On the 21st of September, 1832, died that glory of Scotsmen and giant among littérateurs, Sir Walter Scott, who was buried on the 26th, at Dryburgh Abbey, with every mark of regret and respect which could make the ceremony impressive. Among the few mourners from Edinburgh were the brothers Chambers. No one acquainted with the almost idolatrous veneration they lavished on the great leader of Scottish literature can for a moment doubt the genuineness of their grief, notwithstanding the sudden transition in the following passages: —

> Indebted to Sir Walter for so many kindnesses some years previously, and in correspondence with him till the close of 1837, my brother felt that he had lost his most honored friend. Almost immediately, he proceeded to write a memoir of the deceased, from such materials as were within reach, as well as from personal recollections (p. 242).

The memoir was no doubt very excellent — certainly it was very popular, as a hundred and eighty thousand copies were sold.

There are three extremely national features in this "simple story." The naïve mixture of sorrow with an eye to business; the honesty with which it is avowed; and the apparent blindess to its ludicrous side.

It is impossible to enumerate here all the books for which Chambers's Journal led the way. A few instances will sufficiently indicate their nature and success, and enforce the lesson of their authors' struggling, persevering, and finally triumphant lives. Chambers's "Information for the People" sold one hundred and seventy thousand sets, was republished in America and translated into French. The "Educational Course" was so well received that it extended to a hundred volumes, several of them written by Robert Chambers, while William wrote many of their popular "Social Science Tracts." Among Robert's earlier works was a "History of Scotland" (projected and published by Richard Bentley) to which his "Domestic Annals of Scotland" formed a valuable appendix. In Chambers's "Encyclopædia" and "Cyclopædia of English Literature," the brothers were of course assisted by competent friends, including James Payn, George Dodd, and Robert Carruthers — the latter having been but recently taken from us in his seventy-ninth year. One book written by Robert deserves special mention — because it furnishes an illustration of one of his many methods of "doing good by stealth," and because it evoked from Charles Dickens an unexpected tribute of generous appreciation. On the 25th of January, 1859, a grand Burns Centenary Festival was held at the Crystal Palace, while similar gatherings were held in most of the principal towns throughout the kingdom, and of course in Edinburgh. In Household Words for the 12th of February following, appeared as leader an article entitled, "Burns: Viewed as a Hat-Peg." Written by Dickens himself it satirized, in his own incisive, inimitable style, the commemoration as a gigantic humbug and display of personal vanity, singling out, however, for "favorable distinction" the Edinburgh dinner "from the circumstance that one man happened to be present" who had "done something for the memory of Burns besides talk about it." That "one man" was Robert Chambers, who acknowledged in a speech of "just two lines" the toast to "the biographers of Burns."

> What Mr. Robert Chambers said for Burns on this occasion [continues Mr. Dickens] is not mentioned in the report we read. The infinitely more important question of what he has done for Burns we are in a position to answer without referring to reports. About seventeen years ago a grateful country had left Burns's sister, Mrs. Begg, and her daughters in the most impoverished circumstances; and Mr. Robert Chambers set on foot a subscription for them. The result of the appeal thus made, and of a solemn Branch-Burns Commemoration got up in Ayrshire was a subscription amounting to something less than £400; of which the queen and court gave £64. As much was done with this pittance as could be done; and it was sunk in an annuity for the three poor souls to live upon. Mrs. Begg and her daughters were settled in a cottage in Ayrshire. Mr. Robert Chambers then went bravely to work with his own hands and brains to help Burns's kindred for Burns's sake. After devoting admirable industry and research to the task, he produced "The Life and Poems of Burns" in four volumes; published the book in 1851; and devoted the first proceeds of the sale, £200, to the necessities of Mrs. Begg and her daughters. Thus giving from his own individual exertion more than half as much as the entire sum which all Scotland had given. We hope Mr. Robert Chambers will forgive us for filling up an omission in the newspaper history of the 26th January, and mentioning by way of contrast the nature of his tribute to the memory of Burns.*

This paragraph was copied into the Times with a heading, "Robert Burns and Robert Chambers," and while it gave considerable surprise to Robert Chambers it was even more gratifying to his friends and relatives, who knew how modestly he shrank from all parade, and that he "never spoke" of what he did to help poor but deserving persons whose distresses were brought under his notice. Leigh Hunt immediately after reading the paragraph wrote to Robert Chambers to express his "delight" with it, saying of the facts announced, "These are things which bring tears of admiration into one's eyes. I never heard of the circumstances before or I should have spoken of them. They did not surprise me, for I already believed you to be a man capable of such things; but it is affecting to see realized what one believes in."

Remembering that Leigh Hunt and the brothers Chambers had been considered in some sort competitors for the honor of having originated cheap and good periodical literature; that Leigh Hunt had been the projector, proprietor, and editor of more than one commercially unsuccessful publication of the kind; and that Charles Dickens was the projector, proprietor, and editor of an every way successful periodical, which might have been regarded as the southern rival of the northern journal, it is what Leigh Hunt himself would have called a "handsome thing" to see in all three such utter freedom from that "trade malice" which Mr. Charles Reade so trenchantly denounces — and without which, according to the same high authority, no literary man can be complete!

* Household Words, Vol. XIX., pp. 242, 243.

Another generous act formed the sequel to a pretty love story in the life of Robert Chambers. When he was beginning to make way as a bookseller of nineteen, a widow with several daughters lodged over his shop in Leith Walk; the girls sang and played excellently, and Robert, listening, thought them "a choir of angels." In such a case, as his brother drily remarks, there is always one who is most angelic; and Lilias, the youngest and fairest of the daughters, became Robert's first love. He used to lie awake at night listening while she sang overhead, and weaving verses on her sweet voice and bright eyes. His affection was returned, but the mother thought the young suitor ineligible and broke off the acquaintance. In time Lilias married — in every respect unfortunately. Hearing of her destitute condition, Robert Chambers liberally assisted her. They met once more, when both were on the verge of the grave. She was a widow; he doubly a widower. He was rich and celebrated; she entirely dependent on his bounty. The interview was painful, and they parted with tears. In his will Robert Chambers made ample provision for his first love, but she only survived him a few months.

There was, however, much good work to be done, and there were many fortunate years to be enjoyed before this sequel to their story. The latter half of the brothers' lives was as full of prosperity as the earlier had been of privation. Visiting foreign countries, and writing pleasant and reliable accounts of their travels; receiving municipal and collegiate honors in their own country; welcomed abroad by leaders of thought as worthy fellow-workers, and happy at home among affectionate families and "troops of friends," they amply reaped the reward of their labors.

At a time of life when most men allow their youthful acquirements to rust a little for want of practice, Robert Chambers took up a new science by way of recreation, and threw himself into the study of geology with an ardor worthy of the boy who preferred the "Encyclopædia Britannica" to fairy tales. The Rhineland, Switzerland, Iceland, and Norway, besides the remoter parts of Great Britain, were visited in the course of his explorations, which were described in readable and useful volumes. In America both brothers were cordially received. William was made LL.D. of Edinburgh (of which he was lord provost for four years), and St. Andrews conferred the same dignity on Robert. In the London literary society of the last half-century the brothers were popular. While staying in town a visit from Sydney Smith — who announced himself as the originator of the Edinburgh Review come to see the originator of the Edinburgh Journal — gave William Chambers great pleasure. In the course of their chat Mr. Chambers claimed for the Scotch a considerable fund of humor. "Oh, by all means!" replied his reverend visitor. "You are an immensely funny people, but you require a little operating upon to let the fun out, and I know no instrument so efficacious as the corkscrew."

One visit paid by William Chambers was to Miss Mitford at her pretty cottage at Three Mile Cross. They were mutually pleased, and the authoress of "Our Village" wrote in January, 1850, to the Rev. Hugh Pearson: "I am sure you would like Mr. Chambers. I verily believe that he is all he seems: kind, truthful, benevolent, intelligent, and eminently practical."*

In all their later successes the brothers never lost sight of their birthplace, or forgot their early friends. In grateful recognition of the benefits they had received from a little collection of books called "Elder's Library" in Peebles, William Chambers gave the town a suite of rooms consisting of museum, art gallery, lecture hall, reading-room, and a library of ten thousand volumes. But he frankly admits that the class for whose benefit the princely gift was chiefly intended has not benefited by it to the hoped-for extent.

The last work of any magnitude undertaken by Robert Chambers was "The Book of Days" — a gigantic miscellany of popular antiquities, illustrating the calendar, "including anecdotes, biographies, curiosities of literature, and oddities of human life and character." As it was necessary to attend the British Museum almost daily in order to collect materials Robert Chambers brought his family to London, and took for their accommodation Verulam House, St. John's Wood. This residence, says one of his daughters, he described to her as comprehending > a large garden, lawns, hothouses, and, in short, the whole paraphernalia of a gentleman's country house, with a fine conservatory adjoining the drawing-room, and containing a fountain surrounded with flowers. Besides plenty of space for the beloved books [Mrs. Dowie adds] and spare rooms for guests, there was no end of scope for the romping of grandchildren. On the lawn, adjoining a rustic summer-house, there were some fine trees, one of them a splendid spreading oak, beneath which my mother often took breakfast, at which she usually held a levée of cats. Her fondness for these animals was extraordinary, and she always maintains that they were a misunderstood and ill-used people. Her special favorites were two beautiful white cats, known as Mr. and Mrs. Archie, and one of their kittens was generally perched on her shoulder, when seated under the trees (pp. 306, 307).

Amidst this charming home life "The Book of Days" was begun in 1861, at which time also he was reading the proofs of his "History of the Indian Mutiny," with the assistance of a new friend, Lord Clyde. Two years later "The Book of Days" was finished; but, as he said himself, it was his "death-blow." It seems both sad and strange that a man who had attained greater wealth and popularity than his wildest boyish visions painted; who was surrounded by a loving and beloved family and a wide circle of eminent friends; who could rest or travel as he chose; and at whose command was every requisite for making life enjoyable, should have died of "overwork." Yet that he was a "victim to literary labor" his family believed; though, as he had reached within one year of the allotted threescore and ten, it cannot be held that overwork very materially shortened his career. This toiling unto the eleventh hour, when the need for toil has long ceased, is but too common among literary men, as instanced by Thackeray, Southey, and Dickens; less, of course, for the love of gain than for that of the actual work produced, and the unimpaired power of producing it. Whether this was so or not with Robert Chambers, it is certain that "The Book of Days" was the last continuous work of which he was capable. He died in his own house at St. Andrews — in his study, which had been fitted up as a bedroom during his illness. His last words were: "Quite comfortable — quite happy — nothing more."

Consistently with his unremitting industry, he left an unfinished book; and consistently with his deep though unobtrusive piety, the subject was "The Life and Preachings of Jesus Christ from the Evangelists, for the Use of Young People."

In an excellent summary of his brother's character, at the end of the memoir, Dr. William Chambers says: —

> In the common language of the world, Robert's life had been successful. From humble beginnings he had risen to the enjoyment of a fair share of earthly possessions. Let it, however, be understood that he never sought to acquire wealth for its own sake. He had a hatred of mere money-making. Life with him, as I may say with myself, was viewed as a trust for much more noble ends than that of miserly accumulation. At the outset we had to encounter some privations, but the struggle was by no means either discouraging or cheerless.

He then speaks at some length of the "unextinguishable impulse upwards," which supported them through so many struggles, and pays a grateful tribute to the sustaining influence of a keen love of and veneration for books. We revelled [he adds] in imaginative as well as in more serious kinds of literature. . . . In looking back through a long vista of years to the "Dark Ages," I cannot but think that this species of enjoyment was not only actively but negatively advantageous. There was always for us something to think of besides ordinary cares, something to modify and subdue the temptation to mean indulgence. . . . Poor we were, but so far as the pleasures of reading were concerned, we might be said to be almost on a level with the affluent. . . . Actuated by correct and generous impulses, Robert's career afforded a lesson not only to the young but to the middle-aged. . . . There was a purity, a simplicity, a geniality about his whole career which we do not often see so amiably or so consistently demonstrated. In youth, in manhood, and in declining age, in all the social phases through which he passed, he was ever the same gentle and benign being — loved and esteemed by all who knew him (pp. 338, 339).

We have dwelt at perhaps disproportionate length on the earlier part of the brothers' gallant fight with fortune. But all who have to toil and struggle may turn for encouragement and example to this minutely-painted picture of self-denial, industry, and ingenuity. There is nothing in the story of the brothers Chambers which may not be imitated by young men beginning life with an equal amount of health, principle, and perseverance. No noble patron smoothed seemingly insurmountable obstacles out of their path by the touch of a jewelled finger; no Indian uncle helped them on by an unexpected legacy; no heiress fell in love with the heroic souls inhabiting those poorly-clad bodies, as virtue is usually rewarded — in novels. Their story is simply an excellent commentary on the brave old text: "God helps those who help themselves."

There is a fibre in the Scottish character which will bear a tremendous strain: the bracing of the keen native air, the Spartan simplicity of the national diet, may be among its material causes. Of its existence there can be no doubt. Every generation affords examples of Scots who, against innumerable and intolerable difficulties, have worked their way to stations honorable to themselves, helpful to those around them, and useful to the world; and in all this distinguished list few lives have been more admirable than those of the brothers Chambers.

Of Robert we have had to speak in the past tense; of William, though the elder brother, we may yet, happily, speak in the present, for he worthily continues the career of which, so far, a sketch has been given. To the young and friendless the simple, earnest memoir before us ought — to use William's words — to be both "instructive and inspiriting;" and we may add that in time to come — which we trust will be long in coming — it will prove to be the best monument to the memory of William and Robert alike: a fine lesson of probity and industry, and a beautiful record of brotherly affection.

SIR GIBBIE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

AUTHOR OF "MALCOLM," "THE MARQUIS OF LOSSIE," ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

His next recollection of himself was in the first of the morning, on the lofty chain-bridge over the river Daur. Before him lay he knew not what, only escape from what was behind. His faith in men seemed ruined. The city, his home was frightful to him. Quarrels and curses and blows he had been used to, and amidst them life could be lived. If he did not consciously weave them into his theories, he unconsciously wrapped them up in his confidence, and was at peace. But the last night had revealed something unknown before. It was as if the darkness had been cloven, and through the cleft he saw into hell. A thing had been done that could not be undone, and he thought it must be what people called murder. And Sambo was such a good man! He was almost as good a man as Gibbie's father, and now he would not breathe any more! Was he gone where Gibbie's father was gone? Was it the good men that stopped breathing and grew cold? But it was those wicked men that had deaded Sambo! And with that his first vague perception of evil and wrong in the world began to dawn.

He lifted his head from gazing down on the dark river. A man was approaching the bridge. He came from the awful city! Perhaps he wanted him! He fled along the bridge like a low-flying water-bird. If another man had appeared at the other end, he would have got through between the rods, and thrown himself into the river. But there was no one to oppose his escape; and after following the road a little way up the river, he turned aside into a thicket of shrubs on the nearly precipitous bank, and sat down to recover the breath he had lost more from dismay than exertion.

The light grew. All at once he descried, far down the river, the steeples of the city. Alas! alas! there lay poor black Sambo, so dear to wee Sir Gibbie, motionless and covered with blood! He had two red mouths now, but was not able to speak a word with either! They would carry him to a churchyard and lay him in a hole, to lie there forever and ever! Would all the good people be laid into holes and leave Gibbie quite alone? Sitting and brooding thus, he fell into a dreamy state, in which, brokenly, from here and there, pictures of his former life grew out upon his memory. Suddenly, plainer than all the rest, came the last time he stood under Mistress Croale's window, waiting to help his father home. The same instant back to the ears of his mind came his father's two words, through the window as he had heard them — "Up Daurside."

"Up Daurside!" — Here he was upon Daurside — a little way up too: he would go farther up. He rose and went on, while the great river kept flowing the other way, dark and terrible, down to the very door, inside which lay Sambo with the huge gape in his big throat.

Meantime the murder came to the knowledge of the police, Mistress Croale herself giving the information, and all in the house were arrested. In the course of their examination, it came out that wee Sir Gibbie had gone to bed with the murdered man, and was now nowhere to be found. Either they had murdered him too, or carried him off. The news spread, and the whole city was in commotion about his fate. It was credible enough that persons capable of committing such a crime on such an inoffensive person as the testimony showed poor Sambo, would be capable also of throwing the life of a child after that of the man to protect their own. The city was searched from end to end, from side to side, and from cellar to garret. Not a trace of him was to be found — but indeed Gibbie had always been easier to find than to trace, for he had no belongings of any sort to betray him. No one dreamed of his having fled straight to the country, and search was confined to the city.

The murderers were at length discovered, tried, and executed. They protested their innocence with regard to the child, and therein nothing appeared against them beyond the fact that he was missing. The result, so far as concerned Gibbie, was, that the talk of the city, where almost every one knew him, was turned, in his absence, upon his history; and from the confused mass of hearsay that reached him, Mr. Sclater set himself to discover and verify the facts. For this purpose he burrowed about in the neighborhoods Gibbie had chiefly frequented, and was so far successful as to satisfy himself that Gibbie, if he was alive, was Sir Gilbert Galbrath, Baronet; but his own lawyer was able to assure him with equal certainty, that not an inch of property remained anywhere attached to the title. There were indeed relations of the boy's mother, who were of some small consequence in a neighboring county, also one in business in Glasgow, or its neighborhood, reported wealthy; but these had entirely disowned her because of her marriage. All Mr. Sclater discovered besides was, in a lumber-room next the garret in which Sir George died, a box of papers — a glance at whose contents showed that they must at least prove a great deal of which he was already certain from other sources. A few of them had to do with the house in which they were found, still known as the Auld Hoose o' Galbraith; but most of them referred to property in land, and many were of ancient date. If the property were in the hands of descendants of the original stock, the papers would be of value in their eyes; and in any case it would be well to see to their safety. Mr. Sclater therefore had the chest removed to the garret of the manse, where it stood thereafter, little regarded, but able to answer for more than itself.

CHAPTER IX.

ADRIFT.

GIBBIE was now without a home. He had had a whole city for his dwelling, every street of which had been to him as another hall in his own house, every lane as a passage from one set of rooms to another, every court as a closet, every house as a safe, guarding the only possessions he had, the only possessions he knew how to value — his fellow-mortals, radiant with faces, and friendly with hands and tongues. Great as was his delight in freedom, a delight he revelled in from morning to night, and sometimes from night to morning, he had never had a notion of it that reached beyond the city, he never longed for larger space, for wider outlook. Space and outlook he had skyward — and seaward when he would, but even into these regions he had never yet desired to go. His world was the world of men; the presence of many was his greater room; his people themselves were his world. He had no idea of freedom in dissociation with human faces and voices and eyes. But now he had left all these, and as he ran from them a red pall seemed settling down behind him, wrapping up and hiding away his country, his home. For the first time in his life, the fatherless, motherless, brotherless, sisterless stray of the streets felt himself alone. The sensation was an awful one. He had lost so many, and had not one left! That gash in Sambo's black throat had slain "a whole cityful." His loneliness grew upon him, until again he darted aside from the road into the bush, this time to hide from the Spectre of the Desert — the No Man. Deprived of human countenances, the face of creation was a mask without eyes, and liberty a mere negation. Not that Gibbie had ever thought about liberty: he had only enjoyed; not that he had ever thought about human faces: he had only loved them, and lived upon their smiles. — "Gibbie wadna need to gang to h'aven," said Mysie, the baker's daughter, to her mother, one night as they walked home from a merry-making. "What for that, lassie?" returned her mother. "'Cause he wad be meeserable whaur there was nae drunk fowk," answered Mysie. And now it seemed to the poor, shocked, heart-wounded creature, as if the human face were just the one thing he could no more look upon. One haunted him, the black one, with the white, staring eyes, the mouth in its throat, and the white grinning teeth.

It was a cold, fresh morning, cloudy and changeful, towards the end of April. It had rained, and would rain again; it might snow. Heavy undefined clouds, with saffron breaks and borders, hung about the east, but what was going to happen there — at least he did not think; he did not know east from west, and I doubt whether, although he had often seen the sun set, he had ever seen him rise. Yet even to him, city-creature as he was, it was plain something was going to happen there. And happen it did presently, and that with a splendor that for a moment blinded Gibbie. For just at the horizon there was a long horizontal slip of blue sky, and through that crack the topmost arc of the rising sun shot suddenly a thousand arrows of radiance into the brain of the boy. But the too-much light scorched there a blackness instantly; and to the soul of Gibbie it was the blackness of the room from which he had fled, and upon it out came the white eyeballs, and the brilliant teeth of his dead Sambo, and the red burst from his throat that answered the knife of the Malay. He shrieked, and struck with his hands against the sun from which came the terrible vision. Had he been a common child, his reason would have given way; but one result of the overflow of his love was, that he had never yet known fear for himself. His sweet confident face, innocent eyes, and caressing ways, had almost always drawn a response more or less in kind; and that certain some should not repel him, was a fuller response from them than gifts from others. Except now and then, rarely a street boy, a little bigger than himself, no one had ever hurt him, and the hurt upon these occasions had not gone very deep, for the child was brave and hardy. So now it was not fear, but the loss of old confidence, a sickness coming over the heart and brain of his love, that unnerved him. It was not the horrid cruelty to his friend, and his own grievous loss thereby, but the recoil of his loving endeavor that, jarring him out of every groove of thought, every socket of habit, every joint of action, cast him from the city, and made of him a wanderer indeed, not a wanderer in a strange country, but a wanderer in a strange world.

To no traveller could one land well be so different from another, as to Gibbie the country was from the town. He had seen bushes and trees before, but only over garden walls, or in one or two of the churchyards. He had looked from the quay across to the bare shore on the other side, with its sandy hills, and its tall lighthouse on the top of the great rocks that bordered the sea; but, so looking, he had beheld space as one looking from this world into the face of the moon, as a child looks upon vastness and possible dangers from his nurse's arms where it cannot come near him; for houses backed the quay all along; the city was behind him, and spread forth her protecting arms. He had, once or twice, run out along the pier, which shot far into the immensity of the sea, like a causeway to another world — a stormy thread of granite beaten upon both sides by the waves of the German Ocean; but it was with the sea and not the country he then made the small acquaintance — and that not without terror. The sea was as different from the city as the air into which he looked up at night — too different to compare against it and feel the contrast: on neither could he set foot: in neither could he be required to live and act — as now in this waste of enterable and pervious extent.

Its own horror drove the vision away, and Gibbie saw the world again — saw, but did not love it. The sun seemed but to have looked up to mock him and go down again, for he had crossed the crack, and was behind a thick mass of cloud; a cold damp wind, spotted with sparkles of rain, blew fitfully from the east; the low bushes among which he sat, sent forth a chill sighing all about him as they sifted the wind into sound; the smell of the damp earth was strange to him — he did not know the freshness, the new birth of which it breathed; below him the gloomy river, here deep, smooth, moody, sullen, there puckered with the gray ripples of a shallow laughter under the cold breeze, went flowing heedless to the city. There only was — or had been, friendliness, comfort, home! This was emptiness — the abode of things, not beings. Yet never once did Gibbie think of returning to the city. He rose and wandered up the wide road along the river bank, farther and farther from it — his only guide the words of his father, "Up Daurside;" his sole comfort the feeling of having once more to do with his father so long departed, some relation still with the paradise of his old world. Along cultivated fields and copses on the one side, and on the other a steep descent to the river, covered here and there with trees, but mostly with rough grass and bushes and stones, he followed the king's highway. There were buttercups and plenty of daisies within his sight — primroses, too, on the slope beneath; but he did not know flowers, and his was not now the mood for discovering what they were. The exercise revived him, and he began to be hungry. But how could there be anything to eat in the desert, inhospitable succession of trees and fields and hedges, through which the road wound endlessly along, like a dead street, having neither houses nor paving-stones? Hunger, however, was far less enfeebling to Gibbie than to one accustomed to regular meals, and he was in no anxiety about either when or what he should eat.

The morning advanced, and bye-and-by he began to meet a fellow-creature now and then upon the road; but at sight of every one a feeling rose in him such as he had never had towards human being before: they seemed somehow of a different kind from those in the town, and they did not look friendly as they passed. He did not know that he presented to them a very different countenance from that which his fellow-citizens had always seen him wear; for the mingled and conflicting emotions of his spirit had sent out upon it an expression which, accompanied by the misery of his garments, might well, to the superficial or inexperienced observer, convey the idea that he was a fugitive and guilty. He was so uncomfortable at length from the way the people he met scrutinized him that, when he saw any one coming, he would instantly turn aside and take the covert of thicket, or hedge or stone wall, until the bearer of eyes had passed. His accustomed trot, which he kept up for several hours, made him look the more suspicious; but his feet, hardened from very infancy as they were, soon found the difference between the smooth flags and the sharp stones of the road, and before noon he was walking at quite a sober, although still active pace. Doubtless it slackened the sooner that he knew no goal, no end to his wandering. Up Daurside was the one vague notion he had of his calling, his destiny, and with his short, quick step, his progress was considerable; he passed house after house, farm after farm; but, never in the way of asking for anything, though as little in the way of refusing, he went nearer none of them than the road led him. Besides, the houses were very unlike those in the city, and not at all attractive to him. He came at length to a field, sloping to the road, which was covered with leaves like some he had often seen in the market. They drew him; and as there was but a low and imperfect hedge between, he got over, and found it was a crop of small yellow turnips. He gathered as many as he could carry, and ate them as he went along. Happily no agricultural person encountered him for some distance, though Gibbie knew no special cause to congratulate himself upon that, having not the slightest conscience of offence in what he did.

His notions of property were all associated with well-known visible or neighboring owners, and in the city he would never have dreamed of touching anything that was not given him, except it lay plainly a lost thing. But here, where everything was so different and he saw none of the signs of ownership to which he was accustomed, the idea of property did not come to him; here everything looked lost, or in the same category with the chips and parings and crusts that were thrown out in the city, and became common property. Besides, the love which had hitherto rendered coveteousness impossible, had here no object whose presence might have suggested a doubt, to supply in a measure the lack of knowledge: hunger, instead, was busy in his world. I trust there were few farmers along the road who would have found fault with him for taking one or two; but none, I suspect, would have liked to see him with all the turnips he could carry, eating them like a very rabbit: they were too near a city to look upon such a spectacle with indifference. Gibbie made no attempt to hide his spoil; whatever could have given birth to the sense that caution would be necessary, would have prevented him from taking it. While yet busy he came upon a little girl feeding a cow by the roadside. She saw how he ate the turnips, and offered him a bit of oatmeal bannock. He received it gladly, and with beaming eyes offered her a turnip. She refused it with some indignation. Gibbie, disappointed, but not ungrateful, resumed his tramp, eating his bannock. He came soon after to a little stream that ran into the great river. For a few moments he eyed it very doubtfully, thinking it must, like the kennels along the sides of the street, be far too dirty to drink of; but the way it sparkled and sang — most unscientific reasons — soon satisfied him, and he drank and was refreshed. He had still two turnips left, but, after the bannock, he did not seem to want them, and stowed them in the ends of the sleeves of his jacket, folded back into great cuffs.

All day the cold spring weather continued, with more of the past winter in it than of the coming summer. The sun would shine out for a few moments, with a gray, weary, old light, then retreat as if he had tried, but really could not. Once came a slight fall of snow, which, however, melted the moment it touched the earth. The wind kept blowing cheerlessly by fits, and the world seemed growing tired of the same thing over again so often. At length the air began to grow dusk: then, first, fears of the darkness, to Gibbie utterly unknown before, and only born of the preceding night, began to make him aware of their existence in the human world. They seemed to rise up from his lonely heart; they seemed to descend upon him out of the thickening air; they seemed to catch at his breath, and gather behind him as he went. But, happily, before it was quite dark, and while he yet could distinguish between objects, he came to the gate of a farmyard; it waked in him the hope of finding some place where he could sleep warmer than in the road, and he clambered over it. Nearest of the buildings to the gate, stood an open shed, and he could see the shafts of carts projecting from it: perhaps in one of those carts or under it, he might find a place that would serve him to sleep in: he did not yet know what facilities for repose the country affords. But just as he entered the shed, he spied at the farther corner of it, outside, a wooden structure, like a small house, and through the arched door of it saw the floor covered with nice-looking straw. He suspected it to be a dog's kennel; and presently the chain lying beside it, with a collar at the end, satisfied him it was. The dog was absent, and it looked altogether enticing! He crept in, got under as much of the straw as he could heap over him, and fell fast asleep.

In a few minutes, as it seemed to him, he was roused by the great voice of a dog in conversation with a boy: the boy seemed, by the sound of the chain, to be fastening the collar on the dog's neck, and presently left him. The dog, which had been on the rampage the whole afternoon, immediately turned to creep in and rest till supper time, presenting to Gibbie, who had drawn himself up at the back of the kennel, the intelligent countenance of a large Newfoundland. Now Gibbie had been honored with the acquaintance of many dogs, and the friendship of most of them, for a lover of humanity can hardly fail to be a lover of caninity. Even among dogs, however, there are ungracious individuals, and Gibbie had once or twice been bitten by quadrupedal worshippers of the respectable. Hence, with the sight of the owner of the dwelling, it dawned upon him that he must be startled to find a stranger in his house, and might, regarding him as an intruder rather than a guest, worry him before he had time to explain himself. He darted forward therefore to get out, but had scarcely reached the door, when the dog put in his nose, ready to follow with all he was and had. Gibbie, thereupon, began a loud barking, as much as to say — "Here I am: please do nothing without reflection." The dog started back in extreme astonishment, his ears erect, and a keen look of question on his sagacious visage: what strange animal, speaking like, and yet so unlike an orthodox dog, could have got into his very chamber? Gibbie, amused at the dog's fright, and assured by his looks that he was both a good-natured and reasonable animal, burst into a fit of merry laughter as loud as his previous barking, and a good deal more musical. The dog evidently liked it better, and took it as a challenge to play: after a series of sharp bursts of barking, his eyes flashing straight in at the door, and his ears lifted up like two plumes on the top of them, he darted into the kennel, and began poking his nose into his visitor. Gibbie fell to patting and kissing and hugging him as if he had been a human — as who can tell but he was? — glad of any companion that belonged to the region of the light; and they were friends at once. Mankind had disappointed him, but here was a dog! Gibbie was not the one to refuse mercies which yet he would not have been content to pray for. Both were tired, however, for both had been active that day, and a few minutes of mingled wrestling and endearment, to which, perhaps, the narrowness of their play-bounds gave a speedier conclusion, contented both, after which they lay side by side in peace, Gibbie with his head on the dog's back, and the dog every now and then turning his head over his shoulder to lick Gibbie's face.

Again he was waked by approaching steps, and the same moment the dog darted from under him, and with much rattle out of the kennel, in front of which he stood and whined expectant. It was not quite dark, for the clouds had drifted away, and the stars were shining, so that, when he put out his head, he was able to see the dim form of a woman setting down a something before the dog, — into which he instantly plunged his nose, and began gobbling. The sound stirred up all the latent hunger in Gibbie, and he leaped out, eager to have a share. A large wooden bowl was on the ground, and the half of its contents of porridge and milk was already gone; for the poor dog had not yet had experience enough to be perfect in hospitality, and had forgotten his guest's wants in his own: it was plain that, if Gibbie was to have any he must lose no time in considering the means. Had he had a long nose and mouth all in one like him, he would have plunged them in beside the dog's; but the flatness of his mouth causing the necessity, in the case of such an attempt, of bringing the whole of his face into contact with the food, there was not room in the dish for the two to feed together after the same fashion, so that he was driven to the sole other possible expedient, that of making a spoon of his hand. The dog neither growled nor pushed away the spoon, but instantly began to gobble twice as fast as before, and presently was licking the bottom of the dish. Gibbie's hand, therefore, made but few journeys to his mouth, but what it carried him was good food — better than any he had had that day. When all was gone he crept again into the kennel; the dog followed, and soon they were both fast asleep in each other's arms and legs.

Gibbie woke at sunrise and went out. His host came after him, and stood wagging his tail and looking wistfully up in his face. Gibbie understood him, and, as the sole return he could make for his hospitality, undid his collar. Instantly he rushed off, his back going like a serpent, cleared the gate at a bound, and scouring madly across a field, vanished from his sight; whereupon Gibbie too set out to continue his journey up Daurside.

This day was warmer; the spring had come a step nearer; the dog had been a comforter to him, and the horror had begun to assuage; he began to grow aware of the things about him, and to open his eyes to them. Once he saw a primrose in a little dell, and left the road to look at it. But as he went, he set his foot in the water of a chalybeate spring, which was trickling through the grass, and dyeing the ground red about it: filled with horror he fled, and for some time dared never go near a primrose. And still upon his right hand was the great river, flowing down towards the home he had left; now through low meadows, now through upshouldered fields of wheat and oats, now through rocky heights covered with the graceful silver-barked birch, the mountain ash, and the fir. Every time Gibbie, having lost sight of it by some turn of the road or some interposing eminence, caught its gleam afresh, his first feeling was that it was hurrying to the city, where the dead man lay, to tell where Gibbie was. Why he, who had from infancy done just as he pleased, should now have begun to dread interference with his liberty, he could not himself have told. Perhaps the fear was but the shadow of his new-born aversion to the place where he had seen those best-loved countenances change so suddenly and terribly — cease to smile, but not cease to stare.

That second day he fared better, too, than the first; for he came on a family of mongrel gypsies, who fed him well out of their kettle, and, taken with his looks, thought to keep him for begging purposes. But now that Gibbie's confidence in human nature had been so rudely shaken, he had already begun, with analysis unconscious, to read the human countenance, questioning it; and he thought he saw something that would hurt, in the eyes of two of the men and one of the women. Therefore, in the middle of the night, he slipped silently out of the tent of rags, in which he had lain down with the gipsy children, and ere the mothers woke, was a mile up the river.

But I must not attempt the detail of this part of his journey. It is enough that he got through it. He met with some adventures, and suffered a good deal from hunger and cold. Had he not been hardy as well as fearless he must have died. But, now from this quarter, now from that, he got all that was needful for one of God's birds. Once he found in a hedge the nest of an errant and secretive hen, and recognizing the eggs as food authorized by the shop windows and market of the city, soon qualified himself to have an opinion of their worth. Another time he came upon a girl milking a cow in a shed, and his astonishment at the marvels of the process was such, that he forgot even the hunger that was rendering him faint. He had often seen cows in the city, but had never suspected what they were capable of. When the girl caught sight of him, staring with open mouth, she was taken with such a fit of laughter, that the cow, which was ill-tempered, kicked out and overturned the pail. Now because of her troublesomeness this cow was not milked beside the rest, and the shed where she stood was used for farm-implements only. The floor of it was the earth, beaten hard, and worn into hollows. When the milk settled in one of these, Gibbie saw that it was lost to the girl, and found to him: undeterred by the astounding nature of the spring from which he had just seen it flow, he threw himself down and drank like a calf. Her laughter ended, the girl was troubled: she would be scolded for her clumsiness in allowing Hawkie to kick over the pail, but the eagerness of the boy after the milk troubled her more. She told him to wait, and running to the house, returned with two large pieces of oatcake, which she gave him.

Thus, one way and another, food came to Gibbie. Drink was to be had in almost any hollow. Sleep was scattered everywhere over the world. For warmth, only motion and a seasoned skin were necessary: the latter Gibbie had; the former, already a habit learned in the streets, had now become almost a passion.

CHAPTER X.

THE BARN.

By this time Gibbie had got well up towards the roots of the hills of Gormgarnet, and the river had dwindled greatly. He was no longer afraid of it, but would lie for hours listening to its murmurs over its pebbly bed, and sometimes even sleep in the hollows of its banks, or below the willows that overhung it. Every here and there, a brown rivulet from some peat-bog on a hill — brown and clear, like smoke-crystals molten together, flowed into it, and when he had lost it, guided him back to his guide. Farm after farm he passed, here one widely bordering a valley stream, there another stretching its skirts up the hillsides till they were lost in mere heather, where the sheep wandered about, cropping what stray grass-blades and other eatables they could find. Lower down he had passed through small towns and large villages: here farms and cottages, with an occasional country seat and little village of low thatched houses, made up the abodes of men. By this time he had become greatly reconciled to the loneliness of nature, and no more was afraid in her solitary presence.

At the same time his heart had begun to ache and long after the communion of his kind. For not once since he set out — and that seemed months where it was only weeks, had he had an opportunity of doing anything for anybody — except, indeed, unfastening the dog's collar; and not to be able to help was to Gibbie like being dead. Everybody, down to the dogs, had been doing for him, and what was to become of him! It was a state altogether of servitude into which he had fallen.

May had now set in, but up here among the hills she was May by courtesy only; or if she was May, she would never be Might. She was, indeed, only April, with her showers and sunshine, her tearful, childish laughter, and again the frown, and the despair irremediable. Nay, as if she still kept up a secret correspondence with her cousin March, banished for his rudeness, she would not very seldom shake from her skirts a snow storm, and oftener the dancing hail. Then out would come the sun behind her, and laugh, and say — "I could not help that; but here I am all the same, coming to you as fast as I can!" The green crops were growing darker, and the trees were all getting out their nets to catch carbon. The lambs were frolicking, and in sheltered places the flowers were turning the earth into a firmament. And now a mere daisy was enough to delight the heart of Gibbie. His joy in humanity so suddenly checked, and his thirst for it left unslaked, he had begun to see the human look in the face of the commonest flowers, to love the trusting stare of the daisy, that gold-hearted boy, and the gentle despondency of the girl harebell, dreaming of her mother, the azure. The wind, of which he had scarce thought as he met it roaming the streets like himself, was now a friend of his solitude, bringing him sweet odors, alive with the souls of bees, and cooling with bliss the heat of the long walk. Even when it blew cold along the waste moss, waving the heads of the cotton-grass, the only live thing visible, it was a lover, and kissed him on the forehead. Not that Gibbie knew what a kiss was, any more than he knew about the souls of bees. He did not remember ever having been kissed. In that granite city, the women were not much given to kissing children, even their own, but if they had been, who of them would have thought of kissing Gibbie! The baker's wife, kind as she always was to him, would have thought it defilement to press her lips to those of the beggar child. And how is any child to thrive without kisses! The first caresses Gibbie ever knew as such, were given him by Mother Nature herself. It was only, however, by degrees, though indeed rapid degrees, that he became capable of them. In the first part of his journey he was stunned, stupid, lost in change, distracted between a suddenly vanished past, and a future slow dawning in the present. He felt little beyond hunger, and that vague urging up Daurside, with occasional shoots of pleasure from kindness, mostly of woman and dog. He was less shy of the country people by this time, but he did not care to seek them. He thought them not nearly so friendly and good as the town-people, forgetting that these knew him and those did not. To Gibbie an introduction was the last thing necessary for any one who wore a face, and he could not understand why they looked at him so.

Whatever is capable of aspiring, must be troubled that it may wake and aspire — then troubled still, that it may hold fast, be itself, and aspire still.

One evening his path vanished between twilight and moonrise, and just as it became dark he found himself at a rough gate, through which he saw a field. There was a pretty tall hedge on each side of the gate, and he was now a sufficiently experienced traveller to conclude that he was not far from some human abode. He climbed the gate, and found himself in a field of clover. It was a splendid big bed, and even had the night not been warm, he would not have hesitated to sleep in it. He had never had a cold, and had as little fear for his health as for his life. He was hungry, it is true; but although food was doubtless more delicious to such hunger as his — that of the whole body, than it can be to the mere palate and culinary imagination of an epicure, it was not so necessary to him that he could not go to sleep without it. So down he lay in the clover, and was at once unconscious.

When he woke, the moon was high in the heavens, and had melted the veil of the darkness from a scene of still, well ordered comfort. A short distance from his couch, stood a little army of ricks, between twenty and thirty of them, constructed perfectly — smooth and upright and round and large, each with its conical top netted in with straw-rope, and finished off with what the herdboy called a toupican — a neatly tied and trim tuft of the straw with which it was thatched, answering to the stone-ball on the top of a gable. Like triangles their summits stood out against the pale blue, moon-diluted air. They were treasure-caves, hollowed out of space, and stored with the best of ammunition against the armies of hunger and want; but Gibbie, though he had seen many of them, did not know what they were. He had seen straw used for the bedding of cattle and horses, and supposed that the chief end of such ricks. Nor had he any clear idea that the cattle themselves were kept for any other object than to make them comfortable and happy. He had stood behind their houses in the dark, and heard them munching and grinding away even in the night. Probably the country was for the cattle, as the towns for the men; and that would explain why the country-people were so inferior. While he stood gazing, a wind arose behind the hills, and came blowing down some glen that opened northwards: Gibbie felt it cold, and sought the shelter of the ricks.

Great and solemn they looked as he drew nigh — near each other, yet enough apart for plenty of air to flow and eddy between. Over a low wall of unmortared stones, he entered their ranks: above him, as he looked up from their broad base, they ascended huge as pyramids, and peopled the waste air with giant forms. How warm it was in the round-winding paths amongst the fruitful piles — tombs these, no cenotaphs! He wandered about them, now in a dusky yellow gloom, and now in the cold blue moonlight, which they seemed to warm. At length he discovered that the huge things were flanked on one side by a long low house, in which there was a door, horizontally divided into two parts. Gibbie would fain have got in, to try whether the place was good for sleep; but he found both halves fast. In the lower half, however, he spied a hole, which, though not so large, reminded him of the entrance to the kennel of his dog-host; but alas! it had a door too, shut from the inside. There might be some way of opening it. He felt about, and soon discovered that it was a sliding valve, which he could push to either side. It was, in fact, the cat's door, specially constructed for her convenience of entrance and exit. For the cat is the guardian of the barn; the grain which tempts the rats and mice is no temptation to her; the rats and mice themselves are; upon them she executes justice, and remains herself an incorruptible, because untempted, therefore a respectable member of the farm-community — only the dairy door must be kept shut: that has no cat-wicket in it.

The hole was a small one, but tempting to the wee baronet: he might perhaps be able to squeeze himself through. He tried and succeeded, though with some little difficulty. The moon was there before him, shining through a pane or two of glass over the door, and by her light on the hard brown clay floor, Gibbie saw where he was, though if he had been told he was in the barn, he would neither have felt nor been at all the wiser. It was a very old-fashioned barn. About a third of it was floored with wood — dark with age — almost as brown as the clay — for threshing upon with flails. At that labor two men had been busy during the most of the preceding day, and that was how, in the same end of the barn, rose a great heap of oat-straw, showing in the light of the moon like a mound of pale gold. Had Gibbie had any education in the marvellous, he might now, in the midnight and moonlight, have well imagined himself in some treasure-house of the gnomes. What he saw in the other corner was still liker gold, and was indeed greater than gold, for it was life — the heap, namely, of corn threshed from the straw: Gibbie recognized this as what he had seen given to horses. But now the temptation to sleep, with such facilities presented, was overpowering, and took from him all desire to examine further: he shot into the middle of the loose heap of straw, and vanished from the glimpses of the moon, burrowing like a mole. In the heart of the golden warmth, he lay so dry and comfortable that, notwithstanding his hunger had waked with him, he was presently in a faster sleep than before. And indeed what more luxurious bed, or what bed conducive to softer slumber, was there in the world to find!

"The moving moon went down the sky," the cold wind softened and grew still; the stars swelled out larger; the rats came, and then came puss, and the rats went with a scuffle and squatter; the pagan gray came in like a sleep-walker, and made the barn dreary as a dull dream; then the horses began to fidget with their big feet, the cattle to low with their great trombone throats, and the cocks to crow as if to give warning for the last time against the devil, the world, and the flesh; the men in the adjoining chamber woke, yawned, stretched themselves mightily, and rose; the god-like sun rose after them, and, entering the barn with them, drove out the gray; and through it all the orphan lay warm in God's keeping and his nest of straw, like the butterfly of a huge chrysalis.

When at length Gibbie became once more aware of existence, it was through a stormy invasion of the still realm of sleep: the blows of two flails fell persistent and quick-following, first on the thick head of the sheaf of oats untied and cast down before them, then grew louder and more deafening as the oats flew and the chaff fluttered, and the straw flattened and broke and thinned and spread — until at last they thundered in great hard blows on the wooden floor. It was the first of these last blows that shook Gibbie awake. What they were or indicated he could not tell. He wormed himself softly round in the straw to look out and see.

Now whether it was that sleep was yet heavy upon him, and bewildered his eyes, or that his imagination had in dreams been busy with foregone horrors, I cannot tell; but, as he peered through the meshes of the crossing and blinding straws, what he seemed to see was the body of an old man with dishevelled hair, whom, prostrate on the ground, they were beating to death with great sticks. His tongue clave to the roof of his mouth, not a sound could he utter, not a finger could he move; he had no choice but to lie still, and witness the fierce enormity. But it is good that we are compelled to see some things, life amongst the rest, to what we call the end of them. By degrees Gibbie's sight cleared; the old man faded away; and what was left of him he could see to be only an armful of straw. The next sheaf they threw down, he perceived, under their blows, the corn flying out of it, and began to understand a little. When it was finished, the corn that had flown dancing from its home, like hail from its cloud, was swept aside to the common heap, and the straw tossed up on the mound that harbored Gibbie. It was well that the man with the pitchfork did not spy his eyes peering out from the midst of the straw: he might have taken him for some wild creature, and driven the prongs into him. As it was, Gibbie did not altogether like the look of him, and lay still as a stone. Then another sheaf was unbound and cast on the floor, and the blows of the flails began again. It went on thus for an hour and a half, and Gibbie, although he dropped asleep several times, was nearly stupid with the noise. The men at length, however, swept up the corn and tossed up the straw for the last time, and went out. Gibbie, judging by his own desires, thought they must have gone to eat, but did not follow them, having generally been ordered away the moment he was seen in a farmyard. He crept out, however, and began to look about him — first of all for something he could eat. The oats looked the most likely, and he took a mouthful for a trial. He ground at them severely, but hungry as he was, he failed to find oats good for food. Their hard husks, their dryness, their instability, all slipping past each other at every attempt to crush them with his teeth, together foiled him utterly. He must search farther. Looking round him afresh, he saw an open loft, and climbing on the heap in which he had slept, managed to reach it. It was at the height of the walls, and the couples of the roof rose immediately from it. At the farther end was a heap of hay, which he took for another kind of straw. Then he spied something he knew: a row of cheeses lay on a shelf suspended from the rafters, ripening. Gibbie knew them well from the shop windows — knew they were cheeses, and good to eat, though whence and how they came he did not know, his impression being that they grew in the fields like the turnips. He had still the notion uncorrected, that things in the country belonged to nobody in particular, and were mostly for the use of animals, with which, since he became a wanderer, he had almost come to class himself. He was very hungry. He pounced upon a cheese and lifted it between his two hands: it smelled good, but felt very hard. That was no matter: what else were teeth made strong and sharp for? He tried them on one of the round edges, and, nibbling actively, soon got through to the softer body of the cheese. But he had not got much farther when he heard the men returning, and desisted, afraid of being discovered by the noise he made. The readiest way to conceal himself was to lie down flat on the loft, and he did so just where he could see the threshing-floor over the edge of it by lifting his head. This, however, he scarcely ventured to do; and all he could see as he lay was the tip of the swing-bar of one of the flails, ever as it reached the highest point of its ascent. But to watch for it very soon ceased to be interesting; and although he had eaten so little of the cheese, it had yet been enough to make him dreadfully thirsty, therefore he greatly desired to get away. But he dared not go down: with their sticks those men might knock him over in a moment! So he lay there thinking of the poor little hedgehog he had seen on the road as he came; how he stood watching it, and wishing he had a suit made all of great pins, which he could set up when he pleased; and how the driver of a cart, catching sight of him at the foot of the hedge, gave him a blow with his whip, and, poor fellow! notwithstanding his clothes of pins, that one blow of a whip was too much for him! There seemed nothing in the world but killing!

At length he could, unoccupied with something else, bear his thirst no longer, and, squirming round on the floor, crept softly towards the other end of the loft, to see what was to be seen there.

He found that the heap of hay was not in the loft at all. It filled a small chamber in the stable, in fact; and when Gibbie clambered upon it, what should he see below him on the other side, but a beautiful white horse, eating some of the same sort of stuff he was now lying upon! Beyond he could see the backs of more horses, but they were very different — big and clumsy, and not white. They were all eating, and this was their food on which he lay! He wished he too could eat it — and tried, but found it even less satisfactory than the oats, for it nearly choked him, and set him coughing so that he was in considerable danger of betraying his presence to the men in the barn. How did the horses manage to get such dry stuff down their throats? But the cheese was dry too, and he could eat that! No doubt the cheese, as well as the fine straw, was there for the horses! He would like to see the beautiful white creature down there eat a bit of it; but with all his big teeth he did not think he could manage a whole cheese, and how to get a piece broken off for him, with those men there, he could not devise. It would want a long-handled hammer like those with which he had seen men breaking stones on the road.

A door opened beyond, and a man came in and led two of the horses out, leaving the door open. Gibbie clambered down from the top of the hay into the stall beside the white horse, and ran out. He was almost in the fields, had not even a fence to cross. He cast a glance around, and went straight for a neighboring hollow, where, taught by experience, he hoped to find water.

FAITH AND VERIFICATION.

"An evil and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign."

In my former essays on the religious question of the day, what I have tried to make evident has been this: I have tried to make evident that to all moral life, religion — a belief in God — is essential; and that to all human culture, to all that gives our existence either zest or dignity, a belief in the moral life is essential. I am now going to approach the subject from a somewhat different point, and I conceive myself to be addressing a somewhat different audience. My arguments hitherto have been addressed to those who deny not only that religion is true, but also that it is useful; to men who look on it as a piece of antique lumber — a machine that may have done some good work in its time, but which at its best was inadequate and clumsy, and which now is broken; which the world must put away, and let its place be taken by a more efficient substitute. That religion might be broken I did not attempt to deny. I contended merely that, if it were, its loss was incalculable, and that no substitute could be found for it. Now I am addressing those with whom no such contention is necessary. Neither of these conclusions need be forced upon such, for they admit both already; and they admit this further, which I did not admit — not only that if religion went it would leave them desolate, but that it actually has gone, and that it actually has so left them.

This class is fully as important as the other; and though it is more silent, it is probably far larger; it is certainly making more converts; at some times it embraces the very men who at other times are most opposed to it; it is a desolate, dismal class, one of the ghastliest of the time's phenomena; and it seems every day to be increasing. To the best of my knowledge I am not speaking at random. Let a man have watchful eyes, and a wish to observe beneath the surface; let him mix in any society beyond that of a single set, and he will see the signs all round him of a state of things like this. It is said that in tropical forests one can almost hear the vegetation growing. One may almost say that with us one can hear faith decaying.

Within a certain limited circle there is nothing new in this. The causes of this decay have been maturing for three hundred years, and their effects prophesied for fifty; indeed, not prophesied only, but in some degree accomplished. But what is only now beginning is their general action. Hitherto they have influenced few except the professed thinkers. Now their work is beginning on the mass of lay humanity, whose various powers of thinking may be great or small, but whose special occupation is not thought. We must all of us know this; we can all of us see it. What I have said has been only a general statement, but particular examples of the truth of it must come thick to all of us. Let us compare our friends of to-day with our friends of five years since, and note from how many of them the hold of religion, which was then hardly loosening, is now altogether loosened. The influences of unbelief are breathing everywhere, like a wind in a lighted garden. It makes but little noise, and we might hardly know that it was a wind at all, if the lamps were not all flickering, and so many of them expiring fitfully.

Now what I say is, that this loss of faith, complete as it may be, is a thing bitterly regretted by many, who are most ready to own to it. They may often sneer at faith, and say it will never come back to them; and this bitterness against it may often seem a sign of their being glad to be rid of it. But it is as the bitterness of a woman against her lover, which has not been the cause of her deserting him, but which has been occasioned by his deserting her. To men in a condition like this, a strange blankness has come over human life. They may hear others vociferating that it is solemn; they feel quietly that it is only sad. It is not serious, it is only not amusing. The state of mind and its prevalence is very apt to be overlooked, because it is not a state of mind that, in common intercourse, readily finds utterance. Indeed not this only, but in common intercourse it tends for the time to disappear. People cannot be always exclaiming in drawing-rooms that they have lost their Lord; and the fact may be temporarily forgotten because they have lost their portmanteau. All serious reflections are like reflections in water. A pebble will disturb them for a moment, and make a dull pond sparkle. But the sparkle dies, and the reflection comes again. And there are many about us, though they never confess their pain, and perhaps themselves hardly like to dwell on it, whose hearts are aching for the God that they no longer can believe in. Their lonely hours, between the intervals of gaiety, are passed with barren and sombre thoughts; and a cry rises to their lips, but never passes them.

Amongst such a class the most unlikely people may at times be found, or at least they may be found with leanings that would soon bring them to belong to it. Thus Professor Clifford, one of the most jubilant of our atheistic essayists, has admitted that theism, under certain forms, might ennoble and comfort man; and such faith as that of Charles Kingsley's has awakened his deepest reverence. An example more important still is that of Professor Huxley. Whilst denying with the most unbending and gravest severity any right to man to any positive faith, he yet admits that were such a faith permissible it would be a welcome and a grateful thing. "The lover of moral beauty," he says, "struggling through a world of sorrow and sin, is surely as much the stronger for believing that sooner or later a vision of perfect peace and goodness will burst upon him, as the toiler up a mountain for the belief that beyond crag and snow lie home and rest." And he adds that, could a faith like what he here indicates be but placed upon a firm basis, mankind would cling to it as "tenaciously as ever drowning sailor did to a hencoop." But all these feelings are of no avail. The wish to believe is there; but the belief is as far off as ever. There is a power in the air around us by which faith seems paralyzed. Our intellect, we think, has acquired a new vigor, and a clearer vision; but the result of its growth is, with many, to have made it an incubus; and it lies upon all their deepest hopes and wishes

> Heavy as frost, and deep almost as life.

It is to men and women in this state that I now conceive myself to be speaking; and I wish to do them a service that they very rarely do for themselves. The whole intellect, the whole ordered thought of the world, is fatal, they feel keenly, to their dearest hopes and wishes. But the reasons why it is fatal they only understand vaguely. They do not sort them and appraise them, and look them fairly in the face. To do this is an easy task, and yet beyond measure a useful one. It is the task, indeed, humble and important, that I have now before me. From the very nature of the case I shall say nothing that is novel. I shall merely be uncoiling a few threads that we trip on every day in a state of tangle.

The objections to religion are of two distinct kinds — scientific and moral. An instance of the first is the following (used in this exact form by Professor Clifford), that, all consciousness being connected with a brain, there can be no God unless the universe is one single brain in itself. An instance of the second is, that, human misery being so plain and so vast a fact, the world cannot possibly have any all-powerful governor, who is willing and able to do his best for it.

I propose to deal with these two sets of objections in two separate papers; and I shall try, as far as possible, to confine myself to one single point — not to showing men that they must believe, but that, granting certain points which I presuppose granted, by every rule of reason, they may.

The scientific objections to religion are so many in number, and many of them of so complex a nature, that it would seem they could hardly, in any legitimate way, appeal to so large a class as are undoubtedly affected by them. And to a certain extent their power operates indirectly. The achievements of positive science have given to its greater masters a strange and unexampled pre-eminence. Their obscure researches into the natural order have led them to a very clear rejection of a belief in the supernatural; and the rest of the world has felt itself moved by their conclusions, independently of its assimilation of their premisses. But this is far from being the whole account of the case. The unscientific world, for all practical purposes, knows far more of science than one might at first expect it would. In the common sense of mankind there is a sort of œcumenical infallibility that at once detects the real bearing of facts. The facts are as food to their minds. They may not be able to find or to prepare the food; they may even be unable to distinguish the taste of it; but, how or why they know not, they can and they do digest it. And from all the facts that science has laid before them, they have concentrated and assimilated this great essential fact — that, of design, of government, of creation, the universe can afford no proof. Some say indeed, it can afford a disproof; but this, with the mass of men, has little weight. They perceive instinctively that this is to go too far. The result, however, is not in the least affected. Failure to find proof is indirectly equal to success in finding disproof. Granting, says Professor Huxley, that a religious creed would be beneficial, > my next step is to ask for a proof of the dogma. If this proof is forthcoming, it is my conviction that no drowning sailor ever clutched a hencoop more tenaciously than mankind will hold by such a dogma, whatever it may be. But if not, then I verily believe that the human race will go its own evil way; and my only consolation lies in the reflection that, however bad our posterity may become, so long as they hold by the plain rule of not pretending to believe what they see no reason to believe, because it may be to their advantage so to pretend, they will not have reached the lowest depths of immorality.

And such is the language of the majority of those I am now addressing. Ask any one oppressed and embittered by the want of faith, the reason why he does not again embrace it, and the reason will still be this — that there is no proof that it is true. In the Fortnightly Review for this last September, Mr. Leslie Stephen has said the same thing with a new vehemence; and the beliefs of men, according as we can prove or not prove them, he has classified passionately into realities and empty dreams. A few sentences of his will be worth quoting, as, though he himself does apparently not long for any religious comfort, his arguments are precisely the ones that oppress those who do. "Now," he exclaims to the generation round him, "at last, your creed is decaying. People have discovered that you know nothing about it; that heaven and hell belong to dreamland; that the impertinent young curate who tells me that I shall be burnt everlastingly for not sharing his superstition, is just as ignorant as I myself, and that I know as much as my dog." Again, he says, "The ignorant and the childish are hopelessly unable to draw the line between dreamland and reality; but the imagery which takes its rise in the imagination, as distinguished from the perceptions, bears indelible traces of its origin in comparative unsubstantiality and vagueness of outline." And Mr. Stephen's simile, within certain limits, is one of perfect accuracy. It is this that the world is coming now to see; it is this distinction that it is learning so fast to make. What men do feel now is that they are in some sense awakening: they are learning to test the difference between facts and dreams. And the test, the infallible test, is the possibility of proofs.

The meaning of the word proof by itself may perhaps be somewhat hazy, but the meaning that positive science attaches to it is plain enough. A fact only is proved when the evidence that it rests upon can leave us no room for doubt; when it cannot be denied without absurdity; when it becomes a necessity of the reason that we give our full assent to it. This is the positive doctrine of which we hear most now. Mr. Stephen, as we have seen, conceives it to be changing the whole face of things.

The matter thus, however, is only half stated. Taken by itself this doctrine could have no effect whatever; indeed it would amount to nothing but a verbal proposition. The real power of it lies in the suppressed premiss, that nothing is true that is not susceptible of proof; or, at any rate, that no one has any right to proclaim it as true. This is the fulcrum of the modern intellectual lever; and to fix this firmly in the human mind has been the great aim of science, so far as its aim has had any beyond a commercial and manufacturing value. But the work has proved far more arduous than one might have thought it would have been. To set this fulcrum on a sure foundation is the hardest task of all intellectual engineering. The foundation once secure, the rest is comparatively easy. But the human mind is a sand-bank, and positive science has had to drive endless piles into it, before its engines could have any thing firm to stand on; and nothing really firm has been come to even yet. The foundation, as it now stands, will bear a certain strain, but a certain only. Load it but a little too heavily, and it sinks and is swallowed up in an instant. In other words, the hardest of all beliefs to fix in men's minds is this cardinal axiom of the world's present philosophy, that nothing is surely true but what cannot rationally be doubted; or, to put the matter in Mr. Stephen's language, that dreams of some sort are not more real than realities.

Mr. Stephen can be shown, out of the very paper I allude to, to be an example of this fact himself; and if without offence I may compare him to a fabulous being that children once used to believe in, his position is exactly that of Satan trying to cast out Satan. And such is not his position only, but the position of every positive thinker who has treated human life as though there were morally a right and a wrong in it, and as though morally it were worth being influenced at all. My aim in this paper is a simple and a single one. It is to show that, judged by the daily life of any earnest person, by the very intellectual air he breathes and desires to continue to breathe, the great scientific axiom is an utterly false one; that so far from being true, it is in diametrical opposition to truth; and that if we will only test by reason our own beliefs, each one of us who can in any sense be said to be moral, or to be acting upon any fixed principles whatsoever, will find that so far from proof being the test of all that we hold true, it is only the meanest, the most subordinate truths that are capable of being proved at all; and that there is no belief that gives life any human value that cannot be doubted or contradicted without absurdity, and that has not been doubted and contradicted continually throughout all the world's history.

By way of prelude to what I am going to say, let me ask any positive thinker, such as Professor Huxley, this question. He supposes, at least for argument's sake, that a belief in God might be desirable. But, granted this, he goes on, his next step is to ask for some proof of the truth of it. Now I ask Professor Huxley, or any one else in Professor Huxley's position, what sort of proof it is that he would require to find? What image has he in his mind when he speaks like this? Would his proof be a piece of litmus paper, taking various unexplained colors, in answer to his prayers? or would it be any thing at all of that nature? Such a miracle in the world of matter can hardly be what he looks for, because he starts with assuming that such a miracle is an impossibility. And human evidence is so very fallible, and the human senses are so very subject to hallucinations, that unless a man has strong a priori reasons for a belief in miracles, it is hardly fair to expect him to believe in one, not only when others report the truth of it, but even when his own senses may seem to do so likewise. I defy any one in Professor Huxley's position to name any thinkable proof of the truth of any supernatural fact, using the word proof with the meaning he professes to give to it. He would not be persuaded, nor indeed logically could he be, even should one rise to him from the dead.

Let us now consider the matter step by step. The world once thought that there were two orders of things, the one material, and the other immaterial, of which the most familiar examples were the human soul and body. The highest generalizations of modern science are denials of this dualism; and all its countless details are significant mainly as supporting them. Things are due, it tells us, not to a formless matter and a forming mind; but to a formless matter that, of necessity, has taken form itself. And everything, under a certain aspect, would seem to point this way. Professor Tyndall has said, with perfect justice, that were not man and his destinies involved, we should all long ago have accepted the doctrine of evolution, and the full sufficiency of materialism. So, doubtless, we should have done. Our chief difficulty would in that case be removed; and we should do many things if they were not difficult. Professor Tyndall has hit the right nail on the head. Let us, to begin at the beginning, take the material world by itself, and put conscious life altogether out of the question. The doctrine of evolution, as applied to this, could be accepted by our minds immediately, without the least intellectual difficulty. It would only be a question of evidence; and the evidence that is by this time in our possession would be quite enough to convince us. Long, however, before we come to human destinies, there is one fact which startles us. That fact is consciousness. At a certain stage of its development matter becomes, as it were, two-sided. How to account for this phenomenon science frankly says is hopeless. We do not even possess the rudiment of an organ by which it is conceivable that we could do so. So says Professor Tyndall; and so has said every man of science who has had the least tincture of philosophy, I might almost say the least tincture of education.

This eternal and insuperable gap in our knowledge has been a stumbling-block to some physicists, but to many more a refuge. Here, in "this interspace of world and world," or, rather, of side and side, they think they have found room for man's spiritual nature to expand in — a free and open sky that the ideal may still blossom under. If any one taxes them with making the universe a dull machine, and of explaining everything at the expense of denying everything that is worth explaining, they retort that they too have their mystery as well as their opponents, and a mystery the depth of which they alone can duly appreciate. Profess to explain everything! exclaims Professor Tyndall. Far from it, we profess to explain nothing: "the molecular groupings and motions" of the materialist "in reality explain nothing." See — we not only admit the existence of a mystery, but we do all we can to parade it.

In reality, however, the whole of this kind of talk is useless. The mystery in question is essentially a barren one. It can afford no nourishment to anything that is spiritual or ideal in us. It is not an open window in life, through which an air can blow to us out of an unfathomable distance. It is simply a walled chamber in life, which we can walk all round, but which we can never break into. Or a more apt illustration of the matter will, perhaps, be this. Physical processes and the facts of consciousness may be compared to a sheet of blotting-paper, either side of which we can look at singly, but which, by the very nature of our sight, we can never look at both at the same time. The crowning doctrine of the scientific pyramid, we must recollect, is this: every mental fact has a functional relation to some molecular fact; in other words, mind is inseparable from matter; it is, indeed, the same phenomenon, only regarded from different quarters. But for this, the old dualism, now supposed to be obsolete, would be entirely undisturbed. Indeed, if this doctrine were denied, such a dualism would be the only alternative. To return again, then, to the simile of the sheet of blotting-paper, let us imagine one side of it mechanically spluttered over by a little wheel turning round in an ink-pot. That will represent consciousness, when approached from its physical side. Let us imagine that to the other side of the paper some of the splutterings have soaked through, and taken the form of words or letters. That will represent consciousness, when approached from its mental side.

If such be the connection between the two, one important fact will at once become evident. Matter existed and fermented long before the evolution of mind. One side of the blotting-paper had been spluttered for countless ages, before any ink soaked through, or took the form of writing, on the other. Mental facts are, therefore, essentially dependent on molecular facts; molecular facts are not dependent on mental. They may seem to be so; but this is only a delusion. They are as much the outcome of molecular groupings and movements as the figures in a kaleidoscope are of the groupings and movements of the colored bits of glass. They are things entirely by the way; and they can as little be considered links in any chain of causes as can one figure in a kaleidoscope be called the cause of the figure that succeeds it.

This conclusion is so distasteful to most men that but few of them can be brought to face it. Their intellects start aside from it, shying like startled horses, and go galloping aimlessly away along any track leading in an opposite direction. And yet, as Professor Tyndall says of another doctrine, "were not man's origin implicated, we should accept it without a murmur. . . . The conclusion of pure intellect points this way and no other. But this purity is troubled by our interests. . . . Reason is traversed by the emotions."

A very luminous illustration of this has been given in the Nineteenth Century. It will be remembered that some time since there was a discussion in its pages on "The Soul and Future Life," suggested by some writings of Mr. Frederic Harrison. To that discussion Professor Huxley contributed a paper; and to that paper Mr. Harrison made a special reply, in which he charged Professor Huxley with holding a low form of materialism, and claimed for himself a doctrine that was essentially opposed to it. Professor Huxley spoke of how "the religious feelings might be brought within the range of physiological inquiry;" and of how the production of "The Priest in Absolution" might be due to "a diseased viscus" in the author of it. In these sentences Mr. Harrison found an epitome of modern materialism, and he set himself with all his vigor to show that they were false and mischievous. "We both agree," says Mr. Harrison, "that every mental and moral fact is in functional relation with some molecular fact. So far we are entirely on the same side as against all forms of theological and metaphysical doctrine, which conceive the possibility of human feeling without a human body. But then, says Professor Huxley, if I can trace the molecular facts, which are the antecedents of the mental and moral facts, I have explained the mental and moral facts. That I deny." And he adds, that to ask "how the religious feelings may be brought within the range of physiological inquiry," is about as sane as to ask, "what barometrical readings are responsible for the English constitution." Some connection, he admits, there is between the two — the constitution and the climate; indeed, it is one of his primary dogmas that "all human things depend on . . . the general laws of the solar system." But Professor Huxley's method, none the less, is a false, futile, and degrading one; and its fault lies in this, not that "it confuses moral with physical phenomena," but that "it exaggerates the physical side of moral phenomena."

Now, if we try to get at the bottom of Mr. Harrison's state of mind, we shall see that he is laboring unconsciously with two meanings; one of which is something true, but trivial, and the other of supreme importance, but inconsistent with his own premisses. It is only to the trivial meaning that he has any logical right; and we will examine that first.

It will be found to amount to nothing more than this — that Professor Huxley talks, as conceivable, of a state of knowledge which is practically not attainable; and that in so talking he is talking rather idly. According to Mr. Harrison's own premisses, every mental fact has its exact molecular counterpart, and is able conceivably to be expressed in terms of molecules. But the molecular facts are so minute, so many, and so intricate, and their connection with other molecular facts is at once so infinite and so infinitesimal, that we must despair of ever describing them completely enough to be of any use to us. Let our vision become as keen as it is ever likely to be, the physical side of consciousness will be still a perplexity to it. It will be as the wrong side of a piece of tapestry — nothing but a dim confusion of canvas, threads, and colors. It is the other side alone which it will bring us any profit to look at. If Mr. Harrison, however, will consider his own position, he will see that, in the case of consciousness, to approach it in this way is nothing better than a pis-aller. In the tapestry, the under side is the by-result of the upper. In consciousness the upper side is the by-result of the under. If all human things depend on the laws of the solar system, it will at once be seen that this must be so. Consciousness has been the result of those laws; those laws have not been the result of consciousness.

We may compare a fact of consciousness to a cannon made at billiards; and Professor Huxley would seek to explain the cannon by the laws of motion and the particular stroke of the cue. This, were it practicable, would surely be the right way of proceeding; but Mr. Harrison calls it absurd and wrong. That there is some fault in it is true enough; but Mr. Harrison calls it by the wrong name. The fault is simply that it is a difficult method, not that it is an absurd one.

The simile of the billiard balls will be of much further use to us. Let us suppose six billiard balls to represent a human brain, and the various figures that these balls could assume to represent the various changes attendant on the man's various feelings. Let us take such a man as Mr. Harrison would most admire — a humanitarian enthusiast; and let us imagine him in a crisis of his life when some selfish desire, such as that of a good dinner, was contending with an unselfish desire, such as that of giving a lecture on positivism. At first he is about to yield to the low desire for his dinner. There is a struggle in him. Suddenly his face flushes with the light of a high resolve. The unselfish desires have conquered, and he goes fasting and heroic to the delivery of his lecture.

Such is the aspect of the event as viewed from Mr. Harrison's stand-point. But what is its aspect when viewed from the other side? The six billiard balls have simply changed their places. When they corresponded to the selfish impulse, they formed, let us say, an oval; when they correspond to the unselfish impulse, they formed themselves, let us say, into a circle. What is the cause of this change? Clearly a certain impetus imparted to the balls. The question is, what imparted it? Now, according to Mr. Harrison's hypothesis, the balls were cannoning and dashing about the board long before they so arranged themselves as to correspond to any fact of consciousness; when they were so dashing they dashed in obedience to certain fixed laws — such laws, to put the matter again into Mr. Harrison's language, as "the general laws of the solar system;" and the entire sum and substance of his intellectual position is nothing more than this — that the balls combine so as to equal consciousness, by exactly the same laws they combined by when they did not equal it. It is plain then that as soon as the first stroke was given to them, their entire future history was virtually decided; and that every combination they could ever form into could be foreseen, with sufficient knowledge, at the moment of the stroke. Were our knowledge extended in degree simply, and not in kind, the question derived by Mr. Harrison would be a perfectly proper one — by what barometrical readings can we explain the British constitution? Mr. Harrison says much about the word explaining; but his language makes me doubt a little in what sense he uses it. I use it in this: I say that one fact explains another when, with a full knowledge of the former, we can infallibly predict the latter; and using the word in this sense, it is perfectly true to say, not only that would a full knowledge of our climate lead to a full knowledge of our constitution, but that a full knowledge of any single square inch of the universe would lead to a full knowledge of every other inch of it. If there be but one set of laws at work everywhere, nothing that is could be otherwise than as it is. If human things depend on the general laws of the solar system, had Saturn one moon less, the course of English history would have, in some degree, been different; and the extinction of a crater in the moon would contain the history in it of the death of Christ on the cross. Mr. Harrison complains that Professor Huxley exaggerates the physical side of moral phenomena. But how, on his principles, is it possible to exaggerate the physical side? Take the entire universe — take even the solar system, on whose general laws all our moral phenomena are dependent, and what are all our moral phenomena when compared to that? Is not the organism dwarfed by its vast environment, from the depth of which all its powers are drawn, to the depth of which all its powers will return, and of which it is itself but a part — a fragment? All then that logically Mr. Harrison can mean by his fierce reproof to Professor Huxley is, that when he speaks of a state of knowledge as conceivable, he forgets to observe at the same time that it is practically unattainable; although by the admissions of both of them it is the state to which we are getting nearer and nearer, although we never actually reach it.

But though this is all that Mr. Harrison can mean logically, it is but a very small part of what he does mean actually. His eloquence and his indignation have some really serious content, not only different from this, but diametrically opposed to it. What he is really urging on Professor Huxley is the utter inadequacy of his own premisses; and he is virtually fighting his duel in the oriental fashion, by putting an intellectual end to himself. He comes forward, he says, as a denier and a denouncer of all such theological and metaphysical figments as the existence of a soul apart from a body, or the possibility of any thought or emotion but what is the reverse side of some molecular fact. But what his eloquence really means, is the exact opposite of this. It is a passionate proclamation of the dualism that he conceives himself to be denouncing. "Man is one," he says, "however complex." What he means is that man is complex, however one. Unless he means this, he agrees with Professor Huxley. There is no alternative.

Let us return to our simile of the billiard balls, and we shall see the case more plainly. We have imagined six balls in motion to have grouped themselves for a moment into an oval, and the oval then to have changed shape to a circle. And that change of shape we took to be the physical counterpart of some great moral crisis. Now the balls, we must remember, were in motion, before they corresponded to anything moral at all: a player, we will say, gave them a chance hit with a cue. Professor Huxley says that the change of the oval to the circle can be explained by a knowledge of that hit, combined with a knowledge of the laws of motion. "That," says Mr. Harrison, "is the thing that I deny." But if he denies it, what does he affirm in its stead? When the oval changes to the circle, what new force have we to take account of? Either the balls go on moving by exactly the same laws they have always moved by, and are in the grasp of the same invincible necessity, or else some new and disturbing force has begun to act upon them. Mr. Harrison speaks of consciousness as if it were such a force — a new factor with which we have to reckon. But if consciousness is inseparable from matter, how can it be? Do our billiard balls, when so grouped as to represent consciousness, generate some new motive power, distinct from and often stronger than the original impetus? Clearly no scientific thinker can admit this. To do so would undermine the entire fabric of science. All its highest generalizations would be wrong; and we should again think that it was possible to construct a perpetual motion.

This then, it is plain, cannot be Mr. Harrison's meaning. But if not this, what can it be? There is only one alternative, and that is that unconsciously he postulates a second player — a second cue tampering with the billiard balls, or even more than this — a second hand taking them up, and arranging them arbitrarily in certain figures. Mr. Harrison is on the horns of a dilemma. The mind or spirit is either arranged entirely by the molecules it is connected with, or the molecules it is connected with are arranged, at least partially, by the mind or spirit. Mr. Harrison rejects the former theory: he must accept the latter. The mind in that case is a disturbing element. Since nature is uniform, then this disturbing element must be something supernatural; and we are brought back again to the old religious dualism. The mind or spirit is a something self-existent; known to us only through its action upon matter, but essentially not tied to matter, any more than the hand that interferes with the billiard balls is tied to the billiard balls. Once condemn materialism as Mr. Harrison condemns it, and in this condemnation is to be found the affirmation of will. Once affirm will, and you affirm a dualism — you affirm a self-existent, supernatural order — that is, an order of things of which ex hypothesi no natural proof can be given, because ex hypothesi it lies quite beyond the region of nature. The mere facts of the case we can explain on either hypothesis. Which we adopt must depend entirely on the value we attach to the facts. We may consider them as a series of mere phenomena, which hitherto we have misinterpreted. There is nothing to compel us to fall down and worship them. But once let us do this, once let us speak of moral responsibility, and exalt things spiritual above and beyond things physical, and we are constrained by reason to affirm a supernatural force — a self-existent will. We are renegades to the faith that proof is the test of truth. The foundation-stone of our creed becomes a dogma that cannot be verified.

I have dwelt thus long on a dispute between two particular writers, because they are both men of very singular ability, and their dispute contains the pith of the great dispute of the age. And now let us look round at that age, and see something of what its moral condition is. In many places, it is true, materialism is beginning to do its logical work; but that, in England at least, is amongst those who are taught the gospel, rather than amongst those who teach it. Our leaders of scientific thought are men full of lofty instincts and sure principles. Professor Huxley perpetually is speaking of moral beauty, of sin, and the highest good; and whenever his materialism might teach him any practical lessons, he is to the full as false to it as Mr. Harrison himself. Mr. Leslie Stephen is another case in point. I have noticed his late distinction between dreams and realities. But in the very paper in which he puts this distinction forward, his one inspiring principle has been what on his own showing is a dream. Not only is his whole paper colored by such ethical epithets as low, and lofty, and even sacred, but he implies at the end that the love of truth for truth's sake is the one principle that is really worthy of man. His closing paragraph is an accumulation of grim taunts against the dreamers, and the bitterest of all these is this. "The sentiment," he says, "which he (the dreamer) most thoroughly hates and misunderstands is the love of truth for its own sake. He cannot conceive why any man should attack a lie, simply because it is a lie." Mr. Stephen is wrong. That is exactly what the dreamer can do, and no one else but he; and Mr. Stephen is himself a dreamer, when he writes and feels like this. Why, let me ask him, should the truth be loved? The truths of nature, so far as man is concerned with them, Mr. Stephen says, are "harsh" truths. Why then should "harsh" things be lovable? The dreamer may with sufficient accuracy be said to love truth for its own sake, because he dreams that somehow or other truth and good will be some day found identical. But take his dreams from him, and his love for truth will be gone. Very certainly in that case he will not understand it, and in saying that he will not Mr. Stephen is really saying what redounds most to his praise. Again, low and lofty — these words too are part of the language of dreamland. Mr. Stephen has no right to them. If he has, he must be able to draw a hard and fast line between them; for if his definitions be "vague in outline" and "insubstantial," they belong, according to his express definition, to the land of dreams. Finally, as to all these moral concepts, and more especially as to the love of truth for its own sake, we need only say to Mr. Stephen in his own language, that if their reality "be really enforced by logic, there is no more to be said; only in that case it is desirable that an exhibition of the logical ground should be less frequently superseded by a simple appeal to emotion. It is assuredly a misfortune that morality should be based on a conception that is avowedly little more than a vague 'perhaps.'" Mr. Stephen's arrow goes here very near the mark. Whether he considers it a misfortune or not, it is precisely on a "perhaps" that morality is based, if anything is a "perhaps" that we have any choice in believing. It implies, and it is based upon, a belief in the independence of will. The belief that will is free is as essential to our moral conceptions as the belief that nature is uniform is essential to our scientific conceptions. Morality would be meaningless without the former, as science would be impossible without the latter.

I have taken the foregoing instances from the language of our modern teachers as a reminder, rather than a proof, of the present state of things — of how false to their own great axiom the exponents of positive thought are; and how, so far from believing nothing that cannot be proved to be true, they can only explain their propagation of the dogma by a conviction that has been formed in defiance of it.

This question of free will, however, lies only on the threshold of the matter. Morality assumes two axioms: firstly, that man is responsible for the path he walks in; secondly, that such or such a path is the only right one. The first, as we have seen, implies that the will is free. We will now go on to consider what is implied in the second; and this will show us yet more clearly how supernatural, how unverifiable, are the foundations that the whole moral world rests on. Professor Huxley has denied this in a very memorable sentence, which throws so singular a light on the present state of the question, that I cannot do better than quote it here.

"The assertion," he says, "that morality is in any way dependent on certain philosophical problems, produces the same effect on my mind as if one should say that a man's vision depends on his theory of sight; or that he had no business to be sure that ginger is hot in the mouth unless he has formed definite views as to the nature of ginger, and secondly as to whether he has or has not a sensitive soul."

Professor Huxley is a very remarkable man. On those subjects, by his mastery of which he has grown so famous, he is admired and listened to by all who can form an opinion about them; and those even who can judge little of his scientific work themselves, are yet conscious, as they read his writings, of the vigor of his intellect, and above all of the robust honesty of his character. But when he quits the physical world for the moral, a strange change comes over him, and all that his strength can do is to recoil upon himself. He is pledged to a theory of monistic materialism, and he endeavors to unite this with a dualistic spiritualism. The task, however, is beyond his power. If any one could accomplish it, it might perhaps be he; but the things he would unite are things that can never be united; and the result of his labor is that he sets them side by side, and merely exhibits a contrast when he thinks he has effected a union. But the vigor of his intellect does not desert him. Even here he is above all his fellows. He masses together contradictory and incompatible statements as no one else does. His inconsistencies are more trenchant, and come on us with the force of a sledge-hammer. He concentrates fallacy and confusion into a single sentence, with a vigor to which I can find no parallel. Of this the sentence I have just quoted is an example, and as such will be much use to us here.

The illustration in it illustrates much, but it illustrates the very fact it was designed to invalidate. The fact that ginger is hot in the mouth is compared to the fact that a certain action is pleasing or is unpleasing to a man's whole being. And so far as it goes the comparison is perfectly just. Certain actions undoubtedly affect men in certain ways, quite independently of all theory about them. Sexual abstinence or indulgence is an instance of this. About this, however, there is no question: it is necessarily taken for granted. The question is not whether ginger be hot in the mouth or no, but whether or no we ought to eat it; and thus the very matter which Professor Huxley says is indifferent is the very matter that is really all-important. We must have definite views as to the nature of ginger before we know whether to eat or abstain from it.

That such or such a food is hot in the mouth is just the order of fact on which positive science can be positive. It is an excellent illustration of how far such science will go, how far into the ethical world its verifications will escort us. It will show us that certain outer things affect us in a certain way; and that some of these affections are pleasurable, and some not so. But a study of such tastes as these will no more supply us with any guide to action, show us the way to any spiritual elevation, or help us in any way to be "lovers of moral beauty," than the inspection of a block of marble will enable us to carve an Apollo from it. Men's natural tastes, and the verifiable certitudes with regard to them, such as that ginger is hot in the mouth, are nothing more than the raw material of morality. The spiritual, the moral life consists in shaping and chastening this, in cutting away with care and labor a large part of it, till the shape accords with a certain ideal pattern — till the statue is hewn out of the block. I have pointed out, in a former paper, the confusion, common to most modern theories, between the verifiable laws by which alone freedom of choice can be secured to us, and the essentially unverifiable laws by which this choice is to be directed. Sociology, so far as any art can be based upon the science of it, will guide us merely towards the ideal of J. S. Mill — that of securing as much freedom to each of us as is compatible with a like freedom for all. Sociology must, then, be subsidiary either to individual license or else to some supernatural system. We may compare human life to a yew-tree. Science will show us how it has grown from the ground, and how all its twigs must have fitting room to expand in. It will not show us how to clip the yew-tree into a peacock. All moral truths must rest ultimately on the proved facts of sociology. This is what our scientific moralists are forever proclaiming to us, and no one in his senses would dispute this. Morality, as we must all admit, does rest upon sociology, but it rests on it as a statue does on its pedestal; and the same pedestal will support an Athene or a Priapus.

Which shall the statue be? That is the moral question, and every moralist has for it an unhesitating answer. He is absolute, he is positive on the point. He will not admit that there can be any doubt about it. Of the many ideals possible, one and one only is the best. He can give no reason why it is so; he can only reiterate that it is a fact. Men can agree or disagree with him as they please, and are for this reason the subjects of his praise or blame.

Thus, in the moral world, not only is free-will demanded implicitly, but the exaltation of some ideal — the submission of ourselves to some one "dream," is demanded explicitly. Professor Tyndall sees this plainly enough, and winds up a defence of monistic materialism by a vigorous statement of it. "What is really wanted," he says, "is the lifting power of an ideal element in human life." And all enthusiasms for humanity and the like, all devotions to truth for its own sake, are attempts at supplying us with such an ideal element. What then? Men form such ideals, it will be said, and cannot these be accepted as ultimate facts? Most emphatically they cannot. Did men all agree in forming the same ideal, and when formed did they not continually incline to be false to it, the case might then be different. But as a fact the ideals are very diverse; and when logic and when science have done all they can for us, they leave us face to face with a choice as to which they have no advice to offer us. Let the choice once be made, they will come back to us in an instant, and will again do our bidding; but while we are making the choice, they must leave us solitary; no power of theirs can sustain us in our vigil.

It will thus be seen that when once we enter the moral world we entirely leave the physical, or our concern with it, at any rate, becomes quite subordinate and secondary. We move amongst laws and forces that have no necessary connection with physical facts, and are essentially independent of the laws of the solar system. Their impress on physical facts, their interference with physical laws, may doubtless be the only things through which we can perceive their action; but they are as distinct from the things by which we alone perceive them as a hand unseen in the dark that should arrest or divert the course of a phosphorescent billiard ball. I say that this is so, if they exist at all.

Mr. Stephen says that these all belong to dreamland; and he is quite welcome, if he please, to keep his names. His terminology at least has this merit, that it recognizes the dualism of matter and of spirit. Let him keep his names if he will; and the question in his language amounts to this, whether it may not be only for the sake of the dreams that visit it, that the world of reality has any value for us, and if the dreams may not continue when the reality has passed away.

I will now pass to another point; and Mr. Stephen's language will again be of help to me here. Men's moral notions, taken simply by themselves, may very truly be called dreamlike; distinguished, that is, as Mr. Stephen says, by "their comparative vagueness, and insubstantiality of outline." There is a certain general agreement about them, but the details are ill defined, and are apt to undergo cloud-like changes of shape. Or we may compare such morality to a dim diffused light, not strong enough to see to read by, and falling upon objects mysterious with fog and mist. Religion is the sun from which all this light proceeds; and a man's assent to it corresponds with the emergence of the sun from a cloud-bank. The fogs and mists evaporate, and what was vague becomes clearness. No simile, however, is perfect for very far, and this of the sunlight fails to illustrate the relationship of natural to revealed religion. The question here, however, is a little beside the mark, except for one reason; as, if it were not for that, the passage from the one to the other would, so far as science is concerned, be easy, if not inevitable. Practically what a revelation does is to give natural religion an organized working form. It is a burning-glass, by which the sun's heat is concentrated, and which sets things on fire that were only warm before. Once, then, let us grant a God, and there are strong a priori grounds for expecting and for desiring that he would reveal himself. There is, however, but one revelation — the Christian — that has much chance of securing the world's assent to it; and this is so encumbered with miracles, that its alleged history and credentials seem not only things that we cannot prove to be true, but things as well that we can prove not to be possible. A miracle is an actual suspension of the laws of nature. A variety of molecular or molar motions take place, in defiance of their usual laws. The most marked instance of this, in the Biblical records, is the standing still of the sun and moon at the bidding of Joshua; whilst we may take, as an instance from the New Testament, the sudden cessation of a storm at the words of Christ. Such is the nature of all miracles proper; and though these may do more violence than some to the imagination, the impossibility of all is equal. Let us once grant that a tear could be held from falling, when of physical necessity it would fall, and we must grant that the course of the planets might at any moment be tampered with. Let us grant that a single atom could be deflected from its course for a moment, and we must grant that winds in a moment might be hushed, and turbulent waters stilled. The uniformity claimed for nature is an absolute uniformity, and an infinitesimal violation of this is an infinite violation of it.

And now let us return to a fact we were just now considering. If human free will be a force in life at all, it must, if nature be uniform, be a supernatural force, acting on matter, but essentially independent of it. Every logical reasoner who admits the power of such will must admit not only the possibility of miracles, but also the actual fact of their daily occurrence. Every exertion of the human will is, strictly speaking, a miracle; only it takes place within the closed walls of the brain. The molecules of the brain are arranged and ordered by a supernatural agency. Their natural automatic movements are suspended, or directed and interfered with. It is true that, in common usage, the word miracle has a more restricted use, but so far as it relates to nature the sense is essentially the same. What are commonly called miracles are acts, not of man's free will, but of God's; which is conceived of as disturbing in the same way the automatic movements of matter without the skull, as a man's free will disturbs those of the brain within it. Once then let us grant free will to man, and the impossibility of miracles vanishes — even the improbability.

The imagination, it is true, may turn restive, and swerve from a conclusion such as this; but such is the one conclusion that rigid reason points to, and sooner or later the imagination will have to yield to it. Did our modern thinkers only keep strictly on all points to that strict logic, in whose name they cast out miracles, they would be surprised to find how ingrained in the thoughts of men are conceptions that involve their possibility, and that ignore the strongest arguments that can be urged against them. Science has thrown on this question an infinite and unexpected light. If facts are what I mean to affirm they are, when I say that I threw a stone because I chose to throw it, or stopped a rolling stone because I chose to stop it, I have introduced, by such an action on matter, a disorder into the material universe of exactly the same kind, though not of the same molar magnitude, as Joshua did when he stayed the moon at Ajalon. That story of course may not be true. Because we believe in some miracles, there is no reason to believe in all, any more than, because Sheridan was no doubt a wit, we believe to be really his all the foolish witticisms set down to him. But, paradoxical as it may seem to say so, on a priori grounds, and examined by calm reason, there is no more impossibility involved in the story of Joshua's moon than in saying that a little boy in the street trundled his hoop because he willed to do so, or forbore to trundle it. The possibility of both is equal. Science can find room for the possibility of neither. And thus, as I have said before, let the evidence for miracles be never so overwhelming at first sight, no scientific thinker can be fairly asked to yield to it; and the many possible deceptions of the senses and the imagination leave him ample room to escape from it. Once, however, let a belief in them become intellectually admissible, and the evidence for a number of them becomes abundant and conclusive. Many probable events, which we consider certainties, rest on far slighter evidence than do many miracles which we at once reject as fictions.

And now I will sum up briefly what I have thus far tried to elucidate. Life, as endowed with any spiritual significance, consists of two elements as different from each other as a sponge is from the water that soaks it. Modern thought, with a singular slovenliness, assumes these two elements to be one; and I have been trying to show their difference, and localize the point of junction. We begin with matter, its automatic motions, and the astounding complexity of combinations that have been evolved by them. This line of study brings us at last to men, the most astounding of all automata, capable, in themselves, of moving along a vast variety of paths, but sent each by preceding circumstances along one path in particular. It is at this point that we enter the realm of faith. Faith finds man an automaton, and injects into him a new force. The path along which each man will move becomes no longer fore-decided for him. He may come to the choice with a certain automatic bias, but there is that within him that can overcome this. His choice is in his own hands. You may choose which path you will; that is the first thing faith says to him. Such or such a path is the only right one; that is the second thing. Why is it right? he asks; and morality takes the form of religion, and faith answers thirdly, Because it leads to God, because it leads to the heart's desire.

In former papers I have tried to make it clear how logically inseparable morality is from theism; how theism is the one form to which reason must ultimately reduce the "ideal element," the "lifting power" of which, Professor Tyndall says, is so essential to us. But it has not been necessary to dwell upon that here; since I presume, as I have said, for the present, a desire for religion in my readers, and a recognition of the value of it, only practically thwarted by the absence of any grounds for believing in it. What I have tried to point out to such is this: that the grounds they have been taught to look for are grounds that cannot exist; and that to say that we cannot believe religion because there are no such proofs of it, would be to say we cannot believe that a bird has flown over a desert because it has left no footprints in the sand. I have tried to bring this more home to them by examples found close at hand; to show them that not only in their own moral life do they entirely deny verification as a test of truth, but that the same thing is done by our leaders of positive thought also; and that in the case of all the most important beliefs, this test is abandoned by the very men who have persuaded others to use it.

Arguments are like seed, or like the soul as Paul conceived it, which he compared to seed. They are not quickened unless they die. As long as they remain in the form of arguments, they are ineffective. They begin their action only after they have sunk down into the memory; when the hostility and the distrust they were regarded with die away; when, silently and unperceived, they melt into the mental system, and, becoming part of oneself, effect a turning round of the soul. This, at least, is true in such vital matters as those I am now dealing with. One cannot bully people into the love of God, nor even into a belief in him; and I should not expect my arguments to convert a single sceptic. But I do not for that reason think them useless. If they be sound, as I most firmly think they are, they will some day do their work in the world; but they will need to be stated and re-stated by many thinkers, and in many ways, before their work is appreciable; and every statement helps. And even then what are they? They do but show us the question, not answer it; and show us also that it is still open. I write in the interests of those who desire the gift of faith — a gift of fire as it was to them, which I think falsehood has done much to extinguish. But I cannot re-light the fire; I can only begin sweeping the chimney.

Sweeping the chimney is to my mind a not inapt metaphor; and it applies equally to the work of science. Men of science, so long as they keep to their own limits, are chimney-sweepers in the house of life. They have been at their work now for many generations, and they have cleared away much of the soot of ages; but, unfortunately, they have made more than they have cleared away. The brush of reason must next be applied to this; and the passage will then be clearer than it ever before has been. Or I may express my meaning thus. The reign of science, I may compare to a thunder-storm, which, though it darkens the air while it lasts, will have left it clearer when it has passed away.

In other words, the teaching of science has needed to be made perfect before its limits, and its full meaning, could be truly realized. "Unless I have seen with mine eyes I will not believe," expresses a cer tain mental tendency that has always had existence. But till science and its positive methods began to dawn on the world, this tendency was vague and wavering. Positive science supplied it with solid nutriment; its body grew denser, and its shape more definite; till at last it has spread its affirmations, and its denials also, throughout the whole universe. So far as spirit goes, and spiritual aspirations, it has left the universe empty, swept, and garnished. If spirit is to enter in and dwell there, we must seek elsewhere for it.

If faith then is to have any future history, this, I conceive, is what science will be found to have done for it. It will have taught us to set it on its right foundation. It will have taught us, for instance, that to seek to prove God's existence by traces of design in nature is to begin altogether at the wrong end of the matter. Once let us believe in God, and such traces of design may then perhaps be revealed to us; but the belief must come first, and these traces afterwards. In that case they will remind us of our faith, rather than convince us of it; as a glass of flowers in his library may remind a man that his wife cares for him, though their presence of itself would never make him think he was married.

But perhaps the reign of faith is over. Perhaps we are really about to live by positive science only. So far as reason goes, we shall get no help in the matter; for the issue is not one between faith and reason, but between a belief in two orders of things and a belief in only one. The work of reason will be the same in either case. In either case she will be like a custom-house officer. She will make us declare our taxable goods; and if she finds any in our box we have not declared, she will pitilessly take them away from us. In either case she will be like a judge who will judge us by the laws of which country we choose. Till that choice is made we are her masters; when it is made we are her servants. She will take our beliefs, and she will sift them and resift them, and leave us nothing but what we have an absolute right to. Give her the laws of science, and let her judge our beliefs by them, and slowly but surely she will sift our dreams from our realities. Mr. Stephen will soon shriek to her that she is mistaken, that those are not dreams she is discarding, but solid realities, that he cannot possibly get on without. But reason will not hear him. Her fan is in her hand, and she will thoroughly purge her floor.

What the world's final choice will be may perhaps remain undecided till some practical illustration shall be given of what life looks like, when thus winnowed clean of its dreams. Would-be believers may perhaps be shocked to find that the truths of the spirit have their chief foundation in the world of the spirit; and that logically they are as free to deny them as they are to accept them — that the question, in fact, is positively a matter of choice. But a little reflection will show them that this must be so, and that faith, were it not so, would be robbed of half its value. Could the fact of God's existence, for instance, or the moral value of purity, be expressed by scientific proof — that is, could it be so proved that we had no choice but to believe it — our belief would lose that chastening and transforming power that, by those who feel it, it is supposed to have. An act of faith has the same effect on the character that an act of generous trust has. It is the only act by which the mind can be humbled in the presence of the sum of things, without being abased also; by which man can acknowledge the certain fact of his insignificance, without denying himself altogether any strength and dignity. According to the scientific view of nature, unless we adopt the creed of indifferentism, which is its only logical outcome, man in the face of nature must either strut or grovel. In the first case he is ludicrous; in the latter, by his own admission, contemptible.

What then, again I ask, is the future chance of religion? So long as the moral enthusiasm of men has not spent itself — so long "as vain thoughts," as Dante says, "have not been a petrifying fountain to the soul" — there is the same "stuff" left in the world as religious "dreams are made of;" and when the prestige of positive thought has been reduced to its true dimensions, we may once more return to such dreams as the only true reality. At present it may be hard to do so. A sort of intellectual hysteria may numb our faculties. But this may pass away, and their former strength return to them. The laws of God may once more seem surer to us than the laws of gravitation. Faith may once more dictate to the world, and put its foot upon the neck of nations. It may: we do not know that it ever will. This, however, we do know, that the elements that would make such an event psssible still smoulder in the world. And there are many who, though now they can ejaculate no prayer, and rehearse no creed, would exclaim in a moment, could they think such a coming possible, "Even so come, Lord Jesus."

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER XXXI.

WHAT OTHER PEOPLE THOUGHT.

THE appearance of the new Mrs. Despard in the Abbey made a very great impression. The brilliancy of her blue silk and the bushiness of her orange blossoms were calculated to strike awe into all beholders. There was scarcely a lady within the precincts who did not feel herself personally insulted by the appearance of the milliner girl flaunting in her bridal finery and taking her place by right among them. As for the wives of the chevaliers, their indignation was too great for words. Mingled curiosity and enmity had brought them out in larger numbers than usual, to see the creature, if she was so lost to every feeling of shame as to show herself; and it is scarcely necessary to say that Polly was in that particular entirely lost to every feeling of shame. She came in with her captain, clinging to his arm, and whispering to him, even in the sacred quiet of the Abbey, and as the pair were late, and almost the entire congregation assembled, nothing was wanting to the full enjoyment of her triumph. Polly felt when she raised her head, after that momentary homage to the sacred place which even in her state of excitement she felt bound to make, that one object of her life was attained, that everybody was staring at her, and that in her blue silk she was more the centre of regard than the dean himself under his canopy, or the minor canon just about to begin the service, who perceptibly paused in consequence of the little rustle and commotion which accompanied her entrance. The feelings of the ladies among whom this intruder pushed her way may be imagined. It was all that Mrs. O'Shaughnessy could do, she said afterwards, to refrain from throwing her hymn-book at the head of the jaunty captain, as he handed his bride into her place, before taking his own among his brother chevaliers. The ladies in the Abbey were divided from their partners, being placed in a lower row, and to see the captain pass on to his stall with a swing of elation in his step after handing his bride to her seat, was enough to make any veteran blaspheme. Why should a man be so proud of himself because he has got a new wife? The imbecile glow of vanity and self-congratulation which in such circumstances comes over the countenance, nay, the entire person, even of the wisest, conveys exasperation to every looker-on. The sentiment of indignation, however, against Captain Despard was mingled with pity; but scarcely even contempt sufficed to soften the feeling with which Polly in her blue silk was universally regarded. Polly was an intruder, an aggressor. The very way in which she tossed her head upwards with its bristling crown of artificial flowers was an offence. The women might have their little differences now and then, and it was an undoubted fact that Mrs. Dalrymple, for instance, who was very well connected, had never been able to endure Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, who had no connections at all; but now they all clung together as with one impulse. They crowded upon each other in the seat, so as to leave a clear space between them and Polly, who, unabashed, took full advantage of it, and spread out her flounces, her blue silken skirts around her, with a rustle of defiance. Mrs. Temple was the one who was left next to Mrs. Despard. This lady, who took no notice at first, soon roused up, and putting on her spectacles, looked very seriously at the intruder. Polly faced round upon her, with dauntless readiness, but Mrs. Temple looked so seriously at her, that even Polly felt somewhat discomfited. She saw this new observer's eyes upon her all the time. "Who was that old woman who stared at me so?" she asked, scarcely taking the trouble to whisper, as her husband led her round the nave while the voluntary was being played. "That! that's the wife of an old idiot who gives himself no end of airs," said the captain. "I thought as much," said Polly, tossing her head, "but she'll find I can stare just as well as she can. Two can play at that game." She spoke so loudly that some of the people near said "Hush-sh!" The signor was just then playing a very delicate cadenza in the minor key.

Mrs. Temple took her old husband's arm without a word, and went straight home. He had not himself been at the service, but met her at the door; where he too saw the bride in her blue silk. The old captain did nothing but shake his head. He could not trust himself to speak. "What are things coming to?" he said at last, as they got within their own door. "When that young fellow was made a chevalier, I said nothing could come of it but mischief to the community." Captain Despard, being only fifty, was a young fellow to this veteran. "Never mind the community," said Mrs. Temple, which was a bold thing to say. It was getting late in the October afternoon, and within the little sitting-rooms of the lodges it seemed dark, coming in even from the grey afternoon skies outside. Mrs. Temple rang for the lamp before she went up-stairs to take off her bonnet. She was very full of thought, and sighed as she went. Her own girl, for whom she would so gladly have died, was gone, though she had both father and mother to care for her — and here was another poor girl who lived but had no one to care for her. Strange are the decrees of Providence. Mrs. Temple sighed as she came down-stairs again to where her old captain sat gazing at the lamp with a sorrowful face. "Yes, my dear," he said as she came in, "you were right to say never mind the community. After all, I suppose there is no community in the world that has not its black sheep. Nobody will be so foolish as to confound us with such a fellow; but when I think of that poor girl ——"

"That is what I have been thinking of," said Mrs. Temple, "but perhaps," she added, still unwilling to betray her interest in Lottie, that interest which was half opposition, "perhaps she may not feel it so much as we suppose."

"Feel it! I have not liked to say very much about her, my dear. She reminds me so of our own — and I know you could not bear to talk of that," said the good captain, innocent of the fact that he had talked of little else for months past. "But if you only knew her better! There is something in the walk — in the turn of her head — that so reminds me. But I never liked to say much about it. You must not think she does not feel it. I met her and was talking with her just before I came for you. But for leaving you alone I should have taken her for a walk; it would have done her good. I believe she rushed off to the slopes after all."

"I do not think she would get much good on the slopes," said Mrs. Temple, thinking of the little wind of gossip about Mr. Rollo Ridsdale which had begun to breathe about the lodges.

"She would get fresh air — and quiet. She likes that; she is a very thoughtful girl, my dear — very serious, just like our own poor —— You must forgive me if I am always seeing resemblances. Lottie is very fond of the twilight. I have gone with her so often I know her tastes. Many a time I have done the same with —— When I feel her little arm in mine, I could almost think sometimes that other days had come back."

The shadow of Mrs. Temple's cap quivered on the wall. The thought of the little arm in his, the other days, which this simple touch brought back, was not sweet but terrible to her. A film floated before her eyes, and something choking and intolerable rose in her throat. "I do not suppose," she said hastily, "that a girl brought up like that can mind as one thinks."

The captain shook his head. "I wish you knew her better," he said, with that soft answer which quenches animadversions. The servant maid came in with the tray at this moment, and Mrs. Temple began to pour out the tea. She was a little tired, having had many things to do that day, and it occurred to her suddenly that to lean back in her easy-chair as the captain was doing, and to have her cup of tea brought to her, would be sweet. To have some one to wait upon her tenderly and read her wishes in her eyes, and divine her thoughts before they came to her lips, that would be sweet. But could any one do that except a child, could anything but love do it, and that sacred influence which is in the blood, the same blood running in the different veins of parent and child? These thoughts went through her mind without anybody being the wiser. She gave her husband his tea, and sat down in her turn to rest a little. There was nothing said in the still little room. The two together, did not they know all each other's thoughts and wishes and recollections? They were old, and what could happen to them except the going out to the Abbey, the coming in to tea? But if there had been three instead of two, and one young, with all a dawning world before her feet, everything would have borne a very different aspect. Ah! Mrs. Temple moved quickly, as she had the habit of doing when that recollection, always present to her mind, struck suddenly like a new blow. And here was a creature, helpless, forlorn, without a mother to fly to. The mother who had no child stood doubtful between earth and heaven, asking, speechless, what she was to do. Pass by on the other side as if there was no mother in her, or pardon God for taking her child, and hold out her hand to his? She did not know what to do. Things were not easy for her as for her husband. It was cruel of this girl even to live, to pass by a poor woman's windows who had lost her child. Yet what was the woman to do when this creature who was living, who was an offence to her, was in trouble? Let her sink and never hold out a hand? But what then would the other girl in heaven think of her mother? Mrs. Temple was torn by this conflict of which she gave no sign, while perhaps the old captain in his kind and tender heart, yearning over the young creature who was so helpless and desolate, was unjust to his wife and thought her less than kind.

And it was not only in Captain Temple's house that Polly's appearance was the cause of excitement. The signor put his hand upon the arm of his young assistant as they went out together by the north door. "Did you see them?" he said, with meaning. Young Purcell was pale with excitement. He had done nothing but watch Polly promenading through the nave on her husband's arm, and the very fact of Lottie's superiority to himself made him feel with more horror the impossibility of any harmony between her and Polly, whom he considered so much inferior to himself. He had watched her from the organ-loft, while the signor played the voluntary, with feelings indescribable, and so did his mother who was also in the Abbey, and who gaped at the fine young woman with a mixture of consternation and admiration, by no means sure of her inferiority, yet feeling that a crisis had arrived, and that whatever Miss Despard might have said before, she could not but be glad now of any offer of an 'ome. Mrs. Purcell did not stay for the voluntary, but went home quickly to see after "her dinner," very full of thoughts, and tremulous with expectation. The young lady was proud, she would not have anything to say to John before — but now, no doubt she would send for him and all would be settled. The housekeeper knew that a young stepmother was a strong argument against the peace of a girl who had been used to have everything her own way, and she felt with a tremor of her heart, half pride, half pain, that now at last she would have to resign her boy, and see him pass from beyond her ken into those regions of gentility with which the signor's housekeeper had nothing to do. Very likely John, or John's wife who was "such a lady," would want her to leave her comfortable situation. Mrs. Purcell did not like the idea of it, but still, if it would help to make her boy happy — perhaps even it would remove a stumbling block out of John's way if she were to take it into her own hands, and give up her situation. The thought made her heart heavy, for she liked her place, and the signor, and her comfortable room, and the power of laying by a little money. But John was the person to be considered. What could a young lady object to in his position? he was all that a gentleman could wish to be; but a mother who was in service might no doubt be an objection. Mrs. Purcell made up her mind hurriedly, that if it proved needful she would not wait to be asked, but would herself take the initiative and make the sacrifice; but she did so with a heavy heart. To give up not only her boy, who when he was married would not, she knew, be much more to his mother, but her occupation likewise, and her chief comforts, and her master who was, in a way, like another son to her, a foster son, much greater and richer than she, but still dependent on her for his comfort — it was hard, but still she could do it for her John's sake. Meanwhile her John, feeling the signor's hand heavy with meaning on his arm, answered with tremulous excitement, "Yes — I saw it. It is terrible, terrible! a desecration. To think she should have to put up with that even for a day."

"I wonder what will be the issue," said the signor meditatively. "Her heart is not in her work now. If she becomes an artist it will be against her will — art is not what she is thinking of. I wonder what will come of it. Will she feel the hollowness of this world and throw herself into her profession, or will she ——"

"Master," said the young musician fervently, "sooner or later she will turn to me. It is not possible that a man could love a young lady as I do, and have an 'ome to offer her, as I have ——"

Purcell was educated — he did not forget his h's in general; but how many people are there who, beguiled by that familiar phrase, forget all precautions and plunge recklessly into the pitfall of an 'ome!

"You think so?" said the signor. He did not himself put any confidence in this result, and was even surprised, after his recent experiences, that the young man should be sanguine; but still, after all, who ought to have such true intuitions as the hero himself? and there is no telling what perseverance mingled with enthusiasm may do. The signor was not satisfied with his pupil. She would not devote herself to her work as he wished. She had no abstract devotion to art, as art. The Signor felt, musing over it, that it was possible she might take to it more warmly if by any chance she became Purcell's wife. John was a very good fellow, and when he was disappointed the signor was very angry with Lottie; but still he thought it probable that Lottie, if she married him, would not find much to satisfy her in Purcell, and therefore would be driven to art. And of all results that could be attained, was not this the best? In the mean time however he was very doubtful whether by this means it ever would be attained.

"Yes, master," said the young man; "how can I help thinking so? I can give her, if not very much, at least independence and the comforts of an 'ome. She would not be dragged down by any thing about me. My mother's position may be doubtful," he said, with passing embarrassment; "but you have been so good, you have never made her like a common servant; and at Sturminster nobody need ever know."

"Your mother has been very good and done a great deal for you; you must never let any one ignore your mother."

"Certainly not," said the young man. "She is my mother; that ought to be enough for anybody. And I shall have her come to see me the same as if she were a duchess; but still there is no need of publishing to everybody where she is when she is at home."

"That is true, that is true," said the signor; "then you really think there is a chance that this is how it will end?"

"Master," said Purcell, pausing at the door before they entered. It was one of the Italian traditions which had lingered in the signor's habitual bearing, to stand still now and then as he was walking, by way of giving emphasis to a sentence. They paused now, looking at each other before they went in, and the color came to the young fellow's face. "Master," he said, "it may look self-sufficient, but how can it end otherwise? There is no one else who will offer her what I can offer her; and it would be supposing she had no sense, which is very far from the case, to think she would stand out forever. She is a lady, she is above me in birth; but, thanks to you, I know how to behave like a gentleman, and surely sooner or later this is how it must end."

"Amen, with all my heart," said the signor, turning in at the door which old Pick held open behind, waiting, as one who knew his master's way.

It was Mr. Ashford who had intoned the service that afternoon, and his attention had been so caught by Polly's entrance, that he made a kind of stumble in the beginning — a pause which was perceptible. After that, during the singing of the anthem and at other moments when his attention was free, he had looked down upon that gorgeous apparition from his high desk with a look of compassion on his face. The compassion, it is needless to say, was not for Polly, who wanted none of it. He watched her behind his book, or behind the hand which supported his book, with the most curious alarmed attention. And when he passed her with her husband going out, Mr. Ashford looked at her in a way which Polly thought to be flattering. "That's one as takes an interest in us," she said. "It's Ashford, the minor canon. It must be you he takes an interest in," whispered the captain, and Polly laughed and tossed her head. He went home with the same strange look on his face. It was softened and touched and pitiful. "Poor thing," he said to himself, "poor girl!" and when he got in he sat for a long time in the centre window in the dark, looking out, and trying to think out some way of help. What could he do for her? Poor thing, with all her better instincts and higher feelings, with her impulse of taking care of everybody and keeping her father and brother right, what would become of her now? Mr. Ashford asked himself with many an anxious thought what could be done? A man could do nothing — where it was a girl that was in the case, a man was more helpless than a baby. He could do nothing to help her; he could not even show his sympathy, without probably doing more harm than good to the sufferer. He sat in the window-seat, gazing out on the dusk and the dim horizon as if that could help him in his musings. If he had only had a mother or sister — any woman to whom he could have appealed, he thought he must have done so on behalf of this girl. But he had neither sister nor mother. He was a man very much alone in the world. He had a brother, a poor clergyman with a large family and a wife, who would not understand in the least why Ernest should interest himself in a stranger — a girl. If he wanted some one to spend his money upon, why not take one of the children, he thought he heard her say; and certainly she would not understand, much less respond to any appeal he would make to her. What could he do? If any other suggestion swept across Mr. Ashford's face in the dark or through his heart, nobody was there to see or divine it. He sat there without ringing for his lamp till it was quite late, and was much discomposed to be found sitting in the dark when a messenger arrived with a note from the Deanery about the extra service for the next saint's day. He was annoyed to be found so, being conscious perhaps of reasons for the vigil which he would not have cared to enter upon, for he was shy and sensitive, and it had often happened to him to be laughed at, because of his undue anxiety about others. What is it to you? had been often said to him, and never with more occasion than now. For, after all, what did it matter to the minor canon, what became of Lottie Despard? Whether she and her stepmother should "get on" together; or if they should never "get on," but yet might manage to live under the same roof, a cat and doggish life, what was it to him? One way or other it would not take sixpence out of his pocket, or affect his comfort in any way. But yet he could not get it out of his head. No one in the house had thought of coming to his room to light his lamp, to see that all was in order for him. He was not served with precision as was the signor, for he was fond of saving his servants trouble, and making excuses for them. And when the man came from the Deanery and followed the maid into the study, where she went groping, declaring that her master was not at home, the minor canon was uncomfortable, finding himself thus taken by surprise. "You need not wait for an answer. I will send one in the morning," he said, when the candles on the writing-table had been lit with a match, and he had read the note. He felt that his confused and troubled thoughts might be read in his eyes. But nobody had any clue to the subject of these thinkings; and how could any one suspect that it was a matter of such absolute indifference to himself that was occupying his thoughts — a thing with which he had nothing in the world to do?

CHAPTER XXXII.

WHAT ROLLO HAD TO MARRY ON.

THE moment after a man has made a proposal of marriage, and has been accepted, is not always a moment of unmitigated blessedness. There are ups and downs in the whole business from beginning to end. Sometimes the man has the best of it, and sometimes the woman. When either side has betrayed itself without a response on the other, when the man seems to waver in his privilege of choice, when the woman hesitates in her crowning prerogative of acceptance or rejection, then there are intervals on either side which are not enviable; but when all these preliminaries are over, and the explanation has been made, and the two understand each other — then the lady's position is, for the first few days at least, the most agreeable. She has no parents to interview, no pecuniary investigations to submit to, nor has she to enter upon the question of ways and means, settlements and income for the future. But when a man who knows he has nothing to marry upon is beguiled by circumstances, by a sudden emergency, or by strain of feeling, into the momentous offer, and after the first enthusiasm of acceptance looks himself in the face as it were, and asks himself how it is to be done, there is something terrible in the hours that follow. How was it to be done? Rollo Ridsdale left Lottie at her door, and went across the road towards the Deanery in a state of mind which was indescribable. He was not an immaculate man, nor had he now spoken of love for the first time; but yet he was real in his love, and the response had been sweet to him, sweet and terrible, as conveying every risk and danger that life could bring, as well as every delight. He had lingered with his love until the last available moment, and yet it was a relief to turn his back upon her, to go away into the chaos of his own life and try to find a way out of this maze in which he had involved himself. How was he to marry? what was he to do? He felt giddy as he walked along, steadily enough to outward seeming, but in his soul groping like a blind man. He had asked Lottie Despard to marry him, and she had consented. He wanted nothing better than her companionship, her love, the delight and comfort of her to be his own; but, good heavens! — but, by Jove! — but, in the name of every thing worth swearing by — how was it to be done? — how was he to marry? what was he to do? The happiness was delicious — it was a taste of Paradise, a whiff of Elysium — but —— Rollo did not know where he was going as he crossed the Dean's Walk. He went — steadily enough, his legs carrying him, his knowledge of the place guiding him mechanically, but his whole soul in a maze of thought. How was he to do it? How could he, a man with nothing, not much better than an adventurer, living upon chances and windfalls — how could he weight himself with the support of another — marry a wife? It was preposterous, it was terrible — yet it was sweet. Poor child, she was in want of his arm to shelter her, in want of some one to take care of her; and he could not tolerate the idea that any one but himself should give her the succor she needed; but how was he to do it? The question seemed to get into the air, and echo round him — how was he to do it? He had nothing, or what to such a man was nothing, and worse than nothing. He managed to live no one could tell how. True, in living he did not know how, Rollo managed to spend a good deal of money — more than many a family is reared upon; but there is proportion in everything, and he never could tell, from one year's end to another, how he had got through. And he had asked a girl to marry him! He groaned within himself when he came back to this centre thought, this pivot of all his reflections, though it was sweet. He had asked her to marry him; he had pledged himself to take her away out of her troubles, to open a refuge to her, to make her escape practicable: speedily, certainly, easily so far as she knew — and how was he to do it? If the question went through his mind once, it flew and circled in wavering rounds about him, like a moth or a bat in summer, a hundred times at least as he went from the chevaliers' lodge to the Deanery door. He had no time for thinking, since the hour of dinner approached, and the dean waited for no one; but he thought and thought all the same. What was he to do? He, marry? how was he to do it? Yet it must be done. He did nothing but ask himself this while he brushed his hair and tied his evening tie. He had nothing, not a penny — he had a valet and a dressing-case with gold tops on all the bottles, and the most expensive clothes from the dearest tailor — but he had nothing, and everybody knew that he had nothing. The situation was appalling. A cold dew came out on his forehead; he to do such a thing! but yet he had done it — he had committed himself, and now the question that remained was — not how to get out of it, which under any other circumstances would have been his clear duty, but how to do it? This was the problem he tried to solve while he was dressing, which flitted about his head while he sat at dinner, between every mouthful of his soup, and fluttered all through the dessert. How was he to do it? And when the evening was over — when Lady Caroline had gone to bed, and the dean to his study, Rollo at length ventured out into the Deanery garden with his cigar, in spite of the black looks of Mr. Jeremie, who wanted to shut up the house and get to bed himself at a reasonable hour, as a dean's butler has a right to do.

It was cold — but he did not feel the cold — and the wind was still strong, blowing the black branches wildly about the leaden sky. The dean's garden was bounded by the slopes, only a low and massive grey wall, as old as the buttresses amid which the lawn was set, separating it from the larger grounds, which were open to the community — and Rollo leaning on that wall could almost see the spot where he had sat with Lottie, when she had clasped her hands on his arm, leaning upon him with delicious trust, and giving up all her future into his hands. Even then what a difference there had been between them — she throwing herself upon him in utter faith and confidence, feeling herself delivered completely and at once from all the troubles that overwhelmed her; while he, even in the thrill of pleasure which that soft weight and pressure gave him, felt his heart jump with such sudden alarm as words could not describe. Now when he thought it over, the alarm was more than the pleasure. Lottie, retired into her little chamber, was at that hour going over the whole scene with the tenderest happiness and reliance — feeling safe with him, feeling free of all responsibility, not even forecasting the future, safe and relieved from all the anxieties of the past, caring for nothing but this moment, this exquisite climax of life, this perfect union that had begun and was never to end. Very, very different were Rollo's thoughts. How was he to do it? Marry! the very idea seemed impossible. It involved disclosure, and disclosure would be madness. What would his relations say to him? — what would his friends say to him? His tradesmen would send in their bills, his associates would contemplate him with the very horror of astonishment. Ridsdale married! as well cut his throat at once. Had he ever thought of the little ménage on which Lottie's thoughts (had they been free to plan any thing) would have dwelt with simple pride and happiness, he would have been disposed really to cut his throat. In such a case Lottie would have been sure of her own powers — sure that if they were poor she could make their money go twice as far as Rollo by himself could make it go — and make up for much more than her share of the expenses by the housewifely powers which would have been her delight and her ambition. But to Rollo love in a cottage was a simple folly, meaning nothing. The very idea was so foreign to him that it never entered into his mind at all. What did enter into his mind as the only hope in the blank of the future, was of a very different description. It was the original idea which had first of all moved him towards this girl, who gradually had awakened within him so many other sentiments: her voice. Should he be able to produce this as he hoped, then there would be a way of escape from the difficulty. The manager had behaved like a fool, but Rollo had not changed his opinion. Though he had fallen in love with the singer, and his sentiments in regard to her had thus been modified, he had never changed his opinion. It was a magnificent organ which she possessed and though (which seemed to him very strange) Handel at present was her only inspiration, yet he felt that with proper care that voice could do anything, and that in it might yet lie all the elements of fortune. Casting about around all his horizon, for something like salvation, this was the only light that Rollo perceived. It, perhaps, was not the most desirable of lights. To marry a singer in full heyday of her powers, admired by all the world, and making a great deal of money, was not a thing that any younger son would hesitate to do; but an unknown singer with all her way to make, and her very education still so imperfect, that was a very different matter; but still it was the only chance. In former times, perhaps a man would have thought it necessary to pretend at least a desire to snatch his bride from the exposure of publicity, from the stage or even from the concert-room — a determination to work for her rather than to let her work for him; but along with circumstances sentiments change, and the desire of women for work is apt to be supported from an undesirable side by those who once would have thought their honor concerned in making women's work unnecessary. In civilization there can be no advance without its attendant drawback. Mr. Ridsdale had fallen in love, a thing no young man can entirely guard against, and he had engaged to marry Lottie Despard, partly because he was in love with her, partly because she was in want of protection and succor. But he did not know in what way he could keep a wife — and short of breaking his word and abandoning her altogether (things which at this moment it seemed utterly impossible to do), what other way was open to him than to consider how his wife could keep him? This was a great deal more easy. He had nothing — no money, no profession — but she had a profession, a something which was worth a great deal of money, which only required cultivation to be as good as a fortune. Rollo's heart perceptibly lightened as he thought of this. It did not make the social difficulties much easier, or soften the troubles which he must inevitably have with his family; but still, whereas the other matter had been impossible, this brought it within the range of things that could be contemplated. He could not refrain from one sigh (in the undercurrent of his mind, not dwelt upon or even acknowledged, a thing which he would have been ashamed of had he admitted it to himself), one sigh that the idea of marriage had come in at all. She might have found in him all the succor, all the companionship, all the support she wanted without that, and it would have done her no harm in her after career. But that was a secret thought — an inadvertence, a thing which he dared not permit himself to think, as it were, in the daylight, in his own full knowledge. He knew very well still what a fool he would appear to everybody — how the idea that he, Rollo, with all his experience, should be thus taken in at last, would cause infinite surprise and laughter among his friends — but still there came a gleam of possibility into the matter when he thought of Lottie's gift. By that means they might do it. It was not quite out of the question, quite impossible. Rollo had been so lost in thought that he had not seen Mr. Jeremie looking out from the window through which he had gone into the garden; but as he arrived at this, which was a kind of conclusion, if not a very satisfactory one, he became at last aware of the respectable butler's anxiety.

"Her ladyship, sir, don't hold with leaving the windows open," said Mr. Jeremie, who did not hold with staying out of bed to attend upon a young man's vagaries. There had been nothing of this kind in Miss Augusta's time — not even when Mr. Daventry came courting. Rollo tossed the end of his cigar over the wall and came in, somewhat relieved in his mind, though the relief was not very great. It left all the immediate question unsolved, what his family would say, and what was to be done in the mean time — but it gave a feeble light of possibility in the future. He had calculated on Lottie's voice to make his fortune when he thought of it only as a speculator. He had much more right to look upon her as likely to make his fortune now.

In the morning the same thought was the first in Rollo's mind; but the faint light of hope it gave was surrounded by clouds that were full of trouble. Supposing that in the course of time, when she was thoroughly established in her profession, trained and started, she could mange to attain that most necessary thing called an income, with which to meet the world — this was a contingency which still lay in the future; whereas it might be necessary to act at once. The very urgency and anxiety of Rollo's thoughts will show that he neither wanted to abandon Lottie, nor to allow her to guess that he was alarmed by his engagement to her. The whole scope and object of his deliberations was to make the thing possible. But for this why should he have troubled himself about it at all? He might have "let things take their course" — he might have gone on enjoying the delights of love-making, and all a lover's privileges, without going any further. Lottie was not the kind of girl who ever would have hurried matters, or insisted upon the engagement being kept. He knew well enough that she would never "pull him up." But he was in love with Lottie — he wanted to deliver her from her troubles — he wanted to have her for his own — if he could only see how it was to be done. Evidently there were various conditions which must be insisted on — which Lottie must yield to. Public notice must not be called to the tie between them more than was absolutely necessary. Everything must be conducted carefully and privately — not to make any scandal — and not to compel the attention of his noble family. Rollo did not want to be sent for by his father, to be remonstrated with by his elder brother, to have all his relatives preaching sermons to him. Even his aunt Caroline, passive, easy-going soul, even she would be roused, he felt, to violence, could she divine what was in the air. Marry Miss Despard! the idea would drive her out of all the senses she possessed. Kind as she was, and calm as she was, Rollo felt that in such circumstances she would no longer be either kind or calm — and if even Lady Caroline were driven to bay, what would be the effect of such a step on Lord Courtland, who had no calm of nature with which to meet the revelation? Therefore his heart was heavy as he went out, as soon as the bells had ceased ringing for matins, to meet his love on the slopes. His heart was heavy, yet he was not a cool or indifferent lover. The thought of seeing her again was sweet to him; but the cares were many, and he did not know how to put into language which would not vex or hurt her, the things that must be said. He tried to wrap them up in honeyed words, but he was not very successful — and at last he decided to leave it all to providence — to take no thought for what he was to say. The words will be put into my mouth at the right time, he said to himself piously. He could not exactly forecast what shape the conversation would take, or how this special subject would be introduced. He would not settle what he had to say, but would leave it to fate.

The morning sunshine lay as usual unbroken upon the Dean's Walk. It had been feeble and fitful in the earlier morning, as sunshine has often begun to be in October, but now had warmed into riper glory. The paths on the slopes were strewed with fallen leaves, which the winds of last night had blown about in clouds. Rollo was first at the trysting place, and when he saw Lottie appear suddenly round the bole of the big elm-tree, she seemed to be walking to him, her foot all light and noiseless, upon a path of gold. Her steps seemed to have a fairy tinkle upon that yellow pavement. The movement of her figure was like music, with a flowing liquid measure in it. The little veil that dropped over her hat, the ribbons at her neck, the soft sweep of her dark merino gown, commonest yet prettiest of fabrics, all united in one soft line. There was nobody by, and it was the first heavenly morning upon which they had belonged to each other. She came to him as if out of paradise, out of heaven, all radiant with happiness and celestial trust and love. A glow of tenderness and gladness came over the young man. He forgot all about the difficulties, about money, about his family, about how they were to live and what was to be done. He went to meet her, ardent and eager, forgetting everything but herself. It was the vita nuova all over again, a new earth and new skies. It seemed to both of them that they had never lived before, that this was the birthday of a glorified existence. Even last night, in the agitation of their happiness, had not been like this first new day. When they stepped into each other's sight, realizing the mutual property, the mutual right, the incomprehensible sweetness of belonging to each other, everything else seemed to be swept out of the world. There was nothing visible but themselves, the sweet sky, and genial air; the leaves dropping softly, all crimson and golden, the sun shining on them with a sympathetic surprise of pleasure. For the moment, even to the young man of the world, everything was simple, primitive, and true, all complications and conventionalities swept away; and if so to Rollo, how much more to Lottie, thus advancing sweetly, with a soft measure in her step, not hurried or eager, but in modest faith and innocence, into her lover's arms.

tions proved needless. It was the worse for both, perhaps, that it should be so — but that which is fittest and sweetest is not always that which is most practically good. Instead of talking seriously to each other, making their mutual arrangements, deciding what was to be done, as would have been far the wisest way of employing the solitude of this sweet morning, which seemed to brighten expressly for them, what did the two do, but fall into an aimless delicious whispering about their two happy selves, and nothing more! They had things to say to each other which came by stress of nature, and had to be said, yet were nothing, while the things of real importance were thrust aside. They fell a-gossiping about themselves, about each other, going over all the old ground, repeating last evening's tender follies, about — when you first began to think — and when I first knew — and what has been in the one heart and in the other, when both had to talk of other things, and make no sign. What need to follow all the course of that foolishness? There was nothing in earth or heaven so deeply interesting to Lottie as to hear how Rollo was thinking of her while he stood and talked to somebody else, watching her from far; and how his heart would beat when he saw her coming, and how he blasphemed old Captain Temple, yet blessed him next moment for bringing her here; and what he had really meant when he said this and that, which had perplexed her at the time; nor to Rollo than to know how she had watched for him, and looked for his sympathy, and felt herself backed up and supported the moment he appeared. There was not a day of the past month but had its secret history, which each longed to disclose to the other, and scarcely an hour, scarcely a scrap of conversation which did not contain a world of unrevealed meaning to be unfolded and interpreted. Talk of an hour! they had ample enough material for a century without being exhausted; and as for arrangements, as for the (so to speak) business of the matter, who thought of it? For Lottie was not an intelligent young woman, intending to be married, but a happy girl in love; and Rollo, though he knew better, was in love too, and wished for nothing better than these delightful confidences. The hours went by like a moment. They had already been aroused two or three times by the roll of baby carriages propelled by nursemaids before the greater volume of music from the Abbey proclaimed that service was over. "Already!" they both cried, with wonder and dismay; and then, for the first time, there was a pause.

"I had so much to talk to you about," he said, "and we have not had time to say a word, have we? Ah! when can we have a good long time to ourselves? Can you escape your captain to-night, my darling? I should like to shake him by the hand, to thank him for taking care of you; but couldn't you escape from him, my Lottie, to-night?"

Lottie grew a little pale; her heart sank, not with distrust, but with perhaps a little, a very little disappointment. Was this still how it was to be? Just the same anxious diplomacies to secure a meeting, the same risk and chances? This gave her a momentary chill. "It is very difficult," she said. "He is the only one I have to take care of me. He would think it unkind."

"You must not say now the only one, my Lottie — not the only one — my substitute for a little while, who will soon have to give me up his place."

"But he will not like to give it up now; not till he knows; perhaps not even then — for his daughter, you know ——"

"Ah! it was she who married Dropmore. Lottie, my love, my darling, I cannot live through the evening without you. Could you not come again, at the same time as last night? It is early dark, heaven be praised. Take your walk with him, and then give him the slip, and come here, sweet, there to me. I shall be watching, counting the moments. It is bad enough to be obliged to get through the day without you. Ah! it is the signor's day. The signor is all wrapped up in his music. He will never suspect anything. I will be able to see you at least, to hear you, to look at you, my lovely darling ——"

After a moment said Lottie, "That was one thing I wanted to ask you about. You know why the signor gives me lessons. Will it be right now to go on with him? now that everything is changed? Should not I give them up?"

"Give them up!" cried Rollo, with a look of dismay. "My darling, what are you thinking of? They are more necessary, more important than ever. Of course, we will pay for them after. Oh, no fear but he will be repaid; but no, no, my love, my sweet, you must not give them up!"

She looked at him with something like anxiety in her eyes, not knowing what he could mean. What was it? Lottie could not but feel a little disappointed. It seemed that everything was to go on just the same.

"I shall see you there," he said; "so long as we are in the same place everything is sweet; and I have always taken so much interest in your dear voice that no one can suspect. And to-night you will come — promise me, my darling — just after the service, when it is getting dark?"

"Yes," she whispered, with a sigh — then started from his side. "I saw some one among the trees. The old chevaliers are coming up for their morning walk. Let me go now — you must let me go — Mr. Ridsdale ——"

"Mr. Ridsdale! How can I let my Lottie go before she has called me by my right name?"

"Oh, I must not stay. I see people coming," said Lottie, disappointed, troubled, afraid of being seen, yet angry with herself for being afraid. "Mr. Ridsdale — Rollo, dear Rollo — let me go now ——"

"Till it is time for the signor ——" And he did let her go, with a hasty withdrawal on his part, for unmistakably there were people to be seen moving about among the trees, not indeed coming near their corner, yet within sight of them. Lottie left him hurriedly, not looking back. She was ashamed, though she had no cause for shame. She ran down the bank to the little path which led to the foot of the hill, and to the town. She could not go up and run the risk of being seen going home by the Dean's Walk. She drew her veil over her face, and her cheeks burned with blushes. She was ashamed, though she had done no wrong. And Rollo stood looking down after her, watching her with a still more acute pang. There were things which were very painful to him, which did not affect her. That a girl like Lottie should go away alone, unattended, and walk through the street, with no one with her, a long round, annoyed him beyond measure. He ought to have gone with her, or some one ought to be with her. But then what could he do? He might as well give up the whole matter at once as betray all he was meditating to his people in this way. But he watched her, leaning over the low parapet, with trouble and shame. The girl whom he loved ought not to go about unattended, and this relic of chivalry, fallen into conventionality, moved him more than greater things. He did not object, like Ferdinand, to let his Miranda carry his load for him; but it did trouble him that she should walk through St. Michael's by herself, though in the sweet security of the honest morning. Thus minds differ all over the world.

From The Saturday Review.

THE THINGS WE HAVE NOT.

AMONG all the various kinds of charm, whether inherent in the objects of our desires or woven round them by fine threads of association and circumstance, is there one more subtly enthralling than that which belongs to the things we do not possess? We can scarcely tell how much of the ethereal beauty of youthful dreams depends upon their inaccessible distance, for many other things conspire to steep them in a magical atmosphere. But when we have long ago emerged from that enchanted ground, and have reached the level table-land of middle life, there still are visions haunting us, some more, some less, but not wholly absent from the busiest and the sternest lives; there is still a halo surrounding some objects, which we could not, even if we would, entirely dispel. And of all the favorite spots about which this glamor hovers, there is none to which it clings so persistently as to the things we have not. In a sense this is true, of course, of what we have had and have lost. But that is a comparatively intelligible feeling, made up largely of regret, mixed with love and self-reproach, and bound up with many personal and perhaps even arbitrary associations. It is not the same as the strange bloom of ideal beauty which belongs for us to the things in which we have not, and never had, nor can hope to have, a share. Such things wear a kind of remote impersonal grace, which can be scattered by no rude touch of change or chance, and withered by no closeness of grasp. Our thoughts of them are culled from all the most perfect instances, and combined into a type which perhaps transcends experience. There is an incident in "Transformation" which shows how fully alive Hawthorne was to this idealizing faculty as exercised especially by those not in possession. In looking over Hilda's pictures some of her friends pause at one of a child's shoe, painted, as the author tells us, with a care and tenderness of which none but a woman who deeply loved children would have been capable, and which no actual mother would have been likely to bestow upon such a subject. Actual mothers no doubt have enough to do with their children's shoes without painting them. Possession brings an object into many disenchanting relations. Children themselves, however idolized by their mothers, can scarcely have for them that abstract visionary charm which they possess for the childless. No doubt the joys of possession are far more intense and more richly colored than those of contemplation; but they have not the same half sacred remoteness, the same unchanging lustre. They are purchased by so many cares, often by so much toil, and exposed to so many risks, that enjoyment is often obscured by fatigue and anxiety. However, we need not disparage the delights of possession in order to enhance those of mere contemplation. These are pure enough and keen enough to need no adventitious aids. But their comparative excellence can scarcely be appreciated until after a certain rather severe discipline.

Perhaps no satisfying enjoyment gives so keen and sharply defined an impression of certain forms of happiness as does the eagerness of expectation, or the yearning gaze of privation and disappointment. Does any millionaire realize what money can buy so vividly as the struggling poor man does? He no doubt knows more about it; he finds out a thousand unexpected results in convenience and pleasure, and by practice becomes expert in devising gratifications the very possibility of which would not occur to the poor; but all these details necessarily distract his attention from the one radical and inestimable privilege of being once for all utterly beyond the reach of debt, difficulty, or anxiety in money matters, with its accompanying expansion in all the thousand directions in which our activity is limited by money. The fact of this freedom and all its details become familiar to him, but the keenest sense of its value belongs to those who are, or have very recently been, cramped by poverty. The gift of silence has a wonderful charm for great talkers; and we can hardly suppose that to any very beautiful woman outward symmetry means as much as it does to those who suffer for want of it.

Even in respect of opportunities of acquiring knowledge, the empty-handed have some advantages. Actual experience no doubt teaches more forcibly than any thing else. But it is necessarily absorbing and narrow. It does not leave room for the extensive observation of life which is possible to those whose personal share in it is least. A Roman Catholic priest probably knows more about family relations than any father of a family, though his wider knowledge is of course lacking in a certain fertilizing and corrective element, which is perhaps rather moral than intellectual. It would, however, be idle to deny the importance of a certain personal isolation in throwing open wide fields of observation, which, through sympathy, may become almost as fruitful as the narrower province of personal experience. And sympathy is the form into which unsatisfied feeling is most easily transmuted. By its operation the possessions which for others are limited and accidental and transitory become for a few unchanging and all-pervading. Human nature and its circumstances are everywhere so much alike that those in whom a possession, lost or withheld, has called forth the faculties and feelings appropriate to it will never lack objects for their exercise. If to enter largely into the lives of others lays one open to many griefs, it also brings many joys; and neither can be so absorbing as if they were our own. To live in the experience of others means, at its best, to have a far wider range, and therefore sooner to attain to the calmness of maturity, than is possible to those whose experience is chiefly personal. We mean not the calmness of indifference, but the calmness of an habitual balance of feeling. For those who share in many lives there can scarcely ever be a period of unrelieved gloom, or of untempered brightness. A certain quiet serenity is the peculiar portion of those who are willing to pass through life empty-handed.

But, as we have said, this habitual acceptance of the universal in lieu of the personal can by most people be attained only as the result of keenly felt privation. Till we have at least hungered after some good thing for ourselves, we can scarcely recognize its full value for others. But if the chief end of life be, as may be plausibly maintained, to impress certain ideas upon the mind, it may be a question whether this end will be most effectually attained by actual experience or by privation; in other words, by positive or negative experience. There is a keenness and a persistency about our appreciation of the things which do not fall to our lot which is rarely found in regard of those we have. We may call the topmost grapes sour, but we gaze at them with an earnestness which we should hardly pause to bestow upon those within our reach; and it is odd if the flavor of those undevoured clusters does not haunt our imagination long after the sweetness of their swallowed brethren has been forgotten. Weak human nature would no doubt in general rather eat grapes than receive ever so perfect a mental impression of them; but as we rarely have our choice between these rival processes of experience, it is worth while to open our eyes to the merits of both. Birds in the bush look better and sing more freely than they will ever do in the hand, and when we cannot catch them it is a pity if we cannot learn to sit down quietly and listen to them. And the birds of loveliest plumage and most exquisite song are those which cannot be enjoyed at all except in their native haunts. A lark in a cage charms us chiefly by recalling recollections of free larks, and humming-birds, we believe, have too exquisite a sense of the fitness of things ever to live in captivity. What indeed would they be to us without their liberty to flit from flower to flower? One might as well wish to tame a butterfly.

If we could weigh in a balance the things which can and those which cannot be appropriated, we might perhaps be surprised to find how very large a part of our happiness is derived from things which we cannot lose, because we can never possess them. Possession is of course a very vague word, capable of many different applications; but almost in proportion to the possibility and completeness of individual appropriation are the precariousness of our tenure and the weight of counterbalancing burdens. Sky, sea, and moorland, mountains and stars, music and poetry, will never fail, nor do they ever cost us an anxious thought, for they can never be ours. We had almost added flowers to the list; and all this is indeed true of the "jocund companies" of daffodils, and blue firmaments of wild hyacinths, and starry glades of wind-flowers, the sheets of heather and golden furze, and all the hosts of their wild compeers, who owe nothing to human care. It is even true, in a sense, of roses and lilies, jessamine and honeysuckles. But because these last are capable of becoming cherished nurslings, we cannot say of them that they never cost us an anxious thought. Other people's roses and our neighbor's lilies may give us unmixed pleasure; a purer, though less intense kind of pleasure than that which we derive from our own carefully nurtured plants. The most refined epicureanism would perhaps lead us to cultivate, above all, a taste for the thornless roses which blossom behind no garden hedge, for the unfading lilies which never grew on lawn or bed.

It is impossible to weigh the personal against the universal, the concrete possession against the abstract idea, and say from which the greatest enjoyment is derived in the long run; but certain it is that the one tends to displace the other. The growth of interest in what is universal and abstract is rarely very rapid or very marked in lives filled to the brim with strong personal interests. What we have called negative experience is the choicest soil in which it can be made to bloom. If privations have not been endured, or have not been sharply felt, the mind is hardly ever roused to the keenest admiration of which it is capable; enjoyment ties it down, and lulls it to sleep, and limits its range. Nothing so throws open the doors of the soul and so irresistibly lures it outwards as to have gazed long and steadfastly upon some great natural source of happiness, only to learn that it is forever beyond our grasp. Minds elevated enough to take such an experience kindly are thenceforward undisputed heirs of such happiness in all its forms. They may not grasp it, and yet it can never elude their grasp. They know better than to wish it reduced to the narrow limits of their own personal belongings, for their eyes are satisfied with its perpetual presence all around them. Pleasure for them is transmuted into beauty, possession into contemplation. And contemplation is the one satisfying joy belonging to this world, for it alone has upon it a touch of eternity.

THE NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS.

ONE of the most interesting papers read in the Anthropological Section at the recent meeting of the British Association was by Professor Daniel Wilson, of Toronto, on the Canadian Indians. Professor Wilson showed that the Canadian Indians, instead of "melting away" before the civilized virtues and vices of the white man, have already been to a considerable extent absorbed, and the likelihood is that ultimately this absorption will be complete. At present, Professor Wilson maintains — and he has so mastered the subject that he has a right to speak — the blood of the so-called "red man" flows in the veins of every class of Canadian, from the highest to the lowest; and many of those who are treated by the government as "Indians" are as white as many of their "pale-faced" fellow-countrymen. This subject of the fate of the American Indian has been also engaging the attention of competent men in the United States, and the facts and statistics which have been collected appear to give the death-blow to the commonly accepted "blight" and "withering" theory.

An extremely interesting paper * on the subject, just published, by Lieutenant-Colonel Mallery, enters into the question of the former and present number of the Indians in so thorough a manner as to give confidence in the conclusions come to. Colonel Mallery, from his position on the United States Survey, has had every opportunity of acquiring a knowledge of the present condition and number of the Indians, and he has taken great pains to become acquainted with whatever records exist as to their past numbers. Colonel Mallery shows that the estimates of earlier writers are so varied as to be untrustworthy. Early travellers had no opportunity whatever of acquiring a knowledge of the Indian population of the North American continent, but naturally would exaggerate the number of those with whom they came into contact. Naturally, also, the natives from a wide district would crowd to the shores of the sea, river, or lake, which were the first visitors' only highways, and thus the latter would be led to form an exaggerated notion of the extent of the whole population. Colonel Mallery shows that before and long after the advent of the whites, the only regions where the Indians could find support were along the shores of the great rivers and lakes. If the successive waves of continental migration did originate on the Pacific coast, it is scarcely to be supposed that they crossed the arid plains only lately explored, or even the more eastern prairies, where, with all then existing facilities the support of life would have been most difficult. The savages relied at first mainly on fish, secondarily and later on the chase, and only in their last stages of development on agriculture, which, though a greater resource among some tribes than is generally understood, became so after their long-continued occupancy of regions near the Atlantic and great lakes. They could neither, before obtaining the horse, pursue to great advantage the large game of the open prairie necessary for their subsistence while passing it, nor transport stores before collected, and moved probably (as one route, others being also contended for) via the headwaters of the Mississippi and the outlet of Lake Superior, resting on long lines and with little lateral spread, near rivers, lakes, and the ocean. The greater part of the districts east of the Rocky Mountains and some to their west, where the Indians are now, or in recent years have been found, and much of which was until recently charted as the "Great American Desert," was, in fact, a solitude when America was discovered, the population being then confined to the wooded borders of the traversing streams. Colonel Mallery adduces irrefutable evidence to prove that many Indian tribes now classed as prairie Indians were, when first met with and for long after, lake and river Indians. Early voyagers on the Mississippi and Lake Michigan met Indians only after many days', and even weeks', travel. Vermont and western Massachusetts and much of New Hampshire were left unoccupied. On early maps the low country from the Mobile River to Florida was marked vacant, and the oldest reports from Georgia assert with gratulation that there were scarcely any savages within four hundred miles of Savannah. Colonel Mallery adduces many other facts which, when grouped together, show how insignificant was the territory actually occupied by the natives before the European immigrants could possibly have affected their numbers or distribution, and how silly are any estimates obviously influenced by a calculation of the product of their number on some one square mile, multiplied by the figures expressing all the square miles embraced between the Atlantic and Pacific and certain degrees of latitude. The mounds of the Mississippi Valley certainly prove that at some time it held a large population; but the origin and period, connections, and fate of these so-called "mound-builders" are still sub judice. It is, however, conceded that they were agricultural, had several arts unknown to the historic tribes, and had passed away before the latter had come within our knowledge. The ethnologists and philologists, though so widely disagreeing in other respects, both admit that the actual distribution of the natives at the time of, and shortly after, their discovery, was as represented by Colonel Mallery, and the immediate practical inquiry concerns the tribes then and still known to us, rather than ancient inhabitants, whether or not the ancestors of these tribes.

This distribution rendered misconception of their numbers by the early whites almost unavoidable. The latter, using the natural and only readily available highways of ocean and river, met the Indians precisely where they were most numerous and stationary, and could not thoroughly explore the endless tracts where they only occasionally roamed, or which they entirely avoided; while the enormous distances of separation prevented any one traveller from actually seeing, and thereby distinguishing between, but a limited number of tribes. Even if an expedition through the wilderness were risked, the very presence of the explorers from obvious motives of curiosity, barter, or defence, would, as we have said, attract all the bands over many miles. Cunning and vanity, moreover, would induce every tribe to exaggerate its own importance, which there was at first no evidence to contradict. So late as 1829 Naw-Kaw, a Winnebago chief, attending a balloon ascent in the Battery in New York, where there was an immense crowd, and being asked if he had ever seen so many people together, replied haughtily, "We have more in our smallest villages." Considering that his whole tribe only mustered then about three thousand souls, this may pass as a creditable specimen of aboriginal brag, which, if government officials had not already become familiar through systematic fraud with the actual count of the Winnebagoes, would doubtless have been adopted as a faithful comparison to influence statistics, as has actually occurred with other chiefs, who, likening their few score warriors to "the leaves of the forest," have been seriously quoted. The early travellers received such tales with alacrity to enhance their own adventures, repeating them with the fabled reproductiveness of the three black crows, even when they did not imitate Falstaff in the multiplication of his men in buckram. Another potent cause of error in the enumeration of the Indians, extending even to modern times, and from which we are scarcely yet free, necessarily arose from the utterly confused synonyms. Not only had each of the tribes a variety of names among themselves, but the various English, French, and Dutch immigrants added to these names of their own coining so that one tribe might have a dozen different names, and each name has often been mistakenly held to apply to a different tribe.

The main explanations of the lately unquestioned law dooming all the American Indians to speedy death have been in their constant wars and the strange diseases introduced. As regards the latter small-pox has been the most fatal; but Colonel Mallery shows that its ravages have been no greater among the Indians than among other races and other lands which recovered from it. Moreover, these ravages have been greatly exaggerated often, as may be seen from the report of the Canadian minister of the interior for 1876. In 1868 it was stated the Indians of Vancouver's Island had been nearly exterminated from small-pox, and that "hundreds of bodies lay unburied." After a full inquiry it was found that only eighty-eight Indians had died from the disease in the whole district throughout the entire year. The fact is that many Indians have died of small-pox, as did many Europeans before the days of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu and Dr. Jenner, and also that those who could ran away from the danger, as more enlightened people do now, with the difference that the latter are brought back by the ties of real and personal property, which, not troubling the former, they ever after avoided a locality that in their theory of disease was the scene of demoniac wrath. It may be noted that this particular disease has ceased to be a scourge to the tribes, the reports of fifty-six agents in recent years not including any fatal case.

As to the destructive element of war, that was the normal condition of the Indians before the advent of the whites, who only added to the number of the combatants. The whites did not introduce extermination and dispossession, which were systematically carried out before they came by one or two of the most powerful tribes. The whites were never more systematic or successful in subjugation by force of arms than were several of the Indian leagues, and all we know of the prevailing customs of the continent tells us that war was with its natives a necessity for the assertion of manhood, if not a religious duty. Perhaps since the power of the white race has been established with restraining effect, there have been fewer and less bloody wars than were frequent for centuries before, and certainly for years past no whole tribe, and but a minority of individuals among very few of the tribes, have been on the war path against any other in the United States. No such conversion, then, from less to greater combativeness is apparent as would account for any important change in the Indian population. If warfare has been a chief cause of their decrease, they were on the wane long prior to their discovery. Of this, however, there is no evidence. Taking the Iroquois as a representative body of Indians, Colonel Mallery shows that they now number 13,668 souls, as against 11,650, thirteen years before the Declaration of Independence, being an increase of two thousand. This is not a solitary instance; and especially among the hybrids of Canada, New York, the Indian Territory, Massachusetts, and Wisconsin, has there been a steady increase during the past thirty or forty years. Figures are given to show that the Sioux Confederacy have quadrupled in one hundred and forty years, and doubled, at least, in twenty-nine years. Remarkable increase is shown in other tribes, notwithstanding war, disease, and whisky. It is at the same time admitted that in some of the western regions, especially California, the unusual barbarity of the brutal white has told seriously on the Indian population there, though not to nearly so great an extent as vague estimates would make out.

Only within the past four years has there been any official report of the births and deaths among several tribes sufficiently general to be of value. These official returns relate to over one hundred thousand Indians, belonging to nearly one hundred tribes, and the excess of births over deaths was found to vary from six-tenths to 2·32 per cent. Again, in former times only the strongest survived, weak children not being allowed to live, and old and diseased persons being often put out of the way. Only one of twins was allowed to survive, and generally the battle of life was only to the strong. Now, since the United States government protect and subsidize the Indians the latter are acute enough to see that it is to their interest to have as many mouths to feed and bodies to clothe as possible, and act accordingly.

Colonel Mallery then, from the data which he has collected, comes to the conclusion that when Columbus discovered America there were not more than five hundred thousand Indians to the north of Mexico, and that now, in the United States and Alaska alone, excluding Canada, there are something like three hundred thousand. If the Canadian Indians and hybrids were added to this it would probably turn out that the native population had not at least decreased. At all events it seems to us that Colonel Mallery has adduced strong reasons for hesitating to accept the "blight" and "withering" theory for the American Indians at least. That it does apply to other races with which the Anglo-Saxon at least has come into contact, there is only too good reason to believe. The last of the Tasmanians has gone, the years of the Sandwich Islanders are numbered, many other Pacific islands have been almost depopulated. As to Australia, we wish some one would do for it what Colonel Mallery has done for North America. We believe the results for South America, if the native population question were carefully examined, would show that there also the decrease has been greatly exaggerated. To make a sweeping generalization as to the inevitable disappearance of white before black is absurd; what would be the use of Africa to the world if this were so? As to the future of the American Indian, both Colonel Mallery and Professor Wilson speak hopefully. The process of breaking in the savage to civilized ways of life must be slow. It cannot be done per saltum. How long did it take the European conglomeration of tribes to settle down and reach their present stage of culture? In Canada many so-called Indians are really as settled and civilized as the English peasant, perhaps, on the whole, more so; and if the Indians in the States had as fair play as their Canadian brethren, the process would be much more rapid than it is. At all events, the theory of disappearance by extinction seems now a most improbable one, and that by absorption is proved to be actually occurring. Indeed, the old, old drama which has been acted in Europe from the time of the cavemen until even now is being continued on the other side of the Atlantic; and the result a century or two hence may be a race more mixed, perhaps, than any in the old world, but with the English type of character dominant, and by its very mixture better able to cope with the conditions which prevail on a continent so different in many respects from Eurasia. Professor Huxley has shown how absurd it is to talk of purity of race; there is no such thing probably anywhere in the world, least of all in Europe, in whose population there are lower strains than even that of the North American Indian. We may state that some of the most eminent scientific inquirers in the United States share Colonel Mallery's opinions as to the increase of the Indians.

Colonel Mallery disperses a few other delusions with regard to the North American Indian, most people's idea of whom is derived from Cooper's fictions. He shows how they got their name of "red men" — from the fact that they were in the constant habit of coloring their faces with the ochre found in the soil. Their real color is brown, with many shades. No more common notion exists with regard to the Indians than their belief in one "Great Spirit," under names like Manitou, Taku Wakau, etc. A better acquaintance with Indian traditions, and particularly with the etymology of its languages, shows that this also is a great delusion. The more learned missionaries are now not only agreed that a general creator or upholder never existed in aboriginal cosmogony, but that the much simpler belief in a superhuman Great Chief or ruler is a modern graft. However unpleasant, from a sentimental point of view, Colonel Mallery has done good service by his researches in abolishing beliefs which are so unfounded, and some of which are apt to be mischievous in their consequences.

THE ART OF GOING AWAY.

We have heard it said that one of the most important social accomplishments is that of entering a room gracefully; but to our mind that of leaving one easily and judiciously is to be preferred. It is painful to see people anxious to beat a retreat from a call or visit, and yet apparently as unable to escape as rats in a trap, although nothing bars their egress, and all persons concerned would gladly dispense with their company. The art or science of departure both from localities and positions is worth studying in great as well as little matters. To understand when to bring to an end a morning call or a public career requires, in a lesser or greater degree, the exercise of the same faculty. No visitor is likely to be popular who has not the tact to leave at the proper time a house at which he may be staying; and no prime minister understands his business unless he recognizes the exact moment at which he ought to tender his resignation. Many cases at once present themselves to the mind in which the judicious exercise of the faculty of bringing things to a conclusion is necessary. It is one of the greatest merits of a novelist to know when to wind up his story, and the orator who can sit down at the right moment and in the right way is master of a good half of his art. Preachers sometimes complain that their greatest difficulty is that of concluding their sermons; but in this particular case there is little need for the exercise of any special ingenuity, as an abrupt but early ending is the fault, of all others, which is most readily pardoned by their hearers.

A bulky treatise might be written upon this subject if we had no scruple about violating our own precepts, but we only propose to look at it in some of its social phases. We will not enlarge upon the advisableness of moderation in the length of morning calls, because we lately treated this matter in some detail; and to write an essay instructing people how to get away from their friends would be about as useful as an attempt to teach riding by means of a book. It would of course be easy to multiply palpable truisms on the subject, after the manner of the writer on etiquette who observed that it was ungenteel to blow your nose with your table napkin. We might, for instance, point out that it is unnecessary for a nervous bore who has paid a call lasting three-quarters of an hour to announce his withdrawal by observing that he "fears he must go;" for his host would probably mentally reply, in the words of Sir Walter Scott, "Sinful brother, part in peace." Or we might inveigh against the habit to which some ladies are addicted, of waiting to say an interminable quantity of last words after they have risen to leave; but we have come to the conclusion that the regeneration of mankind on these matters is quite hopeless. Although, however, we have little expectation that the virtue of early departure will ever become common, we may point out the popularity of such a proceeding. It is often a doubtful question whether people will be much gratified by one's arrival, but it is almost always certain that they will be secretly glad at one's departure. At any rate, nobody suffers in the estimation of his friends by leaving them with an appetite for his society.

Few people have more or better opportunities of observing the idiosyncrasies of mankind in this matter than owners of country houses. It is often amusing to notice the various methods of intimating an exit which are adopted by different persons in any houseful of guests. Some will try to break the distressing news gently, as if they were afraid it would overwhelm us with grief, expressing their fears that they "really must go" on such or such a day, probably a later day than they were expected to remain; and it is lucky if the unavoidable regrets expressed by their entertainer do not call forth a reply that they "will do their best to stay a little longer." Others hint indirectly that they are going to deprive you of the pleasure of their company by inquiring where they may obtain flys; while some, on the other hand, say not a word till the carriage is at the door to take them away. Between ignorance as to when some of the guests intend to leave and the sudden departure of others, a host is often thrown into a state of considerable perplexity. To add to these and the other cares of hospitality, some visitors, especially maiden ladies, are apt to bother him about their intended journey for several days beforehand, expecting him to study "Bradshaw" for their edification. At last perhaps they find that they "can't get" to their proposed destination in one day, or at any rate in time for dinner; and therefore they determine to remain a few days longer in their present quarters. When the time arrives for a party of the guests to start for the station, one or two will very likely keep their entertainer in a state of nervous anxiety by making no visible preparations for a start; the servants of others will not be forthcoming, although their masters and mistresses are ready, the carriages at the door, and the luggage on the top of them. Two or three people will want change, too evidently for the purpose of tipping the servants, and the mind of one will be concentrated upon the mysterious disappearance of his umbrella, that of another upon the non-arrival of a letter which he expected that morning, and which he will wish to be carefully forwarded to a place with an unpronounceable Welsh name. When the host's mind is occupied with these matters, one of his visitors will probably call his attention to a telegram in the morning papers; and, just as he is about to bid a graceful farewell to the most important of his guests, there will very likely be an outcry that somebody's fly has not arrived, and a rush will have to be made to the stables, where there will be a scramble to provide a conveyance of some sort at a moment's notice. The worst case of all is when a departed guest suddenly reappears, hot and flurried, having left some of his belongings behind him. Seizing his lost property, he wishes his host a breathless good-by, and, springing into his fly with a bounce and a bang, shuts the door, hoarsely calling to his driver to go on as quickly as possible lest he should miss his train. Fortunate and worthy of all praise is he who succeeds in taking his leave easily and courteously, saying the right thing at the right moment, and calmly going away without fuss or hurry.

There is a proper time for everything, and not least for going away. We must not be misunderstood as implying that, as a universal rule, the sooner our guests leave us the better. On the contrary, there are few greater social nuisances than the premature loss of an important member of a well-assorted party. Perhaps everything has been arranged with the best prospect of success when it suddenly turns out that the most desirable guest of all, who had been expected to stay a week, can only remain for a couple of days. The welcome visitor who leaves too soon is a great offender, and his sin is aggravated when it leads to the extra stay of a decided bore. But a considerable knowledge of character is required by the guest who would stay or go exactly at the right time. It is sometimes difficult to discover whether his host is telling the truth or politely lying when he presses him to remain. The proper hour of the day for leaving is also a matter of some moment. The visitor who goes away at an inconvenient time often gives an immensity of trouble. Many a half-day is wasted by people having to wait at home in order to see a guest off. It is of course desirable to use the most convenient trains, but it is not desirable that a whole household should be disarranged in order that one man may catch an express. It were better that a guest should be an hour longer on his journey than that he should put his entertainer to inconvenience by starting at an awkward moment; for he should remember that his host's recollection of him and his visit will probably be a good deal associated with the occasion of his departure, and it is therefore highly important that that association should be agreeable. One of the greatest difficulties in bidding farewell to a host is to convey to him the impression that you have enjoyed yourself. Expressions of thanks for a pleasant visit are apt to have a stereotyped and conventional ring about them. A hospitable man likes to know that his friends have been happy; but when each of them mutters a sort of little grace on his departure, he feels that they are but paying him an ordinary social compliment, for he knows that they thank their entertainers wherever they go as regularly as they tip the servants. Indeed we once heard of an absent and nervous man who, as he was getting into the carriage which was to convey him to the station, inadvertently tipped his host and thanked the butler for his pleasant visit.

There are unhappy mortals who are so utterly ignorant of the art of departure that more or less decisive measures have to be taken to induce them to leave at all. It is a distressing episode when a visitor has to be assisted in making up his mind to go away, in much the same manner as a lame dog is said to be helped over a stile. It is hard to say which appears the greater fool under such circumstances — the guest or his host. A man is in a decidedly false position when, having enticed another into his house, he is unable to coax him to go out of it again. If the art of departure is difficult, that of ejection is still harder to learn. The reversal of the engines of hospitality is a very undignified proceeding. There are people who are quite callous to all hints that they have stayed long enough. The deterioration of the champagne, the increasing lightness of the claret, the disappearance of the satin damask furniture under loose covers, and even the feigned indisposition of the host, have no effect on such gentlemen. They say that there is nothing they like so much as to be with you when you are quite alone, nor will anything persuade them to be so faithless and ungrateful as to leave you until you are completely restored to health. As regards the little manœuvre about the wine, they will seize the opportunity for a conversation on the subject of vintages, and put a strain upon your temper and your veracity by making inquiries as to the age of the special fluid with which you are endeavoring to starve them out. We must not conclude without a word on the constantly recurring difficulty of getting our friends to go off to bed. When wearily sitting up with our guests in the smoking-room to abnormal hours, how anxiously we watch their cigars becoming shorter and shorter! and how mortifying it is, when we think that the happy moment has at last arrived, and that we are to be allowed to retire to rest, to see them calmly light fresh cigars before throwing away the ends of the old ones! But sometimes non-smokers are little better behaved. Repeated hints that it is getting late seem merely to have the effect of making our visitors congregate on the hearthrug; and, just as we are hoping for a real move, a wretch firmly fixes his back against the mantelpiece, and deliberately proceeds to open the Eastern question. We devoutly wish we could put a stop to his untimely lecture as abruptly as we can conclude an article.

From The Saturday Review.

SOCIAL HYPOCRITES.

MORALISTS are fond of vaguely advising people to "be themselves," and of assuring them that all is well so long as a man dares to be to his own self true. The value of this counsel, of course, entirely depends on the sort of self with which each person happens to be endowed. Socrates, who knew a good deal about his own character, asserted that, if he had been true to himself, he would have been one of the greatest scoundrels of an age peculiarly fertile in unredeemed blackguards. He would have danced a pas de deux with Hyperbolus on the comic stage, instead of figuring as a well-meaning but nebulous professor in a basket. Many people must have the same sort of knowledge of themselves, though they may not be as free-spoken as Socrates. Many a fast freshman, many a noisy subaltern, knows in his inmost heart that he would rather "make hay" in Arcadia than in his friends' rooms; that he would rather sketch than ride a screw in a steeplechase; and that his true self takes more pleasure in the society of his maiden aunts than in that of sporting prophets. He feigns to be what he is not, in the hope that perhaps some day he may really become the sort of character that he admires and imitates. Men of this kind are social hypocrites, and the world is full of them.

The hypocrite is not a popular character; but Heaven forbid that we should judge him harshly. Take him at his worst, take Tartufe or Uriah Heep, and you find a man who has at least a vision of virtue, and who may be supposed to have put himself in training for virtuous courses. Why should he not become "subdued to that he works in," and, by constant practice, catch the trick of righteousness? Probably there is some reason in the nature of things which works against this happy result of a hypocritical career. The sort of "eminent Christian" who robs widows' houses (as the Free Church ministers complain when preaching about the City of Glasgow Bank and its directors) generally breaks down before the close of his beneficent career. Few lies live to old age, and the lie of hypocrisy is apt to be discovered just when discovery is least convenient. The practice of the virtues somehow does not become a habit of the proper and ethical sort. One may doubt whether the practice of the conduct which is socially acceptable becomes more truly the second nature of the social hypocrite. Is he ever quite at his ease in his disguise? However that may be, his failures are not so disastrous and so conspicuous as those of eminent Christian bank directors.

The most notoriously offensive social hypocrite is, to our minds, the man of sham geniality. Concerning even a real genuine "genial man" it may be plausibly urged that he is often intolerable, as he is almost always tolerant. He insists on calling people "good fellows," "excellent fellows," whom you know by instinct to be pestilent creatures, narrow, conceited, and envious. By a peculiarity of vision which must make life very enjoyable, the genial man is blind to these things, and no doubt he is the happier for his blindness. But that does not make him any the better companion to people of lower animal spirits, people who are not always in the very pink of mental, moral, and physical condition. On the whole, however, people of thoroughly healthy minds and bodies seem to be the majority in this world — a thought which should be a great comfort to the philosopher who takes wide views — because we do find genial people decidedly popular. Hence the temptation to be a faux bonhomme, which naturally besets men of a certain weight and physical conformation who are not naturally genial. A man can hardly be genial under twelve stone; but it is not desirable that all persons who scale over that weight and are florid and unctuous should try to be genial. The result of their efforts is the existence of the most annoying sort of social hypocrite, the man who slaps backs out of malice aforethought, sits up late and drinks toddy when he would be in bed if he listened to what the inner spirit sings, and who gives an exuberant welcome to people whom he heartily wishes never to see. A great many doctors, and a great many lawyers, with a sprinkling of the ministry of our Dissenting brethren, are falsely genial. It would be interesting to know whether they are aware that they impose on but few persons, while they inspire the rest of the world with a wild desire to rush on them, to rumple their shirt fronts, tear their broadcloth, and beat them on the nose. They would be much less unpleasant if they were frankly bearish — if they were, in fact, their own disagreeable selves. They are execrable imitations of a type which less than most endures to be imitated. It is agreeable to believe that they are generally mistrusted, that they are always on the point of being found out, and that they compensate themselves for the open exercise of a brusque yet oily courtesy and good-will in public by bullying their families at home.

The sham man of the world is another most uncomfortable and uneasy social hypocrite. The poor wretch has a little taste perhaps and some literary ability; he took a very fair degree at college (where he posed as a hunting-man and a player of loo); he is not unsuccessful as a scholar, a professor, a writer, a popular preacher. What he does naturally — namely, his work — he does well enough; what he does detestably is the thing that is not natural to him — his play. The late ingenious Lord Byron, if we are to believe Leigh Hunt and Mr. Trelawny, was the very crown and flower of this class of social hypocrite. His great natural gifts as a man of the world, his strength, his beauty, his wit, his success with women, were alloyed and impaired by his even more extraordinary poetic powers. The two sides of his nature clashed and made him miserable, and he always preferred and longed for the trivial fame of a man like Luttrell. The common man of letters who wishes to seem a man of the world is probably, with his limited power of feeling, not much happier than Byron. He never can be persuaded that, if he were not a man of letters, he would be nothing. He is always craving for the reputation of the roué or the deer-stalker, of the shekarri or the athlete. It is not his Latin prose (which is not so bad) that he plumes himself on, but his riding, and he rides like a sack of potatoes. He knows a number of things; but he will talk about the things he does not know, such as jockeys, weights, and handicaps. He tries to be the fit companion of young military men; and, when he writes, he mentions "pedants" and "bookworms" as if he were not himself a member of the brotherhood. He is the pedant of fly-fishing, the prig of cricketing or boating shop. Every one is a "pedant" in his eyes who writes about distant times in a tone that is not rollicking, and who writes correctly where he writes at random. If the contempt of scholars, the amusement of men of the world, and the admiration of people who are neither the one nor the other is a desirable reward, the sham man of the world does not lack his guerdon. He is most offensive, perhaps, when, being a popular preacher by his trade, he haunts billiard-rooms, and tries to win a reputation for his knowledge of risky stories. Bad as are the ignoramus who affects knowledge and the vulgar man who affects distinction, the shamefaced braggart scholar escaped from his cloister into mess-rooms and drawing-rooms is even more distasteful.

The refined men who pretend to a healthy, blusterous quality are comparatively innocent impostors. Nature urging them to speak softly and to walk delicately, they must needs strut and shout for fear of being thought effeminate. They hold vague opinions, and vaguely believe in their casual creeds; but to hear them talk, or to read their writings, you would suppose them all to be Cromwells or Knoxes. Mr. Carlyle has much to answer for in regard to this class of humbugs. They are always saying that "the ratepayers will have Lord Lytton's head," or whatever head may be in question, and giving the world to understand that they are on the side of the bloodthirsty ratepayers. They long for rebellions in distant colonies that they may preach the virtues of flogging, of tar-caps, and of military executions. To tell the truth, they could not endure the sight of blood, and their hearts are as tender and womanish (if women's hearts are tender) as their theological opinions are casual and undetermined. Yet, when they treat of the past of theology, or the present restoration of St. Albans, they speak as if they were convinced Calvinists or "hard-shell" Puritans, as if the stool of Jenny Geddes lay ever ready to be thrown at the first representative of "black prelacy" who comes within shot. These deluded persons have a feminine admiration of brute force. Some of them adore Cromwell and others Robespierre, while the charms of that conqueror Henry VIII. still prevail over the ladylike minds of others. The result is to be found in the insincere noise of much modern rhetoric which is poured from a dozen very various pulpits. The fires of Smithfield would be nothing to the conflagrations of to-day if all the pseudo-strong-minded writers had a period of power, and did not run away and hide when their chance came.

The distrust of self, a fine and engaging diffidence, seems to be the motive of most social hypocrites. The sham genial man and the sham man of the world no doubt hope to gain something, some commercial or social reward by their travesty. The others whom we have described find a dubious recompense in the power of occasionally believing that they really are what they try to seem — bluff, brutal, overbearing, roughly simple, destitute of distinction, and hopelessly commonplace. That prize, after all, is nearly as valuable as most of those which an approving and self-satisfied conscience can confer.

From The Spectator.

CHARACTER AND POSITION.

MODERN life is passing, slowly and not always steadily, but still decidedly, through a great revolution, now nearly achieved. The relation of equality is gradually eclipsing every other, that of inequality, where it does survive, taking its least noble form, as most things do in their decay. The poor are still, on this side of the Atlantic, deferential to the rich, but save in that questionable aspect, there is no such thing as looking up or looking down, — we survey each other on a level. The change has been considerably more rapid since the French Revolution, but on a broad view we recognize it as the change from ancient to modern society. Ancient society was essentially unequal; liberty meant dominion. The relation of master and slave, separating the social world by a deep chasm which kindness may have bridged, but which it was never dreamed that justice would fill, was the type, at least in the Roman world, of almost all the relations which existed between human beings. All the important relations of life were unmutual. The duties involved were correlative, not common. Neither the son nor the wife had rights against the husband and father; their right attitude was submission, his was a just and temperate use of authority. Obedience was the right thing for the majority, and a man no sooner ceased to obey than he was at liberty to command. The ideal of democracy is the exact opposite of all this. It has exchanged the idea of correlative for that of common duty, and in stripping virtue of its specific character it has made human relation less organic, and more monotonous.

One result of this change, obvious enough when sought for, seems to us to have been inadequately noticed, and some injustice is the result of forgetting the much greater strain that has been put upon character, since position has lost its importance. Those who have been educated under the old ideal almost always judge too severely those whose characters have been moulded under the new. A person, for instance, whose youth has been embittered by severity, looks with amazement on the unthankfulness and captiousness of those whose parents have always treated them as equals. Had the yoke suddenly been made so light to him, what devotion, what boundless submission would have been too much for his gratitude! He forgets that no one can be as grateful for a yoke never being put on, as for its being taken off. He does not know that a whole new class of difficulties emerge, when the relation changes from an unequal to an equal one. No one can measure, till he has tried it, the difference that is made in any relation by the fact that it leaves space for criticism. A man educated under such a régime as that of J. S. Mill's childhood and youth, for instance, feels one aspect of the character painfully. But he never supposes himself to see more than one aspect. His taste is not hurt, his sense of the becoming is not jarred, he has no formed conceptions of what his father ought or ought not to do, to be crossed and disappointed. Above all, he has, as long as he deems himself bound to submit to his parents, no sense of corporate responsibility with them. He has one trial to bear instead of many. The one may be heavy enough to outweigh the many, but then it must be heavier than is compatible with the average experience of parental care and discipline, we trust, at any time. The old man who remembers a cowed and anxious youth imagines the young people he sees about him have to deal with a single aspect of character as he had, only that it is a more pleasing aspect. But the truth is that whereas he felt the faults of one side of the nature, they feel the faults of the whole.

The two ideals are contrasted most distinctly when they are exhibited in the same person. A proud and sensitive character excites admiration by forbearance and self-control under a heavy yoke. Unreasonable claim has been submitted to, unprovoked harshness or arrogance forgiven, irritation and annoyance have been put down with a strong hand, and a stern dutifulness has kept the relation which was merely irksome sound and active, till it is ended by death. "Now," it is thought, "we shall see the sweetness of the nature. If so much was achieved under difficulty and restraint, what will be the result of removing all difficulty and restraint? If such blossoms sprang from a sterile soil, what will not the plant produce, transplanted into a garden?" Such anticipations probably never failed of disappointment. There are, indeed, all sorts of reasons why they should be disappointed, but the one we are considering is enough. Forbearance exercised under a sense of dominion is no guarantee whatever, except in the sense that every good quality is a preparation for every other, for forbearance exercised in an attitude of criticism. The mind, in the position of subjection, enjoys absolute repose from all questioning of the limits of responsibility. It is difficult to allow for the added distaste and disapproval of every course disliked and disapproved, if we have only once allowed ourselves to ask, "Can I prevent it?"

Where deference ends, criticism begins. We do not mean anything nice or subtle by criticism. We speak of something that may be carried on quite as well in the housekeeper's room and the servants' hall as in the library or the parlor. The master whose service is accepted on the basis of contract — so much money from the one party, so much service from the other — is seen, by the best of servants, in a less gracious light than that in which an average servant regards one whom he remembers as the son of his father's superior, who was an object of interest to him before he was aware of merit or demerit, who stands, in a word, in a certain relation to him which will did not create and cannot annul. The subservience of tenant to landlord may not be thought a very noble relation. Perhaps not, but still it is, or at least it was a relation. There was something stable about it, something that veiled demerit and set merit in its most becoming light, something that checked the restlessness of human choice, and gave respect and consideration time to grow. Under the influence of modern democracy, all this is fast disappearing. Respect is given only where it is seen to be due to something in the character. Every one must stand on his own merits. This may appear at first sight a great gain. Reverence for goodness and wisdom, it may be thought, will stand forth more distinctly, when there is no reverence for anything else. We question whether experience corroborates that belief. As long as we respect each other for position, we are judging something we can judge. Whether these two individuals are father and son, husband and wife, is not matter of controversy. What may be their due meed of respect or consideration, if they are to be judged on their merits, will be subject of endless controversy. As long as the family rule is in theory monarchic, as long as the duty of son or wife is mapped out in a rough but definite simplicity, the ideal may be difficult to act upon, but there is no other difficulty in the case. But when the one thing that settles our relation to each other is character, we are moulding our views of duty on something that is often shifting, and difficult to ascertain when it is permanent. There are crises in life when intercourse with those who were absolutely ignorant of a man's character would be not only the pleasantest, but actually the best thing that could happen to him. He needed encouragement, perhaps, and no one could have given encouragement who knew the facts of the case. He wanted an atmosphere of trust, and a knowledge of his character rendered such an atmosphere impossible. It was possible for him to act upon anticipations of good which it was impossible for any one intimate with him to form. Of course really to know the character would be to knew its latent possibilities of good; to see that something there was able, as Mr. John Morley finely says, to "cast out the corpse of the dead self;" but such insight as this is impossible to human eyes, and we are certain that the best substitute for perfect knowledge, in such circumstances, is absolute ignorance. All knowledge less profound is in such a case misleading.

We allude to rare crises in the history of the human spirit, but something of the kind belongs to the experience of most of us. Who has not felt the wonderful relief of a sojourn among those who were ignorant of his faults? Not, surely, that there is any real relief in imposture, not that in supporting a feigned character there is anything but torment. No, what he really feels must be the escape from ignorance, not from knowledge. The anticipation of blunders and sins, irrational as the statement sounds often, necessitates blunders and sins. There is — would that we could stamp the warning on the heart of a single parent — a creative power in confident expectation. What others expect us to be, even if nothing would more gladden them than to be surprised, it needs strength of mind not to be. Anticipation, however reluctant, seems to cut a path through the tangle, and even if we know it leads far away from our goal, we are apt to find ourselves treading it.

"But why," it may be urged, suppose anticipation busy on the side of evil alone, "why may not the difficulty of mutual apprehension tend to leniency, as well as severity?" We can only say that as a matter of fact it does not. In this imperfect world our faults invite notice much more actively than our virtues. Evil is everywhere far more obvious than good. "Le crime est bruyant par sa nature, la vertu est silencieuse par la sienne." We forget years of unwearied benefaction in the unkindness of a moment, and a burst of temper outweighs, in its effect on the critical judgment, a long course of forbearance. It is not true that "the evil that men do lives after them, the good is oft interred with their bones;" rather the evil that men do lives contemporaneously with them, while the good often waits their disappearance to emerge distinctly. Memory, we believe, is almost always just; but when memory speaks, the time is past for justice to be much else than pain.

If such be the difficulty of any true judgment of character, it may well be thought a loss that the general tendency of social relations has been towards getting rid of those views of life by which respect is claimed on other ground than that of merit. The change is part of a great revolution, which it is idle to arraign or to deplore. It would be wishing to change the whole progress of society, as it is known to history. The abolition of perhaps the most unmixed evil known to history, slavery, is but the first step of this process; and every fresh link in the chain is, in some sense and to some degree, a development of liberty. Still, we see no inconsistency in approving some steps in this direction, and disapproving others. There is no inconsistency in rejoicing in a mild spring day, and dreading the sultry heat of August. There is no disloyalty to the will that has decided on the laws of history, in seeing that, like all other laws known to us, they have their disadvantages. Respect for position, we believe, is a sort of sheath which shields while it only temporarily hides character, allowing it to emerge brighter and keener. We have got rid of the sheath, and there is no use sighing for it back again. But there is great use in recognizing and allowing for our loss, in recognizing the difficulties — not yet consecrated by any traditional attention — of the relations of equality. We do not think, indeed, that as far as the inferior is concerned they are as yet recognized at all. It is seen to be a loss to the superior that he should not be deferred to, but the superior difficulty of justice, as compared with submission, is hardly yet realized. Perhaps the difficulty may diminish. It may be that we are passing through a transition stage, combining the difficulties of both ideals, for such a stage is never recognized till it is past. For the present, the difficulty of justice and the difficulty of deference are increased by the difficulty of choosing between them, and the wisdom of those who find themselves thus entangled is that each should remember — what indeed is perhaps the only antidote to the greater part of human misapprehension — that the one thing certainly common to both parties is difficulty. Such a conviction at least inspires that spirit of indulgence without which, from such imperfect beings as we are, there is no such thing as justice.

WEATHER PROPHECIES.

We are always talking about the weather, always interested in it, always trying to foretell it, always grumbling at it, or delighted with it. How long will it be before we know all about it? And what will life be like when we do? Weather prophecies have hitherto been interesting merely as guesses about a subject which interests us all. Did any one ever come across the absurdest of prophetical almanacs without glancing at that day's prediction to see what the prophet had made of it? Our memories have been stored with sayings about the weather which we learned as children, and which since then have always been at hand to encourage us when they happened to fall in with our wishes; while if they did not, we could remember failures enough to justify us in disregarding them, and hoping for the best. "Evening red and morning grey," has cheered us a little on the cloudiest of mornings; while such sayings as "Rain before seven, fine at eleven," are so delightfully easy to remember, as almost to suggest the idea that the rhyme must have been considered in the general arrangement. All these rules, however, have admitted of numerous exceptions, but prophecy is now beginning to assume a different aspect. Storms announced as coming do actually come, with more or less violence, as the case may be, and perhaps a little uncertainty in point of time, like slightly unpunctual friends, but nevertheless, they come. Many people may be still inclined to look upon these announcements rather as interesting guesses than in any more practical way. But we are beginning to recognize the fact that if the aim is not always quite accurate, we have to deal with something very different from the random shooting of the makers of almanacs, who were as likely as not to put "stormy" or "much rain" opposite a sultry day in the midst of a fortnight of parching sunshine. We may hope, as we go on board the steamer at Newhaven, that the rough weather which was threatened for that particular day will not prove to be anything very dreadful, and we may dwell upon the hopeful opinion expressed by the sailor whom we consulted before we made up our minds to start. But half-way across to Dieppe, in the agonies of a horrible passage, we remember the prediction, if we do not forget the sailor. And with our ever-increasing faith comes the inclination to dream of a time when it shall have a wider range. This is the day of small things, but may there not be a day of greater things reserved for us?

If we were able to foretell the changes of the weather for some little time to come, as certainly and as accurately as eclipses are foretold, there would be a good many obvious advantages in the knowledge. We should have no more pageants ruined by an unlucky choice of day, like the opening of the Paris Exbibition, no draggled processions moving under a leaden sky, no crowds of soaked spectators, ankle-deep in mud. Our fireworks would always go off, and our decorations, designed for the sun to shine on, would not be spoilt by the persistent beating of the rain. Our picnics would not always be fixed for the wettest days in the summer, and when we had carefully planned a month's holiday, we should not begin it exactly as the settled weather broke up. But we should very soon discover that our former ignorance had had its unsuspected compensations. Perhaps the first disadvantage that would strike us in the new state of affairs would be the inconvenient crowding which must result from our increased knowledge. We should all be doing the same thing at the same time. Solitude might be enjoyed in a thick fog or a succession of thunderstorms, but every fine day would be like a cheap excursion, when we should turn out with most of our fellow-creatures, and visit beautiful places in troops. That happiness which consists in contemplating the happiness of others would be ours in a far greater degree, but at times we might half wish to recall the days of uncertainty, when holidays were tickets in a lottery, and we took our chances of disappointment together with the chance of a somewhat more solitary enjoyment. And apart from all selfish thoughts, we should really have something to regret. While we utilized all our fine weather with calculating discretion, how often we should miss the glimpses of beauty which sometimes brighten a wet day! We should lose the gleam of sunlight and tender blue between two heavy showers, the momentary lighting-up of dripping foliage, the sudden splendor flaming in the west in some loneliness of soaked heather and spongy turf. It would require great strength of will to face the inevitable drenching, with a deliberate intention of seeing such things; to ignore the warnings of anxious relatives, prophesying severe colds, and to suppress an uneasy suspicion that possibly it might be rather an idiotic thing to do. And if one did go, defying all possibilities of later repentance, it would be to find that half the charm was gone with the unexpectedness. Though the best point of view might be secured at the precise moment when the weather cleared up, there would be no securing the best mood in which to enjoy the sight. It would be like getting up on purpose to see the sun rise at an unreasonable hour, when one is full of unchristian sentiments. One would be studying oneself all the time to ascertain whether the splendor really did give pleasure enough to make up for the discomfort it had cost, and thus weighing it in the balance, the decision would inevitably be that it did not. It is different when all the weariness and discouragement have been involuntarily endured, and we are helplessly resigned to the day's failure. Such glimpses of loveliness come then as pure bounty and delight, because we have expected nothing, and nothing is expected of us. That is the real charm, whether we go through much or little before we arrive at it, and to own the honest truth if our weather knowledge came to such perfection that it was possible to announce a peculiarly beautiful atmospherical effect to be seen without any trouble at half past three some afternoon, it would be enough to make one take up a book and turn one's back on the window. It is not everybody who can find pleasure in being "personally conducted."

And how much drearier would our wider knowledge make all dreary weather! We should provide for our rainy days in a new sense. All the tiresome duties of life that could possibly be put off would be reserved for the dull time which was known to be at hand. We should go sadly to bed when a bright week was over, and wake up on the fated morning to the gloomy horror of a thick fog, and the remembrance of the arrears of work which we detested. We are told now that our letters are not as charming as the gossiping letters of old times. The penny post has spoilt them, they say, the swift diffusion of news through other channels, and the feverish hurry of the age. But what will the letters of our descendants be like, when they are all written on the dullest days in the calendar? One wonders, too, what new and harmless subject of talk will be found for people who have no ideas in common. No doubt they will not immediately cease to speak of the weather. "Old use clings," and after the conversation of ages, we must surely be born with a natural bias in that direction. But in course of time the habit must be lost; they will look on nature with different eyes, and the old weather proverbs of our ancestors will be as useless to them as bows and arrows to our volunteers. It will become impossible then for any one to please himself with the happy fancy that the skies are smiling on his little projects, and that the slant ray of sunshine which broke through the rain-clouds to shine on the way by which he went to some new enterprise was a hopeful sign. We do not seriously believe it now, and yet there is something pleasantly encouraging in it, as in the parting smile and good wishes of a friend. Nature is so endlessly varying in her moods, that it needs an effort to realize that she takes no heed of ours. But there must be an end of such dreams of sympathy, if we learn to foresee her moods more certainly than our own. We have already given up the comets, which used to rush through space that they might be present at important periods in the world's history, hanging terribly in the heavens at the birth of a hero or the destruction of a city; and the eclipses, conveying threats in their mysterious shadows; but it does seem a little hard, that all our wonderful hopes and fears should not influence so much as a chance ray of sunshine on a cloudy day. "Happy the bride the sun shines on," has been said at many weddings, with its touch of superstition and old-fashioned poetry, but we can hardly repeat it when our knowledge of the weather increases till the wedding-day is carefully arranged with a view to the sunshine. Not only must we give up all thought of sympathy, but we should even feel a double-lack of it when we saw nature's moods not only varying in quick succession, but varied at the same moment. When we hear of some great catastrophe now, we sometimes look back and endeavor to recollect how it was with us at that moment, but we can never realize it now as we might realize it then. With wider knowledge, what terrible storms there would be under cloudless skies for those who had husbands or sons at sea, how strange would be that silent presence of the tempest on a windless afternoon, and with what ghostly distinctness they would hear the labor of the straining ship and the fierce rush of the waves, when not so much as a poplar-leaf quivered overhead.

But though it might be easy, it is perhaps hardly worth while to pursue the fancy further. It is not near enough as yet to make it worth much consideration. We may merely remark that if we ever do learn to foretell the weather, there is one discontented class to whom the knowledge will indeed be a boon. The farmers will feel that they have a wider scope. Hitherto they have only been able to grumble at weather past and present, but when they can grumble also at the weather of the future, their sombre horizon will be rounded and complete.

From The Spectator.

ENDURANCE AND FATALISM.

IT has been said that every people which adopts Christianity as its creed assimilates to itself out of that system the teaching which suits its nature, and rejects the teaching with which it finds in itself no inherent sympathy. The remark, though cynically intended, is in one way a testimony to the truth of a creed in which all natures, however different, find encouragement and restraint, and it is undoubtedly in great part true of the British people. They feel and accept, not in practice always, but still as a theoretic ideal, a great deal of Christianity, but they reject a great deal more. They ignore altogether Christ's speeches about wealth, which, whatever he taught about it, he meant should be a very secondary object; they slur over his personal and direct testimony to the equality of men before the Lord; they "wait for the explanation" of what certain "socialistic" utterances mean; and as to his teaching about submission, they repudiate it altogether. The business of a Mahommedan, they say, is to be resigned; an Englishman must struggle with adversity, even if no hope remains. His duty is war, not submission; grumbling, not content; effort, not resignation; and if anybody teaches the contrary, why, he is either a fatalist, or a weakling, or a man given to suggesting "counsels of perfection" as guides for the every-day life of a world in which the man who does not contend is sure to be crushed down in the endless stampede. Everything, says the Englishman, except death, can be prevented or remedied, and ought to be; and that man is most to be respected who gives way the least, even before the inevitable. Success in a struggle, not peace, is the Englishman's object; to assert his own individuality, not to yield to any higher power. So deeply rooted is the feeling, that if the Spectator, which preaches free-will about five times a week, chances to remark of a misfortune which it believed to have been unpreventable that "it taught the lesson of endurance," it is pelted with the cries of "fatalism," and accused of wishing to suspend effort, while a majority of Englishmen would utterly reject the Massachusetts senator's prayer. He was asked in writing by some impertinent journalist to explain, also in writing, his views as to a future state, for the public benefit, and replied, if we remember aright, "I do not know much about it, and I never feel certain, but I do in my better moments hope strongly that I shall go to another world, where I shall find less friction and no editors." The Englishman would have hoped for a world in which he specially should always have strength to overcome the friction.

So far as this spirit is the outcome of energy, or of combativeness against the curable evils of the world, it has, we need not say, our most hearty sympathy — though we can see also the beauty for some natures of the Catholic notion of resigned submission and retreat — but we are not fully assured that energy is the root of it all. The grumbler is not always the worker, or the fighter either. We think we trace some of it at least, possibly a good deal of it, to a much lower impulse, — that passion for comfort and ease which is now so strong that it grows destructively angry when anything interferes with it, which would punish the heavens for hailing, if it could, and which at heart utterly rejects the notion that Providence can be stern. We noticed the strength of that passion fifteen years ago, during the discussion on eternal punishment, marking with pain that while the argument which moved thinkers was the disproportion between finite guilt and infinite penalties, the argument which moved the multitude was the probable, and, as it were, motherly kindness of the Creator. Since then the feeling has spread, as we notice, very rapidly, till the very ideas that law is hard, that endurance in faith may be a virtue, that resignation is one of the highest graces, that elevation and not happiness may be the object of the grand plan, seem disappearing from men's minds. People seem positively to be affronted with the divine will because shipwrecks occur, to be ready to quarrel with nature because gas explodes in a mine, to doubt all supernatural energy because on the earthquake belt earthquakes kill innocent folk. It is not that they believe that all is love, but that all ought to be gentleness. There ought to be no violence, even in hurricanes, no bloodshed even when eagles are hungry, no pain even when flame has struck on flesh. There should be no teaching of endurance, but only such a development of intelligence that there shall by-and-by be nothing whatever to be endured.

It is a very gelatinous creed, all that, and one for which we confess we have but scant respect. It is utterly inconsistent with the facts of the world, and with any conception any reflecting creature can form of Divine Providence. Suppose we adopt the physicist's theory, reject government by a sentient mind, and believe everything to be cause and effect, then the faith becomes positively ludicrous. Man has then to bear, without protection from anything but his own brain, which in the direction of foresight is nearly powerless, all that is and all that may be. If science is gospel, a heavy proportion of pain is as certain as a demonstration in Euclid. Granted so many millions of people, there will be so many burnt, so many drowned, so many induced to kill themselves with strychnine or corrosive sublimate, so many afflicted with tubercle of the spine; and the proportion may, under certain contingencies, be indefinitely increased, till everybody, for instance, may die in solitude and neglect of yellow fever. There is no earthly reason, under a régime of simple science, why a whole population should not go raving mad, why everybody should not have hypochondria, why all food alike should not be stricken, as was the potato, and all sentient beings die out from any one country. (There is grave reason to suspect that that very thing did occur to the whole people of Cambodia.) Surely, if the scientific hypothesis is true, the very first notion to be taught is the necessity of endurance, of cultivating that form of manliness which can submit to the inevitable without whining, and without wasting mental strength in impotent scratches at an incoming flood, sure, at least, of this thing, that man retains control over himself. The Stoics taught that ages since, and would have smiled in scorn at the weaklings who, without believing in Providence, yet maintained that the first duty of man after a shipwreck is to scold at all concerned, the tide included, as shrilly as he can. Why not accept the lot which must fall on somebody, and which had this time fallen to those for whom he cared? And if science is not God, if, as we believe, the world is regulated by a sentient mind with a purpose of its own to be fulfilled, then the value of endurance, whether in its masculine form of fortitude or its feminine form of resignation, is even greater, for there is in repining, besides weakness, something of disloyalty and accusation of the king whose laws are so irresistible. Of the occasional hardness of those laws, there can be no doubt whatever. Not to mention the sentence of capital punishment under which we all live, there is the fact that all physical penalties — for example, the action of fire — fall upon good and bad alike; that intense suffering may be inherited, as in the liability to caries or leprosy; and that pain is often proportioned not to the capacity to bear it, but to the incapacity, the horse suffering tortures which the polypus escapes. And we may add, though the Saturday Review will be angry, this other fact, — that as far as man can ascertain, no care will entirely destroy his own liability to blunder, under circumstances where his blundering — as, for example, possibly in the structure of the "Captain" — will involve more misery than his guilt could do. In the face of such a régime, which no one doubts, it seems to us that to cultivate endurance, or if we must use theological phrases, the suppression of the will before a higher power, is most conducive to mental strength, and that to condemn such cultivation as "fatalism," as three of our contemporaries recently did, is to deprive man of a portion of his possible armor. "Fatalism," as we understand it, is neither endurance, nor resignation, nor submission, but acquiescence produced by a belief that a blind power — necessity — overrules both the will of the sentient mind and the usual relations of cause and effect, and involves ultimately the denial alike of science and theology, though, as usually held, more fatal to the former than the latter. The Turkish regiments which, surrounded by Greeks in an amphitheatre of hills, sat down and died patiently of starvation, gave an example of fatalism in an extreme and nearly perfect form. Almost every recorded martyrdom gives an example of submission or resignation. But the man who, believing a shipwreck unpreventable, or caused by the unexpected and undesigned consequences of human blundering, accepts the catastrophe without questioning the Providence which, and which alone, could have prevented it, shows the example of endurance; and that endurance, if only real, and not the result of callousness, is a true strengthener to the mind, which, from most of its speculations, gains so little strength.

LOST EILEEN.

I.

SOFT lights may swathe the castle tower,
O'er purple hills the dawn may break;
Dark eves may shadow Eileen's bower,
And night its dusky pinions shake;
The bell may beat what hour it will,
Or hang in silence hushed and still,
But by the sea, or by the shore,
The dark-browed maid is seen no more.

II.

When gloaming last engloomed the land,
And vapors gathering dimly swept
The ridges of the dark-ribbed sand,
And where the latest sun-glow slept,
Ere yet the silver moon had shown,
Or o'er the wave her light was thrown,
Beside the ocean old and gray,
Sweet Eileen bent her lonely way.

III.

So still! The wind was all too weak
To lift the wimple from her breast,
Or toss the curl upon her cheek,
But died away in tones of rest.
So still! No other sound awoke,
Save when a quivering billow broke
About the cliff, or, faintly hailed,
Her solitude the curlew wailed.

IV.

So still! But list — for as a beam
Of silver moonlight slanteth through Deep-foliaged dells, a sudden stream
Of saddest, sweetest music, new
With echoes of the sobbing blast,
Across the listening waters past,
Now fell away, now rose again,
Like gushes of the summer rain.

V.

A shallop through the mist appeared,
Cleaving the dark in noiseless flight,
And on the prow, as still she neared,
There hung a soft and starry light;
A shallop swift — nor oar nor sail
Broke crystal wave or kissed the gale,
Nor lacketh them, the path to win
Soul-moved by one who sate therein.

VI.

Now by that wild uncertain gleam,
Maid Eileen saw a vision bright,
With bated breath, as when a dream
Arises on the brain by night —
The spirit of the mystic bark
That oarless cleft the odorous dark,
A youth with darkly floating hair,
And eyes that glowed with lustre rare.

VII.

Close to his heart a harp he held
Of chastely burnished Indian gold,
That, by his fingers moist compelled,
A weirdly woven music rolled,
A strain where lingered strangely blent
All notes of awe and wonderment,
Like those sweet subtle thoughts that start
At twilight through a poet's heart.

VIII.

"Soft-bosomed maiden, o'er the main
My palace halls are gleaming white;
Full many an emerald they contain,
And diamond and chrysolite.
And there are domes of milky pearl,
And thrones of sapphire, gates of beryl;
And to the portals, wrought of gold,
The tribute of the sea is rolled.

IX.

"Soft banners of the crimson even Hang grandly in the hyaline,
White creamy waves to foam are driven
Round islands nestled in the brine.
Endusked by bloss'my greenery,
Those purple islets peaceful lie,
And scented breezes upward run
Like incense to the golden sun.

X.

"For thee, when gloaming mists were weft
Across the gray face of the sea,
The glory of those halls I left,
The glory of those isles for thee:
My heart was tingling all aflame,
I could not rest me till I came,
And if with me thou wilt not go,
Alas! thou workest bitter woe."

XI.

Like netted sunbeams softly fleeing
To sleep upon the violet's breast,
Into the maiden's inmost being
The magic of those strains hath pressed.
A touch of hand, a breathless kiss,
The mortal maiden seals her his;
A parting look, a flashing oar,
Sweet Eileen will be seen no more.

XII.

The purple-vestured dawn may break
Once more across the restless main,
Across the meadows she may shake
Soft-falling dews in pearly rain.
The glowing hues of eve may burn,
And twilight lift its darkling urn,
But by the sea, or by the shore,
The dark-browed maid is seen no more.

From The Westminster Review.

THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.*

REGARD for the security of our colonies and dependencies is now so preponderant an element in the foreign policy of England, that we are apt to forget how recent is the growth of the system we are anxious to maintain, and how much more accident has contributed to its development than settled policy. Hardly a century has elapsed since the servants of a commercial company, acting without the leave, and often contrary to the express orders of their employers, overthrew the French power in India, and laid the foundations of our empire there. We took the Cape from the Dutch, not because we wanted a field for colonization, but because we wanted a naval station. In Canada, we succeeded the French. The earlier colonies in America were the result of private enterprise — not of government action. And if the foundation of the different Australian colonies is due to the policy of the government of Mr. Pitt, that policy was suggested, not by any desire to find a new field for the honest energy of England, but by the need of providing a place of exile for the felons it was no longer possible to send to America. We purpose, in the present article, to show how, from this sinister origin, have grown communities prosperous in the present, and destined at no distant time to rival in every element of power the country from which they have sprung. Victor Hugo says somewhere that man has to sustain a threefold struggle — against the falsehoods of religion, against the injustice of human laws, and against the inexorability of Nature. From the tyranny of superstition, and from the burden of depraved custom which weighs down old societies, the Australian settlers have from the first been free. They have constructed their own political systems. They have, it is true, wisely adopted the general features of the constitution of the mother country, but in legislation they have attempted to prevent the growth of those abuses and inequalities which they thought rendered society in the mother country unhealthy. They have allowed to each individual full religious liberty, and have tried to prevent any sect or religious tendency from having an unfair advantage. But with Nature in all her moods they have had to maintain a long and unremitting struggle. The physical conditions of every country limit and direct the activities of the people, and perhaps, in the case of no country so much as that of Australia is it necessary to commence an account of social and industrial development by a description of the soil and climate.

