The Living age ...
New York [etc.], The Living age co. inc. [etc.]

https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005

www.hathitrust.org

Public Domain
http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

We have determined this work to be in the public domain, meaning that it is not subject to copyright. Users are free to copy, use, and redistribute the work in part or in whole. It is possible that current copyright holders, heirs or the estate of the authors of individual portions of the work, such as illustrations or photographs, assert copyrights over these portions. Depending on the nature of subsequent use that is made, additional rights may need to be obtained independently of anything we can address.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Production Note

Cornell University Library produced this volume to preserve the informational content of the deteriorated original. The best available copy of the original has been used to create this digital copy. It was scanned bitonally at 600 dots per inch resolution and compressed prior to storage using ITU Group 4 compression. Conversion of this material to digital files was supported by the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation. Digital file copyright by Cornell University Library 1995.

This volume has been scanned as part of The Making of America Project, a cooperative endeavor undertaken to preserve and enhance access to historical material from the nineteenth century.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

AP
2
L79t

024852

Cornell University Library

BOUGHT WITH THE INCOME FROM THE SAGE ENDOWMENT FUND
THE GIFT OF Henry W. Sage
1891

A 238690 4/11/09

6896-1

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by
CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S

LIVING AGE.

E PLURIBUS UNUM.

"These publications of the day should from time to time be winnowed, the wheat carefully preserved, and the chaff thrown away."

"Made up of every creature's best."

"Various, that the mind
Of desultory man, studious of change,
And pleased with novelty, may be indulged."

FIFTH SERIES, VOLUME XXIV.

FROM THE BEGINNING, VOL. CXXXIX.

OCTOBER, NOVEMBER, DECEMBER,

1878.

BOSTON:

LITTELL AND GAY.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

AP
2
L79+

A.238670

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Digitized by
CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Pr-XII-20

TABLE OF THE PRINCIPAL CONTENTS

OF

THE LIVING AGE, VOLUME CXXXIX.

THE TWENTY-FOURTH QUARTERLY VOLUME OF THE FIFTH SERIES.

OCTOBER, NOVEMBER, DECEMBER, 1878.

QUARTERLY REVIEW.

Martin Joseph Routh, ... 195
John Dryden, ... 579
Petrarch, ... 771

WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

The Australian Colonies, ... 451

LONDON QUARTERLY REVIEW.

The Brothers Chambers, ... 387

CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

Froude's "Life and Times of Thomas Becket," 32
Selling the Soul, ... 104
Sir Walter Scott and the Romantic Reaction, ... 298
The Sixteenth Century Arraigned before the Nineteenth, ... 323
Originality of the Character of Christ, . 544
What is Going on at the Vatican: A Voice from Rome, ... 643

NEW QUARTERLY REVIEW.

An Indiscretion in the Life of an Heiress, ... 11, 76

FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW.

Hallucinations of the Senses, ... 259
The Character of the Humorist. Charles Lamb, ... 533
Epping Forest, ... 707
A Rajput Chief of the Old School, . . 823

NINETEENTH CENTURY.

The Chinese as Colonists, ... 50
Henri Greville's Sketches of Russian Life, ... 67
The Ceremonial Use of Flowers, . . . 131
Faith and Verification, ... 410
Chrysanthema Gathered from the Greek Anthology, ... 554

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

A Fetish City, ... 111
French Home Life. The Idea of Home, 152
"Fred," a Tale from Japan, ... 283
The Troubles of a Scots Traveller, . 359
A New Method of Social Evolution, . 750
The Cottage by the River, ... 803

FRASER'S MAGAZINE.

The Public Career and Personal Character of Francis Bacon, . . . 91
Holidays in Eastern France, . . 172, 274, 666
Among the Burmese, . . . 232, 490, 734

GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

Sark, and its Caves, ... 116

CORNHILL MAGAZINE.

Child's Play, ... 28
Color in Painting, ... 287
The Eighteenth Century, ... 515
The Fear of Death, ... 619
The Undefinable in Art, ... 760

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Cyprus, ... 3
"Through the Dark Continent" in 1720, 313

TEMPLE BAR.

General Oglethorpe, ... 504
Miss Ferrier's Novels, ... 693
Racine and his Works, ... 740
A Red-Cross Ride through Snow and Death, ... 798

SUNDAY MAGAZINE.

Lichens, ... 576

ARGOSY.

Lighthouses, ... 371

BELGRAVIA.

Bianca, ... 787

SPECTATOR.

The Relation of Memory to Will, . . . 56
Garden-Parties, ... 59
Invalids, ... 61
Apologies, ... 186
For and Against Norway, ... 189
A New Author's Grievance, ... 250
The Sorrows of the Slow, ... 252
Calculating Boys, ... 255
Cambodia, ... 320
Character and Position, ... 442
Weather Prophecies, ... 445
Endurance and Fatalism, ... 447
A Spanish Bull-Fight, ... 511

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The Various Causes of Scepticism, . 573
The Fear of Death, ... 623
Clerical Self-Conceit, ... 821

SATURDAY REVIEW.

The Habit of Reading, ... 124
Bookworms, ... 381
The Things we Have Not, . . . 432
The Art of Going Away, . . . 438
Social Hypocrites, ... 440
Soldiers of Fortune, ... 626
Prince Bismarck, ... 633
Memoirs of Mrs. Jameson, . . . 636
The Sorrows of Lord Penzance, . . 819

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

An American Zollverein, . . . 127
The Old Bed of the Oxus, . . . 567

ATHENÆUM.

Frances Ann Kemble, ... 628

ACADEMY.

A Chinese in Philadelphia, . . . 564
Hans Hendrik, ... 570

NATURE.

Decorative Coloring in Freshwater Fleas, ... 192
Pottery at the Paris Exhibition, . . 635

TIMES.

The North American Indians, . . 434

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

INDEX TO VOLUME CXXXIX.

AMERICAN Zollverein, ... 127
Apologies, ... 186
Author's Grievance, A New . . . 250
Africa, Through, in 1720, . . . 313
American Indians, The 434
Australian Colonies, The . . . 451
Art, The Undefinable in 760

BECKET, Thomas, Froude's Life of . 32
Bacon, Francis, Career and Character of 91
Burmese, Among the . . 232, 490, 734
Buzzing, The, of Insects, . . . 319
Bookworms, ... 381
Bull-Fight, A Spanish 511
Bismarck, Prince 633
Bianca, ... 787

CYPRUS, ... 3
Child's Play, ... 28
Chinese, The, as Colonists, . . . 50
Calculating Boys, ... 255
Color in Painting, ... 287
Cambodia, ... 320
Chambers, The Brothers, William and Robert, ... 387
Character and Position, ... 442
Cooper, Robert E., Jr., ... 538
Christ, Originality of the Character of . 544
Chrysanthema Gathered from the Greek Anthology, ... 554
Chinese, A, in Philadelphia, . . . 564
Cottage by the River, The . . . 803
Clerical Self-Conceit, ... 821

DOUBTING Heart, A . . . 343, 497
Dryden, John 579
Death, The Fear of 619, 623

ENDURANCE and Fatalism, . . . 447
Eighteenth Century, The . . . 515
Epping Forest, ... 707
Evolution, Social, A New Method of . 750

FROUDE'S "Life of Thomas Becket," . 32
Fetish City, A 111
Flowers, The Ceremonial Use of . . 131
French Home Life, ... 152
France, Eastern, Holidays in . 172, 274, 666
Fleas, Freshwater, Decorative Coloring in 192
"Fred," a Tale from Japan, . . . 283
Faith and Verification, ... 410
Fatalism and Endurance, . . . 447
Ferrier's, Miss, Novels, ... 693

GARDEN-PARTIES, ... 59
Greville's, Henri, Sketches of Russian Life, ... 67
Going Away, The Art of . . . 438

HALLUCINATIONS of the Senses, . . 259
Hypocrites, Social 440
Humorist, The Character of the . . 533
Hans Hendrik, ... 570

INDISCRETION, An, in the Life of an Heiress, ... 11, 76
Invalids, ... 61
Indians, The North American . . 434

JAMESON, Mrs., Memoirs of . . . 636

KEMBLE, Frances Ann 628

LITHGOW'S Travels in 1623, . . . 359
Lighthouses, ... 377
Lamb, Charles, The Character of . . 533
Lichens, ... 576

MEMORY, The Relation of, to Will, . 56
Macleod of Dare, . . . 216, 472, 677

NORWAY, For and Against . . . 189
Nineteenth Century, The, and the Sixteenth, ... 323

ORCHARD, An Old-Fashioned . . 384
Oglethorpe, General 504
Oxus, The Old Bed of the . . . 567

POTTERY at the Paris Exhibition, . . 635
Petrarch, ... 771
Penzance, Lord, The Sorrows of . . 819

RUSSIAN Life, Henri Greville's Sketches of 67
Reading, The Habit of 124
Routh, Martin Joseph 195
Rome, A Voice from 643
Racine and his Works, ... 740

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Red-Cross Ride through Snow and Death, ... 798
Rajput Chief, A, of the Old School, . 823

SELLING the Soul, ... 104
Sark, and its Caves, ... 117
Sir Gibbie, . 143, 240, 371, 401, 602, 653
Sorrows of the Slow, The 252
Scott, Sir Walter, and the Romantic Reaction, ... 298
Sixteenth Century, The, and the Nineteenth, ... 323
Scots Traveller, The Troubles of a . 359
Social Hypocrites, ... 440
Scepticism, The Various Causes of . 573
Soldiers of Fortune, ... 626
Self-Conceit, Clerical 821

TROUBLES, The, of a Scots Traveller, . 359
Things we Have Not, ... 432

VATICAN, What is Going on at the . 643

WILL, The Relation of Memory to . 56
Within the Precincts, 161, 269, 423, 527, 717
Wasps' Nests, Spontaneous Combustion of 384
Weather Prophecies, ... 445

POETRY.

"AUS Alten Märchen Winkt es," . . 386
Aberglaube, ... 706
After the Concert, ... 770

Baby's Dead, ... 770

Creature's, The, Song of Expectation, . 2
Commissioned, ... 322
Cardinal-Flowers, ... 770

Do We Well to Mourn? . . . 322

"Ein Jungling Liebt ein Mädchen," . 2
"Ein Fichtenbaum Steht Einsam," . 2

Finest of Fruits, To the 194
Fragment, A 578

Holyday, ... 322
Harvest Day, In 386
Hymn by Saint Colomba, . . . 514

Lament of Marjory Cockburne, . . 2
Lost Eileen, ... 450
Leith Hill, ... 514
Love and Loss, ... 643

My Friend: a Portrait, ... 194
Nightfall, At 258

Only a Little Child, ... 642
Olden Times and Present, . . . 706

Pilgrim Swallow, ... 130
Prayer, ... 579

Rain, ... 194
Rajput Chief, A, of the Old School, . 823

Spray of Seaweed, ... 66
Sea-Horse, The 66
"So Wandl' Ich Wieder den Alten Weg," 66
Sleep, ... 642
Stanzas, ... 706

Thy Face, ... 130
True Philosophy, ... 130
True, ... 258

Unburied Church, The 386

Woods in Autumn, ... 130
Wife and Child, ... 130
Wrong Time, The 258
With a Present, ... 258

TALES.

BIANCA, ... 787

Cooper, Robert E., Jr., ... 538
Cottage by the River, The . . . 803

"Fred," a Tale from Japan, . . . 283

Doubting Heart, A . . . 343, 497

Indiscretion, An, in the Life of an Heiress, ... 11, 76

Macleod of Dare, . . . 216, 472, 677

Sir Gibbie, . 143, 240, 371, 401, 602, 653

Within the Precincts, 161, 269, 423, 527, 717

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXIV. } No. 1790. — October 5, 1878. { From Beginning, Vol. CXXXIX.

CONTENTS.

I.	CYPRUS. Part II.,	Macmillan's Magazine,	3
II.	AN INDISCRETION IN THE LIFE OF AN HEIRESS,	New Quarterly Review,	11
III.	CHILD'S PLAY,	Cornhill Magazine,	18
IV.	MR. FROUDE'S "LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS BECKET." By Edward A. Freeman. Part IV.,	Contemporary Review,	32
V.	THE CHINESE AS COLONISTS,	Nineteenth Century,	50
VI.	THE RELATION OF MEMORY TO WILL,	Spectator,	56
VII.	GARDEN-PARTIES,	Spectator,	59
VIII.	INVALIDS,	Spectator,	61

POETRY.

THE CREATURE'S SONG OF EXPECTATION, ... 2
LAMENT OF MARJORY COCKBURNE, . 2
"EIN JUNGLING LIEBT EIN MADCHEN," 2
"EIN FICHTENBAUM STEHT EINSAM," 2

MISCELLANY, ... 64

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY
LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

THE CREATURE'S SONG OF EXPECTATION.

BY A. L. WARING.

"For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God." — ROM. viii. 19.

THY creatures suffer, O Most High!
And yet thy sons rejoice;
Thy birds sing on to dying men
With clear, exulting voice;
Thy sunbeams dance among the flowers
That veil our dead from sight,
And sorrow lays a harmless hand
On ever-fresh delight.

O sacred Unity of Love!
This life and death behind,
Attracting heart aloof from heart
And mind at war with mind.
To the worn spirit grieved for thee
At every passing jar,
How touching in their fearless tone,
How sweet thy concords are!

If out of depths that sin has made,
And would have filled with woe,
We hear above creation's groan
Her music soft and low,
It is that lovely things on earth
The atoning truth declare —
The hallelujah of thy heaven
Receives an answer there.

Thou hast a spring of endless health,
With issues great and wide,
In the free heart that dares to live
Because thy Christ has died;
An element of bliss divine
That passes mortal bound,
And worships with the heavenly host
At every joyful sound.

When through the haunting shades of death
We take our hallowed way,
And see in resurrection dawn
The place where Jesus lay,
Still love to love in quest of him
The word of comfort gives;
Still angels watching at his grave
Bear witness that he lives.

A gloom may gather as we go,
And sound and sight grow dim;
But day has risen on the paths
That lead his friends to him.
All through the dull decline of sense
And even while we die,
His triumph finds the listening ear
And fills the expecting eye.

We follow him, and earth shines on,
From our faint gaze set free;
Her psalms, that call no more on us,
Pursue their praise of thee.
While thou, on our eternal life
Through all decay intent,
Art keeping for the day of power
Thy human instrument.

Then may our silence in thy hand,
Mid sickness and distress,
Take part in that ascending hymn
Which serves thee none the less;
Till the whole Church's bridal joy,
Unblemish'd and complete,
Shall win a blessed universe
To its Redeemer's feet.

Sunday Magazine.

LAMENT OF MARJORY COCKBURNE.

I SEWED his sheet, making my mane;
I watched the corpse, myself, alane;
I watched his body, night and day;
No living creature came that way.

I took his body on my back,
And whiles I gaed, and whiles I sat;
I digg'd a grave, and laid him in,
And happ'd him with the sod sae green.

But think na ye my heart was sair,
When I laid the moul' on his yellow hair;
O think na ye my heart was wae,
When I turned about, awa' to gae?

Nae living man I'll love again,
Since that my lovely knight is slain;
Wi' ae lock of his yellow hair
I'll chain my heart for evermair.

"EIN JUNGLING LIEBT EIN MADCHEN."

A YOUNG man loves a maiden,
She somebody else prefers,
That somebody else loves another,
Who makes him by wedlock hers.

The maiden in mere vexation,
Because of the loss she has had,
Weds the first kind soul that offers,
And this makes the young man mad.

'Tis an old, a very old story,
But still it is always new;
And when and wherever it happens,
A man's heart is broken in two.

HEINE.

"EIN FICHTENBAUM STEHT EINSAM."

A PINE-TREE stands alone on
A bare bleak northern height;
The ice and snow they swathe it,
As it sleeps there, all in white.

'Tis dreaming of a palm-tree,
In a far-off Eastern land,
That mourns, alone and silent,
On a ledge of burning sand.

HEINE.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From Macmillan's Magazine.

CYPRUS.

II.

UNDER the Sublime Porte the island of Cyprus formed part of the Vilaet of the Archipelago. The chief residence of the vali was at the Dardanelles. The governor of Cyprus, called a mutassurrif, resided in the island, at Leufcosia or Nicosia. He administered the affairs of the island with a council, over which he presided. This council was composed of the mufti, or highest Mussulman religious authority in the island, the Greek archbishop, the muhasebegi, or financial agent, the evcaf-nazir, or administrator of Mussulman religious property, three Mussulman and two Christian notables. The council met as often as it was summoned by the governor, and always once a week. Its decisions were embodied in documents called musbatas, which were signed by all the members present. These decisions relieved the governor of much personal responsibility, and received the highest consideration at Constantinople. The council occupied itself with all questions of public utility and general administration. From the large Mussulman majority in the council it will be evident that no initiative could be taken by the Christian members; indeed, as a matter of fact, all initiative came from the governor. The council was advantageous in giving the governor, invariably a stranger to the island, the benefit of local advice, and in obliging him to act in harmony with the representatives of the country. To a good governor the council never proved a hindrance; to a bad one it was an impediment to be overcome, but it was no protection against the evils of an inactive administration. The island was divided into five districts and sixteen arrondissements. The chief functionary over a district was called a caimakam, and that over an arrondissement was called a mudir. The caimakam, or prefect, administered with a council, and reported to the governor. The mudirs reported to the caimakam. The council of the caimakam consisted of the cadi, or judge, and four notables. Such was the system of administration which prevailed in Cyprus, and which is known in Turkey as the vilaet system. It assigned to the representatives of the people an important position, but, partly from incapacity and partly from servility, the Christian population did not profit by the liberal advantages accorded to it. The result was that the Christian representatives were in reality, although not avowedly, the choice of the governor and caimakams; but this was a defect, not in the system, but in its execution.

It is evident that much of the system which we have just described might be profitably adopted by the British government. Substituting British for the Turkish functionaries who ex officio are members of the councils, eliminating the ecclesiastical members, both Mohammedan and Christian, and giving to Mussulmans and Christians equal representation, there would be the elements of a very desirable council, containing a highly civilized element, in whose hands would be all the initiative, and a less advanced section, possessing local knowledge and practical experience of the country. The evils of a too-greatly personal government would be avoided, and the people would be trained gradually to take an interest in the administration which ruled them. It cannot be too often insisted upon that our task is not to Anglicize Cyprus, but simply to preserve order, to facilitate the development of the material resources of the island, and to further the moral and intellectual interests of its people. We have to practise what we have so long urged on the Porte — viz., to afford to the native races, by an enlightened and impartial administration, the means of moral elevation and material prosperity. For this result too much government is nearly as detrimental as too little. Our administration must be only the enlightened conception which guides the native hand; and the queen of England must be not only the mistress of Cyprus, but also the honored object of the love and devotion of its native races. There is a vast gulf between the natives of Cyprus and the natives of India, which we must not ignore, and our rule in Cyprus will be an utter failure if we apply to it, without important modifications, our Indian notions of government.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The prosperous days of Cyprus were those in which she enjoyed a large share of self-government; and it is to this elevated position that we must again raise her out of the depths of moral degradation and material bankruptcy into which an unenlightened foreign domination has plunged her.

The revenues which the Porte derived from Cyprus may be classified under three heads: (1) Revenues resulting from the administration of property belonging exclusively to the State. (2) A royalty upon the produce of all lands. (3) Taxes, direct and indirect. The general budget of receipts may be estimated as follows:—

1. Revenue from the salt monopoly	£40,000
2. " " tithes of land	70,000
3. " " customs and excise	23,000
4. " " the monopoly of weighing and measuring .	2,300
5. Revenue from stamp duties and transfer of property . .	3,300
6. Revenue from tobacco monopoly	7,000
7. Revenue from direct contributions called verghi . .	30,000
8. Revenue from tax on sheep and goats	6,000
9. Revenue from exemption from military service . . .	7,000
Total . . .	£188,600

Such are the chief taxes, and we will proceed to examine them in detail.

In a former article we explained the nature of the salt monopoly. It is simply an enterprise worked by the government for the exclusive benefit of the treasury, and only in so far as it imposes a fixed price upon the quantity of salt consumed in the island is it a burden upon the population. Of the revenue obtained, 27,000*l.* is derived from salt exported to foreign parts, so that only about 13,000*l.* is paid by local consumers. The working of this revenue is very simple, and the new administration will not do wrong in continuing the system of accounts and control which existed in the past. Some years ago there were extensive abuses perpetrated in the working of this administration, such as charging to the government expenses never incurred, and the delivery of larger quantities of salt than was paid for to the treasury. But these abuses have been, in great measure, put a stop to by a fairly perfect system of control. The revenue from salt may be expected to increase under the British rule. Greater facilities for shipment must be provided, which will be of importance in increasing the export consumption. The expensive and inconvenient transport by carts, from the salt mounds to the shore, must give place to a rapid and easy transport, either by tramway wagon, or by wire tramway bucket; and a good jetty should be constructed to facilitate the loading of small craft. With these facilities, and a slightly reduced tarif, the volume of export shipments may be considerably increased. As the chief object to be aimed at is the enlargement of the circle of consumption, it may be wise to supply the export trade for distant countries, such as England, at lower rates. The article is suitable for ballast, and consequently will be cheaply carried. It is expedient that this source of revenue from export should be developed to its fullest extent, seeing that it benefits the treasury without being in any way a burden upon the island.

The second item of revenue we have described as a royalty upon the produce of all lands. This tax is called "dimes," a contraction of decima, the tenth part. Its existence dates back from very ancient times, and may justly be connected in the mind of the reader with the tithes or tenth part which Abraham paid to Melchizedek, king of Salem. In Turkey, all lands are sold and purchased with this burden, and the natives scarcely regard it as a tax, but rather as the share of the government in the cultivation of the land. It is upon this account that the tithe-tax, although apparently very heavy, is paid by the peasants with far less grumbling than any other tax, and the only disadvantage connected with it is the impediment which the measures necessary for its proper collection are apt to throw in the way of the freedom of the cultivator. This disadvantage is certainly a very serious one, and when speaking of the cultivation of cotton, in my former article, I had occasion to give a very good example of the hurtful manner in which it may operate. Many schemes have been proposed in

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Turkey for the abolition of this tax, but the difficulty is to find an equally profitable source of revenue which shall vary according to the prosperous or adverse circumstances of the cultivator. One proposition received considerable favor amongst Anglo-Turkish reformers at Constantinople, and that was the imposition of a fixed tax upon each pair of bullocks. Taxing the possession of land presented the inconvenience of imposing a burden upon lands which might not be under cultivation, a serious disadvantage in a country where proprietors of large estates often leave extensive tracts of land fallow for years; and it was argued, that by taxing the cultivator according to the number of the bullocks which he possessed, this evil would be obviated. But a grave injustice would have been inflicted by the proposed new system. The tax per pair of bullocks would be necessarily a fixed one, without regard to the value or quality of the bullocks; and in this the small peasant would have been sacrificed. A good pair of bullocks such as most large proprietors possess, will easily cultivate forty acres of grain land, while the small bullocks which the peasant rears and employs cannot cultivate more than twenty to twenty-five acres. The burden of the tax would therefore fall with unjust severity upon the small cultivator. Fuad Pasha, without exception the most enlightened of Turkish statesmen and whose ability would have done honor to any country, was quite conscious of the disadvantages arising from the tax of tithes, and, as an experiment, in one of the provinces of the empire, he converted the tax into a fixed money value, based upon the average of five preceding years. But the experiment did not succeed, and he was obliged to revert to the old system at the urgent request of the inhabitants whom he had wished to benefit by the innovation.

Later on, a somewhat similar experiment was made in Cyprus during my residence. Upon the urgent representations of Halet Bey, then governor of the island, the Porte did not lease the dimes of Cyprus, but agreed, during three years, to give their collection to each village for a yearly payment of the average amount of its tithes during five preceding years. In this way it was hoped that all arbitrary exactions, and all inconvenience to cultivators would be avoided, and that the farmers of the island would benefit by the profits formerly gained by the tax collectors. What occurred in the village of Pyla, with which I was connected, will exemplify the working and defects of the experiment. All the three years were fairly good agricultural years. During the first the primates of the village administered the tax, and at its close declared that there was a loss of about one thousand piastres between the value of tithes collected and the amount fixed by the treasury. The accounts, however, were very imperfectly kept. The loss had to be levied pro rata upon the cultivators, and gave rise to a great deal of angry talk — the result of which was, that the villagers requested me to arrange for the future administration of the tax. This was comparatively easy for me, as more than a third of the tithe had to be paid by me. An accurate account was kept; every one was satisfied, and the village had a profit at the end of the second year of about seven thousand piastres, while the profits of the third year sufficed to pay the personal tax of all the village. Unfortunately, the experience of the first year at Pyla was general in all the island, and repeated during the remaining two years, so that at the end of the period there was a loud demand for a return to the old system. The mass of cultivators did not benefit by the profits, while all were responsible for the losses, and it was evident that if a bad year came round the consequences might be very disastrous. The danger to the treasury and to the peasant cultivators of the conversion of tithe into a fixed yearly sum was thus clearly demonstrated. In a good year the peasant does not set aside of his profits for future contingencies. All his profits he invests in land or cattle if he is frugal, or he spends them thoughtlessly if he is not; and in either case they are not available when a bad year comes round. The land becomes absolutely unsalable, the cattle die off, and the credit of the farmer is so shaken that he generally cannot borrow. In these circumstances, what be-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

comes of the claims of the treasury? They are either not satisfied, which cripples the treasury, or in being satisfied they cripple the peasant. Until the peasant has become more provident, and places his savings where a bad year does not affect them, or until land is a sure source of credit at all times, it will be wiser for the treasury to accept the risk of the seasons with the cultivators, and defend itself against the consequences of a bad year by encashing larger revenues in a good one. The treasury will frequently find compensation for one bad crop in the goodness of another; but under the system of a fixed average tithe this advantage is lost. The tithe due by the unfortunate cultivator becomes a bad debt for which there is no compensation from his more fortunate neighbor. Some years ago it was the intention of the Sublime Porte, yielding to the outcry of Western critics, to substitute for the revenue of dime a tax of four per mille upon the estimated value of all lands, cultivated or uncultivated; and in Cyprus all the necessary estimations were made. To the peasant proprietor this system would generally be advantageous, because, as a rule, he possesses little uncultivated land, but even he regarded the change with disfavor, as he would become subject to the danger of capricious evaluation.

I have entered at some length into this question for two reasons: firstly, because the revenue from tithes is the most important in the island, and, secondly, because I have reason to believe that the idea of imitating the Indian treatment of the question has found considerable favor in influential quarters. I do not deny the expediency of freeing agriculture from the inconveniences of the tithe-collector; all I insist upon is that any conversion into a fixed and invariable money value will be dangerous to both treasury and island until land has got to be a sure and good source of credit; and that any other substitute, such as a fixed rate upon valuations arbitrarily established, or a tax per pair of bullocks, is certain to prove in great measure unjust.

In the preceding remarks I have not spoken except of a real dime or tenth part, but it is right to say that the Turkish government in its extreme impecuniosity exacted during recent years an eighth part. As the British government happily is not in a similar condition, its first fiscal measure ought to be the reduction of "dime" to its true proportion of a tenth part, and this reduction will be most highly esteemed.

The dimes of Cyprus were leased to the highest bidder. When leased as one lot they invariably fell into the hands of a Turkish, Armenian, or Greek banker of Constantinople. But in recent years the Sublime Porte, before adjudging them at Constantinople, authorized the governor of the island to receive and transmit local offers, and these offers were generally made for the dimes divided into five portions — the dimes of the Messorie, of Larnaca, Limasol, Paphos, and Kyrinia. In this way a very advantageous competition was established. The smaller the lots into which the dimes were divided the greater the number of competitors. The dimes were leased from the 13th of March of each year, but it was never found expedient to adjudicate them until after the "latter" rains of spring, when the prospects of the agricultural year could be fairly estimated. The treasury had no expense whatever in the collection.

The revenue from the dimes is certain to increase rapidly and considerably, and this will afford the treasury an opportunity of favoring by reductions certain products which it may be for the interest of the country to encourage. Thus it will be very wise to abolish all dimes upon the product of trees. The loss from such a measure will not amount to 7,000*l.* per annum, and the advantage will be immense in encouraging the plantation of trees — the surest remedy against drought. It will also greatly facilitate the collection of the revenue, for the tax upon the fruit of trees is paid in very small sums, and gives a disproportionate amount of trouble.

We now come to the taxes direct and indirect, but it may be well to draw attention to the fact, that in the salt and dime revenues we have found more than half of all the revenues of the island.

Of indirect taxes that derived from customs is the most important. The customs tarif established by treaty represents eight per cent. upon all imports and one per cent. upon all exports. The justice of these proportions it is difficult to prove — the inconvenience of it is very great. Thus the collection of an export duty of one per cent. is scarcely worth the trouble — the gain is nearly all expended in collection, and great trouble is given to the merchant for very little benefit to the treasury. There appears to be only one of two things to do, either to diminish the import duty and increase proportionately the export duty, or, better still, abolish the export duty. The custom-house administration in Turkey is exceptionally good, and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

greatly better in the provinces than at Constantinople. The system of accounts gives an effective control, and the fact that all the employés of the custom-house are punctually paid out of encashments before these are accounted for to the treasury has had a great influence in raising the standard of integrity in that branch of the civil service in Turkey. To his Excellency Kiani Pasha are due the reforms in the custom-house service, and while he was at its head the comptabilité of the department was quite equal to that of most European countries. The new administrators of Cyprus will find it an easy task to continue the work of reform which his Excellency so well began.

The monopoly of weighing and measuring produces about 2,300*l.* per annun. This revenue is leased out by the government annually in the same way as the dimes, but it is a revenue which ought to be devoted to municipal purposes.

Stamps and a fee upon the transfer of property produce about 3,300*l.* This revenue may with advantage be considerably increased, and indeed the increase is justified by the better commercial facilities and superior administration of justice which are assured by British rule.

Since I left the island a tobacco monopoly has been instituted, which yielded in 1875, 3,300*l.*, and in 1876, 7,000*l.* All such institutions are, however, in direct antagonism to British notions, and only justifiable when extreme financial pressure exists.

The chief direct tax is one called "verghi," which is a personal tax levied upon all householders and bread-winners in the island. The treasury does not directly either apportion or collect the tax. Each village has to contribute a fixed amount to the treasury, for the payment of which the villagers as a whole are responsible. The notables of the village apportion the quantum of the tax to be paid by each bread-winner according to his means, and as they judge just. As may be imagined, absolute justice is not always meted out, but on the other hand it would be difficult to find a better system. Proportionately, the well-to-do pay less than the laboring man, for the simple reason that the former have most to do with the distribution of the tax. The sum usually paid by a working man not proprietor of land, is about twelve shillings per annum. His gross income may be estimated at twelve pounds, so that the tax represents an income tax, without deductions, of one shilling per pound. Few of the peasant farmers, however, paid more than two pounds ten shillings, and as their incomes frequently amount to one hundred pounds, their personal contribution only represented an income-tax of sixpence per pound. The large proprietors, not peasants, did not contribute their just share of this tax, and the Mohammedan proprietors especially got off easily. It will be necessary to obtain accurate statistics of the contributions of each class, and adjust the burden more equitably. Many of the villages will be found to be considerably in arrear of their payments. Years of drought always left their mark in arrears of village contributions, and considerable sums must be due to the Porte from this cause. I hope, however, that the Porte will forego all such claims, as it would be impossible to allow the Turkish authorities to prosecute them, and very disagreeable for British agents to exact them. In the majority of cases, the villagers would contest the exactitude of the account furnished, invoking payments made to the provincial treasurers which were misappropriated.

A tax upon sheep and goats produced a revenue of 6,000*l.* net. This tax was leased annually by the government in the same manner as the tithes of land. If I remember right, the amount paid for each sheep or goat was four-and-a-half piastres annually, while the average value of each animal at that time was only thirty piastres, and the annual income from it did not exceed twenty piastres. As the proprietor of a flock of about six hundred head, I found the tax exorbitantly heavy; but the peasant shepherds relieve themselves from great part of its burden by cheating the collector in regard to the number of their flocks. The rate fixed was the same all over the Turkish empire, and this produced great injustice, as the sheep of Roumelia are worth three times as much as those of Cyprus.

The last item of revenue which has to be mentioned is the indemnity paid by the Christian population for exemption from military service. Either this tax upon the Christian population must now be abolished or it must be extended to the Mohammedan population as well; seeing that both will in future be exempted from military service. The sum produced by the tax is only 7,000*l.*, and it would seem most expedient to abolish it altogether.

From this brief and general survey of the taxation of Cyprus under Turkish rule there appears to me to be much cause for satisfaction to the British taxpayer. We have seen that the revenue derived from

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the island amounts to about 180,000*l.*, and that nearly a quarter of the whole is derived from a property belonging exclusively to the government, and which is very slightly burthensome to the inhabitants of the island. The tithes contribute more than one-third of the whole, and this source of revenue is certain to increase in proportion to the development of the agricultural resources of the island. Customs contribute 23,000*l.*, and this income will also be largely augmented from the importations necessitated by a greatly increased population. British administration will certainly be more costly than that of the Turkish government, but as a set-off against that increase there will be an enlarged income. It will only, therefore, be mismanagement which can make Cyprus a burden to the imperial treasury, and the remedy for this mismanagement will speedily be found when accounts are published. The only urgent necessity is that the accounts connected with the general administration of the island should not be mixed up with those which concern imperial interests. For works of general utility, such as irrigation, roads, and government offices, the local administration may well be debited with the interest upon the capital thus judiciously and economically expended, but the imperial treasury alone has to support the cost of barrack accommodation, a harbor for ironclads, and military depots.

It has frequently been said that Cyprus is unsuitable for imperial purposes in consequence of its complete want of harbors, in which the British fleet may find shelter. This defect must be acknowledged, but it is, I think, greatly exaggerated. In all the roadsteads on the southern coast of the island ships have the very best holding-ground, and, with proper care, may ride out any storm without the least danger. It is otherwise on the northern coast, where the sea-room is more restricted; but the northern coast will never be of value for imperial purposes. The great disadvantage of the roadsteads upon the southern coast is the shallowness of the water, which runs out a considerable distance from the shore, and over which an ugly surf breaks in stormy weather. Anchored within the line of that surf, no vessel will hold in a storm, and in consequence native craft which have not enough of chain to lie outside come ashore yearly in considerable numbers; but during the nine years of my residence in Cyprus no casualty occurred to a European vessel at anchor, nor do I ever remember any such vessel being obliged to go out to sea for safety. January and February are generally the most stormy months, and it then frequently happens that ships in the roadsteads can hold no communication with the shore during several days. But there is no especial danger whatever in ironclads or any seaworthy vessel with good anchors lying off Larnaca, Limasol, or Famagusta, in the worst of the winter months. At Famagusta the Venetians had a little harbor of sufficient size to hold a small fleet of ships of the tonnage of that day. The harbor is now much filled up, but at a moderate expense could be cleared and repaired. The sea-wall is still sufficient to cause calm water within the harbor, and I remember a French steamer of the Frassinet Company entering the harbor and lying in it for some days, when undergoing repairs which could only be made in calm water. I confess that I cannot pretend to be a competent authority, but I feel convinced that no difficulty will be experienced in greatly enlarging the Venetian harbor of Famagusta, and providing good shelter there for large vessels. Such a harbor will be an immense boon to the shipping which frequents that part of the Mediterranean, for there is no shelter for vessels along all the coast of Syria. Any outlay, therefore, incurred in the construction of a harbor at Famagusta would confer great advantages upon very extensive shipping interests, and in a few years a revenue of some importance might be obtained from harbor dues. Famagusta also presents great advantages for a military depot. In the time of the Venetians it must have sufficed for a population of fully thirty thousand inhabitants, and the walls of most of the houses are still standing. The town is surrounded by a ditch, and inclosed within well-built walls of strong masonry, which are in good repair. For the accommodation of a garrison of ten thousand men little more would be needed than restoring the stones to their former places, covering the houses, and delivering the place from the stagnant pools which surround it and the mounds of débris which encumber it. Famagusta might thus become the imperial military station, while Leufcosia or Nicosia, in the centre of the island, was the seat of the local government.

With all these "dry-as-dust" details about taxes and administration my readers must be sufficiently tired, and will feel pleased to change the subject. Equally glad were my sister and I to vary our life

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

in Cyprus with a yearly excursion of three weeks into the interior of the island. Every year we went as much as possible over new ground, and so got to know the island from end to end. I hope many of my readers may decide upon following our example, and I desire for them a great treat when I wish them as much happiness as we experienced. It was always about the middle of April when we started, just as settled weather might be fairly expected, and when the trees were still clad in foliage, the mountain streams boisterous in their fulness, and the fields rich in waving corn, or carpeted in green. Our preparations were simple, for we made up our minds before starting to become, for the time being, children of nature, accepting the homely fare with which the land could furnish us. The only exception in this respect was in providing ourselves with coffee, tea, claret, and brandy — the last only for medicinal purposes. Each had a travelling-bed, which folded into small compass, with its pliable mattress, pillows, sheets, and quilt; and the cavalcade, as it started, was as follows. First a muleteer on his donkey, which all followed, and which was always the freshest at the end of the day's journey. Next came, on a mule, my cawass Hasen, bristling with pistols and dangling a sword, from vanity, not necessity; then your humble servant on his own horse, and my sister on hers. The worthy old Arab groom, Mohammed, who followed on a mule, would allow no one ever to interpose between him and my sister's horse, which he watched with a kind of paternal solicitude. Next came Jacob, my servant, factotum, and paymaster; and behind him a muleteer, on his donkey, followed by a pack-mule, with the beds and bedding. Thus we started about two o'clock in the afternoon, and made our first halt at the hospitable country-seat of an Italian gentleman and large landed proprietor at Nisso, four hours distant from Larnaca. On the way we had passed through the ancient Idalium, and just as we entered it had looked up to a slight rising ground on the left, where was the site of the temple of Venus, which I uncovered, thus recalling pleasant reminiscenes of intensely interesting days. All the valley lying to the left of the village of Dali was a vast cemetery, which the men of Dali turned over. The beautiful earrings of gold and the elegant vases which these tombs contained, speak of a wealth and refinement in past days far greater than is to be found amongst the simple Daliotes who crowd around to see our cavalcade passing, and the contrast reminds us that the world has not everywhere been progressing. But in the grateful shade of the wooded valleys through which we pass, the fine grain crops, and the well-tilled land prepared for cotton, we may easily comprehend the wealth of the past, and indulge in hopes for the future. After enjoying the hospitable cheer of Mrs. Matei, and sleeping comfortably without unpacking our beds, we start next morning, as soon as it is day, for Leufcosia or Nicosia, the capital of the island, three-and-a-half hours distant. About half-way we come upon a large bed of oyster-shells — jolly big oysters, such as are got in England, not the puny ones of Constantinople — and in the first moments of surprise we feel inclined to ask what oystermonger has been throwing out his shells here. Getting down, we pick up some of the finest specimens, thoroughly petrified, and in no danger of giving an indigestion, and look around to see where the sea was which left these disconsolate esculents stranded high and dry. We see ourselves in the midst of a remarkable country of hill and valley, which seems to speak of volcanic action during which the sea retired, and left dry land between the Bay of Morphou and that of Salamis.

Just as the sun begins to feel warm we are passing on our left a little village in no way very attractive, and notice two or three men and women approach us asking alms. Had we been on the other road to Nicosia by Athienou, similar poor creatures would have offered us a drink of water from an aqueduct which crosses the road. From the noses, in some, eaten away, and in others, the fingers rapidly disappearing, we shudder before the sad victims of leprosy, which in these poor creatures we see before us, and then learn that that little village is solely inhabited by lepers, who procure themselves a livelihood by begging alms and cultivating a little soil around the village. It is a sad sight to notice the different stages of the disease. Some are still comparatively fresh and fair, upon others the gradual death has made considerable progress. And yet, how insensible they seem to the dreadful reality! They clamor for food, and seem as thoughtless as other men.

We are glad when, a few minutes past this village, we find ourselves on the breast of a plateau, and see Nicosia lying before us, in what seems nearly the centre of a valley at the base of the rugged-peaked hills of the northern range of mountains. The view is very picturesque, and espe-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

cially striking, because it comes upon us unexpectedly. The tall minarets of the once Catholic Cathedral of St. Sophia, the zinc roofs of the Greek churches glistening in the sunshine, and the rich foliage which surrounds all the houses, invest the first view of Nicosia with a peculiar charm. A quarter-of-an-hour's further ride brings us to the city gateway. The town is completely surrounded by a ditch and well-built fortifications. It is entered by four gateways, that of Larnaca, Famagusta, Kyrinia, and Morpho. The gate of Larnaca, through which we are now passing, looks as if it belonged to primeval times. It is formed of massive, rough-cut wood, of about nine inches thick, and the primitive fastening is simply a large, square-cut beam, fastened on a pivot to the one half of the door, and inserted, when closed, into an iron catch upon the other. When we enter the town, all the beauty which we saw from the outside is dispelled. We pass along ill-paved, narrow streets, the nasal organs rapidly attest that no attention is paid to the cleansing of the town, and the ruined houses here and the broken aqueducts there serve as a signboard to declare that we are in the neglected domains of the crescent and the star. With difficulty we pass through the bazaars, which are crowded with donkeys, mules, and camels bringing produce, and a noisy rabble squabbling over their sales and purchases. From this troublesome crowd, after having rested and refreshed ourselves, we gladly repair to the Church of St. Sophia. The iron chain under which we must stoop in order to enter reminds us disagreeably, as it is intended to do, that this once Christian cathedral is now sacred to Mohammed. The change has affected the architecture as disagreeably as it does our feelings. The minarets blemish the external view just as the dirty mats, faded carpets, and trumpery pulpits destroy the interior. It requires some effort of the imagination to restore the building in thought to its once solemn and sacred aspect, when during three centuries the kings of Cyprus were crowned within its walls with royal pageant. We venture, with considerable misgiving, to disturb the repose of myriads of fleas, and cause to be uncovered the marble slabs on the floor which mark the graves of some of the Lusignan kings. But we are glad to get up into the minarets, and look out upon the grand beauties of nature which are before us. The peaks of the northern range of hills are very fantastic in their cutting. One is called Pentadactylon, or the Five Fingers, from its resemblance to the half-closed fist, with the thumb extended. The next is Mount Buffavento, three thousand two hundred feet above the level of the sea. On the summit of the next is the ruin of an old castle, and close to it the one hundred chambers cut out of the rock. Along all that range of mountains are found quarries of stone, excellent for building, and most durable. In Nicosia we find ourselves in the centre of a great plain, richly covered with grain, and stretching for sixty miles from sea to sea. The highest point of the southern range, five thousand three hundred and eighty feet, is still glistening with snow, and richly covered with pines.

The next afternoon we start for Bellapais, or Dellapais, a convent built in the time of the Lusignans for white-robed nuns. We cross the ridge of hills by a pass near the village of Dikom, and, after winding through wooded valleys for nearly an hour, get the first view of the fine ruins. We go at once inside, and pass to the left, into what was the refectory. Hardly can we tear ourselves away from the exquisite view which meets our eye on looking out from the windows. I will not attempt to describe it. The common sentiment which rises to our lips is that here we would like to stay. It is not like Naples, it is not like Constantinople, it is not like the Lebanon, but it is a sweet sylvan scene which speaks of peace and plenty. Ere many months pass I doubt not the old monastery will have been restored to its pristine completeness, and will shelter British functionaries instead of the white-robed nuns of the past. On leaving the monastery we accepted the hospitality of a very quaint but worthy man, Haggi Sava, a notable of the village, blessed with the luxury of a one-storyed house in the midst of a dense orchard of fruit-trees of every kind. On another occasion, in the month of September, in walking through these orchards I was astonished to observe the ground thickly strewed with fallen bitter oranges, and wondered why this waste. On inquiry it was explained to me that it was not worth while gathering them, for the price which they could obtain in Nicosia barely covered the cost of carriage. My sister thought this would be a paradise to marmalade Keiller of Dundee. The fruit-trees are chiefly, and in some cases only, valued for their flowers, from which are made deliciously fragrant waters. The caroub and olive trees are in great abundance in this district, and our host gathers yearly, from his own property, two hundred

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tons of locust-beans. Both these trees require to be grafted, else the fruit is not good, and the graft used is simply the insertion into the stem of a shoot — in the case of the olive, of what the natives call the male olive-tree, and in the case of the caroub, of an already grafted caroub-tree. The trees grow spontaneously, and are grafted after they have attained a certain height. Our host, Haggi Sava, has grafted the most of all his caroub-trees during his lifetime, and increases his wealth yearly by the same simple means. This leads me to say that in the district of Paphos there are extensive tracts of wild olive-trees which only wait for the hand of man to graft them.

I could with pleasure continue to carry the reader along with us in our pleasant tour from Bellapais to Kyrinia, thence by Lapithos to Morphon, thence by lovely Soli to the convent of Chico, near the summit of Mount Troados; thence to Paphos, old and new; thence, retracing our steps, to Limasol, by the ruins of ancient Curium, and from Limasol to Larnaca, accomplishing the whole tour, without any great fatigue, in twenty-one days. But I gladly leave the pleasant task to the more able pen of some equally fortunate tourist, of whom I hope ere long the names may be "legion." The public will, however, do well to refuse to read all impressions of Cyprus written before next April, and to prepare themselves for most lugubrious accounts from the pens of all summer excursionists.

This leads me to say a few words in conclusion on the climate of Cyprus. The island is very commonly called unhealthy, but I object to the expression until I know what is meant. If it is meant that Englishmen cannot go out there during the summer months without a considerable risk of catching fever and ague, I admit its correctness. But I ask to what country, with the thermometer generally about 90° in the shade, can Englishmen, with their national love of heavy eating, and of alcoholic liquors, be sent without incurring a considerable risk of sickness of some kind? It will be found, however, that a large proportion of those who go to Cyprus enjoy as good health as they can hope for in any country. Further, I object to blaming the climate for evils which result from defective sanitary regulations, and especially from the over-crowding, without previous preparation, of towns without sewers or street-cleansers, surrounded by stagnant pools and by all that the laziness and indifference of man can accomplish to infect the air. I would judge of the healthiness or unhealthiness of the climate from its effects upon those who, from long wont, live in accordance with its requirements, and who inhabit places free from exceptional and removable disadvantages. Judged by this standard, the climate of Cyprus cannot be declared unhealthy. It is inhabited, and has been from time immemorial, by a perfectly healthy and robust native population, free from all serious sickness, and living to a hale old age. A climate of which this can be said is not justly called unhealthy. Facts, however, often carry more conviction than reasoning, and it is a fact that I lived in Larnaca, and went about the island summer and winter during nine years, and never enjoyed better health anywhere. My sister did so during four years with a similar experience. The consular changes which I witnessed during my residence there were of three French consuls, three Italian consuls, three British and two American consuls, and the only casualties amongst them were the death of a French consul from cholera and of an Italian consul when absent from the island. All the others, although disgusted with an inactive life destitute of social resources, left the island in perfectly robust health, and never suffered from any serious sickness. Of the pernicious fevers which destroy many lives, reported by Dr. Clarke — who spent ten days in the island — I can only say that I never heard of them during my residence, although they may have existed before my arrival. Of the dreadful asps, taruntulas, etc., I admit that they exist, but I only found specimens after considerable search.

R. HAMILTON LANG.

August 9, 1878.

From The New Quarterly Review.

AN INDISCRETION IN THE LIFE OF AN HEIRESS.

PART I.

CHAPTER I.

When I would pray and think, I think and pray
To several subjects: heaven hath my empty words;
Whilst my invention, hearing not my tongue,
Anchors on Isabel.

THE congregation in Tollamore church were singing the evening hymn, the people gently swaying backwards and forwards like trees in a soft breeze. The heads of the village children, who sat in the gallery, were inclined to one side as they uttered

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

their shrill notes, their eyes listlessly tracing some crack in the old walls, or following the movement of a distant bough or bird, with features rapt almost to painfulness.

In front of the children stood a thoughtful young man, who was plainly enough the schoolmaster; and his gaze was fixed on a remote part of the aisle beneath him. When the singing was over, and all had sat down for the sermon, his eyes still remained in the same place. There was some excuse for their direction, for it was in a straight line forwards; but their fixity was only to be explained by some object before them. This was a square pew, containing one solitary sitter. But that sitter was a young lady, and a very sweet lady was she.

Afternoon service in Tollamore parish was later than in many others in that neighborhood; and as the darkness deepened during the progress of the sermon, the rector's pulpit candles shone to the remotest nooks of the building, till at length they became the sole lights of the congregation. The lady was the single person besides the preacher whose face was turned westwards, the pew that she occupied being the only one in the church in which the seat ran all round. She reclined in her corner, her bonnet and dark dress growing by degrees invisible, and at last only her upturned face could be discerned, a solitary white spot against the black surface of the wainscot. Over her head rose a vast marble monument, erected to the memory of her ancestors, male and female; for she was one of high standing in that parish. The design consisted of a winged skull and two cherubim, supporting a pair of tall Corinthian columns, between which spread a broad slab, containing the roll of ancient names, lineages, and deeds, and surmounted by a pediment, with the crest of the family at its apex.

As the youthful schoolmaster gazed, and all these details became dimmer, her face was modified in his fancy, till it seemed almost to resemble the carved marble skull immediately above her head. The thought was unpleasant enough to arouse him from his half-dreamy state, and he entered on rational considerations of what a vast gulf lay between that lady and himself, what a troublesome world it was to live in where such divisions could exist, and how painful was the evil when a man of his unequal history was possessed of a keen susceptibility.

Now a close observer, who should have happened to be near the large pew, might have noticed before the light got low that the interested gaze of the young man had been returned from time to time by the young lady, although he, towards whom her glances were directed, did not perceive the fact. It would have been guessed that something in the past was common to both, notwithstanding their difference in social standing. What that was may be related in a few words.

One day in the previous week there had been some excitement in the parish on account of the introduction upon the farm of a steam threshing-machine for the first time, the date of these events being some thirty years ago. The machine had been hired by a farmer who was a relative of the schoolmaster's, and when it was set going all the people round about came to see it work. It was fixed in a corner of a field near the main road, and in the afternoon a passing carriage stopped outside the hedge. The steps were let down, and Miss Geraldine Allenville, the young woman whom we have seen sitting in the church pew, came through the gate of the field towards the engine. At that hour most of the villagers had been to the spot, had gratified their curiosity, and afterwards gone home again; so that there were only now left standing beside the engine the engine-man, the farmer, and the young schoolmaster, who had come like the rest. The laborers were at the other part of the machine, under the cornstack some distance off.

The girl looked with interest at the whizzing wheels, asked questions of the old farmer, and remained in conversation with him for some time, the schoolmaster standing a few paces distant, and looking more or less towards her. Suddenly the expression of his face changed to one of horror; he was by her side in a moment, and, seizing hold of her, he swung her round by the arm to a distance of several feet.

In speaking to the farmer she had inadvertently stepped backwards, and had drawn so near to the band which ran from the engine to the drum of the thresher that in another moment her dress must have been caught, and she would have been whirled round the wheel as a mangled carcase. As soon as the meaning of the young man's act was understood by her she turned deadly pale and nearly fainted. When she was well enough to walk, the two men led her to the carriage, which had been standing outside the hedge all the time.

"You have saved me from a ghastly

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY.
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

death!" the agitated girl murmured to the schoolmaster. "Oh! I can never forget it!" and then she sank into the carriage and was driven away.

On account of this the schoolmaster had been invited to Tollamore House to explain the incident to the squire, the young lady's only living parent. Mr. Allenville thanked her preserver, inquired the history of his late father, a painter of good family, but unfortunate and improvident; and finally told his visitor that, if he were fond of study, the library of the house was at his service. Geraldine herself had spoken very impulsively to the young man — almost, indeed, with imprudent warmth — and his tender interest in her during the church service was the result of the sympathy she had shown.

And thus did an emotion, which became this man's sole motive power through many following years, first arise and establish itself. Only once more did she lift her eyes to where he sat, and it was when they all stood up before leaving. This time he noticed the glance. Her look of recognition led his feelings onward yet another stage. Admiration grew to be attachment; he even wished that he might own her, not exactly as a wife, but as a being superior to himself — in the sense in which a servant may be said to own a master. He would have cared to possess her in order to exhibit her glories to the world, and he scarcely even thought of her ever loving him.

There were two other stages in his course of love, but they were not reached till some time after to-day. The first was a change from this proud desire to a longing to cherish. The last stage, later still, was when her very defects became rallying-points for defence, when every one of his senses became special pleaders for her; and that not through blindness, but from a tender inability to do aught else than defend her against all the world.

CHAPTER II.

She was active, stirring, all fire —
Could not rest, could not tire —
Never in all the world such an one!
And here was plenty to be done,
And she that could do it, great or small,
She was to do nothing at all.

FIVE mornings later the same young man was looking out of the window of Tollamore village school in a fixed and absent manner. The weather was exceptionally mild, though scarcely to the degree which would have justified his airy situation at such a month of the year. A hazy light spread through the air, the landscape on which his eyes were resting being enlivened and lit up by the spirit of an unseen sun rather than by its direct rays. Every sound could be heard for miles. There was a great crowing of cocks, bleating of sheep, and cawing of rooks, which proceeded from all points of the compass, rising and falling as the origin of each sound was near or far away. There were also audible the voices of people in the village, interspersed with hearty laughs, the bell of a distant flock of sheep, a robin close at hand, vehicles in the neighboring roads and lanes. One of these latter noises grew gradually more distinct, and proved itself to be rapidly nearing the school. The listener blushed as he heard it.

"Suppose it should be!" he said to himself.

He had said the same thing at every such noise that he had heard during the foregoing week, and had been mistaken in his hope. But this time a certain carriage did appear in answer to his expectation. He came from the window hastily; and in a minute a footman knocked and opened the school door.

"Miss Allenville wishes to speak to you, Mr. Mayne."

The schoolmaster went to the porch — he was a very young man to be called a schoolmaster — his heart beating with excitement.

"Good morning," she said, with a confident yet girlish smile. "My father expects me to inquire into the school arrangements, and I wish to do so on my own account as well. May I come in?"

She entered as she spoke, telling the coachman to drive to the village on some errand, and call for her in half an hour.

Mayne could have wished that she had not been so thoroughly free from all apparent consciousness of the event of the previous week, of the fact that he was considerably more of a man than the small persons by whom the apartment was mainly filled, and that he was as nearly as possible at her own level in age, as wide in sympathies, and possibly more inflammable in heart. But he soon found that a sort of fear to entrust her voice with the subject of that link between them was what restrained her. When he had explained a few details of routine she moved away from him round the school.

He turned and looked at her as she stood among the children. To his eyes her beauty was indescribable. Before he had met her he had scarcely believed that any woman in the world could be so lovely.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The clear, deep eyes, full of all tender expressions; the fresh, subtly-curved cheek, changing its tones of red with the fluctuation of each thought; the ripe tint of her delicate mouth, and the indefinable line where lip met lip; the noble bend of her neck, the wavy lengths of her dark brown hair, the soft motions of her bosom when she breathed, the light fall of her little feet, the elegant contrivances of her attire, all struck him as something he had dreamed of and was not actually seeing. Geraldine Allenville was, in truth, very beautiful; she was a girl such as his eyes had never elsewhere beheld; and her presence here before his face kept up a sharp struggle of sweet and bitter within him.

He had thought at first that the flush on her face was caused by the fresh air of the morning; but, as it quickly changed to a lesser hue, it occurred to Mayne that it might after all have arisen from shyness at meeting him after her narrow escape. Be that as it might, their conversation, which at first consisted of bald sentences, divided by wide intervals of time, became more frequent, and at last continuous. He was painfully soon convinced that her tongue would never have run so easily as it did had it not been that she thought him a person on whom she could vent her ideas without reflection or punctiliousness — a thought, perhaps, expressed to herself by such words as, "I will say what I like to him, for he is only our schoolmaster."

"And you have chosen to keep a school," she went on, with a shade of mischievousness in her tone, looking at him as if she thought that, had she been a man capable of saving people's lives, she would have done something much better than teaching. She was so young as to habitually think thus of other persons' courses.

"No," he said simply; "I don't choose to keep a school in the sense you mean, choosing it from a host of pursuits, all equally possible."

"How came you here, then?"

"I fear more by chance than by aim."

"Then you are not very ambitious?"

"I have my ambitions, such as they are."

"I thought so. Everybody has nowadays. But it is a better thing not to be too ambitious, I think."

"If we value ease of mind, and take an economist's view of our term of life, it may be a better thing."

Having been tempted, by his unexpectedly cultivated manner of speaking, to say more than she had meant to say, she found it embarrassing either to break off or to say more, and in her doubt she stooped to kiss a little girl.

"Although I spoke lightly of ambition," she observed, without turning to him, "and said that easy happiness was worth most, I could defend ambition very well, and in the only pleasant way."

"And that way?"

"On the broad ground of the loveliness of any dream about future triumphs. In looking back there is a pleasure in contemplating a time when some attractive thing of the future appeared possible, even though it never came to pass."

Mayne was puzzled to hear her talk in this tone of maturity. That such questions of success and failure should have occupied his own mind seemed natural, for they had been forced upon him by the difficulties he had encountered in his pursuit of a career. He was not just then aware how very unpractical the knowledge of this sage lady of seventeen really was; that it was merely caught up by intercommunication with people of culture and experience, who talked before her of their theories and beliefs till she insensibly acquired their tongue.

The carriage was heard coming up the road. Mayne gave her the list of the children, their ages, and other particulars which she had called for, and she turned to go out. Not a word had been said about the incident by the threshing-machine, though each one could see that it was constantly in the other's thoughts. The roll of the wheels may or may not have reminded her of her position in relation to him. She said, bowing, and in a somewhat more distant tone: "We shall all be glad to learn that our schoolmaster is so — nice; such a philosopher." But, rather surprised at her own cruelty in uttering the latter words, she added one of the sweetest laughs that ever came from lips, and said, in gentlest tones, "Good morning; I shall always remember what you did for me. Oh! it makes me sick to think of that moment. I came on purpose to thank you again, but I could not say it till now!"

Mayne's heart, which had felt the rebuff, came round to her with a rush; he could have almost forgiven her for physically wounding him if she had asked him in such a tone not to notice it. He watched her out of sight, thinking in rather a melancholy mood how time would absorb all her beauty, as the growing distance between them absorbed her form. He then went in, and endeavored to recall every

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

word that he had said to her, troubling and racking his mind to the utmost of his ability about his imagined faults of manner. He remembered that he had used the indicative mood instead of the proper subjective in a certain phrase. He had given her to understand that an old idea he had made use of was his own, and so on through other particulars, each of which was an item of misery.

The place and the manner of her sitting were defined by the position of her chair, and by the books, maps, and prints scattered round it. Her "I shall always remember," he repeated to himself, aye, a hundred times; and though he knew the plain import of the words, he could not help toying with them, looking at them from all points, and investing them with extraordinary meanings.

CHAPTER III.

But what is this? I turn about
And find a trouble in thine eye.

EGBERT MAYNE, though at present filling the office of village schoolmaster, had been intended for a less narrow path. His position at this time was entirely owing to the death of his father in embarrassed circumstances two years before. Mr. Mayne had been a landscape and animal painter, and had settled in the village in early manhood, where he set about improving his prospects by marrying a small farmer's daughter. The son had been sent away from home at an early age to a good school, and had returned at seventeen to enter upon some professional life or other. But his father's health was at this time declining, and when the painter died, a year and a half later, nothing had been done for Egbert. He was now living with his maternal grandfather, Richard Broadford, the farmer, who was a tenant of Squire Allenville's. Egbert's ideas did not incline to painting, but he had ambitious notions of adopting a literary profession, or entering the Church, or doing something congenial to his tastes whenever he could set about it. But first it was necessary to read, mark, learn, and look around him; and, a master being temporarily required for the school until such time as it should be placed under government inspection, he stepped in and made use of the occupation as a stop-gap for a while.

He lived in his grandfather's farmhouse, walking backwards and forwards to the school every day, in order that the old man, who would otherwise be living quite alone, might have the benefit of his society during the long winter evenings. Egbert was much attached to his grandfather, and so, indeed, were all who knew him. The old farmer's amiable disposition and kindliness of heart, while they had hindered him from enriching himself one shilling during the course of a long and laborious life, had also kept him clear of every arrow of antagonism. The house in which he lived was the same that he had been born in, and was almost a part of himself. It had been built by his father's father; but on the dropping of the lives for which it was held, some twenty years earlier, it had lapsed to the Squire.

Richard Broadford was not, however, dispossessed: after his father's death the family had continued as before in the house and farm, but as yearly tenants. It was much to Broadford's delight, for his pain at the thought of parting from those old sticks and stones of his ancestors, before it had been known if the tenure could be continued, was real and great.

On the evening of the day on which Miss Allenville called at the school Egbert returned to the farmhouse as usual. He found his grandfather sitting with his hands on his knees, and showing by his countenance that something had happened to disturb him greatly. Egbert looked at him inquiringly, and with some misgiving.

"I have got to go at last, Egbert," he said, in a tone intended to be stoical, but far from it. "He is my enemy after all."

"Who?" said Mayne.

"The squire. He's going to take seventy acres of neighbor Greenman's farm to enlarge the park; and Greenman's acreage is to be made up to him, and more, by throwing my farm in with his. Yes, that's what the squire is going to have done. . . . Well, I thought to have died here; but 'tisn't to be."

He looked as helpless as a child, for age had weakened him. Egbert endeavored to cheer him a little, and vexed as the young man was, he thought there might yet be some means of tiding over this difficulty. "Mr. Allenville wants seventy acres more in his park, does he?" he echoed mechanically. "Why can't it be taken entirely out of Greenman's farm? His is big enough, Heaven knows; and your hundred acres might be left you in peace."

"Well mayest say so! Oh, it is because he is tired of seeing old-fashioned farming like mine.. He likes the young generation's system best, I suppose."

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"If I had only known this this afternoon!" Egbert said.

"You could have done nothing."

"Perhaps not." Egbert was, however, thinking that he would have mentioned the matter to his visitor, and told her such circumstances as would have enlisted her sympathies in the case.

"I thought it would come to this," said old Richard vehemently. "The present Squire Allenville has never been any real friend to me. It was only through his wife that I have stayed here so long. If it hadn't been for her, we should have gone the very year that my poor father died, and the house fell into hand. I wish we had now. You see, now she's dead, there's nobody to counteract him in his schemes; and so I am to be swept away."

They talked on thus, and by bedtime the old man was in better spirits. But the subject did not cease to occupy Egbert's mind, and that anxiously. Were the house and farm which his grandfather had occupied so long to be taken away, Egbert knew it would affect his life to a degree out of all proportion to the seriousness of the event. The transplanting of old people is like the transplanting of old trees; a twelvemonth usually sees them wither and die away.

The next day proved that his anticipations were likely to be correct, his grandfather being so disturbed that he could scarcely eat or drink. The remainder of the week passed in just the same way. Nothing now occupied Egbert's mind but a longing to see Miss Allenville. To see her would be bliss; to ask her if anything could be done by which his grandfather might retain the farm and premises would be nothing but duty. His hope of good results from the course was based on the knowledge that Allenville, cold and hard as he was, had some considerable affection for or pride in his daughter, and that thus she might influence him.

It was not likely that she would call at the school for a week or two at least, and Mayne therefore tried to meet with her elsewhere. One morning early he was returning from the remote hamlet of Hawksgate, on the further side of the parish, and the nearest way to the school was across the park. He read as he walked, as was customary with him, though at present his thoughts wandered incessantly. The path took him through a shrubbery running close up to a remote wing of the mansion. Nobody seemed to be stirring in that quarter, till, turning an angle, he saw Geraldine's own graceful figure close at hand, robed in fur, and standing at ease outside an open French casement.

She was startled by his sudden appearance, but her face soon betrayed a sympathetic remembrance of him. Egbert scarcely knew whether to stop or to walk on, when, casting her eyes upon his book, she said, "Don't let me interrupt your reading."

"I am glad to have ——" he stammered, and for the moment could get no farther. His nervousness encouraged her to continue. "What are you reading?" she said.

The book was, as may possibly be supposed by those who know the mood inspired by hopeless attachments, "Childe Harold's Pilgrimage," a poem which at that date had never been surpassed in congeniality to the minds of young persons in the full fever of virulent love. He was rather reluctant to let her know this; but as the inquiry afforded him an opening for conversation he held out the book, and her eye glanced over the page.

"Oh, thank you," she said hastily, "I ought not to have asked that — only I am interested always in books. Is your grandfather quite well, Mr. Mayne? I saw him yesterday, and thought he seemed to be not in such good health as usual."

"His mind is disturbed," said Egbert.

"Indeed, why is that?"

"It is on account of his having to leave the farm. He is old, and was born in that house."

"Ah, yes, I have heard something of that," she said with a slightly regretful look. "Mr. Allenville has decided to enlarge the park. Born in the house, was he?"

"Yes. His father built it. May I ask your opinion on the point, Miss Allenville? Don't you think it would be possible to enlarge the park without taking my grandfather's farm? Greenman has already five hundred acres."

She was perplexed how to reply, and evading the question said, "Your grandfather much wishes to stay?"

"He does, intensely — more than you can believe or think. But he will not ask to be let remain. I dread the effect of leaving upon him. If it were possible to contrive that he should not be turned out I should be grateful indeed."

"I — I will do all I can that things may remain as they are," she said with a deepened color. "In fact, I am almost certain that he will not have to go, since it is so painful to him," she added in the sanguine

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tones of a child. "My father could not have known that his mind was so bent on staying."

Here the conversation ended, and Egbert went on with a lightened heart. Whether his pleasure arose entirely from having done his grandfather a good turn, or from the mere sensation of having been near her, he himself could hardly have determined.

CHAPTER IV.

Oh, for my sake, do you with fortune chide
The guilty goddess of my harmful deed,
That did not better for my life provide.

NOW commenced a period during which Egbert Mayne's emotions burnt in a more unreasoning and wilder worship than at any other time in his life. The great condition of idealization in love was present here, that of an association in which, through difference in rank, the petty human elements that enter so largely into life are kept entirely out of sight, and there is hardly awakened in the man's mind a thought that they appertain to her at all.

He deviated frequently from his daily track to the spot where the last meeting had been, till, on the fourth morning after, he saw her there again; but she let him pass that time with a bare recognition. Two days later the carriage drove down the lane to the village as he was walking away. When they met she told the coachman to stop.

"I am glad to tell you that your grandfather may be perfectly easy about the house and farm," she said; as if she took unfeigned pleasure in saying it. "The question of altering the park is postponed indefinitely. I have resisted it: I could do no less for one who did so much for me."

"Thank you very warmly," said Egbert so earnestly that she blushed crimson as the carriage rolled away.

The spring drew on, and he saw and spoke with her several times. In truth he walked abroad much more than had been usual with him formerly, searching in all directions for her form. Had she not been unreflecting and impressionable — had not her life dragged on as uneventfully as that of one in gaol, through her residing in a great house with no companion but an undemonstrative father; and, above all, had not Egbert been a singularly engaging young man of that distracting order of beauty which grows upon the feminine gazer with every glance, this tender waylaying would have made little difference to anybody. But such was not the case. In return for Egbert's presence of mind at the threshing she had done him a kindness, and the pleasure that she took in the act shed an added interest upon the object of it. Thus, on both sides it had happened that a deed of solicitude casually performed gave each doer a sense of proprietorship in its recipient, and a wish still further to establish that position by other deeds of the same sort.

To still further kindle Geraldine's indiscreet interest in him, Egbert's devotion became perceptible ere long even to her inexperienced eyes; and it was like a new world to the young girl. At first she was almost frightened at the novelty of the thing. Then the fascination of the discovery caused her ready, receptive heart to palpitate in an ungovernable manner whenever he came near her. She was not quite in love herself, but she was so moved by the circumstance of her deliverer being in love, that she could think of nothing else. His appearing at odd places startled her; and yet she rather liked that kind of startling. Too often her eyes rested on his face; too often her thoughts surrounded his figure and dwelt on his conversation.

One day when they met on a bridge, they did not part till after a long and interesting conversation on books, in which many opinions of Mayne's (crude and unformed enough, it must be owned) that happened to take her fancy, set her glowing with ardor to unfold her own.

After any such meeting as this, Egbert would go home and think for hours of her little remarks and movements. The day and minute of every accidental rencounter became registered in his mind with the indelibility of ink. Years afterwards he could recall at a moment's notice that he saw her at eleven o'clock on the third of April, a Sunday; at four on Tuesday, the twelfth; at a quarter to six on Thursday, the twenty-eighth; that on the ninth it rained at a quarter past two, when she was walking up the avenue; that on the seventeenth the grass was rather too wet for a lady's feet; and other calendrical and meteorological facts of no value whatever either to science or history.

On a Tuesday evening, when they had had several conversations out of doors, and when a passionate liking for his society was creeping over the reckless though pure girl, slowly, insidiously, and surely, like ripeness over fruit, she further committed herself by coming alone to the school. A heavy rain had threatened to fall all the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd afternoon, and just as she entered it began. School hours were at that moment over, but he waited a few moments before dismissing the children, to see if the storm would clear up. After looking round at the classes, and making sundry inquiries of the little ones in the usual manner of ladies who patronize a school, she came up to him.

"I listened outside before I came in. It was a great pleasure to hear the voices — three classes reading at three paces." She continued with a laugh: "There was a rough treble voice bowling easily along, an ambling sweet voice earnest about fishes in the sea, and a shrill voice spelling out letter by letter. Then there was a shuffling of feet — then you sang. It seemed quite a little poem."

"Yes," Egbert said. "But perhaps, like many poems, it was hard prose to the originators."

She remained thinking, and Mayne looked out at the weather. Judging from the sky and wind that there was no likelihood of a change that night, he proceeded to let the children go. Miss Allenville assisted in wrapping up as many of them as possible in the old coats and other apparel which Egbert kept by him for the purpose. But she touched both clothes and children rather gingerly, and as if she did not much like the contact.

Egbert's sentiments towards her that evening were vehement and curious. Much as he loved her, his liking for the peasantry about him — his mother's ancestry — caused him sometimes a twinge of self-reproach for thinking of her so exclusively, and nearly forgetting all his old acquaintance, neighbors, and his grandfather's familiar friends, with their rough but honest ways. To further complicate his feelings to-night there was the sight, on the one hand, of the young lady with her warm rich dress and glowing future, and on the other of the weak little boys and girls — some only five years old, and none more than twelve, going off in their different directions in the pelting rain, some for a walk of more than two miles, with the certainty of being drenched to the skin, and with no change of clothes when they reached their home. He watched the rain-spots thickening upon the faded frocks, worn-out tippets, yellow straw hats and bonnets, and coarse pinafores of his unprotected little flock as they walked down the path, and was thereby reminded of the hopelessness of his attachment, by perceiving how much more nearly akin was his lot to theirs than to hers.

Miss Allenville, too, was looking at the children, and unfortunately she chanced to say, as they toddled off, "Poor little wretches!"

A sort of despairing irritation at her remoteness from his plane, as implied by her pitying the children so unmercifully, impelled him to remark, "Say poor little children, madam."

She was silent — awkwardly silent.

"I suppose I must walk home," she said, when about half a minute had passed. "Nobody knows where I am, and the carriage may not find me for hours."

"I'll go for the carriage," said Egbert readily.

But he did not move. While she had been speaking, there had grown up in him a conviction that these opportunities of seeing her would soon necessarily cease. She would get older, and would perceive the incorrectness of being on intimate terms with him merely because he had snatched her from danger. He would have to engage in a more active career, and go away. Such ideas brought on an irresistible climax to an intense and long-felt desire. He had just reached that point in the action of passion upon mind at which it masters judgment.

It was almost dark in the room, by reason of the heavy clouds and the nearness of the night. But the fire had just flamed up brightly in the grate, and it threw her face and form into ruddy relief against the grey wall behind.

Suddenly rushing towards her, he seized her hand before she comprehended his intention, kissed it tenderly, and clasped her in his arms. Her soft body yielded like wool under his embrace. As suddenly releasing her he turned, and went back to the other end of the room.

Egbert's feeling as he retired was that he had committed a crime. The madness of the action was apparent to him almost before it was completed. There seemed not a single thing left for him to do, but to go into lifelong banishment for such sacrilege. He faced round and regarded her. Her features were not visible enough to judge of their expression. All that he could discern through the dimness and his own agitation was that for some time she remained quite motionless. Her state was probably one of suspension; as with Ulysses before Melanthus, she may have > entertained a breast

> That in the strife of all extremes did rest.

In one, two, or five minutes — neither of

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

them ever knew exactly how long — apparently without the motion of a limb, she glided noiselessly to the door and vanished.

Egbert leant himself against the wall, almost distracted. He could see absolutely no limit to the harm that he had done by his wild and unreasoning folly. "Am I a man to thus ill-treat the loveliest girl that ever was born? Sweet injured creature — how she will hate me!" These were some of the expressions that he murmured in the twilight of that lonely room.

Then he said that she certainly had encouraged him, which, unfortunately for her, was only too true. She had seen that he was always in search of her, and she did not put herself out of his way. He was sure that she liked him to admire her. "Yet, no," he murmured, "I will not excuse myself at all."

The night passed away miserably. One conviction by degrees overruled all the rest in his mind — that if she knew precisely how pure had been his longing towards her, she could not think badly of him. His reflections resulted in a resolve to get an interview with her, and make his defence and explanation in full. The decision come to, his impatience could scarcely preserve him from rushing to Tollamore House that very daybreak, and trying to get into her presence, though it was the likeliest of suppositions that she would never see him.

Every spare minute of the following days he hovered round the house, in hope of getting a glimpse of her; but not once did she make herself visible. He delayed taking the extreme step of calling, till the hour came when he could delay no longer. On a certain day he rang the bell with a mild air, and disguised his feelings by looking as if he wished to speak to her merely on copy-books, slates, and other school matters, the school being professedly her hobby. He was told that Miss Allenville had gone on a visit to some relatives thirty-five miles off, and that she would probably not return for a month.

As there was no help for it, Egbert settled down to wait as he best could, not without many misgivings lest his rash action, which a prompt explanation might have toned down and excused, would now be the cause of a total estrangement between them, so that nothing would restore him to the place he had formerly held in her estimation. That she had ever seriously loved him he did not hope or dream; but it was intense pain to him to be out of her favor.

CHAPTER V.

So I soberly laid my last plan
To extinguish the man,
Round his creep-hole, with never a break
Ran my fires for his sake;
Over head did my thunder combine
With my underground mine:
Till I looked from my labor content
To enjoy the event.
When sudden — how think ye the end?

A WEEK after the crisis mentioned above, it was secretly whispered to Egbert's grandfather that the park enlargement scheme was after all to be proceeded with; that Miss Allenville was extremely anxious to have it put in hand as soon as possible. Farmer Broadford's farm was to be added to Greenman's, as originally intended, and the old house that Broadford lived in was to be pulled down as an encumbrance.

"It is she this time!" murmured Egbert gloomily. "Then I did offend her, and mortify her; and she is resentful."

The excitement of his grandfather again caused him much alarm, and even remorse. Such was the responsiveness of the farmer's physical to his mental state that in the course of a week his usual health failed, and his gloominess of mind was followed by dimness of sight and giddiness. By much persuasion Egbert induced him to stay at home for a day or two; but indoors he was the most restless of creatures, through not being able to engage in the pursuits to which he had been accustomed from his boyhood. He walked up and down, looking wistfully out of the window, shifting the positions of books and chairs, and putting them back again, opening his desk and shutting it after a vacant look at the papers, saying he should never get settled in another farm at his time of life, and evincing all the symptoms of nervousness and excitability.

Meanwhile Egbert anxiously awaited Miss Allenville's return, more resolved than ever to obtain audience of her, and beg her not to visit upon an unoffending old man the consequences of a young one's folly. Any retaliation upon himself he would accept willingly, and own to be well deserved.

At length, by making off-hand inquiries (for he dared not ask directly for her again) he learnt that she was to be at home on the Thursday. The following Friday and Saturday he kept a sharp look-out; and, when lingering in the park for at least the tenth time in that half-week, a sudden rise in the ground revealed her coming along a path.

Egbert stayed his advance, in order that,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

if she really objected to see him, she might easily strike off into a side path or turn back.

She did not accept the alternatives, but came straight on to where he lingered, averting her face waywardly as she approached. When she was within a few steps of him he could see that the trimmings of her dress trembled like leaves. He cleared his dry throat to speak.

"Miss Allenville," he said, humbly taking off his hat, "I should be glad to say one word to you, if I may."

She looked at him for just one moment, but said nothing; and he could see that the expression of her face was flushed, and her mood skittish. The place they were standing in was a remote nook, hidden by the trunks and boughs, so that he could afford to give her plenty of time, for there was no fear of their being observed or overheard. Indeed, knowing that she often walked that way, Egbert had previously surveyed the spot and thought it suitable for the occasion, much as Wellington antecedently surveyed the field of Waterloo.

Here the young man began his pleading speech to her. He dilated upon his sensations when first he saw her; and as he became warmed by his oratory he spoke of all his inmost perturbations on her account without the slightest reserve. He related with much natural eloquence how he had tried over and over again not to love her, and how he had loved her in spite of that trying; of his intention never to reveal his passion, till their situation on that rainy evening prompted the impulse which ended in that irreverent action of his; and earnestly asked her to forgive him — not for his feelings, since they were his own to commend or blame — but for the way in which he testified of them to one so cultivated and so beautiful.

Egbert was flushed and excited by the time that he reached this point in his tale.

Her eyes were fixed on the grass; and then a tear stole quietly from its corner, and wandered down her cheek. She tried to say something, but her usually adroit tongue was unequal to the task. Ultimately she glanced at him, and murmured, "I forgive you;" but so inaudibly, that he only recognized the words by their shape upon her lips.

She looked not much more than a child now, and Egbert thought with sadness that her tear and her words were perhaps but the result, the one of a transitory sympathy, the other of a desire to escape. They stood silent for some seconds, and the dressing-bell of the house began ringing. Turning slowly away without another word she hastened out of his sight.

When Egbert reached home some of his grandfather's old friends were gathered there, sympathizing with him on the removal he would have to submit to if report spoke truly. Their sympathy was rather more for him to bear than their indifference; and as Egbert looked at the old man's bent figure, and at the expression of his face, denoting a wish to sink under the earth, out of sight and out of trouble, he was greatly depressed, and he said inwardly, "What a fool I was to ask forgiveness of a woman who can torture my only relative like this! Why do I feel her to be glorious? Oh that I had never seen her!"

The next day was Sunday, and his grandfather being too unwell to go out, Egbert went to the evening service alone. When it was over, the rector detained him in the churchyard to say a few words about the next week's undertakings. This was soon done, and Egbert turned back to leave the now empty churchyard. Passing the porch he saw Miss Allenville coming out of the door.

Egbert said nothing, for he knew not what to say; but she spoke. "Ah, Mr. Mayne, how beautiful the west sky looks! It is the finest sunset we have had this spring."

"It is very beautiful," he replied, without looking westward a single degree. "Miss Allenville," he said reproachfully, "you might just have thought whether, for the sake of reaching one guilty person, it was worth while to deeply wound an old man."

"I do not allow you to say that," she answered with proud quickness. "Still, I will listen just this once."

"Are you glad you asserted your superiority to me by putting in motion again that scheme for turning him out?"

"I merely left off hindering it," she said.

"Well, we shall go now," continued Egbert, "and make room for newer people. I hope you forgive what caused it all."

"You talk in that strain to make me feel regrets; and you think that because you are read in a few books you may say or do anything."

"No, no. That's unfair."

"I will try to alter it — that your grandfather may not leave. Say that you forgive me for thinking he and yourself had better leave — as I forgive you for what

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

you did. But remember, nothing of that sort ever again."

"Forgive you? Oh, Miss Allenville!" said he in a wild whisper, "I wish you had sinned a hundred times as much, that I might show how readily I can forgive all."

She had looked as if she would have held out her hand; but, for some reason or other, directly he had spoken with emotion it was not so well for him as when he had spoken to wound her. She passed on silently, and entered the private gate to the house.

A day or two after this, about three o'clock in the afternoon, and whilst Egbert was giving a lesson in geography, a lad burst into the school with the tidings that Farmer Broadford had fallen from a corn-stack they were threshing, and hurt himself severely.

The boy had borrowed a horse to come with, and Mayne at once made him gallop off with it for a doctor. Dismissing the children, the young man ran home full of forebodings. He found his relative in a chair, held up by two of his laboring men. He was put to bed, and seeing how pale he was, Egbert gave him a little wine, and bathed the parts which had been bruised by the fall.

Egbert had at first been the more troubled at the event through believing that his grandfather's fall was the result of his low spirits and mental uneasiness; and he blamed himself for letting so infirm a man go out upon the farm till quite recovered. But it turned out that the actual cause of the accident was the breaking of the ladder that he had been standing on. When the surgeon had seen him he said that the external bruises were mere trifles; but that the shock had been great, and had produced internal injuries highly dangerous to a man in that stage of life.

His grandson was of opinion in later years that the fall only hastened by a few months a dissolution which would soon have taken place under any circumstances, from the natural decay of the old man's constitution. His pulse grew feeble and his voice weak, but he continued in a comparatively firm state of mind for some days, during which he talked to Egbert a great deal.

Egbert trusted that the illness would soon pass away; his anxiety for his grandfather was great. When he was gone not one of the family would be left but himself. But in spite of hope the younger man perceived that death was really at hand. And now arose a question. It was certainly a time to make confidences, if they were ever to be made; should he, then, tell his grandfather, who knew the Allenvilles so well, of his love for Geraldine? At one moment it seemed duty; at another it seemed a graceful act, to say the least.

Yet Egbert might never have uttered a word but for a remark of his grandfather's which led up to the very point. He was speaking of the farm and of the squire, and thence he went on to the daughter.

"She, too," he said, "seems to have that reckless spirit which was in her mother's family, and ruined her mother's father at the gaming-table, though she's too young to show much of it yet."

"I hope not," said Egbert fervently.

"Why? What be the Allenvilles to you — not that I wish the girl harm?"

"I think she is the very best being in the world. I — love her deeply."

His grandfather's eyes were set on the wall. "Well, well, my poor boy," came softly from his mouth. "What made ye think of loving her? Ye may as well love a mountain, for any return you'll ever get. Do she know of it?"

"She guesses it. It was my saving her from the threshing-machine that began it."

"And she checks you?"

"Well — no."

"Egbert," he said after a silence, "I am grieved, for it can but end in pain. Mind, she's an inexperienced girl. She never thinks of what trouble she may get herself into with her father and with her friends. And mind this, my lad, as another reason for dropping it; however honorable your love may be, you'll never get credit for your honor. Nothing you can do will ever root out the notion of people that where the man is poor and the woman is high-born he's a scamp and she's an angel."

"She's very good."

"She's thoughtless, or she'd never encourage you. You must try not to see her."

"I will never put myself in her way again."

The subject was mentioned no more then. The next day the worn-out old farmer died, and his last request to Egbert was that he would do nothing to tempt Geraldine Allenville to think of him further.

CHAPTER VI.

Hath misery made thee blind
To the fond workings of a woman's mind?
And must I say — albeit my heart rebel
With all that woman feels but should not tell;
Because, despite thy faults, that heart is moved —
It feared thee, thank'd thee, pitied, madden'd, loved?

IT was in the evening of the day after Farmer Broadford's death that Egbert first

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

sat down in the house alone. The bandy-legged little man who had acted as his grandfather's groom of the chambers and stables simultaneously had gone into the village. The candles were not yet lighted, and Mayne abstractedly watched upon the pale wall the latter rays of sunset slowly changing into the white shine of a moon a few days old. The ancient family clock had stopped for want of winding, and the intense silence that prevailed seemed more like the bodily presence of some quality than the mere absence of sound.

He was thinking how many were the indifferent expressions which he had used towards the poor body lying cold up-stairs — the only relation he had latterly had upon earth — which might as well have been left unsaid; of how far he had been from practically attempting to do what in theory he called best — to make the most of every pulse of natural affection; that he had never heeded or particularly inquired the meaning of the different pieces of advice which the kind old man had tendered from time to time; that he had never even thought of asking for any details of his grandfather's history.

His musings turned upon Geraldine. He had promised to seek her no more, and he would keep his promise. Her interest in him might only be that of an exceedingly romantic and freakish soul, awakened but through "lack of other idleness," and because sound sense suggested to her that it was a thing dangerous to do; for it seemed that she was ever and only moved by the superior of two antagonistic forces. She had as yet seen little or no society, she was only seventeen; and hence it was possible that a week of the town and fashion into which she would soon be initiated might blot out his very existence from her memory.

He was sitting with his back to the window, meditating in this minor key, when a shadow darkened the opposite moonlit wall. Egbert started. There was a gentle tap at the door; and he opened it to behold the well-known form of the lady in his mind.

"Mr. Mayne, are you alone?" she whispered, full of agitation.

"Quite alone, excepting my poor grandfather's body up-stairs," he answered, as agitated as she.

Then out it all came. "I couldn't help coming — I hope — oh, I do so pray — that it was not through me that he died. Was it I, indeed, who killed him? They say it was the effect of the news that he was to leave the farm. I would have done anything to hinder his being turned out had I only reflected! And now he is dead. It was so cruel to an old man like him; and now you have nobody in the world to care for you, have you, Egbert — except me?"

The ice was wholly broken. He took her hand in both his own and began to assure her that her alarm was grounded on nothing whatever. And yet he was almost reluctant to assure her out of so sweet a state. And when he had said over and over again that his grandfather's fall had nothing to do with his mental condition, that the utmost result of her hasty proceeding was a sadness of spirit in him, she still persisted, as is the custom of women, in holding to that most painful possibility as the most likely, simply because it wounded her most. It was a long while before she would be convinced of her own innocence, but he maintained it firmly, and she finally believed.

They sat down together, restraint having quite died out between them. The fine-lady portion of her existence, of which there was never much, was in abeyance, and they spoke and acted simply as a young man and woman who were beset by common troubles, and who had like hopes and fears.

"And you will never blame me again for what I did?" said Egbert.

"I never blamed you much," she murmured with arch simplicity. "Why should it be wrong for me to be honest with you now, and tell everything you want to know?"

Mayne was silent. That was a difficult question for a conscientious man to answer. Here was he nearly twenty-one years of age, and with some experience of life, while she was a girl nursed up like an exotic, with no real experience, and but little over seventeen — though from the fineness of her figure she looked more womanly than she really was. It plainly had not crossed her young mind that she was on the verge of committing the most horrible social sin — that of loving beneath her, and owning that she so loved. Two years thence she might see the imprudence of her conduct, and blame him for having led her on. Ought he not, then, considering his grandfather's words, to say that it was wrong for her to be honest; that she should forget him, and fix her mind on matters appertaining to her order? He could not do it — he let her drift sweetly on.

"I think more of you than of anybody in the whole world," he replied. "And you will allow me to, will you not? — let

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

me always keep you in my heart, and almost worship you?"

"That would be wrong. But you may think of me, if you like to, very much; it will give me great pleasure. I don't think my father thinks of me at all — or anybody, except you. I said the other day I would never think of you again, but I have done it, a good many times. It is all through being obliged to care for somebody whether you will or no."

"And you will go on thinking of me?"

"I will do anything to — oblige you."

Egbert, on the impulse of the moment, bent over her and raised her little hand to his lips. He reverenced her too much to think of kissing her cheek. She knew this, and was thrilled through with the delight of being adored as one from above the sky.

Up to this day of its existence their affection had been a battle, a species of antagonism wherein his heart and the girl's had faced each other, and being anxious to do honor to their respective parts. But now it was a truce and a settlement, in which each one took up the other's utmost weakness, and was careless of concealing his and her own.

Surely, sitting there as they sat then, a more unreasoning condition of mind as to how this unequal conjunction would end never existed. They swam along through the passing moments, not a thought of duty on either side, not a further thought on his but that she was the dayspring of his life, that he would die for her a hundred times; superadded to which was a shapeless uneasiness that she would in some manner slip away from him. The solemnity of the event that had just happened would have shown up to him any ungenerous feeling in strong colors — and he had reason afterwards to examine the epoch narrowly; but it only seemed to demonstrate how instinctive and uncalculating was the love that worked within him.

It was almost time for her to leave. She held up her watch to the moonlight. Five minutes more she would stay; then three minutes, and no longer. "Now I am going," she said. "Do you forgive me entirely?"

"How shall I say 'yes' without assuming that there was something to forgive?"

"Say 'yes.' It is sweeter to fancy I am forgiven than to think I have not sinned."

With this she went to the door. Egbert accompanied her through the wood, and across a portion of the park, till they were about a hundred yards from the house, when he was forced to bid her farewell.

The old man was buried on the following Sunday. During several weeks afterwards Egbert's sole consolation under his loss was in thinking of Geraldine, for they did not meet in private again till some time had elapsed. The ultimate issue of this absorption in her did not concern him at all: it seemed to be in keeping with the system of his existence now that he should have an utterly inscrutable to-morrow.

CHAPTER VII.

Come forward, some great marshal, and organize equality in society.

THE month of August came round, and Miss Allenville was to lay the foundation-stone of a tower or beacon which her father was about to erect on the highest hill of his estate, to the memory of his brother, the general. It was arranged that the school children should sing at the ceremony. Accordingly, at the hour fixed, Egbert was on the spot; a crowd of villagers had also arrived, and carriages were visible in the distance, wending their way towards the scene. When they had drawn up alongside and the visitors alighted, the master mason appeared nervous.

"Mr. Mayne," he said to Egbert, "you had better do what's to be done for the lady. I shall speak too loud, or too soft, or handle things wrong. Do you attend upon her, and I'll lower the stone."

Several ladies and gentlemen now gathered round, and presently Miss Allenville stood in position for her office, supported on one side by her father, a hard-featured man of five-and-forty, and some friends who were visiting at the house; and on the other by the school children, who began singing a song in keeping with the occasion. When this was done, Geraldine laid down the sealed bottle with its enclosed memorandum, which had been prepared for the purpose, and taking a trowel from her father's hand, dabbled confusedly in the mortar, accidentally smearing it over the handle of the trowel.

"Lower the stone," said Egbert, who stood close by, to the mason at the winch; and the stone began to descend.

The dainty-handed young woman was looking as if she would give anything to be relieved of the dirty trowel; but Egbert, the only one who observed this, was guiding the stone with both hands into its place, and could not receive the tool of her. Every moment increased her perplexity.

"Take it, take it, will you?" she impa-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tiently whispered to him, blushing with a consciousness that people began to perceive her awkward handling.

"I must just finish this first," he said.

She was resigned in an instant. The stone settled down upon its base, when Egbert at once took the trowel, and her father came up and wiped her glove. Egbert then handed her the mallet.

"What must I do with this thing?" she whispered entreatingly, holding the mallet as if it might bite her.

"Tap with it, madam," said he.

She did as directed, and murmured the form of words which she had been told to repeat.

"Thank you," she said softly when all was done, restored to herself by the consciousness that she had performed the last part gracefully. Without lifting her eyes she added, "It was thoughtful of you to remember that I shouldn't know, and to stand by to tell me."

Her friends now moved away, but before she had joined them Egbert said, chiefly for the pleasure of speaking to her: "The tower, when it is built, will be seen many miles off."

"Yes," she replied in a discreet tone, for many eyes were upon her. "The view is very extensive." She glanced round upon the whole landscape stretched out before her, in the extreme distance of which was visible the town of Westcombe.

"How long does it take to go to Westcombe across this way?" she asked of him while they were bringing up the carriage.

"About two hours," he said.

"Two hours — so long as that, does it? How far is it away?"

"Eight miles."

"Two hours to drive eight miles — who ever heard of such a thing!"

"I thought you meant walking."

"Ah, yes; but one hardly means walking without expressly stating it."

"Well, it seems just the other way to me — that walking is meant unless you say driving."

That was the whole of their conversation. The remarks had been simple and trivial, but they brought a similar thought into the minds of both of them. On her part it spread a sudden gloom over her face, and it made him feel dead at heart. It was that horrid thought of their differing habits and of those contrasting positions which could not be reconciled.

Indeed, this perception of their disparity weighed more and more heavily upon him as the days went on. There was no doubt about their being lovers, though scarcely recognized by themselves as such; and, in spite of Geraldine's warm and unreflecting impulses, a sense of how little Egbert was accustomed to what is called society, and the polite forms which constant usage had made almost nature with her, would rise on occasion, and rob her of many an otherwise pleasant minute. When any little occurrence had brought this into more prominence than usual, Egbert would go away, wander about the lanes, and be kept awake a great part of the night by the distress of mind such a recognition brought upon him. How their intimacy would end, in what uneasiness, yearning, and misery, he could not guess. As for picturing a future of happiness with her by his side there was not ground enough upon which to rest the momentary imagination of it. Thus they mutually oppressed each other even while they loved.

In addition to this anxiety was another; what would be thought of their romance by her father, if he were to find it out? It was impossible to tell him, for nothing could come of that but Egbert's dismissal and Geraldine's seclusion; and how could these be borne?

He looked round anxiously for some means of deliverance. There were two things to be thought of, the saving of her dignity, and the saving of his and her happiness. That to accomplish the first he ought voluntarily to leave the village before their attachment got known, and never seek her again, was what he sometimes felt; but the idea brought such misery along with it that it died out under contemplation.

He determined at all events to put the case clearly before her, to heroically set forth at their next meeting the true bearings of their position, which she plainly did not realize to the full as yet. It had never entered her mind that the link between them might be observed by the curious, and instantly talked of. Yes, it was his duty to warn her, even though by so doing he would be heaping coals of fire on his own head. For by acting upon his hint she would be lost to him, and the charm that lay in her false notions of the world be forever destroyed.

That they would ultimately be found out, and Geraldine be lowered in local estimation, was, indeed, almost inevitable. There was one grain of satisfaction only among this mass of distresses. Whatever should become public, only the fashiona-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ble side of her character could be depreciated; the natural woman, the specimen of English girlhood that he loved, no one could impugn or harm.

Meetings had latterly taken place between them without any pretence of accident, and these were facilitated in an amazing manner by the duty imposed upon her of visiting the school as the representative of her father. At her very next appearance he told her all he thought. It was when the children had left the room for the quarter of an hour's airing that he gave them in the middle of the morning.

She was quite hurt at being treated with justice, and a crowd of tears came into her sorrowful eyes. She had never thought of half that he feared, and almost questioned his kindness in enlightening her.

"Perhaps you are right," she murmured, with the merest motion of lip. "Yes, it is sadly true. Should our conduct become known, nobody will judge us fairly. 'She was a wild, weak girl,' they will say."

"To care for such a man — a village youth. They will even suppress the fact that his father was a painter of no mean power, and a gentleman by education, little as it would redeem us; and justify their doing so by reflecting that in adding to the contrast they improve the tale.

And calumny meanwhile shall feed on us
As worms devour the dead: what we have done
None shall dare vouch, though it be truly known.

And they will continue, 'He was an artful fellow to win a girl's affections in that way — one of the mere scum of the earth,' they'll say."

"Don't, don't make it so bad!" she implored, weeping outright. "They cannot go so far. Human nature is not so wicked and blind. And they dare not speak so disrespectfully of me, or of any one I choose to favor." A slight haughtiness was apparent in these words. "But, oh, don't let us talk of it — it makes the time miserable."

However, she had been warned. But the difficulty which presented itself to her mind was, after all, but a small portion of the whole. It was how should they meet together without causing a convulsion in neighboring society. His was more radical and complex. The only natural drift of love was towards marriage. But how could he picture, at any length of years ahead, her in a cottage as his wife, or himself in a mansion as her husband? He in the one case, she in the other, were alike painfully incredible.

But time had flown, and he conducted her to the door. "Good-bye, Egbert," she said tenderly.

"Good-bye, dear, dear madam," he answered; and she was gone.

Geraldine had never hinted to him to call her by her Christian name, and finding that she did not particularly wish it he did not care to do so. "Madam" was as good a name as any other for her, and by adhering to it and using it at the warmest moments it seemed to change its nature from that of a mere title to a soft pet sound. He often wondered in after days at the strange condition of a girl's heart, which could allow so much in reality, and at the same time permit the existence of a little barrier such as that; how the keen, intelligent mind of woman could be ever so slightly hoodwinked by a sound. Yet, perhaps, it was womanlike, after all, and she may have caught at it as the only straw within reach of that dignity or pride of birth which was drowning in her impetuous affection.

CHAPTER VIII.

The world and its ways have a certain worth,
And to press a point while these oppose
Were a simple policy: best wait,
And we lose no friends, and gain no foes.

THE inborn necessity of ransacking the future for a germ of hope led Egbert Mayne to dwell for longer and longer periods on the at first rejected possibility of winning and having her. And apart from any thought of marriage, he knew that Geraldine was sometimes a trifle vexed that their experiences contained so little in common — that he had never dressed for dinner, or made use of a carriage in his life; even though in literature he was her master, thanks to his tastes.

For the first time he seriously contemplated a visionary scheme which had been several times cursorily glanced at; a scheme almost as visionary as any ever entertained by a man not yet blinded to the limits of the possible. Lighted on by impulse, it was not taken up without long calculation, and it was one in which every link was reasoned out as carefully and as clearly as his powers would permit. But the idea that he would be able to carry it through was an assumption which, had he bestowed upon it one hundredth part of the thought spent on the details of its working, he would have thrown aside as unfeasible.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

To give up the school, to go to London or elsewhere, and there to try to rise to her level by years of sheer exertion, was the substance of this scheme. However his lady's heart might be grieved by his apparent desertion, he would go. A knowledge of life and of men must be acquired, and that could never be done by thinking at home.

Egbert's abstract love for the gigantic task was but small; but there was absolutely no other honest road to her sphere. That the habits of men should be so subversive of the law of nature as to indicate that he was not worthy to marry a woman whose own instincts said that he was worthy, was a great anomaly, he thought, with some rebelliousness; but this did not upset the fact or remove the difficulty.

He told his fair mistress at their next accidental meeting (much sophistry lay in their definition of "accidental" at this season) that he had determined to leave Tollamore. Mentally she exulted at his spirit, but her heart despaired. He solemnly assured her that it would be much better for them both in the end; and she became submissive, and entirely agreed with him. Then she seemed to acquire a sort of superior insight by virtue of her superior rank, and murmured, "You will expand your mind, and get to despise me for all this, and for my want of pride in being so easily won; and it will end unhappily."

Her imagination so affected her that she could not hinder the tears from falling. Nothing was more effective in checking his despair than the sight of her despairing, and he immediately put on a more hopeful tone.

"No," he said, taking her by the hand, "I shall rise, and become so learned and so famous that ——" He did not like to say plainly that he really hoped to win her as his wife, but it is very probable that she guessed his meaning nearly enough.

"You have some secret resources!" she exclaimed. "Some help is promised you in this ambitious plan."

It was most painful to him to have to tell her the truth after this sanguine expectation, and how uncertain and unaided his plans were. However, he cheered her with the words, "Wait and see." But he himself had many misgivings when her sweet face was turned away.

Upon this plan he acted at once. Nothing of moment occurred during the autumn, and the time for his departure gradually came near. The sale of his grandfather's effects having taken place, and notice having been given at the school, there was very little else for him to do in the way of preparation, for there was no family to be consulted, no household to be removed. On the last day of teaching, when the afternoon lessons were over, he bade farewell to the school children. The younger ones cried, not from any particular reflection on the loss they would sustain, but simply because their hearts were tender to any announcement couched in solemn terms. The elder children sincerely regretted Egbert, as an acquaintance who had not filled the post of schoolmaster so long as to be quite spoilt as a human being.

On the morning of departure he rose at half past three, for Tollamore was a remote nook of a remote district, and it was necessary to start early, his plan being to go by packet from Melport. The candle-flame had a sad and yellow look when it was brought into his bedroom by Nathan Brown, one of his grandfather's old laborers, at whose house he had taken a temporary lodging, and who had agreed to awake him and assist his departure. Few things will take away a man's confidence in an impulsive scheme more than being called up by candlelight upon a chilly morning to commence working it out. But when Egbert heard Nathan's great feet stamping spiritedly about the floor downstairs, in earnest preparation of breakfast, he overcame his weakness and bustled out of bed.

They breakfasted together, Nathan drinking the hot tea with rattling sips, and Egbert thinking as he looked at him that Nathan had never appeared so desirable a man to have about him as now when he was about to give him up.

"Well, good mornen, Mistur Mayne," Nathan said, as he opened the door to let Egbert out. "And mind this, sir; if they used ye bad up there, th'lt always find a hole to put thy head into at Nathan Brown's, I'll warrant as much."

Egbert stepped from the door, and struck across to the manor-house. The morning was dark, and the raw wind made him shiver till walking warmed him. "Good heavens, here's an undertaking!" he sometimes thought. Old trees seemed to look at him through the gloom, as they rocked uneasily to and fro; and now and then a dreary drop of rain beat upon his face as he went on. The dead leaves in the ditches, which could be heard but not seen, shifted their positions with a troubled rustle, and flew at intervals with a little rap against his walking-stick and hat. He was

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

glad to reach the north stile, and get into the park, where, with an anxious pulse, he passed beneath the creaking limes.

"Will she wake soon enough; will she be forgetful, and sleep over the time?" He had asked himself this many times since he rose that morning, and still beset by the inquiry, he drew near to the mansion.

Her bedroom was in the north wing, facing towards the church, and on turning the brow of the hill a faint light in the window reassured him. Taking a few little stones from the path he threw them upon the sill, as they had agreed, and she instantly opened the window, and said softly, "The butler sleeps on the ground floor on this side, go to the bow-window in the shrubbery."

He went round among the bushes to the place mentioned, which was entirely sheltered from the wind. She soon appeared, bearing in her hand a wax taper, so small that it scarcely gave more light than a glowworm. She wore the same dress that she had worn when they first met on the previous Christmas, and her hair was loose as at that time. Indeed, she looked throughout much as she had looked then, except that her bright eyes were red, as Egbert could see well enough.

"I have something for you," she said softly as she opened the window. "How much time is there?"

"Half an hour only, dearest."

She began a sigh, but checked it, at the same time holding out a packet to him.

"Here are fifty pounds," she whispered. "It will be useful to you now, and more shall follow."

Egbert felt how impossible it was to accept this. "No, my dear one," he said, "I cannot."

"I don't require it, Egbert. I wish you to have it; I have plenty. Come, do take it." But seeing that he continued firm on this point she reluctantly gave in, saying that she would keep it for him.

"I fear so much that papa suspects me," she said. "And if so, it was my own fault, and all owing to a conversation I began with him without thinking beforehand that it would be dangerous."

"What did you say?"

"I said," she whispered, 'Suppose a man should love me very much, would you mind my being acquainted with him if he were a very worthy man?' 'That depends upon his rank and circumstances,' he said. 'Suppose,' I said, 'that in addition to his goodness he had much learning, and had made his name famous in the world, but was not altogether rich?' I think I showed too much earnestness, and I wished that I could have recalled my words. 'When the time comes I will tell you,' he said, 'and don't speak or think of these matters again.'"

In consequence of this new imprudence of hers Egbert doubted if it would be right to correspond with her. He said nothing about it then, but it added a new shade to the parting.

"I think your decision a good and noble one," she murmured, smiling hopefully. "And you will come back some day a wondrous man of the world, talking of vast schemes, radical errors, and saying such words as the 'backbone of society,' the 'tendency of modern thought,' and other things like that. When papa says to you, 'My lord the chancellor,' you will answer him with 'A tall man, with a deep-toned voice — I know him well.' When he says, 'Such and such were Lord Hatton's words, I think,' you will answer, 'No, they were Lord Tyrrell's; I was present on the occasion;' and so on in that way. You must get to talk authoritatively about vintages and their dates, and to know all about epicureanism, idleness, and fashion; and so you will beat him with his own weapons, for he knows nothing of these things. He will criticise you; then he will be nettled; then he will admire you."

Egbert kissed her hand devotedly, and held it long.

"If you cannot in the least succeed," she added, "I shall never think the less of you. The truly great stand on no middling ledge; they are either famous or unknown."

Egbert moved slowly away amongst the laurestines. Holding the light above her bright head she smiled upon him, as if it were unknown to her that she wept at the same time.

He left the park precincts, and followed the turnpike road to Melport. In spite of the misery of parting he felt relieved of a certain oppressiveness, now that his presence at Tollamore could no longer bring disgrace upon her. The threatening rain passed off by the time that he reached the ridge dividing the inland districts from the coast. It began to get light, but his journey was still very lonely. Ultimately the yellow shore-line of pebbles grew visible, and the distant horizon of water spreading like a grey upland against the sky, till he could soon hear the measured flounce of the waves.

He entered the town at sunrise, just as

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the lamps were extinguished, and went to a tavern to breakfast. At half past eight o'clock the boat steamed out of the harbor, and reached London after a passage of five-and-forty hours.

From The Cornhill Magazine.

CHILD'S PLAY.

THE regret we have for our childhood is not wholly justifiable: so much a man may lay down without fear of public ribaldry; for although we shake our heads over the change, we are not unconscious of the manifold advantages of our new state. What we lose in generous impulse, we more than gain in the habit of generously watching others; and the capacity to enjoy Shakespeare may balance a lost aptitude for playing at soldiers. Terror is gone out of our lives, moreover; we no longer see the devil in the bed-curtains, nor lie awake to listen to the wind. We go to school no more; and if we have only exchanged one drudgery for another (which is by no means sure), we are set free forever from the daily fear of chastisement. And yet a great change has overtaken us; and although we do not enjoy ourselves less, at least we take our pleasure differently. We need pickles nowadays to make Wednesday's cold mutton please our Friday's appetite; and I can remember the time when to call it red venison, and tell myself a hunter's story, would have made it more palatable than the best of sauces. To the grown person cold mutton is cold mutton all the world over; not all the mythology ever invented by man will make it better or worse to him; the broad fact, the clamant reality, of the mutton carries away before it such seductive figments. But for the child it is still possible to weave an enchantment over eatables; and if he has but read of a dish in a story-book, it will be heavenly manna to him for a week.

If a grown man does not like eating and drinking and exercise, if he is not something positive in his tastes, it means he has a feeble body and should have some medicine: but children may be pure spirits, if they will, and take their enjoyment in a world of moonshine. Sensation does not count for so much in our first years as afterwards; something of the swaddling numbness of infancy clings about us; we see and touch and hear through a sort of golden mist. Children, for instance, are able enough to see, but they have no great faculty for looking; they do not use their eyes for the pleasure of using them, but for by-ends of their own; and the things I call to mind seeing most vividly, were not beautiful in themselves, but merely interesting or enviable to me as I thought they might be turned to practical account in play. Nor is the sense of touch so clean and poignant in children as it is in a man. If you will turn over your old memories, I think the sensations of this sort you remember will be somewhat vague, and come to not much more than a blunt, general sense of heat on summer days, or a blunt, general sense of well-being in bed. And here, of course, you will understand pleasurable sensations; for overmastering pain — the most deadly and tragical element in life and the true commander of man's soul and body — alas! pain has its own way with all of us; it breaks in, a rude visitant, upon the fairy garden where the child wanders in a dream, no less surely than it rules upon the field of battle, or sends the immortal war-god whimpering to his father; and innocence, no more than philosophy, can protect us from this sting. As for taste, when we bear in mind the excesses of unmitigated sugar which delight a youthful palate, "it is surely no very cynical asperity" to think taste a character of the maturer growth. Smell and hearing are perhaps more developed; I remember many scents, many voices, and a great deal of spring singing in the woods. But hearing is capable of vast improvement as a means of pleasure; and there is all the world between gaping wonderment at the jargon of birds, and the emotion with which a man listens to articulate music.

At the same time, and step by step with this increase in the definition and intensity of what we feel which accompanies our growing age, another change takes place in the sphere of intellect, by which all things are transformed and seen through theories and associations as through colored windows. We make to ourselves day by day, out of history, and gossip, and economical speculations, and God knows what, a medium in which we walk and through which we look abroad. We study shop windows with other eyes than in our childhood, never to wonder, not always to admire, but to make and modify our little incongruous theories about life. It is no longer the uniform of a soldier that arrests our attention; but perhaps the flowing carriage of a woman, or perhaps a countenance that has been vividly stamped with passion and carries an adventurous story

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

written in its lines. The pleasure of surprise is passed away; sugarloaves and watering-carts seem mighty tame to encounter; and we walk the streets to make romances and to sociologize. Nor must we deny that a good many of us walk them solely for the purposes of transit or in the interest of a livelier digestion. These, indeed, may look back with mingled thoughts upon their childhood, but the rest are in a better case; they know more than when they were children, they understand better, their desires and sympathies answer more nimbly to the provocation of the senses, and their minds are brimming with interest as they go about the world.

According to my contention this is a flight to which children cannot rise. They are wheeled in perambulators or dragged about by nurses in a pleasing stupor. A vague, faint, abiding wonderment possesses them. Here and there some specially remarkable circumstance, such as a watercart or a guardsman, fairly penetrates into the seat of thought and calls them for half a moment out of themselves; and you may see them, still towed forward sideways by the inexorable nurse as by a sort of destiny, but still staring at the bright object in their wake. It may be some minutes before another such moving spectacle reawakens them to the world in which they dwell. For other children, they almost invariably show some intelligent sympathy. "There is a fine fellow making mud pies," they seem to say; "that I can understand, there is some sense in mud pies." But the doings of their elders, unless where they are speakingly picturesque or recommend themselves by the quality of being easily imitable, they let them go over their heads (as we say) without the least regard. If it were not for this perpetual imitation, we should be tempted to fancy they despised us outright, or only considered us in the light of creatures brutally strong and brutally silly; among whom they condescended to dwell in obedience like a philosopher at a barbarous court. At times they display an arrogance of disregard that is truly staggering. Once, when I was groaning aloud with physical pain, a young gentleman came into the room and nonchalantly inquired if I had seen his bow and arrow. He made no account of my groans, which he accepted, as he had to accept so much else, as a piece of the inexplicable conduct of his elders; and, like a wise young gentleman, he would waste no wonder on the subject. Those elders who care so little for rational enjoyment, and are even the enemy of rational enjoyment for others, he had accepted without understanding and without complaint, as the rest of us accept the scheme of the universe.

We grown people can tell ourselves a story, give and take strokes until the bucklers ring, ride far and fast, marry, fall, and die; all the while sitting quietly by the fire or lying prone in bed. This is exactly what a child cannot do, or does not do, at least when he can find anything else. He works all with lay figures and stage properties. When his story comes to the fighting, he must rise, get something by way of a sword and have a set-to with a piece of furniture, until he is out of breath. When he comes to ride with the king's pardon, he must bestride a chair, which he will so hurry and belabor and on which he will so furiously demean himself, that the messenger will arrive, if not bloody with spurring, at least fiery red with haste. If his romance involves an accident upon a cliff, he must clamber in person about the chest of drawers and fall bodily upon the carpet, before his imagination is satisfied. Lead soldiers, dolls, all toys in short, are in the same category and answer the same end. Nothing can stagger a child's faith, he accepts the clumsiest substitutes and can swallow the most staring incongruities. The chair he has just been besieging as a castle, or valiantly cutting to the ground as a dragon, is taken away for the accommodation of a morning visitor, and he is nothing abashed; he can skirmish by the hour with a stationary coal-scuttle; in the midst of the enchanted pleasance, he can see, without sensible shock, the gardener soberly digging potatoes for the day's dinner. He can make abstraction of whatever does not fit into his fable; and he puts his eyes into his pocket, just as we hold our noses in an unsavory lane. And so it is, that although the ways of children cross with those of their elders in a hundred places daily, they never go in the same direction nor so much as lie in the same element. So may the telegraph wires intersect the line of the high road, or so might a landscape painter and a bagman visit the same country and yet move in different worlds.

People, struck with these spectacles, cry aloud about the power of imagination in the young. Indeed there may be two words to that. It is, in some ways, but a pedestrian fancy that the child exhibits. 'Tis the grown people who make the nursery stories; all the children do, is jealously to preserve the text. One out of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

a dozen reasons why "Robinson Crusoe" should be so popular with youth, is that it hits their level in this matter to a nicety; Crusoe was always at makeshifts and had, in so many words, to play at a great variety of professions; and then the book is all about tools, and there is nothing that delights a child so much. Hammers and saws belong to a province of life that positively calls for imitation. The juvenile lyrical drama, surely of the most ancient Thespian model, wherein the trades of mankind are successively simulated to the running burthen "On a cold and frosty morning," gives a good instance of the artistic taste in children. And this need for overt action and lay figures testifies to a defect in the child's imagination which prevents him from carrying out his novels in the privacy of his own heart. He does not yet know enough of the world and men. His experience is incomplete. That stage wardrobe and scene-room that we call the memory is so ill-provided, that he can overtake few combinations and body out few stories, to his own content, without some external aid. He is at the experimental stage; he is not sure how one would feel in certain circumstances; to make sure, he must come as near trying it as his means permit. And so here is young heroism with a wooden sword, and mothers practise their kind vocation over a bit of jointed stick. It may be laughable enough just now; but it is these same people and these same thoughts, that not long hence, when once they are on the theatre of life, will set you weeping and trembling. For children think very much the same thoughts, and dream the same dreams, as bearded men and marriageable women. No one is more romantic. Fame and honor, the love of young men and the love of mothers, the business man's pleasure in method, all these and others they anticipate and rehearse in their play hours. Upon us, who are further advanced and fairly dealing with the threads of destiny, they only glance from time to time to glean a hint for their own mimetic reproduction. Two children playing at soldiers are far more interesting to each other than one of the scarlet beings whom both are busy imitating. This is perhaps the greatest oddity of all. "Art for art" is their motto; and the doings of grown folk are only interesting as the raw material for play. Not Théophile Gautier, not Flaubert, can look more callously upon life, or rate the reproduction more highly over the reality; and they will parody an execution, a deathbed or the funeral of the young man of Nain, with all the cheerfulness in the world.

The true parallel for play is not to be found, of course, in conscious art, which is an abstract, impersonal thing, and depends largely upon philosophical interests beyond the scope of childhood. It is when we make castles in the air and personate the leading character in our own romances, that we return to the spirit of our first years. Only, there are several reasons why the spirit is no longer so agreeable to indulge. Nowadays, when we admit this personal element into our divagations we are apt to stir up uncomfortable and sorrowful memories, and remind ourselves sharply of old wounds. Our day-dreams can no longer lie, all in the air, like a story in the "Arabian Nights;" they read to us rather like the history of a period in which we ourselves had taken part, where we come across many unfortunate passages and find our own conduct smartly reprimanded. And then the child, mind you, acts his parts. He does not merely repeat them to himself; he leaps, he runs, and sets the blood agog over all his body. And so his play breathes him; and he no sooner assumes a passion than he gives it vent. Alas! when we betake ourselves to our intellectual form of play, sitting quietly by the fire or lying prone in bed, we rouse many hot feelings for which we can find no outlet. Substitutes are not acceptable to the mature mind, which desires the thing itself; and even to rehearse a triumphant dialogue with one's enemy, although it is perhaps the most satisfactory piece of play still left within our reach, is not entirely satisfying, and is even apt to lead to a visit and an interview which may be the reverse of triumphant after all.

In the child's world of dim sensation, play is all in all. "Making believe" is the gist of his whole life, and he cannot so much as take a walk except in character. I could not even learn my alphabet without some suitable mise-en-scène, and had to act a business man in an office before I could sit down to my book. Will you kindly question your memory, and find out how much you did, work or pleasure, in good faith and soberness, and for how much you had to cheat yourself with some invention? I remember, as though it were yesterday, the expansion of spirit, the dignity and self-reliance, that came with a pair of mustachios in burnt cork, even when there was none to see. Children are even content to forego what we call the realities, and prefer the shadow to the substance. When they might be speaking

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

intelligibly together, they chatter senseless gibberish by the hour, and are quite happy because they are making believe to speak French. I have said already how even the imperious appetite of hunger suffers itself to be gulled and led by the nose with the fag end of an old song. And it goes deeper than this: when children are together even a meal is felt as an interruption in the business of life; and they must find some imaginative sanction, and tell themselves some sort of story, to account for, to color, to render entertaining, the simple processes of eating and drinking. What wonderful fancies I have heard evolved out of the pattern upon teacups! — from which there followed a code of rules and a whole world of excitement, until tea-drinking began to take rank as a game. When my cousin and I took our porridge of a morning, we had a device to enliven the course of the meal. He ate his with sugar, and explained it to be a country continually buried under snow. I took mine with milk, and explained it to be a country suffering gradual inundation. You can imagine us exchanging bulletins; how here was an island still unsubmerged, here a valley not yet covered with snow; what inventions were made; how his population lived in cabins on perches and travelled on stilts, and how mine was always in boats; how the interest grew furious, as the last corner of safe ground was cut off on all sides and grew smaller every moment; and how, in fine, the food was of altogether secondary importance, and might even have been nauseous, so long as we seasoned it with these dreams. But perhaps the most exciting moments I ever had over a meal, were in the case of calves' feet jelly. It was hardly possible not to believe — and you may be sure, so far from trying, I did all I could to favor the illusion — that some part of it was hollow, and that sooner or later my spoon would lay open the secret tabernacle of the golden rock. There might some miniature Red Beard await his hour; there might one find the treasures of the Forty Thieves, and bewildered Cassim beating about the walls. And so I quarried on slowly, with bated breath, savoring the interest. Believe me, I had little palate left for the jelly; and though I preferred the taste when I took cream with it, I used often to go without, because the cream dimmed the transparent fractures.

Even with games, this spirit is authoritative with right-minded children. It is thus that hide-and-seek has so pre-eminent a sovereignty, for it is the wellspring of romance, and the actions and the excitement to which it gives rise lend themselves to almost any sort of fable. And thus cricket, which is a mere matter of dexterity, palpably about nothing and for no end, often fails to satisfy infantile craving. It is a game, if you like, but not a game of play. You cannot tell yourself a story about cricket; and the activity it calls forth can be justified on no rational theory. Even football, although it admirably simulates the tug and the ebb and flow of battle, has presented difficulties to the mind of young sticklers after verisimilitude; and I knew at least one little boy who was mightily exercised about the presence of the ball, and had to spirit himself up, whenever he came to play, with an elaborate story of enchantment, and take the missile as a sort of talisman bandied about in conflict between two Arabian nations.

To think of such a frame of mind, is to become disquieted about the bringing up of children. Surely they dwell in a mythological epoch, and are not the contemporaries of their parents. What can they think of them? what can they make of these bearded or petticoated giants who look down upon their games? who move upon a cloudy Olympus, following unknown designs apart from rational enjoyment? who profess the tenderest solicitude for children, and yet every now and again reach down out of their altitude and terribly vindicate the prerogatives of age? Off goes the child, corporally smarting, but morally rebellious. Were there ever such unthinkable deities as parents? I would give a great deal to know what, in nine cases out of ten, is the child's unvarnished feeling. A sense of past cajolery; a sense of personal attraction, at best very feeble; above all, I should imagine, a sense of terror for the untried residue of mankind: go to make up the attraction that he feels. No wonder, poor little heart, with such a weltering world in front of him, if he clings to the hand he knows! The dread irrationality of the whole affair, as it seems to children, is a thing we are all too ready to forget. "Oh, why," I remember passionately wondering, "why can we not all be happy and devote ourselves to play?" And when children do philosophize, I believe it is usually to very much the same purpose.

One thing, at least, comes very clearly out of these considerations; that whatever we are to expect at the hands of children, it should not be any peddling exactitude about matters of fact. They walk in a vain show, and among mists and rainbows;

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

they are passionate after dreams and unconcerned about realities; speech is a difficult art not wholly learned; and there is nothing in their own tastes or purposes to teach them what we mean by abstract truthfulness. When a bad writer is inexact, even if he can look back on half a century of years, we charge him with incompetence and not with dishonesty. And why not extend the same allowance to imperfect speakers? Let a stockbroker be dead stupid about poetry, or a poet inexact in the details of business, and we excuse them heartily from blame. But show us a miserable, unbreeched human entity, whose whole profession it is to take a tub for a fortified town and a shaving-brush for the deadly stiletto, and who passes three-fourths of his time in a dream and the rest in open self-deception; and we expect him to be as nice upon a matter of fact as a scientific expert bearing evidence. Upon my heart, I think it less than decent. You do not consider how little the child sees, or how swift he is to weave what he has seen into bewildering fiction; and that he cares no more for what you call truth, than you for a gingerbread dragoon.

I am reminded, as I write, that the child is very inquiring as to the precise truth of stories. But indeed this is a very different matter, and one bound up with the subject of play, and the precise amount of playfulness, or playability, to be looked for in the world. Many such burning questions must arise in the course of nursery education. Among the fauna of this planet, which already embraces the pretty soldier and the terrifying Irish beggarman, is, or is not, the child to expect a Bluebeard or a Cormoran? Is he, or is he not, to look out for magicians, kindly and potent? May he, or may he not, reasonably hope to be cast away upon a desert island, or turned to such diminutive proportions that he can live on equal terms with his lead soldiery, and go a cruise in his own toy schooner? Surely all these are practical questions to a neophyte entering upon life with a view to play. Precision upon such a point, the child can understand. But if you merely ask him of his past behavior, as to who threw such a stone, for instance, or struck such and such a watch; or whether he had looked into a parcel or gone by a forbidden path; why he can see no moment in the inquiry, and 'tis ten to one, he has already half forgotten and half bemused himself with subsequent imaginings.

It would be easy to leave them in their native cloudland, where they figure so prettily — pretty like flowers and innocent like dogs. They will come out of their gardens soon enough, and have to go into offices and the witness-box. Spare them yet a while, O conscientious parent! Let them doze among their playthings yet a little! for who knows what a rough, warfaring existence lies before them in the future? R. L. S.

From The Contemporary Review.

MR. FROUDE'S "LIFE AND TIMES OF THOMAS BECKET."

PART IV.

In approaching the career of Thomas as archbishop, I must again remind the reader of the difference between Mr. Froude's way of looking at the matter and my own. Mr. Froude has undertaken to wage war on "sacerdotalism," and in that quarrel to run a tilt against Thomas of London as a representative of sacerdotalism. In that warfare it would seem from Mr. Froude's practice that any weapon may be used except one. Accurate statement of what really happened, even though such accurate statement might serve Mr. Froude's purpose, is clearly forbidden by the destiny which guides Mr. Froude's literary career. On the other hand, I have nothing to do with "sacerdotalism" or "anti-sacerdotalism." I am not concerned to attack or to defend either, if only for the very good reason that neither of those long and new-fangled words gives me any very clear meaning. All that I have undertaken is the humbler task of finding out the things that really happened, and of trying to find out from the things which happened what manner of men they were who did those things. Above all things, let it be remembered that, while Mr. Froude holds a position which makes it his business to make out all the acts of Archbishop Thomas to be as blameworthy as may be, I hold no position which makes it my business to make out any of his acts to be either blameworthy or praiseworthy. Mr. Froude fights against the archbishop; I fight, not for the archbishop, but simply for truth. I am not concerned to defend a single action of Thomas; everything that he did as archbishop may be proved to be altogether blameworthy, and I am none the worse. I am touched only if he can be shown to be a mere factious, intriguing hypocrite; for that I believe that he was not. But, on the other hand, if any one action of Thomas as archbishop can be proved to be

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

praiseworthy, Mr. Froude is so far the worse. Something is taken away from the utter blackness of the picture of sacerdotalism and its champion. I am in the happier position of having nobody to blacken, and indeed nobody to whitewash. My personal partisanship, so far as I have any, ceases when Thomas lays down the chancellorship. I have neither to defend the cause which the archbishop maintained, nor the particular way in which he maintained it. All that I have to say on behalf of either is that the cause was one which in those days might honestly be maintained, and that the way in which Thomas maintained it was one which was natural in a man of his character placed in his position.

It must always be remembered, though it does not seem always to be remembered by Mr. Froude, that there were, at different stages of the story, two distinct subjects of dispute between the archbishop and the king, and that the point for which Thomas died was not the point about which the dispute began. The dispute began out of a number of small quarrels which gathered round the great question of the exemption of the clergy from temporal jurisdiction. Thomas actually died for the rights of his own church, for the right of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and none other, to crown the king of England.* No doubt the two quarrels were closely connected; the second quarrel would never have arisen except as a kind of appendage to the first. It is hardly possible that, had other things gone smoothly, any quarrel could have arisen on this particular point; it is certain that, unless a great deal had gone before, such a quarrel, if it had arisen, could not have led to the primate's death. As a matter of fact, the immediate question for which Thomas was a martyr was the right of coronation, or, if any one chooses to be yet more precise, the right of undisturbed censure on those who infringed the right of coronation. The martyrdom was undoubtedly the result of the earlier quarrel, and the instinct of the age was practically not wrong in looking on Thomas as the martyr of the general cause of ecclesiastical privilege. But it is well to remember what the immediate point at issue was. And we may perhaps be inclined to think that the immediate cause of martyrdom was a worthier cause than the more general matter of dispute. We can now hardly enter into the intense feeling of the age with regard to all local and corporate rights. At least we can hardly enter into it when it takes an ecclesiastical shape. We could understand Thomas dying for the rights of the city of London better than we can understand his dying for the rights of the Church of Canterbury. But, if we throw ourselves into the feelings of the time, we shall perhaps learn to enter into the state of mind which, even if nothing else had gone before would deem it a duty in the head or in any other member of the Church of Canterbury to die rather than do anything which could seem to infringe the highest privilege of that Church or to lessen the guilt of those who had infringed it. This side of the case ought not to be forgotten; at the same time it should not be so pressed as to forget that the question would never have put itself in that form unless a great deal besides had gone before.

I have already said that the claims of the clergy to an exemption from temporal jurisdiction might be fairly said to be the greatest evil of the time in 1164, though they certainly were not the greatest evil of the time in 1154. They were now the greatest evil, because the combined energies of Henry and Thomas had swept away the still greater evils which had been rife ten years earlier. When the power of the temporal law had been fully established over all other classes, the fact stood out more plainly that there was one class, more truly that there were two classes, in the realm who were exempted from its full sovereignty. If the layman wronged his fellow-layman, the sharp justice of the Angevin king knew how to deal with him. King Henry's punishments were stern; but they were punishments at which men's feelings had not hitherto learned to revolt so long as they were meted out to the guilty only. Cruel mutilations were the penalty even of very trifling thefts, while, for the murderer and the robber on a great scale, the law of the Conqueror which forbad the putting to death of any man had long passed out of men's minds. The means were bloody, but the work had been done. One group of exceptions only remained. Let the clerk slay or rob the layman, let the layman slay or rob the clerk, let the clerk slay or rob his brother clerk, and the hand of King Henry's justice was shortened. The Church claimed that all matters in which ecclesiastical persons — taking those words in the very widest sense — were either doers or sufferers should be exempt from the secular jurisdiction, and should be reserved for her

* This is clearly brought out by Mr. Robertson: Becket, p. 290.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

own milder tribunals. Before those tribunals life and limb were safe; imprisonment and stripes were the heaviest sentences. King Henry found that such an exemption made his work imperfect; a crowd of offenders were every year rescued from the authority of his own courts, and were handed over to tribunals which were believed to be often partial and corrupt, and which in any case could deal only very inadequately with the worst class of offenders. Holy orders were then bestowed with such amazing lavishness, and the ecclesiastical privileges sheltered such large classes of persons who were not, according to modern notions, in holy orders at all, that the number of clerical offenders — to say nothing of the lay offenders against clerks — was positively very large. The evil was a crying one. It was absolutely necessary to the completion of King Henry's work that both the priestly murderer and the murderer of a priest should be amenable to the king's justice like other men. To carry out this end Chancellor Thomas was, as far as we can see, perfectly ready; the king thence made the mistaken inference that Archbishop Thomas would be equally ready. Archbishop Thomas, as the facts show, was not so ready; if my estimate of his character is right, it was impossible that he should be.

Mr. Robertson has gone through the matter at some length, and comes to this conclusion: "Nothing, as appears to us, can be plainer than that the archbishop's cause was decidedly wrong."* I have nothing to gainsay in Mr. Robertson's arguments; I have nothing to gainsay in his conclusion, if it simply means that the archbishop's cause was wrong in the sense that we, seven hundred years later, can clearly see that it was wrong. A privilege which was thoroughly mischievous in itself was defended by arguments, scriptural, historical, and legal, all of which were thoroughly fallacious. But if Mr. Robertson means that the archbishop's cause was wrong in the sense that he was morally blameworthy for supporting it — that is, that it was so clearly wrong that he was morally bound to see that it was wrong — I am hardly prepared to go that length. It is certain that many wise and good men supported the same cause, some of them men who thoroughly took in all that could be said on the other side. It was not left for the nineteenth century to weigh the actions of Henry and Thomas in the balance of a perfectly fair judgment. Ages before either Froude arose, William of Newburgh, the father of historical criticism, as Giraldus is the father of comparative philology, held his court on king and primate, and, while ruling that the zeal of both was praiseworthy, gave sentence that the zeal of both had sadly outrun discretion.* The same line is taken by others from whom we might have looked for less impartiality than from a critic far away in another province. The king's case is stated with all fulness and fairness by more than one of the archbishop's own biographers.† No one does more thorough justice to Henry than Herbert of Bosham, the primate's most fiery admirer, the man who did not scruple to reprove King Henry to his face for setting a bad example to a long string of followers who have not known how an emperor of the Romans ought to be described.‡ Herbert pours forth all his rhetoric to set forth the righteous motives of both disputants. King and primate alike had a zeal for God; which zeal was according to knowledge, he will leave God himself to judge.§ Now when men could so fairly and favorably judge what was to be said on the other

* Becket, p. 80.

* The two chapters of this writer which are given to this subject, the sixteenth and the twenty-fifth of his second book, should be most carefully studied, as a wonderfully fair contemporary judgment on both sides. He says of the king (ii. 130): "Acri motu turbatus, in spiritu vehementi contra malefactores clericos posuit leges, in quibus utique zelum justitiæ publicæ habuit, sed fervor immoderatior modum excessit. Sane hujus immoderationis regiæ nostri temporis episcopos tantum respicit culpa, quantum ab eis processit et causa." In speaking of the archbishop (ii. 154), he was tied by the reverence due to a canonized saint; yet he ventures to say: "Itaque quod a venerabili pontifice tunc actum est, nec laudandum esse judico, nec vituperare præsumo; sed dico quod si vel modice in hujus modi a sancto viro per zeli laudabilis paulo immoderatiorem impetum est excessum, hoc ipsum est sacræ, quæ consecuta noscitur, igne passionis excoctum." He argues that Gregory the Great, in his wise condescension to human weakness, would have acted otherwise than Thomas did.

† Henry's case is well put by the anonymous Lambeth writer, Giles ii. 85. And in the other accounts, as in Roger of Pontigny, 120, if Henry's case is not stated in the same formal way, yet the facts which were his justification are plainly set forth.

‡ See the most remarkable conversation between the king and Herbert of Bosham, reported by William Fitz-Stephen, Giles, i. 266; Robertson, iii. 99. (On coming to England, I find Mr. Robertson's edition of William Fitz-Stephen and Herbert of Bosham. I have therefore thought it right to verify my references to Dr. Giles's edition by the new, and doubtless more correct, text.)

§ Herbert has a whole chapter on this head, beginning at p. 102 (iii. 264, Robertson). At p. 108 (272) he bursts into a torrent of declamation in joint honor of both disputants: "O rex et O pontifex, quorum utrumque Dei apprehendit æmulatio." He winds up more gravely: "Certo enim certius quod uterque habuerit æmulationem, unus pro populo, alter vero pro clero; utrius tamen eorum fuerit cum scientia zelus, non hominis, qui cito fallitur, sed scientiarum Domini qui in fine declarabit judicium."

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

side, we must allow that a cause which they accepted, though it may rightly seem monstrous now, must have had something about it which hindered it from seeming utterly monstrous then. Again, nothing is plainer than that, while statesmen and great churchmen were divided, popular feeling everywhere, in his own province and out of it, in his own country and out of it, went enthusiastically along with Thomas and his cause. From his first struggle at Northampton to his last struggle at Canterbury, an admiring multitude is always ready to welcome, to applaud, to wait upon his steps. We may with advantage stop to think what this fact proves and what it does not prove. We need not discuss the meaning put upon it by Thierry, though the fact is valuable the other way, as showing how well a man of Norman descent could win the love of all classes of Englishmen. Nor is the importance of the fact put aside by Mr. Froude's easy process of talking about a "mob."† Let it be that it was only the "mob" which followed Thomas from the gate of Northampton castle to the gate of St. Andrew's Priory, and that it was only the "mob" which came forth from every town and village of Kent, from Southwark, from his own London, to welcome him on his last return. Mobs often go wrong in their judgments, but they hardly shower their applause on men who are known only as unscrupulous and tyrannical ministers. The popular admiration for Thomas in no way proves his cause to have been a cause in itself wise and righteous, a cause which we could wish to have triumphed in the long run; but it does prove that his cause was not at the time palpably the cause of wrong and oppression. Thomas was the champion of clerical immunities; if clerical immunities had been felt by the mass of the people as a wrong to themselves, they would not have applauded the champion of those immunities. Besides the religious — if it will please Mr. Froude, we will call it the superstitious — feeling which would draw the "mob" to the primate's side, the mob would contain comparatively few who had suffered heavy and unpunished wrongs from priestly offenders; it would contain many who had been themselves, who had seen their friends and neighbors, rescued from the bloody sentences of the king's courts by the interposition of the milder jurisdiction of the bishop. A cause which was strongly supported by many of the highest minds of the age, and which was no less strongly supported by the mass of the people, must have had more to be said for it than Mr. Froude, and even than Mr. Robertson, seems to see.

The arguments from Scripture, the civil law, and other sources, by which it was sought to defend the ecclesiastical privileges, may be fairly left to Mr. Robertson's refutation.* They are much on a level with most other such arguments in those ages. When we read Robert Grosseteste's dispute with his refractory canons, we decide that the bishop was right and the canons wrong; but we are in no way helped to that decision by the bishop's arguments about the sun, moon, and stars. When we read the great dispute about the relations between the crowns of England and Scotland, whatever conclusion we may come to, we are not led to it by the statements made on both sides about the children and the contemporaries of Brutus. Those ages were quite capable of arguments purely legal or purely logical. But in attempting disputation of a wider kind, they seem always to have mistaken mere illustrations — illustrations, some of them, which we should very likely make now, but which we should not make without a smile — for serious arguments which proved something. But one special fallacy ran through all arguments on this subject. The course of affairs for several centuries in western Europe, while it had been such as to throw much temporal power into the hands of the clergy, had also been such as at once to extend the class of clergy more widely, and to draw the line between them and the laity more broadly, than in any other time or country. It is not too much to say, with a keener observer than either Mr. Froude or Mr. Robertson, that "the clerical order in the Middle Ages extended far beyond the priesthood; it included in Henry's day the whole of the professional and educated classes."† There is nothing like this in our own time; there never was anything like it in Eastern Christendom, where such learning as there was never died out among the laity. In the West the clergy — taking that word in the widest sense — formed so distinct a class, and a class in many respects so superior to all other classes, that it is not wonderful if there grew up among them the very strongest form of that corporate or quasi corporate spirit, that esprit de corps as it is † Living Age, No. 1730, p. 368. Elsewhere there are "crowds," "swarms," and the like.

* Becket, pp. 77–85.
† Green: History of the English People, i. 164.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

called, which is found in a greater or less degree in all marked classes and professions. Considering again many features of the society in which they lived, it is not wonderful if the clergy sometimes fancied that they, the ministers of the Church, were themselves the Church, and if they applied to the clergy, as distinguished from the laity, much which Scripture says, or was interpreted to say, of the Church as distinguished from the world. This way of looking at things almost naturally led, on the part of the more zealous members of the order, into a way of looking at the civil power which is quite unintelligible in modern times, and which would always have been unintelligible in the East. It is of course, in all times and places, an easy figure of speech to compare a prince whose policy is disliked to all the persecutors and royal sinners in Scripture and ecclesiastical history. But the language of ecclesiastical writers sometimes goes far beyond this. It sometimes almost puts on a tone of Manichæan dualism, as if that one of the two swords which was wielded by Cæsar had been put into Cæsar's hand, not by God, but by his enemy.* The doctrine of the Ghibelline came as the needful answer, and Henry, with all his Guelfic alliances, was really fighting the Ghibelline battle. A prodigious mass of talk of all these kinds is to be found in the writings of the time. It would not be hard to help Mr. Froude to a string of passages which would serve his purpose better than anything that he has either quoted or imagined. To a modern mind all this needs no refutation; my point simply is that the more reasonable forms of this teaching were accepted by good and moderate men, and that, even in its extremest form, it was no cunningly devised scheme for the enslavement of the laity, but was simply something which grew up, like other things, by the force of circumstances.

But we have the further fact that the champions of ecclisastical privilege won for themselves by such championship the admiration of the people in general, of the "mob," in the words of Mr. Froude. Why should men sympathize with the exclusive privileges of a class to which they did not belong? The great master of English history has lately taught us that there is a stage in constitutional development at which the assertion even of exclusive privileges may be popular. The privileges gained by one class may be felt to be a kind of earnest that the same privileges may one day be gained by other classes.* This would seem to be true whenever the privilege is a mere exemption, when nothing is taken from the unprivileged class, but when all that is done is to exempt a single class from some grievance common to all. I confess that, notwithstanding Mr. Robertson's judgment the other way,† I do see in the struggle for ecclesiastical exemptions a struggle for the mitigation of the criminal code. I do see in Thomas's generation the beginnings of a feeling against the barbarous punishments inflicted in the king's courts of which there is no trace in the earlier part of the same century. Herbert of Bosham, stating the case of Thomas, claims it as a clerical privilege to be exempted from branding and mutilation. But he also implies that branding and mutilation are punishments which ought not to be inflicted on any man. His reasoning indeed is as much theological as humanitarian; it is a crime to deface the image of God.‡ Still, in whatever shapes and by whatever arguments, the voice of humanity was making itself heard. Punishments which men accepted as the ordinary course of things in the days of Henry the First were beginning to be cavilled at in the days of Henry the Second. It was openly said that such punishments were too bad for the clergy; it was beginning to be whispered that they were too bad for the laity also. In such a case as this, the establishment of the class privilege is distinctly a step towards the general deliverance. It is idle to dispute whether Thomas was or was not "a kindred spirit to our modern reformers and mitigators of the criminal code." It is enough for my purpose that the cause which he maintained was one which tended, even if indirectly, towards the mitigation of that code, and that the people instinctively saw that it did so tend.

* Some passages go almost further than this. Edward Grim (34), in describing the king's severities towards the criminous clerks, states the facts fairly enough; but when he comes to rhetoric, he speaks of "sanctus archiepiscopus, dolens conservos suos pro quibus Christus mortuus est tantis ascribi indignitatibus."

* See Stubbs: Constitutional History, iii. 562.

† Becket, pp. 86, 87.

‡ Comparing the ecclesiastical and temporal jurisdictions (i. 105; Robertson, iii. 269), he says of the former: "Inde est quod absque membrorum mutilatione et sine omni deformatione corporis est. Spiritualis est enim. Adeo etiam quod ordinis privilegium excludat cauterium, quam tamen pœnam communiter inter homines etiam jus forense damnat: ne videlicet in homine Dei imago deformetur." So the preachers of humanity in the eleventh and twelfth centuries denounced the crime of selling Christians into slavery; those of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries denounced the crime of selling men of any kind. Yet there is one canon of Anselm (see Eadmer, 68) which seems to denounce slavery in the abstract.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Nor, while judging of the ecclesiastical privileges, must we leave out of sight the fact that the rule cut both ways. It is most important to insist on the fact, one which I have already tried to point out, that the privileges of the clerical order were in some cases privileges in which that word seemed to have come back to the older meaning of privilegium. Mr. Froude makes one of his most daring assertions when he says, speaking of the murderers of Thomas: —

> They had been excommunicated, but they had received no further molestation. It has been conjectured that they owed their impunity to Becket's own claim for the exclusive jurisdiction of the spiritual courts in cases where spiritual persons were concerned. But the wildest advocates of the immunities of the Church had never dreamed of protecting laymen who laid their hands on clerks. The explanation was that the king had acted honorably by taking the responsibility on himself, and had not condescended to shield his own reputation by the execution of men whose fault had been over-loyalty to himself.*

I am afraid, as I have hinted more than once, that we must not expect to find kings, bishops, or any class of men in the twelfth century acting honorably in the sense in which Mr. Froude doubtless understands "honorably." But let this pass. I do not know whether the phrase "it has been conjectured" is meant as a rebuke to Mr. Robertson; if so, Mr. Froude has got on rather dangerous ground. Much as I differ from many of Mr. Robertson's conclusions, greatly as I dislike the tone of much of his book, there are few people who are less likely to go wrong on a mere question of fact. Nothing is more certain than that Mr. Froude is utterly wrong in the above hasty assertion, and that Mr. Robertson is perfectly right when he asserts the exact contrary. As the law stood at the time of the murder of Thomas, his murderers could not be touched except by ecclesiastical censures. The law was presently altered; we can hardly doubt that one reason for its alteration was because such offenders as the slayers of the martyr had escaped. These facts should surely have been known to the writer who so powerfully urges the claims of English law to be looked on as the foundation of English history, and it is one of the most surprising cases of Mr. Froude's constant ill-luck that they should not have been known. This will be seen when we compare Mr. Froude's statements with Mr. Robertson's.

Mr. Robertson, in discussing the general question of the immunities, says: —

> No other answer is needed to the claims set up by Becket for the exemption of the clergy from the secular courts than such as is furnished by a letter of his immediate successor, written at a time when the clergy had begun to feel that their immunities were attended by considerable inconveniences. For the Church's claim to exclusive jurisdiction over all cases which concerned the clergy had not only the effect of withdrawing clerical robbers and murderers from the secular tribunals, but also the robbers and murderers of the clergy, so that (as was most signally instanced in Becket's own case) the murderer of an ecclesiastic was subject to no other than ecclesiastical punishments; and the effect of this came to be so seriously felt that Archbishop Richard endeavored to procure an alteration of the law. He argues that misdeeds ought to be punished in any case. "I should be content," he says, "with the sentence of excommunication, if it had the effect of striking terror into evil-doers; but through our sins, it has become ineffective and despised. The slayers of a clerk or a bishop are sent to Rome by way of penance; they enjoy themselves by the way, and return with the pope's full grace, and with increased boldness for the commission of crime. The king claims the right of punishing such offences; but we of the clergy damnably reserve it to ourselves, and we deserve the consequences of our ambition in usurping a jurisdiction with which we have no rightful concern. . . ." The archbishop's argument was intended to protect the clergy from violence, but it is evident that it is equally applicable to the protection of the laity against the violence of clergymen (Becket, pp. 82, 83).

Later, towards the end of the book, Mr. Robertson says again: —

> We have seen that the immunities of the clergy were found a bar to the punishment of the murderers of ecclesiastics: and in consequence of this, Archbishop Richard, the successor of Becket, wrote the letter already quoted, in which the argument, although intended only to secure the punishment of offences against the clergy, is equally strong against that exemption of criminal clergymen from secular jurisdiction which had been the foundation of Becket's cause. It was probably in consequence of this that, in 1176, a council at Westminster, under the legate Hugh Petroleone, enacted that the murderer of a clerk, on conviction or confession before the king's justiciary, should undergo the usual punishment for his crime, and, moreover, should forfeit his inheritance. At the same time it was decreed (although as Henry tells the pope, not without much opposition from the greatest and the wisest men of the realm) that clergymen should not be subject to the

* LIVING AGE, No. 1749, p. 732.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

secular courts except for offences against the forest laws, or on account of fees to which the duty of lay service was attached. The indignation with which contemporary writers assail the legate for consenting to these exceptions, appears to show that they were of great practical importance; but in any case, the principle of the immunity of ecclesiastics from all secular jurisdiction was abandoned, and the sanction of Rome was given to decrees which Becket would have denounced as intolerable and impious (pp. 209, 210).

Mr. Robertson then quotes passages from Giraldus and Peter of Blois, in which Archbishop Richard is blamed for giving up rights for which Thomas had died. This was a somewhat inaccurate statement of the real cause of Thomas's death; but it illustrates the received way of looking at the matter. Now Mr. Froude, who a few pages before had said that "the wildest advocates of the Church had never dreamed of protecting laymen who had laid their hands on clerks," had, somewhere or other, read about this act of Archbishop Richard; but he read it in his usual fashion. He saw enough to make merry about clerical deer-stealers; he never saw the passages which showed that hitherto laymen who laid their hands on clerks had been protected. Here stands his version, well worthy to be compared with Mr. Robertson's. For be it remembered, Mr. Robertson is just as glad as Mr. Froude to catch at anything that will tell against Thomas and his cause. But, unlike Mr. Froude, he sees and reads all that is in his book. Mr. Froude says: —

> In the October following, Cardinal Hugezun came from Rome to arrange the vexed question of the liability of clerks to trial in the civil courts. The customs for which Henry pleaded seem at that time to have been substantially recognized. Offenders were degraded by their ordinaries and passed over to the secular judges. For one particular class of offences definite statutory powers were conceded to the State. The clergy were notorious violators of the forest laws. Deer-stealing implied a readiness to commit other crimes, and Cardinal Hugezun formally consented that orders should be no protection in such cases. The betrayal of their interests on a matter which touched so nearly the occupation of their lives was received by the clergy with a scream of indignation. . . . "Archbishop Richard," says Giraldus, "basely surrendered the rights which the martyr Thomas had fought for and won, but Archbishop Stephen recovered them." The blood of St. Thomas had not been shed, and the martyr of Canterbury had not been allowed a monopoly of wonder-working, that a priest should be forbidden to help himself to a haunch of venison on festival days.*

It may be a question whether a joke about a haunch of venison is worth the cost of a direct misstatement of the law; but, if the joke told against the clergy and the accurate statement of the law told in their favor, it might be too much to expect the assertor of the claims of the statute-book to count the cost in such a case. And it may be that a simple layman cannot throw himself into the point of view from which these things are looked at by one who has himself, like Thomas, "put off the deacon." To the simple layman the fact that the ecclesiastical claims cut both ways, that they sometimes tended to the damage of the clergy as well as to their profit, is an important element in the case, one which not only should not be denied, but should be prominently set forth. By virtue of the privileges for which Thomas struggled, the blood of Thomas remained, as far as temporal punishment was concerned, unavenged. In truth each side of the exemption was a further reason for abolishing the exemption, because each side of the exemption increased the number of offenders who escaped the due reward of their deeds. But we can understand that the fact that the exemption did cut both ways, the fact that, while the clerk was liable to lighter punishments than other men, he was also placed under feebler protection than other men, did something to take away anything that seemed exclusive and invidious in the clerical exemption from temporal jurisdiction.

Such then was the character, such were the various sides and aspects, of these famous claims of the clergy to answer for their crimes in the spiritual courts only which formed the subject of the first struggle between Thomas and the king. Here was a whole system of teaching, supported by great names and precedents, which formed a part, an essential and prominent part, of the clerical belief of the time. Into the midst of this teaching, into an atmosphere where its doctrines floated on every breath, Thomas was suddenly plunged. If he became archbishop, these were the principles which an archbishop was bound to profess and act upon. They were the principles which an archbishop who had sinned against those principles as chancellor was bound to profess and to act

* Living Age, No. 1749, p. 735.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

upon, even more strongly than his predecessors who had needed no such repentance. Anselm stood before his eyes, and, though we may greatly doubt whether Anselm would have countersigned all the doctrines of Thomas — he assuredly would not have approved of all his acts — it was perfectly natural that both Thomas and his contemporaries should honestly believe that he was walking in the steps of Anselm. Once archbishop, with Anselm as his chosen model, Thomas could not fail to become the champion of the ecclesiastical claims in all their fulness. He could not fail to throw into his championship, not only all the inborn fervor of his nature, but the further artificial fervor of one who was acting a part, though a part in acting which he believed that he was only doing his duty.

It is therefore almost vain to inquire whether Thomas was morally justified in taking up the cause which he did take up. Being the man that he was, in the position in which he found himself, it was impossible that he should do otherwise than take up that cause. And being the man that he was, and in the position in which he found himself, it was further impossible that he should do otherwise than take up that cause with a fervor, with an obstinacy, with a kind of reckless defiance of consequences, which was peculiar to himself. Beside him all other assertors of the same claims in his own day, or before his day, seemed lukewarm. It was only natural that they should seem lukewarm. No one else had in the same way the necessity constantly laid upon him of carrying out the part of an ecclesiastical champion in all its fulness. We need hardly stop to argue whether a man was right or wrong in taking up a certain cause when he could not fail to take up that cause unless he had been another man. To Henry at this stage we may pay a higher tribute. We have seen that the most enthusiastic admirers of Thomas fully admit the integrity of his motives. He found a great source of evil in his kingdom, weakening the course of justice and disturbing the peace of the realm. He gave the whole power of his mind to put an end to that evil. Thomas and Henry alike, in the general part which they took, acted as they could not fail to act. Of Henry we may further say that, in the general part which he took, he acted as it was abstractedly right to act. It is more profitable to examine the particular acts both of king and primate, to look at the way in which each, starting from a perfectly defensible position, carried out the cause which he had in hand. In thus weighing their particular acts, we are often driven to pronounce a harsh judgment on both. The pair of disputants with whom we have now to deal have indeed fallen away from the pair of disputants two generations earlier whom they must have had before their eyes. Henry the Second and Thomas are not as Henry the First and Anselm. Each alike loses his dignity and forsakes his position. Thomas is violent, obstinate, provoking; Henry does not shrink from any act of meanness or cruelty which could crush or distress his adversary. But we must insist on king and primate alike being judged by their real acts, as recorded by writers of their own age, not by imaginary acts which ingenious writers of the nineteenth century may think good to discover for them. Now it is not too much to say that Mr. Froude's narrative of the first ground of quarrel between Thomas and Henry, of the events between the consecration of Thomas and the Council of Clarendon, is purely fictitious. The names of the chief actors are the same in the real and in the fictitious narrative. The general course of events in the fictitious narrative might seem to be suggested by the real one. But this is all that we can say. In all the details of the story, in all the points of law and fact on which the controversy turned, Mr. Froude gives us a story which is altogether different from that of the contemporary writers. Mr. Froude deals with facts in the kind of way in which the popes claimed to deal ex plenitudine potestatis with the kingdoms of the earth. He pulls down and he builds up, he plants and he destroys, after a fashion which may be lawful to those whose object it is to make a point against sacerdotalism or anti-sacerdotalism, but which can only be looked at with simple wonder by those whose object is the lowlier one of finding out the truth of history.

Mr. Froude begins his narrative of the grounds of quarrel by a statement of law.

> Knights holding their lands from the Church on military tenure had hitherto done homage for them to the crown. The new archbishop demanded the homage for himself. He required the Earl of Clare to swear fealty to him for Tunbridge Castle. The Earl of Clare refused and appealed to the king, and the archbishop dared not at once strike so large a quarry. But he showed his teeth with a smaller offender. Sir William Eynesford, one of the king's knights, was patron of a benefice in Kent. The archbishop presented a priest to it. The knight ejected the archbishop's

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd nominee, and the archbishop excommunicated the knight.*

The names here are the same as the names in the real story; so are some of the facts. But every fact is so altered, so colored, so mixed up with fictitious statements of fact and erroneous statements of law, that Mr. Froude's story, as it stands, can only be called a fiction. The statement that "knights holding their lands from the Church on military tenure had hitherto done homage for them to the crown" is mere nonsense. Mr. Froude has doubtless got hold of some glimmering of the Conqueror's great law of Salisbury, by which every man in the realm, knights holding their lands from the Church on military tenure among the rest, had to become the man of the king. But this did not, as Mr. Froude seems to think, shut out the homage due to the intermediate lord, ecclesiastical or temporal. Nor was there anything new, as he implies, in the archbishop demanding such homage. Knights holding their lands from the archbishop on military tenure owed homage to the archbishop, but a homage in which their higher allegiance to the king was reserved. Mr. Froude tells the story about Tunbridge Castle, as if the castle had been undoubtedly a fief held of the see of Canterbury by military tenure, and as if the archbishop was guilty of some innovation in demanding homage for an estate so held. The real point of controversy was quite different. The archbishop asserted that the castle was a fief of the archbishopric. When the archbishop therefore demanded homage for it, the earl's answer was not, as Mr. Froude represents it, a mere refusal; it was a proposal of compromise, which reminds us of relations of homage between still greater personages than earls and archbishops. Earl Roger offered to do homage to the archbishop, but he declined to say for what fief the homage was to be done.† This would have had the effect of making the earl personally the archbishop's man, as so many others were, but it would have left the claims of the see over the castle of Tunbridge undecided. The state of things would have been that which sometimes existed between the crowns of England and Scotland, when the two kings were on friendly terms, and when it was not the interest of either to stir the question whether the Scottish king's homage was done for the kingdom of Scotland or for anything else. All these touches, which give so much life and meaning to the story, seem to have no meaning for Mr. Froude. They certainly count for nothing in an argument against sacerdotalism; but they count for a great deal in bringing the life and times of Thomas Becket as a living thing before us. Having done with Earl Roger, Mr. Froude passes on to William of Eynesford, and his story is still more utterly perverted than the other. As Mr. Froude tells it, it reads like a wanton attack on the archbishop's part on the layman's right of patronage. Mr. Froude leaves out the fact, on which the whole story turns, that William, while one of the king's knights, was also one of the archbishop's knights, and that the archbishops claimed to appoint clerks to all churches on lands held of the see.* There seems to have been fair ground for doubt whether this claim was a good one, and it may be that William was right in his law and that Thomas was wrong. In the case of the Earl of Clare, the dispute was a simple question of fact; in the case of William of Eynesford the dispute was a simple question of law. To say that Mr. Froude has misstated the fact in one case and the law in the other, would be paying his narrative too high a compliment. It would imply that his narrative contains intelligible statements which can be affirmed or denied. Instead

* LIVING AGE, No. 1730, p. 361.

† Herbert, i. 86 (iii. 251, Robertson): "Comes vero hominium obtulit, sed super quo, quod quærebat archipræsul, exprimere recusavit." I take this to be the earl's final answer, not as at all contradicting the version given by Ralph de Diceto (i. 311, Stubbs), which, I conceive, refers to an earlier stage of the controversy. Here the earl, called on by the archbishop to do homage for the castle, "archiepiscopo duriorem opposuit adversarium, respondens totum illud feodum in servitio militari et publicis pensionibus persolvendis regem potius attendisse quam archiepiscopum." The proposal put into the earl's mouth by Herbert would naturally come as a later compromise. But, in any case, Ralph's story is quite different from Mr. Froude's. In Ralph's version the earl refuses homage to the archbishop on the ground that he held the castle directly from the king. Granting the earl's fact, his law follows as a matter of course. Granting the archbishop's fact, his law follows equally. Mr. Froude takes, not the earl's fact, but the archbishop's, and gets his law out of his own head.

* See the story in William Fitz-Stephen, 208 (Robertson, iii. 43), who says of the archbishop: "Ejus est tam baronum suorum quam monachorum Cantuariensium vacantes in villis donare ecclesias." As Mr. Robertson says (Becket, p. 72), the claim of the archbishop was a very doubtful one; but it was one which Thomas had inherited from his predecessor Theobald, while Mr. Froude makes the archbishop's collation of the benefice an interference with the rights of a man with whom he had nothing to do. The references which Mr. Robertson makes to Gervase (X. Scriptt. 1667, 1675) throw great doubt on the archbishop's right, which was given up by the next primate Richard. But I do not see that very much is proved by the fact that the monks afterwards received the advowson as a gift ("Willielmus dominus ejusdem fundi dedit conventui Cantuariensi, exenio quoque reddidit"). This sounds to me like a compromise.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of such statements, his narrative is mere careless confusion, but of course a confusion in which everything so falls out as to put Thomas in the worst light. And, again to mark the straws which show the way of the wind, where William Fitz-Stephen says "ecclesiam donaverat," Mr. Froude says, "The archbishop presented a priest to it." Mr. Froude ought to know that to talk of a bishop "presenting" in his own diocese is sheer nonsense.*

It is a question whether this happened before or after the Council of Tours in 1163. Mr. Froude seems to place it before; Mr. Robertson places it after. The point is of some little consequence, as it involves a question whether Thomas was, in these proceedings, carrying out a canon of that council which decreed the restoration of alienated church property.† That Thomas had a general license from the king to recover the lost estates of the see is not stated by Mr. Froude, but it is stated by William Fitz-Stephen.‡ It is likely enough in itself, though Henry may not have foreseen the special use to which the license was to be put. As for the rest of the Eynesford story, if Mr. Froude's study of the statute-book had gone as far back as the few genuine ordinances of the Conqueror, he might have made his case against Thomas stronger than he has done. William was a tenant-in-chief of the crown as well as a tenant of the archbishop, and Mr. Froude understates his case when he says that "it had been usual to pay the king the courtesy of consulting him" before excommunicating such an one. It was no mere matter of courtesy, but a matter of law or established custom, of the Conqueror's own ordaining; and the answer made by Thomas that it was not for the king to meddle in matters of absolution and excommunication was one which goes to the very root of the matter, and might, one would have thought, have served Mr. Froude's purpose well. On the other hand, Mr. Froude seems not to mention that Thomas absolved William of Eynesford, that William, as his man, appeared as one of his sureties at Northampton, and that the question about the advowson was settled by William giving it as a gift, not indeed to the archbishopric, but to the convent of Christ Church.

Mr. Froude's account of the Council of Tours is also remarkable:—

> The English prelates attended. The question of precedence was not this time raised. The Archbishop of Canterbury and his suffragans sat on the pope's right hand; the Archbishop of York and his suffragans sat on the pope's left. Whether anything of consequence passed on this occasion between the pope and Becket is not known: probably not; it is certain, however, that they met.*

It is proverbially hard to prove a negative, and it is strange if so minute an account as Mr. Froude's should be a pure dream. But there is nothing in any book, old or new, to which I have access at this moment which leads me to think that there was a single English bishop at Tours besides Thomas himself. Herbert of Bosham, who was clearly present, gives a minute account of Thomas's journey and of his reception by Alexander. The English primate was received with extraordinary honors, and was treated as first in rank after the pope himself. But of Mr. Froude's picture of the pope in the middle, with Thomas on one side and Roger on the other, there is not a word.† Moreover, it is known that something of very considerable consequence passed on this occasion between the pope and Thomas; "that they met" there is no need to prove. We need not accept the story of William of Newburgh — which is doubtless transferred hither from a later time — that Thomas now resigned his archbishopric and received it again from the pope.‡ But there is no doubt that it was now that Thomas tried to procure the canonization

* The phrase of Ralph de Diceto (i. 311, Stubbs), "Thomas archiepiscopus vacantem ecclesiam Ainefordiæ contulit in Laurentium," is still more accurate.

† Mr. Robertson (Becket, 71) argues that the abuses forbidden by the Council of Tours were of a different kind from those which Thomas was, rightly or wrongly, trying to reform. The words of the canon, as given by William of Newburgh (i. 127), stand thus: "Statuimus ut quisquis alicui laico in seculo remanenti ecclesiam decimamve concesserit," etc. (The text seems to be somewhat different from that quoted by Mr. Robertson.) But the words which go before, "quidam fratrum et coepiscoporum nostrorum aliorumque prælatorum ecclesiæ decimas eis, et ecclesiarum dispositiones indulgent," seem to meet the case of the church of Eynesford, as conceived by Thomas, an advowson which had passed from spiritual into temporal hands. "Habere ecclesiam" and similar phrases are often applied to advowsons. See Domesday, 280, and Norman Conquest, v. 502.

‡ Giles, i. 208 (Robertson, i. 43): "Tamen prius a rege petitam obtinuerat archiepiscopus licentiam revocandi prædia ecclesiæ Cantuariensis, a prædecessoribus suis male alienata, vel a laicis occupata."

* Living Age, No. 1730, p. 362.

† Herbert, i. 90 (Robertson, iii. 255): "Quod cæteris majus adhuc, Romana ecclesia nostrum archipræsulem, tanquam ex multis qui convenerant primogenitum, quodam quæsi primogeniti honore et cultu honestabat præ cæteris." Mr. Froude seems still to be followed by the memory of the day when Archbishop Roger had to be "drawn out of his ill-chosen place."

‡ ii. 130: "Ubi, ut dicitur, pontificatum, minus sincere et canonice, id est, per operam manumque regiam, susceptum, pungentis conscientiæ stimulos non ferens, secreto in manus domini papæ resignavit." This must be a confusion with the scene of the same kind at Sens recorded by Edward Grim (52) and William Fitz-Stephen (244).

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of Anselm. Such an attempt is most significant in connection with what had gone before and with what followed. It could have no other meaning than that of declaring to the world that Anselm was the model which Thomas had chosen to imitate. For Alexander the Sixth to canonize Anselm at the request of Morton was a very harmless proceeding, one which in no way threatened the throne of Henry the Seventh. For Alexander the Third to canonize Anselm at the request of Thomas would have been an act which could have had but one meaning, and that a meaning which might be understood to threaten the throne of Henry the Second. The wily pontiff neither agreed nor refused, but bade Thomas bring the matter before the judgment of the English bishops.* Both Thomas and the English bishops had before long quite other matters to see to.

Just after the matter of William of Eynesford a very remarkable sentence is found in Mr. Robertson's book. "In another case the primate appeared as a sort of Hampden." † As Mr. Froude gives no narrative of this case, I am relieved from giving any counter-narrative; and I am specially glad to be relieved from deciding whether the story has anything to do with Danegeld or no. It is enough to say that Thomas withstood, and successfully withstood, the levying of a tax which he deemed oppressive and illegal — that his so doing brought on him the king's anger — and that Mr. Robertson, no very favorable judge, approves of his conduct. Surely we have here a side of the archbishop's character which deserves some place in the narrative of his life and times. But then the character of a Hampden and the character of an unscrupulous and tyrannical minister are hardly consistent with one another. Still less would it suit Mr. Froude's theory to argue that the consecrating hands of Henry of Winchester had changed the one character into the other. The Hampden-like side of Thomas therefore remained invisible to Mr. Froude's eyes.

And now we have reached the time when Henry deemed, and deemed most rightly, that the time was come to put an end to what, now the greater evils still had been put an end to, might be fairly called the greatest evil of the time, the immunity of criminous clerks from temporal jurisdiction. Several gross cases of crimes done by clerical offenders drew special attention to the matter at this time. Mr. Froude picks out one story to tell in detail. But, while he might have chosen more than one case about which there seems to have been no kind of doubt, Mr. Froude has characteristically chosen a case in which it is by no means clear that any crime was committed at all. As usual, he tells the story after his own fashion, confusing every fact and every point of law on which the real story turns.

A canon of Bedford, named Philip of Broi or Broc, was charged with the murder of a knight. He was tried before his diocesan, the Bishop of Lincoln. As the tale is told to us, the evidence against him was insufficient; he was therefore admitted to a canonical purgation. That is, he was allowed to declare his innocence by a solemn oath.* On this the kinsmen of the slain men declared themselves satisfied, and in ordinary course the matter would have ended. But the sheriff of Bedfordshire, Simon Fitz-Peter, having, it is said, a private grudge against Philip,† demanded that he should be tried again in the king's court. Philip refused to answer a second time on the same charge, especially before a lay tribunal, and being, as we are told, a man of high birth, he used very violent and abusive language to the sheriff. ‡ The sheriff complained to

* See the letter of Pope Alexander to Thomas; Giles, G. Foliot, 261; and the bulls in Anglia Sacra, ii. 177.

† Becket, p. 73.

* The story of Philip of Brois or Broc is told most fully by Edward Grim (22; Robertson, iii. 374), by Roger of Pontigny (114), and by Garnier (30). William Fitz-Stephen (214; Robertson, iii. 43) and Herbert (i. 101; Robertson, iii. 265) tell the story without reference to the charge of murder. They begin with the insults offered to the sheriff, or, as Herbert makes it, to the itinerant justices. The purgation comes out in the accounts both of Edward and Roger: "Ecclesiastico jure purgatur, et soluta controversia liber a parentibus clamatus est," "quum coram episcopo suo super objecto sibi homicidio sufficienter respondisset, et deficientibus in causa adversariis ipse ad innocentiam suam certius comprobandum se sacramento purgasset." The "purgatio" occurs again in the story of the dean at Scarborough (Will. Fil. Steph. 213; Robertson, iii. 44), in a passage which, at least in Dr. Giles's text, is not easy to construe. This dean, one may add, was really brought before the king, which may have helped towards Mr. Froude's notion that Philip of Broi was. The purgatio was not always satisfactory, as in the counter-story in Herbert (i. 101; Robertson, iii. 264), which begins so like this of Philip. Here a priest in the diocese of Salisbury is charged with murder. The accusers fail in their proof: the purgation also fails, and the accusers are not satisfied ("Sacerdote constanter inficiante, quum non posset super homicidio per accusatores convinci canonica indicitur purgatio accusato, accusatoribus præsertim fama consentiente et ipsis etiam probabiliter arguentibus accusatum. Sed eo in purgatione deficiente, mittit episcopus ad archipiæsulem de jure consulens"). Thomas's sentence is that the priest be deprived of his benefices and kept in a monastery, under the strictest penance, for the rest of his days. And this though the charge seems to have been "Not proven."

† "Volens clericum deperire ex antiquo odio," says Edward Grim.

‡ E. Grim, 23 (Robertson, iii. 375): "Clericus autem,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the king; the king, greatly wroth at the insult done to his officer, which he held to be done to himself,* ordered that Philip should be tried again on the old charge of murder. The archbishop was present, and asserted the freedom of the clerk from trial by a secular court. It seems at last to have been agreed that Philip should be tried at Canterbury by a mixed court of bishops and barons.† He was there arraigned for the murder. He denied the charge and pleaded his former trial and purgation. The plea was admitted.‡ His insolence to the sheriff he confessed and professed his readiness to give satisfaction. His sentence was that he should make a personal amende honorable to the sheriff,§ that his prebend should be forfeited to the king for two years, during which time he should leave England, and that his movable goods should be also forfeited to the king, to be disposed, some add, to charitable uses at the king's pleasure.‖ The king was very angry; he demanded that the bishops should themselves make a purgation, and swear that they had judged according to their consciences, and had not let Philip off because he was a clerk.*

Now it is of the essence of this story that Philip was, rightly or wrongly, acquitted of the murder after a manner which was usual in the jurisprudence of the time. It is open to Mr. Froude or to any other man to set very little store on a canonical purgation as a means of getting at truth; it is not open to him or to any other man to represent canonical purgation as being a quite different kind of thing from what it was. The canon law, like the older law of England, attached a certain value to the accused man's oath. In default of conclusive evidence, his solemn denial of the charge was accepted. We know not what the evidence against Philip was. For him there is the fact that the kinsmen of the dead man accepted his denial; against him there is the fact that the sheriff was dissatisfied with the proceedings, balanced by the alleged fact — one very easy to allege — that the sheriff was Philip's personal enemy. I should be sorry positively to affirm either that Philip had killed the knight or that he had not. The point is that he denied the charge, and that both the Bishop of Lincoln and the kinsfolk of the dead man accepted the denial. Mr. Froude, on the other hand, knows much more about the matter. "Philip de Broi . . . had killed some one in a quarrel." The murder being thus assumed, the nature of canonical purgation has to be changed to suit the story. Instead of a solemn denial of a crime, it is turned into a penance or composition for a crime which is not denied. "He made his purgation ecclesiastico jure — that is, he paid the usual fees and perhaps a small fine." Mr. Froude would have us believe that the fact of the murder was allowed on all hands, but that the murderer was let off on payment of fees. This new view of purgation involved some further changes in the story.

The king sent for Philip de Broi, and cross-questioned him in Becket's presence. It was not denied that he had killed a man.†

ut vir ingenuus, dolore tactus et indignatione, convitiis vicecomitem aggressus est." So Queen Elizabeth in the ballad "swore most like a royal queen," and there is a story of some one who knew that Sarah Duchess of Marlborough must be "a great lady," because of her oaths. Roger (114) and Garnier (319, "Li clerc fu gentiz hom") witness to Philip's good birth; but they do not so distinctly connect his good birth and his bad language. In Mr. Froude's version, he becomes "a young nobleman," though I do not think that there is anything elsewhere about his age.

* Roger, 114: "Sic se habere convitia illa militi suo illata, ac si sibi ipsi intulisset Philippus." Edward Grim gives the matter another turn: "Gavisus, ut creditur, rex accepta occasione sæviendi in clericum."

† E. Grim, u. s.: "Missis igitur a rege episcopis aliisque ordinis utriusque, qui clericum judicarent." So Roger: "Quosdam episcopus et proceres ad diem sibi ab archiepiscopo constitutam Cantuariam transmisit."

‡ Roger, 115: "Quum venissent, Philippum de veteri querela homicidii instanter impetebant. Quumque causam ecclesiastico judicio terminatam iterari non debere judicatum fuisset, ventum est tandem ad contumelias regio militi illatas."

§ The description of the amende is curious. Edward Grim gives it thus: "Quod nudus astaret ministro regis, laicali more, et ipsi offerret arma pro injuria, et in illius viveret subjectione." "Ipse vero ante militem, nudum se secundum morem patriæ satisfacturus offerret," is Roger's account. In the French rime of Garnier (32), it stands —

"Ultre ço, li jugèrent n'il se despuillereit,
Devaunt le chevaler, se suffrir le voleit;
Et, véaunt ses amis, armes aportereit,
A la lei del païs de sus li jurereit,
De teus mesfet de lui teus amendes prendreit."

Herbert (102) says: "Publica virgarum disciplina clerico adjudicata." William Fitz-Stephen (214) says nothing about the amende, but sends Philip into banishment: "Simul et regni inhabitatione Philippum privandum." So the best authority of all, Ralph de Diceto (i. 313, Stubbs): "Pulsus est e regno per biennium."

‖ This stands in Garnier (31) —

"Jugent li ke dous aunz sa pruvende lerra,
Et li Reis entretant les rentes en prendra,
A musters et à pofres et à punz les durra;
Et en autres almones, einsé cun lui plerra.
— Or pot dire Phelipes ke riche almoner a."

According to Roger (115), the king was not bound in this way to be Philip's almoner: "Rex iterum [interim?] de reditibus ejus quod vellet faceret." Edward Grim clearly distinguishes between the prebend and Philip's other property. "Decernimus ut biennio maneat sub manu regis præbenda tua, et possessiones, omniaque quæ in reditibus habes, ad nutum ipsius eroganda pauperibus."

* E. Grim, u. s.: "Per oculos Dei, ait, jam mihi jurabitis quod justum judicium judicastis nec pepercistis viro quia clericus est."

† Living Age, No. 1730, p. 362.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

That the king sent for Philip is a pure imagination of Mr. Froude's. The "cross-questioning" was suggested by the words of Edward Grim, "facta quæstione de clerico in præsentia archiepiscopi." But this does not mean a cross-questioning of Philip by the king, but a discussion of Philip's case by king, sheriff, and archbishop. The words "it was not denied that he had killed a man" seem to be suggested by the words of Edward Grim a little later, "negat ille homicidium."* To be sure, the words which suggest Mr. Froude's statement, and Mr. Froude's statement itself, have exactly opposite meanings, and on the opposition between their meanings the whole story turns. Still the words "negat ille homicidium" have that outward and physical likeness to Mr. Froude's statement which seems to be all that Mr. Froude cares for in dealing with his authorities. There is in both something about a denial, and something about killing a man. The only difference is as to the place of the negatives in the sentence. But negatives are but little words after all, and it is easy to leave them out or to put them in. We have all heard of the edition of the Bible which left out the "not" in the seventh commandment. I have sometimes wondered whether, in an Oxford convocation, the proctors can always distinguish a vote of "Placet" from one of "Non placet." It is certain that Mr. Froude looks on the difference between "negat" and "non negat" as a very trifling matter. In his eyes it is clearly open to a writer on the "Life and Times of Thomas Becket" to use either phrase at pleasure, according as the negative or the affirmative may best serve to blacken the character of Thomas and the ecclesiastical order generally.

And now we come to the great central point of the whole story, to the famous Constitutions of Clarendon, and to all that followed on their enactment or proposed enactment. From this point I shall cease to follow Mr. Froude in detail. I have, I trust, already done my main work. I have, I trust, shown how utterly untrustworthy is Mr. Froude's whole narrative of the acts of Thomas, how utterly groundless is the imaginary portrait which he paints by way of inference from a series of imaginary acts. For the part of Thomas's life with which I am most concerned, for his chancellorship, I have tried to substitute a more trustworthy narrative of his acts, and a portrait which, as it is drawn by way of inference from acts which are not imaginary, is, I trust, itself not an imaginary portrait. I have also tried to show what was the real position of both parties at the opening of the quarrel between the king and the archbishop, to show what was the real nature of those ecclesiastical exemptions which formed their first main ground of quarrel, how they looked at the time, how they worked in practice. I have, I hope, done enough to show that the cause which Thomas took up, though a cause which, by the light of the nineteenth century, we see to be wholly wrong, was one which an honest man might well take up in the twelfth century. I wish to establish, in opposition to partisan writers on either side, that king and archbishop alike were, as Herbert of Bosham so strongly sets forth, acting with thorough honesty, in Herbert's phrase, with a "zeal for God." It is not needful for my purpose to go through that long controversy, or to examine in detail a long series of acts of both Henry and Thomas, many of which on both sides must be condemned. My general position I believe I have made good; and, as to Mr. Froude's way of telling particular stories, it is hardly needful to give any more detailed examples after this last of Philip of Broi. I shall now therefore do no more than make some further remarks on some aspects of Mr. Froude's treatment of the general story, without examining either the contemporary or the modern narrative in the same minute way in which I have thus far examined some portions of it.

This then is the place for a word or two as to the famous Constitutions themselves. Were they, as the king and his party said, really the old law of England, or were they, as the archbishop and his party said, mere modern innovations, perhaps not of Henry himself, but of tyrants a little before his day? Very vague language was used on both sides, and the state of the case was such that it is in no way wonderful that vague language was used on both sides. Looking at the Constitutions as a

* It is hardly possible that Mr. Froude can have fancied himself to be following the short account of Ralph de Diceto (i. 313, Stubbs): "Controversiæ præstitit occasionem Phillippus de Broc, canonicus de Bedeford, qui tractus in causam propter homicidium, in justiciarum regis verbum protulit contumeliosum. Quod cum coram archiepiscopo negare non posset, præbendæ suæ multatus est beneficio, pulsus est a regno per biennium." Here certainly is the verb "negare" with a negative. The word "homicidium" is not very far off, and a reader who had seen no fuller account might doubt for a moment whether "negare" referred to "homicidium" or to "verbum contumeliosum." But the purgation and the other details, of which Mr. Froude has made so strange a use, can never have come from this source; they are clearly from Edward Grim.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

whole, he would be a rash historian who should venture to call them, as a whole, either old or new. But there was quite air enough of both age and newness about them to make it perfectly natural for one side to call them old and for the other side to call them new. On the one hand, it is quite certain that not one of the Constitutions can be fairly called an innovation of Henry's own devising. On the other hand, it is equally certain that the Constitutions, as a code, would have had a very strange look in the eyes of an Englishman a hundred years earlier. Henry professed, and on the whole he was justified in the profession, that his object was to restore the law as it had stood under his grandfather. A state of things two reigns back, a state of things ranging from thirty to more than sixty years back, commonly seems to statesmen quite old enough for all practical purposes. But the fact that it was a state of things two reigns back, and not only one reign back, gave its restoration an air of innovation. After the time of anarchy anything might seem new. The root of the whole matter lay in the Conqueror's separation of the ecclesiastical and temporal jurisdictions. In the old times of England these questions had never been stirred. Even after the Conquest there was for a long while very little disposition to stir them. Under the Conqueror we hear of claims to exemption from the mouth of Odo; but William and Lanfranc knew how to deal with a Bishop of Bayeux who was also Earl of Kent. Under Rufus comes the much more remarkable but much less known story of William, Bishop of Durham, which I hope some day to have an opportunity of dealing with in the detail which it deserves.* Under Henry the First ecclesiastical claims grew, as they could not fail to grow at such a time, even with the strong hand of the Lion of Justice to keep them down.† Then, under the anarchy, they grew apace; as we have seen, every aspect of the time combined to make them grow. They grew both for good and for evil. We may be sure that, when Henry and Thomas entered on their first work of reform, the question had put on much larger dimensions than it had ever borne under the earlier reign of law. Both clerkly murderers and murderers of clerks must have become much larger classes than they had been before the anarchy. Now that other classes of evil-doers had been brought under the power of the law, Henry wished to complete his work by bringing these classes under the power of the law also. So to do was his duty as king, and with the experience of so many ages to enlighten us, we cannot deem that he did other than his duty as king in his attempt to secure the full ecclesiastical independence of England, to put a stop to all appeals, to all reference to a foreign power, in the affairs of his realm. It must always be remembered that, as far as dealings with the court of Rome went, what Henry the Eighth did Henry the Second had tried to do. We honor him for the attempt; but we see also that the attempt was premature. The mind of western Europe was not yet advanced enough for its success; Henry could not keep his own position; he forbade appeals and then appealed himself. The system of appeals was itself a novelty; but the new views had grown so fast that it was now their prohibition which had the look of innovation. The constitution about the revenues of vacant bishoprics and abbeys was a device of Randolf Flambard; it could no longer be called an innovation in the days of Henry. The constitution about ecclesiastical elections will be best understood if we bear in mind the wonderful irregularity which had prevailed in the way of appointing bishops and abbots at least down to the settlement between Anselm and Henry the First. It was thoroughly understood at the time of Thomas's own appointment that the king was the real elector.* Henry the Second, like Henry the Eighth, wished to establish this acknowledged fact somewhat more clearly. One constitution, which generally gets overlooked, but which was not overlooked by Thomas's French biographer,† that which forbids the ordination of villains without their lord's consent, was founded on a very old piece of canon law which forbade the ordination of slaves in such cases. Granting the existence of slavery, there is nothing unreasonable in such a law. But, as applied to villains, the rule had, though it is quite possible that neither Thomas nor Henry remarked the fact, a special importance at that time when the free churls of an earlier day were fast sink-

* I refer to the story in the Monasticon, i. 244.

† See Norman Conquest, v. 236.

* Roger, 105: "Regis voluntas . . . ex qua totam electionis summam pendere oportebat."

† Garnier, 89: —

"Fils à vilains ne fust en nul liu ordenez Sanz l'otrei sun seignur de cui terre il fu nez.
— Et deus à sun servise nus a tuz apelez!
Mielz valt filz à vilain qui est preuz et senez,
Que ne feit gentilz hum failliz et debutez."

See Robertson, 99. Stubbs: Constitutional History, iii. 367.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ing into villainage.* Taken one by one, the Constitutions, looked at as customs, cannot be called novelties. The novelty lay in drawing them up in precise language and in the form of a code, and in calling on men to promise obedience to them under their seals. Things to which people are very well accustomed in practice often have an air of novelty when they are drawn out in a formal way, still more when men are called on to pledge themselves to them in a formal way. Each way of looking at the Constitutions had in it an element of truth. In such cases party spirit is commonly satisfied with the element of truth which is on its own side. A priest of the eleventh century, with an element of truth in his case, was not likely to see the element of truth in his adversary's case; he could hardly be expected to do so when an historian of the nineteenth is so carried away that he cannot see the facts, even when all the truth is on the other side and not even an element on his own. And yet Herbert of Bosham, William of Newburgh, the writer of the anonymous life, have fully and frankly done that justice to Henry, which Mr. Froude, I will not say of set purpose, but under the influence of some misguiding and avenging Atê, has refused to do to Thomas.

To these Constitutions, as every one knows, Thomas gave a consent of which he afterwards repented — "affected penitence," Mr. Froude ventures to call it. It is not easy to get at the exact truth of the matter; for it is not very clear whether Thomas really set his seal to the Constitutions or gave a mere verbal assent — two very different things in the morality of his age. Some of the biographers look one way, some another, while Gilbert Foliot has a version,† whose seeming differences from all other accounts remind us of the counter-statements of Aischinês and Dêmosthenês. Still even his story may perhaps, by allowing for a little exaggeration, be reconciled with the main facts of the other stories with no very great trouble. I am not called on to defend the conduct of Thomas from Mr. Froude's very harsh constructions, all the less as, this time, a very sufficient defence against Mr. Froude's worst charges has been made beforehand by Mr. Robertson.‡ On the whole, it seems most likely that Thomas was led to believe that the king would be satisfied with a mere verbal assent, to save the king's honor, and that the matter would be pressed no further. When he was further called on to set his seal to the document, he felt himself, I still venture to say, "entrapped;" in the end he yielded and repented.

The successive scenes in the Northampton Council form such a vivid piece of personal history that Mr. Froude has, as it were, in spite of himself, allowed some measure of life to find its way into his narrative of them. Mr. Froude can tell a story; he could have told this story nobly; even as it is, the master of narrative sometimes prevails over the hater of sacerdotalism. But the most touching incident of all, when the fiery Herbert stirs up the archbishop to fierce action, when the milder William Fitz-Stephen counsels patience, when the king's officer forbids him to speak to his master, and he still points in silence to the suffering figure on the crucifix,* — this scene finds no place in Mr. Froude's picture. But it is more important to notice that again every detail on which the issue turns is wrongly told by Mr. Froude. Of the nature of the great assembly which met at Northampton, Mr. Froude could have had no idea when he talked about "every peer and prelate." It was the old assembly of England, which Gilbert Foliot, rhetorically perhaps, speaks of as a gathering of the people, and to which at least all the king's tenants-in-chief were summoned.† "Becket alone had hesitated to appear." There is no evidence that this was so; but, if so it was, it was because he was not summoned in usual form as a member of the assembly, but was cited to appear before it as a party accused,

* See Norman Conquest, v. 475–479.

† This is the famous letter printed by Dr. Giles, in his collection of Gilbert Foliot's Letters, i. 275, and the genuineness of which is discussed by Mr. Robertson: Becket, p. 325. See especially Gilbert's version of Thomas's conduct, p. 272.

‡ Pp. 103, 104.

* This is told by William Fitz-Stephen: "Post modicum, idem Willielmus filius Stephani volens loqui archiepiscopo, et a quodam marescallo regis, qui cum virga sua astabat, prohibitus, dicente, quod nullus ei loqueretur. Post intervallum, intendens in archiepiscopum, erectione oculorum et motu labiorum, signum fecit ei, quod crucis suæ exemplum, et crucifixi, quam tenebat, imaginem respiceret, et quod in ratione esset; archiepiscopus signum illud intellexit bene, et fecit sic, confortatus in Domino." He adds, that Thomas reminded him of the incident some years later. It is worth notice that William Fitz-Stephen often mentions Herbert of Bosham, as well as John of Salisbury and others, in his narrative; but I do not think that Herbert ever mentions William.

† "Generale concilium," says William Fitz-Stephen (218). "Omnes qui de rege tenerent in capite mandari fecit," says Edward Grim (39). So the French rimer (50) —

"Et prelaz et baruns par ban i fait venir Trestuz ceus ke en chef de lui deivent tenir."

He does not here use the beautiful word which he has in p. 86,

"Nuls qui tenist del rei sa terre chevalment," which would hardly have been wide enough.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to answer the suit of John the marshal. John the marshal's name does not occur in Mr. Froude's account, where everything is wrapped in vague phrases, and where John's suit is darkly alluded to in one of the vaguest of them. Yet the alleged denial of justice in the archbishop's court in the cause of John the marshal was the root of the whole matter. It was solely for his conduct in that cause that Thomas was legally summoned to answer at Northampton. All Mr. Froude's hints and surmises are without authority; they all come from one source, that ludicrous misunderstanding of Edward Grim's language about the war of Toulouse of which I spoke long ago. Nothing is plainer than that Henry was now determined to crush Thomas by any means, right or wrong. Up to this point Henry was distinctly in the right. Outwardly he was so on every point; the only question as to his personal integrity in the matter is whether he had any deliberate share in the process by which Thomas was undoubtedly entrapped at Clarendon. Anyhow he was formally in the right. Thomas had lost his ground by his conduct at Clarendon. But Henry could not keep in the right. Thomas was now his enemy, to be overthrown by any means, fair or foul. All money claims against the chancellor had been released to the archbishop at his consecration. Yet Henry was not ashamed to bring them up again, in order to crush Thomas yet further. All this shows the same spirit as Henry's later barbarous dealings with the guiltless kindred and friends of Thomas; it shows the spirit of the man who put out the eyes of the children of the Welsh princes. Henry was a great king, a great lawgiver, a ruler who did much for England and whose name England ought to hold in honor. But in a crowd of acts of this kind he showed the blood that was in him. We feel that we are dealing with a prince who ruled over England and Normandy, but who was himself neither English nor Norman. In all this we see the man who came of the dæmon stock of Anjou.

