And carry faithfully thy Masters sighs,
That it must work some heat in her cold heart,
And all my labors now come fraughted home
With ten fold prize.

Roc. Will you yet hear me?

Mount. Yes,
But take heed (gentle Rocca) that thou do'st
Tenderly by degrees assault mine ears
With her consent, now to embrace my love,
For thou well know'st I have been so plung'd, so torn
With her resolv'd reject, and neglect:
That to report her soft acceptance now,
Will stupifie sense in me, if not kill:
Why shew'st thou this distemper?

Roc. Draw your sword,
And when I with my breath have blasted you,
Kill me with it:
I bring you smiles of pitty, not affection:
For such she sent.

Mount. Oh! can she pitty me?
Of all the paths lead to a womans love,
Pitties the straightest.

Roc. Waken Sir, and know
That her contempt (if you can name it so)
Continues still: she bids you throw your Pearl
Into strong streams, and hope to turn them so,
Ere her too foul dishonor, writ your plaints
In rocks of Coral grow'n above the Sea,
Them hope to soften to compassion,
Or change their modest blush to love sick pale,
Ere work her to your impious requests;
All your loose thoughts she chides you home again,
But with such calm behaviour, and mild looks,
She gentlier denies than others grant,
For just as others love so doth she hate:
She says, that by your order you are bound
From marrying ever, and much marvels then
You would thus violate her and your own faith,
That being the virgin you should now protect,
Hitherto she professes she has conceal'd
Your lustful Batteries, but the next she vows,
(In open Hall, before the honor'd cross
And her great Brother) she will quite disclose
Calling for justice, to your utter shame.

Mount. Hence, find the Blackamore that waits upon her,
Bring her unto me, she doth love me yet,
And I must her now, at least seem to do:
Cupid, thy brands that glow thus in my veins,
I will with blood extinguish—ar't not gone?
Shall my desires, like beggars wait at dore

Whil'st any others revel in her breast?
Sweat on my spirits: know thou trickt up toy,
My love's a violent flood, where art thou falln,
Playing with which tide thou'dst been gently toss'd,
But crossing it, thou art or'whelm'd, and lost.

Enter Astorius and Castriot.

Cast. Monsieur, good day.

Ast. Good morrow valiant Knight,
What, are you for this great solemnity
This morn intended?

Mount. What solemnity?

Ast. The inveting of the Martial Spaniard,
Peter Gomera, with our Christian Badge.

Cast. And young Miranda the Italian,
Both which with wondrous prowess, and great luck
Have dar'd and done for Malta, such high feats,
That not one Fort in it, but rings their names
As loud as any mans.

Mount. As any mans?

Why, we have fought for Malta.

Ast. Yes Mountferrat.

No bold Knight ever past you, but we wear
The dignity of Christians on our breasts,
And have a long time triumph'd for our conquests;
These conquer'd a long time, not triumph'd yet;

Mount. Astorius, you are a most indulgent Knight,
Detracting from your self, to add to others,
You know this title is the period
To all our labors, the extremity
Of that tall pyramid, where honer hangs.
Which we with sweat and agony have reach'd,
And should not then so easily impart
So bright a wreath to every cheap desert.

Cast. How is this French man chang'd Astorius?
Some sullen discontent posselles him,
That makes him envy, what he heretofore
Did most ingeniously but emulate.

Mount. Oh furious desire, how like a whirl-wind
Thou hurriest me beyond mine honors point?
Out of my heart, base lust, or heart, I vow
Those flames that heat me thus, I'll burn thee in.

Ast. Do' ye observe him?

Mount. What news of the Dane,
That valiant Captain Norandine?

Cast. He fights still,
In view oth' Town; he playes the devil with 'em,
And they the Turks with him.

Mount. They'r well met then, 'twere sin to sever 'em
Pish—woman.—Memory—
Would one of ye would leave me:

Ast. Six fresh Gallies

I in St. Angelo from the promontory
This morne descride, making a Girdle for him;
But our great Master doth intend relief
This present meeting: will you walk along?

Mount. Humh—I have read, Ladies enjoy'd, have been
The gulphs of worthiest men, buried their names,
Their former valor, bounty, beauty, virtue,
And sent 'em stinking to untimely graves.
I that cannot enjoy, by her disdain,
Am like to prove as wretched; woman then
Checking or granting, is the grave of men.

Ast. He's saying of his prayers sure.

Cast. Will you go Sir?

Mount. I cry you mercy: I am so transported
(Your pardon, noble Brothers) with a business
That doth concern all Malta, that I am
(Anon you'l hear't) almost blind, and deaf.
Lust neither sees nor hears ought but it self:
But I will follow instantly: your cross.

Ast. Not mine.

Cast. Nor mine, 'tis yours.

(dropt.

Ast.

Adj. Cast. Good morrow Brother.

Exeunt.

Mount. White innocent sign, thou do'st abhor to dwell,
So near the dim thoughts of this troubled breast,

Enter Zanthia, alias Abdella, with two Letters.

Yet I must weas thee to protect my crimes,
If not for conscience, for hypocrisie,
Some Churchmen so wear Callocks: Oh my Zan.
My Pearl, that scorns a stain! I must repent
All my neglect: let me Ixion like,
Embrace my black cloud, since my Juno is
So wrathful, and aversé; thou art more soft
And full of dalliance than the fairest flesh,
And far more loving.

Zan. I, you say so now,
But like a property, when I have serv'd
Your turns, you'll cast me off, or hang me up
For a sign, somewhere.

Mount. May my life then forsake me
Or from my expected blifs, be cast to hell.

Zan. My tongue Sir, cannot lisp to meet you so,
Nor my black cheek put on a feigned blush,
To make me seem more modest than I am.
This ground-work, will not bear adulterate red,
Nor artificial white, to cozen love.

These dark locks, are not purchas'd, nor these teeth,
For every night, they are my bed-fellows;
No bath, no blanching water; smoothing oyles,
Doth mend me up; and yet Mountferrat, know,
I am as full of pleasure in the touch
As ere a white fac'd puppet of 'em all,
Juicy, and firm, unsledge 'em of their tyres,
Their wires, their partlets; pins, and Periwigs,
And they appear like bald cootes, in the nest;
I can as blithly work in my loves bed,
And deck thy fair neck, with these Jetty chains,
Sing thee asleep, being wearied, and refresh'd,
With the same organ, steal sleep off again.

Mount. Oh my black swan, sleeker then Cignets plush,
Sweeter than is the sweet of Pomander,
Breath'd like curl'd Zephyrus, cooling Lymon-trees,
Straight as young pines, or Cedars in the grove,
Quickly descend lovers best Canopie
Still night, for Zanthia doth enamour me
Beyond all continence perpetrate (deer wench)
What thou hast promis'd, and I vow by heaven
Malta, I'll leave in't my honours here,
And in some other Country (Zanthia) make
My wife, and my best fortune.

Zan. From this hope,
Here is an answer to that Letter, which
I lately shew'd you sent from Tripoly,
By the great Easha, which importunes her
Love unto him, and treachery to the Island,
Which will she undertake, by Mahomet
The Turk there vows, on his blest Alcharon,
Marriage unto her: this the Master knows,
But is resolv'd of her integrity
(As well as he may) sweet Lady yet for love,
For love of thee Mountferrat, (Oh! what Chains
Of deity, or duty can hold love?)
I have this answer fram'd, so like her hand
As if it had been moulded off: returning
The Balthas Letter safe into her pocket;
What will you do with it, your self best knows,
Farewel, keep my true heart, keep true your vows.

Exit

Mount. Till I be dust, my Zanthia be confirm'd.
Sparrows, and Doves, sit coupling twixt thy lips,
It is not love, but strong Libidinous will
That triumphs o're me, and to satiate that,
What difference twixt this Moore, and her fair Dame?
Night makes their hews alike, their use is so,
Whose hand is so subtle, he can colours name,

Zan.

If he do winck, and touch 'em? lust being blind,
Never in women did distinction find.

Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter two Gentlewomen.

1. But yfaith dost thou think my Lady was never in love?
2. I rather think she was ever in love: in perfect charity.
1. I mean, with all the world.
2. A most christian answer I promise you: but I mean in Love with a man.
2. With a man? what else? would'st have her in love with (a beast?)
1. You are somewhat quick: but if she were, it were no President: did, you never read of Europa, the fair, that leapt A bull, that leapt the Sea, that swoom to land, and then
2. Oh heavens, a bull? (leapt her?)
1. Yes, a white bull.
2. Lord, how could she sit him? where did she hold?
1. Why, by the horn, since which time, no woman (almost) is Contented, till she have a horn of her own, to hold by.

2. Thou art very knavish.
1. And thou very foolish: but sirah, why dost not thou
2. Because I would be no mans looking-glasse? (marry?)
1. As how?
2. As thus, there is no Wife, if she be good, and true, will honor, and obey, but must reflect the true countenance of her husband upon him; if he look sad upon her she must not look merrily upon him: if he look merrily, she must not sorrowfully, else she is a false glass, and fit for nothing but breaking: his anger must not be her discontent; his pleasure, her delight: if he weep, she must cry: if he laugh, she must show her teeth: if he be sick, she must not be in health; if he eat Cawdles, she must eat pottage, she must have no proper passion of her own; and is not this a tyranny?

1. Yes, yfaith, Marriage may well be called a yoaik; Wives then are but like superficial lines in Geometry, that have no proper motion of their own, but as their bodies their husbands move, yet I know some Wives, that are never freely merry, nor truly pleased, but when they are farthest off their husbands.

2. That's because the Moon governs 'em which hath most light and shines brightest, the more remote it is from the Sun; and contrary is more fullen, dim, and showes least splendor, when it is neerest.

1. But if I were to marry I would marry a fair effeminate fool.

2. Why?
1. Because I would lead the blind whither I list.
2. And I the wisest man I could get for money, because I had rather follow the cleer-sighted: blefs me from a husband That sales by his Wives compass?

1. Why?
2. Why 'tis ten to one but she breaks his head in her youth, and when she is old shee'l never leave till she has broke his back too—

But what scurvey Knight have you here in Malta, &c.

Enter Zanthia.

Zan. Hist, wenches: my Lady calls, she's entring
The Tarrase, to see the show.

1. Oh black pudding.
2. My little labor in vain.
1. But what scurvey Knights have we here in Malta, that when they are dubd take their oath of allegiance to live poor, and chafly ever after?
2. 'Faith many Knights in other Nations (I have heard) are as poor as ours: marry where one of 'em has taken the Oath of chastity, we want a new Columbus to find out.

Exeunt.
Scena

Scene Terzia.

Enter (above) Oriana, Zanchia, two Gentlemen, (beneath)
Valetta, Mountferrat, Altorius, Caltriot, Gomera, Miranda, Attendants of Knights, &c.

Mount. Are you there Lady?

Ori. Thou art a naughty man,
Heaven mend thee.

Val. Our greet meeting princely brothers,
Ye holy Souldiers of the Christian Cross,
Is to relieve our Captain Norandine,
Now fighting for Valetta with the Turk,
A valliant Gentleman, a noble Dane
As ere the Countrey bred, endangered now
By fresh supply of head-bound Infidels.
Much means, much blood this warlike Dane hath spent
To advance our flag, above their horned moons,
And oft hath brought in profitable conquest:
We must not see him perish in our view:
How far off fight they?

Mir. Sir, within a League.

Val. 'Tis well: our next occasion of conventing
Are these too gentlemen, standing in your sight.
(Ye are noble props of Malta) royally
Descended are they both, valiant as war,
Miranda, and Gomera, full ten years
They have serv'd this Island, perfected exploits
Matchless, and infinite, they are honest, wise,
Not empty of one ornament of man:
Most eminent agents were they in that slaughter
That great marvelous slaughter of the Turks,
Before St. Elms, where five and twenty thousand
Fell, for five thousand of our Christians:
These ripe considerations moving us
(Having had your allowance on their worths)
Here we would call 'em to our Brothethood;
If any therefore can their manners tax,
Their faith, their chastity, any part of life,
Let 'em speak now.

Al. None do's.

All. None can, great Master.

Val. The dignity then dignifie, by them,
As their reward: tender Miranda first
(Because he is to succor Norandine)
Our sacred Robe of Knight-hood, our white Cross,
The holy cognizance of him we serve,
The sword, the spurs.

Mir. Grave, and most honor'd Master,
With humble duty, and my souls best thanks
To you, and all this famous Conventicle,
Let me, with modesty refuse acceptance
Of this high order: I (alafs) am yet
Unworthy, and incapable of such honor,
That merit, which with favor you enlarge
Is far, far short, of this propos'd reward.
Who take upon him such a charge as this,
Must come with pure thoughts, and a gathered mind
That time, nor all occasions ever may
After disperse, or stain; did this title here
Of Knighthood, ask no other ornaments
Then other Countries glittering show, poor pride,
A gingling spur, a feather, a white hand,
A frizled hayr, powder'd, perfumes, and lust,
Drinking sweet wines, surfeits, and ignorance,
Rashly, and easily should I venture on't,
But this requires another kind of man.

Mount. A staid, and mature judgement; speak on sir.

Mir. May it please you then to allow me some small time
To rectifie my self, for that high feat,
Or give my reasons to the contrary.
Ith mean space, to dismiss me to the ayd

Of Norandine: my Ships ride in the bay
Ready to disembogue, tack'led, and mann'd
Even to my wishes.

Mount. His request
Is fair and honest.

Val. At your pleasure go.

Mir. I humbly take my leave of all: of you
My noble friend Mountferrat; grations Mistress,
Oh that auspicious smile doth arm your souldier,
Who fights for those eyes, and this sacred Cross,
Can neither meet sad accident, nor loss.

Exit.

Ori. The mighty master of that Livory,
Conduct thee safely to these eyes again.

Mount. Blowes the wind that way?

Val. Equally belov'd,
Equally meriting, Gomera, you
Without excuse receive that dignity:
Which our provincial chapter hath decreed you.

Gom. Great Master of Jerusalem's Hospital,
From whence to Rhodes this blest Fraternity
Was driven, but now among the Maltois stands,
Long may it flourish, whilst Gomera serves it,
But dares not enter farther.

All. This is strange.

Val. What do ye object?

Gom. Nothing against it, but my self (fair Knights)
I may not wear this Robe.

Val. Express your reasons;
Doth any hid sin goar your conscience?

Al. Are you unstedfast in Religion?

Cast. Or do ye intend to forsake Malta now,
And visit your own Countrey fruitful Spaine.

Gom. Never good fir.

Val. Then explicate your thoughts.

Gom. This then: I should be perjur'd to receive it,
Once in Melita, your next City here,
When I was yonger, read I the decrees
Touching this point, being ambitious then
To approach it once, none but a Gentleman
Can be admitted.

Val. That's no obstacle
In you.

Gom. I should be sorry that were it,
No married man.

Mount. You never felt that yoaik.

Gom. None, that hath been contracted.

Cast. Were you ever?

Gom. Nor married, nor contracted, none that ever
Hath vowed his love to any woman kind,
Or finds that secret fire within his thoughts:
Here I am cast, this Article my heart
Objects against the title of my fame,
I am in love; laugh not: though time hath set
Some wrinkles in this face, and these curl'd locks
Will shortly dye into an other hew,
Yet, yet I am in love: (yfaith your smile)
What age, what sex, or what profession
Divine, or humane, from the man that cries
For Almes the high way, to him that sings
At the high Altar, and doth sacrifice,
Can truly say he knows not what is Love?

Val. 'Tis honestly profest; with whom Gomera?
Name the Lady, that with all the advantage
We may advance your suit.

Gom. But will you Sir?

Val. Now by our holy rock were it our Sister:
Spaniard, I hold thee worthy, freely name her.

Gom. Be master of your word: it is the Sir,
The matchless Oriana.

Val. Come down Lady,
You have made her blush, let her consent I will Make good my oath.

Mount. Is't so? stay: I do love
So tenderly Gomera your bright flame,

As not to suffer your perdition.

Gom. What means Mountferrat?

Enter Guard.

Mount. This whole anberge hath
(A Guard upon this Lady) wonder not,
'Tane publick notice of the Bassas love
Of Tripoli unto her, and contented
She should return this answer, as he writ
For her conversion, and betraying Malta,
She should advise him betray Tripoli,
And turning Christian, he should marry her.

All. All this was so.

Mount. How weakly do's this court then
Send Vessels forth to Sea, to guard the Land
Taking such special care to save one Bark,
Or strive to add fam'd men unto our cloak,
When they lurk in our bosomes would subvert
This State, and us, presuming on their blood,
And partial indulgence to their sex?

Val. Who can this be?

Mount. Your Sister, great Valetta,
Which thus I prove: demand the Bassa's Letter.

Ori. 'Tis here, nor from this pocket hath been mov'd
Nor answer'd, nor perus'd by——

Mount. Do not swear

Cast not away your fair foul, to your treason
Add not foul perjury: is this your hand?

Ori. 'Tis very like it.

Mount. May it please the Master,
Confer these Letters, and then read her answer,
Which I have intercepted; pardon me
Reverend Valetta, that am made the means
To punish this most beautiful Treachery;
Even in your Sister, since in it I save
Malta from ruine I am bolder in't,
Because it is so palpable and withall
Know our great Master to this Countrey, firm.
As was the Roman Marcus, who spar'd not
As dear a Sister in the publique cause.

Val. I am amaz'd; attend me.

Reads the Letter.

Let your Forces by the next even be ready, my Brother feasts then; put in at St. Michaels, the ascent at that Port is easiest; the Keys of the Castle, you shall receive at my hands:
that possess, you are Lord of Malta, and may soon desiroy all by fire, then which I am hotter, till I embrace you, Farewell,

Your Wife
O R I A N A.

From this time let me never read again.

Get. 'Tis certain her hand.

Val. This Letter too

So close kept by her self, could not be answered
To every period thus, but by her self.

Ori. Sir, hear me.

Val. Peace, thou fair sweet bank of flowers,
Under whose beauty Scorpions lie, and kill;
Wert thou a kin to me, in some new name
Dearer then Sister, Mother, or all blood,
I would not hear thee speak: bear her to prison,
So gross is this, it needs no formal course,
Prepare thy self, to morrow thou shalt dye.

Ori. I dye a Martyr then, and a poor maid,
Almost yfaith as innocent as born,
Thou know'st thou art wicked, Frenchman heaven forgive

All. This Scene is strangely turn'd. (thee Ex.)

Val. Yet can nature be

So dead in me? I would my charge were off,
Mountferrat should perceive my Sister had
A Brother would not live to see her dye
Unfought for, since the statutes of our state

Allow (in case of accusations)

A Champion to defend a Ladies truth.
Peter Gomera, thou hast lost thy wife,
Death pleads a precontract.

Gom. I have lost my Tongue,
My sence, my heart, and every faculty:
Mountferrat go not up: with reverence
To our great Master, and this consistory
(I have considered it, it cannot be)

Thou art a villain, and a forger.
A blood-sucker of innocence, an hypocrite,
A most unworthy wearer of our Cross;
To make which good take (if thou dar'st) that gage
And arm'd at all points like a Gentleman
Meet me to morrow morning, where the Master,
And this fraternity shall design, where I
Will cram this slander back into thy throat,
And with my swords point thrust it to thy heart,
The very nest, where lust and slander breeds.
Pardon my passion; I will tear those spurs
Off from thy heels, and stik 'em in thy front
As a mark'd villain.

Mount. This I look'd not for:
Ten times more villain, I return my gage,
And crave the Law of Arms.

Gom. 'Tis that I crave.

All. It cannot be denide.

Gom. Do not I know

With thousand gifts, and importunacies,
Thou often hast sollicitd this Lady
(Contrary to thy oath of chastity)
Who ne'r disclosing this thy hot reign'd lust,
Yet tender to prevent a publique scandal,
That Christendome might justly have impos'd,
Upon this holy institution,
Thou now hast drawn this practise 'gainst her life
To quit her charity.

Mount. Spaniard, thou liest.

Ajt. No more Gomera, thou art granted combat,
And you Mountferrat must prepare against
To morrow morning in the valley here
Adjoyning to St. Georges Port: a Lady in case of life 'gainst whom one witness comes
May have her champion.

Val. And who hath most right
With, or against our Sister, speed in fight.

Florish
Exit.

Enter Rocca.

Mount. Rocca, the first news of Mirandas service
Let me have notice of.

Roc. You shall: The Moore
Waites you without.

Mount. Admit her, ha, ha, ha.
Oh, how my fancies run at tilt! Gomera
Loves Oriana; she as I should ghes,
Affects Miranda; these are two dear friends,
As firm, and full of fire, as steel and flint.
To make 'em so now, one against the other: Enter Zanthia.
Stay let me like it better, Zanthia;
First tell me this, did Don Gomera use
To give his visits to your Mistrifs?

Zan. Yes, and Miranda too: but severally.

Mount. Which did she most apply to?

Zan. Faith to neither:

Yet infinitely I have heard her praise 'em both,
And in that manner, that were both one man
I think she was in love with't.

Mount. Zanthia,
Another Letter you must frame for me
Instantly, in your Ladies Character,
To such a purpose as I'll tell thee strait,
Go in, and stay me: Go my Tinder-box,
Cross lines I'll cross; so, so: my after-game

I must

I must play better: woman, I will spread
My vengeance over Malta, for thy sake:
Spaniard, Italian, like my steel and stone,
I'll knock you thus together, wear ye out
To light my dark deeds, whilst I seem precise,
And wink to save the sparkles from mine eyes. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

A Sea-fight within, alarm.

Enter Norandine, Miranda, and Soldiers, and Gentlemen.

Mir. How is it Sir?
Nor. Pray set me down; I cool,
And my wounds smart.
Mir. I hope yet
Though there be many, there's none dangerous.
Nor. I know not, nor I care not much, I got 'em
Like a too forward fool, but I hope the Surgeons
Will take an order I shall not leave 'em so,
I make the rogues more work than all the Island,
And yet they give me the hardest words for my money.
Mir. I am glad ye are so sprightly: ye fought bravely
Go call the Surgeons Soldiers: wondrous nobly
Upon my life, I have not seen such valour;
Maintained so long, and to so large a ruine,
The odds so strong against ye.
Nor. I thank ye,
And thank ye for your help, your timely succor.
By th'mass, it came i' th' nick Sir, and well handled;
Stoutly, and strongly handled: we had duct else,
My Turk had Turk'd me else: but he has well paid for't.
Why what a Sign for an Almanack h'as made me?

Enter Astorius.

Ast. I am glad to find ye here Sir, of necessity,
I must have come aboard else; and brave Captain
We all joy much in your fair victory,
And all the Island speaks your valour nobly.
Have ye brought the Turk in, that ye took?
Mir. He ridesthere.
Nor. If he were out again, the devil should bring him.
H'as truly circumcis'd me.
Ast. I have a business
Which much concerns ye, presently concerns ye;
But not this place nor people: pray ye draw off, Sir,
For 'tis of that weight to ye.
Mir. I'll wait on ye,
I must crave leave awhile: my care dwels with ye,
And I must wait my self.
Nor. Your servant, Sir.
Mir. Believe I shall, and what my love can minister;
Keep your stout heart still.
Nor. That's my best Physitian.
Mir. And I shall keep your fame fair. Exit.
Nor. Ye are too Noble.

A brave young fellow of a matchless spirit;
He brought me off like thunder, charg'd, and boarded,
As if he had been shot to save mine honor:
And when my fainting men, tyr'd with their labour,
And lack of blood, gave to the Turk assurance
The day was his; when I was cut in shreds thus,
And not a corn of Powder left to bless us;
Then flew his Sword in, then his Cannon roar'd,
And let sie blood and death and storms amongst 'em.
Then might I hear their sleepy Prophet howl too,
And all their silver Crescents then I saw
Like falling Meteors spent, and set for ever
Under the Cross of Malta; death so wanton
I never lookt upon, so full of revel.

Enter Surgeon.

I will not be drest yet: Methought that fellow
Was fit for no conversation, nor no Christian
That had not halfe his brain's knockt out, no Soldier.
Oh valiant young man, how I love thy virtue.
1 Sol. Pray ye Sir be drest, alas ye bleed apace yet.
Nor. 'Tis but the sweat of honor (alas) thou milkfop,
Thou man of March-pain, canst thou fear to see
A few light hurts, that blush they are no bigger,
A few small scratches? get ye a Cawdle, Sirrah,
Your finger akes, and let the old wives watch thee:
Bring in the booty: and the prisoners;
By heaven I'll see 'em, and dispose 'em first,
Before I have a drop of blood wip'd from me, goe. Exeunt Soldiers.
Surg. You'll faint Sir.
Nor. No, ye lie, Sir, like an Ass, Sir;
I have no such pigs hurt in my belly.
Sur. By my life Captain
These hurts are not to be jested with.
Nor. If thou hadst 'em:
They are my companions fool, my family;
I cannot eat nor sleep without their company:
Dost take me for St. Davy, that fell dead
With seeing of his nose bleed?

Enter Soldiers with booty.

Sur. Here they come, Sir:
But would you would be drest.
Nor. Pox: drest thy self first.
Thou faint'st a great deal faster: what's all this,
1 Sold. The money and the merchandize ye took Sir,
Nor. A goodly purchase; Is it for this we venture
Our liberties and lives? what can all this do?
Get me some dozen surfeits, some seven fresh whores,
And twenty pot-Allies; and then I am virtuous.
Lay the Knights part by, and that to pay the Soldier:
This is mine own, I think I have deserv'd it:
Come, now look to me, and grope me like a Chambermaid,
I'll neither start nor squeak; what's that i' th' Trusse there?
2 Sold. 'Tis cloth of Tissue, Sir, and this is Scarlet.
Nor. I shall look redder shortly then, I fear me,
And as a Captain ought, a great deal prouder.
Can ye cure me of that crack, Surgeon?
Sur. Yes, when your Suit's at pawn, Sir.
Nor. There's for your plaister.
A very learned Surgeon: what's in that pack there?
1 Sold. 'Tis English Cloth.
Nor. That's a good wear indeed,
Both strong, and rich: but it has a virtue
A twang of the own Countrey, that spoils all:
A man shall ne'r be sober in't: Where are the Gentlemen,
That ventur'd with me, both their lives and fortunes?
Come forward my fair spirits; Norandine
Forgets his worth, when he forgets your valours,
You have lost an eye, I saw ye face all hazards:
You have one left yet, to choose your Mistriss.
You have your leg broke with a shot; yet sitting,
I saw you make the place good with your Pike still.
And your hand's gone; a good heart wants no instruments;
Share that amongst ye, there's an eye, an arm,
And that will bear you up, when your legs cannot.
Oh, where's the honest Sailor? that poor fellow,
Indeed that bold brave fellow, that with his Musket
Taught them new ways how to put their caps off;
That stood the fire of all the fight, twice blown,
And twice I gave him drown'd: welcome ashore knave;
Give me thy hand, if they be not both lost: faith thou art welcome,
My tough knave welcome: thou wilt not shrink i' th' washing
Hold, there's a piece of Scarlet, get thee handsom.
And this to buy thee buttons.
Sail. Thank ye Captain.
Command my life at all hours;

Nor. Thou durst give it.
You have deserv'd too.

3 Sold. We have seen the fight Sir.

Nor. Yes: coil'd up in a Cable, like salt Eels,
Or buried low i' th' ballast, do you call that fighting?
Where be your wounds? your knocks? your want of limbs rogues?

Art not thou he that ask'd the Master-gunner
Where thou mightst lie safest? and he strait answered,
Put thy head in that hole, new bor'd with a Cannon;
For 'twas an hundred to one, another shot would not hit
Your wages you shall have, but for rewards (there:
Take your own waies: and get ye to the Taverns;
There, when ye are hot with Wine, 'mongst your admirers.

Take Ships, and Towns, and Castles at your pleasures,
And make the Great Turk shake at your valors.
Bring in the prisoners now, my brave Muslemen.

Enter Prisoners, and Luscinda.

You that are Lords o' th' Sea, and scorn us Christians,
Which of your mangy lives is worth this hurt here?
Away to prison with 'em, see 'em safe;
You shall find we have Gallies too, and slaves too.

1 Sol. What shall be done with this woman, Sir?

Nor. Pox take her,

'Twas she that set me on to fight with these rogues,
That Ring-worm, rot it: what can you do now
With all your paintings, and your pouncings, Lady,
To restore my blood again? you, and your Cupid
That have made a Carbinado of me; plague take ye,
Ye are too deep ye rogue, this is thy work woman,
Thou louse woman; 'death, you goe too deep still.
The seeing of your simpring sweetness: — ye Filly,
Ye Tit, ye Tomboy, what can one nights gingling,
Or two, or ten, sweet heart, and oh my dear chicken,
Scratching my head, or fumbling with my fore-mast,
Doe me good now? ye have powder'd me for one year,
I am in souce I thank ye; thank your beauty,
Your most sweet beauty: pox upon those goggles.
We cannot fight like honest men, for honor,
And quietly kill one another as we ought,
But in steps one of you; the devils holiness
And you must have a daunce: away with her,
She stinks to me now.

1 Sold. Shall I have her Captain?

2 Sold. Or I?

3 Sold. I'll marry her.

4 Sold. Good Captain, I.

3 Sold. And make her a good Christian; lay hands off her;
I know she's mine.

2 Sold. I'll give my full share for her: have ye no manners;
To thrust the woman so?

Nor. Share her among ye;
And may she give ye as many hurts as I have,
And twice as many aches.

Lusc. Noble Captain,
Be pleas'd to free me from these Soldiers wildness,
Till I but speak two words.

Nor. Now for your Maidenhead,
You have your book, proceed.

Lusc. Victorious Sir,
'Tis seldom seen in men so valiant,
Minds so devoid of virtue: he that can conquer,
Should ever know how to preserve his conquest,
'Tis but a base theft else. Valour's a virtue,
Crown of mens actions here; yours as you make it.
And can you put so rough a foyl as violence,
As wronging of weak woman to your triumph?

Nor. Let her alone.

Lusc. I have lost my husband, Sir;
You feel not that: him that I love; you care not:
When fortune falls on you thus, you may grieve too:

My liberty, I kneel not for; mine honor,
(If ever virtuous honor, toucht your heart yet)
Make dear, and precious, Sir: you had a mother.

Nor. The rougy thing speaks finely, neat, who took ye?
For he must be your guard.

Lusc. I wish no better,
A noble Gentleman, and Nobly us'd me,
They call'd his name Miranda.

Nor. You are his then?
Ye have light upon a young man worth your service,
I free ye from all the rest: and from all violence;
He that doth offer 't, by my head he hangs for't:
Goe see her safe kept, till the Noble Gentleman
Be ready to dispose her: thank your tongue,
You have a good one, and preserve it good still:
Soldiers, come wait on me, I'll see ye paid all. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Miranda and Astorius.

Ast. I knew ye lov'd her, virtuously ye lov'd her,
Which made me make that haste: I knew ye priz'd her
As all fair minds do goodness.

Mir. Good Astorius,
I much confes I do much honor her,
And worthily I hope still.

Ast. 'Tis no doubt, Sir,
For on my life she is much wrong'd.

Mir. Very likely:
And I as much tormented I was absent.

Ast. You need not fear, Peter Gomera's Noble,
Of a try'd faith and valour.

Mir. This I know too:
But whilst I was not there, and whilst she suffer'd;
Whilst Virtue suffer'd, friend, oh how it loads me!
Whilst innocence and sweetness sunk together,
How cold it sits here? if my arm had fought her,
My truth, though naked, stood against all treasons,
My sword here grasped, Love on the edge, and Honor,
And but a signal from her eye to seal it;
If then she had been lost; I brag too late,
And too much I decline the Noble Peter.
Yet some poor service I would do her sweetness,
Alas she needs it, my Astorius,
The gentle Lady needs it.

Ast. Noble spirit.

Mir. And what can: prethee bear with this weakness.
Often I do not use these Womens weapons
But where true pity is. I am much troubl'd,
And something have to do, I cannot form yet.

Ast. I'll take my leave, Sir, I shall but disturb ye.

Mir. And please you for a while: and pray to fortune to smile upon this Lady.

Ast. All my help, Sir. Exit.

Mir. Gomera's old and stiff: and he may lose her,
The winter of his years and wounds upon him:
And yet he has done bravely hitherto;
Mountferrat's fury, in his heat of Summer,
The whistling of his Sword like angry storms,
Renting up life by th' roots, I have seen him scale
As if a Falcon had run up a train,
Clashing his warlike pinions, his steel'd Curasse,
And at his pitch innew the Town below him.
I must doe something.

Enter Collonna.

Col. Noble Sir, for Heaven sake
Take pity of a poor afflicted Christian
Redeem'd from one affliction to another.

Mir. Boldly you ask that, we are bound to give it.
From what affliction, Sir?

Col. From cold, and hunger:

From nakedness and stripes.

Mir. A prisoner?

Col. A slave, Sir, in the Turkish prize, new taken; That in the heat of fight, when your brave hand Brought the Dane succor, got my irons off, And put my self to mercy of the Ocean.

Mer. And swom to Land?

Col. I did Sir, Heaven was gracious; But now a stranger, and my wants upon me, Though willingly I would preserve this life, Sir, With honesty and truth I am not look'd on; The hand of pity that should give for heaven lake, And charitable hearts are grown so cold, Sir, Never remembering what their fortunes may be.

Mir. Thou sayst too true: of what profession art thou?

Col. I have been better train'd; and can serve truly, Where trust is laid upon me.

Mir. A handsome fellow; Hast thou e'r bore Arms?

Col. I have trod full many a march, Sir, And some hurts have to shew: before me too, Sir.

Mir. Pity this thing should starve, or, forced for want, Come to a worse end. I know not what thou mayst be. But if thou thinkst it fit to be a servant, I'll be a Master, and a good one to thee, If ye deserve, Sir,

Col. Else I ask no favour.

Mir. Then Sir, to try your trust, because I like you, Go to the Dane, of him receive a woman, A Turkish prisoner, for me receive her, I hear she is my prize, look fairly to her, For I would have her know, though now my prisoner, The Christians need no Schoolmasters for honor. Take this to buy thee clothes, this Ring, to help thee Into the fellowship of my house: ye are a stranger, And my servants will not know ye else; there keep her, And with all modesty preserve your service.

Col. A foul example find me else: Heaven thank ye. Of Captain Norandine?

Mir. The same.

Col. 'Tis done, Sir:

And may Heavens goodness ever dwell about ye.

Mir. Wait there till I come home,

Col. I shall not fail, Sir,

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Mountferrat with a Letter, and Abdella.

Abd. 'Tis strange it should be so, that your high mettle Should check thus poorly, dully; most unmanly.

Mount. Let me alone.

Abd. Thus leadenly?

Mount. — Take ye.

Abd. At every childish fear? at every shadow? Are you Mountferrat that have done such deeds? Wrought through such bloody fields, men shake to speak of? Can ye go back? is there a safety left yet? But fore-right? is not ruine round about ye? Have ye not still these arms, that Sword, that heart-whole? Is't not a man ye fight with, and an old man, A man half kill'd already? Am not I here? As lovely in my black to entertain thee, As high and full of heat to meet thy pleasures?

Mount. I will be alone.

Abd. Ye shall: farewell, Sir; And do it bravely, never think of conscience: There is none to a man resolved; be happy.

Exit.

Enter Miranda.

Mount. No, most unhappy wretch as thou hast made me More devil than thy self, I am.

Mir. Alone,

And troubled too, I take it: how he starts? All is not handsome in thy heart Mountferrat. God speed ye Sir, I have been seeking of ye? They say you are to fight to day.

Mount. What then?

Mir. Nay, nothing but good fortune to your Sword, Sir. Ye have a cause requires it, the Islands safety, The Orders, and your Honors.

Mount. And do you make a question I will not fight it Nobly?

Mir. Ye dare fight, Ye have, and with as great a confidence as justice; I have seen ye strike as home, and hit as deadly.

Mount. Why are these questions then?

Mir. I'll tell ye quickly.

Ye have a Lady in your cause, a fair one, A gentler never trod on ground, a Nobler.

Mount. Do ye come on so fast? I have it for ye.

Mir. The Sun ne'r saw a sweeter,

Mount. These I grant ye: Nor dare I against beauty heave my hand up, It were unmanly, Sir; too much unmanly: But when these excellencies turn to ruine, To ruine of themselves, and those protect 'em; When virtue's lost lust, and dishonor enter'd, Loss of our selves and souls basely projected —

Mir. Do you think 'tis so?

Mount. Too sure.

Mir. And can it be?

Can it be thought Mountferrat, so much sweetness, So great a Magazine of all things precious, A mind so heavenly made, prethee observe me:

Mount. I thought so too: now by my Holy Order, He that had told me, (till experience found it Too bold a proof) this Lady had been vitious — I wear no dull Sword Sir, nor hate I virtue, Mir. Against her brother? to the man has bred her? Her Bloud and Honor?

Mount. Where ambitious lust Desires to be above the rule prescrib'd her, Takes hold, and wins, poor chastity, cold duty; Like fashions old forgot, she flings behind her, And puts on bloud and mischief, death, and ruine, To raise her new-bui't hopes, new faith to fasten her: Ma'foy, she is as foul, as Heaven is beauteous.

Mir. Thou liest; thou liest Mountferrat: thou liest basely, Stare not, nor swell not with thy pride: thou liest; And this shall make it good.

Mount. Out with your heat first, Ye shall be fought withal.

Mir. By — that Lady, The virtue of that woman, were all the good deeds Of all thy families, bound in one Fagot, From Adam to this hour, but with one sparkle Would fire that wispe, and turn it to light ashes.

Mount. Oh pitiful young man, struck blind with beauty! Shot with a womans smile: poor, poor Miranda; Thou hopeful young man once; but now thou lost man: Thou naked man of all that we call Noble, How art thou cozen'd? didst thou know what I do, And how far thy dear honor (mark me fool) Which like a father I have kept from blasting, Thy tender honor is abus'd: but fight first, And then too late, thou shalt know all.

Mir. Thou liest, still.

Mount. Stay, now I'll shew thee all, and then I'll kill thee. I love thee so dear, time shall not disgrace thee. Read that.

Mir. It is her hand: it is most certain; Good Angels keep me: that I should be her Agent To betray Maliba, and bring her to the Basha, That on my tender love lay all her project! Eyes never see again, melt out for sorrow,

Did the Devil do this?

Mount. No, but his Dam did it,
The virtuous Lady that you love so dearly;
Come, will ye fight again?

Mir. No, prethee kill me:
For Heaven sake, and for goodness sake dispatch me,
For the disgrace sake that I gave thee, kill me.

Mount. Why, are ye guilty?

Mir. I have liv'd Mountferrat,
To see dishonor swallow up all virtue,
And now would die: by heavens eternal brightness,
I am as clear as innocence.

Mount. I knew it,
And therefore kept this Letter from all knowledge,
And this sword from anger, ye had died else.
And yet I lye, and basely lye.

Mir. O virtue!
Unspotted virtue, whither art thou vanish'd?
What hast thou left to abuse our frailties
In shape of goodness?

Mount. Come, take courage, man,
I have forgiven, and forgot your rashness,
And hold you fair as light in all your actions,
And by my troth I griev'd your loves; take comfort,
There be more women.

Mir. And more mischief in 'em.

Mount. The justice I shall do, to right these villanies
Shall make ye man again: I'll strike it sure, Sir.
Come, look up bravely: put this puling passion
Out of your mind; one knock for thee Miranda.
And for the Boy, the grave Gomera gave thee,
When she accepted thee her Champion;
And in thy absence, like a valiant Gentleman,
I yet remember it: he is too young,
Too Boyish, and too tender, to adventure:
I'll give him one sound rap for that: I love thee,
Thou art a brave young spark.

Mir. Boy, did he call me?

Gomera call me Boy?

Mount. It pleas'd his gravity,
To think so of ye then: they that do service,
And honest service, such as thou, and I doe,
Are either knaves, or boys.

Mir. Boy, by Gomera?
How look'd he when he said it? for Gomera
Was ever wont to be a virtuous Gentleman,
Humane, and sweet.

Mount. Yes when he will, he can be;
But let it go, I would not breed dissention;
'Tis an unfriendly office, and had it been
To any of a higher strain than you, Sir,
The well known, well approved, and lov'd Miranda,
I had not thought on't: 'twas hap'ly his haste too,
And zeal to her.

Mir. A Traitor and a Boy too?
Shame take me if I suffer't: puff: farewell love.

Mount. Ye know my business, I must leave ye, Sir,
My hour grows on apace.

Mir. I must not leave you
I dare not, nor I will not, till your goodness
Have granted me one courtesie: ye say ye love me?

Mount. I doe, and dearly: ask? and let that courtesie
Nothing concern mine honor,

Mir. You must do it.
Or you will never see me more:

Mount. What is it?
It shall be great that puts ye off; pray speak it.

Mir. Pray let me fight to day: good, dear Mountferrat,
Let me, and hold Gomera——

Mount. Fie Miranda,
Doe ye weigh my worth so little?

Mir. On my knees,
As ever thou hadst true touch of a sorrow
Thy friend conceiv'd, as ever honor lov'd thee.

Mount. Shall I turn recreant now?

Mir. 'Tis not thy cause,
Thou hast no reputation wounded in't,
Thine's but a general zeal: 'death: I am tainted,
The dearest twyn to life, my credit's murder'd,
Bast'd and boy'd,

Mount. I am glad ye have swallow'd it,
I must confess I pity ye; and 'tis a justice,
A great one too, you should revenge these injuries:
I know it, and I know ye fit and bold to do it,
And man, as much as man may: but Miranda,
Why do ye kneel;

Mir. By——I'll grow to the ground here,
And with my sword dig up my grave, and fall in't
Unless thou grant me: dear Mountferrat, friend,
Is any thing in my power, to my life, Sir?
The honor shall be yours.

Mount. I love ye dearly,
Yet so much I should tender.

Mir. I'll preserve all:
By——I will: or all the sin fall with me,
Pray let me.

Mount. Ye have won: I'll once be coward
To pleasure you.

Mir. I kiss your hands, and thank ye.

Mount. Be tender of my credit, and fight bravely.

Mir. Blow not the fire that flames.

Mount. I'll send mine Armor,
My man shall presently attend ye with it,
For you must arm immediately, the hour calls,
I know 'twill fit ye right; be sure, and secret,
And last be fortunate; farewell: ye are fitted:
I am glad the load's off me.

Mir. My best Mountferrat.

Exeunt

Scena Quarta.

Enter Norandine and Doctor.

Nor. Doctor, I will see the Combat, that's the truth on't
If I had never a leg, I would crawl to see it.

Doct. You are most unfit, if I might counsel ye,
Your wounds so many, and the air——

Nor. The Halter;
The air's as good an air, as fine an air;
Wouldst thou have me live in an Oven?

Doct. Beside the noise, Sir:
Which to a tender body.

Nor. That's it, Doctor,
My body must be cur'd withal: if you'll heal me quickly,
Boil a Drum-head in my broth: I never prosper,
With knuckles o' Vcal, and birds in Sorrel sops,
Cawdles, and Cullysses; they wash me away
Like a horse had eaten grains: if thou wilt cure me,
A pickled herring, and a pottle of Sack: Doctor,
And half a dozen Trumpets.

Doct. Y' are a strange Gentleman,

Nor. As e'r thou knew'st: wilt thou give me another glister
That I may sit cleanly there like a French Lady,
When she goes to a Mask at Court; where'st hy hoboy?

Doct. I am glad ye are grown so merry.

Nor. Welcome Gentlemen.

Enter Astor, and Castr.

Ast. We come to see you, Sir; and glad we are
To see you thus, thus forward to your health, Sir.

Nor. I thank my Doctor here.

Doct. Nay, thank your self, Sir,
For by my troth, I know not how he's cur'd,
He ne'r observes any of our prescriptions. (Doctor,

Nor. Give me my Money again then, good sweet
Wilt thou have twenty shillings a day for vexing me.

Doct.

Doct. That shall not serve ye Sir ;

Nor. Than forty shall Sir,

And that will make ye speak well : hark the Drums.

Capt. They begin to beat to th' field : Oh noble Dane,
Never was such a stake, I hope of innocence
Plaid for in Malta, and in blood before.

Ast. It makes us hang our heads all.

Nor. A bold villain :

If there be treason in it : accuse poor Ladies ?

And yet they may do mischief too : I'll be with ye :

If she be innocent, I shall find it quickly,

And something then I'll say.

Ast. Come, lean on us, Sir.

Nor. I thank ye Gentlemen : and Domine Doctor,
Pray bring a little freezing powder in your pocket,
For fear I found when I see my blood.

Doct. You are pleasant.

Exeunt.

Scena Quinta.

Enter two Marshals.

1. Are the Combatants come in ?

2. Yes.

1. Make the field clear there.

2. That's done too.

The Scaffold set out, and the stairs.

1. Then to the prisoner : the grand Master's coming,
Let's see that all be ready there.

2. Too ready.

How ceremonious our very ends are ?

Alas, sweet Lady,

If she be innocent,

No doubt but justice will direct her Champion

Away : I hear 'em come :

1. Pray heaven she prosper.

Flourish.

Enter Valetta, Norandine, Astor, Castriot, &c.

Val. Give Captain Norandine a chair.

Nor. I thank your Lordship.

Val. Sit Sir, and take your ease : your hurts require it
You come to see a womans cause decided
That's all the knowledge now, or name I have for her :
They say a false, a base, and treacherous woman,
And partly prov'd too.

Nor. Pity it should be so :

And if your Lordship durst ask my opinion,

Sure, I should answer no : so much I honor her :

And answer't with my life too : But Gomera

Is a brave Gentleman ; the other valiant,

And if he be not good, dogs gnaw his flesh off,

And one above 'em both will find the truth out.

He never fails, Sir,

Val. That's the hope rests with me.

Nor. How nature and his honor struggle in him !

A sweet, clear, noble Gentleman. Within, make room there.

Guard. Make room there.

Val. Go up, and what you have to say, say there,

Enter Oriana, Ladies, Executioner, Abdella, and Guard.

Ori. Thus I ascend : nearer I hope to heaven,
Nor doe I fear to tread this dark black Mansion :

The Image of my grave, each foot we move,

Goes to it still : each hour we leave behind us,

Knols sadly toward it : My noble Brother

For yet mine innocence dares call ye so,

And you the friends to virtue, that come hither,

The Chorus to this Tragick Scene, behold me,

Behold me with your Justice, not with Pity,

(My cause was ne'r so poor to ask compassion,)

Behold me in this spotless White I wear,

The Emblem of my life, of all my actions,

So ye shall find my story, though I perish :

Behold me in my Sex, I am no Soldier,

Tender, and full of fears our blushing Sex is,

Unhardned with relentless thoughts ; unhatcht

With blood, and bloody practice : alas we tremble ;

Drums afar off.

A low March.

But when an angry dream allicts our fancies,
Die with a tale well told : had I been practis'd,
And known the way of mischief, travell'd in it
And given my blood, and honor up to reach it,
Forgot Religion, and the line I sprung on,
Oh heaven, I had been fit then for thy justice,
And then in black, as dark as Hell, I had howl'd here.
Last, in your own opinions weigh mine innocence,
Amongst ye I was planted from an Infant
(Would then, if heaven had so been pleas'd, I had perish'd)
Grew up, and goodly, ready to bear fruit,
The honourable fruit of marriage :

And am I blasted in my bud with Treason ?

Boldly, and basely of my fair name ravish'd,

And hither brought to find my rest in ruine ?

But he that knows all, he that rights all wrongs,

And in his time restores, knows me : I have spoken.

Val. If ye be innocent, heaven will protect ye,

And so I leave ye to his Sword strikes for ye,

Farewell.

Ori. Oh that went deep, farewell dear brother,

And howso'er my cause goes, see my body

(Upon my knees I ask it) buried chastely ;

For yet, by holy truth, it never trespass'd.

Ast. Justice sit on your cause ; and heaven fight for ye.

Nor. Two of ye Gentlemen, do me but the honor

To lead me to her : good my Lord, your leave too :

Val. You have it Sir.

Nor. Give me your fair hands fearless,

As white as this I see your Innocence,

As spotless, and as pure : be not afraid Lady,

You are but here brought to your nobler fortune,

To add unto your life immortal story :

Vertue, through hardest things arrives at happiness,

Shame follow that blunt sword that looses you :

And he that strikes against you : I shall study

A curse or two for him : once more your fair hands,

I never brought ill luck yet ; be fearless happy.

Ori. I thank ye, noble Captain.

Nor. So I leave ye.

Val. Call in the Knights severally.

Enter severally Gomera and Miranda.

Ori. But two words to my champion,

And then to heaven and him, I give my cause up :

Val. Speak quickly, and speak short.

Ori. I have not much Sir.

Noble Gomera, from your own free virtue,

You have undertaken here a poor Maids honor.

And with the hazard of your life : and happily

You may suspect the cause, though in your true worth

You will not shew it, therefore take this testimony

(And as I hope for happiness, a true one)

And may it steel your heart, and edge your good sword,

Ye fight for her, as spotless of these mischiefs,

As heaven is of our sins, or truth of errors,

And so desie that treacherous man, and prosper.

Nor. Blessing o'thy heart Lady.

Val. Give the signal to 'em.

Low Alarms.

Nor. 'Tis bravely fought Gomera ; follow that blow,

Well struck again boy : look upon the Lady,

And gather spirit : brave again : lye close.

Lye close I say : he fights aloft, and strongly :

Close for thy life : a vengeance o' that fell buffet :

Retire, and gather breath : ye have day enough Knights ;

Look lovely on him Lady : to't again now

Stand, stand Gomera, stand : one blow for all now.

Gather thy strength together ; God bless the woman :

Why, where's thy noble heart ? heaven bless the Lady.

All. Oh, oh !

Val. She is gone, she is gone :

Nor. Now strike it.

Hold, hold : he yields : hold thy brave sword he's conquer'd :

He's

He's thine Gomera, now be joyful Lady :
What could this thief have done, had his cause been equal ?
He made my heart-strings tremble.

Val. Off with his Caske there ;
And Executioner take you his head next.

Abdel. Oh cursed fortune !

Gom. Stay, I beseech ye, Sir, and this one honor
Grant me : I have deserv'd it ; that this villain
May live one day, to envy at my justice,
That he may pine and dye, before the sword fall.
Viewing the glory, I have won her goodness.

Val. He shall, and you the harvest of your valour
Shall reap brave Sir, abundantly.

Gom. I have sav'd her.
Preserv'd her spotless worth from black destruction,
Her white name to eternity deliver'd,
Her youth, and sweetness, from a timeless ruine.
Now Lord Valetta, if this bloody labour
May but deserve her favour.

Mir. Stay, and hear me first.

Val. Off with his Cask, this is Miranda's voice.

Nor. 'Tis he indeed, or else mine eies abuse me,
What makes he here thus ?

Ori. The young Miranda ?

Is he mine enemy too ?

Mir. None has deserv'd her
If worth must carry it, and service seek her,
But he that sav'd her honor.

Gom. That's I Miranda.

Mir. No, no, that's I Gomera, be not so forward,
In bargain for my love, ye cannot cozen me.

Gom. I fought it.

Mir. And I gave it : which is nobler ?
Why every Gentleman would have done as much
As you did : fought it : that's a poor desert, Sir,
They are bound to that ; but then to make that fight sure,
To do as I did, take all danger from it
Suffer that coldness, that must call me now
Into disgrace for ever, into pity.

Gom. I undertook first, to preserve from hazard.

Mir. And I made sure no hazard should come near her.

Gom. 'Twas I deserv'd Mountferat.

Mir. 'Twas I wrought him,
You had had a dark day else ; 'Twas I deserv'd
His conscience first, 'twas I that shook him there,
Which is the brave defiance.

Gom. My life and honor
At stake I laid,

Mir. My care ; and truth lay by it
Least that stake might be lost : I have deserv'd her,
And none but I ; the Lady might have perish'd,
Had Fell Mountferat struck it, from whose malice
With cunning, and bold confidence I catch'd it,
And 'twas high time, and such a service Lady
For you, and for your innocence, for who knows not
The all-devouring sword of fierce Mountferat ?
I shew'd ye what I could do, had I been spiteful
Or Master but of halfe the poison he bears,
(Hell take his heart for't) and beshrew these hands Madam,
With all my heart, I wish a mischief on 'em,
They made ye once look sad : such another fright
I would not put ye in, to owe the Island,
Yet pardon me, 'twas but to shew a Soldier,
Which, when I had done, I ended your poor coward.

Val. Let some look out, for the base Knight Mountferat.

Ab. I hope he's far enough, if his man be trusty :
This was a strange misfortune ; I must not know it.

Val. That most debauch'd Knight, come down sweet Sister
My spotless Sister : now, pray thank these Gentlemen,
They have deserv'd both truly, nobly of ye.
Both excellently, dearly, both all the honor
All the respect and favour.

Ori. Both shall have it ;
And as my life, their memories I'll nourish.

Val. Ye are both true Knights, and both most worthy Lo-
Here stands a Lady ripen'd with your service, (vers, Young, fair, and (now I dare say) truly honourable :

'Tis my Will she shall marry : marry now,
And one of you (she cannot take more nobly) your deserts
Begot this Will, and bred it ; both her beauty
Cannot enjoy : dare ye mark me your umpier ?

Gom. Mir. With all our Souls.

Val. He must not then be angry
That looses her.

Gom. Oh that were Sir, unworthy,

Mir. A little sorrow he may find.

Val. 'Tis manly.

Gomera, you are a brave accomplish'd Gentleman
A braver no where lives than is Miranda,
In the white way of virtue, and true valour.
Ye have been a pilgrim long : yet no man farther
Has trod those thorny steps, than young Miranda,
You are gentle : he is gentleness it self : Experience
Calls you her brother ; this her hopeful heir

Nor. The young man now, and 't bethy Will.

Val. Your hand, Sir ;
You undertook first : nobly undertook,
This Ladies cause : you made it good, and fought it
You must be serv'd first, take her, and enjoy her ;
I give her to you : kiss her, are you pleas'd now ?

Gom. My joy's so much I cannot speak.

Val. Nay, fairest Sir ;
You must not be displeas'd : you break your promise.

Mir. I never griev'd at good, nor dare I now, Sir,
Though something seem strange to me.

Val. I have provided
A better match for you : more full of Beauty,
I'll wed ye to our Order : there's a Mistress,
Whose beauty ne'r decays : time stands below her :
Whose honor, Ermin-like, can never suffer,
Spot, or black foil ; whose eternal issue
Fame brings up at her breasts, and leaves 'em fainted,
Her you shall marry.

Mir. I must humbly thank ye.

Val. Saint Thomas Fort, a charge of no small value
I give ye too, in present, to keep waking
Your noble spirits ; and to breed ye pious,
I'll send ye a probation Robe, wear that
Till ye shall please to be our brother : how now ?

Enter Astorius.

As. Mountferat's fled, Sir.

Val. Let him go awhile
Till we have done these Rites, and seen these coupled :
His mischief now lies open : come all friends now.
And so let's march to th' Temple, sound those Instruments,
That were the signal to a day of blood ;
Evil beginning hours may end in good. Flourish.

Nor. Come, we'll have wenches man, and all brave things.
— Let her go : we'll want no Mistresses,
Good Swords, and good strong Armors.

Mir. Those are best Captain. (after us.)

Nor. And fight till Queens be in love with us, and run
I'll see ye at the Fort within these two days,
And let's be merry prethee.

Mir. By that time I shall.

Nor. Why that's well said : I like a good heart truly.

Exeunt.

Actus

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Norandine, and Servant, Corporal and Soldiers above.

Ser. THe day's not yet broke, Sir.
Nor. 'Tis the cooler riding,
I must goe see Miranda: bring my horse
Round to the South Port: I'll out here at the beach
And meet ye at the end o' th' Sycamores:
'Tis a sweet Walk, and if the wind be stirring
Serves like a Fan to cool.

Corporal and Watch above singing.

SONG.

1. SIt Soldiers, sit and sing, the Round is clear
And Cock-a-loodle-looe, tells us the day is near.
Each tofs his Cann, until his throat be mellow,
Drink, laugh and sing, the Soldier has no fellow.
2. To thee a full pot, my little Lance-presado,
And when thou hast done, a pipe of Trinidado.
Our glafs of life runs wine, the Vintner sinks it
Whilst with his Wife the frolick Soldier drinks it.
3. The Drums beat, Ensigns wave, and Cannons thump it
Our Game is Ruffe, and the best heart doth trump it:
Each tofs his Cann until his throat be mellow
Drink, Laugh, and Sing, the Soldier has no fellow.
4. I'll pledge thee my Corporal, were it a Flagon
After Watch fiercer, than George did the Dragon,
What blood we loose i' th' Town, we gain i' th' Tuns,
Furr'd Gowns, and flat Caps, give the wall to Guns
Each tofs his Cann, until his throat be mellow,
Drink, laugh, and sing, the Soldier has no fellow.

Ser. Which Walk?

Nor. Why that, Sir,

Where the fine City Dames meet to make matches.

Ser. I know it.

Nor. Speed ye then: what mirth is this?

The Watches are not yet discharg'd, I take it:
These are brave careles Rogues; I'll hear the Song out
And then I'll fit ye for't, merry Companions:
Here's notable Order, now for a trick to tame ye—
Owgh, owgh.

1 Wat. Hark, hark, what's that below us, who goes there?

Nor. Owgh, owgh, owgh.

2 Wat. 'Tis a Bear broke loose: pray call the Corporal.

1 Wat. The Dutchmans huge fat Sow.

2 Wat. I see her now, and five fine pigs.

Nor. Owgh, owgh.

Corp. Now, what's the matter?

1 Wat. Here's the great fat Sow, Corporal.

The Dutchmans Sow, and all the Pigs, brave fat Pigs,
You have been wishing long she would break loose.

Nor. Owgh, owgh.

Cor. 'Tis she indeed, there's a white pig now sucking,
Look, look, do you see it, Sirs?

1 Wat. Yes very well, Sir.

Cor. A notable fat whorson; come two of ye.
Go down with me, we'll have a tickling breakfast.

2 Wat. Let's eat 'em at the Cross.

Cor. There's the best liquor.

Nor. I'll liquor some of ye, ye lazie rogues,
Your minds are of nothing but eating and swilling:
What a sweet Beast they have made of me? a Sow?
Hogg upon hogg, I hear 'em come.

Enter Cor. below, and Watch.

Cor. Go softly, and fall upon 'em finely, nithbly.

1 Wat. Bless me.

Cor. Why, what's the matter?

1 Wat. Oh the devil?

The devil, as high as a Steeple.

2 Wat. There he goes Corporal;
His feet are Cloven too.

Cor. Stand, stand I say: death, how I shake?

Where be your Muskets?

1 Wat. There's no good of them:

Where be our Prayers, man?

2 Wat. Lord, how he stalks: speak to him Corporal.

Cor. Why, what a devil art thou.

Nor. Owgh, owgh.

Cor. A dumb devil.

The worst devil that could come, a dumb devil,
Give me a Musket; he gathers in to me,
I' th' name of—speak what art thou?—speak devil;
Or I'll put a plumb in your belly.

Nor. Owgh, owgh, owgh.

Cor. Fie, fie, in what a sweat I am! Lord bless me;
My Musket's gone too, I am not able to stir it:

Nor. Who goes there? stand, speak.

Corp. Sure I am enchanted.

Yet here's my Halbert still: nay, who goes there, Sir?

What have I lost my self? what are ye?

Nor. The Guard.

Corp. Why, what are we then: he's not half so long now.

Nor he has no tail at all, I shake still damnably.

Nor. The word.

Corp. Have mercy on me, what word does he mean?
Prethee devil, if thou be'st the devil,
Do not make an Ass of me; for I remember yet
As well as I am here, I am the Corporal,
I'll lay my life on't devil.

Nor. Thou art damn'd:

Corp. That's all one: but am not I the Corporal?
I would give a thousand pound to be resolv'd now,
Had not I Soldiers here?

Nor. No, not a man,
Thou art debauch'd, and cozen'd.

Corp. That may be,
It maybe I am drunk; Lord, where have I been?
Is not this my Halbert in my hand?

Nor. No, 'tis a May-pole.

Cor. Why then I know not who I am, nor what,
Nor whence I come.

Nor. Ye are an arrand Rascal;
You Corporal of a Watch.

Cor. 'Tis the Dane's voice: you are no devil then:

Nor. No, nor no Sow, Sir.

Cor. Of that I am right glad, Sir,
I was ne'r so frighted in my life, as I am a Soldier.

Nor. Tall watchmen,
A guard for a Goose, you sing away your Centuries.
A careful company: let me out o' th' port here,
I was a little merry with your worships:
And keep your guards strong, though the devil walk.
Hold, there's to bring ye into your wits again.
Goe off no more to hunt Pigs: such another trick
And you will hunt the gallows.

Cor. Pray Sir pardon us:
And let the devil come next, I'll make him stand
Or make him stink.

Nor. Doe, doe your duty truly.
Come let me out, and come away: no more rage.

Exe.

Scena

Enter

Scena Secunda.

Enter Abdella with a Letter, and Rocca.

Ab. Write thus to me? he hath fearfully, and basely Betraid his own cause: yet to free himself He now ascribes the fault to me.

Roc. I know not.

What he hath done: but what he now desires, His Letters have inform'd you.

Ab. Yes, he is Too well acquainted with the power he holds, Over my mad affections: I want time To write: but pray you tell him, if I were No better steel'd in my strong resolutions Than he hath shown himself in his; or thought There was a hell hereafter, or a Heaven, But in enjoying him, I should stick here, And move no further: bid him yet take comfort; For something I would do, the devil would quake at, But I'll untie this Nuptial knot of love, And make way for his wishes: in the mean time Let him lie close, for he is strictly fought for, And practise to love her, that for his ends Scorns fear and danger.

Enter Oriana and Velleda.

Roc. All this I will tell him.

Exit Rocca.

Ab. Do so: farewell. My Lady, with my fellow, So earnest in discourse! what e'er it be I'll second it.

Vel. He is such a noble Husband, In every circumstance so truly loving, That I might say, and without flattery, Madam The Sun sees not a Lady but your self That can deserve him.

Abd. Of all men I say That dare (for 'tis a desperate adventure) Wear on their free necks the sweet yoke of woman, (For they that do repine, are no true husbands) Give me a Soldier.

Ori. Why, are they more loving Than other men?

Abd. And love too with more judgement; For, but observe, your Courtier is more curious To set himself forth richly than his Lady; His baths, perfumes, nay paintings too, more costly Than his frugality will allow to her, His clothes as chargeable; and grant him but A thing without a beard, and he may pass At all times for a woman, and with some Have better welcome: Now, your man of Lands For the most part is careful to manure them, But leaves his Lady fallow; your great Merchant Breaks oftner for the debt he owes his wife, Than with his creditors; and that's the reason She looks elsewhere for payment: Now your Soldier —

Vel. I marry do him right.

Abd. First, who has one, Has a perpetual guard upon her honor; For while he wears a sword, slander her self Dares not bark at it: next, she sits at home Like a great Queen, and sends him forth to fetch in Her tribute from all parts; which being brought home, He laies it at her feet, and seeks no further For his reward, than what she may give freely, And with delight too, from her own Exchequer Which he finds ever open.

Ori. Be more modest.

Abd. Why, we may speak of that we are glad to taste of, Among our selves I mean.

Ori. Thou talkst of nothing.

Abd. Of nothing Madam? You have found it something;

Or with the raising up this pretty mount here, My Lord hath dealt with spirits.

Enter Gomera.

Ori. Two long hours absent?

Gom. Thy pardon sweet: I have been looking on The Prize that was brought in by the brave Dane, The valiant Norandine, and have brought something, That may be thou wilt like of; but one kiss, And then possess my purchase: there's a picce Of cloth of Tissue, this of purple Velvet, And as they swear, of the right Tyrian dye, Which others here but weakly counterfeit: If they are worth thy use, wear them; if not, Bestow them on thy women.

Abd. Here's the Husband.

Gom. While there is any trading on the Sea Thou shalt want nothing; 'tis a Soldiers glory, However he neglect himself, to keep His Mistris in full lustre.

Ori. You exceed, Sir.

Gom. Yet there was one part of the prize dispos'd of Before I came, which I grieve that I miss'd of, Being almost assur'd, it would have been A welcome present.

Ori. Pray you say, what was it?

Gom. A Turkish Captive of incomparable beauty, And without question, in her Countrey Noble; Which, as companion to thy faithful Moor, I would have given thee for thy slave.

Ori. But was she Of such an exquisite form?

Gom. Most exquisite.

Ori. And well descended?

Gom. So the habit promis'd, In which she was taken.

Ori. Of what years?

Gom. 'Tis said A Virgin of fourteen.

Ori. I pity her, And wish she were mine, that I might have the means T'entertain her gently.

Gom. She's now Miranda's, And as I have heard, made it her suit to be so.

Ori. Miranda's? then her fate deserves not pity, But envy rather.

Gom. Envy Oriana?

Ori. Yes, and their envy that live free.

Gom. How's this?

Ori. Why, she's falln into the hands of one, So full of that, which in men we stile goodness, That in her being his slave, she is happier far Than if she were confirm'd the Sultan's Mistris.

Gom. Miranda is indeed a Gentleman Of fair desert, and better hopes, but yet He hath his equals.

Ori. Where? I would go far, As I am now, though much unfit for travails, But to see one that without injury Might be put in the scale, or paralell'd, In any thing that's Noble, with Miranda; His knowledge in all services of war, And ready courage, to put into act That knowing judgement, as you are a Soldier You best may speak of. Nor can you deliver, Nor I hear with delight, a better subject. And heaven did well, in such a lovely feature To place so chaste a mind; for he is of So sweet a carriage, such a winning nature, And such a bold, yet well-dispos'd behaviour; And to all these, h'as such a charming tongue, That if he would serve under Loves fresh colours, What monumental Trophies might he raise,

Of his free conquests, made in Ladies favors?

Gom. Yet you did resist him, when he was An earnest suitor to you.

Ori. Yes I did;
And if I were again sought to, I should;
But must ascribe it, rather to the fate
That did appoint me yours, than any power
Which I can call mine own.

Gom. Even so?

Abd. Thanks fortune,
The plot I had to raise, in him, doubts of her,
Thou hast effected.

Ori. I could tell you too,
What cause I have to love him, with what reason.
In thankfulness, he may expect from me,
All due observance; but I pass that, as
A benefit, for which, in my behalf,
You are his debtor.

Abd. I perceive it takes,
By his chang'd looks.

Ori. He is not in the City?
Is he my Lord?

Gom. Who Lady?

Ori. Why Miranda,
Having you here, can there be any else
Worth my enquiry?

Gom. This is somewhat more
Than love to virtue,

Ori. Faith when he comes hither
(As sometimes, without question you shall meet him)
Invite him home.

Gom. To what end?

Ori. To dine with us,
Or sup.

Gom. And then to take a hard bed with you:
Mean you not so?

Ori. If you could win him to it,
'Twould be the better; for his entertainment,
Leave that to me, he shall find Noble usage,
And from me a free welcome.

Gom. Have you never Heard of a Roman Lady (Oriana)
Remembered as a president for Matrons,
(Chaste ones, I pray you understand) whose husband
Tax'd for his sovre breath by his enemy,
Condemn'd his wife, for not acquainting him
With his infirmity?

Ori. 'Tis a common one;
Her answer was, having kiss'd none but him,
She thought it was a general disease
All men were subject to; but what infer you
From that my Lord?

Gom. Why, that this virtuous Lady
Had all her thoughts so fixed upon her Lord,
That she could find no spare time to sing praises
Of any other; nor would she employ
Her husband (though perhaps in debt to years
As far as I am) for an instrument
To bring home younger men that might delight her
With their discourse, or —

Ori. What my Lord?

Gom. Their persons,
Or if I should speak plainer —

Ori. No it needs not,
You have said enough to make my innocence know
It is suspected.

Gom. You betray your self
To more than a suspicion; could you else
To me that live in nothing but love to you
Make such a gross discovery, that your lust
Had sold that heart I thought mine, to Miranda?
Or rise to such a height in impudence,
As to presume to work my yielding weakness
To play for your bad ends, to my disgrace,

The Wittal, or the Pander?

Ori. Do not study

To print more wounds, (for that were tyranny)
Upon a heart that is pierced through already.

Gom. Thy heart? thou hast pierc'd through mine honor
The honor of my house, fool that I was, (false one,
To give it up to the deceiving trust
Of wicked woman: for thy sake vild creature,
For all I have done well, in my life,
I have dig'd a grave, all buried in a wife;
For thee I have des'd my constant Mistress,
That never fail'd her servant, glorious war;
For thee, refus'd the fellowship of an Order
Which Princes, through all dangers, have been proud
To fetch as far as from Jerusalem:
And am I thus rewarded?

Vel. By all goodness,

You wrong my Lady, and deserve her not,
When you are at your best: repent your rashness;
'Twill show well in you.

Abd. Do, and ask her pardon.

Ori. No, I have liv'd too long, to have my faith
(My tri'd faith) call'd in question, and by him
That should know true affection is too tender
To suffer an unkind touch, without ruine;
Study ingratitude, all, from my example;
For to be thankful now, is to be false.
But be it so, let me dye, I see you wish it;
Yet dead for truth, and pities sake, report
What weapon you made choice of, when you kild me.

Vel. She faints.

Abd. What have ye done?

Ori. My last breath cannot
Be better spent, than to say I forgive you;
Nor is my death untimely, since with me
I take along, what might have been hereafter
In scorn delivered for the doubtful issue
Of a suspected mother.

Vel. Oh, she's gone.

Abd. For ever gone. Are you a man?

Gom. I grow here.

Abd. Open her mouth, and power this Cordial in it;
If any spark of life be unquench'd in her,
This will recover her.

Vel. 'Tis all in vain,
She's stiffe already: live I, and she dead?
Gom. How like a murtherer I stand? look up,
And hear me curse my self, or but behold
The vengeance I will take for't Oriana,
And then in peace forsake me: Jealousie,
Thou loathsome vomit of the fiends below,
What desperate hunger made me to receive thee
Into my heart, and soul? I'll let thee forth,
And so in death finde ease; and does my fault then
Deserve no greater punishment? no, I'll live
To keep thee for a fury to torment me,
And make me know what hell is on the earth:
All joyes and hopes forsake me; all mens malice,
And all the plagues they can inflict, I wish it
Fall thick upon me: let my tears be laught at,
And may mine enemies smile to hear me groane;
And dead, may I be pitied of none.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Collonna and Lucinda.

Luc. Pray you Sir why was the Ordnance of the Fort.
Discharg'd so sodainly?

Col. 'Twas the Governors pleasure,
In honor of the Dane, a custom us'd,
To speak a Soldiers welcome.

Luc. 'Tis a fit one:
But is my Master here too?

Col. Three days since.

Luc. Might I demand without offence, so much,
Is't pride in him (however now a slave)
That I am not admitted to his presence?

Col. His curtesie to you, and to mankind
May easily resolve you, he is free
From that poor vice which only empty men
Esteem a virtue.

Luc. What's the reason then,
As you imagine, Sir?

Col. Why I tell you;
You are a woman of a tempting beauty,
And he, however virtuous, as a man
Subject to humane frailties; and how far
They may prevail upon him, should he see you,
He is not ignorant: and therefore chooses,
With care t'avoid the cause that may produce
Some strange effect, which will not well keep ranck
With the rare temperance, which is admired
In his life hitherto.

Luc. This much increases
My strong desire to see him.

Col. It should rather Teach you to thank the Prophet that you worship,
That you are such a mans, who though he may
Do any thing which youth and heat of blood
Invites him to, yet dares not give way to them:
Your entertainment's Noble, and not like
Your present fortune; and if all those tears
Which made grief lovely in you, in the relation
Of the sad story, that forc'd me to weep too,
Your husbands hard fate were not counterfeit;
You should rejoyce that you have means to pay
A chaste life to his memory, and bring to him
Those sweets, which while he liv'd, he could not tast of;
But if you wantonly bestow them on Another man you offer violence
To him, though dead; and his griev'd spirit will suffer
For your immodest looseness.

Luc. Why, I hope, Sir,
My willingness to look on him, to whom
I owe my life and service, is no proof
Of any unchaste purpose.

Col. So I wish too,
And in the confidence it is not, Lady,
I dare the better tell you he will see you
This night, in which by him I am commanded,
To bring you to his chamber, to what end
I easily should guess, were I Miranda;
And therefore, though I can yield little reason,
(But in a general love to womens goodness)
Why I should be so tender of your honor,
I willingly would bestow some counsail of you,
And would you follow it?

Luc. Let me first hear it,
And then I can resolve you.

Col. My advice then
Is, that you would not, (as most Ladies use
When they prepare themselves for such encounters)
Study to add, by artificial dressings
To native excellence; yours (without help)
But seen as it is now, would make a Hermit
Leaves his deaths head, and change his after hopes
Of endless comforts for a few short minutes
Of present pleasures; to prevent which, Lady,
Practice to take away from your perfections,
And to preserve your chastity unstain'd,
The most deform'd shape that you can put on
To cloud your bodies fair gifts, or your minds,
(It being laboured to so chaste an end)
Will prove the fairest ornament.

Luc. To take from
The workmanship of Heaven is an offence
As great, as to endeavor to add to it;

Of which, I'll not be guilty: Chastity
That lodges in deformity, appears rather
A mule't impos'd by nature, than a blessing;
And 'tis commendable only when it conquers,
Though nere so oft assaulted, in resistance:
For me, I'll therefore so dispose my self,
That if I hold out, it shall be with honor;
Or if I yield, Miranda shall find something
To make him love his victory.

Exit.

Col. With what cunning
This woman argues for her own damnation?
Nor should I hold it for a miracle,
Since they are all born Sophisters to maintain
That lust is lawful, and the end and use
Of their creation: would I never had Hop'd better of her; or could not believe,
Though seen the ruin, I must ever grieve.

Exit.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Miranda, Norandine, Servants with Lights.

Mir. I'll see you in your chamber.

A Table out,
two stools.

Nor. Pray ye no farther:
It is a ceremony I expect not,
I am no stranger here, I know my lodging,
An have slept soundly there, when the Turks Cannon
Playd thick upon't: O 'twas Royal Musick,
And to procure a sound sleep for a Souldier,
Worth forty of our Fiddles. As you love me
Press it no farther.

Mir. You will overcome.
Wait on him carefully.

Nor. I have took since supper
A rouse or two too much, and by——
It warms my blood.

Mir. You'll sleep the better for't.
Nor. —on't, I should, had but I a kind wench
To pull my Boot-hose off, and warm my night-cap,
There's no charm like it: I love old Adams way;
Give me a diligent Eve, to wait towards bed-time,
Hang up your smooth chin page: and now I think on't,
Where is your Turkish Prisoner?

Mir. In the Castle,
But yet I never saw her.

Nor. Fie upon you:
See her for shame; or hark ye, if you would Perform the friends part to me, the friends part,
It being a fashion of the last edition,
Far from panderism, now send her to me;
You look strange on't, no entertainment's perfect
Without it on my word; no livery like it;
There's no suit got without it,
Gold is an ass to't.

Mir. Go to bed, to bed.
Nor. Well, if she come, I doubt not to convert her,
If not, the sin lye on your head.
Good night

Exit Nor. and Servants.

Enter Colonna and Lucinda.

Col. There you shall find him Lady: you know what I
And if you please you may make use. (have said,

Luc. No doubt Sir.

Col. From hence I shall hear all.

Mir. Come hither young one.
Besheiw my heart: a handsome wench: come nearer,
A very handsome one: do not you grieve, Sweet,
You are a prisoner?

Luc. The loss of liberty
No doubt Sir, is a heavy and a sharp burden
To them that feel it truly: But your servant,
Your humble handmayd, never felt that rigor,
Thanks to that noble will: no want, no hunger,
(Companions still to slaves) no violence

Nor

Nor any unbecoming act, we start at,
Have I yet with; all content and goodness,
Civility, and sweetness of behaviour
Dwell round about me; therefore worthy Master,
I cannot say I grieve my liberty.

Mir. Do not you fancy me too cold a Soldier,
Too obstinate an enemy to youth,
That had so fair a jewel in my Cabinet,
And in so long a time, would nere look on it?

Col. What can she say now?

Luc. Sure I desir'd to see ye,
And with a longing wish.

Col. There's all her virtue.

Luc. Pursu'd that full desire to give ye thanks Sir,
The only Sacrifice I have left, and service,
For all the virtuous care you have kept me safe with.

Col. She holds well yet.

Mir. The pretty fool speaks finely:
Come sit down here.

Luc. O Sir, 'tis most unseemly.

Mir. I'll have it so: sit close, now tell me truly,
Did you ere love yet?

Luc. My years will answer that Sir.

Mir. And did you then love truly?

Luc. So I thought Sir.

Mir. Can ye love me so?

Col. Now!

Luc. With all my duty;
I were unworthy of those favors else,
You daily showre upon me.

Mir. What thinkst thou of me?

Luc. I think ye are a truly worthy Gentleman,
A pattern, and a pride to the age ye live in,
Sweet as the commendations all men give ye.

Mir. A pretty flattering rogue, dare ye kiss that sweet Ye speak so sweetly of? Come. (man

Col. Farewell virtue.

Mir. What hast thou got between thy lips? kiss once
Sure thou hast a spell there. (more.

Luc. More than ere I knew Sir.

Col. All hopes go now. (hear me,

Mir. I must tell you a thing in your ear, and you must
And hear me willingly, and grant me so too,
'Twill not be worth my asking else.

Luc. It must be
A very hard thing Sir, and from my power,
I shall deny your goodness.

Mir. 'Tis a good wench; I must lye with ye Lady.

Luc. 'Tis something strange:
For yet in all my life I knew no bedfellow.

Mir. You will quickly find that knowledge.

Luc. To what end Sir?

Mir. Art thou so innocent, thou canst not guess at it?
Did thy dreams never direct thee?

Luc. 'Faith none yet Sir. (pleasure;

Mir. I'll tell thee then: I would meet thy youth, and Give thee my youth for that, by heaven she fires me,
And teach thy fair white arms, like wanton Ivies
A thousand new embraces.

Luc. Is that all Sir?

And say I should try, may not we lie quietly?
Upon my conscience I could.

Mir. That's as we make it. (then?

Luc. Grant that, that likes ye best, what would ye do

Mir. What would I do? certainly I am no baby,
Nor brought up for a Nun; hark in thine ear.

Luc. Fie, fie, Sir.

Mir. I would get a brave boy on thee,
A warlike boy.

Luc. Sure we shall get ill Christians.

Mir. We'll mend 'em in the breeding then.

Luc. Sweet Master.

Col. Never belief in woman come near me more.

Luc. My best and noblest Sir, if a poor Virgin,

(For yet by—I am so) should chance so far
(Seeing your excellence, and able sweetness)
To forget her self, and slip into your bosome,
Or to your bed, out of a doting on ye,
Take it the best way; have you that cruel heart,
That murd'ring mind too?

Mir. Yes by my troth (sweet) have I,
To lie with her.

Luc. And do you think it well done? (wench,

Mir. That's as she'll think when 'tis done; come to bed
For thou art so pretty, and so witty a companion,
We must not part to night.

Luc. Faith let me go Sir,
And think better on't.

Mir. Yfaith thou shalt not;
I warrant thee I'll think on't.

Luc. I have heard 'em say here,
You are a Maid too.

Mir. I am sure I am, wench,
If that will please thee.

Luc. I have seen a wonder,
And would you loose that for a little wantonness,
(Consider my sweet Master, like a man, now,)
For a few honied kisses, sleight embraces,
That glory of your youth that crown of sweetness?
Can ye deliver that unvalued treasure?

Would ye forsake, to seek your own dishonor,
What gone, no age recovers, nor repentance,
To a poor stranger?

Col. Hold there again, thou art perfect.

Luc. I know you do but try me.

Mir. And I know

I'll try you a great deal farther: prethee to bed;
I love thee, and so well: come kiss me once more;
Is a maiden-head ill bestow'd o'me?

Luc. What's this Sir?

Mir. Why, 'tis the badge (my Sweet) of that holy Order
I shortly must receive, the Cross of Malta.

Luc. What virtue has it?

Mir. All that we call virtuous.

Luc. Who gave it first?

Mir. He that gave all, to save us.

Luc. Why then 'tis holy too?

Mir. True sign of holiness,
The badge of all his Soldiers that profess him.

Luc. The badge of all his Soldiers that profess him,
Can't save in dangers?

Mir. Yes.

Luc. In troubles comfort?

Mir. You say true, sweet.

Luc. In sickness, restore health?

Mir. All this it can do.

Luc. Preserve from evils that afflict our frailties.

Mir. I hope she will be Christian: all these truly.

Luc. Why are you sick then, sick to death with lust?
In danger to be lost? no holy thought,
In all that heart, nothing but wandring frailties
Wild as the wind, and blind as death or ignorance, Inhabit there.

dMir. Forgive me heaven, she says true.

Luc. Dare ye profess that badge, prophane that goodness?

Col. Thou hast redeem'd thy self again, most rarely.

Luc. That holiness and truth ye make me wonder at?
Blast all the bounty heaven gives, that remembrance.

Col. O excellent woman.

Luc. Fling it from ye quickly,
If ye be thus resolv'd; I see a virtue
Appear in't like a sword, both edges flaming
That will consume ye, and your thoughts, to ashes,
Let them profess it that are pure, and noble,
Gentle, and just of thought, that build the cross,
Not those that break it, by—if ye touch me,
Even in the act, I'll make that cross, and curse ye.

Mir. You shall not (fair) I did dissemble with ye,

And but to try your faith, I fashion'd all this:
Yet something you provokt me: this fair cross:
By me (if he but please to help, first gave it) shall nee'r be worn upon a heart corrupted;
Go to your rest, my modest, honest servant,
My fair, and virtuous maid, and sleep secure there,
For when you suffer, I forget this sign here.

Col. A man of men too: O most perfect Gentleman!

Luc. All sweet rest to you sir; I am half a Christian,
The other half, I'll pray for; then for you, Sir;

Mir. This is the fowlest play I'll shew, good night, sweet.

Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Mountferrat and Rocca.

Mount. The Sun's not set yet?

Roc. No Sir.

Mount. Would it were,
Never to rise again to light the world.
And yet, to what vain purpose do I wish it.
Since though I were environ'd with thick mists,
Black as Cymerian darkness, or my crimes,
There is that here, upon which as an anvil
Ten thousand hammers strike, and every spark
They force from it, to me's an other Sun
To light me to my shame?

Roc. Take hope, and comfort.

Mount. They are aides indeed, but yet as far from me,
As I from being innocent: this cave fashion'd
By provident nature, in this solid Rock
To be a den for beasts, alone, receives me,
And having prov'd an enemy to mankind,
All humane helps forsake me.

Roc. I'll nee'r leave you,
And wish you would call back that noble courage
That old invincible fortitude of yours
That us'd to shrink at nothing.

Mount. Then it did not.

But 'twas when I was honest; then in the height
Of all my happiness, of all my glories,
Of all delights, that made life pretious to me
I durst dye Rocca; death it self then to me
Was nothing terrible, because I knew,
The fame of a good Knight would ever live
Fresh on my memory; but since I fell
From my integrity, and dismiss'd those guards,
Those strong assurances of innocence,
That constancy fled from me, and what's worse,
Now I am loathsome to my self; and life
A burthen to me, rack'd with sad remembrance
Of what I have done, and my present horrors
Un-sufferable to me, tortur'd with despair
That I shall nee'r find mercy: hell about me,
Behind me, and before me, yet I dare not,
Still fearing worse, put off my wretched Being.

Enter Abdella.

Roc. To see this would deter a doubtful man
From mischievous intents, much more the practice
Of what is wicked: here's the Moore, look up Sir,
Some ease may come from her.

Mount. New trouble rather,
And I expect it.

Abd. Who is this? Mountferrat?

Rise up for shame, and like a river dri'd up
With a long drought, from me, your bounteous Sea
Receive those tides of comfort that flow to you;
If ever I look lovely: if desert.

Could ever challenge welcome; if revenge,
And unexpected wreek, were ever pleasing
Or could endear the giver of such blessings,
All these I come adorn'd with, and, as due,
Make challenge of those so long wish'd embraces
Which you (unkind) have hitherto deny'd me.

Mount. Why, what have you done for me?

Abd. Made Gomera

As truly miserable, as you thought him happy,
Could you wish more?

Mount. As if his sickness could Recover me; the injuries I receiv'd
Were Oriana's.

Abd. She has paid dear for 'em,
She's dead.

Mount. How?

Abd. Dead; my hate could reach no farther:
Taking advantage of her in a swoon,
Under pretence to give a Cordial to her
I poyson'd her: what stupid dulness is this?
What you should entertain with sacrifice,
Can you receive so coldly?

Mount. Bloody deeds

Are grateful offerings, pleasing to the devill,
And thou, in thy black shape, and blaker actions
Being hel's perfect character, art delighted
To do what I thought infinitely wicked,
Tremble to hear: thou hast, in this taen from me
All means to make amends with penitence,
To her wrong'd virtues, and dispoil'd me of
The poor remainder of that hope was left me,
For all I have already, or must suffer.

Abd. I did it for the best.

Mount. For thy worst ends,
And be assur'd but that, I think to kill thee
Would but prevent, what thy despair must force thee
To do unto thy self, and so to add to Thy most assur'd damnation, thou wert dead now.
But get thee from my sight: and if lust of me
Did ever fire thee (love I cannot call it)
Leap down from those steep Rocks, or take advantage
Of the next tree to hang thy self, and then
I may laugh at it.

Abd. In the mean time

I must be bold, to do so much for you, ha, ha.

Mount. Why grinst thou, devil?

Abd. That 'tis in my power,

To punish thy ingratitude; I made trial
But how you stood affected, and since I know
I'm us'd only for a property,
I can, and will revenge it to the full.
For understand, in thy contempt of me,
Those hopes of Oriana, which I could
Have chang'd to certainties, are lost for ever.

Mount. Why, lives she?

Abd. Yes, but never to Mountferrat,
Although it is in me, with as much ease
To give her freely up to thy possession,
As to remove this rust; which yet despair of:
For by much wrong'd love, gattery, nor threats,
Tears, prayers, nor vows, shall ever win me to it:
So with my curse I leave thee.

Mount. Prethee stay,

Thou know'st I dote on thee, and yet thou art
So peevish, and perverse, so apt to take Trifles unkindly from me.

Abd. To perswade me

To break my neck, to hang, then damn my self,
With you are trifles.

Mount. 'Twas my melancholy

That made me speak I know not what: forgive,
I will redem my fault.

Roc. Believe him Lady.

Mount. A thousand times I will demand thy pardon,

And keep the reckoning on thy lips with kisses.

Abd. There's something else, that would prevail more
(with me.)

Mount. Thou shalt have all thy wishes do but bless me
With means to satisfy my mad desires
For once in Oriana and for ever
I am thine, only thine my best Abdella.

Abd. Were I assur'd of this, and that you would Having enjoy'd her——

Mount. Any thing: make choice of Thine own conditions.

Abd. Swear then, that perform'd,
(To free me from all doubts and fears hereafter)
To give me leave to kill her.

Mount. That our safety
Must of necessity urge us to.

Abd. Then know
It was not poyson, but a sleeping potion
Which she receiv'd; yet of sufficient strength
So to bind up her senses, that no sign
Of life appear'd in her: and thus thought dead,
In her best habit, as the custom is
You know in Malta, with all ceremonies
She's buried in her families monument,
In the Temple of St. John; I'll bring you thither,
Thus, as you are disguis'd; some six hours hence
The potion will leave working.

Ros. Let us haste then.

Mount. Be my good angel, guide me.

Abd. But remember,
You keep your Oath.

Mount. As I desire to prosper
In what I undertake.

Abd. I ask no more.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Miranda, Norandine, and Collonra.

Col. Here sir, I have got the Key; I borrow'd it
Of him that keeps the Church, the door is open.

Mir. Look to the horses then, and please the fellow.
After a few devotions, I'll retire.

Be not far off, there may be some use of ye,
Give me the light: come friend, a few good prayers
Were not bestow'd in vain now, even from you Sir.

Menthat are bred in blood, have no way left 'em,
No bath, no purge, no time to wear it out
Or wash it off, but penitence, and prayer:
I am to take the order, and my youth
Loaden I must confess with many follies,
Circled and bound about with sins as many
As in the house of memory live figures.
My heart I'll open now, my faults confess,
And raise a new man, heaven, I hope, to a new life.

Nor. I have no great devotion, at this instant,
But for a prayer or two, I will not out Sir,
Hold up your finger, when you have pray'd enough.

Mir. Go you to that end.

Nor. I shall ne'er pray alone sure,
I have been so us'd to answer the Clerk: would I had a cushion, for I shall ne'er make a good Hermit, and kneel till my knees are horn, these stones are plaguy hard;
where shall I begin now? for if I do not observe a method,
I shall be out presently.

Ori. Oh, oh.

Nor. What's that Sir? did ye hear?

Mir. Ha; to your prayers.

Nor. 'Twas hereabouts, t'has put me clean away now,
I shall ne'er get in again, ha, by Land,
And water, all children, and all women,
I there it was I left.

Ori. Oh, oh.

Nor. Never tell me Sir,
Here's something got amongst us.

Mir. I heard a groan:

A dismal one, —— Ori. Oh, Oh.

Nor. Here, 'tis here Sir, 'tis here Sir;
A devil in the wall.

Mir. 'Tis some illusion
To fright us from devotion —— Ori. Oh, oh.

Nor. Why 'tis here,
The spirit of a huntsman choak'd with butter:
Here's a new tomb, new trickments too.

Mir. For certain,
This has not been three days here.

Nor. And a Tablet
With rimes upon't.

Mir. I prethee read 'em Norandine.

Nor. An Epi--and Epi--taff. I think 'tis, I 'tis taff, an Upon the most excell, excell--lent--and. (Epitaff.)

Mir. Thou canst not read.

Nor. I have spoyl'd mine eyes with gunpowder,

Mir. An Epitaph upon the most virtuous, and excellent
The honor of Chastity, Oriana. (Lady)

Nor. The grand masters sister: how a devil came she here?
When slipt she out o'th'way, the stone's but half upon her.

Mir. 'Tis a sodain change: certain the mischief
Mounferrat offer'd to her broak her heart-strings.

Nor. Would he were here, I would be the clerk my self,
And by this little light, I would bury him alive here:
Here's no lamenting now. Ori. Oh, oh.

Nor. There 'tis (for her.)

Mir. Sure from the monument, the very stone groanes
Oh, dear Lady: blessing of women, virtue of thy sex;
How art thou set for ever, how stol'n from us.

Babbling, and prating now converse with women.

Nor. Sir, it rises, it looks up. She rises up.

Mir. Heaven bless us.

Nor. It is in womans cloathes, it rises higher.

Mir. It looks about, and wonders, sure she lives Sir.

'Tis she, 'tis Oriana, 'tis that Lady.

Nor. Shall I go to her? Ori. Where am I!

Mir. Stand still.

Ori. What place is this?

Nor. She is as live as I am.

Ori. What smell of earth, and rotten bones, what dark
Lord, whither am I carried? (place?)

Nor. How she stares,
And sets her eyes upon him.

Mir. How is't dear Lady?

Do you know me, how she snakes?

Ori. You are a man.

Mir. A man that honors you.

Ori. A cruel man,

Ye are all cruel: are you in your grave too?

For there's no trusting cruel man, above ground.

Nor. Byr'Lady that goes hard.

Mir. To do you service

And to restore ye to the joys you were in.

Ori. I was in joyes indeed, and hope——

Mir. She sinks again

Again she's gone; she's gone: gone as a shadow,
She sinks for ever, friend.

Nor. She is cold now,

She is certainly departed, I must cry too.

Mir. The blessed angels guide thee: put the stone too,
Beauty thou art gone to dust, goodness to ashes.

Nor. Pray take it well: we must all have our hours
Sir.

Mir. I, thus we are; and all our painted glory,
A bubble that a boy blows in toth' ayr,
And there it breaks.

Nor. I am glad ye sav'd her honor yet.

Mir. Would I had sav'd her life now too: oh heaven
For such a blessing, such a timely blessing

O friend, what dear content 'twould be, what story

To keep my name from worms?

Oria Oh, oh.

Nor. She lives again.

'Twas

Twas but a trance.

Mir. Pray ye call my man in presently
Help with the stone first, oh she stirs again.

Oh call my man away.

Nor. I fly, I fly Sir.

Mir. Upon my knees O heaven, O heaven I thank thee.

Enter Colonna, and Norand.

The living heat steals into every member;
Come help the Coffin out softly, and sodainly;
Where is the Clerk?

Col. Drunk above he is sure Sir.

Mir. Sirrah, you must be secret.

Col. As your soul Sir.

Mir. Softly good friend, take her into your armes.

Nor. Put in the crust again.

Mir. And bring her out there when I am a horseback
My man, and I will tenderly conduct her
Unto the Fort; stay you, and watch what issue,
And what inquirie's for the body.

Nor. Well Sir.

Mir. And when ye have done, come back to me.

Nor. I will.

Mir. Softly, oh softly.

Nor. She grows warmer still Sir.

Col. What shall I do with the Key?

Mir. Thou canst not stir now,

Leave it ith'door, go get the horses ready. Exeunt.

Enter Rocca, Mountferrat, Abdella, with a dark Lanthorn.

Roc. The door's already open, the Key in it.

Mount. What were those past by?

Roc. Some scout of Soldiers, I think.

Mount. It may well be so, for I saw their horses:

They saw not us I hope.

Abd. No, no, we were close,

Beside they were far off.

Mount. What time of night is't?

Abd. Much about twelve I think.

Roc. Let me go in first

For by the leaving open of the door here
There may be some body in the Church: give me the

Abd. You'll love me now I hope. (Lanthorne.)

Mount. Make that good to me

Your promise is engaged for.

Abd. Why she is there

Ready prepar'd, and much about this time
Life will look up again.

Roc. Come in all's sure,

Not a foot stirring, nor a tongue.

Mount. Heaven blefs me,

I never enter'd with such unholy thoughts

This place before.

Abd. Ye are a fearful fool,

If men have appetites allow'd 'em,
And warm desires, are there not ends too for 'em?

Mount. Whether shall we carry her?

Roc. Why, to the bark, Sir,

I have provided one already waits us;

The wind stands wondrous fair too for our passage.

Abd. And there when ye have enjoy'd her, for ye have Let me alone to send her to feed fishes: (that liberty
I'll no more fights for her.

Mount. Where is the monument?

Thou art sure she will awake about this time?

Abd. Most sure, if she be not knockt oth'head: give me
Here 'tis, how is this, the stone off? (the Lanthorn,

Roc. I, and nothing

Within the monument, that's worse; no body

I am sure of that, nor sign of any here,

But an empty Coffin.

Mount. No Lady?

Roc. No, nor Lord Sir,

This Pye has been cut up before.

Abd. Either the Devil

Must do these tricks——

Mount. Or thou, damn'd one, worse;
Thou black swoln pitchy cloud, of all my afflictions:
Thou night hag, gotten when the bright Moon suffer'd:
Thou hell it self confin'd in flesh: what trick now?
Tell me, and tell me quickly what thy mischief
Has done with her, and to what end, and whether Thou hast remov'd her body, or by this holy place
This Sword shall cut thee into thousand pieces,
A thousand thousand, strow thee ore the Temple
A sacrifice to thy black fire, the Devil.

Rod. Tell him, you see he's angry

Abd. Let him burst,

Neither his sword, nor anger do I shake at,
Nor will yield to feed his poor suspitions,
His idle jealousies, and mad dogs heats
One thought against my self: ye have done a brave deed;
A manly, and a valiant piece of Service:
When ye have kill'd me, reckon't amongst your Battels;
I am sorry ye are so poor, so weak a Gentleman,
Able to stand no fortune: I dispose of her?
My mischief make her away? a likely project,
I must play booty against my self, if any thing cros ye,
I am the devil, and the devils heir,
All plagues, all mischiefs.

Mount. Will ye leave and do yet?

Ab. I have done too much,

Far, far too much, for such a thankless fellow,
If I be devil, you created me;
I never knew those arts, nor bloody practises
(— o' your cunning heart, that mine of mischief)
Before your flatteries won 'em into me.
Here did I leave her, leave her with that certainty
About this hour to wake again.

Mount. Where is she?

This is the last demand.

Ab. Did I now know it,

And were I sure, this were my latest minute,
I would not tell thee: strike, and then I'll curse thee:

Roc. I see a light, stand close, and leave your angers.
We all miscarry else.

Enter Gomera, Page with Torch.

Ab. I am now careles,

Mount. Peace, prethee peace, sweet, peace, all friends.

Abd. Stand close then.

Gom. Wait there Boy, with the light, till I call to
In darkness was my soul and senses clouded (thee:
When my fair Jewel fell, the night of jealousy,
In all her blackness drawn about my judgment:
No light was let into me, to distinguish
Betwixt my suddain anger and her honor,
A blind sad Pilgrimage shall be my pennance,
No comfort of the day will I look up at:
Far darker than my jealous Ignorance
Each place of my aboad shall be my prayers
No ceremonious lights shall set off more:
Bright Armes, and all that carry lustre, life,
Society, and solace, I forsake ye.

And were it not once more to see her beauties,
(For in her bed of death, she must be sweet still,)
And on her cold sad lips seal my repentance;
Thou child of heaven, fair light I could not miss thee.

Mount. I know the tongue, would I were out again.

I have done him too much wrong to look upon him.

Ab. There is no shifting now, boldness, and confidence
Must carry it now away: he is but one neither,
Naked as you are, of a strength far under.

Mount. But he has a cause above me.

Ab. That's as you handle it.

Roc. Peace: he may go again, and never see us.

Gom. I feel I weep apace, but where's the flood,
The torrent of my tears, to drown my fault in?
I would I could now, like a loaden cloud,
Begotten in the moist south, drop to nothing.
Give me the Torch, Boy.

Roc. Now he must discover us.

Ab. He has already, never hide your head
Be bold and brave, if we must dye together.

Gom. Who's there? what friend to sorrow? The Tomb
The Stone off too? the body gone, by— (wide open
Look to the door Boy: keep it fast, who are ye?
What sacrilegious villains? false Mounteferrat,
The wolf to honor, has thy hellish hunger,
Brought thee to tear the body out oth'tomb too?
Has thy foul mind so far wrought on thee? ha,
Are you there too? nay, then I spie a villany
I never dream'd of yet, thou sinful usher
Bred from that rottenness, that bawd to mischief,
Do you blush through all your blackness? will not that hide
Ab. I cannot speak. (it?

Gom. You are well met, with your dam, Sir,
Art thou a Knight? did ever on that sword,
The Christian cause sit nobly? could that hand fight,
Guided by fame, and fortune? that heart inflame thee,
With virtuous fires of valor, to fall off,
Fall off so suddainly, and with such foulness,
As the false Angels did, from all their glory?
Thou art no Knight, honor thou never heard'st of,
Nor brave desires could ever build in that breast.
Treason, and tainted thoughts, are all the Gods
Thou worship'st, all the strength thou hadst, and fortune;
Thou didst things out of fear, and false heart, villain
Out of close traps and treacheries, they have raised thee.

Mount. Thou rav'st old man.

Gom. Before thou get'st off from me,
Hast thou the glory of thy first fights on thee
Which thou hast basely lost, thy noblest fortunes,
And in their greatest lustres, I would make thee,
Before we part, confes, nay, kneel, and do it,
Nay, crying kneel, coldly, for mercy, crying:
Thou art the recreant'st Rogue, time ever nourish'd,
Thou art a dog, I will make thee swear, a dog
A mangy Cur-dog; do you creep behind the Altar?
Look how it sweats, to shelter such a rascal;
First, with thy venemous tooth infect her chaste life,
And then not dare to do; next, rob her rest,
Steal her dead body out oth'grave.

Mount. I have not.

Gom. Prethee come out, this is no place to quarrel in,
Valiant Mountferrat come,

Mount. I will not stir.

Gom. Thou hast thy sword about thee,
That good sword, that never faill'd thee: prethee come,
We'll have but five stroaks for it; on, on Boy,
Here's one would fain be acquainted with thee,
Would wondrous fain cleave that Calves-head of yours Sir,
Come, prethee let's dispatch, the Moon shines finely:
Prethee be kill'd by me, thou wilt be hang'd else,
But it may be, thou long'st to be hang'd.

Roc. Out with him, Sir,
You shall have my sword too: when he's dispatch'd once,
We have the world before us.

Gom. Wilt thou walk fellow,
I never knew a Rogue, hang arse-ward so,
And such a desperate knave too.

Ab. Pray go with him,
Something I'll promise too,

Mount. You would be kill'd then?
No remedy; I see,

Gom. If thou dar'st do it?

Mount. Yes, now I dare; lead out, I'll follow presently
Under the Mount I'll meet ye.

Gom. Go before me,
I'll have ye in a string too.

Mount. As I am a Gentleman,
And by this holy place I will not fail thee,
Fear not, thou shalt be kill'd, take my word for it
I will not fail.

Gom. If thou scap'st thou hast Cats luck.

The Mount?

Mount. The same: make hast, I am there before else.

Gom. Go get ye home; now if he scape I am a Coward.

Mount. Well, now I am resolv'd, and he shall find it.
Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Miranda, Lucinda, Collonna.

Mir. How is it with the Lady?

Luc. Sir, as well

As it can be with one, who feeling knowes now
What is the curse the divine justice lay'd
On the first sinful woman.

Mir. Is she in travel?

Luc. Yes sir; and yet the troubles of her mind
Afflict her more, than what her body suffers,
For in the extremity of her pain, she cryes out,
Why am I here? Where is my Lord Gomera,
Then sometimes names Miranda, and then sighes,
As if to speak, what questionless she loves well,
If heard, might do her injury.

Col. Heavens sweet mercy

Look gently on her,

Mir. Prethee tell her, my Prayers
Are present with her, and good wench provide
That she want nothing: what's thy name?

Luc. Lucinda.

Mir. Lucinda? there's a prosperous omen in it,
Be a Lucina to her, and bring word
That she is safe delivered of her burthen,
And thy reward's thy liberty: come Collonna,
We will go see how th'Engineer has mounted
The Cannon the great Master sent, be careful
To view the works, and learn the discipline
That is us'd here: I am to leave the world
And for your service, which I have found faithful,
The charge that's mine, if I have any power
Hereafter may concern you.

Col. I still find

A noble Master in you,

Mir. 'Tis but justice,
Thou do'st deserve it in thy care, and duty. Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Gomera, Mountferrat, Rocca, Abdella, with a Pistol.

Gom. Here's even ground, I'll stir no foot beyond it,
Before I have thy head.

Mount. Draw Rocca.

Gom. Coward,
Hath inward guilt, robb'd thee as well of courage
As honesty? that without odds thou dar'st not Answer a single Enemy?

Mount. All advantage
That I can take, expect.

Roc. We know you are valiant,
Nor do we purpose to make farther trial
Of what you can do now: but to dispatch you.

Mount. And therefore fight, and pray together,
Gom. Villains;

Whose baseness, all disgraceful words made one,
Cannot expres; so strong is the good cause
That seconds me, that you shall feel, with horror
To your proud hopes, what strength is in that arm,
Though old, that holds a sword made sharp by justice.

Ab. You come then here, to prate? fight.

Mount. Help Rocca, now,
Or I am lost for ever; how comes this?
Are villany and weakness twyns?

Roc. I am gone too.

Gom. You shall not scape me, wretches;

Ab. I must do it,

All will go wrong else.

shoots him.

Com. Treacherous bloody woman,
What hast thou done?

Ab. Done a poor womans part,
And in an instant, what these men so long
Stood fooling for.

Mount. This ayd was unexpected,
I kiss thee for't,

Roc. His right arms only shot,
And that compell'd him to forsake his sword,
He's else unwounded.

Mount. Cut his throat.

Ab. Forbear.

Yet do not hope 'tis with intent to save thee.
But that thou mayst live to thy farther torment,
To see who triumphs over thee: come Mountferrat,
Here join thy foot to mine, and let our hearts
Meet with our hands, the contract that is made
And cemented with blood, as this of ours is,
Is a more holy sanction, and much surer,
Than all the superstitious ceremonies
You Christians use.

Enter Norandine.

Roc. Who's this?

Mount. Betray'd again?

Nor. By the report it made, and by the wind
The Pistol was discharg'd here.

Gom. Norandine.

As ever thou lov'st valor, or wear'st Arms
To punish baseness, shew it.

Nor. O the devil,

Gomera wounded, and my Brache black beauty
An actor in it?

Ab. If thou strik'st, I'll shoot thee.

Nor. How? fright me with your Pot-gun? what art thou?
Good heaven, the Rogue, the traytor rogue Mountferrat,
To swinge the nest of you, is a sport unlook'd for,
Hels — consume you.

Mount. As thou art a man,
I am wounded, give me time to answer thee.

Gom. Durst thou urge this? this hand can hold a sword yet.

Nor. Well done: to see this villain, makes my hurts
Bleed fresh again, but had I not a bone whole,
In such a cause I should do thus, thus Rascals.

Enter Corporal and watch.

Cor. Disarm them, and shoot any that resists.

Gom. Hold Corporal; I am Gomera,

Nor. 'Tis well yet, that once in an age you can Remember what you watch for: I had thought
You had again been making out your parties
For sucking piggs.

'Tis well:

Nor. As you will answer

The contrary with your lives, see these forth coming.

Cor. That we shall do.

Nor. You bleed apace: good Soldiers
Go help him to a Surgeon,

Roc. Dare the worst,
And suffer like your self.

Ab. From me learn courage.

Nor. Now for Miranda, this news will beto him
As welcome as 'tis unexpected: Corporal,
There's something for thy care to night; my horse there.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Oriana, and Lucinda.

Ori. How do's my Boy?

Luc. Oh, wondrous lusty Madam,
A little Knight already: you shall live
To see him to'ss a Turk.

Ori. Gentle Lucinda,
Much must I thank thee for thy care, and service.

Enter Miranda, Norandine, Colonna.

And may I grow but strong to see Valetta,
My husband, and my brother, thou shalt find
I will not barely thank thee.

Mir. Look Captain, we must ride away this morning
The Auberge sits to day, and the great Master Writes plainly, I must or deliver in
(The year expir'd) my probation weed,
Or take the Cloak: you likewise Norandine
For your full service, and your last assistance
In false Mountferrats apprehension
Are here commanded to associate me; my twin in this high honor.

Nor. I'll none on't: do they think to bind me to live chast, sober, and temperately, all days of my life? they may as soon tye an Englishman to live so; I shall be a sweet Dane, a sweet Captain, go up and down drinking small beer, and swearing 'ods neagues, no, I'll live a Squire at Arms still, and do thou so too; and thou bee'st wife: I have found the mystery now, why the Gentlemen wear but three bars of the cross, and the Knights the whole one.

Mir. Why Captain?

Nor. Marry Sir, to put us in remembrance, we are but three quarters cross'd in our licence, and pleasures: but the poor Knights cross'd altogether; the brothers at Arms, may yet meet with their Sisters at Arms, now and then, in brotherly love; but the poor Knights cannot get a Lady for love, nor money: 'tis not so in other Countries I wis, pray haste you, for I'll along, and see what will come on't. Exit.

Mir. Colonna, provide strait, all necessaries
For this remove, the Lytter for the Lady,
And let Lucinda bear her company,
You shall attend on me.

Col. With all my duties

Mir. How fare you gracious Mistris? Exit.

Ori. O Miranda.

You pleas'd to honor me with that fair title
When I was free, and could dispose my self;
But now, no smile, no word, no look, no touch
Can I impart to any, but as theft
From my Gomera, and who dares accept,
Is an usurper.

Mir. Leave us; I have touch'd thee,
(Thou fairer virtue, than thou'rt beautiful)
Hold but this test, so rich an ore was never Tryed by the hand of man, on the vast earth:
Sit brightest Oriana, is it sin
Still to profess I love you, still to vow
I shall do ever? heaven my witness be,
'Tis not your eye, your cheek, your tongue, no part
That superficially doth snare young men,
Which has caught me; read over in your thoughts
The story that this man hath made of you,
And think upon his merit.

Ori. Only thought

Can comprehend it.

Mir. And can you be so
Cruel, thankless, to destroy his youth
That sav'd your honor, gave you double life?
Your own, and your fair Infants? that when fortune
(The blind foe to all beauty, that is good,)
Bandied you from one hazard to another,
Was even heavens Messenger, by providence
Call'd to the Temple, to receive you there,
Into these Arms, to give ease to your throwes,
As if't had thunder'd; take thy due Miranda,
For she was thine; Gomera's jealousie
Struck death unto thy heart; to him be dead,
And live to me, that gave thee second life:
Let me but now enjoy thee: Oh regard
The torturing fires of my affections.

Ori. Oh master them, Miranda, as I mine;
Who follows his desires, such tyrants serves
As will oppress him insupportably.
My flames, Miranda, rise as high as thine,
For I did love thee 'fore my marriage,
Yet would I now consent, or could I think Thou wert in earnest, (which by all the souls
That have (for chastity) been sanctified
I cannot) in a moment I do know
Thou'dst call fair temperance up to rule thy blood,
Thy eye was ever chaste, thy countenance too honest,
And all thy wooings was like Maidens talk;
Who yieldeth unto pleasures, and to lust
Is a poor captive, that in Golden Fetters
(And pretious (as he thinks) but holding gyves)
Frets out his life.

Mir. Find such another woman,
And take her for his labour, any man:

Ori. I was not worthy of thee, at my best,
Heaven knew I was not, I had had thee else;
Much less now gentle Sir; Miranda's deeds
Have been as white as Oriana's fame,
From the beginning to this point of time,
And shall we now begin to stain both thus?
Think on the legend which we two shall breed
Continuing as we are, for chasteest dames
And boldest Soldiers to peruse and read,
I and read thorough, free from any act
To cause the modest cast the book away,
And the most honour'd Captain fold it up.

Mir. Fairest; let go my hand: my pulse beats thick,
And my mov'd blood, rides high in every vein,
Lord of thy self now, Soldier, and ever:
I would not for Aleppo, this frail Bark,
This bark of flesh, no better steers-man had
Than has Mountferrat's: may you kiss me, Lady?

Ori. No; though't be no essential injury,
It is a circumstance due to my Lord,
To none else: and my dearest friend, if hands
Playing together, kindle heat in you,
What may the game at Lips provoke unto?

Mir. Oh what a tongue is here? whil'st she doth teach
My heart to hate my fond unlawful love,
She talks me more in love, with love to her,
My fires she quenches with her arguments,
But as she breathes 'em, they blow fresher fires.
Sit further: now my flame cools; Husband, Wife,
There is some holy mystery in those names
That sure the unmarried cannot understand.

Ori. Now thou art strait, and dost enamour me,
So far beyond a carnal earthly love;
My very soul doats on thee, and my spirits
Do embrace thine, my mind doth thy mind kiss,
And in this pure conjunction we enjoy
A heavenlier pleasure than if bodies met:
This, this is perfect love, the other short,
Yet languishing fruition, every Swain
And sweating Groom may clasp, but ours refin'd

Two in ten ages cannot reach unto;
Nor is our spiritual love, a barren joy,
For mark what blessed issue we'll beget,
Dearer than children to posterity,
A great example to mens continence,
And womens chastity, that is a child
More fair and comfortable, than any heir.

Mir. If all wives were but such, lust would not find
One corner to inhabit, sin would be
So strange, remission superfluous:
But one petition, I have done.

Ori. What (Sweet)

Mir. To call me Lord, if the hard hand of death
Seize on Gomera first.

Ori. Oh, much too worthy;
How much you undervalue your own price,
To give your unbought self, for a poor woman,
That has been once sold, us'd, and lost her show?
I am a garment worn, a vessel crack'd,
A Zone unti'd, a Lilly trode upon,
A fragrant Flower cropt by another hand,
My colour sully'd, and my odor's chang'd,
If when I was new blossom'd, I did fear
My self unworthy of Miranda's spring:
Thus over-blown, and feeded, I am rather
Fit to adorn his Chimney, than his bed.

Mir. Rise miracle: save Malta, with thy virtue,
If words could make me proud, how has she spoke,
Yet I will try her to the very block:
Hard-hearted, and uncivil Oriana,
Ingrateful payer of my Industries,
That with a soft painted hypocrisie
Cozen'st, and jeer'st my perturbation,
Expect a witty, and a fell revenge:
My comfort is, all men will think thee false,
Beside thy Husband having been thus long
(On this occasion) in my Fort, and power.

Enter Nor. Collonna, & Lucinda, with a Child.

I'll hear no more words: Captain, let's away
With all care see to her: and you Lucinda
Attend her diligently: she is a wonder.

Nor. Have you found she was well deliver'd:
What, had she a good Midwife, is all well?

Mir. You are merry Norandine.

Luc. Why weep you, Lady?

Ori. Take the poor Babe along.

Col. Madam, 'tis here.

Ori. Dissembling death, why didst thou let me live
To see this change, my greatest cause to grieve? Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Astorius, Castriot, Valetta, Gomera, Synnet, Knights, two Bishops, Mountferrat guarded by Corporal and Soldiers, Abdella, a Gentleman with a Cloak, sword, and Spurs: Gomera.

Val. A tender Husband hast thou shew'd thy self
My dearest brother, and thy memory
After my life in brazen Characters;
Shall monumentally be register'd
To ages consequent, till times running hand,
Beats back the world, to undistinguish'd Chaos,
And on the top of that thy name shall stand
Fresh, and without decay.

Gom. Oh honor'd Sir!
If hope of this, or any bliss to come,
Could lift my load of grief off from my soul,
Or expiate the trespass 'gainst my wife,
That in one hours suspicion I begat,
I might be won to be a man again,
And fare like other Husbands, sleep and eat,
Laugh, and forget my pleasing penitence;

But till old nature can make such a wife
Again, I vow ne'r to resume the order
And habits that to men are necessary,
All breath I'll spend in sighs, all sound in groans,
And know no company but my wailing moans.

Ast. This will be wilful murder on your self,
Nor like a Christian do you bear the chance
Which th' inscrutable Will of Heaven admits.

Gom. What would you have my weakness do, that Suffer'd it self thus to be practis'd on,
By a damn'd hell-hound, and his agent dam,
The impious Midwife, to abortive births,
And cruel instrument to his decrees?
By forgery they first assail'd her life,
Heaven playing with us yet, in that, he wrought
My dearest friend, the servant to her virtue
To combat me, against his Mistress truth.
That yet effectless, this enchanting Witch,
Bred baneful jealousy against my Lady,
My most immaculate Lady, which seiz'd on her
Almost to death: Oh yet! not yet content,
She in my hand put (to restore her life
As I imagin'd) what did execute
Their devilish malice, farther, great with child,
Was this poor innocent, that too was lost,
They doubled death upon her, not staying there,
They have done violence unto her Tomb,
Not granting rest unto her in the grave:
I wish Miranda had enjoy'd my prize;
For sure I'm punish'd for usurping her,
Oh what a Tyger is resisted Lust?
How it doth forrage all?

Mount. Part of this tale

I grant you true; but 'twas not poison given her?

Ab. I would it had, we had been far enough,
If we had been so wise, and had not now
Stood curtesing for your mercies here.

Mount. Beside,

What is become o'th' body? we know not.

Val. Peace impudence,
And dear Gomera practise patience
As I my self must, by some means at last
We shall dissolve this Riddle.

Gom. Wherefore comes
This villain in this festival array,
As if he triumph'd for his treachery?

Cast. That is by our appointment: give us leave,
You shall know why anon.

Enter Miranda, Norandine, Collona.

Val. One of the Esquard.

Esg. The Gentlemen are come.

Val. Truce then awhile,
With our sad thoughts; what are you both resolv'd?

Nor. Not I my Lord, your down-right Captain still I'll live, and serve you, not that altogether
I want compunction of conscience,
I have enough to save me, and that's all,
Bar me from drink, and drabs, ev'n hang me too,
You must ev'n make your Captains Capons first,
I have too much flesh for this spiritual Knighthood,
And therefore do desire forbearance, Sir,
Till I am older, or more mortifi'd,
I am too sound yet,

Val. What say you Miranda?

Mir. With all pure zeal to Heaven, duty to you,
I come to undergo it.

Val. Proceed to th' ceremony.

Gom. Before you match with this bright honor'd title,
Admir'd Miranda, pardon what in thought
I ever did transgress against your virtue;
And may you find more joy with your new Bride
Than poor Gomera e'r enjoy'd with his,

But 'twas mine own crime, and I suffer for't:
Long wear your dignity, and worthily,
Whilst I obscurely in some corner vanish.

Mir. Have stronger thoughts, and better, first I crave
According to the order of the Court
I may dispose my Captives, and the Fort,
That with a clean and purified heart
The fittier I may endue my Robe.

All. 'Tis granted.

Enter Oriana veil'd, Ladies, Lucinda, Child.

Mir. Bring the Captives. To your charge
And staid tuition, my most noble friend;
I then commend this Lady; start not off
A fairer, and a chaster never liv'd;
By her own choice you are her Guardian,
For telling her I was to leave my Fort,
And to abandon quite all worldly cares.
Her own request was, to Gomera's hands
She might be given in custody, for sh'ad heard
He was a Gentleman wife, and temperate,
Full of humanity to Women-kind,
And 'cause he had been married, knew the better
How to entreat a Lady.

Val. What Countrey-woman is she?

Mir. Born a Greek.

Val. Gomera, 'twill be barbarous to denie
A Lady, that unto your refuge flies,
And seeks to throwd her under virtues wing.

Gom. Excuse me noble Sir; oh think me not
So dull a devil, to forget the loss
Of such a matchless wife as I possess'd,
And ever to endure the sight of woman:
Were she the abstract of her sex for form,
The only warehouse of perfection.
Were there no Rose nor Lilly but her Cheek,
No Musick but her tongue, Virtue but hers;
She must not rest near me, my vow is graven,
Here in my heart, irrevocably breath'd
And when I break it.

Ast. This is rudeness Spaniard,
Unseasonably you play the Timonist,
Put on a disposition is not yours,
Which neither fits you, nor becomes you.

Gom. Sir.

Cast. We cannot force you, but we would persuade.

Gom. Beseech you Sir, no more, I am resolv'd
To forsake Malta, tread a pilgrimage
To fair Jerusalem, for my Ladies soul,
And will not be diverted.

Mir. You must bear
This Child along w'ye then.

Gom. What Child?

All. How's this?

Mir. Nay then Gomera, thou art injurious,
This Child is thine, and this rejected Lady
Thou hast as often known, as thine own wife,
And this I'll make good on thee, with my sword.

Gom. Thou durst as well blaspheme: if such a scandal—
(I crave the rights due to a Gentleman)
Woman unvail.

Ori. Will you refuse me yet?

Gom. My Wife!

Val. My Sister!

Gom. Some body, thank Heaven
I cannot speak.

All. All praise be ever given:

Mount. This saves our lives, yet would she had been dead;
The very sight of her afflicts me more
Than fear of punishment, or my disgrace.

Val. How came you to the Temple?

Mir. Sir, to do

My poor devotions, and to offer thanks

For scaping a temptation near perform'd
With this fair Virgin. I restore a wife
Earth cannot parallel: and busie nature
If thou wilt still make women, but remember
To work 'em by this sampler; take heed, Sir,
Henceforth you never doubt, Sir.

Gom. When I do
Death take me suddainly.

Mir. To increase your happiness
To your best wife take this addition.

Gom. Alack my poor knave.

Val. The confession
The Moor made 't seems was truth.

Nor. Marry was it Sir; the only truth that ever issued out of hell, which her black jawes resemble; a plague o' your bacon-face, you must be giving drinks with a vengeance;
ah thou branded bitch: do' ye stare goggles, I hope to make winter-boots o' thy hide yet, she fears not damning: hell fire cannot parch her blacker than she is: d' ye grin, chimney-sweeper.

Ori. What is't Miranda?

Mir. That you would please Lucinda might attend you.

Col. That suit Sir, I consent not to.

Luc. My husband?
My dearest Angelo?

Nor. More Figgam-bobs; is not this the fellow that swom
Like a duck to th' shore in our sea-service?

Col. The very same, do not you know me now, Sir,
My name is Angelo, though Colonna vail'd it,
Your Countrey-man and kinsman born in Florence,
Who from the neighbor-Island here of Goza
Was captive led, in that unfortunate day
When the Turk bore with him three thousand souls;
Since in Constantinople have I liv'd
Where I beheld this Turkish Damsel first.
A tedious suitor was I for her love,
And pitying such a beauteous case should hide
A foul prophan'd with infidelity,
I labour'd her conversion with my love,
And doubly won her; to fair faith her soul
She first betroth'd, and then her faith to me,
But fearful there to consummate this contract
We fled, and in that flight were ta'en again
By those same Gallies, 'fore Valetta fought.
Since in your service I attended her,
Where, what I saw, and heard, hath joy'd me more
Than all my past afflictions griev'd before.

Val. Wonders crown wonders: take thy wife Miranda.
Be henceforth called our Malta's better Angel,
And thou her evil Mountferrat.

Nor. We'll call him Cacodemon, with his black gib there, his Succuba, his devils seed, his spawn of Phlegeton, that o' my conscience was bred o' the spume of Cocitus; do ye snarle you black Jill? she looks like the Picture of America.

Val. Why stay we now.

Mir. This last petition to the Court,
I may bequeath the keeping of my Fort
To this my kinsman, toward the maintenance
Of him, and his fair virtuous wife; discreet,
Loyal, and valiant I dare give him you.

Val. You must not ask in vain, Sir.

Col. My best thanks
To you my noble Cousin, and my service
To the whole Court; may I deserve this bounty.

Val. Proceed to th' ceremony, one of our Esquard
Degrade Mountferrat first.

Mount. I will not sue
For mercy, 'twere in vain; fortune thy worst.

Musick.

An Altar discover'd, with Tapers, and a Book on it. The two Bishops stand on each side of it; Mountferrat, as the Song is singing, ascends up the Altar.

*See, see, the stain of honor, virtues foe,
Of Virgins fair fames, the foul overbrow,
That broken hath his oath of chastity
Dishonor'd much this holy dignity,
Off with his Robe, expell him forth this place,
Whilst we rejoyce, and sing at his disgrace.*

Val. Since by thy actions thou hast made thy self
Unworthy of that worthy sign thou wear'st,
And of our sacred order, into which
For former virtues we receiv'd thee first,
According to our Statutes, Ordinances,
For praise unto the good, a terror to
The bad, and an example to all men;
We here deprive thee of our habit, and Declare thee unworthy our society,
From which we do expell thee, as a rotten
Corrupted and contagious member.

Esq. Using th' authority th' Superior
Hath given unto me, I untie this knot,
And take from thee the pleasing yolk of heaven:
We take from off thy breast this holy cross
Which thou hast made thy burthen, not thy prop;
Thy spurs we spoil thee of, leaving thy heels;
Pare of thy honor, that have kick'd against
Our Orders precepts: next we reave thy sword,
And give thee armless to thy enemies,
For being foe to goodness, and to Heaven,
Last, 'bout thy stiffneck, we this halter hang,
And leave thee to the mercy of thy Court.

Val. Invest Miranda.

S O N G.

*Fair child of virtue, honors bloom
That here with burning zeal dost come
With joy to ask the white cross cloak,
And yield unto this pleasing yolk,
That being young, vows chastity,
And choos'est wilful poverty;
As this flame mounts, so mount thy zeal, thy glory
Rise past the Stars, and fix in Heaven thy story.*

1 Bish. Whar crave you, gentle Sir?

Mir. Humble admittance

To be a brother of the holy Hospital
Of great Jerusalem.

2 Bish. Breathe out your vow.

Mir. To heaven, and all the bench of Saints above
Whose succor I implore t' enable me,
I vow henceforth a chaste life, not to enjoy
Any thing proper to my self; obedience
To my superiors, whom Religion,
And Heaven shall give me: ever to defend
The virtuous fame of Ladies, and to oppugne
Even unto death the Christian enemy,
This do I vow to accomplish.

Esq. Who can tell,
Has he made other vow, or promis'd marriage
To any one, or is in servitude?

All. He's free from all these.

1 Bish. Put on his spurs, and girt him with the sword,
The scourge of Infidels, and tipes of speed.
Buildst thy faith on this?

Mir. On him that dy'd
On such a sacred figure, for our sins.

2 Bish. Here, then we fix it on thy left side, for Thy increase of faith, Christian defence, and service
To th' poor, and thus near to thy heart we plant it
That thou maist love it even with all thy heart,

With thy right hand protect, preserve it whole,
 For if thou fighting 'gainst heavens enemies
 Shalt flie away, abandoning the cross
 The Ensign of thy holy General,
 With shame thou justly shalt be robb'd of it
 Chas'd from our company, and cut away
 As an infectious putrified limb,

Mir. I ask no favour.

Bish. Then receive the yoke
 Of him that makes it sweet, and light, in which,
 Thy soul find her eternal rest.

Val. Most welcome.

All. Welcome, our noble Brother.

Val. Break up the Court; Mountferrat, though your deeds

Conspiring 'gainst the lives of innocents
 Hath forfeited your own, we will not stain
 Our white cross with your blood: your doom is then
 To marry this coagent of your mischiefs
 Which done, we banish you the continent,
 If either, after three daies here be found
 The hand of Law laies hold upon your lives.

Nor. Away French stallion, now you have a Barbary mare of your own, go leap her, and engender young devillings.

Val. We will find something, noble Norandine

To quit your merit: so to civil feasts,
 According to our customs; and all pray
 The dew of grace, bless our new Knight to day.

Exeunt.

A PROLOGUE

At the reviving of this PLAY.

C Tatnes and Pictures challenge price and fame;
If they can justly boast, and prove they came
From Phidias or Apelles. None denie,
Poets and Painters hold a sympathy;
Yet their works may decay, and lose their grace,
Receiving blemish in their Limbs or Face.
When the Minds Art has this preheminnence,
she still retaineth her first excellence.
Then why should not this dear Piece be esteem'd
Child to the richest fancies that e'r teem'd?

When not their meanest off-spring, that came forth,
but bore the image of their Fathers worth.
Beaumonts, and Fletchers, whose desert out-wayes
The best applause, and their least sprig of Boyes
Is worth Phæbus; and who comes to gather their fruits of wit, he shall not rob the treasure.
Nor can you ever surfeit of the plenty,
Nor can you call them rare, though they be dainty.
The more you take, the more you do them right,
And we will thank you for your own delight.

Actus Primus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Vitelli, Lamoral, Anastro.

Vit. Alvarez pardon'd?
 Ana. And return'd
 Lamo. I saw him land
 At St. Lucars, and such a general welcome,
 Fame as harbinger to his brave actions,
 Had with the easie people, prepar'd for him,

As if by his command alone, and fortune
 Holland, with those low Provinces, that hold out
 Against the Arch-Duke, were again compell'd
 With their obedience to give up their lives
 To be at his Devotion.

Vit. You amaze me,
 For though I have heard, that when he fled from Sevil

To save his life (than forfeited to Law
For murthering Don Pedro my dear Uncle)
His extrem wants enforce'd him to take pay
I'th' Army, fate down then before Ostend,
'Twas never yet reported, by whose favour
He durst presume to entertain a thought
Of coming home with pardon.

Ana. 'Tis our nature
Or not to hear, or not to give belief
To what we wish far from our enemies.

Lam. Sir, 'tis most certain, the Infanta's Letters
Assisted by the Arch-Dukes, to King Philip,
Have not alone secur'd him from the rigor
Of our Casilian Justice, but return'd him
A free man and in grace.

Vit. By what curs'd means
Could such a fugitive arise unto
The knowledge of their Highnesses? much more
(Though known) to stand but in the least degree
Of favour with them?

Lam. To give satisfaction
To your demand, though to praise him I hate,
Can yield me small contentment, I will tell you,
And truly, since should I detract his worth,
'Twould argue want of merit in my self.
Briefly to pass his tedious pilgrimage
For sixteen years, a banish'd guilty man,
And to forget the storms, th' affrights, the horrors
His constancy, not fortune, overcame,
I bring him, with his little son, grown man
(Though 'twas said here, he took a Daughter with him)
To Ostend's bloody siege that stage of war,
Wherein the flower of many Nations acted,
And the whole Christian world spectators were;
There by his Son, or were he by adoption,
Or nature his, a brave Scene was presented,
Which I make choice to speak of, since from that
The good success of Alvarez, had beginning.

Vit. So I love virtue in an enemy
That I desire in the relation of This young mans glorious deed, you'd keep your self
A friend to truth, and it.

Lam. Such was my purpose;
The Town being oft assaulted, but in vain,
To dare the proud defendents to a sally,
Weary of ease, Don Inigo Peralta,
Son to the General of our Catiline forces,
All arm'd, advanc'd within shot of their Walls,
From whence the Musquetiers plaid thick upon him,
Yet he (brave youth) as careless of the danger,
As careful of his honor, drew his sword,
And waving it about his head; as if
He dar'd one spirited like himself, to trial
Of single valor, he made his retreat
With such a slow, and yet majestique pace,
As if he still call'd loud, dare none come on?
When sodainly, from a postern of the Town
Two gallant horsemen issued, and o'ertook him,
The Army looking on, yet not a man
That durst relieve the rash adventurer,
Which Lucio, son to Alvarez then seeing,
As in the Vant-guard he fate bravely mounted,
Or were it pity of the youths misfortune,
Care to preserve the honor of his Countrey,
Or bold desire to get himself a name,
He made his brave Horse like a whirlwind bear him,
Among the Combatants: and in a moment
Discharg'd his Petronel, with such sure aim
That of the adverse party from his horse,
One tumbled dead, then wheeling round, and drawing
A Faulcion, swift as lightning he came on
Upon the other, and with one strong blow,
In view of the amazed Town, and Camp,
He struck him dead, and brought Peralta off

With double honor to himself.

Vit. 'Twas brave:
But the success of this?

Lam. The Camp receiv'd him
With acclamations of joy and welcome;
And for addition to the fair reward
Being a massy chain of Gold given to him
By young Peralta's Father, he was brought To the Infanta's presence, kiss'd her hand,
And from that Lady, (greater in her goodness
Than her high birth) had this encouragement:
Go on young man; yet not to feed thy valour
With hope of recompence to come, from me,
For present satisfaction of what's past,
Ask any thing that's fit for me to give,
And thee to take, and be assur'd of it.

Ana. Excellent Princess.

Vit. And stil'd worthily
The heart-bloud, nay the Soul of Soldiers.
But what was his request?

Lam. That the repeal
Of Alvarez makes plain: he humbly begg'd
His Fathers pardon, and so movingly
Told the sad story of your Uncles death
That the Infanta wept, and instantly
Granting his suit, working the Arch-Duke to it,
Their Letters were directed to the King,
With whom they so prevail'd, that Alvarez
Was freely pardon'd.

Vit. 'Tis not in the King
To make that good.

Ana. Not in the King? what subject
Dares contradict his power?

Vit. In this I dare,
And will: and not call his prerogative
In question, nor presume to limit it.
I know he is Master of his Laws,
And may forgive the forfeits made to them,
But not the injury done to my honor;
And since (forgetting my brave Uncles merits
And many services, under Duke D'Alva)
He suffers him to fall, wresting from Justice
The powerful sword, that would revenge his death,
I'll fill with this Astrea's empty hand,
And in my just wreak, make this arm the Kings,
My deadly hate to Alvarez, and his house,
Which as I grew in years, hath still encreas'd,
As if it call'd on time to make me man,
Slept while it had no object for her fury
But a weak woman, and her talk'd of Daughter:
But now, since there are quarries, worth her fight
Both in the father, and his hopeful son,
I'll boldly cast her off, and gorge her full
With both their hearts: to further which, your friendship,
And oaths: will your assistance, let your deeds
Make answer to me: useles are all words
Till you have writ performance with your swords.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Bobadilla and Lucio.

Luc. Go fetch my work: this Ruffe was not well starch'd,
So tell the maid, 't has too much blew in it,
And look you that the Partridge and the Pullen
Have clean meat, and fresh water, or my Mother
Is like to hear on't,

Bob. Oh good St. Jaques help me: was there ever such an Hermaphrodite heard of? would any wench living, that should hear and see what I do, be wrought to believe, that the best of a man lies under this Petticoat, and that a Cod-piece were far fitter here, than a Pinn'd Placket?

Luc. You had best talk filthily: do; I have a tongue

To

To tell my Mother, as well as ears to hear
Your ribaldry.

Bob. Nay you have ten womens tongues that way I am sure: why my young Master or Mistrifs, Madam, Don, or what you will, what the devil have you to do with Pullen, or Partridge? or to sit pricking on a clout all day? you have a better needle, I know, and might make better work, if you had grace to use it.

Luc. Why, how dare you speak this before me, sirrah?

Bob. Nay rather, why dare not you do what I speak? — though my Lady your mother, for fear of Vielli and his faction, hath brought you up like her Daughter, and has kept you these 20 years, which is ever since you were born, a close prisoner within doors, yet since you are a man, and are as well provided as other men are, methinks you should have the same motions of the flesh, as other Cavaliers of us are inclin'd unto

Luc. Indeed you have cause to love those wanton motions, They having hope you to an excellent whipping, For doing something, I but put you in mind of it, With the Indian Maid, the Governor sent my mother From Mexico.

Bob. Why, I but taught her a Spanish trick in charity, and holpe the King to a subject that may live to take Grave Maurice prisoner, and that was more good to the State, than a thousand such as you are ever like to doe: and I will tell you, (in a fatherly care of the Infant I speak it) if he live (as blest the babe, in passion I remember him) to your years, shall he spend his time in pinning, painting, purling, and perfuming as you do? no, he shall to the wars, use his Spanish Pike, though with the danger of the lash, as his father has done, and when he is provoked, as I am now, draw his Toledo desperately, as —

Luc. You will not kill me? oh.

Bob. I knew this would silence him: how he hides his eyes? If he were a wench now, as he seems, what an advantage Had I, drawing two Toledo's, when one can do this? But oh me, my Lady: I must put up: young Master I did but jest: Oh custom, what hast thou made of him?

Enter Eugenia and Servants.

Eug. For bringing this, be still my friend; no more A servant to me.

Bob. What's the matter?

Eug. Here,

Even here, where I am happy to receive Assurance of my Alvarez return, I will kneel down: and may those holy thoughts That now possess me wholly, make this place A Temple to me, where I may give thanks For this unhop'd for blessing Heavens kind hand Hath pour'd upon me.

Luc. Let my duty Madam Presume, if you have cause of joy, to intreat I may share in it.

Bob. 'Tis well, he has forgot how I frighted him yet.

Eug. Thou shalt: but first kneel with me Lucio, No more Posthumia now, thou hast a Father, A Father living to take off that name, Which my too credulous fears, that he was dead, Bestow'd upon thee: thou shalt see him Lucio And make him young again, by seeing thee, Who only hadst a being in my Womb When he went from me, Lucio: Oh my joyes, So far transport me, that I must forget The ornaments of Matrons, modesty, And grave behaviour; but let all forgive me If in th' expression of my soul's best comfort Though old, I do a while forget mine age And play the wanton in the entertainment Of those delights I have so long despair'd of.

Luc. Shall I then see my Father?

Eug. This hour Lucio;

Which reckon the beginning of thy life I mean that life, in which thou shalt appear To be such as I brought thee forth, a man, This womanish disguise, in which I have So long conceal'd thee, thou shalt now cast off, And change those qualities thou didst learn from me, For masculine virtues, for which seek no tutor, But let thy fathers actions be thy precepts; And for thee Zancho, now expect reward For thy true service.

Bob. Shall I? you hear fellow Stephano, learn to know me more respectfully; how dost thou think I shall become the Stewards chair, ha? will not these slender hanches show well with a chain, and a gold night-Cap after supper, when I take the accompts?

Eug. Hast, and take down those Blacks with which my Hath like the widow, her sad Mistrifs, mourn'd, (chamber And hang up for it, the rich Persian Arras, Us'd on my wedding night, for this to me Shall be a second marriage: send for Musique, And will the Cooks to use their best of cunning To please the palat.

Bob. Will your Ladyship have a Potato-pie, 'tis a good stirring dish for an old Lady, after a long Lent.

Eug. Begone I say: why Sir, you can goe faster?

Bob. I could Madam: but I am now to practise the Stewards pace, that's the reward I look for: every man must fashion his gate, according to his calling: you fellow Stephano, may walk faster, to overtake preferment: so, usher me.

Luc. Pray Madam, let the waistcoat I last wrought Be made up for my Father: I will have A Cap, and Boot-hose futable to it.

Eug. Of that

We'll think hereafter Lucio: our thoughts now Must have no object but thy Fathers welcome, To which thy help —

Luc. With humble gladness, Madam.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Alvarez, Clara.

Alv. Where lost we Syavedra?