Lord Palmerston, it is said, once found a difficulty in filling the office of secretary for the colonies. In his despair he proposed to take the department himself. "Come up-stairs," he said to a friend; "let us get a map and see where these places are." Had physical geography formed in his time a part of the training of public schools, he might have learnt much of the problems of Australian administration by the slight process of initiation he jestingly proposed. Australia is not an island, but a continent. And it is a continent destitute of all those features which give variety to the climates of Europe and Asia. The vast, uniform desert plain of the interior impresses on the fringe of littoral its own character of uniformity. The northern part of the continent is within the tropics. The rest is for the most part semi-tropical, though the highlands of the south-eastern corner may fairly be called temperate. The total area is nearly three million square miles, but the greater part of this is occupied by the barren plateau of the interior. This is an almost level waste of sandstone sloping slightly to the centre. Its margin, on the south, descends into the sea in abrupt cliffs. On the north and east and west it dips into the fringing coastland by declivities more or less gradual, which, seen from below, present the appearance of a mountain chain. The elevation of this margin varies from fifteen hundred to three thousand feet above the sea. The lowland between the edge of the plateau and the sea varies in breadth, as a rule, from one hundred to two hundred miles, but in places the highlands, or the projecting spurs, overlook the sea. The general contour of the country thus resembles that of the Deccan, but the absence of heights within the central plateau, and its vast size, forbid the existence of the rivers which render southern India so fertile. In many places volcanic agency has raised the level of the edges, and covered the surrounding country with rich volcanic deposits.

On the west, at a distance of two hundred miles from the coast a steep ascent of granite and syenite leads like steps from the lowland to the plateau. The range is continued along the north, diminishing in elevation as it approaches the east. The northern portion of the eastern edge is about twelve hundred feet in height. Between Rockhampton and Brisbane in Queensland it is broken by volcanic irruptions which run from east to west. South of this it approaches the sea, and has been raised by volcanic agency to heights of three thousand feet. From Queensland to Victoria the breadth of coast-land varies from one hundred to fifty miles. In Victoria — the south-eastern corner of the continent — the range rises to the height of seven thousand feet, and is dignified with the title of the Australian Alps. Thus the centre of the continent is a sandy waste, parched by a tropical sun. Periodic winds from the north-west and the south do indeed bring moisture from the surrounding seas. But except on the eastern and the south-eastern coasts there are no great mountain heights to front the winds and condense the moisture in fertilizing rain. The perpetual radiation from the surface of the interior makes the air so dry that it absorbs whatever moisture the heights near the coast fail to condense. From this result not only droughts but floods. For when year after year no rain has fallen in the interior, the intense heat of the surface so rarefies the atmosphere that an excess of air is drawn from the sea and sweeps with greater force to greater distances inland. When the cold southern current meets the warm, moist north-west monsoon, the vapor is condensed and covers the desert with floods. We have said that the interior slopes in an almost imperceptible decline to its centre. There is, therefore, no drainage. The water lies in wide stagnant sheets. Under the fierce rays of the sun it rises in vapor, but when it reaches the higher and cooler strata of the atmosphere it is again precipitated in rain. There is no mode of escape for the imprisoned water except by evaporation, and thus the excessive rainfall of one year is followed by excessive rainfall in succeeding years. It is thus that the desert centre impresses, as we have said, its own character on the surrounding country, except where bold and varied local features give parts of the country a character of its own. "In the depressions of the great plain," says Mr. Ranken, "there is most probably only one long drought or one long wet season; no seasons of a year but years of a season."

Volcanic agency, by rearing mountain barriers and opening up drainage lines, has conferred such a special character on the south-eastern corner, and in a less degree on the east coast generally. From Queensland to Victoria the eastern edge of the tableland forms a watershed from which rivers flow sluggishly to the south-west. They would have hardly energy to force their way to the sea, but that they meet the Murray, fed by the copious rainfall of the Australian Alps. These rivers, the Darling and the Murray and their tributaries, form the only great river system of Australia. No other rivers flowing from the inner slope of the edge of the plateau reach the sea. The rain that falls elsewhere spreads out in sudden floods or creeps listlessly along in vague and manifold channels till it is lost in the sands or absorbed by evaporation in the dry air. The soil of the interior is, as a rule, disintegrated sandstone, saliferous or ferruginous, and often is covered with marshes of salt or gypsum. The volcanic upheavals on the south-east, east, and north-east margins have not only improved the climate, by diversifying the surface of the country, but have in many parts covered it with rich deposits of volcanic soil.

The botanical features which are characteristic of Australian scenery are the same everywhere, and are in many cases peculiar to the continent. But there are exceptions to this uniformity which have led botanists to divide it into four provinces, the vegetation of each of which resembles respectively Indian, Polynesian, African, and South American types. As the centre is approached these distinctions disappear. The exceptional vegetation of the north is distinctly tropical. In sheltered situations on the eastern slopes reached by the rainfall from the sea, are found shady forests of rich foliage, which contrast with the dark, shadeless trees and grassy scrub characteristic of Australia. Near Rockingham Bay in Queensland, the base of the high hills is clothed with jungle, in which cedars and palms and bamboos are festooned with vines and lanas, and shadow a rich undergrowth of orchids and ferns. Farther south, in New South Wales, the wild wood-crowned valleys and flowery glens of the Blue Mountains form a striking contrast to the thickets of shrubs which conceal the sandy soil of the neighboring tracts. But in Sydney Harbor the bare, crumbling cliffs and thickets, descending abruptly to the clear blue water, form a scene of surpassing loveliness. Farther south still, in the deep valleys and glens of the Australian Alps, giant eucalypti shelter thickets of ferns and mimosas. The trees clothe the mountain-side even to the snow-line. For here (perhaps owing to the dryness of the atmosphere of the interior) though the highest summit is only 7,142 feet above the sea, eternal snow lies on the mountain-tops. Such is the scenery on the seaward side of the elevated edge of the table-land. Westward of the Cordilleras the land slopes gently inwards in park-like undulations and grassy downs. Patches of shady thicket and forest belts relieve the landscape, and quaint volcanic peaks enclose it. But where the watershed is not broken, and as the interior is approached, there is only a waste of stones, or sand, or marsh, or struggling water, or wide flood. There is no vegetation, but a poor variety of meagre grasses and low shrubs. The ordinary forest scenery of Australia is characterized by want of shade. The trees, which are mostly evergreens, stand in isolated clumps. The branches shoot upwards, and the scant, dull, leathery leaves hang vertically. Frequent bush fires destroy the grass and undergrowth, and leave the giant eucalpyti standing gaunt and bare. Monotony and absence of interest is the rule. Nearly everywhere the want of water robs the landscape of one great charm. Good scenery, it must be confessed, is exceptional.

The climate is everywhere dry, and singularly healthy. Exposure which in other climates would be fatal, is easily borne. Though the heat, especially in the north, is at times excessive, it has not the same enervating effect on persons of European blood as heat has in ordinary tropical regions. Towards the south, at any rate, it never interferes with outdoor work. The hot winds which sometimes blow from the interior produce great discomfort, but do not last long enough to be really formidable. The seasons, we need hardly say, are the reverse of ours — Christmas falling in the middle of the Australian summer. Droughts and floods are the two great obstacles to industrial enterprise. Mr. Ranken's description of the end of a long drought is so vivid and picturesque, and illustrates so many features of Australian life and scenery, that we cannot forbear to quote it: —

For days and months the earth has been hot, parched, and cracked; for months the waters have ceased to flow, the trees have lived but not grown, and the sky has been cloudless. The never-green forest is browner, sadder, and still in the oppressive air; the plains are bare and dusty; the watering-places (for the sheep) filled with dead, and the whole scene quivers before the eye by the great radiation of its heat. Daily the sun rises in a hazy sky, sails in a white heat through a cloudless course, and sets a round ball of fire on the edge of a copper dome. A sullen dewless night follows the dreaded day. The leaves of the forest and the surviving grass of the field glisten like blades of steel in the glare of the mighty sun: there is no green thing, nor sound of life from bird or beast or tree in the great noonday heat. At length clouds mysteriously gather — daily they gather and disappear at night — at last they form dense, low masses, thunder breaks, and violent storms of wind sweep the plain: no rain. Again and again these storms break before the longed-for rain comes, and with it comes flood. Perhaps the rain, filling the northern streams, first floods the southern water-channels before a cloud is in their sky. But with the floods destruction to lingering life no less than hope to withering vegetation is brought down. Many a settler has been ruined by droughts; but many a flock which survived that ordeal has been silently, hopelessly swallowed by the flood.

We cannot wonder then, that though the desert yields a scant herbage for sheep, settlers do not venture to push far into the interior. Nor can we fail to appreciate the dangers and difficulties which the long series of heroic explorers have had to encounter, and to which so many have succumbed. The eastern half of the continent has been fairly explored. A line of telegraph has been carried from Adelaide, on the south, to Port Darwin, on the north, but the western half may still be said to bid defiance to the zeal of discoverers. On the south it ends in a long line of cliffs. The rivers which reach the sea on the west and north have been found to have their source in the granite declivity of the table-land. The waters that lay beyond were found to lose themselves as they flowed towards the centre. Instability as well as barrenness is the character of the interior. The sheets of water by which the camps are pitched will suddenly dry up, or when pitched on what seems safe ground, they may be swept away by unforeseen floods. Water is generally obtained only by sinking wells. In South Australia alone are there permanent collections of water worthy of being called lakes. Such are the physical features of the country.

The condition of the inhabitants, whom, because we know of no earlier race dwelling there, we call aborigines, is the same now as it was when the first European landed on the shores of Australia, and as it probably has been during ages of unprogressive and uneventful existence. This is not the place to inquire as to their affinities and their history. Whether they are an isolated remnant of the people who once peopled and, to some extent, people now the Asiatic continent and the islands of Polynesia, we cannot say; but this at least may be affirmed, that no other race anywhere has sunk to or continued in so low a state of barbarism, or shows so little susceptibility to civilizing influences. No savage race presents more repulsive features. The type of face is negro, but the hair hangs lank and long. They wear no clothes, and provide no shelter for themselves except temporary structures of boughs and grasses. On the coast and by the rivers they live well on fish, opussums, kangaroos, and bandicort; but in the interior they as often as not live on rats or frogs. They are found in greatest numbers on the seaboard, but far away in the interior they occur in sparsely distributed tribes and families. As they have nothing to possess, they have no ideas of individual or tribal property. But each tribe has territory peculiarly its own, and the rule that no tribe must trespass within the limits of another tribe is rigidly adhered to. The principle is so well understood that fidelity to it leads to the only acts of cannibalism they are known to commit. A tree called the bunya-bunya bears once in three years a large crop of fruit which the natives consider a great delicacy. Neighboring tribes are allowed to enter the district in which it grows to feast upon the bountiful provision. After some time the visitors, who had previously been accustomed to an almost exclusively animal diet, grow weary of the rich, farinaceous food. The game and fish of their hosts is sacred from their touch. But the desire for flesh is uncontrollable, and one of their own number becomes a victim to it. The tribes have chiefs, and in matters such as marriage obey customs of the most complex kind. But they are totally destitute of religious sentiment. They have no mythology — hardly, indeed, a superstition. In some districts there survive traditions of some animal now extinct, the return of which they fear. They have identified in some cases the conception of a devil which the white men have imparted to them with this object of horror. But of a god, or a great spirit, or spiritual existences of any kind, they appear not only to have no idea, but to be incapable of forming a conception. In the interior and on the north there is but one wide-spread dialect; but each river of the great river system which flows from the western downs of the Cordilleras, and each separate tribal district along the coast, has a distinct language.

In sketching the history of the early European settlements, we shall have to speak of the fatal effects of their presence in the native races. Even now the hostility of the tribes of the interior is one of the great dangers in the way of discovery. Bands of explorers, whose aims and methods were humane and conciliatory, have had to fight their way from day to day through successive districts of attacking savages. Settlers in the bush — as all the country remote from the great towns is called — have to protect themselves against their thieving raids, and are not always nice in the measures they take in self-defence. The aboriginal — if he ever ponders questions of right — no doubt thinks he is justified in plundering from the intruder who has shut him out from the rivers and the coast, and driven away the game on which he used to live. And the settler, of course, has European notions as to the sacred rights of property. In such a struggle barbarism must in the end be worsted. But the temper of government is just and even benevolent to the black men. There are laws to preserve them, not only from aggression, but from the temptations to which the presence of civilization exposes them. Christian philanthropy has established institutions where an attempt is made to atone for the wrongs done to the race by training a few individuals to industrial pursuits, and giving them secular and religious instruction. But the attempt seems hitherto to have produced little fruit. Aborigines labor — especially in the jails where they are compelled to do so — but they have hardly as yet learned to feel the needs which are the incentives to civilized life. Mr. Trollope says he has never heard of an aboriginal living in a house of his own. They read and write: they sing hymns and recite portions of Scripture. But they acquire no ideas from what they read, and no real religious sentiment seems to have been developed. As is the case with most savage races, freedom from toil and the wild ardor of the chase have given litheness and agility, and even an air of dignity, to their frame. They are employed in large numbers as horsekeepers, and in other callings of that kind. In Queensland and western Australia they are employed as policemen. Their endurance, and the keenness of observation which often enables savages to follow up tracks which a man accustomed to civilized life would lose, fit them admirably for police duties in a country where theft of cattle is one of the commonest forms of crime. In the towns some work (irregularly) as masons or carpenters, while many lead a lazy, loafing life on the outskirts of civilization. There are certain spots reserved for their residence where they may be studied in all the observances of pristine barbarism.

The distribution of animals is similar to that of men. Everywhere the varieties are few and the individuals of each variety few. But near the coast and rivers they are more numerous than in the arid plains of the interior, and the animals, like the men of the temperate south, are of stronger and finer type than those of the hotter north. There are no quadrumana, pachydermata, or ruminantia. There are but few mammalia, and of these, most are marsupials. The opossum "up a gum tree," and the kangaroo are, perhaps, the most familiar types. The melancholy valediction of the disappointed free selecter quoted by Mr. Trollope, sums up what are regarded as the salient features of life on the downs of the western slope of the Cordilleras. "Farewell to the kangaroo, farewell to the wild emu, farewell to the squatter of the plain. I hope I shall never see that d——d rascal again." The scantiness of food and the uncertainty of the seasons prevent the formation of large herds and the adoption of migratory habits. It is a land of lonely, not gregarious life. The only beast of prey is the dingo, or wild dog — which is nearly everywhere a constant scourge to the sheep-farmers. Reptiles and insects abound. There are many birds of prey and birds of brilliant plumage, but few melodious birds of song. We are speaking here, of course, only of indigenous varieties, for as we shall hereafter see many foreign kinds have been acclimatized.

Australia was discovered by Manuel Godenho, a Portuguese, in 1601. During the rest of the seventeenth century various Dutch adventurers landed on points of the continent and adjacent islands. Names such as Carpentaria, Arnheimland, and Van Diemen's Land, are memorials of their enterprise. Dampier, the buccaneer, was the first Englishman to effect a landing. After him came a series of English, Dutch, and French mariners. But none of these succeeded in laying the foundation of a permanent settlement. In 1770, the celebrated Captain Cook landed at Botany Bay, and proclaimed the country part of the territories of the English crown. He surveyed a portion of the eastern coast (which from its resemblance to his native country he called New South Wales), and proposed that convicts should be sent hither from England. Accordingly, in 1788, Governor Phillip landed with seven hundred and fifty-seven convicts (of whom one hundred and ninety-two were women), two hundred and eight marines and their families, and a chaplain. He attempted to found a convict establishment at Botany Bay. Defeated in his effort by the unfavorable nature of the site selected, he at length succeeded in founding one at Port Jackson, a little to the north. This grew and prospered, and became the centre from which eastern Australia was colonized. It is now the city of Sydney, a place of calm prosperity, long since purged of all felon taint, a city of fair streets and gardens on the shores of the fairest haven of the earth. After the foundation of the settlement at Port Jackson, the French made several attempts to establish themselves in southern Australia; but, like all their vast and shadowy schemes of colonization and conquest, these efforts failed.

Around the convict settlement at Port Jackson grew the first English colony — New South Wales. It is the classic land of Australia. If the spirit of Greek romance survived, the soft glories of Sydney Harbor, the bold picturesqueness of the Hawkesbury River, and the wild defiles of the Blue Mountains would be peopled in the imagination of the settlers with nymphs and genii. Australian mythology would not lack heroes. The Greeks built temples to the founders of their states. In their grateful devotion, the dim traditions of the greatness of their mortal chiefs grew into myths which identified them with the mighty ones of heaven. To the first governors of New South Wales glory such as this has been denied. But they have such immortality as the unpoetic intelligence of modern times allows. Athens had its Theseum, and Phillip Street in Sydney and Port Phillip in Victoria commemorate the first governor at Port Jackson. The struggle which he and his successors had to maintain was indeed one that called for the highest efforts of heroism. They were dependent for food and necessaries on precarious supplies from England, or India, or the Dutch settlements in the East. They had to struggle with drought and floods. They had not only to preserve discipline among the convicts, but to control the mutinous and imperious spirit of the force which was sent from England to enable them to maintain order. And there were constant troubles with the aborigines, who were too barbarous to be conciliated or even effectively coerced. The civilization of the white men made scarcer and scarcer every day the fish and game on which they lived. Their own unwritten law prevented them from withdrawing to the territory of other tribes. As was natural, they attempted to retaliate for their wrongs by killing stray whites and destroying their property. And, as was natural too, the white men often treated them as beasts of prey, to be hunted down and exterminated if they could not be driven away. Writing in the July number of this review we described the inevitable results of the relations between civilized colonists and uncivilized natives. The whites can always plead provocation, but in Australia as in Kafirland the measure of retribution has far exceeded the measure of provocation. Governor Phillip estimated the number of the tribe which dwelt around Port Jackson at fifteen hundred individuals. The last survivor of the tribe died in 1849. European disease and European stimulants proved hardly less fatal elements in the process of extermination than mere violence and pressure.

More than once absolute starvation seemed likely to put an end to the infant settlement. The governor shared the hardships of the governed, and his highest state hardly rose above rough plenty. In 1791 the first non-criminal immigrant arrived. He was a German and married one of the female convicts. In 1793 a wooden church was erected, and this in 1806 was succeeded by one of brick. In that year, too, a ship was built and a newspaper published. In 1825 one-third of the population were convicts. In 1839 the last batch of convicts were put ashore. Altogether seventy thousand criminals were brought to New South Wales, many of whom at the expiration of their term of punishment were absorbed into the general community. Thus in the total population of not much more than half a million, the taint of convict blood is sufficiently appreciable to engender in the minds of ardent colonists much sensitiveness of sentiment on the subject. Meanwhile enterprise and exploration penetrated inland. Attempts at cultivation were at first unsuccessful, but it was discovered that the natural pasture of the country was admirably fitted for sheep. Between 1810 and 1821 the growing hopes of an export trade in wool attracted settlers. The merino breed was introduced, and soon runs of thousands of acres in various parts of the strip of coastland were occupied by sheep. All the land of the colony belonged to the crown, and the rights conceded to individuals — at least in later times — were generally rights of grazing only. The persons to whom concessions of this kind have been made are called, throughout Australia, "squatters." Since the crown has made over its right in the land to the colony, the interest of these pastoral leaseholders has come into conflict with the interest of a new class of agricultural freeholders, which the colonial legislatures, in their anxiety to avoid the evils they discern in the old-world model of society, have striven to create. The struggle still continues and is, as we shall hereafter see, the great question of Australian politics. Distress at home has been in all ages the great incentive to migration. Many attempts had been made in vain to cross the Blue Mountains and penetrate into the unknown interior; but in 1813, when a general drought had rendered the wide pasturages of the seaboard barren, a band of sheep-farmers succeeded in getting through and finding grass for their flocks on the other side. In 1808 a convict settlement dependent on New South Wales was formed in Van Diemen's Land. In 1835 settlers from Van Diemen's Land founded, near the harbor of Port Phillip, a town which is now known as Melbourne, the capital of Victoria. In 1825 Van Diemen's Land was made a penal settlement, independent of New South Wales, and in 1851 the dependency of Port Phillip was made a separate colony under the name of Victoria. We shall have hereafter to speak of the causes which make disruption a corollary to the growth of these vast but little-organized and imperfectly developed territories which we call colonies. Victoria asserted its independence, as we have seen, in 1851, and in 1859 the northern portion of New South Wales, which had previously been known as the Moreton Bay District, was constituted a separate colony under the name of Queensland. The seat of government for Victoria was fixed at Melbourne, and for Queensland at Brisbane. In the article on south Africa, already referred to, we have spoken of the difference between the constitution of a colony as a crown colony, and the system known as responsible government. Hitherto New South Wales had been a crown colony. The governor appointed by the English ministry did, in fact, govern subject only to the control of Downing Street. The lands of the colony which had not become the property of individuals or corporations were held to be at the disposal of the crown. But in 1856 responsible government was introduced. Though the crown retained a power of veto, the duty of legislation was left to two houses of Parliament, representative, in different degrees, of the people of the colony. The executive administration devolved upon ministers responsible to Parliament, and the crown lands were surrendered to the colony, and were, of course, at the disposal of its Parliament. The social and material progress of the various territories of Australia hardly admit of being sketched in detail, and will, perhaps, be most easily made clear when we have to speak of their present condition. The subjects of keen political discussion, and the general tendency of legislation in all are so similar that one general account will suffice. Here we shall only attempt to sketch in rough outline the main incidents in the history of the other settlements.

Port Phillip was discovered in 1802 during a voyage of exploration along the southern coast. An attempt to plant a penal settlement there in 1803 failed. We have seen how great are the dangers which attend attempts at exploration by land in the interior. But from the earliest years of our settlement at Port Jackson to the present day bands of explorers have followed in rapid succession. In 1824 an expedition from New South Wales succeeded, after incredible hardships, in crossing the Murray River and penetrating overland to Port Phillip. In 1826 another unsuccessful effort was made to locate convicts at Western Port (west of Port Phillip), chiefly as it appears as a protest against French claims. In 1827 Mr. John Batman, a native of Paramatta, near Sydney, and Mr. T. J. Gellibrand, both settlers in Van Diemen's Land, informed the governor of New South Wales that they were "in possession of some flocks of sheep highly improved, some of the merino breed and some of the pure south Devon; of some pure south Devon cattle, and also of a fine breed of horses. They proposed to ship to Western Port fifteen hundred to two thousand sheep; thirty head of cows, oxen, horses, etc., the whole to be under the personal direction of Mr. Batman, who would constantly reside there; and they asked his Excellency to grant them a tract of land proportionable to the sum of money they proposed to expend, and also to afford them every encouragement in carrying the proposed project into effect." The governor curtly declined to comply with their request.

In 1834 Mr. Henty, another Van Diemen's Land settler, established himself without leave or license from the crown at Portland Bay (in Victoria), and had soon the happiness of seeing the stock he brought with him increase to seven thousand sheep, two hundred and forty-seven cattle, and twenty-five horses. Incited, perhaps, by Henty's success, Batman crossed to Port Phillip and concluded a treaty with the chiefs of the native tribes, by which they declared that they do "give, grant, enfeoff, and confirm" unto him,

"his heirs and assigns, all that tract of country situate and being in Port Phillip" (here follows the description) "containing about five hundred thousand acres, more or less." Mr. Labilliere preserves the inventory of the articles given as the price. The value of course was ludicrously small compared with that of the concession. But Batman further agreed to protect the chiefs and pay them annual tribute. On a part of the tract thus ceded, which Batman devoted to pastoral purposes, stands at present the city of Melbourne, with its population of more than two hundred thousand souls. The governor of Van Diemen's Land naturally refused to sanction the arrangement that had been made, as it would be "a departure from the principle upon which a Parliamentary sanction, without reference to the aborigines, has been given to the settlement of South Australia as part of the possessions of the crown." But finally a sum of 7,000*l.* was allowed to Batman and his associates "in consideration of expenses incurred by them in the first formation of the settlement." But Mr. Batman is not the only person entitled to the credit of this first formation. In 1835 Mr. Faulkner came from Van Diemen's Land and settled on the site of Melbourne, in rivalry, but not at variance, with Batman's party. In 1836 Captain Lonsdale arrived as official head; and from this time the settlement of Port Phillip grew rapidly in numbers and prosperity. Its soil and area made it less successful in the growth of wool than New South Wales, and in the cultivation of wheat than South Australia. But it combined these two industries as neither of its neighbors could, and thus approached more closely to the colonial idea of well-being. It was the creation of private enterprise, and from its earliest years was impatient of subordination to spiritless, benighted, official New South Wales. In 1851 its aspirations were satisfied by its establishment as a separate colony, under the name of Victoria. It is the youngest of the Australian group, and the most powerful. But its greatness is due not to its fields, nor its pastures, nor its ports, nor to the radical constitution it has established for itself. In 1851 — the year it became an independent colony — gold was found at Ballaarat. Not from Europe only, but from the struggling colonies around, adventurers flowed in — often at the rate of five hundred every day. The pasture lands of the Riverina and the wheatfields of South Australia were drained of cultivators and shepherds. The growing towns were deserted by the workmen — by all, indeed, who had trust in their nerve and lucky star. The contagion of adventure was ever spreading. Convicts came from Van Diemen's Land and New South Wales and added to the difficulties with which the young government had to deal. A vast multitude of men was soon collected, for whom there was no shelter, no system of supplies, no settled mode of rule. Where all had dreams of finding a fortune by one lucky stroke, none were content to earn the slow wages of labor or the profits of trade. Policemen could only be provided by offering extravagant rates of pay. Shopkeepers would only sell at exorbitant prices. The luxuries of life were more common than the comforts — even than what, according to Western notions, are the necessaries of life. Men drank champagne at three guineas a bottle who could not afford to eat a well-cooked mutton chop. At first, society was saved by the rough methods known as lynch law. By degrees more settled methods were established. The charges imposed by government for permission to dig, gave rise to discontent, which in one instance ended in open revolt, suppressed only with great loss of life. The average earnings of the miners were no doubt less than those which could have been realized in regular industries. Some made large fortunes; many were ruined; and the profits of the gold-fields went in larger proportions to the traders than to those who found the gold. The fascination of the fields paralyzed for a time the development of production and commerce in the neighboring colonies, but in the end the result was happy. The want of the country was labor, and gold attracted it. There was need of concentration, and at the gold-fields sprang up organized societies with wants and the means of satisfying them. The growth of Melbourne is connected with the growth of Ballaarat, and is hardly so wonderful. Ballaarat was founded in 1852. In 1871 its population was nearly fifty thousand; it had fifty-six churches and three town halls. Its municipal revenue was 50,000*l.* It had sixty miles of water mains and fifty miles of gas mains. There were in it eleven banks, eight iron foundries, thirteen breweries, and three flour-mills. Gold has since been found and regularly worked in New South Wales, Queensland, and to some extent in Tasmania. West Australia — the most melancholy of Australian colonies — still cherishes dreams of finding in gold a solace for all the struggles and disappointments of the past, and there is every reason to believe that it exists in large quantities in South Australia. But its fascination has ceased. It is obtained now, as a rule, by quartz-crushing — a system which requires capital or at least association and co-operation. Thus the returns are less speculative than those of the old system of alluvial washings, in which each man trusted to his own luck and his own energy. Miners' wagers are high — higher, perhaps, than the average earnings of those who work on their own account at their own risk. Gold mining, like copper mining in South Australia and coal mining in New South Wales, is likely to be a permanent industry. In its beginning it has enriched Australia with much-needed labor, and the English language with such words as "chum" and "duffer."

Of the early history of the other colonies we must speak but briefly. Van Diemen's Land was occupied as a convict settlement in 1803. Convict labor soon covered it with well-made roads and other public works. Convict labor gave the free settlers many of the conveniences of slavery, from which institution it differed in no important respect. The bushrangers, or escaped convicts, here as in New South Wales, are the dreaded personages in the romance of early settlement. And the presence of so large a criminal element in the population was a perpetual subject of reproach and chagrin to the free colonists. Their complaints and protests were at last heard, and since 1853 no convicts have been sent to the island. So many painful associations linked themselves to the name Van Diemen's Land, that it was henceforth called Tasmania, after Tasman, its Dutch discoverer. In 1856 the colony was endowed with responsible government; but when it escaped from the control of the mother country, it also lost its claim to protection. The Tasmanians of to-day ascribe the decline of their prosperity, not only to the loss of convict labor and the abolition of the large penal establishments, but to the withdrawal of the British troops. Throughout Australia, generally, the sentiment of loyalty is strong, and they feel a regret, which is all the stronger because it is sentimental, that British soldiers should no longer be among them to represent the protecting energy of Great Britain. This is hardly the place to discuss the possibility or the desirability of making the connection between England and its colonies permanent. But assuming that the object is one worth striving for, it must be admitted that the social relations existing between British officers and the upper classes of colonial society are an important element in securing their good-will.

South Australia, like Victoria, originated as a settlement of free colonists — not, like all the other territories, as a convict depot. In 1830 Sturt, one of the early explorers, starting from New South Wales, followed the Murrumbidgee to its confluence with the Murray, and thence followed the course of the Murray to the sea. His discoveries were followed by a survey of the country from that river to the Spencer Gulf, and by the formation of a company in London to "plant" a colony there. By this time the evils resulting from the want of system in previous attempts at colonization had been recognized. It was seen that society in the old world depended for its prosperity on the due distribution of functions to each individual, and that in new countries hitherto the universal desire for the possession of land, and the ease with which it was gratified, had prevented the formation of a healthy industrial framework. Large grants of land had been made to individuals, but they remained for the most part unoccupied and untilled. Mr. Wakefield's scheme of colonization was devised as a remedy for these evils, and it was to some extent adopted in the English act of 1834 for the formation of the colony of South Australia. The land was to be sold in small blocks, and the proceeds of the sale were to be devoted to the encouragement of immigration. Mr. Wakefield had strongly insisted that the land should only be disposed of for a "sufficient" price, but he had made no suggestion as to the application of the purchase money. The price in South Australia has never been less than twenty shillings an acre. Where attempts have been made to discover the sufficient price by auction, the result has been only to create a class of land agents who, with no honest intention of acquiring land themselves, contribute to levy tribute from those who wish to do so. The Board of Control for India had been established by government as a check upon the exercise of authority by the East India Company. By the act of 1834, a board of South Australian commissioners in London was created to be a check upon the exercise of authority by government. In practice, however, the power of control was little exercised. The act had further provided that as soon as the population of the new colony should have reached fifty thousand, a constitution with representative government should be granted to it. After some intermediate changes of system — the population, in 1850, having attained this limit — the colonists were allowed to elect sixteen out of the twenty-four members of the Legislative Council. Representative government was thus granted, not, as in the other colonies, as the result of popular pressure, but in accordance with the scheme for the creation of South Australia. But the people desired a still more popular constitution. New South Wales, the only colony to which a constitution had been granted, had been satisfied to leave the nomination of members of the upper house to the crown; but the more democratic instincts of South Australia were impatient of official control, and in 1866 the constitution now in force was proclaimed. Under it there are two houses: an upper house, elected by the country at large, and a lower house of seventy-two-members, elected — two for each district — by manhood suffrage. The large expenditure on public works, in the first years of the colony's existence, involved it in debt. The proceeds of the land sales, instead of being devoted entirely to immigration, were devoted — one-third to immigration, one-third to public works, and a third to the repayment of the public debt. The financial equilibrium has long since been restored, and the price of land now forms part of the ordinary revenue of the colony. Copper was to South Australia what gold was to Victoria, and though, like other industries, it suffered by the rush for gold in 1851, it seems likely to be a more permanent source of prosperity. The wool trade has fluctuated, as elsewhere, the squatters gaining experience and devising modes of cheapening production after each fresh disaster. But the production of wool, which is the great industry of New South Wales, is, in South Australia, of importance second to that of wheat. She not only grows for her own consumption, but exports to the other colonies — to the Cape, to India and China, and to Great Britain. In 1866–67 the area under wheat was 457,628 acres; in 1870–1 it was 604,761 acres; but the uncertainty of the climate is shown by the fact that between those years the average crop per acre varied as follows: 1866–67, fourteen bushels twenty pounds; 1867–68, four bushels forty pounds; 1868–69, nine bushels forty-two pounds; 1869–70, five bushels forty-five pounds; 1870–71, eleven bushels thirty pounds.

Wine is produced in South Australia as well as in Victoria and West Australia. It is well adapted for local consumption, though in little favor. The poorer classes prefer abominable concoctions simulating spirit: the richer prefer brandy or the light wines of France. The art of wine-making is acquired empirically and only by long local experience. Australian growers seem as yet to have failed in their attempts to please the English palate. But it is to be hoped that the efforts they made to make their wines known at the Paris Exhibition and the acknowledged excellence of some of the brands will overcome the inveterate prejudices of home consumers.

South Australia is more than a geographical expression, but as a geographical expression it has long ceased to be appropriate. The territory of the colony extends northward to the northern coast of the continent. While other colonies were discussing schemes for united action to secure telegraphic communication with Europe, South Australia, with characteristic enterprise, determined to secure to itself all the advantages of exclusive possession. The difficulties of pushing a line of telegraph through eighteen hundred miles of desert interior were at length successfully surmounted, and now the wire connects Adelaide on the south with Port Darwin on the north. Round Port Darwin a settlement has been formed which will soon, no doubt, become a colony and claim separation from the mother colony, as Queensland and Tasmania and Victoria did from New South Wales, and as sections of Queensland and New South Wales are now claiming from the rest of the territory to which they belong. As we write, the news comes that a new expedition for discovery and survey is projected from Queensland to Port Darwin. The settlement of the north-east coast will follow, and soon the hot northern coast-lands will be as well known, and perhaps as well peopled as the more temperate lands of the west and east and south.

Of West Australia we have still to speak. It was founded by a band of English emigrants under the direction of Captain (afterwards Sir James) Stirling. The nucleus of the settlement was the town of Perth on the Swan River, founded in 1829. Immigrants continued to arrive, but from the beginning the colony had difficulties and misfortunes to encounter such as fell to the lot of none of the other colonies. It had neither the cheap labor, nor the grants of imperial funds, nor the centralized system which fostered the growth of New South Wales and Tasmania. Nor was it the result of organized effort, like South Australia. The aboriginal inhabitants were of an especially savage and irreconcilable type, and the relations of the colonists with them, in spite of the humane and conciliatory disposition of the governors, were bitter and bloody. The patches of cultivable land occurred at long intervals in the waste of sand and scrub-covered rock. Before the foundation of Perth there had been a convict depôt at St. George's Sound. In 1832, it was proposed to succor the distressed condition of the colonists, and relieve the embarrassment of Great Britain, which could find no home for its felons, by reviving the depot there. But the colony, as a whole, repudiated the scheme, and struggled on. Though cultivation slowly increased it failed to retain the labor necessary for its development, and in 1849, the broken-spirited settlement accepted the sad alternative of receiving convicts. In 1850, a penal settlement was established on the Swan River. The advantages hoped for were to some extent realized, but Victoria and South Australia, with natural horror of the convict taint, complained that the time-expired prisoners came and settled in their midst. Owing to their remonstrances convicts ceased, after 1860, to be sent to Swan River. The population of Western Australia is only twenty-five thousand, and during ten years ten thousand felons had been landed on its shores. In 1872, there were two thousand convicts still in confinement, or at large on ticket of leave, or under a conditional pardon. Of the remaining eight thousand those who had not died or gone to other colonies formed with their families part of the ordinary population. The result is, as Mr. Trollope says, that "the whole labor market of the colony savors of the convict element. Many of the most thriving shopkeepers came out as convicts. There are convict editors of newspapers. The convict flavor is over everything." Of course this social taint, added to the physical disadvantages of the country, discourages immigration, but the men themselves, however vicious in disposition or unprepossessing in feature, and however dissipated their habits may be, are at least restrained from crime. Life and property are as safe as elsewhere. The colony has always hoped and still hopes that gold will at last be discovered to attract labor, but hitherto the money spent in search and experiments has been spent in vain. Pearls have been found on the coast, but the class the fisheries enrich can hardly be regarded as inhabitants. Wool is the principal staple, but the production is small compared with that of other colonies. Of the patches of land suitable for pastoral runs much is covered with poisonous herbage. Both soil and climate are in many places fit for wheat. But the system of farming is thoroughly bad, and hitherto there have been many failures from moth and rust.

Western Australia is the only Australian colony which has not a responsible representative government of its own. Yet it can hardly be called a crown colony in the strict sense of that term. The governor is in theory absolute and responsible. But besides his executive council of permanent officials there is a legislative council of eighteen members — six of whom are nominated by the government and twelve elected by the colony. And as the legislative council has the power of stopping supplies, it can of course contest the action of the governor. Such an arrangement as this, it is evident, is only tolerable as the precursor of regular representative institutions.

We have thus attempted to review the early history of each of the colonies. We have still to describe the general features of the process by which occupation spread inwards and laterally from the first centres of settlement. New South Wales, we have seen, commenced with a convict settlement. The free settlers who followed came to be cultivators, not stock farmers. The frequent droughts and floods soon taught them the climate was unfavorable to agriculture. But pasture, they found, was abundant, and the mildness of the winter and absence of beasts of prey made stock-keeping easier than in better-watered regions. The merino sheep was introduced, and soon superseded the previous breeds. About the same time a herd of cattle, kept at the settlement for meat, escaped, and showed graziers the way to finer pastures. In 1873 there were in Australia 4,340,638 horned cattle and 41,366,263 sheep. The first graziers, it must be remembered, were cultivators first and graziers after. Wheat had to be grown for the support of the convicts. Government was glad to give grants of land and convict labor and military protection from the outrages of the laborers thus given, to those who would establish out-settlements to grow the needed wheat. The best land was devoted to agriculture, but the poorer lands adjoining were stocked with sheep and cattle. As these increased fresh pastures were sought inland. Cattle were found to be the best pioneers of settlement — requiring little labor and none of that painful preparation that agriculture involves. Government conceded for a nominal fee unrestricted rights of grazing in the apparently limitless interior, and thus the class of squatters arose. The dry air of the interior made the sheep healthy. Their wool was always marketable. Cattle, on the other hand, though they fattened even on the meagre herbage of the desert-like plains, yielded no return as soon as they increased beyond the number necessary to supply the population with meat. Sheep-runs therefore unconnected either with cultivation or the employment of convicts multiplied inwards. The droughts, which proved so mischievous to agriculture, and fluctuations in the external demand have from time to time depressed squatting enterprise. But from each disaster the sheep-farmers learned some mode of improving the staple or economizing their resources. Sheep, it is known, thrive best in a dry climate and by frequent change of pasture. The damp clay lands of the coast (where the rainfall is greater than inland) were therefore left for the most part to cattle — while the sheep were driven to the western slopes of Cordilleras, or eastern margin of the great inland plateau. The agriculturist followed the squatter, for land which is found to be good for sheep is favorable for the growth of food. But distance from ports and markets of course prescribed limits to the advance of settlement, and rich lands near the coast, like those of West Australia, were most readily occupied. Cattle were the most hardy stock, and were often sent to new land to prepare it for sheep. Riverina is the great plain country in the angle of New South Wales and Victoria, north of the Murray River, and intersected by the tributary streams of that great system. It was easily accessible from New South Wales and Victoria, and was already being stocked when the gold discoveries of 1857 gave an impetus to grazing by creating a demand for meat. Soon, not only the land near the rivers was taken up, but the land between, far from watercourses, was provided with water by dams and wells and fully occupied. The success of stock farming here tempted men northwards. From South Australia and New South Wales flocks were driven hundreds of miles to the interior. The accounts of explorers had led the new settlers to expect fair seasons. Much capital was sunk in constructing wells and dams. The herbage, though scanty, was rich in salt and fattening. But after a few years came a drought. The sheets of water dried up and wells failed. In the droughts or in the floods which followed nearly all the sheep perished, and hardly a station of all those that had been established was maintained. The result of the simultaneous advance in Queensland was hardly less discouraging to the pioneers. Unlike the settlers of the Riverina they were men of little experience in stock-raising, and they secured lands rather as speculative investments than with the intention of occupying them themselves. Pastoral runs they saw were everywhere increasing in value, and they believed that the rich downs of Queensland would soon be at a premium. Much time and effort was, in the first place, wasted in the search of suitable lands as yet unallotted. Then the conditions imposed by government required that the land should be actually occupied. To occupy it stock and labor were necessary. Prices and wages were at the time very high, and the speculators had to borrow capital at excessive rates of interest. The returns from such outlay are very slow, and year after year they had to borrow fresh capital, to part with a portion of their land, or to mortgage the whole. Every one clung to his land, while no one prospered on it. At last the crisis came. In 1868 the price of wool fell to one-half of what it had been. The lands so long prized became almost unsalable. The speculators were ruined, and their creditors lost heavily. And when the trade in wool revived the benefit was reaped by new men, who had purchased the stations for nominal sums. The early squatters thought more of increasing the production of wool than of improving the breed of sheep. They depended upon imported rams, but year by year it became more apparent that careful attention to processes of natural selection, results in the creation, for each district, of breeds giving a better and more abundant staple.

At first the flocks of sheep — or "mobs" as they are called in Australia — were under the charge of shepherds, and were driven each morning to pasture, and at night confined to narrow folds. The dingoes, or wild dogs, and the hurtful spear-grass were the great dangers to be feared. As the pasturages began to show symptoms of exhaustion the mobs were driven to the virgin lands that lay beyond. But as settlement increased and the cost of labor rose, and the decreased value of wool compelled the squatter to fresh economy, it was found that it was better to fence in the runs and leave the sheep to seek their own pasture night and day within the limits of huge paddocks. In place of many shepherds and messengers was one boundary rider. The result of this system was of course to impoverish the soil of the confined area. Thus in the more settled districts it has become the practice to sow imported grasses and trefoil in order to enrich the natural pasture. Under this more careful system of grazing it is profitable to keep sheep upon freehold. At first it would only pay to keep them on leasehold land, for which but small fees were paid, but the tendency of industrial development as well as of legislation, is to substitute for a system of huge squatters' leasehold lands a system of freehold sheep-farms. There have even been instances of cnltivated lands reverting to pasture.

The largest number of sheep which a run can safely carry under one management is said on excellent authority to be ten thousand. But the number is often much greater than that. Yet so wide is the area over which they feed, that Mr. Trollope says the most striking feature in the aspect of the pastoral regions is the absence of sheep. Many of the squatters, especially in the older districts, are men of great wealth. But the provinces are, as a rule, working on capital borrowed from banks or merchants in the towns. The wool is shipped to England through the merchants, and for years its value goes only to reduce the debt. The rate of interest in the colonies is about double what it is in England, and on every fresh advance which the fluctuations of trade or the need of increased productive expenditure compels the squatter to solicit, a heavy commission is charged. The result is that often the pioneer is ruined, while his merchant, or his overseer, or even his shepherd, succeeds to the valuable property he has created.

Drought, we have said, is the great foe of the squatter. This is especially the case in South Australia, where flocks have sometimes been driven hundreds of miles from the interior to the coast in search of water. The dingoes are formidable, but their number is kept down by systematic poisoning. On old pastures disease attacks the sheep; their constitution deteriorates, and salt and tonics have to be supplied to them. But in the settled districts the squatters complain that they are victims, not to the "inexorability of Nature," but to the tyranny of human law. The free selecter is dreaded more than the dingo. The benevolent intentions of the legislature have designed him to be a yeoman cultivator, but in practice he is, say the squatters, a cattle-stealer. He establishes himself as a thorn in the side of the squatter, taking land from pasture which is never likely to produce wheat. He may be bribed into withdrawal, but while he remains he lives on the squatter's meat. The imputation seems to be hardly resented by the class on whom it is made. "I was once standing by," says Mr. Trollope, "over a kangaroo which we had hunted, and which a free selecter who had made one in the hunt was skinning. 'You have heard of the cattle-stealers, sir,' he said, looking up at me; 'this is the way they do it by moonlight, I'm told.' He was owning himself to be a cattle-stealer, but he was not a bit ashamed of it." Vagrants, too, are a serious tax on the resources of the squatter. Want of hospitality to wayfarers would, in most cases, be want of humanity. Many an honest man in search of work depends for shelter and sustenance on the dwellers in the wilderness through which he passes. Anglo-Indian notions everywhere prevail, and the result is the existence of a class similar to the Anglo-Indian loafer. The fear of mischievous reprisal prevents individuals from doing any thing to check the evil. In India a special act was passed to prevent European vagrancy, and either legislation or associated action must effect the same end in Australia.

But in spite of all these drawbacks to human felicity, the life of a squatter and his assistants must be pronounced in the main a happy life. Horses are plentiful, and the work to be done involves regular habits and constant exercise in the open air. Lambing, washing, and shearing times are full of excitement. Rough plenty prevails. Mutton is, of course, a too familiar fare, but there is abundance of other meat and vegetables. Tea is the ordinary beverage of all classes, but brandy-and-water seems popular as a stimulant with the upper. The shearers and other laborers who assemble in large numbers during shearing-time drink tea only. But Sir Wilfred Lawson, and others who think with him that the drunkenness of England is due to the daily temptations of the public-house, ought to note that these Australian teetotalers look forward to one long drinking-bout at the end of their labors as the reward of their abstinence, and the best investment for their large earnings. The practice, whether it be due to inherited instinct or the survival of depraved tastes, is in every way to be deplored. A man can spend but little in Australia except in food. But rations are, as a rule, supplied in addition to regular wages; and if the latter were saved and invested in freehold, Australia would soon have its longed-for yeomanry. Distances are so great that there is little of settled social intercourse between the scattered squatters. But when they travel on business they receive, and may almost demand, unbounded hospitality. Visits of this kind are frequent and welcome. The houses of the squatters are more like Indian bungalows than English residences. They are generally of one story only, and have the verandah as a principal feature. The storerooms, the offices and quarters for the servants and assistants, adjoin. The whole has an air rather of patriarchal plenty than of elegance and comfort. The richer squatter sometimes attempts to reproduce in his house and its surroundings the aspect of an English mansion and its grounds. But finished picturesqueness is wanting. The Australian settler takes pride and pleasure in the possession of books, but their life is too active to allow much leisure for reading; and culture, far removed from all that ministers to it, languishes. The surrounding scenery of course varies. Some of the runs are in forest-covered tracts, amid rocks and hills; others in what seems a flat, treeless waste. Elsewhere they occupy bare grassy downs. Where there is forest it contains little life or variety of charm. The limits of squatting are defined by climate. As the north is approached, sheep thrive less, and yield less wool. But the influences which are hostile to sheep are favorable, or at least not injurious, to horned stock. In the hot, damp climate of the north, and in the low coast-land, cattle thrive. They are hardier than sheep, and require far less expenditure both for labor and cartage. Being better able to travel to find food, they can be maintained on pastures too poor for sheep. For this reason they have been pioneers in land subsequently occupied by sheep or brought under cultivation. The care of stock suits better the wild undisciplined habits of the aboriginals than any other form of labor. Their services can be cheaply secured, and they have therefore been largely employed as assistants to the stockmen. Though fencing has of late years been resorted to, cattle are easily herded, and can, in the dry climate, be driven long distances without loss of condition. Cattle-stealing long harassed the cattle, but laws providing for the registration of brands have done much to check it. The only other special difficulty is the danger that the cattle will get wild and break away into the scrub. Recovering these runagates is perhaps the most exciting of Australian sports.

It was at one time hoped that the trade in preserved meat would enrich Australia and benefit the English consumer. The preparation was conducted in the most economical way. In one establishment, "the meat was preserved, the essence extracted, the tallow made into soap and candles, hides made into leather, the hoofs boiled for oil, the bones crushed, and the refuse dried and compressed into manure." But the advantage in price has not been sufficient to make the consumption considerable in England, and the profits of the Australian producer were very small. The success of the effort to bring fresh meat in freezing-chambers to England, promises better for the future of both wool-growing and stock-keeping in Australia. The fashion in wool changes and converts the profits of the squatter to a loss, but the demand for good mutton is constant, and tolerably uniform; and, of course, the increased value of the meat would enable the wool-grower to compete on more favorable terms with the wool-growers of other countries. The Australian horses are hardy and strong: they are bred in large numbers for home use and for export. Most of the weight-carrying horses of Anglo-Indians are "Walers." Pasture is abundant, and the horses require absolutely no care. Sometimes they break away into the bush, and thus large herds of wild horses are formed, which occupy pastures coveted by the squatters. The work of expelling them is excellent sport. Few of those captured are worth breaking in, and in many places they are ruthlessly shot down. The wild horse rapidly degenerates. The emblem of Australia is the kangaroo, but the figure of a centaur would be more appropriate. Every one rides, and horse-racing is even more than in England a national sport.

But the great ambition of protectionist and democratic Australia is to grow its own food supplies — that is to say, its own wheat, for no other breadstuff is generally used — and to substitute the small farmer for the squatter. The eastern seaward slopes are, as a rule, fitted neither by climate nor soil for the growth of wheat. Few river valleys of any breadth traverse them, and the crops they yield are chiefly maize and sugarcane and grass and vines and oranges. But the inland slopes of the mountain-chain spread out in downs, which, though for the most part devoted to wool, are admirably fitted for wheat. Such are the Darling downs in Queensland, and, south of these, the highlands of New England; and again, south of Sydney, the high cold country of Manera.

North of the Murray River stretch the plains of Riverina. They include all the country watered by the Darling and its tributary streams, and have no definite limit northwards. Admirable for pasture, they would also be admirable for wheat, if only the rainfall were sufficient. To the south-east, and on the margin of the rivers, the free selecter has made good his hold, and wheat is grown. To grow it profitably, the rainfall must be not only large on an average of years, but fairly uniform. The chance of ample and steady rainfall diminishes as the distance from the coast increases; and so spasmodic is the action of the river system, that no practicable scheme of irrigation has been devised. But the area of land fit for wheat, and, as yet, unsold, is very large compared with that under cultivation. Much depends on the character of the settler. In South Australia, where many thrifty Germans have made a home for themselves, wheat is grown in large quantities on lands with a lower rainfall than lands elsewhere, which other settlers find unprofitable. The need of thrift and dogged industry during the first years of cultivation is obvious. The land has to be cleared of trees before even preparations for sowing can be made; and the country offers absolutely no wild produce which can be used for food. Then droughts and floods must be regarded as normal phenomena. It can hardly be matter of surprise that deserted freeholds are so common in New South Wales. Many of the free selecters eke out the produce of their farms by the wages they earn as carters, or as laborers for the neighboring squatters; and the squatters who complain of their presence are too apt to forget the advantages they reap from it in this respect. The system of cultivation is unscientific. Labor is dear, and therefore the great object is to economize it. The corn is reaped by a machine which thrashes as it reaps. There is no attempt at rotation of crops: manure is not given, and even the stubble is often burnt in the ground. By such superficial methods the farmer has earned for himself the name of cockatoo — for he does not till, but scratch. He has but one defence — the system pays, and perhaps no other would. Posterity will suffer — not he. And if he were not a cockatoo, the land would lie uncultivated. Wasteful use is better than useless waste.

The Australian farmer's homestead has nothing of the picturesque comfort of the English farmhouse. It is a mere hut in the midst of fields. The fields, indeed, are fenced to keep off the cattle of the neighboring grazing grounds, and to satisfy the requirements of the land laws, but there is no garden nor old trees, nor anything round which the associations of home can grow. The farmer comes not to find a home but to make money by growing wheat. When the soil is impoverished he migrates to fresh land. As settlement has been extended in the south African colonies by Dutch farmers "trekking" inland to escape from British rule; so it has been extended inward in Australia by cultivators in search of "fresh fields" and graziers in quest of "pastures new." The object of democratic legislation in Australia has been to attract immigrants, and to create a class of peasant proprietors. Land has not the same sentimental value in new countries as in old, but the Australian elector has not been able to divest himself of the feelings with which the state of society in England inspired him. He carries to the new country antipathies engendered in the old. He does not ask himself how the land of his adoption may be best developed, but how it may be saved from the power of capitalists and large landed proprietors. The risks which attend the enterprise of the squatter and the large scale on which his operations are conducted, render the possession or the command of capital absolutely necessary. The immense extent of land required render it impossible for him to purchase it. He has it on lease — and for grazing only. This monopoly of land — possibly of land suited for wheat — by capitalists, is an abomination to the democratic elector. He forgets that the class which supplies immigrants are attracted not by the prospect of the possession of land, but by the prospect of earnings. If wages are higher than the profits of cultivation they prefer to be workmen — not farmers. And wages, as a rule, are higher than the profits of a poor, inexperienced farmer. But to the fascination of abstract theory was added the class rancor of the ignorant and demagogue-driven workman against the better-educated, prosperous, and perhaps selfish, squatter. In the electoral struggle the squatters have been defeated. In Victoria and New South Wales the rule of free selection before survey prevails. By this rule any one can select anywhere a prescribed area of land not as yet alienated by the State, and by complying with certain conditions as to personal residence and improvements, and by paying a small amount of purchase money, spread in easy instalments over a term of years, can obtain a title to its possession as freehold. The area is limited in order to prevent the growth of large estates. The purchase money is fixed, not with a view to increasing the general revenue of the colony so much as to enable it to execute the works necessary to bring the land within reach of markets. The price fixed is, we believe, nowhere less than twenty shillings an acre. There are no limits to this power of choice. The free selecter may oust the squatter from the best portions of his leasehold run, or he may take a part which seriously diminishes the utility of the rest. It is notorious that land is often chosen not for its value to the selecter but on account of the injury with which the selection threatens the squatter. He naturally complains that while the term of his lease is unexpired his lands should be thus invaded. He claims to have discovered its capabilities and to have, by his capital, by his energy, by his daring even, to have developed them and converted the wilderness into a place of men. To protect himself from the wanton wrong which, as the squatter believes, the law does him, he is content to evade it. When a run is threatened by free selecters too numerous or too respectable to be bought off, the squatter himself becomes a free selecter of the threatened parts or of parts which command the rest. He buys in the name of his relatives, his servants, his friends — often in names which are wholly imaginary. By this system of dummying, considerable portions of squatters' leaseholds have become his freehold, and legislation has thus precipitated the evil against which it was directed. But the wrong done to the squatter is as nothing compared to the wrong done to the class of free selecters and the common weal. Much of the land now devoted to pasture is fit for tillage, and no one can reasonably complain if on these the squatter should give place to the farmer. But the lands chosen are often entirely unsuited to tillage. In South Australia the system of selection after survey prevails. In western Australia an attempt is made to confine the selections to areas on which a compact community can grow. But elsewhere the inexperienced immigrant is allowed to wander where he pleases and select whatever he takes a fancy to. The result is that the country is covered with straggling homesteads, and that while good wheat-land lies unused labor is wasted on land which never will be fit for wheat. The disadvantages under which the children of these scattered settlers labor as regards education is a grave evil in a country which depends for its future as much on the character of its people as on its own natural capabilities. Already the ignorance of these children of the wilderness is a reproach to Australia. The free selecters themselves are often cattle-stealers; are often ruined and driven to bushranging. Of eight hundred thousand acres alienated in New South Wales only one hundred and forty-seven thousand were sown with wheat in 1871. If the lands were compact within a smaller area, education and markets would be within reach, government would be easy, and instead of struggling, isolated families, there would be a community strong for mutual support. The large freeholders — the true aristocracy of Australia — have even a graver grievance than the leasehold squatter. In the early days of colonization large tracts were given to them or to their fathers as an inducement to them to devote energy and capital to the development of the country. It was then a wilderness, and nothing was known as to its capabilities. After a thousand struggles and failures they succeeded in introducing breeds of animals which flourish there now — and the crops which their experience and their outlay have shown to be most suitable. They have made roads, built bridges, and laid out towns. Now that the landowner has shown what the lands are fit for he wants tenants for those he cannot occupy himself. But the very tenants he would wish to get — the men with a little capital — the system of free selection has tempted to scatter themselves all over the country. They prefer unprofitable freeholds to profitable leaseholds. The tenants who offer themselves are men whom one bad season ruins. Hence this arable land is generally devoted to grazing; for "sheep are the only tenants whose crops do not fail."

The remedy for these evils is not to make the leasehold squatter secure in his domain, but to allow selection to be made only in districts which survey by experienced persons has shown to be suitable both as regards soil and access to markets. Where free selections thrive their prosperity is generally due to the fact that they are allowed to graze cattle in the waste land round their holdings. If the price of land were reduced — if lands fit for grazing, though not for agriculture, were sold in sufficiently large plots to render grazing profitable at a few shillings an acre, instead of at twenty shillings, a class of grazing farmers would be created that would confer on the country all the blessings hoped for from the class of tillage farmers.

Queensland, the most tropical of the colonies, is the seat of sugar cultivation. Unlike other crops, the cane requires two seasons to ripen, and therefore one year of drought or excessive rain or cold, will imperil the produce of two. The cultivation is encouraged by a heavy protective duty, and in favorable parts of the coast-lands, near to markets, has proved singularly remunerative. The climate is such that white men cannot do field-work, and even if they could, the high pay that would be necessary would prevent Queensland growers from competing with the growers of other climes who depend altogether on cheap tropical labor. Up to 1871 the work of the sugar plantations was chiefly done by laborers imported from various islands of Polynesia. The traffic seems to have been conducted under stringent regulations for securing the Polynesian from coercion, ill-usage, forcible detention, or bad faith. Of forty-three hundred imported up to 1871, twenty-seven hundred had returned to their homes, possessors of fortunes such as avarice never dreamt of in their own country, and endowed with habits of industry, such as, it might well be hoped, would render them missionaries of civilization to their fellows. But the cooly traffic for other regions than Queensland was not so rigidly controlled — was not, indeed, controlled at all, and true stories of kidnapping and outrage stirred English philanthropists to action. Unfortunately their zeal was not according to knowledge, and was shown in undeserved denunciations of what was called Queensland slavery. Within the colony itself white labor, shrinking from the competition of blacks, clamored for protection and prohibitions, and their selfish outcry was mistaken for an echo of the philanthropic sentiment of England. The traffic declined, and the Qneensland planters have now to look to India and China for cooly labor. Cotton, which it was once attempted to encourage by a bounty on exportation, is still grown in large quantities near Brisbane, but elsewhere it has given place to sugar.

Mining industries, though at present secondary to agriculture and grazing, are likely in no distant future to be the chief element in Australian prosperity. We have spoken already of the discoveries of gold and copper. Tin was found in New South Wales in 1872, and a tin fever followed, which resembled in all its stages the gold fever. Coal-fields of immense extent exist in many parts of the east coast and far away into the interior. But many years must elapse before the population is dense enough to allow the inland fields to be worked. At present those only are utilized which are within reach of the sea, or close to rivers. The Hunter River is the Tyne of Australia. At its mouth is the important town of Newcastle, whence coal is exported in large quantities to India, China, and other centres of eastern Asia. Iron is brought there to be smelted. Elsewhere in Queensland and New South Wales the iron ores (which exist in rich deposits on the surface in the neighborhood of free-stone) are smelted at the mines — the dense forests of large timber supplying ample fuel. But the time will come when forest timber will be no longer available, and then the coal seams will be worked. It is to be hoped that the Australian governments, which in so many respects show wise prevision, will save the country from the disastrous consequences which have elsewhere ensued on the destruction of forests. With coal and iron Queensland and New South Wales will become a new England in the East. They will first manufacture their own implements and then their own ships and cotton goods. Victoria has no coal, and despite the vigor of her citizens, ambitious Melbourne will not rival the greatness of apathetic Sydney.

The great obstacle to industrial development is everywhere the difficulty of transit. The squatter two hundred miles inland has to draw all his supplies from the coast and send all his wool there for shipment to England. The roads, except in the most settled districts, are mere improvised tracks, while the rivers generally have bar mouths, and are navigable only for a short distance from the sea. The only navigable system is that of the Darling, and even it is not navigable to its mouth. Traffic, too, is possible only at certain seasons, and is liable to frequent interruption. Yet so great is the difficulty and expense of land carriage, that the produce of Riverina finds its way by the tortuous windings of the rivers to a point on the Murray, and thence by rail to distant Melbourne, rather than by a comparatively short route overland to the much nearer port of Sydney.

Railways run straight inland from several of the chief ports; but, with the exception of the line destined to connect Melbourne and Sydney, none go from one centre of population to another. The reason is, of course, that population is densest on the coast, and that here communication by sea is easy. South Australia, elated by its success in constructing the telegraph line across the continent, thought of making a railway as well, and thus peopling the interior. But the physical conditions on which we have so often dwelt ordain that as the centre of the continent is approached, population and production must diminish in relation to area. Railways inland, therefore, can never give rise to settlement as they have done in America. The traffic can never require great speed or frequent trains. The first lines constructed were of the most costly type, but the advantages of cheap, light lines are now recognized. Railways, we may remark, have been constructed by the government. Private enterprise would certainly not have ventured on the necessary outlay, and the benefits they have conferred are undoubted. But the corrupting influence which the construction and maintenance of the lines has had, both on the government and the constituencies, justifies to a great extent the often expressed objections to entrusting such functions to the State. The scramble for public works grants of all kinds is, next to the democratic instinct, the great depraving influence in Australian politics. The candidates who succeed are not the men who are fitted by character and ability for the duties of legislation, but the men who have the knack of pleasing and amusing the electors; who can promise most glibly roads and railways and bridges; who attack most rancorously men of property and position, and announce them as oppressors of the honest laborer. Ministers must use the same arts to secure Parliamentary support as the members do to secure suffrages. Members and districts alike are bribed with grants from public funds for local works. The needs of the district are not considered, but its claims on the ministry. In such an atmosphere personal integrity cannot long exist. Many of the projects are mere jobs intended to benefit not a locality even, but a few individuals. The management of the State property is extravagant and corrupt. Personal and political considerations — often even coarser forms of inducement — determine the way in which lands are assigned and contracts given. Loan after loan is contracted with a light heart. The public debt grows, and only the substitution of local administrative governments for the system of centralized authority can save colonial finance from permanent disorder. The income from the sales of land being reckoned as ordinary revenue for a time conceals the danger, and the vigor of a young community will, in any case, repair the waste of unthrifty government.

Hardly anywhere in Australia is there any class, except the mercantile and trading classes of the towns, intermediate between the large capitalist and the laborer. At first the squatters were supreme in legislation, and selfishly used their power to save the lands they leased from agricultural occupation. But the various forms of mining industry led to the introduction of a large class of workmen, to whom, under the new constitutions, political power passed. They hated the squatters and the principles which squatting represented. Already the large freeholders desired the creation of a farming class to take their land on lease. The democracy created instead the class of free selecters. Production they endeavored to develop or to maintain where it languished by protective duties. Everything was protected — what the colony could not produce as well as what it could produce — everything except the produce of the squatter. The mercantile classes, who of course were mainly importers, opposed it. The press opposed it. The intelligence of the country opposes it, but the doggedness of the ignorant masses maintains it. The home government of course preferred free trade, but could not force it on an unwilling colony. It insisted only, in justice to foreign nations with whom it had treaty relations, and perhaps in the hope that practical inconvenience would be more convincing than abstract argument, that the goods of one colony should not be admitted on more favorable terms into another than the goods of foreign countries. The Australian colonies pay for their economic hobby not only by the misdirection of their industry, but by the expense and inconvenience of having to maintain against each other a customs barrier. The Riverina is politically connected with New South Wales, but all its imports and exports are by way of Melbourne. Commercially it is a part of Victoria, but the New South Wales government levies duty on all the goods which pass the Murray River. To obviate this inconvenience it was arranged that the Victoria government should collect and appropriate to its own use all the duties at Melbourne, and pay a lump sum annually as compensation to New South Wales. But a dispute arose as to the amount, and a barrier as discreditable as that of the Indian Inland Customs line is still maintained. Confederation of the Australian colonies is a consummation that can hardly be hoped for very soon. But a customs union — such as that which existed between the German States — is the only remedy for the present intolerable obstacles to inter-colonial trade. To the council appointed to superintend the working of such a union other common functions — defence, for instance, and foreign relations — will by degrees be assigned, and thus the object of confederation will be slowly attained.

We have seen that Victoria and Queensland successfully claimed independence of New South Wales. Further separations are the great questions of local politics. Riverina — a district of squatters — though it finds the inconvenience of being politically connected with New South Wales — having its trade in Melbourne and its courts of justice in Sydney — is yet unwilling to be absorbed in democratic Victoria. It therefore claims to be made an independent colony. Rockhampton, in Queensland, is indignant that Brisbane should be enriched by the establishment of public offices there, and that the district round Brisbane, having a preponderance of votes, should have an unfair proportion of the public funds spent in works for its benefit. It, too, claims independence, but the claim is met by the protests of Bowen — a centre of population still further north. Bowen objects to the supremacy of Rockhampton on the very grounds on which Rockhampton objects to the supremacy of Brisbane. Thus every district — especially those which are most remote from the seat of government — desires separation. Parties too weak in the legislature often unite to support each other's schemes. But the more remote and less developed regions have not representation enough to make themselves heard, even by this process of "log-rolling. Confederation and decentralization will alone prevent the indefinite multiplication of these claims — by diminishing the prerogatives, and therefore the charms, of independence, and by removing the grievances which at present make subordination irksome.

We have said that the Australian States are democratic, but they are so in varying degrees. In Queensland the franchise is higher than elsewhere. The squatting interest is still powerful, and, as a result, salutary restraints are imposed on the power of selecting land for agriculture. The area has been surveyed and classified, and only the cultivation appropriate to each soil is permitted. Like New South Wales, it has attempted to create a yeoman class, but it has done so by recognizing the fact that the inland soil is suited for grazing, rather than for agriculture. Land is given at low rates as freehold for grazing; and the prosperous grazing farms of Queensland are a happy contrast to the scattered patches of the free-selecting cultivators of New South Wales. South Australia, too, has adopted the system of selection after survey, and New South Wales, though it permits free selection before survey, is less protectionist than Victoria. Victoria, the most prosperous of all, is the most democratic. It is indeed, perhaps, the most democratic state that exists, or has ever existed. The attempt of the squatters to save their leasehold lands from invasion has long since been defeated. The battle is now being fought over the lands they have acquired in freehold. That the form of acquisition was legal hardly any one denies. That the acquisition was in most cases opposed to the common interests of the colony, and that the squatters, as a class, have shown selfish indifference to those interests, not many will deny. The democracy wishes to open out fields for industry: the squatters prefer to reserve their lands for grazing, and thus exclude industry. Confiscation has been proposed; resumption at equitable rates has been proposed; but the favorite remedy is a tax on large landed estates, the rate being enhanced according to the degree in which the estate exceeds the untaxed minimum. The disputes as to the payment of members and the mode of making the will of the lower house override that of the upper house are mere incidents or phases of this controversy. Financial distress gives the question urgency. The proceeds of the land sales have long been treated as revenue, when they ought in truth to have been regarded as capital. Now that they begin to fail and that the customs — under the fatal influence of protection — languish, democracy looks round for some means of escape from the consequences of its own extravagance.

In all the colonies (except western Australia) the English model of government by queen (i.e. governor), lords (i.e. Legislative Council), and commons (i.e. Legislative Assembly), has been followed. In Queensland and New South Wales the council is nominated by the governor on the advice of his ministers. In South Australia and Victoria it is elective. We need not give details as to the qualifications of electors and candidates. In Victoria, a member of council must own property worth 2,500*l.*, and the elector must pay rent or rates to the value of 50*l.* Thus the upper chamber represents property generally and not, as is often assumed in our newspapers, merely the squatting interests. For elections to the assembly there is manhood suffrage, and no property qualification. Members of the assembly receive a yearly salary. The elections excite little interest or excitement, and are hardly ever attended with disorder. This is due in part to the system of voting by ballot, but chiefly to popular indifference. Minorities have been hopelessly crushed. Political life has no venerable associations, and little of present dignity to attract the cultured classes. The history of the country is one of slow development, and presents none of those crises in which great men can stand forth and win fame. The character of the career, and the character of those who choose it, act and react on each other. As a rule, men of wealth and education enter Parliament only to procure the passing of some measure in which they are personally interested; and, as a rule, elections turn not on broad questions of political principle, but on considerations of local or personal advantage. Such political capacity as exists in the assemblies is due to the existence of the much-abused class of professional politicians. If most men go to Parliament only for the sake of business, it is well that a few should make a business of going there. In that, as in other professions, professional skill ought to lead to professional feelings of honor.

The affectionate loyalty of Australians to the mother country is shown in their adherence to English Parliamentary forms. The custom of our House of Commons is the code of colonial assemblies. There is generally an absence of dignity and too often of decorum in the conduct of debates — and discussions are too often mere wrangling over local jobs or interchange of coarse personalities. There are endless disputes on points of order, and the speaker is perpetually on his legs. Did we not remember the session of 1877 in our own House of Commons we should add that tactics of obstruction are resorted to such as no assembly of reasonable men ought to tolerate. Notwithstanding this endless flow of talk few speakers acquire even decent fluency of correct expression. It is to Oxford, not to Sydney, that we owe the incisive rhetoric of Mr. Lowe. Society in Australia is still young and small, and the delegates but represent the faults of their constituencies. The eighty-six members of the Victoria Assembly represent a population of only 629,776. The population of South Australia is 225,677, and of Western Australia 27,321. We ought to compare the Australian houses rather with London vestries or rural boards than with our own legislature. A free society in a healthy and productive climate must progress, whatever be the faults of its representative institutions. Melbourne, with its population of 247,000, and Sydney with its population of 167,000 would be considered large cities, even in England. In all that makes the life of their present inhabitants happy — in all that tends to the well-being of posterity — they are as rich as the most fortunate of English cities. Happily for their country, there is as yet no need for a system of State relief of distress. But grants of public money assist benevolent associations in succoring the helpless. The system of popular instruction is excellent, and a university provides for the need — not at present, it would seem, very acutely felt — of higher education. Churches, chapels, and conventicles of every creed and hue, attest the religious instincts of the people. The public offices are stately — the streets wide and well cared for. The gardens are so extensive that the country may be said to saturate the town. Beyond the great cities life assumes a less polished form. Nothing can be more primitive than the ordinary features of bush life. The towns, where they occur, are very small. A sanguine prudence has, in nearly every case, laid out the plans with geometrical precision and wild prodigality of space. The skeleton thus framed is but slightly clothed with flesh, and the comfort and picturesqueness of the present is sacrificed to the needs of the future. The great features of the towns seem to be street alignments, churches, hotels, and banks — the latter following the example of Lombard Street in architectural pretension. Education in the bush has till recently been much neglected, but is now regarded as a matter of pressing importance. The character of the working class is drawn in favorable colors. They are in better circumstances than their English brethren. They are less self-conscious in their assertion of independence, and therefore more polite. As a class they are not so sharply distinguished from the other classes of the country by difference of education as the mass of English workmen are, but the continued inflow of uneducated emigrants is one of the chief causes which have depraved politics. Prosperity fits a man for political functions, but the sudden change from poverty to affluence upsets his intelligence and self-control. Tippling is uncommon — but occasional bouts of drunkenness form, as we have had occasion to say before, the dear delights of life. Next to the workman's antipathy to capital and squatting — perhaps, indeed, even above it — must be reckoned his dislike of colored labor. He may possibly feel the objections to it which, in the minds of dispassionate judges, seem to justify his hostility, but his immediate reason for hating it is that it is cheap. We cannot, of course, condemn it on this ground. The Chinaman or Polynesian is cheap because the food he eats is easily grown and he has no habits which require much outlay. He and his habits are, perhaps, better suited to the climate than the European and European habits, and give more promise of permanency. We see no reason to believe that the man with simpler wants is less capable of improvement and development than the man with wants acquired under other conditions than those he has to work under. We see that in the northern colonies cheap labor — colored labor — is necessary for utilizing the productive resources of the country. But we also see that the population which gives the labor is transitory and incapable of becoming an element in a healthy State. The profligacy and indecency of the Chinese communities is so gross and open that we sympathize with the feeling of indignation and almost shame which self-respecting workmen must feel at their proximity. But this question of setting a limit to the growth and spread of depraved yet industrious races, is one we cannot discuss within the limits we assign to ourselves. Probably in Australia the political solution will be a recognition of the fact that there are two zones of country — one for white labor and one for colored. In the former we shall have countries organized on the Western model; in the latter we shall have an oligarchy of white directors of labor, and under it a mass of toiling, unprivileged, colored men.

It is pleasant to dream of a greater Britain at the antipodes, where the English language will be spoken, English literature had in loving honor, and English traditions be treasured long after the inevitable doom of decadence has befallen our island kingdom. But the future of the white population is not yet so well assured that we can say with confidence that the dream will be realized. The experiment of acclimatization has not been tried long enough to determine whether our race can adapt itself to the new conditions without loss of vigor and persistence. In India, we believe, pure European blood is sterile in the third generation. In America the physical degeneracy of persons of pure American extraction is acknowledged. The race would languish and become either extinct or effete, but for the ever fresh infusion of European blood. While the Australian cricketers are still among us, it seems rash to say that the "native" Australian is physically inferior to the Englishman. But he is certainly of lighter build — more agile, perhaps, and as enduring, but not so strong. Mentally they are, as contrasted with Englishmen, precocious and quick rather than sound. Manners, of course, are due rather to temporary environments than to inherent qualities. The rich men — the aristocrats — are often men of the humblest origin; and there is no aristocracy of birth, or even of education, to give tone to society and establish a standard of manners. This is delicate ground, and the general estimate we give must be understood to be subject to many exceptions. If the upper classes are often uncultured, it must be remembered that in the ranks of the strugglers are many men of gentle English birth. Society is not as in England distinguished by sharp contrasts. The gentles are rougher, the simples are more polished than at home. Here in England statesmen talk without hesitation or regret of the possibility of colonial independence and separation. But in Australia it is treason to do so. The Colonial Office may be abused, but the English connection is very dear, and every symbol of it is valued. A Victorian is proud of Melbourne, and a New South Wales man of Sydney, but there is no sentiment of pride or loyalty regarding Australia as a whole. We are of those who hold that the affection of the colonists should be prized and cherished by our country, and that in our policy we should not encourage the idea nor even anticipate the possibility of separation. There may perhaps never be a self-sustaining Anglo-Saxon population in Australia, but the decline of England must be rapid indeed if for centuries to come we shall not be able to send the overflow of a healthy people to maintain the vigor of our distant settlements.

Of the works, the titles of which we have prefixed to this article, those of Mr. Ranken and Mr. Trollope are well known. Mr. Ranken's is at once philosophic and practical — scientific and business-like.

He treats adequately of all the conditions — social, physical, and political, which govern the development of nations, while his style, Tacitean almost in brevity and suggestiveness, admits of several passages of finished picturesqueness of expression. Mr. Trollope is perhaps more readable. Full of genial common sense, he speaks rather as an intelligent and practised observer than as an expert. To both our acknowledgments are due, but especially to Mr. Ranken. Mr. Labilliere's work seems to have been written rather for Victorians than for Englishmen. It contains many details of interest but, on the whole, rather materials for history than history — rather archives than annals.

MACLEOD OF DARE.

BY WILLIAM BLACK.

CHAPTER XL.

DREAMS.

THIS long and terrible night: will it never end? Or will not life itself go out, and let the sufferer have rest? The slow and sleepless hours toil through the darkness; and there is a ticking of a clock in the hushed room; and this agony of pain still throbbing and throbbing in the breaking heart. And then, as the pale dawn shows gray in the windows, the anguish of despair follows him even into the wan realms of sleep, and there are wild visions rising before the sick brain. Strange visions these are; the confused and seething phantasmagoria of a shattered life; himself regarding himself as another figure, and beginning to pity this poor wretch who is not permitted to die. "Poor wretch! poor wretch!" he says to himself. "Did they use to call you Macleod; and what is it that has brought you to this?"

See now! He lays his head down on the warm heather, on this beautiful summer day; and the seas are all blue around him, and the sun is shining on the white sands of Iona. Far below, the men are singing "Fhir a bhata" and the sea-birds are softly calling. But suddenly there is a horror in his brain; and the day grows black; but an adder has stung him! it is Righinn — the Princess — the Queen of Snakes. Oh, why does she laugh, and look at him so with that clear, cruel look? He would rather not go into this still house where the lidless-eyed creatures are lying in their awful sleep. Why does she laugh? Is it a matter for laughing that a man should be stung by an adder, and all his life grow black around him? For it is then that they put him in a grave; and she — she stands with her foot on it! There is moonlight around, and the jackdaws are wheeling overhead; our voices sound hollow in these dark ruins. But you can hear this, sweetheart: shall I whisper it to you? "You are standing on the grave of Macleod."

Lo! the grave opens! Why, Hamish, it was no grave at all, but only the long winter; and now we are all looking at a strange thing away in the south, for who ever saw all the beautiful flags before that are fluttering there in the summer wind? O sweetheart! your hand — give me your small, warm, white hand. See! we will go up the steep path by the rocks; and here is the small white house; and have you never seen so great a telescope before? And is it all a haze of heat over the sea, or can you make out the quivering phantom of the lighthouse — the small gray thing out at the edge of the world? Look! they are signalling now; they know you are here: come out, quick! to the great white boards, and we will send them over a message, and you will see that they will send back a thousand welcomes to the young bride. Our ways are poor; we have no satin bowers to show you, as the old songs say; but do you know who are coming to wait on you? The beautiful women out of the old songs are coming to be your handmaidens — I have asked them — I saw them in many dreams — I spoke gently to them — and they are coming. Do you see them? There is the bonnie Lizzie Lindsay, who kilted her coats o' green satin to be off with young Macdonald; and Burd Helen — she will come to you pale and beautiful; and proud Lady Maisry that was burned for her true love's sake; and Mary Scott of Yarrow that set all men's hearts aflame. See, they will take you by the hand. They are the Queen's Maries. There is no other grandeur at Castle Dare.

Is this Macleod? They used to say that Macleod was a man! They used to say he had not much fear of anything. But this is only a poor trembling boy — a coward trembling at everything, and going away to London with a lie on his lips.

And they know how Sholto Macleod died, and how Roderick Macleod died, and Ronald, and Duncan the fair-haired, and Hector; but the last of them — this poor wretch — what will they say of him? "Oh, he died for the love of a woman!" She struck him in the heart, and he could not strike back, for she was a woman. Ah, but if it was a man, now! They say the Macleods are all become sheep, and their courage has gone, and if they were to grasp even a rose-leaf they could not crush it. It is dangerous to say that; do not trust to it. Oh, is it you, you poor fool in the newspaper who are whirling along behind the boat? Does the swivel work? Are the sharks after you? Do you hear them behind you, cleaving the water? The men of Dubh Artach will have a good laugh when we whisk you past. What! you beg for mercy? — come out, then, you poor devil! Here is a tarpaulin for you. Give him a glass of whiskey, John Cameron. And so you know about theatres; and perhaps you have ambition too; and there is nothing in the world so fine as people clapping their hands? But you — even you — if I were to take you over in the dark, and the storm came on: you would not think that I thrust you aside to look after myself? You are a stranger; you are helpless in boats: do you think I would thrust you aside? It was not fair — oh, it was not fair: if she wished to kill my heart, there were other things to say than that. Why, sweetheart, don't you know that I got the little English boy out of the water; and you think I would let you drown! If we were both drowning now, do you know what I should do? I should laugh and say, "Sweetheart, sweetheart, if we were not to be together in life, we are now in death, and that is enough for me."

What is the slow, sad sound that one hears? The grave is on the lonely island; there is no one left on the island now; there is nothing but the grave. "Man that is born of a woman hath but a short time to live, and is full of misery." Oh no, not that! That is all over; the misery is over, and there is peace. This is the sound of the sea-birds, and the wind coming over the seas, and the waves on the rocks. Or is it Donald, in the boat, going back to the land? The people have their heads bent; it is a lament the boy is playing. And how will you play the "Comhadh na Cloinne" to-night, Donald? — and what will the mother say? It is six sons she has to think of now; and Patrick Mòr had but seven dead when he wrote the "Lament of the Children." Janet, see to her! Tell her it is no matter now; the peace has come; the misery is over; there is only the quiet sound of the waves. But you, Donald, come here. Put down your pipes, and listen. Do you remember the English lady who was here in the summer-time; and your pipes were too loud for her, and were taken away? She is coming again. She will try to put her foot on my grave. But you will watch for her coming, Donald; and you will go quickly to Hamish; and Hamish will go down to the shore, and send her back. You are only a boy, Donald; she would not heed you; and the ladies at the castle are too gentle, and would give her fair words; but Hamish is not afraid of her; he will drive her back — she shall not put her foot on my grave; for my heart can bear no more pain.

And are you going away — Rose-Leaf — Rose-Leaf — are you sailing away from me on the smooth waters to the south? I put out my hand to you; but you are afraid of the hard hands of the northern people, and you shrink from me. Do you think we would harm you, then, that you tremble so? The savage days are gone; come — we will show you the beautiful islands in the summer-time; and you will take high courage, and become yourself a Macleod; and all the people will be proud to hear of Fionaghal the Fair Stranger who has come to make her home among us. Oh, our hands are gentle enough when it is a rose-leaf they have to touch. There was blood on them in the old days; we have washed it off now: see — this beautiful red rose you have given me is not afraid of rough hands! We have no beautiful roses to give you, but we will give you a piece of white heather, and that will secure to you peace and rest and a happy heart all your days. You will not touch it, sweetheart? Do not be afraid! There is no adder in it. But if you were to find, now, a white adder, would you know what to do with it? There was a sweetheart in an old song knew what to do with an adder. Do you know the song? The young man goes back to his home, and he says to his mother, "O make my bed soon; for I'm weary, weary hunting, and fain would lie doon." Why do you turn so pale, sweetheart? There is the whiteness of a white adder in your cheeks; and your eyes — there is death in your eyes! Donald! — Hamish! help! help! — her foot is coming near to my grave! — my heart ——

And so, in a paroxysm of wild terror and pain, he awoke again, and behold, the ghastly white daylight was in the room — the cold glare of a day he would fain have never seen. It was all in a sort of dream that this haggard-faced man dressed, and drank a cup of tea, and got outside into the rain — the rain, and the noise of the cabs, and the gloom of London skies: these harsh and commonplace things were easier to bear than the dreams of the sick brain. And then, somehow or other, he got his way down to Aldershot, and sought out Norman Ogilvie.

"Macleod!" Ogilvie cried, startled beyond measure by his appearance.

"I — I wanted to shake hands with you, Ogilvie, before I am going," said this hollow-eyed man, who seemed to have grown old.

Ogilvie hesitated for a second or two; and then he said vehemently, —

"Well, Macleod, I am not a sentimental chap, but — but — hang it! it is too bad. And again and again I have thought of writing to you, as your friend, just within the last week or so; and then I said to myself that tale-bearing never came to any good. But she won't darken Mrs. Ross's door again — that I know. Mrs. Ross went straight to her the other day. There is no nonsense about that woman. And when she got to understand that the story was true, she let Miss White know that she considered you to be a friend of hers, and that — well, you know how women give hints ——"

"But I don't know what you mean, Ogilvie," he cried, quite bewildered. "Is it a thing for all the world to know? What story is it — when I knew nothing till yesterday?"

"Well, you know now: I saw by your face a minute ago that she had told you the truth at last," Ogilvie said. "Macleod, don't blame me. When I heard of her being about to be married, I did not believe the story ——"

Macleod sprang at him like a tiger, and caught his arm with the grip of a vise.

"Her getting married? — to whom?"

"Why, don't you know?" Ogilvie said, with his eyes staring. "Oh yes, you must know. I see you know. Why, the look in your face when you came into this room ——"

"Who is the man, Ogilvie?" — and there was the sudden hate of ten thousand devils in his eyes.

"Why, it is that artist fellow — Lemuel. You don't mean to say she hasn't told you? It is the common story. And Mrs. Ross thought it was only a piece of nonsense — she said they were always making out those stories about actresses — but she went to Miss White. And when Miss White could not deny it, Mrs. Ross said there and then they had better let their friendship drop. Macleod, I would have written to you — upon my soul, I would have written to you — but how could I imagine you did not know? And do you really mean to say she has not told you anything of what has been going on recently — what was well known to every body?"

And this young man spoke in a passion too: Keith Macleod was his friend. But Macleod himself seemed, with some powerful effort of will, to have got the better of his sudden and fierce hate; he sat down again; he spoke in a low voice; but there was a dark look in his eyes.

"No," said he slowly, "she has not told me all about it. Well, she did tell me about a poor creature — a woman-man — a thing of affectation, with his paint-box and his velvet coat and his furniture: Ogilvie, have you got any brandy?"

Ogilvie rang, and got some brandy, some water, a tumbler, and a wineglass placed on the table. Macleod, with a hand that trembled violently, filled the tumbler half full with brandy.

"And she could not deny the story to Mrs. Ross?" said he, with a strange and hard smile on his face. "It was her modesty. Ah, you don't know, Ogilvie, what an exalted soul she has. She is full of idealisms. She could not explain all that to Mrs. Ross. I know. And when she found herself too weak to carry out her aspirations, she sought help. Is that it? She would gain assurance and courage from the woman-man?"

He pushed the tumbler away; his hand was still trembling violently.

"I will not touch that, Ogilvie," said he, "for I have not much mastery over myself. I am going away now — I am going back now to the Highlands. Oh! you do not know what I have become since I met that woman — a coward and a liar! They wouldn't have you sit down at the mess table, Ogilvie, if you were that: would they? I dare not stay in London now. I must run away now — like a hare that is hunted. It would not be good for her or for me that I should stay any longer in London."

He rose, and held out his hand: there was a curious glazed look on his eyes. Ogilvie pressed him back into the chair again.

"You are not going out in this condition, Macleod — you don't know what you are doing. Come now, let us be reasonable; let us talk over the thing like men. And I must say, first of all, that I am heartily glad of it, for your sake. It will be a hard twist at first; but, bless you! lots of fellows have had to fight through the same thing, and they come up smiling after it, and you would scarcely know the difference. Don't imagine I am surprised, — oh no. I never did believe in that young woman; I thought she was a deuced sight too clever; and when she used to go about humbugging this one and the other with her innocent airs, I said to myself, 'Oh, it's all very well; but you know what you are about.' Of course there was no use talking to you. I believe at one time Mrs. Ross was considering the point whether she ought not to give you a hint, seeing that you had met Miss White first at her house, that the young lady was rather clever at flirtation, and that you ought to keep a sharp look-out. But then you would only have blazed up in anger. It was no use talking to you. And then, after all, I said that if you were so bent on marrying her, the chances were that you would have no difficulty, for I thought the bribe of her being called Lady Macleod would be enough for any actress. As for this man Lemuel, no doubt he is a very great man, as people say; but I don't know much about these things myself; and — and — I think it is very plucky of Mrs. Ross to cut off two of her lions at one stroke. It shows she must have taken an uncommon liking for you. So you must cheer up, Macleod. If women take a fancy to you like that, you'll easily get a better wife than Miss White would have made. Mind you, I don't go back from anything I ever said of her. She is a handsome woman, and no mistake; and I will say that she is the best waltzer that I ever met with in the whole course of my life — without exception. But she's the sort of woman who, if I married her, would want some looking after — I mean, that is my impression. The fact is, Macleod, away there in Mull you have been brought up too much on books and your own imagination. You were ready to believe any pretty woman, with soft English ways, an angel. Well, you have had a twister; but you'll come through it; and you will get to believe, after all, that women are very good creatures, just as men are very good creatures, when you get the right sort. Come now, Macleod, pull yourself together. Perhaps I have just as hard an opinion of her conduct toward you as you have yourself. But you know what Tommy Moore, or some fellow like that, says: 'Though she be not fair to me, what the devil care I how fair she be?' And if I were you I would have a drop of brandy — but not half a tumblerful."

But neither Lieutenant Ogilvie's pert common sense, nor his apt and accurate quotation, nor his proffered brandy, seemed to alter much the mood of this haggard-faced man. He rose.

"I think I am going now," said he, in a low voice. "You won't take it unkindly, Ogilvie, that I don't stop to talk with you. It is a strange story you have told me.— I want time to think over it. Good-by."

"The fact is, Macleod," Ogilvie stammered, as he regarded his friend's face, "I don't like to leave you. Won't you stay and dine with our fellows? Or shall I see if I can run up to London with you?"

"No, thank you, Ogilvie," said he. "And have you any message for the mother and Janet?"

"Oh, I hope you will remember me most kindly to them. At least I will go to the station with you, Macleod."

"Thank you, Ogilvie; but I would rather go alone. Good-by, now."

He shook hands with his friend — in an absent sort of way — and left. But while yet his hand was on the door, he turned and said, —

"Oh, do you remember my gun that has the shot barrel and the rifle barrel?"

"Yes, certainly."

"And would you like to have that, Ogilvie? — we sometimes had it when we were out together."

"Do you think I would take your gun from you, Macleod?" said the other. "And you will soon have plenty of use for it now."

"Good-by, then, Ogilvie," said he; and he left, and went out into the world of rain and lowering skies and darkening moors.

And when he went back to Dare it was a wet day also; but he was very cheerful; and he had a friendly word for all whom he met; and he told the mother and Janet that he had got home at last, and meant to go no more a-roving. But that evening, after dinner, when Donald began to play the lament for the memory of the five sons of Dare, Macleod gave a sort of stifled cry, and there were tears running down his cheeks — which was a strange thing for a man; and he rose and left the hall, just as a woman would have done.

And his mother sat there, cold, and pale, and trembling; but the gentle cousin Janet called out, with a piteous trouble in her eyes, —

"Oh, auntie, have you seen the look on our Keith's face ever since he came ashore to-day?"

"I know it, Janet," said she. "I have seen it. That woman has broken his heart — and he is the last of my six brave lads."

They could not speak any more now; for Donald had come up the hall; and he was playing the wild, sad wail of the "Cumhadh na Cloinne."

CHAPTER XLI.

A LAST HOPE.

THOSE sleepless nights of passionate yearning and despair, those days of sullen gloom broken only by wild cravings for revenge that went through his brain like spasms of fire, these were killing this man. His face grew haggard and gray; his eyes morose and hopeless; he shunned people as if he feared their scrutiny; he brooded over the past in a silence he did not wish to have broken by any human voice. This was no longer Macleod of Dare. It was the wreck of a man — drifting no one knew whither.

And in those dark and morbid reveries there was no longer any bewilderment. He saw clearly how he had been tricked and played with. He understood now the coldness she had shown on coming to Dare; her desire to get away again; her impatience with his appeals; her anxiety that communication between them should be solely by letter. "Yes, yes," he would say to himself — and sometimes he would laugh aloud in the solitude of the hills — "she was prudent. She was a woman of the world, as Stuart used to say. She would not quite throw me off — she would not be quite frank with me — until she had made sure of the other. And in her trouble of doubt, when she was trying to be better than herself, and anxious to have guidance, that was the guide she turned to — the woman-man, the dabbler in paint-boxes, the critic of carpets and wall-papers!"

Sometimes he grew to hate her. She had destroyed the world for him. She had destroyed his faith in the honesty and honor of womanhood. She had played with him as with a toy — a fancy of the brain — and threw him aside when something new was presented to her. And when a man is stung by a white adder, does he not turn and stamp with his heel? Is he not bound to crush the creature out of existence, to keep God's earth and the free sunlight sweet and pure?

But then — but then — the beauty of her! In dreams he heard her low, sweet laugh again; he saw the beautiful brown hair; he surrendered to the irresistible witchery of the clear and lovely eyes. What would not a man give for one last, wild kiss of the laughing and half-parted lips? His life? And if that life happened to be a mere broken and useless thing — a hateful thing — would he not gladly and proudly fling it away? One long, lingering, despairing kiss; and then a deep draught of Death's black wine!

One day he was riding down to the fishing station when he met John MacIntyre the postman, who handed him a letter, and passed on. Macleod opened this letter with some trepidation, for it was from London; but it was in Norman Ogilvie's handwriting.

"DEAR MACLEOD, — I thought you might like to hear the latest news. I cut the inclosed from a sort of half-sporting, half-theatrical paper our fellows get; no doubt the paragraph is true enough. And I wish it was well over and done with, and she married out of hand; for I know until that is so, you will be torturing yourself with all sorts of projects and fancies. Good-by, old fellow. I suppose when you offered me the gun, you thought your life had collapsed altogether, and that you would have no further use for anything. But no doubt, after the first shock, you have thought better of that. How are the birds? I hear rather bad accounts from Ross; but then he is always complaining about something.

"Yours sincerely,

"NORMAN OGILVIE."

And then he unfolded the newspaper cutting which Ogilvie had inclosed. The paragraph of gossip announced that the Piccadilly Theatre would shortly be closed for repairs; but that the projected provincial tour of the company had been abandoned. On the reopening of the theatre, a play, which was now in preparation, written by Mr. Gregory Lemuel, would be produced. "It is understood," continued the newsman, "that Miss Gertrude White, the young and gifted actress who has been the chief attraction at the Piccadilly Theatre for two years back, is shortly to be married to Mr. L. Lemuel, the well-known artist; but the public have no reason to fear the withdrawal from the stage of so popular a favorite; for she has consented to take the chief rôle in the new play, which is said to be of a tragic nature."

Macleod put the letter and its enclosure into his pocket, and rode on. The hand that held the bridle shook somewhat; that was all.

He met Hamish.

"Oh, Hamish!" he cried, quite gayly. "Hamish, will you go to the wedding?"

"What wedding, sir?" said the old man; but well he knew. If there was any one blind to what had been going on, that was not Hamish; and again and again he had in his heart cursed the English traitoress who had destroyed his master's peace.

"Why, do you not remember the English lady that was here not so long ago? And she is going to be married. And would you like to go to the wedding, Hamish?"

He scarcely seemed to know what he was saying in this wild way; there was a strange look in his eyes, though apparently he was very merry. And this was the first word he had uttered about Gertrude White to any living being at Dare ever since his last return from the south.

Now what was Hamish's answer to this gay invitation? The Gaelic tongue is almost devoid of those meaningless expletives which, in other languages, express mere annoyance or temper. When a Highlander swears, he usually swears in English. But the Gaelic curse is a much more solemn and deliberate affair.

"May her soul dwell in the lowermost hall of perdition!" — that was the answer that Hamish made; and there was a blaze of anger in the keen eyes and in the proud and handsome face.

"Oh yes," continued the old man in his native tongue, and he spoke rapidly and passionately, "I am only a serving-man; and perhaps a serving-man ought not to speak; but perhaps sometimes he will speak. And have I not seen it all, Sir Keith? — and no more of the pink letters coming; and you going about a changed man, as if there was nothing more in life for you? And now you ask me if I will go to the wedding! And what do I say to you, Sir Keith? I say this to you — that the woman is not now living who will put that shame on Macleod of Dare!"

Macleod regarded the old man's angry vehemence almost indifferently: he had grown to pay little heed to anything around him.

"Oh yes, it is a fine thing for the English lady," said Hamish, with the same proud fierceness, "to come here and amuse herself. But she does not know the Mull men yet. Do you think, Sir Keith, that any one of your forefathers would have had this shame put upon him? I think not. I think he would have said, 'Come, lads, here is a proud madam that does not know that a man's will is stronger than a woman's will; and we will teach her a lesson. And before she has learned that lesson, she will discover that it is not safe to trifle with a Macleod of Dare.' And you ask me if I will go to the wedding! I have known you since you were a child, Sir Keith, and I put the first gun in your hand, and I saw you catch your first salmon; it is not right to laugh at an old man."

"Laughing at you, Hamish? I gave you an invitation to a wedding."

"And if I was going to that wedding," said Hamish, with a return of that fierce light to the gray eyes, "do you know how I would go to the wedding? I would take two or three of the young lads with me. We would make a fine party for the wedding. Oh yes; a fine party! And if the English church is a fine church, can we not take off our caps as well as any one? But when the pretty madam came in, I would say to myself, 'Oh yes, my fine madam, you forgot it was a Macleod you had to deal with, and not a child, and you did not think you would have a visit from two or three of the Mull lads?'"

"And what then?" Macleod said, with a smile — though this picture of his sweetheart coming into the church as the bride of another man had paled his cheek.

"And before she had brought that shame on the house of Dare," said Hamish excitedly, "do you not think that I would seize her — that I would seize her with my own hands? And when the young lads and I had thrust her down into the cabin of the yacht — oh yes, when we had thrust her down and put the hatch over — do you think the proud madam would be quite so proud?"

Macleod laughed a loud laugh.

"Why, Hamish, you want to become a famous person! You would carry off a popular actress, and have all the country ringing with the exploit! And would you have a piper, too, to drown her screams — just as Macdonald of Armadale did when he came with his men to South Uist and carried off Flora Macdonald's mother?"

"And was there ever a better marriage than that — as I have heard many a man of Skye say?" Hamish exclaimed eagerly. "Oh yes, it is good for a woman to know that a man's will is stronger than a woman's will! And when we have the fine English madam caged up in the cabin, and we are coming away to the north again, she will not have so many fine airs, I think. And if the will cannot be broken, it is the neck that can be broken; and better that than that Sir Keith Macleod should have a shame put on him."

"Hamish, Hamish, how will you dare to go into the church at Salen next Sunday?" Macleod said; but he was now regarding the old man with a strange curiosity.

"Men were made before churches were thought of," Hamish said curtly; and then Macleod laughed, and rode on.

The laugh soon died away from his face. Here was the stone bridge on which she used to lean to drop pebbles into the whirling clear water. Was there not some impression even yet of her soft warm arm on the velvet moss? And what had the voice of the streamlet told him in the days long ago? — that the summer-time was made for happy lovers; that she was coming; that he should take her hand and show her the beautiful islands and the sunlit seas before the darkening skies of the winter came over them. And here was the summer sea; and moist, warm odors were in the larch wood; and out there Ulva was shining green, and there was sunlight on the islands and on the rocks of Erisgeir. But she — where was she? Perhaps standing before a mirror, with a dress all of white, and trying how orange blossoms would best lie in her soft brown hair. Her arms are uplifted to her head; she smiles: could not one suddenly seize her now by the waist, and bear her off, with the smile changed to a blanched look of fear? The wild pirates have got her; the rose-leaf is crushed in the cruel northern hands; at last — at last — what is in the scabbard has been drawn and declared, and she screams in her terror!

Then he fell to brooding again over Hamish's mad scheme. The fine English church of Hamish's imagination was no doubt a little stone building that a handful of sailors could carry at a rush. And of course the yacht must needs be close by; for there was no land in Hamish's mind that was out of sight of the salt-water. And what consideration would this old man have for delicate fancies and studies in moral science? The fine madam had been chosen to be the bride of Macleod of Dare; that was enough. If her will would not bend, it would have to be broken. That was the good old way: was there ever a happier wife than the lady of Armadale, who had been carried screaming down-stairs in the night-time, and placed in her lover's boat, with the pipes playing a wild pibroch all the time?

Macleod was in the library that night when Hamish came to him with some papers. And just as the old man was about to leave, Macleod said to him, —

"Well, that was a pretty story you told me this morning, Hamish, about the carrying off of the young English lady. And have you thought any more about it?"

"I have thought enough about it," Hamish said in his native tongue.

"Then perhaps you could tell me, when you start on this fine expedition, how you are going to have the yacht taken to London? The lads of Mull are very clever, Hamish, I know; but do you think that any one of them can steer the 'Umpire' all the way from Loch-na-Keal to the river Thames?"

"Is it the river Thames?" said Hamish, with great contempt. "And is that all — the river Thames? Do you know this, Sir Keith, that my cousin Colin Laing, that has a whiskey shop now in Greenock, has been all over the world, and at China, and other places; and he was the mate of many a big vessel; and do you think he could not take the 'Umpire' from Loch-na-Keal to London? And I would only have to send a line to him and say, 'Colin, it is Sir Keith Macleod himself that will want you to do this;' and then he will leave twenty or thirty shops — ay, fifty and a hundred shops — and think no more of them at all. Oh yes, it is very true what you say, Sir Keith. There is no one knows better than I the soundings of Loch Scridain and Loch Tua; and you have said yourself that there is not a bank or a rock about the islands that I do not know; but I have not been to London. No, I have not been to London. But is there any great trouble in getting to London? No, none at all, when we have Colin Laing on board."

Macleod was apparently making a gay joke of the matter; but there was an anxious, intense look in his eyes all the same — even when he was staring absently at the table before him. "Oh yes, Hamish," he said, laughing in a constrained manner, "that would be a fine story to tell; and you would become very famous — just as if you were working for fame in a theatre; and all the people would be talking about you. And when you got to London, how would you get through the London streets?"

"It is my cousin who would show me the way: has he not been to London more times than I have been to Stornoway?"

"But the streets of London — they would cover all the ground between here and Loch Scridain; and how would you carry the young lady through them?"

"We would carry her," said Hamish curtly.

"With the bagpipes to drown her screams?"

"I would drown her screams myself," said Hamish, with a sudden savageness; and he added something that Macleod did not hear.

"Do you know that I am a magistrate, Hamish?"

"I know, Sir Keith."

"And when you come to me with this proposal, do you know what I should do?"

"I know what the old Macleods of Dare would have done," said Hamish proudly, "before they let this shame come on them. And you, Sir Keith — you are a Macleod too; ay, and the bravest lad that ever was born in Castle Dare! And you will not suffer this thing any longer, Sir Keith; for it is a sore heart I have from the morning till the night; and it is only a serving-man that I am; but sometimes when I will see you going about — and nothing now cared for, but a great trouble on your face — oh, then, I say to myself, 'Hamish, you are an old man, and you have not long to live; but before you die you will teach the fine English madam what it is to bring a shame on Sir Keith Macleod!'"

"Ah, well, good-night now, Hamish; I am tired," he said; and the old man slowly left.

He was tired — if one might judge by the haggard cheeks and the heavy eyes; but he did not go to sleep. He did not even go to bed. He spent the livelong night, as he had spent too many lately, in nervously pacing to and fro within this hushed chamber, or seated with his arms on the table, and the aching head resting on the clasped hands. And again those wild visions came to torture him — the product of a sick heart and a bewildered brain; only now there was a new element introduced. This mad project of Hamish's, at which he would have laughed in a saner mood, began to intertwist itself with all these passionate longings and these troubled dreams of what might yet be possible to him on earth; and wherever he turned it was suggested to him; and whatever was the craving and desire of the moment, this, and this only, was the way to reach it. For if one were mad with pain, and determined to crush the white adder that had stung one, what better way than to seize the hateful thing and cage it, so that it should do no more harm among the sons of men? Or if one were mad because of the love of a beautiful white princess, and she far away, and dressed in bridal robes, what better way than to take her hand, and say, "Quick, quick, to the shore! For the summer seas are waiting for you; and there is a home for the bride far away in the north?" Or if it was only one wild despairing effort — one last means of trying — to bring her heart back again? Or if there was but the one fierce captured kiss of those lips no longer laughing at all? Men had ventured more for far less reward, surely? And what remained to him in life but this? There was at least the splendid joy of daring and action!

The hours passed; and sometimes he fell into troubled sleep as he sat with his head bent on his hands — but then it was only to see those beautiful pictures of her that made his heart ache all the more. And sometimes he saw her all in sailor-like white and blue, as she was stepping down from the steamer; and sometimes he saw the merry duchess coming forward through the ballroom, with her saucy eyes and her laughing and parted lips; and sometimes he saw her before a mirror; and again she smiled — but his heart would fain have cried aloud in its anguish. Then again he would start up, and look at the window. Was he impatient for the day?

The lamp still burned in the hushed chamber. With trembling fingers he took out the letter Ogilvie had written to him, and held the slip of printed paper before his bewildered gaze. "The young and gifted actress." She is "shortly to be married." And the new piece that all the world will come to see, as soon as she is returned from her wedding tour, is "of a tragic nature."

Hamish, Hamish, do you hear these things? Do you know what they mean? Oh, we will have to look sharp if we are to be there in time! Come along, you brave lads; it is not the first time that a Macleod has carried off a bride. And will she cry, do you think — for we have no pipes to drown her screams? Ah, but we will manage it another way than that, Hamish! You have no cunning, you old man! There will be no scream when the white adder is seized and caged.

But surely no white adder! O sweetheart, you gave me a red rose! And do you remember the night in the garden, with the moonlight around us, and the favor you wore next your heart was the badge of the Macleods? You were not afraid of the Macleods then; you had no fear of the rude northern people; you said they would not crush a pale rose-leaf. And now — now — see! I have rescued you; and those people will persuade you no longer; I have taken you away — you are free! And will you come up on deck now, and look around on the summer sea? And shall we put in to some port, and telegraph that the runaway bride is happy enough; and that they will hear of her next from Castle Dare? Look around, sweetheart: surely you know the old boat. And here is Christina to wait on you; and Hamish — Hamish will curse you no more — he will be your friend now. Oh, you will make the mother's heart glad at last: she has not smiled for many a day.

Or is it the proud madam that is below, Hamish; and she will not speak; and she sits alone in all her finery? And what are we to do with her now, then — to break her will? Do you think she will speak when she is in the midst of the silence of the northern seas? Or will they be after us, Hamish? Oh, that would be a fine chase, indeed; and we would lead them a fine dance through the western isles; and I think you would try their knowledge of the channels and the banks. And the painter fellow, Hamish, the woman-man, the dabbler — would he be in the boat behind us? — or would he be down below, in bed in the cabin, with a nurse to attend him? Come along, then! — but beware of the overfalls off Tiree, you southern men! Or is it a race for Barra Head, and who will be at Vatersay first? There is good fishing-ground on the Sgriobh bhan, Hamish; they may as well stop to fish as seek to catch us among our western isles. See, the dark is coming down, are these the Monach lights in the north? — Hamish, Hamish, we are on the rocks, and there is no one to help her! Oh, sweetheart! — sweetheart! ——

The brief fit of struggling sleep is over; he rises and goes to the window; and now, if he is impatient for the new day, behold! the new day is here. Oh, see how the wan light of the morning meets the wan face! It is the face of a man who has been close to death; it is the face of a man who is desperate. And if, after the terrible battle of the night, with its uncontrollable yearning and its unbearable pain, the fierce and bitter resolve is taken? — if there remains but this one last despairing venture for all that made life worth having? How wildly the drowning man clutches at this or that, so only that he may breathe for yet a moment more! He knows not what miracle may save him; he knows not where there is any land; but only to live — only to breathe for another moment — that is his cry. And then, mayhap, amid the wild whirl of waves, if he were suddenly to catch sight of the shore, and think that he was getting near to that, and see awaiting him there a white princess, with a smile on her lips and a red rose in her outstretched hand, would he not make one last convulsive effort before the black waters dragged him down?

CHAPTER XLII.

THE WHITE-WINGED DOVE.

THE mere thought of this action, swift, immediate, impetuous, seemed to give relief to the burning brain. He went outside, and walked down to the shore; all the world was asleep; but the day had broken fair and pleasant, and the sea was calm and blue. Was not that a good omen? After all, then, there was still the wild, glad hope that Fionaghal might come and live in her northern home; the summer days had not gone forever; they might still find a red rose for her bosom at Castle Dare.

And then he tried to deceive himself. Was not this a mere lover's stratagem? Was not all fair in love as in war? Surely she would forgive him, for the sake of the great love he bore her, and the happiness he would try to bring her all the rest of her life? And no sailor, he would take care, would lay his rough hand on her gentle arm. That was the folly of Hamish. There was no chance in these days for a band of northern pirates to rush into a church and carry off a screaming bride. There were other ways than that; gentler ways; and the victim of the conspiracy — why, she would only laugh in the happy after-time and be glad that he had succeeded. And meanwhile he rejoiced that so much had to be done. Oh yes, there was plenty to think about now, other than those terrible visions of the night. There was work to do; and the cold sea air was cooling the fevered brain, so that it all seemed pleasant and easy and glad. There was Colin Laing to be summoned from Greenock, and questioned. The yacht had to be provisioned for a long voyage. He had to prepare the mother and Janet for his going away. And might not Norman Ogilvie find out somehow when the marriage was to be, so that he would know how much time was left him?

But with all this eagerness and haste he kept whispering to himself counsels of caution and prudence. He dared not awaken her suspicion by professing too much forgiveness or friendliness. He wrote to her — with what a trembling hand he put down those words, Dear Gertrude, on paper, and how wistfully he regarded them! — but the letter was a proud and cold letter. He said that he had been informed she was about to be married; he wished to ascertain from herself whether that was true. He would not reproach her either with treachery or deceit; if this was true, passionate words would not be of much avail. But he would prefer to be assured, one way or another, by her own hand. That was the substance of the letter.

And then, the answer! He almost feared she would not write. But when Hamish himself brought that pink envelope to him, how his heart beat! And the old man stood there in silence, and with gloom on his face: was there to be, after all, no act of vengeance on her who had betrayed Macleod of Dare?

These few words seemed to have been written with unsteady fingers. He read them again and again. Surely there was no dark mystery within them?

"DEAR KEITH, — I cannot bear to write to you. I do not know how it has all happened. Forgive me, if you can; and forget me. G."

"Oh, Hamish," said he, with a strange laugh, "is it an easy thing to forget that you have been alive? That would be an easy thing, if one were to ask you? But is not Colin Laing coming here to-day?"

"Oh yes, Sir Keith," Hamish said, with his eyes lighting up eagerly, "he will be here with the 'Pioneer,' and I will send the boat out for him. Oh yes; and you are wanting to see him, Sir Keith?"

"Why, of course," Macleod said. "If we are going away on a long voyage, do we not want a good pilot?"

"And we are going, Sir Keith?" the old man said; and there was a look of proud triumph in the keen face.

"Oh, I do not know yet," Macleod said impatiently. "But you will tell Christina that if we are going away to the south, we may have lady visitors come on board some day or another; and she would be better than a young lass to look after them, and make them comfortable on board. And if there is any clothes or ribbons she may want from Salen, Donald can go over with the pony; and you will not spare any money, Hamish, for I will give you the money."

"Very well, sir."

"And you will not send the boat out to the 'Pioneer' till I give you a letter; and you will ask the clerk to be so kind as to post it for me to-night at Oban; and he must not forget that."

"Very well, sir," said Hamish; and he left the room, with a determined look about his lips, but with a glad light in his eyes.

This was the second letter that Macleod wrote; and he had to keep whispering to himself, "Caution! caution!" or he would have broken into some wild appeal to his sweetheart far away: —

"DEAR GERTRUDE" (he wrote), — "I gather from your note that it is true you are going to be married. I had heard some time ago; so your letter was no great shock to me; and what I have suffered — well, that can be of no interest to you now, and it will do me no good to recall it. As to your message, I would forgive you freely; but how can I forget? Can you forget? Do you remember the red rose? But that is all over now, I suppose; and I should not wonder if I were, after all, to be able to obey you, and to forget very thoroughly, not that alone, but everything else. For I have been rather ill of late — more through sleeplessness than any other cause, I think; and they say I must go for a long sea-voyage; and the mother and Janet both say I should be more at home in the old 'Umpire' — with Hamish and Christina and my own people round me — than in a steamer; and so I may not hear of you again until you are separated from me forever. But I write now to ask you if you would like your letters returned, and one or two keepsakes, and the photographs: I would not like them to fall into other hands; and sometimes I feel so sick at heart that I doubt whether I shall ever again get back to Dare. There are some flowers, too; but I would ask to be allowed to keep them, if you have no objection — and the sketch of Ulva, that you made on the deck of the 'Umpire' when we were coming back from Iona, I would like to keep that, if you have no objection. And I remain your faithful friend,

"KEITH MACLEOD."

Now at the moment he was writing this letter Lady Macleod and her niece were together, the old lady at her spinning-wheel, the younger one sewing. And Janet Macleod was saying, —

"Oh, auntie, I am so glad Keith is going away now in the yacht; and you must not be vexed at all or troubled if he stays a long time; for what else can make him well again? Why, you know that he has not been Keith at all of late — he is quite another man — I do not think any one would recognize him. And surely there can be no better cure for sleeplessness than the rough work of the yachting; and you know Keith will take his share, in despite of Hamish; and if he goes away to the south, they will have watches, and he will take his watch with the others, and his turn at the helm. Oh, you will see the change when he comes back to us!"

The old lady's eyes had slowly filled with tears.

"And do you think it is sleeplessness, Janet," said she, "that is the matter with our Keith? Ah, but you know better than that, Janet."

Janet Macleod's face grew suddenly red; but she said hastily, —

"Why, auntie, have I not heard him walking up and down all the night, whether it was in his own room or in the library? And then he is out before any one is up: oh yes, I know that when you cannot sleep the face grows white and the eyes grow tired. And he has not been himself at all — going away like that from every one, and having nothing to say, and going away by himself over the moors. And it was the night before last he came back from Kinloch, and he was wet through, and he only lay down on the bed, as Hamish told me, and would have slept there all the night but for Hamish. And do you not think that was to get sleep at last — that he had been walking so far, and coming through the shallows of Loch Scridain, too? Ah, but you will see the difference, auntie, when he comes back on board the 'Umpire;' and we will go down to the shore, and we will be glad to see him that day."

"Oh yes, Janet," the old lady said, and the tears were running down her face; "but you know — you know. And if he had married you, Janet, and staid at home at Dare, there would have been none of all this trouble. And now — what is there now? It is the young English lady that has broken his heart; and he is no longer a son to me, and he is no longer your cousin, Janet, but a broken-hearted man that does not care for anything. And you are very kind, Janet; and you would not say any harm of any one. But I am his mother — I — I — well, if the woman was to come here this day, do you think I would not speak? It was a bad day for us all that he went away — instead of marrying you, Janet."

"But you know that could never have been, auntie," said the gentle-eyed cousin, though there was some conscious flush of pride in her cheeks. "I could never have married Keith."

"But why, Janet?"

"You have no right to ask me, auntie. But he and I — we did not care for each other — I mean, we never could have been married. I hope you will not speak about that any more, auntie."

"And some day they will take me, too, away from Dare," said the old dame, and the spinning-wheel was left unheeded; "and I cannot go into the grave with my five brave lads; for where are they all now, Janet? — in Arizona one, in Africa one, and two in the Crimea, and my brave Hector at Königgrätz. But that is not much: I shall be meeting them all together; and do you not think I shall be glad to see them all together again just as it was in the old days? and they will come to meet me; and they will be glad enough to have the mother with them once again. But Janet, Janet, how can I go to them? What will I say to them when they ask about Keith — about Keith, my Benjamin, my youngest, my handsome lad?"

The old woman was sobbing bitterly, and Janet went to her and put her arms round her, and said, —

"Why, auntie, you must not think of such things. You will send Keith away in low spirits if you have not a bright face and a smile for him when he goes away."

"But you do not know — you do not know," the old woman said, "what Keith has done for me. The others — oh yes, they were brave lads; and very proud of their name, too; and they would not disgrace their name wherever they went; and if they died, that is nothing, for they will be together again now; and what harm is there? But Keith, he was the one that did more than any of them; for he staid at home for my sake; and when other people were talking about this regiment and that regiment, Keith would not tell me what was sore at his heart; and never once did he say, 'Mother, I must go away like the rest,' though it was in his blood to go away. And what have I done now? — and what am I to say to his brothers when they come to ask me? I will say to them, 'Oh yes, he was the handsomest of all my six lads; and he had the proudest heart too; but I kept him at home.' And what came of it all? Would it not be better now that he was lying buried in the jungle of the Gold Coast, or at Königgrätz, or in the Crimea?"

"Oh, surely not, auntie! Keith will come back to us soon; and when you see him well and strong again, and when you hear his laugh about the house, surely you will not be wishing that he was in his grave? Why, what is the matter with you to-day, auntie?"

"The others did not suffer much, Janet; and to three of them anyway it was only — a bullet — a cry — and then the death-sleep of a brave man, and the grave of a Macleod. But Keith, Janet, he is my youngest; he is nearer to my heart than any of them: do you not see his face?"

"Yes, auntie," Janet Macleod said, in a low voice. "But he will get over that. He will come back to us strong and well."

"Oh yes, he will come back to us strong and well!" said the old lady, almost wildly; and she rose, and her face was pale. "But I think it is a good thing for that woman that my other sons are all away now; for they had quick tempers, those lads; and they would not like to see their brother murdered."

"Murdered, auntie!"

Lady Macleod would have answered in the same wild, passionate way, but at this very moment her son entered. She turned quickly; she almost feared to meet the look of this haggard face. But Keith Macleod said, quite cheerfully, —

"Well, now, Janet, and you will go round to-day to look at the 'Umpire?' And will you come too, mother? Oh, she is made very smart now; just as if we were all going away to see the queen."

"I cannot go to-day, Keith," said his mother; and she left the room before he had time to notice that she was strangely excited.

"And I think I will go some other day, Keith," his cousin said gently, "just before you start, that I may be sure you have not forgotten anything. And, of course, you will take the ladies' cabin, Keith, for yourself; for there is more light in that, and it is farther away from the smell of the cooking in the morning. And how can you be going to-day, Keith, when it is the man from Greenock will be here soon now?"

"Why, I forgot that, Janet," said he, laughing in a nervous way. "I forgot that, though I was talking to Hamish about him only a little while ago. And I think I might as well go out to meet the 'Pioneer' myself, if the boat has not left yet. Is there anything you would like to get from Oban, Janet?"

"No, nothing, thank you, Keith," said she; and then he left; and he was in time to get into the big sailing-boat before it went out to meet the steamer.

This cousin of Hamish, who jumped into the boat when Macleod's letter had been handed up to the clerk, was a little black-haired Celt, beady-eyed, nervous, but with the affectation of a sailor's bluffness, and he wore rings in his ears. However, when he was got ashore, and taken into the library, Macleod very speedily found out that the man had some fair skill in navigation, and that he had certainly been into a good number of ports in his lifetime. And if one were taking the 'Umpire' into the mouth of the Thames, now? Mr. Laing looked doubtfully at the general chart Macleod had; he said he would rather have a special chart which he could get at Greenock: for there were a great many banks about the mouth of the Thames; and he was not sure that he could remember the channel. And if one wished to go further up the river, to some anchorage in communication by rail with London? Oh yes, there was Erith. And if one would rather have moorings than an anchorage, so that one might slip away without trouble when the tide and wind were favorable? Oh yes, there was nothing simpler than that. There were many yachts about Erith, and surely the pier-master could get the "Umpire" the loan of moorings. All through Castle Dare it was understood that there was no distinct destination marked down for the "Umpire" on this suddenly arranged voyage of hers; but all the same Sir Keith Macleod's inquiries went no further, at present at least, than the river Thames.

There came another letter, in dainty pink; and this time there was less trembling in the handwriting; and there was greater frankness in the wording of the note.

"DEAR KEITH" (Miss White wrote), — "I would like to have the letters; as for the little trifles you mention, it does not much matter. You have not said that you forgive me; perhaps it is asking too much; but believe me you will find some day it was all for the best. It is better now than later on. I had my fears from the beginning: did not I tell you that I was never sure of myself for a day? and I am sure papa warned me. I cannot make you any requital for the great generosity and forbearance you show to me now; but I would like to be allowed to remain your friend. G. W.

"P. S. — I am deeply grieved to hear of your being ill, but hope it is only something quite temporary. You could not have decided better than on taking a long sea-voyage. I hope you will have fine weather."

All this was very pleasant. They had got into the region of correspondence again; and Miss White was then mistress of the situation. His answer to her was less cheerful in tone. It ran thus: —

"DEAR GERTRUDE,—To-morrow morning I leave Dare. I have made up your letters, etc., in a packet; but as I would like to see Norman Ogilvie before going farther south, it is possible we may run into the Thames for a day; and so I have taken the packet with me, and, if I see Ogilvie, I will give it to him to put into your hands. And as this may be the last time that I shall ever write to you, I may tell you now there is no one anywhere more earnestly hopeful than I that you may live a long and happy life, not troubled by any thinking of what is past and irrevocable.

"Yours faithfully,
"KEITH MACLEOD."

So there was an end of correspondence. And now came this beautiful morning, with a fine northwesterly breeze blowing, and the "Umpire," with her mainsail and jib set, and her gay pennon and ensign fluttering in the wind, rocking gently down there at her moorings. It was an auspicious morning; of itself it was enough to cheer up a heartsick man. The white sea-birds were calling; and Ulva was shining green; and the Dutchman's Cap out there was of a pale purple-blue; while away in the south there was a vague silver mist of heat lying all over the Ross of Mull and Iona. And the proud lady of Castle Dare, and Janet, and one or two others more stealthily, were walking down to the pier to see Keith Macleod set sail; but Donald was not there — there was no need for Donald or his pipes on board the yacht. Donald was up at the house, and looking at the people going down to the quay, and saying bitterly to himself, "It is no more thought of the pipes now that Sir Keith has, ever since the English lady was at Dare; and he thinks I am better at work in looking after the dogs."

Suddenly Macleod stopped, and took out a pencil, and wrote something on a card.

"I was sure I had forgotten something, Janet," said he. "That is the address of Johnny Wickes' mother. We were to send him up to see her some time before Christmas."

"Before Christmas!" Janet exclaimed; and she looked at him in amazement. "But you are coming back before Christmas, Keith?"

"Oh, well, Janet," said he carelessly, "you know that when one goes away on a voyage, it is never certain about your coming back at all; and it is better to leave everything right."

"But you are not going away from us with thoughts like these in your head, surely?" the cousin said. "Why, the man from Greenock says you could go to America in the 'Umpire;' and if you could go to America, there will not be much risk in the calmer seas of the south. And you know, Keith, auntie and I don't want you to trouble about writing letters to us; for you will have enough trouble in looking after the yacht; but you will send us a telegram from the various places you put into."

"Oh yes, I will do that," said he, somewhat absently. Even the bustle of departure and the brightness of the morning had failed to put color and life into the haggard face and the hopeless eyes.

That was a sorrowful leave-taking at the shore; and Macleod, standing on the deck of the yacht, could see, long after they had set sail, that his mother and cousin were still on the small quay watching the "Umpire" so long as she was in sight. Then they rounded the Ross of Mull; and he saw no more of the women of Castle Dare.

And this beautiful white-sailed vessel that is going south through the summer seas: surely she is no deadly instrument of vengeance, but only a messenger of peace? Look, now, how she has passed through the sound of Iona; and the white sails are shining in the light; and far away before her, instead of the islands with which she is familiar, are other islands — another Colonsay altogether, and Islay, and Jura, and Scarba, all a pale transparent blue. And what will the men on the lonely Dubh Artach rock think of her as they see her pass by? Why, surely that she looks like a beautiful white dove. It is a summer day; the winds are soft; fly south, then, white dove, and carry to her this message of tenderness and entreaty, and peace! Surely the gentle ear will listen to you; before the winter comes, and the skies grow dark overhead, and there is no white dove at all, but an angry sea-eagle, with black wings outspread, and talons ready to strike. Oh, what is the sound in the summer air? Is it the singing of the sea-maiden of Colonsay, bewailing still the loss of her lover in other years? We cannot stay to listen: the winds are fair. Fly southward, and still southward, O you beautiful white dove, and it is all a message of love and of peace that you will whisper to her ear!

CHAPTER XLIII.

DOVE OR SEA-EAGLE?

BUT there are no fine visions troubling the mind of Hamish as he stands here by the tiller in eager consultation with Colin Laing, who has a chart outspread before him on the deck. There is pride in the old man's face. He is proud of the performance of the yacht he has sailed for so many years; and proud of himself for having brought her — always subject to the advice of his cousin from Greenock — in safety through the salt sea to the smooth waters of the great river. And indeed this is a strange scene for the "Umpire" to find around her in the years of her old age. For instead of the giant cliffs of Gribun and Bourg, there is only the thin green line of the Essex coast; and instead of the rushing Atlantic, there is the broad smooth surface of this coffee-colored stream, splashed with blue where the ripples catch the reflected light of the sky. There is no longer the solitude of Ulva and Colonsay, or the moaning of the waves round the lonely shores of Fladda, and Staffa, and the Dutchman; but the eager, busy life of the great river — a black steamer puffing and roaring, russet-sailed barges going smoothly with the tide, a tug bearing a large green-hulled Italian ship through the lapping waters, and everywhere a swarming fry of small boats of every description. It is a beautiful summer morning, though there is a pale haze lying along the Essex woods. The old "Umpire," with the salt foam of the sea incrusted on her bows, is making her first appearance in the Thames.

"And where are we going, Hamish," says Colin Laing, in the Gaelic, "when we leave this place?"

"When you are told, then you will know," says Hamish.

"You had enough talk of it last night in the cabin. I thought you were never coming out of the cabin," says the cousin from Greenock.

"And if I have a master, I obey my master without speaking," Hamish answers.

"Well, it is a strange master you have got. Oh, you do not know about these things, Hamish. Do you know what a gentleman who has a yacht would do when he got into Gravesend as we got in last night? Why, he would go ashore, and have his dinner in a hotel, and drink four or five different kinds of wine, and go to the theatre. But your master, Hamish, what does he do? He stays on board, and sends ashore for time-tables and such things; and, what is more than that, he is on deck all night, walking up and down. Oh yes, I heard him walking up and down all night, with the yacht lying at anchor."

"Sir Keith is not well. When a man is not well he does not act in an ordinary way. But you talk of my master," Hamish answered proudly. "Well, I will tell you about my master, Colin — that he is a better master than any ten thousand masters that ever were born in Greenock, or in London either. I will not allow any man to say anything against my master."

"I was not saying anything against your master. He is a wiser man than you, Hamish. For he was saying to me last night, 'Now when I am sending Hamish to such and such places in London, you must go with him, and show him the trains, and cabs, and other things like that.' Oh yes, Hamish, you know how to sail a yacht, but you do not know anything about towns."

"And who would want to know anything about towns? Are they not full of people who live by telling lies and cheating each other?"

"And do you say that is how I have been able to buy my house at Greenock," said Colin Laing, angrily, "with a garden and a boat-house too?"

"I do not know about that," said Hamish; and then he called out some order to one of the men. Macleod was at this moment down in the saloon, seated at the table, with a letter inclosed and addressed lying before him. But surely this was not the same man who had been in these still waters of the Thames in the bygone days, with gay companions around him, and the band playing "A Highland lad my love was born," and a beautiful-eyed girl, whom he called Rose-Leaf, talking to him in the quiet of the summer afternoon? This man had a look in his eyes like that of an animal that has been hunted to death and is fain to lie down and give itself up to its pursuers in the despair of utter fatigue. He was looking at this letter. The composition of it had cost him only a whole night's agony. And when he sat down and wrote it in the blue-gray dawn, what had he not cast away?

"Oh no," he was saying now to his own conscience, "she will not call it deceiving! She will laugh when it is all over; she will call it a stratagem; she will say that a drowning man will catch at any thing. And this is the last effort — but it is only a stratagem: she herself will absolve me — when she laughs and says, 'Oh, how could you have treated the poor theatres so?'"

A loud rattling overhead startled him.

"We must be at Erith," he said to himself; and then, after a pause of a second, he took the letter in his hand. He passed up the companion-way; perhaps it was the sudden glare of the light around that falsely gave to his eyes the appearance of a man who had been drinking hard. But his voice was clear and precise as he said to Hamish, —

"Now Hamish, you understand everything I have told you?"

"Oh yes, Sir Keith."

"And you will put away that nonsense from your head; and when you see the English lady that you remember, you will be very respectful to her, for she is a very great friend of mine; and if she is not at the theatre, you will go on to the other address, and Colin Laing will go with you in the cab. And if she comes back in the cab, you and Colin will go outside beside the driver, do you understand? And when you go ashore you will take John Cameron with you, and you will ask the pier-master about the moorings."

"Oh yes, Sir Keith; have you not told me before?" Hamish said, almost reproachfully.

"You are sure you got everything on board last night?"

"There is nothing more that I can think of, Sir Keith."

"Here is the letter, Hamish."

And so he pledged himself to the last desperate venture.

Not long after that Hamish and Laing and John Cameron went in the dingey to the end of Erith pier, and left the boat there; and went along to the head of the pier, and had a talk with the pier-master. Then John Cameron went back, and the other two went on their way to the railway station.

"And I will tell you this, Hamish," said the little black Celt, who swaggered a good deal in his walk, "that when you go in the train you will be greatly frightened. For you do not know how strong the engines are, and how they will carry you through the air."

"That is a foolish thing to say," answered Hamish, also speaking in the Gaelic. "For I have seen many pictures of trains; and do you say that the engines are bigger than the engines of the 'Pioneer,' or the 'Dunara Castle,' or the 'Clansman' that goes to Stornoway? Do not talk such nonsense to me. An engine that runs along the road, that is a small matter; but an engine that can take you up the Sound of Sleat, and across the Minch, and all the way to Stornoway, that is an engine to be talked about!"

But nevertheless it was with some inward trepidation that Hamish approached Erith station; and it was with an awe-struck silence that he saw his cousin take tickets at the office; nor did he speak a word when the train came up, and they entered and sat down in the carriage. Then the train moved off, and Hamish breathed more freely: what was this to be afraid of?

"Did I not tell you you would be frightened?" Colin Laing said.

"I am not frightened at all," Hamish anwered indignantly.

But as the train began to move more quickly, Hamish's hands, that held firmly by the wooden seat on which he was sitting, tightened and still further tightened their grasp, and his teeth got clenched, while there was an anxious look in his eyes. At length, as the train swung into a good pace, his fear got the better of him, and he called out, —

"Colin — Colin — she's run away!"

And then Colin Laing laughed aloud, and began to assume great airs, and told Hamish that he was no better than a lad kept for herding the sheep who had never been away from his own home. This familiar air reassured Hamish; and then the train stopping at Abbey Wood proved to him that the engine was still under control.

"Oh yes, Hamish," continued his travelled cousin, "you will open your eyes when you see London; and you will tell all the people when you go back that you have never seen so great a place; but what is London to the cities and the towns and the palaces that I have seen? Did you ever hear of Valparaiso, Hamish? Oh yes, you will live a long time before you will get to Valparaiso! And Rio: why, I have known mere boys that have been to Rio. And you can sail a yacht very well, Hamish; and I do not grumble that you would be the master of the yacht — though I know the banks and the channels a little better than you; and it was quite right of you to be the master of the yacht; but you have not seen what I have seen. And I have been where there are mountains and mountains of gold ——"

"Do you take me for a fool, Colin?" said Hamish, with a contemptuous smile.

"Not quite that," said the other; "but am I not to believe my own eyes?"

"And if there were the great mountains of gold," said Hamish, "why did you not fill your pockets with the gold; and would not that be better than selling whiskey in Greenock?"

"Yes; and that shows what an ignorant man you are, Hamish," said the other, with disdain. "For do you not know that the gold is mixed with quartz, and you have got to take the quartz out? But I dare say now you do not know what quartz is: for it is a very ignorant man you are, although you can sail a yacht. But I do not grumble at all. You are master of your own yacht, just as I am the master of my own shop. But if you were coming into my shop, Hamish, I would say to you, 'Hamish, you are the master here, and I am not the master; and you can take a glass of anything that you like.' That is what people who have travelled all over the world, and seen princes and great cities and palaces, call politeness. But how could you know any thing about politeness? You have lived only on the west coast of Mull, and they do not even know how to speak good Gaelic there."

"That is a lie, Colin," said Hamish, with decision. "We have better Gaelic there than any other Gaelic that is spoken."

"Were you ever in Lochaber, Hamish?"

"No, I was never in Lochaber."

"Then do not pretend to give an opinion about the Gaelic — especially to a man who has travelled all over the world, though perhaps he cannot sail a yacht as well as you, Hamish."

The two cousins soon became friends, again, however. And now, as they were approaching London, a strange thing became visible. The blue sky became more and more obscured. The whole world seemed to be enveloped in a clear brown haze of smoke.

"Ay, ay," said Hamish, "that is a strange thing."

"What is a strange thing, Hamish?"

"I was reading about it in a book many a time — the great fire that was burning in London for years and years and years: and have they not quite got it out yet, Colin?"

"I do not know what you are talking about, Hamish," said the other, who had not much book-learning, "but I will tell you this, that you may prepare yourself now to open your eyes. Oh yes, London will make you open your eyes wide, though it is nothing to one who has been to Rio, and Shanghai, and Rotterdam, and other places like that."

Now these references to foreign parts only stung Hamish's pride; and when they did arrive at London Bridge he was determined to show no surprise whatever. He stepped into the four-wheeled cab that Colin Laing chartered just as if four-wheeled cabs were as common as sea-gulls on the shores of Loch-na-Keal. And though his eyes were bewildered and his ears dinned with the wonderful sights and sounds of this great roaring city — that seemed to have the population of all the world pouring through its streets — he would say nothing at all. At last the cab stopped; the two men were opposite the Piccadilly Theatre.

Then Hamish got out and left his cousin with the cab. He ascended the wide steps; he entered the great vestibule; and he had a letter in his hand. The old man had not trembled so much since he was a schoolboy.

"What do you want, my man?" some one said, coming out of the box-office by chance.

Hamish showed the letter.

"I wass to hef an answer, sir, if you please, sir, and I will be opliged," said Hamish, who had been enjoined to be very courteous.

"Take it round to the stage entrance," said the man carelessly.

"Yes, sir, if you please, sir," said Hamish; but he did not understand; and he stood.

The man looked at him; called for some one; a young lad came; and to him was given the letter.

"You may wait here, then," said he to Hamish; "but I think rehearsal is over, and Miss White has most likely gone home."

The man went into the box-office again; Hamish was left alone there in the great empty vestibule. The Piccadilly Theatre had seldom seen within its walls a more picturesque figure than this old Highlandman, who stood there with his sailor's cap in his hand, and with a keen excitement in the proud and fine face. There was a watchfulness in the grey eyes like the watchfulness of an eagle. If he twisted his cap rather nervously, and if his heart beat quick, it was not from fear.

Now when the letter was brought to Miss White, she was standing in one of the wings, laughing and chatting with the stage-manager. The laugh went from her face. She grew quite pale.

"Oh, Mr. Cartwright," said she, "do you think I could go down to Erith and be back before six in the evening?"

"Oh yes; why not?" said he carelessly.

But she scarcely heard him. She was still staring at that sheet of paper, with its piteous cry of the sick man. Only to see her once more — to shake hands in token of forgiveness — to say good-by for the last time: what woman with the heart of a woman could resist this despairing prayer?

"Where is the man who brought this letter?" said she.

"In front, miss," said the young lad, "by the box-office."

Very quickly she made her way along the gloomy and empty corridors, and there in the twilit hall she found the gray-haired old sailor, with his cap held humbly in his hands.

"Oh, Hamish," said she, "is Sir Keith so very ill?"

"Iss it ill, mem?" said Hamish; and quick tears sprang to the old man's eyes. "He iss more ill than you can think of, mem; it iss another man that he iss now. Ay, ay, who would know him to be Sir Keith Macleod?"

"He wants me to go and see him — and I suppose I have no time to go home first ——"

"Here is the list of the trains, mem," said Hamish eagerly, producing a certain card. "And it iss me and Colin Laing, that'ss my cousin, mem; and we hef a cab outside; and will you go to the station? Oh, you will not know Sir Keith, mem; there iss no one at all would know my master now."

"Come along, then, Hamish," said she quickly. "Oh, but he cannot be so ill as that. And the long sea-voyage will pull him round, don't you think?"

"Ay, ay, mem," said Hamish; but he was paying little heed. He called up the cab; and Miss White stepped inside; and he and Colin Laing got on the box.

"Tell him to go quickly," she said to Hamish, "for I must have something instead of luncheon if we have a minute at the station."

And Miss White, as the cab rolled away, felt pleased with herself. It was a brave act.

"It is the least I can do for the sake of my bonnie Glenogie," she was saying to herself, quite cheerfully. "And if Mr. Lemuel were to hear of it? Well, he must know that I mean to be mistress of my own conduct. And so the poor Glenogie is really ill. I can do no harm in parting good friends with him. Some men would have made a fuss."

At the station they had ten minutes to wait; and Miss White was able to get the slight refreshment she desired. And although Hamish would fain have kept out of her way — for it was not becoming in a rude sailor to be seen speaking to so fine a lady — she would not allow that.

"And where are you going, Hamish, when you leave the Thames?" she asked, smoothing the fingers of the glove she had just put on again.

"I do not know that, mem," said he.

"I hope Sir Keith won't go to Torquay or any of those languid places. You will go to the Mediterranean, I suppose?"

"Maybe that will be the place, mem," said Hamish.

"Or the Isle of Wight, perhaps," said she carelessly.

"Ay, ay, mem — the Isle of Wight; that will be a ferry good place, now. There wass a man I wass seeing once in Tobermory, and he wass telling me about the castle that the queen herself will hef on that island. And Mr. Ross, the queen's piper, he will be living there too."

But of course they had to part company when the train came up; and Hamish and Colin Laing got into a third-class carriage together. The cousin from Greenock had been hanging rather in the background; but he had kept his ears open.

"Now, Hamish," said he, in the tongue in which they could both speak freely enough, "I will tell you something; and do not think I am an ignorant man; for I know what is going on. Oh, yes. And it is a great danger you are running into."

"What do you mean, Colin?" said Hamish; but he would look out of the window.

"When a gentleman goes away in a yacht, does he take an old woman like Christina with him? Oh no; I think not. It is not a customary thing. And the ladies' cabin; the ladies' cabin is kept very smart, Hamish. And I think I know who is to have the ladies' cabin."

"Then you are very clever, Colin," said Hamish contemptuously. "But it is too clever you are. You think it strange that the young English lady should take that cabin. I will tell you this — that it is not the first time nor the second time that the young English lady has gone for a voyage in the 'Umpire,' and in that very cabin too. And I will tell you this, Colin; that it is this very year she had that cabin; and was in Loch Tua, and Loch-na-Keal, and Loch Scridain, and Calgary Bay. And as for Christina — oh, it is much you know about fine ladies in Greenock! I tell you that an English lady cannot go anywhere without some one to attend to her."

"Hamish, do not try to make a fool of me," said Laing angrily. "Do you think a lady would go travelling without any luggage? And she does not know where the 'Umpire' is going!"

"Do you know?"

"No."

"Very well, then. It is Sir Keith Macleod who is the master when he is on board the 'Umpire,' and where he wants to go, the others have to go."

"Oh, do you think that? And do you speak like that to a man who can pay eighty-five pounds a year of rent?"

"No, I do not forget that it is a kindness to me that you are doing, Colin, and to Sir Keith Macleod too; and he will not forget it. But as for this young lady or that young lady, what has that to do with it? You know what the bell of Scoon said: 'That which concerns you not, meddle not with.'"

"I shall be glad when I am back in Greenock," said Colin Laing moodily.

But was not this a fine, fair scene that Miss Gertrude White saw around her when they came in sight of the river and Erith pier? — the flashes of blue on the water, the white-sailed yachts, the russet-sailed barges, and the sunlight shining all along the thin line of the Essex shore. The moment she set foot on the pier she recognized the "Umpire" lying out there, the great white mainsail and jib idly flapping in the summer breeze: but there was no one on deck. And she was not afraid at all; for had he not written in so kindly a fashion to her; and was she not doing much for his sake, too?

"Will the shock be great?" she was thinking to herself. "I hope my bonnie Glenogie is not so ill as that; for he always looked like a man. And it is so much better that we should part good friends."

She turned to Hamish.

"There is no one on the deck of the yacht, Hamish," said she.

"No, mem," said he, "the men will be at the end of the pier, mem, in the boat, if you please, mem."

"Then you took it for granted I should come back with you?" said she, with a pleasant smile.

"I wass thinking you would come to see Sir Keith, mem," said Hamish gravely. His manner was very respectful to the fine English lady; but there was not much of friendliness in his look.

She followed Hamish down the rude wooden steps at the end of the pier; and there they found the dingey awaiting them, with two men in her. Hamish was very careful of Miss White's dress as she got into the stern of the boat; then he and Colin Laing got into the bow; and the men half paddled and half floated her along to the "Umpire" — the tide having begun to ebb.

And it was with much ceremony, too, that Hamish assisted Miss White to get on board by the little gangway; and for a second or two she stood on deck and looked around her, while the men were securing the dingey. The idlers lounging on Erith pier must have considered that this was an additional feature of interest in the summer picture — the figure of this pretty young lady standing there on the white decks and looking around her with a pleased curiosity. It was some little time since she had been on board the "Umpire."

Then Hamish turned to her, and said, in the same respectful way, —

"Will you go below, mem, now? It iss in the saloon that you will find Sir Keith, and if Christina iss in the way, you will tell her to go away, mem."

The small gloved hand was laid on the top of the companion, and Miss White carefully went down the wooden steps. And it was with a gentleness equal to her own that Hamish shut the little doors after her.

But no sooner had she quite disappeared than the old man's manner swiftly changed. He caught hold of the companion hatch; jammed it across with a noise that was heard throughout the whole vessel; and then he sprang to the helm, with the keen gray eyes afire with a wild excitement.

"—— her, we have her now!" he said, between his teeth; and he called aloud: "Hold the jib to weather there! Off with the moorings, John Cameron! —— her, we have her now! — and it is not yet that she has put a shame on Macleod of Dare!"

From Fraser's Magazine.

AMONG THE BURMESE.

IV.

OF the many complex problems involved in the Eastern question, one of the most important is that of the government under an equitable code of laws of various races of men living side by side in the same country, holding different and perhaps hostile forms of religious belief, opposite moral and social theories, widely differing political traditions; and a consideration of the way in which this problem presents itself in a province of the Indian Empire cannot be without interest even apart from that which attaches to the particular territory which serves for an example. And there is perhaps none of the Indian provinces in which this subject is more remarkably illustrated than in that of British Burmah, a country open from end to end to immigrations by sea, while it seems to have formed a sort of cul de sac into which nation after nation, taking advantage of its system of great rivers, has wandered from the north by land, and formed settlements which to this day remain in great part perfectly distinct from one another. In no other province is there a more curious medley of foreign peoples congregated in the chief towns, while probably in none is the rural population composed of so many separate nationalities. The importance of each component part, moreover, is increased by the fact that the sum of all the races represented forms but a thin population, for with an area equal to that of Great Britain, British Burmah has a total population less than that of London alone. It is not intended here to propound any theory as to the best mode of dealing with such a state of things, or even to indicate the method followed by the English government; my object is only to bring home to the English reader one of the most obvious characteristics of the internal life of one of the least known of our Indian provinces, by briefly noticing the principal nationalities by which it is inhabited. It is well known that the population of every great town in the East consists of a vast mixture of races and creeds; and it is not so much to the motley gatherings of the Burmese seaports that I propose to draw attention, as to the numerous distinct peoples and tribes quietly settled in the interior of the country, sharing the same districts and living under identical laws, yet never interfering with one another, but each living a life almost as separate as the various tribes of fish or of birds.

A glance at the statistics of population annually published in the provincial administration reports, or even at the register of any school or jail or hospital in the country, would indicate the mixture of races as one of the marked characteristics of the province. For example, in some recent returns of the government high school at Rangoon, in a table which classifies the pupils according to race, no less than nine nationalities appear, and of these nine headings, more than one includes several distinct tribes. Naturally, in the central school of the province a large proportion of the attendance is supplied by foreigners temporarily resident at the capital; but it will be found that a similar mixture is represented in every large institution in the country, and we must go back to very early dates to account for the presence far inland, in long settled communities, of the important races which share the land with the Burmese.

To trace the steps by which this distribution of the country has come about, it would be necessary to wade through the sparse records of a history which, where it is trustworthy, is but a list of horrors, and in which it is almost a hopeless task to separate truth from falsehood. The stories of the cruel and barbarous wars of which Burmah has been the theatre in long-past years, and by which one petty kingdom supplanted another, only to give place in its turn to a stronger invader, have little interest in themselves, yet it is essential to study them if we would approach an explanation of the existence within this small area of races which to the present hour retain their individuality, each differing from the other in physique, in costume, in language, in social customs, and in national character.

Meantime, in attempting to present a sketch of popular life in a country so little known and visited, it is at least proper to point out what has been the ultimate result, down to the present day, of past wars and migrations, as shown in the present composition of the population. Burmese, Arakanese, Karens (in many tribes), Talines, Shans, Toungthoos, Khyins, and a succession of wild hill tribes — these constitute the chief components of the rural population; while not less familiar to every resident of Burmah is the presence of Chinese, Madrasees, Bengalis, Moguls, Parsees, Armenians, Jews, English, Germans, French, and Americans. This latter list being composed mainly of the representatives of well-known peoples, may be very briefly dismissed; but the more obscure peoples of the interior, whose origin is for the most part altogether unknown, and whose very presence is shrouded in mystery, will justify somewhat fuller treatment.

Of the population of the great towns the Chinese form a very large and important section, and in such towns as Rangoon and Moulmein, Chinamen sit with Europeans on municipal committees, and Chinese mercantile firms rank side by side with those of the English and Germans. Closely akin to the Burmese in race and religion, the Chinese immigrant usually marries a Burmese wife, and this element of the population has thus more of permanency than the rest. Massed in compact bodies in various quarters of a large town, the Chinese, orderly and industrious as they are for the most part, are also a source of some anxiety to the police. The community being divided into a number of social companies or guilds, each with its secret club, the faction fights of the Chinese are like a serious version of the student fights of a German university; while an inveterate passion for dice and for every form of gambling brings the Chinaman into constant conflict with the English law. Every kind of trade and mannfacture is followed by this plodding and hardworking people, the favorite being carpentry and house-building. The building trade is almost a Chinese monopoly, and whole streets are lined with the shops of Chinese carpenters, furniture-dealers, tailors, and shoemakers. Finally, nowhere is the national industry better exemplified than in the English schools, where the most promising scholar in a class is very commonly a Chinese boy whose patient perseverance is in strong contrast to the indolence of so many of his Burmese schoolfellows.

But though the most permanently linked with the Burmese population, the Chinese element is only one among many of no less importance. From a late official report we learn that, in a total provincial population of less than three millions, nearly one hundred thousand are Mahommedans, of whom a great part are foreigners, thirty-one thousand more are entered as Hindus, while a remarkable feature of the return is that of a total of thirty-two thousand Christians in the province, upwards of twenty-five thousand are natives. An analysis of this latter figure would show that the great majority are converts not from Budhism, but from the rude religious cult of the Karen tribes, a subject to which I shall recur hereafter. The Mahommedans, Parsees, Jews, and Armenians are for the most part merchants, traders, and petty shopkeepers, while the Hindus are absorbed by every variety of employment. The Madrassee money-lenders of Rangoon have a thriving trade, and, though living in miserable hovels, are among the richest inhabitants of the whole province; while here, as in India, the clerical work of nearly every public or mercantile office is largely done by Hindus from Madras or Bengal, educated in English schools.

In this last-named circumstance may be perceived an unfortunate result of the contrast in character between the thrifty and pushing native of India and the indolent and prodigal Burman, which is a source of anxious consideration to the local authorities. With every desire to give to the natives of the province as large a share as possible in the conduct of public affairs, the English government finds itself compelled in numberless cases by its own requirements, and in its own interest, to take prior advantage of the services of the better-educated and more business-like natives of India, who, in every sphere of life, perseveringly push themselves to the front. In the revenue and judicial departments the Burmese are already largely and successfully employed, but in nearly every other branch of administration Hindus and other foreigners are constantly employed in offices where natives of the province would be preferred if they had the necessary qualifications. The lessening of this evil is one of the chief tasks set to the local Education Department.

One inevitable consequence of such a gathering of nationalities as I have described is the presence of a large number of half-breeds, the children of mixed marriages, an element in every Indian population of which the importance has in late years attracted a good deal of attention. The educational statistics of British Burmah show a total half-breed population of about four thousand, and it is satisfactory to know that adequate provision is here made for the education of the children of this useful class. Proud of their European descent, adopting almost universally European costume and habits of life, the Eurasians, notwithstanding many physical and social disadvantages, constitute a valuable link between the English and their native fellow-subjects, and furnish the government with a class of excellent public servants in every department.

Such are some of the principal ingredients which, with Burmese and Europeans, go to make up the community of a large Burmese town; and closely as all are associated together in the business of every-day life, each element of the crowd preserves its own separate identity, so much so that even the outward aspect of the town itself corresponds to the patch-work composition of its population. Thus, in one quarter the houses are built after a Chinese fashion, the brickwork painted and inlaid with devices in pottery, the doors labelled with Chinese inscriptions and hung with Chinese lanterns, in another they are the copy of the houses of Bengal and upper India, and a third is occupied by the ruder and more irregular timber dwellings of the Burmese. So, too, with religious buildings. Not only is every great Christian denomination represented by its own church, but an equally conspicuous place is taken in a Burmese street by the Mahommedan mosque, the Chinese joss-house, the Hindu temple, and the Burmese pagoda.

And if we stand at the street-corner and watch the passers-by, the variety of feature, complexion, and costume is in accordance with that of the surrounding buildings. The Mogul, with his almost European complexion, dressed in spotless white; the Parsee, hardly less fair, remarkable in his tall, backward-sloping paper hat; the Jew with embroidered and brass-buttoned waistcoat and flowing linen sleeves; the Chinaman, with pigtail bound round his temples and body and legs encased in loose garments of indigo blue, pass and repass each other; the Burmese policeman, the shaven Budhist monk, the English sailor, swarthy, ill-clad "coolies" of Madras, and effeminate-looking Baboos from Bengal, add to the incongruous stream; while conspicuous in the throng, neat and clean and fair of face, the Burmese women are the only representatives of their sex.

But if the seaport town presents a strange mixture of discordant elements, intimately associated yet never amalgamating, the whole surface of the country is hardly less variously peopled. If a map were to be drawn with Burmah as it is at the present day, so prepared as to show accurately by the coloring the position and proportions of the various peoples, the waves and patches of color would so blend with and intersect each other as to represent a piece of variegated tapestry. The Arakanese in the north, with a strong tinge of the neighboring district of Bengal, would shade off gradually into the Burmese proper of Pegu. The latter again, to the southward, would melt into the Talines, and so to the Malay populations, and in the north-east would merge, through Karen and Shan, to Siamese. But these would be only the body-colors forming the groundwork of the map, and upon them, in scattered and irregular patches, would appear rival clans of mountaineers, villages of Karens in many varieties of tribe, settlements of Shans, isolated monasteries and homesteads of Toungthoos and Talines, outcast colonies of silkworm-breeders (an abomination to the Budhists by whom they live surrounded), and families of Khyins separated like lepers from their fellow-men. Nor would the map of one year be necessarily accurate in the next, for it is a peculiarity of some at least of the tribes enumerated, that they migrate by whole villages from place to place.

Looking to the legacy which has thus been left to the country by the immigrant peoples by whom it has been successively overrun, we are led to turn for a moment to the fragmentary records which represent its early history. When we read of the kingdoms of Arakan, Ava, and Pegu, of Prome, Toungoo, and Thatone, each with its petty dynasty, and consider the limited area affected by them, we are reminded most of the kings of the Amorites and Hittites, of Moabites and Jebusites, and are disposed to hold them of little real account. Yet even if their history were a blank, the relics of their former greatness which still survive would forbid us to leave them out of the account in dealing with the present. For to this day the ruins of fortress and palace, of pleasure-grounds and pagoda, attest the reality of the power of more than one of the miniature kingdoms which in this obscure corner of the world have risen, flourished, and decayed, unheard of beyond the narrow circuit within which they were a terror to mankind. Thus, for example, in a remote part of the district of Akyab, hardly known outside the limits of the district, lie hidden and forgotten the solid remains of the ancient capital of Arakan, a most striking historical relic. This interesting monument has within late years been in great part demolished to suit the requirements of a small English civil station, and it is to be regretted that no law for the preservation of ancient monuments was in force to save it from its fate. Yet the place is still well worth a visit. A more impregnable natural site could hardly be found than that chosen for his palace by the Arakanese king. The only approach to the spot is by winding tidal creeks, flanked by precipitous wooded banks, and high on a plateau in the midst of these natural bastions and moats are still to be seen the remains of the enormously massive walls of rough stone which guarded the palace, square within square, and even of the royal gardens and bathing-place; while close by are still more perfect relics of religious devotion in a cluster of ruined pagodas, their foundations honeycombed by dark subterranean galleries lined with thousands of images, and now haunted by innumerable bats.

In the same way the province contains many other places once centres of political or religious life — such as Thatone in the Tenasserim division — which still invite the labor of the discoverer. The interest which would attach to researches in such spots as these would belong to the domain of the historian of religion and of language, and would lie rather in the social than the political vicissitudes of the tribes or nations concerned; but from any point of view it is probable that sufficient matter of genuine interest would repay a careful investigation such as has often been made in less interesting localities, and for the prosecution of which the permanent occupation of the country by the English should afford the best possible opportunity.

Turning now to the present, and commencing our survey of the country from the north, we find on the frontier of Arakan (the most northerly of the three administrative divisions of the province) an extensive mountainous region known as the Arakan Hill Tracts, occupied by various wild tribes in the rudest stages of civilization. The way in which this border district has been ruled is highly creditable to the Indian government. A judicious system of administration by one or two civil officers, aided only by native police, has put an end to much of the lawlessness which formerly prevailed, and has inspired the simple hill-tribes with a respect for the English character which is well illustrated by the following extract from a late official report: —

> Forbidden to adjust their differences by the ancient method of violence and retaliation, the various clans settled within the border have free recourse to the Court of the Superintendent. . . . The law administered is simple, and in civil matters local customs are as far as possible adhered to. Taxation is very light, and to avoid suspicion the population has never been numbered. Having a climate more varied and temperate than that of the plains, this district only requires cultivation to make it prosperous and wealthy.

And the report adds that there are already signs of a considerable immigration of cultivators from Chittagong.

Immediately to the south of these highlands the population is Arakanese proper. United until the end of the last century under a separate and independent government, the Arakanese are a race distinct in many points from their conquerors the Burmese; and, though of the same Mongolian stock, have much in common also with their Aryan neighbors in Bengal. Somewhat darker in complexion than the Burmese, their dress is a sort of engrafting of the Burmese costume on that of Bengal, and their language, although a variety of Burmese, is hardly intelligible to a native of Pegu or Tenasserim. In character, too, as in geographical position, they seem to stand midway between the acute, servile Bengali and the more masculine but less quick-witted natives of Pegu. Large numbers of the people, especially in the northern district, are Mahommedans by religion, and, as a consequence of this, we find in Arakan something of that seclusion of women of which the absence is so conspicuous in Burmah proper. The visitor to Arakan is at once struck by the contrast here presented to the rest of the province, for, whereas to the south of this division women appear in public as much as men, the streets of the chief Arakanese town are almost like an Indian bazaar in this respect, and the women who do show themselves constantly have their heads covered, as in Bengal, in conspicuous contrast to their sisters of Pegu. It is probably due to the same causes that female education, though little enough advanced throughout the country, is most backward in the districts of Arakan. Yet, notwithstanding the considerable Mussulman element, the population of Arakan is mainly Budhist, and backward though this division of the province is intellectually, it has submitted to government inspection one hundred and ninety Budhist monasteries, representing upwards of four thousand pupils.

As a people, too, the Arakanese have now become practically an integral part of the Burmese nation, although still bearing strongly marked traces of their former independent position.

Passing southwards from Arakan to Pegu, the rich central province traversed by the Irrawady, we find the mass of the population Burmese, of whose character, appearance, customs, and religion I have already written at length. But among them, throughout the largest and most populous districts, are scattered in villages of their own various other tribes and colonies, of which the most important are those of the Karens; and to this curious people, who constitute the principal non-Burmese element of the province, attention must here be invited.

The phenomenon which the Karen tribes present is very remarkable: while a wild independence is maintained by such of them as still occupy undisturbed their ancient homes in the mountains of the north-east frontier, those which are settled in the plains afford an instance of a conquered people who, though they have accepted their enforced position of inferiority, have neither amalgamated in any way with their conquerors nor been driven by them from the country. Vanquished, or at least thrust aside, centuries ago by the Burmese, they have held and still hold their own in separate villages and settlements, intermixed throughout the country with the Burmese, yet never drawing nearer to them, but remaining as from the first a people wholly apart, scarcely ever intermarrying with the families of their conquerors, unconverted to their religion, unaffected by their social customs, rarely even learning their language. But what is still more surprising is that this same people, who for centuries have kept an almost impenetrable reserve in presence of the civilization and religion of the Burmese, have in late years welcomed with open arms the missionaries of Christianity. So conspicuous, indeed, has been the effect of this latter revolution, that I can hardly better illustrate the manner in which the Karen tribes are distributed among the Burmese than by referring to the statistics of the Christian schools founded for their children by the American Baptist missionaries.

It will be well, however, in the first place to notice some of the distinguishing characteristics of the race, and in doing so it must be premised that a wide difference of character distinguishes the Karen tribes, which in great force occupy the mountains on the Tenasserim frontier, between the Sittang and Salween rivers, from those whose villages are dotted over the settled districts of the plains. Hardy in constitution, living in a bracing climate, with a naturally fortified territory of their own, the Gaikos, Bghais, and others have all the characteristics of mountaineers, exhibiting a bearing in accordance with their independent position, and withal a lawless character which is in a strange contrast to the meek and submissive nature of their kinsmen in the plains.

In the yearly statistics of the Burmese province, the only entries under the head of "native chiefs" are those of three independent chiefs of the tribe of Red Karens, who hold a rude sway over a mountainous territory bordering on the Shan states. The authority of these chiefs descends by law of primogeniture from father to son; and as regards "religion or caste," they are recorded as "heathen," that is, professing no recognized creed. Compared with the equally wild territory of the Arakan hills, this more independent region is a source of more trouble to the English authorities. Speaking of western Karennee (that is, the Red Karen country), the last report says:

> This little principality, consisting as it does of a number of petty chieftainships without any real ruler, is in itself sufficiently contemptible, but its internal condition chances to be of some moment to this province from the number of criminals who find their way thither across the frontier. These men, after committing dacoitees and other offences within British jurisdiction, escape to their own country, where they find a secure asylum, for, the authority of the Karennee chiefs being merely nominal, there is no one of whom their extradition can, as matters at present stand, be effectually demanded.

In the mountain Karens, therefore, we meet, as we should expect, with the characteristics of a rude, independent race, untrammelled by law or the restraints of civilization. Descending, however, to the plains, we find the same race of people constituting a very important section of the community, but exhibiting under altered circumstances a totally different character. Instead of the loose, irregular government of nominally independent native chiefs, they live under a settled English administration, and instead of being the principal occupiers of the soil, they find in that position their hereditary foes, the Burmese, in whose presence they have a perpetual reminder of former defeats and of their own social inferiority. Under the shelter of a strong ruling power they are safe from interference on the part of their neighbors; but while they are able to appreciate the exceptional blessings which English rule has thus conferred upon them, the peaceful enjoyment of their social rights seems to have had absolutely no effect in bringing them into closer relations with their fellow-subjects or in breaking down the barriers between the two races. Sturdy in physique, heavy in countenance, slovenly if not uncleanly in person, speaking a language of their own subdivided into various dialects, they live like caravans of gypsies throughout the country, their houses of the rudest construction, their dress coarse in material and rude in fashion, though often tastefully woven and embroidered. Cultivators of rice for the most part, they give no trouble to the district officers; patient and yielding in disposition, they shrink above all things from publicity; and if it is found difficult to induce the Burmese to compete with foreigners for public and lucrative employment, it seems an impossibility to bring forward the stolid, imperturbable Karen. The singular gentleness and timidity of this people is seen in visiting a Karen school, where the most advanced youths surpass even Burmese girls in their unaffected shyness in presence of the examiner.

As I have already hinted, the division of the Karens into highlanders and lowlanders by no means exhausts the differences which separate tribe from tribe, but the notice of this main division is sufficient to indicate the general position held by the Karen people in the provincial population, as well as to illustrate the striking phenomenon presented by their religious conversion. The highlanders with their rude culture and lawless mode of life, and the lowlanders with their timid exclusiveness, have alike shown themselves to be open in a marvellous way to the peaceful influences of the schoolmaster and the missionary.

There is probably no Christian mission in the world which has met with a more complete success than that of the American Baptists to the Karens of Burmah. Their reception and progress have been almost like those of an invader entering unopposed into a land flowing with milk and honey. The missionary to the Buddhist inhabitants of the same country finds himself at once met by a powerful enemy in an ancient and firmly rooted religion, strong in the large admixture of genuine truth which it contains. But it has been otherwise with the Karens: not only was no such obstacle in existence, but the advent of foreign teachers of a new religion was apparently foreshadowed and anticipated by the popular traditions. Nor has their success been any mere flash in the pan, the fruit of sudden enthusiasm. Considering the means at its command, the mission has made steady and satisfactory advances, and has done more than would have been possible to any secular agency to improve the social status of this interesting people, by whom the missionaries are regarded as their best friends, and who devote year by year to the cause of the mission a solid share of their labor and their possessions.

At the headquarters of each of the most important districts, such as Rangoon, Moulmein, Toungoo, Henzadah, and Bassein, a central boarding-school for boys and girls has long been established for Karens only, and in connection with each central institution a series of elementary schools, presided over by native catechists, are attached to what are called the several local "churches" in the rural districts. Thus we read that "in connection with the Henzadah Karen mission are fifty out-stations where are little congregations of Christians." In the neighboring district of Bassein a similar scattering of churches corresponds with two central schools numbering together one hundred and seventy-five pupils; in Toungoo a large school in two departments, for the two principal Karen tribes, numbers two hundred and eighty-two pupils; and in Rangoon a similar organization exists on a still larger scale.

And while the American Baptists have been thus conspicuous in this virgin field of missionary enterprise, the same faith has been propagated among the same people under different forms by missions numerically weaker but in no way less zealous attached to the Roman Catholic communion.

It must be admitted that hitherto the civilizing influence thus widely exerted has not succeeded in drawing the Karens out of the social obscurity in which by nature and the course of their history they have long been hidden; but it is undeniable that it has immensely improved their social condition, has organized and increased their industry, purified their character, and added to their wealth. And if the intellectual out-turn of the Karen mission schools has hitherto been insignificant, the prospects of the race in this respect have, it is hoped, been in late years improved by the educational policy of the local government.

In the early days of the mission the zeal of its founders led them to devote immense labor to the translation of the Christian Scriptures into the Karen dialects, and finding that no written character was in existence, they even invented one for the purpose, modelled on the Burmese, and printed in it thousands of Bibles, tracts, and school text-books.

One consequence, however, of this zeal has of course been to perpetuate the unnecessary barriers which separate the Karens from the Burmese, and to increase instead of destroying the complete isolation of the people. This evil, which is now fully recognized by the missionaries themselves, is being gradually remedied by the policy of the government education department with which the Karen schools have been brought into harmony. By this policy the Burmese language is made a prominent subject of study in the Karen schools, special inducements to its acquirement are offered, and while the publication of books in Burmese is actively prosecuted, that of books in the Karen dialects is not encouraged.

The Karen schools now form a distinctive feature of the provincial educational system, and the best of them compare not unfavorably with those established for the Burmese population; and though the Karen village schools, from want of adequate teaching power and supervision, have so far shown little result in comparison with the old foundations of the Budhist monasteries, there seems to be good prospect for their future.

In the Karen school at Toungoo, attended by the youth of the wildest tribes, it is reported, amongst other things, that "arithmetic is thoroughly well known;" and in connection with the same school the inspector touches upon one of the most noticeable peculiarities of the Karen people to which I can bear personal testimony, namely, their keen appreciation of English music. When the regimental band plays in the public gardens of Rangoon, while the Burmese pass by unattracted, a group of Karens may often be seen taking up a retired position to enjoy the music; and the reality of this appreciation is proved in the most remarkable way in the Karen schools. All attempts to teach English music to Burmese boys end in failure. Their voices are harsh and unmusical, and their ear adapted only to the music of their own monotonous instruments; but the Karens on the contrary are endowed both with an accurate ear and with melodious voices, English music seems to come to them as naturally as to the people of Lancashire, and the part singing in a Karen mission school is worth hearing, not merely as a curiosity but as a genuine musical treat.

In the preceding pages I have purposely dwelt at length on the characteristics of the Karen race as holding the second place, after the Burmese, in the provincial population. With the moral defects of every Oriental people, and without many of the winning characteristics of the Burmese — with no sense of humor, no taste for games and sports, no appreciation of any form of art — they appeal in some ways still more powerfully to English sympathy, and cannot fail to excite the interest of those with whom they come in contact, while their condition must always be an important consideration of the government of the day.

But as we pass through the province we are met also from time to time by the representatives of other strange peoples, less numerous than the Karens but not less individual or less worthy of notice. The inspecting officer, of whatever department of the administration, as he passes from village to village and from one zayat to another, is still accustomed in the maritime districts of Tenasserim to encounter a people speaking a language akin neither to Burmese, Chinese, nor to any Indian language, a people now scanty and insignificant, but proud of their ancient descent and of the traditional power of their ancestors. These are the Talines, once the ruling power on the Burmese seaboard, the leaders of the civilization of the day, and regarded by competent authorities as probably the aborgines of the country, who on the inroad of the Burmese from the north were pushed southwards and established themselves in a strong and independent position on the coast. Long isolated from their ancient enemies the Burmese, the Talines, though now yielding to the absorbing and levelling influences of modern life and civilization, still speak their own language, in which too they preserve their own version of the common religion, a version more ancient than that of the Burmese. Hence it is that in the late educational schemes of the English government the Taline monasteries have held an exceptional position. While elsewhere throughout the country the Budhist monastic schools have yielded with remarkable readiness to the influence of the English educational agencies, in these isolated but still important centres of indigenous education the government has met with the least ready response in its efforts to engraft an improved system on the indigenous foundation. So that we find it recorded in an educational report that the only function for which the Taline monks seem to exist is "that of occupying the exceptionally luxurious monasteries the Talines found."

The picture which they thus present is one of peaceful and picturesque decay, and interesting chiefly from the records they preserve of an historic past. It may be added that in the Taline religious houses, the repository of MSS. probably the most ancient in the country, it is possible that a careful philological research would be rewarded by valuable discoveries.

In some ways more closely allied to the Burmese, the small scattered communities of Toungthoos, who are found not only in the province under notice but in the neighboring countries, have also their own separate traditions of former greatness, of an ancient capital, Thatone, and of original immigration from the north. Conspicuous among the gaily-dressed Burmese in a costume of sombre dark blue or black, with their own isolated settlements, their own religious foundations, and their own dialect, these, too, constitute an instructive link with the past as well as an interesting element in the present population. In some Toungthoo monasteries the Burmese language is the medium of instruction, and the religious records are preserved in the same language. Peaceably settled in the midst of Burmese and Karens, this scattered people attracts little public attention, and is no doubt destined at no remote date to be lost sight of altogether. But for the time being their identity is as marked and their position — to the skilful reader of national characteristics — as eloquent of the past, as that of other tribes more numerous and more conspicuous.

A few words of notice must be given also to the Khyins, another distinct people, who in their social position and even in their personal peculiarities bear striking records of long-past ages. Forced centuries ago into the mountains on the advance of the Burmese down the valley of the Irrawady, the Khyins preserve their own nationality, and are found settled here and there in the province, especially near the frontiers of Arakan and Pegu; and it is a strange but not uncommon sight even in the most civilized towns of Pegu to see a group of Khyins, their women rendered conspicuous by the ghastly custom of blackening the whole surface of their faces with tattooing, a hideous practice which is, according to one report, a standing and hereditary reminder of days when disfigurement was the only sure protection from slavery that a father could afford to his daughter.

The various settlements and villages of Shans, who also add to the number of distinct nationalities occupying Burmese territory, do not seem to call for special notice here, offshoots as they are from a still recognized neighboring people, not, as in the case of the tribes noticed above, the stranded or vanishing relics of an ancient history of which they constitute almost the only trustworthy records.

Enough has, however, been said to show that the task of administration in this remote province has not been altogether a simple one, and that while in the Burmese themselves the government of India has had to deal with a people differing in every important respect from those with whom they have come in contact in India, they have in the internal administration of the province been confronted also by a variety of races and tribes not less firmly established than the Burmese, and each with its own peculiarities of character and custom demanding special consideration.

Sufficient indication has also, perhaps, been given of the interesting and almost untrodden area offered in the province of Burmah for more than one department of antiquarian research. Lastly, such a survey as I have attempted becomes the more interesting when it is remembered that under a strong and settled government all, or at least the majority of these distinctions of race, radical as they are in many cases, are becoming year by year less marked, and seem likely to be eventually obliterated with the absorption of the distinctive dialects which is gradually taking place. The Burmese language, both by the deliberate policy of the English government and the necessities of trade, law, and general intercourse, is becoming the universal vernacular of the province. The Taline language is fast dying out, and the several Karen dialects, to which a new but transitory life has been given by the enthusiasm of Christian missionaries, are yielding to the same influences and may perhaps ultimately disappear. The Arakanese brogue is supplanted in schools by the purer Burmese idiom, while such dialects as those of the Toungthoos and highland clans are still more certainly doomed.

into the cindery back-room fire, and causing a cloud of dust to fly over Mildie, seated opposite, with a Euclid open in her lap, on to which, under cover of the twilight, and Casabianca's late reverie, a few tears had been silently dropping.

"No, you need not set me right, Mildie; I won't be set right by you. I believe if you were dead, and some one made a mistake in history over your coffin, you would jump up and set 'em right. What does the name signify. I know what I mean; those fellows in the French Revolution, who wanted to blow everybody's brains out, and kick things to shivers — and I say that the way in which we are all being treated just now, is enough to make a fellow wish to join 'em. It's an awful shame."

"I don't know, Casa," said Mildie, with a great sob in her voice. "I suppose it will be for your good in the end, and perhaps Emmie will enjoy herself when she gets away from Saville Street, and can improve her French, and visit places one reads about. I would go away with a worse person than Aunt Rivers even," said Mildie savagely, "to see the town where the chevalier Bayard is buried. Oh, Emmie will enjoy herself; and Katharine Moore says we ought not to make a trouble of it."

"Hang Katharine Moore!" exploded Casabianca; "it's beastly ungrateful of her to say any such thing. I should like to know who has brought up their second scuttle of coals all this winter, while Mary Anne has been saying that one scuttle a day was enough for attic lodgers; and whose doing it is that Christabel's flowers ever get watered; and then for them to take and say I'm not to make a trouble of being sent out of the house to wear petticoats and yellow stockings, and never have a hat on my head! It's enough to turn a fellow into a flat Jebusite, as I said before; and all that Miss Alma Rivers may marry a money-grubbing Kirkman, and live in the 'Tower of Babel.' You need not shout at me. I know I'm right about that name at least. That is what Mr. Kirkman's new big house is called. Uncle Rivers showed it me in Punch, when I went to Eccleston Square with mamma the other morning."

"It was not the name I was trying to stop you from saying," answered Mildie. "I don't care what people call Mr. Kirkman's house; it's nothing to us; but Emmie asked me not to say, or let any one else say, she was going abroad with Aunt Rivers instead of Alma, because Alma was engaged to Mr. Horace Kirkman. It may not be quite settled yet, Emmie thinks, and it ought not to be talked about. If it is such a disgrace to the family, we need not be in a hurry to spread it about."

"Rubbish!" cried Casabianca. "When a fellow has heard a thing with his own ears, where's the use of trying to make him believe he does not know it. I tell you I heard every word Aunt Rivers said to mother. They left me kicking about in a dressing-room with nothing to do for an hour but listen to the talk that went on in the bedroom beyond; Aunt Rivers coughing half the time to work mother up to pity her, and do as she wished. Did I not feel as if I were being regularly sold, tied up in a sack and delivered over, as the bargaining went on. Such a pleasant change for dearest Emmie! The making of dear little Aubrey! Faugh! And then Uncle Rivers comes out, staring as if he expected to see a fellow six feet high, and puts his hand on my head and says they intend to make a Grecian of me. Grecian, indeed! I always thought the Greeks were fools for speaking such a miserable language, and inventing mathematics; but I did not know before that they made quite such guys of themselves as to go about in yellow stockings and petticoats, and without any hats."

"And you really," said Mildie, sighing, "care about that; and you are not at all glad to be going to a place where you can learn as much as you like, and where you might, if you pleased, get to be a great man. Coleridge and Charles Lamb were brought up where you are going."

"Yes, I know all about 'em; Christabel's been reading it to me out of a book. They had to eat lumps of boiled beef fat at dinner called squabs! Sounds jolly, I think!"

"It's a very unfair world, I think," said Mildred, while a great tear fell and blistered a page of her Euclid. "Some people get what they don't want and can't make any use of, and other people who are starving for that same thing have to go without."

"Shut up there," cried Casabianca; "I thought sisters were made to be sympathetic with one and all that, but you —— It makes me more disgusted than anything, to see you sitting there crying, because you are never to go to school again, and never need look into a book unless you please. Don't I wish I were standing in your shoes."

"Would you really like to change places with me?" cried Mildie, a wild notion of personating Casabianca in petticoats and yellow stockings, and profiting by Uncle Rivers's presentation to Christ Church in his stead, shooting momentarily through her brain.

"There," said Casabianca, "that just proves what I'm always pointing out to you — the folly of you girls supposing, because you can do sums, and remember a date or two, that you have the same sort of sense that we have; or that you know anything of a man's life. You think, do you, that you could get on better at a public school than I could, because you're bookish? as if that would help you in a boxing-match. A jolly fix you would find yourself in before a week was out, if I took you at your word."

"I know it's impossible, of course," said Mildie despairingly. "And, Casa, I don't mean to be unsympathizing. I'm sorry enough that you are going away."

"Well you may be," growled Casabianca, resolved not to be mollified too easily. "You'll all feel the miss of me when the Gentle Lamb flies into a temper, and there's no one to stand up to him. All your precious history and mathematics won't help you to manage him."

"I know it," said Mildie. "But that's just why it seems so hard that I am to be taken from things I care for, and set to make a muddle of other people's work. Aunt Rivers told mamma that I was old enough now to be as useful in the family as Emmie, and that I ought to begin, as if just saying that could turn me into Emmie."

"But you think a great deal of yourself, don't you?" said Casabianca, aghast at this sudden appearance of self-depreciation in Mildie.

"No, I don't! — I can't help liking arithmetic and remembering dates and things; but, oh! you need not, all of you, think so badly of me because of that; if I could make myself as pretty as Emmie, and get people to like me as they do her; but there," dashing her head down upon her Euclid, and making it a mere puddle of tears, "I know they never will. I know how it will be when you and Emmie are gone. The Gentle Lamb will always be making horrible grimaces on the stairs, while Mrs. Urquhart is passing, and I shall not be able to stop him, and the keys will always be missing at tea-time, and I shall never know where to look for the sal-volatile when mamma has a headache."

"And all because the Rivers are so selfish," grunted Casabianca. "They have everything they can possibly want, and yet they rob us of Emmie. I know what it is like."

"So do I," said Mildie, "and I wish there was a prophet now to go to Aunt Rivers and say, 'Thou art the man!' I should like to do it myself."

"Perhaps she'll be awfully punished by-and-by, then," said Casabianca, a good deal cheered by the suggestion; "so, if I were you, Mildie, I would cheer up a bit. You really ain't so bad when you don't set up to know more than other people; and now I'll tell you something that you never should have known if you had not come down from your high horse. Tom Winter has been mistaking you for Emmie this long time."

"How could he?" asked Mildie, not so overwhelmed by the compliment as might have been expected.

"He is my greatest friend this half, and I told him how jolly Emmie was, and that he might look at her at church if he liked, and the other day I found out that he had been looking at you, and taking you for the pretty one. He says he don't see any reason why he should not. There now."

"I don't care what Tom Winter thinks of me," said Mildie, with dignity; "but if you will like me as Harry likes Emmie, I will do everything I can for you till you go, and always in the holidays, you shall see."

"All right," said Casabianca, edging his chair a little closer to Mildie's. "I never did bully you but for your own good, to keep you from thrusting your learning down everybody's throat; and now as you are reasonable I'll let you into something more. See my purse. You may well stare at what is in it; but Mr. Anstice tipped me tremendously the day he called when everybody was out, and when I walked back to his place with him. He said it was to buy a bat, but I shall get a great deal more out of it than that, I promise you, if only I can make up my mind to change the first 'yellow-boy' I ever had in my life. Don't it look jolly?"

"Mr. Anstice!" exclaimed Mildie. "He called an hour ago with a book for Emmie, and left word that he would not come in, as it was her last day at home. I wondered how he had got to know she was going away. I suppose you told him that and everything — eh, Casabianca?"

"Why not? If Aunt Rivers thinks she can bribe me to keep hers and Miss Alma's secrets she's very much mistaken. Of course I told him everything."

"How did he look?" inquired Mildie curiously.

"Look!" said Casabianca, "how should he look, but just as usual, though, now I come to think of it, I don't believe he did. He was not so jolly as usual. When he first came in he looked — well, palish, you know, as if he had a bad cold in his head or something. However, he was all right with me, and evidently very glad to have me to talk to, for he invited me to dine with him, and gave me this magnificent tip when I went away."

"Perhaps I had better take the book and his note to Emmie now. She is packing her new box in the spare room, and she is to drink tea this last night in the Land of Beulah. I will find her before she goes up."

It had all come about in what seemed such an amazingly short space of time, so many events and propositions following each other, that Emmie, the person chiefly concerned, had hardly yet taken in all that was involved in them. On the day after Emmie's return home, Dr. Urquhart had been sent for to Eccleston Square in haste, and brought back alarming news of Lady Rivers, who had been seized with an attack of hæmorrhage from the lungs after an agitating conversation with her daughter. Some days of real anxiety followed, and then, as amendment set in, the necessity of Lady Rivers leaving England and spending some months in a warmer climate began to be talked of. Next came the day when Mrs. West was summoned to a conference with Sir Francis Rivers in Eccleston Square, from which she returned pale and agitated, saying that Sir Francis had almost put her sister's life into her hands by assuring her that Lady Rivers would only consent to leave home on condition that her niece Emmie was allowed to accompany her, while Alma remained to complete her London season under her sister's chaperonage. Aubrey's nomination to Christ Church had not, in reality, been offered as a bribe, for Sir Francis had previously been working to obtain it; but success came at the moment when he made his request for the loan of Emmie, and Mr. West chose to feel that it laid an obligation upon the whole family from which they could not escape. When the matter was laid before him he said he would not accept Sir Francis's favors without paying the equivalent prescribed, and, hearing this, Emmie and her mother exchanged glances, and knew in their hearts that the thing was settled and nothing left for either of them to say. An education for one of the boys must not be refused or imperilled by any crossing of Mr. West's mood.

Sir Francis was liberal beyond expectation in all the arrangements that followed, and everybody told Mrs. West and Emmie that this price they were paying for Aubrey's advantage was no sacrifice, but a great piece of good luck. They were too busy to investigate their own impressions on the subject closely, and said very little to each other about the approaching separation even during the last day's packing. They talked as loving people on the eve of a parting do talk, of trifles which concerned the common life, tenderly making believe that absence would not snap the close threads of union. They made over Casabianca's new shirts to the last button, and laid little plans for brightening Harry's evenings and consoling Mildie for the loss of her school lessons. Then, when Emmie was laying her new dress on the top of her box and nothing further remained to be done, Mrs. West spoke a few tender words of counsel and love and sorrow, taking care all the while that the slow tears creeping down her cheeks should not fall on the pretty frills and flounces Emmie's fingers were smoothing out, and they kissed across the box and clung mutely together over this symbol of parting, till Mr. West's evening knock was heard at the door. It brought a pang to Emmie with the thought of how far she would be away when it came on the next evening, and it sent Mrs. West away in haste, to be at her post when her husband came in. He would not say anything to-night about Emmie's approaching departure, but perhaps (so Mrs. West thought) he would grieve over it more than any one else in the house; for did not the worst part of every trouble come upon him, and ought not he to be supremely pitied by her at least?

Emmie sat down on the floor after her mother left her, to wipe away her tears and get herself ready for the Land of Beulah. Tears had been very near her eyes all day, yet it cannot be denied that the grey web of her regrets was crossed by a great many bright threads of hope and expectation. The mere fact of being seated here to-night, with a fire lighted in the spare room expressly for her, and an air of excitement pervading the whole house on her account, caused some pleasant stirrings of emotions. Beyond lay thoughts and hopes, and eager glances into the future, which during the press of late occupations she had kept at bay. She now confessed to herself that after the interest of that one fortnight spent at the Riverses' she should have found it difficult to sink back altogether into Saville Street life, and never to know the end and real meaning of some events she had there taken part in. Now she should at all events be in the way of hearing, and might perhaps get to understand the drift of Eccleston Square politics in the end. Could Casabianca's ears have served him rightly? Could Alma have decided so, and what influence had her own presumptuous meddling had on her decision?

Here instead of thoughts came visions, and Emmie was back in Eccleston Square, looking down over the balusters on a nodding bird of paradise feather and on the upturned face of a young man following behind. She could read clearly the character revealed in those keen, inquisitive eyes, that large, smiling, self sufficient mouth, those boastful open nostrils and that square chin, and she knew quite well, if Alma did not, the little there was to like in it and the much to shrink from instinctively; and as she mentally gazed the wonder grew. How could Alma choose so? Would there ever be an end of her wondering, even while she kept her memory clear from the picture of another face which she could never bear, even in thought, to put by the side of that one; the idea of their being rivals giving her always a glow of indignation hard to keep within reasonable bounds? But what, after all, was Alma's choice to her, and what possible right had she to be angry about it, or to grieve for the pain it must have brought some one who would perhaps lay a part of the blame to her officiousness?

Just as Emmie's thoughts reached this point, Mildie opened the bedroom door, bringing in a stream of gaslight from the passage, and something in her hand, which Emmie discovered to be a letter when her dreaming eyes recovered their power of seeing, and she had brought herself back to Saville Street again.

"Are you not dressed yet?" cried Mildie. "The tea has gone into the Land of Beulah already, and Dr. Urquhart came in half an hour ago. Here's a letter and a parcel for you, which Mr. Anstice left at the door. I did not think it worth while to bring them up whilst you were busy packing."

"Fetch me a candle then, please," said Emmie, "and I will dress here, without going up-stairs again."

But Emmie did not wait for the candle to open her letter; as soon as Mildie was safely out of the room she coaxed up a blaze from the red embers, tore open the envelope, and read: —

"DEAR MISS WEST, — I called in Saville Street two days ago, in the hope of seeing you, and — shall I confess it? — of hearing from you the truth of a report that had reached me of serious illness in your uncle's house. I thought the illness might account for my not having received an answer to a letter sent there more than a week ago, and I trusted to your kindness to throw all the light on my suspense your superior knowledge could give. Judge of my disappointment at not finding you. In default of his elders, Casabianca entertained me with an exposition of his views on things in general, among which I picked up, not what I wanted to hear certainly, but at all events the end of my suspense. There is simply no more to be said, and I am egotistical once more to you because I think, having gone so far in self-betrayal, it is better to make an end, and to assure you, once for all, that the failure of the enterprise you put me upon in no way detracts from my gratitude to you for holding me worthy of it. Let us both forget that we ever took upon ourselves to judge Mr. Horace Kirkman, junior, and try to believe a certain person's discernment greater than ours. May your cousin be happy in the choice she has made, and may you suffer as little from Mrs. Kirkman's vicarious affection as circumstances will admit of. I should like to have seen you before you left England, but I must not monopolize your time at home, now so short — the more as I am not without hope of seeing something of you during your banishment. The house to which, as I hear from your brother, you are going, belongs to a relative of mine, and it must have been my talk in old times of the charms and advantages of La Roquette that induced Lady Rivers to fix upon it as a winter residence for herself and you. My cousin, Madame de Florimel, lives in a tumble-down old château at the foot of the hill on which the châlet you will inhabit is perched, and the visit she expects from me once in two years or so is about due now. Perhaps I shall escape there from this region of Kirkmans and east-windy thoughts should they become too oppressive when Easter arrives, and we shall meet at La Roquette and talk London gossip among the anemones and daffodils, which by that time will have overrun all the valleys where you will be quite at home when I see you next. Did you not say, when we were capping verses at Christmas and Miss Moore could not understand your not being ready with a line for 'daffodils,' that you did not know Wordsworth well because you had never had him of your own? Here he is in a small enough compass to fit into a chance corner of your travelling-box, and I bring him in case you should find room for him at the last.

"Your sincere friend,

"WYNYARD ANSTICE."

"What does he say, Emmie? What is the letter about?" asked Mildie, who, candle flaming in hand, stood staring down into Emmie's face, as she reached the last line. "Why, I do believe there's a tear on your cheek. Dear Emmie, you will let me read the letter, won't you? I do so want to know the sort of things people write when they are crossed in love and very miserable. Does he threaten to die and come to Alma's wedding breakfast like Alonzo the Brave, with worms creeping out of his eyes? I'm sure I wish he would, and that you and I might be there as bridesmaids, and see the Riverses and Kirkmans properly served out at last. You will let me read some part of the letter at all events, won't you?"

Emmie had it safe back in its envelope by this time.

"Mr. Anstice writes to me about La Roquette, the place in France where we are going," she answered with dignity. "He has French relations, and one of them lives in an old château there, close to the house Uncle Rivers has taken for us to live in."

"A château," sighed Mildie. "How much happier most people are than ourselves! if I had a relation living in a real old château, I should not mind what happened to me — no, not if I were crossed in love fifty times. Dear Emmie, since you won't give me Mr. Anstice's letter to read, let me at least put his book into your box, and finish off the ends of the packing, while you go and enjoy yourself in the Land of Beulah. To-morrow at this time I shall not have even such pleasant occupation as packing; I shall be making tea for the boys in the back parlor, without you, completely miserable.

CHAPTER XV.

HUSH.

To enter Mrs. Urquhart's appartments, from any other part of the house, was to pass from noise and excitement to peace and sunshine, and Emmie felt a hush fall on her spirits the instant she crossed the threshold. Not that she was altogether wrong in supposing that the general agitation had for once just touched the still atmosphere of the Land of Beulah, and brought something new into the faces and manner of the friends who welcomed her there; but it was a soothing something, that flattered her with a sense of importance without saddening her. The fire was coaxed into such clear burning as only skill like Mrs. Urquhart's could coax a London fire. The tea service of dainty china and bright silver sparkled with cleanliness not due certainly to manipulations of Mary Ann's, and the faces round the table reflected the brightness. Dr. Urquhart might, indeed, be a little preoccupied, for once or twice, when Emmie suddenly turned towards him, she found, to her surprise, that he was gazing rather intently on her. Could he be noticing the red rims round her eyes, and did he know what caused them? Emmie looked away into the depths of the fire, and tried to comfort herself with the reflection that the most skilful of physicians, though he might spy out quickly the tokens of tears, could not penetrate to the cause from which the tears sprang. Mrs. Urquhart was luckily less observant than her son. She chatted on through the silence of the two others, about the laudatory notice of Graham's lectures she had just spied out in the Lancet, and by-and-by Dr. Urquhart woke up and joined in the conversation after his usual manner, with a good deal of playful banter of his mother, and then a question or remark, which tended to draw the talk away from personal matters, and give Emmie a chance of taking her share.

She did not avail herself of it frequently, such a bewildering clatter of voices seemed to be going on in her mind, all telling her different things about to-morrow, and all, as it seemed to her, trying to drown a persistent small voice, that somewhere in a far corner of her brain would go on saying softly over and over again — "Among the anemones and daffodils in the spring" — "Among the anemones and daffodils in the spring." This was February, and even in England daffodils "take the winds of March." Emmie knew enough of Shakespeare to remember that. A month — six weeks — to wait, and then —— No, she would not make that calculation again; her mother was crying down-stairs over a different scale of reckoning the weeks. How could she be so heartless as to feel as if the arrival of one London acquaintance at La Roquette, would annul the pain of separation from every one at home! She determined to put the notion from her, and attend to what Dr. and Mrs. Urquhart were saying. They had travelled to the south of France in their talk now, and were congratulating her on all the new sights and sounds she would experience — nightingales, fireflies, cicalas.

Tea is over, and Mrs. Urquhart looks a shade surprised, when Dr. Urquhart lingers on, leaving a pile of notes unexamined on his writing-table, while he takes botanical dictionaries, volumes of natural history, from his shelves, to show Emmie engravings of flowers and insects she will soon have an opportunity of admiring in their natural state. How delightedly Mildie would have picked up the information that drops from his lips, quite unpremeditatedly, and only because there is such a store within, that it must come out when not suppressed; and how difficult it is to Emmie, to care just then as much about the migratory caterpillar, and the edible green frog, as she knows she ought to care. He perceives the lack of interest at last, and subsides, with a sigh, into the inner room to his writing-table and letters and reading-lamp. There, partially hidden by the curtains that hang from the arch between the rooms, he can still hear the murmur of voices by the hearth. He leans back in his chair every now and then between reading and answering a note, perhaps to cogitate his reply; perhaps to get a peep at the talkers, and think, as he watches the changes on Emmie's face, that his mother has found something to say to her which interests her more than the green frog. When he has come to his last note, he indulges himself in a longer spell of watching. Mrs. Urquhart has laid down her particolored knitting, and has folded one of Emmie's little hands in hers.

"Yes, my dear," she is saying, "a first visit from home is an important crisis to a girl. Dear me! nothing else in after life is ever quite like it. It may be — it is likely to be — the beginning of all her real life. Perhaps I'm a silly old woman, who expects every girl she sees to have the same experience as herself; but talking of this journey of yours, somehow sets me upon recollecting the first time I ever left my home. I had led a quieter life than even you, my dear, in a little Scotch manse in the north, where we never saw a fresh face from year's end to year's end, and my first visit was made to cousins who lived in Edinburgh. What a packing up it was! How my mother stitched at my clothes; and what a prayer my good father made over me at family worship the last evening! The whole village was stirred up, and there was quite a little crowd to see me set off by the coach in the morning. Our laird, who made the journey the same day, and had promised to look after me, sneered a little at all the tears and excitement, telling me I should be back in a few weeks, feeling just the same as before I went, and that I should wonder then what all the commotion had been about. He was mistaken, however. I did return home at the end of a six weeks' visit; but Dr. Urquhart, my Dr. Urquhart, not the imitation one you see there, followed me to the manse before the week was out, and well, my dear, the old quiet home-life was over for me after that. Plenty of struggle and trouble came after; but I don't think I ever for one moment of the struggling time wished that I had not travelled to Edinburgh that particular winter. Things of the kind will occur, I suppose, when a girl goes out into the world from a quiet home; there is always a chance that it is her fate she goes to meet, and I can only say that I hope your luck will be as good as mine, if you chance to come across yours before we sit here again, Emmie, my dear."

"Mother! what are you talking about? — hush!"

The two heads, confidentially approaching each other, turned in surprise towards the direction whence the words came, and saw Dr. Urquhart standing in the opening between the rooms, and looking very much shaken out of his ordinary composure. There was an actual flash of anger in his eyes, and his fresh healthy cheeks were a great many shades redder than usual. Mrs. Urquhart gazed at him silently for a minute over her spectacles. She had not been silenced in such a peremptory tone since the date of her Edinburgh journey.

"My dear Graham," she said at last, "why should I be silent? What business is it of yours what I say to Miss West? We thought you were too much occupied with your letters to heed what nonsense we women please to talk to each other."

Dr. Urquhart had now reached the fireplace, and was facing his mother, with the gleam of displeasure still in his grey eyes.

"It is my business," he said, in a low tone. "I cannot hear you suggesting to Miss West the possibility of coming back changed to her old friends, without putting in a word of remonstrance. I wonder at you, mother."

"But why should you care?" cried

Emmie, turning innocent, wide-open eyes upon him. "Of course it was only nonsense we were talking. I don't want any change. Nothing will happen to me. I shall come back just the same — liking and disliking the same people that I like and dislike now. You will see."

"Shall I? — That is enough," said Dr. Urquhart, turning from his mother to Emmie, with all the anger cleared away from his face, and a strange happy trembling of the lip, and twinkling of the eyes, noticeable there instead.

Mrs. Urquhart cleared her throat very loudly, and began ostentatiously to count the stitches of her knitting.

"It is just folly to pretend to prophecy how you will feel when you come back before you have ever gone away," she said severely, when she had come to the end of a row.

"I was not prophesying, was I?" asked Emmie, a little taken aback at the impression her commonplace remark had evidently made on her two auditors. "I don't think I meant to prophecy anything."

"No, no!" said Dr. Urquhart in a hurried voice, through which a timid joyfulness pierced. "It was, if I may be allowed to say so, more of a promise than a prophecy; it is a question of present feeling, of knowing our own minds."

"Which you young things always fancy you do when you don't," said Mrs. Urquhart, beginning diligently to count again.

Emmie's cheeks burned uncomfortably, as she sat in a silence that followed, wondering what she could have said or done amiss, and when the clock in the back room opportunely broke the stillness, by striking nine, she jumped up much relieved, and pleaded the early start to-morrow morning, and the number of little last things that remained to be done, in excuse for an early leave-taking. She fancied that Mrs. Urquhart's farewell kiss was somewhat less cordial than her welcoming one had been, and that Dr. Urquhart tried to make up for his mother's unwonted coldness by following her to the door, and holding her hand in a long farewell shake, while he promised to look after her mother's health until her return. When once the door of the Land of Beulah was shut behind her, however, she had too many other things to think of to trouble herself further about any strangeness there might have been in the manners of her two friends that night. She would have been extremely surprised, if she had known how nearly the Land of Beulah ceased to be the Land of Beulah, on her account, after she left it.

Dr. Urquhart walked straight to his own end of the room, when he had taken leave of Emmie, and as he stood by his writing-table sealing his notes, and putting them ready for the late post, his mother's ear detected the sound of a softly whistled tune, breaking out again and again, —

My love she's but a lassie yet.

It was a sound she had not heard for years, and which she could not think seemly from the lips of a physician in such growing repute as Dr. Graham Urquhart. Then, with the bundle of notes in his hand, he came and stood again by the fireplace, not speaking, but looking at the red embers with a provokingly happy smile on his face. A true Urquhart smile, made up of confident hopefulness, and a touch of self-complacency as well. Such a smile as had sometimes vexed Mrs. Urquhart's soul when, on a face of which this was a facsimile, it had confronted her in moments of disturbance in her early married life. She hardly knew what to make of herself when she felt the old impatience stirring again, and found a sneer curling her old lips, as she marked the contented curve into which her son's had fallen.

From Temple Bar.

GENERAL OGLETHORPE.

WHAT reader of Boswell's "Life of Johnson" (and who would venture to acknowledge he has not read it?) does not remember the pleasant little dinner-parties at General Oglethorpe's? The quaint figure, too, of the venerable general in his old-fashioned cocked hat, with his sword by his side, and his walking-staff and book in hand, is familiar to most of us. Let us introduce him to the reader as he introduced himself to Boswell: —

Let me here be allowed [says Boswell] to pay my tribute of most sincere gratitude to the memory of that excellent person, my intimacy with whom was the more valuable to me, because my first acquaintance with him was unexpected and unsolicited. Soon after the publication of my "Account of Corsica," he did me the honor to call on me, and approaching me with a frank and courteous air, said, "My name, sir, is Oglethorpe, and I wish to be acquainted with you." I was not a little flattered to be thus addressed by an eminent man, of whom I had read in Pope, from my early years,

Or driven by strong benevolence of soul,
Will fly, like Oglethorpe, from pole to pole.

I was fortunate enough to be found worthy of his good opinion, insomuch that I not only was invited to make one in the many respectable companies whom he entertained at his table, but had a cover at his hospitable board every day when I happened to be disengaged; and in his society I never failed to enjoy learned and animated conversation seasoned with genuine sentiments of virtue and religion.