In the behavior of Thomas, on the other hand, we see throughout the artificial character of his saintship. The thing is overdone; there is no simplicity about it; the fierce fanaticism, the overwrought spiritual excitement, the morbid craving for martyrdom, the evident delight in the mere wielding of his spiritual arms, all belong to the man who, honestly no doubt, but consciously, asked himself at each stage what was the right thing for a candidate for saintship to do. Anselm before him, Edmund after him, assuredly never asked any such question. But then Anselm and Edmund had not been suddenly changed from chancellors into archbishops. They had never felt the joys of combat — the certaminis gaudia — in unhorsing Ingelram of Trie; so they never felt the kindred joy of excommunicating Roger of York and Gilbert of London. Human nature is so complex and contradictory that such a joy need not make us think that the tears and the broken voice with which some of Thomas's excommunications and denunciations were pronounced * were in any degree counterfeit. A much later prelate has been known to sign himself the "afflicted servant" of a metropolitan whom he was routing with all the vigor of an unanswerable logic, and to speak — doubtless in all sincerity — of the "pain" which he felt in dealing blows which must have been attended by that satisfaction with which human skill cannot help looking on its own successful efforts. No wonder if Pope Alexander, calm, crafty, politic, with his own objects to gain, felt the living saint an encumbrance till he was, so happily for all Alexander's objects, changed into the dead martyr. We feel indignant with the way in which Alexander takes Thomas up and puts him down again, as suits the purpose of the moment; but we must remember how strange, how unintelligible, how untoward for his own plans, the stubborn — he would call it perverse — obstinacy of the Englishman must have seemed to the wily Italian. And, of all things in the world, when peace had been made, when Thomas came back to his Church, he surely should not have come back amidst a whirlwind of suspensions and excommunications. However deeply the rights of the Church of Canterbury had been sinned against, that was surely the moment for an amnesty. Moderate men, warm admirers of his own, saw this fully at the time.† So, earlier in his career, his wise and cool-headed friend John of Salisbury warned him against studies, the canon law above all, which were likely to gender to pride and wrath rather than to

* Herbert, i. 230 (Robertson, iii. 391): "Confestim, omnibus, audientibus et constupentibus, miro modo compunctus, voce quidem flebili et intentissimo compassionis affectu in ipsum Anglorum regem Henricum nominative comminatorium emisit edictum." Mr. Froude (LIVING AGE, No. 1733, p. 546) naturally knows nothing of this; but he adds that Thomas was "in high delight with himself," which is perfectly possible. "Excommunicavit" is of course throughout translated "cursed."

† This is strongly put in the anonymous "Lambeth Life," ii. 116, 119.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

meekness and long-suffering.* Yet there was, after all, some meekness and long-suffering left in the man who took such an adviser's rebukes in thorough good part.† All this part of Thomas's career, the hardest to justify, the most wearisome to study, is one on which I have no call to dwell. Yet even here I must ask for justice. It is hard measure when Mr. Robertson blames Thomas for outspoken English words against the corruptions of the Roman court which in another mouth might have been hailed as signs of premature Protestantism.‡ And though every excommunication was in some sort a curse, it is an invidious way of putting it, when Mr. Froude always uses the word "curse" instead of "excommunication."

And now I have done. I have said enough for my purpose both as to the character of Thomas and as to his treatment by Mr. Froude. I conceive that, since men began to write history at all, not many so-called historical narratives have been written which have so utterly departed from the truth of fact as Mr. Froude's "Life and Times of Thomas Becket." I know one parallel, and only one; that is "The Annals of an English Abbey." I know of no other writings professedly historical in which page follows page in which it is really safe to follow the rule of contrary. A large part of Mr. Froude's narrative can only be used negatively: when we have read his account and have not yet turned to his authorities, we do not know how things did happen, but we know one of the ways in which they did not happen. Now, though there are other writers who are very untrustworthy, I know none beside Mr. Froude who has reached such a depth of untrustworthiness as this. The thing is quite distinct from mere ordinary blunders, springing from ordinary ignorance or ordinary carelessness. Mr. Froude has plenty of them too; but mere blunders of this kind would not have given Mr. Froude that special character which is wholly his own, and which no one else can dispute with him. Mere inaccuracy in detail is quite another matter from the purely fictitious character of large parts of Mr. Froude's story. All inaccuracy is a fault; but some kinds of inaccuracy are not inconsistent with very high merits. The best historian, like the best general, is he who makes fewest mistakes. The difference between the accurate and the inaccurate writer is not that the accurate writer makes no mistakes, but that the accurate writer finds out his own mistakes, while the inaccurate writer leaves his mistakes to be found out by other people. The all but unfailing accuracy — I say "all but," in order to be ready for any mischance, rather than from any distinct conviction that the qualification is needed — of a Thirlwall or a Stubbs is not given to ordinary men. The rest of us must be prepared to make mistakes, and we must be satisfied if our mistakes are such that we can correct them in our errata or in our second edition. I am now speaking of mistakes strictly so called, as distinguished from theories and inferences which may be held to be erroneous. Take the work of Thierry. Never was a work founded on a theory more utterly groundless; but the mere errors in detail are fewer than might have been looked for, and they are of quite another kind from Mr. Froude's. Thierry uses authorities in the wildest way; he has no notion of the different value of authorities; any book older than the invention of printing seems to him to be as good as any other book. He takes a piece from one account and a piece from another, and puts them together without seeing that they are inconsistent with one another. He kills the

* See the letter in Giles, i. 194, of which Mr. Froude (LIVING AGE, No. 1733, p. 543) gives a very singular summary. He leaves out all about the canon law, and when John says, "Expedit conferre de moribus cum aliquo spirituali, cujus exemplo accendamini quam inspicere et discutere litigiosos articulos sæcularium literarum," he translates — "To confer with spiritual men, whose example may influence your devotion, would profit you more than indulging in litigious speculations." It is hard to guess what idea Mr. Froude's readers will form of Thomas's "litigious speculations." The passage is translated with perfect accuracy by Mr. Robertson: Becket, 167.

† It is some comfort that Mr. Froude does not make Thomas "curse" John of Salisbury for this letter. It seems, from Mr. Robertson's note on the page just quoted, that he would have found some precedents for so doing.

‡ Mr. Robertson (Becket, 236) is much displeased with Thomas's certainly very violent letter to the Cardinal Albert in Giles, Ep. i. 95. The references to Barabbas and the like are the usual commonplaces of the time, which popes down to our own day have always known how to deal back again.

As I have now come to the end, I may mention a passage in a letter in the same collection which has a curious sound in connection with Thomas's early pluralities. This is the letter of Nicholas "de monte Rothomagensi" (explained by Mr. Robertson, 153, as "master of a hospital, at Mont. S. Jacques, near Rouen"), Giles, Ep. ii. 187. It is the letter which describes the reading of the Constitutions of Clarendon to the empress Matilda. Matilda makes a speech, in which, among the other evils of the time, she mentions how "uni clericulo quatuor aut septem ecclesiæ tribuuntur aut præbendæ, cum sacri canones ubique manifeste prohibeant, ne clericus in duabus ecclesiis connumeretur." The whole letter is remarkable on many grounds, both those which have to do with the history of Thomas, and those which have not. She approved of some of the Constitutions, but not of others, and she especially disapproved of their being put in the shape of a code.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

same man two or three times over by different names, or he records his acts in two or three inconsistent ways, if Norman and English writers happen to give his name in different shapes. He colors too; so we all do more or less; but Thierry colors more than most of us. He puts in the word "Saxon" or "Anglais" wherever, according to his theory, the word "Saxon" or "Anglais" ought to have been found. Yet, with all this, for nearly every direct statement Thierry has, I will not say authority, but something which he chose to take for authority. We do not find in Thierry page after page which has no likeness to anything earlier than his own book, except the mere physical likeness of names and words which seems to have been suggested, but only suggested, by the sight of some ancient record. Thierry's book could never be made a useful or safe book by any amount of correction; but the reason lies far more in the general unsoundness of the theory, in the utterly uncritical use of authorities, than in the actual mistakes in detail, though they are not few. Sir Francis Palgrave again — I speak of those of his writings which he had himself corrected — is full of theories which I must deem to be, if not erroneous, at least exaggerated; he is full of inferences from his authorities which I cannot see that his authorities bear out. But every word is written from some authority; even if we reject the authority, if we refuse to accept the inference from the authority, the authority itself is not misrepresented or made to say the opposite of what it does say. Take again Dean Milman. It might seem a bold thing to call him an inaccurate writer; yet there is a sense in which the charge would not be untrue. No style is more massive and forcible than his; no narrative is more weighty and instructive. But go into details; there are many sentences which are not strictly grammatical, and the slips in names, titles, dates, and the like, are endless. But these are not mistakes which touch the essence of the matter; a few strokes of the pen would set them all right for another edition. I know not how Dr. Milman wrote; but his text always reads to me like the first draft of a manuscript which the author has not read over. The mistakes are of the kind which are sure to be made in such a draft even by the most accurate of men. Not long ago I was very severely taken to task by a most distinguished German scholar for having quoted Mr. Green's "Short History of the English People." I ought not, I was told, to have quoted a book which, like Mr. Green's, "swarmed with errors." Yet, notwithstanding the distinguished German scholar's rebuke, I mean to go on quoting Mr. Green's "Short History," except so far as I may find it more convenient to quote the more agreeable print of his longer history. Mr. Green's book — at least its first edition — did indeed abound in errors, errors which one was amazed to find in a book of such astonishing knowledge, insight, and power of writing. But, allowing for what is a wholly different matter, conclusions in which one might not wholly agree, Mr. Green's errors were mainly — I will not say always — errors of the same kind as Dr. Milman's, errors which a correction here and there would set right. And there are a crowd of writers, some of great popular reputation, against whom accurate scholarship has far heavier charges to bring. There are books, popular books, celebrated books, which are full of errors of a very different kind from the slips of Dr. Milman and Mr. Green — errors of gross carelessness, gross ignorance. Still, the narratives of which I speak are not purely fictitious; the main outlines of the real story are there; no amount of correction could make the narratives really good, but a careful improvement in detail might make them fairly trustworthy. Mr. Froude stands alone as the one writer of any importance of whose writings one can say that on them any process of correction would be thrown away. The evil is inherent, it is inborn. It is not mere coloring; it is not mere mistaken inference; it is not mere mistakes in detail, however gross the carelessness or ignorance which they might imply. It is the substitution, through page after page, of one narrative for another — the substitution of a story which bears no likeness to the original story except that the same actors appear in both. When such narratives as that of Mr. Froude appear under the garb of history, it becomes the duty of those who have really studied the times which he ventures to touch to put in their protest in the name of historic truth. I leave others to protest against Mr. Froude's treatment of the sixteenth century. I do not profess to have mastered those times in detail from original sources. I have however been often led to particular points in those times from various local and special quarters; and when I have been so led, I have always found Mr. Froude's treatment of the matter which I had in hand both inadequate and inaccu-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

rate. But in the twelfth century I feel myself at home, only less at home than if Mr. Froude had come and sought me out in the eleventh. If history means truth, if it means fairness, if it means faithfully reporting what contemporary sources record and drawing reasonable inferences from their statements, then Mr. Froude is no historian. The "Life and Times of Thomas Becket," whatever it may be, is not a history; because history implies truth, and the "Life and Times of Thomas Becket" is not truth but fiction. It does not record the life of a chancellor and archbishop of the twelfth century, but the life of an imaginary being in an imaginary age. It may be a vigorous and telling party pamphlet; it is not a narrative of facts. Mr. Froude is a man of undoubted ability, of undoubted power of writing. If there is any branch of science or learning in which accuracy of statement is a matter of indifference, in which a calm putting forth of statements which are purely arbitrary can be accepted in its stead, in that branch of science or learning Mr. Froude's undoubted ability, his gift of description and narrative, may stand him in good stead. But for the writing of history, while those gifts are precious, other gifts are more precious still. In that field "before all things truth beareth away the victory;" and among those whom truth has enrolled in her following as her men, among those who go forth to do battle for her as their sovereign lady, Mr. Froude has no part nor lot. It may be his fault; it may be his misfortune; but the fact is clear. History is a record of things which happened; what passes for history in the hands of Mr. Froude is a writing in which the things which really happened find no place, and in which their place is taken by the airy children of Mr. Froude's imagination. EDWARD A. FREEMAN.

From The Nineteenth Century.

THE CHINESE AS COLONISTS.

THE Chinese are, by common consent of all Western nations, pronounced to be an eccentric and impracticable race. And not without reason; for, in nearly every characteristic which marks a people, they seem to be hopelessly antagonistic to nations occupying the western hemisphere, and usually included in the conventional term "civilized." Oil and water would seem to be scarcely less reconcilable to each other than is the Chinaman to the European or American; and the greater the opportunities of intercommunication the less they appear likely to harmonize. Yet the Chinese do not, like most dark-skinned races, flinch or degenerate in the contact. On the contrary; homogeneous, sturdy, clannish, and enterprising, they not only hold their own, hand to hand and foot to foot, with more favored races, but compete with them successfully upon Chinese soil, and bid fair to wrest from them the prizes of art, labor, and commerce even in their own territories. As a natural result, Chinese immigration has become a red rag to Australians and Americans alike, and the question of putting a decided stop to it, or so dealing with it as to keep it within manageable bounds, forces itself with daily increasing weight upon the attention of the several administrations concerned.

Summarize the charges brought against Chinese immigrants by those most nearly interested, namely, British colonist and United States citizen, and these may be stated as follows: They are pronounced to be the scum of the population of the worst districts of China; they migrate without their families, and the few women they import are shipped under a system of slavery for the vilest purposes; they introduce their own bizarre habits and ideas, and studiously eschew all sociability with colonists of other races; they outrage public opinion by hideous immoralities; they ignore or defy judicial and municipal institutions; they form secret and treasonable associations amongst themselves; they manage to afford, by their low, miserable style of living, to undersell and underwork white men as mechanics, laborers, and servants; they fail to take root in the soil, making it their aim always to carry home their gains to the old country, and even to have their bones conveyed back thither for interment; in a word, so far from seeking to become colonists or citizens in the true sense of the terms, and striving to enrich or benefit the country of their temporary adoption, they are mere vagrants and adventurers, and that of a kind positively hurtful to the general welfare and progress.

Some of these accusations are serious enough, and the remainder of the traits ascribed derive an importance which they would not otherwise possess from mere association with a race which has unfortunately rendered itself obnoxious. The object of this paper is to inquire how far the generally received opinion is to be accepted as correct, and whether any, and, if so, what, steps can be taken to remove or

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

modify any difficulties which may actually lie in the way of acclimatizing (so to speak) the Chinese upon a foreign soil with advantage to themselves and to those amongst whom they settle. It will be presumed, as a matter of course, that the Chinaman has as much right to emigrate, and claim for his motto the maxim "Live and let live," as any other denizen of this earth's surface. Any one thinking otherwise must seek elsewhere than in this paper for a refutation of his dog-in-the-manger doctrine.

In dealing with the charges brought against the Chinese immigrant it would seem only necessary to give attention to the more material ones of vagrancy, immorality and insubordination. As regards those other traits which derive their importance from association rather than from any inherently objectionable features, it will suffice if their influence be not lost sight of when the question of remedial measures comes to be considered. If clannishness, patriotism, persistence in the habits and ideas to which one has been brought up, frugality, the desire to acquire money in order to lay it out at home, and a settled determination to lay one's bones on native soil, can be characterized as crimes or objectionable traits, then many are the Englishmen, Scotchmen, Irishmen, and Americans, who cannot afford to throw stones at the "heathen Chinee."

First, as regards the character of vagrancy ascribed to the Chinese immigrants as a class. This is to a certain extent merited, and it is a difficulty which, for some time to come at any rate, must beset the question more or less, seeing that it is of necessity chiefly the poor and wretched, who, finding existence at home impossible or intolerable, seek to better themselves by going abroad. But it is by no means the fact that it is solely the scum of the Chinese population who emigrate. It depends much upon the part of country from which they may hail. The chief, indeed the only, provinces whose populations have thus far shown a tendency to overflow seaward, are those of Canton, Fukien, and Chekeang, and the principal points of embarkation are (commencing from the west and going northward and eastward) Haenan, Canton and Macao, Swatow and Chaochow, Amoy, Chinchew, and, to a limited extent, Wenchow and Ningpo. The Haenan people make their way principally to the Straits of Malacca and that neighborhood, where they find ready and useful occupation as domestic servants. The province of Canton and some of its conterminous districts are drained through Canton and Macao, whence a vast number of mechanics and petty tradesmen yearly go southwards to the straits and Australia, and eastwards to California; and these ports have been the chief centres of the abominable traffic in coolies, which, fed as it has been by the refuse of a redundant population, has given to Chinese emigration the low character which is now universally attached to it. Swatow, Amoy, and Chinchew, although likewise outlets of late for coolies, were points of escape for the adventurous Chinaman long before the country was opened up by treaties, or coolie emigration was rendered practicable by the complicity of the foreigner; and it was from these districts principally that in those early times junks carried away the tradesmen, mechanics, agriculturists, fishermen, sailors, and hucksters who had already formed large and thriving communities in Java, Singapore, Malacca, Penang, and a hundred other places in the eastern seas, when English guns first woke up the echoes upon the Chinese coast. Thus tradition and association have alike helped to maintain the character of the emigrants who hailed from these particular districts, and to this day they constitute the most respectable type of the migrating class, and are perhaps as little open to the charge of being the scum of the population as any emigrants in the world. From this it will be seen that whilst the refuse of the Chinese population does to a great extent foul the stream of emigration going on from the Chinese shores, there is nevertheless in it a vast, if not preponderating, element of that class who form the backbone of trade, and have as much interest in leading a quiet, well-ordered life as any colonist who leaves the shores of Great Britain for the purpose of bettering his prospects.

The notable immorality ascribed to the Chinese immigrant comes next to be considered. That the Chinese are without the vices common to mankind, no one can for a moment pretend to maintain; but the question is, are they so specially and hopelessly addicted to the grosser forms of immorality as to render it inexpedient to encourage their introduction amongst Christian peoples? This query may safely be answered in the negative. Morality, although, properly speaking, a virtue hedged about with unmistakable limits, is practically and taking the world as it goes, at best but an elastic term. There is not a single nation, be it ever so Christian

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and civilized, in which immortality is not indulged in to a greater or less degree, and in which its practice is not tolerated by society so long as it is not obtruded too glaringly upon the public notice. Even religious and highly moral England has much to deprecate in this particular, and, if one may judge by what is to be seen every day in the streets, theatres, refreshment bars and rooms, places of entertainment, and other public resorts in the principal towns, the evil, instead of diminishing, seems to keep pace with the high-pressure rate of advance which marks every phase of life. But China is heathen, and, taking her with this qualification, it may be safely asserted that her people act more strictly up to their limited lights, and that their immoralities are fewer and far less obtruded upon the notice, than is the case in countries which have been vastly more privileged in the way of teaching, examples, and opportunities.

It has been too much the habit with some travellers, newspaper correspondents, and other hasty observers, who have ventured to write about China, to pander to the preconceived notions of their readers by mocking at the pretended mental and moral characteristics of the Chinese, and representing that, with all their loud talking about codes and maxims of renowned sages, they are, practically and without qualification, a dishonest, treacherous, cowardly, cruel, and degraded people. But it is as false as it is unmanly so to picture them. As a matter of fact, and making due allowance for the proportion of evil which must exist in every community, they regard the writings of their sages with all the reverence which we give to Bibles and liturgies in the West, and in the main carry out the excellent principles therein laid down most strictly in their social economy and personal relations. How otherwise could vast communities exist, as they do in China's thousand cities, person and property secure, peace, happiness, and plenty universal, education encouraged, local and general trade flourishing, business contracts sacred, poverty exceptional, and vice only to be found if sought out in its own special haunts? It is true, famine and flood periodically devastate huge tracts of country, rebellion decimates whole provinces from time to time, official rapacity and cruelty find their victims, alas! too frequently; cases of robbery, murder, infanticide, embezzlement, abduction, and other crimes are not uncommon; gambling-houses, brothels, and opium-dens thrive, and are winked at by the executive; and opium-smoking has its votaries in the most respectable family circles. But all these blots and blisters upon society are, in China as elsewhere, exceptions, not the rule; and they are apt to attract the observation of the superficial traveller or book-maker, while he shuts his eyes to, or purposely ignores, the background of the picture, where may be seen the Chinaman as he is at home, an intelligent, patient, hardworking, frugal, temperate, domestic, peace-loving, and law-abiding creature.

Thus much for the Chinese from a collective point of view. What this paper, however, has more directly to do with is the low character of that portion of the people which emigrate. Here circumstances and associations have to be taken into consideration, and the two facts already noticed — namely, that it is chiefly the poor and wretched who leave the country, and that no respectable females accompany the men — go far to explain how it comes to pass that they appear to be addicted to so many and such serious vices. This tendency, however, seems to have been more markedly observed in the case of those Chinese who have migrated to San Francisco, and to a certain extent also in the Australian communities. It certainly cannot be said to characterize those who have found their way into the Malayan archipelago, owing no doubt to the fact that, finding themselves among kindred dark-skinned races, they have in most cases married, settled down, and become serviceable members of society. Their successful introduction amongst such races would go far to prove, at any rate, that, given the necessary encouragement and protection, as well as reasonable facilities for attaching themselves to the soil, they are capable of becoming as contented and useful workers as they are in their own country.

As regards the insubordination and impatience of restraint ascribed to the Chinese immigrant, there is also something to be said both for and against. A frequent and well-founded occasion for complaint against the Chinese on this score has been their tendency to form secret associations, which, originally constituted in China for political purposes, are apt, when entered into abroad, to degenerate into conspiracies to resist unpopular government measures, or to determine disputes between clans or factions by resort to force. In fact, the instant and implacable severity with which any attempt to form a hoei or secret society in

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

China is met by the executive, however neglectful or venal otherwise, and the comparative immunity from interference which such associations have usually enjoyed elsewhere, except when brought into notoriety by some overt act of resistance to lawful authority, have had the effect of fostering the growth of the evil amongst Chinese communities abroad; and until the same precautions are taken by foreign governments to check the tendency in the bud, as is the practice in China, these societies must always form a hot-bed of intrigue and machination against the public weal. There seems to be but one remedy for the nuisance, and that is to prohibit by the severest penalties the formation by the Chinese of any clubs or associations whatever whose books and proceedings are not open to periodical supervision by the police authorities. Apart from this proneness to club together for defensive purposes, and which may be ascribed to governmental maladministration, rather than to any impatience of restraint inherent in the Chinese character, there is every evidence to show that the Chinaman, in his own country and in his normal condition, is willingly submissive to constituted authority, and gladly accepts its obligations and restraints, so long as his rights as a man and a citizen are not unreasonably entrenched upon. Indeed, instances may be pointed out, all over China, in which large villages, which in Europe would rank as towns, pass a peaceful and unobtrusive existence, free from the supervision of either civil or military officials, and governed solely by a system of "ancients" or elders, by whom every dispute or difficulty is easily adjusted.

Under this category may be ranged another characteristic noticeable in the Chinese immigrant, namely, his contempt for, and resistance to, municipal arrangements for the public good. This is a feature of social economy quite foreign to a Chinaman's ideas of what is necessary or expedient in the general interest. In China, if a charitable or wealthy individual expends his spare funds in a public work, or if the government, or a club, or an association of householders more immediately interested take upon themselves to erect a bridge, pave a roadway, widen a street, improve the drainage, and such like, the general public gratefully accepts the boon, and avail itself of the advantages afforded. But, failing the occurrence of any such fortunate contingency, the Chinaman is content to take matters as he finds them, and never dreams of burdening himself or his neighbors with any obligations beyond what may be needful to keep body and soul together. Such a thing as an association for keeping streets clean and in repair, facilitating traffic, improving the drainage, securing general comfort and health, and otherwise promoting the public welfare, he is not accustomed to, and it is difficult to force upon his comprehension. No doubt he carries this prejudice with him into foreign lands, and thinks to live free of such superfluous luxuries, as he does in his own country. But the remedy of this weakness is a mere question of time and effort. It is not so very long since Western people were content to exist amidst surroundings fully as wretched, filthy, and obnoxious as anything now observable in Chinese cities; and the reformation which has since proved possible in their case gives reason to hope that the Chinese are not incapable of a similar regeneration, could similar inducements and opportunities be afforded them. A proof of what is practicable in this respect may at this moment be quoted in the Chinese quarter of the foreign settlement of Shanghai, where the arrangements for the public welfare, supported and aided to a great extent by the Chinese population, would do credit to many a European town.

Assuming the premises above set forth to be sound — namely, that the Chinese as a race are not hopelessly degraded nor insubordinate to reasonable restraint, that on the contrary they show every evidence, when in their own country, of being an industrious, intelligent, frugal, temperate, peace-loving, and orderly people, and that that portion of them which emigrate do not as a rule come from amongst the dregs of the population — the question very naturally presents itself, how it comes to pass that these people, when they go abroad, become metamorphozed into such vicious, obnoxious members of society as to be positively hurtful to any community amongst whom they settle. The reason is obvious to any one who has studied the Chinese in their own country, and is not inoculated by party or national prejudice. It is that the many commendable traits by which their character is marked have not been sufficiently understood or encouraged, whilst their bad points, developed unfortunately by adventitious and unfavorable circumstances, have not been dealt with in the manner best calculated to work an effectual remedy. Misappreciation and mismanagement have in fact been to a great extent, if not altogether, the true

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

source of all our troubles with Chinese immigrants. And how can it be expected to be otherwise, when a government undertakes suddenly to bring within the scope of its legislative enactments tens and hundreds of thousands of an entirely alien race, without having them in any way represented in the executive, or without taking the precaution to see that some one member of the ruling power, at any rate, is familiar with the language, customs, and habits of thought of the people governed? A move in this direction has fortunately been made of late in Hongkong and Singapore, and with on the whole favorable results, considering the partial nature of the measures adopted. But until this reform was introduced, and as is even now the case in Australia, the West Indian islands and the United States, it may safely be affirmed that there was no one in official circles who comprehended one word of the spoken or written Chinese language, and that the members of the government one and all were utterly ignorant of the peculiarities of the people whom they were set to govern. Here at once would be a fruitful source of mutual misunderstandings between the governing and governed, leading inevitably to exaction and harsh treatment on the one side, and to shrinking, isolation, discontent, and despair on the other.

Happily there seems to be a remedy for this untoward condition of affairs, and one not beyond the reach of accomplishment, if only the proper course be taken to adopt and apply it. Much may be effected in the first place by efforts to improve the type and condition of the Chinese who emigrate, and by encouraging female emigration in the case of those countries where the Chinaman finds himself thrown among peoples of alien race to himself, as, for instance, in the British colonies and western American states. This result can only be attained by international arrangement with the Chinese government, and, more than one Western power being concerned, it would be a happy thing if concerted action could be brought to bear so as to secure unity of purpose in the general interest. The Chinese government, although always intolerant of the efflux of their people from their own dominions, have of late learned to accept the inevitable, and to show an interest in the welfare of their expatriated subjects, as has been evinced by the commission sent a few years ago to South America to inquire into the condition and treatment of their people there, and by their negotiations with more than one foreign government with a view to the legislation of emigration and its conduct upon humane and properly recognized principles. Nothing can have a more mischievous effect than the attempts which have been made both in America and Australia to legislate upon the subject independently of the Chinese government, and to place restrictions upon the influx of Chinese which are utterly opposed to treaty stipulations, and which foreign governments would certainly never tolerate in the case of their own subjects resorting to Chinese territory. Then, again, an entirely different system will need to be introduced in respect to the treatment of the Chinese who settle upon foreign shores. Every administration, within whose jurisdiction Chinese happen to place themselves, should lose no time in supplying itself, as a sine quâ non, with respectable interpreters, competent both to speak and write the language — such men, in fact, as those who, under the enlightened policy of the British Foreign Office, have done so much of late years to smooth away the asperities of our relations with China itself — men who, on the one hand, can, by their experience of the Chinese character, pilot the government into a discreet threading of its many intricacies, and on the other, by their familiarity with the language, court the trust and confidence of the people themselves.

Another most effectual method of conciliating the Chinese, and inducing content in their minds whilst under an alien rule, would be to hold out encouragements to individuals from amongst their own number to merit the distinction of taking a part, however limited, in the administration of their affairs. The Chinese are, as has been advanced at the commencement of this paper, an eccentric people. Their mental architecture is so entirely different from that of any other race as to be simply unique, and to attempt to lead them to a result by any other process of thought or argument than that to which they have been accustomed is to court almost certain failure. Hence the wisdom of humoring them to a certain extent; and this is nowhere more necessary than when dealing with them from an administrative point of view. The Dutch, with their usual acuteness, have detected this peculiarity, and met it in Java and their other Eastern possessions by appointing what are called "capitan Cheena" over certain sections of population, a species of small court magistrates, in fact, to whom are relegated all cases, civil and criminal, of a petty na-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ture arising amongst their several districts, and who are responsible to the higher courts for the mode in which these are dealt with. Important cases, as a matter of course, are treated by the Dutch authorities; and a system of appeal, it is presumed, exists, so as to obviate corruption or injustice. The system is found to work well, and the Chinese like it; and example might with advantage be taken from it to introduce something of the same co-ordinate jurisdiction in other foreign states resorted to by Chinese. Could ameliorations of the kind described be once introduced, no long time would elapse before the results would show themselves in the increased attraction to foreign shores and happy settlement there of a people who, if properly understood and dealt with, are certainly capable of proving the most tractable and useful colonists in the world.

But, it may be argued, it does not suffice merely to establish the fact that the Chinaman is capable of becoming a useful colonist if properly understood and discreetly dealt with. There remains yet the difficulty of reconciling the white man to the damaging competition in the labor market to which he is subjected by the presence of the Chinaman, be he ever so quiet, good, and useful. The experience of all modern colonization goes to prove that the white working man cannot and will not tolerate the having to measure himself against colored labor. Not only does it inevitably drive him out of the market, but its mere introduction amongst a community of white men seems to have the direct effect of paralyzing their energies and creating a lower scale of society with which the white working man can have no sympathy, be he ever so poor and starving; and the result is that he either takes his place above the black and employs him to work for him, or he sinks to something below and becomes demoralized and lost.

This may be all very true, but it is open to question whether, as a consequence, the white man possesses the right to exclude the colored man from sharing with him any portion of God's earth, or competing with him in the great struggle for life which is the lot of humanity. A curse of servitude seems indeed to have been placed by an inscrutable Providence upon the colored races, and however philanthropists may claim that the colored man is by nature the equal of the white man, yet there can be no doubt that the time is still far distant when the colored man can fit himself for the equality political and social which theoretically should be his. But the white man may well be content to assert the ascendency which a more advanced state of civilization and intelligence has secured him, and to take the lead politically of his darker brother. There can be no justice in his attempting to appropriate likewise the loaves and fishes that should be common to all, or to grudge to the colored man the fruits of labor earned by the sweat of his own brow. If the interests of the two races clash, or harmony of sentiment and action be found difficult, it is for the government of the country concerned to meet the case by judicious legislation, which shall insure to every class the enjoyment of its reasonable and legitimate rights. For the masses to interfere, and to say, "This or that shall not be so long as it does not suit us," is to throw contempt on all government, and sooner or later to bring about a condition of anarchy dangerous alike to all. The latest accounts from San Francisco report that vast bands of working men have associated themselves by oath to stop the immigration of the Chinese altogether, and, if needs be, to destroy any Pacific mail steamer that attempts to introduce them. But let the case be reversed, and let a Chinese mob attempt such a high-handed measure as against American or other foreigners arriving upon their native shore — an outrage they would be quite capable of if driven thereto in retaliation — and what would be the consequence? Treaty rights would be instantly quoted against the disturbers of the peace, and the "inevitable gunboat" would forthwith appear on the scene to maintain these rights by force of arms. The white man, in fact, considers himself entitled to bring China and her commercial resources under tribute to his untiring enterprise and greed of gain, and the least he can do is to tolerate the admission into his own lands of Chinese whose object in resorting thereto is not so much to acquire wealth as to find bread for their daily needs.

The question very naturally suggests itself, what is then to be the future of the Chinese in Australia and America? It is difficult to make a forecast on this head with any approach to precision in view of the ever-varying phases which mark the political atmosphere in these days. In the United States especially paroxysms of political fever so continually agitate individual states, and even at times the nation at large, that he would be a bold man who would presume to predict what will be the condition of the country or any section of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the population a hundred or even fifty years hence. One thing, however, it would seem allowable to assert without risk of mistake. The Chinaman is by tradition and education a monarchist, regarding autocracy as the only reasonable form of government; and he thrives best under its sway, so long as his just rights are respected. For the elective franchise he is entirely unfit, nor would he care for the privilege of exercising it if thrust upon him. After generations of association with white races and experience of the advantages of freedom of thought, the case might be different; but until his nature is materially modified, and the scope of his aims and wants becomes more extended, he progresses more safely led than leading. It follows that, whatever may be the political changes that may transpire in the countries to which Chinamen resort, their condition will be the happiest for themselves and the safest for the country concerned if they are dealt with as a subject people, and, as has already been remarked, as a community possessing abnormal characteristics, and therefore needing otherwise than ordinary treatment.

The preceding remarks represent the opinion of many who have been able to judge of the Chinese merely from observation of them in their own country, and apart from foreign associations and influences. But, as a matter of fact, little or no attention has been given to their condition and character as colonists abroad beyond the one-sided and sweeping condemnation of them which it has been the purpose of this paper to deprecate; and until full information upon these heads can be obtained, it may be to a certain extent unsafe to come to a definite conclusion as to the proper course to be pursued in dealing with the case. A very effective method of acquiring this information, and one that would have a most happy effect in conciliating and satisfying the Chinese immigrants themselves, would be to appoint a public commission of responsible persons, some of whom should speak and write the Chinese language, to visit all the places resorted to by Chinese, and to make it their duty to ascertain from the people themselves what grievances they have to complain of, what difficulties lie in the way of their harmonious incorporation with other colonists, and generally what remedial measures the circumstances of the case demand. Great Britain, as having an important interest in the results of such an inquiry, and as a power which is always found in the van where a policy of progress, enlightenment, and humanity is concerned, might very well take upon herself this duty, and there can be no doubt that she would have the grateful co-operation of the Chinese government and people in the undertaking, as well as the sympathy of other nations interested in the satisfactory solution of the problem.

W. H. MEDHURST.

From The Spectator.

THE RELATION OF MEMORY TO WILL.

AMID all the varied general interest of the great cause célèbre of our day — the Tichborne trial — perhaps the most distinct and important was the light thrown by it on people's different ideas of what it was possible to remember and to forget. When the trial was under general discussion, the contrast, or possibly the resemblance, between the powers of oblivion demanded for the claimant, and those which A and B were conscious of possessing, were matters of frequent mention, and most of us gained some knowledge of the different distance to which the past recedes in different lives. Hardly any knowledge can be more interesting or more fruitful, whether we consider its bearing on the moral atmosphere of the persons thus differently affected, or on the suggestion so expressively conveyed in the German name for memory, — Erinnerung (the inward faculty). Plutarch, in an attempt to vindicate the possible knowledge of the future, by showing the mysterious element in our knowledge of the past, calls memory "the sight of the things that are invisible, and the hearing of the things that are silent;" and a thinker, whose great metaphysical achievement was almost avowedly the obliteration from our mental inventory of all those powers which are supposed to deal with the invisible, recalls this description, in his confession that the analysis which reduced every other source of apparently ultimate knowledge to a trick of association was checked when we came to that within us which bore witness to a real past; and the concession that in this case we do know what we cannot prove, seems to us a pregnant one. How we know that these dim pictures on our walls — at once faint and indelible — are the work of another artist than imagination, must, J. S. Mill allows, be a question as vain as how we know that the things around us are real. But it is under its personal aspect that we would speak of memory to-day.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Apart from some such test as the Tichborne trial, we are curiously ignorant of the different aspects of the past to different minds. One would have expected, perhaps, that we should discern any idiosyncracy in this region clearly enough. A good memory may be avowed without vanity, and a bad one confessed without shame, while the exigencies of practical life are continually confuting or confirming the claim or the confession. But as for the test at all events, and we suspect as to the self-revelation, it belongs exclusively to the recent past, and concerns rather what we should call the materials for memory than memory. A man would say he had a bad memory if he forgot to call for an important letter at the post-office, but there is nothing in such a fact as this to throw any light on his relation to the past. While he is chafing at his forgetfulness, the words — even the insignificant words — of those who have been for more than a generation unseen among men, may be distinct in his inward ear; he may see the flower-beds whence he plucked nosegays with tiny fingers, and feel again the push of a door that taxed his childish strength, on the threshold of a house whose very bricks and mortar have long since been mingled with the dust. And on the other hand, the most unique and one of the longest lives we ever knew — the life richest in material of the knowledge that would have found an eager listener — was obscured by the profusion of detail in the near past; far off, moved figures known to the historian, but close at hand there were so many of the doings and arrangements of contemporaries, remembered with a really surprising accuracy, that a glimpse at the giants who moved on our sphere when the century was young was hardly discernible through the cobwebs. Of this memory for the distant, we may almost say, in the exaggeration permissible to any short utterance on such a subject, that it differs, with different persons, as a window by day differs from a window by night. To some persons, hardly anything within the room is so distinct as its prospect. Those far-off hills, that winding road, that distant indication of busy life attracts their eye from open book, or pressing letter, or picture of some far fairer scene within. To others, the past is much what the outlook becomes when the candles are lit. A hasty glance in that direction reveals nothing but the reflection of the observer on the window-pane, and if he opens the window, and makes an effort to look out, still nothing is visible but the dim outline of things close at hand. Yet it is likely enough that for all practical exigencies one of the last class may have a good memory, and one of the first a bad one.

In this region our very silence is misleading. We are silent about what we have forgotten. We are silent also about what we remember most profoundly. "Rien ne se ressemble comme le néant et la profondeur." We are apt to make mistakes both ways. Sometimes we take the silence of oblivion for the silence of profound and overpowering recollection, sometimes our mistake is in the opposite direction; and it is impossible to say which error is the commonest, for the one occurs when the deep mind judges the shallow, and the other when the shallow mind judges the deep. At all events, this misconception is one of the many causes which hide from us the meaning of memory in one mind and in another, and thus curtain off from us the moral background of every life.

We could be far more nearly just to each other, if we realized that with some persons the past years remain, and with others they depart. Take, for instance, the new light thus thrown on the sin of which, perhaps, we can least bear to believe ourselves guilty. Ingratitude, in the sense of an opportunity deliberately neglected to repay a great benefit, we should hope was a crime as rare as it is repulsive, but in the sense of a half-voluntary oblivion of small benefits, of the importance of which it is possible to take very different views, we do not think it is at all uncommon. Now look at it in the light of this intellectual difference between man and man. You are surprised that So-and-so shows no recollection of the kindly dealings which, having happened at a time when he was nobody, and you were somebody, surely deserved to be remembered. No intellectual explanation can exonerate one who has forgotten a kindness; still it makes a great difference, surely, if the ungrateful person has forgotten everything else that happened at the same time, wrongs to himself included. To him, the long-ago means something it is an effort to see. To you, it may mean something it is an effort not to see. You, perhaps, are imagining him to see these past actions of yours, and choose to ignore them, while it needs as great an effort on his part to recall them (to return to our first figure) as to look out from a lighted room. And his loss is not pure loss. His short memory may improve his relations with his fellow-men as often as it injures them; indeed, men and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

women being what they are, it is to be feared rather more often. A generous person dismisses the slight of yesterday to oblivion and recalls the kindnesses that enriched his far-off youth, whatever be the medium through which he habitually views the past. But we shall never know the difficulty in either action without some reference to this medium, and by the same principle, we cannot, without such a reference to it, rightly judge him who forgets what he ought to remember, or who remembers what he ought to forget.

Nevertheless, the "ought" remains. The very illustrations which bring home to us the difficulty of discarding or retaining the past, impress on us also its aspect as a part of duty, and while we shall best understand other lives by realizing its difficulty, it is a constant sense of its possibility which we need in order to mould our own. That any one ought to remember, indeed, and that recollection therefore is, to some extent, a matter of will, we admit every time we blame a child or a servant for forgetting a message, whatever difficulty we may find in carrying out our own view consistently. But can we say that the possibility of remembering at will involves the possibility of forgetting at will? Because we may make a successful effort to resist sleep, does it follow that we may make a successful effort to resist wakefulness? There is a natural fitness in effort to produce recollection, is there not also a natural fitness in effort to prevent oblivion? Does not the very desire to forget, imply that we are doomed vividly and permanently to remember? This question was, in fact, one of the great points of interest in the famous trial to which we have alluded. The possibility of obliterating a painful past from the mind was the plea put forward on the part of the person who had, it was asserted, voluntarily reduced certain parts of his life to a blank. "This possibility," said the chief justice, in that masterly summing-up which most of its readers must have wished they had made their exclusive source of knowledge of the history, "will not be confirmed by the experience of most people." How many, indeed, must have wondered that any other suggestion had not been made in preference to one that defied all their most vivid experience, — that any one should forget a part of his youth because it was painful. You might as well suggest that a speech had been unheard by him because of the loud voice of the speaker. And what is surprising is that, however ardently we may wish that such and such things had not been, it is wonderfully difficult even to desire that they should be forgotten. Whilst the past seems a part of oneself, that clinging to life which belongs to our whole being makes itself manifest in the recoil from oblivion, even with regard to what we would so gladly have avoided altogether. Oblivion is near enough; we approach that time, to borrow the fine, though rather confused, image of Locke, when our memory is to resemble the tombs to which we are hastening, in which, though the marble and brass remain, "yet the inscriptions are effaced, and the imagery withers away." We will not go half-way to meet the chill shadow; even pain is less an object of dread than the loss of something that has become a part of our intellectual being.

It is true, there is in the effort to forget, something that seems a sort of intellectual suicide. Nevertheless, there is a sense in which forgetting, we believe, is as much of a duty as remembering. There is such a mental attitude, however difficult it be to describe, and though it is impossible to give it a single name, as turning our back on the past, or on part of the past. Duty has no more despotic claim on any part of our being than on that faculty which surrenders its possessions to oblivion. Doubtless it is impossible to put into words the kind of effort a man makes when he wills to do something which will, apparently, has no tendency to achieve. Or rather, perhaps, the effort to move the will is a thing indescribable in words. How can I make myself cease to wish what I do wish? It must be possible, for it is sometimes the demand of conscience. The past must remain, but we may open the door to something that hides it. The well-known and often repeated condemnation of the Bourbons, — that they had learnt nothing and forgotten nothing, commemorates the general impression, which we believe to be a profoundly true one, that a man must forget in order to remember. There are some things in the history of every man which he must cease to contemplate, in order to see anything else. We remember hearing the biography of one eminent lawyer by another criticised by a third as rendered nugatory by the constant reminder, "I have been very much ill-used by him." The biographer needed to forget one fact about his hero, in order to state clearly anything else about him. The necessity

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

is seen most clearly in the lives of the great, but it is common to them and their humblest fellow-men.

We believe that hardly anything would do more to open springs of sympathy, and close those of bitterness, than the recognition of our responsibility for what we remember. That it should cease to be true that

> Each day brings its petty dust,
> Our soon-choked hearts to fill,
> And we forget because we must,
> And not because we will,

this, we believe, would bring about such a transformation of the moral nature as would resemble, or rather as would supply, new motives for all strenuous action, new dissuasion from all useless thought. It would be something like choosing from out the whole circle of our acquaintance the wisest and best to be our daily companions, and so occupying our attention with their large and fruitful interests, that all that was small, or futile, or bitter should, under this beneficent encroachment, wither away of itself.

From The Spectator.

GARDEN-PARTIES.

CAN it be possible that all writers of poetry and fiction are leagued together to deceive mankind in the matter of garden-parties? The idea of such a conspiracy must be a painful one, but the most unsuspicious of men may well ask himself what other theory will fit the facts. Our poets and novelists are alike fond of introducing us to garden-parties, and invariably lavish their prettiest phrases on such descriptions. This might be proved, if any proof were needed, by a multitude of quotations, but one or two will be enough. Every one will remember how George Eliot tells us of a festival where the guests, > descending at the garden gate,

> Streamed, with their feathers, velvet, and brocade,
> Through the pleached alleys;

and how she gives us a charming glimpse of them later;

> A joyous hum is heard the gardens round;
> Soon there is Spanish dancing, and the sound
> Of minstrel's song, and autumn fruits are pluckt.

Or we may take, as even more to the purpose, a few lines from Mr. Morris, who excels in painting such sweet summer pictures. This is what he says of a garden-party, in the "hot, bright days" towards the end of June: —

> On such a day
> These folk among the trellised roses lay.
> . . . . . .
> Nor did the garden lack for younger folk,
> Who cared no more for burning summer's yoke
> Than the sweet breezes of the April-tide;
> But through the thick trees wandered far and wide
> From sun to shade, and shade to sun again.
> . . . . . .
> Both youths and maidens; and beneath their feet
> The grass seemed greener, and the flowers more sweet
> Unto the elders as they stood around.

We do not offer this as a complete description of a garden-party, but it is a delightful sketch, in which no essential point is omitted. We have been obliged to cut out a few references to customs which are somewhat out of fashion. The elders have perhaps grown wiser since those days, and they do not usually lie about on the grass while the young people take their gentle exercise. And certainly they do not employ these leisure moments in crowning themselves with flowers. Many of them are quite as fond of telling stories now as then, but the practice does not, as a rule, attract the "younger folk" from distant corners of the garden. Still, allowing for these little differences, the picture, as far as it goes, is charming. Details may be wanting, but we have here all that is absolutely necessary, — garden and shrubberies, summer-time and flowers, chaperons and young people. Perhaps with us the garden-party season begins rather late for "trellised roses," and the words must be taken to represent ribbon borders of geraniums and calceolarias. But poetry is apt to require a little adaptation, to make it fit the facts of every-day life, and the rest is accurate enough. We have the maidens, — the daughters of the squire, the lawyer, the doctor, and the neighboring clergy; and the youths, — the few eligible young men who live within reach, or can be coaxed from town for the day, eked out with a sprinkling of tall schoolboys, and two or three officers from the nearest garrison. And they are certain to wander together as far and as wide as the limits of the garden permit, having nothing else to do. But is it quite like one of Mr. Morris's poems, after all? And is going to a garden-party really the most perfect way of spending a summer afternoon?

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

We begin to doubt when we remember many summer afternoons which we have spent indoors, even, it may be, with feet on the fender, for it must be confessed that our climate is not to be trusted. There is a touch of shy caprice about the seasons, something of March and April underlying our summer weather. A "wet, bird-haunted English lawn" has a loveliness of its own, but on a chilly August day it is not exactly the spot where one would choose to linger, even though a brass band from the county town should do its best to make up for the autumnal silence of the birds by playing a set of quadrilles. And our doubts increase if we leave the poets altogether, and attempt a sketch in more appropriate prose. We can easily make a study from the life, for garden parties do not seem likely to go out of fashion. In spite of wind and rain, they show themselves in our grounds year after year, like shrubs that put forth blighted leaves and blossoms, but will not die. Garden-parties are flowers which will not flourish in our chilly air, and — since doubt, once admitted, spreads ever faster — we may question whether they would be worth very much if they did. They do not harmonize well with the traditions of old-fashioned country-houses and English hospitality. There is something hollow and pretentious about them. A man might be dull, and his entertainment poor, yet you felt that he had done what he could when he welcomed you to his home. But there is something not quite so cordial about the hospitality which stops to shut the house-door before unfastening the garden-gate. It is true that the welcome, such as it is, is widely diffused. People do not send out invitations to dinner without considering a little how their friends will suit each other, but they deal in a more haphazard fashion with the guests who are to stay out-of-doors, and be refreshed with tea and thin bread-and-butter. There is plenty of room, and "The more the merrier" is a proverb of hopeful sound, so why should any one be excluded? Unluckily there is nothing to be done with these miscellaneous crowds when they arrive. The host and hostess can only walk about in smiling helplessness, devoutly hoping that all will go well, and that the pleasant people will come together and enjoy themselves. They are secretly aware that they have invited a great many who are not particularly pleasant. If the bores would but fasten on each other, there might not be much harm done; but of course, being bores, they do nothing of the kind, and even the pleasant people seem less pleasant than usual. There is nothing to do but to talk, which would be very well indeed, if it were not impossible to talk while standing on a lawn in the midst of a continually shifting crowd. Every one knows this who has made the attempt. Every sentence is broken by greetings from fresh arrivals, every body is anxious to make a remark about the weather, and to ask whether you have seen everybody else; the people you like best are going as you come or coming as you go, and the time slips away in a succession of glimpses of faces, and tantalizing snatches of conversation.

Yet this is a garden-party under comparatively favorable circumstances. Who does not know what it is when circumstances are unfavorable? There have been three or four wet days in succession, and the morning comes with threatening clouds. Still it does not actually rain, and some one who is weather-wise says the glass is going up, and even if there should be a shower, it will be nothing of any importance. There is one, of course, just to give a final touch of wetness to the grass; but after that it clears up more decidedly, and at the appointed time you start, hoping for the best. You are not one of those fortunate but unsympathetic people who do not care about the color of their weather, and the dull, grey sky oppresses you with a guilty sense of melancholy. As you drive up to the house, however, you remark on the pleasant animation of the scene, sorely as it needs a gleam of sunshine; and you hasten to join the groups that come and go, with a certain briskness of movement, along the paths and underneath the trees. You understand it better a few minutes later, when you have ascertained that the garden is bleak and exposed, and that the wind (which is decidedly getting up) is either north or east, or that delightful mixture of the two which has found a poet of its own. There is lawn-tennis, of course, but the greatest happiness of the greatest number was never more deliberately ignored than when lawn-tennis was introduced at garden-parties. For every four who play, there are forty who must stand out, either because they cannot play, or because there is no room for them. It is not very amusing to look on, especially when an old lady at your elbow wants the game explained to her, but cannot get rid of the impression that it is very like battledore and shuttlecock, and that they might keep the ball up

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

better, if they tried. It is only fair, however, to say that the players are not really enjoying themselves either. They are playing badly, and they know it. The men want to take off their coats, and the girls are evidently hampered by their unbusiness-like dresses, and afraid of slipping on the wet grass. The closely-shaven lawn is unpleasantly like a damp sponge, and the forty who are standing on it, and getting very chilly, feel it a distinct aggravation of their misery that the four who are actively exerting themselves should be very much too hot. Presently the necessity for exercise sends the lookers-on to wander once more, perhaps to find their way into the kitchen-garden. But they will not stay there long, for cabbages are hideously depressing on a dreary day, and a time comes when every possibility of amusement is exhausted. It is terrible to realize this, and to know that the carriages have been sent to the village a mile and a half away, and that yours will not come for another hour or more. Then it is that you feel that you are certainly catching cold, and that you hate your shivering fellow-creatures, though you hate those most who shiver least. You do not wonder that under certain circumstances people take to drinking. You begin to think that they are far from inexcusable, if the circumstances are at all like yours. You would take to it yourself, only, fortunately for your reputation and your future career, you can find nothing to drink but claret-cup with gnats in it, and there is not much to be got out of that except the gnats. So you resign yourself to your fate, and gloomily resolve that you will go to no more garden-parties, unless, indeed, one should be given in the grounds of the Palace of Truth. It would be worth while to go to that; for there would never be another.

Some such experience as this is only too common in the months of August and September, and yet there are people who cherish a dream, made up of poetry such as we quoted, and of memories of sunshine in sweet, old-fashioned gardens. To such we can only say, — If you care for your beautiful vision, deal tenderly with it. Call it up by the fireside on winter evenings, when the ground is like iron with the blackest of frosts, and the bleak wind tyrannizes over leafless trees. But think of it as little as may be when the long days come round once more, and never, if you prize it, take it with you to one of the garden-parties of the present day.

From The Spectator.

INVALIDS.

MISS MARTINEAU'S low estimate of her "Life in the Sick-room" strikes us as a curious (though in this case quite explicable) example of the inability of authors to judge the relative value of their own productions. It is the one of her writings we should place highest. The fresh, pure sense of nature's homely grace, expressed as it is in so many pictures which owe their charm wholly to the painter, or at least in the originals of which a common eye would find no attraction; combined with an appreciation, which is indeed seldom separated from this taste for nature, of the pathos of ordinary human life, with its undistinguished joys and sorrows, give the book a refreshing influence which it is curious to find in any volume with such a title. It is, indeed, an eminently healthy book. After saying this, we need hardly add that we cannot accept it as a picture of average life in the sick-room. Though full of shrewd and thoughtful observation, or perhaps because of this wealth, it fails to represent the usual experience of the invalid who, > gazing round this little room,

> Must whisper, "This shall be thy doom.
> Here must thou struggle, here alone
> Repress tired nature's rising moan."

Miss Martineau's experience was, indeed, modified by too many exceptional influences to allow her to feel this trial as it weighs on hundreds and thousands, and perhaps hardly any one who feels it could describe it. However, she was far too clever a woman to write on any subject she understood without giving many sensible hints about it, and although other parts of the book seem to us more valuable, these suggestions, based on experience, and bearing on one of the most difficult problems of life, form no despicable portion of this particular invalid's legacy to her kind.

It would be a very valuable book which should teach the sick to understand the healthy, and the healthy to understand the sick. No two classes so urgently need this mutual understanding, and perhaps no two classes find it equally difficult. It is very desirable that the rich should be just to the poor, and the poor to the rich, but it is a great alleviation of mutual misunderstanding in this case that the rich and the poor live apart. The sick and the well, on the other hand, are separated not by a dividing line crossing society, but by

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

a thousand small centres of divergence sprinkled all over it. This difficulty divides families and separates friends; it introduces sources of hopeless misapprehension between those who have been intimate from childhood, and who are still, and must continue, in direct outward contact. Moreover, it is not only more necessary for sick and well to understand each other than for rich and poor, it is also more difficult. How misleading are the external suggestions of illness! Who can approach some one lying on a couch, in an atmosphere of stillness and careful order, and not find his imagination filled with the idea of repose? And yet nothing is so unlike any sensation of lifelong illness as repose is. Hurry, and overdriven weariness, and distracting annoyances, and all the disasters of an overbusy life, give one far more insight into the condition of an invalid than that which is suggested to us by everything about him. We cannot always remember this paradox, but it does not cease to be true when we forget it.

The great hindrance to an understanding of lifelong illness is that every one knows a little of illness, and most people fancy that transitory experience enables them to judge of a permanent condition. No mistake is more natural, but we believe none to be more entire. We can judge about as well of the hardships of poverty from remembering some Alpine journey in which dinner was not to be had when it was much wanted, as we can, by recalling some attack of sharp fever, or the confinement of a sprained ankle, imagine what it is to exchange the interests, pains, and pleasures of this busy world for those of the sick-room. There are two main reasons for this misleading effect of what is transitory. The most important, perhaps, is our inability to represent to ourselves adequately the effect of difference of degree. We are apt to reason about cause and effect as if we could by multiplying a small result arrive at a large result. And yet the every-day lessons of nature are full of warnings against this kind of reasoning. Imagine a logical thinker for the first time learning that a certain degree of cold made water solid; any attempt on his part, short of success, to verify the statement would make it seem more improbable. "It is true," he might say, "we cannot get the thermometer quite so low as what you call the freezing-point, but you see we have come very near it, without detecting the slightest tendency to this startling change from fluid to solid." The laws of chemistry are a standing protest against this kind of reasoning, and it would be well for every logician to be forced to study them. People are constantly arguing about moral questions in the style of our supposed disbeliever in ice, and we believe nobody can quite shake off the influence of this fallacy in judging of illness. It is wonderfully difficult to realize that the effect of some condition may be different, according as it is permanent or transitory, not only in degree, but in kind. Yet it is undeniable. A short taste of some privations might prove a positive enjoyment; a day of painless blindness, for instance, might prove to a busy worker a delightful rest. Such a person would, after such an experience, be further from knowing what it is to be blind always, than one who had never been blind at all. A short trial of illness, therefore, or indeed of any misfortune, is not only an imperfect means of forming any judgment as to its permanent effect, it is very often the means of forming a wrong judgment. It resembles, in this respect, a slight knowledge of a foreign language. A foreigner, speaking English, once said of Beethoven, whom he had personally known, — "He was very brutal." The information thus conveyed to an English ear by a veracious and well-informed witness was as correct as much opinion that is founded on a short experience. But in the case of illness, we fear, the reality is "brutal" in English, and not in French.

But in the second place, it is very important, and not very easy, to remember that the actual circumstances of anything permanent are altogether different from the circumstances of anything transitory. There would be abundant sympathy for the ills of life, if they would last only a short time. Many invalids will say that they do not want sympathy, but this is hardly ever entirely true, and it is never true that they do not want what sympathy brings. Eager and devoted attention may sometimes actually lessen suffering, and if this is often not the case, it is undeniable that an atmosphere of tender, absorbing anxiety does make bearable all but the worst and rarest physical ills. Many who can recall some short attack of dangerous illness, preceded and followed by health, will say that no memory is more precious to them. When death and estrangement have done their work, the recollection of hours of feverish pain, in which the patient's acceptance of food or drink caused more gratitude than all the beneficence of his subsequent career, shines through the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

vista of cold, loveless years with a radiance that is only partly delusive. That experience did really belong to the struggle between life and death, but it is utterly unlike the experience of the very same physical condition when death and life have alike receded, and that awful, potent, all-healing fear of separation is as remote as the hope and stir that belong to the ordinary course of things in the world. Is it no trial to watch relaxed devotion, and feel it the result simply of the heaviness of the misfortune which first called forth devotion? Let no one plead in answer that the sufferer gets used to pain. His nearest and dearest get used to the thought of his suffering — it is a law of nature, to which they can but submit — but never let us suppose that the pain of another grows less because we think less about it. It is possible to get used to privation, and to some kinds of minor discomfort. Any one who says it is possible to get used to pain has forgotten what pain is.

It is wonderfully easy to forget pain. We have often thought there was a sort of witness to immortality in the strange fact that while emotion remembered, is, to some extent, emotion experienced, sensation is never really remembered at all. Whatever belongs to the body seems to bear the stamp of mortality, — it passes at once into the region of oblivion when we are delivered from its pressure. How different is the relation of memory to the maladies of the soul! Place the unkindness of long years ago side by side in your recollection with the toothache of last week, and you feel at once you are comparing a living thing and a dead thing. The unkindness, whether remembered by him who felt or inflicted it, is a living reality, potent to reopen and envenom the wound it had made. The toothache is gone, as if it had never been. To this fact, we are convinced, must be traced the common assumption that any degree of bodily suffering would be chosen rather than severe pain of mind. What people mean in saying this is, no doubt, that they would rather remember physical than mental pain, and of course a short experience of the pain which leaves no trace is to be preferred to an equally short experience of the pain which leaves a profound trace. But we are considering the case of one who knows that this fierce companion will not quit his side till the clay which gives it its power is laid in the grave, — and no sufferer, we think, is to be set by his side. The deadliest mental anguish allows some respite, when the body claims its due; an undying grief does not prevent faint gleams of pleasure when sleep comes on after fatigue, or hunger and thirst are relieved. But there is no converse to the picture. An unintermittent pain of body, when very severe, leaves room for nothing but itself.

The effort at understanding a state very different from their own, like every other effort, cannot be urged on the sick as it can on the sound. Yet we are far from thinking that it ought not to be urged on the sick at all. Lifelong illness would be, we are certain, more tolerable, if the invalid could realize the difficulties it imposes on the surrounders. Doubtless there is pain in the recognition, and a sort of pain to which there is nothing parallel in the corresponding effort on the part of the sound. But it would save far more pain than it inflicts, in all circumstances, to recognize the cost at which every one puts himself in the place of another. Those who are bustling about in the world must take their neighbors as they find them. They at any moment can change their atmosphere, and they do not carry about a moral thermometer, to see whether it is exactly suited to their taste and temperament, or if they do, they are taught their mistake. The invalid, on the other hand, has a right to demand that you should bring no jarring ideas to an atmosphere he cannot change at will; but he seldom sees that this, like every other peculiar demand, must release some form of energy to compensate for that which it absorbs. The principle of the conservation of force is the greatest help to mutual toleration that the intellectual world can supply, and translated into the language of common life, this scientific expression means no more than the homely adage that you cannot eat your cake and have it. We are always experiencing the truth of this saying, and always forgetting it. It is a constant temptation to believe that any one who behaved rightly would be able to spend great moral energy in one direction, without having less to spend in another. Certainly a man's moral energy is not limited in the way that his purse is. Practically, however, it is limited. Every exceptional claim implies some surrender. The invalid whose nerves must be sheltered, who must have intercourse adjusted to suit him, cannot be looked up to as a source of influence. He must not expect to be at once deferred to as a capable person and sheltered as a weak one.

But one of the great difficulties of the sick-room is the absence of those circum-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

stances which help self-appreciation. Most people overrate themselves in certain directions, but in the jostling of the world, most of us are taught our place. The atmosphere of the sick-room, on the other hand, quite shuts out the possibility of the small checks which make us feel that we have thought too much of ourselves. It is quite evident that Miss Martineau suffered in this way, though perhaps her deafness had as much to do with the result as her ill-health. At any rate, she is a memorable example of the disadvantages of being cut off from the discipline which teaches modesty. No doubt a great deal of the deference which fed her vanity was both deserved and sincere, but probably not quite all. And with ordinary invalids, there is and cannot but be much illusion as to the interest they inspire, for nothing is so like deference as well-bred compassion. But indeed it has been a truth insufficiently considered, although its causes are obvious, that all influences which isolate the soul tend to give it an undue idea of its own importance. It is hard — we believe almost impossible — for a solitary being to attain humility.

What, we may be asked, in conclusion, is our remedy for all these disadvantages? Or what is the use of dwelling on disadvantages for which there is no remedy? Is it not better to forget incurable ills, till they are forced on the mind by the pressure of experience?

No, emphatically no. The ordinary misfortunes of the world would lose much of their pain if they were distinctly recognized. And although it is true that we do not remove misunderstanding in accounting for it — that we cannot make it otherwise than painful — yet the difference between a pain which we trace to unkindness or selfishness and that which we trace to inevitable mistake, is as great as the difference between the pain of a sprained ankle when we try to stand on it, and when we let it rest on a cushion. The mind loses the bitterness of its sufferings in discerning their necessity, and is sometimes surprised in this acquiescence to find them almost disappear.

THE treaty between Japan and Corea of February 26, 1876, gave the Japanese the right to settle and trade on certain points of the Corean coasts. The first of these settlements was formed in Fusan, not far from Torai, and a correspondent thence to the Japanese journal Sakigake Shinbun says: —

It was very cold in January at Fusan: the thermometer stood between —2° and —22° F. (—19° and —30° C.). Our settlement numbers about a hundred houses, with about eight hundred Japanese inhabitants of both sexes. A school for teaching the Corean language was lately opened in the newly-built temple of Honganji. The populous city of Torai, which is about three ri (seven miles) from our settlement, is frequently infested by tigers, and on that account every door is closed early in the evening, after which no one ventures into the streets. An animal called "tonpi" by the Coreans, and which resembles a cat, attacks the tiger, which seems to fear it greatly. Noticing this, the Coreans, when they go into the hills, put on a cap of tonpi-skin. Very few of the lower class of Coreans sleep in beds; most of them have only a sheet of Corean paper for a couch, and keep up a fire beside them for warmth. The articles of import are chiefly muslin, silk, dyes, tin, copper, and various small wares. The Coreans, on the other hand, bring golden and other valuable manufactured goods for export. No customs are paid in trading.

THE Rev. W. G. Lawes, the well-known New Guinea traveller and missionary, has communicated to the Colonies an interesting account of a visit which he paid, towards the close of last year, to the previously unknown village of Kalo, on the western bank of the Uanekela (or Kemp-Welch) River, which empties into Hood Bay, New Guinea, not far from Kerefunu. Mr. Lawes says that the village is laid out in streets and squares, all of which are kept scrupulously clean, being swept every day by the women. He induced one of the chiefs to accompany him some three miles up the river, which he found takes a sharp curve a little way above Kalo, and becomes narrower, but after about a mile it widens out again into a fine broad stream. It is said to be navigable for a long distance, and, according to native accounts, runs to Manumanu, in Redscar Bay. On the Kalo side of the river groves of cocoanut trees abound, and betel-palms are also plentiful, while on the east bank numerous and extensive plantations of bananas and sugarcane were seen. Mr. Lawes states that the villages round and near Hood Bay are inhabited by a fine race of men, who are industrious and kindly-disposed, though at first shy and suspicious. They have a warlike character, but their hostility to each other would probably be soon removed if more constant intercourse were established among them. Cocoanuts are at present the only article of any commercial value which the natives possess, and it is probable that some day large quantities of copra will be exported from this part of New Guinea; no doubt, too, the country has other resources which are as yet undeveloped.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXIV. } No. 1791.—October 12, 1878. { From Beginning, Vol. CXXXIX.

CONTENTS.

I.	Henri Greville's Sketches of Russian Life. By W. R. S. Ralston,	Nineteenth Century,	67
II.	An Indiscretion in the Life of an Heiress. By Thomas Hardy. Conclusion,	New Quarterly Review,	76
III.	The Public Career and Personal Character of Francis Bacon. By James Rowley,	Fraser's Magazine,	91
IV.	Selling the Soul,	Contemporary Review,	104
V.	A Fetish City,	Blackwood's Magazine,	111
VI.	Sark, and its Caves,	Gentleman's Magazine,	116
VII.	The Habit of Reading,	Saturday Review,	124
VIII.	An American Zollverein,	Pall Mall Gazette,	127

POETRY.

The Spray of Seaweed, . . . 66
The Sea-Horse, ... 66
"So wandl' ich wieder den alten Weg," 66

Miscellany, ... 128

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For Eight Dollars, remitted directly to the Publishers, the Living Age will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of The Living Age is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of Littell & Gay.

Single Numbers of The Living Age, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

THE SPRAY OF SEAWEED.

NESTLED below the hollow bank,
In the rugged northern land,
Where the breakers leap and the wild winds sweep
Over the long grey sand;
Where the great tides' ceaseless ebb and flow
Leave curving lines of foam,
Amid rush and sedge, on a rocky ledge,
The fisherman made his home.

Forever through blaze of noonday,
Through midnight's solemn sleep,
Through morn's soft ray, and gloaming grey,
Thrilled the music of the deep;
And the foam-flakes flew on the breezes,
And rested, where sparse and thin,
The grasses shook in the sheltered nook,
As the flood-tide thundered in.

She stands in the lowly doorway,
The girl with the wild blue eyes,
The floating hair, and the startled air,
And the blush that deepens and flies,
Whenever a sudden footstep
Treads the path o'er the turfy down,
Or the bells peal out, or a laugh or a shout
Rings up from the little town.

She goes not with the red-cloaked girls
To the pier at evening tide,
Nor lingers to watch for the herring catch,
On the staithes at the harbor side;
Nor wanders among the sand-hills,
Where the sea-pinks creep and cling,
Nor to lanes where they know the violets blow,
And the merry bluebells ring.

But ever she keeps her vigil
By her father's lonely cot,
With a listening ear — what would it hear?
Fixed eyes, that strain for — what?
And always the frail, soft fingers
Toy with a strange love-token;
A seaweed spray from the rocky bay,
Its trails all dried and broken.

They talk sometimes in whispers,
Among the fisher-folk,
Of a stranger who came with a foreign name,
To win a heart he broke;
And one would tell he watched them,
On the sands-reach by the heath,
And saw him twist, round the curls he kissed,
The sea-bloom's coral wreath.

Fast fled that golden summer.
Oh, many a lonely year,
Through change and loss, through care and cross,
Has the pale girl wasted here!
For him who wooed, and won, and went,
Fair promise on his tongue;
Nor ever returned to the faith he spurned,
To the heart his falsehood wrung.

Yet still she keeps the seaweed,
That as his pledge he gave,
That happy night, in the soft rose light,
At the margin of the wave;
And ever she waits and watches,
For him who will never more
Trace the winding road, too often trode,
To the cottage on the shore.

And the few life leaves to love her,
No longer strive to win
The wildered brain from the sweet, dull pain,
It so long has wandered in;
Better they think to let her keep
Her poor dim dream of trust,
Till at last at rest, she bears on her breast,
The seaweed and the dust.

All The Year Round.

THE SEA-HORSE.

SEA-MINNOW this with pony's crest,
Just one of Amphitrite's toys,
With which her Nereids coax to rest
The little stormy Triton boys;

In truth, a tiny twisted thing
Which, cast upon that golden shore,
The dark-eyed lads to strangers bring
Where sang Parthenope of yore.

Device befitting sculptured page,
Quaintly with whiffs of song entwined,
Waif from the ebbing tide of age,
A hippocampus of the mind,

Which seeks from out the old and new,
A happy canto to compile,
Whose signs and words around may strew
The soothing of a quiet smile.

Now in the fish some hearts may claim
A symbol ever dear to us;
And some the pony pet, though lame,
A little mule of Pegasus.

Then haste, thou atom of a book,
To young and old with cheery call;
In town or train, or pastoral nook,
Thy message has a word to all.

A Century of Emblems.

"SO WANDL' ICH WIEDER DEN ALTEN WEG."

So again I am pacing the well-known streets,
The road I so oft have taken;
I come to the house where my darling dwelt,—
How blank it looks and forsaken!

The streets are too narrow, they shut me in!
The very stones of them scare me!
The houses fall on my head! I fly
As fast as my feet can bear me!

HEINE.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Nineteenth Century.

HENRI GREVILLE'S SKETCHES OF RUSSIAN LIFE.

A FEW years ago a lady offered a novel to a well-known French editor. He not only refused it, but spoke of it most slightingly. "Never, never," said he to her husband who offered him the manuscript, "will any newspaper or review accept any of your wife's writings: if she ever obtains the slightest success in Paris, come and tell me I was mistaken." So discouraged was she by her repeated failures that she was inclined to abandon Paris for St. Petersburg, a city which had more kindly received her literary efforts. Suddenly, as in so many other instances of long-unappreciated talent, a change came. Newspaper after newspaper opened wide its columns. In the year 1876 she published with full success no less than six (long before written) novels, and four more in 1877. At present her position is assured. What the above-mentioned editor now thinks of his outspoken condemnation has never been made public.

For a great many years the professorship of French in the University of St. Petersburg has been held by M. Jean Fleury, the author of a highly successful work on Rabelais.* His daughter, Mlle. Alice Fleury, was educated by him so well that at fifteen she was well acquainted with Latin, English, and Italian. It was when she had attained that age that she accompanied her father from Paris to St. Petersburg, where she spent many winters, generally passing the summers in Russian country houses. Having thus gained a perfect knowledge of Russian life, she began to publish her experiences, the French Journal de St. Pétersbourg opening its columns to a series of her novels between the years 1871 and 1876. Meantime she had married M. Durand, a professor of French at St. Petersburg, and had left that city for Paris, which long, in its literary capacity, treated her with the inhospitality described above. Now, however, all is changed, and her fame as a novelist is established under the pseudonym of "Henri Gréville." That name is taken from a hamlet in Normandy, the province from which the Fleurys originally came.*

In a few of Henri Gréville's novels the scene is laid in France. "Suzanne Normis" is the record of a father's affection for a daughter married to an unworthy husband. "Autour d'une Phare" is the story of a faithless wife's remorse. "La Maison de Maurèze" relates the story of a noble and pure-hearted wife who struggles onwards amid many sufferings and leaves them behind her at last. But these stories of French life have not the charm of novelty which renders so attractive those of the author's novels of which the scene is laid in Russia. In the latter all is new and strange. The reader is transported into an unknown land. The landscapes are unfamiliar, the peasants who till the fields or meet together before the village church are different from those of other lands, and even the superior beings who inhabit the seigneurial halls speak and think and conduct themselves in a manner which often offers a sharply defined contrast to that to which we are accustomed in better-known regions. And about these pictures of Russian life there is a singular charm. The splendor of the summer nights, when the glorious moon reveals the landscape revelling in the fresh coolness which has followed the intolerable blaze of the day; the silence of the winter, when the crackling frost goes about seeing that the rivers are well bridged, and the earth well wrapped in snow, and the trees adorned with their crystal gauds; the dull villages, with their dark wooden cottages drawn up in two lines separated by a space of mud in spring, of dust in summer, of snow in winter; the white-walled, green-domed church, and the seigneur's house with its surrounding household buildings and its adjoining wood — all these are brought as clearly before the reader's eyes as they could be in the Russian novels of which he is probably unable to read a line. Then the

* Rabelais et ses Œuvres (Didier).

* For many of these details the writer is indebted to an interesting and trustworthy article by M. Louis Leger in the Bibliothèque Universelle et Revue Suisse for last March.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

time-honored customs of the villagers; their half-savage life, but little altered from what it was in the olden days before Peter introduced his reforms, when Russia was warred upon by Lithuanians and Poles, or still earlier when the land lay prostrate beneath the Mongol yoke, or earlier still when it was divided among countless independent princes of Rurik's line, or even earlier in pre-historic times when the Slav immigrants first dotted the country with their village communities and shared the lands they tilled among the fathers of their families; and the easy-going, hospitable manners of the country house, where the superiors used to recline like gods upon their divans careless of the peasant kind who paid them worship and worked wearily for their pleasure; the constant comings and goings, the long drives over the crackling snow in winter, the cheery wanderings on fine summer's evenings beneath the "dreaming" trees, the frequent tea, the gossipings, the flirtations, and the unceremonious visitings — all these things are clearly pictured in "Henri Gréville's" books, and may be clearly realized by all who read them. Let us give an idea of some of the most characteristic.

The darkest picture which they contain is that offered by "L'Expiation de Savéli," a record of the fearful sufferings inflicted upon a village community by a tyrannical proprietor in the old days of serfdom. As a general rule the Russian nobles were easy landlords, who treated their serfs with no small kindness, being regarded by their vassals with a respect, even with an affection, similar to that which the Scotch Highlanders entertained for the chief of their clan. But here and there were brutal exceptions, like the Bagrianof of the tale, a domestic tyrant, who ill-used his trembling wife, and gave his mind to making his villagers miserable, sending their sons to Siberia or into the army, and behaving even worse towards their daughters. Long did the peasants suffer under his cruel wrath. At length they rose against him, and one night seized and bound him in his bedroom and prepared to slay him. But he spake them fair, sware by all that was holy that he would bear no malice, and promised them all manner of advantages if they would let him live. They yielded, trusting to his oaths. But he laughed all his pledges to scorn, and soon the soldiers were called in, and the ringleaders were pitilessly flogged and sent to Siberia. A little time passed, and his wrath fell upon Savéli, a young peasant, who was about to marry the fair village maiden Fédotia. In an ill-starred moment she went to the tyrant to ask for mercy. When she left his house her cheeks were white, her eyes were wild, and, rushing down to the river, she ended her insulted life beneath its waves. Then her betrothed swore vengeance. Again the brutal lord was seized in bed by his peasants, who this time faltered not, and his foul life ended beneath their strong blows. Then they set fire to the house and retired. And in the flames would have perished his wife and child had not Savéli come to their rescue. Years passed by: the tyrant dead, the village flourished, and among others Savéli grew rich, and his son was well educated, and became a handsome and cultured lad, who eventually won the heart of the late seigneur's daughter, the girl whom Savéli had rescued from the flames. Then Savéli felt himself obliged to tell his son the fearful story of her father's death, and how they two must be forever kept apart by the stream of blood which his hand had caused to flow. Till then he had known no remorse for the murder he had committed, but at last his sin had found him out, and, "prostrated before the holy pictures, his head smiting the floor, he passed long hours crying aloud for pardon to the God against whom he had sinned." Nor did peace revisit him till he lay on his deathbed, and the young girl whom he had rendered fatherless pronounced his pardon and made the sign of the cross over the forehead of her father's murderer. "Then a strange joy lighted up the features of the guilty man, and he died."

Lest any one should think the horrors in this story have been exaggerated beyond belief, let him turn to Mackenzie Wallace's "Russia," ii. 251, where he will find a reference to the case of a fiend in human

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

shape, a Madame Saltykóf, who was brought to justice in 1768. In the course of eleven years she had killed by inhuman tortures about a hundred of her serfs, including several young girls of eleven and twelve years of age. But let us turn from this dark realistic picture to the idyllic scenes portrayed in "Sonia," one of the most charming of Madame Durand's stories.

General Goréline was a good-natured Russian seigneur, who was kept in a state of chronic subjugation by an imperious and scheming wife. When in the country his principal delight was to smoke long-stemmed pipes, which he was always leaving about in all manner of out-of-the-way places. So there was attached to his service a little peasant maiden, ten or eleven years old, whose chief business it was to recover the stray pipes and bring them back to the forgetful general. A pretty child she was, bronzed of course by the sun, and but scantily clothed, for she was an orphan with none to care for her, but full of life, and running about deftly on feet which, though always bare, were not flat or distorted. The only person besides the general who ever gave her a kind word was the tutor, young Boris Grebof, who had been engaged by the general's wife to spend the summer in the country in order to superintend the education of her exceedingly spoilt child Eugene. With his pupil's sister, the fair and somewhat foolish Lydia, the young tutor of course fell in love, and she, full of romance, and being naturally thrown much into his company, fully returned his young affection. There could be but one termination to such a courtship. The good-natured old general was not disinclined to look favorably on Boris; but when that ingenuous youth asked the general's wife for permission to marry Lydia a terrible scene ensued, which ended in his being ordered to leave the house. He did so, of course, but before he went he asked the general to let him take away with him the little Sonia. For the poor child had been driven away from the house in a fit of passion by the generalsha. A pin left in the carpet of her mistress's room had entered one of Sonia's bare feet as she carried a pitcher of water, and the pain it caused made her forget herself so far as to drop her burden upon one of the generalsha's dresses. The poor child would have been compelled to beg from door to door for a livelihood had not Boris, for whom she had contracted a sort of canine attachment, taken her away with him and consigned her to the care of his mother, an excellent old lady who doated upon her only son. The generalsha strongly objected to this improvement in Sonia's prospects, and ordered her husband to refuse to let her go. But he, for perhaps the first time in his life, had the hardihood to refuse to listen to her imperious voice, and sent away his little pipe-finder with a kindly farewell. How happily then went the days of Sonia by when she found herself well clothed, well fed, well cared for in the quiet household of Boris's mother and her three old servants who had lived with her all her life! Into this quiet family circle she entered almost a little savage, ragged and wild and ignorant of all civilized life, astonished at the church services which she had scarcely ever been allowed to attend in her former home, wondering at finding herself no longer cold and famished and aching from cruel blows. It was long indeed before she could be induced to allow herself to be shod, but a word from Boris was enough to persuade her to submit. For his desires were a law to her. She followed him about with her eyes, and, when he left his home for Moscow, her heart was heavy within her as she stood amid the snows watching his sleigh disappearing into the distance. Three years elapsed, and Boris, whose love for Lydia Goréline had never lessened, though it was evidently fated to remain a dream, was recalled home by the news of his mother's illness. He came in time to hear her last words, to pay her the last sad rites, and after he had laid her in the village graveyard, escorted to her last resting-place by the sorrowing peasants to whom she had all her life been an untiring benefactress, he returned to Moscow, taking with him the young Sonia, in whom it was now difficult to recognize the little savage who had run about the Gorélines' domains ragged and barefoot. She had learned much in the interval, and now in

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Moscow she taught herself to read and write, working through the long evenings when Boris was absent, to the accompaniment of the monotonous ticking of the cuckoo clock on the wall, till sleep would render dim her weary eyes. At length Boris's relations with Lydia came to a crisis. Determining to marry an elderly general, she demanded back her letters from her faithful lover, an unexpected blow which reduced him to despair. Long he sat alone and heartbroken in his room, thinking of the past, of how he had been treated by her whom he had loved so long and so well. Then Sonia came to the rescue. Standing by his side in the darkening twilight, her arms hanging down straight beside her, her somewhat severe features wearing an air of tender reproach, she told him it was a sin thus to yield to grief, and solace entered into his heart as he listened. Two years later he was completely consoled. Good and steady work abroad had soothed his grief, and he could enjoy life once more. Meanwhile Sonia had grown into womanhood. And with her body her mind had developed, her natural intelligence stimulated by a well-chosen course of study. Scarcely could Boris, when he returned and saw her for the first time after his absence, believe that the graceful girl who stood before him could be the Sonia whom he had saved some seven years before from the sad fate which awaits a homeless orphan. Strange, very strange, did the past seem to him that night, as he gazed from his open window, and listened to the three thousand bells of Moscow proclaiming that Lent was past, and Easter had come, and light and joy were about to take the place of darkness and sorrow. Is it needful to say how the story ends? Methinks not.

As a companion sketch to the charming portrait of Sonia, may be taken that of Dosia, a young Russian girl whose unconventional behavior is long the despair of her aristocratic relatives, but who, under the care of a charming woman who understands how to treat this somewhat fitful being, developes into a heroine worthy to win the hearts of all who see her. The story has already gone into seven editions in France. Nor is it wonderful, for a more attractive figure than that of Dosia has seldom been put upon a novelist's canvas. Perhaps the best way of describing her will be to quote a few lines from the introduction to "The Fortunes of Nigel." The author of "Waverley," apologizing for the White Lady of Avenel, says to Captain Clutterbuck: "Could I have evoked an esprit follet, at the same time fantastic and interesting, capricious and kind; a sort of wildfire of the elements, bound by no fixed laws or motives of action; faithful and fond, yet teasing and uncertain ——" upon which the captain breaks in with: "If you will pardon the interruption, sir, I think you are describing a pretty woman." Of such a kind is Dosia Zaptine. Another noble woman is the heroine of "Les Epreuves de Raïssa." Raïssa is the daughter of an old couple, honorable but not aristocratic, who doat upon their only child. Suddenly their happiness is destroyed, their lives are before long shortened, by the horror which comes over them when they learn how she has been treated by a young aristocrat, an officer of the Guard. His friends endeavor to hush up the matter, but she and her father persist in crying for vengeance, and at last the matter comes to the knowledge of the emperor, who behaves somewhat as did our James the First in the case of Lord Dalgarno and the Lady Hermione. Count Gretsky is ordered to make Raïssa his wife, and is then sent to Siberia. Raïssa finds herself a countess, with a gorgeous palace awaiting her, and vassal and serf ready to obey her orders. But she will none of these things. Continuing to live as modestly as before, she constitutes herself the steward of her husband's property, and forwards him the money which is brought to her. He meanwhile lives in Siberia, black hatred towards his enforced wife devouring his heart. At length she goes down to one of his estates in the country, and finds herself the neighbor of his sister Helen Marsof. Of this sister-in-law, at first most unwilling to see her, she becomes the guardian angel. On one occasion she saves Helen's child when an attempt to poison him had been made by a villanous peasant woman of the name of Mavra Moroza. Soon afterwards she appears just in time to save both Helen and her child, against whom the peasantry had been excited by Mavra, who pretended that their mistress had poisoned their wells. And finally she is able to disperse a dark cloud of calumny which had long hung over Helen's head, due to the slanders of Mavra and her husband, who had murdered Helen's husband, and managed to direct suspicion against her. No wonder that Raïssa becomes the bosom friend of Helen, who does all she can to plead her cause with Count Gretsky. For in reality Raïssa is in love with the husband who hates her. Long does she strive in vain. But at length comes the news that

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Count Gretsky is ill in his Siberian exile. Raïssa loses no time in flying to the emperor to ask for leave to visit and to nurse him. Not only is her request granted, but she obtains his pardon too. And so she speeds away on her long journey eastward towards her husband, accompanied by his faithful old servant Fadei. She finds him alive but insensible, and she watches long and anxiously over his couch. Her tender care, her skilful nursing, saves him from sinking; but when he becomes conscious to whom he owes his life, nothing warmer than a feeling of obligation is stirred within his heart. He is coldly polite and deferential, but neither liking nor love can she obtain. One day, as they sit together, she takes from her finger her marriage-ring and gives it to him, saying that they had better be separated on their return to Europe, so that he may be a free man once more. And he is pleased, little thinking how passionate a love for him is burning within the heart of the wife who has done so much for him, and for whom he still feels so strong an aversion. But more time passes by. He learns from his companions all that has taken place during his illness, he gradually begins to awaken to a sense of Raïssa's merits, and a suspicion of her feelings towards him begins to dawn upon his mind. At length one day, as they sit together in their sleigh travelling westwards towards civilization, happiness, and home, there comes a sudden change in his feelings. "All the admiration he had concealed, all the tenderness he had turned into hatred, all the gratitude which he had forced into ingratitude, mounted to his lips like an overflowing stream; but he could not utter a word." Only he took the wedding-ring which Raïssa had given back to him, and once more placed it upon her finger.

It will have been observed that the author does not love tragic endings. We can read her stories without being depressed. She loves a clear and tranquil sunset, full of the promise of the morrow's brightness, better than such a lurid ending of the day as brings to a close the sad fortunes of Lucy Ashton. In this Henri Gréville differs from the Russian authors themselves, who are apt to write the most lugubrious stories. Even Ivan Tourguéneff, by far the greatest literary artist whom Russia has produced, even he who has lived so much abroad that he is sometimes styled a Zapadnik or Western, dwells with manifest fondness on the dark side of human life, and, in many of his stories, almost crushes the reader's spirits. Take, for instance, his wonderful tale called "Neschastnaya," or "The Unhappy One," in which a cruel step-father persecutes out of the world an unoffending step-daughter, feeling no remorse even when she dies, and he throws clods of earth into her grave "with the air of a man stoning an enemy." After reading this saddest of stories, the gloom of which is, from first to last, relieved by scarcely a gleam of light, you feel as if, like Henry the First, you never cared to smile again. There is one, however, of Henri Gréville's stories which is an exception to the general rule, for it is melancholy throughout. It records the sorrows of one those poor pilgrims through the world who never have a chance of faring well, who seem to be opposed by some such cruel fate as that which, to the eye of the ancient Greek, ever lowered over certain families destined to constant sorrow and ultimate extinction. Probably the story is an over-true one, and therefore it has been invested with a sadness which its fellows do not wear.

The Institute N. at St. Petersburg, intended for young ladies of noble birth, enjoyed a high reputation, patronized as it was by the imperial family, and attended by the daughters of many of the best families in Russia. Unfortunately it was exploited for her own benefit by the directress, a Madame Batourof, who had received the post as a mark of respect for her late husband, a general who had died of his wounds on the field of battle. In twenty-seven years she contrived, out of what in America would be called her stealings, to settle in life three daughters to whom she gave good dowries, and to enable her four sons in military service to live sumptuously. For all this the institutki, the young ladies who were ruled over by Madame Batourof, suffered greatly. They used to arrive as little girls, rosy and vigorous. Seven or eight years afterwards they were restored to their relatives — who, if they lived at a distance, had never seen them in the interval — thin, haggard, weak, the shadows of their former selves. Far worse, however, than Madame Batourof was Mademoiselle Grabinof, one of the teachers, a jealous, malicious, hateful creature, always striving to stand well with the pupils of influence and to crush beneath her feet those of less estate. One day when the young ladies were assembled in class, and the professor of history was detailing to their drowsy ears the reasons for the decline of the House of Austria, a rich contralto voice suddenly burst

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

into loud, clear song. General stupefaction occurred for a moment, and then the offender was discovered to be Ariadne Ranine, an orphan girl, poor, unprotected, fitted to be an object of scorn and hatred to Grabinofs. Summoned before the directress, and asked why she disturbed the class, she quietly replied that she could not help doing so; she felt that she must sing, or she would die, or at least choke. Whereupon she was ordered to sing again, and, as it turned out that she had a magnificent voice and great musical aptitude, it was resolved that she should be allowed to study seriously the art to which she was already devoted. For a time all went well. Her life became more tolerable to her, her studies soothed her, in the sacred music which she sang in the chapel she poured forth all her soul. It seemed for a while as if her evil destiny had forgotten her. But the Grabinof had not, and at last came an opportunity for poisoning the happiness of the orphan girl she hated. A grave scandal made itself heard in the establishment. Three of the pupils, in the silence of the night, met three young guardsmen in one of the deserted rooms, and supped with them off the pies and champagne which their admirers had brought. The story came round to the ears of the directress, who trembled for her post. It was necessary to punish some one, to make an example of some vile person. As to expelling the real culprits, the young princess Olga Orline and her aristocratic friends, such a course was not to be thought of; and so, at the instigation of the Grabinof, the directress solemnly expelled the innocent Ariadne, an unconscious scapegoat destined to suffer for others' sins. Fortunately for her, Ariadne had found a friend. An old lady who was acquainted with Madame Batourof, and who thus knew the story of Ariadne's ill-treatment, took her home to live with her. Finding for her a "phœnix" of singing-masters, she enabled her to carry on her studies, and in the course of time Ariadne appeared in public, under a feigned name, and achieved a thorough success. But the second time she appeared in the concert-room, just as she was about to sing, she heard a voice say, "Her real name is Ranine; she was expelled from the institute on account of an intrigue with a young man;" and for a moment she almost lost consciousness. Then by a great effort she drove away the recollection of the words which had stung her, and sang with even more fire and pathos than before. But her heart was almost broken. Returning home she found her kindly friend, the old lady who had protected her, prostrated by illness. A little later, and her friend's death left her alone in the world, with none to turn to for aid, and with thirty-two roubles in her purse. But another friend unexpectedly appeared. Olga Orline, the young princess for whose fault she had been punished at the institute, had always resolved to repay the obligation. In order to be able to aid her, she was obliged to tell the whole story of the midnight supper with the young guardsmen to her mother, who quickly pardoned her for the indiscretion she confessed, and determined to help the poor orphan who had suffered in her daughter's behalf. And so, after a while, Ariadne was installed in comfort in the house of the Orlines. With time her voice increased in power and compass, until at length a new success was achieved by her. At the opera one of the principal singers was suddenly taken ill. Ariadne's master compelled her to take the defaulter's place. She sang with full success, and was received by her hearers with the enthusiasm which a St. Petersburg audience has always at its command. But even then she was not destined to be happy. A few days later appeared an article in a journal, once more telling the old scandalous falsehood about her character. Overcome by the shock, she decided to sing no more at the opera. Then the princess Orline invited her to accompany her and her daughter to France for a while. She went, and the party was joined by a young Constantin Ladof, who had paid Ariadne much attention, and had indeed become the object around which her young affections had twined themselves. At last a chance of happiness seemed to glimmer before her from out of the darkness to which she was accustomed. But at Fécamp she learned that Ladof and Olga Orline were to be married. Not long afterwards her body was found at the base of one of the high chalk cliffs. She was buried in the Fécamp cemetery, and the princess Orline paid the gardener of the graveyard to look after her tomb, on which he places flowers during the summer season. But when the visitors have left, it remains as desolate as her whole life had been.

For descriptions of country life, and for a careful study of a lady who, without being aware of the fact, and without meaning to do wrong, renders miserable her niece and ward, the reader may be referred to the longest of our author's works, "Les Koumiassine," which occupies two

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

volumes. But its incidents are too numerous to allow of justice being done to it by so short an account of it as could be given here. Another interesting story of society is "La Princesse Oghérof," which tells how the slanderous tongue of Pauline Hopfer, a jealous German governess, separates two loving hearts. Marthe Milaguine, instead of marrying Michel Avérief, weds the Prince Oghérof, and the rejected lover seeks for solace in the Caucasus. There he is supposed to have died while attempting to save from her burning hut a Circassian woman, but in reality he escapes, and makes his way back to Russia. Meanwhile Prince Oghérof is drowned in an attempt to rescue from the waters of a frozen river the scandalmonger Pauline Hopfer; and at last all is cleared up, and the long-parted lovers are brought together again.

There still remain to be noticed a number of characteristic stories of Russian life which do not deal so exclusively with the loves of princes and princesses. With some account of them the present article may be brought to a close. They are grouped under the title of "Nouvelles Russes," and they contain in a small compass some of the most remarkable of the pictures which our author has drawn. Stepan Makarief is a Russian peasant, honest and pious and thoroughly dutiful to his old father, who chooses for him a wife whom he at once accepts. But the choice turns out to be a bad one. She often leaves him at home while she goes on pilgrimages to the neighboring churches, where she does not disdain the attentions paid her by the village youth. At length the old father dies, telling Stepan on his death-bed that his wife does not fear him enough, and that he ought to chastise her vigorously. Stepan, for once, does not obey his father, but when the advice is a second time given him by a respected female neighbor, he follows it, and when his spouse Irene returns home from her next gadding about, he receives her in a way which leaves its traces behind for several days. "This action," we learn, "raised Stepan high in the opinion of his fellows, and when he went to work next day the married men of the village received him with marked respect." His wife is congratulated by her female friends on the beating as a mark of her husband's returning love, and all goes well for a time. But at the end of the fourth year of wedded life, while Stepan is absent in Moscow on commercial business, his wife deserts him, going away with a travelling petty merchant. Stepan returns to his desolate home, which he continues to inhabit, aided in his household arrangements by a neighbor, a poor widow with two small children. One day, however, when he comes home at night from afield, he finds that his wife has returned. He orders her to leave him. She refuses to depart, saying that she has no one else to turn to, for the companion of her flight is dead, and her husband is bound to support her. Vainly does Stepan appeal to the head of the village. He is told that nothing can be done, for she is only claiming what is her legal right. Vainly on his return home does he beat his wife. She bears the blows, but will not release him from her hated presence. Next Sunday she dresses herself in her best, decks herself with beads and false pearls, and prepares to seek for admiration in church. But he tears the finery from her back and strews her ornaments upon the ground. Still she will not leave him. And so this terrible life goes on for a time, Stepan's house becoming for him a hell, from which he seeks refuge in the dram-shop. Finally in a quarrel, when she has provoked him more than he in his drunken state can endure, he takes his axe and frees himself forever from his burden. The head of the commune comes with others among the villagers, and they find the wife dead in a pool of blood, with the murderer crouching beneath the holy pictures. Stepan tells them what has taken place, how his faithless wife vexed him beyond all endurance, how she even struck him, her lord — a statement which sends a thrill through the assembly — and how he had at last avenged himself. "She was a wicked woman," he ends by saying; "I was not wrong in killing her. Still, if the commune orders me to Siberia, I will go. I ask for no favor." Then the feeble voice of the head of the commune is raised in reply, saying: "We are all sinful men: no one among us knows what he might do if temptation came in his way. Brother, thou hast taken away a life; but she was a wicked woman, as thou hast said. We are not agents of the law; we are thy brethren. Is it not so?" A murmur of assent arises from the crowd of peasants to whom he has turned. "Thou hast been unhappy," he continues; "is it for us to judge thee?" "No," replies the crowd; "let God forgive him!" And so no further notice is taken of the fatal deed. The body of the dead woman is prepared for the funeral, and on the next Sunday is interred in the village cemetery. Stepan

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

lives peacefully in his now quiet home. His neighbors respect him, no remorse troubles him. But his countenance wears a strange expression. Ever do his blue eyes gaze at those who look him in the face, with a steady regard which seems to say, "Knowest thou what I have done? And if thou dost know, dost thou condemn me?"

Thoroughly Russian is the tale entitled "Le Meunier." The miller in question is an old ruined noble, Mérikof by name, who, after the loss of almost all his property, retired to a small estate still remaining to him in the country, and there lived like a hermit, occupying himself with the business of a mill, and consoling himself with strong liquors. One of his neighbors is a Countess Marie, a handsome and charming woman, who is touched by the sad tale of Mérikof's life, and sets to work to draw him from his hermitage, and to render his existence brighter than it was before. In this she succeeds thoroughly, and Mérikof becomes attached to her with a kind of humble devotion. One day she expresses her horror of drink, and says that if she happened to see one of her friends under its influence, she would never be able to look at him again without aversion. Mérikof listens, and when he goes home he takes from a cupboard a bottle of spirits, empties it out of window, and makes a vow to drink no more. And he long keeps his vow. But once, during the absence of the countess from her estate, he consents to assist at the christening feast of the sacristan's child, a boy to whom he has stood godfather. And at such a feast in Russia it is hard for any one to be present without drinking much. That same day the countess unexpectedly returns home. The next morning, surprised at not receiving a visit from her "tame bear," she goes down to the mill with her children to ask for news of him. His old servant Stepanida says he is ill, and tries to prevent him from being disturbed. But the countess, grieved to hear of her old friend's illness, insists on seeing him, and makes her way into the room where he lies. He is sleeping heavily, his face flushed, his breathing stertorous. A strong smell of spirits pervades the room, but to this the countess pays no special attention, and goes away without perceiving that her old friend's sleep is a drunken slumber. But when two hours later Mérikof awakes, he knows not this. He imagines that she must have become aware of his condition, and that henceforward he will be an object of aversion to her eyes. Stepanida could have undeceived him, but his fury when he discovers that the countess has visited him is so great that she becomes frightened, and postpones what she has to say till the evening. To him, however, that evening never comes. Going down to his mill, he walks across a little wooden bridge which crosses the mill-stream, and throws himself into the swiftly running waters. The truth is never known, his death being universally attributed to an accident. The countess mourns for him as for a kinsman, and her children go every year, on the anniversary of his death, to lay on his grave chaplets of fresh flowers. Only his old servant, the faithful Stepanida, has her own ideas as to the cause of his death. She lives alone in a small cottage near the church, from which she can see the grave of her late master without moving from the window, by the light of which she sees to knit the socks which bring her in her daily bread.

One more story, this time of a more cheerful nature, and the present sketch may be brought to a close. It depicts a few scenes taken from that professorial life which Henri Gréville has had such excellent opportunities of studying. It is called "L'Examinateur."

Professor Maréguine was peacefully smoking his pipe one day on the verandah of his little country house, a modest home to which he delighted to betake himself when the summer vacation allowed him to leave hot and dusty Moscow. The professor was forty-two years old, and had never so much as dreamed of marriage. Absorbed in his work, he thought of little else while at Moscow. When the summer came he was perfectly happy in his little house amid the woods, to which he retired along with two old servants. Contented, but somewhat sad, he there spent his time without ever yielding to day-dreams about a possible wife or child. On the evening in question, however, while the professor calmly smoked his long pipe, he was attracted by the noise made by a number of village children who had collected around the well, the centre point of rustic gossip, and were amusing themselves by plaguing in a friendly manner a big dog which came to drink from the trough alongside. They hung round his neck, they pulled his ears, his tail, they kept him from the water he longed for. But he bore no malice. Only at last, uttering a warning bark, he plunged through their ranks, upsetting them on all sides, and thrust his hot muzzle into the cool water. Then sitting quietly down, with half-closed eyes, and tongue hanging

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

from his mouth, the drops of water streaming down on his white chest, he delivered himself up to the embraces and teasings of his young friends. All this the professor watched from the other side of a thick hedge, enjoying the sight, and finally dispersing the children by the gift of a coin capable of procuring them gingerbread. The sun sank lower. Maréguine found himself alone and disposed to melancholy. Presently he was conscious of the voices and laughter of a couple of village lovers; and he pensively went indoors. Over his tea he questioned one of his old servants about her experiences of married life, especially about her recollections of her children, listening long to her pleased gossiping. Then he went to bed, and all night long saw before his eyes the dog with its lolling tongue and the children with their bare feet and shocks of uncombed hair.

Some months later Maréguine happened to act as examiner of a number of young ladies who wished to qualify themselves as governesses. One of the candidates was rejected, and so great was her sorrow at being refused her diploma that Maréguine was greatly touched. She was a certain Annette Larionof, who had come with her mother from the government of Yaroslaf to obtain leave to practise as a teacher, having no other means of livelihood. So much did Maréguine sympathize with her distress that he promised to give her gratuitous instruction, thereby greatly delighting her and her old mother. For the mother and daughter were very poor, possessing only some seven hundred roubles a year, barely enough to furnish them with the necessaries of existence. Twice a week, then, they came to the professor's rooms, and with the greatest patience he attempted to instruct Annette. But it was time thrown away. She could not learn. One morning she came alone and said that her mother was ill. In the afternoon Maréguine took a droschky and went to visit her in the far-away abode from which Annette used to make her way to her lessons on foot. Madame Larionof was in bed, but still engaged in the knitting which she never seemed to abandon, and which it appeared enabled her to earn some twenty kopecks a day. That evening when Maréguine returned home he forwarded a hundred-rouble note anonymously to Madame Larionof, with a few lines in a feigned hand to say that it was sent in payment of an old debt by one who wished to remain unknown.

At length came the eve of the day on which Annette was to be once more examined. "What will these poor women do if she fails again?" thought Maréguine as he lay down to rest. For a long time he could not sleep, and when at last slumber came it brought with it strange dreams. He saw before him his little country house. Before it lay stretched the watch-dog. A swarm of children threw themselves upon it and played it all manner of tricks. Long it put up with them. Then becoming bored, up it jumped and trotted away out of sight, followed by the laughing little ones. Maréguine found himself alone and sad. Then on the verandah appeared a female form holding a child by the hand. And her face, he presently felt, was the face of Annette — and he woke with a start. Next day came Annette in the deepest grief to tell him she was again unsuccessful, and to entreat him to break the sad news to her mother. Suddenly at the sight of her utter despair his dream recurred vividly to his imagination. "Annette," he cried, "I am neither young nor handsome, but I think we might be happy together." And so the old bachelor became a married man, and Annette's mother spent the last years of her life in knitting socks for his five children. Maréguine is perfectly happy. The dog has died of old age, but it has a successor exactly like it.

Among the many points in favor of the stories of which an attempt has been made to give some idea, is their moral tone, one which enables them to be safely recommended for general reading. And, with the exception of the scene of crime in the opening of "Les Epreuves de Raïssa," there is nothing in them which can shock an English taste. The best proof that they have attained to a happy medium in dealing with passion is afforded by the fact that some of the clerical journals of France have objected to them as being too outspoken, while some more mundane French critics have accused them of English coldness and reticence. To "Dosia," it may be added, the Académie Française allotted last May a Prix Montyon of two thousand francs. In the present article, however, they have been regarded from a special point of view. From the majority of Henri Gréville's works much may be learned about a great country of which we, as a general rule, know little. What is said in them about Russia may be taken by English readers as accurate. It may be that Russian eyes may see flaws, may detect here and there a line, a hue, which are not absolutely Russian, may hear a foreign accent, as it were, in Henri Gré-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ville's words. But into that question it is quite needless for the foreign reader to enter. The Russians may be described, to borrow an idea from Dr. Wendell Holmes, after three fashions. There are the Russians as they really are, the Russians as they themselves think they are, and the Russians as they appear to foreigners. It is enough that the present works represent them graphically after the third fashion. It is possible that no such sweet, fair maiden as Sonia could ever be developed from a barefooted Russian peasant girl. It is possible that into the character of Dosia may have entered something of French espiéglerie. But no foreign author has ever before drawn so generally correct a series of Russian female portraits; no one has made so clear to foreign eyes the inner life of Russian homes. With what artistic skill and delicacy these pictures have been drawn and colored all readers of Henri Gréville's works will be able to judge for themselves.

W. R. S. RALSTON.

From The New Quarterly Review.

AN INDISCRETION IN THE LIFE OF AN HEIRESS.

PART II.

CHAPTER I.

He, like a captain who beleaguers round
Some strong-built castle on a rising ground,
Views all the approaches with observing eyes;
This and that other part in vain he tries,
And more on industry than force relies.

SINCE Egbert Mayne's situation is not altogether a new and unprecedented one, there will be no necessity for detailing in all its minuteness his attempt to scale the steeps of fame. For notwithstanding the fact that few, comparatively, have reached the top, the lower tracts of that troublesome incline have been trodden by as numerous a company as any allegorical spot in the world.

The reader must then imagine five years to have elapsed, during which rather formidable slice of human life Egbert had been constantly striving. It had been drive, drive from month to month; no rest, nothing but effort. He had progressed from newspaper work to criticism, from criticism to independent composition of a mild order, from the latter to the publication of a book which nobody ever heard of, and from this to the production of a work of really sterling merit, which appeared anonymously. Though he did not set society in a blaze, or even in a smoke, thereby, he certainly caused a good many people to talk about him, and to be curious as to his name.

The luminousness of nature which had been sufficient to attract the attention and heart of Geraldine Allenville had, indeed, meant much. That there had been power enough in the presence, speech, mind, and tone of the poor painter's son to fascinate a girl of Geraldine's station was of itself a ground for the presumption that he might do a work in the world if he chose. The attachment to her was just the stimulus which such a constitution as his required, and it had at first acted admirably upon him. Afterwards the case was scarcely so happy.

He had investigated manners and customs no less than literature; and for a while the experience was exciting enough. But several habits which he had at one time condemned in the ambitious classes now became his own. His original fondness for art, literature, and science was getting quenched by his slowly increasing habit of looking upon each and all of these as machinery wherewith to effect a purpose.

A new feeling began to animate all his studies. He had not the old interest in them for their own sakes, but a breathless interest in them as factors in the game of sink or swim. He entered picture-galleries, not, as formerly, because it was his humor to dream pleasantly over the images therein expressed, but to be able to talk on demand about painters and their peculiarities. He examined Correggio to criticise his flesh shades; Angelico, to speak technically of the pink faces of his saints; Murillo, to say fastidiously that there was a certain silliness in the look of his old men; Rubens for his sensuous women; Turner for his Turneresqueness. Romney was greater than Reynolds because Lady Hamilton had been his model, and thereby hung a tale. Bonozzi Gozzoli was better worth study than Raffaelle, since the former's name was a learned sound to utter, and all knowledge got up about him would tell.

Whether an intense love for a woman, and that woman Geraldine, was a justifiable reason for this desire to shine it is not easy to say.

However, as has been stated, Egbert worked like a slave in these causes, and at the end of five full years was repaid with certain public applause, though, unfortunately, not with much public money. But this he hoped might come soon.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Regarding his love for Geraldine, the most noteworthy fact to be recorded of the period was that all correspondence with her had ceased. In spite of their fear of her father, letters had passed frequently between them on his first leaving home, and had been continued with ardor for some considerable time. The reason of its close will be perceived in the following note, which he received from her two years before the date of the present chapter: —

"Tollamore House.

"MY DEAR EGBERT, —

"How shall I tell you what has happened! and yet how can I keep silence when sooner or later you must know all?

"My father has discovered what we feel for each other. He took me into his room and made me promise never to write to you, or seek you, or receive a letter from you. I promised in haste, for I was frightened and excited, and now he trusts me — I wish he did not — for he knows I would not be mean enough to lie. So don't write, poor Egbert, or expect to hear from miserable me. We must try to hope; yet it is a long, dreary thing to do. But I will hope, and not be beaten. How could I help promising, Egbert, when he compelled me? He is my father. I cannot think what we shall do under it all. It is cruel of life to be like this towards us when we have done no wrong.

. . . . . .

"We are going abroad for a long time. I think it is because of you and me, but I don't know. He does not tell me where we shall go. Just as if a place like Europe could make me forget you. He doesn't know what's in me, and how I can think about you and cry at nights — he cannot. If he did, he must see how silly the plan is.

"Remember that you go to church on Sunday mornings, for then I think that perhaps we are reading in the same place at the same moment; and we are sometimes, no doubt. Last Sunday when we came to this in the Psalms, 'And he shall be like a tree planted by the waterside that will bring forth his fruit in due season: his leaf also shall not wither; and look, whatsoever he doeth, it shall prosper,' I thought, 'That's Egbert in London.' I know you were reading that same verse in your church — I felt that you said it with us. Then I looked up to your old nook under the tower arch. It was a misery to see the wood and the stone just as good as ever, and you not there. It is not only that you are gone at these times, but a heavy creature — blankness — seems to stand in your place.

"But how can I tell you of these thoughts now that I am to write no more? Yet we will hope, and hope. Remember this, that should anything serious happen, I will break the bond and write. Obligation would end then. Good-bye for a time, I cannot put into words what I would finish with. Good-bye, good-bye.

"G. A.

"P.S. Might we not write just one line at very wide intervals? It is too much never to write at all."

On receiving this letter Egbert felt that he could not honorably keep up a regular correspondence with her. But a determination to break it off would have been more than he could have adhered to if he had not been strengthened by the hope that he might soon be able to give a plausible reason for renewing it. He sent her a line bidding her to expect the best results from the prohibition, which, he was sure, would not be for long. Meanwhile, should she think it not wrong to send a line at very wide intervals he would promptly reply.

But she was apparently too conscientious to do so, for nothing had reached him since. Yet she was as continually in his thought and heart as before. He felt more misgivings than he had chosen to tell her of on the ultimate effect of the prohibition, but could do nothing to remove it. And then he had learnt that Miss Allenville and her father had gone to Paris, as the commencement of a sojourn abroad.

These circumstances had burdened him with long hours of depression, till he had resolved to throw his whole strength into a production which should either give him a fair start towards fame, or make him clearly understand that there was no hope in that direction for such as he. He had begun the attempt, and ended it, and the consequences were fortunate to an unexpected degree.

CHAPTER II.

Towards the loadstar of my one desire
I flitted like a dizzy moth, whose flight
Is as a dead leaf's in the owlet light.

MAYNE'S book having been launched into the world and well received, he found time to emerge from the seclusion he had maintained for several months, and to look into life again.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

One warm, fashionable day, between five and six o'clock, he was walking along Piccadilly, absent-minded and unobservant, when an equipage approached whose appearance thrilled him through. It was the Allenville landau, newly painted up. Egbert felt almost as if he had been going into battle; and whether he should stand forth visibly before her or keep in the background seemed a question of life or death.

He waited in unobserved retirement, which it was not difficult to do, his aspect having much altered since the old times. Coachman, footman, and carriage advanced, in graceful unity of glide, like a swan. Then he beheld her, Geraldine, after two years of silence, five years of waiting, and nearly three years of separation; for although he had seen her two or three times in town after he had taken up his residence there, they had not once met since the year preceding her departure for the Continent.

She came opposite, now passively looking round, then actively glancing at something which interested her. Egbert trembled a little, or perhaps a great deal, at sight of her. But she passed on, and the back of the carriage hid her from his view.

So much of the boy was left in him still that he could scarcely withhold himself from rushing after her, and jumping into the carriage. She had appeared to be well and blooming, and an instinctive vexation that their long separation had produced no perceptible effect upon her, speedily gave way before a more generous sense of gratification at her well-being. Still, had it been possible, he would have been glad to see some sign upon her face that she yet remembered him.

This sudden discovery that they were in town after their years of travel stirred his lassitude into excitement. He went back to his chambers to meditate upon his next step. A trembling on Geraldine's account was disturbing him. She had probably been in London ever since the beginning of the season, but she had not given him a sign to signify that she was so near; and but for this accidental glimpse of her he might have gone on for months without knowing that she had returned from abroad.

Whether she was leading a dull or an exciting life Egbert had no means of knowing. That night after night the arms of interesting young men rested upon her waist and whirled her round the ball-room he could not bear to think. That she frequented gatherings and assemblies of all sorts he calmly owned as very probable, for she was her father's only daughter, and likely to be made much of. That she had not written a line to him since their return was still the grievous point.

"If I had only risen one or two steps further," he thought, "how boldly would I seek her out! But only to have published one successful book in all these years — such grounds are slight indeed."

For several succeeding days he did nothing but look about the Park, and the streets, and the neighborhood of Chevron Square, where their town house stood, in the hope of seeing her again; but in vain. There were moments when his distress that she might possibly be indifferent about him and his affairs was unbearable. He fully resolved that he would on some early occasion communicate with her, and know the worst. Years of work remained to be done before he could think of appearing before her father; but he had reached a sort of half-way stage at which some assurance from herself that his track was a hopeful one was positively needed to keep him firm.

Egbert still kept on the look-out for her at every public place; but nearly a month passed, and she did not appear again. One Sunday evening, when he had been wandering near Chevron Square, and looking at her windows from a distance, he returned past her house after dusk. The rooms were lighted, but the windows were still open, and as he strolled along he heard notes from a piano within. They were the accompaniment to an air from the "Messiah," though no singer's voice was audible. Egbert readily imagined who the player might be, for the "Messiah" was an oratorio which Geraldine often used to wax eloquent upon in days gone by. He had not walked far when he remembered that there was to be an exceptionally fine performance of that stirring composition during the following week, and it instantly occurred to him that Geraldine's mind was running on the same event, and that she intended to be one of the audience.

He resolved upon doing something at a venture. The next morning he went to the ticket-office, and boldly asked for a place as near as possible to those taken in the name of Allenville.

"There is no vacant one in any of those rows," the office-keeper said, "but you can have one very near their number on the other side of the division."

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Egbert was astonished that for once in his life he had made a lucky hit. He booked his place, and returned home.

The evening arrived, and he went early. On taking his seat he found himself at the left-hand end of a series of benches, and close to a red cord, which divided the group of seats he had entered from stalls of a somewhat superior kind. He was passing the time in looking at the extent of orchestra space, and other things, when he saw two ladies and a gentleman enter and sit down in the stalls diagonally before his own, and on the other side of the division. It delighted and agitated him to find that one of the three was Geraldine; her two companions he did not know.

"Policy, don't desert me now," he thought; and immediately sat in such a way that unless she turned round to a very unlikely position she would not see him.

There was a certain half-pleasant misery in sitting behind her thus as a possibly despised lover. To-night, at any rate, there would be sights and sounds common to both of them, though they should not communicate to the extent of a word. Even now he could hear the rustle of her garments as she settled down in her seat, and the faint murmur of words that passed between her and her friends.

Never, in the many times that he had listened to that rush of harmonies, had they affected him as they did then; and it was no wonder, considering what an influence upon his own life had been and still was exercised by Geraldine, and that she now sat there before him. The varying strains shook and bent him to themselves as a rippling brook shakes and bends a shadow. The music did not show its power by attracting his attention to its subject; it rather dropped its own libretto and took up in place of that the poem of his life and love.

There was Geraldine still. They were singing the chorus "Lift up your heads," and he found a new impulse of thought in him. It was towards determination. Should every member of her family be against him he would win her in spite of them. He could now see that Geraldine was moved equally with himself by the tones which entered her ears.

"Why do the nations so furiously rage together" filled him with a gnawing thrill, and so changed him to its spirit that he believed he was capable of suffering in silence for his whole lifetime, and of never appearing before her unless she gave a sign.

The audience stood up, and the "Hallelujah Chorus" began. The deafening harmonies flying from this group and from that seemed to absorb all the love and poetry that his life had produced, to pour it upon that one moment, and upon her who stood so close at hand. "I will force Geraldine to be mine," he thought. "I will make that heart ache of love for me." The chorus continued, and her form trembled under its influence. Egbert was for seeking her the next morning and knowing what his chances were, without waiting for further results. The chorus and the personality of Geraldine still filled the atmosphere. I will seek her to-night — as soon as we get out of this place," he said. The storm of sound now reached its climax, and Geraldine's power was proportionately increased. He would give anything for a glance this minute — to look into her eyes, she into his. "If I can but touch her hand, and get one word from her, I will," he murmured.

He shifted his position somewhat and saw her face. Tears were in her eyes, and her lips were slightly parted. Stretching a little nearer he whispered, "My love!"

Geraldine turned her wet eyes upon him, almost as if she had not been surprised, but had been forewarned by her previous emotion. With the peculiar quickness of grasp that she always showed under sudden circumstances, she had realized the position at a glance.

"Oh, Egbert!" she said; and her countenance flagged as if she would have fainted.

"Give me your hand," he whispered.

She placed her hand in his, under the cord, which it was easy to do without observation; and he held it tight.

"Mine, as before?" he asked.

"Yours now as then," said she.

They were like frail and sorry wrecks upon that sea of symphony, and remained in silent abandonment to the time, till the strains approached their close.

"Can you meet me to-night?" said Egbert.

She was half frightened at the request, and said, "Where?"

"At your own front door, at twelve o'clock." He then was at once obliged to gently withdraw himself, for the chorus was ended, and the people were sitting down.

The remainder was soon over, and it was time to leave. Egbert watched her and her party out of the house, and, turning to the other doorway, went out likewise.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

CHAPTER III.

Bright reason will mock thee,
Like the sun from a wintry sky.

WHEN he reached his chambers he sat down and literally did nothing but watch the hand of the mantel-clock minute by minute, till it marked half past eleven, scarcely removing his eyes. Then going again into the street he called a cab, and was driven down Park Lane and on to the corner of Chevron Square. Here he alighted, and went round to the number occupied by the Allenvilles.

A lamp stood nearly opposite the doorway, and by receding into the gloom to the railing of the square he could see whatever went on in the porch of the house. The lamps over the doorways were nearly all extinguished, and everything about this part was silent and deserted, except at a house on the opposite side of the square, where a ball was going on. But nothing of that concerned Egbert: his eyes had sought out and remained fixed upon Mr. Allenville's front door, in momentary expectation of seeing it gently open.

The dark wood of the door showed a keen and distinct edge upon the pale stone of the porch floor. It must have been about two minutes before the hour he had named when he fancied he saw a slight movement at that point, as of something slipped out from under the door.

"It is but fancy," he said to himself.

He turned his eyes away, and turned them back again. Some object certainly seemed to have been thrust under the door. At this moment the four quarters of midnight began to strike, and then the hour. Egbert could remain still no longer, and he went into the porch. A note had been slipped under the door from inside.

He took it to the lamp, turned it over, and saw that it was directed only with initials, — "To E. M." Egbert tore it open and glanced upon the page. With a shiver of disappointment he read these words in her handwriting: —

"It was when under the influence of much emotion, kindled in me by the power of the music, that I half assented to a meeting with you to-night; and I believe that you also were excited when you asked for one. After some quiet reflection I have decided that it will be much better for us both if we do not see each other.

"You will, I know, judge me fairly in this. You have by this time learnt what life is; what particular positions, accidental though they may be, ask, nay, imperatively exact from us. If you say 'not imperatively,' you cannot speak from knowledge of the world.

"To be woven and tied in with the world by blood, acquaintance, tradition, and external habit, is to a woman to be utterly at the beck of that world's customs. In youth we do not see this. You and I did not see it. We were but a girl and a boy at the time of our meetings at Tollamore. What was our knowledge? A list of other people's words. What was our wisdom? None at all.

"It is well for you now to remember that I am not the unsophisticated girl I was when you first knew me. For better or for worse I have become complicated, exclusive, and practised. A woman who can speak, or laugh, or dance, or sing before any number of men with perfect composure may be no sinner, but she is not what I was once. She is what I am now. She is not the girl you loved. That woman is not here.

"I wish to write kindly to you, as to one for whom, in spite of the unavoidable division between our paths, I must always entertain a heartfelt respect. Is it, after this, out of place in me to remind you how contrasting are all our associations, how inharmonious our times and seasons? Could anything ever overpower this incongruity?

"But I must write plainly, and, though it may grieve you now, it will produce ultimately the truest ease. This is my meaning. If I could accept your addresses without an entire loss of position I would do so; but, since this cannot be, we must forget each other.

"Believe me to be, with wishes and prayers for your happiness,

"Your sincere friend,

"G. A."

Egbert could neither go home nor stay still; he walked off rapidly in any direction for the sole sake of vehement motion. His first impulse was to get into darkness. He went towards Kensington; thence threaded across to the Uxbridge Road, thence to Kensal Green, where he turned into a lane and followed it to Kilburn, and the hill beyond, at which spot he halted and looked over the vast haze of light extending to the length and breadth of London. Turning back and wandering among some fields by a way he could never afterwards recollect, sometimes sitting down, sometimes leaning on a stile, he lingered on until the sun had risen. He then slowly walked again towards London, and, feeling by this time very weary, he entered the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

first refreshment-house that he came to, and attempted to eat something. Having sat for some time over this meal without doing much more than taste it, he arose and set out for the street in which he lived. Once in his own rooms he lay down upon the couch and fell asleep.

When he awoke it was four o'clock. Egbert then dressed and went out, partook of a light meal at his club at the dismal hour between luncheon and dinner, and cursorily glanced over the papers and reviews. Among the first things that he saw were eulogistic notices of his own book in three different reviews, each the most prominent and weighty of its class. Two of them, at least, would, he knew, find their way to the drawing-room of the Allenvilles, for they were among the periodicals which the squire regularly patronized.

Next, in a weekly review he read the subjoined note: —

"The authorship of the book —— ——, about which conjecture has lately been so much exercised, is now ascribed to Mr. Egbert Mayne, whose first attempt in that kind we noticed in these pages some eighteen months ago."

He took up a daily paper, and presently lighted on the following paragraph: —

"It is announced that a marriage is arranged between Lord Bretton, of Tosthill Park, and Geraldine, only daughter of Foy Allenville, Esq., of Tollamore House, Wessex."

Egbert arose and went towards home. Arrived there he met the postman at the door, and received from him a small note. The young man mechanically glanced at the direction.

"From her," he mentally exclaimed. "What does it ——"

This was what the letter contained: —

"Twelve o'clock.

"I have just learnt that the anonymous author of the book in which the world has been so interested during the past two months, and which I have read, is none other than yourself. Accept my congratulations. It seems almost madness in me to address you now. But I could not do otherwise on receipt of this news, and after writing my last letter. Let your knowledge of my nature prevent your misconstruing my motives in writing thus on the spur of the moment. I need scarcely add, please keep it a secret forever. I am not morally afraid, but other lives, hopes, and objects than mine have to be considered.

"The announcement of the marriage is premature, to say the least. I would tell you more, but dare not.

"G. A."

The conjunction of all this intelligence produced in Egbert's heart a stillness which was some time in getting aroused to excitement. His emotion was formless. He knew not what point to take hold of and survey his position from; and, though his faculties grew clearer with the passage of time, he failed in resolving on a course with any deliberateness. No sooner had he thought, "I will never see her again for my pride's sake," than he said, "Why not see her? she is a woman; she may love me yet."

He went down-stairs and out of the house, and walked by way of the Park towards Chevron Square.

Probably nobody will rightly appreciate Mayne's wild behavior at this juncture, unless, which is very unlikely, he has been in a somewhat similar position himself. It may always appear to cool critics, even if they are generous enough to make allowances for his feelings, as visionary and weak in the extreme. Yet it was scarcely to be expected, after the mental and emotional strain that he had undergone during the preceding five years, that he should have acted much otherwise.

He rang the bell and asked to see Mr. Allenville. He, perhaps fortunately, was not at home. "Miss Allenville, then," said Mayne.

"She is just driving out," said the footman dubiously.

Egbert then noticed for the first time that the carriage was at the door, and almost as soon as the words were spoken Geraldine came down-stairs.

"The madness of hoping to call that finished creature wife!" he thought.

Geraldine recognized him, and looked perplexed.

"One word, Miss Allenville," he murmured.

She assented, and he followed her into the adjoining room.

"I have come," said Egbert. "I know it is hasty of me; but I must hear my doom from your own lips. Five years ago you spurred me on to ambition. I have followed but too closely the plan I then marked out, for I have hoped all along for a reward. What am I to think? Have you indeed left off feeling what you once felt for me?"

"I cannot speak of it now," she said

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

hurriedly. "I told you in my letter as much as I dared. Believe me I cannot speak — in the way you wish. I will always be your friend."

"And is this the end? Oh, my God!"

"And we shall hope to see you to dinner some day, now you are famous," she continued, pale as ashes. "But I — cannot be with you as we once were. I was such a child at that time, you know."

"Geraldine, is this all I get after this lapse of time and heat of labor?"

"I am not my own mistress — I have my father to please," she faintly murmured. "I must please him. There is no help for this. Go from me — do go!"

Egbert turned and went, for he felt that he had no longer a place beside her.

CHAPTER IV.

Then I said in my heart, "As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise?"

MAYNE was in rather an ailing state for several days after the above-mentioned event. Yet the lethean stagnation which usually comes with the realization that all is over allowed him to take some deep sleeps, to which he had latterly been a stranger.

The hours went by, and he did the best he could to dismiss his regrets for Geraldine. He was assisted to the very little success that he attained in this by reflecting how different a woman she must have become from her old sweet self of five or six years ago.

"But how paltry is my success now she has vanished!" he said. "What is it worth? What object have I in following it up after this?" It rather startled him to see that the root of his desire for celebrity having been Geraldine, he now was a man who had no further motive in moving on. Town life had for some time been depressing to him. He began to doubt whether he could ever be happy in the course of existence that he had followed through these later years. The perpetual strain, the lack of that quiet to which he had been accustomed in early life, the absence of all personal interest in things around him, was telling upon his health of body and of mind.

Then revived the wish which had for some time been smouldering in his secret heart — to leave off, for the present, at least, his efforts for distinction; to retire for a few months to his old country nook, and there to meditate on his next course.

To set about this was curiously awkward to him. He had planned methods of retrogression in case of defeat through want of ability, want of means, or lack of opportunity; but to retreat because his appetite for advance had gone off was what he had never before thought of.

His reflections turned upon the old home of his mother's family. He knew exactly how Tollamore appeared at that time of the year. The trees with their half-ripe apples, the bees and butterflies lazy from the heat; the haymaking over, the harvest not begun, the people lively and always out of doors. He would visit the spot, and call upon some old and half-forgotten friends of his grandfather in an adjoining parish.

Two days later he left town. The fine weather, his escape from that intricate web of effort in which he had been bound these five years, the sensation that nobody in the world had any claims upon him, imparted some buoyancy to his mind; and it was in a serene if sad spirit that he entered Tollamore Vale, and smelt his native air.

He did not at once proceed to the village, but stopped at Fairland, the parish next adjoining. It was now evening, and he called upon some of the old cottagers whom he knew. Time had set a mark upon them all since he had last been there. Middle-aged men were a little more round-shouldered, their wives had taken to spectacles, young people had grown up out of recognition, and old men had passed into second childhood.

Egbert found here, as he had expected, precisely such a lodging as a hermit would desire. It was in an ivy-covered detached house which had been partly furnished for a tenant who had never come, and it was kept clean by an old woman living in a cottage near. She offered to wait upon Egbert whilst he remained there, coming in the morning and leaving in the afternoon, thus giving him the house to himself during the latter part of the day.

When it grew dusk he went out, wishing to ramble for a little time. The gibbous moon rose on his right, the stars showed themselves sleepily one by one, and the far distance turned to a mysterious ocean of grey. He instinctively directed his steps towards Tollamore, and when there towards the school. It looked very little changed since the year in which he had had the memorable meetings with her there, excepting that the creepers had grown higher.

He went on towards the park. Here

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

was the place whereon he had used to await her coming — he could be sure of the spot to a foot. There was the turn of the hill around which she had appeared. The sentimental effect of the scenes upon him was far greater than he had expected, so great that he wished he had never been so reckless as to come here. "But this is folly," he thought. "The betrothed of Lord Bretton is a woman of the world in whose thoughts, hopes, and habits I have no further interest or share."

In the lane he heard the church-bells ringing out their five notes, and meeting a shepherd Egbert asked him what was going on.

"Practising," he said, in an uninterested voice. "'Tis against young miss's wedding, that their hands may be thoroughly in by the day for't."

He presently came to where his grandfather's old house had stood. It was pulled down, the ground it covered having become a shabby, irregular spot, half grown over with trailing plants. The garden had been grassed down, but the old apple-trees still remained, their trunks and stems being now sheeted on one side with moonlight. He entertained himself by guessing where the front door of the house had been, at which Geraldine had entered on the memorable evening when she came to him full of grief and pity, and a tacit avowal of love was made on each side. Where they had sat together was now but a heap of broken rubbish half covered with grass. Near this melancholy spot was the cottage once inhabited by Nathan Brown. But Nathan was dead now, and his wife and family had gone elsewhere.

Finding the effect of memory to be otherwise than cheerful, Mayne hastened from the familiar spot, and went on to the parish of Fairland in which he had taken his lodging.

It soon became whispered in the neighborhood that Miss Allenville's wedding was to take place on the 17th of October. Egbert heard few particulars of the matter beyond the date, though it is possible that he might have known more if he had tried. He preferred to fortify himself by dipping deeply into the few books he had brought with him; but the most obvious plan of escaping his thoughts, that of a rapid change of scene by travel, he was unaccountably loth to adopt. He felt that he could not stay long in this district; yet an indescribable fascination held him on day after day, till the date of the marriage was close at hand.

CHAPTER V.

How all the other passions fleet to air,
As doubtful thoughts, and rash-embraced despair
And shudd'ring fear, and green-eyed jealousy!

ON the eve of the wedding the people told Mayne that arches and festoons of late summer flowers and evergreens had been put up across the path between the church porch at Tollamore and the private gate to the squire's lawn for the procession of bride and bridesmaids. Before it got dark several villagers went on foot to the church to look at and admire these decorations. Egbert had determined to see the ceremony over. It would do him good, he thought, to be witness of the sacrifice.

Hence he, too, went along the path to Tollamore to inspect the preparations. It was dusk by the time that he reached the churchyard, and he entered it boldly, letting the gate fall together with a loud slam, as if he were a man whom nothing troubled. He looked at the half-completed bowers of green, and passed on into the church, never having entered it since he first left Tollamore.

He was standing by the chancel-arch, and observing the quantity of flowers which had been placed around the spot, when he heard the creaking of a gate on its hinges. Two figures entered the church, and Egbert stepped behind a canopied tomb.

The persons were females, and they appeared to be servants from the neighboring mansion. They brought more flowers and festoons, and were talking of the event of the morrow. Coming into the chancel they threw down their burdens with a remark that it was too dark to arrange more flowers that night.

"This is where she is to kneel," said one, standing with her arms akimbo before the altar-railing. "And I wish 'twas I instead, Lord send if I don't."

The two girls went on gossiping till other footsteps caused them to turn.

"I won't say 'tisn't she. She has been here two or three times to-day. Let's go round this way."

And the servants went towards the door by a circuitous path round the aisle, to avoid meeting with the new-comer.

Egbert, too, thought he would leave the place now that he had heard and seen thus much; but from carelessness or design he went straight down the nave. An instant afterwards he was standing face to face with Geraldine. The servants had vanished.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"Good evening," she said serenely, not knowing him, and supposing him to be a parishioner.

Egbert returned the words hastily, and, in standing aside to let her pass, looked clearly into her eyes and pale face, as if there never had been a time at which he would have done anything on earth for her sake.

She knew him, and started, uttering a weak exclamation. When he reached the door he turned his head, and saw that she was irresolutely holding up her hand, as if to beckon to him to come back.

"One word, since I have met you," she said in unequal, half-whispered tones. "I have felt that I was one-sided in my haste on the day you called to see me in London. I misunderstood you."

Egbert could at least out-do her in self-control, and, astonished that she should have spoken, he answered in a yet colder tone, —

"I am sorry for that; very sorry, madam."

"And you excuse it?"

"Of course I do, readily. And I hope you, too, will pardon my intrusion on that day, and understand the — circumstances."

"Yes, yes. Especially as I am most to blame for those indiscreet proceedings in our early lives which led to it."

"Certainly you were not most to blame."

"How can you say that?" she answered with a slight laugh, "when you know nothing of what my motives and feelings were?"

"I know well enough to judge, for I was the elder. Let me just recall some points in your own history at that time."

"No."

"Will you not hear a word?"

"I cannot. . . . Are you writing another book?"

"I am doing nothing. I am idling at Monk's Hut."

"Indeed!" she said, slightly surprised. "Well, you will always have my good wishes, whatever you may do. If any of my relatives can ever help you ——"

"Thank you, madam, very much. I think, however, that I can help myself."

She was silent, looking upon the floor; and Egbert spoke again, successfully hiding the feelings of his heart under a light and untrue tone. "Miss Allenville, you know that I loved you devotedly for many years, and that that love was the starting-point of all my ambition. My sense of it makes this meeting rather awkward. But men survive almost anything. I have proved it. Their love is strong while it lasts, but it soon withers at sight of a new face. I congratulate you on your coming marriage. Perhaps I may marry some day, too."

"I hope you will find some one worth your love. I am sorry I ever — inconvenienced you as I did. But one hardly knows at that age ——"

"Don't think of it for a moment — I really entreat you not to think of that." What prompted the cruelty of his succeeding words he never could afterwards understand. "It was a hard matter at first for me to forget you, certainly; but perhaps I was helped in my wish by the strong prejudice I originally had against your class and family. I have fixed my mind firmly upon the differences between us, and my youthful fancy is pretty fairly overcome. Those old silly days of devotion were pretty enough, but the devotion was entirely unpractical, as you have seen, of course."

"Yes, I have seen it," she faltered.

"It was scarcely of a sort which survives accident and division, and is strengthened by disaster."

"Well, perhaps not, perhaps not. You can scarcely care much now whether it was or not; or, indeed, care anything about me or my happiness."

"I do care."

"How much? As you do for that of any other wretched human being?"

"Wretched? No!"

"I will tell you — I must tell you!" she said with rapid utterance. "This is my secret, this. I don't love the man I am going to marry; but I have agreed to be his wife to satisfy my friends. Say you don't hate me for what I have told. I could not bear that you should not know!"

"Hate you? Oh, Geraldine!"

A hair's breadth further, and they would both have broken down.

"Not a word more. Now you know my unhappy state, and I shall die content."

"But, darling — my Geraldine!"

"It is too late. Good-night — good-bye!" She spoke in a hurried voice, almost like a low cry, and rushed away.

Here was a revelation. Egbert moved along to the door, and up the path, in a condition in which his mind caused his very body to ache. He gazed vacantly through the railings of the lawn, which came close to the churchyard; but she was gone. He still moved mechanically on. A little further and he was overtaken by the parish clerk, who, addressing a few words to him, soon recognized his voice.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The clerk's talk, too, was about the wedding. "Is the marriage likely to be a happy one?" asked Egbert, aroused by the subject.

"Well, between you and me, Mr. Mayne, 'tis a made-up affair. Some says she can't bear the man."

"Lord Bretton?"

"Yes. I could say more if I dared; but what's the good of it now!"

"I suppose none," said Egbert wearily.

He was glad to be again alone, and went on towards Fairland slowly and heavily. Had Geraldine forgotten him, and loved elsewhere with a light heart, he could have borne it; but this sacrifice at a time when, left to herself, she might have listened to him, was an intolerable misery. Her inconsistent mannner, her appearance of being swayed by two feelings, her half-reservations, were all explained. "Against her wishes," he said; "at heart she may still be mine. Oh, Geraldine, my poor Geraldine, is it come to this!"

He bitterly regretted his first manner towards her, and turned round to consider whether he could not go back, endeavor to find her, and ask if he could be of any possible use. But all this was plainly absurd. He again proceeded homeward as before.

Reaching Fairland he sat a while in his empty house without a light, and then went to bed. Owing to the distraction of his mind he lay for three or four hours meditating, and listening to the autumn wind, turning restlessly from side to side, the blood throbbing in his temples and singing in his ears, and the ticking of his watch waxing apparently loud enough to stun him. He conjured up the image of Geraldine in her various stages of preparation on the following day. He saw her coming in at the well-known door, walking down the aisle in a floating cloud of white, and receiving the eyes of the assembled crowd without a flush, or a sign of consciousness; uttering the words, "I take thee to my wedded husband," as quietly as if she were dreaming them. And the husband? Egbert shuddered. How could she have consented, even if her memories stood their ground only half so obstinately as his own? As for himself, he perceived more clearly than ever how intricately she had mingled with every motive in his past career. Some portion of the thought, "marriage with Geraldine," had been marked on every day of his manhood.

Ultimately he fell into a fitful sleep, when he dreamed of fighting, wading, diving, boring, through innumerable multitudes, in the midst of which Geraldine's form appeared flitting about, in the usual confused manner of dreams — sometimes coming towards him, sometimes receding, and getting thinner and thinner till she was a mere film tossed about upon a seething mass.

He jumped up in the bed, damp with a cold perspiration, and in an agony of disquiet. It was a minute or two before he could collect his senses. He went to the window and looked out. It was quite dark, and the wind moaned and whistled round the corners of the house in the heavy intonations which seem to express that ruthlessness has all the world to itself.

"Egbert, do do come to me!" reached his ears in a faint voice from the darkness.

There was no mistaking it: it was assuredly the tongue of Geraldine.

He half dressed himself, ran downstairs, and opened the front door, holding the candle above his head. Nobody was visible.

He set down the light, hastened round the back of the house, and saw a dusky figure turning the corner to get to the gate. He then ran diagonally across the plot, and intercepted the form in the path. "Geraldine!" he said, "can it indeed be you?"

"Yes, it is, it is!" she cried wildly, and fell upon his shoulder.

The hot turmoil of excitement pervading her hindered her from fainting, and Egbert placed his arm round her, and led her into the house, without asking a question, or meeting with any resistance. He assisted her into a chair as soon as they reached the front room.

"I have run away from home, Egbert, and to you!" she sobbed. "I am not insane: they and you may think so, but I am not. I came to find you. Such shocking things have happened since I met you just now. Can Lord Bretton come and claim me?"

"Nobody on earth can claim you, darling, against your will. Now tell it all to me."

She spoke on between her tears. "I have loved you ever since, Egbert; but such influences have been brought to bear upon me that at last I have hardly known what I was doing. At last, I thought that perhaps, after all, it would be better to become a lady of title, with a large park and houses of my own, than the wife of any man of genius who was poor. I loved you all the time, but I was half ashamed that I loved you. I went out continually, that gaiety might obscure the past. And then

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dark circles came round my eyes — I grew worn and tired. I am not nearly so nice to look at as at that time when we used to meet in the school, nor so healthy either . . . I think I was handsome then." At this she smiled faintly, and raised her eyes to his, with a sparkle of their old mischief in them.

"And now and ever," he whispered.

"How innocent we were then! Fancy, Egbert, our unreserve would have been almost wrong if we had known the canons of behavior we learnt afterwards. Ah! who at that time would have thought I was to yield to what I did? I wish now that I had met you at the door in Chevron Square, as I promised. But I feared to — I had promised Lord Bretton — and I that evening received a lecturing from my father, who saw you at the concert — he was in a seat further behind. And then, when I heard of your great success, how I wished I had held out a little longer! for I knew your hard labor had been on my account. When we met again last night it seemed awful, horrible — what I had done. Yet how could I tell you plainly? When I got indoors I felt I should die of misery, and I went to my father, and said I could not be married to-morrow. Oh, how angry he was, and what a dreadful scene occurred!" She covered her face with her hands.

"My poor Geraldine!" said Egbert, supporting her with his arm.

"When I was in my room this came into my mind, 'Better is it that thou shouldest not vow, than that thou shouldest vow and not pay.' I could bear it no longer. I was determined not to marry him, and to see you again, whatever came of it. I dressed, and came down-stairs noiselessly, and slipped out. I knew where your house was, and I hastened here."

"You will never marry him now?"

"Never. Yet what can I do? Oh! what can I do? If I go back to my father — no, I cannot go back now — it is too late. But if they should find me, and drag me back, and compel me to perform my promise!"

"There is one simple way to prevent that, if, beloved Geraldine, you will agree to adopt it."

"Yes."

"By becoming my wife, at once. We would return to London as soon as the ceremony was over; and there you may defy them all."

"Oh, Egbert! I have thought of this ——"

"You will have no reason to regret it. Perhaps I can introduce you to as intellectual, if odd-mannered and less aristocratic, society than that you have been accustomed to."

"Yes, I know it, — I reflected on it before I came . . . I will be your wife," she replied tenderly. "I have come to you, and to you I will cling."

Egbert kissed her lips then for the first time in his life. He reflected for some time, if that process could be called reflection which was accompanied with so much excitement.

"The parson of your parish would perhaps refuse to marry us, even if we could get to the church secretly," he said, with a cloud on his brow. "That's a difficulty."

"Oh, don't take me there!" I cannot go to Tollamore. I shall be seen, or we shall be parted. Don't take me there."

"No, no; I will not, love. I was only thinking. Are you known in this parish?"

"Well, yes; not, however, to the clergyman. He is a young man — old Mr. Keene is dead, you know."

"Then I can manage it." Egbert clasped her in his arms in the delight of his heart. "Now this is our course. I am first going to the surrogate's, and then further; and while I am gone you must stay in this house absolutely alone, and lock yourself in for safety. There is food in the house, and wine in that cupboard; you must stay here in hiding till I come back. It is now five o'clock. I will be here again at latest by eleven. If anybody knocks, remain silent, and the house will be supposed empty, as it lately has been so for a long time. My old servant and waitress must not come here to-day — I will manage that. I will light a fire, which will have burnt down by daylight, so that the room will be warmed for you. Sit there while I set about it."

He lit the fire, placed on the table all the food the house afforded, and went away.

CHAPTER VI.

Hence will I to my ghostly father's cell;
His help to crave, and my dear hap to tell.

In half an hour Egbert returned, leading a horse.

"I have borrowed this from an old neighbor," he said, "and I have told the woman who waits upon me that I am going on a journey, and shall lock up the house to-day, so that she will not be wanted. And now, dearest, I want you to lend me something."

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"Whatever it may be, you know it is yours."

"It is that," he answered, lightly touching with the tip of his finger a sparkling ring she wore on hers — the same she had used to wear at their youthful meetings in past years. "I want it as a pattern for the size."

She drew it off and handed it to him, at the same time raising her eyelids and glancing under his with a little laugh of confusion. His heart responded, and he kissed her; but he could not help feeling that she was by far too fair a prize for him.

She accompanied him to the door, and Mayne mounted the horse. They parted, and, waiting to hear her lock herself in, he cantered off by a bridle-path towards a town about five miles off.

It was so early that the surrogate on whom he called had not yet breakfasted, but he was very willing to see Mayne, and took him at once to the study. Egbert briefly told him what he wanted; that the lady he wished to marry was at that very moment in his house, and could go nowhere else for shelter — hence the earliness and urgency of his errand.

The surrogate seemed to see rather less interest in the circumstances than Mayne did himself; but he at once prepared the application for a license. When it was done, he made it up into a letter, directed it, and placed it on the mantelpiece. "It shall go by this evening's post," he said.

"But," said Egbert, "considering the awkward position this lady is in, cannot a special messenger be sent for the license? It is only seven or eight miles to ——, and yet otherwise I must wait for two days' posts."

"Undoubtedly; if anybody likes to pay for it, a special messenger may be sent."

"There will be no paying; I am willing to go myself. Do you object?"

"No; if the case is really serious, and the lady is dangerously compromised by every delay."

Mayne left the vicarage of the surrogate and again rode off; this time it was towards a well-known cathedral town. He felt bewildering sensations during this stroke for happiness, and went on his journey in that state of mind which takes cognizance of little things, without at the time being conscious of them, though they return vividly upon the memory long after.

He reached the city after a ride of seven additional miles, and soon obtained the precious document, and all else that he required. Returning to the inn where the horse had been rested, rubbed down, and fed, he again crossed the saddle, and at ten minutes past eleven he was back at Fairland. Before going to Monk's Hut, where Geraldine was immured, he hastened straight to the parsonage.

The young clergyman looked curiously at him, and at the bespattered and jaded horse outside. "Surely you are too rash in the matter," he said.

"No," said Egbert; "there are weighty reasons why I should be in such haste. The lady has at present no home to go to. She has taken shelter with me. I am doing what I consider best in so awkward a case."

The parson took down his hat, and said, "Very well; I will go to the church at once. You must be quick if it is to be done to-day."

Mayne left the horse for the present in the parson's yard, ran round to the clerk, thence to Monk's Hut, and called Geraldine.

It was, indeed, a hasty preparation for a wedding ceremony that these two made that morning. She was standing at the window, quite ready, and feverish with waiting. Kissing her gaily and breathlessly he directed her by a slightly circuitous path to the church; and, when she had been gone about two minutes, proceeded thither himself by the direct road, so that they met in the porch. Within, the clergyman, clerk, and clerk's wife had already gathered; and Geraldine and Egbert advanced to the communion railing.

Thus they became man and wife.

"Now he cannot claim me anyhow," she murmured when the service was ended, as she sank almost fainting upon the arm of Mayne.

"Mr. Mayne," said the clergyman, aside to him in the vestry, "what is the name of the family at Tollamore House?"

"Strangely enough, Allenville — the same as hers," said he coolly.

The parson looked keenly and dubiously at Mayne, and Egbert returned the look, whereupon the other turned aside and said nothing.

Egbert and Geraldine returned to their hermitage on foot, as they had left it; and, by rigorously excluding all thoughts of the future, they felt happy with the same old unreasoning happiness as of six years before, now resumed for the first time since that date.

But it was quite impossible that the hastily married pair should remain at Monk's Hut unseen and unknown, as they fain would have done. Almost as soon as they had sat down in the house they came

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to the conclusion that there was no alternative for them but to start at once for Melport, if not for London. The difficulty was to get a conveyance. The only horse obtainable here, though a strong one, had already been tired down by Egbert in the morning, and the nearest village at which another could be had was about two miles off.

"I can walk as far as that," said Geraldine.

"Then walk we will," said Egbert. "It will remove all our difficulty." And, first packing up a small valise, he locked the door and went off with her upon his arm, just as the church clock struck one.

That walk through the woods was as romantic an experience as any they had ever known in their lives, though Geraldine was far from being quite happy. On reaching the village, which was larger than Fairland, they were fortunate enough to secure a carriage without any trouble. The village stood on the turnpike road, and a fly, about to return to Melport, where it had come from, was halting before the inn. Egbert hired it at once, and in little less than an hour and a half bridegroom and bride were comfortably housed in a quiet hotel of the seaport town above mentioned.

CHAPTER VII.

How small a part of time they share
That are so wondrous sweet and fair!

THEY remained three days at Melport without having come to any decision on their future movements.

On the third day, at breakfast, Egbert took up the local newspaper which had been published that morning, and his eye presently glanced upon a paragraph headed "The Tollamore Elopement."

Before reading it he considered for a moment whether he should lay the journal aside, and for the present hide its contents from the tremulous creature opposite. But deeming this unadvisable, he gently prepared her for the news, and read the paragraph aloud.

It was to the effect that the village of Tollamore and its neighborhood had been thrown into an unwonted state of excitement by the disappearance of Miss Allenville on the eve of the preparations for her marriage with Lord Bretton, which had been alluded to in their last number. Simultaneously there had disappeared from a neighboring village, whither he had come for a few months' retirement, a gentleman named Mayne, of considerable literary reputation in the metropolis, and apparently an old acquaintance of Miss Allenville's. Efforts had been made to trace the fugitives by the young lady's father and the distracted bridegroom, Lord Bretton, but hitherto all their exertions had been unavailing.

Subjoined was another paragraph, entitled "Latest particulars."

"It has just been discovered that Mr. Mayne and Miss Allenville are already man and wife. They were boldly married at the parish church of Fairland, before any person in the village had the least suspicion who or what they were. It appears that the lady joined her intended husband early that morning at the cottage he had taken for the season, that they went to the church by different paths, and after the ceremony walked out of the parish by a route as yet unknown. In consequence of this intelligence Lord Bretton has returned to London, and her father is left alone to mourn the young lady's rashness."

Egbert lifted his eyes and watched Geraldine as he finished reading. On perceiving his look she tried to smile. The smile thinned away, for there was not cheerfulness enough to support it long, and she said faintly, "Egbert, what must be done?"

"We must, I suppose, leave this place, darling; charming as our life is here."

"Yes; I fear we must."

"London seems to be the spot for us at once, before we attract the attention of the people here."

"How well everything might end," she said, "if my father were induced to welcome you, and make the most of your reputation! I wonder, wonder if he would! In that case there would be little amiss."

Mayne, after some reflection, said, "I think that I will go to your father before we leave for town. We are certain to be discovered by somebody or other, either here or in London, and that would bring your father, and there would possibly result a public meeting between him and myself at which words might be uttered which could not be forgotten on either side; so that a private meeting and explanation is safest, before anything of that sort can happen."

"I think," she said, looking to see if he approved of her words as they fell, "I think that a still better course would be for me to go to him — alone."

Mayne did not care much about this plan at first; but further discussion gave

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

it a more feasible aspect, since Allenville, though stern and proud, was fond of his daughter, and had never crossed her, except when her whims interfered, as he considered, with her interests. Nothing could unmarry them; and Geraldine's mind would be much more at ease after begging her father's forgiveness. The journey was therefore decided on. They waited till nearly evening, and then, ordering round a brougham, Egbert told the man to drive to Tollamore.

The journey to Geraldine was tedious and oppressive to a degree. When, after two hours' driving, they drew near the park precincts, she said shivering, —

"I don't like to drive up to the house, Egbert."

"I will do just as you like. What do you propose?"

"To let him wait in the road, under the three oak-trees, while you and I walk to the house."

Egbert humored her in everything; and when they reached the designated spot the driver was stopped, and they alighted. Carefully wrapping her up he gave her his arm, and they started for Tollamore House at an easy pace through the moonlit park, avoiding the direct road as much as possible.

Geraldine spoke but little during the walk, especially when they neared the house, and passed across the smooth broad glade which surrounded it. At sight of the door she seemed to droop, and leant heavily upon him. Egbert more than ever wished to confront Mr. Allenville himself; morally and socially it appeared to him the right thing to do. But Geraldine trembled when he again proposed it; and he yielded to her entreaty thus far, that he would wait a few minutes till she had entered and seen her father privately, and prepared the way for Egbert to follow, which he would then do in due course.

The spot in which she desired him to wait was a summer-house under a tree about fifty yards from the lawn front of the house, and commanding a view of the door on this side. She was to enter unobserved by the servants, and go straight to her father, when, should he listen to her with the least show of mildness, she would send out for Egbert to follow. If the worst were to happen, and he were to be enraged with her, refusing to listen to entreaties or explanations, she would hasten out, rejoin Egbert, and depart.

In this little summer-house he embraced her, and bade her adieu, after their honeymoon of three short days. She trembled so much that she could scarcely walk when he let go her hand.

"Don't go alone — you are not well," said Egbert.

"Yes, yes, dearest, I am — and I will soon return, so soon!" she answered; and he watched her crossing the grass and advancing, a mere dot, towards the mansion. In a short time the appearance of an oblong of light in the shadowy expanse of wall denoted to him that the door was open: her outline appeared on it; then the door shut her in, and all was shadow as before. Even though they were husband and wife the line of demarcation seemed to be drawn again as rigidly as when he lived at the school.

Egbert waited in the solitude of this place minute by minute, restlessly swinging his foot when seated, at other times walking up and down, and anxiously watching for the arrival of some messenger. Nearly half an hour passed, but no messenger came.

The first sign of life in the neighborhood of the house was in the shape of a man on horseback, galloping from the stable entrance. Egbert saw this by looking over the wall at the back of the summer-house; and the man passed along the open drive, vanishing in the direction of the lodge. Mayne, not without some presentiment of ill, wondered what it could mean, but thought it just possible that the horseman was a special messenger sent to catch the late post at the nearest town, as was sometimes done by Squire Allenville. So he curbed his impatience for Geraldine's sake.

Next he observed lights moving in the upper windows of the building. "It has been made known to them all that she is come, and they are preparing a room," he thought hopefully.

But nobody came from the door to welcome him; his existence was apparently forgotten by the whole world. In another ten minutes he saw the Melport brougham that had brought them, creeping slowly up to the house. Egbert went round to the man, and told him to drive to the stables and wait for orders.

From the length of Geraldine's absence, Mayne could not help concluding that the impression produced on her father was of a doubtful kind, not quite favorable enough to warrant her in telling him at once that her husband was in waiting. Still, a sense of his dignity as her husband might have

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

constrained her to introduce him as soon as possible, and he had only agreed to wait a few minutes. Something unexpected must, after all, have occurred. And this supposition was confirmed a moment later by the noise of a horse and carriage coming up the drive. Egbert again looked over into the open park, and saw the vehicle reach the carriage entrance, where somebody alighted and went in.

"Her father away from home perhaps, and now just returned," he said.

He lingered yet another ten minutes, and then could endure no longer. Before he could reach the lawn door through which Geraldine had disappeared it opened. A person came out and, without shutting the door, hastened across to where Egbert stood. The man was a servant without a hat on, and the moment that he saw Mayne he ran up to him.

"Mr. Mayne?" he said.

"It is," said Egbert.

"Mr. Allenville desires that you will come with me. There is something serious the matter. Miss Allenville is taken dangerously ill, and she wishes to see you."

"What has happened to her?" gasped Egbert breathlessly.

"Miss Allenville came unexpectedly home just now, and directly she saw her father it gave her such a turn that she fainted, and ruptured a blood-vessel internally, and fell upon the floor. They have put her to bed, and the doctor has come, but we are afraid she won't live over it. She has suffered from it before."

Egbert did not speak, but walked hastily beside the man-servant. The only recollection that he ever had in after years of entering that house was a vague idea of stags' antlers in a long row on the wall, and a sense of great breadth in the stone staircase as he ascended it. Everything else was in a mist.

Mr. Allenville, on being informed of his arrival, came out and met him in the corridor.

Egbert's mind was so entirely given up to the one thought that the life of his Geraldine was in danger, that he quite forgot the peculiar circumstances under which he met Allenville, and the peculiar behavior necessary on that account. He seized her father's hand, and said abruptly,

"Where is she? Is the danger great?"

Allenville withdrew his hand, turned, and led the way into his daughter's room, merely saying in a low, hard tone, "Your wife is in great danger, sir."

Egbert rushed to the bedside and bent over her in agony not to be described. Allenville sent the attendants from the room, and closed the door.

"Father," she whispered feebly, "I cannot help loving him. Would you leave us alone? We are very dear to each other, and perhaps I shall soon die."

"Anything you wish, child," he said with stern anguish; "and anything can hardly include more." Seeing that she looked hurt at this, he spoke more pleasantly. "I am glad to please you — you know I am, Geraldine — to the utmost." He then went out."

"They would not have let you know if Dr. Williams had not insisted," she said. "I could not speak to explain at first — that's how it is you have been left there so long."

"Geraldine, dear, dear Geraldine, why should all this have come upon us?" he said in broken accents.

"Perhaps it is best," she murmured. "I hardly knew what I was doing when I entered the door, or how I could explain to my father, or what could be done to reconcile him to us. He kept me waiting a little time before he would see me, but at last he came into the room. I felt a fulness on my chest, I could not speak, and then this happened to me. Papa has asked no questions."

A silence followed, interrupted only by her fitful breathing: —

> A silence which doth follow talk, that causes
> The baffled heart to speak with sighs and tears.

"Do you love me very much now, Egbert?" she said. "After all my vacillation, do you?"

"Yes — how can you doubt?"

"I do not doubt. I know you love me. But will you stay here till I get better? You must stay. Papa is sure to be friendly with you now."

"Don't agitate yourself, dearest, about me. All is right with me here. Your health is the one thing to be anxious about now."

"I have only been taken ill like this once before in my life, and I thought it would never be again."

As she was not allowed to speak much, he remained holding her hand; and after some time she sank into a light sleep. Egbert then went from the chamber for a moment, and asked the physician who was in the next room, if there was good hope for her life.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"It is a dangerous attack, and she is very weak," he replied, concealing, though scarcely able to conceal, the curiosity with which he regarded Egbert; for the marriage had now become generally known.

The evening and night wore on. Great events in which he could not participate seemed to be passing over Egbert's head; a stir was in progress, of whose results he grasped but small and fragmentary notions. And, on the other hand, it was mournfully strange to notice her father's behavior during these hours of doubt. It was only when he despaired that he looked upon Egbert with tolerance. When he hoped, the young man's presence was hateful to him.

Not knowing what to do when out of her chamber, having nobody near him to whom he could speak on intimate terms, Egbert passed a wretched time of three long days. After watching by her for several hours on the third day, he went downstairs, and into the open air. There intelligence was brought him that another effusion, more violent than any which preceded it, had taken place. Egbert rushed back to her room. Powerful remedies were applied, but none availed. A fainting-fit followed, and in two or three hours it became plain to those who understood that there was no Geraldine for the morrow.

Sometimes she was lethargic, and as if her spirit had already flown; then her mind wandered; but towards the end she was sensible of all that was going on, though unable to speak, her strength being barely enough to enable her to receive an idea.

It was a gentle death. She was as acquiescent as if she had been a saint, which was not the least striking and uncommon feature in the life of this fair and unfortunate lady. Her husband held one tiny hand, remaining all the time on the right side of the bed in a nook beside the curtains, while her father and the rest remained on the left side, never raising their eyes to him, and scarcely ever addressing him.

Everything was so still that her weak act of trying to live seemed a silent wrestling with all the powers of the universe. Pale and hopelessly anxious they all waited and watched the heavy shadows close over her. It might have been thought that death felt for her and took her tenderly. She sighed twice or three times; then her heart stood still; and this strange family alliance was at an end forever.

THOMAS HARDY.

From Fraser's Magazine.

THE PUBLIC CAREER AND PERSONAL CHARACTER OF FRANCIS BACON.*

BY JAMES ROWLEY.

THE subject of this paper, difficult as it is even to men of exceptional knowledge and capacity, has yet two conspicuous advantages — its limits are marked with tolerable distinctness, and the area those limits inclose is not too wide to be fairly taken in by any mind of average capacity. It is true that to most the mere mention of the name "Lord Bacon" suggests a field of intellectual labor that stretches far beyond the horizon of all ordinary and of most extraordinary observers; but that is because those that think and talk about Lord Bacon generally think and talk about the writer of the "Novum Organum" and "History of Henry VII.," not about the learned counsel, the attorney-general, the lord chancellor. My business at present is exclusively with the latter. Not only too is the range of the subject distinctly limited, but also the facts it deals with have been fairly ascertained. Thanks to Bacon's own care in preserving the letters and other documents that reveal or illustrate his actions, and the loving diligence of a succession of scholars — of whom Mr. James Spedding is the latest, fullest, and worthiest — the most eventful passages of his life have been laid bare to the satisfaction of rational curiosity. There is not much dispute about what Bacon actually said and did on the occasions which supply the most abundant matter for controversy; it is almost invariably on the right interpretation of his sayings and doings that the disputants join issue. Bacon's apologists do not deny that he had been nobly befriended by the man against whose life he pleaded in court, that he watched — so far as we know, without flinching — the agonies of a half-crazy parson in whose unpreached sermon the king professed that he saw most dangerous treason, that he allowed the reigning favorite to write him letters desiring him as chancellor to show all the favor he might to particular suitors, that he took presents from parties to causes in his court whose cases were still undecided, and that he was active in many of the transactions that the historians of James's reign have visited with emphatic reprobation; but they maintain that in most of these alleged misdeeds Bacon was justified by their circumstances or by the practice of the time, and in the

* This paper is the substance of a lecture given at the Museum and Library, Bristol, in February last.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

remainder that his sin was not of so dark a hue as not to be easily forgiven by fellow-sinners. Even over the minor details of his actions there is little wrangling.

Now the proper method of treating this subject seems to be, to fix the attention solely on Bacon as a lawyer and statesman, forgetting for the moment that he was ever anything else. If we do not carefully separate the chancellor from the philosopher, or rather — to take a hint from the poet Cowley — contemplate the chancellor of King James's laws apart from the chancellor of nature's laws, do not succeed in isolating the former, we shall be sure to go astray. Bacon chose to cast in his lot with the Cecils, Howards, and Egertons of the day, and as a Cecil, a Howard, or an Egerton he must consent to be judged. In his will "he leaves his name and memory to men's charitable speeches, and to foreign nations, and to the next ages." But every one whom fortune or his own energy has lifted into high place does pretty much the same, though he may not often say as much. One, however, cannot help suspecting that the spoken appeal of the author of the "Essays" and "Advancement of Learning" has been more potent with the dispensers of posthumous justice than the dumb appeal of his unlettered brethren. Literature has taken charge of all alike, and literary men are not the "kinless loons" that Cromwell's Scottish judges were; the justice they deal out to historical characters of their own craft is more generously tempered with mercy than that which they deal out to those whose kinship they do not acknowledge. In this there is nothing to be surprised at, and little to blame; working in the full sunlight of a grand intellectual reputation, literature can hardly help being dazzled. But at present my course is clear; strictly speaking, it is to Viscount St. Albans, not Francis Bacon, that we must now give our attention.

Yet, comparatively narrow as our field is thus made, there is in it, as experience has shown, ample scope for criticism and controversy. Bacon's public career has provoked a good deal of both; of the latter something more than its fair share. For the criticism I make no apology. The subject demands it; I must only take care that it be as just as my knowledge, insight, and critical gift permit.

Bacon's public career stretches over thirty-seven years. He sat in every Parliament — nine in all — that was called between his twenty-fourth and sixty-first years, being a member of the Commons' House in all but the last, in the last being for a time not only a member of the Lords' House, but in a certain sense its leading member. There is no special distinction about his Parliamentary career, though constituencies and fellow-members seem to have been sensible of his fine qualities. Middlesex chose him to one Parliament, Cambridge University to another, the latter carrying him off from Ipswich and St. Albans, which had also elected him. But the time had not yet come when men could rise to what Bacon seems to have sought after — power, honor, and wealth — by the Parliamentary ladder alone; and Bacon, though not undistinguished, cannot be said to have shone as a Parliament man. The day for shining in Parliament had, however, not yet dawned. His name is found in the debates from the very first, appears with increasing frequency in every successive Parliament or session of Parliament, and is now and then conspicuous in originating, supporting, or pushing forward important measures. There are two or three noticeable things about his notions and behavior in the Commons and the sentiments of the other members regarding him. He had a somewhat higher conception of the Parliamentary functions than prevailed in the sixteenth century. Thinking it unworthy of a great nation that its representatives should be called together merely to vote money to the crown, he not only strove to give the appearance of a more dignified purpose and a loftier tone to the debates, but also did somewhat to take away their reproach by introducing several measures of public utility himself. One of these, for the repeal of superfluous laws, on which he tried to awaken some degree of interest in Elizabeth's last Parliament, is notable as showing Bacon's forecast of a monstrous abuse, and attempted anticipation of a great reform of modern times. Even in speaking on a subsidy bill — a not very inspiriting subject — he is seen endeavoring to pitch the note of the discussion a little higher than honorable gentlemen were accustomed to, and to stir up within the Commons some sense of their own dignity.

It is also honorable to Bacon that the Commons appear to have had a large measure of faith in his capacity, honesty, and discretion. He was their favorite — in his mature days perhaps their invariable — reporter of committees, as the chairman was then called, and of conferences with the king or the Lords: and so entirely did the Commons trust him that they more than once put him at the head of commit-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tees charged to carry out objects that he had strongly opposed. Many proofs of this unlimited confidence in his punctual fulfilment of a trust are found in those stirring passages of Parliamentary history connected with the impositions, purveyance, and other grievances over which James's first Parliament was so fretful. For part of this time Bacon was solicitor or attorney general, and took the side of the crown on every disputed question with a promptitude and adhered to it with a steadiness that have drawn down on him the scorn of some modern writers; yet the House would have him and no other as the leading member of committees appointed to search for precedents, argue before the Lords, or address the king, in favor of opinions that were the reverse of his own. And in no single instance did the House show the slightest dissatisfaction with him; in the only one in which his conduct seemed open to exception, "the acclamation of the House was" — these are the very words of the report — "that the course" Bacon had taken "on the spur of the moment" in the king's presence "was a testimony of their duty and no levity."* Mr. Spedding clearly has excellent grounds for his opinion that the Commons found Bacon to be the man among them in whose hands "any business of delicacy or difficulty always prospered best."

And in the Parliamentary element Bacon's bearing was self-possessed, dignified, and manly. So far as we know, Parliament seldom heard an intemperate word fall from his lips; though his opinions were often ill-received by the majority in the most exciting debates, he maintained an unruffled serenity; he seems to have never once forgotten himself when upholding unpopular views. For after the great queen's death the temper of the Commons changed; the premonitory symptoms, though none understood them, of a great revolution began to show themselves; the House not seldom betrayed a disposition to fall into an ungovernable mood without precedent in Elizabethan Parliaments. This was a new experience to Bacon. He had hitherto striven to raise Parliament out of the region of humdrum, but had never dreamed of its asserting a position in the State injurious to the prerogative of the crown. A state of things in which the Commons should be supreme would have been to him a revelation of political chaos, a confusion worse confounded. To Bacon the idea that the affairs of a great nation should be controlled, and its policy dictated, by a miscellaneous collection of country gentlemen, lawyers, and merchants, would have been ridiculous. Accordingly, from the beginning of the seventeenth century Bacon held steadfastly to the crown. He took the same side as King James on every public question, was diligent in seeking arguments in favor of every pet scheme of the king's, pushed himself into the front of the king's partisans in every dispute, in a word placed his reasoning and persuading powers absolutely at the king's disposal. It would not be easy to find a trace of a difference of opinion between the king and Bacon during the first fourteen years of Stuart rule.

For all that, it is not necessary to pronounce Bacon a servile tool of tyranny, though some have not scrupled to do so. It is easy to point out the close association between Bacon's worldly interests and the course he pursued, and to hint that like many philosophical politicians he had a turn for swimming with the stream. It is true that during a part of this time Bacon was hungry for office, during another part actually in office, the paid servant of the crown; but there is nothing to show that the opinions he expressed were not the opinions he held. We may have our suspicions, may be eager to find indications that the motives ascribed to him did not operate, but we can confidently assert that in Bacon's Parliamentary career there is nothing to fix a dishonorable stain on his name. If he went with the crown now, whereas he had once shown another inclination, the circumstances were altered. Instead of lying in stagnation, Parliament was now instinct with life. Bacon had now little reason to fear that the Lower House would settle down into a mere political mechanism for increasing the royal revenue. His apprehension may now have been that it would show too great activity, and advance pretensions irreconcilable with order and good government, and Mr. Spedding actually credits him with such an apprehension; and Bacon, whose longing for good government was undoubtedly a genuine feeling, may have been convinced that with the crown only lay the possibility of giving the nation that one priceless blessing. For this is the theory on which his champions rest their vindication of his conduct in attaching himself to the court. What his eyes desired to see above all things was the establishment of rational principles and sound methods of government; there was but one means of secur-

* Spedding, iii. 172.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

ing this, he thought, the royal prerogative, and so he was ready to defend the royal prerogative against all attacks. Unless I am much mistaken in my reading of Bacon's political career, this is a well-founded theory; it seems to me to rhyme accurately with everything we know of his sayings and doings as a political thinker, a Parliamentary speaker, and a minister of State. If this be so, there is little to object to in Bacon's conduct as a Parliament man. The case against him would have little plausibility if it drew its materials from this province of his life alone.

But the far more active sphere of Bacon's political labors lay outside Parliament, and to it belong those parts of Bacon's conduct over which historians and moralists have shaken their heads, and regarding which thoroughly informed critics are not yet agreed as to their verdict. Into this sphere Bacon did not find admission so easy as into Parliament. He had to wait for nearly a quarter of a century and to sit in seven Parliaments before he was appointed to any office under the crown, or was even given any permanent public employment. Why he was kept in the antechamber so long has never been satisfactorily explained. His transcendent ability seems to have been admitted from the first; his father, who had been for twenty-one years among the most faithful and valued of Elizabeth's ministers, had designed and partly trained him for the service of the queen; he was himself more than willing to be dedicated to the same service; the man highest in the confidence of the sovereign was his close connection, for some years the young noble whom the queen delighted to honor was his enthusiastic friend and vehement advocate, for a time the royal ear was open to his own pleadings; one could hardly conceive an aspirant with greater advantages, internal and external, better gifted or better circumstanced. Yet, though a seeker as early as 1580, he was not a finder of what he sought until 1607, when he was made solicitor-general. He had certainly been before this one of the learned counsel to both Elizabeth and James, and an occasional bit of employment had been thrown him, in which he did his part so well that it is surprising he did not get more. It would have been well for his fame, however, had he been passed over in one too notorious case; his appearance in court against his benefactor, Essex, and his acceptance of 1,200*l.* (about 6,000*l.* now), the fine of one of Essex's less unlucky associates, still make a dark blot on his memory, which, to my mind, no amount of apologetic literature will ever wholly wash away. The fact remains that the greatest intellect of his time was kept shivering in the shade for two-thirds of his working life.

Some think that the Cecils, father and son, looked with a jealous eye on their young kinsman, and seeing in him a possible obstacle to their own designs, craftily poisoned their mistress's mind against him. For this notion there is nothing that can be called evidence, unless the fact that Bacon and his mother were at one time strongly suspicious of the younger Cecil — and with Lady Bacon at least suspicions were certainties — is to be taken as such. The elder Cecil gave him the reversion of the clerkship of the Star Chamber, a post worth 1,600*l.* a year, equal to 8,000*l.* now; to the younger, Bacon is almost passionate in protesting his devotion. "I do protest before God," he once wrote to Robert Cecil, "without compliment or any light vein of mind, if I knew in what course of life to do you best service, I would take it, and make my thoughts, which now fly to many pieces, be reduced to that centre." * I am nearly sure that the tardiness in Bacon's upward progress was not due to any active ill-will on the part of the Cecils.

Some think that the deep offence that Bacon gave the queen by his unexpected display of spirit in the Parliament of 1593, when he helped to spoil an ingenious plan for entrapping the Commons into an acknowledgment of a co-ordinate power in the Lords over money bills, thrust him back from the door at a critical moment. There is no doubt that the queen was greatly displeased on this occasion, and denied the offender admission to her presence for a considerable time. Yet patience and prudent management brought back the queen's favor, though it did not bring the preferment his soul longed for. Elizabeth died, and all that Bacon gained from the new king was a pension of 60*l.* a year, security in his position of learned counsel, and the cheap honor of knighthood: more than four years had yet to pass before the coveted solicitorship was given him.

It might be thought that Bacon was unfortunate in his choice of a profession. That a man whom so fastidious a critic as Joubert decides to have been "a grand and noble intellect," and who was fully alive to his own powers, should have elected to win his way to wealth and learned leisure through

* Spedding, iv. 247.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The codeless myriad of precedent,
That wilderness of single instances, called the law of England, is not exactly what we should have expected. Bacon wrangling with Coke about the reseizure of the lands of a relapsed recusant! * Cutting blocks with a razor is a most inexpressive image of such a proceeding; a Beethoven or a Wagner grinding "Yankee Doodle" on a barrel-organ daily from morning to evening would be more like the thing. But it was only when all other avenues were apparently closed against him that Bacon took seriously to practising the law.

Perhaps the true reason of Bacon's being kept waiting so long lies nearer the surface. May it not have been that both Elizabeth and James were unwilling to take him into their service because they thought him unfit for it? The most excellent of Elizabeth's many royal excellences, historians tell us, was a keen insight into character and a readiness to be served by available merit, wherever found; it is well-nigh inconceivable that she would have declined to employ Bacon had she been assured that to employ him would have been for her advantage and the nation's. And James simply picked up the reins as they had fallen from Elizabeth's hands; the early part of his reign was merely a continuance of his predecessor's so far as the change of charioteers allowed. It is not unlikely — there are not a few touches in Bacon's biography that suggest it — that Bacon was regarded at court rather as a thinker than as a man of action, a speculative dreamer rather than an efficient worker. Now, the clerkship of the Star Chamber was just the place for such a man; its income, managed with ordinary prudence, would have given him abundant leisure to dream on things to come and to build up great instaurations to his heart's content. And if Mr. Mill, the man in possession, had no sense of his responsibilities, and kept Bacon out of the place for nineteen years by living unconscionably long, that was not Elizabeth's fault or Burghley's. Now and then Bacon himself betrays a consciousness of unfitness for the work he was so eager to undertake. Writing to Bodley in 1606, he says: "I do confess, since I was of any understanding my mind hath in effect been absent from that I have done; and in absence are many errors which I do willingly acknowledge; and amongst the rest this great one that led the rest; that knowing myself by inward calling to be fitter to hold a book than to play a part, I have led my life in civil causes; for which I was not very fit by nature, and more unfit by the preoccupation of my mind." * Too much significance, however, may easily be given to words like these; so much depends on the humor a man is in when he writes them. Other passages may be found in Bacon's letters and papers that speak a different language.

One thing, however, is clear; if Bacon failed to win preferment in early life, it was not through any excess of modesty or backwardness in asking. There is no blinking the fact, Bacon was a sturdy beggar all his life. He prayed, and never fainted; he kept steadily knocking at the doors of office; no disappointment disheartened him, no rebuff daunted him; it would be curious to calculate what proportion of his extant letters thank for past or solicit future favors or support. The result of such a calculation would, I am afraid, be humiliating. Almost his first letter that has survived, one to his uncle Burghley, had "no further errand but to commend unto your lordship the remembrance of my suit which then I moved unto you;" † almost the last entreats Sir Humphrey May "to sound the Duke of Buckingham's good affection towards me before you do move him in the particular petitions." ‡ And the forty-five years of Bacon's life that lie between these two letters are of a piece with such a beginning and ending. His first suit, which lasted for some seven years, fairly over, no practice coming, and Mr. Mill, the Star-Chamber obstructive, being insensible to his clear duty, Bacon in his thirty-third year, briefless barrister as he was, addressed himself to the task of winning the vacant attorney-generalship. His rival was Edward Coke, the great common-lawyer; but Coke's massive legal knowledge was, Bacon thought, more than counterbalanced as an advantage by the warm friendship the queen's favorite, Essex, felt for himself. Essex certainly did his part thoroughly; he made his friend's case more than his own, spending, as he said, "his utmost friendship, credit, and authority" in promoting Bacon's suit, and during fourteen months of hot strife never letting slip an opportunity of pressing Bacon's claim and "driving in a nail for the negative of the Huddler," § as Bacon phrases

* Spedding, iii. 1–5.

* Spedding, vol. iii. 253.
† Ibid. i. 12.
‡ Ibid. vii. 548.
§ Ibid. i. 263.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

it in one of his letters, "Huddler" being Coke's nickname with Bacon and Essex, It was all lost labor, however; the Huddler got the place. But his appointment left the solicitorship vacant; and a fight began for the solicitorship which was kept up for eighteen months with an almost passionate, certainly injudicious, pertinacity on Essex's part. Essex's letters to Bacon testify to his utter abandonment of himself to his friend's service. In one he writes, "She [that is, the queen] in passion bade me go to bed, if I could talk of nothing else. Wherefore, in passion I went away, saying while I was with her I could not but solicit for the cause and man I so much affected."* In another he comforts Bacon by telling him that the queen "doth not contradict confidently, which they that know the minds of women say is a sign of yielding."† Bacon threatened that, if refused the place, he would retire with a couple of men to Cambridge, and there spend his life in studies and contemplations.‡ But neither Bacon's threats, nor Essex's ardor, nor yet the colder advocacy of Burghley, availed Bacon aught; the solicitorship went to another. Bacon swallowed his disgust, and did not retire to Cambridge. In a few months Egerton's elevation to the office of lord keeper threw open the mastership of the rolls to legal ambition, and Bacon at once turned a longing eye on the place. Essex was at Plymouth, deep in preparations for the grand enterprise against Cadiz, which in a month's time was to make his own fame and the nation's ring through Europe. Yet he responded promptly and heartily to his friend's appeal. If Bacon was once more disappointed it was not through lack of zeal in Essex. While this suit was still waiting for a final answer, others were going on, the ghosts of which flit across Mr. Spedding's pages. One of these is remarkable as involving in its rejection the gravest consequences, if the suitor is to be believed. "I will," writes Bacon to his uncle, "use no reason to persuade your lordship's mediation but this: that your lordship and my other friends shall in this beg my life of the queen; for I see well the bar will be my bier, as I must and will use it rather than that my poor estate or reputation shall decay. But I stand indifferent whether God call me or her Majesty."§ That is, if I do not get this post, I will take to practising at the bar, and the bar is sure to be the death of me. He did not get the post, but he was, notwithstanding, no more careful to die than he had been before to retire to Cambridge. He then tried to make a bargain with Egerton, offering to give up the reversion of the clerkship of the Star Chamber to one of Egerton's sons, if Egerton would only induce his mistress to make him master of the rolls. But Egerton declined the offer — had, perhaps, no mind to so one-sided a compact. About this time the death of Sir William Hatton created a vacancy of another kind, and Bacon was as ready to take Sir William's place in his family and household, as he had ever been to serve the queen. Essex rushed with characteristic energy and fire into this new suit of Bacon's, but his fervent pleadings went the way of their predecessors; the lady preferred to be consoled by Coke, who thus a second time carried off a coveted prize from Bacon.

To go through the list of Bacon's applications for good things, that were nearly always refused him, in the later years of Elizabeth's and earlier of James's reign, were a wearisome and thankless task. It is worth while, however, to take a passing glance at the motives he sometimes assigned for his eagerness to get them. In 1600 he petitioned the queen for an estate. There were three feelings at work, he declares, to make him ask the favor — his love for his mother, who he mightily desired might carry to her grave the comfort of seeing her son with an unincumbered property, his desire to secure Gorhambury, and be able to entertain her Majesty there, and "to trim and dress the grounds for her Majesty's solace," and his wish to be freed "from the contempt of the contemptible, that measure a man by his estate."* This last is that ignoblest of motives which the great-hearted Diogenes of our day has called "striking the surrounding flunkeys yellow." And a few months after James's accession, when he found a royal favor, the then dishonoring honor of knighthood, which Ben Jonson refused, within his reach, he asks for it "because of my late disgrace" — an arrest for debt, presumably — "and because I have three new knights in my mess in Gray's Inn commons, and because I have found out (the phrase is significant) an alderman's daughter, an handsome maiden, to my liking."† At that time the king

* Spedding, i. 289.
† Ibid. i. 290.
‡ Ibid. i. 291.
§ Ibid. ii. 49.

* Spedding, ii. 166.
† Ibid. iii. 80.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

never seemed so happy as when making knights; and in a few days the high-souled philosopher was able to woo his handsome maiden as Sir Francis Bacon. And having, after three years' wooing, won the handsome maiden, he proceeds to utilize her as he had before utilized his mother. Pleading anxiously with the lord chancellor for the solicitorship, he wrote: "Were it not to satisfy my wife's friends, and to get myself out of being a common gaze and speech, I protest before God I would never speak word for it." * And though one feels a shock at hearing or seeing the word "shameless" applied to any part of Bacon's conduct, yet the word will leap to one's lips in front of one passage of his life. When the death of Elizabeth put him in a flutter of expectation, and he was busy speeding self-recommendatory letters to every person possessing influence with the new king that he could claim any degree of acquaintance with, he sent one to Southampton, the man who had been tried and condemned with Essex, on the day when Bacon stood among the accusers of his former benefactor. In this he assures Southampton, "It is as true as a thing that God knoweth that this great change hath wrought in me no other change towards your lordship than this, that I may safely be now that which I was truly before." † Surely the force of philosophical effrontery could hardly farther go than this.

At last, after twenty-seven years of crushing and pushing and elbowing among the "press" of place-hunters, Bacon got his feet planted on the lowest round of his Jacob's ladder; having, in 1606, wrung from the king a promise of the solicitorship on the next vacancy, he became solicitor-general in 1607. Six years later he was made attorney-general, ten years later lord keeper, and eleven years later lord chancellor. Thus the ladder was ascended, and heaven gained! But neither in scaling nor in attainment did Bacon's craving allow him any respite. Omitting the smaller instances, I shall just look at two prominent ones. In 1612 his cousin Salisbury, high treasurer and secretary of state, died. Bacon thought he would himself make an admirable secretary, and drew up, perhaps sent to the king, an application for the place. And this brings us face to face with a very unpleasant feature in Bacon's character, his habit of flattering men in their lifetime and depreciating them after their death. Five years before he had told Salisbury: "I do esteem whatsoever I have or may have in this world but as trash, in comparison of having the honor and happiness to be a near and well-accepted kinsman to so rare and worthy a counsellor, governor, and patriot." * What is his language now? "Now that he is gone, in whose lifetime the virtues might reckon on destruction with the utmost certainty." † The inducements, too, which he suggests to James are curious: "I will be as ready as a chessman to be wherever your Majesty's royal hand will set me." ‡ James, however, chose to be his own secretary for a time. The second application is perhaps the strangest of all Bacon's proceedings in this way. Lord Chancellor Egerton having fallen ill in February 1616, Bacon jumps at the conclusion that he is going to die, and straightway pens a letter to the king worthy of careful study as a specimen both of Bacon's literary style and character. He begins by making God the king's gardener. "Your worthy chancellor, I fear, goes his last day. God hath hitherto used to weed out such servants as grew not fit for your Majesty. But now he has gathered to himself a true sage, or salvia, out of your garden." "But," he goes on to say, "your Majesty's service must not be mortal." To save it from such a fate he is of opinion that his Majesty should appoint him to the dying man's place, and points out to his Majesty that his appointment would give his Majesty the disposal of offices worth 7,600*l.* (about 40,000*l.*) per annum; a chancellor that would be ever on the look-out to prevent his Majesty being distracted with business; that was in the good graces of the Lower House, had some interest with the gentlemen of England, and would strengthen the inventive part of the council, "who now commonly do exercise rather their judgments than their inventions." This was the blowing of his own trumpet, a process for which Bacon never wanted breath; he made as little scruple to dwell on the defects of possible rivals. The Lord Coke, his old enemy the Huddler, "was of an over-ruling nature," and would ill fit "an over-ruling place," would be more useful in a financial office, and was a popular man; "and popular men are no sure mounters for your Majesty's saddle." § Two days after writing this letter he went to see Egerton. A

* Spedding, iii. 296.
† Ibid. iii. 75.

* Spedding, iv. 12.
† Quo vivente virtutibus certissimum exitium.
‡ Spedding, iv. 282.
§ Ibid. v. 241–4.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

postscript of a note to Villiers tells us the substance of the interview: "My lord chancellor is prettily amended. I was with him yesterday almost half an hour. He used me with wonderful tokens of kindness. We both wept, which I do not often." * The chancellor rallied, however, and Bacon had to keep the curb on his impatience for another year.

All through these experiences his eye often wandered to right and to left in search of an occasional windfall. At one time he offers to farm the alienations for the king at a handsome rent; at another he thinks the king ought to give him 2,000*l.* out of certain fines; at another he begged the privilege of "making a baron," that is, selling a peerage — a usual and very lucrative practice in James's reign — and pocketing the price. But it was after his fall, when suddenly flung out of the Olympus to gain which he had toiled so painfully and borne so much, that he made the most piteous appeals to Buckingham and the king. He begs for an additional pension, for the provostship of Eton, for payments anticipatory of a handsome pension already granted him, for an immediate remission of his whole sentence and restoration to the House of Lords. He even stooped to pray that an arrear of about 2,000*l.*, which had been discovered to be due to the crown by his half-brother, Sir Nicolas Bacon, should be given him. "It is a suit," he writes to Buckingham, "whereunto I may as it were claim kindred." † Towards the end of his life Bacon figures in history as a kind of St. Simeon Stylites, "battering the gates of heaven" — his heaven — "with storms of prayer."

So far for the way he took to win power in the State. But how did he use the power when won? The best that can fairly be said for him is, I think, that he used it in the main not altogether unsatisfactorily. But it should not be forgotten that the side of Bacon's public life, which can be contemplated with the nearest approach to unqualified admiration, was not connected with the direct exercise of political power. If I were asked what I believed to be Bacon's most conscious feeling regarding himself, I should answer, intellectual self-confidence. Pride of intellect, some would perhaps prefer to call it, and perhaps they would be right. From first to last Bacon leaned with implicit faith on his own intelligence; whatever else might play him false, that, he seemed to think, never could. The first article of his creed was the practical infallibility of his own judgment. When still young he told his uncle that he had "taken all knowledge for his province;" and when over forty he discerned in his nature a kind of relationship and familiarity with truth, as being "gifted with desire to seek, patience to doubt, fondness to meditate, slowness to assert, readiness to consider, carefulness to dispose and set in order." It is significant of this element in Bacon's character that on the only two occasions when he took an independent course that displeased the sovereign, he was never for a moment tempted, after he found out his mistake, into an acknowledgment that he had been wrong. He was ready to do anything to atone for his conduct; in the second instance, being chancellor, he promptly wheeled round and undid everything he had done before in the matter; but neither in the first nor in the second did he utter a single word capable of being construed into a confession of error. The theory of the unconsciousness of genius in its highest developments assuredly receives no support from Bacon's case.

Now, either from natural impulse or from motives of self-advancement, Bacon scrutinized very keenly and pondered very carefully the politics, domestic and international, the burning religious questions, the tendencies, movements, and other easily conceived manifestations of the then dominant time-spirit. Thus endowed with a piercing and discriminating intellect, and having of his own free will turned that intellect on the subjects that then engaged the attention of the rulers of men, he considered himself justified in giving advice, generally unasked, to those that needed it most, the great personages that were in the thick of the fight, and might therefore, Bacon may have thought, be the better of seeing things as the clearest pair of eyes in Christendom saw them. Accordingly Bacon from his youth up seems to have constituted himself a sort of counsel-general — unattached, but very willing to be attached — to the great and powerful. He drew up weighty papers of considerations for the queen, for Walsingham, for Cecil, for Essex, for King James, for any one in fact that was in a position to profit by the advice and bring profit to the adviser. His first occasional paper, written in his twenty-fifth year, is a letter of advice to the queen, in which he respectfully interprets to her the leading questions of the hour, and prescribes the attitude she ought

* Spedding, v, 245.
† Ibid. vii. 451.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to take towards them. Many people would look on this as presumption and monstrous self-conceit. A youth of twenty-five thrusting his views and counsel on the veteran ruler who had taken her seat in the centre of public affairs before her self-appointed adviser was born, and had watched them Argus-eyed ever since, cannot certainly be quoted as an example of all that is most graceful in youth. Yet it is worth noting how much of this volunteered advice is in harmony with the soberest judgment of the present day, and how little of the passion or prejudice of the moment is visible in it. Indeed most of these extra-official observations are rich in thought of almost priceless value; a spirit of calm contemplation, as of one that dwelt in a serener atmosphere, far above the "dust of systems and of creeds," pervades them; and to us who live on the safe side of the historic convulsions to the movements tending to which these papers belong, they seem weighty with solid practical sense as well. To give a single example: the "Considerations touching the Queen's Service in Ireland," which he sent to his cousin Robert Cecil, in 1602, to help him to see his way through the intricacies of the Irish problem then calling as loudly to English statesmen for solution as ever it has called in our own times, reveal him as not only perfect master of the subject, but as urging a policy that in most of its features every one not a fanatic now believes would have been the wisest. Let us take this extract as a sample. "Therefore a toleration of religion (for a time not definite), except it be in some principal towns and precincts, after the manner of some French edicts, seemeth to me to be a matter warrantable by religion, and in policy of absolute necessity." * Yet the one recommendation of Bacon's regarding Ireland that he lived to see carried out, the plantation of Ulster, has been emphatically condemned by the intolerant dogmatism of later years that plumes itself on being judicial history; but fact, I take it, has abundantly vindicated the wisdom of Bacon in this particular in the eyes of those who have not surrendered their natural eyesight to a theory.