Cl. He was met

Ent'ring the City by some Gentlemen Kinsmen, as he said of his own, with whom For compliment sake (for so I think he term'd it) He was compell'd to stay: though I much wonder A man that knows to do, and has done well In the head of his troop, when the bold foe charg'd home, Can learn so sodainly to abuse his time In a pish entertainment: for my part (By all the glorious rewards of war) I had rather meet ten enemies in the field All sworn to fetch my head, than be brought on To change an hours discourse with one of these Smooth City-fools, or Tissue-Cavaliers, The only Gallants, as they wisely think, To get a Jewel, or a wanton Kiss From a Court-lip, though painted.

Alv. My Love Clara,

(For Lucio is a name thou must forget With Lucio's bold behaviour) though thy breeding I th' Camp, may plead something in the excuse Of thy rough manners, custom having chang'd, Though not thy Sex, the softness of thy nature, And fortune (then a cruel stepdame to thee) Impos'd upon thy tender sweetness, burthens Of hunger, cold, wounds, want, such as would crack The sinews of a man, not born a Soldier: Yet now she smiles, and like a natural mother Looks gently on thee, Clara, entertain Her proffer'd bounties with a willing bosom; Thou shalt no more have need to use thy sword;

Thy

Thy beauty (which even Belgia hath not alter'd)
Shall be a stronger guard, to keep my Clara,
Than that has been, (though never us'd but nobly)
And know thus much.

Cl. Sir, I know only that
It stands not with my duty to gain-say you,
In any thing: I must, and will put on
What fashion you think best: though I could wish
I were what I appear.

Alv. Endeavour rather
To be what you are, Clara entring here,
As you were born, a woman.

Enter Eugenia, Lucio, Servants.

Eug. Let choice Musick
In the best voice that e'er touch'd humane ear,
For joy hath t'ild my tongue up, speak your welcome.

Alv. My soul (for thou giv'st new life to my spirit)
Myriads of joyes, though short in number of Thy virtues, fall on thee; Oh my Eugenia,
Th' assurance that I do embrace thee, makes
My twenty years of sorrow but a dream,
And by the Nectar, which I take from these,
I feel my age restor'd, and like old Aeson
Grow young again.

Eug. My Lord, long wish'd for welcome,
'Tis a sweet briefness, yet in that short word
All pleasures which I may call mine, begin,
And may they long increase, before they find
A second period: let mine eyes now surfeit
On this so wish'd for object, and my lips
Yet modestly pay back the parting kifs
You trusted with them, when you fled from Sevil,
With little Clara my sweet daughter: lives she?
Yet I could chide my self, having you here
For being so covetous of all joyes at once,
T' enquire for her, you being alone, to me
My Clara, Lucio, my Lord, my self,
Nay more than all the world.

Alv. As you, to me are

Eug. Sit down, and let me feed upon the story
Of your past dangers, now you are here in safety
It will give relish, and fresh appetite
To my delights, if such delights can cloy me.
Yet do not Alvarez, let me first yield you
Account of my life in your absence, and Make you acquainted how I have preserv'd
The Jewel left lock'd up in my womb,
When you, in being forc'd to leave your Country,
Suffer'd a civil death.

Within clashing swords

Alv. Do my Eugenia,
'Tis that I most desire to hear,

Eug. Then know.

Sayavedra within,

Alv. What noise is that?

Says. If you are noble enemies,
Oppress me not with odds, but kill me fairly,

Vitelli within.

Vit. Stand off, I am too many of my self.

Enter Bobadilla.

Bob. Murther, murther, murther, your friend my Lord,
Don Sayavedra is set upon in the streets, by your enemies Vitelli, and his Faction: I am almost kill'd with looking on them.

Alv. I'll free him, or fall with him: draw thy sword
And follow me.

Clar. Fortune, I give thee thanks
For this occasion once more to use it. (hang me Exit.)

Bob. Nay, hold not me Madam; if I do any hurt,

Luc. Oh I am dead with fear! let's flie into Your Closet, Mother.

Eug. No hour of my life
Secure of danger? heav'n be merciful,

Or now at once dispatch me:

Enter Vitelli, pursued by Alvarez, and Sayavedra, Clara beating of Anastro.

Cl. Follow him

Leave me to keep these of.

Alv. Assault my friend

So near my house?

Vit. Nor in it will spare thee,

Though 'twere a Temple: and I'll make it one,
I being the Priest, and thou the sacrifice,
I'll offer to my Uncle.

Alv. Halte thou to him,

And say I sent thee:

Cl. 'Twas put bravely by,

And that: and yet comes on, and boldly rare,

In the wars, where emulation and example

Joyn to increase the courage, and make less

The danger; valour, and true resolution

Never appear'd so lovely, brave again:

Sure he is more than man, and if he fall;

The best of virtue, fortitude would dye with him:

And can I suffer it? forgive me duty,

So I love valour, as I will protect it

Against my Father, and redeem it, though

'Tis forfeited by one I hate.

Vit. Come on,

All is not lost yet: You shall buy me dearer
Before you have me: keep off.

Cl. Fear me not,

Thy worth has took me prisoner, and my sword

For this time knows thee only for a friend,

And to all else I turn the point of it.

Say. Defend your Fathers enemy?

Alv. Art thou mad?

Cl. Are you men rather? shall that valour, which Begot you lawful honor in the wars,

Prove now the Parent of an infamous Bastard

So foul, yet so long liv'd, as murther will

Be to your shames? have each of you, alone

With your own dangers only, purchas'd glory

From multitudes of enemies, not allowing

Those nearest to you, to have part in it,

And do you now joyn, and lend mutual help

Against a single opposite? hath the mercy

Of the great King, but newly wash'd away

The blood, that with the forfeit of your life

Cleav'd to your name, and family like an ulcer,

In this again to set a deeper dye

Upon your infamy: you'll say he is your foe,

And by his rashness call'd on his own ruin;

Remember yet, he was first wrong'd, and honor

Spurr'd him to what he did, and next the place

Where now he is: your house, which by the laws

Of hospitable duty should protect him;

Have you been twenty years a stranger to it,

To make your entrance now in blood? or think you

Your country-man, a true born Spaniard, will be

An offering fit, to please the genius of it?

No, in this I'll presume to teach my Father,

And this first Act of disobedience shall Confirm I am most dutiful.

Alv. I am pleas'd

With what I dare not give allowance to;

Unnatural wretch, what wilt thou do?

Cl. Set free

A noble enemy: come not on, by —

You pass to him, through me: the way is open:

Farewel: when next I meet you, do not look for

A friend, but a vow'd foe; I see you worthy,

And therefore now preserve you, for the honor

Of my sword only:

Vit. Were this man a friend,

How would he win me, that being my vow'd foe

Deserves

Deserves so well? I thank you for my life;
But how I shall deserve it, give me leave
Hereafter to consider.

Exit.

Alv. Quit thy fear,
All danger is blown over: I have Letters
To the Governor, in the Kings name, to secure us,
From such attempts hereafter: yet we need not,
That have such strong Guards of our own, dread others;
And to increase thy comfort, know, this young man
Whom with such fervent earnestness you eye,
Is not what he appears, but such a one
As thou with joy wilt bless, thy Daughter Clara.

Eug. A thousand blessings in that word.

Alv. The reason
Why I have bred her up thus, at more leisure
I will impart unto you, wonder not
At what you have seen her do, it being the least
Of many great and valiant undertakings
She hath made good with honor.

Eug. I'll return
The joy I have in her, with one as great
To you my Alvarez: you, in a man,
Have given to me a Daughter: in a Woman,
I give to you a Son, this was the pledge
You left here with me, whom I have brought up
Different from what he was, as you did Clara,
And with the like success; as she appears Alter'd by custom, more than Woman, he Transform'd by his soft life, is less than man.

Alv. Fortune, in this gives ample satisfaction
For all our sorrows past.

Luc. My dearest Sister.

Clara. Kind Brother.

Alv. Now our mutual care must be
Employ'd to help wrong'd nature, to recover
Her right in either of them, lost by custom:
To you I give my Clara, and receive
My Lucio to my charge: and we'll contend
With loving industry, who soonest can Turn this man woman, or this woman man.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Pachieco, and Lazarillo.

Pac. Boy: and Cloak, and Rapier; it fits not a Gentleman of my rank, to walk the streets in Querpo.

Laz. Nay, you are a very rank Gent. Signior, I am very hungry, they tell me in Sevil here, I look like an Eel, with a mans head: and your neighbor the Smith here hard by, would have borrowed me th' other day, to have fish'd with me, because he had lost his Angle-rod.

Pac. Oh happy thou Lazarillo (being the cause of other mens wits) as in thine own: live lean, and witty still: oppress not thy stomach too much: gross feeders, great sleepers, fat bodies; fat bodies, lean brains: No Lazarillo, I will make thee immortal, change thy Humanity into Deity, for
I will teach thee to live upon nothing.

Laz. Faith Signior, I am immortal then already, or very near it, for I do live upon little or nothing: belike that's the reason the Poets are said to be immortal, for some of them live upon their wits, which is indeed as good as little or nothing: But good Master, let me be mortal still, and let's goe to supper.

Pac. Be abstinent; shew not the corruption of thy generation: he that feeds, shall die, therefore, he that feeds not shall live.

Laz. I; but how long shall he live? there's the question.

Pac. As long as he can without feeding: didst thou read of the miraculous Maid in Flanders?

Laz. No, nor of any Maid else; for the miracle of Virgineity now-a-days ceases, e'r the Virgin can read Virginity?

Pac. She that liv'd three years without any other sustenance, than the smell of a Rose.

Laz. I heard of her Signior, but they say her guts shrunk all into Lute-strings, and her neather-parts cling'd together like a Serpents Tail, so that though she continued a woman still above the girdle, beneath yet she was monster.

Pac. So are most women, believe it.

Laz. Nay all women Signior, that can live only upon the smell of a Rose.

Pac. No part of the History is fabulous.

Laz. I think rather no part of the Fable is Historical:
but for all this, Sir, my rebellious stomach will not let me be immortal: I will be as immortal, as mortal hunger will suffer: put me to a certain stint Sir, allow me but a red herring a day.

Pac. O' de dios: wouldst thou be gluttonous in thy delicacies?

Laz. He that eats nothing but a red herring a day, shall ne'r be broil'd for the devil's rasher: a Pilchard, Signior, a Surdiny, an Olive, that I may be a Philosopher first, and immortal after.

Pac. Patience Lazarillo; let contemplation be thy food awhile: I say unto thee, one Pease was a Soldiers Provant a whole day,

At the destruction of Jerusalem.

Enter Metaldi, and Mendoza.

Laz. I; and it were any where but at the destruction of a place, I'll be hang'd.

Met. Signior Pachieco Alasto, my most ingenious
Cobler of Sevil, the bonos noxios to your Signiorie.

Pac. Signior Metaldi de Forgio, my most famous Smith, and man of Mettle, I return your courtesie ten fold, and do humble my Bonnet beneath the Shooe-sole of your congie:
the like to you Signior Mendoza Pediculo de Vermim, my most exquisite Hofe-heeler.

Laz. Here's a greeting betwixt a Cobler, a Smith, and a Botcher: they all belong to the foot, which makes them stand so much upon their Gentry.

Mend. Signior Lazarillo.

Laz. Ah Signior see: nay, we are all Signiors here in Spain, from the Jakes-farmer to the Grandee, or Adelantado:
this Botcher looks as if he were Dough-bak'd, a little Butter now, and I could eat him like an Oaten-cake: his fathers diet was new Cheese and Onions when he got him: what a scallion-fac'd rascal 'tis?

Met. But why Signior Pachieco, do you stand so much on the priority, and antiquity of your quality (as you call it)
in comparison of ours?

Mend. I; your reason for that.

Pac. Why thou Iron-pated Smith: and thou Woollenwitted Hofe-heeler: hear what I will speak indifferently
(and according to antient Writers) of our three professions: and let the upright Lazarillo be both judge and moderator.

Laz. Still am I the most immortally hungry; that may be.

Pac. Suppose thou wilt derive thy Pedigree, like some of the old Heroes, (as Hercules, Aeneas, Achilles) lineally from the gods, making Saturn thy great Grandfather, and Vulcan thy Father: Vulcan was a god.

Laz. He'll make Vulcan your godfather by and by.

Pac. Yet I say, Saturn was a crabbed block-head, and Vulcan a limping Horn-head, for Venus his wife was a strumpet, and Mars begot all her Children; therefore however, thy original must of necessity spring from Bastardie: further, what can be a more deject spirit in man, than to lay his hands under every ones horses feet, to do him service, as thou dost? For thee, I will be brief, thou dost botch, and not mend, thou art a hider of enormities, viz, Scabs, Chilblains,

chilblains, and kib'd heels: much prone thou art to Sects, and Heresies, disturbing State, and Government; for how canst thou be a sound member in the common-weath, that art so subject to stiches in the ankles? blush, and be silent then, oh ye Mechanicks, compare no more with the politick Cobler: For Coblers (in old time) have prophesied, what may they do now then, that have every day waxed better, and better? have we not the length of every mans foot? are we not daily menders? yea, and what menders? not horse-menders.

Laz. Nor manners-menders.

Pac. But soul-menders: Oh divine Coblers; do we not, like the wise man, spin out our own threds, (or our wives for us?) do we not by our sowing the Hide, reap the Beef? are not we of the Gentle-craft, whilst both you are but Crafts-men; You will say, you fear neither Iron nor Steel, and what you get is wrought out of the fire; I must answer you again, though, all this is but forgery: You may likewise say, a man's a man, that has but a hose on his head: I must likewise answer, that man is a botcher, that has a heel'd hose on his head: to conclude, there can be no comparison with the Cobler, who is all in all in the Commonwealth, has his politique eye and ends on every mans steps that walks, and whose course shall be lasting to the worlds end.

Met. I give place: the wit of man is wonderful: thou hast hit the nail on the head, and I will give thee six pots for't, though I ne'r clinch shooe again.

Enter Vitelli and Alguazier.

Pac. Who's this? oh our Alguazier: as arrant a knave as e'er wore one head under two offices: he is one side Alguazier.

Met. The other side Serjeant,

Mend. That's both sides carrion I am sure.

Pac. This is he apprehends whores in the way of justice, and lodges 'em in his own house, in the way of profit: he with him, is the Grand Don Vitelli, 'twixt whom and Fernando Alvarez, the mortal hatred is; he is indeed my Don's Bawd, and does at this present, lodge a famous Curtizan of his, lately come from Madrid.

Vit. Let her want nothing Signior, she can aske: What loss or injury you may sustain I will repair, and recompence your love: Only that fellows coming I dislike, And did fore-warn her of him: bear her this With my best love, at night I'll visit her.

Alg. I rest your Lordships Servant.

Vit. Good ev'n, Signiors:

Oh Alvarez, thou hast brought a Son with thee Both brightens, and obscures our Nation, Whose pure strong beams on us, shoot like the Suns On baser fires: I would to heaven my blood Had never stain'd thy bold unfortunate hand, That with mine honor I might emulate, Not persecute such virtue: I will see him, Though with the hazard of my life: no rest In my contentious spirits, can I find Till I have gratify'd him in like kind.

Exit.

Alg. I know you not: what are ye? hence ye base Beseignios.

Pac. Mary Caizo Signior Alguazier, d'ye not know us? why, we are your honest neighbors, the Cobler, Smith, and Botcher, that have so often fate snoring cheek by joll with your Signiorie, in rug at midnight.

Laz. Nay, good Signior, be not angry: you must understand, a Cat, and such an Officer see best in the dark.

Met. By this hand, I could find in my heart to shooe his head,

Pac. Why then know you, Signior; thou mongril, begot at midnight, at the Goal gate, by a Beadle, on a Catchpoles wife, are not you he that was whipt out of Toledo for perjury.

Men. Next; condemn'd to the Gallies for pilfery, to the Buls pizel.

Met. And after call'd to the Inquisition, for Apostacie.

Pac. Are not you he that rather than you durst goe an industrious voyage being press'd to the Islands, skulk'd till the Fleet was gone, and then earn'd your Royal a day by squiring puncks, and puncklings up and down the City?

Laz. Are not you a Portuguize born, descended o' the Moors, and came hither into Sevil with your Master, an arrant Tailor, in your red Bonnet, and your blue Jacket, lousie, though now your block-head be cover'd with the Spanish block, and your lashed Shoulders with a Velvet Pee.

Pac. Are not you he that have been of thirty callings, yet ne'r a one lawful? that being a Chandler first, profess'd sincerity, and would sell no man Mustard to his Beef on the Sabbath, and yet sold Hypocrisie all your life time?

Met. Are not you he, that were since a Surgeon to the Stews, and undertook to cure what the Church it self could not, Strumpets that rise to your office by being a great Don's Bawd?

Laz. That commit men nightly, offenceless, for the gain of a groat a prisoner, which your Beadle seems to put up, when you share three pence?

Mend. Are not you he that is a kisser of men, in drunkenness, and a berayer in sobriety?

Alg. Diabolo: they'll rail me into the Gallies again.

Pac. Yes Signior, thou art even he we speak of all this while: thou mayst by thy place now, lay us by the heels: 'tis true: but take heed, be wiser, pluck not ruin on thine own head: for never was there such an Anatomie, as we shall make thee then: be wise therefore, thou child of the night! be friends, and shake hands, thou art a proper man, if thy beard were redder: remember thy worshipful function, a Constable; though thou turn'st day into night, and night into day, what of that? watch less and pray more: Let not thy mittens abate the talons of thy authority, but gripe theft and whoredom, wheresoever thou meet'st 'em: bear 'em away like a tempest, and lodge 'em safely in thine own house:

Laz. Would you have whores and thieves lodgd in such a house?

Pac. They ever do so: I have found a thief, or a whore there, when the whole Suburbs could not furnish me.

Laz. But why do they lodge there?

Pac. That they may be safe and forth-coming: for in the morning usually, the thief is sent to the Goal, and the whore prostrates her self to the Justice.

Men. Admirable Pachiecho.

Met. Thou Cobler of Christendom.

Alg. There is no railing with these rogues: I will close with 'em, till I can cry quittance: why Signiors, and my honest neighbors, will you impute that as a neglect of my friends, which is an imperfection in me? I have been Sand-blind from my infancy: to make you amends you shall sup with me.

Laz. Shall we sup with ye, Sir? O' my conscience, they have wrong'd the Gentleman extreemly.

Alg. And after supper, I have a project to employ you in, shall make you drink and eat merrily this month: I am a little knavish: why, and doe not I know all you to be knaves?

Pac. I grant you, we are all knaves, and will be your knaves: But oh, while you live, take heed of being a proud knave.

Alg. On then pass: I will bear out my staffe, and my staffe shall bear out me.

Laz. Oh Lazarillo, thou art going to supper.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Lucio, and Bobadilla.

Luc. Pray be not angry.

Bob. I am angry, and I will be angry Diabolo: what should should you do in the Kitchin, cannot the Cooks lick their fingers without your overseeing? nor the maids make pot-tage, except your dogs-head be in the pot? Don Lucio, Don Quot-Quean, Don Spinster, wear a Petticoat still, and put on your Smock a' Monday: I will have a baby o' clouts made for it, like a great girl: nay, if you will needs be starching of Ruffs, and sowing of Black-work, I will of a mild, and loving Tutor, become a Tyrant, your Father has committed you to my charge, and I will make a man or a mouse on you.

Luc. What would you have me do? this scurvy sword So galls my thigh: I would't were burnt: pish, look, This Cloak will ne'r keep on: these Boots too hide-bound, Make me walk stiff, as if my legs were frozen, And my Spurs gingle like a Morris-dancer: Lord, how my head akes with this roguish Hat; This masculine attire is most uneasy, I am bound up in it: I had rather walk in folio, again, loose like a woman.

Bob. In Folio, had you not? Thou mock to heav'n, and nature, and thy Parents, Thou tender Leg of Lamb; oh, how he walks As if he had bepifs'd himself, and fleers! Is this a gate for the young Cavalier, Don Lucio, Son and Heir to Alvarez? Has it a corn? or do's it walk on conscience, It treads so gingerly? Come on your ways, Suppose me now your Fathers foe, Vitelli, And spying you i'th' street, thus I advance I twist my Beard, and then I draw my sword.

Luc. Alas.
Bob. And thus accost thee: traitorous brat, How durst thou thus confront me? impious twig Of that old stock, dew'd with my kinsmans gore, Draw, for I'll quarter thee in pieces four.

Luc. Nay, prethee Bobadilla, leave thy fooling, Put up thy sword, I will not meddle with ye; I, juggle me, I care not: I'll not draw, Pray be a quiet man.

Bob. D' ye hear: answer me, as you would do Don Vitelli, or I'll be so bold as to lay the pomel of my sword over the hilts of your head: my name's Vitelli, and I'll have the wall.

Luc. Why then I'll have the kennel: what a coil you keep? Signior, what happen'd 'twixt my Sire and your Kinsman, was long before I saw the world, No fault of mine, nor will I justify My Fathers crimes: forget Sir, and forgive. 'Tis Christianity: I pray put up your sword, I'll give you any satisfaction That may become a Gentleman: however I hope you are bred to more humanity Than to revenge my Fathers wrong on me That crave your love, and peace: law-you-now Zancho Would not this quiet him, were he ten Vitellies.

Bob. Oh craven-chicken of a Cock o'th' game: well, what remedy? did thy Father see this, O' my conscience, he would cut off thy Masculine gender, crop thine ears, beat out thine eyes, and set thee in one of the Pear trees for a scare-crow: As I am Vitelli, I am satisfied; but as I am Bobadilla, Spindola, Zancho, Steward of the house, and thy Fathers Servant, I could find in my heart to lop off the hinder part of thy face, or to beat all thy teeth into thy mouth: Oh thou whay-blooded milk-sop, I'll wait upon thee no longer, thou shalt ev'n wait upon me: come your ways Sir, I shall take a little pains with ye else.

Enter Clara.

Cl. Where art thou brother Lucio? ran tan tan ta ran tan ran tan tan ta, ta ran tan tan tan. Oh, I shall no more see those golden daies, these clothes will never fadge with me: a——O' this filthy vardingale, this hip-hape: brother, why are womens hanches only limited, confin'd, hoop'd in, as it were with these same scurvy vardingales?

Bob. Because womens hanches only are most subject to display and shie out.

Cl. Bobadilla, rogue, ten Duckets, I hit the prepuce of thy Codpiece.

Luc. Hold, if you love my life, Sister: I am not Zancho Bobadilla, I am your brother Lucio: what a fright you have put me in?

Cl. Brother? and wherefore thus?

Luc. Why, Master Steward here, Signior Zancho, made me change: he does nothing but mis-use me, and call me Coward, and swears I shall wait upon him.

Bob. Well: I do no more than I have authority for: would I were away though: for she's as much too manish, as he too womanish: I dare not meddle with her, yet I must set a good face on't (if I had it) I have like charge of Madam, I am as well to mollifie you, as to quallifie him: what have you to do with Armors, and Pistols, and Javelins, and swords, and such tools? remember Mistresses; nature hath given you a sheath only, to signifie women are to put up mens weapons, not to draw them: look you now, is this a fit trot for a Gentlewoman? You shall see the Court-Ladies move like Goddeses, as if they trode air; they will swim you their measures, like Whiting-mops, as if their feet were fins, and the hinges of their knees oil'd: doe they love to ride great horses, as you do? no, they love to ride great asses sooner: faith, I know not what to say t' ye both: Custom hath turn'd nature topsie-turvie in you.

Cl. Nay, but Master Steward.

Bob. You cannot trot so fast, but he ambles as slowly.

Cl. Signior Spindle, will you hear me,

Bob. He that shall come to bestride your Virginitie, had better be a toot o'er the Dragon.

Cl. Very well.

Bob. Did ever Spanish Lady pace so?

Cl. Hold these a little.

Luc. I'll not touch 'em, I.

Cl. First doe I break your Office o're your pate, You Dog-skin-fac'd rogue, pilcher, you poor Jour, Which I will beat to Stock-fish.

Luc. Sister.

Bob. Madam.

Cl. You Cittern-head, who have you talk'd to, ha? You nasty, stinking, and ill-countenanc'd Cur.

Bob. By this hand, I'll bang your brother for this, when I get him alone.

Cl. How? kick him Lucio, he shall kick you Bob, Spight o' the nose, that's flat: kick him, I say, Or I will cut thy head off.

Bob. Softly y' had best.

Cl. Now, thou lean, dry'd, and ominous visag'd knave, Thou false and peremptory Steward, pray, For I will hang thee up in thine own chain.

Luc. Good Sister do not choak him.

Bob. Murder, murder.

Exit.

Cl. Well: I shall meet with ye: Lucio, who bought this?

'Tis a reasonable good one; but there hangs one Spain's Champion ne'er us'd truer: with this Staffe Old Alvarez has led up men so close, They could almost spit in the Cannons mouth, Whilst I with that, and this well mounted, scour'd A Horse-troop through, and through, like swift desire, And seen poor rogues retire, all gore, and gash'd Like bleeding Shads.

Luc. Bless us, Sister Clara.

How desperately you talk: what d' ye call This Gun a dag?

Cl. I'll give't thee: a French petronel: You never saw my Barbary, the Infanta Bestow'd upon me, as yet Lucio?

Walk down, and see it

Luc. What into the Stable?

Not I, the Jades will kick: the poor Groom there

Was almost spoil'd the other day.

Cl. Fie on thee,
Thou wilt scarce be a man before thy Mother.
Luc. When will you be a woman?

Enter Alvarez and Bobadilla.

Cl. Would I were none.
But natures privy Seal allures me one.
Alv. Thou anger'st me: can strong habitual custome
Work with such Magick on the mind and manners,
In spite of sex and nature? find out firrah,
Some skilful fighter.

Bob. Yes Sir.
Alv. I will rectifie,
And redeem eithers proper inclination,
Or bray 'em in a mortar, and new mold 'em. Exit.
Bob. Believe your eyes, Sir, I tell you, we wash an Ethiop.
Cl. I strike it for ten Duckets.

Alv. How now Clara,
Your Breeches on still? and your petticoat
Not yet off Lucio? art thou not guelt?
Or did the cold Muscovite beget thee,
That lay here Lieger in the last great frost?
Art not thou Clara, turn'd a man indeed
Beneath the girdle? and a woman thou?
I'll have you search'd by, — I strongly doubt;
We must have these things mended: come goe in. Exit.

Enter Vitelli and Bobadilla.

Bob. With Lucio say you? there is for you.
Vit. And there is for thee.
Bob. I thank you: you have now bought a little advice
Of me; if you chance to have conference with that Lady there, be very civil, or look to your head: she has Ten nails, and you have but two eies: If any foolish
Hot motions should chance to rise in the Horizon
Under your equinoctial there, qualifie it as well as You can, for I fear the elevation of your pole will Not agree with the Horoscope of her constitution:
She is Bell the Dragon I assure you.
Vit. Are you the Lucio, Sir, that sav'd Vitelli?
Luc. Not I indeed, Sir, I did never brable;
There walks that Lucio Metamorphos'd. Exit.

Vit. Doye mock me?
Cl. No, he does not: I am that
Supposed Lucio that was, but Clara,
That is, and daughter unto Alvarez.
Vit. Amazement daunts me; would my life were riddles,
So you were still my fair Expositor:
Protected by a Lady from my death.
Oh, I shall wear an everlasting blush
Upon my cheek from this discovery:
Oh, you the fairest Soldier, I e'er saw;
Each of whose eyes, like a bright beamy Shield,
Conquers without blows, the contentious.

Cl. Sir, guard your self, you are in your enemies house,
And may be injur'd.

Vit. 'Tis impossible:
Foe, nor oppressing odds dares prove Vitelli,
If Clara side him, and will call him friend;
I would the difference of our bloods were such
As might with any shift be wip'd away:
Or would to heaven your self were all your name;
That having lost blood by you, I might hope
To raise blood from you. But my black-wing'd fate
Hovers averfely over that fond hope:
And he, whose tongue thus gratifies the daughter,
And Sister of his enemy, wears a sword
To rip the Father and the Brother up.
Thus you that sav'd this wretched life of mine,
Have sav'd it to the ruin of your friends,
That my affections should promiscuously

Dart love and hate at once, both worthily?
Pray let me kiss your hand.

Cl. You are treacherous,
And come to do me mischief.

Vit. Speak on still:
Your words are falser (fair) than my intents,
And each sweet accent far more treacherous; for Though you speak ill of me, you speak so well,
I doe desire to hear you.

Cl. Pray be gone:
Or kill me if you please.

Vit. Oh, neither can I,
For to be gone, were to destroy my life;
And to kill you, were to destroy my soul:
I am in love, yet must not be in love:
I'll get away apace: yet valiant Lady,
Such gratitude to honor I do owe,
And such obedience to your memory,
That if you will bestow something, that I
May wear about me, it shall bind all wrath,
My most inveterate wrath, from all attempts,
Till you and I meet next.

Cl. A favour, Sir?
Why, I will give ye good counsel.

Vit. That already,
You have bestowed; a Ribbon, or a Glove.
Cl. Nay, those are tokens for a waiting-maid
To trim the Butler with,

Vit. Your feather.
Cl. Fie; the wenches give them to their serving-men.

Vit. That little Ring.
Cl. 'Twill hold you but by th' finger;
And I would have have you faster.

Vit. Any thing
That I may wear, and but remember you.
Cl. This smile: my good opinion, or my self.
But that it seems you like not

Vit. Yes, so well:
When any smiles, I will remember yours;
Your good opinion shall in weight poize me
Against a thousand ill: Lastly, your self,
My curious eye now figures in my heart,
Where I will wear you, till the Table break.
So, whitest Angels guard you.

Cl. Stay Sir, I
Have fitly thought to give, what you as fitly
May not disdain to wear.

Vit. What's that?
Cl. This Sword.
I never heard a man speak till this hour.
His words are golden chains, and now I fear
The Lyonessè hath met a tamer here:

Fie, how his tongue chimes: what was I saying?
Oh: this favour I bequeath you, which I tie
In a Love-knot, fast, ne'er to hurt my friends;
Yet be it fortunate 'gainst all your foes
(For I have neither friend, nor foe, but yours.)
As e'er it was to me: I've kept it long,
And value it, next my Virginity:
But good, return it, for I now remember
I vow'd, who purchas'd it, should have me too.

Vit. Would that were possible: but alas it is not;
Yet this assure your self, most honour'd Clara,
I'll not infringe a particle of breath
My vow hath offer'd to ye: nor from this part
Whilst it hath edge, or point, or I a heart. Exit.

Cl. Oh, leave me living: what new exercise
Is crept into my breast, that blancheth clean
My former nature? I begin to find
I am a woman, and must learn to fight
A softer sweeter battel, than with swords.
I am sick methinks, but the disease I feel
Pleaseth, and punisheth: I warrant love
Is very like this, that folks talke of so;

I skill not what it is, yet sure even here,
Even in my heart, I sensibly perceive
It glows, and riseth like a glimmering flame,
But know not yet the Essence on't, nor name.

Exit.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Malroda and Alguazier,

Mal. HE must not? nor he shall not, who shall lett him?
You politique Diego, with your face of wisdom;
Don-blirt, the—— on your Aphorismes,
Your grave, and Sage-Ale Physiognomy:
Do not I know thee for the Alguazier,
Whose dunghil all the Parish Scavengers
Could never rid? thou Comedy to men,
Whose serious folly is a Butt for all
To shoot their wits at; whilst thou hast not wit,
Nor heart, to answer, or be angry.

Alg. Lady.

Mal. Peace, peace, you rotten Rogue, supported by A staffe of rottener office: dare you check
Any accesses, that I will allow?

Piorato is my friend, and visits me
In lawful sort to espouse me as his wife;
And who will crosse, or shall our enter-views?
You know me sirrah, for no Chambermaid,
That cast her belly, and her wastecoate lately;
Thou think'st thy Constableness is much: not so,
I am ten offices to thee: I, thy house,
Thy house, and office is maintain'd by me.

Alg. My house-of-office is maintain'd i' th' garden:
Go too, I know you, and I have contriv'd;
Y^e are a delinquent, but I have contriv'd
A poison, though not in the third degree:
I can say, black's your eye, though it be grey;
I have conniv'd at this, your friend, and you:
But what is got by this connivency?

I like his feather well: a proper man,
Of good discourse, fine conversation,
Valiant, and a great carrier of the business,
Sweet breasted, as the Nightingale, or Thrush:
Yet I must tell you; you forget your self,
My Lord Vitellies love, and maintenance

Deserves no other Jack i' th' box, but he:
What though he gather'd first the golden fruit,
And blew your pigs-coat up into a blister,
When you did wait at Court upon his mother;
Has he not well provided for the barn?
Beside, what profit reap I by the other?

If you will have me serve your pleasure, Lady,
Your pleasure must accommodate my service;
As good be virtuous and poor, as not Thrive by my knavery, all the world would be Good, prosper'd goodness like to villany.
I am the Kings Vice-gerent by my place;
His right Lieutenant in mine own precinct.

Mal. Thou art a right rascal in all mens precincts;
Yet now my pair of twins, of fool, and knave,
Look we are friends; there's Gold for thee, admit
Whom I will have, and keep it from my Don;
And I will make thee richer than thou'rt wife:
Thou shalt be my Bawd, and my Officer:
Thy children shall eat still, my good night Owl,
And thy old wife sell Andirons to the Court,
Be countenanced by the Dons, and wear a hood,
Nay, keep my Garden-house; I'll call her Mother,
Thee Father, my good poysonous Red-hair'd Dill,
And Gold shall daily be thy Sacrifice,
Wrought from a fertile Island of mine own,

Which I will offer, like an Indian Queen.

Alg. And I will be thy devil, thou my flesh,
With which I'll catch the world.

Mal. Fill some Tobacco,
And bring it in: if Piorato come
Before my Don, admit him; if my Don
Before my Love, conduct him, my dear Devil. Exit.

Alg. I will my dear Flesh: first come, first serv'd. Well said
Oh equal Heaven, how wisely thou disposest
Thy several gifts? one's born a great rich fool,
For the subordinate knave to work upon:
Another's poor, with wits addition,
Which well or ill-us'd, builds a living up;
And that too from the Sire oft descends:
Only fair virtue, by traduction
Never succeeds, and seldom meets success,
What have I then to do with't? My free will Left me by heaven, makes me or good, or ill:
Now since vice gets more in this vicious world
Than Piety, and my Stars confluence
Enforce my disposition to affect
Gain, and the name of rich, let who will practise
War, and grow that way great: religious,
And that way good: my chief felicity
Is wealth the nurse of sensuality:
And he that mainly labours to be rich,
Must scratch great scabs, and claw a Strumpets itch. Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Piorato, and Babadilla, with Letters.

Pio. To saay, Sir, I will wait upon your Lord,
Were not to understand my self.

Bob. To say Sir,
You will do any thing but wait upon him,
Were not to understand my Lord.

Pio. I'll meet him
Some half hour hence, and doubt not but to render
His Son a man again: the cure is easie,
I have done divers.

Bob. Women do ye mean, Sir?

Pio. Cures I do mean, Sir: be there but one spark
Of fire remaining in him unextinct,
With my discourse I'll blow it to a flame;
And with my practice into action:
I have had one so full of childish fear,
And womanish-hearted sent to my advice,
He durst not draw a knife to cut his meat.

Bob. And how Sir, did you help him?

Pio. Sir, I kept him
Seven daies in a dark room by a Candle-light,
A plenteous Table spread with all good meats,
Before his eyes, a Case of keen broad Knives,
Upon the board, and he so watch'd he might not Touch the least modicum, unless he cut it:
And thus I brought him first to draw a knife.

Bob. Good.

Pio. Then for ten daies did I diet him
Only with burnt Pork, Sir, and gammons of Bacon;
A pill of Caveary now and then,
Which breeds choler adust you know,

Bob. 'Tis true.

Pio. And to purge phlegmatick humor, and cold crudities,
In all that time he drank me Aqua-fortis,
And nothing else but——

Bob. Aqua-vita Signior,
For Aqua-fortis poisons.

Pio. Aqua-fortis
I say again: what's one man's poison, Signior,
Is another's meat or drink.

Bob. Your patience, Sir;
By your good patience. h' had a huge cold stomach.

Pio. I fir'd it: and gave him, then three sweats

In the Artillery-yard three drilling daies:
And now he'll shoot a Gun, and draw a Sword,
And fight with any man in Cbristendom.

Bob. A receipt for a coward: I'll be bold, Sir,
To write your good prescription.

Pio. Sir, hercafter
You shall, and underneath it put probatum:
is your chain right?

Bob. 'Tis both right and just Sir;
For though I am a Steward, I did get it
With no mans wrong.

Pio. You are witty.

Bob. So, so.

Could you not cure one Sir, of being too rash
And over-daring? there now's my disease:
Fool-hardy as they say, for that infooth,
I am.

Pio. Most easily.

Bob. How?

Pio. To make you drunk, Sir,
With small Beer once a day, and beat you twice,
Till you be bruise'd all over: if that help not,
Knock out your brains.

Bob. This is strong Physick Signior,
And never will agree with my weak body:
I find the medicine worse than the malady,
And therefore will remain fool-hardy still:
You'll come, Sir?

Pio. As I am a Gentleman.

Bob. A man o' th' Sword should never break his word.

Pio. I'll overtake you: I have only, Sir
A complimental visitation
To offer to a Mistris lodg'd here by.

Bob. A Gentlewoman?

Pio. Yes Sir.

Bob. Fair, and comely?

Pio. Oh Sir, the Paragon, the Non-paril
Of Sevil, the most wealthy Mine of Spain,
For beauty, and perfection.

Bob. Say you so?

Might not a man entreat a crurtesie,
To walk along with you Signior, to peruse
This dainty Mine, though not to dig in't Signior?
Hauh——I hope you'll not denie me, being a stranger;
Though I am a Steward, I am flesh and blood,
And frail as other men,

Pio. Sir, blow your nose:
I dare not for the world: no, she is kept
By a great Don, Vitelli.

Bob. How?

Pio. 'Tis true,

Bob. See, things will veer about: this Don Vitelli
Am I to seek now, to deliver Letters
From my young Mistris Clara: and I tell you,
Under the Rose, because you are a stranger,
And my special friend, I doubt there is
A little foolish love betwixt the parties,
Unknown unto my Lord.

Pio. Happy discovery:
My fruit begins to ripen: hark you Sir,
I would not wish you now, to give those Letters:
But home, and opethis to Madona Clara,
Which when I come I'll justifie, and relate
More amply, and particularly.

Bob. I approve
Your counsel, and will practise it: bazilos manos:
Here's two chewres chew'd: when wisdom is employ'd
'Tis ever thus: your more acquaintance, Signior:
I say not better, least you think, I thought not
Yours good enough.

Exit.

Enter Alguazier.

Pio. Your servant excellent Steward.

Would all the Dons in Spain had no more brains,
Here comes the Alguazier: dieu vous guard Monsieur.
Is my Cuz stirring yet?

Alg. Your Cuz (good cosin?)
A whore is like a fool, a kinto all
The gallants in the Town: Your Guz, good Signior,
Is gone abroad; Sir, with her other Cosin,
My Lord Vitelli: since when there hath been
Some dozen Cosins here to enquire for her.

Pio. She's greatly ally'd Sir.

Alg. Marry is she, Sir,
Come of a lusty kindred: the truth is,
I must connive no more: no more admittance
Must I consent to; my good Lord has threatned me,
And you must pardon.

Pio. Out upon thee man,
Turn honest in thine age? one foot i'th' grave?
Thou shalt not wrong thy self so, for a million:
Look, thou three-headed Cerberus (for wit
I mean) here is one sop, and two, and three,
For every chop a bit.

Alg. I marry Sir:
Well, the poor heart loves you but too well.
We have been talking on you 'faith this hour:
Where, what I said, goe too: she loves your valour;
Oh, and your Musick most abominably:
She is within Sir, and alone: what mean you?

Pio. That is your Sergeants fide, I take it Sir;
Now I endure your Constables much better;
There is less danger in't: for one you know
Is a tame harmless monster in the light,
The Sergeant salvage both by day, and night

Alg. I'll call her to you for that.

Pio. No, I will charm her.

Enter Malroda.

Alg. She's come.

Pio. My Spirit.

Mal. Oh my Sweet,
Leap hearts to lips, and in our kisses meet.

S O N G.

Pio. Turn, turn thy beauteous face away,
How pale and sickly looks the day,
In emulation of thy brighter beams!
Oh envious light, fly, fly, begone,
Come night, and piece two breasts as one;
When what love does, we will repeat in dreams.
Yet (thy eyes open) who can day hence fright,
Let but their Lids fall, and it will be night.

Alg. Well, I will leave you to your fortitude;
And you to temperance: ah, ye pretty pair,
'Twere sinto sunder you. Lovers being alone
Make one of two, and day and night all one.
But fall not out, I charge you, keep the peace;
You know my place else.

Exit.

Mal. No, you will not marry:
You are a Courtier, and can sing (my Love)
And want no Mistrisses: but yet I care not,
I'll love you still; and when I am dead for you,
Then you'll believe my truth.

Pio. You kill me (fair)
It is my lesson that you speak: have I
In any circumstance deserv'd this doubt?
I am not like your false and perjur'd Don
That here maintains you, and has vow'd his faith,
And yet attempts in way of marriage
A Lady not far off.

Mal. How's that?

Pio. 'Tis so:
And therefore Mistris, now the time is come

You

You may demand his promise; and I swear
To marry you with speed.

Mal. And with that Gold
Which Don Vitelli gives, you'll walk some voyage
And leave me to my Trade; and laugh, and brag,
How you o'er-reach'd a whore, and gull'd a Lord.

Pio. You anger me extremly: fare you well.
What should I say to be believ'd? expose me
To any hazard; or like jealous Juno
(Th' incensed step-mother of Hercules)
Design me labours most impossible,
I'll doe 'em, or die in 'em; so at last
You will believe me.

Mal. Come, we are friends: I do,
I am thine, walk in: my Lord has sent me outsidés,
But thou shalt have 'em, the colours are too sad:

Pio. 'Faith Mistrifs, I want clothes indeed.

Mal. I have
Some Gold too, for my servant.

Pio. And I have
A better mettal for my Mistrifs.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Vitelli and Alguazier, at several doors.

Alg. Undone—wit now or never help me: my Master
He will cut my throat, I am a dead Constable;
And he'll not be hang'd neither, there's the grief:
The party, Sir, is here.

Vit. What?

Alg. He was here;
I cry your Lordship mercy: but I ratled him;
I told him here was no companions
For such debauch'd, and poor condition'd fellows;
I bid him venture not so desperately
The cropping of his ears, flitting his nose,
Or being gelt.

Vit. 'Twas well done.

Alg. Please your honor,
I told him there were Stews, and then at last
Swore three or four great oaths she was remov'd,
Which I did think I might, in conscience,
Being for your Lordship.

Vit. What became of him?

Alg. Faith Sir, he went away with a flea in's ear,
Like a poor cur, clapping his trundle tail
Betwixt his legs.—A chi ha, a chi ha, a chi ha—now luck.

Enter Malroda and Piorato.

Mal. 'Tis he, do as I told thee: Bless thee Signior.
Oh, my dear Lord.

Vit. Malroda, what alone?

Mal. She never is alone, that is accompanied With noble thoughts, my Lord; and mine are such,
Being only of your Lordship.

Vit. Pretty Lafs.

Mal. Oh my good Lord, my Picture's done: but 'faith
It is not like; nay, this way Sir, the light
Strikes best upon it here.

Pio. Excellent wench.

Alg. I am glad the danger's over.

Vit. 'Tis wondrous like,

But that Art cannot counterfeit what Nature
Could make but once,

Mal. All's clear; another tune
You must hear from me now: Vitelli, thou'rt
A most perfidious and a perjurd man,
As ever did usurp Nobility:

Vit. What meanst thou Mal?

Mal. Leave your betraying smiles,
And change the tunes of your inticing tongues
To penitential prayers; for I am, great

Exit.

Exit.

In labour, even with anger, big with child
Of womans rage, bigger than when my womb
Was pregnant by thee: go seducer, flie
Out of the world, let me the last wretch be Dishonored by thee: touch me not, I loath
My very heart, because thou lay'st there long;
A woman's well help'd up, that's confident
In e'er a glittering outside on you all:
Would I had honestly been match'd to some Poor Countrey-swain, e'er known the vanity
Of Court: peace then had been my portion,
Nor had been cozen'd by an hours pomp
To be a whore unto my dying day.

Vit. Oh the uncomfortable waies such women have,
Their different speech and meaning, no assurance
In what they say or do: Dissemblers
Even in their prayers, as if the weeping Greek
That flatter'd Troy a-fire, had been their Adam;
Lyers, as if their mother had been made
Only of all the falshood of the man,
Dispos'd into that rib: Do I know this,
And more: nay, all that can concern this Sex,
With the true end of my creation?

Can I with rational discourse sometimes
Advance my spirit into Heaven, before
'T has shook hands with my body, and yet blindly
Suffer my filthy flesh to master it,
With sight of such fair frail beguiling objects?
When I am absent, easily I resolve
Ne'er more to entertain those strong desires
That triumph o'er me, even to actual sin;
Yet when I meet again those forcerers eies,
Their beams my hardest resolutions thaw,
As if that cakes of Ice and July met,
And her sighs powerful as the violent North,
Like a light feather twirl me round about
And leave me in mine own low state again.
What ayl'st thou? prethee weep not: Oh, those tears
If they were true, and rightly spent, would raise
A flow'ry spring i'th' midst of January:
Celestial Ministers with Chrystal cups
Would stoop to save 'em for immortal drink:
But from this passion; why all this?

Mal. Do ye ask?

You are marrying: having made me unfit
For any man, you leave me fit for all:
Porters must be my burthens now, to live,
And fitting me your self for Carts, and Beadles,
You leave me to 'em: And who of all the world
But the virago, your great Arch-foes daughter?
But on: I care not, this poor rush: 'twill breed
An excellent Comedy: ha, ha: 't makes me laugh:
I cannot choose: the best is, some report
It is a match for fear, not love o' your side.

Vit. Why how the devil knows she, that I saw
This Lady? are all whores, piec'd with some witch?
I will be merry, 'faith 'tis true, sweet heart,
I am to marry?

Mal. Are you? you base Lord,
By—I'll pistol thee.

Vit. A roaring whore?

Take heed, there's a Correction-house hard by: (you of,
You ha' learn'd this o' your swordman, that I warn'd
Your Fencers, and your drunkards: but whereas
You upbraid me with oaths, why I must tell you
I ne'er promis'd you marriage, nor have vow'd,
But said I lov'd you, long as you remain'd
The woman I expected, or you swore,
And how you have fail'd of that (sweet-heart) you know.
You fain would shew your power, but fare you well,
I'll keep no more faith with an infidel.

Mal. Nor I my bosome for a Turk: d' ye hear?
Goe, and the devil take me, if ever
I see you more: I was too true.

Vit.

Vit. Come, pith:
That devil take the falsest of us two.

Mal. Amen.

Vit. You are an ill Clark; and curse your self:
Madness transports you: I confess, I drew you
Unto my Will: but you must know that must not Make me doat on the habit of my sin.
I will, to settle you to your content,
Be master of my word: and yet he ly'd
That told you I was marrying, but in thought:
But will you slave me to your tyranny
So cruelly I shall not dare to look
Or speak to other women? make me not
Your smock's Monopolie: come, let's be friends:
Look, here's a Jewel for thee: I will come
At night, and —

Mal. What 'yfaith: you shall not, Sir.

Vit. 'Faith, and troth, and verily, but I will

Mal. Half drunk, to make a noise, and rail?

Vit. No, no,

Sober, and dieted for the nounce: I am thine,
I have won the day.

Mal. The night (though) shall be mine.

Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Clara, and Bobadilla with Letters.

Cl. What said he, sirrah?

Bob. Little, or nothing: faith I saw him not,
Nor will not: he doth love a strumpet, Mistriß,
Nay, keeps her spitefully, under the Constables nose,
It shall be justified by the Gentleman
Your brothers Master that is now within
A practising: there are your Letters: come
You shall not cast your self away, while I live,
Nor will I venture my Right worshipful place
In such a business—here's your Mother, down:
And he that loves you: another 'gates fellow, I wish,
If you had any grace.

Enter Eugenia and Sayavedra.

Cl. Well rogue.

Bob. I'll in, to see Don Lucio manage, he'll make
A pretty piece of flesh, I promise you,
He does already handle his weapon finely.

Exit.

Eug. She knows your love, Sir, and the full allowance
Her Father and my self approve it with,
And I must tell you, I much hope it hath Wrought some impression by her alteration;
She sighs, and saies, forsooth, and cries heigh-ho,
She'll take ill words o' th' Steward, and the Servants,
Yet answer affably, and modestly:
Things Sir, not usual with her: there she is,
Change some few words.

Say. Madam, I am bound t'ye;
How now, fair Mistrißs, working?

Cl. Yes forsooth,
Learning to live another day.

Say. That needs not.

Cl. No forsooth: by my truly but it does,
We knew not what we may come to.

Eug. 'Tis strange.

Say. Come, I ha' begg'd leave for you to play.

Cl. Forsooth

'Tis ill for a fair Lady to be idle.

Say. She had better be well-busied, I know that.
Turtle: me thinks you mourn, shall I sit by you?

Cl. If you be weary, Sir, you had best be gone
(I work not a true stitch) now you're my mate.

Say. If I be so, I must do more than side you.

Cl. Ev'n what you will, but tread me.

Say. Shall we bill?

Cl. Oh no, forsooth.

Say. Being so fair, my Clara,
Why d'ye delight in Black-work?

Cl. Oh White, Sir,
The fairest Ladies like the blackest men:
I ever lov'd the colour: all black things
Are least subject to change,

Say. Why, I do love
A black thing too: and the most beauteous faces
Have oftneß of them: as the blackest eyes,
Jet-arched brows, such hair: I'll kiss your hand.

Cl. 'Twill hinder me my work Sir: and my Mother
Will chide me, if I do not do my taske.

Say. Your Mother, nor your Father shall chide: you Might have a prettier taske, would you be rul'd,
And look with open eyes.

Cl. I stare upon you:

And broadly see you, a wondrous proper man,
Yet 'twere a greater taske for me to love you
Than I shall ever work Sir, in seven year,

—O' this stitching, I had rather feel
Two, than fow one:—this rogue h' as given me a fitch
Clean cross my heart:

Now you grow troublesome: pish, the man is foolish.

Say. Pray wear these trifles.

Cl. Neither you, nor trifles,
You are a trifle, wear your self, Sir, out,
And here no more trifle the time away.

Say. Come; you're deceiv'd in me, I will not wake,
Nor fast, nor dye for you.

Cl. Goose, be not you deceiv'd,
I cannot like, nor love, nor live with you,
Nor fast, nor watch, nor pray for you.

Eug. Her old fit.

Say. Sure this is not the way, nay, I will break
Your melancholly.

Cl. I shall break your pate then,
Away, you sanguine scabbard.

Eug. Out upon thee
Thou'lt break my heart, I am sure,

Enter Alvarez, Piorato, Lucio, and Bobadilla.

Say. She's not yet tame.

Alv. On Sir; put home: or I shall goad you here
With this old Fox of mine, that will bite better:

Oh, the brave age is gone; in my young daies

A Chevalier would stock a needles point

Three times together: strait i' th' hams?

Or shall I give ye new Garters?

Bob. Faith old Master.

There's little hope: the linnen sure was danck

He was begot in, he's so faint, and cold:

Ev'n send him to Toledo, there to study,

For he will never fadge with these Toledos;

Bear ye up your point there; pick his teeth: Oh base.

Pio. Fie: you are the most untoward Scholar: bear

Your body gracefully: what a posture's there?

You lie too open-breasted.

Luc. Oh!

Pio. You'd never

Make a good States-man:

Luc. Pray no more.

I hope to breathe in peace, and therefore need not

The practise of these dangerous qualities,

I do not mean to live by't; for I trust

You'll leave me better able.

Alv. Not a Button:

Let's goe get us a new heir.

Eug. I by my troth: your daughter's as untoward.

Alv. I will break thee bone by bone, and bake thee,

E'r I'll ha' such a wooden Son to inherit:

Take him a good knock; see how that will work.

Pio. Now, for your life Signior:

Luc.

Luc. Oh; alas, I am kill'd
My eye is out: look Father Zancho:
I'll play the fool no more thus, that I will not.

Clara. 'Heart: ne'r a rogue in Spain shall wrong my brother
Whilst I can hold a sword.

Pio. Hold Madam, Madam.

Alv. Clara.

Eug. Daughter.

Bob. Mistrefs:

Pio. Bradamante.

Hold, hold I pray,

Alv. The devil's in her, o'the other side sure,
There's Gold for you: they have chang'd what ye call'ts:
Will no cure help? well I have one experiment,
And if that fail, I'll hang him, then here's an end on't.
Come you along with me: and you Sir: Exeunt.

Bob. Now are you going to drowning. Alv. Eug. Luc.

Say. I'll ev'n along with ye: she's too great a Lady Bob.
For me, and would prove more then my match. Exit

Clara. You'r he spoke of Vitelli to the Steward:

Pio. Yes, and I thank you, you have beat me for't.

Clara. But are you sure you do not wrong him?

Pio. Sure?

So sure, that if you please venture your self
I'll shew you him, and his Cokatrice together,
And you shall hear 'em talk.

Clara. Will you? by —— Sir

You shall endear me ever: and I ask
You mercy

Pio. You were somewhat boystrous. (pains,

Clara. There's Gold to make you amends: and for this
I'll gratifie you farther: I'll but masque me
And walk along with ye: faith let's make a night on't. Exit.

Scena Quinta.

Enter Alguazier, Pachieco, Mendoza, Metaldi,
Lazarillo.

Alg. Come on my brave water-Spaniels, you that hunt
Ducks in the night: and hide more knavery under your gownes than your betters: observe my precepts, and edifie by my doctrine: at yond corner will I fet you; if drun-kards molest the street, and fall to brabbling, knock you down the malefactors, and take you up their cloaks and hats, and bring them to me: they are lawful prisoners, and must be ransom'd ere they receive liberty: what else:
you are to execute upon occasion, you sufficiently know,
and therefore I abbreviate my Lecture.

Met. We are wise enough, and warm enough.

Men. Vice this night shall be apprehended.

Pach. The terror of rug-gownes shall be known: and Discharge us of after reckonings. (our bills)

Laz. I will do any thing, so I may eat.

Pach. Lazarillo, We will spend no more; now we are grown worse, we will live better: let us follow our calling faithfully. (and who)

Alg. Away, then the Common-wealth is our Mistrefs:
Would serve a common Mistrefs, but to gain by her?

Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Vitelli, Lamorall, Genevora, Anastro, and two Pages with lights.

Lam. I pray you see the Masque, my Lord.

Ana. 'Tis early night yet.

Gen. O if it be so late, take me along:
I would not give advantage to ill tongues
To tax my being here, without your presence
To be my warrant.

Vit. You might spare this, Sister,
Knowing with whom I leave you; one that is
By your allowance, and his choice, your Servant,
And may my counsel and persuasion work it,
Your husband speedily: For your entertainment
My thanks; I will not rob you of the means
To do your Mistrefs some acceptable service
In waiting on her to my house.

Gen. My Lord,

Vit. As you respect me, without farther trouble
Retire, and tast those pleasures prepar'd for you,
And leave me to my own ways.

Lam. When you please Sir.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Malroda, and Alguazier.

Mal. You'll leave my Chamber?

Alg. Let us but bill once,
My Dove, my Sparrow, and I, with my office
Will be thy slaves for ever.

Mal. Are you so hot?

Alg. But tast the difference of a man in place,
You'll find that when authority pricks him forward,
Your Don, nor yet your Diego comes not near him
To do a Lady right: no men pay dearer
For their stoln sweets, than we: three minutes trading
Affords to any finner a protection
For three years after: think on that, I burn;
But one drop of your bounty.

Mal. Hence you Rogue,
Am I fit for you? is't not grace sufficient
To have your staff, a bolt to bar the door
Where a Don enters, but that you'l presume
To be his taster?

Alg. Is no more respect
Due to his rod of justice?

Mal. Do you dispute?
Good Doctor of the Dungeon, not a word more,
——If you do, my Lord Vitelli knows it.

Alg. Why I am big enough to answer him,
Or any man.

Mal. 'Tis well.

Vitelli within.

Vit. Malroda.

Alg. How?

Mal. You know the voice, and now crouch like a Cur,
Tane worrying sheep: I now could have you guelled
For a Bawd rampant: but on this submission
For once I spare you

Alg. I will be reveng'd ——
My honorable Lord.

Enter Vitel.

Vit. There's for thy care

Alg. I am mad, stark mad: proud Pagan scorn her host?
I would I were but valiant enough to kick her,

Enter Piorato, and Clara above.

I'll wish no manhood else.

Mal. What's that?

Alg. I am gone.

Exit.

Pio. You see I have kept my word.

Clara. But in this object
Hardly deserv'd my thanks.

Pio. Is there ought else
You will command me?

Clara. Only your sword
Which I must have: nay willingly I yet know
To force it, and to use it.

Z

Pio.

Pio. 'Tis yours Lady.

Cl. I ask no other guard.

Pio. If so I leave you:

And now, if that the Constable keep his word,
A poorer man may chance to gull a Lord.

Mal. By this good—you shall not.

Vit. By this——

I must, and will, Maltrada; What do you make
A stranger of me?

Mal. I'll be so to you,
And you shall find it.

Vit. These are your old arts
T'endear the game you know I come to hunt for,
Which I have born too coldly.

Mal. Do so still,
For if I heat you, hang me.

Vit. If you do not
I know who'll starve for't: why, thou shame of women,
Whose folly, or whose impudence is greater
Is doubtful to determine; this to me
That know thee for a whore.

Mal. And made me one,
Remember that.

Vit. Why should I but grow wise
And tie that bounty up, which nor discretion
Nor honor can give way to; thou wouldst be
A Bawd e're twenty, and within a Month
A barefoot, lowzie, and diseased whore,
And shift thy lodgings oftner than a rogue
That's whipt from post to post.

Mal. Pish: all our Colledge
Know you can rail well in this kind.

Cl. For me
He never spake so well.

Vit. I have maintain'd thee
The envy of great fortunes, made thee shine
As if thy name were glorious: stuck thee full
Of jewels, as the firmament of Stars,
And in it made thee so remarkable
That it grew questionable, whether virtue poor,
Or vice so fet forth as it is in thee,
Were even by modesties self to be preferr'd,
And am I thus repaid?

Mal. You are still my debtor;
Can this (though true) be weigh'd with my lost honor,
Much less my faith? I have liv'd private to you,
And but for you, had ne'r known what lust was,
Nor what the sorrow for't.

Vit. 'Tis false.

Mal. 'Tis true,
But how return'd by you, thy whole life being
But one continued act of lust, and Shipwrack
Of womens chastities.

Vit. But that I know
That she that dares be damn'd, dares any thing,
I should admire thy tempting me: but presume not
On the power you think you hold o're my affections,
It will deceive you: yield, and presently
Or by the inflamed blood, which thou must quench
I'll make a forcible entry.

Mal. Touch me not:
You know I have a throat,——if you do
I will cry out a rape, or sheath this here,
Ere I'll be kept, and us'd for Julip-water
T'allay the heat which luscious meats and wine
And not desire hath rais'd.

Vit. A desperate devil,
My blood commands my reason; I must take
Some milder way.

Mal. I hope (dear Don) I fit you.
The night is mine, although the day was yours
You are not fasting now: this speeding trick
Which I would as a principle leave to all,

Exit.

That make their maintenance out of their own Indies,
As I do now; my good old mother taught me,
Daughter, quoth she, contest not with your lover
His stomach being empty; let wine heat him,
And then you may command him: 'tis a sure one:
His looks shew he is coming.

Vit. Come this needs not,
Especially to me: you know how dear
I ever have esteem'd you.

Cl. Lost again.

Vit. That any sight of yours, hath power to change
My strongest resolution, and one tear
Sufficient to command a pardon from me,
For any wrong from you, which all mankind
Should kneel in vain for.

Mal. Pray you pardon those
That need your favor, or desire it.

Vit. Prethee.
Be better temper'd: I'll pay as a forfeit
For my rash anger, this purse fil'd with Gold.
Thou shalt have servants, gowns, attires, what not?
Only continue mine.

Mal. 'Twas this I fish'd for

Vit. Look on me, and receive it.

Mal. Well, you know
My gentle nature, and take pride t'abuse it:
You see a trifle pleases me, we are friends;
This kiss, and this confirms it.

Cl. With my ruine.

Mal. I'll have this diamond, and this pearl.

Vit. They are yours.

Mal. But will you not, when you have what you came for,
Take them from me to-morrow? 'tis a fashion
Your Lords of late have us'd.

Vit. But I'll not follow.

Cl. That any man at such a rate as this Should pay for his repentance.

Vit. Shall we to bed now?

Mal. Instantly, Sweet; yet now I think on't better
There's something first that in a word or two
I must acquaint you with.

Cl. Can I cry ay me,
To this against my self? I'll break this match,
Or make it stronger with my blood.

Descends.

Enter Alguazier, Piorato, Pacchieco, Metaldi, Mendoza, Lazarillo, &c.

Alg. I am yours.

A Don's not priviledg'd here more than your self,
Win her, and wear her.

Pio. Have you a Priest ready?

Alg. I have him for thee, Lad; and when I have Married this scornful whore to this poor gallant,
She will make suit to me; there is a trick
To bring a high-pris'd wench upon her knees:
For you my fine neat Harpyes stretch your tallons
And prove your selves true night-Birds.

Pach. Take my word
For me and all the rest.

Laz. If there be meat
Or any banquet stirring, you shall see
How I'll bestow my self.

Alg. When they are drawn,
Rush in upon 'em: all's fair prize you light on:
I must away: your officer may give way
To the Knavery of his watch, but must not see it.
You all know where to find me.

Exit.

Met. There look for us.

Vit. Who's that?

Mal. My Piorato, welcome, welcome:
Faith had you not come when you did my Lord
Had done I know not what to me.

Vit. I am gul'd,
First cheated of my Jewels, and then laug'd at:

Sirha,

Sirha, what makes you here?

Pio. A business brings me,
More lawful than your own,
Vit. How's that, you slave?

Mal. He's such, that would continue her a whore
Whom he would make a wife of.

Vit. I'll tread upon
The face you doat on, strumpet.

Enter Clara.

Pach. Keep the peace there.

Vit. A plot upon my life too?

Met. Down with him.

Cl. Show your old valor, and learn from a woman,
One Eagle has a world of odds against
A flight of Dawes, as these are.

Pio. Get you off,
I'll follow instantly.

Pach. Run for more help there. Exeunt all but Vit. and Vit. Los of my gold, and jewels, and the wench too (Clara.
Afflicts me not so much, as th'having Clara
The witness of my weakness.

Cl. He turns from me,
And yet I may urge merit, since his life
Is made my second gift.

Vit. May I ne'r prosper
If I know how to thank her.

Cl. Sir, your pardon
For pressing thus beyond a Virgins bounds
Upon your privacies: and let my being
Like to a man, as you are, be th'excuse
Of my soliciting that from you, which shall not
Be granted on my part, although desir'd
By any other: Sir, you understand me,
And 'twould shew nobly in you, to prevent
From me a farther boldness, which I must Proceed in, if you prove not merciful,
Thought with my loss of blushes and good name.

Vit. Madam, I know your will, and would be thankful
If it were possible I could affect
The daughter of an enemy.

Cl. That fair false one
Whom with fond dotage you have long pursu'd
Had such a father: she to whom you pay
Dearer for your dishonor, than all titles
Ambitious men hunt for, are worth.

Vit. 'Tis truth.

Cl. Yet, with her, as a friend you still exchange
Health for diseases, and, to your disgrace,
Nourish the rivals to your present pleasures,
At your own charge, us'd as a property
To give a safe protection to her lust,
Yet share in nothing but the shame of it.

Vit. Grant all this so, to take you for a wife
Were greater hazard; for should I offend you
(As 'tis not easy still to please a woman)
You are of so great a spirit, that I must learn
To wear your petticoat, for you will have My breeches from me.

Cl. Rather from this hour
I here abjure all actions of a man,
And will esteem it happiness from you
To suffer like a woman: love, true love
Hath made a search within me, and expell'd
All but my natural softness, and made perfect
That which my parents care could not begin.
I will show strength in nothing, but my duty,
And glad desire to please you, and in that Grow every day more able.

Vit. Could this be,
What a brave race might I beget? I find
A kind of yielding; and no reason why
I should hold longer out: she's young, and fair,

And chaste; for sure, but with her leave, the Devil
Durst not attempt her: Madam, though you have A Soldiers arm, your lips appear as if They were a Ladies,

Cl. They dare Sir, from you
Endure the tryal.

Vit. Ha: once more I pray you:
The best I ever tasted; and 'tis said
I have prov'd many, 'tis not safe I fear
To ask the rest now: well, I will leave whoring
And luck herein send me with her: worthiest Lady,
I'll wait upon you home, and by the way
(If ere I marry, as I'll not forswear it)
Tell you, you are my wife.

Cl. Which if you do,
From me all man-kind women, learn to woe. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Alguaziér, Pachieco, Metaldi, Mendoza,
Lazarillo.

Alg. A cloak? good purchase, and rich hangers? well,
We'll share ten Pistolets a man.

Laz. Yet still
I am monstrous hungry: could you not deduct
So much out of the gross sum, as would purchase
Eight loynes of Veal, and some two dozen of Capons?

Pach. O strange proportion for five.

Laz. For five? I have
A legion in my stomach that have kept
Perpetual fast these ten years: for the Capons,
They are to me but as so many black Birds:
May I but eat once, and be satisfied,
Let the fates call me, when my ship is fraught,
And I shall hang in peace.

Alg. Steal well to night,
And thou shalt feed to morrow; so now you are
Your selves again, I'll raise another watch
To free you from suspicion: set on any
You meet with boldly: I'll not be far off,
I'll assist you, and protect you. Exit.

Met. O brave officer.

Enter Alvarez, Lucio, Bobadilla.

Pach. Would every ward had one but so well given,
And we would watch, for rug, in gowns of velvet.

Mend. Stand close, a prize.

Met. Satten, and gold Lace, Lads.

Alv. Why do'st thou hang upon me?

Luc. 'Tis so dark
I dare not see my way: for heaven sake father
Let us go home.

Bob. No, ev'n here we'll leave you:
Let's run away from him, my Lord.

Luc. Oh 'las.

Alv. Thou hast made me mad: and I will beat thee dead,
Then bray thee in a mortar, and new mold thee,
But I will alter thee.

Bob. 'Twill never be:
He has been three days practising to drink,
Yet still he sips like to a waiting woman,
And looks as he were murdering of a fart
Among wild Irish swaggers.

Luc. I have still
Your good word, Zancho, father.

Alv. Milk-sop, coward;
No house of mine receives thee: I disclaim thee,
Thy mother on her knees shall not entreat me
Hereafter to acknowledge thee.

Luc. Pray you speak for me.

Bob. I would; but now I cannot with mine honor.

Alv. There's only one course left, that may redeem thee,
Which is, to strike the next man that you meet,
And if we chance to light upon a woman,
Take her away, and use her like a man,
Or I will cut thy hamstrings.

Pach. This makes for us.

Alv. What do'st thou do now?

Luc. Sir, I am saying my prayers;
For being to undertake what you would have me,
I know I cannot live.

Enter Lamorall, Genevora, Anastro, and Pages with Lights.

Lam. Madam, I fear
You'll wish you had us'd your coach: your brothers house
Is yet far off.

Gen. The better sir: this walk
Will help digestion after your great supper,
Of which I have fed largely.

Alv. To your task,
Or else you know what follows:

Luc. I am dying:
Now Lord have mercy on me: by your favor,
Sir I must strike you.

Lam. For what cause?

Luc. I know not:
And I must likewise talk with that young Lady,
An hour in private.

Lam. What you must, is doubtful,
But I am certain Sir, I must beat you.

Luc. Help, help.

Alv. Not strike again?

Lam. How, Alvarez?

An. This for my Lord Vitellis love.

Pach. Break out,
And like true thieves, make prey on either side,
But seem to help the stranger.

Bob. Oh my Lord,
They have beat him on his knees.

Luc. Though I want courage:
I yet have a sons duty in me, and Compassion of a fathers danger; that,
That wholly now possesses me.

Alv. Lucia.

This is beyond my hope.

Met. So Lazarillo,
Take up all boy: well done.

Pach. And now steal off
Closely and cunningly.

An. How? have I found you?
Why Gentlemen, are you mad, to make your selves
A prey to Rogues?

Lam. Would we were off.

Bob. Thieves, thieves.

Lam. Defer our own contention: and down with them.

Luc. I'll make you sure.

Bob. Now he plays the Devil.

Gen. This place is not for me. Exit.

Luc. I'll follow her
Half of my pennance is past o'er. Exit.

Enter Alguazier, Assistant, and other Watches.

Alg. What noise?
What tumult's there? keep the Kings peace I charge you.

Pach. I am glad he's come yet.

Alv. O, you keep good Guard
Upon the City, when men of our ranck
Are set upon in the streets.

Lam. The assistants
Shall hear on't be assur'd.

An. And if he be
That careful Governor he is reported,

You will smart for it.

Alg. Patience, good Signiors:

Let me survey the Rascals: O, I know them,
And thank you for them: they are pilf'ring rogues
Of Andaluzia that have perus'd
All Prisons in Castile: I dare not trust
The dungeon with them: no, I'll have them home
To my own house.

Pach. We had rather go to prison.

Alg. Had you so dog-bolts? yes, I know you had:
You there would use your cunning fingers on
The simple locks; you would: but I'll prevent you.

Lam. My Mistrißs lost, good night. Exit.

Bob. Your Son's gone too,
What should become of him?

Alv. Come of him, what will:
Now he dares fight, I care not: I'll to bed,
Look to your prisoners Alguazier. Exit with Boba.

Alg. All's clear'd:

Droop not for one disaster: let us hug,
And triumph in our knaveries.

Assist. This confirms

What was reported of him.

Met. 'Twas done bravely.

Alg. I must a little glory in the means
We Officers have, to play the Knaves, and safely:
How we break through the toyles, pitch'd by the Law,
Yet hang up them that are far less delinquents:
A simple shopkeeper's carted for a bawd
For lodging (though unwittingly) a smock-Gamster:
Where, with rewards, and credit I have kept
Malroda in my house, as in a cloyster,
Without taint, or suspicion.

Pach. But suppose

The Governor should know't?

Alg. He? good Gentleman,
Let him perplex himself with prying into
The measures in the market, and th'abuses
The day stands guilty of: the pillage of the night
Is only mine, mine own fee simple;
Which you shall hold from me, tenants at will,
And pay no rent for't.

Pach. Admirable Landlord.

Alg. Now we'll go search the Taverns, commit such
As we find drinking: and be drunk our selves
With what we take from them: these silly wretches
Whom I for form sake only have brought hither
Shall watch without, and guard us.

Assist. And we will See you safe lodg'd, most worthy Alguazier,

With all of you his comrads.

Met. 'Tis the Governor.

Alg. We are betray'd?

Assist. My guard there; bind them fast:

How men in high place and authority
Are in their lives and estimations wrong'd
By their subordinate Ministers? yet such
They cannot but employ: wrong'd justice finding Scarce one true servant in ten officers.
'T'expostulate with you, were but to delay
Your crimes due punishment, which shall fall upon you
So speedily, and severely, that it shall Fright others by th'example: and confirm
How ever corrupt Officers may disgrace
Themselves, 'tis not in them to wrong their place.
Bring them away.

Alg. We'll suffer nobly yet,
And like to Spanish Gallants.

Pach. And we'll hang so.

Laz. I have no stomach to it: but I'll endeavor.

Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Lucio, and Genevora.

Gen. Nay you are rude; pray you forbear, you offer now
More than the breeding of a Gentleman
Can give you warrant for.

Luc. 'Tis but to kiss you,
And think not I'll receive that for a favour
Which was enjoy'd me for a penance, Lady.

Gen. You have met a gentle confessor, and for once
(So then you will rest satisfied) I vouchsafe it.

Luc. Rest satisfied with a kiss? why can a man
Desire more from a woman? is there any Pleasure beyond it? may I never live
If I know what it is.

Gen. Sweet Innocence.

Luc. What strange new motions do I feel? my veins
Burn with an unknown fire: in every part
I suffer alteration: I am poison'd,
Yet languish with desire again to taste it,
So sweetly it works on me.

Gen. I ne'er saw
A lovely man, till now.

Luc. How can this be?
She is a woman, as my mother is,
And her I have kiss'd often, and brought off
My lips unscorch'd; yours are more lovely, Lady,
And so should be less hurtful: pray you vouchsafe
Your hand to quench the heat tane from your Lip,
Perhaps that may restore me.

Gen. Willingly.

Luc. The flame increaseth: if to touch you, burn thus,
What would more strict embraces do? I know not,
And yet methinks to die so, were to ascend
To heaven, through Paradise.

Gen. I am wounded too,
Though modesty forbids that I should speak
What ignorance makes him bold in: why do you fix
Your eyes so strongly on me?

Luc. Pray you stand still,
There is nothing else, that is worth the looking on:
I could adore you, Lady.

Gen. Can you love me?

Luc. To wait on you, in your chamber, and but touch
What you, by wearing it, have made divine,
Were such a happiness. I am resolved,
I'll sell my liberty to you for this glove,
And write my self your slave.

Enter Lamorall.

Gen. On easier terms,
Receive it as a friend.

Lam. How! giving favor!
I'll have it with his heart.

Gen. What will you do?

Luc. As you are merciful, take my life rather.

Gen. Will you depart with't so?

Lam. Do's that grieve you?

Gen. I know not: but even now you appear valiant.

Luc. 'Twas to preserve my father: in his cause
I could be so again. (enemy?)

Gen. Not in your own? Kneel to thy Rival and thine
Away unworthy creature, I begin
To hate my self, for giving entrance to
A good opinion of thee: for thy torment,
If my poor beauty be of any power,
Mayst thou doat on it desperately: but never Presume to hope for grace, till thou recover
And wear the favor that was ravish'd from thee.

Lam. He wears my head too then.

Gen. Poor fool, farewell.

Exit.

Luc. My womanish soul, which hitherto hath govern'd
This coward flesh, I feel departing from me;
And in me by her beauty is inspir'd
A new, and masculine one: instructing me
What's fit to do or suffer; powerful love
That hast with loud, and yet a pleasing thunder
Rous'd sleeping manhood in me, thy new creature,
Perfect thy work so that I may make known
Nature (though long kept back) will have her own.

Exeunt.

Actus V.

Scena Prima.

Enter Lamorall and Lucio.

Lam. Can it be possible, that in six short hours
The subject still the same, so many habits
Should be remov'd? or this new Lucio, he
That yesternight was baffled and disgrac'd,
And thank'd the man that did it, that then kneeld
And blubber'd like a woman, should now dare
On terms of honor seek reparation
For what he then appear'd not capable of?

Luc. Such miracles, men that dare do injuries
Live to their shames to see, and for punishment
And scourge to their proud follies.

Lam. Prethee leave me:
Had I my Page, or foot-man here to flesh thee,
I durst the better hear thee.

Luc. This scorn needs not:
And offer such no more.

Lam. Why say I should,
You'll not be angry?

Luc. Indeed I think I shall,
Would you vouchsafe to shew your self a Captain,
And lead a little farther, to some place
That's less frequented.

Lam. He looks pale.

Luc. If not,
Make use of this.

Lam. There's anger in his eyes too:
His gesture, voyce, behaviour, all new fashion'd;
Well, if it does endure in act the triall
Of what in show it promises to make good,

Ulysses Cyclops, Ios transformation,
Eurydice fetch from Hell, with all the rest
Of Ovids Fables, I'll put in your Creed;
And for proof, all incredible things may be,
Write down that Lucio, the coward Lucio,
The womanish Lucio fought.

Luc. And Lamorall,
The still employ'd great duellist Lamorall,
Took his life from him.

Lam. 'Twill not come to that sure:
Methinks the only drawing of my Sword
Should fright that confidence.

Luc. It confirms it rather.
To make which good, know you stand now oppos'd
By one that is your Rival, one that wishes
Your name and title greater, to raise his;
The wrong you did, less pardonable than it is,
But your strength to defend it, more than ever
It was when justice friended it. The Lady
For whom we now contend, Genevora
Of more desert, (if such incomparable beauty
Could suffer an addition) your love
To Don Vitelli multipli'd, and your hate
Against my father and his house increas'd;

And

And lastly, that the Glove which you there wear,
To my dishonour, (which I must force from you)
Were dearer to you than your life.

Lam. You'll find

It is, and so I'll guard it:

Luc. All these must meet then

With the black infamy, to be foild by one
That's not allow'd a man: to help your valor,
That falling by your hand, I may, or dye,
Or win in this one single opposition
My Mistriss, and such honor as I may Enrich my fathers Arms with.

Lam. 'Tis said Nobly;
My life with them are at the stake.

Luc. At all then.

Fight.

Lam. She's yours, this and my life too follow your fortune,
And give not only back that part, the looser
Scorns to accept of —

Luc. What's that?

Lam. My poor life,

Which do not leave me as a farther torment,
Having dispoild me of my Sword, mine honor,
Hope of my Ladies grace, fame, and all else
That made it worth the keeping.

Luc. I take back

No more from you, than what you forc'd from me;
And with a worser title: yet think not
That I'll dispute this, as made insolent
By my success, but as one equal with you,
If so you will accept me; that new courage,
Or call it fortune if you please, that is Conferr'd upon me by the only fight
Of fair Genevora, was not bestow'd on me
To bloody purposes: nor did her command
Deprive me of the happiness to see her
But till I did redeem her favor from you;
Which only I rejoyce in, and share with you
In all you suffer else.

Lam. This curtesie

Wounds deeper than your Sword can, or mine own;
Pray you make use of either, and dispatch me.

Luc. The barbarous Turk is satisfied with spoil;
And shall I, being posses'd of what I came for,
Prove the more Insidel?

Lam. You were better be so,
Than publish my disgrace, as 'tis rhe custom,
And which I must expect.

Luc. Judge better on me:

I have no tongue to trumpet mine own praise
To your dishonor: 'tis a bastard courage
That seeks a name out that way, no true born one;
Pray you be comforted; for by all goodness
But to her virtuous self, the best part of it,
I never will discover on what terms
I came by these: which yet I take not from you,
But leave you in exchange of them, mine own,
With the desire of being a friend; which if
You will not grant me, but on farther trial
Of manhood in me, seek me when you please,
(And though I might refuse it with mine honor)
Win them again, and wear them: so good morrow. Exit.

Lam. I ne'r knew what true valor was till now;
And have gain'd more by this disgrace, than all
The honors I have won: they made me proud,
Presumptuous of my fortune; a mere beast,
Fashion'd by them, only to dare and do:
Yielding no reasons for my wilful actions
But what I stuck on my Swords point, presuming
It was the best Renew. How unequal
Wrongs well maintain'd makes us to others, which Ending with shame teach us to know our selves,
I will think more on't.

Enter Vitelli.

Vit. Lamorall.

Lam. My Lord?

Vit. I came to seek you.

Lam. And unwillingly;

You ne'r found me tell now: your pleasure Sir?

Vit. That which will please thee friend: thy vow'd love to me
Shall now be put in action: means is offer'd
To use thy good Sword for me; that which still Thou wearst, as if it were a part of thee.
Where is it?

Lam. 'Tis chang'd for one more fortunate:
Pray you enquire not how.

Vit. Why, I ne'r thought
That there was musick in't, but ascribe
The fortune of it to the arm.

Lam. Which is grown weaker too. I am not (in a word)
Worthy your friendship: I am onenew vanquish'd,
Yet shame to tell by whom.

Vit. But I'll tell thee
'Gainst whom thou art to fight, and there redeem
Thy honor lost, if there be any such:
The King, by my long suit, at length is pleas'd
That Alvarez and my self, with eithers Second,
Shall end the difference between our houses,
Which he accepts of, I make choice of thee;
And where you speak of a disgrace, the means
To blot it out, by such a publick trial
Of thy approved valor, will revive
Thy antient courage. If you imbrace it do;
If not, I'll seek some other.

Lam. As I am
You may command me.

Vit. Spoke like that true friend
That loves not only for his private end. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Genevora, with a Letter and Bobadilla.

Gen. This from Madona Clara?

Bob. Yes, an't please you.

Gen. Alvarez daughter?

Bob. The same, Lady.

Gen. She,

That sav'd my brothers life?

Bob. You are still in the right,
She wil'd me wait your walking forth: and knowing
How necessary a discreet wife man
Was in a business of such weight, she pleas'd
To think on me: it may be in my face
Your Ladyship, not acquainted with my wisdom,
Finds no such matter: what I am, I am;
Thought's free, and think you what you please.

Gen. 'Tis strange,

Bob. That I should be wise, Madam?

Gen. No, thou art so;

There's for thy pains: and prethee tell thy Lady
I will not fail to meet her: I'll receive
Thy thanks and duty in thy present absence:
Farewell, farewell, I say, now thou art wise. Exit Bob.
She writes here, she hath something to impart
That may concern my brothers life; I know not,
But general fame does give her out so worthy,
That I dare not suspect her: yet wish Lucio,

Enter Lucio.

Were Master of her mind: but she upon't;
Why do I think on him? see, I am punish'd for it,
In his unlook'd for presence: Now I must Endure another tedious piece of Courtship,

Would

Would make one forswear curtesie.

Luc. Gracious Madam,
The sorrow paid for your just anger towards me
Arising from my weakness, I presume
To press into your presence, and despair not
An easie pardon.

Gen. He speaks fence: oh strange.

Luc. And yet believe, that no desire of mine,
Though all are too strong in me, had the power
For their delight, to force me to infringe
What you commanded, it being in your part
To lessen your great rigor when you please,
And mine to suffer with an humble patience
What you'll impose upon it.

Gen. Courtly too.

Luc. Yet hath the poor, and contemn'd Lucio, Madam,
(Made able only by his hope to serve you)
Recover'd what with violence, not justice,
Was taken from him: and here at your feet
With these, he could have laid the conquer'd head
Of Lamorall ('tis all I say of him)
For rudely touching that, which as a relique
I ever would have worship'd, since 'twas yours.

Gen. Valiant, and every thing a Lady could Wish in her servant.

Luc. All that's good in me,
That havenly love, the opposite to base lust,
Which would have all men worthy, hath created;
Which being by your beams of beauty form'd,
Cherish as your own creature.

Gen. I am gone

Too far now to dissemble: rise, or sure
I must kneel with you too: let this one kiss
Speak the rest for me: 'tis too much I do,
And yet, if chastity would, I could wish more.

Luc. In overjoying me, you are grown sad;
What is it Madam? by——
There's nothing that's within my nerves (and yet Favour'd by you, I should as much as man)
But when you please, now or on all occasions
You can think of hereafter, but you may
Dispose of at your pleasure.

Gen. If you break.

That oath again, you loose me. Yet so well
I love you, I shall never put you to't;
And yet forget it not: rest satisfied
With that you have receiv'd now: there are eyes
May be upon us, till the difference
Between our friends are ended: I would not
Be seen so private with you.

Luc. I obey you.

Gen. But let me hear oft from you, and remember
I am Vitellies Sister.

Luc. What's that Madam?

Gen. Nay nothing, fare you well: who feels loves fire,
Would ever ask to have means to desire. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Assisente, Sayavedra, Anaastro, Herald, Attendants.

Assf. Are they come in?

Har. Yes.

Assf. Read the Proclamation,
That all the people here assembled may
Have satisfaction, what the Kings dear love,
In care of the Republick, hath ordained;
Attend with silence: read aloud.

Herald Reads.

FOrasmuch as our high and mighty Master, Philip, the potent and most Catholick King of Spain, hath not only in his own Royal person, been long, and often solicited, and grieved, with the deadly and honorable hatred, sprung up betwixt the two antient and most incurable descended Houses of these his two dearly and equally beloved Subjects, Don Ferdinando de Alvarez, and Don Pedro de Vitelli: (all which in vain his Majesty hath often endeavored to reconcile and qualifie:) But that also through the debates, quarrels, and outrages daily arising, falling, and flowing from these great heads, his publick civil Government is seditiously and barbarously molested and wounded, and many of his chief Gentry (no less tender to his Royal Majesty then the very branches of his own sacred blood) spoyld, lost, and submerged, in the impious inundation and torrent of their still-growing malice: It hath therefore pleas'd His sacred Majesty, out of his infinite affection to preserve his Common-wealth, and general peace, from farther violation, (as a sweet and heartily loving father of his people) and on the earnest petitions of these arch-enemies, to Order, and ordain, that they by ready, each with his well-chosen and beloved friend, armed at all points like Gentlemen, in the Castle of St. Jago, on this present Monday morning betwixt eight and nine of the clock, where (before the combattants be allowed to commence this granted Duel) This to be read aloud for the publick satisfaction of his Majesties well beloved Subjects.

'Save the King.

Drums within.

Say. Hark their Drums speak their insatiate thirst
Of blood, and stop their ears 'gainst pious peace,
Who gently whispering, implores their friendship?

Assf. Kings nor authority can master fate;
Admit 'em then, and blood extinguish hate.

Enter severally, Alvarez, and Lucio, Vitelli and Lamora.

Say. Stay, yet be pleas'd to think, and let not daring
Wherein men now adaies exceed even beasts,
And think themselves not men else, so transport you
Beyond the bounds of Christianity:

Lord Alvarez, Vitelli, Gentlemen,
No Town in Spain, from our Metropolis
Unto the rudest hovel, but is great
With your assured valors daily proofs:
Oh will you then, for a superfluous fame,
A sound of honor, which in these times, all
Like hereticks profess (with obstinacy)
But most erroneously venture your souls,
'Tis a hard task, through a Sea of blood
To fail, and land at Heaven?

Vit. I hope not

If justice be my Pilot: but my Lord,
You know, if argument, or time, or love,
Could reconcile, long since we had shook hands;
I dare protest, your breath cools not a vein
In any one of us, but blows the fire
Which nought but blood reciprocal can quench.

Alv. Vitelli, thou sayst bravely, and sayst right,
And I will kill thee for't, I love thee so.

Vit. Ha, ha, old man: upon thy death I'll build
A story (with this arm) for thy old wife
To tell thy daughter Clara seven years hence
As she sits weeping by a winters fire,
How such a time Vitelli slew her husband
With the same Sword his daughter favor'd him,
And lives, and wears it yet: Come Lamorall,
Redeem thy self.

Lam. Lucio, Genevora

Shall on this Sword receive thy bleeding heart,
For my presented hat, laid at her feet.

Luc

Luc. Thou talk'st well Lamorall, but 'tis thy head
That I will carry to her to thy hat:
Fie Father, I do cool too much.

Alv. Oh boy:
Thy fathers true Son:
Beat Drums, — and so good morrow to your Lordship.

Enter above Eugenia, Clara, Genevora.

Say. Brave resolutions.

Anast. Brave, and Spanish right.

Gen. Lucio.

Cl. Vitelli.

Eng. Alvarez.

Alv. How the devil
Got these Cats into th' gutter? my pussè too?

Eng. Hear us.

Gen. We must be heard.

Cl. We will be heard

Vitelli, look, see Clara on her knees
Imploring thy compassion: Heaven, how frenly
They dart their emulous eyes, as if each scorn'd
To be behind the other in a look!
Mother, death needs no Sword here: oh my Sister
(Fate fain would have it so) persuade, entreat,
A Ladies tears are silent Orators
(Or should be so at least) to move beyond
The honest tongu'd-Rhetorician:
Why will you fight? why do's an uncles death
Twenty year old, exceed your love to me
But twenty days? whose forc'd cause, and fair manner
You could not understand, only have heard.
Custom, that wrought so cunningly on nature
In me, that I forgot my sex, and knew not Whether my body femaie were, or male,
You did unweave, and had the power to charm
A new creation in me, made me fear
To think on those deeds I did perpetrate,
How little power though you allow to me
That cannot with my sighs, my tears, my prayers
Move you from your own loss, if you should gain.

Vit. I must forget you Clara, 'till I have Redeem'd my uncles blood, that brands my face
Like a pestiferous Carbuncle: I am blind
To what you do: deaf to your cries: and Marble
To all impulsive exorations.
When in this point, I have perch'd thy fathers soul,
'Til tender thee this bloody reeking hand
Drawn forth the bowels of that murderer:
If thou canst love me then, I'll marry thee,
And for thy father lost, get thee a Son;
On no condition else.

Assit. Most barbarous.

Say. Savage.

Anast. Irreligious.

Gen. Oh Lucio!

Be thou merciful: thou bear'st fewer years,
Art lately wean'd from soft effimacy,
A maidens manners, and a maidens heart
Are neighbors still to thee: be then more mild,
Proceed not to this combat; be'st thou desperate
Of thine own life? yet (dearest) pittymine
Thy valour's not thine own, I gave it thee,
These eyes begot it, this tongue bred it up,
This breast would lodge it: do not use my gifts
To mine own ruine: I have made thee rich,
Be not so thankless, to undo me for't

Luc. Mistrifs, you know I do not wear a vein.
I would not rip for you, to do you service:
Life's but a word, a shadow, a melting dream,
Compar'd to essential, and eternal honor.
Why, would you have me value it beyond
Your btother: if I first cast down my sword
May all my body here, be made one wound,

And yet my soul not find heaven thorough it.

Alv. You would be catter-walling too, but peace,
Go, get you home, and provide dinner for
Your Son, and me: wee'll be exceeding merry:
Oh Lucio, I will have thee cock of all
The proud Vitellies that do live in Spain:
Fie, we shall take cold: hunch: — I am hoarse
Already.

Lam. How your Sister whets my spleen!
I could eat Lucio now:

Gen. Vitelli, Brother,
Ev'n for your Fathers soul, your uncles blood,
As you do love my life: but last, and most
As you respect your own Honor, and Fame,
Throw down your sword; he is most valiant
That herein yields first.

Vit. Peace, you fool.

Cl. Why Lucio,
Do thou begin; 'tis no disparagement:
He's elder, and thy better, and thy valor
Is in his infancy.

Gen. Or pay it me,
To whom thou ow'st it: Oh, that constant time
Would but go back a week, then Lucio
Thou would'st not dare to fight.

Eng. Lucio, thy Mother,
Thy Mother begs it: throw thy sword down first.

Alv. I'll throw his head down after then.

Gen. Lamorall.

You have often swore you'd be commanded by me.

Lam. Never to this: your spight, and scorn Genevora,
Has lost all power in me:

Gen. Your hearing for six words.

Ass. Say. An. Strange obstinacy!

Al. Vit. Lu. Lam. We'll stay no longer.

Cl. Then by thy oath Vitelli,
Thy dreadful oath, thou would'st return that Sword
When I should ask it, give it to me, now,
This instant I require it.

Gen. By thy vow,
As dreadful Lucio, to obey my will
In any one thing I would watch to challenge,
I charge thee not to strike a stroak: now he
Of our two brothers that loves perjury
Best, and dares first be damn'd, infringe his vow.

Say. Excellent Ladies.

Vit. Pish, you tyrannize.

Luc. We did equivocate.

Alv. On.

Cl. Then Lucio,
So well I love my husband, for he is so,
(Wanting but ceremony) that I pray
His vengeful sword may fall upon thy head
Succesfully for false-hood to his Sister.

Gen. I likewise pray (Vitelli) Lucio's sword
(Who equally is my husband as thou hers)
May find thy false heart, that darst gage thy faith,
And durst not keep it.

Assit. Are you men, or stone.

Alv. Men, and we'll prove it with our swords:

Eng. Your hearing for six words, and we have done,
Zancho come forth — we'll fight our challenge too:
Now speak your resolutions.

Gen. These they are, Enter Bobidilla with two swords and a Pistol.
The first blow given betwixt you, sheathes these swords in one anothers bosomes.

Eng. And rogue, look
You at that instant do discharge that Pistol
Into my breast: if you start back, or quake,
I'll stick you like a Pig.

Alv. — Hold, you are mad.

Gen. This we said: and by our hope of bliss
This we will do: speak your intents.

Cl. Gen. Strike.

Eng. Shoot.

All. Vit. Lat. La. Hold, hold: all friends.

Affist. Come down.

Alv. These devilish women

Can make men friends and enemies when they list.

Say. A gallant undertaking and a happy;

Why this is noble in you: and will be

A welcomer present to our Master Philip

Than the return from his Indies.

Enter Clara, Genevora, Eugenia, and Bobadilla.

Cl. Father, your blessing.

Alv. Take her: if ye bring not

Between you, boys that will find out new worlds,

And win 'em too, I'm a false Prophet.

Vit. Brother.

There is a Sister, long divided streams

Mix now at length, by fate.

Bob. I am not regarded: I was the careful Steward that provided these Instruments of peace, I put the longest weapon in your Sisters hand, (my Lord) because she was the shortest Lady: For likely the shortest Ladies love the longest---men: And for mine own part, I could have discharged it: my Pistol is no ordinary Pistol, it has two ramming bullets; but thought I, why should I shoot my two bullets into my old Lady? if they had gone, I would not have staid long after: I would ev'n have died too, bravely y'faith, like a Roman Steward: hung my self in mine own chain, and there had been a story of Bobadilla, Spindola, Zanco, for after ages to lament: hum: I perceive, I am not only not regarded, but also not rewarded.

Alv. Prethee peace: 'shalt have a new chain, next Saint Jaques day, or this new gilt:

Bob. I am satisfied: let virtue have her due: And yet I am melancholy upon this atonement: pray heaven the State rue it not: I would my Lord Vitellie's Steward, and I could meet: they should find it should cost 'em a little more to make us friends: well, I will forswear wine, and women for a year: and then I will be drunk to morrow, and run a whoring like a dog with a broken bottle at's tail; then will I repent next day, and forswear 'em again more vehemently: be forsworn next day again, and repent my repentance: for thus a melancholy Gentleman doth, and ought to live.

Affist. Nay, you shall dine with me: and afterward I'll with ye to the King: But first, I will Dispatch the Castles business, that this day May be compleat. Bring forth the malefactors.

Enter Alguazier, Pacheco, Metaldi, Mendoza, Lazaril, Piorato, Malroda, and Guard.

You Alguazier, the Ringleader of these Poor fellows, are degraded from your office, You must return all stolen goods you receiv'd, And watch a twelve month without any pay: This, if you fail of, (all your goods confiscate) You are to be whipt, and sent into the Gallies.

Alg. I like all, but restoring that Catholique Doctrine.

I do dislike: Learn all ye officers

By this to live uprightly (if you can.)

Exit.

Affist. You Cobler, to translate your manners new, Are doom'd to th' Cloisters of the Mendicants, With this your brother, botcher, there for nothing To cobble, and heel hose for the poor Friers, Till they allow you penance for sufficient, And your amendment; then you shall be freed, And may set up again,

Pach. Mendoza, come, Our souls have trode awry in all mens fight, We'll underlay 'em, till they go upright,

Exe. Pach. and Mend.

Affist. Smith, in those shackles you for your hard heart Must lie by th' heels a year.

Met. I have shod your horse, my Lord.

Exit.

Affist. Away: for you, my hungry white-loaf'd face, You must to th' Gallies, where you shall be sure To have no more bits, than you shall have blows.

Laz. Well, though herrings want, I shall have rowes.

Affist. Signior, you have prevented us, and punish'd Your selfe severelier than we would have done.

You have married a whore: may she prove honest.

Pio. 'Tis better, my Lord, than to marry an honest woman; That may prove a whore,

Vit. 'Tis a handsome wench: and thou canst keep her tame I'll send you what I promis'd.

Pio. Joy to your Lordships.

Alv. Hear may all Ladies learn, to make of foes The perfect'st friends: and not the perfect'st foes Of dearest friends, as some do now a daies.

Vit. Behold the power of love, to nature lost By custome irrecoverably, past the hope Of friends restoring, Love hath here retriev'd To her own habit, made her blush to see Her so long monstrous Metamorphoses, May strange affairs never have worse success.

Exeunt.

EPILOGUE.

Our Author fears there are some Rebel hearts,
Whose dulness doth oppose loves piercing darts;
Such will be apt to say there wanted wit,
The language low, very few scenes are writ

With spirit and life; such odd things as these
He cares not for, nor ever means to please;
For if your selves a Mistriss or loves friends,
Are lik'd with this smooth Play he hath his ends.

Enter Bartello and Silvio.

Sil. Tis true she is a right good Princess, and a just one,
 And Florence when she sets, has lost a Planet.

Bar. My Mistriss? I tell thee gentle Nephew,
 There is not such another friend to goodness,
 To down-right dealing, to faith and true heart
 Within the Christian confines: Before she blest us,
 Justice was a Cheese-monger, a meer Cheese-monger,
 Weigh'd nothing to the world but Mites and Maggots,
 And a main stink: Law like a Horse-courser,
 Her rules, and precepts hung with gawdes and ribbons
 And pamper'd up to couzen him that bought her,
 When she her self was hackney, lame, and founder'd.

Sil. But the sweet Lady,

Belvidere the bright one —

Bar. I, there's a face indeed: Oh my dear Nephew,
 Could a young fellow of thy fiery mettle
 Freeze, and that Lady in his Arms?

Sil. I think not.

Bar. Thou hast a parlous judgement; but let that pass,
 She is as truly virtuous, fair, and noble,
 As her great Mother's good: and that's not ordinary.

Sil. But why (so many Princes, and so great ones Being Suitors) should the Dutchess deny to match her?

Bar. She is a Jewel man, hangs in her bosom,
 Her only Child: with her eies she sees all things,
 Discourses with her tongue, and pluck her from her
 (So dotingly the old one loves her young one)
 You pluck her heart out too: Besides, of late daies,

The Duke of Milan, who could never win her
By Love, nor Treaty, laid a close train for her
In her own private Walks: some forty Horse-men,
So to surprize her; which we found, and dealt with,
And sent 'em running home to the Duke their Master,
Like Dogs with bottles at their tails.

Sil. Since that, I heard Sir,
She has sent her to your Cittadel to secure her,
My colin Rodope, your wife attending her.

Bar. You hear a truth, and all convenient pleasures
Are there proportion'd for her.

Sil. I would fain, Sir,
Like one that owes a dutious service to her
Sometimes to please you—

Bar. Gentle Colin pardon me,
I must not, nor you must not dare to offer,
The last Edict lies on his life pursues it;
Your friend, Sir, to command, abroad to love you
To lend ye any thing I have, to wait upon ye,
But in the Cittadel where I stand charg'd,
Not a bit upon a march: no service, Sir,
No, good Sir by no means: I kiss your hands, Sir. Exit.

Sil. To your keeping only? none else to look upon her?
None but Bartello worthy her attendance?
No faith but his to serve her? Oh Belvidere,
Thou Saint to whom my youth is sacrific'd,
Thou point to which my life turns, and my fortune,
Art thou lock'd from me now? from all my comforts,
Art thou snatch'd violently? thou hear'st me not,
Nor canst thou see (fair soul) thy servants mournings,
Yet let thy gentle heart feel what his absence,
The great divorce of minds so truly loving,
So long, and nurs'd in one affection
Even from our infant eyes, suck'd in and nourish'd:
Oh let it feel but that, and there stand constant
And I am blest. My dear Aunt Rodope,
That is her Governess, did love me dearly,
There's one hope yet to see her: when he is absent
It may be ventur'd, and she may work it closely:
I know the Ladies will goe equal with me,
And so the danger of the Edict avoided;
Let me think more, for I must try all hazards.

Enter Claudio and Soto.

Soto. Will ye go yonder, Sir?

Cla. Yes marry will I Sir.

Soto. And by this Ladder?

Cla. By that Ladder, coxcombe.

Soto. Have ye any more necks at home when this is broken,
For this will crack with the best friend he has Sir?
Or can you pitch of all four, like an Ape now?
Let me see you tumble.

Cla. You are very pleasant Sir,

Soto. No truly Sir, I should be loath to see ye
Come fluttering down like a young Rook, cry squab,
And take ye up with your brains beaten into your buttocks.

Cla. Hold your peace Ass: who's this stands musing here?
Sylvio?

Sil. Who calls me?

Cla. One most glad to see you Sir.

Sil. My dearest Claudio? what make you thus private,
And with a preparation of this nature? (nefts.)

Soto. We have leave to play, and are going to climb Birds

Sil. Prethee what is it friend? why start ye from me?
Is your old Mistris grown so coy and cruel,
She must be scal'd? it seems you are loath to tell me,
Since twenty years continuance of our friendship

May not be worth the weight of such a secret,
'Twill be but rude to aske again: save ye.

Cla. Nay stay, dear Silvio, if you love me take it:
For till you know it, never woman labour'd
As I do now.

Sil. I'll doe my best to ease it.

Cla. You have heard the Lady Belvidere—

Sil. What heard Sir?

Cla. Heard to the Cittadel, upon some fears
She is confin'd.

Sil. Why dreams he on this beauty?
'Tis true, I have heard it.

Cla. And that no access,
No blessing from those eyes, but with much hazard,
Even hazard of a life.

Sil. He dares not love her;
I have heard that too: but whither points your purpose?

Cla. Oh Silvio, let me speak that none may hear me,
None but thy truth: I have lov'd this Lady long,
Long given away my life to her devotion,
Long dwelt upon that beauty to my ruine.

Sil. Do's she know this?

Cla. No, there begins my misery,
Ixion-like, I have only yet clasp'd clouds,
And fed upon poor empty dreams that starve me.

Sil. And what do you mean to do now?

Cla. Though I dye for't.
Though all the tortures in the world hung on me,
Arm'd with imperious Love, I stand prepar'd now,
With this to reach her Chamber: there to see her,
And tell her boldly with what truth I love her.

Sil. 'Twill not be easily done Sir.

Cla. Oh my Silvio,
The hardest things are sweetest in possession.

Sil. Nor will shew much discretion.

Cla. Love is blind man,
And he that looks for reason there far blinder.

Sil. Have ye consider'd ripely?

Cla. All that may fall,
And arm'd against that all.

Sil. Her honor too?

What she may suffer in this rash adventure
The beauty of her name?

Cla. I'll doe it closely,
And only at her window, with that caution—

Sil. Are there no Guards?

Cla. Corruption chokes their service.

Sil. Or do you hold her bred so light a woman
To hold commerce with strange tongues?

Cla. Why this service,
This only hazard of my life must tell her,
Though she were Vestas self, I must deserve her.

Sil. I would not have ye go: pray let it sink here;
And think a nobler way to raise your service,
A safer and a wiser.

Cla. 'Tis too late, Sir.

Sil. Then I must say, You shall not goe.

Cla. I shall not?

Sil. You shall not go: that part bred with ye, friendship
Bids me say boldly so, and you observe me.

Cla. You stretch that tye too far.

Sil. I'll stretch it farther:

The honor that I bear that spotless virtue
You foully seek to taint, unnobly covet,
Bids me command ye stay: if not, thus force ye.

Soto. This will be worse than climbing.

Cla. Why do ye draw Sir?

Sil. To kill thee, if thy base will be thy Master.

Cla. I ever was your friend.

Sil. Whilst thou wert honest,
And not a Night-thief of anothers honor;
I never call'd a fool my friend, a mad man,
That durst expose his fame to all opinions,
His life to dishonest dangers: I never lov'd him,
Durst know his name, that fought a Virgins ruine,
Nor ever took I pleasure in acquaintance
With men, that give as loose reins to their fancies
As the wild Ocean to his raging fluxes:
A noble soul I twin with, and my love
Followes his life, dares master his affections.

Will ye give off, or fight?

Cl. I will not fight with ye:

The sacred name of friend ties up that anger,
Rather I'll study.

Sil. Do, to be a friend still.

Cl. If this way, I shall never hold.

Sil. I'll watch ye:

And if I catch ye false: by heaven ye dye for't,
All love forgot.

Cl. When I fear that, I am fit for't.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Lopez at a Table with Jewels and Money upon it, an Egg roasting by a Candle.

Lop. Whilst prodigal young gaudy fools are banqueting,
And launching out their states to catch the giddy,
Thus do I study to preserve my fortune,
And hatch with care at home the wealth that Saints me.
Here's Rubies of Bengala, rich, rich, glorious;
These Diamonds of Ormus bought for little,
Here vented at the price of Princes Ransomes;
How bright they shine like constellations,
The South Seas treasure here, Pearl, fair and orient
Able to equal Cleopatra's Banquet:
Here chains of lesser stones for Ladies lusters,
Ingotts of Gold, Rings, Brooches, bars of Silver,
These are my studies to set off in sale well,
And not in sensual surfeits to consume 'em;
How roasts mine egg; he heats apace, I'll turn him:
Penurio, where you knave do you wait? Penurio,
You lazie knave.

Pen. Did you call Sir?

Lop. Where's your Mistris?

What vanity holds her from her attendance?

Pen. The very sight of this egg has made him cockish,
What would a dozen butter'd do? She is within Sir.

Lop. Within Sir, at what thrif ye knave? what getting?
(get meat to it,

Pen. Getting a good stomach Sir, and she knew where to
She is praying heartily upon her knees Sir,
That Heaven would fend her a good bearing dinner.

Lop. Nothing but gluttony and surfeit thought on,
Health flung behind: had she not yesternight firrah
Two Sprats to supper, and the oil allowable?
Was she not sick with eating? Hadst not thou,
(Thou most ungrateful knave, that nothing satisfies)
The water that I boild my other egg in
To make thee hearty broth?

Pen. 'Tis true, I had Sir;
But I might as soon make the Philosophers Stone on't,
You gave it me in water, and but for manners sake,
I could give it you again, in wind, it was so hearty
I shall turn pissing-Conduit shortly: my Mistris comes, Sir.

Enter Isabella.

Lop. Welcome my Dove.

Isab. Pray ye keep your welcome to ye,
Unless it carries more than words to please me,
Is this the joy to be a Wife? to bring with me,
Besides the nobleness of blood I spring from,
A full and able portion to maintain me?
Is this the happiness of youth and beauty,
The great content of being made a Mistris,
To live a Slave subject to wants and hungers,
To jealousies for every eye that wanders?
Unmanly jealousie.

Lop. Good Isabella.

Isab. Too good for you: do you think to famish me,
Or keep me like an Alms-woman in such rayment,
Such poor unhandsome weeds? am I old, or ugly?
I never was bred thus: and if your misery

Will suffer wilful blindness to abuse me,
My patience shall be no Bawd to mine own ruine.

Pen. Tickle him Mistris: to him.

Isab. Had ye love in ye,
Or any part of man——

Pen. Follow that Mistris.

Isab. Or had humanity but ever known ye,
You would shame to use a woman of my way thus,
So poor, and basely; you are strangely jealous of me
If I should give ye cause.

Lop. How Isabella?

Isab. As do not venture this way to provoke me.

Pen. Excellent well Mistris,

Lop. How's this Isabella?

Isab. 'Twill stir a Saint, and I am but a woman,
And by that tenure may——

Lop. By no means chicken,
You know I love ye: fie, take no example
By those young gadding Dames: (you are noted virtuous)
That stick their Husbands wealth in trifles on 'em
And point 'em but the way to their own miseries:
I am not jealous, kiss me, — I am not:
And for your Diet, 'tis to keep you healthful,
Surfeits destroy more than the sword: that I am careful
Your meat should be both neat, and cleanly handled
See, Sweet, I am Cook my self, and mine own Cater.

Pen. A——of that Cook cannot lick his fingers.

Lop. I'll add another dish: you shall have Milk to it,
'Tis nourishing and good.

Pen. With Butter in't Sir?

Lop. This knave would breed a famine in a Kingdom:
And cloths that shall content ye: you must be wise then,
And live sequestred to your self and me,
Not wandring after every toy comes cross ye, (Penurio.
Nor struck with every spleen: what's the knave doing?

Pen. Hunting Sir, for a second course of Flies here,
They are rare new Sallads.

Lop. For certain Isabella
This ravening fellow has a Wolf in's fellow:
Untemperate knave, will nothing quench thy appetite?
I saw him eat two Apples, which is monstrous.

Pen. If you had given me those 't had been more monstrous.

Lop. 'Tis a main miracle to feed this villain,
Come Isabella, let us in to supper,
And think the Roman dainties at our Table,
'Tis all but thought.

Exeunt.

Pen. Would all my thoughts would do it:
The Devil should think of purchasing that Egg-shell,
To victual out a Witch for the Burmoathes:
'Tis Treason to any good stomach living now
To hear a tedious Grace said, and no meat to't,
I have a Radish yet, but that's but transitory.

Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Soto.

Soto. Can any living man, unless a Rascal
That neither knows himself, nor a fashion'd Gentleman
Take me for a worse man than my Master now?
I am naturally proud in these clothes: but if pride now
Should catch a fall in what I am attempting,
'Tis but a Proverb sound, and a neck broken,
That's the worst can come on't, a Gentleman's gone then,
A Gentleman o'th' first house, there's the end on't:
My Master lies most pitifully complaining,
Wringing and kicking up to th' ears in love yonder,
And such a lamentable noise he keeps, it kills me:
I have got his cloaths, and if I can get to her
By hook or crook here, such a song I'll sing her——
I think I shall be hang'd, but that's no matter, (Elephant,
What's a hanging among friends: I am valiant now as an
I have consider'd what to say too: let me seenow,
This is the place, 'tis plaguy high: stay at that lower window

Let

Let me aim finely now, like a good Gunner,
It may prove but a whipping.

Enter Silvio.

Sil. I saw some body
Pass by me now, and though it were dark, me-thought yet
I knew the clothes: ha, let me not be cozen'd,
The Ladder too, ready to sling it? monstrous,
'Tis he, 'tis Claudio: most voluptuous villain,
Scandal to womans credit: Love, I forget thee, (there?)
Soto. What will he do i'th' name of Heaven, what's that
Sil. And all the friendship that I bore thee, bury here.
Soto. What has he in's hand? I hope but a Cudgel.
Sil. Thy fault's forgive O Heaven: farewell thou traitor.
Soto. I am slain: I am slain.
Sil. He's down, and dead: dead certain,
'Twas too rash, too full of spleen, stark dead:
This is no place now to repent in, only
Would I had given this hand that shot the Pistol
I had mis'd thee, and thou wer't once more Claudio. Exit.

Enter Claudio.

Cl. Why should I love thus foolishly? thus desperately?
And give away my heart where no hope's left me?
Why should not the true counsel of a friend restrain me?
The Devils mouth I run into affright me,
The honor of the Lady, charm my wildness;
I have no power, no Being of my self,
No reason strong enough now left within me
To bind my Will: Oh Love, thou god, or devil,
Or what thou art, that playes the tyrant in me.

Soto. Oh.

Cl. What's that cry?

Soto. A Surgeon, a Surgeon,
Twenty good Surgeons.

Cl. 'Tis not far from me,
Some murder o' my life,

Soto. Will you let me dye here?
No drink come, nor no Surgeon?

Cl. 'Tis my man sure,
His voice, and here he lies: how is it with thee?

Soto. I am slain, Sir, I am slain.

Cl. Slain? Who has slain thee?

Soto. Kill'd, kill'd, out-right kill'd.

Cl. Where's thy hurt?

Soto. I know not,
But I am sure I am kill'd.

Cl. Canst thou sit up,
That I may find the hurt out?

Soto. I can sit up,
But ne'er the less I am slain.

Cl. 'Tis not o' this side?

Soto. No Sir, I think it be not.

Cl. Nor o' this side,
Was it done with a sword?

Soto. A Gun, a Gun, sweet Master.

Cl. The devil a bullet has been here: thou art well man.

Soto. No sure I am kill'd.

Cl. Let me see thy thighs, and belly,
As whole as a fish for any thing I see yet:
Thou bleed'st no where.

Soto. I think I do not bleed, Sir,
But yet I am afraid I am slain.

Cl. Stand up fool,
Thou hast as much hurt as my nail; who shot thee,
A Pottle, or a Pint?

Soto. Signior Silvio shot me
In these clothes; taking me for you, and seeing
The Ladder in my hand here, which I stole from ye, (for ye
Thinking to have gone to the Lady my self, and have spoke

Cl. If he had hit ye home, he had serv'd ye right firrah,
You faucy rogue, how poor my intent shews to me,
How naked now, and foolish?

Soto. Are ye sure he has not hit me,

It gave a monstrous bounce?

Cl. You rose o' your right side,
And said your prayers too, you had been payed else:
But what need'st thou a Bullet, when thy fear kisses thee?
Sirrah, keep your own counsel for all this, you'll be hang'd
If it be known. (else,

Soto. If it be by my means, let me;
I am glad I a n not kill'd, and far more gladder
My Gentleman-like humor's out: I feel 'tis dangerous,
And to be a gentleman, is to be kill'd twice a week.

Cl. Keep your self close i'th' Countrey for a while firrah.
There's Money, walk to your friends.

Soto. They have no Pistols,
Nor are no Gentlemen, that's my comfort. Exit.

Cl. I will retire too, and live private; for this Silvio,
Inflam'd with nobleness, will be my death else;
And if I can forget this love that loads me,
At least the danger: and now I think on't better,
I have some conclusions else invites me to it. Exit.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Rodope, and Silvio at several doors.

Rod. Nephew.

Sil. My dear Aunt.

Rod. Would you go by thus sily,
And never see me, not once send in to me
Your loving Aunt? she that above all those
I call my kindred, honour'd you, and placed you
Nearest my heart?

Sil. I thank you worthy Aunt
But such at this time are my occasions——

Rod. You shall not goe yet, by my faith you shall not,
I will not be deny'd: why look ye sad Nephew?

Sil. I am seldom other: Oh, this blood sits heavy:
As I walk'd this way late last night,
In meditation of some things concern'd me——

Rod. What Nephew?

Sil. Why methought I heard a Piece, Lady,
A Piece shot off, much about this place too,
But could not judge the cause, nor what it boaded,
Under the Castle-wall.

Rod. We heard it too,
And the Watch pursu'd it presently, but found nothing,
Not any tract.

Sil. I am right glad to hear it:
The Ruffians surely that command the night
Have found him, stript him: and into the River
Convey'd the body.

Rod. You look still sadder, Nephew,
Is any thing within these walls to comfort ye?
Speak, and be Master of it.

Sil. Ye are a right Courtier,
A great Professor, but a poor performer.

Rod. Do you doubt my faith: you never found me that I dare well speak it boldly, but a true friend. (way.

Sil. Continue then.

Rod. Try me, and see who falters.

Sil. I will, and presently: 'tis in your power
To make me the most bound man to your courtesie.

Rod. Let me know how, and if I fail——

Sil. 'Tis thus then,
Get me access to the Lady Belvidere,
But for a minute, but to see her: your Husband now
Is safe at Court, I left him full employ'd there.
Rod. You have ask'd the thing without my power to The Law lies on the danger: if I lov'd ye not (grant ye,
I would

I would bid ye goe, and there be found, and dye for't.

Sil. I knew your love, and where there shew'd a danger
How far you durst step for me: give me a true friend;
That where occasion is to do a benefit
Aims at the end, and not the rubs before it;
I was a fool to ask ye this, a more fool
To think a woman had so much noble nature
To entertain a secret of this burthen;
Ye had best to tell the Dutchess I perswaded ye,
That's a fine course, and one will win ye credit;
Forget the name of Cofin, blot my blood out,
And so you raise your self, let me grow shorter.
A woman friend? he that believes that weaknes
Steers in a stormy night without a Compass.

Rod. What is't I durst not do might not impeach ye?

Sil. Why this ye dare not do, ye dare not think of.

Rod. 'Tis a main hazard.

Sil. If it were not so

I would not come to you to seek a favour.

Rod. You will lose your self.

Sil. The loss ends with my self then.

Rod. You will but see her?

Sil. Only look upon her.

Rod. Not stay:

Sil. Prescribe your time.

Rod. Not traffique with her

In any close dishonourable action?

Sil. Stand you your self by.

Rod. I will venture for ye,

Because ye shall be sure I am a touch'd friend,
I'll bring her to ye: come walk, you know the Garden,
And take this key to open the little Postern,
There stand no guards.

Sil. I shall soon find it Aunt.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter two Soldiers.

1 Sol. Is the Captain come home?

2 Sol. No, who commands the Guard to night?

1 Sold. I think Perruchio.

2 Sold. What's the Word?

1 Sold. None knows yet,

2 Sol. I would this Lady were married out o'th' way once,
Or out of our custodies; I wish they would take in more (companies,
For I am sure we feel her in our duties shrewdly.

1 Sol. 'Tis not her fault I warrant ye, she is ready for't,
And that's the plague, when they grow ripe for marriage
They must be slipt like Hawkes,

2 Sol. Give me a mean wench,
No State doubt lies on her, she is alwayes ready.

1 Sol. Come to the Guard, 'tis late, and sure the Captain
Can not be long away.

2 Sol. I have watch'd these three nights,
To morrow they may keep me tame for nothing. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Silvio, Belvidere, and Rodope with a Light.

Sil. This is the place I think; what Light is that there?
The Lady and my Cofin?

Bel. Is this the Garden?

Rod. Yes Madam.

Sil. Oh my blessed Mistrifs,
Saint of my soul.

Bel. Speak softly: take me to ye,
Oh Silvio, I am thine, thine ever Silvio.

Rod. Is this your promise, Sir? Lady your honor?
I am undone if this be seen, disgrac'd,

Fallen under all discredit.

Bel. Do you love still?

Dear, do you keep your old faith?

Sil. Ever Lady;

And when that fails me, all that's good forsake me.

Rod. Do not you shame? Madam, I must not suffer this,
I will not suffer it; men call you virtuous,
What do you mean to lose your self thus; Silvio?
I charge thee get away, I charge you retire ye,
I'll call the Watch else,

Sil. Call all the world to see us,
We live in one anothers happiness,
And so will die.

Bel. Here will I hang for ever.

Rod. As ye respect me, as hereafter Madam
You would enjoy his love—nothing prevail with ye?
I'll try my strength then; get thee gone thou villain,
Thou Promise-breaker.

Sil. I am tide, I cannot.

Rod. I'll ring the Bell then.

Sil. Ring it to death, I am fixt here.

Enter Bartello, two Soldiers with lights.

Bart. I saw a Light over the Garden walk,
Hard by the Ladies Chamber, here's some knavery
As I live, I saw it twice.

Rod. The Guard, the Guard there;
I must not suffer this, it is too mischievous.

Bart. Light up the Torch, I fear'd this, ha? young Silvio?
How got he in?

1 Sold. The Devil brought him in sure
He came not by us.

Bart. My wife between 'em bustling?
Guard, pull him off.

Rod. Now, now, ye feel the misery.

Bart. You, Madam, at an hour so far undecent?
Death, O my soul! this is a foul fault in ye,
Your mothers care abus'd too, Light's to her Chamber,
I am sorry to see this,

Bel. Farewel my Silvio,
And let no danger sink thee.

Sil. Nor death Lady.

Exeunt Bell. Rod.

Bart. Are ye so hot? I shall prepare ye Physick
Will purge ye finely, neatly: you are too fiery,
Think of your prayers, Sir, an you have not forgot 'em;
Can ye flie i' th' air, or creep ye in at key-holes?
I have a Gin will catch ye though you conjur'd:
Take him to Guard to night, to strong and sure Guard;
I'll back to th' Dutchess presently: no less sport serve ye,
Than the Heir to a Dukedom? play at push-pin there Sir?
It was well aim'd, but plague upon't, you shot short,
And that will lose your game.

Sil. I know the loss then.

Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Claudio like a Merchant.

Claud. Now, in this habit may I safely see
How my incensed friend carries my murther,
Who little I imagin'd had been wrought
To such a height of rage, and much I grieve now
Mine own blind passion had so master'd me,
I could not see his love, for sure he loves her,
And on a nobler ground than I pretended.

Enter Penurio.

It must be so, it is so; what Penurio,
My shotten friend, what wiad blew you?

Pen. Faith 'tis true,
Any strong wind will blow me like a Feather,
I am all Air, nothing of earth within me,
Nor have not had this month, but that good Dinner
Your Worship gave me yesterday, that staves by me,

And

And gives me ballast, else the Sun would draw me?

Cl. But does my Mistress speak still of me?

Pen. Yes, Sir,

And in her sleep, that makes my Master mad too,
And turn and fart for anger.

Cl. Art sure she saw me?

Pen. She saw ye at a window.

Cl. 'Tis most true,

In such a place I saw a Gentlewoman,
A young, sweet, handsome woman.

Pen. That's she, that's she Sir.

Cl. And well she view'd me, I view'd her.

Pen. Still she Sir.

Cl. At last she blush'd, and then look'd off.

Pen. That blush, Sir,

If you can read it truly —

Cl. But didst thou tell her,

Or didst thou fool me, thou knew'st such a one?

Pen. I told her, and I told her such a sweet tale —

Cl. But did she hear thee?

Pen. With a thousand ears, Sir,

And swallow'd what I said as greedily,
As great-belly'd women do Cherries, stones and all Sir.

Cl. Methinks she should not love thy Master?

Pen. Hang him Pilcher,

There's nothing loves him: his own Cat cannot endure him,
She had better lye with a Bear, for he is so hairy,
That a tame Warren of Fleas frisk round about him.

Cl. And wilt thou work still?

Pen. Like a Miner for ye.

Cl. And get access,

Pen. Or conjure you together,

'Tis her desire to meet: she is poyson'd with him,
And till she take a sweet fresh air, that's you Sir.

Cl. There's money for thee: thou art a precious Varlet
Be fat, be fat, and blow thy Master backward.

Pen. Blow you my Mistress, Sir, as flat as a Flounder,
Then blow her up again, as Butchers blow their Veals;
If she dye upon the same
Bury her, bury her in Gods name.

Cl. Thou art a merry knave: by this hand I'll feed thee,
Till thou crack'st at both ends, if thou dar'st do this
Thou shalt eat no fantastical Porridge,
Nor lick the dish where oil was yesterday,
Dust, and dead Flies to day; Capons, fat Capons —

Pen. Oh hearty sound.

Cl. Cramb'd full of itching Oysters.

Pen. Will ye have the Dutchess?

Cl. And Lobsters big as Gauntlets,
Thou shalt despise base Beef.

Pen. I do despise it,

And now methinks I feel a Tart come sliding.

Cl. Leaping into thy mouth: but first deal faithfully.

Pen. When will ye come?

Cl. To morrow.

Pen. I'll attend ye,

For then my Master will be out in business.

Cl. What news abroad?

Pen. 'Mas, as I was coming to you,
I heard that Signior Silvio, a good Gentleman,
Many a good meal I have eaten wit him —

Cl. What of him?

Pen. Was this day to be arraigned before the Dutchess,
But why, I could not hear.

Cl. Silvio arraign'd?

Go, get ye gone, and think of me.

Pen. I flie Sir.

Exit Pen.

Cl. Arraign'd? for what? for my supposed death? no,
That cannot be sure, there's no rumor of it,
Be it what it will, I will be there and see it,
And if my help will bring him off, he has it.

Exit.

Scena Quinta.

Enter Dutchess, Lords, Silvio prisoner, Belvidere, Bartello, Rodope, Clark, Counsellors, Attendants.

Du. Read the Edict last made,
Keep silence there.

Clerk. If any man of what condition soever, and a subject, after the publishing of this Edict, shall without special Licence from the great Dutchess, attempt or buy, offer, or make an attempt, to solicit the love of the Princess Belvidere, the person so offending, shall forfeit his life.

Couns. The reason why my Royal Mistress here
In her last Treaty with Sien as Duke,
Promis'd her beauteous daughter there in marriage,
The Duke of Milan, rival in this fortune,
Un-nobly sought by practice to betray her;
Which found, and cross'd, the Cittadel receiv'd her
There to secure her Mothers word; the last cause
So many Gentlemen of late enamour'd
On this most beauteous Princess, and not brooking
One more than other, to deserve a favour,
Bloud has been spilt, many brave spirits lost,
And more, unless she had been kept close from their violence,
Had like to have followed: therefore for due prevention
Of all such hazards and unnoble actions,
This last Edict was publish'd, which thou Silvio
Like a false man, a bad man, and a Traitor
Hast rent a-peeces, and contemn'd, for which cause
Thou standest a guilty man here now.

Enter Claudio.

Clark. Speak Silvio,

What canst thou say to avoid the hand of Justice?

Sil. Nothing, but I confess, submit and lay my head to it.

Bel. Have ye no eyes my Lords, no understandings?

The Gentleman will cast himself away,
Cast himself wilfully: are you, or you guilty?
No more is he, no more taint sticks upon him:
I drew him thither; 'twas my way betray'd him,
I got the entrance kept, I entertain'd him,
I hid the danger from him, forced him to me,
Poor gentle soul, he's in no part transgressing,
I wrote unto him.

Sil. Do not wrong that honor.

Cast not upon that pureness these aspersions,
It was my love, my violence,
My life must answer it: I broke in to her,
Tempted the Law, solicited unjustly.

Bel. As there is truth in Heaven, I was the first cause:
How could this man have come to me, left naked
Without my counsel and provision?
What hour could he find out to pass the Watches,
But I must make it sure first? Reverend Judges,
Be not abus'd, nor let an innocent life lie
Upon your shaking Conscience; I did it,
My love the main wheel that set him a going:
His motion but compell'd.

Sil. Can ye believe this?

And know with what a modesty and whiteness
Her life was ever ranck'd? Can you believe this
And see me here before ye, young and wilful?
Apt to what danger Love dares thrust me on,
And where Law stops my way, apt to contemn it?
If I were bashful, old, or dull, and sleepy
In Loves allarms, a woman might awake me,
Direct, and clew me out the way to happiness:
But I, like fire, kindled with that bright beauty,
Catch hold of all occasions, and run through 'em.

Bel. I charge ye, as your honest souls will answer it.

Sil. I charge ye, as you are the friends to virtue,

That

That has no pattern living but this Lady.

Bel. Let not his blood—

Sil. Let not her wilfulness—

For then you act a Scene Hell will rejoyce at.

Bel. He is clear.

Sil. She is as white in this as Infants.

Cl. The god of Love protect your cause, and help ye,
Two nobler pieces of affection

These eyes ne'er look'd on, if such goodness perish,

Let never true hearts meet again, but break. Exit.

1 Lord. A strange exemple of strong love, a rare one.

2 Lord. Madam, we know not what to say, to think on.

Dutch. I must confess it strikes me tender too,
Searches my Mothers heart: you found 'em there?

Bar. Yes certain Madam.

Dutch. And so linked together?

Bar. As they had been one piece of Alabaster.

Dutch. Nothing dishonourable?

Sil. So let my soul have happiness,
As that thought yet durst never seek this bosom.

Dutch. What shall I do? 'Tis broke my Law, abus'd me,
Fain would I know the truth, either confess it,
And let me understand the main offender,
Or both shall feel the torture.

Sil. Are ye a Mother;

The Mother of so sweet a Rose as this is?
So pure a Flower? and dare ye lose that nature?
Dare ye take to your self so great a wickedness,
(Oh holy Heaven) of thinking what may ruine
This goodly building? this Temple where the gods dwell?
Give me a thousand tortures, I deserve 'em,
And shew me death in all the shapes imagin'd.

Bel. No death but I will answer it, meet it, seek it;
No torture but I'll laugh upon't, and kiss it.

1 Lord. This is no way.

2 Lord. They say no more for certain
Than their strong hearts will suffer.

Dutch. I have bethought me;

No Lords, although I have a Child offending,
Nature dares not forget she is a Child still;
Till now, I never look'd on love imperious:
I have bethought me of a way to break ye,
To separate, though not your loves, your bodies:
Silvio attend, I'll be your Judge my self now,
The sentence of your death (because my Daughter
Will bear an equal part in your afflictions)

I take away and pardon: this remains then
An easie and a gentle punishment,
And this shall be fulfill'd: because unnobly
You have sought the love, and marriage of a Princess,
The absolute and sole Heir of this Dukedom,
By that means, as we must imagine strongly,
'To plant your self into this rule hereafter,
We here pronounce ye a man banish'd from us

Sil. For ever banish'd Lady?

Dutch. Yet more mercy,

But for a year: and then again in this place
To make your full appearance: yet more pitty,
If in that time you can absolve a question,
Writ down within this scrawl, absolve it rightly,
This Lady is your wife, and shall live with ye;
If not, you loose your head.

Sil. I take this honor,

And humbly kiss those Royal hands. (Princesses,

Dutch. Receive it: Bartello, to your old guard take the
And so the Court break up.

Sil. Farewel to all,

And to that spotless heart my endless service. Exit.

1 Lord. What will this prove?

2 Lord. I'll tell you a year hence, Sir. Exeunt.

Scena Sexta.

Enter Penurio, Isabella, Claudio.

Pen. Are you pleas'd now? have not I wrought this won- (der
Non eben fatto Signieur.

Cl. Rarely Penurio

Pen. Close, close then, and work wax.

Cl. I am studying for thee
A dinner, that shall victual thee for ten year.

Pen. Do you hear Mistrifs?

You know what a dundir whelp my Master is,
I need not preach to ye, how unfit and wanting
To give a woman satisfaction:

How he stinks, and snores, a Bull's a better bed-fellow;
And for his love, never let that deceive ye.

Isab. Nay sure he loves me not.

Pen. If he could coyn ye,
Or turn ye into mettal, much might be then;
He loves not any thing but what is traffique:
I have heard him swear, he would sell ye to the Grand Signior.

Isab. The Turk?

Pen. The very Turke, and how they would use ye.

Isab. I'll fit him for't: the Turk?

Pen. I know the price too:

Now ye have time to pay him, pay him home Mistrifs;
Pay him o' th' pate, clout him for all his courtesies;
Here's one that dances in your eyes, young delicate
To work this vengeance; if ye let it slip now,
There is no pittying of ye, od's precious, Mistrifs,
Were I his wife, I would so mall his Mazard,
'Tis charity, meer charity, pure charity,
Are you the first? has it not been from Eves time,
Women would have their safe revenges this way?
And good and gracious women, excellent women;
Is't not a handsome Gentleman? a sweet Gentleman;
View him from head to foot, a compleat Gentleman;
When can ye hope the like again? I leave ye,
And my revenge too, with ye; I know my office,
I'll not be far off, be not long a fumbling,
When danger shall appear, I'll give the 'larme. Exit.

Isab. You are welcome, Sir, and would it were my fortune
To afford a Gentleman of your fair seeming,
A freer entertainment than this house has,
You partly know, Sir. —

Cl. Know, and pity Lady,
Such sweetness in the bud, should be so blasted;
Dare you make me your Servant?

Isab. Dare you make Sir,
That service worthy of a womans favour
By constancy and goodness?

Cl. Here I swear to ye,
By the unvalued love I bear this beauty,
(And kiss the Book too) never to be recreant,
To honour ye, to truly love, and serve ye,
My youth to wait upon ye, what my wealth has.

Isab. Oh make me not so poor to sell affection,
Those bought loves Sir, wear faster than the moneys;
A handsome Gentleman.

Cl. A most delicate sweet one,
Let my truth purchase then.

Isab. I should first try it,
But you may happily. —

Cl. You shall not doubt me,
I hope she loves me; when I prove false, shame take me;
Will ye believe a little?

Isab. I fear, too much, Sir.

Cl. And will ye love a little?

Isab. That should be your part:

Cl. Thus I begin then, thus and thus.

Isab. A good beginning,
We have a proverb saies, makes a good ending.

Cl. Say ye so? 'tis well inferr'd.

Isab. Good Sir, your patience:

Methinks I have ventur'd now, like a weak Bark
Upon a broken billow, that will swallow me,
Upon a rough Sea of suspitions,
Stuck round with jealous rocks.

Pen. within. A hem, a hem there.

Ifab. This is my man; my fears too soon have found me,

Enter Penurio.

Now what's the news?

Pen. A pox of yonder old Rigel,
The Captain, the old Captain.

Ifab? What old Captain?

Pen. Captain courageous yonder of the Castle,
Captain, Don Diego, old Bartello.

Ifab. Where is he?

Pen. He's coming in:

'Twould vex the Devil, that such an old Potgun as this,
That can make no sport, should hinder them that can do it.

Ifab. I would not have him see the Gentleman,
For all the world, my credit were undone then.

Pen. Shall I fling a piss-pot on's head as he comes in,
And take him into th' kitchen, there to drie him.

Ifab. That will not do; and he is so humorous too
He will come in.

Cl. What is he?

Ifab. One much troubles me.

Pen. And can do nothing, cannot eat.

Ifab. Your fight now,

Out o' a driveling dotage he bears to me,
May make him tell my husband, and undo me.

Cl. What would ye have me do?

Ifab. But for a while Sir,
Step here behind this hanging, presently
I'll answer him, and then —

Cl. I will obey ye.

Enter Bartello.

Bar. Where's my rich Jeweller? I have stones to sett.

Pen. He is abroad, and sure Sir.

Bart. There's for your service:

Where's the fair Lady? all alone sweet beauty?

Ifab. She's never much alone Sir, that's acquainted
With such companions as good honest thoughts are.

Bar. I'll sit down by thee, and I'll kiss thy hand too,
And in thine ear swear by my life I love thee.

Ifab. Ye are a merry Captain.

Bar. And a mad one, Lady;

By th' mas thou hast goodly eyes, excellent eyes, wench,
Ye twinkling rogues, look what thy Captain brings thee,
Thou must needs love me; love me heartily,
Hug me, and love me, hug me close.

Ifab. Fie Captain.

Bar. Nay, I have strength, and I can strain ye sirrah,
And vault into my seat as nimbly, little one.

As any of you smooth-chinn'd boys in Florence,
I must needs commit a little folly with ye,

I'll not be long, a brideling cast, and away wench;
The hob-nail thy husband's as fitly out o' th' way now?

Ifab. Do you think he keeps a bawdy-house?

Bar. That's all one.

Ifab. Or did you ever see that lightness in my carriage,
That you might promise to your self —

Bar. Away fool,

A good turn's a good turn; I am an honest fellow.

Ifab. You have a handsome wife, a virtuous Gentlewoman.

Bar. They are not for this time o' th' year.

Ifab. A Lady,

That ever bore that great respect to you,
That noble constancy.

Bar. That's more than I know.

Enter Maid, and Penurio.

Maid. Oh Mistrifs, ye are undone, my Master's coming
Pen. Coming hard by here.

Bar. Plague consume the Rascal,
Shall I make petty-patties of him?

Ifab. Now what love Sir?

Fear of your coming made him jealous first;
Your finding here, will make him mad and desperate,
And what in that wild mood he will execute —

Bar. I can think of nothing, I have no wit left me;
Certain my head's a Mustard-pot.

Ifab. I have thought Sir,
And if you'll please to put in execution
What I conceive —

Bar. I'll do it, tell it quickly.

Ifab. Draw your sword quickly, and go down in rag'd,
As if you had persu'd some foe up hither,
And grumble to your self extremely, terribly,
But not a word to him, and so pass by him.

Bar. I'll do it perfectly.

Enter Lopez.

Ifab. Stand you still good Sir.

Bar. Rascal, slave, villain, take a house so poorly,
After thou hast wrong'd a Gentleman, a Soldier,
Base Poultrou boy, you will forsake your neast sirrah.

Lop. The matter, good sweet Captain?

Bart. Run-away rogue,
And take a house to cover thy base cowardize,
I'll whip ye, I'll so scourge ye.

Exit.

Lop. Mercy upon me,
What's all this matter wife?

Ifab. Did you meet the mad man?

Lop. I never saw the Captain so provok'd yet.

Ifab. Oh he's a Devil sure' a most bloody devil,
He follow'd a young Gentleman, his sword drawn,
With such a fury, how I shake to think on't,
And foyn'd, and slash'd at him, and swore he'd kill him,
Drove him up hither, follow'd him still bloodily,
And if I had not hid him, sure had slain him;
A merciless old man.

Bla. Most virtuous Lady,

Even as the giver of my life, I thank ye.

Lop. This fellow must not stay here, he is too handsome;
He is gone Sir, and you may pass now with all security,
I'll be your guide my self, and such a way
I'll lead ye, none shall cross, nor none shall know ye.
The door's left open Sirrah, I'll starve you for this trick,
I'll make thee fast o' Sundaies; and for you Lady,
I'll have your Lodgings farther off, and closer,
I'll have no street-lights to you; will you go Sir?

Cl. I thank ye Sir: the devil take this fortune;
And once more all my service to your goodness.

Exit.

Pen. Now could I eat my very arms for madness,
Cross'd in the nick o' th' matter? vengeance take it,
And that old Cavalier that spoil'd our Cock-fight,
I'll lay the next plot surer.

Ifab. I am glad and sorry,
Glad, that I got so fairly off suspicion;
Sorry, I lost my new lov'd friend.

Pen. Not lost Mistrifs;

I'll conjure once again to raise that spirit;
in, and look soberly upon the matter,
We'll ring him one peal more, and if that fall,
The devil tak the Clappers, Bells, and all.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Dutchesse, Lords, and Rhodope.