General Oglethorpe was a remarkable man, and it is to be regretted that he did not accede to Johnson's offer to write his life. "He (Johnson) urged General Oglethorpe to give the world his life. He said, 'I know no man whose life would be more interesting. If I were furnished with materials, I should be very glad to write it.'" Boswell adds in a note: —

The general seemed unwilling to enter upon it at this time; but upon a subsequent occasion he communicated to me a number of particulars, which I have committed to writing; but I was not sufficiently diligent in obtaining more from him, not apprehending that his friends were so soon to lose him; for, notwithstanding his great age, he was very healthy and vigorous, and was at last carried off by a violent fever, which is often fatal at any period of life.*

Judging from his singular ability in recording the conversation of Johnson and his friends, we may lament the loss of Boswell's memoranda concerning the general. We are not aware that they have ever been given to the public in any shape, nor whether they are still in existence. We must remember that Oglethorpe was not only commemorated by Pope, but that Thomson also paid a tribute to his high character in his "Liberty" (part v. 645), where, speaking of colonies, he says: —

Bound by social freedom, firm they rise;
Such as, of late, an Oglethorpe has form'd,
And, crowding round, the charm'd Savannah sees.

Probably few of our readers are acquainted with many incidents in General Oglethorpe's life. They picture him to their mind's eye as the friend of Dr. Johnson, and the pleasant, garrulous old man of an almost fabulous age, who could talk of serving under Prince Eugene (Sir Roger de Coverley's "Prince Eugenio"), and who could mention his adventures in snipe-shooting in Conduit Fields — where Conduit Street, Bond Street, now stands. On the latter point it may be of interest to remark that Pennant says: "The late Carew Mildmay, Esq.,* used to say that he remembered killing a woodcock on the site of Conduit Street, at that time an open country. He and General Oglethorpe were great intimates, and nearly of the same age, and often produced proofs to each other of the length of their recollections." We have mentioned this anecdote in passing, as we shall have to refer to it in estimating the true age of our general. Conduit Street was built in 1718, and it is not such a wonderful fact that persons living into the concluding quarter of the last century should remember, as Mildmay and Oglethorpe could, portions of the metropolis, which in their early youth were fields, now become fashionable and thickly populated streets. There are probably not a few persons now living who can remember the "Five Fields," as they were called, at the present day the fashionable Belgravia; and even Tothill Fields; when snipe could be found there.

We shall throw together, then, a few notes on General James Edward Oglethorpe, and intersperse them with such Oglethorpiana as may be gathered from Boswell's amusing pages. The obituary of June 30, 1785, records the name of General James Edward Oglethorpe at his seat, Cranham Hall, Essex. "The papers," says the correspondent of Sylvanus Urban, "mention his age as one hundred and two, but it appears by the books of Christ Church, Oxford,† that he was entered there in 1714 as being then sixteen, which would make his age only eighty-seven. However (he would never tell his age) he possessed all his faculties to within three or four days of his death." Another correspondent observes: "He was always unwilling to tell his age; perhaps he was not certain about it." A third, however, dedicates the following lines to his memory: —

One hundred two, Methusalem in age,
A vigorous soldier, and a virtuous sage!
He founded Georgia, gave it laws and trade,
He saw it flourish, and he saw it fade.

Now, if the entry in the college books could be verified, we are afraid that Mr. Thoms would triumphantly point to it as

* It is worthy of remark that this was Boswell's own end. Malone, in the advertisement to the third edition of his work, says: "Unfortunately, in the midst of his labors, he was seized with a fever, of which, to the great regret of all his friends, he died on the 19th of May, 1795." Such is Malone's account.

* Mr. Carew Hervey Mildmay died at the great age of 96 in 1780.

conclusively demolishing the general's supposed centenarianism; but, then, how are we to reconcile it with Pennant's assertion that Mr. Carew Mildmay and Oglethorpe were "nearly the same age"? When Mr. Mildmay died in 1780 at the age of ninety-six (the age stated in all the baronetages we have seen) Oglethorpe was then only eighty-two, and there would appear a great discrepancy in their years. The general would have been comparatively a boy to Mildmay, and they could hardly have "often produced proofs to each other of the length of their recollections." If, however, we were to assume that they were contemporaries in age, as Oglethorpe died five years after Mildmay, it would bring him up to one hundred and one at his death, or nearly the age which some reported him. We are enabled, however, to set the matter at rest. Through the courtesy of that most civil of college servants, Mr. Moses Holliday, "bailiff" of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, we inspected the buttery books of that college. In those days there were only scholars and gentleman-commoners at Corpus. Amongst the latter the name of Oglethorpe occurs as in residence in 1714, and once or twice in 1715, when he ceased to reside. The volume for 1713 is either lost or mislaid, and we could not verify the Christian name, which was usually put down at entrance. However, the deficiency was kindly supplied by the keeper of the archives of the university, the reverend the warden of Wadham, who has sent us an extract from the register of matriculations of the university: "Term. Trin. [1714] Julii 8. C.C.C. Jacobus Oglethorpe 16 Theoph. f. Sti Jacobi Lond. Equ. fil." The date "1714" is not actually written in the register; but the date "1713" is written above the first entry of the preceding Hilary term. Here, then, we have the proof that James, son of Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, of St James's, London, was matriculated as of Corpus College, on the eighth of July, 1714, his age being then sixteen. He must have been born, then, in 1698; and at the date of his death, in 1785, would have been only eighty-seven.

The family of Oglethorpe was one of considerable antiquity, and originally seated at Oglethorpe in Yorkshire. We are informed that one of them was reeve of the county at the time of the Conquest. The ancient seat at Oglethorpe continued in the family till the civil wars, when it was lost for their loyalty.

The general's great-grandfather, William Oglethorpe, was born in 1588, and married Susannah, daughter of Sir William Sutton, and sister to Lord Lexington. He had a son and a daughter. The son, Sutton Oglethorpe, was born in 1612, and had two sons — (1) Sutton, who was stud-master to Charles II.; and (2) Theophilus. The second son, Theophilus, or, as he afterwards was, Sir Theophilus, was the general's father, and was born in 1650. He was lieutenant-colonel in the Duke of York's troop of Horse Guards, and from 1673 to 1679 one of the commissioners for executing the office of master of the horse. He appears to have purchased Westbrook Place, near Godalming, and to have obtained considerable Parliamentary influence in the now disfranchised borough of Haslemere, for which place he sat, as did his three sons after him. He seems to have sat previously for Morpeth in 1685. He is mentioned as first equerry to King James II., and a major-general in that monarch's army. Sir Theophilus married Eleanora Wall, of a considerable family in Ireland, by whom he had seven children. He died in 1702, and was buried in St. James's Church, Westminster, where is a monument to him and his son Lewis. The issue of his marriage consisted of three sons and four daughters. The eldest son, Lewis, was equerry to Queen Anne, and aide-de-camp to the Duke of Marlborough. He was killed at the battle of Schellenburg in 1704, at the age of twenty-two. Like his father, he sat for the borough of Haslemere. The second son, Theophilus, was aide-de-camp to the Duke of Ormond. He also sat for the family borough, and is mentioned as having died without issue before 1738. He seems to have been elected for Haslemere in 1708, and in 1710 is styled Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe. The third son, James Edward, was our general, whom we find first sitting for Haslemere in 1722. The daughters seem all to have married foreigners, and two of them were in the court of King James's queen at St. Germains. The correspondent of Sylvanus Urban says that the five eldest children were born in St. James's Palace, and adds that the story is well known, and was once much spread by the Whigs, who believed in the foolish tale of the warming-pan, that one of these children was the person introduced.

The Oglethorpes were always staunch Jacobites, and the general's father, Sir Theophilus, refused to serve under the Prince of Orange, who, after vainly endeavoring to gain him over, gave his regiment to the Lord Churchill's (afterwards Duke of Marlborough) brother. The known principles of the family, and their attachment to the Stuarts, brought suspicion (most unjustly, we feel assured) on our general himself in the "forty-five." It was probably to Mary Oglethorpe, the general's third sister, that Lady Cowper, with true Whig instinct, alludes in her diary, under the date of December 16, 1714: "Mrs. Clayton dined here. She told me that the Duchess of Bolton made great interest for Mrs. M. Oglethorpe to be a maid of honor (if a woman can be so that has had several children). The princess is mightily obliged to her Grace for the recommendation, for the Oglethorpes have always been spies to France, and this very woman took a journey thither the day after the queen was buried: and to be sure she had always been a spy upon the Whigs, her mother having turned her out of doors upon pretence of her being a Protestant and a Whig. So she harbored herself with those who were really so; particularly, she was always at my Lady Mohun's, where all the libertine Whigs were frequently, and she certainly did a world of harm that way." O fie! my Lady Cowper, we do not believe a word of your insinuation; and pray, were not your own family, the Claverings, notorious for their staunch Jacobite predilections? But how different do things appear to the eyes of the wife of a Whig lord chancellor!

As James Oglethorpe's name ceases to appear in the buttery-books of Corpus College in the year 1715, we find that in that year he received a captain-lieutenant's (we presume lieutenant and captain's) commission in the first troop of the Queen's Grenadiers. He was shortly afterwards, upon the recommendation of the Duke of Marlborough, appointed aide-de-camp and secretary to Prince Eugene, and accompanied him in the expedition against the Turks, and was present at the siege of Belgrade. Of this fact we are assured from a conversation at a dinner-party at the general's in 1772, when Dr. Johnson said, "'Pray, general, give us an account of the siege of Belgrade.' Upon which the general, pouring a little wine upon the table, described everything with a wet finger. 'Here we were, here were the Turks,' etc., etc. Johnson listened with the closest attention."* As this campaign took place in 1716, it is not impossible that he was, according to some accounts, aide-de-camp to the great Duke of Argyll,* in the suppression of the rebellion of 1715. But another statement in the pages of the Gentleman's Magazine is improbable, as the date will show that it was at a time when Oglethorpe had not even matriculated at Oxford, and was only fifteen: "The late general is known to have been aide-de-camp to the Earl of Peterborough in 1713, with whom Dr. Berkeley, his lordship's chaplain, was fellow-traveller in going express to the ambassador in Italy."

Belgrade having surrendered in 1717, and peace concluded in the following year, Oglethorpe would appear to have returned home. In 1722 he entered Parliament for the family borough of Haslemere. He seems to have been an active member of the House. About the year 1727 attention was called to the horrible state of our gaols. An acquaintance of the philanthropic Dr. Bray had made a casual visit to Whitechapel Prison, and his representation of the miserable state of the prisoners had such an effect on the doctor that he immediately applied himself to solicit benefactions for their relief, and the result was contributions sufficient to provide comforts for the inmates of that prison and the Borough Compter. About the same time Oglethorpe, upon visiting a friend in the Fleet, found him loaded with irons. This fact, coupled with Dr. Bray's discovery, led him to bring the matter before Parliament, when a committee was appointed, of which he was the chairman. The inquiry elicited the most shocking details, but it is satisfactory to know that it was attended with most beneficial results. The biographer of the worthy Dr. Bray (the founder of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel) informs us that "the inquiry into the state of the gaols brought about an interview between the doctor and Mr. (afterwards General) Oglethorpe." Bray was now in precarious health, and he was anxious that his philanthropic designs should be entrusted to a small body of trustees,† and Oglethorpe willingly undertook to be of the number, and engaged several others of rank and distinction to act with him. There can be little doubt that the friendship that thus sprung up between these two benevolent men, though destined to be shortly terminated by the death of Bray, much influenced Oglethorpe's subsequent career. Bray died in February, 1730, but it would seem that a scheme had been formed for establishing a colony in America, to which might be draughted off the surplus poor of the kingdom, with advantage to themselves and benefit to the country. Probably Oglethorpe had discussed the matter with his friend, but an opportunity now arose which would appear to have favored the design. The Abbé Raynal,* in his account of the foundation of Georgia, tells us: —

> One of those instances of benevolence which liberty, the source of every patriotic virtue, renders more frequent in England than in any other country, served to determine the views of government with regard to this place. A rich and humane citizen, at his death, left the whole of his estate to set at liberty such insolvent debtors as were detained in prison by their creditors. Prudential reasons of policy concurred in the performance of this will dictated by humanity; and the government gave orders that such unhappy prisoners as were released should be transplanted into that desert country that was now intended to be peopled; it was named Georgia in honor of the reigning sovereign. This instance of respect, the more pleasing as it was not the effect of flattery, and the execution of a design of so much real advantage to the state, were entirely the work of the nation. The Parliament added £9,843 15*s.* to the estate left by the will of the citizen, and a voluntary subscription † produced a much more considerable sum. General Oglethorpe, a man who had distinguished himself in the House of Commons by his taste for great designs, by his zeal for his country, and his passion for glory, was fixed upon to direct these public finances, and to carry into execution so excellent a project. Desirous of maintaining the reputation he had acquired, he chose to conduct himself the first colonists that were to be sent to Georgia; where he arrived in January, 1733, and fixed his people on a spot at ten miles' distance from the sea, in an agreeable and fertile plain on the banks of the Savannah. This rising settlement was called Savannah from the name of the river; and, inconsiderable as it was in its infant state, was, however, to become the capital of a flourishing colony. It consisted at first of no more than one hundred persons, but before the end of the year was increased to six hundred and eighteen, one hundred and twenty-seven of whom had emigrated at their own expense.

* History of the British Settlements in America, p. 142. Ed. Edinburgh, 1779.

† To this subscription Oglethorpe contributed very largely.

It will not be necessary in our brief notice of Oglethorpe to discuss the causes which eventually contributed to the want of success which attended this enterprise. The colony, even in its infancy, brought with it the seeds of its decay. Oglethorpe, however, during the ten years in which he was connected with it, amidst great disadvantages and apparently want of support from the home government, displayed qualities of much personal bravery and endurance. In 1734 he returned to England, bringing with him several Indian chiefs. The periodical literature of the day, as might be expected, is filled with the visit of Tomo Chiqui and his companions. They were duly presented to the king at Kensington, dined with the Archbishop of Canterbury (Potter) at Lambeth, and did the usual round of London sightseeing. We are told that > nothing was wanting to contribute to their diversion and amusement, and to give them a just idea of English politeness and respect. In return, they expressed themselves heartily attached to the British nation. Prince William* presented the young Micho, John Towanohowi, with a gold watch, with an admonition to call upon Jesus Christ every morning when he looked on it, which he promised. They appeared particularly delighted with seeing his Highness perform his exercise of riding the managed horse, the Horse Guards pass in review, and the agreeable appearance of the barges, etc., on the Thames on Lord Mayor's day.†

Oglethorpe appears now to have been at the zenith of popularity, and much interest was concentrated upon Georgia. In 1735 he returned to Georgia, having induced the brothers John and Charles Wesley to accompany him. Charles returned to England with despatches from Oglethorpe early in 1737, but John remained till the close of that year, when he left the colony under circumstances which do not seem to reflect much credit on him, but which are no doubt familiar to the readers of his biography by Coke and Moore. The Wesleys had sent an invitation to their friend George Whitefield to follow them to Georgia, and after some delay he set forth; but it is remarkable that he had sailed from the Downs only a few hours before the vessel which brought back John Wesley cast anchor there, the two ships, in fact, passing in sight of each other. Whitefield remained in the colony only till the close of 1738. Oglethorpe's reputation for philanthropy received a singular illustration from a somewhat eccentric personage, Mr. Robert North, of Scarborough, in 1735. Mr. North proposed to give prizes to those who should write in the Gentleman's Magazine the four best poems entitled "The Christian Hero." The prize was "to the person who shall make the best, a gold medal (intrinsic value about ten pounds), which shall have the head of the Right Hon. the Lady Elizabeth Hastings on one side, and that of James Oglethorpe, Esq., on the other, with this motto, 'England may challenge the world, 1736.'" Subsequently, in the magazine for February 1736, Mr. North begs pardon of the Lady Elizabeth for the uneasiness he had caused her by proposing to engrave her portrait on his prize-medal, but "hopes that Mr. Oglethorpe will be prevailed upon to consent that the medal shall bear his effigies."

As we have before observed, it would hardly interest our readers to enter into the details of the causes which contributed to the failure of the original plantation of Georgia; amongst them might be specified the heterogeneous nature of the population, and, added to this, the constant jealousy of the Spanish. While the more curious student might find scattered up and down the pages of contemporaneous literature a few passages discovering the interest felt in the project and the zeal and activity of Oglethorpe in the promotion of the welfare of the infant colony, to the general reader the story presents but little to excite attention. In 1741 the colony had dwindled down to about a sixth part of the original number. Oglethorpe finally returned home in September 1743, and in June 1744 his lieutenant-colonel was brought to a court-martial and broke for groundless charges against his chief. It does not, however, appear, that Oglethorpe had resolved not to return to his command, but an event which now took place seems to have determined the point. In the marriages for September 1744 we read, "The Hon. James Oglethorpe, Esq., general and commander-in-chief of his Majesty's forces in South Carolina and Georgia, and brigadier-general upon the British establishment, to Elizabeth, the only surviving heir of the late Sir Nathan Wright, of Cranham Hall, in Essex, Bart." From the following lines we must share the disappointment that awaited the colonists on this occasion: * —

* London Magazine, October, 1744.

In answer to a paragraph in a Letter from Charles Town, South Carolina, lately published in the Papers, which hoped the speedy Return of General Oglethorpe to that Part of the World.

By a LADY.

You wish in vain, it cannot be,
Tho' his appearance would be victory;
He who so many conquer'd had
Is now, himself, a captive made.

The fairest of Diana's train,
For whom so many sigh'd in vain,
Has bound him in her silken chain,
From whence he'll ne'er get loose again.

The son of Jove and Venus knew,
Who bravely fought could nobly woo,
And howsoe'er he dar'd in fight,
He'd force him yield to lovely WRIGHT.

But the brave general had other panegyrists besides the poetess, for in the November number of the London Magazine for 1744 is a really able article in his behalf, entitled "A Parallel between the late Earl of Peterborough and General Oglethorpe." One passage in this paper we must quote: —

> What pleasure must every friend to virtue and merit feel at the triumphs he has had over his unworthy accusers, and the consideration that has been paid him since his return! I believe the justice of his actions and the equity of his demands were infinitely agreeable to his Royal Master, and that he will still continue in the consideration that so many great and eminent qualities deserve, and forever engage the love and respect of his country, and the veneration of posterity.

Whatever may have been the attempts to throw discredit upon his military career, it is clear he had not lost the confidence of the king, and in the rising of "the forty-five" he was appointed to a command. On his return to London, in 1746, without ever having actively engaged "the rebels," he was accused of neglect of duty and the non-juring proclivities of his family were insinuated, but he was acquitted of the charges, and honorably gazetted on the 21st of October in that year. With this event his military career closed.

Oglethorpe had sat continually from 1722 for Haslemere, with which borough his family had been closely connected since 1698. He appears to have been an active member, and ever ready in philanthropic projects. We have already seen the zeal he displayed in prison reform, a zeal in which he and Dr. Bray showed themselves no unworthy forerunners of the far-famed John Howard. In 1750, he took a great interest in establishing the herring fishery, and was one of the council. In 1754, however, he lost his election for the seat which had been filled by his father, brothers, and himself for upwards of half a century.* Whether he had now parted with the family house at Westbrook Place we have not investigated; but probably on marrying the heiress of Cranham he had so done, and thus lessened his influence at Haslemere. The writer of the notice of the general's death in the Gentleman's Magazine describes Westbrook Place as "a beautiful situation in a beautiful country. The gardens beautiful. The general planted a vineyard, now much decayed."

Upon his retirement from Parliament, Oglethorpe devoted himself to various schemes of public and private charity. His name will be found on the committees of most of the benevolent institutions of the day, and we can well imagine the activity he took in every good work, by finding his co-operation so earnestly sought after. Nor was his benevolence confined to public institutions. He could discern and foster merit in private stations. Boswell, in describing the success of Johnson's poem of "London" (published in 1738), adds: —

> One of the warmest patrons of this poem on its first appearance was General Oglethorpe, whose strong "benevolence of soul" was unabated during the course of a very long life; though it is painful to think that he had but too much reason to become cold and callous, and discontented with the world, from the neglect which he experienced of his public and private worth by those in whose power it was to gratify so gallant a veteran with marks of distinction. This extraordinary person was as remarkable for his learning and taste, as for his other eminent qualities; and no man was more prompt, active, and generous in encouraging merit. I have heard Johnson gratefully acknowledge, in his presence, the kind and effectual support which he gave to his "London," though unacquainted with its author.

And we can imagine some kind act from the following, in a letter dated Feb. 7, 1774: "Mr. Oglethorpe was with me this morning; you know his errand. He was not unwelcome."

The glimpse that Boswell's pages afford us of the general's social life is very interesting. He seems to have surrounded himself with the most of the literary men of the day, and "a cover at his hospitable board" was an honor much appreciated by Master Boswell. He tells us: —

> Monday, April 10, 1775, I dined with him (Johnson) at General Oglethorpe's with Mr. Langton, and the Irish Dr. Campbell, whom the general had obligingly given me leave to bring with me. This learned gentleman was thus gratified with a very high intellectual feast, by not only being in company with Dr. Johnson, but with General Oglethorpe, who had been so long a celebrated name both at home and abroad.

A dinner on the same day, three years previously (1772), affords us a curious anecdote or two. Boswell started the question of the morality of duelling; after discussing which, —

> The general told us that when he was a very young man, I think only fifteen,* serving under Prince Eugene of Savoy, he was sitting in a company at table with a prince of Würtemberg. The prince took up a glass of wine, and, by a fillip, made some of it fly in Oglethorpe's face. Here was a nice dilemma. To have challenged him instantly might have fixed a quarrelsome character on the young soldier: to have taken no notice of it might have been considered as cowardice. Oglethorpe, therefore, keeping his eye upon the prince, and smiling all the time, as if he took what his Highness had done in jest, said, "Mon prince" — I forget the French words he used, the purport, however, was, "That's a good joke; but we do it much better in England," and threw a whole glass of wine in the prince's face. An old general, who sat by, said, "Il a bien fait, mon prince, vous l'avez commencé;" and thus all ended in good humor.

We fancy that we have read somewhere of the "first gentleman in Europe" having committed a similar act of blackguardism, when the officer, whom he insulted, threw a glass into his neighbor's face, saying, "Pass it on." At this same dinner-party, the subject of ghosts being introduced —

> Johnson repeated what he had told me of a friend of his, an honest man, and a man of sense, having asserted to him that he had seen an apparition. Goldsmith told us he was assured by his brother, the Reverend Mr. Goldsmith, that he also had seen one. General Oglethorpe told us that Prendergast, an officer in the Duke of Marlborough's army, had mentioned to many of his friends that he should die on a particular day; that upon that day a battle took place with the French; that after it was over and Prendergast was still

* At this election Mr. Philip Carteret Webb was chosen, and we are told "it is well known and remembered by the humorous ballad of 'The Cow of Haslemere,' attributed to Dr. King, of Oxford, and printed that year in folio." — Nichols's "Bowyer," p. 297.

* We have seen that this cannot be true, as he was at Oxford when sixteen.

alive, his brother officers, while they were yet in the field, jestingly asked him where was his prophecy now. Prendergast gravely answered, "I shall die notwithstanding what you see." Soon afterwards there came a shot from a French battery, to which the orders for a cessation of arms had not reached, and he was killed upon the spot. Colonel Cecil, who took possession of his effects, found in his pocket-book the following solemn entry: "Dreamt — or ——* Sir John Freind meets me" (here the very day on which he was killed was mentioned). Prendergast had been connected with Sir John Freind, who was executed for high treason. General Oglethorpe said he was with Colonel Cecil when Pope came and inquired into the truth of this story, which made a great noise at the time, and was then confirmed by the colonel.

Right pleasant, Master Boswell, must have been General Oglethorpe's dinners, and lovable the giver; and would that we could know more of his personal history! We cannot, however, quite assent to Joseph Warton's assertion that "he was at once a great hero and a great legislator." He was, doubtless, a brave, honorable man, a thorough "fine old English gentleman," earnestly discharging his duty, to the best of his ability, in the senate and in the field. His supposed Jacobite tendencies excited the animosity of the Whigs, to his exclusion from those professional honors to which he was otherwise justly entitled; and the same reason probably elevated him in the eyes of such admirers as Dr. Johnson. To us, however, he appears in the light of an eminently philanthropic man and good Christian, who adorned the lax and sceptical age in which he lived by an example of genuine piety in faith and practice; and who will ever recall to our minds the ideal of the "chevalier sans peur et sans reproche."

A passage in our narrative may be corrected from the Gentleman's Magazine for November 1787, in an obituary notice of the general's widow, at the age of 77. It would seem from her will that she was wealthy, and that Westbrook Place was still in her possession. The writer says: "To her magnanimity and prudence, on an occasion of much difficulty, it was owing that the evening of their lives was tranquil and pleasant, after a stormy noon."

* Boswell suggests the blank might be filled up, "was told by an apparition."

A SPANISH BULL-FIGHT.

[To the Editor of the Spectator.]

Sir, — The small town of Amélie-les-Bains, in the eastern Pyrenees, close to the Spanish frontier, under the shadow of Mont Canigon, and hanging over the gorges of the River Tech, and its tributary, the Mondony, has been this week en fête, and middle-class French and Spaniards, and peasants of both countries, have flocked in for their annual jollification. The usual gambling-stalls, where you invest your sou and run your chance for a packet of sweatmeats or whatever else you have a mind to, offered temptations as irresistible as ever; the bains and boissons refreshed the guests as far as hot-sulphur waters can refresh, and the time passed gaily with music and dancing à la Catalan. But chief among the attractions, and that which is looked forward to as the great event of the feast, is the bull-fight. For days the terrace on which the thermes Romains are placed was in preparation for the occasion; barriers were put up, surmounted by benches, and the place turned into a small amphitheatre. Some American friends of ours offered us room at a window in their hotel which overlooked the scene, but we said with great self-abnegation, "No! bull-fights are bloody and brutal, and as the only English here, we will uphold our testimony against them." "Not at all," said they. "No horses are used, and neither the matadores nor the bulls are ever hurt; we have seen them in Barcelona, and a more harmless exhibition could not be witnessed." "Is it possible?" and with some slight misgiving at what promised to be rather a slow affair, we accepted our places. Many things in travelling come to modify one's prievously conceived ideas, but was it possible that our notions of a Spanish bull-fight were all wrong?

The preparations being complete, the ground was cleared, the matadores, two in number, with one or two non-professional volunteers, put themselves in readiness, and the first bull rushed into the arena. He was small, and appeared frightened out of his senses by the spectacle that met him, the clamor of the people, and the din of the music, and seemed more solicitous for his own safety than anxious for the blood of his antagonists.

Some appearance of wrath was, however, excited in him by the matadores, who did their utmost with red blanket and goads to irritate him, and he was induced to "run" them once or twice, but in a manner so inefficient that it could have resulted in nothing, even if the men had kept their ground. At length, when nothing more could be got out of the animal, he was let out, and another was driven in, with a similar result, the spectators doing their best to aid the matadores in their endeavors to excite the poor panic-stricken beast, until he, too, was allowed to escape. Three or four more followed, all insignificant and without fight; nevertheless, the matadores, who need not have moved an inch for any of them, did what they could to keep up the delusion of danger by running away and jumping up the barriers. In the case of another beast who showed no better "form," a big fellow from among the spectators jumped into the arena, and after one or two unsuccessful attempts, succeeded in taking the bull by the horns. Then ensued a somewhat novel wrestling-match, man against bull. The man, despite the frantic struggles of the bull, kept his hold, and the bull, in his endeavors to get loose, finally tumbled over on his side, amidst the vociferous applause of the spectators. On regaining his feet, the animal, finding his exit unopposed, rushed out of the place, as if conscious of his humiliation. This incident was not uninteresting, but it was hardly in accordance with anticipation, and was more enjoyed by the spectators than by the matadores. To show that they also were capable of such a feat, the next bull was secured by one of them, who had a good dance with him, another matadore the while clinging to the animal's tail. Emboldened by these exploits, others among the spectators descended to try their hands, and to win applause apparently so easily obtained, but the matadores, seeing that the credit and dignity of their sport were at stake, refused to allow the interference, and so irritated did they become, that for some minutes there was every probability of a hand-to-hand fight. The public, however, besought their patience, and with the aid of the police, who promptly appeared as in France they always do, succeeded in pacifying them, and the entertainment proceeded. The best sport of the legitimate sort was shown by a cow that was wild with mingled rage and fear, and as her horns were long and sharp and well forward on her head, and as she was remarkably nimble on her feet, she was rather formidable. One of the volunteer matadores, whilst attempting to elude one of her fiery dashes, fell, and might have been hurt if she had had any persistence, but the animal was so distracted that she missed her opportunity. Even the courage of this cow, however, seemed to depend more on the fear shown by her antagonists, who fled to the barricades at every assault, than from any disposition of her own.

Among the remaining beasts was a calf, who looked on the whole proceedings as a lark, and enjoyed a frisk round the arena without once dreaming of trying to stick anybody, and the cow, his mother, who, having been separated from her offspring, was expected to show some exasperation, could not overcome her abject terror, and fled in all directions. Having run through the herd, the best were put through a second time, but with the exception of the wild cow, who pawed the ground, and alone showed any proper feeling, there was nothing to be done with them; and the fight, after a duration of two hours and a half, came to an end, the people dispersing with much satisfaction. The "course" was described as better than that of last year, and whether ironically or not, I do not know, as "magnifique." For my own part, it appeared ridiculous, and that such preparations should be made and pilgrimages performed for the sake of such a farce, passes my comprehension. But at any rate, here was a bull-fight without any approach to cruelty, and in which there was nothing that could blunt or degrade the most humane susceptibilities. What proportion of Spanish bull-fights are conducted like this one and those which at Barcelona take place every Sunday, I do not know; but I fancy that those exhibitions of wholesale slaughter of bulls and horses and of imminent danger to men which have colored our idea of the Spanish national character, are not very common, and are somewhat exaggerated. — I am sir, etc., FRED. BURGESS.

HYMN BY ST. COLUMBA.

I.

SWEET is to me in Uchd Alŭinn,*
On a peaked crag to be,
That I might often behold
The face of the boundless sea.

II.

To look on the heaving waves,
While in their Father's ear
Music forever they chant, Hymning the world's career.

III.

The level and star-bright strand
No sorrow it were to see,
And to hear the wondrous birds,
Sailing on happily.

IV.

The thunder of crowding waves
To hear on the rocky shore.
And down by the church to hear
The sounding surges roar.

V.

To see the swift-flying flocks
Over the watery plain,
And, greatest of wonders all,
The monsters of the main.

VI.

To see the ebb and the flood
In power upon the sea,
And Cul-ri-Erin† there, I say,
My secret name would be.

VII.

And grief would come to my heart,
While gazing to her shore,
And all the many ills I've done
I weeping would deplore.

VIII.

The Godhead then would I bless,
Him who doth all things keep,
Heaven with its orders bright untold,
And earth and shore and deep.

IX.

I would search in all the books
That good to my soul would bring,
Now to beloved Heaven I'd kneel,
And now a psalm I'd sing.

X.

Heaven's high one, the holy Chief,
My thoughts would now employ,
Anon, to work without constraint
Would be to me a joy.

XI.

Dulse from the rocks I would pluck,
At times I'd fishing go,
At times I would feed the poor,
Now in the cell bend low.

XII.

Best counsel in the sight of God
To me there hath been given,
From error he shall keep me free,
My king, the Lord of Heaven!

LEITH HILL.

["Hereabouts is a thing remarkable, though but little taken notice of, — I mean that goodly prospect from the top of Leith Hill. . . . The like, I think, is not to be found in any part of England, or perhaps Europe besides; and the reason why it is not more observed is partly its lying quite out of any road, and partly its rising so gently, and making so little show till one is got to the very top of it." — Camden's Britannia.]

YES, — thirty years ago
Last Easter Day, two striplings topped thy height
Leaping and singing, turned, in hushed delight
Gazed on the marvellous landscape spread below.

Twenty-four years ago,
Three sauntering friends slowly strolled up: there sat
Long summer hours of jest and tale and chat, —
The shimmering view in sunshine all aglow!

A dozen years ago,
Again I climbed thy side: this time, alack!
With wife, and eldest-born apickaback, —
How the young rascal made me sweat and blow!

I, a few weeks ago
Toilsomely scale thy steep one autumn day,
And land and sky look misty, sad, and grey, —
Or is the mist in me? I am changed so!

Old friends of long ago,
Buffeted, scattered, world-worn and way-sore;
Or, won that hill where Moses stood of yore, —
A goodlier prospect than this world can show!

But the great view below,
These counties stretching to the far-off sea,
With chessboard field, toy farm, and pigmy tree,
Are what old Camden saw, three hundred years ago.

Spectator. M.

From The Cornhill Magazine.

THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

THE eighteenth century, so near to us and yet so far from us, possesses this peculiar charm, that its proximity in point of time enables us to realize to ourselves habits of life, and modes of thought, almost as remote from our own as those of the Elizabethan age. What it requires the powerful imagination of the poet or the novelist to do for us in respect of the sixteenth century, that every man can do for himself in respect of the eighteenth. We can live as familiarly with the men of a hundred years ago as if we had known them ourselves; and yet we are sure that if by any miracle we could be thrown back among them for a day, their talk, their ideas, their very dress, would seem as strange to us as if they belonged to another world. Johnson at the Mitre Tavern, Cowper at the Olney tea-table, Fox shooting partridges at Holkham, Pitt and Bentham playing chess at Bowood, Dr. Taylor and his sleek black horses, might almost be our own contemporaries. Thirty years ago the old tavern life of London still survived. Dinner hours in the country were still sufficiently early to admit of chess and cards being introduced in the evening. A few years earlier Lord Althorpe was still shooting partridges with pointers and setters over the ground trodden by Charles Fox. And numerous Doctor Taylors still survived among the clergy, though they had exchanged their bobwigs and coaches for the less clerical costume of cross-barred stiff ties and one-horse gigs. In the pictures we have hastily recalled, there is nothing strange or unfamiliar. Yet make these figures speak, let them once begin to talk of politics, or literature, or religion, or pleasure, or "society," and we find ourselves in a different world. When personal government by the sovereign was a recognized principle in politics; when the authority of Dr. Johnson was universally accepted in literature; when the Church of England was so supremely popular that the clergy could afford to take their ease and live pretty much like laymen; when the "quality" still frequented Vauxhall and Ranelagh; when ladies of title gave convivial suppers, and were exposed to the same kind of attentions from their inebriated guests as Marlow pays to Miss Hardcastle — it is difficult to believe that in many other respects life was pretty much the same as at the commencement of the present reign. The immense remoteness of such scenes and such ideas from our own experience was combined with the nearness of the two periods to each other in point of time; so much so that opinions and practice as unfamiliar to ourselves as those of a Strafford or a Rochester, were a matter of course with men whom we seem to know as well as our grandfathers — forms a contrast which is perhaps without a parallel.

Till recent years the eighteenth century had a bad name among us. The Lake school had raised a prejudice against its literature. Reformers of every shade heaped abuse upon its politics. Moralists condemned its vices. The High Churchman of 1833 blotted it from his calendar. It was generally voted an unspiritual, "unideal," and materialistic age; when men had lost their hold on great principles, when faith had given way to sense, and theology to evidences. It was an age of coarse enjoyments, of beef and pudding, and port, and punch, and beer. Mr. Thackeray has remarked how fat people were in the eighteenth century. And it is quite true that in any family portrait-gallery one may trace a marked difference between the faces of the eighteenth and the faces of the seventeenth century. But it was forgotten that the eighteenth century, if not an age of great thoughts, was pre-eminently an age of great deeds. In the eighteenth century constitutional government was established, and the British empire was created. Political eloquence then reached its highest pitch; and there breathes through the language of British statesmen, in their intercourse with foreign states, that "calm pride," as Mr. Matthew Arnold has so well observed, which is peculiar to an age of aristocracy.

Mr. Thackeray, we think, was the first English man of letters who recognized the rich materials which the eighteenth century afforded for literary treatment. And in "The Virginians" and "Esmond," in the "Humorists" and "The Four Georges," he has shown what good use he could make of them. Since then, George Eliot has given us pictures of provincial and rural life, which though they lie quite at the end of the last century, and partly in the beginning of the present one, are no doubt faithful representations of our country towns and villages any time during the reign of George the Third. Mr. Froude, in his "Short Essays on Great Subjects," has two or three very striking papers on the condition of England during the same period, in which he claims for it the superiority over ourselves in many respects in which we have been accustomed to look down upon it from an infinite height of self-complacency. Still more lately Mr. Lecky and others have given us works of great learning and ability on the same subject; so that public interest in the eighteenth century is now thoroughly awakened, and we begin to see, with more clearness than before, what were its leading characteristics, and to appreciate the wheat among the tares, of which last, no doubt, it yielded an abundant crop.

In looking back upon the eighteenth century, one of the first things which strike us is the air of repose which breathes over it. It reminds one of the land of the lotus-eaters, "in which it seemed always afternoon." And this, too, in spite of an occasional rebellion, or a serious riot, which would startle us out of our propriety at the present day. But the eighteenth century took things very easily. George the Second was rather frightened in 1745; a few Londoners left the city; and a few people in the country, Lord Eldon's mother among the number, got out of the direct line of the armies. But, on the whole, the irruption of the Highlanders seems to have been regarded with great indifference. And it is wonderful how shortly all record of it was forgotten. There are probably fewer local traditions of Prince Charles's advance into England than of any event in history of equal magnitude and interest. The fact is, nobody cared. It was an age in which nobody cared very much. And when the Highlanders retreated the wave closed over them, and left hardly a trace behind. The British public, again reminding us of the lotus-eaters, were in no mind to be startled out of their pleasant doze. They had had enough of action and of motion; they had gone through two revolutions, a religious and a civil one. There had been burning, and fighting, and exile, and confiscation, on and off, for two centuries. They had grown weary of these troubles, and of the principles by which they had been caused. They would fight no more for an idea; of that they were quite certain. And though, when a Spaniard or a Frenchman became troublesome, John Bull flared up for a moment to chastise him, he soon sank back again into his accustomed indolence, basking in the sunshine of domestic peace and prosperity, and venerating the institutions of the country as they enabled him to do so. It is the life of "Old Leisure," that inimitable portrait drawn by one of the greatest literary artists which the fair sex has produced in this country, which greets us everywhere in that happy time — πρὶν ἐλθεῖν υἱὰς Ἀχαίων — before the French Revolution had made all the world eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and had brought death and democracy into the societies of Europe.

In spite of the one great question which must still have kept the minds of politicians unsettled during the first half of the eighteenth century, the repose of which we speak extended itself to the world of politics. Till we look more closely into the matter, we are puzzled to know what the Houses of Parliament could have found to talk about during the reign of the first two Georges. What, however, really gave life and meaning to the Parliamentary opposition of those days, was that old antagonism between land and trade which was the growth of the Revolution, and of which the ridiculous side is shown us in Addison's "Freeholder," and the more reasonable one in Shelburne's "Autobiography." The complaint was that by leaning exclusively on the trading class, the government had created an artificial interest, through which they were enabled to override the natural interests of the country, and to defy the majority of the nation. Enough of feudalism still survived to make it generally believed that the landowners under the sovereign were the natural leaders of the people. And it is the fierce struggle for existence of this ancient principle, with the new political ideas then beginning to assert themselves, which is the key to much of the Parliamentary history of the period. The country gentlemen, then the really independent party, had a second grievance also. They held that the new Parliamentary system was not constitutional. Lord Shelburne, who, for the age in which he lived, was what we should now call an advanced Liberal, constantly speaks of this system as a sham. The monarchy was only a convenient cloak for the real supremacy of a faction, and the dictatorship of a single minister. This, the country gentlemen contended, was not what they meant when they accepted the new dynasty. Non hæc in fœdera veni, said the Tory party. They were all staunchly monarchical, and they were now palmed off with a counterfeit. It would be foreign to the purpose of the present article to discuss the reasonableness or unreasonableness of these complaints. We are trying only to realize as closely as possible the Parliamentary life of the period, and what it was that gave reality and meaning to that Tory opposition, so much talked of and so little understood, which was led by Wyndham and inspired by Bolingbroke. We know better since the publication of Lord Shelburne's life what Sir William talked about to the Somersetshire squires when he assembled them round his table at Orchard Wyndham, or drank a glass of punch with them at the neighboring bowling-green. "During the first twenty years of the reign of George II. there were three parties: first, the old Whigs, who entirely composed the administration; secondly, the discontented Whigs, who, one after another, quarrelled with Sir Robert Walpole and the main body; thirdly, the Tories, to whose character and principles sufficient justice has not been done, owing to the never-ceasing outcry of ministers in confounding them with the Jacobites; but, in fact, they were the landed interest of England, who desired to see an honorable, dignified government, conducted with order and due economy and due subordination, in opposition to the Whigs, who courted the mob in the first instance, and in the next the commercial interest."

These, then, were the real principles of opposition. The Whigs had exalted the trading interest at the expense of the land, and, by setting up a sham monarchy instead of a real one, had violated the spirit of the constitution. But, on the whole, it was an age of repose. Ministers had to undergo an annual baiting on the Germanizing policy of the court and on the increase of the national debt, the bugbear which afflicted our ancestors with a perpetual panic. But the outside political world was stirred hardly by a single ripple. Of legal or constitutional changes no serious sound was ever heard. When Walpole was asked by the Dissenters when the time would arrive for removing their disabilities, he answered, "Never." Now and then there was a murmur of triennial Parliaments, and a whisper of Parliamentary reform. But the aversion of the people to any further changes was too deeply rooted to permit of either question being seriously entertained, and established institutions slumbered on in absolute security. In spite of the parvenu trade, the peerage and the gentry were still the real governing powers in the country, and their supremacy was cheerfully accepted as one of the eternal laws of nature. Mr. Lecky, in a very fine passage, sums up the advantages and disadvantages of aristocratic government, deciding in its favor by several lengths — if I may use such an expression. By the aristocracy, however, he seems to mean principally the nobility; and he is clearly of opinion that the oligarchical arrangements of the eighteenth century, against which the country party protested so long and so loudly, were a decided benefit to the nation. He thinks that, as far as they still exist, they are so still. But this is a political speculation upon which I am precluded from entering.

If we turn to the Church, we find her still regarded by ninety-nine hundredths of the people as our great bulwark against Popery; and her external repose during this long period of time was even still more unruffled than the repose of the political world. It must not, however, be supposed that the apparent torpor of the eighteenth century was inconsistent with practical religion. Clarissa Harlowe, as Mr. Froude points out, found daily service in the London churches as easily as she could now; and Cowper found the same at Huntingdon in 1765. This was not the case in rural parishes, it is true; but George Eliot testifies to the truly religious spirit of the English farmers and peasantry seventy and eighty years ago: and what they were then we may reasonably conclude them to have been seventy and eighty years before. They had that kind of religiousness which springs from absolute belief in the doctrines of religion — and when it is said that the eighteenth century was not an age of faith, the statement can only be received with considerable reservation, and in reference to a sphere of thought far removed above the level even of the middle classes. Controversial theologians admitted that no doctrine could be authorized by faith which was not accepted by reason. But the great mass of the people knew nothing of such theories.

"To the masses of the English people," says Mr. Froude, "to the parishioners who gathered on Sunday into the churches, whose ideas were confined to the round of their common occupations, who never left their own neighborhood, never saw a newspaper or read a book but the Bible and the "Pilgrim's Progress," the main facts of the gospel history were as indisputably true as the elementary laws of the universe. That Christ had risen from the dead was as true as that the sun had risen that morning. That they would themselves rise was as certain as that they would die, and as positively would one day be called to judgment for the good or ill they had done in life."

And as was their religious, so was their moral repose. No troublesome doubts, no distracting newspapers, found their way into those peaceful villages, where parson and squire, farmer and laborer, made up a little community by themselves, self-contained, self-governed, satisfied with themselves and with each other, and knowing nothing and caring nothing for the great world outside. The natural and "underived" authority of the gentry and clergy was as unquestioned as the law which they administered, or the doctrines which they preached. One generation succeeded to another, but life continued just the same. The old man saw in his age the things which he had seen in his youth. That longing for confirmed tranquillity which Wordsworth speaks of as one of the strongest instincts of our nature, might then be satisfied. At the present day we never know how soon any of our old landmarks, be they customs, institutions, beliefs, or even the mere features of nature, may be ruthlessly demolished. We scarcely dare allow our affections to go out from us to twine themselves round any external object, for fear it should be suddenly torn up. To be afraid to love anything, for fear we should be obliged to mourn for it, is one form of human unhappiness for which heavy compensation of some kind is due to us at the hands of progress. The eighteenth century had little progress; but then it had little worry, and no doubt. The most ardent Ritualist nowadays, says the essayist already quoted, feels that the ground is hollow under him. The most ardent Conservative knows that institutions are everywhere on their trial, that authority is everywhere disputed, that subordination is everywhere derided. But to the men of the eighteenth century none of these disquieting elements presented themselves. Everything around them spoke of permanence, stability, and security; institutions were regarded as facts about which it was ridiculous to argue. It was not supposed possible that we could do without the Church and the monarchy. There was a reality and solidity about men's convictions in those days which must have been a great source of moral and intellectual comfort. Happy they who lived in the pre-scientific age! Happy Old Leisure, sauntering by his garden wall, and picking the leaves off the apricots! Happy old vicar, smoking his pipe in peace, unvexed of Darwins and Colensos, scratching the head of his faithful old brown setter, with his old single-barrelled flint-and-steel in the corner by his side!

A good many words and phrases which were once held in high honor in the country have been turned into ridicule by the choicer religious spirits of our own time. Among these "the sober piety" of our ancestors has come in for its full share of laughter, and has been associated in people's minds with square, high-backed pews, fiddles and bassoons in the gallery, nasal responses pronounced by the clerk alone, and a good deal of sleeping during the sermon. Yet it is doubtful if more solid fruits were not borne by this uninteresting tree than are produced either by the fervor of Ritualism or the inspirations of "Humanity." Whether it is a fact or not that English work, for instance, has fallen off since the eighteenth century in thoroughness and honesty I do not undertake to say; but the affirmative has been widely maintained, without, as far as I know, provoking any serious contradiction, and has been acknowledged with regret by some of the warmest friends and admirers of the working classes. The evil, however, if it really exists, is not confined to them. Small traders of every description are charged with selling and constructing articles which are not what they represent them to be; and that old English pride in a good piece of honest work which was once so general is said to be growing rarer and rarer. If so, I cannot imagine anything more calculated to make us doubtful of the superior religious earnestness of the present day. At all events, without proceeding any further with this comparison, I shall certainly claim for the eighteenth century its own fair share of earnestness both in religion and the duties of daily life.

And there is no doubt that in some other qualities which the general consent of mankind has till quite recent times esteemed highly beneficial to society, the eighteenth century was more largely endowed than its successor — I mean respect for law and constituted authority as such, and that kind of rational self-knowledge which recognizes the facts of human nature, and not only sees nothing degrading in subordination, but accepts it as the one essential condition of all permanent political communities. This, too, is earnestness of its kind — a determination not to be turned away from facing realities by any flattering or sentimental theories which rest on no visible foundation. I hope I shall not be so far misunderstood as to be supposed to deny that there is any other kind of earnestness. There is the earnestness of inquiry and curiosity — the earnestness which seeks the law within the law. But there is also the earnestness which comes of a simple desire to perform our allotted duties under the system of things which we find to be in existence, and asks for no higher satisfaction than the consciousness of having been successful. I cannot help thinking that of this kind of earnestness there was rather more in the last century than there is in the present. The motto of Englishmen then was, Spartam nactus es, hanc orna. And it was, I think, the mixture of this simple sense of duty with the coarser moral fibre of the period which produced such men as Clive and Hastings and many of our great Indian and colonial administrators, with whom their duty to their country was an all-sufficient motive of action and ample warrant for the means they might adopt in the discharge of it.

The coarseness of private manners was only one form of the general license which was the inevitable product of the Revolution. It was not till late in the eighteenth century that society began to recover from the moral shock occasioned by the rupture of old ties, the rejection of old sanctions, and the extinction of an old faith which followed that event. The ideal, romantic, or imaginative element — call it what you will — had been crushed out of Church and State with the expulsion of the Stuarts and the remodelling of our religious institutions on a rational basis. The inevitable result was an influx among the upper classes of both political and religious indifference, which, where it did not end in absolute scepticism, was wholly ineffectual against the temptations of the world and the flesh. The influence, in a word, of the English Revolution upon English morals was the influence of all revolutions upon all morals in all ages of the world. Political infidelity is their first fruit, and social license their second. The effect in England was visible of course long before the final act of that great drama. But with that period we are not concerned. A change began to show itself after the middle of the century. We hear no more of such doings as went on with Queen Caroline's maids of honor; of such letters as may be found in the correspondence of Lady Suffolk. Political corruption began to wane, and, after one fresh outburst under Fox and Newcastle at the beginning of George the Third's reign, subsided forever. Literature became purer, and "Tom Jones," "Clarissa Harlowe," and "Peregrine Pickle" gradually became impossibilities. Mr. Lecky has noticed, in a very interesting passage, the concurrent influence of Wesley and Lord Chatham in this purification of the atmosphere. To these names may be added those of Johnson and Cowper. Chatham in politics, Wesley in religion, and Johnson and Cowper in literature, were working for the same end. Chatham infused a wholly new tone into the language of public men. Wesley recalled society to some small consideration for its eternal welfare; and Johnson showed how a man of infinite humor, robust common sense, and of a strong animal nature, could be at the same time "the great moralist," the enthusiastic High Churchman, and the conscientious Christian. The influence of Cowper is to be traced rather in our literature than in our manners; and it must be confessed that down even to the French Revolution, manners, in spite of Wesley and in spite of Johnson, retained much of their original laxity. That awful crash sobered them in a moment. The English aristocracy began to be afraid of opinion; and Charles Fox dated the downfall of good-fellowship, and of really good conversation, which to be good must be fearless, from the same epoch. So late, however, as 1787, we find plenty of evidence that "society" had not lost its spirits. In March 1787 Sir Gilbert Elliot writes to his wife as follows: "From the Opera I went to Mrs. Crewe's (to supper), where there was a large party and pleasant people among them — for example, Tom Pelham, Mundy, Mrs. Sheridan, Lady Palmerston, etc., etc.; besides all which were three young men so drunk as to puzzle the whole assembly. They were Orlando Bridgeman, Charles Greville, and a Mr. Gifford, who is lately come to a good estate of about 5,000*l.* a year, the whole of which he is in the act of spending in one or two years at most — and this without a grain of sense, without any fun to himself or entertainment to others. He never uttered a word, though as drunk as the other two, who were both riotous, and began at last to talk so plain that Lady Francis and Lady Palmerston fled from their side-table to ours, and Mrs. Sheridan would have followed them, but did not make her escape till her arms were black and blue, and her apron torn off."

And again, two months afterwards: "I was last night at the masquerade at Vauxhall with the Palmerstons, the Culverdens, Miss Burney, Windham, Pelham, etc. I went in despair, as I always do on such services; but it answered vastly well, and I was more amused than usual at such places. The buildings and decorations were really fine and well-designed. No heat nor much cold; a great many people, but no crowd on account of the ground. A good supper, and a blackguardish company, with a dash of good company, and no riot while we stayed, which was past three o'clock; but the Vauxhall squeak was just heard, and people were becoming very tender and very quarrelsome."

And in fact the extent to which society in those days lived out of doors and in public must have been a constant temptation to intrigue. Its masquerades, its Vauxhall Gardens, its Mrs. Cornely's, afforded every facility for assignations and adventures of every kind; and, if we may credit the Gentleman's Magazine, were sometimes made use of for the perpetration of criminal outrages. The miscellaneous character of the company, moreover, was anything but favorable to innocence; nuns from Drury Lane, and milkmaids from St. James's Square, mixing together with perfect freedom and equality. A further illustration of the laxity of tone at all events, which still prevailed in good society, may be seen in a letter written by Miss North to a female friend, and published in the Auckland memoirs, in which she regales her with the latest piece of scandal in a style as piquant as it is surprising.

One of the greatest social nuisances of the eighteenth century were the men-servants. We all know the figure they make in the plays of that period; the impudent blackguards whom any gentleman at the present day would kick down-stairs before they had been five minutes in his company. These are doubtless exaggerations; but the fact was, that in the fashionable world at that time, a servant was under little more obligation to be civil to his master, than a cabman is now to be civil to his fare. He lived by society, more than by any individual member of it. His real wages were the vails which were paid him by his master's friends; and a place was then good or bad, not according to the character of the employer, the amount of work which he required, or the money remuneration which he paid, but according to the number and quality of his company. This system naturally led to servants being kept in great numbers. In "The Constant Couple" we find a widow lady and her daughter, of good position, but not particularly rich, with four footmen in the house. They formed a society of their own, with their own rights and privileges, and could be as troublesome on occasion as the 'prentices of London were a century before. They had the right of free admission to the upper gallery of the theatre. And when their riotous behavior made it necessary to expel them, in the year 1737, it was not done till five-and-twenty persons had been seriously injured. As they lived principally on board wages, they had their own clubs and taverns, as indeed they have now, where they swore, drank, and gambled like their betters. Of the grievous burden which the system of vails entailed upon the poorer class of visitors, when money was worth nearly double what it is now, innumerable anecdotes remain. Of these the most amusing is of Steele and Bishop Hoadly visiting the Duke of Marlborough, when, on taking their departure through lines of rich liveries, Steele found he had not got money enough for the whole number, and made the servants a speech instead, complimenting them on their critical powers, and inviting them all gratis to Drury Lane Theatre to whatever play they might choose to bespeak. The worst of it was, that guests were expected to fee all the servants in the house, from the highest to the lowest; and Mr. Roberts has preserved a table of vails kept by one of the Burrell family, in which the gardeners, under-gardeners, undercook, errand-boy, and nurse figure with the chief domestics. The nuisance, however, was very tenacious of life, and is not dead yet. In fact, among one class of country servants, namely gamekeepers, it is hardly, if at all, abated.

Before quitting London for the country, as the Londoners themselves always did in the month of May, I may glance briefly at the literature of the age of which London was the centre. We all know Macaulay's picture of the degraded condition of literature between the disappearance of the patron and the formation of a reading public, a period of time which may be said to extend from about 1720 to 1780. De Quincey while denying that men of letters were worse off pecuniarily during this period than either before or since, declares that it was then that literature, "from being the noblest of professions, became a trade." He attributes the change to "expanding politics, expanding partisanship, and expanding journalism, which called into the field of literature an inferior class of laborers." This remark seems much too sweeping; and a better account is to be found in De Quincey's own remarks on the influence of novels upon literature. Politics and journalism have no doubt a tendency to debase literature, because, by using it as an instrument, they are compelled to recognize mediocrity. When political writing becomes one of the necessaries of society, like medicine or law, we must take what we can get; the very best, if possible; if not, what is possible. But then, on the other hand, in political writing there is always scope for the very highest literary ability. In this country alone, take Swift, Bolingbroke, Chesterfield, Burke, and Junius, and consider what standards of political and periodical writing they have established, and we shall hardly say that the influence upon literature of "an expanding partisanship and expanding politics" has been wholly bad. With novels the reverse is the case. Journalism, if injurious to the dignity of literature, is favorable to the cultivation of style. Of fiction, on the other hand, if worthier to be called a fine art, the tendency is rather to neglect form. And, what is more, the popularity of fiction causes it to be chosen as a medium for the exposition of theories, which cannot fail to suffer in a literary sense from the atmosphere with which they are surrounded, though a larger number of readers may at the moment be secured for them. In the political and the religious novel of the present day, we see the system in operation. Yet who can doubt that the political principles recommended to us in "Coningsby" and "Sybil" could have been far more effectively presented in another shape? It was a necessary part of the author's purpose to secure for these theories as wide a circulation as possible; and he very wisely, therefore, sacrificed literary effect to the attainment of a higher object. But that it was a sacrifice I shall always continue to think. To mix love, and pleasure, and racing, and hunting with a fine political dissertation, is like putting sugar into dry sherry. More people will like it. But the wine is ruined.

Now in the eighteenth century this system was unknown; Essay kept herself to herself. And nobody can regret that we did not have the "Thoughts on the French Revolution," or the "Letter to a Noble Lord," in the form of a three-volume novel. The humor, the wit, and the singular dramatic power displayed in Lord Beaconsfield's novels, make it difficult to wish that they had been anything but what they are; but, as a general principle, controversy and fiction are not well suited to each other. The comparative effect upon literature of novels and newspapers would make an excellent subject for a special essay; but I cannot carry the subject any further at present, except to add that as the expansion of fiction has been more mischievous to style than the expansion of journalism, literary style in consequence is one of the accomplishments in which the last century was superior to the present one. Lord Macaulay, I suppose, is our great master of style; but then in Lord Macaulay's style the influence of journalism is conspicuous. It is the style of Dr. Johnson taken down from its pedestal and adapted to every-day life — to the time and the comprehension of cursory and hurried readers. In the face of such a master, it would be wrong indeed to say that style is not studied at the present day. Macaulay, in fact, has founded a school. He has done for prose what Pope did in the last century for verse; and what he himself says of Pope's imitators, might be applied verbatim to his own. Nor is Lord Macaulay, of course, the only English writer of the nineteenth century who has cultivated style as Johnson and as Burke cultivated it: what is meant is, that it is no longer universally regarded as an integral part of literature which no man can neglect who aspires to literary fame. It is considered sufficient at the present day that an author should say what he has to say in an easy and perspicuous manner, without giving himself any trouble to choose the most felicitous expressions, to place each word where it will have the most weight, or to observe the order of thought in the construction of his sentences. Now, if the eighteenth-century men did not always do this, they at least acknowledged the obligation; and the whole prose literature of the century bears the impress of this recognition. You can hardly take up a book or an essay written by a man of any note during this period, without seeing that its composition has been carefully attended to. This was that "elegance" of which in eighteenth-century criticism we hear so much, but which nowadays has fallen into such utter disrepute, that to call a man an elegant writer is almost equivalent to laughing at him.

Nor can I help thinking, I confess, in spite of Macaulay and De Quincey, that literature, if not literary men, was held in higher esteem in the last century than it is in the present one. Has there been any one in this century who has occupied the same position in English society as first Pope, and afterwards Dr. Johnson, occupied in the society of that? It was not merely Pope the poet, or Johnson the moralist, to whom the honor was paid; it was paid to each as the acknowledged chief and representative of English literature. Whether what some people call mere literature, and others pure literature, is considered worthy of any such homage at the present day, is at least a very doubtful point.

The condition into which the English universities were allowed to sink in the eighteenth century was not without its good side, and might be traceable in part to that respect for literature as an end in itself, and not as a means to something else, which university reformers are now endeavoring to revive. The theory still was that the university was an institution for original study and research; that young men went up to it for literary purposes alone and not for social ones; and, consequently, that they were to be left comparatively unfettered in their course of reading Johnson, indeed, says that in his time they seldom read any books but such as were prescribed by their tutors; but still the understanding was that all alike came to read, and that compulsion in the shape of a test examination was consequently unnecessary. The tradition lingered at Oxford till the end of the century; and on the proposed introduction of the new system in the year 1800 it was objected to it, I believe, that it would destroy the independence and the leisure essential to a literary community, and that the yoke of education would prove as fatal to the spirit of learning as, according to the good old joke, marriage is to love. The answer to this was, that you could not kill that which was already dead; that the spirit of learning no longer breathed within its ancient haunts; and that as the university had no longer any claims to live at leisure, she must condescend to make herself useful. Whether Oxford and Cambridge in the eighteenth century really deserved these taunts may possibly be open to doubt. Gibbon's experience of Magdalen, and Lord Eldon's account of his own examination for his degree, have always been received as conclusive evidence on the subject; but Gibbon was a gentleman-commoner, and down to within a very recent date gentlemen-commoners had almost the same license as he had. Lord Eldon speaks only of the examination, and says nothing of the studies of the place. We see from Johnson that in 1730 lectures were pretty regularly given, that attendance on them was required; and that some pupils, at all events, took copious notes of what they heard, since Johnson himself used to go to Taylor at Christ Church to copy his notes of Mr. Bateman's lectures. From what we afterwards hear of Taylor, he does not seem to have been a man of exceptional intellectual activity; and we cannot therefore suppose that his industry was an exceptional case. The college exercises which seem to have been handed about the university, kept up the spirit of emulation to a certain extent; and, on the whole, we should be disposed to think that there was a good deal of exaggeration in the accounts which have come down to us of college life in those days. The university no doubt, like many other things in the eighteenth century, was in a process of transition. She had ceased in great measure to be a metropolis of learning; she had not yet begun to be a metropolis of education. In this stage of her existence she presented, like the old borough system, one of those practical anomalies which it is impossible to justify to the public either by the principles which they represent or the fruits which they occasionally produce. The university reformers of the present day seem disposed to allow that the educational machinery grafted on to the university at the beginning of the present century has not been without some of the bad effects which were then predicted from it; and political reformers may be found who say as much of the first Reform Bill. But in the case of all such anomalies as the two in question, the world at large is so much more sure of the evil than it is of the good, that when once called in question they are almost surely doomed. The principle seems up in the clouds, among the τά μετέωρα πράγματα, while the grievance is under our very noses. The results of the old system are not appreciated till they are missed, or it is thought that they will be just as attainable under the new one. At all events, there is no stopping people from interfering with any institution which has not something solid to show for itself. Principles are not sufficient.

The social life of the last century in the two universities must have been extremely remote from the experience of any living men. The coffee-house system seems then to have flourished in the university as much as it did in London. And it appears from Mr. Wordsworth's account that the residents had far greater liberty in such matters than they have now. Undergraduates appear to have spent their evenings at coffee-houses, and to have sneaked into college at one o'clock in the morning without rebuke. Johnson, it may be remembered, talks of drinking with a friend at an alehouse near Pembroke Gate; and Paley, we are told, at Cambridge always went after dinner to the coffee-house in Trumpington Street, and finished with supper at "Dockerell's."

But perhaps the most interesting and curious of all the features of old Oxford life was the Jacobitism which still lingered there within the memory of men who were alive twenty years ago. One such, at all events, used to be pointed out to us when the present writer was at Oxford, in the person of the president of Magdalen, the venerable Dr. Routh, who died in 1859 in the hundredth year of his age. He, we were always told, had seen Dr. Johnson coming in and out of University College, and in the Magdalen common room had drunk to the king over the water. As Charles Edward did not die till 1788, and as we know that so late as 1770 the French government had designs on foot for restoring him to the English throne, it is perfectly possible that the old habit may have survived down to the time when Routh became a fellow. Scott tells us that Sir Arthur Wardour continued to pray for the restoration of the Stuarts after the family was extinct; and, if so, English Jacobites may easily have continued to drink to it only ten years after it had been contemplated as an actual possibility. Still, to have gazed upon a man who had actually passed his glass over the water-bottle in honor of his exiled king always seems to me, when I look back upon it, more like a dream than a reality. At all events, the fact, if it be one, is only one more illustration of the remark with which I set out, namely, that one great attraction of the eighteenth century is its combined nearness to and remoteness from our own epoch. Mr. Lecky seems to think that Jacobitism disappeared from Oxford at a comparatively early period of the eighteenth century; but the custom of drinking "the king's health," at all events, flourished in full vigor down to as late a date as when that king was Charles the Third. An old Oxford friend has frequently assured me that his own great-uncle remembered the fellows of Balliol going down on their knees in the snow to drink the king's health, and putting a young nobleman under the pump who refused to join in the toast.

Passing from Oxford and Cambridge to provincial towns in general, we find a kind of life in the eighteenth century which is now almost wholly disappeared. In country towns in those days a better class of society resided; there was more leisure and consequently more society than there is now. In the winter-time, the county families often took houses for the season in some adjoining town, where they could enjoy society without going a dozen miles across country through roads covered with snow or ploughed into ruts knee-deep. Theatres, baths, assemblies, and entertainments of every kind then gave life and light to many an old country town which is now almost like a catacomb. Then, too, when so many of the country gentlemen never left home all their lives, they dealt exclusively with country tradespeople, and thus created a market for goods of a superior description, which it is difficult to obtain now anywhere but in London. Then in all the principal county towns there were shops which in all essential accommodation could compete with the best in the metropolis. The proprietor attended in person, attired with scrupulous neatness, and waited behind the counter himself on his more valued customers. The streets were thronged with carriages, the inn-yards were full, and an air of substantial prosperity pervaded the whole place, which, in too many instances, railways have partially destroyed. By its patronage of local trade, the local aristocracy kept up its influence; and though every town, which was large enough to have two parties, was divided into Whig and Tory, a Radical would have been regarded everywhere with horror as a species of parricide. The mob, generally speaking, were Tories and Churchmen to the back-bone, and the predominant feeling almost everywhere was the one so charmingly satirized in "Janet's Repentance." Into the life of our large manufacturing towns some interesting glimpses are afforded us in the life of Crompton, the inventor of the mule. "The better class of the inhabitants for that time, and for the half-century following, had thus so much leisure time to dispose of, that habits of social intercourse were established, and a consequent courtesy of manners acquired, which, unfortunately, has not been in every case maintained. The theatre was a fashionable and well-frequented place of amusement, and dancing assemblies were frequent and well-attended. The education afforded at the grammar-school was of a high order; indeed the fact that Ainsworth, the grammarian, to whom every English scholar owes a debt of gratitude, was himself educated and afterwards taught a school in Bolton, is sufficient evidence that polite literature was estimated at its proper value, and produced its legitimate fruit."

Thus both the minor aristocracy, who lived exclusively in the country, and the inhabitants of towns had in those days a life of their own more varied and sociable than anything which exists at present in the English provinces. The provincial stage was then an institution of importance. Provincial watering-places were ten times as numerous as they are at present; and shortly after the middle of the century sea-bathing was added to the list of amusements in which the country gentleman could participate. It was some time, however, before bathing-machines were constructed; and when they were, people did not always understand the use of them. My readers may remember the misadventure of Matthew Bramble at Scarborough. The passion for sea-bathing, however, steadily increased, and, north, east, south, and west, little fishing-towns or small seaports became transformed into fashionable watering-places much to the disgust of the old inhabitants, who found the new-comers superior to themselves in station, and as these formed an exclusive society of their own, admission to which became an object of ambition to the local magnates, these were gradually withdrawn from their former associates, and the old social circle was destroyed. Before this time, high and low had been accustomed to meet together at the bar, the fives court, and the belfry, and to join in the amusements of cock-fighting and badger-baiting. "But when they strangers comed," said an old woman of ninety to Mr. Roberts,* "then the town was a-spoiled."

The country gentleman at home in the eighteenth century had quite as full a round of amusements as he has now. The bowling-green was then an institution in every county town of any magnitude, where both sexes met in the summer-time, to dine, dance, and play at bowls. There seems to have been also a great deal of morning visiting as well among the gentlemen as the ladies. Lord Shelburne tells us that, in his time, in Wiltshire — that is about the beginning of George the Third's reign — when families called on each other, the gentlemen were shown into one room and the ladies into another. Wine and beer were immediately placed before the men, "who, when they had done, sent to tell the women." "Several of the best gentlemen, and members for the county," he says, "drunk nothing but beer." On this subject Mr. Roberts has collected some curious particulars. Towards the close of the last century, ale or "strong beer," as it is still called in the western counties, a liquor quite different from London ale, was brought up in decanters marked with an oat, and drunk out of long glasses, after dinner, as wine is now. At some hunt dinners it was the fashion to drink thirteen toasts in strong beer, after which each man drank what he liked. There was a particularly strong beer called Dorset beer — "a foolish drink," as one gentleman calls it, in 1725, who had taken rather too much of it overnight, and felt stupid in consequence all the next day. It may have been this beer of which Edmund Smith drank to such excess that he died from the effects of it, in 1710.

Country life then seems on the whole to have been more sociable than it is now, though manners were much more coarse. But there was one taste which sprang up in the eighteenth century against which no such charge can be brought; that is the taste for landscape-gardening introduced by Kent and Bridgman, and patronized by Pope and Addison. This taste, however, did not spread beyond the higher aristocracy; and among the country gentlemen of modest fortunes ornamental gardening seems to have been very little practised. At the present day, when we come across one of these "ghostly halls of grey renown," now turned into farmhouses, which are so common in many parts of England, it is rare to find any traces of a flower-garden still remaining. We see the old fish-ponds, or the hollows where the fish-ponds were. We see large kitchen-gardens and orchards, and enclosures which were once deer-parks, but few or no traces of extensive pleasure-grounds.

What kind of life went on within these old halls when the men returned from hunting and shooting cannot be understood by taking any one account of country life which has been left to us by any single author. Sir Roger de Coverley, Squire Western, Squire Allworthy, Sir Charles Grandison, Sir Hildebrand Osbaldeston, Sir Everard Waverley, the fox-hunters of Cowper and Thomson, no doubt possess elements of truth. That a country dinner-party, and the long evening which followed it, was sometimes such as Thomson has described in his "Autumn," may readily be believed; and, making large allowance for poetical exaggeration, we might accept the picture as a representative one of rural manners in general in the year 1750. The dinner is of the well-known kind — sirloins, pasties, puddings; the drink is ale, and the talk is of the day's sport. After dinner comes an interval of punch and strong beer, followed by whist or backgammon, during which some men smoke their pipes, while others have a romp with the young ladies. These frivolous diversions over, the business of the evening begins;

> The dry divan
> Close in firm circle, and set ardent in > For serious drinking,

till all succumb to its effects but one man, and he the parson of the parish. In all this of course there is vast exaggeration; but no doubt Thomson may have seen something not very unlike it among the Warwickshire and Worcestershire squires when visiting his noble patrons. And if for romping we read dancing, and deduct a certain amount of inebriety, we have a picture before us which is probably not far from the truth. It is remarkable that in this well-known scene, exaggerated as it may be, we have direct evidence in refutation of another social theory on the subject of the eighteenth century, which Mr. Lecky has adopted with perhaps too little consideration. Here we find the vicar dining with the squire on perfectly equal terms, and seeing all his flock under the table. This is not the position of an humble and despised dependant, who leaves table with the cheese, and marries his patron's mistress. Mr. Lecky would say, perhaps, that he was speaking only of one class of the clergy, namely, domestic chaplains and the poorer class of curates. But he does not describe them as exceptions. The fact is, there were the same distinctions between the clergy in the eighteenth century as there are in the nineteenth. There were the sons of poor parents sent to college perhaps because they showed some turn for reading, but without either the interest or the ability to help them to a fellowship or a living, and who scrambled through life as best they could on very humble means, subject to all the mortifications of genteel poverty, and to all the indignities which an age less delicate than our own was sure to heap upon it. But there were also, as there are now, the younger sons of the gentry, who succeeded to the family livings, the holders of college livings and chancellors' livings, all of whom mingled on equal terms with the country society, and took part in both its business and its pleasures. The town clergy, it is allowed, were men of learning and refinement, and generally respected by all parties; so that, after all, the unfavorable picture drawn of the whole body will apply only to a small class.

Whether we take the clergyman of real life, such as Johnson's friend, Dr. Taylor; the clergyman of satire, such as Thomson's "doctor of tremendous paunch," and Cowper's "plump convivial parson;" or the clergyman of fiction, such as Mr. Irwin and Mr. Gilfil, we see equally that the country rector or vicar of the eighteenth century was, mutatis mutandis, much what he was in the earlier part of the nineteenth. And the same social distinction which existed then between the two classes of the clergy does even now exist, in a less marked but not a less real form. Mr. Trollope knows this, and has described it too in "The Claverings" with perfect truth. The difference between Mr. Saul and Mr. Clavering is but the reflection of a real social difference, of which a perfect illustration may be found in the "Life of Jones of Nayland." Mr. Froude's picture of the country vicar in the first quarter of the present century may be appealed to in confirmation of these remarks, since he was substantially the same man as his father and grandfather. "He farmed his own glebe. He was a magistrate, and attended quarter sessions and petty sessions; and in remote districts, where there were no resident gentry of consequence, was the most effective guardian of the public peace. He affected neither austerity nor singularity. He rode, shot, hunted, and ate like other people; occasionally, when there was no one else to take the work upon him, he kept the hounds. In dress and habit he was simply a superior small country gentleman, very far from immaculate; but, taken altogether, a wholesome and solid member of practical English life."

It is a mistake, therefore, to suppose that the country clergy of the eighteenth century were socially inferior to the country clergy of the nineteenth. The reverse is nearer to the truth. They were eminently "unclerical" in their habits. Sometimes they were sensual and slothful. The few among them who had any taste for reading were scholars rather than divines, and preferred Euripides to Chrysostom. But they held their own in society, and were just as much gentlemen as they are now; while I confess I am disposed to think, with Mr. Froude, that they had more influence with their parishioners than the present race of clergymen, zealous and ascetic as they may be.

If finally we turn to the farmers and the peasantry of the middle of the last century, we shall have no difficulty in pronouncing its social condition superior to our own. The farmers lived in a homelier and more frugal manner, but they lived in comfort, and were strangers to social discontent. Game was not then preserved as it is now; and Gilbert White thought him a very unreasonable sportsman who killed twenty brace of partridges in a day. Shooting, probably, was seldom or never let over the tenant's head. His landlord was generally resident, and the farm descended in the same families for generations. Witness the old song: —

> The farm which I hold on your honor's estate
> Is the same which my grandfather tilled.

There was no grumbling at the game-laws in those days, for nobody was injured by them. There was no demand for tenant right, for the farmers were contented with their own position, and it never occurred to them to ask for any share of the proprietorship. Nor was there any dissatisfaction with the tenure of land in general, as the possession of it was more generally diffused, and it was less coveted than it is now, either as a commercial investment or an ἄγαλμα πλοῦτου. Towards the close of the century, however, a change began. The nabob came into existence. The duke and the marquis were not to be outshone by him; and the process of buying out the smaller gentry began in earnest. Society in general became more ostentatious, and the change, according to Cowper, found its way into farmhouses. But the change was very gradual. And thirty years ago, the old type of farmer still survived in sufficient numbers for middle-aged men to have formed a pretty accurate conception of what he was a hundred years ago.

On the condition of the peasantry it is unnecessary to dilate at much length. The enclosure of the wastes and commons did not begin on any large scale till the last quarter of the century. And we have only to compare the rate of wages with the price of provisions in the reign of George the Second, to see that the ordinary day-laborer was better off than he was at any time between the close of the American War and the great rise in wages which has taken place within the last few years. In his habits he was honest, industrious, and temperate. He had elbow-room in his native village, a roomy cottage, a good garden, and the common for his pigs and geese. The village public-house was comparatively unknown. The church was well attended; and as group after group of men approached the church-porch on Sunday they would be seen to stoop down to untie the strings of their knee-breeches that they might kneel down properly in church. As the century drew to a close, however, the circumstances of the peasant changed. And if we look at Crabbe's account of him we shall see the approach of those conditions which in another generation caused him to become a byword.

Such was the eighteenth century as I love to depict it to myself: a century not overburdened with delicacy or scrupulousness of any kind; but bluff, hale, and hearty, a century of great moral and mental tranquillity, of some coarseness and animalism, and of unruffled religious belief among the great masses of the people; a century in which the landmarks were not removed, and abuses were allowed to spread in picturesque luxuriance over all our most venerable institutions; a century, nevertheless, of great men and great deeds, in which England rose to a predominant place among the nations of the world, and fitted herself to perform the great part which Providence had in store for her as the savior of the liberties of Europe.

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

LOTTIE'S SIDE OF THE QUESTION.

LOTTIE made her way down the slopes alone, with feelings which had greatly changed from those of a little while ago. How happy she had been! The hour that had passed thus under the falling leaves had been like paradise; but the portals of exit from paradise are perhaps never so sweet as those of entrance. Her coming away was with a sense of humiliation and shame. As she wound her way down her favorite by-road winding among the shrubs and trees, she could not help feeling that she was making her escape, as if from some guilty meeting, some clandestine rendezvous. In all her life Lottie had never known this sensation before. She had been shy, and had shrunk from the gaze of people who had stared at her in admiration of her beauty or of her singing, but in her shyness there had always been the pride of innocence; and never before had she been afraid to meet any eye, or felt it necessary to steal away, to keep out of sight as if she were guilty. She had not done anything wrong, but yet she had all the feeling of having done something wrong — the desire to escape, the horror of detection. To some the secret meeting, the romance and mystery, would have been only an additional happiness, but Lottie, proud and frank and open-hearted, could not bear the very thought of doing anything of which she was ashamed. The sensation hurt and humiliated her. All had been very different before —— To meet her lover unawares, yet not without intention, with a delightful element of chance in each encounter, to look out secretly for him, yet wonder innocently to find him, to let her steps be drawn here or there by a sense of his presence, with a fond pretence of avoiding him, a sweet certainty of meeting him — all these risks and hazards of emotion had been natural. But Lottie felt with a sudden jar of her nerves and mind that this ought not to continue so. She had felt a little wondering disappointment on the previous night when he had asked her to meet him again, without any suggestion that he should go to her, or make the new bond between them known. Even then there had been a faint jar, a sigh of unfulfilled expectation. But now their hurried parting, her own flight, the little panic lest they should be seen, and discovery follow, made Lottie's heart sick. How well she could imagine how this ought to have been! They ought not to have fled from each other or been afraid of any man's eye. It would not have mattered whether the signor or any one suspected. Blushing and shy, yet with full faith in the sympathy of all who saw her, Lottie would have walked down the Dean's Walk with her betrothed: she would have avoided no one. She would have been shamefaced but not ashamed. What a difference between the two! all the difference that there is between the soft blush of happiness and the miserable burning of guilt. And this was what ought to have been. Half Lottie's misery — as half the misery of all imaginative, inexperienced women — arose from the pain and disappointment of feeling that those she loved did not come up to the ideal standard she had set up in her soul. She was disappointed, not so much because of the false position in which she herself was placed (for this, except instinctively, she had but little realized), but because Rollo was not doing, not yet, all that it seemed right for him to do. She would have forced and beaten (had she been able) Law into the fulfilment of his duty, she would even have made him generous to herself, not for the sake of herself, but that he should be a model of brotherhood, an example of all a true man ought to be; and if this was so in the case of her brother, how much more with her lover? If to be harsh as a tyrant or indifferent as a sultan was the highest ideal of a man's conduct, how much happier many a poor creature would be! It seems a paradox to say so, but it is true enough; for the worst of all, in a woman's mind, is to feel that the wrong done to her is worse wrong to him, an infringement of the glory of the being whom she would fain see perfect. This, however, is a mystery beyond the comprehension of the crowd. Lottie was used to being disappointed with Law — was she fated to another disappointment more cruel and bitter? She did not ask herself the question, she would not have thought it even, much less said it for all the world; but secretly there was a wonder, a pang, a faint sense of failure in her heart.

It is not without an effort, however, that the heart will permanently admit any such disappointment. As Lottie went her way thus drooping, ashamed, and discouraged, thinking of everything that had been done and that ought to have been done, there drifted vaguely across her mind a kind of picture of Rollo's meeting with her father, and what it would be. She had no sooner thought of that than a glow of alarm came over her face, and insensibly of consolation to her mind. Rollo and her father! What would the captain say to him? He would put on his grand air in which even Lottie had no faith; he would exhibit himself in all his vain greatness, in all his self-importance, jaunty and fine to his future son-in-law. He would give Lottie herself a word of commendation in passing, and he would spread himself forth before the stranger as if it was he whom Rollo wanted and cared for. Lottie's steps quickened out of the languid pace into which they had fallen, and her very forehead grew crimson as she realized that meeting. Thank heaven, it had not taken place yet! Rollo had been too wise, too kind, too delicate to humble his love by hurrying into the presence of the captain, into the house where the captain's new wife reigned supreme. The new wife — she too would have a share in it, she would be called into counsel, she would give her advice in everything, and claim a right to interfere. Oh, Lottie thought, how foolish she had been! How much wiser was Rollo, no doubt casting about in his mind how it was best to be done, and pondering over it carefully to spare her pain! She felt herself enveloped in one blush from the crown of her head to the sole of her feet; but how sweet was that shame! It was she who was foolish, not he who had failed. Her cheeks burned with a penitential flush, but he was faultless. There was nothing in him to disappoint, but only the most delicate kindness, the tenderest care of her. How could she have thought otherwise? It was not possible that Rollo should like secret meetings, should fear discovery. In the first days of their acquaintance he had shown no reluctance to come to the humble little lodge. But now — his finer feeling shrank from it now — he wanted to take his love away from that desecrated place, not to shame her by prying into its ignoble mysteries. He was wiser, better, kinder than any one. And she was ashamed of herself, not any longer of anything else, ashamed of her poor, mean, unworthy interpretation of him; and as happy in her new, changed consciousness of guilt, and penitence and self-disgust — as happy as if, after her downfall into earth, she had now safely got back into heaven.

By this time she had got out of the wooded slopes, and over the stile, and into the steep thoroughfare at the foot of the Abbey walls, the pavement of St. Michael's Hill. Lottie did not feel that there was any harm in walking through the street alone, as Rollo thought there was. She wanted no attendant. A little bodyguard, invisible, but with a radiance going out from them which shone about her, attended upon her way. Love and innocence and happiness, no longer with drooping heads but brave and sweet, a band invisible, guaranteeing their charge against all ills. As she went along the street with this shining retinue, there was nothing in all the world that could have harmed her; and nobody wanted to harm the girl — of whom, but that she was proud, no soul in St. Michael's had an unkind word to say. Everybody knew the domestic trouble that had come upon her, and all the town was sorry for Lottie — all the more that there was perhaps a human satisfaction in being sorry for one whose fault was that she was proud. She met Captain Temple as she entered the Abbey gate. Many thoughts about her had been in the kind old man's heart all the morning, and it was partly to look for her after vain walks about the Abbey precincts that he was turning his steps towards the town. He came up to her eagerly, taking her hand between his. He thought she must have been wandering out disconsolate, no matter where, to get away from the house which was no longer a fit home for one like her. He was so disturbed and anxious about her, that the shadow which was in his mind seemed to darken over Lottie, and cast a reflection of gloom upon her face. "You have been out early, my dear? Why did you not send for me to go with you? After matins I am always at your service," he said.

But there was none of the gloom which Captain Temple imagined in Lottie's face. She looked up at him out of the soft mist of her own musings with a smile. "I went out before matins," she said; "I have been out a long time. I had — something to do."

"My poor child! I fear you have been wandering, keeping out of the way," said the old captain Then another thought seized him. Had she begun already to serve the new wife and do the errands? "My dear," he said, "what have you been doing? you must not be too good — you must not forget yourself too much. Your duty to your father is one thing, but you must not let yourself be made use of now — you must recollect your own position, my dear."

"My position?" she looked up at him bewildered; for she was thinking only of Rollo, while he thought only of her father's wife.

"Yes, Lottie, my dear child, you have thought only of your duty hitherto, but you must not yield to every encroachment. You must not allow them to think that you give up everything."

"Ah," said Lottie, lifting to him eyes which seemed to swim in a haze of light; "to give up everything would be so —— I don't know what you mean," she added hastily, in a half-terrified tone. As for Captain Temple, he was quite bewildered, and did not know what to think.

"Need I explain, my dear, what I mean? There can be but one thing that all your friends are thinking of. This new relation, this new connection. I could not sleep all night for thinking of you in the house with that woman. My poor child! and my wife too. You were the last thing we talked of at night, the first in the morning —— "

"Ah," said Lottie again, coming back to reality with a long-drawn breath. "I was not thinking of her; but I understand you now."

Lottie had, however, some difficulty in thinking of her even now; for one moment, being thus recalled to the idea, her countenance changed, but then came back to its original expression. Her eyes were dewy and sweet — a suspicion of tears in them like the morning dew on flowers with the sunshine reflected in it, the long eyelashes moist, but the blue beneath as clear as a summer sky; and the corners of her mouth would run into curves of smiling unawares; her face was not the face of one upon whom the woes of the world were lying heavy, but of one to whom some new happiness had come. She was not thinking of what he was saying but of something in her own mind. The kind old captain could not tell what to think; he was alarmed, though he could not tell why.

"Then it is not so bad," he said, "as you feared?"

"What is not so bad? Things at home? Oh, Captain Temple! But I try not to think about it," Lottie said hastily, with a quiver in her lip. She looked at him wistfully, with a sudden longing. "I wish — I wish — but it is better not to say any thing."

"You may trust to me, my dear; whatever is in your heart I will never betray you; you may trust to me."

Lottie's eyes filled with tears as she looked at him, but she shook her head. They were not bitter tears, only a little bitter-sweet of happiness that wanted expression, but which she dared not reveal. If she could but have told him! If Rollo, failing her father, would but come and speak to this kind and true friend! But she shook her head. She was no longer free to say and do whatever pleased her out of her own heart. She must think of him, and while he did not speak what could she say? She put out her hand to her old friend again with a little sudden artifice unlike Lottie. "I have been out all the morning," she said; "I must make haste and get back now."

"I am very glad you are not unhappy," said the old captain, looking at her regretfully. He was not quite sincere. To tell the truth, it gave him a shock to find that Lottie was not unhappy; how could she put up with such a companion, with such a fate? He went in to his wife who had been watching furtively at the window while this conversation was going on, to talk it all over. Mrs. Temple was almost glad to find something below perfection in the girl about whom secretly she thought as much as her husband talked. "We have been thinking too much about it," she said; "if she can find the stepmother congenial it will be better for her."

"Congenial! you are talking folly. How could she be congenial?" cried Captain Temple, with great heat, but he did not know what to make of it. He was disappointed in Lottie. When he had met her the day before she had been quivering with pain and shame, revolted and outraged as it was right and natural she should be. And now it seemed to have passed altogether from her mind. He could not make it out. He was disappointed; he went on talking of this wonder all day long and shaking his white head.

As for Lottie, when she went home, she passed through the house, light and silent as a ghost, to her own little room where, abstracted from everything else, she could live in the new little world of her own which had come out of the mists into such sudden and beautiful life. It was very unlike Lottie, but what more does the young soul want when the vita nuova has just begun, but such a possibility of self-abstraction and freedom to pursue its dreams? Rapt in these she gave up her occupation, her charge, without a sigh. When she was called to table, she came quite gently, and took no notice of anything that passed there, having enough in her own mind to keep her busy. Law was as much astonished as Captain Temple. He had thought that Lottie would not endure it for a day, but, thanks to that happy preoccupation, Lottie sailed serenely through these troubled waters for more than a week, during which she spent a considerable portion of her time on the slopes, though the weather grew colder and colder every day, and the rest in her own room, in which she sat fireless, doing her accustomed needlework, her darnings and mendings mechanically, while Polly remodelled the drawing-room, covering it with crocheted antimacassars, and all the cheap and coarse devices of vulgar upholstery. While this was going on, she too was content to have Lottie out of the way. Polly pervaded the house with high-pitched voice and noisy step; and she filled it with savory odors, giving the two men hot suppers, instead of poor Lottie's cold beef which they had often found monotonous. The captain now came in for this meal which in former times he had rarely favored; he spent the evenings chiefly at home, having not yet dropped out of the fervor of the honeymoon; and on the whole even Law was not sure that there was not something to be said for the new administration of the house. There was no cold beef — that was an improvement patent to the meanest capacity. As for Polly, nothing had yet occurred to mar her glory and happiness. She wore her blue silk every day, she walked gloriously about the streets in her orange-blossoms, pointed out by everybody as one of the ladies of the Abbey. She went to the afternoon service and sat in her privileged seat, and looked down with dignified sweetness upon "the girls" who were as she once was. She felt herself as a goddess sitting there in the elevated place to which she had a right, and it seemed to her that to be a chevalier's wife was as grand as to be a princess. But Polly did not soil her lips with so vulgar a word as wife. She called herself a chevalier's lady, and her opinion of her class was great. "Chevalier means the same thing as knight, and instead of being simple missis, I am sure we should all be my lady," Polly said, "if we had our rights." Even her husband laughed, but this did not change her opinion. It was ungrateful of the other chevaliers' ladies that they took no notice of this new champion of their order. But for the moment Polly, in the elation of her success, did not mind this, and was content to wait for the recognition which sooner or later she felt would be sure to come.

This elation kept her from interfering with Lottie, whose self-absorbed life in her own room, and her exits and entrances, Mrs. Despard tolerated and seemed to accept as natural; she had so many things to occupy and to please her, that she could afford to let her stepdaughter alone. And thus Lottie pursued for a little way that life out of nature to which she had been driven. She lived in those moments on the slopes, and in the hours she spent at the signor's piano, singing; and then brooded over these intervals of life in the silence. Her lessons had increased to three in the week, and these hours of so-called study were each like a drama of intense and curious interest. Rollo was always there, a fact which he explained to the signor by his professional interest in the new singer, and which to Lottie required no explanation; and there too was her humble lover, young Purcell, who as she grew familiar with the sight of him, and showed no displeasure at his appearance, ventured daily more and more, sometimes daring to turn the leaves of the music, and even to speak to her. Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, who sat by, watching them all with lively but not extravagant interest, was the only one in the little party who was not more or less excited. As for Lottie, this lesson was the centre of all her life. If music be the food of love, love was the very inspiration of music to her; the two reacted upon each other, raising her to such a height of primitive heroic passion as nobody near her divined — as nobody, indeed, except perhaps the signor, with his Italian susceptibility, was capable of divining. He saw indeed with dissatisfaction, with an interest which was almost angry, that it was not art that moved her, and that the secret of the astonishing progress she made was not in his instructions. What was it? The signor was angry, for he felt no certainty that this wonderful progress was real. Something made her sing like an angel. What was it? not art. The natural qualities of her voice were not to be gainsaid; but the musician felt that the training under which she seemed to be advancing visibly was all fictitious, and that it was something else that inspired her. But Rollo had no such enlightenment. He remarked with all the technicality of an amateur how her high notes gained in clearness, and her low notes in melody, at every new effort. It was wonderful; but then the signor was a wonderful teacher, a wonderful accompanyist, and what so natural as that a creature of genius like this should grow under his teaching like a flower? Though it was to him she sang, and though her love for him was her inspiration, Rollo was as unaware of this as old Pickering in the hall, who listened and shook his head, and decided in his heart that a woman with a voice like that was a deal too grand for Mr. John. "She's more like Jenny Lind than anything," old Pick said; and in this Mr. Ridsdale agreed, as he sat and listened and thought over the means which should be employed to secure her success. As for young Purcell he stood entranced and turned over the leaves of the music. Should he ever dare to speak to her again, to offer her his love as he had once ventured to do — she who seemed born to enthral the whole world? But then, the young fellow thought, who was there but he who had an 'ome to offer Lottie? He was the nobler of the two between whom she stood, the two men who loved her; all his thought was, that she being unhappy, poor, her father's house made wretched to her, he had an 'ome to offer her; whereas Rollo thought of nothing but of the success she must achieve in which he would have his share. In order to achieve that success Rollo had no mind to lend her even his name; but the idea that it was a thing certain, comforted him much in the consciousness of his own imprudent engagement, and gave a kind of sanction to his love. To marry a woman with such a faculty for earning money could not be called entirely imprudent. These were the calculations, generous, and the reverse, which were made about her. Only Lottie herself made no calculations, but sang out of the fulness of her heart, and the delicate passion that possessed her; and the signor stood and watched, dissatisfied, sympathetic, the only one that understood at all, though he but poorly, the high emotion and spring-tide of life which produced that flood of song.

In this highly-strained, unnatural way, life went on amid this little group of people, few of whom were conscious of any volcano under their feet. It went on day by day, and they neither perceived the gathering rapidity of movement in the events, nor any other sign that to-day should not be as yesterday. Shortly after the explanation had taken place between Rollo and Lottie, Augusta Huntington, now Mrs. Daventry, arrived upon her first visit home. She was the dean's only child, and naturally every honor was done to her. All the country round, every one that was of sufficient importance to meet the dean's daughter, came to dinner. The dean himself took the matter in hand to see that no one was overlooked. They would all like, he thought, to see Augusta, the princess royal of the reigning house; and Augusta was graciously pleased to like it too. One of these entertainments ended in a great musical party, to which all who had known Miss Huntington, all the singers in the madrigals and choruses of which she had been so fond, were asked. When Lottie's invitation came, there was a great thrill and commotion in Captain Despard's lodge. Lottie did not even suspect the feelings which had been roused on the subject when she took out her white muslin dress, now alas, no longer so fresh as at first, and inspected it anxiously. It would do still with judicious ironing, but what should she do for ornaments, now that roses were no longer to be had? This troubled Lottie's mind greatly though it may be thought a frivolous question, until a few hours before the time, when two different presents came for her, of flowers: one being a large and elaborate bouquet, the other a bunch of late roses, delicate, lovely, half-opened buds, which could only have come out of some conservatory. One of these was from Rollo, and who could doubt which it was? Who but he would have remembered her sole decoration, and found for her in winter those ornaments of June? What did she care who sent the other? she decked herself with her roses, in a glow of grateful tenderness, as proud as she was happy, to find herself thus provided by his delicate care and forethought. It did not even occur to Lottie to notice the dark looks that were thrown at her as she came down-stairs all white and shining, and was wrapped by Law (always ostentatiously attentive to his sister in Polly's presence) in the borrowed glory of Mrs. O'Shaughnessy's great Indian shawl.

The party was large and crowded, and Lottie, all alone in it, was frightened and confused at first; but they were all very kind to her, she thought. Lady Caroline said, "How do you do, Miss Despard," with something like a smile, and looked as if she might have given Lottie her hand, had not the girl been afraid; and Augusta, when she found her out, came forward with a welcome which was almost effusive. "I hear you have improved so much," she said, taking in at one glance all the particulars of Lottie's appearance, with a wondering question within herself where the roses came from, though she perceived at once that it was the same white muslin frock. And when Lottie sang, which the signor managed she should do with great effect towards the close of the evening, Augusta rushed to her with great eyes of astonishment. "Where did you get all that voice," she cried; "you did not have that voice when I went away." "I flatter myself it was I that found Miss Despard out," said Rollo, suffering himself to look at her, which hitherto he had only done when there was a shield of crowding groups between him and his cousin. Before this he had managed to make the evening sweet to Lottie by many a whispered word. But when he looked at her now, unawares, under Augusta's very eyes, with that fond look of proprietorship which is so unmistakable by the experienced, and to which Lottie responded shyly by a smile and blush, and conscious tremor of happiness, neither of them knew what a fatal moment it was. Augusta, looking on, suddenly woke up to the meaning of it, the meaning of Rollo's long stay at the Deanery, and various other wonders. She gave the pair but one look, and then she turned away. But Lottie did not see that anything strange had happened. She was so happy that even when Rollo too left her, alarmed, her heart was touched and consoled by the kindly looks of the people whom she knew in the crowd, the ladies who had heard her sing before at the Deanery, and who were gracious to her, and Mr. Ashford who kept by her side and watched over her "like a father," Lottie said to herself, with affectionate gratitude, such as might have become that impossible relationship. The minor canon did not leave her for the rest of the evening, and he it was who saw her home, waiting till the door was opened, and pressing kindly her trembling cold hand; for, she could not tell how, the end of the evening was depressing and discouraging, and the pleasure went all out of it when Rollo whispered to her in passing, "Take care for heaven's sake or Augusta will find us out!" Why should it matter so much to him that Augusta should find it out? Was she not more to him than Augusta? Lottie shrank within herself and trembled with a nervous chill. She was half grateful to, half angry with, even Mr. Ashford. Why should he be so much more kind to her, so much more careful of her than the man who had promised her his love and perpetual care?

But even now when she stole in, shivering with the cold of disappointment and discouragement, through the dark house to her room, Lottie did not know all that this evening had wrought. And she scarcely noticed the gloom on Polly's face, nor the strain of angry monologue which her father's wife gave vent to, next morning. Polly wondered what was the good of being a married lady, when a young unmarried girl that was nobody, was took such notice of, and her betters left at 'ome? Did people know no manners? Gentlefolks! they called themselves gentlefolks, and behaved like that? If that was politeness Polly thanked heaven it was not the kind as she had been taught. But the outburst came when Lottie, taking no notice, scarcely even hearing what was said, showed herself with her music in her hands going out to her lesson. Polly came out of her husband's room and planted herself defiantly in Lottie's way. "Where are you going again," she said, "miss? where are you going again? Is this to be always the way of it? Do you mean never to stay at home nor do anything to help nor make yourself agreeable? I declare it is enough to put a saint in a passion. But I won't put up with it, I can tell you. I did not come here to be treated like this, like the dirt under your feet."

Lottie was almost too much taken by surprise to speak. It was the first absolute shock of collision. "I am going for my lesson," she said.

"Your lesson!" cried Polly. "Oh my patience, oh my poor 'usband! that is the way his money goes — lessons for you and lessons for Law, and I don't know what! You ought to be ashamed of yourselves, you two. You ought to be making your living both of you, if you were honest, instead of living on your father as wants all he's got for himself. But you sha'n't go to any lesson if I can help it," she cried. "You'll stay at home and try and be of a little use, or you'll march off this very day, and find some one else to put up with you and your lessons. It sha'n't be me. I won't stand by and see my 'usband wronged. You'll ruin him between you, that's what you'll do; go back, miss, and put down them books this moment. I won't have it, I tell you. I'll not see my 'usband eaten up by the likes of you."

Polly's diction suffered from her passion, and so did her appearance. Her face grew scarlet, her eyes flashed with fury. She put out her hand to push Lottie back, who shrank from her with a cry of dismay.

"Let me pass, please," said Lottie piteously. She could not quarrel with this woman, she could not even enter so much into conflict with her as to brush past her, and thus escape. She shrank with pain and horror from the excited creature in her way.

"It's you that will have to go back," said Polly, "not me. I'm the mistress of this house you'll please to recollect, Miss Lottie. Your father's been a deal too good, he's let you do just what you pleased, but that's not my style. I begins as I mean to end. You sha'n't stay here, I tell you, whatever you may think, if you want to trample upon me, and eat up every penny he has. Go and take off your things this moment, and see if you can't be a little use in the house."

Lottie was struck dumb and could not tell what to say. She had not been cared for much in her life, but she had never been restrained, and the sensation was new to her. She did not know how to reply. "I do not wish to be in your way," she cried. "I shall not stay long nor trouble you long, but please do not interfere with me while I am here. I must go."

"And I say you sha'n't go!" said Polly, raising her voice after the manner of her kind, and stamping her foot on the floor. "If you disobey me, I won't have you here not another day. I'll turn you out if it was twelve o'clock at night. I'll show you that I am mistress in my own house. Do you think I'm going to be outfaced by you, and treated like the dirt below your feet? Go and take off your things this moment, and try if you can't settle to a bit of work. Out of this house you sha'n't go, not a single step."

"I say, stand out of the way," said Law; he had come out of the dining-room with his hands in his pockets, having just finished his dinner. Law was not easily moved, but he had now made up his mind that he was on Lottie's side. "Don't give yourself airs to her. She is not of your sort," he said. "The governor may let you do many things, but not bully her. Look here, Polly, you'd better stand out of her way."

"And who are you, you lazy useless lout, that dares to call me Polly?" she cried. "Polly indeed! your father's wife, and far better than you. I'll make him put you to the door, too, you idle low fellow, spending your time with a pack of silly, dressing, useless girls ——"

"I say, stop that," cried Law, growing red, and seizing her suddenly by the arm; he stood upon no ceremony with Polly, though she was his father's wife, but he gave an uneasy, alarmed glance at Lottie. "There's some one waiting for you outside," he cried. "Lottie, go."

She did not wait for any more. Trembling and horrified she ran past and got out breathless, hastily closing the door behind her. The door had been open and Mrs. O'Shaughnessy outside, drawing her skirts round her physically and metaphorically so as to avoid all pollution, yet listening to everything she could hear, was walking up and down the pavement. "Me poor child!" the good Irishwoman said, half sorry, half delighted to hear the first of the scandal. "Already! has it come to this? Me heart is sore for ye, Lottie me dear!"

THE CHARACTER OF THE HUMORIST.

CHARLES LAMB.

THOSE English critics who at the beginning of the present century introduced from Germany, together with some other subtleties of thought transplanted hither not without advantage, the distinction between the fancy and the imagination, made much also of the cognate distinction between wit and humor, between that unreal and transitory mirth, which is as the crackling of thorns under the pot, and the laughter which blends with tears and with the sublimities of the imagination even, and which, in its most exquisite motives, is one with pity, — the laughter of the comedies of Shakespeare, hardly less expressive than his moods of seriousness or solemnity, of that deeply stirred soul of sympathy in him, as flowing from which both tears and laughter are alike genuine and contagious.

This distinction between wit and humor, Coleridge and other kindred critics applied, with much effect, in their studies of some of our older English writers. And as the distinction between imagination and fancy, made popular by Wordsworth, found its best justification in certain essential differences of stuff in Wordsworth's own writings, so this other critical distinction, between wit and humor, finds a sort of visible analogue and interpretation in the character and writings of Charles Lamb; one who lived more consistently than most writers among subtle literary theories, and whose remains are still full of curious interest for the student of literature as a fine art.

The author of the "English Humorists of the Eighteenth Century," coming to the humorists of the nineteenth, would have found, as is true pre-eminently of himself, the springs of pity in them deepened by the deeper subjectivity, the intenser and closer living with itself, which is characteristic of the temper of the later generation; and therewith, the mirth also, from the amalgam of which with pity humor proceeds, has become, in Charles Dickens, for instance, freer and more boisterous.

To this more high-pitched feeling, since predominant in our literature, the writings of Charles Lamb, whose life occupies the last quarter of the eighteenth century and the first quarter of the nineteenth, are a transition; and such union of grave, of terrible even, with gay, we may note in the circumstances of his life, as reflected thence into his work. We catch the aroma of a singular, homely sweetness about his first years, spent on Thames' side, among the red bricks and terraced gardens, with their rich historical memories of old-fashioned legal London. Just above the poorer class, deprived as he says, of the "sweet food of academic institution," he is fortunate enough to be reared in the classical languages at an ancient school where he becomes the companion of Coleridge, as at a later period his enthusiastic disciple. So far, the years go by with less than the usual share of boyish difficulties; protected, one fancies, seeing what he was afterwards, by some attraction of temper in the quaint child, small and delicate, with a certain Jewish expression in his clear, brown complexion, with eyes not precisely of the same color, and a slow walk adding to the staidness of his figure; and whose infirmity of speech, increased by agitation, is partly engaging.

And the cheerfulness of all this, of the mere aspect of Lamb's quiet subsequent life also, might make the more superficial reader think of him as in himself something slight, and of his mirth as cheaply bought. Yet we know beneath this blithe surface there was something of the fateful domestic horror, of the beautiful heroism and devotedness also, of old Greek tragedy. His sister Mary, two years his senior, in a sudden paroxysm of madness, caused the death of her mother, and was brought to trial for what an overstrained justice might have construed as the greatest of crimes. She was released on the brother's pledging himself to watch over her; and to this sister, from the age of twenty-one, Charles Lamb devoted himself, "seeking thenceforth," says his excellent biographer, "no connection which could interfere with her supremacy in his affections, or impair his ability to sustain and comfort her." The "feverish, romantic tie of love," he cast away for the "charities of home." Only, from time to time, the madness returned, affecting him too, once; and we see them voluntarily yielding to restraint. In estimating the humor of "Elia," we must no more forget the strong undercurrent of this great misfortune and pity, than one could forget it in his actual story. So he becomes the best critic, almost the discoverer, of Webster, a dramatist of genius so sombre, so heavily colored, so macabre. "Rosamund Grey," written in his twenty-third year, a story with something bitter and exaggerated, an almost insane fixedness of gloom perceptible in it, strikes clearly this note in his work.

For himself, and from his own point of view, the exercise of his gift, of his literary art, came to gild or sweeten a life of monotonous labor, and seemed, as far as regarded others, no very important thing; availing to give them a little pleasure, and inform them a little, chiefly in a retrospective manner; but in no way concerned with the turning of the tides of the great world. And yet this very modesty, this unambitious way of conceiving his work, has impressed upon it a certain exceptional enduringness. For of the remarkable English writers contemporary with Lamb, many were greatly preocupied with ideas of practice, — religious, moral, political, — ideas which have since, in some sense or other, entered permanently into the general consciousness; and, these having no longer any stimulus for a generation provided with a different stock of ideas, the writings of those who spent so much of themselves in their propagation have lost, with posterity, something of what they gained in immediate influence. Coleridge, Wordsworth, Shelley, even — sharing so largely in the unrest of their own age, and made personally more interesting thereby, yet, of their actual work, surrender more to the mere course of time than some of those who may have seemed to exercise themselves hardly at all in great matters, to have been little serious, or a little indifferent regarding them.

Of this number of the disinterested servants of literature, smaller in England than in France, Charles Lamb is one. In the making of prose he realizes the principle of art for its own sake, as completely as Keats in the making of verse. And, working thus ever close to the concrete, to the details, great or small, of actual things, books, persons, and with no part of them blurred to his vision by the intervention of mere abstract theories, he has reached an enduring moral effect also, in a sort of boundless sympathy. Unoccupied, as he might seem, with great matters, he is in immediate contact with what is real, especially in its caressing littleness, that littleness in which there is much of the whole woeful heart of things, and meets it more than half-way with a perfect understanding of it. What sudden, unexpected touches of pathos in him! — bearing witness how the sorrow of humanity, the Welt-Schmerz, the constant aching of its wounds, is ever present with him; but what a gift also for the enjoyment of life in its subtleties, of enjoyment actually refined by the need of some thoughtful economies and making the most of things! Little arts of happiness he is ready to teach to others. The quaint remarks of children which another would scarcely have heard, he preserves, — little flies in the priceless amber of his Attic wit, — and has his "Praise of Chimney-sweepers," (as William Blake has written, with so much natural pathos, "The Chimney-sweeper's Song,") valuing carefully their white teeth, and fine enjoyment of white sheets in stolen sleep at Arundel Castle, as he tells the story, anticipating something of the mood of our deep humorists of the last generation. His simple mother-pity for those who suffer by accident, or unkindness of nature, blindness, for instance, or fateful disease of mind, like his sister's, has something primitive in its bigness; and on behalf of ill-used animals he is early in composing a "Pity's Gift."

And if, in deeper or more superficial senses, the dead do care at all for their name and fame, then how must the souls of Shakespeare and Webster have been stirred, after so long converse with things that stopped their ears above and below the soil, at his exquisite appreciations of them; the souls of Titian and of Hogarth also; for, what has not been observed so generally as the excellence of his literary criticism, Charles Lamb is a fine critic of painting also. It was as loyal, self-forgetful work for others, for Shakespeare's self first, and then for Shakespeare's readers, that this too was done; he has the true scholar's way of forgetting himself in his subject. For though "defrauded," as we saw, in his young years, "of the sweet food of academic institution," he is yet essentially a scholar, and all his work mainly retrospective, as I said; his own sorrows, affections, perceptions, being alone real to him of the present. "I cannot make these present times," he says once, "present to me."

Above all, he becomes not merely an expositor, permanently valuable, but for Englishmen almost the discoverer of the old English drama. "The book is such as I am glad there should be," he modestly says of the "Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakespeare;" to which, however, he adds in a series of notes the very quintessence of criticism, the choicest aromas and savors of Elizabethan poetry being sorted and stored here with a sort of delicate intellectual epicureanism, which has had the effect of winning for these, then almost-forgotten poets, one generation after another of enthusiastic students. Could he but have known how fresh a source of culture he was evoking there for other generations, all through those years, in which, a little wistfully, he would harp on the limitation of his time by business, and sigh for a better fortune in regard of literary opportunities!

To feel strongly the charm of an old poet or moralist, the literary charm of Burton, for instance, or Quarles, or Lady Newcastle, and then to interpret that charm, to convey it to others, — he seeming to himself but to hand on to others, in mere humble ministration, that of which for them he is really the creator, — that is the way of his criticism, cast off in a stray letter often or passing note, or lightest essay or conversation; it is in such a letter, for instance, that we come upon a singularly penetrative estimate of the genius and writings of Defoe.

Tracking, with an attention always alert, the whole process of their production to its starting-point in the deep places of the mind, he seems to realize the but half-conscious intuitions of Hogarth or Shakespeare, and develops the great ruling unities which have swayed their actual work; or "puts up," and takes, the one morsel of good stuff in an old, forgotten writer. There comes even to be an aroma of old English in what he says even casually; noticeable echoes, in chance turn and phrase, of the great masters of style, the old masters. Godwin, seeing in quotation a passage from "John Woodvil," takes it for a choice fragment of an old dramatist, and goes to Lamb to assist him in finding the author. His power of delicate imitation in prose and verse goes the length of a fine mimicry even, as in those last essays of Elia on "Popular Fallacies" with their gentle reproduction or caricature of Sir Thomas Browne, showing the more completely his mastery, by disinterested study, of those elements in the man which are the real source of style in that great, solemn master of old English, who, ready to say what he has to say with a fearless homeliness, yet continually overawes one with touches of such strange utterance from things afar. For it is with the delicacies of fine literature especially, its gradations of expression, its fine judgment, its pure sense of words, of vocabulary, — things, alas! dying out in the English literature of the present, together with the appreciation of them in our literature of the past, — that his literary mission is chiefly concerned. And yet, delicate, refining, daintily epicurean, though he may seem when he writes of giants such as Hogarth or Shakespeare, though often but in a stray note, you catch the sense of awe with which those great names in past literature and art brooded over his intelligence, his undiminished impressibility by the great effects in them. Reading, commenting on Shakespeare, he is like a man who walks alone under a grand stormy sky, and among unwonted tricks of light, when powerful spirits might seem to be abroad upon the air; and the grim humor of Hogarth, as he analyzes it, rises into a kind of spectral grotesque; while he too knows the secret of fine, significant touches like theirs.

There are traits, customs, characteristics of houses and dress, surviving morsels of old life, like those of which we get such delicate impressions in Hogarth, concerning which we well understand, how, common, uninteresting, or worthless even, in themselves, they have come to please us now as things picturesque, when thus set in relief against the modes of our different age. Customs, stiff to us, stiff dresses, stiff furniture, — types of cast-off fashions, left by accident, and which no one ever meant to preserve, we contemplate with more than good-nature, as having in them the veritable accent of a time, not altogether to be replaced by its more solemn and self-conscious deposits; like those tricks of individuality which we find quite tolerable in persons, because they convey to us the secrets of lifelike expression, and with regard to which we are all to some extent humorists. But it is part of the privilege of the genuine humorist to anticipate this pensive mood with regard to the ways and things of his own day; to look upon the tricks in manner of the life about him with that same refined, purged sort of viston, which will come naturally to those of a later generation, in observing whatever chance may have saved of its mere external habit. Seeing things always by the light of some more entire understanding than is possible for ordinary minds of the whole mechanism of humanity, and the manner, the outward mode or fashion, always in strict connection with the spiritual condition which determines it, a humorist like Charles Lamb anticipates the enchantment of distance; and the characteristics of places, ranks, habits of life, are transfigured for him, even now and in advance of time, by poetic light; justifying what some might condemn as mere sentimentality, in the effort to hand on unbroken the tradition of such fashion or accent. "The praise of beggars," "the cries of London," the traits of actors just "old," the spots in "town" where the country, its fresh green and fresh water, still lingered on, one after another, amidst the bustle; the quaint, dimmed, just played-out farces he had relished so much, coming partly through them to understand the earlier English theatre as a thing once really alive; those fountains and sun-dials of old gardens, of which he entertains such dainty discourse, — he feels the poetry of these things, as the poetry of things old indeed, but surviving as an actual part of the life of the present, and as something quite different from the poetry of things flatly gone from us and frankly antique, coming back to us, if at all, as entire strangers, like Scott's old Scotch-border figures, their oaths and armor. Such gift of appreciation depends, as I said, on the habitual apprehension of men's life as a whole; its organic wholeness, as extending even to the least things; of its outward manner in connection with its inward temper; and it involves a fine perception of the congruities, the musical accordance of humanity with its environment of custom, society, intercourse of persons; as if all that, with its meetings, partings, ceremonies, gesture, tones of speech, were some delicate instrument on which an expert performer is playing.

These are some of the characteristics of Elia, one essentially an essayist, and of the true family of Montaigne, "never judging," as he says, "system-wise of things, but fastening on particulars;" saying all things as it were on chance occasion only, and as a pastime, yet succeeding thus, "glimpse-wise," in catching and recording more frequently than others "the gayest, happiest attitude of things;" a casual writer for dreamy readers, yet always giving the reader so much more than he seemed to propose. There is something of the follower of George Fox about him, and the Quaker's belief in the inward light coming to one passive, to the mere wayfarer, who will be sure at all events to lose no light which falls by the way; glimpses, suggestions, delightful half-apprehensions, profound thoughts of old philosophers, hints of the innermost reason in things, the full knowledge of which is held in reserve; all the varied stuff, that is, of which genuine essays are made.

And with him, as with Montaigne, the desire of self-portraiture is, below all more superficial tendencies, the real motive in writing at all, — a desire closely connected with that intimacy, that modern subjectivity, which may be called the Montaignesque element in literature. What he designs is to give you himself, to acquaint you with his likeness; but must do this, if at all, indirectly, being indeed always more or less reserved for himself and his friends; friendship counting for so much in his life, that he is jealous of anything that might jar or disturb it, even to a sort of insincerity, of which he has a quaint "praise;" this lover of stage plays significantly welcoming a little touch of the artificiality of play to sweeten intercourse.

And, in effect, a very delicate and expressive portrait of him does put itself together for the duly meditative reader; and in indirect touches of his own work, scraps of faded old letters, what others remembered of his talk, the man's likeness emerges; what he laughed and wept at, his sudden elevations and longings after absent friends; his fine casuistries of affection and devices to jog sometimes, as he says, the lazy happiness of perfect love; his solemn moments of higher discourse with the young, as they came across him on occasion, and went along a little way with him; the sudden, surprised apprehension of beauties in old literature, revealing anew the deep soul of poetry in things; and still the pure spirit of fun, having its way again, — laughter, that most short-lived of all things (some of Shakespeare's even having fallen dim), wearing well with him. Much of all this comes out through his letters, which may be regarded as a part of his essays. He is an old-fashioned letter-writer, the essence of the old fashion of letter-writing lying, as with true essay-writing, in the dexterous availing oneself of accident and circumstance, in the prosecution of deeper lines of observation; although, just as in the record of his conversation, one loses something, in losing the actual tones of the stammerer, still graceful in his halting (as he halted also in composition, composing slowly and in fits, "like a Flemish painter," as he tells us), so "it is to be regretted," says the editor of his letters, "that in the printed letters the reader will lose the curious varieties of writing with which the originals abound, and which are scrupulously adapted to the subject."

Also, he was a true "collector," delighting in the personal finding of a thing, in the color an old book or print gets for one by the little accidents which attest previous ownership. Wither's "Emblems," "that old book and quaint," long-desired, when he finds it at last, he does not value less because a child had colored the plates with its paints. A lover of household warmth everywhere, of the tempered atmosphere which our various habitations get by men living within them, he "sticks to his favorite books as he did to his friends," and loved the "town," with a jealous eye for all its characteristics, "old houses" coming to have souls for him. The yearning for mere warmth against him, in another, makes him content with pure brotherliness, "the most kindly and natural species of love," as he says, all through life, in place of the passion of love; Jack and Jill sitting thus side by side, till one sat alone in the faint sun at last, in a way, the anticipation of which sounds sometimes as a too poignant note in the sweetly-linked music of their intercourse, and sets us speculating, as we read, as to precisely what amount of melancholy really accompanied for him the approach of old age, so steadily foreseen, and makes us note with pleasure his successive wakings up to cheerful realities, out of too curious musings over what is gone, and what remains, of life. In his subtle capacity for enjoying the more refined points of earth, of human relationship, he could throw the gleam of poetry or humor on what seemed common or threadbare; has a care for the sighs, and weary, humdrum preoccupations of very weak people, down to their little pathetic "gentilities," even; while, in the purely human temper, he can write of death, almost like Shakespeare.

And that care, through all his enthusiasm of discovery, for the accustomed in literature, connected thus with his close clinging to home and the earth, was con-gruous also with that love for the accustomed in religion, which we may notice in him. He is one of the last votaries of that old-world religion, based on the sentiments of hope and awe, which may be described as the religion of men of letters, (as Sir Thomas Browne has his "Religio Medici") religion as understood by the soberer men of letters in the last century, Addison, Gray, and Johnson, by Jane Austen and Thackeray, later. In its essence, a high way of feeling induced by the constant presence of great things in literature, extended in its turn to those matters greater still, it lives, in the main retrospectively, in a system of received sentiments and beliefs; received, like those great things in literature and art, in the first instance, on the authority of a long tradition, in the course of which they have linked themselves in a thousand complex ways to the conditions of human life, and no more questioned now than the feeling one keeps by one of the greatness of Shakespeare. For Charles Lamb, such form of religion becomes the solemn background on which the nearer and more exciting objects of his immediate experience relieve themselves, borrowing from it an expression of calm; its necessary atmosphere being indeed a profound quiet, that quiet which has in it a kind of sacramental efficacy, working, we might say, on the principle of the opus operatum, almost without any co-operation of one's own, towards the assertion of the higher self; so physically sweet, moreover, to one of Lamb's delicately attuned temperament; such natures seeming to long for it sometimes, as for no merely negative thing, with a sort of mystical sensuality.

The writings of Charles Lamb are an excellent illustration of the value of reserve in literature. Below his quiet, his quaintness, his humor, and what may seem the slightness, the merely occasional or accidental character of his work, there lies, as I said at starting, as in his life, a true tragic element. The gloom, reflected at its darkest, in those hard shadows of "Rosamund Grey," is always there, though restrained always in expression, and not always realized either for himself or his readers; and it gives to those lighter matters on the surface of life and literature, among which he for the most part moved, a wonderful play of expression, as if at any moment these light words and fancies might pierce very far into the deeper heart of things. In his writing, as in his life, that quiet is not the low flying of one from the first drowsy by choice, and needing the prick of some strong passion or worldly ambition, to stimulate him into all the energy of which he is capable; but rather the reaction of nature, after an escape from fate, dark and insane as in old Greek tragedy; following which, the mere sense of relief becomes a kind of passion, as with one who, having just escaped earthquake or shipwreck, finds a thing for grateful tears in the mere sitting quiet at home, under the wall, till the end of days.

He felt the genius of places; and I sometimes think he resembles the places he knew and liked best, and where his lot fell; London, sixty-five years ago, with Covent Garden and the old theatres, and the Temple Gardens still unspoiled, with Thames gliding down, and beyond to north and south the fields at Enfield or Hampton, to which, "with their living trees," the thoughts wander "from the hard wood of the desk;" fields fresher, and coming nearer to town then, but in one of which the present writer remembers, on a brooding early summer's day, to have heard the cuckoo for the first time. Here, the surface of things is certainly humdrum, the streets dingy, the green places, where the child goes a-maying, tame enough. But nowhere are things more apt to respond to the brighter weather, nowhere is there so much difference between rain and sunshine, nowhere do the clouds roll together more grandly, mounting a little way till the sun touches their dun into gold; those quaint pastorals gathering a certain quality of grandeur from the background of the great city, visible from those distant fields also, with its weighty atmosphere, and portent of storm, in the rapid light on dome and bleached stone steeples. ROBERT E. COOPER, JR., A FRENCH SKETCH OF AN ENGLISH BUSINESS MAN,

BY RUDOLPH LINDAU.

TRANSLATED FOR THE LIVING AGE BY C. W. LATIMER.

CHAPTER I.

ROBERT E. COOPER was a small man, compactly built, with a pleasant face and English features. His auburn hair was kept carefully brushed, and was always divided by a faultless white line. He had light eyes with a frank, honest look in them, a soft and well-trimmed beard, beautiful teeth, and handsome feet and hands.

He was always well dressed in the last fashion, but his clothes were never showy, and were always in good taste. He rose betimes every morning of his life, and went to bed at the same regular hour, unless chance took him to a ball or a soirée, when he changed his habits for the occasion.

"I never leave early," he remarked to one of his friends. "It is one of my principles that the man who accepts an invitation contracts an obligation, and must sacrifice his own pleasure to the pleasure of others. At home I go to bed at eleven o'clock."

So he struggled bravely with his need of sleep, and refrained from bidding his host good-night till only three or four people remained in the room.

His voice was sonorous, he spoke gravely, and laughed little. When he did it was not because he was amused, but because he considered that it was proper he should laugh. Then he would give a loud "Ha! ha!" and relapse at once into his usual seriousness.

He was only called "Cooper" by his intimate friends. The foreign population of Yokohama is almost entirely composed of young men, and the prefix "Mr." is generally unknown there among equals. He alone was commonly addressed by it.

If any one accosted him with the least familiarity he always drew back and looked at him severely. The abbreviation of his name to Robert, Bobby, or Bob, inspired him with horror, and even his intimates could not so address him unreproved.

"It has ever been one of my principles," he said to a man who had so far forgotten himself as to call him Bob, "to give every man the name which belongs to him. My name is Cooper — Robert E. Cooper."

He was generally liked by the residents of Yokohama, and as every one in the place had a soubriquet of some kind, he was nicknamed Mr. Robert Cooper, with a strong emphasis on the first word. He was twenty-eight years old, and agent for an important English house. No books were ever kept more faultlessly than his. His handwriting was plain and bold, and he wrote as he spoke, with great care and solemnity.

Mr. Cooper had been early appointed to the honorable post of president of the Chamber of Commerce in Yokohama, and he fulfilled all his official duties with the utmost punctuality and precision. At public meetings — of which there were a good many at Yokohama between 1860 and 1870, some to establish a new club, some to get up the spring races, some to get signatures to petitions from the foreign residents at Yokohama to the authorities native and consular at Yeddo, it was always Mr. Cooper who was called to the chair. He enforced the strictest order and the closest observance of parliamentary rules. He spoke well, and spoke often; and had a certain set of high-sounding expressions well known to all his audience, to which they listened with a concealed smile. Mr. Robert E. Cooper never had any suspicion of the popular opinion of his eloquence, and as he never laughed himself either at persons or at things, the idea that he could possibly be laughed at never entered his mind.

He went to church every Sunday of his life; returned all his visits within forty-eight hours after he received them; answered every letter by return of post; never owed a cent to any man; and gave largely to the poor — more liberally indeed than his means would well allow, sometimes by public subscription, but oftenest in private charity.

Mr. Robert Cooper had been for eight years agent for the English firm which had sent him to Yokohama, when in consequence of a speculation not shared in by the branch house in Japan, the English house suddenly stopped payment, and it became necessary to wind up the affairs of the establishment at Yokohama.

The news of this misfortune falling on persons to whom he had been long attached, and for whom he always professed the greatest respect, was a severe blow to Mr. Robert E. Cooper. He bore it bravely, however, without complaint or any outward show of feeling, but he at once sent in his resignation as president of the Chamber of Commerce; a resignation which was unanimously rejected by the members of that association.

Soon after he went into business on his own account, under the name of Robert E. Cooper, Jr. Nobody in Yokohama had been before aware that there existed such a person as Robert E. Cooper, Sr. They now, however, learned that he was the father of Mr. Cooper, and that he was a respectable merchant in a small way in London. It was in connection with his father that Mr. Robert E. Cooper, Jr., set up in business; and for several years his prudence and his industry were crowned with brilliant success.

He passed in Yokohama for a man who was very well off, though not a milionaire, and he had just announced in the Chamber of Commerce that he "should be obliged to relinquish the honor of representing the commercial interests of the foreign population of Japan — his intention being to wind up his affairs and to return shortly to England," when suddenly there arrived at Yokohama the news of a terrible commercial crisis in London by which a number of important and most respectable houses had been obliged to suspend. Amongst these merchants who had been forced into bankruptcy was Robert E. Cooper, senior.

Mr. Robert E. Cooper, on the day when this news reached Yokohama, appeared at his usual hour in the club reading-room, but his face was very white, and he looked several years older. He took up the China Express and sat for an hour motionless behind its pages, his eyes fixed on the despatch which contained the names of the London houses wrecked in the great catastrophe. Then he rose; breathed hard, put on his gloves with the methodical, reflective air he wore when he was doing anything, however trivial, and walked out of the club with measured tread, saluting those he passed in his usual style, a lowering of his eyelids, accompanied by a scarcely perceptible movement of his head.

The next day several leading members of the commercial community at Yokohama called at his counting-room, to testify by this attention that they did not consider him in any way to blame for the misfortune which his father's house had just sustained. They found him at his desk, behind his ledger. He did not breathe a word about what had taken place, and no one had courage to open the subject with him.

At this time there was living in Yokohama a young Englishman of good family who had come out to Japan three years before bringing good introductions, among them one to Mr. Cooper. That gentleman had received him cordially, and the young man entertained a grateful and respectful attachment for him. Erasmus Benson (this was his name) was much liked among the foreign residents; he was a gay, pleasant companion, reliable in business, and agreeable in society. He too came on that day to make Cooper a visit, and his principal object was to speak of private affairs.

"Mr. Cooper," he began, shaking his friend's hand, "a great misfortune has befallen me. Yesterday's mail brought me the news of the sudden death of my father. I set out to-morrow to return to my mother in London, and I am come to say good-bye. Can I be of any use to you in England?"

Mr. Cooper rose, grasped Erasmus Benson by the hand, and shook it cordially. Then, without speaking, he re-seated himself. Benson looked at him and saw that his lip quivered.

"You too, Mr. Cooper," he went on, "have had bad news by this unlucky mail, and I am very sorry."

Cooper once more rose, and again grasped the hand of Benson. He made desperate efforts to preserve his calmness. He passed his finger inside his cravat as if to give himself more air, coughed as though something rose up in his throat, and said in a choked voice, —

"Most true. A most unlucky steamer."

"Send me word what I can do for you," answered Benson, seeing his friend was really unable to continue the interview, "and permit me to bid you farewell now, in case I should not see you again before I go."

But next morning at six o'clock, when the "Europa" was just ready for sea, Benson, on arriving at the wharf, found Cooper waiting for him quietly. He was dressed with his usual care, but his face was very sad. He went on board with Benson, helped him to instal himself in his state-room, and remained with him until the anchors were about to be weighed. Just as he was leaving the ship he said, —

"My father may be in need of kindness and consolation. If you are able to leave your mother for a few hours, I would ask you to go and see him. Tell him to be of good cheer — and say you left me — well. Au revoir, Mr. Benson."

He went quickly over the ship's side, but remained standing on the wharf, waving farewell, as long as he could distinguish Benson on the deck of the vessel.

CHAPTER II.

DURING the following month it became known in Yokohama that Mr. Robert Cooper, through no fault of his own, had become insolvent, and had made arrangement with his creditors. He sold the pretty house he owned upon the Bund, which is the quay and also the chief street of Yokohama. He parted with his furniture, which he had imported from England, and on whose comfort and durability he had prided himself; he sold even his saddle-horse, though the youngest foreign clerk in Yokohama thinks himself entitled to possess that luxury. He then rented a small villa in the suburb of the foreign quarter, where rents were never high, and thither he retired with one old kotzkoi, or Japanese domestic, who appeared to be entirely devoted to him, and who had been in his service a dozen years.

He had also taken a situation as bookkeeper in the large American house of James Webster & Co. After a while it came to be known among his friends that he hardly spent a quarter of his salary, but paid over to his creditors every cent that he could possibly save.

He himself never breathed a word to any man about his own affairs. He continued to get himself up with scrupulous care and neatness, but his clothes were beginning to show wear, and he got no new ones. He went to the club as he had always done, and he was present at all public meetings, but he made no speeches, and took no active part in the discussion of affairs. He had requested Mr. Webster to state privately that for the future he renounced the honor of taking the chair at public meetings, being troubled by a slight affection of the throat which obliged him to be careful.

All the foreign residents of Yokohama, though there were among them a number of rough, rude, careless, unreflecting men, appreciated, with the tact of accomplished diplomatists, the motives which induced him to withdraw from public life, and felt increased respect for their former president.

Some of his most intimate acquaintances, seeing how much he suffered from wounded pride, tried to make him talk with them about his own affairs, that they might end by offering him assistance, but Mr. Cooper always evaded the subject and turned the conversation. James Webster one day said to him in that off-hand tone peculiar to Americans, —

"Mr. Cooper, you must be quite aware you would do yourself no harm with me by accepting an advance upon your salary. Your engagement with this house is for three years, and it is all the same to me whether I pay you down your three years salary at once, or year by year. The money will come out of my pocket sooner or later. You might as well have it now."

Mr. Cooper answered, —

"Thank you, Mr. Webster. But it does not seem to me the right thing to accept such a favor at your hands. I am the highest of your employés, and it is my duty to set the young men a good example."

So saying Mr. Cooper went back to his desk. But Webster, watching him by stealth, saw his face contract with a nervous spasm. He coughed, bit his lips, tried to swallow something in his tbroat, but did not speak another word.

Webster rubbed his hands and whistled "Yankee Doodle." A little time afterwards he went to the office door. Cooper followed him with a wistful look in his sad face, shook his head once or twice, sighed, blew his nose, and went back to his desk without saying anything.

He became an old and broken man from the day misfortune fell upon him. He still walked with a firm step, but he stooped as he had never done before. His auburn hair was streaked with grey and grew thin over his temples. Before the year was out, all those who knew him saw his health was giving way.

Webster was not much surprised, therefore, at finding one morning that the place of his bookkeeper was vacant, and at receiving a little note, written formally in the third person, informing him that Mr. Cooper was prevented by slight indisposition from appearing in the counting-room that morning, and begged Mr. Webster to excuse him.

Webster set out at once for the little house inhabited by Cooper. He found him sitting in the veranda, fully dressed, holding in his hand a handsomely bound volume of some English classic. He rose, but with difficulty, and in answer to the American's anxious inquiries about his health, replied that he was a little weak, and that the doctor had ordered him not to go out that day. Still there was little the matter with him. Beside him on the table stood a large vial of medicine, and punctually as the clock struck ten he took two spoonfuls of its contents, gravely remarking as he did so, — "I have never been able to understand the sense of the custom physicians have of employing a spoonful as a measure. There are tea-spoons and table-spoons of such different capacity."

The next few days passed, but Cooper was still absent from his desk. Webster went regularly to see him every evening and spent about an hour with him. The sick man talked of the prospects, of the silk-crop, of the tea-market, of the quantity of opium imported from India, of Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, Milton, Goldsmith, and Samuel Johnson. Of himself he never said more than a few words. The physician, whom Webster took pains to see, gave no encouragement as to his recovery.

"I greatly fear," he said, "that our poor friend is dying of a broken heart."

"What nonsense!" exclaimed Webster almost angrily. "Why should his heart break? He has lost his fortune, and he still owes some thousands of dollars; but surely he must have too much courage to let a trifle like that take such a hold upon him. Why, I had lost two fortunes before I came out to Yokohama, and I did not give way on that account."

"You are different," answered the doctor. "It would go harder with Cooper than with most men. He has changed completely in the past year. He has had an excellent constitution, but he has lost all his strength; he is an old man now. He does not suffer from any definite ailment, but he is wasting away. I know him better than any of my patients, for even when he was perfectly well he made a principle of consulting me every spring, when I ordered him some harmless medicines. I have watched him carefully for some months past, and I fear there is hardly a hope of his recovery."

Next day when Webster paid his usual visit he found the patient in his bed. The kind-hearted American sat down beside him, and after having talked of a variety of subjects, said abruptly, —

"Cooper, my old friend, have you any thing on your mind concerning money matters?"

"Nothing, whatever," answered the sick man. "My creditors have given me more time to pay my debts than I hope I shall find necessary. I expect to be able to settle all I owe at the expiration of my contract with you."

"Come, Cooper! Won't you have the money right away?"

"No, thank you, my dear Mr. Webster. You are very kind. I am greatly obliged to you. Is not the mail from Shanghai due to-day? — Thank you sincerely, Mr. Webster."

Webster saw clearly that Cooper did not wish to accept what he had offered, and did not know how to make him look at it in a right way.

"Very well — as you please," he said in a half-sulky tone, "but recollect to call on me if you should want anything."

Cooper merely bowed his head.

"Yes," said Webster, going back to the question he had asked him; "the steamer from Shanghai with the European mail is expected in to-day."

She arrived during the afternoon, and brought a letter from Erasmus Benson to Cooper, saying that in about two weeks after he received it, he might look for him in Japan. The two weeks passed away quickly. By this time Cooper rarely left his room. He sat propped up in bed, his thin, transparent, shrivelled hands lying motionless on the coverlet.

CHAPTER III.

It was a beautiful evening in September. The air was mild and the windows of the sick-room were thrown open. The leaves could be heard rustling on the old trees that surrounded the small house that Cooper lived in, and from the distance came the voices of the Japanese boatmen, passing under the steep cliff in which the villa stood. In the next house a girl was singing, accompanying herself on the koto, a species of Japanese harp. The sounds all blended into a sweet and peaceful lullaby. A lassitude that was quite free from pain stole over Cooper, and he closed his eyes. Suddenly he heard along the road a horse approaching rapidly. It stopped, and a moment after the Japanese domestic entered to inquire if his master would see Mr. Benson.

"If he will have the kindness to come in," said Mr. Cooper.

"I am very sorry not to find you well," said Benson, approaching the bed. "How are you to-day, Mr. Cooper?"

"I am a little weak," answered the sick man. "But how are you, yourself? Let me look at you."

He examined his young friend attentively, and then remarked with a pleased smile, —

"You look just as you ought to do. I am satisfied."

Benson had seen Webster before coming to visit Cooper, and was resolved to help him in spite of himself.

"Mr. Cooper," he said, in the tone of a man who will not be interrupted till he has said all he has to say, "excuse me for speaking about your affairs without your permission. I am now a rich man. I can do what I please with the fortune my father has just left me. My object in returning to Yokohama is to make investments. Mr. Cooper, I know you have some creditors; permit me to become the only one. Let me buy up your obligations. Do me this favor, Mr. Cooper — Cooper, treat me as a friend. I offer you nothing but what one man of honor may accept from another. This will be simply an advance which you will soon repay. I can make it without the smallest inconvenience — Mr. Cooper, do not refuse me!"

Cooper did not move. Erasmus saw by the moonlight the large tears dropping from his eyelids.

"Mr. Cooper," he said, "tell me how much you owe."

"Erasmus Benson," said Cooper, in a muffled voice, "you are ——" He paused as if seeking an adequate expression. "You are a good man, Erasmus Benson!"

"Mr. Cooper, how much do you owe?"

"Seven thousand five hundred and fifty dollars, with interest at six per cent. from the first of April of this year."

"Then permit me to advance you that sum at six per cent."

"What security can I offer you?"

"Give me half your salary with James Webster & Co. He wants to make a new agreement with you. In consideration of the value of your services he offers you a salary of five thousand dollars. You see you will repay me in three years' time."

"That does not include the interest."

"You can give me a note for the interest if you like, although it seems to me unnecessary."

"I can perfectly well save three thousand dollars a year. I will pay it to you quarterly."

"Just as you think best, my dear Mr. Cooper."

The sick man remained silent for some minutes, absorbed in his own thoughts, and then he repeated, —

"Erasmus Benson, you are a good man!"

The next day found Benson seated at a table copying half a dozen times a letter addressed by Cooper to his creditors; duplicates of the original one which Cooper had drawn up for him.

Cooper had risen from his bed and was seated in a large armchair. When the letters were written and Cooper had read and signed them, Benson went into the town, and remained absent till midday. He then returned, bringing six bills of exchange on the Oriental Bank of London, to the amount of seventy-seven hundred and eighty-six dollars; the exact sum Cooper owed with interest calculated up to October 1, the probable date of the arrival of these letters in England.

Cooper signed the bills after Benson had indorsed them, and then asked to see the note in which he pledged himself to pay Benson the sum of seventy-seven hundred and eighty-six dollars with six per cent. interest in twelve equal payments at intervals of three months.

"Webster will bring it you this evening, before dinner," said Benson."

Cooper professed himself satisfied by this assurance, and in a voice which grew weaker and weaker, began to talk about "old England," and of their mutual friends.

He did not again allude to business, but from time to time he took up the letters lying near him on the table, and after reading their addresses, let them drop from his hand.

Webster arrived about six o'clock. When he had greeted Cooper, he drew from his pocket a large sheet of blue paper which was evidently of importance from the red tape which tied it, and said, —

"Here is the important document. Sign it at once, my friend, and then put all this business out of your mind. When this is done you will have nothing to think about but getting well."

So saying, he handed the document to Cooper with a pen. Cooper took the paper, but quietly motioned the pen away.

"Move my chair nearer to the light," he said feebly. "I cannot see."

Webster and Benson looked at each other. Then they endeavored to satisfy the sick man's fancy.

"It has always been one of my principles," continued Cooper gravely, "never to sign any paper without having first made myself master of its contents."

He held the paper so as to catch the light, and began to read it over. It had been drawn up according to custom by a lawyer, and contained certain expressions and sonorous phrases only to be met with in the language of the law. The watchers saw by the movement of Cooper's lips that he was reading each word to himself without uttering a sound.

A profound silence reigned in the room for some minutes, then Cooper said, —

"It is all right. A pen, if you please, Mr. Webster."

They gave him one. He took it in his left hand, and passing it awkwardly into his right, made a great effort and signed in large letters with a trembling hand, ROBERT E. COOPER, JR.

His hand dropped by his side. The pen slid from his fingers, and fell upon the floor. He let himself sink back in his chair, and gave a feeble sigh. A smile of indescribable content spread over his features, and he murmured: "It is all right now — all settled. You will not forget my letters for the post? I cannot go out today. I am a little tired — I should like to rest."

Then came a deep silence which neither Benson nor Webster dared to break. It was a solemn silence in presence of the dead.

From The Contemporary Review.

ORIGINALITY OF THE CHARACTER OF CHRIST.

NO man can study the signs of the times without being impressed with the conviction that there is a radical difference between the religious scepticism of the nineteenth and the religious scepticism of the eighteenth century. It is not the difference between better or worse, between more or less, between higher or lower; it is the difference of an opposite standpoint. The scepticism of the eighteenth century proceeded from the belief that the contents of revelation were antagonistic to the dictates of nature; the scepticism of the nineteenth century proceeds from the belief that the contents of revelation are simply the embodiment of human ideas. Nothing can be more remarkable than the effect which this transformation has produced upon the science of apologetics. It has been required not only to adopt a new line of defence, but to resort to that very mode of warfare which it had deprecated in its enemy. The English deists of last century set revelation in antagonism to nature, and it became the office of the science of apologetics to establish the harmony between them. The German philosophy of our age has made revelation the poetic form of natural reason, and it has become the office of apologetic science to discover a fundamental difference between the natural and the revealed. The task of the former period was to find a meeting-place betwixt nature and the supernatural; the task of the present day is to find an idea in the snpernatural to which the natural mind of man did not attain. The book wanted for the England of the eighteenth century was pre-eminently a Butler's "Analogy," a treatise to establish the points of agreement in the divine and human records. The book wanted by the England of our age has not yet appeared, but when it does appear it will be a treatise whose central aim and object will be the opposite of Butler's "Analogy"—the establishment of the proposition that the divine record is not merely the latest flower of human thought, not merely the last effort of human speculation, but something which was in advance of the humanity of its own time, and something which is still in advance of the humanity of every age.

Is there an original element then in that which we call the Christian revelation? Is there to be found in it something which could not have originated in the times which gave it birth, something which did not originate in any previous state of culture? Does it contain any representation which goes beyond the thought of its own period, or any aspiration which transcends the yearnings of a pre-Christian world? That is the all-important question to the apologist of the nineteenth century, for on the answer to that depends the answer to the question whether Christianity be a history or a myth, whether the record of the New Testament Scriptures be a record of historical occurrences or merely the poetic garniture which has clothed the aspirations slumbering in the heart of heathendom. The former is the view of Christian supernaturalism; the latter is the distinct averment of that form of scepticism which distinguishes the nineteenth century, and which receives the name of the mythical theory. The mythical theory has not mistaken the nature of that problem with which it has to contend; it has fully recognized that in order to prove the mythical character of Christianity it must prove the existence of Christianity previous to the historical Christ. It has encountered two enemies on the threshold, and it has devoted all its energies to their discomfiture. It first attacked the origin of the Gospels in the criticism of Frederic Baur of Tübingen, and endeavored to account for their production by the conflict of Judaic and Christian tendencies. But it found another adversary lurking behind the Gospels; the written narrative contained the statement of outward events. To account for the origin of the Gospels was not enough; the mythical theory must explain the origin of the Gospel history. This, also, it has attempted to do, and in the historical researches of David Strauss it has striven to find for the events of the New Testament a place and an origin in the mythical expectations of the Old. But even if we conceded that Baur and Strauss have accomplished their object, it seems to have escaped the mythical theory that a third enemy still remains. There is not only a Gospel and a Gospel history to be accounted for; behind both there is a Gospel portraiture, and a portraiture without which neither the outward acts nor the written record could ever have found a place in human thought. Could we satisfactorily explain on purely human principles the origin of the evangelic manuscripts, could we satisfactorily account on purely natural grounds for the successful propagation of the facts which these narratives record, we should still be confronted by a more formidable antagonist than all in the existence of the character of Christ.

We do not here contend that this existence was actually lived, we do not assume that the character attributed to the founder of Christianity was in veritable form seen amongst men; to do so would be to beg the whole question. We take our stand upon an undoubted fact, a fact admitted by all schools of thought, orthodox and heterodox, supernatural and mythical — that there is before our eyes the delineation of a moral character which professes to embody the essence of the Christian life. We have here a portraiture, whether it be an ideal portraiture or the description of an actual life is not here the question: the sole question is, to what does this portraiture amount? Is it reducible to the natural yearnings of heathendom? is it the flower of human speculation? is it the latest fruit of the pagan tree? If so it becomes only another argument for the mythical theory. But if, on the other hand, it should be found to be an original portraiture, if on examination it should be seen to transcend alike the Jewish and the heathen yearning, if it should be recognized to contain an element for which there was no preparation in the pre-Christian world, its existence must furnish a strong presumption against the very basis of that theory. Such is the question we intend to consider. We assume nothing, we use no materials which the mythicist himself would not admit to be legitimate. We do not take for granted that the founder of Christianity ever existed, we do not take for granted that the records of his existence are either authentic or genuine. We simply recognize the fact that there is a narrative before us, and that in this narrative there is delineated the portrait of a life. We address ourselves solely and entirely to the examination of that portrait. We consider not whence it came, we inquire not who painted it, we only ask whether it was painted in old colors or in new; and according to our answer of that question we seek to estimate the force of the mythical theory.

There is one preliminary remark which should not be omitted in a study of this subject; we mean the unity of the Christian portraiture. Of the four evangelical narratives which depict it, the first three, or synoptic Gospels, present a considerable difference from the fourth; there is a difference of standpoint, a difference of style, and for the most part a difference in the local scene of their enactment. But beneath these points of variation there is a more essential bond of agreement: the four Gospels portray one Christ. It is not too much to say that if we confine our attention to the mental features of the portrait we shall find the closest parallel between the Christ of the Synoptics and the Christ of John — a parallel which is all the more striking from the difference of their outward surroundings. The words are generally dissimilar, but it is the same being who speaks them; the acts are frequently different, but it is the same character that performs them. If in the Synoptics he blesses the poor in spirit, he washes in the fourth Gospel the disciples' feet. If in the Synoptics he blesses the hungering and thirsting after righteousness, he satisfies in the fourth Gospel the spiritual thirst of the woman of Samaria. If in the Synoptics he blesses the pure in heart, he reveals himself in the fourth Gospel to the guileless Nathanael. In both he speaks to the multitude in parable, though in the former it is the parable of word, in the latter the parable of deed. In both he manifests the consciousness of theocratic power, that authoritative speech which is more remarkable from the absence of any physical display. In both he looks forward to death as that which is to crown his mission and consummate his plan. The Christ of the Synoptics is seen for the most part in the works and in the walks of practical life, ministering to temporal necessities and teaching the duties of every day; the Christ of the fourth Gospel is chiefly beheld on the mountain-tops of contemplation, communicating to his more initiated disciples the deeper mysteries of the kingdom. But while undoubtedly this is the general characteristic of the two representations, the unity of portraiture appears in this, that the distinctive expression of each breaks forth occasionally in the other. The fourth Gospel is generally contemplative, yet there is nothing in the Synoptics more practical than the miracle of Cana in Galilee. The Synoptics are pre-eminently practical, yet there is nothing in the fourth Gospel more mystical than the passage in which Christ declares the reciprocal knowledge of the Father and the Son, or the verses in which he pronounces the blessing on Peter, or the expressions with which he calls to himself the laboring and heavy-laden. The existence of such unity amidst diversity is alone sufficient to establish the fact that before the minds of the disciples there stood one common image, the portraiture of one character, the delineation of the same moral features, the exhibition of the same Christ.

We pass now to consider the witness of this portraiture to itself, and this will be best seen by considering its relation to the contemporary world around it. At the time when Christianity came upon the scene the world was mentally divided into two sections — the Jew and the Gentile. In the mouth of an Israelite the names denoted no more than a difference of nationality, but we now see that they involved a difference of intellectual standpoint. Let us first briefly observe the relation which the character of Christ presents to the nature of Judaism. The mental characteristic of Judaism was in its one-sidedness. Of all systems that ever existed it was perhaps the least capable of eclecticism. As long as it remained an independent existence it was unable to contemplate more than one side of an idea. Its earnestness was the earnestness of fanaticism, its reverence for truth was the reverence for a possession which it believed to be exclusively its own. Yet it was from this intellectually narrow soil that there emanated the most many-sided conception which has ever proceeded from any age of history. From the heart of a people whose notion of absolute truth was the idea of a truth absolutely committed to one nation, there came forth a life or the conception of a life whose distinguishing feature was its cosmopolitanism, and whose leading characteristic was its capacity for assimilation. If we open the New Testament narrative without any dogmatic bias, if we approach it merely as spectators and in the absence of all individual interests, we shall find that even on such a purely human view we are brought at once into contact with what may be called a human anomaly. We are confronted by a portraiture whose distinction it is to combine in highest form all other distinctions, whose separation from the rest of humanity is its ability to unite those elements whose division has been the ground of separation. The life of Christ, as recorded in the Evangelists, is a life which reaches its unity by assimilation of contrary elements. We have the statement of a supernatural birth and of a continued supernatural sustenance side by side with the natural growth and development of a human soul. We have the practical workshop of Nazareth in almost immediate conjunction with the mystical solitudes of the wilderness. We have the logical acuteness which can detect the subtleties of Pharisaic sophistry in strict combination with that intuitional child-life which sees the kingdom of God. We have that rare capacity of moral sympathy which can at once turn aside from rejoicing with the joyful to find an equal power in sorrowing with the sad. We have that vast outlook which can contemplate the end of all things, immediately succeeded by that minute particularity which can dictate the precepts for the hour. We have the life which at one moment seems at home amid the crowd, and which the next appears to have reached its ideal in solitude. His all-absorbing desire is the spiritual elevation of humanity, yet he surpasses all philanthropists in his provision for the daily temporal wants of men. He is boundlessly tolerant; he forbids not the good work of those who are working from an inferior motive to that of his personal service. Yet he displays something which in such minds is rarely to be found — a tolerance even for intolerance; he will not suffer the fire from heaven to descend upon the village of Samaria which, through the force of religious bigotry, has closed its gates against him. He is pervaded with the love of purity, yet he claims a special power of extending forgiveness to the impure, and exemplifies that power in a series of instances whose consistency is never broken. The conception, in short, which the delineation of Christ's character introduced into the world is that idea which Paul has felicitously expressed in the words "He that is spiritual judgeth all things." It is the conception of a spirituality which, just because it is the highest type of life, comprehends within itself all the lower forms of existence; which because it is sacred includes also the secular, and because it is high stretches down to the minute and lowly. This, we say, is the thought which the delineation of Christ's portraiture has presented to the world, and which has long since become the world's possession. Yet we must not forget that this thought was not always commonplace; least of all must we forget that it was foreign to the nation which produced it. It was of all other thoughts that most remote from the Jewish mind; and when the Jewish mind beheld it, it beheld it with aversion and loathing. Even the recorders of the evangelical narrative give indications that they are depicting a portrait the full beauty of whose expression they do not as yet see. No one will suspect Mr. Matthew Arnold and Mr. Stuart Mill of an undue predilection for dogmatic Christianity, yet both Mr. Matthew Arnold and Mr. Stuart Mill have recorded in the strongest terms their conviction that the portrait of the master was above its Jewish delineators. Strauss himself seems latterly to have had this truth forced upon him. In his later "Life of Jesus," intended for the German people, he appears to have found that the character of the founder himself was precisely that element which could not be resolved into the legendary expectations of the Jewish nation, and therefore he is forced to seek for that character a source outside of Judaism. He says that the nature of Christ contains two elements, the one Judaic and the other Gentile; the former derived from birth and education, the latter the product of natural disposition; the former holding him to the institutions of the past, the latter impelling him onward into sympathy with the claims of the future. In this statement there is already conceded one-half of the argument against the mythical theory. If the natural instincts of Judaism are unable to explain the existence of Christ's portraiture, the natural instincts of Judaism must have been unable to create that portraiture. In admitting the originality of Christ's character with reference to the Jewish nation, Strauss has virtually admitted that the Jewish nation of itself could neither have imagined nor constructed the central figure of the Christian history. He has virtually arrived at the conclusion that if these fishermen of Galilee were the originators of this sublime conception, they must have originated it, not by reason of their Judaism, but in spite of their Judaism; not because they were fishermen of Galilee, but because they had transcended the limits of all Palestine; not because they were imbued with the legendary spirit of their nation, but because they had caught a breath of that Gentile atmosphere which was everywhere diffused around them.

Turn we, then, to this other side of the question. Judaism, in the judgment of the mythical theory itself, has been pronounced inadequate to account for the creation of the Christian portraiture, and the mythical theory has fallen back on the support of the Gentile element. But is the Gentile element more adequate than the Jewish? Does the portrait of Christ, as we now behold it, present any real analogy to the aspirations of heathendom? The heroes of all nations, as embodied in their works of fiction, will be found to be simply the expression of the national idea. Is the portrait of Christ the expression of the heathen ideal? That is the question to which the subject narrows itself. The first point of inquiry is, What are the ideals of heathendom? As they appear chronologically on the page of history, they may, we think, be reduced to four — physical strength, intellectual power, æsthetic culture, and regal majesty. Let us glance at each of these.

The earliest historical ideal of heathendom is the worship of physical strength; it finds its peculiar sphere in the Asiatic continent. Mr. Buckle, in his "History of European Civilization," has mentally divided the human race into two great sections: in the one, man has power over nature; in the other, nature has power over man; the former is the characteristic of Europe, the latter of Asia. We believe the distinction to be at once historical and philosophical. As we survey the great systems of Asiatic worship, we are impressed beyond all other things with the conviction that we are in the presence of a life where the aspect of nature is more reverenced than the movements of mind, where the individual sinks into insignificance in the contemplation of an outward universe, whose vast extent and changeless duration contrast so painfully with the frailty of his human years. We believe it was this conviction which originated the Brahminical trinity. Men looked upon the process of vegetation as a continuous circle of birth, growth, and decay in order to be born again, and they gave to each step of the process the names of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva. To the philosophic minds of India, these names doubtless came to have a more spiritual significance, but to the mass of the people their original application remained. Nor, if we consult the sacred books of the Hindus, are we less impressed with the Asiatic reverence for the elements of physical strength. Perhaps in nothing does this ideal more prominently appear than in the tendency to indulge in numerical calculations. As we read the "Vedas" we are absolutely appalled by the vastness of the dimensions and the enormous length of the duration assigned to natural objects. We hear in one place the earth described as a plain, whose diameter is one hundred and seventy million miles; we read in another of mountains sixty miles high; we are told in a third of a period of duration extending to four thousand millions of millions of years. Such calculations defy the power of fancy itself, and the imagination grows giddy in the very act of contemplating them. Yet the straining after these vast numerical proportions had its root, not in poetic imagination, but in a very prosaic conviction of the nothingness of human life. Man beheld nature in its most powerful and gigantic aspects, and therefore to him the physically powerful and the permanently changeless became the ideal of perfection. The outward universe appeared invulnerable by time, and it was therefore an object of reverence; the individual life was transitory and fading, and it was therefore an object of contempt. Hence, in the Asiatic view, it became the religious duty of the individual to yield up his petty being to the abiding life of nature, to desire no life but its life, no immortality but that which it enjoyed. It was this belief, implicitly contained in Brahminism, which ultimately broke forth with such startling power in the creed of Gautama Buddha. That creed, apparently the inculcation of a spiritual sacrifice, was in reality a homage paid to the powers of nature. The individual was enjoined to offer up his individuality; but why? Not because unselfishness in itself was noble, but because individuality in itself was worthless. Man's highest life was the loss of his personality, for in the loss of that personality he became a part of the great universe from which he had emerged and from which it had been his misery ever to have separated. He was unhappy because he had striven to live in independent personality; he must continue to be unhappy as long as he continued to desire such personality: if he would find rest, if he would attain to freedom from care and sorrow, he must obtain freedom from the sense of individual existence, and give back the elements of his being into union with the elements of nature. Such is the religious ideal of Buddhism, such for the most part is the religious ideal of the Asiatic mind. If in the worship of the Parsee its full force was broken,— if then, for the first time, men began to discover that nature was not altogether beautiful, and that she enclosed a night amid the sunshine, it was still from nature alone that they expected deliverance from the night, and their highest hope of unclouded happiness rested in the contemplation of the strength of material power.

The second ideal of heathendom is that of intellectual power, and it finds its fitting representative in the Platonic mind. In one sense Platonism is the revolt from, in another sense it is the ally of, the Asiatic ideal. It is the revolt from it because here, for the first time, we find the emergence of Mr. Buckle's European type of intellect; nature has lost its dominion over man, and man has begun to claim his dominion over nature. Yet from another point of view, Platonism is the ally of its adversary, for here, as in the Asiatic cultus, the interests of individual life are again lost and overshadowed. The ideal of Platonism is that of an intellectual aristocracy, for whose sake alone, and by whose laws alone, the world exists. The republic of Plato bears a strong analogy to the political Utopia of Mr. Carlyle, with one prominent point of contrast. The Greek philosopher and the seer of Chelsea both start with the removal of artificial inequalities, yet both are strongly convinced that, even were men made equal, they could not remain so. With each, democracy is the starting-point; with each, continued democracy is an impossibility. In the view of both there is a principle of natural selection, by which the intellectual come to the surface, and, by the sheer force of intellect, rule as kings over the masses; but here Plato and Carlyle part asunder. Carlyle would never dream of deifying intellectual force, or any other force, apart from its power of practical work; he values it not for what it is, but for what it can do; his intellectual man dominates the masses because through his intellect he is able to reach the masses. With Plato it is all the reverse. His intellectual man comes to the surface, not that he may carry down into the depths a breath of the upper atmosphere, but in order that he may remain upon the surface, and keep the depths forever beneath him. The Platonist looked with contempt upon the interests of individual men, in so far as they were individual. For the common passions which actuated mankind he had no sympathy; for the common emotions which animated mankind he had no room. In his Utopia the intellect was everything; it was at once the object of contemplation and the faculty by which it was contemplated. The duty of man was meditation; the object of man's meditation was himself. But if he would meditate aright, he must dwell upon that which was universal in the human race. He must disregard the individual peculiarities of the mass; he must withdraw himself from the petty interests of the hour; he must grasp the highest type of humanity, and keep his thoughts on that which was independent of all times and of all places. The masses of mankind struggled for the wants of material nature; the Platonist must despise material nature, and must welcome any material wants which forced the mind inward upon itself. The masses of mankind had family ties and affections; the Platonist must abstract himself from all such limitations, and view himself as the member of a wider brotherhood. The masses of mankind were prone to the love of individual beings, but the individual form was fleeting and perishing; the Platonist must fix his affections upon that which would not pass away — not on the individual being, but on those qualities of the individual being which he shared in common with the race of humanity, and possessed as the realization of a universal type of excellence. Platonic love was not the love of virtuous men, but the love of their virtues; not the affection for noble hearts, but the admiration for that which made them noble. The soul beheld nothing but its own shadow, saw nothing but abstractions, pondered nothing but qualities, and lived for nothing but the emancipation from individual desires.

Meantime, in the heart of the masses themselves there had been growing up an ideal of a very different kind — an ideal which, for the sake of brevity, we may call æsthetic culture. Strictly speaking, the name is too wide for that which it designates, and covers a larger area than it is meant to enclose. We here use it, however, in its most limited sense, to indicate the perception of the beautiful in the forms of outward nature and the forms of the sensuous imagination. At the very moment when nature, in its individual material aspects, was being discarded by the Platonic mind as a hindrance to mental development, it was being embraced by the popular mind of Greece as a source of elevation and power. The vision of the beautiful was to the masses what the contemplation of the abstract was to the philosophers — a perception of that which revealed God, and a meditation on that which was immutable and eternal. They found in the forms of nature the revelation of celestial harmonies, and were kindled into a love of poetry which became to them the synonym for a religion. Nor let it be thought that in this love of the beautiful in nature the popular mind of Greece was altogether untrue to its European culture. If it was opposed to Platonism in refusing to depreciate matter, it was equally opposed to the Asiatic servitude which bowed down before matter. When men come to recognize the beauty of nature, they have ceased to fear nature; for the recognition of beauty is the sense of love, and love is incompatible with fear. The Brahmin had beheld in the universe only a gigantic strength before which he quailed; the Greek saw in it an insinuating charm which invited him to approach and tempted him to commune. His worship was absolutely untouched by terror; it was more like the worship of the poet than the adoration of the humble saint. Indeed, Hegel has advanced the strange theory that the Greek adoration of nature proceeded from a sense of human superiority. Man, he says, had arrived at the conviction that the life of nature was foreign to his life, and that his life was nobler than that of nature. Accordingly he sought to clothe nature in his own attire, to invest her with those qualities of mind and soul which he found existing within himself, to crown her with that glory which constituted the essence of his own being. Those beauties which he worshipped in the outer universe were precisely the beauties which he felt within him; he invested the inanimate with the semblance of the life which he himself lived and breathed, in order that he might lift the world of nature into a seeming equality with the world of spirit. If this view of Hegel be true, we have here, even in the most concrete form of European thought, the presence of the distinctive European element; man in the life of the mass, as well as man in the life of the philosopher, had arrived at the conviction of his superiority to nature, and claimed his legitimate place in the universe of being.

If this Hegelian explanation have any foundation in fact, it will help to explain the transition from the popular ideal of Greece into the seemingly opposite ideal of Rome. The first impression awakened by that transition is indeed a sense of contrast. If Greece idealized the soft, the refined, the beautiful, Rome worshipped the strong, the stern, the fearful; that which she sought beyond all other things was to realize in actual life the power of humanity. Yet, according to the foregoing explanation, this stern Roman ideal had already been growing up in the very heart of the effeminate Grecian mythology; man had there been preparing for a kingdom. Rome was the establishment of that kingdom, or, at least, it was the attempt to establish it. It was the effort to raise an empire which should never be moved, and in whose eternity and immutability men might recognize the object of their religion. In this one particular there was a strange analogy between the otherwise contrasted types of the Roman and the Jew. Both looked for the establishment of a sacred empire upon the basis of physical power, though the motive of the Jew was religious, the motive of the Roman worldly. Both contemplated the extension of that empire to the ends of the habitable world, and in a certain sense both were successful in their aim, though the Roman realized it literally, the Jew only metaphorically and in a way he did not desire. Both wrought out their design through the medium of outward conquest, though with the Roman the conquest was an end, with the Jew only the road to something higher. Thus united amidst their difference, the Roman and the Jew have never been altogether separate through the whole course of history. In the outward legalism of mediæval worship, in the struggles of the papacy after temporal dominion, above all in that vast conception of a holy Roman empire which has never ceased to dominate the Teutonic mind, we see the influence of a partly pre-Christian culture, and recognize in one united aim the theocratic aspirations of the Roman and the Jew.

We have now briefly examined the four ideals of paganism — the efforts to find perfection in physical strength, intellectual power, æsthetic culture, and regal majesty. The next question which arises is this, does any one of these ideals, or do all of them united, suffice to explain that Christian conception which is the essence of the gospel narrative? If the character of Christ, as there delineated, can be referred to any of them singly or accounted for by a combination of them all, we shall then be forced to admit that there is nothing in that character above the power of human creation. But if, on the other hand, the gospel conception of Christ refuses to coalesce with these ideals, if it shows on many points not only an important difference from them but a positive antagonism to them, if the longer we compare them we are the more impressed with the belief that they belong to separate orders of thought, we shall be driven to the conclusion that nothing in heathendom with which we are acquainted was adequate to create the Christian portraiture. Now, we think it will be evident even to the most superficial reflection that the conception of Christ, as delineated by the Evangelists, so far from being a sublimation of the ideals of heathendom, is a direct and positive reversal of them. Let us begin with that which we found to be characteristic of the Asiatic mind — the reverence for physical strength. Nothing can be more clear on the very surface of the Gospel narrative than that the standard of heroism there contemplated is precisely of the opposite nature. The individuality of the Brahmin had sunk into nothingness before his admiration of that active power which he beheld in the world of nature; the individuality of the Christian rose into moral significance in the presence of a contrary thought — the belief that the highest strength was that passive power which could sustain physical weakness. The object which the Christian idealized was not so much a life that could do great things as a life that could bear great things, not so much a power to work as a power to suffer, not so much a strength that shone forth in outward majesty as a strength that manifested itself in supporting outward meanness. This is indeed the distinctive and characteristic element in the Christian ideal; it permeates the whole narrative like an atmosphere. The eye, in the fourth Gospel, is summoned to rest upon one who voluntarily and deliberately exchanges a divine for a human form, refuses to grasp the empire of Godhead in order that he may wear the garb of a servant, divests himself of an element of life which is natural to him, in order that he may incorporate an element of death which is foreign to his nature, empties his omniscience into a human knowledge, his infinitude into a finite form, his eternity into a temporal duration, his power of universal dominion into a power of absolute service. The narrative is constructed in such a way that in proportion as the human limitations cluster around the life of the Master, the reader is made more and more conscious of the Master's essential majesty, sees his strength just where he is physically most weak, and beholds his spiritual triumph precisely on that field where he is physically vanquished — the death of the cross. It has been said that the theological development of the fourth Gospel is in advance of the first three, and in a systematic sense we believe this to be true; they approach the figure of the Master from different sides of the landscape, yet in the view of both the figure of the Master is the same. If John emphasizes the divine, and the Synoptists give more prominence to the human Christ, we must remember that the ideal of the human contained in the Synoptists is precisely identical with John's ideal of the divine; in both it is the portraiture of a life whose strength is its power of service. The key-note of Matthew, Mark, and Luke is the majesty of a human nature which has lost all thought of its own majesty: "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister." The most perfect form of humanity which this world has ever seen was that which wore the garb of human servitude; such from beginning to end is the thought of the Synoptists. Theirs is the worship of a strength which is strong by becoming weak, the reverence of a life which is individually great by losing its own individuality and living in the lives of others. They find heroism precisely in those qualities whose opposites had been the worship of the Asiatic intellect. They assign a kingdom to poverty of spirit, an increase of knowledge to the increase of sorrow, an earthly empire to the power of gentleness, a perfect satisfaction to the hungering and thirsting of the soul. They see a higher triumph in the peace-maker than in the war-maker, a superior strength in the power of forgiveness to that which dwells in the capacity for vengeance. They find the most promising subjects of the new kingdom precisely in those whom the Asiatic intellect would have passed over — in the laboring, the heavy-laden, the consciously weak, and poor, and needy. We need not say that an ideal such as this was the antagonist and the subversion of the worship of physical power. So far from being created by that worship, it could only begin to exist in its decay and death. It grew out of another order of thought, it was the product of a contrary element, and the element which produced it was foreign, not only to the mind of Judea, but to the entire genius of the Asiatic intellect.

If we pass now to the Platonic ideal, we shall find ourselves equally unable to discover in the natural growth of heathendom an explanation of the Christian portraiture. The Platonist, as we have seen, aspired to the consciousness of intellectual power; it was the sense of this intellectual superiority which constituted his sense of empire over the common herd of men. It is not too much to say that in this aspect also the ideal which floated before the mind of the Christian was a complete reversal of heathen aspirations. The founder of Christianity is also contemplated as recognizing degrees of mental superiority, and as assigning to such degrees of superiority a proportionate place in his kingdom. But the mental superiority desired by the Christian founder is not that of intellectual self-consciousness, but something which as nearly as possible is the antithesis of such a feeling. The condition of membership in Christ's kingdom is the death of self-consciousness, intellectual or moral. He demands as a preliminary requisite the possession of a child-life. He insists upon the simplicity, the spontaneousness, the absence of self-analysis, the unconsciousness of all power, and the ignorance of all merit, which are the essential attributes of the spirit of childhood. He declares that the revelation which he came to communicate appeals, not to those faculties which are developed in the few, but precisely to that part of our nature which potentially exists in all men: "I thank thee, O Father, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." He affirms that while there must be degrees of superiority, the heights to which a man rises will be proportionate to his unconsciousness of his own elevation; and he illustrates the thought by acting the very striking parable of placing a little child in the midst of the disciples. He makes the highest of moral qualities not self-reliance, but that which is its contrary — faith, the trusting in another. They who would follow him have to leave their all. A man's all is not necessarily his property; or, to speak more correctly, his property is not necessarily his outward possessions; it is whatever he believes to be the source of his peculiar strength. To become a follower of the Master was therefore to relinquish whatever a man had grasped as the strong point of his nature. It was to subside from self-reliance into absolute dependence, from conscious strength into conscious weakness, from the walk by sight into the walk by faith. It was to forget those points of intellectual superiority which may have separated him from his brethren, and to lay hold of those points of human insufficiency which by one common sense of need linked his individual life to the lives of all mankind; the ideal of Christianity was the death of the ideal of Platonism.

Nor can the conception of Christ's character be referred with any greater plausibility to the third standard of heathen perfection. That standard was, as we have seen, the attempt to reach æsthetic culture by the contemplation of natural and physical beauty. It is a notorious fact that to the mind of the first Christians those beauties which form the prerogative of the poet and the artist were rather objects of aversion than of contemplation. It is quite certain that they believed this special form of æsthetic culture to be at variance with their religion, and it is equally certain that they were wrong in so believing. Yet the very fact that the first Christians should have conceived such an impression indicates that the religion of Christ must have introduced them to another phase of æsthetic culture. The truth is that Christianity had brought into the world a new estimate of the beautiful by the introduction of a new law of association. It had succeeded in uniting the thought of symmetry with that which hitherto had been unsymmetrical, in attaching the idea of harmony to that which hitherto had been unharmonious. When Paul said that he gloried in the cross, he expressed more than the common faith of Christendom; he indicated the common assent of Christendom to a new association of the beautiful — an association which to the heathen mind appeared the wildest of paradoxes — the union of glory and pain. Christ was himself the personification of the new æsthetic ideal. He unites in one act the hitherto opposite elements of glory and of shame. He looks forward to the hour of deepest human frailty as the hour in which the Son of Man should be glorified. He declares on the road to Emmaus that the disharmony was an essential part of the beauty, that Christ must needs have suffered that he might enter into his glory. He stands under the shadow of the cross, and bequeaths to the world his peace; he confronts the spectacle of death, and speaks of the fulness of his joy. Nay, this æsthetic connection between the cross and the crown, between the Calvary and the Olivet of human life, is carried out to a still further length by the minds of his disciples. As if to find the longest possible bridge between the extremes of human thought, they actually rise to the conception of Christ as the high priest in heaven. They are not afraid to enter within the veil, they are not afraid to introduce within the veil the thought of sacrifice and the memory of human pain; heaven and earth never met so closely together as in that association of sacrificial sorrow with spiritual joy. The apologetic importance of this association it is hardly possible to overrate; it is, if we mistake not, that which above all other things stamps the character of Christ with its impress of originality. The founder of Buddhism has been thought to come nearer to him than any other ideal of antiquity; but it is just here that the founder of Buddhism is further behind him than all. Buddha longed for death, and taught his followers to long for death; but why? Because the sufferings of life were too strong for him. The notion of a world redeemed through a cross, and perfected through suffering, was at the last possible remove either from his teaching or his thought. Buddha considered the goal of human blessedness to be the emancipation from desire — desire was the source of temptation, and temptation was the source of pain. With what a startling power of contrast does the Christian ideal burst upon our view! "Then was Jesus led up by the Spirit to be tempted in the wilderness." The more deeply we analyze the meaning of these words, the more are we impressed with the radical difference of their standpoint from that of the Buddhist religion. Here is a being who is supposed to have actually reached the blessedness of divine communion. The heavens have opened to his vision, and the voice of heaven has sounded in his ear, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Yet this Nirvana of rest, which to Buddha would have been the goal, is to Christ only the beginning. He is led up from the paradise into the wilderness, into the world of desires and temptations, simply in order that he may experience these desires and encounter these temptations; and as if to make the contrast more marked, he is "led up by the Spirit." The struggle with worldly influences, so far from being, as Buddha held, a barrier to the religious life, is declared to be itself the highest manifestation of that life, the evidence of its existence, and the proof of its power. From the manger to the cross, from the wilderness to the garden, we are confronted by one pervading thought — the possible glory of human suffering, and the potential gain that resides in human loss; and we are constrained as we survey the picture, whatever be our estimate of its dogmatic value, to assign to it the merit of genuine originality.

The last ideal of heathendom, and that in which heathendom agreed with Judaism, was the reverence for regal majesty, the desire of a kingdom. Now, let us observe that, in the abstract, Christ was at one with this desire. Lord Amberley, in his "Analysis of Religious Belief," has found in Christ's abstinence from earthly greatness a parallel to the saying of Confucius, that there are three desirable objects, and that the possession of empire is not one of them. Lord Amberley has altogether missed the beauty and the freshness of the Christian paradox. The Chinese philosopher meant to state that a man might be perfectly happy though his lot were obscure and his influence insignificant; Christ would certainly have conceded the platitude, but he would not have thought it worthy to be the subject of a special revelation. The leading thought in the mind of the Master is not the abstract undesirableness of empire, but the contrary. Empire in its deepest sense is the influence of mind over mind, and Christ professes expressly to establish such an influence. He adopts a principle of natural selection, by which the saints shall judge the world; in other words, by which the best shall rule. He declares his mission to be the establishment of a kingdom, the introduction of a new government into the affairs of men, the domination of worldly views by spiritual forces now despised and disregarded. To this extent he is at one with the Roman and at one with the Jew; he believes men, as isolated individuals, to be incapable of action, and he longs to see them united as the servants of a theocratic power, whose will shall be their law, and whose law shall be their will. But at this point the master parts company with the Roman and the Jew, and strikes off into a path which had been hitherto untrodden. He agreed with them in their desire of a kingdom; he differed from them radically in their mode of realizing it. The Roman and the Jew sought to dominate men from without; they strove after an empire which should be won by physical weapons and maintained by physical power. Christ objected to this imperialism, not, as Lord Amberley thinks, because it was a source of human greatness, but because it was not a source of human greatness, — because, in the strictest sense of the word, it was not a kingdom at all. He felt, and felt truly, that any empire which, like the Jewish and the Roman, claimed to be theocratic, could only be made permanent by ruling from within, that nothing could be called a sacred sovereignty which did not directly influence the mind. He felt that the ultimate seat of regal authority lay in the heart of a people, that the heart could only be won by love, and that love could only be manifested by sacrifice. It was from this thought, or train of thought, that there emerged the great Christian paradox, "He that is least shall be greatest." To be a king in the most absolute sense was to be ruler over the heart; but to be ruler over the heart, it was first necessary that the sovereign should be a subject. He who would win the love of others must first be dominated by the love of others; captivity must precede captivation. Inspired by this deep principle of morality, the master conceived the grand design of establishing a kingdom that could never be moved — a kingdom not based upon the physical power which was perishable, nor even on the intellectual Platonic power which could only exist through the ignorance of the many, but on a power whose foundation was the nature of humanity itself — the capacity for love. He proposed to conquer the heart of the world, and to conquer it by the exhibition of his own heart. The founders of previous kingdoms had sought to rule by placing in the foreground the display of their personal superiority; the founder of Christianity resolved to subjugate mankind by the sacrifice of himself. The kings of former time had fought their way to empire by shedding the blood of their enemies; the aspirant to this new kingdom determined to secure dominion by shedding his own.

An aim so strange, a plan so paradoxical, would alone have been sufficient to mark out Christianity from all foregoing forms of faith, but to this there must be added another element which heightens the strangeness and completes the contrast. It is now a historical fact that the founder of Christianity has succeeded in his aim; whatever be mythical in the Gospel, there is no mythology here. There is at this hour in the world the nucleus of such a kingdom as Christ desired to found. We mean not the kingdom of the Roman hierarchy, or the kingdom of the Anglican Church, or the kingdom of the Presbyterian worship, but that which at once underlies and overlaps them all — the loyalty of a multitude of souls to Him who is their ideal of perfection. For let it be remembered that Christianity is not primarily, nor even chiefly, a collection of moral precepts intended for the guidance of human life. If that were all, it would be easy to find occasional parallels between the maxims of Jesus and the maxims of Buddha, or Confucius, or Lao-Tze. But Christianity is what Buddhism and Confucianism and Taoism are not — the membership in a kingdom, and the loyalty to a king. It contemplates in the first instance, not the special sayings of its founder, nor yet the sum of his united teaching; it contemplates the founder himself, and fixes its eye upon him alone. Christianity includes all the precepts of morality, but all the precepts of morality united are not the essence of the Christian faith, and simply for this reason, that the Christian religion is a faith. It is the subjection of the heart to an ideal whom it adores, the captivation of the eye by a portrait in which it revels, the conquest of the will by a law which it loves; Christianity in its deepest nature is an æsthetic belief, the vision of a beautiful life, and the conviction that this beauty has become by its union with humanity the atonement for human deformity. There is within this world an actually existing kingdom of Christ, the hearts of whose subjects are ever bowing down before him; and amidst all the changes in the systems of human government, amidst all the transmutations in the aspects of theological thought, this great ideal has found no diminution in his power and reign. The question is, does the ideal represent a reality? and the answer to that question depends on the answer to another. Has the ideal of Christendom sprung from a reality, has it grown out of the natural instincts of the human mind, or does it involve something which the human mind has displayed no ability to create? That is the question which in these pages we have been endeavoring to answer, and we seem to have arrived at the only possible answer. If we find Judea reaping where she has not sown, and gathering where she has not strewed; if we see her the birthplace of an idea which surpassed her power of origination, and when originated surpassed her power of comprehension; if in her contact with the Gentile nations we fail to discover any germs from which that idea could have naturally sprung; if we find it in essence and in portraiture directly at variance with all heathen aspirations, reversing the world's ideal of physical strength, transforming its estimate of mental power, casting into the shade its conception of æsthetic culture, and placing on a contrary basis its hope of a theocratic kingdom; if we find it introducing a new standard of heroism which caused every valley to be exalted, and every mountain to be made low; and if, above all, we perceive that when that standard of heroism rose upon the world, it rose upon a foreign soil which received it as an alien and an adversary, are we not driven to ask if even on the lowest computation we have not reached the evidence of a new life in humanity, the outpouring of a fresh vitality, and the manifestation of a higher power?

GEORGE MATHESON.

From The Nineteenth Century.

CHRYSANTHEMA GATHERED FROM THE GREEK ANTHOLOGY.

PERHAPS scholars have heard and read quite enough about the "Greek Anthology." It has become historical, as all collected poems do, a storehouse not unlocked unless to group or edit the contents; this record of the manifold life of a thousand years has been made into a book, and has lost some of its vitality in the making. There is plenty of question about the different anthologies, and some little about the separate authors and their poems. But, on the other hand, poetry-lovers, and specially lovers of songs, hardly know how many of their favorites are there in original form. English people who love Herrick and Ben Jonson do not all know that Meleager was in love with daffodils, and wrote about the wreath he made of them very much as Herrick would have done; that Agathias as good as wrote "Drink to me only with thine eyes" (the first verse of it at least, and the second is to be found unfathered in the fifth book of the "Anthology"* too); and that, to speak in reverse order of time, Mrs. Browning and Shakespeare and Spenser can all be quoted in it. There are epigrams with the stamp of each upon the face of them.

These lovers of songs — they may not care for history, and are very likely quite ignorant of Herrick's life and Jonson's — will not want to hear much about the song-writers themselves; and there is not much to tell. "Herrick" and "Jonson" are to them respectively the names of a good many and a few well-known and well-loved verses, and so should Callimachus, for instance, and Agathias, and of course Meleager be; and that would be a great deal better fame for these poets than that students only should know about them as represented by certain numbers in the great drift-heap of the "Anthology." Plato and Simonides have their better fame elsewhere, and are not in such risk of being laid by. This, then, is what I want to give — some readable little English poems written to all intents and purposes a great while ago in Greek. An accurate recognition of each poet as an individual cannot perhaps be made out of the original language, scarcely even there; but just as Keats by his temperament met Homer half-way in Chapman, lovers of the Elizabethan poets and of modern poetry, as well as Greek scholars or better, can meet these very men with their sweethearts and their garlands "in their habit as they lived" so many hundred years gone by.

Now, for us to do this with ease and pleasure, we must meet them under some guise familiar to us and not dull. This brings us to the question of metres. With our ears accustomed to such a great number of lyric forms, we must have variety above all else. For different subjects we want different keys and different time as in music. We have a strong instance of this in Tennyson's work. For the monotone of sorrow he takes one grave metre, but in "Maud," where the movement is as complex as life's, he varies the metres to correspond with it as best may be. The translator who would use one metre for these Greek epigrams, would have written "Maud" in couplets. Hexameters and pentameters and occasional iambics are the metres of the "Anthology," but they are not familiar to us and never will be, unless combined with rhyme (and always the more rhyme the better), when they present as good a means as can be found for faithful and rhythmical translations; and heroic couplets which to us take the place of the longer lines to the Greek ear are generally dull. There is no denying that. Take up any book of unbroken couplets, and it will certainly prove less inviting than it could possibly have done in any other form, blank verse included. It is true that in English literature heroic couplets do best clothe the epigram; but then we must bear this in mind — what is nearest to our sympathies in the work of these so-called "epigrammatic" poets is not, as we now speak, epigrammatic at all. Many of the verses are rhetorical exercises, jokes and so forth; but even of these (as Mr. Symonds has shown in his "Greek Poets") most, though they have the point of an epigram, have not its sting. Meleager's "wreath of songs" was a collection of lyrics, most of them short and nearly all memorable, but their incisiveness is very different from the precision we look for in an epigram; they are not forced or witty, many of them just idylls. In our English with its wide vocabulary, and if he had been writing for print and not for graving, it is not perhaps impertinent to suppose that he and his fellows, if not his predecessors, would have chosen the sonnet form. For the sonnet with its beautiful order, its strict rules, any one of which broken is an offence to the cultivated ear, and with the manifold changes of tone, the simplicity and the neatness which it admits, is really our best equivalent for the eight or ten hexameters and pentameters in which most of our favorite Greek epigrams are contained. As it is, a translator cannot render these into sonnets without a little undue expansiveness; but where the epigram is of fourteen lines or even twelve, he may fairly cast it into a sonnet, as I shall hope to show in one or two examples by-and-by.

To rondels and other "moulds," so to speak, for English verse, we are not accustomed. I am afraid, if I were to try these, I should not be simple enough for a translator. The charm of a rondel is its artificial grace, delighting the eye and ear. The charm of a translation in verse is that the verse should neither load the sense nor tangle it. So I have not inserted any rondels, the most delicate webs of love-song possible.

We need not hesitate over the story of the "Anthology" as it has come down to us; Mr. Symonds has made it all interesting already, and what matters to us is that we have the poems in their original form. Being fugitive pieces, they will speak for themselves. We don't want to say, "Now all this was a man's diathesis, and here is his heartbeat," but "Here is this man's heartbeat: judge his diathesis."

The first collection that was made of Greek epigrams was Meleager's, just before the Christian era, and his way of collecting them is quite the most charming of all. He gathers the songs into a wreath, as he calls it, giving to each poet a symbolic flower; and though he gives all sorts of flowers, for health, and rest, and pleasuring, he gives no poppy to any one, which we must take to mean that they are none of them dull. This is how he introduces them: I have put the preface into blank verse, to preserve the quantities for any one who cares to read it, not because among so many names strange to us we can hope to see all the pretty touches of the poem.

For whom the fruitage of this strain, my muse,
And who among the bards hath made this wreath?
Meleager wove it, and his weaving gives
For keepsake to most noble Diocles.
Here many lilies are of Anyte,
And white lilies of Mœro, many an one,
And Sappho's flowers — so few but roses all —
And daffodils of Melanippides
Heavy with ringing hymns — and thy young branch, Vine of Simonides, and twisted in Nossis, thine iris flower that breathes of myrrh,
And in its tablets are Love's stores of wax.
Herewith, Rhianus' scented marjoram,
And the sweet crocus of Erinna too
Clear as the girl's own skin — and hyacinth,
Alcæus' hyacinth that speaks to bards —
And a dark spray of Samius' laurel-tree,
Fresh ivy-clusters of Leonidas,
And foliage of Mnesalcus' needled pine.
And from the plane-tree song of Pamphilus
He cut a branch, and with the walnut boughs

Of Pancrates he twined it, and white leaves
Of Tymnes' poplar. Nicias' green mint
And sandwort of Euphemus from the shore;
And Damagetus' purple violet,
And the sweet myrtle of Callimachus
Full of sharp honey — with Euphorion's flower.
The lychnis and, therewith, his cyclamen,
The Muses call after the sons of Zeus.

This is Dioscorides'. We must find one epigram of his, at all events: —

And Hegesippus' maddening grape-cluster
He set therein, and Persus' scented flag
And a sweet apple from Diotimus' tree —
Pomegranate flowers of Menecrates,
And the myrrh branches of Nicænetus,
Phaennus' flax plant — Simmias' tall wild pear.
And a few leaves he pulled of Parthenis
Her delicate meadow-parsley, and — gleanings fair
Of the honey-dropping muses — golden ears
From the wheat-harvest of Bacchylides.
And old Anacreon — that sweet strain of his,
An unsown flowerage of his nectar songs:
And the rough white-thorn of Archilochus
He gathered from the pasture — as it were.
Only a few drops from a sea of bloom —
Young shoots of Alexander's olive-grown
And Polycleitus' dark blue corn-flower. There
He set Polystratus the amaracus,
The poets' flower, and from Antipater
A young Phœnician cypress: and therewith
Eared Syrian spikenard which he gathered him
Out of his singing they call Hermes' gift.

That is Hermodorus. There is only one epigram of his in the "Anthology," a beautiful one upon a statue of Athene: —

And Poseidippus too, and Hædulus —
Flowers of the field — and wind-flowers springing glad
In airs Sicilian,

(that is a periphrasis for asclepias perhaps, for these flowers are for the poets of country life) — and the golden bough

Of sacred Plato, shining in its worth.
And he threw in Aratus learned in stars,
Cutting the first spires of his heaven-high pine,
Chæræmon's lofty lotus, mixing it
With flox of Phædimus and chamomile —
The crinkled oxeye — of Antagoras,
And fresh green thyme of Theodoridas —
The wine-cup's charm — and Phanieus' bean-flowers too,
With many shoots fresh sprung of other bards,
Adding thereto white early violets
Of his own muse. But to my friends I give Thanks. And this gracious coronal of song
Be for all such as love these holy things.

There it is with its envoi. Nothing about order except the order of taste, as if he were really plaiting a garland — just the praise of a book of pleasant verses. Now, to make any portion of the "Anthology" come to us anything like what Meleager's collection was, we want to make a wreath of songs too — to get a taste of a great many writers at their best. Only we must plait our flowers with this difference — that Meleager's own early violets take the place of a great many of the poets' flowers whom he quoted.

Mr. Wright's little book "The Golden Treasury of Greek Poetry," published in 1867 in the Clarendon Press Series, gives a taste of a great many very good, nay, perhaps best, things, all through Greek literature, and his specimens from the "Anthology" are as good as the rest. The book is handy and available; and he has tied up the epigrams in groups which give some sort of order, and allow a sufficient variety. It were pity to do again what he has done so well, especially as by choosing his selection nearly all references and Greek letters can be avoided; so I shall take it for basis, and try and be clear and simple in my renderings and as interesting as I can. I shall want to add some few epigrams, nearly all of them Meleager's, and shall do so from time to time at the end of that group of Mr. Wright's to which they severally appertain.

We need not trouble ourselves about all the very classical epitaphs which form his first group. They have not the personal interest of those which come later in the fourth section, being for the most part rhetorical exercises — models of brevity and fulness in the Greek, but thankless in English verse, and indeed in print altogether. The longest of them, for instance, which has its locus classicus in Demosthenes' "De Coronâ" has been done scores of times and never yet made thrilling. It is no doubt rather out of compliment and custom that Mr. Wright has included it. Scholars look for it everywhere, and I hope they will not be disappointed to forego their favorite here; it is quite too involved for translation, and has in itself none of the special charm of the Greek epigram — terseness with limpidity.

Here are his first two, epitaphs of Simonides, who lived a good five hundred years before Christ, "On them that fell with Leonidas: " —

For their dear country these her quenchless glory
Won, for themselves the dusky shroud of death.
By that same death they live, whose echoing story
Rings from the halls Hades inhabiteth.

Stranger! tell Lacedæmon — here we lie!
Hers was the word and ours the will to die.

And here is a fine traditionary epitaph for Achilles: —

This mound, the Achæans reared, — Achilles' tomb —
For terror to the Trojans yet to be,
Leans shoreward that his mighty spirit whom Sea Thetis bore may hear its dirge of the sea.

I should like to add this noble and characteristic one of Dioscorides. (I promised one of his for the sake of Meleager's wreath). But I am afraid I must give a reference here to the "Palatine Anthology" (viii. 434).

The mother sent eight sons against the foe —
Eight sons beneath one pillar buried she,
Nor wept for grief, nor spake aught else but — "Oh,
These children, Sparta, did I bear for thee!

And now, commencing Mr. Wright's second section, we come straight upon Meleager's "Spring Song," which might be — I had almost written must be — Spenser's work in Greek, and which is one of the loveliest as it is one of the longest pieces in the "Anthology." As there is evidently the Alexandrian touch about it, and the work is almost of the Christian era, I shall expand it a little more, in English, than I should venture to do were it the work of an earlier period: —

Now wintry winds are banished from the sky,
Gay laughs the blushing face of flowery spring:
Now lays the land her duskier raiment by
And dons her grass-green vest, for signal why
Young plants may choose themselves apparelling.

Now, drinking tender dews of generous morn,
The meadows break into their summer smile,
The rose unfolds her leaves: and glad, the while,
In far-off hills the shepherd winds his horn,
And his white brede the goatherd's heart beguile.

Now sail the sailors over billowing seas
While careless zephyr fills the canvas fair,
And singing crowds with dances debonnair
Praise Dionysus for the grapes' increase —
The berried ivy twisted in their hair.

Forth from the rotting hide now bees are come —
Deft craftsmen working well and warily —
And in the hive they settle, while they ply
Fresh-flowing waxen store, with busy hum,
And small pierced cells for their sweet industry.

Now shrilleth clear each several bird his note.
The halcyon charms the wave that knows no gale,
About our eves the swallow tells her tale,
Along the river banks the swan, afloat,
And down the woodland glades the nightingale.

Now tendrils curl and earth bursts forth anew —
Now shepherd's pipe and fleecy flocks are gay —
Now sailors sail, and Bacchus gets his due —
Now wild birds chirp and bees their toil pursue — Sing, poet, thou — and sing thy best for May.

"Ainsi," says Sainte-Beuve, "le printemps de Méléagre n'était pas un idéal dans lequel, comme dans presque tous nos avril et nos mai, l'imagination, éveillée par le renouveau, assemble divers traits épars, les arrange plus ou moins, et les achève . . . l'heureux poète n'a fait que copier la nature."

Next we go back more than two hundred years to Leonidas. He is terser, but loves the spring quite as well (I must try and be terser too): —

'Tis time to sail — the swallow's note is heard,
Who chattering down the soft west wind is come,
The fields are all aflower, the waves are dumb
Which erst the winnowing blast of winter stirred.

Loose cable, friend, and bid your anchor rise,
Crowd all your canvas at Priapus' hest,
Who tells you from your harbors — "Now 'twere best, Sailor, to sail upon your merchandise."

The last of this group is Agathias' vintage song. He lived a good seven hundred years after Leonidas, and is a pagan only by imitation; but he did delicious work, with a certain lilt about it that makes translation irresistible, and here he is at his very best — for his "Laurel-leaves," a series of love-songs, are lost long ago: —

Tread we thine infinite treasure, Iacchus, the vintage sweet!
Weave we the Bacchic measure with paces of wildering feet.
Down flows the vast clear stream, and the ivy-wood bowls, as they float
O'er the surging nectar, seem each like a fairy boat.
Close we stand as we drink and pledge in the glowing wine —
No warm naiad, I think, need kiss in your cup or mine!

See, o'er the wine-press bending, the maiden Roseflower beams — Splendor of loveliness sending that dazzles the flood with its gleams.

Captive the hearts of us all! straightway no man that is here
But is bound to Bacchus in thrall — to Paphia in bondage dear.
Cruel — for while at our feet he revels in bountiful rain, Longing most fleet — most sweet — is all she gives for our pain.

That is all, I am sorry to say, that Mr. Wright has quoted in his idyllic section. As I am going to cut out a few from his fifth part, I shall here insert a lovely one of Meleager's to a locust — not half well known enough (vii. 195): —

Charmer of longing — counsellor of sleep!
— The cornfields' chorister
Whose wings to music whirr —
Come, mimic lute, my soul in songs to steep,
Brush tiny foot and wing
In tender musicking:
Come! out of sleepless care my heart uplift,
Locust, and set love free
With your shrill minstrelsy.
And, in the morning, I will give for gift
A fresh green leek to you
And kissing drops of dew.

I will not apologize for the metre; no Englishman could write anything but a lyric to a locust.

The third part brings us to the love-songs, of which I cannot spare any, and I must add one or two. Meleager is at the head of the poets here, of course, but I cannot bring myself to give his sweethearts their proper names, Heliodora and Zenophile, and I prefer putting a simple English equivalent or none at all to selecting other names, which must always be a matter of the translator's individual taste, and so rather an impertinence, although no less a name than Shelley's * sanctions it.

White flowers the violet now, Narcissus flowers
And drinks the dewy showers:
The lily plants arow
On hillsides grow.
But Spring's best crown, her flower of flowers, is here,
My lady-love, my dear:
Most winsome bud that blows
And sweetest rose.
Proud fields, in vain ye laugh with blooms bedight!
For lo, my lady's light
Is better than the breath
Of all your wreath.

I shall be accused of recherche here; but it is a case where it is much better to be fanciful than to be bald, and whoever cares to substitute "Zenophile" for "my lady-love" will see how it puts the little poem out, though it has no effect upon the metre.

The next is Elizabethan too, if I may classify my poets so, but full of epithets almost impossible in English: —

I cry you Love — at earliest break of day
But now, even now, his wings the wanderer spread
And passed away,
Leaving his empty bed.
Ho! ye that meet the boy — for such is he,
Full of sweet tears and wit; a fickle sprite
Laughing and free,
With wings and quiver bright!
Yet know I not on whom to father Love —
For earth denies the wanton child his name,
And air above,
And the broad sea the same.
With each and all he lives at feud. Beware
Lest, while I speak, he cast
A dainty snare
Over your hearts at last.
But see! his hiding-place, his very self,
Close to my hand, behold, the archer lies,
A laughing elf
Within my lady's eyes.

The next is of the same period, and by Philodemus, who came also from Gadara, which we know of as the city of swine, but which was a city of poets then.

Gadara first received me — that famous city my mother, says Meleager in one of his epitaphs for himself, which we cannot find room for in full. In this song of Philodemus is a note of warning which we do not get in Meleager: —

Not yet the season of bare stems for flowers,
Nor yet wine-hued the grape cluster, which now Puts forth its maiden charms — but these the hours
When little Loves prepare them each his bow,
Lusidice, and smoke from embers lours —
Poor lovers I and thou!
Ere the dart speed a hasty flight be ours,
For soon the world will be ablaze, I trow.

Meleager would not have confused the picture so; but what is real and valuable in that song is the sigh in it. Rufinus has the same sigh, but his touch is more pathetic still; he does not compliment his lady as Ben Jonson did when he "sent her a late rosy wreath:" —

Oh! royal rose — of many a flower and sweet,
Mine hands have woven you a garland meet,
And, having woven, lay it at your feet.

Here lilies, here the rosebud, and here too
The windflower with her petals drenched in dew,
And daffodillies cool, and violets blue.

* Though his "kissing Helena" owes the name doubtless to the "Faustus" of Marlowe: —
"Her lips suck forth my soul: see, where it flies."

Let this fair garland put your pride to death!
To you that bloom to-day, each blossom saith
"Your beauty, like my beauty, withereth."

Meleager's glad song comes in again, with no sadness in its tone: —

Now will I weave white violets, daffodils
With myrtle spray,
And lily bells that trembling laughter fills,
And the sweet crocus gay.
With these blue hyacinth, and the lover's rose
That she may wear —
My sun-maiden — each scented flower that blows
Upon her scented hair.

I think we must give Agathias the palm among these. His vintage song, which I quoted already, would be fit pendant for the fresco of the grape-treading in the Campo Santo at Pisa; but here he is quite as fine when he would turn his back upon the wine-cup. He is Ben Jonson. We have all heard some of this poem before: —

No wine for me! — Nay, and it be your will,
Kiss first the goblet — I will drink my fill:
How may I, when thy lips have touched it, dare
Be sober still, and that sweet draught forswear?
For the cup steers the kiss from thee to me,
And tells me all the bliss it won of thee.

I venture to transpose the order of the next two songs, to give Meleager's toast to Heliodora close upon this one (Herrick, after Jonson). —

Fill to the sun-maiden! and then
Upon the draught her name
Yet once again, "The sun-maiden,"
And be the toast the same.
Ah! yet once more: and give to me
That garland drenched in myrrh:
Her wreath of yesterday shall be Memorial of her.

In the "Palatine Anthology" there is a parenthesis with which the song ends, too pretty for me to refrain from giving it, as Mr. Wright has done: —

(And lo! the rose, the lover's love, — Because it sees her lying Another's burning heart above —
The very rose is crying!)

Fortunately the next three are short, for I shall have some longer ones to add: —

Farewell, Phaësphorus — dawn's herald ray,
But soon return as Hesperus, I pray,
And, darkling, bring back her you take away.

Here is a traditionary one; the fancy is as old and as young as love, and Tennyson's "Miller's Daughter" is perhaps the amber in which it lives best. Both these epigrams are his we will say, for he has "Sweet Hesper Phosphor" in his "In Memoriam:" —

It's oh! to be a wild wind — when my lady's in the sun —
She'd just unbind her neckerchief, and take me breathing in.
It's oh! to be a red rose — just a faintly blushing one —
So she'd pull me with her hand and to her snowy breast I'd win.

The last is Plato's divine one to Aster. Mr. Farrar has done it into an hexameter and pentameter neatly, if not poetically, and I give my rendering with diffidence: —

Thou gazest on the stars — a star to me
That art — but oh! that I the heavens might be
And with a thousand eyes still gaze on thee!