But I would limit this almost unqualified commendation of Bacon's expositions of state policy to his comparatively unofficial days. When attorney-general or chancellor, he seems to have now and then allowed unworthy considerations to dim somewhat his clearness of vision, to have been a little disposed to find a solution of the question before him that would be agreeable to the king rather than one that would be just and politic. The same familiar ground furnishes us with an illustration of this. During his attorney-generalship he advised the king to prohibit absolutely the exportation of wools from Ireland, thus doing his worst to strangle in the cradle, from purely selfish purposes, a natural and growing branch of Irish industry, the suppression of which in later times did perhaps more to injure Ireland and to evoke the Nemesis under whose lash England still winces, than any other single cause. It is suggestive also to compare the tolerant course towards the Catholics that Bacon pleaded for when unemployed, with his actual treatment of the Catholics when he was attorney-general. Writing to the king in 1615, he says: "I have heard more ways than one of an offer of 20,000*l.* per annum for farming the penalties of recusants. . . . Wherein I will presume to say that my poor endeavors, since I was by your great and sole grace your attorney, have been no small spurs to make them feel your laws and seek this redemption." * But these are among the exceptional cases that prove the rule, and the rule is that Bacon's "Considerations," whether upon a war with Spain or upon Sutton's estate, upon the pacification of the Church or upon jury reform, are wise with a wisdom far beyond the wisest working wisdom of his century, having but one obvious drawback — that they were too far in advance of the times they were intended to benefit to be of much use to them. This passion for giving advice continued with Bacon to the last. Two years after his fall he writes to Buckingham: "But when I look abroad and see the times so stirring, and so much dissimulation, falsehood, baseness, and envy in the world, and so many idle clocks going in men's heads; then it grieveth me much that I am not sometimes at your lordship's elbow, that I mought give you some of the fruits of the careful advice, modest liberty, and true information of a friend that loveth your lordship as I do." †

Clear-sighted, however, as Bacon was, he was as blind as the most horn-eyed among his contemporaries to the real significance of the signs of the times. Fourteen years after his death, the deepest and broadest political upheaval that has ever convulsed English life put itself in motion,

* Spedding, iii. 49.

* Spedding, v. 102.
† Ibid. vii. 423.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and in two years more became a war that shook the firmest-based political and religious fabric in Europe to its foundations. The forces that gave birth to that upheaval were gathering, indeed must have been actively at work, in Bacon's time. Their outward manifestations were familiar, and a subject of grave reflection to Bacon. Yet his writings betray little sensibility to the "whitherward" of English politics and religion in his day as they do to the other great spiritual phenomenon that makes his age so absorbingly interesting, the Shakespearian drama. The fact is really worth more than a passing thought. Here was the most penetrating and vigilant intelligence that has ever employed itself on contemporary politics, and an imagination of rare breadth and power, entirely ignorant of the leading tendency of the politics they studied, and utterly indifferent to the noblest works of imagination that were getting produced and published within a mile's distance. The party that in its manhood scattered princes and their armies at Naseby and Worcester, and gave to England its last ruler of the old colossal type, was called by Bacon in its infancy "a small number of very silly and base people, now by the good remedies that have been used suppressed and worn out." And the picture of a contented people, a church luminous "as an heaven of stars," a learned and just bench of judges, a careful, loyal, and free-spoken council, an efficient magistracy, and the rest, that Bacon painted for the king as a New Year's gift for 1619,* would be ludicrous if it were not so sad when looked at in the lurid light that a tragic event of almost exactly thirty years later throws upon it. Bacon could gaze fixedly on the face of the sky and of the earth, but could not discern the cloud that had already risen out of the west. The words of Mr. Ruskin, slightly altered, will convey the lesson to us. "Above all things let us see that we be modest in our thoughts, for of this one thing we may be absolutely sure, that all our thoughts are but degrees of darkness." †

The story of Bacon's public acts will, I think, kindle in the unbiassed mind a very different feeling from that kindled by a study of his speculations. To me, at least, many of them are of a very questionable character, though the best informed of Bacon's biographers can see nothing in the worst of them that is not excusable. Bacon's public career has one very suspicious feature — its history is studded with facts that require elaborate explanations and apologies before any ingenuous mind can be reconciled to them. For Bacon's letters are not like Cromwell's, do not bear the stamp of a disinterested spirit on their very face; unlimited comment and explanation are necessary. One can easily fancy an essentially upright man doing now and then a thing whose blameless character is not obvious at first sight; but an essentially upright man doing so many things that require such an expenditure of explanation to show that they were all right as Bacon did, is not so easily fancied. And Bacon's justification necessitates the reversal of all that was seemingly solid in our long-established conceptions of English history in James's reign, and a reconstruction of that history on an entirely new basis. For with James's whole course of policy, and with many of the proceedings of his reign that later history has pronounced wrong, unjustifiable, ill-judged and wicked, Bacon was closely connected; the reputation of the reign must stand or fall with his reputation; it is impossible to defend or excuse him without defending or excusing the master he served under and the men he acted with. From this task of revolutionizing our thoughts regarding the character of the British Solomon and of his reign, Mr. Spedding has not shrunk; his sympathetic readers will carry away from the perusal of his pages notions the very opposite of those found in Lord Macaulay's pages, and even radically different from those given by that most scrupulous and veracious writer, Mr. Gardiner. This is the price, then, we must pay for getting Francis Bacon reclaimed to the paths of integrity: we must unlearn all that we have hitherto learned of a big section of English activity, and learn its history all over again, taking special care to change all our sinners into saints and all our saints into sinners. I am not sure whether we shall not also have to overhaul, in some measure, our old ideas of right and wrong — at any rate have to make those we strive to judge by somewhat elastic.

Perhaps the chapter of Bacon's life that looks ugliest to the casual observer, as yet a stranger to the power of explanations, is the chapter that unfolds his dealings with the young Earl of Essex. Yet Bacon's admirers find no difficulty whatever in it.

* Spedding, vi. 452.

† The essay "Of Empire" supplies another striking illustration of the dimness of even Bacon's spiritual vision. In 1625 he says of the "Second Nobles" or "Gentlemen" that kings need not apprehend "much danger from them, being a body dispersed: they may sometimes discourse high, but that doth little hurt." If he had only lived till 1645!

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

They admit that Essex worked zealously to advance Bacon's interests, became his champion against every possible rival, labored with a generous enthusiasm to win office and distinction for him, and when all his efforts failed to overcome the reluctance of the queen, gave Bacon an estate, which he afterwards sold for what would be nearly 9,000*l.* now. They assert, however, that Bacon paid for these benefits by services rendered to Essex of at least equal value — letters of advice, and such like, accepting as literal truth Bacon's own statement, "I did not only labor carefully and industriously in that he set me about, whether it were matter of advice or otherwise, but neglecting the queen's service, mine own fortune, and in a sort my vocation, I did nothing but devise and ruminate with myself to the best of my understanding, propositions and memorials of anything that might concern his lordship's honor, fortune, or service." * The obligations being thus about equal, there was no reason, they think, why Bacon should not bring into play all his powers of persuasion to insure his former friend's conviction for treason, when he was manifestly guilty of treason. Bacon, they also say, had a stronger feeling within him than friendship — a devouring zeal for the public service. Again to use his own words: "Whatsoever I did concerning that action and proceeding (the trial of Essex) was done in my duty and service to the queen and the State; in which I would not show myself false-hearted nor faint-hearted for any man's sake living." Bacon, it is clear, was more an antique Roman than a vulgar Englishman: he would cheerfully have settled the rope round the neck of his own brother to save from the slightest harm a queen or State — that had offices to bestow!

As to the first of these pleas, it can owe its validity only to the principle that all friendship is but a debit and credit account, and that, when the two sides exactly balance each other, the so-called friends are quits, their relations return to their original state, and each is at liberty to act as if he had never received from or done a kindness to the other. Bacon's apology, after his friend's death, is therefore a kind of lawyer's bill; Dr. so much advice and looking after somewhat complicated affairs,† Cr. so much zeal on various occasions and a small estate. The columns are totted up, the amounts are exactly equal; no one who knows how to do a sum in simple addition can reasonably blame Bacon for giving his professional services to the crown against Essex. Yet few, I am sure, can see without a pang the largest-brained philosopher of the modern world rising in court and coldly shutting the door of hope against the generous, unselfish, eager-hearted friend of former days who stood at bay before him gallantly fighting for his life. "I have never yet seen in any case," he said, "such favor shown to any prisoner; so many digressions, such delivering of evidence by fractions, and so silly a defence of such great and notorious treasons," * and so on, giving a keener edge to the axe by every sentence. "To this," an eye-witness reports, "the earl answered little;" and we can well believe him.

What Essex's case is in Bacon's extra-official public career Peacham's is in his official. Peacham was a Somersetshire clergyman among whose papers was found a manuscript sermon that had never been preached, in which the king's policy was assailed with virulence, and a sweeping vengeance was predicted for the king and his ministers. James took fright; the spectre of a wide-spread nefarious Puritan conspiracy rose before his mind; Peacham was seized, charged with treason, and measures were taken to make him disclose the names of his supposed accomplices. Peacham had no accomplices to disclose. Thereupon it was resolved in council to put him to the torture, and a warrant was issued to Winwood the secretary, Bacon the attorney-general and six others, to see the poor wretch tortured. The warrant was duly executed — in the words of the report that Bacon himself signed, "Peacham was examined before torture, in torture, between tortures, and after torture." The case of the luckless would-be pulpit libeller need not be pursued in detail further. Though a mighty fuss was made about it, the very record of which covers nearly forty pages of Spedding,† it is enough to say here that Peacham was tried for treason at Taunton, found guilty and left for death, the gaol fever, however, not the gallows, killing him a few months afterwards. It is surely startling to find Bacon assisting in person at the torture of a fellow-creature only thirteen years before torture was unanimously declared by the judges to be contrary to law; yet his admirers preserve

* Spedding, iii. 143.
† "Anxiety of Mind," "Mythical Lawyer's Bill."

* Spedding, ii. 229.
† v. 90–128.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

their equanimity. "All we know," pleads Mr. Spedding, "is that he did not refuse to be present at an examination under torture." Even if this were so, it could not much avail Bacon; but I submit that we know more. We know that he busied himself greatly about Peacham's case, taking the management of the process of screwing a pre-judicial expression of opinion out of the judges concerning it. We know that he wrote lightly, not to say unfeelingly, to the king regarding it: "It grieveth me exceedingly that your Majesty should be so much troubled with this matter of Peacham, whose raging devil seemeth to be turned into a dumb devil." Bacon was always very sensitive to the sorrows of kings and great placemen. We know that five years later, on being called upon to deal with "one Peacock charged with an attempt to infatuate the king's judgment by sorcery," and finding Peacock too possessed by a dumb devil, this chancellor of nature's laws recommended torture. His own words are: "I make no judgment yet, but will go on with all diligence; and if it may not be done otherwise, it is fit Peacock be put to the torture. He deserveth it as well as Peacham did."* But, another admirer urges, Bacon was doing no more than his duty in seeing Peacham tortured; he was first law officer of the crown, and as such was bound to carry out his instructions. "Why, Hal, 'tis my vocation! Hal, 'tis no sin for a man to labor in his vocation!"

Bacon's conduct as lord keeper and lord chancellor I have left myself little room to discuss. I am not aware that fault has been found with his general discharge of the duties of his office, and posterity seems to have acquiesced in his own judgment of himself: "I was the justest judge that was in England these fifty years." The two broad blemishes — to use the very mildest term possible regarding them — on his judicial career are, that he too often listened to Buckingham's one-sided applications on behalf of suitors in his court, and that he had what Shakespeare calls "an itching palm" — a few hundred pounds slipped into his hand by a litigant seldom found its way back to its original owner. Here is a sample of Buckingham's letters: "Lest my often writing may make your lordship conceive that this letter has been drawn from me by importunity, I have thought fit, for preventing of any such conceit, to let your lordship know that Sir John Wentworth, whose business I now recommend, is a gentleman whom I esteem in more than an ordinary degree. And therefore I desire your lordship to show him what favor you can for my sake in his suit, which his Majesty hath referred to your lordship: which I will acknowledge as a courtesy unto me."* With regard to the second blemish, Bacon himself, when impeached, pleaded guilty to twenty-seven circumstantially stated instances of taking gifts from suitors. But it is alleged that his guilt in these two particulars, crimson as its dye looks to the carelessly glancing spectator, fades into a comparatively neutral tint before a searching examination. Neither of his aberrations marred the character of his decisions; he read Buckingham's letter or took the suitor's money or cabinet, and then decided according to the merits of the case and the law that ruled it; no charge of having perverted justice was ever made against him; the Commons themselves, while arraigning him as a corrupt judge, never questioned even the soundness of a single decision. Moreover, most of the gratuities — that is the happy euphemism — "were received after the cause had been ended, and without relation to any precedent promise;" and the accepting such gratuities, Bacon, to use his own words, "conceived to be no fault." And to crown all, the chancellor's oath contained no clause against corruption; and corruption in a chancellor was not forbidden by either the written or unwritten law of England. These are the leading features of the case for the defence.

Many topics of great interest connected with the subject still remain; but I must be satisfied with a mere indication of one or two of them. Bacon's love of management, which he himself describes as "a middle thing between art and chance," strikes one very often in watching his ways. He took a pleasure in laying little traps, generally harmless; in arranging for a longish pedigree of events, in which the last was the thing sought; in aiming with a great show of earnestness at one object, while all the time he was intent at knocking over another. It was an innocent game of guile, appropriate in the servant of the great master of transparent kingcraft that then ruled England. Then, his extravagant flattery of the great, especially of King James, must surely be offensive to every mind not yet fortified against

* Spedding, vii. 77.

* Spedding, vii. 6.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

healthy human feeling by reasonings and explanations. And his taste for expense and love of splendor, by keeping him constantly in debt, accounts for much of what is condemnable or questionable in his career.

To conclude. The general impression of Bacon's character that a careful and certainly not unfavorably prepossessed reading of his letters and occasional papers has left on my mind is something like this. He was not a man to whom superlatives or strong language of any color can fairly be applied. He was not the "meanest of mankind." "Base" and "despicable," "generous" and "noble," are words that the historian of Bacon's life will never have occasion to draw from his vocabulary. Most assuredly his place is not with the morally great, the strong-hearted, much-enduring, self-sacrificing, heroic spirits, the Keplers and Newtons, the Miltons and Johnsons. Bacon's place is not with these; it is with the Lakes, the Cranfields, the Yelvertons, the Nevilles of his day; ranked with such men he is a respectable figure enough. It is when you withdraw him from the crew of contemporary politicians and courtiers, and set him among the great and noble of all time, that his figure shrinks and his features become commonplace. There is no trace of the heroic about his moral character; there is nothing in the man that appeals to the universal heart, nothing to stir enthusiasm, nothing to win admiration. His literary partisans struggle desperately for his good name; but the utmost that their efforts, if successful, could gain from us is, that we should refrain from condemning. His nature wanted elevation, a finer tone, a richer flavor; his motives were the motives of the crowd of self-seekers around him. We might even go farther and say that Bacon lacked common manliness. When misfortune came, he lost all sense of dignity, buried himself in his bedclothes, moaned forth his confessions of guilt, and begged piteously for mercy. "My lords, it is my act, my hand, my heart. I do beseech you, my lords, be merciful to a broken reed." Compare the demeanor of certain other historic Englishmen in the presence of circumstances immeasurably more trying: the cheery humor of More, the calm self-possession of Raleigh, the stately self-respect of Strafford, the high-toned courage of Vane, remain forever part of England's wealth and the world's; their story gives a warmer tint to life. But Bacon prostrate and crying for mercy — this is a sight that no one can care to look at; the emotion it awakens is neither sympathy nor pity. The truth would seem to be that Bacon hardly ever touches humanity on the moral and emotional side. He seems to have been incapable of deep feeling, seems hardly ever to have known what love or hate was; there are few traces of tenderness in his letters and papers, there are as few traces of malice. His was an almost passionless nature; there was little moral spontaneity of any kind. He had to jot down among his memoranda "to bear in mind the attorney's weaknesses," and to run up a column of that official's disadvantages for his future use. Mr. Spedding construes these and similar memoranda of Bacon's into a proof of his goodness of nature; an evil nature would have remembered all these against a man whose place it sought to fill without tables. This explanation makes Bacon a man who deliberately does violence to his own nature, commits treason against his own soul, for selfish ends. The fact seems rather to be that Bacon had no strong natural impulses either to good or to evil; and had his intellect told him that it would be for his interest to do a good action of a particular kind, he would have had to jot down a memorandum of it also. For in Bacon's opinion intellect held the highest place. "A man is but what he knoweth," he wrote in his thirty-fourth year; and then continues: "Are not the pleasures of the affections greater than the pleasures of the senses? and are not the pleasures of the intellect greater than the pleasures of the affections?" Yet — this knowledge —

> What is she, cut from love and faith,
> But some wild Pallas from the brain
>
> Of demons? fiery hot to burst
> All barriers in the onward race
> For power. Let her know her place —
> She is the second, not the first.

"Born for the universe" — the phrase is almost his own — Bacon narrowed, not his mind — that was incompressible — but his soul, and gave up to his worse self, to his craving after power, distinction, grandeur, everything that the philosophical mind professes to despise most, those peerless gifts which might have made his name an ennobling influence to all time.

University College, Bristol.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Contemporary Review.

SELLING THE SOUL.

"This word "Damnation" terrifies not me,
For I confound Hell in Elysium.
A sound Magician is a demigod!"
MARLOWE'S Faustus.

"CYPRIAN. Oh, could I possess that woman,
To my aid from Hell I'd summon
A potent Devil, — and my soul
Give by bond to his control;
Suffering, wheresoe'er he swept it,
Endless tortures!
DEMON (from below). I accept it."
CALDERON'S Magico Prodigioso.

"And had not his own wilfulness
His soul unto the Devil bound,
He must, with certainty no less,
His self-damnation soon have found."
GOETHE'S Faust.

WITHOUT seeking to fix the exact date when the greatest of Spanish poets wrote his lyrical tragedy of "El Magico Prodigioso," it is certain that one of the greatest of our English dramatists had previously written "The Tragical Life and Death of Dr. Faustus." It appears to have been first published in 1604 (black-letter quarto), and Calderon de la Barca was not born till 1601. The subject or ruling principle of each of these extraordinary dramas is essentially the same, and is in some respects identical with the "Faust" of the greatest poet of Germany. There are no signs whatever that Calderon knew anything of Marlowe's tragedy, either in the original or through translation. That Goethe was conversant with both the above dramas is more than probable, although there is only a general resemblance in some of his earlier scenes. Howbeit, in our own period the richly-adorned poem of Goethe has (very unjustly, in our opinion) concentrated and absorbed the exclusive attention of the literary public in his version of the profoundly interesting legend of Dr. Faustus. The learned and admirable essay by Dr. Hueffer is scarcely an exception.

The theological and philosophical arguments in the German drama differ from those of the Spanish poet, chiefly in their greater breadth and their variety of illustration; as also from those of the English Faustus, who contents himself, for the most part, with certain scholastic problems in cosmogony and astronomy, and a declaration of his determination to become a great magician. To obtain this power he is ready to barter his soul. He says: —

Why should he not? — is not his soul his own?

A Good Angel and a Bad Angel appear to him, and advance their several arguments. The latter prevails with him, and then the magnificent Kit Marlowe puts these words into the mouth of Faustus: —

Had I as many souls as there are stars,
I'd give them all!

The Bad Angel exhorts him to "despair in God, and trust to Belzebub." Still, he is not without serious misgivings; and, when he is about to sign the deed of gift with his blood, the influence of the Good Angel prevails, and the blood suddenly stops flowing.

My blood congeals — and I can write no more!

He had previously asked himself, —

Why waverest thou?
Oh, something soundeth in mine ear, —
Abjure that magic — turn to God again!

Suddenly he sees the words "Homo, fuge!" written upon his arm. It vanishes. He does not fly. It returns! Yet he will not fly. He has duly read the Latin incantation; and in the end, after stipulating for four-and-twenty years of magical power and human enjoyments of every kind, he signs a deed of gift in a regular legal form, which gives it a ghastly air of diabolical reality.

In the "Magico Prodigioso," the sale of "the immortal soul" is effected by a similar bond, which Cyprian signs with his blood; but the preliminaries are very different from the above, and the main incentive and object is different. The Mephistopheles is also a far more learned, philosophical, and courtly person. On his first appearance, as Shelley translated it (in "The Liberal"), we read, "Enter the Devil as a fine Gentleman."* The surrender of Cyprian's soul to the demon, though preceded by intense intellectual struggles, dissatisfactions with the results of philosophical studies, theological arguments, and a yearning after forbidden knowledge, is nevertheless finally determined upon for the sake of obtaining personal possession of a certain beautiful and virtuous lady. This lady (Justina) exercises an influence upon the hero (Cyprian) throughout the drama, far surpassing that of Helen in Marlowe's tragedy, and quite equal to the influence Margaret exercises over Faust. But it is of a very different kind in some respects, for Justina, besides being a boldly reasoning theologian, placing her life in peril as a heretic, is pursued

* Mr. Rossetti's alteration of devil to demon loses the familiar wit and humorous irony. In Mr. Buxton Forman's edition of Shelley, we also have, — "The demon, dressed in a court-dress, enters." It is no doubt a more direct translation of "Sale el Demonio vestido de gala;" and the rendering by Mr. D. F. MacCarthy, of "Enter the Demon in gala dress," is yet more rigidly literal; still one regrets that Mrs. Shelley's transcription from the first publication was not adopted.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY in the first instance by two lovers before Cyprian sees her. Other situations are also in the highest style of the Spanish comedy of intrigue. These two lovers are prevented from fighting a mortal duel by the mediatorial reasonings of Cyprian, who takes so much interest in what is said of the lady that he is quite prepared to fall in love with her himself. This happens shortly after. Justina's character being regarded as of immaculate purity by these three adorers, the demon adopts a peculiarly Spanish treta fraudulenta in order to damage, if not destroy, her reputation. He secretes himself in the balcony of her bed-chamber, and when the two former lovers are advancing from opposite sides under cover of the night, down slips the demon by a rope, and suddenly diving into the earth, the two lovers come close upon each other, each one believing the other had just descended by the rope! A second duel is also prevented by the entrance of Cyprian. His love is of course much troubled by what they tell him. In some sort he is glad of it, as they agree to give her up as an unworthy object, and this relieves him of their rivalry; but partly he disbelieves the scandalous statement, and in any case his passion is too engrossing to be turned aside. He throws off his student's dress, and orders a rich court suit, with sword and feathers; away with books and studies, for "love is the homicide of genius." He calls to his servants Moscon and Clarin: —

> Moscon, prevenme mañana
> Galas; Clarin, tráeme luego,
> Espada y plumas; que amor
> Se regala en el objeto,
> Airoso y lucido. Y ya
> Ni libros ni estudios quiero;
> Porque digan, que es amor
> Homicida del ingenio.
>
> Jornada 1.

From this point in the drama Cyprian pursues Justina with devoted passion. She does not encourage his hopes, and the demon, by reason of her purity and holiness of spirit, has no real power over her. Nevertheless, he promises her to Cyprian. And the "juggling fiend" brings the meeting about in the following fashion. In a lonely wood a phantom figure of Justina appears, which Cyprian embraces, and presently carries off in his arms, — when the following scene occurs: —

> Cypr. Ya, bellísima Justina,
> En este sitio que oculto,
> Ni el sol le penetra á rayos, etc.
>
> Jornada 3.

> Cypr. Now, O beautiful Justina,
> In this sweet and secret covert,
> Where no beam of sun can enter,
> Nor the breeze of heaven blow roughly;
> Now the trophy of thy beauty
> Makes my magic toils triumphant,
> For here, folding thee, no longer
> Have I need to fear disturbance.
> Fair Justina, thou hast cost me
> Even my soul! But in my judgment,
> Since the gain has been so glorious,
> Not so dear has been the purchase.
> Oh! unveil thyself, fair goddess,
> Not in clouds obscure and murky,
> Not in vapors hide the sun, —
> Show its golden rays refulgent!
> [*He draws aside the cloak, and discovers a skeleton.

In the brief space at our disposal in the present paper it must be obvious that no attempt can be made to give more than a synthetical view of this wonderful poem; sufficient, however, has been presented to show that it takes rank, together with Marlowe's tragedy, as the earliest of the high-class poetical, magical, amatory, philosophical, and theological treatment to which the remarkable old legend of Doctor Faustus is so manifestly open. And this would be the more palpable with respect to "El Magico Prodigioso" if we could give some of the argumentative discussions between Cyprian and the Demon; but for these, as well as the love-scenes, the reader must be referred to the original, or to the translations of Shelley as the most beautifully poetical, and to those of Mr. D. F. MacCarthy as the most complete and literal.

Highly, and justly, has Milton been eulogized for his portrait of Satan, thus redeeming the "Prince of Darkness" from the old grotesque monster with horns and tail, as described and "illuminated" in monastic missals and legends. But in the intellectual sorrow and retrospective pangs of the "archangel ruined," Milton was preceded in some degree by Marlowe, and in a direct and sustained manner, both in sorrow and intellectual grandeur, by Calderon.

> Tan galan fui por mis partes,
> Por mi lustre tan heróica,
> Tan noble por mi linage,
> Y por mi ingenio tan docto, etc.
> El Magico Prodigioso. — Jornada 2.

Here is Shelley's noble translation: —

> Since thou desirest, I will then unveil
> Myself to thee; for in myself I am

* Calderon's Dramas, translated in the metre of the original by D. F. MacCarthy.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

A world of happiness and misery;
This I have lost, and that I must lament
Forever. In my attributes I stood
So high and so heroically great,
In lineage so supreme, and with a genius
Which penetrated with a glance the world
Beneath my feet, that, won by my high merit,
A king — whom I may call the King of Kings,
Because all others tremble in their pride
Before the terrors of his countenance,
In his high palace roof'd with brightest gems
Of living light — call them the stars of heaven —
Named me his counsellor. But the high praise
Stung me with pride and envy, and I rose
In mighty competition, to ascend
His seat and place my foot triumphantly
Upon his subject thrones. Chastised, I know
The depth to which ambition falls; too mad
Was the attempt, and yet more mad were now
Repentance of the irrevocable deed: —
Therefore I chose this ruin with the glory
Of not to be subdued, before the shame
Of reconciling me with him who reigns,
By coward cession.

So powerful in its features and individuality is the portrait of Satan drawn and painted by Milton, that one cannot suppose he was at all indebted to "El Magico Prodigioso" for the hero of "Paradise Lost;" but the coincidence is surely very remarkable, and remarkable also as never having been noticed before, so far as I am aware; but I say this under correction. The Demon proceeds in a strain equally Miltonic: —

Nor was I alone,
Nor am I now, nor shall I be alone;
And there was hope, and there may still be hope,
For many suffrages among his vassals
Hailed me their lord and king, and many still
Are mine, and many more, perchance, shall be.
Thus vanquished, though in fact victorious,
I left his seat of empire, from mine eye
Shooting forth poisonous lightning, while my words
With inauspicious thunderings shook Heaven,
Proclaiming vengeance, public as my wrong,
And imprecating on his prostrate slaves
Rapine, and death, and outrage.

We must admit that Shelley's translation, being in his stately and harmonious blank verse, makes the resemblance to Milton far greater than the asonante lyrics of the original (or those of the literal translation of Mr. MacCarthy — for neither of them sound at all like Milton); the sense and purport, however, is not affected by the difference in the genius and style of the two languages.

Without searching ancient classic times, or times yet more remote, for philosophers and other celebrated men who had a "familiar demon" in frequent attendance, we may regard it as pretty certain that the sale of the human soul to the Devil in order to obtain forbidden knowledge, together with magic powers enabling the possessor to work wonders, and also to obtain unlimited enjoyments of life during a specified number of years, originated in German country towns, and probably in the form of itinerant plays and puppet-shows, as early as 1404. Some of these, or of similar kind, were subsequently printed. There was the "Wahrhaftigen Historien von denen gräulichen Sünden Dr. Johann Faustens;" Hamburgh, 1599. There was "Doctor Faustus, von J. Widman," printed in Berlin 1587, and another in the same year by Spiess. Plays on this subject, if not printed, were acted in travelling shows in Poland and in France; and it was probably not long after this period that Marlowe wrote his tragedy, and had it produced on the stage, though it seems not to have been printed till some years later.

This subject was produced in various forms during the next twenty years; but it is remarkable how closely they all held to the main principle of the early legend. A curious old theatrical pamphlet is now before me, entitled "The Necromancer, or Harlequin Doctor Faustus, as performed at the Theatre Royal in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Printed and sold at the bookseller's shop at the corner of Searle Street, and by A. Dodd at the Peacock, without Temple Bar. 1723." It is preceded by "The Vocal Parts of the Entertainment." The reader of the present day, having before his mind the vulgar comic stuff that is "said and sung" at three-fourths or more of the London theatres, and at nine-tenths of our provincial theatres, and of the theatres in all English-speaking countries — for which London managers are directly answerable — will naturally anticipate that these "vocal parts," introductory to the necromantic entertainment of "Harlequin Doctor Faustus," can be nothing else than a burlesque, and one of the most unmitigated kind. It is no such thing. The title, no doubt, is not a little misleading; but the treatment of the old legend is worthy of all respect, as the opening scene will testify: —

SCENE — A Study. The DOCTOR discovered reading at a Table. A Good and Bad SPIRIT appear.

Good Spirit.

O Faustus! thy good Genius warns;

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Break off in time; pursue no more
An Art that will thy Soul ensnare!

Bad Spirit.

Faustus, go on! — That fear is vain:
Let thy great heart aspire to trace
Dark nature to her secret springs,
Till knowledge make thee deem'd a god.

[Good and Bad Spirits disappear. The Doctor uses magical motions, and an Infernal Spirit rises.

This infernal spirit informs the doctor that his spells have been successful, and that the "King of Night" proposes to divide his power with the magician. The infernal spirit then significantly shows a paper. The good spirit again appears, and warns Faustus; but in vain, and we then have the following

INCANTATION.

Arise! ye subtle forms that sport
Around the throne of sable night,
Whose pleasures in her silent court
Are unprofaned with baleful light.

As the doctor still hesitates to sign the fatal "paper," the infernal spirit "strikes the table, and it appears covered with gold, crowns, sceptres, etc." All sorts of promises are then made, and finally the apparition of the beautiful Helen of Troy is called up. The doctor's scruples being overcome by that, he is "preparing to address Helen with fondness," when the infernal spirit "interposes," and, conditionally, "offers the paper!"

The doctor — "gazing at Helen" — signs the bond, but after this, on "attempting to approach Helen," she vanishes, together with the infernal spirit, "who sinks laughing," in the most dishonorable manner. The next scene is called "The Doctor's School of Magic;" and pupils are seated on each side of the stage to receive lessons, and "see the power of his art." Not much, however, comes of this, even though the phantom of the Stygian ferryman, Charon, proposes to show them "ghosts of every occupation." We are not favored in this old theatrical curiosity with an account of the "Harlequinade," which is to follow; and as we know nothing of the scenery, the dresses, and the music, it is impossible to form any judgment or conjecture as to its effect as a stage representation. My only object was to make apparent the earnestness with which this old necromantic legend was treated by all parties. Even the prose stories had a grim air of reality about them. In an old pamphlet I picked up when a child, one of the feats of magic performed by Dr. Faustus was during a walk in the high road near a little market-town, when, for a "pleasant wager" with some friend, he stops a wagoner, and "eats a load of hay." A moment never to be forgotten, from its startling effect upon the imagination of childhood, on reading — all in secret — the heading of one of the chapters, — "Doctor Faustus eats a load of hay!" With devouring eyes we read the account of the preposterously impossible performance, and more than half believed it.

That scenes of comedy, even of low comedy, and occasionally broad farce, have been introduced in the great majority of the numerous dramas that have been written on this subject, is well known. Even the classic Spanish of "El Magico Prodigioso" is made to stoop from its dignified earnestness and poetical altitude to indulge in several of the dullest attempts at fun, and the dreariest of humor, except in the malignant gymnastics of the demon in his several manœuvres to destroy the reputation of Justina. The "jovial fellows" in Auerbach's cellar, and certain other characters in Goethe's "Faust," are also introduced with a view to variety and relief; and the same may be urged in justification of the broad, and coarse, as well as farcical scenes introduced in Marlowe's tragedy. But with regard to these latter offences, a very acceptable exoneration may be discovered. We find it in old records of his time that one "William Bride, and one Samuel Rowled received £4 for their adycions to Dr. Faustus, in 1602," — i.e., before its first publication in quarto, and probably before it was acted. The ears of the "groundlings" of that day required to be tickled with stuff of that sort, just as in our own day the eyes, both of the groundlings and the upperlings, require — or are constantly assumed by managers to require — a grossness of an equal though a different kind. It is fairly open to opinion that Marlowe did not write the coarse nonsense in the above drama, although he may have interpolated a passage or two. For instance, — the doctor having had a quarrel with Mephistopheles on some question of astronomy, is abruptly left by the latter, and then Faustus calls upon Christ "to save distresséd Faustus' soul!" Whereupon, Lucifer and Belzebub, having been apprised by Mephistopheles of the danger of losing their prey, enter suddenly to bring him to his senses. With this view they "entertain" him with a sight of the Seven Deadly Sins, who appear in succession. One of these (viz., Envy) is certainly not unworthy of Marlowe, in his grotesque vein: —

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

I am Envy! begotten of a chimney-sweep and an oyster-wife. I cannot read, and therefore wish all books burned. I am lean with seeing others eat. O that there would come a famine all over the world! that all might die, and I live alone. Then thou should'st see how fat I'd be! But (to Lucifer) must thou sit while I stand? Come down with a vengeance!

Among other entertaining things Faustus wishes to have a good look at Hell. He exclaims to Lucifer in passionate accents, "Oh, might I see Hell — and return again safe — how happy were I then!"

After this we have more vulgar tricks, not so much like magic for the "lower orders," as conjuring tricks for country clowns; and all this we may, without offence, set down to the account of the £4 paid to "right wittie" Master W. Bride, and the very worthy and ingenious Master Rowled, for their pleasant "adycions." It may be asked, how did Marlowe relish this? Why, just as Shakespeare relished, or disregarded, the many interpolations made in his plays. Besides, these things were continually done. In those days, they didn't care a straw about such matters. But the profound tragic pathos and power of Marlowe begins to show itself as he is approaching the closing scenes of the tragedy. His Mephistopheles has previously displayed, occasionally, both pathos and dignity; and Milton found some thoughts worthy of being placed in the mouth of his grand Satan. In one of the early scenes, the devil says, in reply to a question about the infernal regions: —

Hell hath no limits, nor is circumscribed
In one self place; but where we are is Hell.
MARLOWE'S Faustus.

The closing movements in "El Magico Prodigioso" are conducted with great dignity and impassioned earnestness. Cyprian has sold his soul to the demon for various services to be rendered; but, by a puzzling kind of theological contradiction, he is doomed to die, not in fulfilment of his contract with the demon, but by public execution as one of the early Christian martyrs of Antioch. How the fiend could allow this to happen is perplexing, for surely he must have known that it would be very difficult to carry off the soul of a man who had earned the crown of martyrdom. Justina also abjures the gods of her country, and dies on the scaffold as a convert to Christianity. Having always refused herself to Cyprian in life, she very pathetically reminds him, while they are both in the condemned cell, that she had said she could only love him in death, and that now she is ready to fulfil her promise. They both declare themselves prepared to endure any tortures, and Cyprian grandly adds that one who has given his soul for her, should make light of giving up his body to God.

Cyp. Quien el alma dió por ti,
Qué hará en dar por Dios el cuerpo?
Just. Que en la muerte te queria
Dije; y pues á morir llego
Contigo, Cypriano, ya,
Cumpli mis ofrecimientos.
Jornada 3.

Soon after this scene a terrible storm shakes the whole city, to the dismay of the governor, and all the people who appear to crowd round him in the hall of justice. The last scene then opens, and discovers a scaffold, upon which the heads and bodies of Cyprian and Justina are seen; while in the air above them the demon is seated upon a winged serpent. He addresses the spectators, declaring the purity of Justina, and that the two martyrs have ascended to the "spheres of the sacred throne of God," who commands him, most unwillingly, to make this announcement. The demon than darts downward under the earth; but the pagan governor, standing firm for the State religion, assures the people that what they have just seen and heard are the enchantments effected as the last despairing act of the wicked Cyprian.

Gov. Todos estos son encantos,
Que aqueste mágico ha hecho
En su muerte.

In the preternatural workmanship — the diablerie of Goethe — the close and vivid familiarity with thaumaturgic scenes of picturesque glamor, as well as fast and frantic revels — not to speak of the apparently intimate knowledge of the secret movements of the devil's mind, prodigally displayed in his "Faust" — with all the dialogues, characters, scenery, songs, and choruses in the "Walpurgisnacht" — the great German poet may fairly be said to surpass every other; and, indeed, to put all others, except Shakespeare, far into the shade. The comical devilries interpolated in Marlowe's "Faustus" are mere clownish pretences in comparison; and even the mountain-moving and other encantaciones in Calderon's "Magico Prodigioso" are poor enough beside what is seen, said, sung, and done, after the Ignis Fatuus has led Faust and Mephistopheles into the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"true witch element" of the Hartz Mountains on May-day night. This is the very perfection of realized unreality in high fantastic incantations. But what are we to make of the last scene of this tragedy, whether we take it from the first part (as is usually done) or from the second part? As to the last scene in Marlowe's tragedy, it is worthy of special note that with regard to the three heroes of these three extraordinary tragedies, in which each hero has, by a bond sealed with his blood, sold his soul to the devil — not through a juggle, but by direct intention — Marlowe's man is the only one who is really damned. The other two, by one means or other, are "saved;" but an Elizabethan dramatist was not likely to play at fast and loose, and he therefore "gives the devil his due," and allows him to take full possession of his horror-stricken bondman. This is preceded by agonizing mental struggles and writhings to avoid what he knows to be inevitable; and few things can be more touching than the amiability and unselfishness — now brought out for the first time, as by the uprooting of his inmost depths of feeling — with which Faustus reverts to his early love of study among his dear fellow-students; while he now wishes from his heart, with scalding tears, that he had "never seen Wittenberg — never read book." And then, a few hours before midnight, he begs his friends not to imperil their own lives by coming in to his assistance, whatever cries and screams they may hear, "for nothing can save him." They take a last farewell, and Faustus calls upon the "hours" to stand still. "O lente, lente, currite Noctis equi!" The whole of this final scene is worked up with a dreadful power of ideal realization that perhaps surpasses every other scene in the entire range of tragic composition. "See where Christ's blood streams in the firmament!" He calls upon Christ, and madly endeavours to "leap up" — but something "pulls him down"! If tragic terror and the profoundest pathos of pity ever attained their utmost limits, they certainly do so in this closing scene, wherein he cries: —

> O Soul, be changed into small water-drops,
> And fall into the ocean! — ne'er be found!

We have seen how the hero of "El Magico Prodigioso" escapes from his bondholder. Let us now see how it fares with the Faust of the great German poet. We shall have a word or two to say as to the close of the second part; but, by common literary consent, the tragedy is not unfairly considered, as a clearly intelligible matter, to end with the first part. Margaret cries out with horror that Mephistopheles is coming to bear her away. The fiend calls to Faust to come to his side, or he will leave him in the same predicament as Margaret, who, he says, has been "judged." But a "voice from above says she is saved!" That is, Eternal Justice recognizes the fact that, whatever may have been her wrong-doings, they were really attributable to her brain-seething, seductive lover — the theological roué, Faust. And what becomes of him? Why, the fiend now becomes his guardian genius, having previously warned him not to stay and share the expected doom of Margaret, — and calling him to his side, vanishes with him! That the great author did not intend him to make good his damnatory bond at this time seems evident, by this close of the drama, and next by his writing a second part.

If any great author of a former date could uplift his head from the tomb, and note with astonishment what was said about him and his works at the present day, it may safely be assumed that no astonishment could surpass that of Master William Shakespeare. And this feeling would probably rise to its height on finding that Dr. Hermann Ulrici has proved that Shakespeare had, though unconsciously, a special ethical, philosophical, or theological design in each of his principal plays!* Something not unlike this might perhaps be expected in the case of Goethe, and more particularly with regard to the second part of "Faust." All the English critics, as well as the translators "fight shy" of it, so that really the great majority of foreign readers scarcely know of its existence. But a deep-seeing, subtly inventive and expounding genius at length came to light in the person of William Kyle. His cabalistic book is entitled "An Exposition of the Symbolic Terms of the Second Part of 'Faust;'" which "proves itself to be a dramatic treatment of the modern history of Germany."† Alluding to this second part, a writer in the Saturday Review observed that it was "too hopelessly mystical" not to find a great number of profound admirers in Germany. One of these students and a sincere one, let us frankly and unhesitatingly admit, is Herr Kyle. To examine this remarkably German book is of course impossible in

* See an excellent translation by Dora L. Schmitz. G. Bell, 1877.

† Nuremberg: J. A. Stein. London: Trübner & Co.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

this paper. We can only observe that an elucidatory diagram is given in the page preceding the introduction, something like a trapezium, or rather an imperfect square with nothing inside; and we must then proceed at one vigorous dash through all the physical elements, and their respective symbolic signification, etc., and come to the last act. We are here informed that "Faust has already accomplished a part of his prescribed task." "This consisted in hemming the bounds of the sea." This rather bold figure of rhetoric is explained to mean "rendering it more adapted for the service of the rational man; i.e., the great ocean of (religious) sentiment existing in the breast of the German nation." And this task "attracted the attention of ideal genius since the year 1750." The great names of Kant, Jacobi, Fichte, Schelling, Hegel, Feuerbach, Strauss, and others are then adduced as apostles of this work, which was to culminate in Faust! He is the ideal genius of rationalism, as Mephisto is "the spirit of religious dogmatism." The era of "ideal toleration now begins, and" (without a word about real toleration) "Faust is reconciled to the imagination of the world at large." How this fine finishing up releases him from his soul's bond one cannot well perceive; but we are now told that "he ascends into heaven, guided by the ideal of eternal love." It is added, casually, that "royalty, aristocracy, and the Church, are no more visible. Henceforth, ideal genius is to be regarded as the sacred power of the world at large." Finally (and it is with extreme preparations and difficulty that we are allowed ever to get to any finality) Margaret pleads for her lover and seducer, who caused her evil-doing and pathetically tragic death, and "appeals to the higher power in heaven — to the ideal of Eternal love."

Mater Gloriosa.

Komm! hebe dich zu höhern Sphären!
Wenn er dich ahnet, folgt er nach.

Our author, Herr Kyle, does not stop even here, but we must; and we take leave of him with great respect for what is evidently his sincere belief in this highly poetical omnium gatherum and cryptological gallimaufry, called the second part of "Faust."

One closing word as to the use — not the mere utility, but the public or private acts and advantages — derivable from the great preternatural powers which the three philosophical heroes of these three wonderful dramas have obtained by forbidden and perilous means. Beyond personal enjoyments and sundry magic pranks, they really seem not to have had the least idea what to do with their new faculties and endowments. Mr. Hewlett, in a recently published essay on "The Devil in English Poetry," remarks, and for the first time we believe, that the various acts of Marlowe's Faustus in necromantic travels and tricks are so comparatively trifling that the tragic scene of his terrific death seems almost like an anti-climax. This is a pregnant piece of criticism; for I consider that the same thing may very nearly be said of the other two great dramas on this subject. What use do the philosophical heroes make of their preternatural powers? The best things done — that is, the most poetical of them — are where Marlowe's Faustus exclaims, "Have I not made blind Homer sing to me?" —when he has heard the "melodious harp (of Orpheus) that built the walls of Thebes;" — and when we witness his rapturous love-scene with Helen of Troy. The rest of his thaumaturgic feats are, for the most part, coarse nonsense, whoever wrote them. In "El Magico Prodigioso" we hear of mountains being made to shift sides — of trees being frightened at the menacing groans Cyprian utters — that flowers faint away — that the birds hush their sweet melodies at his weighty incantations (prodigios graves) — that wild beasts are dazzled and confused, etc.; and after all this, Cyprian says boastively he has now made it evident that his estudio infernal has not been in vain! In fact, he is now able to teach his master (que puedo dar leccion á mi maestro). All the necromantic things Faust does, or gets done for him by Mephistopheles in Auerbach's cellar, in the Hartz Mountains, or elsewhere, are of no greater importance than the above, when we think of the dreadful price he has agreed to pay for them. If this view be accepted, we may say, and with profoundest respect for the "dead kings of melody," that another fable of Faustus may yet be imagined, though not very easily written. Thus: extreme personal enjoyments and egoistical triumphs can only charm for a few years; and the world around needs all sorts of improvements and peaceful glories. When thou hast obtained preternatural power, O Faustus of a nobler time! what wilt thou do with it?

R. H. Horne.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From Blackwood's Magazine.

A FETISH CITY.

SOME of the irreverent have long felt a suspicion that the ancients knew more about this world of ours than is accredited to them in the "Classical Atlas." Greeks and Romans did not publish the log of every ship entering their ports, nor examine the crew of each oneraria returned from parts unknown. The silence of pedantic geographers, who evidently took small pains to verify the accounts handed to them, is not to be relied on. Gentlemen of that sort feel more interest in refuting a predecessor, in triumphing over his misstated facts and mangling his theories, than in widening the general knowledge. Nevertheless a man is startled at first when local antiquaries invite him to credit Greek ruins in the Transvaal. They do wisely to put forward unquestionable evidence in support of such a statement. That has been done. Friezes, capitals, and miscellaneous objects, Greek in character beyond any doubt, have been forwarded to Cape Town from the neighborhood of Bloemhof. They are important enough to show — if one may trust the judgment of those who have examined them — that a large city once stood there, and that high civilization reigned therein. As is usual when the spell of oblivion breaks, it is suddenly discovered that the fact was known long ago. The œkist of Cape Colony, Van Riebeck, mentioned incidentally (edition of 1657, London) that far to the north lay a great city, Momotopata, adorned with temples, porticos, and columns. No one appears to have heard of the place from that time till now. Upon this evidence the ruins below Bloemhof have been called by the name Van Riebeck gives; by the by, he adds that diamonds abound there. Without committing myself to any opinion, I wish to put forward a very curious report I received on the diamond fields from a digger, very poor and very eccentric. At that time the idea of a Greek city in south Africa would have been ridiculed without mercy. I myself paid no attention to the tale, but since a Greek city is now admitted, I cannot but remember this man's declaration.

Very poor and very eccentric he was indeed. At that time rags commanded no pity on the fields, for they often contained, in their dirtiest recesses, some little store of gems which duchesses might envy. Nor were we prone to accept a miserable way of life as evidence of poverty, since examples familiar to every one inculcated caution. But seeing this man every day — for I lived just above his claim at Bultfontein — seeing him always at work, with an animated jack-jumper of a bush-boy for sole companion, I fell into the habit of wishing him good-day and luck. He seldom answered, which fact gave, perhaps, a zest to my unwearied courtesy. But when he did throw back the dirty hair from his eyes, swollen and bloodshot — the digger's eye, inflamed with dazzle of the grit, and sunshine blazing in the snowy walls of "stuff," and poisonous dust of lime that fills the air — his reply was always "Nix, mate!" Early in our acquaintance I told him to bring me his first "find," promising a fabulous price for luck. He never brought it. His bush-boy grew more bird-like and less human daily. It was not difficult to see that these poor wretches were starving, presently. The conviction struck me one day, and I invited the man to my tent, whilst intrusting his boy to my head Kaffir, Chawles.

The urchin had a due share of those extraordinary gifts with which Providence has supplied his race for our bewilderment. He mimicked successively a lion, an elephant, a baboon, an ostrich, and other animals within his experience; fought a battle, and died; imitated me; and then, whilst my Kaffirs rolled with laughter, suddenly changed to a likeness of Chawles, — all in that nervous, restless, uncomprehending manner which makes the bush-boy resemble a bird the more, the more he shows a simian intelligence. He neither laughed nor seemed to know what he was doing. His eyes never ceased to glint and turn. His small muscles quivered restlessly even when he imitated, with marvellous truth, the stately pawing of a lion. Before his performance, and immediately after, he devoured "mealies" and offal, nearly raw, in quantities to astonish even a Kaffir. And then he laid him supine, and slept, with features twitching, stomach swollen like a drum, and little thin legs extended, but unrelaxed, ready to bound upon his feet at the slightest noise. An extraordinary creature is the Bushman, — one to drive conscientious anthropologists to despair.

Meanwhile I entertained my guest. He told me that he was an Africander of Huguenot blood. He had traded on a large scale up country; but one misfortune after another had broken up his connection with the Kaffir chiefs, and reduced him to digging on Bultfontein. Compassion would

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

be quite thrown away upon many of his fellows in that state of life, but Vasson was not lucky. In four months of hard work he had found nothing. I was able to put the poor fellow into a small claim I had just purchased, where the usual percentage of half the finds for his labor should make him comfortable, and might give him a fortune. So, the next day, he set to work rejoicing.

I did not see much of Vasson after that, except on a Saturday, when he brought my diamonds, if any, and balanced accounts. The venture was fairly successful. After a time I moved to New Rush, with a round sum which my particular claim had brought me; and then, though not unlucky upon the whole, I met with an accident which laid me up for several months. It was in that time that I really made acquaintance with Vasson, who was very shy and retiring. Many stories he told to relieve the horrible tedium of my illness. My friends more prosperous were not unkind; but the business of diamond-digging in that halcyon day was too full of excitement, too cruelly checkered by ups and downs, to leave remembrance for those "shut up and left" in the struggle. A joyous word at the door, a hasty tale of somebody's luck, or of somebody's folly, exhausted the charitable impulse of my comrades. Vasson was a man of another stamp — lower, I think, but more grateful to me then. Somewhat dull, very self-conscious, silent, as are all who have passed their life among savages, and unable by constitution and habit to see the best point of his own stories, he was still my pleasantest companion — in fact, my only one. Many curious hints and details I picked up from him of life "up country," which I now regret to have let pass without a note. But one tale of his — that which I am about to transcribe — was impressed by three repetitions. I am sure I have it correct. After hearing, the reader may decide for himself whether Cape Town antiquaries are right in identifying the ruins below Bloemhof with the ancient Momotopata.

In 1861 Vasson went up towards "the lakes" with a train of five wagons, carrying about £5,000 worth of goods, cotton, gunpowder, cutlery, and the like. Even at that time the trade was not what it had been. Competition had set in, and, as a necessary consequence, a reckless system of credit. Though the great chiefs still held themselves bound to one or other trader, they began to cease coercing their inferiors. These, unrestrained by pride, and incapable of balancing the advantages of honesty, did not regard their bargains as sacred. They took what they could get, promised everything, and performed as little as possible. Under sufficient pressing, the kings would still perpetrate horrible tortures upon a swindler; but the ferocity of their justice deterred humane traders from appealing to it, the more especially since one serious word from his black suzerain would have stopped any chief — which word was not pronounced. In fact, the monopoly was breaking up. But without monopoly, in these days of enterprise and universal speculation, savage trade cannot be carried on. I must ask the reader to think out for himself the necessity of this case, since I have no room to demonstrate it. His reflections will be greatly aided by a short conversation with any merchant who has commercial relations with Africa, with the far East, and such latitudes.

Vasson understood his business, and he foresaw the dead-lock which has since come about. He resolved to leave the track, already too much beaten by Jews and carpet-baggers, who, getting their own goods on credit, could afford, in a dishonest sense, to sell them on the same terms. After eighteen months' wandering amongst old customers, he reached the northern limit of the Matabele country. That warlike people claim authority over all bordering tribes; and if the king had known that one of "his traders" had ventured across the frontier, it might have cost that daring man his life. But Vasson was well acquainted with the risk. The Matabele keep a line of desert round them, like the ancient Suevi. Their ferocious bands constantly traverse it, but Vasson trusted to his own vigilance, and the superhuman cunning of his bush-boys. These people to the trader are more than dogs to the sportsman. My friend's oxen and horses were all "salted" — that is, had suffered and survived the attacks of the tzetze-fly; with them he confidently ventured into parts unknown; and upon leaving the trade-route, he followed a course due westward, in about the latitude, as he thinks, of Sofala.

The desert barrier of the Matabele is about thirty miles wide, beyond which, as they tell you, extends a country to which "no man comes nor hath come since the making of the world." That was the question which Vasson proposed to test. A week's journey through lands where his oxen found abundance of forage, showed him that the Matabele in this respect as

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

in others, are indifferent to the truth. He came upon a district well wooded, full of game, and not uncultivated, though the people remained invisible. They had cause to hide, with such savage neighbors. Vasson scouted assiduously, but failed to discover so much as a farm-hut. He had not yet quite passed the area of veldt lands, and with some judgment and risk could take his wagons in a line tolerably straight. Twenty Hottentots and Bastards well armed made his company, besides half-a-doxen teamsters, and as many bush-boys. They had stood by him in worse fights than he was likely to encounter.

Where there is cultivation there must be people, and where people, trade. For the raw material appeared in plenty, and if these barbarians did not yet know the delight of cotton cloths and rum, business would be only the more profitable. Exciting work it is to push through an unknown country when the population remains obstinately out of sight, but African traders of the old school do not easily take alarm. Nevertheless, when he had marched for three weeks on end through this peopled solitude, passing never a road, seeing no house nor any inhabitant, Vasson began to feel anxious. For his life he entertained no fear at all, but a thousand accidents might wreck his fortune; and his Hottentots, afraid, like all negroes, of the unknown, grew more and more gloomy as they advanced. Game, however, showed in plenty, and thus the men escaped all pretence of hunger, that supreme excitement of insubordination and alarm.

After three weeks' steady journeying they found themselves before a chain of hills which barred their course. The vegetation had become more dense, and each day it grew more difficult to force the wagons on. Vasson announced that if from their tops no satisfactory prospect could be seen, he would turn back, and try districts eastward of the Matabele, which are known, indeed, but rarely visited. Accordingly, he left the wagons there, and climbed the nearest hill with a few trusty Hottentots. A day and a half brought him to the top, and from a clear knoll he looked across the plain below. First to catch his sight was a great river flowing northward, along the foot of the high ground. Its banks, thickly wooded, were patched with clearings of lighter green, which showed more frequent towards the left, where a long space seemed to mark a town. Not less than twenty miles of country lay before Vasson's eye, so far as he could judge, and it was all peopled and cultivated. He took rough bearings of a kloof or pass which seemed likely to be practicable for his wagons, and returned in great contentment. Half-way back he met a couple of the men left in charge escorting a number of strangers. The latter halted, whilst the Hottentots delivered their message. They brought overtures of friendship from an unknown sovereign. Vasson instantly produced his flask, and opened communication. The ambassadors were much like any other negroes — almost naked, well-shaped, and snub-featured. Their ornaments and cloths showed no sign of intercourse with Europeans, at which view the trader rejoiced. They wore a smiling and gentle expression, and carried no arms. The one peculiarity which struck Vasson was their mode of arranging the hair — that distinctive mark among negro tribes. These people shaved the crown of the head, and twisted their wool back over a pad from forehead to nape. They spoke Matabele with some difficulty.

The purport of their message was an invitation to the royal kraal. They said that the white man's presence had been reported to their king long ago, to his great satisfaction. He wished no better than to trade, and he would make himself responsible for the white man's stock. In earnest of his good intentions, he had sent these officers to guide the travellers, intrusting them with presents of food. All this is so usual on the part of a negro monarch that Vasson did not feel surprise. Though omitting no precaution, he followed the ambassadors readily. They did not lead him through the kloof which his sagacity had chosen, but guided the wagons by a longer route, perhaps more convenient, but toilsome enough.

It is hard work to gather details from an African trader. A negro is a negro to him, a king is a king, and his palace is sufficiently described by the noun-substantive. All that occurred to Vasson as worth mentioning about this people was, that they seemed more intelligent and better-tempered than the warrior tribes with whom he had hitherto done business. They were fairer, perhaps; but in a negro kraal of the interior every shade of complexion may be noticed, from soot-black to bronze-yellow. Their features, too, were comparatively regular, but scarcely more so than in other cases. No exercise of memory could recall anything more peculiar about king or subjects. His majesty received the guest with usual ceremonies, raised him a large hut, and showed a per-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

fect bewilderment of joy at the presents offered. He had never seen a white man before; and such European manufactures as had hitherto made his choicest spoil had been won from marauding Matabele. The king was young and good-looking. He possessed some hundreds of wives, a little army of caboceers, and used such ceremonial as is affected by other negro potentates. Trade proved to be excellent. The people had quantities of ivory, dressed skins, a good deal of gold-dust, and a few ostrich-feathers of high class. Some ancestral stones they valued also, which Vasson now recognizes to have been diamonds. For the sake of encouragement he bought a few from influential personages; but, putting no value on them, they were soon lost. The trade could be properly described by no word less emphatic than "roaring." Whole tusks of ivory Vasson bought for a roll of cotton, feathers at six pennyworth of rum, superb karosses at a similar rate. In two months he had sold all his stock remaining, and justly considered himself a capitalist.

During this time he passed through the adventure which struck my imagination. The royal town, as I have said, was clustered on a spur of the mountain, with an arm of the river at its foot. The guides had brought Vasson over a defile many miles to the southward, and so down the river-bank. But when he began to think of returning, he remembered that kloof upon the northern side of the spur, which would certainly cut off many miles of road, if practicable. To his inquiries the answer was unanimous, that a thousand difficulties intervened. But something in the manner of his hosts convinced Vasson that they were telling a falsehood. Having now such a precious cargo, all kinds of fancies and suspicions gathered in his mind. He resolved to explore; and with that object accustomed the people to see him take long walks into the country with his gun and a bush-boy. Then, having disarmed the jealousy of these simple fellows, he set out one day for the excursion.

Several paths led from the town to farmlands on the river-bank. Vasson intended to round the hill, but, after walking a couple of miles, he crossed a narrow track that mounted on his right. Without hesitation he followed this short cut. The steep and broken path seemed to have had few travellers of late, but it climbed in a direction such that Vasson began to hope it would take him to the kloof itself. The distance was greater than he had thought; four hours' good walking carried him only to the crest of the descent. He met no soul, but fetishes in abundance, which chilled the very marrow of his bush-boy. Fearsome objects they were indeed, bits of awful rag tied to sticks, rotten chunks of wood across the road, feathers and strings fluttering on a branch. These things became more frequent as they went on, and Vasson began to fear that the kloof might be a fetish place, which would account for everything.

The path ended suddenly at a table-rock, which stood sheer above the entrance to a defile. Vasson halted in amaze. Before and above him rose a great propylon garlanded with creepers. Its blocks of huge stone showed scarcely one effacing mark of time. Gods long forgotten held court thereon, accepted tribute of peoples extinct, received the worship of mighty monarchs unrecorded. The cornice harbored flowers and birds in its bold ledge, but the shadow of it fell almost as clean as on the day when ancient colonies raised it — who shall tell how many centuries ago! The great arch stood at right angles to Vasson's place, and spanned nearly half the narrow cleft. Twenty men abreast could have walked through it, and the ground below was level like a causeway, though overgrown with brush. To left, the sheer precipice advanced so suddenly that Vasson could catch but a glimpse of the river; to right, at a hundred yards' distance, the semicircle was completed, shutting out all further view up the pass. A deadly silence reigned. Not a breath stirred the glossy leaves, shining and glittering against the hot blue sky. Whip-like creepers trailed from the cornice without a shiver, and their bright stars of blossoms hung motionless. The sunshine burned with stilly vehemence upon the pale-red stone, and checkered it with shadows deep as sculptured leaves. Such sight as that never came before the wanderer's eye. Vasson was seized with a reckless curiosity to know what lay beyond.

Right and left the cliff rose like a wall, so cut by human labor. Where he looked down, the vines beneath his feet had been smoothed away, but at a little distance on either side they fell to the very ground. He turned to force a way through the bush, and thus caught sight of his companion, who lay prostrate and shivering with fear, his eyes covered. Thus were the natives used to fall, no doubt, while they supplicated the fetish. Vasson told the half-inanimate creature that he wished to consult the gods in their very home, and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

left him there. He pushed without difficulty along the escarpment, for such it was — designed, without doubt, for the use of archers in case of attack. A few yards on, he found a creeper suitable, slung his rifle, and dropped down. Thoughtlessly letting go his hold, he fell waist-deep into a morass, hidden by broad-leaved plants and herbage. A cry of despair escaped him, but the bottom of the morass proved to be hard as stone. After great exertions, sounding with his ramrod, he gained the bank, which was faced with slabs of granite. Superhuman in its grandeur the arch appeared as Vasson stood beneath it and looked through. Upon the side remote from his former station, footholes had been rudely cut, and two strong ropes hung from the top. He saw the trick now. By this staircase mounted the fetish-priests to play their savage tricks upon the simple folk who asked their aid.

Keeping a look-out for treacherous magicians and snakes scarcely less harmful, Vasson walked up the kloof. After two or three turnings, always between those barriers of cliff, which at each corner bore a ruined turret, he saw at length the open space beyond, and once more halted with a thrill. What he had supposed a kloof was a level basin of many hundred acres. Though it was well clothed with trees, he could trace the lie of the land; but no opening appeared save that in which he stood. Lofty hills closed round it like a wall. But other sights absorbed him. The causeway he had followed led to another propylon, and through that to a maze of stately ruins. White as marble in the distance shone the walls of a city, gapped, dismantled, but still superb. Only a glimpse of their circuit could be gained through intervening clumps of wood. Above and under and among the ruins green heads of foliage rose high into the air, with white columns gleaming through. Vasson was but a trader, and not imaginative; but such a sight killed fear. Experience told him that the fetish-men themselves would not be likely to dwell in these haunted ruins; indeed he marked a few brown huts under a knoll, with people moving to and fro. Heedless of consequences in his excitement, he plunged into the woods upon his left.

Stumbling over broken columns, turned from his course by walls half erect, he struggled on, guided by the hunter's instinct. After two hours' work the bastions of the city gleamed on a sudden through the trees. He had approached within fifty yards before seeing them. Like a hill of masonry the dismounted blocks sloped upwards. Trees stood amongst them, bushes sprang in every cleft between huge stones. Ten yards in air hung a big rock, lifted by the crest of a young cotton-tree, hurrying towards the light. Vasson climbed easily over the ruins. Within he found a vigorous jungle reigning, pavements all covered and broken, streets and houses uprooted. A few yards on either side bounded his utmost view, but what he saw convinced him of the luxury once ruling in this savage land. To right and left he made his way, finding only trees and thickets in a wilderness of rubbish. The tall white columns evidently stood in another quarter of the town. It was time to set back. But just as he made up his mind to turn, Vasson caught a glimpse of more important ruins, and pushed on for a last chance.

Another scramble on walls overthrown brought him to the edge of such a cavity as misdirected experience enabled him to recognize with ease. It was a "pan," says Vasson, fitted with seats half-way round. Those who know south African scenery will perceive how natural was the mistake. What Vasson thought to be a "pan" was doubtless a theatre. It seemed to me strong evidence of truth that the man should intelligibly describe objects so far beyond his knowledge as a propylon and a Greco-Egyptian theatre. The ranges of seats were almost perfect, and the wall of the uposkenion — to use the proper word — could be distinctly followed. Enough of it was left to give half-a-dozen persons a lofty seat. So many, in fact, lounged upon it, basking in the sun. The bright colors of their dress caught Vasson's eye upon the instant. He crouched in superstitious awe, for his nerves had been long on stretch. The skin of these people was white, their costume strange. Instinctively the explorer hid, but not in time. They saw him, and, leaping from the perch, they fled with an eerie clamor. Peering down, Vasson saw them pass between the shattered orchestra and the public seats. All his tremors vanished. The white complexion was yellow and diseased, the white hair sapless, the brilliant dresses fluttering tufts of rag. The creatures who dared to occupy that haunted city were albino idiots, a class very common in negro-land. Of their color the fetish-men made use, no doubt, when needful, and their foolishness preserved them from the terrors of the place.

Vasson hasted back, though he judged that the albinos' exaggerated report would

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

be more likely to alarm the priests than to stir them to pursuit. He had marked his track, of course, and followed it with speed. When the brown huts again came into sight, he was not surprised to observe a great animation reigning. The albinos all were there, fluttering like a small crowd of parrots on the ground. But the fetish-men and women had doubtless withdrawn to perform their incantations — in which they at least believe — and to construe this portent with awful alarms. Vasson crept from bush to bush across the open, gained the kloof, plunged into the morass where he had sounded it, swarmed the cliff, and found his bush-boy — still prostrate, still with eyes covered, still praying or sleeping, or — one knows not what to fancy of a creature but half human. At his master's kick he raised himself quietly to follow. Choosing a back way they reached the town before sunset, and Vasson called upon the king at once for his P. P. C. He "grasped the situation," and preceived that the fetish-men would be no long time before discovering that the white stranger had explored their mysteries. The small surplus of his stock Vasson distributed amongst the royal household and the most powerful caboceers. Twenty-four hours after beholding these strange sights he inspanned for the home journey.

Vasson passed safely through the Matabele realm, not without suspicion, however. Judicious bribes saved him. In reaching the colony he found himself a man of fortune. But successful traders in south Africa are the favorite victims of legal knavery. They gain an exaggerated notion of their shrewdness, which is only rectified by disastrous matching with the trained wit of German Hebrews. Vasson, like others, was as good as ruined the day he opened business. Three years after, he was obliged to take the "Kaffir road" once more, and his course was naturally directed towards that rich, retiring, and unsophisticated population, the secret of whose existence he had breathed to no soul living before me. But circumstances had changed. Who shall guess how the Matabele had heard of his illicit explorations, or how rumors wander across the desert? That question has occupied many minds, but it did not seem actuel to Vasson when the Matabele seized his wagons, arms, goods, and Hottentots for treason, taking credit for leaving him his life. My poor friend returned with a single horse and a sack of "mealies." The first venture into fairyland made his fortune; the second ruined him beyond hope. After that catastrophe he rubbed along with petty trade, penuriously saving up for another expedition. The ancients were wise. It cost a man his life to see the mysteries of the gods. In the hope of sudden wealth Vasson had tried the diamond fields, but to no purpose, for the object he had in view. None who keep before them a definite design succeed there, the evil fates alone know why, for surely these deserve protection. When I left, Vasson had gathered but a very few hundred pounds toward the thousands needed. I have heard nothing from him since, but the newspapers inform us that Momotopata has been identified in certain Greek ruins below Bloemhof in the Transvaal. What then was Vasson's city? Were there two Greco-Egyptian colonies?

From The Gentleman's Magazine.

SARK, AND ITS CAVES.

In June last year (1877), I crossed from Southampton to Guernsey, intending to stay some days in Sark, and explore the caves there, as I had done those of Cornwall, an account of which I gave in Macmillan's Magazine, August 1876. We arrived early in the morning at St. Peter Port, Guernsey, and I found the excursion steamer, which leaves Guernsey for Sark only twice a week, just gone — for if the Southampton packet happens to be late, the excursion steamer does not wait for her. But sailing-boats go to and fro daily, weather permitting. In winter, weather does not permit, and Sark is often without communication with the larger islands for ten days or a fortnight together, so they must frequently be rather short of news and provisions there, though milk, bread, eggs, and poultry would not be likely to run short. The time of the passage of course varies; and as no Sark boat had arrived at St. Peter Port, nor was expected to start for some time, I hired a sailing-boat for myself. The morning was rainy and cold; we were some hours out, and we had to take to our oars, the wind being insufficient for our purpose. A small boat with two fishermen, and full of gigantic crabs, came to meet us when we approached, and took me on shore with my box. Having passed the fine precipices of Brechon, we landed on some tough, brown rocks at the wild, picturesque little Havre Gosselin, this being the nearest point to Guernsey; one of the sail-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ors, a strong youth, carried my box, which was not light, up these steep rocks — a feat I should have been very sorry to have had to perform myself. The inn (Hôtel Gavey) is about a mile off, and an excellent one I found it. I was sorry to learn that, on account of this difficulty of communication with the outer world through the long winter months, Mr. Gavey was about to give up his little hotel; for he makes his visitors most comfortable, and charges them moderately.

I spent ten days on the small island, and wished I could have spent more. In walking to the inn, I was much struck with the beauty of the lanes and hedgerows, with the greenness of the grass and the abundance of wild flowers, especially saxifrage — more than one species of which is very luxuriant — seathrift, and ferns. There is also plenty of purple iris, while the cottage gardens are full of myrtle, large tree-fuchsia, and many other flowers, indicating a mild climate. The little hotel is beautifully situated in Dixcart Valley. A stream runs down to the sea here, and the windows look upon a small meadow of the richest grass, where a graceful Guernsey cow was tethered, who never failed by herself to supply the whole hotel with delicious milk; the meadow sloping down to the stream, which is closely embowered with fine trees, apple, pear, oak, beech, alder, and others, where the birds sing sweetly. Dixcart Bay, within a few minutes' walk, is the favorite place for bathing. "Happy the race that has no history." Little Sark has none to speak of, and seems happy. There is little crime, little poverty, little sickness. Sark has a language of its own, but no literature — a modification of the Jersey patois. French and English are taught in the schools, and nearly every one seems to know French. The only noteworthy incident in the history of Sark is its recovery for the English from the French by a Flemish gentleman in the reign of Queen Mary. The incident reminds one of the Trojan horse, for a coffin was landed which was said to contain a dead body for burial; but in the chapel the Flemish crew, opening it, took from it "swords, targets, and arquebusses," with which they soon overpowered the scanty French garrison, a part of whom had been persuaded to row off to the ship to receive certain commodities, and these were made prisoners. The boat returned filled with Flemings. Queen Elizabeth granted the island to Hélier de Carteret, seigneur of St. Ouen in Jersey, to be held by him and his heirs in perpetuity, on condition that he let it out in forty different tenements, that so there might be at least as many men to repel any sudden attack. In his family it remained for some time; in fact, Carteret seems the commonest name among the farmers and fishermen now. Sark has its own local government, and is still portioned out into these forty tenements, held of the seigneur, which may not be divided, and which pass to the eldest son, or daughter, if there are no male heirs. Nor may they be sold without consent of the seigneur; so that some of the farms have remained in the same families since 1575. The holders of the forty tenements, the seigneur, the seneschal, the prévôt, and the greffier now constitute the Court of Chefs-Plaids. This court levies all local rates, and the seneschal has complete jurisdiction in all cases of petty offences. The seigneur can refuse his assent to measures passed by the court, but there is a doubtful right of appeal from him to the royal court of Guernsey. I took a great liking to the people; they seem a simple, honest, and manly race, a population of fishermen and agriculturists. The houses are strongly built of dark granite, the walls being very thick, with flowers often trained over them. The old stone wells are particularly picturesque. It was curious to hear the Church of England service in French in the church on Sunday afternoon. The weather-beaten fishermen and farmers go there, and also to the Presbyterian chapel, in their "Sunday best," namely, in black coats, looking very prosperous. There is a monument on the hill near Havre Gosselin, erected to the memory of a party who perished by the capsizing of a sailing boat. It is erected by the widow of the gentleman who hired the boat. Here my sailor boy, who was carrying my things, deposited them on the pedestal, that he might go and look for some one to help him; and as I wished to get on to the hotel out of the Scotch mist, he told me I might safely do so without encumbrances, as robberies were absolutely unknown, and the book-bag, and rug, etc. etc., might be left to themselves without the smallest risk, and so it proved. There are good schools, and the climate being healthy, the rock-scenery of wonderful unique beauty, with all the other advantages thus enumerated, is this not a kind of "earthly paradise"? It would certainly be a good place to spend a honeymoon in. The good simple folk know nothing and care nothing for the distractions of religious or political controversy on the conti-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

nents yonder: whether or not their creed and constitution be absolutely "the best," they are pious and content; with no history and no literature — think of that! — living a healthy, honest, out-door life, braving the perils of their stormy seas, proud of their island home, familiar with the wondrous and changing face of nature, satisfied with the "state of life unto which it has pleased God to call them" — all except the younger sons perhaps, who have perforce — and a good thing too — to go and seek their fortunes elsewhere!

My usual programme was to go out, after an excellent breakfast (consisting of first-rate tea, new-laid eggs, good bread and butter, and fresh lobster), for the purpose of exploring the coast, taking some biscuits with me, and trusting to getting milk at the cottages, where I would sit and chat for a while with the courteous fisherman's or farmer's wife and her pretty little children; or else I trusted to finding a spring, or returned in time for the small table d'hôte dinner at six o'clock. There are no guides, and this is a little inconvenient; yet, if you once get to know your whereabouts a little, I for my part prefer to go about alone. There is generally some visitor staying at Sark in the summer who will accompany the stranger to the principal points of interest, if he desires it, in return for a similar favor that has probably been shown himself on his arrival. At least, I found two gentlemen who knew the localities well and did me this kindness. My first business, however, was to take a boat and row round the island, which gives you the best general idea of it. I walked down to the Creux Harbor, by the other little inn (the Bel Air), and there embarked. This is the only harbor for boats of any size, except the unused Port Gouray, to the south, but it is not large enough even for the small excursion steamer to enter. It is surrounded by an amphitheatre of fine rocks, which are pierced by a tunnel, the only access by land to the harbor. When we rowed round the bays the sea was of a beautiful clear emerald color, lighter round the reefs, and laced with foam, as I used to see it on fine days in Cornwall. In coming back the boatman and I had to strain every nerve to get into the small harbor round the breakwater, the current being very strong and a brisk breeze blowing. But the weather was, on the whole, very favorable for exploration of the caves, whether by boat or by swimming: in Cornwall it had always been too rough for this. I think I was a little disappointed with the appearance of height and general massive effect of the cliffs in Sark, while the colors can hardly vie with those of Kynance or Mullion; there is nothing so stupendous either as the granite cliffs of Tol Pedu-pen, with the cliffs of Connemara, or the Hebridean Loch Scavaig. Still, the tints of the rock are often beautiful; and there are some very noble masses, as, for instance, the Tint-a-jeu (Tintagel), the Moie de Mouton, and the Autelets. But the Gonliot Caves are probably among the most remarkable sea caves known, those of Staffa and Capri alone (and these hardly) rivalling them in interest. On my boat excursion round the island I got a header at a delicious place on the south-east of it (near the barracks, I think, called Brenière), where an iron ladder is fixed to the rock, and I often came afterwards by land for the same purpose. Here is a cove with a boat drawn up on shore, and the fishermen spread their nets and lobster-pots to dry above the iron ladder. We passed a hollow in the cliffs before we got to this spot, where an easy climb enables you to obtain lovely specimens of Asplenium marinum, which elsewhere grows out of reach. The first cave we went into was one on the south-west, an extremely beautiful one in respect of form and color. I believe it has various names; but my boatman called it Victor Hugo's, because, he said, he had rowed Victor Hugo into it, and the great French poet, having admired it and asked its name, on learning that it had none in particular, told him he might call it Victor Hugo's. Most of the stone is granite or porphyry, or similar metamorphic rock, in Sark the mica of ordinary granite being replaced by hornblende; but all varieties of stain, produced by weathering and lichens, unite with the native hues of the material to give lovely effects of color in many of these caves, especially in this one. Its rude architecture also has noble proportions. To adopt an idea of Hugo, the tumultuous turbulence of earthquake, of storms, who were the builders and sculptors here, have breathed the spirit of their own chaos into the sublime symmetry of these high vaults, arches, and dark, mysterious, winding corridors, wherein the sea washes and wanders, stumbles and fumbles blindly, murmuring, sobbing, making strange sounds in dim recesses of the mountain's heart. This cave has dark walls, with pink felspar veinings and many a golden stain; light from the green, fluctuant ocean-floor quavering on wall and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

roof, with exquisitely subtle, soft-enmeshed "eye music." A boat can enter the recesses of it better than any other; but the coloring of some in Dixcart Bay is perhaps more brilliant, vivid crimson, almost like the lizard serpentine. (There is also plenty of fine green serpentine in Sark.) That small cave is also clothed with a rich robe of purple lichen. However, this Tyrian dye is finer in some caves of north Devon and Cornwall. Mr. C., who has probably been in every cave of Sark, told me there was another finer cavern in the Point du Château, only to be explored by wading. This I had not time to visit. The state of the tide being unfavorable for visiting the Gonliots and Boutiques, we did not attempt them, but rowed as far as we dared into the Moie de Mouton Cave, the approach to which is grand. It is in a vertical cliff (I believe about three hundred feet high) which has been formed into a peninsula through the action of the waves, and is separated by a steep precipice from the mainland. Its jagged, weathered pinnacles and castellations are the resort of innumerable gulls, cormorants, puffins, oyster-catchers, etc., who set up their wild cries on a boat's approach, and darken the air with their wheeling motions in clouds above you. It seems that some of the islanders land their sheep out of a boat here, leaving them to browse upon the scanty herbage, and when the sheep are wanted, while they feed upon the precipice, shoot them, picking them up out of the water as they fall into it. This sounds apocryphal, but I believe it is true. The small gloomy fiords and fissures about here are very impressive. This cave is narrow, though long, and even on a calm day it is surprising what a suction of water there is in it, as I found to my cost on swimming there subsequently. I was anxious to explore it to the end, which I was told had not been done; so one day I came round here in a boat, and having fastened a bit of candle to an old hat, I swam till a big wave washed in, put my candle out, and bruised me a bit against the rocky sides. However, as my eyes had got more accustomed to the darkness, I went on, and the water soon becoming shallow, I felt my way along till the cave narrowed to a fissure, through which I could see daylight, but into which a man could not squeeze himself. The water was not near so cold as I thought it would be, still I was very glad to get a header out in the open sunlight, where mother-of-pearl seemed fleeting and floating upon the clear warm green waves, and to bask on a rock near the cavern portal afterwards. The most amusing thing was that a quantity of young cormorants, making the most alarmed cries, retreated as I advanced further and further into the depths of the cavern, but when they got near the shallow water at the end they dived under me, and so made their escape. We rowed back to the Creux Harbor between the island and the recently detached Nez, at the extreme north, where the current is very rapid indeed, coming round by the Eperchenes (the old landing-place), and visiting the Chapelle des Manses and another cave. We passed also the Autelets, which are splendid detached craggy towers, about whose feet bright surges leap blithely, from their inaccessibility much inhabited by sea-birds, as also is the Etac de Sark, on the south-east, but that is more accessible. The grounds of the Seigneurie, which are very pretty, as is also the house of the seigneur, open upon the Port du Montin, a little bay near the Autelets. Here there was an old monastery, and the fishponds of it remain. On the cliffs above the Autelets a crane is erected, by which the vraic, a seaweed much used for manure, is hoisted up from the beach.

Another excursion is to the Creux du Denible, which is a wonderful place indeed, and well worth a visit; nor is the fame of it exaggerated, as assuredly is that of the Coupée, a narrow natural causeway connecting Great and Little Sark together, which is curious geologically, but to my mind not impressive at all, for all the fuss made about it. This Creux is a huge crater with gloomy vertical sides, of a deep gory red, nearly two hundred feet in height: there is an almost precisely similar one at Tol Pedu-penwith in Cornwall. These strange shafts are formed by the percolation of water from above loosening veins of softer clayey material in the hard igneous rock, the débris being washed away little by little through the sea's action in caves below — for they all have communication with the sea by caves. The sea, however, only penetrates into the shaft during high spring tides when the boiling cauldron reverberating and bursting spray up to the very summit must be magnificent. There are two very steep tracks in the rock near here, much overgrown with ivy and bramble at the top, by which you may, if you like, descend to the shore. A young gentleman who accompanied me made notes of the one just adjoining the Creux, but I stopped short in the middle, and did not like it, without a guide's steadying hand. Taking a boat,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

however, from the harbor, I landed in Denible Bay, and proceeding through one of the strange natural tunnels that communicates with the Creux, I emerged through the other. Within this circular amphitheatre the scene is extraordinarily impressive. A gigantic buttress of dark stone, worn by storms into the most fantastic and unearthly shapes, divides one great portal from another. From within the circular chasm (one hundred feet in length by fifty feet across), with its lofty blood-red vertical walls, you gaze up at the blue sky and fleecy clouds that form your roof, around to the huge rolled boulders, the playthings of tempest; on either side the vast buttress, that suggests in the twilight some huge corrugated half-human giant, across the blue sea. Through one cavern-portal Jersey in misty outline is visible; through the other the castellated jutting cliffs of the Point du Denible. There is no sound, save of quiet plashing waves upon the shore, —

> The stilly murmur of the distant sea
> Tells us of silence.

Beyond this bay I clambered over wet stones covered with seaweed, to see a great detached rock in which there is a fine natural arch; but I had sent my boat away, and the tide warned me that, though I could not climb down from the Creux, I must now climb up, the farther track (with some iron rings fixed in the cliff at a difficult place) may possibly be the easiest; this was the one, at any rate, I got up by. One must be careful of the tide, of course. Bathing near the Port du Montin I was caught one day, all egress from my little creek being cut off, except up the cliff. There is a similar though smaller creux in Little Sark, called the Pot; there the interior of the fissure is robed with luxurious aromatic plants of all kinds; you can easily get down it by a little track to the shore, then turning northwards, there is some fine solitary chaotic rock-scenery to be found, also a small cave with beautiful crystals in it. Time slips away when one broods long and alone in such places.

One day Mr. C. took me to explore the Boutiques. To do this thoroughly you want a lantern or a torch, for there are some very big awkward blocks where you might let youself down, and it is pitch dark, so that you would in falling break your leg without a light. The land entrance is by a steep vein of soft clayey mineral. At the entrance a lofty, grand, and gloomy vault: when you have clambered cautiously down the big boulders into unknown depths, you have to wade through water which remains even at low tide; and here let me strongly recommend bathing-shoes for use in the Sark caves, for I cut my foot rather badly on the sharp stones; but fortunately sea water is a great healer. Not having bathing-shoes with me, I usually wore two pairs of socks wading, but did not wear them on this occasion. You must not trust to buying much at the shops here, for the stock of goods in general is limited; there is, in fact, no village at all, only a few scattered houses, but I believe there are good lôdgings to be had in these.

After this water you arrive in a fine spacious chamber, having an opening to the sea. The dripping roof affords a lodgment for those beautiful green ferns — Asplenium marinum — that love twilight and moisture. Beyond the great chamber you pass through a passage that leads outside the open at the northern extremity of the island, but you have to do some amount of stiff climbing over black boulders before you get there. To do justice to this cave, there should be torches, it cannot be seen with a lantern properly.

Another excursion I made was from the little Havre Gosselin by boat to the Isle of Brechon, to visit the Pirates' Cave, the entrance to which is perhaps grander than anything at Sark, and reminds one of the cave at Tol Pedu. The vast irregular fissure strikes the traveller approaching from Guernsey by the islands of Jethon and Herm; it is a broad black gash, reaching from top to bottom of the perpendicular cliff. The landing here is not very easy even in the calmest weather; you have to time jumping on to one of the rocks as the wave drives your boat towards it; you then clamber up some large black boulders sloping backwards, a long grand granite staircase suggesting the "Arabian Nights" or "Vathek," till you stand under the mighty arch itself as of a mountain temple. Here is the entrance to some old copper mines. I penetrated some way into the level with a light; and it is said that a great depth of ashes was found by those excavating the mine, confirming the tradition that pirates had formerly made their eyrie in this wild spot. The Havre Gosselin opposite is the most picturesque of little bays, with its fishing boats and nets, and its iron ladder fixed to the brown corrugated crag, with a rope beyond that, by which a person landing makes his way up from the boats. The sunshine on these rich brown rocks and on the sparkling clear green sea is always beautiful. It was

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

generally reported to be impossible to swim across the Gonliot Straits, the eighty-yard-wide passage that divides Brechon from Sark. These straits have a sinister reputation, several ships having been wrecked in their immediate neighborhood. Professor Ansted says: "The water passage between the Gonliot rock and Brechon is deep, dark, and dangerous. The current is swift, and varies with the tide, so that at times it would be impossible to row against it. There is, however, depth of water sufficient to float a frigate, and daring sailors in time of need have ventured to sail through it." Finding myself there (about an hour after or before the turn of the tide), I thought the swim across would not be difficult; so on my return from Brechon I got a boatman to row me to the Gonliot rock that I might try it; he kept near in case I should find the current too strong. But I got easily across to Brechon (drifting a little south) in a very short time. Great care must be taken, however, as to the state of the tide; the boatman should be consulted. In order to dissuade me from what he considered a rash attempt, my pleasant boatman, as a last resort, told me, when I was on the very point of taking my header, that there were "lots of big porpoises here;" indeed, we had seen them; but I told him he knew they would not hurt me; then he said, "Oh! but there are white porpoises, and they do hurt!" It was too late, I had taken my header; yet to my horror it occurred to me in the water that perhaps he meant sharks! However, I did not meet any. Brechon is inhabited chiefly by rabbits.

Talking of sharks reminds one of that other sea-monster, the octopus. It was in a cavern of the Douvres rocks, in the Chaussey archipelago, not so very far off, that Hugo, as every one knows, placed his pieuvre. And I hear that his beautiful description of the sea cave was suggested chiefly by the Gonliot caves of Sark. The Gonliot caves must certainly be classed among the most uniquely lovely places in the world. But to be really appreciated they must be visited again and again under different aspects and in various manners. You must go into them by land and by sea. It is only at certain hours, or certain days, under special circumstances of tide, weather, and elevation of the sun, that you can see them to advantage at all. Nor do I believe that an island like this can be fairly appreciated by the picnic parties that come for the day by the Guernsey or Jersey excursion steamer to drink champagne or beer at Mr. Gavey's. To know and feel nature a man must watch her countenance and her varying moods, as a lover watches the face and moods of a beloved woman. There is no difficulty in the path that leads down to the Gonliot, though at the bottom a little scrambling over boulders has to be done. Through a magnificent natural arch, when you enter the first cavern, you gaze upon the blue sea, the hazy blue air, and the warm brown cliffs of the Havre Gosselin. A branch of the first cavern leads westward to the sea; but turning sharp round when we come to this, we make our way into a chamber whose walls are literally covered with plum and greengage-colored anemones, as though embossed with so many rich gems. This leads to the sea again, and one can clamber thence over a rough ridge of rocks to rejoin the path one has descended. These are partly covered with slippery seaweed and barnacles. But if you do this only, you will not have seen the Gonliots. Westward from this cave opens a narrow fissure with always more or less sea-water in it; and through this one must wade in order to reach the glories of the place. You then enter one of the loveliest fairy palaces in the world; but it is seen to most advantage as I saw it swimming in from the Gonliot rock, opposite Brechon, with the afternoon sunlight just pouring into the entrance. This channel is very narrow, and in swimming great care should be taken, as the suction is always considerable, and there is only just room to float; the rock, moreover, is covered with wounding sharp acorn shells; the weather should be perfectly calm, and the swimmer not liable to cramp. But what I saw I will attempt to describe. The sun was shining upon myriads of rosy, and carmine, sunrise-tinted, glistening anemones; through the clear chrysoprase-colored wave one could perceive some with their sensitive rainbow tentacles extended, those above the water-line being equally beautiful, though closed. This narrow channel, which cannot be entered by a boat or by wading, opened into an exquisitely lovely Nereid's palace, instinct with seagreen twilight, the rich rough sides of which were thickly encrusted with living gems of all fashions; here all

> Had suffered a sea change
> Into something rich and strange:

all was living arabesque, rarest filigree, enchasement as of shrines or goblets. Besides the sea-flowers described, there were delicate porcelain-white ones, innumerable corallines and madrepores,

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

sponges of infinite variety and golden hue, minute volcano-like fretted fountains jetting crystal, water-light meanwhile quavering on fair tinted roof and wall, green or purple tresses and streamers of laver, dulse, and tangle stirring joyously in dim bouldered deeps below. To float luxuriously in the midst of such glories seemed like being in heaven, or at least in fairy-land! Along the cliffs of the mainland east of the caves in the adjoining fiord, Mr. C. told me he had, by wading, found ultramarine actinias; but though I swam there on purpose I did not find them, the tide being probably too high. Southward again from this chamber a winding corridor, illuminated by green twilight, with delicious sound of rushing water in it, conducts into another fair sea hall. Immense orange-hued actinias were clustered in some fissure near this. One day wading was quite possible here, but another day I had to swim, and with the utmost difficulty, against the tide; but wading with one's clothes half on is most uncomfortable, you are sure to get very wet! In this further chamber, which is said to have the conformation of a human ear, still more marvels await you. The muffled sounds, the weird explosions the waters make amongst these vast dim labyrinths is strange indeed when one listens in solitude; and the silent, ancient monster head of the promontory seems to listen also! I confess that if I had had the "Travailleurs de la Mer" fresh in my mind just then I should have hesitated to swim so much about these caves, for in this very place (or in the Boutiques adjoining) Hugo states that he himself saw a bather pursued by a swimming pieuvre, and that it measured, on being caught, four feet across. So far as I could hear, the fishermen, as a rule, never do swim in these caves; and yet I had inquired from several, who all told me that they knew of none but small pieuvres at Sark. Of course in the torrid zone they do attain the dimensions of the poet's monster, and I doubt if one measuring four or five feet across would not be capable of disposing of a swimmer if the man were caught unwary. I was told that an easier method of dealing with them than cutting their heads off (Perseus-wise) was to turn them inside out: it does not sound very feasible. But assuredly he who has watched these obscene chimeras, with their palpitating, livid, leprous scab, that seems never wet though in the water, may well shudder to think of being seized by one in the twilight of such a cave. What are malicious Norwegian water-sprites and hideous dragons to this? No, they are this. And of such a lovely cavern Hugo has made this snaky-haired Alecto, this Gorgon, presiding genius!

To return to the fourth chamber. Its walls are hung with multitudes of fairy-like outlandish creatures, Tubulariæ, Caryophylliæ, Plumulariæ. These polypes are usually small, but here their arborescent polyparies are like a forest of large olive-green grapes, being seldom unbathed by the sea. "Nowhere in Europe," says Professor Ansted, "under the most favorable circumstances, can so great a wealth of animal life be found within a small space as in some of the Sark caverns." He well names them the grüne Gevölbe of marine zoology. Upwards of eighty species of zoophytes have been found, and the varieties are numerous. These stalked cups and agate vases innumerable are compound hydroid polypes, to which belongs a most extraordinary history. The best account of such creatures is perhaps to be found in M. de Quatrefage's charming work, the "Wanderings of a Naturalist." We are largely indebted to him for our knowledge of them: the facts having been not so long ago received with all the incredulity that greeted Trembley's revelations concerning the fresh-water hydra.

"The whole compound animal is enclosed," says Mr. Gosse, "in a tube of transparent substance resembling horn, and this tube at every bud takes the form of an open cell or cup, into the cavity of which each individual polype head can withdraw itself on alarm, and from the orifice of which it protrudes and expands (spreading abroad its delicate tentacles) when it seeks prey. In this great marine family (Sertulariadæ) the germ first develops a single hydra-like polype, consisting of a slender stem, enclosing a stomachal cavity. Soon, however, a lateral bud projects, which shoots upwards and develops a head of the tentacles similar to that of the first, while from the side of this another shoot still comes up the rising stem, which assumes a plant-like condition of branching stalks with many lateral tentacled buds." Then in the angle formed by the branches — or sometimes elsewhere on the stalk — at certain seasons appear the germ-bearing capsules or vesicles; these are tall, vase-like, transparent bodies, abruptly narrowed at top to a short rim like a pitcher. These capsules were especially remarkable as I swam. They contain ten or more ovate sacs, each of which encloses several embryos, which

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

escape successively by slowly emerging from the pitcher-like rim. But what are these embryos that thus escape? Why, no other than medusæ, those beautiful roseate, sylph-like parachutes we are familiar with, which illuminate the ocean with pale blue gleams at night, and which are often so formidable to fishes, even to the human swimmer. "The margin of the disk carries twenty-four slender tentacles exactly corresponding to those of the parent polype, being studded with warts, which are aggregations of barb-bearing capsules, instruments for arresting and killing prey. At the bases of the tentacles are placed eight beautiful organs which are doubtless the seats of a special sense. Each of these consists of a transparent globe; in its interior is borne a smaller globule or lens of high refractive power, placed a little toward the outer side. These are generally considered to be eyes, but some believe them to have more analogy to our organs of hearing, the crystalline globule (or otolithe) being capable of vibration within its vesicle." Are they either organs of sight or of hearing? Why not of some special sense peculiar to these beings? What is the consciousness of such creatures? Who can tell? Marvellous fairies, true Nereids indeed we have here, and this fair marine palace belongs to them! For conceive the lovely innumerable parachute-like, rainbow-tinted opalline sylphs, with that strange consciousness of their own, which, if my senses had been less gross, I should have perceived with delight and wonder, sporting here in their native element, where I was to them but a temporary specimen of a rarely seen monstrous intruder! — where they are accustomed to disport themselves, moving by voluntary pulsations of their pellucid frames or delicate cilia, whose motion is that of wind-waved corn.

But why should Naiads, Nereids, or Tritons, and all Neptune's court of sea fairies have human forms? Was not that, after all, the only mistake our forefathers made on the subject? Otherwise they truly discerned that all is spirit; and much as we have learned, we have surely erred from their superior knowledge in substituting ideal "laws" and blind isolated "forces" for this early faith of true poetic intuition. Well, indeed, might the Christian poet sigh to be a "pagan suckled in a creed outworn," so that he might have "glimpses to make him less forlorn" in this age of dull, dead machinery! But the deadness is in us, not in nature. It is a temporary blindness, sent that we may see the more truly afterwards. Great Pan is not dead. Like all our other beloved dead, he has but changed his form, and shall yet be given back to us a myriad-fold more living. But more remains to be told about our sea fairies here. The poor little things have innocently and unwittingly taught us a great "law" that still astonishes the mighty minds of our professors — the law of alternate generation. Fancy what an honor for these sea fairies, who also have been baptized by us with such very long Latin names! The stationary compound polype gives birth to a medusa, and the free swimming medusa in turn gives birth to a stationary, compound, plant-like polype. The medusa, out of its ovaries at a stated time, drops a quantity of ciliated gemmules; these pear-shaped creatures, endowed themselves with the power of spontaneous motion, fix upon a suitable locality and adhere; there they grow into a lengthened, branching, budding, compound hydroid polype. "It is evident," says Mr. Gosse, "that this is a very different thing from the metamorphosis which takes place in insects and crustacea, where it is but one individual passing through a succession of forms, by casting off a succession of garments that concealed, and, as it were, masked the ultimate form. The butterfly is actually contained in the caterpillar, and can be demonstrated there by a skilful anatomist. In this case, however, there are distinct births, producing in a definite order beings of two forms, the one never producing its image directly, but only with the interposition of a generation widely diverse from it. Hence, to use the striking, though homely, illustration of one of the first propounders of this law, any one individual is not at all like its mother or its daughter, but exactly resembles its grandmother or its granddaughter." We have lately discovered that plants may become animals and animals plants! And, indeed, there is no longer any proper distinction between them, if the Venus fly-trap eats and digests organic food. But this extraordinary law, as perhaps one may term it, of marine atavism, transcends all other miracles of science.

One of my boatmen took me into his house one day to show me an immense block of stone that he had found floating on the sea near Brechon. It was honeycombed with air-chambers, and smelt strongly of sulphur; it appeared to be lava from some recently erupted volcano; the air-chambers enabled it to float. But what volcano could it have come from? And how far must it have travelled upon the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ocean currents that brought it? Or was it conceivably some kind of immense meteoric stone that fell at sea?

The reader may like to have the following legend of the Coupée, which perhaps is the most interesting thing about it. "Long centuries ago Sark rose from the waters, then, as now, an island, but uncultivated, uninhabited, unknown; from the waters it rose up exceeding fair. One day the birds and flowers, which sang and clustered there, sending their sweet offerings of perfume and of praise up to the Most High, beheld for the first time man. By night he had arrived, and when the morning light kissed away the drops that hung upon the flowers, the man was there. Dark was his countenance and dark was his mind, as was the night from whence his form had sprung; but to the night succeeding a dawn had broken on his soul, a sun had risen in his breast, which now was battling with the gloom that had fettered and oppressed his mind; and here the man had come to pray for strength to conquer all his inward foes, and here in solitude he tarried with the birds and flowers. Years passed away, and the hermit lived still upon the island: his only food was herbs, his only drink the spring; but he had found companions, for he had learned to know and love the birds who sang so sweetly to him, and the flowers that ever sprang before him in his path. Years passed away again, and now the old man had found peace — he had found peace of mind and happiness; round his head had come a halo of pure light, and often as he sat in the solemn evening hour, he felt upon his cheek the breath of angels' wings; and he could see before him, fresh risen from the ocean, an islet on which wandered shapes of glory, and from which came sounds of angels' voices, as they sang their everlasting songs of praise to the Almighty. Entranced by the glories of the islet, he prayed that he might be permitted to mingle with the spirits that were wandering and praising there . . . and thus his prayer was answered . . . from his side of the separating chasm sprang a path which, raised high above the golden waters, seemed to grow. And as the morning dawned upon each night that the old man passed in prayer, the abyss that separated him from the happy islet became narrower, until at length, the bridge completed . . . he left his earthly flowers and birds, and passed on to where the heavenly choir received him, and the flowers that never fade spring round God's throne."

I left Sark by the pretty little excursion steamer with great regret for Guernsey, and crossing thence to Southampton had a good view of the Casquets, where there are three revolving lights. These rocks are very dangerous, and the sea always shows its teeth round about there; we got a pitching and a ducking in their neighborhood, though elsewhere it had been calm. I will conclude with Professor Ansted's words about Sark: "Nowhere can the destroying power of the sea be better studied than in the grand scenes presented at every point round this remarkable island. Detached portions of the main island, others nearly detached, and only connected by natural bridges, or narrow necks of land; huge vaults through which the sea dashes at all times, or into which it penetrates only at high water; fragments of rock of all dimensions, some jagged and recently broken, some — and these the hardest and toughest — rounded and smooth, vast piles of smaller rocks heaped around: all these offer abundant illustrations of nature's course when the elements meet on the battle-field of an exposed coast, the tidal wave undermining and tearing asunder even the hardest porphyrized granites, however they may seem to present a bold front, and bear the reputation of being indestructible. The huge, isolated masses of rock, often pierced with large natural vaults or tunnels, form a kind of advanced guard in every direction, appearing to repel for a time the action of the waves, but really only serving as proofs of the destruction thus caused."

RODEN NOEL.

From The Saturday Review.

THE HABIT OF READING.

AN ingenious writer in the Pall Mall Gazette has recently exposed to the horrified public a new vice of the working-classes, as they are still facetiously called. It does not seem easy to invent, still less to discover in actual existence, a new vice. In Hawthorne's "Transformation" there is a mysterious character who is supposed by some to be a revenant, a Satanic evangelist from the old Roman world with the mission of reviving extinct iniquities. He certainly could not have brought up from the dead and buried world the terrible crime revealed by the writer in the Pall Mall Gazette. This gentleman has found out that many members of the poorer classes are victims of the detestable prac-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tice of reading too much. The author of "Lothair" said, with much truth, that the upper classes never read at all; and they at least must be moved by the terrible and unsuspected depravity of the new social layers. Reading tells on artisans (we are to believe) like drink, or rather like opium. They will read anything, just as Porson was ready to drink anything, from spirits of wine and stuffs for lamps, to cheap sherry. They will read scientific treatises, if they can get nothing better. Works on conic sections, philology, the theory of torpedoes, or the higher curves, minister to their diseased appetites. They will swallow a geological treatise as certain savages eat earth when they cannot get slugs or opossums. They can pass a happy hour with the advertisement sheet of the Times. These are their resources in desperate circumstances, when no novels and stories of adventure are to be had. It is scarcely necessary to say, however, that they prefer stories of adventure to advertisements. Captain Mayne Reid shows them "the key of the happy golden land," and M. Gustave Aimard leads them against red-skins, black-skins, and yellow-skins. The London Reader supplies them with tales of social adventure, with the romance of virtuous indigence and vicious opulence. All the leisure hours of these abandoned artisans are devoted to reading, and, as they stitch at our coats, or paint our panels, or lay bricks for our houses, they live on memories of these happy entertainments. They exist in a paradis artificiel, as Charles Baudelaire would have said, to which opium and bang do not supply the "Open, sesame!" Thus hours of toil go by like a night of dreams; in their waking moments their eyes see little of the visible world. They are bent on printed pages which reveal a world of adventurous life in which weariness and want are forgotten. The bold burglar steals off to crack a crib, the knight carries away the Jewess on his saddle-bow, the earless trapper shoots the grizzly bear, the escaped convict hides in the sewers of Paris, the Countess of Rudolstadt flits from one to another deserted tower or haunted forest. The starveling tailor, the swinked mechanic, is for the hour like the gods in the "Strayed Reveller:" —

> The gods are happy.
> They turn on all sides
> Their shining eyes:
> And see, below them,
> The earth, and men.

No doubt the writer in the Pall Mall Gazette is right when he says that life in their artificial paradise is ruinous to the poor men who seek this refuge from care. There is not much to be said for them. It is plain that they may become as useless, shiftless, and forlorn as drunkards or opium-eaters, if they once abandon themselves to the habit of indiscriminate reading. One cannot even claim for them the praise of imaginative power. If people are truly imaginative, they find materials of thought and stuff for dreams in the moving spectacle of life. They are interested, not as gossips are interested, in the affairs of their neighbors and of the world. It is for want of original fancy that people turn to the materials of fancy ready-made, so to speak; to the manufactured article, as found in poems and novels. The raw material, which imagination ought to work on, lies around us everywhere. Some persons are so constituted that they avert their eyes from life, and look only at the reflection, or rather the picture of it, which is to be found in books. They do not care to observe life except in a magic mirror, like that of the Lady of Shalott; and, unlike her, they are never sick of shadows. There is a want of energy in the character of such people, and yet they win some sympathy from all bookish men. They only carry to excess the tendency of all scholars, historians, bibliographers. Bookworms of more complete development ought to feel not unkindly towards the poor do-nothing lovers of literature, the working-men who waste their time and money over books, as their more robust fellows do over pots of ale.

The temptation to become a mere bookworm is probably the besetting sin of most men of letters. Printed paper draws them magnetically, as Homer says iron draws the hands of a hero. They must always be reading; and they, like the depraved mechanic, find material in the newspaper sheets which are devoted to advertisements. What literature, indeed, can be more full of suggestion than the advertisements which tell us all that men need — the whole farrago libelli of human life — which reveal undreamed of and mysterious wants, and funds of incomprehensible supply? A man who has the habit of reading will not refuse a tract. There are often very good stories in tracts — in the first page and a half, that is to say — the honey-smeared lips of the cup which is sometimes full of wormwood. You get from tracts an insight into the habits of costermongers, and the incidents which diversify the life of cabmen (a very con-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

vertible class). You are put on the track of unexpected analogies, between the daguerretoype and conscience, for example, or some information about the art and mystery of rope-making goes before remarks (which may be skipped) about the bondage of bad habits. A man with the habit of reading has a Mahommedan respect for all printed paper. He finds things he is glad to know about in the scraps inserted in the binding of old books. Important facts meet him in the greasy country newspapers which lie on the tables of rural inns. He cannot take up a mouldy octavo on a stall but he learns something from the researches of a forgotten pedant. It is true that the confirmed reader may be missing something else that is worth looking at in human life, while he pores over the productions of the feeble or the mighty minds of old. On the other hand, he has so far the advantage over the mentally dissipated mechanic, that in everything he reads he finds grist for the mill that works up the solid literary vestments of old times into the marketable shoddy which is the raiment of the modern spirit. He is working at his trade, not neglecting it, unless he is one of those misers of reading who keep all they find to themselves. There is not much to be said for the habit of reading when it merely ministers to a man's contempt for people who live their lives in the sun and the wind and are careless of books.

There is this to be said for the habit of reading, that it fills up waste hours as nothing else does, except, perhaps, the refreshment of smoking. A man who can find amusement in any printed trash suffers less than others from long periods of waiting at railway stations. He exhausts the advertisements, and it is strange if he does not find on the bookstall some sixpenny volume which makes him laugh or wonder. The very cheapest and most trivial literature introduces you to an undreamed of world of readers and writers, about whose intellectual tastes and habits there is no other way of getting information. Who, for example, would know the whole truth about the mental vacuity of people of fashion if he did not, in some forlorn hour and place, read the literature which they love and help to construct? Who could fathom the deeps of popular politics and political economy without aid from the journals of the uninstructed? Their novels are equally strange, and equally reward research. The habit of reading is invaluable, too, when a man is waiting at a dentist's or a doctor's. No hours of waiting for a verdict can be more dreary; and he is blessed who can bury himself in old numbers of "Punch," in the paper of yesterday, and in goody-goody books about cruelty to animals.

It is a mistake to suppose that all born bookworms are people who have no interest in practical life, and no power of dealing with men and with circumstances. There never was a more confirmed bookworm than Napoleon, who, for all that, was, it will be allowed, "a man of action." In all his campaigns he carried a travelling library of novels. He had an official in Paris to look after his literary en cas. Just as the life of a servant was devoted to keeping a roast fowl always ready to be eaten, so this literary taster had to supply Napoleon with novels eternally fresh. From Moscow, from Madrid, he kept writing for new novels. He often complained that they were really too bad. He would read a few pages in his travelling carriage, and then throw the dull volumes out of the window, and turn, voracious, to a fresh packet. He projected a miniature travelling edition of all readable French literature, but the publication in the desired form proved too expensive, even for an emperor. This taste for trashy novels was not peculiar to Napoleon. Many men of active minds, even when refined taste is combined with activity, many judges, barristers, scholars, find rest and solace in the very poorest novels. As long as there is a plot, and a narrative, and a mystery, they are content.

The habit of reading is only noxious when it becomes, as it often does among indolent people, a disease. Their mental emptiness produces a morbid hunger; they must forever have a tattling paper in their hands. They can read only literature which deals with known people and with "personalities" and gossip, but of that they are insatiate. They have grafted on malice and idleness the form, but not the essence of the habit of reading. It is a habit which is depriving lecturers in the universities of their office, and which once threatened to silence orators. Fortunately it has been found that the speeches of orators are very useful as texts for the endless flow of printed matter which streams from the literary men. If Mr. Gladstone and Lord Beaconsfield did not speak there would be nothing to write about, therefore nothing to read, and a serious void in the breakfast hour of respectable families. Bookworms ought to be anxious to have themselves marked off as a species distinct from mere newspaper worms. There is

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

something respectable in the habit of the bookworm, which causes libraries to be kept up and knowledge to be stored, while the devourer of the flying leaves of literature is another creature, a sort of butterfly or locust. He is indolent, ignorant, and retains nothing but a confused memory of gossip, with the wrong facts affixed to the wrong names. No honest bookworm would willingly share the habit of the newspaper devourer; he would rather consort with the depraved mechanic who lives in a fantastic world of romance. In him there may be the undeveloped germs of the scholar or poet; but the languid butterfly who settles on the leaves of the lighter press is generally nothing but a scandalmonger too lazy to walk and talk and pursue his profession in the old manner of the Backbites and Sneerwells. For the worthier habit of reading, Fulke Greville is the best apologist, with his confession of the advantage of retiring from 'the heavy wheels of fortune" to "the safe society of books and of dead men."

From The Pall Mall Gazette.

AN AMERICAN ZOLLVEREIN.

SOME interest has been excited by a rumor, originating in a letter from the American correspondent of the Times, that negotiations were likely to be reopened between the government of the United States and the government of the Dominion of Canada for the settlement of the commercial controversy which has during the last fourteen years caused much trouble and loss to both countries. The statement in this simple and guarded form is likely enough to be correct. The Americans are quite shrewd enough to have seen long ago that they committed a grave blunder when they "denounced" the Reciprocity Treaty with Canada in 1864; and they have felt the consequences of that blunder all the more keenly since the period of unhealthy and abnormal prosperity which followed the war came to a sudden end in the crash of 1873. When the Reciprocity Treaty was abrogated the Americans, with characteristic ignorance of Canadian feeling and character, and with equally characteristic self-conceit, were confident that Canada, unable to stand commercially alone and weakened in her political relations by the imperial policy or no-policy then prevailing at home, would throw herself without delay into the arms of the Republic. The dominant school of politicians in this country, then every day expected to be relieved from the restraining influence of Lord Palmerston, and to develop its doctrines vigorously under the guidance of Mr. Gladstone, had announced repeatedly and with energy that if the Canadians wished to become partners in the republican government of the United States England would not say a word, much less lift a finger, to prevent them. Accordingly, the American project of coercing Canada into an appreciation of the advantages of joining the Union had something more than fair play. Its complete failure was remarkable and instructive. The Canadians were justly angry, and perhaps a little alarmed. They set to work at once to secure the political strength without which their neighbors might wear them down in detail; and the Confederation Act of 1867 was in truth the Canadian retort upon the abrogation of the Reciprocity Treaty. With equal courage, promptitude, and activity they proceeded to defend and develop their trade, and they soon found that they had little to fear from the competition of the Americans — so long, at least, as the latter bound themselves in the complicated trammels of an illogical and continually changing protective system. The growth of Canadian trade in the ten years succeeding the confederation of 1867 was very marked; and the Americans saw their hopes of inducing Canada to enter the Union by enforcing the threat of keeping her out in the cold gradually vanishing. Those hopes, however, revived as Canada began to suffer from the "hard times." The aggregate imports and exports of the Dominion amounted to $194,000,000 in 1872, and to $218,000,000 in 1874; in 1875 they fell to $200,000,000, and in 1876 to $174,000,000. Of course this decline of trade has caused much grumbling, and the protectionists have used it to push their attack upon free-trade principles and their very limited acceptance in practice by the government and parliament of Canada. Of course, too, there are many Canadians who see that if the American market were open to them they could make a much better fight for commercial existence. But the United States are wedded to a protectionist policy; and there seems very little hope for the present that any material change will be made in the American tariff, whatever may be the vicissitudes of parties at Washington. It is foolish to build upon the fact — if it be a fact — that the Democrats are by principle and tradition a free-trad-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ing party. The late and the present House of Representatives, though governed by a Democratic majority, have done nothing to promote free trade.

The Americans are able to say, therefore, that if the Canadians want to procure admission to the markets of the Republic they must accept protection as an established fact and make terms with it accordingly. The correspondent of the Times asserts that the United States government is considering proposals to be addressed to the government of the Dominion, not for a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty, but for the inclusion of Canada and the States in a customs union with a uniform tariff. Undoubtedly this would open the American markets to Canadian trade; and, if the advantages are so great as the Americans contend, the Canadians may possibly be tempted to look at the offer. But we have no doubt that upon consideration they will see, what is perfectly obvious, that, even supposing the advantages to be as clear as any one ventures to assert, the price demanded is too high. In the first place, Canada by entering a customs union would abandon her freedom of action altogether. Commercial treaties may be abrogated or altered from time to time, but when once Canada had become a partner in the American Zollverein she would find it impossible to withdraw. The frontier customs line and all the organizations connected with it would be abolished — an excellent thing in itself no doubt; but plainly it would be hard to re-establish the system when people had once got used to its absence, and freedom of trade across the St. Lawrence had become as familiar as freedom of trade across the Mississippi. Canada, however, is not inclined thus to burn her boats. Even if she were, the rights of this country would have to be regarded. The correspondent of the Times is of opinion that "if the Dominion were assured of perfect liberty of action" the American proposals would have considerable chance of acceptance. The testimony of the writer, no doubt, may be trusted so far as the prevalent views of politicians in the United States are concerned, but we hesitate to place implicit confidence in his evidence as to Canadian feeling. Citizens of the United States are generally wrong in all their notions about Canada, and we fancy they are mistaken in thinking that the mass of the Canadian people would be prepared, on any inducement, to enter into relations with the United States which would operate against this country as if it were a foreign power. It is true that Canada has legislated in a protective sense against British manufacturers, but there has been at least an equality in the treatment of all commerce outside of the Dominion. Under the proposed Zollverein Canada would keep out British products, for the benefit mainly of the cotton-spinners of Massachusetts and the iron-merchants of Pennsylvania. We doubt, as we have said, whether such a scheme has the slightest chance of being entertained by any important section of the Canadians, protectionist or free-trading, conservative or liberal. It is well to observe that the protectionist party in Canada, which might naturally be expected to favor a project of this character, is mainly composed of conservatives, who look with extreme dislike upon American institutions and are warm supporters of the imperial connection. But, whatever might be the opinion of the moment in Canada, it is quite clear that the sanction of the Parliament here to the creation of an American Zollverein could not be easily obtained.

HAZLITT'S PORTRAIT OF LAMB. — A portrait round which a very exceptional amount of literary interest clusters has, according to the Athenæum, been offered to the trustees of the National Portrait Gallery for purchase. It is a likeness of Charles Lamb, painted by the artist and essayist, William Hazlitt, and presented to Coleridge; Coleridge left it to his friend and host, Mr. Gillman, and from the widow of Mr. Gillman it has come to its present owner, Mr. Moger. The likeness has been spoken of with special approval by Crabb Robinson in his diary. This picture represents Lamb at the age of about thirty, in a sixteenth-century Spanish costume, half length and full size; the amount of lifelike, variable expression in the face is very considerable, and the execution is sufficiently good to show that Hazlitt, however superior he may have been as a writer, was not by any means without capacity as a painter. A duplicate of this portrait is in the possession of Mrs. Moxon; there cannot be a doubt that the original is the one now offered by Mr. Moger for purchase. It has been engraved in one of the collections of Lamb's letters, but the oil picture is vastly better than the engraving.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXIV. } No. 1792.—October 19, 1878. { From Beginning, Vol. CXXXIX.

CONTENTS.

I.	The Ceremonial Use of Flowers,	Nineteenth Century,	131
II.	Sir Gibbie. By George MacDonald, author of "Malcolm," "The Marquis of Lossie," etc.,	Advance Sheets,	143
III.	French Home Life. The Idea of Home,	Blackwood's Magazine,	152
IV.	Within the Precincts. By Mrs. Oliphant. Part XV.,	Advance Sheets,	161
V.	Holidays in Eastern France,	Fraser's Magazine,	172
VI.	Apologies,	Spectator,	186
VII.	For and Against Norway,	Spectator,	189
VIII.	Decorative Coloring in Freshwater Fleas,	Nature,	192

POETRY.

La Pellegrina Rondinella,	130	Emblem of True Philosophy,	130
"Dein Angesicht, so lieb und schon,"	130	"My Wife and Child come close to me,"	130
The Woods in Autumn,	130

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For Eight Dollars, remitted directly to the Publishers, the Living Age will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of The Living Age is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of Littell & Gay.

Single Numbers of The Living Age, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LA PELLEGRINA RONDINELLA.

BY THOMASSO GROSSI (Milan).

LITTLE pilgrim swallow, still
Thou dost perch upon my sill,
Singing every morning, till
My heart repeats thy plaintive rill;
What is wrong, tell me along,
Little swallow, in thy song?

Art forsaken by thy mate,
Abandoned and left desolate;
Or weep'st perhaps my cruel fate,
Seeing me disconsolate?
With sorrow wrung, my heart's unstrung,
Little swallow, by thy tongue.

Yet have I most cause to sigh
Thou canst on thy wings rely,
Skim the lake and soar on high,
Wake in echoes from the sky
Notes that each my prison reach,
Little swallow, with thy speech.

Ah! if I—but fates compel
Me dungeoned to this narrow cell,
Whence the sun may not dispel
The gloom that drowns my voice as well,
Lifted vain, in sad refrain,
Little swallow, to thy strain.

Now September is at hand
Thou wilt leave me with thy band,
Calling mountains, dreary sand,
Calling oceans, flowery land,
Without choice, to rejoice,
Little swallow, with thy voice.

Still shall I, awake from sleep
Opening my eyes to weep,
Though the earth with snow be deep,
Fresh thy love and pity keep;
Without restraint, to hear I'll feint,
Little swallow, still, thy plaint.

When spring comes in radiance bright,
A cross will stand upon yon height;
Little swallow, check thy flight,
Upon its topmost bar to light;
Salute my grave, and at its verge,
Little swallow, chant my dirge.

Cincinnati, July 21, '77. J. T. W.

"DEIN ANGESICHT, SO LIEB UND SCHON."

THY face, so sweet and fair to see,
Of late has come in my dreams to me;
It is so gentle, and angel-fair,
And yet so wan, so wan with care.

The lips are rose-red; but anon
Death kisses them, and they are wan;
And quench'd is the celestial light,
That from thy sweet eyes flashes bright.

HEINE.

THE WOODS IN AUTUMN.

A SONNET.

FLASHES of gold that fleck the sober grey;
Dark ruddy tints that crimson in the light;
Soft streaks of silver glimmering pearly white,
Amid the russet browns half hid away;
Pure green of spring that lingers while it may;
Patches of ivy-foliage dark as night;
Rich purple shades that peep out from the height:
Such crown with glory the September day.
Oh autumn woods! I lie beside the stream
That winds you round about so lovingly,
And rapt in sense of wondrous beauty, see
How vain must be ambition's lofty dream
To rival tints like yours, or dare to trace
Your perfect harmony, your perfect grace.

Cassell's Magazine. G. WEATHERLY.

EMBLEM OF TRUE PHILOSOPHY.

AT fashion's call, with cruel shears,
They cropped poor Tray's superfluous ears;
Twice shrieked the mutilated pup,
Then sniffed and ate the fragments up,
Nor stayed his losses to deplore,
But wagged his tail and roared for more.
Here, without Tupper, we may see
The marrow of philosophy,
The how and where, with natural ease,
To stow away our miseries;
Nor simply to gulp down our pain,
But turn disaster into gain;
And, when her scissors shear our pate,
To batten on the spoils of Fate.

G. S. CAUTLEY.

MY wife and child, come close to me,
The world to us is a stormy sea;
With your hands in mine, if your eyes but shine,
I care not how wild the storm may be.

For the fiercest wind that ever blew
Is nothing to me, so I shelter you:
No warmth do I lack, for the howl at my back
Sings down to my heart, "Man, bold and true."

A pleasant sail, my child! my wife!
O'er a pleasant sea, to many is life;
The wind blows warm, and they dread no storm,
And wherever they go, kind friends are rife.

But, wife and child! the love, the love,
That lifteth us to the saints above,
Could only have grown where storms have blown,
The truth and strength of the heart to prove.

EBENEZER JONES.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Nineteenth Century.

THE CEREMONIAL USE OF FLOWERS.

I.

THE use of flowers in religious rites and for sacrificial purposes is to be met with amongst the rudest and most primitive races of present and past times. Thus, at the latter part of the seventeenth century, Rochefort found the different tribes of Florida setting on the tops of trees, as offerings to the sun, skins of deer filled with the best fruits of the country, crowned with flowers and sweet-scented herbs. And in ceremonies connected with the burial or commemoration of the dead, we have what may be called an intimation of it even among the aborigines of Australia, — they place their dead between layers of green leaves. But it is with the inhabitants of the Pacific isles, amongst the natives of Polynesia and the Tonga Islands, that we shall perhaps find our best starting-point.

Throughout Polynesia the natives have invariably shown a great fondness for flowers, and all books of travel tell of the graceful garlands woven by them to be worn round the head and neck on various occasions of religious solemnity or social rejoicing. The Tahitians were obliged by their climate to practice early interment of the dead, except in cases of embalmment; but so long as they were able to keep a body, they rested it, covered with the choicest white native cloth and decked with wreaths and garlands of the sweetest flowers in bloom, on a bier spread with fragrant green leaves. The floor of the dwelling in which it lay was also strewn with fragrant leaves. When bodies were embalmed, relatives or friends kept them unburied for a considerable period. In this case a light kind of altar was erected near the corpse, and on it articles of food, fruits and garlands and flowers were daily deposited. If the deceased was a chief of rank or fame, a person was specially appointed to attend the corpse and present food to its mouth. The reason of these customs is remarkable, and furnishes a good illustration of savage or primitive animism. The Tahitians had a notion that the scent was the spirit of the offering, and corresponded to the spirit of man, and that consequently it would be grateful to the departed, and would appease any desire they might have to return and partake of the enjoyments of this life. In order to secure the admission of a departed spirit to the joys of their paradise, the Samoans thought it necessary, after they had arrayed the corpse in the best raiment they could provide, to wreath its head with flowers, and then to place upon the body a pig baked whole surrounded by a pile of vegetable food: the pig and food were propitiatory offerings to the god Tiki. Turner mentions a curious custom existing in New Caledonia, when he visited it early in the present century, in connection with the prevailing belief in disease-makers. If a man was suspected of witchcraft, and supposed to have caused thereby the death of several persons, he was formally condemned. Immediately after sentence had been passed on him, a great festival was held, during which the criminal, decked with a garland of red flowers and shells, with his arms and legs covered with flowers and shells, and his face and his body painted black, dashed into the midst of the assembled people, and, jumping over the rocks into the sea, paid the penalty of his supposed crime by the forfeiture of his life. At the ceremony of initiation into the Areoi brotherhood, flowers were also in requisition. The candidate on presenting himself for admission — a step he was held to take by the direct inspiration of the gods, and which he took in a state of apparent neneva or derangement — wore round his loins a girdle of yellow plantain or ti leaves; his face was stained with the scarlet dye mati; his brow was decorated with a shade of curiously plaited cocoanut leaves; and his hair, perfumed with powerfully scented oil, was ornamented with a profusion of fragrant flowers. The altars set up for the occasion were covered with sacred boughs, and ornamented with a border or fringe of rich yellow plantain leaves.

Often on the occasion of religious ceremonies, simple leaves were substituted for flowers. Mariner gives an instance of this in his account of the sacrifice of a child by the Tonga islanders to appease their god, offended by sacrilege. After

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the child had been strangled, the body was placed upon a sort of handbarrow, supported on the shoulders of four men, and carried in a procession of priests, chiefs, and matabooles clothed in mats, with wreaths of green leaves round their necks. Again, when Finow went to perform the ceremony of toogi at the grave of his father at Mafanga, the burial-place of the greatest Tonga chiefs from time immemorial, he and the several chiefs and matabooles who accompanied him, put on mats made of the leaves of the ifi tree, and wreaths of the same round their necks in token of respect and humility, before they approached the grave to lay the cava root on it. This same chief Finow, when his daughter, to whom he was passionately attached, died, and when her body, washed and anointed, and laid in a large cedar chest, had been strewn with wreaths of flowers, made for the purpose by her female attendants, issued an order forbidding any one to appear at her burial wearing a wreath of ifi leaves. Instead, he required every one to wear a wreath of flowers as if dressed for an occasion of rejoicing. At the inâchi, a kind of first-fruits festival, all the Tonga men and women who walked in the procession wore wreaths of flowers. And certainly, flowers were not lacking at marriages. Then the guests, both men and women, wore them as well as the bride.

II.

THE Chechemecas and other peoples of Anuach held flowers to be the most pleasing offerings, next after human sacrifices, they could make to their deities. Indeed, when their religion was limited to the worship of the sun and moon, their sacrifices consisted solely of the herbs and flowers they found springing in the fields, together with fruits and copal; and it was not until the example of the Aztecs familiarized them with the barbarous practice, that they sought to propitiate their gods by the destruction of human life.

The sacrificial observances of the Aztecs or Mexicans were most elaborate: in addition to human victims they offered animals, birds, and flowers in the special worship of special divinities. Thus quails and falcons were sacred to the god Huitzilopochlti; to the sun also they made a daily offering of quails; hares, rabbits, and deer were sacrificed to the god Mixcoatl; and to Tlaloe and Coatlicue they consecrated the first-blown flowers of the season. In the third month — about the beginning of April — the Xochemanqui, or those who traded in flowers, celebrated the festival of Coatlicue, the goddess of flowers. On this occasion the offerings consisted of curiously woven garlands, and it was forbidden to every one to smell the flowers of which they were composed, before their dedication to the goddess. A singular refinement of worship to exist side by side of the most revolting sacrifice of human life! At the feast of the great god Tezcatlipoca flowers formed a prominent feature in the ceremonies with which it was celebrated. Ten days before it, a priest wearing the badges that distinguished the god, issued from the temple, carrying a bunch of flowers in his hands, and a little flute made of clay, with which he summoned all the people to prayer; the sound of the flute, a very shrill one, was repeated every day until the festival itself, when the image of the god, bound with thick cords of wreaths of maize — emblematical of drought which the people sought to prevent — and with a garland on its head, was borne aloft in procession by priests. All the youths and virgins of the temple, as well as the nobles of the court, joined in the procession, having similar wreaths or toxcatls about their necks and in their hands. The lower area of the temple through which they passed was strewn with flowers and herbs, and when the idol was carried back to its altar the people made abundant offerings of gold, gems, flowers, feathers, animals, and food to it. The festival of Huixtocihuatl, the goddess of salt — there are salt mines in Mexico — was opened by a great dance of women, who, joined to one another by strings or cords of different flowers and wearing garlands of wormwood on their heads, moved in a circle round a female prisoner clothed in the habit of the idol of the goddess. This dance continued throughout the night, and on the following morning the dance of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the priests, which lasted the whole day with no other interruption than the sacrifice of prisoners, began. During it they held in their hands the beautiful yellow flowers called by the Mexicans *cemporalxochitl. At sunset the sacrifice of the prisoner closed these strange rites. In the ninth month the second festival of Huitzilopochtli was kept, when, in addition to the usual ceremonies that marked the first, all the idols were adorned with flowers; not only those worshipped in the temples, but those likewise which were kept in houses for private devotion.

On, and during the first year after the death of a king, human sacrifices were numerous, but in each succeeding year on the anniversary of the funeral they were replaced by sacrifices of rabbits, butterflies, quails, and other birds, and by oblations of bread, wine, and copal flowers.

The great quantities of flowers required for the worship of their gods, both in temples and private oratories, stimulated, no doubt, the genius of the Mexicans for horticulture, which was eminently displayed in their famous floating gardens; but the purposes of worship were not the sole end that called for the exercise of their skill in the cultivation of flowers. Customs prevailed amongst them that prescribed the presentation of flowers at stated times to the king, the lords, ambassadors, and other persons of rank. Moreover, the great nobles themselves, who were privileged to enjoy the temporary use and profits of the tecpantlalli or crown lands, held these subject to a tribute of nosegays of flowers, and different kinds of birds, which they were bound to present to the king whenever they visited him. And with the exception of certain liabilities to repair and rebuild the royal palaces, and to assist in the cultivation of the royal gardens by directing the labors of the populace of their respective districts, the tenure of crown lands consisted of these tributes alone. One other use of flowers obtaining amongst the Mexicans deserves notice. It was customary, when a maiden, destined from her infancy to the service of the gods, attained the age of sixteen or eighteen, for her parents to seek a husband for her, and, having found one, to request the permission of the tehantiohuatzin to settle her in marriage. The request was accompanied by a studied address in which they thanked him for the care and attention he had bestowed on the education of their daughter, and also by a gift consisting of flowers, a number of quails on curiously varnished plates, and a quantity of copal and food. And now, with a brief quotation from the speech of one of the envoys to the perfidious Tezozomoc, illustrative of the simplicity of the regal insignia of the early Chechemecas, we will conclude our brief survey of Mexican flower usages. After the Toltecan envoy had spoken, his bold Chechemecan colleague thus addressed the tyrant: "I, my lord, may speak to you with greater confidence and liberty, as I am a Chechemeca, and address myself to a prince of my own nation who is a descendant of the great kings Xolotl, Nopaltzin and Tlotzin. You are not ignorant that those divine Chechemecas, your ancestors, set no value on gold or precious stones. They wore no other crown on their heads than a garland of herbs and flowers of the field, nor adorned themselves with any other bracelets than the stiff leather against which beat the string of their bow in shooting."

* The cemporalxochitl, or chempas-cuhil as the Spaniards call it, is known to the French as the œillet d'Inde, Indian carnation. It is very common in Mexico, where it is also called the "flower of the dead."

III.

THOSE who are familiar with Moore's "Hindu Pantheon" will remember a graceful outline representing Vishnu, reposing on the serpent Cesha, willing and contemplating the creation of the world: the creative power Brahmā is seen springing forth upon a lotus flower. In another plate, representing Sītā's reunion with Rāma after her fiery ordeal to satisfy the world of her chaste escape from the power of Rāvana, Rāma is seen throwing the chaplet of marriage round her neck, whilst from above the pushpa-vrishti or flower-rain, falls on both of them. The peculiar tenets of the Brahmin creed shown in these two pictures seem to offer at least a partial explanation of the lavish use of flowers in their religious rites by the fol-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

lowers of Brahma and Bouddha, and which indeed far exceeds that of even the Mexicans. Flowers and garlands, according to Sir J. Emerson Tennent, are introduced in their worship to the utmost extent. The atmosphere of the wiharas and temples, he says, is rendered oppressive with the perfume of champac and jessamine. And the shrines of the gods and the steps leading to the temples are thickly strewn with blossoms of the nagaha and the lotus, which it is the special duty of priests to renew daily. The traditions of the profuse employment of flowers at an early period are almost incredible. For instance, we read in the "Mahâwanso," the most renowned of Singhalese chronicles, that the Ruanwellé dagoba (it was two hundred and seventy feet high) was on one occasion festooned with garlands from pedestal to pinnacle till it resembled one uniform bouquet. At another time it and the lofty dagoba at Mihintala were buried under heaps of jessamine and other native flowers. A further idea of the extent of the practice may be gained from the list of the various religious edifices erected by Prakrama Bahu in different parts of his kingdom, likewise given in the "Mahâwanso." It enumerates one hundred and ninety-two rooms for the purpose of offering flowers. Fa Hian, the Chinese traveller, in the description of his pilgrimage through Buddhist kingdoms, speaks with the enthusiasm of a devotee of the wealth of flowers and perfumes with which the Singhalese paid homage to their god at the festival of the Mountain without Fear during his visit to Anarajapoora at the beginning of the fifth century. And native historians are said to allude constantly, as familiar incidents, to the profusion of flowers used on ordinary occasions, and to the formation by successive kings of innumerable gardens for the floral requirements of the temples. The capital was surrounded on all sides by flower gardens ; and in such numbers that according to the "Rájá-ratnácari" one was to be found within a distance of four leagues in any part of Ceylon. In the same chronicle it is recorded that in the fifteenth century a king offered no less than 6,480,320 sweet-smelling flowers at the shrine of the Tooth. And the regulations of the temple at Dambedenia in the thirteenth century prescribed "every day an offering of one hundred thousand blossoms, and each day a different kind of flower." Even in the demon worship, which was the prevailing worship of the Singhalese before the introduction of Buddhism by Mahindo, flowers were required. Sir J. Emerson Tennent in his work on Ceylon gives some curious facts about the gok-bandeema, the consecration of trees, by means of wreaths of leaves, to different demons to insure their safety. To him also we are indebted for an account of the ceremonies performed by the kattadias or devil-priests. They take place on every domestic occurrence of joy or calamity, and are, he says, generally accomplished with observances so barbarous as to be the most revolting evidence still extant of the uncivilized habits of the Singhalese. In a case of sickness when the help of a devil-dancer is sought, an altar, decorated with garlands and flowers, is raised within sight of the dying man, who is directed to touch and dedicate to the evil spirit the wild flowers and rice and flesh prepared and laid upon it, as the pidaneys or offerings, to be made at sunset, at midnight, and in the morning. The dewol-modoowa — a ceremony that seemingly incorporates the worship of the whole host of infernal deities (the Singhalese have a demon or sanne for each form of disease), and that is celebrated on a big scale, and frequently in behalf of an entire village or district afflicted by cholera or the fever dreaded by the natives — is held in a madoowa, a temporary building constructed of branches and decorated with white cloths, where for seven successive days offerings are made of wild flowers and fruit, together with rice and money.

In one part of the marriage rite of the Hindoos — and a very complex rite it is — the officiating priest binds the hands of the bride and bridegroom together with a garland of flowers, like as the Armenians do ; and when the bride has been formally given away and received, the garland is removed during the recital, by the father of the bride, of the Gāyatri, the holiest verse of the Vedas.

Prodigal of flowers in the worship of their gods, the Buddhists use them without stint for the service of the dead. When a little child, a child under two years of age, dies, the body is not burned, but decked with flowers they lay it in a grave whilst a priest chants the song of Yama. When an adult dies, the nearest relatives carry the corpse, washed, perfumed, and decked with wreaths of flowers, to the funeral pile, previously prepared and decorated with strung and unstrung blossoms, at some spot in a forest or near water. After the burning of the body, an oblation of a funeral cake garlanded with fragrant flowers and betel leaves is made on a small altar placed near the door of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the deceased or close by running water. This is followed by further offerings of a lamp, water, and wreaths of flowers. On the last day of mourning, namely, on the tenth day, a fresh oblation is made of blossoms, tila, and water, succeeded by a still more elaborate one of perfumes, flowers, and durva grass. Then a funeral cake is offered, together with blossoms, perfumes, resin, and betel leaves, which the priest sprinkles with water and rice, saying meanwhile, "May the waters be auspicious, may the blossoms be sweet," etc. After these and various other ceremonies, the priest lights a lamp in honor of the deceased and goes to collect the ashes. Finally, the son or nearest relative of the dead man, accompanied by his kinsmen, proceeds to the burial ground bearing eight vessels filled with yet other offerings of flowers, roots, and such like things. In fact, turn where we will at the present day in any part of those vast countries where ancient Buddhism, unchanged through centuries that may now be reckoned by decades, still holds its sway, dominating one fourth of the human race — in Thibet and Tartary and China, the Flowery Empire, in Japan and Ceylon, in India, throughout the Oriental Archipelago — on every side floral offerings meet our view. Now almost concealing the wreck of ruined but still venerated shrines; now veiling the idols of a religion abhorrent to civilized nations in the grossness of its symbolism; or, better still, softening with their living beauty the sad aspect of the cities of the dead, and again and again bearing witness to the undying belief in a future life.

In a formal treatment of our subject it would be impossible to leave this part of it without special mention of the flower customs of the land of Zoroaster. But as it is, I must content myself with simply repeating, for the benefit of those who did not see it when it was made some twelve months since, Dr. George Birdwood's communication to the Athenæum on "Persian Flower Worship:" —

> Very beautiful is the Persian love for flowers. In Bombay I found the Parsees use the Victoria Gardens chiefly to walk in, "to eat the air" — "to take a constitutional," as we say. Their enjoyment of it was heartily animal. The Hindu would stroll unsteadfastly through it, attracted from flower to flower, not by its form or color, but its scent. He would pass from plant to plant, snatching at the flowers and crushing them between his fingers as if he were taking snuff. His pleasure in the flowers was utterly sensual. Presently a true Persian, in flowing robe of blue, and on his head his sheepskin hat — "black, glossy, curl'd, the fleece of Kar-Kal" — would saunter in, and stand and meditate over every flower he saw, and always as if half in vision. And when the vision was fulfilled and the ideal flower he was seeking found, he would spread his mat and sit before it until the setting of the sun, and then pray before it, and fold up his mat again and go home. And the next night, and night after night, until that particular flower faded away, he would return to it, and bring his friends in ever-increasing troops to it, and sit and play the guitar or lute before it, and they would all together pray there, and after prayer still sit before it, sipping sherbet, and talking the most hilarious and shocking scandal late into the moonlight; and so again and again every evening until the flower died. Sometimes, by way of a grand finale, the whole company would suddenly rise before the flower and serenade it together with an ode from Hafiz and depart.

IV.

In spite of what has been urged against it, it is difficult to avoid seeing something more than a mere accidental resemblance in the ceremonial and symbolical use of the lotus by the Egyptians and the Hindoos. And the very fact that the flower was, with the former, a symbol of Nofra Atmoo, the defender and protector of the world, is of itself evidence, notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary, that it was held in veneration by the worshippers of Isis and Osiris as well as by the votaries of Bouddha, — evidence that is strengthened by representations of the infant deity Ehōou, the god of day, rising from a lotus flower; and by those of the final judgment scene before Osiris seated on his throne, attended by Isis and Nephthys, with the four genii of Amenti standing on a lotus flower in front: all of which recall more or less the peculiar features of Hindoo worship already noticed.

The Egyptians were great gardeners. And they used flowers, both those they cultivated and those that did not require their care, in every circumstance of life. When an Egyptian approached a place of divine worship, he invariably held the flower of the agrostis or lotus in his hand; and examples of the custom are so numerous, so unmistakable, so perfect, on sepulchral tablets and other Egyptian monuments of antiquity, as to render Diodorus's account of it quite unnecessary as a source of information. Oblations of flowers were a distinctive and striking feature amongst the costly gifts of gold and silver vessels, jewels, robes, precious ointments and perfumes, that the Egyptians used to make to their gods. Sometimes a single blossom

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

without any other kind of gift was offered; or the oblation consisted of carefully arranged bouquets of prescribed form, made of the papyrus or lotus only: or it was formed of a variety of flowers, those most grateful or useful to man being chosen as most acceptable to the gods. The papyri at the British Museum furnish admirable illustrations of this rite. For instance, the papyrus of Mutemna, priestess of Amen-Ra; or, better, that of Ta-ma, with vignettes of several chapters of the "book of the dead," or "ritual." But the papyrus of Mutnetem, a queen, lent by the Prince of Wales, is perhaps the most interesting and the most beautiful of all the papyri now to be seen there. It, like that of Ta-ma, represents an image of Re or Ra, but the altar of the god piled up with lotus blossoms and other offerings is much larger than that in the Ta-ma, and the offerings, from the perfect state of preservation of the papyrus and the brightness of the colors, are as clear and as distinct as if they had been painted but yesterday. Sometimes wreaths and garlands were laid upon the altars, or the statues of the gods were crowned with them: an observance, Pliny tells us, most faithfully maintained by Ptolemæus. The helichrysos was in great request for these wreaths, both on account of its beautiful golden color and because it does not fade. At the annual and solemn festival of the shrines, mentioned by Diodorus,* and likewise on the Rosetta stone,† flowers were specially required, not only to decorate the shrines and the statues of the gods carried in procession, but also for the sacrificial ceremonies that followed, and which, when the king happened to be present, it was his privilege to perform. On such occasions he was frequently accompanied by the queen holding a sistrum in one hand, and in the other a bouquet of flowers made in a form peculiar to the rite.

The Egyptians believed the soul to be not only immortal, but a portion of the divine essence that after death and judgment was, if found unsullied by its habitation in the flesh, again united to the Deity of which it was an emanation; hence, they worshipped their dead with divine honors, that is, they made oblations to them similar to the ordinary oblations in honor of the gods; and they hailed them with the hallowed name of Osiris. In addition to such public rites, private commemorations were constantly made by priests on altars set up for the purpose in the buildings where mummies were kept till they were consigned to the tomb. They consisted of libation and of offerings, including flowers and fruit. In the interval between embalmment and burial, social feasts were likewise held in honor of the dead, at which the guests, relatives and friends of the deceased were decked with flowers.

As regards military triumphs, we find that, on returning from war, the army as it passed through Egypt was met at each of the principal cities by a concourse of people, headed by the priests and chief men of the place bearing garlands, bouquets, and palm branches, to welcome its return. At the general thanksgiving in the principal temple of the city that followed their return to the capital, the soldiers — who to a man were obliged to take part in the ceremony, and to return thanks for the victories they had gained, as well as for their personal preservation — though they did not have flowers, carried each one in his hand a twig of some tree, supposed to be the olive or bay, which was ultimately laid on one of the altars of sacrifice.

Their keen appreciation of variety in trees and flowers led the Egyptians to exact contributions of rare specimens from tributary nations; and plants figure among the presents brought by foreigners to Egyptian kings. Their passion for flowers was still further exhibited in the paintings of their walls; floral forms were woven in their textile fabrics; and indeed, whatever they wished to ornament they ornamented with them. Nay, according to Pliny, they even made artificial flowers, hence called Ægyptiæ; and Pliny's affirmation has been confirmed by recent discoveries in tombs.

Wreaths and chaplets for personal adornment were in common use amongst the Egyptians at a very early period; and though the lotus was preferred for the purpose, many other flowers and leaves were employed — such as the chrysanthemum, acinon, acacia, Strychnus persoluta, anemone, convolvulus, olive, bay-tree and others. We have it on the authority of Plutarch, that when Agesilaus, king of Sparta, visited Egypt, he was so delighted with the chaplets of papyrus sent him by the king, that he took some home with him. At social entertainments, as soon as the ceremony of anointing with precious unguents was over, a lotus flower was presented to each guest, who held it in his or

* . . . ἐν ταῖς πανηγύρεσι τῶν ναῶν ἀνακομιζομένων εἰς ὄρος ἄνθεσι παντοίοις ὑπὸ τῶν ἱερέων κατεστρωμένον. — Lib. i., cap. 97.

† Line 42 of the Greek text.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

her hand during the feast. Servants next brought necklaces of flowers, chiefly of the lotus; and if we bear in mind that this was done as a mark of respect, the suggestion that Pharao simply observed the custom in kingly fashion when he put a chain of gold round Joseph's neck, will not seem fanciful, as it otherwise might. A garland was also put round the head, to which a single lotus bud or a full-blown flower was so attached as to hang down the very centre of the forehead. Sometimes a cluster of blossoms occupied the place of the single bud or blossom. Lotus flowers made up into wreaths and other devices were suspended on stands placed about the room, or separately they were set in amphoræ or jars ready for immediate use: whilst servants were constantly employed to bring other flowers fresh from the garden to supply the guests anew, as their bouquets and garlands faded; attendants too were employed to hold flowers for the guests to smell. They sometimes crowned the bowl with wreaths of flowers; and a vase filled with blossoms of the lotus was, Sir G. Wilkinson says, frequently placed on a stand before the master of the house, or presented to him by an attendant. All, or nearly all, of these special characteristics of the social life of the Egyptians are to be found in the mural paintings from Thebes, forming part of the collection of Egyptian antiquities in the British Museum; and last year Mr. Long, in his "Egyptian Feast," recalled some of them, though he has certainly given them less prominence than they received at the hands of Theban artists.

V.

THERE is comparatively little mention by Jewish authors of the use of flowers by the Hebrews for either religious or other purposes. Still there is sufficient to show that what they loved pre-eminently in parable and simile, they, like other Oriental nations, did not fail to turn to direct account in times of public and private rejoicing. The bloody sacrifices and holocausts of the Mosaic dispensation necessarily lessened, if they did not altogether dispense with, opportunities for their sacrificial use; and indeed it seems doubtful whether in the adornment of victims, and at the great festival of first fruits, they formed a regular, or at all events a conspicuous feature of the ceremonial. In the Mischna mention is made of the wreath of olive set on the head of the ox that went before the bearers of first fruits to Jerusalem, to be offered a sacrifice of peace; but there is no express notice of garlands, such as occurs of the pagan use of them in the chapter of the Acts of the Apostles describing how the people of Lystra would sacrifice to Paul and Barnabas as gods, and the "priest of Jupiter that was before the city bringing oxen and garlands [ταύρους καὶ στέμματα], would have offered sacrifice with them." Again, much is said of the crowning of the first fruits: ". . . et quando propius accedebant Jerusolymam, mittebant ad eos qui coronabant primitiva." One commentator, interpreting these words, "et coronabant primitiva eorum," says, "Id est, adornabant, conjugentes ficus et uvas recentes cum ficibus siccis et passis, quas eo modo adducebant; si vero omnes erant recentes, indicium erat bonitatis et præstantiæ, adornantes eas botris uvarum." And the reason given for the need of the coronatio recentibus is, that often fresh figs and grapes would not bear the long journey those distant from Jerusalem had to make, and that consequently the more excellent offering of fresh fruit was added to the dried as they neared the city, "præstantiores ostendebant superius." But what really constituted the primitiarum coronatio is a much-disputed point. Spencer in his elaborate treatise on the Hebrew ritual says that there is scarcely any point in the whole Mischna that the Jewish rabbis have studied with greater labor and less effect to explain than this. He himself inclines to the opinion that various modes of crowning the first fruits, including wreaths and garlands of flowers, obtained amongst them, on the ground that various forms of crowning for the various conditions of first-fruit offerings obtained among contemporary heathen nations, whose coronatio primitiarum consisted sometimes of a heaping up of the first fruits in the form of a crown; at other times of a crown properly so called, or garlands of flowers set on the top or around the first fruits. They held it to be a pious and religious act to crown all things having regard to religious worship. "Sacrificantes id quod Diis offerebant, vel acceptum etiam referebant, coronabant." In proof of the antiquity of the crowning of victims by the Jews, Spencer quotes the following passage from Philo Judæus on Nadab and Abihu: "Fire went forth from heaven and consumed all things that were on the altar, victims and chaplets, ὁλοαυτώματα καὶ τὰ στέμματα." In the rites observed at the Feast of the Tabernacles, where naturally we should expect a distinct mention of flowers, there is none. This is the more remarkable, because the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

omission cannot arise from a lack of appreciation of their beauty and the pleasure to be derived from them. The Hebrews possessed it, and at times showed it to a degree that surpassed even the intensity of Hellenic sensuousness. A famous passage in the Second Book of Wisdom is an instance in point: "Let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments, and let not the flower of the time pass by us. Let us crown ourselves with roses before they be withered. Let no meadow escape our riot. . . . Let us everywhere leave tokens of our joy." The twenty-eighth chapter of Isaias furnishes another argument that they indulged in extravagances similar to those of the Greeks: "Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, and to the fading flower the glory of his joy, who were on the head of the fat valley, staggering with wine. The crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim shall be trodden under feet. And the fading flower, the glory of his joy who is on the head of the fat valley, shall be as a hasty fruit before the ripeness of autumn."

The fact that a woman did or did not wear a myrtle wreath at her marriage — the myrtle wreath was probably of much later origin than the golden city — was, in the event of her widowhood or divorce, a matter of great importance to her; on it often depended the amount of her ketubah or jointure. It is laid down in the Mischna that "a woman who becoming widowed or divorced asserts, As a virgin I was married, while he [the husband or his heir] asserts, No! as a widow thou wast married, in her case should there be evidence to prove that she went to be married in a myrtle wreath and with her hair flowing, her ketubah is two hundred dinar." In the same code, amongst the cases in which men were to be believed should they offer to testify, when grown up, to what they have seen while children, occurs the following: "A man is to be believed who affirms . . . I remember that the woman A. B. went forth to be married with a myrtle wreath and flowing hair." Consequently she was married as a virgin, and entitled to a ketubah of two hundred dinar. The ketubah of a widow was only a maneh, namely, one hundred dinar. During the war with Vespasian bridegrooms' crowns were prohibited by special decree. And in the war with Titus a decree was passed prohibiting brides' crowns. Opinions differ as to which of the various crowns worn by a bridegroom were touched by the decree. Some rabbis maintained that those only made of crystal or bdellion were meant; others contended that the decree included both these and those of myrtle and roses, and that wreaths of reeds or plaited rushes alone were allowed, "ex cannis aut junco plectebantur;" others again maintained that every kind was forbidden. The decree concerning the crown worn by a bride apparently had regard only to the very ancient one called the golden city.

Flowers were used by the Jews in times of public rejoicing and when they wished to show marked honor to individual persons. They knew too that the custom existed among other nations. Witness the reception of Holofernes by the people of Syria and Mesopotamia and Libya and Cilicia in the book of Judith: "And so great a fear lay upon all those provinces, that the inhabitants of all the cities, both princes and nobles as well as the people, went out to meet him at his coming, and received him with garlands and lights and timbrels and flutes. And though they did these things they could not for all that mitigate the fierceness of his heart." It is moreover said that Judith crowned herself with lilies when she set out for the tent of Holofernes, because the Jews held the lily to counteract all witchcraft and enchantments. But Grotius thinks that the lilies of Judith hung from her neck; and from the context they were evidently gold ornaments. When she returned, "all the women of Israel ran together to see her and blessed her and made a dance among them for her, and she took a thyrsus in her hand and gave others to the women that were with her, and they wore crowns of olive both she and her companions, and she went before all the people in the dance, leading all the women, and all the men of Israel followed wearing their arms, with garlands, and singing hymns." * Tirinus remarks that here we have a picture or figure of Christian processions, "with pomp of vestments, flowers, branches, music, lights, arms, and solemn movements, since every creature must praise the Creator." And Calmet, commenting on the same passage, says that crowns of olive for women are so rare, that this is the only example related of the Hebrews. Then Philo Judæus, in his celebtated epistle to Caius Cæsar, reminds the emperor of how, after his visit to Jerusalem, his grandfather Marcus Agrippa was conducted down to the sea by the people, not of one city only, but of all the

* The Vulgate edition of Judith is translated from the Chaldean. The ancient Greek version, which I have chiefly followed, is more diffuse.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

country, οὐχ ὑπὸ μιᾶς πόλεως, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ τῆς χώρας ἁπάσης, strewing the road with branches of flowers on account of his piety. And, finally, Josephus relates that Jaddus, overwhelmed with terror at the approach of Alexander and his army, the night after sacrifice was admonished by God in a dream to take courage, and after adorning the city with garlands, to open the gates, himself and the priests dressed in their priestly habits, attended by persons in white clothes, and to go to meet them, without any fear or apprehension, relying on his providence. Upon this admonition he was roused out of his sleep and seemed extremely rejoiced, after which he told the revelation to all, and having performed everything as he had been ordered in his dream, he waited for the king's arrival.

VI.

Θάλλει δ' οὐρανίας ὑπ' ἄχνας ὁ καλλίβοτρυς κατ' ἦμαρ ἀεὶ νάρκισσος, μεγάλαιν θεαῖν *ἀρχαῖον στεφάνωμ'.

THE exquisite chorus of Sophocles from which these lines are taken gives at once the most beautiful description of Colonos and the key to customs that entered more deeply into Greek life than they entered into the life of any of the peoples I have named. If the ancient coronet of the mighty goddesses themselves was formed of the narcissus, what offerings more pleasing than offerings of flowers could their suppliants make them? Greek and Roman alike, it would seem, thought none, and so back into far-distant times we trace them. The στέμματα borne by Chryses in honor of far-darting Apollo, when he went to ransom his daughter, are supposed to designate a garland of flowers; and it was evidently held in great veneration from the words of Agamemnon harshly dismissing the old man: "Let me not find thee at the hollow barks, either now loitering or hereafter returning, lest the staff and garland of the god avail thee not [Μή νύ τοι οὐ χραίσμῃ σκῆπτρον καὶ στέμμα θεοῖο], for her I will not set free." Again, in the "Suppliants" of Æschylus, the suppliant girl reminds the king to "pay religious regard to the stern of the ship (the city) with a crown on it," Αἰδοῦ σὺ πρύμναν πόλεως ὠδ' ἐστεμμένην, meaning the altar with its garland or suppliant bough. In the "Birds" of Aristophanes, Pisthetairus bids the priest, "Begone from us both you and your garlands, for I alone will sacrifice this myself." And in his "Peace," Tyrgæus announces, "The basket is ready containing coarse barley and a garland and a knife; and see here is a fire too, and nothing detains us but the sheep." During the ninth year of the Peloponnesian War, Thucydides relates, the temple of Juno at Argos was burned down in consequence of Chrysis, the priestess, having set a lighted torch near the garlands, and fallen asleep afterwards. The garlands all caught fire, and the mischief was irremediable before she perceived it. Garlands once offered were left hanging on the altars after they had faded. On the setting out of the sacred "mission ship" from Athens to Delos, the ship was solemnly consecrated to Apollo by a chaplet placed on the stem at the moment of starting. This practice was closely connected with the delay in carrying out the sentence of death passed on Socrates, as all who know the celebrated passage at the beginning of Plato's "Phædo" will remember. And who does not recollect, —

Ipsa Paphum sublimis abit, sedesque revisit
Læta suas, ubi templum illi centumque Sabæo Thure calent aræ, sertisque recentibus halant;

or again, —

Nos delubra deûm miseri, quibus ultimus esset
Ille dies, festa velamus fronde per urbem.

And the altar to the manes of the unhappy Polydore decked with leaden-colored wreaths and gloomy cypress;

Cæruleis mœstæ vittis atraque cupresso.

And Anchises when he made libation for a safe voyage wreathed the bowl;

Tum pater Anchises magnum cratera corona
Induit, implevitque mero, divosque vocavit.

In Virgil too the ill-starred Dido calls the attention of her sister to the ships with their sterns crowned with garlands ready for departure,

Puppibus et læti nautæ imposuere coronas, who herself was wont to garland her husband's marble shrine

Velleribus niveis et festa fronde revinctum, and who also wreathed her own funeral pyre;

Intenditque locum sertis, et fronde coronat Funerea.

* And ever day by day the narcissus with its beauteous clusters, the ancient coronet of the mighty goddesses, bursts into bloom by heaven's dew. — Œdipus Coloneus.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

As a good instance of the votive use of chaplets I may cite the twelfth satire of Juvenal. Catullus, threatened with a shipwreck, vows offering to the gods: he is saved, and they are made.

Ite igitur, pueri, linguis animisque faventes,
Sertaque delubris, et farra imponite cultris,
Ac molles ornate focos, glebamque virentem.
Jam sequar, et sacro, quod præstat, rite peracto
Inde domum repetam, graciles ubi parva coronas
Accipiunt fragili simulacra nitentia cera.

At the second of the Arateia, the sacrifices offered by command of the oracle twice every year at Sicyon in honor of Aratus, all the senators assisting wore garlands. And the Greeks and Romans, like the Aztecs, dedicated particular flowers to individual deities. We have seen that the narcissus belonged to the mighty goddesses; the poppy was also sacred to Ceres; Venus had her anemone; Hera the lily; Artemis the myrtle; and Sappho crowns the Muses with Pierian roses. At the celebration of the rites of Ceres, her priestess was wont to carry poppies in her hand: "Forthwith she [Ceres] likened herself to Niceppe, whom the State had appointed her public priestess, and she grasped in her hand the fillets and poppies, and kept her key on her shoulders." * From Ovid's "History of Sacrifice" we get another point of resemblance between the primitive sacrifices of the people of Anuach and Mexico and those of early classic times. In the old days, he says, the knife of the present day had no employment in the sacred rites. The altar used to send forth its smoke contented with Sabine herbs, and the laurel was burned with no crackling noise. If there was any one who could add violets to the chaplets wrought from the flowers of the meadow, he was a rich man.

Abont two years ago considerable excitement was created in archæological circles by the discovery in Rome of the ancient Porta Fontinalis on the very spot on which, in 1825, Stephano Piale, in a series of lectures, with marvellous sagacity sought to establish its site. The gate took its name from the festival of the fountains — "Fontinalia fontium sacra unde et Romæ Fontinalis porta" — a high day and holiday of regal Rome. "Fontinalia festus erat dies Romæ, quo in fontes coronas projiciebant, puteosque coronabant, ut a quibus pellucidos liquores ad restinguendam sitim acciperent, iisdem gratiam referre hoc ritu viderentur." Any one who visits our own Dorsetshire coast at the beginning of the fishing season may still witness a survival of the old pagan custom of crowning the waters; not, it is true, as a thank-offering, like the Fontinalia for benefits bestowed on the thirsty, but as a propitiatory offering to obtain food for the hungry. The fishermen of Weymouth, on the first of May, put out to sea to cast on the waves garlands which they take with them for the purpose. And this survival is but another link in the chain that connects us with the yet more primitive practice of the red Indian, who secures a safe passage across Lake Superior or down the Mississippi, by gifts of precious tobacco, which he wafts to the great spirit of the flood on the bosom of its waters.

Examples of Greek and Roman reverence for the dead bearing upon our subject are so numerous that it is no easy matter to select from amongst them. They crowd upon us. When a Greek died, the nearest female relatives — not a hireling or stranger such as the Roman pollinctor — assembled to perform the last offices. Having placed the obolus in the mouth of the dead, and washed and anointed the body with precious perfumes and clothed it in a splendid white garment, they crowned the head with flowers of the season, τοῖς ὡραίοις ἄνθεσι. In addition to this, the Romans sometimes covered the couch on which the dead body lay with leaves and flowers. It was likewise a universal custom for the relatives and friends of one just dead, especially if the deceased was young, to carry wreaths of flowers to the house or place of burial of such a one. At the χοαί, the ceremony at the grave, libations of milk, honey, water, wine, and offerings of flowers and olives, were made; and after burial the grave was constantly crowned and adorned with wreaths. When Atossa, in the "Persians" of Æschylus, filled with terror, sought to allay her fears by bearing propitiatory offerings, "things which are soothing charms to the dead," to the tomb of Darius, the sire of her child, she took with her wreathed flowers, children of the all-teeming earth, ἄνθη πλεκτὰ παμφόρου γαίας τέκνα. And Chrysothemis, when she bore her own and Electra's offerings to their father's grave, saw "from the top of the mound fresh running streams of milk, and my sire's grave garlanded all around with every flower that grows." A beautiful picture of filial piety, καὶ περιστεφῆ κύκλῳ πάντων ὅσ' ἐστὶν ἀνθέων θῆκην πατρός. And the complaint of Petala to Simmalion,

* Hymn to Demeter (Callimachus).

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY in the epistles of Alciphron, plainly shows how special was the dedication of flowers to the dead: "I have a lover who is a mourner, not a lover: he sends me garlands and roses as if to deck a premature grave, and he says he weeps through the livelong night." From Anacreon it would appear that the rose was thought to possess a peculiar virtue for the dead: — τόδε καὶ νοσοῦσιν ἀρχεῖ τόδε καὶ νεκροῖς ἀμύνει.

Moreover, the springing of flowers from the tomb of the dead was welcomed as an earnest of their happiness; and it was the universal wish that the tombstones of departed friends might be light to them, and that a perpetual springtide of all kinds of sweet flowers might encircle their graves. And so we read in the Greek Anthology: A lad still in the first period of youth, still wanting the down of a beard, has envious fate deprived of life; and thou deity with an evil eye hast cut unholily hopes, how great, from him, who has left many works of a wise hand. But do thou, Earth, be kind, and lightly lie upon Aquilinus; and mayest thou produce sweet-scented flowers by his side, such as thou bearest amongst the Arabians and such as are amongst the Indians. Again: May many flowers grow on this newly-built tomb: not the dried-up bramble nor the noxious ægipyrus, but violets and marjoram and the narcissus growing in water; and around thee, Vibius, may all roses grow.

It is scarcely necessary to do more than name the Feralia, the Parentalia, the Dies Violares of the Romans. Every one knows about them; and besides they closely resemble the Greek rites just noticed. The Romans were strict in their observance of them; and even the hateful Caracalla, when he visited Achilles' grave, laid garlands of flowers upon it. And when he himself died, to the great joy of his people, some were found who for a long time afterwards decked his tomb with spring and summer flowers: "Non defuerunt, qui per longum tempus vernis æstivisque floribus tumulum ejus ornarint." And Antonius dying begged to have roses scattered on his tomb, —

Manibus est imis rosa grata, et grata sepulchris,
Et rosa flos florum.

So too Ovid, writing from the land of his exile, prayed his wife: "But do you perform the funeral rites for me when dead, and offer chaplets wet with your tears. Although the fire shall have changed my body into ashes, yet the sad dust will be sensible of your pious affection." The "sad dust" of the cultured Roman poet, by the way, will scarcely bear comparison with the conception of the Tahitian savage. Scipio Serapio was the only person who ever received after death from the Roman people the honor of a sparsio florum. He died in his tribuneship greatly beloved by the people. The property he left was found to be insufficient to pay the expenses of his burial, whereupon the people made a subscription to defray them; and when the body was borne to the grave, flowers were scattered upon it from every quarter ("e prospectu omni"). Only the other day Francis Deak died, and it was almost impossible to read the accounts of the way in which his countrymen showed their love for him, without being carried back to the funeral of the Roman tribune.

The Romans certainly surpassed every nation in the number and variety of their chaplets. And though the civic and martial crowns conferred by the general voice of the army or citizens were for the most part composed solely of leaves or grass, and so bear indirectly only on our present inquiry, no triumph appears to have been complete without a plentiful use of flowers, the florum foliorumque sparsio. But though the Greeks were surpassed by the Romans in the number and variety of chaplets, they were not surpassed by them in the use of flowers for every purpose on occasions of military and civic rejoicing: the very name, φυλλοβολούμενον, given to those they wished to single out for the special favor of the people, owes its origin to the use. When Brasidas went to Scione, the inhabitants received him with every mark of honor. They publicly crowned him with a crown of gold as the liberator of Greece, while individually they decked him with garlands and thronged to him as to a victorious athlete.* The youthful Commodus as he drew near to Rome, on succeeding his father, was met by all the Roman nobles with laurels in their hands and all kinds of flowers that the season afforded. And they strewed all the way before him with flowers and garlands.† The last semblance of a triumph in Rome was accorded to Narses in A.D. 554, when his soldiers with garlands in their hands chanted the praises of the conqueror.

It is hard to assign any year or period when the use of chaplets at meals, or rather at the symposium, was first intro-

* Thucydides.
† Herodianus.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

duced. At one time festal chaplets were unquestionably considered incompatible with sobriety of character, and, among the Romans, he who appeared with one in public was liable to severe punishment. The flower-sellers and chaplet-makers had an extensive trade, and at Athens a quarter of the market was devoted to them, τὸ στεφανηπλόκιον, called also αἱ μύρρῑναι because the chaplets were for the most part composed of myrtle sprays interwoven with other flowers. At the μύρρῑναι chaplets were sold ready-made, or orders were received for them for the symposia. The most celebrated chaplet-maker of antiquity was Glycera, who frequently challenged Pausias the painter to surpass in painting her weaving of flowers. His Στεφανηπλόκος, a witness to the truth of their traditional contests, was still extant in Pliny's time. All kinds of flowers were used for the chaplets, but the rose, the king of flowers (βασιλεὺς τῶν ἀνθεων), ranked highest. Hence the Demos in Aristophanes' "Knights" is to be ἐστεφανωμένος ῥόδοις. Violet chaplets were in great favor with the Athenians, whence the name ἰοστέφανοι. Alcibiades went to Agatho's crowned with ivy and violets: " . . . the voice of Alcibiades, who was very drunk, was heard in the court bawling very loud and asking, Where is Agatho? and ordering a slave to lead him to Agatho. The flute-player, therefore, and some others of his followers, supported him towards Agatho, and he stood at the door crowned with a garland of ivy and violets, and having very many fillets on his head, and exclaiming: All hail, my friends! Either receive as a fellow tippler a man very drunk, or let us depart after crowning Agatho alone, for which purpose I have come." It was usual to distribute the chaplets after supper and immediately before the symposium; so, in Plutarch's banquet, supper being now ended, Melissa (queen of Corinth) distributed the garlands, and we offered libations. It frequently devolved upon the host to provide them; the ancient custom alluded to by Ovid, and according to which each guest took his own garland ("vina dabat liber, tulerat sibi quisque coronam"), not being uniformly adhered to. Often (or, according to some, generally) the wreaths were handed round repeatedly during the same entertainment. In the neighborhood of Pandosia it was considered disreputable to wear purchased flowers at festivals. The Greek fashion of wearing a garland (ὑποθυμίς) round the neck, as well as on the head, was not common with the Romans. Cicero, however, mentions it. And Ovid, too, in his description of the visit of the younger Tarquinius and his companions to the palace: "ecce nurum regis fusis per colla coronis inveniunt." * In the course of time the dietetic virtue of the wreath, upheld by Tryphon the physician in Plutarch's "Symposium," was lost sight of at Rome, and wreaths were appreciated solely as cheerful ornaments and symbols of festivity, and gave occasion to many a joke and game, such as the bibere coronas. The bridal wreath, στεφὸς γαμήλιον, was composed of flowers plucked by the bride herself: to buy flowers for the purpose was of ill omen. The Roman corona nuptialis was generally formed of verbena, also gathered by the bride. And the bridegroom wore a chaplet, and the doors of his house and the bridal couch were made gay with garlands. At Cato's second marriage these customs were dispensed with, because "fate was now summoning him to the war; still a solitary union pleased him, and nuptials devoid of empty pomp, and the admission of the gods alone as witnesses of the solemnities. No festive garlands hang from the wreath-bound threshold, and no white fillet runs along the two doorposts, etc."

I have already referred to the Roman laws against the indiscriminate use of garlands. They were most rigorous, and the breach of them was attended with severe punishment. L. Fulvius, a banker, having been accused and found guilty, at the time of the Second Punic War, of looking down from the balcony of his house with a chaplet of roses on his head, was imprisoned by order of the Senate, and was not liberated before the war was brought to a close, a period of sixteen years. A great contrast to the license of the Greeks, instanced in the well-known story of Polemon. The case of P. Munatius is another example of Roman severity. Munatius, for having crowned himself with flowers taken from the statue of Marsyas, was condemned by the Triumviri to be put in chains. Upon his making appeal to the tribunes of the people, they refused to intercede in his behalf. It was by wreathing the statue of this same god, Marsyas, that Julia caused the bitterest grief to her father, the emperor Augustus. Horace mentions a use to which flowers were put in his time that hitherto we have not come across: in the theatre the stage was covered with them, —

Recte necte crocum floresque perambulet Attæ.

* Fast. ii. 739. See also Tibullus, I. vii. 52: —
"Et capite et collo mollia serta gerat."

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

This may have incited Cleopatra to receive Antonius at one of her banquets in an apartment strewn with rose-leaves to a considerable depth, as the custom of festal chaplets prompted her to give him a horrible proof of her crafty spirit; and procured for us one of the most dramatic incidents of her life, and one that will stamp the character of the Egyptian queen, and mark the nature of her relations with the Roman triumvir, as long as the remembrance of her history endures. Shortly before the battle of Actium, Antonius had grown so distrustful of Cleopatra that he dreaded her very attentions, and would not even touch food until another had first tasted it. The queen, wishing, it was said, to amuse herself with his fears, but more probably desirous of displaying her resource, her power, had the tips of the flowers of a chaplet dipped in poison and then placed it upon her head. When the feast was at its highest she challenged Antonius to swallow the chaplet with his wine — it should be borne in mind that the more luxurious Romans were not satisfied with a banquet unless the petals of roses were swimming in their Falernian wine even in mid-winter. The leaves were stripped from off the wreath and thrown into the cup, and Antonius, oblivious of all apprehension of treachery, was on the very point of drinking, when Cleopatra arrested him with her hand and said, "Behold, Marcus Antonius, the woman against whom you are so careful to take these new precautions in employing your tasters. And if I could exist without you, would either means or opportunity of effecting my purpose be wanting to me?" She then ordered a man to be brought from prison and made to drink off the potion. It was done, and he fell dead upon the spot.

It is unnecessary to follow the changes that heathen rites and customs in connection with our present subject underwent at the transforming touch of Christianity, and to note how the use of flowers was at a very early date adopted by the Christians in connection with their religious and social celebrations, as it is easy enough to trace the survival, or revival, or independent growth, in this nineteenth century and in our own country, of most of the primitive and ancient customs that have just passed before us. For instance, we need not now go to France on the first of November for the Parentalia, the Dies Violares of the old Romans; and our recent law reports furnish evidence that the use of flowers in religious worship is upheld with a resolution not displayed by even the Aztecs or Singhalese, the Egyptians or Greeks. But, though in our social life we have emulated the luxury of classic times in many things, we certainly have not yet gone so far as to need a Tertullian to write another "De Coronâ."

A. LAMBERT.

SIR GIBBIE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

AUTHOR OF "MALCOLM," "THE MARQUIS OF LOSSIE," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

THE EARRING.

"COME oot o' the gutter, ye nickum!" cried, in harsh, half-masculine voice, a woman standing on the curbstone of a short, narrow, dirty lane, at right angles to an important thoroughfare, itself none of the widest or cleanest. She was dressed in dark petticoat and print wrapper. One of her shoes was down at the heel, and discovered a great hole in her stocking. Had her black hair been brushed and displayed, it would have revealed a thready glitter of grey, but all that was now visible of it was only two or three untidy tresses that dropped from under a cap of black net and green ribbons, which looked as if she had slept in it. Her face must have been handsome when it was young and fresh; but it was now beginning to look tattooed, though whether the color was from without or from within, it would have been hard to determine. Her black eyes looked resolute, almost fierce, above her straight, well-formed nose. Yet evidently circumstance clave fast to her. She had never risen above it, and was now plainly subjected to it.

About thirty yards from her, on the farther side of the main street, and just opposite the mouth of the lane, a child, apparently about six, but in reality about eight, was down on his knees raking with both hands in the gray dirt of the kennel. At the woman's cry, he lifted his head, ceased his search, raised himself, but without getting up, and looked at her. They were notable eyes out of which he looked — of such a deep blue were they, and having such long lashes; but more notable far from their expression, the nature of which, although a certain witchery of confidence was at once discoverable, was not to be determined without the help of the whole face, whose diffused meaning seemed in

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

them to deepen almost to speech. Whatever was at the heart of that expression, it was something that enticed question and might want investigation. The face as well as the eyes was lovely — not very clean, and not too regular for hope of a fine development, but chiefly remarkable from a general effect of something I can only call luminosity. The hair, which stuck out from his head in every direction, like a round fur cap, would have been of the red-gold kind, had it not been sunburned into a sort of human hay. An odd creature altogether the child appeared, as, shaking the gutter-drops from his little dirty hands, he gazed from his bare knees on the curb-stone at the woman of rebuke. It was but for a moment. The next he was down, raking in the gutter again.

The woman looked angry, and took a step forward; but the sound of a sharp imperative little bell behind her, made her turn at once, and re-enter the shop from which she had just issued, following a man whose pushing the door wider had set the bell ringing. Above the door was a small board, nearly square, upon which was painted in lead-color on a black ground the words, "Licensed to sell beer, spirits, and tobacco to be drunk on the premises." There was no other sign. "Them 'at likes my whusky 'ill no aye be speerin' my name," said Mistress Croale. As the day went on she would have more and more customers, and in the evening on to midnight, her parlor would be well filled. Then she would be always at hand, and the spring of the bell would be turned aside from the impact of the opening door. Now the bell was needful to recall her from house affairs.

"The likin' 'at craturs his for clean dirt! He's been at it this hale half-hoor!" she murmured to herself as she poured from a black bottle into a pewter measure a gill of whisky for the pale-faced toper who stood on the other side of the counter: far gone in consumption, he could not get through the forenoon without his morning. "I wad like," she went on, as she replaced the bottle without having spoken a word to her customer, whose departure was now announced with the same boisterous alacrity as his arrival by the shrill-toned bell — "I wad like, for's father's sake, honest man! to thraw Gibbie's lug. That likin' for dirt I canna fathom nor bide."

Meantime the boy's attention seemed entirely absorbed in the gutter. Whatever vehicle passed before him, whatever footsteps behind, he never lifted his head, but went creeping slowly on his knees along the curb still searching down the flow of the sluggish, nearly motionless current.

It was a grey morning towards the close of autumn. The days began and ended with a fog, but often between, as golden a sunshine glorified the streets of the grey city as any that ripened purple grapes. To-day the mist had lasted longer than usual — had risen instead of dispersing; but now it was thinning, and at length, like a slow blossoming of the sky-flower, the sun came melting through the cloud. Between the gables of two houses, a ray fell upon the pavement and the gutter. It lay there a very type of purity, so pure that, rest where it might, it destroyed every shadow of defilement that sought to mingle with it. Suddenly the boy made a dart upon all fours, and pounced like a creature of prey upon something in the kennel. He had found what he had been looking for so long. He sprang to his feet and bounded with it into the sun, rubbing it as he ran upon what he had for trousers, of which there was nothing below the knees but a few streamers, and nothing above the knees but the body of the garment, which had been — I will not say made for, but last worn by a boy three times his size. His feet, of course, were bare as well as his knees and legs. But though they were dirty, red, and rough, they were nicely shaped little legs, and the feet were dainty.

The sunbeams he sought came down through the smoky air like a Jacob's ladder, and he stood at the foot of it like a little prodigal angel that wanted to go home again, but feared it was too much inclined for him to manage the ascent in the present condition of his wings. But all he did want was to see in the light of heaven what the gutter had yielded him. He held up his find in the radiance and regarded it admiringly. It was a little earring of amethyst-colored glass, and in the sun looked lovely. The boy was in an ecstasy over it. He rubbed it on his sleeve, sucked it to clear it from the last of the gutter, and held it up once more in the sun, where, for a few blissful moments, he contemplated it speechless. He then caused it to disappear somewhere about his garments — I will not venture to say in a pocket — and ran off, his little bare feet sounding thud, thud, thud on the pavement, and the collar of his jacket sticking half-way up the back of his head, and threatening to rub it bare as he ran. Through street after street he sped — all built of granite, all with flagged footways, and all paved with

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

granite blocks — a hard, severe city, not beautiful or stately with its thick, grey, sparkling walls, for the houses were not high, and the windows were small, yet in the better parts nevertheless, handsome, as well as massive and strong.

To the boy the great city was but a house of many rooms, all for his use, his sport, his life. He did not know much of what lay within the houses; but that only added the joy of mystery to possession: they were jewel-closets, treasure-caves, indeed, with secret fountains of life; and every street was a channel into which they overflowed.

It was in one of quite a third-rate sort that the urchin at length ceased his trot, and drew up at the door of a baker's shop — a divided door, opening in the middle by a latch of bright brass. But the child did not lift the latch — only raised himself on tiptoe by the help of its handle, to look through the upper half of the door, which was of glass, into the beautiful shop. The floor was of flags, fresh sanded; the counter was of deal, scrubbed as white almost as flour; on the shelves were heaped the loaves of the morning's baking, along with a large store of scons and rolls and baps — the last, the best bread in the world — biscuits, hard and soft, and those brown discs of delicate flaky piecrust, known as buns. And the smell that came through the very glass, it seemed to the child, was as that of the tree of life in the Paradise of which he had never heard. But most enticing of all to the eyes of the little wanderer of the street were the penny loaves, hot-smoking from the oven — which fact is our first window into the ordered nature of the child. For the main point which made them more attractive than all the rest to him was, that sometimes he did have a penny, and that a penny loaf was the largest thing that could be had for a penny in the shop. So that, lawless as he looked, the desires of the child were moderate, and his imagination wrought within the bounds of reason. But no one who has never been blessed with only a penny to spend and a mighty hunger behind it, can understand the interest with which he stood there and through the glass watched the bread, having no penny and only the hunger. There is at least one powerful bond, though it may not always awake sympathy, between mudlark and monarch — that of hunger. No one has yet written the poetry of hunger — has built up in verse its stairs of grand ascent — from such hunger as Gibbie's for a penny loaf up — no, no, not to an alderman's feast; that is the way down the mouldy cellar-stair — but up the white marble scale to the hunger after righteousness whose very longings are bliss.

Behind the counter sat the baker's wife, a stout, fresh-colored woman, looking rather dull, but simple and honest. She was knitting, and if not dreaming, at least dozing over her work, for she never saw the forehead and eyes which, like a young ascending moon, gazed at her over the horizon of the opaque half of her door. There was no greed in those eyes — only much quiet interest. He did not want to get in; had to wait, and while waiting beguiled the time by beholding. He knew that Mysie, the baker's daughter, was at school, and that she would be home within half an hour. He had seen her with tear-filled eyes as she went, had learned from her the cause, and had in consequence unwittingly roused Mrs. Croale's anger, and braved it when aroused. But though he was waiting for her, such was the absorbing power of the spectacle before him that he never heard her approaching footsteps.

"Lat me in," said Mysie, with conscious dignity and a touch of indignation at being impeded on the very threshold of her father's shop.

The boy started and turned, but instead of moving out of the way, began searching in some mysterious receptacle hid in the recesses of his rags. A look of anxiety once appeared, but the same moment it vanished, and he held out in his hand the little drop of amethystine splendor. Mysie's face changed, and she clutched it eagerly.

"That's rale guid o' ye, wee Gibbie!" she cried. "Whaur did ye get it?"

He pointed to the kennel, and drew back from the door.

"I thank ye," she said heartily, and pressing down the thumbstall of the latch, went in.

"Wha's that ye're colloguin' wi', Mysie?" asked her mother, somewhat severely, but without lifting her eyes from her wires. "Ye maunna be speykin' to loons i' the street."

"It's only wee Gibbie, mither," answered the girl in a tone of confidence.

"Ou weel!" returned the mother, "he's no like the lave o' loons."

"But what had ye to say till him?" she resumed, as if afraid her leniency might be taken advantage of. "He's no fit company for the likes o' you, 'at his a father an' mither, an' a chop (shop). Ye maun hae little to say to sic rintheroot laddies."

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"Gibbie has a father, though they say he never hid nae mither," said the child.

"Troth, a fine father!" rejoined the mother, with a small scornful laugh. "Na, but he's something to mak mention o'! Sic a father, lassie, as it wad be tellin' him he had nane! What said ye till 'im?"

"I bit thankit 'im, 'cause I tint my drop as I gaed to the schuil i' the mornin', an' he fan't till me, an' was at the chop-door waitin' to gie me't back. They say he's aye fin'in' things."

"He's a guid-hertit cratur!" said the mother, "—for ane, that is, 'at's been sae ill broucht up."

She rose, took from the shelf a large piece of bread, composed of many adhering penny loaves, detached one, and went to the door.

"Here, Gibbie!" she cried as she opened it; "here's a fine piece to ye."

But no Gibbie was there. Up and down the street not a child was to be seen. A sandboy with a donkey-cart was the sole human arrangement in it. The baker's wife drew back, shut the door, and resumed her knitting.

CHAPTER II.

SIR GEORGE.

THE sun was hot for an hour or two in the middle of the day, but even then in the shadow dwelt a cold breath — of the winter, or of death — of something that humanity felt unfriendly. To Gibbie, however, bare-legged, bare-footed, almost bare-bodied as he was, sun or shadow made small difference, except as one of the musical intervals of life that make the melody of existence. His bare feet knew the difference on the flags, and his heart recognized unconsciously the secret as it were of a meaning and a symbol, in the change from the one to the other, but he was almost as happy in the dull as in the bright day. Hardy through hardship, he knew nothing better than a constant good-humored sparring with nature and circumstance for the privilege of being, enjoyed what came to him thoroughly, never mourned over what he had not, and, like the animals, was at peace. For the bliss of the animals lies in this, that, on their lower level, they shadow the bliss of those — few at any moment on the earth — who do not "look before and after, and pine for what is not," but live in the holy carelessness of the eternal now. Gibbie by no means belonged to the higher order, was as yet, indeed, not much better than a very blessed little animal.

To him the city was all a show. He knew many of the people — some of them who thought no small things of themselves, better than they would have chosen he or any one else should know them. He knew all the peripatetic vendors, most of the bakers, most of the small grocers and tradespeople. Animal as he was, he was laying in a great stock for the time when he would be something more, for the time of reflection, whenever that might come. Chiefly, his experience was a wonderful provision for the future perception of character; for now he knew to a nicety how any one of his large acquaintance would behave to him in circumstances within the scope of that experience. If any such little vagabond rises in the scale of creation, he carries with him from the street an amount of material serving to the knowledge of human nature, human need, human aims, human relations in the business of life, such as hardly another can possess. Even the poet, greatly wise in virtue of his sympathy, will scarcely understand a given human condition so well as the man whose vital tentacles have been in contact with it for years.

When Gibbie was not looking in at a shop-window, or turning on one heel to take in all at a sweep, he was oftenest to be seen trotting. Seldom he walked. A gentle trot was one of his natural modes of being. And though this day he had been on the trot all the sunshine through, nevertheless, when the sun was going down there was wee Gibbie upon the trot in the chilling and darkening streets. He had not had much to eat. He had been very near having a penny loaf. Half a cookie, which a stormy child had thrown away to ease his temper, had done further and perhaps better service in easing Gibbie's hunger. The green-grocer-woman at the entrance of the court where his father lived, a good way down the same street in which he had found the lost earring, had given him a small yellow turnip — to Gibbie nearly as welcome as an apple. A fish-wife from Finstone with a creel on her back, had given him all his hands could hold of the sea-weed called dulse, presumably not from its sweetness, although it is good eating. She had added to the gift a small crab, but that he had carried to the sea-shore and set free, because it was alive. These, the half-cookie, the turnip, and the dulse, with the smell of the baker's bread, was all he had had. It had been rather one of his meagre days. But it is wonderful upon how little those rare natures capable of making the most of things will live and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

thrive. There is a great deal more to be got out of things than is generally got out of them, whether the thing be a chapter of the Bible or a yellow turnip, and the marvel is that those who use the most material should so often be those that show the least result in strength or character. A superstitious priest-ridden Catholic may, in the kingdom of heaven, be high beyond sight of one who counts himself the broadest of English churchmen. Truly Gibbie got no fat out of his food, but he got what was far better. What he carried — I can hardly say under or in, but along with those rags of his, was all muscle — small, but hard and healthy and knotting up like whipcord. There are all degrees of health in poverty as well as in riches, and Gibble's health was splendid. His senses also were marvellously acute. I have already hinted at his gift for finding things. His eyes were sharp, quick, and roving, and then they went near the ground, he was such a little fellow. His success, however, not all these considerations could well account for, and he was regarded as born with a special luck in finding. I doubt if sufficient weight was given to the fact that, even when he was not so turning his mind it strayed in that direction, whence, if any object cast its reflected rays on his retina, those rays never failed to reach his mind also. On one occasion he picked up the pocket-book a gentleman had just dropped, and, in mingled fun and delight, was trying to put it in its owner's pocket unseen, when he collared him, and, had it not been for the testimony of a young woman who, coming behind, had seen the whole, would have handed him over to the police. After all, he remained in doubt, the thing seemed so incredible. He did give him a penny, however, which Gibbie at once spent upon a loaf.

It was not from any notions of honesty — he knew nothing about it — that he always did what he could to restore the things he found; the habit came from quite another cause. When he had no clue to the owner, he carried the thing found to his father, who generally let it lie a while, and at length, if it was of nature convertible, turned it into drink.

While Gibbie thus lived in the streets like a town-sparrow — as like a human bird without storehouse or barn as boy could well be — the human father of him would all day be sitting in a certain dark court, as hard at work as an aching head and a bloodless system would afford. The said court was off the narrowest part of a long, poverty-stricken street, bearing a name of evil omen, for it was called the Widdiehill — the place of the gallows. It was entered by a low archway in the middle of an old house, around which yet clung a musty fame of departed grandeur and ancient note. In the court, against a wing of the same house, rose an outside stair, leading to the first floor; under the stair was a rickety wooden shed; and in the shed sat the father of Gibbie, and cobbled boots and shoes as long as, at this time of the year, the light lasted. Up that stair, and two more inside the house, he went to his lodging, for he slept in the garret. But when or how he got to bed, George Galbraith never knew, for then, invariably, he was drunk. In the morning, however, he always found himself in it — generally with an aching head, and always with a mingled disgust at and desire for drink. During the day, alas! the disgust departed, while the desire remained, and strengthened with the approach of evening. All day he worked with might and main, such might and main as he had — worked as if for his life, and all to procure the means of death. No one ever sought to treat him, and from no one would he accept drink. He was a man of such inborn honesty, that the usurping demon of a vile thirst had not even yet, at the age of forty, been able to cast it out. The last little glory-cloud of his origin was trailing behind him — but yet it trailed. Doubtless it needs but time to make of a drunkard a thief, but not yet, even when longing was at the highest, would he have stolen a forgotten glass of whisky; and still, often in spite of sickness and aches innumerable, George labored that he might have wherewith to make himself drunk honestly. Strange honesty! Wee Gibbie was his only child, but about him or his well-being he gave himself almost as little trouble as Gibbie caused him! Not that he was hard-hearted; if he had seen the child in want, he would, at the drunkest, have shared his whisky with him; if he had fancied him cold, he would have put his last garment upon him; but to his whisky-dimmed eyes the child scarcely seemed to want anything, and the thought never entered his mind that, while Gibbie always looked smiling and contented, his father did so little to make him so. He had at the same time a very low opinion of himself and his deservings, and justly, for his consciousness had dwindled into little more than a live thirst. He did not do well for himself, neither did men praise him; and he shamefully neglected

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

his child; but in one respect, and that a most important one, he did well by his neighbors: he gave the best of work, and made the lowest of charges. In no other way was he for much good. And yet I would rather be that drunken cobbler than many a "fair professor," as Bunyan calls him. A grasping merchant ranks infinitely lower than such a drunken cobbler. Thank God, the Son of Man is the judge, and to him will we plead the cause of such — yea, and of worse than they — for he will do right. It may be well for drunkards that they are social outcasts, but is there no intercession to be made for them — no excuse to be pleaded? Alas! the poor wretches would storm the kingdom of peace by the inspiration of the enemy. Let us try to understand George Galbraith. His very existence the sense of a sunless, dreary, cold-winded desert, he was evermore confronted, in all his resolves after betterment, by the knowledge that with the first eager mouthful of the strange element, a rosy dawn would begin to flush the sky, a mist of green to cover the arid waste, a wind of song to ripple the air, and at length the misery of the day would vanish utterly, and the night throb with dreams. For George was by nature no common man. At heart he was a poet — weak enough, but capable of endless delight. The time had been when now and then he read a good book, and dreamed noble dreams. Even yet the stuff of which such dreams are made, fluttered in particolored rags about his life; and color is color even on a scarecrow.

