And now to return to the subject of the Conference:

After considerable thought the State Department finally decided to invite the Chinese to send a delegation. It was the first time China had ever sat in an international conference as a "free and independent Power." This element aroused so much enthusiasm in China that the Government sent a delegation of about three undred persons, including secretaries, stenographers, and assistants; so many in fact that Dr. Sze, the Minister, had difficulty in realing and housing them.

Since the State Department's invitation was sent to the Peking Government, the Kuomintang regime at Canton immediately raised a tremendous howl and sent a rivel delegation which sniped at the Peking delegates throughout the meeting. There was even an attempt to assausingte Dr. Sun at Canton during the conference.

The Japaness were not enthusiastic about the Mashington Conference, and approached the meeting somewhat in the mood of a raughty child called to the teacher's desk for a reprimand. They were suspicious of the conference because they knew it was designed primarily to obstruct their schemes for China. But with their potential ally, Germany, out of the running and with Russia involved in a communist revolution at her very back door, the Japanese felt it would be better to attend then stay out. Japan's acceptance of the invitation was actually not received until two weeks after all the other official acceptances were in; and it was widely reported that Japan's decision to attend the conference resulted from assurances from British sources that Japan "would not be treated badly" at the nesting. However, any assurances from Pritish circles could hardly have carried such weight, in view of the fact that one of the chief objectives of the conference, though not stated in the formal invitation, was to abrogate the Anglo-Japanese Illiance.

Although strong opposition to the continuance of the Anglo-Japanese allience rad developed in the United States during the war, it was the opposition of the Jominion of Canada that forced Great Eritain to give serious consideration to the natter of discontinuing the pact. The Canadians felt, as did Americans, that the relligerent clauses in the alliance imposed dangerous obligations on Great Britain in the event of an outbreak of war between Japan and the United States. The Lanadians, due to the geographical situation of the two countries, also had exerienced complications with Japan over immigration questions. Immigration complitions which the United States had experienced with Japan in California in 1908 ere paralleled in Canada. Thus, when American Japanese relations became acute in n 1921, the Dominion of Canada was more affected by the so-called "North American" point of view as opposed to the London "Imperial" viewpoint. In consequence there leveloped in Canada a national demand for termination of the alliance.

Pages 76, 77, and 78.

Arthur Meighen, the Canadian Premier, urged the substitution of a four-Power conference on Pacific affairs, to be participated in by the United States, Britain, China, and Japan. But at the Imperial Conference in London Meighen's efforts met strong opposition not only from Lloyd George, but from Curzon, Balfour, and Lee, all of whom feared the menade of an antagonized Japan toward India and Britain's other territorial and economic stakes in Eastern Asia and the Pacific. In the hot debate which ensued the delegates from Australia, New Zealand and India sided with Britain, while South Africa favored revision rather than abrogation. But Meighen stood his ground, and ultimately brought the imperial conference around to his point of view. It was this discussion in the Imperial Conference, plus England's desire to reach an understanding with the United States on the limitation of naval construction, that paved the way for the calling of the Washington Conference.

Aside from France and Italy, which possessed naval armament of considerable strength, and also held concessions in China, the other European Powers invited to the conference--Netherlands, Belgium, and Portugal--held either concessions in China or colonial territories in the region of the Pacific.

The conference in many ways was of unusual significance: it was America's initial attempt to invoke an international conference for the purpose of reaching a peaceful settlement of questions which had long threatened war in the Pacific.
Attendance was entirely voluntary in the sense that the conference was not made up of delegates representing victorious and vanquished nations, as had been the case at Versailles. The British delegation was made up of representatives not only of Freat Britain but of Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and India.

European and Japanese delegates were astonished when Charles E. Hughes, chairman of the American delegation, announced at the opening session that the United States was prepared to stop its naval building program and, more, was prepared to scrap a number of warships which were in an advanced stage of construction. The American proposal was so contrary to professional diplomatic practice that the delegates stared at each other in wonderment, but it was a proposal which the British could hardly afford to contest, since the British Admiralty was already concerned y the American naval construction program.

It was finally agreed that the Anglo-Japanese alliance would be abandoned, and fapan was persuaded to accept a 5:5:3 naval ratio with the United States and Great Britain. A compensation for Japan was the agreement that the United States would not increase or continue its construction of fortifications on naval and military positions west of the 180th meridian. American naval experts did their best in private to prevent the limiting of our fortifications on naval positions in the Vestern Pacific, and also to prevent the curtailment of the United States naval building program, but they fought a losing fight.

All of the agreements, resolutions, and proposals at the conference were more or less linked together around the central document, which was the Nine-Power Treaty with China, upon which all commitments depended, including the major issue of limitation of navel armament and curtailment of construction on navel bases in the Pacific area. The Nine-Power Treaty came to be known as the "Chinese Charter of Liberty," because it put an end to the old sphere-of-influence doctrine which had obsessed Europe and Japan, and for more than a quarter of a century had threatened

Interest also adopted other measures concerned with the future development of mine as a unified state. The Japanese were forced to withdraw their troops from intung Province and restore the former German interests at Tsingtae, including atrol of the port and railway running into the interior of the province, to inese control. The conference also approved a resolution to send a delegation. China to investigate the relinquishment of extraterritoriality, which had ampored the development of modern Chinese courts and had infringed upon the evereignty of the country. It also was recommended that steps be taken to assist ains in modernizing her currency and her fiscal system, and finally the Powers greed to withdraw their postal agencies from China and consented to the calling a conference to revise the Chinese tariff, leading in the direction of tariff atonomy. Also of importance from the standpoint of Russian interests in the Farmatt, the Japanese were forced to withdraw their troops from Siberia, where they ad been stationed since World War I.