Dutch. Now Rhodope, How do you find my daughter?
Rho. Madam, I find her now what you would have her,

What the State wishes her; I urg'd her fault to her,
 Open'd her eyes, and made her see the mischief
 She was running with a headlong will into,
 Made her start at her folly, shake and tremble,
 At the meer memory of such an ignorance,
 She now contemns his love, hates his remembrance,
 Cannot endure to hear the name of Silvio;
 His person spits at.

Dutch. I am glad to hear this.

Rho. And humbly now to your Will, your care, Madam,
 Bends her affections, bows her obedience;
Syenna's Duke, with new eyes now she looks on,
 And with a Princely love, fit for his person.
 Returns that happiness and joy he look'd for;
 The general good of both the neighbor Dukedoms,
 Not any private end, or rash affection
 She aims at now: hearing the Duke arriv'd too,
 (To whom she owes all honor, and all service,)
 She charg'd me kneel thus at your Graces feet,
 And not to rise without a general pardon.

Dutch. She has it, and my love again, my old love,
 And with more tenderness I meet this penitence,
 Than if she ne'er had started from her honor;
 I thank ye Rhodope, am bound to thank ye,
 And daily to remember this great service,
 This honest faithful service; go in peace,
 And by this Ring, delivered to Bartello,
 Let her enjoy our favour, and her liberty,
 And presently to this place, with all honor,
 See her conducted.

Rho. Your Grace has made me happy.

Exit.

Enter 1 Lord.

1 Lord. Syenna's noble Duke, craves his admittance.

Enter Duke of Syenna with Attendants.

Dutch. Go; wait upon his Grace, fair Sir, you are welcome,
 Welcome to her ever admir'd your virtues:
 And now methinks, my Court looks truly noble;
 You have taken too much pains Sir.

Syen. Royal Lady,
 To wait upon your Grace is but my service.

Dutch. Keep that Sir, for the Saint ye have vow'd it to.

Syen. I keep a life for her: since your Grace pleases
 To jump so happily into the matter,
 I come indeed to claim your Royal promise,
 The beauteous Belvidere in marriage,
 I come to tender her my youth, my fortune,
 My everlasting love.

Enter Belvidere, Bartello, Rhodope, Attendants.

Dutch. You are like to win, Sir:
 All is forgot, forgiven too; no sadness
 My good Child, you have the same heart still here.
 The Duke of Syenna, Child, pray use him nobly.

Sy. An Angel beauty.

Bel. Your Grace is fairly welcome,
 And what in modesty a blushing maid may Wish to a Gentleman of your great goodness;

But wishes are too poor a pay for Princes.

Sy. You have made me richer than all States and Titles,
 One kiss of this white hand's above all honors,
 My faith dear Lady, and my fruitful service,
 My duteous zeal—

Bel. Your Grace is a great Master,
 And speaks too powerfully to be resisted:
 Once more you are welcome, Sir, to me you are welcome,
 To her that honors ye; I could say more Sir,
 But in another's tongue 'twere better spoken,

Sy. As wife as fair, you have made your servant happy;
 I never saw so rich a Mine of sweetness.

Dutch. Will your Grace please, after your painful journey
 To take some rest? Are the Dukes Lodgings ready?

Lord. All Madam.

Dutch. Then wait upon his Grace, all, and to morrow, Sir,
 We'll shew ye in what high esteem we hold ye,
 Till then a fair repose.

Sy. My fairest service.

Exit Duke, &c.

Dutch. You have so honour'd me, my dearest daughter,
 So truly pleas'd me in this entertainment,
 I mean your loving carriage to Syenna,
 That both for ever I forget all trespasses,
 And to secure you next of my full favour,
 Ask what you will within my power to grant ye,
 Ask freely: and if I forget my promise—
 Ask confidently.

Bel. You are too Royal to me;
 To me that have so foolishly transgress'd you,
 So like a Girl, so far forgot my virtue,
 Which now appears as base and ugly to me,
 As did his Dream, that thought he was in Paradise,
 Awak'd and saw the Devil; how was I wander'd?
 With what eyes could I look upon that poor, that court thing,
 That wretched thing call'd Sylvio? that (now) despis'd thing,
 And lose an object of that graceful sweetness,
 That god-like presence as Syenna is?
 Darkness, and cheerful day, had not such difference:
 But I must ever bless your care, your wisdom,
 That led me from this labyrinth of folly,
 How had I sunk else? what example given?

Dutch. Prethee no more, and as thou art my best one,
 Ask something that may equal such a goodness.

Bel. Why did ye let him go so slightly from ye,
 More like a man in triumph, than condemn'd:
 Why did ye make his pennance but a question,
 A Riddle, every idle wit unlocks.

Dutch. 'Tis not so,
 Nor do not fear it so: he will not find it,
 I have given that (unless my self discover it)
 Will cost his head.

Bel. 'Tis subject to construction?

Dutch. That it is too.

Bel. It may be then absolv'd,
 And then are we both scorn'd and laugh'd at, Madam;
 Beside the promise you have ty'd upon it,
 Which you must never keep.

Dutch. I never meant it.

Bel. For heaven sake let me know it, 'tis my Suit to ye,
 The Boon you would have me ask; let me but see it,
 That if there be a way to make't so strong,
 No wit nor powerful reason can run through it,
 For my disgrace, I may beg of heaven to grant it.

Dutch. Fear not, it has been put to sharper judgements
 Than e'er he shall arrive at: my dear Father,
 That was as fiery in his understanding,
 And ready in his wit as any living,
 Had it two years, and studied it, yet lost it:
 This night ye are my Bed-fellow, there Daughter
 Into your bosom I'll commit this secret,
 And there we'll both take counsel.

Bel. I shall find
 Some trick I hope too strong yet for his mind.

Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Penurio.

Pen. Methinks I am batten'd well of late, grown lusty,
Fat, high, and kicking, thanks to the bounteous Rugio;
And now, methinks I scorn these poor repasts,
Cheese-parings, and the stinking tongues of Pilchers;
But why should I remember these? they are odious,
They are odious in mine eyes; the full fat dish now,
The bearing dish is that I reverence,
The dish an able Serving-man sweats under,
And bends i' th' hams, as if the house hung on him,
That dish is the dish: hang your bladder Bankets,
Or halfe a dozen of Turnops and two Mushrumps,
These when they breed their best, hatch but two belches;
The state of a fat Turkey, the decorum
Hemarches in with, all the train and circumstance;
'Tis such a matter, such a glorious matter,
And then his fauce with Oranges and Onions,
And he displaid in all parts, for such a dish now,
And at my need I would betray my Father,
And for a roasted Conger, all my Country.

Enter Bartello.

(Mistress?)

Bar. What my friend Lean-gut, how does thy beauteous
And where's your Master Sirrah? where's that horn-pipe?

Pen. My Mistress, Sir, does as a poor wrong'd Gentlewo-
Too much, heaven knows, oppress'd with injuries; (man,
May do and live.

Bar. Is the old fool still jealous?

Pen. As old fools are, and will be still the same, Sir.

Bar. He must have cause: he must have cause.

Pen. 'Tis true, Sir,
And would he had with all my heart.

Bar. He shall have.

Pen. For then he had Salt to his Saffron porridge.

Bar. Why do not I see thee sometime? why thou starv'd
Why do not ye come to me, you precious bow-case? (rascal?)
I keep good meat at home, good store.

Pen. Yes Sir, I will not fail ye all next week.

Bar. Thou art welcome,
I have a secret I would fain impart to thee,
But thou art so thin, the wind will blow it from thee,
Or men will read it through thee.

Pen. Wrap't up in beef Sir,
In good gross beef, let all the world look on me,
The English have that trick to keep intelligence.

Bar. A witty knave, first there's to tie your tongue up.

Pen. Dumb as a Dog, Sir.

Bar. Next, hark in your ear, Sirrah.

Pen. Well, very well, excellent well: 'tis done, Sir,
Say no more to me.

Bar. Say and hold.

Pen. 'Tis done, Sir.

Bar. As thou lov'st butter'd eggs, swear.

Pen. Let me kiss the Book first,
But here's my hand, brave Captain.

Bar. Look ye hold, sirrah.

Exit.

Pen. Oh the most precious vanity of this world;
When such dry'd Neats-tongues must be soak'd and larded
With young fat supple wenches? Oh the Devil.
What can he do, he cannot suck an egg off
But his back's loose i' th' hilts: go thy wayes Captain,
Well may thy warlike name work Miracles,
But if e'er thy founder'd courser win much more,
Or stand right but one train —

Enter three Gentlemen.

1 Gen. Now Signior Shadow,
What art thou thinking of, how to rob thy Master?

Pen. Of his good deeds? The Thief that undertakes that Must have a hook will poze all Hell to hammer:

Have ye dined Gentlemen, or do you purpose?

2 Gen. Dined, two long hours ago.

Pen. Pray ye take me with ye.

3 Gen. To supper dost thou mean?

Pen. To any thing

That has the smell of meat in't: tell me true, Gentlemen,
Are not you three going to be sinful?

To iropard a joynt, or to? I have found your faces,
And see whore written in your eyes.

1 Gen. A parlous rascal,

Thou art much upon the matter.

Pen. Have a care Gentlemen,

'Tis a fore age, very fore age, lewd age,
And women now are like old Kniglus adventures,
Full of enchanted flames, and dangerous.

2 Gen. Where the most danger is, there's the most honor.

Pen. I grant ye, honor most consists in sufferance,
And by that rule you three should be most honorable.

3 Gen. A subtle Rogue: but canst thou tell Penurio
Where we may light upon —

Pen. A learned Surgeon?

(wenches.)

3 Gen. Pox take ye fool; I mean good wholesome

Pen. 'Faith wholesome women will but spoil ye too,
For you are so us'd to snap-haunces: But take my counsel,
Take fat old women, fat, and five and fifty,
The Dog-dayes are come in.

2 Gen. Take fat old women?

Pen. The fatter and the older, still the better,
You do not know the pleasure of an old Dame,
A fat old Dame, you do not know the knack on't:
They are like our country Grotts, as cool as Christmas,
And sure i' th' keels.

1 Gen. Hang him starv'd fool: he mocks us.

3 Gen. Penurio, thou know'st all the handsome wenches?
What shall I give thee for a Merchants wife now?

Pen. I take no money Gentlemen, that's base,
I trade in meat, a Merchants wife will cost ye
A glorious Capon; a great shoulder of Mutton;
And a Tart as big as a Conjurers Circle

3 Gen. That's cheap enough.

1 Gen. And what a Haberdashers?

Pen. Worse meat will serve for her, a great Goose-Pie,
But you must send it out o' th' Countrey to me,
It will not do else: with a piece of Bacon,
And if you can, a pot of Butter with it.

2 Gen. Now do I aim at horse-flesh: what a Parsons?

Pen. A Tithe-Pig has no fellow, if I fetch her,
If she be Puritane, Plumb-porridge does it,
And a fat loin of Veal, well sauc'd and roasted,

2 Gen. We'll meet one night, and thou shalt have all these;
O' that condition we may have the wenches
A dainty rascal.

Pen. When your stomachs serve ye,
(For mine is ever ready) I'll supply ye.

1 Gen. Farewel, and there's to fill thy paunch,

Pen. Brave Gentleman.

2 Gen. Hold sirrah, there.

Pen. Any young wench i' th' Town, Sir.

3 Gen. It shall go round.

Exit Gen.

Pen. Most honorable Gentlemen,
All these are Courtiers, but they are meer Coxcombs,
And only for a wench, their purses open,
Nor have they so much judgement left to chuse her;
If e'r they call upon me, I'll so fit 'em,
I have a pack of wry-mouth'd mackrel Ladies,
Stink like a standing ditch, and those dear Damfels;
But I forget my business, I thank ye Monsieurs,
I have a thousand whimsies in my brain now.

Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter (to a Banquet) Dutchess, Syenna, Lords, Attendants.

Dutch. Your Grace shall now perceive how much we honor
And in what dear regard we hold your friendship : (ye
Will you sit Sir, and grace this homely Banquet ?

Sy. Madam, to your poor friend, you are too magnificent.

Dutch. To the Dukes health, and all the joyes I wish him,
Let no man miss this cup : have we no Musick ?

Sy. Your noble favours still you heap upon me,
But where's my virtuous Mistris, such a Feast,
And not her sparkling beauty here to bless it ?
Methinks it should not be, it shews not fully.

Dutch. Young Ladies Sir, are long, and curious
In putting on their trims, forget how day goes,
And then 'tis their good morrow when they are ready :

Go some and call her, and wait upon her hither,
Tell her the Duke and I desire her company :

I warrant ye, a hundred dressings now
She has survey'd, this, and that fashion look'd on,
For Ruffs and Gowns; cast this away, these Jewels
Suited to these and these knots : o' my life Sir,

She fears your curious eye will soon discover else :
Why stand ye still, why gape ye on one another ?
Did I not bid ye go, and tell my Daughter ?

Are ye nailed here ? nor stir ? nor speak ? who am I,
And who are you ?

1 Lord. Pardon me, gracious Lady,
The fear to tell you that you would not hear of Makes us all dumb, the Princess is gone, Madam.

Dutch. Gone ? whither gone ? some wiser fellow answer me

2 Lord. We fought the Court all over, and believe Lady
No news of where she is, nor how convey'd hence.

Dutch. It cannot be, it must not be.

1 Lord. 'Tis true, Madam,
No room in all the Court, but we search'd through it,
Her women found her want first, and they cry'd to us.

Dutch. Gone ? stol'n away ? I am abus'd, dishonour'd,

Sy. 'Tis I that am abus'd, 'tis I dishonour'd.
Is this your welcome, this your favour to me ?

To foist a trick upon me, this trick too,
To cheat me of my love ? Am I not worthy ?
Or since I was your guest, am I grown odious ?

Dutch. Your Grace mistakes me, as I have a life, Sir.

Sy. And I another, I will never bear this,
Never endure this dor.

Dutch. But hear me patiently.

Sy. Give me my Love.

Dutch. As soon as care can find her,
And all care shall be used.

Sy. And all my care too,
To be reveng'd ; I smell the trick, 'tis too rank,
Fie, how it smells o' th' Mother.

Dutch. You wrong me, Duke.

Sy. For this disgrace ten thousand Florentines
Shall pay their dearest bloods, and dying curse ye,
And so I turn away your mortal enemy. Exit.

Duc. Since ye are so high and hot Sir, ye have half arm'd us,
Be careful of the Town, of all the Castles,
And see supplies of Soldiers every where,
And Musters for the Field when he invites us,
For he shall know 'tis not high words can fright us,
My Daughter gone ? has she so finely cozen'd me ?
This is for Silvio's fake sure, Oh cunning false one ;
Publish a Proclamation thorough the Dukedom,
That whoso'er can bring to th' Court young Silvio,
Alive or dead, beside our thanks and favour,
Shall have two thousand Duckets for his labour ;
See it dispatch'd, and sent in haste : Oh base one. Exeunt.

Scena

Scena Quarta.

Enter Isabella, and Penurio with a Light.

Isab. Was't thou with Rugio ?

Pen. Yes marry was I closely.

Isab. And does he still remember his poor Mistris ?
Does he desire to see me ?

Pen. Yes, and presently :

Puts off all business else, lives in that memory,
And will be here according to directions,

Isab. But where's thy Master ?

Pen. Where a coxcomb should be,
Waiting at Court with his Jewels,
Safe for this night I warrant ye.

Isab. I am bound to thee.

Pen. I would ye were, as close as I could tye ye,

Isab. Thou art my best, my truest friend.

Pen. I labour

I moil and toil for ye : I am your hackney.

Isab. If ever I be able —

Pen. Steal the great Cheese Mistris,
Was sent him out o' th' Countrey.

Isab. Any thing.

Pen. That's meat, 'tis lawful Mistris : where's the Castle
He got at Court ? (Custard.)

Isab. He has lock'd it in's study.

Pen. Get a warrant to search for counterfeit Gold.

Isab. Give me thy Candle,
I'll find a time to be thy careful Cater.

Pen. And many a time I'll find to be his Cook,
And dress his Calves head to the sweetest sauce Mistris.

Isab. To bed Penurio, go, the rest is my charge,
I'll keep the Watch out.

Pen. Now if you spare him —

Exit.

Isab. Peace fool,

I hope my Rugio will not fail, 'twould vex me :
Now to my string ; so, sure he cannot miss now,
And this end to my finger I'll lie down,
For on a suddain I am wondrous heavy,
'Tis very late too ; if he come and find this,
And pull it, though it be with easie motion
I shall soon waken, and as soon be with him.

Enter Lopez.

Lop. Thou secret friend, how am I bound to love thee ?
And how to hug thee for thy private service ?
Thou art the Star all my suspicions sail by,
The fixed point my wronged honor turns to,
By thee I shall know all, find all the subtilties
Of devilish women, that torment me daily :
Thou art my Conjurer, my Spell, my Spirit,
All's hush'd and still, no sound of any stirring,
No tread of living thing : the Light is in still,
And there's my Wife, how prettily the fool lies,
How sweet, and handsomely, and in her clothes too,
Waiting for me upon my life ; her fondness
Would not admit her rest till I came to her :
O careful fool, why am I angry with thee ?
Why do I think thou hat'st thy loving Husband ?
I am an Ass, an over-doting Coxcomb,
And this sweet soul, the mirror of perfection :
How admirable fair and delicate,
And how it stirs me, I'll sing thy sweets a Requiem,
But will not waken thee.

SONG.

OH fair sweet face, oh eyes celestial bright,
Twin Stars in Heaven, that now adorn the night ;
Oh fruitful Lips, where Cherries ever grow,
And Damask cheeks, where all sweet beauties blow ;
Oh thou from head to foot divinely fair,
Cupid's most cunning Nets made of that hair,

And

*And as he weaves himself for curious eyes;
Ob me, Ob me, I am caught my self, he cries:
Sweet rest about thee sweet and golden sleep,
Soft peaceful thoughts, your hourly watches keep,
Whilst I in wonder sing this sacrifice,
To beauty sacred, and those Angel-eyes.*

Now will I steal a kiss, a dear kiss from her,
And suck the Rosie breath of this bright beauty;
What a Devil is this? ty'd to her finger too?
A string, a damned string to give intelligence
Oh my lov'd key, how truly hast thou serv'd me;
I'll follow this: soft, soft, to th' door it goes,
And through to th' other side; a damned string 'tis,
I am abus'd, topt, cuckolded, fool'd, jaded,
Ridden to death, to madness; stay, this helps not:
Stay, stay, and now invention help me,
I'll sit down by her, take this from her easily,
And thus upon mine own: Dog, I shall catch ye,
With all your cunning, Sir: I shall light on ye,
I felt it pull sure: yes, but wondrous softly,
'Tis there again, and harder now, have at ye,
Now and thou scap'st, the Devil's thy ghostly father. Exit.

Isab. Sure 'twas my husband's voice, the string is gone too,
He has found the trick on't: I am undone, betray'd,
And if he meet my friend he perishes,
What fortune follows me, what spightful fortune?
Ho! Jaquet.

Enter Jaquet,

Jaq. Here Mistress, do you call me?

Isab. Didst thou hear no noise?

Jaq. I hear my Master mad yonder,
And swears, and chafes—

Isab. Dar'st thou do one thing for me?
One thing concerns mine honor, all is lost else?

Jaq. Name what you will.

Isab. It can bring but a beating,
Which I will recompence so largely—

Jaq. Name it.

Isab. Sit here, as if thou wert asleep.

Jaq. Is that all?

Isab. When he comes in, whate'er he do unto thee
(The worst will be but beating) speak not a word,
Not one word as thou lovest me.

Jaq. I'll run through it.

Isab. I'll carry away the Candle.

Jaq. And I the blows Mistress. Exit.

Enter Lopez.

Lop. Have you put your light out? I shall stumble to ye,
You whore, you cunning whore, I shall catch your rogue too,
H'as light legs else, I had so Ferret-claw'd him:

Oh have I found ye? do ye play at dog-sleep still whore?
Do you think that can protect ye? yes, I will kill thee,
But first I'll bring thy friends to view thy villainies,
Thy whorish villainies: and first I'll beat thee,
Beat thee to pin-dust, thou salt whore, thou varlet,
Scratch out thine eyes; I'll spoil your tempting visage;
Are ye so patient? I'll put my nails in deeper,
Is it good whoring? whoring ye base rascal?
Is it good tempting men with strings to ride ye?
So, I'll fetch your kindred, and your friends, whore,
And such a Justice I will act upon thee. Exit.

Enter Isabella.

Isab. What is he gone?

Jaq. The Devil go with him Mistress,
Has harrowed me, plough'd Land was ne'r so harrow'd:
I had the most adoe to save mine eyes.

Isab. Has paid thee,
But I'll heal all again with good Gold. Jaquet;

H'as damned nails.

Jaq. They are ten-penny nails I think Mistress:
I'll undertake he shall strike 'em through an inch board.

Isab. Go up, and wash thy self: take my Pomatum,
And now let me alone to end the Tragedy.

Jaq. You had best beware.

Isab. I shall deal stoutly with him,
Reach me my Book, and see the door made fast wench,
And so good night: now to the matter politick.

Lopez knocks within.

Lop. Within. You shall see what she is, what a sweet jewel.

Isab. Who's there, what mad-man knocks? is this an hour
And in mine Husband's absence?

Lop. Within. Will ye open?

You know my voice ye whore, I am that Husband:
Do you mark her subtilty? but I have paid her,
I have so ferk'd her face: here's the blood Gentlemen,
Ecce signum: I have spoil'd her Goatish beauty,
Observe her how she looks now, how she is painted,
Oh 'tis the most wicked'st whore, and the most treacherous—

Enter Lopez, Bartello, Gent. and two Gentlewomen.

Gent. Here walks my cosin full of meditation,
Arm'd with religious thoughts.

Bar. Is this the monster?

1 Gentlew. Is this the subject of that rage you talk'd of,
That naughty woman you had pull'd a-pieces?

Bar. Here's no such thing.

1 Gentlew. How have ye wrong'd this beauty?
Are not you mad my friend? what time o' th' moon is 't?
Have not you Maggots in your brains?

Lop. 'Tis she sure.

Gent. Where's the scratch'd face ye spoke of, the torn gar-
And all the hair pluck'd off her head? (ments,

Bar. Believe me.

'Twere better far you had lost your pair of pibbles,
Than be the least adornment of that sweetness.

Lop. Is not this blood?

1 Gentlew. This is a monstrous folly,
A base abuse.

Isab. Thus he does ever use me,
And sticks me up a wonder, not a woman;
Nothing I doe, but's subject to suspicion;
Nothing I can do, able to content him.

Bar. Lopez, you must not use this.

2 Gentlew. 'Twere not amiss, Sir.
To give ye sauce to your meat, and suddainly.

1 Gentlew. You that dare wrong a woman of her goodness,
Thou have a Wife, thou have a Bear ty'd to thee,
To scratch thy jealous itch, were all o' my mind,
I mean all women, we would disburthen ye
Of that that breeds these fits, these dog-flaws in ye,
A Sow-guelder should trim ye.

Bar. A rare cure Lady,
And one as fit for him as a Thief for a halter,
You see this youth: will you not cry him quittance,
Body 'me, I would pine, but I would pepper him,
I'll come anon, he, hang him, poor pompillion:
How like a wench be his he looks, I'll come Lady;
Lopez. The Law must teach ye what a wife is,
A good, a virtuous wife.

Isab. I'll ne'r live with him,
I crave your loves all to make known my cause,
That so a fair Divorce may pass between us,
I am weary of my life: in danger hourly.

Bar. You see how rude you are, I will not miss ye,
Unfufferable rude: I'll pay him foundly,
You should be whipt in Bedlam: I'll reward him.

2 Gentlew. Whipping's too good.

Lop. I think I am alive still,
And in my wits.

Bar. I'll put a trick upon him,
And get his goods confiscate: you shall have 'em;

I will

I will not fail at nine.

Lop. I think I am here too,
And once I would have sworn I had taken her napping,
I think my name is Lopez.

Gent. Fie for shame, Sir,
You see you have abus'd her, foully wrong'd her,
Hung scandalous and course opinions on her,
Which now you find but children of suspicion:
Ask her forgiveness, shew a penitence,
She is my kinswoman, and what she suffers
Under so base and beately jealousies,
I will redress else, I'll seek satisfaction.

Bar. Why, every boy i' th' Town will piss upon thee.

Lop. I am sorry for't.

1 Gentlem. Down o' your marrow-bones.

Lop. Even sorry from my heart: forgive me sweet wife,
Here I confess most freely I have wrong'd ye,

As freely here I beg a pardon of ye,
From this hour no debate, no cross suspicion——

Isab. To shew ye Sir I understand a wives part,
Thus I assure my love, and seal your pardon.

2 Gentlem. 'Tis well done, now to bed, and there confirm

Gent. And so good night.

Bar. Aware relapses, Lopez.

Lop. Now Isabella tell me truth, and suddainly,
And do not juggle with me, nor dissemble,
For as I have a life ye dye then: I am not mad,
Nor does the Devil work upon my weakness,
Tell me the trick of this, and tell me freely.

Isab. Will then that satisfie ye?

Lop. If ye deal ingeniously.

Isab. I'll tell ye all; and tell ye true and freely.

Barcelo was the end of all this jealousy,
His often visitations brought by you, first
Bred all these fits, and these suspicions:
I knew your false key, and accordingly
I fram'd my plot, to have you take him finely,
Too poor a penance for the wrong his wife bears,
His worthy virtuous wife: I felt it sensibly
When ye took off the string, and was much pleas'd in't,
Because I wish'd his importunate dotage paid well,
And had you staid two minutes more, ye had had him.

Lop. This sounds like truth.

Isab. Because this shall be certain,
Next time he comes; as long he cannot tarry,
Your self shall see, and hear, his lewd temptations.

Lop. Till then I am satisfied, and if this prove true,
Hence-forward Mistrifs of your self I give ye,
And I to serve ye: For my lusty Captain,
I'll make him dance, and make him think the Devil
Claws at his breech, and yet I will not hurt him:
Come now to bed, and prove but constant this way,
I'll prove the man you ever wish'd.

Isab. You have blest me.

Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Silvio.

Silv. Vhat labour and what travel have I run through
And through what Cities to absolve this Riddle
Diviners, Dreamers, School-men, deep Magicians,
All have I try'd, and all give several meaning,
And from all hope of any future happiness,
To this place am I come at length, the Countrey,
The people simple, plain, and harmless witty,
Whose honest labours Heaven rewards with plenty
Of Corn, Wine, Oyl, which they again as thankful,
To their new Crops, new pastimes celebrate,

And crown their joyful harvests with new voices;
By a rich Farmer here I am entertain'd,
And rank'd among the number of his servants,
Not guessing what I am, but what he would have me,
Here may be so much wit (though much I fear it)
To undo this knotty question; and would to Heaven.

Enter Soto with a Proclamation.

My fortunes had been hatch'd with theirs, as innocent,
And never known a pitch above their plainness.

Soto. That it is, that it is, what's this word now? this Is a plaguy word, that it is r. e. a. that it is, reason,
By your leave, Mr. Soto, by your leave, you are too quick,
There's a strange parlous T. before the reason, (Sir,
A very tall T. which makes the word High Treason.

Sil. What Treason's that? does this fellow understand Himself?

Soto. Pitch will infect, I'll meddle no more with this geer;
What a devil ails this fellow? this foolish fellow?

Being admitted to be one of us too,
That are the masters of the sports proceeding,
Thus to appear before me too, unmorris'd?

Do you know me friend?

Sil. You are my Masters Son, Sir.

Soto. And do you know what sports are now in season?

Sil. I hear there are some a-foot.

Soto. Where are your Bells then?

Your Rings, your Ribons, friend? & your clean Napkins?
Your Nolegay in your hat, pinn'd up, am not I here?
My fathers eldest Son, and at this time, Sir, (want
I would have ye know it, though ye be ten times his ser-
A better man than my father far, Lord of this Harvest, Sir,
And shall a man of my place want attendance?

Sil. 'Twas want of knowledge, Sir, not duty, bred this,
I would have made Suit else for your Lordships service.

Soto. In some sort I am satisfied now, mend your manners,
But thou art a melancholy fellow, vengeance melancholy,
And that may breed an insurrection amongst us;
Go too, I'll lay the best part of two pots now
Thou art in love, and I can guess with whom too,
I saw the wench that twir'd and twinkled at thee,
The other day; the wench that's new come hither,
The young smug wench.

Sil. You know more than I feel Sir. (for thee,

Soto. Go too, I'll be thy friend, I'll speak a good word
And thou shalt have my Lordships countenance to her;
May be I have had a snap my self, may be I, may be no,
We Lords are allow'd a little more.

Sil. 'Tis fit, Sir,

I humbly thank ye, you are too too tender of me,
But what Sir, I beseech ye, was that paper,
Your Lordship was so studiously employed in,
When ye came out a-doors?

Soto. Thou meanest this paper.

Sil. That Sir, I think.

Soto. Why, 'tis a Proclamation,
A notable piece of villany, as ever thou heard'st in thy life,
By mine honor it is.

Sil. How Sir? or what concerns it?

Soto. It comes ye from the Dutchess, a plaguy wise woman,
To apprehend the body of one Silvio,
As arrant a Rascal as ever pist against a post,
And this same Silvio, or this foresaid rascal,
To bring before her, live or dead; for which good service
The man that brings him, has two thousand Duckets;
Is not this notable matter now?

Sil. 'Tis so indeed,

This Proclamation bears my bane about it;
Can no rest find me? no private place secure me?
But still my miseries like blood-hounds haunt me?
Unfortunate young man, which way now guides thee,
Guides thee from death? the Countrey's laid round for thee;

Oh

Oh Claudio, now I feel thy blood upon me,
Now it speaks loudly here, I am sure against me,
Time now has found it out, and truth proclaim d it,
And Justice now cries out, I must die for it.

Soto Hast thou read it?

Sil. Yes.

Soto. And dost thou know that Silvio.

Sil. I never saw him, Sir.

Soto. I have, and know him too,
I know him as well as I know thee, and better,
And if I light upon him, for a trick he plaid me once,
A certain kind of dog-trick, I'll so fiddle him,
Two thousand Duckets, I'll so pepper him,
And with that money I'll turn Gentleman,
Worth a brown Baker's dozen of such Silvios.

Sil. There is no staying here, this rogue will know me,
And for the money sake betray me too;
I must bethink me suddenly and safely.

Enter Morris-dancers.

Soto. Mine own dear Lady, have-at-thy honey-comb,
Now, for the honor of our Town, Boyes, trace sweetly,
Cry within of, Arm, Arm.
Who a vengeance ails this whobub: pox refuse 'em,
Cannot they let us dance in our own defence here?

Enter Farmer and Captain.

Capt. Arm, honest friends, arm suddenly and bravely,
And with your antient resolutions follow me; (bores)
Look how the Beacons show like Comets, your poor neigh-
Run maddingly affrighted through the Villages;
Syenna's Duke is up, burns all before him,
And with his sword, makes thousand mothers childless.

Soto. What's this to our Morris-dancers?

Sil. This may serve my turn. (game.)

Soto. There's ne'r a Duke in Christendom but loves a May-

Capt. At a horse you were always ceaz'd, put your Son on him,

And arm him well i' th' States name, I command ye;
And they that dare go voluntary, shall receive reward.

Soto. I dare go no way, Sir, this is strange, Master Captain,

You cannot be content to spoil our sport here,
Which I do not think your Worship's able to answer,
But you must set us together by the ears with I know not
We are for the bodily part o' th' dance. who too?

Cap. Arm him suddainly,

This is no time to fool, I shall return ye else,
A rebel to the General, State, and Duches,
And how you'll answer then —

Far. I have no more Sons, Sir,

This is my only boy; I beseech ye Master Captain.

Soto. I am a rank coward too, to say the truth, Sir,
I never had good luck at buffets neither.

Far. Here's vorty shillings, spare the child

Cap. I cannot.

Soto. Are ye a man? will ye cast away a May-Lord?
Shall all the wenches in the Countrey curse ye?

Sil. An't please you Captain, I'll supply his person,
'Tis pity their old custom should be frighted,
Let me have Horse, and good Arms, I'll serve willingly,
And if I shrink a foot of ground, Hell take me.

Cap. A promising Aspect, face full of courage,
I'll take this man, and thank ye too!

Far. There's for thee,
'Tis in a clout, but good old Gold.

Sil. I thank ye Sir

Far. Goe saddle my fore-horse, put his feather on, too,
He'll prounce it bravely; friend, he fears no Colours,
And take the Armor down, and see him dizin'd, (matter,

Soto. Farewel, and if thou cary'st thy self well in this
I say no more; but this, there must be more May-Lords,
And I know who are fit.

Sil. Dance you, I'll fight, Sir,

Cap. Away, away.

Sil. Farewel, I am for the Captain.

Exit.

Far. Now to this matter again my honest fellows,
For if this goe not forward, I oresee friends,
This war will fright our neighbors out o' th' villages;
Cheer up your hearts, we sha hear better news, boys.

Hob. Surely I will dance no more, 'tis most ridiculous,
I find my wives instructions now mere verities,
My learned wives, she often hath pronounc'd to me
My safety Bomby, desie these sports, thou art damn'd else,
This Feast of Babylon, I will never back again,
His pace is sure prophane, and his lewd W i-hees,
The Sons of Hymyn and Gymyn, in the wilderness:

Far. Fic neighbor Bomby, in your fits again,
Your zeal sweats, this is not careful, neighbor,
The Hobby-horse, is a seemly Hobby-horse.

Soto. And as pretty a beast on's inches, though I say it.

Hob. The Beast is an unseemly, and a lewd Beast,
And got at Rome by the Popes Coach-Horses,
His mother was the Mare of ignorance.

Soto. Cobler thou ly'st, and thou wert a thousand Coblers
His mother was an honest Mare, and a Mare of good credit,
I know the Mare, and if need be, can bring witness;
And in the way of honesty I tell thee,
Scorn'd any Coach-Horse the Pope had: thou art foolish,
And thy blind zeal makes thee abuse the Beast.

Hob. I do desie thee, and thy foot-cloth too,
And tell thee to thy face, this prophane riding
I feel it in my conscience, and I dare speak it,
This un-edified ambling, hath brought a scourge upon us,
This Hobby-horse sincerity we liv'd in War, and the sword of slaughter: I renounce it,
And put the beast off; thus, the beast polluted,
And now no more shall hop on high Bomby,
Follow the painted pipes of high pleasures,
And with the wicked, dance the devils measures;

Away thou pamper'd jade of vanity,
Stand at the Livery of lewd delights now,
And eat the provinder of prick-ear'd folly,
My dance shall be to the pipe of persecution.

Far. Will you dannee no more neighbor?

Hob. Surely no,

Carry the Beast to his Crib: I have renounc'd him
And all his works.

Soto. Shall the Hobby-horse be forgot then?
The hopeful Hobby-horse, shall he lye founder'd?

If thou do'st this, thou art but a cast-away Cobler:

My anger's up, think wisely, and think quickly,
And look upon the quondam beast of pleasure,
If thou dost this (mark me, thou serious Sowter)
Thou Bench-whistler of the old tribe of toe-pieces,
If thou dost this, there shall be no more shooe-mending,
Every man shall have a special care of his own soul:
And in his pocket carry his two Confessors,
His Yugel, and his Nawl: if thou dost this —

Far. He will dance again for certain.

Hob. I cry out on't,

'Twas the fore-running sin brought in those Tilt-staves,
They brandish 'gainst the Church, the devil calls May-poles,

Soto. Take up your Horse again, and girth him to ye,
And girth him handsomely, good neighbor Bomby.

Hob. I spit at him.

Soto. Spit in the Horse face, Cobler?

Thou out of tune, Psalm-singing slave; spit in his visnomy?

Hob. I spit again, and thus I rise against him:

Against this Beast: that signify'd destruction.

Fore-shew'd i' th' falls of Monarchies:

Soto. I' th' face of him?

Spit such another spit, by this hand Cobler

I'll make ye set a new piece o' your nose there,

Tak't up I say, and dance without more bidding;

And dance as you were wont: you have been excellent

And art still, but for this new nicity,

And

And your wives learned Lectures: take up the Hobby-horse
Come, 'tis a thing thou hast lov'd with all thy heart Bomby,
And would'st do still but for the round-breech'd brothers:
You were not thus in the morning; tak't up I say,
Do not delay but do it: you know I am officer;
And I know 'tis unfit all these good fellows
Should wait the cooling of your zealous porridge;
Chuse whether you will dance, or have me execute:
I'll clap your neck i' th' stocks, and thre I'll make ye
Dance a whole day, and dance with these at night too,
You mend old shooes well, mend your old manners better,
And suddenly see you leave off this sincereness.
This new hot Batch, borrowed from some brown Baker,
Some learned brother, or I'll so bait ye for't,
Take it quickly up.

Hob. I take my persecution,
And thus I am forc'd a by-word to my brethren.

Soto. Strike up, strike up: strike merrily.

Far. To it roundly,
Now to the harvest feast: then sport again boyes. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Silvio, arm'd

Sil. What shall I do? live thus unknown, and base still?
Or thrust my self into the head o' th' Battel?
And there like that I am, a Gentleman,
And one that never fear'd the face of danger,
(So in her angry eyes she carried honor)
Fight nobly, and (to end my cares) die nobly?

Song within.

*Silvio go on, and raise thy noble mind
To noble ends; sling course base thoughts behind:
Silvio, thou Son of everliving fame,
Now aim at virtue, and a Noble Name.
Silvio consider, Honor is not won,
Nor virtue reach'd, till some brave thing be done:
Thy Countrey calls thee now; she burns, and bleeds,
Now raise thy self, young man, to noble deeds.
Into the battel Silvio, there seek forth
Danger, and blood, by them stands sacred worth.*

What heavenly voice is this that follows me?
This is the second time 't has waited on me,
Since I was arm'd, and ready for the battel;
It names me often, steels my heart with courage.

Enter Belvidere deformed.

And in a thousand sweet notes comforts me;
What Beldam's this? how old she is, and ugly,
Why does she follow me?

Bel. Be not dismay'd Son,
I wait upon thee for thy good, and honor,
'Twas I that now sung to thee, stirr'd thy mind up,
And rais'd thy spirits to the pitch of nobleness.

Sil. Though she be old, and of a crooked carkas,
Her voice is like the harmony of Angels.

Bel. Thou art my darling, all my love dwels on thee
The Son of virtue, therefore I attend thee;
Enquire not what I am, I come to serve thee,
For if thou be'st inquisitive, thou hast lost me:
A thousand long miles hence my dwelling is,
Deep in a Cave, where but mine own, no foot treads,
There by mine Art, I found what danger (Silvio)
And deep distress of heart, thou wert grown into,
A thousand Leagues I have cut through empty air,
Far swifter than the sayling rack that gallops
Upon the wings of angry winds, to seek thee,
Sometimes o'er a swelling tide, on a Dolphins back I ride,
Sometimes pass the earth below, and through the unmoved
Center go;

Sometimes in a flame of fire, like a Meteor I aspire,
Sometimes in mine own shape, thus, when I help the vir-tuous,

Men of honourable minds, command my Art in all his kinds;

Pursue the noble thought of War, from thy Guard I'll not be far,

Get thee worship on thy foe, lasting Fame is gotten so.

Single Syennas Duke alone, hear thy friends, thy Countrey groan,

And with thy manly arm strike sure, then thou hast wrought thine own free cure.

Sil. Some Sybel sure, some soul heaven loves, and favours.
And lends her their free powers, to work their wonders?
How she incites my courage?

Bel. Sylvio,
I knew thee many daies ago,
Forefaw thy love to Belvidere, the Dutchess daughter, and her Heir;

Knew she lov'd thee, and know what past; when you were found i' th' Castle fast

In one anothers arms; forfaw the taking of ye, and the Law
And so thy innocence I loved, the deepest of my skill I proved;

Berul'd by me, for to this hour, I have dwelt about thee with my power.

Sil. I will, and in the course of all observe thee,
For thou art sure an Angel sent to me.

Bel. Get thee gone then to the fight, longer stay but robs thy right;

When thou grow'st weary I'll be near, then think on beau-teous Belvidere,

For every precious thought of her, I'll lend thine honor a new spurre;

When all is done, meet here at night; Go and be happy in the fight. Exit.

Sil. I certainly believe I shall do nobly,
And that I'll bravely reach at too, or die. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Claudio, and Penurio:

Cla. Is she so loving still?

Pen. She is mad with Love,
As mad as ever unworm'd dog was, Signior,
And does so weep, and curse, for your prevention,
Your crosses in your love; it frets me too,
I am fall'n away to nothing, to a spindle,
Grown a meer man of mat, no soul within me,
Pox o' my Master, Sir, will that content ye?

Cla. This rogue but cozens me, and she neglects me,
Upon my life there are some other gamesters,
Nearer the wind than I, and that prevents me,
Is there no other holds acquaintance with her?
Prethee be true; be honest, do not mock me,
Thou knowest her heart, no former interest
She has vow'd a favour too? and cannot handsomely
Go off, but by regaining such a friendship?
There are a thousand handsome men, young, wealthy,
That will not stick at any rate, nor danger,
To gain so sweet a prize; nor can I blame her,
If where she finds a comfort, she deal cunningly,
I am a stranger yet.

Pen. Ye are all she looks for,
And if there be any other, she neglects all,
And all for you: I would you saw how grievously
And with what hourly lamentations.

Cla. I know thou flatter'st me; tell me but truth,
Look here, look well, the best meat in the Dukedom,
The rarest, and the choicest of all Diets,
The will I give thee, but to satisfy me;
That is, not to dissemble; this rare Lobster,
This Pheasant of the Sea, this dish for Princes,

And

And all this thou shalt enjoy, eat all thy self,
Have good Greek Wine, or anything belongs to it,
A wench, if it desire one.

Pen. All this, Signior?

Cl. All, and a greater far than this.

Pen. A greater?

Cl. If thou deserve by telling truth.

Pen. A wench too?

Cl. Or any thing, but if you play the knave now,
The cozening knave, besides the loss of this,
In which thou hast parted with a paradise,
I ne'er will give thee meat more, nor a morsel,
No smell of meat by my means shall come near thee,
Nor name of any thing that's nourishing,
But to thy old part Tantalus again,
Thou shalt return, and there snap at a shadow.

Pen. Upon this point, had I intended Treason,
Or any thing might call my life in question,
Follow'd with all the tortures time could think on,
Give me but time to eat this lovely Lobster,
This Alderman o'th' Sea, and give me Wine to him,
I would reveal all, and if that all were too little,
More than I knew; Bartello holds in with her,
The Captain of the Cittadel, but you need not fear him,
His tongue's the stiffest weapon that he carries.
He is old, and out of use; there are some other,
Men, young enough, handsome, and bold enough,
Could they come but to make their game once, but they want
They want the unde quare, they are laid by then. (Sir,

Enter Bartello.

You only are the man shall knock the nail in——

Bar. How now Penurio?

Pen. Your worship's fairly met, Sir.

You shall hear further from me, steal aside, Sir.

Cl. Remember your Master for those Chains.

Pen. They are ready, Sir. (Merchant;

Bart. What young thing's this? by his habit he's a
I fear he trades my way too, you dried dog-fish,
What bait was that?

Pen. Who Sir, the thing went hence now?
A notable young whelp.

Bart. To what end sirrah?

Pen. Came to buy Chains and Rings, is to be married,
An Assè, a Coxcomb, h'as nothing in's house Sir;
I warrant you think he came to see my Mistress?

Bart. I doubt it shrewdly.

Pen. Away, away 'tis foolish;
He has not the face to look upon a Gentlewoman,
A poor skim'd thing, his Mothers maids are fain, Sir
To teach him how to kiss, and against he is married,
To shew him on which side the stirrop stands.

Bart. That's a fine youth.

Pen. Thou wouldst hang thy self, that thou hadst half Thou empty Potgun. (his power,

Bart. Am I come fit Penurio?

Pen. As fit as a fiddle,

My Master's now abroad about his business. (pected

Bart. When thou cam'st to me home to day, I half sus-
My wife was jealous, that she whispered to thee.

Pen. You deserve well the whilst, there's no such matter,
She talk'd about some toys my Master must bring to her,
You must not know of.

Bart. I'll take no noat Penurio.

Pen. No, nor you shall not, till you have it soundly.

This is the bravest Capitano Pompo.

Enter Isabella.

But I shall pump ye anon, Sir.

Isab. Oh my Bartello (Rogue,

Bart. Ye pretty Rogue, you little Rogue, you sweet
Away Penurio, go and walk i'th' Horse-Fair.

Isab. You do not love me?

Bart. Thou liest, thou little rascal;

There sirrah, to your Centry.

Pen. How the Colt itches?

I'll help ye to a Curry-comb shall claw ye. Exit.

Isab. And how much dost thou love me?

Bart. Let's go in quickly,

I'll tell thee presently, I'll measure it to thee.

Isab. No bullsè first? sit o' my knee, my brave boy,
My valiant boy; do not look so fiercely on me,
Thou wilt fright me with thy face; come buss again Chick,
Smile in my face you mad thing.

Bart. I am mad indeed wench,
Precious, I am all o' fire.

Isab. I'll warm thee better.

Bar. I'll warm thee too, or I'll blow out my bellows;
Ha, ye sweet rogue, you loving rogue, a boy now,
A Soldier I will get shall prove a fellow.

Enter Jaquenet and Penurio.

Jaq. Mistress, look to your self, my Master's coming.

Bar. The devil come, and go with him.

Pen. The devil's come indeed, he brings your wife, Sir.

Isab. We are undone, undone then.

Bar. My wife with him?

Why this is a dismal day.

Pen. They are hard by too, Sir.

Bar. I must not, dare not see her.

Isab. Nor my Husband,
For twenty thousand pound.

Bar. That I were a Cat now,

Or any thing could run into a Bench-hole,
Saint Antonies Fire upon the rogue has brought her;
Where shall I be? just i'th' nick o'th' matter?
When I had her at my mercy? think for heaven sake,
My wife, all the wild furies hell has.

Pen. Up the Chimney.

Bar. They'll smoke me out there presently.

Isab. There, there, it must be there,
We are all undone else: it must be up the Chimney.

Bar. Give me a Ladder.

Isab. You must use your Art, Sir,

Alas, we have no Ladders.

Bar. Pox o'thy Husband,
Does he never mend his house?

Pen. No, nor himself neither:

Up nimbly, Sir, up nimbly.

Bar. Thou know'st I am fat,

Thou mercilefs lean rogue.

Pen. Will ye be kill'd?

For if he take ye——

Bar. Lend me thy shoulder.

Pen. Soft, Sir,

You'll tread my shoulder-bones into my sides else;

Have ye fast hold o'th' barrs?

Bar. A vengeance barr'em.

Isab. Patience good Captain, Patience: quickly, quickly.

Bar. Do you think I am made of smoke?

Pen. Now he talks of smoke,

What if my Master should call for fire?

Bar. Will ye Martyr me?

Isab. He must needs have it.

Bar. Will ye make me Bacon?

Isab. We'll do the best we can, are all things ready?

Pen. All, all, I have 'em all.

Bar. Go let 'em in then,

Not a word now on your life.

Bar. I hang like a Meteor.

Enter Lopez and Rhodope.

Lop. You are welcome Lady.

Rho. You are too too courteous,

C c

But

But I shall make amends, fair Ifabella.

Ifab. Welcome my worthy friend, most kindly welcome.

Rbo. I hear on't, and I'll fit him for his foolery.

Lop. Some Sweet meats wife: some Sweet meats presently.

Rbo. Oh my sowre fauce.

Lop. Away quick Ifabella.

Exit Ifab.

Did you hear him?

Rbo. Yes, yes, perfectly, proceed, Sir.

Lop. Speak loud enough: Dare ye at length but pity me?

Rbo. Faith Sir, you have us'd so many reasons to me, And those so powerfully —

Lop. Keep this kiss for me.

Bar. And do I stand and hear this?

Rbo. This for me, Sir,

This is some comfort now: Alas my Husband —

But why do I think of so poor a fellow, So wretched, so debauch'd?

Bar. That's I, I am bound to hear it.

Rbo. I dare not lye with him, he is so rank a Whoremaster.

Lop. And that's a dangerous point.

Rbo. Upon my conscience, Sir, He would stick a thousand base diseases on me.

Bar. And now must I say nothing.

Lop. I am found Lady.

Rbo. That's it that makes me love ye.

Lop. Let's kiss again then.

Rbo. Do, do.

Bar. Do, the Devil

And the grand Pox do with ye.

Lop. Do ye hear him? well —

Enter Penurio and Ifabella.

Now, what's the news with you?

Pen. The sound of War, Sir, Comes still along: The Duke will charge the City; We have lost they say.

Lop. What shall become of me then, And my poor wealth;

Bar. Even hang'd, I hope.

Rbo. Remove your Jewels presently, And what you have of wealth into the Cittadel, There all's secure.

Lop. I humbly thank ye Lady:

Penurio, get me some can climb the Chimney, For there my Jewels are, my best, my richest, I hid 'em, fearing such a blow.

Pen. Most happily:

I have two boys that use to sweep foul Chimneys, Truly I brought 'em, Sir, to mock your worship, For the great Fires ye keep, and the full Diet.

Lop. I forgive thee knave, where are they?

Pen. Here Sir, here:

Monsieur Black, will your small worship mount:

Enter two Boys.

1 Boy. Madam è be com to creep up into your Chimney, and make you
Cleane, as any Lady in de world: Ma litla, litla frera, and è,
Chanta, frere, chanta.

Pen. Come Monsieur, mountè, mountè, mount Monsieur Mustard-pot.

1 Boy. Monsieur è have dis for vostra barba, ple ta vou Monsieur.

Pen. Mountè Monsieur, mountè dere be some fine tings.

1 Boy. He will creep like de Ferret Monsieur.

Pen. Dere in the Chimney. The Boy above singing.

1 Boy. He be de sheilde due shaufon, Madam.
Boys goes in behind the Arras.

Pen. There's a Birds-nest, I wou'd have ye climb it Monsieur,

Up my fine singing Monsieur: that's a fine Monsieur.

Lop. Watch him, he do not steal.

Pen. I warrant ye Sir.

Lop. These Boys are knavish.

Boy within, Madam here be de Rat, de Rat, Madam.

Pen. I'll look to him tightly

Lop. Lord, what comes here, A walking apparition?

Ifab. Saint Christopher.

Rbo. Mercy o' me, what is it?

How like my Husband it looks?

Bar. Get ye down devil,

I'll break your neck else: was ever man thus chimnied?

Lop. Go pay the boys well; see them satisfied.

Pen. Come Monsieur Devils, come my Black-berries I'll butter ye o' both sides.

Boy Exit.

Ifab. Nay, ev'n look Sir, are you cooled now, Captain?

Bar. I am cuckolded, and fool'd to boot too: Fool'd fearfully, fool'd shamefully.

Lop. You are welcome Sir,

I am glad I have any thing within these doors Sir To make ye merry: you love my wife, I thank ye. You have shew'd your love.

Bar. Wife, am I this? this odd matter, This monstrous thing?

Rbo. You ought, but yet you are not: I have been bold with you Sir, but yet not basely, As I have faith I have not.

Lop. Sir, believe it,

'Twas all meant but to make you feel your trespass; We knew your hour, and all this fashion'd for it.

Bar. Were you o'th' plot too?

Ifab. Yes by my troth, sweet Captain.

Bar. You will forgive me wife?

Rbo. You will deserve it?

Bar. Put that toth' venture.

Rbo. Thus am I friends again then, And as you ne'er had gone astray, thus kiss ye.

Bar. And I'll kiss you, and you too ask forgiveness, Kiss my wife Lopez, 'tis but in jest remember;

And now all friends together to my Castle, Where we'll all dine, and there discourse these stories, And let him be Chimney-swept in's lust that glories. Ex.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Silvio and Belvidere severally.

Sil. Hail reverend Dame, heaven wait upon thy studies.

Bel. You are all well met Son: what is the Battel ended?

Sil. Mother, 'tis done.

Bel. How has thy honour prosper'd?

Sil. The Dutchess has the day, Syenna's prisoner: Arm'd with thy powerful Art, this arm dismounted him, Receiv'd him then on foot, and in fair valour.

Forc'd him mine own, this Jewel I took from him, It hung upon his cask, the Victors triumph:

And to the Dutchess now a Prisoner

I have render'd him: Come off again unknown, Mother.

Bel. 'Tis well done, let me see the Jewel Son; 'Tis a rich one, curious set, fit for a Princess Burgonet: This rich Token late was sent, by the Dutchess with intent, The Marriage next day to begin: Dost thou know what's hid within?

Wipe thine eyes, and then come near, see the beauteous

Belvidere:

Now behold it.

Sil. Oh my Saint.

Bel. Wear it nobly, do not faint.

Sil. How blest am I in this rich spoil, this Picture, For ever will I keep it here, here Mother, For ever honor it: how oft, how chafly Have I embrac'd the life of this, and kist it?

Bel.

Bel. The day draws on that thou must home return,
And make thy answer to the Dutchess's question
I know it troubles thee, for if thou fail in't.

Sil. Oh, I must dye.

Bel. Fear not, fear not, 'Ill benign,
Cast thy trouble on my back, Art nor cunning shall not lack,
To preserve thee, still to keep, what thy envious foemen seek;

Go boldly home, and let thy mind, no distrustful crosses find:
All shall happen for the best; souls walk through sorrows that are blest.

Sil. Then I go confident.

Bel. But first my Son, a thankful service must be done,
The good old woman for her pain, when every thing stands fair again,
Must ask a poor Boon, and that granting, there's nothing to thy journey wanting.

Sil. Except the trial of my soul to mischief,
And as I am a Knight, and love mine honor,
I grant it whatsoever.

Bel. Thy pure soul
Shall never sink for me, nor howl.

Sil. Then any thing.

Bel. When I shall ask, remember.

Sil. If I forget, heavens goodness forget me.

Bel. On thy journey then awhile, to the next cross way and stile,
I'll conduct thee, keep thee true, to thy Mistriss and thy vow,
And let all their envies fall, I'll be with thee, and quench
all.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Dutchess, Syenna, and Lords.

Sy. Lady, the stubborn war's more mild than you are,
That allows Ransom, and the Prisoner taken—

Dutch. We must not be too hasty: Remember Sir,
The wrong and violence you have offer'd us,
Burnt up our frontier Towns, made prey before ye
Both of our Beasts, and Corn; slain our dear subjects,
Open'd the fountain eyes of thousand widows,
That daily fling their curses on your fury;
What ordinary satisfaction can salve this?
What hasty thought-on Ransome give a remedy?
You must excuse us yet, we'll take more counsel:
In the mean time, not as a prisoner,
But as a noble Prince we entertain ye.

Sy. I am at your mercy Lady, 'tis my fortune,
My stubborn fate; the day is yours, you have me,
The valour of one single man has cross'd me,
Cross'd me and all my hope; for when the Battel's
Were at the hottest game of all their furies,
And conquest ready then to crown me Victor.
One single man broke in, one sword, one virtue,
And by his great example thousands followed,
Oh how I shame to think on't, how it shakes me!
Nor could our strongest head then stop his fury,
But like a tempest bore the field before him,
Till he arriv'd at me, with me he buck'led,
A while I held him play; at length his violence
Beat me from my saddle, then on foot pursu'd me,
There triumph'd once again, then took me prisoner:
When I was gone, a fear possess'd my people.

Dutch. One single arm, in a just cause, heaven prospers.
Is not this stranger Knight as yet discover'd,
That we may give his virtue a due honor?

Lord. Not yet that we hear Madam, but to that purpose,
Two daies ago we publish'd Proclamations.

Enter Soto with a Trumpet, and Silvio.

Soto. Oh dainty Dutchess, here I bring that Knight
Before thy fragrant face, that warlike wight,
He that Syenna's Duke, and all his Lonts
Beat (as the Proverb seemly saies) to clouts:
He that unhors'd the man o' fame to boot,
And bootless taught his Grace to walk afoot:
He that your writings (pack'd to every pillar)
Promis'd promotion to, and store of siller,
That very man I set before thy Grace,
And once again pronounce, this man it was.

Dutch. A pretty foolish Squire, what must the Knight be?

Sy. Some Jugler or some Mad man,

Sil. I was not so,

When thy faint Troops in flocks I beat before me,
When, through the thickest of thy warlike horse,
I shot my self even to thy Standard Duke,
And there found thee, there singled thee, there shew'd thee
The temper of my Sword. 'Tis true, thou stoodst me,
And like a noble soldier bidst me welcome;
And this I'll say, More honor in that arme,
I found and tryed, than all thy Army carried:
What follows thy imprisonment can tell thee.

Sy. His fair relation carries truth and virtue,
And by those Arms I see, (for such were his,
So old, so rusty) this may be he that forc'd me.

Sil. Do you know this Jewel, from your Cask I rent it,
Even as I clos'd, and forced ye from your saddle;
Do you now remember me—

Sy. This is the valour
Madam, for certain he, it must be he,
That day I wore this Jewel, you remember it.

Dutch. Yes, very well; not long before I sent it.

Sy. That day I lost this Jewel, in fight I lost it,
I felt his strokes, and felt him take it from me,
I wore it in my Cask; take it again Sir,
You won it nobly, 'tis the prize of honor

Soto. My Father and my self are made for ever.

Dutch. Kneel down brave Sir, thus my Knight first I raise ye,
Gird on a Sword; next General of my Army, Discovers
Give him a staff; last, one in Counsel near me. himself.

Now, make us happy with your fight: how? Silvio?
Have I on thee bestow'd this love, this honor?
The Treasons thou hast wrought set off with favours?
Unarm him presently: Oh thou foul Traitor,
Traitor to me, mine honor, and my Countrey,
Thou kindler of these Wars.

Sil. Mistake not Madam.

Dutch. Away with him to prison,
See him safe kept, the Law shall shortly sirrah,
Find him fitter Titles for ye, than I gave ye.

Soto. This is the youth that kill'd me, I'll be quit with him,
What a blind rogue was I, I could never know him?
And 't please your Grace, I claim the benefit
Of the Proclamation that proclaim'd him Traitor,
I brought him in.

Dutch. Thou shalt have thy reward for't.

Soto. Let him be hang'd, or drown'd then,

Dutch. Away with him.

Sil. Madam, I crave your promise first, you are tyed to it,
You have past your Princely word.

Dutch. Prove it, and take it.

Sil. This is the day appointed,
Appointed by your Grace for my appearance;
To answer to the Question.

Dutch. I remember it.

Sil. I claim it then,

Dutch. If you perform it not,
The penalty you claim too.

Sil. I not repent it;
If I absolve the words?

Dutch. Your life is free then,
You have drawn a speedy course above my wishes,

To my revenge, be sure ye hit it right,
Or I'll be sure you shall not scape the danger.

Sil. My rest is up now Madam.

Dutch. Then play it cunningly. mises,

Sil. Now, where's the Hag? where now are all her pro-
She would be with me, strengthen me, inform me?
My death will now be double death, ridiculous?
She was wont still to be near, to feel my miseries,
And with her Art, I see her no where now;
What have I undertaken? now she fails me,
No comfort now I find, how my soul staggers?
Till this hour never fear nor doubt possess me,
She cannot come, she will not come, she has fool'd me;
Sure, she is the Devil, has drawn me on to ruine,
And now to death bequeaths me in my danger.

Sy. He stands distracted, and his colour changes.

Dutch. I have given him that will make his blood forsake
Shortly his life. him;

Sy. His hands and contemplation
Have motion still, the rest is earth already. (out Sir;

Duc. Come, will ye speak or pray? your time grows
How every where he looks? he's at last cast.

Enter Belvidere, and secretly gives him a paper, and Exit.

Sy. His colour comes again fresh.

Duc. 'Tis a flash, Sir,
Before the flame burns out; can ye yet answer?

Sil. Yes Madam, now I can.

Duc. I fear you'll fail in't.

Sil. And do not think my silence a presage,
Or Omen to my end, you shall not find it;
I am bred a Soldier, not an Orator:
Madam, peruse this scrowl, let that speak for me;
And as you are Royal, wrong not the construction.

Dutch. By heaven you shall have fair play.

Sil. I shall look for't.

Question.

Tell me what is that only thing,
For which all women long;
Yet having what they most desire,
To have it do's them wrong.

Answer.

Tis not to be chaste, nor fair,
Such gifts malice may impair;
Richly trimm'd to walk or ride,
Or to wanton unesp'y'd;
To preserve an honest name,
And so to give it up to fame;
These are toys. In good or ill
They desire to have their Will;
Yet when they have it, they abuse it,
For they know not how to use it.

Dutch. You have answer'd right, and gain'd your life,
I give it.

Sil. Oh happy Hag! But my most gracious Madam,
Your promise ty'd a nobler favour to me.

Dutch. 'Tis true, my Daughter too.

Sil. I hope you will keep it.

Dutch. 'Tis not in my power now, she is long since wander'd,
Stol'n from Court, and me; and what I have not
I cannot give: no man can tell me of her,
Nor no search find her out: and ifot Silvi o,
Which strongly I believe——

Sil. Mock me not Lady,
For as I am a servant to her virtue,
Since my first hour of exile, I ne'er saw her.

Lord. That she is gone, 'tis too too true, and lamentable,
Our last hope was in you.

Sil. What do I hear then,

And wherefore have I life bestow'd and honor?

To what end do I walk? for men to wonder at,
And fight, and fool? pray ye take your honors from me,
(My sorrows are not fit companions for 'em)
And when ye please my life: Art thou gone Mistress,
And wander't heaven knows where? this vow I make thee,
That till I find thee out, and see those fair eyes;
Those eyes that shed their lights, and life into me,
Never to know a friend, to seek a kindred,
To rest where pleasure dwels, and painted glory,
But through the world; the wide world, thus to wander,
The wretched world alone, no comfort with me,
But the meer meditations of thy goodness:
Honor and greatness, thus adieu.

Enter Belvidere.

Bel. Stay Silvio,
And Lady sit again, I come for Justice.

Sil. What would she now?

Bel. To claim thy promise Silvio,
The boon thou swor't to give me.

Sy. What may this be,
A Woman or a Devil?

Dutch. 'Tis a Witch sure,
And by her means he came to untwist this Riddle.

Sil. That I am bound to her for my life, mine honor;
And many other thousand ways for comfort
I here confess: confess a promise too,
That what she would aske me to requite these favours,
Within the endeavour of my life to grant,
I would; and here I stand my words full master.

Bel. I wish no more: great Lady, witness with me,
The boon I crave for all my service to thee,
Is now to be thy wife, to grant me marriage.

Sil. How? for to marry thee? ask again woman,
Thou wilful woman, ask again.

Bel. No more Sir.

Sil. Ask Land, and Life.

Bel. I aske thee for a Husband.

Soto. Marry her, and beat her into Gun-powder,
She would make rare Crackers.

Sil. Ask a better fortune,
Thou art too old to marry: I a Soldier,
And always married to my sword.

Bel. Thy word Fool,
Break that, and I'll break all thy fortunes yet.

Dutch. He shall not,

I am witness to his faith? and I'll compel it.

Sy. 'Tis fit ye hold your word, Sir.

Sil. Oh most wretched.

Dutch. This was a fortune now beyond my wishes,
For now my Daughter's free, if e'er I find her.

Sy. But not from me.

Dutch. You are sharer in this happiness,
My self will wait upon this marriage,
And do the old woman all the honor possible. (ance,

Sy. I'll lead the Knight, and what there wants in dalli-
We'll take it out in drink.

Sil. Oh wretched Silvio.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Lopez and Isabella.

Lop. Hast thou sent for him,

Ifab. Yes.

Lop. A young man, faist thou?

Ifab. Yes, very young, and very amorous.

Lop. And handsome?

Ifab. As the Town affords.

Lop. And dar't thou

Be so far good, and Mistress of thine honor;
To slight these?

Ifab.

Ifab. For my Husband's sake to curse 'em,
And since you have made me Mistress of my fortune,
Never to point at any joy, but Husband,
I could have cozen'd ye, but so much I love ye,
And now so much I weigh the estimation
Of an unspotted wife——

Lop. I dare believe thee,
And never more shall doubt torment my spirit.

Enter Penurio.

Ifab. How now Penurio?

Pen. The thing is coming, Mistress.

Lop. I'll take my standing.

Pen. Do, and I'll take mine.

Exit Lopez.

Ifab. Where didst thou leave him?

Pen. I left him in a Cellar,
Where he has paid me titely, paid me home Mistress,
We had an hundred and fifty healths to you, sweet Mistress,
And three score and ten damnations to my Master;
Mistress, shall I speak a foolish word to ye?

Ifab. What's that Penurio?

The fellow's drunk.

Pen. I would fain know your body.

Ifab. How's that? how's that prethee?

Pen. I would know it carnally,

I would conglutinate.

Ifab. The reason sirrah?

Pen. Lobster, sweet Mistress, Lobster.

Ifab. Thy Master hears.

Pen. Lobster, sweet Master, Lobster.

Ifab. Thou art the most pretious rogue.

Enter Claudio.

Pen. Most pretious Lobster.

Ifab. Do you see who's here? go sleep ye drunken rascal.

Pen. Remember you refuse me arm'd in Lobster. Exit.

Ifab. Oh my lost Rugio, welcome, welcome, welcome,
A thousand welcomes here I'll seal.

Cl. Pray ye stay, Lady,
Do you love me ever at this rate? or is the fit now,
By reason of some wrong done by your Husband,
More fervent on ye?

Ifab. Can I chuse but love thee?
Thou art my Martyr, thou hast suffered for me,
My sweet, sweet Rugio.

Cl. Do you do this seriously?
'Tis true, I would be entertained thus.

Ifab. These are nothing,
No kisses, no embraces, no endearments,
To those——

Cl. Do what you will,
Ifab. Those that shall follow,
Those I will crown our love withal; why sigh ye?
Why look ye sad my dear one?

Cl. Nay, faith nothing,
But methinks so sweet a beauty, as yours shews to me,
And such an innocence as you may make it,
Should hold a longer Siege.

Ifab. Ha, you speak truth, Sir,

Cl. I would not have it so.

Ifab. And now methinks,
Now I consider truly what becomes me,
I have been cozen'd, fearfully abus'd,
My reason blinded.

Cl. Nay, I did but jest with ye.

Ifab. I'll take ye at your word, and thank ye for't Sir;
And now I see no sweetness in that person,
Nothing to stir me to abuse a Husband,
To ruine my fair fame.

Cl. Good Isabella.

Ifab. No handsome man, nor any thing to doat on,
No face, no tongue to catch me, poor at all points,

And I an ass.

Cl. Why do ye wrong me Lady?
If I were thus, and had no youth upon me,
My service of so mean a way to win ye,
(Which you your self are conscious must deserve ye,
If you had thrice the beauty you possess, must reach ye)
If in my tongue your fame lay wrack'd, and ruin'd
With every cup I drink: if in opinion
I were a lost, defam'd man: but this is common
Where we love most, where most we stake our fortunes,
There least and basest we are rewarded: fare ye well,
Know now I hate you too as much, contemn ye,
And weigh my credit at as high a value.

Ifab. May be I did but jest.

Cl. Ye are a woman,
And now I see your wants, and mine own follies,
And task my self with indiscretion,
For doating on a face so poor.

Ifab. Say ye so Sir,
(I must not lose my end) I did but jest with you,
Only fool'd thus to try your faith: my Rugio,
Do you think I could forget?

Cl. Nay, 'tis no matter.

Ifab. Is't possible I should forsake a constancy,
So strong, so good, so sweet?

Cl. A subtle woman.

Ifab. You shall forgive me, 'twas a trick to try ye,
And were I sure he lov'd me——

Cl. Do you doubt now?

Ifab. I do not doubt, but he that would profess this,
And bear that full affection you make shew of,
Should do——

Cl. What should I do?

Ifab. I cannot shew ye.

Cl. I'll try thee damnedst Devil: hark ye Lady,
No man shall dare do more, no service top me,
I'll marry ye.

Ifab. How Sir?

Cl. Your Husband's sentenc'd,
And he shall dye.

Ifab. Dye?

Cl. Dye for ever to ye,
The danger is mine own.

Ifab. Dye did ye tell me?

Cl. He shall dye, I have cast the way.

Ifab. Oh foul man,
Malicious bloody man.

Enter Lopez.

Lop. When shall he dye, Sir,
By whom, and how?

Cl. Hast thou betraid me, woman?

Ifab. Base man, thou would'st have ruin'd me, my name too
And like a Toad, poison'd my virtuous memory:
Further than all this, dost thou see this friend here,
This only friend, shame take thy Lust and thee,
And shake thy soul, his life, the life I love thus,
My life in him, my only life thou aim'st at.

Cl. Am I catcht thus?

Lop. The Law shall catch ye better.

Ifab. You make a trade of betraying Womens honors,
And think it noble in ye to be lustful,
Report of me hereafter——

Cl. Fool'd thus finely?

Lop. I must intreat ye walk, Sir, to the Justice,
Where if he'll bid ye kill me——

Cl. Pray stay awhile, Sir,
I must use a Players shift, do you know me now Lady?

Lop. Your brother Claudio sure.

Ifab. Oh me, 'tis he Sir,
Oh my best brother.

Cl. My best sister now too,
I have tryed ye, found ye so, and now I love ye,

Love ye so truly nobly.

Lop. Sir, I thank ye,
You have made me a most happy man.

Clia. Thank her Sir,
And from this hour preserve that happiness,
Be no more fool'd with jealousy.

Lop. I have lost it,
And take me now new born again, new natur'd.

Isab. I do, and to that promise tye this faith,
Never to have a false thought tempt my virtue.

Lop. Enough, enough, I must desire your presence,
My Cousin Rhodope has sent in all haste for us,
I am sure you will be welcome.

Clia. I'll wait on ye.

Lop. What the Project is —

Isab. We shall know when we are there, Sir, Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Dutchess, Syenna, Lords, Sylvio.

Dutch. Joy to you Sylvio, and your young fair Bride,
You have stolen a day upon us; you cannot wooe, Sir.

Sil. The joyes of Hell hang over me, oh mischief,
To what a fortune has the Devil driven me?
Am I reserv'd for this?

Sy. Beshrew me, Sir,
But you have gotten you a right fair bedfellow,
Let you alone to chuse.

Sil. I beseech your Grace,
'Tis misery enough to have met the Devil,
Not mens reproaches too.

Sy. How old is she?

Dutch. A very Girl, her eye delivers it.

Sy. Her teeth are scarce come yet.

Lord. What goodly children

Will they two have now? she is rarely made to breed on,
What a sweet timber'd body?

Dutch. Knotty i' th' back,
But will hold out the stronger; What a nose?

Sy. I marry, such a nose, so rarely mounted,
Upon my conscience, 'twas the part he doted on.

Dutch. And that fine little eye to it, like an Elephant's.

Lord. Yes, if her feet were round, and her ears sachels.

Sy. For any thing we know.

Sil. Have ye no mercy?

No pity in your bloods to use a wretch thus?
You Princes in whose hearts the best compassions,
Nearest to those in Heaven, should find fit places,
Why do you mock at misery? sling scorns and baseness
Upon his broken back, that sinks with sorrows?
Heaven may reward you too, and an hour come,
When all her great designs shall shew ridiculous,
And your hearts pinch'd like mine.

Musick in divers places.

Dutch. Fie Sir, so angry
Upon your wedding day? go sinug your self,
The Maid will come anon: what Musick's this?

Sy. I warrant you some noble preparation.

Dutch. Let's take our places then.

Sil. More of these Devils dumps?

Must I be ever haunted with these witchcrafts?

Enter a Masquerado of several shapes, and Dances, after which, enter Belvidere and disperses them; before the Mask-ers enter two Presenters, among which are Bartello, Lopez, Claudio, Isabella, Rhodope, Soto, Penurio, Jaquet.

r Pre. Room, room for merry spirits, room,
Hither on command we come,
From the good old Beldam sent,
Cares and sorrows to prevent.

2. Look up Sylvio, smile, and sing,
After winter comes a Spring.

1. Fear not faint fool what may follow,
Eyes that now are sunk and hollow,
By her Art may quick return
To their flames again, and burn.

2. Art commands all youth, and blood,
Strength and beauty it makes good.

1. Fear not then, despair not, sing
Round about as we do spring:
Cares and sorrows cast away,
This is the old wives Holy-day.

Dance here, then enter Belvidere.

Dutch. Who is this?

Sy. The shape of Belvidere.

Bel. Now Sylvio,

How dost thou like me now?

Sil. Thus I kneel to thee.

Bel. Stand up, and come no nearer, mark me well too,
For if thou troublest me, I vanish instantly:

Now chuse wisely, or chuse never,
One thou must enjoy for ever.

Dost thou love me thus?

Sil. Most dearly.

Bel. Take heed fool, it concerns thee nearly.

If thou wilt have me young and bright,

Pleasing to thine eye and sight,

Courtly, and admir'd of all,

Take heed lest thy fame do fall,

I shall then be full of scorn,

Wanton, proud, beware the horn,

Hating what I lov'd before,

Flattery apt to fall before,

All consuming, nothing getting,

Thus thy fair name comes to setting.

But if old, and free from these

Thou shalt chuse me, I shall please:

I shall then maintain thee still,

With my virtue and my skill

Still increase and build thy name,

Chuse now Sylvio, here I am.

Sil. I know not what to say, which way to turn me,
Into thy Sovereign will I put my answer.

Bel. I thank ye Sir, and my Will thus rewards ye,
Take your old Love, your best, your dearest Sylvio:

No more Spells now, nor further shapes to alter me,
I am thy Belvidere indeed. Dear Mother,

There is no altering this; heavens hand is with it:

And now you ought to give me, he has fairly won me.

Sil. But why that Hag?

Bel. In that shape most secure still,
I followed all your fortunes, serv'd, and counsell'd ye,

I met ye at the Farmers first, a Countrey wench,

Where fearing to be known, I took that habit,

And to make ye laughing sport at this mad marriage,
By secret aid of my friend Rhodope

We got this Maske.

Sil. And I am sure I have ye.

Bel. For ever now, for ever.

Dutch. You see it must be,
The wheel of destiny hath turn'd it round so.

Sy. It must, it is, and curs'd be he that breaks it.

Dutch. I'll put a choice to you, Sir: ye are my prisoner.

Sy. I am so, and I must be so, till it please you —

Dutch. Chuse one of these, either to pay a Ransom,

At what a rate I shall set it, which shall be high enough,

And so return a Free man, and a Batchelor,

Or give me leave to give you a fit wife,

In honor every way yours Graces equal,

And so your Ransom's paid.

Sy. You say most nobly,
Sylvio's example's mine, pray chuse you for me.

Dutch. I thank ye Sir, I have got the mastery too,

And here I give your Grace a Husbands freedom:

Give

Give me your hand, my Husband.

Sy. You much honor me,
And I shall ever serve ye for this favour.

Bart. Come Lopez, let us give our wives the breeches too,
For they will have 'em.

Lop. Whilst they rule with virtue
I'll give 'em, skin and all.

Isa. We'll scratch it off else.

Sil. I am glad ye live, more glad ye live to honor,
And from this hour a stronger love dwell with us ;
Pray you take your man again.

Cl. He knows my house, Sir.

Dutch. 'Tis sin to keep you longer from your loves,
We'll lead the way ; and you young men that know not
How to preserve a wife, and keep her fair,
Give 'em their soveraign Wills, and pleas'd they are.

Exeunt.

Here endeth Women pleas'd.

THE Mistriss.

Actus Primus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Tom Lurcher, and Jack Wild-brain.

Lur. *J*ack.

Wild. What wind bro'ght thee hither?
In what hollow tree, or rotten wall
Hast thou been like a Swallow all this winter,
Where hast thou been men?

Lur. Following the Plow.

Wild. What Plow? Thou hast no Land,
Stealing is thy own purchase.

Lur. The best inheritance.

Wild. Not in my opinion,
Thou hadst five hundred pound a year.

Lur. 'Tis gone,

Prethee no more on't, have I not told thee,
And oftentimes, nature made all men equal,
Her distribution to each child alike;
Till labour came and thrust a new Will in,
Which I allow not: till men won a priviledge

By that they call endeavour, which indeed
Is nothing but a lawful Cosenage,
An allowed way to cheat, why should my neighbor
That hath no more soul than his Horse-keeper,
Nor bounteous faculties above a Broom-man,
Have forty thousand pounds, and I four groats;
Why should he keep it?

Will. Thy old opinion still.

Lur. Why should that Scrivener,
That ne'er writ reason in his life, nor anything
That time e'ver gloried in, that never knew
How to keep any courtesie conceal'd,
But Noverint Universi must proclaim it,
Purchase perpetually, and I a rascal:
Consider this, why should that mouldy Cobler
Marry his Daughter to a wealthy Merchant,
And give five thousand pounds, is this good justice?
Because he has a tougher constitution;
Can feed upon old Songs, and save his money,
Therefore must I go beg?

Will.

Wil. What's this to thee?

Thou canst not mend, if thou beest determin'd
To rob all like a Tyrant, yet take heed
A keener justice do not overtake thee,
And catch you in a Nooze.

Lur. I am no Wood-cock,
He that shall sit down frightened with that foolery
Is not worth pity, let me alone to shuffle,
Thou art for wenching.

Wil. For beauty I, a safe course,
No halter hangs in the way, I desic it.

Lur. But a worse fate, a wilful poverty,
For where thou gain'st by one that indeed loves thee,
A thousand will draw from thee, 'tis thy destiny;
One is a kind of weeping cross Jack,
A gentle Purgatory, do not sling at all,
You'll pay the Box so often, till you perish.

Wil. Take you no care for that sir, 'tis my pleasure,
I will employ my wits a great deal faster
Than you shall do your fingers, and my loves,
If I mistake not, shall prove ripe harvest
And handsomer, and come within less danger.
Where's thy young Sister?

Lur. I know not where she is, she is not worth caring for,
She has no wit.

Oh you'd be nibbling with her,
She's far enough I hope, I know not where,
She's not worth caring for, a fullen thing,
She wou'd not take my counsel Jack,
And so I parted from her.

Wil. Leave her to her wants?

Lur. I gave her a little money, what I could spare,
She had a mind to th' Country, she is turn'd,
By this, some Farriers dairy maid, I may meet her
Riding from Market one day, 'twixt her Dorsers,
If I do, by this hand I wo't spare
Her butter pence.

Wil. Thou wilt not rob thy Sister.

Lur. She shall account me for her Eggs and Cheeses.

Wil. A pretty Girl, did not old Algripe love her?
A very pretty Girl she was.

Lur. Some such thing,

But he was too wise to fasten; let her pass.

Wil. Then where's thy Mistress?

Lur. Where you sha'not find her,
Nor know what stuff she is made on; no indeed Sir,
I choose her not for your use.

Wil. Sure she is handsome.

Lur. Yes indeed is she, she is very handsome, but that's all one.

Wil. You'll come to th' Marriage?

Lur. Is it to day.

Wil. Now, now, they are come from Church now.

Lur. Any great preparation,
Does Justice Algripe shew his power?

Wil. Very glorious, and glorious people there.

Lur. I may meet with him yet e're I dye as cunning as he is.

Wil. You may do good Tom, at the carriage,
We have plate and dainty things.

Lur. Do you no harm Sir;
For yet methinks the Marriage should be mar'd
If thou maist have thy will, farewell, say nothing. Exit.

Enter Gentlemen.

Wil. You are welcome noble friends. 1. I thank you Sir,
Nephew to the old Lady, his name is Wildbrain,
And wild his best condition. 2. I have heard of him,
I pray ye tell me Sir, is young Maria merry
After her Marriage rites? does she look lively?
How does she like her man? Wil. Very scurvily,
And as untowardly she prepares her self,
But 'tis mine Aunts will, that this dull mettal
Must be mixt with her to allay her handsomeness.

1. Had Heartlove no fast friends?

Wil. His means are little,

And where those littles are, as little comforts
Ever keep company: I know she loves him,
His memory beyond the hopes of —
Beyond the Indies in his mouldy Cabinets,
But 'tis her unhandsome fate.

Enter Heartlove.

1. I am sorry for't,

Here comes poor Frank, nay we are friends, start not Sir,
We see you'r willow and are sorry for't,
And though it be a wedding we are half mourners.

Fr. Good Gentlemen remember not my fortunes,
They are not to be help'd by words.

Wil. Look up man,
A proper sensible fellow and shrink for a wench?
Are there no more? or is she all the handsomness?

Fr. Prethee leave fooling.

Wil. Prethee leave thou whining,
Have maids forgot to love?

Fr. You are injurious.

Wil. Let 'em alone a while, they'll follow thee.

1. Come good Frank,

Forget now, since there is no remedy,
And shew a merry face, as wise men would do.

2. Be a free guest, and think not of those passages.

Wil. Think how to nick him home, thou knowst she Graff me a dainty medler on his crabstocke; (dotes on thee
Pay me the dreaming puppy.

Fr. Well, make your mirth, the whilst I bear my misery:
Honest minds would have better thoughts.

Wil. I am her Kinsman,
And love her well, am tender of her youth,
Yet honest Frank, before I would have that stinkard,
That walking rotten tombe, enjoy her maidenhead.

Fr. Prethee leave mocking.

Wil. Prethee Frank believe me,
Go to consider, hark, they knock to dinner. Knock within.
Come wo't thou go?

2. I prethee Frank go with us,
And laugh and dance as we do.

Fr. You are light Gentlemen,
Nothing to weigh your hearts, pray give me leave,
I'll come and see, and take my leave.

Wil. We'll look for you,
Do not despair, I have a trick yet. Exit.

Fr. When I am mischievous I will believe your projects:
She is gone, for ever gone, I cannot help it,
My hopes and all my happiness gone with her.
Gone like a pleasing dream: what mirth and joillity
Raigns round about this house? how every office
Sweats with new joyes, can she be merry too?
Is all this pleasure set by her appointment?
Sure she hath a false heart then; still they grow lowder,
The old mans God, his gold, has won upon her,
(Light hearted Cordial Gold) and all my services
That offered naked truth, are clean forgotten:
Yet if she were compell'd, but it cannot be,
If I could but imagine her will mine,
Although he had her body.

Enter Lady and Wildbrain.

La. He shall come in.
Walk without doors o'this day, though an enemy,
It must not be.

Wil. You must compel him Madam.

La. No she shall fetch him in, Nephew it shall be so.

Wil. It will be fittest. Exit.

Fr. Can fair Maria look again upon me?
Can there be so much impudence in sweetness?

Enter Maria.

Or has she got a strong heart to desic me?
She comes her self: how rich she is in Jewels!

D d

Methinks

Methinks they show like frozen Icicles,
Cold winter had hung on her, how the Roses
That kept continual spring within her cheeks
Are withered with old mans dull embraces?
She would speak to me. I can sigh too Lady
But from a sounder heart: yes, and can weep too
But 'tis for you, that ever I believ'd you,
Tears of more pious value than your marriage;
You would encase your self, and I must credit you,
So much my old obedience compels from me;
Go, and forget me, and my poverty,
I need not bid you, you are too perfect that way:
But still remember that I lov'd Maria,
Lov'd with a loyal love, nay turn not from me,
I will not ask a tear more, you are bountiful,
Go and rejoyce, and I will wait upon you
That little of my life left.

Mr. Good Sir hear me,
What has been done, was the act of my obedience
And not my will: forc'd from me by my parents,
Now 'tis done, do as I do, bear it handsomly
And if there can be more society
Without dishonor to my tie of marriage
Or place for noble love, I shall love you still,
You had the first, the last, had my will prosper'd;
You talk of little time of life: dear Frank,
Certain I am not married for eternity,
The joy my marriage brings tells me I am mortal.
And shorter liv'd than you, else I were miserable;
Nor can the gold and ease his age hath brought me
Add what I coveted, content go with me,
They seek a day of joy, prethee let's show it,
Though it be forc'd, and by this kiss believe me
However, I must live at his command now,
I'll dye at yours.

Fr. I have enough, I'll honor ye.

Exeunt.

Enter Lurcher.

Lur. Here are my trinkets, and this lusty marriage
I mean to visit, I have shifts of all sorts,
And here are a thousand wheels to set 'em working,
I am very merry, for I know this wedding
Will yield me lusty pillage: if mad Wildgoose
That debosh'd rogue keep but his antient revels,
And breed a hubbub in the house I am happy.

Enter Boy.

Now what are you?

Boy. A poor distressed Boy, Sir,
Friendless and comfortless, that would intreat
Some charity and kindness from your worship,
I would fain serve, Sir, and as fain endeavour
With dutious labour to deserve the love
Of that good Gentleman should entertain me.

Lur. A pretty Boy, but of too mild a breeding,
Too tender, and too bashful a behaviour,
What canst thou do?

Boy. I can learn any thing,
That's good and honest, and shall please a Master.

Lur. He blushes as he speaks, and that I like not,
I love a bold and secure confidence,
An impudence that one may trust, this boy now:
Had I instructed him, had been a Jewel,
A treasure for my use, thou canst not lye?

Boy. I would not willingly.

Lur. Nor thou hast not wit
To dissemble neatly?

Boy. Do you love such boys, Sir?

Lur. Oh mainly, mainly, I would have my Boy impudent,
Out-face all truth, yet do it piously:
Like Proteus, cast himself into all forms,
As suddain and as nimble as his thoughts,

Blanch at no danger, though it be the Gallows,
Nor make no conscience of a cosenage,
Though it be i'th' Church. Your soft, demure, still children—
Are good for nothing, but to get long Graces—
And sing Songs to dull tunes; I would keep thee
And cherish thee, hadst thou any active quality,
And be a tender Master to thy knavery,
But thou art not for my use.

Boy. Do you speak this seriously?

Lur. Yes indeed do I.

Boy. Would you have your boy Sir
Read in these moral mischiefs?

Lur. Now thou mov'st me.

Boy. And be a well-train'd youth in all activities?

Lur. By any means.

Boy. Or do you this to try me,
Fearing a pronefs.

Lur. I speak this to make thee.

Boy. Then take me Sir, and cherish me, and love me,
You have me what you would: believe me, Sir
I can do any thing for your advantage,
I guess at what you mean; I can lie naturally,
Aseasily, as I can sleep Sir, and securely:
As naturally I can steal too.

Lur. That I am glad on,
Right heartily glad on, hold thee there, thou art excellent.

Boy. Steal any thing from any body living.

Lur. Not from thy Master.

Boy. That's mine ownbody:
And must not be.

Lur. The boy mends mightily.

Boy. A rich man, that like snow heaps up his moneys,
I have a kind of pious zeal to meet still;
A fool that not deserves 'em, I take pitty on,
For fear he should run mad, and so I ease him.

Lur. Excellent boy, and able to instruct me,
Of mine own nature just.

Boy. I scorn all hazard,
And on the edge of danger I do best, Sir,
I have a thousand faces to deceive,
And to those, twice so many tongues to flatter,
An impudence, no brags was ever tougher,
And for my conscience.

Lur. Peace, I have found a Jewel,
A Jewel all the Indies cannot match,
And thou sha't feel —

Boy. This title, and I ha' done, Sir;
I never can confess, I ha' that spell on me;
And such rare modesties before a Magistrate,
Such innocence to catch a Judge, such ignorance.

Lur. I'll learn of thee, thou art mine own, come boy,
I'll give thee action presently,

Boy. Have at you.

Lur. What must I call thee?

Boy. Snap, Sir.

Lur. 'Tis most natural,
A name born to thee, sure thou art a Fairy,
Shew but thy skill, and I shall make thee happy.

Enter Lady, Nurse, Mistrijs, Newlove, Tobie.

La. Where be these knaves? who strues up all the liveries.
Is the Bride's bed made?

Tob. Yes Madam and a Bell
Hung under it artificially.

La. Out knave, out,
Must we have 'larms now?

Tob. A little warning
That we may know to begin our healths Madam;
The Justice is a kind of old Jade, Madam,
That will goe merriest with a Bell.

La. All the house drunk.

Tob. This is a house of Jubile.

La. Are the best hangings up? and the Plate set out?
Who makes the Posset, Nurse?

Nur.

Nur. The dayrie mayd,
And shee'll put that in, will make him caper:
Well Madam, well, you might ha' chose another,
A handfomer for your years.
La. Peace, he is rich Nurse,
He is rich, and that's beauty.
Nur. I am sure he is rotten,
Would he had been hang'd when he first saw her. Termagant!
La. What an angry Quean is this, where,
Who looks to him?
Tob. He is very merry Madam,
M. Wildbrain, has him in hand, ich'bottom o'th'Sellar
He sighs and tipples.
Nur. Alas good Gentleman,
My heart's fore for thee.
La. Sorrow must have his course, sirra,
Give him some Sack to dry up his remembrance,
How does the Bridegroom, I was afraid of him.
Nur. He is a trim youth to be tender of, hemp take him.
Must my sweet new blown Rose find such a winter
Before her spring be near.
La. Peace, peace, thou art foolish.
Nur. And dances like a Town-top: and reels, and hobbles.
La. Alas, good Gentleman, give him not much wine.
Tob. He shall ha' none by my consent.
La. Are the women comforting my daughter?
Nur. Yes, yes, Madam,
And reading to her a pattern of true patience,
They read and pray for her too.
Nur. They had need,
Ye had better marry her to her grave a great deal:
There will be peace and rest, alas poor Gentlewoman,
Must she become a Nurse now in her tenderness?
Well Madam, well my heart bleeds.
La. Thou art a fool still.
Nur. Pray heaven I be.
La. And an old fool to be vext thus.
'Tis late she must to bed, go knave be merry,
Drink for a boy, away to all your charges.

Enter Wildbrain, and Franck Heartlove.

Wil. Do as thou wo't, but if thou dost refuse it
Thou art the stupid'st ass, there's no long arguing,
Time is too precious Franke.
Fr. I am hot with wine.
And apt now to believe, but if thou dost this
Out of a villany, to make me wrong her.
As thou art prone enough.
Wil. Does she not love thee?
Did she not cry down-right e'n now to part with thee?
Had she not swoounded if I had not caught her?
Canst thou have more?
Fr. I must confesse all this.
Wil. Do not stand prating, and misdoubting, casting,
If she go from thee now, she's lost for ever;
Now, now she's going, she that loves thee going,
She whom thou lov'st.
Fr. Pray let me think a little.
Wil. There is no leisure; think when thou hast imbrac'd her
Can she imagine thou dost ever honor her?
Ever believe thy oaths, that tamely suffer'st
An old dry ham of horse-flesh to enjoy her?
Enjoy her maiden-head; take but that from her
That we may tell posterity a man had it,
A handsome man, a Gentleman, a young man,
To save the honor of our house, the credit,
'Tis no great matter I desire. Fr. I hear you.
Wil. Free us both from the fear of breeding fools
And ophs, got by this shadow: we talk too long.
Fr. She is going to bed, among the women,
What opportunity can I have to meet her?
Wil. Let me alone, hast thou a will? speak foundly,

Speak discreetly, speak home and handfomly,
Is't not pittie, nay misery, nay infamy to leave
So rare a pie to be cut up by a raskal.
Fr. I will go presently, now, now, I stay thee.
Wil. Such a dainty Doe, to be taken
By one that knows not neck-beef from a Pheasant,
Nor cannot relish Braggat from Ambrosia.
Is it not conscience?
Fr. Yes, yes, now I feel it.
Wil. A meritorious thing.
Fr. Good Father Wildgoose,
I do confesse it.
Wil. Come then follow me.
And pluck a mans heart up, I'll lock thee privately,
Where she alone shall presently pass by,
None near to interrupt thee but be sure;
Fr. I shall be sure enough, lead on, and crown me.
Wil. No wringings in your mind now as you love me. Ex.

Enter Lady, Maria, Justice, Gent. Nurse, Newlove.

La. 'Tis time you were a bed.
Ju. I prethee sweet-heart
Consider my necessity, why art sad?
I must tell you a tale in your ear anon.
Nur. Of Tom Thumb.
I believe that will prove your stiffest story.
New. I pittie the young wench.
1. And so do I too.
2. Come, old sticks take fire.
1. But the plague is, he'll burn out instantly;
Give him another cup.
2. Those are but flashes,
A tun of sack wonot set him high enough.
Will ye to bed? M. I must.
1. Come, have a good heart,
And win him like a bowle to lye close to you,
Make your best use.
Ju. Nay prethee Duck go instantly,
I'll dance a Jig or two to warm my body.

Enter Wildbrain.

Wil. 'Tis almost midnight.
La. Prethee to bed Maria.
Wil. Go you afore, and let the Ladies follow,
And leave her to her thoughts a while, there must be
A time of taking leave of these same fooleries
Bewailing others maiden-heads.
La. Come then,
We'll wait in the next room.
Ju. Do not tarry.
For if thou dost, by my troth I shall fall asleep Mall. Ex.
Wit. Do, do, and dream of Doterels, get you to bed quickly,
And let us ha' no more stir, come now, no crying,
'Tis too late now, carry your selves discreetly.
The old thief loves thee dearly, that's the benefit.
For the rest you must make your own play, Nay not that way,
They'll pull ye all to pieces, for your whim-whams,
Your garters and your gloves, go modestly,
And privately steal to bed, 'tis very late Mall,
For if you go by them such a new larum.
Ma. I know not which way to avoid'em.
Wi. This way,
This through the Cloysters: and so steal to bed,
When you are there once, all will separate
And give ye rest, I came out of my pittie
To shew you this.
Ma. I thank you. Wi. Here's the keyes,
Go presently and lock the doors fast after ye,
That none shall follow.
Ma. Good night.
Wi. Good night sweet Cosen.
Ma. A good, and sweet night, or I'll curse thee Frank. Exit
Ente

Enter Frank Hartlove

Fr. She stays long, sure young Wildgoose has abus'd me,
He has made sport wi' me, I may yet get out again,
And I may see his face once more, I ha' foul intentions,
But they are drawn on by a fouler dealing

Enter Maria.

Hark, hark, it was the door,
Something comes this way, wondrous still and stealing
May be some walking spirit to affright me.

Ma. Oh heaven my fortune.

Fr. 'Tis her voice, stay.

Ma. Save me,

Bless me you better powers.

Fr. I am no devil.

Ma. Y'are little better to disturb me now.

Fr. My name is Hartlove.

Ma. Fye, fye, worthy friend.

Fye noble Sir.

Fr. I must talk farther with ye,

You know my fair affection.

Ma. So preserve it,

You know I am married now, for shame be civiler,

Not all the earth shall make me.

Fr. Pray walk this way,

And if you ever lov'd me.

Ma. Take heed Frank

How you divert that love to hate, go home prethee.

Fr. Shall he enjoy that sweet?

Ma. Nay pray unhand me.

Fr. He that never felt what love was.

Ma. Then I charge you stand farther off.

Fr. I am tame, but let me walk wi' ye,

Talk but a minute.

Ma. So your talk be honest,

And my untainted honor suffer not,

I'll walk a turn or two.

Fr. Give me your hand then.

Exit.

Enter Wildbrain, Justice, Lady, Nurse, Gent.
Women, Newlove.

Just. Shee's not in her Chamber

La. She is not here.

Wil. And I'll tell you what I dream'd.

Ju. Give me a Torch.

1. G. Be not too hasty Sir.

Wil. Nay let him go.

For if my dream be true he must be speedy,
He will be trickt, and blaz'd else.

Nur. As I am a woman

I cannot blame her if she take her liberty,
Would she would make thee Cuckold, thou old bully,
A notorious cuckold for tormenting her.

La. I'll hang her then.

Nur. I'll bless her then, she does justice,
Is this old stinking dogs-flesh for her dyet?

Wil. Prethee honest Nurse do not fret too much,
For fear I dream you'll hang your self too.

Just. The Cloister?

Wil. Such was my fancy, I do not say 'tis true,
Nor do I bid you be too confident.

Ju. Where are the keys, the keys I say.

Wil. I dream'd she had 'em to lock her self in.

Nur. What a devil do you mean?

Enter reSvant.

Wil. No harm, good Nurse be patient.

Ser. They are not in the window, where they use to be.

Wil. What foolish dreams are these?

Ju. I am mad.

Wil. I hope so,

If you be not mad, I'll do my best to meyake.

1. This is some trick.

2. I smell the Wildgoose.

Ju. Come Gentlemen, come quickly I beseech you,
Quick as you can, this may be your case Gentlemen.
And bring some light, some lights.

Exit.

Wil. Move faster, faster, you'll come too late else.
I'll stay behind and pray for ye, I had rather she were dishonest
Than thou shouldst have her.

Enter Maria, and Frank.

Ma. Y'are most unmanly, yet I have some breath left,
And this steel to defend me, come near me,
For if you offer but another violence,
As I have life I'll kill you, if I miss that,
Upon my own heart will I execute,
And let that fair belief out, I had of you.

Fr. Most vertuous Maid, I have done, forgive my follies:
Pardon, O pardon, I now see my wickedness,
And what a monstrous shape it puts upon me,
On your fair hand I seal.

Enter Ju.

Ju. Down with the door.

Ma. We are betraid, oh Frank, Frank,

Fr. I'll dye for ye

Rather than you shall suffer, I'll—

Enter all.

Ju. Now enter.

Enter sweet Gentlemen, mine eyes, mine eyes,
Oh how my head asks.

1. Is it possible?

2. Hold her, she sinks.

Ma. A plot upon my honor

To poyson my fair name, a studied villany,
Farewell, as I have hope of peace, I am honest,

Ju. My brains, my brains, my monstrous brains, they bud sure.

Nu. She is gone, she is gone.

Ju. A handsome riddance of her.

Would I could as easily lose her memory.

Nur. Is this the sweet of Marriage, have I bred thee
For this reward?

1. Hold, hold, he's desperate too.

Ju. Be sure ye hold him fast, we'll bind him over
To the next Sessions, and if I can, I'll hang him.

Fr. Nay then I'll live to be a terror to thee,
Sweet Virgin Rose farewell: heaven has thy beauty,
That's only fit for heaven. I'll live a little
To find the Villain out that wrought this injury,
And then most blessed soul, I'll climb up to thee.
Farewell, I feel my self another creature.

Exit.

La. Oh misery of miseries.

Nu. I told ye Madam.

La. Carry her in, you will pay back her portion?

Ju. No not a penny, pay me back my credit,
And I'll condition wi' ye.

La. A sad wedding,

Her grave must be her Bridal bed: oh Mall,
Would I had wed thee to thy own content,
Then I had had thee still.

Ju. I am mad, farewell,
Another wanton wife will prove a hell.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Enter Tom. Lurch, and his Boy.

Lur. What hast thou done ?

Boy. I have walked through all the lodgings.

A silence as if death dwelt there inhabits.

Lur. What hast thou seen ?

Boy. Nought but a sad confusion

Every thing left in such a loose disorder

That were there twenty theeves, they would be laden.

Lur. 'Tis very well, I likethy care, but 'tis strange

A wedding night should be so solitary.

Boy. Certainly there is some cause, some death or sickness

Is falln suddenly upon some friend,

Or some strange news is come.

Lur. Are they all a bed ?

Boy. I think so, and sound asleep, unless it be
Some women that keep watch in a low parlor,
And drink, and weep, I know not to what end.

Lur. Where's all the plate ?

Boy. Why lockt up in that room.

I saw the old Lady, ere she went to bed

Put up her plate, and some of the rich hangings

In a small long chest, and chains and rings are there too,
It stands close by the Table on a form.

Lur. 'Twas a good notice, didst thou see the men.

Boy. I saw them sad too, and all take their leaves,
But what they said I was too far to hear Sir.

Lur. 'Tis daintily discover'd, we shall certainly
Have a most prosperous night, which way ?

Boy. A close one,
A back door, that the women have left open,
To go in and out to fetch necessaries,
Close on the Garden side.

Lur. I love diligence,
Wert thou not fearful ?

Boy. Fearful ? I'll be hang'd first.

Lur. Say they had spied thee.

Boy. I was then determin'd

To have cry'd down right too, and have kept 'em company,
As one that had an interest in their sadness,
Or made an errand to I know not whom Sir.

Lur. My dainty Boy, let us discharge, that plate
Makes a perpetual motion in my fingers,
Till I have fast hold of it.

Boy. Pray be wise Sir, do't handsomly, be not greedy,
Lets handle it with such an excellence
As if we would bring thieving into honor :
We must disguise, to fright these reverend wathces.

Lur. Still my blest Boy.

Boy. And clear the room of drunken jealousies,
The chest is of some weight, and we may make Such noise ith'the carriage we may be snap'd.

Lur. Come open, here's a devils face.

Boy. No, no, Sir, wee'l have no shape so terrible,
We will not do the devil so much pleasure,
To have him face our plot.

Lur. A winding sheet then.

Boy. That's too cold a shift,

I would not wear the reward of my wickedness,
I wonder you are an old thief, and no cunninger,
Where's the long Cloak ?

Lur. Here, here.

Boy. Give me the Turbant

And the false beard, I hear some coming this way,
Stoop, stoop, and let me sit upon your shoulders,
And now as I direct, stay, let them enter,
And when I touch move forward, make no noise.

Enter Nurse and Tobie.

Nur. Oh 'tis a sad time, all the burnt wine is burnt
Nic.

Tob. We may thank your drychaps for't, the Canarie's gone too

No substance for a sorrowful mind to work upon,
I cannot mourn in beer, if she should walk now
As discontented spirits are wont to do.

Nur. And meet us in the Cellar.

Tob. What fence have we with single beer against her ?
What heart can we desie the Devil with ?

Nur. The March' beer's open.

Tob. A fortification of March beer will do well,
I must confess 'tis a most mighty Armour,
For I presume I cannot pray.

Nur. Why Nicolas ?

Tob. We Coachmen have such tumbling faiths, no prayers
Can go an even pace.

Nur. Hold up your candle

Tob. Verily Nurse, I have cry'd so much
For my young Mistriss, that is mortified,
That if I have not more sack to support me,
I shall even sleep: heihö, for another slagon;
These Burials, and Christnings are the mournful matters,
And they ask more drink.

Nur. Drink to a sad heart's needful.

To. Mine's ever sad, for I am ever dry Nurse.

Nur. Methinks the light burns blew, I prethee snuff it,
There's a thief in't I think.

To. There may be one near it.

Nur. What's that that moves there, ith' name of—Nicholas ?

That thing that walks.

To. Would I had a Ladder to behold it,
Mercy upon me, the Ghost of one oth' Guard sure,
'Tis the devil by his clawes, he finels of Brimstone,
Sure he farts fire, what an Earth-quake I have in me;
Out with thy Prayer-book Nurse.

Nur. It fell ith' the frying pan, and the Cat's eat it.

Tob. I have no power to pray, it grows still onger,
'Tis Steeple high now, and it sayls away Nurse.

Lets call the butler up, for he speaks Latine,
And that will daunt the devil: I am blasted,
My belly's grown to nothing.

Nur. Fye, fye, Tobie.

Exit.

Boy. So let them go, and whilst they are astonish'd
Let us presently upon the rest now suddenly.

Lur. Off, off, and up agen, when we are near the parlor,
Art sure thou knowst the Chest ?

Boy. Though it were ith'dark Sir,
I can go to't.

Lur. On then and be happy.

Exit.

Enter Tobie.

Tob. How my haunches quake, is the thing here still ?
Now can I out-do any Button-maker, at his own trade,
I have fifteen fits of an Ague, Nurse, 'tis gone I hope,
The hard-hearted woman has left me alone. Nurse—
And she knows too I ha but a lean conscience to keep me company.

Noise within.

The devil's among 'em in the Parlour sure,
The Ghost three stories high, he has the Nurse sure,
He is boyling of her bones now, hark how she whistles :
There's Gentlewomen within too, how will they do ?
I'll to the Cook, for he was drunk last night,
And now he is valiant, he is a kin to th'devil too,
And fears no fire.

Enter Lurcher and Boy.

Lur. No light ?

Boy. None left Sir,

They

They are gone, and carried all the candles with 'em,
Their fright is infinite, let's make good use on't,
We must be quick sir, quick, or the house will rise else.

Lur. Was this the Chest?

Boy. Yes, yes.

Lur. There was two of 'em.

Or I mistake.

Boy. I know the right, no stay Sir,
Nor no discourse, but to our labor lustily,
Put to your strength and make as little noise,
Then presently out at the back door.

Lur. Come Boy.

Come happy child and let me hug thy excellence. Exit.

Enter Wildbrain.

Wil. What thousand noises pass through all the rooms?
What cries and hurries? sure the devil's drunk.
And tumbles through the house, my villainies
That never made me apprehend before
Danger or fear, a little now molest me;
My Cofens death sits heavy o'my conscience,
Would I had been half hang'd when I hammer'd it.
I aim'd at a living divorce, not a burial
That Frank might have had some hope: hark still
In every room confusion, they are all mad,
Most certain all stark mad within the house,
A punishment inflicted for my lewdness,
That I might have the more sense of my mischief,
And run the more mad too, my Aunt is hang'd sure,
Sure hang'd her self, or else the fiend has fetch'd her.
I heard a hundred cries, the Devil, the Devil,
Than roaring, and then tumbling, all the chambers
Are a meer Babel, or another Bedlam.
What should I think? I shake my self too:
Can the Devil find no time, but when we are merry,
Here's something comes.

Enter Newlove.

New. Oh that I had some company,
I care not what they were, to ease my misery,
To comfort me.

Wil. Whose that?

New. Again? may then receive—

Wil. Hold, hold I am no fury.

The Merchants wife.

New. Are ye a man? pray heaven you be.

Wil. I am.

New. Alas I have met Sir
The strangest things to night.

Wil. Why do you stare.

New. Pray comfort me, and put your candle out,
For if I see the spirit again I dye for't.

And hold me fast, for I shall shake to pieces else.

Wil. I'll warrant you, I'll hold ye,
Hold ye as tenderly; I have put the light out,
Retire into my Chamber, there I'll watch wi'ye,
I'll keep you from all frights.

New. And will ye keep me.

Wil. Keep you as secure Lady.

New. You must not wrong me then, the devil will have us.

Wil. No, no, I'll love you, then the devil will fear us.
For he fears all that love, pray come in quickly,
For this is the malicious house he walks in,
The hour he blasts sweet faces, lames the limbs in,
Depraves the senses, now within this half hour
He will have power to turn all Citizens wives
Into strange Creatures, Owles, and long-tail'd Monkeys,
Jays, Pies, and Parrots, quickly, I smell his brimstone.

New. It comes agen I am gone shift for your self Sir. Exit.

Wil. Sure this whole night is nothing but illusion,
Here's nothing comes, all they are mad, damn'd devil
To drive her back again, 't had been thy policy

To have let us alone, we might have done some fine thing
To have made thy hel-hood laugh, 'tis a dainty wench,
If I had her again, not all your fellow goblins,
Nor all their claws should scratch her hence, I'll stay still,
May be her fright will bring her back again,
Yet I will hope.

Enter Toby.

Tob. I can find no bed, no body, nor no chamber,
Sure they are all ith' Cellar, and I cannot find that neither,
I am led up and down like a tame ass, my light's out
And I grope up and down like blind-man-buffe,
And break my face, and break my pate.

Wil. It comes again sure
I see the shadow, I'll have faster hold now,
Sure she is mad, I long to lye with a mad-woman,
She must needs have rare new tricks.

Tob. I hear one whisper
If it be the devil now to allure me into his clutches,
For devils have a kind of tone like crickets,
I have a glimpse of her guise, 'tis she would steal me,
But I'll stand sure.

Tob. I have but a dram of wit left,
And that's even ready to run, oh for my bed now.

Wil. She nam'd a bed, I like that, she repents sure,
Where is she now?

Tob. Who's that?

Wil. Are you there, In, In, In presently.

Tob. I feel his talents through me,
'Tis an old haggard devil, what will he do with me?

Wil. Let me kiss thee first, quick, quick.

Tob. A lecherous Devil.

Wil. What a hairy whore 'tis, sure she has a muffler.

Tob. If I should have a young Satan by him, for I dare not deny him,

In what case were I? who durst deliver me?

Wil. 'Tis but my fancy, she is the same, in quickly, gently my Sweet girl.

Tob. Sweet devil be good to me.

Exeunt.

Enter Lurch, and Boy.

Lur. Where's my love, Boy.

Boy. She's coming with a Candle

To see our happy prize.

Lur. I am cruel weary.

Boy. I cannot blame ye, plate is very heavy
To carry without light or help.

Lur. The fear too

At every stumble to be discover'd boy,
At every cough to raise a Constable,
Well, we'll be merry now.

Boy. We have some reason;
Things compass'd without fear or eminent danger,
Are too luxurious sir to live upon.
Money and wealth got thus are as full venture,
And carry in their nature as much merit
As his, that digs 'em out 'oth' mine, they last too
Season'd with doubts and dangers most deliciously,
Riches that fall upon us are too ripe,
And dull our appetites.

Lu. Most learned child.

Enter Mistrifs.

Mi. Y'are welcome, where have you left it.

Lu. In the next room, hard by.

Mi. Is it plate all.

Lu. All, all, and Jewels, I am monstrous weary,
Prethee let's go to bed.

Mi. Prethee let's see it first.

Lu. To morrow's a new day sweet.

Mi. Yes to melt it,

But let's agree to night, how it shall be handled,
I'll have a new gown.

Lur. 'Shat have any thing.

Mi. And such a riding suit as Mistress Newlover's:
What though I be no Gentlewoman born,
I hope I may achieve it by my carriage.

Lu. Thou sayst right.

Mi. You promis'd me a horse too, and a lackquay.

Lur. Thou shalt have horses six, and a postilion.

Mi. That will be stately sweet heart, a postilion.

Lu. Nay, we'll be in fashion; he shall ride before us
In winter, with as much dirt would dampe a musket;
The inside of our coach shall be of scarlet.

Mi. That will be dear.

Lu. There is a dye projecting
Will make it cheap, wench, come thou shalt have any thing.

Mi. Where is this chest, I long, sweet, to behold
Our Indies.

Boy. Mistress lets melt it first, and then 'tis fit
You should dispose it, then 'tis safe from danger.

Mi. I'll be a loving Mistress to my boy too.
Now fetch it in and lets rejoyce upon't.

Boy. Hold your light Mistress, we may see to enter.

Mi. Ha what's here? call you this a chest?

Boy. We ha mist Sir.

Our haste and want of light made us mistake.

Mi. A very Coffin.

Lu. How! a Coffin? Boy, 'tis very like one.

Boy. The devil ow'd us a shame, and now he has paid us.

Mi. Is this your Treasure?

Boy. Bury me alive in't.

Lu. It may be there is no room.

Mi. Nay, I will search it:

I'll see what wealth's within, — a womans face,
And a fair womans.

Boy. I cannot tell sir,
Belike this was the sadness that posses't 'em;
The plate stood next, I'm sure.

Lur. I shake, I shake Boy, what a cold sweat? —

Boy. This may work, what will become on's Sir?

Mi. She is cold, dead cold: de'e find' your conscience,
De'e bring your Gillians hither — nay, she's punish'd,
You conceal'd love's cas'd up?

Lur. 'Tis Maria, the very same, the Bride, new horror!

Mi. These are fine tricks, you hope she's in a sound
But I'll take order she shall ne'r recover
To bore my Nose, come, take her up and bury her
Quickly, or I'll cry out; take her up instantly.

Lu. Be not so hasty fool, that may undo us;
We may be in for murder so; be patient,
Thou see'st she's dead, and cannot injure thee.

Mi. I am sure she shall not.

Boy. Be not, Sir, dejected,
Too much a strange mistake! this had not been else,
It makes me almost weep to think upon't.

Lu. What an unlucky thief am I?

Mi. I'll no considering, either bestir your self, or —

Lu. Hold.

Mi. Let it not stay, to smell then, I will not Indure the stink of a Rival.

Lu. Would 'twere there again.

Boy. We must bury her.

Lur. But were o'th fudden, or with what providence,
That no eyes watch us.

Mi. Take a Spade and follow me,
The next fair ground we meet, make the Church-yard;
As I live, I'll see her lodg'd. Exit.

Lu. It must be so,

How heavy my heart is, I ha no life left.

Boy. I am past thinking too, no understanding,
That I should miss the right Chest.

Lu. The happy Chest.

Boy. That, which I saw and markt too.

Lu. Well passion wo'not help us,
Had I twenty falls for this?

Boy. 'Twas my fault sir.
And twenty thousand fears for this, oth'devil,
Now could I curse, well, we have her now,
And must dispose her.

Enter Mistress.

Mi. Hang both for two blind buzzards, here's a Spade
Quickly or I'll call the neighbors.
There's no remedy,
Would the poor hungry prisoners had this pastie. Exit.

Enter Justice, and a Servant with a light.

Ser. 'Twas a strange mischance Sir.

Ju. Mischance, sayst? No 'twas happiness to me,
There's so much charge sav'd, I have her portion,
I'll marry twenty more on such conditions.

Ser. Did it not trouble you Sir,
To see her dead?

Ju. Not much, I thank my conscience;
I was tormented till that happen'd, furies
Were in my brain to think my self a Cuckold
At that time of the night:

When I come home, I charge you shut my doors,
Locks, bolts, and bars, are little enough to secure me.

Ser. Why, and please you?

Ju. Fool to ask that question;
To keep out women, I expect her Mother
Will visit me with her clamors, oh I hate
Their noise, and do abhor the whole sex heartily;
They are all walking Devils, Harpyes: I will study
A week together how to rail sufficiently,
Upon 'em all, and that I may be furnish'd,
Thou shalt buy all the railing Books and Ballads,
That Malice hath invented against women,
I will read nothing else, and practise 'em,
Till I grow fat with curses.

Ser. If you'll go
To th'charge, let me alone to find you Books.

Ju. They come neer us

Ser. Whats that?

Ju. Where? hold up the Torch Knave.

Ser. Did you hear nothing, 'tis a —

Ju. Why dost make a stand?

Ser. Whats that?

Ju. Where, where, dost see any thing?
We are hard by the Church-yard, and I was never Valiant at midnight in such irksome places;
They say Ghosts walk sometimes, hark, de'e hear nothing?

Enter Lurcher, Boy, and Mistress.

Mi. No farther, dig here, and lay her in quickly.

Lur. What light is that Boy, we shall be discover'd;
Set the Coffin up an end, and get behind me,
There's no avoiding.

Boy. Oh!

Ju. Where's that groan? I begin to be afraid.

Ser. What shall we do Sir?

Ju. We are almost at home now, thou must go forward,
Perhaps 'twas my imagination.

Lur. 'Tis he?

Boy. I know him too, let me alone.

Ser. Oh Sir, a Ghost, the very Ghost of Mistress Bride,
I have no power to run away.

Ju. Cursed Ghost, bless me, preserve me,
I do command thee what so ere thou art,
I do conjure thee leave me; do not fright me;
If thou beest a devil vex me not so soon,
If thou beest.

The spirit of my wife.

Boy.

Boy. Thy Wife.

Ju. I shall be tormented.

Boy. Thy abus'd wife, that cannot peaceably
Enjoy her death, thou hast an evil conscience.

Ju. I know it

Boy. Among thy other sins which black thy soul,
Call to thy mind thy vow made to another,
Whom thou hast wrong'd, and make her satisfaction
Now I am dead, thou perjurd man: or else
A thousand black tormentors shall pursue thee,
Untill thou leap into eternal flames;
Where gold which thou ador'st here on earth
Melted, the fiends shall powre into thy throat;
For this time pass, go home and think upon me.

Lur. Away.

Scr. There are more spirits.

Ju. Thank you dear wife,
I'll bestow twenty nobles of a Tomb for thee,
Thou shalt not walk and catch cold after death.

They go Backward in.

Lu. So, so, they'r gone, 'twas my ingenious rascal:
But how dost thou know he made vows to another?

Boy. I over-heard the woman talk to night on't;
But now let's lose no time Sir, pray lets bury
This Gentlewoman, where's my Mistress?

Enter Mistress.

Mi. Here I durst not tarry.

Lu. We ha so cosen'd the old forty i'th hundred,
And the devil hinder him not, he'll go a pilgrimage;
But come, about our business, set her down again.

Mar. Oh!

Lur. She groans, ha.

Mar. Oh!

Lur. Again, she stirs.

Mi. Lets fly, or else we shall be torn in pieces.

Lur. And you be good at that, bury your self,
Or let the Sexton take ye for his fee,
Away boy.

Exit.

Mar. I am very cold, dead cold;
Where am I? What's this? a Coffin? where have I been?
Mercy defend me: Ha? I do remember
I was betray'd, and swoounded, my heart akes,
I am wondrous hungry too, dead bodies eat not;
Sure I was meant for burial, I am frozen;
Death, 'like a cake of Ice dwells round about me;
Darkness spreads o're the world too, where? what path?
Best providence direct me.

Exit.

Actus Tertius.

Enter Lady, Wildbraine, Women, Toby.

La. Thou art the most unfortunate fellow;

Wil. Why Aunt what have I done?

La. The most malicious varlet,
Thy wicked head never at rest, but hammering,
And haching hellish things, and to no purpose,
So thou mayst have thy base will.

Wi. Why do you rail thus?
Cannot a scurvy accident fall out,
But I must be at one end on't?

La. Thou art at both ends.

Wi. Cannot young fullen wenches play the fools
And marry, and dye, but I must be the agent?
All that I did (and if that be an injury,
Let the world judge it) was but to perswade her,
And (as I take it) I was bound to it too,
To make the reverend coxcombe her husband Cuckold:

What else could I advise her? was there harm i'this?
You are of years, and have run through experience,
Would you be content if you were young again,
To have a continual cough grow to your pillow?
A rottenness, that vaults are perfumes to;
Hang in your roof, and like a fog infect you?
Anointed hammes, to keep his hinges turning,
Reek ever in your nose, and twenty night caps,
With twenty several sweats?

To. Some Jew, some Justice,
A thousand heathen sinels to say truth Madam,
And would you mellow my young pretty Mistress
In such a mis-ken?

La. Sirra,
Where's the body of my Girl?

Wi. I know not,
I am no Conjurer, you may look the body,
I was like to be stol'n away my self, the Spirit
Had like to ha surpris'd me in the shape of a woman,
Of a young woman, and you know those are dangerous.

To. So had I Madam, simply though I stand here,
I had been ravish'd too: I had twenty Spirits,
In every corner of the house a Fiend met me.

La. You lye like Raskals,
Was Mistress Newlove such a spirit Sir?

To fright your worship;
Well, I discharge you Sir, y'are now at liberty,
Live where you please, and do what pranks you fancy,
You know your substance: though you are my Nephew,
I am no way bound Sir to protect your mischief;
So fare you well.

Wi. Farewell good Aunt, I thank you,
Adieu honest Nick, the devil if he have power,
Will persecute your old bones, for this Marriage,
Farewell Mistress Win.

To. And shall we part with dry lips?
Shall we that have been fellow devils together
Flinch for an old womans fart?

Wi. 'Tis a fine time a night too, but we must part Nick.

To. Shall we never ring again? ne're tofs the tenor,
And roul the changes into a Cup of Clarret?
You shall not want what ere I lay my hands on,
As I am sure Automedon the Coachman,
Shall be distributed; bear up, I say, hang sorrow,
Give me that bird abroad that lives at pleasure,
Sam the Butler's true, the Cook a reverend Trojan,
The Faulkner shall sell his Hawks, and swear they were rotten,

There be some wandring spoons, that may be met with,
I'll pawn a Coach horse, peace, utter no sentences.
The harshness shall be us'd in our wars also;
Or shall I drive her (tell me but your will now,
Say but the word) over some rotten bridg,
Or by a Marl-pit side, she may slip in daintily,
Let me alone for my self.

Wi. No, no, farewell Toby,
Farewell spiny Nicholas, no such thing,
There be ways i'the world, if you see me
A day or two hence, may be wee'l crack a quart yet,
And pull a bell, commend to the household;
Nay, cry not Toby, 'twill make thy head giddy.

To. Sweet Master Wildbraine.

Wi. No more Toby, go the times may alter——
But where's the coarse of my dead cosen,
(If she be dead) I hop'd 'thad but dissembled
That sits heavy here: Toby, honest Toby,
Lend me thy Lanthorn, I forgot 'twas dark,
I had need look to my ways now.

To. Take a lodging with me to night in the Stable,
And ride away to morrow with one of the horses,
Next your heart, pray do.

Wi. No, good night good neighbor Toby, I will wander,
I scorn to submit my self, ere I have rambled,
But whither, or with what, that's more material;

No matter, and the worst come, it is but stealing,
And my Aunt wo't see me hang'd for her own credit,
And farewell in a Halter costs me nothing. Exit

Enter Hartlove.

Fran. The night, and all the evil the night covers,
The Goblins, Hags, and the black spawn of darkness,
Cannot fright me: no death, I dare thy cruelty.
For I am weary both of life and light too;
Keep my wits heaven, they say spirits appear
To melancholy minds, and the graves open,
I would fain see the fair Maria's shadow,
But speak unto her spirit e'er I dyed,
But ask upon my knees a mercy from her;
I was a villain, but her wretched kinsman,
That set his plot, shall with his heart-blood satisfy
Her injur'd life and honor, what light's this?

Enter Wildbrain with a Lanthorn.

Wild. It is but melancholy walking thus;
The Tavern doors are baracado'd too,
Where I might drink till morn in expectation;
I cannot meet the Watch neither; nothing in
The likeness of a Constable, whom I might,
In my distress, abuse, and so be carried,
For want of other lodging, to the Counter.

Fra. 'Tis his voice, Fate, I thank thee.

Wild: Ha, who's that, and thou be'st a man speak?

Frank Hartlove, then I bear my destinies,
Thou art the man of all the world I wish'd for;
My Aunt has turn'd me out a doors, she has,
At this unchristian hour, and I do walk,
Methinks like Guido Faux with my dark Lanthorn,
Stealing to set the Town a fire; i' th' Countrey
I should be tane for William o' the Wispe,
Or: Robin Good-fellow, and how dost Frank?

Ha. The worse for you.

Wild. Come, thart a fool, art going to thy lodging?
I'll lie with thee to night, and tell thee stories,
How many devils we ha met withal;
Our house is haunted Frank, whole legions,
I saw fifty for my share.

Fr. Didst not fright 'em?

Wild. How; fright 'em? no, they frighted me sufficiently.

Fr. Thou hadst wickedness enough to make them stare,
And be afraid o'thee, malicious devil;
And draw thy sword, for by Maria's soul;
I will not let thee scape to do more mischief.

Wild. Thou art mad, what dost mean?

Fr. To kill thee, nothing else will ease my anger,
The injury is fresh, I bleed withal,
Nor can that word express it, theres no peace in't,
Nor must it be forgiven, but in death;
Therefore call up thy valour, if thou'st any.
And summon up thy spirits to defend thee;
Thy heart must suffer for thy damn'd practises,
Against thy noble cosin, and my innocence.

Wild. Hold, hear a word; did I do anything
But for your good, that you might have her,
That in that desperate time I might redeem her,
Although with shew of loss.

Fr. Out ugly villain,
Fling on her the most hated name of whore
To the worlds eye, and face it out in courtesie,
Bring him to see't, and make me drunk to attempt it.

Enter Maria.

Ma. I hear some voices this way.

Fr. No more, if you can pray, do it as you fight.

Ma. What new frights oppose me? I have heard that tongue

Wild. 'Tis my fortune.

You could not take me in a better time, Sir,
I ha nothing to lose but the love I lent thee,
My life my sword protect.

Ma. I know 'em both, but to prevent their ruines,
Must not discover —— stay men most desperate;
The mischief you are forward to commit
Will keep me from my grave, and tie my spirit
To endless troubles else.

Wild. Ha, 'tis her Ghost.

Fr. Maria?

Ma. Hear me both, each wound you make
Runs through my soul, and is a new death to me,
Each threatening danger will affright my rest;
Look on me Hartlove, and my kinsman view me;
Was I not late in my unhappy marriage,
Sufficient miserable? full of all misfortunes?
But you must add, with your most impious angers,
Unto my sleeping dust this insolence?

Would you teach time to speak eternally
Of my disgraces; make Records to keep 'em,
Keep them in brass? fight then, and kill my honor;
Fight deadly both, and let your bloody swords,
Through my reviv'd, and reeking infamy
(That never shall be purg'd) find your own ruines:
Hartlove, I lov'd thee once, and hop'd again
In a more blessed love to meet thy spirit,
If thou kill'st him, thou art a murderer,
And murder shall never inherit heaven:
My time is come, my concealed grave expects me,
Farewel, and follow not, your feet are bloody,
And will pollute my peace: I hope they are melted,
This is my way sure

Exit.

Fr. Stay blessed soul.

Wi. Would she had come sooner, and ha sav'd some blood.

Fr. Dost bleed?

Wild. Yes certainly, I can both see and feel it.

Fr. Now I well hope it is not dangerous;
Give me thy hand, as honor guides me,
I'll know thee again.

Wild. I thank thee heartily;
I know not where to get a Surgeon;
This vision troubles me, sure she is living,
And I was foolish blind, I could not find it;
I bleed apace still, and my heart grows heavy,
If I go far I faint, I'll knock at this house,
They may be charitable, would 'twere perfect day.

Enter Mistress.

Mist. 'Tis not he: What would you, Sir?

Wild. I would crave a little rest Lady,
And for my hurts some Surgerie, I am a Gentleman
That fortune of a fight

Mist. A handsome Gentleman,
Alas he bleeds, a very handsome Gentleman,
Wild. A sweet young wench, beshrew my heart a fair one,
Fortune has made me some recompence,

Mist. Pray come in, the air is hurtful for you,
Pray let me lead you, I'll have a bed for you presently,
I'll be your Surgeon too, alas sweet Gentleman,

Wild. I feel no hurts, the morning comes too fast now.

Mist. Softly, I beseech you.

Exit.

Enter Lady and Toby.

Tob. He is not up yet Madam, what meant you
To come forth so early?

La. You blockhead;
Your eyes are sow'd up still, they cannot see
When it is day: oh my poor Maria;
Where be the women?

Tob. They said they would follow us.

La. He shall not laugh thus at my misery,
And kill my child, and steal away her body,

And keep her portion too.

Tob. Let him be hang'd for't,
You have my voice.

La. These women not come yet?
A Son-in-law, I'll keep a Conjurer,
But I'll find out his knavery.

Tob. Do, and I'll help him.
And if he were here, this whip should conjure him,
Here's a Capias, and it catch hold on's breech,
P'ce make him soon believe the Devil were there.

La. An old Usurer.

Tob. He married the money, that's all he lookt for;
For your daughter, let her sink or swim.

La. I'll swim him;
This is his house, I wonder they stay thus,
That we might rail him out on's wits.

Tob. They'll come,
Fear not Madam, and bring clappers with 'em,
Or some have lost their old wont, I have heard,
No disparagement to your Ladyship, some o' their tongues
Like Tom-a-Lincoln, three miles off.

La. Oh sic,
How tedious are they?

Tob. What and we lost no time,
You and I shall make a shift to begin with him,
And tune our Instruments till the Comfort come
To make up the full noise, I'll knock.

Ju. Who's that rapt so saucily?

Tob. 'Tis I, Toby, come down, or else we'll fetch you down,
Alas, this is but the Saints-bell, here's a Gentlewoman
Will ring you another peal, come down, I say.

Ju. Some new fortifications, look to my doors,
Put double barrs, I will not have her enter,
Nor any of her Tribe, they come to terrifie me:
Keep out her tongue too, if you can.

La. I hear you,
And I will send my tongue up to your worship,
The eccho of it shall flye o'er the street;
My Daughter that thou killedst with kindness (Jew)
That thou betrayedst to death, thou double Jew,
And after stol'st her body.

Tob. Jew's too good for him,

Ju. I desie you both;
Thy daughter plaid the villain and betraid me.
Betrai'd my honor.

La. Honor, Rascal,
And let that bear an action, I'll try it with thee,
Horor?

Tob. Oh Reprobate!

La. Thou musty Justice,
Buy an honourable halter and hang thy self.

Tob. A worshipping ropes end is too good for him.

La. Get honor that way, thou wot die a dog else.

Tob. Come and be whipt first.

La. Where is her Portion.

Enter Nurse and Women.

Ju. Where I'll keep it safely.

Nur. Traitor, thou shalt not keep it.

Ju. More of the kennel? put more bolts to th' doors there,
And arm your selves, hell is broke loose upon us.

Tob. I am glad y'are come, we'll blow the house down.

La. Oh Nurse, I have such cause——

Wo. Villain, viper, although you had no cause, we are bound
To help.

Nur. Yes, and believe, we come not here to examine,
And if you please we'll fire the house

Ju. Call the Constable.

Tob. A charitable motion, fire is comfortable.

La. No, no, we'll only let him know our minds,
We will commit no outrage, he's a Lawyer,

Ju. Give me my Musket.

La. Where's my daughters body,

That I may bury it?

Wo. Speak, or we'll bury thee,

Nur. Alive, we'll bury thee, speak old Iniquity.

Tob. Bury him alive by all means for a testimony.

Ju. Their voices make my house reel, oh for Officers,
I am in a dream, thy daughters spirit
Wa'ks a nights, and troubles all the neighbors:
Go hire a Conjurer, I'll say no more.

La. The Law shall say more,

Wo. Nur. We are witnesses,
And if thou be'st not hang'd ——

Enter Lurcher and Boy.

Lur. Buy a Book of good manners,
A short Book of good manners.

Boy. Buy a ballad, a ballad of the maid was got with child

Tob. That might ha been my case last night,
I'll ha't, what e'er it cost me.

Boy. A ballad of the Witches hang'd at Ludlow.

Tob. I will have that too;
There was an Aunt of mine. I think amongst 'em,
I would be glad to hear her Testament.

Lur. A new Eook of Women,

Ju. The thunder's laid, how they stare at him

Lur. A new Eook of Fools, a strange Book,
Very strange fools.

Ju. I'll owe thee a good turn, whate'er thou art.

Lur. A Book of Walking Spirits.

Ju. That I like not.

Tob. Nor I, they walk'd me the Fools Morris.

Lur. A Book of Wicked Women.

Ju. That's well thought on.

Dur. Of rude, malicious Women, of proud Women,
Of scolding Women, we shall ne'er get in.

Boy. A ballad of wrong'd Maids.

La. I'll buy that.

Lur. A little, very little Book,
Of good and godly Women, a very little one,
So little you may put it in a Nutshel.

Tob. With a small print that no body can read it.

Nur. Peace firrah, or I'll tear your Books.

Ju. Open the door and let him in, I love him.

Lur. A Book of evil Magistrates.

La. I marry d'ye hear that Justice.

Lur. And their eviller wives,
That wear their Places in their Petticoats.

Ju. D'ye hear that Lady.

Boy. A Eook new printed against Playing,
Dancing, Masking, May-poles; a zealous Brothers Book,
And full of Fables.

Lur. Another Book of Women, of mad women,
Women that were born in March.

Exit.

La. Are you got in?

We would ha pull'd your knaves hide else; this fellow
Was sent to abuse us, but we shall have time
To talk more with this Justice.

Ju. Farewel Madam, as you like this, come visit me agen,
You and your treble strings, now scold your hearts out——

Wo. Shall he carry it thus away?

Nur. Go to the Judge, and what you'll have us swear——

La. I thank ye heartily,
I'll keep that for the last, I will go home,
And leave him to his Conscience for a while,
If it sleep long, I'll wake it with a vengeance.

Exit.

Enter Servants.

1. What book has he given thee?

2. A dainty book, a book of the great Navy,
Of fifteen hundred ships of Cannon-proof,
Built upon Whales to keep their keels from sinking:
And Dragons in 'em, that spit fire ten mile;
And Elephants that carry goodly Castles.

1. Dost thou believe it?
2. Shall we not believe Books in print?
 1. I have John Taylors book of Hempseed too, Which for two lines I hapned on by chance, I reverence.
 2. I prethee what are they?
 1. They are so pat upon the time, as if He studied to answer the late Histrionastix, Talking of change and transformations, That wittily, and learnedly he bangs him, So many a Puritans ruff, though starch'd in print, Be turn'd to Paper, and a Playwrit in't And confute Horace with a Water Poet: A Play in the Puritans ruff? I'll buy his Works for't, What hast there a Ballad too?
 2. This is a piece of Poetry indeed;

He sings; Justice cries within.

What noise is that?

1. Some cry i th' streets; prethee sing on. Sing again.
2. Agen, dost not hear? 'tis i th' house certainly?
1. 'Tis a strange noise? and has a tang o th' Justice.
2. Let's see? Exit.

Enter the Servants bringing in their Master bound and gagg'd.

1. Untie his feet, pull out his gag, he will choak else; What desperate rogues were these.

2. Give him fresh air.

Ju. I will never study books more: I am undone, these villains have undone me. Rifled my Desk, they have undone me learnedly: A fire take all their Books, I'll burn my Study: Where were you rascals when the villains bound me, You could not hear?

1. He gave us Books, Sir, dainty Books to busie us; And we were reading, in that which was the Brew-house; A great way off, we were singing Ballads too; And could not hear

Ju. This was a precious thief, A subtle trick to keep my servants safe.

2. What ha you lost Sir?

Ju. They ransack'd all before my face, and threatned To kill me if I cough'd, they have a chain, My rings, my box of casting gold, my purse too. They robb'd me miserably; but that which most grieves me, They took away some Writings; 'twas a rogue That knew me, and set on by the old Lady, I will indite her for't.

1. Shall we pursue 'em?

Ju. Run, run, cursed raskals, I am out of my wits, let not a creature in, No not with necessaries.

2. We shall be starv'd.

Ju. I'll buy my meat at window as they pass by; I wo'nt trust my Scrivenor, he has books too; And bread I'll ha slung up; I charge ye all Burn all the books i th' house.

1. Your little Prayer Book?

Ju. I'll never pray agen, I'll have my doors Made up, nothing but walls, and thick ones too; No sound shall tempt me agen, remember I Have forswore books,

2. If you should be call'd to take your oath?

Ju. I will forswear all oaths, rather than see A thing but in the likeness of a book: And I were condemn'd, I'll rather chuse to hang, Than read agen; come in, and search all places, They may be about the house, were the doors lock'd?

1. But the keys in 'em, and if they be gone, They could not want wit to lock us in, Sir,

Ju. Never was a man so miserably undone, I would lose a limb, to see their rogueships totter.

Exeunt.

Enter Lady and Nurse.

La. Thy brothers daughter, saist, and born in Wales?

Nur. I have long time desired to see her, and I hope Your Ladyship will not be offended.

La. No, no.

Nur. I should be happy, if she might be serviceable To you Madam.

La. Beshrew me, but at first, she took me much, Is she not like Maria? setting aside Her language very like her, and I love her The better for't, I prethee call her hither, She speaks feat English.

Nur. Why Guennib, Guennib, du hummah Guennib. She is course Madam, after her countrey guise, And were she in fine cloths——

La. I'll have her handsome:

Enter Maria.

What part of Wales were you born in?

Ma. In Abebundis Madam.

Nur. She speaks that name in Welsh, which we call Breck-

La. What can you do? (nock.

Ma. Her was toe many rings in Walls, know not the falhion in Londons? her was milk the Cows, make secze and butters, and spin very well the Welsh freeze, her was Cooke to te Mountain Cots, and sing very fine prittish tunes, was mage good ales and breds, and her know to dance on Sundays, marge you now Madams.

La. A pretty innocence, I do like her infinitely, Nurse, And if I live——

Enter Servant.

Ser. Here is Mr. Hartlove, Madam, come to see you.

La. Alas poor Gentleman, prethee admit him.

Enter Hartlove and Gent.

Ha. Madam, I am come to take my last leave.

La. How Sir?

Ha. Of all my home affections, and my friends, For the interest you had once in Maria, I would acquaint you when I leave the kingdom.

La. Would there were any thing in my poor power That might divert your Will, and make you happy; I am sure I have wrong'd her too, but let your pardon Assure me you are charitable; she's dead Which makes us both sad: What do you look on? The likest face——

Ma. Plesse us awle, why does that sentilman make such unders and mazements at her, I know her not.

Ha. Be not offended maid. (to him.

La. How the wench blushes, she represents Marias los

Ma. Will the sentilman hurt her? pray you be her defences, was have mad phisnomies, is her troubled with Lunaticks in her prain pans, blefs us awle.

Ha. Where had you this face?

Ma. Her faces be our none, I warrant her.

Ha. I wonot hurt you, all the lineaments That built Maria up; all those springing beauties Dwell on this thing, change but her tongue I know her: Let me see your hand.

Ma. Du Guin. was never thieves, and robberies; here is no findge in her hands warrant her.

Ha. Trust me, the self same white, And softness, prethee speak our English Dialect.

Ma. Ha leggs? what does her speage hard urds to her, to make poor Guennib ridicles, was no mannerly sentilman to abuse her.

Ha. By the love, That everlasting love I bear Maria——

Ma. Maria, her name was Guenith, and good names, was poor else, oman maid, her have no fine kanags to madge her trickfic in her own cuntries was held a fine ense her can tels her, and honest ense too, marg you dat now, her can keep her little legs close enough, warrant her.

La. How prettily this anger shews.

1. She gabbles innocently.

Ha. Madam farewell, and all good fortune dwell we'e, With me my own affections; farewell Maid, Fair gentle Maid.