He had had a good mother, and his father was a man of some character, both intellectually and socially. Now and then, it is too true, he had terrible bouts of drinking; but all the time between he was perfectly sober. He had given his son more than a fair education; and George, for his part, had trotted through the curriculum of Elphinstone College not altogether without distinction. But beyond this his father had entirely neglected his future, not even revealing to him the fact — of which, indeed, he was himself but dimly aware — that from wilful oversight on his part and design on that of others, his property had all but entirely slipped from his possession.

While his father was yet alive, George married the daughter of a small laird in a neighboring county — a woman of some education, and great natural refinement. He took her home to the ancient family house in the city — the same in which he now occupied a garret, and under whose outer stair he now cobbled shoes. There, during his father's life, they lived in peace and tolerable comfort, though in a poor enough way. It was all, even then, that the wife could do to make both ends meet; nor would her relations, whom she had grievously offended by her marriage, afford her the smallest assistance. Even then, too, her husband was on the slippery incline; but as long as she lived she managed to keep him within the bounds of what is called respectability. She died, however, soon after Gibbie was born; and then George began to lose himself altogether. The next year his father died, and creditors appeared who claimed everything. Mortgaged land and houses, with all upon and in them, were sold, and George left without a penny, or any means of winning a livelihood, while already he had lost the reputation that might have introduced him to employment. For heavy work he was altogether unfit; and had it not been for a bottle companion — a merry, hard-drinking shoemaker — he would have died of starvation, or sunk into beggary.

This man taught him his trade, and George was glad enough to work at it, both to deaden the stings of conscience and memory, and to procure the means of deadening them still further. But even here was something in the way of improvement, for hitherto he had applied himself to nothing, his being one of those dreamful natures capable of busy exertion for a time, but ready to collapse into disgust with every kind of effort.

How Gibbie had got thus far alive was a puzzle not a creature could have solved. It must have been by charity and ministration of more than one humble woman, but no one now claimed any particular interest in him — except Mrs. Croale — and hers was not very tender. It was a sad sight to some eyes to see him roving the streets, but an infinitely sadder sight was his father, even when bent over his work, with his hands and arms and knees going as if for very salvation. What thoughts might then be visiting his poor worn-out brain I cannot tell; but he looked the pale picture of misery. Doing his best to restore to service the nearly shapeless boots of carter or beggar, he was himself fast losing the very idea of his making, consumed heart and soul with a hellish thirst. For the thirst of the drunkard is even more of the soul than of the body. When the poor fellow sat with his drinking companions in Mistress Croale's parlor, seldom a flash broke from the reverie in which he seemed sunk, to show in what region of fancy his

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

spirit wandered, or to lighten the dulness that would not unfrequently invade that fore-court of hell. For even the damned must at times become aware of what they are, and then surely a terrible though momentary hush must fall upon the forsaken region. Yet those drinking companions would have missed George Galbraith, silent as he was, and but poorly responsive to the wit and humor of the rest; for he was always courteous, always ready to share what he had, never looking beyond the present tumbler — altogether a genial, kindly, honest nature. Sometimes, when two or three of them happened to meet elsewhere, they would fall to wondering why the silent man sought their company, seeing he both contributed so little to the hilarity of the evening, and seemed to derive so little enjoyment from it. But I believe their company was necessary as well as the drink to enable him to elude his conscience and feast with his imagination. Was it that he knew they also fought misery by investments in her bonds — that they also were of those who by Beelzebub would cast out Beelzebub — therefore felt at home, and with his own?

CHAPTER III.

MISTRESS CROALE.

THE house at which they met had yet not a little character remaining. Mistress Croale had come in for a derived worthiness, in the memory, yet lingering about the place, of a worthy aunt deceased, and always encouraged in herself a vague idea of obligation to live up to it. Hence she had made it a rule to supply drink only so long as her customers kept decent — that is, so long as they did not quarrel aloud, and put her in danger of a visit from the police; tell such tales as offended her modesty; utter oaths of any peculiarly atrocious quality; or defame the Sabbath Day, the Kirk or the Bible. On these terms, and so long as they paid for what they had, they might get as drunk as they pleased, without the smallest offence to Mistress Croale. But if the least unquestionable infringement of her rules occurred, she would pounce upon the shameless one with sudden and sharp reproof. I doubt not that, so doing, she cherished a hope of recommending herself above, and making deposits in view of a coming balance-sheet. The result for this life so far was, that, by these claims to respectability, she had gathered a clientèle of douce, well-disposed drunkards, who rarely gave her any trouble so long as they were in the house, though sometimes she had reason to be anxious about the fate of individuals of them after they left it.

Another peculiarity in her government was that she would rarely give drink to a woman. "Na, na," she would say, "what has a wuman to dee wi' strong drink! Lat the men dee as they like, we canna help them." She made exception in behalf of her personal friends; and, for herself, was in the way of sipping — only sipping, privately, on account of her "trouble," she said — by which she meant some complaint, speaking of it as if it were generally known, although of the nature of it nobody had an idea. The truth was that, like her customers, she also was going down the hill, justifying to herself every step of her descent. Until lately, she had been in the way of going regularly to church, and she did go occasionally yet, and always took the yearly sacrament; but the only result seemed to be that she abounded the more in finding justifications, or, where they were not to be had, excuses, for all she did. Probably the stirring of her conscience made this the more necessary to her peace.

If the Lord were to appear in person amongst us, how much would the sight of him do for the sinners of our day? I am not sure that many like Mistress Croale would not go to him. She was not a bad woman, but slowly and surely growing worse.

That morning, as soon as the customer whose entrance had withdrawn her from her descent on Gibbie, had gulped down his dram, wiped his mouth with his blue cotton handkerchief, settled his face into the expression of a drink of water, gone demurely out, and crossed to the other side of the street, she would have returned to the charge, but was prevented by the immediately following entrance of the Rev. Clement Sclater — the minister of her parish, recently appointed. He was a man between young and middle-aged, an honest fellow, zealous to perform the duties of his office, but with notions of religion very beggarly. How could it be otherwise when he knew far more of what he called the divine decrees than he did of his own heart, or the needs and miseries of human nature? At the moment, Mistress Croale was standing with her back to the door, reaching up to replace the black bottle on its shelf, and did not see the man she heard enter.

"What's yer wull?" she said indifferently.

Mr. Sclater made no answer, waiting for

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

her to turn and face him, which she did the sooner for his silence. Then she saw a man unknown to her, evidently, from his white neckcloth and funereal garments, a minister, standing solemn, with widespread legs, and round eyes of displeasure, expecting her attention.

"What's yer wull, sir?" she repeated, with more respect, but less cordiality than at first.

"If you ask my will," he replied, with some pomposity, for who that has just gained an object of ambition can be humble? — "it is that you shut up this whisky shop, and betake yourself to a more decent way of life in my parish."

"My certie! but ye're no blate (overmodest) to craw sae lood i' my hoose, an' that's a nearer fit nor a perris!" she cried, flaring up in wrath both at the nature and rudeness of the address. "Alloo me to tell ye, sir, ye're the first 'at ever daured threep my hoose was no a dacent ane."

"I said nothing about your house. It was your shop I spoke of," said the minister, not guiltless of subterfuge.

"An' what's my chop but my hoose? Haith! my hoose wad be o' fell sma' consideration wantin' the chop. Tak ye heed o' beirin' fause witness, sir."

"I said nothing, and know nothing against yours more than any other shop for the sale of drink in my parish."

"The Lord's my shepherd! Wad ye even (compare) my hoose to Jock Thamson's or Jeemie Deuk's, baith i' this perris?"

"My good woman, ——"

"Naither better nor waur nor my neepers," interrupted Mistress Croale, forgetting what she had just implied: "a body maun live."

"There are limits even to that most generally accepted of all principles," returned Mr. Sclater; "and I give you fair warning that I mean to do what I can to shut up all such houses as yours in my parish. I tell you of it, not from the least hope that you will anticipate me by closing, but merely that no one may say I did anything in an underhand fashion."

The calmness with which he uttered the threat alarmed Mistress Croale. He might rouse unmerited suspicion, and cause her much trouble by vexatious complaint, even to the peril of her license. She must take heed, and not irritate her enemy. Instantly, therefore, she changed her tone to one of expostulation.

"It's a sair peety, doobtless," she said, "'at there sud be sae mony drouthie thrapples i' the kingdom, sir; but drouth maun drink, an' ye ken, sir, gien it war hauden frae them, they wad but see deils an' cut their throts."

"They're like to see deils ony gait er' lang," retorted the minister, relapsing into the vernacular for a moment.

"Ow', 'deed maybe, sir! but e'en the deils themsels war justifeed i' their objection to bein' committed to their ain company afore their time."

Mr. Sclater could not help smiling at the woman's readiness, and that was a point gained by her. An acquaintance with Scripture goes far with a Scotch ecclesiastic. Besides, the man had a redeeming sense of humor, though he did not know how to prize it, not believing it a gift of God.

"It's true, my woman," he answered. "Ay! it said something for them, deils 'at they war, 'at they preferred the swine. But even the swine cudna bide them!"

Encouraged by the condescension of the remark, but disinclined to follow the path of reflection it indicated, Mistress Croale ventured a little farther upon her own.

"Ye see, sir," she said, "as lang's there's whusky, it wull tak the throt-ro'd. It's the naitral w'y o' 't, ye see, to rin doon, an' it's no mainner o' use gangin' again natur. Sae, alloin' the thing maun be, ye'll hae till alloo likewise, an' it's a trouth I'm tellin' ye, sir, 'at it's o' nae sma' consequence to the toon 'at the drucken craturs sud fill themsels wi' dacency — an' that's what I see till. Gang na to the magistrate, sir; but as sune's ye hae gotten testimony — guid testimony though, sir — 'at there's been disorder or immorawlity i' my hoose, come ye to me, an' I'll gie ye my han' to paper on't this meenute, 'at I'll gie up my chop, an' lea' yer perris — an may ye sune get a better i' my place. Sir, I'm like a mither to the puir bodies! An' gin ye drive them to Jock Thamson's, or Jeemie Deuk's, it'll be just like — savin' the word, I dinna inten' 't for sweirin', guid kens! — I say it'll just be dammin' them afore their time, like the puir deils. Hech! but it'll come sune eneuch, an' they're muckle to be peetied!"

"And when those victims of your vile ministrations," said the clergyman, again mounting his wooden horse, and setting it rocking, "find themselves where there will be no whisky to refresh them, where do you think you will be, Mistress Croale?"

"Whaur the Lord wulls," answered the woman. "Whaur that may be, I confess I'm whiles laith to think. Only gein I was

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

you, Maister Sclater, I wad think twise afore I made ill waur."

"But hear me, Mistress Croale: it's not your besotted customers only I have to care for. Your soul is as precious in my sight as any of which I shall have to render an account."

"As Mistress Bonniman's, for enstance?" suggested Mrs. Croale, interrogatively, and with just the least trace of pawkiness in the tone.

The city, large as it was, was yet not large enough to prevent a portion of the private affairs of individuals from coming to be treated as public property, and Mrs. Bonniman was a handsome and rich young widow, the rumor of whose acceptableness to Mr. Sclater had reached Mistress Croale's ear before ever she had seen the minister himself. An unmistakable shadow of confusion crossed his countenance; whereupon, with consideration both for herself and him, the woman made haste to go on, as if she had but chosen her instance at merest random.

"Na, na, sir! what my sowl may be in the eyes o' my Maker, I hae ill tellin'," she said, "but dinna ye threip upo' me 'at it's o' the same vailue i' your eyes as the sowl o' sic a fine, bonny, winsome leddy as yon. In trouth," she added, and shook her head mournfully, "I haena had sae mony preevileeges; an' maybe it'll be seen till, an' me passed ower a wheen easier nor some fowk."

"I wouldn't have you build too much upon that, Mistress Croale," said Mr. Sclater, glad to follow the talk down another turning, but considerably more afraid of rousing the woman than he had been before.

The remark drove her behind the categorical stockade of her religious merits.

"I pey my w'y," she said, with modest firmness. "I put my penny, and whiles my saxpence, intil the plate at the door when I gang to the kirk — an' I was jist thinkin' I wad win there the morn's nicht at farest, whan I turnt an' saw ye stan'in there, sir; an' little I thoucht — but that's neither here nor there, I'm thinkin'. I tell as feow lees as I can; I never sweir, nor tak the name o' the Lord in vain, anger me 'at likes; I sell naething but the best whusky; I never hae but broth to my denner upo' the Lord's day, an' broth canna brak the Sawbath, simmerin' awa upo' the bar o' the grate, an' haudin' no lass fra the kirk; I confess, gien ye wull be speirin', 'at I dinna read my buik sae aften as maybe I sud; but, 'deed, sir, tho' I says't 'at sud haud my tongue, ye hae waur folk i' yer perris nor Benjie Croale's widow; an' gien ye wunna hae a drap to weet yer ain whustle for the holy wark ye hae afore ye the morn's mornin, I maun gang an' mak my bed, for the lass is laid up wi' a bealt thoom, an' I maunna lat a' thing gang to dirt an' green bree; though I'm sure it's rale kin' o' ye to come to luik efter me, an' that's mair nor Maister Rennie, honest gentleman, ever did me the fawvor o', a' the time he ministered the perris. I haena an ill name wi' them 'at kens me, sir; that I can say wi' a clean conscience; an' ye may ken me weel gien ye wull. An' there's jist ae thing mair, sir: I gie ye my Bible-word, 'at never, gien I saw sign o' repentance or turnin' upo' ane o' them 'at pits their legs 'aneth my table — Wad ye luik intil the parlor, sir? No! — as I was sayin', never did I, sin' I keepit hoose, an' never wad I set mysel' to quench the smokin' flax; I wad hae no man's deith, sowl or body, lie at my door."

"Well, well, Mistress Croale," said the minister, somewhat dazed by this cataract he had brought upon his brain, and rather perplexed what to say in reply with any hope of reaching her, "I don't doubt a word of what you tell me; but you know works cannot save you; our best righteousness is but as filthy rags."

"It's weel I ken that, Mr. Sclater. An' I'm sure I'll be glaid to see ye, sir, ony time ye wad dee me the fawvor to luik in as ye're passin' by. It'll be none to yer shame, sir, for mine's an honest hoose."

"I'll do that, Mistress Croale," answered the minister, glad to escape. "But mind," he added, "I don't give up my point for all that; and I hope you will think over what I have been saying to you — and that seriously."

With these words he left the shop rather hurriedly, in evident dread of a reply.

Mistress Croale turned to the shelves behind her, took again the bottle she had replaced, poured out a large half-glass of whiskey, and tossed it off. She had been compelled to think and talk of things unpleasant, and it had put her, as she said, a' in a trim'le. She was but one of the many who get the fuel of their life in at the wrong door, their comfort from the world-side of the universe. I cannot tell whether Mr. Sclater or she was the farther from the central heat. The woman had the advantage in this, that she had to expend all her force on mere self-justification, and had no energy left for vain glory. It was with a sad sigh she set about the work of the house. Nor would it have comforted

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

her much to assure her that hers was a better defence than any distiller in the country could make. Even the whiskey itself gave her little relief; it seemed to scald both stomach and conscience, and she vowed never to take it again. But alas! this time is never the time for self-denial; it is always the next time. Abstinence is so much more pleasant to contemplate upon the other side of indulgence! Yet the struggles after betterment that many a drunkard has made in vain, would, had his aim been high enough, have saved his soul from death, and turned the charnel of his life into a temple. Abject as he is, foiled and despised, such a one may not yet be half so contemptible as many a so-counted respectable member of society, who looks down on him from a height too lofty even for scorn. It is not the first and the last only, of whom many will have to change places; but those as well that come everywhere between.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

FRENCH HOME LIFE.

THE IDEA OF HOME.

THE assertion that "languages are the expression of the genius of nations" is accepted by many of us as a vaguely approximate truth. We incline to recognize that national forms of speech are likely to be more or less indicative of national forms of character, and that the configuration of thought in different countries may possibly present some sort of connexity with the shape of the talk employed to disclose that thought. Yet, though we may own that this notion is admissible in principle, very few people would probably be inclined — if they knew their own mind — to go beyond a somewhat doubting adhesion to such a rule; and scarcely any of us would consent to accept the theory advanced by some enthusiastic philologists and historians, that language can be regarded as a reliable guide to the study and the determination of national tendencies and capacities. Who would seriously admit, for instance, after consideration, that because certain words are the exclusive property of certain languages, the ideas which those words convey must consequently be a similarly exclusive property of the nations which employ those languages? The fact of the existence of the words supplies, it is true, a primâ facie proof that they were required, in the lands in which we find them, in order to express a local thought; but the absence of equivalent words in other lands cannot reasonably be taken to constitute valid evidence of any corresponding absence of a similar thought elsewhere. We may perhaps safely assume, from the presence or absence of particular words in the dictionaries of certain peoples, that the need of a concrete and specific definition of particular sentiments has, from some endemic cause, been felt and been satisfied by one race and not by another; but surely we cannot grant more than that; for would it not be altogether contrary to our actual experience of the relative composition of national characters, to infer that the want of a word must necessarily imply any want of a correlative sentiment? The purely moral faculty of feeling a sentiment is, manifestly and incontestably, independent of the purely material faculty of demonstrating that sentiment by one word. To prove this, we have but to look at some of the most ordinary examples which lie before our eyes. Who would venture to pretend that the French are unable to distinguish between the feeling of "love" and the feeling of "like" because their language contains but one word to express both? Who would proclaim that no people but the Germans are capable of realizing the delightful notion of gemüthlich because they alone amongst the nations possess the word? Who would assert that because we English can only say "new" and "number" we are therefore incompetent to see our way to the varying senses of neuf and nouveau, of nombre and numéro? Who would affirm that marriage exists entirely in England, but that it is practised only partially in France, and is utterly unknown in Germany, for the reason that we alone in the three countries possess the two special words "husband" and "wife" to describe the married state; while the French can only say mari and femme — husband and woman; and the Germans are reduced to the wretched epithets of Mann and Frau — man and woman? No — it cannot be seriously argued that reality of perception has any consanguinity with concision of definition, or that earnestness of sensation is in any way related to precision of description. On the contrary, it may be said, without exaggeration, that the most intense and the most emotional impressions of which human nature is susceptible, are precisely those which it is the most difficult to expound in specific terms.

These considerations are surely reason-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

able, and yet our practice is not always in accord with them. Notwithstanding their apparent truth, we are not unfrequently disposed, in daily life, to let them get out of sight, and to think and to talk as if they had no existence. Are not a good many of us often confidently asserting, for instance — and this brings us to the subject which we are going to look at here — that "home" is an essentially English idea, because we fancy, in the negligence of our prejudices, that "home" is an essentially English word? Yet, in indulging this particular impression, we are not only acting in contradiction to the general principles which have just been indicated, but, furthermore, we are committing a material error, and are perpetrating a flagrant injustice: a material error, because the word "home" exists in the Teutonic and Scandinavian tongues as completely as it does in English; a flagrant injustice, because the idea of "home" is felt and realized, in varying degrees and forms, throughout a large part of the earth.

But if, recognizing our error and our injustice, we were to attempt, honestly, to repair the one and to atone for the other; and if, with that double object, we were to begin to look about us, outside our own shores, for other "homes" to which we could address excuses for having carelessly and impertinently forgotten their name and their existence, we should at once discover that several other nations besides ourselves are committing identically the same error, are perpetrating identically the same injustice, and are living, self-admiringly, in precisely the same unfounded, egotistical persuasion that they alone know "home." Throughout the German earth, in Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Iceland, we should find convictions on the question as fervent as our own. In all these lands an ineradicable popular belief exists that the indigenous word alone is capable of adequately expressing the deep, sweet, earnest thought it tells of, and that the thought itself is cherished and carried out there with a perfection which no other soil can imitate. Whether the word be heim, hiem, hem, or heimr, the faith in its unapproachable merit is equally profound; whatever be the latitude in which it is employed, the confidence in the exceptional completeness of its local form of application is equally unshakable. Each of the nations which are handling these rival nouns, is almost more convinced than even England is, that its own words and its own realization of it, are the only worthy ones, and that all emulative candidatures — if indeed any such be possible at all — are mere paltry shams and empty imitations. Half-a-dozen countries claim a monopoly in the matter, just as we ourselves do; and this fact supplies some sort of excuse for our own prejudices, for it proves, at all events, that we are not alone in entertaining them.

But the fact does a good deal more than this. In showing us that we are surrounded by races which, like the English, insist that they alone can properly baptize and can thoroughly feel "home," they furnish striking evidence of the vast value which the people of those races attach to the idea which the word conveys. On that part of the subject they and we are unanimous; we all demonstrate, by the eagerness and the enthusiasm of our claim to be first, that we long with special fervor for victory in the competition.

It must, however, be borne in mind, that — so far as the mere word is concerned — that competition, ardent as it is, is limited to a relatively small area. Neither the Slav nor the Latin races take part in it, for the excellent reason that their tongues contain no term equivalent to "home." The word itself — the true word, the precise word — is the exclusive property of the British, German, and Scandinavian nations. Elsewhere there are but shadows of it. But though it is solely in the north-western corner of Europe that we can detect the word, it is not there alone that we can discover the idea which the word represents. The quarrel as to whether heim or "home," or any other similar or dissimilar sound, expresses best the full meaning of the thought, is, after all, an idle one. It rests on nothing, and can lead to no good end whatever. The true interest of the subject is not there. It lies, not in the relative merits of analogous syllables, but in the comparative intensities with which the sentiment itself is exhibited by different peoples. On this point, also, wide differences of opinion will be found all round us; but there are distinct facts to guide us, and discussion, consequently, becomes possible and useful.

The first of those facts which strikes us is that, though in its completest and highest material manifestations, "home" is, like the denomination which expresses it, an essentially northern product, the notion of home, as distinguished from its practice, is discernible in almost every land. That notion is not, and probably never has been, a product of cold or heat, of latitude or climate, of rank or wealth, of any natural or artificial cause, or of any accident of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

country or position. It is the resultant of an almost universal need, the fruit of an almost universal yearning. And again, this need and this yearning must be as ancient as they are deep and general, for the word "home" was invented and used long before the time had come for the fulfilment of the idea which that pregnant word was destined one day to convey. All the designations of home which have been enumerated here are old — older certainly, by far, than any of the conditions on which the realization of the idea at present depends. We may presume from this that the longing for a home of some kind, however insufficient, was so inborn in men, that they took at once what they could get, and called it, in their trustful ignorance, by the admirable title which we now apply to a very different development of the same thought. Our actual perception of the meaning of the word is essentially modern; for "home" cannot be realized, as we have learned to view it now, without the aid of certain conditions which modern life alone has created. It probably existed, in the sense of which it was then susceptible, even when men had no lodging-place but a hollow tree or a hole in a rock; but its meaning has indeed changed since, for, in its full, present import, it signifies security, permanence, habit, comfort, and, furthermore, almost a sentiment of property. So long as those various components could not be grouped together, there could have been no "home" in our existing use of the word; there was a state which was described by the same name, but it was not the same state. Home — our home of to-day — cannot have had being while war and slavery were habitual accompaniments of life; it cannot have begun to assume a form until men had not only placed a solid roof over their heads, but had also ceased to fear either that enemies might burn that roof next day, or that masters might expel them from its cover. Some animals, perhaps, like bees and ants and beavers, may have always profoundly understood the real capacities of "home;" but humanity cannot have even suspected that the modern "home" was possible so long as durability and safety were unattained. Freedom and peace have been its father and mother. Those two conditions still constitute everywhere the essential foundations of "home;" but they are no longer sufficient by themselves; the present world wants more; the superstructure must be built with additional and different materials. So far, probably, everybody will agree with everybody else; but here we reach a point at which we shall cease to be unanimous, for each of us has his own idea of the precise nature of the additional materials required. When once liberty and safety are secured, our desires begin to vary largely; each one of us has, more or less, to make his home for himself, according to his temperament and his means of action, and most varying are the shapes which the results present.

Their varieties are not, however, products of individual fancies exclusively; national influences have also a large share in their formation. The first great grouping into classes is indeed the work of national action alone; the division, by personal peculiarities and habits, into genera and species, comes in the second line. Different conceptions of the idea of "home" are expressed as national testimonies by the races of Europe, each one for itself, with a clearness which permits us to recognize the part which is essentially impersonal and public, in contradiction to what is individual and specific in each case. The evidence in the matter is everywhere so abundant, that an endeavor to determine the shape and character of the national practice of "home," as applied in any particular country, ought not to be very difficult to carry out. For instance, regarding the question, in each land, as a great local whole, and putting aside all shadings and all accidents, it is surely just to describe the English home, in its main outlines, as a massive fortress which its occupiers defend against all comers; the German home as a woman's laboring-place, which offers but weak attractions to men; and the French home as a common ground of union, where all the members of a family, and each of their friends, find a seat awaiting them. There are exceptions everywhere in quantities; but who that knows and can compare the daily life of the English, the Germans, and the French, will deny the general accuracy of these rough definitions?

The idiosyncrasies of the French home — of the true typical French home, that is — are, taken as a whole, the most admirable in Europe. Of course there are weak points in them. Of course there are defects in the French system. Of course there are in France, as elsewhere, a mass of stupid, gloomy firesides, of all ranks, of all shades, and of all degrees, which are animated by no life, which present no interest or action, which offer neither character nor charm. But those are not the representative homes of France; those

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

are not illustrative examples of the idea of home as nationally realized in the land; those are the exceptions, not the rule. The national type of home, the national sentiment of home, the national use of home, are other. Nationally, amongst the French, home is a general meeting-spot for cheeriness and affection. How, indeed, could it be anything else with the character of the race? Home in France is made what it is by the temperament of the people, and by their special disposition to use and enjoy in common all the elements of satisfaction which they can accumulate by joint subscription. In England, the sharp severance into classes destroys the possibility of collective social action. In Germany the same difficulty exists, though in another form; and furthermore, women and men live virtually apart from each other there; each sex composes associations for itself in itself, and society, in its true sense, is a privilege of a limited upper category, and is nationally unknown. But in France there seems to be a vast unconscious partnership throughout the land for the rendering of life pleasant — a federation which includes all persons — an alliance which unites all interests — a coalition which amalgamates all opinions — a league which utilizes all agencies, which profits by all accidents, which works in-doors and out-of-doors, which uses the homes as it uses the streets. Society, as it is conceived and realized in France, admits no obstacles to the demands of its all-comprehending activity; it accepts no refusals; it stands forward in its force as a recognized public necessity, as a valued public right; it knocks imperiously at all doors; it calls on the entire people to come out and participate in the common work; it insists that each and all shall aid in the universal labor, and shall contribute to the general end. And it does all this without the faintest notion that it is doing it. Under such conditions society in France most naturally denies to home the character of a special refuge or a favorite hiding-place; it contemptuously refuses to see in it a citadel for defence or a prison for enclosure; it indignantly despises it as a traitor to the common cause, if it persists in keeping its shutters closed. In the eyes of society home is but one of its workshops — a factory in which the tools are family affections and fireside ties, in which the materials fashioned are manners, thought, and language, and of which the special function is to produce implements adapted to social needs.

Sociableness is probably the most striking of the various characteristics of the French home; but it is surrounded by others which stand forward in almost equal evidence. The eager action of the women, the intensity of family union, the love and the constant pursuit of sensations and emotions, contribute largely to the end attained. Created and supported by causes so prolific as these, home exercises an enormous power in France: no other place competes with it; all classes recognize its influence; neither the wine-shop nor the club attracts the Frenchman away from it; he goes to it with a convinced contentment which is one of the marks of its value. But he does not enter it to shut himself up in it with his wife and children; he regards it, just as society does, not as a personal exclusive property of his own, in which no one else has a right to share, but as part of a collective social whole, and he, consequently, is unable to conceive that he would properly use it if he barred it up and wrote "No Admission for Strangers" on the gate. It might, indeed, be argued, without much exaggeration, that his disposition to unshroud his home to others as other homes are set before himself, is precisely one of the causes of the attraction which his own home exercises over him; its openness bestows upon it as many brightnesses and provides it with as many contacts as he can discover elsewhere, — and for that very reason he likes it and is proud of it. His home life is substantially identical, in character, in objects, and even in society, with all that life elsewhere can offer him; so, though he goes much elsewhere, he neither abandons nor despises home, for comparison shows him nothing better. He wishes it to be a hive in movement, adorned with all that animation, gaiety, and good fellowship can do for it; but he sees in it neither a sanctuary nor a stronghold.

And if the men view home after this fashion, the women regard it in the same light more clearly still, for the making of it is essentially their work. The men accept it, utilize it, and rejoice in it, but it is the women who construct it; and in no other of her functions does the typical character of the Frenchwoman exhibit itself more clearly, in no other of her efforts is her influence on her nation more easily discernible. The peculiar restlessness of her spirit finds a limitless field of action in her efforts to extend the influence of her home; her keen inventivity is unceasingly employed in the composition of new results from old causes, and in the obtain-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ing of varied pleasures without expenditure of money. Her demonstrative affectionateness receives abundant satisfaction from the community of her life with her relations and friends. As she usually abhors calm, and instinctively regards it as synonymous with stupidity, she naturally excludes it from her home, on the principle that any emotion is better than the absence of emotion. She regards activity and fertility of impressions as the indispensable basis of home life; she proclaims that ennui is the most dangerous enemy of that life; and what is ennui but "an afflicting sensation for want of a sensation"? So she takes especial care that there shall be no such want around her, and she establishes as the foremost principle of her action that both duty and interest oblige her to provide sensation for herself and for those who share her home. This situation is so absolutely unlike that which exists in England, that it may be useful to remember, in partial explanation of the difference, that, nationally, we English do not amuse ourselves; that, though our upper strata absorb pleasures in prodigious quantities, and with an intensity of eagerness for which no parallel can be found elsewhere, the people, as a whole, know scarcely anything of amusement, and contemplate it from afar as a class privilege which is beyond their reach. It could scarcely, indeed, be otherwise; for we regard amusement as a distinct and special process, as an operation requiring outside aid, as the evident result of a recognizable cause, and, more than all, as a product unattainable without a direct or indirect disbursement of money. Amusement in England has become, in its main aspects, a thing to be bought; it needs time, organization, and cash; so — for want of those conditions — the mass of the nation has to do without it. But in France, on the contrary, amusement is a universal birthright. In France it is not a process, it is a state; it is not an active operation, it is an instinctive sentiment; it is not the result of any cause whatever, it is a true example of spontaneous generation. The French need amusement, so they have it; it springs up everywhere around them; everything is a possible occasion for it; its sources abide in the nature of the race, its elements are in the people themselves; it is an internal capacity, not an external creation. And in this capacity lies the main explanation of the general brightness of their homes: it is it which enables the women to provide the abundant decoration of gaiety that ornaments the life of France; it aids to throw over the land the delightful aspect of social oneness which, in spite of class divisions, of political hates, of poverty and wealth, and of all the differences of characters, and tendencies, is still so striking and so evident to the foreign looker on. The common necessity and the common capacity of amusement, and the universal disposition to extract amusement from the simplest and the most easily utilizable causes, create a bond which holds the entire race together.

With such a force at work in almost every house, it is but natural that all French homes should be very much like each other; that the same pattern should be reproduced in them abundantly; that their tone and objects should be substantially identical throughout the land; and that for this reason, again, in addition to those which have been already indicated, they should present a marked and recognizable national type. And the vividness of that type is rendered clearer still by two other causes — the intensity of the family tie, and the constant longing for emotional sensation. Allusion has been already made to each of them; but they merit further notice, for they contribute almost as much as the mutuality of association and of amusement to the building up of the French home.

Family union is generally felt and practised with such thoroughness in France that it constitutes one of the great levers of the life of the people. It is a union which includes all sorts of connections within its elastic grasp; which shuts out neither aunts nor brothers-in-law; which neglects neither collaterals, nor agnates, nor cognates; which puts forward attachment between persons of the same kin as a natural pleasure as well as a natural duty; and which — more wonderful than all — does not repudiate even poor relations. Its effect on homes is both to hold them together and to open them out; to extend the circle of their composition, and, simultaneously, to deepen the earnestness of their action. And, naturally, it adds largely to the national physiognomy of those homes by bestowing on them an amplitude of composition and a variety of ingredients which are but rarely found outside France, and by creating in them, consequently, a particular effect of largeness and comprehensiveness. This does not mean, of course, that one single roof habitually covers all the members of a family (though there are innumerable examples of accumulations of three genera-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tions in the same house), but that the separate homes of each of those members are regarded by them as a sort of joint possession in which the home sentiment is instinctively felt by each of them towards the others. And it is not pretended that the conditions which have just been indicated are universal, but only that they are general, and that they apply to the majority of cases. There are in France, as elsewhere, sons who quarrel with their fathers, brothers who hate their sisters, and husbands who abhor their wives; but still, the aspect of French hearths, as a whole, is one of striking unity and of wide-spreading, much-embracing sympathy.

The desire for sensation, which is common, in almost equal degrees, to both men and women, imports into the subject another characteristic of a still more local kind, for nowhere is the enjoyment and the research of sensation carried so far as it is in France. Indeed, its introduction into homes, its maintenance there as a useful and even a necessary aid of daily life, its employment as a dispeller of monotony and as a creator of constant novelties of impression, are so absolutely peculiar to France, that of all the elements which enter into the composition of the idea of home there, this one is, perhaps, the most exclusively national. Elsewhere emotions are usually regarded as somewhat out of place in homes; tranquillity of perception, and a certain unchangeableness of thought, are supposed, in other countries, to be inherent to home life. But in France the contrary system is applied. In France the danger of stupidity is so keenly felt, the destructive nature of its action on social intercourse is so distinctly recognized, that constant battle is kept up against every manifestation of its presence. The horror of dulness, of inertness, of impassibility, of silence, is so intense, that, by mere reaction from it, the admiration of susceptibility, of vivacity, of excitability, which is inborn in the race, is rendered stronger and deeper still.

Each of these forces, acting separately, would produce a marked influence on the life of the people; but as they are all working permanently and vigorously together, with harmony and without friction, the effect has become both universal and irresistible. The collective operation, on the most extended scale, of agencies of such a nature, has shaped the homes of France into the essentially national and local type which they present.

That type is singularly full of merits — of such rare and real merits that all unprejudiced observers will recognize and proclaim them. But beside them stands the first of the defects of the system — the want of calm. Excitement is in the character of the race: we find it, in varying degrees, all over France, and in almost everything that the French do; but it strikes us with especial force when it glares at us in homes, because it is not possible to conceive the perfect idea of home without a certain quantity of repose, without occasional respite from ambitions, animations, and perturbations, without the sweet refreshment which is induced by tranquillizing contacts, by soothing affections, by stilling thoughts. Such rest would be easy to obtain in French homes, for, in almost all of them, its elements lie about in luxuriant abundance; but the nation's life and the nation's nature are hostile to the development of those elements, and only permit them to continue to exist on condition of hiding themselves, of remaining latent, of not presuming to struggle against the outside, and of never showing themselves in action excepting on rare occasions when the outside has consented, for an instant, to withdraw.

And yet this insufficiency of interiorness, this non-realization of the notion of retreat, this perpetual sentiment of relationship with the world, which seem to foreigners to be so general in French homes, are not perceptible to the French themselves. For them, with their needs and habits, their homes are precisely what they ought to be. The French see nothing in their system that can be improved; and if they are satisfied, we have certainly no right to call upon them to change.

It is not, however, either with their eyes or with our own that we are looking, for the moment, at their homes. We are trying to consider them from an abstract point of view, — to apply to them an imaginary measure, and to determine, not whether they are defective for the French (we see clearly that they are not), but how far they come short of theoretical perfection — how far they fail to realize the ideal model. They reach so much nearer to it than any of their competitors, that it is mournful to see them fail to quite attain it. The homes of France possess, in the brilliant and attaching potentialities which have just been indicated, a larger perfection than we can discover elsewhere of the particular qualifications which enable the greatest number to participate in the greatest joy. Gaiety, intelligence, and joint action are applied in them to the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

pursuit of happiness for all. Dulness, sadness, and all the forms of stupidity and ennui are combated in them. They offer a strangely wide development of family affections. And surely — whatever be the prejudices of other races in favor of other forms and of other functions of home — it cannot fairly be pretended either that similar capacities exist, or that similar results are attained in other lands.

Against these superiorities we have to set off two grave deficiencies, the want of calm being the foremost of them. And if a balance could be struck by simply measuring out the merits of joy and calm in their application to home, we might, each one of us, work out that part of the calculation according to our individual notion of psychological arithmetic. But the inquiry contains other elements. The entire theory of the modern home is engaged in it. The whole principle of the objects and the uses of home depends upon the reply which we may give to it. Should home be essentially a place of joy, or should it be essentially a place of rest?

The answer which most of us would incline to make is, probably — it should be both together, or each alternately, according to our shifting tempers and varying needs. But can it be so? And if the French have failed to render it so, is it possible that any other race can succeed where they, with all their powers, have left the work undone?

This question brings us face to face, in one bound, with the action of nationalities on home; for what are joy and rest in such a case but manifestations of a national idea, but expressions of a national need? What are they, to take a rough example, but echoes of the voice of France calling laughingly for the one, and of the speech of England asking gravely for the other? And these echoes lead us to the strange reflection that, as in France, the homes seem to reflect the dispositions of the women, so, in England, they appear to indicate the desires of the men. It is certainly the women who, in their hot pursuit of sensation, drive out calm in the one case, and, almost as assuredly, it is the men who claim it in the other. This exercise of the home-forming influence by one sex in France, and by the other sex in England, puts directly before us one of the reasons why the realization of the national idea of home differs so largely in the two countries.

The English side of the subject is not, however, under discussion here; its French aspects alone concern us; and furthermore, no contrast is needed to bring them into light, for they stand out clearly by themselves in the vigor and the strikingness of their local character, in the unmistakableness of their nationality. They are what they are because they are French. They contribute an altogether special contingent to the idea of home, and they furnish one more testimony to the unvarying action of French nature on all that it touches. But this particularism cannot justly be regretted, for a certain proportion of it is indispensable to the actual conception of home. Cosmopolitanism and international unity would be in direct contradiction with that conception. In the present case, indeed, regret lies in the opposite direction; for the very intensity of the national influence which provokes this marked specificness, manifestly weakens and diminishes the operation of all the multiform personal forces whose agency is needed to create individuality in homes. Without their aid, neither the lights and shades which bring about variety, nor the movements of expression, nor the shiftings of color, which indicate the presence of fancy and of originality, are likely to be called into existence; and it is precisely because they are frequently wanting in France that we detect there, in spite of brilliancy and gaiety, so much uniformity of outline, so much monotony of tendency and of object in all the homes of the land. The nation does too much, and individuals do too little. And herein lies a second grave defect of the French ideal. The fact that the self-same defect exists elsewhere does not render it less real in France; the tyranny of majorities is not peculiar to that country, but we find there a vigorous example of it in the case before us.

And yet it is strange that such a tyranny should be able to display itself in a land where social liberty is developed to the extent which it reaches in France. The faculty of doing as you like, without occupying yourself about the opinion of your neighbor, constitutes one of the particular charms of life there; but in this matter of the organization of homes we see but little trace of it. French homes are about as much like each other as English homes are, and for the same reason. Everybody fashions them as everybody else does. Scarcely any one throws into them individuality, or what philosophers call the "Me." The appearance of nationalism becomes of course more marked in consequence of the absence of personality; but, from the ideal point of view, there is no

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

advantage in that, for, as has been already said, it is difficult to conceive a perfect home unless individual intervention is superadded in it to national action.

In France individual intervention is rarely perceptible, except, indeed, in the arrangement of the material elements of home. But the demonstration of self in furniture is of little importance in the matter, for whatever be the merit and the value of surroundings which satisfy the eye, whatever be the contentments induced by them, the leverage of home as a governing power in life depends on conditions of mind, and not on the color of tapestries or the shape of sideboards. Furthermore, in a national measurement of home, the state of the entire people must be looked at; no selections can be made; it is from the mass (which possesses neither tapestries nor sideboards) that experience and arguments should be drawn. And if we observe that the mass lives uniformly — if we recognize that the units who compose it have ceased to be producers of new things — if we see that they accept a model and apply a rule, that they bring to work no perceptible inventivity, — then, evidently, it may be urged that they have abdicated the right of applying their own preferences, and that they yield to the pressure of a dominating national type.

But how curious it is that they should yield to that pressure in the matter of home, and that they should resist it in everything else! No people are more personal than the French; individuality is everywhere amongst them; it is often, indeed, carried so far that it inflates itself into mannerism and pretension. But in this one case of the composition of home it makes no attempt to assert itself. The result is that, with all the gaiety and brightness of French homes, we are frequently disappointed in them by a want of the vigor which is obtainable only by the use of personal forces, and by a frequent cropping up of blank spaces in the midst of the vivid coloring which is proper to the land.

It is strange, also, that the two great defects of the French system should be of natures so antagonistic to each other. How is it possible that the absence of calm and the absence of color can coexist in the same people? The exactly opposite result might have been confidently looked for. It might have been expected that the very same pursuit of sensation which drives out repose would have necessarily and inevitably provoked a variety of personal vigors and of individual fertilities. But it is not so. However much French temperaments may be personal, French homes remain national.

Yet, notwithstanding their evident faults and their seeming contradictions, what incomparable homes they are! Where else is anything like them to be found? How admirably they realize the ideal of what family life may be in all its tender, eager, loving, sunny attributes! If French homes are not perfect, they approach, at all events, much nearer to perfection than any other homes do, precisely for the reason that they contain the largest proportion of the components that produce happiness in its active living forms. It cannot be denied that the sort of gladness which results from quick movement of the sensibilities, from developed responsiveness, and from eager use of the perceptive faculties, is a brighter state, both intellectually and susceptively, than the passive contentment engendered by the absence of emotion. Great as are the merits of occasional repose, indispensable, indeed, as it is to well-ordered existence, it is, after all, a negative condition; it implies, more or less, a suspension of life. The French avoid that suspension as much as possible; they do all they can to maintain themselves in the positive shapes of well-being; they have organized their home system in that intent, and that is why it stands so high amongst its fellows.

And furthermore, it must be remembered that the faults which foreigners may see in French homes are invisible to the dwellers in those homes. Custom blinds them, just as it blinds us English. Their judgment on the question is like our own, a result of prejudice; it is based exclusively on the teaching of their own habits, without comparisons; but as the topic is one on which they, like all other people, feel with enthusiasm, it is unlikely that they will ever be led to admit defects in their system. As was said at the beginning of this article, each nation believes that it alone is right in the matter; so that if we claimed the faculty of disapproving the French, they might, with equal justice and effect, insist on judging us in return, and would, doubtless, find occasion to say a good deal against our ways. We should do well to remember, as regards this part of the case, that the subject of homes is a very large one, and that it includes, not only an extensive collection of national types, but also, in addition, a varied series of exceptional cases and conditions in which we can scarcely refuse to recognize the reality of the existence of new phases

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and new species of home. And this necessity for admitting into the group a good many outside elements which did not seem, at first sight, to form part of it, should render us generous and liberal towards the French and other foreigners. Can we, for instance, deny, with justice, that a lighthouse is a home to the keepers who dwell in it? or that the snow-huts of the Esquimaux are homes to them during their eight months of winter? or even that the vagabond tents of Asia, the wandering roofs of skin or woven hair, are homes to the tribes they shelter? They are not homes according to the rules applied in France or England; but it would be an act of illogical unfairness to assert that they are not susceptible of becoming homes to their inmates. And look at another example, more striking still than any of these: look at monks and nuns, who live in circumstances which seem, to our view, to exclude all possibility of home sentiment, but who create for themselves thoughts and hopes which throw into their barren cells a meaning and a charm, and who, consequently, discover in them a true and touching character of home. In this frequent case it is not possible to doubt that fervor and emotion provoke a sensation of peculiar contentment which gilds the barest walls, which softens the hardest pallets, which casts sweetness over naked ugliness. It is not our home, but is it not a home? Again, in some strange specimens, personal character alone, irrespective of all external conditions whatever, may be supposed to bestow on the most unlikely resting-places a certain aspect of home. May it not be suggested, in illustration, without too violent exaggeration, that Diogenes may have found a veritable home in his tub, Simeon Stylites in his pillar, or even naked truth in the bottom of her well?

It is evident that none of these cases correspond at all to the present perfected European theory of home; but they show, at all events, that in considering the question as a whole, we have to take account of a good many conflicting elements, and that we should therefore do well, in approaching it, to divest ourselves as far as possible of preconceived notions, and of the impression that our own rule is the only good one. The modern English doctrine appears, it is true, to have been applied by Horace in that Sabine farm, which he described as but neither his testimony nor his authority suffices to prove that "rest" is so indispensable in homes that the French are wrong for not possessing it. No particular method and no particular law can be applied to so elastic a subject. Each example must be left with its merits and its faults. The New Zealand system exhibits very few of the characteristics which we pursue in Europe, but it possesses individuality in a remarkable degree. A Maori hut is so sacredly personal a property of its owner, that when he dies no one is permitted to utilize it, and it is left, untenanted, to rot. No stronger illustration could probably be discovered, and yet it is not likely that it would lead the French to recognize that they are not sufficiently individual. Contrasts between parts of the subject are useless; comparison is serviceable only when applied to the whole — to the mass of advantages or disadvantages discoverable in each case; and even if we limit our criticism to general aspects and to aggregate forms, even if we avoid the temptation to frame an opinion on details, even then we need to exercise a good deal of toleration before we can arrive at a just result. But it happens that home is a subject on which we all feel deeply, and on which it is, consequently, particularly difficult for us to be tolerant. Toleration usually implies indifference; it is rarely a product of reason; it is incompatible with ardent faith; no enthusiast is capable of it: so, as every one of us is animated in some degree by the conviction that we alone are right, it is scarcely likely that any considerable number of persons will anywhere be found in a position which permits them to exercise toleration. And judicial impartiality, which is a higher form of toleration, will of course be still more unattainable; so that the subject is one on which conflict of opinion is inevitable.

> The homely house that harbors quiet rest;

The longing of the absent for their home, their own home and no other, is both a consequence and an evidence of this state of mind; and the universality of its existence shows how widely spread that state is. Whether it be called home-sickness, or Heimweh, or nostalgia, it is always the same "sadness to return;" and it furnishes, in all its applications, unceasing testimony to the intense exclusiveness of our thoughts of home. And yet, in the case before us, in the idea of home as realized in France, there is so much that all of us must desire, so much that all of us must wish to appropriate, that, if the world is capable of making an exception in its non-admissiveness, it is surely in favor of France that the exception would be

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

made. If there be on the earth a type of home which is capable of exciting a majority to vote for its adoption, it must be, assuredly, the bright home of France, with its joyousness, its carelessness, its laughter, and its faults.

Its faults are probably incurable; they must be accepted (for the present at all events) as they are, for the sake of the merits which accompany them. But as the same judgment may safely be pronounced on all the other national types of home, there is no special reproach in it for France. This does not mean, however, that betterment is improbable in the general application of the idea of home; on the contrary, the history of its march supplies such abundant evidence of its onward tendency that we may fairly expect its development to continue, and that our children, in France and elsewhere, will extract from home even more than we do. Still, though the law of progress obliges us to suppose that the world will continue to advance in this matter as in all else, it does seem, all the same, rather difficult to imagine that posterity will really be able to amend much what we already have. The actual homes of Europe are so highly wrought, they combine so many admirable constituents, that there scarcely appears to be any space left in them for further growth. Material and mechanical expansions we may confidently look for; but it is difficult to see how they are to add to the existing goodnesses of home. Even if our successors should invent some day the automatic service described in "The Coming Race," that perfecting will not render their homes more thorough, more graceful, or more charming than those which we bequeath to them. We have safety, permanence, the legal right of independence, undisturbed property, old associations, comfort, elegance, satisfaction of our habits, our tastes, and our affections. And in the case of France we have still more — for many joys and brilliancies are superadded there. The union of these conditions bestows on the French home of our period as much excellence as our ambition can covet or our imagination can conceive. If future generations are able to carry that excellence higher still, it will be probably because progress consists as much in the unceasing creation of new desires as in the easier satisfaction of old needs.

In France there may be a growth of variety, but there can scarcely be a development of intensity. The system may perhaps expand in width, but it is difficult to conceive that it can gain in profoundness, for it is based so essentially on deep feeling that its foundations seem incapable of being thrust still lower. They stretch into the heart-life of the people, they reach to the substratum of its spirit, they rest upon its fondnesses. Where else can they possibly be extended? The French idea of home stands forward in an eager brightness of its own; it is true to say of it, "Its air is a smile."

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE CAPTAIN'S WIFE.

LOTTIE could do nothing but stand bewildered and gaze at this new claimant of her regard. Surprise took all the meaning, all the intelligence out of her face. She stood with her eyes wide open, her lips dropping apart. Her new mamma! She had the indescribable misfortune of not being able to think upon her own mother with any reverence or profound affection. Mrs. Despard was but "poor mamma" to her, no more. Lottie could not shut her eyes to the deficiencies of that poor woman, of whom the best that could be said was that she was dead, and beyond the reach of blame. There was no cherished and vaunted idea, therefore, to be outraged; but perhaps all the more Lottie's soul rose up in rebellion against the title as applied to any one else. She had known what was coming, and yet she was as entirely taken by surprise as if this idea had never been suggested to her. With eyes suddenly cleared out of all the dazzling that had clouded them, she looked at the woman thus brought in upon her — this intruder, who however had more right to be there than even Lottie had — the captain's wife. If this event had happened a month or two ago, while she retained all her natural vigor, no doubt, foolish as it was, Lottie would have made some show of resistance. She would have protested against the sudden arrival. She would have withdrawn from company so undesirable. She would have tried, however absurd it might have been, to vindicate herself, to hold the new comer at arm's length. But this had all become impossible now. At no other moment could she have been so entirely taken by surprise. All the apprehensions about her father

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

which had been communicated to her on former occasions had died out of her mind. She had never said very much about this danger, or been alarmed by it as Law was. It had not occurred to her to inquire how it would affect herself. And now she was taken altogether by surprise. She stood struck dumb with amazement, and gazed at the woman instinctively taking in every particular of her appearance, as only a woman could do. Unconsciously to herself, Lottie appraised the other, saw through her, calculating the meaning of her and all her finery. No man could have done it, and she was not herself aware of having done it; but Polly knew very well what that look meant. Notwithstanding her own confidence in her bridal array, even Polly felt it coming to pieces, felt it being set down for what it was worth; and naturally, the feeling that this was so, made her angry and defiant.

"How do you do, miss?" she said, feeling that even her voice sounded more vulgar than it need to have done. "I hope as we shall be good friends. Your pa has played you a nice trick, hasn't he? but men is men, and when they're like he is, there's allowances to be made for them." Polly was aware that this speech was in her very worst style. She had not intended to call Lottie miss; but with that girl standing staring, in a plain cotton frock, looking a lady every inch of her, from the crown of her head to the sole of her foot — a bride, in a fine bonnet covered with orange-blossoms and a bright silk dress that matched, was not in possession of her faculties. Bold as she was, she could not but be conscious of a tremor which mingled with her very defiance. "Well, I'm sure, what a pretty table!" she resumed. "They might have known we were coming home, captain. There ain't much on it, perhaps — not like the nice chicken and sausages you'd have got at mother's. But mother would never have set it out so pretty, that I'll allow." Then Polly looked round upon the dim old walls, faintly lighted by the lamp. "So this is the dining-room," she said; "this is my new 'ome. To think I never should have been inside the door till now. Let me alone, Harry. I don't want none of your huggings. I want to make acquaintance with my new 'ome. You know well enough I married just as much for the sake of living in the lodges as for you — don't you now?" she said, with a laugh. Perhaps only fathers and mothers, and not even these long-suffering persons always, can look on at the endearments of newly-married couples with tolerance. Lottie was offended, as if their endearments had been insulting to herself. She looked at them with an annoyed contempt. No sympathetic touch of fellow-feeling moved her. To compare this, as she thought, hideous travesty of love, with her own, would have but hardened her the more against them. She turned away, and shut the window, and drew down the blind, with an energy uncalled for by such simple duties. When the captain led his wife up-stairs, that she might take off her bonnet, Lottie sat down and tried to think. But she could not think. It had all happened in a moment, and her mind was in an angry confusion, not capable of reason. She could not realize what had happened, or what was going to happen — an indignant sense of being intruded upon, of having to receive and be civil to an unwelcome visitor — and an impatience almost beyond bearing of this strait into which her father had plunged her, filled her mind. Something more, she dimly felt, lay behind — something more important, more serious; but in the mean time she did not feel that her occupation was gone, or her kingdom taken from her. A disagreeable person to entertain — a most unwelcome, uncongenial guest. For the moment she could not realize anything more. But her mind was in the most painful ferment, her heart beating. How was she to behave to this new, strange visitor? What was she to say to her? She must sit down at table with her, she supposed. She was Captain Despard's — guest. What more? But Lottie knew very well she was something more.

Mary came in, bringing tea, which she placed at the head of the table, where Lottie usually sat. Mary's eyes were dancing in her head with curiosity and excitement. "What is it, miss? oh, what is it, miss? What's happened?" said Mary. But Lottie made her no reply. She did not herself know what had happened. She waited for the return of "the woman" with a troubled mind. Everything was ready, and Lottie stood by ready to take her seat the moment they should come back. She heard them come down-stairs, laughing and talking. The woman's voice filled all the house. It flowed on in a constant stream, loud enough to be heard in the kitchen, where Mary was listening with all her ears. "Very nice on the whole," the new-comer was saying; "but of course I shall make a few changes. I've always heard that a room should be like its mistress. There's not half enough

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

pretty things to please me. I do love a pretty room, and plenty of antimacassars and pink ribbons. Oh, I sha'n't tell you what I am going to do to it! — not a word. Gentlemen must be taught their place. I am going to make it look very nice, and that should be enough for you. Oh yes, I am quite ready for supper. I haven't touched a bit of anything since five o'clock, when we had tea. Poor Harry, I can see how you have been put upon." This was said at the foot of the stairs, where not only Lottie but Mary could hear every word. Mary understood it all, but Lottie did not understand it. She could not receive Polly's programme into her mind, nor think what was meant by it. While she still stood waiting, the two came in — the bride, with her tower of hair upon her head, and all her cheap ribbons and bangles. She came in, drawing herself away from the captain's encircling arm. "Behave!" said Polly, shaking a finger at him; and she swept in and round the table, almost pushing against the surprised spectator who stood looking on, and deposited herself in Lottie's chair. "It's best to begin as you mean to end," said Polly; "I'm not tired to speak of, and I'll take my own place at once. You can sit here, Miss Lottie, between him and me."

Still, Lottie did not know what to think or to say. She stood still, bewildered, and then took the place pointed out to her. What did it mean? It was easy enough to see what it meant, if her head had not been so confused. "Yes, dear," said Polly, "a little bit of cold beef — just a very little bit. I am not fond of cold victuals. That's not how we've been living, is it? and that's not how I mean you to live. Oh no, I don't blame Lottie. Unmarried girls don't know any better. They don't study a man like his wife knows how to do. I can see how it's been; oh, I can see! Too many mouths to feed, and the meat has to be bought according. Who is your butcher, miss? Oh, him! I don't hold with him. I shall send for Jones to-morrow; he's the man for my money. Wasn't that a lovely sweetbread that we had at our wedding breakfast? You didn't remark? Oh, nonsense, I'm sure you remarked! It was a beauty! Well, that was from Jones's. I'll send for him to-morrow. Do you take sugar in your tea, Miss Lottie? Dear! I shouldn't have thought it; so careful a young lady. 'Enery, darling, what are you drinking? Do you take tea?"

"I don't mind what I take, my love, so long as you give it me," said the gallant captain; "tea or poison, I'd take it from that hand; and I don't want anything but to look at you, at the head of my table. This is how it should be. To think how long I have been denying myself, forgetting what happiness was!"

"You poor dear Harry! all for the sake of your children! Well, I hope you'll find it repaid. They ought to be grateful. The times and times that you and me has talked it over, and given it up for their sakes! You're very quiet, miss; you don't say much," added Polly; "but I daresay it was a surprise to you, seeing me come home?"

"Why don't you speak up and make yourself pleasant?" said the captain, with a kind of growl under his breath.

Lottie came to herself a little by dint of this pressure. She did not seem to know how it had come about, or what the emergency meant. "I beg your pardon," she said, her head swimming and everything going round with her, "I am — taken very much by surprise. If I had known what was going to happen, I — might have been more prepared."

"I can understand that," said Polly. "Hold your tongue, captain. She is quite right. You ought to have written and told her, as I asked you. But now that you do know, I hope you mean to be friendly, miss. Them that treats me well, I treats them well. I don't wonder that you don't like it at first," she added graciously; "a girl no older than yourself! But he would have it, you know, and what could I do? When a man's in that way, it's no use talking to him. I resisted as long as I could, but I had to give in at the last."

"By George!" said the captain, helping the beef. He had some one to stand by him now, who he felt might be a match for Lottie; but he was still a little afraid of Lottie, and consequently eager to crow over her in the strength of his backer. "The trouble I've had to bring matters to this point," he said; "but never mind, my love, it is all right now you are here. At one time I thought it never was going to be accomplished. But perseverance ——"

"Perseverance does a deal; but, bless you, I never had no doubt on the subject," said the new Mrs. Despard, taking up her teacup in a way that was very offensive to Lottie. The captain looked at her from the other end of the table, with a kind of adoration; but nevertheless the captain himself, with all his faults, was painfully aware of her double negatives, and thought to himself, even when he looked at her so admiringly, that he must give her a few

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

lessons. He had never paid much attention to Lottie, and yet he could not help getting a glimpse of his new wife through Lottie's eyes.

"Where is my son?" said Polly. "Harry, darling, where is that dear Law? He won't be so much surprised, will he? He had a notion how things were going. But I've got a great deal to say to him, I can tell you. I don't approve of his goings on. There's a many things as I mean to put a stop to. Nobody shall say as I don't do my duty by your children. I shall tell him ——"

"Do you know Law?" said Lottie. This gave her a little chill of horror; though indeed she remembered that Law had spoken of some one — some one about whom Lottie had not cared to inquire.

"Oh yes, miss, I know Law." (Polly did not know how it was that she said miss to Lottie. She did not mean to do it. She did it, not in respect, but in derision; but the word came to her lips, whether she would or not.) "Law and I are old friends. Time was when I didn't feel sure — not quite sure, you know," she said, with a laugh of mingled vanity and malice, "if it was to be the father or the son; but, lord, there's no comparison," she added hastily, seeing that even on the captain's fine countenance this boast produced a momentary cloud. "Law will never be as fine a man as his father. He hasn't got the captain's carriage, nor he ain't so handsome. Bless us, are you listening, Harry? I didn't mean you to hear. I don't think you handsome a bit, now, do I? I'm sure I've told you times and times ——"

The two thus exchanging glances and pretty speeches across the table were too much occupied with themselves to think of anything else. And no one heard Law's approach till he pushed open the door, and with a "Hillo!" of absolute amazement, stood thunderstruck, gazing upon this astonishing spectacle. The sight that Law beheld was not a disagreeable sight in itself: the table, all bright with its bouquet of crimson leaves, which the captain had pushed to one side in order that he might see his wife — and the three faces round it, two of them beaming with triumph and satisfaction. The young man stood at the door and took it all in, with a stare, at first, of dismay. Opposite to him sat Lottie, put out of her place, looking stunned, as if she had fallen from a height and did not know where she was. As he stood there she lifted her eyes to him with a look of wondering and bewildered misery which went to Law's heart; but the next moment he burst into a loud laugh, in spite of himself. To see the governor casting languishing looks at Polly was more than his gravity could bear. He could think of nothing, after the first shock, but "what a joke" it was. A man in love, especially a man in the first imbecility of matrimonial bliss, is a joke at any time; but when it's your governor, Law said to himself! He gave a great roar of laughter. "Polly, by Jove!" he said; "so you've been and done it!" It had alarmed him much beforehand, and no doubt it might be tragical enough after; but for the moment it was the best joke that Law had encountered for years.

"Yes, we've been and done it," said Polly, rising and holding out her hand to him. "Come here and kiss me, my son. I am delighted to see you. It's so nice to hear a good laugh, and see a bright face. Lottie, Law, hasn't found her tongue yet. She hasn't a word to throw at a dog, much less her new mamma. But you, it's a pleasure to see you. Ah!" said Polly, with effusion, "the gentlemen for me! Ladies, they're spiteful, and they're jealous, and they're stuck up; but gentlemen does you justice. You mustn't call me Polly, however, though I forgive you the first time. You must know that I am your mamma."

Law laughed again, but it was not a pleasant laugh; and he grasped the hand which his father held out to him, with a desire to crush it, if he could, which was natural enough. Law thought it a joke, it is true; but he was angry at bottom, though amused on the surface. And he did hurt his father's somewhat flabby, unworking hand. The captain, however, would not complain. He was glad even to be met with a semblance of cordiality at such a moment. He helped Law largely to the beef, in the satisfaction of this family union, and this was a sign of anxiety which Law did not despise.

"Oh, and I assure you I mean to be a mother to you," said Polly. "It sha'n't be said now that you haven't any one to look after you. I mean to look after you. I am not at all satisfied with some of your goings on. A gentleman shouldn't make too free with them that are beneath him. Yes, yes, Harry, darling; it's too early to begin on that point; but he shall know my mind, and I mean to look after him. Now this is what I call comfortable," said Mrs. Despard, looking round with a beaming smile; "quite a family party, and quite a nice tea; though the beef's dry to my taste (but I never was one for cold victuals), and everybody satisfied ——"

"Lottie," said the captain, looking up

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd from his beef with some sternness, "you seem the only exception. Don't you think, my child, when you see everybody so happy, that you might find a word to say?"

"Oh, don't hurry her," said Polly, "we've took her by surprise. I told you not to, but you would. We'll have a nice long talk to-morrow, when she gives me over the housekeeping; and when she sees as I mean to act like a mother, why things will come right between her and me."

The Despards were not highly educated people, but yet a shiver ran through them when Polly, unconscious, said, "We've took her by surprise." The captain even shrank a little, and took a great deal too much mustard, and made himself cough, while Law, in spite of himself, laughed, looking across the table to the place where Lottie sat. Lottie noticed it the last of all. She heard every word they all said, and remembered every word, the most trifling; but at the moment she scarcely distinguished the meaning of them. She said, "I think, papa, if you don't mind, I will go to my room. I am rather tired; and perhaps I had better give some orders to Mary."

"Oh, never mind; never mind about Mary, if it's on my account. I shall look after her myself," said Polly. "What's good enough for the captain is good enough for me; at least till I settle it my own way, you know. I don't want to give any trouble at all, till I can settle things my own way."

"It is not I that have to be consulted," said Captain Despard; "but if you are going to sit sulky and not say a word, I don't see — what do you think, my pet? — that it matters whether you go or stay ——"

"Oh, don't mind me, miss," said Polly. She could not look Miss Despard in the face and call her Lottie, knowing, however she might consent to waive her own rights, that Miss Despard was still Miss Despard, whatever Polly might do. Not a thing on her that was worth five shillings, not a brooch even; nothing like a bracelet; a bit of a cotton frock, no more; but she was still Miss Despard, and unapproachable. Polly, with her bracelets on each wrist, rings twinkling on her hands as she took her supper, in a blue silk, and knowing herself to be an officer's lady, Mrs. Captain Despard, — with all this could not speak to her husband's daughter except as miss. She could not understand it, but still it was so.

The little crooked hall was full of boxes when Lottie came out; and Mary stood among them, wondering how she was to get them up-stairs. Perhaps she had been listening a little at the door, for Mary's consternation was as great as Lottie's. "Do you think, miss, it's real and true? Do you think as she's married, sure? Mother wouldn't let me stay a day, if there was anything wrong; and I don't know as I'll stay anyhow," Mary said.

"Wrong? what could be wrong?" said Lottie. She was less educated in knowledge of this kind than the little maid-of-all-work. It troubled her to see the boxes littering the hall, but she could not carry them up-stairs. For a moment the impulse to do it, or at least to help Mary in doing it, came into her mind; but, on second thoughts, she refrained. What had she to do with this new-comer into the house, who was not even a visitor, who had come to remain? Lottie went up-stairs without saying any more. She went first into the little faded drawing-room, where there was no light except that which came from the window and the lamp in the Dean's Walk. It was not beautiful. She had never had any money to decorate it, to make it what it might have been, nor pretty furniture to put into it. But she sat down on her favorite little chair, in the dark, and felt as if she had gone to sit by somebody that was dead, who had been a dear friend. How friendly and quiet the little room had been! giving her a centre for her life, a refuge for her thoughts. But all that was over. She had never known before that she had liked it or thought of it much; but now, all at once, what a gentle and pleasant shelter it had been! As Lottie thought of everything, the tears came silently and bitterly into her eyes. She herself had been ungrateful, unkind to the little old house, the venerable old place, the kind people. They had all been kind to her. She had visited her own disappointment upon them, scorning the neighbors because they were less stately than she expected them to be; visiting upon them her own discontent with her position, her own disappointment in being less important than she expected. Lottie was hard upon herself, for she had not been unkind to any one, but was, on the contrary, a favorite with her neighbors — the only girl in the place, and allowed by the old people to have a right to whims and fancies. Now, in the face of this strange, incomprehensible misfortune, she felt the difference. Her quiet old room! where kind voices had spoken to her, where he

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

had come, saying such words as made her heart beat; where she had sung to him, and received those tender applauses which had been like treasure to Lottie. She seemed to see a series of past scenes like pictures rising before her. Not often had Rollo been there — yet two or three times; and Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, with her mellow brogue, and Mr. Ashford, and even the stately person of the dean himself. She had been at home here, to receive them, whoever came. The room had never been invaded by anything that was unfriendly or unpleasing. Now — what was it that woman said of changes — making it look nice? Lottie had not understood the words when they were said, but they came back upon her now.

By-and-by she heard some one coming up-stairs, and starting, rose to steal away to her own room, afraid to meet the stranger again; but no light made its appearance, and Law put in his head at the door, then seeing something moving against the window, came to her, and threw himself down on the window-seat. "They're going on so down-stairs, that I couldn't stand it," said Law, "it's enough to make a fellow sick;" and then, after a pause, "Well! I told you what was coming, but you wouldn't believe me; what do you think of it now?"

"Oh, Law, what does it mean? Are we not dreaming? Can it be true?"

"True! of course it is true. I told you what was going to happen." Then his tone softened. "Poor Lottie, it's you I'm sorry for. If you could only see yourself beside her! And where were his eyes, that he couldn't see?" Here Law paused abruptly, wondering all at once whether the difference would be as marked between his sister and the girls whom he too liked to spend his evenings with. He was sure that Emma was not like that woman; but still the thought subdued his indignation. "I say," he added hastily, "I want to give you a bit of advice. Just you give in to her, Lottie. Fighting is no good; she has got a tongue that you couldn't stand, and the things she would say you wouldn't understand. I understand her well enough; but you wouldn't know what she meant, and it would make you angry and hurt you. Give in, Lottie. Since the governor's been so silly, she has a right. And don't you make any stand as if you could do it — for you can't. It is a great deal better not to resist ——"

"What do you mean by resist? How can I resist? The house is papa's, I suppose," said Lottie. "The thing is, I don't understand it. I can't understand it: that somebody should be coming to stay here, to be one of us, to be mixed up in everything — whom we don't know —"

"To be mistress," said Law, "that's the worst — not to be mixed up with us, but to be over us. To take everything out of your hands ——"

"Do you think I care for that? I do not mind who is mistress," said Lottie, all unaware of her own characteristics. Law was wiser than she was in this respect. He shook his head.

"That's the worst," he said, "she'll be mistress — she'll change everything. Oh, I know Polly well; though I suppose, for decency, I mustn't say Polly now."

"How is it you know her so well? And how did papa know her?" said Lottie. "I should have thought you never could have met such women. Ah! you told me once about — others. Law! you can't like company like that; surely, you can't like company like that! how did you get to know her?" Law was very much discomfited by this sudden question. In the midst of his sympathy and compassion for his sister, it was hard all at once to be brought to book, when he had forgotten the possibility of such a danger.

"Well, you know," he said, "fellows do; I don't know how it is — you come across some one, and then she speaks to you, and then you're forced to speak back; or perhaps it's you that speaks first — it isn't easy to tell. This was as simple as anything," Law went on, relieved by the naturalness of his own explanation. "They all work in the same house where Langton lives, my old coach, you know, before I went to old Ashford. I don't know how the governor got there. Perhaps it was the same way. Going in and out, you know, day after day, why, how could you help it? And when a woman speaks to you, what can you do, but say something? That's exactly how it was."

"But, Law," she said, grasping his arm — all this conversation was so much easier in the dark — "Law, you will take care? she said she was not quite sure whether it was to be the father or the son. Ah! a woman who could say that, Law ——"

"It's a lie," said Law fiercely, "and she knows it. I never thought anything of her — never. It's a lie, if she were to swear it! Polly! why, she's thirty, she's — I give my word of honor, it's a lie."

"But, Law! oh, Law dear ——"

"I know what you're going to say. I'll take care of myself; no fear of me getting entangled," said Law briskly. Then he

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

stopped, and, still favored by the dark, took her hands in his. "Lottie, it's my turn now. I know you won't stand questioning, nor being talked to. But, look here — don't shilly-shally if you can care for anybody, and he'll marry you and give you a place of your own — you needn't jump up as if I had shot you. If you talk about such things to me, I may surely talk to you. And mind what I say. I don't expect you'll be able to put up with your life here ——"

"I hear them stirring down-stairs," said Lottie, drawing her hands out of his hold. "Don't keep me, don't hold me, Law. I cannot see her again to-night."

"You won't give me any answer," said the lad regretfully. There was real feeling in his voice — "But, Lottie, mind what I say. I don't believe you'll be able to put up with it, and if there's any one you care for and he'll marry you ——"

Lottie freed herself from him violently, and fled. Even in the dark there were things that Law could not be permitted to say, or she to hear.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE HEAVINGS OF THE EARTHQUAKE.

THE next morning dawned very strangely on all the members of the little household. Lottie was down early, as she generally was; but the advantages of early rising were neutralized by the condition of the little maid, Mary, who was too much excited to do her work, and kept continually coming back to pour her doubts and her difficulties into Lottie's ear. "I can't get no rest till I've told mother," Mary said. "If there's anything wrong, mother won't let me stay, not a day. And even if there's nothing wrong, I don't know as I'll stay. I haven't got no fault to find with you, miss; nor the captain, nor even Mr. Law; though he's a dreadful bother with his boots-cleaning; but to say as you're beginning as you mean to end, and then to give all that trouble! every blessed thing, I had to drag it up-stairs. Mr. Law was very kind; he took up the big box — I couldn't ha' done it; but up and down, up and down, all the little boxes and the bags, and the brown paper parcels — 'It saves trouble if you begins as you means to end,' she says ——"

"I don't want to hear what Mrs. Despard says," said Lottie. Mrs. Despard: it was her mother's name. And though that mother had not been an ideal mother, or one of those who are worshipped in their children's memories, it is wonderful, what a gush of tender recollections came into Lottie's mind with the name. Poor mamma! she had been very kind in her way, always ready to indulge and to pardon, if indifferent to what happened in more important matters. She had never exacted anything, never worried her children about idleness or untidiness, or any of those minor sins which generally make a small girl's life a burden to her. Lottie's mind went back to her, lying on her sofa, languid, perhaps lazy — badly dressed; yet never anything but a lady, with a kind of graciousness in her faded smile, and grace in her faded gown. Not a woman to be held in adoration, and yet — the girl sighed, but set to work to make the little brown dining-room neat, to get the table set, making up for Mary's distracted service by her own extra activity. For amid all the horrors of last night there was one which had cut Lottie very deeply, and that was the many references to the cold beef, and the bride's dislike of "cold victuals." It is inconceivable, among all the more important matters involved, how deeply wounded Lottie's pride had been by this reproach. She resolved that no one should be able to speak so to-day; and she herself put on her hat and went out to the shop on the Abbey hill almost as soon as it had opened, that this intolerable reproach should not be in the interloper's power. She met more than one of the old chevaliers as she came up, for most of them kept early hours and paced the terrace pavement in the morning as if it had been morning parade. They all looked at her curiously, and one or two stopped her to say "Good morning." "And a fine morning it is, and you look as fresh as a flower," one of the old gentlemen said; and another laid his hand on her shoulder, patting her with a tender, fatherly touch. "God bless you, my dear, the sight of you is a pleasure," said this old man. How little she had thought or cared for them, and how kind they were in her trouble! She could see that everybody knew. Lottie did not know whether she did not half resent the universal knowledge. Most likely they had known it before she did. The whole town knew it, and everybody within the precincts. Captain Despard had got married! Such a thing had not occurred before in the memory of man. Many people believed, indeed, that there was a law against it, and that Captain Despard was liable to be turned out of his appointment. Certainly it was unprecedented; for the old chevaliers before they came to St. Michael's had generally

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

passed the age at which men marry. The whole scene seemed to have taken a different aspect to Lottie. Since her home had become impossible to her, it had become dear. For the first time she felt how good it was to look across upon the noble old buttresses of the Abbey, to inhabit that "retired leisure," that venerable quietness. If only that woman were not there! But that woman was there, and everything was changed. Lottie had been rudely awakened, dragged, as it were, out of her dreams. She could not think as she usually did of the meetings that were sure to come somehow in the Abbey, or on the slopes — or count how long it would be till the afternoon or evening, when she should see him. This, though it was her life, had been pushed out of the way. She thought of all last night's remarks about the cold beef and the poor fare, and the changes that were going to be made. Would she think bacon good enough for breakfast? — would she be satisfied with the rolls, which Lottie herself felt to be a holiday indulgence? Pride, and nothing but pride, had thrown the girl into such excesses. She could not endure those criticisms again. Her brain was hot and hazy, without having any power of thought. The confusion of last night was still in her. Would it all turn out a dream? or would the door open by-and-by and show this unaccustomed figure? Lottie did not feel that she could be sure of anything. The first to come down was Law, who had been forced from his bed for once by sympathy. Law was very kind to Lottie. "I thought I wouldn't leave you to face her by yourself," he said, "they're coming down directly." Then Lottie knew that it was no dream.

The bride came down in a blue merino dress, as blue as the silk of last night. Polly was of opinion that she looked well in blue; and it was not one of the ethereal tints that are now used, but a good, solid, full blue, quite uncompromising in point of color. And the hair on her head was piled up as if it would reach the skies, or the ceiling at least. She came down arm-in-arm with her husband, the two smiling upon each other, while Law and Lottie stood one on each side of the table with no smiles, looking very serious. It was Mrs. Despard who did the most of the conversation; for the captain was passive, feeling, it must be allowed, somewhat embarrassed by the presence of his children, who did not embarrass her at all. But she did not think the bacon very good. She thought it badly cooked. She thought the girl could not have been well trained to send it up like that. And she was not pleased either with the rolls; but announced her intention of changing the baker as well as the butcher. "We've always gone to Willoughby's, as long as I can recollect, and I don't fancy any bread but his." Lottie did not say anything, she was nearly as silent as on the previous night; and Law, who was opposite, though he made faces at her now and then, and did his best to beguile his sister into a laugh, did not contribute much to the conversation. He got up as soon as he had swallowed his breakfast and got his books. "I'm off to old Ashford," he said.

"Where are you going, Law? — you must never get up from table without asking my leave — it is dreadful unmannerly. You have got into such strange ways; you want me to bring you back to your manners, all of you. Who are you going to? — not to Mr. Langton as you used to do — I'm glad of that."

"I don't see why you should be glad of that. I'm going to old Ashford," said Law gloomily. "He is a much better coach than Langton. I have not anything to do to-day, Lottie; I shall be back at twelve o'clock."

"Dear me," said Mrs. Despard, "how long is Law going on going to school like a little boy? I never heard of such a thing, at his age. He should be put into something where he could earn a little money for himself, instead of costing money; a great, strong young fellow like that. I think you're all going to sleep here. You want me, as anybody can see, to wake you up, and save you from being put upon, my poor man. But I hope I know how to take care of my own husband, and see that he gets the good of what he has, and don't just throw it away upon other folks. And I begin as I means to end," said Polly, with a little toss of her head. Law, stopped by the sound of her voice, had turned round at the door, and contemplated her with gloomy looks; but seeing it was not to come to anything bad, went away. And the bell began, and the captain rose. His bride came to him fondly, and brushed a crumb or two off his coat, and arranged the flower in his buttonhole. "Now you look quite sweet," she said with genuine enthusiasm. "I ain't going in the morning, when none but the regular folks is there, but I mean to go, my dear, in the afternoon. It's only proper respect, living in the precincts; but you won't be long, dear? You'll come home to your poor little wife, that don't know

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

what to do without her handsome husband? Now, won't you, dear?"

"I'll be back as fast as my legs can carry me," said the captain. "Come and meet me, my pet. Lottie will tell you when the voluntary begins ——"

"Oh, I can tell very well without Lottie," said the bride, hanging upon him till he reached the door. All these endearments had an indescribable effect upon the girl, who was compelled to stand by. Lottie turned her back to them and rearranged the ornaments on the mantelpiece, with trembling hands, exasperated almost beyond the power of self-restraint. But when the captain was gone, looking back in his imbecility to kiss his hand to his bride, the situation changed at once. Polly turned round, sharp and business-like, in a moment. "Ring the bell, miss," she said, "and tell the girl to clear them things away. And then, if you will just hand me over the keys, and let me see your housekeeping things and your stores and all that, we may settle matters without any trouble. I likes to begin as I mean to end," said Polly peremptorily. Lottie stood and looked at her for a moment, her spirit rekindling, her mind rising up in arms against the idea of obedience to this stranger. But what would be the use of trying to resist? Resist! what power had she? The very pride which rebelled against submission made that submission inevitable. She could not humiliate herself by a vain struggle. Polly, who was very doubtful of the yielding of this natural adversary, and rather expected to have a struggle for her "rights," was quite bewildered by the meekness with which the proud girl, who scarcely took any notice of her, she thought, acquiesced in the orders she gave. Lottie rang the bell. She said, "You will prefer, I am sure, to give Mary her orders without me. There are not many keys, but I will go and get what I have."

"Not many keys! and you call yourself a housekeeper?" said Polly. Lottie turned away as the little maid came in, looking impertinent enough to be a match for the new mistress; but Lottie was no match for her. She went and got out her little housekeepingbook, which she had kept so neatly. She gathered the keys of the cupboards, which generally stood unlocked, for there was not so much in them that she should lock them up. Lottie had all the instincts of a housekeeper. It gave her positive pain to hand over the symbols of office — to give up her occupation. Her heart sank as she prepared to do it. All her struggles about the bills, her anxious thought how this and that was to be paid, seemed elements of happiness now. She could not bear to give them up. The pain of this compulsory abdication drove everything else out of her head. Love, they say, is all a woman's life, but only part of a man's; yet Lottie forgot even Rollo — forgot his love and all the consolation it might bring, in this other emergency, which was petty enough, yet all-important to her. She trembled as she got together these little symbols of her domestic sovereignty. She heard the new mistress of the house coming up the stairs as she did so, talking all the way. "I never heard such impudence," Polly was saying. "Speak back to her mistress! a bit of a chit of a maid-of-all-work like that. I suppose she's been let do whatever she pleased; but she'll find out the difference." Behind Polly's voice came a gust of weeping from below, and a cry of "I'm going to tell mother;" thus hostilities had commenced all along the line.

"I can't think however you got on with a creature like that," said Polly, throwing herself down in the easy-chair. "She don't know how to do a single thing, as far as I can see; but some folks never seem to mind. She sha'n't stay here not a day longer than I can help. I 've given her warning on the spot. To take impudence from a servant the very first day! But that's always the way when things are let go; the moment they find a firm hand over them there's a to-do. To be sure it wasn't to be looked for that you could know much, miss, about managing a house."

"Mary is a very good girl," said Lottie hastily. "She has always done what I told her. Here are the keys of the cupboards, since you wish for them; but there are not any stores to lock away. I get the things every week, just enough to use —"

"And don't lock them up!" Polly threw up her hands. "That's one way of housekeeping; but how should you know any better, poor thing, brought up like that! I'm sure I don't mean to be hard upon you; but you should have thought a bit of your papa, and not have wasted his money. However, that's all over now. A man wants a nice 'ome to come back to, he wants a nice dinner on the table, he wants somebody that can talk to him, to keep him out of mischief. Oh, I know very well the captain's been fond of having his fling. I ain't one of the ignorant ones, as don't know a man's ways. And I like that sort much the best myself. I like a man to be a man, and know what's what.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

But you'll soon see the difference, now that he's got some one to amuse him, and some one to make him comfortable at home. So these are all, Miss Lottie? And what's this? oh, a book! I don't think much of keeping books. You know how much you has to spend, and you spend it; that's my way."

Lottie made no reply. She felt it to be wiser for herself, but no doubt it was less respectful to Polly, who paused now and then for a reply, then went on again, loving to hear herself talk, yet feeling the contempt involved in this absence of all response. At last she cried angrily, "Have you lost your tongue, miss, or do you think as I'm not good enough to have an answer, though I'm your papa's wife?"

"I beg your pardon," said Lottie; "I — don't know what to say to you. We don't know each other. I don't understand —— Don't you see," she cried suddenly, unable to restrain herself, "that since you came into the house you have done nothing but — find fault with all my — arrangements?" (These mild words came with the utmost difficulty; but Lottie was too proud to quarrel). "You can't think that I could like that. I have done my best, and if you try as I have done, you will find it is not so easy. But I don't want to defend myself; that is why I don't say anything. There can be no good in quarrelling, whether you think me a bad housekeeper or not."

"I ain't so sure of that," said Polly. "Have a good flare-up, and be done with it, that's my way. I don't hold with your politeness, and keeping yourself to yourself. I'd rather quarrel than be always bursting with spite and envy, like some folks. It stands to reason as you must hate me, taking things out of your hands; and it stands to reason as I should think more of my own husband than of keeping up your brother and you in idleness. But for all that, and though we might fight now and then — everybody does, I don't care nothing for a girl as is always the same — I don't see why we shouldn't get on neither. The captain says as you've a very good chance of a husband yourself. And though I'm just about your own age, I've had a deal of experience. I know how to bring a man to the point, if he's shilly-shallying, or won't speak up like a man, as a girl has a right to expect."

"Oh! stop, stop, stop!" cried Lottie, wild with horror. She cast a hurried glance round, to see what excuse she could make for getting away. Then she seized eagerly upon her music which lay on the old square piano. "I must go to my lesson," she said.

"Your lesson! Are you having lessons too? Upon my word! Oh, my poor husband! my poor captain! No wonder as he has nothing but cold beef to eat," said Polly, with all the fervor of a deliverer, finding out one misery after another. "And if one might make so bold as to ask, miss, who is it as has the honor to give lessons to you?"

"The signor — Mr. Rossinetti," Lottie added, after a moment. It seemed desecration to talk of any of the familiar figures within the Abbey precincts by their familiar titles to this intruder.

"Oh! I'm not so ignorant as not to know who the signor is. That will be half a guinea, or at the least seven and six a lesson!" she said, raising her hands in horror. "Oh, my poor 'usband! This is how his money goes! Miss," said Polly severely, "you can't expect as I should put up with such goings on. I have your papa to think of, and I won't see him robbed — no, not whatever you may do. For I call that robbery, just nothing else. Half a guinea a lesson, and encouraging Law to waste his time! I can't think how you can do it: with that good, dear, sweet, confiding man letting you have your own way, and suspecting nothing," cried Polly, clasping her hands. Then she got up suddenly. "I declare," she cried, "church is near over, and me not ready to go out and meet him! I can't go out a figure, in a common rag like this, and me a bride. I must put on my silk. Of course, he wants to show me off a bit before his friends. I'll run and get ready, and we can talk of this another time."

Thus Lottie escaped for the moment. She was asked a little later to see if Mrs. Despard's collar was straight, and to pin on her veil. "Do I look nice?" said Polly triumphant, and at the same time mollified by the services which Lottie rendered without objection. She had put on her "blue silk" and the bonnet with the orange-blossoms, and neckties enough to stock a shop. "Perhaps, as there's nothing ordered, and I mean to make a change with the tradespeople, the captain and me won't come back to dinner," said Polly. "There's your favorite cold beef, miss, for Law and you." Lottie felt that she began to breathe when, rustling and mincing, her strange companion swept out, in the face of all the people who were dispersing from matins, to meet her husband. Polly liked the wondering encounter of all their eyes. With her blue silk sweeping the pavement

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

after her, and her pink parasol, and the orange-blossoms on her bonnet, her figure descending the Dean's Walk alone, while all the others issued out of the Abbey doors, was conspicuous enough. She was delighted to find that everybody looked at her, and even that some stood still to watch her, looking darkly at her finery. These were the people who were jealous, envious of her fine clothes and her happiness, or jealous of her handsome husband, who met her presently, but who perhaps was not so much delighted to see her amidst all his fellow-chevaliers, as she thought. Captain Despard was not a man of very fine perceptions; but though his blooming young wife was a splendid object indeed beside the dark, little old figure of Mrs. Temple, he had seen enough to feel that the presence of the old lady brought out into larger prominence something which the younger lacked. But he met her with effusive delight, and drew her hand within his arm, and thus they disappeared together. Outside the precincts there was no need to make any comparison, and Polly's brilliancy filled all hearts with awe.

When Law returned, he found Lottie seated in her little chair, with her face hidden in her hands. It was not that she was crying, as he feared at first. The face she raised to him was crimson with excitement. "Oh, Law!" she said, "Law, Law!" Lottie had got beyond the range of words. After a while she told him all the events of the morning, which did not look half so important when they were told, and they tried to lay their heads together and think what was best to be done. But what could any one do? Mary could scarcely put the remnants of the cold beef on the table, for her eagerness to tell that she had been to mother, and mother would not hear of her staying. "Places isn't so hard to get as all that, for a girl with a good character," she said. When she was gone, Lottie looked piteously at her brother.

"What kind of a place could I get?" she said. "What am I fit for? Oh, Law! I think it is a mistake to be brought up a lady. I never thought it before, but I do now. How can we go on living here? and where are we to go?"

"That's what I always said," said Law. He was horribly grave, but he had not a word to say except that he had got a match at football, and perhaps might stay and sup with the fellows afterwards. "I'm just as well out of the way, for what can I do for you? only make things worse," he said. And though he had been so kind and sympathetic at first, Law stole away, glad to escape, and left Lottie alone, to bear it as she might. She had no lesson that day, though she had pretended to have one. She would not go to the Abbey, where the new member of the family meant to appear, she knew. Lottie stayed in the familiar room which was hers no longer, until the silence became too much for her, and she felt that any human voice would be a relief. She went out in the afternoon, when all seemed quiet, when everybody had gone to the Abbey for the evening service. There would be nobody about, and it seemed to Lottie that the shame was upon her, that it was she who must shrink from all eyes. Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, however, knocking on the window violently, instantly gave her to understand that this was impracticable. The girl tried to resist, being afraid of herself, afraid of what she might say, and of what might be said to her. But as she hurried on, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy's maid rushed after her. Lottie had to go to her old friend, though very reluctantly. Mrs. O'Shaughnessy had a bad cold. She was sitting wrapped up in a shawl, and a visitor with something to tell was beyond price to her. "Come and tell me all about it, then!" she cried, "me poor darlin'!" enveloping Lottie in her large embrace. "And tell the major, Sally, and let nobody come in." The major came instantly to the call, and Lottie tried to tell her story to the kind couple who sat on either side of her, with many an exclamation.

"I knew that was what it would come to," Mrs. O'Shaughnessy said.

"And I never thought Despard (saving your presence, my dear) could have been such a fool!" cried the major.

"Oh sure, major, you're old enough to know that every man is a fool where a woman's concerned."

But what was Lottie to do? They petted her and condoled with her, soothing her with their sympathy, and all the tender words they could think of; but they could throw no light upon one point: what could the girl do? Nothing, but put up with it. They shook their heads, but could give her no comfort. If Law had but been doing something instead of idling all his time away! But then Law was not doing anything. What was he good for, any more than Lottie?

"Mary can get another place. Her mother will not let her stay, and she can get another place, she says; but here are

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

two of us, Law and I, and we are good for nothing!" cried Lottie. How her thoughts were altered from the time when she thought it necessary to stay at home, to do no visible work, for the credit of the family! Lottie was not young enough to feel that it was necessary to be consistent. "We are young and strong and able to work, but we are good for nothing!" she said. And they both looked at her blankly, not knowing what to say.

By-and-by Lottie escaped again into the open air, notwithstanding their anxious invitation that she should stay with them. She was too wretched to stay, and there had come upon her a longing to see another face in which there might be comfort. As she went out she almost walked into Captain Temple's arms, who was walking slowly along looking up at her window. The old man took both her hands into his. "My poor child!" he said. He was not so frankly inquisitive as the good people she had just left, but he drew her hand through his arm and walked with her, bending over her.

"I do not want to tempt you from your duty, my dear; you'll do what is right, I am sure you will do what is right. But I can't bear to think you are in trouble, and we so near. And my wife," said the old man slightly faltering, "my wife thinks so, too." He was not quite so sure of his wife. She had the restraining effect upon her husband which a more reserved and uncommunicative mind has over an impulsive one. He knew what he would like to do, but he was not sure of her, and this put hesitation into his speech.

"Oh! Captain Temple," cried Lottie, moved at last to tears, "what am I to do? If I cannot bear it, what am I to do?"

"Come and speak to my wife," he said; "come, dear, and see my wife. She can't talk about everything as I do, but she has more sense than any one, and knows the world. Come with me, Lottie, and see what Mrs. Temple says."

He thought the sight of the girl in her trouble would be enough, and that his wife would certainly say what it was on his own lips to say. Just then, however, there was a sound of doors opening, and old Wykeham came out and looked upon the world with a defiant countenance from the south door of the Abbey, which was a sign that service was over; and the notes of the voluntary began to peal out into the air. Lottie drew her arm from that of her old friend — she could not bear the eyes of the crowd. "Another time, another time; but I must go now," she cried, escaping from him and turning towards the slopes. The old captain's first impulse was to follow. He stood for a moment gazing after her as she sped along, slim and swift and young, up the deserted road. It was beginning to grow dark, and the evening was colder than it had been yet. Where was she going? To her favorite haunt on the slopes to get the wind in her face; to let her thoughts go, like birds, into the wide space and distance? If that had been all! The old man thought of an alternative which filled him with alarm. He took a step after her, and then he paused again, and shaking his head, turned back, meeting all the people as they streamed out of the Abbey. Poor child! if she did meet him there, what then? It would comfort her to see her lover; and if he was good, as the anxious old chevalier hoped, had not the lover more power to save her than all the world? There was no question of taking Lottie from her father and mother, separating her from her home. If this young man were to offer her a home of her own, where could there be so good a solution to the problem? Captain Temple turned and walked home with a sigh. It was not his way of delivering Lottie, but perhaps it was the way that would be most for her happiness, and who was he that he should interfere? He let her go to her fate with a sigh.

From Fraser's Magazine.

HOLIDAYS IN EASTERN FRANCE.

I.

SEINE ET MARNE.

How delicious to escape from the fever heat and turmoil of Paris to the green banks and sheltered ways of the gently undulating Marne; with what delight we wake up in the morning to the sound of the mower's scythe, the rustle of acacia leaves, and the notes of the stock-dove, looking back as upon a nightmare to the horn of the tramway conductor and the perpetual grind of the stone-mason's saw! Yes, to quit Paris in these days of tropic heat and nestle down in some country resort is indeed like exchanging Dante's lower circle for Paradise. The heat has followed us here, but with a screen of luxuriant foliage between us and the burning blue sky, and with a breeze perpetually rippling the leaves, no one need complain. With the cocks and the hens, the birds and the bees, we are all up and stirring betimes: there

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

are dozens of nooks and corners if we like to spend the morning out of doors and do not feel enterprising enough to set out on an exploring expedition by diligence or rail. After the midday meal everybody takes a siesta as a matter of course, waking up between four and five o'clock for a ramble, and wherever we go we find lovely prospects. Quiet little rivers and canals winding between lofty lines of poplar, undulating pastures and amber corn-fields, picturesque villages crowned by a church spire here and there, wide sweeps of highly cultivated land interspersed with rich woods, vineyards, orchards, and gardens — all these make up the scenery familiarized to us by some of the most characteristic of French painters. Just such rural pictures have been portrayed a thousand times by Millet, Corot, Daubigny, and in their very simplicity often lies the chief charm. No extensive or grandiose outlines are here as in Brittany, no picturesque poverty, no poetic archaisms; all is rustic and pastoral, with the rusticity and pastoralness of every day. We are in the midst of one of the wealthiest and best-cultivated regions of France moreover, and when we penetrate below the surface we find that in manners and customs, as well as dress and outward appearance, the peasant and agricultural population generally differ no little from their remoter fellow-countrymen, the Bretons. In this famous cheese country, the fromage de Brie being the speciality of these dairy farms, there is no superstition, hardly a trace of poverty, and little that is poetic. The people are rich, laborious, and progressive. The farmers' wives, however hard they may work at home, wear the smartest of Parisian bonnets and gowns when paying visits — I was going to say, when at church, but nobody goes here. It is a significant fact that in this well-educated district, where newspapers are read by the poorest, and where well-being is the rule and poverty a rare exception, the church is empty on Sunday, and the priest's authority is nil. The priests may preach against abstinence from church in the pulpit, and may lecture the congregation in private, but no effect is thereby produced. Church-going has become out of date among the manufacturers of Brie cheese. They amuse themselves on Sundays by taking walks with their children, the paterfamiliases bathe in the river, the ladies put on their fine clothes and pay visits, but they omit their devotions. Some of these tenant farmers — for many of the farms are let on lease as in England, possessors of small farms hiring more land — are very rich, and one of our neighbors here, whose wealth had been made by Brie cheese, lately gave his daughter several hundred thousand francs by way of dowry. The wedding breakfast took place at the Grand Hotel, Paris, and a hundred guests were invited to partake of a sumptuous collation. Sometimes these rustic brides are dowried with a million francs. But in spite of fine clothes and large dowries, farmers' wives and daughters still attend to their dairies, and when they cease to do so, doubtless farming in Seine et Marne will cease to be the prosperous business we now find it.

It is delightful to witness the widespread well-being of this highly favored region. "There is no poverty here," say my host and hostess, "and that is why life is so pleasant." True enough. Wherever you go you find well-dressed, contented-looking people — no rags, no squalor, no pinched want. Poverty is an accident of rare occurrence and not a normal condition, every one being able to get plenty of work and good pay. The habitual look of content written upon the faces you meet is very striking. It seems as if in this land of Goshen life were no burden, but matter for satisfaction only. Class distinctions can hardly be said to exist. There are employers and employed, masters and servants, of course; but the line of demarcation is lightly drawn, and we find an easy familiarity existing between them, wholly free from impoliteness, much less vulgarity. That automatic demureness characterizing English servants in the presence of their employers is wholly unknown here. There are households with us where the servants might all be mutes for any signs of animation they give, but here they take part in what is going on, and exchange a word and a smile with every member of the household, never dreaming that it should be otherwise. One is struck, too, here by the good looks, intelligence, and trim appearance of the children, who, it is clear, are well cared for. The houses have vines and sweet peas on the wall, flowers in the window, and altogether a look of comfort and ease found nowhere in western France. The Breton villages are composed of mere hovels, where pigs, cows, and poultry live in close proximity to their owners; a dunghill stands before every front door, and to get in-doors or out the inhabitants have always to cross a pool of liquid manure. Here order and cleanliness prevail, with a diffusion of well-being hardly to be matched out of America. Travellers who visit France again and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

again, rather out of sympathy with its people and institutions than from a desire to see its monuments or outward features, will find ample to reward them in Seine et Marne. On every side you have evidence of the boundless natural resources and indefatigable laboriousness of the people. There is one point here, which, as elsewhere in France, strikes an agriculturist with astonishment, and that is the abundance of fruit trees standing amid cornfields and miscellaneous crops; also the interminable plantations of poplar-trees that are to be seen on every side, apparently without any object. But the truth is, the planting of trees is no extravagance but rather economy, the fruit they produce exceeding in value the corn they destroy; whilst the puzzling lines of poplars beside canals and railways are the work of the government, every spare bit of land belonging to the state being planted with trees for the sake of the timber. The crops are splendid, partly owing to the soil and partly to the advanced system of agriculture. You may see exposed for sale in little towns and villages the newest American agricultural tools, whilst the great diversity of products speaks much for the enterprise of the farmers. As you stroll along, now climbing, now descending this pleasantly undulated country, you may see a dozen crops on less than an acre. A patch of potatoes here, vines growing there, on one side a bit of wheat, oats, rye, or barley, with fruit trees casting abundant shadow over all, or Indian corn, clover, and mangel wurzel in the green state, recently planted for autumn fodder, are found side by side, further on a poppy-field, three weeks ago in full bloom, now having full pods ready for gathering — the poppy being cultivated for the manufacture of oil here — all these and many more are seen close together, and near them many a lovely little glen, copse, and ravine, recalling Scotland and Wales. You may walk for miles through what seems one vast orchard, only instead of turf, rich crops are growing under the trees. This is indeed the orchard of France, on which we English largely depend for our summer fruits. A few days ago the black-currant trees were being stripped for the benefit of Parisian lovers of cassis, and now we encounter on our walks carts laden with plums packed in baskets and barrels, on their way to Covent Garden; later on, it will be the peach and apricot crops gathered for exportation; later still, apples, walnuts, and pears. One village not far from our own sends fruit to the Paris markets valued at a million francs annually But the traveller must settle down in some delicious retreat in the valley of the Marne to realize the interest and charm of such a country as this. And he must above all things be a fairly good pedestrian, for it is not a land of luxuries, and carriages, good, bad, or indifferent, are difficult to be got. A countless succession of delightful prospects is offered to the persevering explorer who each day strikes out in an entirely different direction. I have always been of opinion that the best way to see a country is to make a halt in some good central point, for weeks at a time, and from thence "excursionize." By these means much fatigue is avoided, and the two chief drawbacks to the pleasures of travel, namely, hotels and perpetual railways, avoided as much as possible. My rallying point was a pleasant French country house at Couilly, offering every opportunity for studying agriculture and rural life as well as making excursions by road and rail. Couilly itself is charming. The canal winding its way between thick lines of poplar-trees towards Meaux is a walk you may take on the hottest day of summer without fatigue; the river, narrow and sleepy, yet so picturesquely curling amid green slopes and tangled woods, affords another delightful stroll; then there are broad, richly-wooded hills rising above these, and shady side paths leading from hill to valley, with alternating vineyards, orchards, pastures, and corn-fields on either side. Couilly lies in the heart of the cheese-making country, part of the ancient province of Brie, from which this famous cheese is named (the comté of Brie became part of the French kingdom on the occasion of the marriage of Jeanne of Navarre with Philippe le Bel, in 1361), and is as prosperous as it is picturesque. Within a stone's throw of our garden walls once stood a famous convent of Bernardines, called Pont-aux-Dames. Here Mme. Dubarry, of evil reputation, was exiled after the death of Louis XV. On the outbreak of the Revolution she fled to England, and might there have ended her unworthy life in peace but for a cupidity which brought her to the guillotine. The old favorite of perhaps the most depraved of French kings had left secreted at Pont-aux-Dames a case of diamonds, and in order to secure these she ventured to Couilly again, with the result that might have been expected. The Revolutionary tribunal got hold of Madame Dubarry, and she mounted the scaffold in company of her betters, no one before or after showing such pusillanimity when her turn came.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The diligence passes our garden gate early in the morning, and in an hour and a half takes us to Meaux, former capital of the province of La Brie, bishopric of the famous Bossuet, and also one of the early strongholds of the Reformation. The neighboring country, pays Meldois, as it is called, is one vast fruit and vegetable garden, bringing in enormous returns. From our vantage ground, for of course we go outside the coach, we survey the shifting landscape — woods, valley, and plain, soon seeing the city with its imposing cathedral, both of the whiteness of marble, rising above the winding river and fields of green and gold on either side. I know nothing that gives the mind an idea of fertility and wealth more than this scene, and it is no wonder that the Prussians in 1871 here levied a heavy toll, their sojourn at Meaux having cost the inhabitants not less than a million and a half of francs. All now, however, is peace and prosperity, and here, as in the neighboring towns and villages, rags, want, and beggary are not seen. The evident well-being of all classes is delightful to behold. Meaux, with its shady boulevards and public gardens, must be a pleasant place to live in, nor would intellectual resources be wanting. We strolled into the spacious town library, open, of course, to strangers, and could wish for no better occupation than to con the curious old books and manuscripts that it contains. The employé having shown us the busts adorning the walls of the principal rooms, took us into a side closet, where, ignominiously put out of sight, are the busts of Charles X. and Louis Philippe. "But," said our informant, "we have more busts in the garret — those of the emperor Napoleon III., the empress, and the prince imperial." Naturally enough, on the proclamation of the republic, these busts were considered as supererogatory, and it is to be hoped they will stay where they are. The Evêché, or bishop's palace, is the principal sight at Meaux. It is full of historic associations besides being very curious in itself. Here have slept many noteworthy personages — Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, when on their return from Varennes, June 24, 1791; Napoleon in 1814, Charles X. in 1828; later, General Moltke in 1870, who said upon that occasion, "In three days, or a week at most, we shall be in Paris," not counting on the probabilities of a siege. The room occupied by the unfortunate Louis XVI. and his little son still bears the name of la chambre du roi, and cannot be entered without a feeling of sadness. The gardens, designed by Lenôtre, are as quaint and characteristic perhaps as any of the same period — a broad, open, sunny flower-garden below, terraced walks above so shaded with closely-planted plane-trees that the sun can hardly penetrate on this July day. These green walks, where the nightingale and the oriole were singing, were otherwise as quiet as the Evêché itself; but the acme of quiet and solitude was only to be found in the avenue of yews called Bossuet's Walk. Here it is said the great adversary of the Jansenists used to pace backwards and forwards when composing his famous discourses, wholly excluding himself from the world, like another celebrated French writer, Balzac, whilst thus occupied. A little garden house in which he ate and slept leads out of this delightful walk, a cloister of greenery, the high square-cut walls of yew shutting out everything but the sky. What would some of us give for such a retreat as this — an ideal of perfect tranquillity and isolation from the outer world that might have satisfied the soul of Schopenhauer itself? But the good things of life are not equally divided. The present bishop, an octogenarian who has long been quite blind, would perhaps prefer to hear more echoes from without. It happened that in our party was a little child of six, who with the inquisitiveness of childhood followed the servant in-doors while the rest waited at the door for permission to visit the palace. "I hear the footsteps of a child," said the old man, and bidding his young visitor approach, he gave him sugarplums, kisses, and finally his blessing. Very likely the innocent prattlings of the child were as welcome to the old man as the sweetmeats to the little one on his knee.

The terraces of the episcopal garden cross the ancient walls of the city, and underneath the boulevards afford a promenade almost as pleasant. It must be admitted that much more pains are taken in France to embellish provincial towns with shady walks and public promenades than in England. The tiniest little town in Seine et Marne has its promenade, that is to say, an open green space and avenues, with benches for the passer-by. We cannot certainly sit out of doors as much as our French neighbors in consequence of our more changeable climate, but might not pleasant public squares and gardens, with bands playing gratuitously on certain evenings in the week, entice customers from the public-house? The traveller is shown the handsome private residences of rich Meldois, where, in the second week of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

September 1870, were lodged the emperor of Germany, the prince Frederick Charles, and Prince Bismarck. Meaux, if one of the most prosperous, is also one of the most liberal of French cities, and has been renowned for its charity from early times. In the thirteenth century there were no fewer than sixty hôtels-dieu léproseries (hospitals for lepers) in the diocese; and in the present day it is true to its ancient traditions, being abundantly supplied with hospitals, etc.

Half an hour from Meaux by railway is the pretty little town of La Ferté sous Jouarre, coquettishly perched on the Marne, and not yet rendered unpoetic by the hum and bustle of commerce. Here even more than at Meaux the material well-being of all classes is especially striking. You see the women sitting in their little gardens at needlework; the children trotting off to school; the men busy in their respective callings; but all as it should be, no poverty, no dirt, no discontent: cheerfulness, cleanliness, and good clothes, are evidently everybody's portion. Yet it is eminently a working population; there are no fashionable ladies in the streets, no nursery maids with over-dressed charges on the public walks; the men wear blue blouses, the women cotton gowns; all belong to one class, and have no need to envy any other. Close to the railway station is a little inn where I saw an instance of the comfort enjoyed by these unpretentious citizens of this thrifty little town. The landlord, a particularly intelligent, and, cela va sans dire, well-mannered person, was waiting upon his customers in blue blouse, the landlady was as busy as could be in the kitchen. Both were evidently accustomed to plenty of work; yet when she took me over the house in order to show the accommodation for tourists, I found their own rooms furnished with Parisian elegance. There were velvet sofas and chars, white lace curtains, polished floors, mirrors, hanging wardrobes, a sumptuous little bassinette for baby, and adjoining as charming a room for their elder daughter — a teacher in a day school — as any heiress to a large fortune could desire. This love of good furniture and in-door comfort generally seemed to me to speak much, not only for the taste, but the moral tone of the family. Evidently to these good people the home meant everything dearest to their hearts. You would not find extravagance in food and dress among them, or most likely any other but this. They work hard, they live frugally, but when the day's toil is done, they like to have pretty things around them, and not only to repose but to enjoy.

La Ferté sous Jouarre is the seat of a large manufacture of millstones, exported to all parts of the world, and a very thriving little place. Large numbers of Germans are brought hither by commerce, and now live again among their French neighbors as peacefully as before the war. The attraction for tourists is, however, Jouarre, reached by a lovely drive of about an hour from the lower town. Leaving the river you ascend gradually, gaining at every step a richer and wider prospect; below, the blue river winding between green banks; above, a lofty ridge of wooded hills, with hamlets dotted here and there amid the yellow corn and luxuriant foliage. It is a bit of Switzerland, and has often been painted by French artists.

The love of flowers and flower-gardens, so painfully absent in the west of France, is here conspicuous. There are flowers everywhere, and some of the gardens give evidence of great skill and care. Jouarre is perched upon an airy green eminence, a quiet, old-world town, with an enormous convent in the centre, where some scores of cloistered nuns have shut themselves up for the glory of God. There they live as much in prison as if they were the most dangerous felons ever brought to justice; and a prison house indeed the convent looks, with its high walls, bars, and bolts. I had a little talk with the sister in charge of the porter's lodge, and she took me into the church, pointing to the high iron rails barring off the cloistered nuns with that expression of imbecile satisfaction as much inseparable from her calling as her unwholesome dress. "There is one young English lady here," she said, "formerly a Protestant; she is twenty-one, and only the other day took the perpetual vows." I wondered as I looked up at the barred windows how long this kind of suttee would be permitted in happy France, and indeed in any other country, and whether in the lifetime of that foolish English girl the doors would be opened, and she would be compelled to go forth and labor in the world like any other rational being. This dreary prison house, erected not in the interests of justice and society, but in order to gratify cupidity on one side and fanaticism on the other, afforded a painful contrast to the cheerful, active life outside. Close to the convent is one of the most curious monuments in the entire depart-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ment of Seine et Marne, namely, the famous Merovingian crypt, described by French archæologists in the Bulletin Monumental and elsewhere. It is well known that during the Merovingian epoch, and under Charlemagne, long journeys were often undertaken in order to procure marble and other building-material for the Christian churches. Thus only can we account for the splendid columns of jasper, porphyry, Corinthian, and rare marbles of which this crypt is composed. The capitals of white marble, in striking contrast to the deep red, greens, and other colors of the columns, are richly carved with acanthus leaves, scrolls, and classic patterns, without doubt the whole having originally decorated some pagan temple. The chapel containing the crypt is said to have been founded in the seventh century, and speaks much for the enthusiasm and artistic spirit animating its builders. There is much elegance in these arches, also in the sculptured tombs of different epochs which, like the crypt, have been preserved so wonderfully until the present time. Other archæological treasures are here, notably the so-called pierre des sonneurs de Jouarre — stone of the Jouarre bellringers — a quaint design representing two bellringers at their task, with a legend underneath, dating from the fourteenth century. When I arrived at Jouarre, M. le curé and the sacristan were both absent, and as no one else possessed the key of the crypt, my chance of seeing it seemed small. However, some one obligingly set me on a voyage of discovery, and finally the sacristan's wife was found in a neighboring harvest field, and she bustled up, delighted to show everything; amongst other antiquities, some precious skulls and bones of saints, kept under lock and key in the sacristy, and only exposed on fête-days.

No one, however, need to have archæological tastes in order to enjoy these twin towns; alike scenery and people are charming, and the tourist is welcomed as a guest rather than a customer. But whether at Jouarre or anywhere else, he who knows most will see most; every day the dictum of the great Lessing being illustrated in travel: "Wer viel weiss, hat viel zu sorgen." The mere lover of the picturesque, who cares nothing for French history, literature, and institutions, old or new, will get a superb landscape here and nothing more.

In striking contrast with the homely ease and well-to-do terre-à-terre about us at Couilly, is the princely château of the Rothschilds at Ferrières, which none should miss seeing on any account whatever. With princely liberality also, Baron Rothschild admits any one to his fairyland who takes the trouble to write for permission; and however much we may have been thinking of Haroun al Raschid, King Solomon, and the "Thousand and One Nights" beforehand, we shall not be disappointed. The very name of Rothschild fills us with awe and bewilderment. We prepare ourselves to be dazzled with gold and gems, to tread on carpets gorgeous as peacocks' tails, softer than eider-down; we pass through jasper and porphyry columns into regal halls where the acme of splendor can go no farther, where the walls are hung with tapestry and crimson satin, where every chair looks like a throne, and where on all sides mirrors reflect the treasures collected from all parts of the world. And we are not disappointed.

Quitting the railway at the cheerful, wealthy little town of Lagny, we drive past handsome country houses and well-kept flower gardens, and then gradually ascend a road winding amid hill and valley up to the château, a graceful structure in white marble, or so it seems, proudly commanding the wide landscape. The flower gardens are a blaze of colors, and the orange-trees give delicious fragrance as we ascend the terrace; ascend, indeed, being hardly the word applicable to steps sloping so easily upwards, and so nicely adjusted to the human foot, that climbing Mont Blanc under the same circumstances could be accomplished without fatigue. It is impossible to give any idea of the different kinds of magnificence that greet us on every side. Now a little Watteau world in tapestries having for background sky-blue satin and roses; now a dining hall, sombre, gorgeous, and majestic as that of a Spanish palace; now we are transported to Persia, China, and Japan; next we find ourselves amid unspeakable treasures of Italian and other marbles. To come down to practical details, it might be suggested to the generous owner of this noble treasure-house of art that the briefest possible catalogue of his choicest treasures would unspeakably oblige his visitors.

There is hardly a piece of furniture that is not interesting, alike from a historic and artistic point of view, whilst some are chefs-d'œuvre both in design and execution, and dazzlingly rich in material. Among these may be mentioned a pair of chimney ornaments thickly hung with pendants of precious stones; a piano — which

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

belonged to Marie Antoinette — the case of which is formed of tortoise-shell richly decorated with gold; a cabinet set with emeralds, sapphires, and other jewels; another composed of various precious stones; chairs and couches covered with exquisite tapestry of the Louis Quinze period; some rare specimens of old cloisonné work, also of Florentine mosaics — these forming a small part of this magnificent museum.

The striking feature is the great quantity and variety of rich marbles in every part. One of the staircases is entirely formed of different kinds of rare marble, the effect being extraordinarily imposing. Elsewhere a room is divided by Corinthian columns of jasper and porphyry, and on every side is displayed a wealth and splendor in this respect quite unique. Without doubt nothing lends such magnificence to interiors as marbles, but they require the spaciousness and princeliness of such a château as this to be displayed to advantage. Next in importance as a matter of mere decoration must be cited the tapestries, of which there is a rare and valuable collection, chiefly in the hall, so called, and where they are arranged about the running gallery surmounting the pictures. What this hall must be worth would perhaps sound fabulous on paper; it is here that some of the most precious cabinets are found; treasures of ivory, ebony, gems, gold and silver; and the pictures alone represent a princess's dowry. Examples of some of the great masters are here — Velasquez, Rembrandt, Rubens, Claude Lorraine, Bordone, Reynolds; lastly, among moderns, Ingres and Hippolyte Flandrin.

Much might be said about the pictures if space permitted, but they alone are worth making the journey from Paris to see. But the crême de la crême of Baron Rothschild's treasures is not to be found in this sumptuous hall, in spite of tapestries, pictures, marbles, and rare furniture, nor in the state salon, but in one of the dining-rooms, a marvellously rich and gorgeous apartment, where the wealth of gold and splendid colors is toned down, and the eye is rather refreshed than dazzled by the whole. On the walls, reaching from base to ceiling, are hung a series of six paintings on leather, known as the cuirs de Cordoue, or leather paintings from Cordova. They are historical and allegorical subjects, and are painted in rich colors with a great abundance of gold on a brown background, the general effect being that of a study in gold and brown. When looked at narrowly we find great dramatic interest in the subjects, and a uniform masterliness of execution, but without a catalogue it is impossible to give any accurate idea of these gorgeous paintings. The entire department of Seine et Marne perhaps offers no greater rarity than these paintings on leather from Cordova of which we would fain know the history.*

So much for the treat in store for those art-lovers who find their way to the château of Ferrières, where none will fail to add something to his previous store of knowledge. Those who really value art in all its degrees as forming part of daily life, cannot study the exquisite designs, elaborate workmanship, and splendid materials of the furniture, decorations, and general fittings-up of such a place as this without feeling strongly how little that is new and modern can be compared to the old, whether we regard mere carpentry, general effect, solidity, or design. This is strikingly illustrated in the old and new Japanese cloisonné work, the former being infinitely richer, more brilliant, and more elaborate than the other.

When not disposed to go so far afield in search of pleasure and instruction, we find ample occupation close at hand. Even in this quiet little village of Couilly there is always something going on, either a fête, a prize-distribution, a ball, or some other local celebration. The école communale for boys and girls has just closed for the summer holidays, and last Sunday the prizes were given away with much state and ceremony. A tent was decorated with tricolor flags, wreaths, and flowers, the village band fetched the mayor and corporation, and marched them in to a spirited air. I had already seen a prize-distribution in the heart of Anjou, but how different to this! Here at Couilly it was difficult to believe that the fashionable Parisian toilettes around us belonged to the wives of small farmers who all the week time were busy in their dairy and poultry-yard, whilst the young ladies, of all ages from three to fifteen, their daughters, might have appeared at the lady mayoress's ball, so smart were their gala frocks, white muslin, and blue ribbons. A few mob caps among the old women and blue blouses among the men were seen, but the assemblage as a whole might be called a fashionable one, while in Anjou exactly the same class presented the homeliest appearance, all the female part of it

* See second volume of the Bibliothèque de l'Art. Paris: Quantin.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

wearing white coiffes and plain black stuff gowns, the men blue blouses and sabots. Nor was the difference less striking in other respects. These boys and girls of rich tenant farmers, peasant proprietors, or even day laborers, are far ahead of the young people in Anjou, and each would be considered a wonder in benighted Brittany. They are in fact quite accomplished, not only learning singing, drawing, and other accomplishments, but to take part in dramatic entertainments. Two performances were given by the boys, two by the girls, a little play being followed by a recitation, and I must say I never heard anything of the kind in a village school in England. These children acquitted themselves of their parts remarkably well, especially the girls, and their accuracy, pure accent, and delivery generally spoke volumes for the training they had received. Of awkwardness there was not a trace. There were speeches from the mayor, M. le curé, and others, also music, singing, and a large number of excellent books were distributed, each recipient being at the same time crowned with a wreath of artificial flowers. It is to be hoped that ere many years the excellent education these children receive will be the portion of every boy and girl in France, and that an adult unable to read and write — the rule, not the exception, among the rural population in Brittany — will be unheard of. A friend of mine from Nantes recently took with him to Paris a young Breton maidservant, who had been educated by the "bonnes sœurs," that is to say, the nuns. What was the poor girl's astonishment to find that in Paris everybody was so far accomplished as to be able to read and write! Her surprise would have been greater still had she witnessed the acquirements and aplomb of these little Couilly girls, many of them, like herself, daughters of small peasant farmers. It must be mentioned for the satisfaction of those who regard the progress of education with some concern, that the elegant bonnets and dresses I speak of are laid aside on week days, and that nowhere in France do people work harder than here. But when not at work they like to wear fine clothes and read the newspaper as well as their neighbors. The amount of clothes these country women possess is often enormous, and they pride themselves upon the largest possible quantity of linen, a great part of which is of course laid by. They count their garments not by dozens but by scores, and can thus afford to wait for a quarterly washing day, as they often do.

It must be also mentioned that cleanliness is uniformly found throughout these flourishing villages, and in almost all hot and cold public baths. Dirt is as rare — I might almost say as unknown — as rags, neither of which as yet we have seen throughout our long walks and drives except in the case of a company of tramps we encountered one day. Drunkenness is also comparatively, in some places we might say absolutely, absent. As we make further acquaintance with these favored regions we might suppose that here at least the dreams of the Utopians had come true, and that poverty, squalor, and wretchedness were banished forever. The abundant crops around us are apportioned out to all, and the soil, which if roughly cultivated according to English notions, yet bears marvellously, is not the heritage of one or two but of the people. The poorest has his bit of land, to which he adds from time to time by the fruits of his industry; and though tenant farming is carried on largely, owing to the wealth and enterprise of the agricultural population, the tenant farmers almost always possess land of their own, and they hire more in order to save money for future purchases. Of course they could only make tenant farming pay by means of excessive economy and laboriousness, as the rents are high, but in these respects they are not wanting. The fertility of the soil is not more astonishing than the variety of produce we find here, though pasturage and cheese-making are chiefly depended on in some neighborhoods, and fruit crops in others. The pastures are very fine, but we seldom see cattle out to graze; probably the harvest work requires all hands, and as there are no fences between field and meadow, this may account for what appears bad management. The large heap of manure being dried up by the sun in the middle of the farmyard also looks like unthriftiness, whilst the small, dark, and ill-ventilated dairies make us wonder that the manufacture of the famous Brie cheese should be the profitable thing it is. At the farm we visited we saw thirty-six splendid Normandy cows, the entire milk produce of which was used for cheese-making. Yet nothing could appear worse than the dairy arrangements from a hygienic point of view, and the absolute cleanliness requisite for dairy work was wanting. These Brie cheeses are made in every farm, small and great, and large quantities are sent to the Meaux market on Saturdays, where the sale alone reaches the sum of five or

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

six millions of francs yearly. The process is a very simple one, and is of course perpetually going on. Our hostess at one of the larger and more prosperous of these farms showed us everything, and regaled us abundantly with the fresh milk warm from the cow. Here we saw an instance of the social metamorphosis taking place in these progressive districts. The mistress of the house, a bright, clever woman, occupied all day with what we in England should call the drudgery of the farmhouse, is yet fairly educated, and though now neatly dressed in plain cotton gown, on Sunday dresses like any other lady for the promenade. Her mother, still clinging to past customs, appeared in short stuff petticoat, wooden shoes, and yellow handkerchief wrapped round her head; whilst the children, who in due time will be trained to toil like their neighbors, are being well taught in the village school. These people are wealthy, and may be taken as types of the farming class here, though many of the so-called cultivateurs, or proprietors farming their own land, live in much easier style, the men managing the business, the ladies keeping the house, and the work of the farm being left to laborers. The rent of good land is about fifty shillings an acre, and wages in harvest time four francs (3*s.* 4*d.*) with board. The farms, while large by comparison with anything found in Brittany and Anjou, are small measured by our scale, being from fifty to two or three hundred acres.

Steam threshing has long been in use here, but of course not generally, as the smaller patches of corn only admit of the old system, and the corn is so ripe that it is often threshed on the field immediately after cutting. The harvesting process is often very slow, and we often see only one or two laborers on a single patch; one wheat-field near us occupied a man and a girl an entire week in the reaping. But there is no waiting as a rule for fine weather to dry and cart away the corn, and masters and men work with a will. We must indeed watch a harvest from beginning to end to realize the laboriousness of a farmer's life here. Upon one occasion, when visiting a farm of a hundred and thirty acres, we found the farmer and his mother both hard at work in the field, the former carting away straw, the corn being threshed by machinery in the field, the latter tying it up. Yet this man possessed a good income independent of his gains as a farmer. The look of cheerfulness animating all faces was delightful to behold. The farmer's countenance beamed with satisfaction, and one may be sure not without good cause. The farmhouse and buildings were spacious and handsome, and as is generally the case here, were surrounded by a high wall, having a large court in the centre where a goodly number of geese, turkeys, and poultry were disporting themselves. Here we found only a few cows, but they were evidently very productive from the quantity of cheeses in the dairy. Sheep are not kept here largely, and grazing bullocks still less. The farmer therefore relies chiefly on his dairy, next on his corn and fruit crops, and as bad seasons are rare, both these seldom fail him.

But these pleasant villages have generally some other interest besides their rich harvests and picturesque sites. In some of the smallest you may find exquisite little churches, such as La Chapelle sur Crécy, a veritable cathedral in miniature. Crécy was once an important place, with ninety-nine towers and double ramparts, traces of which still remain. A narrow stream runs at the back of the town, and quaint enough are the little houses perched beside it, each with its garden and tiny drawbridge drawn at night — the oddest scene — of which a sketcher might make something. A sketcher indeed must be a happy person her, so many quiet subjects offering themselves at every turn. Many of these village churches date from the thirteenth century, and are alike picturesque within and without, their spires and gabled towers imparting the leading character to the landscape. Nowhere indeed in France do you find more picturesque village churches, not a few ranking among the historic monuments of France. Here and there are châteaux with old-fashioned gardens and noble avenues, and we have only to ask permission at the porter's lodge to walk in and enjoy them at leisure. In one of these the lady of the house, who was sitting out of doors, kindly beckoned us to enter as we passed, and we had the pleasure of listening under some splendid old oaks to the oriole's song, and of seeing a little cluster of eucalyptus trees, two surprises we had not looked for. The oriole, a well-known and beautiful American bird, and a songster that may be compared to the nightingale, is indeed no stranger here, and having once heard and seen him you cannot mistake him for any other bird. His song is an invariable prognostic of rain, as we discover on further acquaintance. The Eucalyptus globulus, or blue gum tree, native of Australia and now so success-

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

fully acclimatized in Algeria, the Cape, the Riviera, and other countries, is said to flourish in the region of the olive only, but we were assured by our châtelaiue that it bears the frost of these northern zones. I confess I thought her plantation looked rather sickly, and considering that the climate is, like that of Paris, subject to short spells of severe cold in winter and great changes at all times, I doubt much in the experiment. But the health-giving, fever-destroying eucalyptus is not needed in this well-wooded, healthy country, for the splendid foliage of acacia, walnut, oak, and birch leave nothing to desire either in the matter of shade or ornament; A lover of trees, birds, and whispering breezes will say, that here at least is a corner, if not of the celestial, the earthly paradise.

Nowhere is summer to be more revelled in, more amply tasted, than in these rustic villages, where yet creature comforts abound, and nowhere is the dolce far niente mood so easily induced. Why should we be at the trouble to undertake a hot dusty railway journey in search of dolmens, thirteenth-century churches, Gaelic tombs, and feudal remains when we have the essence of deliciousness at our very doors, waving fields of ripe corn, where the reapers in twos and threes are at work (picturesque figures that seem to have walked out of Millet's canvas), lines of poplars along the curling river; beyond, hills covered with woods, here and there a clustering village or château breaking the green? This is the picture, partially screened by noble acacia-trees, that I have from my window, accompanied by the music of waving barley and wheat, dancing leaves, and chaffinches tame as canaries singing in the branches.

About a mile off is the little village of Villiers, which is even prettier than our own, and which of course artists have long ago found out. Villiers sur Morin would be an admirable summer resort for an artist fond of hanging woods, running streams, and green pastures; and a dozen more possessing the same attractions lie close at hand. But though within so easy a distance of Paris, life is homely, and fastidious travellers must keep to the beaten tracks and high roads where good hotels are to be found. When he goes into the byways, a wayside inn is all that he must expect; and if there is no diligence, a lift in the miller's or baker's cart. The farmers' wives driving to market with their cheese and butter are always willing to give the stranger a seat, but money must not be offered in return for such obligingness. We must never forget that if these country folk are laborious, and perhaps even sordid in their thriftiness, they are proud, and refuse to be paid for what costs them nothing.

But no matter how enamored of green fields and woodland walks, we must tear ourselves away for a day to see the famous "chocolate city" of M. Menier, the modern marvel par excellence of the department, and a piece of the most perfect organization it is possible to conceive. M. Menier undoubtedly has aimed at making the best chocolate that ever rejoiced the palate; he has achieved far greater things than this in giving us one of the happiest and most delightful social pictures that ever charmed the heart. Again we make the pretty little town of Lagny our starting-point, and having passed a succession of scattered farmhouses and wide cornfields, we come gradually upon a miniature town built in red and white. So coquettishly, airily, daintily placed is the city of chocolate amid orchards and gardens that, at first sight, a spectator is inclined to take it rather for a settlement of such dreamers as assembled together at Brook Farm to poetize, philosophize, and make love, than of artisans engaged in the practical business of life. This long street of charming cottages, having gardens around and on either side, is planted with trees, so that in a few years' time it will form as pleasant a promenade as the Parisian boulevards. We pass along, admiring the abundance of flowers everywhere, and finally reach a large open square, around which are a congeries of handsome buildings, all, like the dwelling-houses, new, cheerful, and having trees and benches in front. Here are co-operative stores, schools, libraries; beyond, to the left, stands the château of M. Menier, surrounded by gardens, and to the right the manufactory. The air is here fragrant, not with roses and jessamine, but with the grateful aroma of chocolate, reminding us that we are indeed in a city, if not literally a pile of cacao, yet owing its origin to the products of that wonderful tree, or rather to the ingenuity by which its resources have been turned to such account. The works are built on the river Marne, and having seen the vast hydraulic machines, we enter a lift with the intelligent foreman deputed to act as guide, and ascend to the topmost top of the many-storyed, enormous building in which the cocoa berry is metamorphozed into the delicious compound known as chocolat-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Menier. This is a curious experience, and the reverse of most other intellectual processes, since here, instead of mounting the ladder of knowledge gradually, we find ourselves placed on a pinnacle of ignorance from which we descend by degrees, finding ourselves enlightened when we at last touch terra firma. Our aerial voyage accomplished therefore in the lift, we see process No. 1, namely, the baking of the berry, this of course occupying vast numbers of hands, all consisting of men, on account of the heat and laboriousness required in the operation. Descending a story, we find the berry already in a fair way to become edible, and giving out an odor something like chocolate; here the process consists in sorting and preparing for grinding; the vast masses of cocoa, it is hardly necessary to say, coming down automatically by machinery. Lower still we find M. Menier's great adjunct in the fabrication of chocolate, namely, sugar, coming into play, and no sooner are sugar and berry put together than the compound becomes chocolate in reality. Lower still we find processes of refining and drying going on, an infinite number being required before the necessary fineness is attained. Lower still we come to a very hot place indeed, but, like all the other vast compartments of the manufactory, as well ventilated, spacious, and airy as is possible under the circumstances, the workman's inconvenience from the heat being thereby reduced to a minimum. Here it is highly amusing to watch the apparently intelligent machines which divide the chocolate into half-pound lumps, the process being accomplished with incredible swiftness. Huge masses of chocolate in this stage, awaiting the final preparation, are seen here, all destined at last to be put, half a pound at a time, into a little baking tin, to be baked like a hot cross bun, the name of Menier being stamped on at the same time. A good deal of manipulation is necessary in this process, but we must go down a stage lower to see the dexterity and swiftness with which the chief manual tasks in the fabrication of chocolate are performed. Here women are chiefly employed, and their occupation is to envelop the half-pound cake of chocolate in three papers — first silver, next yellow, and finally sealing it up in the well-known white cover familiar to all of us. These feminine fingers work so fast and with such marvellous precision that if the intricate pieces of machinery we have just witnessed seemed gifted with human intelligence and docility, on the other hand the women at work in this department appeared like animated machines — no blundering, no halting, no alteration of working pace. Their fluttering fingers indeed worked with beautiful promptitude and regularity; and as everybody in M. Menier's "city of chocolate" is well-dressed and cheerful, there was nothing painful in the monotony of their toil or unremitting application.

On the same floor are the packing departments, where we see the cases destined for all parts of the world. Thus quickly and easily we have descended the ladder of learning, and have acquired some faint notion of the way in which the hard, brown, tasteless cocoa berry is transformed into one of the most agreeable and wholesome compounds as yet invented for our delectation. Of course many intermediate processes have had to be passed by, also many interesting features in the organization of the various departments — these to be realized must be seen.

There are one or two points, however, I will mention. In the first place, when we consider the enormous duty on sugar, and the fact that chocolate, like jam, is composed half of sugar and half of berry, we are at first at a loss to understand how chocolate-making can bring in such large returns as it must do — in the first place to have made M. Menier a bis-millionaire, in the second to enable him to carry out his philanthropic schemes utterly regardless of cost. But we must remember that there is but one chocolate-Menier in the world, and that in spite of the enormous machinery at work night and day, working-day and Sunday, supply can barely keep pace with demand; also that M. Menier possesses cocoa and sugar plantations, thus getting his raw material at first hand.

A staff of night workers are at rest in the daytime, in order to keep the machinery going at work, and, to my regret, I learned that the workshops are not closed on Sundays. M. Menier's workpeople doubtless get ample holidays, but the one day's complete rest out of the seven, the portion of all with us, is denied them. By far the larger portion of the chocolate-Menier is consumed in France, where, as in England and America, it stands unrivalled. M. Menier may therefore be said to possess a monopoly, and seeing how largely he lavishes his ample wealth on others, none can grudge him such good fortune.

Having witnessed the transformation of one of the most unpromising-looking berries imaginable into the choicest of sweet-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

meats, the richest of the "cups that cheer but not inebriate," lastly, one of the best and most nourishing of the lighter kinds of food, we have to witness a transformation more magical still, namely, the hard life of toil made comparatively easy, the drudgery of mechanical labor lightened, the existence of the human machine made hopeful, healthful, reasonable, and happy. Want, squalor, disease, and drunkenness have been banished from the city of chocolate, and thrift, health, and prosperity reign in their stead. Last of all, ignorance has vanished also, a thorough education being the happy portion of every child within its precincts. Our first visit is to what is called the école gardienne, or infant school — like the rest, kept up entirely at M. Menier's expense — and herein the founder's gift of organization is seen more strikingly than anywhere. These children, little trotting things from three to five years old, have a large playground, open in summer, covered in winter, and a spacious schoolroom, in which they receive lessons in singing, ABC, and so on. Instead of being perched on high benches without backs, and their legs dangling, as is the case in convent schools for the poor, they have delightful little easy-chairs and tables accommodated to their size, each little wooden chair with backs, having seats for two, so that instead of being crowded and disturbing each other, the children sit in couples, with plenty of room and air, and in perfect physical comfort. No hollow cheeks, no bent backs, no crookedness here. Comfortable as princes these children sit in their chairs, having their feet on the floor and their backs where they ought to be, namely, on a support. Leading out of the schoolroom are two small rooms, where we saw a pleasant sight — a dozen cots, clean and cosy, on which sturdy boys and girls of a year old were taking their midday's sleep. We next went into the girls' school, which is under the charge of a certificated mistress, and where the pupils remain till thirteen or fourteen years of age, receiving exactly the same education as the boys, and without a fraction of cost to the parents. The course of study embraces all branches of elementary knowledge, with needlework, drawing, history, singing, and bookkeeping. Examinations are held, and certificates of progress awarded. We found the girls taking a lesson in needlework — the only point in which their education differs from that of the boys — and the boys at their drawing-class, all the schools being lofty, well-aired, and admirably arranged. Adjoining the schools is the library, open to all members of the community, and where many helps to adult study are afforded. On the other side of the pleasant green square, so invitingly planted with trees, stands the co-operative store, which is of course a most important feature in the organization of the community. There meat, groceries, and other articles of daily domestic consumption are sold at low prices, and of the best possible quality, the membership of course being the privilege of the thrifty and the self-denying, who belong to the association by payment. I did not ask if intoxicating drinks were sold on the premises, for such an inquiry would have been gratuitous. The cheerful, tidy, healthful looks of the population proclaimed their sobriety; and some sirop de groseille offered to me in one cottage showed that such delicious drinks are made at home as to necessitate no purchases abroad.

There is also a savings' bank which all are invited to patronize, six and a half per cent. being the incentive held out to these economizers on a small scale. But neither the school, nor the co-operative store, nor the savings' bank, can make the working man's life what it should be without the home; and it is here that alike M. Menier's philanthropy and organization have acheived the greatest results. These dwellings, each block containing two, are admirably arranged, with two rooms on the ground-floor, two above, a capital cellar, office, and last, but not least, a garden. The workman pays a hundred and twenty francs, rather less than five pounds a year, for this accommodation, which it is hardly necessary to say is the portion of very few artisans in France or elsewhere. The cité, as it is called, being close to the works, they can go home to their meals; and though the women are largely employed in the manufactory, the home need not be neglected. It was delightful to witness my cicerone's pleasure in his home. He was a workman of superior order; and though, as he informed me, of no great education, yet possessed of literary and artistic tastes. The little parlor was as comfortable a room as any reasonable person could desire. There were books on the shelves, and pictures over the mantelpiece; among these portraits of M. Thiers, Gambetta, and M. Menier, for all of whom he expressed great admiration. "Ah!" he said, "I read the newspaper, and I know a little history, but in my time education was not thought of. These children here have now the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

chance of being whatever they like." He showed me his garden, every inch of which was made use of, fruits, flowers, and vegetables growing luxuriantly in this well-selected site. The abundance of flowers was particularly striking, especially to those familiar with certain districts of France where a flower is never thought of. M. Menier himself must have as strong a passion for gardening as for philosophy, judging from the enormous gardens adjoining his handsome château; and perhaps his love of flowers — always a most humanizing taste — has set the example. These brilliant parterres, whether seen in the vast domains of the master or the humble homesteads of the men, delightfully break the red and white uniformity of the "city of chocolate," flowers above, around, and on every side. There is also a profusion of fruits and vegetables, land quite recently laid under cultivation soon yielding returns in this favored spot.

With regret we turn our backs upon an experiment as unique as it is successful in the history of social organization. Wherever we go, in whatever corner of the world we see or taste the famous chocolate-Menier, we shall henceforth be reminded of something which will lend additional sweetness and flavor. We shall recall a community of working people whose toil is lightened and elevated, whose position is made rational and happy by a sympathy and munificence rarely found allied. Many others have spent perhaps as much for the good of their working people as M. Menier. To few is granted so happy a gift of organization, and of fitting the means to the end. More lessons than one will be carried away by the least or most instructed visitor to the delighful little "city of chocolate" on the banks of the Marne.

The pretty little town of Lagny should detain the traveller for an hour or two, which he cannot do better than spend on the river. There are boats to be had, and I daresay an enterprising explorer could find his way back to Esbly or Meaux without having recourse to the railway.

Church-going in this rich cheese-making country is at all times a dreary affair, as I have said, but especially just now, when partly from harvest-work going on all Sunday, and partly from lack of devotion, both Catholic and Protestant places of worship are all but empty. For there is a strong Protestant element here, dating from the Huguenot times, and in the neighboring village of Quincey are found a Protestant church and school. One Sunday morning I set off with two friends to attend service, announced to take place at eleven o'clock, but on arriving at Quincey we found the "temple" locked, and not a sign of any coming ceremonial. Being very hungry after our long walk through cornfields and vineyards, we went to a little baker's shop in search of a roll, and there realized the hospitable spirit of these good Briards. The mistress of the shop very kindly invited me into a little back room, and regaled me with excellent household bread, Brie cheese, and the wine of the country, refusing to be paid for her refreshments. This little meal finished I joined my friends at the church, which was now open, and in company with half-a-dozen school-children we quietly waited to see what would eventually take place. By-and-by one or two peasant-folk dropped in; then the schoolmaster appeared, and we were informed that it being the first Sunday in the month the pastor had to do duty in an adjoining parish according to custom, and that the schoolmaster would read the prayers and lessons instead. A psalm was sung, portions of Scripture and short prayers followed, another straggler or two joining the little congregation as the service went on. The schoolmaster, who read, played the harmonium, and sang exceedingly well, finally read a brief exposition on the portion of Scripture read, whereupon, after further singing, we broke up. These country pastors, like the priests, receive very small pay from the State.

In the afternoon we went to the parish church of Couilly whilst vespers were going on. If the little Protestant assemblage I had just witnessed was touching, this was painful, and might have afforded an artist an admirable subject for a picture. Sitting on a high stool, with his back to the congregation, consisting of three old women, was the priest, on either side the vergers, one in white stole, the other in purple with a scarlet cap, all three chanting in loud monotonous tones, and of course in Latin, now and then the harmonium giving a faint accompaniment. On either side of these automatic figures were rows of little boys in scarlet and white, who from time to time made their voices heard also. As a background to this scene was the pretty little Gothic interior, the whiteness of aisle and transept being relieved by the saffron-colored ribs of the arches and columns; the church of Couilly being curious without and beautiful within, like many other parish churches

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

here. After a time one of the vergers blew out the three wax lights on a side alter, and all three retired, each scurrying away in different directions with very little show of reverence. How different to the crowded churches in Brittany, where, whether at mass or vespers, hardly standing-room is to be found! How long Catholicism will hold its sway over the popular mind there depends of course greatly on the priests themselves, who, if ignorant and coarse-mannered, at least set their flocks a better example in the matter of morals than here. The less said about this subject the better. French priests are, whichever way we regard them, objects of commiseration, but there can be no doubt that the indifference shown to religion in the flourishing department of Seine et Marne has been brought about by the priests themselves and their open disregard of decorum. Their domestic lives are an open book which all who run may read!

Some of them, however, occupy their time very harmlessly and profitably in gardening and bee-keeping, their choicest fruits and vegetables, like those of their neighbors, going to England. We went one day, carrying big baskets with us, to visit a neighboring curé famous for his greengages, and whose little presbytère looked very inviting with its vine-covered walls and luxuriant flower-garden. The curé, who told us he had been gardening that morning from four till six o'clock, received us very courteously, yet in a business-like way, and immediately took us to his fruit and vegetable garden some way off. Here we found the greatest possible profusion and evidence of skilful gardening. The fruit trees were laden; there were Alpine strawberries with their bright red fruit, currants, melons, apricots, etc., and an equal variety of vegetables. Not an inch of ground was wasted, nor were flowers wanting for adornment and the bees. Splendid double sunflowers, veritable little suns of gold; garden mallows, gladioles, and others. A score and more of hives completed the picture, which its owner contemplated with natural pride.

"You have only just given your orders in time, ladies," he said; "all my greengages are to be gathered forthwith for the English market. Ah! those English, those English, they take everything! our best fruit — and the island of Cypress!"

Whereupon I ventured to rejoin that at least if we robbed our French neighbors of their best fruit, our money found its way into the grower's pocket. Of course these large purchases in country places make home produce dearer for the inhabitants, but as the English agents pay a higher price than others, the peasants and farmers hail their appearance with delight. The fruit has to ripen on its way, and to enjoy a "Reine Claude" or melon to the full, we must taste it here. This curé makes a good deal by his bees, and the honey of these parts is firstrate. On the whole, small as is their pay, these parish priests cannot be badly off, seeing that they get extra money by their garden produce and largely also by baptismal and other church fees. Then, of course, it must be remembered that nothing is expected of them in the way of charity, as with our clergy. "Nous recevons toujours, nous ne donnons jamais," was the reply of a French bishop on being asked an alms by some benevolent lady for a protégé.

Scattered throughout these fertile and prosperous regions are ancient towns, some of which are reached by separate little lines of railway, others are accessible by road only. Coulommiers is one of these, and though there is nothing attractive about it except a most picturesque old church and a very pretty walk by the winding Grand-Morin, it is worth making the two hours' drive across country for the sake of the scenery. As there is no direct communication with Couilly and no possibility of hiring a carriage at this busy season, I gladly accepted a neighbor's offer of a seat in his "trap," a light spring-cart with a capital horse. The third spare seat was occupied by a neighboring notary, the two men discussing metaphysics, literature, and the origin of things on their way. We started at seven o'clock in the morning, and lovely indeed looked the wide landscape in the tender light, valley and winding river and wooded ridge being soon exchanged for wide open spaces covered with corn and autumn crops. Farming here is carried on extensively, some of these rich farms numbering several hundred acres. The farmhouses and buildings surrounded with a high stone wall are few and far between, and the separate crops cover much larger tracts than here. It was market-day at Coulommiers, and on our way we passed many farmers and farmeresses jogging to market, the latter with their fruit and vegetables, eggs and butter, in comfortable covered carts. Going to market in France means indeed what it did with us a hundred years ago; yet the farmers and farmers' wives looked the picture of prosperity. In some cases fashion had so far got the better of tradi-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tion that the reins were handled by a smart-looking young lady in hat and feathers and fashionable dress, but for the most part by toil-embrowned, homely women, with a colored handkerchief twisted round their head, and no pretension to gentility. The farmers wear blue blouses, and were evidently accustomed to hard work, but for all that it was easy to see that they were possessed both of means and intelligence. Like the rest of the Briard population they are fine fellows, tall, with regular features and frank, good-humored countenances. Some of these farmers are in receipt of what is considered a fair income for an English vicar or rector, wholly irrespective of their farming gains, but they work all the same. I went inside the fine old church, and, though the doors were open, found it empty except for a little market girl who, having deposited her basket, was bent not on prayer but on counting her money. In Brittany on market days there is never a lack of pious worshippers. The interior of this picturesque church is very quaintly colored, and as a whole is well worth seeing. Like many other towns in these parts Coulommiers dates from an ancient period, and long belonged to the English crown. Alternately ravaged during the Hundred Years' War and the religious wars and troubles of the League, nothing to speak of remains of its old walls and towers of defence. Market day is a sight there, and the show of melons alone made a subject for a painter. The weather-beaten market-women, with their gay colored handkerchiefs round their heads, their blue gowns, the delicious color and lovely forms of the fruit — all this must be seen. Here and there were large pumpkins, cut open to show the ripe red pulp, with abundance of purple plums, apples, and pears just ripening, and bright yellow apricots on every side. It was clear "les Anglais" had not carried off all the fruit! At Coulommiers or elsewhere you may search in vain for rags, dirt, or a sign of beggary. Every one is homely, prosperous, and wears a cheerful countenance.

[NOTE. — It will be seen that I have given the reader no information about hotels, and this requires a word of explanation. Whether travelling in Seine et Marne or elsewhere, I make it a rule never to patronize a hotel if I can possibly help it; my theory is that the mere tourist sees nothing — at least to write about, and that the only way to make travel, especially French travel, profitable is to live among the people and see things from their point of view. Thus I get handed on from one French friend to another, and make as many possible excursions from the same starting point, instead of flying from point to point by railway. I have no doubt that all the pleasant towns and villages I mention have little inns where people not too particular are made comfortable, whilst those able to spend money on a handsome scale would doubtless find furnished houses at almost the same rate as in the fashionable watering-places. This picturesque region is moreover not to be scampered through, but to be seen quietly and leisurely, and commends itself to the lovers of natural beauty and rustic life only. Artist and angler alike must be well satisfied unless hard to please.] M. B.-E.

From The Spectator.

APOLOGIES.

WE have sometimes wished that in small social matters it were possible that private persons should be made aware of the impression they produce on their neighbors to the same extent that public men are, and have imagined to ourselves some such officer, on a small scale, as the speaker of the House of Commons, empowered to watch over social demeanor, and impose on the offender against the laws of good-breeding the expiation of an adequate apology. A good deal that ruffles and chills the surface of intercourse would, if it were acknowledged and regretted, be at an end. Sometimes it would even be changed into an influence for good. Many a little slip of manners, many a momentary lapse of considerateness and self-control, would not only be wiped out by an apology, — it would be often replaced by a pleasing recollection of the frank and hearty expression of regret which always draws people nearer; and such an expression would often be readily forthcoming, if only there were any perception of its necessity, or any easy way of making it. Of course there are offences in which an apology makes very little difference. If a man has abused confidence, or made mischief, then though the apology ought to be made, we cannot promise him that it will reinstate him in the good graces of his friends. The harm here is in the thing done, — the doer's feelings about it are secondary. But in a thousand tiny social offences the proportion is the other way. To speak of one which may seem too small to mention, and yet which is one of the commonest sources of minute social annoyance, — how many a tiny gnat-sting would have all its irritation allayed, if our friend could realize that being kept waiting

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

is disagreeable, and that he, having caused us this unpleasant little experience, ought to express and to feel regret for it. If this were acted upon, not only would these small offences be often readily forgotten, but also they would be much seldomer repeated. There is a greater influence than we are apt to imagine in any symbol of intention, and an apology, if it were really adequate, would always impress on the mind of its author that he must not make it over again.

This last circumstance, however, is indispensable. If in reward for the originality of our suggestion we were appointed to fill the post we have adumbrated, it should stand as one of the first decisions on our "perpetual edict" that no apology should be made twice. The charming friend who murmurs a gracious excuse, as she takes her seat (for this sort of offence is exclusively womanly, we believe) in a carriage full of sulky people whose tempers have been evaporating for the last ten minutes, should be condemned to keep her regrets to herself. The consolation of supposing herself a pleasing member of society because she has represented herself as overwhelmed with sorrow for making us miss the appointment or the train, or even put us into a flutter at the chance, should henceforth be denied her. Still more severely should we deal with those curious apologies which take the form of a simple statement of this offence, and which are indeed its usual accompaniment. "I am afraid we are rather late?" "You are afraid, indeed! You know you have kept us looking at the clock, and considering whether we might order dinner to be served, for the best part of an hour. You know it perfectly, you knew it would be so when you ordered your carriage, when you kept it waiting, when you stepped into it, and finally, when you stopped at your host's door. Rebuke and exhortation would be wasted on you; your other merits, whatever they may be, may still possibly ensure the hospitality you so liberally abuse; but one thing you shall not do, you shall not go on putting your selfishness into a very inadequate statement, and fancying that an apology. The fear which does not influence the most msignificant of your actions shall be debarred from all influence on your words, forevermore."

Our most absolute prohibition, indeed, should be made against the form of apology which is much the commonest. There should, under our rule, be a sudden and permanent cessation of all apologies for neglect of social attention. Nobody should be allowed to give the statement that he or she "has been wanting to come and see you" the aspect of apology. The frequency of this form of attention is a curious instance of the prevalence of egotism, even when people most wish to consider their neighbors. How often does its object with difficulty suppress in answer Mr. Toots's well-known comment, "It's of no consequence, thank you." Very often the apology is the first intimation of the neglect. Why are you to force your friend to find some civil paraphrase for "I was not aware that you had not been to see me"? What answer can be given to these apologies combining truth and politeness, indeed, we are entirely ignorant. There is a ditch on each side the way. You may easily contract too much of Mr. Toots's style, and be too eager to make your friend quite easy as to any intermission of his visits, and this is the side on which we would counsel our readers to be most assiduously on their guard. But if, in your desire to escape this danger, you profess any keen sense of the pleasure of your friend's society, you are enhancing the sin for which he is professing penitence. We really are unable to recommend a suitable formula for a well-bred person on receiving this kind of apology. All the answers which naturally suggest themselves are a rebuke to self-importance or a reproach. Surely it is the most elementary rule of politeness that one should make no apology which it is difficult to answer.

Of course it does happen occasionally that one person feels disappointed at want of attention from another. But it happens so much more often that we overrate the importance of our attentions, that on this account alone we would recommend each of our friends to take it for granted that his absence has been unnoticed in the crowd. It is curiously difficult to take this for granted. It is more difficult, we believe, for any one really and practically to bring home to his imagination that he is an object of entire indifference, than that he is disliked. This last, indeed, is not a matter of great difficulty. We are all, at times, distasteful to ourselves. We can readily imagine, even before we are forced to believe, that the sentiment may be shared by others. But that we should actually not be taken cognizance of, one way or another, that it should be all one whether we are there or not there, this is a state of mind nobody has any help in imagining from the most diligent self-examination. He must, to understand it,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

make that most difficult effort of suppressing all sense of self, and putting himself in the place of another. Nobody can really believe that he is the average man. He may think himself exceptionally faulty, perhaps — we are speaking of a state of mind quite possible to the humblest of men — still he cannot realize that the chief thing about him to other people is that he is just a specimen of humanity. It is strange, for this is what we must all be, to the bulk of our acquaintance. However, the difficulty of conceiving this of oneself is almost insuperable. Each of us knows so much in himself that is unlike other people, that he cannot conceive how these things are not present to the mind of any one who reflects upon him for a moment. He forgets that the most commonplace person of his acquaintance might say the same. It is our own belief that a commonplace person is a merely relative term, like a first cousin once removed. At a certain distance people are commonplace, and the distance varies. A considerable force of character impresses itself on the attention a long way off. But those people must seem commonplace outside the range of intimacy, and the capacity for intimacy is limited.

These considerations, indisputable as they are, being so difficult to realize, we would bring forward another, not more obvious, for that is impossible, but more easy of practical application. Supposing you are one of the small number of people who can say, "I am sorry I have not been able to come and see you," without rousing to the lips of your friend the suppressed reply, "I really have not missed you," — still, it must be remembered that neglect is not one of the offences that an apology wipes out. We are not, of course, taking into account the cases where there is any explanation to be offered. We do not call the information that our friend has been laid up with a sprained ancle an apology. We are speaking of bonâ fide apologies, — real confessions of failure, as far as they go, in what is assumed to be the duties of friendship; and while we allow that a great many failures are more than compensated for by being confessed, we urge that neglect is commonly enhanced thereby. "I am sorry you are so little brilliant or interesting, that I can always find something better to do than to come and see you," is a statement you cannot make pleasing by the cleverest paraphrase. Yet people are always thinking this may be done by simply suppressing the most obvious part of their case. They hope their friend will jump at once from the fact to their sorrow for it, and will feel gratified by the association. But he can only make the transit by the ordinary stepping-stones; the least logical of human beings must feel, with Polonius, —

> But this effect, defective, comes by cause, and so finds himself contemplating his own stupidity or vulgarity, or even his simple insignificance. A pleasing object you have pointed out to him, in your anxiety to be civil!

We are unable to suggest a good recipe for rendering neglect palatable. "Least said, soonest mended," is the only scrap of wisdom we have to offer on the subject. We have, indeed, heard of an apology made to a lady for omitted attentions on the score that the apologizer had been unaware of her good position in society, which apology so delighted her that she rather encouraged the acquaintance in consequence. But her gratification was of a kind which probably the most benevolent of us are not eager to afford our friends, and we cannot recall another instance of this kind of excuse proving satisfactory. We do not even counsel much explanation of a more adequate and dignified character if it is to apply to the future as well as the past. As people get busier, or feebler, or more sought after, they are obliged, more or less, to "weed" their acquaintance, as the saying is, and they may often feel, in doing this, that, from a different point of view, the possible friend would be anything but a weed. We are informed that it is a gross sign of bad gardening to allow a daisy to show its modest face on a lawn, but the owner of a trim villa may admire Wordsworth's verses on the flower all the same; and something like this may be the feeling of many persons, when they decide that some old acquaintance must be no more encouraged, or some new one repelled. We have never seen any attempt at explanation in the case, however, that did not strike us as a mistake. The most careful enumeration of one's many claims only drives home to the mind of the unsuccessful claimant the consciousness that he is not sufficiently important to be admitted to the lists. That is the last thing in the mind of the speaker, but by the law of mental parallax, which it is so difficult to allow for, it must be the first in the mind of the hearer. We have known persons whose minutes were valuable spend many of them, where two civil lines were all that was needed, in making an answer to a note ungracious, stilted,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and tiresome. No doubt their view was that all this explanation softened the refusal of the invitation to dinner, or whatever it was, but the truth is that simplicity in these matters is as much more gracious as happily — though the fact is by no means universally acted upon — it is also more convenient.

Another form of apology with which we would wage war is any in which the apologizer assures his friend he had no intention of giving offence. Has he ever such an intention? The excuse had some meaning in former days; it was allowable to tell a man the speaker had no intention of offending him when the offence was the first step towards shooting him, and as a synonym for not wishing that result, we should permit it still. But it wants pistols and seconds in the background to give it any meaning whatever. Men only mean to offend each other when they would, in former days, have been ready to kill each other. They are offensive from inconsiderateness, from selfishness, from stupidity, from want of imagination, not once in a thousand times from intending to be so. What people often mean, however, by saying that they meant no offence was that they meant well. It is a very different thing to mean not to be offensive, and not to mean to be offensive, and we would by no means suppress the statement of the first, but we would never allow any one to think that the mere absence of an intention to give pain or annoyance ought to be mentioned as bearing on the fact that the thing has been done. The question is whether this uneasy feeling is reasonable; that there was no intention to produce it proves nothing, one way or another, and may almost always be taken for granted.

We have preached a curious sermon on the duty of making apologies, we may be told, consisting almost entirely of an attack, made with all the force at our disposal, on the apologetic habit of mind, or perhaps we should rather say, the apologetic habit of words. But this is eminently a case for homœopathic treatment. We oppose the habit of making apologies, because we want an apology to have some meaning. It should be like a wedding present, something the giver does not look to repeat in a lifetime. When it has become a habit, it must always sink into that most unsatisfactory substitute for the real article, a mere statement of the offence, — a repetition in words of the thing that has annoyed us in fact. We have seen it urged upon indiscreetly charitable persons (and it has struck us as one of the most practicable of reforms), that they should never allow themselves to give trifling sums. No doubt they had better give a trifling sum than a large one to an undeserving petitioner, but they are so much more likely to think twice if the gift is a sovereign than if it is a halfpenny, that even the danger of enriching an impostor is a less evil than the stimulus to caution is a gain. This is the reform we would make in apologies. We want to get rid of all these halfpennyworths that are bestowed so readily, and let the giver dispose of what costs him something. We want to stop this dribbling-away of meaningless excuse where there is nothing to excuse, and store up the wasted material for some of those occasions, not wholly wanting to the life of the gentlest and most courteous, when the grace of intercourse has been hurt by temper, or indiscretion, or indolence, and a word in season would right it, and perhaps make it better than before.

From The Spectator.

FOR AND AGAINST NORWAY.

We English are not beloved in Norway. The grievances of the people against us are that we have spoiled their pleasant, simple, happy country, destroyed their game, corrupted their ideals, sophisticated their manners, raised their prices; finally, that we think a great deal too much of ourselves, and treat the natives of that grand Northland, whose heroic pirates and robbers gave our forbears, a thousand years before steam-launches and salmon-fishing, such severe drubbings, with the insular insolence which also arouses comments in other parts of the globe. The Norsk people — that is to say, all those who have not rivers to let, or furs to sell, or "stations" to keep, and who do not live by hiring out carrioles and ponies to the incomprehensible people who are always waiting to see the midnight sun, and to behold reindeer in the act of scraping their food from under the snow — wish we would keep away, and let Gamle Norge be really Old Norway, instead of another big piece of playground for the autumn excursionist from that island out of which the raven formerly got such solid and unctuous pickings. They like us better in Sweden, but Sweden means Stockholm, and the lovely little red and green city of boats and bridges is a good deal Frenchified, its staunch Protestantism notwithstanding, in all the respects that strangers are likely to

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

gain any knowledge of. The traveller in Norway needs not, and as a matter of fact does not, trouble himself about the disfavor with which he is regarded in the abstract; it does not come in his way, which lies among the classes who are liable to the obscuration of the ideal by that powerful persuader, gain; and among the "fors" of Scandinavian travel, general civility must be placed.

Supposing one does not want to kill things, that the rivers rather than the fish are "running in one's mind," that the scarcity of bears and the falling-off of reindeer for purposes of slaughter are not fatal to enjoyment, and that the spectacle of inconceivable numbers of beautiful, feathered creatures, with never a "hot corner" in the neighborhood, be congenial to one's taste, there is immense pleasure in travelling along roads "magnificently engineered" — so Captain Clark Kennedy pronounces them to be — in a vehicle both novel and comfortable, through scenes of marvellous and various beauty. Whether it be for or against Norway, and indeed Scandinavia generally, that the natives are never in a hurry, are stolidly unsympathetic with the foreigner who is, and treat time with as much disregard as if it were eternity, each individual must decide for himself; to our mind, the holiday feeling would gain by this charming indifference.

Just as in former times, when, for instance, Colonel Newcome came home on leave, every reader of Eastern travel knew Shepherd's Hotel as well as the lord warden, so travellers in Northland and readers of its lore are acquainted with Mr. Bennett. He is the real, live Wizard of the North, the earthly providence of the tourist, instructing him, through his faultless little "Handbook," before he starts, receiving him on his arrival at Christiania, when he naturally rushes to "Bennett's," extending his protecting care over him until he is safely "through," as the Scotch say, and has seen the midnight sun, the walrus at home, the little Lapps, even more at home than the walrus; and finally speeding the parting guest when he has delivered up his carriole, after his photograph has been taken in the proud attitude of occupation of that queer carriage. When you stop at Bergen, or Throndhjem, you will be pretty sure to buy specimens of the carved wood, and the silver ornaments, and the skins of furry animals, for which Old Norway is famous. Do not add them to your luggage, but pack them off per coasting steamer to Mr. Bennett; he will take charge of them until you arrive, when he will give you the latest information about everywhere, and the soundest advice about everything, if you do not happen to require anything more. If you do, go to his store, a sight in itself, and get the carriole and harness, the books, the maps, the preserved meats, the small coin for change, and the "straight tip" all round, even as to the best way of rectifying the defects of the "station" beds, which are too short for everybody, and have wedge-shaped pillows. Familiar as the sound of "backsheesh" in the land of the Nile is that of "Bennett" in the land of the fjord and the fjeld. Fairly off in the carriole, with a sure-footed pony — which let no man maltreat, for the Norwegian farmers do not like it, and the station-master will find means to punish, by delay and incivility, the tourist who overdrives the docile and willing little steeds — all the stages of the journey, in whatever direction, are full of charm; the exhilarating freshness of pure air, the keen scent of pines, the peace of the smiling country, the grandeur of distant mountains, the music of streams and waterfalls, and until the extreme north be reached, where only the Scotch fir grows, the poplar, the willow, the mountain ash-trees flourishing in great luxuriance. The northern route is full of grandeur, and Captain Clark Kennedy tells of one stage, on the road to Dovre, which combines every feature of Alpine scenery, "snow-capped hills towering above the road, vast forests of birch and pine, and masses of granite rocks, interspersed with juniper, on every side; and the river, pent up between narrow, precipitous banks of solid stone, dashing at breakneck speed far below." Next to the beauty of nature in these regions, one is led to admire the laziness of the natives. They are past-masters in idleness, they have elevated dawdling to an art. It is quite curious, — only when your pony casts a shoe, and four persons consume a whole hour in replacing it, you begin rather to count up your years. On the Dovrefjeld, which reminds us of Miss Martineau and Frederika Bremer, wolves are scarce, though they still haunt farmyards in the winter, but there is found the lemming, in Norway as large as a water-rat, in Lapland and northern Russia no bigger than a mouse. The migration of the grey squirrels, sung with such spirit and pathos by William Howitt — who has ever made us know the wonderful Arctic world like him? — is not so strange and interesting as that of these puzzling little creatures, who travel in countless hordes, like locusts, and are little

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

less destructive, and which were formerly believed by the Laplanders to be "rained down" from heaven. Captain Clark Kennedy imputes this notion to the fact that the birds of prey which follow closely on the tracks of the lemmings sometimes drop their prizes alive from their talons, while flying at some height from the ground. They are yellow and white in color, with brown markings, and not at all ugly, and though few travellers are fortunate enough to witness a migration of them, they are frequently observed in the pinewoods, and occasionally seen to sit up and "wash their hands" like rabbits. Their appearance in great force takes place every three or four years, and they move invariably in a westerly direction, finding their only insurmountable obstacle in the North Sea. The same writer (who has interpreted so many of our English birds to us) says, in reference to this migration: "It is wonderful to think that such countless millions of tiny animals are all stirred by the same impulse to proceed in a given direction, and in a straight, unbroken line, no obstacle daunting this army of rodents in their migrations towards the ocean. They climb the steepest mountains, unless they can easily pass round them by traversing their lower ridges; they swim the broadest lakes, the widest arms of the sea, and all rivers that may lie in their line of march, utterly devastating the land over which they pass, and traversing in a short time immense tracts of country." In former ages, a solemn form of exorcism was used in Norway against these swarming creatures, which were bidden, in the name of the Blessed Trinity, to go away to those places in which they could harm no person, and there to waste away and decrease daily, until no remains of them should be found in any place. After the desolate but majestic fjeld, where clusters of heartsease and beautiful wild flowers grow amid the patches of snow and reindeer moss, where for a long day's journey Sneehatten, with its black-walled, snow-filled crater, is in view, where the snowy owl, and the eagle-owl, and the great eagles are seen, where the cold is bitter, come lovely open country, the beautiful Gunl, its fair valley, and such heat that exposure to the sun is dangerous. The sudden changes of climate are among the "againsts" of Norway, and so, very strongly, are the mosquitos. At Gunldal, where many bloody battles were fought in the wars between Norway and Sweden, there are hop-gardens and beds of lilies of the valley, strawberries and apricots.

At Throndhjem, famous in the old, savage times, the royal city of later days, the carriole is exchanged for the steamer, when one is en route for the Arctic circle, and the sea has its example of life in innumerable masses like the land. Near Besaker, the steamer cuts her way for hours through vast shoals of floating jelly-fish, moving with the tide, and shining with countless hues. The voyage among the islets along the coast is full of interest: the steamer passes quite close to their rugged sides, covered with masses of bird life, some of them quite white with seagulls, others colonized by terns, which decline to mix with the gulls; and the salt air full of their whirr and clangor, ceaseless by night and day. Anon one comes to the islands of Apelvaer, and to such heaps of codfish as can only be got hold of by the mind by the aid of the figures, that tell us how one year's fishery alone produces sixteen millions of fish, twenty-one thousand five hundred barrels of cod-liver oil, and six thousand barrels of cods' roe!

Near the Arctic line the scenery becomes most grand and beautiful, with its wonderful diversity of cliff and mountain and island, its deep, calm sea, with all the bird-laden islets, the life-thronged solitude in the steady, sustained smile of the sun, whose royal pomp is never bated there. The snow-crowned mountains, the steel-blue glaciers, the four peaks of the sentinel islands of Threnen, warders of the gates of the polar seas; Hestamandö, where the giant cavalry soldier, in everlasting rock, breasts the waves, and the Norse fishers doff their caps to "the horseman," — these are fine to see, and it is not surprising that when, at twelve o'clock at night, the blood-red ball of the sun hung over the gold and purple sea, and a thousand tinted rays danced in constant motion on the snow, there was deep silence on board the steamer whose voyage we are following, and the awe of a sublime spectacle in a measureless solitude fell upon all hearts.

Between the Loffoden Isles and Tromsö "there is an arm of the And Fjord to be crossed, and the water is literally covered and alive with birds, and with great shoals of mackerel and tumbling porpoises; sea-eagles sway and swoop above the ship, and the air is darkened with the strong flight of the northern diver, the guillemot, and the cormorant; while the masses on the rocks are hardly to be distinguished from the great heaps of seaweed." Thus, with so much to impress the imagination, and surely with all the pleasure that utter strangeness can bestow, change so complete that it must rest the weariest brain,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and stir to activity the least-used fancy, one may steam up the fjord to the town of Tromsö and find oneself in real Arctic life, with the everlasting, glittering white snow on every aide; and within a day's journey, the wild, wandering Laplanders, and their herds of those wonderful animals which render human existence possible in the wastes of the northern world.

From Nature.

DECORATIVE COLORING IN FRESHWATER FLEAS.

THERE is something essentially comic in the notion of a freshwater flea — a species of the entomostracous crustaceous Daphnoidæ — becoming beautifully ornamented with patches of scarlet and blue, for the purpose of seducing the affections of the opposite sex. If a scarlet coat is appreciated by the females of the very fleas of this great family to which we all belong, we ought not to be surprised at hereditary predispositions in favor of this color, and should conclude on this ground, as on many others, that the civilian male Anthropini of western Europe have taken a foolish and unnatural step, within the last hundred years, in abandoning the use of brilliantly colored clothing, and giving over the exceptional advantages which it confers to soldiers and huntsmen. The figures given by Prof. August Weismann, in the Zeitschr. wiss. Zoologie (1878, Supplement 1), show us the water-fleas, Polyphemus and Latona, most gorgeously got up in blue and scarlet. Goethe, though he never saw them, foretold their appearance: —

Es war enimal ein König, der hatt' einen grossen Floh, Den liebt' er gar nicht wenig, als wie seinen eignen Sohn,
. . . . . .
In Sammet und in Seide, war er nun angethan, Hatte Bänder auf den Kleide, hatt' auch ein Kreuz daran, etc., etc.

It is to the elaborate and ingenious studies of Prof. Weismann on caterpillars — worthy to be placed by the side of the most original of Mr. Darwin's own investigations — that we owe our knowledge of an exceedingly important cause of animal coloration, namely, that which is explained by the term "startling" or "terrifying" coloration (Schreckfarben). Just as in various human races the amorous of both sexes paint their face and adorn their bodies in order to attract one another, so nature paints by sexual selection, and just as we dress ourselves up in wigs and gowns and spectacles, or tattoo our countenances in order to terrify evil-doers so (Prof. Weismann shows) does nature paint masks with staring eyes upon the feeble caterpillar's back in order that he may enjoy the privileges so usually gained by the ass in the lion's skin. Brilliant patches of color occur only in a few Daphnoidæ (also in a few Phyllopoda), and after a very detailed investigation as to the variations which these patches of color present in the different species, in the two sexes, and at different seasons and at different periods of growth, Prof. Weismann comes to the conclusion that they must be regarded as a decoration acquired by sexual selection which probably was first of all confined to the male sex, but subsequently, in most cases, became transmitted also to the other sex. Probably a reciprocal and alternating sexual selection favored this transference to the female sex, the most brilliant females being chosen by the few males existing at the commencement of a sexual period, and the most brilliant males being chosen by the relatively few females existing at the end of such a period. The existence of these "sexual periods" is a well established feature in the life-history of entomostraca, alternating with parthenogenetic periods. From the fact that neighboring colonies of the same species have a constantly differing arrangement of color, it appears probable that the development of these decorative color-patches took place after the isolation of the colonies, that is to say, subsequently to the glacial period in northern Europe. The transference of the decorative coloration originally developed only by the males, took place in three directions — firstly to the other sex; secondly to the not-yet sexually mature period of growth; and thirdly to the parthenogenetically produced generations. In the various species of Daphnoidæ with decorative coloration we find different degrees of completeness of the transference in these three different directions. Only one species, viz., Latona, presents the highest degree or complete transference of the coloration to both sexes, all stages of growth and all generations of the annual cycle. Prof. Weismann concludes that the Daphnoidæ afford a further case in favor of the hypothesis that secondary sexual characters can be converted into general characteristics of the species, and that they confirm Mr. Darwin's theory of the origin of the color-patterns of butterflies' wings.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXIV. } No. 1793. — October 26, 1878. { From Beginning, Vol. CXXXIX.

CONTENTS.

I.	MARTIN JOSEPH ROUTH,	Quarterly Review,	195
II.	MACLEOD OF DARE. By William Black. Part XVII.,	Advance Sheets,	216
III.	AMONG THE BURMESE. Part III.,	Fraser's Magazine,	232
IV.	SIR GIBBIE. By George MacDonald, author of "Malcolm," "The Marquis of Lossie," etc. Part II.,	Advance Sheets,	240
V.	A NEW AUTHOR'S GRIEVANCE,	Spectator,	250
VI.	THE SORROWS OF THE SLOW,	Spectator,	252
VII.	CALCULATING BOYS,	Spectator,	255

POETRY.

MY FRIEND: A PORTRAIT, . . . 194
RAIN, ... 194
TO THE FINEST OF FRUITS, . . . 194

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY
LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

MY FRIEND: A PORTRAIT.

NOT of the happy souls who sing
Is he my heart loves best;
His speech is not a magic thing,
His thoughts but poorly drest.

His path lies not among the great,
Their praise he doth not speak;
He dwells 'mid those of mean estate,
The lowly and the meek.

He is not beauteous as a god,
As nature's kings should be;
No eye would note him in a crowd,
Nor heart leap up to see.

No guerdons of the world are his,
Nor honors, wealth, nor praise;
Small is his share of outward bliss,
Laborious are his days.

But ah! could others read aright
That mind so pure and fair,
How would they envy his delight,
His joy beyond compare!

Whilst we aspire to heavenly things,
In vision faint and dim,
His spirit mounts on golden wings,
And all is clear to him.

Whilst we lament man's evil days,
By pain and wrong opprest,
His lips are ever proud to praise,
Bright hopes burn in his breast.

His joys come hardly once a year,
Whilst sorrows crowd apace —
To him each day is glad and fair,
The world a blessed place.

So small, so great, his pleasures are,
Alternate sage and child,
He looks with rapture on a star,
A tiny floweret wild.

What marvels poets see and hear,
All learn when he is by:
Music affects the heedless ear;
Beauty the careless eye.

He chooseth not, but teaches all,
And gladdens without heed;
His mind like dews of heaven fall,
On those who stand in need.

Ill fortune halteth at his door,
And sorrows pass not by:
They leave him tranquil as before,
With spirit calm and high.

His treasure none can take by stealth,
His portion none destroy,
Since things unseen are all his wealth,
And nature all his joy!

Nor is he niggard of his hoard,
He largely gives his own:
A beauteous thought, a kindling word,
A glimpse of worlds unknown.

For none so full of love as he,
His wisdom hath no end;
The proudest on his bended knee
Might pray for such a friend.

Good Words. M. B.

RAIN.

MORE than the wind, more than the snow,
More than the sunshine, I love rain;
Whether it droppeth soft and low,
Whether it rusheth amain.

Dark as the night, it spreadeth its wings,
Slow and silently up on the hills;
Then sweeps o'er the vale, like a steed that springs
From the grasp of a thousand wills.

Swift sweeps under heaven the raven cloud's flight;
And the land, and the lakes, and the main,
Lie belted beneath with steel-bright light,
The light of the swift-rushing rain.

On evenings of summer, when sunlight is low,
Soft the rain falls from opal-hued skies;
And the flowers the most delicate summer can show,
Are not stirred by its gentle surprise.

It falls on the pools, and no wrinkling it makes,
But touching, melts in, like the smile
That sinks in the face of a dreamer, but breaks
Not the calm of his dream's happy wile.

The grass rises up as it falls on the meads;
The bird softlier sings in his bower;
And the circles of gnats circle on like winged seeds,
Through the soft sunny lines of the shower.

EBENEZER JONES.

TO THE FINEST OF FRUITS.

(Sung in August by a Sub-Editor.)

LET others praise the mellow peach,
The luscious grape, the golden pine;
But oh, within my modest reach,
I know a fruit that's more divine.
'Mid fragrant groves of orange flower
Let bridegroom roam! But weave my crown
Of gooseberries that, sweet or sour,
Bloom when the world is out of town!

When silence holds the Lady's Mile,
And daily sheets, grown empty too,
Hail, with a glad and greeting smile
The little earthquake from Peru —
The avalanche — the hot pursuit
Of luggage lost — all things that bore!
Say, what can match the cheery fruit
That blooms till town is full once more!

Punch.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Quarterly Review.

MARTIN JOSEPH ROUTH.*

THREE-AND-TWENTY years have run their course since the grave closed over a venerable member of the University of Oxford, who, more than any other person within academic memory, formed a connecting link between the present and the past. In a place of such perpetual flux as Oxford, the stationary figures attract unusual attention. When a man has been seen to go in and out of the same college portal for thirty or forty years, he gets reckoned as much a part of the place as the dome of the Radcliffe or the spire of St. Mary's. But here was one who had presided over a famous college long enough to admit one hundred and eighty-three fellows, two hundred and thirty-four demies, and one hundred and sixty-two choristers. The interval which his single memory bridged over seemed fabulous. He was personally familiar with names which to every one else seemed to belong to history. William Penn's grandson had been his intimate friend. A contemporary of Addison (Dr. Theophilus Leigh, master of Balliol) had pointed out to him the situation of Addison's rooms. He had seen Dr. Johnson, in his brown wig, scrambling up the steps of University College. A lady told him that her mother remembered seeing King Charles II. walking with his dogs round "the parks" at Oxford (when the Parliament was held there during the plague in London); and, at the approach of the heads of Houses, who tried to fall in with him, "dodging" by the cross path to the other side. (His Majesty's dogs, by the way, were highly offensive to the heads.) It seemed no exaggeration when, in the dedication prefixed to a volume of lectures, published in 1838, Dr. Newman described "Martin Joseph Routh, D.D., president of Magdalen College," as one "who had been reserved to report to a forgetful generation what was the theology of their fathers." He was every way a marvel. Spared to fulfil a century of years of honorable life, he enjoyed the use of his remarkable faculties to the very last. His memory was unimpaired; his "eye was not dim." More than that, he retained till his death his relish for those studies of which he had announced the first-fruits for publication in 1788. The sentiment of reverence with which he was regarded was not unmixed with wonder. He had become an historical personage long before the time of his departure. When at last it became known that he had gone the way of all flesh, it was felt that with the president of Magdalen College had vanished such an amount of tradition as had probably never been centred in any single member of the university before.

No detailed memoir of this remarkable man has yet been attempted, and such a work is no longer likely to appear — which is to be regretted. Thirty years hence it will be impossible to produce any memoir of him at all: and the question we have ourselves often complainingly asked concerning other ancient worthies will be repeated concerning Dr. Routh: Why did no one give us at least an outline of his history, describe his person, preserve a few specimens of his talk, — in short, leave us a sketch? Antiquarian biography is at once the most laborious and the most unreadable kind of writing. Bristling with dates, it never for an instant exhibits the man. We would exchange all our "Lives" of Shakespeare for such an account of him as almost any of his friends could have furnished in a single evening. Ben Jonson's incidental notice of his conversation is our one actual glimpse of the poet in society. In like manner, Dr. John Byrom's description of a scene at which Bishop Butler was present, is the only personal acquaintance we enjoy with the great philosophic divine of the last century. And this shall suffice in the way of apology for what follows.

Not far from Beverley, in the East Riding, is a village which, early in the twelfth century, gave its name to the knightly family of Routhe or De Ruda, lords of the manor in 1192. A cross-legged warrior in Routh church is supposed to represent Sir John de Routhe, who joined the Crusades in 1319. A brass within the chancel certainly commemorates his namesake who

* 1. Platonis Euthydemus et Gorgias: recensuit, vertit, notasque suas adjecit Martinus Josephus Routh, A.M., 1784.

2. Tres breves Tractatus. Ab eodem, 1854.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

died in 1557 ("strenuus vir Johannes Routh de Routh chevalier, et nobilis conthoralis ejus Domina Agnes"). The president's immediate ancestors resided at Thorpefield, a hamlet of Thirsk, where his grandfather was born. Peter Routh (1726–1802), a man of piety and learning (educated at Caius College, Cambridge, and instituted in 1753 to the consolidated rectories of St. Peter and St. Margaret, South Elmham, Suffolk), became the father of thirteen children (six sons and seven daughters), of whom the subject of this memoir was the eldest. "I was born" (he says of himself) "at St. Margaret's, South Elmham, in Suffolk, September 18th, 1755." Strange to relate, although throughout the eighteenth century he kept his birthday on the 18th, he ever after kept it on the nineteenth day of September.

Martin Joseph was named after his great-uncles and godfathers, the Rev. Martin Baylie, D.D., of Wicklewood, in Norfolk (his mother's maternal uncle), and the Rev. Joseph Bokenham, M.A., the learned rector of Stoke Ash, who stood to him in the same relation on his father's side. Like the rest of his brothers and sisters, he was baptized immediately after his birth.* His mother, Mary, daughter of Mr. Robert Reynolds of Harleston, was the granddaughter of Mr. Christopher Baylie, of the same place, a descendant from Dr. Richard Baylie, president of St. John's College, Oxford, in 1660, who married a niece of Archbishop Laud. Her first cousin and namesake died in giving birth to Richard Heber, who represented the University of Oxford in Parliament from 1821 to 1826.

When elected to the headship of his college in 1791, it appears, from some memoranda in his hand (written on the back of a letter of congratulation), that the event set him on recalling the dates of the chief incidents in his thirty-six previous years of life. The second entry is: "1758. Removed to Beccles." So that Peter Routh transferred his family thither when Martin was but three years old; and at Beccles eight out of the nine brothers and sisters born subsequently to 1758 were baptized. The reason of this change of residence does not appear; for Peter Routh only held the living of Beccles for "old Bence" (as the Rev. Bence Sparrow was familiarly called) from 1764 to 1774; and it was not till the last-named year that he became master of the Beccles school. At Beccles, at all events, Martin spent all his studious boyhood, being educated by his learned father until he was nearly fifteen years of age (1770), when he went up to Oxford, and became (thirty-first of May) a commoner of Queen's College: the provost at that time being Dr. Thomas Fothergill, who in 1773–4 was vice-chancellor.

Oxford a hundred and eight years ago! What a different place it must have been! The boy of fifteen, weary of his long journey by execrable roads rendered perilous by highwaymen, at last to his delight catches sight of Magdalen tower, and is convinced that he has indeed reached Oxford. It is May, and all is beautiful. He comes rolling over old Magdalen Bridge (a crazy structure which fell down in 1772); looks up with awe as he enters the city by the ancient gate which spans the High Street ("East Gate," demolished in 1771), and finally alights from the "flying machine" (as the stage-coach of those days was called) "at John Kemp's, over against Queen's College," i.e. at the Angel Tavern, where coffee was first tasted in Oxford in 1650. President Routh could never effectually disentangle himself from the memory of the days when he first made acquaintance with Oxford. "Sir," said one of the tutors in 1850, or thereabouts, "Mr. Such-an-one has only just made his appearance in college" (he came out of Suffolk, and a fortnight of the October term had elapsed); "I suppose you will send him down?" "Ah, sir," said the old man thoughtfully, "the roads in Suffolk — the roads, sir — are very bad at this time of the year." "But, Mr. President, he didn't come by the road!" "The roads, sir" (catching at the last word), "the roads in winter, I do assure you, sir, are very bad for travelling." "But he didn't come by the road, sir, he came by rail!"

* One of Peter Routh's children was baptised on the fifth day; two on the fourth; four (Martin being of the number) on the third day; one on the second day; three on the first day after birth.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"Eh, sir? The — what did you say? I don't know anything about that!" waving his hand as if the tutor had been talking to him of something in the moon.

To return to the Oxford of May 1770, and to the Routh of fifteen. When he sallied forth next day to reconnoitre the place of his future abode, he beheld tenements of a far more picturesque type than — except in a few rare instances — now meet the eye. In front of those projecting, grotesque, and irregular houses there was as yet no foot-pavement, the only specimen of that convenience being before St. Mary's Church. The streets were paved with small pebbles, a depressed gutter in the middle of each serving to collect the rain. At the western extremity of High Street rose Otho Nicholson's famous conduit (removed to Nuneham in 1787), surmounted by figures of David and Alexander the Great, Godfrey of Boulogne and King Arthur, Charlemagne and James I., Hector of Troy and Julius Cæsar. Behind it a vastly different Carfax Church from the present came to view, where curfew rang every night at eight o'clock, and two giants struck the hours on a bell. Passengers up Cornmarket (just behind St. Michael's Church), as they glided through the ancient city gate called "Bocardo" — once the prison of Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, and till 1771 a place of confinement for debtors — were solicited to deposit a dole in the hat let down by a string from the window overhead. As yet neither the Radcliffe Infirmary nor the Observatory was built. The way to Worcester College lay through a network of narrow passages, and was pronounced undiscoverable. St. Giles's, on the other hand, was deemed a "rus in urbe, having all the advantages of town and country — planted with a row of elms on either side, and having a parterre of green before the several houses." "Canditch" was seriously encroached upon by a terrace in front of Balliol College, shaded by lofty elms, and resembling that before St. John's. The unwonted breadth acquired for the street when this excrescence was at last removed caused its old appellation to disappear in favor of "Broad Street." A double row of posts — where boys played leapfrog — marked the northern limit of St. Mary's Churchyard. The Radcliffe Library was a rotunda without railings. Hart Hall (which had come to be called "Hertford College," and which resumed its title yesterday after its disuse for fifty years) had no street front; and where "Canterbury Quad" now stands there were yet to be seen traces of the ancient college of which Wickliffe is said to have been warden, and Sir Thomas More a member. St. Peter's Vicarage still occupied the north-east angle of St. Peter's Churchyard, — where its site is commemorated by an inscription from the president's pen. It was but fifteen years since, that on St. John Baptist's day the last sermon had been preached in the open air from the stone pulpit in front of Magdalen College chapel (and a pleasant sight it was): the vice-chancellor, proctors, and masters occupying seats in the quadrangle; the walls being adorned with green boughs and flowers, the ground covered with rushes and grass; and all in order to create the illusion that the preaching "resembled that of John the Baptist in the wilderness." *

The university life of 1770 presented even a greater contrast. The undergraduates rose early, but spent their days in idleness. Practically, the colleges were without discipline. Tutors gave no lectures. It is difficult to divine how a studiously-disposed youth was to learn anything. "I should like to read some Greek," said John Miller of Worcester to his tutor, some thirty years later. "Well, and what do you want to read?" "Some Sophocles." "Then come to-morrow morning at nine o'clock." He went, and read a hundred lines: but could never again effect an entrance. This state of things was effectually remedied by the examination statute and by the publication of the class-list; but neither came into effect till the year 1801. The dinner-hour was two; and for an hour previous, the impatient shout of "Tonsor! tonsor!" was to be heard from every casement. The study, or inner room, was reserved for the

* Jones' "Life of Horne," prefixed to his "Works," vol. i., 117. Pointer's "Oxoniensis Academia," p. 66. Peshall, ad fin., p. 31.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"powdering." Blue coats studded with bright buttons, shorts and buckles, was the established costume. A passage from Scripture was read during dinner. At eight, all supped on broiled bones and beer. There was not to be seen till long after a carpet in a single Oxford common-room: what need to add that undergraduates were without carpets? The "dons" frequented some adjoining tavern or coffee-house. Mr. Wyatt's premises in High Street (known at that time as "Tom's Coffee-house") were the favorite resort of seniors and juniors alike. The undergraduates drank and smoked in the front room below, as well as in the large room overhead which looks down on the street. The older men, the choice spirits of the university, formed themselves into a club which met in a small inner apartment on the ground-floor (remembered as "the House of Lords"), where they also regaled themselves with pipes, beer, and wine. The ballot-boxes of the club are preserved, and the ancient Chippendale chairs (thanks to the taste of their present owner) still stand against the walls. Drunkenness was, unquestionably, at that time the prevailing vice of Oxford. Irreligion reigned; not unrebuked, indeed, yet not frowned down, either. It would be only too easy to produce anecdotes in illustration of both statements. Should it not be remembered, when such discreditable details are brought before our notice, that our universities perforce at all times reflect the manners and spirit of the age; and that it is unreasonable to isolate the Oxford of 1770 from the England of the same period? The latter part of the eighteenth century was a coarse time everywhere; and the low standard which prevailed in church matters outside the university is but too notorious. Only because her lofty traditions and rare opportunities set her on a pinnacle apart, does the Oxford of those days occasion astonishment and displeasure.

Such was the state of things when young Routh became a commoner of Queen's. Jacobite sentiments he found universally prevalent, and he espoused them the more readily because they fell in with the traditions of his family. He was remarkable even as a boy. "I like that little fellow in blue stockings," said the second Earl Temple (afterwards Marquis of Buckingham), with whom Routh used to argue, when he met him in a friend's rooms. ("I suppose," remarked the president, at the end of eighty years, "they weren't very tasty.") But the topic of the hour was the act of Parliament which had been just obtained for the improvement of the city, — an act which in a few years effectually transformed ancient into modern Oxford. Meanwhile Dr. George Horne and Dr. Thomas Randolph were pointed out as the most conspicuous divines in the university; Dr. Kennicott as the most famous Hebraist; Tom Warton as the most brilliant wit. In the very next year young Routh migrated from Queen's to Magdalen. The record survives in his own writing: "1771, July 24th. I was elected a demy of Magdalen, on the nomination of the president, Dr. Horne." And now he came under improved influences — the best, it may be suspected, which the university had at that time to offer. Dr. Benjamin Wheeler, Regius Professor of Divinity in 1776, was a fellow of the college ("my learned friend, Dr. Wheeler," as Dr. Johnson calls him); and Dr. John Burrough was his tutor. Especially is it to be considered that young Routh now lived under the eye of Dr. Horne, who was still engaged on his commentary on the Psalms. It is impossible to avoid suspecting that the character and the pursuits of this admirable person materially tended to confirm in Martin Joseph Routh that taste for sacred learning which was destined afterwards to bear such remarkable fruits. He listened to Horne's sermons in the College Chapel and at St. Mary's; and at the president's lodgings met every one who at that time was most distinguished in or out of the university for learning, ability, or goodness.