I must add to these love-songs two or three in a different strain. Here is a very bright one of Rufinus (v. 15): —

Ah! where is now Praxiteles? and where the hands of Heraclite
That wrought of old such images, as made the marble breathe delight?
Who now shall forge the ambrosial hair, the burning glance of Milité,
Or teach the carven stone how fair the splendors of her bosom be?
Brave sculptors! would that it were mine to bid you at a lover's nod
For such a beauty raise a shrine, as for the statue of a god!

And of Meleager (v. 57): —

Love, if swimming in thy light ofttimes burnt the soul shall be,
Swiftly will she take her flight: cruel, she is winged like thee!

Here is a very characteristic one (v. 182):

Say to Lycænis, Dorcas, what you're bid.
Your love's proved false: false love can't long be hid.
Tell her so, Dorcas — see! and then again
A second and a third time, Dorcas, plain.
Run, don't delay, but fly! stay — Dorcas — stay!
Don't hurry, Dorcas, till I've said my say.
Add to the former words . . . (that's foolish!) no.
Say nothing then, but this — yes, all. Now go.
Be sure and tell her all. But why send you,
Dorcas — when here I am and coming too?

This is the perfection of fancy — it is one of a series which I wish I could include (v. 152): —

Fly for me, gnat, my swiftest messenger,
And touch my lady's ear,
Whispering this:
"He waits thee, waking, but thou sleepest yet.

Ah! thoughtless, to forget Thy votaries!"
Fly to her, singing gnat, oh fly to her!
Yet softly call her, softly, lest he hear
And wake, who sleeps too near,
And all my gains
Be jealous blows. But an thou fetch her me,
A lion's skin to thee,
Gnat, for thy pains,
And a club will I give, in hand to bear.

Could anything be more delicate than that — the notion of dressing a gnat in the attributes of Herakles after his feat of bringing the love to the lover? That at least has not come down to us along the centuries in every poet's song. It is unique, a little orchid in the Greek garden of flowers. But the next has a truer note of feeling (v. 174): —

Now sleeps my lady, like a gentle flower —
O that I were as sleep without his wing,
Across her eyelids there!
So not even he that on Zeus' eyes hath power
Should share with me the sweet companioning
That I should get of her.

This, of regret (xii. 32): —

Ah now remember! yes, now remember
How this good word in the good days I said:
"Beauty is sweetest — beauty is fleetest,
Not the swiftest bird in air
Is a swifter passenger."
Lo! now to earth your beauty flowers are shed!

That is a chrysanthemum indeed — a golden flower, fit winter gathering in the Greek garden. And this of passion (v. 215): —

I pray thee, Love, for sake of my poor song
To put to sleep this sleepless love of mine!
Yea — for they will not learn — those arrows thine
To smite another, but they do me wrong
Winging their flight forever at only me.
What though thou slay me? I shall leave this line Written, whereof the sound shall echo long:
"Here lies, whose murder was of Love's cruelty."

But of all that the prince of love-poets did there is nothing that equals this. I have not been quite literal here. Scholars will know why I need handle it delicately, and it tells its own tale of longing (xii. 125).

Love brought by night a vision to my bed,
One that still wore the vesture of a child
But eighteen years of age — who sweetly smiled
Till of the lovely form false hopes were bred
And keen embraces wild.
Ah! for the lost desire that haunts me yet,
Till mine eyes fail in sleep that finds no more
That fleeting ghost! Oh lovelorn heart, give o'er — Cease thy vain dreams of beauty's warmth — forget
The face thou longest for!

All through the "Anthology" there is nothing rings truer than that. Again I have begun and ended with Meleager, but this section was his special sphere, his share in the epitaphs being, though noble, comparatively small.

The first of these — the epitaphs of friendship and love — is Plato's for Aster, finely done by Shelley, of which I write the mere English: —

As morning star to man thy light was shed —
As evening star thou shinest for the dead!

And then follows one of the only two Mr. Wright gives of Meleager's: — Tears, lady, though thou lie beneath the earth,

The little Love has left for Death, I shed
Tears, bitter tears, o'er thy lamented head,
Poor tribute of my heart and my heart's dearth.
Heavily, heavily, — my dear — my dead! —
In vain to Acheron I mourn thy worth;
Ah! where's the stem that gave my longing birth?
Now Death hath torn — hath torn it from its bed.
Yea, dust hath stained my floweret at her best;
I pray thee, mother earth, that tenderly
Thou gather her whom all we weep to thee —
And fold her gently, mother, to thy breast.

That is what he wrote for his sun-maiden, as I called her in the toast. The next is by Erinna, who lived more than five hundred years before Meleager, and who died when she was only nineteen, leaving work that promised, the ancients thought, to equal Homer's, but this one which Mr. Wright gives is only doubtfully hers.

Pillars and sirens mine, and mournful urn
That holdest all death's little ashes here,
Bid "hail" to them that greet my sepulchre,
Strangers or citizens, ere they return.
And say, "Her father called this buried maid Baucis by name — her race was Tenian."
That they may know my story while they scan
These signs Erinna's hand — my friend's — portrayed.

There is a fine epitaph for Erinna herself, which will not be out of place here (vii. 13): —

Maiden Erinna, like a minstrel bee,
Culling her flowers fresh with the Muses' breath,
Death snatched to bridal: ah! a prophet she,
Singing so surely, "Thou art jealous, Death."

But to Callimachus must be given the palm in this section. He was chief librarian at Alexandria, and lived shortly before the first Punic War. Μέγα βιβλίον μέγα κακόν, he said, "A big book is a big evil," and of all his eight hundred volumes only six hymns and less than a century of epigrams remain. These have been, many of them, quite beautifully translated, but I think this will be welcome under a new guise: —

Their prattling Crethis full of blameless laughter
Oft seek the Samian maidens, many an one:
All her sweet gossip at the loom is done.
She sleeps, below, the sleep that follows after,
Which never a maiden of them all can shun.

The next one is so evidently by Mrs. Browning, that I may be allowed some of her loose rhymes.

Dead! my firstborn? no! to a better country departed,
Living in happy islands, that know no maid so light-hearted.
There thou goest rejoicing along the Elysian pasture —
Soft the flowers around thee — away from every disaster.
Winter nor chills thee, nor summer burns, nor sickness makes sorry;
Thou nor hungerest more nor thirsteth, and robbed of its glory
Seems to thee now this life of ours, for thou dwellest securely — Innocent, there where the rays of Olympus enhallow thee purely!

This is Meleager's best, so earnest that I have changed the person in order to retain the "intimate" tone. Herrick, our Meleager, did this one too.

Bridal none but death for bridegroom, dear,
Falls to thee to lay thy girlhood by.
Oh! last eve upon our threshold, clear
Rang the lotus-flutes, and merrily
Echoed back the beaten chamber door.
But this morning breaks no music glad — Lamentation loud the flutes outpour,
And the bridal god wails hushed and sad.
Yea, the torch, that lit thee to my bed,
Lights thee that last way among the dead.

The next of Leonidas I need not give; it is very matter-of-fact and not very interesting as a record of daily life. The charm of an epitaph of this description is that it shows how similar was life all those years ago to what it is now. As soon as that epitaph is given as an English verse this charm is to a great extent gone. The next of Callimachus I cannot spare.

Now would to God swift ships had ne'er been made!
Then, Sopolis, we had not mourned thy shade —
Dear son of Diocleides seaward sent!
Now somewhere in deep seas thy corse is tost
Hither and thither — and for whom we lost
We find thy name and empty monument.

We pass on to this quaint one by Paulus Silentiarius, one of the latest writers, which Cowper translated strikingly but quite inadmissibly — for he puts all the lines into the mouth of the corpse, whereas the point of the epigram lies in the interruptions of the traveller.

"My name was" — Well! it helps thee not,
"my land" — 'Tis nought to me!
"My race was brave" — Vile had it been, what matter would it be?
"My life and death had fair renown" — If shame, what could it do?
"Here now I lie" — What's that to me? and what am I to you?

On the next page this anonymous one is fine: —

Now have I found the harbor! Hope, and thou good Hap, farewell!
We meet no more; mock those on earth that after me shall dwell.

And this of Plato for Dion, the tyrant of Syracuse: —

Weeping the lot of the Ilian women — for Hecuba weeping —
This was the weft of the Fates spun on the day they were born.
Ah! but from thee, my Dion, thy sacrifice gratefully keeping,
Wide was the hope that the gods, quenching thine honors, have torn.
Thou, while thy citizens praise thee, in the glades of thy land liest sleeping, Dion, desire of whose love wilders my senses forlorn.

Mr. Johnson's pretty and simple verses for this one of Callimachus deter one from trying it again, but the epitaph (upon Heracleitus) is in itself immortal and will shine through many renderings. It is no mere exercise of verse making, but rings with as true and as restrained a note of sorrow as "Lycidas" or "Thyrsis."

One tells me, friend, that we are parted now.
And I recall how often I and thou,
In closest converse, sank the sun to sleep,
And, so remembering, weep.
Halicarnassian host! somewhere thou must Long, long ago be dust,
Yet live thy nightingales — thine own — for them
Death, that takes all, hath never requiem!

This of Simmias is a little earlier (about 300 B.C.). The rendering "Wind, gentle evergreen," with which we are all familiar, does not seem to me to give at all the tone or the lilt of the verse.

Tenderly, ivy, on Sophocles' grave — right tenderly — twine Garlanding over the mound network of delicate green.
Everywhere flourish the flower of the rose, and the clustering vine
Pour out its branches around, wet with their glistening sheen.
All for the sake of the wisdom and grace it was his to combine, Priest of the gay and profound: sweetest of singers terrene.

We need not linger over the epitaph for Anacreon after that on Sophocles, and I am anxious to make this of Leonidas into a sonnet.

Shepherds that on this mountain ridge abide,
Tending your goats and fleecy flocks alway,
A little favor, but most grateful, pay
Cleitagoras, nor be the boon denied!
For sake of mother earth, and by the bride
Of Hades under earth, let sheep, I pray,
Bleat near me, and the shepherd softly play
From the scarred rock across the pasture wide.

Ah! but, in early spring cull meadowsweet,
Neighbor, and weave a garland for my tomb;
And with ewe's milk be the stone edge bedewed
When the lambs play about their mothers' feet.
So shall you honor well the shades, from whom
Are thanks — and from the dead is gratitude.

I must interpolate one of Meleager's on a hare, which I am afraid Mr. Wright does not think grave enough for the "Golden Treasury" (vii. 207): —

I was a fleet-foot, long-eared hare,
Snatched early from maternal care
On delicate spring flowers to fare.

In gentle Fanny's arms I lay,
Nor ever wished myself away,
Nor fretted for my mother aye.

Full many a dainty she supplied.
I lived on clover at her side,
And then, of too much clover, died.

Close to her couch she laid me dead:
In dreamland to be visited
By spectre tombs beside her bed.

Cowper should have done that instead of the other. The last in the fourth section is this very graceful one which bears no master's name.

Kind earth, take old Amyntychus to thee — Mindful of all his labors — tenderly.
For thee he set the olive's sturdy roots,
Many an one, and gave thee vineyard shoots
For beauty, and made thy valleys thick with corn.
And of his hand were water runnels born
To feed thee serviceable herbs, beside Thine apple-bearing orchards fair and wide.
Wherefore on his grey head, kind earth, lie light,
And make with flowers his spring-tide pastures bright.

Nearly all the epigrams in Mr. Wright's fifth section are from the "Anthology of Planudes," a monk of the fourteenth century who "Bowdlerized" the old collections and added others. Two or three only are from the "Palatine Anthology." This first is by Diotimus, almost a contemporary of Callimachus. It is a noble classic speech for a statue.

Here am I, very Artemis, but thou,
Seeing Zeus' true daughter here in bronze revealed, Gaze on my maiden boldness, and allow
"For her were the whole earth mean hunting-field."

Next is a piece of description by Plato: —

Then came we to a shadowy grove: and lo!
Cythera's son like apples in their glow;
And he had laid his arrowy quiver by,
And his bent bow,
Hanging them from the leafy trees and high.
And there he lay among the roses sleeping
And, sleeping, smiled, while browny bees were keeping Court to his waxen lips for honey's flow
Above where he did lie.

The little one of Parmenio is not interesting in English, but this of Agathias is beautiful (perhaps we ought to call it Mrs. Browning's). It is for a waxen Faun.

"All of its own accord, little faun, does thy flute go on ringing?
Why, with ears to the reed, listenest the livelong day?"
Smiling, he holds his peace: an answer maybe had come winging,
Only he pays no heed, rapt in oblivion away.
Nay, not the wax withholds him; his whole soul, charmed with the singing, Gives back silence for meed, silent rewarding the lay.

This fine description of Niobe and her children is the only one of Meleager's which Mr. Wright gives in this group: —

Daughter of Tantalus! hearken my words — a message to mourn —
Hear from my lips the pitiful tale of thy woe!
Loosen thine hair, poor mother, that bared'st for deity's scorn
Many a boy for Phœbus to mark with his bow,
Now not a son is left thee. Fresh horror! for what do I see?
Out and alas! a slaughter that spares not the maid.

One in the arms of her mother, and one as she clings to her knee,
One on the ground, and one at the breast unafraid;
One faces death with a shudder erect; one bends on the dart;
Last, there is one that looks on the daylight alone.
Niobe, she that erewhile loved boasting, with fear at her heart Stands yet quick — a breathing mother of stone.

But this is the loveliest of the group, full of the care and passion of real grief: —

Pericles, Archias' son! To thee they place — For witness of thy prowess in the chase —
My column, on whose stone the sculptor sets
Thy horse, thy dog, thy spears, thy hunting-nets
Mounted on stakes, and eke the stakes alone —
Ah God! ah God! — for all are only stone!
At twenty years thou sleep'st death's sleep profound,
And undisturbed by beasts that prowl around.

I shall not do the next one of Leonidas about a drunken Anacreon. Here are two pretty ones of Meleager instead about a cup and a picture (v. 171): —

Bright laughs the cup — for "I have kissed," it saith, "Thy lady's laughing mouth." Too happy cup!
Oh! that, her lips to my lips, at a breath
My lady's kiss would drink my spirit up!

And (v. 149): —

Ah! who hath shown my lady unto me,
Her very self, as if she spake?
Who brought to me one of the Graces three
For friendship's sake?
Full surely brings he me a joyful thing,
And for his grace the grace of thanks I bring.

But I must not give Meleager the lion's share again in this group — that is almost the last of his I shall be able to put in. These two of Plato's with which Mr. Wright finishes the section are admirably contrasted in tone, and both quite perfect. This is for a ring: —

See! five oxen graven on a jasper gem!
To the life! and feeding one and all of them.
Stay — will they not run away — the beasties? No, the fold
Of this golden circlet our little herd shall hold.

It is as fanciful as a nursery rhyme. The other is as joyous and stately as Milton.

Silent! shaggy scaur that Dryads keep.
Silent! rills adown the crags that run.
Silent! mingled bleating of the sheep —
Pan himself the piping has begun.
To his tuneful lip the reed sets he,
Lo! the dance awakens at his call.
Let your young feet trip it merrily,
Waternymphs and woodnymphs one and all!

Mr. Wright's last section contains what I might call the epigrams of thought. The first is Palladas' — (I had almost written Shakespeare's). He was a late writer.

All life's a stage and farce. Or learn to play,
Careless, or bear your sorrows as you may.

And the next two are his also.

Naked to earth was I brought — naked to earth I descend.
Why should I labor for nought, seeing how naked the end?

And: —

Breathing the thin breath through our nostrils, we Live, and a little space the sunlight see —
Even all that live — each being an instrument
To which the generous air its life has lent.
If with the hand one quench our draught of breath,
He sends the stark soul shuddering down to death.
We that are nothing on our pride are fed,
Seeing, but for a little air, we are as dead.

The next beautiful one — quite Tennysonian — is attributed to Æsopus in the "Palatine Anthology," though Mr. Wright gives it no master.

"Is there no help from life save only death?
Life that such myriad sorrows harboreth
I dare not break, I cannot bear," — one saith.

"Sweet are stars, sun, and moon, and sea, and earth,
For service and for beauty these had birth,
But all the rest of life is little worth —

"Yea, all the rest is pain and grief," saith he,
"For if it hap some good thing come to me An evil end befalls it speedily."

This of Agathias is most charming in its naïveté. Certainly he is the latest of the epigrammatists. But this complaint of girls for secluded life might have been written very few years ago.

Not such your burden, happy youths, as ours —
Poor women children nurtured daintily —
For ye have comrades, when ill fortune lours,
To hearten you with talk and company;
And ye have games for solace, and may roam
Along the streets and see the painters' shows.
But woe betide us if we stir from home —
And there our thoughts are dull enough, God knows!

The next, by Agathias too, is true nowadays and always.

At this smooth marble table let us sit
And while away the time with dice a bit!
Don't crow, sir, if you win — and then, should I,
Grumble and growl, "It's all that beastly die;"
For in such trifles is man's temper plain,
And the dice test our power to self-restrain.

This one by Poseidippus, some seven hundred years earlier, has been well done by Sir John Beaumont together with its answer, attributed to Metrodorus. I am tempted to do it again though, as it just fits a sonnet.

Show me some path of life! The market-place
Breeds only quarrel and hard bargainings,
Staying at home incessant worry brings,
Of working in the fields one tires apace,
Who goes to sea a constant dread must face,
And, if one travel, fears for precious things
Torment — if one has none, the lacking stings —
So, rich or poor, hard is the traveller's case.

Married, what care! single, what loneliness!
Children bring sorrow — blank the childless life;
Foolish is youth, and old age listless quite.
Here lies the only choice, I must confess —
Not to be born into this world of strife,
Or straight to die, having but just seen the light.

For this next — Ptolemy's, who lived about two centuries and a half on in the Christian era — I shall borrow a turn of rhyme from Robert Browning.

I know that I am mortal and the creature of a day.
But when I see the stars, like sand in orbits turn alway,
As that divinest sight I heed, I spurn the earth and say,
"Now am I even as Zeus, and feed on his ambrosia."

This is more familiar. The author is unknown, but the text is as old as Solomon.

Drink and be merry! for what is the future and what is the morrow?
No man answereth thee. Labor not thou, neither run;
Feast as thou may'st, and do good and distribute: but let not life borrow Any false worth, for "to be," "not to be" — lo! 'tis all one!
Yea, what is life? an thou take it, thy thrall. 'Tis the turn of the scale.
But, an thou lose it, another's is all — but thee nought can avail.

The last but one is a poem of Marcus Argentarius, also late, full of a beautiful hedonism.

The golden stars are quiring in the west,
And in their measure will I dance my best,
But in no dance of man.
High on my head a crown of flowers I raise
And strike my sounding lyre in Phœbus' praise,
For this is life's best plan,
And the whole firmament were wrong
Had it no crown, no song.

This crown, this song,* this "order" of life was what made Greek humanity divine. There is no more concise expression of the intimacy between daily life and ritual than that little verse contains in the heart of it. It is the most Greek but, perhaps Mr. Wright thought, not the most philosophic strain to end with, and he brings us to a full stop with Philodemus' resolutions.

I loved — and you. I played — who hath not been Steeped in such play? If I was mad, I ween
'Twas for a god and for no earthly queen.

HEnce with it all! Then dark my youthful head,
Where now scant locks of whitening hair, instead,
Reminders of a grave old age, are shed.

I gathered roses while the roses blew.
Playtime is past, my play is ended too.
Awake, my heart! and worthier aims pursue.

There is a note of Herrick again in that. We found one of Philodemus' love-songs in the third group, and noticed its sigh of sadness, "Poor lovers I and thou." We saw that he too came from Gadara and was a contemporary of Meleager. It is strange to catch the selfsame notes ringing from the midst of that Syrian culture, which we hear echo our own longings of to-day in the poets of the golden age of Elizabeth.

WILLIAM M. HARDINGE.

A CHINESE IN PHILADELPHIA.*

A CHINESE visitor to the Philadelphia Exhibition has written a book with notes of his journey and a description of the exhibition. He was sent by Mr. Hart, inspector general of Chinese customs, and the book, which is in four volumes, has been printed at the Customs Press at Shanghai, by order of Mr. Hart. The author also visited Japan on his way to America, and spent a few days in England and France on his return to China. The work is a full statement of his thoughts and experiences, and contains a mass of information new to his countrymen. He has not the scholarly and elevated tastes of Kwo Sung-tau, the ambassador to England, or the poetic spirit of Pin Chun, the first in time of the Chinese envoys to Europe. But his mind is open to impressions, and he has an eye for machinery and the products of Western civilization. He is a sincere admirer of the railway and the telegraph. He appreciates the cleanliness of Western habits of living. He enjoys the luxuries of hotel life, and the comfort of a carriage and pair. He was active with his pen, and has drawn a long succession of accurate pictures of foreign objects and foreign life. The book betokens great industry on the part of the author, and his possession of an aptitude for close observation. His spirit toward foreign nations is friendly and unprejudiced. Li Kwei had, before this eight months' journey round the world, been employed in the Ningpo custom-house as a despatch-writer for more than ten years. Here he had become acquainted with foreigners, his superiors in office, and was thus better prepared to understand without prejudice what he saw as a traveller. Besides, he has not forgotten for a moment that the object of his mission was that he might write a book on the exhibition and on the incidents of his travels for the information of his conntrymen. Without sacrificing his independence he writes as a custom-house employé, under foreign control. When Li Hung-chang was asked to contribute a preface he consented. He writes in the tone that might be expected from the most able and influential of the living viceroys of China. He alludes to the intelligence and inventive genius of Western nations. He regards railways and the telegraph, iron-plated ships of war and improved rifles, as means to an end. That end is the increased wealth and power of Western countries. He sees the Western men, not only trying each to surpass the other in these advantages, but applying themselves with pertinacious zeal to the expansion of their commerce. He adds that all this is caused by the spirit of the modern age. To describe Western civilization is to confer a real benefit on China: the more so as China has now sent her high officials as ambassadors to the West, and is educating some of her select youth in foreign countries. China and Western kingdoms are become almost one family. "The five continents and lands where strange languages are used are as familiar to us as our own family door." It is well for the State and people of China to have a careful record of what is to be seen and heard in the West by a scholar from among themselves. While the viceroy talks in this way he has shown neither courage nor energy in stemming the tide of opposition to railways and telegraphs in China. But his feelings are military. He wishes ardently that China may be strong, and should public opinion become a little liberalized by the circulation of such books as this, he will still be able to assist after a few years in starting his countrymen on a new career. If he will dismiss his fear of indignant censors and the loss of court favor, the country will follow his lead more willingly than that of any other man. Li Kwei defends international exhibitions. He says he at first thought the Philadelphia Exhibition a great waste of money. By saying this he intentionally places himself at the standpoint of a multitude of his countrymen. But he now knows that it has tended to promote friendly intercourse among nations. Such exhibitions stimulate to invention, extend the knowledge of the productions of the earth, and aid in their equable distribution. So far from being wasteful they are highly beneficial to a country. He tells his readers that he is convinced that the Centenary Exhibition was of very high utility to each of the thirty-seven kingdoms which took part in it. The wide view he has been able to take of foreign ways and inventions has made the author progressive. For example, he strongly advocates female education. When he mentions that women desire to enter Parliament and discuss public affairs, he perhaps feels satirical, but he does not say a word in disparagement of women's claims to education, and their intellectual equality with men. He adopts the principle that female ability is equal to that of the male sex, and urges on his countrymen a return to the education of women, which, he says, has been neglected since the Cheu dynasty. On this subject he writes with the feeling of one who sympathizes with the female sex, and believes in its great capability of progress through education. There are in America three or four millions of female teachers and scholars, and this, he says, is why the country daily grows in prosperity. The nation knows how to use its native talent. Parents in those countries value daughters as much as sons. But, he adds, in China it is different. Daughters are despised by some and drowned by others.

He traces this to the fact that female instruction has fallen out of use. He then appeals to the classics for evidence that girls ought to be educated, and this, he says, would prove the true cure for the evil practice of female infanticide. But, he adds, matters are carried too far, when, as occurred in the fifth month of the year in which he wrote, he saw in the newspapers a statement that a woman had said publicly that in the impending election for president of the United States it was a crying injustice that women could not be nominated for that high post. He records with great pleasure the favorable opinions he heard from foreigners of various countries with regard to the taste and elegance observable in Chinese manufactures. While Japan was struggling at Philadelphia to imitate and rival Western ingenuity on the basis of Western ideas, he rejoices that China was able, without imitating foreign nations, to obtain from impartial judges willing recognition of her fair claims to superiority in many points over all other nations in matters of ingenuity and taste, and the combination of utility with elegance of form. It was agreed that China held the first place at the Centenary Exhibition in silk, tea, silk fabrics, carved ornaments, and in vases of the King-t'ai period. A lower place was assigned to lacquer ware, bronzes and silver, and bamboo ornaments of Chinese make. He details for the information of his countrymen the objections made in America and elsewhere to the imperfect preparation for the market of Chinese silk and tea. He strongly urges on his countrymen to adopt better methods. The favorable judgment pronounced on the productions of Japan and China exhibited at Philadelphia has been repeated at Paris. Observers admire the obvious utility, elegance, and ingenuity of the objects sent by Chinese and Japanese exhibitors. It must, then, be admitted that these races have no mean gifts in the region of art. They have the power to conceive and to execute original and beautiful objects of utility. We must pardon the Chinese who a thousand years ago taught their arts to Japan if they feel some pride in the position that is now cheerfully assigned to them by Western connoisseurs. If they cannot fight so well as Western nations, or originate such magnificent inventions as the railway and telegraph, they have a field of excellence where they need not fear competition. The lacquer ware and bronzes of Japan must be regarded as indirectly the productions of Chinese skill. The Japanese and Chinese arts form together the Chinese school. The author describes several of the charitable institutions of America. To an appreciative account of the large asylum for orphans at Philadelphia he appends what a countryman of his own had done for young criminals. He was magistrate at Yü yau, near Ningpo. He was accustomed to take young thieves and have them taught a trade instead of punishing them. While they were learning he went himself, when he had leisure, and exhorted them to change their habit of stealing and lead a good life. They were, when the handicraft was learned, discharged on the surety of their relatives or their neighbors, or the tradesmen who had instructed them. The consequence was that in that district thefts were soon entirely unknown, and the town and neighborhood became noted for the honesty of the inhabitants. The author tells this story to show from the side of Chinese experience that the proper way to deal with young thieves is to have them taught some craft by which they may earn an honest living. After describing the Philadelphia Mint he discusses the advantage of a mint in China. He shows the inconvenience in the present use of silver by weight as a standard of value in commerce. He urges the arguments used by foreigners in favor of silver coinage. He describes the school at Hartford, where one hundred and forty Chinese youths and boys are under instruction. In the house occupied by them is a chamber set apart for the worship of Confucius, with a tablet having the sage's title inscribed on it. There is also a small apartment for making prostrations to the emperor, whose tablet is also placed there. Each youth costs the government about 120*l.* a year. They went in a body to Philadelphia to see the exhibition, and while there were introduced to the president, who took kindly notice of them all. The education of these youths will extend over ten or fifteen years. After this time they will be available for the consulates which China will by that time have established for Chinese legations, for the customs' service in China, and for interpreting on behalf of mandarins at the open ports. He pays special attention to gun-foundries and arsenals. In these, China officials feel profound interest, being convinced that power lies in artillery. They mistake the cause for the effect, and seem to believe that the Western nations prosper because they have efficient weapons of war. For some years to come travellers from China will therefore continue to describe the latest military and naval inventions in order to gratify the interest felt in them by Chinese viceroys. The author has made an enormous mistake in stating the sum expended in the construction of the Suez Canal. He says that it cost three hundred million pounds sterling. THE OLD BED OF THE OXUS.

THE announcement that the Amou-Darya has returned to its old bed is calculated to puzzle those newspaper readers who have hitherto taken but a languid interest in central Asian affairs. Most rivers have but one bed. The Oxus, however, or "Amou-Darya," as that famous stream is called by the Turcomans and the Russians, has two — one of which disembogues at a point on the southern shore of the Aral Lake, from ninety to a hundred miles due north of Khiva; while the other in former times emptied itself by the Balkan Creek into Krasnovodsk Bay, one of the inlets on the south-eastern coast of the Caspian Sea. The Oxus was turned out of its old bed leading to the Caspian into the new one leading to the Aral Lake by means of a dam erected, within three or four days' march of Khiva, if not at a prehistoric period, at a period of which history has preserved no record. The date, however, of this notable diversion must be fixed at some time after the expulsion of the Tartars from Russia; since the operation is known to have been due to fear of the Russian power and its threatened extension in an easterly direction. In one of Mr. Robert Michell's invaluable translations from the Russian, for the use of the India Office, an interesting account is given of the first reception by the Russians, one hundred and sixty-five years ago, of information as to the double bed of the Amou-Darya, concerning which they seem up to that time to have known nothing. The inhabitants of Astrakhan, Russian as well as Tartar, had long been in the habit of crossing over from Astrakhan to the north-eastern extremity of the Caspian immediately opposite, and of trading there with the Turcomans, when in the year 1713 an eminent Turcoman, Hodja-Nefes by name, accompanied a party of Russian merchants on their return voyage to Astrakhan. There Hodja-Nefes waited upon Prince Michael Simonof. a Persian settled in Russia, whom he informed that he had "matter of great State importance to disclose to the Russian emperor." Prince Simonof sent Nefes to St. Petersburg with a letter to Prince Alexander Bekovitch Cherkasski. Prince Bekovitch, who was an officer in the Imperial Guard and much in favor with the czar, presented Nefes and another Turcoman to Peter the Great, when the secret which Nefes wished to communicate proved to be that "in the country bordering the River Amou gold sand was procured, and that the river, which formerly flowed into the Caspian, and which, from apprehension of the Russians, had been diverted by the Usbegs (Khivans) into the Aral, might, by destroying the dam, be made again to run in its old channel — a work in which the Russians would be assisted by the Turcomans." Hodja Nefes' statements were to some extent confirmed by one Ashur-Bek, Khivan envoy at the Russian court, who asserted positively both that the Oxus at its sources brought down gold, and that the stream had been diverted from its old channel by the Khivans, who, he added, would not interfere with the work of turning its waters into their ancient bed should the Russians determine to perform it.

Peter proposed, in the first place, to construct at the place of the "Red Waters" (Krasnovodsk), where the Oxus had formerly entered the Caspian, a fort capable of accommodating one thousand men; and Ashur-Bek was himself of opinion that Krasnovodsk was the point on which the fort should stand. Soon afterwards this complaisant ambassador left St. Petersburg on his way home. Peter charged him with a mission, or at least gave him credentials of some kind. But he was not the man to place trust in a servant who had shown himself willing to betray his master; and Ashur-Bek, on arriving at Astrakhan, found that he would not be allowed to proceed any further. In vain he addressed letters to the commandant of Astrakhan wishing "good health to the White Czar," and to the commandant himself long life and every comfort. He was kept a prisoner at Astrakhan for upwards of two years. Peter did not care much about reaching Khiva or Khiva and Bokhara alone. But he looked upon these countries as lying on the road to richer lands; and he saw that if the largest river of central Asia could really be turned into the Caspian, India, or the confines of India, might be reached by water. If the news given by the Russian newspapers as to the destruction of the dam near Khiva be true, then direct water communication may ere long be established by way of the Volga, the Caspian, and the Oxus, between St. Petersburg and Afghan Turkestan, between the Ladoga Lake and the slopes of the Hindoo Koosh. Before taking any decisive steps, before even building a fort at Krasnovodsk, Peter resolved to send a reconnoitring expedition along what the Turcomans declared to be the old bed of the river as far as the point where, according to their statements, the dam had been constructed. Prince Alexander Bekovitch Cherkasski, who had presented the Turcoman Hodja-Nefes to the czar, was appointed to the command of the expedition; and early in 1714 Prince Bekovitch was despatched to Khiva, or at least in the direction of the Khivan capital, as if for the purpose of congratulating a new khan who had just ascended the throne.

After an unsuccessful attempt to cross the Caspian, which was full of ice at the time, Prince Bekovitch made a second endeavor with good effect, and, reaching the camping-grounds on the east coast of the Caspian, summoned the chiefs of the Turcoman tribes, and questioned them about the discharge of the River Oxus into the Caspian Sea, and as to the possibility of diverting the stream into its old channel. The Turcomans declared that the course of the Oxus had indeed been turned; and that if a canal of about thirteen miles were dug to a gully known to them, and which was said to be the old bed of the river, the water would once more flow into the Caspian at the "Red Waters," otherwise Krasnovodsk Bay. To obtain confirmation of this statement, Bekovitch sent two Astrakhan nobles, together with Hodja-Nefes, the Turcoman, who knew the country, to the place where the dam was said to turn the waters. They were instructed, after reaching the dam, to return by the old bed of the river to Krasnovodsk Bay, where the former mouth of the Oxus was supposed to be; and to that point of rendezvous Prince Bekovitch sailed with the whole of his force from the spot where he had encountered the Turcoman chiefs on the east coast of the Caspian. From this place — Tiub-Karagan by name — to Khiva there was a road, and along this Hodja-Nefes led the two Russians from Astrakhan. After a fortnight's journey on camels they came to Karagatch, a Khivan boundary settlement, through which lay the great caravan road from Astrakhan to Khiva; and here within two versts (one mile and a third) of the Oxus was an embankment of earth three feet high by seven feet wide extending nearly eleven miles and washed along the whole line by the Oxus, which was at that time flooded — just as it is said to have been the other day when, without the assistance of engineers and by its own natural force, it burst through its ancient dam.

Leaving the great Khiva road on their right, the explorers proceeded across the steppe, and after travelling about sixteen miles came in sight of the gully which the Turcomans assured them was the old bed of the river. They marched three days along this gully to the Ata-Ibrahim settlement, noticing the traces of former settlements and towns on both sides. They also found traces of canals leading from various parts of the gully to former fields and dwelling-places, which confirmed them in the opinion that the river had actually flowed there in bygone days. Hodja-Nefes assured the two Russians from Astrakhan that the gully which they had followed from Ata-Ibrahim continued all the way to the Caspian Sea; but he absolutely refused to conduct them any further, fearing, he said, an attack from Khivan or other robbers. With this information the party joined Prince Bekovitch at the "Red Waters." But the exploration, though fully satisfactory so far as it went, had been by no means complete; and the prince despatched another Russian of Astrakhan with a party of Turcomans to examine the gully from the Caspian as far as Ata-Ibrahim. The Turcomans did not conduct the Russians so far as that place. But they went a considerable distance towards it, and far enough to convince the Russian and Prince Bekovitch, who received the Russian's report, that the gully on the Caspian side and the gully on the Ata-Ibrahim side joined so as to form one continuous channel. Prince Bekovitch considered that the ancient bed of the Oxus had now been discovered, and felt sure that the river had formerly emptied itself, by Balkan Creek, into Krasnovodsk Bay. He reported the result of his exploration to the czar, and forwarded to him maps drawn up by himself of the east coast of the Caspian.

Peter, on receiving the prince's report and maps, ordered that the latter should be verified, and commissioned a naval officer to undertake the work. Prince Bekovitch Cherkasski was at the same time summoned to Libau, in the Baltic provinces, where Peter formally commissioned him to take the command of a military expedition, which was to proceed along the ancient bed of the Oxus to Khiva. The expeditionary force was to consist of six thousand men — infantry and cavalry — of whom one thousand were to guard the fort which it had been resolved to build at the former mouth of the Oxus, in Krasnovodsk Bay. A second fort was to be constructed at Karagatch, either close to the embankment or at any other point suitable for the diversion of the stream into its old channel; and a detachment was to march from Krasnovodsk along the old bed of the Oxus up to the actual river, where it was to leave a force in the newly-raised fort, and then march to Khiva along the river bank, "carefully studying the current of the Oxus, and the dams, so as to form a judgment as to the practicability of damming the course of the stream then flowing into the Aral Lake, and the amount of labor that would be required for performing the work." Khiva was to be reached by two separate columns, of which the principal one, five thousand strong, was to march from Gurief, on the north coast of the Caspian, close to the mouth of the Ural River, as far as Karagatch, where it was to halt and construct the fort already spoken of; while the second and lesser column, one thousand strong, marching from Krasnovodsk along the old bed of the river, was to man the fort, and afterwards follow the chief column to Khiva. The expedition as a whole was to call itself the escort of a caravan, and some thirty merchants, with their attendants, were really to accompany it. Five thousand troops formed rather a large escort for a caravan consisting of thirty merchants and one hundred and sixty-five attendants; but the leader of the force professed to have none but commercial and diplomatic objects in view.

As so often happens with combined expeditions, one portion of the expeditionary force never reached its destination. The Krasnovodsk column does not seem to have started, so difficult was it found to procure the requisite number of camels. Thus the project of reconnoitring the old bed of the Oxus along its entire length from Krasnovodsk to Karagatch, at four days' march from Khiva, was not carried out. After some very rapid marching, executed under trying circumstances, during two months of the hottest period of the year, Prince Bekovitch arrived at Karagatch, and would no doubt, in accordance with his instructions, have built a fort near the Oxus embankment had he not suddenly been attacked by the Khivans; and, although the Khivan forces were on this occasion easily repulsed, Bekovitch's expedition is known to have ended in the destruction of the entire force. Meanwhile nothing had been done towards diverting the course of the Oxus; and, although Peter gave signs of an intention to send out a second expedition, no further attempt was made towards turning the river or even towards exploring the ancient channel along its entire length from Krasnovodsk Bay to Karagatch, until the expedition of Perofski in 1837. This expedition, which, though not attended with such disastrous results, was in one sense far less successful than that of Prince Bekovitch (since it was stopped by the snow and by the loss of nearly the whole of the camels before it had marched a quarter of the distance to Khiva), had originally been announced as a scientific expedition undertaken "for the purpose of exploring the shores of the Aral Lake and the ancient bed of the Oxus." But Perofski did not go near the ancient bed of the Oxus; and, though during General Kaufmann's time expeditions for visiting the ancient bed of the Oxus and determining the practicability of restoring the river to its former course have frequently been reported, these have usually been regarded as expeditions directed against the Turcomans; and it is tolerably certain that more than one of these so-called scientific expeditions has approached Merv. It sometimes happens, however, that the victims of deception end by deceiving themselves; and if the news now published by the Russian newspapers as to the destruction of the Oxus embankment and the return of the river to its old bed be true, it must be concluded that the detachments alleged on so many occasions to have been sent out with the view of determining the question of the old bed of the river were really despatched with that view. They may have wished at the same time to operate against the Tekke Turcomans. But the seizure and annexation of Merv would be as nothing compared with the conquest or creation of a new waterway from the Caspian to Khiva and the various countries washed by the upper Oxus in the region to the north of Afghanistan and of Cashmere. It does not of course follow, even if the river had been brought back to its old course, from Karagatch all the way to Krasnovodsk Bay, that the stream would be navigable from the Caspian upwards. Apart, however, from the question of navigation, the conversion of the Oxus into its ancient channel would bring water into a steppe of

THE annals of literature, although abounding with the productions of countless authors representing all ages and nearly all nations, have hitherto been unable to record the existence of a work emanating from the brain, and transmitted by the pen, of an Eskimo. That deficiency has now been supplied. The work before us is the plain, unvarnished history of the life and adventures of one of those wandering nomads — who pass their lives in months of ceaseless sunshine and months of endless darkness — as chronicled by himself.

Those who have interested themselves in the work of polar exploration, and have read the various narratives of the more recent Arctic expedition, published by the commanders on their return, cannot fail to be acquainted with the name of Hans Hendrik.

We first hear of him in 1853, when he was but a lad some seventeen years of age, accompanying Dr. Kane, the eminent American Arctic explorer, in the capacity of hunter and dog-driver to the expedition. Readers of Dr. Kane's admirable description of this voyage will be able, in a manner, to realize the hardships and sufferings endured by our hero during two terribly severe winters. On this occasion he was the sole companion of Moreton when he reported his great discovery of an "open Polar Sea," now proved to have no existence.

The author's account of how he first accepted employment with the Americans, and his parting from home, is thus laconically described: —

I heard that they were looking for a native companion, and that his parents should have payment during his absence. Nobody being willing, I, Hans Hendrik, finally took a liking to join them, and I said I would go. The ship's master tried to get one assistant more, but did not succeed.

I went to inform my mother of my intention and she gainsaid me, and begged me not to join them; but I replied, "If no mischief happen me I shall return, and I shall earn money for thee; but certainly I pity my dear younger brothers who have not grown food-winners as yet, especially the youngest, Nathaniel." At last we started, and when we left my countrymen and relatives, to be sure it was very disheartening. Still, I thought, if I do not perish I shall return. How strange! This was not to be fulfilled.

Hans, it must be remembered, though a dweller within the Arctic circle, had always lived in the southern part of it, and had therefore never experienced any long period of darkness. His terror and astonishment at the excessive darkness and long-continued absence of the sun in their first winter quarters in latitude 79° is related in the following graphic manner: —

Then it really grew winter and dreadfully cold, and the sky speedily darkened. Never had I seen the dark season like this; to be sure it was awful; I thought we should have no daylight any more. I was seized with fright, and fell a-weeping; I never in my life saw such darkness at noon-time. As the darkness continued for three months, I really believed we should have no daylight more. However, finally it dawned, and brightness having set in, I used to go shooting hares.

That our hero was a keen and successful sportsman is fully exemplified, not only by his own words — and he certainly regards his hunting excursions as the most important duties connected with an Arctic expedition — but also by the statements of the different commanders with whom he served, who testify to his skill and energy, and aver that the lives of many of his scurvy-stricken comrades were undoubtedly saved by his promptitude in procuring game.

Instead of returning to the southward with Dr. Kane, Hans elected to remain and take his chance with a more northerly tribe, called by Sir John Ross the Arctic Highlanders, with whom he lived for several years. He thus describes his attachment to them: —

At length I wholly attached myself to them, and followed them when they removed to the south. I got the man of highest standing among them as my foster father, and when I had dwelled several winters with them, I began to think of taking a wife, although an unchristened one. First, I went a-wooing to a girl of good morals, but I gave her up, as her father said: "Take my sister." The latter was a widow and ill-reputed. Afterwards I got a sweetheart whom I resolved never to part with, but to keep as my wife in the country of the Christians. Since then she has been baptized and partaken of the Lord's Supper.

We next read of the author being engaged in 1860, in the same capacity as before, by Dr. Hayes, who had served as a subordinate in Dr. Kane's expedition, and who found our hero living with his newly adopted friends at Cape York. On this occasion he was permitted to take his wife and child with him.

This expedition wintered some little distance to the southward of the position where Dr. Kane had established his winter quarters. He does not appear to have been a great favorite with the men, partly because he was supposed to have caused the desertion, and consequent death, of another Eskimo, of whom he was jealous; and partly because he was suspected of having been the immediate cause, through a want of attention, of the death of Mr. Sontag, the astronomer, who was frozen while away on a sledging journey with Hans. His account of the latter adventure is interesting and pathetically related; but we are bound to admit that, by his own showing, he does not appear to have made strenuous exertions to save his comrade's life. It is, however, but charitable to suppose that it is simply his inability as a writer, or perhaps his modesty as a man, that makes him appear indifferent to his companion's sufferings. His conduct on this occasion affords a striking contrast to the noble devotion of two young officers belonging to Sir George Nares' expedition, who were placed in almost identical circumstances, but who succeeded in bringing their poor frozen comrade alive to his ship. In spite of his apparent apathy on this occasion, he seems to possess a heart overflowing with the milk of human kindness: the death of his mother-in-law, he tells us, was a "hard blow" to him; while his description of those among whom he had elected to live is such as to make us wish that many in our own more civilized country could be alluded to in the same terms; for he says that "they are never false, but always loving towards each other."

When Captain Hall sailed on his memorable voyage in 1871 Hans was again induced to try his fortunes with the Americans, more especially as his old shipmate Moreton was on board the "Polaris." The account that he gives us as to how he shipped and the amount of wages he was to receive is most amusing, and is certainly very different from the compact we should have expected to be made between a simple and ignorant man and a shrewd Yankee dealer: —

The boat having landed, the assistant trader said, "The merchant wants thee to join them." A little while after the ship's mate, Mister Tarsta, said, "What pay dost thou want per month?" I answered, "Ten dollars." He said, "It is too little, is it not?" I said "Twenty-five." He again, "It is too little." At last, as I did not demand any more, he asked, "Will fifty be sufficient?" I replied, "Yes, that will do." He added, "Art thou willing to perform sailor's work on board, or not?" I agreed so to do, with the exception of going aloft. When I had spoken thus, he was satisfied, and said that we were to start the next day.

After the death of Captain Hall, which event is alluded to by the author in feeling terms, Hans seems to have been subjected to a good deal of chaff and practical joking at the hands of the crew, which the poor fellow, not understanding or appreciating the white man's notions of fun, took in sober earnest, as the following lines testify: —

Once when the sun had reappeared, I heard that I was to be punished in man-of-war fashion. The sailors informed me, "To-morrow, at nine, thou wilt be tied and brought down to the smithy. Mister Tarsta will come to fetch thee after nine o'clock. Take breakfast without fear; if thou art afraid thou wilt be treated ill." When I heard this, I pitied my wife and little children. The next morning when we rose, towards breakfast time, my wife, our daughter, and I fell a-weeping. Our little son asked, "Why do ye cry?" From pity we were unable to give an answer. However, they brought us our breakfast, and, though without appetite, we had just begun eating when we heard a knocking at the door. It was opened, and Mister Tarsta, with a smiling look, made his appearance, and accosted us: "Godmorgen, are ye eating?" whereupon, still smiling, he petted our children and left us, and a heavy stone was removed from my heart. I also thanked God, who had shown mercy to a poor little creature.

His horror that corporal punishment should be inflicted on board white men's ships is expressed in a long conversation with Joe, the other Eskimo serving on board the "Polaris," at page fifty-seven. He concludes his conversation by saying that he will never again take service under the Americans, but should the English wish to engage him he would go! We cannot help thinking that Master Hans inserted this little paragraph after he had returned from our recent Arctic expedition, as he was totally unacquainted with the English or their customs before he was engaged by Sir George Nares to serve on board the "Discovery."

Those who are acquainted with the history of this expedition will remember how on a dark October night, with a fierce gale howling around them, nineteen human beings were separated from their ship, and drifted down on an ice floe, during six long dark months, exposed to all the severities of an Arctic winter, through Baffin's Bay to Davis' Straits, a distance, almost incredible to relate, of fifteen hundred miles! The only shelter that they had was that which their own resources could afford. Our author was one of this party, whose salvation, indeed, was mainly owing to his energy and skill as a hunter. It was he who, when hope was almost extinguished, succeeded in shooting some seals and a bear, and was thus instrumental in keeping his companions alive. In the official account, published by the United States government, of the cruise of the "Polaris," our author is spoken of in the following high terms: "The valuable services of Joe and Hans, as interpreters and hunters, often maintained the very lives of the ship's company." On being rescued from their floating prison by an English sealer, Hans was taken to America, in which country he remained for some months, until an opportunity offered of sending him back to Greenland. His astonishment at everything he saw in the United States is amusingly expressed in several pages. Sometimes his surprise was so great as to cause him to moralize, and to exclaim to his companion, Joe, "How wonderful that all these people subsist from the trifle that the soil produces; behold the numberless houses, the charming shores yonder, and this calm sea, how inviting!"

When Sir George Nares sailed in command of our last Arctic expedition he expressly called in at the little Danish settlement of Pröven, on the west coast of Greenland, in order to secure the services of Hans, as hunter and interpreter to one of his ships. In this he was successful, and although he was informed that his wife and family could not accompany him, as in previous expeditions, he was easily induced to try his fortunes once more in the far north. His services during that expedition are thus alluded to by Captain Nares in his official account: "All speak in the highest terms of Hans the Eskimo, who was untiring in his exertions with the dog sledge and in procuring game." The same fits of despondency seem to have attacked him during the winter on board the "Discovery" as he was subject to in the American expeditions. He always seemed to be under the impression that he was regarded with disfavor by a portion of the crew, and that they had resolved to flog him, if not to kill him. It appears to be the fashion among the Eskimo when feeling depressed to run away from their comrades, and seek relief either in solitude or death. The author describes at page thirty-eight the disappearance of a young Eskimo, whose desertion and consequent death was attributed by several of the members of Dr. Hayes' expedition to the ill-treatment he received from Hans himself; and at page ninety he gives an account of his own desertion from the "Discovery" because he thought that some of the crew had conspired against him to flog him. This so preyed upon his mind that he resolved to run away, although he naively remarks, "Our captain likes me; perhaps he will send people in search of me"! After he had gone a short distance from the ship he very wisely halted, knowing, as he said, that he would be searched for. He was soon found and brought on board, but not, however, before he had caused a great deal of anxiety to all on board, who were apprehensive for his safety, exposed as he was for some hours to a temperature many degrees below zero.

Hans, undoubtedly, regarded himself as one of the most important members in each and all of the expeditions with which he was connected. According to his own account, he was invariably consulted as to the route to be adopted, and on other matters, as the following lines will show: "When we were going, our captain said, 'Now show us the road; go ahead of us, and we will follow.'" Again: "The captain used to question me, 'Which way are we to go?' I answered, 'Look here, this will be better.' It was lucky the commander treated me as a comrade"! Speaking of Captain Nares, he says: "The captain of our other ship was beyond all praise; one might think he neither slept nor ate. Sitting in his look-out in the mast, he sometimes took his meat there. On account of his extraordinary skill in ice-navigation, he was our leader." A vein of simplicity pervades the whole book, though strongly marked by egotism, but this is hardly to be wondered at, more especially when we are told that the work was almost entirely written from memory; the few notes that the author possessed being in all probability those taken during the time he was serving with the last English expedition. In making even those few notes the author was doubtless prompted by observing so many men belonging to the crew of the "Discovery" keeping regular written journals. Hans is now, we are told, established as boatswain and laborer at one of the Greenland settlements. For an Eskimo, he must be regarded by his neighbors as a wealthy man, for the interest of the money he received as pay in his four expeditions would certainly yield a very comfortable competence to a resident in Greenland. Let us hope he will live long to enjoy the comforts of a life at home, and we may surely add to the name which he has already earned for himself as a mighty hunter a new reputation as an author.

The credit for the appearance of this little book is entirely due to Dr. Rink, who has so admirably translated and edited it. He is perhaps the only man in the world who could have undertaken the task and executed it so well. A master of the Eskimo language, and perfectly familiar, from a long residence in Greenland, with the manners and customs of the natives, besides possessing a personal knowledge of the author, he was peculiarly fitted for the work which he has so successfully concluded; and which will, we predict, take its place amid the many volumes of Arctic adventure which are now before the public, and be read with equal interest.

Dr. Rink, in an introduction, gives a slight sketch of the early life of the author, and briefly summarizes the narratives of the four expeditions in which Hans Hendrik served, and which had for their object the attainment of a high northern latitude. ALBERT H. MARKHAM.

From The Spectator.

THE VARIOUS CAUSES OF SCEPTICISM.

MR. GLADSTONE, in his remarkable article in the Contemporary Review on "The Sixteenth Century Arraigned Before the Nineteenth," and Mr. Baldwin Brown, in his not less remarkable address to the Congregational Union at Liverpool on Tuesday on the explanation of the great sceptical movements of the day, strike the same note. They hold that the truest explanation of the shortcomings of scepticism in our generation is the fault of the orthodoxy of the previous generation. It was the practical paganism of the Catholic world, say both, which gave rise to the Reformation; and it was the onesidedness of the various Reformers which gave rise to the intellectual revolts of the later heresiarchs. Thus, Mr. Baldwin Brown holds that it was Calvinism which caused Unitarianism. "Take the Unitarian heresy in modern times. He held that the high Calvinistic theology, coming perilously near, as it did, to the presentation of an interior discord in the triune nature, which was harmonized by the atonement, almost inevitably developed a community which could see only the unity, and felt itself called to bear witness to the vital aspect of that truth to the world." And no doubt not only is there very great truth in the general doctrine that the degeneracy of a great faith almost inevitably leads to the sincere proclamation of some half-true but energetic doctrine which is the natural protest against the spurious form in which that faith has been held, — just as idolatrous tendencies in Christianity directly promoted the spread of Mahommedanism, — but those who know the history of Calvinism and Unitarianism know how much there is to be said for Mr. Baldwin Brown's special illustration of it. At the same time, we cannot believe that explicit reaction against a degenerate and implicitly heterodox faith, is the sufficient explanation of all such forms of error. Else what are we to say to the widespread atheism, — or to the still more dangerous, because colder and more indifferent, secularism, — of the present day? Is that to be explained as a legitimate reaction against the hollowness of any previous form of religious faith? It can hardly be true that all falsehood is half-truth, and is the proper cure for some deficiency in the previous profession of the truth. It may well be indeed that while the people of Europe were slowly learning to believe in a righteous and loving God, it was impossible for them to be taught to believe in physical law; and it may also be that now when the people of Europe are being taught the meaning and uses of physical law, it is not very easy for them to retain at the highest point, — the point of truth, — their belief in a righteous and loving God. Nobody can say that in dealing with "such creatures as we are, in such a world as the present," it is easy to give us a firm grasp of any great class of truths whatever, without loosening our grasp on some other class of truths, perhaps nobler and more vital, though it may be also, for that very reason, a class of truths less difficult to recover. Still, this is a very different thing from saying that every form of explicit error is due to reaction against some still more serious implicit error in the faith of our fathers. Voltaire may have been raised up as a wholesome scourge of selfish superstitions, and yet it does not follow that every one who follows

Voltaire has been driven into the rank of his followers by disgust for such superstitions. So far as we can see, the theory that the spiritual and moral law of action and reaction will account for all dominant errors, is an exaggeration of the function of a valuable, though limited principle. Doubtless, asceticism and monasticism lead to reactions in which the fibre of human character is dangerously relaxed; doubtless, mysticism encourages the growth of rationalism, and rationalism in its turn some kind of regression to idealism and mysticism. Still, these complementary phases of faith are not sufficient, or nearly sufficient, to account for all we see; nor could they be so, unless man were indeed alone in the world, and the Hegelianism which explains all his convictions as partly the growth of, and partly the recoil against, previous convictions, were true. What it leaves out of account is the free, reciprocal action — not necessarily determined by any considerations of this sort, — of God on man, and if we may say so without irreverence, since this is clearly the teaching of Christ, — of man on God. Luther never forgot this most important of all the explanations of the growth or decay of the religious life. "We say to our Lord God," he said, "that if he will have his Church, he must keep it, for we cannot keep it; and if we could, we should be the proudest asses under heaven." And Luther implied, of course, that it might please God to humble the Church, to make it feel his presence less at one time, as well as more at another; to give it, for his good purposes, times of aridity, conventionality, and artificiality, as well as times of rich and flowing faith. And if it be true, as Christ teaches, that man may take the initiative with God, as well as God with man, — that times of trust are times of grace, that knocking leads to opening, — that when man throws himself on God, God pours a new tide of spiritual life into man, then, surely, one of the explanations of a want of faith in the invisible is a previous want of appeal to the invisible, — a self-occupation in thoughts and things which turn us away from the invisible, a life of absorption in the superficial phenomena of existence, a generation of outward interests and outward service. This is an explanation almost opposite to that of the law of action and reaction. That law would suggest that to an age of too much outwardness and coldness, an age of pietism or mysticism would inevitably succeed. Yet such is by no means the universal experience of men. On the contrary, the age in which it was said that "the word of the Lord was precious in those days, — there was no open vision," immediately preceded the age in which the Jews demanded a king, because their faith in that succession of divine judges by which they had been distinguished from the neighboring peoples, had in great measure disappeared. The times distinguished by the apparent silence of heaven frequently lead to periods which are relatively periods of secularism in human history, not to periods of true and deep religious life. And the recent access of atheism seems to be even more due to an apparent dryness of the spiritual life of man (which may be quite as much due to the will of heaven as to the will of man) than to any reaction from former superstitions. As Luther would have said, God has not thought fit to keep his Church as he once kept it. God may have willed that, for a time, it would be better for man to try to the full, what he could and what he could not do, without conscious trust in himself. He may have willed, — as he certainly appears to have willed during many generations even of the life of the people who were specially trained to reveal his mind to the world, — to withhold that stream of spiritual inspiration which is perhaps the only thing corresponding, in the religious life, to what the physicists call "verification" in the world of positive phenomena. We hear on all sides the complaint of the agnostics that it is not their fault if they do not believe in God, — that they will believe at once, if his existence can be verified to them, — that, as Professor Huxley puts it, "no drowning sailor ever clutched a hen-coop more tenaciously" than they would clutch a belief in God which could be verified. If they do not exactly cry aloud, they yet seem to cry under their breath, with the prophet, "Oh, that thou wouldst rend the heavens, that thou wouldst come down, that the mountains might flow down at thy presence!" in other words, that if only something physical might "verify" the divine presence for them, they would be only too happy to accept it. And yet in almost the same breath they declare, — and declare most reasonably, — that nothing physical could prove it, that happen what might, they could only interpret any physical event as a new aspect of nature, that nature is so large and so elastic, that no room is left in it for any thing physical to rank as supernatural. Well, it is obvious that such a state of mind as this is one which could be changed by the direct touch of the divine spirit, and by that only, — by an event of the soul, not an event of the body, — by the power which convinces the conscience, not by any power which only enlarges the experience of the senses.

But it does not follow that because no such event happens, — because the only verification of which the case admits, does not take place, — the agnostic has either, on the one hand, the least right to suppose himself entitled to assume the negative view to be true; or on the other hand, may fairly be regarded by those who do recognize as final evidence the influence of God over their soul, as morally inferior to themselves. Neither of these conclusions is true. The agnostic is not right, for his negative experience, however frequently repeated, cannot outweigh a single clear experience of a positive kind. But none the less, he must not, on account of this negative experience, be treated as morally inferior to one who has verified the existence of a divine will over him and in him; for if it has been, as doubtless it has, for the advantage of mankind that hundreds of generations should have felt the need of high social and moral laws, before ever social and moral laws were established and obeyed, and that hundreds of generations more felt the need of a clear recognition of constant physical laws, before physical laws were discovered and turned to account, why should it not also be for the advantage of man that certain classes, even in the modern times of larger knowledge and higher aims, should be taught to feel acutely the need of a divine light for the true interpretation even of those physical principles of order, which they are so strenuous in asserting and enforcing in their apparent divorce from any spiritual principle? We may say roughly, — a very great thinker indeed did say, — that during the Middle Ages thinking men were chiefly occupied in sounding their own minds, to see how much light the careful exploring of those minds might shed on the external order of things; and that a knowledge of the insufficiency of the study of mind to explain the laws of matter, was the first step to that true study of the laws of matter which followed. And we believe that the eminent agnostics of the present day may be said to be discharging the similar function, of exaggerating indefinitely the influence of material laws in things moral and spiritual, in order eventually to show their well-marked limits; that they are trying (and failing) to prove that material laws are the true keys to the knowledge of mental and moral life, just as the Middle Ages tried and failed to show that moral and spiritual laws were the true keys to the knowledge of material life. And it would be just as foolish to suppose the modern physicists inferior to those who do not fall into their error, only because they are not equally fascinated by their truths as it would have been to denounce the schoolmen as morally inferior to the first heralds of the new science, only for trying to deduce principles of astronomy out of the a-priori and abstract conceptions of the human mind. The truth is, that in every great stage of human progress there is, and must be, an undue appreciation of the step just made. In some sense, it may be said that Providence is the real cause of that undue appreciation. It is, of course, the divine guidance which determines the main lines of direction and intensity for human thought; and if the Creator withdraws himself at times from the vision of men, or of some men, it is no doubt for the benefit of all men that he does so. To speak of those who do not themselves see God as "living without God in the world," is itself atheism. You might as well suppose that before the atmosphere was recognized as having weight and substance, men who did not know the difference between it and a vacuum, lived without the air they breathed. God is not less behind the consciousness of men who have no glimpse of him through their consciousness, then he is within the heart of those who worship him; and the only real rejection of God is the resistance to his word, whether it be felt as his word, or only as a mysterious claim on the human will which it is impossible adequately to define. We hold that, in a sense, God is himself, in all probability, no unfrequent cause of the blindness of men to his presence. He retires behind the veil of sense, when he wishes us to explore the boundaries of sense, and to become fully aware of a life beyond. The physicists in every school are doing this great work for us now. They are explaining, defining, mapping all the currents of physical influence, and from time to time crying out, like Professor Huxley, for "the hen-coop" of which, like shipwrecked sailors, they see no sign; like Professor Tyndall, for the elevating idealism which is conspicuous by its absence in all their investigations; like Professor Clifford, for something to replace the theism of Kingsley and Martineau. To suppose that the men who are doing this great work, — who are mapping for us the quicksands and sunken rocks of physical scepticism, — are necessarily deserted by God, because they do not see him, is to be more truly atheists than any physicist. There is a scepticism which is of God's making, in order that we may see how many of the highest springs of human life are founded in trust, — how everything else fails, even in the highest minds, to produce order, peace, and calm. The physicists of to-day are suffering for us, as well as for themselves. It is their failure to find light, which will show where the light is not, and also where it is. As Mr. Mallock well says, in the best paper he has yet written — that in the Nineteenth Century, on "Faith and Verification," — the pitiful cries of modern physicists, as they raise their hands to what they deem a spiritual vacuum, are about the best auguries we could have that it is not in physical science that man can ever find his salvation.

LICHENS.

LICHENS run through the whole chromatic scale, and show what striking effects nature can produce by an harmonious combination of a few simple lines and hues. Most of them are of a quiet grey tint, but some display the most vivid colors. One species covers trees and rocks with bright yellow, powdery patches; another sprinkles them with a kind of green rust, especially in the neighborhood of large towns. Almost every old wall, castle, and rocky seashore is emblazoned with the brilliant deep yellow rosettes of the common wall parmelia. Olive-green and pale primrose-yellow lichens diversify the surface of moorland boulders and dykes. And what is very remarkable, the higher we ascend the mountain-side, the farther north we penetrate, the brighter becomes the coloring and the more graceful and luxuriant the form of lichens; presenting in this respect a parallel to many flowering plants, such as the birch, whose stem is whiter, and whose leaves are more shining and fragrant in Norway than in this country. One of the loveliest species is the "geographical lichen" (Lecidea geographica), which is the most arctic, antarctic, and alpine plant in the world, occupying the extreme outpost of vegetation in altitude and latitude; and its yellow-green crust becomes brighter, smoother, and more continuous, and its characteristic black dots and lines, like towns, and rivers, and boundaries on a map, become deeper and glossier the nearer we approach the limit of perpetual snow. It is a fit companion of those exquisite alpine flowers that bloom their fairest in the same desolate circumstances, and exhibit a grace and beauty far surpassing those of their favored sisters of the plain. The little cup lichen that holds up its tiny goblets in myriads to catch the dewdrops upon the turfy top of every old wall and bank, assumes in one of its kindred forms that grows at a great height upon the mountains, a larger size, a more elegant shape, and a more tender color. Nothing of the kind can be lovelier than this mountain species, with its soft sulphur-colored cups decked round the edge with waxen heads of the most brilliant scarlet, creeping over the bleak alpine turf, and forming, with the gay flowers of the purple saxifrage and the moss campion, a tiny garden in the wilderness. On the wildest islands of the Antarctic Ocean, where nothing else but lichens grow, some of the finest species abound, whose large polished black shields contrast beautifully with their yellow shrubby stems; and on the tundras, or vast plains that border the polar ocean, the eye is delighted beyond measure with the delicate and intricate branching and the snowy purity of the larger lichens, which form almost the only vegetation. One lichen in New Zealand imitates the finest lace-work; another found on our grey northern moors resembles miniature coral; and on the highest and most exposed ridges of the Scottish mountains one leafy species occurs whose under side is of the most splendid orange color, while its upper surface, constantly wetted by the clouds and mists, is of the most vivid green, varied by the chocolate color of its large, flat, shield-like fructification. Thus, where we should expect the vegetation to partake of the sombre nature of the locality, and to be dwarfed, ill-shapen, and discolored by the unfavorable circumstances, we find the most perfect and luxuriant forms; and just as the lichens in our sheltered woods and valleys flourish best in wild wintry weather, so do their congeners in the exposed altitudes and latitudes of the world, where there is a perpetual winter and storms continually prevail, exhibit their brightest coloring and their most graceful shapes; reading to us thus the most needful lesson of one of the sweet uses of adversity, viz., to perfect that which concerneth us — to complete the ideal which a too easy and pleasant life often fails to realize.

A FRAGMENT.

PEACEFUL our valley, fair and green,
And beautiful her cottages,
Each in its nook, its sheltered hold,
Or underneath its tuft of trees.

Many and beautiful they are;
But there is one that I love best,
A lowly shed in truth it is,
A brother of the rest.

Yet when I sit on rock or hill
Down-looking on the valley fair,
That cottage with its clustering trees
Summons my heart; it settles there.

Others there are whose small domain
Of fertile fields and hedgerows green
Might more seduce a wanderer's mind
To wish that there his home had been.

Such wish be his! I blame him not;
My fancies they perchance are wild,
I love that house because it is
The very mountains' child.

Fields hath it of its own — green fields,
But they are craggy, steep and bare,
Their fence is of the mountain stone,
And moss and lichen flourish there.

And when the storm comes from the north
It lingers near that pastoral spot,
And, piping through the mossy walls,
It seems delighted with its lot.

And let it take its own delight,
And let it range the pastures bare,
Until it reach that nest of trees,—
It may not enter there!

A green unfading grove it is,
Skirted with many a lesser tree —
Hazel and holly, beech and oak,
A bright and flourishing company!

Precious the shelter of those trees!
They screen the cottage that I love,
The sunshine pierces to the roof,
And the tall pine-trees tower above.

DOROTHY WORDSWORTH.

AT NIGHTFALL.

COMING along by the meadows,
Just after the sun went down,
Watching the gathering shadows
Creep over the hillsides brown;

Coming along in the gloaming,
With never a star in the sky,
My thoughts went a-roaming, a-roaming
Through days that are long gone by;

Days when desire said, "To-morrow,
To-morrow, heart, we'll be gay!"
Days ere the heart heard the sorrow
Which echoes through yesterday.

Life was a goblet burnished,
That with love for wine was filled;
The cup is bruised and tarnished,
And the precious wine is spilled.

But to the traveller weary,
Just coming in sight of home,
What does it matter how dreary
The way whereby he has come?

Coming along by the meadows,
And watching the fading day,
Duskier than night's dusky shadows
Fell shadows of yesterday.

In the northern sunset's glimmer,
The Great Bear opened his eyes;
Low in the east a shimmer
Showed where the full moon would rise.

Lights in a window were gleaming,
And some one stood at a gate,
Said, "Why do you stand there dreaming?
And why are you home so late?"

Yesterday's shadow and sorrow
That moment all vanished away!
Here were to-day and to-morrow —
What matter for yesterday?

Good Words.

PRAYER.

PRAYER is balsam, comfort, peace,
The loss of self in Deity;
The harmony of human souls
With heaven's eternal melody!

Prayer is freedom, loss of all
That binds the soul to this poor clod;
So that no words, nor forms, nor thoughts
Stand darkening between her and God!

Mysterious, and yet so bright,
It bears the soul to heaven away;
'Tis like a slumbering at the source,
And yet a waking into day.

From The Quarterly Review.

JOHN DRYDEN.*

THE life of Dryden has yet to be written; but we are at last in the possession of ample materials for the task. The editors of his works have labored with patient research and honest enthusiasm, under no ordinary difficulties; but these difficulties have been crowned with no ordinary success, and Mr. Christie closes a long line of able and industrious students who have cheerfully submitted to much drudgery, and who consequently deserve well of the republic of letters. Ninety-eight years ago Johnson pronounced that the life of Dryden was likely to remain a blank, that nothing could be known beyond what casual mention and uncertain tradition have supplied. We are now enabled to pronounce with confidence that we know as much of Dryden, of his domestic life, of his personal habits, of his peculiarities, of his character, of his relations with his contemporaries, as we know of any of those accomplished men who lounged away their evenings at Button's, or listened to Swift reading "Gulliver's Travels" on Pope's lawn at Twickenham. Indeed we shrewdly suspect that were it possible for Congreve and Addison to converse with a well-informed student of Dryden in the present day, he could communicate many interesting details about their patron which would be altogether new to them; he could explain many inconsistencies in the great poet's character and conduct, which probably excited a good deal of unsatisfactory speculation at Wills' and at the Grecian, and he could show with excusable complacency how careful study will sometimes enable mankind to have a truer insight not into the works only, but into the personal character of a great man nearly two centuries after his death, than was apparently attained by any of those with whom he lived in daily and familiar intercourse.

And here begins our quarrel with the biographers. We are compelled to confess that though they have been eminently successful in bringing fresh material to light, they have failed in the biographer's principal duty. They have not fused their materials into a consistent whole; they have neither arranged nor interpreted; they have contented themselves with heaping up masses of facts which are simply not chaotic because they are chronological. We shall not, we trust, be guilty of any disrespect to the memory of Malone, whose memoir has always been the great storehouse for the facts of the poet's life, or of any insensibility to the merits of Messrs. Mitford, Bell, Hooper and others, whose discoveries Mr. Christie has at once summed up and supplemented, if we say that the biography of Dryden has been very imperfectly executed, that hitherto we have been furnished rather with the materials of a good biography than with the biography itself. Sir Walter Scott's memoir prefixed to the collected edition of the works is still the best we have, but, like all Scott's miscellaneous writings for the booksellers, its graphic vigor is marred too evidently by haste and off-hand judgments, always sensible, but not always accurate. With so many students of Dryden in the field it ought long ago to have been superseded, but we are bound to say that Mr. Christie's introduction, which represents the last contribution to the biography of Dryden, cannot be pronounced in anyway to have superseded it. As a repository of facts lucidly arranged in chronological order it deserves praise. He has availed himself to the full of the labors of his predecessors; he has added some fresh discoveries of his own, and he has evidently spared no trouble to inform himself from collateral sources of the minutest particulars of the poet's life. His text of the poems is the best we have. For the rest, his work sinks to the level of a school-book. The literary execution is of a decidedly third-rate order;* the style is cramped and jejune, the reflections vapid and commonplace, and when he attempts to comment on the more perplexed passages of his author's not very consistent career, his want of insight and his inability to interpret evidence become lamentably apparent. We should in truth be very sorry to think that it is destined to remain the standard biography of one who was himself a model of facile, various, and masculine composition, the best prose-writer beyond all question among our poets, the best poet beyond all question among our prose-writers.

To Dryden himself we are bound by triple ties of traditional association, of personal interest, and of national gratitude. No other name in the annals of literary biography has represented so completely the English character and the English intellect in the fulness of their strength and in the extremity of their weakness. Sophocles was not more essentially an Athenian, Juvenal and Lucan were not more essentially Romans, than Dryden is essentially an Englishman. Nearly two centuries have passed since his coffin was reverently laid by the hands of his contemporaries in the grave of the father of our poetry: and through all the shifting vicissitudes of opinion and criticism which have perplexed two hundred years of restless literary energy, no one has ever yet grudged his ashes the proud distinction thus claimed for them. His services had indeed been manifold and splendid. He had determined the bent of a great literature at a great crisis. He had banished forever the unpruned luxuriance, the essentially uncritical spirit which had marked the literature of Elizabeth and James, and he had vindicated the substitution of a style, which should proceed on critical principles, which should aim at terseness, sententiousness, and epigram, should learn to restrain itself, should master the mysteries of selection and suppression. He had rescued our poetry from the thraldom of a school which was laboring, with all the resources of immense learning, practised skill, and fine genius, to corrupt taste and pollute style with the vices of Marini and Gongora. He had brought home to us the masterpieces of the Roman classics, and he had taught us how to understand them. He had given us the true canons of classical translation. He had shown us how our language could adapt itself with precision to the various needs of didactic prose, of lyric poetry, of argumentative exposition, of easy narrative, of sonorous declamation. He had exhibited for the first time in all their fulness the power, ductility, and compass of the heroic couplet; and he had demonstrated the possibility of reasoning closely and vigorously in verse, without the elliptical obscurity of Fulke Greville on the one hand, or the painful condensation of Davies on the other. He had rescued English satire from the semi-barbarous diction which had deformed it while passing successively through the hands of Gascoign, Donne, Hall, Marston, Wither, Cleveland, Marvel; and he had raised it to the level of that superb satirical literature which Quinctilian claimed as the peculiar and exclusive growth of Roman genius. He had reconstructed and popularized the poetry of romance. He taught us to think naturally and express forcibly. "Perhaps," observes Johnson, "no nation ever produced a writer that enriched his language with such a variety of models." What was said of Rome adorned by Augustus may be applied by an easy metaphor to English poetry embellished by Dryden, "Lateritiam invenit, marmoream reliquit, he found it brick and he left it marble." His influence on our literature in almost all its branches has indeed been prodigious. He is one of those figures which are constantly before us; and, if his writings in their entirety are not as familiar to us as they were to our forefathers, they are to be traced in ever-recurring allusion and quotation: they have insensibly leavened much of our verse, more of our prose, and almost all our earlier criticism. With the exception of Shakespeare's, there is probably no name so familiar to the student of our literature. His genius has been consecrated by the praises of men who now share his own literary immortality; his writings have been discussed in works

which have themselves taken a place among English classics. It would in truth be difficult to name a single writer of distinction between the latter half of the seventeenth century and the commencement of the present, who has not in some form recorded his obligations to him. Wycherly addressed him in a copy of verses, which embody probably the only sincere compliment he ever paid to a fellow-creature. Congreve's prose panegyric glows with a warmth of affectionate eulogy, to which that cold and haughty temper was ordinarily a stranger. Garth, in his admirable preface to Ovid's "Metamorphoses," speaks of him as one of the greatest poets who ever trod on earth, and has defined with a happy precision his various and versatile powers. Addison and Pope forgot their mutual jealousies to unite in loyal homage to the genius of their common master; * and Gray in those noble verses in which he ranks him second only to Shakespeare and Milton, was true to the traditions of a long line of illustrious disciples. Churchill, who might with care perhaps have rivalled him as a satirist, dedicates to his memory a fine apostrophe, which seems to kindle with the genius it celebrates. Johnson has discussed his merits in a model of chastened and lucid criticism, and Goldsmith has laid a graceful tribute at his shrine. Nor were Burke and Gibbon silent. Charles Fox not only pronounced him to be the greatest name in our literature, but has lavished praises almost grotesque in their excess of idolatrous enthusiasm. If Wordsworth with his habitual bigotry, and Landor with his habitual intemperance, could descend to diatribes derogatory only to themselves, Byron and Scott, accepting the legacy which the dying poet had a hundred years before so touchingly bequeathed to Congreve, "shaded the laurels which had descended to them"—and vindicated with jealous fondness the fame of their great predecessor.

In the remarkable reaction which set in against the artificial poetry of the eighteenth century at the beginning of the present, Hallam and Macaulay, with all the energy of their various and dissimilar eloquence, claimed an exemption for the great founder of the school then tottering to its fall. They commented, it is true, in severe terms on the weakness of the man who could prostitute his majestic powers to pander to the tastes of a debauched and profligate court, but they did ample justice to the splendid genius which had produced the "Essay on Dramatic Poesy," "Absalom and Achitophel," "Don Sebastian," the translation of Virgil, "Alexander's Feast," and the "Fables." And here we cannot but think it due to the memory of Dryden to protest against the unmeasured abuse with which his private character has been assailed. He has been alluded to in terms which would require some qualification if applied to Oates or Rochester. Burnet, smarting from the severe castigation he had received in "The Hind and Panther," described him as a monster of immodesty and impurity. Macaulay paints him in the blackest colors; meanness, scurrility, a depraved and polluted imagination, an abject spirit, a shameful career of mendicancy and adulation, are laid to his account. He has been called a backbiter, a liar, a hypocrite; and charges of a still more abominable kind have been advanced and repeated against him. Some of these charges have been grossly exaggerated; for some of them there is absolutely no foundation. Those who knew him well, for instance, have distinctly asserted that his private life was singularly pure, and yet Mr. Christie continues to accuse him, on the paltry evidence of an obscure libeller, of the grossest libertinism. Now, unless we are much mistaken, Dryden was in private life a very respectable, a very amiable, a very lovable, and a very generous man. He was always going out of his way to do a kindness to his fellow-laborers in literature. He welcomed Wycherly with open arms, though he knew that Wycherly's success must be, to some extent, based on his own depression. Dennis, Shere, Moyle, Motteaux, and Walsh, were constantly assisted by him. By his patronage Addison, then a diffident lad at Oxford, and Congreve, a timid aspirant for popular favor, came into prominence. When Southerne was smarting under the failure of his comedy, Dryden was near to cheer and condole with him. He helped Prior, and he was but ill rewarded. He did what he could for young Oldham; and when the poor fellow buried in his premature grave abilities which might have done honor to his country, he dedicated a magnificent elegy to his memory. Lee and Garth were among his disciples; and, if he was at first blind or unjust to Otway's fine genius, he afterwards made ample amends. He gave Nell Gwynne a helping hand at the time when she sorely needed it. His letters to Mrs. Thomas still testify not only his willingness to oblige, but the kindliness and courtesy with which he proffered his services. He was, we are told, beloved by his tenants in Northamptonshire for his liberality as a landlord. The few private letters which have been preserved to us amply prove the warmth and purity of his domestic affections. His relations with his wife are said to have been unhappy, but his devotion to his children is touching in the extreme. He was always thinking of them; he is always alluding to them. He sent two of them to the universities when he could but ill afford it; and he seems to have exercised an anxious vigilance over their studies. "If," he writes, referring to his son Charles, who had been ill, "it please God that I must die of overstudy, I cannot spend my life better than in preserving his." In an age of shameless profligacy, his private life was without a stain; for in the charges brought against him by his literary assailants we can detect nothing but those vague and extravagant calumnies which carry their own refutation. We are not prepared either to defend or to extenuate the grave offences against morality and decorum which sully his writings; we are not prepared to defend the wild inconsistency of his conduct and his opinions, but we contend that a poet must be read in the light of the age which nurtured him. Dryden was the noble scapegoat of an ignoble and dissolute generation. He fell on evil days and profligate patrons, with the hard alternative of popularity or starvation.

JOHN DRYDEN, the eldest son of Erasmus Dryden and Mary, daughter of the Rev. Henry Pickering, was born at Aldwinckle, a village near Oundle in Northamptonshire on the ninth of August, 1631. There is a local tradition that he first saw the light in the parsonage-house of Aldwinckle All-Saints, then the residence of his maternal grandfather. The truth of this tradition has been questioned by the biographers, who, on the authority of Malone, have asserted that Mr. Pickering did not become rector till 1647, and that consequently there are no reasonable grounds for supposing that Dryden was born there in 1631. But Mr. Christie, ascertaining that Pickering became rector in 1597, not in 1647, has corroborated the truth of the old tradition, and justified the claims of the little room which is still shown to the reverence of the literary pilgrim. His family, though not noble, was eminently respectable; and though two of his sisters married small tradesmen, and one of his brothers became a tobacconist in London, he could still remind the Lady Elizabeth Howard that on his mother's side he could number titled relations who had enjoyed the friendship of James I., and sat in judgment on his successor. Poets have seldom been distinguished for adhering to the political and religious traditions which they have inherited, and Dryden is no exception to the rule. His father and his mother were not only Puritans themselves, but belonged to families who had made themselves conspicuous for their opposition to the crown and for the zealous consistency with which they had upheld the principles of their sect. His grandfather had been imprisoned for refusing loan-money to Charles I. His uncle, Sir John Dryden, was accused of having turned the chancel of his church at Canons-Ashby into a barn, and Mr. Christie thinks it not improbable that his father was a committee-man of the Commonwealth times. Of his early youth little is known. He had, he tells, read Polybius in English when he was ten years old, "and even then had some dark notions of the prudence with which he conducted his design, — an early instance of his characteristic preference for solid and philosophic literature as distinguished from romantic and imaginative. If an inscription erected by his cousin in Tichmarsh Church is to be believed, he received the rudiments of his education in that village. From Tichmarsh he proceeded to Westminster School, probably about 1642. We have no means of judging why this school was selected; but the choice was a wise one, and young Dryden arrived at a fortunate moment. Three years before, the languid and inefficient Osbolston had been ejected by Laud from the head-mastership; and the school, now in the vigorous hands of Busby, was about to enter on a career which has no parallel in the history of education. During his tenure of office — to employ the phraseology he loved to affect — Westminster sent up to the universities more lads destined afterwards to distinguish themselves in every department of politics, theology, science, and literature, than any other English school could boast of doing in two centuries. Busby was indeed eminently qualified for his responsible post. He was one of those men whom nature had endowed with versatile powers which circumstances had made it impossible for him to display actively, but which expressed themselves in ready and delighted sympathy whenever he recognized their presence in others. At Oxford he had been distinguished not only by his classical and theological attainments, but by his abilities as an orator, as a conversationalist, and as an amateur actor. The skill with which he had sustained a leading character in Cartwright's comedy of "The Royal Slave," on the occasion of Charles I.'s visit to Oxford, was long remembered in the common room at Christ Church. For upwards of half a century he ruled Westminster with a severity which has been pleasantly ridiculed by Pope, and feelingly described by more than one of his illustrious pupils. But he could reflect with pride, at the end of a long and laborious life, that he had nursed the young genius of Dryden, Lee, Prior, Saunders, Rowe, King, and Duke; that he had moulded the youth of Locke and South; had imbued with literary tastes which never left them the practical abilities of Montagu and Stepney; had laid the foundations of Atterbury's elegant scholarship, and of that learning which made Edmund Smith the marvel of his contemporaries; had taught Friende "to speak as Terence spoke," and Alsop to repeat the refined wit of Horace;* that eight of his pupils had been raised to the bench, that no less than sixteen had been bishops. His influence on Dryden was undoubtedly considerable. He saw and encouraged in every way his peculiar bent. Despairing, probably, of ever making him an exact scholar, he taught him to approach Virgil and Horace, not so much from the grammatical as from the literary side. He taught him to relish the austere beauties of the Roman satirists, and with admirable tact set him to turn Persius and others into English verse, instead of submitting him to the usual drudgery of Latin composition. Dryden never forgot his obligations to Busby. Thirty years afterwards, when the young Westminster boy had become the first poet and the first critic of his age, he addressed his master, then a very old man, in some of the most beautiful verses he ever wrote. With exquisite propriety he dedicated to him his translation of the satire in which Persius records his reverence and gratitude to Cornutus: —

Yet never could be worthily express'd
How deeply thou art seated in my breast.
When first my childish robe resign'd the charge,
And left me unconfin'd to live at large.
Just at that age when manhood set me free,
I then deposed myself and left the reins to thee.
On thy wise bosom I repos'd my head,
And by my better Socrates was bred.
My reason took the bent of thy command,
Was form'd and polish'd by thy skilful hand.

And what he has embalmed so eloquently in verse he has repeated with simpler sincerity, but with equal emphasis in prose. They now lie within a few feet of each other in the great abbey. Men of genius have had, as a rule, little enough to thank their pedagogues for; and at the present time, when masters and pupils are farther than ever from realizing the old notion of the sacred ties which should connect them, we are tempted to dwell fondly on this touching and creditable incident in a great man's career.

From Westminster young Dryden proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge. He was entered May 18th, 1650; he matriculated in the following July, and on the second of October, the same year, he was elected a scholar on the Westminster foundation. Of his life at Cambridge comparatively little is known. He probably carried up to Trinity enough Latin to enable him to read with facility the Roman classics, and enough Greek to enable him to follow a Greek text in a Latin version. We very much question whether his attainments in Greek ever went beyond this, and he has given us ample opportunities of judging. Making all allowances for haste and the exigencies of a theory of translation, which aimed at transferring the spirit rather than the letter, it is obvious that his Greek scholarship was essentially inexact, uncritical, dishonest. In his renderings from Homer and Theocritus, he universally follows the Latin translation; his knowledge of Polybius and Plutarch is plainly at second hand; of Aristophanes and the tragedians he appears to have known little. To Thucydides, to Plato, and to the orators he has rarely even alluded. Indeed we very much question whether he could have read ten consecutive lines of Homer or Euripides without assistance. His college life did not glide away in unbroken tranquillity. An entry may still be read in the conclusion-book at Trinity, which charges him with disobedience to the vice-master and with contumacy in taking the punishment inflicted on him. It would seem also from an allusion in a satire of Shadwell's that he got into some scrape for insulting a young nobleman, which nearly ended in expulsion; but the details are too obscure to warrant any definite conclusion. That he studied hard, however, in his own way is likely enough. He had, at all events, the credit of having read through the Greek and Roman authors. He taught himself Italian and French, and laid the foundation of those wide and varied, though perhaps superficial, attainments which he found so useful in after life. To Trinity he gratefully acknowledged the chief part of his education, though, like his predecessors, Marvel and Cowley, he probably owed little or nothing to anybody but himself. The university, agitated by the civil commotions which had shaken England to its centre, was not at that time conspicuous either for its scholarship or for its efforts in general literature. The age of Milton, Marvel, Cowley, and May, had just passed; the age of Thomas Stanley, Bentley, Barnes, and Middleton had not arrived. What activity there was, was principally in a philosophical and scientific direction. Dryden's tutor, Templar, had engaged himself in a controversy with Hobbes. John Nichols, of Jesus, was writing on precious stones. Ray was laying the foundation of English natural history. Isaac Barrow was deep in botany and astronomy. Cudworth was busy with his great work. Henry More was unravelling the mysteries of Plotinus and the Cabbala. Hill, the master of Trinity, was indifferent to everything but politics. The only man who had any pretension to elegant scholarship was Duport, then Margaret professor of divinity, and shortly afterwards professor of Greek. He was an excellent Latinist, as his epigrams still remain to testify, and he was one of the few English scholars who had acquired fluency and even some skill in Greek verse composition. His versions of the Book of Proverbs, of Ecclesiastes, of the Song of Solomon, and of the Psalms, are unquestionably the best Greek verses which had hitherto appeared in England. To find anything as good, we must go forward nearly a century and a half to Dr. Cooke's version of Gray's "Elegy." It does not seem that Dryden had any acquaintance with him, though he was very likely in residence when Duport was made vice-master of Trinity in 1655. Dryden had, however, taken his degree in the preceding year, and probably preferred rambling at will through the well-stocked shelves of the college library to attending a course of lectures on Theophrastus. His studies were interrupted by the death of his father, and by an attachment he had formed to his cousin Honor Dryden, a young lady of considerable personal attractions and a fair fortune. She turned, it seems, a deaf ear to the flowing periods of her passionate lover, and left him "to bee burnt and martyred in those flames of adoration" which a letter she addressed to him had, he assures her, kindled in him. Whether he returned again to Cambridge, after burying his father, is doubtful. From 1655 to 1657, nothing is known of his movements except what mere conjecture has suggested. In spite of the assertions of Mr. Christie and the old gentleman who assures us that the head of the young poet was too roving to stay there, we are inclined to believe with Malone that, for some time, at least, subsequent to his father's death, he renewed his residence at Trinity. However that may be, it is pretty certain that he had settled in London about the middle of 1657.

He found Cromwell in the zenith of his power, and his cousin Sir Gilbert Pickering high in the protector's favor. He sought at once his cousin's patronage, and appears to have been for a while his private secretary; but his principal aim was directed to literature. His prospects were certainly not encouraging, and it would indeed have required more penetration than falls to the lot even of far-sighted judges to discern the future author of "Absalom and Achitophel" in the stout, florid youth, clad in grey Norwich drugget, who now offered himself as a candidate for poetic fame. He was in his twenty-seventh year. At an age when Aristophanes, Lucan, Persius, Milton, Tasso, Shelley, and Keats had achieved immortality, he had given no signs of poetic ability; he had proved, on the contrary, that he was ignorant of the very rudiments of his art; that he had still to acquire what all other poets instinctively possess. A few lines to his cousin Honor, which would have scarcely found a place in the columns of a provincial newspaper, an execrable elegy on Lord Hastings' death, and a commendatory poem on his friend Hoddesden's "Epigrams," immeasurably inferior to what Pope and Kirke White produced at twelve, conclusively showed that he had no ear for verse, no command of poetic diction, no sense of poetic taste. We have now to watch the process by which these crude and meagre powers gradually assumed, by dint of careful practice, a maturity, a richness, and a ductility which are the pride and wonder of our literature. We are fortunately enabled to trace with accuracy not only the successive stages but the successive steps by which the genius of Dryden underwent this wondrous transformation — and the history of letters presents few more interesting and instructive studies.

When he entered London, he must have found the character of our prose and of our poetry singularly undefined. Both were in a state of transition, and passing rapidly into new forms; but as yet the nature of the transition was obscure, the forms undetermined. There were, in fact, four influences at work. In Herrick and Wither vibrated still the lyric note of Ben Jonson and Fletcher, and in the tragedies of Shirley the large utterance of the old drama was faltering out its last unheeded accents. Cowley and his subordinates were upholding the principles of the metaphysical school, and their influence was, on the whole, predominant in most of the narrative, religious, and lyrical poetry of the time. In Milton, Cartwright, and Owen, it seemed for a moment probable that the Puritans would vindicate for themselves an ascetic and independent literature of their own, which might, under favorable political circumstances, assert the supremacy over all. But the course of intellectual activity is determined by causes which lie outside itself. Partly in obedience to a great European movement, partly owing to the critical and reflective spirit which never fails to follow an age of great creative energy, and partly, no doubt, owing to our increased acquaintance with French masterpieces, an adherence to Elizabethan models was intolerable, to metaphysical subtleties repulsive, to the stern genius of Puritanism impossible. "Paradise Lost" had still to be written, but it was entirely out of tune with the age, as two contemporary testimonies grotesquely illustrate. The "Pilgrim's Progress" was yet to come forth for the delight of millions, but it was not till the present century that it was considered anything but a vulgar romance, appealing only to vulgar readers. In the fourth influence was the principle of life, for it was in entire accordance with the spirit of the age, and it was the influence wielded by Waller, Denham, and Davenant. The terseness, finish, and dainty grace of the first banished forever the "wood-notes wild" of the early singers, and did much to purify language and thought from the extravagance of the metaphysical school, though that school was supported by the powerful genius of Cowley. The studied sweetness, moreover, of Waller's heroics, and the equable common sense of his sentiments, were also instrumental in establishing the tenets of the new school. Denham labored also to substitute reflection for imagination, criticism for feeling, and fitted the heroic couplet for its fresh duties. Davenant followed in his foststeps, added body and solidity to the limper harmony of Waller, aimed at brevity and pointed diction, wrote confessedly on critical principles, recast the drama, and encouraged his coadjutors to recast it. Cowley, at that time the most eminent poet in England, clung with inexplicable pertinacity to the extravagancies of the former age, except in his better moments. Those better moments sufficed, however, to furnish the heroic couplet with models of massive dignity, and to show how it was possible for the English lyric to unite the finished grace of Horace with the rapture and glory of Pindar. Such were the men who initiated the literature which it was the task of the youth now entering on his career to define and establish, of Pope to carry to ultimate perfection, and of Darwin to reduce to an absurdity.

In 1658 Cromwell died, and at the beginning of the following year Dryden published a copy of verses to deplore the event. "The Heroic Stanzas on the Death of the Lord Protector" inaugurate his poetical career. They are not only strikingly superior to his former productions, but they evince a native vigor, an active imagination, and a degree of imitative skill which promised well with time and practice. They showed also that he had elected to cast in his lot with the new school; that the genius of the metaphysical sect to which he had already sacrificed was to yield to the genius of self-restraint and good sense. They are modelled closely on Davenant's "Gondibert," repeating his peculiarities of turn and cadence with a fidelity which is not servile, because it is sustained with such admirable powers of felicitous and original imagery. The following year, so full of political turmoil, he probably spent in close application to composition, and to studying with minuteness the works of his masters. His three next poems, the "Astræa Redux," the "Panegyric on the Coronation," and the "Epistle to the Lord Chancellor," were written to welcome back Charles II. and to flatter his minister. They are evidently the fruit of much labor, and are full of that uneasy elaboration which naturally characterizes the efforts of a young poet on his probation. The versification and tone of thought are those of Davenant, Waller, and Denham happily blended. From the first he has caught a certain solidity of rhythm, and a happy trick of epigrammatic expression; from the second, a tone of equable smoothness, and the art of perverting imagery into compliment; from the third, a habit of commentative reflection and scientific allusion. Though he had abandoned the affectation and extravagance of the metaphysical poets, he was not entirely free from their shackles, and was careful to enrich and enliven his diction with their varied and wide-ranging imagery. Hence the restless straining after illustration, selected indiscriminately from natural science, from mathematics, from mythology and history, which confronts us in these early works.

About this time he had formed the acquaintance of Sir Robert Howard, a fashionable playwright of some distinction; and he honored his friend with a complimentary poem, which probably forms the link between the "Stanzas on Cromwell" and the three poems to which we have just alluded. In 1662 appeared the "Epistle to Dr. Charlton," the first of his works which, according to Hallam, possesses any considerable merit. Considerable merit it undoubtedly does not possess, but it marks a decided advance in literary skill.

Dryden had now commenced his career in earnest. He had quitted his cousin, quarrelled with his Puritan relations, who probably regarded his facile politics with abhorrence, and attached himself to Herringman, a bookseller on the new exchange. Though the property he had inherited from his father must have preserved him from actual want, he was accused of being Herringman's hack. His admission into the Royal Society, however, — which numbered among its members Boyle, Wallis, Wilkins, Barrow, Wren, Waller, Denham, Cowley, and the Duke of Buckingham, — and his intimacy with Sir Robert Howard, place it beyond all doubt that he must have been in a respectable position. He was, perhaps, indebted to Howard for some useful introductions, and, if his enemies are to be believed, for more substantial assistance also. A correspondent in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1745 furnishes us with a glimpse of the young poet in his lighter hours: "I remember plain John Dryden before he paid his court with success to the great, in one uniform clothing of Norwich drugget. I have ate tarts with him and Madame Reeve at the Mulberry Gardens, where our author advanced to a sword and a Chadreux wig." Mr. Christie is very severe with this tart-earting and Madame Reeve, but we really see no reason for concluding either that Dryden was a libertine, or that the lady was notoriously for many years his mistress. The only definite authority for such a statement is a passage in "The Rehearsal" which is surely too general in its language to warrant any certain conclusion. Whatever may have been the nature of his connection with her, it was probably discontinued on his marriage with the Lady Elizabeth Howard.* This lady, the sister of his friend Sir Robert Howard, was the eldest daughter of the Earl of Berkshire, and the marriage, as the register still testifies, was solemnized at St. Swithin's Church, London, December 1st, 1663. It has been confidently asserted that Dryden married her under derogatory circumstances, and that, previous to her marriage with him, she had been the mistress of the Earl of Chesterfield. Now of this there is no proof at all. The two brutal libels in which charges are brought against her good name, accuse her husband of being a drunken profligate, and are full of that reckless malignity which it would be grotesque to attempt to seriously refute. Scott long ago pointed out the utter worthlessness of their testimony. Since Scott wrote, a letter, it is true, addressed by her to Chesterfield, has been brought to light, and this letter, according to Mitford and Mr. Christie, strongly corroborates the former evidence. We cannot see it. She was the social equal of the earl, who was acquainted both with her father and her brothers. She promises to meet him at a place of public resort. She asks him not to believe what the world says of her; but it is surely hard to wrest these words into a criminal signification. There is nothing in the letter incompatible either with an innocent flirtation or a legitimate and honorable attachment. That Chesterfield was a libertine, scarcely affects the question. To conclude that the eldest daughter of one of the first families in England should, with the connivance of her father, submit to be the mistress of a young rake, is preposterous. Mr. Christie supports his authorities with an a-priori argument that if her character had been unsullied she would never have married Dryden. He forgets that Dryden was himself of good birth, that he had her brother to plead for him, that he had all the facilities afforded by a long visit at her father's country house, that he was not in those days the "poet-squab," but that he was "distinguished by the emulous favor of the fair sex." One of his libellers has even gone so far as to say that "blushing virgins had died for him." That the marriage was not a happy one is only too probable, though the unhappiness arose, it is obvious, from causes quite unconnected with infidelity, either on the part of the husband or the wife. Whatever incompatibility might have existed on the score of temper or tastes, the Lady Elizabeth appears to have been a kind and affectionate mother, and may, if we can draw any conclusions from the scanty correspondence which is preserved to us, claim the honorable distinction of having faithfully fulfilled her domestic duties.

About this time Dryden began his connection with the theatres, and this connection was, with some interruptions, continued till within five years of his death — his first play, "The Wild Gallant," being acted in 1663, his last — "Love Triumphant" — in 1694. Since the closing of the theatres by the Puritans in 1642, the drama, which was for upwards of a century the glory and the pride of the English people, supported by the patronage of three liberal and enlightened sovereigns, had maintained a precarious and fugitive existence. The Burbages and Condells, who had once shaken the Globe and the Blackfriars with the plaudits of delighted crowds, had been constrained to act for the amusement of a few desperate enthusiasts in a private room at Holland House, or in a miserable barn at the Cock Pit and the Red Bull, dreading the penance of imprisonment and the imposition of enormous fines. Davenant had indeed, by an ingenious compromise, succeeded in evading the prohibition of the government. He had in 1657 obtained leave to present at the back part of Rutland House an entertainment — so he called it — of declamation and music, after the manner of the ancients; and the "Siege of Rhodes" and the "History of Sir Francis Drake" still testify the existence of this bastard drama. Four years afterwards Charles II. was on the throne, with all the literary predilections of his ancestors, and, though the cautious policy of Clarendon only suffered two theatres to be licensed, both managers and playwrights lost no time in indemnifying themselves for their long privations. The King's Theatre was in the hands of Thomas Killigrew, an accomplished and licentious wit, whose sallies were long remembered at Whitehall. The Duke's Theatre was under the direction of Davenant, who, in 1660, had been raised to the laureateship. The position of a professional writer who had to live by his pen was once more pretty much what it had been when poor Greene jeered at Shakespeare for tagging his verses; and when Shakespeare himself made his fortune out of the Blackfriars Theatre. Dryden must have felt that he had little to fear from his immediate predecessors. Of the giant race who, to borrow a sentence from Lamb spoke nearly the same language, and had a set of moral feelings and notions in common, Shirley only remained. But Shirley had collapsed, worn out and penniless, into a suburban pedagogue; Ford had died in 1639; Massinger in 1640; and in such plays as Cockain's "Obstinate Lady," Quarle's "Virgin Widow," Chamberlayne's "Love's Victory," Killigrew's "Parson's Wedding" — which may be cited as typical of this period — the drama had degenerated into mere fluent rhetoric, or been vulgarized into a series of operatic effects at once futile and nauseous. Of Davenant's earlier plays it is scarcely necessary to speak; the dreariness of those which he produced under the most favorable conditions will probably deter the general reader from venturing to recur to those which he produced under circumstances the most unfavorable.

Into a minute account of Dryden's labors for the stage it is neither profitable nor requisite to enter. Johnson has lamented the necessity of following the progress of his theatrical fame, but sensibly remarks at the same time that the composition and fate of eight-and-twenty dramas include too much of a poetical life to be omitted. They include unhappily the best years of that life; they prevented, as their author pathetically complains, the composition of works better suited to his genius — but for them Lucretius might have found his equal and Lucan his superior. He had bound himself, however, to the profession of a man of letters, and he applied himself with resolution to the production of marketable material. He accurately informed himself of what his patrons wanted, and he managed with unscrupulous dexterity to provide them with it. He followed models for which he has been at no pains to conceal his contempt, and he gratified as a playwright the vitiated taste which as a critic he did his best to correct and purify. Those who live to please must, as he well knew, please to live. The fine genius of the Shakespearean comedy, the conscientious, elaborate, and lofty art of Jonson, were beyond his reach and beyond the taste of his audience; but the bustle, the machinery, the disguises, the complicated intrigue of the Spanish stage, spiced with piquant wit, with obscenity alternately latent and rampant, were irresistibly attractive to a profligate court and to a sordid and licentious mob. With all this Dryden immediately hastened to provide them. His first play, "The Wild Gallant," was a failure. "As poor a thing," writes honest Pepys, "as ever I saw in my life." Comedy, as he soon found, was not his forte, and though he lived to produce five others by dint of wholesale plagiarism from Molière, Voiture, Corneille, and Plautus, and by laboriously interpolating filth which may challenge comparison with "Philotus," or Fletcher's "Custom of the Country"—two of them were hissed off the stage, one was indifferently received, and the other two are inferior in comic effect to the worst of Wycherly's. He had, in truth, few of the qualities essential to a comic dramatist. "I know," he says himself in the "Defence of the Essay on Dramatic Poesy," "I am not so fitted by nature to write comedy. I want that gaiety of humor which is required to it. My conversation is slow and dull, my humor saturnine and reserved. So that those who decry my comedies do me no injury except it be in point of profit; reputation in them is the last thing to which I shall pretend." He had indeed no humor; he had no grace; he had no eye for those subtler improprieties of character and conduct which are the soul of comedy; what wit he had was coarse and serious; he had no power of inventing ludicrous incidents, he could not manage the light artillery of colloquial raillery. "The Wild Gallant" was succeeded by "The Rival Ladies," and it is a relief to return to his efforts in serious drama. This play was written about the end of 1663, but, warned by his former failure, he exchanged in the quasi-comic parts plain prose for blank verse, and he wrote the tragic portions in highly elaborate rhyming couplets. In the "Dedication to the Earl of Orrery," he defended with arguments which he afterwards expanded in his "Essay on Dramatic Poesy," the practice of composing tragedies in rhyme. "The Rival Ladies" was well received, and he hastened to assist his friend, Sir Robert Howard, in "The Indian Queen," which was produced the following year at the King's Theatre with all that splendor of costume and scenery common to the theatre of the Restoration. His powers were now rapidly maturing, and "The Indian Emperor," his next production, is conspicuous for sonorous eloquence, for copious and splendid diction, and for that happy union of strength and sweetness which was ever afterwards to characterize the heroic couplet in his hands.

The year of the plague closed the theatres, and the following year, not less calamitous to the Londoner, scarcely made the metropolis a desirable residence. Dryden spent the greater part of this long period at Charlton in Wiltshire, the seat of his father-in-law. He employed his retirement in producing two of the longest and perhaps the most carefully elaborated of all his writings, the "Annus Mirabilis," and the "Essay on Dramatic Poesy." In the "Annus Mirabilis," he returned to the heroic quatrain of Davenant. A minute and somewhat tedious account of the four days' battle with the Dutch fleet; an apostrophe to the Royal Society; a description of the fire of London, executed with great animation; the king's services at that crisis and a prophecy of what the future city would be — form the subject-matter of the poem. Both in its merits and in its defects, it bears a close resemblance to the "Pharsalia" of Lucan. It is enriched with some fine touches of natural description and, if the moonlight night at sea, and the simile of the bees were borrowed from Virgil, the picture of the dying hare, of the herded beasts lying on the dewy grass, and of the moon "blunting its crescent on the edge of day," show that Dryden had the eye of a poet as he wandered over the park at Charlton. The work is disfigured with many "metaphysical" extravagances, but the king's prayer, as well as the concluding stanzas, must rank among the most majestic passages in English poetry. Preceded by a "Dedication to the Metropolis," executed with a labored dignity of diction and sentiment, in which he seldom afterwards indulged, it appeared in 1667. If the poem commemorated the events of a year memorable in history — the year in which it saw the light was not less memorable in literature, for it witnessed the publication of "Paradise Lost;" and while it mourned the death of Denham, of Cowley, and of Jeremy Taylor, it welcomed into the world the two greatest humorists of the eighteenth century, Jonathan Swift and John Arbuthnot.

The "Essay on Dramatic Poesy," which is cast in the form of a dialogue under names representing respectively Lord Buckhurst, Sir Charles Sedley, Sir Robert Howard and the author himself, is not only an admirable discourse, but it forms an era in the history of literary criticism. The treatises of Wilson, Gascoign, Sidney, Webbe, Puttenham, Campion, and Daniel; the occasional excursions of Ascham in his "Schoolmaster," and of Ben Jonson in his "Discoveries;" and the incidental remarks of Cowley, Denham, and Davenant — may be said to sum up all that had hitherto appeared in England on this important province of literature. But none of these works will bear any comparison with Dryden's. His characters of Shakespeare, of Ben Jonson, and Fletcher, are models of happy and discriminating criticism; his observations are at once judicious and original, and his defence of rhyme in tragedy is a masterpiece of ingenious reasoning. Dryden was in 1668 again busy with his literary engagements in London. The "Annus Mirabilis" had placed him at the head of contemporary poets; the "Essay on Dramatic Poesy" had placed him at the head of contemporary prose-writers. He at once betook himself to the drama, and such was his industry, that within the year he produced three plays, in one of which, a re-cast of Shakespeare's "Tempest," he had the assistance of Davenant. About this time he contracted with the King's Theatre to supply them, in consideration of an annual salary, with three plays a year, and though he failed to satisfy the terms of the agreement, the company, with a liberality not very common with people of their profession, allowed him his stipulated share of the profits. In 1666 the office of historiographer royal had been vacated by the death of James Howel, who is still remembered as the pleasing author of the "Familiar Letters," and in 1668, the death of Davenant threw the laureateship open. To both these offices Dryden succeeded. He was now in comfortable circumstances, but he was soon brought into collision with opponents who embittered his life, and on whom he was destined to confer a scandalous immortality.

Among the young noblemen who relieved the playful vagaries of prosecuting vagrant amours in the guise of quacks on Tower Hill, and of haranguing mobs naked from the balcony of public-houses in Bow Street, with dancing attendance on the theatres, were George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, and Thomas Wilmot, Earl of Rochester. The duke either had, or pretended to have, a contempt for the rhymed heroic tragedies which, introduced by the Earl of Orrery from the French stage and popularized by Davenant and Dryden, were now in exclusive possession of the English boards. These heroic plays Buckingham had already resolved to ridicule in a farce in which Davenant was to be the principal character. As Davenant had died, he resolved to substitute Dryden. His Grace's literary abilities were, however, scarcely equal to the task, as the specimens which he afterwards gave of his powers of composition in his "Reflections on Absalom and Achitophel" abundantly testify. He therefore sought the assistance of Samuel Butler, Thomas Sprat, and Martin Clifford. Butler, a consummate master of caustic humor, had just ludicrously parodied Dryden's heroic plays in a dialogue between two cats, and was smarting under the double sting of neglect and envy. Sprat, though in training for a bishopric which he afterwards obtained, was a man whose wit was equal to his convivial excesses, and these excesses were proverbial among his friends, and long remembered by the good people about Chertsey. Clifford, a clever man and a respectable scholar, found the headmastership of the Charter-House not incompatible with habits which he had probably contracted during his lieutenancy in the Earl of Orrery's regiment, and was notorious for his licentious tastes and his powers of scurrilous buffoonery. Between them they produced "The Rehearsal." In this amusing farce — which furnished Sheridan with the idea and with many of the points of his "Critic" — the central figure is Bayes, a silly and conceited dramatist; and Bayes is Dryden. With all the license of the Athenian stage, Dryden's personal peculiarities, his florid complexion, his dress, his snuff-taking, the tone of his voice, his gestures, his favorite oaths — "Gad's my life," "I'fackins," "Gadsooks," — were faithfully caught and copied. Buckingham, bringing all his unrivalled skill as a mimic into play, spent incredible pains in training Lacy for the part. Dryden's plots were pulled to pieces, the scenes on which he had prided himself were mercilessly mangled, and he had the mortification of hearing that the very theatre which a few nights before had been ringing with the sonorous couplets of his "Siege of Grenada," was now hoarse with laughing at parodies of his favorite passages, as happy as those with which Aristophanes maddened Agathon and convulsed the theatre of Dionysus. Dryden made no immediate reply. He calmly admitted that the satire had a great many good strokes, and has more than once alluded to the character of Bayes with easy indifference.

His equanimity however seems to have been really disturbed by the success of Elkanah Settle's "Empress of Morocco," about a year and a half afterwards. This miserable man, who is now known only by the stinging lines in the second part of "Absalom and Achitophel," had been taken up by the Earl of Rochester. The earl had possibly been annoyed at Dryden's intimacy with Sheffield, he may have been guided merely by that malignant caprice which sometimes envenoms the easy good-nature of a rake. But whatever were his motives, he resolved to do his utmost to oppose the laureate, with whom he had up to this moment been on good terms. By his efforts "The Empress of Morocco" was acted at Whitehall, the lords at court and the maids-of-honor supporting the principal characters. It was splendidly printed, adorned with cuts, and inscribed to the Earl of Norwich in a dedication in which Dryden was studiously insulted. London was loud in its praises, and Dryden, knowing the nature of theatrical fame, trembled for his popularity. Crowne and Shadwell, both leading playwrights, and both at that time his friends, lent him their assistance in a pamphlet which exposed Settle's pretensions in a strain of coarse and brutal abuse. The laureate felt that he was on his mettle, and applied himself with more scrupulous care to his dramatic productions. In "The State of Innocence," which has been to some extent justly censured as a travesty of "Paradise Lost," and in "Aurenzebe," his splendid powers of versification and rhetoric were carried to a height which he never afterwards exceeded. In truth, these two plays, amid much bombast, contain some of his finest writing, and possess throughout an ease, a copiousness and uniform magnificence of diction only occasionally reached before — the result perhaps of a careful study of the principal English poets, to which he had, as he informed Sir George Mackenzie, about this time applied himself. With "Aurenzebe" died the rhymed heroic plays. They had been introduced by Davenant and the Earl of Orrery to gratify the taste of Charles II., who had admired them on the French stage, and they had held almost exclusive possession of the English theatres for fifteen years. The genius of Dryden had failed to naturalize them, and after 1676 we cannot call to mind a single rhymed tragedy which has travelled further than the pages of honest Baker.

He had now become a convert to the verse which had been wielded with such success by his Elizabethan predecessors, and in "All for Love," his next play, he enrolled himself among the disciples of Shakespeare. "All for Love" has been singled out by an eminent French critic for special praise. Dryden tells us that it was the only play he wrote to please himself, the rest were given to the people. The plot, which is the story of Antony and Cleopatra, had been already handled by two masters, but to compare Dryden's play with Shakespeare would be as absurd as to compare the "Electra" of Euripides with the "Electra" of Sophocles. It need not, however, fear a comparison with Fletcher's "False One," though it would be difficult to find a single scene in it equal to that superb scene in Fletcher's play which elicited such rapturous eulogy from Hazlitt. The altercation between Ventidius and Antony, though modelled too closely perhaps on that between Brutus and Cassius in "Julius Cæsar," is a noble piece of declamation; the scene between Cleopatra and Octavia is finer than anything the stage had seen since Massinger, and the character of Octavia is indeed sometimes not unworthy even of him who drew Volumnia.

Dryden was now in the zenith of his theatrical fame. His last three plays had been deservedly popular, but he began with his habitual carelessness to relax in his efforts. Settle was crushed; Rochester was busy. About this time appeared, circulated in manuscript, the "Essay on Satire." The nominal author was Sheffield, Earl of Mulgrave, Dryden's friend and patron. The poem contained some coarse and bitter attacks on Sir Car Scrope, on Rochester, on Sedley, and on the two favorite mistresses of the king. It was confidently believed at the time that the real author was Dryden; it was supposed afterwards that the real author was Mulgrave, but that the work had been revised by Dryden. Sir Walter Scott and Mr. Christie can see no trace of Dryden's hand, and anxiously attempt to relieve him from complicity in a work which reflects so seriously on his honesty. We wish we could agree with them. It seems to us that Dryden's touch is as unmistakably stamped on this essay as the hand of Shakespeare is evident amid the interpolated rubbish of "Timon" and "Pericles." Dryden's mannerisms of expression, cadence, rhythm are so marked that it is never possible for a critical ear to mistake them. They have often been cleverly imitated, they have never been exactly reproduced. His additions and corrections are in truth as glaringly apparent amid the nerveless heroics of Mulgrave as they were afterwards amid the graceless monotony of Tate's. It has been alleged that Pope revised the text as it now stands; but Pope, according to the same authority, revised the text of Mulgrave's "Essay on Poetry," and the hand is not the hand of Pope. It is not perhaps too much to say that Pope, with his style formed and his principles of versification fixed, would have been as incompetent as Mulgrave to catch with such subtle fidelity the characteristics of the elder poet. We very much fear therefore that the drubbing which Dryden got in Rose Alley was not undeserved; and if Rochester took up the quarrel in behalf of the Duchess of Portsmouth, we can only regret that he had not the courage to administer the cudgel himself. One of his letters, however, makes it probable that he was influenced by the less generous motive of revenging the libel on himself. The Rose Alley ambuscade, which might have cost the satirist his life, appears to have been generally regarded as humiliating only to the sufferer, and long continued to furnish matter for facetious allusions to party scribblers and coffee-house wits.

Dryden had now arrived at that period in his career when the obscurer vicissitudes incident to a writer for the stage were to be exchanged for the more striking experiences incident to one who figures on the troubled stage of party politics. He was now to achieve his proudest triumphs. He was to enter on that immortal series of satirical and didactic poems, compared with which his former efforts sink into insignificance. But he was at the same time to drink deep of the cup of humiliation and misery; he was to sully a fine genius in the pursuit of sordid and ignoble ends, and he was to present to the world once more in all its deplorable proportions the old contrast between moral weakness and intellectual strength. The nation was at this moment in a high state of ferment and misery. From a jarring chaos of Cavaliers, Puritans, Roman Catholics, Presbyterians, county parties, of colliding interests, of maddened commons, of a corrupted and corrupting ministry, of a shameful and selfish cabinet, of a disaffected Church, of sects of every shade and denomination, of plots and counterplots, of a royal house openly opposed but secretly in harmony — two great parties were gradually disentangling themselves. The king was childless, and the question of the succession was anxiously debated. In the event of the king's death the crown would revert to the Duke of York; but the Duke of York was a Papist, and of all the many prejudices of the English people the prejudice against Papacy was the strongest. The country party insisted on the exclusion of the Duke of York from the throne, and their leader was the Earl of Shaftesbury. The other party, strongest among the aristocracy, wished, with an eye to their own interests, to please the king, and were headed by the Marquis of Halifax, the Duke of Ormond, and the Earl of Rochester. The object of the exclusionists was to inflame the populace against the Papists. For this reason the infamous fictions of Oates and his associates had been accepted and promulgated, and the complications which succeeded the fall of Danby took their rise. Shaftesbury, who had mortally offended the Duke of York, was president of the Privy Council of Thirty, and virtually directed the House of Commons. The measure on which he had set his heart, and on which his complicated schemes depended, was the Exclusion Bill. To the passing of this he accordingly directed all his energies. He was dismissed from his presidency in 1679, and he went over at once to the opposition. He put himself at the head of the stormy democracy of the city; he encouraged the rumors current about Popish plots. He inflamed the House of Lords by his speeches and the Commons by his emissaries. By his exertions the Exclusion Bill triumphantly passed the Commons, and all but passed the Lords. There, however, the splendid eloquence of Halifax succeeded in defeating it. Monmouth was now the popular idol and the puppet of Shaftesbury. The Oxford Parliament, assembled in 1681, endorsed Shaftesbury's views, and insisted on the complete exclusion of the Duke of York. This assembly the king abruptly dismissed, and Shaftesbury was committed to the Tower. The voice of Parliament was hushed, and a savage literary warfare began. The king, the Duke of York, and the ministry were fiercely assailed. The prose libels of Hunt and Ferguson vied with the sermons of Hickeringhill and the rhymes of Settle and Shadwell in aspersing the character of the duke and in upholding the cause of Monmouth and Shaftesbury. The stage was loud with the fury of party spirit, but the stage, patronized by the king, had ever since the Restoration been true to him. It had upheld monarchy; it had insisted on the divine right of kings, and had zealously set itself to abolish all traces of republicanism. It refused, however, to support the Duke of York, and in "The Spanish Friar," Dryden employed all his dramatic ability to cover the Papists with ridicule. In the person of Dominic were embodied all those characteristics which, two years before, young Oldham had pronounced in a strain of vigorous invective, not unworthy of Dryden himself, to mark the Popish priest. Meanness, gluttony, and avarice, set off and darkened by vices still more odious and criminal, are careful concessions to popular sentiment; though, as Scott well observes, a sense of artistic propriety led the satirist to endow his hero with the wit and talent necessary to save him from being utterly contemptible. "The Spanish Friar," thus interesting from the political side, is still more interesting from the fact that it is beyond all question the most skilfully executed of all Dryden's plays. Indeed, we are acquainted with no play either in ancient or modern times which, without dramatic genius in the highest sense of the term, is elaborated with such a nice regard to dramatic propriety. By minutely artificial strokes and with a studied art very unusual with Dryden, the tragic part helps out the comic, and the comic relieves naturally and appropriately the tragic. In this work tragi-comedy, from an artistic point of view, has achieved perhaps its highest success.

In November 1681 appeared "Absalom and Achitophel." It became instantly popular, and its sale was for those days enormous. There were two editions within two months, and seven others followed at no long interval. By a good fortune, rare indeed in the annals of literature, the verdict of those whom it delighted with all the charm of living interest has been corroborated by the verdict of those who can only appreciate it from the literary side. No poem in our language is so interpenetrated with contemporary allusion, with contemporary portraiture, with contemporary point, yet no poem in our language has been more enjoyed by succeeding generations of readers. Scores of intelligent men who know by heart the characters of Zimri and Achitophel are content to remain in ignorance of the political career of Buckingham and Shaftesbury. The speech in which Achitophel incites his faltering disciple has been rapturously declaimed by hundreds who have been blind to its historical fidelity and to its subtle personalities. The energy of genius has transformed a party pamphlet in verse into a work which men of all ages and of all opinions have agreed to recognize as a masterpiece. The plan of the poem can scarcely be pronounced to be original. The idea of casting a satire in the epic mould, which is a striking feature in it, was derived perhaps from the Fourth Satire of Juvenal — though Dryden is serious where Juvenal is mock-heroic. Horace and Lucan undoubtedly supplied him with models for the elaborate portraits which enrich his narrative, and the ingenious device of disguising living persons under the veil of Scriptural names was by no means new to his readers. A prose tract, for instance, published at Dublin in 1680, entitled "Absalom's Conspiracy, or the Tragedy of Treason," anticipated in embryo the very scheme, and a small piece, "Achitophel, or the Picture of a Wicked Politician," completed the resemblance. "Absalom and Achitophel" produced, naturally enough, innumerable replies from the Whig party, all of which have deservedly sunk into oblivion. We are certainly not inclined to enter into the comparative merits of "Towser the Second," "Azaria and Hushai," and "Absalom Senior," or to determine the relative proportion of dulness between Henry Care, Samuel Pordage, and Elkanah Settle.

In the following March, Shaftesbury, who had meanwhile been brought to trial on a charge of high treason, was acquitted by the grand jury, and the Whigs were mad with joy. Bonfires blazed from one end of London to the other; the bells clanged from the steeples; a medal was struck to commemorate the event. The Tories, baffled and angry, were at their wit's end to know what to do. In this emergency, the king appealed to his laureate to bring into play once more those weapons of invective and ridicule which he had already wielded with such signal success. A less fertile genius would have found it difficult to repeat himself in another form, or to add any particulars to a portrait which he had just delineated with such care, but Dryden was equal to the task. In "The Medal," he hurled at Shaftesbury and his party a philippic which, for rancorous abuse, for lofty and uncompromising scorn, for coarse, scathing, ruthless denunciation, couched in diction which now swells to the declamatory grandeur of Juvenal and now sinks to the homely vulgarity of Swift, has no parallel in literature. The former attack, indeed, was mercy to this new outburst. To find anything approaching to it in severity and skill we must go back to Claudian's savage onslaught on the Achitophel of the fourth century, or forward to Akenside's diatribe against Pulteney. No sooner had "The Medal" appeared, than the poets of the Whig party set themselves with reckless temerity to answer it. Shadwell and Settle led the van. Shadwell, who shortly before had been on good terms with Dryden, and was now about to make himself a laughing-stock forever, was a playwright of some distinction. He belonged to a good family in Norfolkshire, had been educated at Cambridge, and after studying at the Middle Temple had passed some time in foreign travel. On his return to England he had enrolled himself among the wits. His conversation, though noted even in those days for its coarseness, was so brilliant, that Rochester, no mean judge of such an accomplishment, used to say that if he had burnt all he wrote, and printed all he spoke, he would have had more wit and humor than any other poet. His habits were dissolute and sensual, and what time he could spare from entertaining tavern companions, he divided between muddling himself with opium and writing for the stage. He is known to us chiefly from the ludicrous caricature of Dryden, but under that burly and unwieldy exterior — "that tun of man" — there lurked a rich vein of comic humor, keen powers of observation, and sound taste. His "Virtuoso" has elicited praise from a quarter where praise is rare, from the caustic Langbaine. His "Epsom Wells" and his "Squire of Alsatia" may still be read with delight, as singularly lively pictures of Caroline life. Settle's character was beneath contempt, and his works are of a piece with his character; the first was a compound of amiable imbecility and grotesque presumption, the second are a compound of sordid scurrility and soaring nonsense. Of the innumerable replies to "The Medal" Dryden took no notice, but in a piece called "The Medal of John Bayes," Shadwell had exceeded the limits of literary controversy, and had descended to some gross libels on his private character. This it could scarcely be expected he would forgive, and he proceeded to revenge himself. In 1678 there died one Richard Flecknoe, who had been the butt of Marvel's satire, and who, though he had written one exquisite copy of verses and a clever volume of prose sketches, seems to have been regarded as a sort of typical dullard. His character was estimated, perhaps, from his failures as a dramatist. Of the five plays he had written, he could only get one to be acted, and that was damned. This man is depicted by Dryden as the king of the realms of nonsense, conscious of his approaching demise and anxious for the election of his successor. In a strain of ludicrous panegyric, he discusses the grounds of his son Shadwell's claims to the vacant throne. He reflects with pride on the exact similarity, as well in genius as in tastes and features, which exists between himself and his hopeful boy. Shadwell's coronation is then described with more humor than is common with Dryden, though the conclusion of the poem evinces a sudden change from banter to ferocity, and betrays the bitterness of the feelings which had prompted it. This admirable satire — to which Pope was indebted for the plot of the "Dunciad" — is certainly to be numbered among Dryden's most successful efforts. The raillery, though not elegant, is light, and tolerably free from that offensive coarseness which mars so many of his satirical compositions. Though he lived to learn from young Lockier that it was not the first mock-heroic poem written in heroics, he could assert, without fear of contradiction, that the plot of it was original, and a happier plot never suggested itself to a satirist.

The first part of "Absalom and Achitophel" had been so popular that the publisher was anxious to add a second. Dryden was, however, weary or indifferent, and the work was intrusted to Nahum Tate. Sir Thomas Browne has remarked, that Thersites will live as long as Agamemmon; and Bentley observed of himself that, as he despaired of achieving immortality by dint of original effort, he thought his best course would be to climb on the shoulders of his betters. Tate illustrates in a very lively manner the disagreeable truism of the one and the ingenious expedient of the other. Nature had endowed that respectable and gentlemanly man with powers scarcely equal to Pomfret's, and immeasurably inferior to Black-more's. Accident introduced him to Dryden; party spirit finally conducted him to the laureateship, and the laureateship enabled him to inflict on succeeding generations of his countrymen that detestable version of the Psalms which is still appended to our Book of Common Prayer. His other writings repose in the limbo which envelopes those of his friends Brady and Duke, and those of his successor Eusden. The second part of "Absalom and Achitophel" was carefully revised and corrected by Dryden. Indeed his hand is everywhere traceable, and his additions, we suspect, amounted to more than the memorable two hundred and fifty lines which were confessedly inserted by him. In these lines he took the opportunity of revenging himself on the meaner actors in the great drama of 1682. After disposing of Ferguson, Forbes, Johnson, Pordage and others, with that cursory indifference so stinging in its contemptuous brevity — of which the great Florentine satirist was such a master — he proceeds to engage once more with Settle and Shadwell. The verses on the first unite in an equal degree poignant wit with boisterous humor, and are in every way worthy of his great powers. But in dealing with Shadwell he seems to us to descend to the level of the object he despises. The portrait of Og has been much admired, but it is, in our opinion, spoilt by its excessive and offensive coarseness; it is as gross in the execution as it is in the design. Bluff and vulgar, it savors too much of that kind of vituperation, for which Virgil rebukes Dante for lending an attentive ear, —

Che voler ciò udire è basso.

In the "Religio Laici," which appeared in this same year, he struck a new chord, and produced what Scott justly describes as one of the most admirable poems in our language. From politics to religion was at that time an easy transition, and it would in truth be difficult to determine which raged with most controversial violence. The Romanists, the Protestants and the Dissenters were all powerfully represented, and were all powerfully opposed. The Romanists charged the Dissenters with bigotry and intolerance, and the Dissenters retorted by charging the Romanists with plotting against the government and with corrupting civil order. Both were, unhappily, right. The Established Church, standing between them, despised the one party and feared the other. Dryden, anxious doubtless to please his patrons, was probably interested chiefly on the political bearing of the question, and the "Religio Laici" was written, he tells us, with a view of moderating party zeal. If it has none of that lightness of touch, and none of that felicitous grace which throws such a charm over the "Epistles" of Horace, on which it was, he says, modelled, it may, short though it be, challenge comparison with any didactic writing in verse since Lucretius vindicated the tenets of Epicurus. He has little of the fervid enthusiasm, little of the still, sweet music of humanity which vibrates through so much of the "De Rerum Naturâ," but he has all the Roman's powers of reasoning vigorously and perspicuously in verse, of enlivening logic with illustrative imagery, of producing fine rhetorical effects.

Dryden had now to toil hard for emolument, and to write his poetry under the same compulsion which had produced his plays. His salary as laureate was in arrears, and in the shifting currents of political controversy, he had lost some of the most useful of his patrons. His income from the theatres was considerably diminished. The expenses of a handsome house in Gerrard Street, then one of the most fashionable quarters of London, and those incident to the education of three sons, two of whom were destined for the universities, must have increased his pecuniary embarrassments. His health was impaired, and a visit into the country was, his physicians informed him, not only desirable but necessary. His means, however, were at such a low ebb, that without a remittance it was impossible for him to leave town. He was even in danger of being arrested for debt. He applied himself in this emergency to Hyde, Earl of Rochester, then first commissioner of the treasury, reminding him of the important services he had already done the government, and begging for some small remunerative employment. He requested that some of his salary might be remitted — it was now about 1,200*l.* in arrears — and he observed with just indignation that it was enough for one age to have neglected Cowley and starved Butler. As the result of this application he obtained the following May the miserable pittance of 75*l.*, to which was added the office of collector of customs in London. He had now to discover, like Johnson, that the booksellers, though hard taskmakers, are the only patrons on whom genius can rely, and he submitted to the drudgery of hack-work with some querulousness and much energy. As early as 1673 he had entertained the design of composing a great national epic, with either King Arthur or the Black Prince for its hero. This was now abandoned, and he betook himself to the humbler but more remunerative occupation of writing prefaces, of executing miscellaneous translations, of providing young dramatists with prologues, and of co-operating with Lee in producing pieces for the theatres. In 1680 he had taken part in some versions from Ovid's "Epistles." The work had been tolerably successful, and the publisher, Tonson, with whom he had allied himself since 1679, proposed to bring out a volume of "Miscellanies." To this Dryden contributed some versions of parts of Virgil, Horace, and Theocritus, which we do not hesitate to say are the very worst things he ever did. For the majesty and elaborate diction of the first he has substituted a sort of slipshod vulgarity; the curious felicity of the second has vanished in flat, slovenly diffuseness; and the limpid simplicity of the third is disguised in a style which would have disgraced Pordage. The truth was, he sorely needed rest; he was weary, in miserable health, and had saddled himself with a translation of Maimbourgh's "History of the League." In 1685 appeared another volume of "Miscellanies," which contained, among other things, some versions from Lucretius. Dryden was now himself again. He had been for a visit into the country, and had recovered from what he describes as a kind of hectic fever. He had been pleased with the success of his Maimbourgh, and a gossiping letter which he wrote about this time to Tonson, thanking him for two melons, gives us an interesting glimpse of him in domestic life. This second volume of "Miscellanies" was probably published on his return to London. The versions from Lucretius, and the paraphrase of the twenty-ninth ode of the third book of Horace, are the gems of the collection, and in them his genius once more kindles with all its old fire. The superb invocation which the great Roman poet addresses to the tutelary goddess of his race is rendered with a power and majesty which need fear no comparison with the imperial splendor of the original, and the version from the third book is almost equally happy. He might perhaps have left the conclusion of the fourth book where he found it, for though he humorously assures us in his preface that he was not yet so secure from the passion of love as to dispense with his author's antidote against it, he probably knew well enough that he was providing most of his readers rather with a philtre than a prophylactic. The brilliance and care with which these pieces were executed were due, no doubt, not only to his real sympathy with a poet who in some respects resembled himself, but to the necessity for asserting his superiority over Creech, who had just before clothed Lucretius in an English dress. Fox, it is well known, preferred Dryden's rendering of the celebrated Horatian ode, lib. iii. 29, to the original. There is, in reality, little or no comparison between them. Assuredly no two poets could be less like each other than Horace and Dryden, and in none of his works is Horace more Horatian, in none of his works is Dryden more Drydenian.

In February 1684 Charles II. died, and Dryden dedicated to the memory of a patron who had given him little but fair words, and a few broad pieces, a Pindaric ode, entitled the "Threnodia Augustalis." This, says Johnson, with a courteous euphemism, is not amongst his happiest productions. It is, in truth, among his very worst. To say that it does not contain fine lines and passages would be to deny that it was written by its author, but it would be difficult to name another of his poems which contains fewer beauties, more prolixity, less merit. In celebrating the demise of one sovereign he took care to commemorate the accession of the new. He did not forget that the Hesperus of the setting becomes the Lucifer of the dawn; and in regretting a Numa he dried his tears in an anachronistic vision of an Ancus. "Albion and Albinovanus," which had been written to celebrate Charles's triumph over the popular party, was now furbished up to celebrate the accession of James, to hail the millennium of justice and generosity. The character of the new monarch was, however, a compound of meanness and ingratitude, and his conduct to the laureate indicates both. He renewed the patent of the offices enjoyed by the poet, who had served him so well, but he struck off a hundred a year from his salary, and would probably have pushed his contemptible economy still further. This, however, Dryden took care to prevent. On January 19, 1686, John Evelyn entered in his diary: "Dryden, the famous playwright, and his two sons, and Mrs. Nelly (miss to the late king), are said to go to mass. Such proselytes are no great loss to the Church." With regard to Mrs. Nelly, Evelyn had been misinformed; she still lived to adorn the Protestant Church, and to have her funeral sermon preached by the venerable Tennison. With regard to Dryden, his information was correct. The poet-laureate had indeed publicly embraced the tenets which his royal master was laboring to uphold, and his salary was at once raised to its full amount.

The sincerity of his conversion under these circumstances to a creed, which had hitherto been the butt of his keenest sarcasms, has been very naturally called into question. Johnson, with a liberality of feeling rare with him on such points, and Scott, with considerable argumentative skill and at great length, have labored to persuade themselves that it was sincere. Macaulay and Mr. Christie arrive at the opposite conclusion. Hallam is of opinion that no candid mind could doubt the sincerity of one who could argue so powerfully and subtly in favor of the religion he had embraced as Dryden does in "The Hind and Panther." It seems to us that the truth probably lies — where truth usually does lie — midway between the two extremes, between the favorable conclusion of Hallam on the one hand and the unfavorable conclusion of Macaulay on the other. Dryden was in all probability induced to take the step by motives of personal interest. He was probably able to satisfy himself of his honesty when he had taken it, not only by dint of that intellectual plasticity natural to one familiar with every weapon of argument and sophistry, and possessed of a genius singularly fertile in logical resources, but by the ready sympathy of a poet in contact for the first time with a religion which appeals so forcibly to the senses. He had arrived at that period in life when to men of his temper the blessing of a fixed belief is inexpressibly soothing. He was beginning to experience the pain and weariness of a career, the boundaries of which he could now plainly descry. His health was failing. His literary ambition was realized; he could scarcely hope to stand higher than he was. Scott discerns in the "Religio Laici" the commencement of that genuine dissatisfaction with the Protestant Church which finally led him to embrace Roman Catholicism. We cannot see it. It seems to us that the poem was written merely for a political purpose, as he himself assures us. What religious opinions he had, so far as we can gather from his writings, up to this time, probably differed little from those of a busy man of letters who never seriously reflected on such matters, but who amused himself, as occasion offered, with facile acquiescence in conventional dogmas, with the listless speculations of languid scepticism, or with laughing at both. Most creeds he had indeed treated with indiscriminate contempt, and neither the Protestant nor the Catholic Church had escaped the shafts of his sarcastic wit. Macaulay argues that if his conversion had been sincere, he would not have continued to pander to the profligacy of the age, but would have regarded his former transgressions with horror. Such a view appears to us to be based on a radical misconception of Dryden's character. Unless we are much mistaken, he was — so far as the moral elements of his character were concerned — as purely emotional as Shelley or Edgar Poe; but the peculiarity is hidden by the masculine enegy of his powers of verbal expression. It is difficult to associate the idea of such weakness with one who is the personification in so marked a degree of intellectual strength. As a writer, he has the thews and grasp of a giant; in massive and majestic eloquence he has not been excelled in a literature which has produced "Nestor's Speech" and "Satan's Address to the Sun." But the moment we look at the man we are confronted with a mass of inconsistencies and contradictions. Like his own Zimri, he had been everything by starts and nothing long. He began with republican principles; he was soon an uncompromising Tory. In 1658 he was panegyrizing Cromwell and his partisans; in 1660 he was hailing Charles II. as the saviour of an erring nation. In 1673 he was doing everything in his power to inflame the prosecution of the Dutch war; ten years later he was cursing Shaftesbury for his share in it. He exhausted compliment in his allusions to Charles II., and was simultaneously assisting Mulgrave in libelling him. In 1687 he had attached himself to James II.; in 1690 he was speaking respectfully of the Revolution. The truth is that he probably cared little either for religion or politics, either for Charles or James, either for Ormond or Hyde. He was a poet, with all the sensitive susceptibilities of his race; he was a man of letters, whose proper sphere was the library; but with the temperament of the one and with the accomplishments of the other, he combined the coarser instincts of a mere worldling. Not naturally a man of high spirit or lofty aims, the age he lived in did little to supply them. He soon ascertained the marketable value of his endowments, and he carried them, with unscrupulous alacrity, to the highest bidder. Thus while motives of self-interest determined the direction of his energy, the native genius thus brought into play soon created genuine enthusiasm, and he at last became what he at first affected to be. He addressed himself to religious controversy as he had addressed himself to politics. When he took the step which has laid him open to so much suspicion, he took it under that pressure on the part of circumstances which had never failed to dictate his actions; but having taken it, he soon persuaded himself that he was sincere. We may therefore accept that magnificent poem in which he fights the battle of his adopted creed as the genuine voice of genuine conviction, not merely as the hollow rhetoric and conscious sophistry of an interested apostate.

His pen was not suffered to remain idle, and he was at once employed to defend both in prose and verse the religion he had adopted. From an entry of Tonson's at Stationers' Hall, Dryden had, it seems, intended to translate Varilla's "History of Revolutions in Matters of Religion," but for some reason, which it is now useless to guess, the work was abandoned, and he proceeded to engage in a controversy which added little to his reputation. Soon after his accession, James ordered some papers to be published which had, it was alleged, been discovered in the strong box of Charles II. They consisted of two documents in the handwriting of the deceased king, asserting that the only true Church was the Church of Rome. To these James added the copy of a paper written by his first wife, Anne Hyde, stating the motives which had induced her to become a convert to the Catholic religion. No sooner had these manuscripts appeared, than their authenticity was called into question by the Protestant divines. Stillingfleet, then dean of St. Paul's and one of the most accomplished theologians in England, produced a pamphlet, in which he boldly contended that the papers were forgeries. Dryden was selected to reply. He was, however, no match for an adversary who at twenty-four had written the "Irenicum," and whose whole life had been a long training in theological polemics. Dryden confined himself to the defence of the paper attributed to Anne Hyde, and his vindication betrays a coarse license of vituperation, a shallowness and ignorance, which Stillingfleet, in a second pamphlet, contented himself with exposing in a few stinging sentences. The laureate had the good sense to quit a field on which he could scarcely hope to retrieve himself, and to betake himself to a weapon in which he was not likely to find his match. He went down into Northamptonshire, and there, amid the rural beauties of Rushton, produced a poem which, in point of plot, is grotesque in the extreme, but which, in point of execution, must rank among the masterpieces of English literature. "The Hind and Panther" was written with the immediate object of obviating the objections of those who disputed James's right to dispense with the Test Acts. The Hind — milk-white and immortal — represents the Church of Rome; the Panther — the fairest creature of the spotted kind — represents the Church of England. Surrounded with Socinian foxes, Independent bears, Anabaptist boars, and other animals typifying the innumerable sects into which the Protestant community was subdivided, these fair creatures confer on their common danger, discuss the points on which they differ, comment on current topics, smile, wag their tails, and interchange hospitalities. On this monstrous groundwork Dryden has raised the most splendid superstructure of his genius. "In none of his works," says Macaulay with happy discrimination, "can be found passages more pathetic and magnificent, greater ductility and energy of language, or a more pleasing and various music." There was one circumstance connected with the composition of this work which must have been inexpressibly mortifying to the author, and which still deforms, with an ugly inconsistency, the conduct of its argument. The original policy of James had been to attempt an alliance between the Catholic and the Protestant Church, for the purpose of uniting them against the Dissenters. Dryden had therefore, in the course of his poem, treated the Protestant Church with respect and forbearance and the Dissenters with contempt. But the king, finding that such an alliance was impossible, suddenly veered round and adopted a conciliatory tone with the Dissenters, without acquainting his apologist, who was away from London, with the circumstance. The poem was on the point of going to press, and Dryden saw with chagrin the mistake he had made. He proceeded at once to do all in his power to rectify it. He softened down his praises of the Protestant Church and his sneers at the Dissenters. He introduced two episodes, "The Fable of the Swallows" and "The Fable of the Doves," in which the clergy of the Church of England are bitterly assailed. Both in the conclusion of the poem and in the preface, he exhorts the Dissenters to make common cause with the Catholics against their common enemy, the Established Church. Thus altered to meet the new emergency, "The Hind and Panther" made its appearance in April, 1687. It was at once violently assailed, and the poet had to bear the brunt of the odium which the sullen tyranny of his royal master was now beginning to excite on all sides. Whigs and Tories united to attack the apologist of their common enemy. The plot, the argument, the style of the work, were caricatured. The inconsistencies of its author's political career were scoffingly enumerated. One opponent raked up the "Elegy on Cromwell," with comments from the "Astræa Redux" and the "Threnodia Augustalis;" another reprinted the "Religio Laici." Two or three of the more unscrupulous among them charged him with gross profligacy in private life, and descended to personalities about his domestic troubles, his red face, and his short stature. Most of these productions have sunk below the soundings of antiquarianism: one, however, may still be read with interest, even by those familiar with the refined parodies of Canning and the brothers Smith. This was "The Hind and Panther" transversed to the story of "The Country Mouse and the City Mouse," written by two young adventurers, one of whom was destined to become the most distinguished financier of the eighteenth century, the other one of the most graceful of our minor poets — Charles Montague and Mathew Prior. The old poet had, it seems, treated both Prior and Montague with great kindness; and he is said to have felt their ingratitude very keenly. He must have recognized the wit of their exquisite satire, and was perhaps not insensible to the justice of their attack. A translation of the "Life of St. Xavier," and a poem on the birth of the young prince, June 10th, 1688, hurriedly but vigorously executed, concluded his services for James II. Six months afterwards William III. was on the throne.

Dryden's position was now lamentable in the extreme. He was not only in declining years and in miserable health, but he was deprived of all those government offices which he had labored so hard to secure, and on which he relied for permanent income. He was deprived of the laureateship and the historiographership, and he had the mortification of seeing them conferred on his old enemy Shadwell. His place in the customs was taken from him. He had pledged himself too deeply to the religious and political principles which were the abhorrence of the new dynasty and its supporters to dream of recanting. He had nothing but his pen to look to. An ordinary man would have sunk under the weight of such an accumulation of misfortunes. Dryden grappled with them with all the spirit of youth renewed. Never was the divine energy of genius, the proud loyalty to an artistic ideal more jealously preserved in spite of sordid temptation to hurried and slovenly work, or more nobly illustrated than in the ten years still allotted to him. He might engage to provide Tonson with ten thousand verses for a wretched pittance of three hundred guineas; but he took care to make those verses worthy of immortality. He might engage to translate the whole of Virgil for a sum little more than his friend Southerne cleared by two plays; but he strained every nerve to make it worthy of the name it bore, "and refused to be hurried." It seems to us, indeed, that in this last decade of his life his work was more conscientiously executed, in spite of his pecuniary exigencies, than had been common with him before. In 1689 he betook himself once more to the stage, and in less than a year produced the tragedy "Don Sebastian," which has long been regarded as his masterpiece, and a comedy "Amphitryon," which holds a respectable place even in an age which witnessed the comedies of Wycherly and Congreve. "Don Sebastian" was, he tells us, labored with great diligence, and of that diligence it bears evident traces. The subordinate characters are more carefully discriminated than was usual with him. Dorax and Sebastian are noble sketches, and Almeyda is not unworthy of her lover. In depicting the hero friendless, desolate, and ruined, the old poet was not improbably thinking of himself, and when Sebastian cries, —

> Let Fortune empty all her quiver on me,
> I have a soul that like an ample shield
> Can take in all, and verge enough far more.
> Fate was not mine, nor am I Fate's, there speaks in trumpet-tones the indomitable energy which made Dryden's last dark years the most glorious epoch in his artistic life. If we except Otway's two tragedies, "Don Sebastian" is beyond comparison the finest tragedy the English stage had seen since its great master had passed away. The celebrated scene in the fourth act between Dorax and Sebastian is one of the gems of the English drama. "Had it been the only one Dryden ever wrote," says Scott, "it would have been sufficient to insure his immortality."

He could scarcely expect to get a hearing from the new monarch, but both these plays were anxiously dedicated to men who would be likely to have weight with him, Philip, Earl of Leicester, and Sir William Leveson-Gower. "King Arthur" and "Cleomenes" need not detain us, and with "Love Triumphant" the veteran dramatist took leave of the stage forever. In the conspicuous failure of his last play he probably read the advent of a new age, and with that graceful magnanimity which is such a pleasing trait in his character, he resigned the sceptre which he had swayed so long to his friends Southerne and Congreve. He was now busy with his translation of Juvenal and Persius. Of the former he translated the first, third, sixth, tenth, and sixteenth satires, intrusting the rest to his sons Charles and Erasmus, to his former coadjutor Tate, and to Creech. The whole of Persius was executed by himself. To this work, brought out in folio in 1693, he prefixed a "Discourse on Satire," dedicated in an exquisitely courtly strain to the Earl of Dorset. It is somewhat ungracefully garnished with what Scott calls the sort of learning in fashion among the French; but it is still valuable for its occasional remarks on points of criticism; for its eloquent declamation against the abuse of satire; for its admirable delineation of the Latin satirists; for its interesting autobiographical particulars; and, above all, for the ease, variety, and vigor of the style. The versions themselves have all the air of original compositions. In accordance with those principles of translation laid down by Chapman, Cowley, and Denham, and already illustrated by himself in his versions from Lucretius and Ovid, he has aimed not so much at reproducing the literal meaning as at transfusing the spirit of his authors. He is not therefore to be tried by any canons of exact scholarship. He has indeed spoken contemptuously of the servile fidelity of Barton Holiday. He approaches Juvenal pretty much as Horace approached Archilochus and Alcæus. He confesses himself a disciple, but he spoke not so much what his master dictated as what his master suggested. He writes, he says, as Juvenal may be supposed to have written had Juvenal written in English; and he has not scrupled to boast that he has taught Persius to speak with a purity and precision to which he was in his own language a stranger. In this bold experiment he has on the whole succeeded. He has produced translations which may be read with delight by those who cannot read the original, and if in the versions from Juvenal he who can read the original will miss the incisive terseness, the piercing wit, the keen and polished rhetoric of the Roman, he must impartially confess that in the sixth satire the Englishman has almost made the palm ambiguous. He must admit that the noble verses at the conclusion of the tenth, which are one of the proudest gems in the coronet of Roman literature, have by the genius of Dryden been set as a precious gem in the coronet of our own. With regard to his Persius, scholars will, we suspect, continue to prefer the fascinating perplexities and the harsh enigmatical phrase of the poet Casaubon loved, to the flowing diction of his English interpreter. It must, however, be allowed that if Dryden has diluted he has not enervated, and that in two memorable passages — the conclusion of the second satire and the lines to Cornutus in the fifth — he has gone far to make good his promise. To a third and fourth volume of "Miscellanies," which appeared in 1693 and 1694, he also contributed; but with the exception of the fine "Epistle to Kneller," which, like his "Eleanora," written a year before, evinces rare powers of varied and mellow versifying, none of these contributions added anything to his high reputation. About this time he made the acquaintance of Congreve, who had been introduced to him by Southerne, and who had just written his first comedy, "The Old Bachelor." This play, revised and adapted by Dryden's experienced hand, had been received with marked approbation; but a second play, "The Double Dealer," a far superior performance, had been a comparative failure. Upon this, Dryden addressed to his young friend that eloquent "Epistle," in which he hails with rapture a disciple who had already outstepped his master, and contrasts his own desolate sunset with the glorious dawn — so runs this exquisite flattery — of one whom every grace and every muse adorned. He now commenced his translation of Virgil. It occupied him three years, and though the labor was great, it was lightened during its continuance by the hospitality of the Earl of Exeter, Sir William Bowyer, and of his cousin John Dryden; and, at its termination, by the contributions of his friend Dr. Knightly, Chetwood, and Addison. Chetwood furnished him with the "Life of Virgil" and with the "Preface to the Pastorals;" and Addison, then a young man at Oxford, supplied him with the arguments of the several books and with an "Essay on the Georgics." Into his bickerings and pecuniary difficulties with Tonson we cannot enter. They may be read at length in his correspondence, and have been enlarged upon with unprofitable minuteness by Malone and Mr. Christie. The work, originally suggested it is said by Motteaux, was impatiently expected by the public, who had all along evinced an universal interest in its progress. It appeared in July 1697, and from that day to this it has maintained a high place among English classics. Marred by haste, marred by miserable inequalities, marred by reckless carelessness, it is still a noble achievement. It is a work instinct with genius; but it is instinct not with the placid genius of Virgil, but with the impetuous energy of Dryden. The tender grace, the stately majesty, the subtle verbal mechanism of the most exquisite artist of antiquity will be sought in vain in its coarse and facile diction, in the persistent homeliness of its tone, in the rushing and somewhat turbid torrent of its narrative. It is indeed one of those works which will never cease to offend the taste and never fail to captivate the attention. The critic will continue to censure, but the world will continue to be delighted; and Dryden, we suspect, cared little about the suffrage of the former if he could secure the support of the latter. He was, as usual, careful to adorn it with dedications. The "Pastorals" were inscribed to Lord Clifford, the "Georgics" to the Earl of Chesterfield, the "Æneid" to the Marquis of Normanby. The latter dedication is a long discourse on epic poesy, and is one of the most pleasing of his critical essays. To "Virgil" he added a postscript, which it is impossible to read unmoved, though we may temper our pity with the reflection that if the veteran poet had so much to complain of, he had much still left to soothe and encourage him. Indeed, we are by no means sure that the undertone of discontent and querulousness which runs through most of his latter writings is not to be referred rather to the nervous irritability of his temperament than to any insensibility either on the part of the public or on the part of his personal friends. He complains bitterly of his poverty, and poor he undoubtedly was, yet he never could have wanted the necessities of life. He had, on the contrary, we suspect, a full share of its luxuries. He had constant engagements with Tonson; and Tonson, though mean, was honest and punctual in his payments. He had been paid for each one of the "Miscellanies;" he had been paid for "Juvenal;" he had received five hundred pounds for his "Eleanora." The Earl of Dorset had presented him with a large sum; he had a small property of his own, and the Lady Elizabeth was not dowerless. He had cleared at least thirteen hundred pounds by his "Virgil." He complains of ill-health, but what alleviations two of the most eminent surgeons of the day could afford him, he enjoyed in the unfee'd attention of Hobbes and Guibbons. He complains of the malice of his enemies, and yet he might have solaced himself by remembering his friends, for he could number among them some of the most illustrious, the most hospitable, and the most charming of his contemporaries. In that brilliant society which had sate round the Duke of Ormond he had held a conspicuous place,* and he had numbered among his intimate associates the elegant and sprightly Sedley, the brilliant Dorset, the refined and accomplished Sheffield. The country-seats of many of the nobility were open to him, and of their hospitality he frequently availed himself. At the house of his cousin, John Dryden, he was always welcome; and he could gossip with his old love Honor, who, it is said, repented of her early cruelty. At Cotterstock he could be happy in the society of his beautiful relative Mrs. Stewart, who seems to have taken an affectionate interest in his studies, and to have consulted with an anxious solicitude his tastes and his comforts. At the pleasant farm of his friend Jones of Ramsden, he could indulge in his favorite amusement of angling; and when the ill-health under which he latterly labored made it necessary for him to abandon the fishing-rod, he could still complacently discuss D'Urfey's bad angling, and his own superior powers while the Fates were kind. His manners, we are told, were not genteel; but the genial kindliness of his disposition seems to have made him welcome in every circle, and a man whose large sympathies embraced almost every branch of human learning then cultivated was not likely to be a dull companion.

But there was another scene with which Dryden will always be associated, and where we love to picture him. His short, stout figure, his florid, careworn face, his sleepy eyes, his "down look," his snuffy waistcoat, and his long, gray hair were for many years familiar to the frequenters of Wills' Coffee-House, in Russell Street, Covent Garden. There his supremacy had never been shaken. There, whatever had been the vicissitudes of his public and whatever may have been the annoyances of his private life, he could forget them amid loyal and devoted companions. Round his armchair, placed near the fire in winter and out on the balcony in summer, hung delighted listeners, — gay young Templars, eager to hear the reminiscences of one who could recall roistering nights with Etherege and Sedley, and Attic evenings with Waller and Cowley and Davenant; who could remember the wit-combats between Charles and Killigrew, and the sallies of Nell Gwynne when she was still mixing strong waters for the gentlemen; students from Oxford and Cambridge, who had quitted their books to catch a glimpse of the rival of Juvenal; clever lads, ambitious for a pinch from his snuff-box, which was, we are told, equal to a degree in the Academy of Wit; pleasant humorists, "honest Mr. Swan" the punster, Tom D'Urfey, Browne, and old Sir Roger L'Estrange; men distinguished for their skill in art and science, whom his fame had attracted thither, Ratcliffe, Knneller, and poor Closterman. There were those who had like himself achieved high literary distinction, but who were nevertheless proud to acknowledge him their teacher, Wycherly, Southerne, Congreve, and Vanbrugh; Thomas Creech, whose edition of Lucretius had placed him in the front rank of English scholars; William Walsh, "the best critic in the nation;" George Stepney, "whose juvenile poems had made gray authors blush;" young Colley Cibber, flushed with the success of his first comedy; and Samuel Garth, whose admirable mock-heroic poem is still remembered. There too were occasionally to be seen those younger men who were to carry on the work he was so soon to lay down, and who were to connect two great ages of English literature. Pope, indeed, was a child of twelve when his young eyes rested for the first and last time on his master; Addison was in his twenty-sixth year; Prior in his thirty-fourth; Hughes in his twenty-first; Rowe, residing on a comfortable patrimony in the Temple, was twenty-four; St. John, nineteen; Arbuthnot, then deep in his examination of Dr. Woodward's account of the deluge, thirty; Atterbury was thirty-five.

Dryden's labors were not destined to end with the translation of Virgil. He had still nearly three years of toil before him. They were years harassed by a painful disease, by malevolent opponents, and by pecuniary difficulties, but they were years rich in the production of the mellowest and most pleasing of his writings. Neither age nor sickness could damp his spirits or dim his genius. His energy was the energy of a youth renewed. He meditated a translation of the Iliad. He wrote a life of Lucian. He revised his Virgil, and he was engaged on less important works beside. He contracted with Tonson to supply him with ten thousand verses, and he added upwards of two thousand more. These verses form a volume which has for nearly two centuries been the delight of his countrymen, and on that volume the admirers of Dryden will always dwell with peculiar satisfaction. It was published, under the title of "Fables Ancient and Modern," in March 1700. Never were his great powers seen to better advantage, never were his most characteristic defects more happily in abeyance. What Chaucer had told in the ruder speech of the fourteenth century he undertook to tell again in a language which had been enriched and purified by three hundred years of literary activity, and of which he was himself the greatest living master. How he has told the story of "Palamon and Arcite," of "The Cock and the Fox," of "The Wife of Bath," and of "The Flower and the Leaf," is known to thousands who would probably have turned a deaf ear to the older poet. To the versions from Chaucer he added from the "Decamerone" the stories of "Sigismund and Guiscard," of "Theodore and Honoria," and of "Cymon and Iphigenia." So completely has he assimilated both the tone and style of Chaucer and Boccaccio to his own potent genius and majestic diction, that these works may be almost regarded not only as original compositions, but as compositions peculiarly Drydenian. We would willingly linger over the other pieces comprised in this delightful collection; over the prose preface so easy, so graceful, so rich with the mature harvest of a long life of study and reflection; over the exquisite beauty of the verses to the Duchess of Ormond; over that lyrical masterpiece which Scott, Byron, and Macaulay have pronounced to be the noblest ode in our language, which Voltaire preferred to the whole of Pindar, and which even now stands unrivalled for varied, rapid, masculine melody; over that epistle which the old poet labored with such care and which he pronounced to be one of the best of his later compositions; over the venerable portrait for which sate the saintly Ken, and which furnished Goldsmith with a model for his happiest delineation. But time and space fail, we must hurry to the end: —

Sciolzo il collo fumante et levo il morso, Però che spatio assai con esso ho corso.

"By the mercy of God," he wrote in February 1700, "I am come within twenty years of fourscore and eight a cripple in my limbs, but I think myself as vigorous as ever in the faculties of my soul." On the 13th of the following May he was lying in the Abbey among his illustrious predecessors, of whom he had never, during the course of his long life written or spoken one disloyal word. He died, it appears, somewhat suddenly. Enfeebled by a complication of diseases, he was attacked by erysipelas and gangrene, to which May 1st, 1700, he succumbed in spite of the anxious efforts of his medical attendants. A painful operation might have saved his life; he chose rather to resign it. "He received the notice of his approaching dissolution," writes one of those who stood round his death-bed, "with sweet submission and entire resignation to the Divine will, and he took so tender and obliging a farewell of his friends as none but himself could have expressed." His body lay in state for several days in the College of Physicians, and on May 13 was honored with a public funeral more imposing and magnificent than any which had been conceded to an English poet before. He was laid by the bones of Chaucer and Spenser, and Jonson and Cowley, not far from his old friend Davenant, and his old schoolmaster Busby in

SIR GIBBIE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

AUTHOR OF "MALCOLM," "THE MARQUIS OF LOSSIE," ETC.

CHAPTER XI.

JANET.

ONCE away, Gibbie had no thought of returning. Up Daurside was the sole propulsive force whose existence he recognized. But when he lifted his head from drinking at the stream, which was one of some size, and, greatly refreshed, looked up its channel, a longing seized him to know whence came the water of life which had thus restored him to bliss — how a burn first appears upon the earth. He thought it must come from the foot of a great conical mountain which seemed but a little way off. He would follow it up and see. So away he went, yielding at once, as was his wont, to the first desire that came. He had not trotted far along the bank, however, before, at a sharp turn it took, he saw that its course was a much longer one than he had imagined, for it turned from the mountain, and led up among the roots of other hills; while here in front of him, direct from the mountains, as it seemed, came down a smaller stream, and tumbled noisily into this. The larger burn would lead him too far from the Daur; he would follow the smaller one. He found a wide shallow place, crossed the larger, and went up the side of the smaller.

Doubly free after his imprisonment of the morning, Gibbie sped joyously along. Already nature, her largeness, her openness, her loveliness, her changefulness, her oneness in change, had begun to heal the child's heart, and comfort him in his disappointment with his kind. The stream he was now ascending ran along the claw of the mountain, which claw was covered with almost a forest of pine, protecting little colonies of less hardy timber. Its heavy green was varied with the pale delicate fringes of the fresh foliage of the larches, filling the air with aromatic breath. In the midst of their soft tufts, each tuft buttoned with a brown spot, hung the rich brown knobs and tassels of last year's cones. But the trees were all on the opposite side of the stream, and appeared to be on the other side of a wall. Where Gibbie was, the mountain-root was chiefly of rock, interspersed with heather.

A little way up the stream, he came to a bridge over it, closed at the farther end by iron gates between pillars, each surmounted by a wolf's head in stone. Over the gate on each side leaned a rowan-tree, with trunk and branches aged and gnarled amidst their fresh foliage. He crossed the burn to look through the gate, and pressed his face between the bars to get a better sight of a tame rabbit that had got out of its hutch. It sat, like a Druid white with age, in the midst of a gravel drive, much overgrown with moss, that led through a young larch wood, with here and there an ancient tree, lonely amidst the youth of its companions. Suddenly from the wood a large spaniel came bounding upon the rabbit. Gibbie gave a shriek, and the rabbit made one white flash into the wood, with the dog after him. He turned away sad at heart.

"Ilka cratur 'at can," he said to himself, "ates ilka cratur 'at canna!"

It was his first generalization, but not many years passed before he supplemented it with a conclusion:

"But the man 'at wad be a man, he maunna."

Resuming his journey of investigation, he trotted along the bank of the burn, farther and farther up, until he could trot no more, but must go clambering over great stones, or sinking to the knees in bog, patches of it red with iron, from which he would turn away with a shudder. Sometimes he walked in the water, along the bed of the burn itself; sometimes he had to scramble up its steep side, to pass one of the many little cataracts of its descent. Here and there a small silver birch, or a mountain ash, or a stunted fir-tree, looking like a wizard child, hung over the stream. Its banks were mainly of rock and heather, but now and then a small patch of cultivation intervened. Gibbie had no thought that he was gradually leaving the abodes of men behind him; he knew no reason why in ascending things should change, and be no longer as in plainer ways. For what he knew, there might be farm after farm, up and up forever, to the gates of heaven. But it would no longer have troubled him greatly to leave all houses behind him for a season. A great purple foxglove could do much now — just at this phase of his story, to make him forget — not the human face divine, but the loss of it. A lark aloft in the blue, from whose heart, as from a fountain whose roots were lost in the air its natural source, issued, not a stream, but an ever-spreading lake of song, was now more to him than the memory of any human voice he had ever heard, except his father's and Sambo's. But he was not yet quite out and away from the dwellings of his kind.

I may as well now make the attempt to give some idea of Gibbie's appearance, as he showed after so long wandering. Of dress he had hardly enough left to carry the name. Shoes, of course, he had none. Of the shape of trousers there remained nothing, except the division before and behind in the short petticoat to which they were reduced; and those rudimentary divisions were lost in the multitude of rents of equal apparent significance. He had never, so far as he knew, had a shirt upon his body; and his sole other garment was a jacket, so much too large for him, that to retain the use of his hands he had folded back the sleeves quite to his elbows. Thus reversed they became pockets, the only ones he had, and in them he stowed whatever provisions were given him of which he could not make immediate use — porridge and sowens and mashed potatoes included: they served him, in fact, like the first of the stomachs of those animals which have more than one — concerning which animals, by the way, I should much like to know what they were in "Pythagoras' time." His head had plentiful protection in its own natural crop — had never either had or required any other. That would have been of the gold order, had not a great part of its color been sunburnt, rained, and frozen out of it. All ways it pointed, as if surcharged with electric fluid, crowning him with a wildness which was in amusing contrast with the placidity of his countenance. Perhaps the resulting queerness in the expression of the little vagrant, a look as if he had been hunted till his body and soul were nearly ruffled asunder, and had already parted company in aim and interest, might have been the first thing to strike a careless observer. But if the heart was not a careless one, the eye would look again, and discover a stronger stillness than mere placidity — a sort of live peace abiding in that weather-beaten little face under its wild crown of human herbage. The features of it were well-shaped, and not smaller than proportioned to the small whole of his person. His eyes — partly, perhaps, because there was so little flesh upon his bones — were large, and in repose had much of a soft animal expression: there was not in them the look of You and I know. Frequently, too, when occasion roused the needful instinct, they had a sharp expression of outlook and readiness, which, without a trace of fierceness or greed, was yet equally animal. Only all the time there was present something else, beyond characterization: behind them something seemed to lie asleep. His hands and feet were small and childishly dainty, his whole body well-shaped and well put together — of which the style of his dress rather quashed the evidence.

Such was Gibbie to the eye, as he rose from Daurside to the last cultivated ground on the borders of the burn, and the highest dwelling on the mountain. It was the abode of a cottar, and was a dependency of the farm he had just left. The cottar was an old man of seventy; his wife was nearly sixty. They had reared stalwart sons and shapely daughters, now at service here and there in the valleys below — all ready to see God in nature, and recognize him in providence. They belonged to a class now, I fear, extinct, but once, if my love prejudice not my judgment too far, the glory and strength of Scotland: their little acres are now swallowed up in the larger farms.

It was a very humble dwelling, built of turf upon a foundation of stones, and roofed with turf and straw — warm, and nearly impervious to the searching airs of the mountain-side. One little window of a foot and a half square looked out on the universe. At one end stood a stack of peat, half as big at the cottage itself. All around it were huge rocks, some of them peaks whose masses went down to the very central fires, others only fragments that had rolled from above. Here and there a thin crop was growing in patches amongst them, the red gray stone lifting its baldness in spots numberless through the soft waving green. A few of the commonest flowers grew about the door, but there was no garden. The doorstep was live rock, and a huge projecting rock behind formed the back and a portion of one of the end walls. This latter rock had been the attraction to the site, because of a hollow in it, which now served as a dairy. For up there with them lived the last cow of the valley — the cow that breathed the loftiest air on all Daurside — a good cow, and gifted in feeding well upon little. Facing the broad south, and leaning against the hill, as against the bosom of God, sheltering it from the north and east, the cottage looked so high-humble, so still, so confident, that it drew Gibbie with the spell of heart-likeness. He knocked at the old, weather-beaten, shrunk and rent, but well-patched door. A voice, alive with the soft vibrations of thought and feeling, answered,

"Come yer wa's in, whae'er ye be."

Gibbie pulled the string that came through a hole in the door, so lifted the latch, and entered.

A woman sat on a creepie, her face turned over her shoulder to see who came. It was a gray face, with good simple features and clear gray eyes. The plentiful hair that grew low on her forehead, was half gray, mostly covered by a white cap with frills. A clean wrapper and apron, both of blue print, over a blue winsey petticoat, blue stockings, and strong shoes completed her dress. A book lay on her lap: always when she had finished her morning's work, and made her house tidy, she sat down to have her comfort, as she called it. The moment she saw Gibbie she rose. Had he been the angel Gabriel, come to tell her she was wanted at the throne, her attention could not have been more immediate or thorough. She was rather a little woman, and carried herself straight and light.

"Eh, ye puir ootcast!" she said, in the pitying voice of a mother, "hoo cam ye here sic a hicht? Cratur, ye hae left the warl' ahin' ye. What wad ye hae here? I hae naething."

Receiving no answer but one of the child's bewitching smiles, she stood for a moment regarding him, not in mere silence, but with a look of dumbness. She was a mother. One who is mother only to her own children is not a mother; she is only a woman who has borne children. But here was one of God's mothers.

Loneliness and silence, and constant homely familiarity with the vast simplicities of nature, assist much in the development of the deeper and more wonderful faculties of perception. The perceptions themselves may take this or that shape according to the education — may even embody themselves fantastically, yet be no less perceptions. Now the very moment before Gibbie entered, she had been reading the words of the Lord: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me;" and with her heart full of them she lifted her eyes and saw Gibbie. For one moment, with the quick flashing response of the childlike imagination of the Celt, she fancied she saw the Lord himself. Another woman might have made a more serious mistake, and seen there only a child. Often had Janet pondered, as she sat alone on the great mountain, while Robert was with the sheep, or she lay awake by his side at night, with the wind howling about the cottage, whether the Lord might not sometimes take a lonely walk to look after such solitary sheep of his flock as they, and let them know he had not lost sight of them, for all the ups and downs of the hills. There stood the child, and whether he was the Lord or not, he was evidently hungry. Ah! who could tell but the Lord was actually hungry in every one of his hungering little ones!

In the mean time — only it was but thought-time, not clock-time—Gibbie stood motionless in the middle of the floor, smiling his innocent smile, asking for nothing, hinting at nothing, but resting his wild calm eyes, with a sense of safety and mother-presence, upon the gray thoughtful face of the gazing woman. Her awe deepened; it seemed to descend upon her and fold her in as with a mantle. Involuntarily she bowed her head, and stepping to him took him by the hand, and led him to the stool she had left. There she made him sit, while she brought forward her table, white with scrubbing, took from a hole in the wall, and set upon it a platter of oatcakes, carried a wooden bowl to her dairy in the rock through a whitewashed door, and bringing it back filled, half with cream half with milk, set that also on the table. Then she placed a chair before it, and said, —

"Sit ye doon, an' tak. Gin ye war the Lord himsel', my bonny man, an' ye may be for oucht I ken, for ye luik puir an' despised eneuch, I cud gie nae better, for it's a' I hae to offer ye — 'cep it micht be an egg," she added, correcting herself, and turned and went out.

Presently she came back with a look of success, carrying two eggs, which, having raked out a quantity, she buried in the hot ashes of the peats, and left in front of the hearth to roast, while Gibbie went on eating the thick oatcake, sweet and substantial, and drinking such milk as the wildest imagination of town-boy could never suggest. It was indeed angels' food — food such as would have pleased the Lord himself after a hard day with axe and saw and plane, so good and simple and strong was it. Janet resumed her seat on the low three-legged stool, and took her knitting that he might feel neither that he was watched as he ate, nor that she was waiting for him to finish. Every other moment she gave a glance at the stranger she had taken in; but never a word he spoke, and the sense of mystery grew upon her.

Presently came a great bounce and scramble; the latch jumped up, the door flew open, and after a moment's pause, in came a sheep dog — a splendid thoroughbred collie, carrying in his mouth a tiny, long-legged lamb, which he dropped half dead in the woman's lap. It was a late lamb, born of a mother which had been sold from the hill, but had found her way back from a great distance, in order that her coming young one might have the privilege of being yeaned on the same spot where she had herself awaked to existence. Another moment, and her mba-a was heard approaching the door. She trotted in, and going up to Janet, stood contemplating the consequences of her maternal ambition. Her udder was full, but the lamb was too weak to suck. Janet rose, and going to the side of the room, opened the door of what might have seemed an old press, but was a bed. Folding back the counterpane, she laid the lamb in the bed, and covered it over. Then she got a caup, a wooden dish like a large saucer, and into it milked the ewe. Next she carried the caup to the bed; but what means she there used to enable the lamb to drink, the boy could not see, though his busy eyes and loving heart would gladly have taken in all.

In the mean time the collie, having done his duty by the lamb, and perhaps forgotten it, sat on his tail, and stared with his two brave trusting eyes at the little beggar that sat in the master's chair, and ate of the fat of the land. Oscar was a gentleman, and had never gone to school, therefore neither fancied nor had been taught that rags make an essential distinction, and ought to be barked at. Gibbie was a stranger, and therefore as a stranger Oscar gave him welcome — now and then stooping to lick the little brown feet that had wandered so far.

Like all wild creatures, Gibbie ate fast, and had finished everything set before him ere the woman had done feeding the lamb. Without a notion of the rudeness of it, his heart full of gentle gratitude, he rose and left the cottage. When Janet turned from her shepherding, there sat Oscar looking up at the empty chair.

"What's come o' the laddie?" she said to the dog, who answered with a low whine, half-regretful, half-interrogative. It may be he was only asking, like Esau, if there was no residuum of blessing for him also; but perhaps he too was puzzled what to conclude about the boy. Janet hastened to the door, but already Gibbie's nimble feet, refreshed to the point of every toe with the food he had just swallowed, had borne him far up the hill, behind the cottage, so that she could not get a glimpse of him. Thoughtfully she returned, and thoughtfully removed the remnants of the meal. She would then have resumed her Bible, but her hospitality had rendered it necessary that she should put on her girdle — not a cincture of leather upon her body, but a disc of iron on the fire, to bake thereon cakes ere her husband's return. It was a simple enough process, for the oatmeal wanted nothing but water and fire; but her joints had not yet got rid of the winter's rheumatism, and the labor of the baking was the hardest part of the sacrifice of her hospitality. To many it is easy to give what they have, but the offering of weariness and pain is never easy. They are indeed a true salt to salt sacrifices withal. That it was the last of her meal till her youngest boy should bring her a bag on his back from the mill the next Saturday, made no point in her trouble.

When at last she had done, and put the things away, and swept up the hearth, she milked the ewe, sent her out to nibble, took her Bible, and sat down once more to read. The lamb lay at her feet, with his little head projecting from the folds of her new flannel petticoat; and every time her eye fell from the book upon the lamb, she felt as if somehow the lamb was the boy that had eaten of her bread and drunk of her milk. After she had read a while, there came a change, and the lamb seemed the Lord himself, both lamb and shepherd, who had come to claim her hospitality. Then, divinely invaded with the dread lest in the fancy she should forget the reality, she kneeled down, and prayed to the friend of Martha and Mary and Lazarus, to come as he had said, and sup with her indeed.

Not for years and years had Janet been to church; she had long been unable to walk so far; and having no book but the best, and no help to understand it but the highest, her faith was simple, strong, real, all-pervading. Day by day she pored over the great gospel — I mean just the good news according to Matthew and Mark and Luke and John — until she had grown to be one of the noble ladies of the kingdom of heaven — one of those who inherit the earth, and are ripening to see God. For the Master, and his mind in hers, was her teacher. She had little or no theology save what He taught her, or rather what he is. And of any other than that, the less the better; for no theology, except the Theou logos, is worth the learning, no other being true. To know him is to know God. And he only who obeys him, does or can know him; he who obeys him cannot fail to know him. To Janet, Jesus Christ was no object of so-called theological speculation, but a living man, who somehow or other heard her when she called to him, and sent her the help she needed.

CHAPTER XII.

GLASHGAR.

Up and up the hill went Gibbie. The path ceased altogether; but when up is the word in one's mind — and up had grown almost a fixed idea with Gibbie — he can seldom be in doubt whether he is going right, even where there is no track. Indeed in all more arduous ways, men leave no track behind them, no finger-post — there is alway but the steepness. He climbed and climbed. The mountain grew steeper and barer as he went, and he became absorbed in his climbing. All at once he discovered that he had lost the stream, where or when he could not tell. All below and around him was red granite rock, scattered over with the chips and splinters detached by air and wind, water and stream, light and heat and cold. Glashgar was only about three thousand feet in height, but it was the steepest of its group — a huge rock that, even in the midst of masses, suggested solidity.

Not once while he ascended had the idea come to him that by and by he should be able to climb no farther. For aught he knew there were oatcakes and milk and sheep and collie dogs ever higher and higher still. Not until he actually stood upon the peak did he know that there was the earthly hitherto — the final obstacle of unobstancy, the everywhere which, from excess of perviousness, was to human foot impervious. The sun was about two hours towards the west, when Gibbie, his little legs almost as active as ever, surmounted the final slope. Running up like a child that would scale heaven, he stood on the bare round, the head of the mountain, and saw, with an invading shock of amazement, and at first of disappointment, that there was no going higher: in every direction the slope was downward. He had never been on the top of anything before. He had always been in the hollows of things. Now the whole world lay beneath him. It was cold; in some of the shadows lay snow — weary exile from both the sky and the sea and the ways of them — captive in the fetters of the cold — prisoner to the mountain top; but Gibbie felt no cold. In a glow with the climb, which at the last had been hard, his lungs filled with the heavenly air, and his soul with the feeling that he was above everything that was, uplifted on the very crown of the earth, he stood in his rags, a fluttering scarecrow, the conqueror of height, the discoverer of immensity, the monarch of space. Nobody knew of such marvel but him! Gibbie had never even heard the word poetry, but none the less was he the very stuff out of which poems grow, and now all the latent poetry in him was set a swaying and heaving — an ocean inarticulate because unobstructed — a might that could make no music, no thunder of waves, because it had no shore, no rocks of thought against which to break in speech. He sat down on the topmost point; and slowly, in the silence and the loneliness, from the unknown fountains of the eternal consciousness, the heart of the child filled. Above him towered infinitude, immensity, potent on his mind through shape to his eye in a soaring dome of blue — the one visible symbol informed and insouled of the eternal, to reveal itself thereby. In it, centre and life, lorded the great sun, beginning to cast shadows to the south and east from the endless heaps of the world, that lifted themselves in all directions. Down their sides ran the streams, down busily, hasting away through every valley to the Daur, which bore them back to the ocean-heart — through woods and meadows, park and waste, rocks and willowy marsh. Behind the valleys rose mountains; and behind the mountains, other mountains, more and more, each swathed in its own mystery; and beyond all hung the curtain-depth of the sky-gulf. Gibbie sat and gazed, and dreamed and gazed. The mighty city that had been to him the universe, was dropped and lost, like a thing that was now nobody's, in far indistinguishable distance; and he who had lost it had climbed upon the throne of the world. The air was still; when a breath awoke, it but touched his cheek like the down of a feather, and the stillness was there again. The stillness grew great, and slowly descended upon him. It deepened and deepened. Surely it would deepen to a voice! — it was about to speak! It was as if a great single thought was the substance of the silence, and was all over and around him, and closer to him than his clothes, than his body, than his hands. I am describing the indescribable, and compelled to make it too definite for belief. In colder speech, an experience had come to the child; a link in the chain of his development glided over the windlass of his uplifting; a change passed upon him. In after years, when Gibbie had the idea of God, when he had learned to think about him, to desire his presence, to believe that a will of love enveloped his will, as the brooding hen spreads her wings over her eggs — as often as the thought of God came to him, it came in the shape of the silence on the top of Glashgar.

As he sat, with his eyes on the peak he had just chosen from the rest as the loftiest of all within his sight, he saw a cloud begin to grow upon it. The cloud grew, and gathered, and descended, covering its sides as it went, until the whole was hidden. Then swiftly, as he gazed, the cloud opened as it were a round window in the heart of it, and through that he saw the peak again. The next moment a flash of blue lightning darted across the opening, and whether Gibbie really saw what follows, he never could be sure, but always after, as often as the vision returned, in the flash he saw a rock rolling down the peak. The clouds swept together, and the window closed. The next thing which in after years he remembered was, that the earth, mountains, meadows, and streams, had vanished; everything was gone from his sight, except a few yards around him of the rock upon which he sat, and the cloud that hid world and heaven. Then again burst forth the lightning. He saw no flash, but an intense cloud-illumination, accompanied by the deafening crack, and followed by the appalling roar and roll of the thunder. Nor was it noise alone that surrounded him, for, as if he were in the heart and nest of the storm, the very wind-waves that made the thunder rushed in driven bellowing over him, and had nearly swept him away. He clung to the rock with hands and feet. The cloud writhed and wrought and billowed and eddied with all the shapes of the wind, and seemed itself to be the furnace-womb in which the thunder was created. Was this then the voice into which the silence had been all the time deepening? had the presence thus taken form and declared itself? Gibbie had yet to learn that there is a deeper voice still into which such a silence may grow — and the silence not be broken. He was not dismayed. He had no conscience of wrong, and scarcely knew fear. It was an awful delight that filled his spirit. Mount Sinai was not to him a terror. To him there was no wrath in the thunder any more than in the greeting of the dog that found him in his kennel. To him there was no being in the sky so righteous as to be more displeased than pitiful over the wrongness of the children whom he had not yet got taught their childhood. Gibbie sat calm, awe-full, but, I imagine, with a clear forehead and smile-haunted mouth, while the storm roared and beat and flashed and ran about him. It was the very fountain of tempest. From the bare crest of the mountain the water poured down its sides, as if its springs were in the rock itself, and not in the bosom of the cloud above. The tumult at last seized Gibbie like an intoxication; he jumped to his feet, and danced and flung his arms about, as if he himself were the storm. But the uproar did not last long. Almost suddenly it was gone, as if, like a bird that had been flapping the ground in agony, it had at last recovered itself, and taken to its great wings and flown. The sun shone out clear, and in all the blue abyss not a cloud was to be seen, except far away to leeward, where one was spread like a banner in the lonely air, fleeting away, the ensign of the charging storm — bearing for its device a segment of the many-colored bow.

And now that its fierceness was over, the jubilation in the softer voices of the storm became audible. As the soul gives thanks for the sufferings that are overpast, offering the love and faith and hope which the pain has stung into fresh life, so from the sides of the mountain ascended the noise of the waters the cloud had left behind. The sun had kept on his journey; the storm had been no disaster to him; and now he was a long way down the west, and Twilight, in her gray cloak, would soon be tracking him from the east, like sorrow dogging delight. Gibbie, wet and cold, began to think of the cottage where he had been so kindly received, of the friendly face of its mistress, and her care of the lamb. It was not that he wanted to eat. He did not even imagine more eating, for never in his life had he eaten twice of the same charity in the same day. What he wanted was to find some dry hole in the mountain, and sleep as near the cottage as he could. So he rose and set out. But he lost his way; came upon one precipice after another, down which only a creeping thing could have gone; was repeatedly turned aside by torrents and swampy places; and when the twilight came, was still wandering upon the mountain. At length he found, as he thought, the burn along whose bank he had ascended in the morning, and followed it towards the valley, looking out for the friendly cottage. But the first indication of abode he saw, was the wall of the grounds of the house through whose gate he had looked in the morning. He was then a long way from the cottage, and not far from the farm; and the best thing he could do was to find again the barn where he had slept so well the night before. This was not very difficult even in the dusky night. He skirted the wall, came to his first guide, found and crossed the valley-stream, and descended it until he thought he recognized the slope of clover down which he had run in the morning. He ran up the brae, and there were the solemn cones of the corn-ricks between him and the sky! A minute more and he had crept through the cat-hole, and was feeling about in the dark barn. Happily the heap of straw was not yet removed. Gibbie shot into it like a mole, and burrowed to the very centre, there coiled himself up, and imagined himself lying in the heart of the rock on which he sat during the storm and listening to the thunder winds over his head. The fancy enticed the sleep which before was ready enough to come, and he was soon far stiller than Ariel in the cloven pine of Sycorax.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CEILING.

HE might have slept longer the next morning, for there was no threshing to wake him, in spite of the cocks in the yard that made it their business to rouse sleepers to their work, had it not been for another kind of cock inside him, which bore the same relation to food that the others bore to light. He peeped first, then crept out. All was still except the voices of those same prophet cocks, crying in the wilderness of the yet sunless world; a moo now and then from the byres; and the occasional stamp of a great hoof in the stable. Gibbie clambered up into the loft, and turning the cheeses about until he came upon the one he had gnawed before, again attacked it, and enlarged considerably the hole he had already made in it. Rather dangerous food it was, perhaps, eaten in that unmitigated way, for it was made of skimmed milk, and was very dry and hard; but Gibbie was a powerful little animal, all bones and sinews, small hard muscle, and faultless digestion. The next idea naturally rising was the burn; he tumbled down over the straw heap to the floor of the barn, and made for the cat-hole. But the moment he put his head out, he saw the legs of a man: the farmer was walking through his ricks, speculating on the money they held. He drew back, and looked round to see where best he could betake himself should he come in. He spied thereupon a ladder leaning against the end-wall of the barn, opposite the loft and the stables, and near it in the wall a wooden shutter, like the door of a little cupboard. He got up the ladder, and opening the shutter, which was fastened only with a button, found a hole in the wall, through which popping his head too carelessly, he knocked from a shelf some piece of pottery, which fell with a great crash on a paved floor. Looking after it, Gibbie beheld below him a rich prospect of yellow-white pools ranged in order on shelves. They reminded him of milk, but were of a different color. As he gazed, a door opened hastily, with sharp clicking latch, and a woman entered, ejaculating, "Care what set that cat!" Gibbie drew back, lest in her search for the cat she might find the culprit. She looked all round, muttering such truncated imprecations as befitted the mouth of a Scotch-woman; but as none of her milk was touched, her wrath gradually abated; she picked up the fragments, and withdrew.

Thereupon Gibbie ventured to reconnoitre a little farther, and popping in his head again, saw that the dairy was open to the roof, but the door was in a partition which did not run so high. The place from which the woman entered was ceiled, and the ceiling rested on the partition between it and the dairy; so that, from a shelf level with the hole, he could easily enough get on the top of the ceiling. This, urged by the instinct of the homeless to understand their surroundings, he presently effected, by creeping like a cat along the top shelf.

The ceiling was that of the kitchen, and was merely of boards, which, being old and shrunken, had here and there a considerably crack between two, and Gibbie, peeping through one after another of these cracks, soon saw several things he did not understand. Of such was a barrel-churn, which he took for a barrel-organ, and welcomed as a sign of civilization. The woman was sweeping the room towards the hearth, where the peat fire was already burning, with a great pot hanging over it, covered with a wooden lid. When the water in it was hot, she poured it into a large wooden dish, in which she began to wash other dishes, thus giving the observant Gibbie his first notion of housekeeping. Then she scoured the deal table, dusted the bench and the chairs, arranged the dishes on shelves and rack, except a few which she placed on the table, put more water on the fire, and disappeared in the dairy. Thence presently she returned, carrying a great jar, which, to Gibbie's astonishment, having lifted a lid in the top of the churn, she emptied into it; he was not, therefore, any farther astonished, when she began to turn the handle vigorously, that no music issued. As to what else might be expected, Gibbie had not even a mistaken idea. But the butter came quickly that morning, and then he did have another astonishment, for he saw a great mass of something half-solid tumbled out where he had seen a liquid poured in — nor that alone for the liquid came out again too! But when at length he saw the mass, after being well washed, moulded into certain shapes, he recognized it as butter, such as he had seen in the shops, and had now and then tasted on the piece given him by some more than usually generous housekeeper. Surely he had wandered into a region of plenty! Only now, when he saw the woman busy and careful, the idea of things in the country being a sort of common property began to fade from his mind, and the perception to wake that they were as the things in the shops, which must not be touched without first paying money for them over a counter.

The butter-making brought to a successful close, the woman proceeded to make porridge for the men's breakfast, and with hungry eyes Gibbie watched that process next. The water in the great pot boiling like a wild volcano, she took handful after handful of meal from a great wooden dish (called a bossie) and threw it into the pot, stirring as she threw, until the mess was presently so thick that she could no more move the spurtle in it; and scarcely had she emptied it into another great wooden bowl (called a bicker) when Gibbie heard the heavy tramp of the men crossing the yard to consume it.

For the last few minutes, Gibbie's nostrils — alas! not Gibbie — had been regaled with the delicious odor of the boiling meal; and now his eyes had their turn — but still, alas, not Gibbie! Prostrate on the ceiling he lay and watched the splendid spoonfuls tumble out of sight into the capacious throats of four men: all took their spoonfuls from the same dish, but each dipped his spoonful into his private caup of milk, ere he carried it to his mouth. A little apart sat a boy, whom the woman seemed to favor, having provided him with a plateful of porridge by himself, but the fact was, four were as many as could bicker comfortably, or with any chance of fair play. The boy's countenance greatly attracted Gibbie. It was a long, solemn face, but the eyes were bright-blue and sparkling; and when he smiled, which was not very often, it was a good and meaningful smile.

When the meal was over, and he saw the little that was left, with all the drops of milk from the caups, tumbled into a common receptacle, to be kept, he thought, for the next meal, poor Gibbie felt very empty and forsaken. He crawled away sad at heart, with nothing before him except a drink of water at the burn. He might have gone to the door of the house, in the hope of a bit of cakes, but, now that he had seen something of the doings in the house and of the people who lived in it — as soon, that is, as he had looked embodied ownership in the face — he began to be aware of its claims, and the cheese he had eaten to lie heavy upon his spiritual stomach: he had done that which he would not have done before leaving the city. Carefully he crept across the ceiling, his head hanging, like a dog scolded of his master, carefully along the shelf of the dairy, and through the opening in the wall, quickly down the ladder, and through the cat-hole in the barn door. There was no one in the corn-yard now, and he wandered about among the ricks looking, with little hope, for something to eat. Turning a corner he came upon a henhouse — and there was a crowd of hens and half-grown chickens about the very dish into which he had seen the remnants of the breakfast thrown, all pecking billfuls out of it. As I may have said before, he always felt at liberty to share with the animals, partly, I suppose, because he saw they had no scrupulosity or ceremony amongst themselves; so he dipped his hand into their dish: why should not the bird of the air now and then peck with the more respectable of the barn-door, if only to learn his inferiority? Greatly refreshed, he got up from among the hens, scrambled over the dry-stone-wall, and trotted away to the burn.

CHAPTER XIV.

HORNIE.

It was now time he should resume his journey up Daurside, and he set out to follow the burn that he might regain the river. It led him into a fine meadow, where a number of cattle were feeding. The meadow was not fenced — little more than marked off, indeed, upon one side, from a field of growing corn, by a low wall of earth, covered with moss and grass and flowers. The cattle were therefore herded by a boy, whom Gibbie recognized even in the distance as him by whose countenance he had been so much attracted when, like an old deity on a cloud, he lay spying through the crack in the ceiling. The boy was reading a book, from which every now and then he lifted his eyes to glance around him, and see whether any of the cows or heifers or stirks were wandering beyond their pasture of rye-grass and clover. Having them all before him, therefore no occasion to look behind, he did not see Gibbie approaching. But as soon as he seemed thoroughly occupied, a certain black cow, with short sharp horns and a wicked look, which had been gradually, as was her wont, edging nearer and nearer to the corn, turned suddenly and ran for it, jumped the dyke, and plunging into a mad revelry of greed, tore and devoured with all the haste not merely of one insecure, but of one that knew she was stealing. Now Gibbie had been observant enough during his travels to learn that this was against the law and custom of the country — that it was not permitted to a cow to go into a field where there were no others — and like a shot he was after the black marauder. The same instant the herd-boy too, lifting his eyes from his book, saw her, and springing to his feet, caught up his great stick, and ran also: he had more than reason to run, for he understood only too well the dangerous temper of the cow, and saw that Gibbie was a mere child, and unarmed — an object most provocative of attack to Hornie — so named, indeed, because of her readiness to use the weapons with which Nature had provided her. She was in fact a malicious cow, and but that she was a splendid milker, would have been long ago fatted up and sent to the butcher. The boy as he ran full speed to the rescue, kept shouting to warn Gibbie from his purpose, but Gibbie was too intent to understand the sounds he uttered, and supposed them addressed to the cow. With the fearless service that belonged to his very being, he ran straight at Hornie, and, having nothing to strike her with, flung himself against her with a great shove towards the dyke. Hornie, absorbed in her delicious robbery, neither heard nor saw before she felt him, and, startled by the sudden attack, turned tail. It was but for a moment. In turning, she caught sight of her ruler, sceptre in hand, at some little distance, and turned again, either to have another mouthful, or in the mere instinct to escape him. Then she caught sight of the insignificant object that had scared her, and in contemptuous indignation lowered her head between her fore-feet, and was just making a rush at Gibbie, when the herd came up, and with a storm of fiercest blows, delivered with the full might of his arm, drove her in absolute rout back into the meadow. Drawing himself up in the unconscious majesty of success, Donal Grant looked down upon Gibbie, but with eyes of admiration.

"Haith, cratur!" he said, "ye're mair o' a man nor ye'll luik this saven year! What garred ye rin upo' the deevil's verra horns that gait?"

Gibbie stood smiling.

"Gien't hadna been for my club we wad baith be ower the mune, gain this time. What ca' they ye, man?"

Still Gibbie only smiled.

"Whaur come ye frae? — Wha's yer fowk? — Whaur div ye bide? — Haena ye a tongue i' yer heid, ye rascal?"

Gibbie burst out laughing, and his eyes sparkled and shone: he was delighted with the herd-boy, and it was so long since he had heard human speech addressed to himself!

"The cratur's feel (foolish)!" concluded Donal to himself pityingly. "Puir thing! puir thing!" he added aloud, and laid his hand on Gibbie's head.

It was the first touch of kindness Gibbie had received since he was the dog's guest: had he been acquainted with the bastard emotion of self-pity, he would have wept; as he was unaware of hardship in his lot, discontent in his heart, or discord in his feeling, his emotion was one of unmingled delight, and embodied itself in a perfect smile.

"Come, cratur, an' I'll gie ye a piece: ye'll aiblins un'erstan' that!" said Donal, as he turned to leave the corn for the grass, where Hornie was eating with the rest like the most innocent of hum'le (hornless) animals. Gibbie obeyed, and followed, as, with slow step and downbent face, Donal led the way. For he had tucked his club under his arm, and already his greedy eyes were fixed on the book he had carried all the time, nor did he take them from it until, followed in full and patient content by Gibbie, he had almost reached the middle of the field, some distance from Hornie and her companions, when, stopping abruptly short, he began without lifting his head to cast glances on this side and that.

"I houp nane o' them's swallowed my nepkin!" he said musingly. "I'm no sure whaur I was sittin'. I hae my place i' the beuk, but I doobt I hae tint my place i' the gerse."

Long before he had ended, for he spoke with utter deliberation, Gibbie was yards away, flitting hither and thither like a butterfly. A minute more and Donal saw him pounce upon his bundle, which he brought to him in triumph.

"Fegs! ye're no the gowk I took ye for," said Donal meditatively.

Whether Gibbie took the remark for a compliment, or merely was gratified that Donal was pleased, the result was a merry laugh.

The bundle had in it a piece of hard cheese, such as Gibbie had already made acquaintance with, and a few quarters of cakes. One of these Donal broke in two, gave Gibbie the half, replaced the other, and sat down again to his book — this time with his back against the fell-dyke dividing the grass from the corn. Gibbie seated himself, like a Turk, with his bare legs crossed under him, a few yards off, where, in silence and absolute content, he ate his piece, and gravely regarded him. His human soul had of late been starved, even more than his body — and that from no fastidiousness; and it was paradise again to be in such company. Never since his father's death had he looked on a face that drew him as Donal's. It was fair of complexion by nature, but the sun had burned it brown, and it was covered with freckles. Its forehead was high, with a mass of foxy hair over it, and under it two keen hazel eyes, in which the green predominated over the brown. Its nose was long and solemn, over a well-made mouth, which rarely smiled, but not unfrequently trembled with emotion — over his book. For age, Donal was getting towards fifteen, and was strongly built, and well grown. A general look of honesty, and an attractive expression of reposeful friendliness pervaded his whole appearance. Conscientious in regard to his work, he was yet in danger of forgetting his duty for minutes together over his book. The chief evil that came of it was an occasional inroad on the corn, and many were Donal's self-reproaches ere he fell asleep when that had taken place during the day. He knew his master would threaten him with dismissal if he came upon him reading in the field, but he knew also his master was well aware that he did read, and that it was possible to read and yet herd well. It was easy enough in this same meadow: on one side ran the Lorrie; on another was a stone wall; and on the third a ditch; only the cornfield lay virtually unprotected, and there he had to be himself the boundary. And now he sat leaning against the dyke, as if he held so a position of special defence; but he knew well enough that the dullest calf could outflank him, and invade, for a few moments at the least, the forbidden pleasure-ground. He had gained an ally however, whose faculty and faithfulness he little knew yet. For Gibbie had begun to comprehend the situation. He could not comprehend why or how any one should be absorbed in a book, for all he knew of books was from his one morning of dame-schooling; but he could comprehend that, if one's attention were so occupied, it must be a great vex to be interrupted continually by the ever-waking desires of his charge after dainties. Therefore, as Donal watched his book, Gibbie for Donal's sake watched the herd, and, as he did so, gently possessed himself of Donal's club. Nor had many minutes passed before Donal, raising his head to look, saw the curst cow again in the green corn, and Gibbie manfully encountering her with the club, hitting her hard upon head and horns, and deftly avoiding every rush she made at him.

"Gie her't upo' the nose," Donal shouted in terror, as he ran full speed to his aid, abusing Hornie in terms of fiercest vituperation.

But he needed not have been so apprehensive. Gibbie heard and obeyed, and the next moment Hornie had turned tail, and was fleeing back to the safety of the lawful meadow.

"Hech, cratur! but ye maun be come o' fechtin' fowk!" said Donal, regarding him with fresh admiration.

Gibbie laughed; but he had been sorely put to it, and the big drops were coursing fast down his sweet face. Donal took the club from him, and rushing at Hornie, belabored her well, and drove her quite to the other side of the field. He then returned and resumed his book, while Gibbie again sat down near by, and watched both Donal and his charge — the keeper of both herd and cattle. Surely Gibbie had at last found his vocation on Daurside, with both man and beast for his special care!

By and by Donal raised his head once more, but this time it was to regard Gibbie and not the nowt. It had gradually sunk into him that the appearance and character of the cratur were peculiar. He had regarded him as a little tramp, whose people were not far off, and who would soon get tired of herding and rejoin his companions; but while he read, a strange feeling of the presence of the boy had, in spite of the witchery of his book, been growing upon him. He seemed to feel his eyes without seeing them; and when Gibbie rose to look how the cattle were distributed, he became vaguely uneasy lest the boy should be going away. For already he had begun to feel him a humble kind of guardian angel. He had already that day, through him, enjoyed a longer spell of his book, than any day since he had been herd at the Mains of Glashruach. And now the desire had come to regard him more closely.

For a minute or two he sat and gazed at him. Gibbie gazed at him in return, and in his eyes the herd-boy looked the very type of power and gentleness. How he admired even his suit of small-ribbed, greenish-colored corduroy, the ribs much rubbed and obliterated! Then his jacket had round brass buttons! his trousers had patches instead of holes at the knees! their short legs revealed warm woollen stockings! and his shoes had their soles full of great broad-headed iron tacks! while on his head he had a small round blue bonnet with a red tuft! The little outcast, on the other hand, with his loving face and pure clear eyes, bidding fair to be naked altogether before long, woke in Donal a divine pity, a tenderness like that nestling at the heart of womanhood. The neglected creature could surely have no mother to shield him from frost and wind and rain. But a strange thing was, that out of this pitiful tenderness seemed to grow, like its blossom, another unlike feeling — namely, that he was in the presence of a being of some order superior to his own, one to whom he would have to listen if he spoke, who knew more than he would tell. But then Donal was a Celt, and might be a poet, and the sweet stillness of the child's atmosphere made things bud in his imagination.

My reader must think how vastly, in all his poverty, Donal was Gibbie's superior in the social scale. He earned his own food and shelter, and nearly four pounds a year besides; lived as well as he could wish, dressed warm, was able for his work, and imagined it no hardship. Then he had a father and mother whom he went to see every Saturday, and of whom he was as proud as son could be — a father who was the priest of the family, and fed sheep; a mother who was the prophetess, and kept the house ever an open refuge for her children. Poor Gibbie earned nothing — never had earned more than a penny at a time in his life, and had never dreamed of having a claim to such penny. Nobody seemed to care for him, give him anything, do anything for him. Yet there he sat before Donal's eyes, full of service, of smiles, of contentment.