2. She sighs.

Ma. Du cat a whee.

Ha. I cannot goe, there's somewhat calls me back.

Ma. Poor Fränke,

How gladly would I entertain thy love, And meet thy worthy flame, but shame forbids, me: If please her Ladyship dwell here with Guenneth, and learn to spinn and card ull, to mage flannells, and linsfeyes ulseis, fall tawgco'd urds to her Ladyships urships for her.

The tears flow from him.

The tears of true affection, woe is me, Oh cursed love that glories in maids miseries, And true mens broken hearts. (forgive her.)

La. Alas I pity him, the wench is rude, and knows you not,

Ma. Wype your nyes yray you, though was porn in Walls 'mong craggy rocks, and mountains, yet heart is soft, look you hur can weep too, when hur see men mage prinie tears and lamentations.

Ha. How hard she holds me?

Just as Maria did, weeps the same drops, Now as I have a living soul, her sight too; What shall I think, is not your name Maria, If it be not, delude me with so much charity To say it is.

Ma. Upon her life, you was mighty deal in love with some podies, your pale seekes and hollow nyes, and pantings upon her posom, know very well, because look you, her think her honest sentilman, you fall call her Maria.

Ha. Good Madam, think not ill I am thus fancy,

La. Oh no Sir, be you not angry with the wench.

Ha. I am most pleas'd.

1. Lets interrupt him, he'll be mad outright else.

2. Observe a little more.

Ha. Would I could in your language beg a kifs,

Ma. If her have necessities of a kifs, look you, dere is one in farities.

Ha. Let me suffer death,

If in my apprehension two twinn'd cherries Be more a kinn, than her lips to Maria's: And if this harsh illusion would but leave her, She were the same, good Madam, shall I have Your consent now?

La. To what?

Ha. To give this Virgin to me.

La. She's not mine, this is her kinswoman, And has more power to dispose; alas, I pity him. Pray gentleman prevail with him to goe; More that I wish his comfort than his absence.

Ha. You have been always kind to me, will you Deny me your fair Cosin?

Nu. 'Twere fit you first obtain'd her own consent.

Ha. She is no friend that wishes my departure, I doe not trouble you.

1. 'Tis not Maria.

Ha. Her shadow is enough, I'll dwell with that, Pursue your own ways, shall we live together?

Ma. If her will come to morrow and tauge to her, her will tell her more of her meanings, and then if her be melancholy, her will sing her a Welch Song too, to make her merries, but Guenith was very honest; her was never love bnt one sentleman, and he was bear her great teal of good-ills too, was marry one day S. Davy, her give her five pair of white gloves, if her will dance at her weddings.

Ha. All I am worth,

And all my hopes this strange voice would forsake her, For then she snud be——prethee stay a little,

Hark in thine ear, dissemble not, but tell me, And save my life; I know you are Maria: Speak but as I doe, ten words to confirm me; You have an English soul, do not disguise it From me with these strange accents—She pinch'd hard Again, and sigh'd.

La. What ails the Wench?

Exit.

Nu. Why, Guenith.

Ha. She's gone too.

2. Come leave this dream.

Ha. A dream? I think so;

But 'twas a pleasing one, now I'll obey, And forget all these wonders, lead the way.

Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Wildbrain and Toby.

Wil. Honest Toby?

To. Sweet Mr. Wildbrain,—I am glad I ha met

Wild. Why, did my Aunt send for me?

(w'ye

Tob. Your Aunt's a mortal, and thinks not on you For ought I can perceive.

Wild. Is my cosin alive agen?

Tob. Neither, and yet we do not hear That she's buried.

Wild. What should make thee glad then?

Tob. What should make me glad? have I not cause, To see your Princely body well, and walk thus, Look blithe and bonny, and your Wardrobe whole still?

Wild. The case is clear, and I ha found a Mine, A perfect Indie, since my Aunt cashier'd me; What think'st of this?

Tob. Oh delicate bells.

Wild. Thou puttest me in mind, We are to ring anon, I mean to send for thee; Meet me at the old Parish Church.

Tob. Say no more.

Wild. When thy Lady is a bed, we ha conspir'd A midnight peal for joy.

Tob. If I fail, hang me i'th' bell-ropes.

Wild. And how? and how does my Aunt?

Tob. She's up to th' ears in Law;

I do so whirl her to the Counsellors chambers, And back again, and bounce her for more money, And too again, I know not what they do with her; But she's the merriest thing among these Law-drivers; And in their studies half a day together; If they do get her with Magna Charta, she swears, By all the ability of her old body, She will so claw the Justice, she will sell The tiles of the house she vows, and Sack out o'th' Cellar, (That she worships to Idolatry) but she'll hang him.

Wild. I would she could: but hark thee honest Toby. If a man have a Mistrifs, may we not, Without my Aunts leave, borrow now and then A Coach to tumble in, towards the Exchange, And so forth?

Tob. A Mistrifs?

Wil. She may be thine when we are married.

Tob. Command, I'll carry you both in pomp; And let my Lady go a foot a Law-catching, And exercise her corns: where is the Master John?

Wild. 'Shat see her.

Tob. Shall we ring for her?

Wild. And drink her health?

Tob. Drink stilly for five hours.

Wild. We'll drink fifteen.

Tob.

Tob. To night? we will ha twenty Torches then,
And through the streets drive on triumphantly;
Triumphantly we'll drive, by my Ladies door,
As I am a Christian, Coachman, I will rattle you
And Urine in her porch, and she shall fear me:
If you say more, I shall run mad outright,
I will drink Sack, and surfeit instantly;
I know not where I am now.

Exit,

Enter Lurcher.

Wi. Hold for thy buttons sake, the knave's transported.

Lur. Jack Wildbrain? (thee now?)

Wild. Honest Tom, how thrives the felonious world with

Lur. You look and talk as you were much exalted.

Wild. Th'art i'th' right Tom. I'll tell thee first,
I ha shook off my Aunt, and yet I live still,
And drink, and sing; her house had like to ha spoil'd me;
I keep no hours now;
Nor need any false key

To the old womans Cabinets, I ha money
Upon my word, and pawn no oaths to th' Butler.

No matrimonial protestations
For Sack-pollsets to the Chambermaid,
I praise my Fate, there be more ways to th' wood Tom.

Lur. Prethee release my wonder.

Wild. I'll increase it, wipe thine eyes,
Here is a chain worth money, and some man had it,
A foolist Diamond, and other trifles——

Lur. The very same, Oh Gipsy! Infidel!
All that I sweat, and ventur'd my neck for,
He has got already; who would trust a strumpet:

Wild. This? This is nothing to what I possess
At home.

Lur. What home?

Wild. A house that shall be nameless;
The Mistris of it mine too, such a piece
For flesh and blood, added to that so loving——

Lur. Is she married?

Wild. I know not, nor I care not;
But such a prize, so mounting, so delicious,
Thou wilt run mad, I'll tell thee more hereafter,

Lur. Nay, prethee a word more.

Wild. I took no pains to find out all this Paradise,
My destiny threw me upon't i'th' dark, I found it
Wanting a Lodging too.

Lur. No old acquaintance?

Wild. Never, never saw her;
But these things happen not in every age:
I cannot stay, if thou wilt meet anon
At my own randevow, thou knowest the Tavern,
We'll sup together, after that a company
Of merry lads have made a match to ring.

Lur. You keep your exercise, i'th' old Church?

Wild. No other,
There is no Musick to the Bells, we wo'd
Have Bonfires if we durst, and thou wo'd come
It shall cost thee nothing Tom, hang pilfering,
And keep me company, in time I may
Shew thee my wench too.

Lur. I cannot promise; but you will be there?

Wild. We'll tofs the Bells, and make the Steeple
Roar boy, but come to supper then.

Lur. My hand, and expect me:

Yes, I will come or send, and to some purpose;
Art come boy?

Enter Boy with Gown, Beard, and Constables staff.

Excellent, Knave, how didst thou purchase these?

Boy. The staff I stole last night from a sleeping Con-
The rest I borrowed by my acquaintance with (stable;
The Players boyes; you were best to lose no time, Sir.

Lur. So, so, help boy, 'tis very well, do I not look Like one that breaks the Kings peace with authority?

You know your charge, prepare things handfomely,
My diligent boy, and leave me to my office,

Boy. There wants nothing already; but I fly Sir. Exit.

Lur. Now Fortune prove no flut, and I'll adore thee.

Within. Ser. Whose there? Knocks.

Lur. A friend wo'd speak with Master Justice.

Ser. Who are you?

Lur. I am the Constable.

Ser. My Master is not at leasure to hear business.

Lur. How? Not at leasure to do the King service;
Take heed what you say, Sir; I know his worship,
if he know my business, would no excuse.

Ser. You must go to another Justice, I'll assure
My Master is not well in health.

Lur. I know not,

But if your worshipful be not at leasure
To do himself a benefit, I am gone Sir,
An infinite benefit, and the State shall thank him for't;
Thank him, and think on him too; I am an Officer.

And know my place, but I do love the Justice;

I honor any authority above me:

Beside, he is my neighbor, and I worship him.
Ser. You have no Books, nor Ballads, Mr Constable,
About you?

Lur. What should I doe with Books? does it become

A man of my place to understand such matters?

Pray call your Master, if he please to follow me,

I shall discover to him such a plot,

Shall get him everlasting fame, I'll be hang'd for't,

And he be not knighted instantly, and for reward

Have some of the malefactors Lands, I'll bring him too;

But I cannot delay time. Within.

Ju. Who's that?

Ser. A Constable Sir, would speak about some business,
He says will bring you Fame, and mighty profit.

Lur. Please your worship come down, I'll make you happy;

The notabl'st piece of villany I have in hand Sir,

And you shall find it out; I ha made choice

To bring your worship to the first knowledge, and

Thank me, as you find the good on't afterwards.

Ju. What is it? Treason?

Lur. 'Tis little better, I can tell you I have lodg'd

A crew of the most rank and desperate villains:

They talk of robberies and waies they did 'em;

And how they left men bound iu their studies.

Ju. With Books and Ballads?

Lur. That Sir, that, and murders,

And thousand knaveries more, they're very rich Sir,

In Money, Jewels, Chains, and a hundred more

Devices.

Ju. Happy, happy Constable, I meet ye

At the back door, get ready knaves.

Lur. Not a man I beseech you,

I have privately appointed strength about me,

They cannot start, your men would breed suspicion;

All my desire is, you would come alone;

That you might have the hope of the enterprife,

That you might hear 'em first, and then proceed, Sir,

Ju. I come, I come.

Lur. 'Tis very well. Exit.

Ju. Keep all my doors fast, 'tis something late.

Lur. So, so, and please your worship I direct you.

Enter Boy.

Boy. My Master staves, I doubt his lime-twigs catch not,
if they doe, all's provided; but I all

This while forget my own state, fair Maria

Is certainly alive, I met her in Another habit, with her Nurse, 'twas she:

There is some trick in't, but when this is over,

I'll find it out, this project for the Usurer

May have good effect; however, 'twill be sport

To mortifie him a little;

Enter

Enter Lurcher.

He's come without him :
Have you fail'd, Sir ?

Lur. Prosper'd? my little Engineer; away,
He is i'th' next room, be not you seen, firrah.

Boy. The pitfall's ready, never Justice
Was catcht in such a nooze: e'er he get out,
He shall run through a scouring purgatory,
Shall purge him to the quick, 'tis night already. Exit.

Enter Algripe and Lurcher.

Lur. Come softly, yet Sir, softly, are you not weary?

Ju. Th'ast brought me into a melancholy place,
I see no creature.

Lur. This is, Sir, their Den
Where they suppose themselves secure, I am faint,
With making haste; but I must be thus troubled,
And therefore never go without a Cordial;
Without this I should dye; } Seems to
How it refreshes me } drink.
Already? will't please your worship? I might have had
The manners to ha'. let you drink before me;
Now am I lusty.

Ju. 'Twas a good taste.

Lur. Taste? how d'ye find the virtue, nay Sir, spare it not:
My wife has the Receipt, does it not stir
Your Worships body? when you come to examine,
'Twill make you speak like thunder.

Ju. Hoy he.

Lur. It works already.

Ju. Is there never a chair, I was wearier than I thought,
But who shall we have to take 'em. Mr. Constable?

Lur. Let me alone, when I but give the watch-word
We will have men enough to surprize an Army.

Ju. I begin to be sleepy; what, hast a chair?

Enter another with a chair.

Lur. They do not dream of us, 'tis early rising;
Care, care, and early rising, Common-wealths men
Are ever subject to the nods; sit down, Sir,
A short nap is not much amiss; so, so, he's fast;
Fast as a fish i'th' net, he has winking powder
Shall work upon him to our wish, remove him,
Nay, we may cut him into collops now
And he ne'r feel; have you prepar'd the vault, firrah?

Boy. Yes, yes, Sir, every thing in's place.

Lur. When you have plac'd him, you and I boy
Must about another project hard by, his potion
Will bind him sure enough till we return,
This villany weighs mainly, But we'll purge ye. Exit.

Bells ring.

Enter Sexton.

Sex. Now for mine ears, mine ears be constant to me;
They ring a wager, and I must deal justly, ha boys.

Enter Lurcher and Boy.

Lur. Dost hear 'em, hark, these be the Ringers?

Boy. Are you sure the same?

Lur. Or my directions fail;
The coast is clear:

How the bells go? how daintily they tumble?
And methinks they seem to say; Fine fools I'll fit you.

Sex. Excellent agen, good boys—oh that was nought.

Lur. Who's that?

Boy. Be you conceal'd by any means yet, hark,
They stop, I hope they'll to't agen, close Sir.

Enter Wildbrain, Toby, Ringers.

Wild. A palpable knock.

Ring. 'Twas none.

To. Be judg'd by the Sexton then,
If I have ears.

Sex. A knock, a knock, a grofs one.

To. Carman, your gallon of wine, you ring most impiouly,
Art thou o'th' worshipful company of the Knights o'th West,
And handle a bell with no more dexterity?

You think you are in Thames-street
Juggling the Carts: oh a clean hand's a Jewel.

Boy. Good speed to your good exercise.

To. Y'are welcome

Boy. I come, Sir, from a Gentleman, and neighbor hard by,
One that loves your Musick well.

To. He may have more on't,
Handle a bell, as you were haling timber?

Grofs, grofs, and base, absurd.

Ring. I'll mend it next peal.

Boy. To intreat a knowledge of you, whether it be
By the Ear you ring thus cunningly, or by the Eye;
For to be plain, he has laid ten pounds upon't.

Wild. But which way has he laid?

Boy. That your Ear guides you,
And not your Eye.

To. Has won, has won, the Ear's our only instrument:

Boy. But how shall we be sure on't.

To. Put all the lights out, to what end serve our eyes then?

Wild. A plain Case,

Boy. You say true, 'tis a fine cunning thing to ring by th'
And can you ring i'th' dark so? (Ear sure:

Wild. All night long, boy.

Boy. 'Tis wonderful, let this be certain Gentlemen,
And half his wager he allows among ye;
Is't possible you should ring so?

To. Possible, thou art a child, I'll ring when I am dead drunk
Out with the lights, no twinkling of a candle,
I know my rope too, as I know my nose,
And can bang it soundly i'th' dark, I warrant you..

Wi. Come, let's confirm him straight, and win the wager. Ex.

Boy. Let me hear to strengthen me;
And when y'ave rung, I'll bring the money to you.

Lur. So, so, follow 'em;

They shall have a cool reward, one hath gold of mine,
Good store in's pocket,

But this will be reveng'd in a short warning.

They are at it lustily; hey, how wantonly
They ring away their cloaths, how it delights me;

Boy. Here, here, Sir. Ring.

Enter Boy with cloaths.

Lur. Hast Wildbrain's?

Boy. His whole case, Sir; I felt it out, and by the guards
This should be the Coachmans, another suit too.

Lur. Away boy, quickly now to the Ufurer,
His hour to wake approaches.

Boy. That once finished,
You'll give me leave to play, Sir: here they come. Ex.

Enter Wildbrain, Toby, and Ringers.

Wild. I am monstrous weary.

To. Fie, how I sweat? Reach me my cloak to cover me,
I run to oyl like a Porpise; 'twas a brave peal.

Sex. Let me light the candle first, then I'll wait on you.

Wild. A very brave peal.

To. Carman, you came in close now.

Wild. Sure 'tis past midnight.

Ring. No stirring in the streets I hear.

To. Walk further, was that a pillar? 'tis harder than my Where's the boy promis'd us five pounds? (nose;

Wild.

Wild. Room, I sweat still ; come, come, my cloak,
I shall take cold.

Enter Sexton.

Sex. Where lies it ?

Wild. Here, here, and all our cloaths.

Sex. Where, where ?

King. I th' corner.

To. Is thy candle blind too, give me the bottle,
I can drink like a Fish now, like an Elephant.

Sex. Here are the corners, but here are no cloaths ;
Yes, here is a cuff.

Wild. A cuff? give me the candle,
Cuffes wonot cover me—I sinell the knavery.

Tob. Is't come to a cuff? my whole suit turned to a button?

Wild. Now am I as cold again as though 'twere Christmas;
Cold with my fear, I'll never ring by the ear more.

To. My new cloaths vanish'd?

Wild. All my cloaths Toby.

King. Here's none.

Tob. Not one of my dragons wings left to adorn me,
Have I muted all my feathers ?

Wild. Cheated by the car ; a plot to put out the candle ;
I could be mad ; my chain, my rings, the gold, the gold.

Tob. The cold, the cold I cry, and I cry truly,
Not one sleeve, nor a cape of a cloak to warm me.

Wild. What miserable fools were we ?

Tob. We had e'en best, gentlemen,
Every man chuse his rope again, and fasten it,
And take a short turn to a better fortune,
To be bawds to our miseries, and put our own lights out ?

Wild. Prethee Sexton lets have a fire at thy house.
A good fire, we'll pay thee some way for't, I am stone cold.

Sex. Alas I pity you, come quickly Gentlemen.

Wild. Sure I ha been in a dream, I had no Mistris,
Nor gold, nor cloaths, but am a ringing rascal.

Tob. Fellows in affliction, let's take hands all,
Now are we fit for tumblers.

Enter Lurcher and others, bringing in Algripe.

Lur. So, so, presently his sleep will leave him.
And wonder seize upon him,
Bid 'em within be ready.

Ju. What sound's this ?
What horrid dinne? what dismal place is this?
I never saw before, and now behold it ;
But by the half light of a Lamp, that burns here :
My spirits shake, tremble through my body ;
Help, help,

Enter two Furies, with black Tapers.

Mercy protect me, my soul quakes,
What dreadful apparitions! how I shudder!

1. 2. Fu. Algripe.

Ju. What are you ?

1. We are hellhounds, hellhounds, that have commission
From the Prince of darkness,
To fetch thy black soul to him.

Ju. Am I not alive still ?

1. Thou art, but we have brought thee instruments
Will quickly rid thy miserable life, Stabb,
2. Poyson.

1. Hang thy self, this choice is offer'd,
2. Thou canst not hope for heaven; thy base soul is Lost to all hope of mercy.

2. Quickly, quickly,
The torments cool.

1. And all thy friends expect thee.
Come with us to that pit of endless horror,
Or we will force thee.

Ju. Oh, oh, oh.

1. Groans are too late, sooner the ravisher,
Whose soul is hurl'd into eternal frost,
Stung with the force of twenty thousand winters,
To punish the distempers of his blood,
Shall hope to get from thence, than thou avoid
The certainty of meeting hell where he is.
Shall murderers be there for ever dying,
Their souls shot through with Adders, torn on Engines,
Dying as many deaths for killing one,
Could any imagination number them,
As there be moments in eternity :
And shall that Justice spare thee, that hast slain,
Murdered by thy extortion so many ?

Ju. Oh, oh.

2. Do execution quickly, or we'll carry thee alive to hell

Ju. Gently, gentle devils, do not force me
To kill my self, nor do not you do't for me ;
Oh let me live, I'll make amends for all.

1. Tell us of thy repentance? perjur'd villain,
Pinch off his flesh, he must be whipt, salted and whipt.

Ju. Oh misery of miseries!

Recorders 1. 2. Tear his accursed limbs, to hell with him, ha!
A mischief on that innocent face, away. Creeps in.

Enter Boy like an Angel.

Boy. Malicious furies hence, choak not the seeds
Of holy penitence.

Ju. This must be an Angel,
How at his presence the fiends crawl away ?
Here is some light of mercy.

Boy. Be thou wise,
And entertain it, wretched, wretched man ;
What poor defence hath all thy wealth been to thee?
What says thy conscience now ?

Ju. Be my good Angel, here I promise thee,
To become honest, and renounce all villany ;
Enjoyn me any pennance, I'll build Churches ;
A whole City of Hospitals.

Boy. Take heed,
There is no dallying, nor are these impos'd.

Ju. Name any thing within my power, sweet Angel ;
And if I do not faithfully perform it,
Then whip me every day, burn me each minute,
Whole years together let me freeze to llices.

Boy. I th' number of thy foul oppressions ;
Thou hast undone a faithful Gentleman,
By taking forfeit of his Land.

Ju. Young Lurcher,
I do confes.

Boy. He lives most miserable,
And in despair may hang or drown himself ;
Prevent his ruine, or his blood will be
More sin in thy account : hast thou forgotten
He had a sister ?

Ju. I do well remember it.

Boy. Couldst thou for Mammon break thy solemn vow,
Made once to that unhappy maid, that weeps
A thousand tears a day for thy unkindness,
Was not thy faith contracted, and thy heart ?
And couldst thou marry another ?

Ju. But she is dead,
And I will make true satisfaction.

Boy. What do I instance these that hast been false
To all the world.

Ju. I know it, and will henceforth
Practice repentance, do not frown sweet Angel ;
I will restore all Mortgages, forswear
Abominable Usury, live chaste ;
For I have been wanton in my shroud, my age ;
And if that poor innocent maid, I so abus'd,
Be living, I will marry her, and spend
My days to come religiously.

Boy. I was commanded but a Messenger

To tell thee this, and rescue thee from those,
Whose malice would have dragg'd thee quick to hell,
If thou abuse this mercy and repent not,
Double damnation will expect thee for it;
But if thy life be virtuous hereafter,
A blessedness shall reward thy good example,
Thy fright hath much distracted thy weak senses,
Drink of this viol, and renew thy spirits
I ha done my office, think on't and be happy.

Lur. So, so, he gapes already, now he's fast;
Thou hast acted rarely, but this is not all;
First, help to convey him out o' th' vault.

Boy. You will dispense with me now, as you promis'd, Sir,
Lur. We will make shift without thee, th'ast done well,
By our device this bondage may scape hell. Exit.

Enter Lady, Nurse, Maria.

La. Didst think Maria, this poor outside, and Dissembling of thy voice could hide thee from
A mothers searching eye, though too much fear,
Lest thou wert not the same, might blind a Lover
That thought thee dead too; oh my dear Maria,
I hardly kept my joyes in from betraying thee:
Welcome again to life, we shall find out
The mystery of thy absence; conceal
Thy person still, for Algrips must not know thee:
And exercise this pretty Dialect;
If there be any course in Law to free thee,
Thou shalt not be so miserable; be silent
Good Nurse.

Nur. You should not need to fear me, Madam,
I do not love the usuring Jew so well;
Beside, 'twas my trick to disguise her so.

La. Be not dejected Mall.

Ma. Your care may comfort me;
But I despair of happiness:

Hartlove, I dare not see him.

Nur. We'll withdraw.

Lur. I shall but grieve to see his passions too,
Since there's no possibility to relieve him.

Enter Hartlove.

Ha. The world's a Labyrinth, where unguided men
Walk up and down to find their weariness;
No sooner have we measured with much toil
One crooked path with hope to gain our freedom,
But it betrays us to a new affliction;
What a strange mockery will man become
Shortly to all the creatures?

Oh Mariab!

if thou be'st dead, why does thy shadow fright me?
Sure 'tis because I live; were I but certain
To meet thee in one grave, and that our dust
Might have the privilege to mix in silence,
How quickly should my soul shake off this burthen!

Enter Boy.

Thus far my wishes have success, I'll lose
No time: Sir, are not you call'd Mr. Hartlove?
Pardon my rudeness.

Ha. What does that concern
Thee Boy, 'tis a name cannot advantage thee;
And I am weary on't.

Boy. Had you conceal'd,
Or I forgot it, Sir, so large were my
Directions, that you could not speak this language,
But I should know you by your sorrow.

Ha. Thou
Wert well inform'd, it seems; well, what's your business?

Boy. I come to bring you comfort.

Ha. Is Maria

Alive agen? that's somewhat, and yet not Enough to make my expectation rise, to Past half a blessing; since we cannot meet
To make it up a full one; th'art mistaken.

Boy. When you have heard me, you'll think otherwise:
In vain I should report Maria living:
The comfort that I bring you, must depend Upon her death.

Ha. Th'art a dissembling boy,
Some one has sent thee to mock me; though my anger
Stoop not to punish thy green years unripe
For malice; did I know what person sent thee
To tempt my sorrow thus, I should reveng it.

Boy. Indeed I have no thought so uncharitable,
Nor am I sent to grieve you, let me suffer
More punishment than ever boy deserv'd,
If you do find me false; I serve a Mistress
Would rather dye than play with your misfortunes;
Then good Sir hear me out.

Ha. Who is your Mistress?

Boy. Before I name her, give me some encouragement,
That you receive her message: she is one
That is full acquainted with your misery,
And can bring such a portion of her sorrow
In every circumstance so like your own,
You'll love and pity her, and wish your griefs
Might marry one anothers.

Ha. Thou art wild?

Canst thou bring comfort from so sad a creature?
Her miserable story can at best,
But swell my Volume, large enough already.

Boy. She was late belov'd, as you were, promis'd faith,
And marriage; and was worthy of a better
Than he, that stole Maria's heart.

Ha. How's that?

Boy. Just as Maria dealt with your affection,
Did he that married her deal with my Mistress,
When careless both of Honor and Religion;
They cruelly gave away their hearts to strangers.

Ha. Part of this truth I know, but prethee boy
Proceed to that thou cam'st for; thou didst Promise
Something, thy language cannot hitherto
Encourage me to hope for.

Boy. That I come to:

My Mistress thus unkindly dealt withal,
You may imagine, wanted no affliction;
And had e'r this, wept her self dry as Marble,
Had not your fortune come to her relief,
And twinn to her own sorrow brought her comfort.

Ha. Could the condition of my fate so equal,
Lessen her sufferings?

Boy. I know not how

Companions in grief sometimes diminish
And make the pressure easie by degrees:
She threw her troubles off, remembering yours,
And from her pity of your wrongs, there grew
Affection to your person thus increas'd,
And with it, confidence, that those whom Nature
Had made so even in their weight of sorrow,
Could not but love as equally one another,
Were things but well prepar'd, this gave her boldness
To employ me thus far.

Ha. A strange message, boy.

Boy. If you incline to meet my Mistress love,
It may beget your comforts; besides that,
'Tis some revenge, that you above their icorn
And pride can laugh at them, whose perjury
Hath made you happy, and undone themselves.

Ha. Have you done boy?

Boy. Only this little more;
When you but see, and know my Mistress well,
You will forgive my tediousness, she's fair,
Fair as Maria was.

Ha. I'll hear no more,

Go foolish boy, and tell thy fonder Mistriſs
She has no ſecond Faith to give away;
And mine was given to Maria, though her death
Allow me freedom, ſee the Picture of her.

Enter Maria, Nurſe.

I would give ten thouſand Empires for the ſubſtance;
Yet for Maria's ſake, whoſe divine Figure
That rude frame carries, I will love this counterfeit
Above all the world, and had thy Miſtriſs had all
The grace and bloſſom of her ſex; now ſhe
Is gone, that was, walking, a Spring of beauty,
I would not look upon her.

Boy. Sir, your pardon,
I have but done a meſſage, as becomes
A ſervant, nor did ſhe on whoſe commands
I gladly waited, bid me urge her love
To your diſquiet, ſhe would chide my diligence
If I ſhould make you angry.

Ha. Pretty boy.

Boy. Indeed I fear I have offended you:
Pray if I have, enjoyn me any penance for it:
I have perform'd one duty, and could as willingly
To purge my fault, and ſhew I ſuffer with you,
Plead your cauſe to another.

Ha. And I'll take thee
At thy word boy, thou haſt a moving language,
That pretty innocent, Copy of Maria
Is all I love, I know not how to ſpeak,
Winn her to think well of me, and I will Reward thee to thy wiſhes.

Boy. I undertake
Nothing for gain, but ſince you have reſolv'd,
To love no other, I'll be faithful to you,
And my prophetick thoughts bid me already Say I ſhall proſper.

Ha. Thou wert ſent to bleſs me.

Boy. Pray give us opportunity.

Ha. Be happy. Exit.

Nur. He's gone.

Boy. With your fair leave Miſtriſs.

Ma. Have you buſineſs with her pray you?

Boy. I have a meſſage from a Gentleman,
Pleaſe you vouchſafe your ear more private.

Nur. You ſhall have my abſence Neece. Exit.

Ma. Was the gentleman afraid to declare his matters openly, here was no bodies was not very honeſt, if her like not her errands the better, was wiſt to keep her preaths to cool her porridges, can tell her, that now for aule her private hearings and tawgings.

Boy. You may, if pleaſe you, find another language.
And with leſs pains be underſtood.

Ma. What is her meaning?

Boy. Come, pray ſpeak your own Engliſh.

Ma. Have boyes loſt her itts and memories? bleſs us aule.

Boy. I muſt be plain then, come, I know you are Maria, this thin vail cannot obſcure you:
I'll tell the world you live, I have not loſt ye,
Since firſt with grief and ſhame to be ſurpriz'd,
A violent trance; took away ſhew of life;
I could diſcover by what accident

You were convey'd away at midnight; in
Your coffin, could declare the place, and minute,
When you reviv'd; what you have done ſince as perfectly—

Ma. Alas, I am betraid to new miſfortunes.

Boy. You are not, for my knowledge, I'll be dumb
For ever, rather than be ſuch a traitor;
Indeed I pity you, and bring no thoughts,
But full of peace, call home your modeſt blood,
Pale hath too long uſurp'd upon your face;
Think upon love agen, and the poſſeſſion
Of full blown joyes, now ready to ſalute you.

Ma. Theſe words undo me more than my own griefs.

Boy. I ſee how fear would play the tyrant with you,
But I'll remove ſuſpition; have you in Your heart, an entertainment for his love
To whom your Virgin faith made the firſt promiſe?

Ma. If thou mean'ſt Hartlove, thou doſt wound me ſtill,
I have no life without his memory,
Nor with it any hope to keep it long:
Thou ſeeſt I walk in darkneſs like a thief,
That fears to ſee the world in his own ſhape,
My very ſhadow frights me, 'tis a death
To live thus, and not look day in the face,
Away, I know thee not.

Boy. You ſhall hereafter know, and thank me Lady,
I'll bring you a diſcharge at my next viſit,
Of all your fears, be content, fair Maria,
'Tis worth your wonder.

Ma. Impoſſible.

Boy. Be wiſe and ſilent,
Dreſs your ſelf, you ſhall be what you wiſh.

Ma. Do this, and be
My better Angel.

Boy. All your care's on me.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Lurch. and Boy.

Lur. I Muſt applaud thy diligence.

Boy. It had been nothing
To have left him in the Porch; I call'd his ſervants,
With wonders they acknowledg'd him, I pretended
It was ſome ſpice, ſure of the falling ſickneſs,
And that, 'twas charity to bring him home;
They rubb'd and chaſ'd him, ply'd him with Strong water,
Still he was ſenſeleſs, clamors could not wake him;
I wiſh'd 'em then get him to bed, they did ſo,
And almoſt ſmother'd him with ruggs and pillows;
And cauſe they ſhould have no cauſe to ſuſpect me,
I watch'd them till he wak'd.

Lur. 'Twas excellent.

Boy. When his time came to yawn, and ſtretch himſelf,
I bid 'em not be haſty to diſcover
How he was brought home; his eyes fully open
With trembling he began to call his ſervants,
And told 'em he had ſeen ſtrange viſions,
That ſhould convert him from his heathen courſes;
They wondred, and were ſilent, there he preach'd
How ſweet the air of a contented conſcience
Smelt in his noſe now, ask'd 'em all forgiveness
For their hard paſture ſince they liv'd with him;
Bid 'em believe, and fetch out the cold Sur-loin;
Pierce the ſtrong beer, and let the neighbors joy in't:
The conceal'd Muſkadine ſhould now lie open
To every mouth; that he would give to th' poor,
And mend their wages; that his doors ſhould be Open to every miſerable ſutor.

Lur. What ſaid his ſervants then?

Boy. They durſt not ſpeak,
But bleſt themſelves, and the ſtrange means that had Made him a Chriſtian in this over-joy,
I took my leave, and bad 'em ſay their prayers,
And humor him, leſt he turn'd Jew agen.

Lur. Enough, enough. Who's this?

Enter Toby.

'Tis one of my ringers; ſtand cloſe, my Ladies Coachman.
To. Buy a mat for a bed, buy a mat;
Would I were at rack and manger among my horſes;
We have divided the Sextons

Household-stuff among us, one has the rugg, and he's Turn'd Irish, and another has a blanket, and he must beg in't
The sheets serve another for a frock, and with the bed-cord,
He may pass for a Porter, nothing but the mat would fall
To my share, which with the help of a tune and a hassock
Out o'th' Church, may disguise me till I get home ;
A pox o' bell-ringing by the ear, if any man take me
At it agen, let him pull mine to the Pillory: I could wish
I had lost mine ears, so I had my cloaths again:
The weather wo' not allow this fashion,
I do look for an Ague besides.

Lur. How the raskal shakes?

To. Here are company :

Buy a Mat for a Bed, buy a Mat,
A hassock for your feet, or a Piss clean and sweet ;
Buy a Mat for a Bed, buy a Mat:
Ringing I renounce thee, I'll never come to church more.

Lur. You with a Mat.

Tob. I am call'd.

If any one should offer to buy my Mat, what a case were I in?
Oh that I were in my Oat-tub with a horse-loaf,
Something to hearten me :
I dare not hear 'em ;
Buy a mat for a bed, buy a mat.

Lur. He's deaf.

Tob. I am glad, I am : buy a mat for a bed.

Lur. How the raskal sweats? What a pickle he's in?
Every street he goes through will be a new torment.

Tob. If ever I meet at midnight more a jangling :

I am cold, and yet I drop ; buy a mat for a bed, buy a mat.

Lur. He has punishment enough.

Exit.

Enter Wildbrain.

Who's this, my tother youth? he is turn'd Bear.

Wild. I am halfe afraid of my self: this poor shift
I got o'th' Sexton to convey me handsomly
To some harbor, the wench will hardly know me ;
They'll take me for some Watchman o'th' parish ;
I ha ne'r a penny left me, that's one comfort ;
And ringing has begot a monstrous stomach,
And that's another mischief: I were best go home,
For every thing will scorn me in this habit.
Besides, I am so full of these young bell-ringers ;
If I get in adoors, not the power o'th' countrey,
Nor all my Aunts curses shall disemboogie me.

Lur. Bid her come hither presently, — hum, 'tis he.

Exit. Serv.

Wild. I am betraid to one that will eternally laugh at me,
Three of these rogues will jeer a horse to death.

Lur. 'Tis Mr. Wildbrain sure, and yet me thinks
His fashion's strangely alt' red, firrah Watchman, ou rugamuffin, turn you lou w ears skin :
ou with the Bed-rid Bill.

Wild. H'as found me out ;
There's no avoiding him, I had rather now
Be arraign'd at Newgate for a robbery,
Than answer to his Articles: your Will Sir,
I am in haste.

Lur. Nay, then I will make bold wi' ye ;
A Watchman, and asham'd to shew his countenance,
His face of authority? I have seen that physiognomy ;
Were you never in prison for pilfering?

Wild. How the rogue worries me.

Lur. Why may not this
Be the villain robb'd my house last night,
And walks disguis'd in this malignant rugg,
Arm'd with a tun of Iron? I will have you
Before a Magistrate.

Wild. What will become of me?

Lur. What art thou? speak.

Wild. I am the wandring Jew, and please your worship.

Lur. By your leave Rabbi, I will shew you then
A Synagogue, iclip't Bridewel, where you,
Under correction, may rest your self :

You have brought a bill to guard you, there bedog-whpiss
To firke such rugg'd currs, whips without bells
Indeed.

Wild. Bells.

Lur. How he sweats?

Wild. I must be known, as good at first ; now jeer on,
But do not anger me too impudently,
The Rabbi will be mov'd then.

Lur. How? Jack Wildbrain,
What time o'th' Moon man, ha? what strange bells
Hast in thy brains?

Wild. No more bells,
No more bells, they ring backwards.

Lur. Why, where's the wench, the blessing that besel thee?
The unexpected happiness? where's that Jack?

Wild. It was his trick, as sure as I am louzic,
But how to be reveng'd —

Lur. Fie, fie, Jack,

Marry a Watchmans widow in thy young daies,
With a revenue of old Iron and a Rugg?
Is this the Paragon, the dainty piece,
The delicate divine rogue?

Wild. 'Tis enough, I am undone,
Mark'd for a misery, and so leave prating ;
Give me my Bill.

Lur. You need not ask your Taylors,
Unless you had better Linings; it may be,
To avoid suspition, you are going thus
Disguis'd to your fair Mistriss.

Wild. Mock no further,
Or as I live, I'll lay my Bill o'thy pate,
I'll take a Watchmans fury into my fingers,
To ha no judgement to distinguish persons,
And knock thee down.

Lur. Come, I ha done, and now
Will speak some comfort to thee, I will lead thee
Now to my Mistriss hitherto conceal'd ;
She shall take pity on thee too, she loves
A handsome man; thy misery invites me
To do thee good, I'll not be jealous, Jack;
Her beauty shall commend it self; but do not,
When I have brought you into grace, supplant me.

Wild. Art thou in earnest? by this cold iron —

Lur. No oaths, I am not coftive; here she comes.

Enter Mistriss.

Sweet-heart, I have brought a Gentleman,
A friend of mine to be acquainted with you,
He's other than he seems; why d'ye stare thus?

Mist. Oh Sir, forgive me, I have done ye wrong.

Lur. What's the matter? didst ever see her afore Jack?

Wild. Prethee do what thou wot wi' me, if thou hast
A mind, hang me up quickly.

Lur. Never despair, I'll give thee my share rather,
Take her, I hope she loves thee at first sight,
She has petticoats will patch thee up a suit ;
I resign all, only I'll keep these trifles.

I took some pains for 'em, I take it Jack;
What think you pink of beauty, come let me
Counsel you both to marry, she has a trade,
If you have audacity to hook in Gamesters :
Let's ha a wedding, you will be wondrous rich ;
For she is impudent, and thou art miserable ;
'Twill be a rare match.

Mist. As you are a man, forgive me, I'll redeem all.

Lur. You wo' not to this geer of marriage then?

Wild. No, no, I thank you Tom, I can watch for A groat a night, and be every gentlemans fellow. Exit Mi.

Lur. Rise and be good, keep home and tend your business.

Wild. Thou hast don't to purpose, give me thy hand Tom;
Shall we be friends? thou see'st what state I am in,
I'll undertake this pennance to my Aunt,

Just

Just as I am, and openly I'll goe ;
Where, if I be received again for currant,
And fortune smile once more —

Nur. Nay, nay, I'm satisfied, so farewell honest louzie Jack.
Wild. I cannot help it, some men meet with strange destinies. If things go right thou mayst be hang'd, and I
May live to see't, and purchase thy apparel:
So farewell Tom. commend me to thy Polcat.

Enter Lady, Nurse, Servant.

La. Now that I have my counsel ready, and my cause
The Judges all inform'd of the abuses ;
Now that he should be gone.

Nur. No man knows whether,
And yet they talk he went forth with a Constable
That told him of strange business that would bring him
Money and Lands, and Heaven knows what ; but they Have search'd, and cannot find out such an Officer :
And as a secret, Madam, they told your man
Nicholas, whom you sent thither as a spie,
They had a shrewd suspicion 'twas the devil
I' th' likeness of a Constable, that has tempted him :
By this time to strange things ; there have been men
As rich as he, have met convenient rivers,
And so forth ; many trees have born strange fruits :
D'ye think he has not hang'd himself ?

La. If he be hang'd, who has his goods ?

Nur. They are forfeited, they say.

La. He has hang'd himself for certain then,
Only to cosin me of my Girls portion.

Nur. Very likely.

La. Or did not the Constable carry him to some prison ?

Nur. They thought on that too, and search'd every where.

La. He may be close for treason, perhaps executed.

Nur. Nay, they did look among the quarters too,
And mustered all the bridge-house for his night-cap.

Enter Servant.

Ser. Madam, here is the gentleman agen.

La. What Gentleman ?

Ser. He that lov'd my young Mistris.

La. Alas, 'tis Hartlove, 'twill but feed his melancholy.
To let him see Maria, since we dare not Yet tell the world she lives ; and certainly,
Did not the violence of his passion blind him,
He would see past her borrowed tongue and habit.

Nur. Please you entertain him awhile, Madam,
I'll cast about for something with your daughter.

La. Do what thou wot, pray Mr. Hartlove enter.

Exit Ser. and Nur. severally.

Enter Hartlove.

Ha. Madam, I come to ask your gentle pardon.

La. Pardon, for what ? you ne'r offended me.

Ha. Yes, if ye be the mother of Maria.

La. I was her mother, but that word is cancell'd,
And buried with her in that very minute
Her soul fled from her ; we lost both our names
Of mother and of daughter.

Ha. Alas, Madam,
If your relation did consist but in
Those naked terms, I had a title nearer,
Since love unites more than the tie of blood ;
No matter for the empty voice of mother ;
Your nature still is left, which in her absence
Must love Maria, and not see her ashes
And memory polluted.

La. You amaze me, by whom ?

Ha. By me, I am the vile profaner.

La. Why do you speak thus indiscreetly, Sir ?
You ever honour'd her.

Ha. I did live,
But since she died, I ha been a villain to her.

La. I do beseech you say not so ; all this
Is but to make me know how much I sinn'd
In forcing her to marry.

Ha. Do not mock me,
I charge you by the Virgin you have wept for ;
For I have done an impious act against her,
A deed able to fright her from her sleep,
And through her marble, ought to be reveng'd ;
A wickedness, that if I should be silent,
You as a witness must accuse me for't.

La. Was I a witness ?

Ha. Yes, you knew I lov'd
Maria once ; or grant, you did but think so,
By what I ha profest, or she has told you,
Was't not a fault unpardonable in me,
When I should drop my tears upon her grave,
Yes, and proof sufficient.

La. To what ?

Ha. That I, forgetful of my fame and vows
To fair Maria, e'r the worm could pierce
Her tender shroud, had chang'd her for another ;
Did you not blush to see me turn a rebel ?
So soon to court a shadow, a strange thing,
Without a name ? Did you not curse my levity,
Or think upon her death with the less sorrow
That she had scap'd a punishment more killing,
Oh how I shame to think on't.

La. Sir, in my Opinion, 'twas an argument of love
To your Maria, for whose sake you could Affect one that but carried her small likeness.

Ha. No more, you are too charitable, but I know my guilt, and will from henceforth never Change words with that strange maid, whose innocent face
Like your Maria's won so late upon me :
My passions are corrected, and I can Look on her now, and woman-kind, without
Love in a thought ; 'tis thus, I came to tell you,
If after this acknowledgement, you'll be
So kind to shew me in what silent grave
You have dispos'd your daughter, I will ask
Forgiveness of all her dust, and never leave,
Till with a loud confession of my shame,
I wake her ghost, and that pronounce my pardon :
Will you deny this favour ? then farewell,
I'll never see you more : ha !

Enter Nurse, Maria in her own apparel, after some shew of wonder, he goes towards her.

La. Be not deluded, Sir, upon my life
This is the soul whom you but thought Maria
In my daughters habit ; what did you mean Nurse ?
I knew she would but cozen you, is she not like now ?
One dew unto another is not nearer.

Nur. She thinks she is a gentlewoman ;
And that imagination has so taken her,
See scorns to speak, how handsomly she carries it,
As if she were a well bred thing, her body ?
And I warrant you, what looks ?

La. Pray be not foolish.

Ha. I disturb no body, speak but half a word
And I am satisfied, but what needs that ?
I'll swear 'tis she.

La. But do not, I beseech you,
For trust me, Sir, you know not what I know.

Ha. Peace then,
And let me pray, she holds up her hands with me.

La. This will betray all.

Ha. Love ever honor'd,
And ever young, thou Sovereign of all hearts,
Of all our sorrows, the sweet ease.

She weeps now.
Does

Does she still cosin me?

Nur. You will see anon,
'Twas her desire, expect the issue, Madam.

Hi. My soul's so big, I cannot pray; 'tis she,
I will go nearer.

Enter Algripe, Lurcher, Boy.

Nur. Here's Mr. Algripe, and other strangers, Madam.

Al. Here good Lady,
Upon my knees I ask thy worships pardon;
Here's the whole sum I had with thy fair Daughter;
Would she were living, I might have her peace too,
And yield her up again to her old liberty:
I had a wife before, and could not marry;
My pennance shall be on that man that honor'd her,
To confer some Land.

La. This is incredible.

Al. 'Tis truth

Lu. Do you know me, Sir?

Al. Ha. the Gentleman I deceiv'd.

Lur. My name is Lurcher.

Al. 'Shat have thy Mortgage.

Lu. I ha that already, no matter for the Deed
if you release it.

Al. I'll do't before thy witness;
But where's thy Sister? if she live I am happy, though
I conceal our contract, which was Stolen from me with the Evidence of this Land.

*The Boy goes to Maria, and gives her a paper; she wonders, and smiles upon Hartlove, he amaz'd, approaches her:
afterward she shews it her mother, and then gives it to Hartlove.*

Nur. Your daughter smiles.

Lur. I hope she lives, but where, I cannot tell, Sir.

Boy. Even here, and please you, Sir.

Al. How?

Boy. Nay, 'tis she;

To work thy fair way, I preserved you brother,
That would have lost me willingly, and serv'd ye
Thus like a boy; I served you faithfully,
And cast your plots to preserve your credit;
Your foul ones I diverted to fair uses;
So far as you would hearken to my counsel;
That all the world may know how much you owe me.

Al. Welcome entirely, welcome my dear Alathe,
And when I lose thee agen, blessing forsake me:
Nay, let me kiss thee in these cloaths.

Lur. And I too, (thief?)

And bless the time I had so wise a sister, wer't thou the little Boy. I stole the contract, I must confess,

And kept it to my self, it most concern'd me.

Hi. Contracted? this destroys his after marriage.

Mr. Dare you give this hand
To this young Gentleman? my heart goes with it.

Al. Maria alive! how my heart's exalted, 'tis my duty;

Take her Frank Hartlove, take her; and all joyes
With her; besides some Lands to advance her Joynture:

La. What I have is your own, and blessings crown ye.

Hi. Give me room,
And fresh air to consider, Gentlemen,
My hopes are too high.

Mr. Be more temperate,
Or I'll be Welsh again.

Al. A day of wonder.

Lur. Lady, your love, I ha kept my word; there was
A time, when my much suffering made me hate you,
And to that end I did my best to cross you:
And fearing you were dead, I stole your Coffin,
That you might never more usurp my Office:
Many more knacks I did, which at the Weddings
Shall be told of as harmless tales.

Shout within.

Enter Wildbrain.

Wild. Hollow your throats apieces, I am at home;
If you can roar me out again——

La. What thing is this?

Lur. A continent of Fleas: room for the Pageant;
Make room afore there; your kinsman Madam.

La. My kinsman? let me wonder!

Wild. Do, and I'll wonder too to see this company
At peace one with another; 'tis not worth
Your admiration, I was never dead yet;
Y' remerry Aunt, I see, and all your company:
If ye be not, I'll fool up, and provoke ye:
I will do any thing to get your love again:
I'll forswear Midnight, Taverns and Temptations;
Give good example to your Grooms, the Maids
Shall go to bed, and take their rest this year;
None shall appear with blisters in their bellies.

Lur. And when you will fool again, you may go ring.

Wild. Madam, have mercy.

La. Your submission, Sir,
I gladly take; we will
Enquire the reason of this habit afterwards;
Now you are soundly sham'd, well, we restore you
Where's Toby?

Where's the Coachman?

Nur. He's a bed, Madam.

And has an ague, he says.

Lur. I'll be his Physitian.

La. We must afoot then.

Lur. E'er the Priest ha done
Toby shall wait upon you with his Coach,
And make your Flanders Mares dance back agen we'ye,
I warrant you Madam you are mortified,
Your sute shall be granted too.

Wild. Make, make room afore thee.

La. Home forward with glad hearts, home child.

Ma. I wait you.

Ha. On joyfully, the cure of all our grief,
Is owing to this pretty little Thief. (Exeunt omnes.)

Ladies to you, in whose defence and right,
 Fletchers brave Muse prepar'd her self to fight
 A battel without blood, 'twas well fought too,
 (The victory's yours, though got with much ado.)
 We do present this Comedy, in which
 A rivulet of pure wit flows, strong and rich
 In Fancy, Language, and all parts that may Add Grace and Ornament to a merry Play.
 Which this may prove. Yet not to go too far
 In promises from this our Female War.

We do intreat the angry men would not Expect the mazes of a subtle plot,
 Set Speeches, high Expressions, and what's worse,
 In a true Comedy, politick discourse.
 The end we aim at, is to make you sport;
 Yet neither gall the City, nor the Court.
 Hear, and observe his Comique strain, and when You are sick of melancholy, see't agen.
 'Tis no dear Physick since 'twill quit the cost:
 Or his intentions with our pains, are lost.

Actus Primus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Moroso, Sophocles, and Tranio, with Rosemary, as from a wedding.

Mo. Od give 'em joy.

Tra. Amen.

Soph. Amen, say I too: (wench.)

The pudding's now i'th' proof, alas poor
 Through what a mine of patience must thou work,

E'r thou know'st good hour more?

Tra. 'Tis too true: Certain,
 Methinks her father has dealt harshly with her,
 Exceeding harshly, and not like a Father,
 To match her to this Dragon; I protest
 I pity the poor Gentlewoman.

Mor. Methinks now,
 He's not so terrible as people think him.

Soph. This old thief flatters, out of meer devotion,
 To please the Father for his second daughter.

Tra.

Tra. But shall he have her?

Soph. Yes, when I have Rome.
And yet the father's for him.

Mor. I'll assure ye,
I hold him a good man.

Soph. Yes sure a wealthy,
But whether a good womans man, is doubtful.

Tra. Would 'twere no worse.

Mor. What though his other wife,
Out of her most abundant soberness,
Out of her daily hue and cries upon him,
(For sure she was a rebel) turn'd his temper,
And forc'd him blow as high as she? dos't follow
He must retain that long since buried Tempest,
To this soft Maid?

Soph. I fear it.

Tra. So do I too:

And so far, that if God had made me woman,
And his wife that must be——

Mor. What would you do, Sir?

Tra. I would learn to eat coals with an angry Cat,
And spit fire at him: I would (to prevent him)
Do all the ramping, roaring tricks, a whore
Being drunk, and tumbling ripe, would tremble at:
There is no safety else, nor moral wisdom.
To be a wife, and his.

Soph. So I should think too.

Tra. For yet the bare remembrance of his first wife
(I tell ye on my knowledge, and a truth too)
Will make him start in's sleep, and very often
Cry out for Cudgels, Colestaves, any thing;
Hiding his breeches out of fear, her Ghost
Should walk, and wear 'em yet. Since his first marriage,
He is no more the still Petruchio,
Than I am Babylon.

Soph. He's a good fellow,
And on my word I love him: but to think
A fit match for this tender soul——

Tra. His very frown, if she but say her prayers
Louder than men talk treason, makes him tinder;
The motion of a Dial, when he's tefty,
Is the same trouble to him as a Water-work;
She must do nothing of her self; not eat,
Drink, say Sir, how do ye? make her ready, unready,
Unleis he bid her.

Soph. He will bury her,
Ten pound to twenty shillings, within these three weeks

Tra. I'll be your half.

Enter Jaques with a pot of Wine.

Mor. He loves her most extreemly,
And so long 'twill be Honey-moon. Now Jaques.
You are a busie man I am sure.

Jaq. Yes certain,
This old sport must have eggs,

Sop. Not yet this ten daies.

Jaq. Sweet Gentlemen with Muskadel.

Tra. That's right, Sir.

Mor. This fellow broods his Master: speed ye Jaques.

Soph. We shall be for you presently.

Jaq. Your worships
Shall have it rich and neat: and o' my conscience
As welcome as our Lady-day: Oh my old Sir,
When shall we see your worship run at Ring?
That hour, a standing were worth money.

Mor. So Sir.

Jaq. Upon my little honesty, your Mistrifs,
If I have any speculation, must think
This single thrumming of a Fiddle,
Without a Bow, but even poor sport.

Mor. Y'are merry.

Jaq. Would I were wise too: so God blefs your worship.

Tra. The fellow tells you true.

Exit Jaq.

Soph. When is the day man?

Come, come, you'll steal a marriage.

Mor. Nay, believe me:

But when her Father pleases, I am ready,
And all my friends shall know it.

Tra. Why not now?

One charge had ferv'd for both.

Mor. There's reason in't.

Soph. Call'd Rowland——

Mor. Will ye walk?

They'll think we are lost: Come Gentlemen.

Tra. You have wip'd him now.

Soph. So will he never the wench, I hope.

Tra. I wish it.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Rowland and Livia.

Row. Now Livia, if you'll go away to night,
If your affections be not made of words.

Liv. I love you, and you know how dearly Rowland,
Is there none near us? my affections ever
Have been your servants; with what superstition
I have ever Sainted you——

Row. Why then take this way.

Liv. 'Twill be a childish, and a less prosperous course,
Than his that knows not care: why should we do
Our honest and our hearty love such wrong,
To over-run our fortunes?

Row. Then you flatter.

Liv. Alas, you know I cannot.

Rom. What hope's left else
But flying to enjoy ye?

Liv. None so far,

For let it be admitted, we have time,
And all things now in other expectation,
My father's bent against us; what but ruine,
Can such a by-way bring us? if your fears
Would let you look with my eyes, I would shew you,
And certain, how our staying here would win us
A course, though somewhat longer, yet far surer.

Row. And then Moroso h'as ye.

Liv. No such matter

For hold this certain, begging, stealing, whoring,
Selling (which is a sin unpardonable)
Of counterfeit Cods, or musty English Croacus;
Switches, or Stones for th' tooth-ache sooner finds me,
Than that drawn Fox Moroso.

Row. But his money,

If wealth may win you——

Liv. If a Hog may be

High Priest among the Jews? his money Rowland?

Oh Love forgive me, what faith hast thou?

Why, can his money kiss me?

Row. Yes.

Liv. Behind,

Laid out upon a Petticoat: or graspe me
While I cry, Oh good thank you? o' my troth
Thou mak'st me merry with thy fear: or lie with me,
As you may do? alas, what fools you men are?
His mouldy money? half a dozen Riders,
That cannot sit, but stamp fast to their Saddles?
No Rowland, no man shall make use of me;
My beauty was born free, and free I'll give it
To him that loves, not buys me. You yet doubt me,

Row. I cannot say I doubt ye.

Liv. Goe thy ways,

Thou art the prettiest puling piece of passion:
Y'faith I will not fail thee.

Row. I had rather——

Liv. Prethce believe me, if I do not carry it,
For both our goods——

Row. But——

Liv.

Liv. What but ?
Row. I would tell you.
Liv. I know all you can tell me ; all's but this,
 You would have me, and lie with me ; is't not so ?
Row. Yes.
Liv. Why you shall ; will that content you ? Goe.
Row. I am very loth to goe.

Enter Byancha and Maria.

Liv. Now o' my conscience
 Thou art an honest fellow : here's my Sister ;
 Go, prethee go ; this kifs, and credit me,
 E'r I am three nights older, I am for thee :
 You shall hear what I do.
 Farewel.

Row. Farewel.

Exit Rowland.

Liv. Alas poor fool, how it looks ?
 It would ev'n hang it self, should I but cross it.
 For pure love to the matter I must hatch it.
Bya. Nay, never look for merry hour, Maria,
 If now you make it not ; let not your blushes,
 Your modesty, and tendernefs of spirit,
 Make you continual Anvile to his anger :
 Believe me, since his first wife set him going,
 Nothing can bind his rage : Take your own council,
 You shall not say that I perswaded you.
 But if you suffer him—

Mar. Stay, shall I do it ?

Bya. Have you a stomach to't ?

Mar. I never shew'd it.

Bya. 'Twill shew the rarer and the stronger in you.
 But do not say I urg'd you.

Mar. I am perfect,

Like Curtius, to redeem my Country, I have Leap'd into this gulph of marriage, and I'll do it.
 Farewel all poorer thoughts, but spight and anger,
 Till I have wrought a miracle. Now cosin,
 I am no more the gentle, tame Maria ;
 Mistake me not ; I have a new soul in me
 Made of a North wind, nothing but tempest ;
 And like a tempest shall it make all ruin,
 Till I have run my Will out.

Bya. This is brave now,
 If you continue it ; but your own Will lead you.

Mar. Adieu all tendernefs, I dare continue ;
 Maids that are made of fears, and modest blushes,
 View me, and love example.

Bya. Here is your Sister.

Mar. Here is the brave old mans love.

Bya. That loves the young man.

Mar. I and hold thee there wench : what a grief of heart
 When Paphos Revels should rowze up old night,
 To sweat against a Cork ; to lie and tell
 The clock o'th lungs, to rise sport starv'd ?

Liv. Dear Sister,
 Where have you been, you talk thus ?

Mar. Why at Church, wench ;
 Where I am ti'd to talke thus : I am a wife now.

Liv. It seems so, and a modest.

Mar. You are an ass ;
 When thou art married once, thy modesty
 Will never buy thee pins.

Liv. 'Bless me.

Mar. From what ?

Bya. From such a tame fool as our cosin Livia ?

Liv. You are not mad.

Mar. Yes wench, and so must you be,
 Or none of our acquaintance : mark me Livia ;
 Or indeed fit for our sex : 'Tis bed time.
 Pardon me yellow Hymen, that I mean
 Thine offerings to protract, or to keep fasting
 My valiant Bridegroom.

Liv. Whither will this woman ?

Bya. You may perceive her end.

Liv. Or rather fear it.

Mar. Dare you be partner in't ?

Liv. Leave it Maria,

I fear I have mark'd too much, for goodnefs leave it ;
 Divest you with obedient hands, to bed.

Mar. To bed ? no Livia, there are Comets hang Prodigious over that yet ; there's a fellow
 Must yet before I know that heat (ne'r start wench)
 Be made a man, for yet he is a monster ;
 Here must his head be Livia.

Liv. Never hope it.

'Tis as easie with a Sive to scoop the Ocean, as To tame Petruchio.

Mar. Stay : Lucina hear me,
 Never unlock the treasure of my womb
 For humane fruit, to make it capable ;
 Nor never with thy secret hand make brief
 A mothers labor to me ; if I do
 Give way unto my married Husband's Will,
 Or be a Wife in any thing but hopes,
 Till I have made him easie as a child,
 And tame as fear, he shall not win a smile,
 Or a pleas'd look, from this austeritey,
 Though it would pull another Joynture from him,
 And make him ev'ry day another man ;
 And when I kifs him, till I have my Will,
 May I be barren of delights, and know
 Only what pleasures are in dreams, and guesses.

Liv. A strange Exordium.

Bya. All the several wrongs
 Done by Imperious Husbands to their Wives
 These thousand years and upwards, strengthen thee :
 Thou hast a brave cause.

Mar. And I'll do it bravely,
 Or may I knit my life out ever after.

Liv. In what part of the world got she this spirit ?
 Yet pray Maria, look before you truly,
 Besides the obedience of a wife ;
 Which you will find a heavy imputation,
 Which yet I cannot think your own, it shews
 So distant from your sweetness.

Mar. 'Tis I swear.

Liv. Weigh but the person, and the hopes you have,
 To work this desperate cure.

Mar. A weaker subject
 Would shame the end I aim at, disobedience.
 You talk too tamely : By the faith I have
 In mine own noble Will, that childish woman
 That lives a prisoner to her Husbands pleasure,
 Has lost her making, and becomes a beast,
 Created for his use, not fellowship.

Liv. His first wife said as much.

Mar. She was a fool,
 And took a scurvy course ; let her be nam'd
 'Mongst those that wish for things, but dare not do 'em :
 I have a new dance for him.

Liv. Are you of this faith ?

Bya. Yes truly, and will die in't.

Liv. Why then let's all wear breeches.

Mar. Now thou com'st near the nature of a woman ;
 Hang these tame hearted Eyassés, that no sooner
 See the Lure out, and hear their Husbands hollow,
 But cry like Kites upon 'em : The free Haggard
 (Which is that woman, that hath wing, and knows it, Spirit and plume) will make an hundred checks,
 To shew her freedom, sail in ev'ry air,
 And look out ev'ry pleasure ; not regarding Lure, nor quarry, till her pitch command
 What she desires, making her foundred keeper
 Be glad to sling out trains, and golden ones,
 To take her down again.

Liv. You are learned, Sister ;
 Yet I say still take heed.

Mar.

Mar. A witty saying;
I'll tell thee Livia, had this fellow tired
As many wives as horses under him,
With spurring of their patience; had he got
A Patent, with an Office to reclaim us,
Confirm'd by Parliament; had he all the malice
And subtilty of Devils, or of us,
Or any thing that's worse than both.

Liv. Hey, hey boys, this is excellent.

Mar. Or could he

Cast his wives new again, like Bels, to make 'em
Sound to his Will; or had the fearful name
Of the first breaker of wild women: yet,
Yet would I undertake this man, thus single,
And, spight of all the freedom he has reach'd to,
Turn him and bend him as I list, and mold him
Into a babe again; that aged women,
Wanting both teeth and spleen, may Master him.

Bya. Thou wilt be chronic'd.

Mar. That's all I aim at.

Liv. I must confess, I do with all my heart
Hate an imperious Husband, and in time
Might be so wrought upon.

Bya. To make him cuckold?

Mar. If he deserve it.

Liv. Then I'll leave ye Ladies.

Bya. Thou hast not so much noble anger in thee.

Mar. Go sleep, go sleep, what we intend to do,
Lies not for such starv'd souls, as thou hast Livia.

Liv. Good night: the Bridegroom will be with you pre-

Mar. That's more than you know, (sently.)

Liv. If ye work upon him,

As you have promised, ye may give example,
Which no doubt will be followed.

Mar. So.

Bya. Good night; we'll trouble you no further.

Mar. If you intend no good, pray do no harm.

Liv. None, but pray for you.

Exit Livia.

Bya. Cheer wench.

Mar. Now Byancha,

Those wits we have, let's wind 'em to the height.
My rest is up wench, and I pull for that Will make me ever famous. They that lay
Foundations, are half-builders, all men say.

Enter Jaques.

Jaq. My Master forsooth.

Mar. Oh how does thy Master? prethee commend me

Jaq. How's this? my Master stays forsooth. (to him.)

Mar. Why let him stay, who hinders him forsooth?

Jaq. The Revel's ended now,
To visit you.

Mar. I am not sick.

Jaq. I mean to see his chamber forsooth.

Mar. Am I his Groom? where lay he last night forsooth?

Jaq. In the low matted Parlour.

Mar. There lies his way by the long Gallery.

Jaq. I mean your chamber: y'are very merry Mistriifs.

Mar. 'Tis a good sign I am found hearted Jaques:
But if you'll know where I lie, follow me;
And what thou see'st, deliver to thy Master.

Bya. Do gentle Jaques.

Exeunt.

Ja. Ha, is the wind in that door?

By'r Lady we shall have foul weather then:

I do not like the shuffling of these women,

They are mad beasts, when they knock their heads together:

I have observ'd them all this day; their whispers,

One in another's ear, their signs and pinches,

And breaking often into violent laughters:

As if the end they purpos'd were their own.

Call you this weddings? Sure this is a knavery,

A very trick, and dainty knavery,

Marvellous finely carried, that's the comfort:

What would these women do in ways of honor?

That are such Masters this way? Well, my Sir
Has been as good at finding out these toys,
As any living; if he lose it now,
At his own peril be it. I must follow.

Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Servants with Lights, Petruchio, Petronius,, Moroso, Tranio, and Sophocles.

Pet. You that are married, Gentlemen; have at ye
For a round wager now.

Soph. Of this nights Stage?

Petru. Yes.

(shillings.)

Soph. I am your first man, a pair of Gloves of twenty Petru. Done: who takes me up next? I am for all bets.

Mar. Well lusty Lawrence, were but my night now,
Old as I am, I would make you clap on Spurs,
But I would reach you, and bring you to your trot too:

I would Gallants.

(ha?)

Petru. Well said good Will; but where's the staff boy,
Old father Time, your hour-glass is empty.

Tra. A good tough train would break thee all to pieces;
Thou hast not breath enough to say thy prayers.

Petron. See how these boys despise us. Will you to bed son?
This pride will have a fall.

Petru. Upon your daughter;
But I shall rise again, if there be truth
In Eggs, and butter'd Parsnips.

Petro. Will you to bed son, and leave talking?

To morrow morning we shall have you look,
For all your great words, like St. George at Kingston,

Running a foot-back from the furious Dragon,
That with her angry tail belabours him

For being lazie.

Tra. His courage quench'd, and so far quench'd—

Petru. 'Tis well Sir.

What then?

Soph. Fly, fly, quoth then the fearful dwarfe;
Here is no place for living man.

Petru. Well my masters, if I do sink under my business, as I find 'tis very possible, I am not the first that has miscarried; So that's my comfort, what may be done without impeach or waste, I can and will do.

Enter Jaques.

How now, is my fair Bride a bed?

Jaq. No truly, Sir.

Petron. Not a bed yet? body o' me: we'll up and rife her: here's a coil with a Maiden-head, 'tis not intail'd, is it?

Petru. If it be, I'll try all the Law i'th' Land, but I'll cut it off: let's up, let's up, come.

Jaq. That you cannot neither.

Petru. Why?

Jaq. Unless you'll drop through the Chimney like a Daw, or force a breach i'th' windows: you may untile the house,
'tis possible.

Petru. What dost thou mean?

Jaq. A moral, Sir, the Ballad will express it:

*The wind and the rain, has turn'd you back again,
And you cannot be lodged there.* The truth is, all the doors
Are baracadoed; not a Cathole, but holds a murd'rer in't.
She's victuall'd for this month.

Petru. Art not thou drunk?

Soph. He's drunk, he's drunk; come, come, let's up.

Jaq. Yes, yes, I am drunk: ye may go up, ye may Gentlemen, but take heed to your heads: I say no more.

Soph. I'll try that.

Exit Soph.

Petron. How dost thou say? the door fast lock'd fellow?

Jaq. Yes truly Sir, 'tis lock'd, and guarded too; and two as desperate tongues planted behind it, as e'er yet bat-ter'd: they stand upon their honors, and will not give up without

without strange composition, I'll assure you; marching a way with their Pieces cockt, and Bullets in their mouths, will not satisfie them.

Petru. How's this? how's this? they are—
Is there another with her?

Jaq. Yes marry is there, and an Enginier.

Mor. Who's that for Heavens sake?

Jaq. Colonel Byanba, she commands the works: Spinola's but a Ditcher to her, there's a half-moon: I am but a poor man, but if you'll give me leave, I'll venture a years wages, draw all your force before it, and mount your ablest Piece of battery, you shall not enter it these three nights yet.

Enter Sophocles.

Petru. I should laugh at that good Jagues.

Soph. Beat back again, she's fortified for ever.

Jaq. Am I drunk now, Sir?

Soph. He that dares most, go up now, and be cool'd.
I have escap'd a pretty scowring.

Petru. What are they mad? have we another Bedlam?
They do not talke I hope?

Soph. Oh terribly, extreemly fearful, the noise at London-bridge is nothing near her.

Petru. How got she tongue?

Soph. As you got tail, she was born to't.

Petru. Lock'd out a doors, and on my wedding-night?
Nay, and I suffer this, I may goe graze:
Come Gentlemen, I'll batter; are these virtues?

Soph. Do, and be beaten off with shame, as I was: I went up, came to th' door, knock'd, no body answer'd; knock'd louder, yet heard nothing: would have broke in by force; when suddainly a Water-work flew from the window with such violence, that had I not duck'd quickly like a Fryer, catera quis nescit? The chamber's nothing but a meer Ostend, in every window Pewter Cannons mounted, you'll quickly find with what they are charg'd, Sir.

Petru. Why then tantara for us.

Soph. And all the lower Works lin'd sure with small shot, long tongues with Fire-locks, that at twelve score blank hit to the heart: now and ye dare go up.

Enter Maria and Byanca above.

Mor. The window opens, beat a parley first;
I am so much amaz'd, my very hair stands.

Petru. Why how now Daughter: what intrench'd?

Mar. A little guarded for my safety, Sir.

Petru. For your safety Sweet-heart? why who offends
I come not to use violence. (you?)

Mar. I think you cannot, Sir, I am better fortified.

Petru. I know your end,
You would fain reprieve your Maiden-head
A night, or two.

Mar. Yes, or ten, or twenty, or say an hundred;
Or indeed, till I list lie with you.

Soph. That's a shrewd saying from this present hour,
I never will believe a silent woman.

When they break out they are bonfires.

Petru. Till you list, lie with him? why who are you Madam?

Bya. That trim Gentlemans wife, Sir.

Petru. Cry you mercy, do you command too?

Mar. Yes marry does she, and in chief.

Bya. I do command, and you shall go without:
(I mean your wife, for this night)

Mar. And for the next too wench, and so as't follows

Petru. Thou wilt not, wilt'a?

Mar. Yes indeed dear father,
And till he seal to what I shall set down,
For any thing I know for ever.

Soph. Indeed these are Bug-words.

Tra. You hear Sir, she can talk, God be thanked.

Petru. I would I heard it not, Sir.

Soph. I find that all the pity bestow'd upon this woman,
Makes but an Anagram of an ill wife,
For she was never virtuous.

Petru. You'll let me in I hope, for all this jesting;

Mar. Hope still, Sir.

Petron. You will come down I am sure.

Mar. I am sure I will not.

Petron. I'll fetch you then.

Bya. The power of the whole County cannot, Sir,
Unless we please to yield, which yet I think
We shall not; charge when you please, you shall Hear quickly from us.

Mor. Bless me from a chicken of thy hatching,
Is this wiving?

Petru. Prethee Maria tell me what's the reason,
And doe it freely, you deal thus strangely with me?

You were not forc'd to marry, your consent
Went equally with mine, if not before it:

I hope you do not doubt I want that mettle

A man should have to keep a woman waking;

I would be sorry to be such a Saint yet:

My person, as it is not excellent,

So'tis not old, nor lame, nor weak with Physick,

But well enough to please an honest woman,

That keeps her house, and loves her Husband.

Mar. 'Tis so.

Petru. My means and my conditions are no shamers
Of him that owes 'em, all the world knows that,
And my friends no reliers on my fortunes.

Mar. All this I believe, and none of all these parcels
I dare accept against; nay more, so far

I am from making these the ends I aim at,

These idle outward things, these womens fears,

That were I yet unmarried, free to choose

Through all the Tribes of man, I'll take Petruchio

In's shirt, with one ten Groats to pay the Priest,

Before the best man living, or the ablest

That e'er leap'd out of Lancashire, and they are right ones.

Petron. Why do you play the fool then, and stand prating
Out of the window like a broken Miller!

Petru. If you will have me credit you Maria,
Come down, and let your love confirm it.

Mar. Stay there, Sir, that bargain's yet to make.

Bya. Play sure wench, the Pack's in thine own hand.

Soph. Let me die lowsie, if these two wenches
Be not brewing knavery to stock a Kingdom.

Petru. Why this is a Riddle:

I love you, and I love you not.

Mar. It is so:

And till your own experience do untie it,

This distance I must keep,

Petru. If you talk more,

I am angry, very angry.

Mar. I am glad on't, and I will talk.

Petru. Prethee peace,

Let me not think thou art mad. I tell thee woman,
If thou goest forward, I am still Petruchio.

Mar. And I am worse, a woman that can fear

Neither Petruchio Furius, nor his fame,

Nor any thing that tends to our allegiance;

There's a short method for you, now you know me.

Petru. If you can carry't so, 'tis very well.

Bya. No, you shall carry it, Sir.

Petru. Peace gentle Low-bel.

Petron. Use no more words, but come down instantly,
I charge thee by t'ie duty of a child.

Petru. Prethee come Maria, I forgive all.

Mar. Stay there; That duty, that you charge me by (If you consider truly what you say)

Is now another man's, you gave't away

I th' Church, if you remember, to my Husband:

So all you can exact now, is no more

But only a due reverence to your person,

Which thus I pay : Your blessing, and I am gone
To bed for this night.

Petru. This is monstrous :
That blessing that St. Dunstan gave the Devil,
If I were near thee, I would give thee —
Pull thee down by th' nose.

By. Saints should not rave, Sir ;
A little Rubarb now were excellent.

Petru. Then by that duty you owe to me Maria,
Open the door, and be obedient : I am quiet yet.

Mar. I do confess that duty, make your best on't.

Petru. Why give me leave, I will.

By. Sir, there's no learning
An old stiff Jade to trot, you know the moral.

Mar. Yet as I take it, Sir, I owe no more
Than you owe back again.

Petru. You will not Article?
All I owe, presently, let me but up, I'll pay.

Mar. Y' are too hot, and such prove Jades at length ;
You do confess a duty, or respect to me from you again :
That's very near, or full the same with mine ?

Petru. Yes.

Mar. Then by that duty, or respect, or what
You please to have it, go to bed and leave me,
And trouble me no longer with your fooling ;
For know, I am not for you.

Petru. Well, what remedy ?

Petron. A fine smart Cudgel. Oh that I were near thee.

By. If you had teeth now, what a case were we in ?

Mor. These are the most authentique Rebels, next Tyrone, I ever read of.

Mar. A week hence, or a fortnight, as you bear you,
And as I find my Will observ'd, I may,
With intercession of some friends, be brought
May be to kiss you ; and so quarterly
To pay a little Rent by composition,
You understand me ?

Soph. Thou Boy thou.

Petru. Well there are more Maids than Maudlin, that's my comfort.

Mar. Yes, and more men than Michael. (Lady.)

Petru. I must not to bed with this stomach, and no meat

Mar. Feed where you will, so it be found and wholesome,
Else live at Livery, for I'll none with you.

By. You had best back one of the Dairy Maids, they'll carry.

But take heed to your girths, you'll get a bruise else.

Petru. Now if thou wouldst come down and tender me :
All the delights due to a marriage-bed,

Study such kisses as would melt a man,
And turn thy self into a thousand Figures,
To add new flames unto me, I would stand
Thus heavy, thus regardless, thus despising
Thee, and thy best allurings : all the beauty
That's laid upon your bodies, mark me well,
For without doubt your mind's are miserable,
You have no Masques for them : all this rare beauty,
Lay but the Painter and the Silk-worm by,
The Doctor with his Dyets, and the Tailor,
And you appear like flea'd Cats, not so handsome.

Mar. And we appear like her that sent us hither,
That only excellent and beauteous nature ;
Truly our selves for men to wonder at,
But too divine to handle ; we are Gold,
In our own natures pure ; but when we suffer
The husbands stamp upon us, then allays,
And base ones of you men are mingled with us,
And make us blush like Copper.

Petru. Then, and never Till then are women to be spoken of,
For till that time you have no souls I take it :
Good night : come Gentlemen ; I'll fast for this night,
But by this hand, well ; I shall come up yet ?

Mar. No.

Petru. There will I watch thee like a wither'd Jury,
Thou shalt neither have meat, Fire, nor Candle,
Nor any thing that's easie : do you rebel so soon ?
Yet take mercy.

By. Put up your Pipes : to bed Sir, I'll assure you
A months siege will not shake us.

Moro. Well said Colonel.

Mar. To bed, to bed Petruchio : good night Gentlemen.
You'll make my Father sick with sitting up :
Here you shall find us any time these ten days,
Unless we may march off with our contentment.

Petru. I'll hang first.

Mar. And I'll quarter if I do not,
I'll make you know, and fear a wife Petruchio,
There my cause lies.

You have been famous for a woman-tamer,
And bear the fear'd-name of a brave Wife-breaker :
A woman now shall take those honors off, (me,
And tame you ; nay, never look so bigg, she shall believe
And I am she : what think ye ; good night to all,
Ye shall find Centinels.

By. If ye dare fally.

Exeunt above.

Petro. The devil's in 'em, ev'n the very devil, the downright devil.

Petru. I'll devil 'em : by these ten bones I will : I'll bring it to the old Proverb, no sport no pie : — taken down i'th' top of all my speed ? this is fine dancing : Gentlemen, stick to me. You see our Freehold's touch'd, and by this light, we will beleagure 'em, and either starve 'em out, or make 'em recreant.

Petro. I'll see all passages stopt, but those about 'em :
If the good women of the Town dare succor 'em,
We shall have wars indeed.

Soph. I'll stand perdue upon 'em.

Mor. My Regiment shall lie before.

Jaq. I think so. 'tis grown too old to stand.

Petru. Let's in, and each provide his tackle,
We'll fire 'em out, or make 'em take their pardons :
Hear what I say on their bare knees —
Am I Petruchio, fear'd, and spoken of,
And on my wedding night am I thus jaded ? Exeunt omn.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Rowland and Pedro at several doors.

Row. Now Pedro ?

Ped. Very busie Master Rowland.

Row. What haste man ?

Ped. I beseech you pardon me,
I am not mine own man.

Row. Thou art not mad ?

Ped. No ; but believe me, as hasty —

Row. The cause good Pedro ?

Ped. There be a thousand Sir ; you are not married ?

Row. Not yet.

Ped. Keep your self quiet then.

Row. Why ?

Ped. You'll find a Fiddle
That never will be tun'd else : from all women — Exit.

Row. What ails the fellow tro ? Jaqes ?

Enter Jaques.

Jaq. Your friend Sir.

But very full of business.

Row. Nothing but business ?

Prethee the reason, is there any dying ?

Jaq. I would there were Sir.

Row. But thy business ?

Jaq. I'll tell you in a word, I am sent to lay
An Imposition upon Soufe and Puddings,
Palties, and penny Custards, that the women
May not relieve you Rebels : Fare ye well, Sir.

Row. How does my Mistrifs ?

Jaq. Like a resty jade.

She's

She's spoil'd for riding.
Row. What a devil ail they?

Enter Sophocles.

Custards, and penny Pasties, Fools and Fiddles,
What's this to th' purpose? Oh well met.

Soph. Now Rowland.

I cannot stay to talk long.

Row. What's the matter?

Here's stirring, but to what end? whither goe you?

Soph. To view the Works.

Row. What Works?

Soph. The womens Trenches.

Row. Trenches? are such to see?

Soph. I do not jest, Sir.

Row. I cannot understand you.

Soph. Do not you hear

In what a state of quarrel the new Bride
Stands with her Husband?

Row. Let him stand with her, and there's an end.

Soph. It should be, but by'r Lady

She holds him out at Pikes end, and defies him,

And now is fortifi'd, such a Regiment of Rutters

Never defied men braver: I am sent

To view their preparation.

Row. This is news

Stranger, than Arms in the air: you saw not

My gentle Mistriſs?

Soph. Yes, and meditating

Upon some secret business, when she had found it

She leap'd for joy, and laugh'd, and straight retir'd

To shun Moroso.

Row. This may be for me.

Soph. Will you along?

Row. No.

Soph. Farewel.

Exit Sophocles.

Row. Farewel, Sir.

What should her musing mean, and what her joy in't,

If not for my advantage? stay ye; may not

Enter Livia at one door, and Moroso at another, barking.

That bob-tail jade Moroso, with his Gold,

His gew-gaudes, and the hope she has to send him

Quickly to dust, excite this? here she comes,

And yonder walks the Stallion to discover:

Yet I'll salute her: save you beauteous Mistriſs.

Liv. The Fox is kennel'd for me: save you Sir.

Row. Why do you look so strange?

Liv. I use to look Sir

Without examination.

Mor. Twenty Spur-Royals for that word.

Row. Belike then

The object discontents you?

Liv. Yes it does.

Row. Is't come to this? you know me, do you not?

Liv. Yes, as I may know many by repentance.

Row. Why do you break your faith?

Liv. I'll tell you that too,

You are under age, and no band holds upon you.

Mor. Excellent wench.

Liv. Sue out your understanding,

And get more hair to cover your bare knuckle;

(For boys were made for nothing, but dry kisses)

And if you can, more manners.

Mor. Better still.

Liv. And then if I want Spanish Gloves, or Stockings,

A ten pound Wastecoat, or a Nag to hunt on,

It may be I shall grace you to accept 'em.

Row. Farewel, and when I credit women more,

May I to Smithfield, and there buy a Jade,

(And know him to be so) that breaks my neck.

Liv. Because I have known you, I'll be thus kind to you;

Farewel, and be a man, and I'll provide you;

Because I see y'are desperate, some staid Chamber-maid

Exit Jaques.

That may relieve your youth with wholesome doctrine.

Mor. She's mine from all the world: ha wench?

Liv. Ha Chicken? — gives him a box o'th' ear, and Ex.

Mor. How's this? I do not love these favors: save you.

Row. The devil take thee — wrings him by th' nose.

Mor. Oh!

Row. There's a Love-token for you: thank me now.

Mor. I'll think on some of ye, and if I live,

My nose alone shall not be plaid withal.

Exit.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Petronius, and Moroso.

Petro. A Box o'th' ear do you say?

Mor. Yes sure, a sound one,

Beside my nose blown to my hand; if Cupid

Shoot Arrows of that weight, I'll swear devoutly,

H'as sued his Livery, and is no more a boy.

Petro. You gave her some ill language?

Mor. Not a word,

Petro. Or might be you were fumbling?

Mor. Would I had Sir.

I had been a forehead then; but to be baff'd,

And have no feeling of the cause —

Petro. Be patient,

I have a medicine clapt to her back will cure her.

Mor. No sure it must be afore, Sir.

Petro. O' my conscience,

When I got these two wenches (who till now

Ne'r shew'd their riding) I was drunk with Bastard,

Whose nature is to form things like it self

Heady, and monstrous: did she slight him too?

Mor. That's all my comfort: a meer Hobby-horse

She made child Rowland: s'foot she would not know him,

Not give him a free look, not reckon him

Among her thoughts, which I held more than wonder,

I having seen her within's three days kiss him.

With such an appetite as though she would eat him.

Petro. There is some trick in this: how did he take it;

Mor. Ready to cry; he ran away.

Petro. I fear her.

And yet I tell you, ever to my anger,

She is as tame as innocency; it may be

This blow was but a favour.

Mor. I'll be sworn 'twas well tied on then.

Petro. Goe too, pray forget it,

I have bespoke a Priest: and within's two hours

I'll have ye married; will that please you?

Mor. Yes.

Petro. I'll see it done my self, and give the Lady

Such a sound exhortation for this knavery

I'll warrant you, shall make her smell this month on't.

Mor. Nay good Sir be not violent.

Petro. Neither — Mor. It may be

Out of her earnest love there grew a longing

(As you know women have such toys) in kindness,

To give me a box o'th' ear, or so.

Petro. It may be.

Mor. I reckon for the best still: this night then

I shall enjoy her.

Petro. You shall handsel her.

Mor. Old as I am, I'll give her one blow for't

Shall make her groan this twelve-month,

Petro. Where's your Joynture?

Mor. I have a Joynture for her.

Petro. Have your Council perus'd it yet?

Mor. No Council but the night, and your sweet daugh- (ter,

Shall e'r peruse that joynture.

Petro. Very well, Sir.

Moro. I'll no demurrers on't, nor no rejoinders.
The other's ready seal'd.

Petro. Come then let's comfort
My Son Petruchio, he's like little Children
That loose their baubles, crying ripe.

Mor. Pray tell me,
Is this stern woman still upon the flaunt
Of bold defiance?

Petro. Still, and still she shall be,
Till she be starv'd out, you shall see such justice,
That women shall be glad after this tempest,
To tie their husbands shooes, and walk their horses.

Mor. That were a merry world: do you hear the rumor?
They say the women are in insurrection,
And mean to make a—

Petro. They'll sooner
Draw upon walls as we do: Let 'em, let 'em,
We'll ship 'em out in Cuck-stools, there they'll sail
As brave Columbus did, till they discover
The happy Islands of obedience.
We stay too long, Come.

Mor. Now St. George be with us.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Livia alone.

Liv. Now if I can but get in handsomely,
Father I shall deceive you; and this night
For all your private plotting, I'll no wedlock;
I have shifted sail, and find my Sisters safety
A sure retirement; pray to heaven that Rowland
Do not believe too far, what I said to him,
For yon old Foxcase forc'd me, that's my fear.
Stay, let me see, this quarter fierce Petruchio
Keeps with his Myrmidons, I must be suddain,
If he seize on me, I can look for nothing
But Marshal-Law; to this place have I scap'd him;
Above there.

Enter Maria and Byancha' above.

Mar. Cheval'a.

Liv. A friend.

By. Who are you?

Liv. Look out and know.

Mar. Alas poor wench, who sent thee?
What weak fool made thy tongue his Orator?
I know you come to parly.

Liv. Y'are deceiv'd,
Urg'd by the goodness of your cause, I come
To do as you do.

Mar. Y'are too weak, too foolish,
To cheat us with your smoothness: do not we know
Thou hast been kept up tame?

Liv. Believe me.

Mar. No, prethee good Livia
Utter thy Eloquence somewhere else.

By. Good Cousin

Put up your Pipes; we are not for your palate
Alas we know who sent you.

Liv. O' my word—

By. Stay there; you must not think your word,
Or by your Maidenhead, or such Sunday oaths,
Sworn after Even-Song, can inveigle us
To lose our hand-fast: did their wisdoms think
That sent you hither, we would be so foolish,
To entertain our gentle Sister Sinon,
And give her credit, while the wooden Jade
Petruchio stole upon us: no good Sister,
Go home, and tell the merry Greeks that sent you,
Ilium shall burn, and I, as did Aeneas,

Will on my back, spite of the Myrmidons,
Carry this warlike Lady, and through Seas
Unknown, and unbeliev'd, seek out a Land,
Where like a race of noble Amazons
We'll root our selves, and to our endless glory
Live, and despise base men.

Liv. I'll second ye.

By. How long have you been thus?

Liv. That's all one, Cousin,
I stand for freedom now.

By. Take heed of lying;
For by this light, if we do credit you,
And find you tripping, his infliction
That kill'd the Prince of Orange, will be sport
To what we purpose,

Liv. Let me feel the heaviest.

(maiden-head,

Mar. Swear by thy Sweet-heart Rowland (for by your
I fear 'twill be too late to swear) you mean
Nothing but fair and safe, and honourable
To us, and to your self.

Liv. I swear.

By. Stay yet,

Swear as you hate Moroso, that's the surest,
And as you have a certain fear to find him
Worse than a poor dry'd Jack, full of more aches
Than Autumn has; more knavery, and usury,
And foolery, and brokery, than dogs-ditch:
As you do constantly believe he's nothing
But an old empty bag with a grey beard,
And that Beard such a bob-tail, that it looks
Worse than a Mares tail eaten off with Fillies:
As you acknowledge that young handsome wench
That lies by such a Bibba blade that bends
With ev'ry pass he makes, to th' hilts, miserable,
A dry Nurse to his Coughs. a fewerer
To such a nasty fellow, a robb'd thing
Of all delights youth looks for: and to end,
One cast away on course beef, born to brush
That everlasting Caslock that has worn
As many Servants out, as the Northeast passage
Has consum'd Sailors: if you swear this, and truly
Without the reservation of a gown
Or any meritorious Petticoat,
'Tis like we shall believe you.

Liv. I do swear it.

Mar. Stay yet a little; came this wholesome motion
(Deal truly Sister) from your own opinion,
Or some suggestion of the Foe?

Liv. Nev'r fear me,

For by that little faith I have in Husbands,
And the great zeal I bear your cause, I come
Full of that liberty you stand for, Sister.

Mar. If we believe, and you prove recreant, Livia,
Think what a main you give the noble Cause
We now stand up for: Think what women shall,
An hundred years hence, speak thee, when examples
Are look'd for, and so great ones, whose relations,
Spoke as we do 'em wench, shall make new customs,

By. If you be false, repent, go home, and pray,
And to the serious women of the City
Confess your self; bring not a sin so hainous
To load thy soul to this place: mark me Livia,
If thou be'st double, and betray'st our honors,
And we fail in our purpose: get thee where
There is no women living, nor no hope
There ever shall be.

Mar. If a Mothers daughter,
That ever heard the name of stubborn husband
Find thee, and know thy sin.

By. Nay, if old age,
One that has worn away the name of woman,
And no more left to know her by, but railing,
No teeth, nor eyes, nor legs, but wooden ones
Come but i'th' wind-ward of thee, for sure she'll smell thee;
Thou'lt

Thou'lt be so rank, she'll ride thee like a night-Mare,
And say her Prayers back-ward to undo thee:
She'll curse thy meat and drink, and when thou marriest,
Clap a sound spell for ever on thy pleasures.

Mar. Children of five year old, like little Fairies,
Will pinch thee into motley: all that ever
Shall live, and hear of thee, I mean all women,
Will (like so many furies) shake their keys;
And to'st their flaming distaffs o'r their heads,
Crying revenge: take heed, 'tis hideous:
Oh 'tis a fearful office, if thou hadst
(Though thou be'st perfect now) when thou cam'st hither,
A false imagination, get thee gone,
And as my learned Cousin said, repent;
This place is sought by soundness.

Liv. So I seek it,
Or let me be a most despis'd example.

Mar. I do believe thee, be thou worthy of it.
You come not empty?

Liv. No, here's Cakes, and cold meat,
And Tripe of proof: behold, here's Wine and Beer,
Be suddain, I shall be surpriz'd else.

Mar. Meet at the low parlour door, there lies a close way:
What fond obedience you have living in you,
Or duty to a man before you enter,
Fling it away, 'twill but defile our Off'rings.

By. Be wary as you come,

Liv. I warrant ye.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter three Maids.

1 Mai. How goes your business Girls?
2. A foot, and fair.
3. If fortune favour us: away to your strength,
The Country Forces are arriv'd, be gone,
We are discover'd else.

1. Arm, and be valiant.
2. Think of our cause.
3. Our Justice.

1. 'Tis sufficient.

Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Rowland and Tranio at several doors.

Tra. Now Rowland?

Row. How do you?

Tra. How dost thou man?

Thou look'st ill:

Row. Yes, pray can you tell me Tranio,
Who knew the devil first?

Tra. A woman.

Row. So. Were they not well acquainted?

Tra. May be so,

For they had certain Dialogues together.

Row. He sold her fruit, I take it?

Tra. Yes, and Cheese

That choak'd all mankind after.

Row. Canst thou tell me

Whether that woman ever had a faith
After she had eaten?

Tra. That's a School-question

Row. No,

'Tis no question, for believe me Tranio,
That cold fruit after eating bread naught in her
But windy promises, and chollick vows
That broke out both ways.

Row. Thou hast heard I am sure
Of Esculapius, a far famed Surgeon,
One that could set together quarters'd Traitors
And make 'em honest men.

Tra. How dost thou Rowland?

Row. Let him but take, (if he dare do a cure Shall get him fame indeed) a faithless woman,
There will be credit for him, that will speak him,

A broken woman Tranio, a base woman,
And if he can cure such a rack of honor
Let him come here, and practice.

Tra. Now for honors sake,
Why what ail'st thou Rowland?

Row. I am ridden Tranio.

And spur-gall'd to the life of patience
(Heaven keep my wits together) by a thing
Our worst thoughts are too noble for, a woman.

Tra. Your Mistriss has a little frown'd it may be?

Row. She was my Mistriss.

Tra. Is she not?

Row. No Tranio.

She has done me such disgrace, so spitefully
So like a woman bent to my undoing,
That henceforth, a good horse shall be my Mistriss,
A good Sword, or a Book: and if you see her,
Tell her I beseech you, even for love sake.—

Tra. I will Rowland.

Row. She may sooner

Count the good I have thought her,
Our old love and our friendship,
Shed one true tear, mean one hour constantly,
Be oid and honest, married, and a maid,
Than make me see her more, or more believe her:
And now I have met a messenger, farewell Sir.

Exit.

Tra. Alas poor Rowland, I will do it for thee:

This is that dog Moroso, but I hope
To see him cold i'th' mouth first, e'r he enjoy her:
I'll watch this young man, desperate thoughts may seize him,
And if my purse or council can, I'll ease him.

Exit.

Scena Quinta.

Enter Petruchio, Petronius, Moroso, and Sophocles.

Petru. For look you Gentlemen, say that I grant her,
Out of my free and liberal love, a pardon,
Which you, and all men else know, she deserves not,
(Teneatis amici) can all the world leave laughing?

Petro. I think not.

Petru. No by——they cannot;
For pray consider, have you ever read,
Or heard of, or can any man imagine,
So stiff a Tom-boy, of so set a malice,
And such a brazen resolution,
As this young Crab-tree? and then answer me;
And mark but this too friends, without a cause,
Not a foul word come cross her, not a fear,
She justly can take hold on, and do you think
I must sleep out my anger, and endure it,
Sow pillows to her ease, and lull her mischief?
Give me a Spindle first: no, no my Masters,
Were she as fair as Nell-a-Greece, and housewife,
As good as the wife Sailors wife, and young still,
Never above fifteen, and these tricks to it,
She should ride the wild Mare once a week, she should,
(Believe me friends she should) I would tabor her,
Till all the Legions that are crept into her,
Flew out with fire i'th' tails.

Soph. Methinks you err now,
For to me seems, a little sufferance
Were a far surer cure.

Petru. Yes, I can suffer,
Where I see promises of peace and amendment.

Mor. Give her a few conditions.

Petru. I'll be hanged first.

Petron. Give her a Crab-tree Cudgel.

Petru. So I will;

And after it a flock-bed for her bones.
And hard eggs, till they brace her like a Drum,
She shall be pamper'd with ——
She shall not know a stool in ten months, Gentlemen.

Soph. This must not be.

Enter

Enter Jaques.

Jaq. Arm, arm, out with your weapons,
For all the women in the Kingdom's on ye;

Enter Pedro.

They swarm like wasps, and nothing can destroy 'em,
But stopping of their hive, and smothering of 'em.

Ped. Stand to your guard, Sir, all the devils extant
Are broke upon us like a cloud of thunder;
There are more women marching hitherward,
In rescue of my Mistress, than e'er turn'd tail
At Sturbridge Fair, and I believe, as fiery.

Jaq. The forlorn-hope's led by a Tanner's wife,
I know her by her Hide, a desperate woman:
She flead her Husband in her youth, and made
Raynes of his Hide to ride the parish. Take 'em all together,
They are a genealogy of Jennets, gotten
And born thus by the boisterous breath of Husbands;
They serve sure, and are swift to catch occasion,
(I mean their foes or Husbands) by the forelocks,
And there they hang like favours; cry they can
But more for Noble Spight, than fear: and crying
Like the old Giants that were foes to heaven,
They heave ye stool on stool, and sling main Pot-lids
Like massie Rocks, dart Ladles, tossing Irons,
And Tongs like Thunderbolts, till overlaid,
They fall beneath the weight; yet still aspiring
At those Emperious Godheads that would tame 'em.
There's ne'r a one of these, the worst and weakest,
(Chuse where you will,) but dare attempt the raising,
Against the sovereign peace of Puritans,
A May-pole and a Morris, maugre mainly
Their zeal, and Dudgeon-daggers: and yet more,
Dares plant a stand of batt'ring Ale against 'em,
And drink 'em out o'th' parish. (tience.

Soph. Lo you fierce Petruchio, this comes of your impa-

Ped. There's one brought in the Bears against the Canons
Of the Town, made it good, and fought 'em.

Jaq. Another to her everlasting fame, erected
Two Ale-houses of ease: the Quarter-Scissions
Running against her roundly; in which business
'Two of the disanullers lost their night-caps:
A third stood excommunicate by the cudgel;
The Constable, to her eternal glory,
Drunk hard, and was converted, and she victor.

Ped. Then are they victualed with Pies and Puddings,
(The trappings of good Stomachs) noble Ale
The true defender, Sauages, and smoak'd ones,
If need be, such as serve for Pikes; and Pork,
(Better the Jews ne'r hated:) here and there
A bottle of Metbeglin, a stout Britain
That will stand to 'em; what else they want, they war for.

Petru. Come to council.

Soph. Now you must grant conditions, or the Kingdom
Will have no other talke but this.

Petron. Away then, and let's advise the best.

Soph. Why do you tremble?

Mor. Have I liv'd thus long to be knockt o'th' head,
With half a Washing-beetle: pray be wise, Sir.

Petru. Come, something I'll do, but what it is, I know not.

Soph. To Council then, and let's avoid their follies.
Guard all the doors, or we shall not have a Cloak left.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia:

Enter Petronius, Petruchio, Moroso, Sophocles, and Tranio.

Petro. I am indifferent, though I must confess,
I had rather see her carted.

Tra. No more of that, Sir.

Soph. Are ye resolv'd to give her fair conditions?
'Twill be the safest way.

Petru. I am distracted,
Would I had run my head into a halter
When I first woo'd her: if I offer peace,
She'll urge her own conditions, that's the devil.

Soph. Why, say she do?

Petru. Say, I am made an Afs, then;
I know her aim: may I, with reputation
(Answer me this) with safety of mine honor,
(After the mighty manage of my first wife,
Which was indeed a fury to this Filly,
After my twelve strong labours to reclaim her,
Which would have made Don Hercules horn mad,
And hid him in his Hide) suffer this Cicely?
E're she have warm'd my sheets, e're grappell'd with me,
This Pinck, this painted Foist, this Cockle-boat,
To hang her Fights out, and desie me friends,
A well known man of war? if this be equal,
And I may suffer, say, and I have done?

Petron. I do not think you may.

Tra. You'll make it worse, Sir.

Soph. Pray hear me good Petruchio: but ev'n now,
You were contented to give all conditions,
To try how far she would carry: 'Tis a folly,
(And you will find it so) to clap the curb on,
E're you be sure it proves a natural wildness,
And not a forc'd. Give her conditions,
For on my life this trick is put into her,

Petron. I should believe so too.

Soph. And not her own.

Tra. You'll find it so.

Soph. Then if she slownder with you,
Clap spurs on, and in this you'll deal with temperance,
Avoid the hurry of the world.

Tra. And loose.

Musick above.

Mor. No honor on my life, Sir.

Petru. I will do it.

Petron. It seems they are very merry.

Enter Jaques.

Petru. Why Heaven hold it.

Mor. Now Jaques?

Jaq. They are i'th' flaunt, Sir.

Soph. Yes we hear 'em.

Jaq. They have got a stick of Fiddles, and they firk it,
In wondrous ways, the two grand Capitano's,
(They brought the Auxiliary Regiments)
Dance with their coats tuckt up to their bare breeches,
And bid the Kingdom kifs 'em, that's the burden;
They have got Metbeglin, and audacious Ale;
And talk like Tyrants.

Petron. How knowest thou?

Jaq. I pcept in
At a loole Lansket.

SONG.

A Health for all this day
To the woman that bears the sway
And wears the breeches;
Let it come, let it come.

Let this health be a Seal,
For the good of the Common-weal
the woman shall wear the breeches.

Let's drink then and laugh it
And merrily merrily quaff it
And tipple, and tipple a round here's to thy fool,
and to my fool.
Come, to all fools
though it cost us wench, many a pound.

Tra.

Tra. Hark.

Petro. A Song, pray silence.

Mor. They look out.

Petru. Good ev'n Ladies.

Mar. Good you good ev'n Sir.

Petru. How have you slept to night?

Mar. Exceeding well Sir.

Petru. Did you not wish me with you?

Mar. No, believe me,
I never thought upon you.

Cun. Is that he?

Bya. Yes.

Cun. Sir?

Soph. She has drank hard, mark her Hood.

Cun. You are—

Soph. Learnedly drunk, I'll hang else: let her utter.

Cun. And I must tell you, viva voce friend,
A very foolish fellow.

Tra. There's an Ale figure.

Petru. I thank you Susan Brotes.

Cit. Forward Sister.

Cun. You have espoused here a hearty woman,
A comly, and courageous.

Petru. Well, I have so.

Cun. And to the comfort of distressed damfels,
Women out-worn in wedlock; and such vessels,
This woman has defied you.

Petru. It should seem so.

Cun. And why?

Petru. Yes, can you tell?

Cun. For thirteen causes.

Petru. Pray by your patience Mistrifs.

Cit. Forward Sister.

Petru. Do you mean to treat of all these?

Cit. Who shall let her?

Petro. Do you hear, Velvet hood, we come not now
To hear your doctrine

Cun. For the first, I take it,
It doth divide it self into seven branches.

Petru. Hark you good Maria,
Have you got a Catechiser here?

Tra. Good zeal.

Soph. Good three pil'd predication, will you peace,
And hear the cause we come for?

Cun. Yes bob-tails

We know the cause you come for, here's the cause,
But never hope to carry her, never dream
Or flatter your opinions with a thought
Of base repentance in her.

Cit. Give me Sack,
By this, and next strong Ale.

Cun. Swear forward Sister.

Cit. By all that's cordial, in this place we'll bury
Our bones, fames, tongues, our triumphs and all
That ever yet was chronic'd of woman;
But this brave wench, this excellent despiser,
This bane of dull obedience, shall inherit
His liberal Will, and march off with conditions
Noble, and worth her self.

Cun. She shall Tom Tilers,
And brave ones too, my Hood shall make a Hearse-cloth,
And I'll lie under it like Jone o' Gaunt,
E'r I go less, my Distaff stuck up by me;
For the eternal Trophy of my conquests;
And loud fame at my head with two main bottles,
Shall fill to all the world the glorious fall
Of old Don Gillian.

Cit. Yet a little farther,
We have taken Arms in rescue of this Lady;
Most just and Noble: if ye beat us off
Without conditions, and we recant,
Use us as we deserve; and first degrade us
Of all our antient chambring: next that
The Symbols of our secrese, silk Stockings,

*All the Women above,
Citizens and Countrey
women.*

Hew of our heels; our petticoats of Arms
Tear off our bodies, and our Bodkins break
Over our coward heads.

Cun. And ever after
To make the tainture most notorious,
At all our Crests, videlicet our Plackets.
Let Laces hang, and we return again
Into our former titles, Dary-maids.

Petru. No more wars: puissant Ladies, shew conditions
And freely I accept 'em.

Mar. Call in Livia;
She's in the Treaty too.

Enter Livia above.

Mor. How, Livia?

Mar. Hear you that Sir?

There's the conditions for ye, pray peruse 'em.

Petron. Yes, there she is: 't had been no right rebellion,
Had she held off; what think you man?

Mor. Nay nothing.
I have enough o'th' prospect: o' my conscience,
The worlds end, and the goodness of a woman
Will come together.

Petron. Are you there sweet Lady?

Liv. Cry you mercy Sir, I saw you not: your blessing.

Petron. Yes, when I bleis a jade, that stumbles with me.
How are the Articles?

Liv. This is for you Sir;
And I shall think upon't.

Mor. You have us'd me finely.

Liv. There's no other use of thee now extant,
But to be hung up, Cassock, Cap, and all,
For some strange monster at Apothecaries.

Petron. I hear you whore.

Liv. It must be his then Sir,
For need will then compel me.

Cit. Blessing on thee.

Petron. There's no talking to 'em;
How are they Sir?

Petru. As I expected: Liberty and clothes, Reads.
When, and in what way she will: continual moneys,
Company, and all the house at her dispose;
No tongue to say, why is this? or whether will it;
New Coaches, and some buildings, she appoints here;
Hangings, and Hunting-horses: and for Plate
And Jewels for her private use, I take it,
Two thousand pound in present: then for Musick,
And women to read French;

Petron. This must not be.

Petru. And at the latter end a clause put in,
That Livia shall by no man be importun'd.
This whole month yet, to marry.

Petron. This is monstrous.

Petru. This shall be done, I'll humor her awhile:
If nothing but repentance and undoing
Can win her love, I'll make a shift for one.

Soph. When ye are once a bed, all these conditions
Lie under your own seal.

Mar. Do you like 'em?

Petru. Yes.

And by that faith I gave you 'fore the Priest
I'll ratifie 'em.

Cun. Stay, what pledges?

Mar. No, I'll take that oath;
But have a care you keep it.

Cit. 'Tis not now
As when Andrea liv'd.

Cun. If you do juggle,
Or alter but a Letter of these Articles
We have set down the self-same persecution.

Mar. Mistrust him not.

Petru. By all my honesty——

Mar. Enough, I yield.

Petron.

Petron. What's this Inferred here ?

Soph. That the two valiant women that commanded here
Shall have a Supper made 'em, and a large one,
And liberal entertainment without grudging,
And pay for all their soldiers.

Petra. That shall be too;
And if a Tun of Wine will serve to pay 'em,
They shall have justice: I ordain ye all
Pay-masters, Gentlemen,

Tra. Then we shall have sport boys,

Mar. We'll meet you in the Parlor.

Petru. Ne'r look sad, Sir, for I will do it,

Soph. There's no danger in't.

Petro. For Livia's Article you shall observe it,
I have ti'd my self.

Petron. I will.

Petra. Along then: now
Either I break, or this stiff plant must bow.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Tranio and Rowland.

Tra. Come you shall take my counsel.

Row. I shall hang first.

I'll no more love, that's certain, 'tis a bane,
(Next that they poison Rats with) the most mortal:
No, I thank Heaven, I have got my sleep again,
And now begin to write fence; I can walk ye
A long hour in my chamber like a man,
And think of some thing that may better me;
Some serious point of Learning, or my state;
No more ay-mees, and Mistrisses, Tranio,
Come near my brain. I'll tell thee, had the devil
But any essence in him of a man,
And could be brought to love, and love a woman,
'Twould make his head ake worser than his horns do;
And firke him with a fire he never felt yet,
Would make him dance. I tell thee there is nothing
(It may be thy case Tranio, therefore hear me:)
Under the Sun (reckon the mass of follies Crept into th' world with man) so desperate,
So mad, so senseless, poor and base, so wretched,
Roguy, and scurvy,

Tra. Whether wilt thou Rowland?

Row. As 'tis to be in love.

Tra. And why for virtue sake?

Row. And why for virtue's sake? dost thou not conceive

Tra. No by my troth. me?

Row. Pray then and heartily,

For fear thou fall into't: I'll tell thee why too,
(For I have hope to save thee) when thou lovest,
And first beginst to worship the gilt calf:

Imprimis, thou hast lost thy gentry,
And like a Prentice, flung away thy Freedom,
Forthwith thou art a slave.

Tra. That's a new Doctrine.

Row. Next thou art no more man.

Tra. What then?

Row. A Fryppery;
Nothing but braided hair and penny ribbond,
Glove, Garter, Ring, Rose, or at best a Swabber,
If thou canst love so near to keep thy making,
Yet thou wilt lose thy language.

Tra. Why?

Row. Oh Tranio,
Those things in love, ne'er talk as we do,

Tra. No?

Row. No, without doubt, they sigh, and shake the head,
And sometimes whistle dolefully.

Tra. No tongue?

Row. Yes Tranio, but no truth in't, nor no reason,
And when they cant (for 'tis a kind of canting)
Ye shall hear, if you reach to understand 'em
(Which you must be a fool first, or you cannot)
Such gibb'rish; such believe me, I protest Sweet,
And oh dear Heavens, in which such constellations
Reign at the births of Lovers, this is too well,
And daigne me Lady, daigne me I beseech ye
You poor unworthy lump, and then she licks him.

Tra. A—on't, this is nothing.

Row. Thou hast hit it:

Then talks she ten times worse, and wryes, and wriggles,
As though she had the Itch (and so it may be.)

Tra. Why thou art grown a strange discoverer.

Row. Of mine own follies Tranio.

Tra. Wilt thou Rowland,
Certain ne'er love again?

Row. I think so, certain,

And if I be not dead drunk I shall keep it.

Tra. Tell me but this; what dost thou think of women?

Row. Why, as I think of Fiddles, they delight me,
Till their strings break.

Tra. What strings?

Row. Their modesties,
Faiths, Vows, and Maidenheads, for they are like Kits
They have but four strings to 'em.

Tra. What wilt thou

Give me for ten pound now, when thou next lovest,
And the same woman still?

Row. Give me the money;

A hundred, and my Bond for't.

Tra. But pray hear me,

I'll work all means I can to reconcile ye:

Row. Do, do, Give me the money;

Tra. There.

Row. Work Tranio.

Tra. You shall go sometimes where she is.

Row. Yes straight.

This is the first good I e'er got by woman.

Tra. You would think it strange now, if another beauty
As good as hers, say better.

Row. Well.

Tra. Conceive me,
This is no point o' th' wager.

Row. That's all one,

Tra. Love you as much, or more, than now she hates you.

Row. 'Tis a good hearing, let 'em love: ten pound more,
I never love that woman.

Tra. There it is;

And so an hundred, if you lose.

Row. 'Tis done;

Have you another to put in?

Tra. No, no Sir.

Row. I am very sorry: now will I erect
A new game, and go hate for th' bell; I am sure
I am in excellent case to win.

Tra. I must have leave.

To tell you, and tell truth too, what she is,
And how she suffers for you.

Row. Ten pound more,
I never believe you.

Tra. No Sir, I am stinted.

Row. Well, take your best way then.

Tra. Let's walk, I am glad
Your sullen Feavor's off.

Row. Shalt see me Tranio

A monstrous merry man now: let's to the Wedding,
And as we go, tell me the general hurry
Of these mad wenches and their works.

Tra. I will.

Row. And do thy worst.

Tra. Something I'll do.

Row. Do Tranio.

Exeunt.
Scena

Scena Secunda.

Enter Pedro, and Jaques.

Ped. A pair of Stocks bestride 'em, Are they gone?

Jac. Yes they are gone; and all the pans i'th Town
Beating before 'em: What strange admonitions
They gave my Master and how fearfully
They threaten'd, if he broke 'em?Ped. O' my Conscience
H'as found his full match now.

Jac. That I believe too.

Ped. How did she entertain him?

Jac. She lookt on him.

Ped. But icurvly.

Jac. With no great affection
That I saw: and I heard some say he kiss'd her,
But 'twas upon a treaty, and some copies
Say, but her Check.Ped. Jaques, What wouldst thou give For such a Wife now?Jac. Full as many Payers
As the most zealous Puritane conceives
Out of the meditation of fat Veal,
Or Birds of prey, cram'd Capons, against Players,
And to as good a tune too, but against her:
That heaven would blefs me from her: mark it Pedro,
If this house be not turn'd within this fortnight
With the foundation upward, I'll be carted.
My comfort is yet, that those Amorites,
That came to back her cause, those Heathen Whores,
Had their Hoods hallowed with Sack.

Ped. How Divlish drunk they were?

Jac. And how they tumbled, Pedro, Didst thou marke
The Countrey Cavaliero?Ped. Out upon her,
How she turn'd down the Bragget?

Jac. I that sunk her.

Ped. That Drink was well put to her; What a Sommer salt
When the chair fel, she fetch'd, with her heels upward?

Jac. And what a piece of Landskip she discover'd?

Ped. Didst mark her, when her hood fell in the Possiet?

Jac. Yes, and there rid, like a Dutch-Hoy; the Tumbrel,
When she had got her ballasse.

Ped. That I saw too.

Jac. How fain she would have drawn on Sophocles
To come aboard, and how she simper'd it—

Ped. I warrant her, she has been a worthy striker.

Jac. P'th heat of Summer there had been some hope

Ped. Hang her. (on't.)

Jac. She offer'd him a Harry-groat, and belcht out,
Her stomach being blown with Ale, such Courtship,
Upon my life has giv'n him twenty stools since:
Believe my Calculation, these old Women,
When they are tipp'd, and a little heated,
Are like new wheels, they'll roare you all the Town ore
Till they be greas'd.Ped. The City Cinque-a-pace
Dame Toft and Butter, had the Bob too?

Jac. Yes,

But she was fullen drunk, and given to filching,
I see her offer at a Spoon; my Master——
I do not like his look, I fear h'as fasted
For all this preparation; lets steal by him.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Petruchio, and Sophocles.

Sopb. Not let you touch her all this night?

Petru. Nottouch her.

Sopb. Where was your courage?

Petru. Where was her obedience?

Never poor Man was sham'd so; never Rascal
That keeps a stud of Whores was us'd so basely.Sopb. I ray you tell me one thing truly;
Do you love her?Petru. I would I did not, upon that condition
I past thee half my Land.Sopb. It may be then,
Her modesty requir'd a little violence?
Some Women love to struggle.Petru. She had it,
And so much that I sweat for't, so I did,
But to no end: I washt an ethiope:
She swore my force might weary her, but win her
I never could, nor should, till she consented;
And I might take her body prisoner,
But for her mind or appetite—Sopb. 'Tis strange;
This woman is the first I ever read of,
Retus'd a warranted occasion,
And standing on so fair termes.

Petru. I shall quit her.

Sopb. Us'd you no more art?

Petru. Yes, I swore to her,
And by no little ones, if presently
Without more disputation on the matter,
She grew not nearer to me, and dispatcht me
Out of the pains I was, for I was nettl'd,
And willingly, and eagerly, and sweetly,
I would to her Chamber-maid, and in her hearing
Begin her such a hunt-up.

Sopb. Then she started?

Petru. No more than I do now; marry she answered
If I were so dispos'd, she could not help it;
But there was one call'd Jaques, a poor Butler
One that might well content a single woman.

Sopb. And he should tilt her.

Petru. To that fence, and last
She had me yet these six nights look for nothing,
Nor strive to purchase it, but fair good night,
And so good morrow, and a kiss or two
To close my stomach, for her vow had seal'd it,
And she would keep it constant.Sopb. Stay ye, stay ye,
Was she thus when you woo'd her?Petru. Nothing Sophocles,
More keenly eager, I was oft afraid
She had been light, and easie, she would showre
Her kisses so upon me.Sopb. Then I fear
An other spoke's i'th wheele.Petru. Now thou hast found me,
There gnawes my Devil, Sophocles, O patience
Preserve me; that I make her not example
By some unworthy way; as fleaing her,
Boyling, or making verjuice, drying her.

Sopb. I hear her.

Petru. Mark her then, and see the heir
Of spight and prodigality, she has studied
A way to begger's both, and by this handMaria at the dore, and Servant and Woman.
She shall be, if I live, a Doxy.

Sopb. Fy Sir.

Mar. I do not like that dressing, tis too poor,
Let me have six gold laces, broad and massy,
And betwixt ev'ry lace a rich Embroydry,
Line the Gown through with Plusn perfum'd, and puffle,
All the sleeves down with Pearl.Petru. What think you Sophocles.
In what point stands my state now?

Mar. For those hangings.

Hh

Let'em

Let 'em be carried where I gave appointment,
They are too base for my use, and bespeak
New Pieces of the Civil Wars of France,
Let 'em be large and lively, and all silk work,
The borders Gold.

Soph. I marry sir, this cuts it.

Mar. That fourteen yards of Satten give my Woman,
I do not like the colour, 'tis too civil:
Ther's too much Silk i'th lace too; tell the Dutchman
Tha brought the Mares, he must with all speed send me
An other suit of Horses, and by all means
Ten cast of Hawkes for th' River, I much care not
What price they bear, so they be found, and flying,
For the next Winter, I am for the Country;
And mean to take my pleasure; where's the Horseman?

Petru. She means to ride a great Horse.

Soph. With a side saddle?

Petru. Yes, and shee'l run a tilt within this twelve(month

Mar. To morrow I'll begin to learn, but pray sir
Have a great care he be an easie doer,
'Twill spoil a Scholar else.

Soph. An easie doer,
Did you hear that?

Petru. Yes, I shall meet her morals
Ere it be long I fear not.

Mar. O good morrow.

Soph. Good morrow Lady, how is't now.

Mar. Faith sickly,
This house stands in an ill ayre.

Petru. Yet more charges?

Mar. Subject to rots, and rheums; out on't, 'tis nothing
But a tild fog.

Petru. What think you of the Lodge then?

Mar. I like the seat, but 'tis too little, Sophocles
Let me have thy opinion, thou hast judgment.

Petru. 'Tis very well.

Mar. What if I pluck it down,
And build a square upon it, with two courts
Still rising from the entrance?

Petru. And i'th midst

A Colled_e for young Scolds.

Mar. And to the Southward

Take in a Garden of some twenty Acres,
And cast it of the Italian fashion, hanging.

Petru. And you could cast your self so too; pray Lady
Will not this cost much Money?

Mar. Some five thousand,
Say six: I'll have it Battel'd too.

Petru. And gilt; Maria,

This is a fearful course you take, pray think on't,
You are a Woman now, a Wife, and his
That must in honesty, and justice look for
Some due obedience from you.

Mar. That bare word

Shall cost you many a pound more, build upon't;
Tell me of due obedience? VVhat's a Husband?
VVhat are we married for, to carry Sumpters?
Are we not one peece with you, and as worthy
Our own intentions, as you yours?

Petru. Pray hear me.

Mar. Take two small drops of water, equal weigh'd,
Tell me which is the heaviest, and which ought
First to descend in duty?

Petru. You mistake me;

I urge not service from you, nor obedience
In way of duty, but of love, and Credit;
All I expect is but a noble care
Of what I have brought you, and of what I am,
And what our name may be.

Mar. That's in my making.

Petru. 'Tis true it is so.

Mar. Yes, it is Petruchio,
For there was never Man without our molding,
VVithout our stamp upon him, and our justice,

Left any thing three ages after him
Good, and his own.

Soph. Good Lady understand him.

Mar. I do too much, sweet Sophocles, he's one
Of a most spiteful self condition,
Never at peace with any thing but Age,
That I as no teeth left to return his anger:
A Bravery dwells in his blood yet, of abusing
His first good wife; he's sooner fire than powder,
And sooner mischief.

Petru. If I be so fodain
Do not you fear me?

Mar. No nor yet care for you,
And if it may be lawful, I desie you:

Petru. Do's this become you now?

Mar. It shall become me.

Petru. Thou disobedient, weak, vain-glorious woman,
Were I but half so wilful, as thou spiteful,
I should now drag thee to thy duty.

Mar. Drag me?

Petru. But I am friends again: take all your pleasure.

Mar. Now you perceive him Sophocles.

Petru. I love thee

Above thy vanity, thou faithless creature.

Mar. Would I had been so happy when I Married,
But to have met an honest Man like thee,
For I am sure thou art good, I know thou art honest,
A handsome hurtless man, a loving man,
Though never a penny with him; and those eyes,
That face, and that true heart; weare this for my sake,
And when thou think'st upon me pity me:

I am cast away,

Exit Mar.

Soph. VVhy how now man?

Petru. Pray leave me,
And follow your advices.

Soph. The Man's jealous:

Petru. I shall find a time ere it be long, to ask you
One or two foolish questions.

Soph. I shall answer

As well as I am able, when you call me:
If she mean true, 'tis but a little killing,
And if I do not venture it's —
Farewel sir.

Exit Soph.

Petru. Pray farewel. Is there no keeping
A VVife to one mans use? no wintering
These cattel without straying? 'Tis hard dealing,
Very hard dealing, Gentlemen, strange dealing:
Now in the name of madness, what Star raign'd,
VVhat dog-star, bull, or bear-star, when I married
This second wife, this whirlwind, that takes all
VVithin her compass? was I not well warn'd,
(I thought I had, and I believe I know it,)
And beaten to repentance in the dayes
Of my first doting? had I not wife enough
To turn my love to? did I want vexation,
Or any special care to kill my heart?
Had I not ev'ry morning a rare breakfast,
Mixt with a learned Lecture of ill language,
Louder than Tom o' Lincoln; and at dinner,
A dyet of the same dish? was there evening
That ere past over us, without thou Knave,
Or thou VVhore for digestion? had I ever
A pull at this same poor sport men run mad for
But like a Cur I was fain to shew my teeth first,
And almost worry her? and did Heaven forgive me,
And take this Serpent from me? and am I
Keeping tame Devils now again? my heart akes;
Something I must do speedily: I'll die,
If I can handsomely, for that's the way
To make a Rascal of her; I am sick,
And I'll goe very near it, but I'll perish.

Exit.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Livia, Byancha, Tranio, and Rowland.

Liv. Then I must be content, Sir, with my fortune.
Row. And I with mine.
Liv. I did not think, a look,
 Or a poor word or two, could have displanted
 Such a fix'd constancy, and for your end too. (gaws,
Row. Come, come, I know your courtes: there's your gew-
 Your Rings, and Bracelets, and the Purse you gave me,
 The Money's spent in entertaining you
 At Plays, and Cherry-gardens.
Liv. There's your Chain too.
 But if you'll give me leave, I'll wear the hair still;
 I would yet remember you.
Bya. Give him his love wench;
 The young Man has imployment for't:
Tra. Fic Rowland.
Row. You cannot fie me out a hundred pound
 With this poor plot: yet, let me ne'r see day more,
 If something do not struggle strangely in me.
Bya. Young Man, let me talk with you.
Row. Well, young Woman.
Bya. This was your Mistrifs once.
Row. Yes.
Bya. Are ye honest?
 I see you are young, and handsome.
Row. I am honest. (judgement
Bya. Why that's well said: and there's no doubt your
 Is good enough, and strong enough to tell you
 Who are your foes, and friends: Why did you leave her?
Row. She made a puppy of me.
Bya. Be that granted:
 She must do so sometimes, and oftentimes;
 Love were too serious else.
Row. A witty Woman.
Bya. Had you lov'd me—
Row. I would I had.
Bya. And dearly;
 And I had lov'd you so: you may love worse Sir,
 But that is not material.
Row. I shall loofe.
Bya. Some time or other for variety
 I should have call'd you Fool, or Boy, or bid you Play with the Pages: but have lov'd you still,
 Out of all question, and extreamly too;
 You are a Man made to be loved:
Row. This Woman.
 Either abuses me, or loves me deadly.
Bya. I'll tell you one thing, if I were to choofe
 A Husband to mine own mind, I should think
 One of your Mothers making would content me,
 For o' my Conscience she makes good ones.
Row. Lady,
 I'll leave you to your commendations:
 I am in again, The Divil take their tongues.
Bya. You shall not goe.
Row. I will: yet thus far Livia,
 Your Sortow may induce me to forgive you,
 But never love again; if I stay longer,
 I have lost two hundred pound.
Liv. Good Sir, but thus much—
Tra. Turn if thou beest a Man.
Liv. But one kifs of you;
 One parting kifs, and I am gone too.
Row. Come,
 I shall kifs fifty pound away at this clap:
 We'll have one more, and then farewell.
Liv. Farewel.
Bya. Well, go thy wayes, thou bear'st a kind heart
Tra. H'as made a stand. (with thee.
Bya. A noble, brave young fellow

Worthy a Wench indeed.

Row. I will: I will not. Exit Rowland.
Tra. He's gone: but shocagen; play you but your part,
 And I will keep my promise: forty Angels
 In fair gold, Lady: wipe your eyes: he's yours
 If I have any wit.
Liv. I'll pay the forfeit.
Bya. Come then, let's see your sifter, how she fares now,
 After her skirmish: and be sure, Moroso
 Be kept in good hand; then all's perfect, Livia.
Exeunt.

Scena Quinta.

Enter Jaques and Pedro.

Ped. O Jaques, Jaques, What becomes of us?
 Oh my sweet Master.
Jaq. Run for a Physitian,
 And a whole peck of Pothecaries, Pedro.
 He will die, didle, didle die: if they come not quickly,
 And bring all People that are skillful
 In Lungs and Livers: raise the neighbours,
 And all the Aquavite-bottles extant;
 And, O the Parson, Pedro; O the Parson,
 A little of his comfort, never so little;
 Twenty to one you find him at the Bush,
 There's the best Ale.
Ped. I fly. Exit Pedro.

Enter Maria, and Servants.

Mar. Out with the Trunks, ho:
 Why are you idle? Sirha, up to th' Chamber,
 And take the Hangings down, and see the Linnen
 Packt up, and sent away within this half hour.
 What, Are the Carts come yet? some honest body
 Help down the Chests of Plate, and some the Wardrobe,
 Alas, we are undone else.
Jaq. Pray forsooth;
 And I beseech ye, tell me, is he dead yet?
Mar. No, but is drawing on: out with the Armour.
Jaq. Then I'll go see him.
Mar. Thou art undone then Fellow; no Man that has Been near him come near me.

Enter Sophocles, and Petronius.

Soph. Why how now Lady, What means this?
Petron. Now daughter, How does my Son?
Mar. Save all you can for Heavens sake.

Enter Livia, Byancha, and Tranio.

Liv. Be of good comfort, Sister.
Mar. O my Casket.
Petron. How do's thy Husband Woman?
Mar. Get you gon, if you mean to save your lives: the Petron. Stand further off, I prethee. (Sickness.
Mar. Is i'th house Sir,
 My Husband has it now;
 Alas he is infected, and raves extreamly:
 Give me some Counsel friends.
Bya. Why lock the doors up,
 And send him in a Woman to attend him.
Mar. I have bespoke two Women; and the City
 Hath sent a Watch by this time: Meat nor Money
 He shall not want, nor Prayers.
Petron. How long is't
 Since it first took him?

Mar. But within this three hours.

Enter Watch.

I am frighted from my wits: — O here's the Watch; Pray doe your Office, lock the doors up Friends, And patience be his Angel.

Tra. This comes unlook'd for:

Mar. I'll to the lodge; some that are kind and love me, I know will visit me.

Petru. Doe you hear my Masters: ho, you that lock the Petron. 'Tis his voice. (doors up.)

Tra. Hold, and let's hear him.

Petru. Will ye starve me here: am I a Traytor, or an Or am I grown infectious? (Heretick.)

Petron. Pray sir, pray.

Petru. I am as well as you are, goodman puppy.

Mar. Pray have patience.

You shall want nothing Sir.

Petru. I want a cudgel,

And thee, thou wickedness.

Petron. He speaks well enough.

Mar. 'Had ever a strong heart Sir.

Petru. Will ye hear me?

First le pleas'd

To think I know ye all, and can distinguish Ev'ry Mans several voice: you that spoke first, I know my father in law; the other Tranio, And I heard Sophocles; the last, pray mark me, 's my dam'd Wife Maria:

If any Man misdoubt me for infected, There is mine Arme, let any Man look on't.

Enter Doct̄or and Potbecary.

Doct̄. Save ye Gentlemen.

Petron. O welcome Doct̄or, Ye come in happy time; pray your opinion, What think you of his pulse?

Doct̄. It beats with busiest, And shews a general inflammation, Which is the symptome of a pestilent Feaver, Take twenty ounces from him.

Petru. Take a Fool; Take an ounce from mine arme, and Doct̄or Déuz-acc, I'll make a close-stoole of your Velvet Costard.

— Gentlemen, doe ye make a may-game on me?

I tell ye once again, I am as found, As well, as wholsome, and as sensible, As any of ye all: Let me out quickly, Or as I am a Man, I'll beat the walls down, And the first thing I light upon shall pay for't.

Exit Doct̄or and Potbecary.

Petro. Nay, we'll go with you Doct̄or.

Mar. 'Tis the safest; I saw the Tokens Sir.

Petro. Then there is but one way.

Petru. Will it please you open?

Tra. His fit grows stronger still.

Mar. Let's save our selves Sir, He's past all worldly cure.

Petro. Friends do your office. And what he wants, if Money, Love, or Labor, Or any way may win it, let him have it. Farewell, and pray my honest Friends—

Exeunt.

Petru. Why Rascals, Friends, Gentlemen, thou beastly Wife, Jaques; None hear me? Who at the door there?

1 Watch. Think I pray Sir, Whether you are going, and prepare your self.

2 Watch. These idle thoughts disturb you, the good Gentlewoman

Your Wife has taken care you shall want nothing.

Petru. Shall I come out in quiet? answer me,

Or shall I charge a Fowling-Piece, and make Mine own way; two of ye I cannot miss, If I miss three; ye come here to assault me. I am as excellent well, I thank Heaven for't, And have as good a stomach at this instant—

2 Watch. That's an ill sign.

1 Watch. He draws on; he's a dead Man.

Petru. And sleep as soundly; Will ye look upon me?

1 Watch. Do you want Pen and Ink? while you have Settle your state. (sense sir, Petru. Sirs, I am well, as you are; Or any Rascal living.

2 Watch. Would you were Sir.

Petru. Look to your selves, and if you love your lives, Open the door, and fly me, for I shoot else; —I'll shoot, and presently, chain-bullets; And under four I will not kill.

1 Watch. Let's quit him, It may be it is a trick: he's dangerous.

2 Watch. The Devil take the hinmost, I cry.

Exit Watch running.

Ent'r Petruchio with a Piece.

Petru. Have among ye;

The door shall open too, I'll have a fair shoot; Are ye all gone? tricks in my old dayes, crackers Put now upon me? and, by Lady Green-sleeves? Am I grown so tame after all my triumphs? But that I should be thought mad, if I rail'd, As much as they deserve, against these Women, I would now rip up, from the primitive Cuckold, All their arch-villanies, and all their doubles, Which are more than a hunted Hare ere thought on: When a Man has the fairest, and the sweetest Of all their Sex, and as he thinks the noblest, What has he then? and I'll speak modestly, He has a Quartern-ague, that shall shake All his estate to nothing; never cur'd, Nor never dying; He's as a ship to venture His fame, and credit in, which if he Man not With more continual labour than a Gally To make her tith, either she grows a Tumbrel, Not worth the Cloth she wears; or springs more leakes Than all the fame of his posterity Can ever stop again: I could raile twenty dayes; Out on 'em, Hedge-hogs, He that shall touch 'em, has a thousand thorns Runs through his fingers: If I were unmarried, I would do any thing below repentance, Any base dunghill slavery; be a Hang-man, Ere I would be a Husband: O the thousand, Thousand, ten thousand wayes they have to kill us! Some fall with two much stringing of the Fiddles, And those are fools; some, that they are not suffer'd, And those are Maudlin-lovers: some, like Scorpions, They poyson with their tails, and those are Martyrs; Some dye with doing good, those Benefactors, And leave 'em land to leap away: some few, For those are rarest, they are said to kill With kindness, and fair usage; but what they are, My Catalogue discovers not: only 'tis thought They are buried in old Walls, with their heels upward. I could raile twenty dayes together now. I'll seek 'em out, and if I have not reason, And very sensible, why this was done, I'll go a birding yet, and some shall smart for't. Exit.

Actus

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Morofo and Petronius.

Mor. That I do love her, is without all question,
And most extremely, dearly, most exactly;
And that I would ev'n now, this present Monday,
Before all others, Maids, Wives, Women, Widows,
Of what degree, or calling, Marry her,
As certain too; but to be made a Whim-wham,
A Jib-crack, and a Gentleman o'th first house
For all my kindness to her.

Petron. How you take it?
Thou get a Wench, thou get a dozen night-caps?
Wouldst have her come, and lick thee like a Calfe,
And blow thy nose, and busf thee?

Mor. Not so neither.

Petron. What wouldst thou have her do?

Mor. Do as she would do;

Put on a clean Smock, and to Church, and Marry,
And then to Bed a Gods name, this is fair play,
And keeps the Kings peace; let her leave her bobs,
I have had too many of them, and her quillets,
She is as nimble that way as an Eeel;
But in the way she ought to me especially,
A fow of Lead is swifter.

Petron. Quoad your griefs down.

Mor. Give fair quarter, I am old and crasie,
And subject to much fumbling, I confests it;
Yet something I would have that's warme, to hatch me:
But understand me I would have it so,
I buy not more repentance in the bargain
Than the ware's worth I have; if you allow me
Worthy your Son-in-Law, and your allowance,
Do it a way of credit; let me show so,
And not be troubled in my visitations,
With blows, and bitterness, and down-right railings,
As if we were to couple like two Cats,
With clawing, and loud clamour:

Petron. Thou fond Man.

Hast thou forgot the Ballad, crabbed age,
Can May and January match together,
And nev'r a storm between 'em? say she abuse thee,
Put case she doe.

Mor. Well.

Petron. Nay, believe she do's.

Mor. I do believe she do's.

Petron. And div'lishly:

Art thou a whit the worse?

Mor. That's not the matter,
I know, being old, tis fit I am abus'd;
I know 'tis handsome, and I know moreover
I am to love her for't.

Petron. Now you come to me.

Mor. Nay more than this; I find too, and find certain,
What Gold I have, Pearle, Bracelets, Rings, or Owches,
Or what she can desire, Gowns, Petticotes,
Wastcotes, Embroydered-stockings, Scarffs, Cals, Feathers,
Hats, five pound Garters, Muffs, Masks, Ruffs, and Ribands,
I am to give her for't.

Petron. 'Tis right, you are so.

Mor. But when I have done all this, and think it duty,
Is't requisit an other bore my nostrils?
Riddle me that.

Petron. Go get you gone, and dreame
She's thine within these two dayes, for she is so;
The Boy's beside the saddle: get warm broths,
And feed apace; think not of worldly business,
It cools the blood; leave off your tricks, they are hateful,

And meere fore-runners of the ancient measures;
Contrive your beard o'th top cut like Verdugoes;
It shows you would be wise, and burn your night-cap,
It looks like half a winding-sheet, and urges
From a young Wench nothing but cold repentance:
You may eate Onyons, so you'l not be lavish.

Mor. I am glad of that.

Petron. They purge the blood, and quicken,
But after 'em, conceive me, sweep your mouth;
And where there wants a tooth, stick in a clove.

Mor. Shall I hope once again, say't.

Petro. You shall Sir:

And you shall have your hope.

Moro. Why there's a match then.

Enter Byancha and Tranio.

Byan. You shall not find me wanting, get you gone.
Here's the old Man, he'l think you are plotting else
Something against his new Son.

Exit Tranio.

Moro. Fare ye well Sir.

Exit Morofo.

Byan. And ev'ry Buck had his Doe,
And ev'ry Cuckold a Bell at his Toe:
Oh what sport should we have then, then Boyes then,
Oh what sport should we have then?

Petro. This is the spirit, that inspires 'em all.

By. Give you good ev'n.

Petro. A word with you Sweet Lady.

By. I am very hasty, Sir.

Petro. So you were ever.

By. Well, What's your will?

Petro. Was not your skilful hand
In this last stratagem? Were not your mischiefs Eeking the matter on?

By. In's shutting up?

Is that it?

Petro. Yes.

By. I'll tell you,

Petro. Doe.

By. And truly.

Good old Man, I do grieve exceeding much,
I fear too much.

Petro. I am sorry for your heaviness.
Belike you can repent then?

By. There you are wide too.

Not that the thing was done (conceive me rightly)
Do's any way molest me.

Petro. What then Lady?

By. But that I was not in't, there's my sorrow, there
Now you understand me, for I'll tell you,
It was so found a piece, and so well carried,
And if you mark the way, so handsome,
Of such a heighth, and excellence, and art
I have not known a braver; for conceive me,
When the gross fool her Husband would be sick—

Petro. Pray stay.

By. Nay, good, your patience: and no fence for't,
Then slept your daughter in.

Petro. By your appointment.

By. I would it had, on that condition
I had but one half smock, I like it so well;
And like an excellent cunning Woman, cur'd me
One madness with another, which was rare,
And to our weak beliefs, a wonder.

Petro. Hang ye,
For surely, if your husband look not to ye,
I know what will.

By. I humbly thank your worship.
And so I take my leave.

Petro. You have a hand I hear too.

By. I have two Sir.

Petro. In my young daughters business.
By. You will find there

A fitter hand than mine, to reach her frets,
And play down diddle to her.

Petro. I shall watch ye.

By. Do.

Petro. And I shall have Justice.

By. Where?

Petro. That's all one;

I shall be with you at a turne hence forward.

By. Get you a Follēt too; and so good ev'n Sir.

Exeunt.

Enter Petruchio, Jaques, and Pedro.

Jaq. And as I told your worship, all the hangings,
Brass, Pewter, Plate, ev'n to the very looking-glasses.

Ped. And that that hung for our defence, the Armor,
And the March Beere was going too: Oh Jaques
What a sad sight was that?

Jaq. Even the two Rundlets,
The two that was our hope, of Muskadel,
(Better nev'r tongue tript over) those two Cannons,
To batter brawn withal at Christmas, Sir,
Ev'n those two lovely Twyns, the Enemy
Had almost cut off clean.

Petro. Goe trim the House up.
And put the things in order as they were.

Ex. Ped. and Jaq.

I shall find time for all this: could I find her
But constant any way, I had done my business;
Were she a Whore directly, or a Scold,
An unthrift, or a Woman made to hate me,
I had my wif, and knew which way to rayne her;
But while she shews all these, and all their losses,
A kind of linsy woolsey, mingled mischief
Not to be ghest at, and whether true, or borrowed,

Enter Maria.