The youth (for we are speaking of a boy of sixteen) had already established the practice of returning to Beccles once a year, and spending some part of the summer vacation under his parents' roof. This annual visit went on till 1792. On such occasions it is remembered that he sometimes "acted as the assistant or substitute of his father in the schoolroom, where his presence was always welcomed by the pupils, on account of his urbane manner and the happy ease with which he communicated information."* In 1774 (February 5th) he took his B. A. degree; and it was intended that he should at once "go down." The interval before he could be ordained was to have been passed at Beccles. His father had a large family to provide for: two children had been born to him since Martin had gone up to Ox-

* The Fauconberge Memorial (privately printed), 1849, p. 37.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ford in 1770; and the expenses of an university education already pressed somewhat heavily on the domestic exchequer.

"I hope by this time you have passed the pig-market," writes the anxious parent (February 4th, 1774), indulging in an allusion which will be intelligible at least to Oxford men. Then follow directions as to what the son was to do with his effects before his departure: —

> This I mention [proceeds the writer] on the supposition of your not having a very near prospect of returning to college, which must be the case unless somewhat approaching to a maintenance could be contrived for you there; since, as you must be aware, your education hitherto has been full as much as my circumstances will allow of. The particulars now occurring for the refreshment of your memory are all your clothes, linen, sheets, and table-linen, spoons, and such books as you think may be useful, if Wormall should become your pupil, in the use of the globes and a smattering of astronomy. . . . Whether you will have heard the bad news from London, I cannot tell; but, by a letter from Kelsale on Wednesday, we are informed of the death of Mrs. Heber, who was brought to bed of a son, heir to an entailed estate of 1,500*l.* per annum, on old Christmas Day.

His election to a fellowship at Magdalen (July 25th, 1775) determined Routh's subsequent career. He undertook two pupils — one of whom (Edward South Thurlow) was a nephew of the lord chancellor and of the bishop; Granville Penn was the other. And now Routh gave himself up to study. He proceeded M.A. in 1776; was appointed college librarian in 1781; and, in 1784 and 1785, judior dean of arts, enjoying the satisfaction in the latter year of seeing his brother (Samuel) admitted demy. He had already been elected proctor,* in which capacity he was present at an entertainment given to George III., who, with Queen Charlotte, visited the university about this time. The first symptoms of the king's subsequent malady had not yet appeared: but Routh, in describing the scene, while he did full justice to the intelligence and activity which marked the king's face and conversation (he sat opposite to him), dwelt on the restlessness of his eye and manner, — which was afterwards but too easily explained.

It was the belief of Mrs. Routh, on being interrogated in her widowhood on the subject, that when "her dear man" first went to Oxford, he interchanged letters with his father weekly. The impression may have resulted from the very active correspondence which certainly went on, as long as life lasted, between Peter Routh at Beccles and his son at Magdalen. A mere scantling of the father's letters survive; but they betoken a good and thoughtful person: grave, yet always cheerful; affectionate, and with an occasional dash of quiet humor. Between the two there evidently prevailed entire unity of sentiment. Peter Routh keeps "Martin" informed of what is passing in his neighborhood; tells him the rumors which from time to time reach remote Suffolk; and relieves his parental anxiety by communicating the concerns of their own immediate circle. The son, in return, chronicles his pursuits and occupations, which are, in fact, his studies; and until long after he is thirty years of age — throughout his father's life, in short — submits his compositions as deferentially to his judgment as when he was a boy of fifteen. "I do not recollect" (he wrote in 1791, with reference to his dedication of the "Reliquiæ" to the bishops of the Scottish Church) "that I was indebted for any alteration of the original dedication I sent my father, except in two instances. I adopted the words non nisi precarium, and the fine sentence, et ipsi emineatis in principibus Judæ." It is with reference to the speech which, in pursuance of ancient custom, Martin had to deliver at the expiration of his proctorship, that his father sends him the following shrewd remarks (April 3rd, 1786) on writing a speech for delivery: —

> In regard to the part of your speech transcribed in your last, I have to remark that upon revising it you must pay a particular attention to your own manner of speaking, and how the periods run off your own tongue; and that probably where you find an obstruction it will arise from the feet not being sufficiently varied, or the same endings or cases following close upon each other. A little change, I think, would improve a clause which struck me for the last reason, viz. "Si animos ex desidi improbaque muneris mei executione graviori ictu," etc. Alter this, if you please, to per and the accusative, and think of a better word than executio. Again, change some words which occur too often in so short a composition, as orator, oratio, and munus. After cum, which you begin with, the subjunctive should follow, according to classical usage, even where the sense is positive and without contingency. Not but I believe there are instances to the contrary.

At the end of a fortnight, the father enters into minuter criticism, and discovers excellent scholarship. But the correspondence is not by any means always of

* "1784, April. I was elected senior proctor of the university in my twenty-ninth year." — MS. note.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

this severe type. Father and son wrote about books, because learning was with both a passion; and about divinity, because it was evidently uppermost in the heart of either. As a rule, however, these letters have a purely home flavor; and sometimes, when Martin lets out incidentally what a very studious life he is leading, he draws down on himself affectionate rebuke. "It may be grown trite by repetition, and I shall not render it more irksome by prolixity: air and exercise, and, above all, the cold bath is what you must pluck up resolution to make use of." The hint was not thrown away. A shower-bath continued to be a part of the president's bedroom furniture till the day of his death.

I am glad you find more entertainment in Tertullian than I am afraid I could do myself. All I know of him is from quotations, very frequently met with, which have seldom failed of puzzling me with some enigmatical quaintness.*

Next year, Peter Routh writes:—

Your acquaintance with the Fathers is leaving me far behind; and I am apprehensive of not being qualified to talk with you about them when we meet. By the way, Sam has given me some little hope of seeing you in a wig, which I look forward to as the breaking of a spell which has counteracted most of your purposes of exertion, excursion, and amusement.†

Occasionally the old man indulges in a little pleasantry, and many a passage proves that he was by no means deficient in genuine humor. One of his daughters ("Polly") was qualifying herself to undertake a school. After explaining the young lady's aspirations, he suddenly breaks off:

But I think it is not impossible, from the rapid steps taken by our present maccaroni towards working a confusion in the sexes, that if you should ever choose to be a schoolmaster yourself, you may want her assistance to finish the education of your boys by giving them a taste, and a dexterity upon occasion, for tambour-work and embroidery.‡

It is, however, when he is communicating to his son some piece of local intelligence, entertaining him with the doings of some familiar friend of his early days, that Peter Routh's wit flows most freely:—

Last Tuesday, Mr. Elmy derived immensity of happiness from the apotheosis of his daughter. Lest the rite should be disgraced by inferiority in the sacrificing priest, Mr. Prebendary Wodehouse came over upon the occasion. I rather think Sam Carter is making a first attack on Miss ——, who has lately had an addition of 2,000*l.* to her fortune. Weddings have been very rife here for half a year past.*

In the ensuing August (Martin being then in Warwickshire), "Ought I" (asks his father) "to run the hazard of spoiling your visit to Dr. Parr by transmitting Mr. Browne's report that Miss Dibdin is not there, but on the eve of marriage to a gentleman in the Commons?" † Ten years had elapsed when Peter Routh writes: "If you do not exert yourself shortly, your friend Boycatt is like to get the start of you at last in the matrimonial chase." ‡

One more extract from this correspondence shall suffice. It refers to a public transaction which was recent in July 1790, and recalls two names which were still famous fifty years ago, or, as the writer would have said, "agone:"—

The immaculate patriots, so worthy of trust and honor, are showing themselves every day more and more in their true colors. Having gotten a substitute for their old calves'-head clubs, they figure away with it to purpose. At Yarmouth (where, by the way, but for the tergiversation of Lacon, the Church candidate, they would have been foiled at the election) an anniversary feast was held, Dr. Aikin in the chair, in the national cockade. He had been till very lately looked upon as a candid moderate Dissenter; but has now vented his rancor in a pamphlet which it has been thought proper to buy in. His sister, Mrs. Barbauld, has signalized herself in like manner.

The first-fruits of Routh's studies saw the light in 1784 (the year of his senior proctorship), when he was twenty-nine years of age. It was a critical edition of the "Euthydemus" and "Gorgias" of Plato, with notes and various readings filling the last 157 pages: a model of conscientious labor and careful editorship, which will enjoy the abiding esteem of scholars. It was dedicated to Dr. Thurlow, bishop of Lincoln and dean of St. Paul's, brother of Lord Chancellor Thurlow, whose epitaph in the Temple Church Routh wrote.§

But though the classics were ever

* Beccles, May 18th, 1786.
† July 5th, 1787.
‡ June 9th, 1773.

* May 18th, 1786.
† August 10th, 1786.
‡ Bungay, February 15th, 1796. Concerning the Rev. W. Boycatt, see the "Reliquiæ," vol. ii., p. 329.
§ It is printed by Lord Campbell in his "Lives of the Chancellors" (v. 632), but "merendo" appears instead of "merendi," which provoked the old president immensely. "His Scotch Latin, sir!" he exclaimed indignantly to one who alluded to the fate his inscription had experienced.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Routh's delight, and scholarship amounted with him to a passion, he had long since given his heart to something nobler far than was ever "dreamed of in the philosophy" of ancient Greece or Rome. Having already laid his foundations deep and strong, he proceeded to build upon them. Next to the Scriptures (to his great honor, be it said), he saw clearly from the first, notwithstanding the manifold discouragements of the age in which his lot was cast, the importance to one who would be a well-furnished divine of a familiar acquaintance with the patristic writings. Next to the Scriptures; for, like every true "master in Israel," he was profoundly versed in them. This done, besides the acts of the early councils and the ecclesiastical historians, he is found to have resolutely read through the chief of the Greek and Latin fathers; taking them, as far as practicable, in their chronological order: — Irenæus, Origen, Hippolytus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Didymus, among the Greeks; Tertullian, Cyprian, Optatus, Jerome, Augustine, among the Latins. He was ordained deacon at Park Street Chapel, Grosvenor Square, by Philip, Bishop of Norwich, December 21st, 1777.

The nature and extent of his patristic reading at this time may be inferred with sufficient accuracy from a mere inspection of his MS. notes in a little interleaved copy of the N. T. (Amsterdam, 1639); into the frequent blank pages of which it is evident that he had been in the habit from a very early period — indeed, he retained the habit to the end of his life — of inserting references to places in the writings of the fathers where he met with anything unusually apposite, in illustration of any particular text. On the fly-leaf of the first volume of this book (for it had been found necessary to bind the volume into two) is found the following memorandum, which (as the writing shows) must have been made quite late in life: —

> Quæ in sequentibus quasi meo Marte interpretatus sum, ea inter legendum libros sacros a me scripta sunt, raro adhibitis ad consilium interpretibus recentioribus, qui meliora fortasse docuissent. — M. J. R.
>
> At vero initio cœptis his adnotationibus, et per longum tempus, meum judicium iis interponere haud consuevi; dum quidquid mihi auctores veteres legenti ad illustrandam S. Scripturam faciens occurreret, illud hic indicare volebam.

The foregoing statement as to what had been his own actual practice is fully borne out by the contents of these interesting little tomes, where all the earlier notes consist of references to the fathers, followed occasionally by brief excerpts from their writings. In a later hand are found expressions of the writer's individual opinion; while the latest annotations of all, or among the latest, are little more than references to Scripture. These last are often written in a hand rendered tremulous by age. A few specimens will not perhaps be unwelcome. When a young man, he had written against St. Mark xiii. 32, "Vid. Irenæ. L. 2, c. 28, p. 158, ed. Massueti. Exponere conatus est Didymus, L. 3, De Trin. c. 22, et Tertull. adv. Praxeam, c. 26." Long after, he added, "Non est inter ea, quæ ostendit Filio Pater, ut hominibus significet, diei illius cognitio. Confer S. Joan. v. 19, 20, et cap. xiv. 28, et xv. 15, et xvi. 13, et Act. i. 7."

The following is his note on 1 St. John v. 6: "δι' ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος. Deus et Homo. Vid. Reliq. Sacr. vol. i., p. 170, et p. 171, de hoc et commatibus sequentibus. Interpretatio eorum impediri mihi videtur accessionibus Latinis." And on ver. 16: "ἔστιν ἁμοτρία πρὸς θάνατον. Fortasse designatur peccatum de quo Dominus noster in evangelio pronuntiat." On St. Luke i. 32, he writes: "Ostenditur his verbis Maria ex Judæ tribu orta." On v. 23: "Τί ἐστιν εὐκοπώτερον, etc. Sensus verborum est, τί ἐσνιν, etc. An facilius est dicere, etc." On ix. 27: "ἕως ἂν ἴδωσι τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ. Vidend. annon istud de sequentibus exponendum sit. Confer comm. 26 et 32." On xiii. 11: "πνεῦμα ἀσθενείας. Confer Marc. 9, 17, ἔχοντα πνεῦμα ἄλαλον. Hujus capitis comm. 16. Satanæ attribuit infirmitatem mulieris ipse Dominus, ac similiter alibi." On St. Mark xv. 21: "τὸν πατέρα Ἀλεξάνδρου καὶ Ῥούφου. Christianorum, ut verisimile est, quod dignum notatu est. Conf. de Rufo, Rom. xvi. 13."

But the most interesting of his annotations are perhaps the shortest; as when, over against St. Luke xviii. 8, is written: "πλὴν ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου ἐλθὼν ἆρα εὑρήσει τὴν πίστιν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς (the old man had taken the trouble to trrnscribe the Greek in a trembling hand, in order to introduce the pious ejaculation which follows). Concedat hoc Deus." With the same pregnant brevity, his note on St. Matth. xxv. 9, is but — "τοὺς πωλοῦντας. Væ vadentibus!" In truth, his suggestive way of merely calling attention to a difficulty is often as good as a commentary; as when (of 1 Cor. xv. 23–25) he says, "Quomodo exponi debent verba Apostoli, disquirendum." Even

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

more remarkably, when he points out concerning St. Luke xi. 5, "Quæ sequentur Domini effata usque ad comm. 13 maxima observatione digna sunt." Sometimes his notes are strictly critical, as when against St. James iv. 5 he writes, "Difficillime credendum est, Apostolum non attulisse verba alicujus scriptoris incomperti." His translation of St. Luke vi. 40, is as follows: "Discipulus non superat magistrum; sed, si omni parte perfectus sit, magistri æqualis erit." On St. Mark vi. 3, he says, "ἀδελφὸς δὲ Ἰακώβου καὶ Ἰωσῆ. Constat ex cap. xv. com. 39 filios hos extitisse alius Mariæ, non τῆς θεοτόκου." And on 1 Cor. xv. 29, "τί καὶ βαπτίζονται, etc. Mos fuisse videtur ut multi baptizarentur in gratiam Christianorum jam defunctorum qui sine baptismo decessissent, ut vicaria tinctione donati ad novam vitam resurgerent."

Rare, indeed, are references to recent authorities and modern books; but they are met with sometimes. Thus against St. Matthew, xxi. 7, he writes: "His quoque temporibus super asinos vecti iter faciunt pauperes Palæstini, referente Josepho Wolfio in Itinerario [1839], p. 186. Humiliter, super asinos sedent." And against St. John v. 17, "ὁ πατήρ μου ἐργάζεται. Relegat nos ad Justin. M. Dial. cum Tryphone, § 23. D'Israeli, Commentaries on Ch. i. [1830], vol. iii. p. 340." . . . These specimens of the president's private annotations on the N. T. may suffice.

In 1782, being then only in his twenty-eighth year, it became Routh's singular privilege to direct the envoys of the American Church to a right quarter for the creation of a native episcopate. Incredible as it may seem to us of the present day, who witness constantly the creation of new colonial sees, it is a fact that for nearly two centuries our American colonies were left without a native channel of ordination. From the settlement of the first American colony in 1607 to the consecration of Bishop Seabury in 1784, or rather until on his return in 1785, all clergy of the Anglican communion who ministered in America were either missionaries, or had been forced to cross the Atlantic twice, if not four times, for orders. The difficulties which attended the just demand of the American Church for a native episcopate grew out of the political troubles of those times. Because episcopacy was identified with the system of monarchical government, its introduction was resisted by a large party among the Americans themselves, who dreaded (clergy and laity alike) lest it should prove an instrument for riveting the yoke of a foreign dominion. On the other hand, the English bishops, hampered by acts of Parliament, were constrained to exact oaths from candidates for consecration inconsistent with the duties of American citizenship. While these embarrassments were severing the Church of England from the colony, the Danish Church, which had only Presbyterian orders to offer, with well-meant piety offered to stand in the gap. At this critical juncture, Mr. Routh was invited by Bishop Thurlow to a party at his house in London, where he met Dr. Cooper, president of the Theological College at New York, and a friend of Seabury, who was then seeking consecration. He succeeded in impressing Dr. Cooper with the fact (well understood now, but then not so clear) that the Danish succession was invalid. Speaking of this incident of his youth some sixty years after, — "I ventured to say, sir, that they would not find what they wanted." Bishop Lowth, who happened to be present, confirmed his statement; and Seabury, in consequence, acting on the sagacious counsel of Mr. Routh, applied to the Scottish Church, whose orders are unimpeachable, and was consecrated soon after. A great separation was thus providentially averted by the counsel of a wise and thoughtful man. The spark became a flame, which has kindled beacon fires throughout the length and breadth of the vast American continent; and, at the end of well-nigh a century of years, the churches of England and America flourish with independent life and in full communion.

In every notice which has hitherto appeared of Dr. Routh, an unreasonable space is occupied by his friendship with Dr. Samuel Parr, who was an enthusiastic (and of course a grandiloquent) admirer of the future president of Magdalen. Faithful to the friend of early life until the time of Parr's death in 1823, Routh must yet have shrunk from his adulation; must have despised his vanity, disliked his egotism, been annoyed by his pedantry. He complained (not without reason) that he was scarcely able to decipher Parr's letters. John Rigaud expressed a wish to have one (as he collected autographs), and was at once promised a specimen. "I have a good many of his letters, sir; I haven't read them all yet myself!" To the present writer Routh once remarked that his inscriptions were to be traced to the pages of Morcellus. But he provided a shelter for Parr's books (they were piled

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

in boxes under the principal gateway of the college), when the Birmingham rioters threatened to burn his library at Hatton, and often entertained him in his lodgings at Magdalen. His dinner-table to the last retained marks of the burning ashes of Parr's pipe.

Porson, another of his guests, shared his kindness in a substantial form; for the president in 1792, with Dr. Parr, raised a subscription for providing him an annuity. In 1794, Routh did the same kind office for Dr. Parr himself, with the assistance of Mr. Kett and Dr. Maltby, raising for him a subscription of 300*l.* a year.

We are apt to forget that this was a period (1775–1788) when a great stirring in sacred science was certainly going on, both at home and abroad. Griesbach's first edition of the New Testament (1775) marks the commencement of a new era. The great work of Gallandius was completed in 1781. In 1786, "Codex A" was published by Woide, and Alter's Greek Testament appeared. Birch's "Collations" saw the light in 1788, and C. F. Matthæi, in the same year, put forth the last two volumes of his own edition of the Greek Testament. The Philoxenian version also was then first published, and Adler, in the next year, published his collations of the Syriac text. Interesting it is to have to record that at this very time we first hear of Routh also as a student of divinity. The following paper (dated 1788) seems to have been drawn up in the prospect of death: —

I request that after my decease all the letters and papers of whatever kind in my possession be burnt by my brother Samuel and my friend Mr. John Hind, excepting my "Collectanea," in three volumes, from the fathers, on various subjects; my collections from the H. Scripture and the Fathers on the Divinity of the Holy Ghost; the papers relating to a projected edition of the remains and fragments of those ante-Nicene Fathers who have never been separately published; and finally, an interleaved copy of my Plato, wherein the Addenda are digested in their proper order amongst the notes. These papers and books, with my other property of whatever nature, I leave to the sole disposal of my father, at the same time requesting him, if any overplus remain after paying my debts, to present the following books to the following mentioned persons: To the present Lord Bishop of Durham, "Lord Clarendon's Life and continuation of his History." To Edw. Thurlow, Esq., "Bishop Pearson on the Creed." To Granville Penn, Esq., "Ernesti's edition of Livy." To the Rev. George Hirst, "Forster's Hebrew Bible." To the Rev. John Hind, "Grotius's comment on the Old and New Testament," and "Fell's edition of St. Cyprian."

But it is time to call attention to the prospectus which Routh put forth in the same year (1788) of the work by which he will be chiefly remembered; the completion of which proved the solace of his age, as the preparation of it had been the delight of his maturity, namely, the "Reliquiæ Sacræ;" the first two volumes of which appeared in 1814. In the preface he explains that this undertaking, though discontinued about the year 1790, had never been for an instant abandoned; though it was not till 1805 that he was able deliberately to resume his self-imposed task. The object of the work was to bring together and to present, carefully edited, the precious remains of those fathers of the second and third centuries of our era, of whose writings nothing but the merest fragments survive, and whose very names in many instances have only not died out of the Church's memory. Let us hear his own account of this matter: —

While reading the ante-Nicene Fathers, I could not but linger wistfully over many an ancient writer whose scanty remains do not bear independent editorship, nor indeed have ever as yet been brought together. Inasmuch, however, as I entertained the intention of acquainting myself with the constitution, the doctrines, the customs of the primitive Church by diligent study of its own monuments, I resolved to acquaint myself with all the writings of the earliest age, and often found my determination to overlook absolutely nothing, of the greatest use in clearing up the difficulties which occasionally presented themselves. At all events, systematically to neglect so many writers, recommended as they are by their piety and their learning, simply because of the very mutilated condition in which their works have come down to us, was out of the question. On the other hand, it became needful to submit to the drudgery of hunting up and down through the printed volumes of those learned men who have treated of patristic antiquity, in order to detect any scrap of genuine writing which they might happen to contain. Such a pursuit I could in fact never have undertaken had I not been residing in an university. The resources of no private library whatever would have enabled me to effect what I desired.

While thus engaged, I was inevitably impressed with the conviction that he would render good service to the cause of sacred learning who should seriously undertake to collect together those shorter works and fragments, especially if he could be successful in bringing to light and publishing any of the former which still lie concealed in Continental libra-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ries, besides any genuine remains contained in unedited Catenæ and similar collections. The labor of such an undertaking, I further anticipated, would not prove excessive if I took as my limit the epoch of the first Nicene Council. I fixed on that limit because the period is so illustrious in the annals of the Church, and because, in matters of controversy, those fathers are chiefly appealed to who preceded that epoch. Moreover, I could not forget that although in respect of numbers the writers with which an editor would have to do would be by no means small, yet in respect of bulk they would be inconsiderable indeed, one or two writers alone excepted, whose more ample remains make one wish the more that we possessed their works entire. I knew that very seldom are passages from their writings to be met with in Catenæ, or in other collections from the fathers; and I did not believe that there were many works set down which have not yet seen the light.

I hoped therefore, if I undertook to edit such a collection, that its usefulness would not be materially diminished by its bulk. I am well aware that Grabe's "Spicilegium" (which was never completed) comprises scarcely a twentieth part of what I here publish. But then, his plan was to fill his pages with apocryphal writings, and those remains of orthodox fathers which often appear in a separate form. Grabe's work is famous, and not without its own proper use. For my own part, I strictly confine myself to genuine remains, and prescribe to myself the limits of Catholic antiquity, leaving all fragments of Fathers, whose works it is customary to edit separately, to those who shall hereafter undertake to produce new editions of those Fathers' works.

Such was the plan of the "Reliquiæ Sacræ" from the first. The title originally intended for the work had been — "Reliquiæ Sacræ: sive Opuscula et Fragmenta Ecclesiasticorum, qui tempora Synodi Nicænæ antecedebant, et quorum scripta vel apud opera aliena servantur, vel cum varii generis auctoribus edi solent." But when, at the end of six-and-twenty years, the first two volumes of this undertaking appeared (viz. in 1814), not only the prospectus * (freely rendered above), but the very title had undergone material alteration and improvement. The author was probably already conscious of a design to edit separately certain ancient Opuscula. Apart from these, at all events, he proposed should stand his "Reliquiæ Sacræ sive Auctorum fere jam perditorum secundi tertiique sæculi post Christum natum, quæ supersunt."

Two additional volumes of this undertaking appeared in 1816 and 1818 respectively; and, looking upon the work then as complete, the learned editor added indices and corrections — some of which had been furnished by Dr. Parr, "amicus summus, vir doctrinâ exquisitâ ornatus." It was the president's wont in this manner to acknowledge literary kindnesses: namely, by enshrining the friend's name in a note, commonly with the addition of a discriminating epithet or some well-turned phrase; and the compliment (as many living will testify) used to be exceedingly coveted, and was regarded as no small honor. Thus, speaking of an epistle of Cyril, — "Ejus autem lectiones variantes humanitati debeo viri reverendi Stephani Reay e Bibliotheca Bodleiana, cujus facilitatem, verecundiam, eruditionemque omnes agnoscunt;" * — as well-merited a compliment (be it remarked) as ever was paid to a good and guileless man.

It is impossible to handle these volumes without the deepest interest. The passionate yearning which they exhibit after primitive antiquity — the strong determination to get at the teaching of the Church in her best and purest days, ere yet she had "left her first love" and declined from the teaching of her founder, or had shown an inclination to corrupt the deposit: — this, added to the conscientious labor and evident self-denial with which the learned editor has prosecuted his self-imposed task, must command the sympathy and admiration of every one who has toiled ever so little in the same fields. To the diligent readers of the "Ecclesiastical History" of Eusebius, Routh's "Reliquiæ" will have a peculiar interest: for it becomes more than ever apparent how precious are the golden remains which that remarkable man freely embalmed in his pages. Let the truth be added — for it is the truth — that without Eusebius there would have scarcely been any "Reliquiæ Sacræ" for learned men to edit. Reckoning the patristic matter in these four volumes (exclusive of appendices) as covering four hundred and fifty pages, it is found that these would be further reduced to two hundred and sixty, if the excerpts, for which we are solely indebted to Eusebius, were away: and with the one hundred and ninety pages which would thus disappear would also disappear the names of Quadratus, Agrippa Castor, Dionysius Corinthius, Pinytus, Rhodon, Serapion, Apollonius, Polycrates, Maximus, Caius, Alexander of Hierapolis, Phileas; besides almost all that we possess of Papias, Melito, Claudius Apollinaris, and Hegesippus;

* It is reproduced in the Præfatio, pp. x.–xiii.

* Opuscula, ii. 95.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

together with Anonymus Presbyter, Auctor contra Cataphrygas, the account of the martyrs of Lyons, and the famous epistle of the Churches of Vienne and Lyons; besides the notice of the Concilium Cæsariense and the Concilium Lugdunense.

What, then, constitutes the peculiar merit of the work now under consideration? Chiefly the erudition and sagacity with which whatever has been here brought together is edited. Unlike the industrious Grabe, to whom nothing came amiss that belonged to a primitive age (no matter who was its author), Dr. Routh confined his attention strictly to the undoubted remains of high Catholic antiquity. He might easily have enlarged his store from unpublished Catenæ, and other similar sources; but no one ever knew better than he with how much caution such excerpts are to be entertained. Whatever the president deemed open to suspicion, that he unceremoniously rejected. A remarkable illustration of his method in this respect is supplied by the latest of his publications, a tract to be described hereafter, in the course of which he edits from the "Chronicon Paschale" four fragments of Petrus Alexandrinus (thus, at the end of thirty-nine years, adding ten pages to the twenty-nine he had put forth of the same father in 1814); because he made the discovery in the last years of his life that what he had formerly suspected of being a fabrication proved, after all, to be an undoubtedly genuine fragment of the same Alexandrine father.*

Next, the vast research with which, from about forty different sources, the president had gleaned the several articles which make up the collection (they are fifty in all), merits notice. Very scanty in many instances, it must be confessed, is the result. In the case of Aristides (A.D. 125) not a single word of what the man wrote is preserved: † while of many other authors (as of Aristo Pellæus, Ambrosius Alexandrinus, Pierius, etc.) so wondrous little survives (a few lines at best), that it might really appear as if the honors of typography and the labor of annotation were thrown away. Learned persons, however, will know better; and to have said this must suffice. It is believed that one only article in the entire collection first saw the light in the president's pages: viz. a fragment of Africans, about fifty lines long, which he edited from two MSS. at Vienna and one at Paris.* A second edition of the "Reliquiæ" was called for in 1846.

On Tuesday, April 12, 1791, Dr. Horne, bishop of Norwich, sent in his resignation of the presidentship of the college; and the 27th of the same month having been fixed for the choice of his successor, Dr. Burrough, Dr. Metcalfe, Mr. B. Tate, Mr. Parkinson, and Martin Joseph Routh, announced themselves as candidates. The election was made a matter of elaborate canvass. Next to Routh, Parkinson was the greatest favorite. Those who wrote to congratulate the new president on his honors, naturally wished him length of days to enjoy them. Seldom certainly have wishes more nearly resembled effectual prayers. He devoted himself forthwith to his new duties, and obtained a mastery of the subject which surprised the society which had elected him to be their head. We hear little or nothing of him during the next few years. Of the many precious letters he must have written, none are forthcoming. They exist — if at all — among the papers of departed scholars and divines. But here is his own draft of one of them (to whom addressed does not appear) which certainly deserves to be preserved: —

DEAR MR. ——

As I had no permission to communicate your papers to any one, I thought myself bound to keep them as private as possible.

I hope you will forgive my reluctance to entering into a discussion of the terms of the proposition you have laid down; but I think myself obliged, for more reasons than one, to declare I know of no method by which the genuine doctrine taught by the Church, of the SON'S being, as well as the FATHER, very and eternal GOD, — and of the HOLY GHOST'S being, as well as the FATHER, very and eternal GOD, — can be defended against the charge of Tritheism and Idolatry; but by stating ab initio that the Church believes in one Eternal Being really distinguished in its essence; which Being is transcendently one, if Unity admits of increase and diminution. If I am wrong in my judgment of your mode of answering Dr. Priestley or other heretics, I hope to be excused; and remain,

Dear sir, with very great regard, etc.

In 1810, he was presented to the rectory and vicarage of Tylehurst, near Reading

* "Hæc S. Petri Alexandrini Fragmenta, quæ in limine Chronici Paschalis, seu Alexandrini, sita respuerunt critici, propterea quod Athanasius aliquanto post Petrum scribens in iis afferri videbatur, nunc ego cæteris S. Petri reliquiis, sed tardus addidi ob verum titulum eorum in MS. Vaticano a Cardinali Maio repertum, et a Dindorfio nuperæ Chronici editioni præfixum. Quam quidem editionem, cum νόθα esse hæc Fragmenta crediderim, de iis consulere neglexi." — p. 19.

† Reliqq. i. 76.

* Ibid. ii. 228-31.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

(worth 1,000*l.* a year), by Dr. Thomas Sheppard. The president had declined the same presentation eleven years before, disapproving of the condition subject to which it had been then offered him: viz. that he should appropriate 300*l.* of his annual income as president to the "livings' fund" of Magdalen College. Dr. Sheppard had in the mean time married the president's youngest sister, Sophia; and Tylehurst had become again vacant by the death of Dr. Richard Chandler, the celebrated traveller. At the mature age of fifty-five, Dr. Routh therefore received priest's orders at the hands of Dr. John Fisher, bishop of Salisbury, in the bishop's private chapel, August 26th, 1810. There were not wanting some to insinuate that conscientious scruples had been the cause why the president of Magdalen had continued in deacon's orders for three-and-thirty years. He himself not unreasonably supposed that his "Reliquiæ" was the best answer to such a calumny; and explained that his only reason for deferring priest's orders had been because he had never before held any ecclesiastical preferment. Henceforth, then, in his case the cares of the pastoral office were superadded to the claims of a college and the occupations of a laborious student. He made no secret that he preached Townson's sermons — abridged and corrected — every Sunday to his rustic flock; though it remains a marvel how he could possibly decipher the manuscript which he carried with him into the pulpit. One of the latest acts of his life was the enlargement of the church, and — "incolarum paræciæ suæ ætate provectiorum haud immemor" — the erection of a porch on the south side.

There is found in the president's hand the following memorandum: "1820, September 18th, my birthday. I married Eliza Agnes, eldest unmarried daughter of John Blagrave, Esq., of Calcot Park, in the parish of Tylehurst." They were married at Walcot Church, Bath; the president having then completed his sixty-fifth year. This lady, the tenth of a single family of twenty children, survived him fifteen years — dying (March 23rd, 1869) aged seventy-eight — and lies interred in Holywell cemetery. She loved to talk about her husband. He had told her (she said) that when he was twelve years of age he wrote a sermon which so surprised the family that his sister was curious to know whether it was his own. To convince her, he wrote another. Better worth attention, however, is Mrs. Routh's share in the following incident.

Many will remember a shameful murder committed in 1845 by a Quaker named Tawell. Some may be aware that the telegraphic wires were employed, almost for the first time, to promote the ends of justice on the same occasion, and that the murderer's apprehension was the consequence. This man's family lived about four miles from Beccles, were well known to Dr. Routh, and were much respected in the neighborhood. One morning, after breakfast, the president, who had been perusing the sentence passed on Tawell by Sir James Parke, exclaimed "Eliza, give me a pen." She obeyed: whereupon he instantly wrote the following letter, which was duly put into the hands of the miserable man in his cell, and read by him before his execution. It appeared in some of the public prints immediately after: —

SIR, — This comes from one who, like yourself, has not long to live, being in his ninetieth year. He has had more opportunity than most men for distinctly knowing that the Scriptures of the New Testament were written by the Apostles of the Saviour of mankind. In these Scriptures it is expressly said that the blood of Jesus Christ the Son of God cleanses us from all sin; and that if we confess our sins, God, being merciful and just, will forgive us our sins on our repentance.

I write this, not knowing how long you have to live; but in the name of the faithful, just, and merciful God, make use of your whole time in supplications for his mercy.

Perhaps the very circumstances in which you are now placed may be the means of saving your immortal soul; for if you had gone on in sin to the end of your life you would infallibly have lost it. Think, say, and do everything in your power to save your soul before you go into another life.

YOUR FRIEND.

The other work, on which the president of Magdalen founds his claim to the Church's gratitude, appeared in 1832, with this title: "Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Opuscula præcipua quædam." Within the narrow compass of two octavo volumes we are here furnished with what, after exhaustive search, the learned editor deemed most precious among the remains of primitive ecclesiastical antiquity. The preface, "To the Reader," in which the contents of the book are briefly reviewed and explained, deserves an attentive perusal. Hippolytus contributes a treatise on the divine nature. Against heretical depravation, Irenæus and Tertullian write. Some precious authorities concerning the doctrine of the sacrament of Christ's body and blood follow. Against Gentile superstitions Cyprian furnishes a treatise. The

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

creeds and canons of the first four general councils witness to what was the faith, what the discipline, of the Church universal. So much for doctrine. Polycarp, Tertullian, and Cyprian contribute what tends to practical piety. Lastly, the pretensions of the see of Rome to authority and infallibility are tested by an appeal to antiquity. We are shown that Stephanus, bishop of Rome, was held by the ancients to have excommunicated himself when he excommunicated the Orientals; and that Honorius, another Romish bishop, was first condemned by a general council, and then anathematized his own successors. To these, some important treatises were added in 1840, when a second edition of the work was called for. The present bishop of Chester (Dr. Jacobson) re-edited the "Opuscula" in 1858, with much self-denying labor and learning; withholding nothing — but his name.

But it were a very inadequate sketch of Dr. Routh's life and character which should represent him only as a divine. In 1823 he edited Bishop Burnet's "History of his own Life and Times," of which a second and enlarged edition appeared in 1833. His mind seemed saturated with the lore of the period of which Burnet treats; and (as Dr. Daubeny, one of his fellows, remarked) when he made it the theme of his conversation, > he seemed to deliver himself rather like a contemporary who had been an eye-witness of the scenes he described, than as one who had drawn his information from second-hand sources; so perfect was his acquaintance with the minutest details, so intimate his familiarity with everything relating to the history of the individuals who figured in those events. On such occasions, one could hardly help interrupting him in the course of his narrative by enquiring whether he had not himself witnessed the rejoicings at the signature of the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, or shaken hands with President Hough at the time of his triumphant return to his college, on the restoration of the fellows. Availing himself of the privileges of seniority, he had the tact to lead the conversation into those channels with which he was most at home, and astonished the eager listener with the extent and accuracy of his knowledge. It was thus, only a few years before his death, that he surprised Mr. Bancroft, the American historian, with his knowledge of the reign of James II., and of the early settlement in America. Nothing in the mean time can be conceived more dignified, more courteous, more ingratiating than his address and manner, especially during his latter years, when the peculiarities of his dress and appearance were set down to his great age, and the fashion of a period long gone by, which enhanced the effect of his affable and kind, though formal deportment.

In 1852 he published, in a single volume, with many additional notes, Burnet's "History of the Reign of King James II." The last words of his short preface deserve to be transcribed: "Under all our changes, the public press, by its disclosure and powerful advocacy of the truth, has been found protecting right against wrong, and maintaining real liberty." In the first draft this sentence ran thus: "A free press will be found as essential as ever to the preservation of real freedom." His own politics savored altogether of a bygone age. He belonged to no modern party. As one of his fellows expressed it, "In early life his was a kind of theoretical Jacobitism, such as had been cherished very generally by the clergy and country squires of the last century." But disloyalty was abhorrent to his whole nature. He was all for the prerogatives of the sovereign, and jealous of the encroachments of the aristocracy. Thus his Toryism carried with it a dash of Liberalism, which endeared him to Sir Francis Burdett. His churchmanship was that of the best divines of the age of Elizabeth. He abhorred Popery. He formed no alliance with any party in the Church. He was above party; taking his stand on Scripture and primitive antiquity. Keenly alive to politics, (for he read the Times to the last, and watched with extraordinary interest the progress of the Russian war,) he chiefly regarded the movements of the State as they affected the independence and purity of the Church. Even from the government and public business of the university he kept himself aloof, contented to administer his own college well. He was even disinclined to the changes in the academic system which were chiefly advocated by Eveleigh and Parsons. The work of the University Commission he regarded with unmitigated suspicion and disfavor, and would have altogether despaired of Oxford had he been alive at this day.

The present is confessedly the sketch of an uneventful life, of which we are already approaching the closing scene. The president grew very aged, amid the regards of a generation whose sires remembered him an old man. Well informed in every topic of the hour, weighty in his judgments, animated and instructive in his conversation, he was resorted to with affectionate reverence; and every one on coming away had something to relate in proof of his unfailing readiness, clearness, shrewdness —

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the extent and minuteness of his knowledge — his marvellous aptitude at reproducing names and dates when he told a story. The retentiveness of his memory, even in respect of trifles, was truly extraordinary. His nephew, John Routh, having had a seventh child born to him in 1851, the president (who had entered on his 97th year) remarked to John Rigaud (fellow of Magdalen), "That was your number." How he came to know the fact — yet more why he should have remembered it — no one present could imagine. Shortly before his death, on being shown in a newspaper an account of himself, in which his age was mentioned, and the persons specified with whom he might have conversed, he exclaimed, "I am described as being a little younger than Pitt. The blockhead, as he knew my age, might have known that I was four or five years older." Side by side, however, with all this quick intelligence, he would ever and anon betray the fact that he belonged to a quite bygone generation; and it was impossible even for those who revered him most not to be merry over the little details which occasionally came out. Thus (June 4th, 1844) he sent the following official note to the Rev. H. P. Guillemard (senior proctor): "Mr. Woodhouse, a gentleman commoner of this college, has my permission to hire a one-horse chaise, if it meets with the approbation of the senior proctor." And in the following October the present dean of St. Paul's (junior proctor) received a similar message: "Mr. Wm. Woodhouse, a gentleman commoner of this college, has my permission, if he obtains the proctor's consent, to make use of a vehicle drawn by one horse." Little did the venerable writer dream of the metamorphosis which awaited the "vehicle" on the other side of Magdalen bridge! . . . Add certain peculiarities of costume and manner, and it will be readily understood that there were many good stories current concerning the dear old president — some of which were true.

I should despair* of exhibiting a scene which I once heard (or rather once saw) John Rigaud describe of an examination at which he assisted in the president's library, — the last which the president ever conducted in person. The book was Homer, of which the youth to be examined was profoundly ignorant. What with the president's deafness and the man's mistakes, R. thought he must have expired. The president had two copies of Homer, one at each side of his chair; and with immense urbanity handed a copy to the youth as he entered. When the man read the Greek the president thought he was construing into English, and vice versâ. "What was that you said, sir?" he would inquire earnestly. The man confessed what he had said. One of the examiners was down upon him in an instant. The president stood up for the victim, on the charitable hypothesis, that "perhaps he had been taught so." The man speedily put it out of all doubt that his method was entirely his own. Thereupon the president construed the passage for him. R. was fain to conceal himself behind the newspaper, and sat in perfect terror lest he should be appealed to, and be compelled to exhibit a face convulsed with merriment.

Dr. Routh was very fond of his dogs. It was his way, when a superfluous bit of bread-and-butter was in his hand at tea-time, to sink back in his chair and at the same instant to drop the morsel to the expectant and eager quadrupeds, which have been known so far to take advantage of his good-nature as fairly to invade his person, in order to get rather more than he had contemplated bestowing. Very mournful was the expression his features assumed if ever Mrs. Routh, in the exercise of a sane discretion, took upon herself to expel the dogs from the apartment. . . . The vice-president once informed him, in the name of the fellows, that they had resolved to enforce the college order, by which it was forbidden to keep dogs in college. "Then, sir," he rejoined, "I suppose I must call mine — cats!" It was a characteristic reply, as well from its drollery as from the indication it afforded of his resolution to stand up for his favorites. His dogs must perforce he permitted to reign undisturbed. At the same time, his respect for authority and concern for the discipline of the college over which he presided would have made him reluctant to violate any rule of the society.

John Rigaud helped him to prepare the single volume of Burnet's work for the press. This brought him constantly into contact with the venerable president, and rendered him so familiar with his manner, that he narrates his sayings to the life. It also introduced him to much of the president's mind on the subject of Burnet, for whom he entertained wondrous little respect. When the bishop speaks of himself, "Here comes P. P., clerk of this parish!" he would say, after ejaculating to himself, "Rogue!" When Burnet was at last finished, he sent a copy, beautifully bound, to the chancellor, and pleased himself with the prospect of receiving an autograph acknowledgment from the great duke, for whom he entertained an ardent admiration. Day after day elapsed, and still no letter; but the president suffered no one to know that he was greatly vexed and disappointed. At last he opened his grief to Dr. Bliss, with the simplicity of a child who has been denied a lawful gratification. The duke's letter, after many days, was discovered lying on a little

* MS. Memoir of the President of Magdalen.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

table by his side. It had been accidentally overlooked.

One of the president's most characteristic stories related to a privilege case, of which I am only able to relate a portion. It exhibited the House of Commons (for which he entertained very little respect) in antagonism to the courts of law. The speaker entered the court, with purpose to overawe the judge in the administration of justice. "I sit here to administer the laws of England," was the solemn dictum of the great legal functionary. "And I will commit you, Mr. Speaker; yes, you, Mr. Speaker; if you had the whole House of Commons in your belly." . . . But no trick of style can convey the least idea of the animation with which these words of defiance were repeated. The president, having brought the speaker into the presence of the judge, grew excited, and his speech at once assumed the dramatic form. At "I sit here," etc., his whole frame underwent emotion: he raised his voice, and fixed his eyes severely on the person before him. At "the laws of England," he struck the table smartly with his extended fingers. The threat to commit the speaker was uttered with immense gusto, and evidently repeated with increased gratification. But the concluding hypothetical defiance was overwhelming. The patriotic narrator chuckled and fell back in his chair, convulsed with merriment at the grotesqueness of the image which the judge had so deliberately evoked.

He delighted in the company of two or three intimate friends at dinner, on Sundays especially; as Dr. Bloxam, and the present president (Dr. Bulley), Dr. Mozley (recently deceased), and John Rigaud, of his own college; or Dr. Bliss (principal of St. Mary's Hall), Philip Duncan of New College, and "Mo Griffiths," of Merton, etc. On such occasions he would be very communicative and entertaining, abounding in anecdote. He always drank the health of his guests all round; once so far deviating from his usual practice as to propose a toast. It was the Sunday after the Duke of Wellington's death; and he gave "the memory of our great and good chancellor, who never erred except when he was overruled." His way was, after giving his cap to the servant, to say grace himself. Before meat: "For what we are about to receive, the LORD be praised!" Very peculiar was the emphasis with which on such occasions he would pronounce the holy name, giving breadth to the "o" till it sounded as if the word "awe" as well as the sentiment was to be found in it; rolling forth the "r" in the manner which was characteristic of him; and pronouncing the last words with a most sonorous enunciation. His manner at such times was to extend his hands towards the viands on the table. After dinner, "For what we have received," as before. . . . J. R. could never forget the solemn emphasis with which he pronounced the word "wrath" in the communion service.

Let me recall the occasion, the pretext rather, on which (Dec. 10th, 1846) I obtained my first interview with Dr. Routh. I had been charged with a book for him, and, having obtained his permission to bring it in person, presented myself at his gate. Moss received my name in a manner which showed me that I was expected. With a beating heart, I followed the man up the old-fashioned staircase — grim old doctors in their wigs and robes, and bearded divines with little books in their hands, and college benefactors innumerable, eyeing me all the way from the walls with terrible severity. My courage at last almost failed me; but retreat was impossible, for by this time we had reached the open door of the library, — a room completely lined with books, the shelves (which were of deal painted white) reaching from the floor to the ceiling; and the president was to be seen at the furthest extremity, his back to the window, with a blazing fire at his left. At the first intimation of my approach, I noticed that he slipped the book that he was reading into the drawer of the little table before him, and hastened to rise and come into the middle of the room to receive me. The refined courtesy, which evidently was doing its best to persuade me not only that I was a welcome visitor but that I found the master of the house entirely disengaged, struck me much. Most of all, however, was I struck by his appearance. He wore such a wig as one only sees in old pictures: cassock, gown, scarf and bands, shorts and buckles. And then how he did stoop! But besides immense intelligence, there was a great deal of suavity as well as dignity in that venerable face. And "You have come to see a decrepid old man, sir!" he said, as he took me by the hand. Something fell from me about my respect, and my having "long coveted this honor." "You are very civil, sir; sit you down." And he placed me in the arm-chair, in which he said he never sat himself.

After a few civilities, he began to congratulate me on my bachelor's gown, pointing to my sleeves. "And you are a fellow of Oriel, sir? A very honorable college to belong to, sir. It has produced many distinguished men. You know, sir, when you marry, or take a living, you can always add to your name, 'late fellow.' I observe, sir, that Dr. Pusey always does so." It was impossible not to smile. My name (he thought) must be of French origin. It soon became painfully evident that he was only talking thus in order to relieve me from the necessity of speaking, in case I should be utterly at a loss for a topic. So, availing myself of a pause after he had enquired after my intended pursuits, I leaned forward (for he was more than slightly deaf) and remarked that perhaps he would allow me to ask him a question. "Eh, sir?" "I thought that perhaps you would allow me to ask you a question about Divinity, sir." He told me to go on. I explained that I desired a few words of counsel, if he would condescend to give me them — some directions as to the best way of pursuing the study which he had

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

himself cultivated with such signal success. Aware that my request was almost as vague as the subject was vast, and full of genuine consideration for the aged oracle, I enlarged for a minute on the matter, chiefly in order to give him time to adjust his thoughts before making reply. He enquired what I had read. "Pearson and Eusebius, carefully." The gravity which by this time his features had assumed was very striking. He lay back in his chair. His head sank forward on his chest, and he looked like one absorbed in thought. "Yes — I think, sir" (said he after a long pause, which, besides raising my curiosity, rather alarmed me by the contrast it presented to his recent animated manner), "I think, sir, were I you, sir — that I would — first of all — read the — the Gospel according to St. Matthew." Here he paused. "And after I had read the Gospel according to St. Matthew — I would — were I you, sir — go on to read — the Gospel according to St. — Mark." I looked at him anxiously to see whether he was serious. One glance was enough. He was giving me (but at a very slow rate) the outline of my future course. "I think, sir, when I had read the Gospel according to St. Mark, I would go on, sir — yes! go on to — to the — the Gospel — according to — St. Luke, sir." (Another pause, as if the reverend speaker were reconsidering the matter.) "Well, sir, and when I had read those three Gospels, sir, were I in your place, I would go on — yes, I would certainly go on to read the Gospel according to St. John."

For an instant I had felt an inclination to laugh. But by this time a very different set of feelings came over me. Here was a theologian of ninety-one, who, after surveying the entire field of sacred science, had come back to the point he had started from; and had nothing better to advise me to read than the Gospel! I believe I was attempting to thank him, but he did not give me time. He recommended me, with much emphasis, to read a portion of the Gospel every day. "And after the Gospel according to St. John," he proceeded: (Now for it, thought I. We are coming to the point at last.) "I would in the next place, sir — I think" (he paused for an instant and then resumed): "Yes, sir, I think I would certainly go on to read the — Acts of the Holy Apostles: a book, sir, which I have not the least doubt — no, it certainly does not admit of a doubt — was the work of St. Luke." I assented. "But what is quite evident, sir, it must needs be a book of altogether apostolic antiquity, indeed of the age it professes to be. For you may have observed that the sacred writer ends by saying that St. Paul dwelt at Rome 'two whole years in his own hired house.' Now sir" (here he tapped my fingers in the way which was customary with him when he desired to enforce attention), "no one but a contemporary would have ended his narrative in that way. We should have had all about St. Paul's martyrdom" (he looked archly at me, and slightly waved his hand), "all about his martyrdom, sir, if the narrative had been subsequent in date to St. Paul's death." I said the remark was new to me, but I saw its truth. He only wanted me to nod. He was already going on; and, not to presume on the reader's patience (for it cannot be a hundredth part as amusing to read the story as it was to witness the scene), after mentioning the seven Catholic epistles, he advised me to read those of St. Paul in the order of Pearson's "Annales Paulini." He spoke of the Revelation, and remarked that Rome is certainly there, whether imperial or papal. Then he referred to Eusebius; to Scaliger's shrewdness about his "Chronicon" and remarked that there is no Arianism apparent in his ecclesiastical history. Next, he advised me to read the seven epistles of Ignatius, which he was convinced were genuine, notwithstanding what Cureton had written; also that of Clement (for the Clement mentioned by St. Paul wrote only one epistle. It had been doubted, but the extracts in Clemens Alexandrinus are no valid evidence against the authenticity of our copies). "Read these, sir, in the edition of my friend Mr. Jacobson." I said I had the book. "Ah, you have, sir? Well, sir, and after the epistles of Ignatius" — I was longing for an opportunity of showing him that I was not plane hospes; so I ventured to say that "I thought I knew which book to read next!" He understood me: smiled pleasantly, and nodded. "You are very civil, sir!" . . . It was time to go. Indeed the fire was so exceedingly hot that I could bear it no longer. My cap, which I had used for a screen, had been smoking for some time, and now curled and cracked. What annoyed me more, if possible, than the fire, was the president's canary, in a cage near his elbow. The wretched creature was quiet till we got upon divinity; but the moment his master mentioned the Gospels, away it went into a paroxysm of song — scream, scream, scream — as if on purpose to make it impossible for me to hear what he said. If ever the president dropped his voice, the bird screamed the louder.

I said I had kept him too long; but wished him to know what a comfort and help his example and witness had been to me. He spoke of Mr. Newman with many words of regret; declared his own entire confidence; assured me that the truth is with us. Before leaving, I asked him for his blessing, which he instantly proceeded to bestow. "No," he exclaimed, "let me stand;" and standing, or rather leaning over me, he spoke the solemn words. As I was leaving the room, he very kindly bade me come and see him again.

A full year elapsed before I ventured to repeat the intrusion. Mrs. Routh met me in the street, and asked me why I did not go to see her "dear man." "I was afraid of being troublesome." "But he tells me that he wishes to see you." So I went. Would that I had preserved a record of what passed! But it was on one such occasion that I ven-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tured to address him somewhat as follows: "Mr. President, give me leave to ask you a question I have sometimes asked of aged persons, but never of any so aged or so learned as yourself." He looked so kindly at me that I thought I might go on. "Every studious man, in the course of a long and thoughtful life, has had occasion to experience the special value of some one axiom or precept. Would you mind giving me the benefit of such a word of advice?" He bade me explain, evidently to gain time. I quoted an instance. He nodded and looked thoughtful. Presently he brightened up, and said, "I think, sir, since you care for the advice of an old man, sir, you will find it a very good practice" (here he looked me in the face) "always to verify your references, sir!" I can better recall the archness of the speaker's manner than his exact words; but they were nearly those.

And this reminds me of another precept of his, which I have many a time acted on with advantage. Of course I never approached him without some excuse or provocation. Once, for example (it must have been in 1848), he had sent me word that "he had a book for me, and would be glad to put it into my hands, if I would do him the favor to call at his lodgings." I think it was on that occasion that I ventured to ask him (I have often been ashamed of the question since) if there was any commentary on Scripture which he particularly approved of, and could recommend. He leaned forward, murmured something to himself (of which all I could catch was a prolonged and thoughtful "No — I don't know, sir," or something to that effect), and so evidently did not wish to make any reply, that I quickly changed the subject; thanking him again for the book he had given me (it was the fifth volume of the "Reliquiæ"), and opening it with unfeigned interest. He took the volume into his hands, and proposed to show me something which he expected I should "find worth my notice." He turned with difficulty to the last page, and drew me towards him. I knelt. "Attend to this, sir;" and he began reading the long note which fills the lower half of page 369. The print was too small for his aged eyes: so I read aloud. I remember his gently tapping my shoulder with the extremities of his fingers when I came to the words, "Et velim animadvertas, decantatos Petri viginti quatuor annos ad episcopatum pertinere universæ ecclesiæ, non unius Romanæ; et junctos cum Lini annis . . . complere tempus inter mortem Christi et martyria apostolorum Petri et Pauli computari solitum."

In the last year but one of his life (1853) he sent me a little tract (his last production!), in which he printed that precious note, with important additions and corrections. It disposes of the pretence that St. Peter was bishop of Rome for twenty-five years, by an appeal to dates furnished by the same ancient catalogue on which we depend for the chronology of the early bishops. . . . When I was going away he offered to send the book after me by his servant. I explained how much rather I would carry away the treasure myself. "You remind me," he said, "of ——," naming some famous person who used to say "he was not ashamed of being seen carrying his tools."

A full year elapsed. Mrs. Routh told me that the president had remarked that I never called. To remove all ground of complaint, I speedily found myself again in the president's library. I was paving the way for some patristic question. He turned to me, and said rather abruptly, "When you have finished, sir, I have something to say to you." I was dumb. "Do you remember, sir, about a year ago asking me to recommend to you some commentary on Scripture?" "Perfectly well; but I am altogether astonished that you should remember my having taken such a liberty." He smiled good-naturedly; remarked, with a slight elevation of his hand, that his memory was not amiss, and then went on somewhat thus: "Well, sir, I have often thought since, that if ever I saw you again I would answer your question." I was delighted, and said so. He went on, "If you will take my advice, sir (an old man, sir! but I think you will find the hint worth your notice), whenever you are at a loss about the sense of a passage in the New Testament, you will ascertain how it is rendered in the Vulgate; the Latin Vulgate, sir. I am not saying" (here he kindled, and eyed me to ascertain whether there was any chance of my misunderstanding him), "not that the Latin of the Vulgate is inspired, sir!" (he tossed his head a little impatiently, and waved his hand). "Nothing of the sort, sir: but you will consider that it is a very faithful and admirable version, executed from the original by a very learned man, — by Jerome, in the fourth century; certainly made therefore from manuscript authority of exceedingly high antiquity; and in consequence entitled to the greatest attention and deference." I have forgotten what he said besides; except that he enlarged on the paramount importance of such a work. It was very pleasant to hear him. He seemed happy, and so was I. Very distinctly, however, do I remember the impression he left on me, that, having fully delivered this testimony, he did not care to prolong that topic of conversation. I remember, in fact, being afraid to ask him to give me just one illustration of his meaning. It is only fair to add that I have since discovered for myself several proofs of the soundness of his advice; and the anecdote is put on record in the hope that other students may profit by it likewise.

The president lived habitually in his library, — the room on the first floor, of which the windows look out on St. John's quadrangle. There, surrounded by his books (a copy of Laud's "Devotions" always lay on his table), he was to be found engaged in study; poring over small print (by the light of a candle), without the aid of glasses, to so late an hour, that

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Mrs. Routh, in the exercise of her conjugal discretion, has been known to insist on taking away his candle. But she found him an unapt pupil. It was commonly past midnight when he went to rest; and he would sometimes sit up till one in the morning, without, however, rising later in consequence next day. When he had occasion to approach his windows, his wig was discoverable from the quadrangle beneath; but during the latest years of his life, being seldom or never able to attend the chapel service, he was scarcely ever seen except by a privileged few. "For a long time" (wrote the provost of Oriel, Dr. Hawkins, shortly after the president's death) "I had been in the habit of visiting him nearly every week when I was in Oxford, and rarely saw him without learning from him something worth the hearing."

He had been all his life a book collector; watching as vigilantly the productions of the Continental press as the home market. "I should esteem it a favor" (he wrote to a bookseller in 1801) "if you could procure either at home or abroad any or all of the undermentioned books, as you mention your extensive foreign correspondence." And then he specifies twenty-five recent foreign publications, the very titles of which recall a remark of Dr. Bliss, that the president's library, though probably one of the most valuable in England, to a superficial observer might have seemed of small account. His habit of reading booksellers' catalogues (to some of which he had access before they were published) enabled him in the course of a long life to form a wonderful collection. Once (he had been speaking of books of criticism on the New Testament), "I do not say it vauntingly" (he remarked), "but there are there" (pointing to a particular part of his library) "two hundred books which are not to be found in the Bodleian." Though unsolicitous about the external attractiveness of his copies, he was at the pains, whenever he sent any to be lettered, to design in capitals the precise formula which he intended to have impressed on each. The result of so discriminating a taste, supported by a sufficient exchequer, may well have been extraordinary. In 1842, up to which time his library had cost him 8,000*l.*, he was in negotiation with Queen's College for its sale to that society. But in 1852 (March 29th), "being desirous that it might serve the purpose of promoting the glory of God through the advancement of good learning, and feeling a deep interest in the recently established University of Durham," he carried out the intention he had in the mean while formed of transferring it (so far as printed books were concerned) by deed of gift to the warden, masters, and scholars of the northern university, and at Durham it is carefully preserved at the present hour; a singular indication of the freshness of spirit which at the age of ninety-seven could thus reach out with friendly sympathy, and something more, to the youngest rival of our ancient universities. It should be added that Dr. Routh was exceedingly liberal in communicating his books and MSS. to scholars.

The manuscript portion of his library fell into his general estate, and was dispersed in 1855. It abounded in curiosities, — patristic, theological, antiquarian, historical. Thus, it contained the original autograph of Bishop Beveridge on the XXXIX. Articles, from which the Oxford edition was published in 1840. At one time the president had been possessed of a collection of documentary annals of the Society of Friends, the first volume of the records of the Oxfordshire Quarterly Meeting of the Quakers, from the establishment of their society to the year 1746. This volume had long been missing, and till 1828 had been sought in vain. Having ascertained that it was in the possession of the president, two of their body waited on him. The account "they have given of their interview with Dr. Routh" (so runs the Quaker minute) "has been very satisfactory. It appears that the gratification he has derived from the perusal of the volume (which from its instructive tendency he considers creditable to the society) had induced a wish to retain it. Notwithstanding, he obligingly offered to relinquish it, from the respect which he felt for the society, and a willingness to render complete those records which ought to be in the possession of the meeting. As he wished to transfer it through the medium of some friends appointed by the body, William Albright, Daniel Rutter, and John Huntley are directed to wait on him for that purpose." In "grateful acknowledgment of his kind and liberal conduct," the Quakers presented him with "a few volumes of our Friends' writings, both ancient and modern," the names of which follow.

The president wanted (or thought he wanted) no assistance in finding his books; and to the last would mount his library steps in quest of the occupants of the loftier shelves. Very curious he looked, by the way, perched up at that unusual altitude, apparently as engrossed in what he

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

had found as if he had been reclining in his chair. Instead of ringing for Moss, his servant, he would also on occasion help himself to a folio as readily as to a smaller tome. Once (it was in February 1847) a very big book, which he had pulled out unaided, proved "too many" for him, and grazed his shin. The surgeon (Mr. Lewes Parker, who repeated the story) advised him to go to bed at once. "No, thank you, sir" (laughing); "no thank you! If you once get me to bed, I know you will never get me up again." "Then, sir, you must really rest your leg on a chair." This was promised; and a sofa, unknown before in his rooms, was introduced. Two days after, the doctor reappeared, outstripped Moss, and, coming quickly in, found his patient moving about the library steps. "O sir" (scarcely able to command his gravity), "this will never do. You know you promised ——" "Yes, yes, I know, sir" (laughing); "a little more, sir, and I should have been in the right position." . . . The injury might have proved dangerous, and it did occasion the president serious inconvenience for a long time. A friend called to condole. The old man, after describing the accident minutely, added very gravely in a confidential voice, "A worthless volume, sir! a worthless volume!" This it evidently was which weighed on his spirits. Had it been Augustine or Chrysostom, — patience! But to be lamed by a book written by a dunce. . . . His leg, however, was one of his weak spots; the organs which are most affected by catarrhous colds (to which he was subject, and from which he suffered severely) being the other. In his old age he told Dr. Jackson that once (he must then have been about sixty) having walked up to Islip on one side of the Cherwell, and returned on the other, when at Marston he heard Magdalen bells begin to strike up for afternoon chapel. Disliking to be absent, he started off "at a trot," and arrived only just in time. In chapel he felt something trickling down his leg; and on coming out, found his stocking and shoe saturated with blood. He had burst a varicose vein, which always troubled him afterwards. In fact, the consequences of that "trot" from Marston occasioned him inconvenience to the last.

It was in 1848, when he was ninety-three years of age, that he published a fifth and last volume of his "Reliquiæ," — just sixty years after the issuing of the original prospectus of the work. He had already printed, in two appendices at the close of his fourth volume, several pieces which do not strictly fall under the same category as the "Reliquiæ" proper; and he had only excluded the disputation held (A.D. 277) between Archelaus, bishop of Mesopotamia, and the heretic Manes, because of its bulk. (It extends over two hundred octavo pages.) The publication of this remarkable monument is found to have been part of the president's original design in 1788. He styles this fifth volume, "Appendix iii.," into which, besides the "Disputation" already mentioned (first published in 1698), he introduces two tracts, one by Augustine, the other by an unknown writer, together with the creed of Aquileia. But the most interesting feature unquestionably in this concluding volume is the Catena, with which it concludes. He calls it "Testimonia de auctoritate S. Scripturæ ante-Nicæna" and prefixes a "Monitum," which may be thus freely rendered: —

> According to some of our recent writers (followers themselves of a teaching alien to that of our own communion), the primitive Church did not hold that the Christian Faith is based on Holy Scripture, or that the Scriptures are to be regarded as the Rule of Faith. How entirely the truth lies the other way may be easily shown by an appeal to ecclesiastical documents of the earliest ages. For the effectual refutation therefore of an opinion which in itself is fraught with perilous consequence, behold, thou hast here a collection of testimonies to the authority of Holy Scripture, gleaned out of the writings of primitive Christendom, and disposed in long and orderly series.

Accordingly, collected from thirty-one several sources, beginning with St. Peter (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16), St. Paul (1 Cor. xiv. 37, 38), St. John (xiv. 26), Clemens Romanus (c. xlvii.), and ending with Eusebius, about seventy-four important quotations follow. The same volume, by the way, supplies (at p. 251) another interesting illustration of the president's favorite and truly Anglican method, namely, an appeal to primitive antiquity on the subject of the invocation of saints.

Even this, however, was not the president's latest literary effort. When Lord Derby became chancellor of the university in 1853, it seemed to him a fitting occasion for producing a strena (so he phrased it), or auspicious offering; and there were three distinct subjects on which he had thought much, and collected something important, which, carefully edited, he foresaw would constitute an interesting pamphlet. This little work, extending to

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

twenty-five pages, appeared in the beginning of December, 1853. He was then in his ninety-ninth year. He called it "Tres breves Tractatus:" the first, "De primis episcopis;" the second, "S. Petri Alexandrini episcopi fragmenta quædam;" the third, "S. Irenæi illustrata ῥῆσις, in qua ecclesia Romana commemoratur." They are introduced by the following brief notice:—

Inasmuch as there is perpetual discussion among us at the present day concerning Apostolic Succession, Episcopal Ordination, and the authority of the Church of Rome, I judged that I should be rendering useful service if I produced in a separate shape whatever remarks on these subjects I had already put forth in the Annotations to my "Reliquiæ Sacræ." The object I had in view in thus amplifying and adding to my old materials was to illustrate how these several matters were accounted for in the beginning, in order that thus the truth might be the more firmly established. Farewell.

After which follows the president's note on the council against Noëtus,* as enlarged by himself on two subsequent occasions, and now amplified and added to until it attains to more than twice its original bulk. Next come four fragments from the lost work of Peter Alex. "De Paschate;" and these are followed by a restoration of the original text of a passage of Irenæus, of which the true sense is learnedly fixed, and shown not to support those pretensions which writers of the Romish communion have been apt to build upon it.

It was remarked by many how freely during the last year or two of his life the president alluded to his own end; speaking of his approaching departure as one might speak of a journey which had long been in contemplation, and which must needs be undertaken very soon. Among his papers were found two rough drafts of his own intended epitaph, which may perhaps be thus exhibited:—

O all ye who come here, in your Christian and charitable hope, wish peace and felicity, and a consummation of it afterwards, to the soul of Martin Joseph Routh, the last rector of the undivided parish of Tylehurst, and brother of the pious foundress of this church. He departed this life , aged ; dying, as he had lived, attached to the Catholic Faith taught in the Church of England, and averse from all Papal and Sectarian innovations.

But it should be stated that the writer had evidently found it impossible to satisfy himself with the opening sentence. At first he wrote, "Of your charity and trust to God's mercy, wish peace and increase of bliss at Christ's coming;" and though he ran his pen through those words, he was loth to part with that sentiment. "Of your charity which hopeth the best, wish peace and final felicity," presented itself as an alternative. Then, "Of your charity" began to sound questionable. "In your Christian charity" seemed better; but this had given way to "charitable hope," when the pious writer seems to have been reminded of the impossibility of elaborating a sentence by processes like these. There perhaps never lived a scholar who found it more difficult to satisfy himself than Dr. Routh. A third and a fourth draft of the above inscription has been discovered. The fastidiousness of his taste in such matters was altogether extraordinary. It should be added that his inscriptions (and he wrote many) are for the most part singularly original and felicitous. They well deserve to be collected.

But a document of a more important description than the president's epitaph remained unfinished forever. He had postponed to the last month of the last year of his life the business of making a will; and inasmuch as the draft (prepared from instructions furnished a few days previous) was only sent to Dr. Ogilvie for signature on the twentieth, the will was perforce never signed at all. He repeatedly asked for "pen and ink" when it was too late. Such an anecdote is better than a homily. It is believed that at an earlier period he had made a will which he subsequently cancelled.

Very characteristic of the man is another incident, which for more reasons than one deserves to find here a record, and which also belongs to the last year, indeed to the last months, of his life. About the year 1851 he had had several conversations with Dr. Ogilvie (professor of pastoral theology and canon of Christ Church) respecting the doctrine of the holy eucharist: repeatedly formulating the result of his meditations — "meditations to which he had been led by views lately put forth in some quarters, but, according to his sound judgment and well-ordered affections, utterly irreconcilable with Holy Scripture or the sentence of antiquity." The desire to give expression to his own settled convictions on this great subject increased as he drew nearer to his end. In May and June 1854, "on account of the existing

* Reliqq., iv. 247, see p. 526, and v. 369.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

differences about the Eucharist" (so he phrased it), the president again and again put into Dr. Ogilvie's hands a short written statement, accompanied with the remark that it "is in all humility offered, as a strictly Scriptural exposition." The following bears date "June 5, 1854:" — "The bread broken and the wine poured out, symbols in the Eucharist of the body and blood of Christ, impart to the recipient, through his faith in the sacrifice on the cross, life spiritual, — the abidance of himself in Christ and of Christ in him. Our Saviour, interpreting his own words [or explaining his precept of eating his flesh and drinking his blood], saith, 'My words are Spirit and Life.'" . . . Dr. Routh told his friend that this statement of his belief was the one on which his mind at last rested.

His earthly span was brought to a close at half-past seven on the evening of Friday, Dec. 22, 1854. For several days he had been fully conscious that his end was approaching: and on the previous Sunday, though ill and weak, had left orders that the provost of Oriel (Dr. Hawkins) should be admitted if he called; explaining that he had done so, "Because I thought perhaps I might never see you again." On the Tuesday he revived, spoke with animation and cheerfulness, sometimes with more than his usual felicity of expression. "Richard Heber" (he said), "collected more books than any other person; he had four libraries, one at his own place, Hodnet, another at Paris, another at Brussels, another at Amsterdam. His library at Hodnet sold for 53,000*l.*; and his Paris library was very good. I have the catalogue, sir, in my room. 'Mr. Heber,' said Porson to him, with his usual caustic humor, 'you have collected a great many books: pray when do you mean to begin to read them?' But the present dean of Christ Church, sir, a great authority, told me that he never asked Mr. Heber about a book without finding him well acquainted with it.' Thus, even in respect of a trifling matter, the speaker's nature became apparent. Dr. Hawkins (from whom we are quoting) remarks on what goes before: —

> Though he enjoyed a joke, he was supremely anxious that whatever he said should be true. The very accuracy and retentiveness of his memory had probably been assisted by this constant anxiety for truth. And in his later years, when it was not quite so ready and alert as formerly, it was curious to observe the working of his mind, intent to gather up again any fading recollections, and not permitting you to assist him, but recalling his thoughts, and regaining any lost clue himself.
>
> For some time past [proceeds Dr. Hawkins] he had rather lain on his chair than sat upon it, and on this occasion, in order to support himself, he grasped one arm of the chair with his right hand; with his left, stretched over the other arm, touching or clasping mine. He said emphatically that he was "ready." On my observing that a very long life had been assigned him with very little illness and many sources of happiness, — "Yes," he said, he was deeply grateful. "Sir, I believe everything is ordered for the best. Do not you believe that, sir?"

Later in the day, Dr. Cotton, provost of Worcester, visited him: "You are come, sir," said the president, "to one that is going." He conversed cheerfully with Dr. Acland next morning (Wednesday); regretted that the new museum was to be placed in the parks; and remarked, "We are said to have the air in the parks from the Highlands of Scotland. I do not know whether this is correct, sir; I think the hills in Westmoreland must intervene; but I have not inquired into the fact." To his physician: "I will do what you desire, sir; take anything you please; but I know that it is useless. I shall go to-morrow." He went to his bed reluctantly on that same night (Wednesday, 20th) for the last time.

He used to sleep in the "Founder's Chamber," — "King Charles's room," as he himself called it, — an ancient apartment over the college gateway, in which no less than seven royal personages have been entertained. On Friday he was clearly sinking; but at 2. 30 P. M. he spoke a little, and was quite sensible. He expressed a wish to see Dr. Ogilvie, — who, as he knew, had his unsigned will in his keeping, — "to-morrow;" a to-morrow he was destined never to see. It was plain to Dr. Jackson, who attended him, that the time for transacting business of any kind was past. "The president" (he wrote to Dr. Bliss) "is as ill as he can be to be alive." In the evening, when Esther Druce, his faithful old servant, was standing at the foot of his bed, — "Now, Esther, I seem better." He crossed his hands and closed his eyes. She heard him repeat the Lord's prayer softly to himself. Presently she proposed to give him some port wine, as the doctor had recommended. He drank it; feebly took her hand, thanked her for all her attention to him, and remarked that he had been "a great deal of trouble;" adding that he had made some provision for her. His leg occasioned him pain. "Let me make

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

you a little more comfortable," said the poor woman, intending to change the dressing. "Don't trouble yourself," he replied. Those were the last words he spoke. Folding his arms across his breast, he became silent. It was his Nunc dimittis. He heaved two short sighs and all was over. . . . "I have just seen him," wrote Dr. Jackson. "He lay perfectly placid, with his arms crossed just one over the other, as if asleep. May my end be like his at a much less advanced age!"

It has been decided [wrote his nephew to Dr. Bliss on the 24th] in consequence of the strong desire expressed on the subject by members of the college, to bury my dear uncle within the walls. We have had much difficulty in coming to this decision; for, as you may be aware, he gave precise directions for his burial at Theale. We have done so only on the ground that in matters relating to himself (the taking his portrait, for instance) he has uniformly given way to the wishes of the society he presided over; and it is reasonable to suppose that if any representation of the feeling of the college in this respect could have been made to him during his life, he would have conceded the point.

In the beautiful chapel of the society over which he presided for sixty-three years, Dr. Routh was accordingly buried on the Friday after his decease; being followed to the grave by a vast concourse of persons, including the principal members of the university, the fellows and demies of his own college, and a troop of friends. The funeral cortége filled two sides of the cloisters. "It was the most touching and impressive scene, I think, that I ever witnessed," wrote one of the fellows a few days after. But the weather was intensely cold, — the wind blowing strong and bitter from the north-east, as Bodley's librarian remarked in a letter to a friend. Not a note of the organ was heard; the whole body of the choir chanting the Psalms without music. The open grave was immediately in front of the altar; and on the coffin was recorded the rare circumstance that its occupant was in his hundredth year.

He sleeps before the altar, where the shade
He loved will guard his slumbers night and day;
And tuneful voices o'er him, like a dirge,
Will float for everlasting. Fitting close
For such a life! His twelve long sunny hours
Bright to the edge of darkness: then the calm
Repose of twilight, and a crown of stars.

[Published by arrangement with HARPER & BROTHERS.]

MACLEOD OF DARE.

BY WILLIAM BLACK.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE NEW TRAGEDY.

HIS generous, large nature fought hard to find excuses for her. He strove to convince himself that this strange coldness, this evasion, this half-repellent attitude, was but a form of maiden coyness. It was her natural fear of so great a change. It was the result, perhaps, of some last lingering look back to the scene of her artistic triumphs. It did not even occur to him as a possibility that this woman, with her unstable sympathies and her fatally facile imagination, should have taken up what was now the very end and aim of his life, and have played with the pretty dream until she grew tired of the toy, and was ready to let her wandering fancy turn to something other and new.

He dared not even think of that; but all the same, as he stood at this open window alone, an unknown fear had come over him. It was a fear altogether vague and undefined; but it seemed to have the power of darkening the daylight around him. Here was the very picture he had so often desired that she should see — the wind-swept Atlantic, the glad blue skies with their drifting clouds of summer white, the Erisgeir rocks, the green shores of Ulva, and Colonsay and Gometra and Staffa all shining in the sunlight; with the sea-birds calling, and the waves breaking, and the soft west wind stiring the fuchsia bushes below the windows of Castle Dare. And it was all dark now; and the sea was a lonely thing — more lonely than ever it had been even during that long winter that he had said was like a grave.

And she? — at this moment she was down at the small bridge that crossed the burn. She had gone out to seek her father; had found him coming up through the larch wood; and was now accompanying him back. They had rested here; he sitting on the weather-worn parapet of the bridge; she leaning over it, and idly dropping bits of velvet-green moss into the whirl of clear brown water below.

"I suppose we must be thinking of getting away from Castle Dare, Gerty," said he.

"I shall not be sorry," she answered.

But even Mr. White was somewhat

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

taken aback by the cool promptitude of this reply.

"Well, you know your own business best," he said to her. "It is not for me to interfere. I said from the beginning I would not interfere. But still, I wish you would be a little more explicit, Gerty, and let one understand what you mean — whether, in fact, you do mean, or do not mean, to marry Macleod."

"And who said that I proposed not to marry him?" said she, but she still leaned over the rough stones and looked at the water. "The first thing that would make me decline would be the driving me into a corner — the continual goading, and reminding me of the duty I had to perform. There has been just a little too much of that here" — and at this point she raised herself so that she could regard her father when she wished — "and I really must say that I do not like to be taking a holiday with the feeling hanging over you that certain things are expected of you every other moment, and that you run the risk of being considered a very heartless and ungrateful person unless you do and say certain things you would perhaps rather not do and say. I should like to be let alone. I hate being goaded. And I certainly did not expect that you too, papa, would try to drive me into a corner."

She spoke with some little warmth. Mr. White smiled.

"I was quite unaware, Gerty," said he, "that you were suffering this fearful persecution."

"You may laugh, but it is true," said she, and there was a trifle of color in her cheeks. "The serious interests I am supposed to be concerned about! Such profound topics of conversation! Will the steamer come by the south to-morrow, or round by the north? The Gometra men have had a good take of lobsters yesterday. Will the head-man at the something lighthouse be transferred to some other lighthouse; and how will his wife and family like the change? They are doing very well with the subscription for a bell for the Free Church at Iona. The deer have been down at John Maclean's barley again. Would I like to visit the weaver at Iona who has such a wonderful turn for mathematics, and would I like to know the man at Salen who has the biographies of all the great men of the time in his head?"

Miss White had worked herself up to a pretty pitch of contemptuous indignation; her father was almost beginning to believe that it was real.

"It is all very well for the Macleods to interest themselves with these trumpery little local matters. They play the part of grand patron; the people are proud to honor them; it is a condescension when they remember the name of the crofter's youngest boy. But as for me — when I am taken about — well, I do not like being stared at as if they thought I was wearing too fine clothes. I don't like being continually placed in a position of inferiority through my ignorance — an old fool of a boatman saying, 'Bless me!' when I have to admit that I don't know the difference between a sole and a flounder. I don't want to know. I don't want to be continually told. I wish these people would meet me on my own ground. I wish the Macleods would begin to talk after dinner about the lord chamberlain's interference with the politics of burlesques; and then perhaps they would not be so glib. I am tired of hearing about John Maclean's boat, and Donald Maclean's horse, and Sandy Maclean's refusal to pay the road tax. And as for the drinking of whiskey that these sailors get through — well, it seems to me that the ordinary condition of things is reversed here altogether, and if they ever put up an asylum in Mull, it will be a lunatic asylum for incurable abstainers."

"Now, now, Gerty," said her father; but all the same he rather liked to see his daughter get on her high horse, for she talked with spirit, and it amused him. "You must remember that Macleod looks on this as a holiday time, and perhaps he may be a little lax in his regulations. I have no doubt it is because he is so proud to have you on board his yacht that he occasionally gives the men an extra glass; and I am sure it does them no harm, for they seem to me to be as much in the water as out of it."

She paid no heed to this protest. She was determined to give free speech to her sense of wrong, and humiliation, and disappointment.

"What has been the great event since ever we came here — the wildest excitement the island can afford?" she said. "The arrival of the peddler! A snuffy old man comes into the room with a huge bundle wrapped up in dirty water-proof. Then there is a wild clatter of Gaelic. But suddenly, don't you know? there are one or two glances at me, and the Gaelic stops; and Duncan, or John, or whatever they call him, begins to stammer in English, and I am shown coarse stockings, and bundles of wool, and drugget petti-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

coats, and cotton handkerchiefs. And then Miss Macleod buys a number of things which I know she does not want; and I am looked on as a strange creature because I do not purchase a bundle of wool or a pair of stockings fit for a farmer. The Autolycus of Mull is not impressive, pappy. Oh, but I forgot the dramatic surprise — that also was to be an event, I have no doubt. I was suddenly introduced to a child dressed in a kilt; and I was to speak to him; and I suppose I was to be profoundly moved when I heard him speak to me in my own tongue in this out-of-the-world place. My own tongue! The horrid little wretch has not an h."

"Well, there's no pleasing you, Gerty," said he.

"I don't want to be pleased; I want to be let alone," said she.

But she said this with just a little too much sharpness; for her father was, after all, a human being; and it did seem to him to be too bad that he should be taunted in this fashion, when he had done his best to preserve a wholly neutral attitude.

"Let me tell you this, madam," said he, in a playful manner, but with some decision in his tone, "that you may live to have the pride taken out of you. You have had a good deal of flattery and spoiling; and you may find out you have been expecting too much. As for these Macleods here, I will say this — although I came here very much against my own inclination — that I defy any one to have been more kind, and courteous, and attentive than they have been to you. I don't care. It is not my business, as I tell you. But I must say, Gerty, that when you make a string of complaints as the only return for all their hospitality — their excessive and almost burdensome hospitality — I think that even I am bound to say a word. You forget how you come here. You, a perfect stranger, come here as engaged to marry the old lady's only son — to dispossess her — very probably to make impossible a match that she had set her heart on. And both she and her niece — you understand what I mean — instead of being cold, or at least formal to you, seem to me to think of nothing from morning till night but how to surround you with kindness, in a way that Englishwomen would never think of. And this you call persecution; and you are vexed with them because they won't talk to you about theatres — why, bless my soul, how long is it since you were yourself talking about theatres as if the very word choked you!"

"Well, at least, pappy, I never thought you would turn against me," said she, as she put her head partly aside, and made a mouth as if she were about to cry; "and when mamma made you promise to look after Carry and me, I am sure she never thought ——"

Now this was too much for Mr. White. In the small eyes behind the big gold spectacles there was a quick flash of fire.

"Don't be a fool, Gerty," said he, in downright anger. "You know it is no use your trying to humbug me. If you think the ways of this house are too poor and mean for your grand notions of state; if you think he has not enough money, and you are not likely to have fine dinners and entertainments for your friends; if you are determined to break off the match — why, then, do it; but, I tell you, don't try to humbug me."

Miss White's pathetic attitude suddenly vanished. She drew herself up with much dignity and composure, and said, —

"At all events, sir, I have been taught my duty to you; and I think it better not to answer you."

With that she moved off toward the house; and Mr. White, taking to whistling, began to do as she had been doing — idly throwing bits of moss into the rushing burn. After all, it was none of his business.

But that evening, some little time before dinner, it was proposed they should go for a stroll down to the shore; and then it was that Miss White thought she would seize the occasion to let Macleod know of her arrangements for the coming autumn and winter. Ordinarily, on such excursions, she managed to walk with Janet Macleod — the old lady of Castle Dare seldom joined them — leaving Macleod to follow with her father; but this time she so managed it that Macleod and she left the house together. Was he greatly overjoyed? There was a constrained and anxious look on his face that had been there too much of late.

"I suppose Oscar is more at home here than in Bury Street, St. James's?" said she, as the handsome collie went down the path before them.

"No doubt," said he absently: he was not thinking of any collie.

"What beautiful weather we are having!" said she, to this silent companion. "It is always changing, but always beautiful. There is only one other aspect I should like to see — the snow-time."

"We have not much snow here," said he. "It seldom lies in the winter."

This was a strange conversation for two

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

engaged lovers: it was not much more interesting than their talk — how many ages ago? — at Charing Cross station. But then, when she had said to him, "Ought we to take tickets?" she had looked into his face with those appealing, innocent, beautiful eyes. Now her eyes never met his. She was afraid.

She managed to lead up to her announcement skilfully enough. By the time they reached the shore an extraordinarily beautiful sunset was shining over the sea and the land — something so bewildering and wonderful that they all four stopped to look at it. The Atlantic was a broad expanse of the palest and most brilliant green, with the pathway of the sun a flashing line of gold coming right across until it met the rocks, and these were a jet-black against the glow. Then the distant islands of Colonsay, and Staffa, and Lunga, and Fladda, lying on this shining green sea, appeared to be of a perfectly transparent bronze; while nearer at hand the long ranges of cliffs were becoming a pale rose red under the darkening blue-gray sky. It was a blaze of color such as she had never even dreamed of as being possible in nature; nothing she had as yet seen in these northern latitudes had at all approached it. And as she stood there, and looked at those transparent islands of bronze on the green sea, she said to him, —

"Do you know, Keith, this is not at all like the place I had imagined as the scene of the gloomy stories you used to tell me about the revenges of the clans. I have been frightened once or twice since I came here, no doubt — by the wild sea and the darkness of the cathedral, and so forth; but the longer I stay, the less I see to suggest those awful stories. How could you associate such an evening as this with a frightful tragedy? Do you think those people ever existed who were supposed to have suffocated, or slaughtered, or starved to death any one who opposed their wishes?"

"And I do not suppose they troubled themselves much about fine sunsets," said he. "That was not what they had to think about in those days."

"Perhaps not," said she lightly; "but, you know, I had expected to find a place from which I could gain some inspiration for tragedy; for I should like to try, once for all — if I should have to give up the stage — whether I had the stuff of a tragic actress in me. And you know, in that case, I ought to dress in black velvet, and carry a taper through dungeons, and get accustomed to storms and gloom, and thunder and lightning."

"We have no appliances here for the education of an actress — I am very sorry," said he.

"Now, Keith, that is hardly fair," said she, with a smile. "You know it is only a trial. And you saw what they said of my Juliet. Oh, did I tell you about the new tragedy that is coming out?"

"No, I do not think you did," said he.

"Ah, well, it is a great secret as yet; but there is no reason why you should not hear of it."

"I am not anxious to hear of it," said he, without any rudeness.

"But it concerns me," she said, "and so I must tell you. It is written by a brother of Mr. Lemuel, the artist I have often spoken to you about. He is by profession an architect; but if this play should turn out to be as fine as some people say it is, he ought to take to dramatic writing. In fact, all the Lemuels (there are three brothers of them, you know) are like Michael Angelo and Leonardo, artists to the finger-tips, in every direction — poets, painters, sculptors, and all the rest of it. And I do think I ought to feel flattered by their choice in asking me to play the heroine; for so much depends on the choice of the actress ——"

"And you are still to act?" said he quickly, though he spoke in a low voice, so that those behind should not hear.

"Surely I explained to you?" said she, in a pleasant manner. "After all, life-long habits are not so easily cast aside; and I knew you would be generous, and bear with me a little bit, Keith."

He turned to her. The glow of the sunset caught his face. There was a strange, hopeless sadness in his eyes.

"Generous to you?" said he. "You know I would give you my life if that would serve you. But this is worse than taking my life from me."

"Keith! Keith!" said she, in gentle protest, "I don't know what you mean. You should not take things so seriously. What is it, after all? It was as an actress that you knew me first. What is the difference of a few months more or less? If I had not been an actress, you would never have known me — do you recollect that? By-the-way, has Major Stuart's wife got a piano?"

He turned and stared at her for a second, in a bewildered way.

"Oh yes," said he, with a laugh, "Mrs. Stuart has got a piano. She has got a very good piano. And what is the song you

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

would sing now, sweetheart? Shall we finish up and have done with it, with a song at the end? That is the way in the theatre, you know — a dance and a song as the people go. And what shall our song be now? There was one that Norman Ogilvie used to sing."

"I don't know why you should talk to me like that, Keith," said she, though she seemed somewhat frightened by this fierce gayety. "I was going to tell you that, if Mrs. Stuart had a piano, I would very gladly sing one or two songs for your mother and Miss Macleod when we went over there to-morrow. You have frequently asked me. Indeed, I have brought with me the very songs I sung to you the first time I saw you — at Mrs. Ross's."

Instantly his memory flew back to that day — to the hushed little room over the sunlit gardens, to the beautiful, gentle, sensitive girl who seemed to have so strange an interest in the Highlands, to the wonderful thrill that went through him when she began to sing with an exquisite pathos "A wee bird cam' to our ha' door," and to the prouder enthusiasm that stirred him when she sang "I'll to Lochiel, and Appin, and kneel to them." These were fine, and tender, and proud songs. There was no gloom about them — nothing about a grave, and the dark winter-time, and a faithless lost love. This song of Norman Ogilvie's that he had gayly proposed they should sing now? What had Major Stuart, or his wife, or any one in Mull to do with "Death's black wine"?

"I meant to tell you, Keith," said she, somewhat nervously, "that I had signed an engagement to remain at the Piccadilly Theatre till Christmas next. I knew you wouldn't mind — I mean, you would be considerate, and you would understand how difficult it is for one to break away all at once from one's old associations. And then, you know, Keith," said she shyly, "though you may not like the theatre, you ought to be proud of my success, as even my friends and acquaintances are. And as they are all anxious to see me make another appearance in tragedy, I really should like to try it; so that when my portrait appears in the Academy next year, people may not be saying, 'Look at the impertinence of that girl appearing as a tragic actress, when she can do nothing beyond the familiar modern comedy!' I should have told you all about it before, Keith, but I know you hate to hear any talk about the theatre; and I sha'n't bore you again, you may depend on that. Isn't it time to go back now? See! the rose-color is away from Ulva now; it is quite a dark purple."

He turned in silence and led the way back. Behind them he could faintly hear Mr. White discoursing to Janet Macleod about the manner in which the old artists mixed their own pigments.

Then Macleod said, with a great gentleness and restraint, —

"And when you go away from here, Gertrude, I suppose I must say good-by to you; and no one knows when we shall see each other again. You are returning to the theatre. If that is your wish, I would not try to thwart it. You know best what is the highest prize the world can give you. And how can I warn you against failure and disappointment? I know you will be successful. I know the people will applaud you, and your head will be filled with their praises. You are going forward to a new triumph, Gerty; and the first step you will take — will be on my heart."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

AN UNDERSTANDING.

"PAPPY dear," said Miss White to her father, in a playful way, although it was a serious sort of playfulness, "I have a vague feeling that there is a little too much electricity in the atmosphere of this place just at present. I am afraid there may be an explosion, and you know my nerves can't stand much of a shock. I should be glad to get away."

By this time she had quite made up that little difference with her father — she did not choose to be left alone at a somewhat awkward crisis. She had told him she was sure he had not meant what he said about her; and she had expressed her sorrow for having provoked him; and there an end. And if Mr. White had been driven by his anger to be for the moment the ally of Macleod, he was not disinclined to take the other side now and let Miss White have her own will. The vast amount of training he had bestowed on her through many long years was not to be thrown away, after all.

"I told him last night," said she, "of my having signed an engagement till Christmas next."

"Oh, indeed," said her father quickly, looking at her over his spectacles.

"Yes," said she thoughtfully, "and he was not so disturbed or angry as I had expected. Not at all. He was very kind about it. But I don't understand him."

"What do you not understand?"

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"He has grown so strange of late — so sombre. Once, you know, he was the lightest-hearted young man — enjoying every minute of his life, you know; and really, pappy, I think ——"

And here Miss White stopped.

"At all events," said she, quickly, "I want to be in a less dangerously excited atmosphere, where I can sit down and consider matters calmly. It was much better when he and I corresponded; then we could fairly learn what each other thought. Now I am almost afraid of him — I mean, I am afraid to ask him a question. I have to keep out of his way. And if it comes to that, pappy, you know, I feel now as if I was called on to act a part from morning till night, whereas I was always assured that if I left the stage and married him, it was to be my natural self, and I should have no more need to pose and sham. However, that is an old quarrel between you and me, pappy, and we will put it aside. What's more to the purpose is this — it was half understood that when we left Castle Dare he was to come with us through at least a part of the Highlands."

"There was a talk of it."

"Don't you think," said Miss White, with some little hesitation, and with her eyes cast down — "don't you think that would be — a little inconvenient?"

"I should say that was for you to decide," he answered, somewhat coldly; for it was too bad that she should be continually asking his advice and then openly disregarding it.

"I should think it would be a little uncomfortable," she said demurely. "I fancy he has taken that engagement till Christmas a little more to heart than he chooses to reveal. That is natural; I knew it would be a disappointment; but then, you know, pappy, the temptation was very great, and I had almost promised the Lemuels to do what I could for the piece. And if I am to give up the stage, wouldn't it be fine to wind up with a blaze of fireworks to astonish the public?"

"Are you so certain you will astonish the public?" her father said.

"I have the courage to try," she answered, readily. "And you are not going to throw cold water on my endeavors, are you, pappy? Well, as I was saying, it is perhaps natural for Sir Keith Macleod to feel a bit annoyed; and I am afraid, if he went travelling with us, we should be continually skating on the edge of a quarrel. Besides, to tell you the truth, pappy, with all his kindness and gentleness, there is sometimes about him a sort of intensity that I scarcely like; it makes me afraid of him. If it were on the stage, I should say it was a splendid piece of acting — of the suppressed vehement kind, you know; but really, during a holiday time, when one naturally wishes to enjoy the fine weather and gather strength for one's work — well, I do think he ought not to come with us, pappy."

"Very well, you can hint as much without being rude."

"I was thinking," said she, "of the Mr. and Mrs. Baldwin who were in that Newcastle company, and who went to Aberdeen. Do you remember them, pappy?"

"The low comedian, you mean?"

"Yes. Well, at all events, they would be glad to see us. And so — don't you think? — we could let Macleod understand that we were going to see some friends in the north? Then he would not think of coming with us."

"The representation would scarcely be justifiable," observed Mr. White, with a profound air, "in ordinary circumstances. But, as you say, it would be neither for his comfort nor for yours that he should go with us."

"Comfort!" she exclaimed. "Much comfort I have had since I came here! Comfort I call quiet, and being let alone. Another fortnight in this place would give me brain fever: your life continually in danger either on the sea or by the cliffs; your feelings supposed to be always up at passion pitch — it is all a whirl of secret or declared emotions that don't give you a moment's rest. Oh, pappy, won't it be nice to have a day or two's quiet in our own home, with Carry and Marie! And you know Mr. Lemuel will be in town all the summer and winter. The material for his work he finds within himself. He doesn't need to scamper off like the rest of them to hunt out picturesque peasants and studies of waterfalls — trotting about the country with a note-book in hand ——"

"Gerty, Gerty," said her father, with a smile, "your notions are unformed on that subject. What have I told you often? — that the artist is only a reporter. Whether he uses the pencil, or the pen, or his own face and voice to express the highest thoughts and emotions of which he is conscious, he is only a reporter — a penny-a-liner whose words are written in fire. And you — don't you carry your note-book too?"

"I was not comparing myself with an artist like Mr. Lemuel, pappy. No, no. Of course I have to keep my eyes open,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY and pick up things that may be useful. His work is the work of intense spiritual contemplation — it is inspiration ——"

"No doubt," the father said, "the inspiration of Botticelli."

"Papa!"

Mr. White chuckled to himself. He was not given to joking: an epigram was not in consonance with his high sententiousness. But instantly he resumed his solemn deportment.

"A picture is as much a part of the world as a human face: why should I not take my inspiration from a picture as well as from a human face?"

"You mean to say he is only a copyist — a plagiarist!" she said, with some indignation.

"Not at all," said he. "All artists have their methods founded more or less on the methods of those who have gone before them. You don't expect an artist to discover for himself an entirely new principle of art, any more than you expect him to paint in pigments of his own invention. Mr. Lemuel has been a diligent student of Botticelli — that is all."

This strange talk amid the awful loneliness and grandeur of Glen Sloich! They were idly walking along the rough road: far above them rose the giant slopes of the mountains retreating into heavy masses of cloud that were moved by the currents of the morning wind. It was a gray day; and the fresh-water lake here was of a leaden hue, and the browns and greens of the mountain-side were dark and intense. There was no sign of human life or habitation; there was no bird singing; the deer were far away in the unknown valleys above them, hidden by the mystic cloud phantoms. There was an odor of sweet-gale in the air. The only sound was the murmuring of the streams that were pouring down through these vast solitudes to the sea.

And now they reached a spot from whence, on turning, they caught sight of the broad plain of the Atlantic — all wind-swept and white. And the sky was dark and low down; though at one place the clouds had parted, and there was a glimmer of blue as narrow and keen as the edge of a knife. But there were showers about; for Iona was invisible, and Staffa was faintly gray through the passing rain, and Ulva was almost black as the storm approached in its gloom. Botticelli! Those men now in that small lug-sailed boat, far away off the point of Gometra — a tiny dark thing apparently lost every second or so amid the white Atlantic surge, and wrestling hard with the driving wind and sea to reach the thundering and foam-filled caverns of Staffa — they were not thinking much of Botticelli. Keith Macleod was in that boat. The evening before, Miss White had expressed some light wish about some trifle or other; but had laughingly said that she must wait till she got back to the region of shops. Unknown to her, Macleod had set off to intercept the steamer; and he would go on board and get hold of the steward; and would the steward be so kind as to hunt about in Oban to see if that trifle could not be found? Macleod would not intrust so important a message to any one else: he would himself go out to meet the "Pioneer."

"The sky is becoming very dark," Mr. White said; "we had better go back, Gerty."

But before they had gone far the first heavy drops were beginning to fall, and they were glad to run for refuge to some great grey bowlders which lay in the moist moorland at the foot of the mountain slopes. In the lee of these rocks they were in comparative safety, and they waited patiently until the gale of wind and rain should pass over. And what were these strange objects that appeared in the gray mists far along the valley? She touched her father's arm — she did not speak; it was her first sight of a herd of red deer, and as the deer had doubtless been startled by a shepherd or his dog, they were making across the glen at a good speed. First came the hinds, running almost in Indian file, and then with a longer stride came one or two stags, their antlered heads high in the air, as though they were listening for sounds behind them and sniffing the wind in front of them at the same time. But so far away were they that they were only blurred objects passing through the rain mists; they passed across like swift ghosts; there was no sound heard at all. And then the rain ceased, and the air grew warm around them. They came out from the shadow of the rock — behold! a blaze of hot sun on the moist moors, with a sudden odor of bracken, and young heather, and sweet-gale all about them. And the sandy road quickly grew dry again, and the heavens opened, and there was a flood of sunlight falling on that rushing and breezy Atlantic. They walked back to Dare.

"Tuesday, then, shall we say, pappy?" she remarked, just before entering.

"Very well."

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"And we are going to see some friends in Aberdeen."

"Very well."

After this Miss White became a great deal more cheerful, and she was very complaisant to them all at luncheon. And quite by accident she asked Macleod, who had returned by this time, whether they talked Scotch in Aberdeen.

"Because, you know," said she, "one should always be learning on one's travels; and many a time I have heard people disputing about the pronunciation of the Scotch; and one ought to be able to read Burns with a proper accent. Now you have no Scotch at all here; you don't say 'my dawtie,' and 'ben the hoose,' and ''twixt the gloaming and the mirk.'"

"Oh no," said he, "we have none of the Scotch at all, except among those who have been for a time to Glasgow or Greenock; and our own language, the Gaelic is unknown to strangers; and our way of speaking English — that is only made a thing to laugh at. And yet I do not laugh at all at the blunders of our poor people in a strange tongue. You may laugh at us for our way of speaking English — the accent of it; but it is not fair to laugh at the poor people when they will be making mistakes among the verbs. Did you ever hear of the poor Highlander who was asked how he had been employing himself, and, after a long time, he said, 'I wass for tree years a herring-fish, and I wass for four months or tree months a broke stone on the road?' Perhaps the Highlanders are not very clever at picking up another language; but all the same that did not prevent their going to all parts of the world and fighting the battles of other people. And do you know that in Canada there are descendants of the Highlanders who went there in the last century — and they are proud of their name and their history, and they have swords that were used at Falkirk and Culloden — but these Macnabs and Mackays and Camerons, they speak only French! But I think, if they have Highland blood in them, and if they were to hear the "Failte Phrionsal' played on the pipes, they would recognize that language. And why were you asking about Aberdeen?"

"That is not a Highland but a Scotch way of answering my question," said she, smiling.

"Oh, I beg your pardon," said he hastily; "but indeed I have never been to Aberdeen, and I do not know what it is they speak there, but I should say it was likely to be a mixture of Scotch and English such as all the big towns have. I do not think it is a Highland place, like Inverness."

"Now, I will answer your question," said she. "I asked you because papa and I propose to go there before returning to England ——"

How quickly the light fell from his face!

"The fact is, we have some friends there."

There was silence. They all felt that it was for Macleod to speak; and they may have been guessing as to what was passing in his mind. But to their surprise he said, in almost a gay fashion.

"Ah, well, you know they accuse us Highland folk of being rather too importunate as hosts; but we will try not to harass you; and if you have friends in Aberdeen, it would not be fair to beg of you to leave them aside this time. But surely you are not thinking of going to Aberdeen yet, when it is many a place you have yet to see about here. I was to take you in the 'Umpire' to Skye; and we had many a talk about the Lewis too."

"Thank you very much," said she demurely. "I am sure you have been most kind to us; but — the fact is — I think we must leave on Tuesday."

"On Tuesday!" said he; but it was only for an instant that he winced. Again he roused himself — for he was talking in the presence of his mother and the cousin Janet. "You have not been quite fair to us," said he cheerfully; "you have not given yourself time to make our acquaintance. Are you determined to go away as you came, the Fionaghal? But then, you know, Fionaghal came and staid among us, before she began to write her songs about the western isles; and the next time you come, that must be for a longer time, and you will get to know us all better, and we will not frighten you any more by taking you on the sea at night, or into the cathedral ruins. Ah!" said he, with a smile lighting up his face — but it was a constrained gayety altogether — "do I know now why you are hurrying away so soon? You want to avoid that trip in the 'Umpire' to the island where I used to think I would like my grave to be ——"

"Keith!" said Lady Macleod, with a frown. "How can you repeat that nonsense! Miss White will think you are mad."

"It was only an old fancy, mother," said he gently. "And we were thinking

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY of going out to one of the Treshanish islands, anyway. Surely it is a harmless thing that a man should choose out the place of his own grave, so long as he does not want to be put into it too soon."

"It will be time for you to speak of such things thirty years hence," said Lady Macleod.

"Thirty years is a long time," said he; and then he added, lightly, "but if we do not go out to the Treshanish islands, we must go somewhere else before the Tuesday; and would you go round to Loch Sunart now? or shall we drive you to-morrow to see Glen More and Loch Buy? and you must not leave Mull without visiting our beautiful town — and capital — that is, Tobermory."

Every one was quite surprised and pleased to find Macleod taking the sudden departure of his sweetheart in this fashion; it showed that he had abundant confidence in the future. And if Miss White had her own thoughts about the matter, it was at all events satisfactory to her that outwardly Macleod and she were parting on good terms.

But that evening he happened to find her alone for a few moments; and all the forced cheerfulness had left his eyes, and there was a dark look there — of hopeless anxiety and pain.

"I do not wish to force you, Gerty — to persecute you," said he. "You are our guest. But before you go away, cannot you give me one definite word of promise and hope — only one word?"

"I am quite sure you don't want to persecute me, Keith," said she, "but you should remember there is a long time of waiting before us, and there will be plenty of opportunity for explaining and arranging everything when we have leisure to write ——"

"To write!" he exclaimed. "But I am coming to see you, Gerty. Do you think I could go through another series of long months with only those letters, and letters, and letters, to break one's heart over? I could not do it again, Gerty. And when you have visited your friends in Aberdeen, I am coming to London."

"Why, Keith, there is the shooting."

"I do not think I shall try the shooting this year — it is an anxiety — I cannot have patience with it. I am coming to London, Gerty."

"Oh, very well, Keith," said she, with an affectation of cheerful content, "then there is no use in our taking a solemn good-by just now — is there? You know how I hate scenes. And we shall part very good friends, shall we not? And when you come to London we shall make up all our little differences, and have everything on a clear understanding. Is it a bargain? Here comes your cousin Janet — now show her that we are good friends, Keith. And for goodness' sake don't say that you mean to give up your shooting this year, or she will wonder what I have made of you. Give up your shooting! Why, a woman would as soon give up her right of being incomprehensible and whimsical and capricious — her right of teasing people, as I very much fear I have been teasing you, Keith. But it will be all set right when you come to London."

And from that moment to the moment of her departure Miss White seemed to breathe more freely, and she took less care to avoid Keith Macleod in her daily walks and ways. There was at last quite a good understanding between them, as the people around imagined.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

AFRAID.

BUT the very first thing she did on reaching home again was to write to Macleod begging him to postpone his visit to London. What was the use? The company of which she formed a part was most probably going on an autumn tour; she was personally very busy. Surely it would not much interest him to be present at the production of a new piece in Liverpool?

And then she pointed out to him that, as she had her duties and occupations, so ought he to have. It was monstrous his thought of foregoing the shooting that year. Why, if he wanted some additional motive, what did he say to preserving as much grouse plumage as would trim a cloak for her? It was a great pity that the skins of so beautiful a bird should be thrown away. And she desired him to present her kind regards to Lady Macleod and to Miss Macleod, and to thank them both for their great kindness.

Immediately after writing that letter Miss White seemed to grow very light-hearted indeed, and she laughed and chatted with Carry, and was exceedingly affectionate toward her sister.

"And what do you think of your own home now, Gerty?" said Miss Carry, who had been making some small experiments in arrangement.

"You mean, after my being among the savages?" said she. "Ah, it is too true, Carry. I have seen them in their war-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

paint, and I have shuddered at their spears, and I have made voyages in their canoes. But it is worth while going anywhere and doing any thing in order to come back and experience such a sense of relief and quiet. Oh, what a delicious cushion! Where did you get it, Carry?"

She sank back in the rocking-chair out on this shaded veranda. It was the slumbering noontide of a July day; the foliage above and about the Regent's Canal hung motionless in the still sunlight; and there was a perfume of roses in the air. Here at last was repose. She had said that her notion of happiness was to be let alone; and — now that she had despatched that forbidding letter — she would be able to enjoy a quiet and languor free from care.

"Aha, Gerty, don't you know?" said the younger sister. "Well, I suppose, you poor creature, you don't know — you have been among the tigers and crocodiles so long. That cushion is a present from Mr. Lemuel to me — to me, mind, not to you — and he brought it all the way from Damascus some years ago. Oh, Gerty, if I was only three years older, shouldn't I like to be your rival, and have a fight with you for him!"

"I don't know what you mean," said the elder sister sharply.

"Oh, don't you? Poor innocent thing! Well, I am not going to quarrel with you this time, for at last you are showing some sense. How you ever could have thought of Mr. Howson, or Mr. Brook, or — you know whom — I never could imagine; but here is some one now whom people have heard of — some one with fame like yourself — who will understand you. Oh, Gerty, hasn't he lovely eyes?"

"Like a gazelle," said the other. "You know what Mr. —— said? — that he never met the appealing look of Mr. Lemuel's eyes without feeling in his pocket for a biscuit."

"He wouldn't say any thing like that about you, Gerty," Carry said reproachfully.

"Who wouldn't?"

"Mr. Lemuel."

"Oh, Carry, don't you understand that I am so glad to be allowed to talk nonsense? I have been all strung up lately, like the string of a violin. Everything au grand sérieux. I want to be idle, and to chat, and to talk nonsense. Where did you get that bunch of stephanotis?"

"Mr. Lemuel brought it last evening. He knew you were coming home to-day. Oh, Gerty, do you know I have seen your portrait, though it isn't finished yet, and you look — you look like an inspired prophetess. I never saw any thing so lovely."

"Indeed," said Miss White, with a smile; but she was pleased.

"When the public see that, they will know what you are really like, Gerty, instead of buying your photograph in a shop from a collection of ballet-dancers and circus women. That is where you ought to be — in the Royal Academy: not in a shop window with any mountebank. Oh, Gerty, do you know who is your latest rival in the stationers' windows? The woman who dresses herself as a mermaid and swims in a transparent tank below water. Fin-fin they call her. I suppose you have not been reading the newspapers?"

"Not much."

"There is a fine collection for you upstairs. And there is an article about you in the Islington Young Men's Improvement Association. It is signed 'Trismegistus.' Oh, it is beautiful, Gerty — quite full of poetry. It says you are an enchantress striking the rockiest heart, and a well of pure emotion springs up. It says you have the beauty of Mrs. Siddons and the genius of Rachel."

"Dear me!"

"Ah, you don't half believe in yourself, Gerty," said the younger sister, with a critical air. "It is the weak point about you. You depreciate yourself, and you make light of other people's belief in you. However, you can't go against your own genius. That is too strong for you. As soon as you get on the stage, then you forget to laugh at yourself."

"Really, Carry, has papa been giving you a lecture about me?"

"Oh, laugh away; but you know it is true. And a woman like you — you were going to throw yourself away on a ——"

"Carry! There are some things that are better not talked about," said Gertrude White curtly, as she rose and went indoors.

Miss White betook herself to her professional and domestic duties with much alacrity and content, for she believed that by her skill as a letter-writer she could easily ward off the importunities of her too passionate lover. It is true that at times, and in despite of her playful evasion, she was visited by a strange dread. However far away, the cry of a strong man in his agony has something terrible in it. And what was this he wrote to her in simple and calm words?

"Are our paths diverging, Gerty? and, if that is so, what will be the end of it for

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd me and for you? Are you going away from me? After all that has passed, are we to be separated in the future, and you will go one way, and I must go the other way, with all the world between us, so that I shall never see you again? Why will you not speak? You hint of lingering doubts and hesitations. Why have you not the courage to be true to yourself — to be true to your woman's heart — to take your life in your own hands and shape it so that it shall be worthy of you?"

Well, she did speak, in answer to this piteous prayer. She was a skilful letter-writer.

"It may seem very ungrateful in an actress, you know, dear Keith, to contest the truth of any thing said by Shakespeare; but I don't think, with all humility, there ever was so much nonsense put into so small a space as there is in these lines that everybody quotes at your head: —

> To thine own self be true;
> And it must follow, as the night the day,
> Thou canst not then be false to any man.

'Be true to yourself,' people say to you. But surely every one who is conscious of failings, and deceitfulness, and unworthy instincts, would rather try to be a little better than himself? Where else would there be any improvement, in an individual or in society? You have to fight against yourself, instead of blindly yielding to your wish of the moment. I know I, for one, should not like to trust myself. I wish to be better than I am — to be other than I am — and I naturally look around for help and guidance. Then you find people recommending you absolutely diverse ways of life, and with all show of authority and reason too; and in such an important matter ought not one to consider before making a final choice?"

Miss White's studies in mental and moral science, as will readily be perceived, had not been of a profound character. But he did not stay to detect the obvious fallacy of her argument. It was all a maze of words to him. The drowning man does not hear questions addressed to him. He only knows that the waters are closing over him, and that there is no arm stretched out to save.

"I do not know myself for two minutes together," she wrote. "What is my present mood, for example? Why, one of absolute and ungovernable hatred — hatred of the woman who would take my place if I were to retire from the stage. I have been thinking of it all the morning — picturing myself as an unknown nonentity, vanished from the eyes of the public, in a social grave. And I have to listen to people praising the new actress, and I have to read columns about her in the papers, and I am unable to say, 'Why, all that and more was written and said about me.' What has an actress to show for herself if once she leaves the stage? People forget her the next day; no record is kept of her triumphs. A painter, now, who spends years of his life in earnest study — it does not matter to him whether the public applaud or not, whether they forget or not. He has always before him these evidences of his genius; and among his friends he can choose his fit audience. Even when he is an old man, and listening to the praises of all the young fellows who have caught the taste of the public, he can at all events show something of his work as testimony of what he was. But an actress, the moment she leaves the stage, is a snuffed-out candle. She has her stage dresses to prove that she acted certain parts; and she may have a scrap-book with cuttings of criticisms from the provincial papers. You know, dear Keith, all this is very heart-sickening; and I am quite aware that it will trouble you — as it troubles me, and sometimes makes me ashamed of myself — but then it is true, and it is better for both of us that it should be known. I could not undertake to be a hypocrite all my life. I must confess to you, whatever be the consequences, that I distinctly made a mistake when I thought it was such an easy thing to adopt a whole new set of opinions and tastes and habits. The old Adam, as your Scotch ministers would say, keeps coming back to jog my elbow as an old familiar friend. And you would not have me conceal the fact from you? I know how difficult it will be for you to understand or sympathize with me. You have never been brought up to a profession every inch of your progress in which you have to contest against rivals; and you don't know how jealous one is of one's position when it is gained. I think I would rather be made an old woman of sixty to-morrow morning than get up and go out and find my name printed in small letters in the theatre bills. And if I try to imagine what my feelings would be if I were to retire from the stage, surely that is in your interest as well as mine. How would you like to be tied for life to a person who was continually looking back to her past career with regret, and who was continually looking around her for objects of jealous and envious anger? Really, I try to do my duty by everybody. All the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

time I was at Castle Dare I tried to picture myself living there, and taking an interest in the fishing and the farms, and so on; and if I was haunted by the dread that, instead of thinking about the fishing and the farms, I should be thinking of the triumphs of the actress who had taken my place in the attention of the public, I had to recognize the fact. It is wretched and pitiable, no doubt; but look at my training. If you tell me to be true to myself, that is myself. And at all events I feel more contented that I have made a frank confession."

Surely it was a fair and reasonable letter? But the answer that came to it had none of its pleasant common-sense. It was all a wild appeal — a calling on her not to fall away from the resolves she had made — not to yield to those despondent moods. There was but the one way to get rid of her doubts and hesitations; let her at once cast aside the theatre and all its associations and malign influences, and become his wife, and he would take her by the hand, and lead her away from that besetting temptation. Could she forget the day on which she gave him the red rose? She was a woman; she could not forget.

She folded up the letter, and held it in her hand, and went into her father's room. There was a certain petulant and irritated look on her face.

"He says he is coming up to London, papa," said she abruptly.

"I suppose you mean Sir Keith Macleod," said he.

"Well, of course. And can you imagine anything more provoking — just at present, when we are rehearsing this new play, and when all the time I can afford Mr. Lemuel wants for the portrait? I declare the only time I feel quiet, secure, safe from the interference of anybody — and more especially the worry of the postman — is when I am having that portrait painted; the intense stillness of the studio is delightful, and you have beautiful things all around you. As soon as I open the door I come out into the world again, with constant vexations and apprehensions all around. Why, I don't know but that at any minute Sir Keith Macleod may come walking up to the gate!"

"And why should that possibility keep you in terror?" said her father calmly.

"Well, not in terror," said she, looking down, "but — but anxiety, at least; and a very great deal of anxiety. Because I know he will want explanations and promises, and I don't know what — just at the time I am most worried and unsettled about everything I mean to do."

Her father regarded her for a second or two.

"Well?" said he.

"Isn't that enough?" she said, with some indignation.

"Oh," said he coldly, "you have merely come to me to pour out your tale of wrongs. You don't want me to interfere, I suppose. Am I to condole with you?"

"I don't know why you should speak to me like that, at all events," said she.

"Well, I will tell you," he responded, in the same cool, matter-of-fact way. "When you told me you meant to give up the theatre and marry Sir Keith Macleod, my answer was that you were likely to make a mistake. I thought you were a fool to throw away your position as an actress; but I did not urge the point. I merely left the matter in your own hands. Well, you went your own way. For a time your head was filled with romance — Highland chieftains, and gillies, and red deer, and baronial halls, and all that stuff; and no doubt you persuaded that young man that you believed in the whole thing fervently, and there was no end to the names you called theatres and everybody connected with them. Not only that, but you must needs drag me up to the Highlands to pay a visit to a number of strangers with whom both you and I lived on terms of apparent hospitality and good-will, but in reality on terms of very great restraint. Very well. You begin to discover that your romance was a little bit removed from the actual state of affairs — at least you say so ——"

"I say so!" she exclaimed.

"Hear me out," the father said patiently. "I don't want to offend you, Gerty, but I wish to speak plainly. You have an amazing faculty for making yourself believe anything that suits you. I have not the least doubt but that you have persuaded yourself that the change in your manner toward Keith Macleod was owing to your discovering that their way of life was different from what you expected; or perhaps that you still had a lingering fancy for the stage — anything you like. I say you could make yourself believe anything. But I must point out to you that any acquaintance of yours — an outsider — would probably look on the marked attentions Mr. Lemuel has been paying you, and on your sudden conversion to the art theories of himself and his friends, and on the revival of your ambitious notions about tragedy ——"

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"You need say no more," said she, with her face grown quickly red, and with a certain proud impatience in her look.

"Oh yes, but I mean to say more," her father said quietly, "unless you wish to leave the room. I mean to say this — that when you have persuaded yourself somehow that you would rather reconsider your promise to Sir Keith Macleod — am I right? — that it does seem rather hard that you should grow ill-tempered with him and accuse him of being the author of your troubles and vexations. I am no great friend of his — I disliked his coming here at the outset; but I will say he is a manly young fellow, and I know he would not try to throw the blame of any change in his own sentiments on to some one else. And another thing I mean to say is — that your playing the part of the injured Griselda is not quite becoming, Gerty: at all events, I have no sympathy with it. If you come and tell me frankly that you have grown tired of Macleod, and wish somehow to break your promise to him, then I can advise you."

"And what would you advise, then," said she, with equal calmness, "supposing that you choose to throw all the blame on me?"

"I would say that it is a woman's privilege to be allowed to change her mind; and that the sooner you told him so the better."

"Very simple!" she said, with a flavor of sarcasm in her tone. "Perhaps you don't know that man as I know him."

"Then you are afraid of him?"

She was silent.

"These are certainly strange relations between two people who talk of getting married. But, in any case, he cannot suffocate you in a cave, for you live in London; and in London it is only an occasional young man about Shoreditch who smashes his sweetheart with a poker when she proposes to marry somebody else. He might, it is true, summon you for breach of promise; but he would prefer not to be laughed at. Come, come, Gerty, get rid of all this nonsense. Tell him frankly the position; and don't come bothering me with pretended wrongs and injuries."

"Do you think I ought to tell him?" said she slowly.

"Certainly."

She went away and wrote to Macleod; but she did not wholly explain her position. She only begged once more for time to consider her own feelings. It would be better that he should not come just now to London. And if she were convinced, after honest and earnest questioning of herself, that she had not the courage and strength of mind necessary for the great change in her life she had proposed, would it not be better for his happiness and hers that the confession should be made?

Macleod did not answer that letter; and she grew alarmed. Several days elapsed. One afternoon, coming home from rehearsal, she saw a card lying on the tray on the hall table.

"Papa," said she, with her face somewhat paler than usual, "Sir Keith Macleod is in London!"

CHAPTER XXXIX.

A CLIMAX.

SHE was alone in the drawing-room. She heard the bell ring, and the sound of some one being let in by the front door. Then there was a man's step in the passage outside. The craven heart grew still with dread.

But it was with a great gentleness that he came forward to her, and took both of her trembling hands, and said, —

"Gerty, you do not think that I have come to be angry with you — not that!"

He could not but see with those anxious, pained, tender eyes of his that she was very pale; and her heart was now beating so fast — after the first shock of fright — that for a second or two she could not answer him. She withdrew her hands. And all this time he was regarding her face with an eager, wistful intensity.

"It is — so strange — for me to see you again," said he, almost in a bewildered way. "The days have been very long without you — I had almost forgotten what you were like — and now — and now — oh, Gerty, you are not angry with me for troubling you?"

She withdrew a step and sat down.

"There is a chair," said she: he did not seem to understand what she meant. He was trying to read her thoughts in her eyes, in her manner, in the pale face; and his earnest gaze did not leave her for a moment.

"I know you must be greatly troubled and worried, Gerty, and — and I tried not to come; but your last letter was like the end of the world for me. I thought everything might go then. But then I said, 'Are you a man, and to be cast down by that? She is bewildered by some passing doubt; her mind is sick for the moment; you must go to her, and recall her, and awake her to herself; and you will see her

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

laugh again.' And so I am here, Gerty; and if I am troubling you at a bad time — well, it is only for a moment or two; and you will not mind that? You and I are so different, Gerty! You are all perfect. You do not want the sympathy of any one. You are satisfied with your own thinkings; you are a world to yourself. But I cannot live without being in sympathy with you. It is a craving; it is like a fire —— Well, I did not come here to talk about myself."

"I am sorry you took so much trouble," she said, in a low voice, and there was a nervous restraint in her manner. "You might have answered my letter instead."

"Your letter!" he exclaimed. "Why, Gerty, I could not talk to the letter. It was not yourself. It was no more part of yourself than a glove. You will forget that letter, and all the letters that ever you wrote; let them go away like the leaves of former autumns that are quite forgotten; and instead of the letters be yourself, as I see you now — proud-spirited and noble — my beautiful Gerty — my wife!"

He made a step forward, and caught her hand. She did not see that there were sudden tears in the imploring eyes. She only knew that this vehemence seemed to suffocate her.

"Keith," said she, and she gently disengaged her hand, "will you sit down — and we can talk over this matter calmly, if you please; but I think it would have been better if you left us both to explain ourselves in writing. It is difficult to say certain things without giving pain, and you know I don't wish to do that ——"

"I know," said he, with an absent look on his face; and he took the chair she had indicated, and sat down beside her; and now he was no longer regarding her eyes.

"It is quite true that you and I are different," said she, with a certain resolution in her tone, as if she was determined to get through with a painful task, "very seriously different in everything — in our natures, and habits, and opinions, and all the rest of it. How we ever became acquainted I don't know; I am afraid it was not a fortunate accident for either of us. Well ——"

Here she stopped. She had not prepared any speech, and she suddenly found herself without a word to say, when words, words, words, were all she eagerly wanted in order to cover her retreat. And as for him, he gave her no help. He sat silent, his eyes downcast, a tired and haggard look on his face.

"Well," she resumed, with a violent effort, "I was saying, perhaps we made a mistake in our estimates of each other. That is a very common thing; and sometimes people find out in time, and sometimes they don't. I am sure you agree with me, Keith?"

"Oh yes, Gerty," he answered absently.

"And then — and then I am quite ready to confess that I may have been mistaken about myself; and I am afraid you encouraged the mistake. You know, I am quite sure I am not the heroic person you tried to make me believe I was. I have found myself out, Keith; and just in time before making a terrible blunder. I am very glad that it is myself I have to blame. I have got very little resolution. 'Unstable as water' — that is the phrase: perhaps I should not like other people to apply it to me; but I am quite ready to apply it to myself, for I know it to be true; and it would be a great pity if any one's life were made miserable through my fault. Of course I thought for a time that I was a very courageous and resolute person; you flattered me into believing it; but I have found myself out since. Don't you understand, Keith?"

He gave a sign of assent; his silence was more embarrassing than any protest or any appeal.

"Oh, I could choose such a wife for you, Keith — a wife worthy of you — a woman as womanly as you are manly; and I can think of her being proud to be your wife, and how all the people who came to your house would admire her and love her ——"

He looked up in a bewildered way.

"Gerty," he said, "I don't quite know what it is you are speaking about. You are speaking as if some strange thing had come between us, and I was to go one way and you another through all the years to come. Why, that is all nonsense! See! I can take your hand — that is the hand that gave me the red rose. You said you loved me then; you cannot have changed already. I have not changed. What is there that would try to separate us? Only words, Gerty! — a cloud of words, humming round the ears and confusing one. Oh, I have grown heart-sick of them in your letters, Gerty; until I put the letters away altogether, and I said, 'They are no more than the leaves of last autumn: when I see Gerty, and take her hand, all the words will disappear then.' Your hand is not made of words, Gerty; it is warm, and kind, and gentle — it is a woman's hand. Do you think words are able to make me

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

let go my grasp of it? I put them away. I do not hear any more of them. I only know that you are beside me, Gerty; and I hold your hand."

He was now no longer the imploring lover: there was a strange elation — a sort of triumph — in his tone.

"Why, Gerty, do you know why I have come to London? It is to carry you off — not with the pipes yelling to drown your screams, as Flora Macdonald's mother was carried off by her lover — but taking you by the hand, and waiting for the smile on your face. That is the way out of all our troubles, Gerty: we shall be plagued with no more words then. Oh, I understand it all, sweetheart — your doubts of yourself, and your thinking about the stage: it is all a return of the old and evil influences that you and I thought had been shaken off forever. Perhaps that was a little mistake; but no matter. You will shake them off now, Gerty. You will show yourself to have the courage of a woman. It is but one step — and you are free! Gerty," said he, with a smile on his face, "do you know what that is?"

He took from his pocket a printed document, and opened it. Certain words there that caught her eye caused her to turn even paler than she had been; and she would not even touch the paper. He put it back.

"Are you frightened, sweetheart? No! You will take this one step, and you will see how all those fancies and doubts will disappear forever. Oh, Gerty, when I got this paper into my pocket to-day, and came out into the street, I was laughing to myself; and a poor woman said, 'You are very merry, sir; will you give a poor old woman a copper?' 'Well,' I said, 'here is a sovereign for you, and perhaps you will be merry too;' — and I would have given every one a sovereign if I had had it to give. But do you know what I was laughing at? — I was laughing to think what Captain Macallum would do when you went on board as my wife. For he put up the flags for you when you were only a visitor coming to Dare; but when I take you by the hand, Gerty, as you are going along the gangway, and when we get on to the paddle-box, and Captain Macallum comes forward, and when I tell him that you are now my wife, why, he will not know what to do to welcome you! And Hamish, too — I think Hamish will go mad that day. And then, sweetheart, you will go along to Erraidh, and you will go up to the signal-house on the rocks, and we will fire a cannon to tell the men at Dubh Artach to look out. And what will be the message you will signal to them, Gerty, with the great white boards? Will you send them your compliments, which is the English way? Ah, but I know what they will answer to you. They will answer in the Gaelic; and this will be the answer that will come to you from the lighthouse — 'A hundred thousand welcomes to the young bride!' And you will soon learn the Gaelic, too; and you will get used to our rough ways; and you will no longer have any fear of the sea. Some day you will get so used to us that you will think the very sea-birds to be your friends, and that they know when you are going away and when you are coming back, and that they know you will not allow any one to shoot at them or steal their eggs in the spring-time. But if you would rather not have our rough ways, Gerty, I will go with you wherever you please — did I not say that to you, sweetheart? There are many fine houses in Essex — I saw them when I went down to Woodford with Major Stuart. And for your sake I would give up the sea altogether; and I would think no more about boats; and I would go to Essex with you if I was never to see one of the sea-birds again. That is what I will do for your sake, Gerty, if you wish — though I thought you would be kind to the poor people around us at Dare, and be proud of their love for you, and get used to our homely ways. But I will go into Essex, if you like, Gerty — so that the sea shall not frighten you; and you will never be asked to go into one of our rough boats any more. It shall be just as you wish, Gerty; whether you want to go away into Essex, or whether you will come away with me to the north, that I will say to Captain Macallum, 'Captain Macallum, what will you do now? — that the English lady has been brave enough to leave her home and her friends to live with us; and what are we to do now to show that we are proud and glad of her coming?'"

Well, tears did gather in her eyes as she listened to this wild, despairing cry, and her hands were working nervously with a book she had taken from the table; but what answer could she make? In self-defence against this vehemence she adopted an injured air.

"Really, Keith," said she, in a low voice, "you do not seem to pay any attention to anything I say or write. Surely I have prepared you to understand that my consent to what you propose is quite impossible — for the present, at least? I asked for time to consider."

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"I know — I know," said he. "You would wait, and let those doubts close in upon you. But here is a way to defeat them all. Sweetheart, why do you not rise, and give me your hand, and say, 'Yes?' There would be no more doubts at all."

"But surely, Keith, you must understand me when I say that rushing into a marriage in this mad way is a very dangerous thing. You won't look or listen to anything I suggest. And really — well, I think you should have some little consideration for me."

He regarded her for a moment — with a look almost of wonder; and then he said hastily, —

"Perhaps you are right, Gerty; I should not have been so selfish. But — but you cannot tell how I have suffered; all through the night-time thinking and thinking, and saying to myself that surely you could not be going away from me; and in the morning, oh! the emptiness of all the sea and the sky, and you not there to be asked whether you would go out to Colonsay, or round to Loch Scridain, or go to see the rock-pigeons fly out of the caves. It is not a long time since you were with us, Gerty; but to me it seems longer than half a dozen of winters; for in the winter I said to myself, 'Ah, well, she is now working off the term of her imprisonment in the theatre; and when the days get long again, and the blue skies come again, she will use the first of her freedom to come and see the sea-birds about Dare.' But this last time, Gerty — well, I had strange doubts and misgivings; and sometimes I dreamed in the night-time that you were going away from me altogether — on board a ship — and I called to you, and you would not even turn your head. Oh, Gerty, I can see you now as you were then — your head turned partly aside; and strangers round you; and the ship was going farther and farther away; and if I jumped into the sea, how could I overtake you? But at least the waves would come over me, and I should have forgetfulness."

"Yes, but you seem to think that my letters to you had no meaning whatever," said she, almost petulantly. "Surely I tried to explain clearly enough what our relative positions were?"

"You had got back to the influence of the theatre, Gerty — I would not believe the things you wrote. I said 'You will go now and rescue her from herself. She is only a girl; she is timid; she believes the foolish things that are said by the people around her,' And then, do you know, sweetheart," said he, with a sad smile on his face, "I thought if I were to go and get this paper, and suddenly show it to you — well, it is not the old romantic way, but I thought you would frankly say 'Yes,' and have an end of all this pain. Why, Gerty, you have been many a romantic heroine in the theatre; and you know they are not long in making up their minds. And the heroines in our old songs, too: do you know the song of Lizzie Lindsay, who 'kilted her coats o' green satin,' and was off to the Highlands before any one could interfere with her? That is the way to put an end to doubts. Gerty, be a brave woman. Be worthy of yourself. Sweetheart, have you the courage now to 'kilt your coats o' green satin?' And I know that in the Highlands you will have as proud a welcome as ever Lord Ronald Macdonald gave his bride from the south."

Then the strange smile went away from his face.

"I am tiring you, Gerty," said he.

"Well, you are very much excited, Keith," said she; "and you won't listen to what I have to say. I think your coming to London was a mistake. You are giving both of us a great deal of pain; and, as far as I can see, to no purpose. We could much better have arrived at a proper notion of each other's feelings by writing; and the matter is so serious as to require consideration. If it is the business of a heroine to plunge two people into lifelong misery without thinking twice about it, then I am not a heroine. Her 'coats o' green satin!" — I should like to know what was the end of that story. Now really, dear Keith, you must bear with me if I say that I have a little more prudence than you; and I must put a check on your headstrong wishes. Now I know there is no use in our continuing this conversation: you are too anxious and eager to mind any thing I say. I will write to you."

"Gerty," said he slowly, "I know you are not a selfish or cruel woman; and I do not think you would willingly pain any one. But if you came to me and said, 'Answer my question, for it is a question of life or death to me,' I should not answer that I would write a letter to you."

"You may call me selfish if you like," said she, with some show of temper, "but I tell you once for all that I cannot bear the fatigue of interviews such as this, and I think it was very inconsiderate of you to force it on me. And as for answering a question, the position we are in is not to be explained with a 'Yes' or a 'No;' it is mere romance and folly to speak of people

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

running away and getting married; for I suppose that is what you mean. I will write to you, if you like, and give you every explanation in my power. But I don't think we shall arrive at any better understanding by your accusing me of selfishness or cruelty."

"Gerty!"

"And if it comes to that," she continued, with a flush of angry daring in her face, "perhaps I could bring a similar charge against you, with some better show of reason."

"That I was ever selfish or cruel as regards you?" said he, with a vague wonder, as if he had not heard aright.

"Shall I tell you, then," said she, "as you seem bent on recriminations? Perhaps you thought I did not understand — that I was too frightened to understand. Oh, I knew very well!"

"I don't know what you mean," said he, in absolute bewilderment.

"What! not the night we were caught in the storm in crossing to Iona? — and when I clung to your arm, you shook me off, so that you should be free to strike out for yourself if we were thrown into the water. Oh, I don't blame you! It was only natural. But I think you should be cautious in accusing others of selfishness.

For a moment he stood looking at her, with something like fear in his eyes — fear and horror and a doubt as to whether this thing was possible; and then came the hopeless cry of a breaking heart, —

"Oh God, Gerty! I thought you loved me — and you believed that!"

From Fraser's Magazine.

AMONG THE BURMESE.

III.

AFTER all the thousand and one descriptions of India, how many men are there in England who have the faintest notion of the variety of climates under which their friends live in the different provinces of the Indian Empire, or of the varied and multiform influences of what to them seems, in most cases, nothing more than a rise, more or less abnormal, in the thermometer? How many are aware that while in Madras and southern India the punkah flaps wearily without cessation, night and day, summer and winter, in Lahore, or even Delhi, there are nearly six months out of the twelve when in your thickest English broadcloth you may find yourself running round your garden to keep the blood circulating? while between these extremes there is every shade of variation, the mean being realized in such a climate as that of Singapore or Point de Galle, where the heat is never excessive, but cold is never known and a uniform temperature prevails throughout the year.

Even the main feature which is common to every Indian climate alike is probably a mystery to the majority of people who have experience only of our own ever-variable skies. I mean the monsoons. It is not commonly realized that in India for half the year, speaking roughly, the wind blows steadily from the north-east, and for the other half from the south-west; the former period embracing the cold weather and the hot, a time during which the sky remains cloudless day after day for months (so that you can order your picnics or garden-parties or shooting-parties with the certainty of perfect weather), and only the temperature varies, getting gradually higher as the season advances, till a succession of magnificent thunder-storms gives warning of the change of monsoon — and the latter the rainy season, throughout which rain falls almost daily, breaking usually once a day, most often at sunset, and sometimes holding up for several days of awful heat.

Again, the total difference in the character of the heat to be endured in the several latitudes is a matter of which no account seems taken outside the country itself. I once travelled from Mussoorie in the Himalayas to Calcutta, a journey occupying from two to three days, chiefly by railway, in the first week of June, and it resembled rather a voyage from England through the desert of Sahara to the equator than a journey from one part of the same country to another. Starting from the cool, dewy heights of the lower Himalaya by a steep descent into the plain we passed abruptly to an oppressively hot temperature. Across the level Doon and over the Siwalik range we descended into the still more burning region of the Doab, between the Jumna and Ganges. At Agra the heat was indescribable and of such a kind as to render the skin dry and parched as that of the cicalas, with the sound of which the Indian air thrills incessantly; while in the railway train the air which entered the windows was, without a shadow of exaggeration, like the blast from an open furnace. But gradually a complete revolution took place in our sensations, which changed with the changing landscape. Instead of the parched plains over

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

which we had hastened for many hours — the only objects to attract the eye being rocks or hillocks seeming red hot in the sun, or perhaps a herd of black buck standing out in relief on the horizon — as we entered what are called the lower provinces of Bengal we plunged into a vast garden of luxuriant vegetation, and while the eye was relieved by the fresh green coloring, the skin was still more powerfully affected by the entire change of climate, and its dried-up pores burst into perspiration. Of these distinct kinds of heat which is least intolerable depends on each man's constitution, but either is a severe physical trial. All that is intended here, however, is to point to the many contrasts of climate, scenery, and all accessories of life which are to be found within the aggregation of countries to which the general name of India is given.

Of the varied beauties of tropical vegetation there is a much clearer idea even amongst those least acquainted with the East, for in our own beautiful conservatories we can enjoy in great perfection the sight of tropical foliage. Yet the lover of nature who is content with this is like "the linnet born within the cage, that never knew the summer woods," for no conservatory that ever was planned could give to any one even a faint conception of the beauties which Oriental nature has in store for those who are willing to brave her terrors and discomforts. Not to speak of the awe-inspiring spectacles of Himalayan scenery, or the extravagant profusion of a thousand untrodden jungles, there is none of the Indian provinces which has not its own lessons to teach, which the lover of the picturesque, the botanist, or the naturalist, can learn there and nowhere else.

But it is with Burmah that I am now concerned, and if I have any readers whose lives have been passed on the continent of India and who have never visited this its beautiful appendage, let me assure them that it has many and striking individualities, not only of race and creed, custom and costume, but of climate and scenery, of vegetable and animal life, which are not to be found to the westward of the bay behind which it is withdrawn. Even in respect of climate, those who know both could hardly fail to prefer Burmah to any part of the Indian plains. Almost as well, it seems to me, might one live in the moon, with its long days of intolerable heat and weary nights of Arctic frost, as in the north of India, where for half the year the cold pierces to your bones, and for the other half you gasp through month after month with none but artificial relief from the raging heat of the day and the stifling atmosphere of the night. Nor is life in the plains of lower Bengal or southern India a whit more tolerable. The real advantage of the Indian plains over Burmah, as a residence for Englishmen, is that they can get away from them. Burmah, though possessing lofty and beautiful mountain ranges, has as yet no hill sanatorium, with a railway from your door to the foot of the ascent; its most westerly seaport is many days' voyage farther from home than any Indian port, and the great gulf of the Bay of Bengal lies between the invalid in Rangoon and the cool breezes of the Nilgherries. But there are very many points in which the Burmese climate (excluding one or two feverish districts) is less hostile to the European than that of any part of the plains of India. A "merciful" climate it has been justly called, owing to its freedom from the rigors which are experienced in neighboring countries. The hot season is short, ending often with the month of April, and throughout it the nights are cool in comparison with those of the Indian hot weather. The thermometer at this season varies not uncommonly 25° or more during the twenty-four hours, mounting in the house rapidly from 72° in the early morning to 98° in the hours immediately after midday, and falling not less rapidly to 80° at sunset, and even 70° at night. Again, the rainy season, which is very much longer than in many parts of India, is, on the whole, not only bearable but in many respects even pleasant to the European. Of course all seasons vary, and one year will be worse than another, but in every rainy season there are many cool, cloudy days, with little or no rain, when you may sit in your house with open windows and without need of punkah or other appliance for cooling the room — a thing impossible in Calcutta or throughout the Indian plains. The "cold weather" in Burmah is indeed sometimes more nominal than real, yet from the beginning of December to the end of February you may with certainty count on positive cold at night (when blankets are indispensable), and unless the year is exceptional, the days too are not disagreeably hot.

And if the climate of Burmah is bearable, endless sources of interest are supplied by the beauty of outward nature in a country diversified not only by a luxuriant vegetation but by two great mountain chains with outlying spurs, by magnificent rivers winding now through vast plains, now through narrow and beautiful defiles,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

by lovely lakes, by strange rocks rising abruptly from the level and hollowed into caverns of almost incredible vastness, and even by rare physical phenomena such as mud volcanoes and boiling springs. The officer who has been quartered in Rangoon during the burning months of March and April will perhaps have nothing but execration for every phase and incident of life at that most trying time, but as the astronomer who braves the frosts of a winter midnight feels richly rewarded by the confirmation of a theory or by the smallest new discovery, so here, even in the hottest season, the lover of nature cannot fail to be in some measure compensated by the glories of the vegetable world. The habitué of Calcutta enjoys, year after year, in his scorching hot weather, the sight of the masses of acacia bloom of dazzling scarlet, and of many other lovely trees and flowers, but Calcutta has nothing to show which can compare with the scene presented by the cantonment of Rangoon at the same season, where tall forest trees are covered like rhododendrons with thick clusters of white or purple flowers, where flowering boughs form themselves into living triumphal arches, and where nearly every road is an avenue overshadowed by trees which three times in every summer burst out in a single night into a profusion of yellow bloom, of which the scent, as fragrant and delicate as that of the lily of the valley, is diffused over the air for a circuit of miles. One of the first things to strike the eye of the traveller in Burmah, to whom the Indian continent is familiar, is the difference in the vegetation of the two countries. He who has lived among the cocoanuts, dates, and betel trees of lower Bengal will at once see that though such trees are not absent, especially on the southern coast, they have become the exception in the landscape instead of the rule, and in his first drive at Rangoon, round the beautiful lake and the cantonment boundary road, he may for the time fancy himself in some corner of Europe rather than in the heart of Asia. In the same way the traveller from the arid plains of northern India, beyond the limits of the sea-loving cocoanuts, will find a no less striking contrast in the nature of the forest trees and the dense and luxuriant underwood, green and fresh as it remains throughout the hottest season.

Very much of the vegetation is of course common to Burmah and India. Our old friends the mango, the peepul, the bamboo, the tamarind, and the jack are there; but the groves of orange, mangosteen, and dorian are unique; so are the gardens of pineapple planted under a dripping canopy of tall forest trees: so are the beautiful padouks, so fragile that one such cyclone as periodically sweeps Calcutta bare would destroy them every one; so is the pema, purple or white, combining the beauties of rhododendron and horse-chestnut: so is the tall, exquisitely graceful wood-oil tree, a model of vegetable form, rising smooth and stately high over the surrounding underwood. Above all you must come to Burmah if you would see in its native beauty that most delicate and lovely of flowering trees, the Amherstia, like a giant fuchsia on the scale of an oak — a plant so rare and of such delicate nature that even in this its native country there are only one or two districts where it is content to show itself.

In her forest trees, again, Burmah has enough to be proud of. The forests of teak have for many years provided one of the principal exports of the province, and in the office of the conservator of forests at Rangoon may be seen specimen slabs of teak, toon, padouk, and many other varieties of valuable timber. Long rafts of timber are met with daily on the rivers, and in the creek which connects the Sittang and Pegu rivers, I have known the passage completely blocked by them.

When to special possessions such as these are added, not only the normal glories of an Eastern garden but a storehouse of rare and beautiful orchids, only rivalled by those of South America, it will be understood that at least for the botanist and the lover of scenery Burmah has its own attractions, which are shared by no other Indian province.

With this beautiful and abundant vegetation every hill is clothed to the top, every river and creek is fringed, every valley and plain is carpeted; and if, leaving the mainland, we cross to any of the wooded islands which lie within sight of the Tenasserim coast, we find within a tiny area something like an epitome of the whole. Visiting, on one occasion, one of the group of the Moscos, I shall never forget the impression made upon me. The little steamer anchored a few hundred yards from the shore in a sheltered bay. The sea was smooth as glass, and its green depths literally transparent as crystal, so that as our boat cut through them to the shore we saw far beneath us beds of branching coral of many colors, rocks and seaweeds, as if at a foot's depth. Landing on a broad margin of dazzling white sand we found ourselves in a scene such as long years ago

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

had been pictured to our minds by the pages of "Robinson Crusoe" and "Masterman Ready," but which later years had taught us to regard as purely imaginary. The hard white beach was strewn with corals and shells, some of great beauty; there was not a sign of human habitation except a rude cabin built by fishermen and deserted; perfect stillness reigned except for the ripple of tiny waves on the shore; while immediately beyond the beach the bay was encircled by a dense forest of cocoanut and other trees, rising in ledges to the central point of the island. Over all was a cloudless blue sky, not a breath of wind stirred, and around lay a "crescent of sea," bounding the horizon.

But in every such landscape one thing is missed by the Englishman, one want is felt for which nothing in the tropical wilderness can altogether atone: there are no singing birds. Parrots in flocks fly screaming from tree to tree, with brilliant green bodies and scarlet beaks; the jay shoots like the flash of a blue-light across the scene; the black and white Indian robin recalls with its pretty ways its distant English namesake; but, night or day, in heat, cold, or rain, the Indian woods are songless, save only for one or other kind of intermittent and monotonous call. The clear, exulting notes of thrush and blackbird, the cooing of doves, the rippling song of the skylark, which make the English landscape alive with joyous music, find no echo here, and the exuberant vegetation, through which a gleam of color darts now and again, inspires from its very stillness a feeling almost of oppression.

The subject of the general character of the vegetation suggests naturally that of the fruits which are the special product of the soil. It is an old story that the traditional resident of Calcutta thought it worth a man's while to make the voyage from England to Calcutta by the Cape of Good Hope and back only to eat one mango at the proper season, and even now men will be found who think some Indian fruits superior to any which other countries produce. But the majority will probably concur with me in holding that in the matter of fruit the East can bear no comparison with the West. Not all the mangoes, leeches, guavas, custard-apples, tipparees and pomegranates in the world would suffice to tempt me if I had the range of even a cottage garden in England, with strawberries and gooseberries, raspberries and currants, cherries, apples and plums, not to mention wall-fruit, and the luxuries of the English hothouse.

There is one fruit, however, and one only, so far as my experience goes, in which the East has a rival to any other in the world — and that is the mangosteen, a fruit of which Burmah alone of Indian provinces can boast, though sharing the distinction with the neighboring Malay states. To describe a wholly unknown fruit is a hopeless task which I shall not attempt. Suffice it to say that the mangosteen is the most refined and delicious of fruits, that it must be eaten fresh from the tree to be appreciated, and that for this luxury the epicure must pass by India to the farther shores of the Bay of Bengal or the coasts of the Malay peninsula.

Another fruit there is peculiar to this region, and happily so, in my opinion, for the rest of the world; although those who have found out its secret (and many Europeans are among the number) regard it as the king of fruits. This is the dorian, a fruit of which the mere smell is so repulsively powerful that the presence of even one (it is about as large as a cocoanut stripped of its fibre) in any part of the house is enough to fill every room with the odor, and this is such that, on discovering it, the first impulse of the ignorant inmate would be that it was time he should see to his drains. It may be imagined that to go to sea, as I have, in a ship even partially loaded with dorians is a trial to the stoutest of sailors. Yet of all fruits there is none which is more prized as a delicacy by the natives of the country, so that whole shiploads are yearly carried up the Irrawady to the palace of the king of Ava. What is more, even among Englishmen, there are not a few who, having once violently overcome their first repugnance and persevered for a little, have exchanged their disgust for admiration, and will assure their more squeamish friends that there is no fruit in the world to equal the dorian.

The Burmese have, however, a remarkable relish for the most strongly flavored food, and so characteristic is this fact that the reader will perhaps bear with me if I digress from my subject to give one or two illustrations of the peculiarity. Living as they do either by the sea or on the banks of rivers and creeks, it is natural that fish should form one of the commonest ingredients of the food of the people, and were they content with the fish freshly caught from the river or sea there would be no matter for remark. But no one could live a week among the Burmese without realizing that the favorite form in which fish is presented — constituting as it does an in-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dispensable part of every meal — is not a whit less repellent to the senses of the European than the fruit of which I have spoken above. This most unsavory food, huge mounds of which are piled up in every market, and whole boatloads of which are carried by river, poisoning the very air where the boat is moored, consists of fish which has first been allowed to decay, and is then in some way pickled and pounded into a sort of paste. It is called năpēē, and as the English dinner-table is incomplete without potatoes, so no Burmese rice-dish is complete without napee. In the common form in which the people eat it I have never heard of any Englishman being converted to a taste for napee; it is found, however, in a more refined form called balachong, in which it resembles a very highly flavored anchovy paste, and in which it may be appreciated by any one whose taste is not over delicate.

One more illustration must be given of what to sober people who shudder at the thought even of frogs may seem an incredible depravity of taste. Among the delicacies of a Burmese table one of the rarest is a sort of fricassee or grill made of a peculiar species of very large maggot. This creature, short in length but of monstrous girth, is found in the fruit of certain palm-trees: a dish of them is sometimes brought by natives as a present on the occasion of their visiting an Englishman, and when fried on toast they are supposed to be excellent eating. I was once nearly taken unawares by a dish of pogoungs, which was introduced to me as toasted cheese, but having heard of the existence of the reality I detected the trap, and was saved from making the experiment.

To return to my subject: Burmah, independently of its special products, is well stocked with fruits which all alike are able to appreciate. Although the climate does not, as in northern India, allow the cultivation of peaches and strawberries, throughout a great part of the year the best of oranges are plentiful, and as the season wears on, mangoes, mangosteens, custard-apples, and pineapples follow each other in succession, besides a host of other fruits common in India, as plantains, guavas, and the like. Of these perhaps the most abundant of all are the pineapples, excellent in flavor, which may be seen carried like turnips in cartloads and heaped up on the bare ground in the market-place.

Such being the nature of the vegetation and the physical formation of the country, it may be asked "What of the wild life by which the province is tenanted?" Surely, with a succession of forests, hills, and plains, rivers and lakes, it must be swarming with life in every form, and must be the very paradise of the sportsman. Strange to say, though the first conclusion is correct enough, and though there is hardly any game dear to the sportsman's heart which is not even abundant, there is comparatively little real sport to be had in the country. These vast wilds are indeed stocked with a variety of game such as few parts of India can show; not only the tiger, the leopard, and the bear, but the bison and the elephant, roam wild within them; the plains of Pegu are the resort of herds of deer; while for small game, snipe and quail, duck, teal, and game-fowl are abundant. And yet, for the most part, all alike live unmolested by the sportsman; and the explanation lies in the luxuriance of the vegetation and the impregnability of the fastnesses, guarded by swamp and creek and river, as well as by impenetrable forest, within which this wild life wanders free. There are no rajahs or zamindars in Burmah to turn even a limited area of the jungles into a hunting preserve, or to supply the trained elephants required to beat the coverts, and even if there were (and if the taking of animal life were not at variance with Budhism) it is probable that the impassable nature of the country where game most abounds would militate fatally against sport.

It is for these reasons that, notwithstanding the profusion of animal life, sport in Burmah is almost confined to snipe-shooting and occasional deer-coursing. For the latter the country produces a special breed of dogs, in appearance between a greyhound and a deerhound, named from Kayàzoo, a village near the Pegu plains. Any attempt at a beat for larger game almost certainly ends in disappointment. There is, of course, no lack of minor sports in English stations. The Rangoon drag harriers give runs as sporting as many a pack of fox-hounds, and the various local race-meetings become yearly more important. But for the genuine sportsman, to whom horse and hound, rod, gun, and rifle, represent all that makes life worth living, there is no place in the wild province of which I write.

For the naturalist, on the other hand, the same jungles are an inexhaustible mine of wealth. Birds of countless variety and of exquisitely beautiful form and plumage may be found for the seeking; butterflies and beetles of every brilliant color are collected for sale by the private soldier quartered in Rangoon; and the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

entomologist may be tormented to the top of his bent by a variety of insect and reptile life which seems absolutely infinite. Nor need he go outside his own garden to find a thousand subjects for study. Regiments of ants, of different size, color, and equipment, march daily backwards and forwards across the pathways; a light cavalry of insects is ever hovering on the outskirts of the garden to descend on the most precious flowers; the "praying mantis" may be seen almost any day among the shrubs; leaf-insects and stick-insects, indistinguishable from the foliage, may be discovered by diligent search; squirrels run up the trees, long-tailed lizards, colored like the rainbow, dart round the branches, and fireflies light up the leaves at night; while within the house the smaller lizard, with a chirp which recalls the cricket on the hearth, is as common and as harmless as are house-flies in England. A more alarming but equally harmless lizard found both in the garden and the house, is the tucktoo, peculiar to Burmah, a large striped animal sometimes a foot long, which, instead of the chirp of the smaller kind, utters at rare intervals — often when the house is still at the dead of night — a loud, sepulchral call repeated six or seven times and seeming to say, "tuck-too, tuck-too." This creature's presence in a house is said to bring good luck to the inmates. Snakes of every kind are common in the jungles and even in the garden; scorpions lurk under stones and logs, and at some seasons are a terror to the barefooted natives. Lastly, monkeys of various species revel in the Burmese forests; and among these, in the southern district of Tenasserim, is found a tribe not known in more northern latitudes and deserving of special notice.

The monkey is not generally popular as a domestic animal, yet I do not fear to assert of the representative of the genus to which I now refer that he is capable of winning the heart of the most inveterate monkey-hater. Of a constitution so delicate that he cannot be safely transported even to India from his warm southern forests, the little Gibbon monkey may be seen in perfectly happy freedom in the south of Burmah, and when taken young and trained as a home pet, no more engaging animal is to be found. He is not, indeed, free from the mischievous propensities of his kind (and some Gibbons are very mischievous), but they are certainly less obtrusive and are counterbalanced by many attractions. The tiny body is entirely covered with a thick coat of the softest wool, either black or creamy white, out of a fringe of which the beaded eyes peer wistfully; unlike his more plebeian relations he has no vestige of a tail, and his arms are of immense length in proportion to his body. The grace of his movements and the suppleness and power of his limbs are absolutely unexampled, carrying him at giddy pace, with perfect fearlessness and consummate ease, from branch to branch of the loftiest trees or along the eaves of houses. And when with this beauty and grace are combined the most shy and retiring disposition, the most clinging and affectionate heart, the winning ways and plaintive noises almost of a child, he must have an ineradicable aversion to monkeys who is not won to affection for the Gibbon. Seen, as I have seen him, set to play with a common tailed monkey, he is for all the world like the child of an aristocratic family who having been reared away from all contact with the world has been put down by the side of some rude village schoolboy, whose familiarity is as hateful to him as his coarse practical jests are repulsive and unintelligible.

Dwelling as I have done in the preceding pages on the many objects of beauty and interest to be found in the Burmese province, one is liable to be misunderstood and perhaps to convey an impression that the country is as desirable a residence for the Englishman as would be the Riviera or the slopes of the Pyrenees during an English spring. But it is very far otherwise in reality, and Burmah is no exception to the general rule that he who chooses to make the East the scene of his life's labors chooses a climate which will at least test severely his physical constitution, in which he must be prepared to face numberless privations and discomforts inseparable from life within the tropics, and in which the pleasure of witnessing and realizing the strange sights and experiences of Eastern life is heavily weighted by the conditions under which it is enjoyed. Such drawbacks may be lightly borne by the tourist who can re-embark when he will for his own breezy climate, but it is another thing for the man who makes the East his home for a fixed number of years, and those perhaps the best years of his life. Of some specific trials of Burmese life I shall have something to say hereafter; meantime by setting out with this caution I shall be less likely to mislead the reader if I now endeavor to present a sketch of the character and surroundings of the home to which an En-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

glishman whose lot is cast in Burmah takes back the English girl whom he has persuaded to share his fortunes.

Passing through the continent of India by the ordinary route, from Bombay to Calcutta, the traveller becomes accustomed to the sight of a style of domestic architecture which he naturally concludes to be universal throughout the Indian Empire. Whether large or small, whether of one, two, or three storeys, the Anglo-Indian dwelling-house has the same general characteristics. A square block of solid white masonry faced with plaster; a flat roof of which the line is unbroken by chimneys or other irregularities; and a line of stucco pillars supporting the verandah which runs round each storey, and within which doors and windows are dimly seen, guarded by venetian shutters of a uniform green. Such, in barest outline, is the aspect of the ordinary English house in the plains of India (on the beautiful ledges of the Himalaya the homesteads are often as English as the climate), and it is a surprise to the traveller whose journey takes him through India to Burmah to find in the dwelling-houses of Rangoon and Moulmein a contrast to the rule to which he has become used so complete that there are indeed few points of resemblance between the Indian and the Burmese house. Instead of staring white brick and stucco, the Englishman's house in Burmah is built of dark mahogany-colored timber; instead of a flat roof levelled with cement and without projecting eaves, we have steep-pitched roofs tiled or "shingled," and with broad overhanging eaves sheltering the verandah; instead of the single ground-floor of the "bungalow," even the one-storeyed house in Burmah is supported on pillars of squared timber, leaving as often as not a large vacant space underneath the house which serves as lumber-room or even coach-house. Hence the old popular fancy in India that in the universal swamp of Burmah every house stood necessarily on "legs" to raise it out of the water. In many cases this lower region is walled in either with timber or masonry and becomes a separate basement storey, otherwise it is commonly concealed by trelliswork, or perhaps by a screen of shrubs and flowers in pots.

On a general view perhaps the nearest parallel to the Burmese house is the Swiss cottage. The houses which are dotted about the cantonment of Rangoon, each standing in its own green "compound" or enclosure, are not altogether unlike the pretty wooden châlets with overhanging eaves and projecting verandahs which may be seen in a drive through the Simmenthal above the lake of Thun; and even fine public buildings, such as hospitals and schools, are, with few exceptions, of the same material and built in the same style. And very picturesque they are; they have, of course, not the solidity of the Indian house, although probably quite as durable, nor are they capable of so well resisting the heat, which, in the hot season, pours through roof and walls till your very chairs and tables are hot to the touch. On the other hand they cool rapidly, and do not, as an Indian house does, retain the heat like a brick-kiln.

Entering through an open verandah, the visitor finds himself in a small entrance hall filled, perhaps, with shrubs and flowers. Ascending a staircase and passing across an upper verandah, he is ushered into the drawing-room, and, if he knows the look of the distempered walls of an Indian house, will be struck by the pleasant effect of the panelled wooden walls painted in some delicate shade of green or grey which, hung with pictures, brackets and the like, often give to the Burmese drawing-room a wonderfully English air. Carpeted with fine matting relieved by one or two gay-colored rugs, the room is furnished precisely as in an English house, the furniture being either imported from London or made on English models. Roses and mignonette are in water on the tables, and the only reminders of the East are the numerous open doors and windows and the inevitable punkah, the grateful breath of which atones for its ugliness. Picturesque as it is, however, the Burmese house must be no more regarded than the Indian house as a desirable exchange for the original on which it is modelled. The most tastefully furnished drawing-room in the East lacks, in the first place, one essential element of comfort, privacy. Every door and window must be open throughout the day (unless closed to shut out the heat), so that you are never sure of freedom from unwelcome intrusion either of servants or others. Nor is it possible really to enjoy even roses and mignonette at a temperature of 98°, and when this is continued day after day in the hot season, life itself is apt to become a burden to all but philosophers. And there are many other days in the Oriental year when the heart of the Englishman fails within him for longing for his native land, for houses where every room is private, where insects do not plague, and where intolerable heat

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

is almost unknown. There is one fortnight, for example, in every year in Burmah, which is looked forward to with a mixture of feelings — the first fortnight of the rainy season of the south-west monsoon. Many days and weeks of burning and increasing heat have made men long with unspeakable longing for the clouds which come down to hide the hateful sun, and for the rain, which almost in an instant transforms the brown earth into a carpet of verdure; and, in truth, the change is welcome, with all its drawbacks. But these, too, have to be reckoned with. Among the effects of the sudden rainfall is the awakening to life and activity of countless forms of insect life — beetles of every conceivable shape and size, flying ants, grasshoppers, cockchafers, and winged things of a myriad kinds. During the daytime this strange resurrection is not made apparent, but no sooner are lights lighted in the house — of which, be it remembered, no door or window can be closed on account of the heat — than they troop in, great and small, in blind mirth flying to the brilliant light; round about every lamp or candle; charging full tilt against globe and shade; pattering almost like hail on the tables and the matting, and of course usually suffering the agonies of death by burning. It may be faintly imagined what a dinner by candle-light becomes during these terrible days; for, though the lights are removed from the table, the white table-cloth itself serves as an attraction to insect eyes, and even temporary gauze doors, the only possible resource, soon make the air of the room stifling, and thus banish the last hope of satisfying in peace such appetite as the climate may have allowed. Mercifully this scourge lasts only for a short time, and when the monsoon has thoroughly set in the dinner-table is free as a general rule from insect plagues till the same season returns.

Again, in a house of this kind during a series of months of continuous and heavy rain the damp penetrates everywhere, so that it is only by constant care and watchfulness that clothes, books, pictures, or any other household property can be preserved from its ravages. You will be told that mushrooms grow in a single night on the boots in your dressing-room, but that a fine woolly mould does so is literally true. And these are only random examples of a host of petty annoyances, of which the sum constitutes in truth a heavy burden.

Yet, notwithstanding the many serious inconveniences and discomforts which cannot be avoided, there is also very much that is enjoyable in Burmese life. Rangoon itself is proverbially healthy; what little more than twenty years ago was a malarious swamp has indeed been converted into one of the healthiest towns in the East, standing high on the list of Indian military stations. At all seasons of the year the air is singularly pure and fresh; the town with its population of ninety thousand is conspicuously free from the epidemics which visit the more northern provinces, and it is happily out of the range of the cyclones which a few hundred miles to the north devastate both shores of the Bay of Bengal. Placed within late years in direct communication with England by a line of monthly passenger steamers, Rangoon is now supplied with the necessaries and conveniences of English life as easily as the great seaports of India. The headquarters of the civil administration, of a division of the Madras military command, and of the mercantile community, it has a large mixed English society of which the elements, ever shifting as they necessarily are, combine to minimize the evils of a residence in Asia.

I have spoken of the drawing-room of an Anglo-Burmese house, and it need only be added that dining-room, bed-rooms, and dressing-rooms are in the same way assimilated as much as possible to those of an English house. The kitchen and servants' quarters occupy as a rule a detached range of buildings a few yards from the house and connected by a covered way; the stables being assigned another separate quarter of the enclosure. Lastly, there is the flower-garden, and if the occupant of the house is a lover of flowers he has within his reach here one of the purest and most satisfying pleasures which Eastern life affords. Even in England the gardener is not so highly favored as in Burmah, where roses of one sort or another are perennial, and where there is no month in the year that he cannot have, flourishing in the open air, a lovely show of flowers and shrubs. The character of the display varies of course with the season, but the flower-beds never lie as they do in England bare and unsightly for long months together: winter and summer, rain and hot weather, a succession of beautiful flowers and foliage rewards his labor, and that with a rapidity and profusion unknown in colder countries. The new comer who intends to avail himself of this perpetual source of pleasure should, if possible, choose his ground carefully. A house with a southerly aspect, standing on a level plot of ground, with one or two large trees

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY in the near neighborhood, and furnished with a well which does not run dry, will give him an opportunity (even if his compound is a wilderness of weed on his arrival) of laying out for himself a garden which will gladden his eyes when he comes home from his duty or business in an evening, and will provide him in the cool morning hours with constant and absorbing recreation.

The abruptly marked division of the year into a wet and a dry season naturally determines the general character of the changes to which the garden is subject, while there is also a large variety of perennial plants. It is in the wet season that the earth seems most to revel in its exuberance, yielding its produce gratuitously, and without need of the labor which in the dry months is essential to provide the necessary moisture. Yet it is hard to say at which time of year the garden is most to be admired. Nothing, it would seem, can surpass its beauty when the flower-beds and the rockeries under the shade of the dripping trees are converted into a wilderness of many-colored caladiums, maidenhair, and other ferns, lycopodiums with a blue metallic sheen on their feathery leaves, begonias of every form and color, broad-leaved lilies, variegated crotons, the carmine-colored amaranthus, the lovely Cissus discolor, and a hundred varieties of trailing and creeping plants interwoven in lovely confusion; while under shelter of the eaves is a dazzling show of achimenes, a ribbon border of coleus, red, white, and velvety green, gives a rainbow setting to the whole, and high on the pema tree overhead, only to be seen by peering through the branches, are pendent the sprays of purple orchids far out of reach. Then it is that the garden is seen in its most exclusively tropical aspect, though roses, pinks, and even sweetbriar may, with care, keep alive memories of England.

But the floods of rain cease, and a succession of cloudless skies throws its influence over the garden. The rain-loving bulbs withdraw into themselves, and remain dormant during the dry season; but their place is taken by successors still more brilliant in coloring, not less luxuriant in growth, and recalling far more than they the far-off favorites of the English flower-garden. It is now that roses and geraniums, verbenas and petunias blaze forth into unrivalled beauty, and, while in the shade, the blue lycopodium is still lovely, a glow of color lights up the sunny parts of the garden with the familiar hues of English annuals, phloxes, zinnias, portulacca, mignonette, and many others, seeming to thrive almost better under the relentless Indian sun than in the more variable summer of England. The heavily-scented gardenia comes into flower in the open garden, the purple masses of the bougainvillia, and the flame-like rays of the scarlet pointsettia; heliotropes and even honeysuckles scent the air, not to mention many beautiful pendent and climbing plants indigenous to the tropics, and a profusion of orchids of rarest form and color.

It need hardly be said that a garden such as this neither springs into spontaneous life nor preserves its beauty without constant care. It is essential to the very existence of the garden in the dry season that it should be watered twice daily, but labor is cheap, and beyond this mechanical process the gardener has only to sow his seeds, to see that the soil is suited to the nature of each plant, to watch and guard against destructive insects — a constant and trying task, it must be confessed — and in spite of every obstacle his garden will repay him a hundredfold for every hour of attention he gives to it.

Kitchen-gardening, at least the cultivation of the favorite English vegetables, is only possible during the few months of the cold season. A suitable soil and abundance of water are the only essentials to its success, yet it is only a few Englishmen who are willing to encounter the labor and care which it requires. Laid out immediately round a well, and with a system of irrigation by bamboo pipes, a kitchen-garden may be cultivated to the greatest advantage, and peas and beans, mustard and cress, radishes, cauliflowers, spinach, and tomatoes, will make the gardener a liberal return for his pains. Without an ample supply of water, however, and that within easy reach, it is hopeless to attempt this form of horticulture.

P. HORDERN.

SIR GIBBIE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

AUTHOR OF "MALCOLM," "THE MARQUIS OF LOSSIE," ETC.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PARLOR.

THE day went on, and went out, its short autumnal brightness quenched in a chilly fog. All along the Widdiehill, the gas

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

was alight in the low-browed dingy shops. To the well-to-do citizen hastening home to the topmost business of the day, his dinner, these looked the abodes of unlovely poverty and mean struggle. Even to those behind their counters, in their back parlors, and in their rooms above, everything about them looked common, to most of them, save the owners, wearisome. But to yon pale-faced student, gliding, in the glow of his red gown, through the gray mist back to his lodging, and peeping in at every open door as he passes, they are so full of mystery, that gladly would he yield all he has gathered from books, for one genuine glance of insight into the vital movement of the hearts and households of which those open shops are the sole outward and visible signs. Each house is to him a nest of human birds, over which brood the eternal wings of love and purpose. Only such different birds are hatched from the same nest! And what a nest was then the city itself! — with its university, its schools, its churches, its hospitals, its missions; its homes, its lodging-houses, its hotels, its drinking-shops, its houses viler still; its factories, its ships, its great steamers; and the same humanity busy in all! — here the sickly lady walking in the panoply of love unharmed through the horrors of vicious suffering; there the strong mother cursing her own child along half a street with an intensity and vileness of execration unheard elsewhere! The will of the brooding spirit must be a grand one, indeed, to enclose so much of what cannot be its will, and turn all to its purpose of eternal good! Our knowledge of humanity, how much more our knowledge of the Father of it, is moving as yet but in the first elements.

In his shed under the stair it had been dark for some time — too dark for work, that is, and George Galbraith had lighted a candle: he never felt at liberty to leave off so long as a man was recognizable in the street by the daylight. But now at last, with a sigh of relief, he rose. The hour of his redemption was come, the moment of it at hand. Outwardly calm, he was within eager as a lover to reach Lucky Croale's back parlor. His hand trembled with expectation as he laid from it the awl, took from between his knees the great boot on the toe of which he had been stitching a patch, lifted the yoke of his leather apron over his head, and threw it aside. With one hasty glance around, as if he feared some enemy lurking near to prevent his escape, he caught up a hat which looked as if it had been brushed with grease, pulled it on his head with both hands, stepped out quickly, closed the door behind him, turned the key, left it in the lock, and made straight for his earthly paradise — but with chastened step. All Mistress Croale's customers made a point of looking decent in the street — strove, in their very consciousness, to carry the expression of being on their way to their tea, not their toddy — or if their toddy, then not that they desired it, but merely that it was their custom always of an afternoon: man had no choice — he must fill space, he must occupy himself; and if so, why not Mistress Croale's the place, and the consumption of whisky the occupation? But alas for their would-be seeming indifference! Everybody in the lane, almost in the Widdiehill, knew every one of them, and knew him for what he was; knew that every drop of toddy he drank was to him as to a miser his counted sovereign; knew that, as the hart for the water-brooks, so thirsted his soul ever after another tumbler; that he made haste to swallow the last drops of the present, that he might behold the plenitude of the next steaming before him; that, like the miser, he always understated the amount of the treasure he had secured, because the less he acknowledged, the more he thought he could claim.

George was a tall man, of good figure, loosened and bowed. His face was well-favored, but not a little wronged by the beard and dirt of a week, through which it gloomed haggard and white. Beneath his projecting black brows, his eyes gleamed doubtful, as a wood-fire where white ash dims the glow. He looked neither to right nor left, but walked on with moveless dull gaze, noting nothing.

"Yon's his ain warst enemy," said the kindly grocer-wife, as he passed her door.

"Ay," responded her customer, who kept a shop near by for old furniture, or anything that had been already once possessed —"ay, I daursay. But eh! to see that puir negleckit bairn o' his rin scoorin' aboot the toon yon gait — wi' little o' a jacket but the collar, an' naething o' the breeks but the doup — eh, wuman! it maks a mither's hert sair to luik upo' 't. It's a providence 'at his mither's weel awa' an' canna see't; it wad gar her turn in her grave."

George was the first arrival at Mistress Croale's that night. He opened the door of the shop like a thief, and glided softly into the dim parlor, where the candles were not yet lit. There was light enough, however, from the busy little fire in the grate, to show the clean sanded floor which

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

it crossed with flickering shadows, the colored prints and cases of stuffed birds on the walls, the full rigged barque suspended from the centre of the ceiling, and, chief of all shows of heaven or earth, the black bottle on the table, with the tumblers, each holding its ladle, and its wineglass turned bottom upwards. Nor must I omit a part without which the rest could not have been a whole — the kettle of water that sat on the hob, softly crooning. Compared with the place where George had been at work all day, this was indeed an earthly paradise. Nor was the presence and appearance of Mistress Croale an insignificant element in the paradisial character of the place. She was now in a clean white cap with blue ribbons. Her hair was neatly divided, and drawn back from her forehead. Every trace of dirt and untidiness had disappeared from her person, which was one of importance both in size and in bearing. She wore a gown of some dark stuff with bright flowers on it, and a black silk apron. Her face was composed, almost to sadness, and throughout the evening, during which she waited in person upon her customers, she comported herself with such dignity that her slow step and stately carriage seemed rather to belong to the assistant at some religious ceremony, than to one who ministered at the orgies of a few drunken tradespeople.

She was seated on the horsehair sofa in the fire-twilight, waiting for her customers, when the face of Galbraith came peering round the door-cheek.

"Come awa' ben," she said, hospitably, and rose. But as she did so, she added with a little change of tone, "But I'm thinkin' ye maun hae forgotten, Sir George. This is Setterday nicht, ye ken; an' gien it war to be Sunday mornin' afore ye wan to yer bed, it wadna be the first time, an' ye michtna be up ear eneuch to get yersel shaved afore kirktime."

She knew as well as George himself that never by any chance did he go to church; but it was her custom, as I fancy it is that of some other bulwarks of society and pillars of the church, "for the sake of example," I presume, to make not unfrequent allusion to certain observances, moral, religious, or sanatory, as if they were laws that everybody kept.

Galbraith lifted his hand, black, and embossed with cobbler's wax, and rubbed it thoughtfully over his chin: he accepted the fiction offered him; it was but the well-known prologue to a hebdomadal passage between them. What if he did not intend going to church the next day? Was that any reason why he should not look a little tidier when his hard week's-work was over, and his nightly habit was turned into the comparatively harmless indulgence of a Saturday, in sure hope of the day of rest behind.

"Troth, I didna min' 'at it was Setterday," he answered. "I wuss I had pitten on a clean sark, an' washen my face. But I s' jist gang ower to the barber's an' get a scrape, an' maybe some of them 'll be here or I come back."

Mistress Croale knew perfectly that there was no clean shirt in George's garret. She knew also that the shirt he then wore, which probably, in consideration of her maid's festered hand, she would wash for him herself, was one of her late husband's which she had given him. But George's speech was one of those forms of sound words held fast by all who frequented Mistress Croale's parlor, and by herself estimated at more than their worth.

The woman had a genuine regard for Galbraith. Neither the character nor fate of one of the rest gave her a moment's trouble; but in her secret mind she deplored that George should drink so inordinately, and so utterly neglect his child as to let him spend his life in the streets. She comforted herself, however, with the reflection, that seeing he would drink, he drank with no bad companions, — drank at all events where what natural wickedness might be in them, was suppressed by the sternness of her rule. Were he to leave her fold — for a fold in very truth, and not a sty, it appeared to her — and wander away to Jock Thamson's or Jeemie Deuk's, he would be drawn into loud and indecorous talk, probably into quarrel and uproar.

In a few minutes George returned, an odd contrast visible between the upper and lower halves of his face. Hearing his approach she met him at the door.

"Noo, Sir George," she said, "jist gang up to my room an' hae a wash, an' pit on the sark ye'll see lyin' upo' the bed; syne come doon an' hae yer tum'ler comfortable."

George's whole soul was bent upon his drink, but he obeyed as if she had been twice his mother. By the time he had finished his toilet, the usual company was assembled, and he appeared amongst them in all the respectability of a clean shirt, and what purity besides the general adhesiveness of his trade-material would yield to a single ablution long delayed. They welcomed him all, with nod, or grin, or merry word, in individual fashion, as

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

each sat measuring out his whisky, or pounding at the slow-dissolving sugar, or tasting the mixture with critical soul seated between tongue and palate.

The conversation was for some time very dull, with a strong tendency to the censorious. For in their circle, not only were the claims of respectability silently admitted, but the conduct of this and that man of their acquaintance, or of public note, was pronounced upon with understood reference to those claims — now with smile of incredulity or pity, now with head-shake regretful or condemnatory — and this all the time that each was doing his best to reduce himself to a condition in which the word conduct could no longer have meaning in reference to him.

All of them, as did their hostess, addressed Galbraith as Sir George, and he accepted the title with a certain unassuming dignity. For, if it was not universally known in the city, it was known to the best lawyers in it, that he was a baronet by direct derivation from the hand of King James the sixth.

The fire burned cheerfully, and the kettle making many journeys between it and the table, things gradually grew more lively. Stories were told, often without any point, but not therefore without effect; reminiscences, sorely pulpy and broken at the edges, were offered and accepted with a laughter in which sober ears might have detected a strangely alien sound; and adventures were related in which truth was no necessary element to reception. In the case of the postman, for instance, who had been dismissed for losing a bag of letters the week before, not one of those present believed a word he said; yet as he happened to be endowed with a small stock of genuine humor, his stories were regarded with much the same favor as if they had been authentic. But the revival scarcely reached Sir George. He said little or nothing, but, between his slow gulps of toddy, sat looking vacantly into his glass. It is true he smiled absently now and then when the others laughed, but that was only for manners. Doubtless he was seeing somewhere the saddest of all visions — the things that might have been. The wretched craving of the lower organs stilled, and something spared for his brain, I believe the chief joy his drink gave him lay in the power once more to feel himself a gentleman. The washed hands, the shaven face, the clean shirt, had something to do with it, no doubt, but the necromantic whisky had far more.

What faded ghosts of ancestral dignity and worth and story the evil potion called up in the mind of Sir George! — who himself hung ready to fall, the last, or all but the last mildewed fruit of the tree of Galbraith! Ah! if this one and that of his ancestors had but lived to his conscience, and with some thought of those that were to come after him, he would not have transmitted to poor Sir George, in horrible addition to moral weakness, that physical proclivity which had now grown to such a hideous craving. To the miserable wretch himself it seemed that he could no more keep from drinking whisky than he could from breathing air.

CHAPTER V.

GIBBIE'S CALLING.

I AM not sure that his father's neglect was not on the whole better for Gibbie than would have been the kindness of such a father persistently embodying itself. But the picture of Sir George, by the help of whisky and the mild hatching oven of Mistress Croale's parlor, softly breaking from the shell of the cobbler, and floating a mild gentleman in the air of his lukewarm imagination, and poor wee Gibbie trotting outside in the dark of the autumn night, through which the moon keeps staring down, vague and disconsolate, is hardly therefore the less pathetic. Under the window of the parlor where the light of revel shone radiant through a red curtain, he would stand listening for a moment, then, darting off a few yards suddenly and swiftly like a scared bird, fall at once into his own steady trot — up the lane and down, till he reached the window again, where again he would stand and listen. Whether he made this departure and return twenty or a hundred times in a night, he nor any one else could have told. Sometimes he would for a change extend his trot along the Widdiehill, sometimes along the parallel Vennel, but never far from Jink Lane and its glowing window. Never moth haunted lamp so persistently. Ever as he ran, up this pavement and down that, on the soft-sounding soles of his bare feet, the smile on the boy's face grew more and more sleepy, but still he smiled and still he trotted, still paused at the window, and still started afresh.

He was not so much to be pitied as my reader may think. Never in his life had he yet pitied himself. The thought of hardship or wrong had not occurred to him. It would have been difficult — impossible, I believe — to get the idea into his head that existence bore to him any

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

other shape than it ought. Things were with him as they had always been, and whence was he to take a fresh start, and question what had been from the beginning? Had any authority interfered, with a decree that Gibbie should no more scour the midnight streets, no more pass and repass that far-shining splendor of red, then indeed would bitter, though inarticulate complaint, have burst from his bosom. But there was no evil power to issue such a command, and Gibbie's peace was not invaded.

It was now late, and those streets were empty: neither carriage nor cart, wheelbarrow nor truck, went any more bumping and clattering over their stones. They were well lighted with gas, but most of the bordering houses were dark. Now and then a single foot-farer passed with loud, hollow-sounding boots along the pavement; or two girls would come laughing along, their merriment echoing rude in the wide stillness. A cold wind, a small, forsaken, solitary wind, moist with a thin fog, seemed, as well as wee Gibbie, to be roaming the night, for it met him at various corners, and from all directions. But it had nothing to do, and nowhere to go, and there it was not like Gibbie, the business of whose life was even now upon him, the mightiest hope of whose conscious being was now awake.

All he expected or ever desired to discover, by listening at the window, was simply whether there were yet signs of the company's breaking up; and his conclusions on that point were never mistaken: how he arrived at them it would be hard to say. Seldom had he there heard the voice of his father, still seldomer anything beyond its tone. This night, however, as the time drew near when they must go, lest the Sabbath should be broken in Mistress Croale's decent house, and Gibbie stood once more on tiptoe, with his head just on the level of the window-sill, he heard his father utter two words: "Up Daurside" came to him through the window, in the voice he loved, plain and distinct. The words conveyed to him nothing at all; the mere hearing of them made them memorable. For the time, however, he forgot them, for, by indications best known to himself, he perceived that the company was on the point of separating, and from that moment did not take his eyes off the door until he heard the first sounds of its opening. As, however, it was always hard for Gibbie to stand still, and especially hard on a midnight so cold that his feet threatened to grow indistinguishable from the slabs of the pavement, he was driven, in order not to lose sight of it, to practise the art, already cultivated by him to a crab-like perfection, of running first backwards, then forwards with scarcely superior speed. But it was not long ere the much expected sound of Mistress Croale's voice heralded the hour for patience to blossom into possession. The voice was neither loud nor harsh, but clear and firm; the noise that followed was both loud and strident. Voices had a part in it, but the movement of chairs and feet and the sudden contact of different portions of the body with walls and tables, had a larger. The guests were obeying the voice of their hostess all in one like a flock of sheep, but it was poor shepherd-work to turn them out of the fold at midnight. Gibbie bounded up and stood still as a statue at the very door-cheek, until he heard Mistress Croale's hand upon the lock, when he bolted, trembling with eagerness, into the entry of a court a few houses nearer to the Widdie-hill.

One after one the pitiable company issued from its paradise, and each stumbled away, too far gone for leave-taking. Most of them passed Gibbie where he stood, but he took no heed: his father was always the last — and the least capable. But, often as he left her door, never did it close behind him until with her own eyes Mistress Croale had seen Gibbie dart like an imp out of the court — to take him in charge, and, all the weary way home, hover, not very like a guardian angel, but not the less one in truth, around the unstable equilibrium of his father's tall and swaying form. And thereupon commenced a series of marvellous gymnastics on the part of wee Gibbie. Imagine a small boy with a gigantic top, which, six times his own size, he keeps erect on its peg, not by whipping it round, but by running round it himself, unfailingly applying, at the very spot and at the very moment, the precise measure of impact necessary to counterbalance its perpetual tendency to fall in one direction or another, so that the two have all the air of a single invention — such an invention as one might meet with in an ancient clock, contrived when men had time to mingle play with earnest — and you will have in your mind's eye a real likeness of Sir George attended, any midnight in the week, by his son Gilbert. Home the big one staggered, reeled, gyrated, and tumbled; round and round him went the little one, now behind, now before, now on this side, now on that, his feet never more than

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

touching the ground but dancing about like those of a prize-fighter, his little arms up and his hands well forward, like flying buttresses. And such indeed they were — buttresses which flew and flew all about a universally leaning tower. They propped it here, they propped it there; with wonderful judgment and skill and graduation of force they applied themselves, and with perfect success. Not once, for the last year and a half, during which time wee Gibbie had been the nightly guide of Sir George's homeward steps, had the self-disabled mass fallen prostrate in the gutter, there to snore out the night.

The first special difficulty, that of turning the corner of Jink Lane and the Widdiehill, successfully overcome, the twain went reeling and revolving along the street, much like a whirlwind that had half forgotten the laws of gyration, until at length it spun into the court, and up to the foot of the outside stair over the baronet's workshop. Then commenced the real struggle of the evening for Gibbie — and for his father too, though the latter was aware of it only in the momentary and evanescent flashes of such enlightenment as made him just capable of yielding to the pushes and pulls of the former. All up the outside and the two inside stairs, his waking and sleeping were as the alternate tic-tac of a pendulum; but Gibbie stuck to his business like a man, and his resolution and perseverance were at length, as always, crowned with victory.

The house in which lords and ladies had often reposed was now filled with very humble folk, who were all asleep when Gibbie and his father entered; but the noise they made in ascending caused no great disturbance of their rest; for, if any of them were roused for a moment, it was but to recognize at once the cause of the tumult, and with the remark, "It's only wee Gibbie luggin' hame Sir George," to turn on the other side and fall asleep again.

Arrived at last at the garret door, which stood wide open, Gibbie had small need of light in the nearly pitch darkness of the place, for there was positively nothing to stumble over or against between the door and the ancient four-post bed, which was all of his father's house that remained to Sir George. With heavy shuffling feet the drunkard lumbered laboriously bedward; and the bare posts and crazy frame groaned and creaked as he fell upon the oat-chaff that lay waiting him in place of the vanished luxury of feathers. Wee Gibbie flew at his legs, nor rested until, the one after the other, he had got them on the bed; if then they were not very comfortably deposited, he knew that, in his first turn, their owner would get them all right.

And now rose the culmen of Gibbie's day! its cycle, rounded through regions of banishment, returned to its nodus of bliss. In triumph he spread over his sleeping father his dead mother's old plaid of Gordon tartan, all the bedding they had, and without a moment's further delay — no shoes even to put off — crept under it, and nestled close upon the bosom of his unconscious parent. A victory more! another day ended with success! his father safe, and all his own! the canopy of darkness and the plaid over them, as if they were the only two in the universe! his father unable to leave him — his for whole dark hours to come! It was Gibbie's paradise now! His heaven was his father's bosom, to which he clung as no infant yet ever clung to his mother's. He never thought to pity himself that the embrace was all on his side, that no answering pressure came back from the prostrate form. He never said to himself, "My father is a drunkard, but I must make the best of it; he is all I have!" He clung to his one possession — only clung: this was his father — all in all to him. What must be the bliss of such a heart — of any heart, when it comes to know that there is a father of fathers, yea, a father of fatherhood! a father who never slumbers nor sleeps, but holds all the sleeping in his ever waking bosom — a bosom whose wakefulness is the sole fountain of their slumber!

The conscious bliss of the child was of short duration, for in a few minutes he was fast asleep; but for the gain of those few minutes only, the day had been well spent.

CHAPTER VI.

A SUNDAY AT HOME.

SUCH were the events of every night, and such had they been since Gibbie first assumed this office of guardian — a time so long in proportion to his life that it seemed reached. It was to him as one of the laws of existence that fathers got drunk and Gibbies took care of them. But Saturday night was always one of special bliss; for then the joy to come spread its arms beneath and around the present delight: all Sunday his father would be his. On that happiest day of all the week, he never set his foot out of doors, except to run twice to Mistress Croale's, once to fetch the dinner which she

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

supplied from her own table, and for which Sir George regularly paid in advance on Saturday before commencing his potations.

But indeed the streets were not attractive to the child on Sundays: there were no shops open, and the people in their Sunday clothes, many of them with their faces studiously settled into masks intended to express righteousness, were far less interesting, because less alive, than the same people in their work-day attire, in their shops, or seated at their stalls, or driving their carts, and looking thoroughly human. As to going to church himself, such an idea had never entered his head. He had not once for a moment imagined that anybody would like him to go to church, that such as he ever went to church, that church was at all a place to which Gibbies with fathers to look after should have any desire to go. As to what church-going meant, he had not the vaguest idea; it had not even waked the glimmer of a question in his mind. All he knew was that people went to church on Sundays. It was another of the laws of existence, the reason of which he knew no more than why his father went every night to Jink Lane and got drunk. George however, although he had taught his son nothing, was not without religion, and had notions of duty in respect of the Sabbath. Not even with the prize of whisky in view, would he have consented to earn a sovereign on that day by the lightest of work.

Gibbie was awake some time before his father, and lay revelling in love's bliss of proximity. At length Sir George, the merest bubble of nature, awoke, and pushed him from him.