Donal took up his book, but laid it down again and gazed at Gibbie. Several times he tried to return to his reading, but as often resumed his contemplation of the boy. At length it struck him as something more than shyness would account for, that he had not yet heard a word from the lips of the child, even when running after the cows. He must watch him more closely.

By this it was his dinner time. Again he untied his handkerchief, and gave Gibbie what he judged a fair share for his bulk — namely, about a third of the whole. Philosopher as he was, however, he could not help sighing a little when he got to the end of his diminished portion. But he was better than comforted when Gibbie offered him all that yet remained to him; and the smile with which he refused it made Gibbie as happy as a prince would like to be. What a day it had been for Gibbie! A whole human being, and some five and twenty four-legged creatures besides to take care of!

After their dinner, Donal gravitated to his book, and Gibbie resumed the executive. Some time had passed when Donal, glancing up, saw Gibbie lying flat on his chest, staring at something in the grass. He slid himself quietly nearer, and discovered it was a daisy — one by itself alone: there were not many in the field. Like a mother leaning over her child, he was gazing at it. The daisy was not a cold white one, neither was it a red one; it was just a perfect daisy: it looked as if some gentle hand had taken it, while it slept and its starpoints were all folded together, and dipped them — just a tiny touchy dip, in a molten ruby, so that, when it opened again, there was its crown of silver pointed with rubies all about its golden sun-heart.

"He's been readin' Burns!" said Donal. He forgot that the daisies were before Burns, and that he himself had loved them before ever he heard of him. Now, he had not heard of Chaucer who made love to the daisies four hundred years before Burns. — God only knows what gospellers they have been on his middle-earth. All its days his daisies have been coming and going, and they are not old yet, nor have worn out yet their lovely garments, though they patch and darn just as little as they toil and spin.

"Can ye read, cratur?" asked Donal.

Gibbie shook his head.

"Canna ye speyk, man?"

Again Gibbie shook his head.

"Can ye hear?"

Gibbie burst out laughing. He knew that he heard better than other people.

"Hearken till this than," said Donal. He took his book from the grass, and read, in a chant, or rather in a lilt, the Danish ballad of Chyld Dyring, as translated by Sir Walter Scott. Gibbie's eyes grew wider and wider as he listened; their pupils dilated, and his lips parted: it seemed as if his soul were looking out of door and windows at once — but a puzzled soul that understood nothing of what it saw. Yet plainly, either the sounds, or the thought-matter vaguely operative beyond the line where intelligence begins, or, it may be, the sparkle of individual word or phrase islanded in a chaos of rhythmic motion, wrought somehow upon him, for his attention was fixed as by a spell. When Donal ceased, he remained open-mouthed and motionless for a time; then, drawing himself slidingly over the grass to Donal's feet, he raised his head and peeped above his knees at the book. A moment only he gazed, and drew back with a hungry sigh: he had seen nothing in the book like what Donal had been drawing from it — as if one should look into the well of which he had just drank, and see there nothing but dry pebbles and sand! The wind blew gentle, the sun shone bright, all nature closed softly round the two, and the soul whose children they were was nearer than the one to the other, nearer than sun or wind or daisy or Chyld Dyring. To his amazement Donal saw the tears gathering in Gibbie's eyes. He was as one who gazes into the abyss of God's will — sees only the abyss, cannot see the will, and weeps. The child in whom neither cold nor hunger nor nakedness nor loneliness could move a throb of self-pity, was moved to tears that a loveliness, strange and unintelligible to him, had passed away, and he had no power to call it back.

"Wad ye like to hear't again?" asked Donal, more than half understanding him instinctively.

Gibbie's face answered with a flash, and Donal read the poem again, and Gibbie's delight returned greater than before, for now something like a dawn began to appear among the cloudy words. Donal read it a third time, and closed the book, for it was almost the hour for driving the cattle home. He had never yet seen, and perhaps never again did see such a look of thankful devotion on human countenance as met his lifted eyes.

How much Gibbie even then understood of the lovely eerie old ballad, it is impossible for me to say. Had he a glimmer of the return of the buried mother? Did he think of his own? I doubt if he had ever thought that he had a mother; but he may have associated the tale with his father, and the boots he was always making for him. Certainly it was the beginning of much. But the waking up of a human soul to know itself in the mirror of its thoughts and feelings, its loves and delights, oppresses me with so heavy a sense of marvel and inexplicable mystery, that when I imagine myself such as Gibbie then was, I cannot imagine myself coming awake. I can hardly believe that, from being such as Gibbie was the hour before he heard the ballad, I should ever have come awake. Yet here I am, capable of pleasure unspeakable from that and many another ballad, old and new! somehow, at one time or another, or at many times in one, I have at last come awake! When, by slow filmy unveilings, life grew clearer to Gibbie, and he not only knew, but knew that he knew, his thoughts always went back to that day in the meadow with Donal Grant as the beginning of his knowledge of beautiful things in the world of man. Then first he saw nature reflected, Narcissus-like, in the mirror of her humanity, her highest self. But when or how the change in him began, the turn of the balance, the first push towards life of the evermore invisible germ — of that he remained, much as he wondered, often as he searched his consciousness, as ignorant to the last as I am now. Sometimes he was inclined to think the glory of the new experience must have struck him dazed, and that was why he could not recall what went on in him at the time.

Donal rose and went driving the cattle home, and Gibbie lay where he had again thrown himself upon the grass. When he lifted his head, Donal and the cows had vanished.

Donal looked all round as he left the meadow, and seeing the boy nowhere, concluded he had gone to his people. The impression he had made upon him faded a little during the evening. For when he reached home and had watered them, he had to tie up every animal in its stall, and make it comfortable for the night; next, eat his own supper; then learn a proposition of Euclid, and go to bed.

CHAPTER XV.

DONAL GRANT.

HUNGERING minds come of peasant people as often as of any, and have appeared in Scotland as often, I fancy, as in any nation; not every Scotsman, therefore, who may not himself have known one like Donal, will refuse to believe in such a herd-laddie. Besides, there are still those in Scotland, as well as in other nations, to whom the simple and noble, not the commonplace and selfish, is the true type of humanity. Of such as Donal, whether English or Scotch, is the class coming up to preserve the honor and truth of our Britain, to be the oil of the lamp of her life, when those who place her glory in knowledge or in riches, shall have passed from her history as the smoke from her chimneys.

Cheap as education then was in Scotland, the parents of Donal Grant had never dreamed of sending a son to college. It was difficult for them to save even the few quarterly shillings that paid the fees of the parish schoolmaster: for Donal, indeed, they would have failed even in this, but for the help his brothers and sisters afforded. After he left school, however, and got a place as herd, he fared better than any of the rest, for at the Mains he found a friend and helper in Fergus Duff, his master's second son, who was then at home from college, which he had now attended two winters. Partly that he was delicate in health, partly that he was something of a fine gentleman, he took no share with his father and elder brother in the work of the farm, although he was at the Mains from the beginning of April to the end of October. He was a human kind of soul notwithstanding, and would have been much more of a man if he had thought less of being a gentleman. He had taken a liking to Donal, and having found in him a strong desire after every kind of knowledge of which he himself had any share, had sought to enliven the tedium of an existence rendered not a little flabby from want of sufficient work, by imparting to him of the treasures he had gathered. They were not great, and he could never have carried him far, for he was himself only a respectable student, not a little lacking in perseverance, and given to dreaming dreams of which he was himself the hero. Happily, however, Donal was of another sort, and from the first needed but to have the outermost shell of a thing broken for him, and that Fergus could do: by-and-by Donal would break a shell for himself.

But perhaps the best thing Fergus did for him was the lending him books. Donal had an altogether unappeasable hunger after every form of literature with which he had as yet made acquaintance, and this hunger Fergus fed with the books of the house, and many besides of such as he purchased or borrowed for his own reading — these last chiefly poetry. But Fergus Duff, while he revelled in the writings of certain of the poets of the age, was incapable of finding poetry for himself in the things around him: Donal Grant, on the other hand, while he seized on the poems Fergus lent him, with an avidity even greater than his, received from the nature around him influences similar to those which exhaled from the words of the poet. In some sense, then, Donal was original; that is, he received at first hand what Fergus required to have "put on" him, to quote Celia, in As you like it, "as pigeons feed their young." Therefore, fiercely as it would have harrowed the pride of Fergus to be informed of the fact, he was in the kingdom of art only as one who ate of what fell from the table, while his father's herd-boy was one of the family. This was as far from Donal's thought, however, as from that of Fergus; the condescension, therefore, of the latter did not impair the gratitude for which the former had such large reason; and Donal looked up to Fergus as to one of the lords of the world.

To find himself now in the reversed relation of superior and teacher to the little outcast, whose whole worldly having might be summed in the statement that he was not absolutely naked, woke in Donal an altogether new and strange feeling; yet gratitude to his master had but turned itself round, and become tenderness to his pupil.

After Donal left him in the field, and while he was ministering, first to his beasts and then to himself, Gibbie lay on the grass, as happy as child could well be. A loving hand laid on his feet or legs would have found them like ice; but where was the matter so long as he never thought of them? He could have supped a huge bicker of sowens, and eaten a dozen potatoes; but of what mighty consequence is hunger, so long as it neither absorbs the thought, nor causes faintness? The sun, however, was going down behind a great mountain, and its huge shadow, made of darkness, and haunted with cold, came sliding across the river, and over valley and field, nothing staying its silent wave, until it covered Gibbie with the blanket of the dark, under which he could not long forgot that he was in a body to which cold is unfriendly. At the first breath of the night-wind that came after the shadow, he shivered, and starting to his feet, began to trot, increasing his speed until he was scudding up and down the field like a wild thing of the night, whose time was at hand, waiting until the world should lie open to him. Suddenly he perceived that the daisies, which all day long had been full-facing the sun, like true souls confessing to the father of them, had folded their petals together to points, and held them like spear-heads tipped with threatening crimson, against the onset of the night and her shadows, while within its white cone each folded-in the golden heart of its life, until the great father should return, and, shaking the wicked out of the folds of the night, render the world once more safe with another glorious day. Gibbie gazed and wondered; and while he gazed — slowly, glidingly, back to his mind came the ghost-mother of the ballad, and in every daisy he saw her folding her neglected orphans to her bosom, while the darkness and the misery rolled by defeated. He wished he knew a ghost that would put her arms round him. He must have had a mother once, he supposed, but he could not remember her, and of course she must have forgotten him. He did not know that about him were folded the everlasting arms of the great, the one Ghost, which is the Death of death — the life and soul of all things and all thoughts. The Presence, indeed, was with him and he felt it, but he knew it only as the wind and shadow, the sky and closed daisies: in all these things and the rest it took shape that it might come near him. Yea, the Presence was in his very soul, else he could never have rejoiced in friend, or desired ghost to mother him: still he knew not the Presence. But it was drawing nearer and nearer to his knowledge — even in sun and air and night and cloud, in beast and flower and herd-boy, until at last it would reveal itself to him, in him, as Life Himself. Then the man would know that in which the child had rejoiced. The stars came out, to Gibbie the heavenly herd, feeding at night, and gathering gold in the blue pastures. He saw them looking up from the grass where he had thrown himself to gaze more closely at the daisies; and the sleep that pressed down his eyelids seemed to descend from the spaces between the stars. But it was too cold that night to sleep in the fields, when he knew where to find warmth. Like a fox into his hole, the child would creep into the corner where God had stored sleep for him: back he went to the barn, gently trotting, and wormed himself through the cat-hole.

The straw was gone! But he remembered the hay. And happily, for he was tired, there stood the ladder against the loft. Up he went, nor turned aside to the cheese; but sleep was common property still. He groped his way forward through the dark loft, until he found the hay, when at once he burrowed into it like a sandfish into the wet sand. All night the white horse, a glory vanished in the dark, would be close to him, behind the thin partition of boards. He could hear his every breath as he slept, and to the music of it, audible sign of companionship, he fell fast asleep, and slept until the waking horses woke him.

CHAPTER XVI.

APPRENTICESHIP.

He scrambled out on the top of the hay, and looked down on the beautiful creature below him, dawning radiant again with the morning, as it issued undimmed from the black bosom of the night. He was not, perhaps, just so well groomed as white steed might be; it was not a stable where they kept a blue-bag for their gray horses; but to Gibbie's eyes he was so pure, that he began, for the first time in his life, to doubt whether he was himself quite as clean as he ought to be. He did not know, but he would make an experiment for information when he got down to the burn. Meantime was there nothing he could do for the splendid creature? From above, leaning over, he filled his rack with hay; but he had eaten so much grass the night before, that he would not look at it, and Gibbie was disappointed. What should he do next? The thing he would like best would be to look through the ceiling again, and watch the woman at her work. Then, too, he would again smell the boiling porridge, and the burning of the little sprinkles of meal that fell into the fire. He dragged, therefore, the ladder to the opposite end of the barn, and gradually, with no little effort, raised it against the wall. Carefully he crept through the hole, and softly round the shelf, the dangerous part of the pass, and so on to the ceiling, whence he peeped once more down into the kitchen. His precautions had been so far unnecessary, for as yet it lay unvisited, as witnessed by its disorder. Suddenly came to Gibbie the thought that here was a chance for him — here a path back to the world. Rendered daring by the eagerness of his hope, he got again upon the shelf, and with every precaution lest he should even touch a milk-pan, descended by the lower shelves to the floor. There finding the door only latched, he entered the kitchen, and proceeded to do everything he had seen the woman do, as nearly in her style as he could. He swept the floor, and dusted the seats, the window-sill, the table, with an apron he found left on a chair, then arranged everything tidily, roused the rested fire, and had just concluded that the only way to get the great pot full of water upon it, would be to hang first the pot on the chain, and then fill it with the water, when his sharp ears caught sounds and then heard approaching feet. He darted into the dairy, and in a few seconds, for he was getting used to the thing now, had clambered upon the ceiling, and was lying flat across the joists, with his eyes to the most commanding crack he had discovered: he was anxious to know how his service would be received. When Jean Mavor — she was the farmer's half-sister — opened the door, she stopped short and stared: the kitchen was not as she had left it the night before! She concluded she must be mistaken, for who could have touched it? and entered. Then it became plain beyond dispute that the floor had been swept, the table wiped, the place redd up, and the fire roused.

"Hoot! I maun hae been walkin' i' my sleep!" said Jean to herself aloud. "Or maybe that guid laddie Donal Grant's been wullin' to gie me a helpin' han' for's mither's sake, honest wuman! The laddie's guid eneuch for onything! — ay, gien 'twar to mak' a minister o'!"

Eagerly, greedily, Gibbie now watched her every motion, and, bent upon learning, nothing escaped him: he would do much better next morning! — At length the men came in to breakfast, and he thought to enjoy the sight; but, alas! it wrought so with his hunger as to make him feel sick, and he crept away to the barn. He would gladly have lain down in the hay for a while, but that would require the ladder, and he did not now feel able to move it. On the floor of the barn he was not safe, and he got out of it into the cornyard, where he sought the hen-house. But there was no food there yet, and he must not linger near; for, if he were discovered, they would drive him away, and he would lose Donal Grant. He had not seen him at breakfast, for indeed he seldom, during the summer, had a meal except supper in the house. Gibbie, therefore, as he could not eat, ran to the burn and drank — but had no heart that morning for his projected inquiry into the state of his person. He must go to Donal. The sight of him would help him to bear his hunger.

The first indication Donal had of his proximity was the rush of Hornie past him in flight out of the corn. Gibbie was pursuing her with stones for lack of a stick. Thoroughly ashamed of himself, Donal threw his book from him, and ran to meet Gibbie.

"Ye maunna fling stanes, cratur," he said. "Haith! it's no for me to fin' fau't, though," he added, "sittin' readin' buiks like a gowk 'at I am, an' lattin' the beasts rin wull amo' the corn, 'at's weel peyed to haud them oot o' 't! I'm clean affrontit wi' mysel', cratur."

Gibbie's response was to set off at full speed for the place where Donal had been sitting. He was back in a moment with the book, which he pressed into Donal's hand, while from the other he withdrew his club. This he brandished aloft once or twice, then starting at a steady trot, speedily circled the herd, and returned to his adopted master — only to start again, however, and attack Hornie, whom he drove from the corn-side of the meadow right over to the other: she was already afraid of him. After watching him for a time, Donal came to the conclusion that he could not do more than the cratur if he had as many eyes as Argus, and gave not even one of them to his book. He therefore left all to Gibbie, and did not once look up for a whole hour. Everything went just as it should; and not once, all that day, did Hornie again get a mouthful of the braird. It was rather a heavy morning for Gibbie, though, who had eaten nothing, and every time he came near Donal, saw the handkerchief bulging in the grass, which a little girl had brought and left for him. But he was a rare one both at waiting and at going without.

At last, however, Donal either grew hungry of himself, or was moved by certain understood relations between the sun and the necessities of his mortal frame; for he laid down his book, called out to Gibbie, "Cratur, its denner-time," and took his bundle. Gibbie drew near with sparkling eyes. There was no selfishness in his hunger, for, at the worst pass he had ever reached, he would have shared what he had with another, but he looked so eager, that Donal, who himself knew nothing of want, perceived that he was ravenous, and made haste to undo the knots of the handkerchief, which Mistress Jean appeared that day to have tied with more than ordinary vigor, ere she entrusted the bundle to the foreman's daughter. When the last knot yielded, he gazed with astonishment at the amount and variety of provision disclosed.

"Losh!" he exclaimed, "the mistress maun hae kenned there was two o' 's."

He little thought that what she had given him beyond the usual supply was an acknowledgment of services rendered by those same hands into which he now delivered a share, on the ground of other service altogether. It is not always, even when there is no mistake as to the person who has deserved it, that the reward reaches the doer so directly.

Before the day was over, Donal gave his helper more and other pay for his service. Choosing a fit time, when the cattle were well together and in good position, Hornie away at the stone dyke, he took from his pocket a somewhat wasted volume of ballads — ballants, he called them — and said,

"Sit ye doon, cratur. Never min' the nowt. I'm gaein' to read till ye."

Gibbie dropped on his crossed legs like a lark to the ground, and sat motionless. Donal, after deliberate search, began to read, and Gibbie to listen; and it would be hard to determine which found the more pleasure in his part. For Donal had seldom had a listener — and never one so utterly absorbed.

When the hour came for the cattle to go home, Gibbie again remained behind, waiting until all should be still at the farm. He lay on the dyke, brooding over what he had heard, and wondering how it was that Donal got all those strange beautiful words and sounds and stories out of the book.

CHAPTER XVII.

SECRET SERVICE.

I MUST not linger over degrees and phases. Every morning, Gibbie got into the kitchen in good time; and not only did more and more of the work, but did it more and more to the satisfaction of Jean, until, short of the actual making of the porridge, he did everything antecedent to the men's breakfast. When Jean came in, she had but to take the lid from the pot, put in the salt, assume the spurtle, and, grasping the first handful of the meal, which stood ready waiting in the bossie on the stone cheek of the fire, throw it in, thus commencing the simple cookery of the best of all dishes to a true-hearted and healthy Scotsman. Without further question she attributed all the aid she received to the goodness, "enough for anything," of Donal Grant, and continued to make acknowledgment of the same in both sort and quantity of victuals, whence, as has been shown, the real laborer received his due reward.

Until he had thoroughly mastered his work, Gibbie persisted in regarding matters economic "from his loophole in the ceiling;" and having at length learned the art of making butter, soon arrived at some degree of perfection in it. But when at last one morning he not only churned, but washed and made it up entirely to Jean's satisfaction, she did begin to wonder how a mere boy could both have such perseverance, and be so clever at woman's work. For now she entered the kitchen every morning without a question of finding the fire burning, the water boiling, the place clean and tidy, the supper dishes well washed and disposed on shelf and rack: her own part was merely to see that proper cloths were handy to so thorough a user of them. She took no one into her confidence on the matter: it was enough, she judged, that she and Donal understood each other.

And now if Gibbie had contented himself with rendering this house-service in return for the shelter of the barn and its hay, he might have enjoyed both longer; but from the position of his night-quarters, he came gradually to understand the work of the stable also; and before long, the men, who were quite ignorant of anything similar taking place in the house, began to observe, more to their wonder than satisfaction, that one or other of their horses was generally groomed before his man came to him; that often there was hay in their racks which they had not given them; and that the master's white horse every morning showed signs of having had some attention paid him that could not be accounted for. The result was much talk and speculation, suspicion and offence; for all were jealous of their rights, their duty, and their dignity, in relation to their horses: no man was at liberty to do a thing to or for any but his own pair. Even the brightening of the harness-brass, in which Gibbie sometimes indulged, was an offence; for did it not imply a reproach? Many were the useless traps laid for the offender, many the futile attempts to surprise him: as Gibbie never did anything except for half an hour or so while the men were sound asleep or at breakfast, he escaped discovery.

But he could not hold continued intercourse with the splendor of the white horse, and neglect carrying out the experiment on which he had resolved with regard to the effect of water upon his own skin; and having found the result a little surprising, he soon got into the habit of daily and thorough ablution. But many animals that never wash are yet cleaner than some that do; and, what with the scantiness of his clothing, his constant exposure to the atmosphere, and his generally lying in a fresh lair, Gibbie had always been comparatively clean. Besides, being nice in his mind, he was naturally nice in his body.

The new personal regard thus roused by the presence of Snowball, had its development greatly assisted by the scrupulosity with which most things in the kitchen, and chief of all in this respect, the churn, were kept. It required much effort to come up to the nicety considered by Jean indispensable in the churn; and the croucher on the ceiling, when he saw the long nose advance to prosecute inquiry into its condition, mentally trembled lest the next movement should condemn his endeavor as a failure. With his clothes he could do nothing, alas! but he bathed every night in the Lorrie as soon as Donal had gone home with the cattle. Once he got into a deep hole, but managed to get out again, and so learned that he could swim.

All day he was with Donal, and took from him by much the greater part of his labor: Donal had never had such time for reading. In return he gave him his dinner, and Gibbie could do very well upon one meal a day. He paid him also in poetry. It never came into his head, seeing he never spoke, to teach him to read. He soon gave up attempting to learn anything from him as to his place or people or history, for to all questions in that direction Gibbie only looked grave and shook his head. As often, on the other hand, as he tried to learn where he spent the night, he received for answer only one of his merriest laughs.

Nor was larger time for reading the sole benefit Gibbie conferred upon Donal. Such was the avidity and growing intelligence with which the little naked town-savage listened to what Donal read to him, that his presence was just so much added to Donal's own live soul of thought and feeling. From listening to his own lips through Gibbie's ears, he not only understood many things better, but, perceiving what things must puzzle Gibbie, came sometimes, rather to his astonisment, to see that in fact he did not understand them himself. Thus the bond between the boy and the child grew closer — far closer, indeed, than Donal imagined; for, although still, now and then, he had a return of the fancy that Gibbie might be a creature of some speechless race other than human, of whom he was never to know whence he came or whither he went — a messenger, perhaps, come to unveil to him the depths of his own spirit, and make up for the human teaching denied him, this was only in his more poetic moods, and his ordinary mental position towards him was one of kind condescension.

It was not all fine weather up there among the mountains in the beginning of summer. In the first week of June even, there was sleet and snow in the wind — the tears of the vanquished winter, blown, as he fled, across the sea, from Norway or Iceland. Then would Donal's heart be sore for Gibbie, when he saw his poor rags blown about like streamers in the wind, and the white spots melting on his bare skin. His own condition would then to many have appeared pitiful enough, but such an idea Donal would have laughed to scorn, and justly. Then most, perhaps then only, does the truly generous nature feel poverty, when he sees another in need and can do little or nothing to help him. Donal had neither greatcoat, plaid, nor umbrella, wherewith to shield Gibbie's looped and windowed raggedness. Once, in great pity, he pulled off his jacket, and threw it on Gibbie's shoulders. But the shout of laughter that burst from the boy, as he flung the jacket from him, and rushed away into the middle of the feeding herd, a shout that came from no cave of rudeness, but from the very depth of delight, stirred by the loving kindness of the act, startled Donal out of his pity into brief anger, and he rushed after him in indignation, with full purpose to teach him proper behavior by a box on each ear. But Gibbie dived under the belly of a favorite cow, and peering out sideways from under her neck and between her forelegs, his arms grasping each a leg, while the cow went on twisting her long tongue round the grass and plucking it undisturbed, showed such an innocent countenance of holy merriment, that the pride of Donal's hurt benevolence melted away, and his laughter emulated Gibbie's. That sort of day was in truth drearier for Donal than for Gibbie, for the books he had were not his own, and he dared not expose them to the rain; some of them indeed came from Glashruach — the Muckle Hoose, they generally called it! When he left him, it was to wander disconsolately about the field; while Gibbie, sheltered under a whole cow, defied the chill and the sleet, and had no books of which to miss the use. He could not, it is true, shield his legs from the insidious attacks of such sneaking blasts as will always find out the undefended spots; but his great heart was so well-to-do in the inside of him, that, unlike Touchstone, his spirits not being weary, he cared not for his legs. The worst storm in the world could not have made that heart quail. For, think! there had just been the strong, the well-dressed, the learned, the wise, the altogether mighty and considerable Donal, the cowherd, actually desiring him, wee Sir Gibbie Galbraith, the cinder of the city-furnace, the naked, and generally the hungry little tramp, to wear his jacket to cover him from the storm! The idea was one of eternal triumph; and Gibbie, exulting in the unheard-of devotion and condescension of the thing, kept on laughing like a blessed cherub under the cow's belly. Nor was there in his delight the smallest admixture of pride that he should have drawn forth such kindness; it was simple glorying in the beauteous fact. As to the cold and the sleet, so far as he knew they never hurt anybody. They were not altogether pleasant creatures, but they could not help themselves, and would soon give over their teasing. By to-morrow they would have wandered away into other fields, and left the sun free to come back to Donal and the cattle, when Gibbie, at present shielded like any lord by the friendliest of cows, would come in for a share of the light and the warmth. Gibbie was so confident with the animals, that they were already even more friendly with him than with Donal — all except Hornie, who, being of a low spirit, therefore incapable of obedience, was friendliest with the one who gave her the hardest blows.

From The Cornhill Magazine.

THE FEAR OF DEATH.

We add a strange bitterness to the last parting, inasmuch as upon so many of the subjects relating to it we doom ourselves to a sort of anticipated loneliness. Few of us have the courage to speak quietly and freely of our own prospects of mortality with those nearest and dearest to us. Tenderness and custom combine to seal our lips; and there grows up a habit of reserve which we scarcely wish to break through. Yet the veil of habitual silence which we throw over death, as concerning ourselves, adds to that sense of mystery and chillness which it were surely wiser as far as may be to dispel than to increase. Each of us must die alone; but we need not encounter the fear of death alone.

How far is it true to say that the fear of death is a natural and universal instinct? or rather to what extent does the instinctive fear of it prevail among ourselves? The very reserve of which I have spoken makes it impossible to answer with any confidence. If such reserve may be taken as an indication of shrinking from a painful subject, this shrinking would appear to be much less strong among the poor than the rich. Their outspokenness with respect to their own approaching death, or that of parents or children whom they may be nursing with the utmost tenderness, is very startling to unaccustomed ears, and might almost suggest indifference, had we not ample reason to know that it is compatible not only with tender affection but with deep and lasting sorrow for the very loss of which by anticipation they spoke so unhesitatingly. No doubt all habits of reserve imply more or less of the power of self-control, which is so largely dependent upon education; but there would seem to be also a real difference of feeling between rich and poor about death. Perhaps their habitual plainness of speech about it may contribute towards lessening the fear of it among them. But there is an obvious and deeply pathetic explanation of their calmness in the prospect of it for themselves or for those dearest to them. The hardness and bareness of life lessens its hold upon them; sometimes even makes them feel it not an inheritance to be coveted for their children. The dull resignation with which they often say the little ones are "better off" when they die, tells a grievous story of the struggle for mere existence; while the simplicity of their faith in the unseen is equally striking in its cheerful beauty. Both habits of mind tend to diminish the fear of death itself, as well as the unwillingness to speak of it which belongs to more complicated states of feeling and more luxurious habits of life.

It is of course impossible fully to distinguish between the fear of death, and the fear of that which may come after death; and this is not the place for fully considering the grounds of the latter fear. But our feeling about the great change is assuredly composed of many elements, and the nature of our expectation of another life is by no means the only thing which makes death more or less welcome. We do not probably at all fully realize how wide is the range of possible feeling about this life, making our anticipations of its ending as many-tinted almost as those with which we contemplate the hereafter. We tacitly agree in common conversation to avoid the subject as it concerns ourselves and our interlocutors, and in speaking of others we make it a point of good manners to refer to it as matter of regret; while religious books and sermons always assume that the king of terrors can be encountered with calmness only by the aid of that faith which they preach. But is it really the case that apart from the terrors of religion and the courtesies of feeling, the end of life would always be unwelcome in its approach to ourselves and to others? Is there inherent in all of us a universal craving to prolong the term of this sublunary existence, and to prevent the loosening of any of its ties?

We may be pretty sure that there is some foundation in reason for any strongly prevalent manipulation of feeling. It is easy to see how this particular practice has grown up; but it does seem to have passed the limit of sincerity, and therefore of wholesomeness. Even if we may not speak freely, it must be well to think truly in a matter of such deep and frequent concern; and it can surely be no true part of religion to deepen the natural opposition of feeling to the lot which is appointed to all.

One of the great distinctions which the voluntary assumption of mourning tends to obliterate is that between timely and untimely deaths. There is no doubt a sense in which to the eye of faith no death can be untimely, but this is as distinctly a matter of faith as the blessedness of pain. Faith may discern a rightness in the cutting short of the young life, as in all forms of suffering and affliction; but though faith may be able to surmount all obstacles, neither faith nor reason can profit by our ignoring the natural inequalities of the ground. Some deaths are not in any true sense afflictions; and to say so need imply no disrespect, nay it may convey the very highest testimony, to the departed. We speak of survivors as mourners, till we forget that there are survivors who, in place of mourning, may for very love be filled with a solemn joy in the completed course to which added length of days could scarcely have added either beauty or dignity. When we allow ourselves to think of the reality rather than of the mere conventional description of the event, it seems wonderful that we should have only one word with which to speak of the completion and of the destruction of a human lifetime; only one word for the event which closes the long day's toil, and for that which crashes like a thunderbolt into the opening blossom of family life; for that which makes and that which ends widowhood; for the final fulfilment or reversal of all our temporal hopes; for bereavement and for reunion. It is true that in one sense it is "one event" which befalls in all these cases, but the feelings belonging to it have as wide a range of color as the sunset clouds. Need we wrap them all in the same thick veil of gloomy language and ceremonial?

At any rate, the feelings with which we contemplate the termination of our own earthly life must vary indefinitely in different individuals, and in the same individual at different times; and it would be a matter of deep interest to compare our respective experience if we could bring ourselves to do so.

It is sometimes said that no one can tell what his own feeling about death would be, until he has been brought face to face with it. This is no doubt true; but it is also true that the feelings with which we regard it from a distance vary as much as those with which we should meet its near approach, and that the former are more important to our welfare than the latter. To be "through fear of death all their lifetime subject to bondage," is a heavy burden, and I believe not an uncommon one. Generalizing from the scanty materials gleaned by one ordinary observer, I believe that the purely instinctive fear is strongest in people of a very high degree of vitality; it is the shadow cast by intense love of life, and seems to depend in a great measure upon a certain kind of physical vigor. This may be one explanation of the strange and beautiful way in which the fear of death so often disappears as the event itself approaches; the weakened frame does not shrink from the final touch of that decay which has already insensibly loosened its hold upon life. Professional observers speak of cases in which the fear of dying is active to the last, as being extremely rare; it should probably be considered as a physical indication of vitality. For the same reason, perhaps, the fear of death is often comparatively slight in early youth, before the constitution has reached its full vigor, and before the habit of living has been very firmly established. At the same time, the very energy and buoyancy of a perfectly vigorous physical organization help to dispel or to neutralize painful impressions, so that although the idea of death may be more naturally abhorrent to the strong than to the weak, they may be less habitually oppressed by the thoughts of it.

There also seems to be a deep, though obscure, connection between the wish and the power to live. Physicians and nurses have strange stories to tell of cases in which a strong motive for living has seemed sufficient to recall patients from the very grasp of death. Sometimes the mere assurance, given with a confident manner but a doubting heart, that recovery is possible, seems to give strength to rally and may turn the scale in favor of life. For this reason, amongst others, medical men are generally extremely unwilling to tell patients that there is no hope. There are cases on record in which such an announcement, though voluntarily elicited and met with perfect apparent calmness, has seemed to sap the strength in a moment and cause a sudden and rapid sinking. It is perhaps some physical instinct of self-preservation, rather than any want of courage, which makes some sick people so carefully shun all opportunities for any such communication. The curious physical results of mental expectation make it often most inexpedient for the sick to know all that is known to others about their state; and perhaps only those who have lived long in sick-rooms can fully appreciate the blessing to the watchers of having to do with a patient who neither anxiously questions nor fears to hear or to speak the plain truth, making it clear that to him the question of life or death is not one of overmastering importance. To be able, while the bodily life is trembling in the balance, to look beyond it in undisturbed serenity, is not only to be in the condition most favorable to health and happiness, it is to radiate strength and courage to all around. And some such influence, though in a more diffused and less perceptible form, is exercised during health by those who do not shrink from the prospect of death.

Perfect serenity in regard to death is not to be attained by any effort of the will, nor by any mere process of reasoning; it is rather the result of a happy combination of bodily and mental conditions. The chief of these conditions, the assured hope of a future beyond the grave in comparison of which the brightest earthly visions fade like a candle before the dawn, is not given to all; and in these days especially, it is for many overshadowed, if not altogether blotted out, by doubts and questionings which can no longer be hidden from the multitude. Even to those who most earnestly cling to the hope of immortality, it would seem that our troublous inheritance of sympathy must cast many a distressing side-light upon prospects in which of old the faithful were able to take undisturbed delight. However this may be, the mere prospect of prolonged existence beyond the grave, apart from other reasons for joyful confidence, must be taken rather as enlarging the scope of our hopes and of our fears than as necessarily altering the balance between them. Habitual hopefulness may color the prospect beyond the grave with the same glowing tints which it throws over this world, so that in some cases the same cause which makes life delightful makes death not unwelcome. Such a state of mind, though rare, is not unknown. But perhaps a perfect balance of feeling is more readily to be found at a lower level of expectation.

It may be one of the natural compensations for a comparatively low degree of vitality that, in thinking of death, the idea of rest predominates over that of loss, so that there is no alloy of pain in the reflection that none of the troubles of this life can be more than passing clouds; that for each one of us "the Shadow sits and waits;" that the burden of life, however heavy, must drop off at last; and that none can say how near to any one may be the final relief from all its evils. Weariness of mere existence is a heavy, and probably a very common, secret burden; one which makes the thought of annihilation more attractive to some of us than any celestial visions. Those who suffer from it would not welcome the brightest prospects of heaven, unless they could hope first for a "long and dreamless sleep" in which to wash off the travel stains of the past.

This is a feeling which is probably most common in youth or old age, when the ties to life are fewer than they are in its prime, and when the past or the future may well look almost intolerably long to the wearied imagination. It may be that in the miserable experience of some sufferers this deep weariness of life may not exclude the fear of death; but so terrible a combination can scarcely be either common or lasting. Probably the normal state of things is that in which some degree of fear, or at least of reluctance, exists as a pure instinct; rising and falling with physical causes, ready to give force to the terrors of conscience and the cravings of affection, but held in check by various considerations and controlled by the will, if not utterly subdued by trustful hope. In people of active, energetic temperament, with keen susceptibility to sensuous impressions, one may sometimes observe that no amount either of religious hope for another life, or of painful experience of this, will overcome the constitutional shrinking from the anticipated rending asunder of body and soul. They carry the same feeling through sympathy into their thoughts of the death of others, which appears to be almost physically shocking to them, however obviously acceptable to the person chiefly concerned. Such a state of feeling is to those who do not share it as unaccountable as it is evident. Looking at death calmly, as one of the very few circumstances of quite universal experience, any vehement disinclination to it would seem to be inappropriate as well as futile. But disinclination to some of its accidental circumstances is but too easily intelligible. This is probably another reason why the shrinking from it often seems to increase as youth is left behind. The very young cannot know how terrible a thing sickness is; those who have watched many death-beds can scarcely forget the awful possibilities of physical suffering. And yet it seems probable that many of the worst appearances are more or less delusive. A very moderate experience of sick-rooms suffices to show that actual suffering bears no exact proportion to its outward manifestations. Be this as it may, physical suffering is clearly no necessary accompaniment of death, and the dread of pain which makes us shrink from the prospect of mortal illness is quite a different thing from the real instinctive dread of death: it should indeed, and often does, act powerfully in reconciling us to the prospect of death.

In like manner the unwillingness to be taken away from life in its fulness, to be cut off from the enjoyment of bright prospects, and debarred from the satisfaction of that ever-deepening curiosity with which every active mind must behold the mysterious drama going on around us — this unwillingness is quite a distinct feeling from the shrinking of the flesh and spirit from dissolution. It is a feeling which should in reason belong in its full force only to those who look upon death as the end of all things, and for whom, therefore, it should at least have no terrors. Is it some mysteriously intense appetite, or an inveterate confusion of thought, which hinders most people from perceiving that not to exist cannot possibly be in the slightest degree painful or even unpleasant? If, on the other hand, we regard death merely as a transition from one state of existence to another (and of an existence possibly of infinite duration), we open the door to all extremes of glorious or fearful expectation, and the event itself shrinks into insignificance. From this point of view, as well as from the last, though for such different reasons, the important question is not when we die, but how we live. Religion and philosophy on different grounds combine to impress upon us the continuity and mutual dependence of successive "dispensations" or "developments." We cannot conceive of, much less really believe in, any state of existence in which we can have any interest wholly disconnected from our interest in this life. The laws which regulate the world we know must be in some degree the laws of any world in which we can conceive of ourselves as existing and retaining our identity, and it is hard to understand how any rational being can find a fancied safety in the mere delay of an inevitable crisis. Of course the theological origin of such a fancy is familiar enough; but the result is, I think, as unworthy of its own religious basis as it is of our human dignity. To suppose that we can have any reasonable ground of confidence for this life either in or apart from an Almighty Being whom we cannot trust with our destiny in the next, is certainly not more foolish than it is faithless. Our hopes for this world and for the next must rest upon one foundation, — our faith must be equally prepared for trials in respect of both. Either death leads to nothing at all, and to fear it is unmeaning; or it is a mere parenthesis, and to fear it is unworthy of those who believe in a righteous order.

Still, while life is sweet, we must needs shrink more or less from what at least looks like its untimely termination. If it were not for the conventional association of sorrow with death already referred to, few, perhaps, would be selfish enough to wish to detain the aged from their rest, and to themselves the prospect is rarely unwelcome; but for the young in their springtime, or the middle-aged in their vigor, death necessarily involves a loss which is not the less real and need not be the less keenly felt because it may be regarded as overbalanced by the gain. Let our anticipations of life beyond the grave be as bright as they will, there can be no use in denying the preciousness of those which lie on this side of it; and the most ardently hopeful must still feel that, if the choice lay with themselves, it would be wisest not to hurry over the preliminary phase. But the truth is brought home to us again and again, that we have not light enough to choose by. In the dimness we can faintly discern that life has other kinds of completeness besides length of days.

It is not growing like a tree
In bulk, doth make man better be;
Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,
To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sere.
A lily of a day
Is fairer far in May —
Although it fall and die that night,
It was the plant and flower of light.
In small proportions we just beauties see,
And in short measures life may perfect be.

As the years go on, there gathers a special radiance of eternal youth around some of the figures from whom all our hopes in this world have been most sharply severed. There are lives so rounded and crowned by their completed deeds of love, that death seems to have appeared in the fulness of their prime only to consecrate them forever; others stand apart from human ties in a solitude which makes time seem of little consequence, and the grave a not unfamiliar country. In all these cases we may even now see a fitness in what, according to mere reckoning of time, would be called unseasonable. And if we can catch glimpses of these things from without, there are no doubt many inward dramas which refuse to square themselves with the external framework of human life. We do not know to what unfathomable necessities the times and seasons of life and death may correspond, and as little do we know, in looking at each other's lives, what may be unfolding or what may be concluded, as seen from within. That which seems to others a cutting short of activity, may be to ourselves the laying down of arms no longer needed; our eyes may see the haven, where our friends can see only the storm; or if we cannot see a fitness in the time of our death, is that a strange thing in such a life as this? From The Spectator.

THE FEAR OF DEATH.

A FINE writer in the Cornhill points out that the somewhat artificial avoidance in society of the subject of the feelings with which individuals contemplate death, has the effect probably rather of increasing the intensity of that occasionally deep fear of it, of which now and then we meet with remarkable instances. The poor, says this writer, have no such delicacy in speaking of the event of death, even in the presence of those who are about to die. They talk of it with the same straightforward plainness of speech with which they talk of the course of bodily disease, and whether or not it be a consequence of this plainness of speech, or only a consequence of something else in the lot of the poor which also causes this plainness of speech, at all events there seems to be much less evidence of any agonizing fear of death among the poor than among the rich. And we are inclined to believe that the absence of reserve on the subject does at least in some degree diminish the awe of death; for it is certain that all the reserves of what is called "polished society" do more or less increase the mental excitement with which the subject-matter of these reserves is treated; and doubtless all increase of excitement on any subject of which the mind entertains a secret awe, adds to the intensity of that awe. We do not mean, of course, that either openness or reserve will alter very much the feeling with which, when death arrives, the dying meet it. But as "C. E. S." very justly observes, in the Cornhill, the feelings with which we regard death when it is at a distance, concern the general happiness of life more deeply than the feelings with which we meet it when it comes, — which are often very different. If by anticipating the inevitable event with the same simplicity and plainness with which we anticipate the other necessary eras of life, we can diminish the artificial panic with which death is sometimes regarded while it is distant, there is good reason to believe that the feelings with which it will be met on its immediate approach, — whenever, at least, that approach is due to natural causes, and not to violence, — will take care of themselves. As in Dr. Johnson's case so in hundreds of others, the man who has fought against the horror of death till he has suffered far more than a hundred times its actual terror during his lifetime, will pass through it with the utmost serenity and peace when at last it really comes. Hence it does not in the least follow that what is needed to correct the excess of panic with which death is contemplated, must be something adequate to sustain the soul when it actually comes, for those who have most to sustain them in the final crisis, constantly suffer most in the premature contemplation of that crisis; while those, again, who have no morbid fear of death till it is close at hand, may be the least able to face it when it comes. The writer in the Cornhill accounts for the very numerous cases in which people who feel the greatest horror of death, beforehand, meet it most tranquilly in the end, by assuming that this morbid horror of it is due to a certain excess of vitality, — a quickness of blood, — which is necessarily so far reduced when death is really at hand, that with it goes also the nervous horror which was itself fed by that vitality. We doubt the explanation. Some who have this very keen dread of disembodiment, do not seem to have any of that overflow of spirits or of life which the theory assumes; while very many indeed who have that overflow of spirits, and life, and health in the largest possible measure, seem quite destitute of the morbid fear which is supposed to spring out of it. As far as the present writer's experience has gone, this morbid feeling is very apt to belong to people of weak health, though of a tenacious kind of constitution, of strong social affections, and of active imaginations, who are constantly reminded of the feebleness of their apparent hold on life, and yet cannot conceive of living at all without the manifold domestic incidents and homelike detail in which, to them, life has hitherto consisted. Such persons regard death, while it is only suggested to them by their imaginations, with the sort of terror with which a man at sea regards the chance of sinking into the dark, cold waters, — as a dreadful rending asunder of vivid ties, tearing him violently from all the warmth and fulness of life, to plunge him into what Shelley so finely calls

> The wide, grey, lampless, deep, unpeopled world.

But when death really comes close, — if it comes by a gradual and natural approach, — they find out their mistake; though the outer scene withdraws itself, there is no consciousness of a violent dragging or snatching at that which constitutes their own feeling of themselves. Often they feel an unwonted tranquillity, an unusual calm, which is not unconsciousness, stealing over them; a feeling of coming to themselves instead of being torn away into a new and desolate region; and even where this consciousness of strange serenity, often described by the dying, is not expressed, there is often a complete cessation of restlessness, an appearance of grateful satisfaction in all that is done for them, and a feeble self-possession, which seem to bystanders to imply some such state of feeling. As Father Newman so finely expresses it, in that noble delineation of death in his "Dream of Gerontius," which seems to have had its origin in hints given to the great imagination of the writer in the last whispers of the dying: —

> I went to sleep; and now I am refreshed,
> A strange refreshment; for I feel in me
> An inexpressive lightness, and a sense
> Of freedom, as I were at length myself,
> And ne'er had been before. How still it is!
> I hear no more the busy beat of time,
> No, nor my fluttering breath, nor struggling pulse,
> Nor does one moment differ from the next.
> I had a dream; yes, some one softly said,
> "He's gone!" and then a sigh went round the room,
> And then I surely heard a priestly voice
> Cry, "Subvenite!" and they knelt in prayer.

I seem to hear him still, but thin and low,
And fainter and more faint the accents come,
As at an ever-widening interval.
Ah! whence is this? What is this severance?
This silence pours a solitariness
Into the very essence of my soul,
And the deep rest, so soothing and so sweet,
Hath something, too, of sternness and of pain.
For it drives back my thoughts upon their spring
By a strange introversion, and perforce
I now begin to feed upon myself,
Because I have nought else to feed upon.
Am I alive or dead? I am not dead,
But in the body still, for I possess
A sort of confidence which clings to me,
That each particular organ holds its place
As heretofore, combining with the rest
Into one symmetry that wraps me round,
And makes me man; and surely I could move,
Did I but will it, every part of me.
And yet I cannot to my sense bring home,
By very trial, that I have the power.
'Tis strange; I cannot stir a hand or foot,
I cannot make my fingers or my lips
By mutual pressure witness each to each,
Nor by the eyelid's instantaneous stroke
Assure myself I have a body still.
Nor do I know my very attitude,
Nor if I stand, or lie, or sit, or kneel.
So much I know, not knowing how I know,
That the vast universe where I have dwelt
Is quitting me, or I am quitting it;
Or I or it is rushing on the wings
Of light or lightning on an onward course,
And we e'en now are million miles apart.
Yet. . . . is this peremptory severance
Wrought out in lengthening measurements of space,
Which grow and multiply by speed and time?
Or am I traversing infinity
By endless subdivision, hurrying back
From finite towards infinitesimal,
Thus dying out of the expansive world?

Certainly the evidence — so far as observation can give us evidence — of the experience of the dying, is evidence that dying itself, as distinguished from the pain or disease which leads to it, is not only not painful, but a withdrawal from bodily pain, often accompanied by a singular increase of moral self-possession. And as regards the painlessness of the natural process of dying, — it is clearly to be expected. All suffering, even faintness, which is often the worst sort of suffering, is the struggle of the principle of life against some physical disease or failure which endangers life; and so long as life is strong, the struggle may be terrible. But when life ebbs, the power to suffer physically must ebb with it. Indeed, nothing seems to be a more singular testimony to the instinctive character of the belief in immortality, than the impression so often shared by those who profess to believe in annihilation, that even a natural and gradual death must in itself involve extreme suffering. If dying means the dwindling of life, it must mean also the dwindling of the power to suffer, which is one of the most characteristic of the measures of life. But even the disbeliever in immortality really thinks of some being, some person as suffering in the wrench which a separation between him and his body implies. Yet nothing can be more illogical than for such a one to imagine that there is anything to wrench away. And even the spiritualist, who does believe in the separate existence of the person from his body, has no right to suppose that there is anything necessarily painful in the dissolution of the partnership, any more than there was in the first formation of it. As the coming of life is gradual and unconscious, — as almost all the great eras of bodily growth and decline approach by gradual and unconscious steps, — so analogy would be apparently in favor of the last great change being gradual and unconscious too; and what analogy suggests, observation appears to confirm. Even in the case of violent deaths, it may be fairly said that the pain suffered is not due to death, but to the vitality of full health, since the suffering from acts of violence which are the most nearly fatal, is usually less than the suffering from those which, though dangerous, do not appear to undermine equally the vital stength. It is not the man who suffers in being disembodied; it is the body which suffers before the man can be disembodied; and the suffering grows less, not greater, as the life in the body dwindles.

But after all, and even without relation to religious fears legitimate or the reverse, — the fear of death, is, we suppose due more to the strangeness, and newness, and solitariness of the experience, than to the expectation of physical pain. Men who can hardly conceive themselves at all, except as they are clothed in the domestic incidents of life, anticipate a kind of necessary dreariness in being withdrawn from all these incidents, — and shiver as they think of the fading away of the familiar faces, and the solitude of the soul. The mere conception of even a temporary imprisonment in self, — of what Father Newman describes as a feeding of the soul on itself, — is more alarming to them than any amount of physical pain, when combined with the ordinary aids of sympathy and tenderness. But even these persons should remember that so far as the experience of the dying can be gathered, this loneliness seems to be least felt when it begins. Loneliness, after all, is a relative term. Keble very justly said that no one ever really lives anything like his whole life within another's reach.

Why should we faint and fear to live alone,
Since all alone, so Heaven has willed, we die;
And not the tend'rest heart, and next our own,
Knows half the reasons why we smile or sigh?

There may be and is more loneliness in feeling how little of each other we really know, when we are closest to each other, than in calmly realizing what oneself really is without the sting of this silent reproach. Solitude is often less solitary than society, — where solitude is calm and clear, while society only brings home to one one's own isolation. At all events, the evidence of a hundred death-beds, of the utmost diversity as regards theological belief, entirely goes to prove, that among sincere and high-minded men and women, death appears to be rather a process of coming to oneself, of entering into a certain (at least temporary) calm and self-possession, than one of pain, of alarm, or even of surprise.

From The Saturday Review.

SOLDIERS OF FORTUNE.

NOTWITHSTANDING peace congresses and that diffusion of wealth which gives so many people a concern in general tranquillity, we seem to be rapidly reverting to that condition of society when there were openings everywhere for soldiers of fortune. They may, indeed, have to go further from home than formerly to find engagements; but then in these days of steam the journey from England to Asia Minor is far more easy than the journey used to be from Paris to Florence, when Italy was the paradise of the armed adventurer. For the Middle Ages were, beyond a doubt, the golden ages of the profession. Not to speak of crusading princes who picked up crowns in the Orient, the wealthiest nations were in those days the least disposed to fight in defence of their possessions. The fairest plains of Italy were partitioned among an infinite number of petty republics and principalities, whose citizens throve by trade and commerce. With little territorial elbow-room, and rivalling each other in a keen competition for business, they were perpetually quarrelling among themselves. Their accumulations were naturally the objects of covetousness to neighboring nobles who had their strongholds and rock-girt fastnesses in situations where the surroundings were as picturesque as they were barren. These robber potentates acted on the old principle of sic vos non vobis, and raised their revenues, when they could find them, by the right of the strongest. So the well-to-do citizens, in order to guard themselves against loss, hired warriors from the North to do the hard fighting. When Italians met Italians in the field the list of casualties was often marvellously small; but it became a different business altogether when German or French mercenaries mingled in the fray. Thus one band of foreigners came to be pitted against another, and a dashing leader might make sure of wealth, with the chances of winning a commanding position. Nerve and muscle were his stock in trade, and with audacity and skill in military tactics he was likely to rise to a most lucrative renown. His fame was bruited abroad beyond the Alps, and recruits from all poverty-stricken countries flocked eagerly to his standard. He became virtually master of the State or the tyrant that paid him, for he changed sides as he pleased, and a quarrel with him was to be avoided at any price. Sometimes he settled down in the state of his adoption, and lived and died in the dignified and lucrative position of commander-in-chief of its forces. Now and then, if his ambition was not to be satisfied even on these liberal terms, he gathered one of those hosts of condottieri that made peace and war on their own account, levying contributions everywhere by the mere menace of their presence. This irregular warfare more than supported itself, and the chiefs carried their chests of treasure about with them. Their encampments showed the most luxurious magnificence of the age, with their silken pavilions and splendid camp furniture, and their endless round of feasting and debauchery. They fared no less cheaply than sumptuously, for the food and wines were lightly come by; and, though they kept their horses in wind and their arms in order by the chivalrous exercises in which they delighted, the discipline can scarcely have been of the strictest. But audacity and impunity bred recklessness; and the discipline, such as it was, was good in comparison with that of any enemies they were likely to encounter.

The conditions of military adventure changed with the consolidation of kingdoms and the greater centralization of military power. The stuff that went to make the rank and file of armies found employment at home under native monarchs or feudal leaders. Yet still there were many excellent opportunities for the penniless cadets of fighting families. A prince who was jealous of intrigues at home, or more or less suspicious of his nobles, was glad to surround himself with guards who understood little of the language of his subjects, and who depended absolutely on himself. The French kings set an example in this respet. Many a poor Scotch gentleman, if he did not make his fortunes by marriage like Quentin Durward, found himself in clover in the Scottish Guard. If he had to submit to some restrictions on his personal liberty, he surrounded himself with all that in his esteem made life worth having, and was really more to be envied than the head of the family at home. In place of making shift for his living in a gloomy fortalice that was occasionally gutted or burned over his head, he had snug quarters in one of the royal palaces, with horses and attendants, and a comfortable mess. He had pay that came to him sooner or later, although it was very apt to run into arrear; and he had occasional douceurs for deeds of special service, with the chance of loot in time of war or domestic trouble. We suspect that these magnificently appointed guardsmen, though their nominal rank might be only that of full private, were more to be envied than the soldiers of fortune who took service in regular armies a few generations later. The immortal Dugald Dalgetty, after spending the best part of his life in promiscuous foreign service, had only risen to the rank of Rittmeister. It is true that he changed his allegiance repeatedly, and a rolling stone gathers little moss. But then he shifted from side to side because he never had an opportunity of feathering his nest. The pay was no great thing at best, and, small as it was, it seldom could be counted upon. Their High Mightinesses the States of Holland, as he tells us, were the solitary exception that proved the rule. He admits that they were altogether unexceptionable as paymasters, and a man might grow sleek and fat in the Dutch service. But their good qualities as men of business had a shadowy side, and they set their faces against any license in the way of military indiscretions. If the citizens or their wives or daughters had cause of complaint, the provost marshal promptly interfered. In the imperial armies, on the other hand, where the military coffers were always empty or nearly so, the soldiers were encouraged to take care of themselves. Still, though the burghers and peasants had to put up with their excesses, the means of existence must have been rather precarious. Under the immortal Gustavus, the Lion of the North, matters were still worse; for he insisted upon the strictest order and discipline, while the pay was painfully moderate; and the only chances for a cavalier of honor lay in the pickings he might scramble for during sack or storm. To be sure, such chances were by no means rare in those days; but we should imagine that towards the end of the Thirty Years' War the miserable people must have been so closely shorn that there was very little left to be stripped from them. There was incident enough in the life, no doubt, for those who liked excitement; and that was the best that could be said for it. There was abundance of hard fighting; there was a great deal of sharp starvation to be undergone in the course of the obstinately prolonged sieges; there were epidemics of strange and malignant kinds perpetually decimating the troops in their campaigns; and, when a man dropped wounded, there were heavy odds against his receiving any decent attendance. The adventurers who went abroad in quest of gain had to content themselves with a moderate share of glory; most of them left their bones on forgotten battle-fields; and the few who came back, like Dugald Dalgetty, might think themselves lucky if they were as fortunate as he was in bringing a horse and weapons along with them. Since then warlike speculations of this kind have gone very much out of fashion. It is true that the petty German princes sold their subjects by herds like sheep for the wars of the last century; but, although armies might be partially recruited by contract from abroad, they were almost entirely officered from home. There was little hope of rising for strangers in the regular forces of great military powers. Such intruders were looked upon, to say the least of it, rather coldly than otherwise; and even in corps like the Austrian cavalry, which have been a good deal affected by our countrymen, Englishmen have rarely risen beyond the rank of major.

There have been some exceptions, no doubt. There have always been semi-barbarous States that offered a sort of market to Western intelligence, dash, and education. While we were making ourselves masters of India piecemeal, and chiefly by dint of hard fighting, Frenchmen and Germans found occasional employment in drilling the levies that were opposing our advance. Now and then some refugee or waif of society rose slowly to distinction and office among the Turks, coming out as a full-blown pasha with license to make the most of his pashalic. But these instances of success were comparatively rare, and there were various disagreeables which could scarcely be avoided in such a career. To recommend yourself to the favor of a Mahometan power it is, or was, advisable, as a rule, to begin by turning renegade, and Christian gentlemen, however nominal their Christianity may be, have mostly a prejudice against conversion under such circumstances. However loosely religion may sit upon a man, the idea of renouncing it for gain is generally repugnant to the feelings. Moreover, as the military virtues are common enough among Mussulmans, it was only unusual energy or genius that could make sure of distancing native competition. With the sultans and maharajahs of Hindustan the state of the matter was somewhat different. Devoted as they might be to the gods of their mythology, they did not insist upon foreigners professing a belief in the divinity of Brahma or the incarnations of Vishnu; and, indeed, the jealous exclusiveness of the Brahminical and soldier castes would never have tolerated the profane intrusion of an infidel. But, though it was something to keep one's creed and one's honor, yet the life of the most honored adventurer was always hanging by a thread, and his prosperity was staked on the caprices of a despot. A court intrigue or a mishap in the field might plunge him irremediably into the deepest disgrace, and the man whom the prince had delighted to honor might be cast into a dungeon on the shortest notice and subjected to every refinement of torment. Confiscation was the invariable penalty of disgrace, and if he had amassed money by presents or plunder, he had all the better reason for living in mortal apprehension. For his wealth was a standing provocation to have done with him; and if he carried it safely out of the country of his adoption, he might well take credit for unprecedented ingenuity and good luck. But now a more rosily-colored era appears to be dawning on the world, when kingdoms and principalities and posts of advantage may be seen to be literally going a-begging. If we may judge by the events of the last few months, the great empire of the Ottomans is in active course of dissolution. Its numerous nationalities, with their infinite subdivisions, are all in a ferment, and many of them are already looking towards the Franks. One province has already been absolutely clipped off; the throne must some day be filled by election, and the only thing that is certain is that, thanks to the jealousies of the great powers, no scion of any reigning house will be eligible. If the empire goes on falling to pieces, there will be other bodies of electors looking out for a head to direct and a strong hand to control them, with no restrictions on their right of choice imposed by Europe in congress. Should war once break out in central Asia, the prospect of free-fighting there opens up brilliant possibilities. All preconceived combinations may be upset in the general confusion and turmoil; and the present vassals of Russia or her probable allies may possibly turn to her open enemies. The Chinese, who have been too much ignored of late, may very conceivably cut into the game, and may gladly welcome Europeans from the west to lead their "ever-victorious" armies on the Kuldja frontier. So that soldiers who grumble at slack promotion, and are conscious of possessing certain indispensable gifts, may look for chances of dazzling brilliancy. It is true that they must carry their lives in their hands, and make up their minds to face hazards and hardships. But, after all, there are many men who would as soon play fast and loose with their lives as with their fortunes; and even the fate of the most unfortunate speculators may seem preferable to that of the shareholders in a broken bank.

FRANCES ANN KEMBLE.*

THIS record of a girlhood has the merit of "ringing true." It is compiled from letters and journals written at the time; the phases of character gradually developing are revealed along with all the faults, mistakes, contradictions, and aspirations of the days as they passed by, and there is no attempt to extenuate immaturity or reconcile inconsistencies. Although it is an autobiography, and Mrs. Kemble in her girlhood is her own heroine, the book does not convey the impression of egotism — the proportion of things is preserved. The scenes, personages, and characters that made up the daily life and surroundings of her childhood and youth are all vividly reproduced as they were or appeared to her, but her personal importance to any one except herself is skilfully kept at its due level. The reader hears and sees with the ears and eyes of Frances Ann Kemble, and shares the life and experiences of a little human being who, more than most children, must have been a source of perplexity and dismay to her parents. With all the faults of a passionate, proud, imperious disposition, are mingled such genuine nobleness and truthfulness, and such a strong and ever-abiding instinct of duty, that the reader becomes her partisan; but to those about her "pretty Fanny's way" must have been tormenting usually, and highly exasperating sometimes. She was endowed with the most perilous organization that could be bestowed on a woman. Mrs. Kemble has more than once given to the world portions of her history, and they have been more or less histories of the shipwreck of the hopes and aspirations with which her life began. The present "record" furnishes the explanation. And if enemies and detractors can ever be turned into friends and well-wishers this record of a girlhood ought to go far towards allaying a disposition to pass harsh judgment on anybody, for it shows how little people outside know of the inner life of those nearest to them, not to speak of those whom they only see and hear of at a distance. Her own words are significant: —

> With a highly susceptible and excitable nervous temperament and ill-regulated imagination, I have suffered from every conceivable form of terror; and though, for some inexplicable reason, I have always had the reputation of being fearless, have really, all my life, been extremely deficient in courage. Very impetuous, and liable to be carried away by any strong emotion, my entire want of self-control and prudence, I suppose, conveyed the impression that I was equally without fear; but the truth is that, as a wise friend once said to me, I have always been "as rash and as cowardly as a child;" and none of my sex had a better right to apply to herself Shakespeare's line, —
> A woman naturally born to fears.

The "Records of a Girlhood" in no respect goes back over any portions of her story already told by Mrs. Kemble, — the book takes up entirely fresh ground, — and the curtain drops upon the ominous words, "I was married in Philadelphia on the 7th of June, 1834, to Mr. Pierce Butler, of that city."

The interest of the personal narrative is increased by the incidental notices of persons of social, literary, and political distinction, and by sketches of London society as it was in the stormy days when reform and revolution were making men's hearts fail with forebodings. The various personages are described with an ease and a force which bring them clearly before the reader. It is obvious that the writer's powers have never been developed to their full possibilities, — at least, they have never borne adequate fruit. In this sense the present book is melancholy; otherwise, it is bright and many-colored. It is provoking, however, that, when most of the persons noted are dead or passed away, Mrs. Kemble should speak of them as letters of the alphabet. Convicts are numbered: she might have given names.

Frances Ann Kemble was born on the 27th of November, 1809, in Newman Street. She was the third child of Charles Kemble, the brother of John Kemble, and of Mrs. Siddons. Of her mother Mrs. Kemble speaks in touching and affectionate terms. Her father was Captain Decamp, a French officer, who had married the daughter of a Swiss farmer in the neighborhood of Berne. Captain Decamp, a highly accomplished man, was unfortunately induced to settle in London with the promise of much patronage and protection from influential friends. He came with the first rush of the French emigrants, and found London inundated with objects of sympathy, and himself lost in the crowd. He gave lessons on the flute and in drawing, but his health failed and his family increased, and, if it had not been for the little Maria Theresa (named after the empress), they must have starved. She became an actress in a then famous troupe of children, who acted Berquin's and Madame de Genlis's plays, and her grace, beauty, and talent made her a favorite. Here is a glimpse of a royal and domestic interior into which she was introduced: —

> The little French fairy was eagerly seized upon by admiring fine ladies and gentlemen, and snatched up into their society, where she was fondled and petted and played with; passing whole days in Mrs. Fitzherbert's drawing-room, and many a half-hour on the knees of her royal and disloyal husband, the prince regent, one of whose favorite jokes was to place my mother under a huge glass bell, made to cover some large group of precious Dresden china, where her tiny figure and flashing face produced even a more beautiful effect than the costly work of art whose crystal covering was made her momentary cage. I have often heard my mother refer to this season of her childhood's favoritism with the fine folk of that day, one of her most vivid impressions of which was the extraordinary beauty of person and royal charm of manner and deportment of the Prince of Wales, and — his enormous appetite; enormous, perhaps, after all, only by comparison with her own, which he compassionately used to pity, saying frequently, when she declined the delicacies that he pressed upon her, "Why, you poor child! Heaven has not blessed you with an appetite." . . . After six years spent in a bitter struggle with disease and difficulties of every kind, my grandfather, still a young man, died of consumption, leaving a widow and five little children, of whom the eldest, my mother, not yet in her teens, became from that time the bread-winner and sole support.

She grew up to be a noble woman, and made her mark in her profession. She was married early and very happily to Charles Kemble, and their household seems from these "Records" to have been a model of somewhat stately regularity; for the ci-devant French fairy proved an admirable housewife, the qualities of generations of Swiss ancestors blooming afresh in her. For none of her children had the stage attraction; indeed, they all had a repugnance to it as a profession, and although Frances Ann inherited the Kemble genius, yet its development was hindered by the intense aversion which no success nor excitement ever mitigated. Here is her own account of how she came to be an actress: —

It was in the autumn of 1829, my father being then absent on a professional tour in Ireland, that my mother, coming in from walking one day, threw herself into a chair and burst into tears. She had been evidently much depressed for some time past, and I was alarmed at her distress, of which I begged her to tell me the cause. "Oh, it has come at last," she answered; "our property is to be sold. I have seen that fine building all covered with placards and bills of sale; the theatre must be closed, and I know not how many hundred poor people will be turned adrift without employment!" I believe the theatre employed regularly seven hundred persons in all its different departments, without reckoning the great number of what were called supernumeraries, who were hired by the night at Christmas, Easter, and on all occasions of any specially showy spectacle. . . . I comforted my mother with expressions of pity and affection, and, as soon as I left her, wrote a most urgent entreaty to my father that he would allow me to act for myself, and seek employment as a governess, so as to relieve him at once at least of the burden of my maintenance. I brought this letter to my mother, and begged her permission to send it, to which she consented; but, as I afterwards learnt, she wrote by the same post to my father, requesting him not to give a positive answer to my letter until his return to town. The next day she asked me whether I seriously thought I had any real talent for the stage. My school-day triumphs in Racine's "Andromaque" were far enough behind me, and I could only answer, with as much perplexity as good faith, that I had not the slightest idea whether I had or not. She begged me to learn some part and say it to her, that she might form some opinion of my power, and I chose Shakespeare's Portia, then, as now, my ideal of a perfect woman. . . . Having learnt it by heart, I recited Portia to my mother, whose only comment was, "There is hardly passion enough in this part to test any tragic power. I wish you would study Juliet for me." Study to me then, as unfortunately long afterwards, simply meant to learn by heart, which I did again, and repeated my lesson to my mother, who again heard me without any observation whatever. Meantime my father returned to town and my letter remained unanswered, and I was wondering in my mind what reply I should receive to my urgent entreaty, when one morning my mother told me she wished me to recite Juliet to my father; and so in the evening I stood up before them both, and with indescribable trepidation repeated my first lesson in tragedy. They neither of them said anything beyond, "Very well, — very nice, my dear," with many kisses and caresses, from which I escaped to sit down on the stairs half-way between the drawing-room and my bedroom, and get rid of the repressed nervous fear I had struggled with while reciting, in floods of tears. A few days after this my father told me he wished to take me to the theatre with him to try whether my voice was of sufficient strength to fill the building; so thither I went. That strange-looking place, the stage, with its racks of pasteboard and canvas — streets, forests, banqueting-halls, and dungeons — drawn apart on either side, was empty and silent; not a soul was stirring in the indistinct recesses of its mysterious depths, which seemed to stretch indefinitely behind me. In front, the great amphitheatre equally empty and silent, wrapped in its grey holland covers, would have been absolutely dark but for a long, sharp, thin shaft of light that darted here and there from some height and distance far above me, and alighted in a sudden, vivid spot of brightness on the stage. Set down in the midst of twilight space, as it were, with only my father's voice coming to me from where he stood hardly distinguishable in the gloom, in those poetical utterances of pathetic passion I was seized with the spirit of the thing; my voice resounded through the great vault above and before me, and, completely carried away by the inspiration of the wonderful play, I acted Juliet as I do not believe I ever acted it again, for I had no visible Romeo, and no audience to thwart my imagination; at least, I had no consciousness of any, though in truth I had one. In the back of one of the private boxes, commanding the stage but perfectly invisible to me, sat an old and warmly attached friend of my father's, Major D——. . . . Not till after the event had justified my kind old friend's prophecy did I know that he had witnessed that morning's performance, and, joining my father at the end of it, had said, "Bring her out at once; it will be a great success." And so three weeks from that time I was brought out, and it was a "great success." Three weeks was not much time for preparation of any sort for such an experiment, but I had no more, to become acquainted with my fellow actors and actresses, not one of whom I had ever spoken with or seen — off the stage — before; to learn all the technical business, as it is called, of the stage.

The dress selected, for her mother, strong in her experience and good sense, set aside all suggestions of historical and artistic innovation, was a dress of plain white satin with a long train, short sleeves and low body, a girdle of fine paste brilliants, and a small coronet of the same to hold up her hair, dressed as she usually wore it — "perfectly simple," as she says, "it was unlike anything Juliet ever wore as possible."

All being in due preparation for my coming out, my rehearsals were the only interruption to my usual habits of occupation, which I pursued very steadily in spite of my impending trial. On the day of my first appearance I had no rehearsal, for fear of over-fatigue, and spent my morning as usual, in practising the piano, walking in the inclosure of St. James's Park opposite our house, and reading in Blunt's "Scripture Characters" (a book in which I was then deeply interested) the chapters relating to St. Peter and Jacob. I do not know whether the nervous tension which I must have been enduring strengthened the impression made upon me by what I read, but I remember being quite absorbed by it, which I think was curious, because certainly such subjects of meditation were hardly allied to the painful undertaking so immediately pressing upon me. But I believe I felt imperatively the necessity of moderating my own strong nervous emotion and excitement by the fulfilment of my accustomed duties and pursuits, and, above all, by withdrawing my mind into higher and serener regions of thought as a respite and relief from the pressure of my alternate apprehensions of failure and hopes of success. I do not mean that it was at all a matter of deliberate calculation or reflection, but rather an instinct of self-preservation, which actuated me; a powerful instinct which has struggled and partially prevailed throughout my whole life against the irregular and passionate vehemence of my temperament, and which, in spite of a constant tendency to violent excitement of mind and feeling, has made me a person of unusually systematic pursuits and monotonous habits, and been a frequent subject of astonishment, not unmixed with ridicule, to my friends, who have not known as well as myself what wholesomeness there was in the method of my madness. . . . My mother, who had left the stage for upwards of twenty years, determined to return to it on the night of my first appearance, that I might have the comfort and support of her being with me in my trial. We drove to the theatre very early, indeed while the late autumn sunlight yet lingered in the sky; it shone into the carriage upon me, and as I screened my eyes from it, my mother said, "Heaven smiles on you, my child." My poor mother went to her dressing-room to get herself ready, and did not return to me for fear of increasing my agitation by her own. My dear aunt Dall and my maid and the theatre dresser performed my toilet for me, and at length I was placed in a chair, with my satin train carefully laid over the back of it, and there I sat, ready for execution, with the palms of my hands pressed convulsively together, and the tears I in vain endeavored to repress welling up into my eyes and brimming slowly over, down my rouged cheeks, upon which my aunt, with a smile full of pity, renewed the color as often as these heavy drops made unsightly streaks in it. Once and again my father came to the door, and I heard his anxious "How is she?" to which my aunt answered, sending him away with words of comforting cheer. At last, "Miss Kemble called for the stage, ma'am!" accompanied with a brisk tap at the door, started me upright on my feet, and I was led round to the side scene opposite to the one from which I saw my mother advance on the stage; and while the uproar of her reception filled me with terror, dear old Mrs. Davenport, my nurse, and dear Mr. Keely, her Peter, and half the dramatis personæ of the play (but not my father, who had retreated, quite unable to endure the scene) stood round me as I lay, all but insensible, in my aunt's arms. "Courage, courage, dear child! poor thing!" reiterated Mrs. Davenport. "Never mind 'em, Miss Kemble!" urged Keely, in that irresistibly comical, nervous, lachrymose voice of his, which I have never since heard without a thrill of anything but comical association; "never mind 'em! don't think of 'em, any more than if they were so many rows of cabbages!" "Nurse!" called my mother, and on waddled Mrs. Davenport, and, turning back, called in her turn, "Juliet!" My aunt gave me an impulse forward, and I ran straight across the stage, stunned with the tremendous shout that greeted me, my eyes covered with mist, and the green baize flooring of the stage feeling as if it rose up against my feet; but I got hold of my mother, and stood like a terrified creature at bay, confronting the huge theatre full of gazing human beings. I do not think a word I uttered during this scene could have been audible; in the next, the ball-room, I began to forget myself; in the following one, the balcony scene, I had done so, and, for aught I knew, I was Juliet; the passion I was uttering sending hot waves of blushes all over my neck and shoulders, while the poetry sounded like music to me as I spoke it, with no consciousness of anything before me, utterly transported into the imaginary existence of the play. After this, I did not return into myself till all was over, and amid a tumultuous storm of applause, congratulation, tears, embraces, and a general joyous explosion of unutterable relief at the fortunate termination of my attempt, we went home. And so my life was determined, and I devoted myself to an avocation which I never liked or honored, and about the very nature of which I have never been able to come to any decided opinion. It is in vain that the undoubted specific gifts of great actors and actresses suggest that all gifts are given for rightful exercise, and not suppression; in vain that Shakespeare's plays urge their imperative claim to the most perfect illustration they can receive from histrionic interpretation: a business which is incessant excitement and factitious emotion seems to me unworthy of a man; a business which is public exhibition, unworthy of a woman. . . . Nevertheless, [she adds] I sat down to supper with my poor rejoicing parents well content, God knows.

Her delight was enhanced by a lovely little watch, all encrusted with gold and jewels, which her father laid beside her plate, the first she had ever possessed, and which she christened "Romeo." After this her life settled into its new shape. Her salary was fixed at thirty guineas a week, and she records how she went in person to the treasury the next Saturday, and carried the first money she had earned triumphantly to her mother.

There had been some difficulty in arranging a Romeo to the new Juliet — her father took the part of Mercutio, though he had been a favorite Romeo; and Mr. Abbot, a respectable, but not at all ideal actor, was appointed her stage lover.

The public, who had long been familiar with my father's rendering of the part of Romeo, gained as much as I lost by his taking that of Mercutio, which has never since been so admirably represented, and I dare affirm will never be given more perfectly. . . . He was one of the best Romeos, and incomparably the best Mercutio, that ever trod the English stage. My father was Miss O'Neill's Romeo throughout her whole theatrical career, during which no other Juliet was tolerated by the English public. This amiable and excellent woman was always an attached friend of our family, and one day, when she was about to take leave of me, at the end of a morning visit, I begged her to let my father have the pleasure of seeing her, and ran to his study to tell him whom I had with me. He followed me hastily to the drawing-room, and, stopping at the door, extended his arms towards her, exclaiming, "Ah, Juliet!" Lady Becher ran to him and embraced him with a pretty, affectionate grace, and the scene was pathetical as well as comical, for they were both white-haired, she being considerably upwards of sixty and he of seventy years old; but she still retained the slender elegance of her exquisite figure, and he some traces of his pre-eminent personal beauty.

One of the most notable results of her going on the stage was the renewal of a long-dropped friendship with Sir Thomas Lawrence, whose inexplicable conduct towards two of the daughters of Mrs. Siddons, to both of whom he was engaged, had been followed by suffering, death, and entire estrangement.

It was years after these events that Lawrence, meeting my father accidentally in the street one day, stopped him and spoke with great feeling of his sympathy for us all in my approaching trial, and begged permission to come and see my mother and become acquainted with me, which he accordingly did; and from that time till his death, which occurred but a few months later, he was unwearied in acts of friendly and affectionate kindness to me.

He never missed any of her performances; he wrote her the most beautiful notes of mingled criticism and flattery, and he made a pencil sketch of her, which he gave her mother.

Lawrence did not talk much while he took his sketch of me, and I remember very little that passed between him and my mother but what was purely personal. I recollect he told me that I had a double row of eyelashes, which was an unusual peculiarity. He expressed the most decided preference for satin over every other material for painting, expatiating rapturously on the soft, rich folds and infinitely varied lights and shadows which that texture afforded above all others. He has dressed a great many of his female portraits in white satin. He also once said that he had been haunted at one time with the desire to paint a blush, that most enchanting "incident" in the expression of a woman's face, but, after being driven nearly wild with the ineffectual endeavor, had had to renounce it, never, of course, he said, achieving anything but a red face. I remember the dreadful impression made upon me by a story he told my mother of Lady J—— (George the Fourth's Lady J——), who, standing before her drawing-room looking-glass, and unaware that he was in the rooms, apostrophized her own reflection with this reflection: "I swear it would be better to go to hell at once than live to grow old and ugly."

The unexpected death of Lawrence prevented the commencement of a life-sized portrait of the young actress as Juliet, and Mrs. Kemble candidly owns that such was the charm of his countenance, the distinction of his person, the refined gentleness of his voice and manner, that had the intercourse continued much longer, in spite of the forty years' difference of age and the knowledge of his disastrous relations with her cousins, she must have fallen in love with him herself, and become the third of her family whose life he would have troubled. He had a false, superficial sensibility which not only induced women to fall in love with him, but enabled him to believe he was in love with them. "I think he was a dangerous person, because his experience and genius made him delightfully attractive, and the dexterity of his flattery amounted in itself to a fine art."

PRINCE BISMARCK.

THE English public is indebted to the Times for a summary of a work in which more is told about a great man than a great man usually allows to be told about him in his lifetime. This work is the production of an ardent admirer of Prince Bismarck, and it is safe to guess that the bulk of the composition is not as amusing and interesting as the extracts which have been judiciously selected from it. But at any rate these extracts are amusing and interesting in the highest degree. They place before us the prince in all his calculated audacity, and they contain a number of his judgments on some of the most eminent of his contemporaries. It has apparently been his lot in life to have principally to deal with two classes of men — cowards and fools; and he delights in thinking that he has bullied the former and gauged the capacity of the latter. When he first entered on his task of re-fashioning Germany, he found Austria in possession not only of a political but of a social supremacy. Not only was Austria the head of the confederation, but it was accepted as a maxim that Austria was socially above all other members of the confederation, that the emperor of Austria was the king of all other German kings, and that they were to treat him as nobles treat a sovereign. His representatives were to do as they pleased, and the representatives of other German states were only to follow the Austrian example if expressly invited to do so. The Prussian court was always stringing itself up to dispute the political supremacy of Austria, but until Prince Bismarck arrived on the scene it never ventured to call the social supremacy of Austria in question. Social habits color political thoughts so profoundly that, as the prince saw, a social must precede a political revolution. Unless, when they met, the representatives of Prussia behaved as if conscious of being on an equality with the representatives of Austria, no one would believe that Prussia was really prepared to challenge Austria in the field of politics. A social Sadowa was indispensable, and the prince fought and won his Sadowa on the great question of tobacco. It had become a recognized usage that the Austrian representative should smoke while engaged in business, but that no one else might smoke in his august presence. On the sittings of the military commission Count Thun alone smoked, and the Prussian Rochow, although longing to light his cigar, did not dare to presume so far. It was expected, as a matter of course, that the Prussian commissioner would show as much deference to the Austrian commissioner as a commissioner from Würtemberg or Darmstadt. Prince Bismarck had the courage, and real courage was required, to break the spell. He had previously called on Count Thun and been desired to wait while the count smoked and went on with his business. Bismarck quietly took a cigar out of the count's box and smoked too. But this was only in private, and the count might think that it was a mere piece of undesigned gaucherie. It was very different when, in the sitting of a commission with all the delegates of the minor states present as spectators, Bismarck, on seeing Count Thun smoke, pulled a cigar out of his pocket and asked for a light. There was a moment of awe and expectancy, during which the assemply waited to see what the count would do. He capitulated, and did as he was asked. The social supremacy of Austria vanished in the fumes of a cigar.

The prince has been extremely free in giving his confidential friend the means of knowing and publishing the opinions he has formed as to some of those with whom he carried on his diplomatic struggles. This is especially the case with his French friends or enemies. He seems to have had a very poor opinion of the late emperor of the French, and to have formed the conclusion that there was little strength or wisdom beneath the emperor's silence and reserve. He was, as the prince thinks, nothing more than a Tiefenbacher, a popular German expression for a hesitating, pretentious, indolent general. The diplomatic ability of M. Thiers did not impress him as much as might have been expected. "He came to me as a negotiator when he had not gumption enough for a horse-dealer." The prince found it easy to worm secrets out of him, and managed to make him tell that Paris had only provisions for a month more. It would be interesting to know what was the occasion to which the prince was referring. It is very difficult to find any interview which could have been in his mind except one of those that took place in the October of 1870. If the secret was then wormed out of M. Thiers, the secret had at least the diplomatic merit of not being true, as the provisions of Paris lasted more than three months after October. When, again, the prince says that M. Thiers was far too sentimental to bargain well, he might have recollected that it was in deference to the passionate appeals of M. Thiers that Belfort was given up to France. M. Thiers may not have had the supreme ability of a judicious horse-dealer, but when he was negotiating with Prince Bismarck he was not in the position of a man who wants to sell or buy a horse. The prince had got the horse of M. Thiers, and all that M. Thiers could do was to buy his own horse back as cheaply as its possessor by violence would permit. Contemporary Frenchmen will, however, not mind much what the prince has chosen to say about M. Thiers or the emperor. Their amusement or indignation will be reserved for the prince's withering remarks about M. Jules Favre. Of course Bismarck thought Jules Favre foolishly and despicably sentimental. But a Frenchman does not mind being thought sentimental by a German. That he feels acutely and shows his feelings openly is to a Frenchman part of his natural superiority. M. Jules Favre would not lose anything of his own respect or of the respect of others if all the world knew that he cried when outbargained by a German horse-dealer. On the contrary, M. Jules Favre has always been proud, and his friends have been proud with him, that he shed bitter, scalding tears when the cession of Metz and Strasburg was broached. He swears he cried, and M. Jules Simon, as a friend and an historian, knows that he cried. But the prince cruelly digs him a blow that will come to him like a fatal stab. He says that M. Jules Favre did, indeed, try to cry, but that he could not manage it. The tears would not flow, and so the scenic effect was spoilt, although M. Jules Favre had prepared for it with the utmost care by painting his face white. There is scarcely anything in history more grimly comic than the scene which is thus suggested. Very possibly the prince only saw what his cynicism allowed him to see. He may have been so tickled with the supposed spectacle of a rival diplomatist having powdered or painted his face to the proper agony tint, and not being able to blubber when the expected moment for blubbering arrived, that he may have been blind to tears that were really shed and to a face of its natural hue. But nothing will diminish the delight of the Conservative journals of France in the story as Prince Bismarck has chosen to tell it.

His own countrymen, however, are judged with the same severity, and stung with the same shafts of ridicule. The main impression which his intercourse with the most eminent of them seems to have left on him is that they were chiefly eminent as bores. Nothing can be more graphic or amusing than his description of the great Humboldt prosing on with a eulogy of some unknown French luminary, while General Gerlach snored on a stool, the queen was lost in the contemplation of her embroidery, and the king occupied himself with turning over a book of engravings. The prince boasts that he possesses in the highest perfection the art of standing bores when anything is to be gained by standing them, and that in his younger days he won the confidence and affection of Metternich by simply entreating him to go on and on when he had once begun to maunder. The habitual prolixity, however, of Prussian ambassadors not only tried but exhausted his patience. He complained to his confidant with much bitterness of the endless piles of perfectly useless correspondence with which Count Von der Goltz and Count Bernstorff used to inundate the Foreign Office. According to Prince Bismarck, the former diplomatist had not an idea in his head, except such as were inspired by his infatuation for the successive queens in whose courts he lived; and yet Von der Goltz sent him reams of paper about nothing, and was only outstripped by Count Bernstorff in the profuseness of a correspondence which the prince thought valueless. He owned that Arnim was intelligent, but his perpetual vacillations irritated a chief who always had clear opinions, and was always sure that his clear opinions were right. The prince himself always went to work in the shortest way. He recounts how the Duke of Augustenburg lost a crown during an hour's conversation with him in a billiard-room. Bismarck began by calling the duke "Highness," to give him a foretaste of the glories awaiting him, then intimated that Prussia must have Kiel given her by the possible monarch, and on finding the duke stiffer than was convenient, began to call him "Serenity," to show that his chance was gone, and plainly told him in the end that Prussia could wring the neck of the chicken she had hatched. In short, Prince Bismarck was much abler and much bolder, and, it may be added, much more unscrupulous, than those with whom he had to deal. The work he had to do was as rough as it was great, and probably a less dictatorial man could not have done it. Success has glorified a character which failure would have exposed to much merited reproach.

POTTERY AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION.

THE extensive collection of pottery at the Paris Exhibition brought together from so many countries, is of high interest from a technical, as well as from an art point of view. All that is now being done in pottery manufacture, all that has lately been achieved in the way of progress, has been here illustrated. An examination, even a rapid one, shows at once how far in advance of other countries England and France are.

Leaving all strictly art questions out of consideration, it is instructive to notice how the technical processes of manufacture impose limits on an artist's scope, and how these scopes have been widened by recent discoveries. It is not intended in this short note to do more than allude to the more important of these, and before doing so it is worth while mentioning that for domestic purposes English earthenware is still unapproached.

The pâte-sur-pâte decoration, so largely used in England and in France, is a good illustration of how a process in itself confines the artist's power within certain limits.

The nature of the ornamentation consists in applying by the brush, and modelling with tools, raised decorations of "paste," which is often, for the sake of artistic effect, in high relief. The paste is of much the same composition as the body on which it is applied, and requires a similar temperature to convert it into China, i.e., 1,800° C. The colors which can be used for staining this paste must therefore also be capable of being produced at this heat, and the result is an entirely new range of ceramic colors. It is fortunate for the success of this style of decoration that the colors obtained are harmonious, of a subdued tone. They are quite unlike any that can be produced at a lower heat. Apart from the artist's manipulation, which may vary much in delicacy, the general effect of the production is almost wholly the natural result of the process, and is therefore not due entirely to the artist.

Another and distinct application of raised decoration is very largely represented in the French court. It was first used at Bourg-la-Reine some ten years ago, and is now made in many other localities. It consists of painting in clay on earthenware with pallet and brush in various gradations of relief, somewhat like impasto. The heat for firing is comparatively moderate, and the range of colors that can be employed is very wide.

The difficulties of painting under glaze are by degrees being overcome, and one manufacturer has, for the first time, produced gilding under glaze. The colored glazes shown are rich and brilliant, and are well worth the particular notice of those who have paid attention to their production.

The organization of the Sèvres manufactory and the fact that it is under the direction of a chemist of repute lead to expectations of discovery resulting from the research here carried out. And as a fact discoveries of no small value have been made of late years. Besides such discoveries as of compounds yielding new colors, there are some which take rank as new processes.

For example, the late François Richard, an artist on the staff of the manufactory, found that a large proportion of the enamel colors can be made which will bear a temperature of 600° C. — a higher temperature than has been hitherto supposed possible. This higher temperature now employed fuses and softens the glaze; the colors painted on it blend with it so that, on cooling, there is produced that softness and brilliancy hitherto characteristic of pâte-tendre decoration. This process has been named the demi-grand feu. A great benefit arising from this discovery is that many vases damaged in firing, which would formerly have been abandoned, can now be preserved, as the accidents which so often happen in firing can be repaired. Defects in glaze and color can be concealed, as, during an exposure to this demi-grand feu, they are at melting-point, and new glaze, when added, becomes so fused that no line of junction is visible. This process also gets over a difficulty that had long been felt in decorating kaolin, or pâte-dur china, with a pleasing result, as the colors were always crude and harsh, being on the glaze. When a soft effect was required recourse was had to the less durable and more costly pâte-tendre as a body on which to paint.

A new method for decorating porcelain where gold alone is employed has been invented by M. Réjoux. Formerly, when porcelain was decorated with gilding alone, the ornamentation was limited to the production of a pattern by the greater or less relief of the gold, and by its being burnished or left dead. Even the thinnest part of the gilding was opaque. No delicate effects could be produced, and the style was suited rather for an abundant display of barbaric wealth than for refinement of expression.

The new process enables the gilding to be put on so thinly and transparently that the most delicate effects of light and shade can be produced. It is, however, applicable only to vases of gros bleu color, that is, to vases colored with oxide of cobalt. Upon this ground the pattern is drawn with a pigment composed of oxide of aluminium. This is then subjected to a firing which fuses the oxides together, and a brown surface results. This surface is found to be more suitable than any other known for the reception of the gold paste, which can be laid on in a thin film, and then, further, by subsequent removal, can be made to give great transparency. This property of the brown surface is not destroyed by being tinted before the gilding, so that it is possible to tint it with different colors which shall show through. A further variation is very frequently obtained by changing the tone of the gold by mixing it with alloys. This admirable effect of transparency has not been produced by any other means, and the first piece made (with many subsequent) is exhibited.

Another of the processes invented at Sèvres is that of enamelling on pâte-tendre body. In this the colors are applied in powder in the same way as in enamelling on metal, and are fused at a very low temperature. They have more body and are more decided than are those produced by the older enamelling process. On some of the vases shown at the Exhibition the white ground seen is not that of the creamy pâte-tendre body, but the pearl white of the stanniferous enamel.

Other recent improvements which should find a place in a more technical and exhaustive notice have been illustrated at the Exhibition. It may be mentioned that other nations are striving to adapt some of the traditionally recognized styles and their method of manufacture.

We may, in conclusion, refer to a small but important exhibition of porcelain, allant-au-feu, useful for laboratory as well as for domestic use. It is a very good white, thin and hard, and will bear high temperatures if the changes are not too sudden.

MEMOIRS OF MRS. JAMESON.*

THIS very graceful sketch of a very graceful writer has an additional element of pathos in the fact that the volume is an epitaph at once on its heroine and its author. Mrs. Macpherson died as it was passing through the press; and it was left to Mrs. Oliphant to bestow the final revision as a tribute of love to both. Mrs. Jameson died eighteen years ago, and the present generation has outgrown her æsthetic views. If her books on "Sacred and Legendary Art" still survive, theirs is a kind of life corresponding somewhat to the succès d'estime awarded to inconsiderable works by honored names. It was, however, the mental personality that was always more attractive in Mrs. Jameson's many volumes than her actual judgments upon this or that painter. Though the opinions may be now somewhat faded, the interest of the intellectual character remains. This is brought into fair relief by her niece's biography. If, as we gather from the preface, the publication was stimulated by some depreciatory remarks on Mrs. Jameson in Miss Martineau's autobiography, we feel a certain gratitude to Miss Martineau for that special little burst of malevolence.

Mrs. Jameson's father, Brownell Murphy, an old associate of Robert Emmett and Lord Edward Fitzgerald, was happily saved from sharing their fate by the cares of a large family. He had to come to England to make a livelihood as a miniature painter just before the final catastrophe of Irish patriotism. After a fairly successful career in Newcastle, he migrated to Pall Mall. Anna, the eldest of several daughters, was the despot of the family, but an admired one. Not satisfied with French, Italian, and Spanish, she devoured the Oriental disquisitions of Sir William Jones, and composed an Eastern story, "Faizy," for the delectation of the nursery. Her father was not too well off, and an account of lace-making in Flanders suggested to her a scheme for taking her sisters to Belgium to make Brussels lace and the family fortunes. The design was to follow the Paddington Canal till it should enter the sea and then take ship. Their parents, who were sufficiently Irish to enjoy traces of Bohemianism in their children, listened to the project without vetoing it. But the domestic faint-heartedness of Mrs. Macpherson's mother broke it down on the very evening which had been chosen for the start. At sixteen independence was more practicable than at twelve, and Anna became governess in Lord Winchester's family. There she stayed for four years. For the next six or seven years she appears to have lived at home. In 1821 she undertook the charge of a young lady who was going with her family to Italy. That journey inspired her first attempt at authorship. The journal she kept was subsequently developed into her "Diary of an Ennuyée. The tour lasted a year, and on its conclusion she became a governess in Staffordshire for four years. In the mean time she had fallen in love, or fancied she had, with a Mr. Robert Jameson, a young barrister, a protégé of Wordsworth, described by so unfriendly a critic as Mrs. Macpherson as "in all the bloom of life and enthusiasm, of agreeable looks, and manners said to have been most fascinating." An engagement was contracted between them in 1821. They quarrelled and broke it off in the same year; but in 1825 it was revived, very unfortunately for both of them, and they were married in 1825, when the lady was thirty-one years of age. On a Wednesday these two persons, each very agreeable in the eyes of his or her friends, were married, and made their bower in dull lodgings between Gower Street and Tottenham Court Road. On the following Sunday the husband announced his intention to spend the day with some friends of his as yet unknown to his wife, giving her the option to go or stay at home. A shower which they encountered on their way offered her an excuse for turning back. "Very well," said the bridegroom; "you have an umbrella. Go back by all means; but I shall go on." And so he did; and though received, as his astonished hosts afterwards related, with exclamations of bewilderment and consternation, calmly ate his dinner with them, and spent the rest of the evening, until his usual hour, with perfect equanimity and unconcern. Four years of such a life cannot have been very comfortable to either; and when Mr. Jameson, in 1829, accepted a puisne judgeship in Dominica, he left his wife with her family. By this time she had become a popular author. Her "Diary of an Ennuyée" had been published originally by a bookseller named Thomas. This rather remarkable person, who had begun life as a cobbler, and who was afterwards tempted by social ambition and the acquaintance of Mr. Basil Montagu to degenerate into an industrious, but not specially successful, serjeant-at-law, was a friend of Mr. Jameson, and heard Mrs. Jameson read parts of the diary she had kept on her tour in 1821. He offered to print it, and she gave it him on the terms that she was to have a guitar out of the possible profits. Colburn the publisher bought the copyright of Thomas for 50*l.*, and Thomas presented the writer with a ten-guinea guitar. Fifty years ago female authors were not so plentiful as now. Mr. Jameson's banishment to the West Indies thus left his wife an admired member of the circle which regarded Mr. Basil Montagu's house in Bedford Square as something between an hotel and a Parnassus. But, besides Bedford Square, Mr. Brownell Murphy's patrons appreciated Mrs. Jameson's abilities. On her husband's departure she accompanied her father and Sir Gerard Noel and his daughter on a pleasant and luxurious Continental tour. Mrs. Jameson's character was always unimpeached and unimpeachable; otherwise, from her own admiring description, Sir Gerard might have seemed an alarming member of a travelling party: "He had been one of the prince's wild companions in the days of Sheridan and Fox. He had lived a life which would have ruined twenty iron constitutions, and had suffered what might well have broken twenty hearts of common stuff; but his self-complacency was invulnerable, his animal spirits inexhaustible, his activity indefatigable." His good qualities must have been even more dangerous than his bad. "He could play alternately blackguard and gentleman, each in perfection; but the high-born gentleman ever prevailed." Tears he possessed at command, and could curse and weep with equal facility. He once said to Mrs. Jameson, "When I wish to enjoy the very high sublime of luxury, I dine alone, order a mutton cutlet, cuite à point, with a bottle of Burgundy on one side and Ovid's Epistle of Penelope to Ulysses on the other. And so I read, and eat, and cry to myself." Then he repeated with enthusiasm, — his eyes glistening as he recited the lines.

Hanc tua Penelope lento tibi mittit, Ulysse :
Nil mihi rescribas, attamen ipse veni ;

Mr. Jameson does not seem to have found his judicial income sufficient to enable him to contribute to his wife's support; and she embraced literature as a profession. One of her earlier works was undertaken in conjunction with her father. Mr. Murphy had been commissioned by the Princess Charlotte to paint copies in miniature of Sir Peter Lely's "Windsor Beauties" now at Hampton Court. He finished the series to the satisfaction of his patroness, who, however, noticed one exception. "'Mr. Murphy,' she said, 'I see the set of portraits is not complete.' 'Indeed! I believe your Royal Highness will find that none have been omitted.' 'Nay, Mr. Murphy, the "Windsor Beauties" are not complete. You haven't got my grandmother.'" The princess died, and, strangely enough, Prince Leopold refused to purchase the copies. Mr. Murphy endeavored to pay himself for his labor by engraving the portraits, and publishing them as "The Beauties of the Court of King Charles II.," with illustrative memoirs by his daughter. The enterprise was not renumerative. Mrs. Jameson's next undertaking, "Characteristics of Women," which she would have done more wisely to entitle, in accordance with her friend Fanny Kemble's suggestion, "Characters of Shakespeare's Women," had better fortune. It gave her an introduction to the best literary society of Dresden, whither she went in 1833 after an episode of a few months' residence with her husband, who had resigned his judgeship in Dominica and been appointed attorney general at Toronto. A friend who sought her acquaintance at this time, Robert Noel, a cousin of Lady Byron, having himself a German wife, was doubtless able to introduce her to the leaders of letters in Germany. Like Mr. Ticknor and every other visitor to Dresden in those days, she was enchanted by Tieck's readings of Shakespeare, especially of the humorous and declamatory passages. We dare say she thought Tieck was equally impressed with her Shakespearian interpretations. Unfortunately the British Museum possesses Tieck's presentation copy of her "Characteristics of Women," and his annotations on some of her most eloquent rhapsodies are "Dies scheint mir ganz missverstanden," and the like. Mr. Noel introduced her at Weimar to Goethe's family, and she became an intimate friend of Goethe's daughter-in-law, Ottilie von Goethe. For thirty years they corresponded, and often met, now in Weimar, now in Vienna, Dresden, Venice, or Rome.

From Germany she was recalled to England by the news that her father had been seized by paralysis. It is rather hard to understand why the interruption of her tour should have mattered very much. But the ways of literary ladies are past finding out. She writes to her friend Mr. Robert Noel, whom she commonly addresses as "My dear Noel" — "I feel so convinced that I have done right in coming that I cannot repent it." We should have supposed that this was self-evident. She continues, however, "But my reason tells me that I have done no real and effectual good; and can do none. Therefore, I repent it. . . . I could sit down and wring my hands." In any case she utilized her attendance at her father's bedside by collecting for republication, under the title of "Visits and Sketches," a series of essays which had already appeared in various forms. Undoubtedly she thought herself a very hardly-used person. "Outwardly," she writes, "I stand in the world an enviable being; inwardly it is a hard struggle. Of how many women might the history be comprised in these few words, 'She lived, suffered, and was buried!'" Courted by all who cared for lions and lionesses in London, and able to welcome German visitors with little entertainments attended by "Harriet Martineau, Mrs. Opie, and Mrs. Austen; Hayward, the famous German scholar; Biggs, R.A., and Eastlake, R.A., two of our best painters," she was surprised by the extraordinary discovery that the Canadian attorney-general thought he had a right to his wife's company. "Mrs. Jameson's independent condition, the warm friends she had on all sides, the high estimation in which she was universally held; and, on the other hand, the fact that her marriage was childless, made her all the less willing to revive an experiment which had already failed more than once." While her husband was appealing to her to comfort his solitude, telling her of the garden he was planting for her, and the pretty cottage he was planning, she was "trying to drown her fears of the future"

amid German court dinners and balls. Life in Canada could scarcely offer pleasant prospects to a lady who could write, "I accept about one invitation out of three, for I have something better to do than to stand dangling in a court circle talking nothings." Mr. Jameson accused his wife of not writing to him for four or five months. She charged him with writing twice in a year and a half. She refused to rejoin him except in deference to a positive command, and this at last he gave. Accordingly, in September, 1836, she sailed for Canada. In New York she was received with enthusiasm and overwhelmed with presents, including a wampum bag; but she found no husband or husband's friend waiting to attend her to Toronto. After waiting long and wearily, she ventured on a winter journey to Canada. The "Ontario" steamer, which finally landed her at Toronto, had not been expected. "The wharf was utterly deserted; and, as I stepped out of the boat, I sank ankle-deep into mud and ice. Half-blinded by the sleet driven into my face and the tears which filled my eyes, I walked through dreary, miry ways. I heard no voices, I met no familiar face, no look of welcome. And these were the impressions, the feelings with which I entered the house which was to be called my home." "I am," she exclaims subsequently, "a stranger among strangers, and the thermometer is twelve degrees below zero." Her niece says that her "Winter Studies and Summer Rambles," published in 1838, "will convey to the reader the most forlorn, yet fine, picture of a courageous woman's attempt to render her life livable in the midst of a monotony and want of interest which she felt to be killing." It is astonishing to Mrs. Macpherson that the Canadian politicians should have found "distasteful" her accomplished aunt's attempts to show them that, on the education question for instance, they were "all astray." Even Niagara disappointed her, and made her desire that the falls had been "like Yarrow yet unvisited, unbeheld." At length she found existence so burdensome that Mr. Jameson, who had now been appointed chancellor of the new court of equity, consented to relieve her from her conjugal thraldom so far as he could, and to let her return to England. She writes to Mr. Noel: "I am in a small community of fourth-rate, half-educated, or uneducated, people, where local politics of the meanest kind engross the men, and petty gossip and household cares the women. As I think differently from Mr. Jameson on every subject which can occupy a thinking mind, I keep clear of any expression (at least, unnecessary expression) of my opinions." Mr. Jameson — fond at a distance, but cold at home — cannot have been the most endearing of husbands; but, with all respect for Mrs. Jameson's talents, we must say that there was one vocation for which she was apparently unfitted, and that was the vocation of a wife. As her niece says, she may have had "a happy knack of winning confidence and affection;" but it does not appear that she ever attempted to win either from the poor Toronto chancellor.

After a tour among the Indian settlements, and a sojourn in Boston to hear Dr. Channing talk and "preach like an apostle," Mrs. Jameson returned to London in time to witness the queen's return from her coronation. She fell naturally again into her old London intimacies. Among friends, old and new, this volume mentions Mrs. Austin, whose husband Mrs. Jameson not very exhaustively describes as "a hypochondriac;" Samuel Rogers, "whose critical taste was at once the most exquisite and the least exclusive she had ever known;" Mrs. Browning, then Miss Barrett, of whose odd honeymoon flitting to Pisa she was some years later the companion; Miss Martineau, not yet mesmerized out of her ailments, and "fat and portly and handsome, or less plain than she had ever seen her;" Maria Edgeworth, "full of life and vivacity" at eighty-one; "that excellent Joanna Baillie;" and Mrs. Grote, who on her way to Sydney Smith's parsonage at Combe Florey took Mrs. Jameson through the west-country picture-galleries. Now began her life as an art critic and historian, and very hard she labored in her special career. Her "Companion to the Private Galleries," which appeared in 1841, was followed by other works of the same kind, culminating in her well-known series of volumes on "Sacred and Legendary Art." We suspect that Miss Martineau was right in deprecating this new direction of her friend's pen: "Do have done with your mechanical work as soon as you can, and give us more of your own mind." The mixture of her personal imaginativeness with art criticism did not, we think, produce a very happy or permanent result. But for a score of years she exercised a potent influence over taste in England. Her fame was, we fear, greater than her profit; and she much needed to make money by her pen. Mrs. Macpherson, not unmindful perhaps of her own hard struggle with the wolf at the door, asserts, not without ground, that the number of literary women who have been "the support and stay of their families, the one bread-winner upon whom many helpless or disabled relatives depended," is "out of all proportion to that of family benefactors in any other class." If Mrs. Jameson was not a very affectionate wife, she was the most loving of daughters and sisters. The whole family seems more or less to have been dependent upon her not very abundant earnings. In 1851 a pension of 100*l.* on the queen's civil list was bestowed upon her. Mr. Murray and Thackeray accepted the office of trustees for her, the latter characteristically saving her from any sense of shamefacedness at becoming a pensioner by the "wish that he had a couple of trustees and a pension" for himself. Three years later this increase to her precarious income was far more than balanced by the loss through her husband's death of 300*l.* a year which he had agreed to allow her. A second pension of 100*l.* a year was raised for her by sympathizing friends, and thus a very accomplished and deserving woman was set above the absolute necessity of living by authorship. But she enjoyed this pension only four or five years. She died of an attack of bronchitis, according to her physician's account; but her vital energies had already, we are told, been undermined by a blow at her sensitive affections. After her return from Canada, that singular and stony philanthropist, Lady Byron, had contracted with her a close intimacy, which lasted for some eighteen or twenty years. This friendship with a woman whom she herself described as "so different in structure that complete agreement was impossible," and who at first produced on her the impression of "implacability," proved completely absorbing. Mrs. Grote says that Mrs. Jameson "was so engrossed with that lady's family and concerns, that she ceased to maintain several of her old social connections for some years." Suddenly Lady Byron's jealousy was stirred by the communication to Mrs. Jameson, and concealment from herself, of some trivial family secret of the Noels. So bitterly does she seem to have reproached her friend for what was no fault of hers that Mrs. Jameson's pride was outraged, and "she in her turn became the one implacable." She even insisted on repudiating the warm friendship of Major Robert Noel and his wife. Never was there so silly a rupture of the kindly relations of half a lifetime. But the struggle, we are assured, loosened Mrs. Jameson's hold upon the world. She wrote to Major Noel, and her friends believed her, that Lady Byron had "broken her heart."

PARENTAL AFFECTION IN SPARROWS. — I saw a touching little incident showing the affection of sparrows for their young on the Kennington Oval cricket-ground last Thursday afternoon, a description of which you may, perhaps, think it worth while to record.

The afternoon was fine and the ground was surrounded by a dense ring of spectators, when a young pale-colored sparrow, under the guidance of both its parents, was trying to acquire the use of its wings. A slight wind was blowing towards the spectators, and the poor little bird, in its weak attempt to fly, was, to the evident consternation of its parents, carried straight into the laps of the inner ring of spectators, one of whom caught it gently in his hand and held it.

When taken hold of the young bird gave two or three chirps or calls for help, and the old birds flew to within a few feet of the ring of spectators, and, alighting on the grass in front of them all, began to "beg" for the young bird in the most touching and beseeching manner. This they did by lowering their heads and making the peculiar flutter of the wings by which young birds beg for food from the old ones. This singularly touching appeal moved the hearts of many in the crowd, who called out, "Look! look at the old birds!" — "Don't hurt the young bird!" — "Give it back to them," etc. The anxiety and the boldness of the old birds and their humble beseeching for the young was so evident as to come home to the hearts of these somewhat rough spectators.

My own feeling certainly was that I could not have believed that a pair of sparrows could possibly have "begged" with such touching humility and tenderness for the safety of the young bird. Their manner clearly displayed their sense of their own want of power to help the object of their affection, they therefore prayed for mercy in their own way, and with so much feeling, as to excite the full sympathy of the crowd looking on, and to make them, for the time, forget the game of cricket they had come there to see. LOVE AND LOSS.

I.

DARK SPRING.

Now the mavis and the merle
  Lavish their full hearts in song,
Peach and almond boughs unfurl
  White and purple bloom along
A blue burning air,
And all is very fair.
But ah! the silence and the sorrow!
I may not borrow
Any anodyne for grief
From the joy of flower or leaf,
No healing to allay my pain
From the cool of air and rain;
Every sweet sound grew still,
Every fair color pale,
When his life began to wane;
They may never live again!
A child's voice and visage will Ever more about me fail.
Ah! the silence and the sorrow!
Now my listless feet will go
Laboring ever as in snow:
Though the year with glowing wine
Fill the living veins of vine;
Though the glossy fig may swell,
And Night hear her Philomel;
Though the sweet lemon blossom breathe,
And fair Sun his falchion wreathe
With crimson roses at his foot,
All is desolate and mute;
Dark to-day, and dark to-morrow,
Ah! the silence and the sorrow!

II.

ONLY A LITTLE CHILD.

A Voice.
Only a little child!
  Stone cold upon a bed!
Is it for him you wail so wild,
As though the very world were dead?
    Arise, arise!
  Threaten not the tranquil skies!

Do not all things die?
  'Tis but a faded flower!
Dear lives exhale perpetually
  With every fleeting hour.
Rachael forever weeps her little ones;
Forever Rizpah mourneth her slain sons.
    Arise, arise!
  Threaten not the tranquil skies!

Only a little child!
  Long generations pass.
Behold them flash a moment wild
  With stormlight, a pale headlong mass
Of foam, into unfathomable gloom!
Worlds and shed leaves have all one doom.
    Arise, arise!
  Threaten not the tranquil skies.

Should earth's tremendous shade
  Spare only you and yours?
Who regardeth empires fade
  Untroubled, who impassive pours
Human joy, a mere spilt water,
Revels red with human slaughter!
    Arise, arise!
  Threaten not the tranquil skies.

Another Voice.
. . . Only a little child!
  He was the world to me.
Pierced to the heart, insane, defiled,
  All holiest hope! foul mockery,
Childhood's innocent mirth and rest.
    There is no God;
  The earth is virtue's funeral sod!

Another Voice.
Only a little child!
  Ah! then, who brought him here?
Who made him loving, fair, and mild,
  And to your soul so dear?
His lowly spirit seemed divine,
Burning in a heavenly shrine.
    Arise, arise!
With pardon for the tranquil skies.

Only a little child!
  Who sleeps upon God's heart!
Jesus blessed our undefiled,
  Whom no power avails to part
From the life of him who died
And liveth, whatsoe'er betide!
    Whose are eyes
Tranquiller than starlit skies?

Only a little child!
  For whom all things are;
Spring and summer, winter wild,
  Sea and earth, and every star,
Time, the void, pleasure and pain,
  Hell and heaven, loss and gain.
Life and death are his, and he Rests in God's eternity.
    Arise, arise!
Love is holy, true, and wise,
Mirrored in the tranquil skies.

III.

SLEEP.

Airily the leaves are playing
  In blue summer light;
Fugitive soft shadow laying Lovingly o'er marble white,
    Where he lies asleep.

Lilies of the valley bending
  Lowly bells amid the green;
Sweet moss-roses meekly lending
  Their soft beauty to the scene
    Of his quiet sleep.

All around him heather glowing Purple in the sun;
Sound of bees and bird o'erflowing
  Lull my lost, my little one,
    Lying there asleep.

Harsher sight or sound be banished,
  For my child is gone to rest;
These are telling of my vanished
  In the language of the blest,
    Wake him not from sleep!

Good Words. RODEN NOEL.

From The Contemporary Review.

WHAT IS GOING ON AT THE VATICAN.

A VOICE FROM ROME.

THE object of the present article is to set forth as clearly and distinctly as lies in the writer's power the attempts which are now being made, or have been already made by the present pontiff, Leo XIII., to reconcile the interests of the Catholic Church with the peace of civil governments.

I.

IN entering on this task prominence must first be given to a fact which has exercised great influence on the events to be afterwards recorded. That fact was the death, at the commencement of the present year, of King Victor Emmanuel. The decease of the monarch occasioned such universal mourning, and provoked such demonstrations of affection and loyalty, on the part of the entire Italian population, that the Vatican itself was startled by the spectacle. The event had not only given fresh vigor to the faith in nationality, it had also to a certain extent revealed the deeper traditions and instincts of the national religion. The great liberal party, imposing silence on the materialists and freethinkers, hung all the churches with tricolor flags, and the foremost actors in the great national revolution thronged all the cathedrals and there paid the tribute of religious rites to the departed sovereign, already invested with an almost legendary halo. The impression created by the monarch's death had sunk deep into the minds of the people, when the death of Pius IX., so long expected and more than once even prematurely announced, at last took place. The contrast between the national mourning exhibited for King Victor Emmanuel and the general indifference shown on the decease of Pius IX. was too clear and unmistakable not to suggest very awkward conclusions. It is scarcely an exaggeration to affirm that the contrast thus presented served as a crucial test to the great body of Italian Catholics. From that day illusions were more rapidly dispelled, and, just as if a mist had cleared away, the political relations between the Vatican and the Italian State stood forth in their real and sharp outlines.

Whatever views might have been previously entertained by the foreign members of the Sacred College, it is quite certain that on entering the Vatican they found a strong current of opinion for which they were totally unprepared. Cardinal Manning may, amongst his own English partisans and admirers, affirm and reaffirm that he never urged upon his brethren of the Sacred College the expediency of holding the conclave beyond the bounds of Italy. Such declarations will not cancel the fact that the representations made by him to his brother cardinals during the conclave could only at the time lead to the inference that, in the attempt to transfer the sittings of the conclave to Malta, or some other place not subject to the Italian crown, he was putting forth a zeal not inferior to that displayed by him in the cause of papal infallibility. No sooner, however, had the majority of the cardinals reached Rome than it became evident that on one most important point their decision might clearly be foreseen. They were quite resolved not to elect a foreigner to the papal throne, and equally determined not to elect an Ultramontane backed notoriously by foreign influence. Of the previous existence of this moderate and Italian party in the Sacred College no doubt had been entertained. But the precise strength of its convictions, the character of its organization, the nature of its leadership, if it possessed a regular and recognized leader, were all points which were involved in great obscurity. Through the mist, however, it was not difficult to discern how strongly and in what direction the current ran, and from what quarter the wind blew. A thousand little facts, each in itself insignificant, but collectively all-important, served to make known the true state of matters. From many a mouth proceeded the remark that the demonstrations of affection and reverence offered, not only by the Italian people, but by all civilized States, to the memory of King Victor Emmanuel, ought to have the effect of at last opening men's eyes. In other quarters it was observed that the principles of free government and national unity had evidently struck such deep root that it was quite idle to continue any longer dreaming about a restoration of the pope's temporal power. Italy, it was affirmed, had recorded a second and more impressive plebiscite in favor of the house of Savoy. And then profound regret was expressed at the fact that so important a figure in the annals of the papacy as that of Pius IX. should have passed away without exciting in the minds of the deceased pontiff's fellow-countrymen similar feelings of affection and of grief. When the causes of this contrast were brought to light and freely canvassed, there were found not a few highly honored and influential prelates who deplored the eccentricities and follies of Pius IX., as having been the occasion of so much mischief. The general indifference manifested on Pius IX.'s death found, it was said, its simple and natural explanation in those eccentricities, which had alienated from the Holy See the great mass of the Italian people. At the very moment when the crowd, drawn by curiosity, was thronging St. Peter's for the purpose of beholding the pontiff's corpse, many a sharp censure was to be heard in the halls of the Vatican, where from this or from the other high ecclesiastic the words proceeded, "There must be a change of system, otherwise who can tell how it will all end?" In many well-known clerical houses a frank tribute of admiration was paid to the conduct of the government and to the bearing of the troops, as shown in the admirable order maintained at such a critical moment throughout the whole city. Not that there were wanting furious fanatics who at once took the alarm on hearing such language as the above, and determined to band themselves more closely together to prevent the great danger of a moderate pope.

II.

In the very first meetings of the conclave, I repeat, it was quite evident that the Ultramontane cardinals had no chance of success. Cardinal Joachin Pecci, one of the most learned members of the Sacred College, who was an object of profound aversion to Cardinal Antonelli, and was systematically kept for many years at a distance from Rome, had shortly before been appointed cardinal camarlengo. It is just possible that Pius IX., in conferring on him that office, took it for granted that, in accordance with the usual custom of the Sacred College, the cardinal camarlengo would be virtually excluded from the list of candidates for the tiara. But the first consequence of the nomination was that Cardinal Pecci, during his brief tenure of office as camarlengo, had the opportunity of bringing into prominence his character and opinions. There was formed at once without as well as within the walls of the Vatican a current of opinion favorable to Cardinal Pecci, who was pronounced to be averse to flattery, and to the feminine gossip and jealousies by which Pius IX. was unhappily too much characterized. Cardinal Pecci was considered hostile to the Jesuits, and it was reported to be his intention to make a clean sweep of the manifold abuses and corruptions of the Vatican. Future historical critics will doubtless display much acumen in bringing to light the alleged tangled web of native intrigues or foreign influence resulting in the election of Joachin Pecci to the papal chair. I unhesitatingly affirm, on the contrary, that his election was brought about by the force of public opinion, which it is not too much to say had never previously in the annals of the papacy been exerted so freely and so fully, not in Rome alone, but throughout the whole of Italy. Not an hour passed in which there were not transmitted by telegraph to all parts of the world the most minute details respecting this great event in the history of the Church, so far as they could possibly be known; and on all these details the press lavished its comments. It was utterly impossible for the cardinals themselves to keep aloof from, or remain indifferent to, these manifestations of public opinion. The current in favor of moderate courses was strong and undeniable. As it flowed into the Sacred College it found itself encountered and arrested by several groups of schemers, bent on objects which it would be difficult to regard as compatible either with the welfare of civilized States or the good of the Catholic Church. There was wanting, however, for this current of opinions favorable to a moderate policy a clear and definite expression. On the first division a considerable number of votes were given in favor of Cardinal Pecci. Then all doubts and hesitations vanished. Even Cardinal Franchi, who wielded so much influence in the Sacred College, bowed down before the clear expression of public opinion. What followed with such rapidity must be ascribed to the good sense and tact of the cardinals, who perceived that a prolonged opposition would only result either in the defeat of Cardinal Pecci's reactionary opponents, or in the humiliating and perilous spectacle of an open division amongst the rulers of the Catholic Church. The triumph of Cardinal Pecci was hailed everywhere throughout Italy as a national triumph, and this for the special reason that his election had been imposed on his brother cardinals by Italian public opinion. For Cardinal Manning, who, if he had not actually put forward direct pretensions to the vacant chair of St. Peter, certainly did nothing to discourage the efforts made by his devoted partisans and admirers to represent him as the member of the Sacred College best fitted to fill so high an office, — for a cardinal of this stamp it must have been no slight humiliation to find himself compelled to bow down with all apparent reverence before a pope the known enemy of those very Jesuits whom his Eminence of Westminster holds in such honor. It is to be hoped that the severe lesson thus received will have the effect of opening, however late, Cardinal Manning's eyes to the existence of a fact which he has hitherto seemed resolved most obstinately to ignore. The fact is this, that the Roman Curia is essentially Italian. No phenomenon in the administration of the Roman Catholic Church is more remarkable than the skill with which the Italian ecclesiastics constantly residing in Rome, though in most cases far inferior to their foreign brethren in talent, in learning, and in moral character, continue to turn to account the influence in foreign countries of those very brethren for the firmer consolidation of their own power at the papal court. Foreign ecclesiastics have soon an opportunity of learning the extreme limit of gratitude felt in the Vatican. One of these may, after the fashion of Cardinal Manning, create a widespread agitation in favor of such a dogma as the personal infallibility; he may squeeze out, from the hoards of the rich or the hard-won earnings of the poor, millions to be laid as Peter's pence at the feet of the pontiff; he may effect in the interests of Rome the conversion of his Grace the duke of this, and the most noble the marquis of that, and assure his spiritual chief that their conversion only precedes the "going over" of entire towns and counties; he may do all this, and he will have his reward in the possession of a red hat, and the consequent social distinction which his exalted rank in the Church will secure to him in his native country amongst all the members of his own communion. But if he dreams for a single moment that with the acquisition of such honors he has gained the power of influencing at the Vatican the councils of the Church, he will very soon make the unpleasant discovery that he has been reckoning without his host. All the talent and energy which he has been exerting, and successfully exerting, at home, for the interests of his Church, will be found utterly powerless the moment that he seeks to employ them in making the slightest impression on that obstinate, ignorant, yet most practically vulpine element in the Roman Curia which is so thoroughly Italian — nay, more, so thoroughly Roman. This is a characteristic of the Roman Catholic Church which deserves far more attention than it commonly receives; and, paradoxical as the assertion may at the first glance appear, it is not the less true that exactly in proportion to the increased predominance of this exclusively Roman influence in the Curia, the congregations of cardinals, and the foreign nuntiatores, there is an increased willingness on the part of the foreign dignitaries of the Roman Catholic communion to prostrate themselves in abject submission before the will of the Vatican. No better example of this intense selfishness of a local caste, if I may so term it, can be found than is furnished by the whole story of the proceedings respecting the Vatican Council. Cardinal Manning may pride himself on having been made the agent of the Jesuits, and on having tickled and gratified the puerile vanity of Pius IX. Let him calmly cast up the account, and ask himself what addition has thereby accrued to his previous influence with the Roman Curia. Many a humble monk who repairs to the Vatican, as one of the members of a deputation, has within its walls more real and substantial influence, as regards the government of the Church, than this unwearied servant of Rome, who appears to me, at this distance, to be eternally flaunting his scarlet honors, one day in the drawing-room of the noble, and the next at a meeting of the working classes, and who seems consumed by his feverish zeal to effect the conversion of the entire United Kingdom.

III.

THE first speech delivered by the new pontiff was a mistake, occasioned by the desire to let the world know in what account he held certain acts of his predecessor. Pius IX. had by degrees succeeded in surrounding the papal chair with flatterers or fanatics — men whose flatteries and whose fanaticism were equally hurtful to the true interests of the Church. The cardinals who owed their elevation to Gregory XVI. had dwindled down to a very small number, and the majority of those created by Pius IX. were persons who had only been allowed to enter the Sacred College because they held, or at least expressed, the opinion, that in the government of the Church the pope was everything, and the Sacred College a body of small account. Leo XIII., who as cardinal had only too many opportunities of learning in what slight esteem Pius IX. held the Sacred College, determined to open his new papal career by an act not more generous than imprudent. In the very first words which he uttered he restored to the Sacred College its authority. The imprudence of the act soon became apparent. The new pope handed over to the creatures of Pius IX. the government of the Church. He was made aware of the full extent of his error the very moment he began his attempts to reform the papal court.

There is no exaggeration in the statement that amongst all the high functionaries whom he found in the Vatican, not a single one possessed his confidence. The necessity in which he found himself of having persons about him whom he could trust, was the sole reason for his speedily installing in the Vatican his brother, the ex-Jesuit Don Giuseppe Pecci, and several of the able and learned churchmen who for some years had always been nearest his person in his diocese of Perugia. Leo XIII., in the invitation given to his brother to take up his residence with him in the Vatican, virtually gave a soufflet moral to the Jesuits. Don Giuseppe, who thirty years before had been compelled to leave the order of Loyola in consequence of his refusal to teach certain philosophical doctrines regarded by the Jesuits as the highest forms of ethical science, and who, from his first connection with the body, had always remained on terms of intimate friendship with Father Curci, was entrusted by his brother, the pope, with the task of treating confidentially several delicate matters. He and Monsignor Raffaele Boccali, private chamberlain of the pope, are the two individuals to whom Leo XIII. accords, beyond all others, his personal confidence. Monsignor Boccali is a person of great intelligence, and though keenly alive to the interests, is singularly free from the prejudices, of his order. He is the constant companion of the pope during his early morning walks in the Vatican garden, is present at the public audiences given by his Holiness, converses with the pope during dinner, and is almost always invited to pass the evening in the pope's company.

The most important of all the appointments which it became the duty of the new pope to make was that of the cardinal secretary of state. It was impossible that Cardinal Simeoni, the successor of Cardinal Antonelli, should continue to fill the post. During his short tenure of office, Cardinal Simeoni had betrayed a deplorable incapacity for business, had acted only as the blind tool of the Ultramontane irreconcilables, and could not, without the loss of all personal consistency and moral influence, attempt to hold language or advocate a policy at variance with the language and policy to which he was publicly committed. Leo XIII. was subjected to a hard trial. With the exception of Cardinal Franchi, he could not find in the Sacred College a churchman at once able and willing to undertake the duties. Those members to whom he first addressed himself, and whom he certainly would have preferred, declined for various reasons to accept so heavy a responsibility. His Holiness was thus prevented from availing himself of the services of Cardinal Mertel, Cardinal di Pietro, and Cardinal de Luca. Cardinal Franchi was not a man after the pope's heart. He knew that Franchi was an apt pupil of the Antonelli school — one ever ready to lavish smooth words and delusive promises, and ever striving, in the old Antonelli fashion (not quite the apostolic one), to be all things to all men. The pope had, on one occasion, summed up his estimate of Cardinal Franchi in the words, "Le cardinal Franchi est franc par mœurs et faux par caractère." Nor was Cardinal Franchi at all ignorant of the exact estimate formed respecting him by his Holiness. Such a judgment on the part of the pope, and the perfect knowledge of that judgment on the part of his Eminence, might not suggest the most favorable prospects for the relations between Leo XIII. and his new secretary of state. But the pope well knew that Cardinal Franchi was at least pliable, and that he would create no great difficulties when the pope should enter on his cherished task of pacification — that task over which his mind had for long years been brooding. The long-cherished and supreme ambition of Leo XIII. may be described in a single sentence — it aims at putting and leaving the Church in relations of friendship and peace with all civilized States. Cardinal Franchi accepted — not, however, without considerable hesitation — the office of cardinal secretary of state, transferring to Cardinal Simeoni the very important and influential post which he previously held, that of prefect of the College de Propaganda Fide. Cardinal Franchi — it is due to his memory that the statement be made without any reservation — soon entered into all the views and plans of the pontiff, and initiated, alike with Catholic and non-Catholic States, a policy widely different from that pursued by Pius IX. But not the less did, and do, obstacles to the success of Leo XIII.'s views constantly spring up within the bosom of the Sacred College.

The cardinals, reinvested with their authority, carry on against the pontiff a passive opposition which is a constant cause of serious annoyance to his Holiness. Nor does there seem any other feasible method of extrication from this inconvenience than the nomination of as many new cardinals as will support the party of the pontiff in the Sacred College. At present the pope is greatly dissatisfied with the bearing of several nuncios, especially with that of Monsignor Meglia at Paris, and Monsignor Jacobini at Vienna. But should he remove them from their present posts he would be obliged by the traditions of the Curia to confer on them red hats, and by that act would add to the Sacred College two other members hostile to his views. To select new cardinals from amongst the prelates is attended with inconveniences almost as serious, for Pius IX. has certainly not left in the prelatura the means of an easy selection if the ecclesiastic to be chosen is to possess even average intelligence and erudition. Unless the pope shall find the courage to disentangle himself from the old traditions, and select his cardinals outside of the prelatura, no reforms, either religious or political, in the condition of the Church will ever be effected.

IV.

THE pastoral letters published at various periods by the pope when Bishop of Perugia attest the cultured tone of his mind, and his constant and unvarying desire to reconcile the interests of the Church with those of civilization. His constant effort is to demonstrate that every form of civil progress can only be facilitated by the more general extension of the Catholic faith. It is curious to see how the same pastoral letters which have furnished to so liberal a thinker and politician as Ruggero Bonghi the means of setting forth Leo XIII.'s enlightened policy have been ransacked, from the first page to the last, by clerical journalists, for the purpose of finding in the same the mere repetition of Pius IX.'s invectives and tirades. But however much the Ultramontane party may exert itself in order to demonstrate that Leo XIII. is following, and will follow in all respects, the policy of his predecessor, a single fact proves that the fears of the party point in a different direction. With the view of rendering the pope alive to the indignation of that party, no scruple has been felt in impressing upon him that the sensible diminution in the amount of the Peter's pence offerings is due to his own liberal attitude. The ability of Pius IX. in extracting money from the pockets of the faithful was truly marvellous. But if the Peter's pence no longer flow into the papal treasury in so full a stream the cause must be sought elsewhere than in the reasons given by the reactionaries. The numerous pilgrimages organized by the Catholic committees in all parts of the civilized world may have had the effect of gratifying the vanity of Pius IX., but they had likewise another effect, that of opening the eyes of not a few pilgrims to the falseness of the alleged hardships suffered by the late pontiff in his durance vile. Whilst in foreign countries bishops were sending off pastoral letters, and thousands of parish priests were preaching in their churches to ignorant and fanatical congregations, on the state of wretched poverty to which the supreme head of the Catholic Church was reduced by his persecutors, and whilst priestly agitators were holding up before the eyes of their dupes the very straws taken from the pallet of the august prisoner, the thousands of pilgrims who laid their money at the feet of the pontiff had occasion to observe a very different spectacle. On their arrival in Rome they beheld King Victor Emmanuel driving quietly about, everywhere reverentially greeted by the people, his modest landau almost unnoticed amongst the splendid equipages of the Roman princes. And when they repaired to the Vatican they were suddenly dazzled by the magnificence of the marble halls, thronged by Swiss Guards, Noble Guards, papal gendarmes, Palatine Guards, papal chamberlains, prelates, monsignors, and cardinals, in all their full-blown magnificence. Traversing the long array of these gilded satellites of the great central orb, they drew near, awe-struck and bewildered, to the steps of the throne on which the supreme pontiff was seated, amidst the gorgeous splendors of his Byzantine court. If after gazing on the rubicund and jovial countenance of his Holiness, they cast furtive glances round the hall, in the hope of discovering iron gratings across the windows, or perchance, in some corner of the audience hall, the straw mattress, they were doomed to be cruelly disappointed in the search. The tone of their narratives, on returning to their own homes, must, there is some reason to presume, have had a share in fostering the belief which, during the last two or three years before Pius IX.'s decease, was in all Catholic countries every day becoming stronger, that the august prisoner was not so badly treated after all. No truth has been more clearly established in the long annals of political and religious revolutions than this, that a cause can scarcely ever be supported in the long run by mere voluntary offerings. Religious zeal, unless it be very sincere, very fervid, and very constant, will not stand this test. The Catholics, who have for so long a time made such sacrifices to swell the Peter's pence fund, cannot be blamed if they form no exception to this rule ; and if for them, too, the time has come when they are more niggardly in voting the supplies. Some of the largest contributors have put forward excuses sufficiently logical and rational for drawing close their purse-strings. No excuse has been more frequently alleged than the state of matters in the higher clerical circles of Rome, as revealed by the Antonelli-Lambertini lawsuit. The writer is personally acquainted with several wealthy Catholics, who, after having subscribed liberally for several years to the Peter's pence fund, stopped short, and refused to give another farthing, declaring that they saw no reason why they should curtail the comforts, or prevent the indulgence of the lawful and graceful tastes, of their own families, merely to see their gifts made the subject of public bickerings between the illegitimate children and the legal heirs of a cardinal secretary of state. That the enthusiasm has considerably cooled down, is proved by the following fact. Almost immediately after the election of Leo XIII., a deputation of the Lyons Catholics announced to the holy father that the Défense Catholique had opened a subscription with the view of presenting to the new pope a golden tiara of the value of a million francs. "I beg you to do nothing of the kind," was the pope's answer. "I have already four tiaras, and they are more than I want. What the Church wants is the pecuniary means for its own support, not tiaras for the pope." The idea of the tiara was given up; that, however, of the subscription for a million of francs was retained. Well, the melancholy result has been, that up to the present moment, the Lyons subscription does not exceed the amount of a very few thousand francs! When the Peter's pence fund was under the absolute control of Cardinal Antonelli everybody was in the dark about both receipts and payments. But money never ceased to come in, and Pius IX. spent it freely. After Cardinal Antonelli's death, one of the first acts of his successor, Cardinal Simeoni, was to institute a special Peter's pence commission, and the sum then in the papal coffers was converted into foreign securities. These do not yield annually more than twelve hundred and fifty thousand francs, while the annual expense of the whole papal administration is seven million francs. As the holy see refused to accept the annual income of three million two hundred thousand francs, settled on the pope by the Italian Parliament when it voted the law of the papal guarantees, the Vatican has constantly to meet a large annual deficit, and this can only be done by unceasing efforts to get new subscriptions. With the view of counteracting the peculation by which so many of the local Catholic committees have been disgraced, the pope has instituted very recently a new system of collection, by which it is hoped that the financial interests of the Vatican may be more effectually secured. It is matter of public notoriety that there are many priests who have bought estates and built mansions, solely through dexterous manipulation of the Peter's pence fund, the subscriptions to which are not always divided in the regular and undisguised fashion practised by the founder, Don Margotti of Turin, who, as all the world knows, gets his regular legal percentage. We are unable to affirm whether under the new system introduced by the holy see the zeal of the collectors and agents of the Peter's pence fund will remain the same.

MUCH has been written about the celebrated retractation of the Jesuit Father Curci. Before entering on this subject it may be as well to bring out in full relief a little circumstance which deserves to be made known for the light which it throws on the relations between Cardinal Manning and Father Curci. Curci had formed the acquaintance of the cardinal in Rome, and had been on terms of much intimacy with him. In the summer of 1874, when Father Curci became for the first time the object of suspicion and censure at the Vatican on account of his "Ragione dell' Opera," prefixed to his commentary on the four Gospels, he was informed that Archbishop Manning was on the point of visiting Rome. Curci wrote to him requesting that he might be informed of the date of his arrival in Florence, as he had matters of some importance to discuss with him. Father Curci did not cherish the hope of enlisting Monsignor Manning on his side, but he believed it possible that his influence might be usefully exerted in the attempt to reform the factious and corrupt state of the Vatican. Monsignor Manning, on reaching Florence, repaired to the convent of Santa Felicita, where Father Curci was then residing. Father Curci placed in Monsignor Manning's hands the first volume of his commentary, with the special request that he would peruse with more than common attention the "Ragione dell' Opera." When the Jesuit returned Monsignor Manning's visit at the Hôtel de l'Arno, he received from the English ecclesiastic the strongest assurances that he completely shared and approved of the views propounded. Monsignor Manning, in fact, evinced his complete and most cordial concurrence in all the views put forth subsequently by Father Curci in his now celebrated pamphlet "Il Moderno Dissidio." Monsignor Manning left Father Curci with the distinct promise that on reaching Rome he would urge on Pius IX. the acceptance of the truths enounced in the Jesuit's work. He must, however, have been singularly unsuccessful in his mode of recommending to the holy father the cause which he had undertaken to defend, for the effect of his communications to Pius IX. was the creation of a feeling of fierce indignation in the pontiff's mind against the Jesuit, who was henceforth regarded by his Holiness as a traitor to the interests of the papacy. It was not until Leo XIII. gave his mind to a calm and impartial review of the relations between his predecessor and the Jesuit, that Father Curci again received permission to cross the threshold of the Vatican. The true facts of this Curci episode are the following. Father Curci was summoned to Rome by a letter from Cardinal Franchi, in which the cardinal secretary of state informed him that the holy father, desiring to put an end to the violent controversy occasioned by the relations between the Jesuit and the late pontiff, requested the father to repair to Rome in order to have the whole matter thoroughly sifted. Curci at once complied with a request equivalent to a command, and reached Rome on Easter eve. In the interview which he had immediately after his arrival with the cardinal secretary of state, he set forth his opinions with all fulness. Expressing his profound regret at having done anything which might have seemed disrespectful to the person of Pius IX., he expressed his readiness to accept the counsels and commands of the head of the Church. But he strongly insisted on the fact that his work "Il Moderno Dissidio" contained nothing at variance with the doctrines of the Church, and explained the reasons why he had refused to subscribe a retractation in the form required by Pius IX. In the retractation exacted by Pius IX. he had been required to recognize as fundamental doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church: —

1st. The speedy re-establishment of the temporal power of the popes.
2nd. The duty of all sincere Catholics to abstain from political elections.
3rd. The impossibility of co-existence for the papacy and the kingdom of Italy.

"These propositions," said Father Curci, "I am resolved not to subscribe, and rather than do so, I am ready to be cut to pieces. It is high time to recognize the fact that Italian unity cannot be broken up, for whatever may be the form of government destined to rule the country, the nation will not consent to be again divided into different fractions. Such being the undoubted state of matters, the duty of all Catholics is to come forward and play their part in political life, unless they are content to see morality and religion go to the dogs."

Cardinal Franchi hastened to assure Father Curci that no intention existed of asking him to subscribe any retractation in the form required by Pius IX. And when Father Cruci expressed the wish that the treatment of these delicate matters might, considering the numerous and weighty avocations of the cardinal secretary of state, be confided by his Holiness to some person of known impartiality and with sufficient time at his command, Leo XIII. met the wish of the Jesuit by entrusting to his own brother, Don Giuseppe, the task in question. None the less, however, Father Curci had repeated interviews with Cardinal Franchi, to whom he imparted freely his opinions on the condition of the Church and on its relations with the government of Italy.

In one of these conversations, which turned on the occupation of Rome, Father Curci expressed himself in the following terms: "I, who am in the habit of discerning in the course of all human affairs the hand of Providence, believe the occupation of Rome to have been a truly providential event. The Church stood in need of a great humiliation; it has not even now been sufficiently humbled. The Church should reflect, as in a clear mirror, virtue, truth, and morality. What has actually happened? Thanks to this occupation, we see in the Quirinal a young king who, by the admission of the whole world, is sincere, upright, and desirous to do good. We see a young queen universally beloved and honored for her spotless character. And it is impossible to doubt that these high examples must produce the most beneficial influence on the social life, not of the court alone, but of the whole of Italy. It is impossible to estimate the good effect that may flow from such high examples. But the example thus given by a temporal ought to create emulation in a spiritual court. I believe therefore that Providence has brought things about, in order that the court of the Vatican might receive a motive and an impulse to enter on a rivalry of virtue with the court of the Quirinal."

Father Curci, in another conversation, sought to demonstrate the propriety of Leo XIII. no longer remaining like Pius IX. shut up in the Vatican. "Fanatics," he observed, "need not have recourse to poison in order to get rid of an obnoxious pope, after the fashion practised with Leo XII. It will be quite enough for such fanatics to maintain in full force the absurd fiction of the imprisonment. The valley of the Vatican, as you know, was always regarded as quite lethal during the height of summer, — a fact sufficiently proved by the circumstance that in the beginning of July all who have it in their power to do so leave the place. A small seminary attached to the Vatican has always at that season transferred the pupils to another building in a healthier situation in the city. The popes always spent those unhealthy months in the Quirinal Palace, except when they went, as was so often the case with Pius IX., to Castel Galdolfo. If Pius IX. was able to spend without serious injury the last seven years of his life in the Vatican, this must be ascribed partly to his strong constitution, partly to his being the native of a low and level district, and partly to his having during the previous twenty-four years become acclimatized to the Vatican air. But Leo XIII., born in a mountainous district, accustomed to live for the last thirty-two years in a mountainous district, — his diocese of Perugia, — and possessing a somewhat delicate constitution, cannot long remain with impunity in the Vatican."

To these remarks Father Curci received from the cardinal secretary of state the significant answer, "A pope, we are told, ought to be ready to offer up even his life for the Church."

The blood rushed up to the Jesuit's forehead, and the tones of his voice rose so high that the three other persons present at the interview could hear every accent ringing through the room as he rejoined: "Certainly, for the Church; and if such a sacrifice were made for the true interests of the Church, the pope would be venerated as a martyr; but not for the freaks of Don Margotti and of the Civiltà Cattolica. A sacrifice made in obedience to such prompting would still justify our compassion for one thus deceived, but justify still more our perfect right to designate those who thus counselled him as traitors or as fools (lo compatiremmo come ingannato e qualificheremmo per imbecile o traditore chi glielo avesse consigliato)."

Don Giuseppe Pecci, in obedience to his brother's command, entered into communication with Father Curci, with the view of bringing about a solution of the question that so much engrossed the pope's mind. Don Giuseppe Pecci frankly declared to the ex-Jesuit that his brother, being desirous of effecting an amicable settlement of the point at issue, would view with favor such a compromise as, without wounding the self-respect or the conscientious scruples of the father, might enable the pontiff, in a way not disrespectful to the memory of his predecessor, to receive the author of "Il Moderno Dissidio" in the Vatican. Thereupon Father Curci drew up in his own handwriting a retractation which, on being submitted to the pope, received from his Holiness certain modifications, these modifications being framed in terms even more favorable to Father Curci than the original document. Matters having reached this stage, Father Curci, who, during his stay in Rome had discussed freely those controverted matters with several of the most distinguished dignitaries of the Church, expressed the desire to live for some time in strict seclusion, and an arrangement was made for his taking up his residence in the convent of Grottaferrata. Cardinal Nina, the official protector of the convent, gave his complete sanction to the arrangement, and the precise cell to be occupied by the ex-Jesuit had been chosen. But the father, when on the point of starting for the convent, was informed that in consequence of the strong pressure put by certain influential persons on the superior of the convent, the last named person found himself under the necessity of refusing the hospitality which he had already consented to grant. The indignation of Leo XIII. on learning these facts was extreme, and an intimation was conveyed directly from the Vatican to the Jesuit fathers of Mondragone, — because it was by them that pressure had been put upon the superior of Grottaferrata, — that if it was not convenient for them to receive the father at the convent, it was quite convenient for his Holiness to receive him in the Vatican. On the same day Father Curci began to occupy the apartment assigned to him in the Vatican, where he remained for a week.

During the eight days of Father Curci's stay in the Vatican the Jesuit had several interviews with Leo XIII., though not without some difficulty, thanks to Ultramontane influence. More than once the position of the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminister in the Church formed the subject of their conversation. The talk turned at first on the negotiations which, during the pontificate of Pius IX., had been carried on for the establishment of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Scotland. Pius IX., with his marvellous love of gossip, was always pleased to hear Monsignor Manning glorify the revolution effected by him in the position of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in England, and contrast the days when Cardinal Wiseman was hooted and hissed by the ragged boys of Golden Square, with the happier times in which Cardinal Manning now found himself, on all public occasions encircled with the social respect and honor paid to the official representatives of foreign powers. It was a battledore and shuttlecock game of mutual flattery — Monsignor Manning ascribing all the merit of this happy change to the venerable pontiff, and the venerable pontiff tracing it solely to the apostolic zeal of Monsignor Manning. Amongst the vast plans submitted by Monsignor Manning to Pius IX. were some which naturally engaged the attention of Pius IX.'s successor. One of these plans, the passing en masse of large bodies of Ritualistic clergymen from the Church of England to that of Rome, formed the subject of consultation between Leo XIII. and Father Curci. It appears that in an audience granted to him by Pius IX., his Eminence of Westminster drew forth from his pocket a string of names longer than Leporello's famous catalogue of Don Giovanni's fair victims, alleged to be the roll of the Ritualistic clergymen who had secretly pledged themselves to "go over." Many of these Ritualistic clergymen are husbands and fathers, and the chief difficulty lies in these conjugal and paternal relations. Leo XIII. broached this aspect of the question in his conversations with Father Curci, and asked him jokingly what ought to be done. "Why," said the ex-Jesuit, pulling up his collar, as he is in the habit of doing when somewhat at a loss for an answer, "I would wink at the wives and children if the husbands and fathers came over. But," added the wary father, who evidently feared that his Holiness, on the representation of Monsignor Manning, might be betrayed into the commercial operation more idiomatically than elegantly described as that of "buying a pig in a poke," — "I should like first to feel quite sure that your Holiness is really to have such a grand haul."

The pope and the ex-Jesuit parted on the best of terms.

VI.

THE statement has frequently been made that the Vatican feels great alarm at the multiplication of the various religious sects now going on in Rome, and more especially at the increase of Protestant churches. Pope Leo XIII. has very recently renewed, in the letter addressed by him to Cardinal Nina, the protests, the complaints, and the warnings on the same subject so often heard from the lips of Pius IX. By both popes this state of matters has been denounced as an outrage on the Church. That the Vatican really feels the degree of alarm which it exhibits may perhaps be doubted. Any one possessing a thorough acquaintance with the character of Italy and of the Italians will very soon be led to form the opinion that, of the vast sums expended by philanthropic and religious Englishmen to bring over the natives of foreign countries to sounder views of religious truth, scarcely any are so irrationally and so recklessly misspent as those lavished in Italy. If the word Protestant could be accepted as the synonym of anti-papal, the people of Italy are at the present moment the most Protestant nation in the world. This, however, is a subject the proper treatment of which would require, not the limits of an article, but of a volume. But, while making the assertion, it must at once be added that the revival of a deep and true religious faith in Italy is not likely to be produced by the spectacle of rival sects, each claiming to be the sole legitimate representative of Protestantism, and bickering and wrangling amongst themselves with far greater pertinacity and energy than they ever manifest against those whom it must be presumed they regard as the common foe.

The views put forward in "Il Moderno Dissidio" on the present state of religious opinion in Italy constitute an important part of Father Curci's work. Those views had perhaps the greatest share in creating so general an interest in the volume, for it would be idle to deny that on this point especially the influence of the ex-Jesuit's pages has been very remarkable. It is quite true that the spirit of the work was in different quarters differently judged. The present writer, who has had frequent opportunities of discussing with Father Curci the questions handled in his volume, would find himself not a little embarrassed if required to define exactly how far this or that widely diffused interpretation of Father Curci's reasonings was the more correct. There are "irreconcilables" in the papacy who, no matter what the ex-Jesuit may say in behalf of the interests of the Catholic Church and the holy see, do not the less launch their furious invectives at his head, simply because from their point of view every Catholic who is not willing to go all lengths for the restoration of the pope's temporal power is a renegade and a traitor. By such persons popular representation, and, as a consequence, political and administrative elections, are regarded as hurtful to the population, and are therefore by them combated à outrance. By other critics Father Curci's work is regarded as a Jesuitical attempt to recover the lost authority and influence of the Church. In their opinion a Catholic Italy, if voting in great numbers at the political elections, might obtain a Parliamentary majority, and by a legislative act give back to the Church that temporal authority of which it has been deprived. A Catholic majority in the nation would thus bring about a result to be vainly looked for either from a foreign invasion or a popular revolution. Whether this really be the recondite purpose of Father Curci matters very little. It is, however, quite certain that his work has been thus interpreted by not a few Catholics, who, led astray by this delusion, sham an adherence to the present order of things in Italy solely from a hope that through the expected Catholic majority the papal cause may be again triumphant.

Nor are there wanting many sincere Catholics who in perfect good faith believe that from the realization of Father Curci's plans would spring the restored authority of the Church, and that an effectual bar would be raised up to the further progress of freethinkers and materialists. These last, indeed, go even farther in their hopes, believing as they do that a reconciliation between the Church and the State would give to the first an almost unbounded power. A Church, they hold, which could count on being always backed by a great military and naval State, would possess quite exceptional powers of expansion; whilst a State which could equally count on the moral influence of a hierarchy established in every corner of the globe might bring to the development of its policy elements of force not owned by any other power. To this it is objected in some quarters that the Church would run the risk of losing its universal character. But the objectors at once receive from the persons who indulge in these utopian visions the reply that their objection would hold good if the state of things thus anticipated should have a permanent duration, whereas it is quite enough for them that a tacit reconciliation should have a temporary existence. That alone, they affirm, would give additional strength to both Church and State. These hopes may be well or ill founded, but there can be no doubt of their existence.

Such views, however, are not shared by the Conservative party, which is rapidly growing up in the midst of these complications, and which has for its political programme, not submission to the Vatican, but a moderate and conciliatory course in the treatment of ecclesiastical questions. It ought, by this time, to be clear to all impartial politicians, that a system of violent repression against the Roman Catholic Church only hastens the growth of a violent reaction in its favor. And it is fortunate for Italy that she turned a deaf ear to Prince Bismarck when he urged on her statesmen the expediency of making her laws on ecclesiastical matters the mere reflection of his own. Had Italy done so, she might have found herself reduced to the humiliation of following Prince Bismarck in his reopening of negotiations with the Vatican, and perhaps even as far as Canossa.

The demands made by Prince Bismarck showed how limited was his knowledge of the real position of the Catholic clergy in Italy. The Roman Curia is at once astute and powerful. The Italian bishops are now, for the most part, mere creatures of the Jesuits. They are utterly destitute of personal initiative, and are seldom gifted with either talent or learning. The inferior clergy are at once poor and ignorant. Widely different is the character of the Roman Catholic hierarchy and clergy, taken as a body, in England, or France, or Germany. There we see prelates of ability, energy, and erudition, laboring with untiring zeal for the domination of their Church. In what Italian province shall we find the type of the restless and intriguing priest such as he is painted by Emile Zola in his "Conquête de Plassans," a type only too familiar in the provincial society both of France and England? The incumbent of a parish in a large Italian town — when his parishioners present a mixture of clericals, liberals, and old noble families — plays the part of a dexterous diplomatist on all political questions. When he can only count on an element of fanaticism, he plays the part of a fanatic. He is a liberal in the Venetian, Lombard, Genoese, and Piedmontese provinces, those in which the pope recognizes as legitimate the sovereignty of Humbert I. In the country districts he commonly reflects the views of the wealthiest among the neighboring landowners. If his squire is an out-and-out clerical, he too is an out-and-out clerical. If his squire is a decided liberal, above all if he is one who often asks his parish priest to dinner, the parish priest has extremely liberal views, and beneath the generous influence of his host's Chianti or Barolo, will keep the table in a roar by telling good stories as to the way in which the more sceptical and satirical of his parishioners are in the habit of treating the dogmas of Holy Mother Church. It is not uncommon to find the parish priest shy in speaking of politics at all, but it is very uncommon to find him preaching openly from his pulpit against the government. The parish priests, with few exceptions, are extremely ignorant, and this general state of ignorance in the working clergy is a cause of constant and unfeigned anxiety to the present pontiff.

Little progress has been made in the intellectual and moral condition of the Italian parish priest since the day when, thirty-one years ago, Pius IX., shortly after his accession, said to Massimo d'Azeglio: "You may find here and there an honest and intelligent parish priest, but taking them as a body they are mere dirt" (fango). It is a melancholy fact which must suggest most painful reflections to all who are really interested in the moral and religious welfare of Italy, that the parish priest generally stands in the scale of information and character below the mounted carabineer or ordinary tax-collector of his district; and no surprise need be felt if this state of matters so deeply engrosses the thoughts of Leo XIII.

SIR GIBBIE.

BY GEORGE MACDONALD.

AUTHOR OF "MALCOLM," "THE MARQUIS OF LOSSIE," ETC.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE BROONIE.

THINGS had gone on in this way for several weeks — if Gibbie had not been such a small creature, I hardly see how they could for so long — when one morning the men came in to breakfast all out of temper together, complaining loudly of the person unknown who would persist in interfering with their work. They were the louder that their suspicions fluttered about Fergus, who was rather overbearing with them, and therefore not a favorite. He was in reality not at all a likely person to bend back or defile hands over such labor, and their pitching upon him for the object of their suspicion, showed how much at a loss they were. Their only ground for suspecting him, beyond the fact that there was no other whom by any violence of imagination they could suspect, was, that, whatever else was done or left undone in the stable, Snowball, whom Fergus was fond of, and rode almost every day, was, as already mentioned, sure to have something done for him. Had he been in good odor with them, they would have thought no harm of most of the things they thought he did, especially as they eased their work; but he carried himself high, they said, doing nothing but ride over the farm and pick out every fault he could find — to show how sharp he was, and look as if he could do better than any of them; and they fancied that he carried their evil report to his father, and that this underhand work in the stable must be part of some sly scheme for bringing them into disgrace. And now at last had come the worst thing of all: Gibbie had discovered the corn-bin, and having no notion but that everything in the stable was for the delectation of the horses, had been feeding them largely with oats — a delicacy with which, in the plenty of other provisions, they were very sparingly supplied; and the consequences had begun to show themselves in the increased unruliness of the more wayward amongst them. Gibbie had long given up resorting to the ceiling, and remained in utter ignorance of the storm that was brewing because of him.

The same day brought things nearly to a crisis; for the overfed Snowball, proving too much for Fergus's horsemanship, came rushing home at a fierce gallop without him, having indeed left him in a ditch by the roadside. The remark thereupon made by the men in his hearing, that it was his own fault, led him to ask questions, when he came gradually to know what they attributed to him, and was indignant at the imputation of such an employment of his mornings to one who had his studies to attend to — scarcely a wise line of defence where the truth would have been more credible as well as convincing — namely, that at the time when those works of supererogation could alone be effected, he lay as lost a creature as ever sleep could make of a man.

In the evening, Jean sought a word with Donal, and expressed her surprise that he should be able to do everybody's work about the place, warning him it would be said he did it at the expense of his own. But what could he mean, she said, by wasting the good corn to put devilry into the horses? Donal stared in utter bewilderment. He knew perfectly that to the men suspicion of him was as impossible as of one of themselves. Did he not sleep in the same chamber with them? Could it be allusion to the way he spent his time when out with the cattle that Mistress Jean intended? He was so confused, looked so guilty as well as astray, and answered so far from any point in Jean's mind, that she at last became altogether bewildered also, out of which chaos of common void gradually dawned on her mind the conviction that she had been wasting both thanks and material recognition of service, where she was under no obligation. Her first feeling thereupon was, not unnaturally however unreasonably, one of resentment — as if Donal, in not doing her the kindness her fancy had been attributing to him, had all the time been doing her an injury; but the boy's honest bearing and her own good sense made her, almost at once, dismiss the absurdity.

Then came anew the question, utterly unanswerable now — who could it be that did not only all her morning work, but, with a passion for labor insatiable, part of that of the men also? She knew her nephew better than to imagine for a moment, with the men, it could be he. A good enough lad she judged him, but not good enough for that. He was too fond of his own comfort to dream of helping other people! But now, having betrayed herself to Donal, she wisely went farther, and secured herself by placing full confidence in him. She laid open the whole matter, confessing that she had imagined her ministering angel to be Donal himself: now she had not even a conjecture to throw at random after the person of her secret servant. Donal, being a Celt, and a poet, would have been a brute if he had failed of being a gentleman, and answered that he was ashamed it should be another and not himself who had been her servant and gained her commendation; but he feared, if he had made any such attempt, he would but have fared like the husband in the old ballad who insisted that his wife's work was much easier to do than his own. But as he spoke, he saw a sudden change come over Jean's countenance. Was it fear? or what was it? She gazed with big eyes fixed on his face, heeding neither him nor his words, and Donal, struck silent, gazed in return. At length, after a pause of strange import, her soul seemed to return into her deep-set gray eyes, and in a broken voice, low, and solemn, and fraught with mystery, she said,

"Donal, it's the broonie!"

Donal's mouth opened wide at the word, but the tenor of his thought it would have been hard for him to determine. Celtic in kindred and education, he had listened in his time to a multitude of strange tales, both indigenous and exotic, and, Celtic in blood, had been inclined to believe every one of them for which he could find the least raison d'être. But at school he had been taught that such stories deserved nothing better than mockery, that to believe them was contrary to religion, and a mark of such weakness as involved blame. Nevertheless, when he heard the word broonie issue from a face with such an expression as Jean's then wore, his heart seemed to give a gape in his bosom, and it rushed back upon his memory how he had heard certain old people talk of the brownie that used, when their mothers and grandmothers were young, to haunt the Mains of Glashruach. His mother did not believe such things, but she believed nothing but her New Testament! — and what if there should be something in them? The idea of service rendered by the hand of a being too clumsy, awkward, ugly, to consent to be seen by the more finished race of his fellow-creatures, whom yet he surpassed in strength and endurance and longevity, had at least in it for Donal the attraction of a certain grotesque yet homely poetic element. He remembered too the honor such a type of creature had had in being lapt around forever in the airy folds of L'Allegro. And to think that Mistress Jean, for whom everybody had such a respect, should speak of the creature in such a tone! — it sent a thrill of horrific wonder and delight through the whole frame of the boy: might, could there be such creatures? And thereupon began to open to his imagination vista after vista into the realms of might-be possibility — where dwelt whole clans and kins of creatures, differing from us and our kin, yet occasionally, at the cross-roads of creation, coming into contact with us, and influencing us, not greatly perhaps, yet strangely and notably. Not once did the real brownie occur to him — the small, naked Gibbie, far more marvellous and admirable than any brownie of legendary fable or fact, whether celebrated in rude old Scots ballad for his taeless feet, or designated in noble English poem of perfect art, as lubber fiend of hairy length.

Jean Mavor came from a valley far withdrawn in the folds of the Gormgarnet mountains, where in her youth she had heard yet stranger tales than had ever come to Donal's ears, of which some had perhaps kept their hold the more firmly that she had never heard them even alluded to since she left her home. Her brother, a hard-headed highlander, as canny as any lowland Scot, would have laughed to scorn the most passing reference to such an existence; and Fergus, who had had a lowland mother — and nowhere is there less of so-called superstition than in most parts of the lowlands of Scotland — would have joined heartily in his mockery. For the cowherd, however, as I say, the idea had no small attraction, and his stare was the reflection of Mistress Jean's own — for the soul is a live mirror, at once receiving into its centre, and reflecting from its surface.

"Div ye railly think it, mem?" said Donal at last.

"Think what?" retorted Jean sharply, jealous instantly of being compromised, and perhaps not certain that she had spoken aloud.

"Div ye railly think 'at there is sic craturs as broonies, Mistress Jean?" said Donal.

"Wha kens what there is an' what there isna?" returned Jean: she was not going to commit herself either way. Even had she imagined herself above believing such things, she would not have dared to say so; for there was a time still near in her memory, though unknown to any now upon the farm except her brother, when the Mains of Glashruach was the talk of Daurside because of certain inexplicable nightly disorders that fell out there: the slang rows, or the Scotch remishes (a form of the English romage), would perhaps come nearest to a designation of them, consisting as they did of confused noises, rumblings, jaculations: and the fact itself was a reason for silence, seeing a word might bring the place again into men's mouths in like fashion, and seriously affect the service of the farm: such a rumor would certainly be made in the market a ground for demanding more wages to fee to the Mains. "Ye haud yer tongue, laddie," she went on; "it's the least ye can efter a' 'at's come an' gane; an' least said's sunest mendit. Gang to yer wark."

But either Mistress Jean's influx of caution came too late, and some one had overheard her suggestion, or the idea was already abroad in the mind bucolic and georgic, for that very night it began to be reported upon the nearer farms, that the Mains of Glashruach was haunted by a brownie who did all the work for both men and maids — a circumstance productive of different opinions with regard to the desirableness of a situation there, some asserting they would not fee to it for any amount of wages, and others averring they could desire nothing better than a place where the work was all done for them.

Quick at disappearing as Gibbie was, a very little cunning on the part of Jean might soon have entrapped the brownie; but a considerable touch of fear was now added to her other motives for continuing to spend a couple of hours longer in bed than had formerly been her custom. So that for yet a few days things went on much as usual; Gibbie saw no sign that his presence was suspected, or that his doings were offensive; and life being to him a constant present, he never troubled himself about anything before it was there to answer for itself.

One morning the long thick mane of Snowball was found carefully plaited up in innumerable locks. This was properly elf-work, but no fairies had been heard of on Daurside for many a long year. The brownie, on the other hand, was already in every one's mouth — only a stray one, probably, that had wandered from some old valley away in the mountains, where they were still believed in — but not the less a brownie; and if it was not the brownie who plaited Snowball's mane, who or what was it? A phenomenon must be accounted for, and he who will not accept a theory offered, or even a word applied, is indebted in a full explanation. The rumor spread in long slow ripples, till at last one of them struck the membrana tympani of the laird, where he sat at luncheon in the House of Glashruach.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE LAIRD.

THOMAS GALBRAITH was by birth Thomas Durrant, but had married an heiress by whom he came into possession of Glashruach, and had, according to previous agreement, taken her name. When she died he mourned her loss as well as he could, but was consoled by feeling himself now first master of both position and possession, when the ladder by which he had attained them was removed. It was not that she had ever given him occasion to feel that marriage and not inheritance was the source of his distinction in the land, but that, having a soul as keenly sensitive to small material rights as it was obtuse to great spiritual ones, he never felt the property quite his own until his wife was no longer within sight. Had he been a little more sensitive still, he would have felt that the property was then his daughter's, and his only through her; but this he failed to consider.

Mrs. Galbraith was a gentle sweet woman, who loved her husband, but was capable of loving a greater man better. Had she lived long enough to allow of their opinions confronting in the matter of their child's education, serious differences would probably have arisen between them; as it was, they had never quarrelled except about the name she should bear. The father, having for her sake — so he said to himself — sacrificed his patronymic, was anxious that, in order to her retaining some rudimentary trace of himself in the ears of men, she should be overshadowed with his Christian name, and called Thomasina. But the mother was herein all the mother, and obdurate for her daughter's future; and, as was right between the two, she had her way, and her child a pretty name. Being more sentimental than artistic, however, she did not perceive how imperfectly the sweet Italian Ginevra concorded with the strong Scotch Galbraith. Her father hated the name, therefore invariably abbreviated it after such fashion as rendered it inoffensive to the most conservative of Scotish ears; and for his own part, at length, never said Ginny, without seeing and hearing and meaning Jenny. As Jenny, indeed, he addressed her in the one or two letters which were all he ever wrote to her; and thus he perpetuated the one matrimonial difference across the grave.

Having no natural bent to literature, but having in his youth studied for and practised at the Scotish bar, he had brought with him into the country a taste for certain kinds of dry reading, judged pre-eminently respectable, and for its indulgence had brought also a not insufficient store of such provender as his soul mildly hungered after, in the shape of books bound mostly in yellow calf — books of law, history, and divinity. What the books of law were, I would not foolhardily add to my many risks of blundering by presuming to recall; the history was mostly Scotish, or connected with Scotish affairs; the theology was entirely of the New England type of corrupted Calvinism, with which in Scotland they saddle the memory of great-souled, hard-hearted Calvin himself. Thoroughly respectable and a little devout, Mr. Galbraith was a good deal more of a Scotchman than a Christian; growth was a doctrine unembodied in his creed; he turned from everything new, no matter how harmonious with the old, in freezing disapprobation; he recognized no element in God or nature which could not be reasoned about after the forms of the Scotch philosophy. He would not have said an Episcopalian could not be saved, for at the bar he had known more than one good lawyer of the episcopal party; but to say a Roman catholic would not necessarily be damned, would to his judgment have revealed at once the impending fate of the rash asserter. In religion he regarded everything not only as settled but as understood; and seemed aware of no call in relation to truth, but to bark at any one who showed the least anxiety to discover it. What truth he held himself, he held as a sack holds corn — not even as a worm holds earth.

To his servants and tenants he was just — never condescending to talk over a thing with any of the former but the gamekeeper, and never making any allowance to the latter for misfortune. In general expression he looked displeased, but meant to look dignified. No one had ever seen him wrathful; nor did he care enough for his fellow-mortals ever to be greatly vexed — at least he never manifested vexation otherwise than by a silence that showed more of contempt than suffering.

In person, he was very tall and very thin, with a head much too small for his height; a narrow forehead, above which the brown hair looked like a wig; pale-blue, ill-set eyes, that seemed too large for their sockets, consequently tumbled about a little, and were never at once brought to focus; a large, but soft-looking nose; a loose-lipped mouth, and very little chin. He always looked as if consciously trying to keep himself together. He wore his shirt-collar unusally high, yet out of it far shot his long neck, notwithstanding the smallness of which, his words always seemed to come from a throat much too big for them. He had greatly the look of a hen, proud of her maternal experiences, and silent from conceit of what she could say if she would. So much better would he have done as an underling than as a ruler — as a journeyman even, than a master, that to know him was almost to disbelieve in the good of what is generally called education. His learning seemed to have taken the wrong fermentation, and turned to folly instead of wisdom. But he did not do much harm, for he had a great respect for his respectability. Perhaps if he had been a craftsman, he might even have done more harm — making rickety wheelbarrows, asthmatic pumps, ill-fitting window-frames, or boots with a lurking divorce in each welt. He had no turn for farming, and therefore let all his land, yet liked to interfere, and as much as possible kept a personal jurisdiction.

There was one thing, however, which, if it did not throw the laird into a passion — nothing, as I have said, did that — brought him nearer to the outer verge of displeasure than any other, and that was, anything whatever to which he could affix the name of superstition. The indignation of better men than the laird with even a confessedly harmless superstition, is sometimes very amusing; and it was a point of Mr. Galbraith's poverty-stricken religion to denounce all superstitions, however diverse in character, with equal severity. To believe in the second sight, for instance, or in any form of life as having the slightest relation to this world, except that of men, that of animals, and that of vegetables, was with him wicked, antagonistic to the church of Scotland, and inconsistent with her perfect doctrine. The very word ghost would bring upon his face an expression he meant for withering scorn, and indeed it withered his face, rendering it yet more unpleasant to behold. Coming to the benighted country, then, with all the gathered wisdom of Edinburgh in his gallinaceous cranium, and what he counted a vast experience of worldly affairs besides, he brought with him also the firm resolve to be the death of superstition, at least upon his own property. He was not only unaware but incapable of becoming aware, that he professed to believe a number of things, any one of which was infinitely more hostile to the truth of the universe, than all the fancies and fables of a countryside, handed down from grandmother to grandchild. When, therefore, within a year of his settling at Glashruach, there arose a loud talk of the Mains, his best farm, as haunted by presences making all kinds of tumultuous noises, and even throwing utensils bodily about, he was nearer the borders of a rage, although he kept, as became a gentleman, a calm exterior, than ever he had been in his life. For were not ignorant clodhoppers asserting as facts what he knew never could take place! At once he set himself, with all his experience as a lawyer to aid him, to discover the buffooning authors of the mischief: where there were deeds there were doers, and where there were doers they were discoverable. But his endeavors unintermitted for the space of three weeks, after which the disturbances ceased, proved so utterly without result, that he could never bear the smallest allusion to the hateful business. For he had not only been unhorsed, but by his dearest hobby.

He was seated with a game pie in front of him, over the top of which Ginevra was visible. The girl never sat nearer her father at meals than the whole length of the table, where she occupied her mother's place. She was a solemn-looking child, of eight or nine, dressed in a brown merino frock of the plainest description. Her hair, which was nearly of the same color as her frock, was done up in two triple plaits, which hung down her back, and were tied at the tips with black ribbon. To the first glance she did not look a very interesting or attractive child; but looked at twice, she was sure to draw the eyes a third time. She was undeniably like her father, and that was much against her at first sight; but it required only a little acquaintance with her face to remove the prejudice; for in its composed, almost resigned expression, every feature of her father's seemed comparatively finished, and settled into harmony with the rest; its chaos was subdued, and not a little of the original underlying design brought out. The nose was firm, the mouth modelled, the chin larger, the eyes a little smaller, and full of life and feeling. The longer it was regarded by any seeing eye, the child's countenance showed fuller of promise, or at least of hope. Gradually the look would appear in it of a latent sensitive anxiety — then would dawn a glimmer of longing question; and then it would, all at once, slip back into the original ordinary look, which, without seeming attractive, had yet attracted. Her father was never harsh to her, yet she looked rather frightened at him; but then he was cold, very cold, and most children would rather be struck and kissed alternately than neither. And the bond cannot be very close between father and child, when the father has forsaken his childhood. The bond between any two is the one in the other; it is the father in the child, and the child in the father, that reach to each other eternal hands. It troubled Ginevra greatly that when she asked herself whether she loved her father better than anybody else, as she believed she ought, she became immediately doubtful whether she loved him at all.

She was eating porridge and milk: with spoon arrested in mid-passage, she stopped suddenly, and said: —

"Papa, what's a broonie?"

"I have told you, Jenny, that you are never to talk broad Scotch in my presence," returned her father. "I would lay severer commands upon you, were it not that I fear tempting you to disobey me, but I will have no vulgarity in the dining-room."

His words came out slowly, and sounded as if each was a bullet wrapped round with cotton wool to make it fit the barrel. Ginevra looked perplexed for a moment.

"Should I say brownie, papa?" she asked.

"How can I tell you what you should call a creature that has no existence?" rejoined her father.

"If it be a creature, papa, it must have a name!" retorted the little logician, with great solemnity.

Mr. Galbraith was not pleased, for although the logic was good, it was against him.

"What foolish person has been insinuating such contemptible superstition into your silly head?" he asked. "Tell me, child," he continued, "that I may put a stop to it at once."

He was rising to ring the bell, that he might give the orders consequent on the information he expected: he would have asked Mammon to dinner in black clothes and a white tie, but on Superstition in the loveliest garb would have loosed all the dogs of Glashruach, to hunt her from the property. Her next words, however, arrested him, and just as she ended, the butler came in with fresh toast.

"They say," said Ginevra, anxious to avoid the forbidden Scotch, therefore stumbling sadly in her utterance, "there's a broonie — brownie — at the Mains, who dis a' — does all the work."

"What is the meaning of this, Joseph?" said Mr. Galbraith, turning from her to the butler, with the air of rebuke, which was almost habitual to him, a good deal heightened.

"The meanin' o' what, sir?" returned Joseph, nowise abashed, for to him his master was not the greatest man in the world, or even in the highlands. "He's no a Galbraith," he used to say, when more than commonly provoked with him.

"I ask you, Joseph," answered the laird, "what this — this outbreak of superstition imports? You must be aware that nothing in the world could annoy me more than that Miss Galbraith should learn folly in her father's house. That staid servants, such as I had supposed mine to be, should use their tongues as if their heads had no more in them than so many bells hung in a steeple, is to me a mortifying reflection."

"Tongues as weel's clappers was made to wag, sir; and wag they wull, sir, sae lang's the tow (string) hings oot at baith lugs," answered Joseph. The forms of speech he employed were not unfrequently obscure to his master, and in that obscurity lay more of Joseph's impunity than he knew. "Forby (besides), sir," he went on, "gien tongues didna wag, what w'y wad you, 'at has to set a' thing richt, come to ken what was wrang?"

"That is not a bad remark, Joseph," replied the laird, with woolly condescension. "Pray acquaint me with the whole matter."

"I hae naething till acquant yer honor wi' sir, but the ting-a-ling o' tongues," replied Joseph; "an' ye'll hae till arreenge't like, till yer ain setisfaction."

Therewith he proceeded to report what he had heard reported, which was in the main the truth, considerably exaggerated — that the work of the house was done over night by invisible hands — and the work of the stables too; but that in the latter, cantrips were played as well; that some of the men talked of leaving the place; and that Mr. Duff's own horse, Snowball, was nearly out of his mind with fear.

The laird clenched his teeth, and for a whole minute said nothing. Here were either his old enemies again, or some who had heard the old story, and in their turn were beating the drum of consternation in the ears of superstition.

"It is one of the men themselves," he said at last, with outward frigidity. "Or some ill-designed neighbor," he added. "But I shall soon be at the bottom of it. Go to the Mains at once, Joseph, and ask young Fergus Duff to be so good as step over, as soon as he conveniently can."

Fergus was pleased enough to be sent for by the laird, and soon told him all he knew from his aunt and the men, confessing that he had himself been too lazy of a morning to take any steps towards personal acquaintance with the facts, but adding that, as Mr. Galbraith took an interest in the matter, he would be only too happy to carry out any suggestion he might think proper to make on the subject.

"Fergus," returned the laird, "do you imagine things inanimate can of themselves change their relations in space? In other words, are the utensils in your kitchen endowed with powers of locomotion? Can they take to themselves wings and fly? Or to use a figure more to the point, are they provided with the members necessary to the washing of their own — persons, shall I say? Answer me those points, Fergus."

"Certainly not, sir," answered Fergus solemnly, for the laird's face was solemn, and his speech was very solemn.

"Then, Fergus, let me assure you, that to discover by what agency these apparent wonders are effected, you have merely to watch. If you fail, I will myself come to your assistance. Depend upon it, the thing when explained will prove simplicity itself."

Fergus at once undertook to watch, but went home not quite so comfortable as he had gone; for he did not altogether, notwithstanding his unbelief in the so-called supernatural, relish the approaching situation. Belief and unbelief are not always quite plainly distinguishable from each other, and Fear is not always certain which of them is his mother. He was not the less resolved, however, to carry out what he had undertaken — that was, to sit up all night, if necessary, in order to have an interview with the extravagant and erring — spirit, surely, whether embodied or not, that dared thus wrong "domestic awe, night-rest, and neighborhood," by doing people's work for them unbidden. Not even to himself did he confess that he felt frightened, for he was a youth of nearly eighteen; but he could not quite hide from himself the fact that he anticipated no pleasure in the duty which lay before him.

CHAPTER XX.

THE AMBUSH.

FOR more reasons than one, Fergus judged it prudent to tell not even auntie Jean of his intention; but, waiting until the house was quiet, stole softly from his room and repaired to the kitchen — at the other end of the long straggling house, where he sat down, and taking his book, an annual of the beginning of the century, began to read the story of Kathed and Eurelia.* Having finished it, he read another. He read and read, but no brownie came. His candle burned into the socket. He lighted another, and read again. Still no brownie appeared, and, hard and straight as was the wooden chair on which he sat, he began to doze. Presently he started wide awake, fancying he heard a noise; but nothing was there. He raised his book once more, and read until he had finished the stories in it: for the verse he had no inclination that night. As soon as they were all consumed, he began to feel very eerie: his courage had been sheltering itself behind his thoughts, which the tales he had been reading had kept turned away from the object of dread. Still deeper and deeper grew the night around him, until the bare, soulless waste of it came at last, when a brave man might welcome any ghost for the life it would bring. And ever as it came, the tide of fear flowed more rapidly, until at last it rose over his heart, and threatened to stifle him. The direst foe of courage is the fear itself, not the object of it; and the man who can overcome his own terror is a hero and more. In this Fergus had not yet deserved to be successful. That kind of victory comes only of faith. Still, he did not fly the field; he was no coward. At the same time, prizing courage, scorning fear, and indeed disbelieving in every nocturnal object of terror except robbers, he came at last to such an all but abandonment of dread, that he dared not look over his shoulder, lest he should see the brownie standing at his back: he would rather be seized from behind and strangled in his hairy grasp, than turn and die of the seeing. The night was dark — no moon and many clouds. Not a sound came from the close. The cattle, the horses, the pigs, the cocks and hens, the very cats and rats seemed asleep. There was not a rustle in the thatch, a creak in the couples. It was well, for the slightest noise would have brought his heart into his mouth, and he would have been in great danger of scaring the household, and forever disgracing himself, with a shriek. Yet he longed to hear something stir. Oh! for the stamp of a horse from the stable or the low of a cow from the byre! But they were all under the brownie's spell, and he was coming — toeless feet, and thumbed but fingerless hands! as if he was made with stockings and hum'le mittens! Was it the want of toes that made him able to come and go so quietly? — Another hour crept by; when lo, a mighty sun-trumpet blew in the throat of the black cock! Fergus sprang to his feet with the start it gave him — but the next moment gladness rushed up in his heart: the morning was on its way! and, foe to superstition as he was, and much as he had mocked at Donal for what he counted some of his tendencies in that direction, he began instantly to comfort himself with the old belief that all things of the darkness flee from the crowing of the cock. The same moment his courage began to return, and the next he was laughing at his terrors, more foolish than when he felt them, seeing he was the same man of fear as before, and the same circumstances would wrap him in the same garment of dire apprehension. In his folly he imagined himself quite ready to watch the next night without even repugnance — for it was the morning, not the night, that came first!

When the gray of the dawn appeared, he said to himself he would lie down on the bench a while, he was so tired of sitting; he would not sleep. He lay down, and in a moment was asleep. The light grew and grew, and the brownie came — a different brownie indeed from the one he had pictured — with the daintiest-shaped hands and feet coming out of the midst of rags, and with no hair except roughly parted curls over the face of the cherub — for the combing of Snowball's mane and tail had taught Gibbie to use the same comb upon his own thatch. But as soon as he opened the door of the dairy, he was warned by the loud breathing of the sleeper, and looking about, espied him on the bench behind the table, and swiftly retreated. The same instant Fergus woke, stretched himself, saw it was broad daylight, and, with his brain muddled by fatigue and sleep combined, crawled shivering to bed. Then in came the brownie again; and when Jean Mavor entered, there was her work done as usual.

Fergus was hours late for breakfast, and when he went into the common room, found his aunt alone there.

"Weel, auntie," he said, "I think I fleggit yer broonie!"

"Did ye that, man? Ay! — An' syne ye set tee, an' did the wark yersel', to save yer auntie Jean's auld banes?"

"Na, na! I was ower tiret for that. Sae wad ye hae been yersel', gien ye had sitten up a' nicht."

"Wha did it than?"

"Ow, jist yersel', I'm thinkin', auntie."

"Never a finger o' mine was laid till't, Fergus. Gien ye fleggit ae broonie, anither cam; for there's the wark dene, the same's ever!"

"Damn the cratur!" cried Fergus.

"Whisht, whisht, laddie! he's maybe hearin' ye this meenute. An' gien he binna, there's ane 'at is, an' likesna sweirin'."

"I beg yer pardon, auntie, but it's jist provokin'!" returned Fergus, and therewith recounted the tale of his night's watch, omitting mention only of his feelings throughout the vigil.

As soon as he had had his breakfast, he went to carry his report to Glashruach.

The laird was vexed, and told him he must sleep well before night, and watch to better purpose.

The next night, Fergus's terror returned in full force; but he watched thoroughly notwithstanding, and when his aunt entered, she found him there, and her kitchen in a mess. He had caught no brownie, it was true, but neither had a stroke of her work been done. The floor was unswept; not a dish had been washed; it was churning-day, but the cream stood in the jar in the dairy, not the butter in the pan on the kitchen-dresser. Jean could not quite see the good or the gain of it. She had begun to feel like a lady, she said to herself, and now she must tuck up her sleeves and set to work as before. It was a come-down in the world, and she did not like it. She conned her nephew little thanks, and not being in the habit of dissembling, let him feel the same. He crept to bed rather mortified. When he woke from a long sleep, he found no meal waiting him, and had to content himself with cakes * and milk before setting out for the "Muckle Hoose."

"You must add cunning to courage, my young friend," said Mr. Galbraith; and the result of their conference was that Fergus went home resolved on yet another attempt.

He felt much inclined to associate Donal with him in his watch this time, but was too desirous of proving his courage both to himself and to the world, to yield to the suggestion of his fear. He went to bed with a book immediately after the noonday meal, and rose in time for supper.

There was a large wooden press in the kitchen standing out from the wall; this with the next wall made a little recess, in which there was just room for a chair; and in that recess Fergus seated himself, in the easiest chair he could get into it. He then opened wide the door of the press, and it covered him entirely.

This night would have been the dreariest of all for him, the laird having insisted that he should watch in the dark, had he not speedily fallen fast asleep, and slept all night — so well that he woke at the first noise Gibbie made.

It was broad clear morning, but his heart beat so loud and fast with apprehension and curiosity mingled, that for a few moments Fergus dared not stir, but sat listening breathless to the movement beside him, none the less appalling that it was so quiet. Recovering himself a little he cautiously moved the door of the press, and peeped out.

He saw nothing so frightful as he had, in spite of himself, anticipated, but was not therefore, perhaps, the less astonished. The dread brownie of his idea shrunk to a tiny ragged urchin, with a wonderful head of hair, azure eyes, and deft hands, noiselessly bustling about on bare feet. He watched him at his leisure, watched him keenly, assured that any moment he could spring upon him.

As he watched, his wonder sank, and he grew disappointed at the collapsing of the lubber fiend into a poor half-naked child, upon whom both his courage and his fear had been wasted. As he continued to watch, an evil cloud of anger at the presumption of the unknown minimus began to gather in his mental atmosphere, and was probably the cause of some movement by which his chair gave a loud creak. Without even looking round, Gibbie darted into the dairy, and shut the door. Instantly Fergus was after him, but only in time to see the vanishing of his last heel through the hole in the wall, and that way Fergus was much too large to follow him. He rushed from the house, and across the corner of the yard to the barn-door. Gibbie, who did not believe he had been seen, stood laughing on the floor, when suddenly he heard the key entering the lock. He bolted through the cat-hole — but again just one moment too late, leaving behind him on Fergus's retina the light from the soles of two bare feet. The key of the door to the rick-yard was inside, and Fergus was after him in a moment, but the ricks came close to the barn-door, and the next he saw of him was the fluttering of his rags in the wind, and the flashing of his white skin in the sun, as he fled across the clover field; and before Fergus was over the wall, Gibbie was a good way ahead towards the Lorrie. Gibbie was a better runner for his size than Fergus, and in better training too; but, alas! Fergus's legs were nearly twice as long as Gibbie's. The little one reached the Lorrie first, and dashing across it, ran up the side of the Glashburn, with a vague idea of Glashgar in his head. Fergus behind him was growing more and more angry as he gained upon him but felt his breath failing him. Just at the bridge to the iron gate to Glashruach, he caught him at last, and sunk on the parapet exhausted. The smile with which Gibbie, too much out of breath to laugh, confessed himself vanquished, would have disarmed one harder-hearted than Fergus, had he not lost his temper in the dread of losing his labor; and the answer Gibbie received to his smile was a box on the ear that bewildered him. He looked pitifully in his captor's face, the smile not yet faded from his, only to receive a box on the other ear, which, though a contrary and similar both at once, was not a cure, and the water gathered in his eyes. Fergus, a little eased in his temper by the infliction, and in his breath by the wall of the bridge, began to ply him with questions; but no answer following, his wrath rose again, and again he boxed both his ears — without better result.

* It amuses a Scotchman to find that the word cakes as in "The Land of Cakes," is taken, not only by foreigners, but by some English people — as how, indeed, should it be otherwise? — to mean compositions of flour, more or less enriched, and generally appreciable; whereas, in fact, it stands for the dryest, simplest preparation in the world. The genuine cakes is — (My grammar follows usage: cakes is; broth are.) — literally nothing but oatmeal, made into a dough with cold water and dried over the fire — sometimes then in front of it as well.

Then came the question what he was to do with the redoubted brownie, now that he had him. He was ashamed to show himself as the captor of such a miserable culprit, but the little rascal deserved punishment, and the laird would require him at his hands. He turned upon his prisoner and told him he was an impudent rascal. Gibbie had recovered again, and was able once more to smile a little. He had been guilty of burglary, said Fergus; and Gibbie smiled. He could be sent to prison for it, said Fergus; and Gibbie smiled — but this time a very grave smile. Fergus took him by the collar, which amounted to nearly a third part of the jacket, and shook him till he had half torn that third from the other two; then opened the gate, and, holding him by the back of the neck, walked him up the drive, every now and then giving him a fierce shake that jarred his teeth. Thus, over the old gravel, mossy and damp and grassy, and cool to his little bare feet, between rowan and birk and pine and larch, like a malefactor, and looking every inch the outcast he was, did Sir Gilbert Galbraith approach the house of his ancestors for the first time. Individually, wee Gibbie was anything but a prodigal; it had never been possible to him to be one; but none the less was he the type and result and representative of his prodigal race, in him now once more looking upon the house they had lost by their vices and weaknesses, and in him now beginning to reap the benefits of punishment. But of vice and loss, of house and fathers and punishment, Gibbie had no smallest cognition. His history was about him and in him, yet of it all he suspected nothing. It would have made little difference to him if he had known it all; he would none the less have accepted everything that came, just as part of the story in which he found himself.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE PUNISHMENT.

THE house he was approaching had a little the look of a prison. Of the more ancient portion the windows were very small, and every corner had a turret with a conical cap-roof. That part was all rough-cast, therefore gray, as if with age. The more modern part was built of all kinds of hard stone, roughly cloven or blasted from the mountain and its boulders. Granite red and grey, blue whinstone, yellow ironstone, were all mingled anyhow, fitness of size and shape alone regarded in their conjunctions; but the result as to color was rather pleasing than otherwise, and Gibbie regarded it with some admiration. Nor, although he had received from Fergus such convincing proof that he was regarded as a culprit, had he any dread of evil awaiting him. The highest embodiment of the law with which he had acquaintance was the police, and from not one of them in all the city had he ever had a harsh word; his conscience was as void of offence as ever it had been, and the law consequently, notwithstanding the threats of Fergus, had for him no terrors.

The laird was an early riser, and therefore regarded the mere getting up early as a virtue, altogether irrespective of how the time, thus redeemed, as he called it, was spent. This morning, as it turned out, it would have been better spent in sleep. He was talking to his gamekeeper, a heavy-browed man, by the coach-house door, when Fergus appeared, holding the dwindled brownie by the huge collar of his tatters. A more innocent-looking malefactor sure never appeared before awful Justice! Only he was in rags, and there are others besides dogs whose judgments go by appearance. Mr. Galbraith was one of them, and smiled a grim, an ugly smile.

"So this is your vaunted brownie, Mr.

Duff!" he said, and stood looking down upon Gibbie, as if in his small person he saw superstition at the point of death, mocked thither by the arrows of his contemptuous wit.

"It's all the brownie I could lay hands on, sir," answered Fergus. "I took him in the act."

"Boy," said the laird, rolling his eyes, more unsteady than usual with indignation, in the direction of Gibbie, "what have you to say for yourself?"

Gibbie had no say — and nothing to say that his questioner could either have understood or believed: the truth from his lips would but have presented him a lying hypocrite to the wisdom of his judge. As it was, he smiled, looking up fearless in the face of the magistrate, so awful in his own esteem.

"What is your name?" asked the laird, speaking yet more sternly.

Gibbie still smiled and was silent, looking straight in his questioner's eyes. He dreaded nothing from the laird. Fergus had beaten him, but Fergus he classed with the bigger boys who had occasionally treated him roughly; this was a man, and men, except they were foreign sailors, or drunk, were never unkind. He had no idea of his silence causing annoyance. Everybody in the city had known he could not answer; and now when Fergus and the laird persisted in questioning him, he thought they were making kindly game of him, and smiled the more. Nor was there much about Mr. Galbraith to rouse a suspicion of the contrary; for he made a great virtue of keeping his temper when most he caused other people to lose theirs.

"I see the young vagabond is as impertinent as he is vicious," he said at last, finding that to no interrogation could he draw forth any other response than a smile. "Here, Angus," — and he turned to the gamekeeper — "take him into the coach-house, and teach him a little behavior. A touch or two of the whip will find his tongue for him."

Angus seized the little gentleman by the neck, as if he had been a polecat, and at arm's length walked him unresistingly into the coach-house. There, with one vigorous tug, he tore the jacket from his back, and his only other garment, dependent thereupon by some device known only to Gibbie, fell from him, and he stood in helpless nakedness, smiling still: he had never done anything shameful, therefore had no acquaintance with shame. But when the scowling keeper, to whom poverty was first cousin to poaching, and who hated tramps as he hated vermin, approached him with a heavy cart whip in his hand, he cast his eyes down at his white sides, very white between his brown arms and brown legs, and then lifted them in a mute appeal, which somehow looked as if it were for somebody else, against what he could no longer fail to perceive the man's intent. But he had no notion of what the thing threatened amounted to. He had had few hard blows in his time, and had never felt a whip.

"Ye deil's glaur!" cried the fellow, clenching the cruel teeth of one who loved not his brother, "I s' lat ye ken what comes o' brakin' into honest hooses, an takin' what's no yer ain!"

A vision of the gnawed cheese, which he had never touched since the idea of its being property awoke in him, rose before Gibbie's mental eyes, and inwardly he bowed to the punishment. But the look he had fixed on Angus was not without effect, for the man was a father, though a severe one, and was not all a brute: he turned and changed the cart whip for a gig one with a broken shaft, which lay near. It was well for himself that he did so, for the other would probably have killed Gibbie. When the blow fell the child shivered all over, his face turned white, and without uttering even a moan, he doubled up and dropped senseless. A swollen cincture, like a red snake, had risen all round his waist, and from one spot in it the blood was oozing. It looked as if the lash had cut him in two.

The blow had stung his heart and it had ceased to beat. But the gamekeeper understood vagrants! the young blackguard was only shamming!

"Up wi' ye, ye deevil! or I s' gar ye," he said from between his teeth, lifting the whip for a second blow.

Just as the stroke fell, marking him from the nape all down the spine, so that he now bore upon his back in red the sign the ass carries in black, a piercing shriek assailed Angus's ears, and his arm, which had mechanically raised itself for a third blow, hung arrested.

The same moment, in at the coach-house door shot Ginevra, as white as Gibbie. She darted to where he lay, and there stood over him, arms rigid and hands clenched hard, shivering as he had shivered, and sending from her body shriek after shriek, as if her very soul were the breath of which her cries were fashioned. It was as if the woman's heart in her felt its roots torn from their home in the bosom of God, and quivering in agony, and confronted by the stare of an eternal impossibility, shrieked against Satan.

"Gang awa, missy," cried Angus, who had respect to this child, though he had not yet learned to respect childhood; "he's a coorse cratur, an' maun hae's whups."

But Ginevra was deaf to his evil charming. She stopped her cries, however, to help Gibbie up, and took one of his hands to raise him. But his arm hung limp and motionless; she let it go; it dropped like a stick, and again she began to shriek. Angus laid his hand on her shoulder. She turned on him, and opening her mouth wide, screamed at him like a wild animal, with all the hatred of mingled love and fear; then threw herself on the boy, and covered his body with her own. Angus, stooping to remove her, saw Gibbie's face, and became uncomfortable.

"He's deid! he's deid! Ye've kilt him, Angus! Ye're an ill man!" she cried fiercely. "I hate ye. I'll tell on ye. I'll tell my papa."

"Hoot! whisht, missie!" said Angus. "It was by yer papa's ain orders I gae him the whup, an' he weel deserved it forby. An' gien ye dinna gang awa, an' be a guid yoong leddy, I'll gie 'im mair yet."

"I'll tell God," shrieked Ginevra, with fresh energy of defensive love and wrath.

Again he sought to remove her, but she clung so, with both legs and arms, to the insensible Gibbie, that he could but lift both together, and had to leave her alone.

"Gien ye daur to touch 'im again, Angus, I'll bite ye — bite ye — BITE YE," she screamed, in a passage wildly crescendo.

The laird and Fergus had walked away together, perhaps neither of them quite comfortable at the orders given, but the one too self-sufficient to recall them, and the other too submissive to interfere. They heard the cries, nevertheless, and had they known them for Ginevra's, would have rushed to the spot; but fierce emotion had so utterly changed her voice — and indeed she had never in her life cried out before — that they took them for Gibbie's, and supposed the whip had had the desired effect and loosed his tongue. As to the rest of the household, which would by this time have been all gathered in the coach-house, the laird had taken his stand where he could intercept them: he would not have the execution of the decrees of justice interfered with.

But Ginevra's shrieks brought Gibbie to himself. Faintly he opened his eyes, and stared, stupid with growing pain, at the tear-blurred face beside him. In the confusion of his thoughts he fancied the pain he felt was Ginevra's, not his, and sought to comfort her, stroking her cheek with feeble hand, and putting up his mouth to kiss her. But Angus, scandalized at the proceeding, and restored to energy by seeing the boy was alive, caught her up suddenly and carried her off — struggling, writhing, and scratching like a cat. Indeed she bit his arm, and that severely, but the man never even told his wife. Little Missie was a queen, and little Gibbie was vermin, but he was ashamed to let the mother of his children know that the former had bitten him for the sake of the latter.

The moment she thus disappeared, Gibbie began to apprehend that she was suffering for him, not he for her. His whole body bore testimony to frightful abuse This was some horrible place inhabited by men such as those that killed Sambo! He must fly. But would they hurt the little girl? He thought not — she was at home. He started to spring to his feet, but fell back almost powerless; then tried more cautiously and got up wearily, for the pain and the terrible shock seemed to have taken the strength out of every limb. Once on his feet, he could scarcely stoop to pick up his remnant of trowsers without again falling, and the effort made him groan with distress. He was in the act of trying in vain to stand on one foot, so as to get the other into the garment, when he fancied he heard the step of his executioner, returning doubtless to resume his torture. He dropped the rag, and darted out of the door, forgetting aches and stiffness and agony. All naked as he was, he fled like the wind, unseen, or at least unrecognized, of any eye. Fergus did catch a glimpse of something white that flashed across a vista through the neighboring wood, but he took it for a white peacock, of which there were two or three about the place. The two men were disgusted with the little wretch when they found that he had actually fled into the open day without his clothes. Poor Gibbie! it was such a small difference! It needed as little change to make a savage as an angel of him. All depended on the eyes that saw him.

He ran he knew not whither, feeling nothing but the desire first to get into some covert, and then to run farther. His first rush was for the shrubbery, his next across the little park to the wood beyond. He did not feel the wind of his running on his bare skin. He did not feel the hunger that had made him so unable to bear the lash. On and on he ran, fancying ever he heard the cruel Angus behind him. If a dry twig snapped, he thought it was the crack of the whip; and a small wind that rose suddenly in the top of a pine, seemed the hiss with which it was about to descend upon him. He ran and ran, but still there seemed nothing between him and his persecutors. He felt no safety. At length he came where a high wall joining some water, formed a boundary. The water was a brook from the mountain, here widened and deepened into a still pool. He had been once out of his depth before: he threw himself in, and swam straight across: ever after that, swimming seemed to him as natural as walking.

Then first awoke a faint sense of safety; for on the other side he was knee deep in heather. He was on the wild hill, with miles on miles of cover! Here the unman could not catch him. It must be the same that Donal pointed out to him one day at a distance; he had a gun, and Donal said he had once shot a poacher and killed him. He did not know what a poacher was: perhaps he was one himself, and the man would shoot him. They could see him quite well from the other side! he must cross the knoll first, and then he might lie down and rest. He would get right into the heather, and lie with it all round and over him till the night came. Where he would go then, he did not know. But it was all one; he could go anywhere. Donal must mind his cows, and the men must mind the horses, and Mistress Jean must mind her kitchen, but Sir Gibbie could go where he pleased. He would go up Daurside; but he would not go just at once; that man might be on the lookout for him, and he wouldn't like to be shot. People who were shot lay still, and were put into holes in the earth, and covered up, and he would not like that.

Thus he communed with himself as he went over the knoll. On the other side he chose a tall patch of heather, and crept under. How nice and warm and kind the heather felt, though it did hurt the weals dreadfully sometimes. If he only had something to cover just them! There seemed to be one down his back as well as round his waist!

And now Sir Gibbie, though not much poorer than he had been, really possessed nothing separable, except his hair and his nails — nothing therefore that he could call his, as distinguished from him. His sole other possession was a negative quantity — his hunger, namely, for he had not even a meal in his body: he had eaten nothing since the preceding noon. I am wrong — he had one possession besides, though hardly a separable one — a ballad about a fair lady and her page, which Donal had taught him. That he now began to repeat to himself, but was disappointed to find it a good deal withered. He was not nearly reduced to extremity yet though — this little heir of the world: in his body he had splendid health, in his heart a great courage, and in his soul an ever throbbing love. It was his love to the very image of man, that made the horror of the treatment he had received. Angus was and was not a man! After all, Gibbie was still one to be regarded with holy envy.

Poor Ginny was sent to bed for interfering with her father's orders; and what with rage and horror and pity, an inexplicable feeling of hopelessness took possession of her, while her affection for her father was greatly, perhaps for this world irretrievably injured by that morning's experience; a something remained that never passed from her, and that something, as often as it stirred, rose between him and her.

Fergus told his aunt what had taken place, and made much game of her brownie. But the more Jean thought about the affair the less she liked it. It was she upon whom it all came! What did it matter who or what her brownie was? And what had they whipped the creature for? What harm had he done? If indeed he was a little ragged urchin, the thing was only the more inexplicable! He had taken nothing! She had never missed so much as a barley scon! The cream had always brought her the right quantity of butter! Not even a bannock, so far as she knew, was ever gone from the press, or an egg from the bossie where they lay heaped! There was more in it than she could understand! Her nephew's mighty feat, so far from explaining anything, had only sealed up the mystery! She could not help cherishing a shadowy hope that, when things had grown quiet, he would again reveal his presence by his work, if not by his visible person. It was mortifying to think that he had gone as he came, and she never set eyes upon him. But Fergus's account of his disappearance had also, in her judgment, a decided element of the marvellous in it. She was strongly inclined to believe that the brownie had cast a glamor over him and the laird and Angus, all three, and had been making game of them for his own amusement. Indeed Daurside generally refused the explanation of the brownie presented for its acceptance, and the laird scored nothing against the arch-enemy Superstition.

Donal Grant, missing his "cratur" that day for the first time, heard enough when he came home to satisfy him that he had been acting the brownie in the house and the stable as well as in the field, incredible as it might well appear that such a child should have had even mere strength for what he did. Then first also, after he had thus lost him, he began to understand his worth, and to see how much he owed him. While he had imagined himself kind to the urchin, the urchin had been laying him under endless obligation. For he left him with ever so much more in his brains than when he came. This book and that, through his aid, he had read thoroughly; a score or so of propositions had been added to his stock in Euclid; he had even made one or two somethings more like ballads than any former attempts. His first feeling about the child revived as he pondered — namely that he was not of this world. But even then Donal did not know the best Gibbie had done for him. He did not know of what far deeper and better things he had, through his gentleness, his trust, his loving service, his absolute unselfishness, sown the seeds in his mind. On the other hand, Donal had in return done more for Gibbie than he knew, though what he had done for him, namely, shared his dinners with him, had been less of a gift than he thought, and Donal had rather been sharing in Gibbie's dinner than Gibbie in Donal's.