Not certain neither, What a hap had I,
And what a tydie fortune, when my fate
Flung me upon this Bear-whelp? here she comes;
Now, if she have a colour, for the fault is
A cleanly one, upon my Conscience
I shall forgive her yet, and find a something
Certain, I Married for: her wit: I'll marke her.

Mar. Not let his Wife come near him in his sickness?
Not come to comfort him? she that all Laws
Of heaven, and Nations have ordain'd his second,
Is she refus'd? and two old Paradoxes,
Pieces of five and fifty, without faith
Clapt in upon him? h'as a little pet,
That all young Wives must follow necessary,
Having their Maiden-heads—

Petro. This is an Axiome
I never heard before.

Mar. Or say Rebellion,
If we durst be so foul, which two fair words
Alas win us from, in an hour, an instant,
We are so easie, make him so forgetful
Both of his reason, honesty, and credit,
As to deny his Wife a visitation?
His Wife, that (though she was a little foolish,)
Lov'd him, Oh Heaven forgive her for't! nay doted,
Nay had run mad, had she not married him.

Petro. Though I do know this fals'er than the Devil,
I cannot choose but love it.

Mar. What do I know
But those that came to keep him, might have kill'd him,
In what a case had I been then? I dare not Believe him such a base, debosh'd companion,
That one refusal of a tender Maid,
Would make him faign this Sickness out of need,
And take a Keeper to him of Fourscore
To play at Billiards; one that mew'd content

And all her teeth together; not come near him?

Petro. This Woman would have made a most rare Je-
She can prevaricate on any thing: (suite,
There was not to be thought a way to save her
In all imagination, beside this.

Mar. His unkind dealing, which was worst of all,
In sending, who knowes whether, all the plate,
And all the household-stuffe, had I not crost it,
By a great providence, and my friends assistance
Which he will thank me one day for: alas,
I could have watch'd as well as they, have serv'd him
In any use, better, and willinger.

The Law commands me to do it, love commands me,
And my own duty charges me.

Petro. Heav'n blefs me.
And now I have said my Prayers, I'll go to her:
Are you a Wife for any Man?

Mar. For you Sir.
If I were worse, I were better; That you are well,
At least, that you appear so, I thank Heaven,
Long may it hold, and that you are here, I am glad too;
But that you have abus'd me wretchedly,
And such a way that shames the name of Husband,
Such a malicious mangy way, so mingled,
(Never look strangely on me, I dare tell you)
With breach of honesty, care, kindness, manners.

Petro. Holla, you kick too fast.

Mar. Was I a stranger?
Or had I vow'd perdition to your person?
Am I not Married to you, tell me that?

Petro. I would I could not tell you.

Mar. Is my presence,
The stock I come of, which is worshipful,
If I should say Right worshipful, I ly'd not,
My Grandfire was a Knight.

Petro. O'the Shire?

Mar. A Soldier,
Which none of all thy Family e're heard of,
But one conductor of thy name, a Grasier
That ran away with pay: or am I grown
Because I have been a little peevish to you,
Onely to try your temper) such a dogge-leech
I could not be admitted to your presence?

Petro. If I endure this, hang me.

Mar. And two deaths heads,
Two Harry Groats, that had their faces worn,
Almost their names away too.

Petro. Now hear me.
For I will stay no longer.

Mar. This you shall:
How ever you shall think to flatter me,
For this offence, which no submission
Can ever mediate for, you'll find it so,
What ever you shall do by intercession,
What you can offer, what your Land can purchase,
What all your friends, or families can win,
Shall be but this, not to forswear your knowledge,
But ever to forbear it: now your will Sir.

Petro. Thou art the subtlest Woman I think living,
I am sure the lewdest; now be still, and mark me;
Were I but any way addicted to the Devil,
I should now think I had met a play-fellow
To profit by, and that way the most learned
That ever taught to murmur. Tell me thou,
Thou most poor, paltry spiteful Whore: Do you cry?
I'll make you roare, before I leave.

Mar. Your pleasure.

Petro. Was it not sin enough, thou Fruiterer,
Full of the fall thou eat'st: thou Devils Broker,
Thou Seminary of all sedition,
Thou Sword of veng'ance, with a thred hung o're us,
Was it not sin enough, and wickedness
In full abundance? Was it not vexation
At all points, cap a pe? nay, I shall pinch you,

Thus,

Thus like a rotten Rascal to abuse
The name of Heaven, the tye of Marriage;
The honour of thy Friends; the expectation
Of all that thought thee virtuous, with Rebellion,
Childish and base Rebellion, but continuing
After forgiveness too, and worse, your mischief,
And against him, setting the hope of Heaven by,
And the dear reservation of his honor
Nothing above ground could have won to hate thee:
Well, goe thy wayes.

Mar. Yes.

Petru. You shall hear me out first:
What punishment may'st thou deserve, thou thing,
Thou Idle thing of nothing, thou pull'd Primrose,
That two hours after, art a Weed, and wither'd,
For this last flourish on me? am I one
Selected out of all the Husbands living,
To be so ridden by a Tit of ten pence,
Am I so blind and Bed-rid? I was mad,
And had the Plague, and no Man must come near me,
I must be shut up, and my substance bezel'd,
And an old Woman watch me.

Mar. Well Sir, well,
You may well glory in't.

Petru. And when it comes to opening, 'tis my plot,
I must undoe my self forsooth: do'st hear me?
If I should beat thee now, as much may be,
Do'st thou not well deserve it, o' thy Conscience,
Do'st thou not cry, come beat me?

Mar. I defie you.
And my last loving tears farewell: the first stroke,
The very first you give me, if you dare strike,
Try me, and you shall find it so, for ever,
Never to be recall'd: I know you love me,
Mad till you have enjoy'd me; I do turne
Utterly from you, and what Man I meet first
That has but spirit to deserve a favour;
Let him bear any shape, the worse the better.
Shall kill you, and enjoy me; what I have said
About your foolish sickness, e're you have me
As you would have me, you shall swear, is certain;
And challenge any Man, that dares deny it;
And in all companies approve my actions,
And so farewell for this time.

Petru. Grief goe with thee,
If there be any witchcrafts, herbes, or potions,
Saying my Prayers backward, Fiends, or Fayries
That can again unlove me, I am made:

Ex. Mar.

Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Byancha, and Tranio.

Tra. Mistress, you must do it.

By. Are the Writings ready I told you of?

Tra. Yes they are ready, but to what use I know not.

By. Y'are an Ass, you must have all things constru'd,

Tra. Yes, and pierc'd too,
Or I find little pleasure.

By. Now you are knavish,
Goe too, fetch Rowland hither presently,
Your Twenty pounds lies bleeding else: she is married
Within these twelve hours, if we cross it not,
And see the Papers of one size.

Tra. I have ye.

By. And for disposing of 'em.

Tra. If I fail you
Now I have found the way, use Marshal Law
And cut my head off with a hand Saw:

By. Well Sir.

Petrouius and Moroso I'll see sent for,
About your business; goe.

Tra. I am gone.

Ex. Tra.

Enter Livia.

By. Ho Livia.

Liv. Who's that?

By. A friend of yours, Lord how you look now,
As if you had lost a Carrack.

Liv. O Byancha.

I am the most undone, unliappy Woman.

By. Be quiet Wench, thou shalt be done, and done,
And done, and double done, or all shall split for't,
No more of these minc'd passions, they are mangy,
And ease thee of nothing, but a little Wind,
An Apple will do more: thou fear'st Moroso.

Liv. Even as I fear the Gallowes.

By. Keep thee there still.

And you love Rowland? say.

Liv. If I say not,

I am sure I lye.

By. What wouldst thou give that Woman;
In spite of all his anger, and thy fear,
And all thy Fathers policy, that could
Clap ye within these two nights quietly
Into a Bed together?

Liv. How?

By. Why fairly,
At half sword man and wife: now the red blood comes,
I marry now the matters chang'd.

Liv. Byancha,
Methinks you should not mock me.

By. Mock a pudding.

I speak good honest English, and good meaning.

Liv. I should not be ungrateful to that Woman.

By. I know thou would'st not, follow but my Councel,
And if thou hast him not, despite of fortune
Let me nev'r know a good night more; you must Be very sick o'th instant.

Liv. Well, what follows?

By. And in that sickness send for all your friends,
Your Father, and your feaver old Moroso,
And Rowland shall be there too.

Liv. What of these?

By. Do you not twitter yet? of this shall follow
That which shall make thy heart leap, and thy lips
Venture as many kisses, as the Merchants
Doe Dollars to the East-Indies: you shall know all,
But first walke in, and practise, pray be sick.

Liv. I do believe you: and I am sick.

By. Doe,

To bed then, come, I'll send away your Servants
Post for your Fool, and Father; and good fortune,
As we meane honesty, now strike an up-shot.

Exunt

Scena Tertia.

Enter Tranio, and Rowland.

Tra. Nay, on my conscience, I have lost my Money,
But that's all one: I'll never more perswade you,
I see you are resolute, and I commend you.

Row. But did she send for me?

Tra. You dare believe me.

Row. I cannot tell, you have your wayes for profit
Allow'd you Tranio, as well as I
Have to avoid 'em.

Tra. No, on my word, Sir,
I deale directly with you.

Enter Servant.

Row. How now fellow,
Whither Post you so fast?

Ser. O sir my Master,
Pray did you see my Master?

Row. Why your Master?

Ser. Sir.

Ser. Sir his Jewel.
Rom. With the gilded Button?
Ser. My pretty Mistres Livia.
Rom. What of her?
Ser. Is fallen sick o'th suddain.
Rom. How o'th suddain?
Ser. O'th suddain Sir, I say, very sick:
Rom. It seemes she hath got the toothach with raw Apples.
Ser. It seemes you have got the headach, fare you well
 You did not see my Master? (Sir.)
Rom. Who told you so.
Tr. No, no, he did not see him.
Rom. Farewell Blew-bottle. Ex. Servant.
 What should her sickness be?
Tr. For you it may be.
Rom. Yes, when my braines are out, I may believe it,
 Never before I am sure: Yet I may see her;
 'Twill be a point of honesty:
Tr. It will so.
Rom. It may be not too: you would fain be sing'ring
 This old sin-offring of two hundred, Tranio,
 How daintily, and cunningly you drive me
 Up like a Dear to'th toyle, yet I may leap it,
 And what's the Woodman then?
Tr. A loser by you.
 Speak, Will you go or not? to me 'tis equal.
Rom. Come, What goes left?
Tr. Nay, not a penny Romland.
Rom. Shall I have liberty of conscience,
 Which, by interpretation, is ten kisses?
 Hang me if I affect her: yet it may be,
 This whorson manners will require a strugling,
 Of two and twenty, or by'r-Lady thirty.
Tr. By'r-Lady I'll require my wager then,
 For if you kiss so often, and no kindness,
 I have lost my speculation, I'll allow you—
Rom. Speak like a Gamster now.
Tr. It may be two.
Rom. Under a dozen Tranio, there's no setting,
 You shall have forty shillings, winck at small faults.
 Say I take twenty, come, by all that's honest
 I do it but to vex her.
Tr. I'll no by-blowes.
 If you can love her, doe, if you can, hate her,
 Or any else that loves you—
Rom. Prethec Tranio.
Tr. Why farewell twenty pound, 'twill not undoe me;
 You have my resolution.
Rom. And your Money,
 Which since you are so stubborn, if I forfeit,
 Make me a Jack o' Lent, and break my shins
 For untag'd Points and Compters: I'll goe with you,
 But if thou gett'st a penny by the bargain;
 A parting kiss is lawful?
Tr. I allow it.
Rom. Knock out my brains with Apples; yet a bargain:
Tr. I tell you I'll no bargain is; win, and wear it.
Rom. Thou art the strangest fellow.
Tr. That's all one.
Rom. Along then, twenty pound more if thou dar'st,
 I give her not a good word.
Tr. Not a Penny. Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Petruchio, Jaques, and Pedro.

Petru. Prethec, entreat her come, I will not trouble her
 Above a word or two; ere I endure (Exit Pedro.)
 This life, and with a Woman, and a vow'd one
 To all the mischiefs she can lay upon me,
 I'll go to Plough, and eate Lecke Porridge;
 Begging's a pleasure to't, not to be number'd:
 No there be other Countries Jaques for me, and other people, yea, and other women.

If I have need, here's Money, there's your ware,
 Which is faire dealing, and the Sun, they say,
 Shines as warme there, as here, and till I have lost Either my self, or her, I care not whether Nor which first.

Jaq. Will your worship hear me?

Petru. And utterly outworne the memory
 Of such a curse as this, none of my Nation
 Shall ever know me more.

Jaq. Out alas Sir.

What a strange way doe you run?

Petru. Any way,

So I out-run this Rascal.

Jaq. Me thinks now,

If your good worship could but have the patience.

Petru. The patience, why the patience?

Jaq. Why I'll tell you,
 Could you but have the patience.

Petru. Well the patience.

Jaq. To laugh at all she do's, or when she railles,
 To have a Drum beaten o'th top o'th house,
 To give the neighbors warning of her Larme,
 As I do when my Wife rebels.

Petru. Thy Wife?

Thy Wife's a Pigeon to her, a meere slumber,
 The dead of night's not stiller.

Jaq. Nor an Iron Mill.

Petru. But thy Wife is certain.

Jaq. That's false Doctrine,

You never read of a certain Woman.

Petru. Thou know'st her way.

Jaq. I should doe, I am sure.

I have ridden it night, and day, this twenty year.

Petru. But mine is such a drench of Balderdash,
 Such a strange carded cunningness, the Rayne-bow
 When she hangs bent in Heaven, sheds not her colours
 Quicker, and more, than this deceitful Woman.

Enter Ped.

Weaves in her dye's of wickedness: what sayes she?

Ped. Nay not a word sir, but she pointed to me,
 As though she meant to follow; pray sir bear it
 Ev'n as you may, I need not teach your worship,
 The best men have their crosses, we are all mortal.

Petru. What ailes the fellow?

Ped. And no doubt she may Sir.

Petru. What may she, or what do's she, or what is she?
 Speak and be hang'd.

Ped. She's mad Sir.

Petru. Heaven continue it.

Ped. Amen if't be his pleasure.

Petru. How mad is she?

Ped. As mad as heart can wish Sir: she has drest her self (Saving your worships reverence) just i'th 'cut
 Of one of those that multiply i'th Suburbs

For single Money, and as durtilly:
 If any speak to her, first she whistles,
 And then begins her compass with her fingers,
 And points to what she would have.

Petru. What new way's this?

Ped. There came in Master Sophocles,

Petru. And what

Did Master Sophocles when he came in?
 Get my Truncks ready, sirha, I'll be gone straight.

Ped. He's here to tell you
 She's horne mad Jaques.

Enter Sophocles.

Soph. Call ye this a Woman?

Petru. Yes sir, she is a Woman,

Soph. Sir, I doubt it.

Petru. I had thought you had made experience,

Soph. Yes, I did so.

And almost with my life.

Petru. You rid too fast, Sir.

Soph. Pray be not mistakē: by this hand
Your wife's as chaste, and honest as a Virgin,
For any thing I know: 'tis true she gave me
A Ring.

Petru. For rutting.

Soph. You are much deceiv'd still,
Believe me, I never kist her since, and now
Coming in visitation, like a friend,
I think she is mad, Sir, suddainly she started,
And snatch'd the Ring away, and drew her knife out,
To what intent I know not.

Petru. Is this certain?

Soph. As I am here, Sir.

Petru. I believe you honest.
And pray continue so.

Enter Maria.

Soph. She comes.

Petru. Now Damsel,
What will your beauty do if I forsake you?
Do you deal by signs, and tokens? as I ghes then,
You'll walk abroad, this Summer, and catch Captains,
Or hire a piece of holy ground i' th' Suburbs,
And keep a Nest of Nuns?

Soph. Oh do not stir her!
You see in what a case she is?

Petru. She is dogged,
And in a beastly case I am sure: I'll make her,
If she have any tongue, yet tattle. Sophocles,
Prethee observe this woman seriously,
And eye her well, and when thou hast done, but tell me
(For thou hast understanding) in what case
My sense was, when I chose this thing,

Soph. I'll tell you
I have seen a sweeter—

Petru. An hundred times cry Oysters.
There's a poor Begger-wench about Black-Fryers
Runs on her breech, may be an Empress to her.

Soph. Nay, now you are too bitter.

Petru. Nev'r a whit Sir:
I'll tell thee woman; for now I have day to see thee,
And all my wits about me, and I speak
Not out of passion neither (leave your mumping)
I know you're well enough: Now would I give
A million but to vex her: when I chose thee
To make a Bedfellow, I took more trouble,
Than twenty Terms can come to, such a cause,
Of such a title, and so everlasting
That Adams Genealogie may be ended
E'r any Law find thee: I took a Leprosie,
Nay worse, the plague, nay worse yet, a possession
And had the devil with thee, if not more:
And yet worse, was a beast, and like a beast
Had my reward, a Jade to fling my fortunes;
For who that had but reason to distinguish
The light from darknes, wine from water, hunger
From full satiety, and Fox from Fern-bush
That would have married thee?

Soph. She is not so ill.

Petru. She's worse than I dare think of: she's so lewd;
No Court is strong enough to bear her cause,
She hath neither manners, honesty, behaviour,
Wife-hood, nor woman-hood, nor any mortal
Can force me think she had a mother: no
I do believe her stedfastly, and know her
To be a Woman-wolfe by transmigration,
Her first forme was a Ferrets under-ground,
She kills the memories of men: not yet?

Soph. Do you think she's sensible of this?

Petru. I care not,
Be what she will: the pleasure I take in her,

Thus I blow off; the care I took to love her,
Like this point, I untie, and thus I loose it;
The husband I am to her, thus I sever;
My vanity farewell: yet, for you have been
So near me, as to bear the name of wife,
My unquench'd charity shall tell you thus much,
(Though you deserve it well) you shall not beg,
What I ordain'd your Joynture, honestly
You shall have settled on you: and half my house,
The other half shall be employ'd in prayers,
(That meritorious charge I'll be at also Yet to confirm you Christian) your apparel,
And what belongs to build up such a folly,
Keep I beseech you, it infects our uses,
And now I am for travel.

Mar. Now I love you,
And now I see you are a man, I'll talke to you,
And I forget your bitterness.

Soph. How now man?

Petru. Oh Pliny, if thou wilt be ever famous
Make but this woman all thy wonders.

Mar. Sure Sir
You have hit upon a happy course, a blessed,
And what will make you virtuous?

Petru. She'll ship me.

Mar. A way of understanding I long wish'd for,
And now 'tis come, take heed you fly not back Sir,
Methinks you look a new man to me now,
A man of excellence, and now I see
Some great design set in you: you may think now
(And so may most that know me) 'twere my part
Weakly to weep your loss, and to resist you,
Nay, hang about your neck, and like a dotard
Urge my strong tie upon you: but I love you,
And all the world shall know it, beyond woman;
And more prefer the honor of your Countrey,
Which chiefly you are born for, and may perfect,
The uses you may make of other Nations,
The ripening of your knowledge, conversation,
The full ability, and strength of judgement.
Than any private love, or wanton kisses.
Go worthy man, and bring home understanding.

Soph. This were an excellent woman to breed School-men.

Mar. For if the Merchant through unknown Seas plough
To get his wealth, then dear Sir, what must you
To gather wisdom? go, and go alone,
Only your noble mind for your companion,
And if a woman may win credit with you,
Go far, too far you cannot: still the farther
The more experience finds you: and go sparing,
One meal a week will serve you, and one sute,
Through all your travels: for you'll find it certain,
The poorer and the baser you appear,
The more you look through still.

Petru. Dost hear her?

Soph. Yes.

Petru. What would this woman do if she were suffer'd,
Upon a new Religion?

Soph. Make us Pagans,
I wonder that she writes not.

Mar. Then when time,
And fulness of occasion have new made you,
And squar'd you from a Sot into a Signior,
Or nearer, from a Jade into a Courser;
Come home an aged man, as did Ulysses,
And I your glad Penelope.

Petru. That must have
As many Lovers as J Languages.
And what she does with one i'th' day, i'th' night
Undoe it with another.

Mar. Much that way, Sir;
For in your absence it must be my honor,
That, that must make me spoken of hereafter,
To have temptations, and not little ones

Daily and hourly offered me, and strongly,
Almost believed against me, to set off
The faith, and loyalty of her that loves you.

Petru. What should I do?

Soph. Why by my — I would travel,
Did not you mean so?

Petr. Alas no, nothing less man:

I did it but to try, Sir, she's the Devil,
And now I find it, for she drives me; I must go:
Are my trunks down there, and my horses ready?

Mar. Sir, for your house, and if you please to trust me
With that you leave behind.

Petru. Bring down the money.

Mar. As I am able, and to my poor fortunes,
I'll govern as a widow: I shall long
To hear of your well-doing, and your profit:
And when I hear not from you once a quarter,
I'll wish you in the Indies, or Catayna,
Those are the climes must make you.

Petru. How's the wind?

She'll wish me out o' th' world anon.

Mar. For France.

'Tis very fair; get you aboard to night, Sir,
And loose no time, you know the tide staies no man,
I have cold meats ready for you.

Petru. Fare thee well,

Thou hast fool'd me out o' th' Kingdom with a vengeance,
And thou canst fool me in again,

Mar. Not I Sir,

I love you better, take your time, and pleasure.
I'll see you hors'd.

Petru. I think thou wouldst see me hanged too,
Were I but half as willing.

Mar. Any thing

That you think well of, I dare look upon.

Petru. You'll bear me to the Lands end, Sophocles,
And other of my friends I hope.

Mar. Nev'r doubt, Sir,

You cannot want companions for your good:
I am sure you'll kiss me e'r I go; I have business,
And I stay long here I must not.

Petru. Get thee going.

For if thou tarriest but another Dialogue
I'll kick thee to thy Chamber.

Mar. Fare you well, Sir,

And bear your self, I do beseech you, once more,
Since you have undertaken doing wisely,
Manly, and worthily, 'tis for my credit,
And for those flying fames here of your follies,
Your gambols, and ill breeding of your youth,
For which I understand you take this travel,
Nothing should make me leave you else, I'll deal
So like a wife that loves your reputation,
And the most large addition of your credit,
That those shall die: if you want Limon-waters,
Or any thing to take the edge o' th' Sea off,
Pray speak, and be provided.

Petru. Now the Devil,

That was your first good Master, snowre his blessing
Upon ye all: Into whose custody —

Mar. I do commit your Reformation,
And so I leave you to your Stilo novo.

Exit Maria.

Petru. I will go: yet I will not: once more Sophocles
I'll put her to the test.

Soph. You had better go.

Petru. I will go then: let's seek my Father out,
And all my friends, to see me fair aboard:
Then women, if there be a storm at Sea,
Worse than your tongues can make, and waves more broken,
Than your dissembling faiths are, let me feel
Nothing but tempests, till they crack my Keel.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Petronius, and Byancha, with four papers.

By. NOW whether I deserve that blame you gave me,
Let all the world discern, Sir.

Petro. If this motion,

(I mean this fair repentance of my Daughter)
Spring from your good perswasion, as it seems so,
I must confess I have spoke too boldly of you,
And I repent,

By. The first touch was her own,
Taken no doubt from disobeying you,
The second I put to her, when I told her
How good, and gentle yet, with free contrition
Again you might be purchas'd: loving woman,
She heard me, and I thank her, thought me worthy
Observing in this point: yet all my counsel,
And comfort in this case, could not so heal her
But that grief got his share too, and she sick'ned.

Petro. I am sorry she's so ill, yet glad her sickness
Has got so good a ground.

Enter Moroso.

By. Here comes Moroso.

Petro. Oh, you are very welcome,
Now you shall know your happiness.

Mor. I am glad on't.

What makes this Lady here?

By. A dish for you, Sir

You'll thank me for hereafter.

Petro. True Moroso,

Go get you in, and see your Mistress.

By. She is sick, Sir,

But you may kiss her whole.

Mor. How.

By. Comfort her.

Mor. Why am I sent for, Sir?

Petro. Will you in, and see?

By. May be she needs confession.

Mor. By St. Mary,

She shall have absolution then, and pennance,
But not above her carriage.

Petro. Get you in fool.

Exit Mor.

Bya. Here comes the other too.

Enter Rowland and Tranio.

Petro. Now Tranio.

Good ev'n to you too, and you are welcome.

Row. Thank you.

Petro. I have a certain Daughter.

Row. Would you had, Sir.

Petro. No doubt you know her well.

Row. Nor never shall, Sir.

She is a woman, and the waies unto her
Are like the finding of a certain path
After a deep fall'n Snow.

Petro. Well, that's by th' by still.

This Daughter that I tell you of, is fall'n
A little crop sick, with the dangerous surfeit
She took of your affection.

Row. Mine Sir?

Petro. Yes Sir.

Or rather, as it seems, repenting.

And there she lies within, debating on't,

Row. Well Sir.

Petro. I think 'twere well you would see her.

Row.

Rom. If you please, Sir;
I am not squeamish of my visitation.
Petron. But, this I'll tell you, she is alter'd much,
You'll find her now another Livia.

Rom. I have enough o' th' old, Sir.

Petro. No more fool,
To look gay babies in your eyes young Rowland,
And hang about your pretty neck.

Rom. I am glad on't,
And thank my Fates I have scap'd such execution.

Petron. And bus's you till you blush again.

Rom. That's hard, Sir;
She must kiss shamefully e're I blush at it,
I never was so boyish; well, what follows?

Petro. She's mine now, as I please to settle her
At my command, and where I please to plant her:
Only she would take a kind of farewell of you,
And give you back a wandering vow or two,
You left in pawn; and two or three slight oaths
She lent you too, she looks for.

Rom. She shall have 'em
With all my heart, Sir; and if you like it better,
A free release in writing.

Petro. That's the matter,
And you from her, shall have another Rowland,
And then turn tail to tail, and peace be with you.

Rom. So be it: Your twenty pound sweats Tranio.

Tra. 'Twill not undoe me Rowland, do your worst.

Rom. Come, shall we see her, Sir?

Bya. What e'er she saies
You must bear manly Rowland, for her sickness
Has made her somewhat pettish

Rom. Let her talk
Till her tongue ake, I care not: by this hand
Thou hast a handsome face wench, and a body
Daintily mounted; now do I feel an hundred
Running directly from me, as I pist it.

Enter Livia discovered abed, and Moroso by her.

Bya. Pray draw 'em softly, the least hurry, Sir,
Puts her to much impatience.

Petro. How is't daughter?

Liv. Oh very sick, very sick, yet somewhat
Better I hope; a little lightsomer,
Because this good man has forgiven me;
Pray set me higher; oh my head:

Bya. Well done wench.

Liv. Father, and all good people that shall hear me,
I have abus'd this man perniciously; was never old man humbled so;

I have scorn'd him, and call'd him nasty names,
I have spit at him,
Flung Candles ends in's beard, and call'd him harrow,
That must be drawn to all he does: contemn'd him,
For methought then, he was a beastly fellow.
(Oh my side) a very beastly fellow:

And gave it out, his Cassock was a Barge-cloth,
Pawn'd to his predecessor by a Sculler,
The man yet living: I gave him purging comfits
At a great Christning once,
That spoil'd his Chamblet breeches; and one night
I strew'd the stairs with pease, as he past down;
And the good Gentleman (woe worth me for't)
Ev'n with this reverend head, this head of wisdom,
Told two and twenty stairs, good and true;
Mist not a step, and as we say, verbatim
Fell to the bottom, broke his casting Bottle,
Lost a fair Toad-stone, of some eighteen shillings,
Jumbled his Joynts together, had two stools,
And was translated. All this villany
Did I: I Livia, I alone, untaught.

Mor. And I unask'd, forgive it.

Liv. Where's Byancha?

Bya. Here Cofin.

Liv. Give me drink,

Bya. There.

Liv. Who's that?

Mor. Rowland.

Liv. Oh my dissembler, you and I must part.
Come nearer, Sir.

Rom. I am sorry for your sickness.

Liv. Be sorry for your self, Sir, you have wrong'd me,
But I forgive you; are the Papers ready?

Bya. I have 'em here: wilt please you view 'em?

Petro. Yes.

Liv. Shew 'em the young man too, I know he's willing
To shift his sails too: 'tis for his more advancement;
Alas, we might have begger'd one another;
We are young both, and a world of children
Might have been left behind to curse our follies:
We had been undone Byancha, had we married,
Undone for ever, I confess I lov'd him,
I care not who shall know it, most intirely;
And once, upon my conscience, he lov'd me;
But farewell that, we must be wiser, cofin,
Love must not leave us to the world: have you done?

Rom. Yes, and am ready to subscribe.

Liv. Pray stay then:
Give me the papers, and let me peruse 'em,
And so much time, as may afford a tear
At our last parting.

Bya. Pray retire, and leave her,
I'll call ye presently.

Petro. Come Gentlemen, the showre must fall.

Rom. Would I had never seen her.

Bya. Thou hast done bravely wench.

Liv. Pray Heaven it prove so.

Bya. There are the other papers: when they come
Begin you first, and let the rest subscribe
Hard by your side; give 'em as little light
As Drapers do their Wares.

Liv. Didst mark Moroso,
In what an agony he was, and how he cry'd most
When I abus'd him most?

Bya. That was but reason.

Liv. Oh what a stinking thief is this?
Though I was but to counterfeit, he made me
Directly sick indeed. Thames-street to him.
Is a meer Pomander.

Bya. Let him be hang'd.

Liv. Amen.

Bya. And lie you still;
And once more to your business.

Liv. Call 'em in.
Now if there be a power that pities Lovers,
Help now, and hear my prayers.

Enter Petronius, Rowland, Tranio, Moroso.

Petro. Is she ready?

Bya. She has done her lamentations: pray go to her.

Liv. Rowland, come near me, and before you seal,
Give me your hand: take it again; now kiss me.
This is the last acquaintance we must have;
I wish you ever happy: there's the paper.

Rom. Pray stay a little

Petro. Let me never live more
But I do begin to pity this young fellow;
How heartily he weeps!

Bya. There's Pen and Ink, Sir.

Liv. Ev'n here I pray you. 'Tis a little Emblem
How near you have been to me.

Rom. There.

Bya. Your hands too,
As witness's.

Petro. By any means
To th' Book son.

Mor. With all my heart.
Eys. You must deliver it.
Rom. There Livia, and a better love light on thee,
 I can no more.
Eys. To this you must be witness too.
Petro. We will.
Eys. Do you deliver it now.
Liv. Pray set me up;
 There Rowland, all thy old love back: and may
 A new to come, exceed mine, and be happy.
 I must no more.
Rom. Farewel:
Liv. A long farewell. Exit Rom.
Eys. Leave her by any means, till this wild passion
 Be off her head: draw all the Curtains close,
 A day hence you may see her, 'twill be better,
 She is now for little company.
Petro. Pray tend her.
 I must to horse straight, you must needs along too,
 To see my son aboard: were but his wife
 As fit for pity, as this wench, I were happy.
Eys. Time must do that too: fare ye well: to-morrow
 You shall receive a wife to quit your sorrow. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Jaques, Pedro, and Porters, with Chest and Hampers.

Jaq. Bring 'em away Sirs.
Ped. Must the great Trunks go too?
Jaq. Yes, and the Hampers; nay, be speedy Masters;
 He'll be at Sea before us else.
Ped. Oh Jaques,
 What a most blessed turn hast thou?
Jaq. I hope so
Ped. To have the Sea between thee and this woman;
 Nothing can drown her tongue but a storm.
Jaq. By your leave,
 We'll get us up to Paris with all speed;
 For on my soul, as far as Amiens
 She'll carry blank, away to Lyon-keg
 And ship 'em presently, we'll follow ye.
Ped. Now could I wish her in that Trunk:
Jaq. God shield man,
 I had rather have a Bear in't.
Ped. Yes, I'll tell ye:
 For in the passage, if a Tempest take ye,
 As many doe, and you lie beating for it,
 Then, if it pleas'd the fates, I would have the Master,
 Out of a powerful providence, to cry,
 Lighten the ship of all hands, or we perish;
 Then this for one, as best spar'd, should by all means,
 Over-board presently.
Jaq. O' that condition,
 So we were certain to be rid of her,
 I would wish her with us, but believe me Pedro,
 She would spoil the fishing on this coast for ever.
 For none would keep her company but Dog-fish,
 As currish as her self; or Porpisces,
 Made to all fatal uses: The two Fish-streets
 Were she but once arriv'd amongst the Whitings,
 Would sing a woful misereri Pedro,
 And mourn in Poor John, till her memory
 Were cast o' shore agen, with a strong Sea-breach:
 She would make god Neptune, and his Fire-fork,
 And all his demi-gods, and goddesses,
 As weary of the Flemmish Channel, Pedro,
 As ever boy was of the School, 'tis certain,
 If she but meet him fair, and were well angred,
 She would break his god-head.
Ped. Oh her tongue, her tongue.
Jaq. Rather her many tongues.
Ped. Or rather strange tongues.

Jaq. Her lying tongue.
Ped. Her lisping tongue.
Jaq. Her long tongue.
Ped. Her lawless tongue.
Jaq. Her loud tongue.
Ped. And her liquorish ——
Jaq. Many other tongues, and many stranger tongues
 Than ever Babel had to tell his ruines,
 Were Women rais'd withal; but never a true one.

Enter Sophocles.

Soph. Home with your stuff agen, the journey's ended.
Jaq. What does your worship mean?
Soph. Your Master, Oh Petruchio, oh poor fellows.
Ped. Oh Jaques, Jaques.
Soph. Oh your Master's dead,
 His body coming back, his wife, his devil;
 The grief of —— her
Jaq. Has kill'd him?
Soph. Kill'd him, kill'd him.
Ped. Is there no Law to hang her.
Soph. Get ye in,
 And let her know her misery, I dare not
 For fear impatience seize me, see her more,
 I must away agen: Bid her for wife-hood,
 For honesty, if she have any in her,
 Even to avoid the shame that follows her.
 Cry if she can, your weeping cannot mend it.
 The body will be here within this hour, so tell her;
 And all his friends to curse her. Farewel fellows. Exit Soph.
Ped. Oh Jaques, Jaques.
Jaq. Oh my worthy Master.
Ped. Oh my most beastly Mistress, hang her.
Jaq. Split her.
Ped. Drown her directly.
Jaq. Starve her.
Ped. Stink upon her.
Jaq. Stone her to death: may all she eat be Eggs.
 Till she run kicking mad for men.
Ped. And he,
 That man, that gives her remedy, pray Heav'n
 He may ev'n ipso facto, lose his Fadding
Jaq. Let's go discharge our selves, and he that serves her,
 Or speaks a good word of her from this hour,
 A Sedgly curse light on him, which is, Pedro;
 The Fiend ride through him booted, and spurr'd, with a Sythe at's back. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Rowland, and Tranio stealing behind him.

Rom. What a dull ass was I to let her go thus?
 Upon my life she loves me still: well Paper,
 Thou only monument of what I have had,
 Thou all the love now left me, and now lost,
 Let me yet kiss her hand, yet take my leave
 Of what I must leave ever: Farewel Livia.
 Oh bitter words, I'll read ye once again,
 And then for ever study to forget ye.
 How's this? let me look better on't: A Contract
 —— A Contract, seal'd, and ratified,
 Her Fathers hand set to it, and Moroso's:
 I do not dream sure, let me read again,
 The same still, 'tis a Contract
Tra. 'Tis so Rowland;
 And by the virtue of the same. you pay me
 An hundred pound to-morrow.
Rom. Art sure Tranio,
 We are both alive now?
Tra. Wonder not, ye have lost.

Rom.

Row. If this be true, I grant it.
Tra. 'Tis most certain,
 There's a Ring for you too, you know it.
Row. Yes.
Tra. When shall I have my money?
Row. Stay ye, stay ye,
 When shall I marry her?
Tra. To night.
Row. Take heed now
 You do not trifle me; if you do,
 You'll find more payment, than your money comes to:
 Come swear; I know I am a man, and find
 I may deceive my self: swear faithfully,
 Swear me directly, am I Rowland?
Tra. Yes.
Row. Am I awake?
Tra. Ye are.
Row. Am I in health?
Tra. As far as I conceive.
Row. Was I with Livia?
Tra. You were, and had this Contract.
Row. And shall I enjoy her?
Tra. Yes, if ye dare.
Row. Swear to all these.
Tra. I will.
Row. As thou art honest, as thou hast a conscience,
 As that may wring thee if thou liest; all these
 To be no vision, but a truth, and serious.
Tra. Then by my honesty, and faith, and conscience;
 All this is certain.
Row. Let's remove our places.
 Swear it again.
Tra. By——'tistrue.
Row. I have lost then, and Heaven knows I am glad on't.
 Let's goe, and tell me all, and tell me how,
 For yet I am a Pagan in it.
Tra. I have a Priest too,
 And all shall come as even as two Testers. Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Petronius, Sophocles, Moroso, and Petruchio born in a Coffin.

Petro. Set down the body, and one call her out.

Enter Maria in black, and Jaques.

You are welcome to the last cast of your fortunes;
 There lies your Husband; there, your loving Husband,
 There he that was Petruchio, too good for ye;
 Your stubborn and unworthy way has kill'd him
 E'er he could reach the Sea; if ye can weep,
 Now ye have cause begin, and after death
 Doe something yet to th' world, to think ye honest.
 So many tears had sav'd him, shed in time;
 And as they are (so a good mind go with 'em)
 Yet they may move compassion.

Mar. Pray ye all hear me,
 And judge me as I am, not as you covet,
 For that would make me yet more miserable:
 'Tis true, I have cause to grieve, and mighty cause;
 And truly and unfeinedly I weep it.

Soph. I see there's some good nature yet left in her.

Mar. But what's the cause? mistake me not, not this man,
 As he is dead, I weep for; Heaven defend it,
 I never was so childish: but his life,
 His poor unmanly, wretched, foolish life,
 Is that my full eyes pity, there's my mourning.

Petro. Dost thou not shame?

Mar. I doe, and even to water,
 To think what this man was, to think how simple,
 How far below a man, how far from reason,
 From common understanding, and all Gentry,

While he was living here he walk'd amongst us.
 He had a happy turn he dyed; I'll tell ye,
 These are the wants I weep for, not his person:
 The memory of this man, had he liv'd
 But two years longer, had begot more follies,
 Than wealthy Autumn Flies. But let him rest,
 He was a fool, and farewell he; not pitied,
 I mean in way of life, or action
 By any understanding man that's honest;
 But only in's posterity, which I,
 Out of the fear his ruines might out-live him,
 In some bad issue, like a careful woman,
 Like one indeed, born only to preserve him,
 Deny'd him means to raise.

Petro. Unbutton me,
 — I die indeed else? Oh Maria,
 Oh my unhappiness, my misery.

Petro. Goe to him whore;—if he perish,
 I'll see thee hang'd my self.

Petro. Why, why Maria?

Mar. I have done my worst, and have my end, forgive me;
 From this hour make me what you please: I have tam'd ye,
 And now am vow'd your servant: Look not strangely,
 Nor fear what I say to you. Dare you kiss me?
 Thus I begin my new love.

Petro. Once again?

Mar. With all my heart.

Petro. Once again Maria,
 Oh Gentlemen, I know not where I am.

Soph. Get ye to bed then: there you'll quickly know Sir.

Petro. Never no more your old tricks?

Mar. Never Sir.

Petro. You shall not need, for as I have a faith
 No cause shall give occasion.

Mar. As I am honest,
 And as I am a maid yet, all my life
 From this hour, since ye make so free profession,
 I dedicate in service to your pleasure.

Soph. I marry, this goes roundly off.

Petro. Goe Jaques,
 Get all the best meat may be bought for money,
 And let the hog's heads blood; I am born again:
 Well little England, when I see a Husband
 Of any other Nation, stern or jealous,
 I'll wish him but a woman of thy breeding;
 And if he have not butter to his bread,
 Till his teeth bleed, I'll never trust my travel.

Enter Rowland, Livia, Byancha, and Tranio.

Petro. What have we here?

Row. Another Morris, Sir.
 That you must pipe too.

Tra. A poor married couple
 Desire an offering, Sir.

Bya. Never frown at it,
 You cannot mend it now: there's your own hand;
 And yours Moroso, to confirm the bargain.

Petron. My hand?

Mor. Or mine;

Bya. You'll find it so.

Petro. A trick,
 By — a trick.

Bya. Yes Sir, we trickt ye.

Liv. Father.

Petro. Hast thou lain with him? speak?

Liv. Yes truly Sir.

Petro. And hast thou done the deed, boy?

Row. I have, Sir,
 That, that will serve the turn, I think.

Petro. A match then,
 I'll be the maker up of this: Moroso,
 There's now no remedy you see, be willing;

Moꝛ be, or be not, he must have the wench.

Moꝛ. Since I am over-reach'd, let's in to dinner,
And if I can, I'll drink't away.

Tra. That's well said.

Petro. Well firrah, you have plaid a trick, look to't,
And let me be a Grandfire within's twelve-month,
Or by this hand, I'll curtail half your fortunes.

Row. There shall not want my labour, Sir : your money;

Here's one has undertaken,

Tra. Well, I'll trust her,
And glad I have so good a pawn.

Row. I'll watch ye.

Petro. Let's in, and drink of all hands, and be jovial:
I have my Colt again, and now she carries;
And Gentlemen, whoever marries next,
Let him be sure he keep him to his Text.

Exeunt.

EPILOGUE.

THe Tamer's tam'd, but so, as nor the men
Can find one just cause to complain of, when
They fitly do consider in their lives,

They should not reign as Tyrants o'er their wives.

Nor can the Women from this president

Insult, or triumph; it being aptly meant,

To teach both Sexes due equality;

And as they stand bound, to love mutually.

If this effect arising from a cause

Well laid, and grounded, may deserve applause,

We something more than hope, our honest ends

Will keep the Men, and Women too, our friends.

A Bell Rings.

Enter Pymero, Christophero, and Pedro.

Pymero.

Pen the Ports, and see the Watch reliev'd,
 And let the guards be careful of their business,
 Their vigilant eyes fixt on these Islanders,
 They are false and desperate people, when they find.

The least occasion open to encouragement,
 Cruel, and crafty souls, believe me Gentlemen,

Their late attempt, which is too fresh amongst us,
 In which, against all arms and honesty,
 The Governor of Ternata made surprize.
 Of our Confederate, the King of Tidore,
 As for his recreation he was rowing
 Between both Lands, bids us be wise and circumspect.

Chr. It was a mischief suddenly imagin'd,
 And as soon done; that Governor's a fierce knave,
 Unfaithful as he is fierce too, there's no trusting;
 But I wonder much, how such poor and base pleasures,
 Astugging at an Oar, or skill in Steerage,
 Should become Princes.

Py. Base breedings, love base pleasure;

They

They take as much delight in a Baratto,
A little scurvy boat to row her tightly,
And have the Art to turn and wind her nimbly,
Think it as noble too, though it be slavish,
And a dull labour that declines a Gentleman:
As we Portugals, or the Spaniards do in riding,
In managing a great horse, which is princely:
The French in Courtship, or the dancing English,
In carrying a fair presence.

Ped. He was strangely taken;
But where no faith is, there's no trust: he has paid for't
His Sister yet the fair and great Quisara,
Has shew'd a noble mind, and much love in't
To her afflicted brother, and the nobler still it appears,
And seasons of more tenderness, because his ruin stiles her
And his imprisonment adds to her profit. (absolute
Feeling all this, which makes all men admire her,
The warm beams of this fortune that fall on her,
Yet has she made divers and noble Treaties,
And propositions for her brothers freedom,
If wealth or honor —.

Py. Peace, peace, you are fool'd, Sir;
Things of these natures have strange outsides Pedro,
And cunning shadows, set 'em far from us,
Draw 'em but near, they are gross, and they abuse us;
They that observe her close, shall find her nature,
Which I doubt mainly will not prove so excellent;
She is a Princess, and she must be fair,
That's the prerogative of being Royal:
Let her want eyes and nose, she must be beauteous,
And she must know it too; and the use of it,
And people must believe it, they are damn'd else:
Why, all our neighbor Princes are mad for her,

Chr. Is she not fair then?

Py. But her hopes are fairer,
And there's a haughty Master, the King of Bakan,
That lofty Sir, that speaks far more, and louder
In his own commendations, than a Cannon:
He is stricken dumb with her.

Ped. Beshrew me she is a sweet one.

Py. And there's that hopeful man of Syana,
That sprightly fellow, he that's wise and temperate,
He is a Lover too.

Chr. Wou'd I were worth her looking
For; by my life I hold her a compleat one,
The very Sun, I think affects her sweetness,
And dares not, as he does to all else, dye it
Into his tauny Livery.

Py. She dares not see him,
But keeps her self at distance from his kisses,
And her complexion in a Case; let him but like it
A week, or two, or three, she would look like a Lion;
But the main sport on't is, or rather wonder
The Governor of Ternata, her mortal enemy,
He that has catcht her brother King, is struck too,
And is arriv'd under safe conduct also,
And hostages of worth delivered for him;
And he brought a Letter from his prisoner,
Whether compell'd, or willingly delivered
From the poor King, or what else dare be in't,

Chr. So it be honourable, any thing, 'tis all one
For I dare think she'll do the best.

Py. 'Tis certain

He has admittance, and solicites hourly,
Now if he have the trick —

Ped. What trick?

Py. The true one,
To take her too, if he be but skill'd in Bat-fowling,
And lime his bush right.

Chr. I'll be hang'd when that hits,
For 'tis not a compell'd, or forc'd affection
That must take her, I guess her stout and virtuous,
But where's your Uncle, Sir, our valiant Captain,
The brave Ruy Dias all this while?

Py. I marry.

He is amongst 'em too.

Ped. A Lover.

Py. Nay,

I know not that, but since he stands in favour,
Or would stand stily, he is no Portugal else.

Chr. The voice says in good favour, in the list too
Of the privy wooers, how cunningly of late
I have observ'd him, and how privately
He has stolen at all hours from us, and how readily
He has feign'd a business to bid the Fort farewell
For five or six days, or a month together,
Sure there is something —

Py. Yes, yes, there is a thing in't,
A thing would make the best on's all dance after it;
A dainty thing; Lord how this Uncle of mine
Has read to me, and rated me for wenching.
And told me in what desperate case 'twould leave me,
And how 'twould stew my bones.

Ped. You car'd not for it.

Py. I faith not much, I ventur'd on still easily,
And took my chance, danger is a Soldiers honor;
But that this man, this herb of Grace, Ruy Dias,
This father of our faculties should slip thus,
For sure he is a ferriting, that he
That would drink nothing, to depress the spirit,
But milk and water, eat nothing but thin air
To make his blood obedient, that his youth,
In spite of all his temperance, should tickle,
And have a love mange on him.

Chr. 'Tis in him, Sir,
But honourable courtship, and becomes his rank too.

Py. In me 'twere abominable Leachery, or would be,
For when our thoughts are on't, and miss their level,
We must hit something.

Ped. Well, he's a noble Gentleman,
And if he be a suitor, may he speed in't.

Py. Let him alone, our family ne'r fail'd yet.

Chr. Our mad Lieutenant still, merry Pyniero,
Thus wou'd he do, if the Surgeon were searching of him.

Ped. Especially if a warm wench had shot him.

Py. But hark Christophero; come hither Pedro;
When I saw you our brave Countrey-man Armusia?
He that's arriv'd here lately, and his gallants?

A goodly fellow, and a brave companion
Methinks he is, and no doubt, truly valiant,
For he that dares come hither, dares fight any where.

Chr. I saw him not of late, a sober Gentleman
I am sure he is, and no doubt bravely sprung,
And promises much nobleness.

Py. I love him,
And by my troth wou'd fain be inward with him;
Pray let's go seek him.

Ped. We'll attend you Sir.

Py. By that time we shall hear the burst of business,

Exeunt.

Enter Ruy Dias, Quisara, Quisana, and Panura.

Quisara. Aunt, I much thank you for your courtesie,
And the fair liberty you still allow me,
Both of your house and service, though I be
A Princess, and by that Prerogative stand free
From the poor malice of opinion,
And no ways bound to render up my actions,
Because no power above me can examine me;
Yet my dear brother being still a prisoner,
And many wandring eyes upon my ways,
Being left alone a Sea-mark, it behoves me
To use a little caution, and be circumspect.

Quisana. You're wise and noble Lady.

Quisara. Often Aunt

I resort hither, and privately to see you,
It may be to converse with some I favour;

I wou'd

I wou'd not have it known as oft, nor constru'd,
It stands not with my care.

Quisar. You speak most fairly,
For even our pure devotions are examin'd.

Quisar. So mad are mens minds now.

Ruy. Or rather monstrous; (nesh.
They are thick dreams, bred in fogs that know no fair-

Quisar. Madam, the House is yours, I am yours, pray
And at your service all I have lies prostrate; (use me,

My care shall ever be to yield ye honor,
And when your fame falls here, 'tis my fault Lady;

A poor and simple banquet I have provided,
Which if you please to honor with your presence —

Quisar. I thank ye Aunt, I shall be with you instantly,
A few words with this Gentleman.

Quisar. I'll leave ye, Exeunt Quis.
And when you please retire, I'll wait upon you. (& Pan.

Quisar. Why, how now Captain, what afraid to speak to A man of Armes, and danted with a Lady? (me?

Commanders have the power to parle with Princes.

Ruy. Madam, the favors you have still show'd on me,
Which are so high above my means of merit,

So infinite, that nought can value 'em
But their own goodness, no eyes look up to 'em

But those that are of equal light, and lustre,
Strike me thus mute, you are my royal Mistriſs,

And all my services that aime at honor,
Take life from you, the Saint of my devotions;

Pardon my wish, it is a fair ambition,
And well becomes the Man that honors you;

I wou'd I were of worth, of something near you,
Of such a royal piece, a King I wou'd be,

A mighty King that might command affection,
And bring a youth upon me might bewitch ye,

And you a sweet sould Christian.

Quisar. Now you talk Sir;
You Portugals, though you be rugged Soldiers,
Yet when you list to flatter, you are plain Courtiers;
And could you wish me Christian, brave Ruy Dias?

Ruy. At all the danger of my life great Lady,
At all my hopes, at all —

Quisar. Pray ye stay a little,
To what end runs your wish?

Ruy. O glorious Lady,
That I might — but I dare not speak.

Quisar. I dare then,
That you might hope to marry me; nay blush not,

An honorable end needs no excuse;
And would you love me then?

Ruy. My soul not dearer.

Quisar. Do some brave thing that may entice me that Something of such a meritorious goodness, (way,

Of such an unmatcht nobleness, that I may know
You have a power beyond ours that preserves you:

'Tis not the person, nor the royal title,

Nor wealth, nor glory, that I look upon,

That inward man I love that's lin'd with virtue,

That well deserving soul works out a favor;

I have many Princes suiters, many great ones,

Yet above these I love you, you are valiant,

An active man, able to build a fortune;

I do not say I dote, nor meane to marry,

Only the hope is, something may be done,

That may compel my faith, and ask my freedome,

And leave opinion fair.

Ruy. Command dear Lady,

And let the danger be as deep as Hell,

As direful to attempt —

Quisar. Y're too sudden,

I must be rul'd by you, find out a fortune

Wisely, and handsomely, examine time,

And court occasion that she may be ready;

A thousand uses for your forward spirit

Ye may find daily, be sure ye take a good one,

A brave and worthy one that may advance ye,
Forc'd smiles reward poor dangers; you are a Soldier,
I wou'd not talke so else, and I love a Soldier,
And that that speaks him true, and great, his valor;
Yet for all these which are but Womens follies,
You may do what you please, I shall still know ye,
And though ye weare no Sword.

Ru. Excellent Lady,
When I grow so cold, and disgrace my Nation,
That from their hardy nurses suck adventures,
'Twere fit I wore a Tombstone; you have read to me
The story of your favor, if I mistake it,
Or grow a truant in the study of it,
A great correction Lady —

Quisar. Let's toth' banquet,
And have some merrier talk, and then to Court,
Where I give audience to my general Suiters;
Pray heaven my womans wit hold; there brave Captain,
You may perchance meet something that may startle ye;
I'll say no more, come be not sad ———
I love ye. Exeunt.

Enter Pyniero, Armusia, Soza, Christophero, and Emanuel.

Py. You are wellcome Gentlemen, most worthy welcom,
And know there's nothing in our power may serve ye,
But you may freely challenge.

Arm. Sir we thank ye,
And rest your servants too.

Py. Ye are worthy Portugals,
You shew the bravery of your minds and spirits;
The nature of our Country too, that brings forth
Stirring, unwearied soules to seek adventures;
Minds never satisfied with search of honor
Where time is, and the Sun gives light, brave Countrymen,
Our names are known, new worlds disclose their riches,
Their beauties, and their prides to our embraces;
And we the first of Nations find these wonders.

Arm. These noble thoughts, Sir, have intic'd us forward,
And minds unapt for ease to see these miracles,

In which we find report a poor relater;

We are arriv'd among the blessed Islands,
Where every wind that rises blows perfumes,

And every breath of air is like an Incence:

The treasure of the Sun dwells here, each Tree

As if it envied the old Paradice,
Strives to bring forth immortal fruit; the Spices

Renewing nature, though not deifying,

And when that falls by time, scorning the earth,
The sullen earth should taint or suck their beauties,

But as we dreamt, for ever so preserve us:

Nothing we see, but breeds an admiration;

The very rivers as we float along,

Throw up their pearls, and curl their heads to court us;

The bowels of the earth swell with the births

Of thousand unknown gemms, and thousand riches;

Nothing that bears a life, but brings a treasure;

The people they shew brave too, civil manner'd,

Proportioned like the Masters of great minds,

The Women which I wonder at ———

Py. Ye speak well.

Ar. Of delicate aspects, fair, clearly beauteous,
And to that admiration, sweet and courteous.

Py. And is not that a good thing? brave Armusia

You never saw the Court before?

Ar. No certain,

But that I see a wonder too, all excellent,

The Government exact.

Chr. Ye shall see anon,

That that will make ye start indeed, such beauties,

Such riches, and such form.

Enter Bakam, Syana, Governor.

Soz. We are fire already;
The wealthy Magazine of nature sure
Inhabits here.

Arm. These sure are all Islanders.

Py. Yes, and great Princes too, and lusty lovers.

Ar. They are goodly persons; What might he be Signior
That bears so proud a state?

Py. King of Bakam,

A fellow that farts terror,

Em. He looks highly,

Sure he was begot o'th' top of a Steeple.

Chr. It may well be,

For you shall hear him ring anon.

Py. That is Syana,

And a brave temper'd fellow, and more valiant.

Soz. What rugged face is that?

Py. That's the great Governor,

The man surpriz'd our Friend, I told ye of him.

Ar. 'Has dangerous eyes.

Py. A perilous Thief, and subtle.

Chr. And to that subtilty a heart of Iron.

Py. Yet the young Lady makes it melt.

Ar. They start all,

And thunder in the eyes.

Ba. Away ye poor ones,

Am I in competition with such bubbles?

My virtue, and my name rank'd with such trifles?

Sy. Ye speak loud.

Bz. Young-man, I will speak louder;

Can any man but I deserve her favor,

You petty Princes.

Py. He will put 'em all in's pocket.

Sy. Thou proud mad thing be not so full of glory,
So full of vanity.

Bz. How? I contemn thee,

And that fort-keeping fellow.

Py. How the Dog looks,

The bandog Governor?

Gov. Ha, Why?

Bz. Away thing,

And keep your rank with those that fit your royalty;

Call out the Princess.

Gov. Dost thou know me bladder,

Thou insolent impostume?

Bz. I despise thee;

Gov. Art thou acquainted with my nature baby?

With my revenge for Injuries? darst thou hold me

So far behind thy file, I cannot reach thee?

What canst thou merit?

Bz. Merit? I am above it;

I am equal with all honors, all achievements,

And what is great and worthy; the best doer

I keep at my command, fortune's my servant,

'Tis in my power now to despise such wretches,

To look upon ye slightly, and neglect ye,

And but she daines at some hours to remember ye,

And people have bestowed some Titles on ye,

I should forget your names —

Sy. Mercy of me;

What a blown fool has self affection

Made of this fellow? did not the Queen your Mother

Long for bellows, and bagpipes, when she was great with ye,

She brought forth such a windy birth?

Gov. 'Tis ten to one

She eat a Drum, and was deliver'd of alarum,

Or else he was swaddled in an old saile when he was young.

Sy. He swells too mainly with his meditations;

Faith, talk a little handfomer, ride softly

That we may be able to hold way with ye, we are Princes,

But those are but poor things to you; talk wiser,

'T will well become your mightiness; talk less,

That men may think ye can do more.

Gov. Talk truth,

That men may think ye are honest, and believe ye,
Or talk your self asleep, for I am weary of you.

Bz. Why? I can talk and do.

Gov. That wou'd do excellent.

Bz. And tell you, only I deserve the Princess,
And make good only I, if you dare, you sir,
Or you Syana's Prince.

Py. Heres a storm toward,
Methinks it sings already, to him Governor.

Gov. Here lies my proof.

Sy. And mine.

Gov. I'll be short with ye,
For these long arguments I was never good at.

Py. How white the boaster looks?

(Draw.

Enter Ruy Dias, Quisara, Quisana, Panura.

Ar. I see he lacks faith.

Ru. For shame forbear great Princes, rule your angers,
You violate the freedom of this place,

The state and Royalty —

Gov. He's well contented

It seems, and so I have done.

Ar. Is this she Signior?

Py. This is the Princess Sir.

Ar. She is sweet and goodly,

An admirable form, they have cause to juggle.

Quisara. Ye wrong me and my court, ye forward Princes;
Comes your Love wrapt in Violence to seek us?

Is't fit though you be great, my presence should be

Stain'd, and polluted with your bloody rages?

My privacies affrighted with your Swords?

He that loves me, loves my command; be temper'd,

Or be no more what ye profess, my Servants.

Ommes. We are calme as peace.

Ar. What command she carries?

And what a sparkling Majesty flies from her?

Quisara. Is it ye love to do? ye shall find danger,

And danger that shall start your resolutions,

But not this way; 'tis not contention,

Who loves me to my face best, or who can flatter most

Can carry me, he that deserves my favor,

And will enjoy what I bring, love and Majesty,

Must win me with his worth; must travel for me;

Must put his hasty rage off, and put on

A well confirmed, a temperate, and true valor.

Ommes. But shew the way.

Quisara. And will, and then shew you

A will to tread the way, I'll say ye are worthy.

Py. What task now

Will she turn 'em to? these hot youths,

I fear will find a cooling card, I read in her eyes

Something that has some swinge must fly amongst 'em;

By this hand I love her a little now.

Quisara. 'Tis not unknown to you

I had a royal Brother, now miserable,

And Prisoner to that Man; if I were ambitious,

Gap'd for that glory was n're born with me,

There he should lie his miseries upon him:

If I were covetous, and my heart set

On riches, and those base effects that follow

On pleasures uncontrol'd, or safe revenges,

There he should die, his death will give me all these;

For then stood I up absolute to do all;

Yet all these flattering shews of dignity,

These golden dreams of greatness cannot force

To forget nature and my fair affection.

Therefore that Man that would be known my lover,

Must be known his redeemer, and must bring him

Either alive or dead to my embraces.

For ever his bones I scorn shall feel such slavery,

Or seek another Mistress, 'twill be hard

To do this, wondrous hard, a great adventure,
Fit for a spirit of an equal greatness;
But being done, the reward is worthy of it.

Chr. How they stand gaping all?

Quisar. Ruy Dias cold?

Not fly like fire into it? may be you doubt me,
He that shall do this is my husband Prince;
By the bright heavens he is, by whose justice
I openly proclaim it; if I lye,
Or seek to set you on with subtilty,
Let that meet with me, and reward my fallhood.
No stirring yet, no start into a bravery?

Ruy. Madam, it may be, but being a main danger,
Your Grace must give me leave to look about me,
And take a little time, the cause will ask it.
Great Acts require great counsels.

Quisar. Take your pleasure,
I fear the Portugal.

Ba. I'll raise an Army
That shall bring back this Island, Fort and all,
And fix it here.

Gov. How long will this be doing?
You should have begun in your Grandfather's days.

Sy. What may be,
And what my power can promise noblest Lady,
My will I am sure stands fair.

Quisar. Faire be your fortune,
Few promises are best, and fair performance.

Gov. These cannot doe,
Their power and arts are weak ones.
'Tis in my will, I have this King your brother,
He is my prisoner, I accept your proffer,
And bless the fair occasion that achiev'd him:
I love ye, and I honor ye, but speak;
Whether alive or dead he shall be rendred,
And see how readily, how in an instant,
Quick as your wishes Lady——

Quisar. No, I scorn ye,
You and your courtesie; I hate your love Sir;
And ere I would so basely win his liberty,
I would study to forget he was my brother;
By force he was taken; he that shall enjoy me,
Shall fetch him back by force, or never know me.

Py. As I live, a rare Wench.

Ar. She has a noble spirit.

Gov. By force?

Quisar. Yes Sir, by force, and make you glad too
To let him goe.

Gov. How? you may look nobler on me,
And think me no such Boy; by force he must not,
For your love much may be.

Quisar. Put up your passion,
And pack ye home, I say, by force, and suddenly.
He lies there till he rots else, although I love him
Most tenderly and dearly, as a brother,
And out of these respects would joy to see him;
Yet to receive him as thy courtesie,
With all the honor thou couldst add unto him
From his hands that most hate him, I had rather,
Though no condition were propounded for him,
See him far funke i'th earth, and there forget him.

Py. Your hopes are gelt good Governor.

Arm. A rare Woman.

Gov. Lady,
I'll pull this pride, I'll quench this bravery,
And turne your glorious scorn to tears and howlings;
I will proud Princess; this neglect of me
Shall make thy brother King most miserable;
Shall turn him into curses 'gainst thy cruelty;
For where before I us'd him like a King,
And did those Royal Offices unto him:

Now he shall lie a sad lump in a dungeon,
Loden with chains and fetters, colds and hunger,
Darkness, and lingring death for his companions;

And let me see who dare attempt his rescue,
What desperate fool? look toward it; farewell,
And when thou know'st him thus, lament thy follies,
Nay I will make thee kneel to take my offer:
Once more farewell, and put thy trust in puppits. Exit.

Quisar. If none dare undertake it, I'll live a mourner.

Ba. You cannot want.

Sy. You must not.

Ka. 'Tis most dangerous,
And wise men wou'd proceed with care and counsel,
Yet some way would I knew—
Walke with me Gentlemen— Exeunt.

Ar. How do you like her spirit? Manent, Arm.

Soz. 'Tis a clear one, and his Comp.

Clog'd with no dirty stuff, she is all pure honor.
Em. The bravest Wench I ever look'd upon,
And of the strongest parts, she is most fair,
Yet her mind such a mirrour—

Arm. What an action
Wou'd this be to put forward on, what a glory,
And what an everlasting wealth to end it?
Methinks my soul is strangely rais'd.

Soz. To step into it,
'ust while they think, and ere they have determin'd
To bring the King off.

Ar. Things have been done as dangerous.

Em. And prosper'd best when they were least consider'd.

Ar. Bless me my hopes,
And you my friends assist me.
None but our companions.

Soz. You deale wisely,
And if we shrink the name of slaves dye with us.

Em. Stay not for second thoughts.

Ar. I am determin'd;
And though I lose, it shall be sung, I was valiant,
And my brave offer shall be turn'd to story,
Worthy the Princess tongue. A Boat, that's all
That's unprovided, and habits like to Merchants,
The rest wee'l counsel as we goe.

Soz. A way then,
Fortune looks fair on those, make haste to win her.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Keeper, and 2 or 3 Moores.

Kee. I Have kept many a Man, and many a great one,
Yet I confesse, I nere saw before
A Man of such a sufferance; he lies now
Where I would not lay my dog, for sure 't would kill him.
Where neither light or comfort can come near him;
Nor air, nor earth that's wholesome; it grieves me
To see a mighty King with all his glory,
Sunk o'th' sudden to the bottome of a dungeon.
Whether should we descend that are poor Raicals
If we had our deserts?

1. Mo. 'Tis a strange wonder,
Load him with Irons, oppress him with contempts,
Which are the Governors commands, give him nothing,
Or so little, to sustain life, 'tis next nothing;
They stir not him, he smiles upon his miseries,
And beares 'em with such strength, as if his nature
Had been nurs'd up, and foster'd with calamities.

2. He gives no ill words, curses, nor repines not,
Blames nothing, hopes in nothing, we can hear of;
And in the midst of all these frights, fears nothing.

Kk 2

Kee.

Kee. I'll be sworne

He fears not, for even when I shake for him,
As many times my pitty will compell me,
When other souls, that bear not half his burthen,
Shrink in their powers, and burst with their oppressions;
Then will he sing, wooe his afflictions,
And court 'em in sad airs, as if he wou'd wed 'em.

1. That's more than we have heard yet, we are only
Appointed for his Guard, but not so near him,
If we could hear that wonder—

Kee. Many times

I fear the Governor should come to know it;
For his voice so affects me, so delights me,
That when I find his hour, I have Musick ready,
And it stirs me infinitely, be but still and private,
And you may chance to hear.

King appears loden with chains, his head, and armes only above.

2. We will not stir, Sir;

This is a sudden change, but who dares blame it.

Kee. Now hark and melt, for I am sure I shall;
Stand silent, what stubborn weight of chains—

1. Yet he looks temperately.

2. His eyes not sunk, and his complexion firm still,
No wickness, no distemper'd touch upon him,
How constantly he smiles, and how undanted?

With what a Majesty he heaves his head up? Musick.

Kee. Now marke, I know he will sing; do not disturb him.
Your allowance from the Governor, wou'd it were more
Or in my power to make it handsomer. (sir,

Kin. Do not transgress thy charge, I take his bounty,
And fortune, whilst I bear a mind contented
Not leaven'd with the glory I am fallen from,
Nor hang upon vain hopes, that may corrupt me.

Enter Governor.

Gov. Thou art my slave, and I appear above thee.

Kee. The Governor himself.

Gov. What, at your banquet?

And in such state, and with such change of service?

Kin. Nature's no glutton, Sir, a little serves her.

Gov. This diet's holsome then.

Kin. I beg no better.

Gov. A calm contented mind, give him less next;
These full meals will oppress his health, his Grace
Is of a tender and pure constitution,
And such repletions—

Kin. Mock, mock, it moves not me sir,
Thy mirths, as do thy mischiefs, lie behind me.

Gov. Ye carry it handsomely, but tell me patience,
Do not you curse the brave and royal Lady
Your gracious sister? do not you damn her pitty,
Damn twenty times a day, and damn it seriously?
Do not you swear aloud too, cry and kick?
The very soul sweat in thee with the agony
Of her contempt of me? Couldst not thou eat her
For being so injurious to thy fortune,
Thy fair and happy fortune? Couldst not thou wish her
A Bastard, or a Whore, fame might proclame her;
Black ugly fame, or that thou hadst had no sister?
Spitting the general name out, and the nature;
Blaspheming heaven for making such a mischief;
For giving power to pride, and will to Woman?

Kin. No Tyrant, no, I bless and love her for it;
And though her scorn of thee, had laid up for me
As many plagues as the corrupted air breeds,
As many mischiefs as the hours have minutes,
As many formes of Death, as doubt can figure;
Yet I should love more still, and more honor her;
All thou canst lay upon me, cannot bend me,
No not the stroke of death, that I despise too:
For if fear could possess me, thou hadst won me;
As little from this hour I prize thy flatteries,

And less than those thy prayers, though thou wouldst
And if she be not Mistris of this nature, (kneel to me;
She is none of mine, no kin, and I contemne her.

Gov. Are you so valiant sir?

Kin. Yes, and so fortunate;

For he that holds his constancy still conquers;
Hadst thou preserv'd me as a noble enemy,
And as at first, made my restraint seem to me
But only as the shadow of captivity,
I had still spoke thee noble, still declar'd thee
A valiant, great, and worthy man, still lov'd thee,
And still prefer'd thy fair love to my sister;
But to compell this from me with a misery,
A most inhumane, and unhandsome slavery—

Gov. You will relent for all this talk I fear not,
And put your wits a work agen.

Kin. You are cozen'd;

Or if I were so weak to be wrought to it,
So fearful to give way to so much poverty,
How I should curse her heart if she contented?

Gov. You shall write, and entreat, or—

Kin. Do thy utmost,

And e'en in all thy tortures I'll laugh at thee,
I'll think thee no more valiant, but a villain;
Nothing thou hast done brave, but like a thief,
Atchiev'd by craft, and kept by cruelty;
Nothing thou canst deserve, thou art dishonest;
Nor no way live to build a Name, thou art barbarous.

Gov. Down with him low enough, there let him murmur,
And see his diet be so light and little,
He grow not thus high hearted on't, I wil coole ye,
And make ye cry for mercy, and be ready
To work my ends, and willingly; and your sister taken
Your scornful, cruel sister shall repent too, (down,
And sue to me for grace.

Give him no liberty,

But let his bands be doubled, his ease lessened;
Nothing his heart desires, but vex and torture him:
Let him not sleep, nothing that's dear to nature
Let him enjoy; yet take heed that he dye not;
Keep him as near death, and as willing to embrace it,
But see he arrive not at it; I will humble him.

And her stout heart that stands on such defiance;
And let me see her champions that dare venture
Her high and mighty woovers, keep your guards close,
And as you love your lives be diligent.

And what I charge, observe.

Omnes. We shall be dutiful.

(Exit Gov.)

Gov. I'll pull your courage King, and all your bravery.

1. Most certain he is resolv'd nothing can stir him;

For if he had but any part about him
Gave way to fear or hope, he durst not talk thus,
And do thus stoutly too, as willingly,
And quietly he sunk down to his sorrows,
As some men do to their sleeps.

Keep. Yes, and sleeps with e'm;

So little he regards them, there's the wonder,
And often soundly sleeps, wou'd I durst pity him,
Or wou'd it were in my will, but we are servants,
And tied unto command.

2. I wish him better,

But much I fear h'as found his tombe already,
We must observe our guards.

1. He cannot last long,

And when he is dead, he is free.

Kee. That's the most cruelty,
That we must keep him living.

2. That's as he please;

For that Man that resolves, needs no Phisitian.

Exeunt.

Enter

Enter Armusia, Soza, Emanuel like Merchants, arm'd underneath.

Arm. Our prosperous passage was an omen to us,
A lucky and a fair omen.

Omnes. We believe it.

Ar. The Sea and Wind strove who should most befriend
And as they favour'd our design, and lov'd us, (us,
So lead us forth — Where lies the Boat that brought us?

Soz. Safe lodg'd within the Reeds, close by the Castle,
That no eye can suspect, nor thought come near it.

Em. But where have you been, brave sir?

Ar. I have broke the Ice Boyes:

I have begun the game, fair fortune guide it,
Suspectless have I travell'd all the Town through,
And in this Merchants snape won much acquaintance,
Survey'd each strength and place that may befriend us,
View'd all his Magazines, got perfect knowledge
Of where the Prison is, and what power guards it.

Soz. These will be strong attempts.

Ar. Courage is strong:

What we begun with policy, my dear friends,
Let's end with manly force; there's no retiring,
Unless it be with shame.

Em. Shame his that hopes it.

Ar. Better a few, and clearer fame will follow us,
However, lose or win, and speak our memories,
Than if we led our Armies; things done thus,
And of this noble weight, will stile us worthies.

Soz. Direct, and we have done, bring us to execute,
And if we flinch, or fail —

Ar. I am sure ye dare not.

Then farther know, and let no ear be near us,
That may be false.

Em. Speak boldly on, we are honest;
Our lives and fortunes yours.

Ar. Hard by the place then
Where all his Treasure lies, his Armes, his Women,
Close by the Prison too where he keeps the King,
I have hir'd a lodging, as a Trading Merchant,
A Celler to that too, to stow my Wares in,
The very Wall of which, joynes to his store-house.

Soz. What of all this?

Ar. Ye are dull, if ye apprehend not:
Into that Cellar, elected friends, I have convey'd,
And unsuspected too, that that will do it;
That that will make all shake, and smoak too.

Em. Ha?

Ar. My thoughts have not been idle, nor my practice:
The fire I brought here with me shall do something,
Shall burst into material flames, and bright ones,
That all the Island shall stand wondring at it,
As if they had been stricken with a Comet:
Powder is ready, and enough to work it,
The Match is left a-fire, all, all husht, and lockt close,
No man suspecting what I am but Merchant:
An hour hence, my brave friends, look for the fury,
The fire to light us to our honour'd purpose,
For by that time 'twill take.

Soz. What are our duties?

Ar. When all are full of fear and fright, the Governor
Out of his wits, to see the flames so imperious,
Ready to turn to ashes all he worships,
And all the people there to stop these ruins,
No man regarding any private office;
Then flie we to the prison suddenly,
Here's one has found the way, and dares direct us.

Em. Then to our swords and good hearts,
I long for it.

Ar. Certain we shall not find much opposition,
But what is must be forced.

Soz. 'Tis bravely cast Sir,
And surely too I hope.

Ar. If the fire fail not,
And powder hold his nature, some must presently
Upon the first cry of th' amazed people,
(For nothing will be markt then, but the misery)
Be ready with the boat upon an instant,
And then all's right and fair.

Em. Bless us dear fortune.

Ar. Let us be worthy of it in our courage,
And fortune must befriend us, come all sever,
But keep still within sight, when the flame rises
Let's meet, or either doe, or dye.

Soz. So be it.

Exeunt.

Enter Governor, and Captain.

Gov. No Captain, for those Troops we need 'em not,
The Town is strong enough to stand their furies,
I wou'd see 'em come, and offer to do something.
They are high in words.

Cap. 'Tis safer Sir then doing.

Gov. Dost think they dare attempt?

Cap. Maybe by Treaty,
But sure by force they will not prove so froward.

Gov. No faith, I warrant thee, they know me well
And know they have no Child in hand to play with: (enough
They know my nature too, I have bit some of 'em,
And to the bones, they have reason to remember me,
it makes me laugh to think how glorious
The fools are in their promises, and how pregnant
Their wits and powers are to bring things to pass;
Am I not grown lean with loss of sleep and care
To prevent these threatnings, Captain?

Cap. You look well Sir:

Upon my conscience you are not like to sicken
Upon any such conceit.

Gov. I hope I shall not:

Well, wou'd I had this Wench, for I must have her,
She must be mine; and there's another charge Captain;
What betwixt love and brawling I got nothing,
All goes in maintenance —

Heark, What was that,
That noise there? it went with a violence.

The Train takes.

Cap. Some old wall belike Sir,
That had no neighbor help to hold it up,
Is fallen suddenly.

Gov. I must discard these Rascals,
That are not able to maintain their buildings,
They blur the beauty of the Town.

Within. Fire, Fire.

Gov. I hear another tune, good Captain,
It comes on fresher still, 'tis loud and fearful,
Look up into the Town, how bright the ayr shewes;
Upon my life some sudden fire.
The bell too?
I hear the noise more clear.

Ex. Cap.
Bell Rings.

Enter Citizen.

Cit. Fire, fire.

Gov. Where? where?

Cit. Suddenly taken in a Merchans house sir,
Fearful and high it blazes; help good people.

Gov. Pox o'their paper-houses, how they smother,
They light like Candles, how the rore still rises?

Enter Captain.

Cap. Your Magazine's a fire Sir, help, help suddenly,
The Castle too is in danger, in much danger,
All will be lost, get the people presently,
And all that are your Guard, and all help, all hands Sir,
Your wealth, your strength, is burnt else, the Town perisht;
The Castle now begins to flame.

Gov. My soul shakes.

Cap. A

Cap. A Merchants house next joyning? shame light on him,
That ever such a neighbour, such a villain—
Gov. Raise all the Garrison, and bring 'em up.

Enter other Citizens.

And beat the people forward— Oh I have lost all
In one house, all my hopes: good worthy Citizens
Follow me all, and all your powers give to me,
I will reward you all. Oh cursed fortune—
The flame's more violent: arise still, help, help, Citizens,
Freedom and wealth to him that helps: follow, oh follow.
Fling wine, or any thing, I'll see't recompenc'd.
Buckets, more Buckets; fire, fire, fire.

Ex. omnes.

Enter Armusia, and his company.

Arm. Let it flame on, a comely light it gives up
To our discovery.

Soz. Hark, what a merry cry
These hounds make! forward fairly,
We are not seen in the mist, we are not noted. Away,
Away. Now if we lose our fortune— Exit.

Enter Captain and Citizens.

Cap. Up Soldiers, up, and deal like men.
Cit. More water, more water, all is consum'd else.
Cap. All's gone, unless you undertake it straight, your Wealth too, that must preserve, and pay your labor
Up, up; away. (bravely.)

Ex. Cap. and Cit. Then,

Enter Armusia and his company breaking open a Doore.

Ar. So, thou art open, keep the way clear
Behind still. Now for the place.

Sold. 'Tis here Sir.

Ar. Sure this is it.

Force ope the doore— A miserable creature!
Yet by his manly face— The King discover'd.

Kin. Why stare ye on me?

You cannot put on faces to fright me:
In death I am a King still, and contemne ye:
Where is that Governor? Methinks his Man.hood
Should be well pleas'd to see my Tragedy,
And come to bath his stern eyes in my sorrows;
I dare him to the fight, bring his scorns with him,
And all his rugged threats: here's a throat, soldiers;
Come, see who can strike deepest.

Em. Break the Chain there.

Kin. What does this mean?

Ar. Come, talke of no more Governors,
He has other business, Sir, put your Legs forward,
And gather up your courage like a Man,
Wee'll carry off your head else: we are friends,
And come to give your sorrows ease.

Soz. Onbravely;
Delays may lose agen,

Enter Guard.

Ar. The Guard.

Soz. Upon 'em.

Ar. Make speedy, and sure work.

Em. They flie.

Ar. Up with him, and to the Boat; stand fast, now be
When this heat's past, wee'll sing our History. (speedy;
Away, like thoughts, sudden as desires, friends;
Now sacred chance be ours.

Soz. Pray when we have done, Sir.

Exeunt.

Enter 3 or 4 Citizens severally.

1. What is the fire allaid?

2. 'Tis out, 'tis out,

Or past the worst, I never did so stoutly
I'll assure you neighbours since I was a Man:
I have been burnt at both ends like a squib:
I liv'd two hours in the fire, 'twas a hideous matter;
But when men of understanding come about it,
Men that judge of things, my Wife gave me over,
And took her leave a hundred times, I bore up still,
And tost the Buckets Boys.

3. We are all meere Martins.

1. I heard a voice at latter end o'th hurry,
Or else I dreamt I heard it, that said Treason.

2. 'Tis like enough, it might cry Murder too, for there was
Many without a joint, but what's that to us: Let's home
And fright our Wives, for we look like Devils.

Enter 3 Women.

3. Here come some of 'em to fright us.

1 W. Mine's alive neighbor— oh sweet hony husband.

2. Thou liest, I think abominably, and thou hadst been
In my place, thou wouldst have stunk at both ends.
Get me some drink, give me whole Tuns of drink,
Whole cisterns; for I have four dozen of fine firebrands
In my belly, I have more smoke in my mouth, than would Blote a hundred Herrings.

2 Wo. Art thou come safe agen?

3 Wo. I pray you what became of my man, is he in a Well

2. At hearts ease in a Well, is very well neighbor;
We left him drinking of a new dozen of Buckets;
Thy husbands happy, he was through roasted,
And now he's basting of himself at all points:
The Clark and he are cooling their pericraniums;
Body, oh me neighbors there's fire in my Codpiece.

1 Wo. Bless my Husband.

2. Blow it out Wife— blow, blow, the gable end a'th'
Women. Some water, water, water. store-house

3. Peace, 'tis but a sparkle;

Raise not the Town again, 'twill be a great hindrance,
I'm glad 'tis out, and't had ta'en in my Hay-loft?
What frights are these, marry heaven bless thy modicum.

3 Wo. But is a drown'd outright, pray put me out of Fear neighbor.

2. Thou wouldst have it so, but after a hundred fires
More, he'll live to see thee burnt for brewing musty Liquor.

1. Come, let's go neighbor.

2. For I would very fain turn down this liquor;
Come, come, I fry like a burnt mary-bone:
Women get you afore, and draw upon us;
Run wenches, run, and let your Taps run with ye;
Run as the fire were in your tails, cry Ale, Ale.

Wom. Away, let's nourish the poor wretches.

2. We'll rallie up the rest of the burnt Regiment.

Enter Governor, Captain, Soldier, and Guard.

Gov. The fire's quencht Captain, but the mischief hangs still;
The King's redeem'd, and gone too; a trick, a dam'd one:
Oh I am overtaken poorly, tamely.

Cap. Where were the guard that waited upon the prison?

Sol. Molt of 'em slain, yet some scap'd, Sir, and they deliver,
They saw a little boat ready to receive him,
And those redeem'd him, making such haste and fighting;
Fighting beyond the force of men.

Gov. I am lost Captain,
And all the world will laugh at this, and scorn me:
Count me a heavy sleepy fool, a coward,
A coward past recovery, a confirm'd coward,

One without carriage, or common sense.

Sol. Hee's gon Sir,

And put to Sea amaine, past our recovery,
Not a Boat ready to pursue; if there were any,
The people stand amazed so at their valor,
And the sudden fright of fire, none knows to execute.

Gov. Oh, I could tear my limbs, and knock my boys
'Gainst every post I meet; fool'd with a fire? (brains)

Cap. It was a crafty trick.

Gov. No, I was lazy,

Confident sluggish lazie, had I but met 'em
And chang'd a dozen blowes, I had forgiv'n 'em,
By both these hands held up, and by that brightness
That gildes the world with light, by all our worships,
The hidden ebbs and flowes of the blew Ocean,
I will not rest; no mirth shall dwell upon me,
Wine touch my mouth, nor any thing refresh me,
Till I be wholly quit of this dishonor:
Make ready my Barrato's instantly,
And what I shall intend—

Cap. We are your servants.

Exeunt.

Enter Quisara, Ruy Dias.

Quisara. Never tell me, you never car'd to win me,
Never for my sake to attempt a deed,
Might draw me to a thought, you sought my favor?
If not for love of me, for love of armes Sir,
For that cause you profess, for love of honor,
Of which you stile your self the mighty Master,
You might have stept out nobly, and made an offer,
As if you had intended something excellent,
Put on a forward face.

Ru. Dear Lady hold me—

Quisara. I hold ye, as I find ye, a faint servant.

Ru. By—I dare doe—

Quisara. In a Ladies chamber

I dare believe ye, there's no mortal danger:
Give me the man that dares do, to deserve that:
I thought you Portugals had been rare wonders,
Men of those haughty courages and credits,
That all things were confin'd within your promises,
The Lords of fate and fortune I believ'd ye,
But well I see I am deceiv'd Ruy Dias,
And blame, too late, my much believe.

Ru. I am asham'd, Lady,

I was so dull, so stupid to your offer:
Now you have once more school'd me, I am right,
And something shall be thought on suddenly,
And put in Act as soon, some preparation?

Quisara. And give it out?

Ru. Yes, Lady, and so great too;

In which, the noise of all my Countrey-men— (ones,

Quisara. Those will do well, for they are all approv'd
And though he be restor'd alive.

Ru. I have ye.

Quisara. For then we are both servants.

Ru. I conceive ye,

Good Madam give me leave to turn my fancies.

Qui. Do, and make all things fit, and then I'll visit you, Ex.

Ru. My self, the Cozen, and the Garrison,
The neighbors of the out-Isles of our Nation,
Syana's strength, for I can humor him:
And proud Bekamus, I shall deceive his glory. As shout.

What ringing sound of joy is this? whence comes it?
May be the Princes are in sport.

Enter Pyniero, Christoph.

Py. Where are ye?

Ru. Now Pyniero, What's the haste you seek me?

Py. Doe you know this sign Sir?

Ru. Ha!

Py. Do you know this embleme:

Your nose is boar'd.

Ru. Boar'd? What's that?

Py. Y'are topt Sir:

The King's come home again, the King.

Ru. The Devil?

Py. Nay sure he came a Gods name home:
He's return'd Sir.

Christ. And all this joy ye hear—

Ru. Who durst attempt him?

The Princes are all here.

Chry. They are worthy Princes,
They are special Princes, all they love by ounces.
Believe it Sir, 'tis done, and done most bravely and easily.
What fortune have ye lost Sir?

What justice have ye now unto this Lady?

Py. How stands your claim?

That ever Man should be fool'd so,
When he should do and prosper; stand protesting,
Kissing the hand, and fating for a favor,
When he should be about his business sweating;
She bid you go, and pickt you out a purpose, (one,
To make your self a fortune by, a Lady, a Lady, and a lusty
A lovely, that now you may go look. she pointed ye,
Knowing you were a man of worth and merit,
And bid you fly, you have made a fair flight on't,
You have caught a Goose.

Ru. How dare you thus molest me? As shout.

It cannot be.

Chr. Heark how the general joy rings!

Py. Have you your hearing left? Is not that drunk too?
For if you had been sober, you had been wise sure.

Ru. Done? Who dares do?

Py. It seems an honest fellow,
That has ended his Market before you be up.

Chr. The shame on't 's a stranger too.

Py. 'Tis no shame,

He took her at her word, and tied the bargain,
Dealt like a man indeed, stood not demurring,
But clapt close to the cause, as he will do to the Lady:
'Is a fellow of that speed and handsomness,
He will get her with child too, ere you shall come to know
Is it not brave, a gentleman scarce landed, (him,
Scarce eating of the air here, not acquainted,
No circumstance of love depending on him,
Nor no command to shew him, must start forth,
At the first sight to—

Ru. I am undone.

Py. Like an Oyster:

She neither taking view, nor value of him,
Unto such deeds as these—Pox o' these,
These wise delayings—
They make men cowards.

You are undone as a man would undoe an egge,
A hundred shames about ye.

Enter Quisara, Panura, and Traine.

Quisara. Can it be possible,
A stranger that I have not known, not seen yet,
A man I never grac'd; O Captain, Captain,
What shall I do? I am betray'd by fortune,
It cannot be, it must not be.

Py. It is Lady,
And by my faith a handsome Gentleman;
'Tis his poor Schollers prize.

Quisara. Must I be given
Unto a Man I never saw, ne're spoke with,
I know not of what Nation?

Py. Is a Portugal,
And of as good a pitch he will be giv'n to you Lady,
For he's given much to handsome flesh.

Quisara. Oh Ruy Dias,
This was your sloth, your sloth, your sloth Ruy Dias.

Py. Your

Py. Your love sloth, Uncle do you find it now?
You should have done at first, and faithfully: A shout.
And then th'other had lyed ready for ye;
Madam, the general joy comes.

Quisar. We must meet it — but with what comfort?

*Enter Citizens carrying boughs, boys singing after 'em;
Then King, Armulia, Soza, Emanuel; The Princes and train following.*

Quisar. Oh my dear brother, what a joy runs through me,
To see you safe again, your self, and mighty,
What a blest day is this?

Kin. Rise up fair Sister,
I am not welcome till you have embraced me.

Kin. A general gladness sir flies through the City,
And mirth possesses all to see your Grace arrive,
Thus happily arriv'd again, and fairly;
'Twas a brave venture who so e'er put for it,
A high and noble one, worthy much honor;
And had it fail'd, we had not fail'd great Sir,
And in short time too, to have forc'd the Governor,
In spite of all his threats.

Kin. I thank ye Gentleman.

Ru. And all his subtilties to set you free,
With all his heart and will too.

Kin. I know ye love me.

Py. This had been good with something done before it,
Something set off to beautifie it, now it sounds empty, like
A Barbers bason, pox there's no metall in't, no noble mar-

Ba. I have an Army Sir, but that the Governor, (row.
The foolish fellow was a little provident,
And wise in letting slip no time, became him too,
That would have scour'd him else, and all his confines;
That would have rung him such a peal —

Py. Yes backward,
To make dogs houl, I know thee to a farthing,
Thy Army's good for Hawks, there's Nothing but sheeps hearts in it.

Sy. I have done nothing Sir, therefore
I think it convenient I say little what I purpos'd;
And what my love intended.

Kin. I like your modesty,
And thank ye royal friends, I know it griev'd ye
To know my misery; but this man, Princess,
I must thank heartily, indeed, and treuly,
For this Man saw me in't, and redeemed me:
He lookt upon me sinking, and then caught me.
This Sister this, this all Man, this all valor,
This pious Man.

Ru. My countenance, it shames me,
One scarce arriv'd, not harden'd yet, not Read in dangers and great deeds, sea-sick, not season'd —
Oh I have boy'd my self.

Kin. This noble bulwark,
This lance and honor of our age and Kingdome;
This that I never can reward, nor hope
To be once worthy of the name of friend to,
This, this Man from the bowels of my sorrows
Has new begot my name, and once more made me:
Oh sister, if there may be thanks for this,
Or any thing near recompence invented.

Ar. You are too noble Sir, there is reward
Above my action too by millions:
A recompence so rich and glorious,
I durst not dreame it mine, but that 'twas promis'd;
But that it was propounded, sworn and sealed
Before the face of Heaven, I durst not hope it,
For nothing in the life of man, or merit,
It is so truly great, can else embrace it.

Kin. O speak it, speak it, blefs mine ears to hear it,
Make me a happy man, to know it may be,
For still methinks I am a prisoner,
And feel no liberty before I find it.

Ar. Then know it is your sister, she is mine Sir,
I claime her by her own word, and her honor;
It was her open promise to that Man
That durst redeeme ye; Beauty set me on,
And fortune crowns me fair, if she receive me.

Kin. Receive ye, Sir—why Sister—ha—so backward,
Stand as you knew me not? nor what he has ventured?
My dearest Sister.

Ar. Good Sir pardon me,
There is a blushing modesty becomes her,
That holds her back; Women are nice to wooe Sir;
I would not have her forc'd; give her fair liberty;
For things compell'd and frighted, of soft natures,
Turn into fears, and flie from their own wishes.

Kin. Look on him my Quisara, such another,
Oh all ye powers, so excellent in nature!
In honor so abundant! —

Quisar. I confesse Sir,
Confesse my word is past too, he has purchased;
Yet good Sir give me leave to think; but time
To be acquainted with his worth and person;
To make me fit to know it; we are both strangers,
And how we should believe so suddenly,
Or come to fasten our affection —
Alas, love has his complements.

Kin. Be sudden
And certain in your way, no woman doubles,
Nor coy delays, you are his, and so assure it,
Or cast from me and my remembrance ever;
Respect your word, I know you will, come Sister,
Lets see what welcome you can give a prisoner,
And what fair looks a friend— Oh my most noble
Princes, no discontents, but all be lusty,
He that frowns this day is an open enemy:
Thus in my armes my dear.

Ar. You make me blush Sir.

Kin. And now lead on—
Our whole Court crown'd with pleasure.

Ru. Madam, despair not, something shall be done yet,
And suddenly, and wisely.

Quisar. O Ruy Dias.

Py. Well, he's a brave fellow, and he has deserv'd her (richly;

And you have had your hands full I dare swear Gentlemen.

Soz. We have done something, Sir, if it hit right.

Ch. The woman has no eyes else, nor no honesty,
So much I think.

Py. Come, let's goe bounce amongst 'em,
To the Kings health, and my brave Country-mans.
My Uncle looks as though he were sick oth'
Worms friends.

Exeunt

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Pyniero.

Mine Uncle haunts me up and down, looks melancholy,
Wondrous proof melancholy, sometimes swears
Then whistles, starts, cries, and groans, as if he had the Bots,
As to say truth, I think h'as little better,
And wo'd fain speak; bids me good morrow at midnight,
And good night when 'tis noon, has something hovers
About his brains, that would fain find an issue,
But cannot out, or dares not: still he follows.

Enter

Enter Ruy Dyas.

How he looks still, and how he beats about,
Like an old dog at a dead scent? I marry,
There was a sigh wou'd a set a ship a sailing:
These winds of love and honor, blow at all ends.
Now speak and't be thy Will : good morrow Uncle.

Ru. Good morrow Sir.

Py. This is a new salute:
Sure h'as forgot me: this is pur-blind Cupid.

Ru. My Nephew?

Py. Yes Sir, if I be not chang'd.

Ru. I wou'd fain speak with you.

Py. I wou'd fain have ye, Sir,
For to that end I stay.

Ru. You know I love ye,
And I have lov'd yelong, my dear Pyniero,
Bred and supply'd you.

Py. Whither walks this Preamble?

Ru. You may remember, though I am but your Uncle,
I sure had a father's care, a father's tendernefs.

Py. Sure he would wrap me into something now suddenly,
He doubts my nature in, for mine is honest,
He winds about me so.

Ru. A fathers diligence.

My private benefits I have forgot, Sir,
But those you might lay claim to as my follower;
Yet some men wou'd remember —

Py. I do daily.

(one,

Ru. The place which I have put ye in, which is no weak
Next to my self you stand in all employments,
Your counsels, cares, assignments with me equal,
So is my study still to plant your person;
These are small testimonies I have not forgot ye,
Nor wou'd not be forgotten.

Py. Sure you cannot.

Ru. Oh Pyniero —

Py. Sir, what hangs upon you,
What heavy weight oppresses ye, ye have lost,
(I must confess, in those that understand ye)
Some little of your credit, but time will cure that;
The best may slip sometimes.

Ru. Oh my best Nephew —

Py. It may be ye fear her too, that disturbs ye,
That she may fall her self, or be forc'd from ye.

Ru. She is ever true, but I undone for ever.
Oh that Armusia, that new thing, that stranger,
That flag stuck up to rob me of mine honor;
That murd'ring chain shot at me from my Country:
That goodly plague that I must court to kill me.

Py. Now it comes flowing from him, I fear'd this,
Knew, he that durst be idle, durst be ill too,
Has he not done a brave thing?

Ru. I must confess it Nephew, must allow it,
But that brave thing has undone me, has sunk me,
Has trod me like a name in sand, to nothing,
Hangs betwixt hope and me, and threatens my ruin;
And if he rise and blaze, farewell my fortune;
And when that's set, where's thy advancement, Cousin?
That were a friend, that were a noble kinsman.
That would consider these; that man were grateful;
And he that durst do something here, durst love me.

Py. You say true, 'tis worth consideration,
Your reasons are of weight, and mark me Uncle,
For I'll be sudden, and to th' purpose with you.
Say this Armusia, then were taken off,
As it may be easily done,
How stands the woman?

Ru. She is mine for ever;
For she contemns his deed and him.

Py. Pox on him.
Or if the single pox be not sufficient,

The hogs, the dogs, the devils pox possess him:
'Faith this Armusia stumbles me, 'tis a brave fellow;
And if he could be spared Uncle —

Ru. I must perish:

Had he set up at any rest but this,
Done any thing but what concern'd my credit,
The everlasting losing of my worth —

Py. I understand you now, who set you on too:
I had a reasonable good opinion of the devil
Till this hour; and I see he is a knave indeed,
An arrant, stinking knave, for now I smell him;
I'll see what may be done then, you shall know
You have a kinsman, but no villain Uncle,
Nor no betrayer of fair fame, I scorn it;
I love and honor virtue; I must have Access unto the Lady to know her mind too,
A good word from her mouth you know may stir me;
A Ladies look at setting on —

Ru. You say well,
Here Cousin, here's a Letter ready for you,
And you shall see how nobly she'll receive you,
And with what dare direct.

Py. Farewel then Uncle,
After I have talk'd with her, I am your servant,
To make you honest if I can — else hate you.
Pray ye no more compliments, my head is busie, heaven
'What a malicious soul does this man carry? (bless me;
And to what scurvy things this love converts us?
What stinking things, and how sweetly they become us?
Murder's a moral virtue with these Lovers,
A special piece of Divinity, I take it:
I may be mad, or violently drunk.

Which is a whelp of that litter; or I may be covetous,
And learn to murder mens estates, that's base too;
Or proud, but that's a Paradise to this;
Or envious, and sit eating of my self
At others fortunes; I may lye, and damnably,
Beyond the patience of an honest hearer;
Cousin, Cutpurfes, sit i'th' Stocks for apples.
But when I am a Lover, Lord have mercy,
These are poor pelting sins, or rather plagues,
Love and Ambition draw the devils Coach.

Enter Quifana, and Panura.

How now! who are these? Oh my great Ladies followers—
Her Riddle-sounders, and her Fortune-tellers.
Her readers of her Love-Lectures, her Inflamers:
These doors I must pass through, I hope they are wide.
Good day to your beauties, how they take it to 'em?
As if they were fair indeed.

Quifan. Good morrow to you, Sir.

Py. That's the old Hen, the brood-bird? how she buffles?
How like an Inventory of Lechery she looks?
Many a good piece of iniquity
Has pass'd her hands, I warrant her — I beseech you,
Is the fair Princess stirring?

Pan. Yes marry is she, Sir.

But somewhat private: you have a business with her?

Py. Yes forsooth have I, and a serious business.

Pan. May not we know?

Py. Yes, when you can keep counsel.

Pan. How prettily he looks? he's a soldier sure,
His rudeness sits so handsomly upon him.

Quifan. A good blunt Gentleman,

Py. Yes marry am I:

Yet for a push or two at sharp, and't please you —

Pan. My honest friend, you know not who you speak to:
This is the Princess's Aunt,

Py. I like her the better
And she were her Mother (Lady) or her Grandmother,
I am not so bashful, but I can buckle with her.

Pan. Of what size is your business?

L 1

Py.

Pin. Of the long sixteens,
And will make way I warrant ye.

Pan. How fine he talks?

Pin. Nay in troth I talk but courtesly, Lady,
But I hold it comfortable for the understanding:
How fain they wou'd draw me into ribaldry?
These wenches that live easly, live high,
I love these broad discourfes, as they love possets;
These dry delights ferve for preparatives.

Pan. Why do you look so on me?

Pin. I am gueffing should be,
By the cast of your face, what the property of your place,
For I presume you turn a key, sweet beauty,
And you another, gravity, under the Princess,
And by my — I warrant ye good places,
Comly commodious Seats

Quifan. Prethee let him talk still.
For methinks he talks handsomely.

Py. And truly
As near as my understanding shall enable me
You look as if you kept my Ladies secrets:
Nay, do not laugh, for I mean honestly, (end?)
How these young things tattle, when they get a toy by th'
And how their hearts go pit-a-pat, and look for it?
Wou'd it not dance too, if it had a Fiddle?
Your gravity I guefs, to take the Petitions,
And hear the lingring fuits in love dispos'd,
Their sighs and sorrows in their proper place,
You keep the Ay-me Office.

Quifan. Prethee suffer him,
For as I live he's a pretty fellow;
I love to hear sometimes what men think of us:
And thus deliver'd freely, 'tis no malice:
Proceed good honest man.

Pin. I will, good Madam.
According to mens states and dignities,
Moneys and moveables, you rate their dreams;
And cast the Nativity of their desires,
If he reward well, all he thinks is prosperous:
And if he promise place, his dreams are Oracles;
Your antient practique Art too in these discoveries,
Who loves at such a length, who a span farther,
And who draws home, yield you no little profit,
For these ye milk by circumstance.

Qui. Ye are cunning.

Pin. And as they oil ye, and advance your Spindle,
So you draw out the lines of love, your doors too,
The doors of destiny, that men must pass through;
These are fair places.

Pan. He knows all.

Pin. Your trap-doors,
To pop fools in it, that have no providence,
Your little wickets, to work wise men, like wires, through at,
And draw their states and bodies into Cobwebs,
Your Postern doors, to catch those that are cautelous,
And would not have the worlds eye find their knaveries:
Your doors of danger, some men hate a pleasure,
Unkfs that may be full of fears; your hope doors,
And those are fine commodities, where fools pay
For every new encouragement, a new custom;
You have your doors of honor, and of pleasure;
but those are for great Princes, glorious vanities,
That travel to be famous through diseases;
There be the doors of poverty and death too:
But these you do the best you can to damm up,
For then your gain goes out.

Qui. This is a rare Lecture.

Pin. Read to them that understand.

Pan. Beware me,

I dare not venture on ye, ye cut too keen, Sir.

Enter Quifara.

Quifan. We thank you Sir for your good mirth,
You are a good companion.
Here comes the Princess now, attend your business.

Quifan. Is there no remedy, no hopes can help me?
No wit to set me free? whose there hoe?

Quifan. Troubled? her looks are almost wild:
What ails the Princess?
I know nothing she wants.

Quifan. Who's that there with you?
Oh Signior Pyniero? you are most welcome:
How does your noble Uncle?

Pin. Sad as you are Madam:
But he commends his service, and this Letter.

Quifan. Go off, attend within — Fair Sir, I thank ye,
Pray be no stranger, for indeed you are welcome;
For your own virtues welcome.

Quifan. We are mistaken,
This is some brave fellow sure.

Pan. I'm sure he's a bold fellow:
But if she hold him so, we must believe it. Exit

Quifan. Do you know of this, fair Sir?

Pin. I ghes it Madam,
And whether it intends: I had not brought it else,

Quif. It is a business of no common reckoning.
Pin. The handsomer for him that goes about it;
Slight actions are rewarded with slight thanks:
Give me a matter of some weight to wade in.

Quifan. And can you love your Uncle so directly,
So seriously, and so full, to undertake this?
Can there be such a faith?

Pin. Dare you say I to it,
And set me on? 'tis no matter for my Uncle,
Or what I owe to him, dare you but wish it.

Quifan. I wou'd fain —

Pin. Have it done; say but so Lady.

Quifan. Conceive it so.

Pin. I will, 'tis that I am bound to:
Your Will that must command me, and your Pleasure,
The fair aspects of those eyes that must direct me:
I am no Uncles Agent, I am mine own, Lady;
I scorn my able youth should plough for others,
Or my ambition ferve for pay; I aim,
Although I never hit, as high as any man,
And the reward I reach at, shall be equal,
And what love spurs me on to, this desire,
Makes me forget an honest man, a brave man,
A valiant, and a virtuous man, my countrey-man, Armusia
The delight of all the Minions, (your excellence)
This love of you, doting upon your beauty, the admiration of
Make me but servant to the poorest smile,
Or the least grace you have bestow'd on others,
And see how suddenly I'll work your safety,
And set your thoughts at peace; I am no flatterer,
To promise infinitely, and out-dream dangers;
To lye a bed, and swear men into Feavers,
Like some of your trim suiters; when I promise,
The light is not more constant to the world,
Than I am to my word — She turns for millions.

Quifan. I have not seen a braver confirm'd courage.

Pin. For a Tun of Crowns she turns: she is a woman,
And much I fear, a worse than I expected.

You are the object, Lady, you are the eye
In which all excellence appears, all wonder,
From which all hearts take fire, all hands their valour:
And when he stands disputing, when you bid him,
Or but thinks of his Estate, Father, Mother,
Friends, Wife, and Children,
He is a fool, and I scorn him,
And 't be but to make clean his sword, a coward;
Men have forgot their fealty to beauty.
Had I the place in your affections,
My most unworthy Uncle is fit to fall from,

Liv'd in those blessed eyes, and read the stories
Of everlasting pleasures figur'd there,
I wou'd find out your commands before you thought 'em,
And bring 'em to you done, e'r you dream't of 'em.

Quis. I admire his boldness.

Pyn. This, or anything;
Your brothers death, mine Uncles, any mans,
No state that stands secure, if you frown on it.
Look on my youth, I bring no blastings to you,
The first flower of my strength, my faith.

Quis. No more Sir;
I am too willing to believe, rest satisfi'd;
If you dare do for me, I shall be thankful:
You are a handsome Gentleman, a fair one,
My servant if you please; I seal it thus, Sir.
No more, till you deserve more.

Exit.

Pyn. I am rewarded:
This woman's cunning, but she's bloody too;
Although she pulls her Tallons in, she's mischievous;
Form'd like the face of Heaven, clear and transparent;
I must pretend still, bear 'em both in hopes,
For fear some bloody slave thrust in indeed,
Fashion'd and flesh'd, to what they wish: well Uncle,
What will become of this, and what dishonor
Follow this fatal shaft, if shot, let time tell,
I can but only fear, and strive to cross it.

Exit.

Enter Armusia, Emanuel, and Soza.

Em. Why are you thus sad? what can grieve or vex you
That have the pleasures of the world, the profits,
The honor, and the loves at your disposal?

Why should a man that wants nothing, want his quiet?

Ar. I want what beggars are above me in, content;
I want the grace I have merited,
The favor, the due respect.

Soz. Does not the King allow it?

Ar. Yes, and all honors else, all I can ask,
That he has power to give; but from his Sister,
The scornful cruelty, forgive me beauty,
That I transgress from her that should look on me,
That should a little smile upon my service,
And foster my deserts for her own faiths sake;
That should at least acknowledge me, speak to me.

Soz. And you goe whining up and down for this, Sir?
Lamenting and disputing of your grievances?
Sighing and sobbing like a sullen School-boy,
And cursing good-wife fortune for this favour?

Ar. What would you have me doe?

Soz. Doe what you should do,
What a man would doe in this case, a wise man,
An understanding man that knows a woman;
Knows her and all her tricks, her scorns, and all her trifles:
Goe to her, and take her in your arms, and shake her,
Take her and tosse her like a barr.

Em. But be sure you pitch her upon a Feather-bed,
Shake her between a pair of Sheets, Sir,
There shake these sullen fits out of her, spare her not there;
There you may break her Will, and bruise no bone, Sir.

Soz. Goe to her.

Em. That's the way.

Soz. And tell her, and boldly,
And do not mince the matter, nor mock your self,
With being too indulgent to her pride:
Let her hear roundly from ye, what ye are,
And what ye have deserved. and what she must be.

Em. And be not put off like a common fellow,
With the Princess would be private,
Or that she has taken physick, and admits none;
I would talk to her any where.

Ar. It makes me smile.

Em. Now you look handsomly:
Had I a wench to win, I would so flutter her:
They love a man that crushes 'em to verjuice;

A woman held at hard meat, is your Spaniel.

Soz. Pray take our council, Sir.

Ar. I shall do something,

But not your way, it shews too boisterous,
For my affections are as fair and gentle,
As her they serve.

Enter King.

Soz. The King.

King. Why how now friend?

Why do you rob me of the company
I love so dearly, Sir, I have been seeking you;
For when I want you, I want all my pleasure:
Why sad? thus sad still man? I will not have it;
I must not see the face I love thus shadowed.

(him:)

Em. And't please your Grace, methinks it ill becomes
A soldier should be jovial, high and lusty.

King. He shall be so, come, come, I know your reason,
It shall be none to cross you, ye shall have her,
Take my word, ('tis a Kings word) ye shall have her,
She shall be yours or nothing, pray be merry.

Arm. Your Grace has given me cause, I shall be Sir,
And ever your poor servant.

King. My self, Sir,
My better self, I shall find time, and suddainly,
To gratifie your loves too, Gentlemen,
And make you know how much I stand bound to you:
Nay, 'tis not worth your thanks, no further complement;
Will you go with me friend?

Arm. I beseech your Grace,
Spare me an hour or two, I shall wait on you,
Some little private business with my self, Sir,
For such a time.

King. I'll hinder no devotion,
For I know you are regular, I'll take you Gentlemen,
Because he shall have nothing to disturb him,
I shall look for your friend.

Exeunt. manet Armusia.

Enter Panura.

Arm. I dare not fail, Sir:
What shall I do to make her know my misery,
To make her sensible? This is her woman,
I have a toy come to me suddenly,
It may work for the best, she can but scorn me,
And lower than I am, I cannot tumble,
I'll try, what e'er my fate be—Good even fair one,
Pan. 'Tis the brave stranger—A good night to you, Sir.
Now by my Ladies hand, a goodly Gentleman!
How happy shall she be in such a Husband?
Wou'd I were so provided too.

Arm. Good pretty one,
Shall I keep you company for an hour or two?
I want employment for this evening.
I am an honest man.

Pan. I dare believe ye:
Or if ye were not, Sir, that's no great matter,
We take mens promises, wou'd ye stay with me, Sir?

Arm. So it please you, pray let's be better acquainted,
I know you are the Princesses Gentlewoman,
And wait upon her near.

Pan. 'Tis like I do so.

Arm. And may befriend a man, do him fair courtesies,
If he have business your way.

Pan. I understand ye.

Arm. So kind an office, that you may bind a gentleman,
Hereafter to be yours; and your way too,
And ye may bless the hour you did this benefit:
Sweet handsome faces should have courteous minds,
And ready faculties.

Pan. Tell me your business,
Yet if I think it be to her, your self, Sir,

For I know what you are, and what we hold ye,
And in what grace ye stand, without a second,
For that but darkens, you wou'd do it better,
The Princess must be pleas'd with your access,
I'm sure I should.

Arm. I want a Courtiers boldness,
And am yet but a stranger, I wou'd fain speak with her:

Pan. 'Tis very late, and upon her hour of sleep, Sir.

Ar. Pray ye wear this, and believe my meaning civil,
My business of that fair respect and carriage:
This for our more acquaintance.

Jewel.

Pan. How close he kisses?
And how sensible the passings of his lips are?
I must do it, and I were to be hang'd now, and I will do it:
He may do as much for me, that's all I aim at;
And come what will e'er't, life or death, I'll do it,
For ten such kisses more, and 'twere high treason.

Arm. I wou'd be private with her.

Pan. So you shall,

'Tis not worth thanks else, you must dispatch quick.

Arm. Suddenly.

Pan. And I must leave you in my chamber, Sir;
Where you must lock your self that none may see you;
'Tis close to her, you cannot miss the entrance,
When she comes down to bed.

Arm. I understand ye, and once more thank ye Lady.

Pan. Thank me but thus.

Arm. If I fail thee —
Come close then.

Ex.

Enter Quisara, and Quisana.

Quisar. 'Tis late good Aunt, to bed, I am ev'n unready,
My woman will not be long away.

Quisana. I wou'd have you a little merrier first,
Let me sit by ye, and read or discourse
Something that ye fancy, or take my instrument.

Quisar. No, no I thank you,
I shall sleep without these, I wrong your age Aunt
To make ye wait thus, pray let me intreat ye,
To-morrow I'll see ye, I knew y'are sleepy,
And rest will be a welcome guest, you shall not,
Indeed you shall not stay; oh here's my woman,

Enter Panura.

Good night, good night, and good rest Aunt attend you.

Quisana. Sleep dwell upon your eyes, and fair dreams court ye.

Quisar. Come, where have you been wench? make me unreaslept but in last night. (dy,

Pan. You'll sleep the better
I hope no night, Madam.

Quisar. A little rest contents me;

Thou lovest thy bed Panura.

Pan. I am not in love Lady,
Nor seldom dream of devils, I sleep soundly.

Quisar. I'll swear thou dost, thy Husband wou'd not take
If thou wert married wench. (it so well

Pan. Let him take, Madam,
The way to waken me, I am no Dormouse,
Husbands have larum-bells, if they but Ring once.

Quisar. Thou art a merry wench.

Pan. I shall live the longer.

Quisar. Prethee fetch my Book.

Pan. I am glad of that.

Quisar. I'll read awhile before I sleep.

Pan. I will Madam.

Quisar. And if Ruy Dias meet you, and be importunate,
He may come in.

Pan. I have a better fare for you,
Now least in sight play I.

Exit.

Enter Armusia, locks the door.

Quisar. Why should I love him?
Why should I doat upon a man deserves not,
Nor has no will to work it? who's there wench?
What are you? or whence come you?

Arm. Ye may know me,
I bring not such amazement, noble Lady.

Quisar. Who let you in?

Arm. My restless love that serves ye.

Quisar. This is an impudence I have not heard of,
A rudeness that becomes a thief or ruffian;
Nor shall my brothers love protect this boldness,
You build so strongly on, my rooms are sanctuaries,
And with that reverence, they that seek my favours,
And humble fears, shall render their approaches.

Arm. Mine are no less.

Quisar. I am Mistress of my self, Sir,
And will be so, I will not be thus visited:
These fears and dangers thrust into my privacy.
Stand further off, I'll cry out else.

Arm. Oh dear Lady!

Quisar. I see dishonor in your eyes.

Arm. There is none:

By all that beauty they are innocent;
Pray ye tremble not, you have no cause.

Quisar. I'll dye first;
Before you have your Will, be torn in pieces;
The little strength I have left me to resist you,
The gods will give me more, before I am forc'd
To that I hate, or suffer —

Arm. You wrong my duty.

Quisar. So base a violation of my liberty?
I know you are bent unnobly; I'll take to me
The spirit of a man; borrow his boldness,
And force my womans fears into a madness,
And e'er you arrive at what you aim at —

Arm. Lady,

If there be in you any womans pity;
And if your fears have not proclaim'd me monstrous;
Look on me, and believe me; is this violence?
Is it to fall thus prostrate to your beauty
A ruffians boldness? is humility a rudeness?
The griefs and sorrows that grow here an impudence?
These forcings, and these fears I bring along with me,
These impudent abuses offered ye;
And thus high has your brothers favour blown me:
Alas dear Lady of my life, I came not
With any purpose, rough or desperate,
With any thought that was not smooth and gentle,
As your fair hand, with any doubt or danger
Far be it from my heart to fright your quiet;
A heavy curse light on it, when I intend it.

Quisar. Now I dare hear you.

Arm. If I had been mischievous,
As then I must be mad; or were a monster,
If any such base thought had harbour'd here,
Or violence that became not man,
You have a thousand bulwarks to assure you,
The holy powers bear shields to defend chastity;
Your honor, and your virtues are such armours;
Your clear thoughts such defences; if you mis-doubt still
And yet retain a fear, I am not honest,
Come with impure thoughts to this place;
Take this, and sheath it here; be your own safety;
Be wise, and rid your fears, and let me perish;
How willing shall I sleep to satisfy you.

Quisar. No, I believe now, you speak worthily;
What came you then for?

Arm. To complain me, beauty,
But modestly.

Quisar. Of what?

Arm. Of your fierce cruelty,
For though I dye, I will not blame the doer:

Humbly

Humbly to tell your grace, ye had forgot me :
A little to have touch'd at, not accused,
For that I dare not do, your scorns, pray pardon me
And be not angry that I use the liberty
To urge that word, a little to have shew'd you
What I have been, and what done to deserve ye,
If any thing that love commands may reach ye :
To have remembred ye, but I am unworthy,
And to that misery falls all my fortunes;
To have told ye, and by my life ye may believe me,
That I am honest, and will only marry
You, or your memory; pray be not angry.

Quisar. I thank you Sir, and let me tell you seriously,
Ye have taken now the right way to befriend ye,
And to beget a fair and clear opinion,
Yet to try your obedience —

Arm. I stand ready Lady.
Without presuming to ask any thing.

Quisar. Or at this time to hope for further favour;
Or to remember services or smiles;
Dangers you have past through, and rewards due to 'em;
Loves or despairs, but leaving all to me:
Quit this place presently.

Arm. I shall obey ye.

Enter Ruy Dias.

Ru. Ha?

Arm. Who's this?

What art thou?

Ru. A Gentleman.

Arm. Thou art no more I'm sure: oh 'tis Ruy Dias;
How high he looks, and harsh?

Ru. Is there not door enough,
You take such elbow room?

Arm. If I take it, I'll carry it.

Ru. Does this become you Princess?

Arm. The Captain's jealous.

Jealous of that he never durst deserve yet;
Go freely, go, I'll give thee leave.

Ru. Your leave, Sir?

Arm. Yes my leave Sir, I'll not be troubled neither,
Nor shall my heart ache, or my head be jealous,
Nor strange suspicious thoughts reign in my memory;
Go on, and do thy worst, I'll smile at thee;
I kiss your fair hand first, then farewell Captain. Exit.

Quisar. What a pure soul inherits here? what innocences
Sure I was blind when I first lov'd this fellow,
And long to live in that fogg still: how he blusters!

Ru. Am I your property? or those your flatteries,
The banquets that ye bid me to, the trust
I build my goodly hopes on?

Quisar. Be more temperate.

Ru. Are these the shews of your respect and favour?
What did he here, what language had he with ye?
Did ye invite? could ye stay no longer?
Is he so gracious in your eye?

Quisar. You are too forward.

Ru. Why at these private hours?

Quisar. You are too saucy,
Too impudent to task me with those errors.
Do ye know what I am Sir, and my prerogative?
Though you be a thing I have call'd by th' name of friend,
I never taught you to dispose my liberty;
How durst you touch mine honor? blot my meanings?
And name an action, and of mine but noble?
Thou poor unworthy thing, how have I grac'd thee?
How have I nourisht thee and raised thee hourly?
Are these the gratitudes you bring Ruy Dias?
The thanks? the services? I am fairly paid;
Was't not enough I saw thou wert a Coward,
And shadowed thee? no noble sparkle in thee?
Daily provok'd thee, and still found thee coward?
Rais'd noble causes for thee, strangers started at;

Yet still, still, still a Coward, ever Coward;
And with those taints, dost thou upbraid my virtues?

Ru. I was too blame

Lady.

Quisar. So blindly bold to touch at my behaviour?
Durst thou but look amiss at my allowance?
If thou hadst been a brave fellow, thou hadst had some licence
Some liberty I might have then allowed thee
For thy good face, some scope to have argued with me;
But being nothing but a sound, a shape,
The meer sign of a Soldier — of a Lover.
The dregs and drassy part, disgrace and jealousy,
I scorn thee; and contemn thee.

Ru. Dearest Lady,
If I have been too free —

Quisar. Thou hast been too foolish,
And go on still, I'll study to forget thee,
I would I could, and yet I pity thee.

Ru. I am not worth it, if I were, that's misery,
The next door is but death, I must aim at it.

Exit.

Exit.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter King and Governor, like a Moor-Priest.

King. SO far and truly you have discovered to me
The former currents of my life and fortune,
That I am bound to acknowledge ye most holy,
And certainly to credit your predictions,
Of what are yet to come.

Gov. I am no lyer,
'Tis strange I should, and live so near a neighbor;
But these are not my ends.

King. Pray ye sit good father,
Certain a reverend man, and most religious.

Gov. I, that belief's well now, and let me work then,
I'll make ye curse Religion e'r I leave ye.
I have liv'd a long time Son, a mew'd up man,
Sequester'd by the special hand of Heaven
From the worlds vanities, bid farewell to follies,
And shook hands with all heats of youth and pleasures,
As in a dream these twenty years I have slumber'd,
Many a cold Moon have I, in meditation
And searching out the hidden Wils of heaven,
Lain shaking under; many a burning Sun
Has fear'd my body, and boil'd up my blood,
Feebl'd my knees, and stamp't a Meagerness
Upon my figure, all to find out knowledge,
Which I have now attained to, thanks to heaven,
All for my countreys good too: and many a vision,
Many a mistick vision have I seen Son.
And many a sight from heaven which has been terrible,
Wherein the Goods and Evils of these Islands
Were lively shadowed; many a charge I have had too,
Still as the time grew ripe to reveal these,
To travel and discover, now I am come Son,
The hour is now appointed,
My tongue is touch'd, and now I speak.

King. Do Holy man, I'll hear ye.

Gov. Beware these Portugals; I say beware 'em,
These smooth-fac'd strangers; have an eye upon 'em.
The cause is now the God's, hear, and believe King.

King. I do hear, but before I give rash credit,
Or hang too light on belief, which is a sin, father;
Know I have found 'em gentle, faithful, valiant,
And am in my particular, bound to 'em,
I mean to some for my most strange deliverance.

Gov. Oh Son, the future aims of men, observe me;
Above their present actions, and their glory,

Are to be look'd at, the Stars shew many turnings,
If you could see, mark but with my eyes, pupil;
These men came hither, as my vision tells me,
Poor weather-beaten, almost lost, starv'd, feebled,
Their vessels like themselves, most miserable;
Made a long suite for traffique, and for comfort,
To vent their childrens toys, cure their diseases:
They had their sure, they landed, and to th' rate
Grew rich and powerful, suckt the fat, and freedom
Of this most blessed Isle, taught her to tremble,
Witness the Castle here, the Citadel,
They have clapt upon the neck of your Tidore,
This happy Town, till that she knew these strangers,
To check her when she's jolly.

King. They have so indeed Father.

Gov. Take heed, take heed, I find your fair delivery,
Though you be pleas'd to glorifie that fortune,
And think these strangers gods, take heed I say,
I find it but a handsome preparation,

A fair-fac'd Prologue to a further mischief:
Mark but the end good King, the pin he shcots at
That was the man deliver'd ye; the mirror,
Your Sister is his due; what's she, your heir, Sir?
And what's he a kin then to the kingdom?
But heirs are not ambitious, who then suffers?
What reverence shall the gods have? and what justice
The miserable people? what shall they do?

King. He points at truth directly.

Gov. Think of these Son:

The person, nor the manner I mislike not
Of your preserver, nor the whole man together,
Were he but season'd in the Faith we are,
In our Devotions learn'd.

King. You say right Father.

Gov. To change our Worships now, and our Religion?
To be traytor to our God?

King. You have well advis'd me,
And I will seriously consider Father,
In the mean time you shall have your fair access
Unto my Sister, advise her to your purpose,
And let me still know how the gods determine.

Gov. I will, but my main end is to advise
The destruction of you all, a general ruine,
And when I am reveng'd, let the gods whistle. Exeunt.

Enter Ruy Dias, and Pyniero.

Ruy. Indeed, I am right glad ye were not greedy,
And sudden in performing what I will'd you,
Upon the person of Armusia,
I was afraid, for I well knew your valour,
And love to me.

Py. 'Twas not a fair thing, Uncle,
It shew'd not handsome, carried no man in it.

Ruy. I must confess 'twas ill; and I abhor it,
Only this good has risen from this evil;
I have tried your honesty, and find proof,
A constancy that will not be corrupted,
And I much honor it.

Py. This Eell sounds better.

Ruy. My anger now, and that disgrace I have suffer'd,
Shall be more manly vented, and wip'd off,
And my sick honor cur'd the right and straight way;
My Sword's in my hand now Nephew, my cause upon it,
And man to man, one valour to another,
My hope to his.

Py. Why? this is like Ruy Dias?
This carries something of some substance in it;
Some mettle and some man, this sounds a Gentleman;
And now methinks ye utter what becomes ye;
To kill men scurvily, 'tis such a dog-trick,
Such a Rat-catchers occupation——

Ru. It is no better,
But Pyniero, now——

Py. Now you do bravely.

Ru. The difference of our States flung by, forgotten,
The full opinion I have won in service,
And such respects that may not shew us equal,
Laid handsomly aside, only our fortunes,
And single manhoods——

Py. In a service, Sir,
Of this most noble nature, all I am,
If I had ten lives more, those and my fortunes
Are ready for ye, I had thought ye had forsworn fighting,
Or banish'd those brave thoughts were wont to wait upon
I am glad to see 'em call'd home agen. you;

Ruy. They are Nephew,
And thou shalt see what fire they carry in them,
Here, you guess what this means. Shews a challenge.

Py. Yes very well, Sir,
A portion of Scripture that puzzles many an interpreter.

Ruy. As soon as you can find him——

Py. That will not be long Uncle,
And o' my conscience he'll be ready as quickly.

Ruy. I make no doubt good Nephew, carry it so
If you can possible, that we may fight.

Py. Nay you shall fight, assure your self.

Ru. Pray ye hear me
In some such place where it may be possible
The Princess may behold us.

Py. I conceive ye,
Upon the sand behind the Castle, Sir,
A place remote enough, and there be windows
Out of her Lodgings too, or I am mistaken.

Ruy. Y'are i' th' right, if ye can work that handsomly——

Py. Let me alone, and praybe you prepar'd
Some three hours hence.

Ruy. I will not fail.

Py. Get you home,
And if you have any things to dispose of,
Or a few light prayers
That may befriend you, run 'em over quickly,
I warrant, I'll bring him on.

Ruy. Farewel Nephew,
And when we meet again——

Py. I, I, fight handsomly;
Take a good draught or two of Wine to settle ye,
'Tis an excellent armour for an ill conscience, Uncle;
I am glad to see this mans conversion,
I was afraid fair honor had been bed-rid,
Or beaten out o' th' Island, soldiers, and good ones,
Intended such base courses? he will fight now;
And I believe too bravely; I have seen him
Curry a fellows carkaffe handsomely:
And in the head of a troop, stand as if he had been rooted Dealing large doles of death; what a rascal was I (there,
I did not see his Will drawn?
What does she here?

Enter Quisara.

If there be any mischief towards, a woman makes one still;
Now what new business is for me?

Quisar. I was sending for ye,
But since we have met so fair,
You have sav'd that labour; I must intreat you, Sir——

Py. Any thing Madam,
Your Wils are my Commands.

Quisar. Y'are nobly courteous;
Upon my better thoughts Signior Pyniero,
And my more peaceable considerations,
Which now I find the richer ornaments;
I wou'd desire you to attempt no farther
Against the person of the noble stranger,
In truth I am asham'd of my share in't;
Nor be incited farther by your Uncle,
I see it will fit ill upon your person;
I have considered, and it will shew ugly,
Carried at best, a most unheard of cruelty;

Good Sir desist—

Py. You speak now like a woman,
And wondrous well this tenderneſs becomes ye;
But this you muſt remember—your command
Was laid on with a kiſs, and ſeriouſly
It muſt be taken off the ſame way, Madam,
Or I ſtand bound ſtill.

Quiſar. That ſhall not endanger ye,
Look ye fair Sir, thus I take off that duty.

Py. By th' maſs 'twas ſoft and ſweet,
Some bloods would bound now,
And run a tilt; do not you think bright beauty;
You have done me in this kiſs, a mighty favour,
And that Iſland bound by virtue of this honor,
To do what ever you command me?

Quiſar. I think Sir,
From me theſe are unuſual courteſies,
And ought to be reſpected ſo; there are ſome,
And men of no mean rank, would hold themſelves
Not poorly bleſt to taſte of ſuch a bounty.

Py. I know there are, that wou'd do many unjuſt things
For ſuch a kiſs, and yet I hold this modeſt;
All villanies, body and ſoul diſpenſe with,
For ſuch a provocation, kill their kindred,
Demoliſh the fair credits of their Parents;
Thoſe kiſſes I am not acquainted with, moſt certain Madam,
The appurtenance of this kiſs wou'd not provoke me
To do a miſchief, 'tis the devils own dance.
To be kiſs'd into cruelty.

Quiſar. I am glad you make that uſe Sir.

Py. I am gladder
That you made me believe you were cruel,
For by thiſhand, I know I am ſo honeſt,
However I deceiv'd ye, 'twas high time too,
Some common ſlavemight have been ſet upon it elſe;
That willingly I wou'd not kill a dog
That could but fetch and carry for a woman,
She muſt be a good woman made me kick him,
And that will be hard to find, to kill a man,
If you will give me leave to get another,
Or any ſhe that plaid the beſt game at it,
And 'fore a womans anger, prefer her fancy.

Quiſar. I take it in you well.

Py. I thank ye Lady,
And I ſhall ſtudy to confirm it.

Quiſar. Do Sir,
For this time, and this preſent cauſe, I allow it,
Moſt holy Sir.

Enter Governor, Quiſana, and Panura.

Gov. Bleſs ye my Royal Daughter,
And in you, bleſs this Iſland Heaven.

Quiſar. Good Aunt,
What think ye of this man?

Quiſan. Sure h' is a wiſe man,
And a Religious, he tells us things have hapened
So many years ago, almoſt forgotten,
As readily as if they were done this hour.

Quiſar. Does he not meet with your ſharp tongue?

Pan. He tells me Madam,
Marriage, and mouldy Cheeſe will make me tamer.
Gov. A ſtubborn keeper, and worſe fare,
An open ſtable, and cold care,
Will tame a Jade, may be your ſnare.

Pan. Bir Lady, a ſharp prophet, when this proves good,
I'll bequeath you a ſkin to make ye a Hood.

Gov. Lady, I would talk with you.

Quiſar. Do reverend Sir.

Gov. And for your good, for that that muſt concern ye,
And give ear wiſely to me.

Quiſar. I ſhall father.

Gov. You are a Princeſs of that excellence,
Sweetneſs, and grace, that Angel-like fair feature,

Nay, do not bluſh, I do not flatter you,
Nor do I dote in telling this, I am amazed Lady,
And as I think the gods beſtow'd theſe on ye,
The gods that love ye.

Quiſar. I confeſs their bounty.

Gov. Apply it then to their uſe, to their honor,
To them, and to their ſervice give this ſweetneſs;
They have an inſtant great uſe of your goodneſs;
You are a Saint eſteem'd here for your beauty,
And many a longing heart—

Quiſar. I ſeek no fealty,
Nor will I blemiſh that, heaven has ſeal'd on me,
I know my worth, indeed the Portugals
I have at thoſe commands, and their laſt ſervices,
Nay, even their lives, ſo much I think my handſomeſs,
That what I ſhall enjoyn—

Gov. Uſe it diſcreetly.

For I perceive ye underſtand me rightly,
For here the gods regard your help, and ſuddainly;
The Portugals, like ſharp thorns (mark me Lady)
Stick in our ſides, like Razors, wound Religion,
Draw deep, they wound, till the Life-bloud follows,
Our gods they ſpurn at, and their worſhips ſcorn,
A mighty hand they bear upon our government,
Theſe are the men your miracle muſt work on,
Your heavenly form, either to root them out,
Which as you may endeavour; will be eaſe,
Remember whoſe great cauſe you have to execute,
To nip their memory, that may not ſpring more,
Or fairly bring 'em home to our devotions,
Which will be bleſſed, and for which you fainted,
But cannot be, and they go; let me buzle.

Quiſar. Go up with me,
Where we'll converſe more privately;
I'll ſhew ye ſhortly how I hold their temper;
And in what chain thir ſouls.

Gov. Keep faſt that hold ſtill,
And either bring that chain, and thoſe bound in it,
And link it to our gods, and their fair worſhips.
Or Daughter, pinch their hearts a pieces with it,
I'll wait upon your grace.

Quiſar. Come reverend father.

Wait you below.

Ex. Quiſar. and Gov.

Pan. If this Prophet were a young thing,
I ſhould ſuſpect him now, he cleaves ſo cloſe to her;
Theſe holy Coats are long, and hide iniquities.

Quiſan. Away, away fool, a poor wretch.

Pan. Theſe poor ones
Warm but their ſtomachs once—

Quiſan. Come in, thou art fooliſh.

Ex. Quiſania and Panura.

Enter Armuſia, Emanuel, and Pynicro.

Arm. I am ſorry, Sir, my fortune is ſo ſtubborn,
To court my ſword againſt my Countreyman,
I love my Nation well, and where I find
A Portugal of noble Name and Virtue,
I am his humble ſervant, Signior Pynicro,
Your perſon, nor your Uncles am I angry with,
You are both fair Gentlemen in my opinion,
And I proteſt, I had rather uſe my ſword
In your defences, than againſt your ſafeties;
'Tis methinks a ſtrange dearth of enemies,
When we ſeek foes among our ſelves.

Em. You are injured,
And you muſt make the beſt on't now, and readieſt—

Arm. You ſee I am ready in the place, and arm'd
To his deſire that call'd me.

Py. Ye ſpeak honeſtly,
And I could wiſh ye had met on terms more friendly,
But it cannot now be ſo.

Enter

Enter Ruy Dias.

Em. Turn Sir, and see.
Py. I have kept my word with ye Uncle,
The Gentleman is ready.

Enter Governor, and Quisara above.

Arm. Ye are welcome.

Ru. Bid those fools welcome, that affect your courtesie,
I come not to use compliment, ye have wrong'd me,
And ye shall feel, proud man, e'r I part from ye,
The effects of that, if fortune do not fool me;
Thy life is mine, and no hope shall redeem thee.

Arm. That's a proud word,
More than your faith can justifie.

Quisara. Sure they will fight.

Ruy. She's there, I am happy.

Gov. Let 'em alone, let 'em kill one another,
These are the main posts, if they fall, the buildings
Will tumble quickly.

Quisara. How temperate Armusia?
No more, be quiet yet.

Arm. I am not bloody,
Nor do not feel such mortal malice in me,
But since we cannot both enjoy the Princess,
I am resolv'd to fight.

Ruy. Fight home Armusia,
For if thou faint'st, or fall'st —

Arm. Do ye make all vantages?

Ruy; Always; unto thy life I will not spare thee,
Nor look not for thy mercy.

Arm. I am arm'd then.

Ruy. Stand still I charge ye Nephew, as ye honor me.

Arm. And good Emanuel stir not —

Py. Ye speak fitly,
For we had not stood idle else.

Gov. I am sorry for't.

Em. But since you will have it so —

Ruy. Come Sir.

Arm. I wait ye.

Py. I marry, this looks handsomely,
This is warm work.

Gov. Both fall and't be thy Will.

Py. My Uncle dead?

Em. Stand still, or my swords in —

Arm. Now brave Ruy Dias,

Now where's your confidence, your prayers? quickly
Your own spite has condemn'd ye.

Quisara. Hold Armusia.

Ar. Most happy Lady.

Quisara. Hold, and let him rise,
Spare him for me.

Ar. A long life may he enjoy, Lady.

Gov. What ha you done? 'tis better they had all perisht.

Quisara. Peace father, I work for the best; Armusia.
Be in the Garden an hour hence. Ex. Qu. and Gov.

Ar. I shall Madam.

Py. Now as I live, a Gentleman at all inches,
So brave a mingled temper saw I never.

Ar. Why are ye sad Sir? how would this have griev'd you,
If ye had fall'n under a profest enemy?
Under one had taken vantage of your shame too?
Pray ye be at peace, I am so far from wronging ye,
Or glorying in the pride of such a victory,
That I desire to serve ye, pray look chearfully. (Gentleman)

Py. Do you hear this Sir? this love Sir? do you see this How he courts ye? why do you hold your head down?
'Tis no high Treason, I take it, to be equall'd;
To have a slip i' th field, no sin, that's mortal;
Come, come, thank fortune and your friend.

Ar. It may be
You think my tongue may prove your enemy;

And though restrain'd sometimes, out of a bravery,
May take a License to disable ye:

Believe me Sir, so much I hate that liberty,
That in a strangers tongue, 'twill prove an injury,
And I shall right you in't.

Py. Can you have more, Uncle?

Ru. Sir, you have beat me both ways, yet so nobly,
That I shall ever love the hand that did it:
Fortune may make me worthy of some title
That may be near your friend.

Ar. Sir, I must leave ye,
But with so hearty love; and pray be confident,
I carry nothing from this place shall wrong ye.

Exit Arm. and Em.

Py. Come, come, you are right agen, Sir, love your honor,
And love your friend, take heed of bloody purposes,
And unjust ends, good heaven is angry with ye;
Make your fair virtues, and your fame your Mistrifs,
And let these trinkets go.

Ru. You teach well Nephew,
Now to be honourably even with this Gentleman,
Shall be my business, and my ends his.

Enter Governor and King.

Gov. Sir, Sir, you must do something suddainly,
To stop his pride so great and high, he is shot up,
Upon his person too, your state is sunk else:
You must not stand now upon terms of gratitude,
And let a simple tenderness besot ye:
I'll bring ye suddenly where you shall see him,
Attempting your brave Sister, privately,
Mark but his high behaviour then.

King. I will Father.

Gov. And with scorn, I fear contempt too.

King. I hope not.

Gov. I will not name a lust;
It may be that also;

A little force must be applyed upon him,
Now, now applyed, a little force to humble him.
These sweet intreaties do but make him wanton.

King. Take heed ye wrong him not.

Gov. Take heed to your safety,
I but forewarn ye King; if you mistrust me,
Or think I come un-sent —

King. No, I'll go with you.

Exeunt,

Enter Armusia, Quisara.

Arm. Madam, you see there's nothing I can reach at,
Either in my obedience, or my service,
That may deserve your love, or win a liking,
But a poor thought, but I pursue it seriously,
Take pleasure in your Will, even in your anger,
Which other men would grudge at, and grow stormy;
I study new humility to please ye,
And take a kind of joy in my afflictions,
Because they come from ye, I love my sorrows:
Pray Madam but consider —

Quisara. Yes, I do Sir,
And to that honest end I drew ye hither;
I know ye have deserv'd as much as man can,
And know it is a justice to requite you:
I know ye love.

Arm. If ever love was mortal,
And dwelt in man, and for that love command me,
So strong I find it, and so true, here Lady,
Something of such a greatness to allow me,
Those things I have done already, may seem foyle too:
'Tis equity that man aspires to heaven,
Should win it by his worth, and not sleep to it.

Enter

Enter Governor, and King.

Gov. Now stand close King and hear, and as you find him,
Believe me right, or let Religion suffer.

Quisar. I dare believe your worth without additions;
But since you are so liberal of your love Sir,
And wou'd be farther tried, I do intend it,
Because you shall not, or you wou'd not win me
At such an ealie rate.

Arm. I am prepared still,
And if I shrink—

Quisar. I know ye are no coward,
This is the utmost trial of your constancy,
And if you stand fast now, I am yours, your wife Sir;
You hold there's nothing dear that may achieve me,
Doubted or dangerous.