The child got up at once, but only to stand by the bedside. He said no word, did not even think an impatient thought, yet his father seemed to feel that he was waiting for him. After two or three huge yawns, he spread out his arms, but unable to stretch himself, yawned again, rolled himself off the bed, and crept feebly across the room to an empty chest that stood under the skylight. There he seated himself, and for half an hour sat motionless, a perfect type of dilapidation, moral and physical, while a little way off stood Gibbie, looking on, like one awaiting a resurrection. At length he seemed to come to himself — the expected sign of which was that he reached down his hand towards the meeting of roof and floor, and took up a tiny last with a half-made boot upon it. At sight of it in his father's hands, Gibbie clapped his with delight — an old delight, renewed every Sunday since he could remember. That boot was for him! and this being the second, the pair would be finished before night! By slow degrees of revival, with many pauses between, George got to work. He wanted no breakfast, and made no inquiry of Gibbie whether he had had any. But what cared Gibbie about breakfast! With his father all to himself, and that father working away at a new boot for him — for him who had never had a pair of any sort upon his feet since the woollen ones he wore in his mother's lap, breakfast or no breakfast was much the same to him. It could never have occurred to him that it was his father's part to provide him with breakfast. If he was to have none, it was Sunday that was to blame: there was no use in going to look for any when the shops were all shut, and everybody either at church, or close in domestic penetralia, or out for a walk. More than contented, therefore, while busily his father wedded welt and sole with stitches infrangible, Gibbie sat on the floor preparing waxed ends, carefully sticking in the hog's bristle, and rolling the combination, with quite professional aptitude, between the flat of his hand and what of trouser-leg he had left, gazing eagerly between at the advancing masterpiece. Occasionally the triumph of expectation would exceed his control, when he would spring from the floor, and caper and strut about like a pigeon — soft as a shadow, for he knew his father could not bear noise in the morning — or behind his back execute a pantomimic dumb show of delight, in which he seemed with difficulty to restrain himself from jumping upon him, and hugging him in his ecstasy. Oh best of parents! working thus even on a Sunday for his Gibbie, when everybody else was at church enjoying himself! But Gibbie never dared hug his father except when he was drunk — why, he could hardly have told. Relieved by his dumb show, he would return, quiet as an aged grimalkin, and again deposit himself on the floor near his father, where he could see his busy hands.

All this time Sir George never spoke a word. Incredible as it may seem, however, he was continually, off and on, trying his hardest to think of some Sunday lesson to give his child. Many of those that knew the boy, regarded him as a sort of idiot, drawing the conclusion from Gibbie's practical honesty and his too evident love for his kind: it was incredible that a child should be poor, unselfish, loving, and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

not deficient in intellect! His father knew him better, yet he often quieted his conscience in regard to his education, with the reflection that not much could be done for him. Still, every now and then he would think perhaps he ought to do something: who could tell but the child might be damned for not understanding the plan of salvation? and brooding over the matter this morning, as well as his headache would permit, he came to the resolution, as he had often done before, to buy a Shorter Catechism: the boy could not learn it, but he would keep reading it to him, and something might stick. Even now perhaps he could begin the course by recalling some of the questions and answers that had been the plague of his life every Saturday at school. He set his recollection to work, therefore, in the lumber-room of his memory, and again and again sent it back to the task, but could find nothing belonging to the catechism except the first question with its answer, and a few incoherent fragments of others. Moreover, he found his mind so confused and incapable of continuous or concentrated effort, that he could not even keep "man's chief end" and the rosined end between his fingers from twisting up together in the most extraordinary manner. Yet if the child but "had the question," he might get some good of it. The hour might come when he would say "My father taught me that!" — who could tell? And he knew he had the words correct, wherever he had dropped their meaning. For the sake of Gibbie's immortal part, therefore, he would repeat the answer to that first, most momentous of questions, over and over as he worked, in the hope of insinuating something — he could not say what — into the small mental pocket of the innocent. The first, therefore, and almost the only words which Gibbie heard from his father's lips that morning, were these, dozens of times repeated — "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever." But so far was Gibbie from perceiving in them any meaning, that even with his father's pronunciation of chief end as chifenn, they roused in his mind no sense or suspicion of obscurity. The word stuck there, notwithstanding; but Gibbie was years a man before he found out what a chifenn was. Where was the great matter? How many who have learned their catechism and deplore the ignorance of others, make the least effort to place their chief end even in the direction of that of their creation? Is it not the constant thwarting of their aims, the rendering of their desires futile, and their ends a mockery, that alone prevents them and their lives from proving an absolute failure? Sir George, with his inveterate, consuming thirst for whisky, was but the type of all who would gain their bliss after the scheme of their own fancies, instead of the scheme of their existence; who would build their house after their own childish wilfulness instead of the ground-plan of their being. How was Sir George to glorify the God whom he could honestly thank for nothing but whisky, the sole of his gifts that he prized? Over and over that day he repeated the words, "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever," and all the time his imagination, his desire, his hope, were centred on the bottle, which with his very back he felt where it stood behind him, away on the floor at the head of his bed. Nevertheless when he had gone over them a score of times or so, and Gibbie had begun, by a merry look and nodding of his head, to manifest that he knew what was coming next, the father felt more content with himself than for years past; and when he was satisfied that Gibbie knew all the words, though, indeed, they were hardly more than sounds to him, he sent him, with a great sense of relief, to fetch the broth and beef and potatoes from Mistress Croale's.

Eating a real dinner in his father's house, though without a table to set it upon, Gibbie felt himself a most privileged person. The only thing that troubled him was that his father ate so little. Not until the twilight began to show did Sir George really begin to revive, but the darker it grew without, the brighter his spirit burned. For, amongst not a few others, there was this strange remnant of righteousness in the man, that he would never taste drink before it was dark in winter, or in summer before the regular hour for ceasing work had arrived; and to this rule he kept, and that under far greater difficulties, on the Sunday as well. For Mistress Croale would not sell a drop of drink, not even on the sly, on the Sabbath-day: she would fain have some stake in the hidden kingdom; and George, who had not a Sunday stomach he could assume for the day any more than a Sunday coat, was thereby driven to provide his whisky, and that day drink it at home; when, with the bottle so near him, and the sense that he had not to go out to find his relief, his resolution was indeed sorely tried; but he felt that to yield would be to cut his last cable and be swept on the lee-shore of utter ruin.

Breathless with eager interest, Gibbie watched his father's hands, and just as the

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

darkness closed in, the boot was finished. His father rose, and Gibbie, glowing with delight, sprung upon the seat he had left, while his father knelt upon the floor to try upon the unaccustomed foot the result from which he had just drawn the last. Ah, pity! pity! But even Gibbie might by this time have learned to foresee it! three times already had the same thing happened; the boot would not go on the foot. The real cause of the failure it were useless to inquire. Sir George said that, Sunday being the only day he could give to the boots, before he could finish them, Gibbie's feet had always outgrown the measure. But it may be Sir George was not so good a maker as cobbler. That he meant honestly by the boy I am sure, and not the less sure for the confession I am forced to make, that on each occasion when he thus failed to fit him, he sold the boots the next day at a fair price to a ready-made-shop, and drank the proceeds. A stranger thing still was, that, although Gibbie had never yet worn boot or shoe, his father's conscience was greatly relieved by the knowledge that he spent his Sundays in making boots for him. Had he been an ordinary child, and given him trouble, he would possibly have hated him; as it was, he had a great though sadly inoperative affection for the boy, which was an endless good to them both.

After many bootless trials, bootless the feet must remain, and George, laying the failure down in despair, rose from his knees, and left Gibbie seated on the chest more like a king discrowned, than a beggar unshod. And like a king the little beggar bore his pain. He heaved one sigh, and a slow moisture gathered in his eyes, but it did not overflow. One minute only he sat and hugged his desolation — then, missing his father, jumped off the box to find him.

He sat on the edge of the bed, looking infinitely more disconsolate than Gibbie felt, his head and hands hanging down, a picture of utter dejection. Gibbie bounded to him, climbed on the bed, and nearly strangled him in the sharp embrace of his little arms. Sir George took him on his knees and kissed him, and the tears rose in his dull eyes. He got up with him, carried him to the box, placed him on it once more, and fetched a piece of brown paper from under the bed. From this he tore carefully several slips, with which he then proceeded to take a most thoughtful measurement of the baffling foot. He was far more to be pitied than Gibbie, who would not have worn the boots an hour had they been the best fit in shoedom. The soles of his feet were very nearly equal in resistance to leather, and at least until the snow and hard frost came, he was better without boots.

But now the darkness had fallen, and his joy was at the door. But he was always too much ashamed to begin to drink before the child: he hated to uncork the bottle before him. What followed was in regular Sunday routine.

"Gang ower to Mistress Croale's, Gibbie," he said, "wi' my compliments."

Away ran Gibbie, nothing loath, and at his knock was admitted. Mistress Croale sat in the parlor, taking her tea, and expecting him. She was always kind to the child. She could not help feeling that no small part of what ought to be spent on him came to her; and on Sundays, therefore, partly for his sake, partly for her own, she always gave him his tea — nominally tea, really blue city-milk — with as much dry bread as he could eat, and a bit of buttered toast from her plate to finish off with. As he ate, he stood at the other side of the table; he looked so miserable in her eyes that, even before her servant, she was ashamed to have him sit with her; but Gibbie was quite content, never thought of sitting, and ate in gladness, every now and then looking up with loving grateful eyes, which must have gone right to the woman's heart, had it not been for a vague sense she had of being all the time his enemy — and that although she spent much time in persuading herself that she did her best both for his father and him.

When he returned, greatly refreshed, and the boots all but forgotten, he found his father, as he knew he would, already started on the business of the evening. He had drawn the chest, the only seat in the room, to the side of the bed, against which he leaned his back. A penny candle was burning in a stone blacking-bottle on the chimneypiece, and on the floor beside the chest stood the bottle of whisky, a jug of water, a stoneware mug, and a wineglass.

There was no fire and no kettle, whence his drinking was sad, as became the Scotch Sabbath in distinction from the Jewish. There, however, was the drink, and thereby his soul could live — yea, expand her mouldy wings! Gibbie was far from shocked; it was all right, all in the order of things, and he went up to his father with radiant countenance. Sir George put forth his hands and took him between his knees. An evil wind now swelled his sails, but the cargo of the crazy human hull was not therefore evil.

"Gibbie," he said solemnly, "never ye

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

drink a drap o' whusky. Never ye rax oot the han' to the boatle. Never ye drink anything but watter, caller watter, my man."

As he said the words, he stretched out his own hand to the mug, lifted it to his lips, and swallowed a great gulp.

"Dinna do't, I tell ye, Gibbie," he repeated.

Gibbie shook his head with positive repudiation.

"That's richt, my man," responded his father with satisfaction. "Gien ever I see ye pree (taste) the boatle, I'll warstle frae my grave an' fleg ye oot o' the sma' wuts ye hae, my man."

Here followed another gulp from the mug. The threat had conveyed nothing to Gibbie. Even had he understood, it would have carried anything but terror to his father-worshipping heart.

"Gibbie," resumed Sir George, after a brief pause, "div ye ken what fowk'll ca' ye whan I'm deid?"

Gibbie again shook his head — with expression this time of mere ignorance.

"They'll ca' ye Sir Gibbie Galbraith, my man," said his father, "an' richtly, for it'll be no nickname, though some may lauch 'cause yer father was a sutor, an' mair 'at, for a' that, ye haena a shee to yer fut yersel', puir fellow! Heedna ye what they say, Gibbie. Min' 'at ye're Sir Gibbie, an' hae the honor o' the faimily to haud up, my man — an' that ye cannot dee an' drink. This cursit drink's been the ruin o' a' the Galbraiths as far back as I ken. 'Maist the only thing I can min' o' my gran'father — a big bonny man, wi' lang white hair — twise as big's me, Gibbie — is seein' him deid drunk i' the gutter o' the pump. He drank 'maist a' thing there was, Gibbie — lan's an' lordship, till there was hardly an accre left upo' haill Daurside to come to my father — 'maist naething but a wheen sma' hooses. He was a guid man, my father; but his father learnt him to drink afore he was 'maist oot o' 's coaties, an gae him nae schuilin'; an' gien he red himsel' o' a' 'at was left, it was sma' won'er — only, ye see, Gibbie, what was to come o' me? I pit it till ye, Gibbie — what was to come o' me? Gien a kin' neiper, 'at kent what it was to drink, an' sae had a fallow-feelin', hadna ta'en an' learnt me my trade, the Lord kens what wad hae come o' you an' me, Gibbie, my man! — Gang to yer bed, noo, an' lea' me to my ain thouchts; no' 'at they're aye the best o' company, laddie. — But whiles they're no that ill," he concluded, with a weak smile, as some reflex of himself not quite unsatisfactory gloomed faintly in the besmeared mirror of his uncertain consciousness.

Gibbie obeyed, and getting under the Gordon tartan, lay and looked out, like a weasel from its hole, at his father's back. For half an hour or so Sir George went on drinking. All at once he started to his feet, and turning towards the bed a white face distorted with agony, kneeled down on the box and groaned out:

"O God, the pains o' hell hae gotten haud upo' me. O Lord, I'm i' the grup o' Sawtan. The deevil o' drink has me by the hause. I doobt, O Lord, ye're gauin' to damn me dreidfu'. What guid that'll do ye, O Lord, I dinna ken, but I doobtna ye'll dee what's richt, only I wuss I hed never crossed ye i' yer wull. I kenna what I'm to dee, or what's to be deene wi' me, or whaur ony help's to come frae. I hae tried an' tried to maister the drink, but I was aye whumled. For ye see, Lord, kennin' a' thing as ye dee, 'at until I hae a drap i' my skin, I canna even think; I canna min' the sangs I used to sing, or the prayers my mither larnt me sittin' upo' her lap. Till I hae swallowed a mou'fu' or twa, things luik sae awfu' like, 'at I'm fit to cut my thro't; an' syne, ance I'm begun, there's nae mair thoucht o' endeevourin' to behaud (withhold) till I canna drink a drap mair. O God, what garred ye mak things 'at wad mak whusky, whan ye kenned it wad mak sic a beast o' me?"

He paused, stretched down his hand to the floor, lifted the mug, and drank a huge mouthful; then with a cough that sounded apologetic, set it down, and recommenced:

"O Lord, I doobt there's nae houp for me, for the verra river o' the watter o' life wadna be guid to me wantin' a drap frae the boatle intil 't. It's the w'y wi' a' hiz 'at drinks. It's no 'at we're drunkards, Lord — ow na! it's no that, Lord; it's only 'at we canna dee wantin' the drink. We're sair drinkers, I maun confess, but no jist drunkards, Lord. I'm no drunk the noo; I ken what I'm sayin', an' it's sair trowth, but I cudna hae prayt a word to yer lordship gien I hadna had a jooggy or twa first. O Lord, deliver me frae the pooer o' Sawtan. — O Lord! O Lord! I canna help mysel'. Dinna sen' me to the ill place. Ye loot the deils gang intil the swine, lat me tee."

With this frightful petition, his utterance began to grow indistinct. Then he fell forward upon the bed, groaning, and his voice died gradually away. Gibbie had listened to all he said, but the awe of hearing his father talk to one unseen, made his soul very still, and when he ceased he fell asleep.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

Alas for the human soul inhabiting a drink-fouled brain! It is a human soul still, and wretched in the midst of all that whisky can do for it. From the pit of hell it cries out. So long as there is that which can sin, it is a man. And the prayer of misery carries its own justification, when the sober petitions of the self-righteous and the unkind are rejected. He who forgives not is not forgiven, and the prayer of the Pharisee is as the weary beating of the surf of hell, while the cry of a soul out of its fire sets the heartstrings of love trembling. There are sins which men must leave behind them, and sins which they must carry with them. Society scouts the drunkard because he is loathsome, and it matters nothing whether society be right or wrong, while it cherishes in its very bosom vices which are, to the God-born thing we call the soul, yet worse poisons. Drunkards and sinners, hard as it may be for them to enter into the kingdom of heaven, must yet be easier to save than the man whose position, reputation, money, engross his heart and his care, who seeks the praise of men and not the praise of God. When I am more of a Christian, I shall have learned to be sorrier for the man whose end is money or social standing than for the drunkard. But now my heart, recoiling from the one is sore for the other —for the agony, the helplessness, the degradation, the nightmare struggle, the wrongs and cruelties committed, the duties neglected, the sickening ruin of mind and heart. So often, too, the drunkard is originally a style of man immeasurably nobler than the money-maker! Compare a Coleridge, Samuel Taylor or Hartley, with — no; that man has not yet passed to his account. God has in his universe furnaces for the refining of gold, as well as for the burning of chaff and tares and fruitless branches; and, however they may have offended, it is the elder brother who is the judge of all the younger ones.

Gibbie slept some time. When he woke, it was pitch dark, and he was not lying on his father's bosom. He felt about with his hands till he found his father's head. Then he got up and tried to rouse him, and failing, to get him on to the bed. But in that too he was sadly unsuccessful: what with the darkness, and the weight of him, the result of his boy's best endeavor was, that Sir George half slipped, half rolled down upon the box, and from that to the floor. Assured then of his own helplessness, wee Gibbie dragged the miserable bolster from the bed, and got it under his father's head; then covered him with the plaid, and creeping under it, laid himself on his father's bosom, where soon he slept again.

He woke very cold, and getting up, turned heels-over-head several times to warm himself, but quietly, for his father was still asleep. The room was no longer dark, for the moon was shining through the skylight. When he had got himself a little warmer, he turned to have a look at his father. The pale light shone full upon his face, and it was that, Gibbie thought, which made him look so strange. He darted to him, and stared aghast: he had never seen him look like that before, even when most drunk! He threw himself upon him: his face was dreadfully cold. He pulled and shook him in fear — he could not have told of what, but he would not wake. He was gone to see what God could do for him there, for whom nothing more could be done here.

But Gibbie did not know anything about death, and went on trying to wake him. At last he observed that, although his mouth was wide open, the breath did not come from it. Thereupon his heart began to fail him. But when he lifted an eyelid, and saw what was under it, the house rang with the despairing shriek of the little orphan.

From The Spectator.

A NEW AUTHOR'S GRIEVANCE.

MISS AUSTEN has left us an outline of the very remarkable novel which might have been written if she had worked out the suggestions of her would-be counsellors. At this distance of time, it does not require any great amount of critical sagacity to perceive that these kindly helpers might as well have left Miss Austen alone, though as they no doubt belonged to the numerous class who cannot possibly refrain from offering advice, and nothing survives of their well-meant efforts but her bright little sketch, there is no occasion for any uncharitable feelings towards them. We shall not often smile over such amusing descriptions, but probably there will always be people like Miss Austen's advisers, who know nothing of pictures yet feel that they could give a valuable hint or two to any artist, or who can barely distinguish one note from another, but are amiably ready to encourage and advise a professional musician. And in literary matters especially, the number of those who consider themselves qualified to judge will naturally be great. Perhaps the assumption appears in its mildest form in the jokes which are

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

prefaced with the assurance that they are good enough for Punch, and which leave one rejoicing in the thought that the narrator is not likely to be asked to undertake the editorship of that paper just at present. Very harmless, too, are the people with a general idea that moonlight has a tendency to turn into poetry, and that it is a kindness to call the attention of any young writer of verse to a moonlit scene. They do not seem to remember that the subject is a tolerably obvious one, and that where so many claims have been already marked out, the chances of success must be comparatively small. Then, for the young novelist's benefit, we have the stories that are told as "quite like a romance," their claim to the title resting on a feeble resemblance to some situation which has been fairly worn out in any number of romances. If by any chance a child in real life were changed at nurse — does such a thing ever happen, except in a first volume, to be discovered in the third? — there are plenty of people who would listen greedily to all the details, hurry off to any young friend of theirs who was supposed to write, relate the circumstances in a very exhaustive manner, suggest it as an admirable subject for a story, and go away feeling sure that they had done him a good turn. Still more frequently to be met with are the good-natured folks who would not think of proposing the central idea, but who are ready to offer their modest little contribution of minor incidents to any work in progress. There is no want of variety, at any rate. The youngest boy but one said something unusually clever at breakfast that morning, a neighboring farmhouse has been struck by lightning, and the farmer's wife has had a curiously narrow escape, they have been staying in another county, and have come across something which strikes them as a racy bit of dialect, and they hand over the miscellaneous collection of facts, with the general inquiry, "Now, don't you think that would do to put into your novel?" It does not occur to them to ask what the plan of the novel may be, and whether it will admit of the introduction of little boys, thunderstorms, and studies of peasant life. Indeed, as far as one can judge, they have no idea of any plan at all, but imagine a half-written romance to be something like a carpet-bag.

Still, after their own fashion, all these people may be supposed to have the good of the young poet or novelist at heart. There will, no doubt, be some amusement, and even, perhaps, a little irritation mixed with the gratitude with which their offers of assistance are received. One of M. Feuillet's heroes was seriously discomposed when he found that his wife confused the eighth and the eighteenth centuries in her description of the book he was writing, and the suggestions of these kindly counsellors are often quite as absurdly wide of the mark, and betray as utter an ignorance of their friend's scope and aim. As they urged a denunciation of tithes on Miss Austen, so would they urge anything which happened to take their fancy on George Eliot or "Ouida" with equal readiness. But the irritation without any touch of the pleasanter feeling is reserved for another class, the people who cannot go near the humblest and most harmless writer of stories without professing that they expect to be put into a novel directly. The amusement, as in the case of most time-honored jokes, is entirely on one side. The pretence of expectation is about as humorous as if they declared that they expected him to eat them. It was all very well for Balzac to plan the "Comédie Humaine," with its vast multitude of characters, and it might be supposed that he could find room for anything or anybody in his endless volumes. But the small fry of novelists have not these wide sympathies, and do not so much reject large classes as pick out some very small class, or it may be only a few stray characters here and there, with whom they may hope to be able to deal. It is cruelly depresssing to suggest to a beginner that he should attempt the portraits of his acquaintances generally. Perhaps his ideal world is all the dearer to him because it is a refuge where he may hope to be safe from some of them, and he may even feel that he has made more involuntary studies already than he will ever care to use. It may amuse and interest people to look upon themselves for a moment in the light of raw material for a book, especially as they are not likely to be much struck with their own rawness. And of course there are novelists who can give a charm to the most commonplace subjects. But the young author, with his narrower sympathies, feels the task beyond his power. He will have too much respect for the marvels that have been achieved, to join with Mrs. Poyser in asserting that "it's poor eating when the flavor o' the meat lies i' the cruets," but he will be forced to realize, with a crushing sensation of helplessness, how very small his own particular cruet is. And if just at that time he has a half-finished story in his brain, there may be another touch of irritation in the suggestion. A romance which is planned, but not yet

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

written, is a young author's paradise. It is an enchanted land, with all the freshness of discovery still about it. It will be at least half spoilt by the time it is put on paper, but, as yet there has been no wearisome work with pen and ink, and no search for fitting words with which to describe it. The scenery which is to serve as a background becomes clearer day by day, but this distinctness is rather a gradual growth than a conscious addition of details. Everything is seen in a kind of lucid twilight, softer than the common light of day, and better suited to the little group of figures who move through it, drawing to themselves and partially transforming thoughts and fancies from the outer world. They are paler and more shadowy than actual men and women, but in that transparent atmosphere they are more clearly revealed and more intimately known than one human being ever can be to another. And suddenly into the midst of the group blunders some opaque mass of ordinary flesh and blood, some shallow, commonplace girl, or perhaps a big, fresh-colored fellow, who would like to be humorous, proposing himself or herself, as the case may be, as a candidate for immortality in the pages of the forthcoming novel. The visionary world is so near at hand, and so continually present to its author's thoughts, that as likely as not he may realize the full horror of the idea the moment it is uttered, and the joke may leave behind it some grotesque association with his heroine. He forgets that these people cannot know how incongruous they are, and he resentfully declares to himself that they would be capable of taking one of Leighton's paintings (no lesser name than that of a leading artist will serve, for the most modest of men cannot possibly compare this work to anything he only cares about moderately), cutting out a couple of faces, and smiling through the holes, in the belief that their features harmonized with the rest of the picture. He would not be so sensitive about anything but a half-finished work. When a story is fairly in type, the characters seem to have acquired something of independent life. They have come out of dreamland, they, as it were, draw breath for a little while in common air, and find a home wherever the story of their adventures may chance to be read. They will soon be forgotten, but that does not make them less lifelike, as it is a certainty which they share with most of the readers; and meanwhile they gain amazingly in reality by being spoken of, and having their fortunes made the subject of even a little share of mimic hope and fear. Their destiny is fixed, they must take such praise or blame as may fall to their lot, and there is an end of them. The anxiety, the misgivings, the keen and varying feelings are kept for their successors, whose fate has yet to be decided. Of course, the same people who have suggested plots and incidents, and offered themselves as models, will have something to say to any completed work. The portraits of the author's friends may not be there, but nevertheless they must be sought for, and in all probability will be found. Difficulties will be discovered in some part of the story which he always thought was particularly clear, and the opinions expressed by every one of the characters will be supposed to be his "very own," as children say of their toys. All this, however, is harmless enough, if only the people that he specially detests will not read his story with gushing enthusiasm, and praise it with their silliest adjectives. In a perfect state of society it must be supposed that all human beings will like each other very much, and never disagree. But this is probably a long way off, and it is exceedingly difficult even to picture to oneself what life will be like under such circumstances. It is possible, however, to imagine an immense improvement on the present state of affairs. If all those whom from the bottom of our hearts we dislike, would but disagree with us once and for all about everything under the sun, and especially about all matters of taste, — if they would but hate the poets we love, the heroes we worship, and the scenery we admire, and let us keep our own opinions to ourselves, there would be cause for deep thankfulness. Meanwhile, if any writer of stories should suffer in this way, he may well remember that this source of irritation is peculiar to no one pursuit.

From The Spectator.

THE SORROWS OF THE SLOW.

Is there any comfort to be found for those people who are slow in all they think, say, or do, and who are painfully conscious of their own slowness? They need consolation, if it could be discovered anywhere, for it is a most depressing and wearisome consciousness, and the more so because it is continual. From morning to night it underlies all that is said or done, and the certainty of to-morrow's slowness is almost as present with them as the remembrance of the slowness of yesterday or to-day. Almost, but not quite, for there is a glamor

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

about to-morrow which no experience can entirely dispel. To-day may bring some unexpected pleasure of its own, so that we would arrest the course of time to enjoy it longer, if we could; but for all purposes of work, for anything we ought to do, and for all plans that we make, to-morrow will always be worth far more than to-day. Still, for the people who are weighted with the burden of their slowness, even the working hours of the morrow are diminished, and the shadow lengthens out through days to come.

There is one form of consolation which they will reject at once, and unluckily it is precisely the form in which it is generally offered to them. They will have nothing to do with that style of comfort which is embodied in the common saying, "Slow and steady wins the race," and which is more fully set forth in the fable of the hare and the tortoise. Was there ever a story more universally known and quoted? The slightest mention of it calls up the pictures in old editions of the fables which we studied in childhood, and we once more see the hare, preternaturally lively and eager, awaiting the fox's signal to be off, with the tortoise by its side, a flat and melancholy animal. It amused us then, but it will not comfort us in later life. "Slow and steady" is a combination which cannot be taken for granted. That which is done slowly is not necessarily done steadily; in fact, the slowness may be principally caused by hesitation and uncertainty, which do not exactly conduce to steadiness, nor ensure success in any race. Slowness is so far from being always the plodding progress of enduring strength, that it may be merely a kind of mental short-sightedness, wasting time in trying each step to make sure that the footing is secure, and painfully examining the ground which keener eyes would have surveyed in a moment. The fable of the hare and the tortoise is usually misapplied, for it is evident that it was originally intended as a warning to the hare, and not at all as an encouragement to the tortoise. There will always be some people who are boastful, and others who have very little to boast of, and it was the most natural thing in the world that the latter should take a very early opportunity of composing an unpleasant little fable, to show their brilliant friends that quickness was not everything, but that to be successful it needed to be combined with other qualities. It was a true and very useful lesson, for brilliancy and quickness may undoubtedly be found apart from perseverance, raising hopes which will not be realized, — and no doubt there were many people who were delighted to repeat and emphasize the warning. But since men are good-natured, as a rule, and prompt to offer consolations, if they happen to have any ready-made ones at hand, they were willing enough to use the fable as an encouragement to those who might naturally be discouraged in the great race. And in point of fact, it is nearly always quoted for that purpose. The dull child poring over his lessons hears it, and the youth who is just starting in life, and who cannot by any stretch of friendly partiality be complimented on his quickness, will find some allusion to it in the parting speeches of his relations. This use of it proves more kindliness of intention than discernment. The author of the fable intended, as was said, to show that quickness is not everything; but on his own showing it is so very nearly everything, that he found it necessary to combine it with the most egregious folly, to make his story hold together till he could arrive safely at the moral. The tortoise has no real advantage over his antagonist. If the quick men were always fools, who presumed on their quickness, there would be something in the fable, and slowness might come in time to be considered a valuable quality. Even then we might ask whether the success which the tortoise achieved is to be seriously offered to slow people as the type of a desirable triumph. There are some who might feel that the victory which was due entirely to the over-confidence of an opponent, and which was secured by carefully sneaking past him, and not rousing him to display his powers, was a victory which would be a great deal less honorable than many defeats. To triumph thus could hardly have given the tortoise confidence in anything but his ability to detect and profit by the follies of his fellow-creatures, — a valuable talent, no doubt, but not the object of universal ambition, and not necessarily allied to slowness of any kind. And even if we do concede everything, if it be taken for granted that speed is associated with instability, and slowness with steadfast tenacity of purpose, the tortoise could have no advantage except in a prolonged contest. But many races, for many of the pleasant things of life, are short and quickly decided; and every such race is lost beforehand by the man who longs for the prize, but is not swift. He hardly knows that the race is to be run, before the winner is at the goal.

Rejecting this consolation, then, what other remains? It is difficult to see any, unless it may be suggested that the man

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

who is aware of his own slowness, is, perhaps, not likely to be particularly vain. Unluckily, he is not a whit more secure from self-consciousness, from selfish absorption in his own desires and aims, and from thin-skinned irritability, than his quicker neighbors. And he may be just as eager for praise, just as "hungry for acknowledgment," as the vainest of mankind. His security only amounts to this, — that he will not have what is, after all, the pleasantest form of vanity, that delight in one's own powers which is shown by playing with them, it may be a little ostentatiously now and then, but still in a manner which conveys to the bystanders a happy feeling of deftness, assurance, and ease. The slow man never plays with his powers, — he has not time, even if he were not doubtful of them. It is humiliating to be taken unawares, and he is taken unawares every day of his life, and is always expecting to be taken unawares, till he loses confidence in himself. He may strive to be ready, but it is impossible to foresee all contingencies, and his neighbor will adapt himself to the unforeseen circumstances while he hesitates. When he talks, he catches a joke, or an allusion, or the simple meaning of a phrase, a little after everybody else, and is afraid of a sudden remark, lest it should not immediately suggest an answer. By means of an anxious and unremitting effort, he contrives to maintain himself in his place, a little behind his friends, who are talking easily. In his conversation, at any rate, he will have no touch of vanity; but is that a gain worth mentioning? He will hardly think it such. Miss Broughton has a scene in one of her stories where the hero and heroine fall into a river, and when they have escaped, and stand wet and shivering on the bank, the man discovers that though he happens to have his pocket-flash with him, it is very nearly empty. The girl is doubtful about drinking what little brandy there is, but she is assured that there is not the slightest chance of its making her drunk, as she fears, and that it would be the best thing possible for her if it did. There are times when the man who is weary of his own slowness and anxious sobriety of mind is half inclined to think that it might be the best thing possible for him if success could intoxicate him a little, send the blood more quickly and recklessly through his veins, and slightly confuse that cold and deliberate self-judgment which checks him in every ambition. But it needs a potent draught to produce so great an effect. He may have only half desired that it should be produced, but if he has even faintly desired it, he can hardly reckon immunity from the risk as a happiness which will counterbalance all his disadvantages.

Among the things which trouble him, he will count the impossibility of persuading his quicker neighbors to understand how slow he is. There are some things which never can be explained. No one, for instance, who finds his way about by a happy instinct, can ever realize the state of mind of an unlucky man who can seldom tell where he has been, and can never tell where he is going. The clear-headed friend thinks that he realizes it perfectly, but he invariably gives directions which take for granted that the questioner knows what everybody knows, while that is precisely what he wants to know. And it is just as impossible to make the fortunate man, who is quick about everything he says or does, understand what it is to be really slow. He is sure he knows, but in estimating it he passes lightly over much of which he has never thought, and will never think, with any reference to time at all. And the certainty that his difficulties will not be understood troubles the man who is slow, even though his work should be finished and crowned with success. The very praise that he has longed for, to give him the confidence that he sorely needs, has in it a note of expectation which alarms him. People seem to assume that he will do much more than he has already done. He is haunted by a vision of himself as others imagine him, and he sees his double making promises for the future, which he will be called upon to perform. At his best and proudest moment he feels that it is his destiny to disappoint all his friends, and he looks forward anxiously to the verdict of his critics, knowing that those who can show but little as the result of their life's work, must expect to have that little more sternly judged.

Is there any consolation to be found for him? Is there any compensating advantage, great or small, annexed to slowness? Or even — to look for comfort of that negative and unsatisfactory kind which consists in finding out the discomforts of our neighbors — is there any disadvantage attached to speed which can for one moment be weighed against the burden just thrown into the scale? One would be inclined to pronounce decisively that there is not, but for the difficulty of speaking on both sides of such a question as this. And there is another reflection which may well cause us to hesitate. It is so seldom that one is allowed to enjoy

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

a grievance at all boastfully without being called upon to recognize the rival grievances of one's neighbors, that it would seem to be always safest to assume that they exist, even if they are not very easy to discover. The proverb tells us that every man knows where his own shoe pinches, and the shoe may pinch in this case as well as in any other. But it is hard for all who are heavy-footed and plodding to think that those who are lightly shod, and go quickly and surely on their way, can be other than the most enviable of mankind.

From The Spectator.

CALCULATING BOYS.

MR. GEORGE BIDDER, once well known to all the world as "the Devonshire calculating boy," died the other day at a ripe age. He had the good sense, after delighting the "groundlings" by performing marvellous arithmetical feats, to study carefully a profession; he became a civil engineer of some eminence; enjoyed the confidence and esteem of Robert Stephenson; was once president of the Institute of Civil Engineers; and drew up some tables which are of use to his professional brethren. Calculating boys are rather obsolete prodigies. Whether it is from the cheapness and abundance of ready-reckoners, or the spread of education and the increase of the ability to make use of logarithm tables, or contempt for the faculty, the lad who can multiply in the twinkling of an eye six figures by six is rare, and is in little request. The modern schoolmaster has no great ambition to foster useless prodigies of the type of Jedediah Buxton or Zerah Colburn. He would probably find that the government inspector rated very cheaply the worth of the juvenile calculator. In fact, this generation is so much a stranger to this juvenile phenomenon, that it knows little of the nature of the feats at which our fathers held up their hands in amazement, and which for a time were supposed to imply intellectual powers of hitherto unheard of vigor, and to be as marvellous as the gift of tongues. In his "Memoir," Zerah Colburn tells us that a notorious free-thinker, who had seen the arithmetical prodigies wrought by him at the age of six, went home much disturbed, passed a sleepless night, and ever afterwards renounced infidel opinions. And this was only one illustration of the vague feeling of awe and open mouthed wonder which his performances excited. People came to consult him about stolen spoons; and he himself evidently thought that there was something decidedly uncanny, something supernatural, about his gift. And no doubt his apparently intuitive mastery over figures, according to perfectly credible accounts, was truly marvellous. On one occasion, Colburn was asked to name the square of 999,999, which he stated to be 999,998,000,001. He multiplied this by 49, and the product by the same number, and the total result he then multiplied by 25. He raised the figure 8 to the sixteenth power with ease. He named the squares of 244,999,755 and 1,224,998,775. He instantly named the factors, 941 and 263, which would produce 247,483. He could discover prime numbers almost as soon as named. In five seconds he calculated the cube root of 413,993,348,677. Bidder, as Colburn admits, was even more remarkable in some ways; he could not extract roots or find factors with so much ease and rapidity as Colburn, but he was more at home in abstruse calculations. The calculating powers of both lads began very early. At three years of age, George Bidder answered wonderful questions about the nails in a horse's four shoes. At eight, though he knew nothing of the theory of ciphering, he could answer almost instantaneously how many farthings there are in £868,424,121.

There are two or three curious things true of these calculating juveniles, and the most obvious is that they have grown into men of mediocre ability. None of them have exhibited the slightest tincture of genius in mature life. Zerah Colburn's "Memoir" is an inane production, which would be tedious in the extreme except for its absurd naïveté and the frankness with which the author admits his mediocrity. Speaking of himself, he says, with manifest truth, "he was not remarkable either for quickness of mind or closeness of application." "He was not particularly fortunate in arriving at a result which did not readily present itself." He was put by a patron to Westminster School, and it is pretty clear that he proved rather dull when placed in competition with lads of his own age. The only exception to the rule that juvenile calculators prove mediocrities which occurs to us, is Whately, who had, undoubtedly, for a short time, an extraordinary aptitude for figures, akin to that of Bidder and Colburn, and who, if he had been unfortunate enough to have had a father as vain and silly as Colburn's was, might have been exhibited to admiring crowds. A second fact about these prodigies is that the gift, such as it is, rapidly falls off. In Whately's case, it lasted

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

only two or three years. In Colburn's case it lasted longer, and he ascribes its decline to want of practice when he gave up exhibiting his prowess. But it is pretty apparent that — perhaps partly from premature, exhausting mental exertion — the faculty itself really declined; that it could not flourish along with other faculties, which unfolded themselves as the child grew; and that, as Colburn's general intelligence and knowledge increased, his capacity to answer arithmetical puzzles sensibly diminished. Whately's aptitude for mental calculations vanished as soon as he went to school and began his education, and it seems true of all the precocious calculators that they were at their best only when they had nothing to distract them, and before their minds were disciplined and stored with knowledge. It is almost unnecessary to state that this faculty has no connection with true aptitude for mathematics. None of the prodigies whom we have named grew into eminent mathematicians, or disclosed any high talents for mathematical science. We could mention, it is true, several of the latter — Euler and Wallis, for instance — who were rapid and expert calculators, but none of them exhibited precocious aptitude for ciphering. The youthful Pascal, who discovered for himself the demonstration of the thirty-second proposition of the first book of Euclid, or Newton, who, as a boy, invented cleverly-constructed windmills, belongs to another species from the lads who get coppers by multiplying six figures by six figures, or calculating the number of barleycorns which will extend between London and Paris.

In a small degree the faculty possessed by Colburn and Bidder is exhibited by every proficient bank clerk. It is possessed in degree by many men of business, who can with ease run up simultaneously the three money columns of their ledger, or by clever practical engineers, who can leap to conclusions to which others can only toil by the use of formulæ and pen and ink. But as witnessed in Colburn in his youth, this power of calculation was perhaps the result of a defect, almost as much as of mental power. Take a healthy child, of vigorous mind and quick perceptions. Every hour in the day, and at every inlet of its senses, are rushing in varied conflicting impressions. Its incipient knowledge is a confused, jarring mass of sights and sounds. To such a child, which will grow into the vigorous-minded man, the very sense of number comes late. To bring it forth, the artificial stimulus of the schoolroom may be necessary; and for a richly-stored, quickly working mind to exercise so much abstraction as to look only at things as numbers, is impossible. The tendency of such a mind to roam and diverge forbids this; and yet what is this tendency but imagination in the wild state, so to speak, — imagination which, when disciplined and applied to facts, will be the poet's gift or the savant's power of generalizing? On the other hand, the exercise may be practicable to a poorer and weaker nature. Take a child of sluggish disposition, slow to observe, and with no acute senses, taking in few impressions, and those only of the most obvious kind, with few emotions, rather indolent and self-absorbed. Here we have the elements of a calculating juvenile. Abstraction is easy, when the very poverty of the child's mind saves it from distraction. Freedom of movement is practicable in an empty room. The numerical aspects of things may be paramount in a mind which carries away no vivid impressions of form or color, — which works, in fact, like a cog-wheel. Warburton calls "the routine of demonstration the easiest exercise of the mind, where much less of the vigor than of the attention of the mind is required to excel." This remark is quite untrue, if applied, as Warburton applied it, to the art of the mathematician, who must exercise imagination, whose mind must be stored with countless devices, and who succeeds in solving problems which utterly baffle others not so much because he can command his attention, as because he can combine and recombine figures, symbols, and forms with a fertility of resource of which the non-mathematician has no conception. Warburton's remark is singularly wide of the mark, if offered as an explanation of the secret of a great geometrician's or analytical mathematician's success. But it goes far to explain the art of the infant calculators, who were successful in proportion as their minds became like slates or blackboards. Attention was almost everything to them, and it is oftentimes an easy virtue to a dull disposition, which has no temptation and little power to stray. It is plain from Colburn's "Memoir" that he unconsciously used, especially in squaring and extracting roots, devices which are now well known to arithmeticians and described in common text-books, and it says much for him that he discovered them. But on the whole, a retrospect makes one feel that the world has lost little by the disappearance of the juvenile calculator from the list of curiosities. Colburn was always puzzled as to the use of his gift, and we do not wonder at it.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXIV. } No. 1794.—November 2, 1878. { From Beginning, Vol. CXXXIX.

CONTENTS.

I.	HALLUCINATIONS OF THE SENSES,	Fortnightly Review, 259
II.	WITHIN THE PRECINCTS. By Mrs. Oliphant. Part XVI.,	Advance Sheets, 269
III.	HOLIDAYS IN EASTERN FRANCE. Part II.,	Fraser's Magazine, 274
IV.	"FRED:" A TALE FROM JAPAN,	Blackwood's Magazine, 283
V.	COLOR IN PAINTING,	Cornhill Magazine, 287
VI.	SIR WALTER SCOTT AND THE ROMANTIC REACTION,	Contemporary Review, 298
VII.	"THROUGH THE DARK CONTINENT" IN 1720,	Macmillan's Magazine, 313
VIII.	THE BUZZING OF INSECTS,	Public Opinion, 319
IX.	CAMBODIA,	Spectator, 320

POETRY.

AT NIGHTFALL,	258	TRUE,	258
THE WRONG TIME,	258	WITH A PRESENT,	258

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For EIGHT DOLLARS, remitted directly to the Publishers, the LIVING AGE will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of THE LIVING AGE is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of LITTELL & GAY.

Single Numbers of THE LIVING AGE, 18 cents.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

AT NIGHTFALL.

COMING along by the meadows,
Just after the sun went down,
Watching the gathering shadows
Creep over the hillsides brown;

Coming along in the gloaming,
With never a star in the sky,
My thoughts went a-roaming, a-roaming
Through days that are long gone by;

Days when desire said, "To-morrow,
To-morrow, heart, we'll be gay!"
Days ere the heart heard the sorrow
Which echoes through yesterday.

Life was a goblet burnished
That with love for wine was filled;
The cup is bruised and tarnished,
And the precious wine is spilled.

But to the traveller weary,
Just coming in sight of home,
What does it matter how dreary
The way whereby he has come?

Coming along by the meadows,
And watching the fading day,
Duskier than night's dusky shadows
Fell shadows of yesterday.

In the northern sunset's glimmer
The great bear opened his eyes;
Low in the east a shimmer
Showed where the full moon would rise.

Lights in a window were gleaming,
And some one stood at a gate,
Said, "Why do you stand there dreaming?
And why are you home so late?"

Yesterday's shadow and sorrow
That moment all vanished away!
Here were to-day and to-morrow —
What matter for yesterday?

Good Words. M. A. H.

THE WRONG TIME.

SOME indiscreet Abderite boys,
Within a limpit's hollow,
Offered in laurel-juice blue flies
As victims to Apollo.

The god appeased will bless, they thought,
Our tasks of prose and rhyme;
So they the flitting insects caught,
But lost the flitting time.

When Pedagogue their progress tries,
Nor finds the lesson done,
In vain they plead the sacrifice.
He whips them every one.

G. S. CAUTLEY.

TRUE.

TRUE to the promise of thy far-off youth,
When all who loved thee, for thee prophesied
A grand, full life, devoted to the truth,
A noble cause by suffering sanctified.
True to all beauties of the poet-thought
Which made thy youth so eloquent and sweet;
True to all duties which thy manhood brought
To take the room of fancies light and fleet.
True to the steadfast walk and narrow way,
Which thy forefathers of the covenant trod!
True to thy friend in foul or sunny day,
True to thy home, thy country, and thy God;
True to the world, which still is false to thee,
And true to all — as thou art true to me.
True to the vow that bound us in the lane,
That summer evening when the brown bird sang,
Piercing the silence with sweet notes of pain,
While echoes over all the woodland rang.
True to the troth we plighted on that day,
Each to forsake all other for the one;
Cleaving together through the unknown way,
Till death made void the union then begun.
True to the love brought by a little hand:
True — though the patter of the childish feet
Have passed from earth into the silent land;
Loss hallows love, and love is still complete:
I can lift up mine eyes from teardrops free,
For thou art true to all these things — and me.

All The Year Round.

WITH A PRESENT.

THE index to a book is small
Compared with what the book contains;
The head, though but a little ball,
Incloses ardent, thoughtful brains.

And drops of rain are little things
That point to oceans in the sky;
And bridegrooms deal in little rings
As symbols of the strongest tie.

And little blades of grass, though small,
All point to life within the earth —
That life, that in this great round ball
Gives spring its sweetest, freshest birth.

A woman's eye is but a bead
Set clear and fair 'neath snowy brow,
And yet it shews the fairest creed
Before which men on earth may bow.

And words are little weakling notes
That vanish like a passing sigh,
And yet they tell our sweetest thoughts,
And have told thoughts that will not die.

So this I send is but a mark
Of grateful thoughts and warm esteem —
Is but a little wav'ring spark
Dropped down from friendship's glowing beam!

Chambers' Journal.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Fortnightly Review.

HALLUCINATIONS OF THE SENSES.

By hallucination is meant, in scientific phraseology, such a false perception of one or other of the senses as a person has when he sees, hears, or otherwise perceives as real what has no outward existence — that is to say, has no existence outside his own mind, is entirely subjective. The subject is one which has special medical interest; but it will be seen to have also a large general interest, when it is remembered how momentous a part hallucinations have played sometimes at critical periods of human history. Take, for example, the mighty work which was done in the deliverance of France from English dominion by a peasant girl of eighteen — Joan of Arc, the famous Maid of Orleans, who was inspired to her mission by the vision which she saw, and the commands which she heard, of St. Michael and other holy persons. Now, as there are few persons nowadays who believe that St. Michael really appeared to this enraptured maiden, and as few, if any, will doubt that she herself sincerely believed that he did, one must needs suppose that her visions were hallucinations generated by the enthusiasm of a mind which was in a singularly exalted strain of religious and patriotic feeling.

The special medical interest of the subject lies in this — that there are a great many persons in the world who, suffering under some form or other of nervous disorder, habitually see figures or faces, hear threatening or insulting voices, even feel blows and taste poisons, which have no existence outside their own minds; and neither argument nor demonstration of the impossibility of what they allege they perceive, will shake their convictions in the least. "You assure me," they will say, "that I am mistaken; that there are no such persons as I see, no such voices as I hear; but I protest to you that I see and hear them as distinctly as I see and hear you at this moment, and that they are just as real to me." What are we to reply? I have replied sometimes, "that as you are alone on one side in your opinion, and all the world is on the other side, I must needs think, either that you are an extraordinary genius, far in advance of the rest of the world, or that you are a madman a long way behind it; and as I don't think you to be a genius I am bound to conclude that your senses are disordered." But the argument does not produce the least effect.

Let me give an example or two of the character of these hallucinations, and of their persistence in minds that might be thought sane enough to correct them. The first shall be that of an old gentleman who was much distressed because of an extremely offensive smell which he imagined to proceed from all parts of his body: there was not the least ground, in fact, for this imagination. He was scrupulously clean in person, extremely courteous in manner, thoroughly rational in his conversation on every other subject, a shrewd and clever man of business; no one, talking with him, would, for a moment, have suspected him of entertaining such extraordinary fancies. Nevertheless, his life was made miserable by them; he would not go into society, but took solitary rambles in the country, where he might meet as few persons as possible; in his own house he slept for the first part of the night on the ground-floor, mounting up higher at a later period of the night; and this he did to prevent the bad odors from becoming too concentrated in one room. He believed that people in the next house were irritated and offended by the emanations, for he often heard them moving about and coughing; and when he passed a cabstand in the street, he noticed that even the horses became restless and fidgeted. He used to hang his clothes out of the window at night that they might get pure, until his housekeeper put a stop to the practice by telling him that the exhibition of them would excite the notice and comment of his neighbors. All the while he was conducting his business with propriety and success; his own partners had no suspicion of his condition. Knowing this, I asked him how it was that no one of the many persons whom he met daily in business had ever complained of any bad smell, and the answer he made was that they were all too polite to do so, but he could see that they were affected nevertheless, as they sometimes put their handkerchiefs

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to their noses — no doubt for a quite innocent purpose.

Another gentleman was the victim of a very common hallucination; he was much afflicted by voices, which were continually speaking to him, at all times and all places — in the quietude of his room and in the crowded streets, by night and by day. He had come to the conclusion that they must be the voices of evil spirits in the air which tormented him. They knew his thoughts and replied to them before he had himself conceived them; the remarks which they made were always annoying, often threatening and abusive, and sometimes most offensive and distressing; and they disturbed him so much at night that he got very little sleep. He had been driven to the expedient of buying a musical-box, which he placed under his pillow when he went to bed. The noise of the music drowned the noise of the tormenting voices and enabled him to get to sleep; but, as he said, the measure was not entirely satisfactory, because when the box had played out its tunes, it stopped, and he was obliged to wind it up again. It was impossible to persuade this gentleman, sensible as he seemed in other respects, that the voices had no real existence, and that they were due to the disordered state of his nervous system. After listening attentively to my arguments he went away sorrowful, feeling that I had no help for him. I may remark, by the way, that auditory hallucinations of this kind are apt to occur in prisoners who are subjected to long periods of solitary confinement in their cells: they have no mental resources to fall back upon, and their brooding thoughts, not being distracted by the conversation of others, nor having their usual outlet in their own conversation, become audible by them as actual voices.

I might relate many more examples, but these will suffice. Each sense may of course be affected, and sight stands next to hearing in its liability to suffer. In delirium tremens, hallucinations of sight are characteristic features: the patient commonly sees reptiles and vermin in his room, serpents crawling over the floor, rats and mice running over his bed, and pushes them away in a state of restless agitation. In some forms of insanity, the sufferer mistakes persons, believing entire strangers to be near friends or relations; or, again, he may see a person whom he imagines to be his persecutor, escape from the house, when there was really no such person, and buy a revolver, to be ready for him when next he comes prowling about; and in one form of the deepest melancholy, which is known as melancholia attonita, he has sometimes terrible hallucinations — sees, probably, a deep abyss of roaring flames or a vast sea of blood immediately in front of him, and will not make the least movement, lest he should be precipitated headlong into it. There can be no doubt of the mental disorder of persons who suffer in this way; but it must not be supposed that hallucinations of sight do not occur to persons who are free from mental disorder. I cannot help thinking that they furnish the explanation of the firm belief in ghosts and apparitions which has prevailed among all nations and in all times. A belief so universal must have some deep foundation in the facts of nature or in the constitution of man. One may freely admit that persons have seen apparitions and have heard voices which they thought to be supernatural; but inasmuch as seeing is one thing, and the interpretation thereof quite another thing, it may be right to conclude that they were nothing more than hallucinations, and that the reason why no ghosts are seen now, when people pass through churchyards on dark nights, as our forefathers saw them, is that ghosts are not believed in nowadays, while we have gained a knowledge of the nature of hallucinations, and of the frequency of their occurrence, which our forefathers had not.

One does not fail to notice, when proper attention is given to the subject, a fact which is full of meaning, viz., that the apparitions which have been seen at different ages were in harmony with the dominant ideas or beliefs of the age. It is not probable that any one could be found at the present day to affirm that he had seen an old woman riding through the air on a broomstick to a witch's meeting, because the belief in witchcraft is happily well-nigh

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

extinct; but two or three hundred years ago, when it would have been thought something like blasphemy to doubt the being and doings of witches, persons of character and veracity might have been found to avouch it solemnly. In like manner, apparitions of Satan were not very uncommon in the Middle Ages to persons who, like Luther, were in earnest spiritual conflict with him; but there is no instance on record, so far as I know, of such an apparition having ever been seen by an ancient Greek or Roman. The Satan of the Middle Ages who gave Luther so much trouble had not then been invented. Spirits, ghosts, then, and all apparitions of the same kind, I was prepared to have pronounced unhesitatingly to have been hallucinations, which would be found on examination to reflect pretty fairly the prevailing ideas of the time concerning the supernatural; but it occurred to me that it might be prudent, before doing that, to consult the article on apparitions in the latest edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," lest perchance I should be outrunning current authority; and I have there discovered, to my no small surprise, that it is still an open question whether invisible inhabitants of the unknown world did not take human or other shapes and become visible to men. The writer of the article plainly inclines to the opinion that they do, and that there is more in the matter than science has yet dreamt of. So also think the spiritualists.

I now go on to consider the mode of production of hallucinations. At the first blush there might seem to be a great gap between such false perceptions of the senses as I have given examples of, and the faithfully serving senses of a person who is in good health of mind and body. But here, as elsewhere, in nature we find, when we look closely into the matter, that there is no break; we may be pretty sure, perhaps, that when we say of any phenomenon, however strange, that it is singular and quite unlike anything else in the world, we are mistaken, and that we shall not fail to discover other things like it if we search intelligently. Certainly we can trace gradational states between the most extreme hallucinations and such temporary disorders of the senses as healthy persons often have. Let any one stoop down with his head hanging low for a minute, and when he raises it he will have, besides a feeling of giddiness, a sound of singing or of ringing in his ears, and may see a flash or two of light before his eyes; and there are some persons who, under such circumstances, see actual figures for the moment. These sensations are hallucinations; there is no light, nor sound, nor figure outside to cause them; they are owing to the stimulation of their respective nerve centres by a congestion of blood in the brain, which has been produced by the hanging down of the head. Here, then, we have hallucinations that are consistent with the best health; they are due to temporary causes of disturbance of the circulation, and disappear as they disappear. Going a step further, we may watch at the beginning of a fever how gradually the hallucinations take hold of the mind, until their true nature is not recognized. At first the fever-patient is quite aware of his actual surroundings, knowing the persons and objects about him, and when strange faces seem to appear among the familiar faces, as they do, he knows that they are not real, and will talk of them as visions; perhaps they occur at first only when his eyes are shut, or when the room is dark, and vanish directly he opens his eyes or the room is lit up. After a while they come more often, and whether his eyes are shut or not; he becomes uncertain whether they are real or not, assenting when he is told that they are phantoms, but falling back immediately into doubt and uncertainty. At last they get entire mastery of him, he cannot distinguish in the least between them and real figures, discourses with them as if they were real — is wildly delirious.

If the nature of the process by which we perceive and know an external object, be considered, it will be seen that it is much easier to have a false perception than might appear at first sight. When we look at any familiar object — say a cat or a dog — we seem to see at once its shape, its size, its smoothness of coat, and the other qualities by which we know it to be a cat or a dog, but we don't actually

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

see anything of the kind. The proof is that if a person blind from his birth, who knew the cat and dog perfectly well by touch, were to obtain sight by means of a surgical operation when he was thirty years old, he would not know by sight alone either cat or dog, or be able to tell which was which. But if he were permitted to touch the animals he would recognize them instantly, and ever afterwards the impression which they produce on sight would be associated with the impression which they produce on touch, and he would know them when he saw them. That is the way in which the perception of a particular object is formed — by the association of all the sensations which it is adapted to excite in our different senses, their combination in what we call an idea. For example, in the idea of an orange are combined the sensations which we get by tasting it, by touching it, by smelling it, by looking at it, by handling it, each sensation having been acquired by its particular sense in the course of an education which has been going on ever since we were born: when we have got them in that way, they combine to form the idea of the orange; and it is by virtue of this idea, which has been formed and registered in the mind, that we are able to think of an orange, that is, to form a mental image of it, when it is not present to any sense, and to recognize it instantly when it is. It is plain, then, how large a part, by virtue of its past experience, the mind contributes to each perception: when we look at an orange it tacitly supplies to the impression which it makes on sight all the information about it which we have got at different times by our other senses, and which sight does not in the least give us; the visual impression is no more in truth than a sign to which experience has taught us to give its proper meaning, just as the written or spoken word in any language is a sign which is meaningless until we have been taught what to mean by it. So true it is that the eye only sees what it brings the faculty of seeing, and that many persons have eyes, yet see not.

This being so, it is clear that the idea in the mind will very much affect the perception, and that if any one goes to look at something, or to taste something, or to feel something, with a strongly preconceived idea of what it is, he will be likely, if it is not what he thinks it, to have a mistaken perception — to see, or feel, or touch what he thinks it is, not what it really is. This is, indeed, one of the most common causes of erroneous observation, and one which the scientific observer knows well he must always vigilantly guard against. If a man has a foregone conclusion of what he will see, it is not safe to trust his observation implicitly, either in science or in common life. We witness the most striking examples of this dominion of the idea over sense in persons who have been put into the so-called mesmeric state. The operator gives them simple water to taste, telling them at the same time that it is some nauseating and bitter mixture, and they spit it out with grimaces of disgust when they attempt to drink it; when he tells them that what he offers them is sweet and pleasant, though it is as bittter as wormwood, they smack their lips as if they had tasted something remarkably good; if assured that a swarm of bees is buzzing about them, they are in the greatest trepidation, and go through violent antics to beat them off. Their senses are dominated by the idea suggested, and they are very much in the position of an insane person who believes that he tastes poison in his food when he imagines that some one wishes to poison him, or sees an enemy lurking about his premises when he believes himself to be the victim of persecution.

Here, then, we are brought to one efficient cause of hallucinations — namely, a vividly conceived idea which is so intense that it appears to be an actual perception, a mental image so vivid that it becomes a visual image. Everybody knows that the idea or imagination of a sensation will sometimes cause a person to feel the sensation; the mention or the sight of certain little insects which inhabit the bodies of uncleanly persons, seldom fails to make the skin itch uncomfortably. John Hunter said of himself: "I am confident that I can fix my attention to any part, until I have a sensation in that part." Sir Isaac Newton could call up a spectrum of the sun when he was in the dark, by intense direction of his mind to the idea of it, "as when a man looks earnestly to see a thing which is difficult to be seen." Dickens used to allege that he sometimes heard the characters of his novels actually speak to him; and a great French novelist declared that when he wrote the description of the poisoning of one of his characters, he had the taste of arsenic so distinctly in his mouth that he was himself poisoned, had a severe attack of indigestion, and vomited all his dinner — a most pregnant proof of the power of imagination over sense, because arsenic has scarcely an appreciable taste beyond being sweetish!

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Artists sometimes have, in an intense form, the faculty of such vivid mental representation as to become mental presentation. It was very notable in that extraordinary genius, William Blake, poet and painter, who used constantly to see his conceptions as actual images or visions. "You have only," he said, "to work up imagination to the state of vision, and the thing is done." The power is, without doubt, consistent with perfect sanity of mind, although it may be doubtful whether a person who thought it right for himself and his wife to imitate the naked innocence of Paradise in the back garden of a Lambeth house, as Blake did, was quite sane; but too frequent exercise of the power is full of peril to the mind's stability. A person may call up images in this way and they will come, but he may not be able to dismiss them, and they may haunt him when he would gladly be rid of them. He is like the sorcerer who has called spirits from the vasty deep, and has forgotten the spell by which to lay them again. Dr. Wigan tells of a skilful painter whom he knew, who assured him that he had once painted three hundred portraits in one year. The secret of his rapidity and success was that he required but one sitting and painted with wonderful facility. "When a sitter came," he said, "I looked at him attentively for half an hour, sketching from time to time on the canvas. I wanted no more; I put away my canvas, and took another sitter. When I wished to resume my first portrait, I took the man and set him in the chair, where I saw him as distinctly as if he had been before me in his own proper person — I may almost say more vividly. I looked from time to time at the imaginary figure, then worked with my pencil, then referred to the countenance, and so on, just as I should have done had the sitter been there. When I looked at the chair, I saw the man. . . . Gradually I began to lose the distinction between the imaginary figure and the real person, and sometimes disputed with sitters that they had been with me the day before. At last I was sure of it, and then — and then — all is confusion. I suppose they took the alarm. I recollect nothing more. I lost my senses — was thirty years in an asylum. The whole period, except the last six months of my confinement, is a dead blank in my memory."

Or, if the person does not go out of his mind, he may be so distressed by the persistence of the apparition which he has created as to fall into melancholy and despair, and even to commit suicide.

"I knew," says the same author, "a very intelligent and amiable man, who had the power of thus placing before his own eyes himself, and often laughed heartily at his double, who always seemed to laugh in turn. This was long a subject of amusement and joke; but the ultimate result was lamentable. He became gradually convinced that he was haunted by himself. This other self would argue with him pertinaciously, and, to his great mortification, sometimes refute him, which, as he was very proud of his logical powers, humiliated him exceedingly. He was eccentric, but was never placed in confinement, or subjected to the slightest restraint. At length, worn out by the annoyance, he deliberately resolved not to enter on another year of existence — paid all his debts, wrapped up in separate papers the amount of the weekly demands, waited, pistol in hand, the night of the thirty-first of December, and as the clock struck twelve fired it into his mouth."

Were illustrations needed of the production of hallucination by the intensity of the conception, I might take them from Shakespeare, who has given many instances of these "coinages of the brain" which, he says truly, ecstasy is very cunning in. Hamlet, perturbed by the apparition of his father's ghost, whose commands he was neglecting, bends his eyes on vacancy and holds discourse with the incorporeal air. A dagger, sensible to sight but not to feeling, points Macbeth the way to the bed where lay Duncan whom he was about treacherously to stab; he attempts to clutch it, exclaiming justly when he grasps nothing, —

> There's no such thing:
> It is the bloody business which informs
> Thus to mine eyes.

In the well-known passage in which he compares the imaginations of the lunatic, the lover, and the poet, Shakespeare sets forth the very manner of the production of hallucinations, and illustrates the gradations of the process: —

> The lunatic, the lover, and the poet,
> Are of imagination all compact:
> One sees more devils than vast hell can hold;
> That is the madman: the lover, all as frantic,
> Sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt:
> The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
> Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
> And as imagination bodies forth
> The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothings
A local habitation and a name.

Or I might adduce the case of the great Protestant reformer, Luther, who is said — I know not how truly — to have thrown his inkstand at the devil on one occasion; at any rate the mark of the ink is still shown on the wall of the chamber which Luther occupied. True or not, there is nothing improbable in the story; for Luther, though endowed with great sagacity and extraordinary intellectual energy, entertained the common notions of the personality and the doings of the devil which were current among the people of his age. He pictured him very much as a Saxon peasant pictured him. It was the devil, he believed, who caused a great storm, and he declared that idiots, the blind, the lame, and the dumb were persons in whom devils had established themselves, and that physicians who tried to cure their infirmities as though they proceeded from natural causes were ignorant blockheads who knew nothing of the power of the demon. He speaks of the devil coming into his cell and making a great noise behind the stove, and of his hearing him walking in the cloister above his cell in the night; "but as I knew it was the devil," he says, "I paid no attention to him, and went to sleep."

This, then, is one way in which hallucination is produced — by the downward action of idea upon sense. My illustrations of this mode of production have been taken from sane minds, but the hallucinations of the insane are oftentimes generated in the same way. A person of shy, suspicious, and reserved nature, who imagines that people are thinking or speaking ill of him or going out of their way to do him harm, nurses his habit of moody suspicion until it grows to be a delusion that he is the victim of a conspiracy; he then sees evidence of it in the innocent gestures and words of friends with whom he holds intercourse, of servants who wait upon him, and of persons who pass him in the streets; these he misinterprets entirely, seeing in them secret signs, mysterious threats, criminal accusations. It may be pointed out to him that the words and gestures were perfectly natural and innocent, and that no one but himself can perceive the least offence in them; his belief is not touched by the demonstration, for his senses are enslaved by the dominant idea and work only in its service. Sometimes an insane patient who tastes poison in his food and refuses it when it is given to him by one attendant whom he suspects of poisoning him, will take the same food from another attendant, of whom he has no suspicion, without tasting any poison: a proof how much the morbid idea perverts his taste. There is a form of insanity, known as general paralysis, which is marked by an extraordinary feeling of elation and by the most extravagant delusions of wealth or grandeur, and the patient who labors under it often picks up pebbles, pieces of broken glass, and the like, which he hoards as priceless jewels: there is another form of insanity known as melancholia, which is marked by an opposite feeling of profound mental depression and corresponding gloomy delusions, and the patient who labors under its worst form sometimes sees devils in those who minister to him, hears jeers in their consoling words, and imagines torments in their anxious attentions. In each case the hallucinations reflect the dominant morbid feelings and ideas.

A second way in which hallucinations appear to originate is directly in the organ of sense or in its sensory ganglion, which for present purposes I may consider as one. Stimulation of the organ or of its ganglion will undoubtedly give rise to hallucination: a blow on the eye makes a person see sparks of fire or flashes of light, a blow on the ear makes his ears ring; in fact, any organ of sense, when irritated either by a direct stimulus to its nerve-centre, or by a perverted state of the blood which circulates through it, will have the same sensation aroused in it, no matter what the stimulus, as is produced by its natural stimulus. We can irritate the sensory ganglion directly by introducing certain poisonous substances into the blood, and so occasion hallucinations: for example, when a person is poisoned with belladonna (deadly nightshade) he smiles and stares and grasps at imaginary objects which he sees before him, and is delirious. Other drugs will produce similar effects. A French physiologist has made a great many experiments in poisoning dogs with alcohol by injecting it into their veins, and he has found that he can arouse in them very vivid hallucinations: the dog will start up perhaps with savage glare, stare at the blank wall, bark furiously, and seem to rush into a furious fight with an imaginary dog; after a time it ceases to fight, looks in the direction of its imaginary adversary, growling once or twice, and settles down quietly.

The hallucinations which occur in fevers and in some other bodily diseases evidently

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

proceed directly from disorder of the sensory centres, and not from the action of morbid idea upon sense; for we have seen that before they are fixed the intellect struggles against them successfully and holds them in check. A well-known and instructive instance of hallucinations, due to bodily causes, and which did not affect the judgment, is that of Nicolai, a bookseller of Berlin, who, being a person of great intelligence, observed his state carefully and has given an interesting account of it. He had been exposed to a succession of severe trials which had greatly affected him, when, after an incident which particularly agitated and distressed him, he suddenly saw at the distance of ten paces a figure — the standing figure of a deceased person. He asked his wife if she could not see it, but she, as she saw nothing, was alarmed and sent for a physician. When he went into another room it followed him. After troubling him for a day it disappeared, but was followed by several other distinct figures; some of them the figures of persons he knew, but most of them of persons he did not know. "After I had recovered," he says, "from the first impression of terror, I never felt myself particularly agitated by these apparitions, as I considered them to be what they really were — the extraordinary consequences of indisposition; on the contrary, I endeavored as much as possible to preserve my composure of mind, that I might remain distinctly conscious of what passed within me." He could trace no connection between the figures and his thoughts, nor could he call up at his own pleasure the phantoms of acquaintances which he tried to call up by vivid imagination of them; however accurately and intensely he pictured their figures to his mind, he never once succeeded in his desire to see them externally, although the figures of these very persons would often present themselves involuntarily. He saw the figures when alone and in company, in the daytime and in the night; when he shut his eyes they sometimes disappeared, sometimes not; they were as distinct as if they were real beings, but he had no trouble in distinguishing them from real figures. After four weeks they began to speak, sometimes to one another, but most often to him: their speeches were short and not disagreeable. Being recommended to lose some blood, he consented. During the operation the room swarmed with human figures, but a few hours afterwards they moved more slowly, became gradually paler, and finally vanished. This example proves very clearly that a person may be haunted with apparitions, and yet observe them and reason about their nature as sanely as any indifferent outsider could do. It illustrates very well, too, the second mode of origin; for it is reasonable to suppose that they were produced by congestion of blood in the brain acting upon the sensory centres, and that they were dissipated by the removal of the congestion by blood-letting. This is the more probable, as cases have been recorded in which the suppression of a habitual discharge of blood from the body has been followed by hallucinations, and others again in which hallucinations have been cured by the abstraction of blood.

Exhaustion of the nerve-centres themselves by excessive fatigue, mental and bodily, or by starvation, or by disease, will cause a person to see visions sometimes. I may call to mind the well-known case of Brutus, who, as he sat alone at night in his tent before the decisive battle of Philippi, wrapt in meditation, saw on raising his eyes a monstrous and horrible spectre standing silently by his side. "Who art thou?" he asked. The spectre answered, "I am thy evil genius, Brutus. Thou wilt see me at Philippi." He replied, "I will meet thee there." The religious ascetic who withdrew himself from the society of men to some solitary place in the desert or to some cave in the hills, there passing his lonely life in prayer and meditation, and mortifying his body with long fastings and frequent scourgings, brought himself to such a state of irritable exhaustion that he commonly saw, according to his mood of feeling, either visions of angels and saints who consoled him in his sufferings, or visions of devils who tempted and tormented him.* The shipwrecked sailor, when delirious from the exhaustion produced by want of food and drink, sometimes has attractive visions of green fields and pleasant streams, and

* This is a Mohammedan receipt for summoning spirits: —

"Fast seven days in a lonely place, and take incense with you, such as benzoin, aloes-wood, mastic, and odoriferous wood from Soudan, and read the chapter 1001 times (from the Koran) in the seven days — a certain number of readings, namely, for every one of the five daily prayers. That is the secret, and you will see indescribable wonders; drums will be beaten beside you, and flags hoisted over your head, and you will see spirits full of light and of beautiful and benign aspect." — "Upper Egypt; its People and Products," by Dr. Klunzinger, p. 386.

An acquaintance of his, who had undergone the course of self-mortification, said that he really saw all kinds of horrible forms in his magic circle, but he saw them also when his eyes were shut. At last he got quite terrified and left the place.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

cannot be prevented from throwing himself overboard in the mad desire to reach them. The dying person, in the last stage of exhaustion from a wasting disease, has had his death-bed visions of joy or of horror: the good man, whose mind was at rest, has been comforted by visions of heaven; the wicked man, whose troubled conscience would not let him die in peace, has been terrified with spectres of horror — the murderer perhaps by the accusing apparition of his victim. These were thought at one time to be supernatural visitations; they are known now to be for the most part hallucinations, such as occur in the last stage of flickering life, when, to use Shakespeare's words, —

His brain doth, by the idle comments that it makes,
Foretell the ending of mortality.*

I cannot of course enumerate all the bodily conditions in which hallucinations appear, but there is one more which I shall mention particularly, because it has been the foundation of a prophetic or apostolic mission. It is not at all uncommon for a vivid hallucination of one or other of the senses, of hearing, of sight, of smell, of touch, of muscular sensibility, to precede immediately the unconsciousness of an epileptic fit. It may be a command or threat uttered in a distinct voice, or the figure of a person clearly seen, or a feeling of sinking into the ground or of rising into the air; and a common visual hallucination on such occasions is a flash, a halo or a flood of bright or colored light, which makes a strong impression before the person falls unconscious. When he comes to himself, he remembers it vividly, and believes perhaps that it was a vision of an angel of light or of the Holy Ghost. There can be no doubt that angelic apparitions and heavenly visions have sometimes had this origin. Proceeding from the sensory centre, not from the higher centres of thought, they are calculated to produce the stronger impression of their miraculous nature; for if the person knows that he was not thinking of anything of the kind when the vision occurred, he will naturally be the more startled and affected by it. I might give many striking examples in proof of what I say, but I will content myself with an ordinary and comparatively recent one. Two or three years ago a laborer in the Chatham dockyard, who was epileptic and had once been in an asylum for insanity, suddenly split the skull of a fellow-laborer near him with an adze. There was no apparent motive for the deed, for the men were not on bad terms. He was of course tried for murder, but was acquitted by the jury on the ground of insanity, in accordance with the medical evidence, but directly in the teeth of a strong charge of the judge, and much to the disappointment of certain newspapers whose editorial feelings are sadly harrowed whenever an insane person escapes from the gallows. He is now in the criminal asylum at Broadmoor, and he has told the medical officers there — what was not known at the trial — that some years before the murder he had received the Holy Ghost; that it came to him like a flash of light; and that his own eyes had been taken out and other eyes, like balls of fire, substituted for them. A characteristic epileptic hallucination! Let us suppose that this man had undertaken some prophetic mission, as epileptics have done, and had put into it all the energy of his epileptic temperament, he would have declared with perfect sincerity, so far as he was concerned, that the Holy Ghost appeared to him in a vision as an exceeding bright light, and, behold! his own eyes were taken out and balls of fire were in their places.

Some persons maintain that the earliest visions of Mahomet, who, like Cæsar, was epileptic, were of this kind, and that his change of character and the assumption of his prophetic mission followed an epileptic vision. Tradition tells us that he was walking in solitude in the lonely defiles and valleys near Mecca, when every stone and tree greeted him with the words, "Hail to thee, O messenger of God!" He looked round to the right and to the left, but discovered nothing but stones and trees. Soon after this, the angel Gabriel appeared to him in a vision

* In the Second Part of "Henry VI.," Shakespeare gives an instance of a fearful death-bed hallucination, when Cardinal Beaufort is at the point of death: —

King. How fares my lord? Speak, Beaufort, to thy sovereign.
Cardinal. If thou be'st death, I'll give thee England's treasure,
Enough to purchase such another island,
So thou wilt let me live, and feel no pain.
King. Ah, what a sign it is of evil life,
Where death's approach is seen so terrible!
Warwick. Beaufort, it is thy sovereign speaks to thee.
Car. Bring me unto the trial when you will.
Died he not in his bed? where should he die?
Can I make men live, whether they will or no?
O torture me no more! I will confess.
Alive again? then show me where he is:
I'll give a thousand pounds to look upon him.
He hath no eyes, the dust hath blinded them.
Comb down his hair; look, look, it stands upright,
Like lime-twigs set to catch my winged soul.
Give me some drink; and bid the apothecary
Bring the strong poison that I bought of him.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

on the mountain Hira, and announced to him the message of God. The origin of the hallucination seems to have been in this wise. While walking in the valley meditating in solitude on the degrading idolatry of the people, and girding himself to the resolution to undertake a great work of reform which might well seem beyond his strength and make him pause, the intense thoughts of his mental agony were suddenly heard by him as a real voice, where there was no voice; and the vision which he saw when he next fell into an epileptic trance was deemed to be the apparition of the angel Gabriel.

If this be so, and much more if all the apparitions and visions which mankind have seen at different times were really hallucinations, it is startling to reflect what a mighty influence illusions have had on the course of human history. One is almost driven to ask in despair whether all in the world is not illusion, whether "all that we see and seem is not a dream within a dream." But there are countervailing considerations which may abate alarm. If a great work in the world has been done in consequence of a vision which was not, as it was believed to be, a supernatural revelation, but a hallucination produced in accordance with natural laws, the work done, were it good or bad, was none the less real. And inasmuch as the hallucination, whatever its character, is in accordance with the habit of thought and feeling of the person to whom it occurs, and is interpreted, if it be not actually generated, by his manner of thinking, we may put it out of sight as a thing of secondary importance, as an incidental expression, so to speak, of the earnest belief, and fix our minds on this belief as the primary and real agent in the production of the effect. Had Mahomet never seen the angel Gabriel, it is probable that the great mission which he accomplished — the overthrow of idolatry and polytheism and the welding of scattered tribes into a powerful nation — would have been accomplished either by him or by some other prophet, who would have risen up to do what the world had at heart at that time. Had any one else who had not Mahomet's great powers of mind, and who had not prepared himself, as he had done, by many silent hours of meditation and prayer, to take up the reformer's cross, seen the angel Gabriel or any number of angels, he would not have done the mighty work. Who can doubt that the mission of Mahomet was the message of God to the people at that time, as who can doubt that the thunder of the Russian cannon has been the awful message of God to the Mahometan Turks of this time?

So much then for the nature of hallucinations and their principal modes of origin. Although they sometimes originate primarily in the sensory centres, and sometimes primarily in the higher centres of thought, it is very probable that, in many instances, they have a mixed origin. It can hardly be otherwise, seeing how intimate is the structural and functional connection between the nerve-centres of thought and sense, and how likely so closely connected nerve-centres are to sympathize in suffering when the one or the other is disordered.

No one pretends that a person who, laboring under hallucinations, knows their true nature, as Nicolai did, is insane; but it is often said that he has passed the limits of sanity and must be accounted insane when he does not recognize their real nature, and believes in them and acts upon them. But the examples which I have given prove this to be too absolute a statement. I should be very loath to say that either Mahomet or Luther was mad. When the hallucination is the consistent expression of an earnest and coherent belief, which is not itself the product of insanity, it is no proof of insanity, although it may indicate a somewhat unstable state of the brain, and warn a prudent man to temper the ardor of his belief. When, however, a person has hallucinations that are utterly inconsistent with the observation and common sense of the rest of mankind, when he cannot correct the mistakes of one sense by the evidence of another, although every opportunity is afforded him to do so, when he believes in them in spite of confuting evidence, and when he suffers them to govern his conduct, then he must certainly be accounted insane: he is so much out of harmony of thought and feeling with his kind that we cannot divine his motives or reckon upon his conduct, and are compelled to put him under restraint. Persons of this class are apt to be troublesome and even dangerous; believing that they are pursued by a conspiracy, hearing the threatening voices of their persecutors wherever they go, seeing proofs everywhere of their evil machinations, smelling poisonous fumes, feeling the torture inflicted by concealed galvanic wires, they endeavor to protect themselves by all sorts of devices — appeal to the magistrates and the police for assistance, become public nuisances in courts of justice, are, perhaps, driven at last, either from despair of getting redress, or by the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

fury of the moment, to attack some one whom they believe to be an agent in the persecution which they are undergoing. Some of them hear voices commanding them peremptorily to do some act or other — it may be to kill themselves or others — and they are not unlikely in the end to obey the mysterious commands which they receive.

Having said so much concerning the causation and character of hallucinations, I ought, perhaps, before concluding, to say something about the means of getting rid of them. Unfortunately, it is very little that I can say, for, when once they have taken firm hold of a person, they are seldom got rid of. When they occur during an acute case of insanity, where there is much mental excitement, they certainly often disappear as the excitement passes off, or soon afterwards, just as they disappear when the delirium of fever subsides; but when they have become chronic they hold their ground in defiance of every kind of assault upon them. Over and over again the experiment has been tried of proving to the hallucinated patient in every possible way, and by every imaginable device, that his perceptions are false, but in vain.

> You may as well
> Forbid the sea for to obey the moon
> As or by oath or counsel shake
> The fabric of his folly, whose foundation is > Piled upon his faith, and will continue
> The standing of his body.

There is more to be done to prevent hallucinations, I think, than to cure them; that is to say, by prudent care of the body and wise culture of the mind. Looking to their mode of origin, it is obviously of the first importance, trite maxim as it may seem, to keep the body in good health; for not only will bodily disorder directly occasion hallucinations by disturbance of the sensory centres, but by its depressing influence on the entire nervous system it hinders sound, and predisposes to unsound, thought and feeling. Every one knows how hard a matter it is to perceive accurately, to feel calmly, and to think clearly, when the liver is out of order; there is then a good foundation for hallucination. It has so long been the habit to exalt the mind as the noble, spiritual, and immortal part of man, at the expense of the body, as the vile, material, and mortal part, that, while it is not thought at all strange that every possible care and attention should be given to mental cultivation, a person who should give the same sort of careful attention to his body would be thought somewhat meanly of. And yet I am sure that a wise man, who would ease best the burden of life, cannot do better than watchfully to keep undefiled and holy — that is, healthy — the noble temple of his body. Is it not a glaring inconsistency that men should pretend to fall into ecstasies of admiration of the temples which they have built with their own hands, and to claim reverence for their ruins, and, at the same time, should have no reverence for, or should actually speak contemptuously of, that most complex, ingenious, and admirable structure which the human body is? However, if they really neglect it, it is secure of its revenge; no one will come to much by his most strenuous mental exercises, except upon the basis of a good organization — for a sound body is assuredly the foundation of a sound mind.

In respect of the mental cultivation to be adopted, in order to guard against hallucination, I can now only briefly and vaguely enforce one important principle — namely, the closest, most exact, and sincere converse with nature, physical and human. Habitual contact with realities in thought and deed is a strong defence against illusions of all sorts. We must strive to make our observation of men and things so exact and true, must so inform our minds with true perceptions, that there shall be no room for false perceptions. Calling to mind what has been said concerning the nature of perception — how the most complete and accurate perception of an object is gained by bringing it into all its possible relations with our different senses, and so receiving into the idea of it all the impressions which it was fitted to produce upon them — it will appear plainly how necessary to true perception, and to sound thought, which is founded on true perception, and to wise conduct, which is founded on sound thought, are thoroughness and sincerity of observation. So to observe nature as to learn her laws and to obey them, is to observe the commandments of the Lord to do them. Speculative meditations and solitary broodings are the fruitful nurse of delusions and illusions. By faithfully intending the mind to the realities of nature, as Bacon has it, and by living and working among men in a healthy, sympathetic way, exaggeration of a particular line of thought or feeling is prevented, and the balance of the faculties best preserved. Notably the best rules for the conduct of life are the fruits of the best observations of men and things; the achievements of science are no more than

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the organized gains — orderly and methodically arranged — of an exact and systematic observation of the various departments of nature; the noblest products of the arts are nature ennobled through human means, the art itself being nature. There are not two worlds — a world of nature and a world of human nature — standing over against one another in a sort of antagonism, but one world of nature, in the orderly evolution of which human nature has its subordinate part. Delusions and hallucinations may be described as discordant notes in the grand harmony. It should, then, be every man's steadfast aim, as a part of nature, his patient work, to cultivate such entire sincerity of relations with it; so to think, feel, and act always in intimate unison with it; to be so completely one with it in life, that when the summons comes to surrender his mortal part to absorption into it, he does so, not fearfully, as to an enemy who has vanquished him, but trustfully, as to a mother who, when the day's task is done, bids him lie down to sleep.

HENRY MAUDSLEY.

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER XXX.

LOTTIE'S FATE.

LOTTIE went up the Dean's Walk hastily, feeling as if she had taken flight. And she was taking flight. She could not bear to meet the people coming from the Abbey, among whom, no doubt, her father and his wife would be. Lottie was scarcely aware that there was anything else in her mind. She hurried to the slopes as the natural refuge of her trouble. The wind blowing fresh in her face, the great sweep of distance, the air and the clouds, the familiar rustle of the trees, seemed to have become part of her, a necessity of her living. And the slopes were almost deserted now. In October the night comes early, the afternoon is short, even before the winds become chill; already it was darkening, though the afternoon service was but newly over. The trees were beginning to lose their gorgeous apparel; every breeze shook down hosts of leaves, shreds of russet brown and pale gold; the wind was wistful and mournful, with a sigh in it that promised rain. Lottie saw nobody about. She stole through the trees to her favorite corner, and leaned upon the low parapet, looking over the familiar scene. She was so familiar with it, every line; and yet it seemed to her to-night like scenery in a theatre which by-and-by would collapse and split asunder, and give place to something different. It would vanish from her sight, and in place of it there would appear the dim background of one of the little rooms at home, with a figure in a blue gown relieved against it, tossing about a mountain of braids and plaits. Lottie did not feel sure that this figure would not appear at her very side, lay an imperative hand on her shoulder, and order her to give up the secrets of her own being. Thus she carried her care within her. She stood leaning over the parapet, with the trees rustling around, scarcely aware what she was thinking of. Did she expect any one? She would have said no. The night was overcast and growing dismal, why should she expect any one? What reason could he have for coming out here? He could have no instinctive knowledge of her misery to bring him, and he had no longer that excuse of his cigar after dinner as on the happy nights when the air was still like summer. No! it was only for the stillness, only for the air, only to fling her troublesome thoughts out to the horizon and empty her mind, and thus feel it possible to begin again, that she had come. And never had that stillness been so still before. By-and-by this scene would melt away, and it would be the little dining-room in the lodge, with the white tablecloth and the lamp lighted upon it. She had been weary of her home, she had half despised it; but never had she been disgusted, afraid of it, never loathed the thought of going back to it before. And she could not talk to anybody about this; they were all very kind, ready to be sorry for her, to do anything they could for her, but she could not bear their sympathy to-night.

All at once, in the silence which was so full of the whisper of the leaves and the sighs of the wind that she had not heard any footstep, there came a voice close to her elbow which made Lottie start.

"Is it really you, Miss Despard? I had almost given up hopes; and alone! I thought you were never to be alone again," said Rollo, with pleasure in his voice.

How it startled her! She looked round upon him with so much fright in her eyes that he was half vexed, half angered. Was it possible that Lottie after all was just like the rest, pretending to be aston-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ished by his appearance when she knew as well ——

"You surely are not surprised to see me?" he said, with a short laugh.

"I did not think of seeing you," she said quietly, and looked away from him again.

Rollo was angry, yet he was touched by something in her tone; and there must be something to cause this sudden change. She had always been so frank and simple in her welcome of him, always with a light of pleasure on her face when he came in sight; but she would not so much as let him see her face now. She looked round with that first start, then turned again and resumed her dreary gaze into the night. And there was dejection in every line of her figure as she stood dimly outlined against the waning light. Suddenly there came into Rollo's mind a recollection that he had heard something to account for this, without accusing her of petty pretence or affectation.

"Something has happened," he said, with a sense of relief which surprised himself. "I remember now. I fear you are not happy about it."

"No," she said with a sigh. Then Lottie made a little effort to recover herself; perhaps he would not care about her troubles. "It has been a great shock," she said, "but perhaps it may not be so bad after a while."

"Tell me," said Rollo; "you know how much interest I take in everything that concerns you. Surely, Miss Despard, after this long time that we have been seeing each other, you know that? Won't you tell me? I cannot bear to see you so sad, so unlike yourself."

"Perhaps that is the best thing that could happen," said Lottie, "that I should be unlike myself. I wish I could be like some one with more sense; I have been so foolish! Everybody knows that we are poor; I never concealed it, but I never thought —— Oh! how silly we have been, Law and I. I used to scold him, but I never saw that I was just the same myself. We ought to have learned to do something, if it were only a trade. We are both young and strong, but we are good for nothing, not able to do anything. I used to scold him: but I never thought that I was just as bad myself."

"Don't say so, don't say so! You were quite right to scold him; men ought to work. But you," cried Rollo, with real agitation, "it is not to be thought of. You! don't speak of such a thing. What is the world coming to when you talk of working, while such a fellow as I ——"

"Ah! that is quite different," said Lottie. "You are rich, or at least you are the same as if you were rich; but we are really poor, we have no money; and everything we have, it is papa's. I suppose he has a right to do whatever he likes with it; it seems strange, but I suppose he has a right. And then, what is to become of us? How could I be so silly as not to think of that before? It is all my own fault; don't think I am finding fault with papa, Mr. Ridsdale. I suppose he has a right, and I don't want to grumble; it only — seems natural — to tell you." Lottie did not know what an admission she was making. She sighed again into that soft distant horizon, then turned to him with a smile trembling about her lips. It was a relief to tell him; she could speak to him as she could not speak to Captain Temple or Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, though she had known them so much longer. "Perhaps I am only out of temper," she said. She could not but feel more light of heart standing beside him with nobody near; they seemed to belong to each other so.

"How good, how sweet of you to say so," he cried! "Then treat me as if it were natural; come and sit down, nobody will interrupt us; and tell me everything I want to know."

They had met together in Lottie's little drawing-room before, in the eye of day, and three or four times under Lady Caroline's eye; but never before like this in the twilight, all alone in the world as it were, two of them and no more. Lottie hesitated for a moment; but what could be wrong in it? There was nobody to disturb them, and her heart was so full; and to talk to him was so pleasant. She seemed able to say more to him than to any other. He understood her at half a word, whereas to the others she had to say everything, to say even more than she meant before they saw what she meant. She sat down accordingly in the corner of the seat and told him all that happened; herself beginning to see some humor in it as she told the story, half laughing one moment, half crying the next. And Rollo went into it with all his heart. All their meetings had produced their natural effect; for the last fortnight he had felt that he ought to go away, but he had not gone away. He could not deprive himself of her, of their intercourse, which was nothing yet implied so much, those broken conversations, and the language of looks that said so much more than words. Never, perhaps, had his intercourse with any girl been so simple yet so unrestrained.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

If the old captain sometimes looked at him with suspicion, he was the only one who did so; and Lottie had neither suspicion nor doubt of him, nor had any question as to his "intentions" arisen in her mind. She told him her grief now, not dully, with the heavy depression that cannot be moved, but with gleams of courage, of resolution, even of fun, unable to resist the temptation of Polly's absurdity, seeing it now as she had not been able to see it before. "I never knew before," she said fervently, "what a comfort it was to talk things over — but then, who could I talk them over with? Law, who thinks it best not to think, never to mind — but sometimes one is obliged to mind; or Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, whom I cannot say everything to, or —— Mr. Ridsdale!" said Lottie, in alarm, "pray, pray forgive me if I have bored you. I have been pouring out everything to you. I never thought — I did not intend ——"

"Don't tell me that," he said. "I hoped you did intend to confide in me, to trust to my sympathy. Who can be so much interested? to whom can it be so important ——" He leaned forward closer to her, and Lottie instinctively drew away from him a hairsbreadth; but she thought that quite natural too, as natural as that she should be able to speak to him better than to any one else. They had both made the whole avowal of their hearts in saying these words; but it had not been done in words which frightened either or changed their position towards each other. Meanwhile she was content enough, quieted by the sense of leaning her trouble upon him, while he was gradually growing into agitation. Lottie had got all her emergency required — his sympathy, his support, the understanding that was so dear to her. After all her trouble she had a moment of ease; her heart was no longer sore, but soothed with the balm of his tender pity and indignation.

But that which calmed Lottie threw Rollo into ever-increasing agitation. A man who has said so much as that to a girl, especially to one who is in difficulty and trouble, is bound even to himself to say more. The crisis began for him where for her it momentarily ended. To love her and as good as tell her so, to receive, thus ingenuously given, that confession of instinctive reliance upon him which was as good as a betrayal of her love; and to let her go and say nothing more — could a man do that and yet be a man? Rollo was not a man who had done right all the days of his life. He had been in very strange company, and had gone through many an adventure; but he was a man whom vice had never done more than touch. Even among people of bad morals he had not known how to abandon the instincts of honor; and in such an emergency what was he to do? Words came thronging to his lips, but his mind was distracted with his own helplessness. What had he to offer? how could he marry? he asked himself with a kind of despair. Yet something must be thought of, something suggested. "Lottie," he said after that strange pause — "Lottie — I cannot call you Miss Despard any more, as if I were a stranger. Lottie, you know very well that I love you. I am as poor as you are, but I cannot bear this. You must trust to me for everything — you must — Lottie, you are not afraid to trust yourself to me — you don't doubt me?" he cried. His mind was driven wildly from one side to another. Marry! how could he marry in his circumstances? Was it possible that there was anything else that would answer the purpose, any compromise? His heart beat wildly with love and ardor and shame. What would she say? Would she understand him, though he could not understand himself?

"Mr. Ridsdale!" cried Lottie, shrinking back from him a little. She covered her face with her hands and began to cry, being overcome with so many emotions, one heaped on another. At another moment she would not have been surprised; she would have been able to lift her eyes to the glow of the full happiness which, in half-light, had been for weeks past the illumination of her life. But for the moment it dazzled her. She put up her hands between her and that ecstasy of light.

As for Rollo, very different were the thoughts in his mind. He thought Lottie as wise as himself: he thought she had investigated his words; had not found in them the one that is surety for all, and shrank from him. Shame overwhelmed him: the agony of a mind which was really honest and a heart which was full of tenderness, yet found themselves on the verge of dishonor. "Lottie!" he cried with anguish in his voice, "you do not understand me — you will not listen to me. Do not shrink as if I meant any harm."

Then she uncovered her face, and he saw dimly through the twilight a countenance all trembling with emotion and happiness and astonishment. "Harm!" she said, with wonder in her voice — "harm!" His heart seemed to stand

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

still, and all his confused thinkings broken off in the unspeakable contrast between the simplicity of her innocence thinking no evil, and the mere knowledge in his mind which, if nothing more, made guilt possible. Such a contrast shamed and horrified, and filled with an adoration of penitence, the man who might have drawn her into evil, ambiguously, had it been possible. He found himself with one knee on the cold gravel, before he knew, pressing his suit upon her with passion. "Lottie, you must marry me, you must be my wife, you must let me be the one to work, to take care of you, to protect you from all trouble," he cried. But what did Lottie want with those more definite words which he had thought she missed and waited for? Had she not known his secret long ago before he ever spoke a word to her? Had she not been led delicately, tenderly, step by step, through infinite dreams and visions, towards this climax? She cried with happiness and trouble, and the sense of deliverance.

"Oh, why should you kneel to me?" she said. "Do you think it needs that?" While he, more happy than ever he had been in his life, alarmed, disturbed, shaken out of all his habits and traditions, held her fast, like a new-found treasure, and lavished every tender word upon her that language could supply. He owed her a million apologies, of not one of which Lottie was conscious. How could it have been possible for her to suppose, that even for a second, in his inmost thoughts, he had been less than reverent of her? And he — had he meant any harm? He did not think he had meant any harm; yet how, in the name of heaven, was he to marry — how was he to marry — in his present circumstances? While he was pouring out upon Lottie his love and worship, telling her how she had gathered to herself day by day all his thoughts and wishes, this question rose up again in his heart.

"I know," said Lottie, very low — her voice still trembling with the first ecstasy of feeling. It was like the dove's voice, all tenderness and pathos, coming out of her very heart. "I guessed it long — oh, long ago ——"

"How did you do that? Whisper, darling — tell me — when did you first think ——"

Is not this the ABC of lovers? and yet her tone implied a little more than the happy divining of the easy secret. She laughed softly — a variety of music in his ear — the two faces were so close.

"You did not think I knew anything about it. I saw you — looking up at my window — the very night of the wedding. Do you remember?" Again Lottie's low, happy laugh broke into the middle of her words. "I could not think what it meant. And then another time before I knew you — and then —— You did not suppose I saw you. I could not believe it," she said, with a soft sigh of content. Laugh or sigh, what did it matter, they meant the same: the delight of a discovery which was no discovery — the happy right of confessing a consciousness which she dared not have betrayed an hour ago — of being able to speak of it all: the two together, alone in all the world, wanting nothing and no one. This was what Lottie meant. But her disclosures struck her lover dumb. What would she say if she knew his real object then? A prima donna who was to make his fortune — a new voice to be produced in an opera! He shuddered as he drew her closer to him, with terror — with compunction, though he had meant no harm. And he loved her now if he did not love her then — with all his heart now — all the more tenderly, he thought, that she had mistaken him, that she had been so innocently deceived.

By this time it had got dark, though they did not observe it; yet not quite dark, for it is rarely dark out of doors under the free skies, as it is within four walls. It was Lottie who suddenly awoke to this fact with a start.

"It must be late — I must go home," she said. And when she looked about among the ghostly trees which waved and bent overhead, sombre and colorless in the dark — she thought, with a thrill of horror, that hours must have passed since she came here. Rollo too was slightly alarmed. They were neither of them in a condition to measure time; and though so much had happened, it had flown like a moment. They came out from among the trees in the happy gloom, arm-in-arm. Nobody could recognize them; so dark as it was — and indeed nobody was in the way to recognize them — and the Abbey clock struck as they emerged upon the Dean's Walk, reassuring them. Rollo was still in time for dinner, though Lottie might be too late for tea; and the relief of discovering that it was not so late as they thought gave them an excuse for lingering. He walked to the lodges with her, and then she turned back with him; and finally they strayed round the Abbey in the darkness, hidden by it, yet not so entirely hidden as they thought. Only one little jar

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

came to the perfect blessedness of this progress homeward.

"Shall you tell them?" Lottie whispered, just before she took leave of her lover, with a movement of her hand towards the Deanery.

This gave Rollo a serrement du cœur. He replied hastily, "Not to-night," with something like a shiver, and then he added, "Where shall I see you to-morrow?"

This question struck Lottie with the same shock and jar of feeling. Would not he come and claim her to-morrow? This was what she had thought. She did not know what to reply, and a sudden sensation of undefined trouble — of evil not yet so entirely over, as she hoped, came into her mind; but he added, before she could speak, —

"In the old place — that blessed corner which I love better than any other in the world. Will you come while everybody is at the Abbey, Lottie? for we must talk over everything."

This melted the little momentary vexation away, and she promised. And thus they parted perforce — opposite Captain Despard's door. How glad Lottie was that the door was open! It stood open all through the summer, and the habits of the summer were scarcely over. By the light in the dining-room down-stairs and the sound of the voices she divined that tea was not yet over. But she was not able to encounter Mrs. Despard to-night. She did not want to see any one. Her heart was still so full of delicious tumult, her eyes of sweet tears. She had gone out so sorrowful, so indignant, not knowing what was to become of her. And now she knew what was to become of her — the most beautiful, happy fate. He had said he was poor. What did it matter if he was poor? Was she not used to that? Lottie knew, and said to herself with secret joy, that she was the right wife for a poor man. He might have got the noblest of brides, and she would not have been so fit for him; but she was fit for that post if ever a young woman was. She would take care of the little he had which one might be sure he would never do himself — he was too generous, too kind for that; Lottie loved him for his prodigality, even while she determined to control it. She would take care of him and do everything for him, as no woman used to wealth could do. And she would spur him on so that he should do great things — things which he had not done heretofore, only because he had not stimulus enough. He should have stimulus enough now, with a wife who would exult in all he did, and support him with sympathy and help. It was not any passive position that she mapped out for herself. She knew what it meant to be poor, far better than Rollo did. And she did not mind it. Why should she mind it? She had been used to it all her life. She would not care what she did. But he should never have to blush for his wife as a drudge. She would never forget her position, and his position, which was so much greater than hers. This was the first time that Lottie thought of his position. She did so now with a heightening of color, and louder throb of her heart. By this time she was sitting in her own room without even a candle, glad of the seclusion and of the darkness in which she could think, unbetrayed even to herself. Her heart gave a bound, and a flush came to her cheek. There could be no doubt now about her position. No one could dream, no one could think that Rollo's wife was ever to be looked down upon. This gave her a distinct thrill of pleasure; and then she passed it by, to return to a dearer subject — himself! how anxious he had been! as if it were possible she could have resisted his love. He had wooed her, she thought, as if she had been a princess — doubling Lottie's happiness by doing in this respect the thing she felt to be most right and fit, though, oh! so unnecessary in respect to herself! Could he really have any doubt how it would turn out? The thought of this humility in her hero brought tears of love and happiness to Lottie's eyes. Was she the same girl who had sat here in gloom and darkness only last night, wondering what was to become of her? But how was she to know how soon fate would unfold like a flower, and show her what was in store for her? How happy she was — how good, how thankful to God — how charitable to others! She could have gone down-stairs and said something kind even to Polly, had it not been for fear of betraying herself. Everything that was tender and sweet blossomed out in her heart. She was so happy. Is not that the moment in which the heart is most pure, most kind, most humble and tender? God's hand seemed to be touching her, blessing her — and she in her turn was ready to bless all the world.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From Fraser's Magazine.

HOLIDAYS IN EASTERN FRANCE.

II.

LE DOUBS.

FEW travellers in eastern France turn off the great Mulhouse line of railway to visit the ancient city of Provins. Yet none with a real love of the picturesque can afford to pass it by. Airily, nay, coquettishly perched on its smiling green eminence, and still possessed of an antique stateliness in striking contrast with the busy little twin town that has sprung up at its feet, Provins captivates the beholder by virtue alike of its uniqueness and its charm. I can think of nothing in my various travels at all like the little Acropolis of Brie and Champagne, whether seen at a distance on the railway or from the ramparts that encircle it as in the olden time. It is indeed a gem; miniature Athens of a mediæval princedom that, although on a small scale, boasted of great power and splendor; tiny Granada of these eastern provinces, bearing ample evidence of past glories!

You quit the main line at Longueville, and in a quarter of an hour come upon a vast panorama crowned by the towers and dome of the still proud, defiant-looking little city of Provins, according to some writers the Agendicum of Cæsar's "Commentaries;" according to others, more ancient still. It is mentioned in the capitularies of Charlemagne, and in the Middle Ages was the important and flourishing capital of Basse-Brie and residence of the counts of Champagne. Under Thibault VI., called the Chansonnier, Provins reached its acme of prosperity, numbering at that epoch eighty thousand inhabitants. Like most other towns in these regions, it suffered greatly in the Hundred Years' War, being taken by the English in 1432 and retaken from them the following year. It took part in the League, but submitted to Henry IV. in 1590; and from that time gradually declined, at present numbering about seven thousand inhabitants only.

Thus much for its history, which has been chronicled in full by two gifted citizens of modern times, Bourquelot and Opoix: and their works may be consulted in the town library among others on the same subject. We need not, however, go to books and documents for evidence of the past greatness of Provins. The ancient part of it — called the Ville Haute, in distinction from the modern, called the Ville Basse — is an open book that all who run may read.

It is difficult to give any idea of this little citadel, so imposingly commanding the wide valleys and winding rivers at its feet. We climb for a quarter of an hour to find all the remarkable monuments of Provins within a stone's throw; the college, formerly palace of the counts of Champagne, the imposing Tour de César, the Basilica of St. Quiriace with its cupola, the famous Grange aux Dîmes, the ancient fountain, lastly, the ruined city gates and walls. All these are close together, but conspicuously towering over the rest are the dome of St. Quiriace and the picturesque, many-pinnacled stronghold, vulgarly known as Cæsar's Tower. These two crown not only the ruins, but the entire landscape for miles round, with magnificent effect. The tower itself, in reality having nothing to do with its popular name whatever, but the stronghold of the place built by one of the counts of Champagne, is a picturesque object, with its graceful little pinnacles connected by flying buttresses at each corner and pointed tower surmounting all, from which now waves proudly the tricolor flag of the French republic. A deaf and dumb girl leads visitors through a little flower-garden into the interior, and takes them up the winding stone staircase to seek the cells in which Louis d'Outremer and others are said to have been confined. For my own part I prefer neither to go to the top nor bottom of things, feeling no temptation to climb the Pyramids or to dive down into the Mammoth Caves of Kentucky. It is much more agreeable and much less fatiguing to view everything from the level, and this fine old structure called Cæsar's Tower is no exception to the rule. Nothing can be more picturesque than its appearance from the broken ground around, above and below, and no less imposing is the quaint, straggling, indescribable old church of St. Quiriace close by, now a mere patchwork of different epochs, but in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries one of the most remarkable religious monuments in Brie and Champagne. Here was baptized Thibault VI., the song-maker, the lover of art, the patron of letters, and the importer into Europe of the famous Provence rose! Of Thibault's poetic creations an old chronicler wrote, "C'étaient les plus belles chansons, les plus délectables et mélodieuses, qui oncques fussent ouïses en chansons ne instruments, et il les fit écrire en la salle de Provins et en celle de Troyes." Close to the ancient church is the former palace of Thibault, a collége communale for classic and secondary instruction. Unfortunately the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

director had gone off for his holidays, taking the keys with him, so that we could not see the interior and the chapel. It is superbly situated, commanding from the terrace a wide view of surrounding country. Perhaps, however, the most curious relics of ancient Provins are the vast and handsome subterranean chambers and passages which are not only found in the Grange aux Dîmes (literally Tithe Barn), but also under many private dwellings of ancient date.

Those who love to penetrate into the bowels of the earth may visit cave after cave and chamber after chamber in all directions; some of these were of course used for the storage and introduction of supplies in times of war and siege, others have been variously explained. They may have served as crypts for purposes of religious ceremony, also as harbors of refuge for priests and monks, lastly, as workshops. Provins may therefore be called not only a town but a triple city, consisting first of the old, secondly the subterranean, thirdly, the new. Captivating from an artistic and antiquarian point of view as are the two first, all lovers of progress — and the French republic — will not fail to give some time to the last, not omitting on any account the lovely walk on the ramparts before quitting the region of romance for plain matter-of-fact.

A poetic halo still lingers round the rude times of troubadour and knight, but fortunately no such contrast can now be found — at least in France — as then existed between court and people, lord and vassal. The princelings of Brie and Champagne who lived so jollily and regally in the capital of Provins knew how to grind down the people to the uttermost, and levied toll and tax upon every imaginable pretext. The Jew had to pay them for his heresy, the assassin for his crime, the peasant for his produce, the artisan for his right to pursue a handicraft. Now all is good feeling, peace, and prosperity in the modern town, where alike are absent signs of great wealth or great poverty. As yet I am still in a region without a beggar!

Provins affords an excellent example of that spirit of decentralization so usual in France, and unhappily so rare among ourselves. Here in a country town numbering between seven and eight thousand inhabitants only, we find all the resources of a capital on a small scale: public library, museum, theatre, learned societies.* The library contains some curious MSS. and valuable books. The theatre was built by one of the richest and most generous citizens of Provins, M. Garnier, who may be said to have consecrated his ample fortune to the embellishment and advancement of his native town. Space does not permit of an enumeration of the various acts of beneficence by which he has won the lasting gratitude of his fellow-townsmen; and on his death the charming villa he now inhabits, with its gardens, library, art and scientific collections, are to become the property of the town. The Rue Victor Garnier has been appropriately named after this public-spirited gentleman.

There are relics of antiquity to be found in this modern town also, nor have I given anything like a complete account of what is to be found in the old. No one who takes the trouble to diverge from the beaten track in order to visit this interesting little city — Weimar of the troubadours — will be disappointed. I may add, by the way, that the Hôtel de la Boule d'Or, though homely, is comfortable, and that in this out-of-the-way corner the English traveller may even partake of the bière de Bass.

Prom Provins to Troyes is a three hours' journey by rail, and at Troyes, no matter how impatient the tourist may be to breathe the air of the mountains, he must stop a while. Here there is so much to see in the way of antiquities, that several days might be spent profitably and pleasantly, but for the hotels, of which I have little favorable to say. "Dear and dirty" is the verdict I must pass on the one recommended to me as the best. The fastidious traveller will do well therefore so to arrange his journey as to reach Troyes at early morning and start off again at night, though of course such an arrangement will only allow of a hasty glimpse of the various treasures offered to him. Take the churches, for instance. Besides the cathedral, there are six old churches, each of which has some especial interest, and all deserve to be seen in detail. Then there are picturesque mediæval houses, one of the finest libraries in France, a museum, picture-gallery, etc.

The town itself is cheerful, with decorative bits of window-gardening, hanging

* On a former occasion I gave offence to many readers by insisting on the superiority of French over English country towns in this respect. It was urged that under the new Public Libraries Act all our own towns can have a free library if they choose. This I do not deny, but the facts remain as I originally stated them, namely, that in the smallest provincial towns in France you find good free libraries, museums, etc., and in England you do not find them. Instances in point will be adduced farther on.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dormers, abundance of flowers growing everywhere, and much life animating both its old and new quarters. The cathedral, which rises grandly from the monotonous fields of Champagne, just as Ely towers above the flat eastern plains, is also seen to great advantage from the quays, though, when approached nearly, you find it hemmed in with narrow streets. Its noble tower, surmounted by airy pinnacles, and its splendid façade delight and satisfy the eye no less than the interior, gem of purest architecture, blazing from end to end with rich old stained glass! No light here penetrates through the medium of common glass, and the effect is magical; the superb rose and lancet windows, not dazzling, rather captivating the vision with the hues of the rainbow, being made up, as it seems, with no meaner materials than sapphire, emerald, ruby, topaz, amethyst, all these in richest, unimaginable profusion; other interiors are more magnificent in architectural display, none are lovelier than this, and and there is nothing to mar the general harmony, no gliding or artificial flowers, no ecclesiastical trumpery, no meretricious decoration. We find here the glorious art of painting on glass in its perfection, and some of the finest in the cathedral, as well as in other churches here, are the work of a celebrated Troyen, Linard Gonthier.

A sacristan is always at hand to exhibit the treasury, worth some millions of francs, and which is to be commended by all lovers of jewels and old lace. The latter, richest old guipure, cannot be inspected by an amateur without pangs. Such treasures as these, if not appropriated to their proper use, namely, dress and decoration, should at least be exhibited in the Louvre or Troyes museum, where they might be seen and studied by the artistic. There are dozens of yards of this matchless guipure here, but of course few people ever see it. As I turned from one treasure to another, gold and silver ecclesiastical ornaments, ivory coffers, enamels, cameos, diamonds, rubies, topazes, and other jewels, embroideries, reliquaries, tapestries, I was reminded of a passage in Victor Hugo's last poem, "Le Pape." The pope therein makes appeals to the cardinals and bishops assembled around him, urging them in passionate language to sell their jewels and fine clothes, and give the product to the poor — a piece of advice we may be sure will never be taken. The sacristan exhibited a tooth of St. Peter and skulls of two saints, but these are treasures we can look on without envy. This little museum — as indeed the treasury may be called — showed at the Paris exhibition of 1867 one of its richest objects, the reliquary of St. Bernard, and St. Malachi, a chef-d'œuvre of the twelfth century, but as some of the jewels were stolen upon that occasion, nothing this year very naturally found its way from Troyes cathedral to Paris. Close to the cathedral are the town library, museum, and picture-gallery, the two first well worth careful inspection. The famous library has largely contributed to the historic galleries of the Trocadéro, but nevertheless many exquisite specimen of its binding, printing, and illuminating remain, whilst the windows are adorned with most curious and beautiful old glass paintings, from the hand of the gifted Linard Gonthier before mentioned. It is hardly necessary to say that strangers are admitted to all the privileges of the reading-room without any form whatever. The library contains a hundred and some odd thousand volumes, besides between two and three thousand rare MSS. The present population of Troyes is forty thousand, and I am not aware of any such town in England so well off in the matter of books. The museum is divided into several sections, and, though of recent date, possesses some interesting and valuable collections. Near the library and museum is the most beautiful old church in Troyes, St. Urbain, but as it is unfortunately in the hands of the restorer, we can see nothing of the interior, and the splendid Gothic façade is partly hidden by scaffolding. The traveller may next proceed on a voyage of discovery, coming upon the picturesque Hôtel de Ville, quaint relics of mediæval architecture here and there, and half-a-dozen old churches, all noteworthy from some point of view.

It is impossible to do more than suggest the rewards that await such an explorer. Troyes, like Angers and Poitiers, abounds in architectural treasures and historic souvenirs, and all three cities cannot be visited too soon. Restoration and renovation are here, as elsewhere, the order of the day, and every year takes something from their character and charm. Two objects particularly striking amongst so many shall be mentioned only, as no mere description can convey any idea of the whole. The first is the entrance hall of the Hôtel Vauluisant, two features of which should be photographed for the benefit of art schools and art decorators generally. These are a magnificent oak ceiling and a Renaissance chimneypiece in carved wood. no

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

less magnificent. The solidity, richness of design, and workmanship of both ceiling and mantelpiece affords an invaluable lessons to artists, whilst beholders cannot examine them without a feeling of sadness. How little we have in modern art furniture and decoration to be compared to such achievements! Not far from the Hôtel Vauluisant is St. Madelaine, the most ancient church in Troyes, originally Gothic, but now, what with dilapidations and restorations, a curious medley of various styles. To its architecture however, the traveller will pay little heed, his whole attention being at once transferred to the famous jubé or altar screen — or what passes by that name. Rather let us call it a curtain of lace cut out in marble, a screen of transparent ivory, a light stalactite roof of some fairy grotto!

On entering you see nothing but this airy piece of work — one of the daintiest, richest creations of the period — the achievement of Juan Gualde in the sixteenth century. The proportions of the interior seem to diminish, and we cannot help fancying that the church was built for the jubé rather than the jubé for the church, so dwarfed is the latter by comparison. The centre aisle is indeed bridged over by this pieee of stone-carving, so exquisite in design, so graceful in detail, so airy and fanciful, that we are with difficulty brought to realize its size and solidity. This unique altar screen measures over six yards in depth, is proportionately long, and is quite symmetrical in every part; yet it looks as if a breath was only needed to disperse those delicate galleries, hanging arcades, and tiny vaults. Gorgeous painted windows form the background, jewels flashing through a veil of guipure!

Lovers of choice old stained glass must visit St. Nizier and other churches here; all, moreover, possess some peculiar interest, either within or without. Much more might be said on this subject, but these slight indications will give some little idea of what is to be found at Troyes in the way of artistic and archæological interest. Troyes is the birthplace of many noted artists, among whom Mignard, the painter; Girardon, sculptor — whose monument to Richelieu in the Church of the Sorbonne will not fail to be visited by English travellers — of the famous painter in glass, Linard Gonthier, and many more.

Among minor accomplishments of the Troyen of to-day, it may be mentioned that nowhere throughout all France — land par excellence of good washing and clear-starching — is linen got up in such perfection as at Troyes. The blanchisserie Troyenne is an art unhappily unknown in England. It is curious that, much as cleanliness is thought of among ourselves, we are content to wear linen execrably washed and ironed. Clean linen in England means one thing, in France another; and no French servant-maid or waiter would wear the half-washed, half-ironed linen we aristocratic insulars wear so complacently. Here, indeed, is a field for female enterprise.

From Troyes to Belfort is a journey best made by night mail express, as there is little to see on the way; nor need Belfort — famous for its heroic defence under Danfort, and its rescue from Prussian grasp by the no less heroic pleadings of Thiers — detain the traveller. It is pleasant to find here as at Troyes, a "Rue Thiers," and to see Thiers' portrait in every window. If there is one memory universally adored and respected, it is that of the petit bourgeois. No one who gets a glimpse of Belfort with its double ramparts and commanding position, will wonder at Thiers' pertinacity on the one hand, and Bismarck's reluctance on the other. Fortunately the petit bourgeois gained his point, and the preservation of Belfort to France was the one drop of comfort in that sea of misery.

Half an-hour's railway journey brings me to the quaint little town of Montbéliard, where friends' friends welcome me, and I feel in half an hour as much at home as if I had known it all my life. As Montbéliard is a good starting-point for excursionizing in the Doubs, my friends procured a little lodging — rather, I should say, a magnificent appartement — for me in a private house, and I settle down for a week or two. My rooms are quite charming, and for well-furnished, spacious sitting-room and bedroom, equally commodious and airy, I pay one franc a day, and other expenses are proportionately low. Yet it must not be supposed that Montbéliard is wanting in refinement, even elegances, and that high prices are not gradually finding their way here as elsewhere. The fact is, and it is a noteworthy one, the character of the Montbéliardais is essentially amiable, accommodating, and disinterested; and it never enters into people's heads to ask more for their wares simply because they could get it, or to make capital out of strangers. A franc a day is what is paid in these parts by lodgers, chiefly officers, and no more would be asked of the wealthiest or unwariest trav-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

eller. You find the same spirit animating all classes, tradesmen, carriage-proprietors, hotel-keepers, and doubtless it is to be traced to several causes. In the first place Montbéliard is in one of the most enlightened, best educated, and most Protestant departments of all France. Le Doubs, part of the ancient Franche-Comté, is so Protestant, indeed, that in some towns and villages the Catholics are considerably in the minority. So late as the French Revolution the comté of this name belonged to Wurtemburg, having passed over to the house of Wurtemburg by marriage in the fourteenth century. In 1792, however, it became amalgamated with the French kingdom, and fortunately escaped annexation in the last Franco-German war. Protestantism early took hold here, the Lutheran and Anabaptist doctrines especially; and in the present day Montbéliard numbers many Protestant, and only one Catholic church; the former belonging severally to the Reformed Church, the Lutheran, Anabaptist persuasions, and also two or three so-called oratories, in other words, little Dissenting chapels, built and endowed by private founders. We find here the tables strangely turned, and the unique and agreeable spectacle in France of four Protestant pastors to one Catholic priest! It may be imagined that to be curé of Montbéliard is not regarded as an enviable position, although the proportion of Catholics is much larger than in former days, owing to the increase of the rich mercantile class. At one time the Protestant body here numbered two-thirds of the entire inhabitants, now about half belong to the Catholic Church; but a spirit of liberalism pervades all. This strong Protestant element and the long filtration of German manners and customs have doubtless greatly modified the character of the inhabitants, who, whether Protestants or Catholics, live side by side in perfect harmony. We see indeed a toleration absolutely unknown in some parts of France, and an amount of generally diffused education equally wanting where Catholicism is dominant. Brittany and Le Doubs, for instance, offer the most striking contrast it is possible to conceive. In the first we find the priests absolute, and consequently superstition, ignorance, dirt, and prejudice the order of the day; in the last, we have, not priestly rule but a Protestant spirit of inquiry and progress, and consequently, instruction making vast strides on every side, freedom from bigotry, freedom alike from degrading spiritual bondage and fanaticism. In the highly instructive map published by the French minister of instruction, Franche-Comté is marked white, and Brittany black, thus denoting the antipodes of intellectual enlightenment and darkness to be found in the two countries. Here indeed we find ourselves in a wholly different world, so utterly has a spirit of inquiry revolutionized eastern France, so long has her western province been held in the grip of the priests. Furthermore, we have evidence of the zeal animating all classes with respect to education on every side, whilst it is quite delightful to converse with a Montbéliardais, no matter to which he belongs, so unprejudiced, instructed, and liberal-minded are these citizens of a town neither particularly important, flourishing, nor fortunate. For nine months Montbéliard had to support the presence of the enemy, and though the German soldiery behaved very well here, the amiable, lively little town was almost ruined. It is no less patriotic than enlightened, republican ideas being as firmly implanted here as anywhere in France. You see portraits of M. Thiers and Gambetta everywhere, and only good Republican journals on the booksellers' stalls. It would be interesting to know how many copies of the halfpenny issue of La République Française are sold here daily; and whereas in certain parts of France, the woman read nothing except the Semaine Religieuse and the Petit Journal, here they read the high-class newspapers, reviews, and are conversant with what is going on in the political and literary world at home and abroad. Indeed, the contrast is amazing between female education so-called in ultra-Catholic and ultra-Protestant France. In Brittany, where the young ladies are educated by the nuns, you never see or hear of a book. The very name of literature is a dead letter, and the upper classes are no better instructed than the lower. In Franche-Comté girls of all ranks are well educated; young ladies of fortune going in for their brevet, or certificate, as well as those who have their bread to win. They are often familiar with the German and English languages, and, above all, are thoroughly conversant with their own literature, as well as bookkeeping, arithmetic, French history, elementary science, etc. I find young ladies of Montbéliard as familiar with the works of Currer Bell and Mrs. Gaskell as among ourselves. Miss Yonge is also a favorite; and unlike a large class of novel-readers in England, standard works are not neglected by them for fiction. No matter at what time you enter

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the public library here, you are sure to find ladies of all ages, coming to change their books; the contents of this library, be it remembered, consisting chiefly of French classics. This little town of eight thousand inhabitants possesses an intellectual atmosphere in which it is possible to breathe.

The mingled homeliness, diffusion of intelligence, and æsthetic culture seen here, remind me of certain little German cities and towns. People living on very modest means find money for books, whereas in certain parts of France no such expenditure is ever thought of, whilst dress and outward show are ever considered first. Naturally this diffusion of culture raises the tone of conversation and society generally, and its influence is seen in various ways. Music is cultivated assiduously, not only by women of the better ranks, but by both sexes, especially among the work-people. The musical society of Montbéliard furnished a very respectable orchestra indeed, and is composed of amateurs, mostly young men, recruited from the working as well as middle classes. The society gives open-air concerts on Sunday afternoons and one evening in the week, to the great delectation of the inhabitants, who upon these occasions turn out of doors en masse to enjoy the music and the company of their neighbors. The Société d'Emulation is an instance of the stimulus given to scientific, literary, and artistic pursuits by a Protestant spirit of inquiry. This society was founded in 1852 by a few savants, in order to develop the public taste for science, art, and letters. It now numbers two hundred and forty-three members, and has been instrumental in founding a museum containing upwards of eighty thousand archæological specimens, besides botanical, geological, and other collections.

It is particularly rich in the first respect, few provincial museums having such complete illustrations of the pre-historic and also Gallo-Roman periods. The flint, bronze, and iron epochs are here largely represented, some of the large, leaf-shaped flint instruments being particularly beautiful specimens. The excavations at Mandeure, a short drive from Montbéliard, the Epomanduodurum of the Romans, have afforded a precious collection of interesting objects — pottery, small bronze groups and figures, ornaments, terracottas, etc. At Mandeure are to be seen the ruins of the ancient city, amphitheatre, baths, tombs, vestiges of a temple, and other remains, but excavations are still going on under the direction of the learned president of the Société d'Emulation, M. Fabre, and further treasure-trove is looked for. This charming little museum, so tastefully arranged in the picturesque old halles by M. Fabre, is open on Sunday afternoons on payment of two sous; but in order to promote a love of science among the young, schools are admitted gratuitously, and within the last ten weeks thirty-nine teachers and seven hundred and forty-eight pupils of both sexes have availed themselves of the privilege. During the German occupation in 1870–71 a sum of 323,940 francs was levied upon the town, and the museum and library, after being valued at a considerable sum, were seized as pledges of payment. Seals were set on the collections, and German soldiery guarded the treasures which had been collected with so much zeal and sacrifice.

The entire sum was never paid, but the library, consisting of nineteen thousand volumes, and museum were left intact, to the great joy of the inhabitants.

Montbéliard is as sociable as it is advanced, and my introduction from a native of the friendly little town, settled in Paris, opened all hearts to me. Every one is helpful, agreeable, full of hospitality. My evenings are always spent at one pleasant house or another, where music, tea, and conversation lend wings to the cheerful hours. The custom indeed of keeping the veillée, familiar to readers of the gifted Franche-Comtois, Charles Nodier, is common here among rich and poor. People quit their homes after the early supper — for according to German custom we dine at noon and sup at seven here — to enjoy the society of their neighbors. Delightful recollections shall I carrry away from Montbéliard of many a veillée. Of one in particular when a dozen neighbors and their English guest assemble in the summer-house of a suburban garden, there to discuss art, music, and literature over ices and other good things despatched from the town. We had looked forward to a superb moonlight spectacle of river, château, and bridges, flooded with silvery light. We had torrents of rain instead, being threatened with what is a phenomenon of no rare occurrence here, namely, an inundation. Situated on the confluence of two rivers, the Allaine and the Lusine, Montbéliard is a quaint and homely little Venice in miniature, sure to be flooded once or twice a year, when people have to pay visits and carry on their daily avocations in boats.

It takes, however, more than minor mis-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

fortunes such as these to damp French geniality and good nature, and when our pleasant soirée came to an end every one returned home well fortified with umbrellas, cloaks, and goloshes in the best possible humor. Sometimes these veillées will be devoted to declamation or story-telling, one or two of the party reading aloud a play or a poem, or reciting for the benefit of the rest. In the bitter winter nights even this sociable custom is not laid aside, even ladies venturing forth with their lanterns in order to enjoy a little society. Music is the chief out-of-door recreation during the summer months, the military band of the garrison largely contributing to the general amusement. There is also a handsome theatre, at which first-rate representations are occasionally given by artistes from Paris. This is pretty well for a town of eight thousand inhabitants. It is astonishing how French good-humor and light-heartedness help to lighten the hardest lot. We find the hours of toil enormously long here, and economies practised among the better classes of which few English people have any conception. Yet life is made the best of, and everything in the shape of a distraction is seized upon with avidity. Although eminently a Protestant town, shops are open all day long on Sundays, when more business seems to be done than at any other time. The shutters no sooner put up however, than every one sets out for a walk or a visit, and get as much enjoyment as they can. Only the rich or exceedingly well-to-do people keep servants, others content themselves with a charwoman, who comes in for two hours a day and is paid ten or twelve francs a month; many ladies by birth and education, doing all the lighter household work, marketing, etc., themselves, whilst the small shopkeeping class, who, with us, must invariably have a wretched drudge called a maid-of-all-work, never dream of getting any one to cook or clean for them. As a matter of course all this is done by the family, no matter how well educated may be its members. We must always bear in mind that the general well-being and easy circumstances of the French middle classes is greatly owing to their freedom from shams. Toil is not regarded as a degradation, and the hateful word "gentility" is not found in their vocabulary. Thus it comes about that you find a mixture of homeliness, comfort, and solidity of fortune, rarely the case in England. Take my landlady as an example, a charming person, who keeps a straw-hat and umbrella shop, whose sister is a repasseuse, or clear-starcher, and their married brother has also a hat-shop next door. These people do all the work that is to be done themselves, yet in similar circumstances in England, would be sure to have maids-of-all work, nursery maids, and the rest of it. They have plenty of good furniture, supplies of household and personal linen that would set up a shop, and the children of the brother receive the best possible education he can obtain for them. The elder girl has just returned from Belfort with her first diploma, and is to be sent to Germany to learn German. She has nevertheless, acquired a knowledge of what all women should know, can cook, clean, cut out and make clothes, etc., and when herself a wife and mother will doubtless exercise all these accomplishments in order to give her children as good an education as she possesses herself. Both sisters and married brother, moreover, have so well economized their savings that all of them could retire and live on their earnings to-morrow.

More might be said about the easy intercourse and geniality of this little town did space permit. I will pass on to add that, though extremely picturesque, with its flower-gardens running down to the water's edge, tiny bridges, hanging roofs, curling vines, lastly circling green hills and fine old château crowning all, there is little here to detain the tourist. The case is very different with those travellers who are bent upon studying French life under its various aspects, for they will find at Montbéliard a wholly new phase. Much in domestic life reminds us of south Germany, yet no place is more eminently French. The type of physiognomy is frank and animated, fair and even red hair is common, whilst the stature is above the average, and the general physique gives an idea of strength, character, and health. The Montbéliards are courteous but proud, and prone rather to bestow than accept favors. Amiability and real goodness of heart especially characterize them.

As a seat of some special manufactures, musical boxes and clocks being among the chief, it possesses importance; there are also cotton-mills, tanneries, foundries, etc. The fabrication of clocks by machinery is a curious process, the precision and apparent intelligence of the machines being as agreeable to contemplate as the reverse is humiliating, namely, the spectacle of men, women, and children being converted into automatons by unremitting mechanical labor. The length of the day's work here is prodigious, consisting of twelve hours,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and the occupation extremely unwholesome, owing to the smell of the oil and the perpetual noise of machinery. The pay is low, beginning at three francs and reaching to four or four and a half a day. We may blame the artisan class for improvidence, insobriety, and many other failings; but none who calmly compare the life of a clockmaker, for instance, condemned to spend twelve hours of the twenty-four in this laborious, unwholesome, and ill-remunerated labor, with that of the better classes, can wonder at his discontent. If he seeks to better his position by means of strikes, socialistic schemes, or other violent means, at least we must grant that it is only natural, till some other should offer themselves. It is to be hoped that the hours of labor will soon be shortened in a department of France so advanced in other respects; and meantime, in some ways, artisans here are better off than elsewhere. All round the town you find so-called cités ouvrières built on the model of those of Mulhouse; little streets of cheerful cottages, each with its bit of flower and vegetable garden, where at least the workman has something to call a home after his day's labor. These artisan quarters are well or ill kept, of course, according to the thrift or slovenliness of the tenants: some are charming, but at their worst they are a vast improvement upon the close, ill-ventilated quarters to be found in towns. They are also much cheaper, about 5*l.* a year being charged for both house and garden, whereas even in a little town like Montbéliard, accommodation is dear and difficult to be had. In fact, the question of house room is as much of a problem here for the workman as among our own rural population; and though without doubt the heads of firms who have built these cheerful and ornamental little rows of English-like cottages for their work-people were actuated chiefly by philanthropic motives, they found it absolutely necessary to take some steps in the matter. Various efforts are being made to raise the status of the mechanic by means of lectures, reading-rooms, and recreation, but whilst the hours of labor remain what we find them, little good can be effected. A devoted Montbéliardais, who has spent her whole life in her native town, has done much for the female part of the manufacturing population by means of free night schools, free library, chiefly for the young, Sunday afternoon classes for the teaching of cutting out and needle-work, gratuitous laundries, and other philanthropic schemes. These good efforts of Mlle. Rosalie Morel, a lady and a lay-woman, have been seconded by those of a Protestant deaconess in another direction, the latter devoting herself to nursing and the teaching of hygiene and sanitary science. In the matter of cleanliness, therefore, these good people are not left in the dark as in benighted Brittany, where dirt is not preached against as it ought to be in the pulpit. Mlle. Morel's free laundries — in other words, a scheme set on foot for the purpose of teaching the poorest classes what clean linen should be — have doubtless effected much good, and on the whole cleanliness is the rule here, and the public hot and cold baths much frequented by all.

In spite, however, of the animation and bonhomie of this little town, there is a dark side to social life, and in the train of intemperance and unthrift among the manufacturing population we find squalor and immorality. After several weeks' sojourn in that Utopia of all socialistic dreamers — a land without a beggar — I found myself here once more in the domains of mendicity, though it is not to be found to any great extent. The custom of putting out infants to nurse is fortunately unfrequent in these parts, and, as a natural consequence, infant mortality is not above the average. The cités ouvrières are doubtless to be thanked for this, as the nearness of the home to the factory enables the baby to be brought to its mother for nourishment; and in one visit to the clock-manufactory before spoken of, we saw mothers nursing their infants on the spot. Nearer Paris you constantly encounter infants of three days old being despatched with their foster-mother into some country place, there to be brought up by hand, most likely, in other words, to die; but here it is not so. We find at Montbéliard that contrast between wealth and poverty seen in England, but wholly absent from the rural districts of France. The aristocracy of the place here is composed of the wealthy manufacturing class, and by little and little Parisian luxuries are finding their way into this remote region. Until within quite recent date, for instance, there was no such thing as a stand for hackney carriages here; now it has become the fashion to take drives in fine weather, whilst in our walks and drives in the neighborhood we encounter handsome waggonettes and open carriages with a pair of horses rarely seen in the purely agricultural districts. In every way habits of life have become modified by the rapid rise of a commercial aristocracy; and, as a natural consequence, we find much more social distinction than

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

in those parts of France where no such class exists. Yet a stranger who should here study French manners and customs for the first time, would find the principle of equality existing in a degree unknown in England. Can anything be more absurd than the imagined differences of rank that divide the population of our provincial towns? The same thing is seen in the country, where the clergyman holds aloof from the village doctor, the farmer from the shopkeeper, both these from the village schoolmaster, and where, indeed, everybody thinks himself better than his neighbor. We have in England schools for the professional classes, schools for the children of farmers, of wholesale shopkeepers, of small retail tradesmen, lastly, School Board schools for the "people;" yet you no more expect to find a milliner's children attending the latter than a chimneysweep's son at the grammar school. In French country towns all this is simplified by the école communale, at which boys and girls respectively, no matter their parents' calling and means, receive precisely the same education. After the école communale comes the collége, where a liberal education is afforded, and pupils study for the examination of bachelier ès lettres et sciences, but are not prepared as at the lycées for the faculté du droit, or doctorate in law. There is no other school here for primary instruction of both sexes but these communal schools, Protestant and Catholic, and thither all the children go, rich and poor, patrician and prolétaire, as a matter of course. The politeness of the French working classes may be partly accounted for by this association of all ranks in early life. Convent and other schools for young ladies do not exist at Montbéliard, and those who study for the first and second diploma are generally prepared at Belfort and Besançon, where the examinations are held.

There is here an école normale, or training-school for teachers, also a Protestant training-school noted for its excellence. On the whole, for a town of eight thousand inhabitants, Montbéliard must be considered rich in educational and intellectual resources.

Much of the farming in these parts is tenant-farming on a fair scale — i.e., from fifty to two or three hundred acres. In the case of small peasant properties, which of course exist also, the land is usually not divided on the death of the father, the elder son purchasing the shares of his brothers and sisters. More on the subject of agriculture will be said further on, there being nothing particularly striking about the two tenant farms I visited with friends in the immediate proximity of the town. The first, though not a model farm, is considered a good specimen of farming on a large scale, the size being a hundred hectares, about two hundred and fifty acres, hired at a rental of fifty francs per hectare, less than a pound per acre. The premises were large, handsome, and cleanly, according to a French standard, though, as usual, with a large heap of manure drying up in the sun. Here we found thirty-five splendid Normandy and other cows, entirely kept for milking, the milk being all sent into Montbéliard; with a small number of bullocks, horses, and pigs. The land looks poor, and gives no evidence of scientific farming, though every year improvements are made, new agricultural methods and implements introduced, and thus the resources of the land developed. The farmer's wife and young daughters were all hard at work, and the farmer busy with his men in the fields. Close to the farmhouse, which we find spacious and comfortable, is the handsome villa of the owner, who has thus an opportunity of seeing for himself how things go. If tenant farming does not pay in England, it certainly can only do so in France by means of a laboriousness and economy of which we have hardly an idea. Work indeed means one thing with us, and quite another with our French neighbors.

It is on market-day that the country folks and their wares are to be seen to best advantage, and the provident housekeeper supplies herself with butter, fruit, and vegetables, all being, according to our notions, extraordinarily cheap — peaches sixpence a pound, melons a few pence each, a small ripe melon costing sometimes only a penny, and so on in proportion. There is also a slightly acid, delicious fruit here, that of the fruit-bearing cornel-tree, which, with its rich scarlet berries, is just now a handsome ornament in gardens. In spite, however, of the extremely low prices of garden and orchard produce, housekeepers complain of the higher cost of living since the war, meat and poultry fetching very nearly the same prices as in Paris.

In former days the costume of the peasant woman in these parts was exceedingly picturesque, short gay skirt, black bodice, short full white linen sleeves, leaving the arms bare, and a coquettish little close-fitting cap, made of black velvet, embroidered in silk or beads, and fastened to the head with white ribbon bows hanging be-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

hind. All this has disappeared except the coiffe, and that is only to be seen on fair-days and fêtes, and more rarely every day. We saw several of these fanciful caps on the occasion of the annual fair, some richly embroidered with tastefully assorted silks and gold braid; but here, alas! as everywhere else, costume is already a thing of the past, and the all-omnipotent bonnet and chimney-pot are superseding the far more picturesque and becoming head adornments of other days. At the fête in question we witnessed the out-of-door dancing so popular in these parts, even grey-haired Darbies and Joans paying their two sous for the sake of enjoying a waltz or mazurka in the charmed circle. Rich and poor, young and old, learned and simple, of course turned out to see what was going on, and take part in the popular amusements. Every minute we had to stop and shake hands with an acquaintance.

And now before turning to "fresh woods and pastures new," a word must be said about the illustrious name that will ever be linked with that of Montbéliard. Many a hasty traveller alights at the little railway station for the purpose of seeing the noble monument by David d'Angers and the antiquated house bearing the inscription:—

ICI NAQUIT G. CUVIER.

The bronze statue of the great anatomist stands out in bold relief before the Hôtel de Ville, the profile being turned towards the humble dwelling in which he first saw the light, the full face fronting the large Protestant church, built in 1602, a century and a half before his birth. The proximity is a happy one, since was it not by virtue of Protestantism, no matter how imperfect its manifestations, that Cuvier was enabled to pursue his inquiries with such magnificent results? Two centuries before, he might, like Galileo, have had to choose between martyrdom and scientific apostasy. The great Montbéliardais is represented with a pen in one hand, a scroll in the other, on which is drawn the anatomy of the human frame. He wears the long, full frock coat of the period, its ample folds having the effect of drapery. David d'Angers has achieved no nobler work than this statue.

The flourishing college of Montbéliard, called after its greatest citizen, was founded a few years ago, and is one of the first objects seen in quitting the railway station of the Rue Cuvier.

English tourists do not often turn aside from the Swiss route to visit the quieter beauties of Le Doubs, and residents here regret the absence of travellers, which, of course, tells upon the hotels. No one has a word to say in favor of anything in the way of hotels we are likely to meet with on our journey throughout the length and breadth of Franche-Comté. The new line of railway now in course of construction from Besançon to Morteau, through the heart of the country, will effect great changes. This will be a new line into Switzerland. The only way to see these regions to perfection is to hire a carriage by the day, and retain it as long as you please. The railway does not penetrate into the most picturesque regions, and the diligence is slow and inconvenient. Accordingly, having had an itinerary written out for us by friends who had gone over every inch of the ground, mostly on foot, I set off with an enterprising lady, a native of these parts, for a few days' drive in the most romantic scenery of the Doubs, southward of Montbéliard and in the direction of Switzerland. So well is the road marked out for us, that we want neither Joanne nor Murray, and we have, moreover, procured the services of a coachman who has been familiarized with the country by thirty years' experience. Thus far, therefore, we have nothing to desire but fine weather, which has been very rare since my arrival, tempests, showers, and downpours being the order of the day. However, choosing one morning of unusual promise, we start off at seven o'clock, prepared for the best or the worst, a description of the pine forests, mountain gorges, and romantic valleys of Le Doubs being reserved for the next paper.

M. B.-E.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

"FRED:" A TALE FROM JAPAN.

BY R—— L——.

FRED was a stray dog whose origin and whose name even were shrouded in mystery. In 1861 he had landed in Yokohama from an English tea-clipper, in the company of a melancholy traveller. Nobody, of course, took any notice of the dog at the time, and he, on his part, avoided all familiarity with strangers, having, apparently, eyes and ears only for his master, whom he followed everywhere.

This master, Mr. Alexander Young, was a rather mysterious character. Nobody knew whence he came or whither he was

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

bound. The captain of the "Georgina" had made his acquaintance in Java, and had given him a passage to Japan on very moderate terms. During the voyage, Alexander Young — or Sandy, as he was commonly called — spoke very little, but drank a good deal. The captain, who, when at sea, made it a rule never to take anything stronger than water, was not at all disinclined, when ashore, to indulge in an extra bottle or so. In consequence, he treated the weakness of his companion with compassionate fellow-feeling, and even felt, on that very account, a sort of sympathy for him, which showed itself in many little kindnesses. Sandy was very grateful; and in his sad, dreamy, blue eyes there was a tender and friendly expression whenever they rested on the rugged, weather-beaten features of the captain.

Fred was Sandy's constant companion, and the dog's nose was never many inches distant from his master's heels.

"Fred is a curious name for a dog," said the captain, one evening; "why did you call him so?"

Sandy was silent for fully a minute, and then answered slowly, "Because he was a present from my cousin Louisa."

The captain was much impressed by this unexpected explanation; but as he was himself accustomed to clothe his ideas in most enigmatical language, he made no doubt that Sandy's reply had some deep hidden meaning; and without indulging in indiscreet questions, he made many and fruitless efforts to solve the problem unaided. From that time Sandy rose in his esteem. Neither Sandy nor he ever recurred to the subject; but when, at a later period, the captain was asked why Mr. Young's dog was called "Fred," he answered authoritatively, "Because the dog was a present from his cousin Louisa."

Fred was a thorough-bred bull-terrier, snow-white, with one black round spot over his left eye. His fore-legs were bowed, his chest was broad and powerful, his head wide and flat as a frog's. His jaws were armed with a set of short, uneven, sharp teeth, which seemed strong enough to crunch a bar of iron. His eyes were set obliquely in his head, Chinese fashion; nevertheless there was an honest and trustworthy expression in them. One could see that Fred, though he was a dangerous, was not a savage or a wicked beast.

Fred could smile in his grim way, if his master showed him a bone and said, "Smile!" But, as a rule, he was as grave and serious as Young himself. He was no bully or street-fighter. Confident in his own strength, he looked with contempt on the small curs who barked and yelped at him. But if a large dog, a worthy adversary, attacked him, he fought with mute, merciless fury. He neither barked nor growled on such occasions, but the quick, deep breathing under which his broad chest heaved, betrayed his inward fury. His green eyes shone like emeralds, and he fastened his fangs into his enemy with such mad violence that it was a matter of great difficulty to make him loose his hold.

During six months Sandy and Fred led a quiet life at Yokohama. Sandy was known, it is true, to consume in private an incredible amount of spirits; but in public, his behavior was unexceptionable, and no one had ever seen him intoxicated. A few days after his arrival, he had bought one of the rough, ugly little ponies of the country. Those who, for some reason or another, strayed from the beaten paths usually frequented by foreign residents at Yokohama, declared that they had met Young, the pony, and Fred in the most unlooked-for places. The lonely rider, the horse, and the dog appeared, they said, equally lost in deep reverie. Young smoked; the pony, with the reins hanging loose on its neck, walked with his head down, as though it were studying that road of which its master took no heed; while Fred followed close behind, with his dreamy, half-closed eyes fixed on the horse's hoofs. Young never addressed anybody, but returned every salute politely, and, so to speak, gratefully. The Europeans at Yokohama wondered at their quiet fellow-exile; and the Japanese called him kitchingay — crazy.

Young rarely remained in town when the weather was fine. He would leave the settlement in the early morning with his two four-footed companions, and not return from his ride till dusk. But if it rained and blew hard, one might be sure to meet him on the bund — the street which leads from the European quarter to the harbor. On such occasions Sandy, with his hands behind his back, walked slowly up and down the broad road, with Fred at his heels as usual; though it was evident that the poor, drenched animal did not share his master's enjoyment of bad weather. At intervals Sandy would stop in his walk and watch with apparent interest the boisterous sea and the vessels that were tossing on it. Whenever this happened Fred immediately sat upon his haunches and fixed his blinking eyes on his master's countenance, as though he were trying to

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

discover some indication that he was going to exchange the impassable street for the comfortable shelter of his lodgings. If Young stayed too long, Fred would push him gently with his nose as if to wake him out of his day-dream. Sandy would then move on again; but he never went home till the storm had abated or night had set in. This strange, aimless walking up and down gave him the appearance of a man who has missed his railway-train, and who, at some strange, uninteresting station, seeks to while away the time till the next departure.

Young must have brought some money with him to Yokohama, for he lived on for several weeks without seeking employment. At the end of that time, however, he advertised in the Japan Times to the effect that he had set up in business as public accountant. In this capacity he soon got some employment. He was a steady, conscientious worker, rather slow at his work, and evidently not caring to earn more than was required for his wants. In this way he became acquainted with Mr. James Webster, the head of an important American firm, who, after employing Young on several occasions, at last offered him an excellent situation as assistant bookkeeper in his house. This offer Sandy declined with thanks.

"I do not know how long I may remain out here," he said. "I expect letters from home which may oblige me to leave at once."

Those letters never came, and Sandy grew paler and sadder every day. One evening he went to call on James Webster. A visit from Sandy Young was such an unusual occurrence that Webster, who, as a rule, did not liked to be disturbed, came forward to greet his visitor. But Sandy would not come in; he remained at the entrance, leaning against the open door. His speech and manner were calm and even careless; and Webster was consequently somewhat surprised to hear that he had come to take leave.

"Sit down, man," said Webster, "and take a soda-and-brandy and a cheroot."

"No, thank you," replied Young. "I leave early to-morrow morning; and I have only just time to get my things ready."

"So you are really going away?" said Webster. "Well, I am sorry you would not stay with us. As it is, I can only wish you good luck and a prosperous voyage."

He held out his hand, which Young pressed so warmly that Webster looked at him with some surprise; and as he looked, it seemed to him that there was moisture in Sandy Young's eyes.

"Why won't you stay?" continued Webster, who felt a curious interest in the sad, quiet man. "The place I offered you the other day is still there."

Young remained silent for a few moments. Then he shook his head, and said gently, "No, thanks. You are very kind, but I had better go. . . . What should I do here? Japan is a fine country; but it is so very small — always the same blue sea, the same white Fusyyama, and the same people riding the same horses and followed by the same dogs. I am tired of it all. . . . You must admit, Mr. Webster, that life is not highly amusing out here."

There was a short pause, after which Sandy resumed, but speaking more slowly and in still lower tones, "I think there must be a typhoon in the air; I feel so weary. . . . I do not think, Mr. Webster, that you can ever have felt as tired as I do. I thought we were going to have a storm this morning. It would perhaps have done me good. This has been a very close, heavy day. . . . Well, good-night, I did not like to leave Yokohama without bidding you good-bye, and thanking you for all your friendliness."

He moved away with hesitating steps; and when he had gone a few paces he turned round and waved his hand to Webster, who was following him with his eye.

"I thank you again, Mr. Webster," he repeated, with almost pathetic earnestness. "I wish you a very good night." And so he disappeared into the darkness.

That night a terrific storm burst over Yokohama, but it came too late to revive poor, weary Sandy. He was found dead in his bedroom the next morning, having hanged himself during the night. On the table lay a large sheet of paper with the following words written in a bold hand, "Please take care of Fred."

Nothing was found in Sandy's trunk but some shabby clothes and a bundle of old letters which had evidently been read over and over again. They were without envelopes, dated from Limerick, 1855 and 1856, and merely signed, "Louisa." They were examined carefully in the hope that they might furnish some clue to Sandy's parentage and connections; but they were love-letters — mere love-letters — and contained nothing that could interest any one but poor Sandy himself. There was a frequent mention of a father and a mother in these letters, and it was clear that they had

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

not been favorable to the lovers; but who this father and mother were did not appear. Other persons were mentioned, as "Charles," "Edward," "Mary," and "Florence," but their Christian names only were given. In the last letters of October, November, and December 1856, there was constant reference to a certain Frederick Millner, a friend of Sandy's, whom he had, apparently, introduced to his cousin and lady-love. In the first of these letters, Louisa wrote that her mother was much pleased with Mr. Millner, who was a most agreeable and charming companion. In course of time Mr. Millner became "Frederick Millner," then "Fred Millner," "F. M.," and at last he was simply "Fred." Fred had accompanied Louisa and her mother to Dublin, where they had all been much amused. Fred was a capital rider, and at the last meet he had taken the big stone wall behind Hrachan Park, in a style which had excited the admiration of all present. Fred accompanied Louisa frequently on horseback, and she had never had such capital riding-lessons as from him: he understood horses better than anybody, and that ill-tempered "Blackbird" that Sandy had never dared to ride, was as gentle as a lamb with Fred. At the last athletic sports, got up by the officers of the Nineteenth, Fred had thrown the hammer farther than anybody; and would certainly have won the foot hurdle-race likewise, if he had not fallen at the last hurdle. Fred had a beautiful voice; Fred danced well; Fred here, Fred there, Fred everywhere. In the last letter it was said how "poor, daring Fred, had fallen with 'Blackbird' at the last steeplechase and had broken his collar-bone." Yet he did not give up the race, and came in third! "Mother has insisted on his remaining here to be nursed by us till he gets well. He sends his best love, and will write as soon as he is able."

These letters were sealed up and deposited in the archives of the British consulate at Yokohama. Inquiry was made officially at Limerick whether a Mr. Alexander Young and a Mr. Frederick Millner had been known there in 1855 and 1856. In due course of time the reply came, but brought no satisfactory answer to the questions. Alexander Young was quite unknown. A young man, called Frederick Millner, had lived at Limerick at the date mentioned. After bringing shame and sorrow to the daughter of an honored family, he had left the town in secret and had never been heard of since.

As Alexander Young left no property of any value, no further inquiries were made, and he was soon forgotten. He was buried very quietly; and James Webster, the constable of the English consulate, and Fred, alone accompanied him to the grave.

After the funeral the dog returned to Yokohama. For several days he searched anxiously for his master in his old lodgings and near the new-made grave; but he soon became convinced of the fruitlessness of his endeavors, and thenceforward he became, as a Californian called him, "an institution of Yokohama."

Sandy's last wish, "Please take care of Fred," was faithfully attended to. Many of the residents of Yokohama showed themselves ready to adopt the good dog; but Fred did not seem inclined to acknowledge a new master, and testified little gratitude for the caresses bestowed on him. He visited first one and then another of his numerous patrons, and did not object to accompany any of them in turn during a walk or a ride; but no one could boast that Fred was his dog. His favorite resort was the club, where, in the evening, all his friends met, and where he usually remained till the last guest left. Then he took up his quarters for the night with one or other of his friends; and hospitality was readily extended to him, for he was both watchful and well-behaved.

A year had thus gone by, when the "Georgina" once more arrived in Yokohama harbor. The captain walking on the bund one day, recognized his former passenger Fred, and called to the dog. Fred snuffed at him deliberately, drooped his head, and appeared for a few moments to meditate profoundly. But suddenly he showed the wildest delight, leaped up at the captain and licked his hands, barking and smiling; then started down the street at full speed, and at last returned to take his old place at the heels of his new master. The captain, we have said, was a philosopher: he accepted the adoption as a decree of fate to which he bowed submissively.

One evening, not long after this, the captain was attacked by a party of drunken Japanese officers. Fred sprang at the throat of one of the assailants and would have strangled him, if another of the Japanese had not cut him down with a stroke of his sword. The captain escaped with a slight wound and took refuge in the club, from whence he soon sallied forth with a party of friends to give chase to his foes and try to save his dog. But his brave friend and defender was dead. He was

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

buried in the yard of the club-house of Yokohama, where a stone with the inscription, "Fred, 1863," still marks the place where poor Sandy's faithful companion lies.

From The Cornhill Magazine.

COLOR IN PAINTING.

ONE of our greatest art-critics is fond of telling us that there is no such thing as a vulgar color, though there are many vulgar ways of arranging colors. Nobody ever objected to the most brilliant crimson, purple, or orange in a gladiolus, a tulip, or a calceolaria. Nobody ever found the hues of sunset gaudy, or thought the rainbow overdone. The iridescence that plays upon the facets of an opal, the inner surface of a pearly nautilus, or the dewy petal of a rose, never struck the most fastidious eye as glaring, in spite of all its changeful wealth of pink and green and violet. Even among human products we have each of us seen some specimens of Indian or Moorish workmanship, on which the brightest pigments known to man were lavished with an unsparing hand, and yet the total effect was not one of vulgarity, but rather of richness and splendor. Like the gorgeous tropical butterflies, they push color to its furthest admissible extreme, without ever overstepping the limits of perfect good taste. Indeed, it is undeniable that every color in itself, apart from special relations, is beautiful to the majority of human beings just in proportion as it is pure, intense, massive, and brilliant.

Nor do I think that we can doubt the superior æsthetic effect of reds, purples, and oranges over greens, blues, and violets, in the vast majority of cases. Not only do children and uncivilized men prize the pungent hues far more than the retiring ones; but in costume, in festal decoration, and in flower-gardens, almost everybody confesses the same natural preference. It is true that many other considerations come in to mask this original tendency of our nature: fashion or a sense of propriety may make us dress in black or grey, rather than in scarlet or pink; the desire for relief may lead us to gaze with greater pleasure on the blue vault of heaven and the restful verdure of the meadows than on obtrusive masses of red and yellow; an educated revulsion from the excessive stimulation of vulgar furniture — with its crimson satin coverings, its wall-paper ablaze with rose-bunches, and its flare of gilt mirror-frames — may lead the artistic few to delight in the quiet repose of solid grey oak, neutral-tinted papers, and delicate shades of mellow green. Yet these exceptional instances cannot blind us to the general love for ruddy hues. Baby in its cradle jumps at a bunch of red rags. Dinah in the cane-field makes herself lovely with a red turban. The central-African chief is bribed with yards of red calico. Purple and fine linen are the proverbial adjuncts of ancient rulers, from Tyre to imperial Rome. In our own day, the soldier's red coat proves irresistible alike to the nurse-maid in the park and to her mistress in the ball-room. Indeed it is a noticeable fact that men condemned to wear the sombre frock-coat of modern life are glad to seize on every opportunity for donning a brighter and more conspicuous garb. Regimental dances, masonic fêtes, Highland games, boating-matches, athletic sports, and fancy balls are all eagerly caught at by our handsome, well-made young men as lucky occasions for the display of something finer than the swallow-tail and white tie of every-day gatherings. The subaltern in his uniform, the master of fox-hounds in his scarlet coat, and the champion sculler in his striped jersey are all representatives of the healthy primitive love for honest red and yellow.

But while we allow that bright colors are in themselves the pleasantest and prettiest of all — for indeed the retiring tints owe most of their beauty to the relief which they afford us from the excessive stimulation of brilliant hues — and while many of us are even beginning to perceive in England that an over-anxious fastidiousness on this point has long deprived us of much innocent pleasure in dress and decoration — I think it possible that almost all our painting (viewed as purely imitative in purpose) is still marked by far too much color, and especially by far too much red, purple, orange, and yellow. I know that to offer any criticism from outside on our artistic public is to stir a nest of hornets, who straightway sally forth to sting the unhappy culprit with many technical phrases and great assumption of obvious superiority. But I must hasten to reassure these irritable gentlemen by stating that I do not propose to deal out any praise or blame in the present paper to any school or person whatsoever. When I speak of over-coloring, I only mean to assert the simple and positive fact that bright hues are to be found in greater proportions on

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the canvas of painters than in the average every-day scenes of external nature or human life. This preponderance of bright hues is due to the fact that our painting, though to a large extent imitative, has still in part a decorative purpose; and I believe, if we look at the matter from an historical point of view, we shall see reason to conclude that decorative and imitative art were originally one and the same; that in the course of ages they have been gradually separating their functions; but that a complete and final separation has not yet been entirely effected. Whether such a separation will eventually take place in the future is a question at which we can only guess with more or less of probability.

I cannot too strongly insist, however, upon the point that my contention is simply historical and not critical. I have no intention of asserting that our painting ought to be one thing rather than another, because I do not know any meaning for the word "ought" in æsthetic matters. I am not anxious to swell the ranks of those dogmatic æstheticians, already too numerous, who are perpetually thrusting upon the public their own likes and dislikes, as though they were eternal and immutable laws of objective nature. I wish only to point out a simple positive principle in the past and present development of art, which can be easily verified by any person who takes the trouble to examine the evidence on his own account. At the same time, I must guard against an opposite misapprehension, into which my words might possibly lead an unwary reader. I have not a grain of sympathy with that modern French school who preach to us incessantly that "morality has no place in art." The insolent assumption that a particular trade or profession can set itself above those universal laws which govern all human actions and products would be ridiculous if it were not so dangerous. Right and wrong mean for the artist exactly what they mean for the rest of the world. A work of art which inspires high and noble and sympathetic sentiments is so far good, however poor may be its technique; while one which inspires low, vulgar, cruel, or anti-social emotions is so far bad, however exquisite may be its handicraft. The hideous apologies which Théophile Gautier poured forth in favor of bull-fighting and gladiatorial exhibitions; the lurid beauty of Gérôme's masterpieces, "alternating between the sanguinary and sensuous" — these are just as truly bad, in the ethical and only real sense of the word, as the literature and the art of Holywell Street. Even worse, indeed one may say, because their cruelty renders them far more revolting than their licentiousness. From the mere æsthetic standpoint these faults are to be avoided by the highest artist, because the man of refined temperament feels his taste as well as his conscience hurt by them, and the highest art is that which ministers to the most highly-organized natures. So my general statement that right and wrong have no meaning in art must be accepted in the most limited sense; that is to say, in the sense that no absolute æsthetic rule can be set up parallel to the absolute ethical rule which binds us all in every department of life.

Having thus secured ourselves against misconception on either hand, let us proceed to the historical investigation of our subject.

Painting apparently took its rise long before the discovery of pigments. Almost as soon as man was human, he seems to have employed his nascent faculties in etching rough delineations of his fellows with fragments of bone or chips of flint on any material at once hard enough and loose-textured enough to take a deep scratch. But there is no indication of coloring on these primeval bas-reliefs from the caves of Dordogne, which owe their whole artistic effectiveness to their rough accuracy of imitation. Amongst existing savages, however, color is almost universally employed upon æsthetic products, though it is often obtained by more primitive devices than that of applied pigment. Sometimes red and yellow feathers are gummed together into a rude human face, whose eyes are supplied by pieces of mother-of-pearl, while the teeth are represented by little nacreous shells. In other cases, bits of colored pebble or coral are pressed into the service of the artist to beautify the grotesque features of his staring and grinning god. Almost any natural object which exhibits bright permanent hues is prized by the savage on its own account, and is employed by some dexterous shift to enliven his simple works of statuary. Just as he admires the glitter of gold and silver, the fitful gleam of the pearl, the pure tints of the ruby, the sapphire, and the emerald — just as he collects plumes from the ostrich, the parroquet, and the macaw, or gathers cowries, cones, and wentletraps by the seashore — just as he treasures up scraps of red coral and glistening teeth of his conquered enemy — so he frankly uses these self-same materials to decorate the quaint idols which embody his highest ideal of imitative

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

art. So long as the imitation is recognizable, he cares not for appropriateness in the tints he uses, only desiring to produce a brilliant and striking mass of color which may dazzle and delight the eyes of his uncritical fellow-savage.

Wherever the use of pigments is known, we see analogous results. The North American Indians, who have two or three bright primary colors at command, employ them for decoration alone. Their baskets and bows are stained in alternate red and blue; and when they attempt figures or faces they color them for mere brilliancy of effect, with very little regard to the chromatic proprieties of nature. In the ornamental articles which they manufacture by stitching birch-bark with threads of scraped porcupine quill there is some slight approach to imitative coloring; but even this does not go beyond such broad generalities as a blue flower, red fruit, and greenish-yellow leaves. There is no shading, no variety of tint, nothing but a suggestion of conventional color applied indiscriminately to every object which can possibly be described as possessing it. For example, in this stage of art, a "red" cow would be painted in brilliant crimson, and a "blue" sea in the deepest indigo.

If we watch our own children at from four to nine years old, we shall find that they are still at the same point of artistic development. When they are given a paint-box, they set to work at once upon the nursery pictures, and adorn every little girl with a red frock, every boy with a green coat, and every man with a suit of staring yellow or massive blue. They do not care in the least whether the colors they apply resemble anything they have ever seen in real life: they want to decorate the pictures with the immediate and sensuously efficient decoration of brilliant pigments. If they make any attempt at imitative coloring, it is in the same rude form as our Indian artist's: they put a patch of scarlet on the cheeks and lips, and they represent blue eyes by a blotch of ultramarine. As for the browns, the greys, the chocolates, the duller greens and yellows of their paint-box, they try them once, vote them "ugly colors," and never use them again.

The picture-books which are printed for their use frankly recognize these facts, and present them with brilliantly-dressed ladies and gentlemen, gorgeous flowers and monstrous butterflies, gilded palaces and magnificent furniture to their heart's content. The colors are mostly primary and unshaded; they are applied with no very scrupulous regard to external reality; and they meander somewhat vaguely on either side of the line which ought to form their boundary. But the nursery critic overlooks these technical imperfections if only the hues are bright enough, deep enough, and laid on in big enough masses. "What a lovely book!" is the immediate and heart-felt exclamation, as a staring jumble of discordant pigments is laid open before the delighted eyes of the eager six-year-old recipient.

If we turn away from the savage and the child to our own early mediæval ancestors, we shall find very much the same conception of color as merely decorative and ornamental. The Bayeux tapestry employs wool of every dye to define and mark off its various characters; but there is no attempt at representing the actual shades of life. If one horse is a bright red, his neighbor is a deep blue; if Harold is wrought in pink, William faces him in green. The sole purpose of the coloring is to gratify the eye and to distinguish clearly between adjacent objects. The outlines suggest the scene represented, and the needlework renders it in the most sensuously striking hues.

A little higher up in the scale comes the sort of art which we find in the Egyptian paintings. Here we get color applied with a certain rough accuracy to persons, dresses, plants, and animals. The faces and naked limbs are something approaching Coptic flesh-color; the clothes have a considerable vraisemblance of hue; the trees are green; the flowers red, white, and yellow; and the animals dappled or striped after nature. But there is little attempt at shading, while the pigments employed are still few in number and excessively bright in tone. Although color is no longer used for purely decorative ends, but is suggested by the natural appearance of the object delineated, it yet subserves indirectly a decorative purpose, and is accordingly intensified far beyond the natural degree.

The early Italian style gives us another step in advance.* I refer, of course, merely to its employment of color, for in other ways no comparison can be insti-

* I need hardly notice the fact that my arrangement is not meant to be in any sense chronological, but simply representative. We may find at the present day almost every stage of art co-existing in one country or another; and the fluctuations of æsthetic development have been so great that the mediæval school is really earlier in point of evolution than the classical school which preceded it. I have accordingly selected from all ages and countries certain typical stages which form an ideally continuous series, never actually exhibited in the history of any one national art.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tuted between two such different schools as the Egyptian and the mediæval. In its gilded backgrounds, its glittering halos, its serene blue skies, its pale green verdure, its purple, violet, and crimson robes, the early Italian school shows us still a strong love for purely decorative effects. After the lapse of so many years, the brilliant tints of Fra Angelico stand out with startling vividness on their panels even at the present day. But mixed with this mediæval love for gorgeous coloring, we see an increasing anxiety for truthful imitation. The shades of flesh are rendered with considerable skill, and many little touches show a distinct desire to subordinate the decorative to the intellectual element. Nevertheless, on the whole, painting is still a mainly ornamental art in the hands of ecclesiastical decorators. Its principal use is for frescoes, church adornment, or monastic purposes; and it aims more at general brilliant effect in architectural composition than at separate intellectual gratification.

And now, I think, these examples will have made clear the distinction which I wish to draw between imitative and decorative art. Though the process of differentiation has been slow, and is yet incomplete, we can nevertheless see the goal towards which each has been progressing and the sources of pleasure on which it relies. Decorative art, as exhibited in its latest examples — such as the artistic cretonnes, the delicate wall-papers, and the beautiful encaustic tiles which the new æsthetic revival is making familiar to us all — depends for its effect almost entirely on immediate sensuous gratifications; though these are often of a comparatively high order. It gives us abundant visual stimulation by its pure and exquisite colors, harmoniously combined; by its pleasant alternations of light and shade; by its novel tints curiously sought out and effectively disposed. It yields us the highest pleasure of form in its graceful, flowing, and continuous curves; in its lissom sprays of straggling foliage, which nevertheless lead on the eyes unresistingly through their most natural muscular sweep; and in its symmetrical disposition of fruit, and flower, and animal form. But in its purest and most evolved types it never attempts directly to imitate nature. At most it takes a hint from some natural object, which it conventionalizes, as we say — that is, renders in symmetrical arrangement and artificial coloring. Its sole object is to give us the largest possible amount of sensuous pleasure, by means of color — simple or combined; and of form — sinuous or symmetrical. If it imitates nature, it does so only incidentally, and it owes nothing to the accuracy of the imitation.

Imitative art, on the other hand, may incidentally afford us similar sensuous pleasures, but in its most developed types it has shown a tendency to rely more and more upon the exclusively intellectual and emotional factors of æsthetic feeling. It takes some object in external nature, and endeavors to represent it on a plane surface, in color, in chiaroscuro, and in perspective. It tries to set the scene before our eyes as nearly as possible in its true lineaments, its actual relations, its total visible aspect. The whole growth of artistic technique has been the perfectioning of this process. From the single plane of the Egyptians and the floating background of the Chinese, art has advanced to the scientific perspective of the present European style. From the primary colors of the savage and the brilliant hues of the mediæval artists, it has arrived at the comparatively sombre delineations of modern landscape painters. In doing so, it has become from day to day less decorative and more imitative. It has, to a great extent, given up the attempt to please us by bright primaries, by gilding, by symmetrical arrangement, by curves and wavelines not to be found in nature. It has largely abandoned the purely sensuous gratifications — except so far as these may be really found in the objects which it copies; and it has learned to rely on the intellectual pleasure of skilful imitation, combined to a slight extent with plot-interest and sundry complex emotional feelings.*

Of course we must not suppose that civilized men are less impressible than others by the immediate sensuous pleasures of form and color. On the contrary, they are far more impressible. Our latest modern fictile and textile products are calculated to yield the refined European a much higher pleasure than any which the savage can derive from his simple patches of red and blue paint. By combining, diversifying, and sustaining in due suc-

* I must once more beg the reader to observe that I do not say decorative and imitative art ought to differ in these specified ways, but merely that their most developed forms do, as a matter of fact, differ in such ways. I must also ask him to understand that I use the words "higher and "lower," as applied to art, with no ethical connotation, but simply as synonymous with "more" or "less developed;" the test of development being, as usual, the degree of differentiation from the primitive form. Right and wrong, in art as elsewhere, can only deal with that which is consonant with or repugnant to our moral nature.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

cession the various sense-pleasures, our æsthetic designers have learned how to afford a total of artistic gratification which no repetition of violent stimulants could equal or approach. But while in one direction we have perfected the æsthetic feeling which the savage seeks to arouse by his startling pigments, in another direction we have been endeavoring to perfect the extremely different æsthetic feeling which the savage seeks to arouse by his rude imitation of faces or animal shapes. And we have discovered on our way that the two pleasures, in their highest or most developed form, are practically incompatible. We have found out that we cannot, in one and the same artistic product, enjoy both the accurate delineation of nature, and also the stimulation of colors very much brighter and more pronounced than nature. The result has been that decorative and imitative art have necessarily diverged; and that the one has endeavored to give us sensuous beauty, unconnected with imitation, while the other has aimed at truthful representation, with comparatively little regard for sensuous effect. The last qualifying phrase, however, marks the fact that the distinction between the two has not yet been fully carried out, if indeed it is ever destined to reach completion.

The reason why this distinction has arisen, and has reached its present advanced stage, is clear enough. In every generation the more critical and intelligent have progressively noticed the most striking diversities between the representation and the thing represented, thereby urging on to a closer imitation of nature. At first this impulse would only affect the very widest diversities. A red tree or a yellow sky would soon strike even the early spectator as too utterly incongruous; but an ochre cow or a vermilion cheek would not appear to him absurd. Step by step, however, the drawing would become nearer to truth, and the coloring would approximate to nature, though much more slowly. Down to a very late time, after people have learned to expect correct drawing, they will still put up with very conspicuous and undeniable over-coloring. If we look at a few illustrations, taken up almost at the point where we left off before, we may see how slow is the differentiation between the two forms of art, and how long some tradition of their original unity lingers even in their most advanced stages.

The Japanese fan, which lies before me, hardly lays claim to the rank of an exclusively imitative work. To a great extent its purpose is frankly decorative. In the foreground we have a lady dressed in violet, red, and light blue, feeding a dappled russet fawn. The whole background consists below of a massive field of green, covering by far the largest area in the entire fan. Above, the sky is represented of a clear red, shading off toward the horizon into white, lavender, and violet. A pink-blossomed tree overhangs it to the left, while a red scroll and a few violet figures break the monotonous verdure on the right. As a whole, this composition pleases even a European eye by its careful assortment of harmonies and its agreeable correspondence with the natural chromatic scale. Its inaccuracies of delineation too, though perceived, are forgiven, because we set them down at once as Japanese: we class the object in its proper place as a typical specimen of a partially developed national art. There is a certain quaintness in its very imperfections which in a way attracts us; but the attraction is rather ethnographical and scientific than æsthetic. We like such an object to decorate our mantelpiece or our whatnot, but we do not exhibit it in our galleries. Though its truthfulness of delineation is far above anything which the savage could appreciate, yet when judged by our developed standard of taste, it is seen to have sacrificed too much to mere sensuous stimulation for admission into the strictly imitative class.

A large portion of modern keramic ware — excepting only the latest and most differential specimens — shows us a similar attempt to unite the two modes of æsthetic pleasure. A Sèvres has often a background of pure color, on which is inserted a medallion of white porcelain containing some sort of picture — a bunch of roses, a group of Watteau shepherdesses, or a landscape scene with figures interspersed. The object of the whole vase is decorative, and though the central picture has more or less imitative pretensions, it shares the same purpose as the remainder; a fact which is clearly shown by its bright colors and its intensification of the natural hues which it imitates. Similarly with Dresden statuettes and other quasi-imitative developments of plastic art in its inferior walks. All of them mix up some desire to gratify by brilliant coloring with the original design of imitative effect.

As we pass on to more directly representative art we see the prevalence of decorative coloring almost as conspicuously as before. If we begin at the lowest end

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

of the social scale, we find in the cheap German prints which adorn the walls of our peasantry a profusion of reds, purples, blues, and greens, evidently laid on with the principal intention of impressing the eye by a mass of pleasant tints, in the same manner as that employed by the old Egyptian artist. The laborer who buys such a picture wishes to see in it so much likeness to nature as will enable him to recognize its subject, besides finding an appeal to some simple emotion which comes home to his heart in its better or worse moods — baby crowing at the door in its mother's arms, or the huntsman holding up the baffled fox to its snarling and baying blood-enemies; but beyond this, he also demands that his picture shall have abundance of good bright coloring, so as to decorate his whitewashed wall and gratify his native love for pungent visual stimulation. A step above this, we find in the chromo-lithographs of the middle classes one perpetual blaze of golden sunset hues, Italian lakes as blue as gentian, mountain tops tinged with more than Oriental ruddiness, Alpine valleys over which a whole paint-box seems to have got loose indiscriminately, cataracts crowned by crystallized rainbows, and backed up with a solidified firmament of ultramarine. Of course the drawing here is immensely truer than in the German print, while the colors are immensely toned down and shaded off into one another; but the decorative purpose of the pigments is still undeniably conspicuous. Vermilion, carmine, lake, and orange wander at will over sea and sky and mountain. The intention of the lithographer is to strike a compromise; he wishes to keep as true to nature as he can in drawing and shading, but to give the largest consistent amount of coloring which can be combined with approximate accuracy. His products are partly imitative pictures, but they are also partly decorative furniture.

And dare we go on to touch the very ark of art, the water-colors and oil-paintings which hang upon the walls of our academies and exhibitions themselves? It is adventurous to do so; but we must remember that this is a question of positive fact rather than one of taste or of artistic technique. The point to be settled is simply this — Do our artists purposely select the brightest-colored subjects, and exhibit them in somewhat intensified tints; and do they do so with a directly decorative intention? I think the question only admits of one answer. We cannot look about us in any art-gallery without noticing the constant choice of brilliant hues and the careful selection of scenes which will admit of their introduction. I am not criticizing this fact; I am simply stating it. Artists doubtless do quite right in representing the scenes which most gratify both themselves and their public; they only begin to do wrong when they try to convince us that their sole object is imitative. At the present stage of art, it cannot be denied that great pains are taken to introduce as much brilliant pigment as possible, without shocking the average sense of imitative propriety current in most of our educated classes. There are two ways in which this object is attained — first, by the choice of bright subjects; secondly, by the gratuitous introduction of colors, not found or only slightly hinted at in the object represented. I shall give a few examples of each.

In landscape, the decorative intention is shown in the constant selection of sunsets, bright skies, hazy atmospheric effects, red and purple tinged clouds, yellow mists, haloes round sun or moon, and other transient phases of light, in preference to the ordinary clear or dull daylight. It is equally conspicuous in the autumnal tints, the masses of purple heather, the blueness of the distant hills, the belted green and violet of the sea, the red and white cliffs which stand out massively in the foreground. We notice it again in the preponderance of Italian, Oriental, or tropical scenes, where brighter colors are admitted with greater readiness by the general public.* We very seldom find a piece of plain green and brown scenery, with a dull bluish sky, on the canvas of a painter; but we know by heart the "Lake of Como," the "Bay of Naples," the "Evening in Seville," the "Street in Cairo," and the "Sunset on Loch Lomond." Few and far between are the grey mountains, the brown gorse, the sombre stream running between dark rocks, the lake which does not mirror on its placid bosom the gay hues of eventide. Of course one finds these sometimes; but not nearly so often as the brighter subjects. Even then, they are generally represented under the influence of a thunderstorm, a mist, an early morn-

* As a matter of fact, I have learned from my own observation and the information of all trustworthy persons, that color is, on the whole, just as common in temperate north European countries as in Mediterranean or tropical climates; but the public generally is still a prey to the delusion of Italian skies and tropical flowers, so that it readily overlooks an amount of coloring on such subjects which it would regard as excessive in a simple French or English landscape.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ing, or an effect of some kind. Now this love for effects is an offspring of the decorative element in art. An effect is an opportunity for more color, for unusual color, for refractive tints of red, yellow, purple, and orange, which do not often crop out in the dispersed light of the noonday sun. Such colors are the most exceptionally bright of any which we ever see in nature, and so they are introduced with a decorative intention in art. Our public — or rather its most cultivated class — has outgrown the stage where it will accept of brilliant hues which have not even a suggestion in the original to justify them; but it seeks for the greatest masses of warm tints which it can ever find in reality, and it demands that they should be transferred to canvas with just a trifle of artistic exaggeration. Why do we so seldom see Lugano at two o'clock of a winter's afternoon, or catch a glimpse of Snowdon on an average British sunshiny morning? Simply because the artist and the public both, not unnaturally, desire to seize them at their brightest and photograph their most adventitious tints in somewhat intensified pigments.

Figure painting shows us an exactly analogous choice of subjects. Our painters ransack the earth for "effective" drapery; for matting, carpets, cloaks, and upholstery; for "local coloring" of a brilliant sort. Moorish and Persian robes, early Italian dresses, Louis Quatorze costumes, Spanish mantillas and jackets, loose Nubian gowns and necklets of coin, Hindoo veils and bangles, adorn half the pieces in the Salon. Silk, velvet, slashed doublets, Elizabethan stomachers, bright-colored hose, scarlet uniforms, south-German petticoats, princes in stars, saints in Oriental purple, gipsies in red rags, and cardinals in full canonicals, jostle one another in their gilt frames. Every chance of a brilliant dress is seized with avidity, and the wardrobe of all ages and countries is put under contribution by the modern studios. A painter in search of a subject shows his decorative intention by hunting up a theme which will afford ample opportunities for the use of sensuously efficient pigments.

So much for our first point, the decorative nature of the subjects chosen for imitation. Let us look next at our second point, the introduction, for decorative purposes, of bright color not found in the original.

Lionardo said that a perfect picture should exactly resemble the reflection of its original in a mirror. That is to say, Lionardo wished pictorial art to be purely imitative: or, at least, he said so; for there is sometimes a great difference between artistic profession and artistic practice. Our modern painters often give much the same account of their principles; but every plain, uncritical person knows that they introduce a great deal more color into their imitation than they ever found in nature. I don't blame them for doing so; on the contrary, I see that the public probably wouldn't look at their pictures if it was otherwise, and I praise them accordingly. But I insist strenuously on the positive fact that painters do introduce color for decorative effect. I have often stood and watched an artist in the very act of reddening a grey rock. If he is an unusually honest one, he will frankly admit that he does so because that point in his picture requires "warming up;" in other words, wants decorative additions. But he generally endeavors to convince us, on the strength of his abstract imitative theory, that the red tint is there, in spite of the evidence of our own eyes to the contrary. Of course it is just possible that artists may see colors very much more vividly than ordinary people: but that will not account for the discrepancy which ordinary people notice between the original and the copy. If we can't see a faint patch of red in the rock, why should we see it so plainly in the pigment? There is no way out of it. It must be intensified. I acquit the artist of deliberate falsification, but I cannot acquit him of perverse and perverted judgment in refusing to recognize his decorative wishes. Every faint hint of color is exaggerated into undue prominence. Every passing ray of sunlight is made to reveal a bit of bright lichen or faded russet leaf, which is usually merged in the dull brown of ordinary shadow. All the hills are glowing with purple and blue and ruddy pink, where nature generally shows them of a misty pearl-grey. If these devices will not suffice to "warm up" the picture, our artist throws in a bit of extraneous coloring — an old woman in a red cloak, a cow with a rich and glossy brown coat, or a couple of ruddled sheep, in strong contrast to the pale green of the surrounding meadow. Brightness of hue and harmony of coloring are still sought after for their own sake by all our painters, in spite of their constant assertion that their sole endeavor is the imitation of nature.

I cannot too often repeat that I find no fault with all this. Taste in art is simply relative to the likes and dislikes of the in-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dividual, depending ultimately upon his nervous organization; and I hope to show further on that the present development of our art is the natural and inevitable result of our existing position in time and place. It is absurd to say that artists ought to imitate nature, just as it is absurd to say that a Japanese fan ought to be more correctly drawn. Our painters aim at a mixed effect, partly intellectual through their skill in imitation, partly sensuous through their apt disposition of lines and colors. The one pleasure is just as legitimate as the other; and the only mistake that can be made is the positive one of denying the actual presence of decorative elements in existing pictorial art.

I will put a crucial instance, however, as artists — not quite recognizing their partially decorative intention — are rather slow to acknowledge that nature does not really contain all the color which they throw into it. If we wish to choose a summer resort for our holiday, where shall we go to see what it is really like? The very worst representation we can get (because the most incorrect) will be one of those flaring picture advertisements which we find upon the walls of railway stations. Its object is all but simply decorative; it lavishes the brightest pigments in the most impossible situations; it gives us absolutely snowy chalk cliffs, inexpressibly purple sea, and wonderfully pea-green meadows. Except that it does not probably falsify the main natural features in their general outline quite beyond recognition, it is useless for purposes of practical information. Next in order of unlikeness to nature comes the quasi-artistic chromolithograph. This gives us a few more intermediate colors, and a little better drawing; but it still sheds a wealth of primary tints over the scene which no human eye ever met in its waking hours. We feel at once that this, too, is quite untrustworthy as a guide to the reality. We turn to a water-color or an oil-painting, and we find to some extent in the latter and much more in the former that color is still bestowed with a generosity far exceeding the niggardly measure of nature. We really can't say whether the place itself will be pretty or not. We see a very beautiful and artistic representation, in correct drawing and perfect perspective, with a glow of color that affords immediate gratification to the eye; but we feel that it is an idealization, not a copy. Again, we take up the local guide-book, and when we find a woodcut or engraving giving us a view of the neighborhood, we are conscious that we tread at once on firmer ground. Of course the details have been exaggerated and the beauties artificially heightened, but the misleading element of color is wanting, and we know that the lines of contour cannot very widely diverge from the reality. Last of all, we get a photograph, "limned by the unerring sun," and we know with certainty what manner of place we have to deal with. Though the colors of nature are omitted, we yet find it far easier to read them into the outline before us from our general experience than to read out the idealized tints from the picture of the artist. If the photograph is not absolutely truthful, it is at any rate through no intention of falsifying or flattering that it goes astray. The sun never tries to make a pretty picture.

"So a photograph, then, is your highest ideal of imitative art!" says the critic, with that serene sneer of sarcastic inquiry for which he is so distinguished. By no means, because it is not art at all. It is merely the perfection of mechanical imitative representation, with the true element of color omitted. But it serves to bring out the decorative nature of our existing art in a very simple and conspicuous manner. Our pictures are not colored photographs, and we don't wish them to be so.

There is another criticism, however, which many people will be eager to bring forward. The admirers of the early water-color painters and their allies will say — "But you do not find these strong colors in Crome, in Girtin, in the early Turners, in David Cox." True perhaps: it is hard to say, since one must make great allowances for fading. But in any case, the example of one or two isolated names is not sufficient. All that I mean to assert is this — that nearly every existing development of art unites more or less the imitative and the decorative elements. In one instance you may find a greater preponderance of the one, and in a second instance of the other; but taking our art all round, you will find everywhere a decorative purpose still distinctly recognizable. Having arrived at this conclusion with such unanimity as may be attainable, let us go on to inquire into its origin and probable future.

There are two ways of reasoning upon æsthetic matters, by the objective and by the subjective method. The first proceeds by watching the average likes and dislikes of men generally, or of a particular nation, age, or clique, and then endeavoring to account for them on general or special

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

psychological grounds. The second proceeds by watching your own personal likes and dislikes, accounting for them transcendentally to your own satisfaction, and then dogmatically asserting their absolute truth and moral superiority to everybody else's taste. In spite of the example afforded by many distinguished critics, I prefer to follow the former method of inquiry.

If we glance rapidly at the development of art in all times and places, we shall see that it has everywhere largely depended upon the prior stages already attained. There has never been a sudden leap from one style to another. The taste of each generation has been formed upon the artistic products of those which preceded it; and no single individual has ever departed very widely from the general practice of his predecessors. An Assyrian never sat down before a living model to study chiaroscuro, nor did a Chinaman ever take his easel afield to construct a system of natural perspective. The taste of each was on the whole sufficiently gratified, and his critical scruples sufficiently met, by the average workmanship of his countrymen and contemporaries. No Zeuxis ever arose at Memphis; no Raffaelle ever sprang up suddenly amid the conventional artists of Byzantium. Cimabue led on to Giotto, and Giotto to the great painters of the Renaissance: but each change was introduced by slow and tentative degrees, or it could never have been introduced at all. The North American Indians who ask what has become of the other half in a profile, the negroes who object that a man in the foreground is bigger than a house at a hundred yards' distance, would not appreciate the sudden introduction of pictures representing every object in its real visible relations of position and magnitude. A mediæval critic would find our modern paintings dull and sombre; he would miss the brilliant tints and abundant gilding of his own school. A gamekeeper prefers the German print to the exquisite landscapes in the gallery of the castle.

Accordingly, the explanation of our existing stage in art-development is to be found in the circumstances of our place in the world's history. A differentiation has been going on for ages in a comparatively steady direction, and at a moderately even rate, though subject of course to those minor fluctuations which inevitably arise everywhere from the unequal incidence of surrounding energies. The point which we have now reached in this differentiation is just one step ahead of that which we occupied yesterday, and just one step behind that which we shall occupy to-morrow. There may be a little reaction here, a somewhat accelerated rate of progress there; but, on the whole, the art of every nation and epoch exactly answers to the general sociological development of that race and period.

And what are the factors of our own position at the present day? We are the inheritors of all the knowledge and skill of Egypt, Assyria, Greece, Italy, the Renaissance, the modern world. We are not, as we hope and believe, at a period of decline and retrogression. We are going forward on the same general lines of progress as those which have raised us to our present height. But we are not suddenly and unaccountably transcending all prior experience and all earlier methods. Our science is built on the foundations of Galileo, and Newton, and Boyle, and Cuvier; our intellects are nourished on the thoughts of Plato, and Cicero, and Pascal, and Kant; our ethics are based upon the long traditions of Christianity and the slowly improving experience of past generations. So, too, our art-constructiveness and our art-criticism are the results of a long line of previous developments. The tastes and opinions of our artists and our artistic public upon æsthetic matters are largely formed upon the models of past years; though they also diverge from those models just so far as is necessary for the continuous stream of æsthetic evolution. The work of each generation is based on the teaching of the last, which it usually slightly improves, and hands on the improvement to its successors.

Now our modern art is derived, through the Renaissance, from the mediæval and classical schools. Ever since the early Italian revival, there has been, on the whole, a constant tendency for art to become more and more imitative, less and less decorative. Whatever may have been the practice of painters, they have always set forth as their theoretical principle the direct imitation of nature. The intellectual pleasure of accurate representation has gained ground daily over the sensuous pleasure of direct chromatic stimulation. But the tradition of the older schools has not yet wholly died away, nor is the artistic public prepared to let it die away. The critical principle that art ought to be more beautiful than nature is still tacitly held, though not always openly expressed, by most of our painters and critics. In other words, art of such a sort is more pleasing to them than any other. The habits of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

their teachers and fellows, combined with the natural love for bright hues, make them prefer pictures with just so much extra coloring as we ordinarily see. More than this would offend their critical and intellectual tastes, because they have learned from their predecessors to expect a close adherence to the probabilities of nature: less than this they would regard as sombre and gloomy, because they still demand decorative effect, under the names of warmth and harmony.

Indeed, the whole controversy of realism and idealism in art is to a great extent a difference of opinion as to the imitative or decorative intention of painting. The idealists are those who would to some extent subordinate the former to the latter. The realists are those who prefer the intellectual to the sensuous and emotional element. Of course other considerations also intervene; but on the whole, the idealist is the champion of combined sense-pleasure and accurate delineation, while the realist is the champion of pure imitative skill. The one is just as right as the other, because each knows what pleases himself; and in art, whose sole province is that of pleasing us, there cannot possibly be any other test of right than each man's individual taste.

The general conclusion at which we have arrived is therefore this. In our present art there is very little pure imitative work which is not more or less mixed up with decorative additions. For many ages these two styles of art have been differentiating; but they have not even now become absolutely distinct. Decoration still borrows the forms of flowers, foliage and human features, though it conceals their lineaments by conventional treatment. Imitative art still employs color for decorative purposes, though it endeavors to use it as closely as possible after the fashion of nature herself in her warmer moods. Both the artist and the public demand this union, though they will not always confess it; and they would not be satisfied with a rigorously realistic representation of the exact colors found in the dullest natural scenes. We insist upon this particular amount of decorative intermixture and no other, because more coloring would shock our intellectual perception of similarity, while less would disappoint our expectation of sensuous stimulation.

Will the differentiation which has reached this point ever attain a higher stage? Will the imitative element ever be banished from ornament, and the decorative element from painting? This is a difficult and a prophetic question upon which a great deal may be said from either side.