HOLIDAYS IN EASTERN FRANCE.

I NEVER understood till I travelled with French people why French hotels should be so bad; but the reason is to be found in the amiability, laisser faire — call by what name we will — that characteristic which so eminently distinguishes our neighbors on the other side of La Manche. We English perpetually travel, growl and grumble at discomforts as we go, till, by force of persistent fault-finding, we gradually bring about a reformation in hotels and travelling accommodation generally; whereas the French, partly from a dislike to making themselves disagreeable, and partly from the feeling that they are not likely to go over the same ground again, leave things as they find them, to the great disadvantage of those who follow. The French, indeed, travel so little for mere pleasure, that whenever they do so they think it useless to make a fuss about what seems to them part and parcel of the journey. Thus it happens that whenever you go off the beaten tracks in France you find the hotels as bad as they can well be; and your French fellow-traveller takes the dirt, noise, and discomfort generally, much as a matter of course. I am sorry that I can say little for the hotels we found throughout our four days' drive in the most romantic scenery of the Doubs; for the people are so amiable, obliging, and more, than moderate in their charges, that one feels inclined to forgive anything. Truth must be told, however, and so, for once and for all, I will only add that the tourist must here be prepared for the worst in the matter of accommodation, whilst too much praise cannot be accorded to the general desire to please and absolute incapacity of these good people to impose on strangers. It must also be explained that as the mere tourist is a rare phenomenon in these remote parts, the hotels are not arranged in order to meet his wants, but those of the commis voyageur or commercial traveller, who is the chief and best customer of innkeepers all over the country. You meet no one else at the table d'hôte but the commis voyageurs, and it must not be supposed that they are in any way objectionable company. They quietly sit out the various courses, then retire to the billiard room, and they are particularly polite to ladies. Throughout this journey we were on the borders of Switzerland, the thinnest possible partition dividing the land of cleanliness, order, and first-rate accommodation from that of discomfort; yet so rigid is the line of demarcation that no sooner do you put foot on Swiss ground than you find the difference. Quite naturally English travellers keep on the other side of the border, and only a stray one now and then crosses over from the land of cleanliness to the land of dirt.

Our little calèche and horse left much to desire, but the good qualities of our driver made up for everything. He was a fine old man, with a face worthy of a Roman emperor, and having driven all over the country for thirty years, knew it well, and found friends everywhere. Although wearing a blue cotton blouse, he was in the best sense of the word a gentleman, and if we were somewhat astonished to find him seated opposite to us at our table d'hôte breakfast, we soon saw that he well deserved the respect showed him: quiet, polite, dignified, he was the last person in the world to abuse his privileges, never dreaming of familiarity. The extreme politeness shown towards the working-classes here by all in a superior social station doubtless accounts for the good manners we find among them. My fellow-traveller, the widow of a French officer, never dreamed of accosting our good Eugène without the preliminary monsieur, and did not feel at all aggrieved at having him for her vis-à-vis at dinner. Eugène, like the greater part of his fellow-countrymen, is proud and economical, and in order not to become dependent upon his children or charity in his old age, had already with his savings bought a house and garden. It is impossible to give any idea of the thrift and laboriousness of the better order of working-classes here.

Soon after quitting Montbéliard we began to ascend, and for the rest of the day were climbing, gradually exchanging the region of cornfield and vineyard for that of the pine. From Montbéliard to St. Hippolyte is a superb drive of about five hours, amid wild gorges, grandiose rocks that have here taken every imaginable form — rampart, citadel, fortress, tower, all trellised and tasselled with the brightest green, and mountain valleys, here called combes, delicious little emerald islands shut in by towering heights on every side. The mingled wildness and beauty of the scenery reach their culminating point at St. Hippolyte, a pretty little town with a picturesque church superbly situated at the foot of three mountain gorges and the confluence of the Doubs with the Dessoubre, the latter river here turning off in the direction of Fuans. Here we halt for breakfast, and in two hours' time are again ascending, looking down from a tremendous height at the town so incomparably situated in the very heart of these solitary passes and ravines. The road is a wonderful achievement, curling as it does around what below appear unapproachable precipices, and from the beginning of our journey to the end we never ceased to admire it. This famous road was constructed, with many others, in Louis Philippe's time, and must have done great things for the progress of the country. Excepting an isolated little châlet here and there, and an occasional diligence or band of cantonniers, all is solitary; and the solitariness and grandeur increase as we leave the region of rocks and ravines to enter that of the pine, still getting higher and higher. From St. Hippolyte to our next halting-place, Maîche, the road only quits one pine forest to enter another, our way now being perfectly deserted, no herdsman's hut in sight, no sound of bird or animal, nothing to break the silence. Some of these trees are of great height, their sombre foliage at this season of the year being relieved by an abundance of light-brown cones, which give them the appearance of gigantic Christmas trees hung with golden gifts. Glorious as is the scenery we had lately passed — hoary rocks clothed with richest green, verdant slopes, valleys, and mountain-sides all glowing in the sunshine — the majestic gloom and isolation of these pine forests appeal more to the imagination and fill the mind with deeper delight. Next to the sea, the pine forest, to my thinking, is the sublimest of nature's handiwork. Nothing can lessen, nothing can enlarge, such grandeur. Sea and pine forest are the same, alike in thunder-cloud or under a serene sky, summer and winter; lightning and rainbow can hardly add by a hairbreadth to the profundity of the impression they produce.

Maîche might conveniently be made a summer resort, and I can fancy nothing more healthy and pleasanter than such a sojourn amid these fragrant pines. The hotel, too, from what we saw of it, pleased us greatly, and the landlady, like most of the people we have to do with in these parts, is all kindness, obligingness, and good-nature. In large cities and cosmopolitan hotels a traveller is No. 1, 2, or 3, as the case may be, and nothing more. Here host and hostess interest themselves in all their visitors and regard them as human beings. The charges, moreover, are so trifling that in undertaking a journey of this kind, hotel expenses need hardly count at all. The real cost is the carriage.

From Maîche to Le Russey — our halting-place for the night — is a distance of three hours only, during which we are still in the pine-woods. Le Russey possesses no attractions except a quaint and highly artistic monument to the memory of one of her children, a certain Jesuit missionary, whose imposing statue, cross in hand, is conspicuously placed above the public fountain. We cannot have too many of these local monuments, unfortunately rarer in England than in France. They lend character to provincial towns and keep up a spirit of patriotism and emulation among the people. This little town of Le Russey should, if possible, be halted at for an hour or two only; the hotels are dirty and uncomfortable, and we fared worse there than I ever remember to have fared in France, which is saying a good deal. Next morning we were off at eight o'clock to Morteau, our road, now for the most part level, leading us through very different scenery from that of the day before, monotonous open country, mostly pasturage, with lines of pine and fir against the horizon, in many places mere rocky wastes, hardly affording scant herbage for the cattle. Much of this scenery reminded me of the Fell district and north Wales. But by degrees we entered a far more interesting region. We were now close to Switzerland, and the landscape already wore a Swiss look.

There is nothing prettier in a quiet way than this border-land of France and Switzerland, which we reach after a long stretch of rather dreary country. Grace without severity, beauty without sombreness, characterize these pastoral hills and dales, alive with the tinkling of cattle bells and pleasantly diversified with villages scattered here and there, a church spire rising above the broad-roofed Swiss-like wooden houses. On every side are wide stretches of undulating green pasture, in some places shut in by pine-clad ridges, in others by smiling green hills, clusters of white-washed houses being perched terrace-wise alongside. We have seen little that can be called farming in our way, but here we find patches of wheat and rye still too green to cut, also bits of beet-root, maize, hemp, and potatoes; the chief produce of these parts is, of course, that of the dairy, the "beurre de montagne" being famous in these parts. Throughout our journey we have never lost sight of the service-berry tree, the road from Maîche to Morteau is indeed planted with them, and nothing can be handsomer than the clusters of bright red, coral-like berries we have on every side. The hedges show also the crimson-tasselled fruit of the barberry, no less ornamental than the service-berry tree. It is evident the greatest possible care is taken with these wayside plantations, and in a few years' time the road will present the appearance of a boulevard. At La Chenalotte, a hamlet halfway between Le Russey and Morteau, enterprising pedestrians may alight and take a two hours' walk by a mountain path to the falls of the river Doubs, from which river the department takes its name; but as the roads are very bad on account of the late heavy rains, we prefer to drive on to the little hamlet called Les Pargots, beyond Morteau, and thence reach the falls by means of a boat, traversing the lake of Les Brenets and the basins of Le Doubs. The little Swiss village of Les Brenets is coquettishly perched on a green hill commanding the lake, and we are now indeed on Swiss ground, being within a few miles of Chaux de Fonds, and only a short railway journey from Neufchatel and Pontarlier.

We trust ourselves to the care of an experienced boatwoman, and are soon in a fairy-like scene — a vast sheet of limpid water surrounded by verdant ridges, amid which peep châlets here and there, velvety pastures sloping down to the water's edge; all is tenderness, loveliness, and grace. As we glide from the lake to the basins, the scenery takes a severer character, and there is sublimity in these gigantic walls of rock rising sheer from the silvery sheets of water, each successive one seeming to us more beautiful and romantic than the last. Perfect solitude reigns here, for so precipitous and steep are these fortress-like rocks that there is no "coigne of vantage" even for the mountain goat, not the tiniest path from summit to base, no single break in the shelving masses, some of which take the weirdest forms. Seen, as we first saw them, with a brilliant blue sky overhead, no shadow on the gold green verdure, these exquisite little lakes, twin pearls on a string, afford the daintiest, most delightful spectacle; but a leaden sky and a driving wind turn this scene of enchantment into gloom and monotony, as we find on our way back.

The serene beauty of the lake and the imposing aspect of these rock-shut basins give an ascending scale of beauty, and the climax is reached when, having glided in and out from the first to the last, we alight, climb a mountain path, and below, far below, at our feet, amid a deafening roar, are the majestic falls of the Doubs.

These things are indescribable; but to come from the sublime to the ridiculous, I must advise future travellers not to follow our example — in respect of a woman boatman. The good woman who acted as guide to the falls could not hold her tongue for a single moment, and her loud inharmonious tittle-tattle put us in ill-humor for the rest of the day. When you make a long journey to see such a phenomenon as this, you should see it alone, or at least in perfect quiet. We had come opportunely for the falls, however, the enormous quantity of rain that had fallen within the last few weeks having greatly augmented their volume. It was as if no river, but a sea, were here leaping from its prison-house, rejoiced to clear its rocks, and have its own wild way. The profound impression created by such a scene as this, to my thinking, lies chiefly in the striking contrasts we have before us: a vast eddy of snow-white foam, the very personification of impetuous movement, also of sparkling whiteness, with a background of pitchy black rock, still, immovable, changeless as the heavens above.

As we stood thus peering down at the silvery whirlpool and its sombre environment, we were bedewed with a light mist, spray sent upwards by the falling waters. Our female Cerberus gabbled on, and so to get rid of her we descended. There is a restaurant on the French, also on the Swiss side of the basin we had just crossed, and we chose the latter, not with particular success. Very little we got either to eat or drink, and a very long while we had to wait for it, but at last we had dined, and again embarked to cross the basins and lake. In the mean time the weather had entirely changed, and instead of a glowing blue sky and bright sun, we had lowering clouds and high winds, making our boatwoman's task difficult in the extreme. However, still gabbling on, she contrived to clear one little promontory after another, and when once out of the closely confined basins into the more open lake all was as easy as possible.

We found the Hôtel Gimbard at Morteau a vast improvement upon that of Le Russey, and woke up refreshed next morning, after having well supped and well slept, to find, alas! thunder, lightning, and torrents of rain the order of the day. Our programme was to turn off at Morteau in the direction of Fuans and the picturesque banks of the Dessoubre, reaching St. Hippolyte at night, but with great reluctance we had to give up this détour. From Morteau to St. Hippolyte is a day's journey only to be made by starting at eight in the morning, and there are not even decent wayside inns. So we patiently waited till the storm was over; and as by that time it was past midday, there was nothing to do but drive leisurely back to Mâiche. More fortunate travellers than ourselves in the matter of weather, however, are particularly recommended the other route. Mâiche is a good specimen of the large flourishing village or bourg found in these parts, and a greater contrast with those of Brittany cannot be conceived. There you find no upper or middle class element, no progress, little communication with the outer world, some of the towns even, St. Pol de Léon for instance, being literally asleep. Here all is life, bustle, and animation, and though we are now amid a Catholic community, order and comparative cleanliness prevail. Some of the cottage gardens are quite charming, and handsome modern houses in large numbers denote the existence of rich bourgeois families, as is also the case in the villages near Montbéliard. The commune of Mâiche has large revenues, especially in forest lands, and we can thus account for the really magnificent curé and presbytère, the residence of the curé, also the imposing Hôtel de Ville, and new costly decorations of the church. There is evidently money for everything, and the curé of Mâiche must be a happy person, contrasting his position formally with that of his fellow-curés in the Protestant villages around Montbéliard. The down-hill drive from our airy eminence amid these pine forests was even more striking than our ascent had been two days before, and we naturally got over the ground in less than half the time. It is really a pity such delightful scenery should not be made more accessible to travellers by really first-rate inns. There are several at Mâiche, also at St. Hippolyte and Pont de Roïde, but they are made for the commis voyageur, not the tourist. Yet there is a friendliness, a bonhomie, and a disinterestedness about these hotel-keepers, which would soon disappear were the department of Le Doubs turned into a little Switzerland. At the table d'hôte dinners the master of the house always presides and looks after his guests; waiters there are none; sometimes the plates are changed by the landlady, who also superintends the kitchen, sometimes by the landlord, sometimes by a guest, and shortcomings are made up for by general geniality and good-nature; every one knows every one, and the dinner is a meeting of old friends.

All this will soon be changed with the new line of railway leading from Besançon by way of Morteau into Switzerland, and future travellers will be able to see this beautiful country with very little fatigue. As yet Franche-Comté is a terra incognita, and the sight of an English tourist is of rarest occurrence. When we leave Pont de Roïde we once more enter the regions of Protestantism, every village possessing its Protestant and Catholic church. The drive to Blamont is charming, a veritable bit of Devonshire, with green lanes, dells and glades, curling streams, and smooth green meadows. Blamont itself is most romantically situated, crowning a verdant mountain-side, its twin spires (Protestant and Catholic) rising conspicuously above the scattered villages, far above these the mountain range of Lomont. We have all this time, be it remembered, been, geographically speaking, in the Jura, though departmentally in the Doubs, the succession of rock and mountain we have passed through forming part of the Jura range, which vanishes in the green slopes of Blamont. Both the Doubs and the Jura form part of the ancient province of Franche-Comté.

The next village, Glay, is hardly less picturesque; all the neighborhood indeed would afford charming excursions for the pedestrian. The rest of our drive lay through an open, fairly cultivated plain, with little manufacturing colonies thickly scattered among the rural population, in many cases the tall black chimneys spoiling the pastoralness of the scene.

It was with extreme regret I took farewell of the friendly little Protestant town of Montbéliard a few days later. I had entered it, a few weeks before, a stranger; I quitted it amid the good wishes, handclasps, and regretful farewells of a dozen kind friends. Two hours' railway journey through a beautiful country brought me to Besançon, where, as at Montbéliard, I received the warmest welcome, and felt at home at once. The hotels at Besançon have the reputation of being the worst throughout all France, but my kind friends would not permit me to try them. Instead, therefore, of becoming number two or four, as the case might be, in an enormous bustling hotel, I found myself amid all kinds of comforts, domesticities, and distractions, with delightful cicerones in my host and hostess, and charming little companions in their two children. This is, indeed, the poetry of travel; to travel from place to place provided with letters introductory which open hearts and doors at every stage, and make every halt the inauguration of a new friendship. I wish I could subjoin a pencil sketch illustrative of "How I Travelled through Franche-Comté," for my explorations of these picturesque regions were a succession of picnics; host and hostess, their English guest, Swiss nursemaid, and two little fair-haired boys, cosily packed in an open carriage; on the seat beside the driver stands a huge basket, suggestive of creature comforts, the neck of a wine-bottle and the spout of a teapot conspicuous above the other contents!

This is, indeed, the way I saw the beautiful valley of the Doubs, and not only the country round about Besançon, but the borderland of Switzerland and Savoy. The weather — we are in the first days of September — is perfect; the children, aged respectively sixteen months and three years and odd, are the best little travellers in the world, always going to sleep when convenient to their elders, and at other times quietly enjoying the shifting landscape; in fact, there is nothing to mar our enjoyment of regions as lovely as any it has ever been my good fortune to witness.

In consequence of the bad character of the Besançon hotels, even French tourists seldom break their journey here; but on the opening of the new railway line into Switzerland by way of Besançon, Ornans, and Morteau, new and better hotels are sure to spring up. At present, wherever we go we never by any chance meet the ubiquitous English traveller with his "Murray;" and my friends here say that, during a several years' residence in Besançon, they have never yet seen such an apparition. Yet Franche-Comté, at present a terra incognita of tourists, abounds in all kinds of beauty; the sublime, the gracious, and the pastoral, rock, vast panorama, mountain and valley, all are here, and all as yet free from the track of the English and American tourists as the garden of Eden before Eve's trespass.

Besides these quieter beauties are some rare natural phenomena, such as the Glaciers de la Grâce Dieu, near Baume les Dames, and the famous Osselle Grottoes, both of which may be reached by railway. We preferred however, the open carriage, the basket, and the tea-pot, and accordingly set off for the latter one superb morning in the highest spirits, which nothing occurred to mar. Quitting the splendid mountain environment of Besançon, we drove for three hours amid the lovely valley of the Doubs, delighted at every bend of the road with some new feature in the landscape; then choosing a sheltered slope, we unpack our basket, and lunch al fresco, in the merriest spirits and with the heartiest appetites. Never surely did the renowned Besançon pâtés taste better, never did the wine of its warm hillsides possess a pleasanter flavor. The children sported over the turf like little Loves, the air was sweet with the perfume of new-made hay, the birds sang overhead, and beyond our immediate pavilion of greenery lay the curling blue river and smiling hills. Leaving the children to sleep under the trees, and the horse to feed at a neighboring mill — there is no kind of wayside inn here, so that we have to beg a little hay from the miller as a favor — we follow a lad provided with matches and candles to the entrance of the famous grottoes. Outside the sugarloaf hill, so marvellously channelled and cased with stalactitic formation, has nothing remarkable. It is a mere green hill, and nothing more. Inside, however, as strange a spectacle meets our eyes as it is possible to conceive. To see these caves in detail you must spend an hour and a half in the bowels of the earth; but we were contented with half that time, for the underground promenade is a very chilly one, and in some places we were ankle-deep in water. Each being provided with a lighted candle, we followed our youthful guide, who was accompanied by a dog, as familiar as himself with the windings of these sombre subterraneous palaces, for palaces indeed they might be called. Sometimes these stalactite roofs are lofty, sometimes we have to bend our heads in order to pass from one vaulted chamber to another. Here we have a superb column supporting an arch, here a pillar in course of formation — everywhere the strangest, most fantastic architecture — architecture, moreover, that is the work of ages, one petrifying drop after another doing its apportioned work — column, arch, and roof being formed by a process so slow that the lifetime of a human being hardly counts in the calculation. There is something sublime in the steady persistence of nature, the undeviating march to a goal; and as we gaze upon the embryo stages of the petrifaction, stalagmite patiently lifting itself upward, stalactite as patiently bending down to the remote but inevitable union, we might almost fancy them sentient agents in the marvellous transformation. The stamens of a passion-flower do not more eagerly — as it seems — curl upwards to embrace the pistil, the beautiful pistillate flower of the Vallisneria spiralis does not more determinately seek its mate, than these crystal pendants covet union with their fellows below. Such perpetual bridals are accomplished after countless cycles of time, whilst meanwhile, in the sunlit world outside, the faces of whole continents are being changed, and entire civilizations are formed and overthrown.

The feeble light projected by our four candles in these gloomy yet majestic chambers was not so feeble as to obscure the insignificant names of hundreds of individuals scrawled here and there. Schopenhauer explains the foolish propensity of travellers thus to perpetuate their memories, as it seems to them. John Smith and Tom Brown, who scribble their names, whether inside the Kentucky caves or on the top of the Pyramids, imagine most likely that so long as these remain their illustrious names will not be forgotten; and can only remember alike cave and Pyramids by means of such personal associations: they indeed are nothing, but the ego, the little self of John Smith and Tom Brown something. The bones of the cave bear and other gigantic animals have been found here, but at present the only tenants of these antique vaults are the bats, forming huge black clusters in the roof. There is something eerie in their cries, but they are more alarmed than alarming, the lights disturbing them not a little.

Pleasant after even thus short a venture into the region of perpetual night was the return to sunshine, green trees, the children — and the teapot! After calling it into requisition, we set off homewards, reaching Besançon just as the moon made its appearance, a large silver disc above the purple hills. And the next day, good luck still following us, we had a drive and picnic in the opposite direction, this time with a less ambitious programme. In fact, we were merely accepting a neighbor's invitation to a friendly dinner out of doors a few miles from Besançon. This picnic is a fair sample of Franc-Comtois hospitality, not only friends being invited, but their guests, babies, servants — "all that was in their house" — the various parties being collected in a waggonette. It was Sunday, and though I am here still in a strictly Protestant atmosphere, host and guests being Protestants, it was pleasant to find none of the Puritanism characterizing some sections of the Reformed Church in France. The Protestant pastor, indeed, to whose eloquent discourse I had listened that morning, was of the party; and it is quite a matter of course here to spend Sunday afternoons thus sociably and healthfully. The meeting place was a rustic spot much resorted to by Bisontins (as residents of Besançon are called) on holidays, and easily reached from the little station of Roche, on the railway line to Belfort. A winding path through a wood leads to the so-called Acier springs, which since the Roman epoch have continued to supply Besançon with the delicious water we find here in such abundance. We have just such bits of wood, waterfall, and mountain in north Wales, but seldom in September such unbroken sunshine to make a picnic exactly what it should be. It was warm enough for July, and young and old could disport themselves on the turf in perfect security. As the afternoon wore on, numerous pleasure parties, mostly belonging to the working-classes, found their way to the same pleasant spot, all amply provided with baskets of wine and provisions. Some went farther in search of some little glade they could have to themselves, others took possession of nooks and corners in the open space where we had just before dined so merrily. It was amusing to see how little attention these good people paid to us or any other outsiders. Two or three of the women, fearing to tear their Sunday gowns in the wood, coolly took them off, hanging them on the trees near, and as coolly remade their toilette when their woodland rambles were over. The train to Roche certainly brought in a goodly contingent of picnic parties that afternoon, and when about four o'clock we prepared to return home the place was beginning to wear a very animated appearance. The moon had risen ere we reached our destination, and seen in the tender summer twilight the valley of the Doubs looked even more beautiful than in the glowing sunshine of midday. There is no monotony in these vine-clad hills, rugged mountain-sides wooded from peak to base, close-shut valleys, and bright blue winding rivers; whether seen under the dropping shadows of a shifting sky, or the glow of sunset, their quiet beauties delight the eye of every spectator and commend themselves to the artist. Perhaps no department of France is richer in rivers than this, and every landscape has its bit of river or canal.

To get an idea of the commanding position of Besançon, we must climb one of the lofty green heights, that of Notre Dame des Buis for instance, an hour's drive from the town. Having reached a sharp eminence, crowned by a chapel and covered with boxwood, we obtain a splendid view of the natural and artificial defences which make Besançon, strategically speaking, one of the strongest positions in France. Cæsar in his "Commentaries" speaks almost with enthusiasm of the admirable position of Vesontio, the capital of the Sequani, and when he became master of it, the defeat of Vercingetorix became a mere matter of time. But what would the great general have said, could he have seen his citadel thus dwarfed into insignificance by Vauban's magnificent fortifications, and what would be Vauban's amazement could he behold the stupendous works of modern strategists?

Beyond these proudly cresting heights, every peak bristling with its defiant fort, stretches a vast panorama; the mountain chain of the Jura, the Vosges, the snow-capped Swiss Alps, the plains of Burgundy, all these lie under our eyes, clearly defined in the transparent atmosphere of this summer afternoon. Campanulas, white and blue, with abundance of a lovely tinted deep-orange potentilla and carmine dianthus, were growing at our feet, with numerous other wild flowers. The pretty pink mallow cultivated in gardens grows everywhere, but the service-tree and barberry have almost disappeared. This is indeed a paradise to botanists, but their travels should be made earlier in the year. The walks and drives in the neighborhood of Besançon are countless, but that to the little valley of the World's End, "Le Bout du Monde," must on no account be omitted. Again we follow the limpid waters of the winding Doubs: here, on one side, we have hanging vineyards and orchards; on the other, lines of poplar; above these, dimpled green hills and craggy peaks are reflected in the still transparent water. We reach the pretty village of Beurre, after a succession of landscapes, "l'un plus joli que l'autre," as our French neighbors say, and then come suddenly upon a tiny valley shut in by lofty rocks, aptly called the world's end of these parts, since here the most adventuresome pedestrian must retrace his steps. No possibility of scaling these mountain walls, from which a cascade falls so musically, no outlet from these impregnable walls into the pastoral country on the other side. We must go back by the way we have come, first having penetrated to the heart of the valley by a winding path, and watched the silvery water tumble down from the grey rocks that seem to touch the blue sky overhead.

The great charm of these landscapes is the abundance of water to be found everywhere, and no less delightful is the sight of springs, fountains, and pumps in every village. Besançon is noted for its handsome fountains, some of which are real works of art; but the tiniest hamlet in the neighborhood, and indeed throughout the department of the Doubs, is as well supplied as the city itself. We know what an aristocratic luxury good water is in many an English village, and how too often the poor have no pure drinking water within reach at all; here they have close at hand enough and to spare of the purest and best, and not only their share of that, but of the good things of the earth, a bit of vegetable and fruit garden, a vineyard, and generally speaking a little house of their own. Here as a rule everybody possesses something, and the working watchmakers have most of them their suburban garden to which they resort on Sundays and holidays. Besançon is very rich in suburban retreats, and nothing can be more enticing than the cottages and villas nestled so cosily along the vine-clad hills that surround it on every side. It is above all rich in public walks and promenades; one of these, the Promenade Chamart — a corruption of Champs de Mars — possessing some of the finest plane-trees in Europe, a gigantic fragment of forest on the verge of the city of wonderful beauty and stateliness. These veteran trees vary in height from thirty to thirty-five yards. The Promenade Micaud, so called after its originator, winds along the river-side, and affords a lovely view at every turn. Then there are so-called "squares" in the heart of the town, where military bands play twice a week, and nursemaids and their charges spend the afternoon. Perhaps no city of its size in all France — Besançon numbers only sixty thousand inhabitants — is better off in this respect, whilst it is so encircled by vine-clad hills and mountains that the country peeps in everywhere. Considered from all points of view it is a very attractive place to live in, and possesses all the resources of the capital on a small scale: an excellent theatre, literary and artistic societies, free art schools and academy of arts and sciences, museums, picture-galleries, one of the first public libraries in France, of which a word more later on. First of all something must be said of the city itself, which is especially interesting to the archæologist and historian, and is very little frequented by English tourists. Alternately Roman, Burgundian, Arlesian, Anglo-French, and Spanish, Besançon has seen extraordinary vicissitudes; in the twelfth century it was constituted a free city, or commune, and was not incorporated into the French kingdom till the reign of Louis XIV. Traces of these various occupations remain, and as we enter in at one gate and pass out of another, we have each successive chapter suggested to us in the noble Porte Noire or Roman triumphal arch; the ancient cathedral, forming a Roman basilica; the superb semi-Italian, semi-Spanish Palais Granville; the Hôtel de Ville, with its handsome sixteenth-century façade; the Renaissance council chamber; the magnificently carved oak hall of the Palais de Justice; all these stamp the city with the seal of different epochs, and lend majesty to the modern handsome town into which the Besançon of former times has been transformed. The so-called Porte Taillée, a Roman gate hewn out of the solid rock, and surmounted by a tower, is an imposing entry to the city, the triumphal arch before mentioned leading to the cathedral only. Here most picturesquely stand the columns and other fragments of the Roman theatre excavated by the learned librarian, M. Castan, a few years back. The archbishop allows no one to see the treasures contained in the archiepiscopal palace, among which is a fine Paul Veronese; but the cathedral is fortunately open, and there the art-lover may rejoice in one of the most beautiful Fra Bartolomeos in the world, unfortunately hung too high to be well seen. Externally the cathedral offers little interest, but the interior is very gorgeous, a dazzling display of gold ornaments, old stained glass pictures, mosaics, and ecclesiastical riches of all kinds.

The other churches of Besançon are not interesting, architecturally speaking, though picturesque, especially St. Pierre, with its clock-tower conspicuously seen from every part of the town. The Archæological Museum is declared by authorities to be the best arranged in France, and contains some wonderfully beautiful things, notably the Celtic collection found at Alaise, and Gallo-Roman objects of great interest and beauty discovered in various parts of Franche-Comté. Such collections must be studied in detail to be thoroughly appreciated, and commend themselves to archæologists only. I mention the importance and value of the Besançon museum as another illustration of the principle of decentralization carried on in France, each city being enriched and embellished as far as possible, and made a centre, artistic, scientific, and literary. The museum contains, amongst other things, a curious collection of old watches, the speciality of Besançon, of which more will be said hereafter. But what was my astonishment and delight as I sauntered by the little cases under the windows containing coins, medals, and antiquities of various kinds, to come suddenly upon a label bearing this inscription?

LA MONTRE DE VERGNIAUD.

There it lay, the little gold watch of the great Girondin orator, choicest, most precious relic of the Revolution, historic memento unrivalled for its interest and romantic associations! Vergniaud's watch! The very words take one's breath away, yet there it was close under my eyes. All those of my readers who are well acquainted with the history of the Revolution in detail will remember the last banquet of the Girondins, that memorable meeting together of the martyrs of liberty, each one condemned to die next morning for his political creed. The Girondins (of whom Vergniaud was undoubtedly the greatest) ruthlessly swept away, the last barrier removed between principle and passion, and the revolutionary tide was free to work destruction at its will. After the banquet, which was held with much state and ceremony in a hall of the Conciergerie,* now shown to travellers, the twenty-seven Girondins discoursed in Platonic fashion upon the topics nearest their hearts, namely, the future of the republican idea and the immortality of the soul. The solemn symposium brought to an end, each occupied himself differently, some in making their last testaments, others in deep thought, one in calm sleep; and it was during this interval that Vergniaud, with a pin, scratched inside the case of his elegant little gold watch the name of Adèle, and having done this, he handed it to a trustworthy gaoler to be delivered next day. A few hours later his head had fallen on the guillotine, but his last bequest was duly delivered to the Adèle for whom he designed it, a little girl of thirteen, who was to have become his wife. She became in due time a happy wife and mother, and bequeathed Vergniaud's historic watch to a friend, who generously bestowed it upon the Besançon museum. Charles Nodier in his "Dernier Banquet des Girondins," gives an eloquent history of this watch, which most likely he saw or handled as a youth. Vergniaud is undoubtedly one of the most striking and imposing figures in the Revolution, and everything concerning him is of deepest interest. His lofty soul, no more than any other of that epoch, could foresee how the French republic would be established peaceably and firmly after torrents of blood and crimes and terrors unspeakable.

The picture-galleries, arranged in five handsome rooms adjoining, contain these two chefs-d'œuvre amid a fairly representative collection of classic and modern art. The fine Albert Dürer, an altarpiece on wood, the Moro portraits, the Bronzino, a "Descent from the Cross," are veritable gems; and beside these are portraits of the two Granvilles by Titian and Gaetano, and two fine portraits, called "A Mathematician" and "Galileo," attributed to Velasquez.

* So enormous was the influx of visitors during the Exhibition that by an order of the préfet de la police no one is now permitted to use the Conciergerie. It became impracticable.

Under the same roof is the free art school for both sexes, which is one of the most flourishing institutions of the town, and dates from the year 1774. In the second year of instruction drawing is taught from the live model. Besançon also boasts of a free music school, and, what is of particular interest to strangers, a technical school for the training of working watchmakers, male and female. Watchmaking, as has already been mentioned, is the speciality of the town, and originated as far back as 1793. The National Convention is to be thanked for this great source of wealth, the first horlogerie here being founded by the refugee watchmakers of Chaux de Fonds and Locle, who had been proscribed for their adhesion to republican ideas. By a decree of the Convention these exiles were accorded succor and shelter at Besançon, after which the Committee of National Safety declared the horlogeries of Le Doubs national institutions. Upwards of five hundred thousand watches are made annually, and it has been computed that out of every hundred watches that go to the French market, eighty-six come from Besançon. These little watches are very durable and elegant, and are sold at prices that would surprise Sir John Bennett and other eminent watchmakers in London. Besançon also possesses an Academy of Arts, Science and Belles-Lettres, free to both sexes, and a poor scholar, therefore, who has been lucky enough to get a nomination to the Lycée, may here obtain his bachelier ès lettres or ès sciences without one farthing of cost. Again, I may remark that, as far as I know, no English town of sixty thousand inhabitants, more or less, offers such advantages in the way of higher instruction to those who cannot afford to pay for it; but perhaps my English critics will reply that English towns might have such free institutions if they chose. The session of the Besançon academy begins in October and lasts till the summer, during which are daily delivered, by first-rate professors, courses of lectures scientific, artistic, and literary. I should be only too glad to discover that at Hastings or Ipswich, for instance, towns I know pretty well — I could attend gratuitously or otherwise courses of lectures with demonstrations on chemistry, geology, palæontology, or any other subject by accredited professors. The fact of the case is, as any one who lives in France knows, that we have nothing like the free academies, art schools, and music academies found there so largely, and which mostly date from the great Revolution, when the highest instruction was not considered too good for the people. The superior taste, technical skill, and general intelligence of French workmen to our own are due to these causes, and also to the opening of museums, public libraries, etc., on Sundays.

Delightful hours may be spent in the library of Besançon, which is one of the richest and most ancient in France, but space will only permit a word or two concerning its various treasures. Like the memorable library of Weimar, it is a museum as well, and contains a most interesting collection of coins, medals, statues, busts, engravings, etc., relating to the history of Franche-Comté; and, like most other large French provincial libraries, it is under the management of a man of great learning and distinction. M. Castan, the present librarian, is the author of several valuable works relating to his native province, and to him Besançon is indebted for the excavations which have filled its museums with archæological treasures. Bibliographers may here feast their eyes on stores of most precious illuminated MSS. and rare books, some of which are of the greatest rarity; but ordinary tourists will be better pleased with the statues and portraits that adorn its corridor. Here we find celebrated Franc-Comtois of all times, soldiers, savants, poets, littérateurs, the familiar features of Victor Hugo among the rest. Franche-Comté is particularly rich in great names, and Besançon alone boasts of a noble list, Victor Hugo, Charles Nodier, Fourier, Proudhon, Charles Weiss, Francis Wey, the sculptors Clésinger and Petit — these inter alios of our own epoch. The house in which the author of "Notre Dame de Paris" was born, so far back as 1802, is in the street leading to the cathedral, but has long since been reconstructed.

The interest and beauty of Besançon might be dwelt upon at much greater length did space permit; but to realize these the traveller should follow my example and settle down for a fortnight, "excursionizing" from time to time, and seeing the town itself leisurely. Nothing worth seeing can be seen in a hurry, and I would gladly have devoted another fortnight to the antiquities and beautiful environs of this delightful old town. It is eminently Catholic, but although in a tremendous minority here, the Protestants hold their own, and even make head against the enemy, as at Arbois, a little town in the Jura, where a Protestant church has lately been established. There are four pastors at Besançon, who divide the work between them: it is mainly owing to their efforts that a handsome building with gardens in the suburbs has lately been purchased and turned into a Protestant hospital and asylum for the sick and aged. Up till this time they had been received in the municipal hospital under the management of the nuns, who of course did all in their power to worry them into Catholicism. We know what happens when a hospital is under the charge of nuns, and it can easily be understood that many of these poor people preferred to embrace a crucifix than profess the truth when half-dead of exhaustion. Some would go through a mock conversion, others would endure a martyrdom till the last; but the position alike of weak or obstinate was unbearable. Now there is a home not only for the indigent Protestant sick and aged, but for those who can afford to pay a small sum for being well looked after, and it is delightful to witness the homelike ease and comfort of everything. The poor people welcomed their pastor, who accompanied me on my visit, not only as a priest but as a friend, and it was easy to see how they enjoyed a little talk with madame, and the prattle of the children, who were delighted to accompany their parents. The large, shady gardens overlooking the town are much resorted to in fine weather, and everywhere we found cheerful faces. It is hardly necessary to say that this admirable work needs money. The Catholic clergy of course regard any step in advance on the part of the Protestants with abhorrence, and do a little bit of persecution whenever opportunity offers. As perhaps may not be known to all my readers, the parish burial-ground in France is opened by the law to all sects and denominations indiscriminately. Protestant, Jew, Mahometan, or Brahmin may here find a resting-place in spite of M. le Curé. Such is the law, and an admirable law it is, but the law means one thing to a Catholic and another to a Protestant. There is no Protestant burial-ground in Besançon or the neighboring villages, so that every one is buried in the town and parish cemetery; but as mayors of small county towns and villages often happen not to know the law, the curé tries to circumvent his enemy at the last. Accordingly, when the time of burial comes, a Protestant pastor may be kept waiting for hours in consequence of this wilful obstinacy, supposing that the mayor is under clerical influence. Useless to argue, "La loi est avec nous;" curé and mayor persist, and at the last moment the unfortunate pastor has to telegraph to the préfet, who, whether clerical or not, knows the law and is obliged to follow it, and consequently send an authorization which ends the matter. This is very blind on the part of the clericals, for it naturally turns the Protestants into martyrs. It happened in a little village not far from Besançon that after a scene of this kind all the village population turned into the cemetery, and by the time the préfet's order came, the Protestant pastor had a large audience for his discourse over the grave. "C'est si consolant chez les Protestants l'enterrement des morts," people were heard to say, and let us hope the curé and the mayor were punished for their folly by a few conversions to Protestantism among their flock.

Leaving this ungracious subject, let the reader follow me to Ornans and the long valley of the Loue. This is the excursion par excellence to be made from Besançon, and may be made in two ways; either on foot, occupying three or four days, decidedly the most advantageous for those who can do it, or by carriage in a single day, starting very early in the morning, and telegraphing for relays at Ornans the previous afternoon. This is how we man aged it, starting at five, and reaching home soon after eight at night. The children accompanied us, and I must say better fellow-travellers I never had than these mites of sixteen months and three-and-a-half years. When tired of looking at the cows, oxen, goats, horses, and poultry we passed on the road, they would amuse themselves for an hour by quietly munching a roll; and when that occupation at last came to an end, they would go to sleep, waking up just as happy as before. As a hint to mammas, I will add that the younger was getting his teeth, and in the house was fretful and ill at ease. No sooner was his hat on and the magic word voiture pronounced in his hearing, than every cloud vanished from his sweet little face, and all the miseries of teething were forgotten. Ornans is not only extremely picturesque in itself, but interesting as the birthplace and family residence of the famous painter Courbet; it is also a starting-place for the valley of the Loue, and the source of this beautiful little river, the last only to be seen in fine dry weather on account of the steepness and slipperiness of the road. The climate of Franche-Comté is unfortunately very like our own, being excessively changeable, rainy, blowy, sunny, all in a breath. To-day's unclouded sunshine is no guarantee of fine weather to-morrow; although, as a rule, September is the finest month of the year here, it has been all along variable this year with alternations of rain and chilliness. This is the great drawback of travel in these parts, and fine days have to be waited for and seized upon whenever they come. The hotels are very much like caravanserais in Algeria; bells, fireplaces, and other necessities of civilized life are unknown; the bedrooms — generally reached by an outside staircase — afford such accommodation as we should not think luxurious for a stable-boy in England, and often adjoin a noisy upper salle-à-manger, where eating, drinking, and talking are going on all day long. The food is always good, the wine sour as vinegar, and the people obliging in the extreme. At Mouthier we sat down to an excellent dinner at one end of the dining-room; at the other was a long table where a number of peasant farmers, carters, graziers, etc. — it was fair-day — were dining equally well. Our driver was among them, and all were as quiet and well-behaved as possible, but given to spit on the floor, as "is their nature to." The charges are very low.

Ornans we reach after a drive of three hours amid hills luxuriantly draped with vines and craggy peaks clothed with verdure, here and there wide stretches of velvety green pasture with cattle feeding, and haymakers turning over the autumn hay. Everywhere we find haymakers at work, and picturesque figures they are.

Ornans is lovely, and no wonder that Courbet was so fond of it. Nestled in a deep valley of green rocks and vineyards, and built on the banks of the transparent Loue, its quaint spire rising from the midst, it commends itself alike to artist, naturalist, and angler. These old-world houses, reflected in the river, are marvellously malerisch — paintable, as our German friends say; and the scene, as we saw it after a heavy rain, glowed in the brightest, the warmest light.

Courbet's house is situated, not on the river, but by the roadside on the outskirts of the town, fronting the river and the bright green terraced hills above. It is a low one storied house, embosomed in greenery, very rural, pretty, and artistic. In the dining-room we were shown a small statue of the painter by his own hand, giving one rather the idea of a country squire or sporting-farmer than a great artist; and the house — which is not shown to strangers — is full of interesting reminiscences of its owner. In the kitchen is a splendid Renaissance chimney-piece in sculptured marble, fit for the dining-hall of a Rothschild. This Courbet found in some old château near, and transferred it to his cottage. On the walls of the studio are two frescoes he painted in his happier days, before he helped to overthrow the Vendôme Column, and thus forfeited the good feeling of his fellow-townsmen. Ornans is clerical to the backbone, and — will it be believed? — after the unfortunate affair of the Vendôme Column, an exquisite statue with which Courbet had decorated the public fountain was thrown down, of course at clerical instigation. Morteau — it must be supposed — being more enlightened, rescued the dishonored statue, and it now adorns the public fountain of that village. It is indeed impossible to give any idea of the vindictive spirit with which poor Courbet was treated by his native village; and seeing how much he loved it, it must have galled him deeply. We were allowed to wander at will over the house and straggling gardens, having friends in the present occupants, but the house still belongs to the Courbet family, and is not otherwise to be seen.

Ornans possesses a fine old church, also a curious old Spanish house, relic of the Spanish occupation of Franche-Comté, and long walks without number. Everywhere we see artificial terraces for the vines as on the Rhine, not a ledge of mountain-side being wasted. On account of its splendid scenery, it is a favorite resort of French artists, and at least one name among them will ever be associated with it. As we leave it and enter on the Mouthier road the aspect changes, and we find ourselves in the winding, close-shut valley of the Loue, narrow, turbulent little stream, of deep-blue green, winding over a rocky bed, amid hanging vineyards and towering cliffs of every conceivable form. This valley of the Loue is deservedly reckoned among the finest pieces of scenery in the department of the Doubs.

Mouthiers is perched on a hillside amid mountains of grandiose outline, and is hardly less malerisch, though not nearly so enticing as Ornans. In fact, it is a trifle dirty when visited in detail, though charming when viewed from the mountain road above.

After having stopped at Mouthiers to dine and rest, we now climb this, and hardly know which to admire most, the deep, far-off winding valley at our feet, amid which the imprisoned river curls with a noise as of thunder, making miniature cascades at every step; or the towering silvery grey rocks overhead, of most majestic height and form, rising sheer from wild ravine to blue sky. The road zigzags wonderfully around the mountain-sides, a stupendous piece of engineering which cost its originator his life. The engineer to whom travellers are indebted for this road from Mouthier to Pontarlier, while occupied in taking measurements, lost his footing and fell into the awful chasm below. Franche-Comté is rich in zigzagging mountain roads of daring construction, and none are more wonderful than this. All this time, as we crawl at a snail's pace between rock and ravine, purest, most silvery-white masses towering to the sky, densest, deepest green fastnesses that make us giddy to behold, we hear the sea-like roar of the little river as it pours down impetuously from its mountain home. The heavy rains of the previous night, however, prevent us from following it to its source, a delightful excursion in dry weather, but impracticable after a rainfall. The day too is waning, so we leave this to more fortunate travellers, and turn our horse's head towards Mouthier. When, after coffee and a little chat with friends, we leave Ornans, a splendid glow of sunset lights up Courbet's favorite abiding-place, clothing the hills and woods he gazed on so often with ripest gold. The glories of the sunset lingered long, and as the last crimson cloud faded, the full pearly moon rose in the clear heavens, amid myriads of stars.

A few days after this delightful excursion, I quitted Besançon, as I had done Montbéliard, amid the heartiest leave-takings; and the last recollection I have of the ancient town is of two little fair-haired boys whose faces were lifted to mine for a farewell kiss in the railway station.

face of this man who stood before her. He did not advance to her. He regarded her with a sad tenderness, as if he were looking at one far away. When the beloved dead come back to us in the wonder-halls of sleep, there is no wild joy of meeting: there is something strange. And when they disappear again, there is no surprise; only the dull aching returns to the heart.

"Gertrude," said he, "you are as safe here as ever you were in your mother's arms. No one will harm you."

"What is it? What do you mean?" said she quickly.

She was somewhat bewildered. She had not expected to meet him thus suddenly face to face. And then she became aware that the companion-way by which she had descended into the saloon had grown dark: that was the meaning of the harsh noise.

"I want to go ashore, Keith," said she hurriedly. "Put me on shore. I will speak to you there."

"You cannot go ashore," said he calmly.

"I don't know what you mean," said she; and her heart began to beat hurriedly. "I tell you I want to go ashore, Keith. I will speak to you there."

"You cannot go ashore, Gertrude," he repeated. "We have already left Erith. . . . Gerty, Gerty," he continued, for she was struck dumb with a sudden terror, "don't you understand now? I have stolen you away from yourself. There was but the one thing left: the one way of saving you. And you will forgive me, Gerty, when you understand it all ——"

She was gradually recovering from her terror. She did understand it now. And he was not ill at all?

"Oh, you coward! — you coward! — you coward!" she exclaimed, with a blaze of fury in her eyes. "And I was to confer a kindness on you — a last kindness! But you dare not do this thing! — I tell you, you dare not do it! I demand to be put on shore at once! Do you hear me?"

She turned wildly round, as if to seek for some way of escape. The door in the ladies' cabin stood open; the daylight was streaming down into that cheerful little place; there were some flowers on the dressing-table. But the way by which she had descended was barred over and dark.

She faced him again, and her eyes were full of fierce indignation and anger; she drew herself up to her full height; she overwhelmed him with taunts and reproaches and scorn. That was a splendid piece of acting, seeing that it had never been rehearsed. He stood unmoved before all this theatrical rage.

"Oh, yes, you were proud of your name," she was saying, with bitter emphasis; "and I thought you belonged to a race of gentlemen, to whom lying was unknown. And you were no longer murderous and revengeful; but you can take your revenge on a woman, for all that! And you ask me to come and see you, because you are ill! And you have laid a trap, like a coward!"

"And if I am what you say, Gerty," said he, quite gently, "it is the love of you that has made me that. Oh, you do not know!"

She saw nothing of the lines that pain had written on this man's face; she recognized nothing of the very majesty of grief in the hopeless eyes. He was only her jailer, her enemy.

"Of course — of course," said she. "It is the woman — it is always the woman who is at fault! That is a manly thing, to put the blame on the woman! And it is a manly thing to take your revenge on a woman! I thought when a man had a rival, that it was his rival whom he sought out. But you — you kept out of the way ——"

He strode forward, and caught her by the wrist. There was a look in his face that for a second terrified her into silence.

"Gerty," said he, "I warn you! Do not mention that man to me — now or at any time; or it will be bad for him and for you!"

She twisted her hand from his grasp.

"How dare you come near me!" she cried.

"I beg your pardon," said he, with an instant return to his former grave gentleness of manner. "I wish to let you know how you are situated, if you will let me, Gerty. I don't wish to justify what I have done, for you would not hear me — just yet. But this I must tell you, that I don't wish to force myself on your society. You will do as you please. There is your cabin; you have occupied it before. If you would like to have this saloon, you can have that too: I mean I shall not come into it unless it pleases you. And there is a bell in your cabin; and if you ring it, Christina will answer."

She heard him out patiently; her reply was a scornful — perhaps nervous — laugh.

"Why, this is mere folly!" she exclaimed. "It is simple madness. I begin to believe that you are really ill, after all; and it is your mind that is affected. Surely you don't know what you are doing?"

"You are angry, Gerty," said he.

But the first blaze of her wrath and indignation had passed away; and now fear was coming uppermost.

"Surely, Keith, you cannot be dreaming of such a mad thing! Oh, it is impossible! It is a joke: it was to frighten me: it was to punish me, perhaps. Well, I have deserved it; but now — now you have succeeded; and you will let me go ashore, further down the river."

Her tone had altered. She had been watching his face.

"Oh no, Gerty, oh no," he said. "Do you not understand yet? You were everything in the world to me — you were life itself. Without you I had nothing, and the world might just as well come to an end for me. And when I thought you were going away from me, what could I do? I could not reach you by letters, and letters; and how could I know what the people around you were saying to you? Ah, you do not know what I have suffered, Gerty; and always I was saying to myself that if I could get you away from these people, you would remember the time that you gave me the red rose, and all those beautiful days would come back again, and I would take your hand again, and I would forget altogether about the terrible nights when I saw you beside me and heard you laugh just as in the old times. And I knew there was only the one way left. How could I but try that? I knew you would be angry, but I hoped your anger would go away. And now you are angry, Gerty, and my speaking to you is not of much use — as yet; but I can wait until I see you yourself again, as you used to be, in the garden — don't you remember, Gerty?"

Her face was proud, cold, implacable.

"Do I understand you aright — that you have shut me up in this yacht and mean to take me away?"

"Gerty, I have saved you from yourself!"

"Will you be so kind as to tell me where we are going?"

"Why not away back to the Highlands, Gerty?" said he eagerly. "And then some day when your heart relents, and you forgive me, you will put your hand in mine, and we will walk up the road to Castle Dare. Do you not think they will be glad to see us that day, Gerty?"

She maintained her proud attitude, but she was trembling from head to foot.

"Do you mean to say that until I consent to be your wife I am not to be allowed to leave this yacht?"

"You will consent, Gerty!"

"Not if I were to be shut up here for a thousand years!" she exclaimed, with another burst of passion. Oh, you will pay for this dearly! I thought it was madness — mere folly; but if it is true, you will rue this day! Do you think we are savages here? — do you think we have no law?"

"I do not care for any law," said he simply. "I can only think of the one thing in the world. If I have not your love, Gerty, what else can I care about?"

"My love!" she exclaimed. "And this is the way to earn it, truly! My love! If you were to keep me shut up for a thousand years, you would never have it! You can have my hatred, if you like, and plenty of it, too!"

"You are angry, Gerty!" was all he said.

"Oh, you do not know with whom you have to deal!" she continued, with the same bitter emphasis. "You terrified me with stories of butchery — the butchery of innocent women and children; and no doubt you thought the stories were fine; and now you too would show you are one of the race by taking revenge on a woman. But if she is only a woman, you have not conquered her yet! Oh, you will find out before long that we have law in this country, and that it is not to be outraged with impunity. You think you can do as you like; because you are a Highland master, and you have a lot of slaves round you!"

"I am going on deck now, Gerty," said he, in the same sad and gentle way. "You are tiring yourself. Shall I send Christina to you?"

For an instant she looked bewildered, as if she had not till now comprehended what was going on; and she said, quite wildly, —

"Oh, no, no, no, Keith; you don't mean what you say! You cannot mean it! You are only frightening me! You will put me ashore, and not a word shall pass my lips. We cannot be far down the river, Keith. There are many places where you could put me ashore; and I could get back to London by rail. They won't know I have ever seen you. Keith, you will put me ashore now!"

"And if I were to put you ashore now, you would go away, Gerty, and I should never see you again — never, and never. And what would that be for you and for me, Gerty? But now you are here, no one can poison your mind; you will be angry for a time; but the brighter days are coming — oh yes, I know that: if I was not sure of that, what would become of me? It is a good thing to have hope; to look forward to the glad days: that stills the pain at the heart. And now we two are together at last, Gerty! — and if you are angry, the anger will pass away; and we will go forward together to the glad days."

She was listening in a sort of vague and stunned amazement. Both her anger and her fear were slowly yielding to the bewilderment of the fact that she was really setting out on a voyage, the end of which neither she nor any one living could know.

"Ah, Gerty," said he, regarding her with a strange wistfulness in the sad eyes, "you do not know what it is to me to see you again. I have seen you many a time — in dreams; but you were always far away; and I could not take your hand. And I said to myself that you were not cruel; that you did not wish any one to suffer pain; and I knew if I could only see you again, and take you away from these people, then your heart would be gentle, and you would think of the time when you gave me the red rose, and we went out in the garden, and all the air round us was so full of gladness that we did not speak at all. Oh yes; and I said to myself that your true friends were in the north; and what would the men at Dubh Artach not do for you, and Captain Macallum too, when they knew you were coming to live at Dare; and I was thinking that would be a grand day when you came to live among us; and there would be dancing, and a good glass of whiskey for every one, and some playing on the pipes that day! And sometimes I did not know whether there would be more of laughing or of crying when Janet came to meet you. But I will not trouble you any more now, Gerty; for you are tired, I think; and I will send Christina to you. And you will soon think that I was not cruel to you when I took you away and saved you from yourself."

She did not answer; she seemed in a sort of trance. But she was aroused by the entrance of Christina, who came in directly after Macleod left. Miss White stared at this tall, thin-featured, white-haired woman, as if uncertain how to address her; when she spoke it was in a friendly and persuasive way.

"You have not forgotten me, then, Christina?"

"No, mem," said the grave Highland woman. She had beautiful, clear, blue-gray eyes, but there was no pity in them.

"I suppose you have no part in this mad freak?"

The old woman seemed puzzled. She said, with a sort of serious politeness, —

"I do not know, mem. I have not the good English as Hamish."

"But surely you know this," said Miss Gertrude White, with more animation, "that I am here against my will? You understand that, surely? That I am being carried away against my will from my own home and my friends? You know it very well; but perhaps your master has not told you of the risk you run? Do you know what that is? Do you think there are no laws in this country?"

"Sir Keith he is the master of the boat," said Christina. "Iss there anything now that I can do for you, mem?"

"Yes," said Miss White boldly. "There is. You can help me to get ashore. And you will save your master from being looked on as a madman. And you will save yourselves from being hanged."

"I wass to ask you," said the old Highland woman, "when you would be for having the dinner. And Hamish, he wass saying that you will hef the dinner what time you are thinking of; and will you hef the dinner all by yourself?"

"I tell you this, woman," said Miss White, with quick anger, "that I will neither eat nor drink so long as I am on board this yacht! What is the use of this nonsense? I wish to be put on shore. I am getting tired of this folly. I tell you I want to go ashore; and I am going ashore; and it will be the worse for any one who tries to stop me!"

"I do not think you can go ashore, mem," Christina said, somewhat deliberately picking out her English phrases, "for the gig is up at the davits now; and the dingey — you wass not thinking of going ashore by yourself in the dingey? And last night, mem, at a town, we had many things brought on board; and if you would tell me what you will hef for the dinner, there is no one more willing than me. And I hope you will hef very good comfort on board the yacht."

"I can't get it into your head that you are talking nonsense!" said Miss White angrily. "I tell you I will not go anywhere in this yacht! And what is the use of talking to me about dinner? I tell you I will neither eat nor drink while I am on board this yacht."

"I think that would be a ferry foolish thing, mem," Christina said, humbly enough; but all the same the scornful fashion in which this young lady had addressed her had stirred a little of the Highland woman's blood; and she added — still with great apparent humility — "But if you will not eat, they say that iss a ferry good thing for the pride; and there iss not much pride left if one hass nothing to eat, mem."

"I presume that is to be my prison?" said Miss White haughtily, turning to the smart little stateroom beyond the companion.

"That iss your cabin, mem, if you please, mem," said Christina, who had been instructed in English politeness by her husband.

"Well, now, can you understand this? Go to Sir Keith Macleod, and tell him that I have shut myself up in that cabin; and that I will speak not a word to any one; and I will neither eat nor drink, until I am taken on shore. And so, if he wishes to have a murder on his hands, very well! Do you understand that?"

"I will say that to Sir Keith," Christina answered submissively.

Miss White walked into the cabin, and locked herself in. It was an apartment with which she was familiar; but where had they got the white heather? And there were books; but she paid little heed. They would discover they had not broken her spirit yet.

On either side the skylight overhead was open an inch; and it was nearer to the tiller than the skylight of the saloon. In the absolute stillness of this summer day she heard two men talking. Generally, they spoke in the Gaelic, which was of course unintelligible to her; but sometimes they wandered into English — especially if the name of some English town cropped up — and thus she got hints as to the whereabouts of the "Umpire."

"Oh yes, it is a fine big town that town of Gravesend, to be sure, Hamish," said the one voice, "and I have no doubt, now, that it will be sending a gentleman to the Houses of Parliament in London, just as Greenock will do. But there is no one you will send from Mull. They do not know much about Mull in the Houses of Parliament!"

"And they know plenty about ferry much worse places," said Hamish proudly. "And wass you saying there will be anything so beautiful about Greenock ass you will find at Tobbermorry?"

"Tobermory!" said the other. "There are some trees at Tobermory — oh yes; and the Mish-nish, and the shops ——"

"Yess, and the water-fahl — do not forget the water-fahl, Colin; and there iss better whiskey in Tobbermorry ass you will get in all Greenock, where they will be for mixing it with prandy and other drinks like that; and at Tobbermorry you will hef a professor come ahl the way from Edinburgh and from Oban to gif a lecture on the Gaelic; but do you think he would gif a lecture in a town like Greenock? Oh no; he would not do that!"

"Very well, Hamish; but it is glad I am that we are going back the way we came."

"And me too, Colin."

"And I will not be sorry when I am in Greenock once more."

"But you will come with us first of all to Castle Dare, Colin," was the reply. "And I know that Lady Macleod herself will be for shaking hands with you, and thanking you that you wass tek the care of the yacht."

"I think I will stop at Greenock, Hamish. You know you can take her well on from Greenock. And will you go round the Mull, Hamish, or through the Crinan, do you think now?"

"Oh, I am not afrait to tek her round the Moil; but there iss the English lady on board; and it will be smoother for her to go through the Crinan. And it iss ferry glad I will be, Colin, to see Ardalanish Point again; for I would rather be going through the Doruis Mohr twenty times ass getting petween the panks of this tamned river."

Here they relapsed into their native tongue, and she listened no longer; but at all events she had learned that they were going away to the north. And as her nerves had been somewhat shaken, she began to ask herself what further thing this madman might not do. The old stories he had told her came back with a marvellous distinctness. Would he plunge her into a dungeon, and mock her with an empty cup when she was dying of thirst? Would he chain her to a rock at low water and watch the tide slowly rise? He professed great gentleness and love for her; but if the savage nature had broken out at last? Her fear grew apace. He had shown himself regardless of everything on earth: where would he stop, if she continued to repel him? And then the thought of her situation — alone; shut up in this small room; about to venture forth on the open sea with this ignorant crew — so overcame her that she hastily snatched at the bell on the dressing-table, and rang it violently. Almost instantly there was a tapping at the door.

"I ask your pardon, mem," she heard Christina say.

She sprang to the door, and opened it, and caught the arm of the old woman.

"Christina, Christina," she said almost wildly, you won't let them take me away! My father will give you hundreds and hundreds of pounds if only you get me ashore. Just think of him — he is an old man — if you had a daughter ——"

Miss White was acting very well indeed; though she was more concerned about herself than her father.

"I wass to say to you," Christina explained, with some difficulty, "that if you wass saying that, Sir Keith had a message sent away to your father, and you wass not to think any more about that. And now, mem, I cannot tek you ashore; it iss no business I hef with that; and I could not go ashore myself whateffer; but I would get you some dinner, mem."

"Then I suppose you don't understand the English language!" Miss White exclaimed angrily. "I tell you I will neither eat nor drink so long as I am on board this yacht! Go and tell Sir Keith Macleod what I have said."

So Miss White was left alone again; and the slow time passed; and she heard the murmured conversation of the men, and also a measured pacing to and fro, which she took to be the step of Macleod. Quick rushes of feeling went through her — indignation; a stubborn obstinacy; a wonder over the audacity of this thing; malevolent hatred even; but all these were being gradually subdued by the dominant claim of hunger. Miss White had acted the part of many heroines; but she was not herself a heroine — if there is anything heroic in starvation. It was growing to dusk when she again summoned the old Highland woman.

"Get me something to eat," said she; "I cannot die like a rat in a hole."

"Yes, mem," said Christina, in the most matter-of-fact way; for she had never been in a theatre in her life, and she had not imagined that Miss White's threat meant anything at all. "The dinner is just ready now, mem; and if you will hef it in the saloon, there will be no one there; that wass Sir Keith's message to you."

"I will not have it in the saloon; I will have it here."

"Ferry well, mem," Christina said submissively. "But you will go into the saloon, mem, when I will mek the bed for you, and the lamp will hef to be lit, but Hamish he will light the lamp for you. And are there any other things you wass thinking of that you would like, mem?"

"No; I want something to eat."

"And Hamish, mem, he wass saying I will ask you whether you will hef the claret wine, or — or — the other wine, mem, that meks a noise ——"

"Bring me some water. But the whole of you will pay dearly for this!"

"I ask your pardon, mem?" said Christina, with great respect.

"Oh, go away, and get me something to eat!"

And in fact Miss White made a very good dinner, though the things had to be placed before her on her dressing-table. And her rage and indignation did not prevent her having, after all, a glass or two of the claret wine. And then she permitted Hamish to come in and light the swinging lamp; and thereafter Christina made up one of the two narrow beds. Miss White was left alone.

Many a hundred times had she been placed in great peril — on the stage; and she knew that on such occasions it had been her duty to clasp her hand on her forehead and set to work to find out how to extricate herself. Well, on this occasion she did not make use of any dramatic gesture; but she turned out the lamp, and threw herself on the top of this narrow little bed; and was determined that, before they got her conveyed to their savage home in the north, she would make one more effort for her freedom. Then she heard the man at the helm begin to hum to himself "Fhir a bhata, na horo eile." The night darkened. And soon all the wild emotions of the day were forgotten; for she was asleep.

Asleep — in the very waters through which she had sailed with her lover on the white summer day. But Rose-Leaf! Rose-Leaf! what faint wind will carry you NOW to the south?

CHAPTER XLV.

THE VOYAGE OVER.

AND now the brave old "Umpire" is nearing her northern home once more; and surely this is a right royal evening for the reception of her. What although the sun has just gone down, and the sea around them become a plain of heaving and wrestling blue-black waves? Far away, in that purple-black sea, lie long promontories that are of a still pale rose-color; and the western sky is a blaze of golden green; and they know that the wild, beautiful radiance is still touching the wan walls of Castle Dare. And there is Ardalanish Point; and that the ruddy Ross of Mull; and there will be a good tide in the Sound of Iona. Why, then, do they linger, and keep the old "Umpire" with her sails flapping idly in the wind?

As you pass through Jura's Sound,
Bend your course by Scarba's shore;
Shun, O shun, the gulf profound
Where Corrievreckan's surges roar!

They are in no danger of Corrievreckan now; they are in familiar waters; only that is another Colonsay that lies away there in the south. Keith Macleod, seated up at the bow, is calmly regarding it. He is quite alone. There is no sound around him but the lapping of the waves.

And ever as the year returns,
The charm-bound sailors know the day;
For sadly still the Mermaid mourns
The lovely chief of Colonsay.

And is he listening now for the wild sound of her singing? Or is he thinking of the brave Macphail who went back after seven long months of absence, and found the maid of Colonsay still true to him? The ruby ring she had given him had never paled. There was one woman who could remain true to her absent lover.

Hamish came forward.

"Will we go on now, sir?" said he, in the Gaelic.

"No."

Hamish looked round. The shining clear evening looked very calm, notwithstanding the tossing of the blue-black waves. And it seemed wasteful to the old sailor to keep the yacht lying to or aimlessly sailing this way and that while this favorable wind remained to them.

"I am not sure that the breeze will last, Sir Keith."

"Are you sure of anything, Hamish?" Macleod said, quite absently. "Well, there is one thing we can all make sure of. But I have told you, Hamish, I am not going up the Sound of Iona in daylight: why, there is not a man in all the islands who would not know of our coming by to-morrow morning. We will go up the sound as soon as it is dark. It is a new moon to-night; and I think we can go without lights, Hamish."

"The 'Dunara' is coming south to-night, Sir Keith," the old man said.

"Why, Hamish, you seem to have lost all your courage as soon as you put Colin Laing ashore."

"Colin Laing! Is it Colin Laing!" exclaimed Hamish indignantly. "I will know how to sail this yacht, and I will know the banks, and the tides, and the rocks, better than any fifteen thousands of Colin Laings!"

"And what if the 'Dunara' is coming south? If she cannot see us, we can see her."

But whether it was that Colin Laing had before leaving the yacht managed to convey to Hamish some notion of the risk he was running, or whether it was that he was merely anxious for his master's safety, it was clear that Hamish was far from satisfied. He opened and shut his big clasp-knife in an awkward silence. Then he said, —

"You will not go to Castle Dare, Sir Keith?"

Macleod started; he had forgotten that Hamish was there.

"No. I have told you where I am going."

"But there is not any good anchorage at that island, sir!" he protested. "Have I not been round every bay of it; and you too, Sir Keith? and you know there is not an inch of sand or of mud, but only the small loose stones. And then the shepherd they left there all by himself; it was mad he became at last, and took his own life too."

"Well, do you expect to see his ghost?" Macleod said. "Come, Hamish, you have lost your nerve in the south. Surely you are not afraid of being anywhere in the old yacht so long as she has good sea-room around her?"

"And if you are not wishing to go up the Sound of Iona in the daylight, Sir Keith," Hamish said, still clinging to the point, "we could bear a little to the south, and go round the outside of Iona."

"The Dubb Artach men would recognize the 'Umpire' at once," Macleod said abruptly; and then he suggested to Hamish that he should get a little more way on the yacht, so that she might be a trifle steadier when Christina carried the dinner into the English lady's cabin. But indeed there was now little breeze of any kind. Hamish's fears of a dead calm were likely to prove true.

Meanwhile another conversation had been going forward in the small cabin below, that was now suffused by a strange warm light reflected from the evening sky. Miss White was looking very well now, after her long sea-voyage. During their first few hours in blue water she had been very ill indeed; and she repeatedly called on Christina to allow her to die. The old Highland woman came to the conclusion that English ladies were rather childish in their ways; but the only answer she made to this reiterated prayer was to make Miss White as comfortable as was possible, and to administer such restoratives as she thought desirable. At length, when recovery and a sound appetite set in, the patient began to show a great friendship for Christina. There was no longer any theatrical warning of the awful fate in store for every body connected with this enterprise. She tried rather to enlist the old woman's sympathies on her behalf, and if she did not very well succeed in that direction, at least she remained on friendly terms with Christina, and received from her the solace of much gossip about the whereabouts and possible destination of the ship.

And on this evening Christina had an important piece of news.

"Where have we got to now, Christina?" said Miss White, quite cheerfully, when the old woman entered.

"Oh yes, mem, we will still be off the Mull shore, but a good piece away from it, and there is not much wind, mem. But Hamish thinks we will get to the anchorage the night whatever."

"The anchorage!" Miss White exclaimed eagerly. "Where? You are going to Castle Dare, surely?"

"No, mem, I think not," said Christina. "I think it is an island — but you will not know the name of that island — there is no English for it at all."

"But where is it? Is it near Castle Dare?"

"Oh no, mem; it is a good way from Castle Dare; and it is out in the sea. Do you know Gometra, mem? — wass you ever going out to Gometra?"

"Yes, of course; I remember something about it, anyway."

"Ah, well, it is away out past Gometra, mem; and not a good place for an anchorage whatever; but Hamish he will know all the anchorages."

"What on earth is the use of going there?"

"I do not know, mem."

"Is Sir Keith going to keep me on board this boat forever?"

"I do not know, mem."

Christina had to leave the cabin just then; when she returned she said, with some little hesitation, —

"If I wass mekking so bold, mem, ass to say this to you: Why are you not asking the questions of Sir Keith himself? He will know all about it; and if you were to come into the saloon, mem ——"

"Do you think I would enter into any communication with him after his treatment of me?" said Miss White indignantly. "No; let him atone for that first. When he has set me at liberty, then I will speak with him; but never so long as he keeps me shut up like a convict."

"I wass only saying, mem," Christina answered, with great respect, "that if you were wishing to know where we were going, Sir Keith will know that; but how can I know it? And you know, mem, Sir Keith has not shut you up in this cabin: you hef the saloon, if you would please to hef it."

"Thank you, I know!" rejoined Miss White. "If I choose, my jail may consist of two rooms instead of one. I don't appreciate that amount of liberty. I want to be set ashore."

"That I hef nothing to do with, mem," Christina said humbly, proceeding with her work.

Miss White, being left to think over these things, was beginning to believe that, after all, her obduracy was not likely to be of much service to her. Would it not be wiser to treat with the enemy — perhaps to outwit him by a show of forgiveness? Here they were approaching the end of the voyage — at least Christina seemed to intimate as much; and if they were not exactly within call of friends, they would surely be within rowing distance of some inhabited island, even Gometra, for example. And if only a message could be sent to Castle Dare? Lady Macleod and Janet Macleod were women. They would not countenance this monstrous thing. If she could only reach them, she would be safe.

The rose-pink died away from the long promontories, and was succeeded by a sombre gray; the glory in the west sank down; a wan twilight came over the sea and the sky; and a small golden star, like the point of a needle, told where the Dubh Artach men had lit their beacon for the coming night. The "Umpire" lay and idly rolled in this dead calm; Macleod paced up and down the deck in the solemn stillness. Hamish threw a tarpaulin over the skylight of the saloon to cover the bewildering light from below; and then, as the time went slowly by, darkness came over the land and the sea. They were alone with the night, and the lapping waves, and the stars.

About ten o'clock there was a loud rattling of blocks and cordage — the first puff of a coming breeze had struck her. The men were at their posts in a moment; there were a few sharp, quick orders from Hamish; and presently the old "Umpire," with her great boom away over her quarter, was running free before a light south easterly wind.

"Ay, ay!" said Hamish, in sudden gladness, "we will soon be by Ardalanish Point with a fine wind like this, Sir Keith; and if you would rather hef no lights on her — well, it is a clear night whateffer; and the 'Dunara' she will hef up her lights."

The wind came in bits of squalls, it is true, but the sky overhead remained clear, and the "Umpire" bowled merrily along. Macleod was still on deck. They rounded the Ross of Mull, and got into the smoother waters of the Sound. Would any of the people in the cottages at Erraidh see this grey ghost of a vessel go gliding past over the dark water? Behind them burned the yellow eye of Dubh Artach; before them a few small red points told them of the Iona cottages; and still this phantom gray vessel held on her way. The "Umpire" was nearing her last anchorage.

And still she steals onward, like a thief in the night. She has passed through the Sound; she is in the open sea again; there is a calling of startled birds from over the dark bosom of the deep. Then far away they watch the lights of a steamer: but she is miles from their course; they cannot even hear the throb of her engines.

It is another sound they hear — a low booming as of distant thunder. And that black thing away on their right — scarcely visible over the darkened waves — is that the channelled and seabird-haunted Staffa, trembling through all her caves under the shock of the smooth Atlantic surge? For all the clearness of the star-lit sky, there is a wild booming of waters all around her rocks; and the giant caverns answer; and the thunder shudders out to the listening sea.

The night drags on. The Dutchman is fast asleep in his vast Atlantic bed; the dull roar of the waves he has heard for millions of years is not likely to awake him. And Fladda, and Lunga: surely this ghost-gray ship that steals by is not the old "Umpire" that used to visit them in the gay summer-time, with her red ensign flying, and the blue seas all around her? But here is a dark object on the waters that is growing larger and larger as one approaches it. The black outline of it is becoming sharp against the clear dome of stars. There is a gloom around as one gets nearer and nearer the bays and cliffs of this lonely island; and now one hears the sound of breakers on the rocks. Hamish and his men are on the alert. The top-sail has been lowered. The heavy cable of the anchor lies ready by the windlass. And then, as the "Umpire" glides into smooth water, and her head is brought round to the light breeze, away goes the anchor with a rattle that awakes a thousand echoes; and all the startled birds among the rocks are calling through the night — the sea-pyots screaming shrilly, the curlews uttering their warning note, the herons croaking as they wing their slow flight away across the sea. The "Umpire" has got to her anchorage at last.

And scarcely was the anchor down when they brought him a message from the English lady. She was in the saloon, and wished to see him. He could scarcely believe this, for it was now past midnight, and she had never come into the saloon before. But he went down through the forecastle, and through his own stateroom, and opened the door of the saloon.

For a second the strong light almost blinded him; but at all events he knew she was sitting there, and that she was regarding him with no fierce indignation at all, but with quite a friendly look.

"Gertrude!" said he, in wonder; but he did not approach her. He stood before her, as one who was submissive.

"So we have got to land at last," said she; and more and more he wondered to hear the friendliness of her voice. Could it be true, then? Or was it only one of those visions that had of late been torturing his brain?

"Oh yes, Gerty!" said he; "we have got to an anchorage."

"I thought I would sit up for it," said she. "Christina said we should get to land some time to-night, and I thought I would like to see you. Because you know, Keith, you have used me very badly. And won't you sit down?"

He accepted that invitation. Could it be true? could it be true? This was ringing in his ears. He heard her only in a bewildered way.

"And I want you to tell me what you mean to do with me," said she, frankly and graciously: "I am at your mercy, Keith."

"Oh, not that — not that," said he. And he added, sadly enough, "It is I who have been at your mercy since ever I saw you, Gerty; and it is for you to say what is to become of you and of me. And have you got over your anger now? — and will you think of all that made me do this, and try to forgive it for the sake of my love for you, Gerty? Is there any chance of that now?"

She rather avoided the earnest gaze that was bent on her. She did not notice how nervously his hand gripped the edge of the table near him.

"Well, it is a good deal to forgive, Keith; you will acknowledge that yourself; and though you used to think that I was ready to sacrifice everything for fame, I did not expect you would make me a nine days' wonder in this way. I suppose the whole thing is in the papers now?"

"Oh no, Gerty; I sent a message to your father."

"Well, that was kind of you — and audacious. Were you not afraid of his overtaking you? The 'Umpire' is not the swiftest of sailors, you used to say; and you know there are telegraphs and railways to all the ports."

"He did not know you were in the 'Umpire,' Gerty. But of course, if he were very anxious about you, he would write or come to Dare. I should not be surprised if he were there now."

A quick look of surprise and gladness sprang to her face.

"Papa — at Castle Dare!" she exclaimed. "And Christina says it is not far from here."

"Not many miles away."

"Then of course they will know we are here in the morning!" she cried, in the indiscretion of sudden joy. "And they will come out for me."

"Oh no, Gerty, they will not come out for you. No human being but those on board knows that we are here. Do you think they could see you from Dare? And there is no one living now on the island. We are alone in the sea."

The light died away from her face; but she said, cheerfully enough, —

"Well, I am at your mercy then, Keith. Let us take it that way. Now you must tell me what part in the comedy you mean me to play; for the life of me I can't make it out."

"Oh, Gerty, Gerty, do not speak like that!" he exclaimed. "You are breaking my heart! Is there none of the old love left? Is it all a matter for jesting?"

She saw she had been incautious.

"Well," said she gently, "I was wrong; I know it is more serious than that; and I am not indisposed to forgive you, if you treat me fairly. I know you have great earnestness of nature; and — and you were very fond of me; and although you have risked a great deal in what you have done, still, men who are very deeply in love don't think much about consequences. And if I were to forgive you, and make friends again, what then?"

"And if we were as we used to be," said he, with a grave wistfulness in his face, "do you not think I would gladly take you ashore, Gerty?"

"And to Castle Dare?"

"Oh yes, to Castle Dare! Would not my mother and Janet be glad to welcome you!"

"And papa may be there?"

"If he is not there, can we not telegraph for him? Why, Gerty, surely you would not be married anywhere but in the Highlands?"

At the mention of marriage she blanched somewhat; but she had nerved herself to play this part.

"Then, Keith," said she gallantly, "I will make you a promise. Take me to Castle Dare to-morrow, and the moment I am within its doors I will shake hands with you, and forgive you, and we will be friends again as in the old days."

"We were more than friends, Gerty," said he, in a low voice.

"Let us be friends first, and then who knows what may not follow?" said she brightly. "You cannot expect me to be over-profuse in affection just after being shut up like this?"

"Gerty," said he, and he looked at her with those strangely tired eyes, and there was a great gentleness in his voice, "do you know where you are? You are close to the island that I told you of — where I wish to have my grave on the cliff. But instead of a grave, would it not be a fine thing to have a marriage here? No; do not be alarmed, Gerty! it is only with your own good-will; and surely your heart will consent at last! Would not that be a strange wedding, too; with the minister from Salen, and your father on board, and the people from Dare? Oh, you would see such a number of boats come out that day, and we would go proudly back; and do you not think there would be a great rejoicing that day? Then all our troubles would be at an end, Gerty! There would be no more fear; and the theatres would never see you again; and the long, happy life we should lead, we two together! And do you know the first thing I would get you, Gerty? — it would be a new yacht! I would go to the Clyde, and have it built all for you. I would not have you go out again in this yacht, for you would then remember the days in which I was cruel to you; but in a new yacht you would not remember that any more; and do you not think we would have many a pleasant, long summer day on the deck of her, and only ourselves, Gerty? And you would sing the songs I first heard you sing, and I think the sailors would imagine they heard the singing of the mermaid of Colonsay; for there is no one can sing as you can sing, Gerty. I think it was that first took away my heart from me."

"But we can talk about all these things when I am on shore again," said she coldly. "You cannot expect me to be very favorably disposed so long as I am shut up here."

"But then," he said, "if you were on shore you might go away again from me, Gerty! The people would get at your ear again; they would whisper things to you; you would think about the theatres again. I have saved you, sweetheart; can I let you go back?"

The words were spoken with an eager affection and yearning; but they sank into her mind with a dull and cold conviction that there was no escape for her through any way of artifice.

"Am I to understand, then," said she, "that you mean to keep me a prisoner here until I marry you?"

"Why do you speak like that, Gerty?"

"I demand an answer to my question."

"I have risked everything to save you; can I let you go back?"

A sudden flash of desperate anger — even of hatred — was in her eyes: her fine piece of acting had been of no avail.

"Well, let the farce end!" said she, with frowning eyebrows. "Before I came on board this yacht I had some pity for you. I thought you were at least a man, and had a man's generosity. Now I find you a coward, and a tyrant ——"

"Gerty!"

"Oh, do not think you have frightened me with your stories of the revenge of your miserable chiefs and their savage slaves! Not a bit of it! Do with me what you like: I would not marry you if you gave me a hundred yachts!"

"Gerty!"

The anguish of his face was growing wild with despair.

"I say, let the farce end! I had pity for you — yes, I had! Now — I hate you!"

He sprang up with a quick cry, as of one shot through the heart. He regarded her, in a bewildered manner, for one brief second; and then he gently said, "Good-night, Gerty! God forgive you!" and he staggered backward, and got out of the saloon, leaving her alone.

See! the night is still fine. All around this solitary bay there is a wall of rock, jet-black, against the clear, dark sky, with its myriad twinkling stars. The new moon has arisen, but it sheds but little radiance yet down there in the south. There is a sharper gleam from one lambent planet — a thin line of golden-yellow light that comes all the way across from the black rocks until it breaks in flashes among the ripples close to the side of the yacht. Silence once more reigns around; only from time to time one hears the croak of a heron from the dusky shore.

What can keep this man up so late on deck? There is nothing to look at but the great bows of the yacht back against the pale gray sea, and the tall spars and the rigging going away up into the star-lit sky, and the suffused glow from the sky-light touching a yellow-gray on the main-boom. There is no need for the anchor-watch that Hamish was insisting on. The equinoctials are not likely to begin on such a night as this.

He is looking across the lapping gray waters to the jet-black line of cliff. And there are certain words haunting him. He cannot forget them; he cannot put them away.

WHEREFORE IS LIGHT GIVEN TO HIM THAT IS IN MISERY, AND LIFE UNTO THE BITTER IN SOUL? . . . WHICH LONG FOR DEATH, BUT IT COMETH NOT; AND DIG FOR IT MORE THAN FOR HIDDEN TREASURES. . . . WHICH REJOICE EXCEEDINGLY, AND ARE GLAD WHEN THEY CAN FIND THE GRAVE.

. . . . . .

Then in the stillness of the night he heard a breathing. He went forward, and found that Hamish had secreted himself behind the windlass. He uttered some exclamation in the Gaelic, and the old man rose and stood guiltily before him.

"Have I not told you to go below before? and will I have to throw you down into the forecastle?"

The old man stood irresolute for a moment. Then he said, also in his native tongue, —

"You should not speak like that to me, Sir Keith: I have known you many a year."

Macleod caught Hamish's hand.

"I beg your pardon, Hamish. You do not know. It is a sore heart I have this night."

"Oh, God help us! Do I not know that!" he exclaimed, in a broken voice; and Macleod, as he turned away, could hear the old man crying bitterly in the dark. What else could Hamish do now — for him who had been to him as the son of his old age?

"Go below now, Hamish," said Macleod, in a gentle voice; and the old man slowly and reluctantly obeyed.

But the night had not drawn to day when Macleod again went forward, and said, in a strange, excited whisper, —

"Hamish, Hamish, are you awake now?"

Instantly the old man appeared: he had not turned into his berth at all.

"Hamish, Hamish, do you hear the sound?" Macleod said, in the same wild way; "do you not hear the sound?"

"What sound, Sir Keith?" said he; for indeed there was nothing but the lapping of the water along the side of the yacht and a murmur of ripples along the shore.

"Do you not hear it, Hamish? It is a sound as of a brass band! — a brass-band playing music — as if it was in a theatre. Can you not hear it, Hamish?"

"Oh, God help us! God help us!" Hamish cried.

"You do not hear it, Hamish?" he said. "Ah, it is some mistake. I beg your pardon for calling you, Hamish: now you will go below again."

"Oh no, Sir Keith," said Hamish. "Will I not stay on deck now till the morning? It is a fine sleep I have had; oh yes, I had a fine sleep. And how is one to know when the equinoctials may not come on?"

"I wish you to go below, Hamish."

And now this sound that is ringing in his ears is no longer of the brass-band that he had heard in the theatre. It is quite different. It has all the ghastly mirth of that song that Norman Ogilvie used to sing in the old, half-forgotten days. What is it that he hears?

King Death was a rare old fellow,
He sat where no sun could shine;
And he lifted his hand so yellow,
And poured out his coal-black wine!
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah! for the coal-black wine!

It is a strange mirth. It might almost make a man laugh. For do we not laugh gently when we bury a young child, and put the flowers over it, and know that it is at peace? The child has no more pain at the heart. Oh, Norman Ogilvie, are you still singing the wild song? and are you laughing now? or is it the old man Hamish that is crying in the dark?

There came to him many a maiden
Whose eyes had forgot to shine;
And widows with grief o'erladen,
For a draught of his sleepy wine.
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah! for the coal-black wine!

It is such a fine thing to sleep — when one has been fretting all the night, and spasms of fire go through the brain! Ogilvie, Ogilvie, do you remember the laughing duchess? do you think she would laugh over one's grave, or put her foot on it, and stand relentless, with anger in her eyes? That is a sad thing; but after it is over there is sleep.

All came to the rare old fellow,
Who laughed till his eyes dropped brine,
As he gave them his hand so yellow,
And pledged them in Death's black wine!
Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah! for the coal-black wine!

Hamish! — Hamish! — will you not keep her away from me? I have told Donald what pibroch he will play; I want to be at peace now. But the brass-band — the brass-band — I can hear the blare of the trumpets; and Ulva will know that we are here, and the Gometra men, and the sea-birds too, that I used to love. But she has killed all that now, and she stands on my grave. She will laugh, for she was light-hearted, like a young child. But you, Hamish, you will find the quiet grave for me; and Donald will play the pibroch for me that I told him of; and you will say no word to her of all that is over and gone.

See — he sleeps. This haggard-faced man is stretched on the deck; and the pale dawn, arising in the east, looks at him, and does not revive him, but makes him whiter still. You might almost think he was dead. But Hamish knows better than that; for the old man comes stealthily forward; and he has a great tartan plaid in his hands, and very gently indeed he puts it over his young master. And there are tears running down Hamish's face, and he says, "The brave lad! the brave lad!"

CHAPTER XLVI.

THE END.

"DUNCAN," said Hamish, in a low whisper — for Macleod had gone below, and they thought he might be asleep in the small, hushed stateroom — "this is a strange-looking day, is it not? And I am afraid of it in this open bay, with an anchorage no better than a sheet of paper for an anchorage. Do you see now how strange-looking it is?"

Duncan Cameron also spoke in his native tongue, and he said, —

"That is true, Hamish. And it was a day like this there was when the 'Solan' was sunk at her moorings in Loch Hourn. Do you remember, Hamish? And it would be better for us now if we were in Loch Tua, or Loch-na-Keal, or in the dock that was built for the steamer at Tiree. I do not like the look of this day."

Yet to an ordinary observer it would have seemed that the chief characteristic of this pale, still day was extreme and settled calm. There was not a breath of wind to ruffle the surface of the sea; but there was a slight, glassy swell, and that only served to show curious opalescent tints under the suffused light of the sun. There were no clouds; there was only a thin veil of faint and sultry mist all across the sky; the sun was invisible, but there was a glare of yellow at one point of the heavens. A dead calm; but heavy, oppressed, sultry. There was something in the atmosphere that seemed to weigh on the chest.

"There was a dream I had this morning," continued Hamish, in the same low tones. "It was about my little granddaughter Christina. You know my little Christina, Duncan. And she said to me, 'What have you done with Sir Keith Macleod? Why have you not brought him back? He was under your care, grandfather.' I did not like that dream."

"Oh, you are becoming as bad as Sir Keith Macleod himself!" said the other. "He does not sleep. He talks to himself. You will become like that if you pay attention to foolish dreams, Hamish."

Hamish's quick temper leaped up.

"What do you mean, Duncan Cameron, by saying 'as bad as Sir Keith Macleod'? You — you come from Ross: perhaps they have not good masters there. I tell you there is not any man in Ross, or in Sutherland either, is as good a master, and as brave a lad, as Sir Keith Macleod — not any one, Duncan Cameron!"

"I did not mean anything like that, Hamish," said the other humbly. "But there was a breeze this morning. We could have got over to Loch Tua. Why did we stay here, where there is no shelter and no anchorage? Do you know what is likely to come after a day like this?"

"It is your business to be a sailor on board this yacht; it is not your business to say where she will go," said Hamish.

But all the same the old man was becoming more and more alarmed at the ugly aspect of this dead calm. The very birds, instead of stalking among the still pools, or lying buoyant on the smooth waters, were excitedly calling, and whirring from one point to another.

"If the equinoctials were to begin now," said Duncan Cameron, "this is a fine place to meet the equinoctials! An open bay, without shelter, and a ground that is no ground for an anchorage. It is not two anchors or twenty anchors would hold in such a ground."

Macleod appeared: the men were suddenly silent. Without a word to either of them — and that was not his wont — he passed to the stern of the yacht. Hamish knew from his manner that he would not be spoken to. He did not follow him, even with all this vague dread on his mind.

The day wore on to the afternoon. Macleod, who had been pacing up and down the deck, suddenly called Hamish. Hamish came aft at once.

"Hamish," said he, with a strange sort of laugh, "do you remember this morning, before the light came? Do you remember that I asked you about a brass-band that I heard playing?"

Hamish looked at him and said, with an earnest anxiety, —

"Oh, Sir Keith, you will pay no heed to that! It is very common; I have heard them say it is very common. Why, to hear a brass-band, to be sure! There is nothing more common than that. And you will not think you are unwell merely because you think you can hear a brass-band playing!"

"I want you to tell me, Hamish," said he, in the same jesting way, "whether my eyes have followed the example of my ears, and are playing tricks. Do you think they are blood-shot, with my lying on deck in the cold? Hamish, what do you see all around?"

The old man looked at the sky, and the shore, and the sea. It was a marvellous thing. The world was all enshrouded in a salmon-colored mist: there was no line of horizon visible between the sea and the sky.

"It is red, Sir Keith," said Hamish.

"Ah! Am I in my senses this time? And what do you think of a red day, Hamish? That is not a usual thing."

"Oh, Sir Keith, it will be a wild night this night! And we cannot stay here, with this bad anchorage."

"And where would you go, Hamish — in a dead calm?" Macleod asked, still with a smile on the wan face.

"Where would I go?" said the old man excitedly. "I — I will take care of the yacht. But you, Sir Keith — oh! you — you will go ashore now. Do you know, sir, the sheiling that the shepherd had? It is a poor place — oh yes; but Duncan Cameron and I will take some things ashore. And do you not think we can look after the yacht? She has met the equinoctials before, if it is the equinoctials that are beginning. She has met them before; and cannot she meet them now? But you, Sir Keith, you will go ashore."

Macleod burst out laughing in an odd sort of fashion.

"Do you think I am good at running away when there is any kind of danger, Hamish? Have you got into the English way? Would you call me a coward too? Nonsense, nonsense, nonsense, Hamish! I — why, I am going to drink a glass of the coal-black wine, and have done with it. I will drink it to the health of my sweetheart, Hamish!"

"Sir Keith," said the old man, beginning to tremble, though he but half understood the meaning of the scornful mirth, "I have had charge of you since you were a young lad."

"Very well."

"And Lady Macleod will ask of me, 'Such and such a thing happened: what did you do for my son?' Then I will say, 'Your ladyship, we were afraid of the equinoctials, and we got Sir Keith to go ashore; and the next day we went ashore for him; and now we have brought him back to Castle Dare!'"

"Hamish, Hamish, you are laughing at me! Or you want to call me a coward? Don't you know I should be afraid of the ghost of the shepherd who killed himself? Don't you know that the English people call me a coward?"

"May their souls dwell in the downmost hall of perdition!" said Hamish, with his cheeks becoming a gray-white; "and every woman that ever came of the accursed race!"

He looked at the old man for a second, and he gripped his hand.

"Do not say that, Hamish — that is folly. But you have been my friend. My mother will not forget you — it is not the way of a Macleod to forget — whatever happens to me."

"Sir Keith!" Hamish cried, "I do not know what you mean. But you will go ashore before the night?"

"Go ashore?" Macleod answered, with a return to his wild, bantering tone, "when I am going to see my sweetheart? Oh no! Tell Christina, now. Tell Christina to ask the young English lady to come into the saloon, for I have something to say to her. Be quick, Hamish!"

Hamish went away, and before long he returned with the answer that the young English lady was in the saloon. And now he was no longer haggard and piteous, but joyful, and there was a strange light in his eyes.

"Sweetheart," said he, "are you waiting for me at last? I have brought you a long way. Shall we drink a glass now at the end of the voyage?"

"Do you wish to insult me?" said she; but there was no anger in her voice: there was more of fear in her eyes as she regarded him.

"You have no other message for me than the one you gave me last night, Gerty?" said he, almost cheerfully. "It is all over, then? You would go away from me forever? But we will drink a glass before we go!"

He sprang forward, and caught both her hands in his with the grip of a vise.

"Do you know what you have done, Gerty?" said he, in a low voice. "Oh, you have soft, smooth, English ways; and you are like a rose-leaf; and you are like a queen, whom all people are glad to serve. But do you know that you have killed a man's life? And there is no penalty for that in the south, perhaps; but you are no longer in the south. And if you have this very night to drink a glass with me, you will not refuse it? It is only a glass of the coal-black wine!"

She struggled back from him, for there was a look in his face that frightened her. But she had a wonderful self-command.

"Is that the message I was to hear?" said she coldly.

"Why, sweetheart, are you not glad? Is not that the only gladness left for you and for me, that we should drink one glass together, and clasp hands, and say good-by? What else is there left? What else could come to you and to me? And it may not be this night, or to-morrow night; but one night I think it will come; and then, sweetheart, we will have one more glass together before the end."

He went on deck. He called Hamish.

"Hamish," said he, in a grave, matter-of-fact way, "I don't like the look of this evening. Did you say the sheiling was still on the island?"

"Oh yes, Sir Keith," said Hamish, with great joy; for he thought his advice was going to be taken after all.

"Well, now, you know the gales, when they begin, sometimes last for two, or or three, or four days; and I will ask you to see that Christina takes a good store of things to the sheiling, before the darkness comes on. Take plenty of things, now, Hamish, and put them in the sheiling, for I am afraid this is going to be a wild night."

Now, indeed, all the red light had gone away; and as the sun went down there was nothing but a spectral whiteness over the sea and the sky. And the atmosphere was so close and sultry that it seemed to suffocate one. Moreover, there was a dead calm; if they had wanted to get away from this exposed place, how could they? They could not get into the gig and pull this great yacht over to Loch Tua.

It was with a light heart that Hamish set about this thing; and Christina forthwith filled a hamper with tinned meats, and bread, and whiskey, and what not. And fuel was taken ashore, too, and candles, and a store of matches. If the gales were coming on, as appeared likely from this ominous-looking evening, who could tell how many days and nights the young master — and the English lady, too, if he desired her company — might not have to stay ashore, while the men took the chance of the sea with this yacht, or perhaps seized the occasion of some lull to make for some place of shelter? There was Loch Tua, and there was the bay at Bunessan, and there was the little channel called Polterriv, behind the rocks opposite Iona. Any shelter at all was better than this exposed place, with the treacherous anchorage.

Hamish and Duncan Cameron returned to the yacht.

"Will you go ashore now, Sir Keith?" the old man said.

"Oh no; I am not going ashore yet. It is not time to run away, Hamish."

He spoke in a friendly and pleasant fashion, though Hamish, in his increasing alarm, thought it no proper time for jesting. They hauled the gig up to the davits, however, and again the yacht lay in dead silence in this little bay.

The evening grew to dusk; the only change visible in the spectral world of pale yellow-white mist was the appearance in the sky of a number of small, detached, bulbous-looking clouds of a dusky blue-gray; They had not drifted hither, for there was no wind. They had only appeared. They were absolutely motionless.

But the heat and the suffocation in this atmosphere became almost insupportable. The men, with bare heads, and jerseys unbuttoned at the neck, were continually going to the cask of fresh water beside the windlass. Nor was there any change when the night came on. If anything, the night was hotter than the evening had been. They awaited in silence what might come of this ominous calm.

Hamish came aft.

"I beg your pardon, Sir Keith," said he, "but I am thinking we will have an anchor-watch to-night."

"You will have no anchor-watch to-night," Macleod answered slowly, from out of the darkness. "I will be all the anchor-watch you will need, Hamish, until the morning."

"You, sir!" Hamish cried. "I have been waiting to take you ashore; and surely it is ashore that you are going!"

Just as he had spoken there was a sound that all the world seemed to stand still to hear. It was a low, murmuring sound of thunder; but it was so remote as almost to be inaudible. The next moment an awful thing occurred. The two men standing face to face in the dark suddenly found themselves in a blaze of blinding steel-blue light, and at the very same instant the thunder-roar crackled and shook all around them like the firing of a thousand cannon. How the wild echoes went booming over the sea! Then they were in the black night again. There was a period of awed silence.

"Hamish," Macleod said quickly, "do as I tell you now! Lower the gig; take the men with you, and Christina, and go ashore, and remain in the sheiling till the morning."

"I will not!" Hamish cried. "Oh, Sir Keith, would you have me do that!"

Macleod had anticipated his refusal. Instantly he went forward and called up Christina. He ordered Duncan Cameron and John Cameron to lower away the gig. He got them all in but Hamish.

"Hamish," said he, "you are a smaller man than I. Is it on such a night that you would have me quarrel with you? Must I throw you into the boat?"

The old man clasped his trembling hands together as if in prayer; and he said, with an agonized and broken voice,—

"Oh, Sir Keith, you are my master, and there is nothing I will not do for you; but only this one night you will let me remain with the yacht. I will give you the rest of my life; but only this one night ——"

"Into the gig with you!" Macleod cried angrily. "Why, man, don't you think I can keep anchor-watch?" But then he added, very gently, "Hamish, shake hands with me now. You were my friend, and you must get ashore before the sea rises."

"I will stay in the dingey, then," the old man entreated.

"You will go ashore, Hamish; and this very instant, too. If the gale begins, how will you get ashore? Good-by, Hamish — good-night!"

Another white sheet of flame quivered all around them, just as this black figure was descending into the gig; and then the fierce hell of sounds broke loose once more. Sea and sky together seemed to shudder at the wild uproar; and far away the sounds went thundering through the hollow night. How could one hear if there was any sobbing in that departing boat, or any last cry of farewell? It was Ulva calling now; and Fladda answering from over the black water; and the Dutchman is surely awake at last!

There came a stirring of wind from the east, and the sea began to moan. Surely the poor fugitives must have reached the shore now. And then there was a strange noise in the distance: in the awful silence between the peals of thunder it would be heard; it came nearer and nearer — a low murmuring noise, but full of a secret life and thrill — it came along like the tread of a thousand armies — and then the gale struck its first blow. The yacht reeled under the stroke, but her bows staggered up again like a dog that has been felled, and after one or two convulsive plunges she clung hard at the strained cables. And now the gale was growing in fury, and the sea rising. Blinding showers of rain swept over, hissing and roaring; the white tongues of flame were shooting this way and that across the startled heavens; and there was a more awful thunder than even the falling of the Atlantic surge booming into the great sea-caves. In the abysmal darkness the spectral arms of the ocean rose white in their angry clamor; and then another blue gleam would lay bare the great heaving and wreathing bosom of the deep. What devil's dance is this? Surely it cannot be Ulva — Ulva the green-shored — Ulva that the sailors in their love of her call softly Ool-a-va — that is laughing aloud with wild laughter on this awful night? And Colonsay, and Lunga, and Fladda — they were beautiful and quiet in the still summer-time; but now they have gone mad, and they are flinging back the plunging sea in white masses of foam, and they are shrieking in their fierce joy of the strife. And Staffa — Staffa is far away and alone; she is trembling to her core: how long will the shuddering caves withstand the mighty hammer of the Atlantic surge? And then again the sudden wild gleam startles the night — and one sees, with an appalling vividness, the driven white waves and the black islands — and then again a thousand echoes go booming along the iron-bound coast. What can be heard in the roar of the hurricane, and the hissing of rain, and the thundering whirl of the waves on the rocks? Surely not the one glad last cry: SWEETHEART! YOUR HEALTH! YOUR HEALTH IN THE COAL-BLACK WINE!

The poor fugitives crouching in among the rocks: is it the blinding rain or the driven white surf that is in their eyes? But they have sailors' eyes; they can see through the awful storm; and their gaze is fixed on one small green point far out there in the blackness — the starboard light of the doomed ship. It wavers like a will-o'-the-wisp, but it does not recede; the old "Umpire" still clings bravely to her chain cables.

And amid all the din of the storm they hear the voice of Hamish lifted aloud in lamentation, —

"Oh, the brave lad! the brave lad! And who is to save my young master now; and who will carry this tale back to Castle Dare? They will say to me: 'Hamish, you had charge of the young lad: you put the first gun in his hand: you had charge of him; he had the love of a son for you: what is it you have done with him this night?' He is my Absalom; he is my brave young lad: oh, do you think that I will let him drown and do nothing to try to save him? Do you think that? Duncan Cameron, are you a man? Will you get into the gig with me and pull out to the 'Umpire'?"

"By God," said Duncan Cameron solemnly, "I will do that! I have no wife; I do not care. I will go into the gig with you, Hamish; but we will never reach the yacht — this night or any night that is to come."

Then the old woman Christina shrieked aloud, and caught her husband by the arm.

"Hamish! Hamish! Are you going to drown yourself before my eyes?"

He shook her hand away from him.

"My young master ordered me ashore: I have come ashore. But I myself, I order myself back again. Duncan Cameron, they will never say that we stood by and saw Macleod of Dare go down to his grave!"

They emerged from the shelter of this great rock; the hurricane was so fierce that they had to cling to one bowlder after another to save themselves from being whirled into the sea. But were these two men by themselves? Not likely! It was a party of five men that now clambered along the slippery rocks to the shingle up which they had hauled the gig, and one wild lightning flash saw them with their hands on the gunwale, ready to drag her down to the water. There was a surf raging there that would have swamped twenty gigs: these five men were going of their own free will and choice to certain death — so much had they loved the young master.

But a piercing cry from Christina arrested them. They looked out to sea. What was this sudden and awful thing? Instead of the starboard green light, behold! the port red light — and that moving! Oh, see! how it recedes, wavering — flickering through the whirling vapor of the storm! And there again is the green light! Is it a witch's dance, or are they strange death-fires hovering over the dark ocean grave? But Hamish knows too well what it means; and with a wild cry of horror and despair, the old man sinks on his knees and clasps his hands, and stretches them out to the terrible sea.

"Oh, Macleod! Macleod! are you going away from me forever? and we will go up the hills together and on the lochs together no more — no more — no more! Oh, the brave lad that he was! — and the good master! — and who was not proud of him? — my handsome lad! — and he the last of the Macleods of Dare!"

Arise, Hamish, and have the gig hauled up into shelter; for will you not want it when the gale abates, and the seas are smooth, and you have to go away to Dare, you and your comrades, with silent tongues and sombre eyes? Why this wild lamentation in the darkness of the night? The stricken heart that you loved so well has found peace at last; the coal-black wine has been drunk; there is an end! And you, you poor cowering fugitives, who only see each other's terrified faces when the wan gleam of the lightning blazes through the sky, perhaps it is well that you should weep and wail for the young master; but that is soon over, and the day will break. And this is what I am thinking of now: when the light comes, and the seas are smooth, then which of you — oh, which of you all will tell this tale to the two women at Castle Dare?

So fair shines the morning sun on the white sands of Iona! The three days' gale is over. Behold how Ulva — Ulva the green-shored — the Ool-a-va that the sailors love — is laughing out again to the clear skies! And the great skarts on the shores of Erisgeir are spreading abroad their dusky wings to get them dried in the sun; and the seals are basking on the rocks in Loch-na-Keal; and in Loch Scridain the white gulls sit buoyant on the blue sea. There go the Gometra men in their brown-sailed boat to look after the lobster-traps at Staffa; and very soon you will see the steamer come round the far Cailleach Point; over at Erraidh they are signalling to the men at Dubh Artach; and they are glad to have a message from them after the heavy gale. The new, bright day has begun; the world has awakened again to the joyous sunlight; there is a chattering of the seabirds all along the shores. It is a bright, eager, glad day for all the world. But there is silence in Castle Dare!

From Temple Bar.

MISS FERRIER'S NOVELS.

In November 1854 there died in Edinburgh one who might, with truth, be called almost the last, if not the last of that literary galaxy that adorned Edinburgh society in the days of Scott, Jeffrey, Wilson, and others. Distinguished by the friendship and confidence of Sir Walter Scott, the name of Susan Edmonstone Ferrier is one that has become famous from her three clever, satirical, and most amusing novels of "Marriage," "The Inheritance," and "Destiny." They exhibit, besides, a keen sense of the ludicrous almost unequalled. She may be said to have done for Scotland what Jane Austen and Maria Edgeworth have respectively done for England and Ireland — left portraits painted in undying colors, of men and women that will live forever in the hearts and minds of her readers. In the present redundant age of novel-writers and novel-readers, and when one would suppose the supply must far exceed the demand from the amount of puerile and often at the same time prurient literature in the department of fiction that daily flows from the press, it is refreshing to turn to the vigorous and, above all, healthy moral tone of this lady's works. To the present generation they are as if they had never been, and to the question, "Did you ever read 'Marriage'?" it is not uncommon in these times to get such an answer as, "No, never. Who wrote it?" "Miss Ferrier." "I never heard of her or her novels." It is with the view, therefore, of enlightening such benighted ones that I pen the following pages.

Miss Ferrier was the fourth and youngest daughter of James Ferrier, writer to the signet, and was born at Edinburgh 7th of September, 1782. Her father was bred to that profession in the office of a distant relative, Mr. Archibald Campbell, of Succoth (great-grandfather of the present Archbishop of Canterbury). To his valuable and extensive business, which included the management of all the Argyll estates, he ultimately succeeded. He was admitted as a member of the Society of Writers to the Signet in the year 1770. He was also appointed a principal clerk of session through the influence (most strenuously exerted) of his friend and patron, John, fifth Duke of Argyll,* and was a colleague in that office with Scott. He also numbered among his friends Henry Mackenzie, the "Man of Feeling," Dr. Hugh Blair, and last, though not least, Burns the poet. His father, John Ferrier, had been in the same office till his marriage with Grizzel, only daughter and heiress of Sir Walter Sandilands Hamilton, Bart., of Westport, County Linlithgow.† John Ferrier was the last laird of Kirklands, County Renfrew, subsequently sold to Lord Blantyre. Mr. James Ferrier was the third son of his parents, and was born 1744.‡ Miss Ferrier was in the habit of frequently visiting at Inveraray Castle in company with her father, and while there had ample opportunity afforded her of studying fashionable life in all its varied and capricious moods, and which have been preserved to posterity in her admirable delineations of character. Her reason for becoming an authoress is from her own pen as follows, and is entitled a preface to "The Inheritance:" —

An introduction had been requested for the first of these three works, "Marriage;" but while the author was considering what could be said for an already thrice-told tale, it had passed through the press with such rapidity as to outstrip all consideration. Indeed what can be said for any of them amounts to so little, it is scarcely worth saying at all. The first was begun at the urgent desire of a friend, and with the promise of assistance, which, however, failed long before the end of the first volume; the work was then thrown aside, and resumed some years after.* It afforded occupation and amusement for idle and solitary hours, and was published in the belief that the author's name never would be guessed at, or the work heard of beyond a very limited sphere. "Ce n'est que le premier pas qu'il coute," in novel-writing as in carrying one's head in their hand: "The Inheritance" and "Destiny" followed as matters of course. It has been so often and confidently asserted that almost all the characters are individual portraits, that the author has little hope of being believed when she asserts the contrary. That some of them were sketched from life is not denied; but the circumstances in which they are placed, their birth, habits, language, and a thousand minute particulars, differ so widely from the originals as ought to refute the charge of personality. With regard to the introduction of religious sentiment into works of fiction, there exists a difference of opinion, which, in the absence of any authoritative command, leaves each free to act according to their own feelings and opinions. Viewing this life merely as the prelude to another state of existence, it does seem strange that the future should ever be wholly excluded from any representation of it even in its motley occurrences, scarcely less motley perhaps than the human mind itself. The author can only wish it had been her province to have raised plants of nobler growth in the wide field of Christian literature; but as such has not been her high calling, she hopes her "small herbs of grace" may without offence be allowed to put forth their blossoms amongst the briars, weeds, and wild-flowers of life's common path.

Edinburgh, April 1840.

The friend on whose assistance she relied was Miss Clavering, daughter of Lady Augusta Clavering, and niece of the late Duke of Argyll. Between this lady and our author an early friendship existed, which was severed only by death. It commenced in 1797, when Miss Ferrier lost her mother,† and when she went with

* To this nobleman in his later years Mr. Ferrier devoted much of his time, both at Inveraray and Roseneath. He died in 1806. His duchess was the lovely Elizabeth Gunning. Mr. Ferrier died at 25 George Street, Edinburgh, January 1829, aged eighty-six. Sir Walter Scott attended his funeral. After his death Miss Ferrier removed to a smaller house, in Nelson Street.

† Sir Walter's father, Walter Sandilands of Hilderston, a cadet of the Torphichen family (his father was commonly styled Tutor of Calder), assumed the name of Hamilton on his marriage with the heiress of Westport.

‡ His brothers were: William, who assumed the name of Hamilton on succeeding his grandfather in the Westport estate. He was in the navy, and at the capture of Quebec, where he assisted the sailors to drag the cannon up the heights of Abraham; m. Miss Johnstone, of Straiton, Co. Linlithgow; died 1814. Walter; m. Miss Wallace, of Cairnhill, Co. Ayr, father of the late Colonel Ferrier Hamilton, of Cairnhill and Westport. Ilay, major-general in the army; m. first Miss Macqueen, niece of Lord Braxfield, second, Mrs. Cutlar of Orroland, Co. Kirkcudbright. He was governor of Dumbarton Castle, and died there 1824.

her father to Inveraray Castle she was then fifteen, and her friend only eight. Miss Clavering became the wife of Mr. Miles Fletcher, advocate, but was better known in later years as Mrs. Christison. She inherited all the natural elegance and beauty of face and form for which her mother and aunt, Lady Charlotte Campbell, were so distinguished, and died at Edinburgh, 1869, at an advanced age. While concocting the story of her first novel, Miss Ferrier writes to her friend in a lively and sprightly vein: —

Your proposals flatter and delight me, but how in the name of postage are we to transport our brains to and fro? I suppose we'd be pawning our flannel petticoats to bring about our heroine's marriage, and lying on straw to give her Christian burial. Part of your plot I like much, some not quite so well — for example, it wants a moral — your principal characters are good and interesting, and they are tormented and persecuted and punished from no fault of their own, and for no possible purpose. Now I don't think, like all penny-book manufacturers, that 'tis absolutely necessary that the good boys and girls should be rewarded and the naughty ones punished. Yet I think, where there is much tribulation, 'tis fitter it should be the consequence rather than the cause of misconduct or frailty. You'll say that rule is absurd, inasmuch as it is not observed in human life: that I allow, but we know the inflictions of Providence are for wise purposes, therefore our reason willingly submits to them. But as the only good purpose of a book is to inculcate morality and convey some lesson of instruction as well as delight, I do not see that what is called a good moral can be dispensed with in a work of fiction. Another fault is your making your hero attempt suicide, which is greatly too shocking, and destroys all the interest his misfortunes would otherwise excite — that, however, could be easily altered, and in other respects I think your plot has great merit. You'll perhaps be displeased at the freedom of my remarks; but in the first place freedom is absolutely necessary in the cause in which we are about to embark, and it must be understood to be one if not the chief article of our creed. In the second (tho' it should have been the first), know that I always say what I think, or say nothing. Now as to my own deeds — I shall make no apologies (since they must be banished from our code of laws) for sending you a hasty and imperfect sketch of what I think might be wrought up to a tolerable form. I do not recollect ever to have seen the sudden transition of a high-bred English beauty * who thinks she can sacrifice all for love to an uncomfortable solitary Highland dwelling † among tall red-haired sisters and grim-faced aunts. Don't you think this would make a good opening of the piece? Suppose each of us try our hands on it, the moral to be deduced from that is to warn all young ladies against runaway matches, and the character and fate of the two sisters would be unexceptionable. I expect it will be the first book every wise matron will put into the hand of her daughter, and even the reviewers will relax of their severity in favor of the morality of this little work. Enchanting sight! already do I behold myself arrayed in an old mouldy covering, thumbed and creased and filled with dogs'-ears. I hear the enchanting sound of some sentimental miss, the shrill pipe of some antiquated spinster, or the hoarse grumbling of some incensed dowager as they severally inquire for me at the circulating library, and are assured by the master that 'tis in such demand that though he has thirteen copies they are insufficient to answer the calls upon it, but that each of them may depend upon having the very first that comes in!!! Child, child, you had need be sensible of the value of my correspondence. At this moment I'm squandering mines of wealth upon you when I might be drawing treasures from the bags of time! But I shall not repine if you'll only repay me in kind — speedy and long is all that I require; for all things else I shall take my chance. Though I have been so impertinent to your book, I nevertheless hope and expect you'll send it to me. Combie ‡ and his daughter (or Mare, as you call her) are coming to town about this time, as I'm informed, and you may easily contrive to catch them (wild as they are) and send it by them, for there's no judging what a picture will be like from a mere pen-and-ink outline — if that won't do, is there not a coach or a carrier? One thing let me entreat of you: if we engage in this undertaking, let it be kept a profound secret from every human being. If I was suspected of being accessory to such foul deeds, my brothers and amiable, and possessed of great personal beauty, as is attested by her portrait by Sir George Chalmers, Bart., in a fancy dress, and painted 1765. At the time of her marriage (1767) she resided at the Abbey of Holyrood Palace with an aunt, the Honorable Mrs. Maitland, widow of a younger son of Lord Lauderdale's, who had been left in poor circumstances, and had charge of the apartments there belonging to the Argyll family. After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Ferrier occupied a flat in Lady Stair's Close (old town of Edinburgh), and which had just been vacated by Sir James Pulteney and his wife Lady Bath. Ten children were the fruit of this union, six sons and four daughters, viz.: — sisters would murder me, and my father bury me alive — and I have always observed that if a secret ever goes beyond those immediately concerned in its concealment it very soon ceases to be a secret.

Again she writes to her friend and co-partner in her literary work: —

I am boiling to hear from you, but I've taken a remorse of conscience about Lady Maclaughlan and her friends: if I was ever to be detected or even suspected, I would have nothing for it but to drown myself. I mean, therefore, to let her alone till I hear from you, as I think we might compound some other kind of character for her that might do as well and not be so dangerous. As to the misses, if ever it was to be published they must be altered or I must fly my native land.

Miss Clavering writes in answer: —

ARDENCAPLE CASTLE, Sunday Morning.

First of all I must tell you that I approve in the most signal manner of Lady Maclaughlan. The sort of character was totally unexpected by me, and I was really transported with her. Do I know the person who is the original? The dress was vastly like Mrs. Damer,* and the manners like Lady Frederick.† Tell me if you did not mean a touch at her. I love poor Sir Sampson vastly, though it is impossible, in the presence of his lady, to have eyes or ears for any one else. Now you must not think of altering her, and it must all go forth in the world; neither must the misses upon any account be changed. I have a way now of at least offering it to publication by which you never can be discovered. I will tell the person that I wrote it (indeed, quothà, cries Miss Ferrier, and no great favor; see how she loves to plume herself with borrowed fame!). Well, however, my way is quite sure, and the person would never think of speaking of it again, so never let the idea of detection come across your brain while you are writing to damp your ardor.

Positively neither Sir Sampson's lady nor the foolish virgins must be displaced.

Again she writes from Inveraray Castle (of date December 1810), eight years before the work was published: —

And now, my dear Susannah, I must tell you of the success of your first-born. I read it to Lady Charlotte‡ in the carriage when she and I came together from Ardencaple, Bessie§ having gone with mamma. If you will believe, I never yet in my existence saw Lady C. laugh so much as she did at that from beginning to end, and seriously I was two or three times afraid that she would fall into a fit. Her very words were, "I assure you I think it without the least exception the cleverest thing that ever was written, and in wit far surpassing Fielding." Then she said as to our other books they would all sink to nothingness before yours, that they were not fit to be mentioned in the same day, and that she felt quite discouraged from writing when she thought of yours. The whole conversation of the aunties* made her screech with laughing, and in short I can neither record nor describe all that she said; far from exaggerating it, I don't say half enough, but I only wish you had seen the effect it produced. I am sure you will be the first author of the age.

In another letter she writes: —

I had an immense packet from Lady C. the other day, which I confess rather disappointed me, for I expected volumes of new compositions. On opening it what should it prove but your book returned, so I shall keep it safe till I see you. She was profuse in its praises, and so was mamma, who said she was particularly taken with Lady Juliana's brother,† he was so like the duke. Lady C. said she had read it all deliberately and critically, and pronounced it capital, with a dash under it. Lady C. begs that in your enumeration of Lady Olivia's peccadilloes you will omit waltzes.

That dance had just been introduced in London (1811), and the season of that year Miss Clavering spent with her aunt, Lady Charlotte, in the metropolis, in a round of gaiety, going to parties at Kensington Palace (where the Princess of Wales‡ then lived), Devonshire House, and the witty Duchess of Gordon's, one of the "Empresses of Fashion," as Walpole calls her. A propos of waltzes, she writes to Miss Ferrier: —

They are all of a sudden become so much the rage here that people meet in the morning at one another's houses to learn them. And they are getting on very much. Lady Charlotte and I get great honor for the accomplishment, and I have improved a few scholars. Clanronald§ is grown so detestably fine. He waltzes with me because he thinks he thereby shows off his figure, but as to speaking to me or Lady Charlotte, he thinks himself much above that. He is in much request at present because of his dancing; next to him Lord Hartington is, I think, the best dancer; he is, besides, very fond of it, and is much above

* Daughter of General Seymour Conway, and a distinguished sculptor. She was niece of the fifth duke of Argyll.

† Lady Frederick Campbell is believed to have suggested the character of Lady Maclaughlan to Miss Ferrier, and there is little doubt she was the original. She was the widow of Earl Ferrers, of Tyburn notoriety, and was burnt to death at Coombe Bank, Kent, in 1807.

being fine; I never met with a more natural, boyish creature.

To return to the novel. The only portion from Miss Clavering's pen is the history of Mrs. Douglas in the first volume, and are, as she herself remarked, "the only few pages that will be skipped." She further adds: —

Make haste and print it then, lest one of the Miss Edmonstones should die, as then I should think you would scarce venture for fear of being haunted.

I shall hasten to burn your last letter, as you mention something of looking out for a father for your bantling, so I don't think it would be decent to let anybody get a sight of such a letter!

At last, in 1818, the novel was published by the late Mr. Blackwood, and drew forth loud plaudits from the wondering public, as to whom the author of so original a book could be. "In London it is much admired, and generally attributed to Walter Scott," so writes a friend to Miss Ferrier; and she replies in her humorous style: "Whosever it is, I have met with nothing that has interested me since." Sir Walter must have been flattered at his being supposed its father, for he says, in the conclusion of the "Tales of my Landlord:" —

There remains behind not only a large harvest, but laborers capable of gathering it in; more than one writer has of late displayed talents of this description, and if the present author, himself a phantom, may be permitted to distinguish a brother, or perhaps a sister, shadow, he would mention in particular the author of the very lively work entitled "Marriage."

Mr. Blackwood, whose opinion is of some value, thought very highly of "Marriage," and he writes to Miss Ferrier (1817): —

Mr. B. will not allow himself to think for one moment that there can be any uncertainty as to the work being completed. Not to mention his own deep disappointment, Mr. B. would almost consider it a crime if a work possessing so much interest and useful instruction were not given to the world. The author is the only critic of whom Mr. B. is afraid, and after what he has said he anxiously hopes that this censor of the press will very speedily affix the imprimatur.

In allusion to Sir Walter's eulogium on the novel above quoted, Mr. Blackwood writes to the author: —

I have the pleasure of inclosing you this concluding sentence of the new "Tales of my Landlord," which are to be published tomorrow. After this call, surely you will be no longer silent. If the great magician does not conjure you I shall give up all hopes.

But Miss Ferrier seems to have been proof against the great magician even. "Marriage" became deservedly popular, and was translated into French, as appears from the annexed: —

We perceive by the French papers that a translation of Miss Ferrier's clever novel "Marriage" has been very successful in France. — New Times, 6 Oct. '25.

For "Marriage" she received the sum of £150. Her second venture was more successful in a pecuniary sense. Space, however, prohibits me from dwelling any longer on "Marriage," so we come next to "The Inheritance." This novel appeared six years after, in 1824, and is a work of very great merit. To her sister (Mrs. Kinloch, in London) Miss Ferrier writes: —

John (her brother) has now completed a bargain with Mr. Blackwood, by which I am to have £1,000 for a novel now in hand, but which is not nearly finished, and possibly never may be. Nevertheless he is desirous of announcing it in his magazine, and therefore I wish to prepare you for the shock. I can say nothing more than I have already said on the subject of silence, if not of secrecy. I never will avow myself, and nothing can hurt and offend me so much as any of my friends doing it for me; this is not façon de parler, but my real and unalterable feeling; I could not bear the fuss of authorism!

Secrecy as to her authorship seems to have been the great desire of her heart, and much of "The Inheritance" was written in privacy at Morningside House, old Mr. Ferrier's summer retreat near Edinburgh, and she says, "This house is so small it is very ill calculated for concealment."

It was not till 1851 that she publicly avowed herself by authorizing her name to be prefixed to a revised and corrected edition of her works.* Sir Walter Scott was delighted with this second novel, a proof of which was conveyed to Miss Ferrier by Mr. Blackwood: —

On Wednesday I dined in company with Sir Walter Scott, and he spoke of the work in the very highest terms. I do not always set the highest value on the baronet's favorable opinion of a book, because he has so much kindness of feeling towards every one, but in this case he spoke so much con amore, and entered so completely, and at such a length, to me into the spirit of the book and of the characters, that showed me at once the impression it had made on him. Every one I have seen who has seen the book gives the same praise of it. Two or three days ago I had a note from a friend, which I copy: "I have nearly finished a volume of 'The Inheritance.' It is unquestionably the best novel of the class of the present day, in so far as I can yet judge. Lord Rossville, Adam Ramsay, Bell Black, and the major, Miss Pratt, and Anthony Whyte, are capital, and a fine contrast to each other. It is, I think, a more elaborate work than 'Marriage,' better told, with greater variety, and displaying improved powers. I congratulate you, and have no doubt the book will make a prodigious sough." *

* Published by the late Mr. Richard Bentley, to whom she sold her copyrights in 1841. A previous edition was published by him in 1841.

Mr. Blackwood adds: "I do not know a better judge nor a more frank and honest one than the writer of this note."

Again he writes: —

On Saturday I lent in confidence to a very clever friend, on whose discretion I can rely, the two volumes of "The Inheritance." This morning I got them back with the following note: "My dear Sir, — I am truly delighted with 'The Inheritance.' I do not find as yet any one character quite equal to Dr. Redgill,† except perhaps the good-natured, old-tumbled (or troubled, I can't make out which) maiden,‡ but as a novel it is a hundred miles above 'Marriage.' It reminds me of Miss Austen's very best things in every page. And if the third volume be like these, no fear of success triumphant."

Mr. Blackwood again says: —

You have only to go on as you are going to sustain the character Sir Walter gave me of "Marriage," that you had the rare talent of making your conclusion even better than your commencement, for, said this worthy and veracious person, "Mr. Blackwood, if ever I were to write a novel, I would like to write the two first volumes, and leave anybody to write the third that liked."

In the following note, Lister, author of "Granby," also expresses his admiration in graceful terms, and with a copy of his own novel for Miss Ferrier's acceptance.

T. H. Lister to Miss Ferrier.

17 Heriot Row, Feb. 3, 1836.

My dear Madam, — I should feel that in requesting your acceptance of the book which accompanies this note I should be presuming too much upon the very short time that I have had the honor of being known to you, if Mrs. Lister had not told me that you had kindly spoken of it in approving terms. I hope, therefore, I may be allowed, without presumption, to present to you a book which you have thus raised in the opinion of its writer, and the composition of which is associated in my mind with the recollection of one of the greatest pleasures I have derived from novel-reading, for which I am indebted to you. I believe the only novel I read, or at any rate can now remember to have read during the whole time I was writing "Granby," was your "Inheritance." — Believe me, my dear madam, your very faithful, (Signed) T. H. Lister.

From Mrs. Lister (afterwards Lady Theresa Cornewall Lewis) Miss Ferrier also received the following complimentary note.

Mrs. Lister to Miss Ferrier.

Thursday Night. 17 Heriot Row.

My dear Miss Ferrier, — I cannot leave Edinburgh without a grateful acknowledgment of your very kind and flattering gift. Mr. Lister called upon you in hopes of being able to wish you good-bye, and to tell you in person how much we were pleased with the proof you have given us that we are not unworthy of enjoying and appreciating your delightful works — pray accept our very best thanks, and I hope as an authoress you will not feel offended if I say that they will now have an added charm in our eyes from the regard which our personal acquaintance with the writer has engendered. I know that to those who do not mix much in society the acquaintance with strangers is often irksome; we therefore feel the more obliged to you for having allowed us the pleasure of knowing you, and I hope that if we return in the course of the year that we may find you less suffering in health, but as kindly disposed to receive our visits as you have hitherto been. We feel very grateful for all the kindness we have met with in Edinburgh, and amongst the pleasant reminiscences of the last five months we must always rank high the having received from you as a token of regard so acceptable a gift. — Believe me (or indeed I ought to say us), my dear Miss Ferrier, yours most sincerely, (Signed) M. Theresa Lister.

Lord Murray, the late Scotch judge, writes to a mutual friend of his and Miss Ferrier's (Miss Walker of Dalry): —

I received a copy of "Inheritance" in the name of the author, and as I do not know who the author is, and I suspect that you know more than I do, I trust you will find some channel through which you will convey my thanks. I read "Inheritance" with very great pleasure. The characters are very well conceived, and delineated with great success. I may add, I have heard it highly commended by much better judges. Jeffrey speaks very favorably. He is particularly pleased with the nabob (major) and spouse, the letter from the Lakes, and the P.S. to it. Lord Gwydyr, who lives entirely in fashionable circles, said to me much in its praise, in which I concurred. From many other symptoms, I have no doubt of its complete success.

Miss Hannah Mackenzie, daughter of the "Man of Feeling," writes to her friend Miss Ferrier: —

Walter Scott dined here the other day, and both he and papa joined heartily in their admiration of Uncle Adam, and their wish to know who he is. Sir W. also admires Miss Becky Duguid, and said he thought her quite a new character. I should like much to see you, and talk all over at length, but fear to invite you to my own bower for fear of suspicion; but I trust you will soon come boldly, and face my whole family. I do not think you need fear them much; of course, like other people, they have their "thoughts," but by no means speak with certainty, and Margaret has this minute assured us that she does not think it Miss Ferrier's.

Uncle Adam, with "his seventy thousand pounds," and as "cross as two sticks," in some degree resembled old Mr. Ferrier, who was somewhat brusque and testy in his manner, and alarmed many people who were otherwise unacquainted with the true genuine worth and honesty of his character. Miss Becky is a poor old maid saddled with commissions from all her friends of a most miscellaneous description.

She was expected to attend all accouchements, christenings, deaths, chestings, and burials, but she was seldom asked to a marriage, and never to any party of pleasure.

She is an admirable pendant to the "Pratt," who is inseparable, however, from her invisible nephew, Mr. Anthony Whyte. Miss Pratt is a sort of female Paul Pry, always turning up at the most unexpected moment at Lord Rossville's, and finally put the finishing stroke to the pompous old peer by driving up to his castle door in the hearse of Mr. M'Vitie, the Radical distiller, being unable to procure any other mode of conveyance during a heavy snow-storm, and assured every one that she fancied she was the first person who thought herself in luck to have got into a hearse, but considered herself still luckier in having got well out of one.

Caroline, Duchess of Argyll,* expresses her appreciation of "The Inheritance" to the author, for whom she entertained a warm friendship.

* Daughter of Lord Jersey, and wife of the first Marquis of Anglesea, whom she divorced, when Lord Paget, in 1810: m. the same year George, sixth Duke of Argyll.

UPPER BROOK STREET, Monday Evening.

What can I say sufficiently to express my thanks either to you, my dear Miss Ferrier, or to the author of "The Inheritance," whoever she may be, for the most perfect edition of that most perfect book that was ever written! and now that I may be allowed to have my suspicion, I shall read it again with double pleasure. It was so kind of you to remember your promise! When I received your kind letter and books this morning, I was quite delighted with my beautiful present, and to find I was not forgotten by one of my best friends.

"The Inheritance" — a fact not generally known — was dramatized and produced at Covent Garden, but had a very short run, and was an utter failure, as might have been expected. Mrs. Gore was requested to adapt it for the stage by the chief comic actors of the day, and she writes to Miss Ferrier on the subject: —

Since the management of Covent Garden Theatre fell into the hands of Laporte, he has favored me with a commission to write a comedy for him, and the subject proposed by him is again the French novel of "L'Héritière," which turns out to be a literal translation of "The Inheritance." He is quite bent upon having Miss Pratt on the stage. I have not chosen to give Monsieur Laporte any positive answer on the subject without previously applying to yourself to know whether you have any intention or inclination to apply to the stage those admirable talents which are so greatly appreciated in London.

Mrs. Gore, meanwhile, had been forestalled in her attempt, as a play on the subject had been laid before the reader to Covent Garden, and she writes again to Miss Ferrier: —

I have since learned with regret that the play is the production of a certain Mr. Fitzball, the distinguished author of "The Flying Dutchman," and sixty other successful melodramas, represented with great applause at the Surrey, Coburg, City and Pavilion Theatres, etc.; in short a writer of a very low class. The play of "The Inheritance" has been accepted at Covent Garden, but from my knowledge of the general engagements of the theatre, I should say that it has not the slightest chance of approaching to representation. For your sake it cannot be better than in the black-box of the manager's room, which secures it at least from performance at the Coburg Theatre.

We must let the curtain, so to speak, drop on "The Inheritance," and pass on to "Destiny." This novel also appeared six years after, in 1831, and was dedicated to Sir Walter Scott. And he acknowledges the compliment as follows: —

Sir Walter Scott to Miss Ferrier.

MY DEAR MISS FERRIER, — Ann returned to-day, and part of her Edinburgh news informs me that you meditated honoring your present literary offspring with my name, so I do not let the sun set without saying how much I shall feel myself obliged and honored by such a compliment. I will not stand battle during compliments on my wand of merit, but can swallow so great a compliment as if I really deserved it, and indeed, as whatever I do not owe entirely to your goodness I may safely set down to your friendship, I shall scarce be more flattered one way or the other. I hope you will make good some hopes which make Ann very proud of visiting Abbotsford about April next. Nothing can give the proprietor more pleasure, for the birds, which are a prodigious chorus, are making of their nests and singing in blithe chorus. "Pray come, and do not make this a flattering dream." I know a little the value of my future godchild, since I had a peep at some of the sheets when I was in town during the great snow-storm, which out of compassion for an author closed up within her gates may prove an apology for his breach of confidence. So far I must say that what I have seen has had the greatest effect in making me curious for the rest.

Believe me, dear Miss Ferrier, with the greatest respect, your most sincere, humble servant, (Signed) WALTER SCOTT.

Abbotsford, Tuesday Evening.

In the next note he acknowledges a copy of "Destiny" sent him by the author.

Sir Walter Scott to Miss Ferrier.

DEAR MISS FERRIER, — If I had a spark of gratitude in me I ought to have written you well nigh a month ago to thank you in no common fashion for "Destiny," which by the few, and at the same time the probability, of its incidents, your writings are those of the first person of genius who has disarmed the little pedantry of the court of Cupid and of gods and men, and allowed youths and maidens to propose other alliances than those an early choice had pointed out to them. I have not time to tell you all the consequences of my revolutionary doctrine. All these we will talk over when you come here, which I am rejoiced to hear is likely to be on Saturday next, when Mr. Cadell * will be happy to be your beau in the Blucher,† and we will take care are met with at the toll. Pray do not make this a flattering dream. You are of the initiated, so will not be de trop with Cadell. — I am, always with the greatest respect and regard, your faithful and affectionate servant, (Signed) WALTER SCOTT.

Abbotsford, Wednesday Evening.

In 1832, the year after the birth of his godchild "Destiny," poor Sir Walter began to show signs of that general break-up of mind and body so speedily followed by his death. Of this sad state Miss Ferrier writes to her sister, Mrs. Kinloch (in London): —

Alas! the night cometh when no man can work, as is the case with that mighty genius which seems now completely quenched. Well might he be styled "a bright and a benignant luminary," for while all will deplore the loss of that bright intellect which has so long charmed a world — many will still more deeply lament the warm and steady friend, whose kind and genuine influence was ever freely diffused on all whom it could benefit. I trust, however, he may be spared yet a while — it might be salutary to himself to con over the lessons of a death-bed, and it might be edifying to others to have his record added to the many that have gone before him, that all below is vanity. But till we feel that we shall never believe it! I ought to feel it more than most people, as I sit in my dark and solitary chamber, shut out, as it seems, from all the "pride of life" — but alas! worldly things make their way into the darkest and most solitary recesses, for their dwelling is in the heart, and from thence God only can expel them.

Her first visit to the author of "Waverley" was in the autumn of 1811, when she accompanied her father to Ashistiel. The invitation came from Scott to Mr. Ferrier.

Walter Scott, Esq., to James Ferrier, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR, — We are delighted to see that your feet are free and disposed to turn themselves our way — a pleasure which we cannot consent to put off till we have a house at Abbotsford, which is but a distant prospect. We are quite disengaged and alone, saving the company of Mr. Terry the comedian, who is assisting me in planning my cottage, having been bred an architect under Wyat. He reads to us after coffee in the evening, which is very pleasant. This letter will reach you to-morrow, so probably Thursday may be a convenient day of march, when we shall expect you to dinner about five o'clock, unless the weather should be very stormy, in which case we should be sorry Miss Ferrier should risk getting cold. To-day is clearing up after a week's dismal weather, which may entitle us to expect some pleasant October days, not the worst of our climate. The road is by Middleton and Bankhouse; we are ten miles from the last stage, and thirty from Edinburgh, hilly road. There is a ford beneath Ashistiel generally very passable, but we will have the boat in readiness in case Miss Ferrier prefers it, or the water should be full. Mrs. Scott joins in kind respects to Miss Ferrier, and I ever am, dear sir, — Yours truly obliged, (Signed) W. SCOTT.

Ashistiel, October 7th.

* "Destiny" was published by Cadell through Sir Walter's intervention, and by it the author realized £1,700.

It was in 1811 that Scott was appointed a clerk of session, and to Mr. Ferrier he was in some measure indebted for that post.

Her last visit to Abbotsford is touchingly alluded to by Lockhart in his "Life of Scott."

To assist them in amusing him in the hours which he spent out of his study, and especially that he might make these hours more frequent, his daughter had invited his friend the authoress of "Marriage" to come out to Abbotsford, and her coming was serviceable. For she knew and loved him well, and she had seen enough of affliction akin to his to be well skilled in dealing with it. She could not be an hour in his company without observing what filled his children with more sorrow than all the rest of the case. He would begin a story as gaily as ever, and go on, in spite of the hesitation in his speech, to tell it with highly picturesque effect — but before he reached the point, it would seem as if some internal spring had given way. He paused and gazed round him with the blank anxiety of look that a blind man has when he has dropped his staff. Unthinking friends sometimes gave him the catchword abruptly. I noticed the delicacy of Miss Ferrier on such occasions. Her sight was bad, and she took care not to use her glasses when he was speaking, and she affected also to be troubled with deafness, and would say, "Well, I am getting as dull as a post, I have not heard a word since you said so and so," being sure to mention a circumstance behind that at which he had really halted. He then took up the thread with his habitual smile of courtesy, as if forgetting his case entirely in the consideration of the lady's infirmity.

A very interesting account of her recollections of visits to Ashistiel and Abbotsford appeared in the February (1874) number of this magazine: it is short, but gives a sad and pathetic picture of the great man and his little grandson as they sat side by side at table.

The following letter on "Destiny" is from Mrs. Fletcher,* a distinguished citizen of Edinburgh at the commencement of this century, and a leader of the Whig society there. For that reason it is worthy of insertion here. Her son married Miss Clavering, as before mentioned.

Mrs. Fletcher to Miss Ferrier.

TADCASTER, April 16, 1831.

MY DEAR MISS FERRIER, — I should not have been so long in thanking you for your kind present, had I not wished to subject "Destiny" to a severer test than that chosen by the French dramatist. His old woman probably partook of the vivacity of her nation, but my old aunt, as Mary will tell you, is sick and often very sorrowful, and yet "Destiny" has made her laugh heartily, and cheated her of many wearisome hours of lamentation. My grandson, Archibald Taylor, too, forsook football and cricket for your fascinating book, and told me "he could sit up all night to see what had become of Ronald." Mr. Ribley and "Kitty, my dear" hit his comic fancy particularly. My two most bookish neighbors, one an Oxford divine, and the other a Cambridge student, declare that "Glenroy and M'Dow are exquisite originals." My own favorite, "Molly Macaulay," preserves her good humor to the last, though I thought you rather unmerciful in shutting her up so long in Johnnie's nursery. The fashionable heartlessness of Lady Elizabeth and her daughter is colored to the life, and the refreshment of returning to nature, truth, affection, and happiness at Inch Orran is admirably managed. Mary tells me you have returned from Fife with fresh materials for future volumes. Go on, dear Miss Ferrier, you are accountable for the talents entrusted to you. Go on to detect selfishness in all its various forms and foldings; to put pride and vanity to shame; to prove that vulgarity belongs more to character than condition, and that all who make the world their standard are essentially vulgar and low-minded, however noble their exterior or refined their manners may be, and that true dignity and elevation belong only to those to whom Milton's lines may be applied: —

> Thy care is fixed, and zealously attends
> To fill thy odorous lamp with deeds of light,
> And hope that reaps not shame.

The following letter from Joanna Baillie gives a very just and truthful criticism on "Destiny."

Miss Joanna Baillie to Miss Ferrier.

HAMPSTEAD, May 1831.

MY DEAR MADAM, — I received your very kind present of your last work about three weeks ago, and am very grateful for the pleasure I have had in reading it, and for being thus remembered by you. I thank you also for the pleasure and amusement which my sisters and some other friends have drawn from it. The first volume struck me as extremely clever, the description of the different characters, their dialogues, and the writer's own remarks, excellent. There is a spur both with the writer and the reader on the opening of a work which naturally gives the beginning of a story many advantages, but I must confess that your characters never forget their outset, but are well supported to the very end. Your Molly Macaulay* is a delightful creature, and

* Her "Memoir," by her daughter, Lady Richardson, was published not long since.

* The humble and devoted dependent of the proud chief, Glenroy, and governess to his children. She was drawn from life, for Mrs. Kinloch writes to her sister, Miss Ferrier: "Molly Macaulay is charming; her niece, Miss Cumming, is an old acquaintance of mine, and told me the character was drawn to the life. the footing she is on with Glenroy very naturally represented, to say nothing of the rising of her character at the end, when the weight of contempt is removed from her, which is very good and true to nature. Your minister, M'Dow,* hateful as he is, is very amusing, and a true representative of a few of the Scotch clergy, and with different language and manners of a great many of the English clergy — worldly, mean men, who boldly make their way into every great and wealthy family for the sake of preferment and good cheer. Your Lady Elizabeth, too, with all her selfishness and excess of absurdity, is true to herself throughout, and makes a very characteristic ending of it in her third marriage. But why should I tease you by going through the different characters? Suffice it to say that I thank you very heartily, and congratulate you on again having added a work of so much merit to our stock of national novels. Perhaps before this you have received a very short publication of mine on a very serious subject. I desired my bookseller to send a copy to you, inclosed along with one to your friend, Miss Mackenzie. How far you will agree with my opinions regarding it I cannot say, but of one thing I am sure, that you will judge with candor and charity. I should have sent one to Mr. Alison had I not thought it presumptuous in me to send such a work to any clergyman, and, with only one exception (a Presbyterian clergyman), I have abstained from doing so. I was very much obliged to Mrs. Mackenzie, Lord M's lady, for the letter she was so good as to write me in her sister-in-law's stead. If you should meet her soon, may I beg that you will have the goodness to thank her in my name? I was very sorry, indeed, to learn from her that Miss Mackenzie had been so ill, and was then so weak, and that the favorable account I had received of your eyes had been too favorable. With all good wishes to you, in which my sister begs to join me, — I remain, my dear madam, gratefully and sincerely yours, (Signed) J. BAILLIE.

Professor Wilson, "Christopher North," and his uncle, Mr. Robert Sym, W.S., "Timothy Tickler," discuss the merits of "Destiny" in the far-famed "Noctes."

Tickler. — I would also except Miss Susan Ferrier. Her novels, no doubt, have many defects, their plots are poor, their episodes disproportionate, and the characters too often caricatures; but they are all thickset with such specimens of sagacity, such happy traits of nature, such flashes of genuine satire, such easy humor, sterling good sense, and, above all — God only knows where she picked it up — mature and perfect knowledge of the world, that I think we may safely anticipate for them a different fate from what awaits even the cleverest of juvenile novels.

North. — They are the works of a very clever woman, sir, and they have one feature of true and melancholy interest quite peculiar to themselves. It is in them alone that the ultimate breaking-down and debasement of the Highland character has been depicted. Sir Walter Scott had fixed the enamel of genius over the last fitful gleams of their half-savage chivalry, but a humbler and sadder scene — the age of lucre-banished clans — of chieftains dwindled into imitation squires, and of chiefs content to barter the recollections of a thousand years for a few gaudy seasons of Almacks and Crockfords, the euthanasia of kilted aldermen and steamboat pibrochs was reserved for Miss Ferrier.

Tickler. — She in general fails almost as egregiously as Hooke does in the pathetic,* but in her last piece there is one scene of this description worthy of either Sterne or Goldsmith. I mean where the young man† supposed to have been lost at sea, revisits, after a lapse of time, the precincts of his own home, watching unseen in the twilight the occupations and bearings of the different members of the family, and resolving, under the influence of a most generous feeling, to keep the secret of his preservation.

North. — I remember it well, and you might bestow the same kind of praise on the whole character of Molly Macaulay. It is a picture of humble, kind-hearted, thorough-going devotion and long-suffering, indefatigable gentleness, of which, perhaps, no sinner of our gender could have adequately filled up the outline. Miss Ferrier appears habitually in the light of a hard satirist, but there is always a fund of romance at the bottom of every true woman's heart who has tried to stifle and suppress that element more carefully and pertinaciously, and yet who has drawn, in spite of herself, more genuine tears than the authoress of "Simple Susan."

The story of "Destiny," like its predecessors, is laid in Miss Ferrier's favorite Highlands, and it contains several picturesque and vivid descriptions of scenery there, Inveraray and its surroundings generally forming the model for her graphic pen. Much of this novel was written at Stirling Castle, when she was there on a visit to her sister, Mrs. Graham,‡ whose veraray, and Miss C., who is a very clever, pleasing person, seems delighted with the truth and spirit of the whole character of her aunty."

* Lord Jeffrey considered M'Dow "an entire and perfect chrysolite not to be meddled with."

* This is not true, as there are many pathetic passages in "Destiny," particularly between Edith, the heroine, and her faithless lover, Sir Reginald.

‡ Celebrated by Burns, the poet, for her beauty. She inspired his muse when turning the corner of George Street, Edinburgh. The lines addressed to her are to be found in his "Poems." husband, General Graham, was governor of that garrison. After the publication of this last work, and the offer of a thousand pounds from a London publisher for anything from her pen,* she entirely ceased from her literary labors, being content to rest upon the solid and enduring reputation her three "bantlings" (as she called her novels) had won for her. The following fragment, however, was found among her papers, and is the portrait of another old maid, and might serve as a companion to Miss Pratt: as it is amusing, and in the writer's satirical style, I lay it before my readers: —

Miss Betty Landon was a single lady of small fortune, few personal charms, and a most jaundiced imagination. There was no event, not even the most fortunate, from which Miss Betty could not extract evil; everything now the milk of human kindness with her turned to gall and vinegar. Thus, if any of her friends were married, she sighed over the miseries of the wedded state; if they were single, she bewailed their solitary, useless condition; if they were parents, she pitied them for having children; if they had no children, she pitied them for being childless. But one of her own letters will do greater justice to the turn of her mind than the most elaborate description.

"My Dear Miss ——, — I ought to have written to you long before now, but I have suffered so much from the constant changes of the weather, that the wonder is I am able to hold a pen. During the whole summer the heat was really quite intolerable, not a drop of rain or a breath of wind, the cattle dying for absolute want, the vegetables dear and scarce, and as for fruit — that, you know, in this town, is at all times scarce and bad, and particularly when there is the greatest occasion for it. In the autumn we never had two days alike, either wind or rain, or frost, or something or another; and as for our winter — you know what that is — either a constant splash of rain, or a frost like to take the skin off you. For these six weeks, I may say I have had a constant running at my head, with a return of my old complaint; but as for doctors, I see no good they do, except to load people's stomachs and pick their pockets: everything now is imposition; I really think the very pills are not what they were thirty years ago. How people with families continue to live is a mystery to me; and people still going on marrying, in the face of national debt, taxes, a new war, a starving population, ruined commerce, and no outlet for young men in any quarter — God only knows what is to be the end of all this! In spite of all this, these thoughtless young creatures, the Truemans, have thought proper to make out their marriage; he is just five-and-twenty, and she is not yet nineteen! so you may judge what a prudent, well-managed establishment it will be. He is in a good enough business at present, but in these times who can tell what's to happen? He may be wallowing in wealth to-day, and bankrupt to-morrow. His sister's marriage with Fairplay is now quite off, and her prospects for life, poor thing, completely wrecked! Her looks are entirely gone, and her spirits quite broken. She is not like the same creature, and to be sure, to a girl who had set her heart upon being married, it must be a great and severe disappointment, for this was her only chance, unless she tries India, and the expense of the outfit must be a complete bar to that. You would hear that poor Lady Oldhouse has had a son — it seemed a desirable thing, situated as they are with an entailed property; and yet when I look around me, and see the way that sons go on, the dissipation and extravagance, and the heart-break they are to their parents, I think a son anything but a blessing. No word of anything of that kind to the poor Richardsons; with all their riches, they are without any one to come after them. The Prowleys are up in the air at having got what they call 'a fine appointment' for their fourth son, but for my part I'm really sick of hearing of boys going to India, for after all what do they do there? I never hear of their sending home anything but black children, and when they come home themselves, what do they bring but yellow faces, worn-out constitutions, and livers like cocked-hats, crawling about from one watering-place to another, till they are picked up by some light-hearted fortune-hunting miss, who does not care twopence for them."

A beautiful and strong feature in Miss Ferrier's character was her intense devotion to her father, and when he died the loss to her was irreparable. She also was much attached to a very handsome brother, James; he was colonel of the Ninety-fourth Regiment, or Scots Brigade, and died in India in 1804, at the early age of twenty-seven. He had been at the siege of Seringapatam in 1799, and was much distinguished by the notice of Napoleon at Paris in February, 1803. Whence he writes to his sister Susan: —

I think I wrote you I had been introduced to the chief consul. I was on Sunday last presented to his lady, who I do not at all admire. The great man spoke to me then again, which is a very unusual thing, and I am told by the French I must be in his good graces; however, I myself rather think it was my good fortune only, at all events it has given me much pleasure, for it would have only been doing the thing half if he had not spoken to me. I do not think any of the pictures like him much, although most of them have some resemblance; they give him a frown in general, which he certainly has not — so far from it, that when he speaks he has one of the finest expressions possible.

Here, unfortunately, this interesting description comes abruptly to an end, the rest of the letter being lost. On account of failing health and increased bodily languor, Miss Ferrier latterly lived a very retired life, seeing few but very intimate friends, and, as she said, "We are more recluse than ever, as our little circle is yearly contracting, and my eyes are more and more averse to light than ever."

Again she writes: —

I can say nothing good of myself, my cough is very severe, and will probably continue so, at least as long as this weather lasts, but I have many comforts, for which I am thankful: amongst those I must reckon silence and darkness, which are my best companions at present.

For years she had suffered from her eyes, being nearly quite blind of one.* In 1830 she went to London to consult an oculist, but unfortunately derived little benefit. While there, she visited Isleworth, in order to see a villa belonging to Lord Cassillis, and which subsequently figured in "Destiny" as "Woodlands," Lady Waldegrave's rural retreat near London. A valued friend † who saw much of her remarked: —

The wonderful vivacity she maintained in the midst of darkness and pain for so many years, the humor, wit, and honesty of her character, as well as the Christian submission with which she bore her great privation and general discomfort when not suffering acute pain, made every one who knew her desirous to alleviate the tediousness of her days, and I used to read a great deal to her at one time, and I never left her darkened chamber without feeling that I had gained something better than the book we might be reading, from her quick perception of its faults and its beauties, and her unmerciful remarks on all that was mean or unworthy in conduct or expression.

But perhaps the most faithful picture of her is conveyed in this brief sentence from Scott's diary, who describes her as a gifted personage, having, besides her great talents, conversation, the least exigeante of any author-female, at least, whom I have ever seen among the long list I have encountered; simple, full of humor, and exceedingly ready at repartee, and all this without the least affectation of the blue-stocking.

From the natural modesty of her character she had a great dislike to her biography or memorial of her in any shape being written, for she destroyed all letters that might have been used for such a purpose, publicity of any kind being most distasteful to her, evidence of which is very clearly shown in the first part of this narrative. The chief secret of her success as a novelist (setting aside her great genius) was the great care and time she bestowed on the formation of each novel — an interval of six years occurring between each, the result being delineations of character that are unique.

Unfortunately there is little to relate regarding her childhood, that most interesting period of human existence in the lives of (and which is generally distinguished by some uncommon traits of character) people of genius — save that she had for a school companion and playfellow the late Lord Brougham, the distinguished statesman; she was remarkable also for her power of mimicry. An amusing anecdote of this rather dangerous gift is the following. Her brothers and sisters returned home from a ball, very hungry, and entered her room, where they supposed she lay asleep, and, while discussing the events of the evening and the repast they had procured by stealth (unknown to their father), they were suddenly put to flight by the sounds and voice, as they thought, of their dreaded parent ascending the stairs, and in their confusion and exit from the room overturned chairs and tables, much to the amusement of little Susan, who, no doubt, enjoyed the fright and commotion she had caused, and who mimicked under the cover of the bedclothes the accents of her redoubtable parent — a fit punishment, as she thought, for their ruthless invasion of her chamber, and their not offering her a share of their supper. An old Miss Peggy Campbell (sister to Sir Islay Campbell, president of the Court of Session) was also taken off by her, and so like that her father actually came into the room, where she was amusing her hearers, thinking that Miss Campbell was really present. In conclusion, it only remains to be said that when she died a blank was left in her native city that has not been filled since, the modern Athens having sadly deteriorated in the wit, learning, and refinement that so distinguished her in the days that are gone.

* Lady Morgan, a fellow-sufferer from her eyes, was most anxious she should consult Mr. Alexander, the eminent oculist, as he entirely cured her after four years' expectation of total blindness.

† Lady Richardson.

ABERGLAUBE.

I KNOW of a noble lady
Who has never lifted her veil;
Her hand, on the aching temples,
Is tender, and cool, and pale;

Her raiment is black and crimson,
Her voice, which is seldom loud,
Is drowned by a lover's whisper,
But not by a surging crowd;

And her speech, which is heard within us,
Soundeth as if from far,
And she calleth the things that are not
To rebuke the things that are.

Therefore her word is the pillar
Of whatever standeth on earth,
And if aught on earth be precious,
Her sentence gives it worth.

She is very staid in her going,
As if she knew that haste
Would scatter the manna, hidden,
For wayfarers to taste.

Yet whithersoever we hasten,
We find her waiting there;
And she walks where the ways are foulest,
As if she trod upon air.

I have told of her speech and her going;
Of her deeds there is this to tell,
She lifteth up to heaven,
She casteth down to hell.

On earth she layeth foundations,
And others build thereupon;
When they set the headstone with shoutings
She is far away and gone.

For her road is with them that labor,
Her rest is with them that grieve;
Her name is Faith, while you serve her;
When you lose her, Make Believe.

OLDEN TIMES AND PRESENT.

ANCIENT days of chivalry,
Tournament and falconry;
Ladies fair and barons bold;
Thrilling days, those days of old.
Battled towers and moated steeps,
Turret walls and donjon keeps,
Drawbridge closed and warder grave,
Retainers numerous and brave.
Mailèd sentries keeping guard,
Troubadour and minstrel bard
Singing lays 'neath lady's bower,
Serenades at evening hour.
Thrilling days, those days of old,
For ladies fair and warriors bold.

See! a pageant passes by,
In all the pride of chivalry;
Armèd knights on chargers gay,
Warriors eager for the fray.
Burnished helm and glittering lance,
In the golden sunshine glance;
Parting words from lady fair,
Tress of dark or golden hair.
Badge on arm, a woven band,
Parting gift from her fair hand;
The knight departs for fields of France,
To win his fair by spear and lance.

Gone those days of pageantry,
Valor and knight-errantry;
Only battle that of life;
Race for wealth the keenest strife.
Love and truth and honor sold,
Bartered for the gain of gold.
Fair ones' hearts not now are won
By deeds of daring nobly done.

Only battle, that of life.
Need it be ignoble strife?
Human hearts are battle-plains,
Where passions rage and warfare reigns.
Foemen ranged on either side:
Hate and Love, Forgiveness, Pride, Strength and Weakness, Dread and Might;
Direst battles those to fight.
Greatest victors those who win
Conquest over Self and Sin.

STANZAS.

THERE is a tender hue that tips the first young leaves of spring;
A trembling beauty in their notes when young birds learn to sing;
A purer look when first on earth the gushing brook appears;
A liquid depth in infant eyes that fades with summer years.
There is a rosy tint at dawn that flies the brighter day;
A sound of innocence and joy when children shout at play;
A laughing breeze at dewy morn that faints with sultry noon;
A silver veil that softest hangs around the maiden moon.
The scent that roses fully blown about their beauty fling
Is sweet, but cannot with the breath of early buds compare;
So doth there bloom a gentle love in life's enchanted spring,
That fills the breast with feelings age can never hope to share.

EPPING FOREST.

BY ALFRED R. WALLACE.

OUR greatest legal authorities will not admit that the people of England have any right whatever to enjoy the beautiful scenery of their native land, beyond such glimpses as may be obtained of it from highways and footpaths. Legally there is no such thing as a "common," answering to the popular idea of a tract of land over which anybody has a right to roam at will.* Every supposed common is said by the lawyers to belong absolutely to some body of individuals, to a lord or lords of the manor and the surrounding owners of land who have rights of common over it; and if these parties agree together, the said common may be enclosed, and the public shut out of it forever. The thousands of tourists who roam every summer over the healthy wastes of Surrey or the breezy downs of Sussex, who climb the peaks or revel on the heather banks of Wales or Scotland, are every one of them trespassers in the eye of the law; and there is, perhaps, no portion of these favorite resorts of our country-loving people that it is not in the power of some individual or body of individuals to enclose and treat as private property.

How far this legal assumption accords with justice or sound policy, it is not our purpose now to inquire; that question having been treated by many able pens, and being one which will assuredly not become less important or less open to discussion as time goes on. We have now a far pleasanter task, that of calling attention to one of our ancient woodland wastes, Epping Forest, which, in the words of an act of Parliament passed at the end of last session, is to be forever preserved as "an open space for the recreation and enjoyment of the public." Here at length every one will have a right to roam unmolested, and to enjoy the beauties which nature so lavishly spreads around when left to her own wild luxuriance. We shall possess, close to our capital, one real forest, whose wildness and sylvan character is to be studiously maintained, and which will possess an ever-increasing interest as furnishing a sample of those broad tracts of woodland which once covered so much of our country, and which play so conspicuous a part in our early history and national folk-lore. Unfortunately the spoilers have been at work, and much of the area now dedicated to the people has been more or less denuded of its woodland covering and otherwise deteriorated. Before, however, we describe the present state of the forest, and discuss the important question of how best to restore its beauty and increase its interest, it will be well to give our readers some notion of its former extent and of the circumstances that have led to its preservation.

It appears by the reports of the Epping Forest Commission (1875 and 1877) that in the reign of Charles I. the forest of Essex, or of Waltham, as it was then called, comprised the whole district between the rivers Lea and Roding, extending southward to Stratford Bridge, thus including the site of the great Stratford Junction Station, and northward to the village of Roydon, a distance in a straight line of sixteen miles. Much of this wide area was, however, even at that early date, only forest in a legal sense, for it included many towns and villages and much cultivated land, and these seem to have left the actual unenclosed forest not much larger than in the first half of the present century. We are told, for example, that during the two centuries from 1600 to 1800 only eighty acres of the forest were enclosed, and that even up to 1851 barely six hundred acres had been enclosed. The unenclosed forest at that date is estimated by the commissioners at fifty-nine hundred and twenty-eight acres. Then came the development of our railway system, and the discovery of Californian and Australian gold. The wealth of the country began to increase at an unprecedented rate; the growth of London became more rapid than ever, and its citizens more and more acquired the habit of residing in the country. Land everywhere rose in value, the wastes of Epping were temptingly near at hand, and illegal enclosures went on at such a pace that during the twenty years between 1851 and 1871 they amounted to almost exactly half the entire area, leaving only three thousand and one acres still open.

This wholesale process of enclosure, which, if quietly submitted to, would soon have left nothing of Epping Forest but the name, roused the indignation of many who dwelt near the forest or felt an interest in it, and a powerful agitation was commenced, in which the corporation of the city of London and many members of the legislature took a prominent part. In 1871 the Epping Forest commissioners were appointed by act of Parliament, and they gave in their final report only in the spring of last year. But in the mean time a most important case had been decided in the courts. At the request of the corporation of London, which supplied all the necessary funds, the commissioners of sewers (as freeholders in the forest) commenced a suit in chancery against the lords of manors and persons to whom they had granted lands, claiming a right of common over all the waste lands of the forest, and that all enclosures made since 1851 should be declared illegal. The master of the rolls decided (on the 24th November, 1874) in favor of the plaintiffs, and against this decision the defendants did not appeal. It has therefore been made the basis of legislation in the act just passed, which declares, that the whole five thousand nine hundred and twenty-eight acres which the commissioners found to have been open waste of the forest in 1851 are to be treated as common lands, and (the lords of manors or their grantees being first duly compensated for their manorial rights and property in the soil) that the whole of this extensive area, with the exception of lands built upon before 1871, gardens, and pleasure-grounds, is to be preserved "uninclosed and unbuilt upon as an open space for the recreation and enjoyment of the public."

Large sums of money were, however, required to buy up the manorial rights, and although this might possibly have been done by public subscription, the necessity for this course was obviated by the liberality and public spirit of the city of London, which offered to supply all the needful funds, not only for this purchase, but also for all work that might be found necessary for the preservation, management, and replanting of the forest. This munificent offer was accepted, and the very reasonable desire of the corporation to have the chief voice in the management of the newly acquired domain in trust for the public, was acceded to by the legislature; and the act accordingly declares that Epping Forest is to be managed by a committee consisting of twelve members of the Corporation of London, and four verderers, chosen by the commoners of the twelve parishes in which the forest is situated.

Let us now take a brief glance at the present state of the land thus dedicated to the public, before proceeding to discuss the question, how it may be made the most of. First, and nearest to London, we have the open expanse of Wanstead Flats, not half a mile from the Forest Gate Station of the Great Eastern Railway, and which, together with some illegally enclosed ground northwards towards the village of Wanstead, comprises an area of nearly five hundred acres. Crossing it from north to south opposite Lake House is an avenue of lime-trees, never very fine, and now rapidly dying from the combined effects of want of shelter and the smoky atmosphere. With this exception almost the whole of the flats is denuded of trees, and offers a drear expanse of wiry grass interspersed with a few tufts of broom, stretching for more than a mile in length and not far short of half a mile wide. On the northern side considerable excavations have been made for brickfields, and here, where the ground rises somewhat, there is a very nice turf, with fern, broom, and even heather, in considerable patches. Northwestward is a large piece of recovered land, about fifty acres in extent, dotted over with oaks and bushes, and intersected by a fine double avenue of limes a third of a mile long, but many of the trees, in the part nearest London, are rapidly dying. Planes are probably the only trees which would now thrive well here. This is, on the whole, a rather pretty piece of half-wild woodland, well worth careful preservation for the use of the dense population surrounding it.

To the west of Wanstead and Snaresbrook, and northward towards Woodford, is a fine expanse of unenclosed land, nearly a mile long, and from a quarter to half a mile wide; and when some illegal enclosures are thrown open, this will be continued uninterruptedly to Woodford Green. The southern portion of this tract between Wanstead Orphan Asylum and Whip's Cross has been utterly devastated by gravel-digging, the whole surface being a succession of pits and hollows with stagnant pools of water, and a few miserable oaks left standing on mounds where the gravel has been dug away around them. One would think that here the lords of the manors had infringed on the rights of the commoners, by destroying the pasture and even the surface soil on which any herbage can grow; and that in equity they should be called on to pay damages instead of receiving payment for their alleged property in the soil, which they have here succeeded in rendering almost wholly worthless either for use or enjoyment. Northwestward, towards Woodford Green, is a rather pretty piece of wild forest land, with open grassy glades, intervening thickets, and ponds swarming with interesting aquatic plants. There are, however, very few ornamental trees, the oaks being mostly small, with a quantity of miserable pollard-beeches hardly more sightly than so many mops.

Passing Highham Park we come upon a large extent of illegally enclosed land, now to be thrown open, and much of it already given up. Between Woodford Green and Chingford Hatch there are about sixty acres of poor grass and fallow land adorned with a few bushes and one fine oak-tree, but sloping gently towards the north-west, and with extensive views over the wooded country beyond. Further north there are more than a hundred acres of small enclosures — rough pasture, fallow land, or cultivated fields, dotted with a few poor trees, and at present far from picturesque, but with an undulating surface offering considerable opportunity for improvement. To the west these fields are bounded by Chingford Brook, by the side of which are some very handsome willow-trees growing in stiff clay and indicating what this part of the land is adapted for. A little to the north-east is the new village of Buckhurst Hill, to the south-east of which is a fine piece of enclosed forest, about a hundred acres in extent and called the Lodge Bushes.

We now enter the northern and grandest division of the forest, which stretches away for a distance of five miles from Queen Elizabeth's Lodge to near the town of Epping. North and west of the lodge are nearly three hundred acres of illegally enclosed fields, now dreary fallows and poor pastures, but with fine slopes affording opportunity for producing new effects of forest-scenery. To the west and south of Loughton village are more extensive enclosures of several hundred acres of land, much of it arable or pasture land of good quality; and further north, near Theydon Church and on towards Epping, are other enclosures of less extent, and almost all of this will again be thrown open to the forest.

To the north of the road from Loughton to High Beech there is a vast extent of rough forest land, nearly three miles long and from half a mile to a mile wide, which has all been recovered after having been illegally enclosed by the lords of the manors, but not before they have denuded large portions of it of everything deserving the name of a tree, and left it a scrubby waste without any pretensions to sylvan beauty. Here are square miles of land, once as luxuriant as the unenclosed portions further west, but now presenting a hideous assemblage of stunted, mop-like pollards rising from a thicket of scrubby bushes.

From this brief sketch of the present condition of Epping Forest, with more especial reference to the newly recovered portions of it, we find, that probably not much less than a thousand acres, which are now or have recently been enclosed and cultivated fields, will soon be thrown into the forest; while, in addition to this, there are considerably more than a thousand acres which are almost entirely denuded of trees and in a generally unsightly condition. The question at once arises, How can these wide tracts of land be best dealt with for the future recreation and enjoyment of the public? The act of Parliament, it is true, empowers the conservators to form playgrounds and cricket-grounds in suitable places, and some portions of these lands may be so applied. But a very few acres will serve for this purpose, or indeed are at all suitable for it; and there will remain by far the larger portion to be otherwise dealt with. After all the agitation, all the arduous legal struggles, all the liberal, nay lavish, expenditure of money to secure this land to the people, it cannot surely be left as it is. Some steps must be taken to make it beautiful and picturesque in the future, and at least as well adapted for the recreation and enjoyment of coming generations as the old forest was for those which have passed away. The obvious course, and that which will at once occnr to every one, is to plant this ground in some way or other. It was once all forest. It is as a forest that the whole domain is dedicated to the public; and it is the forest scenery which has always given to the entire district its peculiar charm. Our country still has wide tracts of common and of open wastes, as well as extensive enclosed woods, and parks, and plantations; but our genuine forests are few and far between. Undoubtedly, therefore, as forest or woodland of some kind this land should be restored; and the question we have to decide is, Of what kind?

Some may say, restore it as much as possible to its ancient state; plant it with oaks and beeches, with a sprinkling of elm, birch, and ash. This may be the easiest and the simplest, but it is certainly the least advantageous mode of dealing with the land. While these trees were growing — for a couple of generations at least — they would be utterly uninteresting woods, and even in the far distant future would hardly surpass many other parts of the forest, while they would increase the monotony which is its chief defect. Another plan would be, to make a mixed planting of choicer trees, shrubs, and evergreens, which would be more beautiful while growing, and would in time form a forest of a more diversified character. Or again, a regular arboretum might be formed, a great variety of trees, and especially choice pines and firs, being planted so as to form specimens. Either of these plans would at once possess some interest; but they would be utterly deficient in novelty, or in that special and peculiar interest we should aim at, when we have to deal with such an extensive and varied area as the recovered portions of Epping Forest. We have already fine mixed plantations and woods, and many splendid arboretums; and at Kew we have in process of formation a magnificent collection of specimen trees which it would be out of place to attempt to imitate, while the expense would be far greater than almost any other kind of planting.

The plan I have now to propose is very different from all these. It is one which would be perfectly novel, perfectly practicable, intensely interesting as a great arboricultural experiment, attractive alike to the uneducated and to the scientific, not more expensive than any other plan, and perfectly in harmony with the character of the domain as essentially "a forest." It is, briefly, to form several distinct portions of forest, each composed solely of trees and shrubs which are natives of one of the great forest regions of the temperate zone.

In order to understand how interesting and how instructive this would be, and, especially, to how great an extent it would add to the variety and beauty of the scenery, while retaining to the fullest extent its character as a wild and picturesque woodland district, it will be necessary to give a brief sketch of the great forests of the north temperate zone, to point out their comparative richness, their distinctive characters, and their different styles of beauty; and in doing this I shall avail myself largely of the writings of the greatest authority on the subject, Professor Asa Gray, who has made the relations and origin of the various forest regions of the northern hemisphere the study of his life.

The two northern continents, America on the one side, Europe and Asia on the other, have each two great and contrasted forest regions, an eastern and a western; and in both cases the eastern is very rich, while the western is comparatively poor. The trees of our own country belong to the western or European forest region, which includes also the adjacent parts of western Asia. That region contains about eighty-five different kinds of trees (seventeen being conifers, or firs and pines), and of these only twenty-eight are really natives of Britain, about twenty being tolerably common, and forming the wild trees of our woods and wastes, with which we are all more or less familiar.

If we compare the European set of trees with that of the forest region of eastern America we find a wonderful difference. Instead of a total of eighty-five, we have there no less than one hundred and fifty-five different kinds of trees, and a large number of those are very distinct from those of Europe, constituting altogether new types of vegetation, many of which, however, we have long cultivated for ornament. Among these are magnolias, tulip-trees, red and yellow horse-chestnuts, the locust or common acacia, the honey-locust (a far handsomer tree), the liquid ambar, the sassafras, the hickories, the catalpa, the butternut and black walnut, many fine oaks, the hemlock spruce, the deciduous cypress, and a host of others less generally known. Most of these differ from our native trees by their more varied and beautiful foliage, by many of them being flowering trees often of the most magnificent kind, and, what is equally important, by the glorious tints which a large proportion of them assume in autumn. Every one has heard of the rich autumnal tints in Canada and the United States as something of which our woods, beautiful as they are, give hardly any idea. Instead of the yellows and browns of our trees, there is in the American forest every tint from the richest scarlet and crimson to yellow, which, combining in endless varieties, give a splendor to the autumnal landscape which is worth a journey across the Atlantic to behold. The Virginia creeper, which drapes our house with a crimson mantle even amid the smoke of London, the red maple and the sumach of our shrubberies, give us some notion of these tints, but hardly any idea of the effect they produce when their colors are lavishly spread over a varied landscape. Most of the trees which acquire these brilliant hues grow as well with us as in their native country. Some American trees, strange to say, seem to grow even better, for the beautiful ash-leaved negundo is a small tree in its native country, rarely exceeding thirty feet high, while Loudon tells us that it grows to forty feet in England; the white maple reaches only forty feet in America and fifty feet here; and a similar difference occurs with many other trees. So favorable, indeed, is our climate to the growth of trees generally, that, according to Professor Asa Gray, we "can grow double or treble the number of trees that the United States can," although their native species are five times as numerous as ours!

There is therefore really no difficulty in producing in England an almost exact copy of a North American forest, with all its variety of foliage, with its succession of ornamental flowers, and with its glorious autumnal tints; yet this has never been attempted either in this country or in any part of Europe. That many of these trees will reach noble dimensions there is no doubt whatever. A honey-locust (Gleditschia triacanthos) in Professor Owen's garden at Richmond Park was, in 1872, a magnificent tree nearly eighty feet high, and was then sixty years old. There is at Dorking a tulip-tree about the same size; while the many beautiful American oaks, maples, birches, and poplars, form noble forest trees in many of our parks and pleasure-grounds. Were such trees planted in masses, they would grow upwards more rapidly and produce a forest-like effect in from twenty to forty years; while from their varied foliage and general novelty of aspect, they would be both beautiful and interesting at a far earlier period.

Here, then, we may do something which has never been done before, which is sure to succeed (since it is only growing trees in masses which have already been grown singly), and which will ultimately produce a real addition to our landscape, while the individual trees will be a constant source of gratification and delight. As yet we have only mentioned the different kinds of trees, but North America is not less rich in beautiful shrubs to form an underwood to the forest or open patches here and there in its recesses. The rhododendrons, azalias, and kalmias, will grow as underwood wherever there is peat or loam, while the well-known snowberry, the aloe-like yuccas, several fine spiræas, American blackberries, and many others, would grow anywhere.

Now let us suppose one of the most suitable of the open tracts recovered at Epping to be thus converted into an American forest, in which as many trees and shrubs peculiar to eastern North America as we know to be hardy, are planted in masses and variously intermingled. Such an experiment would excite interest at every stage of its growth. The paths and open glades intersecting it would be visited year after year to see how it was thriving, and this would necessarily lead many of its visitors to acquire an intelligent interest in the trees, and shrubs, and flowers of other lands. And as time rolled on, and one kind of tree after another arrived at its period of blossoming, and displayed each succeeding year in greater perfection its glowing autumnal tints, the "American forest" would become celebrated far and wide, and would attract visitors who would never think of going to see the more homely beauties of a native woodland, and still less a young plantation of common trees.

Before proceeding to describe the other characteristic "forest pictures" which might be produced in the wilds of Epping, it will be well at once to answer an objection sure to be made, that the kind of planting here proposed, consisting wholly of foreign, and largely of rare trees and shrubs, would be very expensive. This, however, is a complete error. Many of the trees in question are certainly rather expensive when large specimens are purchased of nursery-men; but this is chiefly because there is so little demand for them, and they occupy ground and require attention for many years unprofitably. But nearly all these American trees could be raised from seed almost as cheaply as the very commonest kinds. The seeds could be obtained from their native country at a mere nominal cost; and by forming a nursery-ground, small at first, and increased year by year, in which to raise them, their removal at the most suitable age and season to the places which they were permanently to occupy would ensure rapid and vigorous growth. The great item of expense in forming any extensive plantation is labor, and this would be little if any more in growing one kind of tree than another, supposing both to be raised from seed and to be equally hardy. The question of expense cannot, therefore, be of importance, as compared with the vast difference in permanent results between the plan here advocated and that of the ordinary English wood, the mixed plantation, or the systematic arboretum. The latter, indeed, would be very much more expensive, because, few specimens being wanted, it would not be worth while raising them from seed, while an arboretum would require more weeding and pruning, as well as some amount of permanent gardening, which in a forest is unnecessary.

Another important feature of such a forest would be, that it would furnish reliable information as to what valuable timber trees may be profitably grown in this country. Among American trees the sugar-maple, hickory, tulip-tree, redwood, and locust, are well known as producing valuable timbers for special purposes; and there are many trees of eastern Europe and Asia equally valuable, which it might be profitable to grow largely. As, however, they have been hitherto almost always grown singly for ornament, we have been unable to test, either the rapidity of their growth under more natural conditions, or the quality of their timber at different ages; all which points would be determined, were they grown in quantity as here proposed, by the mere periodical thinnings-out necessary to encourage the free development of those that were to remain and form the permanent forest.

Passing now to the western or Californian coast of North America, we find another forest region, remarkably different from that of the Eastern States. It is characterized at once by extreme richness in coniferous trees, and what Professor Asa Gray terms its "desperate poverty" in deciduous kinds, of which it has only one-fourth as many as eastern America, and one-half as many as Europe.* Almost all the trees which are especially characteristic of eastern America are wanting, their place being chiefly supplied by peculiar species of oaks, maples, ashes, birches, and poplars, groups which are equally abundant on both sides of the Atlantic. When we turn to the coniferous trees, however, western America stands pre-eminent, possessing nearly twice as many different kinds as the Eastern States, and nearly three times as many as all Europe, while it exhibits the grandest, tallest, and most beautiful firs, pines, and cypresses in the world. Here we find the giant Wellingtonia and redwood, the magnificent Douglas fir, the exquisitely beautiful piceas, nobilis and lasiocarpa, such fine cypresses as Lawsoniana and Lambertiana, such unequalled pines as insignis and macrocarpa, the well-known handsome thujas, gigantea and Lobbii, and many others. These glorious trees form forests by themselves, surpassing in grandeur those of any other temperate land; and every one of these grows freely and rapidly with us (which they do not in eastern America), and, if grown under natural conditions, would probably attain nearly as great a size as in their native country. Their extreme beauty has, however, caused them to be almost always grown singly as specimens, and even thus the rapidity of their growth is often amazing. The Wellingtonia will reach twenty feet in ten years; the Douglas fir grows even more rapidly when young, and a specimen at Dropmore, fifty years old, is now more than a hundred feet high, while its branches, spreading on the ground, cover a space sixty-six feet in diameter. The beautiful grass-green Pinus insignis at the same place reached sixty-eight feet high in thirty-four years; and were these trees planted in masses, so as to draw each other upward, and cause the lower branches to drop off as in their native forests, they would almost certainly grow even more rapidly, and the present generation might walk amid forests of these noble trees not much inferior to those which excite so much admiration on the mountains of California and Oregon.

Here, again, there is no question of success. The experiment has been made already for us hundreds of times over, and we have only to profit by it. These trees succeed well in every part of England without exception, and they would certainly not fail at Epping. An expanse of a hundred or two hundred acres covered with the coniferous trees of western America, planted in masses, groups, or belts, and with winding paths, broad glades, and occasional shrub-planted openings admitting of free access to every part of it, would probably be even more attractive than the forest of eastern America. For many of these trees are exquisitely beautiful objects in their young state, the varying colors of the under and upper surfaces of their foliage and the delicate tints of the new growth in summer, being especially remarkable. Their different rates of growth would soon cause some species to tower above others, and thus produce that charm of variety which is wanting where large areas are planted with trees which all grow at about the same rate.

The next forest type of which we should have an example, is that of eastern Europe and western Asia, containing all those interesting trees of the European forest region which are not natives of our own country. Here we should grow the various European pines and firs, including the symmetrical pinsapo of Spain, the well-known silver fir of the Alps, and the allied but more beautiful Nordman's fir of Russia. Here, too, we should have the nettle-tree, the Judas-tree, the flowering ash, the wild olive, the hop-hornbeam, the almost evergreen Neapolitan alder, and our old favorites the plane, the walnut, the laburnum, and the Portugal laurel. Along with these we should plant the many beautiful and often sweet-scented shrubs of the same districts — laurestinas, myrtles, Spanish broom, coronillas, cistuses, Mediterranean heaths, the favorite lilac, and the luscious Philadelphus or syringa. A smaller space would serve to exhibit these trees and shrubs in forest growth, as they are less numerous and generally not of large size; but as they comprise so many of our garden favorites, the forest of eastern Europe would certainly be very attractive.

We now come to the most remarkable of all the forest regions of the temperate zone — that of eastern Asia and Japan. This forest is even richer than that of eastern America in deciduous trees, and at the same time richer than that of western America in conifers;* and, as it is only partially explored, while the others are well known, its comparative richness will certainly increase as future discoveries are made. We find here a number of the deciduous trees of eastern America represented by closely allied species, and, in addition, a number of altogether peculiar types. Among these are the well-known ailanthus, on the leaves of which silk-worms are fed, and which grows with extreme rapidity; the beautiful paulownia, with flowers like those of a foxglove; the handsome Sophora japonica; and of smaller trees and shrubs, the winter-flowering chimonanthus, the crimson-flowered japonica which adorns our walls in early spring, the favorite weigelia, the yellow-flowered forsythia, the red-berried aucuba, and, last, but not least important for our purpose, the camellia. This glorious evergreen is really as hardy as the common laurel, and will grow out of doors in perfect health and vigor. Its beautiful flowers will, indeed, be often destroyed by the wet and frosts of our springs, but if a sunny bank in the midst of the protecting frosts were covered with these shrubs, they would blossom abundantly whenever we had a mild spring, and would then, indeed, be worth a walk to see; while at all times their splendid glossy green foliage would be a delightful spectacle.

Even more varied and more beautiful than the conifers of California are those of Japan and China, of which there are no less than forty-five species belonging to nineteen generic groups, many of which are altogether peculiar to this region. Here are the elegant cryptomeria and retinosporas, the remarkable salisburia, or gingko-tree, a pine with foliage like that of a gigantic maiden-hair fern, and the hardly less curious sciadopitys, or umbrella-pine. To these we may add the fine cunninghamia, the funereal cypress, and some interesting species of arbor-vitæ.

The space required for this Asiatic forest would not at first be large, as only the most distinct and interesting species need be made use of, while many are not yet to be obtained in this country. Some of the Japanese trees grow slowly, but it is not improbable that when planted in greater quantities they might make more rapid progress. Anyhow the plants themselves are usually so peculiar and generally so beautiful, that in every stage of their growth they would be sure to prove attractive to the public.

We might, however, increase the extent of our Asiatic forest by adding to it another small piece of land in order to cultivate several beautiful plants which characterize the temperate regions of the higher Himalayas, among which are the favorite deodara, some beautiful maples, birches, and oaks, the elegant leycesteria, some fine berberries, rhododendrons, and other interesting plants.

There remain the temperate forests of the southern hemisphere, chiefly represented in Chili and Patagonia, in Australia, and in New Zealand, and comprising a number of very interesting plants, many of which will grow in this country. From Chili there is a peculiar pine, libocedrus, and the well-known araucaria, which when grown in avenues or masses produces a very grand effect. Many of our favorite shrubs come from this region, as the golden-balled buddlea, the lovely flowering evergreens, escallonia and berberis, and the pretty cross-leaved veronica. These would form exquisite flowering thickets to set off the stiff forms of the araucarias. From Australia and New Zealand more variety may be obtained, though comparatively few of the trees of these countries have yet been proved to be perfectly hardy. The common Eucalyptus globulus, celebrated as a remover of miasma, suffers much from the frost when young, but may possibly become hardier as it grows older. Other species of eucalyptus are much more hardy and more ornamental. One raised from seed by myself has, in an exposed situation, reached a height of twenty feet in five years, though once cut down by frost. Another mountain species raised at the same time, is only five feet high, but is perfectly hardy, the leaves being quite uninjured by frost, and it will probably grow into a lofty tree. Some of the acacias are also probably hardy, as they grow well and flower beautifully out of doors; but the most elegant of these southern trees are the pittosporums of New Zealand, which in five years have formed splendid bushes nearly six feet high and as much in diameter, with delicate foliage of a pale green color which does not appear to suffer the least from any ordinary winter's frost. These will grow into small flowering trees fifteen or twenty feet high, having an appearance quite distinct from anything at present in cultivation. The celebrated huon pine of Tasmania is another fine tree of this region; and one of the proteaceæ (Lomatia longifolia) has lived more than twenty years in a garden near London. These, with such shrubs as the white-flowered leptospermum and the purple veronicas, will form a group of plants well illustrating the beautiful evergreen woods of the southern hemisphere.

There remain still the climbing plants, which form a conspicuous ornament of all these forests, and many of which are quite as hardy as the trees they decorate. We might adorn our North American forest with festoons of the Virginia creeper and wild vine, while the red trumpet-creeper and the passion-flower of the Southern States would form beautiful objects, climbing over the bushes and among the branches of trees, and displaying their showy blossoms, which are hardly surpassed by the denizens of our hothouses. The Asiatic forest would in like manner be ornamented with lilac-flowered clematises, the Japan honeysuckle, the evergreen banksian rose, the winter-flowering yellow jasmine, and the glorious wistaria, the very queen of climbing plants. It is the opinion of some eminent horticulturists, that even the superb Chilian Lapageria rosea would grow freely out of doors in a suitable soil and situation, and it might well be tried in association with the trees and shrubs of the same country.

Quitting now that portion of Epping Forest which requires to be replanted, we find extensive tracts still more or less covered with wood, and which require, comparatively speaking, little to be done to them; but that little should be well considered and carefully executed. The preservation of "the natural aspect of the forest," as specially mentioned in the act of Parliament, should always be kept prominently in view, and this principle should influence the character of such footbridges, dams, banks, or other building or engineering works as may be found absolutely necessary. Every such work should be carefully studied, so as to be at once in harmony with the surroundings, permanent, and picturesque. Unpainted wood and stone, both as bold and substantial as possible, should alone be employed, brick being, whenever possible, avoided as both commonplace and unsightly. Wherever possible, earthwork or natural masses of rock should be used, so as to blend imperceptibly with the surrounding forest scenery. Among the works absolutely needed for the enjoyment of the forest are numerous footpaths; and these should be systematically laid out in connection with broader "rides" traversing the larger wooded tracts between well-marked points on either border, thus serving as a means of extricating any unfortunate tourist who may have lost his way. Grassy or shrubby openings might also be occasionally formed in the most densely wooded portions, such clear spaces being very pleasing, admitting air and sunshine, and forming agreeable contrasts. Trees which are any way remarkable for their age, size, or picturesque beauty should be cleared of surrounding thicket, so that they may be properly seen and admired; and this comprises nearly all that need be done here, beyond the ordinary forester's duty of keeping up a sufficient stock of healthy young trees to supply the place of those which die or are accidentally destroyed.

Among the powers conferred upon the conservators is that of draining where needed, and as very great misconception prevails on this subject a few remarks here may not be out of place. People have been so accustomed to hear "draining" spoken of as one of the greatest and most necessary of improvements, that they may not unnaturally think it equally necessary in a forest as in a farm or private estate. It is true that where some particular timber is to be grown for profit, draining may be necessary, but when you only require trees growing naturally, so as to produce beauty and variety, then every variety of soil and every degree of moisture are beneficial. Forests as a rule grow better in damp than in dry soils, and there is no ground so wet that some kinds of trees will not flourish in it. It is only necessary, therefore, to plant the right kinds of trees, and the wet places may be covered with wood even more quickly than the dry.

It must be remembered, too, that a proportion of bog and swamp and damp hollows, are essential parts of the "natural aspect" of every great forest tract. It is in and around such places that many trees and shrubs grow most luxuriantly; it is such spots that will be haunted by interesting birds and rare insects; and there alone many of the gems of our native flora may still be found. Every naturalist searches for such spots as his best hunting-grounds. Every lover of nature finds them interesting and enjoyable. Here the wanderer from the great city may perchance find such lovely flowers as the fringed buck-bean, the delicate bog pimpernell and marsh campanula, the insect-catching sundew, and the pretty spotted orchises.* These and many other choice plants would be exterminated if, by too severe drainage, all such wet places were made dry; the marsh birds and rare insects which haunted them would disappear, and thus a chief source of recreation and enjoyment to that numerous and yearly-increasing class who delight in wild flowers, and birds, and insects, would be seriously interfered with.

There is also a wider and more general point of view from which it may be important to survey this question of drainage. Epping Forest lies within the area of scanty rainfall, which extends over much of the eastern part of England, and as its surface consists largely of gravel, the rain-water rapidly passes away, and thus tends to create an aridity not favorable to luxuriant vegetation. Now, every marsh and bog and swampy flat acts as a natural reservoir, retaining a part of the rainfall, and permanently moistening both the atmosphere and the surrounding soil. In order to improve the climate and foster the vegetation of the forest, it should be the object of its conservators to retain as much as possible of the rainfall water within the area under their jurisdiction. The forest streams might be dammed up at intervals, so as to form permanent ponds or lakes, by which means, combined with the natural reservoirs already alluded to, and aided by the check to evaporation which additional planting will produce, the forest itself and even the surrounding country would be permanently benefited. By extensive draining, on the other hand, water is carried away rapidly from the district, and with it much fertilizing matter; the climate is made dryer, and the growth of herbage as well as of trees and shrubs is rendered less luxuriant.

Coming back now to the general question of forest distribution in the northern hemisphere, many of my readers must have been struck by the singular inequality and remarkable contrasts of the four great temperate forests of which we have proposed that illustrations should be grown at Epping. In a lecture recently delivered before the Harvard University Natural History Society, Professor Asa Gray has given an explanation of these contrasts, which will commend itself to all naturalists who know how important has been the agency of the glacial period in bringing about the existing relations between Alpine and Arctic plants.

Let us now first consider the remarkable difference between the forest vegetation of eastern America and that of Europe and western Asia. The latter area is the more extensive and more varied of the two, yet its trees, both deciduous and coniferous, are scarcely half as numerous or half as diversified. Why, we naturally ask, is America so rich? Professor Asa Gray answers, it is not America that is exceptionally rich, but Europe that is exceptionally poor. This is shown in two ways. Firstly, because America, rich as it is, is surpassed by eastern Asia; and, secondly, because Europe itself was formerly at least as rich as America is now. During the Pliocene or later Miocene periods, Europe possessed most of the generic groups of trees now confined to North America and east Asia, and was wonderfully rich in different kinds. The later Tertiary deposits of Switzerland alone have yielded, according to Professor Heer, two hundred and ninety-one species of trees and two hundred and forty-two shrubs, or far more than the present rich flora of eastern Asia added to the poorer one of Europe. It is true that this number includes the species of several distinct deposits of somewhat different ages. But in the beds of one single locality and period, at Œninghen, the remains of nearly two hundred specimens of trees have been found; and it is in the highest degree improbable that all which lived there have been preserved, while it is certain that the flora of Œninghen was not so rich as that of Switzerland, and was, a fortiori, very much poorer than that of Europe. Making, therefore, all necessary deductions for imperfect determinations of species, it is impossible to doubt that the kinds of trees inhabiting Europe in late Tertiary times were far more numerous and varied than they are now even in eastern Asia, which, as we have seen, is the richest part of the north temperate zone. Since the period of these deposits the climate of all these regions has greatly deteriorated, culminating in a glacial epoch which has only recently passed away; and to this is naturally imputed the wonderful change from riches to poverty which has come over the woody plants of Europe. But we have still to ask, Why did not eastern America and eastern Asia become equally poor? And Professor Asa Gray has now answered that question for us in a very satisfactory manner.

We must first call attention to the fact that when Europe enjoyed a milder climate, with a rich and varied flora, there was also an abundant vegetation, very similar in character to that which now clothes our north temperate latitudes, extending northward to the Arctic circle and far beyond it. In Arctic America, in Greenland, and even in Spitzbergen, there have been found well-preserved remains of maples, poplars, birches, and limes, like those of Europe; of magnolias, hickories, sassafras, and Wellingtonias, like those of America; as well as of gingko-trees and several other kinds now peculiar to Japan. The period when these Arctic woods flourished was no doubt earlier than that of the forests of Œninghen (though both are usually termed Miocene), the northern plants having migrated southward owing to the lowering of the mean temperature. As the severer cold of the glacial epoch came on, the same species could only live by migrating still farther south; and then, when the cold period had passed away, they moved back again, and many of them now occupy the same countries as they did before the glacial epoch.

And now we arrive at the explanation of the exceptional poverty of Europe. If we look at a good map or large globe, we shall see that in North America the Alleghany Mountains run north and south, and the lowlands east and west of them extend uninterruptedly to Florida, to Texas, and to the Gulf of Mexico. There was, therefore, nothing to prevent the southward migration of the flora, and its northward return, when the mountains were covered with snow and ice. But in Europe the geographical conditions are very different. There is a great chain of mountains, the Alps and Pyrenees, running in an east and west direction, and farther south a great sea, the Mediterranean, also running east and west. As the glacial epoch came on, the icy mantle crept southward from the Arctic Ocean and downward from the mountain heights, thus preventing the plants of central Europe from migrating southward, and destroying all that were not capable of enduring a very severe climate, or which did not also exist south of the Alps. But here, too, the Mediterranean prevented any southern migration; and being crowded into a diminished area between the mountains and the sea, many species must have perished. When the cold passed away, the survivors spread northwards and rapidly covered the whole country, but their greatly diminished numbers and the prevalence of a few hardy species over very wide areas, sufficiently attest the severe ordeal they have passed through.

The correctness of this explanation can hardly be doubted, more especially as it equally serves to explain the superior riches of eastern Asia. For here we find a far greater extent of northern land from which the existing forest trees originally came, and also a greater extent of southern lowlands extending uninterruptedly into the tropics, for them to retreat to during the period of cold. All the conditions were here favorable, first for the production and next for the preservation of a rich flora.

The poverty of western America in deciduous trees and its richness in conifers, Professor Asa Gray considers to be a more difficult and at present an insoluble problem. But here, too, a consideration of the physical character of the country suggests an intelligible explanation. Conifers are more especially mountain plants, while deciduous trees abound most in the lowlands. Now in north-west America there is a vast stretch of mountains from the extreme north to the far south, and no extensive lowlands — exactly the reverse of what obtains in eastern America, where the lowlands are vastly more extensive than the mountains. Conifers, therefore, most likely always abounded most on the western side of the continent, and during their enforced southern migrations always found suitable mountain habitats. The deciduous trees, on the other hand (always, probably, few in number), were many of them exterminated in their migrations first southward and again northward, for want of suitable places of growth, or were overpowered by the greater vigor of the competing coniferous trees.

Turning again to eastern Asia we find a combination of both these conditions. Ample mountain ranges traverse every part of it from the Arctic circle to the tropics, but these are everywhere interrupted by great river-valleys and extensive plateaus of moderate elevation, thus offering equally favorable conditions for the preservation of both kinds of trees; and here we accordingly still find the richest and most perfectly balanced woody vegetation of the north temperate zone.

The marvellous history that we have here sketched in the merest outline, teaches us that our own country has been denuded of its proper share of wild trees and shrubs by a great natural catastrophe — the glacial epoch — which destroyed them just as a hurricane or a conflagration might have destroyed them, only more gradually, and at the same time more thoroughly. In replanting the same or similar trees as those which inhabited Europe before the glacial period, we may be said to be only bringing back our own, and again clothing our land with those forest denizens which at no very distant epoch it actually possessed.

Returning again to the more special subject of this paper, I would remark, in conclusion, that the preservation and restoration of Epping Forest is a matter of wide and even of national interest. The method of procedure now decided on will determine its condition for generations to come, and our successors will not forgive us if, for want of due consideration, we fail to make the most of the great opportunity which here offers itself. Whatever is now done will be practically irreversible. It is, therefore, of the highest importance that those who have given thought to the subject, or who possess experience bearing upon it, should now make their views known, in order that conflicting suggestions may be submitted to the ordeal of free criticism, and lead to the adoption of a plan worthy of the occasion, and which we may not at some future time have reason to regret.

WITHIN THE PRECINCTS.

BY MRS. OLIPHANT.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

A CRISIS.

LOTTIE scarcely knew how she got through that afternoon. Rollo presented himself for but a moment at the signor's, in great concern that he could not stay, and begged a hundred pardons with his eyes, which he could not put into words. Lady Caroline and Augusta had made an engagement for him, from which he could not get free. "At the elm-tree!" he whispered in the only moment when he could approach Lottie. Her heart, which was beating still with the mingled anger, and wonder, and fright of her late encounter, sank within her. She could only look at him with a glance which was half appeal and half despair. And when he went away the day seemed to close in, the clouds to gather over the very window by which she was standing, and heaven and earth to fail her. Rollo's place was taken by a spectator whose sympathy was more disinterested than that of Rollo, and his pity more tender; but what was that to Lottie, who wanted only the one man whom she loved, not any other? What a saving of trouble and pain there would be in this world if the sympathy of one did as well as that of another! There was poor Purcell turning over the music, gazing at her with timid eyes full of devotion, and longing to have the courage and the opportunity to offer her again that 'ome which poor Lottie so much wanted, which seemed open to her no where else in the whole world. And on the other side stood Mr. Ashford, without any such definite intention as Purcell, without any perception as yet of anything in himself but extreme "interest in," and compassion for this solitary creature, but roused to the depths of his heart by the sight of her, anxious to do anything that could give her consolation, and ready to stand by her against all the world. The minor canon had been passing when that scene took place in the hall of Captain Despard's house with its open door. He had heard Polly's loud voice, and he had seen Law rush out, putting on his hat, and flushed with unusual feeling. "I don't mind what she says to me as long as she keeps off Lottie!" the young man had said; and careless as Law was, the tears had come to his eyes, and he had burst forth, "My poor Lottie! what is she to do?" Mr. Ashford's heart had been wrung by this outcry. What could he do? — he was helpless — an unmarried man; what use can he ever be to a beautiful, friendless girl? He felt how impotent he was with an impatience and distress which did not lessen that certainty. He could do nothing for her, and yet he could not be content to do nothing. This was why he came to the signor's, sitting down behind backs beside Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, who distracted him by much pantomimic distress, shaking her head and lifting up her hands and eyes, and would fain have whispered to him all the time of Lottie's singing had not the signor sternly interfered. ("Sure these musical folks they're as big tyrants as the Rooshians themselves," Mrs. O'Shaughnessy said indignantly.) This was all the minor canon could do — to come and stand by the lonely girl, though no one but himself knew what his meaning was. It could not be any help to Lottie, who was not even conscious of it. Perhaps, after all, the sole good in it was to himself.

Lottie had never sung so little well. She did not sing badly. She took trouble; the signor felt she tried to do her best, to work at it, to occupy herself with the music by way of getting rid of things more urgent which would press themselves upon her. In short, for the first time Lottie applied herself to it with some faint conception of the purposes of art. To have recourse to art as an opiate against the pangs of the inner being, as an escape from the harms of life, is perhaps not the best way of coming at it, but the signor knew that this was one of the most beaten ways towards that temple which to him enshrined everything that was best in the world. It was perhaps the only way in which Lottie was likely to get at it, and he saw and understood the effort. But it could not be said that the effort was very successful. The others, who were thinking only of her, felt that Lottie did not do so well as usual. She was not in voice, Purcell said to himself; and to the minor canon it seemed very natural that after the scene which she had just gone through poor Lottie should have but little heart for her work. It was easily explained. The signor, however, who knew nothing of the circumstances, came to the most true conclusion. The agitation of that episode with Polly would not have harmed her singing, however it might have troubled herself, had Lottie's citadel of personal happiness been untouched. But the flag was lowered from that donjon, the sovereign was absent. There was no inspiration left in the dull and narrowed world where Lottie found herself left. Her first opening of vigorous, independent life had been taken from her, and for the first time the life of visionary passion and enthusiasm was laid low. She did not give in. She made a brave effort, stilling her excited nerves, commanding her depressed heart. The signor himself was more excited than he had been by all the previous easy triumphs of her inspiration. Now was the test of what she had in her. Happiness dies, love fails, but art is forever. Could she rise to the height of this principle, or would she drop upon the threshold of the sacred place incapable of answering to the guidance of art alone? Never before had he felt the same anxious interest in Lottie. He thought she was groping for that guidance, though without knowing it, in mere instinct of pain to find something that would not fail her. She did not rise so high as she had done under the other leading, but to the signor this seemed to be in reality Lottie's first step, though she did not know it, on the rugged ascent which is the artist's way of life. Straight is the path and narrow is the way in that, as in all excellence. The signor praised her more than he had ever praised her before, to the surprise of the lookers-on; the generous enthusiasm of the artist glowed in him. If he could, he would have helped her over the roughness of the way, just as the minor canon, longing and pitiful, would have helped her if he could over the roughness of life. But the one man was still more powerless than the other to smooth her path. Here it was not sex, nor circumstances, which were in fault, but the rigid principles of art, which are less yielding than rocks; every step, however painful, in that thorny way the neophyte must tread for herself. The signor knew it; but the more his beginner stumbled, the more eager was he to cheer her on.