Arm. There's nothing, nothing:
Let me but know, that I may straight lie to it.

Quisar. I'll tell you then, change your Religion.
And be of one belief with me.

Arm. How?

Quisar. Mark,
Worship our Gods, renounce that faith ye are bred in;
'Tis easily done, I'll teach ye suddenly;
And humbly on your knees—

Arm. Ha? I'll be hang'd first.

Quisar. Offer as we do.

Arm. To the devil Lady?

Offer to him I hate? I know the devil.
To dogs and cats? you make offer to them;
To every bird that flies, and every worm.
How terribly I shake? Is this the venture?
The trial that you talk'd of? where have I been?
And how forgot my self? how lost my memory?
When did I pray, or look up stedfastly?
Had any goodness in my heart to guide me?
That I should give this vantage to mine enemy;
The enemy to my peace, forsake my faith?

Quisar. Come, come, I know ye love me.

Arm. Love ye this way?

This most destroying way? sure you but jest, Lady.

Quisar. My Love and Life are one way.

Arm. Love alone then, and mine another way,
I'll love diseases first,
Doat on a villain that would cut my throat,
Woove all afflictions of all sorts, kiss cruelty.
Have mercy heaven, how have I been wand'ring?
Wand'ring the way of Lust, and left my Maker?
How have I slept like Cork upon a water,
And had no feeling of the storm that tost me?
Trode the blind paths of death? forsook assurance,
Eternity of blessedness for a woman?

Quisar. Are not our powers eternal, so their comforts?
As great and full of hopes as yours?

Arm. They are puppets.

Gov. Now mark him Sir, and but observe him nearly,

Ar. Their comforts like themselves, cold, senseless outides;
You make 'em sick, as we are, peevish, mad,
Subject to age; and how can they cure us,
That are not able to refine themselves?

Quis. The Sun and Moon we worship, those are heavenly,
And their bright influences we believe.

Arm. Away fool,

I adore the Maker of that Sun and Moon,
That gives those bodies light and influence;
That pointed out their paths; and taught their motions;
They are not so great as we, they are our servants,
Plac'd there to teach us time, to give us knowledge;
Of when and how the swellings, of the main are,
And their returns agen; they are but our Stewards
To make the earth fat, with their influence,
That she may bring forth her increase, and feed us.
Shall I fall from this faith to please a woman?

For her embraces bring my soul to ruin?

I look'd you should have laid, make me a Christian
Work that great cure, for 'tis a great one woman;
That labor truly to perform, that venture,
The crown of all great trial, and the fairest:
I look'd ye should have wept and kneel'd to beg it,
Washt off your mist of ignorance, with waters
Pure and repentant, from those eyes; I look'd
You should have brought me your chief god ye worship,
He that you offer humane blood and life to,
And make a sacrifice of him to memory,
Beat down his Altars, ruin'd his false Temples.

Gov. Now you may see.

Quisar. Take heed, you goe too far, Sir,
And yet I love to hear him, I must have ye;
And to that end I let you storm a little;
I know there must be some strife in your bosom
To cool and quiet ye, e'r you can come back:
I know old friends cannot part suddainly,
There will be some lett still, yet I must have ye,
Have ye of my faith too, and so enjoy ye.

Arm. Now I contemn ye, and I hate my self
For looking on that face lasciviously,
And it looks ugly now me thinks.

Quisar. How Portugall?

Arm. It looks like death it self, to which 'twou'd lead me;
Your eyes resemble pale despair, they fright me,
And in their rounds, a thousand horrid ruins,
Methinks I see; and in your tongue hear fearfully
The hideous murmurs of weak souls have suffer'd;
Get from me, I despise ye, and know woman,
That for all this trap you have laid to catch my life in,
To catch my immortal life, I hate and curse ye,
Contemn your Deities, spurn at their powers,
And where I meet your Mabomet gods, I'll swing 'em
Thus o'r my head, and kick 'em into puddles,
Nay, I will out of vengeance search your Temples.
And with those hearts that serve my God, demolish
Your shambles of wild worships.

Gov. Now, now you hear Sir.

Arm. I will have my faith, since you are so crafty,
The glorious cross, although I love your brother;
Let him frown too, I will have my devotion,
And let your whole State storm.

King. Enter and take him;

I am sorry friend that I am forc'd to do this.

Gov. Be sure you bind him fast.

Quisar. But use him nobly.

King. Had it to me been done, I had forgiven it,
And still preserv'd you fair, but to our gods Sir—

Quisar. Methinks I hate 'em now.

King. To our Religion,
To these to be thus stubborn, thus rebellious
To threaten them.

Arm. Use all your violence,
I ask no mercy, nor repent my words:
I spit at your best powers; I serve one,
Will give me strength to scourge your gods.

Gov. Away with him.

Arm. To grind 'em into base dust, and disperse 'em,
That never more their bloody memories—

Gov. Clap him close up.

King. Good friend be cooler.

Arm. Never;

Your painted Sister I despise too.

King. Softly.

Arm. And all her devilish Arts laugh and scorn at,
Mock her blind purposes.

King. You must be temperate;
Offer him no violence, I command you strictly.

Gov. Now thou art up, I shall have time to speak too.

Quisar. Oh how I love this man, how truly honor him.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Christophero, and Pedro (at one door) Emanuel, and Soza, (at another)

Chr. Do you know the news Gentlemen?

Em. Wou'd we knew as well, Sir,
How to prevent it.

Soz. Is this the love they bear us,
For our late benefit? taken so maliciously,
And clapt up close? is that the thanks they render?

Ch. It must not be put up thus, smother'd slightly,
'Tis such a base unnatural wrong.

Ped. I know,
They may think to doe wonders, aim at all,
And to blow us with a vengeance, out o' th' Islands:
But if we be our selves, honest and resolute,
And continue but Masters of our antient courages,
Stick close, and give no vantage to their villanies —

Soz. Nay, if we faint or fall apieces now,
We are fools, and worthy to be markt for misery;
Begin to strike at him, they are all bound too?
To cancel his deserts? what must we look for
If they can carry this?

Em. I'll carry coal then;
I have but one life, and one fortune, Gentlemen,
But I'll so husband it to vex these rascals,
These barbarous slaves.

Ch. Shall we go charge 'em presently?

Soz. No, that will be too weak, and too fool-hardy,
We must have grounds, that promise safety, friends,
And sure offence, we lose our angers else,
And worse than that, venture our lives too lightly.

Enter Pyniero.

Py. Did you see mine Uncle? plague o' these Barbarians,
How the rogues stick in my teeth, I know ye are angry,
So I am too, monstrous angry, Gentlemen,
I am angry, that I choak agen.
You hear Armusia's up, honest Arm:
Clapt up in prison, friends, the brave Arm:
Here are fine boys.

Em. We hope he shall not stay there.

Py. Stay, no, he must not stay, no talk of staying,
These are no times to stay; are not these rascals?
Speak, I beseech ye speak, are they not Rogues?
Think some abominable names are they not devils?
But the devil's a great deal too good for 'em — fusty villains.

Ch. They are a kind of hounds.

Py. Hounds were their fathers;
Old bear-ey'd bob-tail'd hounds — Lord, where's my Uncle?

Soz. But what shall be done, Sir?

Py. Done?

Soz. Yes, to relieve him;
If it be not sudden they may take his life too.

Py. They dare as soon take fire and swallow it,
Take stakes and thrust into their tails for glisters:
His life, why 'tis a thing worth all the Islands,
And they know will be rated at that value;
His very imprisonment will make the Town stink,
And shake and stink, I have physick in my hand for 'em
Shall give the goblins such a purge —

Enter Ruy Dias.

Ped. Your Uncle,

Ru. I hear strange news, and have been seeking ye;
They say Armusia's prisoner.

Py. 'Tis most certain.

Ru. Upon what cause?

Py. He has deserv'd too much, Sir;
The old heathen policie has light upon him.
And paid him home.

Ru. A most unnoble dealing.

Py. You are the next, if you can carry it tamely,
He has deserved of all.

Ru. I must confesse it,
Of me so nobly too.

Py. I am glad to hear it,
You have a time now to make good your confession,
Your faith will shew but cold else, and for fashion,
Now to redeem all, now to thank his courtesie,
Now to make those believe that held you backward,
And an ill instrument, you are a Gentleman,
An honest man, and you dare love your Nations,
Dare stick to virtue, though she be oppress'd,
And for her own fair sake, step to her rescue:
If you live ages, Sir, and lose this hour,
Not now redeem, and vindicate your honor
Your life will be a murmure, and no man in't.

Ru. I thank ye nephew, come along with me Gentlemen,
We'll make 'em dancing sport immediately:
We are Masters of the Fort yet, we shall see
What that can do.

Py. Let it but spit fire finely,
And play their turrets, and their painted Palaces,
A frisking round or two, that they may trip it,
And caper in the air.

Ru. Come, we'll do something
Shall make 'em look about, we'll send 'em plums,
If they be not too hard for their teeth.

Py. And fine Potatoes
Roasted in Gunpowder, such a Banquet, Sir
Will prepare their unmannerly stomachs.

Ru. They shall see
There is no safe retreat in villany;
Come, be high-hearted all.

Omnes. We are all on fire, Sir.

Exeunt.

Enter King and Governor.

King. I am ungrateful, and a wretch, perswade me not,
Forgetful of the mercy he shew'd me,
The timely noble pity — why should I
See him fast bound and fetter'd, whose true courtesie,
Whose manhood, and whose mighty hand set me free?
Why should it come from me? why I command this?
Shall not all tongues and truths call me unthankful?

Gov. Had the offence been thrown on you, 'tis certain
It had been in your power, and your discretion
To have turn'd it into mercy, and forgiven it,
And then it had shew'd a virtuous point of gratitude,
Timely, and nobly taken; but since the cause
Concerns the honor of our gods, and their Title,
And so transcends your power, and your compassion,
A little your own safety, if you saw it too,
If your too fond indulgence did not dazle you,
It cannot now admit a private pitty;
'Tis in their Wills, their Mercies, or Revenges,
And these revolts in you, shew mere rebellions.

King. They are mild and pittiful.

Gov. To those repent.

King. Their nature's soft and tender.

Gov. To true hearts.

That feel compunction for their trespasses:
This man defies 'em still, threatens destruction
And demolition of their Arms and Worship,
Spits at their powers; take heed ye be not found, Sir,
And mark'd a favourer of their dishonor;
They use no common justice.

King. What shall I do
To deserve of this man —

Gov. If ye more bemoan him,

Or mitigate your power to preserve him,
I'll curse ye from the gods, call up their vengeance.

Enter Quisara with her hands bound, Quisana, Panura.

And sling it on your Land and you, I have charge
I hope to wrack you all.

King. What ails my Sister?

Why, is she bound? why looks she so distractedly?
Who does do this?

Quisana. We did it, pardon Sir,
And for her preservation— She is grown wild,
And raving on the strangers love and honor,
Sometimes crying out help, help, they will torture him,
They will take his life, they will murder him presently,
If we had not prevented violently
Have laid hands on her own life.

Gov. These are tokens,
The gods displeasure is gone out, be quick,
And e'er it fall, doe something to appease 'em.
You know the sacrifice—I am glad it works thus.

Quisana. How low and base thou look'st now, that wert noble?
No figure of a King, methinks shews on you.
No face of Majesty, foul, swarth ingratitude
Has taken off thy sweetness, base forgetfulness
Of mighty benefits, has turned thee Devil:
Thou hast persecuted goodness, innocence,
And laid a hard and violent hand on virtue,
On that fair virtue that should teach and guide us;
Thou hast wrong'd thine own preserver, whose least merit,
Pois'd with thy main Estate, thou canst not satisfy,
Nay, put thy life in too, 'twill be too light still:
What hast thou done?

Gov. Goe for him presently,
And once more we'll try if we can win him fairly:
If not, let nothing she says hinder ye, or stir ye;
She speaks distractedly— Do that the gods command ye,
Do you know what ye say Lady?

Quisara. I could curse thee too,
Religion and severity has steel'd thee,
Has turn'd thy heart to stone; thou hast made the gods hard
Against their sweet and patient natures, cruel: (too,
None of ye feel what bravery ye tread on?
What innocence? what beauty?

King. Pray be patient.

Quisara. What honourable things ye cast behind?
What monuments of man?

Enter Armusia and Guard,

King. Once more Armusia,
Because I love ye tenderly and dearly,
And would be glad to win ye mine, I wish ye,
Even from my heart I wish and wooe ye—

Ar. What Sir,
Take heed how ye perswade me falsely, then ye hate me:
Take heed how ye intrap me.

King. I advise ye,
And tenderly and truly I advise ye,
Both for your souls health, and your safety.

Ar. Stay,
And name my soul no more, she is too precious,
Too glorious for you flatteries, too secure too.

Gov. Consider the reward, Sir, and the honor
That is prepared, the glory you shall grow to.

Arm. They are not to be consider'd in these cases,
Not to be nam'd when souls are question'd;
They are vain and flying vapors— touch my life,
'Tis ready for ye, put it to what test
It shall please ye, I am patient; but for the rest
You may remove Rocks with your little fingers,
Or blow a Mountain out o' th' way, with bellows,
As soon as stir my faith; use no more arguments.

Gov. We must use tortures then.

Arm. Your worst and painfull't
I am joyful to accept.

Gov. You must the sharpest,
For such has been your hate against our Deities
Delivered openly, your threats and scornings,
And either your repentance must be mighty,
Which is your free conversion to our customs,
Or equal punishment which is your life, Sir.

Arm. I am glad I have it for ye, take it Priest,
And all the miseries that shall attend it:
Let the gods glut themselves with Christian blood,
It will be ask'd again, and so far followed,
So far reveng'd, and with such holy justice,
Your gods of gold shall melt and sink before it;
Your Altars and your Temples shake to nothing;
And you false worshipers, blind fools of ceremony,
Shall seek for holes to hide your heads, and fears in,
For seas to swallow you from this destruction,
Darkness to dwell about ye, and conceal ye;
Your mothers womb agen—

Gov. Make the fires ready,
And bring the several tortures out.

Quisara. Stand fast, Sir,
And fear 'em not, you that have stept so nobly
Into this pious Trial, start not now,
Keep on your way, a Virgin will assist ye,
A Virgin won by your fair constancy,
And glorying that she is won so, will dye by ye:
I have touch'd ye every way, tried ye most honest,
Perfect, and good, chaste, blushing chaste, and temperate,
Valiant, without vain-glory, modest, stayed,
No rage, or light affection ruling in you:
Indeed, the perfect school of worth I find ye,
The temple of true honor.

Arm. Whether will she?
What do you infer by this fair argument, Lady?

Quisara. Your Faith, and your Religion must be like ye,
They that can shew you these, must be pure mirrors,
When the streams flow clear and fair, what are the foun-
I do embrace your faith, Sir, and your fortune; tains?
Go on, I will assist ye, I feel a sparkle here,
A lively spark that kindles my affection,
And tells me it will rise to flames of glory:
Let 'em put on their angers, suffer nobly,
Shew me the way, and when I faint, instruct me;
And if I follow not—

Arm. Oh blessed Lady,
Since thou art won, let me begin my triumph,
Come clap your terrors on.

Quisara. All your fell tortures.
For there is nothing he shall suffer, brother,
I swear by a new faith, which is most sacred,
And I will keep it so, but I will follow in,
And follow to a scruple of affliction,
In spite of all your gods without prevention.

Gov. Death! she amazes me.

King. What shall be done now?

Gov. They must dye both,
And suddenly, they will corrupt all else;
This woman makes me weary of my mischief,
She snakes me, and she staggers me, go in Sir,
I'll see the execution.

King. Not so suddain:
If they go, all my Friends and Sisters perish.

Gov. Wou'd I were safe at home agen.

Enter Messenger.

Mes. Arm, arm, Sir,
Seek for defence, the Castle plays and thunders,
The Town Rocks, and the houses fly i' th' air,
The people dye for fear— Captain Ruy Dias,
Has made an oath he will not leave a stone here;
No, not the memory, here has stood a City,

Unless Armusia be deliver'd fairly.

King. I have my fears: what can our gods do now for us?

Gov. Be patient, but keep him still: he is a cure, Sir,
Against both Rage and Cannon: goe and fortifie,
Call in the Princess, make the Palace sure,
And let 'em know you are a King: look nobly;
And take you courage to ye; keep close the prisoner,
And under command, we are betraid else.

Ar. How joyfully I goe?

Quisar. Take my heart with thee.

Gov. I hold a Wolf by the ear now:
Fortune free me.

Exeunt.

Enter four Towns-men.

1. Heaven blefs us,
What a thund'ring's here? what fire-spitting?
We cannot drink, but our Cans are mauld amongst us.

2. I wou'd they would maul our scores too:
Shame o' their Guns, I thought they had been bird-pots,
Or great Candle-cases, how devilishly they bounce,
And how the Bullets borrow a piece of a house here,
There another, and mend those up agen
With another Parish; here flies a poudring-tub,
The meat ready roasted, and there a barrel pissing vinegar,
And they two over-taking the top of a high Steeple,
Newly slic'd off for a Sallet.

3. A vengeance fire 'em.

2. Nay, they fire fast enough;
You need not help 'em.

4. Are these the Portugal Bulls——
How loud they bellow

2. Their horns are plaguy strong, they push down Palaces
They tof our little habitations like whelps,
Like grundle-tails, with their heels upward;
All the windows i'th Town dance a new Trenchmore,
'Tis like to prove a blessed age for Glasiers,
I met a hand, and a Letter in't, in great haste,
And by and by, a single leg running after it,
As if the arm had forgot part of his errand,
Heads flie like Foot-balls every where.

1. What shall we do?

2. I care not, my shop's cancell'd,
And all the Pots, and earthen Pans in't vanish:
There was a single Bullet, and they together by the ears;
You would have thought Tom Tumbler had been there,
And all his troop of devils.

3. Let's to the King,
And get this Gentleman deliver'd handsomly:
By this hand, there's no walking above ground else.

2. By this leg — let me swear nimble by it,
For I know not how long I shall owe it,
If I were out o'th' Town once, if I came in agen to Fetch my breakfast, I will give 'em leave to cramm me
With a Portugal Pudding: Come, let's doe any thing
To appease this thunder.

Exeunt.

Enter Pynicro and Panura.

Py. Art sure it was that blind Priest?

Pan. Yes most certain,
He has provok'd all this; the King is merciful,
And wond'rous loving; but he fires him on still,
And when he cools, enrages him, I know it:
Threatens new vengeance, and the gods fierce justice
When he but looks with fair eyes on Armusia,
Will lend him no time to relent; my royal Mistrifs,
She has entertain'd a Christian hope,

Py. Speak truly.

Pan. Nay, 'tis most true, but Lord! how he lies at her,
And threatens her, and flatters her, and damns her,
And I fear, if not speedily prevented,
If she continue stont, both shall be executed,

Py. I'll kiss thee for this news, nay more Panura,

If thou wilt give me leave I'll get thee with Christian,
The best way to convert thee.

Pan. Make me believe so?

Py. I will y'faith. But which way cam'st thou hither?
The Pallace is close guarded, and barricado'd.

Pan. I came through a private vault, which few there
It rises in a Temple not far hence, (know of,
Close by the Castle here.

Py. How — To what end?

Pan. A good one:

To give ye knowledge of my new-born Mistrifs;
And in what doubt Armusia stands,
Think any present means, or hope to stop 'em
From their fell ends: the Princes are come in too,
And they are harden'd also.

Py. The damn'd Priest——

Pan. Sure he's a cruel man, methinks Religion
Should teach more temperate Lessons.

Py. He the fire-brand?

He dare to touch at such fair lives as theirs are?
Well Prophet, I shall prophesie, I shall catch ye,
When all your Prophecies will not redeem ye?
Wilt thou do one thing bravely?

Pa. Any good I am able.

(virtuous,

Py. And by thine own white hand, I'll swear thou art
And a brave wench, durst thou but guide me presently,
Through the same vault thou cam'st, into the Pallace
And those I shall appoint, such as I think fit.

Pa. Yes I will do it, and suddainly, and truly.

Py. I wou'd fain behold this Prophet,

Pa. Now I have ye:

And shall bring ye where ye shall behold him,
Alone too, and unfurnish'd of defences:

That shall be my care; but you must not betray me.

Py. Dost thou think we are so base, such slaves, rogues?

Pa. I do not:

And you shall see how fairly I'll work for ye.

Py. I must needs steal that Priest,

Steal him, and hang him.

Pa. Do any thing to remove his mischief, strangle him——

Py. Come prethee love.

Pa. You'll offer me no foul play?

The Vault is dark.

Py. 'Twas well remember'd.

Pa. And ye may——

But I hold ye honest,

Py. Honest enough I warrant thee.

(place,

Pa. I am but a poor weak wench; and what with the
And your persuasions Sir——but I hope you will not;
You know we are often cozen'd.

Py. If thou dost fear me,
Why dost thou put me in mind?

Pa. To let you know Sir,
Though it be in your power, and things fitting to it,
Yet a true Gent——

Py. I know what he'll do:

Come and remember me, and I'll answer thee,
I'll answer thee to the full; we'll call at th' Castle,
And then my good guide, do thy Will; sha't find me
A very tractable man.

Pa. I hope I shall Sir.

Exeunt.

Enter Bakam, Syana, and Soldiers.

Bak. Let my men guard the Gates.

Syan. And mine the Temple,
For fear the honor of our gods should suffer,
And on your lives be watchful.

Ba. And be valiant;

And let's see, if these Portugals dare enter;
What their high hearts dare do: Let's see how readily,
The great Ruy Dias will redeem his Countrey-men;
He speaks proud words, and threatens.

Sy. He is approv'd, Sir,

And

And will put fair for what he promises;
I could with friendlier terms,
Yet for our liberties and for our gods,
We are bound in our best service
Even in the hazard of our lives.

Enter the King above.

King. Come up Princes,
And give your counsels, and your helps: the Fort still Plays fearfully upon us, beats our buildings,
And turns our people wild with fears.

Ba. Send for the prisoner,
And give us leave to argue. Exit Ba. and Sy. then,

Enter Ruy Dias, Emanuel, Christoph. Pedro, with Sold.

Ru. Come on nobly,
And let the Fort play still, we are Strong enough to look upon 'em,
And return at pleasure; it may
Be on our view they will return him.

Cbr. We will return 'em such thanks else,
Shall make 'em scratch where it itches not.

Em. How the people stare,
And some cry, some pray, and some curse heartily:
But it is the King —

Enter Syana, Bakam, Quifara, Armusia, with Soldiers above.

Ruy. I cannot blame their wisdoms.
They are all above, Armusia chain'd and bound too?
Oh, these are thankful Squires.

Ba. Hear us Ruy Dios,
Be wise and hear us, and give speedy answer,
Command thy Cannon presently to cease,
No more to trouble the afflicted people,
Or suddainly Armusia's head goes off,
As suddainly as said.

Em. Stay Sir, be moderate.

Arm. Do nothing that's dishonourable Ruy Dyas
Let not the fear of me, master thy valour;
Pursue 'em still, they are base malicious people.

King. Friend, be not desperate.

Ar. I scorn your courtesies;
Strike when you dare, a fair arm guide the Gunner,
And may he let flie still with fortune: friend,
Do me the honor of a Soldiers funerals,
The last fair Christian right, see me i'th' ground,
And let the Palace burn first, then the Temples,
And on their scorn'd gods, erect my monument:
Touch not the Princess, as you are a Soldier.

Quifar. Which way you goe, Sir,
I must follow necessary.
One life, and one death.

King. Will you take a truce yet?

Enter Pyniero, Soza, and Soldiers, with the Governor.

Py. No, no, go on:
Look here, your god, your prophet.

King. How came he taken?

Py. I conjur'd for him, King.
I am a sure Curr at an old blind Prophet.
I'll haunt ye such a false knave admirably,

A terrier I; I eartht him, and then snapt him;
Soz. Saving the reverence of your grace, we stole him,
E'en out of the next chamber to ye.

Py. Come, come, begin King,
Begin this bloody matter when you dare;
And yet I scorn my sword should touch the rascal,
I'll tear him thus before ye. Ha?

What art thou?

King. How's this!
Art thou a Prophet?

{ Pulls his Beard and hair off.

Ru. Come down Princes.

King. We are abus'd —
Oh my most dear Armusia —
Off with his chains. And now my noble Sister,
Rejoyce with me, I know ye are pleas'd as I am.

Py. This is a precious Prophet. Why Don Governor,
What make you here, how long have you taken Orders?

Ruy. Why what a wretch
Art thou to work this mischief?
To assume this holy shape to ruine honor,
Honor and chastity;

Enter King, and all from above.

Gov. I had paid you all,
But fortune plaid the flut. Come,
Give me my doom.

King. I cannot speak for wonder.

Gov. Nay, 'tis I Sir,
And here I stay your sentence.

King. Take her friend,
You have half perfwaded me to be a Christian,
And with her all the joyes, and all the blessings.
Why what dream have we dwelt in?

Ru. All peace to ye,
And all the happiness of heart dwell with ye,
Children as sweet and noble as their Parents.

Py. And Kings at least.

Ar. Good Sir, forget my rashness.
And noble Princesses, for I was once angry,
And out of that, might utter some distemper,
Think not 'tis my nature.

Sya. Your joy is ours, Sir.
And nothing we find in ye, but most noble.

King. To prison with this dog, there let him howl,
And if he can repent, figh out his villainies:
His Island we shall seize into our hands,
His Father and himself have both usurp'd it,
And kept it by oppression; the Town and Castle,
In which I lay my self most miserable,
Till my most honourable friend redeem'd me,
Signior Pyniero, I bestow on you,
The rest of next command upon these Gentlemen,
Upon ye, all my love.

Arm. Oh brave Ruy Dias,
You have started now beyond me. I must thank ye,
And thank ye for my life, my wife and honor.

Ruy. I am glad I had her for you, Sir.

King. Come Princes,
Come Friends and Lovers all, come noble Gentlemen,
No more Guns now, nor hates, but joyes and triumphs,
An universal gladness fly about us:
And know however subtle men dare cast,
And promise wrack, the gods give peace at last,

Exeunt.

The Scene France.

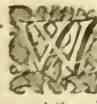

P R O L O G U E.

WIT is become an Antick, and puts on
 As many ſhapes of variation,
 To court the times applauſe, as the times dare,
 Change ſeveral fashions, nothing is thought rare
 Which is not new, and follow'd, yet we know
 That what was worn ſome twenty years agoe,

Comes into grace again, and we purſue
 That cuſtom, by preſenting to your view
 A Play in faſhion then, not doubting now
 But 'twill appear the ſame, if you allow
 Worth to their noble memory, whoſe name,
 Beyond all power of death, live in their fame.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Gentleman and Jaques.

Gent.  Hat happineſs waits on the life at Court,
 What dear content, greatneſs, delight and eaſe?
 What ever-ſpringing hopes, what tides of ho-
 That raiſe their fortunes to the height of wiſhes? nor?
 What can be more in man, what more in nature,
 Than to be great and fear'd? A Courtier,

A noble Courtier, 'Tis a name that draws
 Wonder and duty from all eyes and knees.
 Jaq. And ſo your Worſhips Land within the Walls,
 Where you ſhall have it all incloſ'd, and ſure.
 Gent. Peace knave; dull creature, bred of ſweat and ſmoke,
 Theſe myſteries are far above thy faith:
 But thou ſhalt ſee—
 Jaq. And then I ſhall believe;
 Your fair revenues, turn'd into fair ſuits;

I shall believe your Tenant's bruis'd and rent
Under the weight of Coaches, all your state
Drawn through the streets in triumph, suits for places
Plied with a Mine of Gold, and being got Fed with a great stream I shall believe all this.

Gent. You shall believe, and know me glorious.
Cofin, good day and health.

Enter Cofin.

Cofin. The same to you, Sir,
And more, without my wishes, could you know
What calm content dwells in a private house:
Yet look into your self, retire: this place
Of promises, and protestations, fits
Minds only bent to ruin, you should know this,
You have their language perfect, you have tutors
I do not doubt, sufficient: but beware.

Gent. You are merry Cofin:

Cofin. Yet your patience,
You shall learn that too, but not like it self,
Where it is held a virtue; tell me Sir,
Have you cast up your State, rated your Land,
And find it able to endure the change
Of time and fashion? is it always harvest?

Always vintage? have you Ships at Sea,
To bring you Gold and Stone from rich Peru,
Monthly returning Treasure? doth the King
Open his large Exchequer to your hands
And bid ye be a great man? can your wife
Coin off her beauty? or the week allow Suits to each day? and know no ebb in honor?
If these be possible, and can hold out,
Then be a Courtier still, and still be wasting,

Gent. Cofin, pray give me leave:

Cof. I have done.

Gent. I could requite your gall, and in a strain
As bitter, and as full of Rubarb, preach
Against your Country life, but 'tis below me
And only subject to my pity, know
The eminent Court, to them that can be wise,
And fasten on her blessings, is a Sun
That draws men up from course and earthly Being,
I mean these men of merit that have power
And reason to make good her benefits,
Learns them a manly boldness, gives their tongues
Sweetness of Language, makes them apt to please;
Files of all rudeness, and uncivil haviour,
Shews them as neat in carriage, as in cloaths;
Cofin, have you ever seen the Court?

Cof. No Sir,

Nor am I yet in travel with that longing.

Gent. Oh the state and greatness of that place
Where men are found
Only to give the first creation glory!
Those are the models of the antient world
Left like the Roman Statues to stir up
Our following hopes, the place it self puts on
The brow of Majesty, and flings her lustre
Like the air newly light'ned; Form, and Order,
Are only there themselves, unforc'd, and sound,
As they were first created to this place.

Cof. You nobly came, but will goe from thence base.

Gent. 'Twas very pretty, and a good conceit;
You have a wit good Cofin, I do joy in't,
Keep it for Court: but to my self again,
When I have view'd these pieces, turn'd these eyes,
And with some taste of superstition,
Look'd on the wealth of Nature, the fair dames,
Beauties, that light the Court, and make it shew
Like a fair heaven, in a frosty night:
And 'mongst these mine, not poorest, 'tis for tongues
Of blessed Poets, such as Orpheus was,
To give their worth and praises; Oh dear Cofin:

You have a wife, and fair, bring her hither,
Let her not live to be the Mistress of a Farmers heir
And be confin'd ever to a searge,
Far courser than my horse-cloth.
Let her have Velvets, Tiffinies, Jewels, Pearls,
A Coach, an Usher, and her two Lacquies,
And I will send my wife to give her rules,
And read the rudiments of Court to her.

Cof. Sir, I had rather send her to Virginia
To help to propagate the English Nation.

Enter Servant.

Gent. Sirrah, how slept your Mistress, and what visitants
Are to pay service?

Serv. As I came out,
Two Counts were newly ent'red.

Gent. This is greatness,
But few such servants wait a Country beauty.

Cof. They are the more to thank their modesty,
God keep my Wife, and all my Issue Female
From such uprisings.

Enter a Doctor.

Gent. What? my learned Doctor?
You will be welcome, give her health and youth
And I will give you gold.

Exit Doctor.

Cofin, how favors this? is it not sweet
And very great, tastes it not of Nobleness?

Cof. Faith Sir, my pallet is too dull and lazie
I cannot taste it, 'tis not for my relish,
But be so still.

Since your own misery must first reclaim ye,
To which I leave you, Sir,
If you will, yet be happy, leave the humor
And base subjection to your Wife, be wise,
And let her know with speed, you are her Husband,
I shall be glad to hear it.
My horse is sent for,

Exit.

Gent. Even such another country thing as this
Was I, such a piece of dirt, so heavy,
So provident to heap up ignorance,
And be an ass: such musty cloaths wore I,
So old and thred-bare, I do yet remember
Divers young Gallants lighting at my Gate,
To see my honoured Wife, have offered pence,
And bid me walk their horses, such a slave
Was I in shew then: but my eyes are open'd.

Enter Gent. Wife.

Many sweet morrows to my worthy Wife.

Wife. 'Tis well, and aptly given, as much for you,
But to my present business, which is money —

Gent. Lady, I have none left.

(low,

Wife. I hope you dare not say so, nor imagine so base and
A thought: I have none left?

Are these words fitting for a man of worth,
And one of your full credit? Do you know
The place you live in? me? and what I labour
For, you? and your advancement?

Gent. Yes my dearest.

Wife. And do you pop me off with this slight answer,
In troth I have none left? in troth you must have;
Nay stare not, 'tis most true, send speedily
To all that love you, let your people flye
Like thunder, through the City,
And not return under five thousand Crowns-
Try all, take all, let not a worthy Merchant be untempted
Or any one that hath the name of Money,
Take up at any Use, give Band, or Land,
Or mighty Statutes, able by their strength,
To tie up Sampson, were he now alive,

There

There must be money gotten; for be perswaded,
 If we fall now, or be but seen to shrink,
 Under our fair beginnings, 'tis our ruin,
 And then good night to all, (but our disgrace)
 Farewel the hope of coming happiness,
 And all the aims we levied at so long.
 Are ye not mov'd at this? no sense of want,
 Towards your self yet breeding? be old,
 And common; jaded to the eyes
 Of Grooms, and Pages, Chamber-maids, and Guarders,
 And when you have done, put your poor house in order
 And hang your self, for such must be the end
 Of him that willingly forsakes his hopes
 And hath a joy to tumble to his ruin.
 All that I say is certain, if ye fail
 Do not upbraid me with it, I am clear.

Gent. Now heaven forbid I should do wrong to you
 My dearest Wife, and Madam; yet give leave
 To your poor creature to unfold himself.
 You know my debts are many more than means,
 My bands not taken in, my friends at home
 Drawn dry with these expences, my poor Tenants
 More full of want than we, then what new course
 Can I beget, to raise those crowns by? speak,
 And I shall execute.

Wife. Pray tell me true,
 Have you not Land in the Countrey?

Gent. Pardon me, I had forgot it.

Wife. Sir, you must remember it,
 There is no remedy, this Land must be,
 In Paris e'r to morrow night.

Gent. It shall, let me consider, some 300 acres
 Will serve the turn.

Wife. 'Twill furnish at all points,
 Now you speak like your self, and know like him,
 That means to be a man, suspect no less
 For the return will give ye five for one,
 You shall be great to morrow, I have said it.
 Farewel, and see this business be a-foot,
 With expedition. Exit Wife.

Gent. Health, all joy, and honor
 Wait on my lovely Wife. What? Jaques, Jaques.

Enter Jaques.

Jaq. Sir, did you call?

Gent. I did so, hie thee Jaques.

Down to the Bank, and there to some good Merchant (Conceive me well, good Jaques, and be private)
 Offer 300 acres of my Land:
 Say it is choice and fertile, ask upon it
 Five thousand Crowns, this is the business
 I must employ thee in, be wise and speedy.

Jaq. Sir, do not do this.

Gent. Knave, I must have money,

Jaq. If you have money thus, your knave must tell ye
 You will not have a foot of Land left, be more wary,
 And more friend to your self, this honest Land
 Your Worship has discarded, has been true,
 And done you loyal service.

Gent. Gentle Jaques,
 You have a merry wit, employ it well
 About the business you have now in hand.
 When ye come back, enquire me in the Presence,
 If not in the Tennis-Court, or at my house. Exit.

Jaq. If this vain hold, I know where to enquire ye.
 Five thousand Crowns! this, with good husbandry,
 May hold a month out, then 5000 more,
 And more Land a bleeding for't, as many more,
 And more Land laid aside. God and St. Dennis
 Keep honest minded young men batchelors.
 'Tis strange, my Master should be yet so young
 A puppy, that he cannot see his fall
 And got so near the Sun. I'll to his Cofin.

And once more tell him on't, if he fail,
 Then to my Mortgage, next unto my sale. Exit.

Enter Longovile, Bewford, and the Servant.

Serv. Gentlemen, hold on discourse a while,
 I shall return with knowledge how and where
 We shall have best access unto my Mistriss
 To tender your devotions. Exit.

Long. Be it so:
 Now to our first discourse.

Bew. I prethee peace;
 Thou canst not be so bad, or make me know
 Such things are living, do not give thy self
 So common and so idle, so open vile,
 So great a wronger of thy worth, so low,
 I cannot, nor I must not credit thee.

Lon. Now by this light I am a whoremaster,
 An open, and an excellent whormaster,
 And take a special glory that I am so:
 I thank my Stars I am a whoremaster,
 And such a one as dare be known and seen,
 And pointed at to be a noble wench.

Bew. Do not let all ears hear this, hark he Sir,
 I am my self a whoremaster, I am
 Believe it Sir (in private be it spoken)
 I love a whore directly, most men are wenchers,
 And have profest the Science, few men
 That look upon ye now, but whoremasters,
 Or have a full desire to be so.

Lon. This is noble.

Bew. It is without all question, being private,
 And held as needful as intelligence,
 But being once discover'd, blown abroad,
 And known to common senses, 'tis no more
 Than geometrical rules in Carpenters,
 That only know some measure of an Art,
 But are not grounded: be no more deceived,
 I have a conscience to reclaim you, Sir.
 Mistake me not: I do not bid you leave your whore
 Or less to love her; forbid it,
 I should be such a villain to my friend,
 Or so unnatural: 'twas never harbor'd here,
 Learn to be secret first, then strike your Deer.

Lon. Your fair instructions, Monsieur, I shall learn.

Bew. And you shall have them; I desire your care.

Lon. They are your servants.

Bew. You must not love.

Lon. How Sir?

Bew. I mean a Lady, there's danger.
 She hath an Usher and a Waiting Gentlewoman,
 A Page, a Coach-man, these are fee'd and fee'd
 And yet for all that will be prating.

Lon. So.

Bew. You understand me Sir, they will discover't,
 And there is a loss of credit, Table-talk
 Will be the end of this, or worse, than that;
 Will this be worthy of a Gentleman?

Long. Proceed good Sir.

Bew. Next leave your City Dame;
 The best of that Tribe, are most meerly coy,
 Or most extreemly foolish, both which vices
 Are no great stirrers up, unless in Husbands
 That owe this Cattle, fearing her that's coy
 To be but seeming, her that's fool too forward.

Lon. This is the rarest fellow, and the soundest,
 I mean in knowledge, that e'r wore a Codpiece,
 H^{as} found out that will pass all Italy,
 All France and England; to their shames I speak,
 And to the griefs of all their Gentlemen,
 The noble Theory of Luxury.

Bew. Your patience,
 And I will lay before your eyes a course
 That I my self found out, 'tis excellent,

Easie, and full of freedome.

Long. O good Sir,
You rack me till I know it.

Bew. This it is,
When your desire is up, your blood well heated
And apt for sweet encounter, chuse the night,
And with the night your Wench, the streets have store,
There seize upon her, get her to your chamber,
Give her a cardecew, 'tis royal payment;
When ye are dull, dismis her, no man knows,
Nor she her self, who hath encountred her.

Lon. O but their faces.

Bew. Nere talke of faces:
The night allows her equal with a Dutches,
Imagination doth all think her fair,
And great, clapt in Velvet, she is so,
Sir, I have tryed those, and do find it certain
It never failes me, 'tis but twelve nights since
My last experience.

Lon. O my meiching Varlet, I'll fit ye as I live.
'Tis excellent, I'll be your Scholar Sir.

Enter Lady and Servant.

Wife. You are fairly welcome both: troth Gentlemen
You have been strangers, I could chide you for't,
And taxe ye with unkindness, What's the news?
The Town was never empty of some novelty;
Servant, What's your intelligence?

Ser. Faith nothing.

I have not heard of any worth relating.

Bew. Nor I sweet Lady.

Lon. Then give me attention,

Monsieur Shattillion's mad.

Wife. Mad?

Lon. Mad as May-butter,
And which is more, mad for a Wench.

Lady. 'Tis strange, and full of pity.

Lon. All that comes near him

He thinks are come of purpose to betray him,
Being full of strange conceit: the wench he loved
Stood very near the Crown.

Lady. Alas good Monsieur;
A' was a proper man, and fair demean'd,
A Person worthy of a better temper.

Lon. He is strong opinion'd that the Wench he lov'd
Remains close prisoner by the Kings command:
Fearing her title, when the poor grieved Gentlewoman
Follows him much lamenting, and much loving
In hope to make him well, he knows her not,
Nor any else that comes to visit him.

Lady. Let's walk in Gentlemen, and there discourse
His further miseries, you shall stay dinner,
In truth you must obey.

Om. We are your servants.

Exeunt.

Enter Couzen.

Cous. There's no good to be done, no cure to be wrought
Upon my desperate Kinsman: I'll to horse
And leave him to the fools whip, misery.
I shall recover twenty miles this night,
My horse stands ready, I'll away with speed.

Enter Shattillion.

Sbat. Sir, may I crave your name?

Cous. Yes Sir you may:
My name is Cleremont.

Sbat. 'Tis well, your faction?

What party knit you with?

Cous. I know no parties,
Nor no Factions, Sir.

Sbat. Then weare this Cross of white:

And where you see the like they are my friends,
Observe them well, the time is dangerous, (fellow
Cous. Sir keep your cross, I'll weare none, sure this Is much beside himself, grown mad.

Sbat. A word Sir;

You can pick nothing out of this, this cross
Is nothing but a cross, a very cross,
Plain, without spell, or witchcraft, search it,
You may suspect, and well, there's poyson in't,
Powder, or wild-fire, but 'tis nothing so.

Cous. I do believe you, Sir, 'tis a plain cross.

Sbat. Then do your worst, I care not, tell the King,
Let him know all this, as I am sure he shall;
When you have spit your venome, then will I
Stand up a faithful, and a loyal Subject,
And so God save His Grace, this is no Treason.

Cous. He is March mad, farewell Monsieur. Exit Couzen.

Sbat. Farewell;

I shall be here attending, 'tis my life
They aime at, there's no way to save it; well
Let 'em spread all their nets: they shall not draw me
Into any open Treason, I can see,
And can beware, I have my wits about me,
I thank heaven for't.

Enter Love.

Love. There he goes,
That was the fairest hope the French Court bred,
The worthiest and the sweetest temper'd spirit,
The truest, and the valiantest, the best of judgment,
Till most unhappy I: sever'd those virtues,
And turn'd his wit wild with a coy denial,
Which heaven forgive me, and be pleas'd, O heaven
To give again his senses: that my love
May strike off all my follies.

Sbat. Lady.

Love. I Sir.

Sbat. Your will with me sweet Lady.

Love. Sir, I come.

Sbat. From the dread sovereign King, I know it Lady,
He is a gracious Prince, long may he live,
Pertain you to his chamber?

Love. No indeed Sir,

That place is not for women, Do you know me?

Sbat. Yes, I do know you.

Love. What's my name? pray you speak.

Sbat. That's all one, I do know you and your business,
You are discover'd Lady, I am wary,
It stands upon my life; pray excuse me,
The best man of this Kingdom sent you hither,
To dive into me, have I toucht you? ha?

Love. You are deceiv'd Sir, I come from your love,
That sends you fair commends, and many kisses.

Sbat. Alas, poor soul, How does she? Is she living?
Keeps she her bed still?

Love. Still Sir, She is living,

And well, and shall do so,

Sbat. Are ye in counsel?

Love. No Sir, nor any of my sex.

Sbat. Why so,

If you had been in counsel, you would know,
Her time to be but slender; she must die.

Love. I do believe it, Sir.

Sbat. And suddenly,
She stands too near a fortune.

Love. Sir?

Sbat. 'Tis so,

There is no jesting with a Princes Title,
Would we had both been born of common parents,
And liv'd a private and retir'd life,
In homely cottage, we had then enjoyed,
Our loves, and our embraces: these are things,
That cannot tend to Treason —

Low. I am wretched.

Sbat. O I pray as often for the King as any,
And with as true a heart, for's continuance,
And do moreover pray his heirs may live;
And their fair issues, then as I am bound
For all the states and commons: if these prayers
Be any wayes ambitious, I submit,
And lay my head down, let 'em take it off;
You may informe against me, but withall
Remember my obedience to the Crown,
And service to the State.

Low. Good Sir, I love ye.

Sbat. Then love the gracious King, and say with me

Low. Heaven save his Grace.

Sbat. This is strange——

A woman should be sent to undermine me,
And buz love into me to try my spirit;
Offer me kisses, and enticing follies,
To make me open, and betray my self;
It was a subtile and a dangerous plot,
And very soundly followed, farewell Lady,
Let me have equal hearing, and relate
I am an honest Man. Heaven save the King.

Love. I'll never leave him, till, by art or prayer,
I have restor'd his senses, If I make Him perfect Man again, he's mine, till when,
I here abjure all loves of other men.

Enter Cozen, and Jaques.

Jaques. Nay, good Sir be perswaded, go but back,
And tell him hee's undone, say nothing else;
And you shall see how things will work upon't.

Cozen. Not so good Jaques, I am held an assè,
A Countrey Fool, good to converse with dirt,
And eate course bread, weare the worst Wooll,
Know nothing but the high-way to Paris,
And wouldst thou have me bring these stains,
And imperfections to the rising view
Of the right worshipful thy worthy Master?
They must be bright, and shine, their cloaths
Soft Velvet, and the Tyrian Purple
Like the Arabian gums, hung like the Sun,
Their golden beames on all sides;
Such as these may come and know
Thy Master, I am base, and dare not speak unto him,
Hee's above me.

Ja. If ever you did love him, or his state,
His name, his issue, or your self, go back:
'Twill be an honest and a noble part
Worthy a Kinsman; save 300 Acres
From present execution; they have had sentence,
And cannot be repriev'd, be merciful.

Co. Have I not urg'd already all the reasons,
I had to draw him from his will? his ruin?
But all in vain, no counsel will prevail;
H'as fixt himself, there's no removing, Jaques,
'Twill prove but breath and labor spent in vain,
I'll to my horse, farewell.

Ja. For Gods sake, Sir,
As ever you have hope of joy, turn back;
I'll be your slave for ever, do but go,
And I will lay such fair directions to you
That if he be not doting on his fall,
He shall recover sight, and see his danger,
And ye shall tell him of his Wives abuses,
I fear, too foul against him; how she plots,
With our young Mounsiers, to milk-dry her husband,
And lay it on their backs; the next her pride;
Then what his debts are, and how infinite
The curses of his Tenants, this will work
I'll pawn my life and head, he cries away,
I'll to my house in the Countrey.

Co. Come, I'll go, and once more try him,

If he yield not, so,

The next that tries him shall be want and woe. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Gentleman, Solus.

Gent. Jaques.

Ja. Sir.

Within.

Gent. Rise Jaques 'tis grown day,
The Country life is best, where quietly,
Free from the clamor of the troubled Court,
We may enjoy our own green shadowed walks,
And keep a moderate diet without art.
Why did I leave my house, and bring my Wife,
To know the manner of this subtile place?
Exit. I would, when first the lust to fame and honor,
Possess me, I had met with any evil,
But that; had I been tied to stay at home,
And earn the bread for the whole family,
Exit. With my own hand, happy had I been.

Enter Jaques.

Ja. Sir, this is from your wonted course at home,
When did ye there keep such inordinate hours?
Goe to bed late? start thrice? and call on me?
Would you were from this place; our Countrey sleeps,
Although they were but of that moderate length
That might maintain us in our daily work,
Yet were they sound and sweet. (together;

Gent. I Jaques, there we dreamt not of our Wives, we lay
And needed not; now at length my Cozens words,
So truly meant, mixt with thy timely prayers
So often urged, to keep me at my home,
Condemn me quite.

Ja. 'Twas not your fathers course:
He liv'd and dy'd in Orleans, where he had
His Vines as fruitful as experience
(Which is the art of Husbandry) could make;
He had his presses for 'em, and his wines
Were held the best, and out-sold other Mens,
His corn and cattel serv'd the neighbor Towns
With plentiful provision, yet his thrift
Could miss one Beast amongst the heard;
He rul'd more where he liv'd, than ever you will here.

Gent. 'Tis true, why should my Wife then, 'gainst my Perswade me to continue in this course? (good,

Ja. Why did you bring her hither at the first,
Before you warm'd her blood with new delights?
Our Countrey sports could have contented her;
When you first married her a puppet-play
Pleas'd her as well as now the tilting doth.
She thought her self brave in a bugle chain,
Where Orient pearl will scarce content her now.

Gent. Sure Jaques, she sees something for my good
More than I do; she oft will talk to me
Of Offices, and that she shortly hopes,
By her acquaintance with the friends she hath,
To get a place shall many times outweigh
Our great expences, and if this be so——

Ja. Think better of her words, she doth deceive you,
And only for her vain and sensual ends
Perswade ye thus. Let me be fet to dwell
For ever naked in the barest soil,
So you will dwell from hence.

Gent. I see my folly,

Pack up my stuffe, I will away this morne.
Haste—halte.

Ja. I, now I see your Father's honors
Trebling upon you, and the many prayers
The Countrey spent for him, which almost now
Begin to turn to curses, turning back,
And falling like a mighty shower
Upon ye.

Gent. Goe, call my Wife.

Ja. But shall she not prevail,
And sway you, as she oft hath done before?

Gent. I will not hear her, but raile on her,
Till I be ten miles off.

Ja. If you be forty,
'Twill not be worfe Sir:

Gent. Call her up,

Ja. I will Sir.

Gent. Why what an Ass was I that such a thing
As a Wife is could rule me?

Know not I that woman was created for the man,
That her desires, nay all her thoughts should be
As his are? is my sence restor'd at length?
Now she shall know, that which she should desire,
She hath a husband that can govern her,

Enter Wife.

If her desires leads me against my will;
Are you come?

Wife. What sad unwonted course
Makes you raise me so soon, that went to bed
So late last-night.

Gent. O you shall goe to bed sooner hereafter,
And be rais'd again at thrifty hours:
In Summer time wee'l walk
An hour after our Supper, and to bed,
In Winter you shall have a set at Cards,
And set your Maids to work.

Wife. What do you mean?

Gent. I will no more of your new tricks, your honors,
Your Offices, and all your large preferments,
Which still you beat into my ears, hang o'er me,
I'll leave behind for others, the great sway
Which I shall bear at Court: my living here
With countenance of your honoured friends,
I'll be content to lose: for you speak this
Only that you may still continue here
In wanton ease: and draw me to consume,
In cloaths and other things idle for shew,
That which my Father got with honest thrift.

Wife. Why, who hath been with you Sir,
That you talk thus out of Frame.

Gent. You make a fool of me:
You provide one to bid me forth to supper,
And make me promise; then must some one or other Invite you forth, if you have born your self
Loosely to any Gentleman in my sight
At home, you ask me how I like the carriage,
Whether it were not rarely for my good,
And open'd not a way to my preferment?
Come, I perceive all: talk not, we'll away.

Wife. Why Sir, you'll stay till the next triumph
Day be past?

Gent. I, you have kept me here triumphing
This seven years, and I have ridden through the streets,
And bought embroyder'd hose and foot-cloths too,
To shew a subjects zeal, I rode before
In this most gorgeous habit, and saluted
All the acquaintance I could espie
From any window; these are wayes ye told me
To raise me; I see all: make you ready straight,
And in that Gown which you came first to Town in,
Your safe-guard, cloak, and your hood futable:
Thus on a double gelding shall you anible,

And my man Jaques shall be set before you.

Wife. But will you goe?

Gent. I will.

Wife. And shall I too?

Gent. And you shall too.

Wife. But shall I by this light?

Gent. Why by this light you shall.

Wife. Then by this light

You have no care of your Estate, and mine,
Have we been seven years venturing in a Ship,
And now upon return, with a fair wind,
And a calm Sea, full fraught with our own wishes,
Laden with wealth and honor to the brim,
And shall we flye away and not receive it?
Have we been tilling, sowing, labouring,
With pain and charge a long and tedious winter,
And when we see the corn above the ground,
Youthful as is the Morn and the full eare,
That promises to stuffe our spacious garner,
Shall we then let it rot, and never reap it?

Gent. Wife talke no more, your Rhetorick comes too late,
I am inflexible; and how dare you
Adventure to direct my course of life?

Was not the husband made to rule the Wife?

Wife. 'Tis true: but where the man doth mis his way,
It is the Womans part to set him right;
So Fathers have a power to guide their Sons
In all their courses, yet you oft have seen
Poor little children, that have both their eyes,
Lead their blind Fathers.

Gent. She has a plaguy wit,
I say you'r but a little piece of man.

Wife. But such a piece, as being tane away,
Man cannot last: the fairest and tallest ship,
That ever fail'd, is by a little piece of the same
Wood, steer'd right, and turn'd about.

Gent. 'Tis true she sayes, her answers stand with reason.

Wife. But Sir, your Cozin put this in your head,
Who is an enemy to your preferment,
Because I should not take place of his wife;
Come, by this kifs, thou shalt not go sweet heart.

Gent. Come, by this kifs I will go Sweet-heart,
On with your riding stuffe; I know your tricks,
And if preferment fall ere you be ready,
'Tis welcome, else adieu the City life.

Wife. Well, Sir, I will obey.

Gent. About it then,

Wife. To please your humor I would dress my self,
In the most loathsome habit you could name,
Or travel any whether o're the World,
If you command me, it shall ne'r be said,
The frailty of a woman, whose weak mind,
Is often set on loose delights, and shews,
Hath drawn her husband to consume his state,
In the vain hope of that which never fell.

Gent. About it then, women are pleasant creatures,
When once a man begins to know himself.

Wife. But hark you Sir, because I will be sure,
You shall have no excuse, no word to say
In your defence hereafter; when you see
What honors were prepar'd for you and me,
Which you thus willingly have thrown away,
I tell you I did look for present honor,
This morning for you, which I know had come:
But if they do not come ere I am ready
(Which I will be the sooner least they should)
When I am once set in a countrey life,
Not all the power of earth shall alter me,
Not all your prayers or threats shall make me speak
The least words to my honorable friends,
To do you any grace.

Gent. I will not wish it.

Wife. And never more hope to be honorable,

Gent. My hopes are lower.

Wife. As I live you shall not,
You shall be so far from the name of noble
That you shall never see a Lord again;
You shall not see a Maske, or Barriers,
Or Tilting, or a solemn Christning,
Or a great Marriage, or new Fire-works,
Or any bravery; but you shall live
At home, bespotted with your own lov'd dirt,
In scurvy cloaths, as you were wont to doe,
And to content you, I will live so too.

Gen. 'Tis all I wish, make haste, the day draws on,
It shall be my care to see your Stuffe packt up.

Wife. It shall be my care to gull you: you shall stay. (Ex. Gen.)
And more than so, intreat me humbly too,
You shall have honors presently; Maria.

Enter Maria.

Mrs. Madam.

Wife. Bring hither, pen, ink, and paper.

Mrs. 'Tis here.

Wife. Your Master will not stay,
Unless preferment come within an hour.

Mrs. Let him command one of the City gates,
In time of mutiny, or you may provide him,
To be one of the counsel for invading,
Some savage Countrey to plant Christian faith.

Wife. No, no, I have it for him, call my page;
Now, my dear husband, there it is will fit you. Ex. Maria.

And when the world shall see what I have done,
Let it not move the spleen of any Wife,
To make an Ass of her beloved husband,
Without good ground, but if they will be drawn
To any reason by you, do not gull them;
But if they grow conceited of themselves,
And be fine Gentlemen, have no mercy,
Publish them to the World, 'twill do them good
When they shall see their follies understood,
Go bear these Letters to my servant,
And bid him make haste, I will dress my self,
In all the Journey-Cloaths I us'd before,
Not to ride, but to make the Laughter more.

Exit.

Enter Gentleman, and Jaques.

Gen. Is all packt up?

Ja. All, all Sir, there is no tumbler
Runs through his hoop with more dexterity,
Then I about this business: 'Tis a day,
That I have long long'd to see.

Gen. Come, Where's my Spurs?

Ja. Here, Sir, and now 'tis come.

Gen. I, Jaques, now,
I thank my fates, I can command my Wife.

Ja. I am glad to see it, Sir,

Gen. I do not love always,
To be made a puppie, Jaques.

Ja. But, yet me thinks your Worship does not look,
Right like a Countrey Gentleman.

Gen. I will, give me my t'other hat.

Ja. Here.

Gen. So, my Jerkin.

Ja. Yes, Sir.

Gen. On with it Jaques, thou and I
Will live so finely in the Countrey, Jaques,
And have such pleasant walks into the Woods
A mornings, and then bring home riding-rods,
And walking staves——

Ja. And I will bear them, Sir,
And Skurdge-sticks for the children.

Gen. So thou shalt,
And thou shalt do all, over-see my Work-folkes,
And at the weeks end pay them all their wages,

Ja. I will, Sir, so your Worship give me Money.

Gen. Thou shalt receive all too: give me my Drawers.

Ja. They are ready, Sir.

Gen. And I will make thy Mistris,
My wife, look to her landrie, and her dairy,
That we may have our linnen clean on Sundayes.

Ja. And Holy-dayes.

Gen. I, and ere we walk about the Grounds
Provide our break-fast,
Or she shall smoke, I'll have her a good hufwife;
She shall not make a voyage to her Sisters,
But she shall live at home,
And feed her pullen fat, and see her Maides
In bed before her, and lock all the doors.

Ja. Why that will be a life for Kings and Queens.

Gen. Give me my Scarfe with the great Button quickly.

Ja. 'Tis done, Sir.

Gen. Now my Mittens,

Ja. Here they are, Sir,

Gen. 'Tis well: now my great dagger.

Ja. There.

Gen. Why so; thus it should be, now my riding rod.

Ja. There's nothing wanting, Sir.

Gen. Another, man, to stick under my girdle.

Ja. There it is.

Gen. All is well.

Ja. Why now methinks your Worship looks
Like to your self, a Man of means and credit,
So did your grave and famous Ancestors,
Ride up and down to Fairs, and cheapen cattel.

Gen. Goe, hasten your Mistris, Sirra.

Ja. It shall be done.

Ex. Jaques.

Enter Servant and Page.

Ser. Who's that? who's that Boy?

Page. I think it be my Master.

(rod?)

Ser. Who, he that walks in gray, whisking his riding

Page. Yes, Sir, 'tis he.

Ser. 'Tis he indeed; he is prepar'd

For his new journey; when I wink upon you,
Run out and tell the Gentleman 'tis time——

Exit. Monsieur good day.

(dy.)

Gen. Monsieur, your Mistris is within, but yet not rea-

Ser. My business is with you, Sir; 'tis reported,

I know not whether by some enemy
Maliciously, that envies your great hopes,
And would be ready to sow discontents
Betwixt his Majesty, and you, or truly,
Which on my faith I would be sorry for,
That you intend to leave the Court in haste.

Gen. Faith, Sir, within this half hour. Jaques?

Jaques within: Sir?

Gen. Is my Wife ready?

Ja. Presently.

Ser. But Sir,

I needs must tell you, as I am your friend,
You should have ta'en your journey privater;
For 'tis already blaz'd about the Court.

Gen. Why Sir, I hope it is no Treason, is it?

Ser. 'Tis true, Sir, but 'tis grown the common talk,
There's no discovery else held, and in the presence
All the Nobility and Gentry,

Have nothing in their mouths but only this,
Monsieur Marine, that noble Gentleman,
Is now departing hence: every Mans face
Looks ghastly on his fellows; such a sadness
(Before this day) I ne'er beheld in Court,
Mens hearts begin to fail them when they hear it,
In expectation of the great event

That needs must follow it, pray Heaven it be good!

Gen. Why, I had rather all their hearts should fail,
Than I stay here until my purse fail me.

Ser. But yet you are a Subject, and beware,
I charge you by the love I bear to you,

How you do venture rashly on a course,
To make your Sovereign jealous of your deeds,
For Princes jealousies, where they love molt,
Are easily found, but they be hardly lost.

Gen. Come, these are tricks, I smell 'em, I will goe:

Ser. Have I not still profest my self your friend?

Gen. Yes, but you never shewd it to me yet.

Ser. But now I will, because I see you wise,
And give ye thus much light into a business,
That came to me but now, be resolute,
Stand stily to it that you will depart,
And presently.

Gen. Why so I mean to doe.

Ser. And by this light you may be what you will;
Will you be secret, Sir?

Gen. Why? What's the matter?

Ser. The King does fear you.

Gen. How?

Ser. And is now in Counsel;

Gen. About me?

Ser. About you, and you be wise,
You'll find he's in Counsel about you:
His Counsellors have told him all the truth.

Gen. What truth?

Ser. Why, that which now he knows too well.

Gen. What is't?

Ser. That you have followed him seven years,
With a great train: and though he have not grac't you,
Yet you have divid'd into the hearts of thousands,
With liberality and noble carriage;
And if you should depart home unprefer'd,
All discontented, and seditious spirits
Would flock to you, and thrust you into action:
With whose help, and your Tenants, who doth not know
(if you were so dispos'd :)
How great a part of this yet fertile peaceful Realm of France
You might make desolate? but when the King
Heard this ———

Gen. What said he?

Ser. Nothing, but shook,

As never Christian Prince did shake before.
And to be short, you may be what you will?
But be not ambitious Sir, sit down
With moderate honors, least you make your self
More fear'd.

Gen. I know, Sir, what I have to doe
In mine own business.

Enter Longavile.

Long. Where's Monsieur Mount Marine.

Ser. Why there he stands, will you ought with him?

Long. Yes: Good day Monsieur Marine.

Gen. Good day to you.

Long. His Majesty doth commend himself,
Most kindly to you Sir, and hath, by me,
Sent you this favor: kneel down, rise a Knight.

Gen. I thank his Majesty.

Long. And he doth further request you,
Not to leave the Court so soon,
For though your former merits have been slighted,
After this time there shall no Office fall;
Worthy your spirit, as he doth confes

There's none so great, but you shall surely have it.

Ser. Do you hear? if you yield yet you are an ass.

Gen. I'll shew my service to his Majesty
In greater things than these, but for this small one
I must intreat his Highness to excuse me.

Long. I'll bear your Knightly words unto the King,
And bring his Princely answer back again. Exit Long.

Ser. Well said, be resolute a while, I know
There is a tide of honors coming on.
I warrant you.

Enter Bewford.

B.w. Where is this new made Knight?

Gen. Here, Sir.

Bew. Let me enfold you in my arms,
Then call you Lord, the King will have it so,
Who doth entreat your Lordship to remember
His Message sent to you by Longavile.

Ser. If ye be durty, and dare not mount aloft;
You may yield now, I know what I would do.

Gen. Peace, I will fit him; tell his Majesty
I am a Subject, and I do confes
I serve a gracious Prince, that thus hath heapt
Honors on me without desert, but yet
As for the Message, business urgeth me,
I must be gone, and he must pardon me,
Were he ten thousand Kings and Emperors.

Bew. I'll tell him so.

Ser. Why, this was like your self.

Bew. As he hath wrought him, 'tis the finest fellow
That e're was Christmas Lord, he carries it
So truly to the life, as though he were
One of the plot to gull himself.

Exit Bewf.

Ser. Why so, you sent the wisest and the shrewdest answer
Unto the King, I swear, my honored friend,
That ever any Subject sent his Liege.

Gen. Nay now I know I have him on the hip,
I'll follow it.

Enter Longavile.

Long. My honorable Lord,
Give me your noble hand right courteous Peer,
And from henceforth be a courtly Earl;
The King so wills, and Subjects must obey:
Only he doth desire you to consider
Of his request.

Ser. Why faith you'r well my Lord, yield to him.

Gen. Yield? why 'twas my plot.

Ser. Nay, 'twas your Wives plot.

Gen. To get preferment by it,
And thinks he now to pop me i'th' mouth
But with an Earldome? I'll be one step higher.

Ser. 'Tis the finest Lord, I am afraid anon
He will stand upon't to share the Kingdom with him.

Enter Bewford.

Bew. Where's this Courtly Earl?

His Majesty commends his love unto you;
And will you but now grant to his request,
He bids you be a Duke, and chuse of whence.

Ser. Why if you yield not now, you are undone,
What can you wish to have more, but the Kingdom?

Gen. So please his Majesty, I would be D. of Burgundy,
Because I like the place.

Bew. I know the King is pleas'd.

Gen. Then will I stay and kiss his Highness hand.

Bew. His Majesty will be a glad man when he hears it.

Lon. But how shall we keep this from the world's ear,
That some one tell him not, he is no Duke?

Ser. VVee'l think of that anon.

Why Gentlemen, Is this a gracious habit for a Duke?
Each gentle body set a finger to
To pluck the clouds of this his riding weeds
From off the orient Sun of his best cloaths;
I'll pluck one Boot and spur off.

Long. I another.

Bew. I'll pluck his Jerkin off.

Ser. Sit down my Lord;

Both his spurs off at once good Longavile,
And Bewford, take that Scarfe off, and that Hat,
Doth not become his largely sprouting fore-head.

Now

Now set your gracious foot to this of mine,
One pluck will do it, so, off with the other.

Lon. Lo, thus your servant Longavile doth pluck
The trophy of your former gentry off.
Off with his Jerkin Benford.

Ser. Didst thou never see
A nimble footed Taylor stand so in his stockings,
Whilst some friend help'd to pluck his Jerkin off,
To dance a Jigg?

Enter Jaques.

Lon. Here's his man Jaques come,
Booted and ready still.

Jaq. My Mistris stays;
Why how now Sir? What do's your Worship mean,
To pluck your grave and thrifty habit off.

Gent. My slippers, Jaques.

Lon. O thou mighty Duke,
Pardon this Man,
That thus hath trespassed in ignorance.

Gent. I pardon him.

Lon. His Graces slippers, Jaques.

Jaq. Why what's the matter?

Lon. Foot-man, he's a Duke:
The King hath rais'd him above all his Land.

Jaq. I'll to his Cozen presently, and tell him so;
O what a dung-hill Countrey rogue was I. Exit Jaques.

Enter Wife.

Ser. See, see, my Mistris.

Lon. Let's observe their greeting.

Wife. Unto your will, as every good Wife ought,
I have turn'd all my thoughts, and now am ready.

Gent. O Wife, I am not worthy to kiss the least
Of all thy toes, much less thy Thumb,
Which yet I would be bold with; all thy counsel
Hath been to me Angelical, but mine to thee
Hath been most dirty, like my mind:
Dear Duches I must stay.

Wife. VVhat are you mad, to make me
Dress, and undress, turn and wind me,
Because you find me plyant? said I not
The whole world should not alter me, if once were resolv'd? and now you call me Duches:
VVhy what's the matter?

Gent. Lo, a Knight doth kneel.

Wife. A Knight?

Gent. A Lord.

Wife. A Fool.

Gent. I say doth kneel an Earl, a Duke.

Lon. In Drawers.

Bew. VVithout shoes.

Wife. Sure you lunatick.

Ser. No, honoured Duches,
If you dare but believe your servants truth,
I know he is a Duke.

Lon. God save his Grace.

Wife. I ask your Graces pardon.

Gent. Then I rise,

And here, in token that all strife shall end,
'Twixt thee and me, I let my drawers fall,
And to thy hands I do deliver them:
Which signifies, that in all acts and speeches,
From this time forth, my Wife shall wear the breeches.

Ser. An honorable composition.

Exeunt omnes.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Cozen, and Jaques.

Coz. SHall I believe thee, Jaques?

Jaq. Sir you may.

Coz. Didst thou not dreame?

Jaq. I did not.

Coz. Nor imagine?

Jaq. Neither of both: I saw him great and mighty,
I saw the Monsieurs bow, and heard them cry,
Good health and fortune to my Lord the Duke.

Coz. A Duke art sure? a Duke?

Jaq. I am sure a Duke,
And so sure, as I know my self for Jaques.

Coz. Yet the Sun may dazel; Jaques, Was it not
Some leane Commander of an angry Block-house

To keep the Fleemish Eele-boats from invasion,
Or some bold Baron able to dispend

His fifty pounds a year, and meet the foe
Upon the Kings command, in gilded canvas,

And do his deeds of worth? or was it not
Some place of gain, as Clerk to the great Band

Of maribones, that people call the Switzers?

Men made of Beufe and Sarcenet? (presence?)

Jaq. Is a Duke his chamber hung with Nobles like a

Coz. I am something wavering in my faith;
Would you would settle me, and swear 'tis so,
Is he a Duke indeed?

Jaq. I swear he is.
Coz. I am satisfied, he is my Kinsman. Jaques,

And I his poor unworthy Cozen.

Jaq. True, Sir.
Coz. I might have been a Duke too, I had means,

A wife as fair as his, and as wise as his;
And could have brookt the Court as well as his,

And laid about her for her husbands honor:
O Jaques, had I ever dreamt of this,
I had prevented him.

Jaq. Faith Sir it came
Above our expectation, we were wise
Only in seeking to undoe this honor,
Which shewed our dung-hill breeding and our durt.

Coz. But tell me Jaques,

Why could we not perceive? what dull Divil
Wrought us to cross this noble course, perswading

'T would be his overthrow? 'fore me a Courtier
Is he that knows all, Jaques, and does all,

'Tis as his noble Grace hath often said,
And very wisely, Jaques, we are fools,

And understand just nothing.

Jaq. I, as we were, I confess it.
But rising with our great Master,

We shall be call'd to knowledge with our places,
'Tis nothing to be wise, not thus much there,

There's not the least of the billet dealers,
Nor any of the Pastry, or the Kitchin,

But have it in measure delicate.
Coz. Methinks this greatness of the Dukes my Cozens,

(I ask you mercy, Jaques, that near name is too familiar for me) should give promise
Of some great benefits to his attendants.

Jaq. I have a suit my self, and it is sure,
Or I mistake my ends much.

Coz. What is't Jaques,

May I not crave the place?

Jaq. Yes

Jr. Yes, Sir, you shall,
'Tis to be but his Graces Secretary,
Which is my little all, and my ambition,
Till my known worth shall take me by the hand;
And set me higher; how the fates may do
In this poor thread of life, is yet uncertain;
I was not born I take it for a Trencher,
Nor to espouse my Mistris Dairy-maid.

Couz. I am resolv'd my Wife shall up to Court;
I'll furnish her, that is a speeding courie,
And cannot chuse but breed a mighty fortune;
What a fine youth was I, to let him start,
And get the rise before me? I'll dispatch,
And put my self in Moneys.

Jr. Mafs 'tis true,
And now you talke of Money; Sir, my business
For taking those Crowns must be dispatch:
This little plot in the Countrey lies most fit
To do his Grace such serviceable uses,
I must about it.

Couz. Yet, before you goe,
Give me your hand, and bear my humble service
To the great Duke your Master, and his Duchefs,
And live your self in favor: say my Wife
Shall there attend them shortly, so farewell.

Jr. I'll see you mounted, Sir,

Couz. It may not be,
Your place is far above it, spare your self,
And know I am your servant, fare ye well. Exit Couzen.

Jr. Sir I shall rest to be commanded by you;
This place of Secretary will not content me,
I must be more and greater: let me see;
To be a Baron is no such great matter
As people take it: for say I were a Count,
I am still an under-person to this Duke,
Which methinks sounds but harshly: but a Duke?
O I am strangely taken, 'tis a Duke
Or nothing, I'll advise upon't, and see
What may be done by wit and industry. Exit.

Enter Wife, Longveil, Bewford, Servants.

Wife. It must be carried closely with a care
That no man speak unto him, or come near him,
Without our private knowledge, or be made
Afore-hand to our practise:

My good husband,
I shall entreat you now to stay a while,
And prove a noble coxcomb.
Gentlemen,

Your counsel and advice about this carriage.

Ser. Alas good man, I do begin to mourn
His dire Massacre: what a persecution
Is pouring down upon him? sure he is sinful.

Long. Let him be kept in's chamber under shew
Of state and dignity, and no man suffer'd
To see his noble face, or have access,
But we that are Conspirators. (his Tenants,

Bew. Or else down with him into the Countrey amongst
There he may live far longer in his greatness,
And play the fool in pomp amongst his fellows.

Wife. No, he shall play the fool in the City, and stay,
I will not lose the greatness of this jest,
That shall be given to my wit, for the whole Revenues.

Ser. Then thus wee'll have a guard about his person,
That no man come too near him, and our selves
Always in company; have him into the City
To see his face swell; whilst, in divers corners,
Some of our own appointing shall be ready
To cry heaven blest your Grace, long live your Grace.

Wife. Servant, your counsel's excellent good,
And shall be follow'd, 'twill be rarely strange
To see him stated thus, as though he went
A shroving through the City, or intended

To set up some new Wake:

I shall not hold
From open laughter, when I hear him cry;
Come hither my sweet Duchefs: let me kiss
Thy gracious lips: for this will be his phrases?
I fear me nothing but his legs will break
Under his mighty weight of such a greatness.

Bew. Now me thinks dearest Lady you are too cruel;
His very heart will freeze in knowing this.

Wife. No, no, the man was never of such deepness;
To make conceit his Master: Sir, I'll assure ye
He will out-live twenty such pageants.
Were he but my Cozen, or my Brother,
And such a desperate killer of his fortune,
In this belief he should dye, though it cost me
A thousand Crowns a day to hold it up;
Or were I not known his wife, and so to have
An equal feeling of this ill he suffers,
He should be thustill all the Boyes i'th' Town
Made sute to wear his badges in their hats,
And walk before his Grace with sticks and nose-gayes,
We Married Women hold —

Ser. 'Tis well, no more.
The Duke is entring, set you faces right,
And bow like Countrey Prologues: here he comes.
Make room afore, the Duke is entring.

Enter Duke.

Long. The choicest fortunes wait upon our Duke,
Ser. And give him all content and happiness.

Bew. Let his great name live to the end of time.

Duke. We thank you, and are pleas'd to give you notice
We shall at fitter times wait on your Loves,
Till when, be near Us.

Long. 'Tis a valiant purge, and works extreemly;
'Thas delivered him
Of all Right worshipful and gentle humors,
And left his belly full of nobleness:

Du. It pleased the King my Master,
For sundry vertues not unknown to him,
And the all-seeing state, to lend his hand,
And raise me to this Eminence, how this
May seem to other Men, or stir the minds
Of such as are my fellow Peers, I know not,
I would desire their loves in just designs.

Wife. Now by my faith he does well, very well:
Beshrew my heart I have not seen a better,
Of a raw fellow, that before this day
Never rehearst his state: 'tis marvellous well.

Ser. Is he not Duke indeed, see how he looks
As if his spirit were a last, or two Above his veins, and stretcht his noble hide. (not

Long. Hee's high-brac't like a Drum, pray God he break

Bew. Why let him break, there's but a Calves-skin lost.

Long. May it please your Grace to see the City,
'Twill be to the minds and much contentment
Of the doubtful people,

Du. I am determin'd so, till my return
I leave my honour'd Duchefs to her chamber.
Be careful of your health, I pray you be so.

Ser. Your Grace shall suffer us your humble servants
To give attendance, fit so great a person
Upon your body.

Du. I am pleas'd so.

Long. Away good Bewford, raise a guard sufficient
To keep him from the reach of Tongues, be quick;
And do you hear, remember how the streets
Must be dispos'd with, for cries, and salutations.
Your Grace determines not to see the King —

Du. Not yet, I shall be ready ten dayes hence
To kiss his Highness hand, and give him thanks,
As it is fit I should for his great bounty.
Set forward Gentlemen.

Groom.

Groom. Room for the Duke there. Exeunt Duke and Train.
Wife. 'Tis fit he should have room to shew his mightiness,
 He swells to with his poyson,
 'Tis better to reclaim ye thus, than make
 A sheeps-head of you, It had been but your due ;
 But I have mercy Sir, and mean to reclaim you
 By a directer course.
 That Woman is not worthy of a Soul
 That has the fovereign power to rule her husband,
 And gives her title up, so long provided
 As there be fair play, and his state not wrong'd.

Enter Shattillion.

Shat. I would be glad to know whence this new Duke
 The people buz abroad ; or by what title (springs,
 He receiv'd his dignity, 'tis very strange
 There should be such close jugling in the State,
 But I am ty'd to silence, yet a day
 May come, and soon to perfect all these doubts.

Wife. It is the mad Shattillion by my Soul,
 I suffer much for this poor Gentleman ;
 I'll speak to him, maybe he yet knows me,
Monsieur Shattiliou.

Shat. Can you give me reason from whence
 This great Duke sprang that walks abroad ?

Wife. Even from the King himself.

Shat. As you are a Woman, I think you may be cover'd ?
 Yet your prayer would do no harm good Woman.

Wife. God preserve him.

Enter Shattillions Love.

Shat. I say Amen, and so say all good Subjects.

Love. Lady, as ever you have lov'd, or shall,
 As you have hope of heaven lend your hand,
 And wit, to draw this poor distracted man
 Under your rooffe, from the broad eyes of people,
 And wonder of the streets.

Wife. With all my heart ;
 My feeling of his grief and loss is much.

Love. Sir, now you are come so near the prison, will ye
 Goe in, and visit your fair Love : poor soul
 She would be glad to see you.

Shat. This same Duke is but Apocryphal, there's no creation
 That can stand where titles are not right.

Love. 'Tis true, Sir.

Shat. This is another draught upon my life ;
 Let me examine well the words I spake.
 The words I spake were, that this novel Duke
 Is not o'th' true making, 'tis to me most certain.

Wife. You are as right, Sir, as you went by line.

Shat. And to the grief of many thousands more.

Wife. If there be any such, God comfort them. (please ;

Shat. Whose mouths may open when the time shall
 I'm betray'd, commend me to the King,
 And tell him I am sound, and crave but justice ;
 You shall not need to have your guard upon me,
 Which I am sure are plac'd for my attachment ;
 Lead on ; I'm obedient to my bonds.

Love. Good Sir be not displeas'd with us ;
 We are but servants to his Highness will,
 To make that good.

Shat. I do forgive you even with my heart ;
 Shall I entreat a favor ?

Wife. Any thing.

Shat. To see my love before that fatal stroak,
 And publish to the world my christian death,
 And true obedience to the Crown of France.

Love. I hope it shall not need Sir, for there is mercy
 As well as Justice in his Royal heart.

Exeunt.

Enter three Gentlemen.

1 Gent. Every man take his corner, here am I,
 You there, and you in that place, so be perfect,
 Have a great care your cries be loud ; and faces
 Full of dejected fear and humbleness.
 He comes.

Enter Jaques.

Ja. Fye, how these streets are charg'd and swell'd
 With these same rascally people ? give more room,
 Or I shall have occasion to distribute
 A martial almes amongst you ; as I am a Gentleman
 I have not seen such rude disorder,
 They follow him like a prize, there's no true gaper
 Like to your Citizen, he will be sure
 The Beares shall not pass by his door in peace,
 But he and all his family will follow.
 Room there afore : Sound :

Enter Duke and his company.

Ja. Give room, and keep your places,
 And you may see enough ; keep your places.

Long. These people are too far unmanner'd, thus
 To stop your Graces way with multitudes.

Du. Rebuke them not, good Monsieur, 'tis their loves
 Which I will answer, if it please my stars
 To spare me life and health.

2 Gen. Bless your Grace.

Du. And you with all my heart.

1 Gen. Now heaven preserve your happy dayes :

Du. I thank you too.

3. Gen. Now Heaven save your Grace ;

Du. I thank you all.

Bew. On there before.

Du. Stand Gentlemen, stay yet a while.

For I am minded to impart my love
 To these good people, and my friends,
 Whose love and prayers for my greatness,
 Are equal in abundance, note me well,
 And with my words ; my heart ? for as the Tree——
Long. Your Grace had best beware, 'twill be inform'd
 Your greatness with the people.

Duke. I had more,
 My honest, and ingenious people.—— But
 The weight of business hath prevented me.
 I am call'd from you : but this tree I spake of Shall bring forth fruit, I hope, to your content,
 And so I share my bowels amongst you all.

Omnes. A noble Duke, a very noble Duke.

Enter a Gentleman.

Ser. Afore there Gentlemen.

Gen. You'r faithfully met good Monsieur Mount Marine.

Ser. Be advis'd, the time is alter'd.

Gen. Is he not the same man he was afore ?

Duke. Still the same man to you, Sir.

Long. You have received mighty Grace, be thankful.

Gen. Let me not dye in ignorance ;

Long. You shall not.

Then know, the King out of his love, hath pleas'd
 To stile him Duke of Burgundy.

Gen. O great Duke,

Thus low, I plead for pardon, and desire
 To be enrol'd amongst your poorest slaves.

Du. Sir, you have mercy, and withal my hand,
 From henceforth let me call you one of mine.

Ser. Make room afore there, and dismiss the people.

Du. Every Man to his house in peace and quiet. (Duke.

Peop. Now heaven preserve the Duke, heaven bless the Exeunt Omnes.

Enter

Enter Wife.

Wife. This Letter came this morn from my Cofin
To the great Lady, high and mighty Duchefs
Of Burgundy, be thefe delivered. Oh,
For a ftronger lace to keep my breath
That I may laugh the nine days till the wonder
Fall to an ebb: the high and mighty Duchefs?
The high and mighty God? what a ftile is this?
Methinks it goes like a Duchy lope-man,
A ladder of 100 rounds will fail
To reach the top on't: well my gentle Cofin
I know by thefe contents, your itch of honor;
You muft to the Court you fay, and very shortly:
You fhall be welcome, and if your wife have wit
I'll put her in a thriving courfe, if not
Her own fin on her own head not a blot
Shall ftain my reputation, only this
I muft for healths fake fometimes make an aſs
Of the tame moil my Husband; 'twill do him good,
And give him freſher brains, Me freſher blood.
Now for the noble Duke, I hear him coming.

Enter Duke, his train.

Your Grace is well return'd.

Duke. As well as may be:
Never in younger health, never more able:
I mean to be your bed-fellow this night,
Let me have good encounter,

Bew. Bleſs me heaven
What a hot meat this greatneſs is?

Long. It may be fo,
For I'll be ſworn he hath not got a ſnap
This two months on my knowledge, or her woman
Is damn'd for ſwearing it

Duke. I thank you Gentlemen for your attendance
And alfo your great pains, pray know my Lodgings
Better and oftner, do fo Gentlemen.

Now by my honor, as I am a Prince,
I ſpeak ſincerely, know my lodgings better;
And be not ſtrangers, I ſhall ſee your ſervice
And your deſervings, when you leaſt expect.

Om. We humbly thank your grace for this great favor.

Du. Jaques?

Jaq. Your Grace.

Du. Be ready for the Countrey,
And let my Tenants know the Kings great love:
Say I would ſee them, but the weight at Court
Lies heavy on my ſhoulders: let them know
I do expect their duties in attendance
Againſt the next feaſt, wait for my coming
To take up Poſt-horſe, and be full of ſpeed.

Exit Jaq.

Wife. I would deſire your Grace——

Du. You ſhall deſire, and have your Full deſire: ſweet Duchefs ſpeak.

Wife. To have ſome conference with a Gentleman
That ſeems not altogether void of reaſon.
Hetalks of Titles, and things near the Crown,
And knowing none ſo fit as your Grace,
To give the difference in ſuch points of State——

Du. What is he? if he be noble, or have any part
That's worthy our converſe, we do accept him.

Wife. I can aſſure your Grace, his ſtrain is noble,
But he's very ſubtle.

Duke. Let him be ſo.

Let him have all the brains, I ſhall demonſtrate
How this moſt Chriſtian Crown of France can bear
No other ſhew of Title than the Kings.
I will go in and meditate for half an hour,
And then be ready for him preſently,
I will convert him quickly, or confound him.

Serv. Is mad Shattillion here?

Wife. Is here, and's Lady,

I prethee ſervant fetch him hither.

Serv. Why, what do you mean to put him to?

Wife. To chat with the mad lad my Husband;
'Twill be brave to hear them ſpeak, babble,
ſtare, and prate.

Bew. But what ſhall be the end of all this, Lady?

Enter Shattillion and Lady.

Wife. Leave that to me, now for the grand diſpute,
For ſee, here comes Shattillion: as I live, methinks
All France ſhould bear part of his griefs.

Long. I'll fetch my Lord the Duke.

Shat. Where am I now, or whether will you lead me?
To my death? I crave my priviledge,
I muſt not dye, but by juſt courſe or Law.

Serv. His Majesty hath ſent by me your pardon,
He meant not you ſhould dye; but would intreat you
To lay the full ſtate of your Title open,
Unto a grave and Noble Gentleman.

Enter Duke and Longovile.

The Duke of Burgundy who here doth come,
Who, either by his wiſdom will confute you,
Or elſe inform and ſatiſſie the King.

Bew. May't pleaſe your grace, this is the Gentleman,
Duke. Is this he that chops Logick with my Liege?

Shat. D'ye mock me? you are great, the time will come,
When you ſhall be as much contemn'd as I,
Where are the antient compliments of France,
The upstarts brave the Princes of the blood?

Duke. Your Title Sir, in ſhort.

Shat. He muſt Sir,
Be a better States-man than your ſelf, that can Trip me in any thing, I will not ſpeak
Before theſe witneſſes.

Duke. Depart the room, for none ſhall ſtay,
No, not my deareſt Duchefs.

Wife. We'll ſtand behind the Arras and hear all. Exeunt.

Duke. In that chair take your place, I in this,
Diſcourſe your Title now.

Shat. Sir, you ſhall know,
My Loves true Title, mine by Marriage,
Setting aſide the firſt race of French Kings,
Which will not here concern us, as Pharamond,
With Clodian, Meroveus, and Chilperick,
And to come down unto the ſecond Race,
Which we will likewise ſlip——

Duke. But take me with you:

Shat. I pray you give me leave, of Martel Charles,
The Father of King Pippin, who was, Sire
To Charles the Great, and famous Charlemain.
And to come to the third Race of French Kings,
Which will not be greatly pertinent in this cauſe,
Betwixt the King and me, of which you know
HUGH CAPEI was the firſt,
Next his Son Robert, Henry then, and Philip
With Lewis, and his Son a Lewis too,
And of that name the Seventh, but all this Springs from a Female, as it ſhall appear.

Duke. Now give me leave, I grant you this your Title
At the firſt ſight, carries ſome ſhew of truth;
But if ye weigh it well, ye ſhall find light.
Is not his Majesty poſſeſt in peace,
And juſtice executed in his name,
And can you think the moſt Chriſtian King
Would do this if he ſaw not reaſon for it?

Shat. But had not the Tenth Lewis a ſole Daughter?

Duke. I cannot tell.

Shat. But answer me directly.

Duke. It is a moſt ſeditious queſtion.

o o

Shat.

Shut. Is this your justice?

Duke. I stand for my King.

Shut. Was ever Heir-apparant thus abus'd?

I'll have your head for this.

Duke. Why, do your worst.

Shut. Will no one stir to apprehend this Traitor?

A guard about my person, will none come?

Must my own royal hands perform the deed?

Then thus I do arrest you.

Duke. Treason, help.

Enter Wife, Long, Bew. and Serv.

Wife. Help, help, my Lord and Husband.

Duke. Help the Duke.

Long. Forbear his grace's person.

Shut. Forbear you to touch him that

Your Heir-apparant weds,

But by this hand, I will have all your heads.

Exit.

Serv. How doth your Grace?

Duke. Why? well.

Serv. How do you find his Title?

Duke. 'Tis a dangerous one,

As can come by a female.

Serv. I, 'tistrue,

But the Law Salique cuts him off from all.

Long. I do beseech your Grace, how stands his Title?

Duke. Pew, nothing; the Law Salique cuts him off from all.

Wife. My gracious Husband, you must now prepare,

In all your Graces pomp to entertain

Your Cofin, who is now a convertite,

And follows here, this night he will be here.

Duke. Be ready all in haste, I do intend,

To shew before my Cofin's wondring face,

The greatness of my pomp, and of my place.

Exeunt omnes.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Cofin and his Wife.

Cof. Sirrah, is all things carried to the Tailor?
The measure, and the fashion of the Gown,
With the best trim?

Man. Yes Sir, and 'twill be ready within this two days.

Cof. For my self I care not,

I have a suit or two of antient Velvet;

Which with some small correcting and addition,

May steal into the presence.

(life,

Wife. Would my Gown were ready, Husband, I'll lay my

To make you something e'r to-morrow night.

Cof. It must not be

Before we see the Duke, and have advice,

How to behave our selves: lets in the while,

And keep our selves from knowledge, till time shall call us.

Enter Long and Bew.

Long. I much admire the fierce masculine spirit,
Of this dread Amazon.

Bew. This following night I'll have a wench in solace.

Long. Sir, I hear you,

And will be with you if I live, no more.

Enter Maria.

Ma. My Lady would intreat your presence, Gentlemen.

Bew. We will obey your Lady, she is worthy.

Long. You, light alone, a word, or two.

Ma. Your Will, Sir.

(thou marry?

Long. Hark in your ear; wilt thou be married? speak, wilt

Ma. Married? to whom Sir?

Long. To a proper fellow, landed, and able bodied,

Ma. Why do you flout me, Sir?

(free?

Long. I swear I do not; I love thee for thy Ladies sake, be

Ma. If I could meet such matches as you speak of,

I were a very child to lose my time, Sir.

Long. What saist thou to Monsieur Bemford?

Ma. Sir, I say he's a proper Gentleman, and far Above my means to look at.

Long. Dost thou like him?

Ma. Yes Sir, and ever did.

Long. He is thine own.

Ma. You are too great in promises.

Long. Be rul'd, and follow my advice, he shall be thine

Ma. Would you would make it good, Sir.

Long. Do but thus,

Get thee a cushion underneath thy cloaths,
And leave the rest to me.

Ma. I'll be your scholar,

I cannot lose much by the venture sure,

Long. Thou wilt lose a pretty maidenhead, my rogue,

Or I am much o'th' bow hand, you'll remember

if all this take effect, who did it for you?

And what I may deserve for such a kindness.

Ma. Yours Sir.

Exeunt.

Enter Jaques and Shattillion severally.

Jaq. Save ye Sir.

Shat. Save the King.

Jaq. I pray you Sir, which is the nearest way.

Shat. Save the King, this is the nearest way.

Jaq. Which is the nearest way to the Post-house?

Shat. God save the King and his Post-house.

Jaq. I pray Sir direct me to the house;

Shat. Heaven save the King, you cannot catch me, Sir.

Jaq. I do not understand you, Sir.

Shat. You do not, I say you cannot catch me, Sir.

Jaq. Not catch you, Sir?

Shat. No Sir, nor can the King,

With all his stratagems, and his forced tricks,

Although he put his Nobles in disguise;

Never so oft to sift into my words,

By course of Law, lay hold upon my life.

Jaq. It is business that my Lord the Duke
Is by the King employed in, and he thinks
I am acquainted with it.

Shat. I shall not need to rip the cause up,
From the first, to you,

But if his Majesty had suffer'd me

To marry her, though she be after him,

The right heir general to the Crown of France.

I would not have convey'd her into Spain,

As it was thought, nor would I e'er have joyn'd,

With the reformed Churches, to make them,

Stand for my cause.

Jaq. I do not think you would.

Shat. I thank you Sir,

And since I see you are a favourer

Of virtues, kept in bondage;

Tell directly to my sovereign King,

For so I will acknowledge him for ever,

How you have found my staid affections

Setled for peace, and for the present state.

Jaq. Why Sir?

Shat. And good Sir, tell him further this,

That notwithstanding all suggestions

Brought to him against me, and all his suspicions,

Which are innumerable to my treasons,

If he will warrant me but public trial,

I'll freely yeild my self into his hands;

Can he have more than this?

Jaq. No by my troth.

Shat. I would his Majesty would hear but reason,

As well as you.

Jaq. But Sir, you do mistake me,
For I never saw the King.
In all my life but once, therefore good Sir,
May it please you to shew me which is the Post-house.

Sba. I cry you mercy, Sir, then you are my friend.

Jaq. Yes Sir.

Sba. And such men are very rare with me,
The Post-house is hard by, farewell;

Jaq. I thank you, Sir, I must ride hard to night,
And it is dark already.

Sba. I am cruel, to send this man directly to his death
That is my friend, and I might easily save him,
He shall not dye, come back, my friend, come back.

Jaq. What is your Will?

Sba. Do you not know?

Jaq. Not I.

Sba. And do you gather nothing by my face?

Jaq. No Sir.

Sba. Virtue is ever innocent,
Lay not the fault on me, I grieve for you,
And wish that all my tears might win your safety.

Jaq. Why Sir?

Sba. Alas good friend you are undone,
The more ill fortune, mine to be the means
Of your sad overthrow, you know not me.

Jaq. No truly Sir.

Sba. Would you had never seen me,
I am a man pursu'd by the whole state
And sure some one hath seen me talk with you.

Jaq. Yes, divers Sir.

Sba. Why then your head is gone.

Jaq. I'll out of town.

Sba. Would it were soon enough,
Stay if you love your life, or else you are taken.

Jaq. What shall I do?

Sba. I'll venture deeply for him,
Rather than to cast away an innocent,
Take courage friend, I will preserve thy life;
With hazard of mine own.

Jaq. I thank you, Sir.

Sba. This night thou shalt be lodg'd within my doors,
Which shall be all lock'd fast, and in the morn
I'll so provide, you shall have free access,
To the Sea-side, and so be shipt away,
E'r any know it.

Jaq. Good Sir, suddainly, I am afraid to dye.

Sba. Then follow me.

Exeunt.

Enter Shatillion's Love.

Love. This way he went, and there's the house, I hope,
His better Angel hath directed him,
To leave the wandring streets, poor Gentleman.
Would I were able with as free a heart,
To set his soul right, as I am to grieve,
The ruine of his fame, which God forgive me;
Sir, if you be within, I pray Sir speak to me.

Sba. I am within, and will be; what are you?

Love. A friend.

Sba. No Sir, you must pardon me,
I am acquainted with none such: bespeedy,
Friend, there is no other remedy.

Love. A word Sir, I say, I am your friend.

Sba. You cannot scape by any other means,
Be not fearful, God save the King,
What's your business, Sir?

Love. To speak with you.

Sba. Speak out then?

Love. Shall I not come up?

Sba. Thou shalt not: flie if thou be'st thine own friend,
There lies the fuit and all the furniture
Belonging to the head, on with it friend!

Love. Sir do you hear?

Sba. I do, God blefs the King,
It was a habit I had laid aside,
For my own person, if the state had forced me.

Love. Good Sir, unlock your door.

Sba. Be full of speed, I see some 20 Musquetiers in ambush
Whate'r thou art, know I am here and will be,
Seelt thou this bloody sword that cries revenge?
Shake not my friend, through millions of these foes
I'll be thy guard, and set thee safe aboard.

Love. Dare you not trust me, Sir?

Sba. My good sword before me,
And my allegiance to the King I tell thee
Captain (for so I ghes thee by thy Arms)
And the loose flanks of Halberdiers about thee,
Thou art too weak, and foolish to attempt me.
If you be ready, follow me, and hark you
Upon your life speak to no living wight,
Except my self.

Love Monsieur Shattillion?

Sba. Thou shalt not call agen; thus with my sword,
And the strong faith I bear unto the King;
Whom God preserve, I will defend my chamber,
And cut thy throat, I swear I'll cut thy throat,
Steal after me and live.

Love. I will not stay.

The fury of a man so far distracted.

Exit Love.

Enter Shattillion.

Where's the Officer that dares not enter,
To intrap the life of my distressed friend?
I, have you hid your self? you must be found,
What do you fear? is not authority on your side
Nay, I know the Kings command
Will be your warrant, why then fear you? speak
What strange designs are these? Shattillion,
Be resolute and bear thy self upright,
Though the whole world despite thee: soft, methinks.
I heard a rushing which was like the shake
Of a discovered Officer, I'll search
The whole street over, but I'll find thee out.

Exit.

Enter Jaques in womans apparel.

Jaq. How my joynts do shake, where had I been
But for this worthy Gentleman, that Hath some touch of my infortunes; would I were Safe under hatches once, for Callicut,
Farewel the pomp of Court, I never more
Can hope to be a Duke or any thing,
I never more shall see the glorious face
Of my fair spreading Lord that lov'd me well.

Enter Shattillion.

Sbat. Fly you so fast? I had a fight of you,
But would not follow you; I was too wise,
You shall not lead me with a cunning trick;
Where you may catch me; poor Shattillion;
Hath the Kings anger left thee never a friend?
No, all mens loves move by the breath of Kings.

Jaq. It is the Gentleman that sav'd my life, Sir.

Sbat. Blefs Shattillion, another plot.

Jaq. No Sir, 'tis I.

Sbat. Why, who are you?

Jaq. Your friend whom you preserv'd.

Sbat. Whom I preserv'd?

My friend? I have no woman friend but one,
Who is too close in prison to be here;
Come near, let me look on you.

Jaq. 'Tis I.

Sbat. You should not be a woman by your stature.

Jaq. I am none, Sir.

Sbat. I know it, then keep off,

O o 2

Strange

Strange men and times! how I am still preserv'd?
Here they have sent a yoman of the guard,
Disguis'd in womans clothes, to work on me,
To make love to me, and to trap my words,
And to inhare my life, I know you, Sir,
Stand back, upon your peril, can this be
In Christian Common-weals, from this time forth
I'll cut off all the means to work on me,
I'll ne'er stir from my house: and keep my doors
Lockt day and night, and cheapen meat and drink
At the next shops by Signs, out of my window,
And having bought it, draw it up in my garters.

Jaq. Sir, will you help me?

Shat. Do not follow me,

I'll take a course to live, despite of men. Exit Shat.

Jaq. He dares not venture for me, wretched Jaq.!

Thou art undone for ever and for ever,
Never to rise again? what shall I do?

Enter Bewfort.

Where shall I hide me? here's one to take me,
I must stand close, and not speak for my life.

Bew. This is the time of night, and this the haunt,
In which I use to catch my Wastcoaters,
It is not very dark, no, I shall spie 'em,
I have walk't out in such a pitchy night.
I could not see my fingers this far off.

And yet have brought home venison by the finell,
I hope they have not left their old walk, ah?
Have I spied you sitting by this light?

To me there's no such fine sight in the world,

As a white apron 'twixt twelve and one;

See how it glisters? do you think to scape?

So now I have you fast; come, and do not strive,

It takes away the edge of appetite;

Come, I'll be liberal every way.

Exeunt.

Take heed you make no noise, for waking of the Watch,

Enter Cofin and his Wife.

Cof. Now the blessing of some happy guide,
To bring us to the Duke, and we are ready.

Enter Long. and Servant,

Come forward, see the door is open'd,
And two of his Gent. I'll speak to them,
And mark how I behave my self, God save ye;
For less I cannot wish to men of sort, and of your seeming:
Are you of the Dukes?

Long. We are, Sir, and your servants, your salutes,
We give you back again with many thanks.

Cof. When did you hear such words before Wife? peace,
Do you not dare to answer yet; is't fit
So mean a Gentleman as my self should crave,
The presence of the great Duke your Master?

Serv. Sir you may.

Long. Shall we desire your name, and business, Sir?
And we will presently inform him of you,

Cof. My name is Cleremont.

Serv. You are his Graces kinsman,
Or I am much mistaken?

Cof. You are right,

Some of his noble blood runs through these veins,
Though far unworthy of his graces knowledge.

Long. Sir, we must all be yours; his graces kinsman,
And we so much forgetful? 'twas a rudeness,
And must attend your pardon, thus I crave it:
First to this beauteous Lady, whom I take
To be your Wife, Sir, next your mercy.

Cof. You have it, Sir, I do not like this kissing,
It lies so open to a world of wishes.

Serv. This is the merry fellow; this is he

That must be noble too.

Long. And so he shall.

If all the Art I have can make him noble,
I'll dub him with a Knight-hood; if his wife
Will be but forward, and joyn issue,
I like her above excellent.

Serv. Will't please you

To walk a turn or two, whilst to the Duke
We make your coming known? Exit Serv. and Long

Cof. I shall attend, Sir.

Wife. These Gentlemen are very proper men,
And kiss the best that e'er I tasted.

For goodness-fake husband, let us never more
Come near the Countrey, whatsoever betide us;
I am in malice with the memory
Of that same stinking dung-hil.

Cof. Why now you are my chicken and my dear,
Love where I love, hate where I hate: now
You shall have twenty Gowns, and twenty Chains,
See, the door is opening.

Groom. Room afore there, the Duke is entring.

Enter Duke, Wife, Long. Servant, Maria.

Cof. 'Tis the Duke, even he himself, be merry,
This is the golden age the Poet speaks on.

Wife. I pray it be not brazen'd by their faces,
And yet methinks they are the neatest Pieces
For shape, and cutting that e'er I beheld.

Cof. Most gracious Duke, my poor Spouse and my self,
Do kiss your mighty foot, and next to that
The great hand of your Dutcheffs, ever wishing
Your honors ever springing, and your years.

Duke. Cofin?

Cof. Your Graces vassal, far unworthy
The nearness of your blood.

Duke. Correct me not, I know the word I speak,
And know the person.

Though I be something higher than the place
Where common men have motion, and descending
Down with my eye, their forms are lessened to me;
Yet from this pitch can I behold my own,
From millions of those men that have no mark,
And in my fearful stoop, can make them stand,
When others feel my feet, and perish: Cofin,
Be comforted, you are very welcome, so
Is your fair Wife: the charge of whom I give
To my own dearest, and best beloved.
Tell me, you have resolv'd your self for Court,
And utterly renounc'd the slavish Countrey,
With all the cares thereof?

Cof. I have, Sir.

Duke. Have you dismiss'd your eating household,
Sold your hangings of Nebuchadnezar, for such they were,
As I remember, with the Furnitures
Belonging to your Beds and Chambers?

Cof. I Sir.

Duke. Have you most carefully ta'en off the Lead,
From you roof, weak with age, and so prevented
The ruin of your house, and clapt him
In a summer suit of thatch to keep him cool

Cof. All this I have perform'd.

Duke. Then lend me all your hands, I will embrace my Cofin
Who is an understanding Gentleman,
And with a zeal mighty, as is my name,
Once more I bid you welcome to the Court;
My state again.

Duch. As I was telling you, your Husband
Must be no more Commander, look to that,
Be severd at meat, and lodging, let him have Board-wages, and Diet, 'mongst his men i' th' Town
For pleasure, if he be given to't, let him have it,
Else as your own fancy shall direct you.

Cofin, you see this mighty man here: he was an ass

When

When he came first to Town: indeed he was Just such another coxcomb as your Husband,
God bless the mark, and every good mans child!
This must not stir you Cofin.

Wif. Heaven forbid?

Long. Sweet Maria; provide the cushion ready for it.

Mar. It shall be done.

Duke. Receive all your advices from our self,
Be once a day with us, and so farewell
For this time, my fair Cofin, Gentlemen
Conduct him to his Lodging.

Duch. Farewel, and think upon my words.

Wife. I shall observe them. Exit Duke and Duchs.

Cof. Health, and the Kings continual love, attend you.

Serv. Oh for a private place to ease my Lungs!

Heaven give me patience, such a pair of jades
Were never better ridden to this hour,
Pray heaven they hold out to the journeys end.

Long. Twitch him aside good Monsieur, whilst I break
Upon the body of his strength, his wife,
I have a constant promise: she is my own.

Serv. Ply her to wind-ward Monsieur, you have taken
The most compendious way to raise your self,
That could have been delivered by a Counsel.

Cof. I have some certain aims, Sir: but my wife——

Serv. Your wife, you must not let that trouble you.

Cof. It will Sir, to see her in a strangers arms.

Serv. What mean you? let her alone, be wife, stir not a foot
For if you do, all your hopes are buried:
I swear you are a lost man if you stir.

Cof. I thank you Sir, I will be more advis'd.

Serv. But what great Office do you level at?

Cof. Sir, they are kissing

Serv. Let them kiss,

And much may do their good hearts; they must kiss
And kiss, and double kiss, and kiss again,
Or you may kiss the post for any rising:
Had your noble kinsman ever mounted
To these high Spheres of honor, now he moves in,
But for the kisses of his wife?

Cof. I know not

Serv. Then I do; credit me, he had been lost,
A fellow of no mark, and no repute.

Had not his wife kist soon, and very sweetly:
She was an excellent woman, and dispatcht him
To his full being, in a moment, Sir— Exit Long. and Wife.

Cof. But yet methinks he would not take her, Sir,
Into a private room.

Serv. Now stand and flourish,
You are a mads man for ever.

I do envy you if you stand your fortunes up,
You are the happiest man, but your great Cofin,
This day in Court: well, I will marry surely,
And not let every man out-run me thus.
'Tis time to be mine own friend, I live
In town here, and direct the readiest way,
To other men, and be a slave my self.

Cof. Nay, good Sir be not mov'd, I am your servant,
And will not be ungrateful for this knowledge.

Serv. Will you be walking home?

Cof. I would desire to have my wife along.

Serv. You are too raw,
Begone, and take no notice where you left her,
Let her return at leisure. if she stay
A month, 'twill be the better, understand me
This Gentleman can do't. Exit Cofin.

Cof. I will Sir, and wife remember me, a Duke, a Duke wife.

Serv. Aboard her Longaveile, she's thine own,
To me the fooling of this fool is venery. Exit Servant.

Enter Bewford and Jaques.

Bew. Come, prethee come, have I not crowns? behold
And follow me, here; not a word, go in

Grope by the walls, and you shall find a bed,
Lie down there, see, see, a turn or two, to give
My blood some heats, and I am presently
For action: darknets, by thy leave, I come. Exit Bew.

Enter Maria.

Ma. I am perfect in my lesson, be my speed,
Thou god of marriage, this is the door, I'll knock.

Bew. within. Whole there, I cannot come yet.

Ma. Monsieur Bewford?

Bew. Stay till I light a candle, who are ye?

Ma. Sir? a poor Gentlewoman.

Enter Bewford.

Bew. Oh come in, I'll find a time for you too, be not loud.

Ma. Sir, you have found that time already, shame
On my soul therefore.

Bew. Why? what's the matter?

Ma. Do you not see, Sir, is your light so dim?

Bew. Do you not wait on the Lady Mount Marine?

Ma. I do Sir, but my love on you.

Bew. Poor soul! how cam'st thou by this big belly?

Ma. By your self.

Bew. By heaven I ne'er touch'd your body.

Ma. Yes, unswear that oath again, I'll tell you all;
These two years I have lov'd you, but the means
How to enjoy you, I did never know
Till Twelf-night last, when hearing of your game
To take up wenches private in the night,
I apprehended straight this course to make
My self as one of them, and wait your coming;
I did so. and enjoyed you, and now this child
That now is quick within me, hide my shame,
And marry me, or else I must be forc'd ——

Long. within. Monsieur Bewford, Monsieur Bewford.

Bew. Whose that calls?

Long. Are you a bed?

Bew. No Sir, the hangings.

Enter Longaveil.

Long. Nay Monsieur, I'll forbid that, we'll have fair play,
Lend me your candle, are you taken Bewford?

A lecher of your practice, and close carriage
To be discovered thus? I am asham'd
So great a master in his art should fail,
And stagger in his grounds.

Bew. You're wide,

This woman and my self are man and wife,
And have been so this half year,
Where are you now? have I been discover'd?
You cannot break so easily on me, Sir,
I am too wary to be open'd by you.

Long. But these are but illusions. to give colour
To your most mystick leachery, but Sir,
The belly hath betray'd you all, it must out.

Bew. Good Longaveil believe me on my faith,
I am her husband.

Long. On my faith I cannot, unless I saw
Your hands fast, and your hearts.

Bew. Why Longaveil, when did I give that to your ears,
That was not truth? by all the world she's mine,
She is my wife, and to confirm you better
I give myself again, here take my hand
And I yours, we are once more married,
Will this content you?

Long. Yes I am believing, and God give you joy.

Bew. My loving wife, I will not wrong thee,
Since I am thine and only loved of thee
From this hour I vow my self a new man,
Be not jealous: for though I had a purpose,
To have spent an hour or two in solace otherwise,

And

And was provided for it, yet my love
Shall put a better temper to my blood,
Come out thou woman of unwholsome life,
Be sorry for thy sins, and learn to mend,
Nay, never hide your face, you shall be seen.

Long. Jaques, why Jaques, art thou that Jaques,
The very staffe, and right hand of our Duke?
Speak, thou bearded Venus.

Jac. I am he, by miracle preserv'd to be that Jaques,
Within this two hours Gentlemen, poor Jaques
Was but as coarse in grave: a man of wisdom,
That of my conscience, if he had his right
Should have a pretty State, but that's all one
That Noble Gentleman did save this life,
I keep it for him, 'tis his own. (the Duke)

Long. Oh Bacchus! is all the world drunk? come we'll to
And give thanks for this delivery.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Duke and Jaques.

Duke. NOT gone unto my Tenants to relate
My Grace and Honor; the mightiness
Of my new name, which would have struck a terror
Through their course doublets, to their very hearts?

Jac. Alas, great Lord and Master, I could scarce
With safety of my life return again
Unto your graces house, and but for one
That had some mercy, I had sure been hang'd.

Duke. My house?

Jac. Yes Sir, this house, your house i' th' Town.

Duke. Jaques we are displeas'd, hath it no name?

Jac. What name?

Duke. Dull rogue; what hath the King bestow'd
So many honors, open'd all his springs,
And show'red his graces down upon my head,
And has my house no name? no title yet?
Burgundy house you as.

Jac. Your graces mercy,
And when I was come off, and had recover'd
Burgundy house, I durst not yet be seen,
But lay all night for fear of pursuivants
In Burgundy privie house.

Duke. Oh Sir, 'tis well,
Can you remember now? but Jaques know
Since thy intended journey is so cross,
I will go down my self this morning.

Jac. Sir?

Duke. Have I not said this morning?

Jac. But consider,

That nothing is prepared yet for your journey,
Your graces teams not here to draw your cloaths;
And not a Carrier yet in town to send by.

Duke. I say once more go about it,
You're a wise man, you'd have me linger time,
Till I have worn these cloaths out: will ye go? Ex. Jac.
Make ye ready Wife

Enter Wife.

Duc. I am so, mighty Duke.

Duke. Nay, for the Country.

Duc. How? for the Country?

Duke. Yes I am resolv'd to see my Tenants in this bravery,
Make them a sumptuous feast, with a slight shew,
Of Dives and Lazarus, and a squib or two,
And so return.

Duc. Why Sir? you are not mad? (speak.)

Duke. How many Dukes have ye known mad? I pray

Duc. You are the first, Sir, and I hope the last,
But you are stark horn-mad.

Duke. Forbear good wife.

Duc. As I have faith you're mad: your horns
Have been too heavy for you, and have broke
Your skull in pieces: If you be in earnest.

Duke. Well, you shall know my skull and wits are whole
E'r I have done, and yet I am in earnest.

Duc. Why, do you think I'll go?

Duke. I know you shall.

Duc. I shall? by what authority shall I?

Duke. I am your Husband.

Duc. True, I confess it,
And by that name, the world hath given you
A power to sway me; but Sir, you shall know
There is a greater bond that ties me here,
Allegeance to the King, has he not heapt
Those honors on you to no other end,
But to stay you here, and shall I have a hand
In the offending such a gracious Prince?
Besides, our own undoings lies upon't,
Were there no other cause, I do not see,
Why you should go: If I should say you should not.

Duke. Do you think so?

Duc. Yes faith.

Duke. Now good wife make me understand that point.

Duc. Why that you shall, did I not bring you hither?

Duke. Yes. (fire by me?)

Duc. And were not all these honors wrought out of the Duke. By you?

Duc. By me? how strange you make it?
When you came first, did you not walk the Town,
In a long Cloak half compass? an old Hat,
Lin'd with Vellure, and on it for a band,
A skein of crimson Cruil?

Duke. I confess it.

Duc. And took base courses?

Duke. Base? (strous base.)

Duc. Base, by this light, extream base, and scurvie, mon-

Duke. What were these courses, wife?

Duc. Why, you shall know,
Did you not thus attir'd, trot up and down,
Plotting for vild and lowlie Offices,
And agreed with the Sergeant of the Bears,
To buy his place? deny this, if you can.

Duke. Why it is true.

Duc. And was not that monstrous base?

Duke. Be advis'd wife, a Bear's a Princely beast.

Duc. A Bear?

Duke. Yes wife, and one side venison.

Duc. You're more than one side fool, I am sure of that.

Duke. But since you have vex't me wife, know you shall go,
Or you shall never have penny from me.

Duc. Nay, I have done, and though I know 'twill be Your overthrow, I'll not forsake you now.

Duke. Be ready then.

Exit Duke.

Duc. I will.

Enter Bewf. Long, Serv. Maria.

Long. What are you married Bewford? can make us.

Bewf. I, as fast as words, and hearts, and hands, and Priest

Duc. Oh Gentlemen, we are undone.

Long. For what?

Duc. This Gentleman, the Lord of Lorgue, my Husband,
Will be gone down to shew his play-fellows
Where he is gay.

Bewf. What, down into Countrey?

Duc. Yes faith, was ever fool but he so cross?

I would as fain be gracious to him,
As he could wish me, but he will not let me;
Speak faithfully, will he deserve my mercy?

Long. According to his merits he should wear,
A guarded coat, and a great wooden dagger.

Duch.

Duc. If there be any woman that doth know,
The duties 'twixt a Husband and his wife,
Will speak but one word for him, he shall scape;
Is not that reasonable? but there's none,
Be ready therefore, to pursue the plot
We had against a pinch, for he must stay.

Long. Wait you here for him, whilst I go
And make the King acquainted with your sport,
For fear he be incens'd for our attempting Places of so great honor.

Exit Long.

Duc. Go, be speedy.

Enter Duke, Cosin, Wife, Jaques, Man.

Duke. Come let me see how all things are dispos'd of.

Jaq. One Cart will serve for all your furniture,
With room enough behind to ease the Footman,
A capcase for you linnen, and your plate,
With a strange lock that opens with Amen,
For my young Lord, because of easie portage,
A quiver of your graces lin'd with Cunney,
Made to be hang'd about the Nurfes neck,
Thus, with a Scarfe or Towel.

Duke. Very good.

Jaq. Nay, 'tis well, but had you staid another week,
I would have had you furnisht, in such pomp,
As never Duke of Burgundy was furnisht,
You should have had a Sumpter, though 't had cost me
The laying on my self, where now you are fain,
To hire a Rippers mare, and buy new doffers,
But I have got them painted with your Arms,
With a fair darnex Carpet of my own
Laid cros for the more state.

Duke. Jaques I thank you: your Carpet shall be brusht
And sent you home; what, are you ready wife?

Duc. An hour ago.

Duke. I cannot chuse but kiss thy royal Lips,
Dear Duchess mine, thou art so good a woman.

Bew. You'd say so if you knew all, goodman Duckling.

Cof. This was the happiest fortune could befall me
Now in his absence will I follow close
Mine own preferment, and I hope e'r long,
To make my mean and humble name so strong,
As my great Cosins, when the world shall know,
I bear too hot a spirit to live low.
The next Spring will I down, my wife and houshold,
I'll have my Ushers, and my four Lacquies,
Six spare Caroches too, but mum, no more,
What I intend to do, I'll keep in store.

Duke. Mountey, mountey, Jaques, be our Querry.

Groom. To horse there Gentlemen, and fall in couples.

Duke. Come honoured Duchess.

Enter Longavile.

Long. Stand thou proud man.

Duke. Thieves, Jaques, raise the people.

Long. No, raise no people, 'tis the Kings command,
Which bids thee once more stand, thou haughty man,
Thou art a monster, for thou art ungrateful,
And like a fellow of a rebel nature,
Hast flung from his embraces: and for
His honors given thee, hast not return'd
So much as thanks, and to oppose his Will,
Resolv'd to leave the Court, and set the Realm
A fire, in discontent, and open action:
Therefore he bids thee stand, thou proud man,
Whilst with the whisking of my sword about,
I take thy honors off: this first sad whisk
Takes off thy Dukedom, thou art but an Earl.

Duke. You are mistaken, Longavile.

Long. Oh would I were: this second whisk divides
Thy Earldom from thee, thou art yet a Baron.

Duke. No more whisks if you love me Longavile.

Long. Two whisks are past, and two are yet behind,
Yet all must come, but not to linger time.

With these two whisks I end, now mount Marine,
For thou art now no more, so says the King,
And I have done his Highness Will with grief.

Duke. Degraded from my honors?

Long. 'Tis too certain.

Duke. I am no Traitor sure, that I know of;
Speak Jaques, hast thou ever heard me utter word
Tending to Treason, or to bring in the enemy?

Jaq. Alas Sir, I know nothing,
Why should your Worship bring me in to hang me?
I never medled

But with the brushing of his cloaths, or fetching
In water in a morning for his hands.

Cof. Are these the honors of this place? Anthony
Help me to take her Gown off quickly,
Or I'll so swinge ye for't —

Wife. Why Husband? Sir?

Cof. I'll not loose a penny by this town.

Long. Why what do you mean, Sir, have her to her lodging,
And there undress her, I will wait upon her.

Cof. Indeed you shall not, your month is out I take it,
Get you out before me wife:

Cofin farewell, I told you long agoe,
That pride begins with pleasure, ends with woe.

Exit wife's Wife.

Bew. Goe thy way sentences, 'twill be thy fortune,
To live and dye a Cuckold, and Churchwarden.

Du. Oh my poor Husband! what a heavy fortune s fallen upon him?

Bew. Methinks 'tis strange,
That heaven fore-warning great men of their falls,
With such plain tokens, they should not avoid 'em?
For the last night betwixt eleven and twelve,
Two great and hideous blazing stars were seen
To fight a long hour by the clock, the one
Drest like a Duke, the other like a King;
Till at the last the crowned Star o'er-came.

Serv. Why do ye stand so dead, Monsieur Marine?

Duke. So Cesar fell, when in the Capitol
They gave his body two and thirty wounds.
Be warned all ye Peers, and by my fall,
Hereafter learn to let your wives rule all.

Serv. Monsieur Marine, pray let me speak with you;
Sir, I must wave you to conceal this party,
It stands upon my utter overthrow;
Seem not discontented, nor do not stir afoot,
For if you do, you and your hope —
I swear you are a lost man if you stir.

And have an eye to Benford, he'll tempt you.

Bew. Come, come, for shame go down;
Were I Marine, I would go down:
And being there, I would rattle him such an answer
Should make him smoke.

Duke. Good Monsieur Benford, peace
Leave these rebellious words,
Or by the honors which I once enjoyed,
And yet may swear by,
I'll tell the King of your proceedings;
I am satisfied.

Wife. You talkt of going down when 'twas not fit,
But now let's see your spirit,
A thousand and a thousand will expect it.

Duke. Why wife, are ye mad? (strength.)

Wife. No, nor drunk, but I'd have you know your own

Duke. You talke like a most foolish woman, wife;
I tell you I will stay, yet I have a
Crotchet troubles me,

Long. More crotchets yet?

Duke. Follow me Jaques, I must have thy counsel,
I will return again, stay you there wife. (fools.)

Long. I fear this loss of honor will give him some few Wif. No, no, he is resolv'd, he will not

Stir

Stir a foot, I'll lay my life.

Bew. I, but he's discontented, how shall we resolve that, And make him stay with comfort?

Wife. Faith Bewford we must even let nature work, For he's the sweetest temper'd man for that As one can wish, for let men but go about to fool him, And he'll have his finger as deep in't as the best; But see where he comes frowning, bless us all!

Enter Duke.

Duke. Off with your hats, for here doth come The high and mighty Duke of Burgundy. What ever you may think, I have thought and thought, and thought upon't, and I find it plain, The King cannot take back what he has given, Unless I forfeit it by course of Law.

Not all the water in the River Seine, Can wash the blood out of these Princely veins.

Wife. God-a-mercy Husband, thou art the best To work out a thing at a pinch in France.

Duke. I will ascend my State again, Dukes, take your place, And let our Champion enter.

Long. Has he his Champion? that's excellent.

Duke. And let loud Musick sound before his entrance. Sound Trumpet.

Enter Jaques in Armor, one carrying a Scutcheon before him, and a two-handed Sword.

Wife. How well our Champion doth demean himself, As if he had been made for such an action? Methinks his sturdy truncheon he doth wield, Like Mars approaching to a bloody field.

Duke. I think there's no man so desperate To dare encounter with our Champion, But trust me, Jaques, thou hast pleas'd us well; Once more our warlike Musick, then proceed.

Enter Shattillion.

Shat. What wondrous age is this? what close proceedings? I hear the clang of Trumpets in this house, To what intent do not our States-men search? Oh no, they look not into simple truth; For I am true, and they regard not me, A man in Armor too: God save the King, The world will end, there's nought but treachery.

Jaq. I Jaques, servant to the high and mighty Godfrey, Duke of Burgundy, do come hither to prove by natural strength, and activity of my body, without the help of sorcery, enchantment, or negromancy, that the said Godfrey, late of Mount Marine, and now of Burgundy, hath perfect right thereto, notwithstanding the Kings command to the contrary, and no other person whatsoever: and in token that I will be ready to make good the same: I throw down my gage, which is my honor, pronounced the 37 of Feb. Stilo novo, God save the Duke.

Shat. Of all the plots the King hath laid for me This was the shrewdest, 'tis my life they seek And they shall have it: if I should refuse To accept the challenge in the Kings behalf, They have some cause to take away my life, And if I do accept it, who can tell, But I may fall by doubtful chance of War? 'Twas shrew'd, but I must take the least of evils, I take thy gauntlet up, thou treacherous man, That stands in armed Coat against the King, Whom God preserve, and with my single sword, Will justify whatever he commands; I'll watch him for catching of my words.

Duke. Jaques go on, defend our Princely Title.

Shat. Why shrink'st thou back? thou hast an evil cause;

Come forward man, I have a rock about me; I fight for my true Liege.

Duke. Go forward Jaques.

Jaq. I do beseech your Grace to pardon me, I will not fight with him, with any else I'll shew my resolution speedily.

Shat. Come, do thy worst, for the King shall see All is not true, that is reported of me.

Jaq. I may not fight with him by Law of Arms.

Duke. What? shall my Title fall? wilt thou not fight?

Jaq. Never with him that once hath sav'd my life

Shat. Dar'st thou not fight? behold then, I do go Strong with the zeal I bear my Sovereign, And seize upon that haughty man himself.

Descend the steps (that thou hast thus usurp'd Against the King and State,) down to the ground, And if thou do utter but a syllable

To cross the Kings intent, thou art but dead; There, lye upon the earth, and pine, and dye.

Did ever any man wade through such storms To save his life, as poor Shattillion?

Long. I fear this challenge hath spoil'd all.

Duc. Ne'er fear it, he'll work it out again, servant. See where Shattillion's Love, poor Lady, comes.

Enter Love.

Duke. Jaques.

(he's gone,

Jaq. Lie still, Sir, if you love your life, I'll whistle when Love. Oh Gentlemen, I charge you by the Love Which you bear to women, take some pity On this distressed man, help to restore That precious Jewel to him he hath lost.

Bew. Lady, what ever power doth lie in us By Art, or Prayer, or danger, we are yours,

Lov. A strange conceit hath wrought this malady, Conceits again must bring him to himself, My strict denial to his Will wrought this: And if you could but draw his wilder thoughts To know me, he would sure recover sense.

Long. That charge I'll undertake.

Duke. Look Jaques, look, for Gods sake let me rise, This greatness is a jade, I cannot sit it.

Jaq. His sword is up, and yet he watcheth you.

Du. I'll down again, pray for thy Master, Jaques. (true,

Shat. Now the King may see all the suggestions are not He hath receiv'd against my loyalty; When all men else refuse, I fight his battels, And thrust my body into dangers mouth; I am become his Champion, and this sword Has taught his enemies to know themselves; Oh that he would no more be jealous of me!

Long. Monsieur Shattillion, the King assures you, That for this valiant loyal act of yours, He hath forgot all jealousies and fears, And never more will tempt you into danger.

Shat. But how shall I believe this, what new token Of reconciliation will he shew me? Let him release my poor Love from her torment, From her hard fare, and strict imprisonment.

Long. He hath done this to win your after-love, And see your Lady sent you from the King By these two Gentlemen: be thankful for her.

Shat. She lives, she lives, I know her by the power Shoots from her eyes.

Love. Rise dear Shattillion.

Shat. I know my duty, Next unto my King, I am to kneel to you.

Love. I'll have you rise, fetch me a chair, sit down Shat.

Shat. I am commanded, and faith tell me Mistress, What usage have you had? pray be plain?

Love. Oh my most lov'd Shattillion, pain enough, But now I am free, thanks to my God and King.

Long. His eyes grow very heavy, not a word,

That

That his weak senses may come sweetly home.
Shat. The King is honourable.
Duke. When do you whistle Jaques?
Jaq. By and by.
Long. Come hither Monsieur, canst thou laugh a little?
Serv. Yes Sir.
Long. So thou shalt then. Bewford, how dost thou?
Bew. Why well.
Long. I'm glad on't, and how does thy wife?
Bew. Why, you may see her, Sir, she stands behind you.
Long. By the mass she's there indeed, but where's her belly?
Bew. Belly?
Long. Her great belly, man; what hast thou sent thee?
Serv. A Boy, I'll lay my life, it tumbled so.
Bew. Catcht by this light.
Long. I'll be a Gossip Bewford.
Serv. And I.
Long. I have an odd Apostle spoon.
Bew. S'foot, catcht.
Duc. Why, what's the matter, Gentlemen?
Long. He's married to your woman.
Duc. And I not know it?
Serv. 'Twas a venial sin.
Bew. Gall, gall, gall.
Duc. Forgive her, Monsieur Bewford, 'twas her love.
Bew. You may rise if you please, I must endure it.
Long. See how my great Lord lies upon the ground
 And dare not stir yet?
Jaques whistles?
Duke. Jaques, Jaques, is the Kings Champion gon yet?
Jaq. No, but he's asleep.
Duke. Is he asleep art sure?
Jaq. I am sure he is, I hear him snore.
Duke. Then by your favours Gentlemen I rise,
 And know I am a Duke still.
Jaq. And I am his Champion.
Duc. Hold thee there, and all France cannot mend thee.
Duke I am a Prince as great within my thoughts
 As when the whole state did adorn my person;
 What trial can be made to try a Prince?
 I will appose this noble corps of mine
 To any danger that may end the doubt.
Duc. Great Duke, and Husband, there is but one way
 To satisfy the world of our true right,
 And it is dangerous.
Duke. What may it be?
 Were it to bring the great Turk bound in chains
 Through France in triumph: or to couple up
 The Sophie, and great Prestor John together,
 I would attempt it Duchefs, tell the course.
Duc. There is a strong opinion through the world,
 And no doubt, grounded on experience,
 That Lions will not touch a lawful Prince,
 If you be confident then of your right,
 Amongst the Lions bear your naked body,
 And if you come off clear, and never winch,
 The world will say you are a perfect Prince.

Duke. I thank you Duchefs, for your kind advice,
 But now we do not affect those ravenous beasts.
Long. A Lion is a beast to try a King;
 But for the trial of such a state like this
Pliny reports a mastive dog will serve.
Duke. We will not deal with dogs at all, but men.
Serv. You shall not need to deal with them at all,
 Hark you Sir, the King doth know you are a Duke:
Duke. No, does he?
Serv. Yes, and is content you shall be, but with this caution,
 That none know it but your self:
 For if ye do, he'll take it away by Act of Parliament.
Duke. Here's my hand, and whilst I live or breath,
 No living wight shall know I am a Duke.
Serv. Mark me directly, Sir, your wife may know it.
Duke. May not Jaques.
Serv. Yes, he may.
Duke. May not my Countrey Cosin?
Serv. By no means, Sir, if you love your life and state.
Duke. Well then, know all, I am no Duke.
Serv. No, I'll swear it.
Long. See, he wakes.
Shat. Where am I, or where have I been all this while?
 Sleep hath not fate so found upon mine eyes
 But I remember well that face;
 Oh thou too cruel, leave at length to scorn
 Him that but looking on thy beauty, dies,
 Either receive me, or put out my eyes.
Love. Dearest Shattillion, see upon my knees,
 I offer up my love, forget my wrongs.
Shat. Art thou mine own?
Love. By heaven I am.
Shat. Then all the world is mine.
Love. I have stranger things to tell thee, my dearest love.
Shat. Tell nothing, but that thou art mine own:
 I do not care to know where I have been,
 Or how I have liv'd, or any thing,
 But that thou art my own.
Bew. Well wife, though 'twere a trick that made us wed,
 We'll make our selves merry soon in bed.
Duke. Know all, I am no Duke.
Wife. What say 'e?
Duke. Jaques?
Jaq. Sir.
Duke. I am a Duke.
Both. Are ye?
Duke. Yes faith, yes faith,
 But it must only run among our selves,
 And Jaques, thou shalt be my Secretary still.
Wife. Kind Gentlemen, lead in Shattillion,
 For he must needs be weak and sickly yet.
 Now all my labours have a perfect end, as I could wish,
 Let all young sprightly wives that have
 Dull foolish coxcombs to their Husbands,
 Learn by me their duties, what to do,
 Which is, to make 'em fools, and please 'em too.

Exeunt.

EPILOGUE.

The Monuments of virtue, and desert,
 Appear more goodly, when the gloss of Art
 Is eaten off by time, than when at first

They were set up, not censur'd at the worst.
 We've done our best, for your contents to fit,
 With new pains, this old monument of wit.

P R O L O G U E.

*Since 'tis become the Title of our Play,
A woman once in a Corporation day
With pardon, speak the Prologue, give as free
A welcome to the Theatre, as he
That with a little Beard, a long black Cloak,
With a starch'd face, and supple leg hath spoke
Before the Plays the twelvemonth, let me then Present a welcome to these Gentlemen,
If you be kind, and noble, you will not Think the worse of me for my Petticote :
But to the Play, the Poet bad me tell
His fears first in the Title, lest in swell
Some thoughts with expectation of a strain,
That but once could be seen in a Kings Reign,
This Coronation, he hopes you may
See often, while the genius of his Play,
Doth prophesie, the Conduits may run Wine,
When the days triumph's ended, and divine
Brisk Nectar swell his Temple to a rage,
With something of more price 't invest the Stage.
There rests but to prepare you, that although
It be a Coronation, there doth flow*

*No undermirth, such as doth lard the Scene
For course delight the language here is clean.
And confident, our Poet bade me say,
He'll bate you but the folly of a Play.
For which, although dull souls his Pen despise,
Who thinks it yet too early to be wise.
The nobler will thank his Muse, at least
Excuse him, cause his thought aim'd at the best,
But we conclude not, it does rest in you.
To censure Poet, Play, and Prologue too?
But what have I omitted? is there not
A blush upon my cheeks that I forgot
The Ladies, and a Femal Prologue too?
Your pardon noble Gentlewomen, you
Were first within my thoughts, I know you sit
As free, and high Commissioners of wit,
Have clear, and active souls, nay, though the men
Were lost in your eyes, they'll be found agen,
You are the bright intelligences move,
And make a harmony this sphere of Love,
Be you propitious then, our Poet says,
Our wreath from you, is worth their grove of Bayes :*

Actus Primus.

Enter Philocles and Lisander.

Phi. Ake way for my Lord Protector.

Lisan. Your graces servants.

Enter Cassander, and Lisimachus.

Cas. I like your diligent waiting, where's Lisimachus?

Lis. I wait upon you, Sir.

Scena Prima.

Cas. The Queen looks pleasant
This morning, does she not?

Lis. I ever found
Her gracious smiles on me.

Cas. She does consult
Her safety in't, for I must tell thee boy,
But in the assurance of her love to thee,
I should advance thy hopes another way,
And use the power I have in Epire, to Settle our own, and uncontroled greatness;

But since she carries her self so fairly,
I am content to expect, and by her marriage
Secure thy fortune, that's all my ambition
Now, be still careful in thy applications
To her, I must attend other affairs,
Return, and use what Art thou canst to lay
More charms of love upon her.

Lis. I presume
She always speaks the language of her heart,
And I can be ambitious for no more
Happiness on earth, than she encourages
Me to expect.

Cas. It was an act becoming
The wisdom of her Father to engage
A tie between our Families, and she!
Hath play'd her best discretion to allow it;
But we lose time in conference, wait on her,
And be what thou wert born for, King of Epire,
I must away.

Lis. Success ever attend you.
Is not the Queen yet coming forth?

Lisa. Your servant,
You may command our duties,
This is the Court Star, Philocles.

Pbi. The Star that we must sail by.

Lisa. All must borrow
A light from him, the young Queen directs all
Her favours that way.

Pbi. He's a noble Gentleman,
And worthy of his expectations:
Too good to be the son of such a Father.

Lisa. Peace, remember he is Lord Protector.

Phil. We have more need of Heavens Protection
I th' mean time, I wonder the old King
Did in his life, design him for the office.

Lisa. He might expect his faith, I have heard when
The King, who was no Epirote, advanc'd
His claim, Cassander, our Protector now,
Young then, oppos'd him toughly with his faction,
But forc'd to yield, had fair conditions,
And was declar'd by the whole State, next heir;
If the King wanted issue, our hopes only
Thriv'd in this daughter.

Pbi. Whom but for her smiles
And hope of marriage with Lisimachus,
His Father, by some cunning, had remov'd
E'r this.

Lisa. Take heed, the Arras may have ears
I should not weep much if his grace would hence
Remove to Heaven.

Pbi. I prethee what should he do there?

Lisa. Some Offices will fall.

Pbi. And the Skie too, e'r I get one stair higher
While he's in place.

Enter Antigonus.

Ant. Lisander, Philocles,
How looks the day upon us? where's the Queen?

Pbi. In her bed-chamber.

Ant. Who was with her?

Lisa. None but the young Lord Lisimachus.

Ant. 'Tis no treason

If a man wish himself a Courtier
Of such a possibility: he has
The mounting fate.

Pbi. I would his Father were Mounted to th' gallows.

Ant. He has a path fair enough,
If he survive by title of his Father.

Lisa. The Queen will hasten his ascent.

Pbi. Would I were Queen,

Ant. Thou wou'dst become rarely the petticoat,

What wou'dst thou do?

Pbi. Why, I wou'd marry
My Gentleman usher, and trust all the strength
And burden of my State upon his legs,
Rather than be call'd wife by any son
Of such a Father.

Lisa. Come, let's leave this subject,
We may find more secure discourse; when saw
You young Arcadius, Lord Macarius's Nephew?

Ant. There's a spark, a youth moulded for a Favourite,
The Queen might do him honor.

Pbi. Favourite, 'tis too cheap a name, there were a match
Now for her Virgin blood.

Lisa. Must every man
That has a handsome face or leg, feed such Ambition: I confess I honor him,
He has a nimble soul, and gives great hope
To be no woman-hater, dances handsomly,
Can court a Lady powerfully, but more goes
To th' making of a Prince? he's here
And's Uncle.

Exit.

Enter Arcadius, Macarius, Seleucus.

Sel. Save you Gentlemen, who can direct me
To find my Lord Protector?

Lisa. He was here
Within this half hour, young Lisimachus
His Son is with the Queen.

Sel. There let him compliment,
I have other business, ha, Arcadius!

Exit.

Pbi. Observ'd you, with what eyes Arcadius
And he saluted, their two families
Will hardly reconcile.

Ant. Seleucus carries
Himself too roughly; with what pride and scorn
He pass by 'em?

Lisa. Th' other with less shew
Of anger, carries pride enough in's soul,
I wish 'em all at peace, Macarius looks
Are without civil war, a good old man,
The old King lov'd him well, Seleucus Father
Was as dear to him, and maintain'd the character
Of an honest Lord through Epire: that two men
So lov'd of others, should be so unwelcome
To one another.

Arc. The Queen was not wont to send for me.

Mac. The reason's to her self,
It will become your duty to attend her.

Arc. Save you Gentlemen, what novelty
Does the Court breathe to day?

Lisa. None Sir, the news
That took the last impression is, that you
Purpose to leave the Kingdom, and those men,
That honor you, take no delight to hear it.

Arc. I have ambition to see the difference
Of Courts, and this may spare; the delights
At home do surfeit, and the Mistriess, whom
We all do serve, is fixt upon one object,
Her beams are too much pointed, but no Countrey
Shall make me lose your memories.

Enter Queen, Lisimachus, Macarius, Charilla.

Qu. Arcadius.

Mac. Your Lordship honor'd me,
I have no blessing in his absence.

Lis. 'Tis done like a pious Uncle.

Qu. We must not Give any licence.

Arc. If your Majesty
Would please.

Qu. We are not pleas'd, it had become your duty,
To have first acquainted us, e'r you declar'd

Your resolution publick, is our Court
Not worth your stay?

Ar. I humbly beg your pardon.

Qu. Where's Lysimachus?

Lis. Your humble servant, Madam.

Qu. We shall find

Employment at home for you, do not lose us.

Ar. Madam, I then write my self blest on earth
When I may do you service.

Qu. We would be private, Macarius.

Mic. Madam, you have blest me,
Nothing but your command could interpose to Stay him.

Qu. Lysimachus,
You must not leave us.

Lis. Nothing but Lysimachus? has she not Ta'en a philter?

Qu. Nay, pray be cover'd, Ceremony from you,
Must be excus'd.

Lis. It will become my duty.

Qu. Not your love?

I know you would not have me look upon
Your person as a Courtier, not as Favorite;
That Title were too narrow to express
How we esteem you.