On the one hand it may be urged that the progress in either direction has been steady and regular during a vast period of past development; and it may seem unlikely that so uniform a movement should cease just at its present point. Under our very eyes we see a considerable step in the same path being taken both by ornament and by painting. Pottery and textile fabrics are beginning to discard the bunches of flowers, the landscapes, the figure pieces of former industrial art. Decorators are preaching loudly that "good taste" demands of all products not absolutely imitative that they should be entirely decorative. In needle-work, where nature cannot be represented with accuracy, the rulers of our artistic world are fast gravitating towards conventional patterns and artificial harmonies of tint: the shaded mosaic work of tiny square patches which used to cover so many yards of canvas is giving way to crewel-stitch and uniform coloring. In keramic art, the rich hues and beading of Renaissance pottery are displacing the floral ornamentation and landscape scenes of the last half-century. In house furniture, a distinguished knot of artistic designers have introduced wall-papers and cretonnes on which diapered patterns, exquisite twining tracery, and powerful yet delicately-blended colors are substituted for the scattered pictures which covered our walls and our sofas until yesterday. The public is beginning to draw a hard and fast line on this side between imitation and decoration, and to expect that wherever ornament is borrowed from natural forms it shall be so conventionalized and adapted as to show at once its decorative intention. Instead of real flowers and leaves in brilliant bunches on a white background, our æsthetic purveyors now tickle our eyes with continuous patterns of richly-toned foliage, blossom, and fruit, rendered in symmetrical order and graceful curves, on a ground of some relieving and restful neutral tint. In short, the present tendency of decorative art is to become more distinct than ever from imitative painting.*

* Let me again warn the reader against the notion that any objective goodness or badness is asserted concerning this movement. It is a fashion which pleases me personally, and which, like many others, I am glad to follow; but it is none the less a fashion, not a principle or expression of objective truth. All art is good or bad relatively to the individual alone. To ask another man to conform to one's own standard of taste is in effect asking him to get himself a new nervous system.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Nor can I doubt that, on the whole, of late years, imitative art has simultaneously been growing less decorative and confining itself more strictly to the rigorous copying of nature. Individual instances there may be to the contrary; but most visitors to our exhibitions will probably agree that a more sober and immediately imitative style of coloring has been gradually growing both in the practice of painters and the estimation of connoisseurs. The movement towards differentiation is apparently affecting painting in the same way as it affects ornament, though doubtless to a less degree.

On the other hand, many plausible arguments may be brought against the probability of an ultimate and complete differentiation, at least within any reasonable forecast of future time. It may be said that while developed ornamental art has rejected, or is now rejecting, all direct imitation, it has always retained some likeness to animal and floral forms, however much disguised by conventional adaptations. There does not seem to be any reason why it should not continue in future to base itself upon these natural shapes, even if it take hitherto unexampled pains in asserting their purely suggestive character. So too, in the case of painting, it may be reasonably affirmed that the sensuous love for brilliant color is a more primordial and deeply-seated element of our æsthetic nature than the intellectual love for accurate imitation. It may easily happen, therefore, that even when the pleasure of direct chromatic stimulation has been minimized in imitative art, there will still remain a remnant to bear witness forever to its originally decorative nature. It seems hard to believe that painters will ever cease from choosing for their themes the most exceptionally brilliant scenes of the external world. It would appear natural enough to suppose that we should always most represent what pleases us most in its presentative form.

Perhaps an intermediate course will be the one actually taken in the future development of art. A more exacting and critical eye in coming generations may demand a stricter adherence to the coloring of nature in landscape and portrait, while it may retain somewhat of the older brilliancy in purely ideal pieces. There is little likelihood of any ascetic rejection of color on its own account. But when the rising æsthetic school have reformed our houses in accordance with their own taste, it may perhaps happen that the public will find color enough in its decorative appliances, and only demand the intellectual pleasure of accurate imitation in its pictorial art. There will perhaps be sensuous stimulation sufficient for every eye in the encaustic tiles, the wooden parquets, the oaken wainscoting, the rich carpets, the deeply-tinted dados, the light and brilliant wall-papers, the delicate table-covers, the chintzes, curtains, cushions, banner-screens, and antimacassars; and it may become a pleasant relief to rest the vision and fix the attention upon a landscape or a figure painting in gentle and natural colors. Pictures might then cease to do double duty as art-products and decorative furniture. Landscape might become greyer and more truthful; historical paintings might grow less theatrical and more realistic; while general figure subjects might be chosen with less reference to costume and coloring than is at present the case.

However this may be, it is important to remember that art in every stage is exactly adapted to its public and its professors. The stage which we have actually reached is at each moment the one which we are best able to appreciate. In art, whatever is is right; because to be right is merely to please one's public. I trust, therefore, that no reader will misunderstand my meaning and suppose that I would blame artists for the decorative coloring which I cannot help seeing in their work. I merely point out that it is there, and why it is there. Further than this no philosophic critic can go. To say that it is right or wrong is merely to say that the critic himself admires or dislikes it; a purely personal point which can very seldom be of any general interest to the outside world. Given an object and its representation, any man can decide upon the positive question whether or not, and how much, the copy reproduces the original. But no man can decide dogmatically just how much resemblance and how much decorative deviation other people ought to admire. It is the business of the critic to point out beauties or failures as he conceives them: it is the province of the psychological æsthetician to account for the average likes and dislikes of others as he finds them.

G. A.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Contemporary Review.

SIR WALTER SCOTT AND THE ROMANTIC REACTION.*

Is a strong attraction for a particular writer an advantage or a disadvantage in the attempt at an appreciation of his genius? Could the answer be received as disinterested, we would boldly avow the first view as our own. A strong literary partiality may disqualify the student of literature for any proportionate estimate of the particular mind which has fascinated him, but we cannot but consider it an adequate compensation for all limitation in critical power, that it lights up for him what is actually there. However, any expansion of this view would be a most unbecoming as well as impolitic prelude to a literary attempt of which it is the main justification. We will not provoke sceptics to question our vantage-ground by a preliminary éloge of its strength. We will rather frankly admit that whatever critical advantage lies in an impartial position must be at once disclaimed here. The beginning of our century was one of those wonderful literary eras which stand out like glowing Alpine peaks in any review of history; and we do not advance for our poet the claim that in that group to which its splendor is owing his figure is predominant. But could we, for our own part, recall one of those who made the time what it was, the poet who should be summoned back to a world he was not loath to quit should be Walter Scott. Doubtless we might revive a better man and a better poet in Wordsworth, a far keener genius in Byron, a deeper thinker in Coleridge, a more subtle spirit in Shelley. Yet in none of these do we find that indescribable delightfulness of nature which mingles like a perfume with the utterance of genius, blending our admiration for the creation and the creator, and making us doubt whether we love the writer for the sake of his work, or the work because it recalls the writer. Perhaps it is not thus that we feel towards absolutely the first-rate creations of genius. A dramatic genius, if perfect, is self-effacing. But, this concession made, we would ask if the sense of contact with a robust and spirited nature, distinct with absolute simplicity, and graceful in its frank modesty — if this is not to be taken into account in judging of works which would stand high on their own merits? Of how many men of genius could you say what nobody, we suppose, would deny of Scott? How many modest men of genius has the world known? How many, of whom you could say that they were emphatically men? No one would have had so much excuse for the failings of genius, for no genius ever before met with such universal recognition and such solid recompense. And yet he — the most lionized of men — never, so far as we can see, allowed a taint of vanity or egotism to mar the genial frankness of his attitude to all the world. There are, no doubt, many men of genius of whose personality we do not gain a sufficiently distinct glimpse to discern either the presence or absence of modesty, but to feel at once that a man is pre-eminent in intellect, and that he is modest, is a literary experience belonging, we should say, almost exclusively to the readers of Sir Walter Scott.*

"That may have been an important fact to his friends and dependents," the reader may perhaps object, "but it is nothing to those who know him only through his books." This seems to us a delusion. The thing that showed itself in Scott's character as kindness to the insignificant and the lowly,— exaggeration of the powers of others, and depreciation of his own, — showed itself in his intellect as that perfect simplicity which is one of the finest characteristics of his genius. It is simplicity which gives his style both its rapidity and its pathos. He moves unencumbered by his own personality. We cannot say this of any of his great contemporaries. We are not denying that in some respects their interest for us depends upon the fact that we cannot say it. Their pictures of nature and of life are often made more interesting by the presence of an interesting personality. Still this particular charm is his more than theirs. To find Scott's peer in simplicity, we must go to the kings of the poetic world, and set him by the side of Shakespeare and Homer. We need hardly add that it is only in this single quality we make such a claim for him, but in this we make it fearlessly. The simplicity of the poet is as perfect as was the modesty of the man.

We dwell at length upon this quality in Scott because in the charming little volume which has called forth these remarks, pride is singled out as the distinguishing

* Scott. By RICHARD H. HUTTON. (English Men of Letters. Edited by JOHN MORLEY.) London: Macmillan & Co.

* "Not being endowed with the talents of Burns or Chatterton," he begins his autobiography, "I have been delivered also from their temptations." It is impossible to suspect him of affectation, even were affectation probable in a fragment of self-description, only to be read after the writer's death.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

note of his character. Not standing on the level of our poet, we must not imitate him in saying that "we do not write for that dull elf" who imagines any distinction of contrast between pride and modesty; but we will venture to assert that they are much more often found together than apart. The man who is modest on his strong side is generally proud on his weak side. Take the first reserved, manly, sensitive person you meet, and it is a chance which of the two words you will be inclined to use in describing him. The sense of personal honor and that reticence which guards it may be expressed almost equally by either; and if self-suppression does not imply a low estimate of self, it always resembles and sometimes produces it. In the case of Sir Walter Scott, the two things, we believe, were mutually cause and effect.

In saying that Scott was singularly free from the faults of genius, we do not mean that he was faultless. He had great faults as a man, and these, like his great virtues, colored his genius and leave their trace on his works. Of the worldliness in his character we think Mr. Hutton speaks too mildly. It seems the main aspect that attracted the notice of Scott's great countryman, and impressed itself on the only attempt at an appreciation of the northern singer by an equal, if not a superior. From Carlyle's review of Scott we should suppose him to be a mere manufacturer of well-paid literary luxuries for the fashionable and indolent, — a varnisher of antique trash made, according to the facetious tale, to sell, — a mere lover of the world's high places and clever earner of the needful means of winning them. Such an estimate, proceeding from such a man, is a cruel blow to a great reputation, and it is no small part of the satisfaction we have had in the little book before us (which we have with utter astonishment seen criticised as repeating the estimate against which we welcome it as a protest) that it indicates a return in general feeling from the most exaggerated reaction commemorated in that review. But to protest against any injustice with effect we must recognize the fibre of truth, apart from which injustice has no coherence. Scott's was, we have said, eminently a manly nature. Everything about him is manly, whether we take that word in its nobler or in its more conventional sense. And the more manly a character is, the more handles the world finds in it. Courage, decision, spirit, self-control, are qualities which all men appreciate. They are the instruments of successful action; the ladders by which the high places of the world are scaled. To be richly endowed with all that worldly men most prize and honor, and yet to be "unspotted by the world," is not impossible; but we must never expect to be able to say as much of one to whose other difficulties were added the tremendous temptations of genius. For while the manly nature supplies the soil where worldliness will grow, we may be very sure that the domain of genius is not unvisited by the winged seed, so swift to settle, so inconceivably hard to uproot. It is not less tempting to the son of a solicitor to become a baronet, a laird, and the founder of a family, because he is also a man of genius. When men of genius are indifferent to these things, they are more indifferent than other men. Wordsworth would have cared nothing for them, and so would Mr. Carlyle himself. On the other hand, when a man of genius does care for them, he cares more than most do. There is more imagination to reflect every object of desire; there is a greater variety of intellectual channels, and these deeper and wider, for all satisfaction to fill. Mr. Carlyle speaks of Scott's "vulgar worldliness" as if he had been a citizen of London aspiring to move from the east to the west, to see his name in the Morning Post at the tail of a list of dukes, to eat French cookery off gold plate, and have his wife's horses noted in the park. It is not just thus to confuse different shades even of what is contemptible. Worldliness it was, no doubt, to find his stimulant to literary activity in the hope of founding a line of Scotts of Abbotsford, but it was not exactly the same thing as if he had made it an object of ambition to live in Grosvenor Square. One great Scotchman might, in judging another, have made more allowance for what was national in his weakness. He whose nature vibrated to the touch of the past, may he not be judged more lightly for greed, if we must call it so, that reaches forward to the future? If his genius was steeped in images of grandeur, and the clans of Scotland were to find in him a singer who has made their dialect and their manners familiar to many generations, may he not find some excuse for having tried to set up his tawdry imitation of the antique Scottish home he has made familiar and dear to us all? It is easy to sneer at his stucco panellings, his scraps of armor and antique furniture, his bran-new castle, redolent of upholsterers' bills. The same imagination that revived a buried past invested all these things with the dignity of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

a distant future. Edgar Quinet has imagined Homer creating the "Iliad" from some fragment of half-buried masonry, revealing to him a half-buried past to be peopled by his genius. The Cyclopean ruin, according to the brilliant Frenchman, gave the hint which a great genius, helped by vague tradition, developed into the tale of Troy divine. That seems to us a transplantation of modern growth to the soil of antiquity; but something like it was true of the poet who has some few but striking characteristics in common with Homer. And though it is a long way from a hoary ruin recording in its scars the tale of a fierce and stormy past to the bran-new trumpery of Abbotsford, still between the spirit that loves the one and creates the other there is the connection that exists between any right and healthful feeling and its distortion. If Scott could have been content with his position in the world of imagination and thought, if he had craved no tangible, material expression of his link to the far-away, he would not only have been a greater man, he would have been a far happier, a far more prosperous man. Ah! how paltry, how impotent, appear the objects of worldly ambition when they are seen with the reverted eye! But we must not allow this discernment, overwhelming as it is, to blind us to the ready alliance of these allurements with what is excellent. All that was good in Scott allied itself with the desire to be a holder of Scottish land. His genial hospitality, his sympathy alike with high and low, his love of the careless, free, open-air life, and his intense feeling for nature — all, in short, that gives charm to his writing, arrayed itself on the same side as vulgar ambition. Few of us are capable of measuring the danger of that alliance. Few can estimate the promise of the tempter when he whispers, "All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me." Only once in the world's history, we believe, was that promise heard, adequately comprehended, and entirely rejected.

Carlyle's harsh estimate, we must remember, was written before he had seen the last touching volume of Lockhart's life of his father-in-law. That noble and pathetic struggle with disease and poverty could not, we think, leave the severest condemnation unsoftened towards him who "still with the throttling hands of Death at strife," struggled to pay off a load of debt, and broke down under the gigantic effort. But the judgment, to which the unswerving desire is as the successful achievement, set a seal of acceptance on his patient struggle. To Scott, in the mental weakness of incipient brain disease, was granted by a merciful Heaven the delusion that the hard work was over and the load of debt paid. We almost feel as if we ought to share this delusion; or, at least, in reviewing those years of solitude, of dreary, desolate effort, of the occupation which from a delight had become a torment, the enchanter's rod turned to a scourge, the only words that express our sense of a great spiritual victory are, "He hath received at the Lord's hand the double (i.e., according to the true reading, the adequate punishment) for all his sins."

We cannot trust ourselves to dwell on those last years of one whose nature seemed formed for joy. But it is a weak shrinking. He was spared the awful fate of impunity. He was granted the privilege accorded by Heaven to its favored sons, of expiating all that was weak and unworthy by painful struggle — of exhibiting, side by side, the fugitive nature of those things for which he had striven and the enduring reality of that which he had gained almost unsought. High and low brought their tribute to his death-bed alike. "Do you know where he is lying, sir?" asked a poor man of Allan Cunningham when Scott lay dying, as if there were only one "he" in London; and the vessel which bore him to a milder clime, too late to revive his exhausted frame, was supplied by a government to which he was hostile. "The glory dies not, and the pain is past."

We ought not, perhaps, to wonder that the temptations of worldliness should fail of their due allowance from one who has never shown any capacity for feeling them. But when we turn from Mr. Carlyle's judgment of the intellectual status of his great countryman, we own ourselves as little satisfied as with his moral judgment. An intelligent Frenchman or German wishing to gain some knowledge of English literature, and studying for that purpose the "Miscellanies" of our great critic, would, we imagine, come to the conclusion that it was mere waste of time for any one who wished to disentangle only what is permanent from what calls itself literature, to make himself acquainted with Scott. "It was not," our investigating foreigner might conclude, as he closed the article Mr. Carlyle wrote for the Westminster Review, — "it was evidently not an outburst of any original or spontaneous genius which attracted so much attention. Scott translated Götz von Berlichingen, and, finding that pictures of mediæval life were attrac-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

tive, went on copying cleverly what he had studied, and giving the English world unlimited doses of Götz and water, which rapidly became weaker and weaker. If his clever seasoning and the thirst of the time supplied an eager demand for the manufacture during his lifetime, it would clearly be a waste of time to taste it now." This imaginary decision embodies an honest attempt to put the effect of Carlyle's article into a few words, and we would ask any one who even glances at reviews, if it would not be an enormous mistake? There are a great many writers much deeper and more subtle than Scott whom a student of English literature might neglect with far less loss. It is dangerous, perhaps, to bring a comparison into one's own time, but we should venture to say that, from this point of view — not that of the lover of poetry, but that of the student of poetry as the interpreter of English life — a reader had much better leave the works of Tennyson unread, than those of Scott. The flower may be far more exquisite, but the plant is not in the same degree a characteristic of the soil. We do not imagine the future historian of the Victorian age will turn much to any contemporary poet to illustrate the reign which forms his subject. He may extract Tennyson's ode on the death of the Duke of Wellington, which rather illustrates the past than the present, and there may be one or two other pieces which would come in well enough to give a picturesque touch to some part of his narrative, but his treatment of the literary part of his subject will be curiously separate from the rest; and in the case of one who, according to our own view, is the greatest English poet of the last generation, the historian will look in vain for any point of contact whatever with the political and practical life of commonplace men. This is remarkably untrue of all the great English poets whose youth was contemporary with the French Revolution, and we do not think it would be so untrue of any as of Walter Scott. It was not that his allusions to contemporary events are particularly interesting. For our own part we can never get through "The Vision of Don Roderick;" and the monody on the death of Pitt and Fox, which seemed the most exquisite poetry in the world when read by a child about halfway between the present date and that of its being written, reveals, on a mature re-perusal, a good deal that we must confess to be somewhat trite. No, it is not his allusions to the men and events of the day that make Scott an interpreter of the life of his day. It is his sympathy for a past suddenly become remote; it is the part of his nature that vibrated to an order of things doomed, indeed, everywhere to perish by more or less gradual decay, but which the great crash of the French Revolution banished with a sudden clamor of hatred and outcry that attracted the attention of the world, and, breaking up all other lines of division, arrayed the nations in hostile ranks according to the fears or the hopes roused by the new-born democracy of France.

We may measure its influence by turning for a moment to one on whose character and work that great convulsion set an indelible mark. A young contemporary and countryman of Scott hailed the dawn of that new day with no common joy. The ring of his spear on the shield of the noblest of English statesmen, driven in his old age by this new and terrible issue into the ranks of the retrograde party, attracted every ear, and roused the generous friendship of his opponent. The "Vindiciæ Gallicæ" remains as an illustration of Wordsworth's lines, —

> Bliss was it in that day to be alive,
> But to be young was very heaven.

It commemorates the hopes, the tremulous, exaggerated anticipations, the terrible and crushing disappointments, of those who looked to this new era as the coming of the kingdom of heaven. One in whose veins flows the blood of Mackintosh cannot think without emotion of the strange stamp of irresolution, of hesitation, of dread of the absolute which that mighty disappointment set on his whole subsequent career, how the whole day's work was affected by the morning's dream, and when his evening came it closed on the incomplete work that marks the uncertain choice, and commemorates the glowing and passionate hopes to which history had given the lie. Before Napoleon by a blunder congratulated the wrong man on having written "the unanswerable answer to Burke," that answer had become a sad record of the fallacy of these hopes; and ever after, as it seems to his descendant, their recollection haunted him who that once, and never again, thought the issues of history exhibited the contrasted influences of Ahriman and of Ormuzd, who in his whole subsequent life exhibited the weakness and the strength of an anxious, perhaps an exaggerated, desire to keep justice unwarped by sympathy.*

* The above is the substance of an unfinished essay on the life of Mackintosh by one whom the world will never be able to appreciate, but whom the present

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

It will not, it is hoped, be taken as a mark of personal feeling in the present writer to have introduced into an essay on the genius of Scott the name of one who was Scott's most assiduous visitor in the last sad visit to London,* when the sands of life were low for both, and the sense of a last parting just at hand touched every meeting with its solemnity, its tenderness, and its calm. They had taken different sides in the great dividing questions of the day, and their intercourse had been rare. But in that hour of dim sadness their very divergence became a bond, and Mackintosh, welcome for many reasons, was not the less welcome because he lured away the thoughts of his old friend into those green paths where politics cast no blight, and where each might feel, in the words of Scott's epitaph on Fox,

> If ever from the British heart,
> Oh now let prejudice depart, and leave the hearts of two noble Scotchmen open to the binding and permanent interests from which none were more able than they to draw consolation and hope, even on the very edge of the Valley of the Shadow of Death.

The great movement of which the French Revolution forms the political summit has many sides, and an attempt to appreciate the genius of Scott demands a hasty glance at each. It implies — although in connection with that great event we can hardly say it exhibits — a new interest in individual life, a new respect for idiosyncrasy, and a minute and delicate appreciation for shades of character, both national and personal. Its tendency to develop sympathy with the lowly and obscure, though in reality only a part of the first-mentioned influence, is far more obvious, and is indeed but the literary side of modern democracy. On the other hand, a large part of its influence, and that which most concerns a critic of Sir Walter Scott, is to be traced in the reaction in favor of all that democracy undervalues and obliterates. The feudal past was never loved as it was just before France forever cast away all traces of feudalism. And finally — for a summary of such a movement crowded into such a space must be confined to these bare hints — it exhibits a peculiar love and reverence for nature, in every sense of that vague word, most obviously in the simple outward sense in which alone a critic of Scott need consider it, but also in other shades of meaning more disputable and subtle, though probably, if their import were well weighed, not less valid. However, we have nothing to do with the last, and only mention that aspect of the movement because these other shades of meaning are so important that, even when they are not relevant, it is impossible to approach the subject without naming them.

Scott shows some trace of almost all these tendencies. But if we had to condense into a single phrase the part of this mighty movement embodied in his genius, we should say that that genius was animated by the sympathy with chivalry that was created by its death-blow. Such a summary omits so much that it must throw some undue importance on what it selects; we seem to pass over Scott as what he was so eminently, the painter of nature, and even to deny what he was not less eminently, the painter of humble life. Still we believe it states the most important thing about him. We must always be very careful not to confuse the spirit which admires a particular character with that character itself. Very often they are exactly opposite. The love of chivalry was, in Scott's mind, a love of the past. Of course it was quite unlike any feeling men could have known while that past was present. Nothing is more unlike the feeling of childhood than the feeling with which we revisit the scenes of childhood. Nothing is so unlike the spirit of the men who built castle or abbey as the spirit which delights to trace and restore their ruins. "I have never," says Scott himself, "been able to gain a good idea of a battle from a soldier;" and we have heard of a soldier who professed himself quite unable to recognize anything describing his own experience in the despatches recording an engagement in which he had taken part. The spirit that moves men to action is not the spirit that enables them to review action. No doubt Scott would have made a noble knight, a noble soldier. But then he would not have been the Walter Scott we know. If he could have lived his ideal he would not have written it. His genius, we may say, would not in that case have existed.

The description given above might perhaps be objected to on chronological grounds; we may be thought to antedate the feeling of which we make Scott the writer can never lose an opportunity of naming with an undying gratitude and regret — Alexander John Scott.

* I.e., during Scott's last visit to London, in 1830. "Sir James's kind assiduity," says Lockhart, "was the more welcome, that his appearance banished the politics of the hour on which his old friend's thoughts were too apt to brood." Lockhart was not too much inclined to give any tribute to Sir James Mackintosh.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

representative. We may be reminded that he was a staunch opponent of the triumphant Washington when he had scarcely ceased to find his dearest playfellows in the lambs on his grandfather's farm; and if the enthusiasm of the young politician should be set aside as worthless (which for our part we should not allow), there is plenty of indication throughout Scott's youth * of the strong bent of his sympathies, while as yet the floods had not descended or the waves beat, and the house that was soon to fall with a mighty crash seemed founded on a rock. But we must never think of that or any other great event in history as something unpreluded through years when our ear marks no announcing chord; a finer organ or a more attentive listener would be prepared for the crash of sound — harmonious or discordant according to our sympathies — which announces a new movement in the great symphony of the ages. Chesterfield's celebrated prophecy dates from the middle of the century which closed with its fulfilment, and the assertion that in 1753 "all the symptoms I have ever met with in history previous to great changes and revolutions exist and increase in France" is one of many proofs that the eighteenth century was above all a preparation for the French Revolution. Throughout all that period men were unconsciously ranging themselves for a great conflict. More or less we fix every one's position by the question — Did he advance or did he resist the principles of the Revolution? It is true many, in our own country perhaps most, of those who had prepared the enemy's march, were startled when they found themselves fighting by his side. Gibbon, for instance, was one of those whose influence we should describe as making the rough places plain for the invader, yet when he came the spirit of democracy was "the blackest demon of hell." Now this same mighty influence that bid men work for a great breach with the past told on the generations who felt it, in heightening an affection for the past that was thus to be cast off. We shall often find in history and in our own individual lives that there seems to have been a spirit of foreboding in the air; we knew not why the moments were precious till in looking back we see the coming death or estrangement mark off that time as something the years were not to repeat for us. Something of this spirit seems to us to have moulded the genius of Scott. He hardly lived really to see the French Revolution, for we should say that only our own generation have reached a point whence they may look back and discern the clear outline against the sky. He lived amid its stir and throb; he knew not how profoundly, how permanently it was to influence the modern world, but unconsciously he turned with the tenderness of farewell to that great system of things it was to sweep away, and, like a painter in a foreign land, where he knows his sojourn will be short, he flung with hasty hand its lineaments on his glowing canvas. We may be told that all he cared for was to see his pictures framed and glazed at the most advantageous position in the dealer's shop. True, in a sense — in a very important sense. But still it is also true that he painted a past made dearer to him by its unlikeness to the spirit of all around him which stirred his forebodings and opposed his taste.

This spirit, that looks on feudalism, on chivalry, on the whole mediæval world, against a modern background, found many exponents at that day. Lockhart's page is crowded with their names. Ellis, Percy, Ritson, all the lovers of our early ballad literature, were spiritual brothers of Scott, as most of them were his friends. We should, for our own part, be inclined to find its first eminent representative in Gray. An interesting article in the Saturday Review, some years ago, called attention to the fact that the well-known verse in the "Elegy" commemorating the possible eminence of many forgotten sleepers in the country churchyard, was at first filled with classical names. Gray had written at first of

Some village Cato, who with dauntless breast
The little tyrant of his fields withstood,
Some mute inglorious Tully here may rest,
Some Cæsar, guiltless of his country's blood.

This interesting fact seems to us at once to fix Gray's position, and to mark the change that was passing over the spirit of literature in his day. As the stanza is here written, it belongs wholly to the ideal of history according to which the only interesting past is the classical past. Gray was the first writer who, himself moulded on that classical past, yet shows an especial interest in the dawn of a Christian civilization. "The Bard" is the herald of a new era. That the barbarians of Wales had their literature was a discovery characteristic of the coming age. Everywhere an interest was to arise for what was in a special sense national, what we might

* He was born in 1771.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

say was vernacular, what led the reader away from the broad highway into the narrow footpaths of literature, where an unsuspected flora lurked beneath the shade of the brushwood, and ballads commemorated the names of those to whom history had accorded no epic. The taste for savage life, so curiously characteristic of the most artificial period of our literature, now allied itself with history, and men turned from the remote but dazzling past of Rome (as for that of Greece, it did not attract much attention in the kind of literature we are contemplating) to a nearer and yet dimmer past — to the early twilight of national life, when the birds sang in the dewy dawn, and the stars had hardly ceased to be visible. The fragrance of this early morning-time seems to us to haunt the poetry of Gray like some subtle essence, but it is the spirit of recollection, not of experience, in which he exhibits it to us. It was the contrast of the life Gray painted in "The Bard" to the life of the coffee-house and the common room which made the picture he painted. Till the eighteenth century, the past — the romantic, Gothic past — wanted its background. No doubt a still more remote past, if we judge by chronology, was known well enough, but that was the knowledge of similarity, not the interest of contrast. Horace was the contemporary of the men of that day. The songs which Percy and Ellis collected belonged to a generation far away from all their thoughts and cares. The charm of the far-away, characteristic of a weary age, most especially characteristic of our own, began to be felt in the eighteenth century. Oh, arid, staring noon, where shall we escape from your prosaic monotony? How shall we revive the sweet glimmering uncertainties of daybreak? This was the feeling which made men turn to the dawn of a Christian civilization. The great literature of Rome offers nothing to satisfy this craving. We must turn, to satisfy it, to the songs that delighted the infancy of our own and kindred nations — to the springtime of our own year.

We have spoken of Gray as the herald of the new era, and we think the proof of a readiness in commonplace minds to move in this new direction is to be found in the contemporary and fellow-traveller of Gray — the despised Horace Walpole — a name we cannot mention without adding that we consider the contempt unjust. However, we must not linger to justify that impression, for he is produced here only as a witness to the dawn of antiquarianism. The astonishment of Mr. Seward (father of the vain and irritable Anna, afterwards Scott's correspondent) at finding a sane man hunting up old rubbish in the lumber-room at Ragley, in 1758, may stand as a sort of milestone of the time when it was a surprising taste to care for old books and furniture, and yet when a man of no great originality had such a taste. But Walpole, it may be objected, only cared for old helmets and gloves, and such like trumpery. He did care a good deal about trumpery, but it was part of a real appreciative interest in the past, and everything that bore record of it. His "Description of the Villa of Horace Walpole" (1772) commemorates the first expression of any attempt at reproducing the Gothic architecture which men had to imitate foolishly before they learnt to love, at a time when people cared so little about it, that when he applied for some old tiles from Gloucester Cathedral that were being thrown away, the canons, who "would not allow them to be put to any profane use," destroyed them in preference. His "Castle of Otranto" (1764) may be regarded as the predecessor of all Scott's novels. It was the first romantic sketch of the life of the past, taken from a strictly modern point of view, and was one of the books devoured by Scott as a boy of thirteen or fourteen, in some inaccessible nook on Arthur's Seat on Blackford Hill. This dawning feeling for a life the name of which had become a mere synonym for tasteless barbarism may be symbolized by its appearance in these well-known fellow-travellers Walpole and Gray, and the dilettante is not unworthy to be mentioned beside the poet, if only from the magnanimity which expiated his boyish impertinence in its frank and humiliating confession.

The taste of which we have thus marked the rise had grown to a strong and broad current of feeling when Scott, as a boy of fifteen (1786), had his only meeting with the poet whose genius did so much to feed it, and with whom, in the spirit of humility so characteristic of himself, he deprecated any comparison. The youthful Scott had the proud satisfaction of satisfying the poet's curiosity as to the author of some lines which, placed beneath an engraving in the house of the friend where his meeting with Burns took place, representing a dying soldier, had, in conjunction with their illustration, moved the impressible poet to tears. The verses have nothing remarkable about them, but most of us have ex-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

perienced the sudden rush of unexpected emotion at some touch reviving or creating, by means apparently quite inadequate, a realizing sense of the misery of the world. The incident is one of the most interesting in the life of Scott, and we reflect with pleasure that Burns must have cherished some interest in the lame modest boy who could give him the name of a poet as little known as Langhorne, and in whose sweet and winning aspect he doubtless felt the charm which in later years drew to Scott so many simple hearts. But we cite this fragment of biography here for its significance as a landmark in the development of the new spirit we aim at following out, and of which the fame of Robert Burns forms an advanced stage.

It was only ten years later that he began his translations from the German, which certainly gave the first suggestion to his genius, and revealed to him his destined rôle in the great literary movement of his day. Nevertheless we should say that Byron's name for him, "the Ariosto of the North," was a truer indication of the real affinities of his genius than the fact that he was a translator from "the elegant author of 'The Sorrows of Werther.'" Götz von Berlichingen may be the spiritual father of Quentin Durward and his allies, but we could have spared them and still kept the best of Scott. Sometimes we are even tempted to doubt whether it was not a misfortune that his first essay tempted him on to foreign soil, and to suspect that his work would have been more enduring if his genius had been confined to the soil where it flourished best — that of his native land. However, his German phase was significant as an indication of the place German literature was to take in the coming age. At the end of the last century a paper read by the author of "The Man of Feeling" (1788) revealed to the literary world of Edinburgh, says Scott, "the existence of works of genius in a language cognate with English, and still more closely approaching Lowland Scotch." We have known an old Scotch lady, ignorant of German, who declared after a visit to Germany, that she found no difficulty whatever in making herself understood; and whether she flattered herself or not, there is no doubt that a German would guess at the meaning of Scotch much more successfully than at that of English, while the intellectual differences between the inhabitants of the northern and southern half of our nation draw the Scotch near the Germans in other respects than that of language. The discovery of German literature formed, indeed, a sort of second Renaissance; and in 1792 a class was formed, consisting of Scott and several of his friends, for the prosecution of this "new learning." Scott's interest in German life had been awakened some years before: his assistant in his vain but persistent attempts to acquire some power over the pencil was a Prussian Jew whose father had been a commissary, "or perhaps a spy," in the armies of Frederick the Great, and young Scott heard from his drawing-master many a picturesque tale of the great general's battles, far more valuable to him than the precepts of his art had they been ever so successful. He now turned with ardor, if not with industry, to the acquirement of this new lore, and it needed the classic severity of taste of his friend Erskine (well known to all readers of "Marmion") to hold him back from the "extravagances" of the literature which charmed him, for so it impressed the minds that were moulded on the great writers of Rome. Mrs. Barbauld has the honor to have first applied the match to this well-arranged pile, and her credit is the greater that her reading at Dugald Stewart's, in 1795, which was the origin of his first essay, was only made known to him at second hand by a friend who had formed one of the audience, and whose account fired him with an eagerness that knew no pause till he acquired a copy of the original German ballad from which she had read William Taylor's translation — Burger's "Lenore." Thus originated his first attempt at published verse. The fact that a great part of the edition of Scott's translation of Burger's ballads was consigned to the trunkmaker is less important as an index of the taste of the day than that which was partly its cause — that many translations of the same poem appeared at the same time. And Scott, undaunted by the failure, and encouraged by the sympathy of many whose sympathy was worth more than the applause of the public, — his rival, William Taylor of Norwich, among them, — pursued his way, and his translation of Götz von Berlichingen (1799) was an event of no small importance as a landmark in the history of literature, although the ridicule then showered by the genius of Canning on the German drama helped to consign the translation itself to oblivion.

The avowal that Carlyle's view of Goethe's influence on Scott has some of the exaggeration natural to one who has

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

done more to make German literature known to us than any other writer now alive would excuse any critic of Scott from an attempt even to give a name to the most prominent characteristics of that literature; and in the present writer such an attempt would be presumptuous as well as irrelevant. So far as Scott presents any marked characteristics of the German mind, it is only because they are also the characteristics of the Scotch mind, or indeed of the whole Teutonic race, of which we are ourselves a branch. However, in any study of the movement we are tracing, these broader differences are of great importance, and a word may be given to them in passing.

Will it be thought fanciful if we fix on a trifling distinction of dialect noted by Tacitus between his race and ours as a type of their radical divergence? "They do not reckon by days, as we do, but by nights, for they consider that night leads on the day." The sense of mystery, of awe, of all that is awakened and typified in that nightly plunge of our planet into the shadow which reveals a heaven strewn with glittering worlds, where daylight shows a mere background for vagrant clouds — this we believe is the element that is wanting to the most characteristic thought of Rome (we are not, it must be remembered, including the literature from which Rome borrowed), and is predominant in the most characteristic thought of the Gothic world. Its expression, in the architecture which bears that name, is an unquestionable utterance of the spirit we would here indicate — the round and the pointed arch, side by side, expressing severally the feeling that returns to earth, and aspires to heaven — the contrasted genius of the people whose most characteristic remains are to be found in the road, the aqueduct, and the triumphal arch, and in the castle and the abbey. And the genius of one to whom hoary castle and ruined abbey were the most appropriate material, and who has set them against the imperishable background of blended poetic and historic feeling, is colored throughout by that sense of mystery which nowhere emerges into prominence in his writing. Scott's genius was rooted in a firm belief in the invisible — not a very deep belief perhaps, but one that came very near some of his thoughts, and insensibly affects them all. He was above all a Scotchman, and Scotland is not more the "land of the mountain and the flood" than she is of stern faith and intense belief in a whole unseen universe. We cannot say that either of these things is manifested in the writings of this best-known of Scotchmen; the faith is conventional — the belief in the world of thought is concealed by the luxuriant overgrowth of a rich and vivid interest in the world of sense. But they know little of the nature of faith who deem that its indirect influence is worthless. As well might you suppose that before sunrise or after sunset the sky would show no purple or golden hues, no hope or memory of the hidden orb. The dimness of a passing cloud, that seems rather to efface the shadows than the lights on the landscape, is not more distinct from the blackness of a cloudy midnight than unconscious faith from disbelief in the invisible. The God of our fathers grants his faithful servants the inestimable privilege of bequeathing the influence apart from the possession of their faith, and the children of those who have died for the right to worship him, though they ignore and deny him, yet remain in a sense his witnesses. Scott had not much definite faith of any kind. His picture of the Scotch Covenanters has been censured for irreverence, quite unjustly in our opinion; and we regard his picture of the torture and death of one of them as his finest contribution to the history of his country. Still he had but little sympathy with the religious fervor which marks that history, on whichever side it was displayed, and in his horror of "enthusiasm" he is a true son of the eighteenth century. Nevertheless, the genius of Scott could have grown only out of the soil of a rich and deep faith. The feudalism he loved was at once softened and animated by its loyalty to the Church, which enlisted all the sympathy of his taste as much as it alienated the sympathy of his reason; and that loyalty to a fallen house, which will ever be associated with his pictures of the last struggles for its restoration, borrows a softer lustre from the rays of that earlier feeling, sunk below the horizon, and never again probably to shine upon the path of history. It is a strange thing that the emotions painted by Scott should find their most poetic expression in a few lines from the pen of the most prosaic of historians, and one whose great work was an enthusiastically Whiggish picture of the fall of that house for which Scott cherished so gracious a sympathy. Macaulay's epitaph on a Jacobite, however, seems to us to express so exactly the tone of Scott's Jacobitism, that in spite of the oddness of illustrating the Jacobitism of a Tory poet by the verses of an eminently Whiggish and eminently prosaic historian,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

we give the lines here. The epitaph, which is supposed to be inscribed on an Italian tomb, seems to us the most, and, with the exception of the verses on his own infancy, the only poetic utterance that ever proceeded from the pen of Lord Macaulay; and the fact that they are a merely dramatic expression — that his whole sympathies were enlisted on that side in combating which his Jacobite gave "lands, honor, wealth away" — makes them all the more a representative of the spirit of "Waverley" and "The Bride of Lammermoor."

For my true king I offered without stain
Courage and faith — vain faith and courage vain;
For him I gave lands, honors, wealth away,
And one sweet hope that was more prized than they;
For him I languished in a foreign clime,
Grey-haired with sorrow in my manhood's prime;
Heard in Laverno Scargill's whispering breeze,
And pined by Arno for my lovelier Tees;
Beheld each night my home in fevered sleep,
Each morning started from the dream to weep;
Till God, who tried me sore — too sorely — gave
The resting-place I craved, an early grave.
Oh thou whom chance leads to this nameless stone,
By that dear country which was once my own,
By those white cliffs I never more must see,
By that proud language which I spoke like thee,
Forget all feuds, and shed one English tear,
On English dust — a broken heart lies here!

It must be noted that the divergence of feeling and reason, which we have quoted these verses to exhibit, is eminently characteristic of Scott's sympathy with the past. He once gave this as his reason against undertaking a history of Queen Mary, — and it is a very valid reason against undertaking the history of any period, — that judgment and sympathy are on different sides, but we think it an advantage for a dramatic view of the past. A Fergus Mac Ivor, endowed with Scott's genius, could not have given forth an equally vivid and brilliant picture of the struggle in which he was ready to fight and die. We do not say that such a picture would not have a very vivid interest — it would form the most valuable material alike for the historian or the dramatic writer. But it would not be a work of art.

It is the balance of genius and good sense — the harmony of a cool shrewdness of intellect and a glowing fervor of imagination, which gives Scott's picture of the death of feudalism its peculiar mellowness and force. In speaking of the death of feudalism we include, indeed we specially have in mind, the fall of the Stuarts. It would be a very narrow and superficial survey of history which should confine the limits of the phase of society which, for want of a better name, we sum up in that word, within those ages which bear its name. The Middle Ages are the feudal ages, but we are yet living in the late twilight of feudalism. Those only can refuse to recognize the influence of its fading light whose eyes, turned from the west to the east, like the watchers in a northern summer, discern the approach of a new day. The evening of every age in history is, indeed, like that of which our poet wrote in the graceful verses which he sent to the Duke of Buccleuch from his voyage in the Hebrides, that Morning weaves

Her chaplet with the hues that Twilight leaves.

The east is radiant before the west is dark, and those who watch the growing light will generally be blind to any other. Nevertheless, we suppose it would be generally granted that in England the feudal past is still a mighty influence which no one could ignore without a complete misunderstanding of even the political life of our country. It is waning fast, no doubt; it may be that to our children it will have become an influence to be thrown out of account. But it fades slowly, and its twilight is yet clear around us. The fall of the Stuarts marks a great era in its decay. It ends the stage of unreasoning loyalty; from henceforth the throne is no indefeasible inheritance, but a position imposing duties as well as conferring rights; and the terrible emphasis with which France repeats the lesson has deafened us to its first utterance in our own country. It is the interval between the English and French Revolution which appears to us to exhibit best the outline of Scott's historic sympathy, against the background of his judgment. With the French Revolution he had no sympathy whatever. With the English Revolution he had a partial sympathy; he was compelled to approve it by the dictates of his excellent sense. But the element of taste and feeling, predominant in the second act of the great drama, was latent thus early, and from the first his dramatic sympathies array themselves on the side which judgment condemns. Thus the double feeling supplies the place of impartiality, and art has the mellowing atmosphere it needs.

In the foregoing attempt to set forth Scott's position as a representative of his-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

toric life and feeling, we have already indicated the most marked traits of his genius. But it remains to make some more direct attempt in this direction, an attempt, however, which we gladly find almost superseded by the little volume which has suggested the present attempt. Mr. Hutton's appreciation of Scott as a poet seems to us full of subtle insight and balanced judgment, and an elaborate criticism on our own part would to a considerable extent repeat his, which is especially welcome to us, we must repeat, as a protest against the injustice of one whose very injustice we note with reverence. Mr. Carlyle, in the article to which we have made frequent reference, imputes to the writings of Scott an intellectual poverty which, from his point of view, is undeniable. "The sick heart," he says, "will find no healing here; the darkly struggling heart no guidance; the heroic that is in all men no divine awakening voice." We do not think the judgment even quite true; and even where it is true, it is unjust. One who holds the key that lets the weary spirit out of its dungeon of petty cares and gnawing anxieties into a sunny garden, is not devoid of healing influence. Others, no doubt, have taught us more, — others have implanted germs of deeper conviction, of finer speculation, of a far more pregnant and powerful range of thought. But in certain moments we feel as if even these things could not make up to us for that sense of transplantation to another soil,— for the tear that starts at sorrows not our own, and yet grants our own the wonderful relief of a half-transmuted expression, and makes us question whether the relief lies in what that rush of emotion helps us to remember or to forget: —

Πατροκλον προφασιν, σφων δ' αὐτων κηδε ἑκαστη.

And if the perplexed spirit finds no counsel in Scott's healthy and simple pages, how many a one has gone back to the perplexities of life with a fresher eye, because that rapid, simple, vivid narrative has woven a temporary curtain between those problems and the eyes that are weary of poring over them? The troubles of this life, after an hour with Scott, are what they were. The riddle of the painful earth is as far as ever from being solved; we have found no rushlight even to throw its ray upon the gloom. But we have been far away, and everything looks different. And there is no question that if his peculiar gifts are worth less than valuable thought, they are also rarer. That broad objective painting, that clear representation of simple feelings, that rapid movement, that sense of life and stir, which we find everywhere in the best writing of Scott, we find almost nowhere in the literature of our own day.

We would say the same of his pathos. The literature of the day — even the best literature of the day — seems to us greatly wanting in this quality. Its poverty in this respect is closely connected with its wealth in that which we have just quoted. Pathos is inseparable from reserve, it is felt in its highest measure in the presence of a dumb suffering, and the triumph of genius is to paint this dumb suffering in few words, and make the reader feel as he feels in the presence of one who represses tears, to convey a perception of emotions only half clothed in words, or rather of words which are, as Sir Fitzjames Stephen has finely said, "like the signs of prisoners to each other," — faint suggestions beyond which lies a world of secret meaning, intelligible to him who has the key. We suppose this was what Pitt meant when he said that "he should not have conceived it possible that this sort of feeling" — i.e., the description of the last minstrel as, with feeble and uncertain fingers he attempts the lay — "could have been expressed in words." If it were not a disrespectful way of speaking of a great man's utterance, we should say it was about the worst criticism ever made in a very few words on a fine passage; for it implies that "this sort of feeling" might be expressed by either painting or music, and it seems to us that the minstrel's emotions are equally unsuited to both. We give the well-known lines, that the reader may, if he please, side with Pitt against us.

The humble boon was soon obtain'd;
The Aged Minstrel audience gain'd.
But, when he reach'd the room of state,
Where she, with all her ladies, sate,
Perchance he wish'd his boon denied;
For, when to tune his harp he tried,
His trembling hand had lost the ease
Which marks security to please;
And scenes, long past, of joy and pain,
Came wildering o'er his aged brain —
He tried to tune his harp in vain!

. . . . . .

Amid the strings his fingers stray'd
And an uncertain warbling made,
And oft he shook his hoary head,
But when he caught the measure wild,
The old man raised his face, and smiled;
And lighten'd up his faded eye,
With all a poet's ecstasy!
In varying cadence, soft or strong,
He swept the sounding chords along;

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

The present scene, the future lot,
His toils, his wants, were all forgot.
Cold diffidence, and age's frost,
In the full tide of song were lost;
Each blank, in faithless memory void,
The poet's glowing thought supplied;
And, while his harp responsive rung,
'Twas thus the Latest Minstrel sung.

What Pitt meant, probably, that this sort of feeling could not be expressed by his words, is profoundly true. Pathos is so inaccessible to no man as to the orator. How can he who is nothing when he is not emphatic understand the power of him who is nothing when he is emphatic? The same person might as well undertake to beat the drum and touch the harp as to stir the passion of the crowd and rouse the emotions that respond only to some delicate touch that we forget in the rush of feeling that it excites, knowing not if the sudden tear starts from some fountain hidden in the shadows of memory, or is evoked by the simple image set before us. It was some dim perception in the great orator, probably, of a power of words new to him and unattainable by him, that found vent in a remark which, however inappropriate absolutely, is full of interest on his lips, and points out the true aspect of the poet to the man of eloquence. And we recall with satisfaction how the tribute was repaid, how the poet brought his laurel wreath to the freshly closed tomb, and sang, in verse, which though we have admitted its sentiment to be somewhat trite, will yet, we believe, last as long as the fame of the statesman it celebrates; of the new Palinurus, whose dying hand never slackened on the rudder when the storm was highest, and the rocks were just ahead. Neither poet nor orator knew of the tribute each paid to each, but they were kindred souls, and their fame, we believe, will be coæval.

Mr. Hutton's criticism on the passage which moved the admiration of Pitt seems to us so full of truth and beauty that we will allow ourselves to quote it, as a comment on this illustrious admiration: —

> The singular depth of the romantic glow in this passage, and its equally singular simplicity — a simplicity which makes it intelligible to every one — are conspicuous to every reader. It is not what is called classical poetry, for there is no severe outline, no sculptured completeness and repose, no satisfying wholeness of effect to the eye of the mind, no embodiment of a great action. The poet gives us a breath, a ripple of alternating fear and hope in the heart of an old man, and that is all. He catches an emotion that has its roots deep in the past, and that is striving onward towards something in the future; he traces the wistfulness and self-distrust with which age seeks to recover the feelings of youth, the delight with which it greets them when they come, the hesitation and diffidence with which it recalls them as they pass away, and questions the triumph it has just won, and he paints all this without subtlety, without complexity, but with a swiftness such as few poets ever surpassed.

It is the last word which conveys our own feeling of the essential quality of Scott's style. Perhaps the reader will think it a poor thing to say of any poet that he moves more quickly than others. If what is said of pathos be true, he must allow, however, that almost the most characteristic gift of the poet depends on this capacity, or is at least closely connected with it. The pathetic writer must have quitted a point almost as soon as you are aware that he has touched it. It is very dangerous to quote passages for their pathos; like the lesser stars, this quality is apt to become invisible under direct attention — indeed, the sense of being taken unawares is almost an element in it. But the following passage, descriptive of the commonplace perils and hardships in the life of the lowly, seems to us to unite this quality in no common degree with so many others characteristic of Scott's genius, being one of the few, moreover, in which we trace a reminiscence of Burns, that we will venture to insert it: —

When red hath set the beamless sun,
Through heavy vapors dank and dun;
When the tired ploughman, dry and warm,
Hears, half-asleep, the rising storm
Hurling the hail, and sleeted rain,
Against the casement's tinkling pane;
The sounds that drive wild deer and fox
To shelter in the brake and rocks,
Are warnings which the shepherd ask
To dismal and to dangerous task.
Oft he looks forth, and hopes, in vain,
The blast may sink in mellowing rain;
Till, dark above, and white below,
Decided drives the flaky snow,
And forth the hardy swain must go.
Long, with dejected look and whine,
To leave the hearth his dogs repine.
Whistling, and cheering them to aid,
Around his back he wreathes the plaid;
His flock he gathers, and he guides
To open downs, and mountain-sides,
Where, fiercest though the tempest blow,
Least deeply lies the drift below.
The blast, that whistles o'er the fells,
Stiffens his locks to icicles;
Oft he looks back, while, streaming far,
His cottage window seems a star,
Loses its feeble gleam, and then
Turns patient to the blast again,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

And, facing to the tempest's sweep,
Drives through the gloom his lagging sheep;
If fails his heart, if his limbs fail,
Benumbing death is in the gale;
His paths, his landmarks, all unknown,
Close to the hut, no more his own,
Close to the aid he sought in vain,
The morn may find the stiffen'd swain;
His widow sees, at dawning pale,
His orphans raise their feeble wail;
And, close beside him, in the snow,
Poor Yarrow, partner of their woe,
Couches upon his master's breast,
And licks his cheeks, to break his rest.

We would venture to say of these lines that if any one finds them uninteresting he need never read a line of Scott's poetry again. The interest of Scott's narrative (wanting here, it is true) is hardly large enough to rouse any one who finds no merit in the broad, simple, vigorous painting of this passage — the sense of the characteristic aspects of nature given with a word, the sympathy with what is common, the firm touch as with a rapid sweep of his brush he paints the winter sunset, the cottage whence the shepherd is summoned forth by the pitiless storm, the storm itself, the cottage window gradually hid by it, and then the lonely death at that very cottage door, and the dumb companion's vain efforts to wake his master from the last sleep. Think how many words a poet of our day might use in painting a snow-storm, and note how our poet, in describing it as "dark above, and white below," gives with two mere touches of color the characteristic which everybody recognizes as specially belonging to falling snow, but which only a poet could have thus at once caught and said this and no more. It is the painter's eye, turned to subjects unsuitable for the painter's art. But the picturesque power is the least interest in this passage to our mind. We hardly know a greater debt of gratitude to the masters of song than that incurred by those who are made to feel, from the poet's point of view, the dim, voiceless sorrows in which there is nothing poetic. The sorrows, not of warrior or bard, of fair lady or gentle knight, but of rude clodhoppers hardly more intelligent than the four-footed companions who share their cares and perils, — the hardships of the life that is associated in the minds of the genteel world with Dresden china figures and Arcadian inanities, — these things brought home to the mind in simple homely verse like that we have quoted, cannot, we think, so far as they influence the reader at all, fail to make him better. He feels for the moment that hardship and peril, rare visitors at his door, are the inmates of the poor man's house. He realizes, not oppressively but through the mellowing aspect of poetry that the majority of the world are born to struggle and privation; and if when the impression passes from the mind it leaves no trace upon the heart, then the reader must be one whose heart is unfitted to respond to the sorrows of those obscure lives which constitute the most important division of humanity.

The feeling is the more striking in Scott because it is essentially opposed to the spirit of chivalry with which he had so vivid a sympathy. The absence of all trace of pity for the worst sufferers from the wars which occupy the page of Froissart has been noted as a striking characteristic of his time, for there is no need to suppose any special hardness in the chronicler to account for it. The spirit of chivalry, on its harsher side, was never more adequately condemned than by Scott, in the very romance which has made the manners of chivalry familiar to us. "What is it, valiant knight" (i.e., the glory of chivalry), asks the heroic Jewess of Ivanhoe, — "what is it save an offering of sacrifice to a demon of vainglory, and a passing through the fire to Moloch? What remains to you as the prize of all the blood you have spilled — of all the travail and pain you have endured — of all the tears which your deeds have caused, when death hath broken the strong man's spear, and overtaken the speed of his war-horse?"

"What remains?" cried Ivanhoe: "glory, maiden, glory! which gilds our sepulchre and embalms our name."

"Glory?" continued Rebecca: "alas! is the rusted mail which hangs as a hatchment over the champion's dim and mouldering tomb — is the defaced sculpture of the inscription which the ignorant monk can hardly read to the inquiring pilgrim — are these sufficient rewards for the sacrifice of every kindly affection, for a life spent miserably that ye may make others miserable? Or is there such virtue in the rude rhymes of a wandering bard, that domestic love, kindly affection, peace and happiness, are so wildly bartered, to become the hero of those ballads which vagabond minstrels sing to drunken churls over their evening ale?"

The whole character of Rebecca seems to us an illustration of what we have said of the current of his sympathies towards the weak and the oppressed. Doubtless, a large part of his nature sided with the paltry hero at whose unfeeling behest Rebecca exposes herself to the shafts of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

an invading band at the window of the chamber where Ivanhoe lies wounded. But the insight into the cruelty and hardness of the social order he paints so brilliantly seems to us to indicate a wonderful width and range of sympathy. This is what we mean by his setting the chivalric ideal on a modern background. When Shakespeare paints a Jew, he borrows the spirit of his persecutors, and his Jewess is held up to admiration for robbing her father and deserting his faith. Scott lets the Jewess shine forth in spotless purity against her Christian persecutors, and gives, in his finest female creation,* a voice to a race downtrodden for ages. A far deeper poet than Scott has, in his song of the rabbi Ben-Ezra, given the Jew an utterance which seems to us the translation into the deeper genius of a rich and pregnant thinker of the feeling expressed in Rebecca's demeanor in the lists of Templestowe; and we close the allusion to her with the lines, —

Thou — if thou wast He — who at midwatch came
By the starlight naming a dubious name!
Thou art the judge. We are bruisèd thus —
But the judgment over, join sides with us!
We withstood Christ then, be mindful how
At least we withstand Barabbas now!
Was our outrage sore? but the worst we spared,
To have called these Christians had we dared?
Let defiance to them pay mistrust of thee,
And Rome make amends for Calvary!

Scott's sympathy with what is common constitutes at once a striking characteristic of his genius and the most lovable element in his character. "Vulgar, my dear," he once remonstrated with his daughter Anne, who had applied the epithet to something which did not deserve it, "do you know the meaning of vulgar? It means only common, and when you have lived to my years you will thank God that nothing worth caring most for is uncommon." The remark is one of the very few which remain as an adequate expression of the man. It came from the core of his hearty, simple, genial nature; it expressed that width of unfastidious sympathy which, while it leaves its stamp on every work of his genius, is even more felt in the records which put the reader, as much as mere records can do, in contact with himself. Width of sympathy is, in fact, in the moral world what dramatic power is in the intellectual. Scott's range is not, like Shakespeare's, impartial. It has certain lacunæ; it has also certain definite preferences. He cannot paint those of his own class effectively; he must look up, or look down, to be at his best; and though, even on the level of commonplace genteel life, it appears to us that his pictures are redeemed from mediocrity by occasional reflections of his own magnanimous character, still no doubt it is in the extremes of social life that he is at his best. What we would now dwell upon is, that of these extremes the most effective is the lowest. The Scotch peasant owes his literary existence to Scott's portrait. We must allow that it is the Scotch peasant under a certain rather artificial aspect — it is the feudal attitude of the poor which strongly interests him. What Caleb Balderstone would be, apart from his paltry master, we do not gain much help from his creator to imagine. But to speak of this as a limitation of Scott's sympathies is simply to say that he should not have allowed them to be captivated by a feudal ideal. It would be almost as unfair to say that Shakespeare shows a narrowness of sympathy because, while he has painted many men in other attitudes than in relation to women, he has never painted any woman except in relation to a man. The relation of contrast will always, we believe, remain the most poetic and the most picturesque in which any character can be represented. And perhaps, when the peculiar sense of bond between the lowly born and the highly born, which Scott delighted to paint, has faded into remoteness, it will be more distinctly seen than it is now that some excellences can only be thus developed. We do not, indeed, allow that Scott has no power of drawing peasant life except in this attitude: the picture of Jeanie Deans is enough to save his advocate from such a concession; but though a most striking exception, we should still call this noble picture, regarded from this point, an exception to the ordinary course of his dramatic sympathy. He is in this respect the complement of Wordsworth, and we own that, while Scott's ideal is no doubt the much less original conception of peasant life, we do not find it the least interesting of the two.

His pictures of royalty, on the other hand, seem to us to bear in a peculiar manner the stamp of his swift, simple, outward genius. There is no elaborate pomp of description, yet the reader is always made to confront in imagination some stately and dignified presence; we feel that something in Scott's nature readily

* It must be remembered that Jeanie Deans is hardly a creation.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

vibrated to the summons that demanded the respect of a subject, yet retaining his manliness and balance at the same time. No doubt he had in this respect eminently the défaut de sa qualité. His attitude towards George IV. is not the most pleasing part of his career, and we are glad to think of that tumbler in his coat pocket, honored by having touched the lips of that illustrious monarch, which his loyal subject begged, pocketed, forgot, and sat down upon, startling the poet Crabbe by his sudden rebound from his uneasy seat. We should gladly have hung up what remained of the fragile treasure by the side of Murray of Broughton's saucer, — the cup belonging to which was destroyed in a nobler manner by Scott's father, when it had through Mrs. Scott's officiousness conveyed a cup of tea to the renegade, — as a vestige of two different kinds of loyalty. And well would the broken glass, at all events, have symbolized the brittle nature of all that was associated with Scott's intercourse with George IV. But we have said enough of his weaknesses.

No creation of his art interests us quite so much as the revelations of himself with which that art supplies us. Even his description of nature — the most valuable part of his poetry, and that in which he is eminently a representative of the movement we have connected with his name — seems to us most interesting when it blends itself with what Mr. Ruskin so happily calls his "far away Æolian note," — a touch of sentiment always simple, sometimes what might be called commonplace, but commonplace only because the feelings represented are so common, not because the allusion is borrowed. The feeling is always slight and expressed as shortly as possible, yet it appears to us to set his bright objective pictures on a wonderfully effective background of pensive coloring, while it often contains what seems the reflection of his own conscience on his genius. As for instance: —

> It seemed some mountain rent and riven,
> A channel for the stream had given,
> So high the cliffs of limestone grey
> Hung beetling o'er the torrent's way,
> Yielding along their rugged base,
> A flinty footpath's niggard space,
> Where he, who winds 'twixt rock and wave,
> May hear the headlong torrent rave, . . .
> Till foam-globes on her eddies ride,
> Thick as the schemes of human pride
> That down life's current drive amain,
> As frail, as frothy, and as vain!

This sense of the fugitiveness of all things earthly is impressed with a peculiar vividness on all Scott's poetry. It is difficult to find anything in the circumstances of his life, at the time his poetry was written, to explain this sense of insecurity and change; at least it is only in a single case that we can trace any actual cause for it; and though this one deep and enduring feeling seems to us to have been not sufficiently allowed for in any review of his life, yet a healthy nature does not allow any single feeling, however deep and strong, to color its whole being. Scott's early love was not, however, obliterated by any adequate domestic companionship, and some pathetic verses * (pathetic at least in their circumstances), in the feeble handwriting of his last years, but not his own composition, and known to have been much admired by this young lady, remained after his death associated with her initials, to witness to the undying love which seems to have been the source of a wonderfully enduring pain, but perhaps also of that deeper tone never wanting to his poetry, and giving it, to our mind, its special charm. It often happens, we believe, that a nature of much sensibility associates with some painful memory many feelings which are not caused by it, and unawares lets some event become a symbol of temptations and sorrows with which it has no direct connection. We could almost fancy that the fair young girl whom he remembered so tenderly in his old age (and to whom his thoughts seem to have recurred after his wife's death almost with a sense of freedom) symbolized for him higher, purer aims, and that he regretted in her some ideal to which his whole life had been faithless. It is in the poem where he attempted to paint her † that we also find many of the lines which seem dictated by the spirit of self-reproach. We could fancy that the spirit of warning and guidance which most of us can trace in some form or other, in looking back at our lives, sometimes threw the shadow of his own temptations on the canvas that glowed with his creative power. It might have been his guardian angel who bid him write,

> O teach him, while your lessons last,
> To judge the present by the past;
> Remind him of each wish pursued,
> How rich it glow'd with promised good;

* They were addressed "To Time," and believed to have been the composition of the object of his affection. They are a specimen of the slight conventional style of eighty years ago, and, though not actually written by the person to whom they were attributed, are an evidence of a certain power, both of mind and character, in their possible author.

† We suppose that she must have been the lady "long since dead" whom he described as the original of the colorless Matilda.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Remind him of each wish enjoy'd,
How soon his hopes possession cloy'd!
Tell him we play unequal game
Whene'er we shoot by Fancy's aim!
And, ere he strip him for her race,
Show the conditions of the chase.
Two sisters by the goal are set,
Cold Disappointment and Regret;
One disenchants the winner's eyes,
And strips of all its worth the prize.
While one augments its gaudy show
More to enhance the loser's woe.
The victor sees his fairy gold
Transform'd, when won, to drossy mould,
But still the vanquish'd mourns his loss,
And rues, as gold, that glittering dross.

Trite moralizing, the reader may decide, whose palate, accustomed to the highly seasoned speculation of our own day, finds insipidity in what is simple. To such a mood the grandest thoughts of antiquity would appear trite if they were not veiled in a learned language, and hallowed by the respectful attention of ages. This first of the Romanticists (first at least in fame) may take his place by the side of many a classic writer for the purity and simplicity of the thought which seems poor at first, and enriches itself with the growing experience of life, so that it expands to take in a part of all that we most vividly remember and hope.

That note of dissatisfaction is what we most gladly remember, as we bid him farewell. Whatever in his career was worldly and disappointing, he did not sink so low as to be satisfied with it. He felt the emptiness and poverty of the things he grasped at. Such at least was the utterance of his truest self — such we will also believe (though from a proud, reserved nature there could hardly be evidence of it) was the conviction that lay deeper even than the sense of their loss, and blended with the sense of things eternal that showed clearer as his brittle follies were swept away. JULIA WEDGWOOD.

From Macmillan's Magazine.

"THROUGH THE DARK CONTINENT" IN 1720.

A FEW years ago, a literary man of some eminence, since prematurely gone from us, came to a publisher in a state of great excitement. "I have just picked up the most wonderful thing at a bookstall," he said. "Did you ever hear of an African explorer of the name of Singleton? Can you tell me anything about this book of his? It contains the most extraordinary anticipations of the discoveries of Speke, Burton, and Livingstone in central Africa. Here is a man — Captain Singleton, the name is, there is no date on the book — who professes to have travelled across Africa from Zanzibar to the Gold Coast, and who tells you what he and his party saw on each day's march, what wild beasts they met, how they were treated by the natives, where they halted, and how far they walked at a stretch. They had nothing but a chart and a pocket compass, and yet they crossed the whole continent. But the extraordinary part of it is that he came across the sources of the Nile, and saw it flowing from a lake exactly as Speke describes. This man really ought to get the credit of the discovery. He must have been there, for he gives the particulars of each day's march in the most minute way, and besides, you see, he has been confirmed. I can't understand how I never heard of him before. I don't think his name has turned up in any of these discussions at the Geographical Society. Can you tell me anything about him? When did he live?" "Captain Singleton! Captain Singleton!" said the publisher; "that is surely the name of the hero of one of Defoe's stories;" and turning to the list of Defoe's works, he found that his memory had not deceived him.

"The Adventures of Captain Singleton," and his account of the customs and manners of central Africa, are the creation of the author of "Robinson Crusoe;" but this pushes the surprise at his anticipations of recent discovery only a step farther back. I must admit for my own part, that till I thought of following the captain's itinerary on a modern map, I had supposed, from his general appearance of accuracy, that our ancestors had information about central Africa which had somehow been allowed to drop out of knowledge. It is always the case, in supposed anticipations of modern discoveries, that the bygone investigator or speculator has hit upon the most startling feature, the most blazing promontory, in an unexplored country, or unobserved fact, or unthought-of contrivance. He has announced, in short, by some happy intuition, all that the mass of us ever come to know, and we are consequently ready to give him as much credit as the patient discoverer or inventor who has brought certitude or practical value to his random guesses. Captain Singleton appeared to be a worthy predecessor and anticipator of Livingstone and Speke, because, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, he narrated how in the interior of

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Africa, which the map-makers of the time represented as an unexplored blank, he had seen vast lakes, and a river issuing from one of them which he believed to be the Nile. The one fact in the discoveries of African travellers before Stanley that had laid hold of popular interest was that the Nile had its source in a huge lake, and not, as had previously been the common belief, in the Mountains of the Moon. Captain Singleton was apparently aware of this, and therefore it seemed that his merits as an explorer had been unfairly allowed to die out of the memories of men.

If Captain Singleton is to be judged by leading facts, there is yet another leaf to be added to his laurels. The most striking fact among the results of Mr. Stanley's last journey, is that the river Congo, in the most northerly part of its course, stretches above the equator. I must confess that I was fairly overwhelmed by the greatness of the imaginary hero, and disposed to yield the most enthusiastic belief to Defoe's boast that he "had the world at his finger ends," when I came across a passage which seemed to anticipate even this last triumph of discovery. There can be little doubt that whatever was the source of Defoe's information, it was one of his notions of central African geography that the Congo ran north of the equinoctial line. In their progress across Africa, Captain Singleton's party were diverted from their straight course from east to west by a vast lake, which "held them till they passed the equinoctial line," and when they were rounding this obstruction, and deliberating how to shape their journey for the western coast, their chief geographical authority, after consulting his charts, "advised them that as soon as they had passed this lake they should proceed W. S.W., that is to say, a little inclining to the south, and that in time they would meet with the great river Congo." Nothing could be more explicit. Is it possible that Defoe, with his genius for seizing the most reliable sources of information, had somehow obtained knowledge of the exact lie of the central African lakes and the great river, as they have been explored by recent enterprise?

A close tracing of the course that Captain Singleton followed across Africa dissipates the idea that Defoe might have had access to the notes of some real seventeenth century traveller. One's first impression is, on finding how truly Defoe conforms to the main lines of central African geography, that he had obtained possession of the itinerary of some early Portuguese traveller. The Portuguese had trading settlements on both coasts of Africa, and it is conceivable that enterprising merchants might have made the journey overland from one coast to the other. Defoe knew Portuguese, and was keenly interested in every kind of human enterprise; and there seemed nothing violently improbable in the supposition that he had procured, from some Portuguese adventurer, notes of an actual journey, and made them the basis of the adventures of the fictitious Captain Singleton. But intrinsically probable though this supposition may be, it is not borne out by a minute comparison of Singleton's itinerary with what we know of central Africa from more recent and more accurate travellers. Defoe set forth with inimitable vividness the best knowledge of his time, but it falls considerably short of modern knowledge in point of minute accuracy.

It is impossible, of course, to reproduce in a brief summary the wonderful charm of Defoe's circumstantial narrative. The adventures of Captain Singleton have an imperishable interest apart from their geographical truth. Still, it is worth while to extract the geographical teaching from the other details of the story, merely as an example of the knowledge possessed at the beginning of the seventeenth century by a man of genius who had made it his pride to know all that could be known in his time concerning the surface of the globe. There is a sort of notion abroad that there was a backsliding among the geographers of the seventeenth century from the knowledge gathered by their predecessors of the previous century, and no better test of the truth of this notion can be desired than to examine what we are told concerning central Africa by a man who stood between the two centuries, and was much readier to believe that he knew everything, than to admit that he knew nothing. Defoe has often been quoted as a first-hand authority in matters of history. No reader of his "Journal of the Plague," or his "Memoirs of a Cavalier," who had not been expressly put on his guard, would be likely to suppose that he was not in contact with a contemporary annalist. Part of the secret of this wonderful verisimilitude is that the great story-teller was at pains to master the leading historical facts, and to weave his imaginary incidents upon them as a framework. It is obvious that he had recourse to the same device for giving an air of truth to the adventures of his fictitious traveller "across the dark continent," and that he carefully studied and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

closely followed the best geographical authorities, supposing, that is to say, that those authorities who knew nothing for certain and therefore professed to know nothing at all, were not the best.

We may be sure that it was not scientific curiosity that took Captain Singleton across the dark continent. He was a steward's boy on board a Portuguese ship, and had been concerned in a mutiny. The mutineers had been left by the captain on a barbarous island on the coast of Madagascar, to die of hunger, or be killed by the natives, or make their way back to civilization as they might. In spite of his youth, Singleton's daring and resource soon gave him authority among his companions. He became their leading adviser when they began to concoct means of escape. His advice was that they should seize the small boats of the natives, and coast along the island till they came to natives who had bigger boats, and so on till they should be sufficiently equipped to capture some passing ship of considerable size, and sail away to the Red Sea to ply the trade of piracy. This admirable plan miscarried from the want of a proper gradation of boats, but the deserted mutineers, after making some progress by various ingenious contrivances, had the good fortune at last to encounter the wreck of a Dutch ship, out of which they built a small frigate, and so made their escape to the mainland. Arrived at the mainland, however, they were hardly in less miserable case than before, for if they sailed for the Red Sea in their little vessel, they were certain to be taken by the Arabs and sold for slaves to the Turks, and the winds were too variable, and the sea too tempestuous, to give them a chance of reaching the Cape of Good Hope. They took, therefore, the chronicle says, "one of the rashest, and wildest, and most desperate resolutions that ever was taken by man, or any number of men in the world; this was, to travel overland through the heart of the country, from the coast of Mozambique, on the East Ocean, to the coast of Angola or Guinea, on the Western or Atlantic Ocean, a continent of land of at least eighteen hundred miles; in which journey they had excessive heats to support, impassable deserts to go over; no carriages, camels, or beasts of any kind to carry their baggage, innumerable numbers of wild and ravenous beasts to encounter with, such as lions, leopards, tigers, lizards, and elephants; they had the equinoctional line to pass under, and consequently were in the very centre of the torrid zone; they had nations of savages to encounter with, barbarous and brutish to the last degree; hunger and thirst to struggle with; and, in one word, terrors enough to have daunted the stoutest hearts that ever were placed in cases of flesh and blood."

Singleton by no means approved of this resolution of his Portuguese comrades. He had the bulldog courage of an English buccaneer, and his view was that they should "get into the Arabian Gulf or the mouth of the Red Sea, and waiting for some vessel passing or repassing there, of which there is plenty, seize upon the first they came at by force, and not only enrich themselves with her cargo, but carry themselves to what part of the world they pleased." Finding, however, that his companions had not spirit for this enterprise, but were bent upon making their way overland, he convinced them of the necessity of seizing sixty natives to carry their baggage. From one of these natives Singleton — having given such proofs of natural capacity to command that he was unanimously appointed captain of the expedition — learnt that there was "a great river a little further to the north, which was able to carry their bark many leagues into the country due west," and resolved to take advantage of this waterway for his journey. An observation taken by the gunner, who was the geographer of the company, and was provided with charts and a pocket compass, showed the adventurers that they were in 12° 35′ south of the line. With regard to the position of the river, Captain Singleton says that he "takes this to be the great river marked by our chart-makers at the northmost part of the coast of Mozambique, and called there Quilloa."

Defoe gives a minute description, after his circumstantial manner, of this river: —

> All the country on the bank of the river was a high land, no marshy, swampy ground in it; the verdure good, and abundance of cattle feeding upon it wherever we went, or which way soever we looked; there was not much wood, indeed, at least not near us; but further up we saw oak, cedar, and pine trees, some of which were very large.
>
> The river was a fair open channel about as broad as the Thames, below Gravesend, and a strong tide of flood, which we found held us about sixty miles, the channel deep; nor did we find any want of water for a great way. In short we went merrily up the river with the flood and the wind blowing still fresh at E. and E. N. E.; we stemmed the ebb easily also, especially while the river continued broad and deep; but when we came past the swelling of the tide, and had the natural current of the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

river to go against, we found it too strong for us, and began to think of quitting our bark; but the prince would by no means agree to that, for finding we had on board pretty good store of roping made of mats and flags, which I described before, he ordered all the prisoners, which were on shore, to come and take hold of those ropes, and tow us along by the shore side; and as we hoisted our sail too, to ease them, the men ran along at a great rate.

In this manner the river carried us up, by our computation, near two hundred miles, and then it narrowed apace, and was not above as broad as the Thames at Windsor, or thereabout; and after another day we came to a great waterfall or cataract, enough to frighten us, for I believe the whole body of water fell at once perpendicularly down a precipice above sixty feet high, which made noise enough to deprive men of their hearing, and we heard it above ten miles before we came to it.

The travellers could not carry their frigate above this waterfall, but built canoes and pursued their course by means of them.

We passed abundance of inhabitants upon this upper part of the river, and with this observation, that almost every ten miles, we came to a several nation, and every several nation had a different speech, or else their speech had differing dialects, so that they did not understand one another. They all abounded in cattle, especially on the riverside; and the eighth day of this second navigation, we met with a little negro town, where they had growing a sort of corn-like rice, which eat very sweet; and as we got some of it of the people, we made very good cakes of bread of it, and making a fire baked them on the ground, after the fire was swept away, very well; so that hitherto we had no want of provision of any kind we could desire.

Our negroes towing our canoes, we travelled at a considerable rate, and by our own account could not go less than twenty or twenty-five English miles a day, and the river continuing to be much at the same breadth, and very deep all the way, till on the tenth day we came to another cataract; for a ridge of high hills crossing the whole channel of the river, the water came tumbling down the rocks from one stage to another in a strange manner; so that it was a continued link of cataracts from one to another, in the manner of a cascade; only that the falls were sometimes a quarter of a mile from one another, and the noise confused and frightful.

They hauled and carried their canoes past these cataracts, but the river did not serve them much farther; after two days it became so shallow that "there was not water enough to swim a London wherry," and they were obliged to set forward wholly by land.

There is probably a good deal of guesswork in the description of this river, though there is an element of truth in Defoe's account of the cataracts. Not only are there cataracts on the east African rivers, but they are like the cataracts that Defoe describes. His lower cataract with its sheer descent might pass for the Victoria Falls of the Zambesi, and the succession of cataracts higher up the river have a resemblance in character to the falls on the river Shire. It may have been some rumor of these waterfalls that he has thus boldly localized; still, while the Rufigi is unexplored, it would be rash to say that Defoe has drawn upon his imagination for the most remarkable features of his great river. If we suppose the river up which Captain Singleton sailed to have been the Rufigi, we must give Defoe credit for another remarkable agreement with modern geography. He relates how Captain Singleton after travelling for thirty days due west reached a vast wilderness of sand, and how after pushing on for ten days through this desert he reached an immense lake. "Happily," Singleton says, "we came to it at the south point of it, for to the north we could see no end of it; so we passed by it, and travelled three days by the side of it." Now on looking at the most recent maps of Africa, we see that a line due west from the mouth of the Rufigi would carry the traveller past the southern shore of Lake Tanganika, so that although Defoe is a few degrees wrong in his latitude he might still get credit for a wonderful amount of correct anticipation. On looking, however, at the maps of the seventeenth century, we do not find that in this particular Defoe was ahead of the common knowledge of his age; his lake was simply the Zafflan of the maps, the southern extremity of which was in the same latitude with the river marked Quilloa.

We may admit indeed that the geographers of the seventeenth century had an inkling of the correct position of the southern part of Lake Tanganika. The Portuguese had penetrated as far as that. It is after he has carried Captain Singleton past this point that Defoe's geography becomes indisputably wild and fabulous. His travellers rest for five days by the lake, after their fatigues in the desert. There are no human beings to annoy them — Defoe makes them traverse a thousand miles of the interior without meeting with any creatures of their own kind — but they have several adventures with wild animals, elephants, lions, tigers, and wolves, who compel them to stand on their de-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

fence. Setting forward from the lake to get rid of this disagreeable company, and still keeping their course due west, they find the desert continue, though it is not so arid as before, but watered by small streamlets; they push on through the desert for sixteen days, till the ground begins almost insensibly to rise, and at the end of three days more they reach the summit of a very high ridge of hills, from which they see stretching before them a country clothed with green, and a large river. It was a month since they had had a tree to shelter them from the sun, and the shade of the woods was "the most refreshing thing imaginable to them." The gunner, who kept their computations, told them that they had now come about eleven hundred miles of their journey, and "pulling out his map," assured them that the river which they saw was "either the river Nile or ran into the great lake out of which the river Nile was said to take its beginning." They debated whether it would not be well, if that were the Nile, to build canoes and float down it to Egypt rather than expose themselves to any more deserts and scorching sands, but the gunner dissuaded them by good and sufficient reasons from this way of reaching the sea. While they were loitering by the river before resuming their march, one of the party picked up a piece of gold, and they spent some days searching for gold with great success. The rainy season coming on, they encamped for four months by the Golden River. With commendable care not to set the covetous upon a vain chase, Captain Singleton mentions that they cleared the spot of gold, and that it seemed to be only a casual deposit.

From the Golden River Captain Singleton and his party set forward again due west, and marched ten days through a pleasant country, "easy to travel in as well as to supply us with provisions, though still without inhabitants," at the rate of twenty or twenty-five miles a day, stopping only one day "to make a raft to carry us over a small river which having been swelled with the rains was not yet quite down." We must quote Defoe's realistic account of the surprise with which they were then confronted: —

> When we were past this river, which by the way ran to the northward too, we found a great row of hills in our way; we saw indeed the country open to the right at a great distance; but as we kept true to our course due west, we were not willing to go a great way out of our way, only to shun a few hills, so we advanced; but we were surprised, when, being not quite come to the top, one of our company, who, with two negroes, was got up before us, cried out, the sea! the sea! and fell a dancing and jumping, as signs of joy.
>
> The gunner and I were most surprised at it, because we had but that morning been calculating that we were then above a thousand miles from the seaside, and that we could not expect to reach it till another rainy season would be upon us; so that, when our man cried out, the sea, the gunner was angry and said he was mad.
>
> But we were both in the greatest surprise imaginable, when, coming to the top of the hill, and, though it was very high, we saw nothing but water, either before us, or to the right hand or the left, being a vast sea, without any bound but the horizon.
>
> We went down the hill full of confusion of thought, not being able to conceive whereabouts we were, or what it must be, seeing by all our charts the sea was yet a vast way off.

They are fairly puzzled, but they resolve to hold to the north. They travel along the shore of this sea full twenty-three days, till they descry land on the further side of the water, due west; after travelling eight days more, they find that the lake or sea ends in "a very great river, which runs N. or N. by E." The gunner again pulls out his maps, and declares his belief that he had been mistaken before, and that this is the river Nile. With some trouble they waft themselves and their cattle across the river, and discover a most inhospitable country, full of strange wild creatures, distinguished among which was "an ugly, venomous, deformed kind of snake or serpent," so hideous and noisy that "our men would not be persuaded but it was the devil, only that we did not know what business Satan could have there where there were no people." "It was very remarkable," Captain Singleton reflects, "that we had now travelled a thousand miles without meeting with any people, in the heart of the whole continent of Africa, where, to be sure, never man set his foot since the sons of Noah spread themselves over the face of the whole earth."

A few days after they cross the river, our travellers see some signs of inhabitants. These prove to be "all negroes, and stark naked," but "a very frank, civil, and friendly sort of people," who give Captain Singleton directions for his journey, and show him that he must no longer go due west, but turn northwards, because there is another lake in the way. In two days more they sight this lake, and it "holds them till they pass the equinoctial line."

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

If one reads Captain Singleton's travels hurriedly, without attending to the precise notes of his position at various stages, it might easily appear that Defoe had somehow obtained a more correct idea of the lie of the central lakes than the map-makers of his time. Here we have described a vast lake out of which the Nile issues, and near it another great lake stretching north of the equator. Further, his learned gunner is of opinion that when they have rounded this second lake, they should bend a little to the south, and in time they would strike upon the Congo. One is disposed to jump immediately to the conclusion that Defoe was writing from the information of some early explorer of the Victoria Nyanza and the Albert Nyanza, and some traveller on the Congo who had traced its course north of the equator. Captain Singleton does not reach the Congo; he finds an impassable desert in his way, and holding more directly west, conducts his band at last to the Gold Coast. Still the gunner's geography would have been verified if the desert had not intervened; his charts marked the true course of the Congo, in one great particular at least, as it has been ascertained by Mr. Stanley during his explorations.

The position of Defoe's lakes, however, is seen to be very different from the true position of the Victoria Nyanza and the Albert Nyanza, when we look closely at his definition of them. He makes Captain Singleton travel thirteen hundred miles due west from about 12° S. latitude on the Zanzibar coast, before striking on the great central lake which looked like the sea. It is unnecessary to say that such a course would land the traveller a good thousand miles from the Victoria Nyanza, as marked on the modern map. On the other hand it would bring him as nearly as possible to the Lake Zaire of the seventeenth century map-makers. There is a collection of seventeenth century maps of Africa in the British Museum, which agree, with the slightest possible variations, in the position they give to the central lakes. Dapper's map, reproduced in Mr. Stanley's recent work, is a very good sample of them, and shows their universal conception of the lake system. Defoe's great lake is simply their Lake Zaire. The points in which he differs from them are his second lake lying across the equinoctial line, which I have not seen represented in any map, and the course which he seems to assign to the Congo. On this last point he has been corroborated; but no great equatorial lake has yet been discovered anywhere near the longitude in which he represents it as lying.

Still it is curious that Defoe should have been right about the Congo when the Dutch, English, and French map-makers were wrong. The probability is that he got his information from Portuguese sources — the gunner was a Portuguese sailor, and would naturally have used the maps of his own countrymen — and that the Portuguese had traced the Congo upwards from their settlements near its mouth. We may even suppose that Defoe, who was all his life much in contact with traders, and at one time proposed settling in Cadiz as a merchant, learnt more from the Portuguese than their government would allow publishers to put into their maps. Dr. Livingstone at one time accused the Portuguese government of deliberately misleading the world about the mouths of the Zambesi, and they may easily have had commercial reasons at an earlier date for keeping their knowledge to themselves. The writer of an interesting article in *Nature on the old maps of Africa, points out that the old map-makers, proceeding upon information furnished by Portuguese traders and missionaries, were so far right about the Congo, that they made it issue from a lake in the interior. We may expect to hear by-and-by an account of the exact amount of knowledge concerning central Africa possessed by the early geographers, from the commission which the Lyons Geographical Society has instituted to inquire into the subject. Meantime, judging from what Defoe puts into the mouth of Captain Singleton, we should say that the Portuguese, if they, as seems most likely, were his authorities, knew a good deal about the country for some distance inland from both coasts, but that there was a vast expanse in the interior into which they had never penetrated, or from which they had brought back only the vaguest information.

No exploring records that have yet been brought to light go the least way towards diminishing the credit of recent explorers, Livingtone, Speke, Burton, Baker, and Stanley. The noble courage and patience of these explorers, nothing, of course, can diminish; but they may still retain also unchallenged the glory of priority. Nor do I think that the

* Living Age, No. 1777, p. 56.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

map-makers of the eighteenth century were guilty of a step backwards when they discarded the conjectural tracings of vast lakes which formed the tradition of central African geography in the previous century. I do not know who is responsible for thus making central Africa a geographical blank. The writer in Nature attributes it to Guillaume Delisle; and one finds maps without the lakes which are said to be constructed "selon les nouvelles Observations de Messrs. de l'Académie des Sciences." But at any rate one cannot admit that it was a scientific error thus to make confession of ignorance. The map-makers retained the lakes long after geographers had ceased to profess any knowledge of the country where they were conjecturally placed. Peter Heylin, for example, has the lakes shown in the map accompanying his "Cosmographie," although in the text of the work he makes this frank confession: "Touching these provinces we can say but little, and that little of no great note or certainty; but that they differ for the most part from one another both in speech and behavior; each village under a several king, and each in continual quarrel with its next neighbors, whom, if they overcome, they eat." The sum total of the seventeenth century knowledge about central Africa was that both the Nile and the Congo flowed out of large lakes deep in the interior. The eighteenth century geographers cannot be blamed for ceasing to give pictorial representation to these facts, when they could not fix the true position of the lakes within a thousand miles. The first step towards true knowledge is the rejection of knowledge falsely so conceived; and the exclusion of Lakes Zafflan, Zaire, and Zembre from the maps, was really the first step towards a scientific geography of the unexplored African continent.

W. MINTO.

From Public Opinion.

THE BUZZING OF INSECTS.

THE old naturalists thought generally that the buzzing of insects was produced by the vibrations of the wing, but they had scarcely attempted to analyze this phenomenon, and their opinion was abandoned when Reaumur showed that when the wings are cut a blow-fly continues to buzz. Other explanations of the phenomenon have been advanced by various naturalists, but none of them are satisfactory. M. Jousset de Bellesme has been making some investigations on the subject, and, after proving that previous theories are unsatisfactory, he describes the results of his own researches. To avoid confusion, it should be distinctly understood what is meant by buzzing. In the scientific acceptation it means to imitate the sound of the humblebee, which is the type of buzzing insects. But the humblebee gives out two very different sounds, which are an octave of each other — a grave sound when it flies and a sharp sound when it alights. We say, then, that buzzing is the faculty of insects to produce two sounds at an octave. This definition limits the phenomenon to the hymenoptera and the diptera. The coleoptera often produce in flying a grave and dull sound, but they are powerless to emit the sharp sound, and consequently do not buzz. There are two or three ascertained facts which will serve as guides in the interpretation of the phenomenon. First, it is indisputable that the grave sound always accompanies the great vibrations of the wings, which serve for the translation of the insect. It is easily seen that this sound commences as soon as the wings begin to move, and that if the wings be cut off it disappears entirely. The sharp sound is never, on the contrary, produced during flight; it is only observed apart from the great vibrations of the wings when the insect alights, or when it is held so as to hinder its movement, and in that case the wing is seen to be animated by a rapid trembling. It is also produced when the wings are entirely taken away. From these two remarks we may draw the conclusion that the grave sound belongs properly to the wings, that it is caused by their movements of great amplitude. There is here no difficulty. As to the sharp sound, it is certainly not produced by the wings, since it survives the absence of these. Yet the wings participate in it and undergo a particular trembling during the production of this sound. To discover the cause it is necessary to go back to the mechanism of the movement of the wing. It is known that among nearly all insects the muscles which serve for flight are not inserted in the wing itself, but in the parts of the thorax which support it, and that it is the movement of these which acts on the wing and makes it vibrate. The form of the thorax changes with each movement of the wing under the influence or the contraction of the thoracic muscles. The muscular masses intended

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

for flight being very powerful, this vibratory movement of the thorax is very intense, as may be proved by holding one of these insects between the fingers. But as the vibrations are repeated two or three hundred times per second, they give rise to a musical sound, which is the sharp note. In fact, the air which surrounds the thorax is set in vibration by that directly, and without the wing taking part in it. There are then two simultaneous sounds, one produced by the vibration of the wings and the other by the thoracic vibration, the latter twice as rapid as the former, and therefore an octave. This is why in flight only a single grave sound is heard. When the thorax moves alone a sharp sound is produced. This, M. de Bellesme believes, is the only explanation that can be given of the mode of production of the two sounds which constitute buzzing.

From The Spectator, "Paris Exhibition."

CAMBODIA.

ANOTHER recollection to carry away and dream of — from the gallery of foreign retrospective art — is that of the sculptures from Cambodia, and more particularly of the fragment of a huge, many-headed serpent, with two figures astride on it, and enclasping it, which formed part of the approaches to one of the gates of a fortress, a model of which restored is to be found in the pavilion of the French Direction of the Fine Arts on the other side of the river. The whole body of the serpent would be, if I recollect aright, one hundred and twenty feet long, and the whole number of figures astride, twenty or twenty-two. A people wholly lost to history has left these evidences behind it that it had an art of its own, as complete in its way as that of Egppt or Assyria; that its architects could uprear edifices of stone of gigantic size; that its sculptors could represent the human and other natural forms in due proportion, and in any size; that its artists had the sense of movement in the highest degree — on a fragment of frieze there is an uprearing short-maned horse which might be Assyrian — that they had the gift of ornament, and could wind their characteristic emblem, the serpent, into the most subtle decorative patterns. We may fancy we trace resemblances with the art of Assyria, of China, or India, but the artistic individuality of this extinct people, whose monuments alone remain in the midst of the forests of Cambodia, is unmistakable. I know of nothing resembling the colossal quaternion of heads into which the fortress gate grows up; no other people that I am aware of has thus treated the human form. Not less remarkable is the conception of the serpent. I have spoken of it as many-headed, but it really has one enormous head, out of which many smaller ones spring. And then the type of the human figures themselves, as they ride the serpent, thick-lipped, low-nosed, broad-nostrilled — yet neither negro nor Mongolian — with a kind of sneering smile of self-satisfied power! There is nothing of the cold and awful serenity of the Egyptian, — nothing of the proud, self-conscious strength of the Assyrian. You seek in vain for any really human quality in these faces. Justice is as far from them as mercy. You cannot even say that they are cruel, for cruelty implies something of impulse, if not of passion. They simply have no sense beyond that of satisfying their own selfishness, and they know that they are able to do so to the full. With such a smile on their faces, one might conceive of the antediluvians listening to the preaching of Noah.

Such races deserve to perish. But one would fain know, instead of having to guess, the riddle of their history. Standing before these wonderful remains — the vigorous battle-scene, the wild dance, the strange architectural conceptions, the ever-recurring serpent, the quaternion of gigantic heads — one feels how dark is the fate of nations which have only an art, and not a literature. Not a trace of anything that looks like writing can be discerned anywhere. And so of this lost race of Cambodia, "their memorial is perished with them."

L.

[There is nothing in the world more wonderful than these remains, of which we hear so little. A French traveller once showed us photographs of some upper stories built by these Cambodians, which in his belief, and he was an expert, no architect could now reproduce. He could not conceive how they were done. — ED. Spectator.]

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXIV. } No. 1795.—November 9, 1878. { From Beginning, Vol. CXXXIX.

CONTENTS.

I. The Sixteenth Century Arraigned before the Nineteenth. A Study on the Reformation. By Rt. Hon. W. E. Gladstone,	Contemporary Review,	323
II. A Doubting Heart. By Miss Keary, author of "Castle Daly," "Oldbury," etc. Part IX.,	Advance Sheets,	343
III. The Troubles of a Scots Traveller,	Blackwood's Magazine,	359
IV. Sir Gibbie. By George MacDonald, author of "Malcolm," "The Marquis of Lossie," etc. Part III.,	Advance Sheets,	371
V. Lighthouses,	Argosy,	377
VI. Bookworms,	Saturday Review,	381

POETRY.

Commissioned,	322	Do We Well to Mourn?,	322
Holyday,	322

Miscellany, 384

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For Eight Dollars, remitted directly to the Publishers, the Living Age will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of The Living Age is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of Littell & Gay.

Single Numbers of The Living Age, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

COMMISSIONED.

"Do their errands; enter into the sacrifice with them; be a link yourself in the divine chain, and feel the joy and life of it."

WHAT can I do for thee, beloved,
Whose feet so little while ago
Trod the same wayside dust with mine,
And now up paths I do not know
Speed, without sound or sign?

What can I do? The perfect life
All fresh and fair and beautiful
Has opened its wide arms to thee;
Thy cup is over-brimmed and full;
Nothing remains for me.

I used to do so many things:
Love thee and chide thee and caress;
Brush little straws from off thy way,
Tempering with my poor tenderness
The heat of thy short day.

Not much, but very sweet to give;
And it is grief of griefs to bear
That all these ministries are o'er,
And thou, so happy, love, elsewhere,
Dost need me never more.

And I can do for thee but this:
(Working on blindly, knowing not
If I may give thee pleasure so;)
Out of my own dull, shadowed lot
I can arise, and go

To sadder lives and darker homes,
A messenger, dear heart, from thee
Who wast on earth a comforter;
And say to those who welcome me,
I am sent forth by her:

Feeling the while how good it is
To do thy errands thus, and think
It may be, in the blue, far space,
Thou watchest from the heaven's brink,
A smile upon thy face.

And when the day's work ends with day,
And star-eyed evening, stealing in,
Waves her cool hand to flying noon,
And restless, surging thoughts begin,
Like sad bells out of tune,

I'll pray, "Dear Lord, to whose great love
Nor bound nor limit-line is set,
Give to my darling, I implore,
Some new, sweet joy, not tasted yet,
For I can give no more."

And, with the words my thoughts shall climb
With following feet the heavenly stair
Up which thy steps so lately sped,
And seeing thee so happy there,
Come back half comforted.

SUSAN COOLIDGE.

Sunday Afternoon for November.

HOLYDAY.

HALF-GREEK adown the Highland glen
And singing to the open sky,
I passed beyond the ways of men
And found my vale in Arcady.

The bees were drowsy on the slope,
The air was wondrous sweet and still,
And all my heart beat high with hope
Of marvels on the Grecian hill.

The light cloak from my shoulders flew,
My bare brown limbs were light and free;
The lark whose rapture thrilled me through
Was but a singing bird to me:

For I was Greek in Hellas' prime
And singing to the clear bright air,
And Grecian bees were in the thyme
And the lost charm in all things fair.

Hills beyond hills from blue to grey
Faint to the misty Highland sky,
But I have been an hour away
In my own vale of Arcady.

From tree to tree the whisper creeps,
"Look, sister, at the wayward man!
His are the eyes of one who sleeps
Within the vale Arcadian."

"Hush, hush!" the pine-tree sighs, "and look,"
The lav'rock peeps from heather sweet,
And headlong streams the Highland brook
To break in laughter at my feet.

Blackwood's Magazine. J. S.

DO WE WELL TO MOURN?

YES, grieve! it can be no offence to Him
Who made us sensitive our loss to know;
The hand that takes the cup filled to the brim
May well with trembling make it overflow.

Who sends us sorrow means it should be felt;
Who gave us tears would surely have them shed;
And metal that the "furnace" doth not melt,
May yet be hardened all the more instead.

Where love abounded will the grief abound?
To check our grief is but to chide our love;
With withered leaves the more bestrewed the ground,
The fuller that the rose hath bloomed above!

Yes, grieve! 'tis nature's — that is, God's — behest,
If what is nature called is will divine:
Who fain would grieve not cannot know how blest
It is to sorrow, and yet not repine.

Spectator. S. H.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The Contemporary Review.

THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY ARRAIGNED BEFORE THE NINETEENTH.

A STUDY ON THE REFORMATION.

Optat supremo collocare Sisyphus
In monte saxum: sed vetant leges Jovis.
HOR. Epod. xvii. 68.

IN the month of October, 1850, was kindled a strong political excitement, which ran through this island in all its districts, and gave birth to the measure, at once defiant and impotent, which, under the name of the Ecclesiastical Titles Act, encumbered the statute-book for a quarter of a century, and then silently closed its unwept existence. Public susceptibility had been quickened at the time by a number of secessions from the Church of England to the Church of Rome, large in relation to the previous rarity of such occurrences, and important from the high character of the seceders, and the talents of many, as well as the fine and subtle genius of one, among them. It happened that I had occasion to travel by post in the centre of France at the period when the stir began. Resting for Sunday at Roanne, I attended the paroisse; and heard an earnest preacher on the triumphs of the Church. His capital point was, that these triumphs were in no way confined to the earlier centuries: they were even now as conspicuous as ever; at the very time when he addressed them the great fortress of heresy was crumbling away, and the people of England were returning in crowds within the one true fold of Christ.

Is the worthy preacher now alive? Has he observed the currents of the religious and the ecclesiastical world? What does he think of his description, and of the prediction which it involved? Is he satisfied with the statistics of conversion? Or does he look deeper than statistics, which can at best speak only for the hour that is? Does he dive into causes, and, estimating moral and mental resource in all its deep diversities, does he still see in the opening future that golden harvest, with the glow of which his vision was then delighted?

As for the statistics, they are obstinately stationary. The fraction of Roman Catholics in the population of this country, as computed from the yearly returns of marriages, has for a generation past been between five and four per cent.; and, out of this small portion, by far the larger part, probably not less than five-sixths, are of Irish birth. The slight variation observable has, on the whole, been rather downwards than upwards. The fraction itself, which approached five per cent. in 1854, now rises little above four. There is, in short, no sign that an impression has been made on the mass of the British nation. This is especially remarkable on two grounds. First, that a new lodgment has really been effected in the body of the aristocracy. Now, high station is in this country a capital element of attractive power. Fully half a score of peers, or heirs apparent to peerages, have, within forty years, joined the Latin communion; and have carried thither in several cases the weight of high character, in one or two that of noted abilities or accomplishments. But, secondly, these years have beyond all question effected an enormous augmentation in the arguing and teaching capacity of the Anglo-Roman body. I do not speak of merely mechanical appliances, as buildings. It is probable, that the secessions have multiplied at least fivefold the stock of educated ability and learning, available for all its purposes. The aggregate addition might perhaps claim to be equivalent in force to the entire body of honormen at Oxford or Cambridge for several years. The zeal of the seceders has been even more conspicuous than their talents. Yet this great afflux of missionary energy has entirely failed to mark the work of propagandism either by an increase of relative numbers, or, as every observer must admit, by an augmentation of civil, political, or social force.

Upon this curious state of things, a French priest, the Abbé Martin,* looks in a state of mind more curious still. For him, and for those on this side the water who may have prompted him, the whole argument in the Roman controversy is on one side. Though there has been a great historical controversy, worked out, during many centuries, in many countries,

* What Hinders the Ritualists from Becoming Roman Catholics? By the Abbé Martin. Contemporary Review, August, 1878, pp. 113-136.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

through the most disturbed and complex human action, and often, as all candid men allow, through the vilest human instruments, and through means equivocally good or unequivocally bad, yet this is not one of the matters in which real weights lie in the opposite scales of argument, and we have to be led by the "probable evidence" which is "the guide of life." The case on his side is as clear as a little rill of water, a couple of inches deep. Then these Ritualists, of whom the abbé writes, have gone so provokingly near him; and yet, like the asymptote of the parabola, they will not touch him. They seem to hug and scrape the boundary, and yet refuse to pass it. So the abbé and his friends are as men standing under a tree, whose branches bend under a weight of golden fruit; and they shake the tree with all their might, yet, he says, the apples will not fall. Or they are like a professor of a popular natural science in his lecture-room, with all his paraphernalia around him: his explanation is clear, his description of what he is about to do has not a shadow of a doubt upon it; but, when he comes to his experiment, his instrument will not work, and he finds that there is something wrong. If Mr. Babbage's calculating machine had given him an erroneous result, he would at once have suspected a fundamental error in his adjustment of the parts; but this is the very last thing that would occur to the abbé or his friends. No unkind or discourteous word, indeed, drops from his pen. The glove he wears in his helmet is perfumed "sweet as damask roses." * He has all manner of reasons to excuse these Ritualists; reasons of unconscious, concealed interest, of feeling, of tradition. But his article is entirely subjective; all on the men, nothing on the question. Anything and everything suggests itself to him, except that he finds no reason great or small, lying in the heart and essence of the case itself; a supposition, which the self-centred certainty of the Roman Church forbids any of her sons to entertain. And certainly his case is so far a hard one, that the rush of converts forty, thirty, and twenty years ago was such as to raise a fair presumption that so many teachers would surely be followed by a corresponding multitude of the taught, and to afford at once temptation and excuse for many an unwary and precipitate anticipation.

The general proposition announced by the abbé at the outset seems to be this: that a portion of the English Church much resembles the Latin Church in ritual, usage, and doctrine, and it is therefore matter of astonishment that the resemblance does not merge into identity; in other words, that they do not enter the papal fold. Now, it may relieve the abbé's mind of a portion of the pain of this astonishment if he asks himself another question: it is this. There is another body, whose ritual and doctrine is deemed by his own communion to be very much closer to its own, than those of any portion of the Church of England. The ritual and doctrine of the Eastern Church have received from the Latin Church an acknowledgment it has never granted to any Anglican faction or section whatsoever; it is admitted that, in these capital points, that Church stands unassailable. Accordingly, it is only impeached on the charge of schism, a charge which the Eastern polemics retort in a manner highly inconvenient to the defenders of the Filioque, the supremacy, and the infallibility. Now the abbé must be aware not only of the admitted nearness of the Easterns to the Roman patterns, but also of the fact that nothing is so rare as a theological or ecclesiastical conversion from among them to the Latin communion. He may, then, do well to take the beam of the non-conversion of Greeks and Russians out of his eye before he troubles himself so seriously with the mote of the non-conversion of Ritualists.

The abbé is not coherent in his account of these Ritualists. At one time (C. R. pp. 113, 126) they do not truly belong to the Church of England; at another (p. 125) they "only continue the traditions of Anglicanism under a rather more subtle and dangerous guise." Which of these is the abbé's meaning? Perhaps, though it might seem difficult, he holds by both. If, then, these Ritualists are people who have found out a form of Angli-

* Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

canism "rather more subtle," i.e. difficult for an opponent to grapple with, and "rather more dangerous," i.e. to the Roman controversialist, is it any great wonder that they should remain in the communion where they may think, as they are indeed assured by the abbé, they have found out new means of making good the positions held by their fathers for a term now of three and a half centuries? But, in truth, this article is not an argument merely about Ritualists, as the term is commonly understood among us. The point of the weapon is directed towards them; but the blade is one which cuts down together all, under whatever name, who are either unable to recognize the paramount claims of the actual Roman Church, or resolutely determined to repel them. While the abbé cannot understand — but I hope my reference to the Eastern Church may have advanced him at least one step towards understanding — how there can be a Ritualist, who is not a Romanist, so neither can he, in the same page (113), comprehend how there can be a Protestant who is not a rationalist. In both cases alike, he sees the fact, but he cannot unravel the question how it comes about. Into any of the specialities attaching to the name of Ritualist, or the name of Protestant, I will not enter. I pass by the men, and go to the case. The appeal which I wish to recognize, is really a broader one, on more open ground, in fresher air.

Es machte mir zu eng, ich musste fort.*

It is an appeal to all the disobedient; and it summons them to repent and to obey. What the abbé does not understand is the fact presented rudely, but substantially, by the statistics I have cited: the incompatibility, be it for good or be it for evil, of the English mind with the Roman claims, and the system which those claims introduce. Now, to this system, whether under the name of Rome or of ritual, or whatever other name, I hold it perfectly certain that this nation will, at least until it has undergone an extensive moral as well as theological transformation, decline to submit. And yet not on the ground which the abbé Martin, exhibiting herein a want of acquaintance with the state of opinion and feeling among us, appears to imagine. He thinks that the people of this country in general suppose the Roman Catholic religion to be "a tissue of error and iniquity" (pp. 117, 118). In this idea I believe he does them great injustice. Among the only admissible witnesses, namely, men thoughtful and trained, the great Latin Church as often perhaps receives more than justice, as less. In her vastness, in her continuity, and in the close cohesion of her clergy, she has great and telling advantages. These, let me add, are enhanced by the aspect of unity and standard of zeal which, in this country, existing as a small and marked sect, she exhibits even in her lay members. Beyond all doubt, partly as fact and partly as idea, she makes a most powerful appeal to the imagination, by the side of the little fenced-in "Anglican paddock," as Mr. Dowden has happily denominated the system which resulted from English action on Church matters in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Gregory VII., Innocent III., Thomas à Becket, are great and imposing figures to us all; but Archbishop Laud, who was the Gregory VII. or the Innocent III., or the Thomas à Becket, of our little paddock, seems to take hold of nobody's imagination, and has been set down by Macaulay before his millions of readers as an individual truly contemptible. Our bishops are indeed peers of Parliament; but they have as good as ceased to take part in its debates, except on matters relating to the paddock. Their incomes are carefully regulated by statute, and I believe most properly and becomingly laid out; but they do not partake much of the ideal, even in the sense in which the ideal may be recognized in the eighty and sixty thousand a year inherited at this day by some of the Austro-Sclavonian prelates from the Middle Ages. Luther, quarried out of the rock rather than shaped out of the marble, the Huguenots, the Puritans — these, among them, have taken up the imaginative sides of the great reforming movement. They exhibit all its poetry; Anglicanism shows little

* Schiller's "Wallenstein."

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

but the prose of compromise and the via media. Cranmer, notwithstanding his great position, and his latest moments on the heights of heroism, has never excited half the living human interest that has been given to Margaret Wilson, drowned at a stake by the advancing tide on the western coast of Scotland; as to whom Mr. Napier has lately shown it to be somewhat probable that she never was drowned, or otherwise "done to death," at all. This want of hold upon one of the great sovereign faculties of human nature has, I am persuaded, been a main cause why the English Church has been unable to retain some of her loftiest minds. She is a Church which makes a double appeal to the Catholic and to the Reformed traditions; but she exhibits each of them in shapes in which they are disowned by the more acknowledged representatives of the two respectively. Nor is this all. There has, it is manifest, been a rather marked tendency to Erastianism in the "Anglican paddock;" the natural result of the care which the State bestowed on fencing it, and the legitimate parent of a strong tendency to worldliness. This has been encouraged by historical events. The Puritans were ejected in 1662, and the Nonjurors after the Revolution. Without doubt, the bulk of those who remained were as conscientious as those who departed. But there is usually, almost inevitably, on such occasions, a worldly leaven, a more or less corrupt minority, that loves to abide where the "loaves and fishes" are to be had; and this minority lowers the average tone of the mass, in which it remains. The Puritan and the Nonjuring clergies were alike in this, that they carried with them a very small laity, and a portion relatively large of the zeal, and love, and faith, which are the life of a church.

But there are other reasons which seem, on one side at least, to blunt the sword of controversy. We think ourselves to be great lovers of historic truth. Partly by our origin, partly by our institutions, partly by our habits, we are bound to its service; chained, as it were, to its car, whether we will or no. So that, even if we break the chain, we drag the fragment; it entangles all our movements; we have not the undisturbed complacency, the tripping step, of those who settle every debate as the old Neapolitan police, when they tapped a man on the shoulder and apprehended him, met his inquiries for a cause with the conclusive reply: "Per ordine superiore."

No country, again, has produced more temperate reasoners than this country. Witness Richard Hooker, witness Bishop Butler; I add a third, not unworthy to be named with them for learning and for love, Bishop Forbes of Edinburgh, the author of the "Considerationes Modestæ." Nor, I believe, has any country produced a greater number of henotic writers; the theological peacemakers, who, hoping against hope, have striven, by charitable corrections, and favorable interpretations, to close the breaches of Christendom. It is true, indeed, that we have also to this day a section of almost fanatical combatants against the Church of Rome, and everything in which they can trace a resemblance to it. But their productions are supposed to pass with unusual despatch into the waste-paper basket, and it may truly be said of that Church that, in this country at least, she is even more happy in her extremest adversaries, than in her friends.

In point of fact this servitude, a noble servitude so far as it is realized, to historic truth, is what I cannot bring myself even to stigmatize as inconvenient, if we measure convenience largely, and by eventual results. However this may stand, without doubt the general habit of mind, encouraged by the causes I have named, derives a more direct encouragement from the spirit of the Christian religion such as we profess it. For it is undoubtedly a spirit of examination; even as the spirit inculcated, and generally prevailing, in the Latin communion is a spirit of acquiescence. And here it is that the conditions of any discussion with one in the position of the abbé come into such violent discrepancy on the two sides respectively, that I can hardly hope to convey with any fulness or clearness to his mind what is the point of view from which, according to our national habits of thought, his position is regarded. If two men meet in argument, one of them desirous to measure fully and accurately the points of strength and weakness on both sides, but especially the points of weakness on his own, and the other with an equal honesty of intention, but with a mental habit formed and hardened under influences which forbid not only any condemnation but even any critical scrutiny of the system he belongs to, they can have no common measure of truth, no means of comprehending one another. They are like men, neither of whom understands the language spoken by his adversary. My countrymen in general will I think give their full and final adhesion only to a method which bends

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

submissively to all historic evidence; which handles that evidence in the domain of Church history on the same principles as in any other domain; and which has for its aim nothing else than this, to come at the clear and entire truth, without fear or favor. And there is need of a disposition of this kind. In every religious body without exception, there forms itself a special tradition; an atmosphere, in which its members habitually live and breathe, and according to which all their ideas arrange and shape themselves. In every case, and not alone in the Roman case, this tradition lapses and slides far away from the truth of history. For it is not formed upon facts alone, but upon passions, sympathies, prepossessions: it is the offspring of man's promiscuous nature, and not only of the faculties given him for searching out the truth; and it is matter of much difficulty, even where no authoritative inhibition intervenes, to get out of the mist and the dusk which this tradition sheds around us, and to look at the face of things as they are in themselves, and after they have been stripped of their spurious integument.

Now the first consequence of such a resolute method of proceeding is one unpalatable to every sincere controversialist. He must stoop to the effort of making admissions. I will proceed to make one. Believing the general enterprise of Roman propagandism to be hopeless throughout Great Britain, I nevertheless can also believe that, between the bold and confident assumptions of the Latin Church, the shock given to many minds through the sceptical movement, and the real faults and shortcomings easy enough to be discerned in the Church reformed after the Anglican fashion as well as in every other Church, the Roman fishermen will from time to time gather a handful of fish into their net.

The matter of those faults and shortcomings requires a more detailed notice in one branch. Abuses properly so called, that is to say, corrupt deflections from the acknowledged standard, have in no Church been more rife and rank, than they were in the Church of England for several generations. But these are in a great degree things of the past; they are generally and strongly renounced, at any rate, by the clergy, in spite of whom they exist, so far as they exist at all. But the defects, other than mere abuses, have a deeper seat.

The Protestant, and the Anglican tradition of this country, in the sense in which I recently described, starts from a position allowed by all, that the Christian Church in general had, in the course of time, fallen away in various particulars from its purity. This was the state of declension which prevailed until the sixteenth century. Then there came upon Christendom, initiated by the bravery of Luther, a powerful impulse, which passed into a mighty struggle. This conflict was carried on through many years, with many vicissitudes. But it resulted in a new state of things. On the one side, there remained the Latin Church with its dogma generally unchanged, but with many current opinions and practices hardened into dogma. On the other side stood a variety of Protestant or Reformed communions, differing it is true on several points among themselves, but differing more profoundly or more sensibly, or both, from the great Latin communion which had rejected, or had been rejected by, them. Speaking roughly, there were now set up in western Christendom two systems of doctrine, discipline, and ritual, instead of one: issue had been joined on a multitude of points, and upon all of them where the controversy lay between reformed and unreformed, the second, according to the Protestant tradition as I have described it, was simply wrong, and the first simply right. The Reformers were regarded, not indeed as inspired, but as those who had displaced a false system, and either devised or replaced a true one, in such a sense that it was obligatory, or wise at the very least, to follow them in each and every point as they had delivered it, under pain of impeachment for disloyalty. There was a kind of latent reserve on behalf of those who wished to go beyond the Reformers, though this reserve was again subjected to reservation, and was not held to shelter Unitarians. But for such as fell short of the Reformers, there was no mercy. To adhere to the Gospel in its republication was a duty, as much as to have adhered to it in the form of its original publication. The new system was to be reasoned from, not reasoned on. Private judgment was legitimate, if it resulted in accepting on trial the conclusions of a particular time and crisis; but the lawfulness of its exercise was conditional upon its thinking generally as the Reformers thought, and in each country as the Reformers of that particular country thought.

In England, it had so happened that the Reformation period, popularly thus called, had left the Church of the land in a state of inward conflict between two schools,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

alike determined in rejecting the jurisdiction of Rome, and various other matters along with it, but seriously differing on sacramental doctrines, on the nature and government of the Church, and generally on their relation to the framework of the old religion apart from the more recent Roman peculiarities. It was not for a hundred years, namely, not until 1661, that this feud was brought to a decisive issue by the final triumph of the historical or traditional school, which has commonly been called Anglican, and which is represented in the phrase of the "Anglican paddock." The framers of the scheme then settled were really the final Reformers of the Church of England. But, in the thought and language of the Protestant tradition, they were believed to savor somewhat of reaction; and never took the benefit of that peculiar authority, above the natural though below the supernatural, above the patristic, though below the apostolic, which the Protestant tradition ascribed to the Reformers. But, though their authority may be little recognized in the abstract, it is beyond doubt that, through the medium of the Common Prayer Book they have operated very powerfully on the religious mind of those within the pale of the Anglican Church, and have helped to lift it some would say above, and others would say away from, the true Reformation standard. In the main, however, it is the body of ideas evolved in the sixteenth century, as accepted in England, which has been the treasure, it may even be said the idol, of our "Protestant tradition;" and has been popularly deemed to hold a place beyond the reach of ordinary criticism. This conception, however, is now very widely felt to be one which it is difficult for the philosopher to conceive, or for the reasoner to defend.

It is a serious matter to shake any tradition established with regard to religion. For the invisible world contends against the visible at many and terrible disadvantages, and gets so much less than fair play in the general competition, that there should be much tenderness and caution about shaking any part of the ground it actually holds. But such motives, though they recommend care and forbid precipitancy, cannot establish a standing law in derogation of historic truth; and it is the attempt so to derogate which may often generate the most violent and dangerous reactions. The English mind, under the guidance of liberty, has found it impossible to justify the practice of looking at the Reformation as if it had been a revelation. We cannot be bound even to approve all the proceedings of the primitive Church in its dealings with the heathen world. Much less can we suppose that in the civil wars of Christianity, the conduct of either side had a monopoly of virtue, or its thought of religious truth. It does not follow that the work of the sixteenth century is to be hastily or harshly judged. Its case before the court, so to speak, of posterity is like that of the men of Magna Charta, of the Revolution of 1688, or of the Reform Act. All of these are recognized as signal public benefactors; but none of them are exempt from criticism, or even censure, in the points where it may be found that their workmanship has been defective. But as the passions attending those great political epochs were less fierce, violent, and subtle than those of the Reformation, and again as the business of the Reformation was one far more complex and difficult to deal with, we must be prepared in its case to find, without astonishment, more excesses and more failures mixed with the details of a great and immortal performance. And, when we find them, we must estimate them with judicial calm, but with historic freedom.

Libertas, quæ, sera, tamen respexit inertem.

The mental and moral upheaving, both of nations and of individuals, at the date of the Reformation was an effort such as civilized man had never before been called upon to make. For Christianity, from its origin, wound itself but slowly into the body of society. And, although the early controversies, such as those of the fourth century, went much nearer the foundations of the faith, they were carried on (so to speak) in the scientific region, and did not greatly enter into the moulding of ordinary life and character. But the struggle of the Reformation was not confined to the mental and moral sphere. At every point, it was prosecuted or repressed by the axe and the stake, by sword and cannon. When reason and feeling were thus fiercely and inextricably blended with "blood and fire, and vapor of smoke," * it was impossible that the action of mind could be normal and duly measured, or that its results should come forth without bearing upon them the marks of the agony and convulsion of their birth. To treat the particular tenets of the Reformation one by one, and the verbal forms in which they are expressed. as purely scientific products of

* Acts ii. 19.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

human thought, is contrary to all the lessons of history, to the whole analogy of our nature. The circumstances of the Reformation as a great uprising in vindication of human right, and as a manful protest against corruptions now admitted and lamented by every candid man, gave it a great authority, in the philosophic sense of that word; but this was in its broad outlines and in the main scope of its moral purposes, and cannot be shown to ramify and descend equably into the detail of all its processes.

Of this we have a marked example, as I think, in the doctrine of justification. For Luther, it was the note and test of life or death, the articulus stantis aut cadentis ecclesiæ. Yet the Anglican Church seems to have steered amidst these troubled waters clear of all the difficulty. Some may think it requires a strong appetite for controversy to detect a radical incompatibility between the Anglican article on this subject and the Tridentine teaching in its positive part.* The complemental doctrine of assurance, so widely taught on the Continent as a thing necessary for the Christian, has never at any time been sanctioned by the Church of England. The "Considerationes Modestæ" of Bishop Forbes present abundant materials for a view of the controversy of justification; and that work, together with the "Symbolik" of Möhler, written from the opposite side, appears to supply all that reasonable minds can require in order to close the contest.† Accordingly, the divines, who met at Bonn in 1874, do not seem to have encountered much difficulty in the composition of a reconciling formula, which has not, so far as I have learned, given cause for any scandal in this country.

There were other points, at which partisanship has left its mark, if not on the body of doctrine formulated in the sixteenth century, yet on the Protestant tradition, which is for the greater number of minds its living representative. The strong and just reaction from the purgatorial system, prevailing in the Latin Church of the period, went far to account for, and even excuse, that stark and rigid conception of the effect of death on the state of the human being, which led to an abandonment of the uniform practice of the earliest ages of the Church, as testified by the liturgies, in the commendation of the faithful departed to God, for an increase of their rest and peace. But what caused, nay even what might excuse, the violence thus done to nature, as well as to religion, did not frustrate its mischievous effects in narrowing the range of Christian sympathies, and establishing an anomaly in the general doctrine of prayer. With the obscuration of an universal tradition there came, indeed, manifold confusions of doctrine: the final judgment, with its solemn import, seemed to have no place left for it, when the intermediate state of souls had been reduced almost to a cipher. Worst of all, the new standard appeared to be in hopeless conflict with the widest experience: for it implied that the entire work of discipline was in every case fully accomplished on this side the grave; that every soul passed away into the unseen in a state of ripeness for a final destiny of bliss or woe. But violence begets violence. Within the last twenty years a reaction has arisen, under the force of which a crowd of Protestants, and even many who deem themselves to be of the cream of Protestantism, have adopted ideas of trial and purgation beyond the grave, which vastly exceed in latitude anything ever taught by the Church of Rome.

Again, if it be true that, in the current doctrine and practice of the eucharist, the sacrificial idea had, before the Reformation, and not for the best purposes, been allowed to assume an undue and enormous predominance over that of communion, it came, in the course of controversy, to be so depressed on the Protestant side, that it was almost effaced from the common mind. This could hardly be done without a serious dislocation of the historical relations between that great sacrament and its historic types. Nor, again, without seriously lowering the general conception of Christian life and worship as a true sacrifice to God, which had the eucharistic sacrifice for its central point. St. Paul seems to lift upward the whole fabric of Christian observance, when he exhorts the faithful to present their bodies a living sacrifice unto God, which, he says, is "your reasonable service."* And, if so, whatever tends to impair the efficacy of that idea, tends in like degree to lower the Christian obedience from the level of the filial, towards that of the servile, standard.

A fourth point, in which the general interest of Christian truth took damage from the course of the controversy, related to the authority of Holy Scripture. Exultation in the recovered access of the

* Art. xi. Conc. Trid. Sessio vi., capp. viii., ix.

† Bishop Forbes' Consid. Modest., Books 1–5; and Möhler's Symbolik, i. 1–3.

* Rom. xii. 1; cf. 1 Pet. ii. 5.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

people to the Divine Word concurred with the jealousy of it exhibited on the Roman side to heighten our conception of its exalted function under the economy of the Gospel. The bald announcement of a coordinate authority in dogmatic traditions, exterior to the sacred volume,* the wide door thus laid open to arbitrary assertion, and the unlimited use made of Church authority against human freedom, provoked the reforming parties into the total rejection of that authority, and the substitution of the invisible for the visible Church. It thus became alike a logical and practical necessity to lay upon Scripture the entire stress of defining and proving itself, and to hold the Almighty pledged as it were to every letter forming part of its corpus, with a particularity and rigor hardly known to former ages. It has become long since evident that this was a straining of the truth; and that the superstition thus engendered might, when it wore out and disappeared, make room for scepticism. It can hardly be doubted that the Christian world is, in our day, suffering seriously from this cause. Diminishing, by an arbitrary process, the aggregate of testimony which the wisdom of God had supplied for the establishment and determination of the Gospel, and finding the stock, when thus diminished, to be insufficient, we impeach the revelation itself for a want, which is due only to our own improvidence.

This great and menacing mischief was inherent in the course of the foreign, much more than of the Anglican, Reformation. But another evil was an especial growth of the movement as it shaped itself in England. The popedom was, after the rupture had been consummated through the folly of Pope Pius V., virtually effaced from the national Christianity. So serious a void there was a temptation, perhaps a necessity, to fill; and through the force of events, more than any formal declaration, it was filled in the main by the sovereign. This was a result extremely adverse to civil freedom. It further heightened that excess of regal power, which had already marked the Tudor period. The doctrines of divine right, and of passive obedience, took deep root in England; and they were peculiarly the growth of the English Reformation. The strength of the crown had, indeed, in many respects eased the religious process; and the ill effects in this department were greatly mitigated by the sagacity of "great Elizabeth," and by an undoubted sincerity of attachment to the Church in the two first sovereigns of the Stuart line. But, on the whole, the tendency of the exaggeration I have noted was to depress spiritual life and energy, and to promote and perpetuate a civil intolerance, which the marked theological moderation of the Church of England would of itself have greatly discouraged.

Now, I would warn the abbé Martin — the repeated recurrence of whose name in this paper I trust will not offend, as it is rather typical than personal — that he will not on all hands receive the benefit of such admissions as have here been made. Many among us will demur to them on their merits, many more out of deference to tradition, videlicet, the current popular tradition. Some will probably go so far as to censure any writer, by whom they are made. But doubt, says Dante (Parad. iv. 130), nestles at the root of truth, and no lesson more profound is to be learned among the many that have proceeded from that great and royal teacher. To tradition, as the witness of history, the highest regard is due. Tradition, as the floating opinion of a sect or party, has only a presumptive title to respect even among the members of that sect or party, and cannot be pleaded against a serious investigator, like a privileged communication in an English court of justice.

Again, Abbé Martin may find rained down upon him in abundance, as reproaches, in answer to his inquiry, all those accretions to the Christian faith, partly in the current usages and tradition of his Church, partly in its more authoritative documents, which have been urged by our controversialists with much power, at the various periods when they have seriously drawn the sword of controversy. This ground I leave to professional combatants. I waive, therefore, much advantage, and rather desire to make every possible admission; in the belief that, for the time in which we live, the ultimate issues of discussion will be mainly governed, not by the topics which the propagandist loves, and which he uses in individual cases with great effect, but by those which take a broader grasp of the general reason of mankind. At the same time, while I shall speak of the Roman Church in Roman Catholic countries, on the other side I limit myself to English ground; for I do not feel myself possessed of that acquaintance with the entire case, as it stands in Protestant lands abroad, which is necessary to warrant the degree of pretension implied in the very act of making any contribution

* Perrone, De Loc. Theol., pars ii., sect. ii. 1.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to a public discussion. The religion of each side I take where it is the prevalent religion; for where it represents but a handful, the comparison is vitiated by exceptional, and therefore misleading particulars.

Admitting, then, for argument's sake, that certain conceptions, material to a largely developed Christianity, have been impaired or curtailed, and consenting to pass by the countervailing inquiry whether our common religion has not on the other side suffered more deeply from exaggerations which practically mutilate, I take the case at the worst, and I compare the condition of Christian belief, as such, in the great Latin communion with what it is, for example, in England. I will not rely upon the case of the respective clergies, which we may safely take to be, as a general rule, firm in the faith which they profess. Yet I cannot dismiss their case without a remark. In the Roman Church, they are a body trained from an early age, in jealous and careful severance from the laity. In adult life, this severance continues; so that belief among the clergy tells us nothing as to belief among the educated laity. In England, as also in the Eastern Churches, the clergyman is everywhere a citizen, and everywhere (I include our Nonconformists) in sympathy either with all or many of the educated laity; so that here the general fidelity of the priesthood or ministry does tell us a great deal as to the existence of belief among the educated laity. Nor will it be disputed that the state of belief among those of the general community, who have received the highest instruction, is likely in the course of time, perhaps to determine, at any rate largely and vitally to affect, the belief of the mass.

I suppose it too, to be undisputed that, in the early, though not in the earliest days of the mediæval culture, a strong spirit of reaction against faith asserted its place in the contemporary literature; that is to say, in the permanent, incorporated thought of man for the period. This spirit, mainly known by its relation to the Renaissance of the fifteenth century, I shall describe by the name of paganism. And for one most signal manifestation of it I go back to the middle of the fourteenth, and to the "Decamerone" of Boccaccio; a work which has undoubtedly become part of the literary inheritance of mankind through all generations. This production is saturated from top to toe with the pagan spirit. Many a book composed with the direct intention of assailing dogmatic religion, is far less profoundly estranged from it than the "Decameron." I do not now speak mainly of its indecencies: partly because there has been a change in the general tone, if not the framework of ideas, which makes an exact judgment on the point difficult: partly because that offence has been committed by others, who have left evidence of a strong spirit of Christian belief and feeling, such as Margaret, queen of Navarre, has given in her very beautiful verses, "Qui veut être vrai Chrétien." The profound paganism of the "Decamerone," again, is not principally to be proved by its merciless exhibition of corruption among the priests, monks, and nuns; although the chastisement is couched in a tone as different as possible from that of a reformer. It seems as though it was their being specially bound to the exhibition of the great anti-pagan system, which, instead of exciting grave sorrow and shame, gave zest and intensity to the pleasure of the author in exposing their worldly and fleshly vices. But it is the entire strain, the atmosphere, nay, the very basis of the work, which is pagan, and ultra-pagan. It lies in the exhibition of dissolute life, upon Epicurean principles, as the proper and natural refuge of the very choicest spirits in Florentine society, women as well as men, from the horrors, and from the solemn duties, brought to their doors by the black death of the period. This revival of the carpe diem * as the guide of human life, close to the headquarters of Latin Christianity, is the more remarkable, because the book makes no attack on speculative belief. It was truly a fact in the life of the country of its birth, and of its own and the following generations, such in magnitude and moment as to have no parallel, for the purpose of the present argument, in literary history. It was a national event. It entered into the business of States, and the circle of diplomacy. Produced close to the central seat of Latin Christianity, it became the subject of one or more embassies to Rome from Florence. Under Paul IV. and Pius IV. it was in the Index Prohibitorum Librorum; but in 1573, under Gregory XIII., it was published at Florence, with express approval from the Roman Inquisition, and with a brief from the pope, which granted the copyright to the publishers, and excommunicated all who

* Admirably described in the preface to the new edition of Maçon's (1545) translation. Paris: Liseux. 1878. The subsequent regret of Boccaccio, if established (see Ugo Foscolo's Discourse), will not affect the argument.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

should anywhere infringe it, besides fining them heavily if in the Roman States. It had been corrected; but how? Mainly by the omission of one out of the hundred tales, and by the general omission of ecclesiastical personages, for whom schoolmasters and students were commonly substituted. This concession, which would be incredible if it were not indisputable, tells more than many a volume might be written to tell, of the strong and impregnable position which had been taken by paganism, at the very heart of the whole civilized and Christian world. Unhappily it would be quite easy to widen this illustration, though deepened it could not be; as, for example, by reference to the "cauti carnascialeschi" of the Medicean court, to the remarkable "Autobiography of Benvenuto Cellini," and to the now infamous, but then famous, person and works of Pietro Aretino, Knight of St. Peter by favor of Julius III.

When Christian morality had been to so great an extent shaken and displaced in the mind, and in the practice, of the educated and refined, we cannot be surprised at the violence with which, upon the wider introduction of the new studies from the East, the Christian dogma also was touched by the influence of Greek thought. If ever in the natural world a tempest was required to re-establish atmospheric equilibrium, the great earthquake of the Lutheran movement was needed to shake the very ground under the feet of the Roman court, to compel reflection, to revive religion, and to abash and overbear the interests opposed to disciplinary reform. In this sense I suppose it to be admitted by many members of the Roman Church that it was not only helped, but saved, by the Reformation. The reforms, however, which were accomplished by, and after, the Council of Trent, were confined to the ecclesiastical sphere, and did not exorcise the spirit of paganism. That scandal of scandals which I have set forth, the acceptance and commendation of the "Decamerone" from the Roman chair, was effected amidst the storm of religious war in France and in the Low Countries, and one year only after the same reigning pontiff had struck a medal, and ordered a thanksgiving, in honor of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. As early, indeed, at least, as in the time of Dante, the severance of the supreme Christian teaching from Christian practice had come to be such, as to produce results highly significant of the future. The poet, than whom there had been no more profound believer, and perhaps no greater spiritual writer, since the apostolic time, has described the court of Rome in terms which would have satisfied the highest transports of Luther; and gave tokens of attachment to human liberty sufficient to mark him as a dangerous man. In our own time, a devoted adherent of the popedom has published an elaborate work to prove him an heretic, as well as a revolutionist and a socialist.* But the further lodgment of the enemy has not then been made within the precinct where was to dwell "a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle;" even "the king's daughter, all glorious within," and having "her clothing of wrought gold." Made it was, and seemingly before another century had passed. To this day, he has never been dislodged. Nay more, he has enlarged his tents enormously; and it is no secret that among the educated men of France and Italy, with the exception of a few individuals, the Christian dogma has ceased to hold an authoritative sway over either intellect or life. It is not this or that tenet which they doubt: the whole basis has crumbled, the whole superstructure fallen to the ground; and what even in this day moves some of them when they come to England is, astonishment at the large number of believers. All minor assaults upon belief the Latin Church has indeed put down in her own precinct, with the same success as that which she achieved in defeating the reforms of Scipio Ricci and the synod of Pistoia, or in blasting the promise of Port Royal. Nothing can be more splendid than the external tokens of victory. Jansenism, and Josephism, and the Petite Eglise of France, before our time, and in our own day Hermesianism and the movement of Ronge, have gone the way of all flesh. It remains to see what will be the fate of the Old Catholicism of Germany, and of the sister associations elsewhere. But, while so many attacks have been repulsed, so many rebellions quelled, in detail, the foundations themselves have been sapped, and the educated thought of civilized man, in the countries of the Roman obedience, has broken, and to all appearance finally broken, with Christian belief.

Now it must be most instructive to compare, even in the rudest and briefest outline, the experience of the pagan movement in our own country with its history abroad. I say in our own country, for the abbé Martin's appeal is to us, whom he

* Dante Hérétique, Révolutionnaire, et Socialiste. Par E. Aroux, Ancien Député. Paris, 1855.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

seeks to draw out of our churchless, shelterless condition, into the shelter he so much enjoys. But many of us doubt whether we are quite so churchless, and still more of us whether we are quite so shelterless, as he supposes.

The rebellion of paganism against the faith was felt throughout western Europe. It was a barometrical indication of the condition of a moral atmosphere, which overspread all Christendom, and pervaded its essentially common life. England was an early recipient of the Greek studies in her two universities; and the close connection of her rising literature with Italy ensured her sharing largely in all the impulses which had convulsed or touched the mother country of our civilization. The marks not only of Italy, but of Boccaccio, are stamped upon English letters from Chaucer onwards. But Chaucer exhibits neither the moral foulness, nor that deep underlying of the pagan spirit, which marks the great Italian novelist. His "goodman of religion," is purely and strongly Christian:

The love of Christ, and his apostles twelve,
He taught; but first he followed it himself.

One of the very sweetest and most perfect of Christian poems is "The Merle and the Nightingale," by Dunbar. If it be said that this difference was national and not religious, it has also to be replied that England was distinguished from Italy between the thirteenth and the sixteenth centuries, first by a doctrinal reaction among a portion of the people, which found vent in Wiclif and in Lollardism; secondly, by that strong and truly national reaction against the court and see of Rome, which touched its climax in the proceedings of the reign of Henry VIII. So much for the first stage in the history of the Italian paganism.

The second stage was that, which it reached under the influence of the classical Renaissance. And here I suppose, that the British analogue to the Italian manifestation of the sixteenth century is to be found in the Elizabethan literature, the terrene spirit of which has been very powerfully described by Mr. Dowden in his remarkable works on Shakespeare. Let us estimate that literature first in its prince. Shakespeare undoubtedly exhibits a strong reaction against the transcendental spiritualism of the Middle Ages. It is hard to measure the distance between his mental attitude and that of Thomas à Kempis, or even that of Dante, who was, outwardly at least, a man of the world, a practical politician and partisan. The mediæval Church, or rather that part of it which aimed at fidelity to its mission, in its anxiety to keep religion pure and lofty, had set a gulf between it and the rude common life. Its idea was lofty; but it was not the idea of training the human being in every faculty and for every function of the present existence as the normal means of preparing him for a remoter future. Mary it followed; but Martha, who of necessity must be more typical of the mass of Christians, it rather proscribed. The conditions of earthly existence were renounced, rather than sanctified, in the religious ideal. In order to the eventual re-establishment of the balance between the worlds, there required to be a strong reassertion, not only of the reality of this world and of life in it, but of their legitimacy. They, and not the cloister, were the school, in which the Almighty had appointed his children to be taught and reared. Hence came, as the grand characteristic of our Elizabethan age, what Mr. Dowden calls "devotion to the fact," "attainment of the fact," "rich feeling for positive, concrete fact." * In this reaching out with one arm, so to speak, of our nature over the whole terrestrial domain, there was a real widening of the scope of life; and if we look back impartially to the history of that great period, it seems difficult to deny that there was also a great accession of new human energy to the pre-existing stock. It was the office of the other arm to embrace the unseen life; and probably this grasp was weakened for the time. It could hardly be but that, as in all human reactions, the function restored should trespass on the province of the function previously in too exclusive possession. We need not then be surprised that the works of Shakespeare, as a whole, bear a somewhat worldly aspect; that in their exhibition of human nature, entirely unrivalled in all literature for largeness and variety, with depth, so small a portion should be seen on the side lying heavenward; that saintship, where it appears in Henry VI., is emasculated and incoherent; that not only in our early plays, such as "Romeo and Juliet," but in the later and greater works, "Macbeth," "Othello," "Hamlet," "Lear," the deep problems of our life and duty are handled upon a basis which is but negatively Christian. This is the more noteworthy, because a multitude of passages exhibit Shakespeare as an undoubting believer. But religion had been wrenched

* Dowden's Mind and Art of Shakespeare, pp. 18, 19, 23.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

away from life; and life, in its recoil, busied with the gathering of all its energies, had not recovered the key to its own harmony with religion. I have endeavored here not to understate the charge, which a Beatrice might be warranted in making against our Elizabethan age. But when we compare the English "paganism," as exhibited in Shakespeare, with the Italian paganism, hardened into an Epicurean creed and sanctioned by the Roman court, or teaching with the very same pen, as in the "divine" Aretino, the vilest profligacy and the most orthodox theology, or even as it is exhibited in the splendid poetry of Bojardo and Ariosto, I cannot but think that, in fidelity to history and the fact, we must allow that the comparison is favorable, as far as it goes, both to England and to the Reformation.

Mr. Dowden has chosen with great judgment four names as being together typical of the Elizabethan age in letters: Shakespeare, Bacon, Spencer, Hooker. The magnificent intellect of Bacon is held by Mr. Dowden to have been profoundly indifferent to religion. Is this truly so? I do not presume to deny that in Bacon's character "the world that now is" weighed for more than "that which is to come." But I would appeal with some confidence to his account, for example, of the fall of man, as a proof that he rendered a solid faith and fealty to the Christian dogma. As for Spenser, it is surely notable that, forming himself as he did upon the poets of the Italian romance, he utterly renounced their uncleanness, and, as it were, "passed by on the other side." More still is it to be noted that, while far from being the most robust of the band, Spenser is the one who seems to have taken the best aim at the literary restoration of a true theory of life. All virtue, all duty, all activeness of the human character, are set out by him, under the forms of chivalry, for our instruction; but his ideal knight is Christian to the core.

> And on his breast a bloody cross he bore,
> The dear remembrance of his dying Lord,
> For whose sweet sake that glorious badge he wore,
> And, dead as living, ever him adored.*

Nor was Hooker less a restorer than his great compeers. For was it not given to him to recall our theology from the hungry region of mere polemics to that of positive and fruitful truth, and to become the father of a long line of divines, reared undoubtedly in the mere Anglican paddock, yet not without name and honor in the wide pastures of the Christian world?

I know not whether the Abbé Martin will recognize the relevancy of a discussion of this kind. He may think it ἀπροσδιόνυσον; far from the mark. I admit that it fetches a compass; but this is what frequently, in strategy, hems in the adversary with a zone of iron. The case, I think, may be thus exhibited. Religion lives in various forms; but it has to a great extent the same evils to contend with. These evils are failure in the law of human duty, and failure in the Christian dogma, without which dogma, as Christians believe, the laws of human duty cannot on a large scale be maintained. Obviously our controversies would be solved, could we see plainly in which of its rival forms our religion dealt with these foes most effectually. But then comparison of the dogma is the polemical business, which in this paper has been waived. Comparison of the morality, on an adequate scale, of the countries of the Latin Church and the countries of the Reformed communions would be most instructive; but the facts are so manifold and complex, as to defy reduction to a simple issue. It is something, then, gained towards the establishment of truth, if we can obtain hints for tracing the intellectual history of these countries respectively, in its relation to religion. Such a hint I have sought to supply by exhibiting the effect upon the two systems, or upon the two frames of mind, of the great paganizing movement dating about the close of the Middle Age. We might find here something that may faintly resemble the parables of our Lord, and their adaptedness for public instruction; wherein the truth (as I think Whately observes) is perceived before its application to contending parties has come into view. Upon the whole I believe, that a continuation of the inquiry into the lay literature of the respective countries down to our own day would tell the same very significant story; and would show that, with all our faults, which are countless, yet, taken at large, religion has dealt and deals more hopefully with the great anti-dogmatic movements here in England, than in the lands of the Papal Church. Suppose, for example, that we bring into the field Tasso on the one side, and Milton on the other. Undoubtedly the chief work of Tasso rests upon a basis of Christian facts: yet it may be doubted whether the Christianity of Milton, as exhibited in his works, with all its errors or offences, had not in it far more

* Faerie Queene, i. 2.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY of the character of a living operative power, holding the allegiance of heart and will. Again, while in the last century, the Voltairian torrent carried away the mind of France, the three most prominent contemporary names in English literature, those of Johnson, Burke, and Richardson, were eminently Christian. At a later period we can point to at least four great contemporary poets, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Southey, and Scott, none of them professional * or theological, but all decidedly Christian. It might be difficult to find a parallel within the Roman pale. Men such as these, it must be remembered, are fountain-heads of thought, moulders and makers of the generations yet to come;

> Poets, whose thoughts enrich the blood o' the world.†

At the present moment, indeed, belief in the revelation of the unseen is undergoing, here as elsewhere, a shock which is without parallel, at least in the history of this country, for the activity of its manifestations; and is suffering a sharp retribution for all the errors of all its professors. But it remains to be seen whether what we witness is a structural change, like those which fill the record of geologic time, or whether it is the wave of a cyclone, which wastes and submerges, and is then itself re-absorbed. So it was with the unbelief which Bishop Butler described; so it may be again. It is, however, even now, my persuasion that, so far as men of mature life are concerned, there is exaggeration abroad, if not as to the world of physical science — which has not yet become the "mother and mistress of all the sciences" — yet as to the world of literature; still more as to the sphere of those professions, which are mainly conversant with human life and action, and which, as I cannot but think, must best prepare men to judge of any scheme, which has for its object the training of mankind.

But whatever modesty, whatever reserve the present rampancy of the non-believing movement may inspire, it will hardly prompt us to look to the Latin Church as invested with the reconciling mission between faith and the human reason. It is true that the central authority of that Church has recently pointed out another method of settling the difference. It proposes to effect the work by the simple action of authority: and this method, boldly proclaimed, and well echoed through the world, may attract a fragmentary proportion even of English minds. The abbé Martin says (p. 132), "The fundamental principle of Catholic discipline is respect for authority;" and he calls on us to "understand very clearly" (p. 131) that those, who accept his invitation, must, "in religious matters, make an entire surrender of their personal liberty and of their own will."

Freedom, then, is quietly trodden under foot. Now, this is not a lawless country. It constantly excites the surprise of foreigners that, when revolution shakes or saps the Continent, authority sits undisturbed in England. But that, it will be said, is temporal authority. It is not temporal authority alone. Rely upon it, the acknowledgment of a law external to ourselves in things unseen is the absolute condition, under which alone authority can uphold itself in the sphere of the visible and tangible. But it is met by the counteracting play of liberty; met, yet not extinguished. Authority can only be defended by reason: it is a part of what reason sanctions and recommends. But there is no escape from this, that it must be tried by reason; as even the being of God, with reverence be it spoken, must be tried by reason. Tried by reason, under a great responsibility; but under no external coercion, either physical or moral. What the English mind demands, and will demand, is that the contest between belief and non-belief shall be fought out upon equal terms. This does not mean that human consent, that the tradition of ages, shall be cast aside as a thing of no account; but means that it shall be weighed, and account taken of its weight, by that faculty which God has made to be the very door of our matured minds, and through which alone lawful entrance into them can be had. The principle of authority, the fact of revelation, the stability and perpetuity of the catholic creed, all these, I trust, will remain firmly grounded among us; but they can only be maintained through a frank acceptance of the challenge to make good their claims by reason. This demand of the English mind has been met by the Roman Church with the allegation, that her head is infallible. But then we know that, until eight years ago, this very thing was freely denied by the highest authorities in her communion. She likewise asserts her universality; but does not this seem to be somewhat impaired by the fact that the Christians, who are not of her communion, are quite as

* I do not think Coleridge's early function, as a preacher of a creed soon abandoned, requires me to qualify this epithet.

† Tennyson's Princess, ii.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

numerous as those who are? She claims, too, a right to override the conclusions of science; but will candid reflection regard the plea as strong enough to stand the shock of hard and concrete facts? We observe in the Roman Church a most powerful organization, and a great faculty of action upon all those who do not laboriously think, or largely contribute to supply mankind with its stock of thought: but we observe, also, when we look to the countries of her unbroken dominion, an apparent want of capacity to meet the human mind in its questioning attitude; so that it has simply broken away from her control, and the communications between the two are like the voices of men severed on this side and on that by a broad and deep stream that neither of them can cross. The non-believing guerillas are busy in the field of science, of archæology, of language, of pre-historic facts, of speculative philosophy, of Biblical and all archaic criticism. In every one of these they challenge Christians to the fight. What, within the last thirty years, the current generation — during which the trumpet of defiance has been ever sounding in her ears — have this vast clergy and Church effected in answer to the challenge? And why are Ritualists, or anybody else, to be in a hurry to surrender their Christianity to a body that shows so small capacity to defend a territory, which nevertheless it claims exclusively to occupy?

The truth is that the Reformation, amidst its convulsive throes, lifted again to the surface a gigantic question which had long lain buried beneath the débris of the current religious traditions; namely, whether freedom is one of the vital and normal coefficients for all healthy life and action of the human soul? It answered this question, too, not at once, but partly led and partly driven by the logic of events, in the affirmative. Neither had the Roman Church, before the Reformation, replied to it in the negative. Since that great epoch, her attitude has become in many ways more artificial and constrained. The tendencies adverse to freedom within her pale are supposed to be due to the order of Jesuits. But Loyola is himself only the first, and most prominent, index and result of those tendencies. The foe was everywhere around the walls: sentries had to be multiplied, passwords appointed, and doors formerly open kept fast with lock and key. Jesuitism was only rendered possible by the Reformation: it was, by reflex action, the Reformation's child. Compulsory confession was a yoke which one-half Europe had refused to bear: but in the post-Reformation Church, that rule was developed into the system of direction. Now Tartaros was as far beneath the ground, as the ground beneath heaven; and direction was as far beyond mere confession, as confession was beyond the lines of human autonomy. Religion became more sensuous, more artificial, more feminine. The saints of this period differ from earlier saints, not merely as the ages differ, but from the specific reflex effect which had been wrought upon the Latin religion. What a difference, for instance, between Saint Bernard and St. Francis de Sales: how much more human, natural, and universal is the one, how much more removed is the other from the largeness of the true type of manhood! And so it still seems to be a continual tendency, nay, a standing policy, to depress the man in the priest, and to make the common type of the order force down the growths of individual character. Finally, what the Reformation did once, the French Revolution did anew. It stimulated and centralized the ecclesiastical spirit, narrowing its precinct, making it more intense within that precinct, but widening the gap between it and the lay Christian world, and wearing away the hope of reconciliation between them. It is easy to denounce from the Roman chair all opposers, as simply representing the world, the flesh, and the devil. But the question will recur to calm minds whether that absoluteness of rule which it establishes, from the head downwards, through the several stages of its clergy, ending in the dominion of them all over the flock, and in the establishment of an unchecked clerical supremacy over the detail of life, is really healthful for mankind; really according to the laws of the constitution given us from on high; really the due form of the remedy appointed for the healing, the restoration, and the full development of human nature?

A variety of circumstances tend to confirm this mistrust in the capacity of a Church, such as the abbé Martin recommends, for becoming a successful champion of belief. We know, for example, that forty, thirty, or twenty years ago the fortress of thought and of scientific theology, for the Latin Church, was in South Germany. But we also know that the band of men, who were then her joy and crown, have been driven, since the Council of 1870, out of her communion; and are now known as Old Catholics. If we cross the Rhine into France, we observe that Lamennais, the greatest genius of the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

French clergy of his day, and Hyacinthe, once their greatest preacher, each, though in different directions, became estranged from their Church; that Montalembert is known, and Gratry is suspected, to have died in mental resistance to the Council of the Vatican. If we carry our view into Italy, we find that nearly all the most remarkable men of its clergy for the last half-century have been unable to hold their positions, or have fallen under the positive censures of the Church: Rosmini, Gioberti, Ventura, Passaglia: a list to which two notable names, at least, of men now living might be added. In England it is true that a large number of notable persons were, within our memory, induced to cross the Roman border. They changed the color of their small but respected Anglo-Roman communion, and some of them have been active in polemical campaigning; but what has this clergy effected in the great warfare for belief?

There was a time when the champions of the Latin Church were content to pursue the historic method, and to trace through the sacred Scriptures, the writings of fathers, the structure of liturgies, and the decrees of councils, those severed elements of proof, which, as they thought, welding themselves by degrees into a mass, presented the features of a true historic growth, and justified them in inscribing over the portals of their Church the proud title of the unchanged. There was not only a material but a formal difference between this mode of arguing, and the mode now in use. For it was a process carried on in the open, level arena, upon the common ground of an appeal to history, and to rational judgment, upon a wide range of actual fact. The method is now disused; and such men as the Bossuets, the Nicoles, or as the great divines of Constance, are discredited and even denounced; a change in tactics, which must have a cause, and which suggests no other cause than this; that, in the face of the profound alterations lately effected in the Roman system, the appeal to history has become a patent peril, and must be not only laid aside but inhibited. But do the modes of argument, which have been substituted, better sustain the ordeal, through which they have to pass in every reflective and impartial mind?

For example, in lieu of showing what has been in the world, and what is, or is not to be deduced from the abundant facts of history bearing on the case, recourse is now often had to the argument a priori. This may well be called the domineering argument; as, in order to instruct man, it lays down the law for God, and determines the provision it was needful for him to make in order to ensure the fulfilment of his promise to the Church that the gates of hell should not prevail against it; or, that the Christian faith, and the society to whose stewardship it was to be intrusted, should endure throughout all the ages, until the work of the Redeemer should have been fully accomplished. To this end, we are often told, it was necessary that there should be an ecclesiastical organization with one head exercising supremacy over the entire body. But when we look through or over the wall of the Western Church into the precincts of the Eastern, we seem to find a living confutation of this argument. For there a vast body, nearly a fourth of Christendom, has subsisted from the great day of Pentecost to our day, which not only does not enjoy, but which renounces and condemns, the whole doctrine of supremacy; and which, under the old patriarchal constitution of the Church, retains the Christian faith entire, by the acknowledgment of Rome herself, which invites, and invites in vain, to her councils those unyielding patriarchs of the East. And what is the answer? We may really marvel that human lips can be found to speak, or hands to write it. It is, says Abbé Martin (p. 125), that the Eastern Churches are "almost all of them dead or dying for the last many centuries." Dying for the last many centuries! It is told, I think, of Fontenelle, that he was warned against coffee as a slow poison. "A very slow one," he replied; "I have drunk it through eighty years." Surely it is a poor, thin, transparent shift, which the dire necessities of exhausted polemics may rather account for than excuse. I shall attempt no reply except to say that the score of millions of those Christians, who inhabit the Turkish Empire, have for almost a corresponding tale of generations enjoyed the highest of all honors; they have been sufferers for their faith. They have been its martyrs and its confessors. They alone have continuously filled that character. Many a tender maid, at the threshold of her young life, has gladly met her doom, when the words that accepted Islam, the act that invested her with the yatchak, would have made her in a moment a free and honored member of a privileged, a dominant community. Ever since the Turkish hoof began to lay waste the Levant, those twenty millions have had before them, on the one side peace and freedom, on the other side

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

the gospel. They have chosen the gospel; and have paid the forfeit. And whatever be their faults and errors, it is not for us of the West, amidst our ease and prosperity, our abundant sins and scandals, to stigmatize them as professors of a dead or dying Christianity, and thus to disparage the most splendid and irrefragable, perhaps, of all the testimonies which man can render to the religion of the Cross. Of this deplorable plea I should confidently hope never to hear again, but that I believe none better can be found to serve its controversial purpose.

There may be many, who believe in the perpetuity of the Christian faith, and Christian society or Church, and therefore in its preservation in all necessary truth; and yet who, on the broad ground of rational interpretation of Scripture, would utterly deny, or resolutely question, the assumption that either the Roman pontiff, or any organ or organs of the Church whatever, have a guaranteed immunity from error. The life of the Church is one thing; its health, and the perfection of its health, surely are another. A promise of life to an individual does not exclude sickness: why should the promise of life to the Church? It is surely futile to reply that she cannot err, because immunity from error is essential to the perfect discharge of her duties. Here we have again the a priori doctrine, and rules of conduct laid down for one whose thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor his ways as our ways.* But the assumption is not only arbitrary; it is in straight contradiction to the whole constitution of things, under which we live. For in it every provision for the performance of duty, for the attainment of good, is marked with the imperfection thus haughtily refused. To this rule there is no exception. Even the very "creature," † the beautiful material world, is touched and streaked with it; lest perchance, if it had been faultless, it might suggest to us a claim for immunities that seem to have been advisedly withheld by the supreme wisdom.

But also this daring argument, which threatens, like Capaneus, to scale the gates and walls of heaven, is, after all, quite insufficient for its purpose. If we are to believe in the inerrability of a person, or a body of persons, because it is, forsooth, necessary for the full preservation of the truth, we must then also believe in all besides that can be shown to be needful for the perfect attainment of that end. Now, the conservation of all spiritual truth is not a mere operation of the intellect. It requires the faultless action of the perceiving power of the spirit. That is to say, it requires the exclusion of sin; and the man or body that is to be an infallible, must also be a sinless organ. I here deal, it will be observed, only with the argument a priori, which proclaims that infallibility must be true, because it is necessary for the perfect maintenance of truth and exclusion of error. If this be so, there is something else that is necessary for infallibility. It is necessary that the tainting, blinding, distorting power of sin should be shut out from the spiritual eye of the infallible judge. In a word, one-half of the claim is too glaringly at variance with the facts of every day to be prudently employed; yet it is requisite, in order to make good in reason the other half, which is only advanced with greater safety, because its detection depends upon long, and more complicated and disputable processes.

Another argument which has been recently brought into use, and has dealt a heavy blow to the old and revered motto of Semper eadem, has been that which may indeed be called Nunquam eadem; or, the doctrine of development. When Dr. Newman explained to the world that this was the instrument which had opened for him the way from his mother Church and university into the Roman communion, he felt the necessity of supplying tests, which might serve to distinguish a development from a corruption. Of these he enumerated no less than seven.* They were: —

1. Preservation of type or idea.
2. Continuity of principles.
2. Power of assimilation.
4. Early anticipation.
5. Logical sequence.
6. Preservative additions.
7. Chronic continuance.

Now I submit that these seven tests, imposing as they sound, are radically insufficient to guarantee a normal and healthy growth, which is, I apprehend, the only legitimate development; for they do not include either maintenance of the equilibrium of the system, or the due proportion of its parts. Certainly they afford a warrant against the removal of the old essence and the substitution of a new one; against

* Isaiah lv. 8.
† Rom. viii.

* Newman on Development of Doctrine, chap. i. London. 1845.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the transubstantiation, so to speak, of the Church. But they afford no more. Suppose a child to be born weaker in one leg than in the other, and suppose that weak leg to be bandaged up and never put to the ground. The child develops — that is, he grows up, though he grows up a cripple, with a shrunken limb. But the type or idea of a human body remains; the principle of its life is continuous; it assimilates, for it is nourished by food; the early anticipation was shown in the weakness of the limb; the logical sequence is the continuity of growth; the preservative additions which, on Dr. Newman's principles, must be accessories only, are found in his duly measured clothes; and the chronic duration is in the long life, to which such a person may, and often does, attain, like another of seemlier formation. But the equilibrium is gone, and he wants a crutch; the parts have lost their just proportion, and exhibit only the contrast of a strong side and a weak one. Now this, if I may presume so far, not unfairly describes the development of the Roman out of the apostolic Church. No doubt (as I for one believe) the Church began with a clergy; nay, began in a clergy. It had its centre of life, and of self-propagating power, in the apostolic college, which gradually called into being those orders that form the full equipment of the Christian ministry. I could not in candor deny that Holy Scripture assigns to St. Peter some kind of leadership or primacy. Thus far, and if this had been all, we have, I admit, the germ of an absolute hierarchy, capable of development into the full organism. But these principles of life were girt about on every side with limiting conditions, of an equally active kind. As between St. Peter and the apostles, by the independence of each upon every other individually, extending even to the power of remonstrance and rebuke, and by the superior authority of the apostolic college and the council of the Church. As between the ministry and its flocks, by their free admission to the Word of God without stint or limit; by the authorized, nay, commanded, exercise of their rational mind upon it; by their having some share in appointing to the ministerial office, for surely it was the cheirotony of the Acts that expanded into lay assent, perhaps lay patronage, in the subsequent history of the Church; by their actual participation in government, which I suppose might very well be developed out of the Council of Jerusalem; and finally by their paramount control over temporalities. I do not dispute the historical and huge development in the Latin Church of the first set of principles and powers. But what has become of the second? The access to the Divine Word of Scripture has, to say the least, been greatly narrowed. The duty to prove is replaced (see Abbé Martin) by the duty to submit. Not only are lay rights in regard to appointments fast passing into clerical hands, but presbyteral and episcopal rights are in course of rapid absorption into the will of one single supreme clergyman, the Roman pontiff. The last remnant of lay influence, from within the Church, over its government was effaced in principle and fact, by the exclusion of the representatives of States from the Council of the Vatican. Even of the care of temporalities the Church went far to relieve the people, when, besides the tithes and the voluntary offerings, it possessed before the Reformation from one-third to one-half the land of various countries. And at this day it is held to be vital by a party, that the pope ought also to be a king, in order that he may be temporally independent. The whole space, given for the growth of two sets of principles, has been monopolized by one. In the structure of the Church system, the original equilibrium has thus been wholly dislocated, and a new one devised, with a crutch. The proportion of parts is lost; the laity count but do not weigh; hardly a vestige of their ecclesiastical rights remains; that vestige is only in the form of patronage; and it is marked for early extinction.

It is, I think, clear that, for the purposes of popular influence as well as of controversy, the Roman Church derives vast practical advantage from the continuity of her traditions. She is like a State that has never undergone a revolution. I will not say she is like Russia, as compared with England: since I feel that the illustration is imperfect. For in a State, when evils become intolerable, a radical and violent change must come; inasmuch as to be in the State is, and is felt to be, a first necessity of life. In these times, there is no corresponding sense of a first necessity to be in a Church, that is, to be truly in it, as among its living and working members. So it is quite possible that, in lieu of the trouble, the pain, the agony, of a convulsive change, like revolution in a State, men in a Church may tacitly withdraw, and may pass, through a comprehensive but noiseless disobedience, into a dogmatic vacuum, if not into spiritual death.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Thus much it is right to allow; that traditions, unbroken by any shock of change, offer undoubtedly an imposing spectacle; but they supply no test of truth in religious controversy, any more than they supplied a test of health and safety in the France of 1788. It had unbroken traditions; but it was to come down with a crash in 1789. England, on the other hand, by deposing bad sovereigns, and extorting Magna Charta and the Triennial Bill and the Bill of Rights, in a series of revolutions, had won her way to a true stability of civil existence. A just parallel, a sound illustration, is to be found, as I think, in the pagan or Olympian system of the classic ages. From what original did that system draw its lineage? The abbé Martin will probably agree with me in believing that a primitive religion was given, as the Scriptures tell us, in the cradle of our race. It was not by the shock of religious revolution, by the violence of Luthers, and Zuingles, and Calvins, that this primitive religion was disnatured and deformed. Here and there we have indications of minute local conflicts between an old god and a new; but they were purely local. It was not by persecuting laws, by tribunals of inquisition, or by wars of religion, that the old monotheism was (so to speak) transelemented, and caricatured, into the gorgeous but gross and motley religion of the Greek and Italian peninsulas. It was by continually importing new matter, of a particular quality and bearing. And these were very "preservative additions;" insomuch that they supplied the most civilized part of man, through fifteen hundred years, with what, in "chronic continuance," served them for a religion.

But they gradually and slowly drew the system off its old axis, and pitched it on a new one; and so handled it, that at last it seemed to lose all features of religion considered as a discipline for man. It then no longer presented the first of the seven tests in the preservation of the type or idea. Let it not be supposed that I mean to insinuate such a charge against the Latin Church. The type or idea, that of redemption and renovation through our Lord and Saviour, is, I rejoice to think, still held with a marvellous consent by nearly the entire body, however broken up, of professing Christians. My argument is one a fortiori, and is this; that the plea of continuous traditions is of no binding force, because, as we see from the case of the Olympian system, this feature may subsist, and yet not merely corruption and debasement, but even possibly change of the type, and loss of the essence, may arrive.

Another imposing plea, the plea to which the Latin Church commonly owes what success she may achieve in making proselytes, is the great advantage, or, as it is sometimes put, the necessity, of certainty in religion, for the satisfaction and establishment of the soul. In this department of theology has been elaborated the doctrine of a "divine faith," the privilege of every Latin Christian, distinct, from the first, in its nature from even the most normal process and fullest ripeness of persuasion and conviction. Without doubt faith is distinct from knowledge, in things human as well as in things divine. But, over and above this, it is taught that faith is in essence different from the just appreciation of motives of credibility,* and a claim seems to be made for every Latin Christian of what is essentially a separate and specific revelation. Thus infallibility, on the one side, in the living voice of the Church, seems to be met by a divine certainty on the other in receiving it. No more ingenious scheme could be devised for shutting out that scrutiny of doctrine and ecclesiastical title, which is recommended to the members of all other religious communions, and inhibited to her own. But, when the interior parts of this machinery come to be examined, it is found to exhibit fatal flaws. For there are no infallible means provided for carrying the message from the infallible mouth to the person happily endowed with a gift of "divine certainty" for receiving it. The priest who instructs him is not infallible, nor is the bishop who overrules the priest, nor is the synod which outweighs the bishop. As to the priest, I need not enlarge. As to the bishop, in 1822 Bishop Baynes, a great authority, published his belief that no one in his communion, throughout England and Ireland, believed in the infallibility of the pope. As to synods, the national synod of Ireland, in 1810, declared that no Roman Catholic could be "required to believe or profess" that infallibility, and also declared this freedom to be "a part of the Roman Catholic religion." † Into what terrible pitfalls, then, may the Latin believer fall headlong unawares! for to day he may be assured by a synod, in the name of the entire Roman Church, that he cannot be required to

* Perrone, De Loc. Theol. iii. 1, 2, 137, 138: "Credit perinde ac si cerneret intuitu suo, immò magis." † Defence against Dr. Moysey, p. 230. Slater on Roman Catholic Tenets, pp. 14, 15.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

believe a proposition, and to-morrow a council, meeting at the Vatican, can lay on him that very obligation. What shock to certainty, comparable for a moment to this, has ever been imparted by any act done in the Anglican communion?

I do not wish to use any expression that can wound. But surely, in the sonorous pretensions of the Latin controversialists, there is a great deal of what in common affairs would be adjudged to be no better than "tall talk." The impression on my mind is, that it is no difficult matter to establish a very formidable and damaging indictment against any one of the portions of the Christian Church: damaging enough to excite, unsettle, terrify any one of its members, who does not resort to the unpalatable, but restorative, medicine of examining with an equal care such "wounds and bruises and putrefying sores" as may perhaps be detected in the community he is solicited to join. I fear that the restless and eager prosecution of the business of proselytism has often done irreparable mischief. First, in exposing the cause of belief to those cavils and scoffs, which it has provoked from men who do not believe. Secondly, and yet worse, in unsettling the foundations of that reverence, which every one ought to feel for the faith in which he has been reared, even as for the breasts at which he has first been fed. How often has it shaken the foundations of authority in the very first ordinance of God, the family! How often has it promoted a supposed orthodoxy of belief, to the neglect or to the detriment of those laws of conduct, the support of which is the work, and end, and the true and only renown, of orthodoxy! How often, in accepting the hasty process, often of an unformed and youthful mind, as a sufficient warrant for the tremendous operation of changing a religion, does it, by an unfelt but inevitable influence, impair the strength and sanctity of those bonds which, if sincerely entertained, a religion must as such have woven round the mind and heart! How apt is it to insinuate, "Unless you believe what I tell you, you have no warrant to believe at all!" How eagerly does it inculcate authority upon principles of rebellion, and obtain the surrender of mental freedom through the operation of unbridled mental license! I do not say that no man is to change a false religion for a true; or a less true religion for one with fuller truth; but that the change ought to be recognized for what it is, in fully developed minds, at the best a terrible convulsion, and at times such a rent in the spiritual life, as nothing can repair. Still less do I say that the spirit which our Lord once rebuked is confined to any sect or body: but I fear there is little doubt, upon a survey of the Christian world, which is its most favored seat.

In writing this paper I have obeyed, as far as I could, the injunctions of the abbé Martin, who deprecates dwelling on detail, and urges that "a great institution ought to be taken as a whole," judged "by its broad outlines," tested by its general results (pp. 127, 134). Anxious to avoid the sorer points of contact, I have avoided questions of morality; but he should know that we in England generally do not like the actual teaching of his Church as to the relative places given to particular sins and virtues. We fear that, in that teaching, a supreme law, the love of truth, comes off but second best; so that in the intercourse of life with his co-religionists, we rely a great deal more on the individual, than on the Church. I have taken little notice of his own observations as to details. It is no matter for wonder that his knowledge of things as they are with us, like ours of things as they are in France, should be but remote and inaccurate. Had he been a closer student of our history, he never could have said that there was no peace in the English Church, except when the State tightened the reins. The time of this tightening of the reins has usually been with us the time of the greatest disturbance. The State promoted a lethargic peace during the eighteenth century: not by tightening the reins, but by appointing Hanoverian bishops, who could not exercise a sharp control over a Jacobite clergy; and thus by loosening, not tightening discipline. Nor could he have said, that the Church worked worst in periods of vigor. Hardly any one denies the enormous increase of good wrought in our own time, amidst all its troubles and all its scandals. He sets out in much detail trivial causes, which he thinks prevent conversion. It seems only to occur to him by accident, and as he draws near a close, that his Ritualists abide in the Anglican Church because they believe it to be "a part of the true church of Jesus Christ" (p. 130). But if he is right, — and doubtless he is right, — in imputing to them this belief, how is it that he does not see how it supplies, until overthrown, — and he has done nothing to overthrow it, — the sufficient and conclusive answer to his question?

His courtesy and evident good-will inspire the wish that he knew more closely the state of religion in this non-Roman

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

world. He offers us a religion with "authority for its fundamental principle" (p. 132), but authority blended with "great kindness and condescension" (p. 127). The freedom which we think to be, by the ordinance of God, an inseparable law of our life, and condition of all its healthful energy, has thus tranquilly disappeared from the system of the abbé. What we want is not so much authority "blended with great kindness and condescension," as authority freely entertained and accepted by reason, met by it, and "blended" with it. Were he more familiar with us, he would see that in this country, conformably to its essential character, there exists no question as to the maintenance of religion without this freedom; the serious question is whether it is to be maintained with it, or not to be maintained at all. The liberal coquetry of Von Hartmann * with the Latin Church, as the only foe that negation can stoop to recognize, has, except as to individuals, little meaning for England. Yet there is here a great mass of positive belief, both within and without the Church of the nation. Among the Presbyterians of Scotland, and the Nonconformists of England, extremes of doctrine have been greatly mitigated; but theology is on the rise, and culture is held in increased esteem. No doubt the principles called Anglican, which have also greatly advanced in positiveness and in practical vitality, exhibit notable distinctions from the Protestant system, as it exists outside the Church of the land. But both this evangelical Protestantism, and the Anglican system, have crossed the oceans, and sprung up in the remotest portions of the earth, with vigorous organizations to sustain them, and with no small exhibition of expansive force in efforts to reclaim the heathen. Of the Church of England and her daughters beyond sea, it may with no gross immodesty be said,

> Tum, fortes latè ramos et brachia tendens
> Huc illuc, media ipsa ingentem sustinet umbram.†

There are Roman divines, who seem to boast of the disintegration of Protestantism. Yet I hardly understand how the candid mind, be it Roman or other, can fail to see that these two, which I have described, are great and powerful factors, for the present and for the future, in the composition and direction of the Christian world. They differ in their respective distances from the Church of Rome, in their conceptions of Church communion, of sacraments, of authority, and of Christian tradition. But both prize as an inestimable boon the power of free and universal access for all Christians to the written Word, the most powerful and pure of all instruments of human education; and that boon was obtained for both by the struggle of the sixteenth century. Both look, with a common anxiety, to the great issues that are now debated in every form, and in the hearing of every class and every person. Both look to the determination of those issues, as involving the alternative of the further advancement, or the eventual degeneracy, of man. For them the question of questions is, what modus vivendi, what terms of respective possession and reciprocal influence, can be established between the Christian revelation and the more and more restless, but also more and more awakened and busy, reason of man. The foundations of the great deep are indeed broken up; and men have to contend for the first beginnings, elements, and foundations of the truth. The specific idea of revelation; the limit of inspiration in the Divine Word; the relation between the past and the passing generation in the acceptance and delivery of truth, between the ancient expressions of it and the play of recent thought upon and around them, between the action of freedom in which our nature is grounded, and the reaction of authority, which is as much an essential of mental as of external life; the place of law in the visible creation, and of miracle in relation to experience; the nature and range of intercourse by prayer between the creature and the Creator; the rules by which the dubious conflicts of righteousness in this world shall work out into its final triumph, and the probation of the human being, oftentimes so narrow and inadequate, to our human view, shall usher him onwards to a definitive condition: these are some of the questions within the region of theism, to say nothing of those beyond it, which call importunately for the vindication or readjustment of old replies, or the construction of new ones. Nor do they call in vain. There is no acquiescence in the attempt to divorce morality from religion, or religion from theology. Though the contest be close and urgent, and all the more so from the respect due to so many of the assailants, there is no despondency as to the issue. But it is felt that the time has come, when discussion has to be substituted for anathema as the main instrument of defence. If the Latin

* Die Selbstzersetzung des Christenthum, p. xv.
† Virg. Georg. ii. 296.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Church will gird herself for that discussion, and show that she can surpass Anglicans and Nonconformists, Lutherans and Reformed, in vindicating the authority of religion, and establishing its harmony with the advised and persistent demands of the human reason, she may then only secure for herself the spolia opima of battle in the best of causes. She would thus, assuredly, do more to bring about the ultimate triumph of her own particular claim, than by wondering, while admitting, that all Protestants are not Rationalists, or that all Ritualists do not leave a Church, which is said at the same time, as a true Church, to command their allegiance (p. 130); and, as "the living embodiment of every high and holy thought, memory, purpose, hope," to warm their heart.

W. E. GLADSTONE.

A DOUBTING HEART.

BY MISS KEARY,

AUTHOR OF "CASTLE DALY," "OLDBURY," ETC.

CHAPTER XII.

ROSE-COLORED RIBBONS.

THE heroism with which Emmie had armed herself for her visit appeared at first to have been a little uncalled-for. The anticipated trials did not come, and the disagreeables that cropped up as the days passed on were so unlike those expected that Emmie actually did not discover them to be grievances till the time for bearing them was almost over. She would not be so inconsistent as to complain of being shut up in her aunt's room, out of the way of all but distant glimpses of the gaieties going on in other parts of the house, when she had lately told Katharine Moore that it was the being obliged to go into company that she dreaded. Yet it must be confessed that when the first strangeness of the great house and the many servants was over, such a longing for home would seize her, and send her, towards the close of a long afternoon, into such disgraceful fits of yawning, that she was frequently obliged to make her escape from the close, scented atmosphere of Lady Rivers's dressing-room and bring herself into wide-awake order again by peering over the balusters to the chief staircase, up which a group of afternoon callers would perhaps be ascending, in full view of Emmie's sleepy, disconsolate eyes.

It was very silly, she told herself, to feel disconsolate by about the end of the first week, and to wish, oh so vehemently, that a flight up stairs or down would bring her to Air Throne, or land her in the regions where she and Mary Anne were accustomed to hold discussions and work out experiments which gave the dinners and teas that resulted therefrom a better flavor than Aunt Rivers seemed to find in her dainty little meals. Yes, it was very weak-minded to grow homesick after such a short absence, when another week would bring her back to the old cares and to what she had been used to call the gloom of Saville Street. And with little news to impart to the others, for really, except during the moments of these stolen peeps on to the staircase, any one might come to the house without her being the wiser, even the one person who would come expecting to find Emmie West in the drawing-room, and who might possibly feel a little disappointed at her non-appearance.

One day while Emmie was looking over the balusters a stout, long-trained lady, with a dazzling bird of paradise in her bonnet, suddenly looked upwards, and so evidently saw something in the distant perspective of the winding staircase to arrest her attention that a tall young man who was following lifted up his face and saw too. Only the top of a retreating head Emmie hoped, for though the first glance had somehow fascinated her and kept her for quite a second staring down into the broad, smiling, good-humoredly inquisitive face that was turned up towards her, she had presence of mind to dart away before the younger pair of equally good-humored, inquisitive eyes had quite found her out. A sudden suspicion, turned into certainty by a moment's thought, shot through her and caused her to tingle all over. Yes, those were the Kirkmans: the mother and son whose names Aunt Rivers brought forward so constantly in her conversations with Emmie, and introduced even into those gossipy confidences with her nurse, which Alma used to frown upon.

The next day and the next at the same hour, Emmie cautiously peeped again, just long enough to see the glitter of the paradise feather nodding on the drawing-room landing. Then she retreated into the dressing-room, robbed, she felt, of even the poor dissipation of watching the stairs, and devoted herself for the rest of the afternoon to reading aloud to her aunt. Somewhat monotonously, it is to be feared, for her thoughts were all the while revolving round and round one point — the possi-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

bility, namely, that another caller might come to the house and be shown into the drawing-room while that keen-eyed young man and his smiling mother were talking to Alma. Through a whole chapter of a novel filled with the most thrilling incidents Emmie would continue to see mentally one series of little pictures only. A figure mounting the staircase — the drawing-room door thrown open — and then the change that would come on a certain person's face as soon as a glance into the room had made him aware of its occupants. Next she wondered how it would be if, instead of being shut up here, she were seated down there, say by the fireplace or in the window recess; would the new-comer, for want of something else to do, stroll up to her, and should she be able to say anything to soften the disgust and pain she could picture so surely on his face.

But it was only in the afternoons during the hours when afternoon tea and callers prevailed in the drawing-room that Emmie was guilty of monotonous reading aloud, or indeed of any other symptom of want of sympathy with the invalid who claimed her attention. On all other occasions she proved a most agreeable sick-room companion, and had only herself to thank; Lady Rivers found so much pleasure in her society that she could not bring herself to forego it even for an hour or two. It was sheer selfishness that caused her imprisonment, for Lady Rivers was too much engrossed just then with her own ailments to notice the unfashionable make of Emmie's winter dress. She only kept her shut up because such a listener as Emmie was too great a boon to be shared with any one who did not need the comfort of sympathy as much as she did.

It was something quite new to Lady Rivers to talk about her troubles to a person who looked up with interested instead of critical eyes, puzzled perhaps but still believing, and in spite of past prejudices, Emmie was such a person. Her nature was so essentially sympathetic that while Lady Rivers talked with her accustomed eloquence of complaint she could not help being mesmerized into an answering feeling of compassion. Possibly, after all, it was a worse state of things to live in a great, plentiful house, where everybody, from its master to the youngest of the servants, occupied themselves mainly in spiting and thwarting the mistress, in the fashion Aunt Rivers described, than like her mother to be struggling against the spite and thwarting that came from an empty purse only. Certainly her mother found less to say about her grievances and fewer people to feel bitter against. Poor Aunt Rivers!

And when Emmie tried her hand timidly at condolence, and brought forward, by way of tonic, stoical maxims learned from Katharine Moore, the conversations still flowed on amicably enough. Her velvety brown eyes quite melted with pity and sweetness as she spoke, and it never occurred to Lady Rivers that Emmie West could be recommending contempt of riches, or indifference to the good things of this world to her. In her own opinion she stood secure on an eminence of aristocracy that involved obligations of its own, and she could listen to moralities, applicable to persons whose inferior station in life laid a different order of duties on them, without the least stirring of conscience.

Contentment was no virtue for her, who had always found she could gain any point she set her heart upon by worrying long enough, though it might shine sweetly as a grace in people who mismanaged their family affairs as poor sister West had done. It was, however, gratifying to find virtue in its right place, and Lady Rivers would put out her white jewelled fingers, and reward Emmie's hesitating little sermon with a pat on her cheek, or a caressing touch of her hair, while Emmie wondered and glowed with gratitude, and felt almost as strangely distinguished as if she had seen the stone statue in the Square gardens come down from its pedestal, and hold out a welcoming hand.

"That child is really wonderfully pretty," Sir Francis remarked one day, after Emmie had left the room when he had come in and surprised one of those beaming looks of gratitude on her face. "I don't wonder at your keeping her hidden away here, my dear, if, like Madame de Sévigné, you hold to your reputation of mothering la plus jolie fille à marier in the market at present. You have never met Madame de Sévigné, you say, and don't know her daughter; that is your loss, my love, and perhaps also hers, for I think she would have written a very pleasant letter about you if she had had the luck to know you. No, she is not a person who has been putting notions into my head about Emmie West. I spoke simply from my own observation, and I am sorry that it differs from yours, for, proud as I am of Alma, my conscience will never let me say that her nose is as well-formed, or her complexion so good as her cousin's, now I have remarked the difference. However,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

as you find Emmie West's looks only tolerable, don't you think that you might allow her a little more liberty, and show your confidence in Alma's supremacy by venturing the other into the drawing-room sometimes? It would be only common humanity, and might be indulged in without much risk, I should think. Horace Kirkman is too far gone in infatuation for Alma's grey eyes to be disturbed by those pretty brown ones of Emmie's, unless I am much mistaken, and if he could be so disturbed, I think we might all survive his defection. Your suspense would be over, at all events, and you could betake yourself, with Alma, to the south of France, where Dr. Urquhart urges me to send you till the spring winds are over in England. You would be free to go then without being reproached by your maternal conscience for taking your daughter out of the way of a splendid match, to promote which you have, I am afraid, been perilling your life all the winter."

This remonstrance was, presumably, repeated afterwards in some less irritating form, and enforced by conjugal arguments, to which Lady Rivers succumbed; for the next morning Emmie found herself released from attendance; and had the agreeable choice offered her of accompanying her uncle in the carriage to his law court, and of visiting a circulating library on her way back to select a fresh supply of novels for her aunt's afternoon reading — dissipations not to be despised by a young person to whom a drive even in a street cab was a distinct pleasure, and who had, moreover, a hazy kind of interest in law courts, having given a few moments sometimes to wondering how "people" looked in wigs and gowns whose faces without the wigs had become a standard of pleasantness. Did it alter a person much — would a friendly face in a wig look old and dignified, and could one reasonably expect such an one to be just going in, or just coming out, of that legal temple before which Uncle Rivers's carriage would draw up? Might one even venture to shake hands with a friend in a wig, and explain to him how one was situated with respect to afternoon callers?

Sir Francis Rivers did not interrupt a careful reasoning out of these problems by any ill-advised attempts at conversation during the rapid progress of the brougham which conveyed himself and his niece through "miles of London." He had come out of the house and put himself into the carriage with that peculiar expression on his face, hair flying, eyes fixed, lips working without any corresponding sound proceeding from them, which had inspired Casabianca with the notion of drawing a likeness of his uncle, as "Johnny Head-in-Air," and through the hour's drive there might just as well have been a bundle of rags on the seat opposite him as Emmie West for any impression conveyed to his mind by her presence. No need to care how shabby one's hat and jacket were in a drive with Uncle Rivers. The cessation of the motion when the brougham drew up did not bring Sir Francis down from the clouds all at once. He seized a bundle of papers, threw himself out, and was bustling down a long passage, which Emmie searched with her eyes in vain, when something seemed to stop his course suddenly. He turned round and came back to the carriage, "Johnny Head-in-Air" no longer, but that other edition of Uncle Rivers, whose keen glance, critical or kind, seemed to go down to the bottom of one's mind, and read one's thoughts.

"My child," he said, "I have not given James any orders where to drive. You must tell him yourself where you would like to go. Now you are out for the morning, you will be disposed for a little shopping, no doubt. Girls always want to buy ribbons or something, and I dare say you forgot to bring your purse out with you. There, tuck that into your little glove, and say nothing about it to any one, but tell James to take you where you can spend it as you like."

He was gone quite to the end of the dark passage before Emmie had had presence of mind to smooth out the transparent bit of paper, whose crisp touch was so unfamiliar to her. It was actually a ten-pound note, and for the first moment or two, the almost awful sense of responsibility in having to deal with such a sum brought Emmie more fright than pleasure. Ribbons, indeed! What could Uncle Rivers be thinking about? Did he know what he was doing? or ought one to keep the note untouched, and remonstrate at dinner-time? A recollection of the half smile that played round his lips when he said, "Say nothing about it to any one," was answer enough to this scruple. Perhaps a habit of giving away ten-pound notes inadvertently was one of the peculiarities which Lady Rivers found so trying in her husband.

With this suspicion, Emmie felt a new responsibility laid on her, not to get her benefactor into trouble. It was, moreover, impossible to keep the stately James waiting for orders at the door of the carriage a

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

moment longer, and, on the spur of necessity, Emmie named a shop where Alma had, she knew, been making purchases the day before, and during the long drive her tumultuous thoughts had time to settle themselves into a brilliant kaleidoscope picture of delight; her very fears and scruples fitting in as white lights to heighten the colors.

Yes, yes; she had been told to spend all this money as she pleased, and she would do as she was bid, and for once supply the wants of the feminine side of the household at home with a liberal hand. Her mother's first, then Mildie's, then her own, and there might even remain, when all these were provided for, something over and above wherewith to buy that Christmas present for Mary Ann, which her mother had been so sorrowfully obliged to omit this year. Here was, indeed, a happy morning's work laid out. Yet the purchasing of her presents, when the time came for it — did not take so long as might have been expected. The wants to be supplied were not by any means fancy ones, and had been discussed between Emmie and her mother so often, that she had no difficulty in making up her mind what to buy. Just the very things they had talked of as needful, but impossible to come by, on many a long, rainy afternoon over their mending! Only, now that she had this money in hand of her very own, Emmie decided that the warm shawl for her mother should be softer and finer and of a prettier shade of grey than they had dared to dream of when they spoke of buying it some day, and that Mildie's new hat and her own might be chosen for once with more regard to what was becoming than to what was cheap — just for this once. The giving her home address as the destination of her purchases caused Emmie to color violently, and almost tremble in her shoes, for she could not help fancying the shopman looked surprised, as if he knew the house, and thought her lavishness something monstrous. She recovered her equanimity, however, in the satisfaction of choosing one or two pretty things for herself, such as had never been so much as spoken of in Saville Street, ribbons and gloves and bows for her hair, that were to accompany her back to Eccleston Square, and be worn on occasions when she might make them pretexts for a word, or at all events, a look of gratitude directed towards her kind uncle. He might notice her finery and give her one of his knowing smiles, or just as probably he might remain "Johnny-Head-in-Air" for all the rest of her visit. Anyhow, the interest of having a private understanding about her ribbons with Uncle Rivers, would remain the same. It would be something amusing to think about, and would make her feel more at home in the house, more like a person whose existence had been recognized outside the dressing-room, than she had felt hitherto. That was surely consequence enough to predict for a few yards of ribbon; but Emmie's purchases had a more important part to play than the one she anticipated, and before she had done with them they got twisted round two or three rather significant events, which gave a color to the remaining days of her visit not altogether their own couleur de rose.

The first link of this ribbon-chain was a natural one enough, and was woven under the very circumstances Emmie had foreseen, and on the evening of the important drive. As there chanced to be no guests at dinner that day, and as an old neighbor had unexpectedly come in to sit an hour with Lady Rivers, Emmie was invited to accompany Alma down-stairs, and had the pleasure of putting on her brightest set of ribbons, before she had possessed them many hours.

Sir Francis remained silent and unobserving all dinner-time; but when the dessert was put upon the table he woke up, or rather tumbled down from some region of speculation into his own dining-room, and catching sight of Emmie seated opposite, he twinkled a confidential look across the table at her. Emmie quite thought it was the rose-colored knots on her bosom and in her hair that attracted his attention and caused him to gaze on her approvingly for quite two minutes; but perhaps it was another sort of rose-bloom, deepening and deepening under his gaze, that had chiefly to do with the undoubted pleasure his kindly eyes expressed. To save herself from appearing conscious, Emmie tried to turn her attention to the business of choosing, from the fruit Alma offered to her, something that could not possibly have come from Golden Mount. On former occasions, when she had dined down-stairs, no one had noticed her curious preference for the least inviting fruits on the table; but to-day Sir Francis was watching her closely, and he exclaimed, at the result of her long deliberation, —

"What are you thinking of, child? Why, you have picked out the only pear in the dish that is not worth eating. Where are your eyes? Let me choose for you."

"No, thank you, uncle; I like the little pears best — I do, indeed!"

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

"Ah, you have never tasted a Golden Mount monster! It combines all the fruit-flavors in the world, from pineapples to strawberries. Come, pass the dish! I will pare one, and you shall divide it with me."

"No, thank you, uncle. Please, don't! I had rather not, indeed!" said Emmie, feeling that Alma was looking at her, and hardly knowing the amount of unnecessary earnestness and resolution she put into her second "indeed."

"Hallo! What's the matter?" cried Sir Francis, greatly amused. "Is it a fast-day? or is this some pretty little penance we have imposed on ourself, eh?"

"Yes, what is it, Emmie?" said Alma, in a low, slightly scornful voice, which somehow put Emmie on her mettle.

"I don't want to eat any of Mr. Kirkman's fruit, because ——"

"Well, my dear, go on; because — how has Mr. Kirkman been so unlucky as to offend you?" asked Sir Francis.

Emmie's courage was ebbing fast, so she stuck to her first beginning.

"Because it would be sharing the spoil, and I don't think one ought to do it."

"Emmie has got hold of some of the popular prejudices against Mr. Kirkman," observed Alma; "she does not of course know anything about him."

"I do," said Emmie, looking full into Alma's eyes; "I understand a great deal more than you think."

Alma's eyes fell under something she read in Emmie's; and Sir Francis, a good deal surprised, continued the conversation.

"I did not know you were a politician, or a political economist, my dear. You can't really know anything about Mr. Kirkman's ways of making money. I don't suppose you have ever heard a single fact of his life."

"I know one thing," said Emmie, her voice trembling between timidity and indignation. "Mamma, who knew him long ago, told me that when he was managing a mine in the neighborhood where she lived then, he used to pay the people who worked for him in goods instead of money, and that he cheated the women and children, by selling them bad food. I think these great pears and grapes of his that are made out of all those people's hunger, ought not to taste well to him, and I should not like to help him to eat them."

There was a moment's awful silence after Emmie had ended her eloquent speech. Alma picked up one of the big pears, which Sir Francis had half drawn out of the dish, and restored it carefully to its former position in the pyramid of which it had formed a part, and Sir Francis drummed with three fingers on the knuckles of his left hand, smiling all the time as if he was determined not to let himself be embarrassed by what a pink and white faced chit, like the one before him, could say, and yet had not a crushing answer ready.

"Ah, there is Horace Kirkman's knock at the front door," he said at last. "He takes it pretty much for granted that he is welcome to spend his evenings here — that young fellow. Emmie had better run up quickly to mamma, I think, for if she and Horace Kirkman meet while she is in this red-hot state, we shall have a new version of the battle between the 'doves and the cranes' enacted on the premises."

Emmie did not wait for a second permission to escape, but she felt very miserable as she untied her rose-colored ribbons in her own room before going to her aunt, to read aloud to her for the rest of the evening, while Alma played and sang in the drawing-room to Horace Kirkman.