"I am afraid I sang very badly," Lottie said, coming out with Mrs. O'Shaughnessy and the minor canon, who went along with them he scarcely knew why. He could do nothing for the girl, but he did not like to leave her — to seem (to himself) to desert her. Only himself was in the least degree aware that he was standing by Lottie in her trouble.

"Me child, you all think a deal too much about it. It was neither better nor worse; that's what I don't like in all your singing. It may be fine music, but it's always the same thing over and over. If it was a tune that a body could catch — but it's little good the best tune would have been to me this day. I didn't hear you, Lottie, for thinking what was to become of you. What will ye do? Will you never mind, but go back? Sure you've a right to your father's house whatever happens, and I wouldn't be driven away at the first word. There is nothing would please her so well. I'd go back!"

"Oh, don't say any more," cried Lottie with a movement of sudden pride. But when she caught the pitying look of the minor canon her heart melted. "Mr. Ashford will not be angry because I don't like to speak of it," she said, raising her eyes to him. "He knows that things are not — not very happy — at home."

Then Mr. Ashford awoke to the thought that he might be intruding upon her. He took leave of the ladies hurriedly. But when she had given him her hand, he stood holding it for a minute. "I begin to like Law very much," he said. To feel that this was the way in which he could give her most pleasure was a delicate instinct, but it was not such a pleasure as it would have been a month ago. Lottie did not speak, but a gleam of satisfaction rose in her eyes. "If there is anything I can do," he said faltering, "to be of use ——"

What could he do? Nothing. He knew that, and so did she. It was only to himself that this was a consolation, he said to himself when they were gone. He went away to his comfortable house, and she, slim and light, turned to the other side of the Abbey, with Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, with nowhere in the world to go to. Was that so? was it really so? But still he, with that house of his, a better home than the one which young Purcell was so eager to offer to her, what could he do? Nothing; unless it were one thing which had not before entered his thoughts, and now, when it had got in, startled him so, that middle-aged as he was, he felt his countenance turn fiery red, and went off at a tremendous pace, as if he had miles to go. He had only a very little way to go before he reached his own door, and yet he had travelled more than miles between that and the dwelling of the signor.

As for Lottie, she went home with Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, not knowing what she was to do after. The elm-tree — that was the only place in the world that seemed quite clear to her. For a moment, in the sickness of her disappointment to see Rollo abandon her, she had said to herself that she would not go; but soon a longing to tell him her trouble came upon her. After the Abbey bells had roused all the echoes, and the usual congregation had come from all quarters for the evening service, she left Mrs. O'Shaughnessy and went slowly towards the slopes. It was still early, and the wintry afternoon was cold. There was an east wind blowing, parching the landscape, and turning all its living tints into lines of grey. Lottie was not very warmly clothed. She had her merino gown and little cloth jacket, very plain garments, not like the furs in which Augusta had come home; but then Lottie was not used to living like Augusta, and perhaps her thinner wrap kept her as warm. She went up the Dean's Walk languidly, knowing that it was too early, but unable to rest. She would have to go home after all, to steal in and hide herself in her room for this night at least; but after that, what was she to do? The O'Shaughnessys had not a room to give her. She had no relations whom she might go to; what was to become of her? When she got to the elm-tree there was nobody there. She had known it was too early. She sat down and thought, but what could thinking do? What could she make of it? She looked over the wide landscape which had so often stilled and consoled her, but it was all dead and unresponsive, dried up by that east wind; the earth and the sky, and even the horizon on which they met, all drawn in pale outlines of grey. Her face was blank and pale like the landscape, when the lover for whom she was waiting appeared. The wind, which was so cold, had driven everybody else away. They had it all to themselves, this chilly wintry landscape, the shadowy trees with a few ragged garments of yellow or faded brown still clinging to them. Rollo came up breathless, his feet ringing upon the winding path. He came and placed himself beside her with a thousand apologies that she should have had to wait. "It was a trick of Augusta's," he said; "I am sure she suspects something." Lottie felt that this repeated suggestion that some one suspected ought not to be made to her. But her paleness and sadness roused Rollo to the most hearty concern. "Something has happened," he said; "I can see it, darling, in your eyes. Tell me what it is. Have not I a right to know everything?" Indeed he was so anxious and so tender that Lottie forgot all about offence and her disappointment, and everything that was painful. Who had she beside to relieve her burdened heart to, to lean upon in her trouble? She told him what had happened, feeling that with every word she uttered her load was being lightened. Oh! how good it is to be able to say forth everything, to tell some one to whom all that happens to you is interesting! As she told Polly's insults, even Polly herself seemed to grow more supportable. Rollo listened to every word with anxious interest, with excitement, and indignation and grief. He held her closer to him, saying, "My poor darling, my poor Lottie!" with outbursts of rage and tender pity. Lottie's heart grew lighter and lighter as she went on. He seemed to her to be taking it all on his shoulders, the whole of the burden. His eyes shone with love and indignation. It was not a thing which could be borne; she must not bear it, he would not allow her to bear it, he cried. Finally a great excitement seemed to get possession of him all at once. A sudden impulse seized upon him. He held her closer than ever, with a sudden tightening of his clasp, and hasty resolution. "Lottie!" he cried; and she could feel his heart suddenly leap into wild beating, and looked up trembling and expectant, sure that he had found some way of deliverance. "Lottie, my love! you must not put up with this another day. You must come away at once. Why not this very night? I could not rest and think you were bearing such indignity. You must be brave and trust yourself to me. You will not be afraid, my darling, to trust yourself to me?"

"To-night!" she said with a cry of answering excitement, alarm, and wonder.

"Why not to-night?" he cried with more and more energy. "I know a place where I could take you. A quiet, safe place, with people to take care of you, who would not suffer you to be annoyed even when I was not there myself to watch over you. Lottie, dearest, you would not be afraid to trust yourself to me?"

"No, Rollo, why should I be afraid? — but ——" The suddenness of this prospect of deliverance, which she did not understand, took away Lottie's breath.

"But — there are no buts. You would be taken care of as if you were in a palace. You would have everything to make your life pleasant. You could work at your music ——"

"Ah!" she said, interrupting him: his excitement roused no alarm in her mind. She was incapable of understanding any meaning in him that was inconsistent with honor. "Would it be so necessary to think of the music?" she said. It seemed to her that for Rollo Ridsdale's wife it need not be any longer a point essential. A host of other duties, more sweet, more homely, came before her dazzled eyes.

"Above all things!" he said with a sudden panic, "without that what would you — how could I" — the suggestion was insupportable — "but we can discuss this after," he said. "Lottie, my Lottie, listen! Trust yourself to me — let me take you away out of all this misery into happiness. Such happiness! I scarcely can put it into words. Why should you have another day of persecution, when you can be free if you will this very night?"

His countenance seemed aflame as he bent towards her in the wintry twilight; she could feel the tumultuous beating of his heart. It was no premeditated villany but a real impulse, acted upon, without any pause for thought, with that sudden and impassioned energy which is often more subtle than the craftiest calculation. Even while his heart beat thus wildly with awakened passion, Rollo answered the feeble resistance of his conscience by asking himself what harm could it do her? it would not interfere with her career. As for Lottie, she raised herself up within his arm and threw back her head and looked at him, not shrinking from him nor showing any horror of the suggestion. There was a pause — only for a moment, but it felt like half an hour, while wild excitement, love, and terror coursed through his veins. Surely she understood him, and was not alarmed? If she had understood him and flung away from him in outraged virtue, Rollo would have been abject in guilt and penitence. For the moment, however, though his heart beat with alarm, there was a sense of coming triumph in all his being.

Lottie raised her drooping shoulders, she threw back her head and looked at him, into the glowing face that was so close to her. Her heart had given one answering leap of excitement, but was not beating like his. At that moment, so tremendous to him, it was not passion but reflection that was in her eyes.

"Let me think — let us think," she said. "Oh, Rollo! it is a great temptation. To go away, to be safe with you ——"

"My darling, my own darling! you shall never have cause to fear, never to doubt me; my love will be as steady, as true —" So high had the excitement of suspense grown, that he had scarcely breath to get out the words.

"Do you think I doubt that?" she said, her voice sounding so calm, so soft to his excited ear. "That is not the question; there are so many other things to think of. If you will not think for yourself, I must think for you. Oh, Rollo, no! I don't see how it could be. Listen to me; you are too eager, oh! thank you, dear Rollo, too fond of me, to take everything into consideration — but I must. Rollo! no, no; it would never do; how could it ever do, if you will only think? Supposing even that it did not matter for me, how could you marry your wife from any place but her home? It would not be creditable," said Lottie, shaking her head with all the gentle superiority of reason, "it would not be right or becoming for you."

His arm relaxed round her; he tried to say something, but it died away in his throat. For the moment the man was conscious of nothing but a positive pang of gratitude for a danger escaped; he was safe, but he scarcely dared breathe. Had she understood him as he meant her to understand him, what vengeance would have flashed upon him, what thunderbolt scathed him! But for very terror he would have shrunk and hid his face now in the trembling of the catastrophe escaped.

"More than that, even," said Lottie going on all unawares; "I have nothing, you know; and how could I take money — money to live upon — from you! — till I was married to you? No! it is impossible, impossible, Rollo. Oh, thank you, thank you a thousand times for having thought more of me than of anything else; but you see, don't you see, how impossible it is? I will never forget," said the girl softly, drawing a little closer to him who had fallen away from her in the strange tumult of failure — yet deliverance — which took all strength from him, "I will never forget that you were ready to forget everything that was reasonable, everything that was sensible, and even your own credit, for me!"

Another pause, but this time indescribable. In her bosom gratitude, tender love, and that sweet sense of calmer judgment, of reason less influenced by passion than it would be fitting or right for his to be, which a woman loves to feel within herself — her modest prerogative in the supreme moment; in his a tumult of love, disappointment, relief, horror of himself, anger, and shame, and the thrill of a hair-breadth escape. He could not say a word; what he had done seemed incredible to him. The most tremendous denunciation would not have humbled him as did her unconsciousness. He had made her the most villanous proposal, and she had not even known what it meant; to her it had seemed all generosity, love, and honor. His arm dropped from around her, he had no force to hold her, and some inarticulate exclamation — he could not tell what — sounded hoarsely in utter confusion and shame in his throat.

"You are not angry?" she said, almost wooing him in her turn. "Rollo, it is not that I do not trust you, you know; who should I trust but you? If that was all, I would put my hand in yours, you should take me wherever you pleased. But then there are the other things to be considered. And, Rollo, don't be angry," she said, drawing his arm within hers, "I can bear anything now. After talking to you, after feeling your sympathy, I can bear anything. What do I care for a woman like that? Of course I knew," said Lottie, with tears in her eyes, "that you did feel for me, that you thought of me, that you were always on my side. But one wants to have it said over again to make assurance sure. Now I can bear anything, now I can go home — though it is not much like home — and wait, till you come and fetch me, Rollo, openly, in the light, in the day."

Here, because she was so happy, Lottie put her hands up to her face and laid those hands upon his shoulder and cried there in such a heavenly folly of pain and blessedness as words could not describe. That he should not claim her at once, that was a pain to her; and to think of that strange, horrible house to which she must creep back, that was pain which no happiness could altogether drive out of her thoughts. But yet, how happy she was! What did it matter if for the moment her heart was often sore? A little while and all would be well; a little while and she would be delivered out of all these troubles. It was only a question of courage, of endurance, of fortitude, and patience; and Lottie had got back her inspiration, and felt herself capable of bearing anything, everything, with a stout heart. But Rollo had neither recovered his speech nor his self-possession; shame and anger were in his heart. He had not been found out, but the very awe of escape was mingled with intolerable anger; anger no doubt chiefly against himself but also a little against her, though why he could not have said. The unconsciousness of her innocence, which had impressed him so deeply at first and confounded all his calculations, began to irritate him. How was it possible she did not understand? was there stupidity as well as innocence in it? Most people would have had no difficulty in understanding, it would have been as clear as noonday — or, rather, as clear as gaslight; as evident as any "intention" could be. He could not bear this superiority, this obtuseness of believing; it offended him, notwithstanding that he had made by it what he felt to be the greatest escape of his life.

They parted after this not with the same enthusiasm on Rollo's part as that which existed on Lottie's. She was chilled, too, thinking he was angry with her for not yielding to his desire, and this overcast her happiness, but not seriously. They stole down by the side of the Abbey, in the shadow — Lottie talking, Rollo silent. When they came within sight of the cloister gate and the line of the lodges opposite, Lottie withdrew her hand from his arm. The road looked empty and dark, but who could tell what spectator might suddenly appear. She took his rôle in the eagerness of her heart to make up to him for any vexation her refusal might have given. "Don't come any further," she whispered; "let us part here; some one might see us." In her eagerness to make up to him for her own unkindness, she allowed the necessity for keeping that secret — though to think of it as a secret had wounded her before. Nevertheless, when he took her at her word and left her, Lottie, like the fanciful girl she was, felt a pang of disappointment and painfully realized her own desolateness, the dismal return all alone to the house out of which every quality of kindness had gone. Her heart sank, and with reluctant, lingering steps she came out of the Abbey shadow and began to cross the Dean's Walk, her forlorn figure moving slowly against the white line of the road and the grey of the wintry sky.

Some one was standing at the door as she came in sight of her father's house. It was Captain Despard himself, looking out. "Is that you, Lottie?" he called out, peering into the gloom. "Come in, come in; where have you been? You must not stay out again, making everybody anxious." Then he came out a step or two from his door and spoke in a whisper: "You know what a woman's tongue is," he said; "they have a great deal to answer for; but when they get excited, what can stop them? You must try not to pay any attention; be sensible, and don't mind — no more than I do," Captain Despard said.

CHAPTER XXXV.

FAMILY DUTY: ACCORDING TO MRS. DESPARD.

THERE are some victories which feel very much like defeats. When Polly had scattered her adversaries on every side, driven forth Lottie and got rid of Law, and silenced Captain Despard — who sat in his room and heard everything but thought it wisest not to interfere — she retired upstairs to her drawing-room and celebrated her triumph by shedding torrents of tears. She had intended to make everybody very wretched, and she had done so; supposing, perhaps (though she did not really know what her motive was), that some pleasure would come to herself out of the discomfiture of the others. But pleasure rarely comes by that means, and when she had thus chased everybody out of her way, Polly threw herself down and burst forth into angry sobs and tears. It is not to be supposed that Captain Despard entertained any romantic illusions about his bride; he knew very well what Polly was. He had, as facts proved, been sufficiently fond of her to marry her, but he did not expect of her more than Polly could give, nor was he shocked to find that she had a temper and could give violent utterance to its vagaries; all this he had known very well before. Knowing it, however, he thought it wise to keep out of the way and not mix himself up in a fray with which evidently he had nothing to do. Had she gone a step further with Lottie it is possible that he might have interfered, for, after all, Lottie was his child; and though he might himself be hard upon her at times, there is generally a mingled sentiment of family pride and feeling which makes us unwilling to allow one who belongs to us to be roughly treated by a stranger. But when Law put himself in the breach, his father sat close and took no notice; he did not feel impelled to turn his wife's batteries upon himself out of consideration for Law. Nor did it make any impression upon the captain when he heard her angry sobs overhead. "She will come to if she is left to herself," he said, and he did not allow himself to be disturbed. Polly, in her passion, threw herself on the carpet, leaning her head upon a chair. She had changed the room after her own fashion. She had lined the curtains with pink muslin, and fastened her crochet-work upon the chairs with bows of pink ribbon; she had covered the old piano with a painted cover, and adorned it with vases and paper flowers. She had made the faded little room which had seemed a fit home enough, in its grey and worn humility, for Lottie's young beauty, into something that looked very much like a dressmaker's ante-room, or that terrible chamber, "handsomely fitted up with toilet requisites," where the victims of the photographic camera prepare for the ordeal. But the loveliness of her handiwork did not console Polly; she got no comfort out of the pink bows, nor even from the antimacassars — a point in which Lottie's room was painfully deficient. She flung herself upon the carpet and sobbed. What was the use of being a lady, a chevalier's wife, and living here in the heart of the Abbey, if no one called upon her or took any notice of her? Polly was not of a patient nature; it did not occur to her even that there was still time for the courtesies she had set her heart upon gaining. She had looked every day for some one to come, and no one had ever come; no one had made any advances to her at the Abbey, which was the only place in which she could assert her position as a lady and a chevalier's wife. Even Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, who had risen from the ranks, who lived next door, who was not a bit better, nay, who was much less good than Polly to begin with (for what is a trooper's wife? and she had been nothing but a trooper's wife)—even Mrs. O'Shaughnessy had passed the door as if she did not see it, and had waited outside till Miss Lottie came to her. Polly's dreams had been very different. She had seen herself in imagination the admired of all admirers; she was by far the youngest of all the chevalier's wives, and the gentlemen, at least, she was sure would rally round her. Women might be spiteful, but men always did justice to a woman when she was handsome and young. Was not that written in all the records? She expected that the ladies would be spiteful, that would be indeed a part of her triumph. They would be jealous of her superior attractions, of her youth, of her husband's adoration of her; the old things would be in a flutter of alarm lest their old men should come within her influence. But Polly had felt pretty sure that the old gentlemen would admire her and rally round her. To make the women envious and the men enthusiastic, was not that always the way? Certainly such was the course of events in the Family Herald. The heroine might have one friend devoted to her fortunes, a confidant more admiring, more faithful even than her lover; but all the rest of womankind was leagued against her. And so it had been in most of the novels Polly had read. But that neither men nor women should take any notice, that was a thing for which she was not prepared, and which she declared to herself she would not bear.

She had seen enough already from her windows to make her furious. She had seen Mrs. O'Shaughnessy ostentatiously waiting for Lottie, walking up and down outside, making signs to the girl up-stairs. She had seen Captain Temple pass and repass, looking up at the same window. She had seen the greetings that met Lottie wherever she appeared. The chevaliers and their wives had not always looked upon Miss Despard with such favorable eyes. They had thought her proud, and they had resented her pride; but now that Lottie was in trouble it was round her they had all rallied. It was the party at the Deanery, however, which had been the last drop in Polly's cup. How was she to know that on the highest elevation she could reach as the lady of a chevalier, she was still beneath the notice of Lady Caroline, and as far as ever from the heaven of the highest society? Polly did not know. The elevation to which she herself had risen was so immense in her own consciousness that there seemed no distinction of ranks above her. She thought, as Lottie had once thought, though from a different point of view, that gentlefolks were all one; that a gentleman's wife, if not so rich or so grand, was still on a level with Lady Caroline herself, and within the circle which encompassed the queen. "You can't be no better than a gentleman," Polly said to herself. You might, it was true, be a lord, which some people thought better, but even a lord was scarcely above an officer. All this glorious ambition, however, what was it going to end in? She watched the carriages going to the Deanery, and with still more furious feelings she watched Lottie in her white dress crossing the Dean's Walk. And she left at home, at the window, neglected, left out, though she was Mrs. Despard, and the other nobody! Was it possible that it might be better even to be a dressmaker, forewoman in the workroom, acknowledged to have the best eye for cutting out, and to be the quickest worker of the lot, superior so far among her equals — than to be ignored and neglected and treated as the dust under their feet by a set of poor gentlefolks? Polly felt that she must wreak her vengeance on somebody.

When she had got her fit of crying over accordingly, she jumped up to her feet and hurried to her room to put on her "things." It was her "best things" that she put on. Indeed, Polly had been wearing her best things every day with an extravagance which rather touched her conscience though it delighted her fancy. She made herself very fine indeed that wintry afternoon, and pattered down-stairs upon a pair of high heels which were more splendid than comfortable, and burst into the little room where Captain Despard sat attentive to all these sounds, and wondering what was coming next. Few people realize the advantage of a silly wife to a man who is not over wise. The captain, though he had a high opinion of himself, was aware at the bottom of his heart that other people scarcely shared that sentiment. And to have a wife whom he was fond of, and whose acquisition flattered his vanity, and who was unmistakably, though clever enough, less clever, less instructed, than he was, gave him a sense of superiority which was very pleasant to him. He looked upon her follies with much more indulgence than he had ever felt for Lottie, who did not give him the same consolation.

"Well, what is it now?" he said, with a smile.

"I want you to come out with me," Polly said. "I want to buy some things. My old muff is shabby, I couldn't wear it in the Abbey. Though they're a set of old frights and frumps, I don't wish your wife to be looked down upon by them, Harry. I can see them looking at all my things, counting up what everything costs, and whispering behind my back. That old Mrs. Jones has trimmed her bonnet exactly like mine, though she looks as if she was too grand to see me. They ain't above copying me, that's one thing."

"No wonder," said the admiring husband; "for it is long since anything so young and so handsome has been among them before. Don't they wish they could copy your face as well as your bonnet! that's all."

"Oh, get along!" said Polly, well pleased; "you're always flattering. Come and buy me a muff. I don't know what kind to get. Grebe is sweetly pretty and ermine is delicious, but sealskin, perhaps, is the most genteel; that always looks ladylike. Did you see Mrs. Daventry go by in her carriage? Ah!" Polly sighed; how could she help it? She was very fine in her blue silk, but Augusta was finer. "She has just come from France, you know, and then, of course, they are rich. She had on a velvet with sable that deep! Ah! it's hard to see folks that are no better than you with things that are so much better," cried Polly; "but, after all, though velvet and sable are very nice, give me sealskin — that's always ladylike. A sealskin jacket, if I had that, I don't think there is anything more I should wish for in the world."

"Are they very dear?" said the captain, with a sudden fit of liberality. He had a native love of buying, which is very general with impecunious persons, and at present was in a prodigal mood.

"Dear! Oh, not for the good they are," said Polly. "You never want another winter mantle all your life. You're set up. That makes them cheap in the end; but they cost a deal of money. I haven't seen nobody with one in all the Abbey, except the canon's ladies."

"Then you shall have one!" said Captain Despard. He looked like a prince, Polly thought, as he stood there glowing with generous purpose. The sound of the

"O — oh!" with which she received the offer rang through the lodges. Such a shriek of pleasure had not been heard there since there had been chevaliers in St. Michael's. They went out together, all beaming, arm in arm, the bride clinging fondly to her husband, the captain looking down with delighted protection upon his bride. This sight, which is so pretty in some cases, and calls forth, if much amusement, often a great deal of sympathy, roused anything but friendly feelings in the lodges, where the good people were getting ready for the afternoon service. Old fool was the best name they had for the bridegroom, though he was not very old; and Polly was a grievance which the ladies could not tolerate. They looked after her from their windows with feelings which were far from Christian. It was a thing they ought not to have been exposed to. There should have been an appeal to the queen, if the gentleman had the least energy. "But even the queen, bless her, could not keep a man from marrying," the warden said deprecatingly. He did not like it any more than they did; but it is only when you are yourself of the executive that you know the difficulties of action; that is why the ladies are such critics — they have not got it to do.

Captain and Mrs. Captain Despard (Polly had got beautiful glazed cards printed stiff and strong with this title upon them) walked down to the best shop in St. Michael's, which is a very good shop indeed; and there they bought a beautiful sealskin. Impossible to tell the pride, the happiness, the glory with which Polly acquired this new possession. She had not expected it. These were the days when sealskins were still a hope, a desire, an aspiration to the female mind, a property which elevated its possessor, and identified her among her peers. "That lady with the sealskin," who would think of pointing out anybody by so general a description now? are they not even going out of fashion? But Polly, for one, could not realize the possibility that such a thing could ever happen. And she had not anticipated such a bliss; the happiness was doubled by being unforeseen. This, indeed, was a proof of the blessedness of being a married lady, of having bettered herself, of having married a gentleman. Her mind was in a confusion of delight. Nevertheless she did not forget that she had come out with another and quite distinct purpose. The fact that she had herself been so fortunate did not turn her from her mission. Was it not more her duty than ever to do everything that could be done for her husband's family? When she had decided upon her sealskin, Polly began to shiver. She said, "It is a very cold day. I don't know why it should be so cold so early in the year. Don't you think it is very cold, Harry? I have come out without any wrap. Do you know I think I will put the sealskin on." Why should not she? The proprietor of the shop accomplished the sale with a pang. He knew Captain Despard well enough and he knew Polly, and he trembled when he thought of his bill. But what could he be but civil? He put it on for her — though how any ordinary sealskin could have covered a bosom so swelling with pride and bliss it is hard to say. And the pair went out together as they came in, except that one was almost speechless with the proud consciousness of drawing all eyes. "It is not the appearance," said Polly, "but it is so deliciously warm; there never was anything like it. And now I am set up. I shall not cost you any more for a winter cloak, not for years and years." "I thought you said it was to last forever," said the captain, equally delighted. They promenaded all the way down St. Michael's hill, the admired of all beholders. If the remarks that were made were not precisely such as Polly hoped, still there was no doubt that remarks were made by everybody, and that the sealskin had all the honor it deserved. Sometimes, indeed, there would be a bitter in the sweet, as when the captain took off his hat with jaunty grace to some lady whom he knew. "Who is that?" Polly would ask sharply; but the ladies all hurried by, and never stopped to be introduced; and no man took off his hat to Polly. Even against this, however, the happiness that wrapped her round defended Mrs. Despard. And how the people stared! — people who had seen her going up and down with a little bundle of patterns on her way to her work, on her way to try on a dress — people in the shops, who had been her equals if not her superiors — to see them gazing out at her with big eyes, at her fine sealskin and her fine husband, that comforted her soul. She walked slowly, getting the full good of her triumph. But when she had got to the foot of the hill she dismissed her escort. "Now you may go," she said; "you always had plenty to do in the old days. I don't want you to say I tie you to my apron-string. You may go now."

"This is a pretty way to dismiss your husband," said Captain Despard; "and where are you going, may I ask, that you send me away?"

"Oh, I will tell you fast enough. I am not going anywhere you can disapprove of. I am going to see the girls," said Polly, "that is all."

"The girls! My love, you must recollect," said Captain Despard with dignity, "that the girls, as you call them, are not fit companions for you."

"You may trust me to know my place," said Polly, "and to keep them in theirs. I should think you may trust me."

Fortified by this assurance, the captain left his lovely bride. He turned back to kiss his hand to her when he was half way up the hill, prolonging the sweet sorrow of the parting, and Polly blew him a kiss with infantine grace. It was "as good as a play." "Lord, what fools they are!" said the fishmonger on the hill, who was a cynic; and the young ladies in the draper's shop shook their heads at each other and said, "Poor gentleman!" with the profoundest commiseration.

When he had left her, Polly threw out her skirts and smoothed the fur of her lovely new coat with a caressing hand. She felt that she loved it. It was more entirely delightful than even her husband — a happiness without alloy. She walked very slowly, enjoying every step of the way. She gave a penny to the beggar at the corner in the fulness of her satisfaction. So far her happiness had evidently a fine moral influence on Polly; and she was going to pay a visit which was also very kind, to "the girls" in the River Lane. She was not one to forget old friends. She sailed along in her pride and glory through the quarter where she was so well known, and curved her nostrils at the smells, and allowed disgust to steal over her face when her path was crossed by an unlovely figure. Polly flattered herself that she was a fine lady complete; and there was no doubt that the imitation was very good in the general, so long as you did not enter into details.

At the entrance of the River Lane, however, she ceased to stand upon ceremony with herself. She picked up her skirts and went on at a more business-like rate of speed. Some one was coming up against the light, which by this time of the afternoon came chiefly from the west, some one with his shoulders up to his ears, who took off his hat to Polly, and pleased her until she perceived that it was only Law. "You here!" she said, and as she looked at him the moral influence of the sealskin almost vanished. Thus she went in state to visit the scenes in which so much of her previous life had passed. But a new sentiment was in Polly's eyes. She felt that she had a duty to do, a duty which was superior to benevolence. She pushed open the green swing door with a delicious sense of the difference. The girls were talking fast and loud when she opened the door, discussing some subject or other with all the natural chatter of the workroom. There was a pause when the sound of her heels and the rustle of her silk was heard — a hush ran round the table How well Polly knew what it meant! "They will think it is a customer," she said to herself, and never customer swept in more majestically. They were all at work when she entered, as if they did not know what it was to chatter, and Ellen rose respectfully at the first appearance of the lady.

"Mother is up-stairs, ma'am, but I can take any orders," she said; and then with a shriek cried out "Polly!"

"Polly!" echoed all the girls.

Here was a visitor indeed. They got up and made a circle round her, examining her and all she "had on." "In a sealskin!" 'Liza and Kate cried in a breath, with an admiration which amounted to awe. One of them even put forth her hand to stroke it in her enthusiasm. For an instant Polly allowed this fervor of admiration to have its way. Then she said languidly, —

"Give me a chair, please, and send Mrs. Welting to me. I wish to speak to Mrs. Welting. I am sorry to interrupt your work, young ladies — it is Mrs. Welting I want to see."

"But, Polly!" the girls cried all together. They were too much startled to know what to say. They stood gaping in a circle round her.

"I thought you had come to see us like a friend — like what you used to be."

"And weren't we all just glad to see you again, Polly — and quite the lady!" cried another. They would not take their dismissal at the first word.

"Young ladies," said Polly, "I've not come in any bad spirit. I don't deny as I've passed many a day here. My family (though always far above the dressmaking) was not well off, and I shall always be thankful to think as I did my best for them. But now that I'm married, in a different position," said Polly, "though always ready to stand your friend, when you want a friend, or to recommend you among the Abbey ladies, you can't think as I can go on with you like you were in my own sphere. Where there's no equality there can't be no friendship. Perhaps you wouldn't mind opening a window? It's rather early to put on my sealskin, but one never knows at this time of the year — and I'm 'eated with my walk. Send Mrs. Welting to me, please."

There was a great commotion among the girls. The two passive ones stood with open mouth, struck dumb by this magnificence.

"Lor!" cried Kate, finding no other word that could express her emotion.

Emma, though she was the youngest, was the most vehement of all. "I know what she's come for. She's come to make mischief," cried Emma. "I wouldn't fetch mother. I wouldn't go a step. Let her speak straight out what she's got to say."

"There's reason in everything," said Ellen. "You mayn't mean to keep us up like friends. Just as you like, I'm sure; none of us is wanting to keep it up; but mother takes no hand in the business, and that you know as well as me."

"Send Mrs. Welting to me," cried Polly, waving her hand majestically. She did not condescend to any further reply. She leaned back on her chair and unfastened her beloved mantle at the throat. Then she got out a laced handkerchief and fanned herself. "Me that thought it was so cold," Polly remarked to herself, "and it's like summer!" She did not pay any further attention to the young women, who consulted together with great indignation and excitement at a little distance.

"What can she have to say to mother? I wouldn't call mother, not if she was to sit there for a week," said Emma, who had a presentiment as to the subject of the visit.

"Lord! just look at her in her sealskin," interrupted Kate, who could think of nothing else.

But Ellen, who was the serious one, paused and hesitated. "We can't tell what it may be — and if it turned out to be a job, or something she had got us from some of the Abbey ladies! She's not bad-natured," said Ellen, full of doubts.

All this time Polly waved her handkerchief about, with its edge of lace, fanning herself. She looked at no one — she was too much elevated above all the associations of the place to deign to take any notice. Had not she always been above it? With her disengaged hand she smoothed the fur of her sealskin, rubbing it knowingly upward. She was altogether unconscious of their talk and discussion. What could they have in common with Mrs. Despard? To see her, if any of her former associates had been cool enough to notice it, was still "as good as a play."

The upshot was, that while the others with much ostentation of dragging their seats to the other end of the table, sat down and resumed their work with as much appearance of calm as possible, Ellen ran up-stairs in obedience to her own more prudent suggestions, and reappeared shortly with her mother, a large, comely woman, who, not knowing who the visitor was, was a little expectant, hoping for a very good order — a trousseau, or perhaps mourning. "Or it might be the apartments," Mrs. Welting said. And when she entered the workroom she made the lady a curtsy, then cried out, as her daughters had done, "Why, bless my heart, Polly! The idea of taking me in like this, you saucy things," she cried, turning, laughing, upon the girls. But she did not get any response from these indignant young women, nor from Polly, who made no reply to her salutation, but sat still, delicately fanning herself.

Mrs. Welting stood between the two opposed parties, wondering what was the matter. Since Polly was here, she could have come only in friendship. "I'm sure I'm very glad to see you," she said, "and looking so well and so 'andsome. And what a lovely sealskin you've got on."

"Mrs. Welting," said Polly, with great dignity, taking no notice of these friendly remarks, "I asked for you because I've something to say that is very particular. You don't take much charge of the business, but it is you as one must turn to about the girls. Mrs. Welting, you mayn't know, but there's goings on here as always gave me a deal of annoyance. And now I've come to tell you they must be put a stop to. I never could endure such goings on, and I mean to put a stop to them now."

"Lord bless us!" said Mrs. Welting. She was really alarmed. She gave a glance round upon her girls, all bursting with self-defence, and made them a sign to be silent. Then she turned to her visitor with a mixture of anxiety and defiance. "Speak up, Polly," she said; "nobody shall say as I won't listen, if there's anything against my girls; but speak up, for you've gone too far to stop now."

"How hot it is, to be sure," said Mrs. Despard, "in this close bit of a place! I wish some one would open a window. I can't think how I could have put up with it so long. And I wonder what my 'usband would say if he heard me spoke to like that! I thought you would have the sense to understand that I've come here for your good. It wasn't to put myself on an equality with folks like you, working for your living. I don't want to be stuck up, but a lady must draw the line somewhere. Mrs. Welting, I don't suppose you know it — you ain't often in the workroom — it would be a deal better if you was. There's gentlemen comes here, till the place is known all over the town; and there is one young gentleman as I take a deal of interest in as makes me and his papa very uneasy all along of coming here ——"

"Gentlemen! coming here!" cried Mrs. Welting, looking round upon her daughters with mingled anger and dismay.

"I know what I'm talking about," said Polly; "let them contradict me if they dare. He comes here mostly every day. One of the girls is that silly as to think he's after her. After her! I hope as he has more sense; he knows what's what a deal too well for that. He takes his fun out of them — that is what he does. But you may think yourself what kind of feelings his family has — the captain and me. That's the one that encourages him most," Mrs. Despard added, pointing out Emma with her finger. "She is always enticing the poor boy to come here."

"Oh, you dreadful, false, wicked story!" cried Emma, flushed and crying. "Oh, mother, it ain't nothing of the kind. It was she as brought him first. She didn't mind who came when she was here. She said it was no harm, it was only a bit of fun. We was always against it — at least Ellen was," added the culprit, bursting forth into sobs and tears.

"Yes, I always was," said Ellen, demurely. It was not in human nature not to claim the palm of superior virtue; "but it was not Emma, it was Polly that began. I've heard her argue as it was no harm. She was the first with the captain, and then when young Mr. Despard ——"

"I am not going to sit here, and listen to abuse of my family," said Polly, rising. "I wouldn't have mentioned no names, for I can't abide to have one as belongs to me made a talk about in a place like this. I came to give you a warning, ma'am, not these hardened things. It isn't for nothing a lady in my position comes down to the River Lane. I've got my beautiful silk all in a muddle, and blacks upon a white bonnet is ruination. I did it for your sake, Mrs. Welting, for I've always had a respect for you. And now I've done my Christian duty," said Polly, with vehemence, shaking the dust from her blue silk. "There's them that talk about it, like that little Methody Ellen, but there ain't many that do it. But don't let anybody suppose," she cried, growing hotter and hotter, "that I mean to do it any more! If you let him come here after this, I won't show you any mercy — we'll have the law of you, my 'usband and I. There's laws against artful girls as entice poor innocent young men. Don't you go for to think," cried Mrs. Despard, sweeping out while they all gazed after her, speechless, "because I've once done my Christian duty that I'm going to do it any more!"

We will not attempt to describe the commotion that followed — the reproaches, the tears, the fury of the girls betrayed, of which none was more hot than that of Ellen, who had to stand and hear herself called a Methody, she who was conscious of being an Anglican and a Catholic without blemish, and capable of anything in the world before Dissent.

Polly sailed up the hill, triumphant in that consciousness of having done her duty as a Christian, but equally determined not to do it any more; and what with the consciousness of this noble performance, and what with the sealskin, found it in her power to be almost agreeable to her stepdaughter, when the captain, who, after all, was Lottie's father, and did not like the idea that his girl should be banished from his house, had met her and brought her in.

"She has not had the careful bringing up that you have had, my child," the captain said. "She hasn't had your advantages. You must have a little patience with her, for my sake." Captain Despard had always been irresistible when he asked tenderly, with his head on one side, and an insinuating roll in his voice, that anything should be done for his sake.

Lottie, who was happy in the sense of her lover's readiness to sacrifice everything for her sake (as she thought), and to whom the whole world seemed fairer in consequence, yielded without any struggle, while Polly, on her part, put on her most gracious looks.

"If you take every word I say for serious," said Polly, "I don't know whatever I shall do. I never was used to have my words took up hasty like that. I say a deal of naughtiness that I don't mean — don't I, Harry? You and me would never have come together, should we, if you'd always gone and taken me at my word?" And so the reconciliation was effected, and things went on as before. There was no similar occurrence in respect to Law, whose looks at Polly were murderous; but then Law had no delicacy of sentiment, and whatever had happened would have come into his meals all the same.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

FAMILY DUTY: BY A FINER ARTIST.

ROLLO did not come away from the strange excitement of that interview on the slopes with the same feelings which filled the mind of Lottie. The first intense sensation of shame with which he had realized the villany of the proposal which Lottie did not understand soon changed into a different sentiment. He had felt its guilt, its treacherous cruelty, under the guise of devotion, far more bitterly and intensely than if she had understood and denounced him; and the relief of his escape from an indignation and horror which must have been as overwhelming as the confidence, had made him feel how great a danger he had run, and how terrible to him as well as to her would have been the discovery of his base intention. How could he ever think that Lottie, proud, and pure, and fearless of evil as she was, could have fallen into such a snare! He felt himself a fool as well as a villain; perceiving, too, by the light of fact, what he would not have understood in theory, that the very uncomprehension of innocence makes guilt contemptible as well as terrible. If she could have understood him, he would scarcely have felt so mean, so miserable, so poor a creature as he did now; not even a gay and fine betrayer, but a pitiful cheat and would-be criminal, false to everything that nature trusts in. Rollo had not been irreproachable hitherto, but such sins as he had indulged in had been done among those who were sinners like himself, among people who had a cynical comprehension of the worth of promises and the value of vows. He had never tried that rôle of the seducer before, and the fact that his own shame and horror were real, made them all the more hard to bear. Shame, however, of this bitter kind is not an improving influence. Soon it began to turn to anger equally bitter. He tried to think that Lottie was partly to blame, that she had "led him on," that he never would have gone so far but for "encouragement" from her. Even it flashed across his mind that she was not so unconscious as she appeared, but had pretended ignorance in order to rivet her chains upon him, and force him to the more honorable way which was so much more for her interest. He tried to force this idea into his own mind, which was not sufficiently depraved to receive it; but yet it was not long before he was angry, irritated against the girl who would not understand him, and sore with the humiliation she had inflicted unawares.

Other influences, too, came in to break the purer spell of honorable love under which Rollo, to his own surprise, had so entirely fallen. With the return of Augusta and her husband the world seemed to have come back and seized him. Even the society of Augusta, of itself, had an immediate influence, breaking up the magic of the seclusion in which he had been content to live. Lady Caroline was not a woman who could be called unworldly, but she was passive, and did not take any initiative even in the way of gossip. She liked to hear it; there came a little gleam of interest to her eyes when the stories of the great world were brought to her, when she was told who was going to marry who, and by what schemes and artifices the marriage had been brought about; and who had most frequently and boldly broken the marriage vow, and by whom it had been most politely eluded; and how everybody lived and cheated, and nothing was as it seemed; and all that is done for money, and that is done for pleasure, in that busy, small, narrow-minded village society — which is the world. But though she loved to hear, she could not begin, for unless people told her what was going on, how, she sometimes asked piteously, was she to know? As for the dean, he was not in the habit of it any more than his wife, though when he went to town he would bring down invariably a piece of news from his club — of somebody's appointment, or somebody's good luck, or somebody's wedding. "Now, why can't you go and do likewise?" he would say to Rollo. But all this was mild and secondary in comparison with Augusta, who brought the very air of what Mr. Jenkins calls the upper ten into the Deanery, perfuming all the rooms and all the meals with stories of fortunes won and lost, of squabbles, ministerial and domestic, of marriages and dinners alike "arranged," and all the wonderful dessous des cartes and behind the scenes with which so many people are acquainted in fashionable life. Who so well as Augusta knew that when the Duke of Mannering gave up his governorship, it was not from any political reason, but because the life he led was such that the place was far too hot to hold him, and Government was only too glad to send out Algy Fairfax, though he was only a younger son, and had no particular interest, simply to smooth things down? And what a lucky thing it was for Algy to be there just at the right moment, when there was nobody else handy, and just when Lord Arthur was there, who had got him to explain matters to his elder brother, and knew what he could do? It was what old Lady Fairfax had been scheming for all his life, just as she had been scheming to catch young Snellgrove for Mina. Of course she had succeeded. Mina was almost distracted, every body knew. It was she who had that affair with Lord Colbrookdale, and now everybody said she was wildly in love with Reginald Fane, her cousin; but she might just as well be in love with St. Paul's, for he had not a penny; and she was to be married directly. Did you hear about her settlements? They were simply ridiculous. But that old woman was wonderful. There was nothing she did not think of, and everything she wanted she got. And then there was that story about poor young Jonquil of the war department, who married somebody quite out of the question, a poor clergyman's daughter, or something of that sort, without a penny (though he might have had the rich Miss Windsor Brown for the asking, people said), and of the dreadful end he had come to, living down in some horrid weedy little cottage about Kew, and wheeling out two babies in a perambulator. All these tales, and a thousand more, Augusta told, filling the Deanery with a shameful train of people, all doing something they did not want to do, or forcing others to do it, or following their pleasure through every law, human and divine. Lady Caroline sat in her easy-chair (she was not allowed to put up her feet, except in the evening, after dinner, when Augusta was at home), and listened with half-closed eyes, but unfailing attention. "I knew his father very well," she would say now and then, or "His mother was a great friend of mine." As for Rollo, he knew all the people of whom these stories were told. He had seen the things beginning of which his cousin knew all the conclusions, and what went on behind the scenes; and thus he was carried back after the idyll of the last six weeks to his own proper world. He began to feel that there was no world but that, that nothing else could make up for the want of it; and a shudder ran over him when he thought of Jonquil's fate. Augusta, for her part, did not conceal her surprise to find him at the Deanery. "What is Rollo doing here?" she said to her mother.

"I am sure, my dear, I do not know. He seems to like it, and we are very glad to have him," Lady Caroline replied. But that did not satisfy Mrs. Daventry's curiosity. What could a young man of fashion, a man of the world, do here?

"I wonder what he is after," she said; "I wonder what his object can be. It can't be only your society and papa's. I should just like to know what he is up to. He is not a fool, to have gone and got entangled somehow. I wonder what he can mean by it!" Augusta cried; but her mother could give her no idea. Lady Caroline thought it was natural enough.

"I don't see that it is so strange," she said. "Autumn is a terrible time. To sleep in a strange bed night after night, and never settle down anywhere. Rollo likes to be comfortable; and then there is this Miss Despard. You have heard about Miss Despard?"

"What about Miss Despard?" Augusta said, pricking up her ears.

"She is to be the prima donna," said Lady Caroline. "He thinks she will make his fortune. He has always got some wild scheme in his head. He used to annoy me very much to have her here ——"

"And did you have her here?" cried Augusta, roused into sudden excitement. "Oh, why didn't I know of it! I thought there must be some reason. Lottie Despard! And were you obliged to have her here, mamma? What a bore it must have been for you!"

"I did not like it, my dear," her ladyship said. But after a while she added, conscience compelling her, "She sang very nicely, Augusta; she has a pretty voice."

"She has plenty of voice, but she cannot sing a note," said Augusta, with vehemence, who was herself, without any voice to speak of, a very well-trained musician. She would not say any more to frighten Lady Caroline, but she took her measures without delay. And the result of Augusta's inquiries was that Rollo found his feet entangled in a web of engagements which separated him from Lottie. But though he was sore and angry, he had not given up Lottie, nor had he any intention so to do. When, however, the day came for Lottie's next lesson, Mrs. Daventry herself did the signor the honor of calling upon him just before his pupil appeared. "You know the interest I always took in Lottie. Please let me stay. We have so many musical friends in town that I am sure I can be of use to her," Mrs. Daventry said; and the consequence was that when Lottie and her companion entered the signor's sitting room, the great chair between the fire and the window in which Mrs. O'Shaughnessy usually placed herself was found to be already occupied by the much greater lady, whose sudden appearance in this cordial little company put everybody out. Augusta sat leaning back in the big chair, holding a screen between her cheek and the fire, her fine Paris bonnet, her furs, and her velvet making a great appearance against the dark wall, and her smiles and courtesy confounding every individual of the familiar party. She was more refined, far less objectionable than Polly, and did her spiriting in a very different way; but there could be little doubt that the fine artist was also the most effectual. She put the entire party out, from the least to the greatest, though the sweetest of smiles was on her face. Even the signor was not himself with this gracious personage superintending his exertions. He was a good English Tory, of the most orthodox sentiments; but he was at the same time an impatient Italian, of despotic tastes, and did not easily tolerate the position of second in his own house. Rollo, who had determined to be present, whatever happened, but who, by a refinement of cruelty, did not know his cousin was coming, came in with all the ease of habit, and had already betrayed the fact of his constant attendance at these strange lessons, when Augusta called to him, covering him with confusion. "We shall be quite a family party," she said. "I am so glad you take an interest in poor Lottie too." Rollo could not but ask himself what was the meaning of this sudden friendliness and interest; but he was obliged to place himself by her side when she called him. And when Lottie came in, at whom he did not dare to look, his position became very uncomfortable. Mrs. O'Shaughnessy, finding her seat occupied, and herself compelled to take a lower place, sat down on a chair near the door, with wrath which made her countenance flame. She had stood up in the room a minute before she seated herself, looking round for a more comfortable place, and had greeted Mr. Ridsdale joyously as an old friend. But even Rollo, usually so polite, who never saw her without doing his very best to make himself agreeable, even he never attempted to introduce her to his cousin, and the good woman sat down accordingly, against the wall, silent and fuming, while Augusta took the chief place. The stranger in the midst of them turned the whole party upside down. Even Purcell was so occupied by the conversation that was kept up in whispers by Augusta, in her corner, even during the singing, that he missed to turn the leaves at the proper moment. Augusta knew very well what she was doing. She had a respect for the signor, but she had higher purposes in hand. She kept Rollo by her side, and kept up a conversation with him through all, which was like her usual conversation, deeply pervaded by the essence of society and "the upper ten." She kept it up in a whisper when Lottie began to sing. "Don't you think she is handsome? She is a little like Lady Augustus Donjon about the eyes — don't you think so? Oh, I never told you that good story about the Augustus Donjons," said Mrs. Daventry; and she told her story, all through the song, half audible.

"Wasn't it good?" Augusta said; and then, "That is such a pretty song; and Lottie, you are so improved, I should never have known it to be the same voice. Yes, wasn't it good, Rollo? Augustus Donjon is always the first to laugh himself, and even the children have got it in the nursery. She is such a jolly woman, she never minds. What are we going to have next? Oh, that will be very nice," said Augusta.

Was it wonderful that Purcell should lose the place? The young fellow did all he could to stop the fine lady with furious glances; and the signor, though his back was turned to her, felt the whisper and the indignity run through every nerve of him. Even in his back you could see, Purcell thought, how horribly annoyed he was. His sensitive shoulders winced and shuddered, his elbows jerked. He could not attend to his accompaniment, he could not attend to his pupil. In the very midst of a song he said aloud, distracted by the s's of a whisper which was louder than usual, "This must never happen again." As for Lottie, she did not know what she was doing. She sang — because it was the hour for her lesson, because she found herself standing there by the side of the signor's piano — but not for any other reason. She had neither inspiration, nor had she that nascent sense that art might perhaps console for other losses which she had once felt when Rollo was away. She was distracted by the whispering behind her, from which she could not withdraw her attention. Why did he listen? Why did he allow Augusta to draw him into unfaithfulness to her? And yet, how could he help it! Was it not all Augusta's fault? But with whomsoever the fault lay, Lottie was the victim. Her voice could not be got out. And the reader knows that Augusta was right — that this poor girl, though she had the voice of an angel, did not as yet know how to sing, and had no science to neutralize the impressions made upon her which took away all her heart and her voice. She went on making a brave fight; but when once the signor faltered in his accompaniment, and said loud out, "This must never happen again," and when Purcell forgot to turn the page, what is it to be supposed Lottie could do, who was not the tenth part of a musician such as they were? She faltered, she went wrong. Tune she could not help keeping, it was in her nature: even her wrong notes were never out of harmony; but in time she went wildly floundering, not even kept right by the signor. Even that did not matter very much, seeing that none of these people, who generally were so critical, so censorious, so ready to be hard upon her out of pure anxiety for her, were in a state of mind to perceive the mistakes she was making. And it was only vaguely that Lottie herself was aware of them. Her whole attention was attracted in spite of herself by the whispering in the corner.

"Oh, thank you so much," Augusta broke forth, when she came to an end. "What a charming bit that is! It is Schubert, of course, but I don't know it. The time was a little odd, but the melody was beautiful."

"You know my weakness," said the signor stiffly, turning round. "I cannot answer for myself when people are talking. I am capable of doing anything that is wrong."

"Oh, I remember," cried Mrs. Daventry; "you used to be very stern with all our little societies. Not a word were we allowed to say. We all thought it hard, but of course it was better for us in the long run. And are you as tyrannical as ever, signor?"

"Not so tyrannical since ladies come here, and carry on their charming conversation all the same. I only wish I could have profited by it. It seemed amusing and instructive. If I were not unhappily one of those poor creatures who can only do one thing at a time ——"

"Oh, signor, how very severe you are!" said Augusta. "I was only telling my cousin some old stories which I am sure you must have heard weeks ago. You know the Donjons? No! Oh, I thought everybody knew the Augustus Donjons. They go everywhere; they have friends in music and friends in art, and you meet all sorts of people at their house. Lottie, when you are a great singer, I hope you will remember me, and send me cards now and then for one of your concerts. There are so many things going on now, and all so expensive, that people in our circumstances really can't do everything. Spencer has stalls where we go when there is anything particular, but I assure you, nowadays, one can no more afford a box at the opera —— You know, signor; but I daresay your friends always find you places somewhere."

"That is true. If everything else fails, a friend of mine who plays second violin will lend me his instrument," said the signor, "or a box-keeper now and then will be glad of an evening's holiday. They are blasés, these people. They do not care if Patti sings. They will rather have a holiday and go to a music-hall."

Augusta looked at her cousin, puzzled. She did not see the irony. After all, she thought, there was not, perhaps, so very much difference between a musician and those perfectly gentlemanlike people who showed you to your box or your stall. She had often thought how nice they looked. The signor saw her bewilderment, and added, with a smile, "You have never recognized me in my borrowed part?"

"Oh, signor! — certainly not. I never meant to say anything that would suggest — to imply anything that might — indeed, I hope you will not think I have been indiscreet," cried Augusta. "But, Rollo, we must go, we must certainly go. I told mamma you would come with me to see the old Skeffingtons. Spencer is away, and I must return their call. Signor, I do hope you will forgive me. I meant nothing that was disagreeable. I am sure we are all put to worse straits than that, in order to get a little amusement without ruining ourselves. Oh, Rollo, please come away."

Rollo had snatched an instant as Lottie gathered her music together. "It is not my fault," he said. "She never lets me alone. I did not know she was coming here to-day. Do not put on that strange look."

"Have I a strange look?" Lottie said. What ups and downs were hers! — the other day so triumphant, and now again so cast down and discouraged. The tears were standing in her eyes, but she looked at him bravely. "It does not matter," she said; "perhaps she does not mean it. It takes away my heart, and then I have not any voice."

"Oh, my love!" he whispered under his breath. "And I must put up with it all. At the elm-tree, dear, to-night."

"Oh, no, no," she said.

"Why no, no? It is not my fault. Dear, for pity ——"

"What are you saying to Miss Despard, Rollo? I am jealous of you, Lottie, my cousin never comes to my lessons. And, indeed, I wonder the signor allows it. It is very delightful for us, but how you can work, really work with such a train!" Augusta turned round and looked severely at Mrs. O'Shaughnessy. "If I were the signor I should not admit one creature except your maid."

But this was an indignity which mortal could not endure. The kind Irishwoman rose to her feet as quickly as the low chair would permit. "And, sure, I agree with the lady," she said. "Lottie, me love, I can bear a deal for you, and I've stood your friend through thick and thin, as all here knows. But come again to the signor's, I won't, not if you were to go down on your knees — unless he gives his word of honor that them that hasn't a scrap of manners, them that don't know how to behave themselves, that whispers when you're singing, and interrupts when you're speaking, will never be here again to insult you — at least not when Mistress O'Shaughnessy's here."

Leaving this fine outburst of indignation to vibrate through the room, Mrs. O'Shaughnessy turned upon her heel, and grasping Lottie by the arm, took the pas from Augusta, and marched out with blazing eyes and countenance flushed with war. "Ye can bring the music," she said to old Pick, who had been listening, and whose disappointment at Lottie's breakdown was great, "and there'll be a shilling for you. I'd scorn to be beholden to one of them." Rollo made an anxious attempt, but in vain, to catch Lottie's eyes as she was swept past him. But Lottie would not return his glance. Augusta had done a great deal more execution with her subtle tactics than Polly with hers — which, perhaps, were not more brutal because they were so much less refined.

"What an odious woman!" Augusta cried; "walking out of the room before me. But, Rollo, she was quite right, though she was so impudent. You ought not to go there. Mamma says you want Lottie Despard for your new opera. She would never do. She has a voice, but she doesn't know how to sing. A good audience would never put up with her."

"That is all a mistake," said Rollo; "it may be very well to know how to sing, but it is much better to have a voice."

"I could not have supposed you were so old-fashioned; never say that in public if you want any one to have any opinion of you. But even if you are so sure of her you should keep away, you should not interfere with her training. The fact is," said Augusta very seriously, "I am dreadfully afraid you have got into some entanglement even now."

"You are very kind," said Rollo, smiling, "to take such care of me."

"I wish I could take a great deal more care. I am almost sure you have got into some entanglement, though of course you will say no. But, Rollo, you know, you might as well hang yourself at once. You could never hold up your head again. I don't know what on earth would become of you. Uncle Courtland would wash his hands of you, and what could any of your friends do? It would be moral suicide," said Augusta, with solemnity. "I told you about young Jonquil, and the state he was in. Rollo! that's the most miserable thing that can happen to a man; other things may go wrong, and mend again; your people may interpose, or a hundred things may happen; but this sort of thing is without hope. Oh, Rollo, take it to heart! There are many things a man may do that don't tell half so much against him. You would be poor, and everybody would give you up. For goodness' sake, Rollo, think of what I say."

He gave her an answer which was not civil, and, as he went along by her side to old Canon Skeffington's, there suddenly gleamed across his mind a recollection of the elm-tree on the slopes, and all the sweetness of the stolen hours which had passed there. And Lottie had said "No." Why should she have said "No"? It seemed to him that he cared for nothing else so much as to know why for this first time she had refused to meet him. Had she begun to understand his proposition? had she found out what it was he meant? Was she afraid of him, or indignant, or —— But she had not looked indignant. Of all things in the world, there was nothing he wanted so much as to know what Lottie meant by that refusal. Yet, notwithstanding, he did take to heart what Augusta said.

AMONG THE BURMESE.

V.

IT is a mortifying discovery which nowadays overtakes the Indian officer who returns to his native land after a ten years' absence, laden with costly and beautiful samples of Oriental workmanship, gold, ivory, and sandalwood, shawls, tapestries, and brocade, when in his first walks through the streets of London he finds exposed in every great thoroughfare, in endless variety, the very counterparts of the treasures with which he has thought to surprise and gratify his friends; for sale too at a price probably below what he has himself paid in the land of their production. From this mortification the officer who has been stationed in Burmah is still almost entirely free, for it is only necessity, as a rule, which brings Europeans to the obscure province separated by a five days' sea voyage from the most eastern Indian port, and out of the direct line from India to China; while it is only within very recent years that the country has been brought into direct steam communication with England.

Bowls and vases of silver or gold of Burmese workmanship have begun to find their way into the windows of English silversmiths, but the traveller who turns aside to visit Burmah may still bring home a cargo of strange and beautiful things of native manufacture, of which he will find no duplicates even in the curiosity-shops.

Not to speak of the rubies of upper Burmah, of which the king of Ava carefully guards the monopoly nor of illuminated books, palmleaf MSS., images and other garniture of the Budhist monastery, a variety of handicrafts indigenous to the province will supply him with a multiplicity of ornamental and other work in many materials — embossed drinking-cups of pure silver and gold, others of silver finely enamelled, necklaces, bracelets, and earrings of characteristic design, swords and knives of shapes peculiar to the country, with sheaths of silver or of wood lashed with bands of knotted cane, lacquer boxes and vessels of a hundred forms, caskets of polished tin the product of local mines, samples of wood carving and ivory carving, of weaving and embroidery in silk and cotton; and if to these are added specimens of costume and of household and other ware, handkerchiefs, petticoats, and curtains, ornaments of amber and glass, bells and gongs, umbrellas, lanterns, and fans, with models of buildings, boats, and human figures to illustrate the whole, a museum might almost be furnished with the special products of Burmese workmanship.

It would be an error indeed to suppose that the stranger has only to land in the country to surround himself at once with the best samples of native work. Any one who has visited India knows how difficult it is in an Eastern country to obtain the finest workmanship of whatever kind. Let alone the wearisome bargaining which is inevitable before the smallest purchase is effected, the most valuable specimens are often not to be had at all except through personal interest; fixed prices are absolutely unknown, and it is often necessary to give an order months before you hope to see the result, and then to be prepared to pay for it a truly fancy price. How far the same difficulties follow the traveller from India to Burmah will be seen in the course of the following sketch of some of the most prominent manufactures of the latter province.

Of all Burmese manufactures that of lacquer ware is perhaps the most characteristic of the country, and of the most universal application. The shallow circular rice-dish from which the Burmese family meal is taken in common, is invariably of polished lacquer; and there is no household in the land, from highest to lowest, no boat on the rivers, no monastery in the remotest jungle, but is provided with its drinking-cups, betel-boxes, clothes-boxes, and dishes of the same material in varying qualities of texture and design.

And an excellent material it is for domestic use: with the same polished surface as china, it is as easily kept clean, while it has the advantage of being both lighter and much less fragile; impervious to air or damp, it serves admirably to keep provisions from insects and clothes from mildew, and for all such purposes lacquer boxes are in universal use. The stranger who lands at Rangoon and would see a display of this manufacture should ask his way to Edwards Street — no great distance from the landing-place. There, down the length of a quiet thoroughfare, in shop after shop open to the street, he may contemplate an array of lacquer boxes, dishes, trays, cups, and other vessels of every size and shape, in rows and masses of red, green, gold, yellow, and black, many of the shapes being unique. Common, however, as the manufacture is, the English stranger who walks into any of the numerous lacquer-shops will not find it the simple matter he would suppose to provide himself with the finest samples. Such are the strange notions of business, or at least of dealing with Europeans, prevailing among Burmese shopkeepers, that often the most liberal offers of payment will not induce them to bring out their best wares, while for those they do show they will ask the most exorbitant price, choosing rather not to sell at all than to abate the demand a jot. The best plan, therefore, of the foreigner is, by the help of his English friends resident in the place, to enlist the services of some native of better social position, who will have no difficulty in drawing forth the desired wares, and who may be trusted to estimate them at their proper value, if not to effect the purchase.

Some of the best lacquer ware is to be seen in the Budhist monasteries, where it is in use for every purpose. Certain conventional shapes are assigned specially for the use of the religious, and the piety of their patrons naturally furnishes the monastery with the richest specimens of the manufacture. By the side of the recluse are usually one or two tapering lacquer boxes called otes, polished in dull red, or thickly gilt and inlaid with patches of looking-glass, and his inseparable companion the betel-box is always of fine lacquer. The latter is of the shape most generally used for every purpose, which may be here described. The foundation of the box is a circular tube, within which are two or more shallow trays fitting into each other, and over all, forming the lid, is an outer tube of thinner texture, nearly the same depth as the box and sliding over it so as to reach within half an inch of the bottom. The polished surface of the outside is painted in fantastic designs, most often a confused pattern of indistinguishable flourishes, sometimes interwoven with grotesque faces or figures. The only colors used are dull red, black, yellow, and green, in one or other combination, and some of the commonest cups are polished with bright gilding.

The process of manufacturing lacquer is slow and elaborate: the foundation of each box is of very fine bamboo cane-work, and the value of the work depends mainly on the fineness and flexibility of the texture. Over this bamboo shell are laid, at intervals of several days, layers of composition of various oils, charcoal, and other materials, which are set to dry in an underground vault kept at a very high temperature — each coat when dry undergoing a process of painting, polishing, and engraving, and the work being finally finished on a lathe.

Here it may naturally be asked how the out-turn of this process compares with the beautifully finished trays and boxes of Japanese ware which are now hardly less common in England than our own home manufactures; and it must be at once confessed that Burmese lacquer cannot for a moment compare with that of Japan, either in finish, polish, or design. Nevertheless the Japanese article is little thought of by the Burmese in comparison with their own more flexible manufacture. Some enterprising person not long ago sent Burmese lacquer boxes to Japan and had the peculiar Burmese shape imitated in Japanese ware: the result was a very beautiful specimen of lacquer work, to the English eye far surpassing the original pattern on which it was modelled. Yet, although an appeal to Burmese taste was made in the form of a peacock with spreading tail (the emblem of royalty) embossed on the lid, nothing could persuade a Burmese lacquer-dealer that it was comparable either for make or design to the products of his own country.

Next to lacquer ware the best known and most widely appreciated of Burmese manufactures is that of vessels and ornaments of silver and gold. Samples and imitations of this rough but rich workmanship are now seen not uncommonly in England; but the most characteristic examples are hardly met with, except in the hands of those who have either had friends in the country or made their own home there. And for this there is sufficient reason; for if there are difficulties in the way of obtaining the best lacquer work, with the magazines of which whole streets are lined, it is a thousand times more difficult to satisfy a desire for the finest work of the silversmith or goldsmith. In the first place, although a recognized and long-established craft, the real masters of it are few, and their services are naturally so much in request that they have always more work on hand than they can accomplish within a given time. Thus, when the Prince of Wales visited India in 1875, commissions from India for Burmese silver work occupied the time of every silversmith in the country, and it was difficult for those on the spot to get any order executed. And when, besides the paucity of workmen, you have to reckon with the total disregard of all considerations of time, the indolence and indifference, even to his own interests, which characterize the ordinary Burman, it may be understood how it is that, having given an order to a silversmith, you remain in absolute uncertainty of the time which it will occupy, and sometimes even of the cost of the work. For silver ware, however, there is a recognized scale of charges; and if a workman of known skill is employed, if the work is one which lends itself readily to the usual native designs, and if unlimited patience is exercised, it is not too much to say that the Burmese silversmith will turn out work worthy to rank, if not for fineness of execution, at least for boldness of design and richness of effect, with that of any country in the world, while it has superadded an indefinable character which is entirely its own.

The most common examples of the ware are drinking-bowls of a uniform pattern, but varying in size, design, and workmanship. Not only in the monastery or among the camp equipage of a party of pilgrims, but even in the Burmese cottage, nothing is commoner than to meet with embossed drinking-cups of solid silver; and not less common is the little silver paste-box, the companion of every betel-box, containing the reddish paste which is smeared on the leaf eaten with the betel-nut. Among the subjects of ornamental silver work are also handles and sheaths of swords and knives, images of Budha, and handles of tattooing-instruments; while of personal ornaments the prettiest are the necklace of silver called a dolizan, and the bracelet made of a broad flexible band of woven silver wire. The dolizan consists of drooping festoons of fine filagree work, turned into shapes of tiny birds, stars, and pendants, attached to a closely linked neck-band, and, whether of gold or silver, is as becoming to the English as to the Burmese girl.

It may be supposed that silver cups of Burmese workmanship and design make very showy vases for public presentation, and at the Rangoon races the chief prize of the meeting is commonly a handsome Burmese silver cup presented by the chief commissioner as head of the local government.

The ordinary drinking-bowls vary little in character, being uniformly circular, without handle of any kind, bulging slightly at the centre, and resembling in shape and proportions an ordinary sugar-basin. The outside surface is almost always marked with broad horizontal bands, round each of which are embossed medallions representing grotesque figures of men, women, beloos, or animals real or fictitious — such, for instance, as the signs of the zodiac. These, with a row of leaves or flowers between, are hammered or punched so as to stand out handsomely in relief.

But though the shape just described is by far the commonest, the best silversmiths have also considerable originality in design, or least in the adaptation of conventional designs, which they will draw on paper in good proportion and with fine accuracy.

In giving an order for silver work it is always necessary to make an advance payment of half the cost, and the size and weight of the work depend exactly on the number of rupees advanced, inasmuch as these are melted down and form the material of which it is manufactured. Payment for the workmanship is made when the work is finished and at a rate agreed upon when the order is given, the rate for the best work being usually one rupee for every rupee's weight employed in the work; thus thirty rupees would be advanced, melted down and manufactured into a cup, and thirty more paid for the work on its completion. Occasionally a Burmese workman shows an inclination to forsake the old native designs and to follow European models, but the indigenous types are so marked and so invariably popular with Europeans that there is less danger of such a perversion than in the case of some of the Indian manufactures. At the same time the Burmese silversmith will make a most creditable copy from any pattern of English workmanship which may be given him for imitation.

The design and execution of gold vessels and ornaments are precisely similar to those in silver, and a pair of gold earrings on the model of pagoda bells, or a gold dolizan necklace, is a present as rare and beautiful as can be brought home from the East. The gold, which is generally supplied by the goldsmith, is very highly colored — almost to redness, and the effect on an embossed cup, covered perhaps with a raised lid surmounted by a bird with outstretched wings, is as rich as it is uncommon.

A very pretty display of gold jewellery of this kind is often called forth by the visit of an official to any of the indigenous mixed schools, and a prettier sight can hardly be imagined than a row of little Burmese girls dressed in many-colored silks and decked with pendant necklaces of deep red gold, with earrings of the same, and sprays for the hair sparkling with jewels.

Enamelling on silver is a branch of this manufacture to which are due the most finished samples of silver ware which the province produces. The work is costly, however, and the workers so few that although the manufacture is more beautiful and really artistic than the ordinary silver ware, the craft is almost an extinct one, and it is only in one or two places that specimens of the enamel are to be had.

At Shwegyeen on the Sittang there is a workman who if ample time is given will turn out enamel work which may compare favorably with the finest of Indian workmanship, and this is saying a good deal. The enamel is invariably black, and its appearance, converting the face of an embossed silver cup into a perfectly smooth and highly polished surface of black and silver, is not unlike that of some Italian and Russian work; but an altogether unique effect is given by the designs, which are very elaborately finished, and consist of the grotesque and fanciful figures which exist only in the imagination of the Burmese artist.

In a Budhist country the manufacture of images of brass, marble, silver, and wood is very widely extended, and though the art displayed in the production of figures of a uniform conventional type is not of a very high character, much skill is shown in the sculpture and manufacture of the several kinds. In some monasteries may be seen, seated in a dimly lighted chamber, under a canopy of carved wood, a brazen image of Budha, from six to eight feet in height, and there are few which do not contain a collection of minor images in marble or silver. The most popular, and perhaps the most effective, images are in the pure white marble of upper Burmah, very finely chiselled, and usually having a few touches of gliding or paint to pick out the line of robe or head-dress. Others are of wood, skilfully carved, and perhaps gilded throughout. Some again are modelled in wax and plated with a coating of pure beaten silver, with perhaps a tiny canopy of silver and beads hung with silver leaves, to represent the tree under which Budha is described as sitting.

The treatment accorded to the images varies in different places, some of the religious houses being clean and carefully kept, others dirty, scantily furnished, and neglected. Thus in one monastery a medley of images, ill-arranged and crowded together, will be apparently treated as little else than lumber, while in another the elaborate surroundings of the shrine allotted to a single image recall to mind those of some altar of the Virgin in a Roman Catholic church. Raised from the ground on a carved wooden pedestal, it is shaded by a richly carved canopy, hung with festoons of paper lace, and surrounded by a group of tall glided umbrellas; and on the ledges of the pedestal and about the foot of the images are arranged perhaps a cluster of smaller images of Budha, gilded and illuminated MSS. in curious coverings of cloth and bamboo, otes and other vessels of lacquer and silver; the whole constituting a setting altogether in keeping with the living group which completes the scene — shaven ascetics and their attendants in dingy yellow dress, and a motley gathering of village boys who sit at their feet for instruction.

While images such as these furnish the interior of the monasteries, the open chapels of nearly every large pagoda are filled with others of colossal proportions, of which the substance is of brick and the facing either of plaster or polished chunam. And this leads me to notice a very old form of Burmese industry, the manufacture and use of bricks. Although the abundant timber of the local forests supplies the principal building-material for all substantial houses, the foundations and steps of very many of the religious buildings are of brick faced with plaster, the entrance being often flanked by huge figures of fabulous monsters in the same material. The solid substance of every pagoda in the country is of brick; so generally are the steps by which it is approached and the paving of the platform on which it stands, while throughout the province, to its farthest corners, the centre of the village street and the pathway which leads to the neighboring monastery will be found paved down the centre with a narrow trottoir of bricks or tiles.

To the inseparable accompaniments of the national religion is owing another industry for which Burmah has been noted from ancient times, the casting and manufacture of bells and gongs. There is no pagoda great or small which has not its gilded spiral crown or tee, with rings of sweet-toned bells of many sizes and materials. To the tongue of each bell is suspended a leaf-shaped metal pendant, which hangs below the bell's mouth, and is caught by every breath of wind, so that even in the stillest night the music of pagoda bells on the hilltops is hardly ever silent. But besides the tinkling which in the neighborhood of a pagoda makes the air musical overhead, the visitor hears at intervals — frequent on a festival morning — the deeper tone of some great bell hung close to the ground near the base of the pagoda; for one of the common acts of devotion among Burmese Budhists consists in striking these huge bells — which have no tongue — five or six times in succession with a club or the butt-end of a stag's horn, which usually lies near at hand for the purpose.

These bells vary much in size and decoration, but with one notable exception in upper Burmah, none probably can surpass the monster which hangs on the platform of the Shwedagone at Rangoon, and which baffled by its size and weight the efforts of the English to carry it away as a trophy after the war. The pagoda stands on a hill about a mile and a half from the river, and the story is that the English, having successfully transported the bell to the river-side, were at last compelled to abandon it embedded in the mud on the banks, and that the Burmese subsequently raised it and replaced it in triumph on its original site on the pagoda hill, where it remains to this day.

Some of the larger bells have handles formed of grotesque figures in solid metal, and not uncommonly a bell is slung over the shoulders of two solid wooden figures of hideous beloos. Circular gongs, of the kind commonly known in England, are to be found of every size in the bazaars of Rangoon, and may be bought in the smaller sizes, very sweet in tone, for a few rupees. The most characteristic Burmese gong, however, consists of a triangle of solid bell-metal, about half an inch in thickness, suspended by a string, which swings round and round when struck.

The clear ringing tone of these gongs is familiar to every one who has lived in Burmah as the call by which in every town and village the monks of the locality ask for their morning alms, as they parade the streets in procession, with lacquer boxes slung round their necks to receive the daily collections of rice.

Before leaving the subject of metal work, mention must be made of the manufactures of tin, the product of mines in the Mergui district in the extreme south of the province.

The caskets, tea-boxes, cigar-boxes, models of pagodas, and ornaments of various kinds made in this material, are, next to silver, among the prettiest ornamental work of the country; and they are not the less to be appreciated from the fact that it seems now to be almost certain that, long and patiently as these mines have been worked by Chinese immigrants, the ore has no depth and will before long be exhausted. An English firm has within the last few years resigned in disappointment its lease of some of the most promising mines, after considerable expenditure on roads, machinery, and buildings.

Some notion of the extent of the mines may be gathered from the official statement that during the last two years, 1875–76 and 1876–77, the English firm had turned out 755 cwts. of tin valued at 1 984*l*., and the Chinese 1,025 cwts. valued at 4,196*l*. The tin which is found appears to be very pure, and the ornaments made from it in Moulmein and Rangoon shine like polished silver, for which they might easily be at first sight mistaken. They are made and sold by Chinamen, and are generally engraved with a style, in fanciful patterns of Chinese figures and letters. Being at the same time cheap, pretty, and peculiar to the province, the Burmese tin work ranks high among curiosities of Eastern manufacture.

A very conspicuous place in the present list must also be assigned to wood carving. As the first objects to attract the eye in Burmah are the monastic and other religious buildings, so it is the tasteful and elaborate wood carving with which they are enriched which draws to their exterior more than a passing notice. It is here that we find most conspicuously displayed the national love of decoration in building and the taste which characterizes the native architecture, while the careful finish given to every part alike speaks to the artistic character of the work, of which the form is determined by a combination of motives. The Budhist theory of a future state prompts its professors to a lavish expenditure on religious buildings, while the traditional fashion assigned to the Burmese monastery lends itself readily to architectural decoration. The innumerable gables, projecting eaves and cornices, and the multiple tapering roofs give the wood-carver unlimited scope for the exercise of his craft, and a superstitious desire to avert future evils by present good works makes the provision of handsome and luxurious retreats for the religious, and costly shrines for the most venerated images, the most popular form of almsgiving.

Some fine samples of decoration of this kind may be seen in the monasteries of Rangoon and Moulmein: the porches and chapels of the Shwedagone pagoda are rich in the most finished carving, and the decoration of more than one of the neighboring monasteries is in no way inferior. Throughout the province, moreover, the same artistic display testifies to the same religious devotion. The public gardens at Calcutta contain a specimen of Burmese wood carving in a profusely decorated thain, or shrine, transported bodily from Prome as a trophy of the last war, and looking sadly out of place amidst its foreign surroundings.

But the religious buildings are by no means the exclusive domain of the wood-carver's art, and the popular love of ornament and taste in decoration are shown in the carving lavished upon boats of every kind to which I have drawn attention in a former paper, on the quaint bullock carts used for travelling by land, and on the panelled walls of the better classes of houses. The same manufacture turns out also furniture for English houses, such as punkahs, chairs, screens, sideboards, picture-frames, and the like, which give a picturesqueness of its own to the Anglo-Burmese house. This application of the craft is now made prominent in the manufacturing departments of the principal jails of the province, where the Burmese and Chinese prisoners are employed in making large quantities of household furniture, both plain and ornamental. Lastly, the visitor to Burmah, who finds an interest in the curious buildings, boats, and figures by which he is surrounded, may, if he takes the trouble to find out a skilled carver, carry away with him well-finished models of pagodas, houses, shrines, boats, musical instruments, and figures illustrative of native costume, which will better than any verbal description convey to his friends a correct notion of the strange realities. He will not often find in the work the fineness which characterizes similar manufactures in India, but on the rougher workmanship will be stamped an individual character which corresponds to that of the people of whose country it is the product.

Some very beautiful if rather rough carving in ivory is also among the favorite treasures secured by the traveller in Burmah. I have seen an exceedingly handsome pair of vases made of the ends of two large tusks richly carved and mounted in a setting of gold, both carving and setting of Burmese workmanship; but the commonest samples of this work are sword-handles, knife-handles, and paper-knives. Handles for a set of dinner knives are often made to order, and paper-knives with a rim of enamel on silver are now made to suit the taste of Europeans. The ivory is of pure white and the carving very elaborate; thus a sword-handle will be so perforated through and through, with fantastic figures standing out clearly in the midst of a shell of filagree work, that it becomes too brittle for anything like rough usage. The ivory carving has, however, the same roughness which marks so much of Burmese work, and as regards finish can no more be compared to the Chinese carving than Burmese lacquer to that of Japan.

Hitherto I have spoken chiefly of the manufacture of hard substances which give employment for the most part to men; but as in the management of domestic affairs, and even of business transactions, the women of Burmah are conspicuous among Eastern women as the true help-meets of their husbands, so also they have their share in the provincial manufactures. Throughout Burmah the hand loom is a common part of cottage furniture, and the weaving of fabrics of silk and cotton (one of the most extensive of the local manufactures) is almost exclusively carried on by the women, who weave cloth both for the use of their families and for sale. Of late years the cheap and gay-colored silks and cottons imported from England have become highly popular with the Burmese for turbans and jackets; but for the best dresses, whether of men or women, nothing has yet superseded the indigenous manufacture, with its richness both of color and texture, and even for the commonest petticoats and kilts the cloth woven in the cottages of the country is almost universally used. The patterns of the silk fabrics are curiously like those of Scotch tartans, the blending of the colors being generally very tasteful; and some of the finer textures are exceedingly soft, especially those worn as neckerchiefs by the women.

This manufacture is carried on also by the Karens, both the workmanship and materials being in their case rougher in character though not less effective in appearance. The Karen women in some parts of the province wear as a headdress a thick coarse cotton cloth, folded square and thrown over the head, almost identical both in fashion and effect with that worn by Neapolitan women; and this headdress is often roughly embroidered in colors which render it highly picturesque.

The peculiar jacket worn by the Karen girls is also sometimes embroidered in colors on a black silk ground.

For the silk-weaving, country produce is abundant, and the breeding of silkworms and manufacture of silk is the special occupation of the people in certain districts; but the occupation is so abhorrent to the teaching of Budhism, as involving the death of the worms, that its followers are regarded with horror by the orthodox Buddhists who form the majority of the population.

Under the head of cloth fabrics must be noticed, in conclusion, the manufacture of a very peculiar kind of ornamental tapestry, or rather patchwork, which serves for various domestic purposes, especially for the curtains which, in this land of open zayats and ill-partitioned houses, are used as temporary screens, either in travelling or at home, or when encamping in the open, and which serve also as a covering for the bullock carts to which reference has been made above.

Among the many incidents of Burmese life which when first seen strike the foreigner by their strangeness and marvellously picturesque effect, and of which it is only familiarity which effaces the first impression, a place may fitly be given here to the procession of bullock carts which may be seen in the neighborhood of any great pagoda at a festival time wending their way from the country or from the river-side loaded with pilgrims, drawn by diminutive bullocks, well shaped and well fed, their heads decked with strings of shells and sprays of flowers. The cart, of dark mahogany-colored wood and of shape and proportions which defy description, is sheltered from the sun by an arched framework of bamboo covered with scarlet cloth, from under which as it passes by peep out the heads of boys and girls of every age, dressed out in their best and packed like ripe fruit in the straw. The rug or curtain which covers the cart, and which has led me to this digression, consists of a groundwork of thick, coarse red cloth, upon which is overlaid, in patches of many-colored cloths, a complete picture, representing some dramatic scene, in the peculiar style of Burmese drawing. The coloring and shading of faces and dresses are done with almost as much care as in a painting, and the whole is enlivened with glittering spangles, which add to the brightness of the effect.

A complete account of Burmese manufactures would include many others which have not been even mentioned here, such as those of salt, napee, umbrellas, earthenware, and other adjuncts of domestic life, but from the list already given it may be gathered that while the traveller and collector of curiosities will find in Burmah much beautiful work of native manufacture such as cannot be found elsewhere, the observer of national peculiarities may see in the manufacturing industries of the province the reflection of much that is characteristic in the native habits of mind — in accepted canons of taste, in traditional methods of working, in contrast of colors, in roughness of finish and in grotesqueness of design. Speaking broadly of the character of Burmese handicrafts, it may be said that they are distinguished by boldness and originality of design, by faithfulness of execution, and in most cases by a want of finish due as much to indifference as to any lack of ability; while the taste which they display, indigenous as it probably is to the country, is frequently, if not generally, such as to appeal at once to the most fastidious of Western critics.

It is very noticeable, too, how here, as in India, the workmanship in almost every branch of manufacture improves from year to year under the stimulus given by foreigners. As in the beautiful manufactures of horn and ivory from the Malabar coast, the brass vessels from Benares, and the carved sandalwood from Bombay, the exquisitely finished work of the present day far surpasses that produced twenty years ago, so even in Burmah, late as has been its incorporation with the empire, and far behind as it lags in many respects, a steady advance is perceptible in the quality at least of the finer local manufactures, side by side with that in matters of greater import.

RACINE AND HIS WORKS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MIRABEAU," ETC.

IN my essay upon Corneille * I have said that in judging the works of that writer "we must forget for a time all our former dramatic studies, and keep constantly before us the opposite principles upon which the English and the French legitimate drama are constructed, and the deduction therefrom, that the beauties of the one would be the faults of the other." This sentence applies with equal force to the consideration of the plays of his successor, Racine. The works of neither of these writers, although professedly modelled upon those of Euripides, resemble the Greek drama, except in the choice of subject and the strict observance of the so-called Aristotelian unities. They were simply the offspring of the bastard classicism of the Renaissance, an attempt to resuscitate forms of art that had been dead for two thousand years, and adapt them to the expression of a new world of ideas with which they had nothing in common. The drama of Greece embodied the religion, the traditions, and the manners of the people — it was as national as that of the age of our Elizabeth; the French classical drama endeavored to embody forms of thought with which the modern world is in direct antagonism, with which it is impossible to re-awaken any sympathy. It was an exotic which died almost with its creators.

Its parents were Corneille and Racine, who might be said to hold the respective places of father and mother: the first was its progenitor, but to the care of the second it owed its beauty and perfection. The genius of the two men might be imaged under the same symbol: that of the first was masculine, rugged, creative; that of the second feminine, gentle, perfectioning. Corneille rises at times to heights that Racine could never scale; "Corneille," said Molière, "has, like Socrates, a familiar demon. At certain times this spirit visits him, and taking his pen writes whole pages of whose incomparable beauty Old Pierre is quite unconscious; for when the genius is gone he quietly resumes the pen, and does not perceive the difference." Racine never approached the power of "Horace," nor, unless it might be in "Phèdre," the tragic horror of "Radogune;" but he has a sustained beauty to which his elder rival cannot pretend. I confess to have read the plays of the latter as a task, and with scarcely any curiosity; but those of the former I perused with pleasure and deep interest. Racine always interests us and holds us in suspense from beginning to end; his characters are more human than those of Old Pierre, which are so impossibly vicious or virtuous, so unlovably exalted or degraded, that they are abstractions rather than creatures of flesh and blood; they talk in antitheses, they make love in metaphysical discourses, they declaim, but never feel.

The French classic drama is purely artificial; no attempt at reality, or even vraisemblance, is ever made. The scene of "Iphigénie" is laid in the Greek camp; thousands of men and twenty kings are gathered there, impatient for a favorable breeze to fill their sails; these are constantly talked about, they are the machinery that moves the plot, and yet the dialogue, which seldom goes beyond a duologue, gives us no indication of the presence of such a host; there being no bustle, no excitement, no crowd; the action might as well, for all we see to the contrary, take place upon a desert island. In "Britannicus" we are not vouchsafed a glimpse of the gorgeous court of Nero, who walks about unattended as though he were a private citizen; the same objection may be made to "Bajazet." Where are the splendid seraglio and Oriental magnificence of the Turks, then scarcely past the zenith of their power? This renders such works infinitely frigid and unnatural to those accustomed to the crowded, bustling stage of Shakespeare. "Athalie," which by a strange contradiction was not written for the public stage, is the only one of his plays in which any excitement is produced by such subordinate means. Nothing can be more fatiguing than the perpetually recurring rhyme, and the monotonous smoothness and elegance of the language, which is always the same, whether it comes from the mouth of a king or an attendant; nothing can be more tedious and unnatural than the interminable length of the speeches, the lengthy narratives and descriptions of the heroes and heroines, and their confidants — that most clumsy of all inventions. The simple and artistic method of acquainting the spectators with the incidents of the plot that precede the rising of the curtain, by a conversation between inferior characters, used by the English school, was not permitted to that of Racine. The hero and heroine must tell their own stories, and confide in a second person such feelings and secrets as you could not by any strain of the possible imagine any human being confessing. Of the unities I have spoken in "Corneille," but I cannot forbear referring to the monstrous improbabilities into which it conducts Racine in "Mithridate." News is brought that Mithridates has been killed in a battle with the Romans — he returns, puts into action a plot for testing the true dispositions of his two sons — discovers their love for his affianced wife, Monime — conceives the idea of invading Rome — his country is invaded by the Romans — essays upon himself the effects of several deadly poisons (he was supposed to be poison-proof) — slays himself with his sword — a battle is fought and the invaders are put to flight, and all these things are done within twenty-four hours!

These works, that seldom deigned to any subjects more modern than those furnished by the myths and legends of Greece and Rome, were, after all, but a reflection of the court of France. Corneille belonged to the Richelieu and Mazarin times, eras of transition and turbulence, and there is a certain ruggedness in his genius, a boldness and an independence that chafe at restrictions. Racine wrote wholly and only during the brilliant calm of the court of the grand monarque, and the smoothness of his diction, the polish and evenness of his works, perfectly reflect the serene sky under which they were produced. But the similitude goes much further; the poet was obliged to adapt the persons and manners of his plays, no matter whether Greek, Roman, or Turkish, to the sympathies of his audience, and in no way depart from that which was comme il faut to those fine ladies and gentlemen. Thus we find the Achilles of Homer transformed into such a ceremonious, gallant, and peppery Achille as might have fought at Nerwinde or Ramilies; he addresses Iphigénie in the courtly phrase of such a preux chevalier, and the daughter of Agamemnon receives his attentions in the same strain. But what else could be expected from an Achille or a Hippolyte in a full-skirted velvet coat, breeches and silk stockings rolled above the knee, red-heeled shoes, three-cornered plumed hat, and flowing peruke à la Louis XIV.? or from an Iphigenia or Andromache with befeathered head, dresses of gorgeous silk embroidered with gold and distended by a huge hoop, white gloves, and fan in hand? For it was thus all characters of all ages and nationalities were dressed upon that stage, the only difference being that warriors wore a cuirass and scarf over their coats. Gallantry was therefore the order of the day. Every play was bound to have a sentimental love-story, conducted according to those outward proprieties upon which the lover of Montespan and Co. was so exacting. Pyrrhus, in defiance of history and the known custom of the ancient Greeks, implores his captive, Andromache, to permit him to lead her to the hymeneal altar, just as M. le Marquis might have pleaded to some obdurate fair one to celebrate the nuptial tie before the archbishop of Paris at Notre Dame. Even Pyrrhus, however, was declared to be a little too rugged; had he been reduced to a petit maître he would have been better liked. The sine quâ non of a love-story, as may be imagined, greatly narrowed the poet's choice of subjects, and sometimes spoiled those he did choose. Here was an advantage Corneille possessed over his younger rival; that restriction was not so absolute in his earlier days, hence in some of his finest works — "Horace" and "Cinna," for instance — love plays little or no part. Nevertheless, Racine's strength lay in the delineation of the tender passion, and despite his artificialities few have ever drawn it with greater tenderness and beauty. Thus it is only in such plays as "Phèdre," and perhaps "Britannicus," that we feel it to be intrusive. Indeed, the charm and power of Racine's genius lay in his delineation of women. Few writers have drawn the female character so truthfully, vigorously, and exquisitely as he. His heroines always overshadow his heroes; all our sympathies, be they good or evil, are bound up with them; and the male personages are, with few exceptions, of secondary importance. What care we for Achille, Bajazet, Mithridate, Pyrrhus, Hippolyte? After a time they almost pass out of our memories; but who can ever forget Iphigénie, Roxane, Hermione, and, above all, Phèdre? Racine was accused of writing all his plays for his pupil, the great Champsmelée, and this predominance of the female element in them certainly lends color to the suggestion.

I have no space in an article so brief to enter into the slightest analysis of Racine's several plays, neither would it prove interesting to those unread in them. Of all his works, "Phèdre" is that upon which his claim to genius rests the most soundly. It is not the "Phædra" of Euripides; it is a character that excites our pity rather than our aversion, and it lacks, perhaps, the terrible power of the Greek; but it is a subtle, delicate, and sublime creation, full of fire and real passion, which will never cease to hold an audience awe-struck and spell-bound whenever a genius such as that of Rachel is brought to its interpretation. I would love to extract some of its splendid passages, but space forbids. A work of quite another kind is "Bérénice." Few love-stories in the world are more beautifully tender, more exquisitely pathetic, than that which records the separation of Titus and the queen of Palestine; it has not the tragic gloom of "Romeo and Juliet," and "The Bride of Lammermoor," nor the guilty passion of "Julie," but it leaves upon the mind a sweet melancholy, like a remembrance of the long-buried dead. It is customary to rate "Athalie" as his masterpiece, but with all its splendid passages — and upon these he certainly lavished his finest powers — the plot is uninteresting, and the dialogue at times insufferably tedious; in the choruses he has ventured to imitate that which is inimitable, the Psalms, and the result, fine as these introductions undoubtedly are, is not in favor of the French version.

Voltaire pronounced "Iphigénie" "the most perfect of tragedies." With its many beauties — and there are very charming touches in the heroine's character, while that of Clytemnestra is drawn with rare power — few would be inclined to agree with such a verdict, while Euripides' tragedy upon the same subject continues to exist. "Andromaque" is remarkable for the character of Hermione, one of the subtlest and most powerful female creations ever drawn by poet's pen. "Mithridate," "Bajazet," "Britannicus," have all much power and beauty; but it is a power and beauty with which this age has little sympathy. The nineteenth century is nothing if not "natural;" Racine is the very archetype of the artificial. Whether the lunacies and abominable vulgarisms of the modern school will ultimately produce a reaction, perhaps tending to the opposite extreme, and so bring such writers into esteem again, it is impossible to predict, but at the present time, even in his own country, he is regarded as little more than a fossil of an extinct world.

But let us now turn from the writings to the man.

In the beautiful valley of Chevreuse, not far from Versailles, and about ten leagues from Paris, was an ancient abbey of the Cistercian order, founded in 1204, and called Port-Royal-des-Champs. It was favored with many privileges, among others a permission to receive within its walls those persons, male or female, who wished to seek the retirement of the cloister without binding themselves by monastic vows. Towards the close of the sixteenth century it attained a great celebrity under the direction of Marie Angélique Arnauld, who, devoting her life to the reform of the licentious abuses which disgraced conventual establishments, introduced there a pure and rigid discipline. By-and-by the sisterhood so increased that it became necessary to remove it to more commodious quarters; a house was purchased in the Faubourg St. Jacques, and called the Port-Royal of Paris, and thither after a time the nuns removed. The old abbey was now deserted by all except the domestics. But not for long. About 1647 M. le Maîstre, an advocate, and his two brothers, all three young men, and all three nephews of Madame Arnauld, resolved to retire from the world and take up their abode at Port-Royal-des-Champs. They were speedily joined by others. It was a desolate spot — a region of swamps, weeds, and sterility. By the labor of their own hands these young hermits, most of them of gentle blood, converted this howling wilderness into a scene of rural beauty. The society continued to receive fresh recruits; it did not bind itself by any vows, but each led a life of voluntary poverty, penance, and self-denial; their dress was not monastic, and was distinguished only by its extreme plainness and coarseness. Each, without any consideration of birth, was put to such employment as best suited his capacities. Some cultivated the ground, others were set apart as physicians, schoolmasters, and nurses for the sick poor.

A year or two afterwards, the house in Paris becoming too crowded by ever-increasing numbers, a portion of the sisterhood, under Mère Angélique, returned to the abbey. By-and-by it grew to be the fashion for people of rank and station to retire thither. Among these voluntary recluses were the Duchesse de Luynes, the Duc and Duchesse de Liancourt, the Princesse Guiméné, the Marquise de Sablé, etc. But it is not as an abode of asceticism that its fame has descended to posterity, but as the great educational establishment wherein some of the greatest French writers received their mental training. The name of Blaise Pascal alone would immortalize it; and it was here, amidst the sombre shadows of the old abbey and the deep solitudes of its woods, that JEAN RACINE pondered over the pages of Euripides and first conceived a passionate love of poetry.

I have dwelt thus long upon Port-Royal and its votaries as being one of the most important features of the seventeenth century, and because its influences may be said to have entirely controlled the latter years of Racine's life. The after-fate of the order, its dispute with the Jesuits and ultimate suppression, under circumstances of cruelty that raised its votaries to the dignity of martyrs, do not come within the scope of this article, but may be found in any history of the period.

Racine was born at La Ferté Miton on the 21st of December, 1639, of a highly respectable bourgeois family. At four years of age he lost both his parents and was taken under the care of his maternal grandfather, Pierre Sconin, who placed him at the College of Beauvais. There he remained until he was sixteen, at which period his grandfather died and he was removed to Port-Royal, of which society his grandmother and aunt were already members. His progress in the Greek language — he is said to have mastered the dramatists in less than twelve months — delighted his instructors; but his love for poetry filled their ascetic minds with alarm. He remained three years at Port-Royal, and throughout his life retained the deepest reverence for the great Arnauld and the excellent brethren. Thence he proceeded to the Collége d'Harcourt (Louis-le-Grand) to complete his studies. His first poetical attempt, if we except certain mediocre Latin verses, was an ode on the king's marriage (1660), "La Nymphe de la Seine." He sent it to Chapelaine, the then sovereign arbitrator of Parnassus, who, after making some corrections, of which the poet had the good sense to approve, pronounced it to be the best poem produced upon the occasion, and brought it so strongly before the attention of Colbert that that minister sent the writer a purse of a hundred louis, and soon afterwards conferred upon him a pension of six hundred livres. Thus from his earliest production he dated his rise at court. This pension was all he had to depend upon, and it was scarcely sufficient for the requirements of the most frugal life.

About this time, however, he received an invitation from an uncle, who was a canon of the church of St. Geneviève, at Uzès, in Languedoc, and an intimation that he might, if he chose, succeed to the benefice. So to Languedoc he went, and applied himself to the study of theology; but Virgil and Ariosto divided his time with the saints, and probably got the larger share. Another ode, "La Renommée, was the means of introducing him to Boileau, then a young unknown man, yet some three years his senior. Boileau pronounced so high a eulogy upon it that Racine wrote and begged to be admitted to his acquaintance; it was the commencement of a friendship upon which no shadow, save that of death, ever fell.

Our young poet, consumed by the sacred fire, soon became disgusted with theology, and making up his mind to link his fortunes with his love, came to Paris in 1664 with a play in his pocket entitled "Théagène et Chariclée," which he had probably composed after the reading of Bishop Heliodorus's romance at Port-Royal. He offered it to Molière, who, although the piece was valueless, fancied he discovered in it such promise of future excellence that he desired the writer to visit him again at the end of six months, and in the mean time apply himself to the most diligent study. Some years previously, long before he came to Paris, Molière had written a tragedy entitled "La Thébaïde," which, having failed, he destroyed; it now occurred to him to employ the young Racine upon the same subject. The proposal was made, eagerly accepted, and "Les Frères Ennemis" was produced in 1664, with a very fair amount of success, for a first work. Neither this, however, nor its successor, "Alexandre," rose above mediocrity, nor gave any promise of that genius which was thereafter to illume the French stage. The second tragedy was the cause of his friendship being broken with two of the most illustrious men of the time. It was read to Corneille previous to its representation, and the great dramatist delivered it as his judgment that although the author had a great talent for poetry he had none for the drama, and should therefore abandon it. Racine never forgave this criticism. "Alexandre" was originally produced at Molière's theatre, but the author being dissatisfied with the acting, removed it to the Hôtel de Burgogne, taking with it one of Molière's best actresses. This created a coolness between our young poet and his first patron which was never removed, and although they frequently met at Boileau's they were never again friends.

Boileau had a room in the Rue du Vieux Colombier, where all the rising geniuses of the age assembled. Thither came the bon vivant Chapelle, not a genius, by-the-by, but a glorious boon companion, Molière the silent, La Fontaine the butterfly, our amiable and refined Jean Racine, and over these reunions presided the dry, caustic, and pedantically correct host. They were not quite so free as those of Scarron and the Pomme du Pin in the old Fronde days, nor so correct as those of the Hôtel de Rambouillet and of Madame Scudéri, but they must have been the more delightful for hitting the happy mean. La Fontaine, in his "Amours de Psyché et Cupidon," best describes them.

Four friends, whose acquaintance, commenced by Parnassus, formed what might have been called an academy, if their number had been greater, and they had regarded the Muses as much as their pleasure. The first thing they did was to banish from among them all set conversation and everything that savored of the academic conference. When they found themselves together, and they had talked of their divertissements, if by chance they fell upon scientific topics or something that related to belles lettres, they profited by the occasion. They never dwelt too long upon one subject, flying from one to another like bees who meet in their way different kinds of flowers. . . . Often in fine weather Acante (Racine) proposed a walk to some place out of town far away where few people frequented. He greatly loved gardens, flowers, shades.

Polyphile (La Fontaine) resembled him in that, but one may say that he loved all things. These passions, which filled their heart with a certain tenderness, were transferred into their writings, and formed their principal character.

Racine rested two years, and then brought forth his first great work, "Andromaque."* No play since Corneille's "Cid" had been received with such enthusiasm. His two previous dramas were but weak imitations of his predecessor, but in this third effort he became a creator; henceforth Euripides and not Corneille was to be his model. During those two years of silence he had studied hard beneath the severe discipline of his friend, Boileau. He had once boasted of his great facility in versifying: "I wish you would learn to versify with difficulty," replied the critic; "for my part I always make the last verse first, I should advise you to do the same." Racine took his counsel, abandoned his fatal facility, and so acquired that perfection of style which renders him the model, par excellence, of French classic poetry.

Never was man surely so thin-skinned as this poet; self-esteem must certainly have tyrannized over every other faculty of his mind. We have seen it already lose him two friends; we now find it creating a breach between him and the Port-Royalists. In one of his celebrated letters, Nicole, who had been Racine's instructor, animadverted rather strongly upon romancists and dramatists but without indicating any by name. Racine, who had been previously offended by a refusal of his aunt, Mère Agnès, to receive a visit from him on account of his intimacy "with a class of persons whose name is abominable to every one who retains but a grain of piety," now chose to take those censures to himself, and reply to Nicole in a very violent letter. The Port-Royal did not deign to notice it, but others took up their cause, and provoked a second epistle from the irate poet more bitter than the first. He showed it to Boileau: "It may do credit to your head, but none to your heart," replied the satirist, and prevailed upon him, not only not to publish it, but to recall all the copies he could obtain of the first. It was ten years, however, before he could overcome the displeasure of the Jansenists, who were pious enough to resent a wrong, but not Christian enough to easily forgive one.

* An English version, under the title of "The Distressed Mother," by Ambrose Philips, held our stage until a comparatively recent date.

During this quarrel he had been presented with a benefice, and "the privilege" of the first edition of "Andromaque" was granted to "M. Jean Racine, Prieur de l'Epinay." He held his priory, however, but a few months, for no sooner was he installed than one of the clergy brought an action against him, alleging that Epinay could not be held by any one out of orders.

This procès is said to have suggested his first and last comedy, "Les Plaideurs," produced in 1688. It is an imitation of the "Wasps" of Aristophanes, and ridicules a class which Molière, seemingly, never dared to touch, the lawyers. The action and characters of the play are too extravagant to bring it within the bounds of comedy; it is rather a three-act farce. We have a judge who has such an enthusiasm for his vocation that he will not spare time for eating and sleeping, and even goes to bed in his robes; we have two irrepressible litigants, a bourgeois and a countess, who can find no happiness out of the embroilments of the law; we have the trial of a dog for stealing a capon, in which the proceedings of the French law-courts of the day are humorously burlesqued, and the rhodomontade of the advocates severely caricatured. Two servants represent the counsel. "You will, I believe, make excellent advocates of them, they are very ignorant," says Léandre. Boileau had a brother in the law; he supplied Racine with the technical phrases, and suggested the quarrel scene between Chicaneau and the countess from his experience of a certain Comtesse de Crissé —indeed the three principal personages were all drawn from living originals. The comedy, however, was a failure; somehow the Parisians could not take its humor, and it was withdrawn on the second representation. Molière, always just and generous, although on ill terms with the author, alone praised it, and said openly in the theatre that the comedy was excellent, and that those who ridiculed it deserved themselves to be ridiculed. A month afterwards it was performed as an afterpiece before the king at Versailles, and enjoyed by him with so much gusto that his bursts of immoderate laughter quite astonished the court. Although it was the small hours of the morning when the actors returned to Paris, they proceeded to the poet's lodgings to inform him of his success. It was a quiet retired street in which he lived, and the clatter of the carriages and horses awoke all the neighbors, who seldom heard such sounds even at midday. What could it mean? Nothing less than the arrest of the profane writer who had dared to mock at the majesty of the law. Next day it was rumored all over Paris that Racine had been arrested in the night and thrown into prison!

"Britannicus," which appeared in the same year as "Les Plaideurs," was the first of his historical tragedies. "It is your finest work!" was the verdict of Boileau. The author was of the same opinion, but the public was not. It was received coldly, and attained only eight representations. "There is no sort of cabal," he says in his first preface to this play, "that my enemies have not made against this piece, no censure they have not passed upon it." Then follows a splenetic and unworthy attack upon Corneille, from whose partisans he believed the attack to proceed. "Nothing is so natural as to defend oneself when unjustly attacked. I perceive that Terence himself wrote most of his prologues only to justify himself against the criticisms of an ill-intentioned old poet." This man was ever like a "fretful porcupine," ready to shoot his quills at every touch. Boileau says in one of his letters that it was a passage in this play which occasioned Louis XIV. to withdraw from court ballets, in which he had hitherto figured as a dancer. The passage runs as follows, and applies to Nero: —

Pour toute ambition, pour vertu singulière,
Il excelle à conduire un char dans la carrière;
A disputer des prix indignes de ses mains;
A se donner lui-même en spectacle aux Romains;
A venir prodiguer sa voix sur un théâtre;
A réciter des chants qu'il veut qu'on idolâtre;
Tandis que les soldats, de moments en moments,
Vont arracher pour lui ces applaudissements.

His next work, "Bérénice," was composed at the request of Henriette d'Angleterre, who had chosen the subject as symbolizing the unhappy passion which existed between her and the king, and that separation which both had resolved upon. She employed Corneille upon the same theme, and thus brought about a duel between the two great rivals. The victory rested with the younger; "Titus et Bérénice" is forgotten, but Racine's beautiful play, interpreted by Rachel, drew thousands to the Théâtre Français a quarter of a century ago. Ere, however, either work was given to the public, she who inspired it had died an awful and mysterious death. "Bajazet," his next tragedy, was supposed to have been suggested by the murder of Monaldeschi, the paramour of Christina of Sweden, at Fontainebleau. The character of Roxane, one of his most powerful creations, was expressly written to suit the extraordinary powers of the great actress Champsmelée, whom he had instructed in her art. "She is," says Madame de Sévigné, "I think, altogether the most miraculously fine actress I ever saw: she is a hundred miles beyond the Desœillets; and as to me, who am considered pretty tolerable on the stage, I am not worthy to light the candles when she appears. She is ugly when you are near, and I am not astonished at my son's being overcome by her presence; but when she recites she is adorable." It was she who, under the instruction of her master, first renounced the singsong delivery that then obtained on the Parisian stage, and substituted natural inflections of voice. There was a liaison between Racine and his fair pupil which began at the petits soupers of Ninon de l'Enclos and the Marquis de Sévigné (Madame's son). Our poet, however, was little addicted to such peccadilloes, for his nature was cold, and he who knew so admirably to depict the passion of love never felt it.

In 1673 he produced "Mithridate," which achieved probably the most universal success of all his works. In the same year he was elected a member of the Académie Français. Then followed "Iphigénie," and in 1677 "Phèdre," the grandest of all, and with this his dramatic career may be said to close. Pradon, an obscure dramatist now forgotten, had composed a tragedy upon the same subject which was brought out at the Théâtre Guénégaud at the same time that Racine's work appeared at the Hôtel de Burgogne. The former was taken under the protection of a cabal, who bought up every box at both theatres, crammed the Guénégaud to suffocation with claquers, and left the other empty. Twenty-eight thousand francs were expended on this unworthy artifice. It was impossible, however, that it could secure more than a temporary success for so inferior a production, and it was not long before the great superiority of Racine's tragedy was generally acknowledged and appreciated. But the extremely sensitive nature of the poet received such a shock from its temporary failure that he resolved to at once and forever renounce dramatic composition. Spleen begat piety, a very common parentage: he renounced the theatre and all its works, declared a conviction that all writers of plays and romances were poisoners of the human mind,* for which dictum he had only a few years previously insulted the whole society of Port-Royal — and announced his determination of turning Trappist to atone for the "poison" he had promulgated. The persuasions of his friends, however, succeeded in modifying these terrible resolves into a marriage with the daughter of a bourgeois of Amiens, a very estimable and devout young woman, whose intelligence was wholly absorbed in domestic virtues, and who never read a line of her husband's plays. He became the father of children, in whose presence such profane literature was never mentioned. Some people may discover a laudable penitence for youthful irregularities in such a course of action, but I can discover in it nothing beyond the morbid egotism of what was really a very small mind. "Although the applause I have received may have greatly flattered me, the least critique, however malicious it may have been, has always caused me more annoyance than all the praises have given me pleasure." Such was his confession to his son in after years, and it pictures the whole man: thousands might burn incense before him, but to see one stand aloof made the odor stink in his nostrils, and rendered him the most miserable of men. In considering, however, this sudden access of devotion, it is but just to remember the powerful influence exercised upon his youthful mind by his association with Port-Royal and the Arnaulds. The austere lessons of those ascetics seemed to have ever lingered in his mind, pricking his conscience occasionally for the possible sinfulness of his pursuits, and it only required some sudden shock, such as the cabal against "Phèdre," to develop this into a masterful sentiment.

In the year of the production of "Phèdre," he and Boileau were appointed historiographers to the king, and they accompanied his Majesty in one or two campaigns. Racine's lucubrations were destroyed in the burning of the Maison de Valincourt, at St. Cloud, in 1726. It may be presumed that history did not thereby sustain any considerable loss, as his contributions to it were doubtless little more than inflated panegyrics upon le grand monarque. He was admitted to great intimacy with the king, who loved to converse with him and hear him read, while he and De Montespan played cards. The "history" was the king's favorite subject, for none was so pleasant to him as his own eulogy. During an illness Louis had him to sleep in the next chamber to his, that he might be the more frequently with him. At different times he received in gratuities from the royal purse three thousand nine hundred louis; he had besides one or two posts which must have been tolerably lucrative, as we find him in comfortable circumstances throughout his life. The favor shown by royalty naturally secured him the intimacy of the great. Speaking to his son of his behavior towards his aristocratic friends, he said, "My talent is not to show them I have wit, but to teach them they have it. Thus when you see M. le Duc sometimes pass several hours with me you would be astonished if you were present to find him often go away without my having spoken four words, but I gradually put him in the humor to talk, and he departs much more satisfied with himself than with me." This is the utterance of a perfect courtier, and such he was.

Madame de Maintenon had founded the magnificent conventual establishment of St. Cyr for the education of young ladies. To exercise them in elocution the superior, Madame de Brinon, wrote dramatic pieces, but they were so execrably bad that Maintenon, to whom early associations had given a correct literary taste, was desirous of superseding them by something better. "Andromaque" was tried, but the demoiselles played the love-scenes so well that the royal prude took alarm and put a stop to further representations. She then bethought her of applying to Racine. She accordingly wrote requesting him to compose a dialogue from which all passionate expressions and all love should be banished, that she might convey moral instruction to her scholars under the guise of a pleasant amusement. Boileau urged him to decline, and he was disposed to take this advice, being fearful of compromising the reputation already secured. (We thought, Monsieur Racine, you had renounced all solicitude for such carnal things, regarding them as the offspring of sin?) But vanity got the better of prudence, and he set to work with an eagerness all the greater from long abstention from such pursuits. A few weeks afterwards, in 1689, twelve years after the production of "Phèdre," "Esther" was played at St. Cyr with great splendor. The success was immense. "There never was his own productions that when, at the request of the king, he undertook to teach elocution to one of the princesses, he resigned the office because she proposed to recite some verses from "Andromaque." That this was affectation is proved by the alacrity with which he recommenced composition at the desire of Maintenon.

anything like the anxiety of people to go to St. Cyr," says Madame de la Fayette. "Great and small ran after the piece, and what was intended as a comédie de convent became the most serious affair of the court. The ministers neglected the business of the State to pay court to the king by going to a performance of 'Esther.'" Madame de Sévigné wrote to her daughter in terms of the most extravagant praise concerning it.

The assertion has been accepted by all writers upon Racine that "Esther" was intended to personify Madame de Maintenon; Vashti, Montespan; Aman, Louvois; Asuérus, the king; and that the edict for the destruction of the Jews symbolized the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

That Widow Scarron, the chaste companion of Ninon de l'Enclos, now at the charming age of fifty-nine, took such passages to herself as —

Je ne trouve qu'en vous de ne sais quelle grâce,
Qui me charme toujours et jamais ne me lasse;
De l'aimable vertu doux et puissants attraits,
Tout respire en Esther l'innocence et la paix:
Du chagrin le plus noir elle écarte les ombres.

And —

Dans un lieu séparé de profanes témoins,
Je mets à les former mon étude et mes soins;
Et c'est là que, fuyant l'orgueil du diadème,
Lasse de vains honneurs, et me cherchant moi-même,
Aux pieds de l'Eternel je viens m'humilier,
Et goûter le plaisir de me faire oublier.*

That people should perceive a reference to the fallen favorite De Montespan in —

Peut-être on t'a conté la fameuse disgrâce,
De l'altière Vashti, dont j'occupe la place,
Lorsque le roi, contre elle enflammé de dépits,
La chassa de son trône ainsi que de son lit.
Mais il ne fut sitôt en bannir la pensée:
Vashti régna longtemps sur son âme offensée,† was but natural, and such gross flattery was perfectly in accordance with Racine's character. But Louis XIV. would not have cared to be compared to Asuérus, and no man would certainly have dared to personify the all-powerful and despotic Louvois under such guise as that of Aman. But most absurd of all was it to suppose that this morbidly sensitive poet, who shrank from the lightest breath of censure, who died of a loss of favor, would have dared to so openly beard Louis and his minister upon the persecution of the Protestants; or that he, a rigid and devout Catholic, would have symbolized heretics under the name of the chosen people of God, when Fénelon and Arnauld were in disgrace for a very mild protest against bigotry. Again, would it not have been the severest of satires to represent Esther (De Maintenon) of the race, pleading for them, saving them, when she was one of the most bitter of the persecutors? The French, so quick to perceive real or imaginary coincidences, doubtless fancied they read such things between the lines, but it was only fancy, for Racine would no more have ventured upon such temerity than he would upon assaulting the royal person. He learned thereafter how severely Louis resented the lightest remonstrance; such audacity as this would have consigned him to the Bastille. He chose the subject as one best adapted for the purpose required, without any thought, probably, of its peculiar application, and no doubt took very good care to assure royalty of the fact, or it would not have witnessed its castigation by proxy with so much complacency.

A triumph so complete once more aroused all the poet's eager vanity and thirst for fame, and, selecting a second Scriptural subject, he wrote "Athalie." But in the mean time the Tartuffes had been raising voice and pen against the late theatrical representations at St. Cyr as calculated to instil a love of carnal splendor and amusement in the minds of the pupils; as well as upon the indecorousness of their appearing upon a stage; so "Athalie" was performed only privately in the king's apartments at Versailles, without stage or costume. Some time afterwards, however, it was acted by the ladies and gentlemen of the court with great magnificence. Although an infinitely superior work, it was far from rivalling the success of "Esther;" indeed, it was received but coldly, and as its production upon the public stage was strictly forbidden, it soon fell into oblivion.

The following curious anecdote is related concerning the resuscitation of this work. Two years after Racine's death a number of ladies and gentlemen were assembled at

* "In you alone I find an indescribable grace which ever charms and never wearies me — the soft and powerful features of gentle virtue — all in Esther breathes innocence and peace; of the darkest sorrows she dispels the shadows." "In a place apart from profane eyes my study and care is to train them, and it is there, flying the pride of the diadem, weary of vain honors, studying myself, I come to humble me at the feet of the Eternal, and taste the pleasure of oblivion."

This last passage, it is scarcely necessary to remark, refers to St. Cyr.

† "Perhaps you have been told the famous disgrace of the haughty Vashti, whose place I occupy, when the king, inflamed with wrath against her, drove her from his throne and bed, but he could not so soon banish her from his thoughts. Vashti long reigned in his offended heart." The italicized lines are especially applicable.

a country house near Paris. One evening they were playing a game at forfeits, and the penalty inflicted upon one young man was to read an act of "Athalie." The book was given him, and he was shut up in a cabinet to perform his penance. Some time elapsed, and they were astonished to find he did not return; one of the party going to seek him found him still deeply engaged upon the book; he had read it through once and had just recommenced it, and so enthusiastic was he in his praises that everybody's curiosity was aroused; they begged him to read them some of the scenes, and soon the auditors became as delighted as the reader. The story soon spread all over Paris, and every one became eager to peruse this unknown book; it was reproduced at court, the nobility sustaining all the parts except that of the high priest, which was represented by Baron; a complete reaction set in, and everybody became as enthusiastic over the play as they had recently been indifferent. It was not, however, until the time of the regency, placed upon the public stage, when a child-king being upon the throne imparted a great significance to the character of Joas, and greatly helped the success of the representation.

Disgusted at the failure, Racine laid down his pen in a new fit of spleen, and never raised it again, except to write four canticles for St. Cyr. About the same time a Jesuit master of the College of Louis le Grand furiously attacked his tragedies, saying their author was neither a Christian nor a poet. Boileau immediately took up the cudgels for his friend, who, however, far from resenting the attack, wrote his traducer a very mild letter, in which he said: —

> For a long time God has been graciously pleased to render me insensible to all that can be said of them [his tragedies] either in praise or blame; and I occupy myself only in thinking what excuse I can afford him for having so misspent my time. I beg you, therefore, to tell the Père Bonhoms and all other Jesuits of your acquaintance, that far from being incensed against the professor who has censured my dramatic works, I am rather inclined to thank him for having, while preaching such good moral doctrines in his school, given occasion to a member of his order to evince so much attachment to my interests. Were the offence far greater I should forget it as easily in favor of the great number of reverend fathers who lay claim to my esteem and respect, and above all in favor of the Père la Chaise, who every day confers upon me some fresh act of kindness, and to whom I would sacrifice the resentment of far greater wrongs.

I quote this passage as a sample of Racine's hypocrisy and courtier-like obsequiousness. As we have seen by his own confession, he writhed beneath the slightest touch of criticism, and would break with his best friend for one word of disapproval. During the representation of "Esther," one of the young ladies forgot, only for an instant, a line of her part. "Ah, you have ruined my play!" he cried out from the side in such a tone that she burst into tears — a proof that time had not dulled this susceptibility. But the outward show of piety was the court fashion at that time; and Père la Chaise, the royal confessor, and the Jesuits were omnipotent. Such a little bit of mock humility — the poet dated the letter from Versailles — would be sure to win the favor of Maintenon.

If we required a further proof of the heartless hypocrisy of the man, it would be rendered in the following passage from a letter to his son (1698), in which he speaks of the approaching death of his old chère amie, Champsmelée.

> M. de Rost informs me that Champsmelée is at the point of death, and he seems quite unhappy about it. The most afflicting part of the affair, and that which he does not appear to take into account, is the obstinacy evinced by this poor unfortunate creature in her constant refusal to leave the stage. She has declared, I am told, that she considers it very glorious to die an actress, as she has lived. It is to be hoped she may change like so many others when the awful moment arrives.

Racine was in all things a representative man, an epitome of his age — what that age was like we have endeavored to depict in a previous article. I know not if the daring, undisguised vice of the regency was not preferable to this show of whited sepulchres; it was minus one sin at least — hypocrisy.

We have now arrived at the period of his disgrace, of which there are three different accounts: one author, I think it is Voltaire, ascribes it to his Jansenist tendencies; but Racine had been a Port-Royalist all his life, and was thoroughly recognized as such. Louis Racine, his son, gives the following account: —

> Madame de Maintenon, when privately conversing with him one day upon the misery of the people caused by the desolating war then raging, was so pleased by the justness of his remarks, that she requested him to set down his opinions upon the subject in writing. Receiving from her a promise of secrecy, he consented to do so, and shortly afterwards placed a treatise in her hands which contained some severe strictures upon the condition of the country and the continuation of the war. While she was reading it the king entered and took it from her hand; he insisted upon knowing the name of the author, and after a faint resistance, spite of the pledge she had given, she revealed it. His face darkened. "Because he knows how to make verses perfectly," he said, "does he suppose he knows everything? and because he is a great poet, does he wish to be a minister of state?"* Some time afterwards he ventured to solicit by letter some small favor from the king; it was refused. So deeply did his disgrace prey upon his morbidly sensitive nature that it threw him into a fever, and so aggravated an old disease from which he had been long suffering as to cause his death.

St. Simon ascribes his death to a circumstance which Louis Racine relates very similarly as an anecdote of Boileau. But the authority of that young gentleman, who would have us believe his father to have been the greatest and most immaculate of men, is far from unimpeachable. This is what St. Simon says: —

It sometimes happened that the king had no ministers with him, as on Fridays, and, above all, when the bad weather in winter rendered the sittings very long; then he would send for Racine to amuse him and Madame de Maintenon. Unfortunately the poet was frequently very absent. It happened one evening that, talking with Racine about the theatre, the king asked him why comedy was so much out of fashion. Racine gave several reasons, and concluded by naming the principal — namely, that for want of new pieces the comedians gave old ones, and, amongst others, those of Scarron, which were worth nothing and found no favor with any one. At this the poor widow blushed, not for the reputation of the cripple attacked, but at hearing his name uttered in the presence of his successor! The king was also embarrassed, and the unhappy Racine by the silence that followed felt what a slip he had made. He remained the most confounded of the three, without daring to raise his eyes or to open his mouth. The silence did not terminate for several minutes, so heavy and profound was the surprise. The end was that the king sent away Racine, saying he was going to work. The poet never afterwards recovered his position. Neither the king nor Madame de Maintenon ever spoke to him again or even looked at him; and he conceived so much sorrow at this, that he fell into a languor and died two years afterwards.

Both these accounts are discreditable to Madame de Maintenon. If the son's be correct, it is another instance of that stony selfishness, unredeemed by one generous or even just instinct, which characterized that repulsive woman, at least in her later years. It was she who had led him into disgrace under a pledge she infamously disregarded, therefore it was obviously her duty to save him from the consequences of his indiscretion; but we do not hear of any acknowledgment of her own culpability or even of one word of intercession with his offended master.

But whatever might have been the cause, his disgrace terribly preyed upon the poet's mind, and probably hastened his death. One day, while in his study, he was attacked by such severe pains in the head that he was obliged to be put to bed. He never again left his chamber. Yet his illness was a long and painful one, the result of an abscess in the liver. His parting with Boileau was the most touching incident of his life. When he bade adieu to this old and true friend he raised himself upon his pillow, and, throwing his arms round him, said, "I look upon it as a great blessing for me to have died before you." An operation was performed upon him, but he expired three days afterwards, on the 21st of April 1699, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. He stipulated in his will that he should be buried at Port-Royal. "Ah," remarked a courtier, "he would not have dared to express such a wish in his lifetime!" The king settled a pension of two thousand livres on his widow and children, but expressed no word of regret at his loss. Upon Boileau's informing him that the poet had displayed much courage and fortitude upon his deathbed he replied cynically, "I was told as much, and was greatly surprised at it."

Such was Jean Racine, courtier and poet, and more of the former than of the latter; for, like our own Congreve, he preferred to be known as a man of haut ton rather than as a man of genius.

* Can we believe after this that Louis would strain at such a gnat and yet swallow such a camel as the supposed allusions in "Esther"?

A NEW METHOD OF SOCIAL EVOLUTION.

COMPELLED by an inexorable destiny to wander over the earth's surface, I have ever found myself sharing, to an intense degree, in the aspirations of my fellow-creatures to develop into new and higher conditions, and, at the risk of appearing presumptuous, have not hesitated to offer them freely such counsel and advice as my vivid imagination and extended experience might suggest. Hitherto I must confess that my efforts have been utterly unavailing; but far from being discouraged, I feel constrained to present to a young and rising nation — destined, according to the great Liberal prophet of Great Britain, at no distant date to eclipse the glory and absorb the wealth of our own island realm — a scheme which my recent observations of their tendencies and desires has led me to elaborate; in the hope that its merits will at once be recognized, and that, if they are unable to adopt it in its entirety, they will derive some hints which may prove of real and substantial benefit. It is only natural that, however cosmopolitan the sympathies of an Englishman may be, they should turn most readily to his American cousins; and that, finding himself a prophet without honor in his own country — where people are far too well satisfied with their own opinions, and with the conditions which surround them, to think they need assistance from anybody — he should appeal to that more receptive, progressive, and enlightened branch of the Anglo-Saxon family, where new ideas are eagerly entertained, new tendencies are rapidly developed, new desires constantly expressed, old problems solved, and time-worn habits of thought discarded. To this fresh and promising community, then, I address myself, in the conviction that nothing I can suggest will startle them, and that what may seem to the bigoted and intolerant mind of old-fashioned society absurd or impracticable, will commend itself to so enterprising and vigorous a race as a simple and sensible scheme of social evolution. It is even possible that the stolid intellect of Europe, unable to discriminate between jest and earnest, may regard it as a feeble attempt at satire. Such an insinuation I pass by with contempt. I have never met an American who could deny that, while firmly maintaining that the theory was sound which, in the beautiful language of the Constitution, proclaims that all men were born equal, he was conscious practically that, physically, morally, and intellectually, men are born extremely unequal. In fact, in no country have I ever met a man of any race who did not feel he was very unequal. The same idea is clearly entertained by the higher class of monkeys, and may be observed manifesting itself, in a greater or less degree, throughout the animal kingdom; and it would not be difficult for eminent scientific men to prove that it must even, in a modified form, descend to the oyster. I may here remark incidentally, that I do not think the attention of naturalists has been sufficiently directed to psychological evidences of this kind, by which, apart from all material proof whatever, the ascent of man from the lowest forms of animal life may be clearly traced. I regret I have no time to enter upon this subject more fully here; but it has been necessary to allude to it, because, while the "instinct of inequality" forms the basis of the glorious modern theory in regard to the origin of the human race, it is also the basis upon which my new method of social evolution is constructed. In a word, to make my meaning more clear, as the "instinct of inequality" must be the foundation of the instinct of evolution, without this instinct in the oyster it would never have been possible for the "fittest" to survive and evolve. Evidently it is the result of an aspiration on the part of the oyster to rise above its inferior or "unequal" condition. To use a social rather than a scientific term, it is manifest that we owe our development to the innate snobbishness of the oyster. The theory of evolution, reduced to its social expression, is therefore the theory of snobbishness; and it is from this principle — the grandest, the noblest, and the most powerful that has been implanted in the human breast — that we derive our origin; it is through its mighty influence that we maintain our existence; and it is upon its "latent potencies" that we base our hopes for the future. Implanted more strongly in the Anglo-Saxon race than in any other people on the face of the globe, it has carried the British nation to the pinnacle of greatness and prosperity which it now occupies, though the sentiment is evidently weakening of late under the deleterious influence of a prominent leader in the Liberal party; but it is developing a majesty in the United States which should cause a thrill of pride in the breast of every Englishman when he recognizes how worthy the people of America are proving themselves of the noble heritage they have received from the mother country. Never yet have they thoroughly realized how much they owed to those Pilgrim Fathers, whose hearts throbbing and veins palpitating with the life-sustaining, "naturally selecting" principle of snobbishness, selected, in obedience to its promptings, a noble and virgin continent, upon which their descendants might evolve into social conditions denied to them in their own country. It is to this principle I now wish to appeal, for the purpose of directing it, if possible, to a practical object.

Innumerable evidences confirm my conviction, that no matter what a Constitution, drawn up to meet exigencies which have passed away, may say politically, socially the principle of equality is doomed in America. In all the larger cities there is a class which openly calls itself, and is openly called by others, the aristocracy; and the more modern members of it are endeavoring as much as possible to adopt the manners and customs of aristocracies in other countries, to contract matrimonial alliances with them, and to bow down before them. They put their servants into livery; emblazon the panels of their carriages with heraldic devices, in which coronets and other insignia of nobility and even of royalty may often be detected. Some have purchased property abroad, and call themselves by its well-sounding foreign name; others have adopted the names of noble families; and some have even gone so far as to assume foreign titles, which they use when abroad, and with the crests and armorial bearings of which, even at home, they stamp their note-paper and decorate their dinner menus. The demand has become so extended in this direction, that two heralds' offices have actually been opened in a fashionable part of New York to meet it, where coats of arms, crests, and mottoes may be obtained to sit the name, taste, rank, and pedigree of the purchaser. A directory, called the "Elite Directory," bound in purple leather, with gilt edges, has been published; and not long ago a newspaper was started in Chicago, called the Imperialist, advocating the formation of an aristocracy, and suggesting names for titles which should be adopted. As far back as two hundred years ago, so great a philosopher as John Locke recognized this latent tendency in the constitution which he drew up for the royal colony of South Carolina, one of the provisions of which established a House of Peers, composed of three orders of nobility, severally entitled landgraves, palatines, and caciques — the landgraves to rank with English earls, the palatines with English viscounts, and the caciques with English barons. This lasted for three or four years, and the last landgraviate family has only become extinct in our own times. This spirit, as I have shown, still descends, as it ought, with even greater force to our own day, and through all classes, so that every one who can, however remotely or obscurely, lay claim to any military, political, or judicial title is proud to be addressed by it; while his fellow-citizens meet his wishes in this respect as liberally as possible. Thus even porters and cabmen are called gentlemen, and laundresses and shopwomen, wash-ladies and sales-ladies. In the same manner, though orders are not permitted in the United States, the men and officers of the militia regiments decorate their breasts with Freemason, Oddfellow, Knight-Templar, Fenian, and other badges, which present a truly martial appearance, and give the wearer an air of having seen much service.

The Congress of the United States, recognizing this upward tendency on the part of the American soldier, passed a special act after the close of the civil war, authorizing all the field-officers of the army of the Union, honorably mustered out of service, to claim the title and wear the uniform of their rank — a privilege which, as the courts of Europe are well aware, has not been left to slumber by such American diplomatists as have been entitled to it.

I have felt both encouraged and edified by the spectacle of General Grant, the late president of the United States, and his entire family, manifesting in a marked degree an abundant instinct of inequality. The sternness with which he insists upon social precedence, to which he can lay no claim, being accorded to him — the grace with which he accepts the homage of those whom he considers his social inferiors — the ease with which he adapts himself to the habits and customs of the aristocracy of each country he visits, with a proud consciousness that it is the class to which he instinctively belongs — the quick recognition by that class that he is entitled to take his place among them as one of nature's "fittest," and to look down, as they do, upon those whom she has not "naturally selected" for social eminence — the gratification of his own countrymen at the honors which have been showered upon this early but magnificent promise of their future aristocracy, — all this, I say, is eminently encouraging, but it only proves how imperative the necessity has become for constructing a social system which shall place matters on an assured basis, and deprive carpers and sceptics of an excuse to taunt those whose irrepressible social ambitions prompt them to assume prerogatives which may not yet legally belong to them, but which, in obedience to the dictates of the great principle to which they owe their origin, they feel compelled to appropriate. What, for instance, could be more unseemly on the part of his own countrymen, than to pick flaws in the title of Brigadier-General Badeau, "A.D.C. in the suite," or to criticise the magnificent decorations and orders with which he adorned his uniform? Why should such meritorious efforts at evolution be sneered at in the case of this distinguished officer, when they are universally commended on the part of the oyster? Truly has it been remarked, that scientific men are as illogical as theologians. Go onwards and upwards, then, on the bright and glorious road that leads to social eminence, Grant, Badeau, Pierrepont, worthy representatives of the noble race from which you have sprung; be not checked by the scoffings of the low-born and envious in your aspirations after precedence, decorations, and pedigree; the time will come when all men will recognize in you, and others who are even now following your example, the pioneers of a new and mighty social development, whose benign and mellowing influence will ultimately extend, if it has not already reached, to the gulches and cañons of California.

It being clear, then, that without social ambition there can be no social evolution — and it being abundantly evident, from the illustrations I have adduced, that the sentiment of social ambition has of late years been acquiring overwhelming and uncontrollable force in the American breast — it follows that the moment is ripe for a specific direction to be imparted to it. Unless this is done, there is a danger of a catastrophic period, accompanied by social and political shocks, which may cause great disaster and even loss of life; whereas, if my plan is followed, there will be no more difficulty in transforming a democracy into an aristocracy than there was in changing a monkey into a man. It will be a smooth, easy, and natural process, very similar to that of rubbing off your tail. What, in fact, are the poor, the low-born, and the uneducated of society, but its tail? Very well, then, if you want to evolve, you must rub it off. Nothing can be more self-evident than that; the question is how to do it without producing irritation. It is inherent to the process of transformation that it is rather painful; no amount of salves or caustics can prevent this; the problem is to have as little soreness as possible. Now it is natural that any attempt to form a new couche sociale will leave the class that is left out very sore; therefore it will be necessary to discover a salve which may allay the irritation. The salve I propose is a political one. What do American aristocrats want to do with politics? Absolutely nothing! They won't dirty their fingers with politics even now; how much less should they do so when they are the possessors of real titles! In all old aristocratic European countries the aristocracy is a part of the political machinery, hence it is constantly brought into unpleasant collision with the masses, and is more or less unpopular, while it holds its position by a precarious tenure. Now in America it would be quite different. Here I propose to construct, in the first instance, a purely social aristocracy, having no special political rights or privileges: what need they care about political recognition at Washington, if they are recognized socially by all the crowned heads of Europe? In fact, it might be advisable that one of their rules should preclude any member of Congress or politician from belonging to their order, though this might be relaxed in favor of ex-presidents and ex-ministers to foreign courts, who could give satisfactory proofs of their having achieved great social success, and manifested a profound contempt for the politics of their own country. This entire exclusion from the arena of politics, while a necessary measure in initiating the order of aristocracy in America, would of necessity only be temporary. The irresistible forces at work would finally, as will appear later, sweep away all obstructions raised by the democracy to the overwhelming development of the aristocracy in every department of life, political and financial as well as social; but the merit of the process consists in the fact that it would be entirely unaccompanied by any open or active effort on their part. Thus beautifully do the forces of nature do their work when they are properly directed.

It is well known to scientific men that the most dangerous and disagreeable moment in the process of evolution is the first; ce n'est que le premier pas qui coute. It is then that the animal first feels those well-known curious shooting pains; and though they are accompanied by a certain feeling of gratification arising from the proof they convey to his mind that he has been a specimen selected for the purpose on account of his fitness, still we have the most distinct testimony to the fact that the creature is often in great doubt at this crisis whether "the game is worth the candle." Whatever scoffers may say to the contrary, there is nothing more clearly established than this — so much so that many animals can be proved to have shown hesitation in the early stages of the process. The Ornithorhyncus paradoxus, or duck-bill platypus, is an illustration of this; and the minute observation by naturalists of the mental structure of the aye-aye of Madagascar, proves clearly that had it not been for an hereditary tendency to vacillation in that animal, he would now have been a perfect ape, instead of being obliged to take refuge in the length of his finger-nails. Many other animals in the same way have thus stuck in the middle, and through a certain feebleness of aspiration have been unable to advance, while a retreat to their former condition, where they were much more comfortable, is cut off from them; for it is also established beyond a question that, however much you may desire it, you cannot evolve backwards. The same rules hold good morally which hold good physically. Indeed it is clear that this must be so, as recent investigations by scientific men make it absolutely certain that mind is fluent or gaseous matter, and that matter is condensed and solidified mind. From which it follows that it is not impossible that while the social evolution I am about to suggest is in progress, certain physical modifications may occur simultaneously. These, as I have remarked, may be accompanied by shooting pains in the regions about to undergo change. This change will necessarily be in accordance with the dominant social aspiration, and therefore aristocratic in character: thus the nostrils will become thinner, and more pink and distended; the ears smaller and more delicately lobed; the eyebrows more perfectly arched; defective features will be modified so as to assume a more lofty and classical type, hands and feet diminished in size, and changes of form imparting greater elegance and elasticity to the frame will occur. Perhaps I may seem too bold in saying all this will occur. At the same time, we have a long train of uninterrupted testimony to prove that if nature be consistent with herself they must occur, therefore I feel bound to give this warning to my sympathetic reader; but I do not imagine that the prospect of such a contingency, even though it may be painful, will check his noble ardor to rise. Still, I would suggest, as a preliminary measure, that several secret conferences be held among those who, after reading this essay, feel instinctively drawn together by a common appreciation of the truth, and of the sagacity and research by which it is inspired. These will be the élite, the very crême de la crême of society. The majority, unable to detect profound wisdom in a form which appeals most exclusively to the trained mind of science, and prejudiced against it by their religious bigotry, will turn it to ridicule; but it is not those I seek to reach. The "fittest" will at once respond; and it is by them that this great movement will be inaugurated. They will "select" with an unerring instinct those who should, in the first instance, receive titles. They will, in fact, be intuitively prompted by nature as to the selection; from the "Blue Blood" of Philadelphia, from the "Culture" of Boston (Beacon Street), from the "F. F. V." (first families of Virginia); from Canal Street, in New Orleans (right-hand side); from the descendants of the great Patroons of New Amsterdam, the Knickerbockers of New York, and the dwellers in Second Avenue; from all that is ancient, sacred, cherished, and aspiring in the suppressed aristocracy of the land — will come the response of the "fittest." They will then form themselves into a secret society — for no profane or vulgar eye may dare to penetrate into the early throes of this period of gestation; but one of their first acts must be to collect funds among themselves for the purchase of titles. As a general thing, it will be found preferable that each man purchase his own title; but there may be cases where it would be advisable to assist him to do so. These may be procured from the republics of San Marino and Andorre, from the prince of Monaco, and from the five Counts Palatine of the Holy Roman Empire, at rates corresponding to the various degrees of impecuniosity of those who are entitled to confer them. The pope, and several of the small German princes, and various governments of Europe, will bestow them for other services besides those which are purely pecuniary; nor will it be impossible for distinguished American families to prove their noble descent sufficiently to the satisfaction of certain foreign powers to warrant their being acknowledged as rightful possessors of titles which they may claim by inheritance. We all know that the representatives of more than one British noble family are now simple citizens of the United States. All this would be remedied by the scheme which I propose. After a certain number of titles had thus been confidentially secured, the right should be obtained by the American order, as soon as it was properly constituted, of conferring them. This may be accomplished in the same way as the transmission of the power of the ordination of bishops depends upon the validity of the source from which it is derived. This power could not properly be contested if it was obtained from the pope; and it is not unlikely that Leo XIII. will ere long find himself so much in need of support that he would be glad to conciliate a young and powerful aristocracy by granting them this privilege. When this has been secured, and the order numbers two hundred members, it will formally constitute itself in secret session, and organize the four fundamental institutions upon which its greatness and power will finally depend. These are the two "Colleges of the Order," the "Syndicate of the Order," and the "Tribunal of the Order." The colleges of the order will consist of the "Heralds' College" and the "Electoral College." The Heralds' College will be composed of such members of the order as, according to rules which will necessarily be framed for the guidance of the order, shall be duly qualified. The functions of the Heralds' College will be to supervise all matters connected with armorial bearings, pedigrees, orders of precedence, etc., etc.; it will report upon alliances which it is desirable should be promoted with the members of foreign aristocratic families, and decide upon the titles which, in the interest of the order, new members should assume. In all matters of taste the Heralds' College should reign supreme. Thus, for instance, any one attaining the rank of marquis, and desiring to call himself the Marquis of Mauch Chunk, would be compelled to abide by the veto of the college, if that body, as is most probable, refused, on æsthetic grounds, its assent to the title. It would probably be found convenient that a list of titles, composed chiefly of sonorous and high-sounding names, such as Narragansett, Tuscarora, Onondaga, and Ashtabula, should be kept at the Heralds' College for new members to choose from. The elaboration of the rules and regulations, the code of etiquette in matters of dress, of forms of salutation, and of styles of address in official and private correspondence, will fall into the Heralds' College department. The slovenly manners of the present day, even in old aristocratic countries, are an evidence how much a supervision of this kind is needed; and we have the universal testimony of travellers to the fact, that nowhere is there a race more formed by nature to inaugurate a movement of this sort, than the younger branch of the Anglo-Saxon family; their polite consideration of the fair sex in cars and omnibuses, and other places of public resort, and their chivalrous instincts in matters of single combat, especially in the South, are sufficient evidence that a code of honor might be revived under the auspices of the Heralds' College, to which all Europe would speedily be compelled to conform.

The functions of the Electoral College are more simple: it would be composed only of the oldest and most trusted members of the nobility, whose business it would be to discuss the eligibility, and vote upon the admission, of new members. As the stability and dignity of the order must mainly depend upon the characters of the men who compose it, it is manifest that the functions of the Electoral College are of the utmost importance. This body alone will be vested with the papal authority to confer titles to which I have already alluded.

The "Syndicate of the Order" is, in other words, its financial committee. As the power and influence of every aristocracy in every country must depend rather upon its wealth than anything else, and as land is too common in the New World to add very much to the social position or dignity of its possessor, it is of the first importance that every member of the aristocracy should not only be enormously rich, but that his money should be well and safely invested. As, however, it would be beneath the dignity of a nobleman personally to attend to money matters, or to be engaged in any other business than that connected with the chivalric pursuits of the order, provision for the acquiring and preserving his wealth has to be made otherwise. I may here say that members of the aristocracy will be allowed by the rules of the order, as laid down in the Heralds' College, to enter the army, the navy, and the Church, — the art of first killing people and then saving their souls being one in which all aristocracies have ever been proficient. At the same time, it would be beneath the dignity of an aristocrat to enter any denomination for the latter purpose, unless there was a good prospect of his being able to minister to the spiritual welfare of souls in the capacity of a bishop. In all matters, whether they be connected with people's souls or bodies, the dignity of his order must be his first consideration. Therefore, while he may be in the army or navy, and receive pay without loss of dignity — for he receives it from the government, and not from any one individual; and the function of personal combat is a noble one — under no circumstances could he be a doctor, for he would then have to receive pay from an individual, and the function of saving life for pay has ever been considered by all orders of aristocrats as ignoble. It is not the same with the Church, for here, as I have said, he may rise to a position of great authority and dignity, and he receives his pay not from an individual, but from masses of individuals collectively. Nevertheless, it is not likely that many members of the order will adopt this calling, nor is it desirable that they should. No objection exists to their engaging in artistic, literary, or scientific pursuits, provided they are not paid for their labors. In order, then, that their riches may continually increase without any effort on their part, the Syndicate of the Order becomes necessary. Its composition is peculiar. In former times, as is well known, the buffoon and the domestic chaplain played an important part in the establishment of every great noble. It has, for obvious reasons, been found no longer necessary to keep private buffoons, and even domestic chaplains are rare; but I would suggest, for reasons which I will presently explain, that the latter should form part of every American nobleman's establishment, while I propose to substitute for the private buffoon an individual whom I will call the "private money-grub." Strange as it may seem, the principal operators on the Stock Exchange, the directors and controllers of the railway, telegraph, and steamship lines of the country, the presidents of banks and insurance companies, the leading merchants, the magnates of finance, in fact, would all eagerly seek the position of private money-grubs, for it would be the only avenue through which they could hope ultimately to become themselves ennobled. The private money-grub, after being allowed by the Syndicate enough to live upon, would have his earnings divided into two equal parts. Half would go to the nobleman to whose household he was attached; the other half would be laid by for his own benefit, until it reached the amount necessary to qualify him to be a candidate for the honors of nobility. By this ingenious method it is plain, that while the aristocracy keep themselves removed from the defiling touch of commerce and business generally, they would indirectly exercise a most powerful influence over the finance of the nation.

In addition to the money-grub and the domestic chaplain, there would also be attached to every noble family the "family counsel." The three would form a triumvirate essential to the maintenance and well-being of every nobleman's establishment above a certain rank, and would serve as checks upon one another. Thus the domestic chaplain might advise the money-grub that a certain financial proceeding was morally right, when it might be necessary for the family counsel, who knew the law, to show that it involved legal penalties; or, on the other hand, the counsel might advise a course which was legally safe, which the domestic chaplain might show to be attended with moral difficulties. Here the money-grub in his turn would operate as a check on the chaplain, as he would be empowered to reduce the salary of the latter just in proportion as he raised any such difficulties; while both counsel and chaplain would have an interest in seeing that the money-grub did not cheat his noble master, as their only chance of reaching the lower ranks of the nobility would depend upon the fidelity with which they performed this service. By this simple and beautiful system, money would be made under the sanction alike of the law and of the Church, and fraud be rendered impossible. It is needless to remark that, as in many cases the family counsel would occupy the position of judge, the rights and private interests of the aristocracy would be assured in the event of any attempt to attack them by legal proceedings on the part of the democracy.

The Syndicate of the Order, then, would be composed of a certain number of leading money-grubs, of eminent family counsel, and, for the purpose of inspiring confidence, of a small sprinkling of such domestic chaplains as were loudest in their professions of personal piety, and most celebrated for their theological proficiency. These members of the Syndicate would, while preserving each nobleman's fortune independent, act with a certain harmony and concert, and, by skilful combinations, would easily be able to defeat the schemes of the financial democracy, who, as a rule, are treacherous in their combined operations, and live by plundering and cheating each other. A certain proportion of the fortune of each nobleman would nevertheless be placed in a common fund, to be used for purposes common to the interests of the order — such as the building of clubs, churches, or theatres, which should be frequented exclusively by the members of the aristocracy and the untitled friends whom they might admit to such privileges. Another part of this fund, to be called the "dower fund," would be devoted exclusively to the providing of portions or dots for such daughters of noblemen as it was thought desirable, for the due propagation and maintenance of the order, should contract alliances with the foreign noblemen, who, being almost always mercenary, require as a first condition suitable marriage settlements. These would of course be graduated according to the beauty of the young lady, the rank of the proposed bridegroom, and the advantages in point of connection and influence which he had to offer. Such questions would not, however, fall within the province of the Syndicate, who would simply have to provide the money, but of the Heralds' College, without whose concurrence and approval no marriages among the aristocracy, either at home or abroad, could be contracted. This is necessary for purposes of physical evolution, as it is of the utmost importance, in order to produce the highest organic results, that the strain of blood should be kept pure. The neglect of this simple precaution must inevitably prevent any further development on the part of existing aristocracies, who will thus remain in an imperfect and rudimentary condition, and finally occupy very much the same relation to the aristocracy of America that the Veddahs of Ceylon, the Bosjesmen of south Africa, or the aboriginal natives of Australia do to the Caucasian race. I have taken the trouble to make calculations, based upon the analogy of similar changes in the past, about which no doubt or mistake is possible, and I find that upwards of two million seven hundred and fifty thousand years must elapse before this contrast will exist to the marked extent I have described; the change, however, will be watched with the greatest care and precision by scientific men, who will all ultimately themselves be compelled, in order to escape this fate, to become American noblemen.

I have been led into this slight digression in order to show how grand and inspiring is the mission which the aristocracy of the New World has before it. It is needless to say that it will be aided in its development by the peculiarly favorable conditions, both of soil and climate, which are special to the western hemisphere. While the nations of Europe, in obedience to those sanguinary instincts which prove their close connection with the feræ naturæ from which they are descended, are engaged in a fierce and bloody struggle, from which it is very doubtful whether the fittest will survive, the American aristocracy will be peacefully and intelligently improving its breed. Carefully avoiding, under the direction of their domestic chaplains, any differences of opinion on matters of theology, which can in no way advance the interests of the order, they will not feel disposed to commit "atrocities" on Christian principles, or otherwise check the physical progress of the race, out of regard for its spiritual welfare.

We now come to the fourth and last institution, the "Tribunal of the Order." This will be composed of the most eminent and learned noblemen duly elected, together with a few family counsel who are most eligible for promotion. It will constitute a sort of court of appeal from the Heralds' College. Before it will be tried the cases of all such noblemen as have infringed the laws of the order, by assuming honors to which they are not entitled; treating with indifference the rules of etiquette; conducting themselves in private life, or in their intercourse with the democracy, in a manner unbecoming their dignity; marrying or giving in marriage in disregard to the veto of the Heralds' College, — and so forth. It will be a court of reference and arbitration in all cases of dispute between members of the order; and it will try money-grubs, family counsels, or domestic chaplains, who may have proved unfaithful to their trust. There will be a scale of pains and penalties inflicted proportionate to the offence committed, the most severe of which will be expulsion from the order, with deprivation of rank, and excommunication from all social intercourse whatever. Under no circumstances will noblemen be permitted to bring lawsuits against each other before the established judicatory of the country. This is partly because it would not comport with their dignity to do so, and partly because the judges, being elected by the democracy, and being themselves plebeian, would, except in the case of a family counsel happening to be a judge, decide upon democratic principles, which, as a rule, do not further the ends of justice. The Tribunal of the Order would therefore, in serious cases, have recourse to the far safer, more enlightened, and more expeditious method of trial by single combat before a jury of peers, according to the rules thereunto provided.

From all this it will be seen that the nobles, while refraining from pursuits involving the acquisition of wealth, or from in any way mixing with the common herd, will be by no means an idle class. Besides indulging in horse-racing, yachting, coaching, hunting, and other manly sports, they will have three professions open to them in addition to the domain of art, science, and literature; besides which, the two colleges and tribunal will give ample serious occupation to such of their members as have the privilege of belonging to these bodies. It is desirable that they should travel extensively, and spend much of their time in social intercourse with the aristocracies of other countries. They will probably find life in the country houses of the British aristocracy especially congenial to their tastes. Here they will be well received, and there will be no objection in point of taste or etiquette to their protracting such visits indefinitely. It would be considered a duty and a privilege in England to entertain the nobility of America — a hospitality which the latter could return by restoring the fortunes of many poor and decaying families of the British aristocracy, by bestowing upon the eldest sons well-portioned daughters. Having no extensive landed possessions, they would probably not have castles in the country in which to receive their noble guests, should they return their visits; but this could be arranged by a system of palatial hotels, such as already exist in the country. These would be five stories high, corresponding to the ranks of nobility — dukes being accommodated on the first floor, marquises on the second, and so on.

It is probable that the identity of race, language, and religion would create a far closer sympathy and alliance between the aristocracies of England and America than between those of any other countries; and they could in many ways be mutually beneficial to each other. The degrading tendency which now characterizes the British nobility of entering into all kinds of commercial pursuits might thus be checked. Instead of going into the city, and eking out a precarious and not very reputable livelihood as a guinea-pig on the boards of questionable companies, the impecunious scion of aristocracy would be ashamed to degrade an order, the American branch of which was setting an example of purity, dignity, and the highest sentiments of honor. Indeed it is highly probable that numbers of the cadets of noble families in England, finding that the American nobility offered advantages which their own did not, would apply for admission into its ranks. Such cases would come under the rules laid down in the Heralds' College, regulating the admission of applicants from foreign aristocracies.

These rules would be very strict in all matters of pedigree and antiquity of title; thus no British aristocrat, whose creation did not date back beyond the first settlement of America, would be eligible. No members of any French family ennobled since the Revolution of 1789 need apply. Austrian candidates must all prove their sixteen quarterings, and so on. Nor would this rule be relaxed in favor of royal or ex-royal families. While the Hapsburgs, Bourbons, Guelphs, Hohenzollerns, and even Romanoffs, would be eligible, the Bernadottes of Sweden and all the Bonaparte family, including the Prince Imperial, would be excluded. One must draw the line somewhere.

I have said that when the order numbered two hundred, it was in a position to constitute itself secretly. When it had organized its four institutions, formulated its rules, and completed its social structure in every respect, the moment would have arrived when it would be its duty openly to announce its existence and enter upon its functions. When I remarked that naturalists had observed, in the case of the animal kingdom, that the first step in the process of evolution was the most painful, I neglected to state that the last moment, though not attended with any physical suffering, is extremely distressing to the moral sensibilities of the animal: thus, when the first man openly and boldly stepped forth entirely tail-less, his modesty and shyness were so great that the first use he made of his newly awakened intelligence was to clothe himself. We must all feel instinctively that this could not have been otherwise. In the same way philologists have proved that, if you go back far enough, the syllable expressed by our letters "f, i, g," forms the common root from which all languages have since evolved, with the exception of the languages of certain savage tribes, who are still entirely naked. This is accounted for by the fact that these people developed from a race of monkeys who were themselves originally tail-less, and they were therefore spared any shock of this kind; and so their language, not being based upon the sense of modesty, has not the common idea of clothing expressed by the word "fig" as its root, as is the case with the Aryan, Semitic, and Turanian families.

It is a singular fact, and I would venture, with great diffidence, and at the same time with the utmost certainty, to assert that it is a fact of which I am the sole discoverer, that the tailed monkey should have evolved a much higher human development than the untailed; and yet this is only in obedience to the well-known law, that life as it exists on earth "gradates" from very simple into highly complex types, frequently, however, in its gradation missing a link, or taking two steps at a time, as it were. In this way the tail-less monkey was partially skipped by nature, and has thus duly developed into the lower type of still unclothed man. I have used this illustration because it exactly applies to the sensations of modesty of which the American aristocracy will be painfully conscious when they first announce themselves to the world. Their instinct, in order to escape the ridicule of the ill-bred, jealous, and ignorant classes, will be to hide themselves from the public gaze. This tendency they must boldly resist: let them clothe themselves in the panoply of their order, in their robes and coronets, and appear in state carriages, each drawn by eight horses, with coachmen in powdered wigs, with footmen gorgeous in blazing liveries, preceded by mounted heralds. Let the new order be proclaimed with the blare of trumpets in the public places of all the principal cities in the Union. False modesty at such a moment would be criminal; let them remember that they are inaugurating a social crisis, which must affect the destiny of every aristocracy in Europe. Supposing this anxious period safely passed, and that they compel, as they will, the recognition of all the right-minded classes of society who are animated with the proper social aspirations, they will be afflicted for some time with a tendency to relapse into their old habits, which must be guarded against. Here, again, the analogy of evolution serves as a guide and a warning. When man first developed he was conscious of singular prehensile sensations, producing an irresistible desire to follow the instinct which still lingered with him, and to hang by his tail, and crack nuts. His newly developed reason, however, always came to the rescue in time; by a process of ratiocination, which was necessarily slow, owing to the still imperfect condition of his protoplasm, he perceived that the attempt would be futile and ridiculous, and he refrained. This is a striking illustration of the superiority of reason over instinct. It applies, in the case before us, to the dangerous instinct by which the American nobleman will be at once assailed, to lapse back into money-making. The instinct of commerce and bargaining will be as strong in him at the outset as the tail-hanging, nut-cracking instinct was in the ape; but it will be resisted, and no doubt successfully, by his intellect. After a very short time it will pass away, and he will soon feel no more desire to "operate" financially than he does now to swing on the branches of trees.

The next danger to be avoided is a tendency to a too rapid increase in the numbers of the order. It is evident that it can only maintain its exclusive character, and the prestige by which it can command the respect of the public mind, by refusing to open its ranks too rapidly to those who will seek to press into them. Evolution is specialization; therefore, in its physical progress, there are always to be noticed two distinct processes going on side by side — the development of a tissue, and the wasting of the parts at the expense of which it grows. The same thing will occur morally; in proportion as the social tissue of the aristocracy develops will there be a tendency on the part of the democracy to waste away. In order to prevent this going on too fast, it must be met by checking the too rapid increase of the numbers and ranks of the nobility. Thus, in the first instance, the highest rank should only be that of earl; it is probable that it will be found most consonant with American tastes to adopt English titles, as by these means the wives and daughters will all be styled lady. Before entering the ranks of the nobility, money-grubs, family counsels, and domestic chaplains will be made knights, baronets, and bishops; then will come the ranks of barons, viscounts and earls. By degrees, as the order swells in numbers, and its wealth and power increase, marquises, dukes, and princes may be created, but only in small numbers and at great intervals, promotion to these ranks being dependent upon their combined physical and moral fitness — a question to be decided by the Electoral College. The proportion of the titled aristocracy to the democracy should not be more than one thousand to fifty million. The younger sons, while belonging to the aristocracy, should have as a distinctive appellation the words "Honorable Sir" prefixed to their Christian names. The Sir is necessary to distinguish them from members of Congress, from State legislators, and other political functionaries who now enjoy the title of Honorable. The daughters below a certain rank will be styled Honorable Misses. Younger sons and daughters may, under certain circumstances, with the approval of the Heralds' College, marry into the families of such wealthy plebeians as may be likely to be elected into the order, as it is desirable to form a sort of middle class by these means, from which the ranks of the aristocracy may be slowly recruited.

By degrees the democracy will waste away and become enfeebled, in obedience to the law to which I have already alluded; and the influence of this middle class will extend downwards in a manner which must surely, sooner or later, affect the political condition of the country. Thus the nation at large will gradually undergo such social modifications under the pressure of its aristocracy, as will prepare it for a revolution almost imperceptible in its progress, but which will alter fundamentally its republican character. Political power will eventually slip away from the corrupt classes who now control it, as they become weak and enervated, and inevitably fall into the more sturdy grasp of those who are themselves aspirants for aristocratic honors. All this will occur without any direct intervention on the part of the nobility, but will be the necessary result of revolutionary forces working through the physical and social into the political sphere. In the process of their evolution, politics will thus at last become sufficiently purified for the aristocracy to consider other questions than those which exclusively affect the well-being of their order, and actually to take an interest in the good government and prosperity of their country — a pursuit from which they will have long been excluded. Thus there will finally be evolved a form ot government such as has never hitherto existed. It will be oligarchical in character — as intensely anti-republican, in the ordinary acceptation of the word, as it will be anti-monarchical. While combining the advantages of both systems, it will exclude their defects, for autocracy and mobocracy will be alike impossible. The days of emperor and demagogue will be forever ended, and the power of the plutocrat have utterly passed away. What the exact character will be of the administrative machinery which will be devised by a class alike honorable, intelligent, patriotic, and, above all, disinterested, it is not for me to attempt to explain; those familiar with the laws of evolution will know, given the premises as I have given them, how they must of necessity develop. It is therefore competent to any scientific intellect to construct the whole fabric by the usual deductive process; and it would be a mere work of supererogation, and, indeed, a reflection upon the intelligence of the best minds of the day, were I to enter upon it more fully here. It is enough for me to have shadowed forth the outlines of the great social crisis now impending over the New World. If, by anticipating the movement which is inevitable, I have been enabled to assist those who are destined to inaugurate it; if I should be the one to give it that impetus which is always required to set in motion a mighty idea, I would disclaim all credit for this humble effort which may lead to such vast and magnificent results, well knowing that it would have been utterly unavailing were it not for the powerful forces of nature known to be at work, and the consequently receptive condition of those to whom it is addressed.

THE UNDEFINABLE IN ART.

ALL of us, probably, have learnt to distinguish between the type of man who loves clear intellectual light before everything, and who derives pleasure from objects and ideas only so far as he defines and understands them, and the other type of man who delights to abandon himself to an unthinking emotional state, and to steep his mind, so to speak, in a stream of vague feeling. This contrast meets us in various regions of life. For example: social intercourse is to some simply an opportunity of exchanging clear ideas, and sharing in sentiments which repose on definite convictions. For another class, converse with others owes its value to the opportunity it affords for indulging in vague emotions. Such persons love society only so far as it provides them with the contagion of half-expressed feeling, the delicious thrills of sympathetic emotion, and the exhilarating expansion of soaring with a kindred spirit into the dim regions of poetic fancy. The same contrast presents itself in relation to nature. There is on one side the curious, enquiring, and scientific attitude of mind, and on the other side the dreamily contemplative and the emotional attitude. To the first, nature is a mine of facts and truths; to the other, a wellspring of vague emotional consciousness.

The lover of art might be supposed to belong altogether to the second group. Yet, though all æsthetic taste involves some emotional sensibility, there is within the limits of the class sharing in this capacity a clearly marked distinction between the intellectual and the emotional cultivators of the beautiful. The former are mainly concerned with clarifying their æsthetic impressions, with apprehending the sources of pleasure in nature and art; the latter live rather to enjoy beauty without understanding it, and to have the delights of art with the least admixture of definite thought.

It is commonly supposed that what is known as æsthetic culture tends to elevate the intellectual at the expense of the emotional. The education of taste, it may be said, consists in the main in a development of the powers of attention, discrimination, and comparison. The very frequent use of the term connoisseur (cognoscente) for an artistically cultivated person seems to show that a refined taste in matters of art means a highly intellectualized taste. If so, however, it looks as if the higher æsthetic culture would tend to exclude the vague and indefinite emotional effects described just now. One might even urge that it is impossible for an æsthetically trained mind ever to suspend the intellectual functions in order to taste of the mysterious delights of the unthinking dreamer.

There is a measure of truth in these remarks; yet they do not accurately represent the facts. Æsthetic culture does, no doubt, tend to make our enjoyment of art more intelligent; on the other hand, it no less certainly tends to deepen and widen our emotional capacity itself. Now the peculiar delight experienced in yielding oneself entirely to an indefinite emotional impression may be viewed as one mode of æsthetic pleasure in which culture enables us to share. Indeed, one might reason that the full measure of such vague emotional satisfaction has for its condition a certain degree of intellectual culture. For in its highest degrees this delight takes the form of a sense of the undefined and the mysterious, and this presupposes habits of reflection. A rude peasant is pleasurably moved by nature's works; but he does not reflect on the nature of the feelings thus awakened. It is only the reflective mind which consciously enjoys the mysterious aspects of things. As a matter of observation, too, minds of the highest artistic training frequently manifest a marked disposition to this mode of enjoyment. Contemporary English art, including painting and poetry, illustrates an impulse among some of the most cultivated lovers of art to make prominent this ingredient of the vague and undefined. Further, observation tells us that a susceptibility to these effects of art is not incompatible with a quick and vigorous intellectual appreciation. To name a single example, Robert Schumann, in the interesting papers reprinted from the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, and recently translated into English, shows us in a striking manner a happy combination of a love of intellectual light with a feeling for the obscure and the undefined in art.

It will be admitted, we think, that it is well to cultivate this capacity of vague emotional enjoyment, if it can be shown that intellectual comprehension in art has its limits, and that there is always a larger region of art-effect in which the pleasure must be of an undefined and unexplained nature. If art can be shown to yield modes of delight which are unsusceptible of being connected with definite ideas by reflection, a person will clearly be the loser if his desire for intellectual light is so supreme as to unfit him for those modes of enjoyment. It will be the object of this paper to show that art does produce impressions of this kind, and that, however highly developed the intellectual appreciation of beauty, there remains a wide margin of emotional effect which intellectual reflection cannot render definite. In other words, we shall try to establish this proposition, — that the control of the emotions by the intellect in art has its limits, and that in the delight of the connoisseur, no less truly than in that of the unreflective tyro, there blend innumerable elements which cannot be referred to definite objective sources.

In the first place, then, it is worth remarking that, even within the region of art-impression which intellectual reflection is able to render clear and precise, there is room for the realization of a certain vague emotional effect. This looks at first sight paradoxical, no doubt, but it can be easily made intelligible. It is to be remembered that the process of reducing an impression received from a work of art to definite elements cannot be completely performed in a single moment: it takes time. Our powers of attention are greatly limited, and we are unable to reflect distinctly in one act on more than a small area of impression. As a consequence of this, at any single moment our consciousness is made up of regions having very unequal degrees of illumination. One impression or feeling is reflected on, and so appears clear and distinct; but outside there are circles of consciousness, feelings, and thoughts, which are vague and undefined. Thus at any given moment the impression we receive from a work of art consists of clear and obscure feelings, which latter can only be made luminous in their turn at the expense of the former.

Let us illustrate this in the case of pictorial art, and let us take a picture which has attracted a good deal of notice of late — the "Venus' Mirror" of Mr. Burne Jones. When, for example, we are passing the eye over the several details — the gracefully set figures, the water with its soft reflections, the quiet landscape behind — we are at each successive moment elevating one impression or group of impressions after another into clear consciousness, while the rest fall back into the dim regions of the sub-conscious. Each ingredient — the illuminated and the unilluminated — is alike essential. When, for instance, we are deriving an intellectual satisfaction from some particular virgin-shape or gentle face, the many other pleasing elements of the picture contribute each a little rillet of undiscriminated emotion; and these obscure or "sub-conscious" currents of feeling serve to swell the impression of any single instant, making it full and deep. It is the same when we try to bring a number of details under some aspect of unity or harmony. If, for instance, in the picture alluded to, we attend to the delicious modulation of color, or if, with certain admiring critics, we are able to derive an ineffable enjoyment from the dominant sentiment of the scene, in each case there coexists in our mind with the clear perception of this relation or phase an obscure undiscriminating sense of the many details which all help, according to their rank in the artist's scheme, to make the painting an embodiment of the beautiful and the fountain of a rich and varied delight.

It will be seen, then, that vague emotion is inseparable from every complex work of art. At no single moment is the whole of its charm clear and intelligible to us. We must be content at each instant to enjoy one portion, through the play of intellectual attention and comparison, while accepting the rest on trust, so to speak, knowing we are able in turn to bring it under the same illuminating influence. In this mode of enjoyment, intellect is fully occupied and amply gratified; on the other hand, the peculiar delight which belongs to the vague and mysterious is never wholly expelled from consciousness.

It is to be observed, further, that the development of art, so far from lessening this ingredient in art-pleasure, would rather seem to increase it. Higher works of art are distinguished from lower and elementary ones by being more complex, by having more numerous elements, also a larger number of uniting relations; in other words, a more intricate unity, dominating a wider diversity. Now, though it is true that art-culture expands our capabilities of attention and comparison, so that we are able to embrace a larger number of details under a single aspect of unity, it is no less certain that the more complex a work of art, the larger must be the region of the obscure and undiscriminated at any single moment. If we contrast the state of mind of a child admiring a new doll, and that of an artist contemplating the Laocoon, we shall see that, while there is vastly more of intellectual activity in the former case than in the latter, there is also, in any given moment, a wider area of undetermined pleasure.

We may now turn to a second main ground of the vague in æsthetic impression. Not only is the intellectual reduction of the æsthetic material necessarily partial at each successive moment; it is altogether excluded from certain modes of art-enjoyment: that is to say, the element of the strange and mysterious does not disappear even when attention is turned to this particular quarter. After all, it is only a portion of our delight, which we are able to separate into distinct ingredients, and to refer to definite objects, relations, or ideas. In all our fuller and mingled enjoyments there seem to blend strange elements, which escape all our attempts to seize and to subject them to intellectual control. When, for example, we watch from some Alpine eminence the splendid miracle of a sunset, we are conscious of thrills of emotion which by no skill of reflection can we attach to definite perceptions or their attendant suggestions.

The truth is, that however keen and inquisitive our minds, however well disciplined our intellects, our power of taking apart the contents of our consciousness is always limited. We think, perhaps, that we resolve a feeling called forth by a beautiful picture or a pathetic poem into its ultimate elements; yet, on further reflection, we shall find that we never really effect such an exhaustive analysis.

In the first place, then, every beautiful object, whether of nature or of art, calls up a large number of pleasurable feelings. We roughly mark off portions of this effect, setting down one to sensuous impressions, another to relations of harmony and proportion, another to particular emotions, as wonder, love, and so on. Yet, if we carefully consider the matter, we must be aware that this process is never other than inexact. In the whole impression of a peaceful landscape, for example, we cannot be sure that we make an accurate and exhaustive analysis when we enumerate a few prominent features of the scene with their imaginative suggestions. On the contrary, we are always confident that we leave many sources of gratification undetected. The whole effect, further, seems to be something more than the sum of the separate elements, even supposing these to be ascertained. In the scene before us the pleasures of light, color, and form, and of poetic suggestion partially blend and lose their distinct characters. In other words, the intermingling of these elements affects us differently from the elements experienced apart. Thus a complex object of art always contains an unresolved factor, and so presents a mysterious side to our perceptions.

Let us now go a step further. We will suppose that the total impression of a work of art has been broken up by reflection into groups of elements emotional and sensuous. Yet even this division does not get rid of the element of mystery. Thus the emotional effects of art are by no means perfectly intelligible. Any one who has accustomed himself to reflect on the feelings called forth by the beautiful, the sublime, the comic, and so on, must have learnt how impossible it is to make clear and definite all the separate sources of the pleasure. How strangely and inextricably, for example, do numerous pulsations of feeling mingle in the effects of humor! Who can define all the elements which co-operate to produce the peculiar charm of a figure like Don Quixote, or Mr. Carlyle's Teufelsdroeck? We can only lay the finger on a few points here and there which call forth merry laughter, gentle pity, and nascent admiration: we cannot say whence comes all the peculiar delight which such objects minister to our minds. It is the same with the effects of the sublime. When gazing on a chain of Alpine peaks motionless and charmed in the magical air, we feel ourselves strangely moved, being now lifted up with a sympathetic sense of large power and perfect freedom, now partially subdued by a recognition of the possible relations of this power to our own feeble forces. Yet in vain do we seek to refer to definite impressions and associated ideas all the thrills of emotion which combine in this effect.

Finally, we do not eliminate all mystery, even when we reach that part of æsthetic effect which best lends itself to a minutely discriminative attention, namely, sensuous impression. When listening to a complex orchestral movement with which we are pretty familiar, we seem to ourselves to be able to separate one mass of tones from another, and to refer the whole of the ear's delight to a number of simple impressions. In point of fact, however, this separation is always very rough and incomplete. The whole pleasure of an orchestral chord, with its richly varied "tone color," does not easily break up into a number of single sensations; the very combination of the elements seems to disguise and transform to some extent the characteristic effects of the single constituents. In other words, the value of the tone elements apart and in combination is not the same, and consequently discriminative reflection fails to define the whole effect. It is much the same with colors in combination.

This however is not all. Even when we have reached what we call the elements of sensation, our analysis is only a rough and proximate one. Recent science tells us that what appears to our consciousness an elementary sensation of tone or of color is in reality compounded of simple sensuous elements. The pleasure of a rich full note from a reed instrument, or still better from a human voice, arises, according to Helmholtz, from a fusion of many partial tones, which the unpractised ear is unable to separate. To this circumstance Helmholtz refers a part of the mystery of music. In tones there dimly reveal themselves to our consciousness a plurality of simpler sensations which blend with and disguise one another. The same authority tells us that our seemingly simple sensations of color are never strictly elementary. It is true that we do not ordinarily feel anything mysterious in a pure "primary" color, as scarlet or blue. Yet if the reader will carefully observe the effect produced by a rotating disc, with segments variously colored, when its motion is not too rapid, he will probably find that a vague sense of a number of hues, blending in one result and color, lends a peculiar charm to the impression. Hence it is not impossible certain intermediate colors, as orange and warm violet, owe a part of their æsthetic value to a faint consciousness of the elementary impressions which compose these tints.

We have hitherto been speaking of the feelings called forth by art only so far as they depend on impressions and ideas supposed to be now present to the mind. Regarded in this way, they involve an element of the mysterious, just because our power of analytic reflection is limited. That is to say, the elements of pleasure are too numerous, and mix too freely, for our minds to effect a complete separation of them. But there is a further obstacle to this process of separating and detecting the separate ingredients of art-pleasure. The impressions which objects produce on our minds are a growth of many past experiences. A quiet valley does not affect a young lad as it affects a middle-aged man. To the latter it presents ideal aspects and offers emotional suggestions which do not exist for the former. It faintly reminds him, among other things, of long days of toil, of renewed visions of repose from the fatiguing excitements of the world. Yet the thoughts thus called up are of the vaguest; and much of the emotional power of the associations which gather about objects with growing experience is wholly undefinable. A feeling is produced, but the mental image which would explain this feeling is irrecoverable. We are strangely moved by the first sight of a foreign city, reposing amidst sheltering hills, or by some passing effect of light and color in our habitual surroundings, or by the tones of a strange voice; yet no distinct recollection accompanies the impression, and we are at a loss to explain this effect. In the case of all the more familiar classes of objects, there grow up innumerable associations which all serve to add to the emotional effect, though they do not rise into consciousness as definite ideas. The sky above us, the cool glade, the rounded hill, the murmuring shore — these and other objects acquire for the mature man a meaning which is too deep to be sounded by the intellectual line.

Not only do objects and groups of objects thus collect about them mysterious forces in relation to our emotions, but the various elementary qualities of objects acquire a deeper emotional significance with growing experience; and this is very frequently quite untranslatable into terms of definite ideas. To the cultivated adult visual forms and colors, also tones of various pitch and of special timbre, become invested with a full, deep charm, — yet a charm which cannot be clearly understood, since the innumerable associations which sustain it are lost to view.

Recent scientific speculation opens up a yet deeper ground for this element of the mysterious in the impressions produced by works of nature and art. According to the evolutionist's view of mental growth, our emotions are built up not only of our own individual experiences, but also of those of many generations of ancestors. Here all distinct recollection is plainly excluded. We cannot recall the experiences of our remote forefathers. If, as is said, the charm of landscape is in part to be referred to feelings which have been handed down from our savage ancestors delighting in the chase, this charm must, it is evident, present itself to us as something mysterious. Hence, perhaps, much of that unaccountable emotional effect which is produced in our minds by certain aspects of nature. In the fascination of the restless sea, of wild mountain and of dim wood, of rushing stream and of whispering tree, may there not lie concealed traces of countless experiences of countless generations of uncivilized man? This line of reflection serves, as our evolutionist teachers have pointed out, to account for the deeper unfathomable effects of music; since musical tones may be regarded as the urns, so to speak, which conserve the remains of myriads of utterances of sad and joyous human experience. So, too, the special effects of peculiar colors — the energy of red, the coolness of green, and the deep repose of blue — may rest in part on long-fixed associations. Thus, throughout the scale of æsthetic sensation and emotion, the influences of ancestral experience and of hereditary transmission may be at work, imparting elements of feeling for which the intellectual consciousness vainly tries to find definite objective sources.

Thus far we have been regarding the element of the mysterious in art as dependent on the limits of distinct attention and of analytic reflection. In these cases we feel the presence of something vague and undefined just because we are unable to refer the feelings of the moment to some well-defined objective impression or suggested idea. There is, however, another way in which this element enters into art. Certain modes of æsthetic pleasure directly depend on vague mental representation as their essential condition, and disappear as soon as reflection seeks to give exactness and definiteness to the ideas. This effect is abundantly illustrated in what is often marked off as the imaginative side of art. Let us just glance at one or two of its principal varieties.

In the first place, then, art affords us enjoyment by presenting to our minds subtle threads of similarity binding together things widely diverse in most of their attributes. The gratification in these cases reposes on a momentary apprehension of the point of analogy, and is at once disturbed and destroyed when we begin to reflect closely on the objects or events thus linked together. The most striking example of this effect is given us in poetic similes, including all epithets which are not, strictly speaking, appropriate to the objects to which they are applied, but which bring them for an instant into affinity to other and heterogeneous objects, as "the moaning sea." In all such cases we look at the object through the veil which a transforming imagination throws over it, and the very essence of this imaginative pleasure is involved in keeping the mental representation obscure and undefined. It may be observed that the sense of the mysterious is fuller and intenser when the figurative expression is a new one, and connects things which we are not accustomed to view together. To speak of dawn as a rosy maiden does not strike us as strange, for we have long grown accustomed to the figure. On the other hand, a new and bold simile which brings unlike things together for the first time, as when Milton likens evening to a is further to be noticed that the sense of mystery is much livelier when the poetic figure is not too carefully elaborated. Homer's minutely worked-out similes call up ideas with so much distinctness, that we lose the delicious sense of vagueness which belongs to the more fugitive comparisons of modern poetry.

This remark naturally leads to the reflection that poetry cannot supply this effect of vague suggestion in its deepest and intensest form. Words are always definite, and the images called up by them, even though shadowy and incomplete as wholes, have the particular aspect indicated by the term sharply defined. The suggestions of musical tones, on the other hand, are necessarily obscure, since these tones do not exactly answer to any natural impressions, and only suggest ideas through very rough resemblances. This circumstance helps to lend to music its peculiar depth of mystery. When listening to a quaint picturesque movement of Schumann, our mind's eye dimly recognizes numerous affinities to natural sounds, as murmuring breeze, gurgling waterfall, children's laughter, and so on; yet no distinct images are called up, and our delight remains shrouded in a mist of obscure fancy.

The second main region of undefinable suggestion, and so of the sense of the mysterious in art, is that of imagination in its narrow sense. We refer to those effects of art which depend on a full play of fancy in the recipient of the impression. The artist, whether painter or poet, is said in many cases to leave something to the imagination; that is to say, he does not seek to make all parts of his artistic representation clear and definite, but leaves a territory of the undefined in which the spectator's or hearer's imagination may construct for itself. The novelist thus appeals to our imagination when he draws the veil over some scene of exquisite pathos or of preternatural delight. The painter does this too when he just suggests regions lying beyond that of his picture, into which our fancy may wander in dreamy mood. And, generally in so far as art presents its object incompletely, defining a portion only, and simply pointing to what lies beyond, it illustrates this mode of the mysterious.

This undefined region, left veiled for the imagination to penetrate, includes more than might at first be supposed. It must be remembered that the objects which nature presents to us are themselves not always clearly definable. When we look away over a wide landscape, the remoter regions are but dimly perceived, and beyond them our imagination frames wholly invisible tracts. So, too, when we try to apprehend the events of the remoter periods of history, we do not distinctly seize the reality, but only reach a vague and fragmentary conception of the whole order of events. Thus the remote in space and in time always wears to our imagination a certain air of mystery. Not only so, all that is vast in its dimensions loses in definiteness. The huge mountain has a mystery which the tiny hillock wants, just because it presents a greater object to our perceptive faculties, and one which they cannot easily grasp in a single intuition. Still deeper is the mystery when the limits of the object are wholly undefined. Here we have a presentation of the infinite, which our imagination forever seeks to compass, yet never succeeds in rendering definite. An opening in the evening clouds, discovering unfathomable depths of transparent air, makes such an appeal to our imagination. The long flux of years which the page of history, and still more that of geology, presents to us, affects us similarly. We vainly try to reduce all these magnitudes to terms of our definite and reproducible experiences.

Now art is able, in a number of ways, to represent these uncompassable magnitudes to our fancy. The painter loves to crown his picture with some opening into unmeasured space. Milton delights to unfold in dim outline the vast spaces which enfold the earth, including the towering heights of heaven and the deep abysses of hell. And the same poet knows how to stir our imaginations to lofty effort by passing in review vast and incalculable ages of time. Poetry is specially favored in this respect, since it knows how to magnify every object and every quality by the use of a vague and emphatic vocabulary. By a single expression the poet can excite our imagination to energetic action. Whether it be distance in space or in time, or the magnitude of a physical or moral force, or the degree of a moral or æsthetic quality, his rich storehouse of terms enables him to present the object to our view with its outline blurred, so to speak, and its dimensions undefined. What a mysterious charm belongs to such words as "huge," "vasty," "fathomless," "immeasurable," "boundless," when appropriately employed!

It would be interesting to compare the different arts in respect of their capability of supplying the peculiar modes of vague delight here described. So far as this depends on the limits of simultaneous attention, and on the co-operation of secondary and sub-conscious currents of feeling, there will be a marked difference between the arts of coexistence and of succession; that is to say, the arts which appeal to the eye and those which address themselves to the ear. Poetry and music unfold their contents in a succession of impressions, and so far the whole of the object is, little by little, brought under the control of a discriminating attention. Only in the case of the more complex chords of music is there a considerable simultaneous claim on attention. In the visual arts of painting and sculpture, on the other hand, a large number of details are presented in one and the same moment; and, though we may successively attend to particular features, there is always a large region of the vaguely discerned present to consciousness. In another respect, however, the arts of succession are less definite than those of coexistence, namely, in their general aspect as connected, harmonious wholes. When we appreciate the harmonies of form and sentiment which dominate in a picture, we have all the terms of the relations present to us. The eye can rapidly pass and repass from one point to another, and so by frequent repetition make the perception of the whole distinct and clear. On the other hand, when we gather up the series of impressions left by a beautiful poem or musical composition, we have to trust to recollection for the details. The various elements which are to be combined as parts of a harmonious whole, exist now only as half-blurred mental images, and hence our perceptions of form in these arts are never so clear and exact as in the arts of coexistence.

Let us now turn to the second ground of vagueness in the impressions of art, namely, the impossibility of reaching well-defined elements, whether sensations or ideas, by successive concentrations of attention. So far as the separation of the sensuous material in art-pleasure is concerned, there seems to be some little difference between the arts which employ visual and auditory impressions. We break up melodies into separate tones, yet these still seem to contain some further secret. On the other hand, colors do for the most part appear to consciousness as perfectly simple sensations.

A greater difference presents itself in relation to the depth of associated feelings. Colors do not for the most part stir the mysterious emotional currents which are set in motion by tones. A color presents itself to our minds more as a well-defined object of perception, as a quality of external things to be discriminated and interpreted by the intellect. A tone, on the other hand, has far less of the intellectual and more of the emotional. We do not understand it, we rather feel it. The reason of this difference cannot fully be given here. It may be enough to say that musical tones are not, like colors, common accompaniments of the objects of the external world; that they have their nearest prototype in the natural sounds of the human voice, and that this circumstance serves to invest them with an emotional significance which is wanting to colors. It may be added that many verbal sounds and cadences employed in poetry share to some extent in these deep and undefinable emotional associations.

Finally, with respect to the scope for obscure and incomplete ideal representation, it would appear, also, that the arts of the ear surpass those of the eye. Visual forms and colors, if presented in the abstract — that is, not as directly imitative of objects, as in decorative painting — do no doubt call up now and again vague ideas. Thus the moral ideas symbolized by the straight line or the circle, or by white, are examples of such vague suggestions. For the most part, however, particular arrangements of form and color answer, roughly at least, to too many unlike objects of nature to suggest any particular ideas, however faintly. Thus the forms of architecture, excepting, perhaps, some details, as the Corinthian capital, do not suggest ideas to our minds, and hence the special definiteness of the impressions of this art. It is only when they are made more complex and special that they awaken ideas of objects, and in this case they become imitative, and so call up definite ideas. In contrast to these, musical tones and their combination do commonly tend to call up vague representations of objects or events. We feel, when under the spell of one of Chopin's nocturnes, an irrepressible impulse to interpret the melody with its supporting harmonies, to make them representative of ideas. Yet the ideas thus sought after do not rise into luminous distinctness. We only very dimly perceive the meaning of the wandering melody; and it is this dim sense of an ideal background in music which helps to lend it its peculiar mystery. It may be added that poetry, though using a medium of definite signs, may, by help of certain sounds and cadences, share, in a humble measure, in this power of music to body forth in dim outline large and impressive ideal shapes.

It follows from what has just been said that music will surpass all other arts in presenting to the imagination a blank region to be filled up by its free constructions. The whole of music, when not defined by a union with language, may be said to answer to the occasional pauses and blanks of painting and poetry. As directly imitative arts, these have for the most part to control the imagination, and can only in an exceptional way leave it free space for spontaneous action. Music, on the other hand, seems to have as its common function just to touch the imagination with gentlest pressure on one side, leaving it unfettered as to the precise direction to be followed.

Yet we have seen that a part of the gratification of a freely-moving fancy depends on the representation of the vast, the unbounded, and the sublime, whether in space, time, or in force or degree. Here then, it would seem, the imitative arts must have an advantage. Painting nearly always affords us the sublime in space; sculpture (though inferior in this respect to architecture) may faintly image to our eye the vast and immeasurable in force. Poetry surpasses these, and, by means of its all-comprehensive system of verbal signs, presents to us in suggested forms all varieties of imposing magnitude. In contradistinction to these arts of imitation, music can only body forth the immense by becoming itself a vast magnitude. The protracted series of complex movements of many sounds which makes up a modern symphony may thus be said to give us the sublime in space, time, and energy. Yet it may be doubted how far this effect is proper to music in the same sense in which it is proper to architecture, whose materials are necessarily large and impressive magnitudes.

The result of this rapid examination of the effects of art in its various forms is, that it involves as an essential factor a certain amount of vague and undefinable emotion. Hence art will always have its mysterious side, and a full appreciation of art in all its parts will include a susceptibility of mind to this particular emotional effect. Accordingly a mind which cannot enjoy without perfectly comprehending the whence and the why of its delight, must, it would seem, be debarred from a portion of the pleasures of art.

We have so far said nothing as to the relative merits of the pleasure which is made definite by intellectual reflection, and that which defies such a process of illumination. In truth, it is difficult to compare the two modes of enjoyment. While such intellectual activity tends to destroy a certain charm which belongs to these undefined emotional effects, it adds a new gratification of its own. The question of the superiority of the one or of the other form of enjoyment may, as we have already remarked, best be referred to individual taste. Some minds of a highly intellectual order, and unequally developed in an emotional direction, will prefer those effects of art which lend themselves to clear definition; other minds, of an opposite order, will rather choose the opposite type of æsthetic effect. This difference will affect the person's relative appreciations of the several arts. Thus, the first type of mind will prefer music united to language to "absolute" music. Many persons, like Lessing, fail to enjoy instrumental music just because of its indefiniteness. Others, like Schumann, would regard all minute inquiries into the what and why of instrumental music as irrelevant. They prefer to keep its meaning screened, so to speak, from the rude light of day.

It is another question as to the proper range of this influence, both in art as a whole and in the several arts. It is plain, from what has been said, that this depends, to some extent, on the artist himself. Thus, for example, a musical composer may seek to render instrumental music minutely descriptive. On the other hand, a painter may lean to an obscure mode of presenting his subject. So, too, the poet may fall into the way of suggesting his scenes and events in shadowy outline, and of dwelling on those aspects of nature and of life which most deeply stir vague and undefinable emotions. Is it possible to lay down any rules as to the right management of this material of art?

No rigid maxims, we think, can be looked for here. A wide margin must clearly be allowed for differences of individual taste. All that can be safely said is, that the intellectual and the emotional have each their rights. On the one hand, culture tends, as has been remarked already, so to strengthen the intellectual impulses that a mode of enjoyment from which clear apprehension of objects and ideas is wholly excluded, is unsatisfying and incomplete. On the other hand, art is not science: it aims primarily at an emotional, not an intellectual, result. Some of the deepest feelings of pleasure are, as we have shown, afforded by objects and suggestions which leave the intellect comparatively inactive. Further, as we have seen, these modes of pleasure are not only compatible with intellectual culture; they even presuppose (at least in their highest degree) a certain measure of it. To this we may now add, that our modern culture adds to the value of this undefined emotional enjoyment. Accustomed as we are to the scientific attitude of mind, to regarding nature and life only as an object for intellectual comprehension, there is an exquisite sense of relief in abandoning ourselves for the nonce to the emotional attitude — to viewing nature and life through the dim medium of a fancy which gives to each object the form and color most precious to our feeling. We may thus safely conclude that each mode of gratification has its rightful place in art.

More definite rules for artistic guidance may perhaps be found if we have to deal with special varieties of art. By considering the materials at the command of a particular art, and its varied possibilities, we may roughly ascertain the extent to which this factor is admissible. Thus, for example, it may be safely said that vague suggestion cannot be introduced into pictorial art to the same extent as into music. The eye desires clear and well-defined objects: it is the organ of perception par excellence, and it could never be long satisfied with misty "nocturnes" or with a dreamy, symbolic type of art. Music, on the other hand, by making use of inarticulate sounds — that is to say, a necessarily vague mode of expression — is under no such obligation to meet the intellectual needs. Finally, poetry may be said to offer ample scope for each mode of pleasure. Its medium, verbal signs, allows of the most definite modes of presentation. On the other hand, it is capable of the widest and most various suggestion of the vague and incomplete sort. Hence we ask of the poet an equal satisfaction of intellect and of emotion, clear perception of fact and dreamy imagination of the unknown and the ideal. We are here reasoning that the special aim of an art must be inferred from its special capabilities. Thus, having found how far these vague modes of delight are capable of being produced by the several arts, we can roughly determine their proper functions in relation to this particular kind of emotional effect.

There is one relation of our subject about which a word or two may appropriately be said in conclusion. As we have had occasion to remark in passing, what is new in impressions and their groupings affects us with wonder and a sense of the mysterious; on the other hand, what is customary and familiar appears intelligible on this very ground. Thus, in musical art, certain sequences of harmony, and certain modulations of key, overawe us, so to speak, by their very strangeness; whereas more familiar arrangements seem comparatively clear and comprehensible. In the first case, we have the peculiar delight of the vague and mysterious; in the other, the quieter gratification of intellectual comprehension. If, as we have argued, each mode of delight is a proper effect of art, we must ask how they may be combined. Every work of genius supplies the solution of this problem. It meets our intellectual needs by keeping within those general rules of form which in art answer to the uniformities of nature. On the other hand, in its originality it provides ample novelty of detail, and so unfolds to eye or ear the hidden and mysterious powers of art. If all artists were men of creative genius, there would be no question of the relative worth of fixed form and of novelty of combination. But unfortunately this is not so. Hence we find, on the one hand, those who are content to keep to rules of art without endeavoring to reach a new embodiment of beauty; on the other hand, those who recklessly strain themselves to invent some new wonder, no matter how formless. The first yield but the cool satisfaction of intellectual perception; the second impress and stir our minds for an instant to a sense of the strange and wonderful, but only to leave them permanently unsatisfied.

It is an interesting question, whether the development of art tends to narrow and even to annihilate the region of new creation. J. S. Mill tells us he was much troubled by the thought that musical combinations would some day be exhausted; and German pessimists affirm that original creation in art, as in science, is becoming rarer and rarer. On the other side, there are many who assert that, in the works of one living dramatic poet and musician, we have an absolutely new revelation of art. It certainly would be a sad reflection that at some future day the world would no longer be thrilled by the delicious wonder of a new development in art. Yet, even if this is to be so, the consequences may not be so dreary as one might at first suppose. By the time this apex of development is reached, the storehouse of art-works will, it may be presumed, have become full, and thus there will then be ample novel material for each successive generation of the lovers of art. Even now there is a wide field for elevating wonder in the works of art which we have been able to preserve from the past. It does not seem to be the most devoted friends of art who are wont to complain of its narrow limits.

"BABY'S DEAD."

JUST a whisper from the skies,
In the hush of midnight dreary,
Clasped with peace the aching eyes,
Bore their little sufferer weary
Home, to rest in heaven's sweet morrow;
While far round our footsteps spread
Depths of wild unwavering sorrow,
Baby's dead!

Still around that brow so fair
More than earthly beauty lingers;
Gently smoothe the falling hair,
Fold the tiny frozen fingers;
Twine the curls so proudly tended,
In a halo round his head;
Pride and hope alike are ended,
Baby's dead!

Lonely to the hopeless tomb,
Darling child! how shall we yield thee?
From its drear corroding gloom
Love would freely die to shield thee.
Can we bear that dust should gather
Round our darling's golden head?
Spare the bitter cup, O Father,
Baby's dead!

Dead! and light is quenched in tears;
Hopes that blossomed but to wither,
Sunny dreams of after years,
Lost in death's cold gulf forever.
Sun and moon and stars are smitten
With despair's dark night o'erspread;
Round the universe is written,
Baby's dead!

Darling, from your slumbers deep,
Mother calls, — will you not waken?
In that lone, mysterious sleep,
Do you dream of hearts forsaken?
Safe where joys ne'er droop and languish,
Are you watching overhead?
Oh, the passion of the anguish,
Baby's dead!

Peace, at last, may hush the strife,
Where no mists of parting sever,
We may greet thee crowned with life,
Clasp thee in our love forever.
But to-night, bereft and lonely,
Yearn we for our treasure fled,
While weird echoes answer only,
Baby's dead!

Sunday Magazine. MARY ROWLES.

AFTER THE CONCERT.

MY better self! my Stradiuarius! we Have done great things to-night; have help'd to bear
On outspread wings the stream of melody
Up to heaven's portals — it might enter there.

I wonder, lov'd one, was it thou or I
Who pour'd our soul forth on the music's strain?
Thou art not living — yet I hear thee sigh,
And sing, and sob, like gods more than us men.

Since he, Cremona's master, work'd and wrought
With more than human skill, he surely breath'd
Into his sweet creation speech and thought,
Best of the forest, with man's best enwreath'd.

The master breath'd upon thee, with the love
That centres in a soul; and lo! awoke
Thy sweet life-song, attun'd in heav'n above,
And soaring, thus upon the silence broke.

But no! description's vain — we cannot tell
The songster's sweetness, nor the sough of wind,
The spring-tide wonder, nor the year's sad knell;
Yet all this joy and sadness here we find.

Yet more! for in its midst, grief of a heart
That knows this life, blends with the joy of those Who know but spirit life; and thus impart
Heav'n's bliss into the strain that richer grows.

And yet, sweet violin! without me thou wert mute,
And unresponsive in thy velvet nest would lie;
All silent as a long-forgotten lute,
Thus thou without me — thus without thee I!

Good Words. H. J. O.

CARDINAL-FLOWERS.

WHERE the swift brook runs downward to the sea
Through the dark woods that border Norman's Woe, Rippling with joy or stealing silently,
There cardinal-flowers in stately clusters grow.
They seem in their calm beauty to uprear
Their haughty heads, and blush with conscious pride,
As if the mosses, ferns and all things near
Were but as slaves and vassals at their side.
The cool, green depths where nature seems asleep,
Their passionate color fills with warmth and grace,
Till thoughts of regal pomp and splendor come;
And gazing on their hue so rich and deep
I seem to see, as in a vision, pass
Some gorgeous pageant through the streets of Rome.

From The Quarterly Review.

PETRARCH.*

THE true position of Petrarch in the history of modern culture has recently been better understood, owing to a renewed and careful examination of his Latin works in prose and verse. Not very long ago he lived upon the lips of all educated people as the lover of Laura, the poet of the canzoniere, the hermit of Vaucluse, the founder of a school of sentimental sonneteers called Petrarchisti. This fame of Italy's first lyrist still belongs to Petrarch, and remains perhaps his highest title to immortality, seeing that the work of the artist outlives the memory of services rendered to civilization by the pioneer of learning. Yet we now know that Petrarch's poetry exhausted but a small portion of his intellectual energy, and was included in a vaster and far more universally important life-task. What he did for the modern world was not merely to bequeath to his Italian imitators masterpieces of lyrical art unrivalled for perfection of workmanship, but to open out for Europe a new sphere of mental activity. Petrarch is the founder of humanism, the man of genius who, standing within the threshold of the Middle Ages, surveyed the kingdom of the modern spirit, and by his own inexhaustible industry in the field of study determined the future of the Renaissance. He not only divined but, so to speak, created an ideal of culture essentially different from that which satisfied the mediæval world. By bringing the men of his own generation once more into sympathetic relation with antiquity, he gave a decisive impulse to that great European movement which restored freedom, self-consciousness, and the faculty of progress to the human intellect. To assert that without Petrarch this new direction could not have been taken by the nations at the close of the Middle Ages would be hazardous. The warm reception which he met with in his lifetime and the extraordinary activity of his immediate successors prove that the age itself was ripe for a momentous change. Yet it is none the less certain that Petrarch did actually stamp his spirit on the time, and that the Renaissance continued to be what he first made it. He was in fact the hero of the humanistic struggle; and so far-reaching were the interests controlled by him in this his world-historical capacity, that his achievement as an Italian lyrist seems by comparison insignificant.

It is Mr. Reeve's merit, while writing for the public rather than for scholars, to have kept this point of view before him. Petrarch, he says, "foresaw in a large and liberal spirit a new phase of European culture, a revival of the studies and the arts which constitute the chief glory and dignity of man;" and there are some fine lines in his "Africa," in which he predicts the advancement of knowledge as he discerned it from afar: —

To thee, perchance, if lengthened days are given,
A better age shall mark the grace of Heaven;
Not always shall this deadly sloth endure;
Our sons shall live in days more bright and pure;
Then with fresh shoots our Helicon shall glow;
Then the fresh laurel spread its sacred bough;
Then the high intellect and docile mind
Shall renovate the studies of mankind,
The love of beauty and the cause of truth
From ancient sources draw eternal youth.

With reference to Mr. Reeve's life of the poet-scholar it may be briefly said that none of the more interesting or important topics of Petrarch's biography have been omitted, and that the chief questions relating to his literary productions have been touched upon. The little book is clearly the product of long-continued studies and close familiarity with the subject; it is, moreover, marked by unvarying moderation and good taste. Those who have no leisure for studying the more comprehensive biographies of De Sade and Koerting, or for quarrying for themselves in the rich mine of Signor Fracassetti's edition of the poet's letters, will find it a serviceable guide. One general criticism must here be added. Mr. Reeve is not always particularly happy in the choice of his translations. He quotes, for example, not without approval, Macgregor's version of the canzone to Rienzi, which renders the opening lines by this inconceivable clumsiness of phrase: —

Spirit heroic! who with fire divine
Kindlest those limbs, awhile which pilgrim hold
On earth a chieftain, gracious, wise, and bold.

It might also be parenthetically questioned why he prefers to call the river Sorgues, which in Italian is Sorga, by its Latin name of Sorgia. But these are matters of detail. The book itself is sound. Taking this volume of "Foreign Classics for English Readers" in our hand, we shall traverse a portion of the ground over which Mr. Reeve has passed, using such opportunities as offer themselves for expressing disagreement upon minor points with his conclusions.

The materials for a comprehensive life of Petrarch are afforded in rich abundance by his letters, collected by himself and prepared for publication under his own eye. Petrarch was an indefatigable epistolographer, carrying on a lively correspondence with his private friends, and also addressing the dignitaries of his age upon topics of public importance. Self-conscious and self-occupied, he loved to pour himself out on paper to a sympathetic audience, indulging his egotism in written monologues, and finding nothing that concerned himself too trivial for regard. His letters have, therefore, a first-rate biographical importance. They not only yield precise information concerning the chief affairs of his life; but they are also valuable for the illustration of his character, modes of feeling, and personal habits. The most interesting of the series is addressed to posterity, and is nothing less than the fragment of an autobiography begun in the poet's old age. Of this remarkable document Mr. Reeve has printed a translation into English. Next in importance to the letters rank the epistles and eclogues in Latin verse and the Italian poems; while apart from all other materials, as furnishing a full confession of Petrarch's passions, weaknesses, and impulses, stand the dialogues upon the "Contempt of the World." The preoccupation with self which led Petrarch to the production of so many autobiographical works, marks him out as a man of the modern rather than the mediæval age. He was not content to remain the member of a class, or to conform his opinions to authorized standards, but strove at all costs to realize his own particular type. This impulse was not exactly egotism, nor yet vanity; though Petrarch had a good share of both qualities. It proceeded from a conviction that personality is infinitely precious as the central fact and force of human nature. The Machiavellian doctrine of self-conscious character and self-dependent virtù, so vitally important in the Renaissance, was anticipated by the poet-scholar of Vaucluse, who believed, moreover, that high conditions of culture can only be attained by the free evolution and interaction of self-developed intellects. Nature, besides, had formed him for introspection, gifting him with the sensibilities that distinguish men like Rousseau. Subjectivity was the main feature of his genius, as a poet, as an essayist, as a thinker, as a social being. By surrendering himself to this control, and by finding fit scope for this temperament, he emancipated himself from the conditions of the Middle Ages, which had kept men cooped in guilds, castes, cloisters. Determined to be the best that God had made him, to form himself according to his ideal of excellence, he divested his mind of superstition and pedantry, refused such offices of worldly importance as might have hampered him in his development, and sought his comrades among the great men of antiquity, who, like himself, had lived for the perfection of their own ideal.