Lis. The least of all

These names from you, Madam, is grace enough.

Qu. Yet here you wou'd not rest?

Lis. Not if you please:

To say there is a happiness beyond,
And teach my ambition how to make it mine,
Although the honors you already have
Let fall upon your servant, exceed all
My merit; I have a heart is studious
To reach it with desert, and make it possible
Your favor's mine by justice, with your pardon.

Qu. We are confident this needs no pardon, Sir,
But a reward to cherish your opinion,
And that you may keep warm your passion,
Know we resolve for marriage, and if I had another gift, beside my self,
Greater, in that you should discern, how much
My heart is fixt.

Lis. Let me digest my blessing.

Qu. But I cannot resolve when this shall be,

Lis. How Madam? do not make me dream of Heaven,
And wake me into misery, if your purpose
Be, to immortalize your humble servant,
Your power on earth's divine, Princes are here
The copies of Eternity, and create,
When they but will our happiness.

Qu. I shall

Believe you mock me in this argument,
I have no power.

Lis. How, no power?

Qu. Not as a Queen.

Lis. I understand you not.

Qu. I must obey, your Father's my Protector.

Lis. How?

Qu. When I am absolute, Lysimachus,
Our power and Titles meet, before, we are but
A shadow, and to give you that were nothing.

Lis. Excellent Queen,
My love took no original from State,
Or the desire of other greatness,
Above what my birth may challenge modestly,
I love your virtues; mercenary souls
Are taken with advancement, you've an Empire
Within you, better than the worlds, to that Looks my ambition.

Qu. T'other is not, Sir,
To be despis'd, Cosmography allows
Epire, a place i' th' Map, and know till I
Possess what I was born to, and alone

Do grasp the Kingdoms Scepter, I account
My self divided, he that marries me
Shall take an obsolete Queen to his warm bosom,
My temples yet are naked, until then
Our Loves can be but compliments, and wishes,
Yet very hearty ones.

Lis. I apprehend.

Qu. Your Father.

Enter Cassander and Seleucus.

Cas. Madam, a Gentleman has an humble suit,

Qu. 'Tis in your power to grant, you are Protector,
I am not yet a Queen.

Cas. How's this?

Lis. I shall expound her meaning.

Qu. Why kneel you, Sir?

Sel. Madam, to reconcile two families
That may unite, both Counsels and their blood
To serve your Crown.

Qu. Macarius, and Eubulus
That beare inveterate malice to each other.
It grew, as I have heard, upon the question
Which some of either family had made
Which of their Fathers was the best Commander:
If we believe our stories, they have both
Deserved well of our state, and yet this quarrel
Has cost too many lives, a severe faction.

Sel. But I'll propound a way to plant a quiet
And peace in both our houses, which are torn
With their dissentions, and lose the glory
Of their great names, my blood speaks my relation
To Eubulus, and I wish my veins were emptied
To appease their war.

Qu. Thou hast a noble soul,
This is a charity above thy youth,
And it flows bravely from thee, name the way.

Sel. In such a desperate cause, a little stream
Of blood might purge the foulness of their hearts
If you'll prevent a deluge.

Qu. Be particular.

Sel. Let but your Majesty consent that two
May with their personal valour, undertake
The honor of their family, and determine
Their difference.

Qu. This rather will inlarge
Their hate, and be a means to call more blood
Into the stream.

Sel. Not if both families
Agree, and swear——

Qu. And who shall be the Champions?

Sel. I beg the honor, for Eubulus cause
To be engag'd, if any for Macarius,
Worthy to wager heart with mine, accept it,
I am confident, Arcadius,
For honor would direct me to his sword,
Will not deny, to stake against my life
His own, if you vouchsafe us priviledge.

Qu. You are the expectation, and top boughs
Of both your houses, it would seem injustice,
To allow a civil war to cut you off,
And your selves the instruments, besides
You appear a soldier; Arcadius
Hath no acquaintance yet with rugged war,
More fit to drill a Lady, than expose
His body to such dangers: a small wound
I' th' head, may spoil the method of his hair,
Whose curiosity exacts more time,
Than his devotion, and who knows but he
May lose his ribond by it in his lock,
Dear as his Saint, with whom he would exchange
His head, for her gay colours; then his band
May he disorder'd, and transform'd from Lace

To Cutwork, his rich cloaths be discomplexion'd
With bloud, beside the infashionable slashes:
And at the next Festival take Physick,
Or put on black, and mourn for his slain breeches:
His hands cas'd up in gloves all night, and sweet
Pomatum: the next day may be endanger'd
To blisters with a sword, how can he stand
Upon his guard, who hath Fiddlers in his head,
To which, his feet must ever be a dancing?
Beside a falsify may spoil his cringe,
Or making of a leg, in which consists
Much of his Court-perfection.

Sel. Is this Character
Bestow'd on him?

Qu. It something may concern the Gentleman,
Whom if you please to challenge
To Dance, play on the Lute, or Sing.

Sel. Some Ketch?

Qu. He shall not want those will maintain him
For any sum.

Sel. You are my Sovereign,
I dare not think, yet I must speak somewhat,
I shall burst else, I have no skill in Jiggs,
Nor Tumbling.

Qu. How Sir?

Sel. Nor was I born a Minstrel, and in this you have
So infinitely disgrac'd Arcadius.

But that I have heard another Character,
And with your royal Licence do believe it,
I should not think him worth my killing,

Qu. Your killing?

Sel. Does she not jeer me;
I shall talk treason presently, I find it
At my tongues end already, this is an Affront, I'll leave her.

Qu. Come back, do you know Arcadius?

Sel. I ha' chang'd but little breath with him; our persons
Admit no familiarity; we were Born to live both at distance, yet I ha' seen him
Fight, and fight bravely.

Qu. When the spirit of Wine
Made his brain valiant, he fought bravely.

Sel. Although he be my enemy, should any
Of the gay flies that buzze about the Court,
Sit to catch trouts i'th' summer, tell me so,
I durst in any presence but your own.

Qu. What?

Sel. Tell him he were not honest.

Qu. I see Seleucus; thou art resolute,
And I but wrong'd Arcadius, your first Request is granted, you shall fight, and he
That conquers be rewarded, to confirm
First place and honor to his Family:
Is it not this you plead for?

Sel. You are gracious.

Qu. Lisimachus.

Lis. Madam.

Cas. She has granted then

Sel. With much ado.

Cas. I wish thy sword may open
His wanton veins, Macarius is too popular,
And has taught him to insinuate.

Qu. It shall

But haste the confirmation of our loves,
And ripen the delights of marriage, Seleucus. Exit cum Sel.

Lis. As I guest,
It cannot be too soon.

Cas. To morrow then we crown her, and invest
My Son with Majesty, 'tis to my wishes,
Beget a race of Princes, my Lisimachus.

Lis. First, let us marry, Sir.

Cas. Thy brow was made
To wear a golden circle, I'm transported,
Thou shalt rule her, and I will govern thee;

Lis. Although you be my Father, that will not Concern my obedience, as I take it.

Enter Philocles, Lisander, and Antigonus:

Gentlemen,
Prepare your selves for a solemnity
Will turn the Kingdom into triumph, Epire
Look fresh to morrow, 'twill become your duties
In all your glory, to attend the Queen
At her Coronation, she is pleas'd to make
The next day happy in our Calendar,
My office doth expire, and my old blood
Renews with thought on't.

Pbi. How's this?

Ant. Crown'd to morrow.

Lisa. And he so joyful to resign his Regency,
There's some trick in't, I do not like these hasty
Proceedings, and whirls of state, they have common
As strange and violent effects; well, heaven save the Queen.

Pbi. Heaven save the Queen, say I, and send her a sprightly Bed-fellow, for the Protector, let him pray for Himself, he is like to have no benefit of my devotion.

Cas. But this doth quicken my old heart, Lisimachus;
There is not any step into her throne,
But is the same degree of thy own state;
Come Gentlemen.

Lisa. We attend your grace.

Cas. Lisimachus.

Lis. What heretofore could happen to mankind
Was with much pain to climb to heaven, but in Sophias marriage of all Queens the best,
Heaven will come down to earth, to make me blest. Exe.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Arcadius and Polydora.

Pol. I Ndeed you shall not go.

Arc. Whither?

Pol. To travel;

I know you see me, but to take your leave,
But I must never yield to such an absence.

Arc. I prethee leave thy fears, I am commanded
To th' contrary, I wonot leave thee now.

Pol. Commanded? by whom?

Arc. The Queen.

Pol. I am very glad, for trust me, I could think
Of thy departure with no comfort, thou
Art all the joy I have. half of my soul,
But I must thank the Queen now for thy company,
I prethee, what could make thee so desirous
To be abroad?

Arc. Only to get an appetite
To thee Polidora.

Pol. Then you must provoke it.

Arc. Nay, prethee do not so mistake thy servant.

Pol. Perhaps you surfeit with my Love.

Arc. Thy love?

Pol. Although I have no beauty to compare
With the best faces, I have a heart above
All competition.

Arc. Thou art jealous now,
Come let me take the kiss I gave thee last;
I am so confident of thee, no Lip
Has ravish't it from thine; I prethee come
To Court.

Pol. For what?

Arc. There is the throne for beauty.

Pol. 'Tis safer dwelling here.

Arc. There's none will hurt,
Or dare but think an ill to Polydora,
The greatest will be proud to honor thee.
Thy luster wants the admiration here:
There thou wot shine indeed, and strike a reverence
Into the gazer.

Pol. You can flatter too.

Arc. No praise of thee can be thought so, thy virtue
Will deserve all, I must confess, we Courtiers
Do oftentimes commend to shew our Art,
There is necessity sometimes to say,
This Madam breaths Arabian Gumms,
Amber and Cassia; though while we are praising,
We wish we had no nostrils to take in
Th' offensive steam of her corrupted Lungs.
Nay, some will swear they love their Mistresses,
Would hazard lives and fortunes, to preserve
One of her hairs brighter than Berinices;
Or young Apollo's, and yet after this,
A favour from another toy would tempt him
To laugh, while the officious hangman whips
Her head off.

Pol. Fine men.

Arc. I am none of these,
Nay, there are women Polidora, too
That can do pretty well at flatteries;
Make men believe they dote, will languish for 'em,
Can kiss a Jewel out of one, and dally
A carcanet of Diamonds from another,
Weep into th' bosom, of a third, and make
Him drop as many Pearls; they count it nothing
To talk a reasonable heir within ten days
Out of his whole Estate, and make him mad
He has no more wealth to consume.

Pol. You'll teach me
To think I may be flattered in your promises,
Since you live where this Art is most profest.

Arc. I dare not be so wicked Polidora,
The Infant errors of the Court I may
Be guilty of, but never to abuse
So rare a goodness, nor indeed did ever
Converse with any of those shames of Court,
To practise for base ends; be confident
My heart is full of thine, and I so deeply
Carry the figure of my Polydora,
It is not in the power of time or distance
To cancel it, by all that's blest I love thee:
Love thee above all women, dare invoke
A curse when I forsake thee.

Pol. Let it be some Gentle one.

Arc. Teach me an oath I prethee,
One strong enough to bind, if thou dost find
Any suspicion of my faith, or else
Direct me in some horrid imprecation:
When I forsake thee for the love of other
Women, may heaven reward my apostacy
To blast my greatest happiness on earth,
And make all joys abortive.

Pol. Revoke these hasty syllables, they carry
Too great a penalty for breach of Love
To me, I am not worth thy suffering,
You do not know, what beauty may invite
Your change, what happiness may tempt your eye
And heart together.

Arc. Should all the graces of your sex conspire
In one, and she should court, with a Dowry,
Able to buy a Kingdom, when I give
My heart from Polidora.

Pol. I suspect not,
And to requite thy constancy, I swear.

Arc. 'Twere sin to let thee waste thy breath
I have assurance of thy noble thoughts.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. My Lord, your Uncle hath been every where I' th' Court inquiring for you, his looks speak
Some earnest cause.

Arc. I am more acquainted with Thy virtue, than to imagine thou wilt not Excuse me now, one kiss dismisses him
Whose heart shall wait on Polidora, prethee
Let me not wish for thy return too often,
My Father.

Enter Nestorius, and a servant.

Nes. I met Arcadius in strange haste, he told me
He had been with thee.

Pol. Some affair too soon
Ravish'd him hence, his Uncle sent for him
You came now from Court: how looks the Queen
This golden morning?

Nes. Like a Bride, her soul
Is all on mirth, her eyes have quick'ning fires,
Able to strike a spring into the earth,
In winter.

Pol. Then Lisimachus can have
No frost in's blood, that lives so near her beams.

Nes. His politick Father the Protector smiles too, Resolve to see the ceremony of the Queen
'Twill be a day of state.

Pol. I am not well.

Nes. How! not well? retire then, I must return
My attendance is expected, Polidora,
Be careful of thy health.

Pol. It will concern me.

Exit.

Enter Arcadius, and Macarius.

Arc. You amaze me, Sir.

Mac. Dear Nephew, if thou respect thy safety
My honor, or my age, remove thy self,
Thy life's in danger.

Arc. Mine? who's my enemy?

Mac. Take horse, and instantly forsake the City,
Or else within some unsuspected dwelling,
Obscure thy self, stay not to know the reason.

Arc. Sir, I beseech your pardon, which i' th' number
Of my offences unto any, should Provoke this dishonourable flight?

Mac. I would, when I petition'd for thy stay,
I had pleaded for thy banishment, thou knowst not
What threatens thee.

Arc. I would desire to know it,
I am in no conspiracy of treason,
Have ravish'd no mans Mistress, not so much
As given the lye to any, what should mean
Your strange and violent fears, I will not stir
Until you make me sensible I have lost
My innocence.

Mac. I must not live to see
Thy body full of wounds, it were less sin
To rip thy Fathers Marble, and fetch from
The reverend vault, his ashes, and disperse them
By some rude winds, where none should ever find
The sacred dust: it was his Legacy,
The breath he mingled with his prayers to Heaven
I would preserve Arcadius, whose fate
He prophesied in death, would need protection,
Thou wot disturb his ghost, and call it to Affright my dreams, if thou refuse to obey me.

Arc. You more inflame me, to enquire the cause
Of your distraction, and you'll arm me better

Than

Than any coward flight by acquainting me
Whose malice aims to kill me, good Sir tell me,

Mac. Then prayers and tears assist me.

Arc. Sir.

Mac. Arcadius,

Thou art a rash young man, witness the spirit
Of him that trusted me so much, I bleed,
Till I prevent this mischief.

Enter Philocles, Lisander.

Arc. Ha. keep off.

Phi. What mean you, Sir?

Lif. We are your friends.

Arc. I know your faces, but Am not secure, I would not be betray'd.

Lif. You wrong our hearts, who truly honor you.

Arc. They say I must be kill'd.

Phi. By whom?

Arc. I know not, nor wou'd I part with life so tamely.

Phi. We dare engage ours in your quarrel, hide
Your sword, it may beget suspicion,
It's enough to question you.

Arc. I am confident;

Pray pardon me, come, I despise all danger:
Yet a dear friend of mine, my Uncle told me
He would not see my body full of wounds.

Lif. Your Uncle, this is strange.

Arc. Yes, my honest Uncle,
If my unlucky Stars have pointed me
So dire a fate.

Phi. There is some strange mistake in't.

Enter Antigonus.

Ant. Arcadius, the Queen would speak with you,
You must make haste.

Arc. Though to my death. I flie
Upon her summons I give up my breath
Then willingly, if she command it from me:

Phi. This does a little trouble me.

Lif. I know not

What to imagine, something is the ground
Of this perplexity, but I hope there is not
Any such danger as he apprehends.

Enter Queen, Lisimachus, Macarius, Eubulus, Seleucus Arcadius, Ladies, Attendants and Gent.

Qu. We have already granted to Seleucus
And they shall try their valour, if Arcadius
Have spirit in him to accept the challenge,
Our Royal word is past.

Phi. This is strange.

Eub. Madam, my son knew not what he ask'd,
And you were cruel to consent so soon.

Mac. Wherein have I offended, to be rob'd
At once, of all the wealth I have, Arcadius
Is part of me.

Eub. Seleucus's life and mine
Are twisted on one thred, both stand or fall
Together, hath the service for my Country
Deserved but this reward, to be sent weeping
To my eternal home? Was't not enough
When I was young, to lose my blood in wars,
But the poor remnant that is scarcely warm
And faintly creeping through my wither'd veins
Must be let out to make you sport.

Mac. How can

We, that shall this morn see the sacred oyl,
Fall on your Virgin tressés, hope for any Protection hereafter, when this day
You sacrifice the blood of them that pray for you.

Arcadius, I prethee speak thy self,

It is for thee I plead.

Eub. Seleucus. kneel

And say thou hast repented thy rash suit;
If e'er I see thee fight, I be thus wounded,
How will the least drop forc'd from thy veins,
Afflict my heart.

Mac. Why, that's good;

Exit. Arcadius, speak to her; hear him Madam.

Arc. If you call back this honor you have done me
I shall repent I live, doe not perswade me:

Seleucus, thou art a noble enemy,
And I will love thy soul, though I despair
Our bodies friendly conversation:

I would we were to tugg upon some cliffe,
Or like two prodigies i'th' air, our conflict
Might generally be gaz'd at, and our blood
Appease our grandsires ashes.

Mac. I am undone.

Sel. Madam, my father says I have offended,
If so, I beg your pardon, but beseech you
For your own glory, call not back your word.

Eub. They are both mad.

Qu. No more, we have resolv'd,
And since their courage is so nobly flam'd,
This morning we'll behold the Champions
Within the List, be not afraid, their strife
Will stretch so far as death, so soon as we Are Crown'd, prepare your selves, Seleucus. Kisses her hand.

Sel. I have receiv'd another life in this high favour,
And may lose what nature gave me.

Qu. Arcadius, to encourage thy young valour,
We give thee our Fathers sword.

Command it from our Armory; Lisimachus,
To our Coronation.

Exeunt.

Sel. I'll forfeit

My head for a rebellion, than suffer it.

Exit.

Arc. I am circled with confusions, I'll do somewhat
My brains and friends assist me.

Exit.

Phi. But do you think they'll fight indeed?

Lif. Perhaps

Her Majesty will see a bout or two.
And yet 'tis wondrous strange, such spectacles
Are rare i'th' Court, and they were to skirmish naked
Before her, then there might be some excuse.
There is gimcracks in't, the Queen is wise
Above her years.

Phi. Macarius is perplex'd.

Enter Eubulus.

Lif. I cannot blame him, but my Lord Eubulus
Returns, they are both troubled, 'las good men,
But our duties are expected, we forget. Ex. Phil. Lif.

Eub. I must resolve, and yet things are not ripe,
My brains upon the torture.

Mac. This may quit

The hazard of his person, whose least drop
Of blood, is worth more than our families.
My Lord Eubulus, I have thought a way
To stay the young mens desperate proceedings,
It is our cause they fight, let us beseech
The Queen, to grant us two the priviledge
Of Duel, rather than expose their lives
To eithers fury; it were pity they Should run upon so black a destiny,
We are both old, and may be spar'd, a pair
Of fruitless trees, mossie, and wither'd trunks,
That fill up too much room.

Eub. Most willingly,

And I will praise her charity to allow it;
I have not yet forget to use a sword,
Let's lose no time, by this act, she will licence
Our souls to leave our bodies but a day,
Perhaps an hour the sooner; they may live

To do her better service, and be friends
When we are dead, and yet I have no hope
This will be granted, curse upon our faction.

Mac. If she deny us——

Eub. What?

Mac. I wou'd do somewhat——

Eub. There's something o' th' suddain struck upon
My imagination that may secure us.

Mac. Name it, if no dishonor wait upon't
To preserve them, I'll accept any danger,

Eub. There is no other way, and yet my heart
Would be excus'd, but 'tis to save his life.

Mac. Speak it Eubulus.

Eub. In your ear I shall,
It sha'not make a noise if you refuse it.

Mac. Hum? though it stir my blood, I'll meet Arcadius,
If this preserve thee not, I must unseal
Another mystery. Exit.

Enter Queen, Lisimachus, Cassander, Charilla, Lisander, Philocles, Antigonus.

Qu. We owe to all your loves, and will deserve
At least by our endeavours, that none may
This day repent their prayers, my Lord Protector.

Cas. Madam, I have no
Such Title now, and am blest to lose
That name so happily: I was but trusted
With a glorious burden.

Qu. You have prov'd
Your self our faithful Counsellor, and must still Protect our growing state: a Kingdoms Scepter
Weighs down a womans arm, this Crown sits heavy
Upon my brow already, and we know
There's something more than mettall in this wreath,
Of shining glory, but your faith, and counsel,
That are familiar with mysteries,
And depths of state, have power to make us fit
For such a bearing, in which both you shall Doe loyal service, and reward your Duties.

Cas. Heaven preserve your Highness.

Qu. But yet my Lords and Gentlemen, let none
Mistake me, that because I urge your wisdoms,
I shall grow careless, and impose on you
The managing of this great Province, no,
We will be active too, and as we are
In dignity above your persons, so,
The greatest portion of the difficulties
We call to us, you in your several places
Relieving us with your experience,
Observing in your best directions
All modesty, and distance; for although
We are but young, no action shall forfeit
Our royal priviledge, or encourage any Too unreverent boldness; as it will become
Our honor to consult, e'r we determine
Of the most necessary things of state,
So we are sensible of a check,
But in a brow, that saucily controuls
Our action, presuming on our years
As few, or frailty of our sex; that head
Is not secure, that dares our power or justice.

Phi. She has a brave spirit, look how the Protector
Grows pale already.

Qu. But I speak to you
Are perfect in obedience, and may spare
This Theme, yet 'twas no immaterial
Part of our character, since I desire
All should take notice, I have studied
The knowledge of my self, by which I shall Better distinguish of your worth and persons
In your relations to us.

Lis. This language
Is but a threatening to some body.

Qu. But we miss some, that use not to absent
Their duties from us, where's Macarius?

Cas. Retir'd to grieve, your Majesty hath given Consent, Arcadius should enter the List
To day with young Seleucus.

Qu. We purpose.

Enter Gentleman.

They shall proceed, what's he? (tice

Phil. A Gentleman belonging to Seleucus, that gives no-
He is prepar'd, and waits your royal pleasure.

Qu. He was compos'd for action, give notice
To Arcadius, and admit the challenger:
Let other Princes boast their gaudy tilting,
And mockery of battles, but our triumph
Is celebrated with true noble valour.

Enter Seleucus, Arcadius, at several doors, their Pages before them, bearing their Targets.

Two young men spirited enough to have
Two kingdoms staked upon their swords, Lisimachus
Do not they excellently become their arms?

'Twere pity but they should do something more
Then wave their plumes. A shout within.

What noise is that?

Enter Macarius, and Eubulus.

Mac. The peoples joy to know us reconcil'd,
Is added to the jubile of the day,
We have no more a faction but one heart,
Peace flow in every bosom.

Eub. Throw away
These instruments of death, and like two friends
Embrace by our example.

Qu. This unfein'd?

Mac. By our duties to your self, dear Madam
Command them not advance, our houses from
This minute are incorporated; happy day
Our eyes at which before revenge look'd forth,
May clear suspicion, oh my Arcadius!

Eub. We have found a nearer way to friendship, Madam,
Than by exposing them to fight for us.

Qu. If this be faithful, our desires are blest.

We had no thought to waste, but reconcile
Your blood this way, and we did prophesie
This happy chance, spring into eithers bosom,
Arcadius and Seleucus, what can now
Be added to this days felicity?

Yes, there is something, is there not my Lord?
While we are Virgin Queen.

Cas. Ha, that string
Doth promise Musick.

Qu. I am yet my Lords
Your single joy, and when I look upon,
What I have took, to manage the great care
Of this most flourishing kingdom, I incline
To think I shall do justice to my self,
If I choose one, whose strength and virtue may Assist my undertaking, think you Lords,
A Husband would not help?

Lis. No question, Madam,
And he that purpose to make you so blest
Must needs be worthy of our humblest duty,
It is the general vote.

Qu. We will not then Trouble Ambassadors to treat with any
Princes abroad, within our own dominion,
Fruitful in honor, we shall make our choice;
And that we may not keep you over long
In the imagination, from this circle, we

Have purpose to elect one, whom I shall Salute a King and Husband.

Lisa. Now my Lord Lisimachus.

Que. Nor shall we in this action be accus'd
Of rashness, since the man we shall declare
Deserving our affection, hath been early
In our opinion, which had reason first
To guide it, and his known nobility
Long marry'd to our thoughts, will justify
Our fair election.

Phi. Lisimachus blushes.

Cas. Direct our duties, Madam, to pray for him.

Que. Arcadius, you see from whence we come,
Pray lead us back, you may ascend.

She comes from the State.

Cas. How's this? o're-reach'd?

Arc. Madam, be charitable to your humblest creature,
Doe not reward the heart, that falls in duty
Beneath your feet, with making me the burden
Of the Court-mirth, a mockery for Pages,
'Twere Treason in me but to think you meane thus.

Que. Arcadius, you must refuse my love,
Or I shame this Kingdom.

Phi. Is the wind in that corner?

Cas. I shall run mad Lisimachus.

Lisi. Sir, contain your self.

Sel. Is this to be believ'd?

Mac. What dream is this?

Phi. He kisses her, now by this day I am glad on't.

Lisa. Mark the Protector.

Ant. Let him fret his heart-strings.

Que. Is the day cloudy on the sudden?

Arc. Gentlemen,

It was not my ambition, I durst never Aspire so high in thought, but since her Majesty
Hath pleas'd to call me to this honor, I
Will study to be worthy of her grace,
By whom I live.

Que. The Church to morrow shall
Confirm our marriage, noble Lisimachus;
We'll find out other ways to recompence
Your love to us, set forward, come Arcadius.

Mac. It must be so, and yet let me consider,

Cas. He insults already, policy assist me.
To break his neck.

Lisi. Who would trust Woman?
Lost in a pair of minutes, lost, how bright
A morning rose, but now, 'tis night?

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Polidora, and a Servant.

Pol. OH where shall Virgins look for faith hereafter?
If he prove false, after so many vows?
And yet if I consider, he was tempted
Above the strength of a young Lover, two Such glorious courting his acceptance, were Able to make disloyalty no sin,
At least not seem a fault, a Lady first,
Whose very looks would thaw a man more frozen
Than the Alps, quicken a soul more dead than Winter,
Add to her beauty and perfection,
That she's a Queen, and brings with her a Kingdom
Able to make a great mind forfeit Heaven.
What could the frailty of Arcadius
Suggest, to unspirit him so much, as not

To fly to her embraces, you were present
When she declar'd her self.

Ser. Yes Madam.

Pol. Tell me,

Did not he make a pause, when the fair Queen
A full temptation stood him?

Ser. Very little

My judgment could distinguish, she did no sooner
Propound, but he accepted.

Pol. That was ill,

He might with honor stand one or two minutes,
Me thinks it should have startled him a little,
To have rememberd me, I have deserv'd
At least a cold thought, well, pray give it him.

Ser. I shall.

Pol. When?

Ser. Instantly.

Pol. Not so,

But take a time when his joy swels him most,
When his delights are high and ravishing,
When you perceive his Soul dance in his eyes,
When she that must be his hath dress'd her beauty,
With all her pride, and sends a thousand Cupids
To call him to the tasting of her lip;
Then give him this, and tell him, while I live,
I'll pray for him.

Ser. I shall.

Exeunt.

Enter Cassander, and Lisimachus.

Cas. There is no way but death.

Lisi. That's black, and horrid,
Consider, Sir, it was her sin, not his;
I cannot accuse him, what man could carry
A heart so frozen, not to melt at such A glorious flame? Who could not fly to such A happiness?

Cas. Have you ambition
To be a tame fool? see so vast an injury
And not revenge it? make me not suspect
Thy Mother for this sufferance, my Son.

Lisi. Pray hear me, Sir.

Cas. Hear a patient gull;
A property, thou hast no blood of mine,
If this affront provoke thee not, how canst
Be charitable to thy self, and let him live
To glory in thy shame? Nor is he innocent;
He had before crept slyly into her bosome,
And practis'd thy dishonor.

Lisi. You begin to stir me, Sir.

Cas. How else could she be guilty
Of such contempt of thee? and in the eye
Of all the Kingdom, they conspir'd this stain,
When they had cunning meetings, shall thy love
And blooming hopes be scatter'd thus, and Lisimachus
Stand idle gazer?

Lisi. What, Sir, will his death
Advantage us, if she be false to me?
So irreligious, and to touch her person—
Pause, we may be observed.

Enter Philocles, and Lisander.

Lisa. 'Tis the Protector
And his son.

Phi. Alas, poor Gentleman, I pity
His neglect, but am not sorry for his Father.

Phi. 'Tis a strange turne.

Lisa. The whirligigs of Women.

Phi. Your Graces servant.

Cas. I am yours Gentlemen,
And should be happy to deserve your loves.

Phi. Now he can flatter.

Lisa. In't Sir, to enlarge your sufferings, I have

A heart doth wish
The Queen had known better to reward
Your love and merit.

Lisa. If you would exprefs
Your love to me, pray do not mention it,
I must obey my fate.

Ibi. She will be married
To t'other Gentleman for certain then?

Caf. I hope you'll wish 'em joy.

Phi. Indeed I will, Sir.

Lisa. Your Graces servant.

Caf. We are grown
Ridiculous, the pastime of the Court:
Here comes another.

Enter Seleucus.

Sel. Where's your Son, my Lord?

Caf. Like a neglected servant of his Mistress.

Sel. I would ask him a question.

Caf. What?

Sel. Whether the Queen,
As 'tis reported, lov'd him, he can tell
Whether she promis'd what they talke of, marriage,

Caf. I can resolve you that, Sir.

Sel. She did promise?

Caf. Yes.

Sel. Then shee's a Woman, and your Son;

Caf. What?

Sel. Not worthy his blood, and expectation,
If I be calme.

Caf. There's no opposing destiny.

Sel. I would cut the Throat.

Caf. Whose throat?

Sel. The destinies, that's all, your pardon, Sir,
I am Seleucus still, a poor shadow

Orh' World, a walking picture, it concerns
Not me, I am forgotten by my stars.

Caf. The Queen, with more discretion, might ha chosen
Th e.

Sel. Whom?

Caf. Thee, Seleucus.

Sel. Me? I cannot dance, and frisk with due activity,
My body is lead, I have too much phlegme, what should
I do with a Kingdome? no, Arcadius
Becomes the cushion, and can please, yet setting
Aside the trick that Ladies of Blood look at,
Another Man might make a shift to weare
Rich Clothes, sit in the chair of state, and nod,
Dare venture on discourse, that does not trench
On compliment, and think the study of Armes
And Arts, more commendable in a Gentleman,
Than any Galliard.

Caf. Arcadius,
And you, were reconcil'd.

Sel. We? yes, oh yes,
But 'tis not manners now to say we are friends,
At our equality there had been reason,
But now, subjection is the word.

Caf. They are not Yet married.

Sel. I'll make no Oath upon't,
My Lord Lisimachus,
A word, you'll not be angry if I love you,
May not a Batchellor be made a Cuckold?

Lisa. How, Sir?

Caf. Lisimachus, this Gentleman
Is worth our embrace, hee's spirited,
And may be useful.

Sel. Hark you, can you tell
Where's the best Dancing-master? and you mean
To rise at Court, practise to caper, farewell
The noble science, that makes work for cutlers,
It will be out of fashion to weare swords,

Masques, and devices welcome, I salute you,
Is it not pittie any division
Should be heard out of Musick? Oh 'twill be An excellent age of crotchets; and of Canters.
Buy Captains, that like fools will spend your blood
Out of your Country, you will be of less
Use than your feathers, if you return unman'd
You shall be beaten soon to a new march,
When you shall think it a discretion
To sell your glorious buffes to buy fine pumps,
And pantables, this is I hope no treason.

Exit.

Enter Arcadius leading the Queen, Charia, Eubulus,
Lisander, Philocles, Polidora, servant.

Caf. Wot stay Lisimachus?

Lisa. Yes, Sir,

And shew a patience above her injury.

Arc. This honor is too much, Madam, assume Your place, and let Arcadius waite still:
'Tis happines enough to be your servant.

Caf. Now he dissembles.

Que. Sir, you must sit.

Arc. I am obedient.

Que. This is not Musick
Sprightly enough, it feeds the soul with melancholy.
How sayes Arcadius?

Arc. Give me leave to think

There is no harmony but in your voice,
And not an accent of your heavenly tongue,
But strikes me into rapture, I incline
To think, the tale of Orpheus no fable,
'Tis possible he might inchant the Rocks,
And charme the Forrest, soften hell, hell it self,
With his commanding Lute, it is no miracle
To what you work, whose very breath conveyes
The hearer into Heaven, how at your lips,
Day-winds gather Perfumes, proudly glide away,
To disperse sweetnes round about the world.

Sel. Fine stuff.

Que. You cannot flatter.

Arc. Not, if I should say,
Nature had plac'd you here the creatures wonder,
And her own spring, from which all excellence
On Earth's deriv'd, and copyed forth, and when
The character of fair, and good in others
Is quite worne out, and lost, looking on you
It is supply'd, and you alone made mortal
To feed, and keep alive all beauty.

Sel. Ha, ha, Can you indure it Gentlemen?

Lisa. What do you meane?

Sel. Nay, ask him what he meanes, mine is a down
Right laugh.

Que. Well, Sir, proceed.

Arc. At such bright eyes the stars do light themselves,
At such a forehead Swans renew their white,
From such a lip the morning gathers blushes.

Sel. The morning is more modest than thy praises,
VVhat a thing does he make her?

Arc. And when you flie to Heaven and leave this world
No longer maintenance of goodness from you:
Then Poetry shall lose all use with us,
And be no more, since nothing in your absence
Is left, that can be worthy of a Verse.

Sel. Ha, ha.

Que. VVhose that?

Sel. 'Twas I, Madam.

Arc. Seleucus?

Caf. Ha?

Sel. Yes, Sir, 'twas I that laugh'd.

Arc. At what?

Sel. At nothing.

Lisa. Contain your self, Seleucus.

Eub. Are you mad?

Que. Have

Que. Have you ambition to be punish'd, Sir?

Sel. I need not, 'twas punishment

Enough to hear him make an Idol of you, he left
Out the commendation of your patience, I was a little Mov'd in my nature, to hear his Rodomontados, and Make a monster of his Mistress, which I pittie'd first,
But seeing him proceed, I guess he brought you
Mirth with his inventions, and so made bold to laugh at it.

Que. You are sawcy,
We'll place you where you sha'not be so merry,
Take him away.

Lisa. Submit your self.

Arc. Let me plead for his pardon.

Sel. I wo'd not owe my life so poorly, beg thy own,
When you are King you cannot bribe your destiny.

Eub. Good Madam hear me, I fear he is distracted,
Brave boy, thou should'st be Master of a soul
Like his: thy honors more concern'd.

Sel. 'Tis charity,
Away wo' mee, 'boy Madam?

Cas. He has a daring spirit. Ex Sel. Eub. Cas.

Arc. These, and a thousand more affronts I must Expect: your favors draw them all upon me;
In my first state I had no enemies,
I was secure, while I did grow beneath
This expectation, humble valleys thrive with Their bowmes full of flowers, when the Hills melt
With lightning, and rough anger of the clouds,
Let me retire.

Que. And can Arcadius
At such a breath be mov'd, I had opinion
Your courage durst have stood a tempest for
Our love, can you for this incline to leave
What other Princes should in vain have sued for?
How many Lovers are in pire now
Would throw themselves on danger, not expect
One enemy, but empty their own veins,
And think the loss of all their blood rewarded,
To have one smile of us when they are dying?
And shall this murmur shake you?

Arc. Not dear Madam,
My life is such a poor despised thing,
In value your least graces, that
To lose it were to make my self a victory,
It is not for my self, I fear: the envy
Of others cannot fasten wound in me
Greater, than that your goodness should be check'd
So daringly.

Que. Let not those thoughts afflict thee,
While we have power to correct the offences,
Arcadius be mine, this shall confirm it.

Arc. I shall forget,
And lose my way to heaven, that touch had been Enough to have restor'd me, and infus'd
A spirit of a more celestial nature,
After the tedious absence of my soul,
Oh bless me not too much, one smile a day
Would stretch my life to mortality;
Poets that wrap divinity in tales,
Look here, and give your coppies forth of angels,
What blessing can remain?

Que. Our Marriage.
Arc. Place then some horrors in the way
For me, not you, to pass, the journeys end
Holds out such glories to me, I should think Hell but a poor degree of suffering for it,
What's that, some petition? a Letter to me.

You had a Polidora, ha, that's all.

Ith' minute when my vessels new launch'd forth,
With all my pride, and silken wings about me
I strike upon a Rock: What power can save me?
You had a Polidora; there's a name
Kill'd with grief, I can so soon forget her.

Ser. She did impose on me this service, Sir,

And while she lives she sayes, shee'll pray for you.

Arc. She lives,
That's well, and yet 'twere better, for my fame,
And honor, she were dead; What fate hath plac'd me
Upon this fearful precipice?

Ser. He's troubled.

Arc. I must resolve, my faith is violated
Already, yet poor loving Polidora
Will pray for me, she sayes, to think she can Render me hated to my self, and every Thought's a tormentor, let me then be just.

Que. Arcadius.

Arc. That voice prevailes agen, oh Polidora,
Thou must forgive Arcadius, I dare not Turn rebel to a Princess, I shall love
Thy vertue, but a Kingdom has a charme
To excuse our faulty, dearest Madam.

Que. Now set forward.

Arc. To perfect all our joyes.

Enter Macarius, and a Bishop, Casander.

Mac. I'll fright their glories.

Cas. By what means?

Mac. Observe.

Arc. Our good Unckle, welcome.

Que. My Lord Macarius, we did want your person,
There's something in our joyes wherein you share.

Mac. This you intend your highness wedding day.

Que. We are going.

Mac. Save you labor
I have brought a Priest to meet you.

Arc. Reverend Father.

Que. Meet us, Why?

Mac. To tell you, that you must not Marry.

Cas. Didst thou hear that, Lisimachus?

Lis. And wonder what will follow.

Que. We must not marry.

Bish. Madam, 'tis a rule
First made in heaven, and I must needs declare
You and Arcadius must tie no knot
Of Man and Wife.

Arc. Is my Unckle mad?

Que. Joy has transported him,
Or age has made him dote, Macarius
Provoke us not too much, you will presume
Above our mercy.

Mac. I'll discharge my duty,
Could your frown strike me dead, my Lord, you know
Whose character this is.

Cas. It is Theodosius,
Your graces Father.

Bis. I am subscrib'd a witness.

Phi. Upon my life 'tis his.

Mac. Fear not, I'll cross this Match.

Cas. I'll bless thee for't.

Arc. Unckle, d'ee know what you do, or what we are Going to finish? you will not break the neck of my glorious
Fortune, now my foots ith' stirrup, and mounting,
Throw me over the saddle? I hope you'll let one
Be a King, Madam, 'tis as you say,
My Unckle is something craz'd, there's a worm
In's brain, but I beseech you pardon him, he is Not the first of your counsel, that has talk'd
Idly, d'ee hear my Lord Bishop, I hope
You have more Religion than to joyn with him
To undoe me.

Bis. Not I Sir, but I am commanded by oath,
And conscience to speak truth.

Arc. If your truth should do me any harm, I shall never
Be in charity with a Croziers staffe, look too't.

Que. My youngest Brother,

Cas. Worse and worse, my brains.

Mac. Deliver to me an Infant with this writing,

Exit.

To which this reverend Father is a witness.

Lis. This he whom we so long thought dead, a child?

Que. But what should make my Father to trust him
To your concealment? give abroad his death, and bury
An empty coffin?

Mic. A jealousy he had
Upon Cassander, whose ambitious brain
He fear'd would make no conscience to depose
His son, to make Lisimachus King of Epire.

Que. He made no scruple to expose me then
To any danger?

Mic. He secur'd you, Madam,
By an early Engagement of your affection
To Lisimachus, exempt this testimony,
Had he been Arcadius, and my Nephew,
I need not obtrude him on the state,
Your love and marriage had made him King
Without my trouble, and sav'd that ambition,
There was necessity to open now
His birth, and title.

Pbi. Demetrius alive.

Arc. What riddles are these, Whom do they talk of?

Omni. Congratulate your return to life, and honor,
And as becomes us, with one voice salute you,
Demetrius King of Epire.

Mic. I am no Uncle, Sir, this is your Sister,
I should have suffer'd incest to have kept you
Longer in' dark: love, and be happy both,
My trust is now discharg'd.

Lis. And we rejoice.

Arc. But do not mock me, Gentlemen,
May I be bold upon your words to say
I am Prince Theodosius Son?

Mic. The King.

Arc. You'll justify it?
Sister, I am very glad to see you.

Sp. I am to find a brother, and resign my glory,
My triumph is my shame.

Enter Cassander.

Cas. Thine ear Lisimachus.

Arc. Gentlemen I owe
Unto your loves, as large acknowledgment
As to my birth, for this great honor, and
My study shall be equal to be thought
Worthy of both.

Cas. Thou art turn'd Marble.

Lis. There will be the less charge for my Monument.

Cas. This must not be, sit fast young King. Exit.

Lis. Your sister, Sir, is gone.

Arc. My sister should have been my Bride, that name
Puts me in mind of Polidora, ha?

Cassander. Philocles, Gentlemen,
'f you will have me think your hearts allow me
Theodosius son, oh quickly snatch some wings,
Express it in your haste to Polidora,
Tell her what title is new dropt from heaven
To make her rich; onely created for me:
Give her the ceremony of my Queen,
With all the state that may become our Bride,
Attend her to this throne; Are you not there?
Yet stay, 'tis too much pride to send for her,
Wee'll go our self, no honor is enough
For Polidora, to redeem our fault,
Salute her gently from me, and, upon
Your knee, present her with this Diadem,
'Tis our first gift, tell her Demetrius follows
To be her guest, and give himself a servant
To her chaste bosome, bid her stretch her heart
To meet me, I am lost in joy and wonder. Exeunt Omnes.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Cassander, Eubulus, Soldier.

Cas. Where's the Captain of the Castle?
Sol. Hee'll attend your honors presently.

Cas. Give him knowledge we expect him.

Sol. I shall, my Lord.

Exit.

Cas. He is my creature, fear not,
And shall run any course that we propound.

Eub. My Lord, I like the substance of your plot,
'Tis promising, but matters of this consequence
Are not so easily perfect, and it does
Concern our heads to build upon secure
Principles, though Seleucus, I confess,
Carry a high, and daring spirit in him,
'Tis hard to thrust upon the state new settled
Any impostor, and we know not yet
Whether hee'll undertake to play the Prince;
Or if he should accept it, with what cunning
He can behave himself.

Cas. My Lord, affairs
Of such a glorious nature, are half finish'd,
When they begin with confidence.

Eub. Admit

He want no art, or courage, it must rest
Upon the people to receive his title,
And with what danger their uncertain breath
May flatter ours, Demetrius scarcely warm
In the Kings seat, I may suspect.

Cas. That reason
Makes for our part, for if it be so probable,
That young Demetrius should be living, Why
May not we work them to believe, Leonatus,
The eldest son was, by some trick, preserv'd,
And now would claim his own: there were two sons,
Who in their Fathers life we supposed dead,
May not we find a circumstance to make
This seem as clear as t'other, let the vulgar
Be once possess'd, wee'll carry Epire from Demetrius, and the World.

Eub. I could be pleas'd
To see my Son a King.

Enter Poleanus.

The Captain's here.

Pol. I waite your Lordships pleasure.

Cas. We come to visit your late prisoner:
I will not doubt, but you intreat him fairly,
He will deserve it for himself, and you
Be fortunate in any occasion,
To have express'd your service.

Pol. Sir, the knowledge
Of my honorable Lord his Father, will Instruct me to behave my self with all
Respects becoming me, to such a son.

Cas. These things will least
Oblige you, but how bears he his restraint?

Pol. As one whose soul's above it.

Eub. Patiently?

Pol. With contempt rather of the great command
Which made him prisoner, he will talke sometimes
So strangely to himself.

Eub. Hee's here.

Enter

Enter Seleucus.

Sel. Why was I born to be a subject? 'tis
Soon answer'd, since my Father was no Prince,
That's all: the same ingredients use to make
A Man, as active, though not royal blood
Went to my composition, and I
Was gotten with as good a will perhaps,
And my birth cost my Mother as much sorrow,
As I had been born an Emperor.

Cas. While I look
Upon him, something in his face presents
A King indeed.

Eub. He does resemble much
Theodosius too.

Cas. Whose son we would pretend him,
This will advance our plot,

Sel. 'Tis but a name,
And mere opinion, that prefers one man
Above another, I'll imagine then
I am a Prince, or some brave thing on Earth,
And see what follows: but it must not be,
My single voice will carry it, the name
Of King must be attended with a troop
Of acclamations, on whose ayrie wings
He mounts, and once exalted, threatens Heaven,
And all the stars: how to acquire this noise,
And be the thing I talke of, men have rise
From a more cheap nobility to Empires,
From dark originals, and sordid blood,
Nay some that had no fathers, sons of the earth,
And flying people, have aspir'd to Kingdoms,
Made nations tremble, and have practis'd frowns
To awe the world, their memory is glorious,
And I would hug them in their shades, but what's
All this to me, that am I know not what,
And less in expectation?

Pol. Are you serious?

Cas. Will you assist, and run a fate with us.

Pol. Command my life, Lowe it to your favor.

Sel. Arcadius was once as far from being
As I, and had we not so cunningly
Been reconcil'd, or one, or both had gone
To seek our fortunes in another world;
What's the device now? If my death be next,
The summons shall not make me once look pale.

Cas. Chide your too vain suspitions, we bring
A life, and liberty, with what else can make Thy ambition happy, th'ast a glorious flame,
Welcome to advance it.

Sel. How?

Cas. Have but a will,
And be what thy own thoughts dare prompt thee to,
A King.

Sel. You do not mock me Gentlemen?
You are my Father, Sir.

Eub. This minute shall Declare it, my Seleucus, our hearts swell'd
With joy, with duty rather, oh my boy!

Sel. What's the mystery?

Pol. You must be a King.

Cas. Seleucus, stay, thou art too incredulous,
Let not our faith, and study to exalt thee,
Be so rewarded.

Eub. I pronounce thee King,
Unless thy spirit be turn'd coward, and
Thou faint to accept it.

Sel. King of what?

Cas. Of Epire.

Sel. Although the Queen, since she sent me hither,
Were gone to Heaven I know not how,
That title could devolve to me.

Cas. We have

No Queen, since he that should have married her,
Is prov'd her youngest brother, and now King
In his own title.

Sel. Thank you Gentlemen,
There's hope for me.

Cas. Why, you dare fight with him
And need be, for the Kingdom.

Sel. With Arcadius?
If you'll make stakes, my life against his crown;
I'll fight with him, and you, and your fine Son,
And all the Courtiers one after another.

Cas. 'Two not come to that.

Sel. I am of your Lordships mind, so fare you well.

Cas. Yet stay and hear —

Sel. What? that you have betray'd me:
Do, tell your King, my life is grown a burden,
And I'll confess, and make your souls look pale,
To see how nimble mine shall leap this battlement
Of flesh, and dying, laugh at your poor malice.

Omnes. No more, long live Leonatus King of Epire.

Sel. Leonatus, Who's that?

Cas. Be bold, and be a King, our brains have been Working to raise you to this height, here are None but friends, dare you but call your self
Leonatus, and but justifie with confidence
What we'll proclaime you, if we do not bring
The Crown to your head, we 'll forfeit ours.

Eub. The state is in distraction, Arcadius
Is prov'd a King, there was an elder brother,
If you dare but pronounce, you are the same,
Forget you are my son.

Pol. These are no trifles, Sir, all is plotted,
To assure your greatness; if you will be wise,
And take the faire occasion that's presented.

Sel. Arcadius, you say, is lawful King,
And now to depose him, you would make me
An elder brother, is't not so?

Cas. Most right.

Sel. Nay, right or wrong, if this be your true meaning.

Omnes. Upon our lives.

Sel. I'll venture mine, but with your pardon,
Whose brain was this? from whom took this plot life?

Eub. My Lord Cassander.

Sel. And you are of his mind? and you? and think
This may be done?

Eub. The destinies shall not cross us, if you have Spirit to undertake it.

Sel. Undertake it?

I am not us'd to compliment, I'll owe
My life to you, my fortunes to your Lordship,
Compose me as you please, and when y'ave made
Me what you promise, you shall both divide
Me equally: one word, my Lord, I had rather
Live in the prison still, than be a propency
To advance his politick ends.

Eub. Have no suspicion.

Cas. So, so, I see Demetrius heels already Trip'd up, and I'll dispatch him out oth' way,
Which gone, I can depose this at my leasure,
Being an Impostor, then my Son stands fair,
And may piece with the Princess, we lose time,
What think you, if we first surprize the Court?
While you command the Castle, we shall curbe
All opposition.

Eub. Let's proclaim him first.

I have some faction, the people love me,
They gain'd to us, wee'll fall upon the Court.

Cas. Unless Demetrius yield himself, he bleeds.

Sel. Who dares call treason sin, when it succeeds?

Exeunt Omnes.

Enter

Enter Sophia, and Charilla.

Cha. Madam, you are too passionate, and lose
The greatness of your soul, with the expence
Of too much grief, for that which providence
Hath eas'd you of, the burden of a state
Above your tender bearing,

Sop. Thour't a fool,
And canst not reach the spirit of a Lady,
Born great as I was, and made onely less
By a too cruel destiny, above
Our tender bearing: What goes richer to
The composition of Man, than ours?
Our soul as free, and spacious; our heart's
As great, our will as large, each thought as active,
And in this onely Man more proud than we,
That would have us less capable of Empire,
But search the stories, and the name of Queen
Shines bright with glory, and some precedents
Above Mans imitation.

Cha. I grant it.
For the honor of our sex, nor have you, Madam,
By any weakness, forfeited command,
He that succeeds, in justice, was before you,
And you have gain'd more, in a royal brother,
Than you could lose by your resign of Epire.

Sop. This I allow Charilla, I ha done;
'Tis not the thought I am depos'd afflicts me,
At the same time I feel a joy to know
My Brother living: no, there is another
Wound in me above cure.

Cha. Virtue forbid.

Sop. Canst find me out a Surgeon for that?

Cha. For what?

Sop. My bleeding fame.

Cha. Oh do not injure
Your own clear innocence.

Sop. Do not flatter me,
I have been guilty of an act, will make
All love in women question'd, is not that
A blot upon a Virgins name? my birth
Cannot extenuate my shame, I am
Become the stain of Epire.

Cha. 'Tis but
Your own opinion, Madam, which presents
Something to fright your self, which cannot
Be in the same shape so horrid to our sense,

Sop. Thour' wou'd'st, but canst not appear ignorant:
Did not the Court, nay, the whole Kingdom, take Notice, I lov'd Lisimachus?

Cha. True, Madam.

Sop. No, I was false,
Though counsel'd by my Father to affect him,
I had my politick ends upon Cassander,
To be absolute Queen, flattering his son with hopes
Of love and marriage, when that very day
I blush to think I wrong'd Lisimachus,
That noble Gentleman, but heaven punish'd me;
For though to know Demetrius was a blessing,
Yet who will not impute it my dishonor.

Cha. Madam, you yet may recompence Lisimachus,
If you affect him now, you were not false
To him, whom then you lov'd not, if you can Find any gentle passion in your soul
To entertain his thought, no doubt his heart,
Though sad, retains a noble will to meet it,
His love was firm to you, and cannot be Unrooted with one storme.

Sop. He will not sure
Trust any language from her tongue that mock'd him,
Although my soul doth weep for't, and is punish'd
To love him above the world.

Enter Lisimachus.

Cha. Hee's here
As fate would have him reconcil'd, be free,
And speak your thoughts.

Lisi. If, Madam, I appear
Too bold, your charity will sign my pardon:
I heard you were not well, which made me haste
To pay the duty of an humble visit.

Sop. You do not mock me, Sir.

Lisi. I am confident
You think me not so lost to manners, in
The knowledge of your person, to bring with me
Such rudeness, I have nothing to present,
But a heart full of wishes for your health,
And what else may be added to your happiness.

Sop. I thought you had been sensible.

Lisi. How Madam?

Sop. A man of understanding, can you spend
One prayer for me, remembering the dishonor
I have done Lisimachus?

Lisi. Nothing can deface that part of my Religion in me, not to pray for you.

Sop. It is not then impossible you may
Forgive me too, indeed I have a soul
Full of penitence, and something else,
If blushing would allow to give't a name.

Lisi. What Madam?

Sop. Love, a love that should redeem
My past offence, and make me white again.

Lisi. I hope no sadness can possess your thoughts
For me, I am not worthy of this sorrow,
But if you mean it any satisfaction
For what your will hath made me suffer, 'tis
But a strange overflow of Charity,
To keep me still alive, be your self Madam,
And let no cause of mine, be guilty of
This rape upon your eyes, my name's not worth
The least of all your tears.

Sop. You think 'em counterfeit.

Lisi. Although I may
Suspect a Womans smile hereafter, yet
I would believe their wet eyes, and if this
Be what you promise, for my sake, I have
But one reply.

Sop. I waite it.

Lisi. I have now
Another Mistres.

Sop. Stay.

Lisi. To whom I have made
Since your revolt from me, a new chaste vow,
Which not the second malice of my fate
Shall violate, and she deserves it, Madam,
Even for that wherein you are excellent,
Beauty, in which she shines equal to you
Her vertue, if she but maintain what now
She is Mistres of, beyond all competition,
So rich it cannot know to be improv'd,
At least in my esteem, I may offend,
But truth shall justifie, I have not flatter'd her,
I beg your pardon, and to leave my duty
Upon your hand, all that is good flow in you.

Exit.

Sop. Did he not say, Charilla, that he had Another Mistres?

Cha. Such a sound, methought,
Came from him.

Sop. Let's remove, here's too much ayre,
The sad note multiplies.

Cha. Take courage, Madam,
And my advice, he has another Mistres,
If he have twenty, be you wife, and cross him
With entertaining twice as many servants,
And when he sees your humor he'll return.

And

And sue for any Livery, grieve for this,

Sop. It must be she, 'tis Polidora has Taken his heart, she live my rival,
How does the thought inflame me?

Cha. Polidora?

Sop. And yet she does but justly, and he too;
I would have rob'd her of Arcadius heart,
And they will both have this revenge on me,
But something will rebel.

Enter Demetrius, Philocles, Lisander.

De. The house is desolate, none comes forth to meet us,
Shee's slow to entertain us: Philocles,
I prethee tell me, did she weare no cloud
Upon her brow, was't freely that she said
We should be welcome.

Phi. To my apprehension,
Yet 'tis my wonder she appears not.

Lisa. She, nor any other,
Sure there's some conceit
To excuse it.

Dem. Stay, Who's this? observe what follows?

Phi. Fortune? some inaske to entertain you, Sir.

Enter Fortune crown'd, attended with Youth, Health, and Pleasure.

For. Not yet? What silence doth inhabit here?
No preparation to bid Fortune welcome!
Fortune, the genius of the World, have we Descended from our pride, and state to come,
So far attended with our darlings, Youth,
Pleasure, and Health, to be neglected thus?
Sure this is not the place? call hither Fame.

Enter Fame.

Fa. What would great Fortune?

For. Know.

Who dwells here.

Fa. Once more I report great Queen,
This is the house of Love.

For. It cannot be,
This place has too much shade, and looks as if
't had been quite forgotten of the Spring,
And Sun-beames Love, affect society,
And heat, here all is cold as the hairs of Winter,
No harmony, to catch the busie eare
Of passengers, no object of delight,
To take the wandring eyes, no song, no grone
Of Lovers, no complaint of Willow garlands,
Love has a Beacon upon his palace top,
Of flaming hearts, to call the weary pilgrime
To rest, and dwell with him, I see no fire
To threaten, or to warme: Can Love dwell here?

Fa. If there be noble love upon the World,
Trust Fame, and find it here.

For. Make good your boast,
And bring him to us.

De. What does mean all this?

Lisa. I told you, Sir, we should have some device.

Enter Love.

There's Cupid now, that little Gentleman,
Has troubled every Masque at Court this seven year.

Dem. No more.

Love. Welcome to Love, how much you honor me!
It had become me, that, upon your summons,
I should have waited upon mighty Fortune,
But since you have vouchsafed to visit me;
All the delights Love can invent, shall flow
To entertain you, Musick through the ayre

Shoot your inticing harmony.

For. We came to dance and revel with you.

Lov. I am poor

In my ambition, and want thought to reach
How much you honor Love.

Dance.

Enter Honor.

Hon. What intrusion's this?
Whom do you seek here:

Lov. 'Tis honor.

For. He my servant.

Lov. Fortune is come to visit us.

Hon. And has
Corrupted Love: Is this thy faith to her,
On whom we both waite, to betray her thus
To Fortunes triumph? take her giddy wheel,
And be no more companion to honor;
I blush to know thee, Who'll believe there can Be truth in Love hereafter?

Lov. I have found
My eyes, and see my shame, and with it, this Proud forcecefs, from whom, and all her charmes,
I flye agen to Honor, be my guard,
Without thee I am lost, and cannot boast,
The merit of a name:

For. Despis'd? I shall Remember this affront.

Dem. What Moral's this?

Exeunt.

Enter Honor with the Crown upon a mourning
Cushion.

What melancholly object strikes a sudden
Chillness through all my veines; and turns me Ice?
It is the same I sent, the very fame,
As the first pledge of her insuing greatness:
Why in this mourning livery, if she live
To whom I sent it? ha, What shape of sorrow?

Enter Polidora in mourning.

It is not Polidora, she was faire
Enough, and wanted not the setting off
With such a black: if thou beest Polidora,
Why mournes my love? it neither does become
Thy fortune, nor my joyes.

Pol. But it becomes
My griefs, this habit fits a funeral,
And it were sin, my Lord, not to lament
A friend new dead.

Dem. And I yet living? can
A sorrow enter but upon thy Garment,
Or discomplexion thy attire, whilst I
Enjoy a life for thee? Who can deserve,
Weigh'd with thy living comforts, but a piece
Of all this Ceremony? give him a name.

Pol. He was Arcadius.

Dem. Arcadius?

Pol. A Gentleman that lov'd me dearly once,
And does compel these poor, and fruitless drops,
Which willingly would fall upon his hearse,
To imbalme him twice.

Dem. And are you sure hee's dead?

Pol. As sure as you'r living, Sir, and yet
I did not close his eyes, but he is dead,
And I shall never see the same Arcadius:
He was a Man so rich in all that's good,
At least I thought him so, so perfect in
The rules of honor, whom alone to imitate
Were glory in a Prince, Nature her self,
Till his creation, wrought imperfectly,
As she had made but tryal of the rest,
To mould him excellent.

Dem. And

Dem. And is he dead?
Come, thame him not with praises, recollect
Thy scatter'd hopes, and let me tell my best,
And dearest Polidora, that he lives,
Still lives to honor thee.

Pol. Lives, Where?

Dem. Look here.

Am not I worth your knowledge?

Pol. And my duty,

You are Demetrius, King of Epire, Sir.
I could not easily mistake him so,
To whom I gave my heart.

Dem. Mine is not chang'd,
But still hath fed upon thy memory,
These honors, and additions of state
Are lent me for thy sake, be not so strange,
Let me not lose my entertainment, now
I am improv'd, and rais'd unto the height,
Beneath which, I did blush to ask thy love.

Pol. Give me your pardon, Sir, Arcadius,
At our last meeting, without argument,
To move him more than his affection to me,
Saw'd he did love me; love me above all Women,
And to confirm his heart, was truly mine,
He wish'd, I tremble to remember it,
When he forsook his Polidora's love,
That Heaven might kill his happiness on Earth:
Was not this nobly said? did not this promise
A truth to shame the Turtles?

Dem. And his heart
Is still the same, and I thy constant Lover.

Pol. Give me your leave, I pray, I would not say,
Arcadius was perjur'd, but the same day
Forgetting all his promises, and oathes,
While yet they hung upon his lips, forsook me,
D'ee not remember this too, gave his faith
From me, transported with the noise of greatness,
And would be married to a Kingdom.

Dem. But Heaven permitted not I should dispose
What was ordain'd for thee.

Pol. It was not virtue
In him, for sure he found no check, no sting
In his own bosome, but gave freely all
The reins to blind ambition.

Dem. I am wounded,
The thought of thee ith' throng of all my joyes,
Like poison powr'd in Nectar, turnes me frantick:
Dear, if Arcadius have made a fault,
Let not Demetrius be punish'd for't,
He pleads that ever will be constant to thee.

Pol. Shall I believe Mans flatteries agen,
Lose my sweet rest, and peace of thought agen,
Be drawn by you, from the streight paths of virtue,
Into the maze of Love.

Dem. I see compassion in thy eye, that chides me,
If I have either soul, but what's contain'd
Within these words, or if one syllable
Of their full force, be not made good by me,
May all relenting thoughts in you take end,
And thy disdain be doubled, from thy pardon,
I'll count my Coronation; and that hour
Fix with a rubrick in my Calendar,
As an auspicious time, to entertain
Affairs of weight with Princes; think who now
Intreats thy mercy, come, thou sha't be kind,
And divide Titles with me.

Pol. Hear me, Sir,
I lov'd you once for virtue, and have not
A thought so much unguarded, as to be won
From my truth, and innocence with any Motives of state to affect you,
Your bright temptation mourns while it staves here;
Nor can the triumph of glory, which made you
Forget me, so court my opinion back,

Were you no King, I should be sooner drawn
Again to love you, but 'tis now too late,
A low obedience shall become me best:
May all the joyes I want
Still wait on you, if time hereafter tell you,
That sorrow for your fault hath struck me dead,
May one soft tear drop from your eye, in pitty
Bedew my hearse, and I shall sleep securely:
I have but one word more for goodness sake,
For your own honor, Sir, correct your passion,
To her you shall love next, and I forgive you.

Exit.

Dem. Her heart is frozen up, nor can warm prayers
Thaw it to any softness.

Phi. I'll fetch her, Sir, again.

Dem. Perswade her not.

Phi. You give your passion too much leave to triumph.
Seek in another what she denies.

Enter Macarius.

Mac. Where's the King? oh, Sir, you are undone,
A dangerous treason is a foot.

Dem. What Treason?

Mac. Cassander, and Eubulus have proclaim'd
Another King, whom they pretend to be Leonatus your elder Brother, he that was,
But this morning prisoner in the Castle.

Dem. Ha?

Mac. The easie Epirotes
Gather in multitudes to advance his Title,
They have seised upon the Court, secure your person,
Whilst we raise power to curbe this Insurrection.

Ant. Lose no time then.

Dem. We will not Arme one Man,
Speak it agen, have I a brother living?
And must be no King.

Mac. What means your Grace?

Dem. This newes doth speak me happy, it exalts
My heart, and makes me capable of more Than twenty Kingdoms.

Phi. Will you not, Sir, stand
Upon your guard?

Dem. I'll stand upon my honor,
Mercy relieves me.

Lisa. Will you lose the Kingdom?

Dem. The World's too poor to bribe me: leave
Me all, lest you extenuate my fame, and I
Be thought to have redeem'd it by your counsel,
You shall not share one scruple in the honor;
Titles may set a gloss upon our Name,
But Virtue onely is the soul of Fame.

Mac. He's strangely possess'd Gentlemen. Exeunt Omnes.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Philocles, and Lisander.

Phi. Heres a strange turne, Lisander.
Lisa. 'Tis a Kingdom
Easily purchas'd, who will trust the faith
Of multitudes?

Phi. It was his fault, that would
So tamely give his Title to their Mercy,
The new King has possession.

Lisa. And is like
To keep't, we are alone, what dost think of This innovation? Is't not a fine Jigge?

A precious cunning in the late Protector
To shuffle a new Prince into the state.

Phi. I know not how they have shuffled, but my head on't,
A false card is turn'd up trump, but fates look to't.

Enter Cassander and Eubulus.

Eub. Does he not carry it bravely?

Caf. Excellently.

Philocles, Lisander.

Phi. Lif. Your Lordships servants,
Are we not bound to heaven, for multiplying
These blessings on the Kingdom.

Phi. Heaven alone

Works miracles, my Lord.

Lisa. I think your Lordship
Had as little hope once to see these Princes Revive.

Phi. Here we must place our thanks,
Next providence, for preserving
So dear a pledge.

Enter Leonatus attended.

Eub. The King.

Leo. It is our pleasure

The number of our guard be doubled, give
A Large's to the Soldiers; but dismiss not
The Troops till we command.

Caf. May it please.

Leo. It will not please us otherwise, my Lord,
We have try'd your faith.

Eub. Does he not speak with confidence?

Leo. My Lords and Gentlemen, to whose faith we must Owe next to Heaven our fortune, and our safety,
After a tedious eclipse, the day
Is bright, and we invested in those honors,
Our blood, and birth did challenge.

Caf. May no time

Be registred in our annals, that shall mention
One that had life to oppose your sacred person,

Leo. Let them, whose Titles forg'd and slaw'd, suspect
Their states security, our right to Epire,
Heaven is oblig'd to prosper, treason has
No face so black to fright it, all my cares
Level to this, that I may worthily
Manage the province, and advance the honor
Of our dear Countrey, and be confident,
If an expence of blood, may give addition
Of any happiness to you, I shall Offer my heart the sacrifice, and rejoyce
To make my self a ghost, to have inscrib'd
Upon my marble, but whose cause I died for.

Eub. May Heaven avert such danger.

Caf. Excellent Prince,

In whom we see the Copy of his Father,
None but the Son of Theodosius,
Could have spoke thus.

Leo. We are pleas'd to interpret well,
Yet give me leave to say in my own justice,
I have but exprest the promptness of my soul
To serve you all, but 'tis not empty wishes
Can satisfy our mighty charge, a weight
Would make an Atlas double, a Kings name
Doth sound harmoniously to men at distance;
And those who cannot penetrate beyond
The bark, and out-skin of a Common-wealth,
Or state, have eyes, but ravish'd with the Ceremony
That must attend a Prince, and understand not
What cares allay the glories of a Crown,
But good Kings find and feel the contrary,
You have try'd, my Lord, the burden, and can tell
It would require a Pilot of more years
To steer this Kingdom, now impos'd on me,

By justice of my birth.

Caf. I wish not life,

But to partake those happy days, which must
Succeed these fair proceedings, we are blest,
But Sir, be sparing to your self, we shall Hazard our joyes in you too soon, the burden
Of state affairs, impose upon your counsel.
'Tis fitter that we waste our lives than you,
Call age too soon upon you with the trouble,
And cares that threaten such an undertaking;
Preserve your youth.

Leo. And choose you our Protector,
Is't that you would conclude my Lord? We will Deserve our subjects faith for our own sake,
Not sit an idle gazer at the helm

Enter Messenger.

Phi. How observ'd you that,
Mark how Cassander's Planet struck.

Eu. He might have look'd more calmly for all that,
I begin to fear; but do not yet seem troubled.

Leo. With what news travels his haste? I must secure
My self betimes, not be a King in jest,
And wear my Crown a Tenant to their breath.

Caf. Demetrius, Sir, your brother,
With other Traitors that oppose your claims,
Are fled to the Castle of Nestorius,
And fortifie.

Mes. I said not so my Lord.

Caf. I'll have it thought so, hence.

Exit Messen.

Leo. Plant forces to batter
The walls, and in their ruin bring us work
They live not.

Eub. Good Sir hear me.

Caf. Let it work,
Were Demetrius dead, we easily might uncrown
This swoln Impostor, and my Son be fair
To piece with young Sophia, who I hear
Repents her late affront.

Eub. Their lives may do
You service, let not blood stain your beginnings
The people not yet warm in their allegiance,
May think it worth their tumult to revenge it
With hazard of your self.

Leo. Who dares but think it?
Yet offer first our mercy, if they yield,
Demetrius must not live, my Lord your counsel,
What if he were in heaven?

Caf. You have my consent,
You sha'not stay long after him.

Leo. Sophia is
Not my Sister,
To prevent all that may indanger us, we'll marry her;
That done, no matter though we stand discover'd,
For in her Title then we are King of Epire,
Without dispute,

Caf. Hum; in my judgement, Sir,
That wonot do so well.

Leo. What's your opinion?

Caf. He countermines my plot: are you so cunning

Leo. What's that you mutter, Sir?

Caf. I mutter, Sir?

Leo. Best say I am no King, but some impostor
Rais'd up to gull the state.

Caf. Very fine to have said within
Few hours you'd been no King, nor like to be;
Was not in the compass of High Treason
I take it:

Eub. Restrein your anger, the Kings mov'd, speak not:

Caf. I will speak louder, do I not know him?
That self-same hand that rais'd him to the throne
Shall pluck him from it, is this my reward?

Leo. Our guard, to prison with him,

R r

Caf.

Caf. Me to prison ?

Leo. Off with his head.

Caf. My head ?

Eub. Vouchsafe to hear me, great Sir.

Caf. How dares he be so insolent ?

I ha' wrought my self into a fine condition,
Do'e know me Gentlemen ?

Phi. Very well my Lord ;

How are we bound to heaven for multiplying
These blessings on the Kingdom.

Leo. We allow it.

Eub. Counsel did never blast a Princes ear.

Leo. Convey him to the sanctuary of Rebels,
Nestorius house, where our proud brother has Encons'd himself, they'll entertain him lovingly,
He will be a good addition to the Traitors,
Obey me, or you dye for't, what are Kings
When subjects dare affront 'em ?

Caf. I shall vex
Thy soul for this.

Leo. Away with him : when Kings
Frown, let offenders tremble, this flows not
From any cruelty in my nature, but
The fate of an Usurper : he that will
Be confirm'd great without just title to't,
Must lose compassion, know what's good, not do't.

Exeunt.

Enter Polidora and her servant.

Serv. Madam, the Princess Sophia.

Pol. I attend her Highness.

Enter Sophia.

How much your grace honors your humble servant

Sop. I hope my brother's well.

Pol. I hope so too, Madam.

Sop. Do you but hope ? he came to be your guest.

Pol. We are all his, whilst he is pleas'd to honor
This poor roof with his royal presence, Madam.

Sop. I came to ask your pardon Polidora.

Pol. You never, Madam, trespass'd upon me,
Wrong not your goodness.

Sop. I can be but penitent,
Unless you point me out some other way
To satisfy.

Pol. Dear Madam, do not mock me.

Sop. There's no injury like that to love,
I find it now in my own sufferings :
But though I would have rob'd thee of Arcadius
Heaven knew a way to reconcile your hearts,
And punish me in those joys you have found :
I read the story of my loss of honor,
Yet can rejoice, and heartily, that you
Have met your own agen.

Pol. Whom do you mean ?

Sop. My brother.

Pol. He is found to himself and honor,
He is my King, and though I must acknowledge
He was the glory of my thoughts, and I
Lov'd him, as you did, Madam, with desire
To be made his reason, and duty since,
Form'd me to other knowledge, and I now
Look on him without any wish of more
Than to be call'd his subject.

Sop. Has he made
Himself less capable by being King ?

Pol. Of what ?

Sop. Of your affection.

Pol. With your pardon, Madam.
Love in that sense you mean, lest Polidora
When he forsook Arcadius, I disclaim
All ties between us, more than what a name
Of King must challenge from my obedience.

Sop. This does confirm my jealousy, my heart,
For my sake, Madam, has he lost his value ?

Pol. Let me beseech your grace, I may have leave
To answer in some other cause, or person :
This argument but opens a sad wound
To make it bleed afresh ; we may change this Discourse : I would elect some subject, whose Praises may more delight your ear than this
Can mine ; let's talk of young Lisimachus.

Sop. Ha ; my presaging fears.

Pol. How does your grace ?

Sop. Well, you were talking of Lisimachus,
Pray give me your opinion of him.

Pol. Mine ?

It will be much short of his worth : I think him
A gentleman so perfect in all goodness,
That if there be one in the world deserves
The best of women, heaven created him,
To make her happy.

Sop. You have, in a little, Madam,
Express'd a volume of mankind, a miracle ;
But all have not the same degree of faith,
He is but young.

Pol. What Mistress would desire
Her servant old ? he has both Spring to please
Her eye, and Summer to return a harvest.

Sop. He is black.

Pol. He sets a beauty off more rich,
And she that's fair will love him ; faint complexions
Betray effeminate minds, and love of change :
Two beauties in a bed, compound few men ;
He's not so fair to counterfeit a woman,
Nor yet so black, but blushes may betray
His modesty.

Sop. His proportion exceeds not.

Pol. That praises him, and a well compacted frame
Speaks temper, and sweet flow of elements :
Vast buildings are more oft for shew than use :
I would not have my eyes put to the travel
Of many acres, e'r I could examine
A man from head to foot ; he has no great,
But he may boast, an elegant composition.

Sop. I'll hear no more, you have so far out-done
My injuries to you, that I call back
My penitence, and must tell Polidora,
This revenge ill becomes her. Am I thought
So lost in soul to hear, and forgive this ?
In what shade do I live ? or shall I think
I have not, at the lowest, enough merit,
Setting aside my birth, to poize with yours :
Forgive my modest thoughts, if I rise up
In my own defence, and tell this unjust Lady
So great a winter hath not frozen yet
My cheek, but there's something nature planted,
That carries as much bloom, and spring upon't,
As yours. What flame is in your eye, but may Find competition here ? (forgive agen
My Virgin honor, what is in your lip
To tice the enamour'd soul, to dwell with more
Ambition, than the yet unwither'd blush
That speaks the innocence of mine ?

Enter Demetrius.

Oh brother ?

Dem. I'll talk with you anon, my Polidora,
Allow thy patience till my breath recover,
Which now comes laden with the richest news
Thy ear was ever blest with.

Sop. Both your looks,
And voice express some welcome accident.

Dem. Guess what in wish could make me fortunate
And heaven hath dropt that on Demetrius.

Sop. What means this extatic ?

Dem.

Dem. 'Twere sin to busie
Thy thoughts upon't, I'll tell thee that I could Retain some part; 'tis too wide a joy
To be express'd so soon, and yet it falls
In a few syllables, thou wot scarce believe me,
I am no King.

Sop. How's that!

Pol. Good Heaven forbid.

Dem. Forbid? Heaven has reliev'd me with a mercy
I knew not how to ask, I have, they say,
An elder brother living, crown'd already,
I only keep my name Demetrius,
Without desire of more addition,
Than to return thy servant.

Pol. You amaze me,
Can you rejoyce to be deposed:

Dem. It but

Translates me to a fairer and better Kingdom
In Polidora.

Pol. Me?

Dem. Did you not say,
Were I no King, you could be drawn to love
Me agen, that was consented to in Heaven:
A Kingdom first betray'd my ambitious soul
To forget thee, that, and the flattering glories,
How willingly Demetrius does resign,
The Angels know: thus naked without Titles
I throw me on thy charity, and shall Boast greater Empire to be thine agen, than
To wear the triumphs of the world upon me.

Enter Macarius.

Mac. Be not so careless of your self, the people
Gather in multitudes to your protection
Offering their lives and fortunes, if they may
But see you Sir, and hear you speak to 'em,
Accept their duties, and in time prevent
Your ruin.

Sop. Be not desperate, 'tis counsel.

Dem. You trouble me with noise, speak Polidora

Pol. For your own sake preserve your self,
My fears distract my reason.

Enter Antigonus.

Ant. Lord Lisimachus,
With something that concerns your safety, is Fled hither, and desires a present hearing.

Mac. His soul is honest, be not, Sir, a mad man,
And for a Lady, give up all our freedoms.

Pol. I'll say any thing here, Lisimachus.

Sop. Dear brother hear him.

Enter Lisimachus.

Lif. Sir, I come to yield
My self your prisoner, if my father have Rais'd an Impostor to supplant your Title
Which I suspect, and inwardly do bleed for,
I shall not only, by the tender of
My self, declare my innocence, but either,
By my unworthy life, secure your person,
Or by what death you shall impose, reward
The unexpected Treason.

Sop. Brave young man,
Did you not hear him Brother?

Lif. I am not minded.

Pol. Be witness Madam, I resign my heart
It never was another's, you declare
Too great a satisfaction, I hope
This will destroy your jealousy,
Remember now your danger.

Dem. I despise it,

What fate dares injure me?

Lif. Yet hear me Sir.

Sop. Forgive me Polidora, you are happy,
My hopes are remov'd farther, I had thought
Lisimachus had meant you for his Mistress,
'Tis misery to feed, and not know where
To place my jealousy.

Enter Macarius.

Mac. Now 'tis too late,
You may be deaf, until the Cannon make,
You find your sense, we are shut up now by
A troop of Horse, thank your self.

Pol. They will Admit conditions.

Sop. And allow us quarter.

A shout within.

Pol. We are all lost.

Dem. Be comforted.

Enter Antigonus.

Ant. News my Lord Cassander sent by the new King.
To bear us company.

Dem. Not as prisoner?

Ant. It does appear no otherwise, the soldiers
Declare how much they love him, by their noise
Of Iron, and joy to see him so rewarded.

Dem. It cannot be.

Ant. You'll find it presently,
He curses the new King, talks treason 'gainst him
As nimble as he were in's shirt, he's here.

Enter Cassander.

Cas. Oh let me beg until my knees take root
P' th' earth, Sir, can you pardon me?

Dem. For what?

Cas. For Treason, desperate, most malicious Treason:
I have undone you Sir.

Dem. It does appear
You had a Will.

Cas. I'll make you all the recompence I can,
But e'r you kill me, hear me, know the man,
Whom I to serve my unjust ends, advanc'd
To your throne, is an impostor, a mere counterfeit,
Eubulus' Son.

Exit Anti

Dem. It is not then our brother?

Cas. An insolent usurper, proud, and bloody;
Seleucus, is no leprosie upon me?

There is not punishment enough in nature
To quit my horrid act, I have not in My stock of blood, to satisfy with weeping,
Nor could my soul, though melted to a flood
Within me, gush out tears to wash my stain off.

Dem. How? an Impostor, what will become on's now?
We are at his mercy.

Cas. Sir, the peoples hearts
Will come to their own dwelling, when they see
I dare accuse my self, and suffer for it,
Have courage then young King, thy fate cannot Be long compell'd.

Dem. Rise, our misfortune
Carries this good, although it lose our hopes,
It makes you friend with virtue, we'll expect
What providence will do.

Cas. You are too merciful.

Lif. Our duties shall beg heaven still to preserve you.

Enter Antigonus.

Ant. Our enemy desires some parley, Sir,

Lif. 'Tis not amiss to hear their proposition.

Pol. I'll wait upon you.

Dem. Thou art my Angel, and canst best instruct me,
Boldly present our selves, you'll with Cassander.

Cas. And in death be blest
To find our clarity,

Exit.

Sop. Lisimachus.

Lis. Madam.

Sop. They will not miss your presence, the small time
Is spent in asking of a question.

Lis. I wait your pleasure.

Sop. Sir, I have a suit to you.

Lis. To me? it must be granted.

Sop. If you have
Cancell'd your kind opinion of me,
Deny me not to know, who hath succeeded
Sophia in your heart, I beg the name
Of your new Mistris.

Lis. You shall know her, Madam,
If but these tumults cease, and fate allow us
To see the Court agen, I hope you'll bring
No mutiny against her, but this is
No time to talk of Love, let me attend you.

Sop. I must expect, till you are pleas'd to satisfie
My poor request, conduct me at your pleasure. Exeunt.

Enter Leonatus, Eubulus, Bishop, Lisander, and Philocles.

Leo. They are too slow, dispatch new messengers,
To intreat 'em fairly hither, I am extasi'd,
Were you witness for me too? is it possible
I am what this affirms, true Leonatus,
And were you not my Father, was I given
In trust to you an Infant?

Eub. 'Tis a truth,
Our soul's bound to acknowledge, you supply'd
The absence and opinion of my Son.
Who died, but to make you my greater care
I know not of Demetrius, but suppos'd
Him dead indeed, as Epire thought you were,
Your Fathers character doth want no testimony,
Which but compar'd with what concerns Demetrius
Will prove it self King Theodosius act,
Your Royal Father.

Bish. I am subscrib'd to both his Legacies
By oath oblig'd to secresie, until
Thus fairly summon'd to reveal the trust.

Eub. Cassander had no thought you would prove thus,
To whose policie I gave this aim, although
He wrought you up to serve but as his Engine
To batter young Demetrius, for it was
Your Fathers prudent jealousy, that made him
Give out your early deaths, as if his soul
Prophecy'd his own first, and fear'd to leave
Either of you, to the unsafe protection,
Of one, whose study would be to supplant
Your right, and make himself the King of Epire.

Bish. Your Sister, fair Sophia, in your Fathers
Life, was design'd to marry with Lisimachus
That guarded her; although she us'd some Art
To quit her pupillage, and being absolute,
Declar'd love to Demetrius, which enforc'd
Macarius to discover first your brother.

Leo. No more, lest you destroy agen Leonatus
With wonder of his fate, are they not come yet?
Something it was, I felt within my envy
Of young Demetrius's fortune, there were seeds
Scattered upon my heart, that made it swell
With thought of Empire, Princes I see cannot Be totally eclips'd, but wherefore stays
Demetrius and Sophia, at whose names
A gentle spirit walk'd upon my blood.

Enter Demetrius, Polidora, Sophia, Macarius, Cassander, Lisima.

Eub. They are here,

Leo. Then thus I flie into their bosoms,
Nature has rectifi'd in me, Demetrius,
The wandrings of ambition, our dear Sister
You are amaz'd, I did expect it, read
Assurance there, the day is big with wonder;

Mac. What means all this?

Leo. Lisimachus, be dear to us,
Cassander, you are welcome too.

Cas. Not I,
I do not look for't, all this sha'not bribe
My conscience to your faction, and make Me false agen, Seleucus is no son
Of Theodosius, my dear Countrey-men
Correct your erring duties, and to that,
Your lawful King, prostrate your selves, Demetrius
Doth challenge all your knees.

Dem. All Love and Duty,
Flow from me to my Royal King, and Brother
I am confirm'd.

Cas. You are two credulous,
What can betray your faith so much?

Leo. Sophia, you appear sad, as if your Will Gave no consent to this days happines.

Sop. No joy exceeds Sophia's for your self.

Lis. With your pardon, Sir, I apprehend
A cause that makes her troubled, she desires
To know, what other Mistris, since her late Unkindness, I have chosen to direct
My faith and service.

Leo. Another Mistris?

Lis. Yes, Sir.

Leo. And does our Sister love Lisimachus?

Sop. Here's something would confess.

Leo. He must not dare
To affront Sophia.

Cas. How my shame confounds me,
I beg your justice, without pity on
My age.

Leo. Your pennance shall be, to be faithful
To our state hereafter,

Omnes. May you live long and happy,
Leonatus, King of Epire.

Leo. But where's your other Mistris?

Lis. Even here, Sir.

Leo. Our Sister? is this another Mistris, Sir?

Sis. It holds

To prove my thoughts were so when she began
Her sorrow for neglecting me, that sweetness
Deserv'd, I should esteem her another Mistris,
Then when she cruelly forsook Lisimachus,
Your pardon Madam, and receive a heart
Proud with my first devotions to serve you.

Sop. In this I am crown'd agen, now mine for ever.

Leo. You have deceiv'd her happily,
Joy to you both.

Dem. We are ripe for the same wishes,
Polidora's part of me.

Pol. He all my blessing.

Leo. Heaven pour full joys upon you.

Mac. We are all blest,
There wants but one to fill your arms.

Leo. My Mistris,
And Wife shall be my Countrey, to which I
Was in my birth contracted, your love since
Hath plaid the Priest to perfect what was ceremony
Though Kingdoms by just Titles prove our own,
The subjects hearts do best secure a Crown.

Exeunt Omnes.

EPILOGUE.

T Here is no Coronation to day,
 Unless your gentle votes do crown our Play,
 If smiles appear within each Ladies eye,
 Which are the leading Stars in this fair skie,
 Our solemn day sets glorious, for then
 We hope by their sad influence, the men
 Will grace what they first shin'd on, make't appear,

(Both) how we please, and bless our covetous ear
 With your applause, more welcome than the Bells
 Upon a triumph, Bonfires, or what else
 Can speak a Coronation. And though I
 Were late depos'd, and spoil'd of Majesty,
 By the kind aid of your hands, Gentlemen,
 I quickly may be Crown'd a Queen agen.

P R O L O G U E.

T His Comedy long forgot, by some thought dead,
By us preserv'd, once more doth raise her head.
And to your noble censures does present,
Her outward form, and inward ornament.
Nor let this smell of arrogance, since 'tis known,
The makers that confest it for their own
Were this way skilful, and without the crime
Of flatteries I may say did please the time;
The work it self too, when it first came forth,
In the opinion of men of worth,
Was well receiv'd and favour'd, though some rude

And harsh among th' ignorant multitude,
(That relish gross food, better than a dish,
That's cook'd with care, and serv'd into the wish,
Of curious pallats) wanting wit and strength,
Truly to judge, condemn'd it for the length,
That fault's reform'd, and now 'tis to be try'd
Before such Judges 'twill not be deny'd
A free and noble hearing: nor fear I,
But 'twill deserve to have free liberty,
And give you cause (and with content) to say,
Their care was good, that did revive this Play.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Richardo and Viola.

Rich.

Let us make use of this stolen privacy,
And not loose time in protestation, Mistress,
For 'twere in me a kind of breach of faith,
To say again I love you.

Viola. Sweet, speak softly
For though the venture of your love to me,
Meets with a willing, and a full return:
Should it arrive unto my Fathers knowledge;
This were our last discourse.

Rich. How shall he know it?

Viola. His watching cares are such, for my advancement,
That every where his eye is fix'd upon me:
This night that does afford us some small freedom,
At the request and much intreaty of
The Mistress of the House, was hardly given me:
For I am never suffer'd to stir out,
But he hath spies upon me: yet I know not
You have so won upon me, that could I think
You would love faithfully (though to entertain Another thought of you, would be my death)
I should adventure on his utmost anger.

Rich. Why do you think I can be false?

Viola. No faith,
You've an honest face, but if you should —

Rich. Let all the stor'd vengeance of heaven's justice —

Viola. No more, I do believe you, the dance ended,
Which this free womans ghests have vow'd to have E'r they depart, I will make home, and store me
With all the Jewels, Chains, and Gold are trusted
Unto my custody, and at the next corner,
To my Fathers house, before one at the farthest,
Be ready to receive me.

Rich. I desire
No bond beyond your promise, let's go in,
To talk thus much, before the door, may breed Suspicion.

Enter Mercury and Antonio talking.

Viola. Here are company too.

Rich. Away,
Those powers that prosper true and honest loves
Will bless our undertakings.

Viola. 'Tis my wish, Sir. Exit Rich. and Viola.

Mer. Nay, Sir, excuse me, I have drawn you to Too much expence already in my travel:
And you have been too forward in your love;
To make my wants your own, allow me manners
Which you must grant I want, should I increase,
The bond in which your courtesies have ti'd me:
By still consuming you, give me leave
To take mine own ways now, and I shall often,
With willingness, come to visit you, and then thank you.

Ant. By this hand I could be angry, what do you think me?
Must we that have so long time been as one
Seen Cities, Countreys, Kingdoms, and their wonders;
Been bedfellows, and in our various journey
Mixt all our observations, part (as if
We were two Carriers at two several ways,
And as the fore-horse guides, cry God be with you)
Without or compliment, or ceremony?
In Travellers, that know transalpine garbs,
Though our designs are nec'r so serious, friend,
It were a capital crime, it must not be:
Nay, what is more, you shall not; you e'r long,
Shall see my house, and find what I call mine

Is wholly at your service.

Mer. 'Tis this tires me,
Sir, I were easily woo'd, if nothing else
But my Will lay in the choice: but 'tis not so;
My friends and kindred that have part of me,
And such on whom my chiefest hopes depend,
Justly expect the tender of my love
After my travel: then mine own honesty
Tells me 'tis poor, having indifferent means
To keep me in my quality and rank,
At my return, to tire anothers bounty,
And let mine own grow lusty, pardon me.

Ant. I will not, cannot, to conclude, I dare not:
Can any thing conferr'd upon my friend
Be burthen some to me? for this excuse
Had I no reason else, you should not leave me,
By a travellers faith you should not, I have said,
And then you know my humor, there's no contending.

Mer. Is there no way to 'scape this Inundation?
I shall be drown'd with folly if I go
And after nine days, men may take me up,
With my gall broken.

Ant. Are you yet resolv'd?

Mer. Wou'd you would spare me:

Ant. By this light I cannot
By all that may be sworn by.

Mer. Patience help me,
And heaven grant his folly be not catching:
If it be, the Town's undone, I now would give
A reasonable sum of gold to any Sheriff,
That would but lay an execution on me,
And free me from his company; while he was abroad,
His want of wit and language kept him dumb?
But Balaam's Ass will speak now, without spurring.

Ant. Speak, have I won you? —

Enter Servant and Musician.

Mer. You are not to be resisted.

Serv. Be ready I intreat you, the dance done,
Besides a liberal reward I have,
A bottle of Sherry in my power shall beget
New crotchets in your heads.

Musi. Tush, fear not us, we'll do our parts.

Serv. Go in.

Ant. I know this fellow.
Belong you to the house?

Serv. I serve the Mistress.

Ant. Pretty, and short, pray you Sir then inform her,
Two Gentlemen are covetous to be honor'd,
With her fair presence.

Serv. She shall know so much,
This is a merry night with us, and forbid not Welcome to any that looks like a man:
I'll guide you the way.

Ant. Nay, follow, I have a trick in't. Exit.

Enter Uberto, Silvio, Richardo, Maria, Pedro,
Portia, Viola, with others.

Uber. Come, where's this Masque? fairest, for our cheer,
Our thanks and service, may you long survive,
To joy in many of these nights.

Mar. I thank you

Uber. We must have Musick too, or else you give us,
But half a welcome.

Mar. Pray you Sir, excuse me.

Silv. By no means, Lady.

Uber. We'll crown our liberal feast,
With some delightful strain fitting your love:

And

And this good company.

Mar. Since you enforce it,
I will not plead the excuse of want of skill
Or be, or nice, or curious, every year
I celebrate my marriage night; and will
Till I see my absent Husband.

Ubr. 'Tis fit freedom,
Silv. Richardo thou art dull —

Enter Servant.

Rich. I shall be lighter,
When I have had a heat.

Mar. Now Sir, the news?

Serv. Mistress, there are two Gentlemen.

Mar. Where?

Serv. Complimenting who should first enter.

Mar. What are they?

Serv. Heaven knows, but for their strangeness, have you never seen a Cat wash her face?

Ubr. Yes.

Serv. Just such a stir they keep. if you make but haste,
You may see 'em yet before they enter.

Enter Antonia and Mercurie.

Mer. Let 'em be what they we'll, I'll keep them fair
Entertain, and gentle welcome.

Ant. It shall be so.

Mer. Then let it be your pleasure.

Ant. Lets stand aside, and you shall see us have Fine sport anon.

Mer. A fair society, do you know these Gentlewomen?

Ant. Yes.

Mer. What are they?

(Viola.)

Ant. The second is a neighbors Daughter, her name is
There is my kinsmans wife, Portia her name, and a Friend too.

Mer. Let her — what's she that leads the dance?

1 Serv. A Gentlewoman.

Mer. I see that.

1 Serv. Indeed?

Mer. What?

1 Serv. A Gentlewoman.

Mer. Udsfoot, good Sir, what's she that leads the dance?

2 Serv. My Mistress.

Mer. What else?

2 Serv. My Mistress, Sir.

Mer. Your Mistress? a pox on you,
What a fry of fools are here? I see 'tis treason to understand in this house: if nature were not better to them, than they can be to themselves, they would scant hit their mouths
my Mistress? is there any one with so much wit in's head, that can tell me at the first sight, what Gentlewoman that is that leads the dance?

'Tis my wife.

Mer. Hum.

Ant. How dost thou like her?

Mer. Well, a pretty Gentlewoman.

Ant. Prethee be quiet.

Mer. I would I could

Let never any hereafter that's a man,
That has affections in him, and free passions,
Receive the least tye from such a fool as this is, (truly
That holds so sweet a wife, 'tis lamentable to consider
What right he robs himself of, and what wrong
He doth the youth of such a Gentlewoman?
That knows her beauty, is no longer hers,
Than men will please to make it so, and use it
Neither of which lies freely in a Husband,
Oh what have I done, what have I done, Coxcomb?
If I had never seen, or never tasted
The goodness of this kix, I had been a made man,
But now to make a Cuckold is a sin

Against all forgiveness, worse than a murder;
I have a Wolf by the ears, and am bitten both ways.

Ant. How now friend, what are you thinking of?

Mer. Nothing concerning you, I must be gone.

Ant. Pardon me, I'll have no going, Sir.

Mer. Then good Sir, give me leave to go to bed,
I am very weary, and ill-temper'd.

Ant. You shall presently, the dance is done.

1 Serv. Mistress, these are the Gentlemen.

Mar. My Husband's welcome home, dear Sir. (one,

Mer. She's fair still, oh that I were a knave, or durst be
For thy fake coxcomb; he that invented honesty, undid me.

Ant. I thought you had not known me, y'are merry 'tis well;
And how ist with these worthy Gentlemen? (thought,

Ubr. & Sil. We are glad to see you here again. (vels,

Ant. Oh Gent, what ha' you lost? but get you into tra-
There you may learn, I cannot say what hidden virtues.

Mer. Hidden from you I am sure,

My blood boils like a furnace,

She's a fair one.

Ant. Pray entertain this Gent. with all the courtesie,
Fitting my most especial friend.

Mar. What this poor house may yield,

To make you welcome, dear Sir, command

Without more compliment.

Mer. I thank you:

She's wife, and speaks well too, oh what a blessing

Is gone by me, ne'er to be recovered?

Well, 'twas an old shame the Devil laid up for me, and now has hit me home; if there be any ways to be dishonest, and save my self yet, — No, it must not be, why should

I be a fool too — Yet those eyes would tempt another

Adam, how they call to me, and tell me — S'foot, they shall not tell me any thing, Sir, will you walk in?

Ant. How is't, Signior?

Mer. Crazie a little.

Mar. What ail you, Sir?

What's in my power, pray make use of, Sir. (sure?

Mer. 'Tis that must do me good, she does not mock me

And't please you nothing, my disease is only weariness.

Ubr. Come Gentlemen, we'll not keep you from your beds too long.

Rich. I ha' some business, and 'tis late, and you far from your lodging.

Sil. Well.

Exit manent, Ant. Mar and Mer.

Ant. Come my dear Mercury, I'll bring you to your chamber, and then I am for you Maria, thou art a new wife to me now, and thou shalt find it e'r I sleep.

Mer. And I, an old as to myself, mine own rod whips me, — good Sir, no more of this, 'tis tedious, you are the best guide in your own house — go Sir —

Exit Ant and Mer.

This fool and his fair Wife have made me frantick
From two such Physicks for the soul, deliver me. Exit.

Enter Richardo, Uberto, Pedro, and Silvio.

Ubr. Well you must have this wench then.

Ric. I hope so, I am much o'th' bow-hand else.

Ped. Wou'd I were hang'd, 'tis a good loving little fool, that dares venture her self upon a coast she never knew yet, but these women, when they are once thirteen, god speed the plough.

Sil. Faith they'll venture further for their lading, than a Merchant, and through as many storms, but they'll be fraughted, they are mad like Carrecks, only strength and storage.

Ric. Come, come, you talk, you talk. (her?

Sil. We do so, but tell me Richardo, wot thou marry her?

Ric. Marry her? why, what should I do with her?

Ped. Pox, I thought we should have all shares in her, like lawful prize.

Ric. No by my faith, Sir, you shall pardon me, I lanch'd her at my own charge, without partners. and so I'll keep her.

Ubr.

Ub. What's the hour?

Rich. Twelve.

Ub. What shall we do the while? 'tis yet scarce eleven.

Sil. There's no standing here, is not this the place?

Rich. Yes.

Ped. And to go back unto her fathers house, may breed suspicion,
Let's slip into a Tavern, for an hour, 'tis very cold.

Ub. Content, there is one hard by, a quart of burnt sack will recover us, I am as cold as Christmas, this stealing flesh in the frosty weather, may be sweet i'th' eating, but sure the Woodmen have no great catch on't; Shall's go?

Rich. Thou art the strangest lover of a Tavern, What shall we do there now? lose the hour and our selves too.

Ub. Lose a pudding; What do'st thou talk of the hour; Will one quart muzzle us? have we not ears to hear, and tongues to ask the Drawers, but we must stand here like bawds to watch the minutes?

Sil. Prethee content thy self, we shall scout here, a though we went a' haying, and have some mungey prentice, that cannot sleep for scratching, over-hear us; Come, Will you go Sirs? when your love fury is a little frozen, you'll come to us.

Rich. Will you drink but one quart then?

Ped. No more i'faith.

Sil. Content.

Rich. Why then, have with you, but lets be very watchful.

Ub. As watchful as the Belman, come, I'll lead, because I hate good manners, they are too tedious. Exeunt.

Enter Viola with a Key, and a little Casket.

The night is terrible, and I enclos'd
With that my vertue and my self hate most,
Darkness; yet must I fear that which I wish,
Some company, and every step I take
Sounds louder in my fearful ears to night
Than ever did, the shrill and sacred bell
That rang me to my prayers; the house will rise
When I unlock the dore, were it by day
I am bold enough, but then a thousand eyes
Warne me from going, might not heaven have made
A time for envious prying folk to sleep,
Whilst lovers met, and yet the Sun have shone?
Yet I was bold enough, to steal this key
Out of my fathers Chamber, and dare yet
Venture upon mine enemy, the night,
Arm'd only with my love, to meet my friend.
Alas how valiant, and how fraid at once
Love makes a Virgin? I will throw this key
Back through a window, I had wealth enough
In Jewels with me, if I hold his love
I steal e'm for; farewell my place of birth,
I never make account to look on thee again;
And if there be, as I have heard men say,
These household gods, I do beseech them look
To this my charge, bless it from theeves and fire,
And keep, till happily my love I win,
Me from thy door, and hold my Father in. Exit.

Enter Richardo, Pedro, Uberto, Silvio, and Drawer with a Candle.

Rich. No more for Gods sake, how is the night boy?

Draw. Faith Sir, 'tis very late.

Ub. Faith Sir, you lie, is this your jack i'th' clock-house? will you strike, Sir? gi's some more sack, you varlet.

Rich. Nay, if you love me, good Uberto goe, I am monstrous hot with Wine.

Ub. Quench it again with love, Gentlemen, I will drink one health more, and then if my legs say me not shamefully nay, I will go with you, give me a singlar quart.

Draw. Of what Wine Sir?

Uber. Of Sack, you that speak confusion at the bar, o. Sack, I say, and every one his quart, what a Devil lets be merry.

Draw. You shall, Sir. Exit.

Ped. We will, Sir, and a dryed tongue.

Sil. And an Olive, boy, and a whole bunch of siders, my head swims plaguely, 'uds precious I shall be clawd.

Enter Drawer with four quarts of wine.

Rich. Pray go, I can drink no more, think on your promise, 'tis midnight Gentlemen.

Ub. O that it were dum midnight now, not a word more, every man on's knees, and betake himself to his faint, here's to your wench, seignior, all this, and then away.

Rich. I cannot drink it.

Ped. 'Tis a toy; a toy, away wo't.

Uber. Now dare I speak any thing, to any body living, ome, Where's the fault? off with it.

Rich. I have broke my wind, Call you this Sack? — I wonder who made it? he was a sure workman, for 'tis plagny strong work, Is it gone round?

Ub. 'Tis at the last, out of my way, good boy, Is the Moon up yet?

Draw. Yes, Sir.

Ub. Where is she boy?

Draw. There, Sir.

Ub. We shall have rain and thunder, boy.

Draw. When Sir?

Ub. I cannot tell, but sure we shall boy.

Draw. The Gentleman is Wine-wile.

Uber. Drawer?

Draw. Here, Sir.

Ub. Can you procure?

Draw. What Sir?

Uber. A Whore, or two or three, as need shall serve, boy.

Sil. I, a good Whore were worth money, boy.

Draw. I protest Sir, we are all together unprovided.

Rich. The mor's the pitty, boy, Can you not 'vize us where my Child?

Ped. Why where were you brought up, boy? no inckling of a Whore? no aym my boy?

Uber. It cannot sink in my head now, that thou shouldst marry, Why shouldst thou marry, tell me?

Rich. I marry? I'll be hang'd first: some more wine boy.

Sil. Is she not a Whore translated? and she be, lets repair to her.

Rich. I cannot tell, she may be an offender; but signie Silvio, I shall scratch your head, indeed I shall.

Sil. Judge me, I do but jest with thee, what an she were inverted with her heeles upward, like a traitor's Coat what care I.

Ub. I, hang her, Shall we fall out for her?

Rich. I am a little angry, but these wenches; Did you not talke of wenches?

Sil. Boy, lend me your Candle.

Draw. Why Sir?

Sil. To set fire to your rotten feeling, you'll keep no Whores, Rogue, no good members.

Draw. Whores, Sir.

Silv. I, Whores Sir, Do you think we come to lye with your hogsheads?

Rich. I must beat the watch, I have long'd for't any time this three weeks.

Silv. Wee'll beat the Town too, and thou wilt, we are proof boy; Shall she kill any body?

Rich. No, but wee'll hurt 'em dangerously.

Uber. Silv. Now must I kill one, I cannot avoid it, boy, easily afore there with your candle; Where's your Mistrils?

Draw. A bed, Sir.

Sil. With whom?

Draw. With my Master.

Uber. You lye Boy, shee's better brought up than to lye with her husband, Has he not cast his head yet? next year he will be a velvet-headed Cuckold. Exeunt.

Draw. You are a merry Gentleman, there Sir, take hold.

Enter Viola.

Viola. This is the place, I have out-told the Clock,
For haste, he is not here. Richardo? no;
Now every power that loves and is belov'd:
Keep me from shame to night, for all you know
Each thought of mine is innocent, and pure,
As flesh and blood can hold: I cannot back;
I threw the Key within, and ere I raise
My Father up, to see his daughters shame,
I'll set me down, and tell the Northern Wind,
That it is gentler than the curling West;
If it will blow me dead, but he will come;
I'faith 'tis cold; if he deceive me thus,
A woman will not easily trust a Man. Hark, What's that?

Sil. within. Th'art over long at thy pot, tom, tom, thou art over long at the pot tom.

Viola. Bless me! Whose that?

Pedro within. Whoo!

Uber within. There Boyes.

Viola. Darknes be thou my cover, I must fly,
To thee I haste for help——

Enter Richardo, Pedro, Ubero, Drawer with a Torch.

Viola. They have a light,
Wind, if thou lov'st a Virgin, blow it out,
And I will never shut a window more,
To keep thee from me.

Rich. Boy?

Draw. Sir.

Rich. Why Boy?

Draw. What say you, Sir?

Rich. Why Boy? Art thou drunk Boy?

Draw. What would you, Sir?

Rich. Why very good, Where are we?

Uber. I, that's the point.

Draw. Why Sir, you will be at your Lodging presently.

Rich. I'll go to no lodging Boy.

Draw. Whither will you go then, Sir?

Rich. I'll go no farther.

Draw. For Gods sake, Sir, do not stay here all night.

Rich. No more I will not, Boy, lay me down, and rowle me to a Whore.

Uber. And me.

Ped. There spoke an——

Silvio. Then set your foot to my foot, and up tails all.

Viola. That is Richardo, what a noise they make?

'Tis ill done on 'em: here, Sirs, Richardo?

Rich. What's that Boy?

Draw. 'Tis a Wench, Sir, pray Gentlemen come away.

Viola. O my dear love! How doest thou?

Rich. Faith sweet heart? even as thou feest.

Ped. Where's thy Wench?

Uber. Where's this bed worme?

Viola. Speak softly for the love of heaven.

Draw. Mistress, get you gone, and do not entice the Gentlemen, now you see they'r drunk, or I'll call the Watch, and lay you fast enough.

Vio. Alas, What are you? or, What do you mean?
Sweet love, Where's the place?

Rich. Marry sweet love, e'en here, lye down, I'll feefe thee.

Vio. Good God! What mean you?

Ped. I'll have the Wench.

Uber. If you can get her.

Sil. No, I'll lye with the Wench to night, and she shall be yours to morrow.

Ped. Let go the Wench.

Sil. Let you go the Wench.

Viola. O Gentlemen, as you had mothers!

Uber. They had no mothers; they are the Sons of bitches.

Rich. Let that be maintain'd.

Sil. Marry then.

Viola. Oh bless me heaven!

Uber. How many is there on's?

Rich. About five.

Uber. Why then lets fight three to three.

Sil. Content,

(Draw and fall down.)

Draw. The Watch? the watch? the watch? Where are you?

(Exit.)

Exit.

Rich. Where are these Cowards?

Ped. There's the Wore.

Viola. I never saw a drunken man before,
But these I think are so.

Sil. Oh!

Ped. I mist you narrowly there.

Viola. My state is such, I know not how to think,
A prayer fit for me, only I could move,
That never Maiden more might be in love.

Exit.

Enter Drawer, Constable and Watch.

Watch. Where are they, Boy?

Draw. Make no such haste, Sir, they are no runners.

Ub. I am hurt, but that's all one, I shall light upon some of ye.

Pedro, thou art a tall Gentleman, let me kiss thee.

Watch. My friend.

Uber. Your friend? you lie.

Rich. Stand further off, the watch, you are full of fleas.

Con. Gentlemen, either be quiet, or we must make you quiet:

Rich. Nay, good Mr. Constable, be not so Rigorous.

Uber. Mr. Constable, lend me thy hand of Justice.

Const. That I will Sir.

(so blind.)

Uber. Fy Mr. Constable, What golls you have? is Justice Y? cannot see to wash your hands? I cry you Mercy, Sir; Your gloves are on.

Draw. Now you are up, Sir, Will you go to bed?

Ped. I'll truckle here, Boy, give me another pillow.

Draw. Will you stand up, and let me lay it on then?

Ped. Yes.

(be going Mr. Constable.)

Draw. There hold him two of ye, now they are up,

Rich. And this way, and that way, tom.

Uber. And here away, and there away, tom.

Silv. This is the right way, the others the wrong.

Ped. Th' others the wrong.

All. Thou art over-long at the pot, tom, tom.

Rich. Lead valiantly, sweet Constable, whoop! ha Boyes.

Const. This Wine hunts in their heads.

Rich. Give me the bill, for I'll be the Sergeant.

Const. Look to him, Sirs.

Rich. Keep your Ranks, you Rascalls,, keep your Ranks.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Mercury.

Mer. I Cannot sleep for thinking of this Asses Wife,
I'll be gon presently, there's no staying here, with this Devil about me? hoe, this is the house of sleep, hoe? again there, 'sfoot, the darknes, and this love together,
will make me lunatick; ho?

Enter a Servingman above unready.

Ser. Who calls there?

Mer. Pray take the pains to rise and light a candle.

Ser. Presently,

Mer. Was ever man but I in such a stocks? well, this shall be a warning to me, and a fair one too, how I betray my self to such a Dunce, by way of benefit.

Enter

Enter Servingman.

Ser. Did you call?

Mer. Yes, pray do me the kindness, Sir, to let me out, and not enquire why, for I must needs be gone.

Ser. Not to night, I hope, Sir.

Mer. Good Sir to night, I would not have troubled you else, pray let it be so.

Ser. Alas, Sir, my Master will be offended.

Mer. That I have business? no I warrant ye.

Ser. Good Sir take your rest.

Mer. Pray my good friend let me appoint my own rest.

Ser. Yes, Sir.

Mer. Then shew me the way out, I'll consider you.

Ser. Good Lord, Sir,

Mer. If I had not an excellent temper'd patience, now should I break this fellows head, and make him understand 'twere necessary; the onely plague of this house is the unhandfome love of servants, that ne'er do their duty in the right place, but when they muster before dinner, and sweep the Table with a wodden dagger, and then they are troublesome too, to all mens shoulders, the Woodcocks flesht agen, now I shall have a new stir.

Enter Antonio.

Ant. Why how now friend? What do you up so late? are you well? Do you want any thing? pray speak.

Mer. Onely the cause I rise for.

Ant. What knaves are these? What do you want? why Sirrah?

Mer. Nothing i'th' World, but the keyes to let me out of dores; I must be gon, be not against it, for you cannot stay me.

Ant. Be gon at this time? that were a merry jest.

Mer. If there be any mirth in't, make you use on't, but I must go.

Ant. Why for loves sake?

Mer. 'Twill benefit your understanding nothing to know the cause, pray go to bed, I'll trouble your Man only.

Ant. Nay, Sir, you have rais'd more, that has reason to curse you, and you knew all, my Wifes up, and coming down too.

Mer. Alas, it will be a trouble, pray go up to her, and let me disturbe no more, 'tis unmannerly.

Enter Wife as out of her bed.

Ant. Shee's here already; sweet heart: How say you by this Gentleman? he would away at midnight.

Wife. That I am sure he will not.

Mer. Indeed I must.

Mar. Good Sir let not your homely entertainment press you to leave your bed at midnight; if you want, what my house or our town may afford you, make it your own fault if you call not for it; pray go to bed again; let me compel you, I am sure you have no power to deny a Woman; the ayr is piercing, and to a body beaten with long travel, 'twill prove an ill Physitian.

Mer. If she speak longer I shall be a knave, as rank as ever sweat for't; Sir, if you will fend your Wife up presently, I will either stay with you, d'ye mark me, or deliver you, so just a cause, that you your self, shall thrust me out of dores, both suddenly, and willingly.

Ant. I would fain hear that 'faith, pray thee go up sweet heart, I have half perswaded him, besides, he hath some private business with me.

Mar. Good night, Sir, and what content you would have, I wish with you.

Mer. Could any man that had a back ask more! O me! O me!

Ant. Now deal directly with me: Why should you go?

Mer. If you be wife do not enquire the cause, 'twill trouble you.

Ant. Why? prithee why?

Mer. 'Faith I would not have you know it, let me go, 'twill be far better for you.

Ant. Who's that, that knocks there? i't not at the street door?

Ser. Yes, Sir.

Ant. Who's there, cannot you speak?

Within Vi. A poor distressed Maid, for gods sake let me in.

Mer. Let her in and me out together, 'tis but one labor, 'tis pity she should stand i'th' street, it seems she knows you.

Ant. There she shall stand for me, you are ignorant; this is a common custome of the Rogues that lie about the loose parts of the City.

Mer. As how?

Ant. To knock at doors in dead time of night, and use some feigned voice to raise compassion, and when the doors are open, in they rush, and cut the throats of all, and take the booty, we cannot be too careful.

Within Vi. As ever you had pity let me in, I am undone else.

Ant. Who are you?

Vi. My name is Viola, a Gentlewoman, that ill chance hath distressed, you know my Father.

Mer. Alas of god we'll let her in, 'tis one of the Gentlewomen were here i'th' evening, I know her by her name, (poor foul) shee's cold I warrant her, let her have my warme Bed, and I'll take her fortune; come, pray come.

Ant. It is not Viola, that's certain, she went home to her Fathers, I am sure.

Vi. Will not you be so good to let me in?

Ant. I'll be so good to have you whipt away if you stay a little longer: Shee's gone I warrant her, now let me know your cause, for I will hear it, and not repent the knowing.

Mer. Since you are so importunate, I'll tell you, I love your Wife extreamly.

Ant. Very well.

Mer. And so well that I dare not stay.

Ant. Why?

Mer. For wronging you, I know I am flesh and blood, and you have done me friendships infinite and often, that must require me honest, and a true Man, and I will be so, or I'll break my heart.

Ant. Why, you may stay for all this, methinks.

Mer. No, though I woud be good, I am no faint, nor i't safe to try me, I deal plainly.

Ant. Come, I dare try you, do the best you can.

Mer. You shall not, when I am right agen, I'll come and see you, till when, I'll use all Countreyes, and all means, but I will lose this folly, 'tis a Divil.

Ant. Is there no way to stay you?

Mer. No, unless you will have me such a villain to you, as all men shall spit at me.

Ant. Do's she know you love her?

Mer. No, I hope not, that were recompence fit for a Rogue to render her.

Ant. If ever any had a faithful friend, I am that Man, and I may glory in't, this is he, that ipse, he that passes all Christendome for goodness, he shall not over goe me in his friendship, 'twere recreant and base, and I'll be hang'd first, I am resolv'd, go thy wayes, a Wife will never part us: I have consider'd, and I find her nothing to such a friend as thou art; I'll speak a bold world, take your time and woe her; you have overcome me clearly, and do what's fitting with her, you conceive me, I am glad at heart you love her: by this light, ne're stare upon me, for I will not flye from it, if you had spoken sooner, sure you had been serv'd; Sir, you are not every Man, now to your taske, I give you free leave, and the sin is mine if there be any in it.

Mer. He will be hang'd before he makes this good, he cannot be so innocent a Coxcombe, he can tell ten sure, if I had never known you as I have done, I might be one, as others perhaps sooner, but now 'tis impossible, there's too much good between us.

Ant. Well, thou art e'en the best man — I can say no more, I am, so over-joy'd, you must stay this night, and in the morning go as early as you please, I have a toy for you.

Mer. I thought this pill would make you sick.

Ant. But where you mean to be I must have notice, And it must be hard by too, do you mark me?

Mer. Why, What's the matter?

Ant. There is a thing in hand.

Mer. Why? What thing?

Ant. A found one, if it take right, and you be not peevish. We two will be — you would little think it; as famous for our friendship —

Mer. How?

Ant. If Heaven please, as ever Damon was, and Pythias; or Pylades, and Orestes, or any two that ever were: do you conceive me yet?

Mer. No, by my troth, Sir; he will not help me up sure.

Ant. You shall anon, and for our names, I think they shall live after us, and be remember'd while there is a story; or I'll lose my aim.

Mer. What a vengeance ailes he? How do you?

Ant. Yes faith, we two will be such friends, as the world shall ring of.

Mer. And why is all this?

Ant. You shall enjoy my wife.

Mer. Away, away.

Ant. The wonder must begin, so I have cast it, 'twill be scurv' else, you shall not stir a foot in't, pray be quiet till I have made it perfect.

Mer. What shall a Man do with this wretched fellow? there's no mercy to be used towards him, he is not capable of any pity, he will in spight of course be a Cuckold, And who can help it? must it begin so needs Sir? — think again

Ant. Yes marry must it, and I my self will woe this woman for you, Do you perceive it now? ha?

Mer. Yes, now I have a little sight ith' matter; O that th' head should be so monitrous, that all thy Servants hats may hang upon't! but do you meane to do this?

Ant. Yes certain, I will woe her, and for you, strive not against it, 'tis the overthrow of the best plot that ever was then.

Mer. Nay, I'll assure you, Sir, I'll do no harm, you have too much about you of your own.

Ant. Have you thought of a place yet?

Mer. A place?

Ant. I a place where you will bide, prethee no more of this modesty, 'tis foolish, and we were not determin'd to be absolute friends indeed, 'twere tolerable.

Mer. I have thought, and you shall hear from me.

Ant. Why, this will gain me everlasting glory; I have the better of him, that's my comfort, good night. Exit.

Mer. Good night, well go thy wayes, thou art the tydiest vittall this day I think above ground, and yet thy end for all this must be mottly. Exit.

Enter a Tinker with a Cord, and Dorothy.

Tink. 'Tis better cold; a plague upon these Rogues, how wary they are grown? not a door open now, but double barr'd; not a Window, but up with a case of wood like a spice box, and their locks unpickable, the very Smiths that were half ventures, drink penitent, single Ale, this is the Iron age, the Ballad sings of; well, I shall meet with some of our loose Linnen yet, good fellows must not starve; here's he shall shew God a mighties dog bolts, if this hold.

Dorothy. Faith thou art but too merciful, that's thy fault, thou art as sweet a Thief, that sin excepted, as ever suffer'd, that's a proud word, and I'll maintain it.

Tink. Come, prethee let's shogg off, and browze an hour or two, there's Ale will make a Cat speak, at the harrow, we shall get nothing now, without we batter, 'tis grown too near morning, the Rogues sleep sober, and are watchful.

Dorit. We want a Boy extreamly for this function, kept under for a year, with milk, and knot-grafs; in my time I have seen a boy do wonders; Robbin the red Tinker had a Boy, Rest his Soul, he suffer'd this time; 4 years, for two Spoons, and a Pewter Candlestick, that sweet Man had a Boy, as I am Curstend Whore, would have run through a Cat hole, he would have bouted such a piece of Linnen in an evening —

Tink. Well, we will have a Boy, prethee lets go, I am vengeance cold I tell thee.

Dorothy. I'll be hang'd before I stir without some purchase, by these ten bones, I'll turn she-ape; and untile a house, but I'll have it, it may be I have a humor to be hang'd, I cannot tell.

Enter Viola.

Tink. Peace, you flead Whore, thou hast a mouth like a Bloodhound, here comes a night-shade.

Dorit. A Gentlewoman Whore, by this darknes I'll case her to the skin.

Tink. Peace, I say.

Viola. What fear have I endur'd this dismal night? And what disgrace, if I were seen and known?

In which this darknes onely is my friend,

That onely has undone me; a thousand curses

Light on my easie, foolish, childish love,

That durst so lightly lay a confidence

Upon a Man, so many being false;

My weariness, and weeping, makes me sleepy, I must lie down.

Tink. What's this? a Prayer, or a Homily, or a Ballad of good counsel? she has a Gown, I am sure.

Dor. Knock out her brains, and then shee'll nee'r bite.

Tink. Yes, I will knock her, but not yet, you? woman?

Viol. For Gods fake what are you?

Tink. One of the groomes of your wardrobe, come, uncase, uncase; byr Lady a good Kersey.

Vio. Pray do not hurt me, Sir.

Dor. Let's have no pity, for if you do, here's that shall cut your whistle.

Viol. Alas, what would you have? I am as miserable as you can make me any way.

Dor. That shall be try'd.

Vio. Here, take my Gown, if that will do you pleasure.

Tink. Yes marry will it, look in the Pockets Doll, there may be birds.

Dor. They are flown, a pox go with them, I'll have this Hat, and this Ruffe too, I like it, now will I flourish like a Lady, brave, I faith boy.

Vio. Y'are so gentle people to my seeming, That by my truth I could live with you.

Tin. Could you so? a pretty young round wench, well bloudded, I am for her, Theeves.

Dor. But by this I am not, coole your Codpiece, Rogue, or I'll clap a spell upon't, shall take your edge off with a very vengeance.

Tin. Peace, horse-flesh, peace, I'll cast off my Amazon, she has walk'd too long, and is indeed notorious, shee'll fight and scould, and drink like one of the worthies.

Dorit. Uds, pretious you young contagious Whore, must you be ticing? and, Is your flesh so wranck, Sir, that two may live upon't? I am glad to hear your Cortalls grown so lusty; he was dry founder'd t'other day, wehee my pamper'd Jade of Asia.

Vio. Good Woman do not hurt me, I am sorry that I have given any cause of anger.

Dor. Either bind her quickly, and come away, or by this steel steel I'll tell thee, though I trust for company; now could I eate her broyl'd, or any way, without Vinegar, I must have her Nose.

Vio. By any thing you love best, good Sir, good Woman.

Tin. Why her Nose, Dorothy?

Dor. If I have it not, and presently warm, I lose that I go withal.

Tin. Wood the Devil had that thou goest withall, and thee together, for sure he got thy whelps if thou halt any, shees thy deere dad, Whore! put up your cutpurse; an I take my switch up, 'twill be a black time with you else, sheth your bung Whore.

Dor. Will you bind her? we shall stand here prating, and be hang'd both.

Tin. Come, I must bind you, not a word, no crying.

Vio. Do what you will, indeed I will not cry.

Tin. Hurt her not, if thou dost, by Ale and Beer, I'll clost thy old bald brain pan, with a piece of Brass, you Bitch incarnate.

Exeunt Tinker and Dorothy.

Vio. O Heaven, to what am I reserv'd, that knew not Through all my childish hours and actions, More sin, than poor imagination, And too much loving of a faithless Man? For which I'm paid, and so, that not the day That now is rising to protect the harmless, And give the innocent a sanctuary From theeves and spoilers, can deliver me From shame, at least suspicion—

Enter Valerio.

Val. Sirrah, lead down the horses easily, I'll walke a foot till I be down the hill, 'tis very early, I shall reach home betimes. How now, whose there?

Vio. Night, that was ever friend to Lovers, yet Has rais'd some weary Soul, that hates his bed, To come and see me blush, and then laugh at me.

Val. H'ad a rude heart that did this.

Vio. Gentle Sir,

If you have that which honest men call pitty, And be as far from evil as you shew; Help a poor Maid, that this night by bad fortune Has been thus us'd by Robbers,

Val. A pox upon his heart that would not help thee, this Thieff was half a Lawyer by his bands, How long have you been tyed here?

Vio. Alas, this hour, and with cold and fear am almost perisht.

Val. Where were the watch the while? good sober Gent. they were like careful members of the City, drawing in diligent Ale, and singing catches, while Mr. Constable contriv'd the Tofts: these fellows would be more severely punished than wandring Gypsies, that every statute whips; for if they had every one two eyes a piece more, three pots would put them out.

Vio. I cannot tell, I found no Christian to give me succor.

Val. When they take a Thief, I'll take Ostend agen; the whorsons drink Opium in their Ale, and then they sleep like tops; as for their bills, they only serve to reach down Bacon to make Rashers on; now let me know whom I have done this courtesie too, that I may thank my early rising for it?

Vio. Sir, All I am, you see.

Val. You have a name I'm sure, and a kindred, a Father, friend, or something that must own you; shee's a handsome young Wench; What Rogues were these to Rob her?

Vio. Sir, you see all I dare reveale, And as you are a Gentleman press me no further; For there begins a grief, whose bitterness Will break a stronger heart than I have in me, And 'twill but make you heavy with the hearing,

For your own goodnefs sake desire it not.

Val. If you would not have me enquire that, How do you live then?

Vio. How I have liv'd, is still one question, Which must not be resolv'd—

How I desire to live, is in your liking, So worthy an opinion I have of you.

Val. Is in my liking? How I pray thee? tell me, i'faith I'll do you any good lies in my power; she has an eye would raise a bedrid man; come, leave your fear, and tell me, that's a good Wench.

Vio. Sir, I would serve—

Val. Who would't thou serve? do not weep and tell me,

Vio. Faith, Sir, even some good woman, and such a wife if you be married, I do imagine yours.

Val. Alas! thou art young and tender, let me see thy hand, this was ne'er made to wash, or wind up water, beat cloaths, or rub a floor, by this light, for one use that shall be nameless, 'tis the best wanton hand that e're I lookt on.

Vio. Dare you accept me, Sir, my heart is honest, Among your vertuous charitable deeds, This will not be the least.

Val. Thou canst in a Chamber?

Vio. In a Chamber, Sir?

Val. I mean wait there upon a Gentlewoman, How quick she is, I like that mainly too; I'll have her, though I keep her with main strength like a besieged Town, for I know I shall have the Enemy afore me within a week.

Vio. Sir, I can sew too, and make pretty laces, Dress a head handsome, teach young Gentlewomen, For in all these I have a little knowledge.

Val. 'Tis well, no doubt I shall encrease that knowledge; I like her better still, how she provokes me; pritty young Maid, you shall serve a good Gentlewoman, though I say't, that will not be unwilling you should please me, nor I forgetful if you do.

Vio. I am the happier.

Val. My man shall make some snift to carry you behind him, Can you ride well?

Vio. But I'll hold fast for catching of a fall.

Val. That's the next way to pull another on you, I'll work her as I go, I know shee's wax, now, now, at this time could I beget a Worthy on this Wench, Vio. Sir, for this Gentleness, may Heaven requite you tenfold.

Val. 'Tis a good Wench, however others use thee, be sure I'll be a loving Master to thee, come.

Exeunt.

Enter Antonio like an Irish Footman, with a Letter.

Ant. I hope I am wild enough, for being known, I have writ a Letter here, and in it have abus'd my self most bitterly, yet all my fear is not enough, for that must do it, that must lay it on, I'll win her out i'th' flint, 'twill be more famous, now for my language.

Enter Servingman.

Ser. Now, Sir, Who would you speak with?

Ant. Where be thy Mastres Man? I would speak with her, I have a Letter.

Ser. Cannot I deliver it?

Ant. No, by my trot, and salt, canst thou not Man.

Ser. Well, Sir, I'll call her to you, pray shake your ears without a little.

Exit Servingman.

Ant. Cran a Cree do it quickly; this rebel tonge fricks in my teeth worse than a tough Hen, sure it was ne'er known at Babel, for they sould no Apples, and this was made for certain at the first planting of Orchards, 'tis so crabbed.

Enter

Enter Wife, and Servingman.

Mar. What's he wood speak with me?

Ser. A kill kenny ring, there he stands Madam.

Mar. What would you have with me, friend?

Ant. He has a Letter for other Women, Wilt thou read it.

Mar. From whence?

Ant. De Crosse creest from my Master.

Mar. Who is your Master?

Ant. I pray do you look.

Mar. Do you know this fellow?

Ser. No Maddam, not I; more than an Irish Footman, stand further friend, I do not like your roperunners, What stallion Rogues are these, to weare such dowsetts, the very Cotton may commit adultery.

Mar. I cannot find whose hand this should be, I'll read, To the beauteous wife of Don Antonio, sure this is some blind scribe — well now, What follows?

Ant. Pray God it take, I have given her that, will stir her conscience, how it works with her; hope, if it be thy will, let the flesh have it.

Mar. This is the most abhor'd, intollerable knavery, that ever slave entertain'd, sure there is more than thine own head in this villany, it goes like practic'd mischief; disabled in his body? O good God, as I live he lies fearfully, and basely, ha? I should know that Jewel, 'tis my husband, come hither that, Are you an Irish Man?

Ant. Sweete Woman a Cree I am an Irish man?

Mar. Now I know it perfectly; is this your trick, Sir? I'll trick you for it; How long have you serv'd this Gentleman.

Ant. Please thee a little day, O my Mac dermond put me to my Mastree, 'tis don I know.

Mar. By my faith he speaks as well as if he had been lousy for the language a year or two; well, Sir, you had been better have kept your own shape as I will use you, What have I done that should deserve this tryal? I never made him Cuckold, to my knowledge, Sirrah come hither.

Ant. Now will she send some Jewel, or some Letter, I know her mind as well; I shall be famous.

Mar. Take this Irish bawde here.

Ant. How?

Mar. And kick him till his breeches and breech be of one colour, a bright blew both.

Ant. I may be well swing'd thus, for I dare not reveale my self, I hope she does not mean it, O hone, O hone, O St. Patrick, O a Cree, O sweete Woman.

Mar. No, turn him, and kick him o' t'other side, that's well.

Ant. O good waiting Man, I beseech thee good waiting man, a pox fyre your Legs.

Mar. You Rogue, you enemy to all, but little breeches, How dar'st thou come to me with such a Letter?

Ant. Prethee pittie the poor Irishman, all this makes for me, if I win her yet, I am still more glorious.

Mar. Now could I weep at what I have done, but I'll harden my heart agen, go shut him up, 'till my husband comes home, yet thus much ere ye go, sirrah thach'd head, Would'st not thou be whipt, and think it Justice? well Aquavitæ Barrel, I will bonnce you.

Ant. I pray do, I beseech you be not angry.

Mar. O you hobby headed Rascal, I'll have you flead, and trossers made of thy skin to tumble in, go a way with him, let him see no sun, till my husband come home, Sir, I shall meet with you for your knavery, I fear it not.

Ant. Wilt thou not let me go? I do not like this.

Mar. Away with him.

Servingman. Come, I'll lead you in by your Jack a lent hair, go quietly, or I'll make your crupper crack.

Mar. And do you hear me, Sirrah? and when you have done, make my Coach ready.

Serving. Yes forsooth. Exit Servingman with Antonio.

Mar. Lock him up safe enough, I'll to this Gentleman,

I know the reason of all this business, for I do suspect it, If he have this plot, I'll ring him such a peal, shall make his eares deaf for a month at least. Exit.

Enter Richardo.

Ric. Am I not mad? Can this weak temper'd head, That will be mad with drink, endure the wrong That I have done a Virgin, and my Love? Be mad, for so thou ought'st, or I will beate The walls and trees, down with thee, and will let Either thy memory out, or madneis in; But sure I never lov'd fair Viola, I never lov'd my Father, nor my Mother, Or any thing but drink; had I had love; Nay, had I known so much charity, As would have sav'd an Infant from the fire, I had been naked, raving in the street; With halfe a face, gashing my self with knives, Two houres ere this time.

Enter Pedro, Silvio, Uberto.

Ped. Good morrow Sir.

Rich. Good morrow Gentlemen, shall we go drink agen? I have my wits.

Ped. So have I, but they are unsetled ones, would I had some porridge.

Rich. The Tavern boy was here this morning with me And told me, that there was a Gentlewoman, Which he took for a Whore, that hung on me: For whom we quarrel'd, and I know not what.

Ped. I faith nor I.

Ube. I have a glimmering of some such thing.

Rich. Was it you, Silvio, That made me drink so much? 'twas you or Pedro.

Ped. I know not who.

Sil. We are all apt enough.

Rich. But I will lay the fault on none but me, That I would be so entreated, come Silvio, Shall we go drink agen, come Gentlemen, Why do you stay, let's never leave off now, Whil'st we have Wine, and Throats, I'll practise it, Till I have made it my best quality; For what is best for me to do but that? For Heaven sake come and drink; when I am nam'd, Men shall make answer, VVhich Richardo mean you? The excellent drinker? I will have it so, VVill you go drink?

Silv. VVe drunk too much too lately.

Rich. VVhy there is then the lefs behind to drink; Let's end it all, dispatch that, wee'l send abroad, And purchase all the VVine the world can yield, And then drink it off, then take the fruits o'th' earth, Distil the Juice from them, and drink that off; Wee'l catch the rain before it fall to ground, And drink off that that never more may grow; Wee'l fet our mouths to Springs, and drink them off, And all this while wee'l never think of those That love us best, more than we did last night. We will not give unto the poor a drop Of all this drink, but when we see them weep, Wee'l run to them, and drink their tears off too, Wee'l never leave whilst there is heat or moisture, In this large globe, but suck it cold and dry, Till we have made it Elemental earth, Merely by drinking.

Ped. Is't flattery to tell you, you are mad?

Rich. If it be false, There's no such way to bind me to a Man; He that will have me, lay my goods and lands, My life down for him, need no more, but say, Richardo thou art mad, and then all these Are at his service, then he pleases me, And makes me think that I had vertue in me,

That

That I had love, and tenderness of heart,
That though I have committed such a fault,
As never creature did, yet running mad,
As honest men should do for such a crime,
I have exprest some worth, though it be late:
But I alas have none of these in me,
But keep my wits still like a frozen Man,
That had no fire within him.

Sil. Nay, good Richardo leave this wild talk, and send a letter to her, I'll deliver it.

Rich. 'Tis to no purpose; perhaps she's lost last night, Or she got home agen, she's now so strictly Look'd to, the wind can scarce come to her, or admit She were her self; if she would hear from me, From me unworthy, that have us'd her thus, She were so foolish, that she were no more To be belov'd.

Enter Andrugio and Servant with a Night-gown.

Ser. Sir, we have found this night-gown she took with her.

Rich. Where? where? speak quickly.

Ser. Searching in the Suburbs, we found a Tinker and his Whore that had it in a Tap-house, whom we apprehended, and they confest they stole it from her.

Rich. And murdered her?

Sil. What aile you man?

Rich. Why all this doth not make me mad.

Sil. It does, you would not offer this else, good Pedro look to his sword.

Ser. They do deny the killing of her, but swore they left her tyed to a Tree, in the fields, next those Suburbs that are without our Ladies gate, near day, and by the Rode, so that some passinger must needs unty her quickly.

And. The will of Heaven be done? Sir, I will only entreat you this, that as you were the greatest occasion of her loss, that you will be pleased to urge your friends, and be your self earnest in the search of her; if she be found, she is yours, if she please, I my self only, see these people better examin'd, and after follow some way in search, God keep you Gentlemen. Exit.

Sil. Alas good man!

Ric. What think you now of me, I think this lump Is nothing but a piece of fleagme congeal'd Without a soul, for where there's so much spirit As would but warm a flea, those faults of mine Would make it glow, and flame in this dull heart, And run like molten gold through every sin, Till it could burst these walls, and fly away. Shall I intreat you all to take your horses, And search this innocent?

Ped. With all our hearts.

Ric. Do not divide your selves till you come there, Where they say she was ty'd, I'll follow too, But never to return till she be found. Give me my sword good Pedro, I will do No harm, believe me, with it, I am now Farr better temper'd; if I were not so, I have enow besides, God keep you all, And send us good success. Excunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Mercury, and Servant:

Mer. WHo is it? can you tell?
Ser. By my troth, Sir, I know not, but 'tis a Gentlewoman.

Mer. A Gentleman, I'll lay my life, you puppy, h'as sent his Wife to me: if he have, sling up the bed.

Ser. Here she is, Sir.

Enter Wife with a Letter.

Wife. I am glad I found you Sir, there, take your Letter, and keep it till you have another friend to wrong, 'tis too malicious false to make me sin, you have provoked me to be that I love not, a talker, and you shall hear me.

Why should you dare to imagine me So light a huswife, that from four hours knowledge You might presume to offer to my credit

This rude and ruffian tryal, I am sure I never courted you, nor gave you tokens, That might concern assurance, you are a fool.

Mer. I cannot blame you now, I see this letter, Though you be angry, yet with me you must not, Unless you'll make me guilty of a wrong, My worst affections hate——

Wife. Did not you send it?

Mer. No, upon my faith, which is more, I understand it not; the hand is as far from my knowledge, as the malice.

Wife. This is strange.

Mer. It is so, and had been stranger, and indeed more hateful, Had I, that have receiv'd such courtesies, and owe so many Thanks, done this base office.

Wife. Your name is at it.

Mer. Yes, but not my nature, and I shall hate my name worse than the manner, for this base broking; you are wife and vertuous, remove this fault from me; for on the love I bear to truth and goodness, this Letter dare not name me for the author.

Wife. Now I perceive my husbands knavery, if any man can but find where he has been, I will goe with this Gentleman whatsoever comes on't: and as I mean to carry it, both he and all the World shall think it fit, and thank me for it.

Mer. I must confess I loved you, at first, however this made me leave your house unmannerly, that might provoke me to do something ill, both to your honor and my faith, and not to write this Letter, which I hold so truly wicked, that I will not think on't.

Wife. I do believe you, and since I see you are free, my words were not meant to you, but this is not the half of my affliction.

Mer. 'Tis pittty you should know more vexation; may I enquire?

Wife. Faith, Sir, I fear I have lost my husband.

Mer. Your husband? it cannot be: I pittty her, how she's vext?

Enter Servant

Wife. How now? What news? nay speak, for we must know.

Ser. Faith I have found at length, by chance, where he has been.

Wife. Where?

Ser. In a blind out-house in the Suburbs, pray God all be well with him.

Wife. Why?

Ser. There

Ser. There are his cloaths, but, What's become of him, I cannot yet enquire.

Wife. I am glad of this; sure they have murther'd him, What shall I do?

Mer. Be not so grieved, before you know the truth, you have time enough to weep, this is the sodain't mischief; Did you not bring an Officer to search there, where you say you found his cloaths.

Ser. Yes, and we searcht it, and charg'd the fellow with him: but he, like a Rogue, stubborn Rogue, made answer, he knew not where he was; he had been there, but where he was now, he could not tell: I tell you true, I fear him.

Wife. Are all my hopes and longings to enjoy him, After this 3 years travel, come to this?

Ser. It is the rankest house in all the City, the most cursed roguish Bawdy-house. Hell fire it.

Mer. This is the worst I heard yet; Will you go home? I'll bear you company, and give you the best help I may: this being here will wrong you.

Wife. As you are a Gentleman, and as you lov'd your dead friend, let me not go home, that will but heap one sorrow on another.

Mer. Why propose any thing and I'll perform't; I am at my wits end too.

Ser. So am I, O my dear Master!

Mer. Peace you great fool.

Wife. Then good Sir carry me to some retir'd place, far from the sight of this unhappy City, whether you will indeed, so it be far enough.

Mer. If I might Councel you, I think 'twere better to go home, And try what may be done yet, he may be at home afore you, Who can tell?

Wife. O no, I know he's dead, I know he's murder'd; tell me not of going home, you murder me too.

Mer. Well, since it pleases you to have it so, I will no more perswade you to go home, I'll be your guide in the Countrey, as your grief doth command me, I have a Mother dwelling from this place some 20 miles: the house though homely, yet able to shew something like a welcome; thither I'll see you safe with all your sorrows.

Wife. With all the speed that may be thought upon; I have a Coach here ready, good Sir quickly; I'll fit you my fine husband.