Had she been very ungrateful? Had she taken more upon herself than she had any right to do? for, after all, what business was it of hers, if Alma chose to marry Horace Kirkman? Of one thing she felt certain — she had offended Alma, and must not expect anything but cold looks and distant words from her during the rest of her visit to Eccleston Square. For this she could not help grieving. Alma had shown her many little acts of kindness lately, and however hard she tried, Emmie could not live for ten days in the same house with her cousin, without falling so far under her fascination, as to care a great deal about the sort of looks she had from her. It was all the sweeter surprise, when quite late that evening, just as Emmie had taken the last pin out of her hair, there came a little tap at the door of her room, and Alma's face looked in.

"What! no fire?" she said, "and it is quite a cold night. How lazy of the housemaids! I must speak about it to-morrow. But my room is next door; bring your brush and comb there, and we will have a talk over my fire."

It was the first time that Alma had ever given such an invitation, and Emmie felt considerably flattered, especially when she found that the talk was to be a real tête-à-tête; for the maid had gone to relieve guard in Lady Rivers's room, and Alma was dealing with her own shining plaits herself, and looked as ready for a gossip

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

as ever did Christabel Moore when she stole down to Emmie's chilly little bedroom from the attics, in evening dishabille, for a specially confidential chat. This room of Alma's was something of a contrast to that other one, and Emmie felt wrapt in a dream of comfort and luxury, as she sat on a low stool by a blazing fire and watched the little streams of gold dropping through Alma's white fingers as she undid her braids and shook the rippling glory all about her. In this one respect, in spite of Sir Francis's disparagement, there was no comparison between the cousins. Emmie's soft, dusky hair was well enough, and made just the right setting for the perfect oval of her face; but Alma's hair was a distinct beauty in itself — its crisp, wilful waves and fitful lights and pale glooms seeming as full of individuality and character as everything else about her. Emmie took up and stroked a long coil of hair that had rippled down to where she sat, and said, "I wish Christabel Moore could see it."

"Christabel is the little pale one, who always gets behind her sister, is she not?" asked Alma indifferently.

"She is the artist," answered Emmie; "that is why I wish she could see you just now with your hair down."

It was the nearest approach to a compliment that Emmie had ever ventured on, and Alma, reading the sincerity with which it was offered in Emmie's admiring eyes, repaid it by asking a few questions about the Moores, hitherto a tabooed subject in Eccleston Square. She did not expect to be interested in hearing the history of her aunt's lodgers, but she was; her questions came quicker, and after one long answer from Emmie, Alma sat musing silently, quite forgetting to roll up the coils of hair she held in her hand.

"I could do that," she said at last, decidedly. "The kind of life you have described is not hard. I don't think I should object to toil, or even poverty, if I had got straight down to it once for all, and if there was nobody who had expected better things of me looking on to reproach and complain over me. Emmie, I don't know why I say this to you; I don't think that till to-night I minded very much what you might be thinking of me, but I feel now as if I must ask you, once for all, not to judge me hardly for anything you may hereafter hear of my doing — not very hardly. Unless you could stand exactly where I do, and feel all the influences round me, all the little threads pulling me, you can't judge fairly. You don't know how hard it is to resist what comes to one with the very air one breathes, or how often, when I think of doing some things, I wish for a hand to be stretched out strong enough to save me from myself — from that half of myself which everybody about me feeds while the other starves."

There was a short silence when Alma finished, for Emmie's breath was coming so quickly that she could not command her voice to speak at once, and besides, could she have understood rightly? Did Alma mean her to understand, and might she answer in the only words that her conscience would let her speak after such an appeal, though the very thought of speaking them brought a chill feeling as of a cold wind blowing through her heart.

"I think the hand is stretched out," she said at last, "but you won't see it. I — I wish you would. Alma, dear Alma, I wish you would."

Alma finished putting up her hair, and then she bent down and kissed Emmie between her eyes.

"You are all trembling and cold," she said. "Poor child, I ought not to keep you up late when you tire yourself out waiting on mamma all day. You are a good little thing, Emmie — a good little thing, and I am glad we know each other better now than we did before you stayed here; but your world is so different from mine, you must try not to judge me."

"Good-night, then," said Emmie, making a necklace of her arms so as to hold down Alma's face near her own till she had finished what she wanted to say; "I am only a little thing compared to you, but let me just tell you what Katharine Moore ——"

"No," cried Alma, smiling, "not what Katharine Moore says; I won't hear a word more of hers to-night. She is miles above me, and she knows nothing of me and my world."

"Then I will say something quite new to you," Emmie whispered; "something that I have never said to myself before. Whatever your world may be like, I don't think it will be worth living in if you let love slip out of it. Don't do that, Alma, for you can help it if you will."

"Can I? Good-night. It is actually striking twelve, and I cannot let you speak another word to-night," said Alma.

CHAPTER XIII.

MRS. KIRKMAN'S KISS.

EMMIE got up next morning with a strong impression on her mind that

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"silence was golden;" and she made several firm resolutions while she was dressing about the careful government of her tongue during the remaining portion of her visit to Eccleston Square. Only two days more now; surely she should be able to live through them without falling foul of any subject that would again force words from her lips such as she could not remember afterwards without agonies of shyness. She comforted herself with the assurance that there seemed every prospect of a quiet, uneventful time to be spent monotonously in Lady Rivers's dressing-room, for she found on leaving her room, that Alma had had a note from Constance, begging her to take the opportunity of Emmie's being with their mother to spend two days with her, and Sir Francis was sure to take himself out of the way in the evenings of Alma's absence.

The first day passed smoothly enough to put Emmie off her guard, but on the next, on the very last day of her visit, unexpected trials of temper assailed her, culminating towards evening in a great stress of circumstance that brought her face to face with a self she had not known before to be alive within her. For five strange, fire-lit minutes this new, unexpected Emmie West woke up, and, as it were, stood forth and spoke outside the childish, familiar one, and then, in a great silence that followed the outburst of speech, the new passionate self had to be taken back and shut up a prisoner under bonds that one hoped might not have to be broken ever again. But all this happened at the end of a long, trying day; such self-revelations, such comings-out of the kernel of the being to act irrespectively of old habits do not occur without a great deal of previous emotion to lead up to them.

The rose-colored ribbons again formed a link in the chain of small events that led to Emmie's second outburst of loquacity. Feeling the need of something to brighten her spirits, for Lady Rivers had been in a complaining temper all day, Emmie had adorned herself early in the afternoon with some shreds of her new finery, and Dr. Urquhart, who had lately taken to paying long afternoon visits in Eccleston Square, and indulging his patient with a good deal of conversation after his professional duties were ended, chanced once or twice, in a semi-absent way, to fix his eyes while he was talking on the bright ribbon that fastened her dark hair, being puzzled perhaps to account for such an appearance on her head. Either this circumstance, or something unusual in his manner when he took leave of Emmie, put a sudden new thought into Lady Rivers's mind, which interested her so much as to make her forego the just anger she might have felt against her physician for having eyes for any one but herself while visiting her. She magnanimously put this offence aside in her eagerness to follow out her discovery, and she experienced quite a glow of good-humor in consequence of her self-conquest.

"Urquhart," she began meditatively, as soon as the door had closed behind the doctor. "Urquhart! that is a Scotch name, and a good one, I fancy. Do you happen to know, Emmie, whether these Urquharts of yours are related to Sir Colin Urquhart, of Glen Urst? Your uncle spent a day once with Sir Colin when we were in Scotland, and I would take an opportunity of mentioning the circumstance to Dr. Graham Urquhart if I thought it would do any good."

"What good could it do?" said Emmie, looking puzzled. "I believe Sir Colin Urquhart is what Mrs. Urquhart calls a far-away cousin of theirs; but why should Dr. Urquhart care to know that Uncle Rivers has visited him?"

"My dear child, you don't understand these matters, and your poor mother is of course out of the way of thinking of them. It does not signify, however, as you have, fortunately, some one to take a little care for you when the right time comes. Long before then my mind will be quite free from all my present cares." And Lady Rivers took a pause of thought, and then continued, more to herself than to Emmie, "But no, I am not glad to hear of Dr. Urquhart's connection with the baronet, the owner of Glen Urst, a splendid place, I can tell you, Emmie. Scotch people think a great deal about family when they happen to have it, and unfortunately your father's bankruptcy was made so public, and now your poor mother's miserably ill-judged step of letting lodgings; even our connection would hardly outweigh that with Scotch people; but"—raising her voice and looking at her niece again—"never mind, Emmie, you have pleased me very much since you came here, and I never mean to let you slip quite away from us again. We shall be a great deal together by-and-by, no doubt. When Alma is married she will be so sought after and so much engaged in society, that I, like an unselfish mother as I am, shall have to make up my mind to see very little of her; and then I shall lay claim to you, my dear,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

altogether. You will live here almost entirely, I daresay, by-and-by, and I shall have many little plans and schemes for you too. You will see, my dear."

Emmie's cheeks were blazing by this time, and she now rose from her seat and stood full in front of Lady Rivers's sofa, looking at her with something in her eyes that almost took away her aunt's breath.

"I hope you will never make any plans for me, Aunt Rivers," she said. "I don't like it. I am sorry you made plans for Alma, and I hope you never will for me; and I don't mean almost to live with you by-and-by, for I am wanted at home; and I had rather stay there, whatever may have happened to make people ashamed of us. The Urquharts are not ashamed of us; they are good friends of mamma's and mine, and we don't want them to be anything else. I hope you will never speak like that of them again, Aunt Rivers, or I can't come and nurse you next time that you send for me."

"My dear, what are you thinking about? sit down, you startled me," said Lady Rivers, who was actually too much cowed by the indignation in Emmie's face, to be all at once as angry as contradiction usually made her; "you are misunderstanding me, I'm sure, and you must not look at me in that way, when I am thinking of nothing but how to be kind to you. I wonder you have the heart. There, you see, you have quite shaken me, and I must have my drops again, or I shall not be able to settle comfortably, or get a wink of sleep the whole evening."

Emmie found and administered the drops, and then resumed her seat by the sofa; but though she said no more, there was still something in her face and manner which so roused Lady Rivers's instinct of self-justification, that she could not give the drops a fair chance of composing her, but felt obliged to launch out into fresh expostulations.

"You ought not to be so independent, Emmie; you ought not, indeed. A girl, with four brothers and a sister, all utterly without prospects, and with a mother in weak health, to say nothing of a father who has twice failed in business — not very creditably — a girl in such circumstances as these should be very humble and thankful to any one who speaks of holding out a hand to smooth her way in life. She should not have too much confidence in herself. Good looks are not everything, no, nor the power of winning favor, either, if she chances to have that. Why, even Alma has not found everything to her mind; she could tell you, if she pleased, how possible it is to be deceived and disappointed in people who appear at one time to be devoted to you. Whatever your uncle may choose to say, there is no one equal to Alma. I don't say it's impossible to have more beauty, but I do say that I never saw any one who had such charming ways, or who made people get so fond of her; yet even Alma has not met in one quarter with the treatment she had a right to expect. You may well look surprised, my dear; but I am telling you this for a lesson, and also to show you that if I do seem a little over-anxious about my dear Alma's prospects, it is not without provocation. I am not a schemer; with such daughters as mine I have had no occasion to scheme; but I naturally could not sit still quietly under the idea that Alma had been neglected. Happily that trouble is over now, and as things are turning out I am more than satisfied. We can look on the old disappointment as a great escape now, for even if Mr. Anstice had behaved as he ought, and avoided quarrelling with his uncle, he would never have been as good a match as Horace Kirkman, and I should never have liked him half as well."

"But Alma — but Alma herself?" said Emmie, in a breathless whisper.

"Alma is convinced that a girl may very well be mistaken in choosing for herself; and that it would be mere perversity in her to go on preferring a person who has once failed her."

"Does Alma think he failed," said Emmie, still in a half whisper; "does she call that failing?"

"My dear, you know nothing about it," answered Lady Rivers, a little impatiently. "A man of the world should know well enough that he has no right to aspire to a girl like Alma, unless he has something suitable to offer her, and if he wilfully throws away all his fine prospect for the sake of crotchets and scruples, that half the world don't understand, what can one think of his affection for her? A girl of spirit cannot possibly permit herself to be so treated."

"But if she knew he loved her all the time," persisted Emmie, "and that he hoped she would understand him, and like him the better for standing up for what was right, even at the risk of not getting her at once, then — oh, Aunt Rivers, do you suppose Alma does not know that?"

"You are talking great nonsense, I think, Emmie, and growing quite excited again. What is the use of my taking drops if you look at me in that startling way, and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

touch me with such a hot, trembling hand. I don't understand you at all to-night, and I wish I had never begun to talk to you. What can you know about Alma and Wynyard Anstice more than I have told you? How can you possibly form an opinion on the subject? — an ignorant child who has never been anywhere."

"I am sorry I touched you with a hot hand," said Emmie, no longer in a whisper, but in a tone cold enough to heal the burning touch of her fingers; "and I am sorry we began to talk, since it has disturbed you so much, Aunt Rivers. Perhaps I had better leave you for a little while, and send Ward to give you your afternoon tea."

"Yes, indeed, I think you had better go away, for you have not managed me at all well this afternoon, I must say, Emmie. Your uncle would have been quite surprised if he had heard the tone in which you spoke to me just now, and would have had less to say for the future about your sweetness of temper. However, you tell me you are sorry, and as I never take offence, I shall say no more about it, but allow you to come and read to me after I have had my tea, as usual, and you may give me a kiss before you go, if you like. You had better go down into the drawing-room, I think. I did say I would see Mrs. Kirkman, if she called to-day, but I hardly feel equal to the exertion now. Mrs. Kirkman's voice, and her musk, and the rustle she makes with her dress in moving about are very overpowering when one is not feeling strong. I should like you to speak to her for me, Emmie, and to tell her that I am sorry I cannot see her, and that Alma will certainly be back to-morrow in time to keep her engagement for the flower-show. Now, don't forget that part of the message, Emmie; and speak it as pleasantly as you can. There is no saying what good might not follow to your brothers, if Mrs. Kirkman were to take a fancy to you; and instead of looking proud and vexed, you ought to be grateful to me for giving you the chance of making a favorable impression on such an influential person."

Emmie gave the kiss required, with more reluctance than she had ever felt in bestowing a kiss, since long-past nursery days, when the servants in Saville Street had been wont to remark that Miss Emmie had a pride and a will of her own for all her sweet looks. Then she betook herself to the drawing-room, hoping in that ample space to walk off the excitement that was making her heart beat so quickly and her cheek burn. She hoped devoutly that Mrs. Kirkman would not come just yet, not till she was in a fit state to meet her with the dignity and distance with which such an antagonist ought to be encountered. Her brothers, indeed! As if Harry and Casabianca were of the sort to need that their sister should curry favor with any one on their behalf. No, it would not do to think of that. Emmie's steps quickened and quickened, keeping pace with the rush of indignant feeling, till even the long drawing-room seemed a confined space to walk up and down in. Yet the thoughts that were waiting behind these surface ones were more agitating still — Alma — Mr. Anstice — that hint about Dr. Urquhart, which seemed to Emmie just then a cruel attempt to rob her of the one consoling spot in her life by bringing bitterness and confusion into the very land of Beulah itself.

She left off pacing the room at last, finding it did her no good, and went and stood in the window recess between two great pyramids of rare exotics in pots, that had been sent from the Golden Mount conservatories the day before, and were filling every corner of the drawing-room with their strong, spicy odors. It was raining out of doors a very deluge of rain, but even when standing quite close to the well-fitting double windows Emmie could only faintly catch the sound of the sweeping wind and rushing tempest, under which the trees in the Square garden were bending their black heads; while the foot passengers on the pavement below cowered and fled to the nearest shelter. Outside in the storm seemed better to Emmie just then than inside among the flowers; and the contrast between within and without struck her with a curious, angry pain. She looked round the room: there on the piano was Alma's music lying scattered about, the songs she had sung two evenings ago to Horace Kirkman; here were the flowers breathing themselves out, as it seemed, to Emmie, in silent payment for those songs, and for the smiles that went with them. A confusion of thoughts whirled up into her brain, till she could almost have believed that the trumpet-shaped blossoms hanging round her changed themselves into veritable brazen trumpets, and were blaring out harsh sounds that summoned her, and her brothers, and all the world to come and bow down before the great Kirkman image of gold that Aunt Rivers had set up. Yet even this fantastic picture did not present itself coherently, for it seemed to Emmie

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

now that the trumpet-flowers had changed their note, and were calling on her to pass through a burning fiery furnace to save Alma from having to bow down. Gradually, however, her thoughts steadied, the flower-trumpets left off singing and swinging, and Emmie discovered a word, a sentence that remained clear in her mind when all the seething anger and the fancies had drawn themselves away: "Mr. Anstice ought to know, even if you have to tell him yourself; he ought to know the danger, and that Alma sometimes, if only sometimes, wishes to be saved from it." This was what conscience said at the end of all.

During the thickest of her fancies, Emmie had heard, without noticing, the stopping of a carriage before the front door; but now in the calm that had followed, the voice of her old enemy James announcing Mrs. Kirkman reached her understanding quite distinctly. It brought her out of her recess her ordinary self again, excepting only that she drew up her head a little higher than usual to encounter the entering visitor, and offered her hand without any appearance of shyness.

Mrs. Kirkman was somewhat surprised at the cold, dignified air with which Lady Rivers's message was delivered to her, but not being a person apt to take offence, it did not occur to her to be the least in the world quelled by it. She would have been quite ready to patronize one of Fra Angelico's angels if he had stepped alive towards her out of a picture, psaltery in hand, and to order him tickets for a concert or a dinner at the huge palace Mr. Kirkman had built at Kensington Park Gate, if it had occurred to her, from the scantiness of his tunic, that his purse was scantily filled. His angelic beauty and his airs of heaven would have had nothing awful about them for her.

"My dear, let me sit down," she said, "and then I can listen comfortably to what you have to say to me. The stairs in this house are rather steep compared to ours, which Mr. Kirkman had made on purpose to suit me, and my breath is just a little short. There! — I have untied my bonnet strings, and — yes, here is my fan — now I know you won't mind sitting down opposite me, and telling me exactly how my friend Lady Rivers is to-day. I have a right to be anxious; and Alma has told me who you are, and all about your making such a nice, quiet companion to your aunt while she is sick. You won't mind answering a few questions, will you, my dear?"

Emmie felt that she might just as well throw a bucket of water up at the sun, with a view of extinguishing its light at midday, as attempt to put out the radiant complacency of that large, motherly face by any frosts of reserve within her command. She had to give in without any show of resistance, and to submit to the squeezing of a fat hand laid over hers to emphasize the questioner's anxiety or relief at the information she elicited by a series of close inquiries such as Emmie could not imagine she would ever have ventured to put to Alma.

"You see I am so glad to have an opportunity of getting the truth from some one," Mrs. Kirkman remarked, after an interval of fanning. "Mr. Kirkman was getting fidgetty. He's a man that don't like to hear of sickness or death coming in to put back arrangements that he's set his mind upon. He ain't been used to it, for things always do seem to fall out as he wishes; and if by chance anything of the kind happens to hinder his plans, he's apt to get impatient, and fly off one don't know where. I would not say this before your cousin, but you will understand, my dear, why a serious illness of Lady Rivers would be a great inconvenience, and worse than an inconvenience to us just now. Oh, yes, I see you are quick enough to guess that it is not only of Mr. Kirkman I'm thinking; there's some one else who would dislike even more than he to be shut out from this house by anything untoward happening. You look a little surprised, my dear, at my speaking so plainly" (for Emmie had, in fact, raised her eyebrows with an expression that even Mrs. Kirkman could not quite overlook); "but I am a very frank, talkative person, and everybody who has to do with me must take me as I am; and though perhaps you mayn't know it, my dear Miss West, matters have gone so far between Eccleston Square and Kensington Park Gate that you and I may as well begin to look upon each other as relations at once. I hope you have not any objection, for I have not. I never had but one child — my Horace — who was from the first too sturdy a fellow to put up with much mother's petting; and I've always longed to get pretty young-girl things like you about me to make much of."

The full-blown, smiling face had got alarmingly near by this time. Emmie felt the warm, puffy breath on her cheek, and the paradise feather nodding into her eyes. She could not put up her hand and push it away, that would be too naughty and childish, however vehemently she might

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

wish such a course of action were possible. She could not even openly shrink, for it was a motherly face after all; she could only drop her chin an inch or so to save her pouting, quivering lips, and receive the sounding salute, when it came, in the middle of her forehead.

"There," said Mrs. Kirkman, laughing, and holding out both hands, "you'll know me again, my dear, when we meet next. Help me up from my seat, for I must be going; and I ain't as active as I used to be twenty years ago. I don't mind confessing it to you, but four sumptuous meals such as Mr. Kirkman will have put on the table every day at Kensington Park Gate ain't quite the thing for me, not being exactly what I was brought up to. Why, what a color I have given you! And it was only an old woman's kiss, after all — not deserving of such a pretty blush as that to come after it. You must take this fan of mine to cool your cheeks; it came from Paris only yesterday, and maybe you'll find more use for it than I shall. What! you say you had rather not take it? My dear Miss West, but you must. I'm not one to be said 'No' to. That's something I've learned of my husband; and seeing how well it has answered with him, I hold to the lesson. Besides, you need not be so shy; it's a pretty toy, I daresay, but I've a dozen others at home, and I really want you to keep this as a token that we are to be fast friends by-and-by, when —— Well, as you shake your head, and don't seem to like me to say when, I won't finish my sentence, but leave it as a crow to be plucked between us on some gala day, when perhaps you'll be glad enough to escape with only my kisses; Mr. Kirkman not being the man to let off such a pretty bridesmaid as you'll make without giving him his due at his son's wedding."

Mrs. Kirkman had talked herself nearly to the door, and Emmie was following with a vain hope of being allowed to thrust the fan back into her hand at the last moment; when James's voice, announcing another guest, was heard close behind them, "Mr. Anstice."

It came like a thunderclap on Emmie, just because, ten minutes ago, she had been planning how she would act, and what she would say, if such an unlikely circumstance as Mr. Anstice's appearance on this, her last afternoon, should fall out. Oh, why had fate taken her so cruelly at her word, and put the task she was dreading upon her so soon, before she had well had time to summon up resolution for it? She quite forgot her anxiety about the fan, and flitted back into the middle of the room before she took any notice of Mr. Anstice's entrance, feeling that the first necessity was to put as great a space as possible between herself and Mrs. Kirkman, and put an end to those dreadful innuendoes of which (terrible thought) he might possibly have overheard a word or two.

In a moment the drawing-room door shut behind Mrs. Kirkman, and then, before Emmie had settled it with herself that most likely he had not heard, she felt, rather than saw, for she dared not look up, that Mr. Anstice had brought a chair near to the sofa, on which she had seated herself, and was beginning to talk to her. Wynyard was surprised to find that her shyness continued after the first few moments, when he had tried his very best to put her at ease with him, by talking of Saville Street, and making flattering allusions to Katharine Moore, and to that discussion in Air Throne to which he had been made welcome. He grew quite concerned at her downcast looks and her silence. He was always very much at home with her himself, and had a tender, half-playful, half-affectionate feeling towards her — such as he might have felt towards a young sister, if fate had been so kind as to bestow such a treasure on him — a feeling full of repose and sweetness, without any of the excitement that Alma's presence brought. He thought he should very much like to make Emmie look up at him just now, and to comfort her if there was anything really amiss. It never occurred to him that the cause of her trouble could possibly react on him in any way, or be any concern of his.

"What is the matter?" he said at last, when there had been quite a moment's silence. "I don't think you listened to what I told you just now of my having met Casabianca in the street this morning, and I have a more important anecdote about him in store which I cannot possibly bring out unless you will look up and seem interested. Come, now, did we not make a bargain to tell each other of our grievances in this house? If you will begin, I will go on. Mine are quite serious, I assure you, and yours I am convinced cannot go beyond James and Casabianca's silver tray, for I gathered from Miss Rivers, when I called last week, that the whole household is at your feet since you came to stay here. Won't you look up and tell me?"

He was not at all prepared for the real pain in Emmie's eyes when she did look up.

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

"That lady who left the room as you came in," she began abruptly, "was Mrs. Kirkman. She has been sitting here, talking to me for a long time."

"Well," he said, a little puzzled, "she is a very good-natured person, is she not? I met her the other night at a conversazione, and she did not frighten me. I was even a little relieved, I think, to find her so big. It gives a reason for the Brobdignagian palace they have built at Kensington Park Gate that reconciles one to it a little. She has not done anything very bad to you, I hope."

"She gave me a kiss," said Emmie, her lip quivering so piteously as she spoke, that the words came out with difficulty, and she had to pause to bring them into order for something else that was to follow.

Wynyard felt tempted to laugh for one second, the contrast between Emmie's extreme agitation, and the cause assigned to it struck him as so comical. Then all at once his very heart stood still, for a thought came like a flash of lightning, warning him of a blow that he must call up all his courage to meet manfully.

"You have something else to tell me," he asked slowly; "I should like to hear it at once if you don't mind."

"She said," Emmie went on, looking away and trying hard to empty her voice of significance; "she said she kissed me because we, she and I, were likely to be relations soon."

"And she meant ——"

"Her son and — and ——"

"Miss Rivers! Well, I did not think it would be that; not anything quite so bad as that."

The words were spoken so quietly that Emmie looked up relieved for a moment, and then she could not remove her pitying, remorseful eyes from the face (always a mirror of feeling), which told a great deal too plainly of the stress of the blow she had dealt. It was dreadful to see the pain, the look of death upon it. She felt like a murderess, as if she had really plunged a dagger into a living heart, and was watching the life-blood flow out. How was she to bring out the words, to which this information was meant only to lead up? There was no use in speaking them just now; he could not take them in till this life and death struggle was over.

It really lasted only for a second or two under her eyes. The instant Wynyard recovered himself enough to know that she was looking at him, he sprang up and moved away; her soft, pitying gaze seeming to carry a sting of agony with it just then. In a minute or two, he thought, this live pain with which he was struggling for very existence, as it seemed, would be a dead one, dead with how much else of his very soul extinguished with it. He strolled to the piano where Alma had played to him on the evening when he had resolved to take up again the hope of winning her, and saw some music lying about with Horace Kirkman's name written on it in a bold hand. That sent him further away still to the window recess where he stood for some minutes among the flowers, inhaling their strong perfume without knowing at the time what the impression on his senses was, although similar odors remained hateful to him to his dying day, and always brought back something of the horror of confusion and pain he suffered then. It was not the loss of Alma only that was such a blow to him. He had, at least, believed himself to be prepared for that, ever since the change in his worldly prospects had altered their relations to each other, though there had never been any taking back of old admissions of preference by Alma herself. He had often thought of losing all future right in her, but this way of losing seemed to involve a great deal more than the actual loss in the future. It was a shattering of all the thoughts of her that dated from the first bright dawning of imaginative love in his boyhood when she had summed up perfection to him; a making all the past as empty as it seemed the coming years were to be. Alma and Horace Kirkman! He knew a little of Horace Kirkman, not one bad thing that could be said to stamp him as unworthy, but just a number of very small things which to Wynyard's mind revealed the man's character plainly enough: boastful speeches, little meannesses as the reverse side of ostentatious lavishness, a coarse word or two in an overheard conversation, showing, he thought, a nature that the Alma of his dreams would have shrunk from instinctively. How could his recollection of her stand out pure and clear by the side of this other utterly distasteful image? And Wynyard knew all the time that these were only first thoughts born of his own selfish pain. The pity for her, the longing to save her from what he knew would be misery in the end, the remorse for this first harsh judgment of her, the struggle to put her back in her supreme place, and worship the fallen idol as devoutly as ever, would all have to be gone through in their turn — long, long vistas of pain.

He was just rousing himself to the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

thought of where he was, and to the necessity of getting away from a place where he was liable at any moment to encounter Alma herself, when he felt a timid touch on his arm, hardly a touch — it was more like the flutter of a little bird's wing hovering near; and looking round he saw Emmie standing by his side.

"I am going out of the room now," she said. "I would have gone before but — but — before I go I want to tell you why I repeated Mrs. Kirkman's words to you just now. I thought you ought to know — because ——"

"You were quite right," said Wynyard gently, "and I thank you for it."

"Because," continued Emmie, who could only go straight on, and felt she should be lost if the prepared words were to slip from her, "because, though Mrs. Kirkman and Aunt Rivers say it is to be so — as I told you — Alma herself speaks differently. It was one night when she and I were sitting together alone; but" — she paused almost frightened at the change, the sudden, eager hopefulness that sprang into his face; "do you think I ought to repeat to you what Alma said to me alone?"

"You need not, thank you," said Wynyard, recovering himself after a struggle that had prevented words. "I understand enough to thank you with all my heart for caring enough for me — for her — to say what you have said, for giving me so much hope and trusting me so far. It may not make any difference, I think, now that I should have tried what remonstrance could do without it; but perhaps that is only because you have brought me back to life again. You said you were going, but I will go. I have intruded on you a great deal longer than I intended."

He had got to the door, leaving Emmie still standing among the flowers, when he turned suddenly and came back again. The color had returned into his face, and the dawning of a smile was making it look itself again. "I want you to come away from among Mr. Kirkman's flowers," he said, "for I think there is something poisonous about them, and I'm sure you don't like them any better than I do. And there is another thing I want. I want you to promise me never to blame yourself for what you said to-day; for your kindness to me, whatever comes of it, you must not."

In the midst of his own pain it had occurred to him, with that instinctive reading of a woman's heart only a very high-minded man is capable of, that she would perhaps recall that touch on his arm, those pitying looks she had given him; and when the excitement of the occasion was over, suffer pangs of wounded reserve and pride on their account, and he wanted to save her from self-blame if he could.

"You must promise not to regret anything you have said this afternoon," he persisted.

"I will try," said Emmie, reading the kindness in his face, and feeling grateful, though her heart died under it like a weight.

Then he went, and she walked straight to the fireplace, and seated herself on the same low stool where Alma sat to read Agatha's letter on the evening of Constance's wedding-day. No idle tears, however, came to her to relieve her pain. She knew quite well that she had not time to cry. Aunt Rivers would ring her bell in a minute to summon her to give an account of Mrs. Kirkman's visit, and Emmie thought she had almost rather put out her eyes than let Aunt Rivers see them swollen with crying to-day. She pressed her fingers tightly over the dry, aching balls, and set her will to the task of seizing, and, as it were, repressing within the old bounds this strange, new self that had to-day performed feats, and spoken words she must not so much as think about again for a long, long time. To-morrow she should be at home, making tea for the boys at this hour in the little schoolroom, and having the prospect before her of discussing the weekly bills with Mary Ann in the course of the evening. Surely she should be quite herself again under that pressure, and need never let thoughts of what had happened here rise up to trouble her. Emmie's short experience of life had already taught her more self-control than she was usually credited with by those who only observed the sympathetic expression of her face. The victory over her agitation was quickly won, and when the bell summoned her she was ready to take into her aunt's room a face in which Lady Rivers was not able to detect any disturbance.

"So," she said, when Emmie had answered all her questions, "Mr. Anstice has been calling here again, has he? It is strange how slow some people are in finding out where they are not welcome. He must have seen the Kirkmans' carriage at the door, and Mrs. Kirkman herself. I wonder what he thought about it! Well, he will have to know the truth sooner or later, and it had better not be till all is quite satisfactorily settled, for I would not have Alma's mind disturbed just now for worlds. I think I shall write to Mr. Anstice myself then, a nice, sympathetic little

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

note, for after all he was very useful to Frank, and behaved particularly well when poor dear Melville got into that unlucky scrape at Oxford. I don't forget all that; but if I let him have early news of the engagement, and write to him myself, I don't see that he will have any right to consider himself ill used. He can't possibly be so selfish as to wish to stand between Alma and such a match as Horace Kirkman. He must surely see that he has nothing to offer comparable to that."

What Mrs. Kirkman, on her side, thought of Mr. Anstice, she was at that moment expounding to her son, whom she had come across at the corner of a neighboring square, and taken into the carriage during its transit across Hyde Park.

"Quite a high young man, and very handsome," she was saying. "I don't know how he comes to be calling so often at No. 17; but it strikes me that he looks very much at home in that house. He is not a relation of the Riverses, I know that, and though Miss Rivers and he were talking very intimately about old times and old friends one day when I came in, and found them together, I observed that she never called him anything but Mr. Anstice."

"Anstice," returned Horace crossly. "I know the man; a barrister and scribbler in the papers, and those who know him best, say that, clever as he is, he will never get very far, for he has a knack of always taking up the least workable side of every question. Christian socialism, temperance, I don't know what; notions that would drive my father wild, and cannot, I should think, go down any better with Sir Francis. I don't understand your being so particularly taken with his looks, mother!"

"Well, there's a something, but mind, Horace, I don't mean 'airs' when I say 'high.' It's a something I've never been able to put my finger upon yet. Money won't give it, nor yet education, for you've had the very best of that, you know. It's done a great deal for you, and put you in a better place than your father and me, as far as society goes, though, to be sure, you'll never be such a man as your father, but it has not given you quite the look and way with you that I've noticed in a few tiptop people, and though this Mr. Anstice mayn't have a penny to bless himself with, he's got that. I don't want to make you uneasy, Horace. I'm only telling you just what I see, and explaining why I think that if I were you I would try to get something settled in a certain quarter before very long. Your father hates a thing to be long in hand, and would like to see you engaged to-morrow, and married by the end of the month if it could be done, and we know well enough what Sir Francis's and Lady Rivers's wishes are. It's only the young lady herself."

"Only," cried Horace, turning away his head, and looking out of the window.

"Well, I never knew you backward in asking for anything you wanted before, my boy."

"Perhaps I never wanted anything before so much as this," returned the young man, to whom love was already giving more effective lessons in humility, the root of good manners, than his various teachers through a long and expensive education had been able to instil.

"Your father thought he was asking for a good deal when he came for me," said Mrs. Kirkman, smiling, and putting a big hand on her son's shoulder, "for I was his master's daughter, and had plenty of suitors after me. Shall I tell you what I had been thinking for a good while before he spoke? there now — that he was not quite the man I had taken him for at first, or he would not have waited so long. He found me ready enough, and though, as I said before, you aren't your father, you're his son, and Kirkmans have generally got what they really set their minds upon ever since I have known anything of the family. Miss Rivers left word that she should not fail to be at home in time to go with us to the Botanical Gardens to-morrow afternoon, and you have only to give me a look or a squeeze of the foot at any minute, and I will manage to keep out of the way."

"I sha'n't give you a look or a squeeze of the foot, you may be satisfied, mother," said Horace. "I could not do it to command in that fashion, and yet, perhaps, you are right about the time, and I wish with all my heart that it were well over. But here we are at Kensington Park Gate, and there is my father's brougham at the door before us."

This conversation was one of the consequences that resulted from Emmie's hour in the drawing-room at Eccleston Square. A second result came to Alma in the form of a letter by the eight o'clock evening post on the following day while Emmie was making tea for the children in the back sitting-room at home, and wondering as she listened to the latest anecdotes and most recent Saville Street witticisms as retailed by Mildie and Casabianca, why her fortnight's absence should have stretched such a gulf between her and

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

these once absorbing topics. When the note was brought to her, Alma was alone in the drawing-room, waiting till she could make up her mind to go to her mother's room, where she was due, and make an announcement to her which it was doubtless also her mother's due to hear, before the event that had to be communicated was another hour old. Alma was trying to make herself believe that she looked forward to the caresses and praises which might be expected to follow her news. She ought to be glad to know that in a minute or two more she would bring so much satisfaction, such happiness to her mother. She ought not to shrink from the triumphant jubilee there would be made over her. It was the reward she had to look to, and reasonably she should be in a hurry to taste it. Just then the letter was brought to her, and she took it and held it in her hand, looking at it by the firelight stupidly as one does look at a well-known handwriting that one has not seen for a long time. How familiar it was, and how strange! Dreading what there might be inside the letter, Alma gave herself five minutes in which to recall the pictures that the look of those characters on the envelope brought back to her. Her schoolroom exercise books, when she was thirteen or fourteen, which had had many pages in a handwriting only a little less formed than that. Pages scribbled off in some great press of schoolroom business to secure her being able to join some boating or nutting excursion for which the others had gone off to prepare without thinking of her troubles. How exhilarating the run down to the river, hand in hand, used to be when the task was done! How happy one dared be without thinking of consequences in those days! And again the letters that had come day by day, when Frank had been taken ill with small-pox abroad, and only one member of the reading party to which he belonged had dared to stay in the infected spot to nurse him, and write the bulletins that had brought at first such dismay, and then relief and thankfulness. Alma remembered the position on the pages of these letters where sentences had occurred, which had first made her know that she was in the writer's mind, while he penned them, that he was thinking of her anxiety more than of any other person's, that it was to herself rather than to Frank the devotion was paid. Yes, and it was a look she had seen on her mother's face, while reading one of the letters, that had confirmed her own impression, and permitted her to carry it as a treasure in her heart through all those anxious days. With this recollection, Alma did what she knew she must never do again, scarcely remember henceforth from this evening; she lifted the envelope to her face, and laid her lips on the writing for an instant. It was a good-bye, only that, a good-bye to the poetry, to the romance of her life. Henceforth there would be solid substance for her — plenty of that. Was not Moloch the god of riches, and did not people in old times drop their children through his outstretched brazen hands into the consuming fire beneath that was his heart? Was it so much to drop one's fancies, one's aspirations, the first flower-like feelings of one's heart, through those hands to be burnt up? Surely they would burn without more wailing and demonstration of grief than the trumpets and shawms playing in the Valley of Tophet would drown. Then Alma broke open the seal of the letter, and read: —

"My dear Alma, — I shall address you in the old style once more, whether I have a right to do so or not; for it is only while recalling old privileges, old unrevoked admissions of yours that I feel I have any claim to speak as I am going to speak now. Of course a word from you would silence me forever, but I recollect that I have never had that word. Your mother made me understand some time ago that the change in my worldly prospects after my uncle's death must be held to put an end to the hopes she well knew I had long cherished, and not without her sanction, respecting yourself. She was very angry, and I was very much astonished, for I did not know before that it was the supposed heir of my uncle's money, and not Wynyard Anstice, who was welcomed to your home. I tried hard to nourish resentment and to believe it could kill love, but you delivered me from that delusion on the evening when we talked together over Agatha's profession, and you once more condescended to let me see yourself as you are when the world lets you alone. Since then I have permitted myself to hope again, and this is my hope, that you will let your heart speak to you apart from other considerations and fears. I am the same as I was in the days when you looked kindly on me, when you let me see the dawn of what I believed was to be the crown and glory of my life — your preference for me. I love you as much more now than then, as a man who has struggled and suffered something can love, more

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

than a boy who is beginning to love, and the love of then and now is one unbroken, undying growth. I have proved to myself and can prove to your father and you that as far as considerations of prudence go, I am fit to be trusted with the care of your future. I cannot, it is true, now offer you the riches you might have elsewhere, but besides the love, of which I shall not trust myself to speak much at present, I can promise you something more than the proverbial dinner of herbs. I do not think it likely that I shall ever make a great fortune, but I have health and resolution and aptitude for my own sort of work, and I have been successful in a moderate way so far. I have confidence in your father that he would not oppose your wishes if only they were heartily enlisted on my side. Question them, dearest Alma, straitly to-night. I am not pleading selfishly. I would not, or at least I think I would not have you if you could be — I don't say more prosperous, — but happier, more blessed with any one else, only I don't believe there breathes a man who could love you as I could. With that tremendous boast I must end. In spite of it, heaven knows I am humble enough, fearful enough, and as well aware as I can be of what it is I am asking you to do. If your heart stirs towards me, if it is only a little, give it time to speak. I will wait indefinitely, for I fear nothing so much as a hasty verdict. Yours, as I have always been since I first knew you,

"WYNYARD ANSTICE."

Nearly an hour passed after Alma finished reading, before she betook herself to her mother's room, and as it was then past nine o'clock, she found Lady Rivers, as might indeed have been expected, in a very plaintive state on the score of having been left to her own company for such a length of time.

"I have been coughing all the evening, and I have wanted my drops since Ward left me," she began, directly Alma entered. "I miss poor little Emmie West sadly, and I did think you would have made a point of coming to sit with me and read me to sleep on the first evening of my being alone, especially as, so far as I can make out, there has been nothing to keep you down-stairs. Ward said that a letter had been taken in to you, but you left the Kirkmans only just before you dressed for dinner, so it cannot have been anything of importance!"

"The letter was nothing you would care to hear about, mamma," answered Alma. "But let me sit down near you on the bed, dear mother. I am sorry that your cough has been troublesome, and that I was not here to give you your drops when Ward went down to her supper, especially as I have something to tell you now that we are alone."

"My darling Alma!" cried Lady Rivers, stretching out her arms.

"Yes, mamma," said Alma, without however bending her head an inch from the stately height at which she held it, "it is that — Mr. Horace Kirkman spoke to me this afternoon while we were walking in the gardens, and ——"

"Alma, be quick, child! What is the matter? You accepted him, of course?"

"I did not refuse him, mother. Yes, I suppose it was a virtual acceptance; they are sure to interpret it so; but I asked that we might have a little more time to know each other before my acceptance was considered quite final and made known beyond our two families. I felt this to be fair to him, mother, as well as to myself. When he understands the nature of my feelings a little better, he may not be satisfied, and if I am to sell myself, at all events I should like it to be an honest bargain."

"Alma, do you want to kill me by saying such unkind things, just when we ought to be so happy and thankful? Sold! what can you mean? Horace Kirkman is sincerely attached to you, in fact, absolutely devoted to you. However rich he had been I should not, you know, have wished you to marry one who was not that."

"I believe he is that, mamma."

"And your father thinks well of him, and he is enormously rich, one of the best matches in England just now. Lady Amhurst told Constance only last week that Horace Kirkman might have chosen his wife from almost any of the noble families in England where there are many daughters."

"I wonder he did not."

"He fell in love with you, Alma, directly he was introduced to you, and will not hear of marrying any one else. Mrs. Kirkman told me this so long ago as when we went to Golden Mount for Christmas. Oh, Alma! you ought to think yourself a lucky girl — you ought to be thankful!"

"Let us begin then, mamma," said Alma; "let us be very happy about it. I reckoned a great deal on satisfying you."

"But the delay, the risk, — I don't like that part. Why could you not have put an end to all anxiety by accepting him outright to-day? It would only have been what the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Kirkmans will consider his due, and you would have been in a better position with the old people than you will ever be after this hesitation. I too should have been at rest, and could have got well then."

"I did what I could, mamma," said Alma, the tears rising in her eyes; "you must not press me any further; indeed I thought of you, and hoped you would be happy."

Lady Rivers stretched out her arms again, and again took them back empty.

"You talk of my being happy," she said plaintively, "but it is my children's happiness I want after all — nothing but that — and I can't help having my own views about what will be best for them, Alma, when I have such an example of the miseries of poverty before my eyes forever, as your poor aunt West shows us all. It may have made me over anxious, a little pressing, perhaps, but you ought not to resent it; you should consider how natural it is that I should dread the same wretchedness for my own children that I see in my poor sister. If you, Alma, were to come down to letting lodgings, I should turn in my grave, I think, if I had been dead twenty years."

"You will bring the cough back, I am afraid, mamma," said Alma, "if you talk so excitedly. I had better read a few verses to you, as Emmie used to do, to compose you, and then I will say good-night, leaving the rest of our talk till to-morrow morning when we shall both be calmer."

Alma hurriedly took up the first book that came to hand as she spoke, a Bible from which Emmie West, continuing home habits, had been used to read a chapter or a Psalm to her aunt before leaving for the night; and she opened it haphazard, meaning to read the first sentence or two on which her eye fell. "And the rich man lifted up his eyes being in torments, and saw Lazarus afar off." Alma turned the page quickly. She must not read that as a sedative to her mother's dread of post-mortem anxiety. To put her in mind that things might look so differently in her grave as to make poverty no longer the supreme terror, would hardly conduce to her sleep just now. Apparently Emmie West had greater skill in finding composing passages than Alma, for somehow, as she turned page after page in search of a calming sentence, she thought that the whole book was written through and through with warnings and exhortations against worldliness and the love of riches; such warnings as would be a mere blow in the face when spoken by her lips to her mother that night. After five minutes' search she laid the book down in despair.

"After all I think I had better ring for Ward to come and read you to sleep," she said; "she is not a good reader, but you say the sound of her voice makes you drowsy, and I am sure the sooner you sleep and the less you think to-night the better it will be for you." Then Alma got up from the bed and after ringing the bell wished her mother good-night and left the room.

"Without one kiss to her mother on the day when she had engaged herself to be married," Lady Rivers reflected bitterly, chewing the cud of sad thoughts as she lay waiting for Ward, who was enjoying a cheerful gossip with James down-stairs over the symptoms of coming change, death, and marriage, in the household. She lay regretting Emmie West, and recalling little anecdotes that had come out in Emmie's talks about her home, which suggested a very different state of things between her and her mother. Lady Rivers could not possibly be capable of envying a person who let lodgings, and yet, all through a sleepless night when she tried to comfort herself by picturing the splendors of Alma's marriage, her thoughts perpetually strayed away from the fascinating theme to wonder how Emmie would look and speak, and what sort of fondling and caressing there would be between the mother and the daughter, when she came to tell poor sister West of some marriage engagement that certainly would not, like Alma's, claim a sentence to itself in all the morning papers.

From Blackwood's Magazine.

THE TROUBLES OF A SCOTS TRAVELLER.

If the reader be neither an ignorant fool nor a proud knave; if he be neither a villain, a ruffian, a momus, a carper, a critic, a buffoon, a stupid ass, nor a gnawing worm, he may read with amusement the travels * of one of the most adventurous spirits that Scotland ever sent forth; but if he be any of these, then the traveller, who is his own biographer, bids him go hang himself. With rare modesty, he tells us in his prologue how he knows his

* A most dilectable and true discourse of an admired and painefull peregrination from Scotland to the most famous kingdomes in Europe, Asia, and Africa, etc., etc. By William Lithgow. London: Printed by Nicolas Oakes, dwelling in Fetter Lane. 1623.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

history will, to the wise, be welcome; to the profound historian yield knowledge, contemplation, and direction; and to the understanding gentleman insight, instruction, and recreation. Having thus taken criticism by the horns, he shows how, in his opinion, his talents as a traveller and writer should be appreciated, by publishing, immediately after his prologue, some verses by three of his friends, one of whom tells him that his work,

> In subject, frame, in method, phrase, and style,
> May match the most unmatchèd in this isle.

Our autobiographer then proceeds to develop one of the most marvellous stories of adventure ever told; in which, though the fabulous in history is strangely mingled with the true in travel, we may without much difficulty dissever the fables due to the ignorance of the time from the real and striking adventures of the hero of the tale. And if to have > by the great providence of God, escaped infinite dangers; by sea, suffering thrice shipwrecks; by land, in woods, and on mountains, often invaded; by ravenous beasts, crawling and venomous worms, daily encumbered; by home-bred robbers, and remote savages, five times stripped to the skin; excessive fatigues, unspeakable adversities, parching heats, scorching drought, intolerable distresses of hunger, imprisonments, and cold:

if all this endured is not sufficient, at least the sufferings of the dungeon and the rack at the hands of the Spanish Inquisition have so rarely found a narrator in the person of one who has undergone them, that our indomitable traveller can scarcely be denied an exceptional claim to our attention.

Who or what William Lithgow was by birth he does not himself tell us; nor has his origin been handed down to posterity. We know that he was a Scotsman, born in Lanark; and he must have been possessed of considerable means; for although he describes his journeyings as having been traced over by his "painful feet," yet he never seems to have been without money for his wants. He tells us that in the stripling age of his youth, he made two voyages to the Orkney and Shetland Isles, and thereafter surveyed all Germany, Bohemia, Helvetia, and the Low Countries from end to end, before visiting Paris, where he remained ten months. His Scots associates in Paris were men of good family; and when he left that city on the 7th March 1609, among those who escorted him a short distance on his way, he names "Monsieur Hay of Smithfield, now esquire of his Majesty's body-guards." From Paris he went to Rome; "committing his feet to the hard bruising way," and apparently now, as in all his subsequent journeys, by choice travelling as a pedestrian. In Rome he seems to have found only one good thing, the lachrymæ Christi. "I drew so hard," he says, "at that same weeping wine, till I found my purse began to weep also; and if time had not prevented the sweetness of such tears, I had been left for all the last a miserable mourner." But of all else in Rome his abuse knows no stint; for he is in the very heart of the "snarling crew of snakish Papists," against whom he is never tired of railing. In no unmeasured terms he expresses his opinion of the abominations of Rome, and it is probable that he spoke out more freely than was palatable there; for he relates how the streets and gates were watched for him, and how he was hidden by a compatriot for three days in the palace of the old Earl of Tyrone, escaping on the fourth midnight by leaping the walls. Throughout Lithgow's book we are constantly meeting the most violent tirades against the Papists; and the mixture of fanatical religious zeal with a thorough enjoyment of a broad joke and a love of good living, constitutes one great charm of the narrative. He was not at all above enjoying his journey from Rome to the Chapel of our Lady of Lorretto with two gentlemen of Rome, and the two "vermilion nymphs" who accompanied them, who, "to let me understand they travelled with a cheerful stomach, would often run races, skipping like wanton lambs on grassy mountains, and quenching their follies in a sea of unquenchable fantasies;" but his scorn of them for pulling off their shoes and stockings to enter the "ten thousand times polluted chapel" is of the strongest; and the event gives him theme for a long dissertation upon idolatry, and for a couplet which, we think, stands unrivalled even amongst the many bad verses sprinkled throughout the narrative: —

> To Lorett people haunt with naked feet,
> Whom religion moves with love's fervent sp'rit.

Accompanied by a friend, Lithgow now proceeded to Venice, landing just in time to find a grey friar burning at St. Mark's Pillar, and to see "the half of his body and right arm fall flatlings in the fire." The story of the friar's offence will scarcely bear repetition here; but it so tickled the fancy of our travellers that, before they either ate, drank, or took their lodging,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

they went to visit the monastery whence "the lady prioress and the rest of her voluptuous crew," who had shared in the friar's iniquities, had been banished. The description of the customs of Venice is most curious; and one sentence reads somewhat painfully to us Britons of the present day: "The Venetians, howsoever of old they have been great warriors, they are now more desirous to keep than enlarge their dominions; and that by presents of money, rather than by the sword of true valor." A few years later the crows were flocking to the carcass of the enfeebled republic, bloated with money, and having lost the prestige which had made it unrivalled in the world. For one thing Venice was particularly welcome to our traveller. "I commend," he writes, "the devotion of Venice and Genoa beyond all the other cities in Italy; for the Venetians have banished the Jesuits out of their territories and islands, and the Genoese have abandoned the society of Jews, and driven them from their jurisdiction." At Venice, too, as at Rome, the Jews were made to wear red-and-yellow hats for notice' sake, to distinguish them from others; "which necessary custom, would to God, were enjoined to all the Papists here in England, so should we easily discern them from the true Christians."

To Venice, after some travels in Lombardy, and three months spent in learning Italian at Padua, Lithgow returned; and thence, after having waited twenty-four days for a passage, he at last embarked for the Dalmatian coast. The master had no compass to direct his course, neither was he expert in navigation, so it is no wonder that they made another port than the one for which they had sailed; but at last they reached Zara, strongly garrisoned by Venetian soldiery, and into which no infidel was allowed to enter, unless after giving up his weapons at the gate. From Zara, in an open boat manned by five Sclavonian mariners, who sometimes rowed and sometimes sailed, Lesina was reached, where the governor of the island accompanied Lithgow to see a wonderful monster, surpassing either the Siamese twins or the two-headed nightingale, "for below the middle part there was but one body, and above the middle there was two living souls, each one separated from another with several members." The child or children's father, who is described as "that sorrowful man," informed them that when the one slept the other awaked, which was a strange disagreement in nature. After a chase by a barbarian man-of-war of Tunis, carrying two tier of ordinance and two hundred men, and having been saved only by night's darkness, our traveller reached Ragusa, then a republic, paying tribute both to the Turks and to the Venetians; where he noted the curious proof of the semi-European, semi-oriental character of the place in the method of wearing the hair; "the most part of the civil magistrates having but half of the head bare, but the vulgar sort being all shaven, like the Turks." Corfu was next visited, and the singular precaution taken for the safety of its two fortresses is described.

> Lest by the instigation of the one captain, the other should commit any treasonable effect, the governors of castles, at their election before the senators of Venice, are sworn neither privately nor openly to have mutual conference, nor to write to one another for two years, which is the space of their government.

The Grecian carmoesalo, in which, with forty-seven fellow-passengers, Greeks, Sclavonians, Italians, Armenians, and Jews, our traveller next embarked for Zante, sighted, when off Cephalonia, a Turkish galley making straight to assail her. The affrighted master sought counsel of his fellow-passengers, most of whom, being confident their friends would pay their ransom, counselled rather to surrender than to fight. But our wandering pilgrim pondering in his pensive breast his solitary estate, the distance of his country and his friends, could conceive no hope of deliverance from slavery. Whereupon he "absolutely arose," and bade the master prepare his two pieces of ordnance, his muskets, powder, lead, and half-pikes, encourage his passengers, and promise his mariners double wages — "for who knoweth but the Lord may deliver us from the thraldom of these infidels?" This counsel taken, and preparations having been made to make combat below rather than on deck "both to save them from small shot, and besides for boarding them on a sudden," the doors having been fastened down, every one in his station, and the Almighty having been invoked, the combat began.

> In a furious spleen, the first hola of their courtesies was the progress of a martial conflict, thundering forth a terrible noise of galley-roaring pieces; and we, in a sad reply, sent out a back-sounding echo of fiery flying shot, which made an equivox to the clouds, rebounding backwards in our perturbed breasts the ambiguous sounds of fear and hope.

Night parted the combatants, a tempest separated them; and the brave vessel,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

leaking heavily, put into the Bay of Largastolo (Argostoli) Cephalonia. Three Italians, two Greeks, and two Jews had been killed, eleven others wounded, and our adventurous Lithgow hurt in the right arm. The survivors gave thanks to the Lord for their unexpected safety, buried the dead Christians in a Greekish churchyard, and interred the Jews by the seaside.

From Cephalonia to Zante, which gives rise to the following burst of moral indignation against the English love of plum-puddings. The immense sum made by the traffic in currants — more than £80,000 yearly — having been named, it is called a rent or sum of money which these silly islanders could never afford, if it were not for some liquorish lips here in England of late, who, forsooth, can hardly digest bread, pasties, broth, and (verbi gratiâ) bag-puddings without these currents. And as these rascal Greeks, becoming proud of late with this lavish expense, contemn justly this sensual prodigality, I have heard them often demand the English, in a filthy derision, what they did with such liquorish stuff, and if they carried them home to feed their swine and hogs withal. A question indeed worthy of such a female traffic; the inference of which I suspend: there is no other nation, save this, thus addicted to that miserable isle.

We must pass over the journey with a Greek caravan across the Morea from Patras to Athens, and the reflections to which it gives birth, and hasten on by way of Cerigo to Crete, where new and striking adventures befell the traveller at the very outset of his journey. Having landed at Grabusa, he started to walk to Canea, much against the advice of the governor of the fort.

Scarcely was I advanced twelve miles on my way, when I was beset on the skirt of a rocky mountain with three Greek murdering renegadoes, and an Italian bandido; who laying hands on me, beat me most cruelly, robbed me of my clothes, and stripped me naked, threatening me with many grievous speeches.

At last the Italian, to whom he had spoken in his own tongue, having searched his clothes and budgeto, and found no money except eighty bagantines, scarcely two groats English — for he had knowingly "put his money in exchange" before leaving Grabusa — came across his letters of recommendation from divers princes of Christendom, amongst others from the duke of Venice. These moved the Italian to compassion, and he induced the other brigands to give him back his pilgrim's clothes and his letters; but they kept his blue gown and his bagantines, giving him a stamped piece of clay as a token to show any of their companions whom he might meet on the road. But his troubles were not over. "Leaving them with many counterfeit thanks," he travelled that day thirty-seven miles, and at night attained to the unhappy village of Pickehorno, where he could have neither meat, drink, lodging, nor any refreshment for his wearied body. The people crowded round him with desperate looks. A pitiful woman told him he was likely to be killed; so he stole forth in the dark night, and lay down till morning in a cave by the seaside, "with a fearful heart, a crazed body, a thirsty stomach, and a hungry belly."

But the adventurous spirit still sought fresh adventure. Safely arrived at Canea, which was carefully guarded by seven companies of soldiers of the Venetian republic, Lithgow must needs mix himself up in the affairs of another, and so get into new trouble. The story is such a curious example of the conditions of the time as to be worth relating at some length. During Lithgow's stay at Canea, six Venetian galleys arrived, on one of which was a young French Protestant gentleman, who had been condemned to the galleys for life for having taken part in a brawl in which a Venetian nobleman had been killed. He was allowed by the captain of the galley to come ashore, carrying an iron bolt on his leg and in charge of a keeper; and his tears and account of the persecution to which, as a Protestant, he was subject, so moved Lithgow's sympathetic and anti-Papal spirit, that he resolved to deliver him. The difficulty was to get rid of the keeper; but Lithgow invited him to the wine, "where, after tractal discourses, and deep draughts of Leatic, reason failing, sleep overcame his senses." Then Lithgow clad the Frenchman in an old gown and a black veil that he had borrowed from his laundress, and took him out into the fields, whence he directed him to a Greek convent, known as "the Monastery of Refuge," where he would be detained till the men-of-war arrived from Malta — it being a custom of the Maltese vessels returning from the Levant to touch here to carry away refugees. On his road back to the town, Lithgow met two English soldiers — John Smith and Thomas Hargrave — who had come to warn him that the officers of the galleys were searching for him. They advised him to enter by the eastern gate, which was guarded that day by three other English soldiers and eight French soldiers; and these all accompanied him as an escort to the Ital-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ian monastery, where he lodged. Four officers and six galley-soldiers tried to seize him; but the English and French drew their swords and resisted, mortally wounding two of the officers of the galleys, while Lithgow ran off with John Smith to the monastery, where he remained under safeguard of the cloister until the galleys were gone, when he started to make a tour of the island.

His descriptions of people and of things in Crete are most amusing. He gravely accepts the cave pointed out to him as the labyrinth of Dædalus; he computes that Mount Ida is six miles in height; but he scorns "the darkness of cloudy inventions" in such fables as that if a woman in Crete bite a man anything hard, he will not recover, or that if a certain herb is chewed, hunger shall not be felt for four-and-twenty hours. He notes, with a sharp incisive touch, the dress, the manners, and the habits of the men; and attributes the light conduct of the women to "the nature of the soil and climate." His return to Canea was marked by another kindness on the part of his friend Smith, the English soldier. One night, when Lithgow was at supper in a sutler's, Smith came, with three Italian soldiers, to warn him that there was an Englishman named Wolson in the town, who said that his elder brother had been killed at Burntisland, in Scotland, by one called Keere; and that, notwithstanding Keere had been beheaded, Wolson had sworn to kill the first Scotsman he met; and having heard of Lithgow being in the place, he had resolved to stab him, as he went home that night, asking the English soldiers to help him. Smith, Hargrave, and Horsperld had refused, but Cook and Rollands had yielded. However, Smith and the Italians safely conducted Lithgow to his bed, and Wolson, finding that his design was discovered, and probably being an arrant coward, fled from Canea. It was not long before Lithgow was able cheaply to reward Smith for his kindness on these two occasions. Smith had enlisted at Venice as a soldier for Crete, "where, when transported, he found his captain's promise and performance different, which forced him at the beginning to borrow a little money off his lieutenant." At the end of five years, Smith, unable to discharge his debt, was handed over by his captain to the captain who relieved him, and who paid the old captain his money, and the same again at the end of a second five years. Thus Smith, who was anxious to regain his liberty, was now completing his fifteenth year of bondage. Lithgow paid his debt, got leave for him to depart, and embarked him in a Flemish ship, whose master was one John Allan of Glasgow. The debt for which he had served fifteen years was forty-eight shillings.

In spite of his hatred of the priests, Lithgow had not disdained to live in a monastery at Canea; and he admits that, had it not been for his desire to continue his voyage, he would gladly have stayed longer, "in regard of their great cheer and deep draughts of Malvoise, received hourly, and often against my will." There were four friars, only one of whom was a mass-priest, and he was "so free of his stomach to receive in strong liquor, that, for the space of twenty days of my being there, I never saw him, nor any one of the other three, truly sober." This was the life of the monastery. "Every night after supper the friars forced me to dance with them, either one gagliard or another. Their music in the end was sound drunkenness, and their syncope turned to spew up all; and their bed converted to a board or else the hard floor; for these beastly swine were nightly so full that they had never power to go to their own chambers, but where they fell there they lay till morn."

From Crete Lithgow cruised among the islands of the Levant, taking passage in such small boats as he could find. Stormbound for sixteen days at Angusa, he lived in a little Greek chapel, even cooking his food there, and sleeping in the sanctuary; shipwrecked on the island of Scio, and living "for three days without either meat or drink," in a cave, but saving his coffino, with his papers and linen therein; rescued on the fourth day by fishermen; again chased by Turkish galliots off Negroponte, and compelled by the untoward Greeks to stand sentinel every night for six nights on the top of a high promontory near the inlet where the boat took shelter, it being the time of a snowy and frosty winter, — he never lost heart, but in his night watchings composed some of those execrable verses which he considers the most perfect poetry, and in which he thus makes his will: —

To thee, sweet Scotland, first,
My birth and breath I leave;
To heaven my soul, my heart King James,
My corpse to lie in grave.

My staff to pilgrims I,
And pen to poets send;
My haircloth robe, and half-spent goods
To wandering wights I lend.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From the hands of the Greek crew who detained his budgeto, and made him act as permanent sentry, he was saved by two exiled Venetian gentlemen, who belabored the captain of the ship, and presented Lithgow with forty sequins of gold. He next went to Salonica, then the great university for the Jews, where he says "they speak vulgarly and maternally the Hebrew tongue, man, woman, and child, and not elsewhere in the world." Thence to Tenedos, to the plains of Troy, and to Constantinople, where he received a welcome, which is not without its moral in the present day.

> Bidding farewell to the Turks who had kindly used me three days, in our passage from the Castles, the master of the boat saying "Adio Christiano," there were four French runagates standing on the quay, who, hearing these words, fell desperately upon me, blaspheming the name of Jesus, and throwing me to the ground, beat me most cruelly; and if it had not been for my friendly Turks, who leaped out of their boat, and relieved me, I had there doubtless perished. The other infidels standing by said, "Behold, what a Saviour thou hast, when these that were Christians, now turned Mohammetans, cannot abide nor regard the name of thy God!"

His wounds having been anointed in a Greek lodging, where he was kindly received, and where all recompense was refused, Lithgow paid his respects to Sir Thomas Glover, the British ambassador, and was entertained by him for three months in his house, where at the same time was staying the duke of Moldavia, who had been deprived of his principalities, and whom, when all the other ambassadors had refused to entertain him, Sir Thomas Glover took in, furnishing him with money and other necessaries of his condition. No higher character could be given than that which Lithgow awards to this English ambassador. "He relieved more slaves from the galleys, paid their ransoms, and sent them home freely to their Christian stations, and kept a better house than any ambassador did that ever lay at Constantinople, or ever shall, to the world's end."

Our object being to trace the personal adventures of our hero, we can devote no space to his interesting accounts of the Turkish customs and religion, or to his quaint account of Mahomet, and of his imposing upon "the old Trot," as he calls the prophet's first wife. We must pass on to his next voyage; when, embarking in the spring, he sailed in the "Allathya" of London from Constantinople to Smyrna in twelve days; thence along the coast of Asia Minor to Rhodes in a Turkish coasting vessel; and then, another twelve days' voyage, to Cyprus. Here, on his return to Famagusta from a visit made to the interior of the island, he encountered some Turks, who, because he refused them his mule to ride upon, pulled him by the heels from the mule's back, beat him unmercifully, and left him almost dead. His interpreter fled, and some Greeks saved him from perishing where he lay. From Cyprus to Tripoli; and here we may note what, in these days of Turkish ironclad men-of-war, is a curiously interesting opinion, based on Lithgow's personal experience of Turkish sailors: —

> The natural Turks [he says] were never skilful in managing of sea-battles, neither are they expert mariners, or experienced gunners. If it were not for our Christian runagates, French, English, and Flemings, and they too, sublime, accurate, and desperate fellows, who have taught the Turks the art of navigation, and especially the use of ammunition, which they both carry to them, and then become their chief cannoneers, the Turks would be as weak and ignorant at sea as the silly Ethiopian is inexpert in handling of arms on the land.

Every word of that is as true to-day as it was when written two hundred and fifty years ago.

At Tripoli Lithgow was obliged to wait a long time for a caravan to Aleppo; so he took the opportunity, with three Venetian merchants, to visit the cedars of Lebanon, a day's journey off. Losing their way among the rocks, two of their asses fell over a precipice and broke their necks, and they themselves fell into snowdrifts, and were nearly drowned in a torrent; but at last they safely reached the patriarch's house, and were hospitably entertained. From Tripoli our traveller proceeded with a caravan of Turks to Aleppo, where he had hoped to find a caravan for Babylon: but it had already started; and though he hired a janissary and three soldiers as escort, and tried to overtake it, it had already departed three days before his arrival at Beershake on the Euphrates. His disappointment was great; and his muse expresses what his sorrowful prose cannot perform: —

> My treach'rous guide
> Did nought but cross me; greed led him aside.
> Still this — still that I would. All I surmise
> Is shrewdly stopt. At last my scopes devise
> To make a boat, to bear me down alone,
> With drudges two, to ground — chang'd Babylon.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

That could not be; the charges was too great;
And eke the stream did nought but dangers threat.
My conduct still deceiv'd me, made it square
Another caravan, O! would come here
From Aleppo or Damascus; till in end
Most of my monies did his knavery spend.
Thus was I toss'd long five weeks and four days
With struggling doubts.

At last he complained to the authorities, and they compelled the janissary to take him back to Aleppo. There he laid his tale before the Venetian consul, who took him to the bashaw. The pasha was an upright man, and took the side of the traveller. The janissary was put in prison, and made to restore to Lithgow all the money he had received;

And for his ten weeks' fees, no more he had
Than he that's owner of a ditch-fall'n jade.

In Captain Burnaby's "Ride through Asia Minor," we read of adventures very similar to those of Lithgow, in the attempted extortions by his servants, and the difficulties of travel; and in Lithgow's work we see the same powerful influence exercised by the consuls as at the present day. But in those days Venice had the greatest power, and had that first place in commerce and in influence, which her subsequent trust in "money rather than in the sword of true valor," caused her to lose.

Leaving Aleppo, where he was much struck by the carrier-pigeons, which took messages from Aleppo to Babylon in forty-eight hours, Lithgow reached Damascus in a nine days' journey with a great caravan of some fifteen hundred persons, accompanied by one hundred soldiers as escort. It seems to have been a hard journey. The caravan was often assailed by Arabs; and the Turkish escort used to beat the Christians in their charge. By a present of tobacco Lithgow secured the good-will of the Turkish owner of the mule which carried his provisions; for the Turks, he says, are as addicted to smoke, as Dutchmen are to the pot. But when once Damascus was reached, food for man and beast, and lodging, were provided gratis by the grand seignior. Of Damascus, its pillar of brass marking the spot where Cain slew Abel, the house of Ananias, "the rose-water sold in barrels as beer is with us," the weapons of steel, the fruits, Lithgow speaks in unbounded terms of praise. He can only compare it to one other city out of paradise, "that matchless pattern and mirror of beauty, the city of Antwerp." The journey through Arabia Petræa was safely performed, thanks to the admirable precautions of the captain of the caravan, who, nevertheless, freely bled Lithgow's purse, making him pay excessive sums by the way of tribute to the Arab chiefs, and putting the difference in his own pocket. The Holy Land was traversed. At one village near Cæsarea Philippi, the Moors and Arabs gave the Christians for their supper an hundred strokes apiece, because some of them had trodden on the graves of the dead. After leaving Nazareth a great danger was incurred. A Christian guide named Joab was hired to lead the caravan to Lydda. Sending on ahead he warned a robber chief to intercept the caravan, and then led the travellers into all sorts of bad places, in order to give time to the Arabs to intercept them. However, he was suspected, and having been bound on a horse and threatened with death he confessed. At last by another route the caravan reached Tyre, where Lithgow, like Mark Twain's new pilgrims, broke off a pound-weight of a marble pillar, said to have been brought from Gaza, and to be one of those that Samson pulled down. The half of this precious relic he afterwards presented to King James of blessed memory. Here too he met an English factor, Mr. Brokess, who kindly took him to a Moorish house, "where instantly we swallowed down such jovial and deep carouses of Leatic wine, that both he and I were almost fastened in the last plunge of understanding."

And so the rude journey continued. One day he has to pay seven gold sequins tribute, another day five, to the wretched kings of the East. Another day, his tobacco being all gone, the owner of his mule tried to beat him and dismount his goods. Again, attacked by Arabs, who were driven back, the caravan had nine women and five men killed, and over thirty persons, including the captain, badly wounded. At last Jerusalem appears in sight; but the sun having gone down, the gates were locked, and the hungry and weary travellers were left outside. No offers of money would induce the Turks within to give them food; but the guardian of the monastery of Cordeliers sent two friars who let down bread, wine, and fish to Lithgow over the wall; for which, having been espied, the guardian had to pay next day a fine of one hundred piastres, £30 sterling; "otherwise had both he and I been beheaded."

On Palm Sunday 1612, three years from his leaving Paris, Lithgow entered into Jerusalem, where he was met and received

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

by the guardian of the convent of grey friars. Though we know that his travels were undertaken from sheer love of adventure, we fear he did not scruple to accept the advantages of the rôle of pilgrim. He was escorted to the monastery by twelve friars, singing a Te Deum, and each holding a wax candle. The guardian washed his right foot and the vicar his left; then they and all the twelve friars kissed them. "But when they knew afterwards that I was no popish Catholic, they sore repented them of their labor." How the canny Scotsman must have thrust his tongue in his cheek, as the guardian and the vicar performed these loving ablutions! Yet his intolerant spirit might have well received a lesson from these good Catholic monks; for, on the very day of his arrival, when he and some German Protestants who were, like himself, hospitably entertained at the convent, laughed to see the guardian and the friars beaten and ill-treated on the return of their procession from Bethpage, all the answer made by the guardian was a gentle request that whatever they might think, they would abstain from mocking at the rites which he was bound to perform. "To which," says Lithgow, "we condescended."

A day or two later the friars and their guest made a pilgrimage to the Jordan. They were nearly overwhelmed in sand and attacked by Arabs, but at length they reached the river; and here, as a specimen of our author's style, we will describe in his own words his adventure in search of a stick for King James: —

> Considering the ancient reputation of this famous river, and the rare sight of such an unfrequented place, I climbed up to the top of a turpentine tree, which grew within the limited flood, a little above where I left my company, even naked as I came from swimming, and cut down a fair hunting-rod, which afterwards, with great pains, I brought to England, and did present it (as the rarest gem of a pilgrim's treasure) to his Majesty. But I remember in the choosing thereof, an unexpected accident fell out; for I being sequestrate from the sight of the company, upon this solitary tree, with broad observing leaves, the friars and soldiers removed: keeping their course toward Jericho, but within two furlongs from Jordan, they were beset with the former nocturnal enemies, who assailed them with a hard conflict. For I, hearing the harquebuses go off, was straight in admiration; and looking down to the place where I left my associates, they were gone; so bending my eyes a little further in the plain, I saw them at a martial combat; which sight gave me suddenly the threatening of despair, not knowing whether to stay intrenched within the circumdating leaves, to approve the events of my auspicious fortunes, or in prosecuting a relief to be participant of their doubtful deliverance. In the end, pondering I could hardly or never escape their hands, I leapt down from the tree, leaving my Turkish clothes lying upon the ground, took only in my hand the rod and shass which I wore on my head; and ran stark naked above a quarter of a mile amongst thistles and sharp-pointed grass, which pitifully bepricked the soles of my feet. Approaching on the safe side of my company, one of our soldiers broke forth on horseback, being determined to kill me for my staying behind. Yea, and three times he smote at me with his half-pike; but his horse being at his speed, I prevented his cruelty, first by falling down, next by running in among the thickest of the pilgrims, recovering my beast. Which when the guardian espied, and saw my naked body, he presently pulled off his gown and threw it at me, whereby I might hide the secrets of nature; by which means in the space of an hour I was clothed three manner of ways: first, like a Turk; secondly, like a wild Arabian; and thirdly, like a grey friar; which was a barbarous, a savage, and a religious habit.

We cannot pause to relate in detail the sojourn in Jerusalem: how Lithgow refused to be made a Knight of the Holy Sepulchre, with its privileges of being allowed to set free any malefactor on his way to the gallows, and of carrying silks through all Popish countries without paying duty; how he had his right arm tattooed with the crowns of Scotland and England, and some verses in honor of the king, immediately over the holy sepulchre, to the horror of the friars; how he had to pay the guardian handsomely, and to reward "the avaricious guide, the gaping steward, the Cerberian porter, and the Cimmerian cook with his Etnæan face;" how he finally refused all prayers for further bounties to the convent, having already in eighteen days in Jerusalem spent eighteen pounds sixteen shillings sterling, and this, although the convent had been fined £30 for feeding him on the night of his arrival; how he bargained with the Egyptian caravan to take him away, and how he crossed the desert of Sinai from Gaza; the hardships of the journey; how three of the party of six Germans died in the desert of exhaustion; and how at length Cairo was reached, where the remaining three died of drinking down too much strong Cyprus wine without mixture of water; how the last of the six left all their gold to the stout Scotsman who had been the companion of their desert journey; how the Venetian factor in whose house they died seized their goods, and the pasha gave judgment that two-thirds

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

should go to Lithgow and one-third to the Venetian; the unmistakable delight at the legacy of nine hundred and forty-two sequins, and the rather doubtful sorrow and the very sincere resignation expressed for the poor gentlemen's death.

Lithgow visited the pyramids and the sphinx, and then descended the Nile to Rosetta, in a boat surrounded with forked spikes of iron for fear of the crocodiles, "who generally leap upon boats, and will carry the passenger away headlong down the stream." He tells how the crocodiles are killed by a rat, which runs into their mouths and eats its way out of their bodies; and relates an admirable sporting story of how a Venetian "squint-eyed gunner" killed an enormous crocodile by a most complicated and ingenious combination of a piece of ordnance, a train of powder, a match, a string, and a dead ass for bait, — he having "been duly licentiated thereto by the grand bashaw." At Alexandria it was so hot that the traveller and his companions, used as they were to the desert heat, spent the day in sprinkling themselves with water, and the night lying on the housetop; but in due time a Sclavonian ship bound for Ragusa took them off. Seventeen mariners, and all the four French pilgrims who had accompanied Lithgow from Jerusalem, died on the passage home, of what seems to have been the plague. Five times was the good ship assailed by the corsairs of Tunis; yet she arrived safely in Malta. Thence Sicily was reached, where the traveller was the means of rescuing some Sicilians from a gang of Moors who had seized them for slaves; and hence Naples, whence he again crossed Italy. A narrow escape from murder by four French thieves in a wood near Nice was his last trouble. By way of Spain, across the Pyrenees, he returned to Paris, and thence to London, where he duly presented to King James the pound-weight of Samson's marble pillar and the turpentine stick that had so nearly cost him his life; and so ends Lithgow's first journey.

How long he remained at home he does not tell us; nor will he say whether "discontent or curiosity drove him to his second perambulation" — that, he says, is best reserved to his own knowledge. At all events, before long he was on the road again. This time he traversed the Netherlands, ascended the Rhine, and crossed Switzerland into Italy, where he was robbed, and threatened with a year in the galleys for carrying a stiletto, on the false accusation of a soldier; but he was soon released, and received fifty Florentine crowns of gold in compensation, whereat he extolled the knave that had brought him such a noble reward. Beset by banditti in Calabria, he was saved by exhibiting his patent of Jerusalem. Crossing to Sicily, he found two barons lying dead, who had fought for the love of a young noble woman. "Upon which sight, to speak the truth, I searched both their pockets, and found their two silken purses full loaden with Spanish pistoles, whereat my heart sprung for joy; and, taking five rings off their four hands, I hid them and the two purses in the ground;" after which he alarmed the neighborhood; and when the neighbors were in full lamentation, and had removed the bodies, he made off with his stolen treasure, and reached Malta.

Hence away to Tunis, then to Algiers, strongly garrisoned by janissaries, and full of Spanish slaves; hence to Fez, the most horribly vicious of all the Eastern towns he met, in spite of its magnificent mosques, its beautiful houses and gardens, its sixty-seven bridges, its palaces and hospitals. His companion here was a French lapidary, one M. Chatteliné, who was advised to go to Æthiopia to buy precious stones, on which journey Lithgow was only too glad to accompany him. Hiring a dragoman and two Moorish servants, who left six of their kinsmen in custody as hostages with the Turkish authorities, they set forth. Part of the journey lay through a country rich in cattle, camels, and horses, among half-savage tribes, who sometimes "overlabored" the travellers with bastinadoes; part through a desert full of serpents and wild beasts, inhabited only by Bedouins. At last, despairing of reaching Æthiopia, and Chatteliné having fallen sick, and been left behind, Lithgow, at his dragoman's demand, turned northwards, and came among the Libyan Sabunks. The description of their prince is very curious: "His religion is damnable, so is his life; for he and all the four tribes of Libya worship only for their god, garlic; having altars, priests, and superstitious rites annexed to it; thinking garlic, being strong of itself, and the most part of their food, to have a sovereign virtue in an herbal deity." We should like to know what was "the merry secret here concerning the woman, which often I recited to King James of blessed memory;" but for once our traveller is reticent. Back from the Sabunks, with a guide, through the Numidian Moors — who made horseshoes and nails by heating iron in the sun and hammering it with their fists — to

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Tunis, where the first curiosity he describes is the artificial hatching of chickens in a furnace, upon warm camel's dung, through which the heat was admitted,—"a common thing almost throughout all Africa, which maketh hens with them so plenty everywhere."

While Lithgow was at Tunis, a certain Captain Danser, a Fleming, who had been a great pirate, came to the port as an ambassador of the French king, to relieve some French barks that were in captivity. The bashaw visited him on board his ship, sent him the vessels freely, and invited him to return the visit next day. Danser landed with twelve gentlemen; but as soon as he had crossed the drawbridge of the castle, the gate was shut, and the twelve friends left outside. Danser was then accused by the pasha of his old piracies and murders, and was straightway beheaded, his body being thrown into a ditch. Then the guns of the forts opened fire upon his vessels, but they, by cutting cables, escaped. Nor does this strange treatment of an ambassador draw forth any further comment from our author than, "Lo! there was a Turkish policy, more sublime and crafty than the best European alive could have formed."

The homeward journey was made by Malta and Sicily, where our traveller visited Etna. At Messina he found dying, in extreme misery, Sir Francis Verney, who having spent all his patrimony, had turned Turk at Tunis, had been captured by Sicilian galleys, and, after two years' slavery, had been redeemed by an English Jesuit, on promise of reversion to the Christian faith, and had then turned common soldier. Sir Francis soon died, and his corpse was charitably interred by Lithgow. The rule of the country by the duke of Sona draws forth much admiration from our traveller; and as an example of his wisdom and justice, the following case is cited. A priest of Palermo having killed, in a house of ill-fame, a knight's servant who was brother to a shoemaker, the viceroy made the shoemaker pistol the priest, in spite of the cardinal. But the cardinal had previously punished the priest for killing the servant, by inhibiting him from saying mass for a year; so, to make justice complete, the viceroy, for the murder of the priest, inhibited the shoemaker from making shoes for a year, during which time, however, he gave him two shillings a day for his maintenance.

At Naples, whither he next proceeded, Lithgow was nearly coming to an untimely end through his testing the effects of the Grotta del Cane upon himself, rather than pay the charge of the dogkeeper who stays by the cave; and again, by pushing his way too far into the Sibyl's Cave, where his guide abandoned him, his torch went out, and he fell into the water. From Naples he made his way into Hungary, of whose soil and climate he speaks in unbounded praise; but of its inhabitants he says they have ever been theftuous, treacherous, and false, so that there one brother will hardly trust another. From Hungary he passed through Transylvania into Moldavia, where, in a wood, he was robbed of all his clothes and sixty gold ducats, and bound stark naked to a tree. Here he remained all night, in great fear of wolves and wild boars, till in the morning he was relieved by a company of herds, who gave him an old coat, in which he put the papers and seals that had been left to him, and then made his way to the Baron Starhuld's, who more than made good all his losses. He now travelled through Poland, meeting Scotsmen everywhere, as indeed he had done throughout his travels. One of these took him in a wagon from Warsaw to Dantzic, where for three weeks he lay so ill that his grave and tomb were prepared by his countrymen. But he was destined for other and still greater troubles yet; and so he sufficiently recovered to end his second journey by a sea-voyage home to London.

The traveller himself feels bound to give some special reasons for undertaking a third voyage after encountering so many privations in his two previous journeys. He tells us that his most urgent cause was the necessity of completing his survey of all Europe by visiting Ireland and the half of Spain, which alone he had not yet visited; and secondly, that he was resolved to visit Prester John's dominions in Æthiopia. So he wrote a poetical pamphlet to the king, obtained in return letters of safe-conduct and recommendation, and again set forth on his travels, reaching Dublin on the 22d August 1619. He spent five months travelling through Ireland; and he declares there are more rivers, lakes, brooks, strands, quagmires, bogs, and marshes there than in all Christendom besides. He was often overmired, saddle, body, and all; often set a-swimming in danger of his life, "that for cloudy and fountain-bred perils he was never reduced to such a floating labyrinth." In five months' space he quite spoiled six horses, and himself as tired as the worst of them. His description of the country is very remarkable; the people living in turf-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

cabins then as now; their utter ignorance of the commonest tenets of their religion; their priest-ridden condition; their pagan superstitions, such as bequeathing their cattle to the protection of the new moon; their suffering from absentee landlords: their semi-barbarous manner of life; their ploughs fastened by straw-ropes to the horses' tails; the women giving suck to the babes on their backs by throwing the breasts over the shoulder, as the women in Africa do at this day: the lavish hospitality of the Irish gentry, whose "Spanish sack and Irish uscova" were always ready at hand; the wretched condition of the Protestant Irish clergy, of whom he says: "The ale-house is their church, the Irish priests their consorts; their auditors be 'fill and fetch more;' their text, Spanish sack; their prayers, carousing; their singing of Psalms, whiffing of tobacco; their last blessing, aqua vitæ; and all their doctrine, sound drunkenness."

From Ireland he crossed over to St. Malo, and again visited Paris. His remarks on the fantastic foolery of the French are most amusing; and he concludes his epitome of France by naming three things for the wayfaring man to avoid there: —

> First, the eating of victuals and drinking of wine without price-making; lest, when he hath done, for the stridor of his teeth, his charges be redoubled. Next, to choose his lodging far from marshy ditches, lest the vehemency of chirking frogs vex the wished-for repose of his wearied body and cast him into a vigilant perplexity. And lastly, unless he would rise early, never to lie near the fore-streets of a town, because of the disturbing clamors of the peasant samboys or nail wooden-shoes, whose noise, like an equivox, resembleth the clashing armor of armies, or the clangor of the Ulyssan tumbling horse to fatal Troy.

Lithgow now crossed the Pyrenees into Spain, then continued into Portugal, and thence back to Madrid; but the discomforts of travel in the Peninsula were too great even for our toil-inured traveller: "Great scarcity of beds and dear, and no ready-dressed diet;" and a people far from suited to one who was fond of free quarters and being hospitably entertained; for the Spaniard he found to be "of a spare diet and temperate, if at his own cost he spend; but if given gratis he hath the longest tusks that ever played at table." From Madrid he went to Toledo, where he met one Mr. Woodson, a London merchant, whom he accompanied to Malaga, where he arranged for a passage in a French ship to Alexandria in Egypt. But on the 27th October, 1620, the English fleet, despatched against the pirates of Algiers, cast anchor in the roads. The people of Malaga thought they were Turkish ships, and the town was called to arms; but in the morning the mistake was discovered. Hundreds of the crews came on shore. Lithgow visited the English general Sir Robert Maunsil, on board his ship the "Lion;" and when the fleet sailed, resisting Sir Robert's invitation to accompany him to Algiers, he returned in a fishing-boat to save his linen, letters, and sacket, lying in his hostelry. He had scarcely landed, and was making his way by a quiet road to his lodging, shunning acquaintance, as he was to embark that evening, when he was seized by nine alguazils, wrapped in a black cloak, held by the throat to prevent his crying out, and carried to the governor's parlor. And now began the worst, if not the last, of all poor Lithgow's troubles.

The governor, whom Lithgow had previously known, paid no heed to his remonstrances, but ordered him to be confined, and his apprehension to be kept secret, and sent for the captain of the town, the alcalde, and the State scrivener. These four being assembled at a table, Lithgow was brought before them and questioned as to his journeyings. He was then shut up in a small room, whither the alcalde came and asked him to confess having been in Seville, where he had never been; but as he denied it, he was again brought before the tribunal, and made to swear to tell the truth. He was questioned as to the English fleet, its strength, designs, etc.; and when he denied previous knowledge that the fleet was coming, the governor called him a lying villain, and said he had been nine months in Seville as a spy, to give the English knowledge of the movements of the Spanish fleet. Lithgow in vain sent to his lodging and produced all his letters and passports. Even his patent of Jerusalem, and his liber amicorum, or book of kings', princes', and dukes' autographs, would not convince the governor, and order was given for his being incarcerated secretly in the palace. Then he was searched and stripped, and "in the doublet neck of his breeches, fast shut between two canvasses," they found one hundred and thirty-seven double pieces of gold, which the governor kept. At midnight he was heavily ironed by bolts on each ancle separated by an iron bar a yard long, and thrice as heavy as his body; so that he could only lie on his back, and not even turn. That night he had a good

Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd supper of meat and wine, the last for many a long day.

Next day the governor visited him alone, and tried to get him to confess he was a spy; and when he would not, the governor flew into a rage, ordered that he should have no food but a pint of water and three ounces of brown bread daily, that only a slave should come near him, and that he should be allowed to hear no voice. And so he was left in the dark; and thus for forty-six days he lay.

On the forty-seventh morning before dawn he was carried, ironed as he was, in a coach, to a vine-press house in the fields outside the town, whither the rack had been brought the day before: all this secrecy being observed lest English or French or Flemings should hear of his imprisonment. At dawn of day he was interrogated with the same result — and as he would confess nothing, he was carried to the rack, his irons were knocked off, an inch of his left heel being struck away with the bolt by the executioner, while they told him his sufferings had not yet begun. Then he was stripped, mounted on the rack, and hung by the shoulders, with two small cords passing under his arms and through two rings in the wall above his head. His legs were drawn through the sides of the rack, and cords were fastened to his ancles; and then — the torture began. The description is far too horrible to be related here; and the torture was carried the further because the name and crown of that arch-heretic King James were found upon the sufferer's arm. The account of the torture of the rack is sickening; yet to that inhuman devilry was added that of filling the body with water till it could hold no more. For six long hours did these horrors, he tells us, endure, and then he was reclothed and given some wine and warm eggs, and transported back, in irons as before, to his former dark dungeon.

This occurred five days before Christmas, and each following day he was made to believe the torture was to be repeated. On Christmas Day he was visited by Marina, the ladies' gentlewoman, who, with many tears, brought him honey and fruits, and kind speeches; also the Turkish slave who waited on him brought him word, about St. John's Day, that the English fleet was coming with the Moors to sack Malaga. And now as Twelfth Day came he was threatened with more tortures; and every fourth day the governor ordered his silver-plate keeper to sweep the vermin which filled the loathsome cell over his poor broken body. Then at night the poor Turkish slave would steal in with sticks and burning oil, and sweeping up the vermin in heaps, would burn them.

Soon afterwards he learned that some priests were busily translating his books into Spanish, and that they had found out he was an arch-enemy of the pope. Poor Lithgow! how bitterly his books were rising up in judgment against him now! Those two editions of the "delectable and true discourse of his first paineful peregrination" were too full of anathemas against those accursed Papists. How often Job's "Oh that mine enemy would write a book!" must have come up into his mind. And now, on the second day after Candlemas, the inquisitors, with two Jesuits, entered his cell, accompanied by the governor. A long interrogation ensued. They admitted he had been unjustly accused as a spy, but said that now they had read his books, how he had written against the blessed miracles of Loretto, and the pope, Christ's vicar on earth, he deserved to be speedily burned. Day after day they returned, and endeavored to convert the heretic, promising him liberty and a pension if he would join the Catholic Church. But he still refused; whereupon he was condemned to receive eleven strangling torments in his cell, and then to be transported to Granada, and there burnt alive. Again was the horrible water torture used; the teeth set asunder with iron wedges, and water poured down the throat; then the throat was bound with a garter, and he was rolled about the room. Afterwards he was hung up by his toes, the garter cut, and the water allowed to run out of his mouth. Almost dead after this trial, he was again restored by wine.

The Turkish slave fell sick, and a negro woman who waited on him used secretly to convey him wine; but she was suspected, and the Turk brought back. And so things went on till near Easter; when one evening after supper, the governor, "to entertain discourse," disclosed the whole history to a Spanish cavalier of Granada, whose Flemish servant, standing behind his master, overheard the tale, and at daybreak next morning related it to the English consul, Mr. Richard Wilde, who at once guessed that Lithgow was the unfortunate sufferer. He summoned the other English merchants in Malaga, and they wrote to Sir Walter Aston, the British ambassador at Madrid, who obtained a warrant from the king of Spain for Lithgow's release. On Easter Saturday before midnight he was released, and next day he

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

was carried on board his Majesty's ship the "Vanguard," and thence sent to England in the "Goodwill" of Harwich, — the British merchants sending him presents of food, clothes, wine, and money. Fifty days later he reached Dartford-upon-Thames, whence the next morning he was carried on a feather-bed to Theobald's, and brought before the king, at his return from park; who witnessed with all the court of England "what a martyred anatomy he was, and how small hope was either expected of his life or recovery." The king sent him before the Spanish ambassador, who promised, in the presence of Lords Hamilton and Buckingham, that, after hearing from Spain, all his goods and money and papers should be restored, with £1,000 sterling to be paid by the governor of Malaga. These promises were made on the 6th June 1621. Lithgow was sent at the king's expense to the baths, and gradually recovered the health and strength of his body, though his left arm and crushed bones were incurable.

Alas, poor Lithgow! — another evil yet befell him. The ambassador's promises, which were to have been fulfilled by Michaelmas, were postponed to the following Easter; and then they were still unfulfilled, and the ambassador himself was about to depart for Spain. What happened had best now be told in our hero's own words: —

> I told him flatly in his face the inward grief of my soul. Whereupon, in the Chamber of Presence, before the emperor's ambassador and divers gentlemen, his Majesty's servants, he rashly adventured the credit of regal honor in a single combat against me, a private, lame, and injured man. Where indeed he valiantly obtained both the victory and fame. Victor he was because of my commitment, for I lay nine weeks incarcerate in the Marshalsea at Southwark; and fame he likewise won, because he took it all with him to his country, leaving none here behind him, I mean, for this action.

The edition in which Lithgow first relates this his third voyage, and in which he tells the story of his imprisonment in the Marshalsea, is dated "from my chamber in the Charterhouse, the 13th of January 1623;" and in some verses before the end of the volume, the traveller describes his rest and content as a recipient of the advantages of the charitable aims of the founder of that institution.

That he subsequently so far recovered as to make a pedestrian journey from London to Scotland, it is satisfactory at least to know; but his later editions, to which these are added, do not improve his autobiography.

At the end of the copy of this edition, in the British Museum, are some verses, written in contemporary handwriting, said to be the author's autograph, that suggest some subsequent imprisonment.

> The Charterhouse is lost, the more's my grief,
> And I close pris'ner clapt, in bondage strong,
> Where I six long years lay, void of relief,
> This book the cause, the Spaniard and their wrong;
> Whose former tortures nor their bloody rack
> Cannot suffice, but still they seek my wrack.
> Vivit post funera virtus.

In spite of his vanity, his love of money, his intolerance in religion, his drunken bouts, and his unblushing robbery of the dead in Sicily, we confess the adventurous traveller has won our sympathy by his indomitable courage and perseverance; while by the side of his hardships and sufferings, those of even Cameron and Stanley sink into comparative insignificance.

SIR GIBBIE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

AUTHOR OF "MALCOLM," "THE MARQUIS OF LOSSIE," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

THE TOWN SPARROW.

"THIS, too, will pass," is a Persian word: I should like it better if it were "This too shall pass."

Gibbie's agony passed, for God is not the God of the dead but of the living. Through the immortal essence in him, life became again life, and he ran about the streets as before. Some may think that wee Sir Gibbie — as many now called him, some knowing the truth, and others in kindly mockery — would get on all the better for the loss of such a father; but it was not so. In his father he had lost his Paradise, and was now a creature expelled. He was not so much to be pitied as many a child dismissed by sudden decree from a home to a school; but the streets and the people and the shops, the horses and the dogs, even the penny-loaves though he was hungry, had lost half their precious delight, when his father was no longer in the accessible background, the heart of the blissful city. As to food and clothing, he did neither much better nor any worse than before: people were kind

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

as usual, and kindness was to Gibbie the very milk of mother Nature. Whose the hand that proffered it, or what the form it took, he cared no more than a stray kitten cares whether the milk set down to it be in a blue saucer or a white. But he always made the right return. The first thing a kindness deserves, is acceptance, the next is transmission: Gibbie gave both without thinking much about either. For he never had taken, and indeed never learned to take, a thought about what he should eat or what he should drink, or wherewithal he should be clothed — a fault rendering him, in the eyes of the economist of this world, utterly unworthy of a place in it. There is a world, however, and one pretty closely mixed up with this, though it never shows itself to one who has no place in it, the birds of whose air have neither storehouse nor barn but are just such thoughtless cherubs — thoughtless for themselves, that is — as wee Sir Gibbie. It would be useless to attempt convincing the mere economist that the great city was a little better, a little happier, a little merrier for the presence in it of the child, because he would not, even if convinced of the fact, recognize the gain; but I venture the assertion to him, that the conduct of not one of its inhabitants was the worse for the example of Gibbie's apparent idleness; and that not one of the poor women who now and then presented the small baronet with a penny, or a bit of bread, or a scrap of meat, or a pair of old trousers — shoes nobody gave him, and he neither desired nor needed any — ever felt the poorer for the gift, or complained that he should be so taxed.

Positively or negatively, then, everybody was good to him, and Gibbie felt it; but what could make up for the loss of his Paradise, the bosom of a father? Drunken father as he was, I know of nothing that can or ought to make up for such a loss except that which can restore it — the bosom of the Father of fathers.

He roamed the streets, as all his life before, the whole of the day, and part of the night; he took what was given him, and picked up what he found. There were some who would gladly have brought him within the bounds of an ordered life; he soon drove them to despair, however, for the streets had been his nursery, and nothing could keep him out of them. But the sparrow and the rook are just as respectable in reality, though not in the eyes of the henwife, as the egg-laying fowl, or the dirt-gobbling duck; and, however Gibbie's habits might shock the ladies of Mr. Sclater's congregation, who sought to civilize him, the boy was no more about mischief in the streets at midnight, than they were in their beds. They collected enough for his behoof to board him for a year with an old woman who kept a school, and they did get him to sleep one night in her house. But, in the morning, when she would not let him run out, brought him into the school-room, her kitchen, and began to teach him to write, Gibbie failed to see the good of it. He must have space, change, adventure, air, or life was not worth the name to him. Above all he must see friendly faces, and that of the old dame was not such. But he desired to be friendly with her, and once, as she leaned over him, put up his hand — not a very clean one, I am bound to give her the advantage of my confessing — to stroke her cheek: she pushed him roughly away, rose in indignation upon her crutch, and lifted her cane to chastise him for the insult. A class of urchins, to Gibbie's eyes at least looking unhappy, were at the moment blundering through the twenty-third Psalm. Ever after, even when now Sir Gilbert more than understood the great song, the words, "thy rod and thy staff," like the spell of a necromancer would still call up the figure of the dame irate, in her horn spectacles and her black-ribboned cap, leaning with one arm on her crutch, and with the other uplifting what was with her no mere symbol of authority. Like a shell from a mortar he departed from the house. She hobbled to the door after him, but his diminutive figure many yards away, his little bare legs misty with swiftness as he ran, was the last she ever saw of him, and her pupils had a bad time of it the rest of the day. He never even entered the street again in which she lived. Thus, after one night's brief interval of respectability, he was again a rover of the city, a flitting insect that lighted here and there, and spread wings of departure the moment a fresh desire awoke.

It would be difficult to say where he slept. In summer anywhere; in winter where he could find warmth. Like animals better clad than he, yet like him able to endure cold, he revelled in mere heat when he could come by it. Sometimes he stood at the back of a baker's oven, for he knew all the haunts of heat about the city; sometimes he buried himself in the sids (husks of oats) lying ready to feed the kiln of a meal-mill; sometimes he lay by the furnace of the steam-engine of the waterworks. One man employed there, when his time was at night, always made a bed

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

for Gibbie: he had lost his own only child, and this one of nobody's was a comfort to him.

Even those who looked upon wandering as wicked, only scolded into the sweet upturned face, pouring gall into a cup of wine too full to receive a drop of it — and did not hand him over to the police. Useless verily that would have been, for the police would as soon have thought of taking up a town sparrow as Gibbie, and would only have laughed at the idea. They knew Gibbie's merits better than any of those good people imagined his faults. It requires either wisdom or large experience to know that a child is not necessarily wicked even if born and brought up in a far viler entourage than was Gibbie.

The merits the police recognized in him were mainly two — neither of small consequence in their eyes; the first, the negative, yet more important one, that of utter harmlessness; the second, and positive one — a passion and power for rendering help, taking notable shape chiefly in two ways, upon both of which I have already more than touched. The first was the peculiar faculty now pretty generally known — his great gift, some, his great luck, others called it — for finding things lost. It was no wonder the town crier had sought his acquaintance, and when secured, had cultivated it — neither a difficult task; for the boy, ever since he could remember, had been in the habit, as often as he saw the crier, or heard his tuck of drum in the distance, of joining him and following, until he had acquainted himself with all particulars concerning everything proclaimed as missing. The moment he had mastered the facts announced, he would dart away to search, and not unfrequently to return with the thing sought. But it was not by any means only things sought that he found. He continued to come upon things of which he had no simulacrum in his phantasy. These, having no longer a father to carry them to, he now, their owners unknown, took to the crier, who always pretended to receive them with a suspicion which Gibbie understood as little as the other really felt, and at once advertised them by drum and cry. What became of them after that, Gibbie never knew. If they did not find their owners, neither did they find their way back to Gibbie; if their owners were found, the crier never communicated with him on the subject. Plainly he regarded Gibbie as the favored jackal, whose privilege it was to hunt for the crier, the royal lion of the city forest. But he spoke kindly to him, as well he might, and now and then gave him a penny.

The second of the positive merits by which Gibbie found acceptance in the eyes of the police, was a yet more peculiar one, growing out of his love for his father, and his experience in the exercise of that love. It was, however, unintelligible to them, and so remained, except on the theory commonly adopted with regard to Gibbie, namely, that he wasna a' there. Not the less was it to them a satisfactory whim of his, seeing it mitigated their trouble as guardians of the nightly peace and safety. It was indeed the main cause of his being, like themselves, so much in the street at night: seldom did Gibbie seek his lair — I cannot call it couch — before the lengthening hours of the morning. If the finding of things was a gift, this other peculiarity was a passion — and a right human passion — absolutely possessing the child: it was, to play the guardian angel to drunk folk. If such a distressed human craft hove in sight, he would instantly bear down upon and hover about him, until resolved as to his real condition. If he was in such distress as to require assistance, he never left him till he saw him safe within his own door. The police asserted that wee Sir Gibbie not only knew every drunkard in the city and where he lived, but where he generally got drunk as well. That one was in no danger of taking the wrong turning, upon whom Gibbie was in attendance, to determine, by a shove on this side or that, the direction in which the hesitating, uncertain mass of stultified humanity was to go. He seemed a visible embodiment of that special providence which is said to watch over drunk people and children, only here a child was the guardian of the drunkard, and in this branch of his mission, was well known to all who, without qualifying themselves for coming under his cherubic cognizance, were in the habit of now and then returning home late. He was least known to those to whom he rendered most assistance. Rarely had he thanks for it, never halfpence, but not unfrequently blows and abuse. For the last he cared nothing; the former, owing to his great agility, seldom visited him with any directness. A certain reporter of humorous scandal, after his own third tumbler, would occasionally give a graphic description of what, coming from a supper party, he saw about one o'clock in the morning. In the great street of the city, he overhauled a huge galleon, which proved, he declared, to be the provost himself, not exactly water-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

logged, and yet not very buoyant, but carrying a good deal of sail. He might possibly have escaped very particular notice, he said, but for the assiduous attendance upon him of an absurd little cock-boat, in the person of wee Gibbie — the two reminding him right ludicrously of the story of the Spanish Armada. Round and round the bulky provost, gyrated the tiny baronet like a little hero of the ring, pitching into him, only with open-handed pushes, not with blows, now on this side and now on that — not after such fashion of sustentation as might have sufficed with a man of ordinary size, but throwing all his force now against the provost's bulging bows, now against his overleaning quarter, encountering him now as he lurched, now as he heeled, until at length he landed him high, though certainly not dry, on the top of his own steps. The moment the butler opened the door, and the heavy hulk rolled into dock, Gibbie darted off as if he had been the wicked one tormenting the righteous, and in danger of being caught by a pair of holy tongs. Whether the tale was true or not, I do not know: with after-dinner humorists there is reason for caution. Gibbie was not offered the post of henchman to the provost, and rarely could have had the chance of claiming salvage for so distinguished a vessel, seeing he generally cruised in waters where such craft seldom sailed. Though almost nothing could now have induced him to go down Jink Lane, yet about the time the company at Mistress Croale's would be breaking up, he would on most nights be lying in wait a short distance down the Widdiehill, ready to minister to that one of his father's old comrades who might prove most in need of his assistance; and if he showed him no gratitude Gibbie had not been trained in a school where he was taught to expect or even to wish for any.

I could now give a whole chapter to the setting forth of the pleasures the summer brought him, city summer as it was, but I must content myself with saying that first of these, and not least, was the mere absence of the cold of the other seasons, bringing with it many privileges. He could lie down anywhere and sleep when he would; or spend, if he pleased, whole nights awake, in a churchyard, or on the deck of some vessel discharging her cargo at the quay, or running about the still, sleeping streets. Thus he got to know the shapes of some of the constellations, and not a few of the aspects of the heavens. But even then he never felt alone, for he gazed at the vast from the midst of a city-ful of his fellows. Then there were the scents of the laylocks and the roses and the carnations and the sweet peas, that came floating out from the gardens, contending sometimes with those of the grocers' and chemists' shops. Now and then too he came in for a small feed of strawberries, which were very plentiful in their season. Sitting then on a hospitable door-step, with the feet and faces of friends passing him in both directions, and love embodied in the warmth of summer all about him, he would eat his strawberries, and inherit the earth.

CHAPTER VIII.

SAMBO.

No one was so sorry for the death of Sir George, or had so many kind words to say in memory of him, as Mistress Croale. Neither was her sorrow only because she had lost so good a customer, or even because she had liked the man: I believe it was much enhanced by a vague doubt that after all she was to blame for his death. In vain she said to herself, and said truly, that it would have been far worse for him and Gibbie too, had he gone elsewhere for his drink; she could not get the account settled with her conscience. She tried to relieve herself by being kinder than before to the boy; but she was greatly hindered in this by the fact that, after his father's death, she could not get him inside her door. That his father was not there — would not be there at night, made the place dreadful to him. This addition to the trouble of mind she already had on account of the nature of her business, was the cause, I believe, why, after Sir George's death, she went down the hill with accelerated speed. She sipped more frequently from her own bottle, soon came to "tasting with" her customers, and after that her descent was rapid. She no longer refused drink to women, though for a time she always gave it under protest; she winked at card-playing; she grew generally more lax in her administration; and by degrees a mist of evil fame began to gather about her house. Thereupon her enemy, as she considered him, the Rev. Clement Sclater, felt himself justified in moving more energetically for the withdrawal of her license, which, with the support of outraged neighbors, he found no difficulty in effecting. She therefore flitted to another parish, and opened a worse house in a worse region of the city — on the river-bank, namely, some little distance above the quay, not too far to be within easy range of sailors, and the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

people employed about the vessels loading or discharging cargo. It pretended to be only a lodging-house, and had no license for the sale of strong drink, but nevertheless, one way and another, a great deal was drunk in the house, and as always card-playing, and sometimes worse things were going on, getting more vigorous ever as the daylight waned, frequent quarrels and occasional bloodshed was the consequence. For some time, however, nothing very serious brought the place immediately within the conscious ken of the magistrates.

In the second winter after his father's death, Gibbie, wandering everywhere about the city, encountered Lucky Croale in the neighborhood of her new abode: down there she was Mistress no longer, but, with a familiarity scarcely removed from contempt, was both mentioned and addressed as Lucky Croale. The repugnance which had hitherto kept Gibbie from her having been altogether to her place and not to herself, he at once accompanied her home, and after that went often to the house. He was considerably surprised when first he heard words from her mouth for using which she had formerly been in the habit of severely reproving her guests; but he always took things as he found them, and when ere long he had to hear such occasionally addressed to himself, when she happened to be more out of temper than usual, he never therefore questioned her friendship. What more than anything else attracted him to her house, however, was the jolly manners and open-hearted kindness of most of the sailors who frequented it, with almost all of whom he was a favorite; and it soon came about that, when his ministrations to the incapable were over, he would spend the rest of the night more frequently there than anywhere else; until at last he gave up, in a great measure, his guardianship of the drunk in the streets for that of those who were certainly in much more danger of mishap at Lucky Croale's. Scarcely a night passed when he was not present at one or more of the quarrels of which the place was a hot-bed; and as he never by any chance took a part, or favored one side more than another, but confined himself to an impartial distribution of such peace-making blandishments as the ever springing fountain of his affection took instinctive shape in, the wee baronet came to be regarded, by the better sort of the rough fellows, almost as the very identical sweet little cherub, sitting perched up aloft, whose department in the saving business of the universe it was, to take care of the life of poor Jack. I do not say that he was always successful in his endeavors at atonement, but beyond a doubt Lucky Croale's houff was a good deal less of a hell through the haunting presence of the child. He was not shocked by the things he saw, even when he liked them least. He regarded the doing of them much as he had looked upon his father's drunkenness — as a pitiful necessity that overtook men — one from which there was no escape, and which caused a great need for Gibbies. Evil language and coarse behavior alike passed over him, without leaving the smallest stain upon heart or conscience, desire or will. No one could doubt it who considered the clarity of his face and eyes, in which the occasional but not frequent expression of keenness and promptitude scarcely even ruffled the prevailing look of unclouded heavenly babyhood.

If any one thinks I am unfaithful to human fact, and overcharge the description of this child, I on my side doubt the extent of the experience of that man or woman. I admit the child a rarity, but a rarity in the right direction, and therefore a being with whom humanity has the greater need to be made acquainted. I admit that the best things are the commonest, but the highest types and the best combinations of them are the rarest. There is more love in the world than anything else, for instance; but the best love and the individual in whom love is supreme are the rarest of all things. That for which humanity has the strongest claim upon its workmen, is the representation of its own best; but the loudest demand of the present day is for the representation of that grade of humanity of which men see the most — that type of things which could never have been but that it might pass. The demand marks the commonness, narrowness, low-levelled satisfaction of the age. It loves its own — not that which might be, and ought to be its own — not its better self, infinitely higher than its present, for the sake of whose approach it exists. I do not think that the age is worse in this respect than those which have preceded it, but that vulgarity, and a certain vile contentment swelling to self-admiration, have become more vocal than hitherto; just as unbelief, which I think in reality less prevailing than in former ages, has become largely more articulate, and thereby more loud and peremptory. But whatever the demand of the age, I insist that that which ought to be presented to its beholding, is the com-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

mon good uncommonly developed, and that not because of its rarity, but because it is truer to humanity. Shall I admit those conditions, those facts, to be true exponents of humanity, which, except they be changed, purified, or abandoned, must soon cause that humanity to cease from its very name, must destroy its very being? To make the admission would be to assert that a house may be divided against itself, and yet stand. It is the noble, not the failure from the noble, that is the true human; and if I must show the failure, let it ever be with an eye to the final possible, yea, imperative, success. But in our day, a man who will accept any oddity of idiosyncratic development in manners, tastes, or habits, will refuse, not only as improbable, but as inconsistent with human nature, the representation of a man trying to be merely as noble as is absolutely essential to his being — except, indeed, he be at the same time represented as failing utterly in the attempt, and compelled to fall back upon the imperfections of humanity, and acknowledge them as its laws. Its improbability, judged by the experience of most men, I admit; its unreality in fact I deny; and its absolute unity with the true idea of humanity, I believe and assert.

It is hardly necessary for me now to remark, seeing my narrative must already have suggested it, that what kept Gibbie pure and honest was the rarely-developed, ever-active love of his kind. The human face was the one attraction to him in the universe. In deep fact, it is so to every one; I state but the commonest reality in creation; only in Gibbie the fact had come to the surface; the common thing was his in uncommon degree and potency. Gibbie knew no music except the voice of man and woman; at least no other had as yet affected him. To be sure he had never heard much. Drunken sea-songs he heard every night almost; and now and then on Sundays he ran through a zone of psalm-singing; but neither of those could well be called music. There hung a caged bird here and there at a door in the poorer streets; but Gibbie's love embraced the lower creation also, and too tenderly for the enjoyment of such a melody. The human bird loved liberty too dearly to gather any thing but pain from the little feathered brother who had lost it, and to whom he could not minister as to the drunkard. In general he ran from the presence of such a prisoner. But sometimes he would stop and try to comfort the naked little Freedom, disrobed of its space; and on one occasion was caught in the very act of delivering a canary that hung outside a little shop. Any other than wee Gibbie would have been heartily cuffed for the offence, but the owner of the bird only smiled at the would-be liberator, and hung the cage a couple of feet higher on the wall. With such a passion of affection, then, finding vent in constant action, is it any wonder Gibbie's heart and hands should be too full for evil to occupy them even a little?

One night in the spring, entering Lucky Croale's common room, he saw there for the first time a negro sailor, whom the rest called Sambo, and was at once taken with his big, dark, radiant eyes, and his white teeth continually uncovering themselves in good-humored smiles. Sambo had left the vessel in which he arrived, was waiting for another, and had taken up his quarters at Lucky Croale's. Gibbie's advances he met instantly, and in a few days a strong mutual affection had sprung up between them. To Gibbie Sambo speedily became absolutely loving and tender, and Gibbie made him full return of devotion.

The negro was a man of immense muscular power, like not a few of his race, and, like most of them, not easily provoked: inheriting not a little of their hard-learned long-suffering. He bore even with those who treated him with far worse than the ordinary superciliousness of white to black; and when the rudest of city-boys mocked him, only showed his teeth by way of smile. The ill-conditioned among Lucky Croale's customers and lodgers were constantly taking advantage of his good nature, and presuming upon his forbearance; but so long as they confined themselves to mere insolence, or even bare-faced cheating, he endured with marvellous temper. It was possible, however, to go too far even with him.

One night Sambo was looking on at a game of cards, in which all the rest in the room were engaged. Happening to laugh at some turn it took, one of them, a Malay, was offended, and abused him. Others objected to his having fun without risking money, and required him to join in the game. This for some reason or other he declined, and when the whole party at length insisted, positively refused. Thereupon they all took umbrage, nor did most of them make many steps of the ascent from displeasure to indignation, wrath, revenge; and then ensued a row. Gibbie had been sitting all the time on his friend's knee, every now and then stroking his black face, in which, as insult followed insult, the sunny blood kept slowly rising,

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

making the balls of his eyes and his teeth look still whiter. At length a savage from Greenock threw a tumbler at him. Sambo, quick as a lizard, covered his face with his arm. The tumbler falling from it, struck Gibbie on the head — not severely, but hard enough to make him utter a little cry. At that sound, the latent fierceness came wide awake in Sambo. Gently as a nursing mother he set Gibbie down in a corner behind him, then with one rush sent every Jack of the company sprawling on the floor, with the table and bottles and glasses atop of them. At the sight of them his good humor instantly returned, he burst into a great hearty laugh and proceeded at once to lift the table from off them. That effected, he caught up Gibbie in his arms, and carried him with him to bed.

In the middle of the night Gibbie half woke, and, finding himself alone, sought his father's bosom; then, in the confusion between sleeping and waking, imagined his father's death come again. Presently he remembered it was in Sambo's arms he fell asleep, but where he was now he could not tell: certainly he was not in bed. Groping, he pushed a door, and a glimmer of light came in. He was in a closet of the room in which Sambo slept — and something was to do about his bed. He rose softly and peeped out. There stood several men, and a struggle was going on — nearly noiseless. Gibbie was half-dazed, and could not understand; but he had little anxiety about Sambo, in whose prowess he had a triumphant confidence. Suddenly came the sound of a great gush, and the group parted from the bed and vanished. Gibbie darted towards it. The words, "O Lord Jesus!" came to his ears, and he heard no more: they were poor Sambo's last in this world. The light of a street lamp fell upon the bed: the blood was welling, in great thick throbs, out of his huge black throat. They had bent his head back, and the gash gaped wide.

For some moments Gibbie stood in ghastly terror. No sound except a low gurgle came to his ears, and the horror of the stillness overmastered him. He never could recall what came next. When he knew himself again, he was in the street, running like the wind, he knew not whither. It was not that he dreaded any hurt to himself; horror, not fear, was behind him.

From The Argosy.

LIGHTHOUSES.

LIGHTHOUSES are of great antiquity, but were long of a very imperfect kind; originally nothing more than open fires on the ground. Faraday says that the first idea of a lighthouse was the candle in the cottage window, lighting the husband across the water, or the pathless moor. At an early period in the history of commerce the necessity for such structures must have been felt, and the ancients paid great attention to their construction. The most celebrated lighthouse of antiquity was that of Pharos, near Alexandria, built by Ptolemy Philadelphus, B.C. 280. Josephus states that its light could be distinguished at forty-five miles distance; it fell so recently as A.D. 1303. From this building pharos came to be the general name for lighthouse, and still exists in the French phare.

The Romans were diligent builders of lighthouses, and were the first to introduce them into England. On the summit of Dover Mount still stands the Roman pharos which is supposed to have lighted vessels from the coast of France. Authentic records have come to us of lighthouses at Ostea, Caprea, Ravenna, Puteoli, at the mouth of the Chrysorhoas, on the Bosphorus, Boulogne; and Pennant gives a plate of what is supposed to have been a Roman tower at Gaireg, in Wales.

During the Middle Ages many such towers were erected, the most beautiful of which, as an architectural structure, is that of Genoa. The old English towers were rough and homely, and Lambarde describes them before the reign of Edward III. as "merely great stacks of wood."

The general management of lighthouses and buoys in England is entrusted to the Corporation of the Elder Brethren of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, known as Trinity House. This body was first incorporated in the year 1515, in the reign of Henry VIII., but for many years little was done to ensure the safety of ships by means of lights. With the increase of commerce and navigation, however, they became a matter of necessity, and in the time of James I. the first lighthouse was erected on Dungeness Point.

The first stone lighthouse in Europe was the celebrated Tour de Condouran, built on a flat rock off the mouth of the Garonne, in the Bay of Biscay. It was finished and lit up more than two hundred and fifty years ago, but still continues one

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY of the finest towers in existence; it replaced one built by the English between 1362–71, when the Black Prince was governor of Guienne. The stone building was begun by Louis de Foix in 1584, continued through the reign of Henry IV., and finished in that of Louis XIII. Its height is now one hundred and eighty-six feet, and its style of construction enables it to bear much more decoration than our own more homely structures; it is also memorable as the first house which exhibited a revolving light.

Perhaps the most familiar and celebrated of all lighthouses is that of Eddystone, which marked a crisis in the history of lighthouse building, for the marvellous success which attended its erection led to many other works of the same kind. The Eddystone forms the crest of a reef of rocks which rise fourteen miles S.S.W. of Plymouth Harbor; they are nearly in a line with Lizard Head and Start Point, and lie in the very path of vessels coasting up and down the English Channel; many a gallant ship has been dashed to pieces, and its sailors gone down within sight of home, on this cruel rock. The first attempt to establish a light upon it was made by Mr. Winstanley, who obtained the necessary powers in 1696, and finished his honorable undertaking in four years, though the light was first exhibited in 1698. The rock being uncovered only at low water and in calm weather, rendered the undertaking one of extreme difficulty, and the first summer was entirely spent in making twelve holes in the rocks, and fastening irons into them by which to hold the superstructure; sometimes for ten or twelve days together, the violence of the eddying sea would prevent all operations. The work of the second summer was the erection of a solid pillar on which to set the lighthouse; and during the third, it rose to a height of eighty feet. The fourth summer saw the completion of what resembled a Chinese pagoda, with open galleries and numerous projections; the main gallery under the light was so wide that an eye-witness recorded that it was "possible for a six-oared boat to be lifted up on a wave, and driven clear through the open gallery into the sea on the other side." Winstanley deserves every credit for his heroic endeavor to accomplish what had hitherto been deemed impossible, but a building so unsuited in every way to endure the violence of winds and waves could not stand, and we are not surprised to hear that, during a violent storm in November, 1703, it was entirely washed away, though we must regret that its brave erector perished in the fall of his own creation.

Three years after this failure, in 1706, the Brethren of Trinity House obtained an act of Parliament to enable them to rebuild the lighthouse, and the lease being taken by Captain Lovet, he entrusted the work to John Rudgood, who designed a simple and masterly tower which, avoiding the projections of its predecessor, offered as little resistance as possible to the elements; it was erected in the form of a cone, but its main defect lay in the material of which it was composed, for, like Winstanley's, it was of wood. It would take too long to follow the details of a building which was then considered a triumph of engineering skill: it is sufficient to say it stood bravely for fifty years and fell a victim to fire in 1755; the flames spread with rapidity through the dry and heated lantern, and in a few minutes the whole building was in a blaze. As the increasing trade in the Channel impelled its re-erection, the proprietors took at once the necessary steps for the work, and casting around for the best man their choice fell upon John Smeaton, whose name will ever live in connection with one of the proudest triumphs of human skill and patience. He was by profession a mathematical-instrument maker, and the matter in hand was wholly new to him, but he lost no time in devoting all his energies to it.

One of his first conclusions was, that the building must be of stone, thus combating the popular impression that "nothing but wood could possibly stand on the Eddystone." He carefully examined the plans of the two former lighthouses, and became more and more convinced that their defect was want of weight; he therefore resolved to make his building solid up to a certain height and from thence hollow, and greatly to increase the diameter of the foundation, taking for his model the bole of a spreading oak-tree; he also made very extensive use of the process of dove-tailing, then unknown in masonry, and rooted his foundations into the rock. His plans were made before he ever visited the scene of his future labors, but so skilfully were they laid that slight modifications only were needed. Nothing could bring before us more vividly the almost superhuman difficulties of this undertaking than the account of Smeaton's first attempts to land on the Eddystone rock. Day after day a storm kept him on shore, and when he did reach his destination the sea was

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

so violent that to effect a landing was impossible. This was not the history of one but repeated trials, and we must ever honor the man who, by his patient perseverance, won so noble a victory over the greatest obstacles that nature in her angriest mood could lay in his path.

It was determined that the lighthouse should be built of stone, and all arrangements having been made, Smeaton himself fixed the centre and laid down the lines on August 3rd, 1756, and from that date the work proceeded steadily but intermittently, depending greatly on tide and weather; at the most not more than six hours' labor could be done at one time. By the end of November the necessary cutting in the rock had been safely accomplished, and the workers returned to shore to prepare the stone for next season. The building was fairly begun in the summer of 1757, and, as soon as the work had been carried above high water, it proceeded rapidly. Next season the task was recommenced in May, and to the engineer's delight he found that the storms of winter had left the tower unscathed. This season saw the completion of the solid portion of the building, which formed the floor of the storeroom — the first of the necessary rooms for the lighthouse keepers: the walls of these rooms are twenty-six inches thick; the blocks of stone "joggled and cramped, so as to secure perfect solidity." All through these anxious months Smeaton's sole thought was for his lighthouse, and early in the morning and late at night would he gaze eagerly through his telescope from Plymouth Hoe, till the tall white pillar of darting spray assured him of the safety of his cherished undertaking, every portion of which had been manufactured under his own eye. The next season proved so stormy that the men did not begin their work till July; but, so rapidly did it now progress, that by August 17th the last stone was set, and on October 16th, 1759, that light was first exhibited which for more than a century has been a source of joy and safety to the tempest-tossed sailor. The Eddystone lighthouse is ninety feet high, and its light is visible for nine miles, and is now only one of the many beacons which light up the English Channel along its whole extent, and render its navigation as safe by night as by day.*

Eleven miles from the mainland of Scotland, near the entrances of the Firths of Forth and of Tay, lies a dangerous reef, which, so early as the fourteenth century, was a source of such peril that the Abbot of Arbroath caused a bell to be placed on what is now so well known as the Bell Rock. In 1799 a more than usually violent storm, which caused a terrible loss of life, gave rise to the formation of many plans for a lighthouse on the fatal spot, and Captain Brodie proposed one of cast iron, but his idea was not approved of. Other plans were also proposed and rejected, till the commissioners appointed Mr. Rennie to examine the site, and report as to the best course to be pursued. After much deliberation he decided that a stone lighthouse, built on the plan of Eddystone, would alone meet the exigencies of the case; the rock being uncovered by the water for less time than that of Eddystone, the difficulties of the foundation would be even greater, but he had no doubt they could be overcome and the work accomplished in four years. The report was adopted, and Mr. Rennie appointed chief engineer, with Mr. Stevenson as assistant, to superintend operations on the spot, and in 1807 the task was begun.

It is impossible in one short paper to follow in detail the difficulties, disappointments, and slow progress of the building of each lighthouse, which were much the same in every case, varied only by the greater or less hindrances of tide and site. The history of the Bell Rock lighthouse rivals in thrilling interest that of Eddystone, and should be read by all who can sympathize with the daring yet patient ardor of our great engineers. We must be content to say that it was happily completed by the end of 1810, and the light regularly exhibited after February 11th, 1811. Its cost was £61,332; its height, one hundred and seventeen feet, and its light can be seen for a distance of eighteen miles.

Another celebrated Scotch lighthouse, to which a brief notice must be accorded, is that of Skerryvore, twenty-four miles west of Iona. It is the chief rock of a long reef of compact gneiss, which stretches for eight or ten miles, and in the only point which could afford the needful foundation; for forty-four years previous to 1844 it had been annually the scene of

* Since these words were written it has been discovered that the foundations of the Eddystone Lighthouse have commenced to give way. The lighthouse is consequently condemned. It was at first proposed to destroy the rock on which it stands by dynamite; but there appears to have been some objection to this plan: and the present lighthouse will probably give place to a new and still more perfect structure.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

a shipwreck. The difficulty of landing was great, owing to the immense force (three tons to the superficial foot) with which the Atlantic broke upon it, and caused the delay of the scheme till 1838, when it was undertaken by Mr. Alan Stevenson, who followed generally the plan of the Bell Rock, and, in spite of disasters and tempests, completed his work in 1844. Its cost was nearly £87,000; its diameter at the base, forty-two feet, and at the top, sixteen feet; and its light is a guide to mariners for eighteen miles.

The total number of lights in Great Britain in January, 1871, afloat and ashore, was five hundred and fourteen. Lighthouses in England are usually painted white or red, while those in Scotland are left their natural color. The number of lights of all classes on the English coast averages one to nearly every eleven miles; or, if the floating lights are excluded, one to every fourteen miles; as a general rule, the horizon to be lighted is limited to fifteen or twenty miles, and the height above the sea level varies from ninety to five hundred and forty feet; depending, of course, on the situation of the foundation.

The French lighthouse system is very perfect and comprehensive; the authorities class their lights in four divisions, according to their power and range of visibility. The phares of the first class are visible for thirty, those of the second for twenty-five, those of the third for fifteen miles; while the fourth class, or harbor lights, are seen only for six miles. Of thirteen of the principal French lighthouses, the height varies from one hundred and fifty-seven to three hundred and ninety-seven feet, and the cost from £4,000 to £38,000; while the range of visibility is from eighteen to twenty-seven miles. The greatest recorded distance at which an oil lamp has been seen is that of the holophotal light of Allepey, in Travancore, which has been visible from an elevated position forty-five miles away. This seems very wonderful, but is almost equalled by the revolving light of Buccalieu, in Newfoundland, which throws its beneficent beams for forty nautical miles.

Something must now be said on the subject of the lights themselves, which, beginning with the old-fashioned beacon fires, have not yet reached perfection. The earliest system was merely that of blazing fires on the open ground; then a candle was tried placed in a lantern, and this was adopted at Eddystone, which was first lighted by twenty-four candles in a sort of chandelier. The use of oil lamps instead of candles is said to have been introduced by the celebrated engineer Borda, about 1780 or 1790. Various kinds of oil have been tried; for fifty years spermaceti was used, but the preference is now given to rape-seed, or colza, as the most economical and reliable.

The next step in advance was the adoption of reflectors, which gave rise to the catoptric system, which was universal for half a century. The light thrown from a parabolic reflector is sent out in parallel rays, and can be seen for a great distance. Then came the dioptric system, which consisted in magnifying one large flame through a lens. It had been suggested to Smeaton, 1759, and had been actually employed in the Portland lighthouse in 1789, but, through some mismanagement, it had fallen into disfavor for many years till revived by Augustin Fresnel in a paper read before the French Academy of Sciences, in 1822. The French government at once adopted the dioptric system, which has been improved and perfected by Leopold Fresnel, Alan Stevenson, Arago, and Faraday; it is to this last-named distinguished philosopher that we are indebted for the present efficient mode of ventilating lighthouse lamps.

The light now generally adopted in British lighthouses is a mixture of the two systems; inside the great glass lantern, usually about twelve feet high, is placed another framework of glass, corresponding to the shape of the lantern, and which, enclosing the lamp, is composed of, firstly, a band of glass round the middle, called the lenticular belt, which considerably magnifies the flame; the top consists of a number of prisms, which intercept the light which would otherwise be lost on the roof; and in the lower part of the apparatus is another set of prisms, which, in a similar manner, prevent the light being wasted below.

A curious light is one shown at Stornoway Bay, where the position of a rock is indicated by means of a beam of parallel rays thrown from the shore upon an apparatus fixed in the top of a beacon erected upon the rock itself; this is called an apparent light, from its appearing to rise from a flame on the rock, while in reality it proceeds from the shore six hundred and fifty feet distant, and is refracted by glass prisms placed on the beacon.

Many other means of lighting, besides that of oil lamps, have been tried, though none of them are yet extensively adopted;

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

lime light, electric light, magnesium, and gas. Sir William Thomson, however, considers that "the lighthouse of the future is to be illuminated by gas, except when the situation is on an isolated rock, or where, for any reason, the price of coal is prohibitory." Professor Tyndall coincides in this opinion, and in a paper by Mr. Wigham, gas engineer, we find that this theory has been put into practice by the Irish Board of Lights at Howth Bailey, in Dublin Bay, where an actual saving has been effected by the substitution of gas for oil. The most beautiful and interesting, perhaps, of all lights, is that discovered by Professor Faraday, the electric light. It is really nothing more than the white heat caused by the meeting of two opposing electrical currents, generated by a powerful machine, and conveyed by two copper wires, each terminating in a carbon point. These points are kept at a certain distance from each other, and when the two opposing currents meet there, the resistance of both causes the carbon to glow and become white hot; the incandescent state of the carbon is the brilliant electric light itself. It was utilized by Mr. Holmes, who invented an apparatus for producing it, which was tried in 1859 at the South Foreland lighthouse; it has, however, only been steadily used for six years, but has proved itself so successful that it merits a somewhat detailed notice. The stream of electricity which supplies the two lighthouses standing one above the other on the chalk cliffs of the South Foreland promontory, is not derived from a pile or a battery, but is ground out of huge magneto-electric machines worked by a twenty horse-power steam engine — the current being conducted by wires from the machine-house to the lighthouses. The light generated by this beautiful contrivance is kept constant by means of a clockwork arrangement which draws the carbon points closer together as they disperse themselves by combustion; it is necessary, however, to change them altogether every three hours, but as this is accomplished by the keeper in a few seconds, no real inconvenience is experienced. The cost is a more serious consideration, for we are told, while three keepers suffice for an ordinary lighthouse, a staff of eight men is constantly needed to sustain the electric light at the South Foreland.

A large majority of lights on the British coast are fixed, but a considerable number are revolving. Sir William Thomson considers the present system of lighting very far from perfect, and would have all lighthouses so distinguished that they could not possibly be mistaken for ship or shore lights. He recommends the abolition of lights revolving at different intervals, which, he says, are often mistaken on a stormy night, and the adoption of Morse's telegraph signs. Each lighthouse should have its own letter, which it should show incessantly from sunset to sunrise by means of Morse's dots and dashes, this being accomplished by a simple mechanical contrivance which would drop a screen before the gaslight, eclipsing it at intervals, thus by light and darkness showing the letters on Morse's plan; the length between the dots and dashes indicated by intervals of darkness, the dots and dashes themselves, that is the letters, by short and long flashes; this is called an occulting light. The originator of this idea was Babbage the mathematician, and his paper on the subject may be found by the curious in the pigeon-holes of Trinity House, though warmly approved of by such high authorities as Professor Tyndall and Sir William Thomson, the latter of whom has invented an eclipsing gaslight to be employed in lighthouses, which was exhibited at a conversazione of telegraph engineers on December 2nd, 1874.

This branch of scientific discovery is, like so many others at the present day, still capable of further development, and the perfection and extension of the labors of our savants will doubtless furnish a theme of interest to the future historian of scientific research, and its practical application to the wants of commercial navigation. A. G.

From The Saturday Review.

BOOKWORMS.

In the long and bitter struggle for supremacy which has gone and is still going on between the bookish few and the unread many, we must reckon to the score of the latter two signal advantages, when, in times past, they invented the terms "bookworm" and "blue-stocking." These were immense achievements, such as their opponents could scarcely match, and all the more noticeable because the party from which they have proceeded is, as a rule, the inarticulate one. Such an instance of the force of expression whereby it has once upon a time delivered itself is a measure of the feeling which lies smoul-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

dering in the breasts of all its members, the "great silent souls" — to borrow a phrase of Mr. Carlyle — who belong to what we may call the unintellectual class. It should serve as a wholesome caution to the literary minority, who are too apt to forget — because, forsooth, they can make their side of the dispute sound the loudest — that there is this balanced conflict going on, and to imagine that the fighting is all on one side, that they have now nothing more to do than to inflict the proper chastisement upon their opponents. Nothing can exceed the depth of their error upon this and kindred questions; a natural error, perhaps, because they are here concerned with the subject of their own influence and importance in the world. What the literary man is pleased to call (euphemistically) fame or reputation arising from his successes is by this very term bookworm exposed at its true valuation in the eyes of the laity. When expanded into its full meaning — for the utterances of the silent class are as concise and pregnant as those of an oracle — the word seems to express some such sentence as this addressed to the man of letters: You are a poor creature, who, from the unkindness either of nature or fortnne, have failed past all hope of success in the real efforts of life; you have never been an athlete, a maker of scores at cricket, or a rower in university eights; you have shown no skill as a sportsman; and, as you grew in years, you did not grow in your knowledge of horseflesh or in your discrimination of vintages. You are letting the years pass over you without having learnt or done one of the things which it is the common desire of mankind to learn and do. You never won a Derby or a shooting-match, or made a great "bag" or a good "book;" you have not got so much as a single cup or a single brush to show that your life has not been lived in vain. But, to avoid the stings of conscience, and a too crushing sense of defeat, you bury yourself in the frivolous and fanciful pursuits of literature or science, and surround yourself with a clique of unhappy wretches of the same mould — lepers and outcasts in reality — who agree in pretending that their unhealthy hues are the natural complexion of man in his highest development.

This is the real opinion of the world — the vast majority in any country — concerning fame and literary reputation. Balzac said that critics were les impuissants qui manquent à leur début; most men would go further and apply the phrase to everybody who wields a pen. By sedulously shutting his eyes to the truth and courting the society of his kind, such as can be found in large towns, the bookworm may for a time succeed in forgetting that he is not a hero, but a sort of pariah among his fellowmen. Indeed, as has been said, his blindness sometimes leads him to the length of railing against the unlearned, as though he were carrying the whole world along with him. For a proper awakening, and in order that society may have its full revenge upon him, let the bookworm be tracked out alone, and taken away to spend a few months in the midst of an agricultural neighborhood; that is to say, let him be put for once among a people occupied not with the fictitious interests of imagination or of the past, but with those real and constantly recurring interests which attach to turnips considered either in respect of their own qualities or of the quantity of game to which they will afford a shelter, the conflicting merits of different kinds of guns and cartridges, the capacities and the ailments of the horse and the dog, etc. In the midst of these things he soon discovers how remote his speculations have lain from the practical business of life. To such varied subjects will be added about nightfall disquisitions upon the purchase and history of wines and of cigars — is he more at home here? — or upon that never-failing topic, the history of the coloring of a meerschaum pipe. Among the other sex, besides the universal and purely feminine interests of dress and babies, some local disturbance — the dispute between the clergyman and his archdeacon, between the schoolmaster and the Dissenting minister — involves, it is evident, some deepest considerations of policy or of religion, but so intricately that they are quite inexplicable to the uninstructed layman.

At first, with a sinful hankering after forbidden pleasures, our bookworm hopes to gain some consolation from his accustomed companions. He carries the accursed thing in pocket volumes about with him, and tries to steal away into arbors or unused morning rooms. But he is oppressed by a sense of guilt and a constant fear of detection, which eat into and in time quite wear away his power of enjoyment. There are some hosts and hostesses who feel it to be a reflection upon their character if their guest is seen occupied with a book, deeming that nothing but the extremity of dulness could ever bring one

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

to such a pass. And so, if he goes to the library at all, the bookworm must go there under the plea of writing letters, and take good heed not to become too absorbed, lest he should find that some expedition out of doors has been waiting for him to join it. Or he must stand by the bookshelf in an attitude of pretended irresolution — the true dawdling attitude of a country house — as though only casually, and as it were accidentally, peering into the volume. When he drives to a picnic he longs for a seat on the box, which might afford a chance for gratifying his craving; but if he gets there he is allowed no peace, and is almost required to twist his head off for fear of missing the sights of the neighborhood. These are penalties sufficient for whatever contemptuous expressions he or his associates may in happier moments have been betrayed into towards the unreading public. For, if he is a true brother of the order, some daily dose of literature is as necessary to the bookworm as his daily drops are to the opium-eater; without it he must die, or abruptly end his visit. Towards the end of the day his agonies grow very intense. During the protracted discussion of wines in the dining-room his spirits have been rapidly falling, just as the opium-eater's spirits fall when the hour for his dose has long passed, and at last threaten a total extinction; and when he gets into the drawing-room and the music is found fairly under way — "John Peile" for the benefit of the country gentlemen — he is mechanically drawn to the one bookshelf the room contains. Alas, it has glass doors and they are locked! A row of standard authors in virgin bindings — sleeping beauties — lie before his eyes, ready for a touch to awake them into life; but he has not the audacity of the true prince. Certainly the enchantment consists of nothing more than two comparatively inexpensive glass doors. He could break through it, after such a period of torture; but his resolution is not fixed before he is recalled to the excitement of a round game at cards.

Nevertheless, let him take courage, for his time will come at last. Have we not said that otherwise he must perish? It comes when the household has retired for the night. There in bed, at the double danger of murder and suicide — only that, like Macaulay, he has too often run the risk of committing patricide, matricide, and fratricide to attach much weight to such a consideration as that — we may leave him to his orgies. The early habits of the country, early chiefly in the direction of retiring to rest, are a great inducement towards reading in bed, supposing any inducement to such an indulgence were necessary; and for ourselves we have never known any moments of this enjoyment more keenly pleasurable than such as were won under the circumstances in which we have placed the bookworm. Increase of appetite has not in these cases grown from what it fed on, but from a terrible and protracted fast. Fortunately in the present day no household is so unlettered as not to offer us plenty of matter worth reading; indeed there is a certain class of literature almost always to be met with in those country wildernesses, and seeming to have a peculiar appositeness and vitality there. We can remember making our first close acquaintance with Bewick's "British Birds" in the most bookless house in which it was ever our fortune to be cast. Bewick and Walton and White of Selborne are of course sure to be lurking somewhere; and these three authors, less than any that we know, should be read in copies furnished from a lending library. If we do not possess them ourselves, we should certainly wait till we can borrow them from a friend; for they are treasures too sacred and individual to form a part of any communal schemes. In addition to these classics, the country house may be reckoned upon to hold a number of works which are too rapidly disappearing from our town bookshelves — the bygone classics, standing monuments of wit and beauty as they were esteemed by our fathers, now almost utterly faded from the recollection of the present generation. Here they find their asylum, their harbor of refuge, where the peace of their last resting-place is seldom broken. Such books as we mean are "Tom and Jerry," or Seymour's "Sporting Sketches," or "The Book of Beauty, Edited by the Countess of Blessington," with its story by B. Disraeli, Esq., and elegant verses by Thomas Haynes Bayly, or Mrs. Radcliffe or Mrs. Gore, or "our immortal Joanna Baillie" herself — the expression is Scott's — and many immortals more back to the time of the author of "Douglas;" or, again, some of the antique numbers of magazines and reviews — the Gentleman's Magazine of sixty years ago, or the Quarterly and Blackwood under the editorship of Southey and Lockhart. When we read such relics of the past, we see that the historic imagination may be exercised without going further away than

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the youth time of the last generation; and for any unkindly rubs of fortune in our own case, some unaccountable blindness of the reading public towards our merits, we gain the solace of a free criticism of other former reputations. How remote some of these things seem from us — impossible beauties, impossible sentimental stories, impossible political theories of Southey and Lockhart. We might be exploring an antediluvian literature. The proverb is something musty. "Die two months ago, and not forgotten yet! then there is hope that a great man's memory may outlive his life half a year."

An Old-Fashioned Orchard. — In these modern days men have lost the pleasures of the orchard; yet an old-fashioned orchard is the most delicious of places wherein to idle away the afternoon of a hazy autumn day, when the sun seems to shine with a soft slumberous warmth without glare, as if the rays came through an aërial spider's web spun across the sky, letting all the beauty but not the heat slip through its invisible meshes. There is a shadowy coolness in the recesses under the trees. On the damson trunks are yellowish crystalline knobs of gum which has exuded from the bark. Now and then a leaf rustles to the ground, and at longer intervals an apple falls with a decided thump. It is silent save for the gentle twittering of the swallows on the topmost branches — they are talking of their coming journey — and perhaps occasionally the distant echo of a shot where the lead has gone whistling among a covey. It is a place to dream in, bringing with you a chair to sit on — for it will be freer from insects than the garden seats — and a book. Put away all thought of time; often in striving to get the most value from our time it slips from us as the reality did from the dog that greedily grasped at the shadow; simply dream of what you will, with apples and plums, nuts and filberts within reach. Dusky Blenheim oranges, with a gleam of gold under the rind; a warmer tint of yellow on the pippins. Here streaks of red, here a tawny hue. Yonder a load of great russets; near by heavy pears bending the strong branches; round black damsons; luscious egg-plums hanging their yellow ovals overhead; bullace, not yet ripe, but presently sweetly piquant. On the walnut-trees bunches of round green balls — note those that show a dark spot or streak, and gently tap them with the tip of the tall slender pole placed there for the purpose. Down they come glancing from bough to bough, and, striking the hard turf, the thick green rind splits asunder, and the walnut itself rebounds upwards. Those who buy walnuts have no idea of the fine taste of the fruit thus gathered direct from the tree, when the kernel, though so curiously convoluted, slips its pale yellow skin easily, and is so wondrously white. Surely it is an error to banish the orchard and the fruit garden from the pleasure-grounds of modern houses, strictly relegating them to the rear as if something to be ashamed of. Pall Mall Gazette.

Spontaneous Combustion of Wasps' Nests. — Some time ago the house of General P. M. Arismendi (now consul of Venezuela, in Port-of-Spain, Trinidad) in this city, had a rather narrow escape from being set on fire by the spontaneous combustion of a large wasps' nest (a species of Polistes) in a closet under a roof. The day was exceedingly hot; but this circumstance, I think, has a very slight connection (if any at all) with the outbreak of smoke from the nest. Roofs in this country are constructed of tiles supported by a thick layer of compact earth, which rests on the usual lath-work of dry canes (the stems of Gynerium saccharoides, or aborescent grass), both being substances that conduct heat very badly. The source of heat must therefore have been in the nest itself. In bee-hives the temperature rises sometimes as high as 38° C. (teste Newport, as cited in Girdwoyn, "Anat. et Physiol. de l'Abeille," p. 23). We may be allowed to suppose that something similar happens occasionally also in wasps' nests. Such a heat might be caused by an alteration beginning in the wax, hydro-carbons being formed, which, on being absorbed by the paper-like, porous substance of the cell-walls, must get still more heated, so that a comparatively small access of oxygen would be sufficient to set the whole nest on fire.

I have been assured that the spontaneous combustion of wasps' nests is a well-known fact in the interior of Venezuela, and as I do not recollect having found it mentioned in books, it appeared to me worth while to inquire whether something similar has been observed in other parts of the world, and if so, whether my explanation will hold good in all cases. A. Ernst.

Carácas, July 15.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

Fifth Series, Volume XXIV. } No. 1796. — November 16, 1878. { From Beginning, Vol. CXXXIX.

CONTENTS.

I.	The Brothers Chambers,	London Quarterly Review,	387
II.	Sir Gibbie. By George MacDonald, author of "Malcolm," "The Marquis of Lossie," etc. Part IV.,	Advance Sheets,	400
III.	Faith and Verification. By W. Mallock,	Nineteenth Century,	410
IV.	Within the Precincts. By Mrs. Oliphant. Part XVII.,	Advance Sheets,	423
V.	The Things We Have Not,	Saturday Review,	432
VI.	The North American Indians,	London Times,	434
VII.	The Art of Going Away,	Saturday Review,	438
VIII.	Social Hypocrites,	Saturday Review,	440
IX.	Character and Position,	Spectator,	442
X.	Weather Prophecies,	Spectator,	445
XI.	Endurance and Fatalism,	Spectator,	447

POETRY

In Harvest Day, ... 386
"Aus alten Marchen winkt es, . 386
The Unburied Church, Penmaen, . 386

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY BY

LITTELL & GAY, BOSTON.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

For Eight Dollars, remitted directly to the Publishers, the Living Age will be punctually forwarded for a year, free of postage.

An extra copy of The Living Age is sent gratis to any one getting up a club of Five New Subscribers.

Remittances should be made by bank draft or check, or by post-office money-order, if possible. If neither of these can be procured, the money should be sent in a registered letter. All postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so. Drafts, checks and money-orders should be made payable to the order of Littell & Gay.

Single Numbers of The Living Age, 18 cents.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

IN HARVEST DAY.

THRO' Farmer Gale's wide fields I passed
Just yestereve;
My week of holiday was spent,
And idly on the stile I leant,
Taking my leave

Of all the fair and smiling plain,
Wood, vale, and hill,
And all the homely household band
(The warm grasp of each kindly hand Bides with me still);

And I was sad. The stricken grain
Around me lay;
I could but think of silent glade —
Of buds and blossoms lowly laid
That harvest day.

"And this is all!" I sadly said,
"These withered leaves —
This gathered grain! Spring's hours of bliss
And summer's glory turn to this —
Some yellow sheaves!"

Then Farmer Gale — that good old man,
So simply wise —
Who overheard, and quickly turned,
Said, while a spark of anger burned
In his grey eyes,

"Lad, thou art town-bred, knowing nought
Whereof thou pratest!
For, be the flower as fair as May,
The fruit it yields in harvest day
Is still the greatest!

"And thou — thy spring shall quickly pass;
Fast fall the leaves
From life's frail tree. In harvest day
See that before thy Lord thou lay
Some yellow sheaves."

He went his way; I mine; and now
I hear the flow
Of busy life in crowded street —
Of eager voices, hurrying feet,
That come and go.

Yet e'en while flashing factory looms
My hands engage,
I see that far-off upland plain —
Its long, long rows of gathered grain,
Its rustic sage,

And hear them say, "Let pleasures fair,
And passions vain,
And youthful follies fade and die;
But all good deeds, pure thoughts and high,
Like golden grain,

"Be gathered still." Blest harvest store,
That only grows
In hearts besprinkled with the blood
That evermore — a sacred flood —
From Calvary flows!

Lord, when thou callest, when this world
My spirit leaves,
Then to thy feet, oh, let me come,
Bringing, in joyful harvest-home,
Some yellow sheaves!

Sunday Magazine. ROBINA F. HARDY.

"AUS ALTEN MARCHEN WINKT ES."

FROM the realm of old-world story
There beckons a lily hand,
That calls up the sweetness, the glory,
The sounds of a magic land.

Where huge flowers droop in the splendor
Of closing day's golden red,
And gaze on each other with tender
Looks as of lovers new wed;

Where all the trees, too, have voices,
And all like a chorus sing,
And a sound as of music rejoices
In the babble of every spring;

On the air songs of true love are swelling,
Such as never elsewhere thou hast heard,
Till by yearnings divine beyond telling
Thy soul is divinely stirr'd.

Oh me, if I might go thither,
And gladden my careworn breast,
Shake off all the sorrows that wither,
Be happy and truly at rest!

Ah, many a time in my dreaming
Through that blessed region I roam!
Then the morning sun comes with its beaming,
And scatters it all like foam.

HEINE.

THE UNBURIED CHURCH, PENMAEN.

OF thy unwritten records, faerie Gower,
O'ermounded sepulchre or cromlech grey,
Giddy hill-fortress perch'd above the spray
That beats thy cliffs with unrelenting power,
Or cavern never reach'd by sun or shower, —
One relic, open'd to the eye of day
Out of the wind-swept sand-drift, brings a ray
Of light to gild thy long bedarken'd hour.
Lo, the unburied church on Penmaen downs!
Token of prayer and praise and minist'ring hands,
Of penitence and shrift for lawless bands.
One roof the cross, 'mid the wild dwellings, crowns,
The vesper bell rings softly o'er the sands,
Nor all unblest the realm where Penard frowns.

October 2nd, 1878. HERBERT NEW.

Spectator.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

From The London Quarterly Review.

THE BROTHERS CHAMBERS.*

THERE is a kind of cant lightly passed from lip to lip that publishers are the natural enemies of authors, feed on their brains, push modest merit into the background, and grudgingly reward popularity. The accusation, except in rare instances, is as unjust as it is untrue. In all professions there are discreditable members — literature itself being by no means an exception. But at no time have publishers been wanting as the generous and forbearing friends of authors. Indeed all who mix with literary men and women can cite instances of help given freely in sore need, of claims foregone, of difficulties smoothed, and paths opened by those who, making large outlays of capital and taking all the risk, are fairly entitled to a handsome share of the profits of literature. Moreover, from the days of Dodsley to our own, publishers have existed who have been both discriminating judges of the writings of others and themselves writers of no small distinction. Few careers offer wider opportunities of usefulness; and of those men who have combined book-writing with book-selling few perhaps have used these opportunities better than the late Robert, and the happily still surviving William, Chambers.

The birthplace of the brothers Chambers was that old-world town on the banks of the Tweed whose tranquillity suggested the proverb, "As quiet as the grave or as Peebles:" at the beginning of this century occupied by a prosperous, primitive, homely community of weavers, who burnt peat, ate from wooden platters with horn spoons, wore the stuffs they wove, and by way of dissipation invited each other to tea and proverbs — "a class of sayings" writes Robert Chambers, "which from their agreeable tartness found scope for exercise in ordinary transactions, and were more especially useful in snubbing children and keeping them in remembrance of their duty." Peebles was a paradise of handloom workers, where the operatives could easily earn two pounds a week, a sum which at that time and place represented much more comfort and importance than it would now. And a prominent man in the little community was James Chambers, sprung directly from generations of substantial woollen manufacturers, but looking back with pride through this prosaic vista to "William de la Chaumbre, Bailif é Burgois de Pebles, in the list of those who signed bonds of allegiance to Edward the First at Berwick-on-Tweed, in 1296."

James Chambers is described by his sons as neatly made and rather short, with a handsome face, a kindly, cheerful temper, and a taste for astronomy and the German flute. He occupied "a small mansion fronting Eddleston Water;" with a pretty sitting-room, carpeted, containing an alabaster clock and alabaster-framed pictures, rarities in those days, and also the Scottish indispensable — "a concealed bed;" with looms on the ground floor, and warp and weft in the garrets, where also was ignominiously stowed away a spinet which the music-loving head of the family had rashly sent in a carrier's cart from Glasgow, forgetful of the fact that there was no place for it to stand in.

Weaver James, seated at the open window of his little parlor on calm summer gloamings, "would play an endless series of Scottish airs which might be heard along the Eddleston Water," writes his son Robert. "Then, as the clear silvery moon and planets arose to illumine the growing darkness, out would be brought his telescope, which being planted on my mother's tea-table there ensued a critical inspection of the firmament and its starry host."

The mother's name opens another chapter of curious reminiscences of Scotland in days now historical. About two miles from Peebles was a farm called Newby, seven miles in length, though its homestead consisted only of a cottage and outhouses. Its occupants, towards the end of the last century, were a middle-aged farmer named Gibson, and his wife, a handsome girl of eighteen, who, small as their dwelling was, every night afforded shelter to troops of vagrants, sometimes as many as

* Memoir of Robert Chambers, with Autobiographical Reminiscences of William Chambers, LL.D. Ninth Edition. London and Edinburgh: W. and R. Chambers. 1877.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

twenty at a time. Those of the best character were entertained in "the farmer's ha'," where the family and servants usually sat, repaying their hosts by scraps of country-side gossip gathered in their peregrinations, which there was at that time no other means of hearing. The eldest daughter of the house in after years married James Chambers.

My grandmother and her maids [writes Robert Chambers] were generally up at an early hour to attend to the ewes, and their time for going to rest must consequently have been an early one. There was always, however, a period called "between gloaming and supper time," during which the wheels were brought out for spinning the yarn which was to clothe the family. I often think that it must have been a pleasing sight in that humble hall — the handsome young mistress amidst her troop of maidens, all busy with foot and finger, while the shepherds and their master, and one or two favored gaberlunzies, would be telling stories or cracking jokes for the general entertainment, or some one with a good voice would be singing the songs of Ramsay and Hamilton (p. 38).

Robert's earliest recollection of his mother is that of "a young woman of elegant shape and delicate features, . . . a being of ladylike grace and scarcely in her twenty-fourth year, though already the mother of four children. . . . Punctiliously tasteful in dress, and beautiful in feature, but with an expression of blended pensiveness and cheerfulness indicative of the position into which she had been brought. Even as a child I could see she had sorrows — perhaps regrets." The sorrows chiefly sprang from the temperament of her husband, whose genial disposition, tastes, and accomplishments exposed him to all the temptations attending social success, and who preferred cultivating his musical talent or studying astronomy with his celebrated friend, Mungo Park, then settled in Peebles as a surgeon, to superintending the hundred looms at one time in his employment. "Too slight a regard for personal responsibilities," as his son William gently puts it, threw the burden of them on the shoulders of his delicate wife, who, besides bringing up a large family, had to confront, and, where possible, conquer, the difficulties evaded by her husband. Two of their numerous children were born with six fingers on each hand and six toes on each foot.* This peculiarity was said by the gossips to presage good luck — and good fortune certainly rewarded both Robert and William in after life, though we are inclined to attribute it rather to perseverance, talent, and energy than to their superfluous members.

The two boys were at an early age intelligent, observant, and impressionable. They learnt a love of natural beauty from the place in which they lived, and the people among whom they moved gave them a sense of humor. What can suggest a prettier picture than the following passage from the recollections woven into William Chambers's life of his brother? —

The going forth of the town cows to their pasturage on a neighboring hill and their return, constituted leading and interesting events of the day. Early in the summer mornings the inhabitants were roused by the inharmonious sounds blown from an ox-horn by the townherd, who leisurely perambulated the streets with a grey plaid twisted round his shoulders. Then came forth the cows deliberately, one by one, from their respective quarters, and took their way instinctively by the bridge across the Tweed, their keeper coming up behind to urge forward the loiterers. Before taking the ascent to the hill, the cows, in picturesque groups, might have been seen standing within the margin of the Minister's Pool, a smooth part of the river which reflected on its glistening surface the figures of the animals in various attitudes, along with the surrounding scenery; the whole — river, cows, and trees — forming a tableau such as would have been an appropriate study for Berghem or Wouvermans (p. 20).

The strongly marked characteristics of the Peebles folk may naturally have given some hints to Scott for his famous Waverley portrait gallery. It is more surprising to find among the early acquaintances of the brothers Chambers certain oddities who might have supplied Dickens with the germs of two characters in "Our Mutual

* In William's case amputation of each surplus finger and toe was successfully resorted to; but in Robert's the remedy caused an almost lifelong soreness and tenderness of the feet.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Friend." Yet Miss Ritchie, the clever sprightly woman of irreproachable character, "who, so far from the obsequiousness of her profession, . . . ruled house, servants, and guests with her clear head and ready tongue," reminds us forcibly of Miss Abbey Potterson, to whose beneficent disposition and rough and ready rule over the "Six Jolly Fellowships' Porters," the waterside population of Limehouse bowed down. Miss Ritchie would never allow her customers to have liquor after a certain hour. "When that hour arrived — I think it was the Forbes-Mackenzie hour of eleven," says Robert Chambers — "it was vain for them to ask for a fresh supply. 'Na, na, gang hame to your wives and bairns,' was her dictum, and it was impossible for them to sit much longer."

On the clock's striking ten [says Charles Dickens] and Miss Abbey's appearing at the door, and addressing a certain person in faded scarlet jacket with "George Jones! your time's up. I told your wife you should be punctual," Jones submissively rose, gave the company good-night, and retired. At half past ten, on Miss Abbey's looking in again, and saying, "William Williams, Bob Glamour, and Jonathan, you are all due," Williams, Bob, and Jonathan with singular meekness took their leave and evaporated. Greater wonder than these, when a bottle-nosed person in a glazed hat had, after some considerable hesitation, ordered another glass of gin-and-water of the attendant pot-boy, and when Miss Abbey, instead of sending it, appeared in person, saying "Captain Joey, you have had as much as will do you good," not only did the captain feebly rub his knees and contemplate the fire without offering a word of protest, but the rest of the company murmured — "Ay, ay, captain, Miss Abbey's right. You be guided by Miss Abbey, captain."*

Tam Fleck, again, — considered by his neighbors "a flichty chield," who, "not particularly steady at his legitimate employments," struck out a sort of profession by going about in the evenings with a well-worn copy of L'Estrange's "Translation of Josephus," which he read as current news by the flickering blaze of the cottage fires, — recalls the familiar figure of Mr. Silas Wegg, at Boffin's Bower, alternately "dropping into poetry," and "declining and falling" with Gibbon's "Roman Empire" for the edification of the golden dustman and his Henrietty, at fivepence an hour. And the care with which the supply of improving literature was economized closely resembles that "ligneous sharper" Mr. Wegg's judicious method of eking out his scanty literary resources by pipes and cold pie. It was Tam Fleck's practice, says Dr. William Chambers, not to read more than from two to three pages at a time, interlarded with sagacious remarks of his own by way of foot-notes, and in this way he sustained an extraordinary interest in the narrative. Retailing the matter with great equability in different households, Tam kept all at the same point of information, and wound them up with a corresponding anxiety as to the issue of some moving event in Hebrew annals. Although in this way he went through a course of Josephus yearly, the novelty somehow never seemed to wear off. "Wal, Tam, what's the news the nicht?" would old Geordie Murray say, as Tam entered with his Josephus under his arm, and seated himself at the family fireside. "Bad news, bad news," Tam would reply, "Titus has begun to besiege Jeruselem — it's gaun to be a terrible business." The protracted and severe famine which was endured by the besieged Jews was a theme which kept several families in a state of agony for a week. And when Tam in his readings came to the final conflict and destruction of the city by the Roman general, there was a perfect paroxysm of horror. At such séances my brother and I were delighted listeners (pp. 30, 31).

Nothing can, perhaps, be imagined much more dramatic than the sudden invasion in 1810 of this quiet, sober-minded little Scotch town, whose inhabitants read Josephus for excitement, and took "a smell of fresh air" (generally in the kirkyard) for recreation, by over one hundred prisoners of war on parole. Most of them were lively, accomplished men; naval or military officers fresh from the Peninsular War, and all devoted adherents of Napoleon, though of varied nationality — French, Italian, Swiss, and Polish. Their strange, picturesque attire, their vivacious, gentlemanly manners, above all their determination to establish a table d'hôte, a

* Our Mutual Friend. By Charles Dickens, Vol. I., p. 49.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

billiard-room, and a theatre, without which existence was to them an impossibility, turned the heads of the peaceful Peebles folk and filled their hearts with fearful joy. Military stragglers had already visited the old town and given "an intellectual fillip to the place" — militia regiments had marched to and fro with drums beating and colors flying, and gay recruiting sergeants (dashing, insinuating fellows!) had carried off the youth and valor of the locality, leaving behind in their stead London newspapers, the most new and fashionable airs, — such as, "Cease your funning," — and a knowledge of cricket. A few prisoners, too, had been sent thither — Walloons, Dutch and Danes, who fell quietly into the ways of the quiet town, and by fishing and handicrafts managed to earn a bare subsistence. But no event so revolutionizing as the "French invasion" had ever before happened to Peebles!

James Chambers, as might be expected from his social disposition and love of excitement, took kindly to the clever and interesting exiles. Unable to compete with machinery, he had for some time given up his weaving business and set up as a draper. His new friends were not only welcomed to his house and assisted in their theatrical properties from his wife's wardrobe, but were liberally supplied with clothing from his stores. To these unprofitable business transactions Mrs. Chambers, with the welfare of a large young family at heart, demurred. But her husband, easy-tempered and sanguine, continued to give "unlimited credit" to his unfortunate customers, and, when the government order for their removal to Dumfriesshire arrived, lost every penny due to him. This brought on a crisis in his affairs, complicated by the roguery of a trustee. The home at Peebles was broken up, and the family removed to Edinburgh. Though occasioned by loss and trouble, nothing could have been more fortunate for the two lads than the change of abode. They had exhausted the educational resources of Peebles, which were not vast, though ampler, and incomparably more accessible, no doubt, than in English country towns at the same period. The first school attended by the brothers Chambers was kept by an old widow, who undertook to carry her pupils as far as reading the Bible, with the exception of difficult words, "such as Mahershalalhashbaz," which she told her pupils might reasonably be considered "a pass-over." Thence they were transferred to the burgh school, where reading and writing could be acquired for two shillings and twopence per quarter, with arithmetic thrown in for an extra sixpence; and where, during the teacher's too frequent absence on a carouse, the boys would have a "battle of the books," while the girls discreetly retired under the tables. The "finishing" academy was a grammar school of some celebrity in its day, boarders from Edinburgh and the colonies occasionally appearing there. Boys were even prepared for the university, being well grounded in Greek and Latin for five shillings a quarter. To this establishment Robert alone was advanced; William's education, technically so called, terminating at thirteen, having cost, books included, about six pounds. The boys learnt more at home than at school. They had picked up conversational French from their father's unprofitable customers, studied astronomy through his telescope, and, inspired by his example, spent their play hours in devouring Pope, Goldsmith, Fielding, Smollett, and the "Encyclopædia Britannica." The latter work was a mine of wealth, an intellectual Fortunatus's purse, discovered by Robert in a chest in the attic, having been, like the spinet, a white elephant of a purchase for which no standing room could be found in the crowded little house. "What the gift of a whole toyshop would have been to most children," he says, "this book was to me."

The brothers were fitted for a wider career than their native town could afford. They were independent, thoughtful, full of character, energy and resource. When James Chambers, after some fruitless attempts to revive his commission business in Edinburgh, accepted the post of manager to certain salt works at Joppa Pans, near Portobello, Robert and William were left in the capital; the former to pursue his studies at the academy of Benjamin Mackay, the latter to begin life as a bookseller's out-door apprentice, at four shillings a week. It is immensely to his credit that he made this scanty sum suffice for lodging, clothing ("shoes," he says, "were an awkwardly heavy item"), and board, never asking the smallest help from his father, but living bravely and contentedly on threepence-halfpenny a day, thanks to the frugal catering of his landlady, who declared that eating was "just a use," and relied principally on oatmeal. For a time William managed to earn a daily hot roll (most welcome addition to his scanty breakfast of porridge) by reading aloud to a baker of literary tastes but scanty leisure, while he and his sons prepared their batch. Rising about four o'clock on winter morn-

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ings, the lad of fourteen, before beginning a hard day's work at Sutherland's shop in Calton Street, made his way across the silent town to the baker's cellar, where for over two hours he read aloud, seated on a flour-sack in the window sill, with his book in one hand and a tallow candle stuck in a bottle in the other. The choice of books was left to the young reader, his employer only stipulating for "something comic." "Roderick Random" was the first experiment, attended by shouts of laughter; most of the novels of Smollett and Fielding followed in due succession, but "Gil Blas" was the prime favorite. Shop hours lasted from half past seven till nine at night. Such infinitesimal leisure as remained, the brothers (for Ropert temporarily shared William's bed-closet) spent with two studious lads, named King, "whose talk was of retorts, alkalies, acids, oxygen gas, Leyden jars and the galvanic pile." Their experiments, such as the production of coal-gas in a blacking-bottle, were conducted in the residence of a street porter, a handy and ingenious man, who in early life had broadened his sympathies and picked up an extensive assortment of odds and ends of knowledge by travelling as a gentleman's servant.

A varied experience of strange sorts and conditions of life, many of them long since obsolete, William Chambers gained during those early times of struggle and privation, which he half playfully, half sadly, calls the "dark ages." His master combined with book-selling a circulating library and and an agency for the State Lottery, many of whose patrons were found — strange regions for Alnaschar visions! — in the Sanctuary, the Canongate, and the Old Tolbooth. William's heaviest grievance was the delivery of "those odious piles of lottery circulars," but even in this he found characteristic consolation: "Over the doorway of an old house in the West Bow, which I passed several times daily, was the inscription carved in stone, He that tholes overcomes; I made up my mind to thole — a pithy old Scottish word signifying to bear with patience." The superstitious preferences of the lottery patrons were innumerable. Some would only buy odd numbers of five figures, others bought numbers they had dreamt of, others brought the seventh son of a seventh son to chose a number for them. The majority of purchasers contented themselves with a sixteenth share, costing about a guinea and a half, and were chiefly hackney coachmen, waiters, housekeepers, small tradesmen, and prisoners for debt. But the inhabitants of the Sanctuary would probably have disdained this title; "distinguished characters from England, gaunt, oldish, broken-down men of fashion, wearing big gold spectacles," to whom it was inconvenient to reside near their creditors, occupied the cluster of decayed buildings round Holyrood Palace, within whose precincts they surely defied the sheriff and his men. The debtors' quarter of the Old Tolbooth (of which many strange stories were told) when William Chambers found patrons there, was "little else than a union of lodging-house and tavern, under lock and key." Political fugitives occasionally found refuge there, and thence escaped to the Continent; and among the détenus were several voluntary residents, very obligingly overlooked by the governor, and preferring to live rent-free in a prison to paying for accommodation outside.

But however distasteful the routine of the week might be, Sunday always brought its blessed rest and variety. Between nine and ten on Saturday night the brothers started for their long walk through Portobello to Joppa Pans. The salt works had ceased to send up their noxious fumes, the manager's cottage, however poor and small, was home, and the mother's welcome was loving. Next day would be spent in due visits to the old churches of Inveresk or Dalkeith, followed by rambles through fields which, though scarred by coalpits, still had hedgerows where birds sang and wild flowers bloomed; or amongst "the shell and tangle covered rocks, against which pellucid waves dashed in unremitting murmurs." Even on these walks the rule of never losing a moment for mental cultivation was maintained, and the boys carried a French New Testament with them to study by the way.

The community amongst whom James Chambers was then living had many peculiarities. Together with the colliers in the neighboring tiled hamlets, the elder salt-makers had at one time been serfs, and in that condition had been legally sold with the property on which they dwelt.

> I conversed with some of them on the subject [says William Chambers]. They and their children had been inheritable fixtures to the spot. They could neither leave at will, nor change their profession. . . . I feel it curious that I should have seen and spoken to persons in this country who remembered being legally in a state of serfdom — and such they were until the year 1799, when an act of Parliament abolished this last remnant of slavery in the British Islands. Appreciating the

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

event, they set aside one day in the year as a festival commemorative of their liberation (pp. 117, 118).

The boys had not long even the home at Joppa Pans as a refuge. The trials of James Chambers and his wife reached a climax when he was waylaid and robbed of some money he had collected in Edinburgh for his employers. It seems hard measure that he should be discharged because he had been savagely attacked and left stunned and penniless in the high road. But probably his rugged and irritable independence, always averse to receive or obey orders, became unmanageable when they were such as he did not approve, so that he was unpopular with his employers; and the business at Joppa Pans consisted largely of "supplying material for a contraband trade across the border to England," a trade which high protective duties rendered exceedingly profitable, but whose illegality vexed the soul of the manager.

On Mrs. Chambers, in spite of her weak health and the cares of numerous children, devolved the task not only of nursing her husband, but also of supporting the whole family, except William. Removing at once to a small house on the Musselburgh road, she opened a shop, assisted by such very small savings as William could contribute, the most important item being half-a-guinea presented to him by the happy owner of the sixteenth of a twenty thousand pound prize. Wherever Mrs. Chambers went she made friends by her industry, rectitude, and pleasant manners. Her new undertaking, in course of time, prospered accordingly.

The change in the circumstances of the family fell most heavily on Robert. From inability to pay the college fees, he was compelled to give up his cherished scheme of becoming a divinity student, to which end he had been working desperately hard both in and out of school, half starving himself, and abstaining from every kind of recreation. "I cannot recollect," writes his brother, "that he ever spent a moment in what was purely amusing or of no practical value;" and this stoic was barely fifteen years old! Intensely fond of classical studies, he was a tolerable Latin verse writer and an ardent Pythagorean, sustained through every privation by the distinctions he won at school, and the hope that they presaged equal distinction in the Church. When this hope was dashed to the ground, and the reaction after so much effort and endurance came; when, in addition to his own disappointment, he was forced helplessly to witness the struggles and privations at home, "he wandered about with a sense of desolation," says his brother, "and abandoned himself to an agony of despair." But all this time the "divinity that shapes our ends," however hard our misdirected enthusiasms may strive against it, had been qualifying him for a career more suited to his powers than the ministry. His vocation was to teach through the press, not from the pulpit; and the extreme poverty which sent him after school-hours to the Old Tolbooth for warmth and shelter, or prompted his restless wanderings through every nook and corner of the old picturesque city, filled his fancy with character studies for future essays, and stored his brain with the quaint antiquarian and legendary lore which, seven years later, made Sir Walter Scott wonder "where the boy got all his information." But he could not foresee this in the hour of disappointment at his altered prospects; and the brothers held many a Sabbath eve consultation as to the future, as they sat on a grassy knoll overlooking the gleaming waters of the Firth. Jeremy Taylor says: "No man but hath blessings enough in present possession to outweigh the evils of a great affliction;" how the blessings are to be recognized and brought into practical application, comments William Chambers, is sometimes the difficulty. In Robert's case the blessings consisted of youth, health, a fair education, and honorable aspirations. Then came the question, what was he to do with them? At first a little teaching was undertaken at Portobello. Then an ill-paid situation in a merchant's office. But the latter involved a daily walk of twelve miles, which his lameness compelled him soon to give up; and from his next situation he was discharged, for no reason that he could think of, he said, but that his employer thought him "too stupid ever to be of any good." Impressionable, sensitive, feeling keenly the indifference of well-to-do relations, who might easily have removed the obstacles from his path, Robert now found himself "at the bottom of the ladder"—and instantly set about climbing up again.

Each brother had cherished a secret ambition: Robert's hope of entering the ministry must clearly be given up. William's dream of becoming a bookseller might still be realized. Why should not both enter on the same career, since the experience gained already by the one was fully at the service of the other? And not

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

the experience only: during his apprenticeship William had contrived, by heaven only knows what frugality and self-denial, again to save a very little money, and this was at his brother's disposal, to start him on his new career. So in 1818, at sixteen years old, the disappointed divinity student set up as a bookseller in Leith Walk, Edinburgh, with his stock in trade, consisting of the well-worn remains of his father's library, displayed on a rude stall in front of the little room which "served him for workshop, parlor, and all," as the nursery rhyme runs, and for which he paid the gigantic rental of six pounds a year. William went to live with him in order to lessen expenses, and to be at hand for professional advice, regardless of the fact that a bed on the floor, with a bundle of books for a pillow, was all the accommodation his brother could offer him.

In May, 1819, William's apprenticeship came to an end, and he resolved to make a bold stroke for independence. Continuing to live with his brother, he rented a small shop at no great distance in the Walk — a kind of broad boulevard, stretching for a mile between Edinburgh and the seaport, and used as a general thoroughfare in which most of the eccentrics of Edinburgh circulated, especially at the time of Leith races. Shops for shells, corals, and other curiosities abounded; but the chief attraction was a wax-work show, at whose entrance sat an old gentleman in full court dress, reading a newspaper which had occupied him for ten years. The houses were of a most heterogeneous order, villas with showy gardens appearing between rows of small shops, and an avenue of fine old trees leading to Pilrig House, fronting William's bookstall.

Robert having come into possession of the family library, it was problematical whence William's stock in trade would be derived, but for a lucky accident which gained him the good graces of the travelling agent of William Tegg, the Cheapside publisher, who was about to hold a trade sale at Edinburgh, and wanted the help of some one accustomed to pack and arrange books. William Chambers was recomended, and gave satisfaction; and inquiries followed as to what he meant to do. "I replied to the friendly inquirer, that I was about to begin business," says William, "and that if I had any money I should buy a few of his specimens. 'Well,' he replied, 'I like that frankness. You seem an honest lad, and have been useful to me. Select ten pounds' worth of samples, and I will give you the usual credit.'" This offer was joyfully embraced, and William, having wheeled his precious windfall home in a borrowed truck, spent the few remaining shillings of his last wages in deals, nails, etc., to fit up his shop and stall. A few days later he began business.

He saved as well as earned money in every possible way. He bought books in sheets, and learnt to put them in boards himself; and on wet days, when trade was dull, he transcribed poems for albums with exquisite neatness, in imitation of copperplate lettering. Then he began to write a little himself, and next to print his own productions. The modus operandi he must himself describe, premising that the whole machine only cost three pounds.

> The press, constructed to stand on a table, consisted of a wooden sole, with a carriage, on which the forme of types was to be laid; and this carriage required to be pushed forward and drawn out as you would a drawer. The power consisted of an iron screw hung on a cross beam, sustained by two upright supports. The handle was attached to the upper and projecting end of the screw, and had to be turned about twice with a smart jerk before the pressure could be effected. The working of the machine was slow. Owing to the unsteadiness of the structure, the impression was imperfect. The extent of the pressing surface was eighteen inches by twelve. . . . When the screw was brought to the pull a jangling and creaking noise was produced, like a shriek of anguish, that might have been heard two houses off. The impression being so effected the screw had to be whisked back to a state of repose. I had no table on which to fix this frail machine, and placed it on a stout wooden chest turned on its side, which in more prosperous days had been used in my father's house as a meal-ark.

Nothing more primitive, Dr. Chambers may well remark, had been attempted since Gutenberg made his rudimentary efforts in the art of printing.

> I think there was a degree of infatuation [he continues, evidently giving a half-compassionate, half-regretful glance at those happy days when he was so miserable] in my attachment to that jangling, creaking, wheezing little press. Placed at the only window in my apartment [he had by this time left his brother, and was renting a bedroom behind his own shop] within a few feet of my bed, I could see its outline in the silvery moonlight when I awoke. And there, at the glowing dawn, did its figure assume distinct proportions. When daylight came fully in, it was impossible to resist the desire to rise and have an hour or two of exercise at the little machine (pp. 158–162.

The first work which issued from this apparatus was "The Songs of Robert

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Burns," a popular subject, only too fascinating to the young printer himself, who "hung delightedly over the verses, and could not help singing them" as he set the type. After an interval of fifty years he adds, "I recollect the delight I experienced in working off my first impression, the pleasure since of seeing hundreds of thousands of sheets pouring from machines in which I claim an interest being nothing to it." The artist who illustrated the volume was as remarkable an instance of perseverance under difficulties as the young publisher; both were excellent representatives of a type of character perhaps only to be found in full perfection among the Scots.

Peter Fyfe had been a weaver's reed-maker in Paisley, but having been unfortunate in business had migrated to Edinburgh. Necessitous and clever, he was ready for anything artistic that might come in his way. I am not aware of any department in the fine or useful arts of which he would have confessed himself ignorant. At this period, when few knew anything of lithography, and he knew nothing at all, he undertook in answer to an advertisement to organize and manage a concern of that kind, and by tact and intuition gave unqualified satisfaction. Although altogether unacquainted with copperplate engraving he executed from the description I gave him a portrait of the Black Dwarf, for my account of that singular personage, which sketch has ever since been accepted as an authority. I now applied to this genius for an illustration to my song-book, which he successfully produced, and for a few additional shillings executed a vignette representing some national emblems (p. 163).

The profits of the venture, nine pounds, were found very useful in increasing William's stock of types, which he had been obliged to supplement by wooden letters cut with his chisel and penknife. His next experiment was a circulating library, in which the Waverley novels formed the chief attraction. A huge signboard, with "BOOKSELLER AND PRINTER" painted on it by his own ready hand, also attracted attention; and, in short, though he had many irons in the fire, he handled them so well that none of them burnt his fingers.

The printing stock had been enlarged just at the right time. A rage for writing fell on Robert (then nineteen), who projected a threepenny fortnightly periodical of sixteen pages octavo, to be called "The Kaleidoscope,* or Edinburgh Literary Amusement." Robert was the editor and author in chief; his brother William, printer, publisher, and contributor when leisure served. At the time William undertook these additional tasks he was already working sixteen hours a day, only allowing himself a quarter of an hour for meals which, indeed, did not offer much temptation to loiter, as he lived literally on the provincial sixpence a day. Nothing but the energy and hopefulness of youth could have sustained such pressure and privation.

The Kaleidoscope barely paid its expenses, and expired, at a year old, in 1822. Other hopes and prospects were opening to the young editor. In the same year he issued his first book, "Illustrations of the Author of Waverley," containing descriptions of supposed originals of notabilities in the earlier Waverley novels, such as Dominie Sampson, Meg Merrilies, etc. William set it up in his best long primer type, worked off a thousand copies, and put them in boards with pink paper covers. These were soon sold, and an Edinburgh publisher brought out a second edition in better style, with, as frontispiece, a portrait of Walter Scott, his face hidden by a curtain; an ingenious, and then novel, way of identifying the "Great Unknown." Another circumstance soon brought Robert Chambers into personal communication with his idol. Like his brother, Robert Chambers had cultivated ornamental penmanship; and among other things, he wrote with wonderful minuteness a large sheet of extracts from Scott's poems, which a friend showed to Constable. This led to Robert's obtaining an interview with the great publisher, who advised him to copy the songs from "The Lady of the Lake," in a volume which he would have bound, that Robert might personally present it to the author. The book was taken to Scott's house in Castle Street, and kindly and admiringly received. In a letter from Robert Chambers to Constable, describing the interview, gratitude and enthusiasm hurried the usually accurate and even precise young writer into an extraordinary image. Hoping that he did not stay too long, he adds: "If I have been guilty there, my excuse will readily be found in my only having endeavored to take as long a draught as possible of the bewitching bowl of his presence."

When George IV. visited Edinburgh in 1822, Scott employed his young admirer in copying addresses to the king, and also commissioned him to enter in a volume like the one presented to himself the best vers d'occasion inspired by the royal visit.

* The kaleidoscope, "an optical toy, about which people were, for a time, nearly crazy,' was invented by Brewster in 1821.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

In 1823 the stock of the two brothers had become worth about two hundred pounds each, and they removed to better quarters — William to Broughton Street, Robert to India Place, where he began his "Traditions of Edinburgh" in penny numbers, printed by William.

Edinburgh was at that time full of historical remains, most of which have been swept away in the course of modern improvements. Robert Chambers observing the transition state of society, foresaw the doom of many of these objects of interest, and that many curious customs would soon be obsolete. He therefore conceived and carried out the happy idea of giving, in a popular form, minute accounts of them.

His statements of places and residents exhibit [says Lord Cockburn]* a picture of society which is incomprehensible now [1847], and indeed was scarcely credible even to such survivors as lived in it. They imply that those of the upper class must have all been well acquainted and must have associated with the familiarity of village neighbors. What else could people do who pigged together in the same "land," and had their main doors within a few feet of each other on the same common stair? This must certainly have occasionally given rise to the petty quarrels and factions that keep small sets awake; but on the whole the local concentration was favorable to kindliness and mirth. Few of them had houses, and still fewer incomes, convenient for formal company dinners. The lady's bedroom was often the drawing-room. This, and custom, prolonged hereditary resort of men to the tavern for business and conviviality. . . . The society of Edinburgh contained many good and several bright names, both professional and literary, and was graced by a far greater intermixture of resident rank and family than either Edinburgh or any provincial town can boast of now, when everything of the kind is sucked into the London whirlpool.

Lord Cockburn then laments the "successive throes of the old town," which produced various "improvements," amongst them being the bringing of railways into Princes Street Gardens, whereby many highly interesting memorials perished, and over which the antiquarian soul sighs in vain. Robert Chambers's book attracted some notice, and during its publication, Scott, Lockhart, and Henry Mackenzie (the "Man of Feeling") called upon him; and Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, the well-known antiquary, gave him the notes he had made for a book to be called "Reekiana," and written jointly by Walter Scott and himself. Scott also sent the young author, with a kind, encouraging letter, sixteen closely-written folio pages of reminiscences of old persons and things in Edinburgh. "Such a treasure to me!" wrote Robert, in an introduction to a later edition, "and such a gift from the greatest literary man to the humblest!"

On the completion of the "Traditions" in numbers, and exhaustion of the first collected edition, Robert was advised by Constable to send the second edition to his London correspondents, Messrs. Hurst, Robinson, and Co., to whom he would recommend it. Some large packages were sent, accordingly, but the brothers not feeling satisfied with the result, William determined to look into matters in person. A little romance attending this determination is so naïvely told, that we cannot resist quotation: —

On a fine summer evening in 1825, arriving by a steamer in the Thames, I first visited the Metropolis. The circumstance is to be specially remembered by me. It being too late to pursue my business mission I thought of calling on Mr. John Clark, of Westminster, an artist whom I had accidentally met in Scotland the previous year, when taking views of the principal towns. A long walk brought me to Mr. Clark's door. It was opened by a sprightly young lady, his daughter, whom I had never seen before. The interview with the family was agreeable. An intimacy ensued. And some years afterwards, when the fates were propitious, the sprightly young lady who had chanced to open the door became my wife (p. 200).

The more prosaic result of the visit to London was that William, not liking the aspect of affairs at Messrs. Hurst and Co.'s Cheapside establishment, withdrew the whole stock of "Traditions," and thus saved his brother from any loss in the gigantic crash which ruined Sir Walter Scott, Ballantyne, Constable and his London correspondents. The "Traditions" were afterwards purchased by William Tait for between three and four hundred pounds, and finally, in more prosperous days, repurchased by Robert Chambers.

The satisfaction felt by the brothers in the literary success of the "Traditions" was alloyed by a piece of characteristic imprudence on their father's part. When his son's prospects improved he removed to Edinburgh, and began a lawsuit for the possession of "a wretched old house, not worth, perhaps, £200," which had once belonged to the family, but had drifted into other hands. Both Mrs. Chambers

* Journal of Henry Cockburn; being a Continuation of the Memorials of his Time; 1831–1854 (Edinburgh: Edmondstone and Douglas, Princes Street; 2 Vols., 1874), Vol. II., pp. 194, 195.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

and her children strongly, but vainly, opposed the hopeless litigation. The case proceeded, was lost and the effect on James Chambers was, that he "went from bad to worse, . . . and under his accumulation of disasters and cankering reminiscences, ascribable in a great degree to his own inconsiderateness and want of moral courage, died a wreck, in November, 1824." The costs of the lost lawsuit not only swallowed up all the money received from Tait for the "Traditions," but also threw the brothers back a year or two in their brave struggle. Notwithstanding this heavy legacy of debt left them by their father, his widow found a peaceful and an honored home with her sons, and had the consolation of seeing their progress, and being rewarded by their affection, till the close of her long and useful life in 1843.*

To Robert Chambers's next work, "Popular Rhymes of Scotland," Walter Scott also gave assistance; and, until overwhelmed with work and trouble by Constable's failure in 1826, showed the author much personal kindness, daily walking with him and discussing his studies and prospects. Pecuniary help, it was often hinted, would have been given as readily, but Robert, with youth and strength for capital, honorably preferred to rely upon his own exertions. "The quantity of varied literary work," writes his brother, "which he went through at this time was astonishing," especially as he was personally superintending every detail of an increasing business. Scott seems to have thought he was overdoing it, for he wrote in his diary: —

> Took to reading Chambers's "Beauties of Scotland," which would be admirable if they were accurate. He is a clever young fellow, but hurts himself by too much haste. I am not making too much myself, I know — and I know, too, it is time I were making it. But there is such a thing as more haste and less speed.†

This is a fault to which all fluent and popular young writers, who undertake serial works for money as well as fame, are prone. The marvel in Robert Chambers's case was that, doing so much, and often literally while the press waited for copy, he attained such an average of excellence. He had the advantage of dealing generally with kindred subjects, so that while engaged on one book he was accumulating materials for others, as a glance at their titles will show. Between 1822 and 1832 he produced, besides the "Illustrations" and "Traditions," his "History of the Rebellion of 1745;" "History of the Rebellions in Scotland from 1638 to 1660;" "History of the Rebellions in 1689 and 1715;" "Life of James the First;" "Scottish Ballads and Songs;" "Scottish Jests and Anecdotes;" and "Biography of Distinguished Scotsmen," in addition to editing an old-established newspaper, called the Edinburgh Advertiser. This was a busy life, yet he found time in its course to fall in love with and marry Anne Kirkwood, a charming and accomplished woman — the heroine of some of his poems — whose musical and social talents helped to draw round their home a pleasant circle.

Meantime, William Chambers also was busy writing. His first work, "The Book of Scotland," describing the secular and religious institutions peculiar to that country, he mentions as poor, and "now very properly forgotten." Nevertheless it procured his engagement, in conjunction with his brother, to prepare the "Gazetteer of Scotland," a compilation from the best authorities, with additional matter, to obtain which William undertook pedestrian journeys of forty miles a day, consulting the "oldest inhabitants," and resting at the humblest inns. The compiled portions he wrote and rewrote so diligently, that his manual work amounted to thirty thousand pages of MS., all transcribed behind the counter, or after business hours. Chambers's Edinburgh Journal, the enterprise by which the brothers' name became best known, was started in February, 1832. Popularly written, and plentifully mixing tales and poems with essays and "useful knowledge," at three halfpence a number, it had an immediate success far beyond its projector's hopes. The circulation of the third number reached eighty thousand. The honor of the idea belonged to William. Robert was sceptical, and even a little shocked at it. By the thirteenth number he was converted, and became joint editor; of this partnership the survivor says: —

> A happy difference, yet some resemblance, in character, proved of service in our literary and commercial union. . . . One could not well have done without the other. With mutual help there was mutual strength. . . . All previous hardships and experiences seemed to be but a training in strict adaptation for the course of life opened to us in 1832. Nothing could have happened better.

* Robert and William Chambers also took charge of and associated with themselves in business two brothers, James and David; the former of whom died young, the latter dying in 1871, four days after his brother Robert.

† Lockhart's "Life of Scott," 2nd edit., 1839, Vol. IX., p. 304.

Generated on 2020-05-28 11:29 GMT / https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo.31924079601005
Public Domain / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd
Digitized by CORNELL UNIVERSITY
Original from CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Such was their brotherly confidence that for twenty-one years no memorandum of agreement between them was thought necessary. In his opening address William Chambers hoped that the Journal would be welcomed by "the poorest laborers in the country." How the hope was realized is shown in this passage from a letter written by Allan Cunningham to Robert Chambers: —

> My wife, who has just returned from Scotland, says that your Journal is very popular among her native hills of Galloway. The shepherds, who are scattered there at the rate of one to every four miles square, read it constantly, and they circulate it in this way: the first shepherd who gets it reads it, and at an understood hour places it under a stone on a certain hilltop; then shepherd the second in his own time finds it, reads it, and carries it to another hill, where it is found like Ossian's chief under its own grey stone by shepherd the third, and so it passes on its way, scattering information over the land (p. 245).