After the materials afforded to the biographer by Petrarch's own works, may be placed, but at a vast distance below them, the documents furnished by the Abbé de Sade in his bulky "Life." These chiefly concern Laura, and go to prove that she was a lady of noble birth, married to Hugh de Sade, and the mother of eleven children. It would hardly be necessary to refer to these papers, unless Mr. Reeve had expressed a too unqualified reliance on their authority. He says (p. 33), "These facts are attested beyond all doubt by documents in the archives of the De Sade family." Yet it is still an open question, in the absence of the deeds which the abbé professed to have copied and printed, whether he was not either the fabricator of a historical romance very flattering to his family vanity, or else the dupe of some earlier impostor. It is true that he submitted the supposed originals to certain burghers of Avignon, who pronounced them genuine; but we may remember with what avidity Barrett and Burgon of Bristol swallowed Chatterton's forgeries about the same period: nor, even were we convinced of the abbé's trustworthiness, is there much beyond an old tradition at Avignon to justify the identification of Petrarch's Laura with his Laure de Sade. Mr. Reeve is therefore hardly warranted in asserting that it is "useless to follow the speculations which have been published as to the person of Laura, and, indeed, as to her existence."

Petrarch was born at the moment when the old order of mediævalism had begun to break up in Italy, but not before the main ideas of that age had been expressed in an epic which remains one of the three or four monumental poems of the world. Between the date 1302, when Dante and Petrarch's father were exiled on one day from Florence, and when Petrarch himself was born at Arezzo, and the year 1321, when Dante died, and when the younger poet was prosecuting his early studies in Montpellier, the "Divine Comedy" had been composed, and the mighty age of which it was the final product had already passed away. The papacy had been transferred from Rome to Avignon. The emperors had proved their inability to settle the Italian question. Italy herself, exhausted by the conflicts which succeeded to the first strong growth of freedom in her communes, had become a prey to factions. The age of the despots had begun. A new race was being formed, in whom the primitive Italian virtues of warlike independence, of profound religious feeling, and of vigorous patriotism were destined to yield to the languor of indifference beneath a tyrant's sceptre, to half-humorous cynicism, and to egotistic party strife. At the same time a new ideal was arising for the nation, an ideal of art and culture, an enthusiasm for beauty, and a passion for the ancient world. The Italians, deprived of their liberty, thwarted in their development as a nation, and depraved by the easy-going immorality of the rich bourgeoisie, intent on only money-getting and enjoyment, were at this momentous crisis of their fortunes on the point of giving to the modern world what now is known as humanism, and had already entered on that career of art which was so fruitful of masterpieces in painting, sculpture, and architecture. The allegories, visions, ecstasies, legends, myths, and mysteries of the Middle Ages had lost their primitive vitality. If handled at all by poets or prose-writers, they had become fanciful or frigid forms of literature, at one time borrowing the colors of secular romance, at another sinking into the rigidity of ossified conventionality. Wearied with the effort of the past, but still young, and with a language as yet but in its infancy, the Italians sought a new and different source of intellectual vitality. They found this in the Roman classics, to whom, as to their own authentic ancestors, they turned with the enthusiasm of discoverers, the piety of neophytes.

For Dante the Middle Age still lived, and its stern spirit, ere it passed away, was breathed into his poem. Petrarch, though he retained a strong tincture of mediævalism, belonged to the new period: and this is the reason why, though far inferior in force of character and grasp of thought to Dante, his immediate influence was so much greater. For the free growth of his genius, and for the special work he had to do, it was fortunate for Petrarch that he was born and lived an exile. This circumstance disengaged him from the concerns of civic life and from the strife of the republics. It left him at liberty to pursue his own internal evolution unchecked. It enabled him to survey the world from the standpoint of his study, and to judge its affairs with the impartiality of a philosophical critic. Without a city, without a home, without a family, without any function but the literary, absorbed in solitary musings at Vaucluse, or accepted as a petted guest by the Italian princes, he nowhere came in contact with the blunt realities of life. He was therefore able to work out his ideal; and visionary as that ideal seems to us in many of its details, it controlled the future with a force that no application of his personal powers to the practical affairs of life could have engendered.

Another circumstance of no little weight in the formation of Petrarch for his destined life-work was his education at Avignon. When his father settled there in 1313, the boy of eleven years had already acquired his mother-tongue at Arezzo, Incisa, and Pisa. Nothing therefore was lost for the future poet of the canzoniere in regard to purity of diction. But Avignon was a far more favorable place of training for the humanistic student than any Tuscan town could have been. It was the only cosmopolitan city of that time. A fief of Provence, and owning King Robert of Naples for its sovereign, it was now inhabited by the popes, who swayed Christendom from their palace on the hill above the Rhone. All roads, it is said, lead to Rome; but this proverb in the first half of the fourteenth century might with more propriety have been applied to Avignon. The business of the Catholic Church had to be transacted here; and this brought men of mark together from all quarters of the globe. Petrarch therefore grew up in a society more mingled than could have been found elsewhere at the time in Europe; and since he was destined to be the apostle of the new culture, he had the opportunity of forming a cosmopolitan and universal conception of its scope. His own attitude towards the papal court was not a little peculiar. Though he could boast of being favored by five popes, though he lived on intimate relations with high dignitaries of the Church, though he was frequently pressed to accept the office of apostolic secretary, though he owed his pecuniary independence to numerous small benefices conferred upon him by the pontiffs whom he served, and though he undertook the duties of ambassador at their request, he was unsparing both in prose and verse of the abuse he showered upon them. No fiercer satire of the papal court exists than is contained in the "Epistolæ sine Titulo." It was not that Petrarch was other than an obedient son of the Church: but he could not endure to see the chiefs of Christendom neglecting their high duties to Rome. He thought that if they would but return to the seat of St. Peter, a golden age would begin; and thus his residence in Avignon intensified that idealization of Rome which was the cardinal point of his enthusiasm.

Next in importance to his exile from Provence and his education at Avignon, must be reckoned Petrarch's numerous journeys. His biographers have no slight difficulty in following him from place to place. Besides visiting the most important cities of Italy, he travelled through France and the Low Countries, saw the Rhine, crossed the Alps to Prague, and touched the shores of Spain. No sooner is he established in Vaucluse than we find him projecting a flight to Naples or to Rome. His residence at Parma is interrupted by return flights to Avignon. He settles for a while at Milan; then transfers his library to Venice; next makes Padua his home; then goes on pilgrimage to the Eternal City. The one thing that seems fixed in his biography is change. How highly Petrarch valued freedom of movement, may be gathered from his refusal to accept any office which would have bound him to one spot. Thus he persistently rejected the advances of the popes who offered him the post of secretary; and when Boccaccio brought him the invitation to occupy a professorial chair at Florence in 1351, even this proposal, so flattering to his vanity as an exile and a scholar, was declined with thanks. He knew that he must ripen and possess himself in disengagement from all local ties; for the student belongs to the world, and his internal independence demands a corresponding liberty of action. At the same time there is no doubt that he loved a restless life for its own sake; and he expressly tells us that many of his journeys were undertaken in the vain hope of casting off his passion for Laura, in the unaccomplished effort to break the chains of an internal discontent. The effect of so much movement on himself was still further to develop his cosmopolitan ideal of humanism. He was also flung back by contrast on his inner self, and while he made acquaintance with all the men worth knowing among his contemporaries, he remained a solitary in the midst of multifarious societies. Fame came to him upon his travels, and some of his excursions resembled royal progresses rather than the expeditions of a simple priest. In this way he enhanced the dignity of the humanist's vocation. He may be called the first and by far the most illustrious of those poet-scholars who flitted restlessly from town to town in the Renaissance, ever athirst for glory, and scattering the seeds of knowledge where they went.

When we seek to analyze the ideal of life formed by Petrarch in exile, at Avignon, in the solitary valley of Vaucluse, and in the courts of Europe, we shall be led to consider him from several general points of view — as a scholar, as a politician, as a philosopher, as a poet, and lastly as the man who, living still within the Middle Ages, was first clearly conscious of a modern personality. The discussion of these topics will also serve as well as any other method to bring the complex qualities of one of the most strangely blended characters the world has ever known into sufficient prominence.

It is a mistake to suppose that, though Greek was lost to western Europe, the Latin classics were unknown in the Middle Ages. A fair proportion of both poets and prose-writers are quoted by men of encyclopædic learning like John of Salisbury, Vincent of Beauvais, and Brunetto Latini. But the capacity for understanding them was in abeyance, and their custody had fallen into the hands of men who were antagonistic to their spirit. Between Christianity and paganism there could be no permanent truce. Moreover, the visionary enthusiasms of the cloister and crusade were diametrically opposed to the positive precision of the classic genius. The intellectual strength of the Middle Ages lay not in science or in art, but in a vivid quickening of the spiritual imagination. Their learning was a compilation of detached, ill-comprehended fragments. Their theology, as represented in the "Summa," resembled a vast structure of Cyclopean masonry — block placed on block of rough-hewn inorganic travertine, solidified and weighty with the force of dogma. Their philosophy started from narrow data of authority, and occupied its energies in the proof or disproof of certain assumed formulæ. It was inevitable that mediæval scholarship should regard the classical literatures as something alien to itself and should fail to appropriate them. The mediæval mind was no less incapable of sympathizing with their æsthetic and scientific freedom than the legendary mathematician, who asked what the "Paradise Lost" proved, was unable to take the point of view required by poetry. Its utter misapprehension of the subject-matter of these studies was expressed in the legends which made Virgil a magician and turned the gods of Hellas into devils. Nor were the most learned men free from such radically false conceptions, such palpable and incurable "lies in the soul," poisoning the very source of erudition, and converting their industry into a childish trifling with the puppets of blindfold fancy. The very fact that, while Greek was a living language in the east and in the south of Italy, it should have been abandoned by the students of the north and west, proves the indifference to literature for its own sake and the apathy with regard to human learning that prevailed in Europe. Had not Latin been the language of the Church, the language of civilized communication, it is certain that the great authors of Rome would have fallen into the same oblivion as those of Athens. An accident of social and ecclesiastical necessity preserved them. Yet none the less did they need to be rediscovered when the time came for a true comprehension of their subject-matter to revive. What Petrarch did for scholarship was to restore the lost faculty of intelligence by placing himself and his generation in a genial relation of sympathy to the Latin authors. He first treated the Romans as men of like nature with ourselves. For him the works of Virgil and Cicero, Livy and Horace, were canonical books — not precisely on a par with the Bible, because the matter they handled had a less vital relation to the eternal concerns of humanity — but still possessing an authority akin to that of inspiration, and demanding no less stringent study than the Christian sacred literature.

The dualism of the papacy and the empire, which had struck such deep roots in mediæval politics, repeated itself in Petrarch's theory of human knowledge. Just as the pope was the sun, the emperor the moon of the mediæval social system, so, with Petrarch, Christ and the Church shed the light of day upon his conscience, while the great men of antiquity were luminaries of a secondary splendor, by no means to be excluded from the heaven of human thought. This is the true meaning of his so-called humanism. It was this which made him search indefatigably for MSS., which prompted him to found public libraries and collect coins, and which impelled him to gather up and live again in his own intellectual experience whatever had been thought and done by the heroes of the Roman world. At its beginning, humanism was a religion rather than a science. Its moral force was less derived from the head than from the heart. It was an outgoing of sympathy and love and yearning towards the past, not a movement of sober curiosity. Petrarch made the classic authors his familiar friends and confidants. His epistles to Cicero, Seneca, and Varro are but fragments of a long-sustained internal colloquy, detached by a literary caprice and offered to the public as a specimen of his habitual mood. Unlike Machiavelli, after a day passed among the boon companions of a village inn, Petrarch had no need to cast aside his vulgar raiment on the threshold of his study, and assume a courtly garb before he entered the august society of the illustrious dead. He had wrought himself into such complete sympathy with the objects of his admiration, that he was always with them. They were more real to him than the men around him. He tells Augustine or Cicero more about his inner self than he communicates to the living friends whom he called Lælius and Socrates and Simonides. These men, of whom we know almost nothing, served Petrarch as the audience of his self-engrossed monologues; but they were separated from him by the spirit of the Middle Ages. He held converse with them, and presumably loved them; but he recognized a difference of intellectual breed which removed them to a greater distance than the lapse of years dividing him from antiquity. Only those friends of Petrarch's who were animated by an instinct for humanism, kindred in nature and equal in intensity to his own, emerge from the shadow-world and stand before us in his correspondence as clearly as his comrades of the Roman age. Cola di Rienzo and Boccaccio have this privilege. The rest are formless, vague, devoid of substance — the κωφὰ πρόσωπα of his dramatis personæ.

When we enquire into the range of Petrarch's knowledge, we find that he had by no means more than belonged to the mediæval students in general. It was not the extent, but the intensity of his erudition, not the matter, but the spirit of his scholarship, not its quantity, but its quality, that placed him at an immeasurable distance of superiority above his predecessors. He had so far appropriated Virgil and Seneca, with the larger portions of Cicero and Livy, as to find some difficulty in avoiding verbal reproductions of their works. Had he so willed, he might have expressed himself in a cento of their prose and verse. Horace and Ovid, Juvenal and Persius, Terence, Lucan, Statius, Ausonius, and Claudian, were among his favorite poets. It is possible that he had read Lucretius, and he twice refers somewhat vaguely to Catullus: but Propertius and Tibullus seem to have been unknown to him, while he makes but scanty use of Martial and Plautus. Valerius Flaccus and Silius Italicus he never saw: else it is improbable that he would have chosen Scipio Africanus for the hero of his Latin epic. With Apuleius he was partially acquainted; but there seems good reason to suppose that he had never read the "Golden Ass," though he alludes to it. He knew Macrobius, Aulus Gellius, Solinus, Hyginus, and Pomponius Mela in part, if not completely; for it must be remembered, in reading this lengthy list of authors, that the MSS. were imperfect and full of errors. What Poggio tells us about his finding Quintilian at St. Gallen, proves that the discovery of a good codex was almost equal to the resuscitation of a forgotten author. Cæsar, Sallust, Suetonius, Florus, Justin, Curtius, Vopiscus, Ælius Lampridius, Spartian, together with the anecdotes of Valerius Maximus and the universal history of Orosius, were among the authors he studied and epitomized while composing his great work on "Famous Men." Tacitus was unfortunately unknown to him; and he possessed Quintilian only in a mutilated copy. It may also be regarded as a special calamity that he was unacquainted with the letters of the younger Pliny, though he possessed the natural histories of the elder. The style of these letters would have supplied Petrarch with a better model than Seneca's rhetorical epistles; and he could have assimilated it more easily than that of Cicero, partly because it is itself less idiomatic, and partly because the poet of Vaucluse would have recognized a vivid bond of intellectual sympathy between himself and the humane and tranquil dilettante of Como. As it was, Petrarch's letters bear the stamp of Seneca, Augustine, and the Middle Ages. He found the MS. of Cicero too late (at Verona in 1345) to profit by its study. And here we must express a total disagreement with a passage of Mr. Reeve's "Petrarch," where he says (p. 79): "But though the style of Cicero was, no doubt, his model, he attained rather to the epistolary than to the philosophical diction of that great master." It is true that on the next page Mr. Reeve appears to contradict this statement by the following admission: "As his knowledge of the Ciceronian epistles was not attained till Petrarch had passed his fortieth year, it may be concluded that his own epistolary style was formed before he knew them." The fact is here correctly given. There is no trace of Cicero's diction, at once epigrammatic and easy, in Petrarch's letters; but in his philosophical treatises, though these reveal the paramount influence of Seneca, St. Augustine, and Lactantius, we occasionally detect an aiming at Cicero's oratorical cadences. The variety of matter handled in his letters, the rapid transition from description to dissertation, their masterly portraits of men, the pleasant wit and caustic humor that relieve the graver passages, the unaffected friendliness of their familiar discourse, the earnest enthusiasm of their political and philosophical digressions, the animation and the movement that carry the reader on as through an ever-shifting, ever-changing scene, render this great mass of correspondence not only valuable for the historian but delightful to the general reader. The scholar will detect a less than classic elegance in their diction, and the student will desire less generality of treatment on some personal topics. But both will admit that neither the ear for rhythm nor the quick intelligence which Petrarch recognized among his choicest literary gifts, had failed him in their composition.

It was Petrarch's merit, while absorbing the Roman classics and the Latin fathers, to have aimed consistently at a style that should express his own originality, and be no mere copy of however eminent a master's. The ruling consciousness of self, which formed so prominent a feature of his moral character, lying at the root of his vanity and conditioning his genius as a poet, here decided his literary development. He would be no man's ape — not even the ape of Cicero or Virgil. Come good, come bad, he meant to be himself. With this end in view, he forced himself to deal with the most formidable stylistic difficulties, and to find utterance in a practically dying language for thoughts and feelings that were modern. In this respect he contrasted favorably with his Italian followers, and proved that his conception of humanism was loftier than that of Ciceronian Bembo, or Virgilian Vida. They cut their matter down to the requirements of an artificially assimilated standard. He made the idiom bend to his needs, and preferred that purity of form should suffer, rather than that the substance to be expressed should be curtailed. It may indeed be said with truth that Erasmus, at the close of the fifteenth century, returned to the path trodden by Petrarch in the first half of the fourteenth, which had been abandoned by a set of timid and subservient purists on the quest of an impossible ideal.

Petrarch knew no Greek, yet he divined its importance, and made every effort in his power to learn it, if we except the supreme effort of going to the fount of Greek in Constantinople. His opportunities at Avignon were few; and he obtained no hold upon the language. What the subsequent history of Italian scholarship would have been, if Petrarch had but ventured on that journey to Byzantium which Filelfo and Guarino took with such immediate profit, or if by any other means he had acquired the key to Greek literature, it is now impossible to say. The weak side of the Renaissance was that it depended mainly upon Latin: and this explains in no small measure its philosophical superficiality, its tendency to lifeless rhetoric, its stylistic insipidity, the timidity and artificiality that stamp its literary products with the note of mediocrity. It was the echo of an echo, the silver age of a culture which had its own golden age in the Hellenic past: and all that it achieved in close relation to antiquity was consequently third-rate. Whether Petrarch, if he had known Greek, could have resisted the powerful bias which drew Italians back to Rome rather than to Athens, and whether, if he had overcome this tendency himself, he could have had the force to dye the humanism of the Renaissance with Hellenic instead of Latin colors, are questions that cannot by their very nature be decided. But none the less may we regret that tardy and partial impregnation of the modern mind by the Greek spirit which, had it but come earlier and in fuller measure, might have given the world a new birth of Athens instead of Rome. At the moment when humanism was a religion, the Italians absorbed the Latin genius; but now that scholarship has passed into the scientific stage, we are directed to Hellas with an unassimilative curiosity. As regards Petrarch's own knowledge of Greek authors, it may be briefly stated that he possessed MSS. of Homer and some dialogues of Plato. But he lamented that they were dumb for him while he was deaf. He read the "Iliad" in the pitiful Latin version dictated to Boccaccio by Pilatus; and the doctrines of Plato were known to him only in the meagre abstract of Apuleius, in Cicero, and in the works of St. Augustine.

Rome lay near to the Italians on their emergence from the Middle Ages. They were not a new nation, like the French or Germans; but were conscious that once, not very long ago, and separated from them only by a space of dream-existence, their ancestors through Rome had ruled the habitable world. Therefore Florence clung to her traditions of Catiline; the soldiers on watch at Modena told tales of Hector; Padua was proud of Antenor, and Como of the Plinies; Mantua sang hymns to Virgil; Naples pointed out his tomb; Sulmo rejoiced in Ovid, and Tivoli remembered Horace. The newly-formed Italian people, the people who had fought the wars of independence and had founded the communes, were essentially Roman. In no merely sentimental sense, but as a fact of plain historical survival, what still remained of Rome was indefeasibly their own. The plebs of the Italian cities was of Roman blood. Their municipal constitution, in the form and name at least, was Roman. Yet this great memory was but dimly descried through the mist of legends and romance, till Petrarch seized upon it and called his fellow-countrymen to recognize their birthright. His letter describing the impression made upon him by the ruins of Rome, dated with pride from the Capitol upon the Ides of March, his epistles to Varro and Cicero, and his burning appeals to each succeeding pope that he should end the Babylonian captivity and place a crown upon the brows of the world's mistress, prove with what a passion of anticipation he forecast the time when Rome should once more be the seat of empire. In the field of scholarship his enthusiasm was destined to be fruitful. The spirit of Roman art and literature arose from the grave to sway a golden period in the history of human civilization. But in the sphere of politics it remained impotent, idealistic, fanciful.

As a politician, Petrarch continued to the end an incurable idealist. The very conditions of expatriation and pilgrimage, which rendered him so powerful as the leader of the humanistic movement, loosened his grasp upon the realities of political life. We see this on every occasion of his attempting to play a part in the practical business of the world. In his mission from the papal court to Naples, after the accession of Queen Joan, and in his representation of the Visconti at Venice toward the close of her long struggle with Genoa, he was unsuccessful, mainly because he thought that affairs of State could be decided upon moral principles, and because he assumed the tone of an oratorical pedagogue. It was only when the rhetorician's art was needed for a magnificent display, as in his embassy from the Visconti to the French court upon the delivery of John the Good from captivity, in his speech to the conquered people of Novara, and in his ceremonial address to Charles IV. at Prague, that he justified the confidence which had been placed in him. He never saw the world as it was, but as he wished it. And what he wished, was the impossible resuscitation of the Roman commonwealth. Rome was destined, he believed, to be the centre of the globe again as it had been before. With a thoroughly unpractical conception of the very conditions of the problem, he at one time called upon the popes to re-establish themselves in the Eternal City; at another he besought the emperor to make it his headquarters, and to finish by this simple act the anarchy of Italy; at a third, when Rienzi for a moment evoked the pale shadow of the republic from the ruins of the Campagna, he hailed in him the inaugurator of a new and better age. It was nothing to Petrarch that these three solutions were discordant; that pope, emperor, and commonwealth could not simultaneously exist at Rome. Whatever seemed to reflect lustre on the Rome of his romantic vision satisfied him. Indifferent to the claims of gratitude in the past, careless of consequences in the future, he published letters which denounced his old friends and patrons, the Colonna family, as barbarous intruders in the sacred city. Even his humanity forsook him. He burned to play the Brutus, and bade Rienzi to strike and spare not. By the same heated utterances, penetrated, it is true, with the spirit of a sincere patriotism and piety to Rome, he risked the hatred of the papal see. Nor was it until Rienzi had foamed himself away in the madness of vanity that Petrarch awoke from his wild dream. He awoke indeed, but he never relinquished the hope that, if not by this man or that policy, at least by some other Messiah, and upon a different foundation, Rome might still be restored to her primeval splendor. It would seem as though the great ones of the earth estimated his enthusiasm at its real value, and allowed him to pass free as a chartered lunatic; for, much as he said and wrote about the republic, he never seriously imperilled his consideration at the papal court, nor did he interrupt his friendly relations with the petty princes whom he so vehemently denounced as traitors to the Italian people. There was a strange confusion in his mind between his admiration for the ancient Roman commonwealth, which he had imbibed from Livy and which inspired his "Africa," and his mediæval worship of the mixed papal and imperial idea. To Dante's theory of monarchy he added a purely literary enthusiasm for the populus Romanus. Yet Petrarch was no real friend of the people, as he found it, and as alone it could exist in the new age. His friendship for Azzo da Correggio and Luchino Visconti, for the tyrants of Padua, Verona, and Parma, and for King Robert of Sicily, prove that, though in theory he desired some phantom of republican government, in practice he accommodated himself to the worst forms of despotism. Democracy formed no portion of his creed; and his plan of Roman government, submitted to the consideration of Clement VI. in 1351, simply consisted of a scheme for placing power in the hands of the Roman burghers to the exclusion of the great Teutonic families. He was possessed with scholarly hauteur and literary aristocracy; and if he could not have a senate in Rome, with Scipios and Gracchi perorating before popes and emperors in some impossible chimera of mixed government, he did not care how cities suffered or how princes ground their people into dust. His apathetic attitude toward Jacopo da Bussolari's revolution in Pavia, and his sermon to the Novaresi on obedience, would be enough to prove this, if his whole life at Milan, Parma, and Padua were not conclusive testimony.

The main fault of Petrarch's treatises on politics is that they are too didactic. They do not touch the points at issue, but lose themselves in semi-ethical and superficially rhetorical discourses. Thus he prepared the way for those orators of the Renaissance who thought it enough to adorn their subject with moral sentences and learned citations, neglecting the matter of dispute and flooding their audience with conventional sermons. The same fault may be found with his philosophical writings, although a nobler spirit appears in them and a more sturdy grasp upon the realities of life. It was his misfortune to be cast exclusively upon the Roman eclectics — Cicero, Seneca, and Lactantius — for his training in moral science. His ignorance of Greek deprived him of the opportunity of studying any complete system, while his temperament rendered him incapable of absorbing and reconstructing the stoicism of the later Latin writers. According to his view, orthodoxy was the true philosophy; nor did he ever grasp the notion that in the scientific impulse there is an element of search and criticism perilous to Christian dogmatism. It need scarcely be said that he was a good churchman, though of a type less monumentally severe than Dante. Early in life he took orders; and here it may be observed that Mr. Reeve is possibly wrong in supposing he was never ordained priest. The point seems proved by his own declaration that he was in the habit of saying mass; * and though his life was not irreproachable from a moral point of view, he never pretended that in this respect his conduct had not fallen short of sacerdotal duty.

St. Augustine, whose mental attitude as an orthodox philosopher was similar to his own, became the author of his predilection. Few moments in the history of thought are more interesting than the meeting of that last Roman, already merging his antique individuality in the abyss of theological mysticism, with Petrarch, the first modern to emerge from that contemplative eclipse and reassert the rights of human personality. Between them rolled the river of the Middle Ages, which had almost proved the Lethe of learning; but Petrarch stretched his hand across it, and found in the author of the "Civitas Dei" a friend and comrade. The exquisite sensibility of Augustine, his fervid language, the combat between his passions and his piety, his self-analysis, and final conquest over all that checks the soul's flight heavenward, drew Petrarch to him with irresistible attraction. The poet of Vaucluse recognized in him a kindred nature. The "Confessions" were his Werther, his Rousseau, his cherished gospel of tenderness, "running over with a fount of tears." But, more than this, Augustine pointed him the path that he should tread; and though Petrarch could not tread it firmly, though he bitterly avowed that love, restlessness, vanity, thirst for earthly fame, coldness, causeless melancholy, and divided impulse, kept him close to earth, when he would fain have flown aloft to God, yet the communion with this sterner but still sympathetic nature formed his deepest consolation. Those who wish to study Petrarch's very self must seek it in the book he called his "Secretum," the dialogues with St. Augustine upon the contempt of the world. Between Augustine's own "Confessions" and this masterpiece of self-description, the human intellect had produced nothing of the same kind, if we except Dante's exquisite but comparatively restricted "Vita Nuova." With a master hand Petrarch touches the secret springs of his character in these dialogues, lays his finger upon his hidden wounds, and traces the failures and achievements of his life to their true sources. No more consummate piece of self-conscious analysis has ever been penned. It is inspired with an artistic interest in the subject for its own sake; and though the tone is grave, because Petrarch was sincerely religious, there is no obvious aiming at edification. In this intense sense of personality, this delight in the internal world revealed by introspection, it differs widely from mediæval manuals of devotion, from the "Imitatio Christi," for example, which is not the delineation of a man but of a class.

The "De Contemptu Mundi" is the most important of Petrarch's quasi-philosophical works, chiefly, perhaps, because it was not written with a would-be scientific purpose. Together with a very few books of a similar description, gathered from all literatures ancient and modern, it remains as a fruitful mine for the inductive moralist. His treatise, "De Remediis utriusque Fortunæ," though bulkier, has less value. It consists of sentences and commonplaces upon the good and evil things of life, and how to deal with them, very often acute, and not seldom humorous, and written in a fluent style, that must have made them infinitely charming to the fourteenth century of arid composition. Petrarch had the art of literary gossip; and he displayed it not only in his letters, but also in such studied works as this The essay "De Vitâ Solitariâ" has a greater personal interest. Petrarch unfolds in it his theory of the right uses to be made of solitude, and shows how intellectual activity can best be carried on in close communion with nature. What he preached he had fully proved by practice at Vaucluse and Selvapiana. His recluse is no hermit or mediæval monk. He does not retire to the desert, or the woods, or to the cloister; but he lives a life of rational study and sustained communion with himself in the midst of nature's beauties. These he enjoys with placidity and passion, mingled in a wise enthusiasm, till, living thus alone, he finds his true self, enters into the possession of his own mental kingdom, and needs no external support of class interests, official dignities, or work among his fellow-men to buoy him up. There is a profoundly modern tone in this essay. Petrarch describes in it an intellectual egotist, devoted to self-culture, and bent on being sufficient to himself. It is, in fact, the ideal of Goethe, anticipated by four centuries, and colored with a curious blending of piety and paganism peculiar to Petrarch. The "De Vitâ Solitariâ" might be styled the panegyric of the wilderness, from a humanistic point of view; and here it is worthy of remark that, so far back as the age of Alexander, philosophers, bent upon self-culture, had praised the virtues of withdrawal from the world: —

> οἱ τὰς ὀφρῦς αἴροντες·

says Menander. Therefore what Petrarch did was to restate a classic theory of life, which had been merged in the asceticism of the cloister. He did so, without doubt, unconsciously; for Menander was a closed book to him. In harsh contrast is the companion essay on the leisure of the religious, "De Otio Religiosorum," composed by Petrarch after a visit to his brother Gherardo in his cloister near Marseilles. The fascination which, in spite of humanism, the Middle Ages still exerted over Petrarch, may be seen in every line of this apparent palinode. If we examine the two discourses side by side, we are almost driven to the conclusion that his command of rhetoric induced their author to treat two discordant aspects of the same theme with something like cynical indifference. Yet this was not the case. In each discourse Petrarch is sincere; for the mediæval and humanistic ideals, irreconcilable and mutually exclusive, found their meeting-point in him. Their conflict caused his spiritual restlessness, and it was the effort of his life to bring them into equilibrium. At one time the humanist, athirst for glory, bent on self-effectuation, forensic, eloquent, enjoying life, devoting his solitary hours to culture, and communing in spirit with the orators of ancient Rome, was uppermost. At another the ascetic, renouncing the world, absorbing himself in mystic contemplation, fixing all his thoughts on death and on the life beyond the grave, assumed supremacy. In his youth and early manhood the former prevailed. After the year 1348, the year of Laura's death, the year of the great plague, which swept away his friends and changed the aspect of society, the latter gained a permanently growing ascendency. But it may be safely said that both impulses co-existed in him till the day of his own death in 1374. A common ground for both was found in the strong love of seclusion which formed one of his chief characteristics, driving him from time to time away from towns and friends into the country houses he possessed at Vaucluse, near Parma, near Milan, and at Arquà. A singular scheme, communicated in 1348 to his friends Mainardo Accursio and Luca Cristiano, for establishing a kind of humanistic convent, of which the members should be devoted to study as well as to religious exercises, shows that Petrarch even meditated a practical fusion of the scholarly and monastic modes of life.

Petrarch was neither a systematic theologian nor a systematic philosopher. He was an orthodox essayist on moral themes, biassed by a leaning towards pagan antiquity. Far more valuable than any of his ethical dissertations was his large and liberal view of human knowledge; and in this general sense he rightly deserves the title of philosopher. Mere repetitions of prescribed formulæ, reproductions of a master's ipse dixit, and scholastic reiterations of authorized doctrines, whether in theology or in philosophy, moved his bitterest scorn. He held that everything was worthless which a man had not assimilated and lived into by actual experience, so as to reconstruct it with the force of his own personality. This point of view was eminently precious in an age of formalism. His antipathy to law, in like manner, did not spring from any loathing of a subject redolent with antiquity and consecrated by the genius of Rome. He only despised the peddling sophistries and narrow arts of those who practised it. His polemic against the physicians, condensed into four ponderous invectives, was likewise based upon their false pretensions to science and their senseless empiricism. In every sphere of human activity he demanded that men should possess real knowledge, and be conscious of its limitations. When he entered into the lists against the Averrhoists, his weightiest argument was founded on the fact that they piqued themselves upon their erudition in the matter of stones, plants, and animals, while they neglected the true concerns of man, and all that may affect his destinies for weal or woe. He dreaded a debasement of human culture by Averrhoistic materialism hardly less than an injury to religion from Averrhoistic atheism. A steady preference of the spirit to the letter, and a firm grasp of the maxim that "the proper study of mankind is man," formed the pith and substance of his intellectual creed. It was here that his humanism and his philosophy joined hands. Nor can we regard the revival of learning in Italy without regretting that the humanists diverged so signally from the path prescribed for them in this respect by their great leader. They copied his faults of vanity and rhetoric. They exaggerated his admiration of Cicero and Virgil into a servile cult. They adhered to Latin authors and Latin canons of taste, when they might have carried on his work into the region of Greek metaphysics. But they lost his large conception of human learning, and gave themselves to puerilities which Petrarch would have been the first to denounce. Thus the true strength of Petrarch's spirit failed to sustain his disciples; while his foibles and shortcomings were perpetuated. In particular it may be affirmed that the Renaissance in Italy produced no philosophy worth notice until the dawn of modern science appeared in Telesio and Campanella, and in the splendid lunes of visionary Bruno.

In his general theory of poetry Petrarch did not free himself from mediæval conceptions, however much his practice may have placed him first upon the list of modern lyrists. He held that the poet and the orator were nearly equal in dignity, though he inclined to assigning a superiority to the latter. This estimate of the two chief species of impassioned eloquence, which we are accustomed to regard as separate and rarely combined in the same person, was probably due to the then prevalent opinion that poets must be learned — an opinion based upon the difficulty of study, and the belief that the unapproachable masterpieces of the ancients had been produced by scientific industry. With the same high sense of the literary function which marked his conception of humanism, he demanded that both orator and poet should instruct and elevate as well as please. The content of the work of art was no matter of indifference to Petrarch; and though he was the most consummate artist of Italian verse, the doctrine of art for art's sake found no favor in his eyes. It may, indeed, be said that he overstepped the mark, and confounded the poet with the prophet or the preacher, retaining a portion of that half-religious awe with which the students of the Middle Ages, unable to understand Virgil, and wonder-smitten by his greatness, had contemplated the author of the "Æneid." It was, he thought, the poet's duty to set forth truth under the veil of fiction, partly in order to enhance the pleasure of the reader and attract him by the rarity of the conceit, and partly to wrap his precious doctrine from the coarse unlettered world. This view of the necessary connection between poetry and allegory dates as far back as Lactantius, from whose "Institutions" Petrarch borrowed the groundwork of his own exposition. That it was shared by the early Florentine lyrists, especially by Dante and Guido Caval-canti, is well-known. It reappears in the diploma presented to Petrarch upon the occasion of his coronation. It pervades Boccaccio's critical treatises, and it lives on with diminished energy until the age of Tasso, who supplied a key to the moral doctrine of his "Gerusalemme Liberata." Genius, however, works by instinct far less than by precept; and the best portions of Petrarch's poetry are free from this æsthetic heresy. We find allegory pure and simple, it is true, in his Latin eclogues, while the concetti of the Italian lyrics, where he plays upon the name of Laura, reveal the same taint. In the "Trionfi" allegorical machinery is used with high art for the legitimate presentation of a solemn pageant; so that we need not quarrel with it here. The Latin epistles are comparatively free from the disease, while the "Africa" is an epic of the lamp, modelled upon Virgil, and vitiated less by allegory than by an incurable want of constitutional vitality. It is the artificial copy of a poem which itself was artificial, and is therefore thrice removed from the truth of nature. What must be said about Petrarch's Latin poetry may be briefly stated. It has the same merits and the same defects as his prose. That is to say, he studiously strove at being original while he imitated; and, paradoxical as this may seem, he was not unsuccessful. His verse is his own; but it is often rough, and almost always tedious, deformed by frequent defects of rhythm, and very rarely rising into poetry except in some sonorous bursts of declamation. The lament for King Robert at the end of the "Africa," with its fine prophecy of the Renaissance, and a fervid address to Italy, written on the heights of Mont Genèvre in 1353 upon the occasion of his crossing the Alps, to return to Avignon no more,* might be cited as two favorable specimens. But when we speak of Petrarch as a poet, we do not think of these scholastic lucubrations. We think of the canzoniere, for the sake of which the lover of Madonna Laura is crowned second in the great triumvirate of the trecento by the acclaim of his whole nation.

Petrarch the author of the "Rime in Vita e Morte di Madonna Laura," seems at first sight a very different being from Petrarch the humanist. There is a famous passage in the "De Remediis utriusque Fortunæ," where the lyrist of chivalrous love pours such contempt on women as his friend Boccaccio might have envied when he wrote the satire of "Corbaccio." In the "Secretum," again, he describes his own passion as a torment from which he had vainly striven to emancipate himself by solitude, by journeys, by distractions, and by obstinate studies. In fact, he never alludes to the great love of his life without a strange mixture of tenderness and sore regret. That Laura was a real woman, and that Petrarch's worship of her was unfeigned; that he adored her with the senses and the heart as well as with the head; but that this love was at the same time more a mood of the imagination, a delicate disease, a cherished wound, to which he constantly recurred as the most sensitive and lively wellspring of poetic fancy, than a downright and impulsive passion, may be clearly seen in the whole series of his poems and his autobiographical confessions. Laura was a married woman; for he calls her mulier. She treated him with the courtesy of a somewhat distant acquaintance, who was aware of his homage and was flattered by it. But they enjoyed no intimacy, and it may be questioned whether, if Petrarch could by any accident have made her his own, the fruition of her love would not have been a serious interruption to the happiness of his life. He first saw her in the Church of St. Claire, at Avignon, on the 6th of April, 1327. She passed from this world on the 6th of April, 1348. These two dates are the two turning-points of Petrarch's life. The interval of twenty-one years, when Laura trod the earth, and her lover in all his wanderings paid his orisons to her at morning, evening, and noonday, and passed his nights in dreams of that fair form which never might be his, was the storm and stress period of his checkered career. There is an old Greek proverb that "to desire the impossible is a malady of the soul." With this malady in its most incurable form the poet was stricken; and, instead of seeking cure, he nursed his sickness and delighted in the discord of his soul. From that discord he wrought the harmonies of his sonnets and canzoni. That malady made him the poet of all men who have found in their emotions a dreamland more wonderful and pregnant with delight than in the world which we call real. After Laura's death his love was tranquillized to a sublimer music. The element of discord had passed out of it; and just because its object was now physically unattainable, it grew in purity and power. The sensual alloy which, however spiritualized, had never ceased to disturb his soul, was purged from his still vivid passion. Laura in heaven looked down upon him from her station amid the saints; and her poet could indulge the dream that now at last she pitied him, that she was waiting for him with angelic eyes of love, and telling him to lose no time, but set his feet upon the stairs that led to God and her. The romance finds its ultimate apotheosis in that transcendent passage of the "Trionfo della Morte," which describes her death and his own vision. Throughout the whole course of this labyrinthine love-lament, sustained for forty years on those few notes so subtly modulated, from the first sonnet on his "primo giovenile errore" to the last line of her farewell, "Tu stara' in terra senza me gran tempo," Laura grows in vividness before us. She only becomes a real woman in death, because she was for Petrarch always an ideal, and in the ideal world beyond the tomb he is more sure of her than when "the fair veil" of flesh was drawn between her and his yearning.

No love-poetry of the ancient world offers any analogue to the canzoniere. Nor has it a real parallel in the Provençal verse from which it sprang. What distinguishes it, is the transition from a mediæval to a modern mood, the passage from Cino and Guido to Werther and Rousseau. Its tenacity and idealism belong to the chivalrous age. Its preoccupation with emotion as a given subject-matter and its infinite subtlety of self-analysis place it at the front of modern literature. Among the northern nations chivalrous love was treated as a motive for epic poetry in the Arthurian romances. It afterwards found lyrical expression among the poets of Provence. From them it passed to Italy, first appearing among the Lombard troubadours, who still used the langue d'oc, and next in Sicily at Frederick's court, where the earliest specimens of genuine Italian verse were fashioned. Guido Guinicelli further developed the sonnet, and built the lofty rhymes of the canzone at Bologna. By this time Italian literature was fully started; and the traditions of Provençal poetry had been both assimilated and transcended. From Guido's hands the singers of Florence took the motive up, and gave it a new turn of deeper allegory and more philosophic meaning. The canzoni of Dante and Guido Cavalcanti were no mere poems of passion, however elevated. Love supplied the form and language; but there lurked a hidden esoteric meaning. It is true that in the "Vita Nuova" Dante found at once the most delicate and the most poetically perfect form for the expression of an unsophisticated feeling. Beatrice was here a woman, seen from far and worshipped, but worshipped with a natural ardor. He was not, however, contented to rest upon this point; nor had he any opportunity of becoming properly acquainted with the object of his adoration in her lifetime. In the "Convito," she had already been idealized as Philosophy, and in the "Divine Comedy" she is transfigured as Theology. Death, by separating her from him, rendered Beatrice's apotheosis conceivable; and Dante may be said to have rediscovered the Platonic mystery, whereby love is an initiation into the secrets of the spiritual world. It was the intuition of a sublime nature into the essence of pure impersonal enthusiasm for beauty, an exaltation of woman similar to that attempted afterwards by Shelley in "Epipsychidion," which pervades the poetry of Michelangelo, and which forms a definite portion of the Positivistic creed. Yet there remained an ineradicable unsubstantiality in this point of view, when tested by the common facts of human feeling. The Dantesque idealism was too far removed from the sphere of ordinary experience to take firm hold upon the modern intellect. In proportion as Beatrice personified abstractions, she ceased to be a woman; nor was it possible, except by losing hold of the individual, to regard her as a symbol of the universal. Plato in the "Symposium" had met this difficulty, by saying that the lover, having reached the beatific vision, must renounce the love by which he had been led to it. A different solution, in harmony with the spirit of their age and their religion, was offered by the trecentisti. Their transmutation of the simpler elements of chivalrous love into something mystical and complex, where the form of the worshipped lady transcends the sphere of experience, and her spirit is identified with the lover's profoundest thoughts and highest aspirations, was a natural process in mediæval Florence. The Tuscan intellect was too virile and sternly strung at that epoch to be satisfied with amorous rhymes. The mediæval theory of æsthetics demanded allegory, and imposed upon the poet erudition; nor was it easy for the singer of that period to command his own immediate emotions, with a firm grasp upon their relation to the world around him, or to use them for the purposes of conscious art. He found it more proper to express a philosophic content under the accepted form of erotic poetry than to paint the personality of the woman he loved with natural precision. Between the mysticism of a sublime but visionary adoration on the one side, and the sensualities of vulgar passion or the decencies of married life upon the other, there lay for him no intermediate artistic region. The Italian genius, in the Middle Ages, created no feminine ideal analogous in the reality of womanhood to Gudrun or Chriemhild, Guinevere or Iseult: and when it left the high region of symbolism, it descended almost without modulation to the prose of common life. Guido Cavalcanti is in this respect instructive. We find in his poetry the two tendencies separated and represented with equal power, not harmonized as in the case of Dante's allegory. His canzoni dealt with intellectual abstractions. His ballate gave artistic form to feelings stirred by incidents of everyday experience. The former were destined to be left behind, together with the theological scholasticism of the Middle Ages. The latter lived on through Boccaccio to Poliziano and the poets of the sixteenth century. Still we can fix one moment of transition from the transcendental philosophy of love to the positive romance of the "Decameron." Guided by his master, Cino da Pistoja, the least metaphysical and clearest of his immediate predecessors, Petrarch found the right artistic via media; and perhaps we may attribute something to that double education which placed him between the influences of the Tuscan lyrists and the troubadours of his adopted country. At any rate he returned from the allegories of the Florentine poets to the simplicity of chivalrous emotion; but he treated the original motive with a greater richness and a more idealizing delicacy than his Provençal predecessors. The marvellous instruments of the Italian sonnet and canzone were in his hands, and he knew how to draw from them a purer if not a grander melody than either Guido or Dante. The best work of the Florentines required a commentary; and the structure of their verse, like its content, was scientific rather than artistic. Petrarch could publish his canzoniere without explanatory notes. He had laid bare his heart to the world, and every man who had a heart might understand his language. Between the subject-matter and the verbal expression there lay no intervening veil of mystic meaning. The form had become correspondingly more clear and perfect, more harmonious in its proportions, more immediate in musical effects. In a word, Petrarch was the first to open a region where art might be free, and to find for the heart's language utterance direct and limpid.

This was his great achievement. The forms he used were not new. The subject-matter he handled was given to him. But he brought both form and subject closer to the truth, exercising at the same time an art which had hitherto been unconceived in subtlety, and which has never since been equalled. If Dante was the first great poet, Petrarch was the first true artist of Italian literature. It was, however, impossible that Petrarch should overleap at one bound all the barriers of the Middle Ages. His Laura has still something of the earlier ideality adhering to her. She stands midway between the Beatrice of Dante and the women of Boccaccio. She is not so much a woman with a character and personality, as woman in the general, la femme, personified and made the object of a poet's reveries. Though every detail of her physical perfections, with the single and striking exception of her nose, is carefully recorded, it is not easy to form a definite picture even of her face and shape. Of her inner nature we hear only the vaguest generalities. She sits like a lovely model in the midst of a beautiful landscape, like one of Burne Jones's women, who incarnate a mood of feeling while they lack the fulness of personality. The thought of her pervades the valley of Vaucluse; the perfume of her memory is in the air we breathe. But if we met her, we should find it hard to recognize her; and if she spoke, we should not understand that it was Laura. Petrarch had no objective faculty. Just as he failed to bring Laura vividly before us, until she had by death become a part of his own spiritual substance, so he failed to depict things as he saw them. The pictures etched in three or four lines of the "Purgatorio" may be sought for vainly in his rime. That his love of nature was intense, there is no doubt. The solitary of Vaucluse, the pilgrim of Mont Ventoux, had reached a point of sensibility to natural scenery far in advance of his age. But when he came to express this passion for beauty, he was satisfied with giving the most perfect form to the emotion stirred in his own subjectivity. Instead of scenes, he delineates the moods suggested by them. He makes the streams and cliffs and meadows of Vaucluse his confidants. He does not lose himself in contemplation of the natural object, though we feel that this self found its freest breathing-space, its most delightful company, in the society of hill and vale. He never cares to paint a landscape, but contents himself with such delicate touches and such cunning combinations of words as may suggest a charm in the external world. At this point the humanist, preoccupied with man as his main subject, meets the poet in Petrarch. What is lost, too, in the precision of delineation, is gained in universality. The canzoniere reminds us of no single spot; wherever there are clear, fresh rills and hanging mountains, the lover walks with Petrarch by his side.

If the poet's dominant subjectivity weakened his grasp upon external things, it made him supreme in self-portraiture. Every mood of passion is caught and fixed forever in his verse. The most evanescent shades of feeling are delicately set upon the exquisite picture. Each string of love's many-chorded lyre is touched with a masterly hand. The fluctuations of hope, despair, surprise; the "yea and nay twinned in a single breath;" the struggle of conflicting aspirations in a heart drawn now to God and now to earth; the quiet resting-places of content; the recrudescence of the ancient smart; the peace of absence, when longing is luxury; the agony of presence, adding fire to fire, — all this is rendered with a force so striking, in a style so monumental, that the canzoniere may still be called the "introduction to the book of love." Thus, when Petrarch's own self was the object, his hand was firm; his art failed not in modelling the image into roundness. Dante brought the universe into his poem. But "the soul of man, too, is an universe;" and of this inner microcosm Petrarch was the poet. It remained for Boccaccio, the third in the supreme triumvirate, to treat of common life with art no less consummate. From Beatrice through Laura to the Fiammetta; from the "Divine Comedy" through the canzoniere to the "Decameron;" from the world beyond the grave through the world of feeling to the world in which we play our puppet parts; from the mystic terza rima, through the stately lyric stanzas, to Protean prose. Such was the rapid movement of Italian art within the brief space of some fifty years. We cannot wonder that when Boccaccio died, the source of inspiration seemed to fail. Heaven and hell, the sanctuaries of the soul, and the garden of our earth, had all been traversed. Well might Sacchetti exclaim: —

Sonati sono i corni
D' ogni parte a ricolta:
La stagione è rivolta:
Se tornerà non so, ma credo tardi.

Hitherto we have spoken only of Petrarch's love-verses. There is a short section of the canzoniere devoted to poems on various arguments, which presents him in another light. The oratorical impulse was only second to the subjective in his genius; and three canzoni, addressed to Giacomo Colonna, to Rienzi, and to the Princess of Italy, display the pleader's eloquence in its most perfect lustre. If the "Rime in Vita e Morte di Madonna Laura" bequeathed to the Italians models of meditative poetry, these canzoni taught them how classical form might be given to hortatory lyrics on subjects of national interest. There was a wail, an outcry in their passionate strophes, which went on gathering volume as the centuries rolled over Italy, until at last, in her final servitude beneath the feet of Spanish Austria, they seemed less poems than authentic prophecies. The Italians inherited from their Roman ancestors a strong forensic bias. What the forum was for the ancients, the piazza became for them. To follow out the intricacies of this thought would require more time and space than we can spare. It must be enough to remark that in their literature at large there is a powerful declamatory element. It impairs their philosophical writing, and helps to give an air of superficiality to their poetry. They lack what the Germans call Innigkeit, and the French intimité. What will not bear recitation in the market-place, what does not go at once home without difficulty to the average intelligence of the crowd, must be excluded from their art. It is rarely that we catch an undertone piercing the splendid resonances of their verse, or that we surprise a singer hidden in the cloud of thought, pouring his song forth as the night-bird sings to ease her soul in solitude. Such being, roughly speaking, the chief bent of the Italians, it followed that Petrarch's rhetorical canzoni had a better and more fruitful influence than his meditative poems on their literature. The Petrarchisti of chivalrous passion attenuated his feeling without realizing it in their own lives, and imitated his style without attaining to his mastery of form, until the one lost all vitality and the other became barren mannerism. But from time to time, as in Filicaja's sonnet or Leopardi's "Ode to Italy," we catch the true ring of his passionate "Italia mia!"

It will be understood that what has been said in the foregoing paragraph, about the rhetorical bias of the Italians, is only generally applicable. Their greatest artists and poets — Dante, Petrarch, Signorelli, Michelangelo, Tintoretto, Leopardi — have combined the forensic qualities of the Latins with the Innigkeit of the Teutons, just as, from the opposite point of view, we find a similar combination in Germans like Goethe, and in the French intellect at large. Petrarch's preoccupation with self so far balanced the oratorical impulse that, while the latter found its scope in his prose works, by far the larger portion of his poems gave expression to the former.

By right of his self-consciousness and thirst for glory, Petrarch was a modern man, fashioned by contact with antiquity. But dwelling as he did within the threshold of the Middle Ages, he had to pay the penalty of this emancipation from their intellectual conditions. After all is said, the final characteristic of Petrarch is the state of spiritual flux in which he lived. His love of Laura seemed to him an error and a sin, because it clashed with an ascetic impulse that had never been completely blunted. In his "Hymn to the Virgin," he spoke of this passion as the Medusa which had turned his purer self to stone: —

> Medusa e l'error mio m' han fatto un sasso
> D' umor vano stillante.

Yet he knew that this same passion had been the cause of his most permanent achievements in the sphere of art. Laura's name was confounded with the laurel wreath, for which he strove, and which he wore with pride upon the Capitol. Even here a new contradiction in his nature revealed itself. Thirsting as he did for fame, he judged this appetite ungodly. The only immortality to be desired by the true Christian was a life beyond this earth. While he expressed a contempt for the world inspired by sympathy with monasticism, he enjoyed each mundane pleasure with the fine taste of an intellectual epicure. Solitude was his ideal, and in solitude he planned his most considerable literary masterpieces: but he frequented the courts of princes, made himself their mouthpiece, and delighted in the parade of a magnificent society. Humanism, which was destined to bring forth a kind of neo-paganism in Italy, had its source in him; and no scholar was more enthusiastic for the heroes of the antique age. But even while he gave his suffrage to the "starry youth" of Scipio, he was reminded that the saints of the Thebaid had wreathed their brows with the palms of a still more splendid victory. He worshipped Laura with a chivalrous devotion; but he lived, according to the custom of his time and his profession, with a concubine who bore him two children. No poet exalted the cult of woman to a higher level; but no monk expressed a bitterer hostility against the sex. He could not choose between the spirit and the flesh, or utter the firm "I will" of acceptance or renunciation upon either side. The genius of Rome and the genius of Nazareth strove in him for mastery. At one time he was fain to ape the antique patriot; at another he affected the monastic saint. He pretended to despise celebrity and mourned the vanity of worldly honors; yet he was greedy of distinction. His correspondence reveals the intrigues with which he sought the poet's laurel, pulling wires at Rome and Paris, in order that he might have the choice of being either crowned upon the Capitol or else before the most august society of learned men in Europe. At the same time, when fame had found him, when he stood forth as the acknowledged hero of culture, he complained that the distractions of renown withdrew him from the service of religion and his soul. He claimed to have disengaged himself from the shackles of personal vanity. Yet a foolish word dropped by some young men in Padua against his learning, made him take up cudgels in his failing years, and engage in a gladiatorial combat for the maintenance of his repute. He was clamorous for the freedom of the populus Romanus, and importunate in his assertion of Italian independence. Yet he stooped to flatter kings in letters of almost more than Byzantine adulation, and lent his authority to the infamies of Lombard despotism. It would be easy enough, but weariful, to lengthen out this list of Petrarch's inner contradictions. The malady engendered by them — that incurable acedia, that atonic melancholy, which he ascribed to St. Augustine — made him the prototype of an age which had in it, and which still has, a thousand unreconciled antagonisms. Hamlet and Faust, Werther and René, Childe Harold and Dipsychus, find their ancestor in Petrarch; and it is this which constitutes his chief claim on the sympathies of the modern world. He too has left us a noble example of the method whereby the inevitable discords of an awakened consciousness may be resolved in a superior harmony. Through all his struggles he remained true to the one ideal of intellectual activity, and the very conflict saved him from stagnation. His energies were never for one moment prostrated, nor was his hope extinguished. He labored steadily for the completion of that human synthesis, embracing the traditions of antiquity and Christianity, which, as though by instinct, he felt to be the necessary condition of a European revival. It may be confidently asserted that if his immediate successors had continued his work in the spirit of their leader, the Renaissance would have brought forth nobler fruits.

We are told that the faces of dying persons sometimes reproduce the features of their youth, and the memory of old men reverts to the events of boyhood. Thus Petrarch at the close of life survived the struggles of his manhood, and returned with single-hearted impulse to the alma mater of his youth. From the year 1348 forward, he approximated more and more to the mediæval type of character, without losing his zeal for liberal studies. The coming age, which he inaugurated, faded from his vision, and the mystic past resumed its empire. Yet, as a scholar, he never ceased to be industrious. One of his last works was the translation into Latin of Boccaccio's "Griselda;" and on the morning after his unwitnessed death, his servant found him bowed upon his books. But Petrarch was not sustained in age and sickness by a forecast of the culture he had labored to create. The consolations of religion, the piety of the cloister, soothed his soul; and he who had been the Erasmus of his century, passed from it in the attitude of an Augustinian monk.

At Arquà they still show the house where Petrarch spent his last years, the little study where he worked, the chair in which he sat, the desk at which he wrote. From those soft-swelling undulations of the Euganean hills, hoary with olives, rich with fig and vine, the Lombard plain breaks away toward Venice and the Adriatic. The air is light; the prospect is immense; there is a sound of waters hurrying by. In front of the church-door, below the house, and close beside the rushing stream, stands the massive coffer of Verona marble where his ashes rest. No inscription is needed. The fame of Petrarch broods on Arquà like the canopy of heaven. For one who has dwelt long in company with his vexed, steadfast spirit — so divine in aspiration, so human in tenderness, and so like ourselves in its divided impulses — there is something inexpressibly solemn to stand beside this sepulchre, and review the five centuries through which the glory he desired has lived and grown. Few men capable of comprehending his real greatness, while there standing, will not envy him the peace he found upon the end of life, and pause to wonder when that harmony will be achieved between the wisdom of this world and the things of God which Petrarch, through all contradictions, clung to and in death accomplished.

BIANCA.

NOT long since, I was one among a crowd of nobodies at a big official reception in Paris when the Marchese and Marchesa di San Silvestro were announced. There was a momentary hush; those about the doorway fell back to let this distinguished couple pass, and some of us stood on tiptoe to get a glimpse of them; for San Silvestro is a man of no small importance in the political and diplomatic world, and his wife enjoys quite a European fame for beauty and amiability, having had opportunities of displaying both these attractive gifts at the several courts where she has acted as Italian ambassadress. They made their way quickly up the long room — she short, rather sallow, inclined towards embonpoint, but with eyes whose magnificence was rivalled only by that of her diamonds; he bald-headed, fat, grey-haired, covered with orders — and were soon out of sight. I followed them with a sigh which caused my neighbor to ask me jocosely whether the marchesa was an old flame of mine.

"Far from it," I answered. "Only the sight of her reminded me of bygone days. Dear, dear me! how time does slip on! It is fifteen years since I saw her last."

I moved away, looking down rather ruefully at the waistcoat to whose circumference fifteen years have made no trifling addition, and wondering whether I was really as much altered and aged in appearance as the marchesa was.

Fifteen years — it is no such very long time; and yet I dare say that the persons principally concerned in the incident which I am about to relate, have given up thinking about it as completely as I had done, until the sound of that lady's name, and the sight of her big black eyes, recalled it to me, and set me thinking of the sunny spring afternoon on which my sister Anne and I journeyed from Verona to Venice, and of her naïve exclamations of delight on finding herself in a real gondola, gliding smoothly down the Grand Canal. My sister Anne is by some years my senior.

She is what might be called an old lady now, and she certainly was an old maid then, and had long accepted her position as such. Then, as now, she habitually wore a grey alpaca gown, a pair of gold-rimmed spectacles, gloves a couple of sizes too large for her, and a shapeless, broad-leaved, straw hat, from which a blue veil was flung back and streamed out in the breeze behind her, like a ship's ensign. Then, as now, she was the simplest, the most kind-hearted, the most prejudiced of mortals; an enthusiastic admirer of the arts, and given, as her own small contribution thereto, to the production of endless water-color landscapes, a trifle woolly, indeed, as to outline, and somewhat faulty as to perspective, but warm in coloring, and highly thought of in the family. I believe, in fact, that it was chiefly with a view to the filling of her portfolio that she had persuaded me to take her to Venice; and, as I am constitutionally indolent, I was willing enough to spend a few weeks in the city which, of all cities in the world, is the best adapted for lazy people. We engaged rooms at Danielli's, and unpacked all our clothes, knowing that we were not likely to make another move until the heat should drive us away.

The first few days, I remember, were not altogether full of enjoyment for one of us. My excellent Anne, who has all her brother's virtues, without his failings, would have scouted the notion of allowing any dread of physical fatigue to stand between her and the churches and pictures which she had come all the way from England to admire; and, as Venice was an old haunt of mine, she very excusably expected me to act as cicerone to her, and allowed me but little rest between the hours of breakfast and of the table d'hôte. At last, however, she conceived the modest and felicitous idea of making a copy of Titian's "Assumption," and, having obtained the requisite permission for that purpose, set to work upon the first of a long series of courageous attempts, all of which she conscientiously destroyed when in a half-finished state. At that rate it seemed likely that her days would be fully occupied for some weeks to come; and I urged her to persevere, and not to allow herself to be disheartened by a few brilliant failures; and so she hurried away, early every morning, with her paint-box, her brushes, and her block, and I was left free to smoke my cigarettes in peace, in front of my favorite café on the Piazza San Marco.

I was sitting there one morning, watching, with half-closed eyes, the pigeons circling overhead under a cloudless sky, and enjoying the fresh salt breeze that came across the ruffled water from the Adriatic, when I was accosted by one of the white-coated Austrian officers by whom Venice was thronged in those days, and whom I presently recognized as a young fellow named Von Rosenau whom I had known slightly in Vienna the previous winter. I returned his greeting cordially, for I always like to associate as much as possible with foreigners when I am abroad, and little did I foresee into what trouble this fair-haired, innocent-looking youth was destined to lead me.

I asked him how he liked Venice, and he answered laughingly that he was not there from choice. "I am in disgrace," he explained. "I am always in disgrace — only this time it is rather worse than usual. Do you remember my father, the general? No? Perhaps he was not in Vienna when you were there. He is a soldier of the old school, and manages his family as they tell me he used to manage his regiment in former years, boasting that he has never allowed a breach of discipline to pass unpunished, and never will. Last year I exceeded my allowance, and the colonel got orders to stop my leave; this year I borrowed from the Jews, the whole thing was found out, and I was removed from the cavalry, and put into a Croat regiment under orders for Venice. Next year will probably see me enrolled in the police; and so it will go on, I suppose, till some fine morning I shall find myself driving a two-horse yellow diligence in the wilds of Carinthia, and blowing a horn to let the villagers know that the imperial and royal mail is approaching.

After a little more conversation we separated, but only to meet again, that same evening, on the Piazza San Marco, whither I had wandered to listen to the band after dinner, and where I found Von Rosenau seated with a number of his brother officers in front of the principal café. These gentlemen, to whom I was presently introduced, were unanimous in complaining of their present quarters. Venice, they said, might be all very well for artists and travellers; but viewed as a garrison, it was the dullest of places. There were no amusements, there was no sport, and just now no society; for the Italians were in one of their periodical fits of sulks, and would not speak to, or look at, a German if they could possibly avoid it. "They will not even show themselves when our band is playing," said one of the officers, pointing towards the well-nigh empty piazza. "As for the ladies, it is reported that, if one of them is seen speaking to an Austrian, she is either assassinated or sent off to spend the rest of her days in a convent. At all events, it is certain that we have none of us any successes to boast off, except Von Rosenau, who has an affair, they say, only he is pleased to be very mysterious about it."

"Where does she live, Von Rosenau?" asked another. "Is she rich? Is she noble? Has she a husband, who will stab you both? or only a mother, who will send her to a nunnery, and let you go free? You might gratify our curiosity a little. It would do you no harm, and it would give us something to talk about."

"Bah! he will tell you nothing," cried a third. "He is afraid. He knows that there are half a dozen of us who could cut him out in an hour."

"Von Rosenau," said a young ensign solemnly, "you would do better to make a clean breast of it. Concealment is useless. Janovicz saw you with her in Santa Maria della Salute the other day, and could have followed her home quite easily if he had been so inclined."

"They were seen together on the Lido too. People who want to keep their secrets ought not to be so imprudent."

"A good comrade ought to have no secrets from the regiment."

"Come, Von Rosenau, we will promise not to speak to her without your permission if you will tell us how you managed to make her acquaintance."

The subject of all these attacks received them with the most perfect composure, continuing to smoke his cigar and gaze out seawards, without so much as turning his head towards his questioners, to whom he vouchsafed no reply whatever. Probably, as an ex-hussar and a sprig of nobility, he may have held his head a little above those of his present brother officers, and preferred disregarding their familiarity to resenting it as he might have done if it had come from men whom he considered on a footing of equality with himself. Such, at least was my impression; and it was confirmed by the friendly advances which he made towards me, from that day forth, and by the persistency with which he sought my society. I thought he seemed to wish for some companion whose ideas had not been developed exclusively in barrack atmosphere; and I, on my side, was not unwilling to listen to the chatter of a lively, good-natured young fellow, at intervals, during my long idle days.

It was at the end of a week, I think, or thereabouts, that he honored me with his full confidence. We had been out sea-fishing in a small open boat which he had purchased, and which he managed without assistance — that is to say, that we had provided ourselves with what was requisite for the pursuit of that engrossing sport, and that the young count had gone through the form of dropping his line over the side and pulling it up, baitless and fishless, from time to time, while I had dispensed with even this shallow pretence of employment, and had stretched myself out full length upon the cushions which I had thoughtfully brought with me, inhaling the salt-laden breeze, and luxuriating in perfect inaction, till such time as it had become necessary for us to think of returning homewards. My companion had been sighing portentously every now and again all through the afternoon, and had repeatedly given vent to a sound as though he had been about to say something, and had as often checked himself, and fallen back into silence. So that I was in a great measure prepared for the disclosure that fell from him at length as we slipped before the wind, across the broad lagoon, towards the haze and blaze of sunset which was glorifying the old city of the doges.

"Do you know," said he suddenly, "that I am desperately in love?" I said I had conjectured as much; and he seemed a good deal surprised at my powers of divination.

"Yes," he resumed, "I am in love; and with an Italian lady too, unfortunately. Her name is Bianca — the Signorina Bianca Marinelli — and she is the most divinely beautiful creature the sun ever shone upon."

"That," said I, "is of course."

"It is the truth; and when you have seen her, you will acknowledge that I do not exaggerate. I have known her nearly two months now. I became acquainted with her accidentally — she dropped her handkerchief in a shop, and I took it to her, and so we got to be upon speaking terms, and — and — but I need not give you the whole history. We have discovered that we are all the world to one another; we have sworn to remain faithful to each other all our lives long; and we renew the oath whenever we meet. But that, unhappily, is very seldom! for her father, the Marchese Marinelli, scarcely ever lets her out of his sight; and he is a sour, narrow-minded old fellow, as proud as he is poor, an intense hater of all Austrians, and, if he were to discover our attachment, I shudder to think of what the consequences might be."

"And your own father — the stern old general of whom you told me — what would he say to it all?"

"Oh! he, of course, would not hear of such a marriage for a moment. He detests and despises the Venetians as cordially as the marchese abhors the Tedeschi; and, as I am entirely dependent upon him, I should not dream of saying a word to him about the matter until I was married, and nothing could be done to separate me from Bianca."

"So that, upon the whole, you appear to stand a very fair chance of starvation, if everything turns out according to your wishes. And pray in what way do you imagine that I can assist you towards this desirable end? For I take it for granted that you have some reason for letting me into your secret."

Von Rosenau laughed good-humoredly.

"You form conclusions quickly, he said. "Well, I will confess to you that I have thought lately that you might be of great service to me without inconveniencing yourself much. The other day, when you did me the honor to introduce me to your sister, I was very nearly telling her all. She has such a kind countenance; and I felt sure that she would not refuse to let my poor Bianca visit her sometimes. The old marchese, you see, would have no objection to leaving his daughter for hours under the care of an English lady; and I thought that perhaps when Miss Jenkinson went out to work at her painting — I might come in."

"Fortunate indeed is it for you," I said, "that your confidence in the kind countenance of my sister Anne did not carry you quite to the point of divulging this precious scheme to her. I, who know her pretty well, can tell you exactly the course she would have pursued if you had. Without one moment's hesitation, she would have found out the address of the young lady's father, hurried off thither, and told him all about it. Anne is a thoroughly good creature; but she has little sympathy with lovemaking, still less with surreptitious lovemaking, and she would as soon think of accepting the part you are so good as to assign to her as of forging a cheque."

He sighed, and said he supposed, then, that they must continue to meet as they had been in the habit of doing; but that it was rather unsatisfactory.

"It says something for your ingenuity, that you contrive to meet at all," I remarked.

"Well, yes, there are considerable difficulties, because the old man's movements are so uncertain; and there is some risk too, for, as you heard the other day, we have been seen together. Moreover I have been obliged to tell everything to my servant Johann, who waylays the marchese's housekeeper at market in the mornings, and finds out from her when and where I can have an opportunity of meeting Bianca. I would rather not have trusted him; but I could think of no other plan."

"At any rate, I should have thought you might have selected some more retired rendezvous than the most frequented church in Venice."

He shrugged his shoulders. "I wish you would suggest one within reach," he said. "There are no retired places in this accursed town. But, in fact, we see one another very seldom. Often for days together the only way in which I can get a glimpse of her is by loitering about in my boat in front of her father's house, and watching till she shows herself at the window. We are in her neighborhood now, and it is close upon the hour at which I can generally calculate upon her appearing. Would you mind my making a short détour that way before I set you down at your hotel?"

We had entered the Grand Canal while Von Rosenau had been relating his lovetale, and, some minutes before, he had lowered his sail, and taken to the oars. He now slewed the boat's head round abruptly, and we shot into a dark and narrow water-way, and so, after sundry twistings and turnings, arrived before a grim, timeworn structure, so hemmed in by the surrounding buildings that it seemed as if no ray of sunshine could ever penetrate within its walls.

"That is the Palazzo Marinelli," said my companion. "The greater part of it is let to different tenants. The family has long been much too poor to inhabit the whole of it, and now the old man only reserves himself four rooms on the third floor. Those are the windows, in the far corner; and there — no! — yes! there is Bianca."

I brought my eyeglass to bear upon the point indicated just in time to catch sight of a female head, which was thrust out through the open window for an instant, and then withdrawn with great celerity.

"Ah!" sighed the count, "it is you who have driven her away. I ought to have remembered that she would be frightened at seeing a stranger. And now she will not show herself again, I fear. Come; I will take you home. Confess now — is she not more beautiful than you expected?"

"My dear sir, I had hardly time to see whether she was a man or a woman; but I am quite willing to take your word for it that there never was anybody like her."

"If you would like to wait a little longer — half an hour or so — she might put her head out again," said the young man wistfully.

"Thank you very much; but my sister will be wondering why I do not come to take her down to the table d'hôte. And besides, as I am not in love myself, I may perhaps be excused for saying that I want my dinner."

"As you please," answered the count, looking the least bit in the world affronted; and so he pulled back in silence to the steps to the hotel, where we parted.

I don't know whether Von Rosenau felt aggrieved by my rather unsympathetic reception of his confidence, or whether he thought it useless to discuss his projects further with one who could not or would not assist him in carrying them out; but although we continued to meet daily, as before, he did not recur to the interesting subject, and it was not for me to take the initiative in doing so. Curiosity, I confess, led me to direct my gondolier more than once to the narrow canal over which the Palazzo Marinelli towered; and on each occasion I was rewarded by descrying, from the depths of the miniature mourning-coach which concealed me, the faithful count, seated in his boat and waiting in patient faith, like another Ritter Toggenburg, with his eyes fixed upon the corner window; but of the lady I could see no sign. I was rather disappointed at first, as day after day went by and my young friend showed no disposition to break the silence in which he had chosen to wrap himself; for I had nothing to do in Venice, and I thought it would have been rather amusing to watch the progress of this incipient romance. By degrees, however, I ceased to trouble myself about it; and at the end of a fortnight I had other things to think of, in the shape of plans for the summer, my sister Anne having by that time satisfied herself that, all things considered, Titian's "Assumption" was a little too much for her.

It was Captain Janovicz who informed me casually one evening that Von Rosenau was going away in a few days on leave, and that he would probably be absent for a considerable time.

"For my own part," remarked my informant, "I shall be surprised if we see him back in the regiment at all. He was only sent to us as a sort of punishment for having been a naughty boy, and I suppose now he will be forgiven, and restored to the hussars.

"So much for undying love," thinks I with a cynical chuckle. "If there is any gratitude in man, that young fellow ought to be showering blessings on me for having refused to hold the noose for him to thrust his head into."

Alas! I knew not of what I was speaking. I had not yet heard the last of Herr von Rosenau's entanglement, nor was I destined to escape from playing my part in it. The very next morning, after breakfast, as I was poring over a map of Switzerland, "Murray" on my right hand and "Bradshaw" on my left, his card was brought to me, together with an urgent request that I would see him immediately and alone; and before I had had time to send a reply, he came clattering into the room, trailing his sabre behind him, and dropped into the first armchair with a despairing self-abandonment which shook the house to its foundations.

"Mr. Jenkinson," said he, "I am a ruined man!"

I answered rather drily that I was very sorry to hear it. If I must confess the truth, I thought he had come to borrow money of me.

"A most cruel calamity has befallen me," he went on; "and unless you will consent to help me out of it ——"

"I am sure I shall be delighted to do anything in my power," I interrupted apprehensively; "but I am afraid ——"

"You cannot refuse me till you have heard what I have to say. I am aware that I have no claim whatever upon your kindness; but you are the only man in the world who can save me, and, whereas the happiness of my whole life is at stake, the utmost you can have to put up with will be a little inconvenience. Now I will explain myself in as few words as possible, because I have only a minute to spare. In fact, I ought to be out on the ramparts at this moment. You have not forgotten what I told you about myself and the Signorina Marinelli, and how we had agreed to seize the first opportunity that offered to be privately married, and to escape over the mountains to my father's house, and throw ourselves upon his mercy?"

"I don't remember your having mentioned any such plan."

"No matter — so it was. Well, everything seemed to have fallen out most fortunately for us. I found out some time ago that the marchese would be going over to Padua this evening, on business, and would be absent at least one whole day, and I immediately applied for my leave to begin to-morrow. This I obtained at once through my father, who now expects me to be with him in a few days, and little knows that I shall not come alone. Johann and the marchese's housekeeper arranged the rest between them. I was to meet my dear Bianca early in the morning on the Lido; thence we were to go by boat to Mestre, where a carriage was to be in waiting for us; and the same evening we were to be married by a priest, to whom I have given due notice, at a place called Longarone. And so we should have gone on, across the Ampezzo Pass homewards. Now, would you believe that all has been defeated by a mere freak on the part of my colonel? Only this morning, after it was much too late to make any alteration in our plans, he told me that he should require me to be on duty all to-day and to-morrow, and that my leave could not begin until the next day. Is it not maddening? And the worst of it is, that I have no means of letting Bianca know of this, for I dare not send a message to the palazzo, and there is no chance of my seeing her myself; and of course she will go to the Lido to-morrow morning, and will find no one there. Now, my dear Mr. Jenkinson — my good, kind friend — do you begin to see what I want you to do for me?"

"Not in the very least."

"No? But it is evident enough. Now listen. You meet Bianca to-morrow morning, you explain to her what has happened, you take her in the boat, which will be waiting for you, to Mestre; you proceed in the travelling-carriage, which will also be waiting for you, to Longarone; you see the priest, and appoint with him for the following evening; and the next day I arrive, and you return to Venice. Is that clear?"

The volubility with which this programme was enunciated so took away my breath that I scarcely realized its audacity.

"You will not refuse; I am sure you will not," said the count, rising and hooking up his sword, as if about to depart.

"Stop, stop!" I exclaimed. "You don't consider what you are asking. I can't elope with young women in this casual sort of way. I have a character — and a sister. How am I to explain all this to my sister, I should like to know?"

"Oh! make any excuse you can think of to her. Now, Mr. Jenkinson, you know there cannot be any real difficulty in that. You consent, then? A thousand, thousand thanks! I will send you a few more instructions by letter this evening. I really must not stay any longer now. Good-bye."

"Stop! Why can't your servant Johann do all this instead of me?"

"Because he is on duty like myself. Good-bye."

"Stop! Why can't you postpone your flight for a day? I don't so much mind meeting the young lady and telling her all about it."

"Quite out of the question, my dear sir. It is perfectly possible that the marchese may return from Padua to-morrow night, and what should we do then? No, no; there is no help for it. Good-bye."

"Stop! Hi! Come back!"

But it was too late. My impetuous visitor was down the staircase and away before I had descended a single flight in pursuit, and all I could do was to return to my room and register a vow within my own heart that I would have nothing to do with this preposterous scheme.

Looking back upon what followed across the interval of fifteen years, I find that I can really give no satisfactory reason for my having failed to adhere to this wise resolution. I had no particular feeling of friendship for Von Rosenau; I did not care two straws about the Signorina Bianca, whom I had never seen; and certainly I am not, nor ever was, the sort of person who loves romantic adventures for their own sake. Perhaps it was good-nature, perhaps it was only an indolent shrinking from disobliging anybody, that influenced me — it does not much matter now. Whatever the cause of my yielding may have been, I did yield. I prefer to pass over in silence the doubts and hesitations which beset me for the remainder of the day; the arrival, towards evening, of the piteous note from Von Rosenau which finally overcame my weak resistance to his will; and the series of circumstantial false statements (I blush when I think of them) by means of which I accounted to my sister for my proposed sudden departure.

Suffice it to say that, very early on the following morning, there might have been seen, pacing up and down the shore on the seaward side of the Lido, and peering anxiously about him through an eyeglass, as if in search of somebody or something, the figure of a tall, spare Englishman, clad in a complete suit of shepherd's tartan, with a wide-awake on his head, a leather bag slung by a strap across his shoulder, and a light coat over his arm. Myself, in point of fact, in the travelling-costume of the epoch.

I was kept waiting a long time — longer than I liked; for, as may be supposed, I was most anxious to be well away from Venice before the rest of the world was up and about; but at length there appeared, round the corner of a long, white wall which skirted the beach, a little lady, thickly veiled, who, on catching sight of me, whisked round, and incontinently vanished. This was so evidently the fair Bianca that I followed her without hesitation, and almost ran into her arms as I swung round the angle of the wall behind which she had retreated. She gave a great start, stared at me, for an instant, like a startled fawn, and then took to her heels and fled. It was rather ridiculous; but there was nothing for me to do but to give chase. My legs are long, and I had soon headed her round.

"I presume that I have the honor of addressing the Signorina Marinelli?" I panted, in French, as I faced her, hat in hand.

She answered me by a piercing shriek which left no room for doubt as to her identity.

"For the love of Heaven, don't do that!" I entreated, in an agony. "You will alarm the whole neighborhood, and ruin us both. Believe me, I am only here as your friend, and very much against my own wishes. I have come on the part of Count Albrecht von Rosenau, who is unable to come himself, because ——"

Here she opened her mouth with so manifest an intention of raising another resounding screech that I became desperate, and seized her by the wrists in my anxiety. "Sgridi ancora una volta," says I, in the purest lingua Toscana, "e la lascerò qui — to get out of this mess as best you can — cosi sicuro che il mio nome è Jenkinsono!"

To my great relief, she began to laugh. Immediately afterwards, however, she sat down on the shingle, and began to cry. It was too vexatious: what on earth was I to do?

"Do you understand English?" I asked despairingly.

She shook her head, but sobbed out that she spoke French; so I proceeded to address her in that language.

"Signorina, if you do not get up, and control your emotion, I will not be answerable for the consequences. We are surrounded by dangers of the most — compromising description; and every moment of delay must add to them. I know that the officers often come out here to bathe in the morning — so do many of the English people from Danielli's. If we are discovered together there will be such a scandal as never was, and you will most assuredly not become Countess von Rosenau. Think of that, and it will brace your nerves. What you have to do is to come directly with me to the boat which is all ready to take us to Mestre. Allow me to carry your hand-bag."

Not a bit of it! The signorina refused to stir.

"What is it? Where is Alberto? What has happened?" she cried. "You have told me nothing."

"Well then, I will explain," I answered impatiently. And I explained accordingly.

But, dear me, what a fuss she did make over it all! One would have supposed, to hear her, that I had planned this unfortunate complication for my own pleasure, and that I ought to have been playing the part of a suppliant instead of that of a sorely-tried benefactor. First she was so kind as to set me down as an impostor, and was only convinced of my honesty when I showed her a letter in the beloved Alberto's handwriting. Then she declared that she could not possibly go off with a total stranger. Then she discovered that, upon further consideration, she could not abandon poor dear papa in his old age. And so forth, and so forth, with a running accompaniment of tears and sobs. Of course she consented at last to enter the boat; but I was so exasperated by her silly behavior that I would not speak to her, and had really scarcely noticed whether she was pretty or plain till we were more than half way to Mestre. But when we had hoisted our sail, and were running before a fine fresh breeze towards the land, and our four men had shipped their oars and were chattering and laughing under their breath in the bows, and the first perils of our enterprise seemed to have been safely surmounted, my equanimity began to return to me, and I stole a glance at the partner of my flight, who had lifted her veil, and showed a pretty, round, childish face, with a clear, brown complexion, and a pair of the most splendid dark eyes it has ever been my good fortune to behold. There were no tears in them now; but a certain half-frightened, half-mischievous light instead, as if she rather enjoyed the adventure, in spite of its inauspicious opening. A very little encouragement induced her to enter into conversation, and ere long she was prattling away as unrestrainedly as if we had been friends all our lives. She asked me a great many questions. What was I doing in Venice? Had I known Alberto long? Was I very fond of him? Did I think that the old Count von Rosenau would be very angry when he heard of his son's marriage? I answered her as best I could, feeling very sorry for the poor little soul, who evidently did not in the least realize the serious nature of the step which she was about to take; and she grew more and more communicative. In the course of a quarter of an hour I had been put in possession of all the chief incidents of her uneventful life.

I had heard how she had lost her mother when she was still an infant; how she had been educated partly by two maiden aunts, partly in a convent at Verona; how she had latterly led a life of almost complete seclusion in the old Venetian palace; how she had first met Alberto; and how, after many doubts and misgivings, she had finally been prevailed upon to sacrifice all for his sake, and to leave her father, who, stern, severe, and suspicious, though he had always been generous to her, had tried to give her such small pleasures as his means and habits would permit. She had a likeness of him with her, she said — perhaps I might like to see it. She dived into her travelling-bag, as she spoke, and produced from thence a full-length photograph of a tall, well-built gentleman of sixty or thereabouts, whose grey hair, black moustache, and intent, frowning gaze made up an ensemble more striking than attractive.

"Is he not handsome — poor papa?" she asked.

I said the marchese was certainly a very fine-looking man, and inwardly thanked my stars that he was safely at Padua; for looking at the breadth of his chest, the length of his arm, and the somewhat forbidding cast of his features, I could not help perceiving that poor papa was precisely one of those persons with whom a prudent man prefers to keep friends than to quarrel.

And so, by the time that we reached Mestre, we had become quite friendly and intimate, and had half forgetten, I think, the absurd relation in which we stood towards one another. We had rather an awkward moment when we left the boat and entered our travelling-carriage; for I need scarcely say that both the boatmen and the grinning vetturino took me for the bridegroom, whose place I temporarily occupied, and they were pleased to be facetious in a manner which was very embarrassing to me, but which I could not very well check. Moreover, I felt compelled so far to sustain my assumed character as to be specially generous in the matter of a buona mano to those four jolly watermen, and, for the first few miles of our drive, I could not help remembering this circumstance with some regret, and wondering whether it would occur to Von Rosenau to reimburse me.

Probably our coachman thought that, having a runaway couple to drive, he ought to make some pretence at least of fearing pursuit; for he set off at such a furious pace that our four half-starved horses were soon beat, and we had to perform the remainder of the long, hot, dusty journey at a foot's pace. I have forgotten how we made the time pass. I think we slept a good deal. I know we were both very tired and a trifle cross, when in the evening we reached Longarone, a small, poverty-stricken village, on the verge of that dolomite region which, in these latter days, has become so frequented by summer tourists.

Tourists usually leave in their wake some of the advantages as well as the drawbacks of civilization; and probably there is now a respectable hotel at Longarone. I suppose, therefore, that I may say, without risk of laying myself open to an action for slander, that a more filthy den than the osteria before which my charge and I alighted no imagination, however disordered, could conceive. It was a vast, dismal building which had doubtless been the palace of some rich citizen of the republic in days of yore, but which had now fallen into a dishonored old age. Its windows and outside shutters were tightly closed, and had been so, apparently, from time immemorial; a vile smell of rancid oil and garlic pervaded it in every part; the cornices of its huge, bare rooms were festooned with blackened cobwebs; and the dust and dirt of ages had been suffered to accumulate upon the stone floors of its corridors. The signorina tucked up her petticoats as she picked her way along the passages to her bedroom, while I remained behind to order dinner of the sulky, black-browed padrona, to whom I had already had to explain that my companion and I were not man and wife, and who, I fear, had consequently conceived no very high opinion of us. Happily the priest had already been warned by telegram that his service would not be required until the morrow; so I was spared the nuisance of an interview with him.

After a time we sat down to our tête-à-tête dinner. Such a dinner! Even after the lapse of all these years I am unable to think of it without a shudder. Half famished though we were, we could not do much more than look at the greater part of the dishes which were set before us; and the climax was reached when we were served with an astonishing compote, made up, so far as I was able to judge, of equal proportions of preserved plums and mustard, to which vinegar and sugar had been superadded. Both the signorina and I partook of this horrible mixture, for it really looked as if it might be rather nice; and when, after the first mouthful, each of us looked up, and saw the other's face of agony and alarm, we burst into a simultaneous peal of laughter. Up to that moment we had been very solemn and depressed; but the laugh did us good, and sent us to bed in somewhat better spirits; and the malignant compote at least did us the service of effectually banishing our appetite.

I forbear to enlarge upon the horrors of the night. Mosquitoes, and other insects, which, for some reason or other, we English seldom mention, save under a modest pseudonym, worked their wicked will upon me till daybreak set me free; and I presume that the fair Bianca was no better off; for when the breakfast-hour arrived, I received a message from her to the effect that she was unable to leave her room.

I was sitting over my dreary little repast, wondering how I should get through the day, and speculating upon the possibility of my release before nightfall, and I had just concluded that I must make up my mind to face another night with the mosquitoes and their hardy allies, when, to my great joy, a slatternly serving-maid came lolloping into the room, and announced that a gentleman styling himself "il Conte di Rosenau" had arrived and demanded to see me instantly. Here was a piece of unlooked-for good fortune! I jumped up, and flew to the door to receive my friend, whose footsteps I already heard on the threshold.

"My dear, good soul!" I cried, "this is too delightful! How did you manage —"

The remainder of my sentence died away upon my lips; for alas! it was not the missing Alberto whom I had nearly embraced, but a stout, red-faced, white-moustached gentleman, who was in a violent passion, judging by the terrific salute of Teutonic expletives with which he greeted my advance. Then he, too, desisted as suddenly as I had done, and we both fell back a few paces, and stared at one another blankly. The new comer was the first to recover himself.

"This is some accursed mistake," said he, in German.

"Evidently," said I.

"But they told me that you and an Italian young lady were the only strangers in the house."

"Well, sir," I said, "I can't help it if we are. The house is not of a kind likely to attract strangers; and I assure you that, if I could consult my own wishes, the number of the guests would soon be reduced by one."

He appeared to be a very choleric old person. "Sir," said he, "you seem disposed to carry things off with a high hand; but I suspect that you know more than you choose to reveal. Be so good as to tell me the name of the lady who is staying here."

"I think you are forgetting yourself," I answered, with dignity. "I must decline to gratify your curiosity."

He stuck his arms akimbo, and planted himself directly in front of me, frowning ominously. "Let us waste no more words," he said. "If I have made a mistake, I shall be ready to offer you a full apology. If not — but that is nothing to the purpose. I am Lieutenant-General Graf von Rosenau, at your service, and I have reason to believe that my son, Graf Albrecht von Rosenau, a lieutenant in his Imperial and Royal Majesty's 99th Croat Regiment, has made a runaway match with a certain Signorina Bianca Marinelli of Venice. Are you prepared to give me your word of honor as a gentleman and an Englishman that you are not privy to this affair?"

At these terrible words I felt my blood run cold. I may have lost my presence of mind; but I don't know how I could have got out of the dilemma even if I had preserved it.

"Your son has not yet arrived," I stammered.

He pounced upon me like a cat upon a mouse, and gripped both my arms above the elbow. "Is he married?" he hissed, with his red nose a couple of inches from mine.

"No," I answered, "he is not. Perhaps I had better say at once that if you use personal violence I shall defend myself in spite of your age."

Upon this he was kind enough to relax his hold.

"And pray, sir," he resumed, in a somewhat more temperate tone, after a short period of reflection, "what have you to do with all this?"

"I am not bound to answer your questions, Herr Graf," I replied; "but, as things have turned out, I have no special objection to doing so. Out of pure good-nature to your son, who was detained by duty in Venice at the last moment, I consented to bring the Signorina Marinelli here yesterday, and to await his arrival, which I am now expecting."

"So you ran away with the girl, instead of Albrecht, did you? Ho, ho, ho!"

I had seldom heard a more grating or disagreeable laugh.

"I did nothing of the sort," I answered tartly. "I simply undertook to see her safely through the first stage of her journey."

"And you will have the pleasure of seeing her back, I imagine; for as for my rascal of a boy, I mean to take him off home with me as soon as he arrives; and I can assure you that I have no intention of providing myself with a daughter-in-law in the course of the day."

I began to feel not a little alarmed. "You cannot have the brutality to leave me here with a young woman whom I am scarcely so much as acquainted with on my hands!" I ejaculated, half involuntarily. "What in the world should I do?"

The old gentleman gave vent to a malevolent chuckle. "Upon my word, sir," said he, "I can only see one course open to you as a man of honor. You must marry her yourself."

At this I fairly lost all patience, and gave the Graf my opinion of his conduct in terms the plainness of which left nothing to be desired. I included him, his son, and the entire German people in one sweeping anathema. No Englishman, I said, would have been capable of either insulting an innocent lady, or of so basely leaving in the lurch one whose only fault had been a too great readiness to sacrifice his own convenience to the interests of others. My indignation lent me a flow of words such as I should never have been able to command in calmer moments; and I dare say I should have continued in the same strain for an indefinite time, had I not been summarily cut short by the entrance of a third person.

There was no occasion for this last intruder to announce himself, in a voice of thunder, as the Marchese Marinelli. I had at once recognized the original of the signorina's photograph, and I perceived that I was now in about as uncomfortable a position as my bitterest enemy could have desired for me. The German old gentleman had been very angry at the outset; but his wrath, as compared with that of the Italian, was as a breeze to a hurricane. The marchese was literally quivering from head to foot with concentrated fury. His face was deadly white, his strongly-marked features twitched convulsively, his eyes blazed like those of a wild animal. Having stated his identity in the manner already referred to, he made two strides towards the table by which I was seated, and stood glaring at me as though he would have sprung at my throat. I thought it might avert consequences which we should both afterwards deplore if I were to place the table between us; and I did so without loss of time. From the other side of that barrier I adjured my visitor to keep cool, pledging him my word, in the same breath, that there was no harm done as yet.

"No harm!" he repeated in a strident shout that echoed through the bare room. "Dog! Villain! You ensnare my daughter's affections — you entice her away from her father's house — you cover my family with eternal disgrace — and then you dare to tell me there is no harm done! Wait a little, and you shall see that there will be harm enough for you. Marry her you must, since you have ruined her; but you shall die for it the next day! It is I — I, Ludovico Marinelli — who swear it!"

I am aware that I do but scant justice to the marchese's inimitable style. The above sentences must be imagined as hurled forth in a series of yells, with a pant between each of them. As a melodramatic actor, this terrific Marinelli would, I am sure, have risen to the first rank in his profession.

"Signore," I said, "you are under a misapprehension. I have ensnared nobody's affections, and I am entirely guiltless of all the crimes which you are pleased to attribute to me."

"What? Are you not, then, the hound who bears the vile and dishonored name of Von Rosenau?"

"I am not. I bear the less distinguished, but, I hope, equally respectable patronymic of Jenkinson."

But my modest disclaimer passed unheeded, for now another combatant had thrown himself into the fray.

"Vile and dishonored name! No one shall permit himself such language in my presence. I am Lieutenant-General Graf von Rosenau, sir, and you shall answer to me for your words."

The Herr Graf's knowledge of Italian was somewhat limited; but, such as it was, it had enabled him to catch the sense of the stigma cast upon his family, and now he was upon his feet, red and gobbling, like a turkey-cock, and prepared to do battle with a hundred irate Venetians if need were.

The marchese stared at him in blank amazement. "You!" he ejaculated — "you Von Rosenau! It is incredible — preposterous. Why, you are old enough to be her grandfather."

"Not old enough to be in my dotage — as I should be, if I permitted my son to marry a beggarly Italian — nor too old to punish impertinence as it deserves," retorted the Graf.

"Your son? You are the father then? It is all the same to me. I will fight you both. But the marriage shall take place first."

"It shall not."

"It shall."

"Insolent slave of an Italian, I will make you eat your words!"

"Triple brute of a German, I spit upon you!"

"Silence, sir!"

"Silence yourself!"

During this animated dialogue I sat apart, softly rubbing my hands. What a happy dispensation it would be, I could not help thinking, if these two old madmen were to exterminate one another, like the Kilkenny cats! Anyhow their attention was effectually diverted from my humble person, and that was something to be thankful for.

Never before had I been privileged to listen to so rich a vocabulary of vituperation. Each disputant had expressed himself, after the first few words, in his own language, and between them they were now making hubbub enough to bring the old house down about their ears. Up came the padrona to see the fun; up came her fat husband, in his shirt-sleeves and slippers; and her long-legged sons, and her touzle-headed daughters, and the maid-servant, and the cook, and the ostler — the whole establishment, in fact, collected at the open folding-doors, and watched with delight the progress of this battle of words. Last of all, a poor little trembling figure, with pale face and eyes big with fright, crept in, and stood, hand on heart, a little in advance of the group. I slipped to her side, and offered her a chair, but she neither answered me nor noticed my presence. She was staring at her father as a bird stares at a snake, and seemed unable to realize anything except the terrible fact that he had followed and found her.

Presently the old man wheeled round, and became aware of his daughter.

"Unhappy girl!" he exclaimed, "what is this that you have done?"

I greatly fear that the marchese's paternal corrections must have sometimes taken a more practical shape than mere verbal upbraidings; for poor Bianca shrank back, throwing up one arm, as if to shield her face, and, with a wild cry of "Alberto! Come to me!" fell into the arms of that tardy lover, who at that appropriate moment had made his appearance, unobserved, upon the scene.

The polyglot disturbance that ensued baffles all description. Indeed, I should be puzzled to say exactly what took place, or after how many commands, defiances, threats, protestations, insults, and explanations, a semblance of peace was finally restored. I only know that, at the expiration of a certain time, three of us were sitting by the open window, in a softened and subdued frame of mind, considerately turning our backs upon the other two, who were bidding one another farewell at the farther end of the room.

It was the faithless Johann, as I gathered, who was responsible for this catastrophe. His heart, it appeared, had failed him when he had discovered that nothing less than a bonâ-fide marriage was to be the outcome of the meetings he had shown so much skill in contriving, and, full of penitence and alarm, he had written to his old master, divulging the whole project. It so happened that a recent storm in the mountains had interrupted telegraphic communication, for the time, between Austria and Venice, and the only course that had seemed open to Herr von Rosenau was to start post-haste for the latter place, where, indeed, he would have arrived a day too late, had not Albrecht's colonel seen fit to postpone his leave. In this latter circumstance also the hand of Johann seemed discernible. As for the marchese, I suppose he must have returned rather sooner than had been expected from Padua, and finding his daughter gone, must have extorted the truth from his housekeeper. He did not volunteer any explanation of his presence, nor were any of us bold enough to question him.

As I have said before, I have no very clear recollection of how an understanding was arrived at, and bloodshed averted and the padrona and her satellites hustled down-stairs again. Perhaps I may have had some share in the work of pacification. Be that as it may, when once the exasperated parents had discovered that they both really wanted the same thing — namely, to recover possession of their respective offspring, to go home, and never meet one another again — a species of truce was soon agreed upon between them for the purpose of separating the two lovers, who all this time were locked in one another's arms, in the prettiest attitude in the world, vowing loudly that nothing should ever part them.

How often since the world began have such vows been made and broken — broken, not willingly but of necessity — broken and mourned over, and, in due course of time, forgotten! I looked at the Marchesa di San Silvestro the other night, as she sailed up the room in her lace and diamonds, with her fat little husband toddling after her, and wondered whether, in these days of her magnificence, she ever gave a thought to her lost Alberto — Alberto, who has been married himself this many a long day, and has succeeded to his father's estates, and has a numerous family, I am told. At all events, she was unhappy enough over parting with him at the time. The two old gentlemen who, as holders of the purse-strings, knew that they were completely masters of the situation, and could afford to be generous, showed some kindliness of feeling at the last. They allowed the poor lovers an uninterrupted half hour in which to bid one another adieu forever, and abstained from any needless harshness in making their decision known. When the time was up, two travelling-carriages were seen waiting at the door. Count von Rosenau pushed his son before him into the first; the marchese assisted the half-fainting Bianca into the second; the vetturini cracked their whips, and presently both vehicles were rolling away, the one towards the north, the other towards the south. I suppose the young people had been promising to remain faithful to one another until some happier future time should permit of their union, for at the last moment Albrecht thrust his head out of the carriage window, and, waiving his hand, cried, "A rivederci!" I don't know whether they ever met again.

The whole scene, I confess, had affected me a good deal, in spite of some of the absurdities by which it had been marked; and it was not until I had been alone for some time, and silence had once more fallen upon the Longarone osteria, that I awoke to the fact that it was my carriage which the Marchese Marinelli had calmly appropriated to his own use, and that there was no visible means of my getting back to Venice that day. Great was my anger and great my dismay when the ostler announced this news to me, with a broad grin, in reply to my order to put the horses to without delay.

"But the marchese himself — how did he get here?" I inquired.

"Oh, he came by the diligence."

"And the count — the young gentleman?"

"On horseback, signore; but you cannot have his horse. The poor beast is half dead as it is."

"Then will you tell me how I am to escape from your infernal town? For nothing shall induce me to pass another night here."

"Eh! there is the diligence which goes through at two o'clock in the morning!"

There was no help for it. I sat up for that diligence; and returned by it to Mestre, seated between a Capuchin monk and a peasant farmer whose whole system appeared to be saturated with garlic. I could scarcely have fared worse in my bed at Longarone.

And so that was my reward for an act of disinterested kindness. It is only experience that can teach a man to appreciate the ingrained thanklessness of the human race. I was obliged to make a clean breast of it to my sister; who of course did not keep the secret long, and for some time afterwards I had to submit to a good deal of mild chaff upon the subject from my friends. But it is an old story now, and two of the actors in it are dead, and of the remaining three I dare say I am the only one who cares to recall it. Even to me it is a somewhat painful reminiscence.

A RED-CROSS RIDE THROUGH SNOW AND DEATH.

I.

WHEN I first heard of the fall of Plevna I was at Belgrade, joining in the "mazy dance" at a ball given in the Staro Zdanje by several of the corps diplomatique to their colleagues and their wives, the Servian ministers and their wives, the élite of Belgrade and such "distinguished foreigners" as happened to find themselves in the capital of the plucky little principality. I had just returned from the interior, where I had been "roughing it" (rebuilding burnt villages for a munificent anonymous friend, who gave me a most munificent sum of money), and so the ball seemed to me perhaps even more brilliant than it really was. At all events, the European music, the charming mixture of European and Eastern costumes, military and civil, and of Eastern and Western dances, with the fair of all nationalities, was a pleasant change to me from the discomfort of life in a wild country recently laid waste by fire and sword, and only just beginning to wipe out the "trail of the Turk."

I was enjoying a pleasant chat with the amiable and accomplished Countess B——, with whom I had just danced in the Servian national dance, the kolo, when a grey-bearded diplomatist exclaimed excitedly, half at me half to the countess, "Don't believe it! Can't be true! Have you heard the news?" "No, what?" we exclaimed in chorus, or rather duet. "The Russians have got into Plevna!" It is no part of my purpose to tell the different views and feelings expressed by the different diplomatic agents on the great news which the telegraph had brought us. Suffice it to say that although it did not happen to be truth, it looked like it, and everybody remarked at once, what most had before overlooked, that the Servian prime minister and the Russian diplomatic agent were absent. Prince Wrede, the Austrian consul-general, put two and two together and showed the connection of the two things to the satisfaction of himself and everybody else. However, Plevna was not obliging, and did not fall for several days.

At that time Dr. Humphrey Sandwith was acting as honorary administrator, in Roumania and Bulgaria, of the Russian sick and wounded fund, and having "knocked himself up" with his work, he, with the approval of the committee, invited me to take his place. We had worked together before in Servia; but in the spring of 1877, when we were in the Timok valley, he was struck down by a fever which brought him to "death's door" and very nearly showed him the inside of it; and from the effects of which he still suffered at intervals. Under the circumstances I could not refuse my old friend's invitation, and accordingly, having distributed my remaining stores of bricks, doors, windows, boards, beams, and such like, I set out for Bucharest the day Servia declared her last war with the Turks, in company with General Cartagi, uncle to Prince Milan. We took the steamer as far as Orsova; there we chartered a carriage and four, and drove along the left bank of the Danube as far as Turn Severin. As we passed the then Turkish island Adah Kaleh, which is within gunshot of Servia, Austria, and Roumania, we conceived a brilliant scheme for bombarding it, with small mountain guns, from the heights of the hills which form the Servian bank; but, as the scheme was never carried out, there is no use in dragging it to light from the darkness in which it was conceived, and in which it has (as far as I know) ever remained. But this much I must say, it was a very brilliant one, and would, no doubt, have been successful, assuming (which, however, was doubtful) that the Austrians would not have interfered.

Bucharest was reached in due course, and Dr. Sandwith and I, having spent our Christmas there, made arrangements for visiting the hospitals on both banks of the Danube, and for distributing through the organization of the Russian Red Cross both stores and comforts for the sick and wounded. Towards the end of the last week of the last month of the old year our arrangements were complete, and on the last day of the year I started alone to ride to Fratesti, a little more than fifty versts (about thirty-five miles) from Bucharest on the west of the Giurgevo road to the Danube. It was afternoon and bitterly cold, the thermometer showing twenty degrees of frost according to Celsius, or about zero, Fahrenheit. Still, I was tolerably well clothed and splendidly mounted. Furs, the "proper wear" for such weather, are too heavy, or rather too cumbrous, for the saddle, but I had a leather tunic under my coat, and two pairs of stockings in my jack-boots; my "knees and nose" had, from the force of circumstances, to "look out" for themselves; the former partially, the latter wholly and literally.

My mount was, as I have said, splendid — a mare sixteen hands high, yet "low on the ground," pretty head (which she knew how to carry), intelligent eye, clean legs, sure feet, good appetite, good goer, good temper. Alexandra — that was her name — had been the property of General Darozhinski; he was killed, and she wounded, by the explosion of a shell in the Shipka Pass, and after she had mourned her master till her own wounds (not very bad ones) were healed, she entered my service, and we soon became fast friends and understood each other like Christians.

My baggage consisted of two flannel shirts, a few pairs of stockings, half a dozen pocket-handkerchiefs, a waterproof coat and helmet, and a set of roughed shoes for Alexandra — the last item a happy thought, as the sequel proved — for although the shoes that she started with were all very well for Bucharest, where the deep snow had been cut up by the innumerable sledges, they were worse than useless when we got on the "war-path," which had been stamped down by the troops marching to the Danube till it resembled a sea of glass. In fact, I had to change her shoes as soon as we got out of the town. This little act of courtesy I had to do myself, but being an old soldier in that way, I managed to do it to Alexandra's satisfaction and to the no small amazement of the Don Cossacks who "chanced" that way at the moment.

Then I joined the crowd of troops marching for the front; they were moving at about five versts an hour, and it was impossible to give them the go-bye, as they occupied the whole of the narrow road. I made the best of it, and that was not bad, as I had fallen in with a Russian colonel, and we chatted very pleasantly together till we reached the village of Kulugurine, where my friend and his regiment "nighted." He pressed me very much to stay too, pointing out the disadvantages of travelling in a dark night; but I was deaf to his arguments, for I had promised the Russian Red Cross to be at our Red Cross barracks at Putiné, twenty versts beyond Fratesti, in the morning, and I was nearly a like distance the wrong side of the latter place. Besides, there would be no troops marching by night and I could thus travel quicker. I took a "pull" at the colonel's vodka flask (it was really cognac, but every one religiously believes that Russian officers drink no spirit but vodka, and I won't try to teach them heresy), and nibbling my last biscuit, I called on Alexandra for a trot, hoping to reach Fratesti before the new year — the old one had only about three hours of life left. I was exceedingly anxious to lose no time, as the prisoners from Plevna, nearly thirty thousand in number, were on the march, and the first detachment of four thousand was expected at our barracks the next day. "Our barracks" were built with about £1,000, part of the Russian sick and wounded fund; they held nearly a thousand beds for comparatively light cases, about forty for wounded officers, and about thirty for grave and hopeless cases. The latter were fitted up with much comfort, but the others were only straw in canvas sacks laid on the rough board floor. All the bedding was provided by the Russian Red Cross, as also was the staff of doctors and sisters of charity, and the Russians having taken all these thousands of prisoners, their Red Cross was anxious to provide for those who should fall a prey to the severity of the weather, and so they had invited my co-operation in the matter.

The snow broke crisply under Alexandra's feet as she trotted merrily along into a darkness which seemed to grow thicker and thicker every verst we left behind us, till at length we could see nothing but the distant camp-fires in our rear and the few stars which had ventured out on "such a night as this." Then I could see nothing but Alexandra's head, and suddenly that disappeared, and almost at the same moment I found we were rolling over each other into a young ravine which a snow-drift had obligingly filled up for us. How many times we somersaulted I could not exactly count, but when I came to survey damages I found they were not so severe as one might have expected — a few bruises falling to my own share, and a nasty cut in the shoulder to Alexandra's. "The awkwardest share of this awkward affair" was that when we found a way out of the ravine we did not know where we were. The camp-fires had died and we could not see their ashes, the stars had repented their rashness in coming out and had retired, and all that I could see was a small round spot of white with a larger circle of leaden grey, and beyond that blackness. Alexandra may have seen a little more, as I don't think she ever had typhus as I had two years ago on the Serbo-Bosnian frontier. This disgusting disease, besides twice skinning me, like an eel, alive, affected my eyes, so that although I can see very well by day I am almost blind by night. And here I find myself in a waste of white that for the most part looks black to me. I light a cigar and look at my watch by the light of it — ten o'clock, and I have not dined, and no chance of dining this year. The mare too is hungry, and is pawing the snow away in the vain endeavor to "get to grass." I take the saddle off and spread her blanket over her. In replacing the saddle my half-frozen hand accidentally "punches" my own nose, and to my horror I find it is frost-bitten. I fall on my knees and bathe my face in the snow for nearly an hour, when sensation gradually returns to my nose and ears, and then I try to rise, but cannot — my toes are frozen in my boots. I make many attempts at rising but fail, till at length I seize a stirrup, and in spite of the pain, almost too intense too endure, I pull myself up. Then I spend a good hour stamping circulation into my feet; that done I look again into the semi-darkness, and to my astonishment see a grand old country house, with massive entrance gates, in a high boundary wall surmounted by chevaux de frise. I pick up the bridle and lead the mare towards it, and soon find myself in an avenue of oaks, with hoarfrost hanging from their spreading branches. The road was rough and we made slow progress, and indeed we got no nearer the hospitable mansion — for it was only an optical illusion, a will-o'-the-wisp, that led us farther from our way. I gave up all hope of finding Fratesti, or indeed anywhere, that year, and settled myself down to the monotonous amusement of stamping circulation into my feet, varied occasionally by applying snow to my face and ears. Then the intense cold (it was below zero) brought on an almost irresistible drowsiness; but I dared not sleep, for I knew that if I slept I should forget to awake. I talked to Alexandra, and the poor beast seemed to understand the situation, and ever and anon turned to smell my face. I liked to imagine she was kissing me every time I felt the grateful warmth of her breath on my face, but I suppose she was merely satisfying herself that my weight against her flank was not a dead one. Then I found myself dozing, and would fain have smoked again but I could not open my mouth, for my moustache and beard were frozen together with a block of ice already a quarter of a pound weight — the result of my snow face-baths and of my breathing. In fact I had a gag of ice, which not only prevented my talking to the mare or smoking, but interfered seriously with respiration. The rest of the night was miserable in the extreme. I was hungry, and had nothing to eat; sleepy, and dared not sleep; cold, and too exhausted to take exercise sufficient to keep up the circulation. I had to press close up to poor Alexandra to preserve any warmth at all. Towards morning, too, I felt my hands all covered with blood — I could tell it was blood by the warmth and the smell — and I thought it came from under my finger-nails, which felt as though falling off, but when daylight came I found it was not my own blood but Alexandra's. In embracing her neck to support me and keep me warm, I had reopened her wound and smeared myself with her blood. But daylight did come at last, and I found that I had overshot the side road to Fratesti when less than five versts from that station. I had spent ten hours in the snow within forty minutes' walk of a warm bed.

As we pointed for the Red Cross station I thought to myself, "Well, I'm a strong man, tolerably well clothed, and though very hungry, certainly far from starved — yet I have only got through this night by the 'skin of my teeth.' How can those wretched Turks have pulled through?" The sequel will show.

II.

THE Russian Red Cross delegate at Fratesti was M. Davidoff, now consul-general for the principality of Bulgaria: he gave us a good breakfast and a strong invitation to stay a few hours to rest. This, however, I felt bound to decline, as I had promised M. Richter's locum tenens, the Russian delegate at Putiné, to be at "our barracks" there before noon (it was now nearly ten, and I had twenty-five versts to do, a tired horse and a bad road). A slight fog — no doubt my will-o'-the-wisp castle of the night before — had raised the temperature so that one had not the fear of losing one's nose before one's eyes. Still it was bitter cold, and I could not help asking myself again and again, "How can those wretched prisoners stand this?" At last the answer came in the shape of the first detachment, and oh! what a sight! They looked like a regiment of corpses galvanized into action by the subtle demon of war in some merry moment of "glory." Their pinched features wore a fixed, stolid expression of hopeless misery; their gait was slow and hobbling, for most of them were suffering from frost-bite, and all of them made feeble endeavors to hold their tattered garments round their shivering limbs. Some of them were vainly endeavoring to bite the frozen bread; others actually threw it away as useless weight; and a few Asiatics who had probably never in their lives seen such a winter were contorting their features and jabbering incoherent words which nobody understood or even noticed: they had lost their reason; the next night they lost their lives — they were frozen to death.*

Eh, how sadly did I resume my own march! Here was misery, and I was powerless to alleviate it. I had hundreds of warm garments, but they had been bought with money especially subscribed for the Russian sick and wounded. I could not, of course, commit a breach of trust by applying funds subscribed for the Russians to the benefit of the wretched prisoners they had spared, although the enemy had massacred every Russian who had fallen into his barbarous hands. These poor wretches themselves admitted that the Russian and Roumanian soldiers who fell into Osman Pasha's hands were murdered in cold blood. And indeed Osman himself told me on the 21st of June 1877, when I had an interview with him at Adlie, on the Serbo-Bulgarian frontier, that he looked on the Roumanians as rebels, and as such he should execute them, and that he could not afford to keep Russian prisoners ("Ich bin nicht reich genug Russen zu ernähren!").

I had not gone far before I came upon a Turk crouching in the snow. I dismounted and spoke to him in Sclav, on the chance of his understanding me; but I got no answer, the poor fellow had spoken his last word. He had fallen out to rest and eat his breakfast, and had yielded to the drowsiness which extreme cold induces, and had thus dozed into his last sleep still grasping in his stiff hand his frozen bread. Horrors thickened on me as I traced the prisoners' line of march, lined as it was at intervals with frozen corpses. Some of them were stripped of their clothing, and others were mutilated by the hungry hogs and wild dogs. They culminated in a sickening spectacle — a sow and her litter dragging the viscera from a dead Asiatic. "Oh, heavens!" I exclaimed involuntarily to myself. "Were these poor wretches born to be food for swine?" And clapping my hand on my revolver I was just about to shoot the obscene beast, when the thought occurred to me that it was well for the living that these scavengers — the hogs, the dogs, and the vultures — should eat up the dead, and so prevent their putrefying bodies from breeding a pestilence. At twelve o'clock I reached Putiné, almost at the same moment as several wagons loaded with frozen corpses. The Russian delegate, besides succoring the living, had organized fatigue parties to bury the dead. He had distributed all the Russian stores and warm clothing amongst the Turkish prisoners, and begged hard for some of ours, but I felt bound to resist the temptation. I could not divert from the Russian sick and wounded money subscribed especially for them, and apply it to the Turkish prisoners whom they had spared in spite of the massacre of their own countrymen; though practically it would have come to the same thing, for after taking the instructions of our committee, I handed over my stores to the Russian Red Cross, and they distributed them amongst the Turks. They put the matter to me thus: "Your friends are anxious to help us; we have taken all these prisoners, and with them the responsibility of doing our utmost to keep them alive; so that in helping them you assume a share of our responsibility, and thus you fulfil your own object of helping us." In justice to the Russians I feel bound to say that this magnanimity was by no means exceptional or confined to officials. I have often seen Russian soldiers share their rations with Turkish prisoners. And at Zimnitza I found an hospital barrack with fifty beds, thirty-five of which were occupied by Turkish wounded, whilst in the spaces between the beds Russian wounded were lying on the ground.

Next day Dr. Sandwith arrived in a peasant sledge with Mr. Villiers, of the Graphic, who afterwards published a sketch of "Dr. Sandwith on his Mission of Mercy," which gives a very good idea of the difficulties and discomfort of travelling in south Wallachia in mid-winter. Being thus relieved from work at Putiné, I set out for Zimnitza to visit the Russian hospitals there on my way to Turn-Magurelli, where we had five English doctors. Zimnitza is only forty-five versts from Putiné as the crow flies, but as the Vede runs between, and as that river had overflowed its banks and was not fordable for thirty or forty versts from its mouth, a detour had to be made of about twenty versts, thus lengthening the journey to sixty-five versts. The way from Zimnitza to Turn was also lengthened to the same extent in a similar manner, and so my whole journey amounted to one hundred and ten versts each way, two hundred and twenty versts there and back to Putiné, or three hundred and forty there and back to Bucharest (in all about two hundred and thirty miles).

Alexandra was not the worse for her accident of New Year's eve, and we made the sixty-five versts to Zimnitza in seven hours, including stoppages. The way was dotted here and there with Turks in the snow, some singly, others in little groups of two, three, or four, huddled together for warmth. Most of them were dead and stiff, but I had the satisfaction of saving some who were still alive and putting them on sledges of the nearest Red Cross station. In not a few instances the cargoes of these sledges were found, on arriving at their destination, to be a mixture of living and dead! In one case I hastened to get warm soup for a couple of waifs I had picked up on the road; when I returned, one was lying dead in the other's lap!

The sky was clear, and the sun, shining on the world of white, dazzled the eyes, but at intervals the sun was obscured by the immense flights of birds whom my approach disturbed from their breakfast of human flesh.

At Zimnitza I found twenty-five hundred sick and wounded, including a large proportion of Turks, whom the Russian doctors and sisters of charity were tending in a way which brought tears of gratitude to the eyes of the rough barbarians, who could scarcely understand how delicate Russian ladies could dress their dirty and stinking wounds. Brave women were those daughters of noble Moscow and St. Petersburg families who left their comfortable and happy homes to work almost day and night in the rough barracks of the Red Cross hospitals. Not a small proportion of them sacrificed their lives to their self-imposed work of true charity, and nearly all fell victims to typhus. Of a brave little band of twenty sisters, sixteen were lying sick with typhus, and two dead of the same terrible disease. Those who only saw the Russian sisters when they were convalescent from typhus, taking the air in carriages in Bucharest, formed a very harsh opinion of them; but those who saw them, as I did, at their work, will never forget the courage, the tenderness, the devotion with which they tended the sick and wounded of friend and foe.

Having handed to the delegates and sisters funds for comforts for the severest cases of the twenty-five hundred at Zimnitza and the four thousand patients that were lying on the other side of the Danube at Sistova (the river being at that time impassable), I pointed for Turn-Maguerelli. The road was wilder than ever, but a slight fall of snow had thrown a white mantle over those who slept only too well. The wind had not disturbed the covering which nature had spread over the lonely dead, but the birds and beasts of prey had here and there soiled the pure white sheet with the blood of the bitter weather's victims.

I was not sorry to reach Turn, where I was welcomed by our doctors, who found a comfortable bed for me and a warm stall for Alexandra. Their barrack was not full, and most of their patients were Turks whom they nad literally "picked up" by the wayside, and thus snatched from a frozen grave. On consulting with them I found that owing to their not speaking the language of either Russians or Roumanians, and to the change of the line of march, and to other circumstances it is unnecessary to refer to, they were not at this time (although they had worked well and effectively at Plevna, as the Times' correspondent telegraphed at the time) — they were not doing as much good as they wished and strived to do, or as was commensurate with their expenses; I therefore made arrangements for their return home, which the committee readily ratified, as it released funds to be applied to the purchase of warm clothing and other comforts which the sick and wounded required at that time even more than surgeons and medicines. This arrangement concluded to the satisfaction of our doctors and myself, I retraced my steps, visiting all the hospitals and Red Cross stations on my line of march, and seeing everywhere a repetition of the scenes I have vainly attempted to describe, but which can only be realized in a hideous nightmare. I will not weary my readers with a repetition, but content myself with saying that in three days I was again in Bucharest, having completed my two hundred and thirty miles' "Ride through Snow and Death."

THE COTTAGE BY THE RIVER.

A BUSY man, living by my pen, wearied of and worried with work, when the time came round for taking my usual summer holiday I had almost lost the power to make the effort needed for the start. Switzerland, Norway, even Scotland, — to reach any of these countries involved a journey which I felt in my present mood and state of health an extreme disinclination to take. This state of feeling should have warned me of the necessity for rest and change. My nerves were unstrung, and I wanted rest; but I was in the slavery of authorship. I had given up for a time the press and magazine writing which afforded a sufficient income for my simple wants, in order to devote myself to a considerable work from which I hoped to gain more reputation than could be got from anonymous contributions; and I was under an engagement to deliver a certain quantity of manuscript to my publisher by the autumn, on which, unfortunately, I had received a considerable advance. The weight was still very short, and I knew well that if I took a regular holiday I should never make good the deficiency in time. Had I been living with friends, they would have made me take the rest I needed; but I was my own master, living in chambers, with no one to criticise, or to keep me to regular habits, save my housekeeper, whose frequent remarks on my ill looks and late hours had become at last simply irritating. And thus the days passed, with the inclination to work growing ever less, without recreation or amusement, — in the appearance of industry without its results.

One sultry evening in July, at the close of a day spent in the seclusion of my chambers with little result save a headache and a feeling of exhaustion, which was now the only form of hunger I ever experienced, while sauntering down the hot and stuffy street by way of taking exercise, more to gratify my housekeeper than myself, I met my friend Tom Wyatt, whom I had not seen for some time, and who at once noticed my ill looks.

"You are looking as if you had taken too large a dose of the London season, my dear fellow," he said. "You ought to anticipate your usual holiday, and be off to Switzerland at once. I never saw you look so used-up before."

I repudiated the cause ascribed for my appearance, for I had been leading a hermit's life, and said that I did not see the way to going abroad this year, or anywhere far from town.

"Then why don't you do as I do," he replied, "and take suburban lodgings on the river? I am living down at Stainham. I have got a lodging at the man's from whom I hire my boat. I get a swim in the river every morning before I come up, and a pull every evening after I go down. You have no idea how fresh and jolly the air is on the river of an evening — quite different to this stuffy London air. Lots of fellows I know are living down there for the summer, and the best inn is next door to my lodgings; so there is plenty of company. We have a capital train morning and evening, and we have just time for a rubber going down. It's far better diggings than Switzerland or the Rhine, and ever so much cheaper." And my friend went on to urge me to come down and stay for a few days with him, and get some boating and fresh air.

But the prospect of living in a bustling country town, next door to a river-side inn, which Wyatt mentioned casually was doing a "roaring trade" at this season, had no attraction for me in my present mood, still less the making one in a rubber while being hurried along at forty miles an hour. The notion of a month or so passed on the river, I replied, seemed a very pleasant one; but I should like some quieter place than he had chosen. For I wanted quiet, and freedom from interruption for study and writing. I was in arrears already with some literary work I had on hand, and must make up for lost time. A secluded cottage on the river, now, or lodgings in a quiet farmhouse, would be just the thing for me.

Wyatt observed that cottages with a river frontage commanded very high rents at this season; but if he saw or heard of anything likely to suit, he would let me know.

Two or three days after this I got a note from him, to say that he had found the very place that I wanted; and he proposed that we should go and look at it together that afternoon, starting by the five o'clock quick train.

I met him, accordingly, at the station, at the time appointed. We did not stop at Stainham going down, for Wyatt said that it would be too long a pull from there up to our destination. So, passing that place, we got out at Maddeley, a station some twenty minutes further down the line, also on the river-bank. Here hiring a boat, Wyatt took the sculls, and I sat lazily in the stern, as he pulled up stream for our destination.

It was a lovely summer's evening, and the quiet of the peaceful scene acted like balm on my worried nerves. This was evidently just the sort of life to suit me. I wondered that I had never thought of spending the summer on the river before; and I was ready to take the cottage before I had seen it, and determined to be pleased with it, whatever sort of place it might prove to be.

Wyatt had not seen it either, although so familiar with the river. It was on the tail of a mill-stream, he explained, and separated from the main channel by an island. He had heard of it from a friend, who, coming down the river, had stopped to bathe in this back stream, and had observed the cottage, with a notice that it was to let. Rather a jungle of a place he reported it to be, and looked damp; but it might do well enough for the summer. "Here we are at the place itself," continued Wyatt, "and shall be able to judge for ourselves." And as he spoke he turned the boat to the left, off the main channel, and pulled up a narrow branch scarcely wide enough for plying the sculls.

He rowed for about a furlong up this channel. On our right was the island which separated it from the main stream, meadow and osier land; on our left also a meadow, succeeded by a wood, which terminated in an ill kept lawn of three or four acres, overgrown with shrubs, on which, about fifty yards back from the stream, was the cottage. A board suspended to a post on the bank announced, in letters almost obliterated by damp, that the house was to be let, furnished, and that the key was kept at the mill. Of this mill we could just catch a glimpse, higher up the channel, through the thick underwood that lined the banks, and between the posts of some neglected eel-pots; but we could hear plainly the sound of the water rushing through the race of which this channel formed the termination; and for this point, accordingly, we now made, Wyatt with difficulty forcing the boat through the eel-pots, and punting past the overhanging bushes. Approaching the mill, our progress was stopped by some stakes, partly above and partly under water, which crossed the channel where it narrowed, just below the bridge that connected the mill with the mainland. Fastening the boat to these stakes, where they joined the shore, we proceeded in quest of the miller, whom we found indoors.

The miller told us we should have found the cottage open; it was always left open during the day to air it. His daughter had just gone to shut it up for the night, but we could get there in time to see it first, if we went back at once. So leaving our boat fastened below the bridge, we crossed it and walked back.

Passing through an orchard we entered a little wood which extended along the bank of the stream, so thick and overgrown that the path could hardly be made out, which enclosed the upper side of the lawn on which the cottage stood. Emerging from this wood, and crossing the lawn, we now saw, what no doubt we might have seen in the first instance, that the front door was wide open, and several of the windows, to let in the mild summer air, of which certainly too much could not reach it through the overgrown vegetation which surrounded the place; and we now entered the cottage to inspect it.

It seemed in bad repair, although habitable enough as a summer residence, and bore that air of neglect which makes a shabby house look still shabbier when unoccupied. A low veranda ran along the front; and on each side of the door in the centre, which opened into a passage, was the window of a sitting-room, opening nearly to the ground. The one on the right was a drawing-room, that on the left a dining-room. At the back of the latter was a smaller room, used apparently by the late occupant mainly as a receptacle for fishing-tackle. The staircase was in a recess opposite to this spare room, and at the back of the drawing-room. At the end of the passage was a door communicating with the kitchen and offices. The furniture was faded and shabby, but sufficient for my purposes. There were some easy-chairs in the drawing-room, and a couch, all covered with faded chintz; it also boasted a piano very much out of tune, as Wyatt ascertained by striking a few chords on it. The dining-room, in addition to the ordinary furniture, had a writing-table near the window, at which I thought I would establish myself. The least satisfactory part of the room was the state of the walls, papered with a dull and dismal paper, now discolored with damp, the more conspicuous as they were bare of pictures or ornament, save in the drawing-room, over the fireplace of which hung the portraits of a man and woman, — colored photographs apparently, not badly executed, although somewhat overdone. The woman's was the better work of the two; the figure was tall and graceful, and the face, although not altogether prepossessing in expression, a very handsome one. Whether the person represented was quite a lady could not be told, but the man was certainly not quite a gentleman, and the painter, perhaps in trying to please, had laid on his color too coarsely. The representation was of a swaggering fellow with a broad chest and a fine head of greasy hair, with black curly whiskers meeting under the chin, moustaches, and a black imperial, wearing a good deal of jewellery, carefully picked out by the colorist; altogether a beauty man of an objectionable type, whom some women may be found to admire, but no men. "The last occupants of the house, I suppose," remarked Wyatt; "the lady had a temper of her own, or the artist has libelled her; and that fellow was not the sort to stand it, either, I'll be bound; he thinks a good deal too much about number one for that."

We wanted to find the miller's daughter, to get some information about the amount of crockery and kitchen utensils available, but she did not appear to be anywhere about the place; so I passed into the kitchen to make a rough inventory of its appliances, and afterwards went upstairs and looked over the bedrooms, while Wyatt returned to the garden to have a smoke.

I found him lying on the grass by the bank of the stream. "I say, Phil, my boy," he observed, as I strolled down towards him, "you will be establishing a flirtation with the miller's daughter if you are not looked after — and a very fine young woman she is, I am bound to say. Don't you think so?"

I answered that I was not yet in a position to form an opinion, not having seen her.

"Why," exclaimed Wyatt, raising himself on his elbow, "do you mean to say you didn't meet her inside? Why, she went in not two minutes before you came out. She came out of the grove here on her way from the mill."

I replied that I supposed I must have been up-stairs when she entered, for I did not see her, nor even hear her.

"You may well not have heard her, for she walked so lightly — glided rather than walked. Our friend the miller must have given her lessons in calisthenics; rustic beauties seldom make the most of themselves in the matter of carriage."

We now went up to the house together, and called out once or twice. No one answered, and we came away. "Well, she is an uncommon fine girl," continued Wyatt, as we returned through the thicket to the mill, "if her face is at all equal to her figure. I didn't see her face. I whistled to attract her attention, but she kept her head turned away, with a hood over it. She came quickly out of the thicket, as if she were in a hurry and thinking about something, and went straight into the house. What a jungle this is, to be sure!" he continued, as we made our way in single file along the traces of the path, now overgrown with thorns and bushes. "You will have to get leave to have some of this cut away."

We found the miller smoking his pipe on the bridge. He said that the rent of the cottage was four guineas a week; and on my demurring to that amount, he added that very likely the agent would accept less. He could not take upon himself to lower the terms; his share in the matter was simply to get a commission on the let. Had I not better see the agent in town, and make an offer? The agent wanted very much to get a tenant. He had been told to name four guineas, but he dared say something less would be taken to secure a tenant. "Offer three guineas, and you will get it," Wyatt observed to me aside, "and the place will be cheap at the money; it would fetch three times that amount in most parts of the river, with so much ground about it." "How long had it been empty?" I asked. Two years, the miller believed, but it was empty before he came to the mill. "Two years!" said Wyatt; "why, from the look of the place it might have been uninhabited for twenty. The last occupants must have been fond of a jungle life; but perhaps they did not stay there long?" The miller said he did not know much about it; they left before he came there. He spoke with an air of constraint, as if not wishing to pursue the subject; but Wyatt, who was not easily put down, asked if the pictures in the drawing-room represented the late occupants, and the miller replied in the affirmative, but with a marked reserve of manner.

We now turned to go, and as the miller accompanied us to where our boat was moored, a few yards below the bridge, his manner became more free and open. "These stakes are very handy, gentlemen," he said, as Wyatt stooped to unfasten the painter; and on our expressing concurrence, he went on: "Ay, they come in handy to fasten boats to — they are main handy in more ways than one. These stakes are what I call my bait-lines; I catches some very large bait here, mostly in them deep stakes there, in the middle, under water — dead-bait I calls it. You see this is the way to the ferry over my bridge, and sometimes parties come along here of a night, tight or what not, and they loses their way over my bridge, and falls in, and then instead of floating down, they get caught in these here stakes; and so I sees 'em of a morning, and pulls them out. But it's too late then to send for the doctor."

"Does this often happen?" asked Wyatt.

"Wonderful often; it's wonderful how many folk about here gets tight of a night, and misses the road over my bridge — wonderful many, considering how few folks there be in these parts altogether. 'Tisn't like as if it were London, you see, or even Stainham; there's only villages about here."

"You ought to have a railing put to your bridge," called out Wyatt, as he pushed the boat off, and sent her stern-foremost down the stream.

"So I ought, master — so I ought," chuckled the miller in reply; "leastways I ought to draw them stakes away, and then I shouldn't be troubled with dead-bait of a morning."

"That old fellow thinks himself a wag," said Wyatt, as we dropped slowly down; "who would have thought an old clown like that would have such a stylish daughter!"

Now it so happened that, before we went down to the boat, I had stopped to have a few words with the miller about the best way of obtaining supplies, and so forth, while Wyatt wandered about the island to find a good place for boating in the morning. Just as I was preparing to follow him, the miller's daughter came up to us to tell her father that she had returned from the cottage, who bade her put the key on the hook over the fireplace; and I took the opportunity to arrange that she should be there to meet me when I expected to arrive the day but one following to take possession. And but that I could make allowance for my friend's infatuation about the fair sex, and his disposition to discover some beauty in every woman he met, undistinguishable by any one else, I should have been astonished at the hyperbole he employed about the miller's daughter. A comely wench enough, no doubt, but certainly to my view the reverse of graceful in either carriage or figure. When I put this to him afterwards, he retorted that nothing better was to be expected from a sedentary misogynist, who knew women only in books.

And now we had made our way past the cottage, looking cool and quiet if somewhat gloomy and overshaded with its tangled garden and setting of dark groves, and shot out into the main river, which, peaceful though it was, and little tenanted at this hour, seemed quite lively in contrast with the lonely creek, which, with its overhanging trees and bushes, was settling into the gloom of twilight, while the open river still remained light and clear. Passing by Maddeley, where we had stopped coming up, Wyatt rowed on to Stainham. I had not for a long time enjoyed anything so much as this row down, or rather, as sitting in the boat lazily while my friend did the work. This river-life, so near at hand, yet of which I had made no use before, came on me like the revelation of a state where peace and quiet could be found to refresh and strengthen me for the labor before me. I thought to myself that, sitting in the silence of that cool parlor, the work to be done, which seemed so irksome and repulsive in my London chambers, would become easy again as it used to be in the months gone by, before I had fallen into listless and yet restless habits; and I experienced all the agreeable sense of expectation while partaking of Wyatt's hospitality for the night in his little lodgings at Stainham. As we sat on a bench in front of the house on the river-bank after our light dinner, while he smoked his pipe and I looked out on the tranquil river, I felt how far pleasanter and more wholesome in my present state would be this mode of life than stopping in London, and that the quiet of my new tenement would be pleasanter and more soothing still. For even at Stainham the laughter of some of the town-folks — shop-boys and their sweethearts, I suppose, out after the day's work — as their boats passed up and down till late into the night, harsh and noisy as it sounded, jarred on my nerves. I wondered it did not annoy Wyatt as it did me; but he retorted that it would not bother me more than it did him if I would only take to smoking.

We returned next morning to town, and I hastened to call on the agents for the cottage, whose address had been given me by the miller. The member of the firm into whose room I was shown, made but little objection to the proposed terms. Evidently they would take almost anything to get the house let. The lease, it appeared, was still held by the late occupant; it had come into the hands of the firm as a bad debt. "Who was the late occupant?" I asked, as I rose to go. Well, he was believed to be a person of independent means. "Why did he leave, and where was he now?" That was just what they would like to know. "Was he a married man with a young wife?" Well, Mr. Perkins believed he was. "Then," said I, "I suppose those are their likenesses which I saw in the drawing-room." Mr. Perkins believed they would be, but added that he really knew very little about the matter. They both left the place quite suddenly, for some reason unknown, and he had never heard from them since.

The rest of the day and the succeeding one went speedily in the necessary preparations for my country housekeeping; and in the afternoon of the latter, Wyatt and I again set off together, and by the same train as before. For it had been arranged that he should spend a few days with me at the cottage, to see me started, as he called it. I must confess that I would almost have preferred to make the beginning by myself, possessed as I was with perhaps a morbid craving to be alone; and if Wyatt's good spirits could be appreciated at times, they were somewhat oppressive at others. But of course I could not refuse the offer of his company, and I trust he did not detect any ungraciousness in my manner of responding to it.

We stopped as formerly at Maddeley, whither Wyatt had this time sent his boat on in advance, and he rowed me as before up from there to our new quarters, where we arrived while the long summer evening was still young. The fine weather continued; and in this return to the river I experienced a revival of spirits and calmness of mood to which I had for long been a stranger, and I began to look forward with a keen sense of anticipatory pleasure to a lengthened stay here. Arrived before the lawn, and making fast the boat to the bank, we walked up to the cottage, and found Mrs. Bond, my housekeeper, who had come down by train direct at midday to the station at the village about a mile and a half from the river, at the back of the cottage, busily engaged in getting things into order, and preparing our supper. My books had been unpacked, and, with a few other articles which had been brought down, they gave already a homelike and comfortable aspect to the dining-room. I may here mention that a difficulty had occurred in the first instance about service, for Mrs. Bond was supplemented in my chambers by a charwoman, who came in daily to help, and who was irremovable, and alone she would not suffice for the work of the cottage; but the difficulty had been surmounted by Bond's volunteering to bring down with her a niece, now out of service, and staying with her father in town, and who would be glad of this easy place under her aunt for a few weeks. This girl, whom I had not seen, had gone, Bond said, to the village to make some necessary purchases. Eggs, too, it appeared, were a difficulty; the miller's daughters, who had been there great part of the afternoon, had promised to bring some, but had not returned with them. Thereon Wyatt said he would go and fetch them, and set off in the boat, while I lay down on the bank pleasantly occupied in doing nothing. I knew that I could not go to bed till I had completed my prescribed portion of work, or at least spent the time I had prescribed for myself in pretending to make the attempt; but I put off the hour for settling down to it till after supper.

I was lying thus, lazily looking at the lawn and cottage before me, now overcast by the shades of evening, for the sun had set, and in this shady spot it was already dusk, when I saw the figure of a female issuing from the grove by the path which led from the mill, and going towards the house. I am rather short-sighted, nor was it light enough for any one to see very clearly, but the woman, who was evidently tall, and from her figure young, appeared to have a scarf or hood of dark material over her head, which she held with one hand, and which concealed the face. She passed with quick but even step along the little lawn, and entered the cottage by the open door. The miller's daughter with the eggs, I thought — Wyatt will have had his pull for nothing. The young woman might, however, have gone in by the back door. I suppose she has been so accustomed to the empty house that she has forgotten her manners. But I was too lazy to go and intercept Wyatt, who, indeed, presently appeared coming through the eel-pots, and displayed a basket of eggs deposited on the floor of the boat. It was lucky he went for them, he observed, as he came up and joined me on the bank; the young lady at the mill said it was too late to go back that evening, as her sister was away, and she would have had to come alone, and but for him we should have gone without our omelet. Then it must have been Bond's niece whom I saw just now, I thought — a fine young woman apparently, and with a graceful carriage for a maidservant.

It was late when we had our supper, served by Bond herself; through the open door we could hear her niece employed upon the plates and dishes in the kitchen. Supper ended, my companion smoked his pipe awhile, and then declared for bed. I felt inclined to follow his example; for although in the habit of keeping late hours, having lost the power of sleeping in the early night, the exercise and the unusual spell of fresh air had made me both tired and sleepy. But I had done no work for the last two days; the enjoyment of the holiday would be lost if I was perpetually oppressed with a weight of arrears pressing on me; let me make a beginning of steady industry to-night, and the effort to work would be all the less next day. So when Wyatt took himself off to bed, I moved the candles to the writing-table before the window — we had forgotten to bring down any lamps — and drew out my manuscript from the drawer. The pencil-note marking the date of last leaving off was more than a week old; I really must waste no more time; let me get a fresh start made to-night, and I should be able to go on all the more vigorously to-morrow. Wyatt remonstrated. I should lose all the good to be got by coming down here, he said, if I did not keep rational hours. Brain more active at night, was it? That was just the pity. An active brain meant a sleepless night. How could I expect to be fresh in the morning if I did not give myself a fair chance? It was odd I did not see myself what everybody else could see — that my nerves were not in a state for me to take liberties with myself.

I must have expressed myself with unreasonable warmth at the well-meant caution, for Wyatt became quite apologetic about having said anything to hurt my feelings, and so went off to bed, while I sat down and addressed myself to my task.

It was probably the consciousness of the truth of my friend's remark which had made it so unpalatable. It was plain from what he said that the change I had supposed to be apparent to myself only was visible enough to others. But to-night, at any rate, the state of impotence which now usually beset me when I tried to write was quite absent. The sensation of holding a pen no longer set up that nervous irritability, that vain desire to seize upon ideas always eluding me, combined with a loathing for my task, which had of late been always present with such distressing force. I now felt calm and even pleased with my employment, and could think out my ideas with a distinct sense of mental power. I felt once again something like my old self. Assuredly the cure had begun to take effect already. If I could only maintain this frame of mind I should be able to enjoy my holiday, and yet make good progress with my task. And it was with a sense of infinite relief that I once more resumed a favorite position, which of late I had been obliged to abandon, exchanging the upright chair for an easy one, and putting the candles behind me, so that the light fell on the paper which I held upon a a portfolio. In this way I could write fast enough and comfortably, and then letting the book lie on my lap, could stop at times to rest and think.

Yes, it was the charm of the quiet and the country air which had wrought this restoration already. Why limit my stay here to a few weeks? why not stop on till the winter? It will be easy, no doubt, to get an extension of the lease, and perhaps the agent would put the house and the neglected garden into a little better order. A brighter wall-paper alone would make the cottage quite cheerful.

Sitting thus, writing in an easy-chair, the head may rest while one stops to think, and as I lay back thus now and again, sometimes in happy contemplation of my own improved condition, at others reflecting on the order of my argument, closing my eyes the while, I must have fallen asleep, for when I opened them I did not at first recollect where I was; then I became aware that I had been awakened by a noise. Somebody was moving in the drawing-room on the other side of the little passage, — Wyatt, no doubt. What had he come down-stairs for? But no, it is not Wyatt. It is the rustling of a woman's dress. Mrs. Bond perhaps, locking up for the night. Then, as I glanced at the candles nearly burned out, I knew that it must be long past midnight. I jumped up, curious to know who it could be moving about so late, although the idea of robbers never occurred to me, or if it did was at once dismissed; for who would think of breaking into a house with one of its occupants sitting up with candles before an uncurtained window? As I rose to my feet I again heard the person moving, and stopped to listen. The woman, whoever it is, has come out from the drawing-room, and is passing along the little passage with a light, swift step. Now she is going up the stairs. It must be Bond or her niece. What can she want at this hour? and taking up a candle I opened the door and looked out. The staircase, as I have mentioned, was in the recess at the back of the drawing-room opposite the back parlor; at the top was a landing-place, with a door communicating with the servants' rooms over the offices. Bond or her niece, whichever it was, must have passed through this door to her room. She has been quick about it, for I was close behind. But no! for as I was about to follow I notice that the door is both locked and bolted from this side. She must be still somewhere close. But yet there is no hiding-place. The passage, which corresponded with the one below, was bare of furniture. Opposite the head of the staircase was the lumber-room, over the back parlor. This was unlocked, and not without a certain thrill of excitement I opened the door and looked in. It contained an old chair or two, and some boxes, but was otherwise empty.

There remained only the two bedrooms.

I listened at the door of Wyatt's, which was over the drawing-room, and then opened it quietly. He was sleeping the sound sleep of a healthy man in good training. My own room was empty.

As thus what seemed at first so simple failed of explanation, my heart began to beat loudly as I found myself in presence of the supernatural. The power of motion left me as I stood with the candle in hand, while suddenly, as connected with what had just happened, there flashed across my mind the recollection of the mysterious figure seen in the afternoon. My knees trembled, and I confess that it was more the feeling of protection from Wyatt's presence on the other side of the door than my own resolution that enabled me to recover the power of my limbs. Yet withal I felt thoroughly ashamed of my poltroonery, although finding a salve to my conscience in being able to ascribe it to the state of my nerves. Yes, it must be that! I had become excited again over my work, and waking up suddenly I had allowed this foolish hallucination to possess me for the moment, for hallucination it must be. What more absurd than to connect this prosaic house, tenanted by a couple of young men, with a supernatural presence? Yet it was not without an effort and until after some delay that I went down-stairs again. And how to account for the drawing-room door being open? I am certain I heard Mrs. Bond close it before she went to bed. I looked in. We had made no use of it as yet, and it bore the same untenanted look it had always worn. Shutting the door, I returned to the dining-room, which was just as I had left it. Blowing out the candle I had left lighted there, and stealthily putting my papers away in the drawer, as if afraid of the sound of my own movements, I went up-stairs again, schooling myself to go slowly, yet feeling every moment more assured as each step brought me nearer to the sound of Wyatt peacefully snoring, and then seeking my own room, turned the key. It was now between one and two o'clock. Had not the cottage been so overcast by the shade of trees, I have no doubt a faint glimmering of dawn would have been perceptible in the east. Getting into bed and extinguishing the light, I waited in rapt attention for further sound, but nothing could be heard save the dull murmur of the water passing over the weir higher up the river. The distant village clock struck two, and then three, and it was not until the morning light made the paper on the wall distinct, and resolved all the forms in the room into their proper shape, that I fell asleep.

When I awoke it was broad daylight, and the bright sun streaming on the lawn announced another glorious summer day; and although the occurrence of the night at once returned to my mind, the sight of Wyatt in his boating-flannels coming up from the river after his bathe, whistling as he went, was enough to banish all sense of misgiving. Equally disillusioning was the prosaic voice of Mrs. Bond, outside the door, as she set down the water for my bath, announcing that it was eight o'clock, and that Mr. Wyatt wanted breakfast at half past, in order to catch the 9.30 train. And when I came down-stairs, the view of Wyatt engaged in chopping up some tobacco on the mantelpiece with a penknife, and the cheerful breakfast laid out on the table, was so completely matter-of-fact and commonplace, and at the same time cheerful, that I felt thoroughly ashamed of my nervous alarm of the night. I would put the matter aside, and not think of it one way or the other. And it did not strike me as odd that when Mrs. Bond's niece brought in the kettle to replenish the teapot, she proved to be a short, stout girl of about sixteen, who looked as if she might yet take a start and grow to a proper height, although later in the day I remembered that this left the appearance of the figure in the garden still unaccounted for.

Wyatt set off for the station across the field after breakfast, promising to return by the half past five o'clock train, when we would go for a row on the river; and I announced my resolve of setting to work as soon as he had started, so as to make a good beginning, and get over my day's task before his return, and thus have all the evening free. But with the whole day before me, it seemed only allowable on this the first day to take a little stroll. Down stream, beyond the other strip of wood which closed in the lawn on this side also, were pleasant meadows, in which the cows were taking their first nip after the mowing. The day was hot, but shade could be got everywhere along the hedgerows. After my long sojourn among stuffy streets, the sense of pleasure at drinking in the fresh country air while wandering among these rich meadows by the water, redolent of beauty as they were, was like a feast; it seemed impossible to tear one's self away, and it was not until a degree of appetite asserted itself to which I had for long been a stranger, that I returned to the cottage for luncheon. In my absence the post had arrived, bringing a book from Germany, lately published, and bearing on the subject of my studies, which I had been anxiously looking for. I must now make myself master of some of its contents before proceeding with my own writing, to see how far I have been anticipated. The book was ingenious and original, yet happily still leaving room for the statement of my views on the case, and the afternoon passed quickly and pleasantly enough, as I lay on the grass, by the bank of the stream, with the book for a companion, till the time for Wyatt's return. He must have missed his train, however, for up to six o'clock he had not come; and after waiting till all chance of his arriving by it had passed away, I determined to stroll down to the station to meet him, making, however, a detour by the mill. There would be plenty of time for this, as the next train was not due till seven. Even then we should be able to get out on the river before supper.

The shortest way to the mill was by the path through the wood, parallel to the stream, and some fifty yards distant from it. So overgrown was it that the pathway was barely wide enough for one person to pass, and the shrubs, underwood, and briers gave no view of what lay beyond. It was a perfect jungle. When about halfway through, I noticed what appeared to be the trace of another path turning off to the left — that is, away from the river. The shortest way to the mill was no doubt the one straight on, and this other showed even less sign of being used; but I was seized with a desire to get out of the wood, which this evening was oppressively close, so turned aside. The wood was certainly not so wide as long, and I should probably be able to get out of it the sooner by taking this line.

After pushing my way along for thirty or forty yards, the path opened into a small circular space, explained perhaps by the large oak-tree which checked the undergrowth. Against this were the remains of a rustic seat, consisting of a few planks nailed against the trunk, once painted green, but now fast rotting away. A quiet retreat certainly, and pleasant enough no doubt when this shrubbery was a little better kept; and I wondered whether the young couple whose pictures hung in the drawing-room had ever sat on this bench in their honeymoon days, if they had passed them at the cottage, as seemed probable. But no; I can hardly fancy that gentleman with his hard face, and his curly black whiskers under his square chin, playing the lover, or indulging in much sentiment of any sort. He would expect more attention than he gave, I fancy; and the bride once gained, there would be little of sentiment, or sympathy either, in my gentleman, or I am no judge of character. And the lady, would she be the sort of woman to take the cue from her husband, and to shrink from uncovering the hard side of her lover — content to make the best of him; to humor him when angry, and to play on his weaknesses in his lighter moods? Again, I am mistaken if that is not the face of a woman charged with pride to measure against his selfishness, and vanity against his conceit, — a woman to scorn and upbraid rather than yield without a struggle. If they came here in their honeymoon days, the place had certainly not been used since; it showed no signs of occupation, or even of having been lately visited; but in the centre of the open circle I noticed that the grass had been removed, and the soil raised, as if a beginning had been made of a flower-bed; but no flowers would flourish in a place so gloomy, and the attempt might well be abandoned almost as soon as begun.

Retracing my steps to what in comparison might be called the main path, I went on to the mill, to find the miller standing as before on the bridge over the milldam, smoking his evening pipe. After salutations the miller observed that I need not have come through the wood unless I liked; there was a path round by the orchard and the nine-acre — a daylight route, as one might say; and then proceeded to ask if I found myself comfortable at the cottage.

He put the question in an indifferent tone, but yet I fancied I could detect an expression of curiosity in his face, as if he half expected to hear that I had something to tell.

In company with the miller, and standing there in broad daylight, the alarm of the night had now succeeded to a feeling of indifference, or at most of contempt for myself at allowing my self-possession to be disturbed; but my curiosity was excited by the man's manner, and I asked him somewhat abruptly what he knew about the former occupants of the cottage.

Marking the eagerness of my question, a flash of intelligence passed over the miller's face, but his manner became at once more reserved. They had gone away before he came to the mill, he said, as he had told me before: his brother was here then; he himself was up in Oxfordshire — waving his hand up-stream in the direction indicated — at that time, along with his father. How should he know anything about them?

"Where was his brother now?" I asked; for his evident reserve made me curious.

Well, his brother had emigrated, to be sure — gone to America; and why shouldn't he? He thought he could better himself, and went off; and so he, the speaker, came and took the mill.

Had the man spoken unconcernedly, I should probably have thought no more about it; but I could not help noticing that he seemed to feel I had a sort of power over him, and that although unwilling to give me information, he was also anxious to avoid the appearance of withholding anything. And this made me ask the further question, how long before he came did the lady and gentleman leave?

"A few days before, he," answered rather sulkily, as I thought; he didn't rightly know how long exactly.

"And they went away quite suddenly?" I continued; "and left everything behind them?"

"Yes, they went away without giving notice," said the miller, almost repeating my words, and in a sort of defiant manner.

"And left everything behind them?"

And why shouldn't they? They might come back, perhaps any day, of course. They had the house on lease. But he must go in and have his supper, if I would excuse him. Would I step in and take a glass of anything? Well, then, perhaps I would allow him to take his supper; and so saying, the miller wished me good evening, and turned to go in-doors, while I stepped out towards the station, across the fields, unable to form any conclusion about what had passed, but looking forward with a sense of relief to Wyatt's arrival.

As I passed along the path across the fields from the mill to the village, I met a young woman whom, although I am not quick at remembering faces, I concluded to be the miller's daughter. She gave me a look as of recognition, but passed on without speaking, and I turned round to look after her. Yes, it must have been her I saw; she is tall and slight, although there is certainly nothing graceful or gliding in her gait; she walks as awkwardly as most rustics; it must have been the dim light of evening that threw a glamour over her movements. And under a sudden impulse I called to her, and she stopped and came back a few steps to meet me.

I asked her if it was she who had been down to the cottage on the evening of our first visit.

Yes, she said; she and her sister had been down there that afternoon, to lock it up.

"Your sister?" I asked, — for I remembered that the miller had spoken of sending only one of his daughters. "Then you did not go alone? I thought your father had sent you by yourself? He said so."

"So he did, sir, truly; but my sister was going to the village, so she went along with me. We didn't say nothing to father about it, because he would have said it was nonsense. But I beg your pardon, sir, I must be getting home," and she turned to go on.

"Stay one moment," I said; and then, as she stopped and turned round again, I asked, "Where was your sister when you came out by yourself through the wood?"

"Me come out by the wood!" cried the girl, her mouth opening wide, and her eyes and face alike expressing astonishment; "why, I wouldn't go through the wood for worlds. I should expect to see ——"

"What would you expect to see?" I asked eagerly, interrupting her.

"I beg your pardon, sir," she answered, her manner changing abruptly to one of caution, "I didn't mean anything. I beg your pardon, sir, but father would be very angry if he knew I had been talking to you about such things. I wish you good evening, sir," and bobbing me a curtsy, she turned on her heel and pursued her way to the mill.

Had this conversation passed near the cottage itself, or the grove, or while the events of the night had left their first impression, I believe I should have been startled by this corroboration of my own alarms; as it was, in the broad daylight of these pleasant meadows, with the village and railway station in full view, it was not difficult to succeed in putting aside all sensation of uneasiness; but I could not help looking forward with extreme satisfaction to the return of Wyatt, to whom I determined to communicate my experiences of the night, not without a strong suspicion that my story would be received with considerable ridicule.

Although the sun had not yet set, it was now hidden behind a bank of clouds which had been gathering during the afternoon. The air was still and oppressive; and, never a good walker, I slackened my usual pace for the heat, and thus had the mortification to see the down-train arrive and pass on before I could reach the station. When I got there the passengers by it had already dispersed. As Wyatt did not expect me to meet him, of course he would not have waited for me, and I set off to overtake him along the other footpath, which led also across fields, direct to the cottage. But I could not make him out ahead of me, and on reaching the cottage I found that he had not arrived there. He must have got out at Maddeley, the next station before our own, and be coming up by the river, I made sure; and I wandered down along the bank, in hopes of meeting him, till warned to return by the rolling of distant thunder, and the large drops of rain now beginning to fall.

As I approached the house it was almost dark; the wood beyond it looked more dreary than ever. I almost wondered, looking at it now, that I should have ever ventured to enter it; and I looked uneasily towards it, half expecting to see some mysterious form issuing from its gloomy recesses. But nothing appeared this time, and I hurried indoors, to find a telegram on the table which had been brought from the village in my absence. It was from Wyatt. The governor had sent him into Essex on some business, and he should not be back in time to return that evening, but would come down by the early train in the morning to breakfast, and take a whole holiday.

The feeling of discomfiture produced at first by the news of this desertion, and that I was destined to spend the evening alone, was succeeded by a sense of the absurdity, to say the least, of allowing myself to feel nervous, as I heard the cheerful noise of Mrs. Bond and her niece engaged in preparing supper in the kitchen. The rattle of plates, and the clatter of their voices, were enough to exorcise any demon of timidity and low spirits; and I was able, after a brief toilet, to find complete distraction from such foolish thoughts in the newspapers of the day, which Hannah, the girl, had brought from the village this evening. It was too hot, and I was too tired after my unwonted exercise, to eat much dinner; but I enjoyed all the more the tea which shortly succeeded that meal, and of which, although warned by my doctor to abstain from that form of refreshment at night, I drank even more freely than usual. Some rain fell during dinner, but only the edge of the storm came our way; the rumbling of the thunder could still be heard. The night was still and oppressive; and the windows, although wide open, seemed to let in no air. Awhiles I read, putting off the task of the night from one half-hour to another, hardly disturbed by the inmates of the kitchen taking their supper after mine, and talking, after the fashion of servants, as loudly as if they had been calling to each other from different rooms, instead of being seated at the same table. At another time the noise would have been offensive; just now it was the reverse of disagreeable. About half past ten o'clock Mrs. Bond came in to remove the tea-things; and then, after fastening the drawing-room windows and locking the hall-door, she looked in again to know if I wanted anything more before she went to bed, and wishing me good-night retired.

I was on the point of calling her back, to tell her to open the door of communication at the top of the stairs, but for very shame did not do so; I could not think of any excuse; to say anything about precautions against fire would have sounded ridiculous. I heard her make fast the door leading from the hall into the offices; then there was a certain amount of talking and shutting of doors and windows, followed by steps going up the back staircase, and then the little house became quite still.

Not until then, and I felt absolutely alone, did the terror of I knew not what, against which I had been struggling all day with more or less success, return in full force. Above all, while trying to reassure myself by setting down what I thought I had seen to disordered nerves, there came on my mind, with renewed force, the recollection of the fact that it was not I alone who had to deal with the unaccountable. It could not be the state of my health which made me imagine only that I had heard Wyatt speak of the figure passing into the house from the garden. I was sure he had told me of it. And although the thing had not surprised him, he did not know that the explanation of the appearance which he had suggested, failed altogether to explain it. No! During bright daylight the notion of the supernatural might be dismissed as foolishness; but in my present solitude the possibility seemed real enough. The very silence seemed horrible. I was ready to fancy sounds all round me. But nothing broke the silence. If only Wyatt had been here! or even if the doors in the house had been left open, so that there might have been the sense of security from proximity of other living beings! If only Mrs. Bond's hearty snore could have reached my ears!

Thus I remained for a while under the influence of the terror that possessed me, of I knew not what, yet withal thoroughly ashamed to confess my cowardice, even to myself, till at last, summoning up courage, I lighted the chamber candlestick, and opening the door, placed it on a bracket in the hall, and then quickly returning, but leaving the door ajar, addressed myself to my papers. I had forgotten, as I have mentioned, to bring down any lamps with me, and had commissioned Wyatt that morning to buy three or four cheap ones and bring them down. The darkness of the house during the event of the past night, when the single candle was hardly reflected by the dingy walls of the passage, had contributed not a little to the horror of the situation, and I had resolved to light up all the rooms and passages this evening with a brightness that would banish all chance of a recurrence of such a thing. The non-arrival of these lamps had been almost as keen a disappointment as the absence of Wyatt himself; but even a single candle burning in the hall would be something.

At first the very click of the pen heightened my sense of insecurity, it seemed to challenge a response with the unseen world; but at last the sound became familiar and even soothing. The chime of the village clock at midnight came to remind me that human beings were not so far off; the rattle of a train in the distance passing down the line was even more grateful; I became impressed with a sense of the incompatibility of such matter-of-fact things as railway trains with supernatural apparitions; and for the first time that evening I had succeeded in composing my mind, and concentrating my attention on the work before me. My brain assumed something of its normal activity, and I was getting interested in my work, instead of feeling it to be the distasteful labor which of late had oppressed me. I felt as if I could go on with it all the night through. Say what the doctors might about the importance for health of working only by day, there was nothing like night-work for cultivating the play of fancy and imagination.

Thus I felt for the moment, rather than distinctly thought out the idea, while the busy pen plied its task. But what is that which suddenly makes the hand fall nerveless on the paper, and leaves me bereft of motion save for the quick beating of my heart?

Some one is moving in the drawing-room opposite.

Instinctively I felt that, be it what it may, it is the presence of the night before.

Now I hear the drawing-room door open; the rustling of a dress in the passage.

I started to my feet. At first it seemed as if my limbs would refuse to perform their office; but seizing a candle, I staggered to the door, and opening it wide looked out.

Besides the candle I held in my hand, the light which I had placed in the passage was still burning, so that, dark and dingy as the passage was, it was yet lighted up; and at the other end, in the act of turning to mount the stairs, is the same apparition as had appeared the previous night; the same female figure that had entered the house from the wood. Tall, slight, and erect, robed in dark clothing, the face averted, and the head partly covered by a mantle, the figure was as clearly seen as if it had been daylight. Seen only for a moment, as, passing up the staircase, it disappears from my view.

Surely it must be a real human being, for I can hear the old staircase creak as it makes its way up. Had I stopped to think, I could not have gone on; but under a sudden impulse I too hurried up the staircase after the apparition. Again there is no sign of any moving thing. The landing-place and passage are void of occupant; the passage-door is locked. I peep into the box-room, and again find it empty. There remain only the rooms of Wyatt and myself; and I enter each of these in turn, almost expecting as I do so to find myself face to face with the thing. Seeing nothing in each case, I venture to examine them carefully; but there are no hiding-places; the search is soon ended.

My first impulse after this is to knock loudly at the passage-door and awake the two women; even the sound of my own voice would be a distraction in the horrid silence. But even in my terror I was restrained by shame. Even if they thought me serious, they would put down my impression to mere nervous imagination. Mrs. Bond would think she had more right than ever to tax me with keeping late hours and living on unwholesome diet.

It is an effort to go out again into the passage, still more to go down-stairs; but I manage to do so, and also to look into the drawing-room, the door of which is open, while it was certainly shut before. The room itself shows no signs of having been visited. There is no key to the door; but shutting it I return to the dining-room, the lighted candle in which invites me to enter, and sitting down again I try to compose myself. Surely it must be my disordered health that has conjured up this vision. I was not always such a coward. It must have been mere illusion that I saw something. But no! I was never more convinced of the reality of anything than of the reality of this object. And yet if it be a visitant from the other world, why should I be thus fearful about it? Why should I not boldly face it? I will do so if it comes again; if I hear this sound again on the other side of the door, I will rush out and confront the figure, and intercept it: if incorporeal it will vanish perhaps; if it be real I need not fear to grasp it. What a change has come over you, Philip Merton, that you should be arguing in this way about it, and trying to screw your courage up to the sticking-point! Be yourself, be a man, and do not be afraid of a spirit, if spirit it be. Why should it harm you?

By some such way of reasoning I did succeed in composing myself sufficiently to take up my pen again, and make an effort to continue my writing; not very successfully indeed, for while the hand was busy the ear was on the strain to catch the sound if it should recur.

And while in this state, the hand falls helpless, the cold sweat bursts out, the very blood seems to curdle within me, as I am again startled by the sound of something moving, this time close to me, outside the open window, just on the other side of the table. Good God! why am I to be tormented with these horrid visions? This time it is the figure of a man. The light of a candle comes between us, so that the figure is only obscurely made out in the darkness — the figure of a tall, dark man. I can just distinguish a sort of cloak covering the figure, and the glance of a searching eye under a slouched hat.

I sank back speechless and powerless in my chair. I felt my heart stand still, then begin beating again as if it would burst.

Suddenly a sound issued from the apparition. It spoke.

"How long have you been here?"

The voice, although low and cautious, sounded harsh and hollow, but it reassured me. This was no apparition. This at least was a human being. And sinister though the man looked, the presence of one was a sort of comfort.

I made no answer, for my voice literally stuck in my throat; nor did I want to show the fear that possessed me.

"I could not help myself," continued the voice; "I stayed away; I wandered here and there. I tried to get rid of it; but I had to come back after all. I saw that you were alone, and I thought I would come in. You have got no evidence against me," the man continued, moving back as I stood up, for at the continued sound of the human voice my prostration had ceased. "You have got no evidence against me. I don't want to hurt you," he added, as I started back on the threatening attitude he assumed. "I don't want to hurt any one. I have got enough of that on my mind to last me my life. Look here," he went on, in the same stealthy voice; "I have been tramping all the day, and I'm damnably wet and thirsty. Haven't you got a drop of spirits in the place?"

It seemed to me from the man's manner that he had been drinking already; but to be engaged in the homely office of supplying liquor was an agreeable diversion from the occupation of the night. Wyatt's brandy-bottle was on the sideboard. I took it up, and was about to mix some for him with water, but he whispered to me impatiently from the window to hand him the bottle and glass. He poured out nearly half a tumbler and drank it off.

"How long have you been here?" he repeated, as he set down the glass on the window-sill. "Only two days!" he said, as if to himself, after I had answered him. "So if I had come sooner I should have found the place shut up! Only two days! Only two years since we two were living here, she and I; and the place doesn't seem much changed. Only two years!" he continued turning round, and again speaking as if to himself. "Only two years since she and I were here together! it seems like two hundred. Look here," he continued, turning round again, and stepping over the window-sill into the room; "I want just to see the other room. I have come several thousand miles to see it, I tell you. Yes, I know the way well enough;" and taking up one of the candles, he led the way into the drawing-room. I followed him.

He looked round the little room, casting a curious look on the floor by the hearth, as if he expected to see something on the faded carpet, and then, advancing towards the fireplace, held the candle up to the picture of the woman above it, before which he stood gazing, the expression on his face a strange mixture of terror and ferocity.

As he did so, the light fell also on the portrait of the man. I saw then who my visitor was. Altered though the features were — brute though he looked now, unkempt and sodden, and disfigured by drink — it was still the same face; and he had been a fine-looking man once.

A few moments he stood thus, his hand trembling as he held up the candle. Then he turned the light on his own picture, and looking back on me with a scowl mixed with a drunken leer, said, "Damn it, drink and bad nights change a fellow, don't they? But I was a good-looking chap enough then."

Just what I was thinking.

"Yes; and Judith was a fine woman too, and no mistake. We were a handsome couple as you would wish to see. And I never, never cared for any woman as I cared for her. She could be pleasant enough, too, when she liked. O Judith, Judith, my girl!" he continued, turning again to the picture, "why couldn't you keep that damned temper of yours under a bit? You might have been here now, and me too, quiet and happy, instead of wandering about the world, afraid to show my face anywhere, regularly gone to the dogs." And he stood looking at the woman's face remorsefully.

"Look here," he said, turning round fiercely to me, although still speaking under his breath, "I didn't pretend to be better than other fellows. The women used to run after me, and how could I help being a bit gay? She knew that when she took me. But I would have treated her well all the same, if she would have taken me as I was. What right had she to open my letters, I should like to know? A man who has lived gay can't get square and right all of a sudden."

"That's how it happened," he continued, after a pause, as if he were trying to restrain an insuperable impulse to speak out; "a nice thing for a man, isn't it, when he comes home after a day's worry, and wants to have a quiet time of it, to find his wife behaving like a perfect devil? That's how it happened," he went on, in a hoarse whisper, while the foam stood on his dry, parched lips. "That's where she stood, there, behind the door, when she pulled out the letter — my letter from the other woman, and marked private — and shrieked at me till they might have heard her up at the village; called me a perjured villain, and said she wouldn't let me touch her again. I let her go on for a bit," continued he, with a cunning leer; "I knew it was no good stopping her in her tantrums; and it was a bit hard on her to find she was not the only woman who thought me a fine man. Then she went away upstairs, and I thought it was all over. Oh! why didn't she stay there? I thought she would go to bed and sulk a bit, and that we should make it up in the morning. But no; down she came again, and walked up just here," dragging me back, and pointing to the hearth, "and began again just as bad as ever. Declared she would go off at daybreak, and that that other fellow was ready to receive her, and that she had always cared for him more than me. I wasn't going to stand that, you know. What fellow would that had any respect for himself? I told her to hold her tongue or I'd make her; I told her she was telling a damned lie, and she knew it. Oh! why would she go on? Look here; on my oath, I didn't mean to hurt her — I only meant to frighten her a bit. I thought if she found out my rough side she would learn to hold her tongue. Look here," he went on, in a hoarse whisper, pulling me further back, and holding out the candle with his other hand; "that's where she stood, looking a very devil in her rage and beauty, just by the picture; and there," he said, pointing downwards, "is where she fell. I didn't mean it, I say; I swear I didn't mean it. Her head struck the fender. She never moved again. And I've been punished for it, and she knows it. She will never give me any rest as long as she lies where she does. Look here," he went on again; "how could I help doing what I did afterwards? How was I to go and tell? How could I prove it was an accident? I didn't mean to hurt her. Come away from this," he continued, wiping the sweat from his brow with his sleeve, and moved back into the other room, whither I followed him.

The brandy-bottle was still on the table. He poured out another large glass, and drank it off. Far from making him more drunk, it seemed to steady him. "You must know the whole of it," he said, as he put down the glass. "Come along with me. You're not afraid, are you?" he said, with a sneering smile, as he noticed my sudden drawing back; "I wouldn't hurt a fly to-night. Come along, I must make a clean breast of it, or I shall go mad. Come along," and so saying, he stepped out into the veranda, pulling me by the arm.

But I made no difficulty about following him, and he let go my sleeve. I knew whither he was leading. He said truly that I had been frightened at first, but I was so no longer.

He led the way across the lawn to the grove. Dark though the night was, he made as if by instinct for the path that led through it. The wet leaves showered their drops on us as we brushed through the narrow passage. Suddenly he stopped as if in doubt about his way. I knew what he was looking for. "Here it is," he whispered, and turned up the narrow pathwap to the glade which I had visited the previous afternoon.

We reached the glade, knowing that we were there more by the freedom from the pressure of shrubs and branches than from the sight, although the clouds had now passed away, and it was a starlight night.

"Here is the place," said the man, grasping my arm, and speaking in a whisper close to my ear. "No; don't step on it; keep back; perhaps she hears us: there, down there, just in front, is where it is. I carried her there myself, that very night. All night long I dug. It was just such a night as this, as hot as hell. And all the time I was digging she lay there and never moved; and I covered in the grave, and she never moved; and then I ran off, and wrote to say we had both gone away suddenly together. She never moved then, all the time I was at work, but she never leaves me alone now. I used to think it was all fancy, and the brandy; but it is just as bad when I am sober. Hush! perhaps she is listening to us now; but she never comes except when I am alone.

"Now you know why I wanted you. The thing that lies under here must not be allowed to stay there. I shall know no peace till it is moved away, and put into the churchyard; then, perhaps, she will leave me alone. You must promise me that. You'll do it for your own sake, I know. I shall be far away again, but I shall hear about it. I shall know if it is done; and if it isn't, I shall come back and trouble you again. Come away, we have been here long enough." And so saying, the man turned and led the way back to the main path. That reached, he made as if about to start off, but stopping again, seized me by the hand, and went on.

"I haven't told you all yet. There was one man nearly found me out. I was coming out of this infernal place, just at daybreak, when I met a man, — it was the miller. My plan for concealment was discovered. He would know that I was alone, — that she was not with me. No! I didn't kill him, though I was minded to; I got him to leave his mill, and come right away to America then and there. He didn't know what I was after in this wood, and I never let him come here to find out. I never lost sight of him till I got him out of the place; but he suspects, and I have nearly ruined myself trying to keep him quiet. But he may blab now if he likes, and he won't get any more out of me. I am not going back there again to lead that cursed life."

Then he added, "Now you had better go back to the house; I ain't afraid of your following me, but mind you keep quiet till morning, or it will be worse for you. I know my way out of this." And so saying, he passed on in the direction of the mill, and in an instant I felt rather than saw that I was alone.

To hasten instantly out of the wood and regain the open lawn was my first impulse. Thence I could see the light still burning in the parlor, but I had not courage to enter the house again, still less could I stay where I was and brave another meeting with the apparition. I was now standing in the very spot where I had first seen it, as it moved from the wood into the house; and as soon as I remembered this, I hurried towards the field at the back of the cottage, and so by the path across the field to the village. In these open spaces, tenanted by the quiet cattle, whose forms could be made out recumbent on the grass, there could be no pursuit of these horrors.

By the time I reached the village the first ray of dawn could be made out, and it was soon light. And with the light my courage returned, although the anxiety possessed me not the less strongly to pursue the mystery to an end, if only to satisfy myself that all the scenes I had passed through were not merely the creations of a disordered and enfeebled brain. Faint though I was and weary, my head seemed clear enough, and presently a draught of milk, obtained from an early milkman, gave me some strength. If Wyatt really came as he had promised, by the first train, he would be here at seven o'clock.

The sun rose bright and unclouded, but I had still a long time to wait. Under different circumstances, there would have been abundant scope for enjoyment in watching the gradual birth of another lovely summer's day — all nature refreshed by the night's rain. But now I was only weary and impatient.

The train arrived. Wyatt stepped out, the only passenger for this station. He quite started on seeing me; my face and appearance evidently reflected the excitement I had gone through.

To his anxious inquiry what was the matter with me, I could only reply by urging him to press homewards. He should see and judge for himself what was the matter. And at last Wyatt, seeing my condition, gave up questioning, and we pursued our course in silence.

Entering the vegetable garden by the back gate, we came to the little tool-shed. A spade was lying there which I took up and gave to Wyatt, and taking a hoe myself, I led the way to the grove. Arrived at the little glade, I pointed to the mound in the centre, and beginning to ply the hoe, urged him to dig too.

He set to work; but after a few strokes I was compelled to stop from want of strength. Never since childhood had I felt so weak and helpless. Leaning on the hoe, gasping for breath, I urged Wyatt to his task.

He dug away, casting every now and then a doubting look at me, as if he questioned my sanity. The morning was hot, and Wyatt, though a sturdy fellow, began to feel the strain of the unwonted exercise, taken while fasting; and at last he stopped, and leaning on his spade, looked sulkily at me, as if to say that he had humored me enough.

I replied to his look of reproach by taking the spade from him, and stepping into the hole which he had made, resumed the work of digging. But my labor did not accomplish much; nerves and muscles were both equally relaxed.

Wyatt stood watching my feeble efforts for a time, wiping his brow with his shirt-sleeve. At last, observing that if this tom-foolery was to go on, it had better be done by him, he stepped into the hole again, and taking the spade from me, set to work.

But he too was tired, and did not work with a will; he began grumbling to himself as he dug, speaking in an undertone.

Suddenly he stopped digging, and looked down eagerly. His spade had caught in something.

It was a piece of rag of some sort. The spade severed it easily, and a fragment was thrown up with the earth, and lay exposed on the top of the soil. Another portion could be seen still in the hole, mixed with the loose earth.

My companion's listless manner had left him; he dug now with a will, throwing up large spadefuls quickly.

Presently the spade again met with an obstacle. Something stayed below, when the loose earth was thrown up, projecting above what was left.

Is it a stone or a piece of decayed wood?

Wyatt stopped digging and stooped down to look at it, but drew back again quickly with an exclamation of disgust.

I drew close to the spot, and kneeling, looked down too. The thing was not wood. It was the end of a human foot; the long bones could be seen, with some decomposed flesh still hanging to them.

Wyatt looked at me for a time, in silence, then he got out of the grave, and laying down the spade, said, "We had better not deal with this matter alone; let us get somebody else to go on with the job. Let us go and call the miller."

He put on his coat and led the way. I followed him — taking a last glance round to where the silent witness of the foul deed protruded from the soil — along the narrow path through the grove, till we got into the open meadow. Then we walked along side by side.

"Not now," said my friend, as I essayed to speak; "tell me all about it by-and-by, when you are cooler. I beg your pardon for having doubted you."

We walked on in silence. As we drew in sight of the mill, we saw a couple of persons, women, standing on the bridge which crossed the race. They were the miller's daughters. They hardly noticed us as we came up; they were staring in rapt attention, looking down towards the stream where the stakes were, at the tail of the race.

As we came up with them, the miller appeared from his house carrying a rake and a rope.

"Another drunken fellow, I suppose," he said, "missed his way over the bridge last night;" and so saying, passed down the bank towards the stakes. We followed him with the girls.

As we approach the spot a dark, limp mass can be made out in the water, swayed idly to and fro by the eddy of the stream.

It needed not to see the bloated features, as they dragged the body out of the water, to tell me who it was. I knew from the first moment that I was once more face to face with the visitant of that dread night.

Note by Mr. Wyatt. — The foregoing account was the last thing my poor friend wrote, and finding it among his papers, carefully corrected, as if intended for publication, I believe I am justified in publishing it for the benefit of his estate. The truth of it is of course sufficiently corroborated by the discovery of the body of the woman, precisely as described, and of the drowned man, and the interest which the matter excited at the time will be fresh in the recollection of many. Of the occurrences of the night there was no other witness than himself, and the reader must judge how far it was colored by the condition of his health, the melancholy state of which has been only too faithfully portrayed in his narrative. I can only say that to the day of his death, which happened only a few weeks after the events described, my poor friend always asserted in the strongest terms the truth of what he has written; and the only shade which passed over our friendship during his last illness arose from my having ventured to express somewhat too strongly my doubt whether he was not laboring under a delusion. I am bound in candor to add that his belief in the apparition seems to have been fully shared by the female occupants of the mill, although expressed by them under great reserve. The miller's connection with his brother, the former occupant of the mill, was never fully cleared up; and I cannot but corroborate my friend's account of my having myself seen the female figure passing from the house to the wood, exactly as he describes it, although I should be sorry to say with equal confidence that the appearance was not susceptible of rational explanation. — T. THE RETREAT, STAINHAM LOCK, October, 1878.

From The Saturday Review.

THE SORROWS OF LORD PENZANCE.

THE ingenious schoolboy who, when he was asked to explain the principle of the common pump, boldly took refuge in his knowledge of the binomial theorem would doubtless have made a most excellent dean of the arches. He failed, it is true, at the time to satisfy an examiner whose narrow sympathies were fixed upon the pump, and who could not be brought to appreciate at its right value any display of learning that did not include the required explanation. But the largeness of the boy's view and the liberty of his method have not been left without due recognition; and if we look to an address delivered last Saturday in the Arches Court we shall find that they have, in fact, supplied Lord Penzance with an invaluable precedent. The circumstances of the two cases are indeed almost identical. In common with the schoolboy Lord Penzance found himself in a very embarrassing position. He had been asked to deliver a judgment in the case of "Combe v. Edwards," and unfortunately he had no judgment to deliver. But, although he could not do what was required of him, there was something that he could do, and the opportunity was not to be missed. He had prepared an elaborate essay upon the conduct of the lord chief justice of England, and this stood to him in the place of the schoolboy's binomial theorem. Before he could persuade himself to inform the court that he could not "proceed to punish Mr. Edwards," he found it incumbent upon him to deliver a speech which occupies nearly five columns of the Times. This lengthy harangue, it must be observed, no more affected the final decision at which he was forced to arrive than the binomial theorem affected the working of the common pump. It was an independent effort of genius and learning, the beauty of which is not to be estimated by its service to the particular matter in hand. But we are not on that account to value it the less. If Lord Penzance had waited for an appropriate occasion for saying what he has now said, the world would have been deprived altogether of a very vivacious and entertaining criticism upon a brother judge. He has therefore boldly proceeded according to a method sanctioned by the admirable text-books of Ollendorff. It has often been noticed in regard to these little manuals for the acquirement of foreign languages that, in the dialogues provided for the use of the student, the question and answer are sometimes curiously divergent. Lord Penzance, it would seem, has been struck by the beauty of the system, and has aspired to emulate its quaintness. To the inquiry, "Have you a judgment in the case of the Rev. Mr. Edwards?" he is practically compelled to return a negative answer; but he hastens to add, with evasive eloquence, "I have a prolix attack on the lord chief justice of England."

This single sentence may be taken as indicating the substance of an oration which is decked out with many ornaments of style, and is occasionally distinguished by an uncommon energy of expression. To appreciate its peculiar force and to do justice to the talents of its author, we must be careful not to dwell overmuch upon mere legal technicalities. There is indeed a formidable array of legal authorities; but they serve only as "the trappings and the suits" of Lord Penzance's woe. A load of learning sufficient to oppress a less passionate spirit is here lightly borne along the strong current of personal grief; and in the course of a protracted soliloquy the dean of the arches sounds all the various stops of suffering and regret. He passes from innocent surprise to absolute dismay, from blank incredulity to the most righteous anger, and from vehement indignation to a sentiment of almost tender pity, until at last we are left to wonder that any human being could be so heartless as to be deaf or indifferent to his appeal. That the lord chief justice, at sight of the ruin he has wrought, will be filled with remorse, we cannot doubt; but our concern for the moment is rather with the victim than with the culprit. Like Constance in "King John," poor Lord Penzance can only sit down with his sorrows and rail against authority. He has become so enamored of his grief that, if the baleful prohibition were now withdrawn, he would perhaps be afflicted with a sense of positive deprivation. Constance found it a source of comfort to be allowed "to curse awhile;" and, like that deeply injured lady, Lord Penzance, having discovered that "law itself is perfect wrong," asks no more than to exhibit to the world the spectacle of an intolerable grief. We know there are careless and cynical persons who will grudge the sympathy which the sight of such suffering should command. Heartless sticklers for conventional usage, they will even deny that the bench is a fitting place for the study or display of the emotions, and they will resent the introduction of what Mr. Arnold would describe as "the lyrical cry" into the prim and precise forms of legal rhetoric. But a generous and impulsive nature like that of Lord Penzance is not to be controlled by these petty limitations. His tender tale of woe will find a response wherever a strain of true poetry is mingled with the coarser fibre of our humanity, and with such an audience he can afford to dispense with the frigid approbation of common sense. Those who are really capable of appreciating the moral dignity of his attitude will perceive that his sorrow is as unselfish as it is intense. In the moment of peril he thinks more of his queen than of himself. He can scarcely bear to dwell upon the consequences of a decision by which "the court of her Majesty in council" is dubbed an "inferior court;" he trembles at the awful prospect of a writ of prohibition being one day directed personally to the sovereign herself. And even in dealing with the lord chief justice he exhibits a sentiment of almost respectful pity towards the failings which he is bound in the discharge of a painful duty to expose. He does not spare the rod, and yet out of the fulness of his affection he would fain spoil the child. It is, indeed, truly edifying to see how these brethren on the bench love one another. That the lord chief justice's judgment was marked by almost every kind of judicial incapacity, Lord Penzance is forced to admit. The errors are so many and so grave that the injured dean of the arches is almost overpowered by the mere labor of enumerating them. He is appalled at the extent of the ignorance of which the lord chief justice is convicted; he is lost in amazement at the manner in which the principles of ecclesiastical law have been misconceived. But while all this is made abundantly clear to us, we are allowed to perceive the sense of acute pain which the process of punishment brings to him who has to inflict it. The manifest incompetence of his brother touches him with a feeling of almost personal shame and humiliation. He watches the overthrow of a great reputation with that kind of benevolent sympathy which Cæsar displayed over the wreck of the splendid talents of Antony. And yet he feels, as Cæsar felt, that there is no possibility of salvation. "If," says Lord Penzanze, "the highest ability, the most extended industry, and what all must know to be the most earnest desire and intention to arrive at a right conclusion, can only produce a result so much to be deplored, what hope will there be in future for the ecclesiastical courts when their practice may come to be handled by ability less exceptional and with industry less marked?" The sight of this result so much to be deplored, and the outlook towards that dark future which seems to hide other results so much more deplorable, have the effect of transporting the suffering spirit of Lord Penzance into the purer air of abstract priciples. Securely poised above the heads of common humanity, he lets fall upon the lifeless reputation of the lord chief justice a few valedictory sentences of an inspired and oracular character. "The picture of law triumphant and justice prostrate is not, I am aware, without admirers. To me it is a sorry sight." He names no names, we may observe, but the force of such a reproof is irresistible. And, again, we are told that "the law is, or ought to be, but the handmaid of justice; and inflexibility, which is the most becoming robe of the former, often serves to render the latter grotesque." These are dark riddles hard to decipher. They evidently point to some sort of impropriety, but what may have been its nature or who may be the guilty parties we are not allowed to know. If the lord chief justice has been going about in a becoming robe of inflexibility, his conduct is no doubt open to criticism; but even this style of dressing is to be preferred to that of Justice, who, according to Lord Penzance's account, has no robe at all.

No doubt we shall have further light upon these points when the whole case comes up for consideration in a higher court. We shall then also perhaps be allowed to know whether there is even a glimmer of hope for the shattered reputation of the lord chief justice. It is just possible, after all, that Lord Penzance has been speaking rather as an advocate than as a judge; and, if so, there will be doubtless something to say on the other side. In the dim religious light of Lambeth the case of the luckless author of the prohibition seems desperate indeed, but in the purer air of Westminster he may possibly regain his fame and name. In the mean time, it would perhaps be as well that we should have no more of these passionate soliloquies. To see Lord Penzance in the part of justice triumphing over Lord Chief Justice Cockburn in the less sympathetic rôle of law may be an entertaining sight for the populace, but it will bring only a very moderate amount of honor to the bench. Let Lord Penzance try if he cannot wear the garment of inflexibility just for a little while. We will not forget that he is justice if he will only consent to assume for the nonce the unattractive guise of law. Even the very best performers sometimes accept inferior parts, and however little at first he may relish the exchange, it will not prove uninstructive. And to the public it will be an unmixed good. They will be spared the spectacle of a judge in tears, their hearts will not be torn with pity for the terrible sufferings of the bench, and, what is more, they may even after long lapse of years come back to the innocent belief that the lord chief justice is not entirely devoid of learning or intellectual power. If, on the other hand, judges are to be encouraged to express their opinions of one another, there will soon not be left upon the bench a single reputation.

From The Spectator.

CLERICAL SELF-CONCEIT.

THE new Bishop of Rochester, Dr. Thorold, in his spirited pastoral, attacks rather sharply, though very good-naturedly, the self-conceit of some of the younger clergy. "Is it too caustic," he says, "is it even unjust, to say that a predominant feature in some of the very young clergy of our own time is a superb self-conceit? True, if it is nothing worse, it may soon mend. Years, experience, the widening horizon of knowledge, intercourse with other minds, enlarged responsibility, and sometimes a little wholesome neglect, all concur to cure a disease which your fathers suffered from before you were born, and which you will see and endure in your children." And no doubt the bishop is right that, on the whole, conceit is not only common in the younger clergy, as it is among the young men of every profession, but decidedly commoner among them than among their equals in age elsewhere. Not that we agree with Dr. Thorold in regarding this self-conceit as the opposite of humility. The opposite of humility is pride; and we should think it quite possible that a good many of the young clergy to whom Dr. Thorold attributes this "superb self-conceit" may, after all, in the proper sense of the term, have in them at least the making of genuinely humble-minded men, not in the least disposed to confide too much in their own strength, because it is their own, or to despise the help they know themselves to need. Conceit differs from pride in being founded on illusion. Pride, on the contrary, is not founded on illusion, but on a deliberate preference for self-centred action; it rejects help, because it is help; it repudiates the idea of dependence, even when dependence would be not only right, but a duty; it endeavors to stand alone, even when standing alone involves failure, rather than lean upon another. But conceit rests upon a "conceit," — that is, on a vain fancy; it has more of an intellectual than of a moral origin; it decks out the self in false colors, and so misleads the judgment; while pride usually, far from overrating the self, not unfrequently somewhat underrates it, though chafing angrily at the knowledge that that self is not stronger and better than it is. If this be the real meaning of self-conceit, as distinguished from pride, we should say that Dr. Thorold is quite right in attributing to the younger clergy a much larger measure of self-conceit than belongs even to the young of any other profession, but mistaken in regarding, as he evidently does, this self-conceit as the very antithesis of humility. Nothing is commoner than to find vanity, and the self-conceit which feeds vanity, in minds which are, on the whole, substantially humble, which are not really intolerant of the consciousness of owing much to others, but are merely under the misleading influence of egotistic illusions, or it may be, caste illusions, — the illusions of an order filled with fanciful ideas of its own greatness and dignity. Pride is not the vice of the clergy, — of the Anglican clergy at all events, — for pride springs up out of an hereditary dislike to be laid under obligations to others; out of the attitude of mind which, while it is often wont to bestow much, resents help and sympathy as an insult, — a habit of feeling almost impossible to the English clergy, and especially so to curates. But to the illusions of self-conceit probably no men are more liable than young curates, and indeed young ministers of all denominations, especially those whose theory of their office compels them to attach to it the notion of high supernatural functions, of which they alone are the channels. And it is worth considering why this self-conceit is so characteristic of the younger clergy that it has become almost a classical attribute of theirs, — one which Miss Austen noticed and described most effectively at the beginning of this century, in her pictures of Mr. Collins and Mr. Elton; while, forty years later, Miss Brontë made it one of the chief features of "Shirley," in her picture of Mr. Helstone's curate and his friends.

One of the obvious reasons for self-conceit in the younger clergy is that the profession itself has, of course, a certain attraction for the fancy of men who are by constitution somewhat vain and egotistical. It puts them early in a conspicuous position, and in one surrounded by a good deal of official respect. Hence it attracts conceit, especially conceit which is honestly mingled with a good deal of sincere desire to alleviate the misfortunes and griefs of others. Then, again, the clerical office demands no very alarming apprenticeship, no apprenticeship of a kind to repel superficial ability by the severity of its conditions. A well-meaning man, with a good deal of sympathy for his fellow-creatures, and a good deal of pleasure in any display of that sympathy which enables him to see himself in a graceful and conspicuous position, is very apt to turn instinctively towards the clerical office, as one likely to satisfy both the higher and the feebler part of his nature, and to satisfy it without requiring any very forced march of preliminary preparation. The immediate possession of a position of some dignity and importance, at but little cost of labor and ability, has a great fascination, of course, for men who love to think pleasantly of themselves, at the same time that they are doing good, or believe that they are doing good, to others. This is the first and perhaps one of the most important reasons why the clerical profession, both in the Established Church and in other sects, but especially in the Established Church, is apt to attract young men of amiable disposition, who like conspicuousness, like a position guarded from the fierce jostlings of competitive life, and do not like to be put out of conceit with themselves by attempting tasks in which they are pretty sure to fail, and in which the evidence of failure, where failure is the result, is of a perfectly unmistakable kind. It takes a long time to fail as a clergyman; or at least to be sure that you have failed. It takes a long time even to have the first sanguine self-complacency taken out of you. Probably in no profession are the earnest men who have really struggled to do their duty, so sure to be put out of conceit with themselves before they grow old. In no profession is the sense of inadequacy deeper even amongst the ablest, and of total failure commoner amongst the feeblest. But it takes time, and the gradually purged sight of sincere spiritual aims, to produce this change of feeling. There is so much of complacency involved in the mere consciousness of religious aims, — and so much of artificial protection against the rubs of life, in the charm of a clerical position, — that no young men come so late to a knowledge of their own failures and incompetencies as young clergymen, — especially if they be, as they often are, attracted into the profession by the promise of that very guarded prestige which makes it so slow a business to get experience of blunders. There is more to feed the vanity of a young clergyman than of any other professional junior. There is less to mortify it. On both sides alike there is an artificial protection, and as it were a hot-house life for such conceit as is always natural to the young who have passed through no discipline having a special tendency to remove it.

In the next place, there is something in the mere idea of being made, in any special sense, the channels of divine grace to men, — even if it be only in the way of delivering a message, and much more so in the case of those who think that besides proclaiming a message, they are the exclusive conductors of sacramental grace, — which necessarily lends itself at first to egotistic illusions and self-conceits. It is perfectly true, of course, that clergymen only devote themselves to the work of making God known to men in a rather more special sense than the laity, — that they do nothing which the laity cannot do in almost equal degree, and that what they do they do under some considerable disadvantages, to which laymen who really believe in God are not equally exposed. But however true this may be, and however frankly a good many of the clergy may assure themselves and their people that they believe it to be true, it is not easy for young men suddenly thrust into a position of at least apparent authority and conspicuousness, to realize that it is true. They call themselves ambassadors of God, which in a sense they are; in the same sense, namely, in which all men and women who have a deep conviction that God speaks through their consciences, are ambassadors also. But they are so, as it were, professionally. If they do not declare God's purposes to men, they are worse than nothing. And for a time the consciousness of such a position naturally elates young men who are not aware of their own manifold inefficiencies. The ambassador always fancies that there is some gratifying reason why he, and not another, should fill that office. Soon, perhaps, he finds out that there is a reason, and a good one, but not a gratifying one at all, — it may be that his character may have needed the special protection of the clerical position to keep it clear of gross moral defaults, — that his talent lies rather in the power to deal with words and thoughts than with things; that he has more power of transmitting than originating; that he delivers messages better than he fights battles. But for a time the sense of elation at being an ambassador of God's at all, turns the head of young men.

Nevertheless, we do not believe that there is a profession in the world so humiliating, in the best, but also the most painful sense of the word, as the clergyman's; and this is, we think, its real effect in the long run. This "superb self-conceit" of the younger clergymen and ministers of religion soon works off. Even the genuine priest, who believes with all his heart that his agency is employed by God to absolve from sin, to create anew in every mass the body and blood of an incarnate God, to offer up the divine sacrifice for the dying and the dead, — even he soon learns how little there is in his work in which he has the least right to indulge satisfaction, how much of failure clings to him at every step, how infinitely poor are his achievements. Talk to any of the best of the Irish priesthood, and though you will find a habit of mind almost necessarily authoritative, and even imperious, — necessarily we mean considering the position forced upon them in their little community, — you will hardly ever find any self-conceit, usually a profound humility, bred of deep and frequent failure. And still more is this the case with those ministers of religion who attach no overweening importance to their own agency as priests or ministers, who regard themselves rather as laymen selected for a particular duty, than as a spiritual caste at all. The self-conceit of the younger clergy is very natural, and as we believe, very superficial. It passes away usually before middle age, in all but the weakest-minded; it is transformed into the very opposite quality, — deep self-distrust, — before old age is upon them. Clerical self-conceit is a harmless sort of folly, at worst; and is so far from being essentially incompatible with true humility, that very often we think it is the earliest phase of what afterwards becomes humility, just as a woman who is a little vain about the accident of beauty will often, as her character deepens, and she sees how little it is worth, become all the humbler for her former vanity. For self-conceit is a very different thing from pride; it is a certain self-occupation with superficial advantages of person or position, and not a deep passion for self, such as makes the sense of indebtedness to others seem an almost intolerable burden.

From The Fortnightly Review.

A RAJPUT CHIEF OF THE OLD SCHOOL.*

Moribundus Loquitur.

I.

AND why say ye that I must leave
This pleasure-garden, where the sun
Is baffled by the boughs that weave
Their shade o'er my pavilion?
The trees I planted with my hands,
This house I built among the sands,
Within a lofty wall which rounds
This green oasis, kept with care;
With room for my horses, hawks, and hounds —
And the cool arcade for my ladies fair.

II.

How often, while the landscape flames
With heat, within the marble court
I lie and laugh to see my dames
About the shimmering fountain sport;
Or after the long scorching days,
When the hot wind hushes, and falling stays
The clouds of dust, and stars are bright,
I've spread my carpets in the grove,
And talked and loitered the livelong night
With some foreign leman light o' love.

III.

My wives — I married, as was fit,
Some thirteen of the purest blood —
And two or three have germs of wit,
And almost all are chaste and good;
But all their womanhood has been
Hencooped behind a marble screen;
They count their pearls and doze — while she,
The courtezan, had travelled far,
Her songs were fresh, her talk was free
Of the Delhi court, or the Kábul war.

IV.

Those days are gone — I am old and ill,
Why should I move? I love the place;
The dawn is fresh, the nights are still —
Ah yes! I see it in your face,
My latest dawn and night are nigh,
And of my clan a chief must die
Within the ancestral rampart's fold
Paced by the listening sentinel,
Where ancient cannon, and beldames old
As the guns, peer down from the citadel.

V.

Once more, once only, they shall bear
My litter up the steep ascent
That pierces, mounting stair on stair,
The inmost ring of battlement.
Oft-times that frowning gate I've past
(This time, but one, shall be the last),
Where the tribal dæmon's image stands
Crowning the arch, and on the side
Are scarlet prints of women's hands —
Farewell! and forth must the lady ride,

VI.

Her face unveiled, in rich attire,
She strikes the stone with fingers red —
"Farewell the palace, to the pyre
We follow, widows of the dead!"
And I, whose life has reached its verge,
Bethink me of the wailing dirge
That day my father forth was borne,
High seated, swathed in many a shawl,
By priests who scatter flowers, and mourn —
And the eddying smoke of the funeral.

VII.

Thus did he vanish. With him went Seven women, by the flames set free;
I built a stately monument
To shrine their graven effigy:
In front my father, godlike, stands;
The widows kneel with folded hands;
All yearly rites are duly paid,
All round are planted sacred trees,
And the ghosts are soothed by the spreading shade,
And lulled by the strain of the obsequies.

VIII.

His days were troubled; his curse I earned
Full often, ere he passed that arch,
My father, by his farms we burned
By raiding on the English march;
And then that summer I rebelled,
One fort we seized, and there we held Until my father's guns grew hot;
But the floods and darkness veiled our flight,
We rode their lines with never a shot,
For the matches were moist in the rainy night.

IX.

That's forty years ago, and since,
With all these wild unruly clans,
In this salt wilderness, a prince
Of camel-riding caterans,
I've sought religiously, Heaven knows,
A life of worship and repose,
Vext by the stiff, ungrateful league
Of all my folk in fretful stir,
By priest and gods in dark intrigue,
And the wasting curse of the sorcerer.

X.

They say I seized their broad estates,
Upbraid me with a kinsman's blood;
He led his bands before my gates,
And then — it was an ancient feud.
But I must offer gifts, and pray
The Brahmin's stain be washed away —
Saint and poisoner, fed with bribes,
Deep versed in every traitorous plan —
I told them only to kill the scribes,
But my Afghans hated the holy man.

XI.

Yes, peace is blessed, and prayer is good;
My eldest son defied my power;
I lost his mother in the wood
That hides my lonely hunting-tower;
She was a proud unbroken dame;
Like son, like mother, hard to tame
Or tire — and so he took the bent,
His mother's kinsfolk at his heel,
With many a restless malcontent —
There were some had ease, ere I sheathed my steel.

XII.

The English say I govern ill,
That laws must silence spear and gun,
So may my peaceful subjects till;
But peaceful subjects have I none.
I can but follow my father's rule,
I cannot learn in English school;
Yet the hard world softens, and change is best,
My sons must leave the ancient ways,
The folk are weary, the land shall rest,
And the gods are kind, for I end my days.

XIII.

Then carry me to my castle steep,
Whose time is ending with its lord's:
Eight months my grandsire held the keep
Against the fierce Maratta hordes;
It would not stand three winter suns
Before the shattering English guns;
And so these rude old faithful stones,
My fathers' haven in high war-tide,
Must rive and moulder, as soon my bones
Shall bleach on the holy river-side.

XIV.

Years hence, when all the earth is calm,
And forts are level, and foes agree
To leave their fighting, trade and farm,
And toil, like oxen, patiently,
When this my garden palace stands
A desert ruin, choked with sands,
A broken well 'mid trees that fade,
Some traveller still my name may bless,
The chief lang syne that left him shade
And a water-spring in the wilderness.

A. C. LYALL.