Mer. It shall be so; if this fellow be dead, I see no band of any other Man, to tye me from my will, and I will follow her with such careful service, that she shall either be my Love, or Wife; Will you walk in?

Wife. I thank you, Sir, but one word with my Man, and I am ready; keep the Irish fellow safe, as you love your life, for he I fear has a deep hand in this, then search agen, and get out warrants for that naughty man, that keeps the bad house, that he may answer it, if you find the body, give it due burial; farewell. You shall hear from me, keep all safe.

Exeunt.

Ser. O my sweet Master!

Antonio knocking within.

Ant. within. Man-a-cree, the Devil take thee, Wilt thou kill me here? I prethee now let me goe seek my Master, I shall be very cheel else.

Enter Servant.

Ser. Do you hear man-a-cree, I'll cree your coxcombe, and you keep not still, down you rogue.

Ant. Good sweet fact serving-man, let me out I beseech de, and by my trot I will give dye VVorship 2 shillings in good argott, to buy dy Worship pippines.

Ser. This rogue thinks all the worth of man consists in peepins; by this light I'll heat rebellion out of you for ever.

Ant. Wilt thou not hear me Man? is fet; I'll give thee all I have about me.

Ser. I thank you, Sir, so I may have picking work,

Ant. Here is five shillings Man.

Ser. Here is a cudgel, a very good one.

Enter two Serving-men.

2. Ser. How now, VVhat's the matter? VVhere's the Irishman.

1. Ser. There, a wyth take him, he makes more noise alone there, than ten Lawyers can do with double, and a scurvy Case.

2. Ser. Let him out, I must talk with him.

Enter Antonio.

Ant. Wilt thou give me some drink, O hone? I am very dry Man.

2. Ser. You shall have that shall quench your thirst, my friend.

Ant. Fate dost thou mean man.

2. Ser. Even a good tough halter.

Ant. A halter? O hone!

2. Ser. Sirrah, you are a mischievous Rogue, that's the truth.

Ant. No, fet I am not.

1. Ser. Shall I knock out his brains? I have kill'd dogs have been worth three of him for all uses.

2. Ser. Sirrah, the truth on't is, you must with me to a Justice. O Roger, Roger.

1. Ser. Why, what's the matter William?

2. Ser. Heavy news Roger, heavy newes; god comfort us.

1. Ser. What is't Man?

Ant. What's the matter now? I am e'en weary of this way, would I were out on't.

1. Ser. My Master sure is murder'd, Roger, and this cursed rogue

I fear, has had a hand in't.

Ant. No fet not.

1. Ser. Stand away, I'll kickt out of him: come, sirraha, mount, I'll make you dance, you Rascal, kill my Master? If thy breech were cannon proof, having this good cause on my side, I would encounter it; hold fair, Shamrocke.

Ant. Why how now Sirs? you will not murder me indeed.

2. Ser. Bless us Roger!

Ant. Nay, I am no spirit.

2. Ser. How do you Sir, this is my very Master.

Ant. Why well enough yet, but you have a heavy foot of your own; Where's my Wife.

1. Ser. Alas poor sorrowful Gentlewoman, she thinks you are dead, and has given o're house-keeping.

Ant. Whether is she gone then?

1. Ser. Into the Countrey with the Gentleman your Friend Sir, to see if she can wear her sorrows out there; she weeps and takes on too too—

Ant. This falls out pat; I shall be everlasting for a name: Doe you hear? upon your lives and faiths to me, not one word I am living, but let the same report pass along, that I am murder'd still; I am made for ever.

1. Ser. VVhy Sir?

Ant. I have a Cause Sir, that's enough for you; well, if I be not famous, I am wrong'd much; for any thing I know I will not trouble him this week at least; no, let them take their way one of another:

1. Ser. Sir, VVill you be still an Irish-man?

Ant. Yes a while.

2. Ser. But your VVorship will be beaten no more?

Ant. No, I thank you William.

1. Ser. In truth, Sir, if it must be so, I'll do it better than a stranger.

Ant. Goe, you are Knaves both, but I forgive you, I am almost mad with the apprehension of what I shall be, not a word I charge you.

Exeunt.

Enter Valerio, and Viola.

Val. Come, pretty foul, we now are near our home, And whilst our horses are walkt down the hill, Let thou and I walke here over this Close: The foot-way is more pleasant, 'tis a time

My

My pretty one, not to be wept away,
For every living thing is full of love;
Art not thou so too? ha?

Vio. Nay, there are living things empty of love;
Or I had not been here, but for my self,
Alas, I have too much.

Val. It cannot be, that so much beauty, so much youth and grace should have too much of love. (know.)

Vio. Pray what is love? for I am full of that I do not

Val. Why, love fair Maid is an extream desire,
That's not to be examin'd, but fulfill'd,
To ask the reason why thou art in love,
Or what might be the noblest end in love,
Would overthrow that kindly rising warmth,
That many times slides gently o'r the heart,
'T would make thee grave and staid, thy thoughts would be,
Like a thrice married Widow, full of ends,
And void of all compassion, and to fright thee
From such enquiry, whereas thou art now
Living in ignorance, mild, fresh, and sweet,
And but sixteen; the knowing what love is,
Would make thee six and forty.

Vio. Would it would make me nothing, I have heard
Scholars affirm, the world's upheld by Love,
But I believe, women maintain all this,
For there's no love in men.

Val. Yes, in some men.

Vio. I know them not.

Val. Why, there is love in me.

Vio. There's charity I am sure towards me. (maid,

Val. And love; which I will now express, my pretty
I dare not bring thee home, my wife is foul,
And therefore envious, she is very old,
And therefore jealous: thou art fair and young.
A subject fit for her unlucky vices

To work upon, she never will endure thee,

Vio. She may endure

If she be ought, but Devil, all the friendship
That I will hold with you; can she endure
I should be thankful to you? may I pray
For you and her, will she be brought to think.
That all the honest industry I have,
Deserves brown bread? if this may be endur'd
She'll pick a quarrel with a sleeping child,
E'r she fall out with me.

Val. But trust me, she does hate all handsomness.

Vio. How fell you in love with such a creature?

Val. I never lov'd her.

Vio. And yet married her?

Val. She was a rich one. (then too.)

Vio. And you swore I warrant you, she was a fair one

Val. Or believe me, I think I had not had her. (place

Vio. Are you men all such? wou'd you wou'd wall us in a
Where all we women that are innocent,
Might live together.

Val. Do not weep at this,
Although I dare not for some weighty reason
Displease my Wife, yet I forget not thee.

Vio. What will you do with me?

Val. Thou shalt be plac'd

At my mans house, and have such food and raiment
As can be bought with money: these white hands
Shall never learn to work, but they shall play
As thou say'st they were wont, teaching the strings
To move in order, or what else thou wilt.

Vio. I thank you, Sir, but pray you cloath me poorly,
And let my labor get me means to live.

Val. But fair one, you, I know do so much hate
A foul ingratitude, you will not look
I should do this for nothing.

Vio. I will work as much out as I can, and take as little,
That you shall have as duely paid to you
As ever servant did.

Val. But give me now a trial on't, I may believe

We are alone, shew me how thou wilt kiss
And hug me hard, when I have stolen away
From my too clamorous wife that watches me,
To spend a blessed hour or too with thee.

Vio. Is this the love you mean? you would have that
Is not in me to give, you would have lust.

Val. Not to dissemble, or to mince the word,
'Tis Lust I wish indeed.

Vio. And by my troth I have it not: for heavens sake use me kindly.

Though I be good, and shew perhaps a monster,
As this world goes.

Val. I do

But speak to thee, thy answers are thy own;
I compel none, but if refuse this motion,
Thou art not then for me, alas good soul;
What profit can thy work bring me?

Vio. But I fear, I pray goe, for lust they say, will grow
Outragious, being deni'd, I give you thanks
For all your courtesies, and there's a Jewel
That's worth the taking, that I did preserve
Safe from the robbers, pray you leave me here
Just as you found me, a poor innocent,
And Heaven will bless you for it.

Val. Pretty maid, I am no Robber, nor no Ravisher,
I pray thee keep thy Jewel, I have done
No wrong to thee, though thou beest virtuous
And in extremity, I do not know,
That I am bound to keep thee.

Vio. No Sir, for gods sake, if you know an honest man in all these Countreys, give me some directions to find him out.

Val. More honest than my self, good sooth I do not know; I would have lain with thee, with thy consent, and who would not in all these parts, is past my memory, I am sorry for thee, farewell gentle maid, God keep thee safe. Exit.

Vio. I thank you Sir, and you;
Woman they say, was only made of man,
Methinks 'tis strange they should be so unlike,
It may be all the best was cut away
To make the woman, and the naught was left
Behind with him, I'll sit me down and weep,
All things have cast me from 'em but the earth;
The evening comes, and every little flower
Droops now, as well as I.

Enter two Milk-maids with pails.

Nan. Good Madge lets rest a little, by my troth I am weary, this new pail is a plaguy heavy one, would Tom were hang'd for choosing it, 'tis the untoward'st fool in a Country.

Madge. With all my heart, and I thank you too, Nan.

Vio. What true contented happiness dwels here,
More than in Cities? wou'd to God my Father
Had liv'd like one of these, and bred me up
To milk: and do as they do: methinks
'Tis a life that I wou'd choose, if I were now
To tell my time agen, above a Princes; maids, for charity
Give a poor wench one draught of Milk,
That weariness and hunger have nigh famish'd.

Nan. If I had but one Cows Milk in all the world, you should have some on't; there, drink more, the Cheefe shall pay for it, alas poor heart, she's drie.

Madge. Do you dwell hereabouts?

Vio. No, would I did.

Nan. Madge, if she does not looke like my cousin Sue o'th'
Moor lane, as one thing can look like another—

Madge. Nay, Sue has a hazle eye, I know Sue well, and by your leave, not so trim a body neither, this is a feat bodied thing I tell you.

Nan. She laces close by the mass I warrant you, and so does Sue too.

Vio. I thank you for your gentleness, fair maids.

Nan. Drink agen pray thee.

Vio. I am satisfied, and heaven reward thee for't, yet thus far I will compell you to accept these tritles, toys only that express my thanks, for greater worth, I'm sure they have not in them; indeed you shall, I found 'em as I came.

Nan. Madge, look you here Madge.

Madg. Nay, I have as fine a one as you, mine's all gold, and painted, and a precious stone in't; I warrant it cost a crown wench.

Nan. But mine is the most sumptuous one, that e'r I saw.

Vio. One favour you must do me more, for you are well acquainted here.

Nan. Indeed we'll do you any kindness, Sister.

Vio. Only to send me to some honest place, where I may find a service.

Nan. Uds me, our Dorothy went away but last week, and I know my Mistress want's a maid, and why may she not be plac'd there? this is a likely wench, I tell you truly, and a good wench I warrant her.

Madg. And 'tis a hard case if we that have serv'd four years apiece, cannot bring in one servant, we will prefer her, hark you sister, pray what's your name?

Vio. Melviz.

Nan. A feat name i'faith; and can you milk a Cow? and make a merry-bush? that's nothing.

Vio. I shall learn quickly,

Nan. And dress a house with flowers? and serve a pig? this you must do, for we deal in the Dary, and make a bed or two?

Vio. I hope I shall.

Nan. But be sure to keep the men out, they will mar all that you make else, I know that by my self; for I have been so touz'd among 'em in my days, come you shall e'en home with us, and be our fellow, our house is so honest, and we serve a very good woman, and a Gentlewoman, and we live as merrily, and dance a good daies after even-song: our Wake shall be on Sunday, do you know what a Wake is? we have mighty cheer then, and such a coil, 'twould bless 'ye; you must not be so bashful, you'll spoil all.

Madg. Let's home for Gods sake, my Mistress thinks by this time we are lost, come, we'll have a care of you, I warrant you; but you must tell my Mistress where you were born, and every thing that belongs to you, and the strangest things you can devise, for she loves those extreamly, 'tis no matter whether they be true or no, she's not so scrupulous; you must be our Sister, and love us best, and tell us every thing, and when cold weather comes, we'll lye together, will you do this?

Vio. Yes.

Nan. Then home again o' gods name, can you go apace.

Vio. I warrant you.

Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Pedro and Uberto, severally.

Ped. How now, any good news yet?

Silvio. Faith not any yet.

Ped. This comes o' tipling; would 'twere treason and't please God, to drink more than three draughts at a meal.

Sil. When did you see Richardo?

Ped. I crost him twice to day.

Sil. You have heard of a young wench that was seen last
Ped. Yes.

Sil. Has Richard heard of this?

Ped. Yes, and I think he's ridden after, farewell, I'll have another round.

Sil. If you hear any thing, pray spare no horse-flesh, I'll do the like.

Ped. Do.

Exeunt.

Enter Richardo and Valerio.

Rich. Sir, I did think 'twas you by all descriptions:

Val. 'Tis so,

I took her up indeed, the manner how
You have heard already, and what she had about her,
As Jewels, Gold, and other trifling things:
And what my end was, which because she fled,
I left her there i'th' fields.

Rich. Left i'th' fields? could any but a Rogue
That had despis'd humanity and goodness,
Heavens law and credit; and had set himself
To lose his noblest part, and be a beast,
Have left so innocent unmatch'd a virtue,
To the rude mercy of a wilderness?

Val. Sir, if you come to rail, pray quit my house,
I do not use to have such language given
Within my doors to me; for your wench,
You may go seek her with more patience,
She's tame enough, I warrant you.

Rich. Pray forgive me.

I do confess my much forgetfulness;
And weigh my words no farther, I beseech you,
Then a mere madness, for such a grief has seiz'd me
So strong and deadly, as a punishment,
And a just one too,

That 'tis a greater wonder I am living,
Than any thing I utter; yet let me tell you thus much,
'Twas a fault for leaving her
So in the fields.

Val. Sir, I will think so now, and credit me,
You have so wrought me with your grief, that I
Do both forgive and pity you:
And if you'll please to take a bed this night here;
To morrow I'll bring you where I left her.

Rich. I thank you, now shall I be so unworthy:
To think upon a bed, or ease, or comfort,
And have my heart stray from me, God knows where,
Cold and forsaken, destitute of friends,
And all good comforts else, unless some tree
Whose speechless charity must better ours,
With which the bitter east winds made their sport
And sung through hourly, hath invited her
To keep off half a day? shall she be thus,
And I draw in soft slumbers? God forbid.
No, night and bitter coldness, I provoke thee,
And all the dews that hang upon thy locks, (prime Shows, Hails, Snows, Frosts, and two edged Winds that
The maiden blossoms, I provoke you all,
And dare expose this body to your sharpness,
Till I be made a Land-mark.

Val. Will you then stay and eat with me?

Rich. Y'are angry with me, I know y'are angry,
You would not bid me eat else; my poor Mistress,
For ought I know thou'rt famish'd, for what else
Can the fields yield thee, and the stubborn season,
That yet holds in the fruit? good gentle Sir,
Think not ill manners in me for denying
Your offer'd meat, for sure I cannot eat
While I do think she wants; well I'm a rascal;
A villain, slave, that only was begotten,
To murder women, and of them the best.

Val. This is a strange affliction.

If you'll accept no greater courtesie, yet drink Sir.

Ric.

Ric. Now I am sure you hate me, and you knew
What kind of man I am, as indeed 'tis fit,
That every man should know me to avoid me.
If you have peace within you, Sir, or goodness
Name that abhor'd word Drink, no more unto me,
You had safer strike me,

I pray you do not, if you love me do not.

Val. Sir, I mean no ill by it.

Ric. It may be so,

Nor let me see

None Sir, if you love heaven;

You know not what offence it is unto me,

Nor good now do not ask me why:

And I warn you once again, let no man else speak of't,

I fear your servants will be prating to me.

Val. Why Sir, what ail you?

Rich. I hate drink, there's the end on't,

And that man that drinks with meat is damn'd

Without an age of prayers and repentance,

And there's a hazard too; good Sir, no more

If you will do me a free courtesie;

That I shall know for one: go take your horse,

And bring me to the place where you left her:

Val. Since you are so impotunate, I will;

But I will wish Sir, you had staid to night

Upon my credit you shall see no drink.

Rich. Be gone, the hearing of it makes me giddy,

Sir, will you be intreated to forbear it,

I shall be mad else.

Val. I pray no more of that, I am quiet,

I'll but walk in, and away straight.

Rich. Now I thank you,

But what you do, do in a twinkling, Sir.

Val. As soon as may be.

Exit.

Enter Mother, Viola, and two Milk-maids.

Moth. Is this the wench you have brought me? some catch
I warrant.

How daringly she looks upon the matter?

Madg. Yes forsooth, this is the maiden.

Moth. Come hither, wou'd you serve?

Vio. If it shall please you to accept my service, I hope I shall do something that shall like you, though it be but truth, and often praying for you.

Moth. You are very curious of your hand methinks,

You preserve it so with gloves, let me see it;

I marry, here's a hand of march-pane, wenches,

This pretty palme never knew sorrow yet;

How soft it is I warrant you, and supple:

O' my word, this is fitter for a pocket to filch withal

Than to work withal, I fear me little one,

You are no better than you should be; goe to.

Vio. My Conscience yet is but one witness to me,

And that heaven knows, is of mine innocence,

'Tis true, I must confess with shame enough,

The time that I have led, yet never taught me

What 'twas to break a sleep, or to be weary.

Moth. You can say well: if you be mine, wench, you must doe well too, for words are but slow workers, yet so much hope I have of you, that I'll take you, so you'll be diligent, and do your duty: how now?

Enter Alexander.

Alex. There is a messenger come from your son,
That brings you word he is return'd from travel,
And will be here this night.

Moth. Now joy upon thee for it, thou art ever
A bringer of good tidings, there, drink that:
In troth thou hast much contented me, my Son?
Lord how thou hast pleas'd me, shall I see my Son
Yet e'r I dye? take care my house be handsome,
And the new stools set out, and boughs and rushes,

And flowers for the window, and the Turky Carpet,
And the great parcel Salt, Nan, with the Cruets,
And prethee Alexander goe to the Cook,
And bid him spare for nothing, my son's come home,
Who's come with him?

Alex. I hear of none yet, but a Gentlewoman.

Moth. A Gentlewoman? what Gentlewoman?

Alex. I know not, but such a one there is, he says.

Moth. Pray God he have not cast away himself

Upon some snout-fair piece, I do not like it.

Alex. No sure, my Master has more discretion.

Moth. We'll be it how it will, he shall be welcome.

Sirs to your tasks, and shew this little novice

How to bestir her self, I'll sort out things.

Exit.

Madg. We will forsooth, I can tell you, my Mistress is a stirring woman.

Nan. Lord how she'll talk sometimes? 'tis the maddest cricket—

Vio. Methinks she talks well, and shews a great deal of good huswivery, pray let me deck the chambers, shall I?

Nan. Yes, you shall, but do not scorn to be advis'd, Sister, for there belongs more to that, than you are aware on; why should you venture so fondly upon the strowings? there's mighty matters in them I'll assure you, and in the spreading of a bough-pot, you may miss, if you were ten years elder,
if you take not a special care before you.

Vio. I will learn willingly, if that be all.

Nan. Sirrah where is't they say my young Master hath been?

Madg. Faith I know not, beyond the Sea, where they are born without noses.

Nan. Blessus! without noses? how do they do for handkerchiefs?

Madg. So Richard says, and sirrah, their feet stand in their foreheads.

Nan. That's fine by my troth, these men have pestilent running heads then; do they speak as we do?

Mag. No, they never speak.

Nan. Are they curfend?

Mag. No, they call them Infidels, I know not what they are.

Nan. Sirrah, we shall have fine courting now my young master is come home, were you never courted Sister?

Vio. Alas, I know it not.

Mag. What is that courting, sirrah?

Nan. I can tell, for I was once courted in the matted chamber, you know the party Madg., faith he courted finely.

Madg. Pray thee what is't?

Nan. Faith, nothing but he was somewhat figent with me, faith 'tis fine sport, this courting.

Alex. within. Where be the Maids there?

Madg. We shall be hang'd anon, away good wenches, and have a care you dight things handsomly, I will look over you.

Exeunt.

Enter Mercury and Maria.

Mer. If your sorrow will give you so far leave, pray think your self most welcome to this place, for so upon my life you are, and for your own fair sake, take truce awhile with these immoderate mournings.

Wife. I thank you Sir, I shall doe what I may;
Pray lead me to a chamber.

Enter Mother and Alexander.

Mer. Presently,
Before your blessing Mother, I intreat ye
To know this Gentlewoman, and bid her welcome,
The virtuous wife of him that was my self
In all my travels.

Moth. Indeed she is most welcome, so are you son (kneel.

T t 2

Now

Now all my blessing on thee; thou hast made me Younger by 20 years, than I was yesterday, Will you walk in? what ails this Gentlewoman? Alas, I fear she is not well, good Gentlewoman.

Mer. You fear right.

Moth. She has fasted over long, You shall have supper presently o'th' board.

Mer. She will not eat; I can assure you Mother, For Gods sake let your Maid conduct her up Into some fair becoming Chamber Fit for a woman of her Being, and As soon as may be,

I know she's very ill, and wou'd have rest.

Moth. There is one ready for her, the blew chamber.

Mer. 'Tis well, I'll lead you to your chamber door And there I'll leave you to your quiet, Mistriſs.

Wife. I thank you, Sir, good rest to every one, You'll see me once again to night, I hope.

Mer. When you shall please, I'll wait upon you, Lady. Exit.

Moth. Where are these maids, attend upon the Gentlewoman, and see she want no good thing in the house? good-night with all my heart forsooth, good Lord how you are grown, is he not Alexander?

Alex. Yes truly, he's shot up finely, God be thanked.

Mer. An ill weed, Mother, will do so.

Alex. You say true, Sir, an ill weed grows apace.

Mer. Alexander the sharp, you take very quickly.

Moth. Nay, I can tell you, Alexander will do it, do you read madcap still?

Alex. Sometimes forsooth.

Moth. But faith Son, what Countreys have you travell'd?

Mer. Why many, Mother, as they lay before me, France, Spain, Italy and Germany, and other Provinces that I am sure, you are not better'd by, when you hear of them.

Moth. And can you these tongues perfectly?

Mer. Of some a little, Mother.

Moth. Pray spout some French Son.

Mer. You understand it not, and to your ears 'twill goe like an unshod cart upon the stones, only a rough unhand-some found.

Moth. I would fain hear some French.

Alex. Good Sir, speak some French to my Mistriſs.

Mer. At your intreaty Alexander, I will, who shall I speak to?

Alex. If your worship will do me the favour Sir, to me.

Mer. Mounſeir, Poultron, Coukew, Cullione, Besay, Man cur.

Alex. Awe Mounſeir.

Moth. Ha, ha, ha, this fine indeed, gods blessing on thy heart Son, by my troth thou art grown a proper Gentleman, cullen and pullen, good god what awkeward words they use beyond the seas, ha, ha, ha?

Alex. Did not I answer right.

Mer. Yes good Alexander, if you had done so too, But good Mother, I am very hungry, and have rid far to day, and am fasting.

Moth. You shall have your supper presently, my sweet Son.

Mer. As soon as you please, which once ended, I'll go and visit you sick Gentlewoman.

Moth. Come then. Exeunt.

Enter Antonio like a Post, with a Letter.

Ant. I have ridden like a fury, to make up this work, and I will do it bravely, e'r I leave it; this is the house I am sure.

Enter Alexander.

Alex. Who wou'd you speak with, Sir?

Ant. Marry Sir, I would speak with a Gentlewoman, came this night late here from the City, I have some Letters of importance to her, I am a Post Sir, and would be dispatched in haste.

Alex. Sir, cannot I deliver 'em? for the truth is, she's ill, and in her chamber.

Ant. Pray pardon me, I must needs speak with her, my business is so weighty.

Alex. I'll tell her so, and bring you present word.

Ant. Pray do so, and I'll attend her, pray god the grief of my imagined death, spoil not what I intend, I hope it will not.

Alex. Though she be very ill, and desires no trouble, Yet if your business be so urgent, you may come up and speak with her.

Ant. I thank you Sir, I follow you. Exit Alex.

Enter Wife.

Wife. What should this fellow be i'th' name of Heaven, that comes with such post business? sure my Husband hath reveal'd himself, and in this haste sent after me, are you the Post my friend?

Enter Antonio.

Ant. Yes forsooth Mistriſs.

Wife. What good news hast thou brought me gentle Post? For I have woe and grief too much already.

Ant. I would you had less, Mistriſs, I could wish it, be-shrew my heart she moves me cruelly.

Wife. Have I found you once more Jugler? well Jewel, thou hast only virtue in thee, of all I read of yet; what ears has this ass to betray him with? well, what's your business then?

Ant. I have brought a Letter from your servant, Mistriſs, in haste.

Wife. Pray give it me, I hope the best still.

Ant. This is the upshot, and I know I have hit it, Well, if the spirits of the dead do walk, I shall Hear more of this one hundred years hence.

Wife. By any means you must have special care, for now the City is possest for certain, my Master is made away, which for ought I know is truth indeed; good Mistriſs leave your grief, and see your danger, and let that wife and noble Gentleman with whom you are, be your right hand in all things.

Ant. Now do I know I have the better on't, by the languishing of her eye at this near instant, 'tis still simming in her blood, in coyning somewhat to turn Mercury, I know it.

Wife. He is my Husband, and 'tis reasonable he should command in all things, since he will be an ass against the hair, at his own peril be it, in the morn you shall have a packet, till when, I must intreat you stay, you shall not lose by it.

Ant. I do not doubt it, Mistriſs; I'll leave you to your rest, and wait your pleasure.

Wife. Do, and seek out the Gentleman of the house, bid him come to me presently.

Ant. Who, Mr. Mercury?

Wife. Do you know him, Post?

Ant. Only by sight forsooth, now I remember your servant will'd me to let you know he is the only man, you and your fortunes, are now to rest upon.

Wife. Prethee no more, I know all this already.

Ant. I'll take my leave now, I am made for ever. Exit.

Wife. Good night, I am provided for you, my fine youth. Exit.

Enter Mother, beating Viola, Alexander with a broken Glass.

Mother. I'll make thee have more care.

Viola. Good Mistriſs pardon me

Moth. Thou'lt ne'r be good I warrant thee, can your fine fingers hold no faster?

Viola. Indeed it was against my will.

Moth.

Moth. Alexander, let's see the glass, as I am true kirsome woman, it is one of the chrystal glasses my Cofin sent me, and the baggage hath broke it where it cannot be mended, Alexander, can Humphrey mend this think you?

Alex. No truly, this will ne'er be mended.

Vio. Truly I meant but to wash it for the Gentlewoman that is sick above, and shaking out the water, knockt it against the pail side.

Moth. Did you so? be sure I'll stop it, 'twill make a good gap in your quarters wages, I can tell you.

Viola. I pray forgive me, and let me have no wages this first quarter.

Moth. Go whimling, and fetch two or three grating loaves out of the Kitching, to make Ginger-bread of, 'tis such an untoward thing. Exit Viola.

Alex. She's somewhat simple indeed, she knew not what a kimmel was, she wants good nurture mightily.

Moth. My Son tells me, Alexander, that this young widow means to sojourn here, she offers largely for her board, I may offer her good cheer, prethee make a step i'th' morning down to the Parsonage for some Pigeons? what are you mad there? what noise is that? are you at bowls within? why do you whine?

Enter Viola weeping.

Vio. I have done another fault, I beseech you sweet Mistress forgive me.

Moth. What's the matter.

Vio. As I was reaching for the bread that lay upon the shelf, I have thrown down the minc'd meat, that should have made the pies to morrow.

Moth. Get thee out of my house, thou filthy destroying Harlot, thou, I'll not keep thee an hour longer.

Vio. Good Mistress, beat me rather for my fault, as much as it deserves, I do not know whither to go.

Moth. No I warrant thee, out of my doors.

Vio. Indeed I'll mend, I pray speak you for me.

Alex. If thou hadst hurl'd down any thing but the Pie-meat, I would have spoke for thee, but I cannot find in my heart now.

Moth. Art thou here yet? I think I must have an Officer to thrust thee out of my doors, must I?

Vio. Why, you may stop this in my wages too, For God's sake do, I'll find my self this year; And let me stay.

Mer. Thou't spoil ten times as much, I'll cudgel thee out of my doors.

Vio. I am assur'd you are more merciful, Than thus to beat me and discharge me too.

Moth. Dost thou dispute with me, Alexander carry the prating hilding forth.

Vio. Good Mistress hear me, I have here a Jewel, My Mother left me, and 'tis something worth: Receive it, and when all my faults together Come to the worth of that, then turn me forth, Till then I pray you keep me.

Moth. What giggombob have we here? pray god you have not pilfred this somewhere, th'art such a puling thing, wipe your eyes, and rise, go your ways, Alexander, bid the Cook mince some more meat, come, and get you to bed quickly, that you may up betime i'th' morning a milking, or you and I shall fall out worse yet. Exit Moth. and Alex.

Vio. She has hurt my arm; I am afraid she is a very angry woman, but blefs him heaven that did me the most wrong, I am afraid Antonio's wife should see me, she will know me.

Mother within. Melvia.

Vio. I am coming, she's not angry agen I hope. Exit.

Enter Mercury.

Mer. Now what am I the better for enjoying This woman that I lov'd so? all I find, That I before imagined to be happy:

Now I have done, it turns to nothing else
But a poor pitied, and a base repentance,
Udsfoot, I am monstrous angry with my self:
Why should a man that has discourse and reason,
And knows how near he loses all in these things,
Covet to have his wishes satisfied;
Which when they are, are nothing but the shame
I do begin to loath this woman strangely,
And I think justly too, that durst adventure,
Flinging away her modesty to take
A stranger to her bed, her Husbands body
Being scarce cold in the earth for her content,
It was no more to take my senses with
Than if I had an idle dream in sleep
Yet I have made her promises: which grieves me,
And I must keep 'em too, I think she hunts me:
The devil cannot keep these women off,
When they are fetched once.

Enter Wife in night attire.

Wife. To bed for gods sake Sir, why do you stay here?
Some are up i'th' house, I heard the wife,
Good dear sweet-heart to bed.

Mer. Why, I am going? why do you follow me?
You would not have it known I hope, pray get you
Back to your chamber, the doors hard by for me,
Let me alone, I warrant you this it is
To threshwell, I have got a customer,
Will you go to bed?

Wife. Will you?

Mer. Yes, I am going.

Wife. Then remember your promise you made to marry me.

Mer. I will, but it was your fault, that it came To this pinch now, that it must need remembrance:
For out of honesty I offer'd you
To marry you first, why did you slack that offer?

Wife. Alas I told you the inconvenience of it,
And what wrong it would appear to the world
If I had married in such post-haste
After his death: beside, the foolish people
Would have been bold to have thought we had lain together in his time, and like enough imagin'd
We two had murder'd him.

Mer. I love her tongue yet,
If I were a Saint

A gilded Saint, and such a thing as this Should prate thus wittily and feelingly
Unto my Holiness, I cannot tell,
But I fear shrewdly I should do something
That would quite scratch me out o'th' Kalender,
And if I stay longer talking with her,
Though I am mad at what I have done already,
Yet I shall forget my self again;
I feel the Devil

Ready to hold my stirrop; pray to bed, good night.

Wife. This kiss, good night sweet Love,
And peace goe with thee: thou hast prov'd thy self
The honestest man that ever was entic'd
To that sweet sin as people please to call it,
Of lying with anothers wife, and I,
I think the honestest woman without blushing,
That ever lay with another man, I sent my Husband
Into a Cellar, post, fearing, and justly
He should have known him, which I did not purpose
Till I had had my end.

Well, now this plot is perfect, let him brag on't.

Exit.

Actus

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Justice and Curio with a Paper.

Just. Brlady Sir, you have rid hard that you have.

Cur. They that have business, must do so, I take it.

Just. You say true, when set you out my friend?

Cur. About ten a clock, and I have rid all night.

Just. By the mass you are tough indeed, I have seen the day, I would have rid too with the proudest of them, and sling dirt in their faces, and I have don't with this foolish boy, Sir, many a time; but what can last always? 'tis done, 'tis done now, Sir, age, care, and office, brings us to our footcloaths, the more the pity.

Curio. I believethat, Sir, but will it please you to read the business?

Just. My friend, I can read, and I can tell you when.

Cur. Would I could too Sir, for my haste requires it.

Just. Whence comes it do you say?

Cur. Sir from the City.

Just. Oh from the City, 'tis a reverent place.

Curio. And his justice be as short as his memory, A Dudgeon Dagger will serve him to mow down sin withal,

What clod-pole Commissioner is this?

Just. And by my faith, govern'd by worthy members, Discreet and upright.

Cur. Sir, they are beholding to you, you have given some of them a commendations, they were not worthy of this twenty years.

Just. Go to, go to, you have a merry meaning, I have found you Sir, i' faith, you are a wag, away, fie now I'll read Your Letter.

Cur. Pray do Sir; what a misery 'tis To have an urgent business wait the Justice Of such an old Tuff-taffata that knows not, Nor can be brought to understand more sence, Than how to restore suppress Alehouses, And have his man compound small trespasses, For ten groats.

Just. Sir, it seems here your business is of a deeper circumstance than I conceiv'd it for; what do you mean, Sir?

Cur. 'Tis for mine own ease I'll assure your Worship.

Just. It shall not be i' faith friend, here I have it, That one Antonio a Gentleman, I take it so, Yes, it is so, a Gentleman is lately thought to Have been made away, and by my faith, upon a Pearls ground too, if you consider; well, there's Knavery in't, I see that without spectacles.

Cur. Sure this fellow deals in revelation, he's so hidden, Goe thy ways, thou wilt stick a bench spit as formally, And shew thy Agot, and hatch'd chain As well as the best of them.

Just. And now I have consider'd, I believe it.

Cur. What Sir?

Just. That he was murdered,

Cur. Did you know him?

Just. No.

Cur. Nor how it is suppos'd.

Just. No, nor I care not two-pence, those are toys and yet I verily believe he was murdered, as sure as I believe thou art a man, I never fail'd in these things yet, w'are a man that's beaten to these matters, experience is a certain conceal'd thing that fails not: pray let me ask you one thing, why do you come to me?

Cur. Because the Letter is address'd to you, being the nearest Justice.

Just. The nearest? is that all?

Cur. I think it be Sir, I would be loth you should be the wisest.

Just. Well Sir, as it is, I will endeavour in it; yet if it had come to me by name, I know not, but I think it had been as soon dispatch'd as by another, and with as round a wisdom, I, and as happily, but that's all one: I have born this place this thirty years, and upwards, and with sufficient credit, and they may when they please, know me better; to the nearest? well.

Cur. Sir, it is not my fault, for had I known you sooner——

Just. I thank you Sir, I know it.

Cur. I'll be sworn you should have plaid for any business now.

Just. And further, they have specified unto me, his Wife is forely suspected in this matter, as a main cause,

Cur. I think she be Sir, for no other cause can be yet found.

Just. And one Mercury a traveller, with whom they say directly she is run away, and as they think this way.

Cur. I knew all this before.

Just. Well Sir, this Mercury I know, and his breeding, a neighbors child hard by, you have been happy, Sir, in coming hither.

Cur. Then you know where to have him, Sir?

Just. I do Sir, he dwells near me.

Cur. I doubt your Worship dwells near a knave then.

Just. I think so; pray put on: but 'tis a wonder To see how graceless people are now given, And how base virtue is accounted with them That should be all in all, as says a wife man.

I tell you Sir, and it is true, that there have been such murthers, and of late days, as 'twould make your very heart bleed in you, and some of them as I shall be enabled, I will tell you, it fell out of late days.

Cur. It may be so, but will it please you to proceed in this?

Just. An honest Weaver, and as good a workman, as e'er shot shuttle, and as close: but every man must dye; this honest Weaver being a little mellow in his Ale, that was the evidence verbatim, Sir, God bless the mark, sprung his neck just in this place: well Jarvis, thou hadst wrongs, and if I live some of the best shall sweat for't, then a wench——

Cur. But Sir, you have forgot my business.

Just. A sober pretty maid about 17. they say, certainly, howsoever 'tis shuffled, she burst her self, and fondly, if it be so, with Furmety at a Churching, but I think the Devil had another agent in't: either of which, if I can catch, shall stretch for't.

Cur. This is a mad Justice that will hang the Devil; but I would you would be short in this, before that other notice can be given.

Just. Sir, I will doe discreetly what is fitting; what, Antonio?

Ant. within. Your Worship.

Just. Put on your best coat, and let your fellow Mark goe to the Constable, and bid him aid me with all the speed he can, and all the power, and provide Pen and Ink to take their confessions, and my long sword: I cannot tell what danger we may meet with; you'll go with us?

Cur. Yes, what else? I came to that end to accuse both parties.

Just. May I crave what you are?

Cur. Faith Sir, one that to be known would not profit you, more than a near kinsman of the dead Antonio's.

Just. 'Tis well, I am sorry for my neighbor, truly, that he had no more grace, 'twill kill his Mother; she's a good old woman, will you walk in? I'll but put my cloak on, and my chain off, and a clean band, and have my shoes blackt over, and shift my Jerkin, and we'll to our business, and you shall see how I can bolt these matters.

Cur. As soon as't please you, Sir.

Exit.
Enter,

Enter Valerio, and Richardo.

Val. This is the place; here did I leave the Maid
Alone last night, drying her tender eyes,
Uncertain what to do, and yet desirous
To have me gone.

Rich. How rude are all we men,
That take the name of Civil to our selves?
If she had set her foot upon an earth
Where people live that we call barbarous;
Though they had had no house to bring her to,
They would have spoil'd the glory, that the spring
Has deckt the trees in, and with willing hands
Have torn their branches down, and every man
Would have become a builder for her sake.
What time left you her there?

Val. I left her, when the Sun had so much to sett,
As he is now got from his place of rise.

Rich. So near the night she could not wander far;
Fair Viola!

Val. It is in vain to call, she fought a house
Without all question.

Rich. Peace, fair Viola?
Fair Viola? who should have left her here
On such a ground? if you had meant to lose her,
You might have found there were no echos here
To take her name, and carry it about,
When her true Lover came to mourn for her,
Till all the neighboring valleys and the hills,
Refounded Viola,——

And such a place,
You should have chose——
You pity us because

The dew a little wets our feet,
Unworthy far to seek her in the wet;
And what becomes of her? where wandred she,
With two showers raining on her, from her eyes
Continually, abundantly, from which
There's neither tree nor house to shelter her;
Will you go with me to travel?

Val. Whither?

Rich. Over all the world.

Val. No by my faith, I'll make a shorter journey
When I do travel.

Rich. But there's no hope
To gain my end in any shorter way.

Val. Why, what's your end?

Rich. It is to search the earth,
Till we have found two in the shapes of men,
As wicked as our selves.

Val. 'Twere not so hard to find out those.

Rich. Why, if we find them out,
It were the better, for what brave villany,
Might we four do? we wou'd not keep together:
For every one has treachery enough.
For twenty countreys, one should trouble Asia,
Another should sow strife in Africa;
But you should play the knave, in at home in Europe,
And for America let me alone.

Val. Sir, I am honest,
Than you know how to be, and can no more
Be wrong'd, but I shall find my self aright.

Rich. If you had any spark of honesty,
You would not think that honest than I,
Were a praise high enough to serve your turn:
If men were commonly so bad as I,
Thieves would be put in Calendars for Saints;
And bones of murderers would work miracles.
I am a kind of knave, of knave so much
There is betwixt me, and the vilest else——
But the next place of all to mine is yours.

Enter two Milk-maids and Viola with pails,

Val. That last is she, 'tis she.

Rich. Let us away, we shall infect her, let her have the wind,
And we will kneel down here.

Vio. Wenches away, for here are men.

Val. Fair maid, I pray you stay.

Vio. Alas, agen?

Rich. Why do you lay hold on her? I pray heartily let her

Val. With all my heart, I do not mean to hurt her.

Rich. But stand away then for the purest bodies
Will soonest take infection, stand away,
But for infecting her my self, by heaven,
I would come there, and beat thee further off.

Vio. I know that voice and face.

Val. You are finely mad, goodby Sir, now you are here together, I'll leave you so, god send you good luck, both;
when you are soberer, you'll give me thanks. Exit.

Madg. Wilt thou go milk? come.

Nan. Why dost not come?

Madg. She nods, she's asleep.

Nan. What wert up so early?

Madg. I think you man's mad to kneel there, nay come come away, uds body, Nan, help, she looks black i'th face,
She's in a found.

Nan. And you be a man, come hither, and help a woman.

Rich. Come thither? you are a fool.

Nan. And you a knave and a beast that you are.

Rich. Come hither, 'twas my being now so near,
That made her her swoond, and you are wicked people,
Or you wou'd do so too; my venom eyes
Strike innocency dead at such a distance,
Here I'll kneel, for this is out of distance.

Nan. Th'art a prating ass, there's no goodness in thee,
I warrant, how dost thou?

Vio. Why? well.

Madg. Art thou able to go?

Vio. No, pray go you and milk, if I be able to come
I'll follow you, if not, I'll sit here,
Till you come back.

Nan. I am loth to leave thee here with you wild fool.

Vio. I know him well, I warrant thee he will not hurt me.

Madg. Come then Nan.

Exeunt Maids.

Rich. How do you? be not fearfull, for I hold my hands before my mouth, and speak, and so
My breath can never blast you.

Vio. 'Twas enough to use me ill, though you had never fought me to mock me, why kneel you so far off, were not that gesture better us'd in prayer, had I dealt so with you,
I should not sleep, till heaven and you had both forgiven
me.

Rich. I do not mock, nor lives there such a villain
That can do any thing contemptible
To you, but I do kneel, because it is
An action very fit and reverent,
In presence of so pure a creature,
And so far off, as fearful to offend,
One too much wrong'd already.

Vio. You confes you did the fault, yet scorn to come,
So far as hither, to ask pardon for't;
Which I could willingly afford to come,
To you to grant, good Sir if you have
A better love, may you be blest together.
She shall not wish you better than I will,
I but offend you, there are all the Jewels
I stole, and all the love I ever had,
I leave behind with you, I'll carry none
To give another may the next maid you try
Love you no worse, nor be no worse than I.

Rich. Do not leave me yet for all my fault,
Search out the next things to impossible,

And

And put me on them when they are effected,
I may with better modesty receive Forgiveness from you.

Vio. I will set no pennance,
To gain the great forgiveness you desire:
But to come hither and take me and it,
Or else I'll come and beg, so you will grant,
That you will be content to be forgiven.

Rich. Nay, I will come since you'll have it so,
And since you please to pardon me I hope
Free from infection, here I am by you;
A careless man, a breaker of my faith,
A lothsome drunkard; and in that wild fury:
A hunter after whores: I do beseech you,
To pardon all these faults, and take me up
An honest, sober, and a faithful man.

Vio. For heavens sake, urge your faults no more, but mend,
All the forgiveness I can make you, is,
To love you, which I will do, and desire
Nothing but love again, which if I have not Yet I will love you still.

Rich. Oh Women, that some one of you will take,
An everlasting pen into your hands:
And grave in paper which the writ shall make,
More lasting than the marble Monuments,
Your matchless virtues to posterities:
Which the defective race of envious man,
Strive to conceal.

Vio. Methinks I would not now for any thing,
But you had mist me, I have made a story,
Will serve to waste many a winters fire
When we are old, I'll my daughters then,
The miseries their Mother had in love:
And say, my girls be wiser, yet I would not
Have had more wit my self, take up those Jewels,
For I think I hear my fellows coming.

Enter the Milk-maids with their pails.

Madge. How dost thou now? (home?)

Vio. Why, very well I thank you, 'tis late, shall I haste

Nan. I prethee we shall be shent soundly.

Madge. Why does that railing man goe with us?

Vio. I prethee speak well of him, on my word,
He's an honest man.

Nan. There was never any so one's complexion, a Gentleman?

I'de be asham'd to have such a foul mouth. Exeunt.

Enter Mother, Alexander, Andrugio, and his man Rowland.

Moth. How now Alexander, what Gentleman is this?

Alex. Indeed forsooth I know not, I found him at the market full of woe, crying a lost daughter, and telling all her tokens to the people; and what you wot? by all subscription in the world, it should be our new Maid Melvia, one would little think it, therefore I was bold to tell him of her Mistress.

Moth. Melvia? It cannot be, fool, alas you know she is a poor wench, and I took her in upon mere charity.

And. So seem'd my daughter when she went away, as she had made her self.

Moth. What stature was your child of, Sir?

And. Not high, and of a brown complexion,
Her Hair aborn, a round face, which some friends that flattered me, would say 'twould be a good one.

Alex. This is still Melvia, Mistress, that's the truth on't.

Moth. It may be so, I'll promise you.

Alex. Well, goe thy ways, the flower of our Town, for a hand and a foot, I shall never see thy fellow.

Moth. But had she not such toys, as Bracelets, Rings, and Jewels?

And. She was something bold indeed, to take such things that night she left me.

Moth. Then belike she run away?

And. Though she be one I love, I dare not lye, she did indeed.

Moth. What think you of this Jewel?

And. Yes, this was one of them, and this was mine, you have made me a new man, I thank you for it.

Moth. Nay, and she be given to filching, there is your Jewel, I am clear on't: but by your leave, Sir, you shall answer me for what is lost since she came hither, I can tell you, there lye things scattering in every place about the house.

Alex. As I am virtuous, I have the lyingst old Gentlewoman to my Mistress, and the most malicious, the devil a good word will she give a servant, that's her old rule; and God be thanked, they'll give her as few, there is perfect love on both sides, it yearns my heart to see the wench miscontrived, a careful soul she is, I'll be sworn for her, when she's gone, let them say what they will, they may eat their caps at such another.

And. What you have lost by her, with all my heart I'll see you double paid for, you have sav'd With your kind pity, two that must not live Unless it be to thank you; take this Jewel, This strikes off none of her offences, Mistress, Would I might see her.

Moth. Alexander, run, and bid her make haste home, she's at the milking Close; but tell her not by any means who's here, I know she'll be too fearful.

Alex. Well, we'll have a posset yet at parting, that's my comfort, and one round, or else I'll lose my Will.

Exit.

And. You shall find Silvio, Uberto, and Pedro enquiring for the Wench at the next Town, tell them she is found, and where I am, and with the favor of this Gentlewoman, desire them to come hither.

Moth. I pray do, they shall be all welcome. Exit. Serv

Enter Justice, Curio, and Mark.

Just. By your leave forsooth, you shall see me find the parties by a slight,

Moth. Who's that, Mr. Justice? how do you, Sir?

Just. Why, very well, and busie, where's your Son?

Moth. He's within, Sir.

Just. Hum, and how does the young woman my Cofin, that came down with him.

Moth. She's above, as a woman in her case may be.

Just. You have confest it? then sirrah call in the Officers: she's no Cofin of mine; a mere trick to discover all.

Moth. To discover? what?

Enter Mark and Officers.

Just. You shall know that anon: I think I have overreached you; oh welcome, enter the house, and by virtue of my warrant which you have there, seize upon the bodily persons of those whose names are there written, to wit, one Mercury, and the wife of one Antonio.

Moth. For what.

Just. Away I say,

This Gentleman shall certify you for what. Ex. Officer.

Moth. He can accuse my Son of nothing, he came from travel but within these two days?

Just. There hangs a tale.

Moth. I should be sorry this should fall out at any time: but especially now Sir; will you favour me so much, as to let me know of what you accuse him?

Cur. Upon suspicion of murder.

Moth. Murder? I despise thee.

Curio.

Cur. I pray God he may prove himself innocent.

Just. Fie, say not so, you shew your self to be no good Common-wealths man: for the more are hang'd the better 'tis for the Common-wealth.

Moth. By this rule you were best hang your self.

Just. I forgive your honest mirth ever: Oh welcome, welcome Mark.

Enter Mark and Officers, with Mercury and the Wife.

Your Pen, Ink, and Paper, to take their examinations.

Mer. Why do you pull me so? I'll go alone.

Just. Let them stand, let them stand quietly, whilst they are examin'd?

Wife. What will you examine us of.

Just. Of Antonio's murder.

Mer. Why, he was my friend.

Wife. He was my Husband.

Just. The more shame for you both; Mark, your Pen and Ink.

Moth. Pray God all be well, I never knew any of these travellers come to good; I beseech you, Sir, be favourable to my Son.

Just. Gentlewoman, hold you content, I would it were come to that?

Mer. For gods sake mother, why kneel you to such a pig-brib'd fellow? he has surfeited of Geese, and they have put him into a fit of Justice; let him do his worst.

Just. Is your paper ready?

Mark. I am ready, Sir.

Enter Antonio.

Just. Accuse them, Sir, I command thee to lay down accusations against these persons, in behalf of the State, and first look upon the parties to be accus'd, and deliver your name.

Cur. My name is Curio, my murdered kinsman If he were living now, I should not know him, 'Tis so long since we saw one another.

Ant. My Cousin Curio?

Cur. But thus much from the mouths of his servants, and others, whose examinations I have in writing about me, I can accuse them of; this Mercury, the last night, but this last, lay in Antonio's house, and in the night he rose, raising Antonio, where privately they were in talk an hour, to what end I know not: but of likelihood, finding Antonio's house not a fit place to murder him in, he suffered him to go to bed again, but in the morning early, he train'd him I think forth, after which time he never saw his home; his cloaths were found near the place where Mercury was, and the people at first denyed they saw him: but at last he made a frivolous tale, that there he shifted himself into a Footmans habit: but in short, the next hour this woman went to Mercury, and in her Coach they posted hither; true accusations, I have no more, and I will make none.

Just. No more? we need no more, firrah, be drawing their Mittimus before we hear their answer. What say you Sir? are you guilty of this murder?

Mer. No Sir.

Just. Whether you are or no, confess, it will be the better for you.

Mer. If I were guilty, your Rhetorick could not fetch it forth: but though I am innocent, I confess, that if I were a stander by, these circumstances urg'd, which are true, would make me doubtless believe the accused parties, to be guilty.

Just. Write down, that he being a stander by; for so you see he is, doth doubtless believe the accused parties, which is himself to be guilty.

Mer. I say no such thing.

Just. Write it down I say, we'll try that.

Mer. I care not what you write, pray God you did not kill him for my love, though I am free from this, we both deserve—

Wife. Govern your tongue I pray you, all is well, my Husband lives, I know it, and I see him.

Just. They whisper, sever them quickly I say, Officers, why do you let them prompt one another, Gentlewoman, what say you to this, are not you guilty?

Wife. No, as I hope for mercy.

Just. But are not those circumstances true, that this Gentleman hath so shortly and methodically deliver'd?

Wife. They are, and what you do with me, I care not, Since he is dead, in whom was all my care: You knew him not.

Just. No, an't been better for you too, and you had never known him.

Wife. Why then you did not know the worlds chief joy, His face so manly as it had been made, To fright the world, yet he so sweetly temper'd; That he would make himself a natural fool, To do a noble kindness for a friend.

He was a man whose name I'll not out-live, Longer than heaven, whose Will must be obey'd; Will have me do.

Ant. And I will quit thy kindness.

Just. Before me, she has made the tears stand in mine eyes, but I must be austere, Gentlewoman; you must confess this murder.

Wife. I cannot, Sir, I did it not, but I desire to see those examinations which this Gentleman acknowledges to have about him, for but late last night I receiv'd Letters from the City, yet I heard of no confession, then.

Just. You shall see them time enough I warrant you, but Letters you say you had, where are those Letters?

Wife. Sir, they are gone.

Just. Gone? whither are they gone? How have you dispos'd of 'em?

Wife. Why Sir, they are for womens matters, and so I use 'em.

Just. Who writ 'em?

Wife. A man of mine.

Just. Who brought 'em?

Wife. A Post.

Just. A Post? there is some great haste sure, aha, where is that Post?

Wife. Sir, there he stands.

Just. Does he so? bring hither that Post, I am afraid that Post will prove a knave; come hither Post, what? what can you say concerning the murder of Antonio?

Ant. What's that to you?

Just. Oh Post, you have no answer ready, have you? I'll have one from you.

Ant. You shall have no more from me than you have; you examine an honest Gentleman and Gentlewoman here, 'tis pittty such fools as you should be i'th Commission.

Just. Say you so Post, take away that Post, whip him and bring him again quickly, I'll hamper you Post.

Mer. 'Tis Antonio, I know him now as well; what an irregular fool is this?

Ant. Whip me? hold off.

Wife. Oh good Sir whip him, by his murmuring he should know something of my Husbands death; that may quit me, for gods sake fetch't out.

Just. Whip him I say.

Ant. Who is't dares whip me now?

Wife. Oh my lov'd Husband.

Mer. My most worthy friend? where have you been so long?

Ant. I cannot speak for joy.

Just. Why, what's the matter now, and shall not Law then have her course?

Andra. It shall have no other course than it has I think.

Just. It shall have other course before I go, or I'll beat my brains, and I say it was not honestly done of him to discover himself before the parties accus'd were executed, that Law might have had her course, for then the kingdom flourishes.

Ant. But such a wife as thou, had never any man, and such a friend as he, believe me wife, shall never be good wife, love my friend, friend love my wife, hark friend.

Just. Mark, if we can have nothing to do, you shall swear the peace of some body.

Mark. Yes Sir.

Ant. By my troth I am sorry my wife is so obstinate, sooth, if I could yet do thee any good, I wou'd, faith I wou'd.

Mer. I thank you Sir, I have lost that passion.

Ant. Cousin Curio, you and I must be better acquainted.

Cur. It is my wish, Sir.

Ant. I should not have known you neither, 'tis so long since we saw, we were but children then: but you have shew'd your self an honest man to me.

Cur. I would be ever so.

Enter Richardo and Viola.

Moth. Look you, who's there.

And. Say nothing to me, for thy peace is made.

Rich. Sir, I can nothing say,
But that you are her Father, you can both
Not only pardon, when you have a wrong,
But love where you have most injury.

Just. I think I shall hear of no hanging this year, there's A Tinker and a Whore yet, the Cryer said, that rob'd her, and are in prison, I hope they shall be hang'd.

And. No truly Sir, they have broke prison.

Just. 'Tis no matter, then the Jaylor shall be hang'd.

And. You are deceiv'd in that too, Sir, 'twas known to be against his will, and he hath got his pardon, I think for nothing, but if it doth cost him any thing, I'll pay it.

Just. Mark, up with your papers, away.

Mer! Oh you shall stay dinner, I have a couple of brawling neighbors, that I'll assure you will not agree, and you shall have the hearing of their matter.

Just. With all my heart.

Mer. Go, Gentlemen, go in.

Rich. Oh Viola, that no succeeding age,
Might loose the memory of what thou wert,
But such an overswayed Sex is yours,
That all the virtuous actions you can do,
Are but as men will call them; and I swear,
'Tis my belief, that women want but ways;
To praise their deeds, but men want deeds to praise.

Exeunt omnes.

EPILOGUE.

'Tis ended, but my hopes and fears begin,
Nor can it be impnted as a sin
In me to wish it favour, if this night,

To the Judicious it hath giv'n delight.
I have my ends, and may such for their grace,
Vouchsaf'd to this, find theirs in every place.

Master.

 Ay her aloof, the Sea grows dangerous,
How it spits against the clouds, how it capers,
And how the fiery Element frights it back
There be Devils dancing in the air I think
I saw a Dolphin hang i'th horns o'th' moon
Shot from a wave, hey day, hey day,
How she kicks and yerks?

de pont. Morillat

Maſt. The ſtorm is loud,
We cannot hear one another,
What's the coaſt?

Boatſ. We know not ye; ſhall we make in?

Albert. What comfort Sailors?
I never ſaw, ſince I have known the Sea,
(which has been this twenty years) ſo rude a tempeſt:
In what State are we?

Maſt. Dangerous enough Captain,
We have ſprung five leaks, and no little ones;
Still rage; beſides, her ribs are open;
Her rudder almoſt ſpent; prepare your ſelves;
And have good courages, death comes but once,
And let him come in all his frights.

Albert. Is't not poſſible,
To make in to th' Land? 'tis here before us.

Morill. Here hard by Sir.

Maſt. Death is nearer, Gentlemen.
Yet do not cry, let's dye like men.

Tib. Shall's hoife the Boat out,
And goe all at one caſt? the more the merrier.

Enter Amint.

Maſt. You are too haſty Mounſieur,
Do ye long to be i'th' Fiſh-market before your time?
Hold hernp there.

Amint. Oh miſerable fortune,
Nothing but horror ſounding in mine ears,
No minute to promiſe to my frightened ſoul,

Tib. Peace woman,
We ha ſtorms enough already; no more howling.

Amint. Gentle Maſter.

Maſt. Clap this woman under hatches.

Alb. Pretheſpeak mildly to her.

Amint. Can no help?

Maſt. None that I know.

Amint. No promiſe from your goodneſs?

Maſt. Am I a God? for heavens ſake ſtow this

Tib. Go: take your gilt Prayer-Book woman;
And to your buſineſs; wink and die,
There's an old Haddock ſtaies for ye.

Amint. Muſt I die here in all the frights and terrors,
The thouſand ſeveral ſhapes death triumphs in?
No friend to counſel me?

Alb. Have peace ſweet Miſtriſs.

Amint. No kindred ſtears upon me? oh! my country?
No gentle hand to cloſe mine eyes?

Alb. Be comforted, heaven has the ſame
Power ſtill, and the ſame mercy.

Amint. Oh, that wave will devour me.

Maſt. Carry her down Captain;
Or by theſe hands I'll give no more direction,
Let the Ship ſink or ſwim, we ha ne'er better luck,
When we ha ſuch ſtorage as theſe trinkets with us,
Theſe ſweet ſin-breeders: how can heaven ſmile on us,
When ſuch a burthen of iniquity
Lies tumbling like a potion in our ſhip's belly?

Tib. Away with her, and if ſhe have a Prayer,
That's fit for ſuch an hour, let her ſay't quickly,

Exit.

And ſeriously.

Exit.

Alb. Come, I ſee it clear Lady, come in,
And take ſome comfort. I'll ſtay with ye.

Amint. Where ſhould I ſtay? to what end ſhould I hope,
Am not I circled round with miſery?
Confuſions in their full heights dwell about me:
Oh Mounſieur Albert, How am I bound to curſe ye,
If curſes could redeem me? how to hate ye?
You forc'd me from my quiet, from my friends;
Even from their Arms, that were as dear to me;
As day-light is, or comfort to the wretched;
You forc'd my friends from their peaceful reſt,
Some your relentleſs ſword gave their laſt groans;
Would I had there been numbred;
And to fortunes never ſatiſfied afflictions,
Ye turn'd my Brother; and thoſe few friends I'd left,
Like deſperate creatures, to their own fears
And the world's ſtubborn pitties: Oh mercileſs!

Alb. Sweet Miſtriſs.

Amint. And whither they are wandred to avoid ye,
Or whither dead, and no kind earth to cover 'em;
Was this a Lovers part? but heaven has found ye,
And in his loudeſt voice, his voice of thunder,
And in the mutiny of his deep wonders,
He tells ye now, ye weep too late:

Alb. Let theſe tears tell how I honor ye;
Ye know dear Lady, ſince ye are mine,
How truly I have lov'd ye, how ſanctimoniouſly
Obſerv'd your honor; not one laſcivious word,
Not one touch Lady; no, not a hope that might not render
The unpolluted ſervant of your chaſtity; (me
For you I put to ſea, to ſeek your Brother;
Your Captain, yet your ſlave, that his redemption,
If he be living, where the Sun has circuit,
May expiate your rigor, and my raſhneſs.

Amint. The ſtorm grows greater, what ſhall we do?

Alb. Let's in:

And aſk heavens mercy; my ſtrong mind yet preſages,
Through all theſe dangers, we ſhall ſee a day yet
Shall crown your pious hopes, and my fair wiſhes. Exit.

Enter Maſter, Sailors, Gentlemen, and Boatſwain.

Maſt. It muſt all over-board.

Boatſ. It clears to Sea-ward Maſt.

Fling o'er the Lading there, and let's lighten her;
All the meat, and the Cakes, we are all gone eſſe;
That we may find her Leaks, and hold her up;
Yet ſave ſome little Biſket for the Lady,
Till we come to the Land.

La-m. Muſt my Goods over too?
Why honeſt Maſter? here lies all my money;
The Money I ha wrackt by uſury,
To buy new Lands and Lordſhips in new Countreys,
'Cause I was baniſh'd from mine own
I ha been this twenty years a raiſing it.

Tib. Out with it:
The devils are got together by the ears, who ſhall have it;
And here they quarrel in the clouds.

La-m. I am undone Sir:

Tib. And be undone, 'tis better than we

La-m. Oh ſave one Cheſt of Plate.

Tib. Away with it luſtily, Sailors;
It was ſome pawn that he has got unjuſtly;
Down with it low enough, and let Crabs breed in't;
Maſt. Over with the Trunks too.

Enter Albert.

Alb. Take mine and ſpare not.

Maſt. We muſt over with all.

Fran. Will ye throw away my Lordſhip
That I ſold, put it into cloaths and neceſſaries,
To goe to ſea with?

Tib. Over with it; I love to ſee a Lordſhip ſink;

Sir,

Sir, you left no wood upon't, to buoy it up;
You might ha' sav'd it else.

Fran. I am undone for ever;

Alb. Why we are all undone; would you be only happy?

La-m. Sir, you may loose too.

Tib. Thou liest; I ha' nothing but my skin,
And my cloaths; my sword here, and my self;
Two Crowns in my pocket; two pair of Cards;
And three false Dice: I can swim like a fish
Rascal, nothing to hinder me.

Bousfir. In with her of all hands.

Mast. Come Gentlemen, come Captain, ye must help all;
My life now for the Land,

'Tis high, and rocky, and full of perils;

Alb. However let's attempt it.

Mast. Then cheer lustily my hearts.

Exit.

Enter Sebastian and Nicusa.

Sebast. Yes, 'tis a Ship, I see it now, a tall Ship;
She has wrought lustily for her deliverance;
Heavens mercy, what a wretched day has here been?

Nicu. To still and quiet minds that knew no misery,
It may seem wretched, but with us 'tis ordinary;
Heaven has no storm in store, nor earth no terror,
That can seem new to us.

Sebast. 'Tis true Nicusa, if fortune were determin'd
To be wanton, and would wipe out the stories
Of mens miseries: yet we two living,
We could cross her purpose; for 'tis impossible
She should cure us, we are so excellent in our afflictions;
It would be more than glory to her blindness,
And stile her power beyond her pride, to quit us.

Nicu. Do they live still?

Sebast. Yes, and make to harbor:

Nicu. Most miserable men; I grieve their fortunes.

Sebast. How happy had they been, had the Sea cover'd em?
They leap from one calamity to another;
Had they been drown'd, they had ended all their sorrows.
What shouts of joy they make?

Nicu. Alas poor wretches, had they but once experience
Of this Island, they'd turn their tunes to wailings;

Sebast. Nay, to curses.

That ever they set foot on such calamities;
Here's nothing but Rocks and barrenness,
Hunger, and cold to eat; here's no Vineyards
To cheer the heart of man, no Christal Rivers,
After his labour, to refresh his body,
If he be feeble; nothing to restore him,
But heavenly hopes, nature that made those remedies,
Dares not come here, nor look on our distresses,
For fear she turn wild, like the place, and barren.

Nicu. Oh Uncle, yet a little memory of what we were,
'Twill be a little comfort in our calamities;
When we were seated in our blessed homes,
How happy in our kindreds, in our families,
In all our fortunes?

Sebast. Curse on those French Pirats, that displanted us;
That flung us from that happiness we found there;
Constrain'd us to Sea, to save our lives, honors, and our
With all we had, our kinsmen, and our jewels, (riches,
In hope to find some place free from such robbers,
Where a mighty storm sever'd our Barks,
That, where my Wife, my Daughter
And my noble Ladies that went with her,
Virgins and loving souls, to scape those Pirats.

Nicu. They are yet living; such goodness cannot perish.

Sebast. But never to me Cousin;

Never to me again; what bears their Flag-staves?

Nicu. The Arms of France sure;

Nay, do not start, we cannot be more miserable;
Death is a cordial, now, come when it will.

Sebast. They get to shore apace, they'll flie as fast (there?)
When once they find the place; what's that which swims

Ni. A strong young man, Sir, with a handsome woman.
Hanging about his neck.

Sebast. That shews some honor;
May thy brave charity, what e'er thou art,
Be spoken in a place that may renown thee,
And not dye here.

Nicu. The Boat it seems turn'd over,
So forced to their shifts; yet all are landed:
They're Pirates on my life.

Sebast. They will not rob us;
For none will take out misery for riches:
Come Cousin, let's descend, and try their pities;
If we get off, a little hope walks with us;
If not, we shall but load this wretched Island
With the same shadows still, that must grow shorter. Ex.

Enter Albert, Aminta, Tibalt, Morillat, La-mure, Master, Franville, Surgeon, Sailors.

Tib. Wet come ashore my mates, we are safe arrived yet.

Mast. Thanks to heavens goodness, no man lost;
The Ship rides fair too, and her leaks in good plight.

Alb. The weathers turn'd more courteous;
How does my Dear?

Alas, how weak she is, and wet?

Amint. I am glad yet, I escap'd with life;
Which certain, noble Captain, next to heavens goodness,
I must thank you for, and which is more,
Acknowledge your dear tenderness, your firm love
To your unworthy Mistress, and recant too
(Indeed I must) those harsh opinions,
Those cruel unkind thoughts, I heapt upon ye;
Farther than that, I must forget your injuries.
So far I am ti'd, and fet'ted to your service,
Believe me, I will learn to love.

Alb. I thank ye Madam,
And it shall be my practise to serve.
What cheer companions?

Tib. No great cheer Sir, a piece of souc'd Bisket
And halfe a hard egg; for the Sea has taken order;
Being young and strong, we shall not surfet Captain.
For mine own part, I'll dance till I'm dry;
Come Surgeon, out with your Clister-pipe,
And strike a Galliard.

Alb. What a brave day again?
And what fair weather, after so foul a storm?

La-mure. I an't pleas'd the Master he might ha seen
This weather, and ha' sav'd our goods.

Alb. Never think on 'em, we have our lives and healths.
La-m. I must think on 'em, and think
'Twas most maliciously done to undoe me.

Fran. And me too, I lost all;
I ha'n't another shirt to put upon me, nor cloaths
But these poor rags; I had fifteen fair suits,
The worst was cut upon Taffaty.

Tib. I am glad you ha' lost, give me thy hand,
Is thy skin whole? art thou not pur'l'd with scabs?
No antient monuments of Madam Venus?
Thou hast a suit then will pose the cunning'st Tailor,
That will never turn fashion, nor forsake thee,
Till thy executors the Worms, uncase thee,
They take off glorious suites Franville: thou art happy,
Thou art deliver'd of 'em; here are no Brokers;
No Alchymists to turn 'em into Mettal;
Nor leather'd Captains, with Ladies to adore 'em;
Wilt thou see a Dog-fish rise in one of thy brave doublets,
And tumble like a tub to make thee merry,
Or an old Haddock rise with thy hatch'd sword
Thou paid'st a hundred Crowns for?
A Mermaid in a Mantle of your Worships,
Or a Dolphin in your double Ruffe?

Fran. Ye are merry, but if I take it thus,
If I be foisted and jeer'd out of my goods.

La-m. Nor I, I vow thee.

Nor Master, nor Mate, I see your cunning,

Alb. Oh be not angry Gentlemen.

Moril. Yes Sir, we have reason.

And some friends I can make.

Mat. What I did Gentlemen, was for the general safety.

If ye aim at me, I am not so tame.

Tib. Pray take my counsel Gallants.

Fight not till the Surgeon be well,

He's damnable sea-lick, and may spoil all;

Besides he has lost his Fiddlestick, and the best

Box of Bores-grease; why do you make such faces,

And hand your swords?

Alb. Who would ye fight with Gentlemen?

Who has done ye wrong? for shame be better temper'd.

No sooner come to give thanks for our safeties,

But we must raise new civil broils amongst us

Inflame those angry powers, to shower new vengeance on us?

What can we expect for these unmanly murmurs,

These strong temptations of their holy pitties,

But plagues in another kind, a fuller, so dreadful,

That the singing storms are slumbers to it?

Tib. Be men, and rule your minds;

If you will needs fight, Gentlemen,

And think to raise new riches by your valours,

Have at ye, I have little else to do now

I have said my prayers; you say you have lost,

And make your loss your quarrel.

And grumble at my Captain here, and the Master

Two worthy persons, indeed too worthy for such rascals,

Thou Gambon gallant, and Mammon you

That build on golden Mountains, thou Money-Maggot;

Come all, draw your swords, ye say ye are miserable.

Alb. Nay, hold good Tibalt

Tib. Captain, let me correct 'em;

I'll make ye ten times worse, I will not leave 'em;

For look ye, fighting is as nourishing to me as eating,

I was born quarrelling.

Mat. Pray Sir.

Tib. I will not leave 'em skins to cover 'em;

Do ye grumble, when ye are well, ye rogues?

Mat. Noble Du-pont.

Tib. Ye have cloaths now: and ye prate.

Amin. Pray Gentlemen, for my sake be at peace.

Let it become me to make all friends.

Fran. You have stopt our angers Lady.

Alb. This shews noble.

Tib. 'Tis well: 'tis very well: there's half a Bisket,

Break't amongst ye all, and thank my bounty.

This is Cloaths and Plate too; come no more quarrelling.

Amin. But ha! what things are these,

Are they humane creatures?

Enter Sebastian and Nicusa.

Tib. I have heard of Sea-Calves.

Alb. They are no shadows sure, they have Legs and Arms.

Tib. They hang but lightly on though.

Amin. How they look, are they mens faces?

Tib. They have horse-tails growing to 'em.

Goodly long manes.

Amin. Alas what sunk eyes they have!

How they are crept in, as if they had been frighted!

Sure they are wretched men.

Tib. Where are their Wardrobes?

Look ye Franvile, here are a couple of Courtiers.

Amin. They kneel, alas poor souls.

Alb. What are ye? speak; are ye alive,

Or wandring shadows, that find no peace on earth,

Till ye reveal some hidden secret?

Sebast. We are men as you are;

Only our miseries make us seem monsters,

If ever pitty dwelt in noble hearts;

Alb. We understand 'em too: pray mark 'em t Gentle-

Sebast. Or that heaven is pleas'd with human echarity;

If ever ye have heard the name of frien dship?

Or suffered in your selves, the least afflictions,

Have gentle Fathers that have bred ye tenderly,

And Mothers that have wept for your misfortunes,

Have mercy on our miseries.

Alb. Stand up wretches;

Speak boldly, and have release;

Nicuf. If ye be Christians,

And by that blessed name, bound to relieve us,

Convey us from this Island.

Alb. Speak; what are ye?

Seb. As you are, Gentle born; to tell ye more,

Were but to number up our own calamities,

And turn your eyes wild with perpetual weepings;

These many years in this most wretched Island

Wetwo have liv'd: the scorn and game of fortune;

Bless your selves from it Noble Gentlemen;

The greatest plagues that humane nature suffers,

Are seated here, wildness, and wants innumerable,

Alb. How came ye hither?

Nicuf. In a ship as you do, and you might have been.

Had not Heaven preserv'd ye for some more noble use;

Wrackt desperately; our men, and all consum'd,

But we two; that still live, and spin out

The thin and ragged threds of our misfortunes.

Alb. Is there no meat above?

Sebast. Nor meat nor quiet;

No summer here, to promise any thing;

Nor Autumn, to make full the reapers hands;

The earth obdurate to the tears of heaven,

Lets nothing shoot but poison'd weeds.

No Rivers, nor no pleasant Groves, no Beasts;

All that were made for man's use, flie this desert;

No airy Fowl dares make his flight over it,

It is so ominous.

Serpents, and ugly things, the shames of nature,

Roots of malignant tastes, foul standing waters;

Sometimes we find a fullsome Sea-root,

And that's a delicate? a Rat sometimes,

And that we hunt like Princes in their pleasure;

And when we take a Toad, we make a Banquet.

Amin. For heavens sake let's aboard.

Alb. D'ye know no farther?

(inhabited;

Nicu. Yes, we have sometimes seen the shadow of a place

And heard the noise of hunters;

And have attempted ro find it, to far as a River,

Deep, slow, and dangerous, fenced with high Rocks,

We have gone; but not able to atchieve that hazard,

Return to our old miseries.

If this sad story may deserve your pities.

(cries:

Alb. Ye shall aboard with us, we will relieve your mis-

Sebast. Nor will we be unthankful for this benefit,

No Gentlemen, we'll pay for our deliverance;

Look ye that plough the Seas for wealth and pleasures,

That out-run day and night with your ambitions,

Look on those heaps, they seem hard ragged quarries;

Remove 'em, and view 'em fully.

Mat. Oh heaven, they are Gold and Jewels.

Sebast. Be not too hasty, here lies another heap.

Moril. And here another,

All perfect Gold.

(vers;

Alb. Stand farther off, you must not be your own car-

La-m. We have shares, and deep ones;

Fran. Yes Sir, we'll maintain't: ho fellow Sailors,

La-m. Stand all to your freedoms;

I'll have all this.

Fran. And I this.

Tib. You shall be hang'd first,

La-m. My losses shall be made good.

Fran. So shall mine, or with my sword I'll do't;

All that will share with us, assist us.

Tib. Captain, let's set in.

Alb. This money will undo us, undo us all:

Sebast. This Gold was the overthrow of my happiness;

I had

I had command too, when I landed here,
And lead young, high, and noble spirits under me,
This curled Gold enticing 'em, they let upon their Captain,
On me that own'd this wealth, and this poor Gentleman,
Gave us no few wounds, forc'd us from our own ;
And then their civil swords, who should be owners,
And who Lords over all, turn'd against their own lives,
First in their rage, consum'd the Ship,
That poor part of the Ship that scap'd the first wrack,
Next their lives by heaps ; Oh be you wise and careful :

La-m. We'll ha' more : sirrah, come shew it.

Fran. Or ten times worse afflictions than thou speak'st of.

Alb. Nay, and ye will be dogs. Beats 'em out.

Tib. Let me come, Captain :

This Golden age must have an Iron ending.

Have at the bunch.

He beats 'em off. Exit.

Amint. Oh Albert ; Oh Gentlemen, Oh Friends. Exit.

Sebast. Come noble Nephew, if we stay here, we dye,
Here rides their Ship, yet all are gone to th' spoil,
Let's make a quick use.

Nicus. Away dear Uncle.

Sebast. This Gold was our overthrow. Exit.

Nicus. It may now be our happiness.

Enter Tibalt and the rest.

Tib. You shall have Gold : yes, I'll cram it int' ye ;
You shall be your own carvers ; yes, I'll carve ye,

Morill. I am sore, I pray hear reason :

Tib. I'll hear none.

Covetous base minds have no reason ;

I am hurt my self, but whilst I have a leg left,
I will so haunt your gilded souls ; how d'ye Captain ?
Ye bleed apace, curse on the causers on't ;
Ye do not faint ?

Alb. No, no ; I am not so happy.

Tib. D'ye howl, nay, ye deserve it :

Base greedy rogues ; come, shall we make an end of 'em ?

Alb. They are our Countrey-men, for heavens sake spare 'em.
Alas, they are hurt enough, and they relent now.

Aminta above.

Aminta. Oh Captain, Captain.

Alb. Whose voice is that ?

Tib. The Ladies. (tain.

Amint. Look Captain, look ; ye are undone : poor Cap-
We are all undone, all, all : we are all miserable, Mad wilful men ; ye are undone, your Ship, your Ship.

Alb. What of her ?

Amint. She's under sail, and floating ;
See where she flies : see to your shames, you wretches :
These poor starv'd things that shew'd you Gold.

La-m. and Franvile goes up to see the Ship,

1 Sail. They have cut the Cables,
And got her out ; the Tide too has befriended 'em.

Mast. Where are the Sailors that kept her ?

Boats. Here, here in the mutiny, to take up money,
And left no creature, left the Boat ashore too ;
This Gold, this damn'd enticing Gold.

2 Sail. How the wind drives her,
As if it vied to force her from our furies ?

La-m. Come back good old men :

Fran. Good honest men, come back.

Tib. The wind's against ye, speak louder ;

La-m. Ye shall have all your Gold again : they see us.

Tib. Hold up your hands, and kneel,

And howl ye block-heads ; they'll have compassion on ye ;
Yes, yes, 'tis very likely, ye have deserv'd it,
D'ye look like dogs now ?

Are your mighty courages abated ?

Alb. I bleed apace Tibalt :

Tib. Retire Sir : and make the best use of our miseries.
They but begin now.

Enter Aminta.

Amint. Are ye alive still ?

Alb. Yes sweet.

Tib. Help him off Lady ;

And wrap him warm in your arms, (somely,
Here's something that's comfortable ; off with him hand-
I'll come to ye straight ; but vex these rascals a little.

Exit Albert, Aminta.

Fran. Oh, I am hungry, and hurt, and I am weary.

Tib. Here's a Pistle of a Portigue, Sir ;

'Tis excellent meat, with four sauce ;
And here's two Chains, suppose 'em Saufages ;
Then there wants Mustard ;

But the fearful Surgeon will supply ye presently :

La-m. Oh for that Surgeon, I shall die else.

Tib. Faith there he lies in the same pickle too,

Surg. My Salves, and all my Instruments are lost ;
And I am hurt and starv'd ;

Good Sir, seek for some herbs.

Tib. Here's Herb-graceless, will that serve ?

Gentlemen will ye go to supper ?

All. Where's the meat ?

Tib. Where's the meat ? what a Veal voice is there ?

Fran. Would we had it Sir, or any thing else ;

Tib. I would now cut your throat you dog,
But that I wo't doe you such a courtesie ; (hence'
Oh ! what a comfort will your worship have some three days
Ye things beneath pitty, Famine shall be your harbinger,
You must not look for Down-beds here,
Nor Haagings ; though I could wish ye strong ones ;
Yet there be many lightsome cool Star chambers,
Open to every sweet air, I'll assure ye,
Ready provided for ye, and so I'll leave ye ;
Your first course is serv'd, expect the second. Exit.

Fran. A vengeance on these Jewels.

La-m. Oh ! this cursed Gold. Exeunt

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Albert, Aminta.

Alb. A Las dear soul ye faint.

Amint. You speak the language
Which I should use to you, heaven knows, my weakness
Is not for what I suffer in my self,
But to imagine what you endure, and to what fate
Your cruel Stars reserve ye.

Alb. Do not add to my afflictions
By your tender pitties ; sure we have chang'd Sexes ;
You bear calamity with a fortitude
Would become a man ; I like a weak girl, suffer.

Amint. Oh, but your wounds,
How fearfully they gape ? and every one
To me is a Sepulchre : if I lov'd truly,
(Wise men affirm, that true love can do no wonders,)
These bath'd in my warm tears, would soon be cur'd,
And leave no orifice behind ; pray give me leave.
To play the Surgeon, and bind 'em up ;
The raw air rankles 'em.

Alb. Sweet, we want means.

Amint. Love can supply all wants.

Alb. What have ye done, Sweet ?

Oh sacrifice to beauty : there's no hair
Of these pure locks, by which the greatest King
Would not be gladly bound, and love his Fetters.

Amint. Oh Albert, I offer this sacrifice of service
To the Altar of your staid temperance, and still adore it,
When with a violent hand you made me yours,
I curs'd the doer: but now I consider,
How long I was in your power: and with what honor;
You entertain'd me, it being seldom seen,
That youth, and heat of blood, could e'r prescribe
Laws to it self; your goodness is the Lethe,
In which I drown your injuries, and now live
Truly to serve ye: how do you Sir?
Receive you the least ease from my service?
If you do, I am largely recompenc'd.

Alb. You good Angels,
That are engag'd, when mans ability fails,
To reward goodness: look upon this Lady
Though hunger gripes my croaking entrails,
Yet when I kiss these Rubies, methinks
I'm at a Banquet, a refreshing Banquet;
Speak my bless'd one, art not hungry?

Amint. Indeed I could eat, to bear you company.

Alb. Blush unkind nature,
If thou hast power: or being to hear
Thy self, and by such innocence accus'd;
Must print a thousand kinds of shame, upon
Thy various face: canst thou supply a drunkard,
And with a prodigal hand reach choice of Wines,
Till he cast up thy blessings? or a glutton,
That robs the Elements, to sooth his palat,
And only eats to beget appetite,
Not to be satisfied? and suffer here
A Virgin which the Saints would make their guest,
To pine for hunger? ha, if my fence Horns within.
Deceive me not, these Notes take Being
From the breath of men; confirm me my Aminta;
Again, this way the gentle wind conveys it to us,
Hear you nothing?

Amint. Yes, it seems free hunters Musick;

Alb. Still 'tis louder; and I remember the Portugals
Inform'd us, they had often heard such sounds,
But ne'r could touch the shore from whence it came;
Follow me, my Aminta: my good genius,
Shew me the way still; still we are directed;
When we gain the top of this near rising hill,
We shall know further. Exit. And Enter above.

Alb. Courteous Zephyrus,
On his dewy wings, carries perfumes to cheer us;
The air clears too;
And now, we may discern another Island,
And questionless, the seat of fortunate men:
Oh that we could arrive there.

Amint. No Albert, 'tis not to be hop'd;
This envious Torrent's cruelly interpos'd;
We have no vessel that may transport us;
Nor hath nature given us wings to flie.

Alb. Better try all hazards,
Than perish here remediless; I feel
New vigor in me, and a spirit that dares
More than a man, to serve my fair Aminta;
These Arms shall be my oars, with which I'll swim;
And my zeal to save thy innocent self,
Like wings, shall bear me up above the brackish waves.

Amint. Will ye then leave me?

Alb. Till now I ne'er was wretched.
My best Aminta, I swear by goodness
'Tis nor hope, nor fear, of my self that invites me
To this extrem; 'tis to supply thy wants and believe me
Though pleasure met me in most ravishing forms,
And happiness courted me to entertain her,
I would nor eat nor sleep, till I return'd
And crown'd thee with my fortunes.

Amint. Oh but your absence.

Alb. Suppose it but a dream, and as you may,
Endeavour to take rest; and when that sleep
Deceives your hunger with imagin'd food,

Think you have sent me for discovery
Of some most fortunate Continent, yet unknown,
Which you are to be Queen of.
And now ye Powers, that e'er heard Lovers Prayers,
Or christit pure affection; look on him
That is your Votary; and make it known
Against all stops, you can defend your own. Exit.

Enter Hippolita, Crocale, Juletta.

Hip. How did we lose Clarinda? (take foil,

Cro. When we believ'd the Stag was spent, and would
The sight of the black lake which we suppos'd
He chose for his last refuge, frighted him more
Than we that did pursue him.

Jul. That's usual; for, death it self is not so terrible
To any beast of chase.

Hip. Since we liv'd here, we ne'er could force one to it.

Cro. 'Tis so dreadful,
Birds that with their pinions cleave the air
Dare not flie over it: when the Stag turn'd head,
And we, even tir'd with labor, Clarinda, as if She were made of Air and Fire,
And had no part of earth in her, eagerly pursu'd him;
Nor need we fear her safety, this place yields not Fawns nor Satyrs, or more lustful men;
Here we live secure,

And have among our selves a Common-wealth,
Which in our selves begun, with us must end.

Jul. I, there's the misery.

Cro. But being alone,

Allow me freedom but to speak my thoughts;
The strictness of our Governess, that forbids us,
On pain of death, the sight and use of men,
Is more than tyranny: for her self, she's past
Those youthful heats, and feels not the want
Of that which young maids long for: and her daughter
The fair Clarinda, though in few years
Improv'd in height and large proportion,
Came here so young,

That scarce remembering that she had a father,
She never dreams of man; and should she see one,
In my opinion, a would appear a strange beast to her.

Jul. 'Tis not so with us.

Hip. For my part, I confess it, I was not made
For this single life; nor do I love hunting so,
But that I had rather be the chace my self.

Cro. By Venus (out upon me) I should have sworn
By Diana, I am of thy mind too wench;
And though I have ta'en an oath, not alone
To detest, but never to think of man,
Every hour something tells me I am forsworn;
For I confess, imagination helps me sometimes,
And that's all is left for us to feed on,
We might starve else, for if I have any pleasure
In this life, but when I sleep, I am a Pagan;
Then from the Courtier to the Countrey-clown,
I have strange visions.

Jul. Visions Crocale?

Cro. Yes, and fine visions too;
And visions I hope in dreams are harmless,
And not forbid by our Canons; the last night
(Troth 'tis a foolish one, but I must tell it)
As I lay in my Cabin, betwixt sleeping and waking.

Hip. Upon your back?

Cro. How should a young Maid lie, fool,
When she would be intranc'd?

Hip. We are instructed; forward I prethee.

Cro. Methought a sweet young man
In years some twenty, with a downy chin,
Promising a future beard, and yet no red one,
Stole slylie to my Cabin all unbrac'd,
Took me in his arms, and kiss'd me twenty times,
Yet still I slept.

Jul. Fie; thy lips run over Crocale.
But to the rest.

Cro. Lord, What a man is this thought I,
To do this to a Maid!
Yet then for my life I could not wake.
The youth, a little danted, with a trembling hand
Heav'd up the clothes.

Hip. Yet still you slept?
Cro. Y^ofaith I did; and when, methoughts, he was warm
by my side,
Thinking to catch him, I stretcht out both mine armes;
And when I felt him not, I shreekt out,
And wak'd for anger.

Hip. 'Twas a pretty dream.
Cro. I, if it had been a true one.

Enter Albert.

Jul. But stay, What's here cast o'th' shore?

Hip. 'Tis a man;
Shall I shoot him?
Cro. No, no, 'tis a handsome beast;
Would we had more o'th' breed; stand close wenches,
And let's hear if he can speak.

Alb. Do I yet live?
Sure it is ay I breathe; What place is this?
Sure something more than humane keeps residence here,
For I have pass'd the Stygian gulph,
And touch upon the blessed shore? 'tis so;
This is the Elizian shade; these happy spirits,
That here enjoy all pleasures.

Hip. He makes towards us.
Jul. Stand, or I'll shoot.
Cro. Hold, he makes no resistance.

Alb. Be not offended Goddesses, that I fall
Thus prostrate at your feet: or if not such,
But Nymphs of Dian's train, that range these groves,
Which you forbid to men; vouchsafe to know
I am a man, a wicked sinful man; and yet not fold
So far to impudence, as to presume
To press upon your privacies, or provoke
Your Heavenly angers; 'tis not for my self
I beg thus poorly, for I am already wounded,
Wounded to death, and faint; my last breath
Is for a Virgin, comes as near your selves
In all perfection, as what's mortal may Resemble things divine. O pity her,
And let your charity free her from that defart,
If Heavenly charity can reach to Hell,
For sure that place comes near it: and where ere
My ghost shall find abode,
Eternally I shall powre blessings on ye.

Hip. By my life I cannot hurt him.
Cro. Though I lose my head for it, nor I
I must pity him, and will.

Enter Clarinda.

Jul. But stay, Clarinda?
Cl. What new game have ye found here, ha!
What beast is this lies wallowing in his gore?

Cro. Keep off.
Cl. Wherefore, I pray? I ne'er turn'd
From a fell Lions rob'd of her whelps,
And, Shall I fear dead carrion?

Jul. O but.
Cl. But, What is't?
Hip. It is infectious.
Cl. Has it not a name?
Cro. Yes, but such a name from which
As from the Devil your Mother commands us flee.

Cl. Is't a man?
Cro. It is.
Cl. What a brave shape it has in death;

How excellent would it appear had it life!
Why should it be infectious? I have heard
My Mother say, I had a Father,
And was not he a Man?

Cro. Questionless Madam.
Cl. Your fathers too were Men?
Jul. Without doubt Lady.
Cl. And without such it is impossible
We could have been.
Hip. A sin against nature to deny it.
Cl. Nor can you or I have any hope to be a Mother,
Without the help of Men.

Cro. Impossible.
Cl. Which of you then most barbarous, that knew
You from a man had Being, and owe to it
The name of parent, durst presume to kill
The likeness of that thing by which you are?
Whose Arrows made these wounds? speak, or by Dian
Without distinction I'll let fly at ye all.

Jul. Not mine.
Hip. Nor mine.
Cro. 'Tis strange to see her mov'd thus.
Restrain your fury Madam; had we kill'd him,
We had but perform'd your Mothers command.

Cl. But if she command unjust and cruel things,
We are not to obey it.

Cro. We are innocent; some storm did cast
Him shipwreckt on the shore, as you see wounded:
Nor durst we be Surgeons to such
Your Mother doth appoint for death.

Cl. Weak excuse; Where's pity?
Where's soft compassion? cruel, and ungrateful
Did providence offer to your charity
But one poor Subject to express it on,
And in't to shew our wants too; and could you
So carelessly neglect it?

Hip. For ought I know, he's living yet;
And you may tempt your Mother, by giving him succor.

Cl. Ha, come near I charge ye.
So, bend his body softly; rub his temples;
Nay, that shall be my office: how the red
Steales into his pale lips! run and fetch the simples
With which my Mother heal'd my arme
When last I was wounded by the Bore.

Cro. Doe: but remember her to come after ye,
That she may behold her daughters charity.

Cl. Now he breathes; Exit Hippolita.
The ayr passing through the Arabian groves
Yields not so sweet an odour: prethee taste it;
Taste it good Crocale; yet I envy thee so great a blessing;
'Tis not sin to touch these Rubies, is it?

Jul. Not, I think.
Cl. Or thus to live Camelion like?
I could resign my essence to live ever thus.
O welcome; raise him up Gently. Some soft hand
Bound up these wounds; a womans hair. What fury
For which my ignorance does not know a name,
Is crept into my bosome? But I forget

Enter Hippolita.

My pious work. Now if this juyce hath power,
Let it appear; his eyelids ope: Prodigious!
Two Suns break from these Orbes.

Alb. Ha, Where am I? What new vision's this?
To what Goddess do I owe this second life?
Sure thou art more than mortal:
And any Sacrifice of thanks or duty
In poor and wretched man to pay, comes short
Of your immortal bounty: but to shew
I am not unthankful, this in humility
I kiss the happy ground you have made sacred,
By bearing of your weight.

Cl. No Goddess, friend: but made

Of that same brittle mould as you are ;
One too acquainted with calamities,
And from that apt to pity. Charity ever
Finds in the act reward, and needs no Trumpet
In the receiver. O forbear this duty ;
I have a hand to meet with yours,
And lips to bid yours welcome.

Cro. I see, that by instinct,
Though a young Maid hath never seen a Man,
Touches have titillations, and inform her.

Enter Rosella.

But here's our Governess ;
Now I expect a storme.

Ros. Child of my flesh,
And not of my fair unspotted mind,
Un-hand this Monster.

Cl. Monster, Mother ?

Ros. Yes ; and every word he speaks, a Syrens note,
To drown the careless hearer. Have I not taught thee
The falshood and the perjuries of Men ?
On whom, but for a woman to shew pity,
Is to be cruel to her self ; the Sovereignty
Proud and imperious men usurp upon us,
We conferr on our selves, and love those fetters
We fasten to our freedoms. Have we, Clarinda,
Since thy fathers wrack, fought liberty,
To lose it un-compel'd ? Did fortune guide,
Or rather destiny, our Barke, to which
We could appoint no Port, to this blest place,
Inhabited heretofore by warlike women,
That kept men in subjection ? Did we then,
By their example, after we had lost
All we could love in man, here plant our selves,
With execrable oaths never to look
On man, but as a Monster ? and, Wilt thou
Be the first president to infringe those vows
We made to Heaven ?

Cl. Hear me ; and hear me with justice.
And as ye are delighted in the name
Of Mother, hear a daughter that would be like you.
Should all Women use this obstinate abstinence,
You would force upon us ; in a few years
The whole World would be peopled
Onely with Beasts.

Hip. We must, and will have Men.

Cro. I, or wee'll snake off all obedience.

Ros. Are ye mad ?

Can no persuasion alter ye ? suppose
You had my suffrage to your sute ;
Can this Shipwrackt wretch supply them all ?

Alb. Hear me great Lady ?

I have fellows in my misery, not far hence,
Divided only by this hellish River,
There live a company of wretched Men,
Such as your charity may make your slaves ;
Imagine all the miseries mankind
May suffer under : and they groan beneath 'em.

Cl. But are they like to you ?

Jul. Speak they your Language ?

Cro. Are they able, lusty men ?

Alb. They were good, Ladies ;

And in their May of youth of gentle blood,
And such as may deserve ye ; now cold and hunger
Hath lessen'd their perfection : but restor'd
To what they were, I doubt not they'll appear
Worthy your favors.

Jul. This is a blessing
We durst not hope for.

Cl. Dear Mother, be not obdurate.

Ros. Hear then my resolution : and labor not
To add to what I'll grant, for 'twill be fruitless,
You shall appear as good Angels to these wretched Man ;

In a small Boat wee'll pass o'er to 'em ;
And bring 'em comfort : if you like their persons,
And they approve of yours : for wee'll force nothing ;
And since we want ceremonies,
Each one shall choose a husband, and injoy
His company a Month, but that expir'd,
You shall no more come near 'em ; if you prove fruitful,
The Males ye shall return to them, the Females
We will reserve our selves : this is the utmost,
Ye shall e'er obtain : as ye think fit ;
Ye may dismiss this stranger,
And prepare to morrow for the journey. Exit.

Cl. Come, Sir, Will ye walk ?

We will shew ye our pleasant Bowers,
And something ye shall find to cheer your heart.

Alb. Excellent Lady ;

Though 'twill appear a wonder one near starv'd
Should refuse rest and meat, I must not take Your noble offer : I left in yonder desert
A Virgin almost pin'd.

Cl. Shee's not your Wife ?

Alb. No Lady, but my Sister ('tis now dangerous
To speak truth) To her I deeply vow'd
Not to tast food, or rest, if fortune brought it me,
Till I blest'd her with my return : now if you please
To afford me an easie passage to her,
And some meat for her recovery,
I shall live your slave : and thankfully
She shall ever acknowledge her life at your service.

Cl. You plead so well, I can deny ye nothing ;
I my self will see you furnisht ;
And with the next Sun visit and relieve thee.

Alb. Ye are all goodness — Exit.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter severally, Lamure, Franville, Morillat.

Lam. OH! What a tempest have I in my stomach?
How my empty guts cry out? my wounds ake,
Would they would bleed again, that I might get Something to quench my thirst.

Fran. O Lamure, the happiness my dogs had
When I kept house at home! they had a storehouse,
A storehouse of most blessed bones and crusts,
Happy crusts: Oh! how sharp hunger pinches me?

Exit Franville.

Mor. O my importunate belly, I have nothing
To satisfy thee; I have fought,
As far as my weak legs would carry me,
Yet can find nothing: neither meat nor water;
Nor any thing that's nourishing,
My bellies grown together like an empty sachel.

Enter Franville.

Lam. How now, What news?

Mor. Hast any meat yet?

Fran. Not a bit that I can see;
Here be goodly quarries, but they be cruel hard
To gnaw: I ha got some mud, we'll eat it with spoons,
Very good thick mud: but it stinks damnably;
There's old rotten trunks of Trees too,
But not a leafe nor blossom in all the Island.

Lam. How it looks?

Mor. It stinks too.

Lam. It may be poyson.

Fran. Let it be any thing;
So I can get it down: Why Man,
Poyson's a Princely dish.

Mor. Hast

Mor. Hast thou no Bisket?

No crumbs left in thy pocket: here's my dublet,
Give me but three small crumbes.

Fran. Not for three Kingdoms,
If I were master of 'em: Oh Lamure,
But one poor joynt of Mutton: we ha scorn'd (Man)

Lam. Thou speak'st of Paradise
Or but the sinusses of those healths,
We have lewdly at midnight flang away.

Mor. Ah! but to lick the Glasses.

Enter Surgeon.

Fran. Here comes the Surgeon: What
Hast thou discover'd? smile, smile, and comfort us.

Sur. I am expiring;
Smile they that can: I can find nothing Gentlemen,
Here's nothing can be meat, without a miracle.
Oh that I had my boxes, and my lints now,
My flupes, my tents, and those sweet helps of nature,
What dainty dishes could I make of 'em.

Mor. Hast ne'er an old suppository?

Sur. Oh would I had Sir.

Lam. Or, but the paper where such a Cordial
Potion, or Pills hath been entomb'd.

Fran. Or the best bladder where a cooling-glisten.

Mor. Hast thou no searcloths left?
Nor any old pulteses?

Fran. We care not to what it hath been ministred.

Sur. Sure I have none of these dainties Gentlemen.

Fran. Where's the great Wen
Thou cut'st from Hugh the saylers shoulder?
That would serve now for a most Princely banquet.

Sur. I, if we had it Gentlemen.
I flung it over-board, slave that I was.

Lam. A most unprovident villain.

Sur. If I had any thing that were but supple now!
I could make Sallads of your shoes Gentlemen,
And rare ones: any thing unctious.

Mor. I, and then we might fry the soals i'th' Sun.
The soals would make a second dish.

Lam. Or, souce 'em in the salt-water,
An inner soal well souc'd.

En. Aminta.

Fran. Here comes the Woman;
It may be she has meat, and may relieve us,
Let's withdraw, and mark, and then be ready,
She'll hide her store else, and so cozen us.

Amin. How weary, and how hungry am I,
How feeble, and how faint is all my body?
Mine eyes like spent Lamps glowing out, grow heavy,
My sight forsaking me, and all my spirits,
As if they heard my passing bell go for me,
Pull in their powers, and give me up to destiny,
Oh! for a little water: a little, little meat,
A little to relieve me ere I perish:
I had whole floods of tears awhile that nourisht me,
But they are all consum'd for thee dear Albert;
For thee they are spent, for thou art dead;
Merciless fate has swallow'd thee.

Oh — I grow heavy: sleep is a salve for misery;
Heaven look on me, and either take my life,
Or make me once more happy.

Lam. Shee's fast asleep already,
Why should she have this blessing, and we wake still,
Wake to our wants?

Mor. This thing hath been our overthrow,
And all these biting mischiefs that fall on us
Are come through her means.

Fran. True, we were bound ye all know,
For happy places, and most fertile Islands,
Where we had constant promises of all things,
She turn'd the Captains mind,
And must have him go in search, I know not of who,
Nor to what end: of such a fool her brother,

And such a coxcomb her kinsman, and we must put in every where,

She has put us in now yfaith.

Lam. Why should we consume thus, and starve,
Have nothing to relieve us;
And she live there that bred all our miseries.
Unrosted, or unfod?

Mor. I have read in stories.

Lam. Of such restoring meates,
We have examples;
Thousand examples, and allow'd for excellent;
Women that have eate their Children,
Men their slaves, nay their brothers: but these are nothing;
Husbands devoured their Wives:

(thye are their Chattels,)

And of a Schoolmaster, that in a time of famine,
Powdered up all his Scholars.

Mor. Shee's young and tydic,
In my conscience she'll eat delicately;
Just like young Pork a little lean,
Your opinion Surgeon.

Sur. I think she may be made good meat,
But look we shall want Salt.

Fran. Tush, she needs no powdering,

Sur. I grant ye;
But to suck out the humorous parts: by all means,
Lets kill her in a chafe, she'll eat the sweeter.

Lam. Let's kill her any way: and kill her quickly,
That we might be at our meat.

Sur. How if the Captain?

Mor. Ta'k not of him, he's dead, and the rest famish'd.
Wake her Surgeon, and cut her throat,
And then divide her, every Man his share.

Fran. She wakes her self.

Amin. Holy and good things keep me!
What cruel dreams have I had! Who are these?
O they are my friends; for heavens sake Gentlemen Give e some food to save my life: if ye have ought to spare;
A little to relieve me: I may bless ye;
For weak and wretched, ready to perish,
Even now I die.

Mor. You'll save a labor then,
You bred these miseries, and you shall pay for't;
We have no meat, nor where to have we know not,
Nor how to pull our selves from these afflictions,
We are starv'd too, famisht, all our hopes deluded;
Yet ere we die thus, wee'll have one dainty meal.

Amin. Shall I be with ye Gentlemen?

Lam. Yes mary shall ye: in our bellies Lady.
We love you well——

Amin. What said you Sir?

Lam. Mary wee'll eat your Ladiship.

Fran. You that have buried us in this base Island,
Wee'll bury ye in a more noble Monument.

Sur. Will ye say your prayers, that I may perform Lady?
We are wondrous sharp set; come Gentlemen,
Who are for the hinder parts?

Mor. I.

Fran. I.

Lam. And I.

Sur. Be patient;
They will not fall to every Man's share;

Amin. O hear me;
Hear me ye barbarous men:

Mor. Be short and pithy,
Our stomachs cannot stay a long discourse.

Sur. And be not fearful,
For I'll kill ye daintily.

Amin. Are ye not Christians?

Lam. Why, do not Christians eat Women?

Enter Tibalt, Master, Saylor.

Amin. Eat one another? 'tis most impious.

Sur. Come, come.

Amin. Oh, help, help, help.

Tib. The Ladies voice! stand off slaves,
What do you intend villains?
I have strength enough left me, if you abuse this soul,
To——

Ms. They would have ravisht her upon my life,
Speak, how was it Lady?

Amin. Forgive 'em, 'twas their hungers.

Tib. Ha, their hungers!

Ms. They would have eaten her.

Tib. O dam'd villains; speak, is it true?

Sw. I confess an appetite.

Tib. An appetite, I'll fit ye for an appetite.
Are ye so sharp set, that her flesh must serve you?
Murther's a main good service with your Worships;
Since ye would be such Devils,
Why did you not begin with one another handfomly,
And spare the Woman to beget more food on?

Amin. Good Sir.

Tib. You shall grow mummy rascals;
I'll make you fall to your brawns, and your buttocks,
And worry one another like keen bandogs.

Amin. Good Sir be merciful.

Tib. You shall know what 'tis to be damn'd Canibals.

Amin. O my best friend!

Enter Albert.

Al. Alas poor heart! here,
Here's some meat and sovereign drink to ease you,
Sit down gentle Sweet.

Amin. I am blest to see you.

Tib. Stir not within forty foot of this food,
If you do dogs!

All. Oh, Captain, Captain, Captain.

Alb. Ye shall have meat all of you.

Tib. Captain, hear me first: hark,

'Tis so inhumane! I would not ha the air corrupted with it.

Alb. O barbarous men! sit down Dupont,
Good Master, and honest Saylor.

Tib. But stand you off,
And waite upon our charity; I'll wait on you else;
And touch nothing but what's flung ye; as if you were dogs;

If you do, I'll cut your fingers; friends,
I'll spoil your carving.

Amin. There wretches, there.

Tib. Eat your meat handsomely now,
And give Heaven thanks.

Alb. There's more bread.

Tib. See, they snarle like dogs;
Eat quietly you Rascals, eat quietly.

Alb. There is drink too.

Tib. Come, come, I'll fill you each your cups,
Ye shall not surfet.

Amin. And what have you discover'd?

Alb. Sweet, a paradise,
A paradise inhabited with Angels,
Such as you are: their pitties make 'm Angels,
They gave me these viands, and supply'd me
With these pretious drinks.

Amin. Shall not we see 'em?

Alb. Yes, they will see you
Out of their charities, having heard our story,
They will come, and comfort us, come presently;
We shall no more know wants nor miseries.

Amin. Are they all women?

Alb. All, and all in love with us.

Amin. How!

Alb. Do not mistake: in love with our misfortunes,
They will cherish and relieve our men.

Tib. Do you shrug now,
And pull up your noses? you smell comfort,
See they stretch out their Legs like Dottrels,
Each like a new Saint Dennis.

Alb. Dear Mistris,

When you would name me, and the women hear,
Call me your brother, you I'll call my sister,
And pray observe this all——

Why do you change color sweet.

Amin. Eating too much meat.

Alb. Sawc't with jealousy;

Fie, fie, dear saint, yfaith ye are too blame,
Are ye not here? here fixt in my heart?

All. Hark, hark;

Enter Rosella, Clarinda, Crocale, Hipollitta, Julietta.

Alb. They are come, stand ready, and look nobly,
And with all humble reverence receive 'em,
Our lives depend upon their gentle pitties,
And death waits on their anger.

Mor. Sure they are Fairies.

Tib. Be they Devils: Devils of flesh and blood;
After so long a Lent, and tedious voyage,
To me they are Angels.

Fran. O for some Eringoes!

Lam. Potatoes, or Cantharides.

Tib. Peace you Rogues, that buy abilities of your 'po-thecaries,

Had I but took the diet of green Cheese,
And Onions for a month, I could do wouders.

Rof. Are these the Jewels you run mad for?

What can you see in one of these,
To whom you would vouchsafe a gentle touch?
Can nothing perswade you

To love your selves, and place your happiness
In cold and chaste embraces of each other.

Ju. This is from the purpose.

Hip. We had your grant to have them as they were.

Clz. 'Tis a beauteous Creature,
And to my self, I do appear deform'd,
When I consider her, and yet she is
The strangers sister; Why then should I fear?
She cannot prove my rival.

Rof. When you repent,
That you refus'd my counsel, may it add
To your afflictions, that you were forward;
Yet leap'd into the Gulfe of your misfortunes,
But have your wishes.

Maft. Now she makes to us.

Amin. I am instructed, but take heed Albert,
You prove not false;

Alb. Ye are your own assurance,
And so acquainted with your own perfections,
That weak doubts cannot reach you; therefore fear not.

Rof. That you are poor and miserable men,
My eyes inform me: that without our succors,
Hope cannot flatter you to dream of safety;
The present plight you are in, can resolve you
That to be merciful, is to draw near
The Heavenly essence: whether you will be Thankful, I do not question; nor demand
What country bred you, what names, what maners;
To us it is sufficient we relieve
Such as have shapes of men: and I command you,
As we are not ambitious to know
Farther of you, that on pain of death
You presume not to enquire what we are,
Or whence deriv'd.

Alb. In all things we obey you,
And thankfully we ever shall confess
Our selves your creatures.

Rof. You speak as becomes you;
First then, and willingly, deliver up
Those weapons we could force from you.

Alb. We lay 'em down
Most gladly at your feet.

Tib. I have had many a combat with a tall wench;
But never was disarm'd before.

Rof. And

Rof. And now hear comfort,
Your wants shall be supply'd, and though it be
A debt women may challenge to be sued to,
Especially from such they may command ;
We give up to you that power, and therefore Freely each make his choice.

Fran. Then here I fix.

Mor. Nay, she is mine: I eyed her first.

Lam. This mine.

Tib. Stay good rascals ;
You are too forward, sir Gallant,
You are not giving order to a Taylor
For the fashion of a new suit ;
Nor are you in your warehouse, master Merchant,
Stand back, and give your betters leave : your betters ;
And grumble not : if ye do, as I love meat
I will so swinge the salt itch out on you:
Captain, Master, and the rest of us,
That are brothers, and good fellows : we have been Too late by the ears : and yet smart for our follies ;
To end therefore all future emulation : if you please,
To trust to my election, you shall say,
I am not partial to my self ; I doubt not Give content to all.

All. Agreed, agreed.

Tib. Then but observe, how learned and discreetly;
I will proceed, and as a skilful Doctor
In all the quirks belonging to the game ;
Read over your complexions : for you Captain
Being first in place, and therefore first to be serv'd,
I give my judgment thus, for your aspect,
Y'are much inclin'd to melancholy: and that tells me,
The fullen Saturne had predominance
At your nativity, a malignant Planet,
And if not qualified by a sweet conjunction
Of a soft and ruddy wench, born under Venus,
It may prove fatal: therefore to your armes,
I give this rose-cheekt Virgin.

Cl. To my wish ;

Till now I never was happy.

Amin. Nor I accurs'd.

Tib. Master, you are old ;

Yet love the game, that I perceive too,
And if not well spur'd up, you may prove rusty ;
Therefore to help ye here's a Bradamanta,
Or I am cosen'd in my calculation.

Cro. A poor old man allotted to my share.

Ti. Thou wouldst have two ;

Nay, I think twenty : but fear not wench,
Though he be old he's tough : look on's making,
Hee'll not fail I warrant thee.

Rof. A merry fellow,
And were not man a creature I detest ;
I could indure his company.

Ti. Here's a fair heard of Does before me,
And now for a barren one :
For, though I like the sport : I do not love
To Father children: like the Grand Signior,
Thus I walk in my Seraglio,
And view 'em as I pass : then draw I forth
My handkercher, and having made my choice,
I thus bestow it.

Rof. On me.

Ti. On you : now my choice is made ;
To it you hungry Rascals.

Alb. Excellent.

Amin. As I love goodness,
It makes me smile i'th' height of all my fears.

Cl. What a strong contention you may behold
Between my Mothers mirth and anger.

Tib. Nay, no coyness: be Mistris of your word,
I must, and will enjoy you.

Rof. Be advis'd fool : alas I am old ;
How canst thou hope content from one that's fifty.

Ti. Never talk on't ;

I have known good ones at threescore and upwards ;
Besides the weathers hot : and men
That have experience, fear Fevers :
A temperate diet is the onely Physick,
Your Julips, nor Guajacum prunell's,
Camphire pills, nor Goord-water,
Come not near your old Woman ;
Youthful stomachs are still craving,
Though there be nothing left to stop their mouths with ;
And believe me I am no frequent giver of those bounties :
Laugh on : laugh on : good Gentlemen do,
I shall make holiday and sleep, when you
Dig in the mines till your hearts ache.

Rof. A mad fellow ;

Rof. Well, Sir, I'll give you hearing : and as I like
Your wooing, and discourse : but I must tell ye Sir,
That rich Widows look for great sums in present,
Or assurances of ample Joynters.

Ti. That to me is easie,
For instantly I'll do it, hear me comrades.

Alb. What say'st thou Tibalt ?

Tib. Why, that to woo a Wench with empty hands
Is no good Heraldry, therefore let's to the gold,
And share it equally : 'twill speak for us
More than a thousand complements or cringes,
Ditties stolen from Petrarch, or Discourse from Ovid,
Besides, 'twill beget us respect,
And if ever fortune friend us with a Barque,
Largely supply us with all provision.

Alb. Well advis'd, defer it not.

Ti. Are ye all contented.

All. We are ?

Ti. Lets away then,
Strait wee'll return,
And you shall see our riches.

Exit.

Rof. Since I knew what wonder and amazement was,
I ne'er was so transported.

Cl. Why weep ye gentle Maid ?

There is no danger here to such as you ;
Banish fear : for with us I dare promise,
You shall meet all courteous entertainment.

Cro. We esteem our selves most happy in you.

Hip. And blest fortune that brought you hither.

Cl. Hark in your ear ;
I love you as a friend already,
Ere long you shall call me by a nearer name,
I wish your brother well : I know you apprehend me.

Amin. I, to my grief I do ;

Alas good Ladies, there is nothing left me,
But thanks, to pay ye with.

Clar. That's more,
Than yet you stand ingag'd for.

Enter Albert, Tibalt, and the rest with treasure.

Rof. So soon return'd !

Alb. Here : see the Idol of the Lapidary.

Ti. These Pearls, for which the slavish Negro
Dives to the bottom of the Sea.

Lam. To get which the industrious Merchant
Touches at either pole.

Fran. The never-faying purchase
Of Lordships, and of honors.

Mor. The Worlds Mistris,
That can give every thing to the possessors.

Ma. For which the Saylor's scorn tempestuous Winds.
And spit defiance in the Sea.

Ti. Speak Lady : Look we not lovely now ?

Rof. Yes, yes, O my Stars,
Be now for ever blest, that have brought
To my revenge these Robbers ; take your arrowes,
And nayl these Monsters to the earth.

Alb. What mean ye Lady ?

In what have we offended?

Rof. O my daughter!

And you companions with me in all fortunes,
Look on these Caskets, and these Jewels,
These were our own, when first we put to Sea
With good Sebastian: and these the Pyrats
That not alone depriv'd him of this treasure,
But also took his life.

Cro. Part of my present
I will remember was mine own.

Hip. And these were mine.

Ju. Sure, I have worn this Jewel.

Rof. Wherefore do ye stay then,
And not perform my command?

Al. O Heaven!

What cruel fate pursues us.

Ti. I am well enough serv'd,
That must be off'ring Joyntures, Jewels,
And precious stones, more than I brought with me.

Rof. Why shoot ye not?

Cl. Hear me dear Mother;
And when the greatest cruelty, is Justice,
Do not shew mercy: death to these starv'd wretches
Is a reward, not punishment: let 'em live
To undergoe the full weight of your displeasure.
And that they may have sence to feel the torments
They have deserv'd: allow 'em some small pittance,
To linger out their tortures.

Rof. 'Tis well counsell'd.

All. And we'll follow it;

Alb. Hear us speak.

Rof. Peace dogs.

Bind 'em fast: when fury hath given way to reason,
I will determine of their sufferings,
Which shall be horrid. Vengeance, though slow pac'd,
At length o'rakes the guilty; and the wrath
Of the incens'd powers, will fall most sure
On wicked men, when they are most secure. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Raymond, Sebastian, Nicusa, Saylor.

1. Sayl. Here's nothing, Sir, but poverty and hunger;
No promise of inhabitation; neither track of Beast,

Nor foot of Man: we have searcht
All this Rocky desert, yet cannot discover any assurance
Here is, or hath been such men.

2. Sayl. Not a relique of any thing they wore;
Nor mark left by 'em, either to find relief,
Or to warn others from the like misfortune.
Believe it, these fellows are both false,
And, to get a little succor in their misery,
Have fram'd this cunning Tale.

Ray. The Ship, I know, is French, and own'd by Pirats,
If not by Albert my arch enemy.
You told me too there was a woman with 'em.
A young and handsome Woman.

Sebast. There was so Sir.

Raym. And such, and such young gallants.

Nic. We told you true, Sir,
That they had no means to quit this Island.

Raym. And that amidst their mutiny to save your lives,
You got their Ship.

Sebast. All is most certain, Sir.

Raym. Where are they then? Where are these Men

Or Woman? we are landed where your faiths
Did assure us, we could not miss their sights.
For this news we took ye to our mercy,
Reliev'd ye, when the furious Sea, and Famine
Strove, which should first devour ye;
Cloath'd, and cherisht ye; us'd ye as those ye say ye are.
Fair Gentlemen, now keep your words,
And shew us this company, your own free pitties spoke of;
These men ye left in misery; the Woman.
Men of those noble breedings you pretend to Should scorn to lie, or get their food with falsehood;
Come, direct us.

Sebast. Alas, Sir, they are gone,
But by what means, or providence, we know not.

2. Sayl. Was not the Captain
A fellow of a fiery, yet brave nature,
A middle stature, and of brown complexion?

Nic. He was, Sir.

Raym. 'Twas Albert,
And my poor wretched sister.

1. Sayl. 'Twas he certain,
I ha been at Sea with him; many times at Sea.

Raym. Come, shew us these Men;
Shew us presently, and do not dally with us.

Seb. We left 'em here; What should we say, Sir?
Here, in this place.

2. Sayl. The earth cannot swallow 'em;
They have no wings, they cannot fly sure.

Raym. You told us too
Of heaps of treasure, and of sums conceal'd,
That set their heart a fire; we see no such thing,
No such sign; What can ye say to purge ye?
What have ye done with these men?

Nic. We, Sir?

Raym. You Sir;
For certain I believe ye saw such people.

Sebast. By all that's good,
By all that's pure and honest,
By all that's holy.

Raym. I dare not credit ye,
Ye have so abus'd my hope, that now I hate ye.

1. Sayl. Let's put 'em in their ragged clothes again Captain,

For certain they are knaves, lets e'en deliver 'em
To their old fruitful Farm; here let 'em walk the Island.

Sebast. If ye do so, we shall curse your mercies.

Nic. Rather put us to Sea again.

Raym. Not so.

Yet this I'll do, because ye say ye are Christians,
Though I hardly credit it: bring in the boat,
And all aboard again, but these two wretches;
Yet leave 'em four dayes meat. If in that time,
(For I will search all nookes of this strange Island)
I can discover any tract of these men,
Alive or dead, I'll bear ye off, and honor ye;
If not, ye have found your Graves; so farewell. Exit.

Nic. That goodness dwells above, and knows us innocent,
Comfort our lives, and at his pleasure quit us.

Sebast. Come Cousin, come; old time will end our story:
But no time (if we end well) ends our glory. Exit.

Enter Rosella, Clarinda, Crocale, Hippolita, Juletta.

Rof. Use 'em with all the austerity that may be,
They are our slaves; turn all those pitties,
Those tender reluctations that should become your sex,
To stern anger; and when ye look upon 'em,
Look with those eyes that wept those bitter sorrows,
Those cruelties ye suffer'd by their Rapines.
Some five dayes hence that blessed hour comes
Most happy to me, that knit this hand to my dear husbands,
And both our hearts in mutual bands.
That hour Ladies.

Cl. What of that hour?

Rof. Why, on that hour daughter,

And

And in the height of all our celebrations,
Our dear remembrances of that dear Man,
And those that suffer'd with him, our fair kinsmen,
Their lives shall fall a sacrifice to vengeance,
Their lives that ruin'd his; 'tis a full justice:
I will look glorious in their bloods;
And the most Noble spirit of Sebastian,
That perisht by the pride of these French Pirates,
Shall smile in Heaven, and bless the hand that kill'd 'em.
Look strictly all unto your prisoners;
For he that makes a scape beyond my vengeance,
Or entertains a hope by your fair usage;
Take heed, I say, she that deceives my trust,
Again take heed: her life, and that's but light neither;
Her life in all the tortures my spirit can put on.

All. We shall be careful.

Rof. Do so.

Ex. Rossella.

Cla. You are angry Mother, and ye are old too,
Forgetting what men are: but we shall temper ye.
How fare your prisoners, Ladies? in what formes
Do they appear in their afflictions?

Ful. Mine fare but poorly;

For so I am commanded: 'tis none of their fault.

Cla. Of what sort are they?

Ful. They say they are Gentlemen.

But they shew Mungrels.

Cla. How do they suffer?

Ful. Faith like boyes;

They are fearful in all fortunes; when I smile
They kneel, and beg to have that face continued;
And like poor slaves, adore the ground I go on.
When I frown, they hang their most dejected heads,
Like fearful sheephounds; shew 'em a crust of bread
They'll Saint me presently, and skip like Apes
For a sup of Wine. I'll whip 'em like hackneys,
Saddle 'em, ride 'em, do what I will with 'em.

Cla. Tush, these are poor things.

Have they names like Christians?

Ful. Very fair names: Franville, Lamure, and Morillat;
And brag of great kindreds too. They offer very handsomely,

But that I am a fool, and dare not venture.

They are sound too o'my conscience,
Or very near upon't.

Cla. Fy, away fool.

Ful. They tell me,

If they might be brought before you,
They would reveale things of strange consequence.

Cla. Their base poor fears.

Ful. I, that makes me hate 'em too;

For if they were but manly to their sufferance,
Sure I should strain a point or two.

Cla. An hour hence I'll take a view of e'm,
And hear their business. Are your Men thus too?

Cro. Mine? No, gentle Madam, mine were not cast
In such base molds; afflictions, tortures,
Are names and natures of delight, to my men;
All sorts of cruelties they meet like pleasures.

I have but two; the one they call Du-pont,
Tibalt Du-pont; the other the Ship-master.

Cla. Have they not lives, and fears?

Cro. Lives they have Madam;
But those lives never linkt to such companions
As fears or doubts.

Cla. Use 'em Nobly;

And where you find fit subjects for your pitties
Let it become ye to be courteous;
My Mother will not alwayes be thus rigorous.

Hip. Mine are Saylor's Madam,

But they sleep soundly, and seldom trouble me, unless it be when

They dream sometimes of fights and tempests;
Then they rore and whistle for Cans of Wine,
And down they fling me; and in that rage,

(For they are violent fellows) they play such reaks.
If they have meat, they thank me;
If none, they heartily desire to be hang'd quickly.
And this is all they care.

Cla. Look to 'em diligently, and where your pitties tells ye

They may deserve, give comfort.

All. We will.

Exit.

Cla. Come hither, be not frighted;

Enter Aminta,

Think not ye steal this liberty, for we give it,
Your tender innocence assures me, Virgin,
Ye had no share in those wrongs these men did us;
I find ye are not hardned in such mischiefs.
Your brother was mis-led sure,
Fouly mis-led.

Amin. How much I fear these pitie!

Cla. Certain he was, so much I pity him;
And for your sake, whose eyes plead for him;
Nay, for his own sake.

Amin. Ha!

Cla. For I see about him

Women have subtil eyes, and look narrowly;
Or I am much abus'd: many fair promises;
Nay beyond those, two many shadowed virtues.

Amin. I think he is good.

Cla. I assure my self he will be;
And out of that assurance take this comfort,
For I perceive your fear hath much dejected ye.
I love your brother.

Amin. Madam.

Cla. Nay, do not take it for a dreamt of favor,
That comforts in the sleep, and awake vanishes;
Indeed I love him.

Amin. Do ye indeed?

Cla. You doubt still, because ye fear his safety;
Indeed he is the sweetest man I ere saw;
I think the best. Ye may hear without blushes,
And give me thanks, if ye please, for my curtesie.

Amin. Madam, I ever must;

Yet witness Heaven, they are hard pull'd from me.
Believe me, Madam, so many imperfections I could find,
(Forgive me Grace for lying) and such wants,
('Tis to an honest use) such poverties,
Both in his main proportion, and his mind too;
There are a hundred handsomer; (I lie leudly)
Your noble usage, Madam, hath so bound me to ye,
That I must tell ye.

Cla. Come, tell your worst.

Amin. He is no husband for ye.
I think ye mean in that fair way.

Cla. Ye have hit it.

Amin. I am sure ye have hit my heart:
You will find him dangerous, Madam;
As fickle as the flying ayr, proud, jealous,
Soon gluttet in your sweets, and soon forgetful;
I could say more, and tell ye I have a brother,
Another brother, that so far excells this,
Both in the ornaments of Man, and making.

Cla. If you were not his sister, I should doubt ye mainly;
Doubt ye for his love, ye deal so cunningly.
Do not abuse me, I have trusted ye with more than life;
With my first love; be careful of me.

Amin. In what use, Madam?

Cla. In this Lady,

Speak to him for me, you have power upon him;
Tell him I love him, tell him I dote on him:
It will become your tongue.

Amin. Become my grave.

O fortune, O cursed fortune!

Cla. Tell him his liberty,
And all those with him; all our wealth and Jewels;

Good sister, for I'll call ye so.

Amin. I shall Lady,
Even die, I hope.

Clz. Here's Meat and Wine, pray take it,
And there he lies; give him what liberty you please;
But still conceal'd. What pleasure you shall please, Sister.
He shall ne'er want again. Nay, see an you'l take it;
Why do you study thus?

Amin. To avoid mischiefs, if they should happen.

Clz. Goe, and be happy for me.

Amin. O blind fortune;
Yet happy thus far, I shall live to see him,
In what strange desolation lives he here now?
Sure this Curtain will reveale.

Enter Albert.

Alb. Who's that? ha!
Some gentle hand, I hope, to bring me comfort.
Or if it be my death, 'tis sweetly shadowed.

Amin. Have ye forgot me, Sir?

Alb. My Aminta?

Amin. She Sir,
That walks here up and down an empty shadow,
One, that for some few hours
But wanders here, carrying her own sad Coffin,
Seeking some Desert place to lodge her griefs in.

Alb. Sweet sorrow welcome, welcome noble grief;
How got you this fair liberty to see me?
For sorrows in your shape are strangers to me.

Amin. I come to counsel ye.

Alb. Ye are still more welcome;
For good friends in afflictions give good Counsels.
Pray then proceed.

Amin. Pray eat first, ye shew faint;
Here's Wine to refresh ye too.

Alb. I thank ye dear.

Amin. Drink again.

Alb. Here's to our loves.

How, turn and weep!
Pray pledge it: this happiness we have yet left,
Our hearts are free. Not pledge it? Why?
And though beneath the Axe this health were holy,
Why do ye weep thus?

Amin. I come to woo ye.

Alb. To woo me Sweet? I am woo'd and won already,
You know I am yours. This pretty way becomes ye.
But you would deceive my sorrows; that's your intent.

Amin. I would I could, I should not weep, but smile.
Do ye like your Meat and Wine?

Alb. Like it?

Amin. Do you like your liberty?

Alb. All these I well may like.

Amin. Then pray like her that sent 'em.
Do ye like wealth, and most unequal'd beauty?

Alb. Peace, indeed you'l make me angry.

Amin. Would I were dead that ask it,
Then ye might freely like, and I forgive ye.

Alb. What like, and who? add not more misery
To a man that's fruitful in afflictions.

Who is't you would have me like?

Who sent these comforts?

Amin. I must tell.

Alb. Be bold.

Amin. But be you temperate.
If you be bold I die. The young fair Virgin;
(Sorrow hath made me old.) O hearken,
And wisely hark, the Governess daughter:
That Star that strikes this Island full of wonder,
That blooming sweetness.

Alb. What of her?

Amin. She sent it: and with it,
It must be out, she dotes on ye,
And must enjoy ye: else no joy must find ye.

Alb. And have you the patience to deliver this?

Amin. A sister may say much, and modestly.

Alb. A sister?

Amin. Yes, that name undid ye;

Undid us both: had ye nam'd Wife, she had fear'd ye;
And fear'd the sin she follow'd; She had shun'd, yea
Her Virgin modesty had not touch'd at ye.
But thinking you were free, hath kindled a fire,
I fear will hardly be extinguish'd.

Alb. Indeed I played the fool.

Amin. O my best Sir, take heed,

Take heed of lies. Truth, though it trouble some minds,
Some wicked minds, that are both dark and dangerous:
Yet it preserves it self, comes off pure, innocent,
And like the Sun, though never so eclips'd,
Must break in glory. O Sir, lie no more.

Alb. Ye have read me a fair Lecture,
And put a spell upon my tongue for saying.
But how will you counsel now?

Amin. Ye must study to forget me.

Alb. How?

Amin. Be patient.

Be wise and patient, it concens ye highly.
Can ye lay by our loves? But why should I doubt it?
Ye are a man, and man may shift affections,
'Tis held no sin. To come to the point,
Ye must lose me; many and mighty reasons.

Alb. Hear me Aminta,

Have you a man that loves you too, that feeds ye,
That sends ye liberty? Has this great Governess
A noble son too, young, and apt to catch ye?
Am I, because I am in bonds, and miserable,
My health decay'd, my youth and strength half blasted,
My fortune like my waining self, for this despis'd?
Am I for this forsaken? a new love chosen,
And my affections, like my fortunes, wanderers?
Take heed of lying, you that chid me for it;
And shew'd how deep a sin it was, and dangerous.
Take heed, your self, you swore you lov'd me dearly;
No few, nor little oathes you swore Aminta,
Those seal'd with no small faith, I then assur'd my self.
O seek no new ways to cozen truth,

Amin. I do not.

By love it self I love thee,
And ever must, nor can all deaths dissolve it.

Alb. Why do you urge me thus then?

Amin. For your safety,

To preserve your life.

Alb. My life, I do confess, is hers,

She gives it,

And let her take it back, I yield it.

My loves intirely thine, none shall touch at it;

None, my Aminta, none.

Amin. Ye have made me happy,

And now I know ye are mine. Fortune, I scorn thee.
Goe to your rest, and I'll sit by ye;
Whilst I have time I'll be your mate, and comfort ye,
For only I am trusted: you shall want nothing,
Not a liberty that I can steal ye.

Alb. May we not celebrate our loves Aminta?
And where our wishes cannot meet.

Amin. You are wanton,

But with cold kisses I'll allay that fever;

Look for no more, and that in private too.

Believe me, I shall blush else.

But, let's consider, we are both lost else.

Alb. Let's in, and prevent fate.

Exeunt.

Enter Crocale, Julietta, Tibalt, Master.

Tib. You do well to ay'r us, Ladies, we shall be musty else.
What are your wise wills now?

Cro. You are very crank still.

Tib. As

Tib. As crank as a holy Fryer, fed with hail-stones.
But do ye bring us out to bait, like Bills?

Mast. Or are you weary of the charge ye are at?
Turn us abroad again, let's jog Ladies;
We are gros, and course, unfit for your sweet pleasures.

Tib. Knock off our shoes, and turn's to grass.

Cro. You are determin'd

Still to be stubborn then: it well becomes ye.

Tib. An humour Lady that contents a prisoner.
A fullen sit sometimes serves for a second course.

Jul. Ye may as well be kind,
And gain our favours; gain meat and drink,
And lodging to rest your bones.

Tib. My bones have bore me thus long,
And had their share of pains and recreations;
If they fail now, they are no fair companions.

Cro. Are ye thus harsh to all our Sex?

Mast. We cannot be merry without a Fidler,
Pray strike up your Tabors, Ladies.

Cro. The fools despise us.

Jul. We know ye are very hungry now.

Tib. Yes 'tis very wholesom, Ladies;
For we that have gros bodies, must be careful
Have ye no piercing air to stir our stomachs?
We are beholding to ye for our Ordinary.

Jul. Why slaves, 'tis in our power to hang ye.

Mast. Very likely.

'Tis in our powers then to be hang'd, and scorn ye.
Hanging's as sweet to us, as dreaming to you.

Cro. Come, be more courteous. (saries.)

Jul. Do, and then ye shall be pleas'd, and have all neces-

Tib. Give me some Ratsbane then.

Cro. And why Ratsbane, Mounseieur?

Tib. We live like vermine here, and eat up your cheese,
Your mouldy cheese, that none but Rats would bite at;
Therefore 'tis just that Ratsbane should reward us.
We are unprofitable, and our Ploughs are broken;
There is no hope of Harvest this year, Ladies.

Jul. Ye shall have all content

Mast. I, and we'll serve your uses.

I had rather serve hogs, there's more delight in't;
Your greedy appetites are never satisfied;
Just like hungry Camels, sleeping or waking
You chew the cud still.

Cro. By this hand we'll starve ye.

Mast. 'Tis a noble courtesie:

I had as lief ye should famish me, as founder me:
To be jaded to death, is only fit for a hackney.
Here be certain Tarts of Tarr about me,
And parcels of potargo in my Jerkin,
As long as these last.

Jul. Which will not last ever.

Tib. Then we'll eat one another like good fellows:
A shoulder of his for a haunch of mine.

Jul. 'Tis excellent.

Tib. 'Twill be as we'll dress it Ladies.

Cro. Why sure ye are not men?

Mast. Ye had best come search us,

A Seaman is seldom without a salt Eele.

Tib. I am bad enough,

And in my nature a notorious wench;
And yet ye make me blush at your immodesty.
Tell me good Master, didst ever see such things?

Mast. I could like 'em, though they were lewdly given,
If they could say no;

Tib. Well, ye may hang, or starve us;
But your commanding impudence shall never fear us.
Had ye by blushing signs, soft cunings, crept into us,
And shew'd us your necessities: we had met your purposes,
Supply'd your wants. We are no Saints Ladies;
I love a good wench, as I love my life,
And with my life I will maintain my love:
But such a fordid impudence I'll spit at.
Let's to our dens again. Come noble Master.

You know our minds, Ladies:

This is the faith in which we'll die. Exit Tib. and Mast.

Cro. I do admire 'em

Jul. They are noble fellows,
And they shall not want, for this.

Cro. But see, Clarinda comes.

Farewel, I'll to my charge.

Enter Clarinda.

Cl. Bring out those prisoners now,
And let me see 'em, and hear their business.

Jul. I will. Madam. Exit.

Cl. I hope she hath prevail'd upon her brother.
She has a sweet tongue, and can describe the happiness
My love is ready to fling on him.

And sure he must be glad, for certain, wonder,
And bless the hour that brought him to this Island,
I long to hear the full joy that he labours with.

Enter Juletta, Morillat, Franvilé, Lamure.

Mor. Bless thy Divine Beauty.

Fran. Mirror of sweetness.

La-m. Ever-springing brightness.

Cl. Nay, Stand up Gentlemen, and leave your flatteries.

Mor. She calls us Gentlemen, sure we shall have some meat

Cl. I am a mortal creature, (now.)

Worship Heaven, and give these attributes
To their Divinities. Methinks ye look but thin.

Mor. Oh we are starv'd, immortal beauty.

La-m. We are all poor starv'd knaves.

Fran. Neither liberty nor meat, Lady (men.)

Mor. We were handsome men, and Gentlemen, and sweet
And were once gracious in the eyes of beauties,
But now we look like Rogues;
Like poor starv'd rogues.

Cl. What would ye do if ye were to die now?

Fran. Alas, we were prepar'd. If you will hang us,
Let's have a good meal or two to die with,
To put's in heart.

Mor. Or if you'll drown us,
Let's be drunk first, that we may die merrily,
And bless the founders.

Cl. Ye shall not die so hastily.

What dare ye do to deserve my favour?

La-m. Put us to any service,

Fran. Any bondage,

Let's but live.

Mar. We'll get a world of children,
For we know ye are hainously unprovided that way;
And ye shall beat us when we offend ye;
Beat us abundantly, and take our meat from us.

Cl. These are weak abject things, that shew ye poor ones.
What's the great service ye so oft have threaten'd,
If ye might see me, and win my favour?

Jul. That business of discovery:

Mor. Oh, Ill tell ye Lady.

La-m. And so will I.

Fran. And I,

Pray let me speak first.

Mor. Good, no confusion.

We are before a Lady that knows manners;
And by the next meat I shall eat, 'tis certain,
This little Gentlewoman that was taken with us.

Cl. Your Captains Sister, she you mean.

Mar. I, I, she's the business that we would open to ye.
You are couzen'd in her.

Lam. How, what is't you would open?

Fran. She is no Sister.

Mor. Good Sirs how quick you are.

She is no Sister, Madam.

Fran. She is his.

Mor. Peace I say.

Cl. What is she?
Mor. Faith, sweet Lady,
 She is, as a man would say, his.
Cl. What?
Lam. His Mistress.
Mor. Or, as some new Translators read, his.
Cl. Oh me!
Mor. And why he should delude you thus,
 Unless he meant some villany? these ten weeks
 He has had her at Sea, for his own proper appetite.
Lam. His Cabin-mate I'll assure ye.
Cl. No Sister, say ye?
Mor. No more than I am brother to your beauty.
 I know not why he should juggle thus.
Cl. Do not lie to me.
Mor. If ye find me lie, Lady, hang me empty.
Cl. How am I fool'd!
 Away with 'em Juletta, and feed 'em
 But bark ye, with such food as they have given me.
 New misery!

Fran. Nor meat nor thanks for all this.

Exit.

Cl. Make 'em more wretched.
 Oh I could burst! curse and kill now,
 Kill any thing I meet, Juletta, follow me,
 And call the rest along.

Jul. We follow, Madam.

Exeunt

Enter Albert and Aminta.

Amint. I must be gone now, else she may suspect me;
 How shall I answer her?

Alb. Tell her directly.

Amint. That were too suddain, too improvident;
 Fires of this nature must be put out cunningly,
 They'll waste all come near 'em else.
 Farewel once more.

Alb. Farewel,

And keep my love entire.

Nay, kiss me once again, me thinks we should not part.

Amint. Oh be wise, Sir.

Alb. Nay, one kiss more.

Amin. Indeed you're wanton;
 We may be taken too.

Enter Clarinda, Juletta, Crocale, Hippolita.

Cl. Out thou base woman.
 I'll shoot 'em both.

Cro. Nay stay, brave Lady, hold;
 A suddain death cuts off a Nobler vengeance.

Cl. Am I made Bawd to your lascivious meetings?
 Are ye grown so wise in sin?

Shut up that villany: and sirrah,
 Now expect my utmost anger.
 Let him there starve.

Alb. I mock at your mischiefs.

Cl. Tie that false witch unto that Tree,
 There let that savage beasts
 Gnaw off her sweetness, and Snakes
 Embrace her beauties; tie her, and watch
 That none relieve her.

Hip. We could wish ye better fortune, Lady,
 But dare not help ye.

Amin. Be your own friends, I thank ye.
 Now only my last audit, and my greatest,
 Oh Heaven, be kind unto me,
 And if it be thy Will, preserve.

Enter Raymond.

Ray. Who is this?
 Sure 'tis a woman, I have trode this place,
 And found much footing; now I know 'tis peopl'd.
 Ha, let me see! 'tis her face.
 Oh Heaven! turn this way Maid.

Amin. Oh Raymond, oh Brother.

Raym. Her tongue too: 'tis my Sister; what rude hand!

Nay kiss me first, Oh joy!

Amin. Fly, fly dear brother,
 You are lost else.

Jul. A man, a man, a new man.

Raym. What are these?

Enter Juletta, Crocale, Clarinda.

Cro. An enemy, an enemy.

Cl. Dispatch him,
 Take him off, shoot him straight.

Raym. I dare not use my sword, Ladies,
 Against such comely foes.

Amin. Oh brother, brother!

Cl. Away with 'em, and in dark prisons bind 'em.
 One word reply'd, ye die both.

Now brave mother, follow thy noble anger,
 And I'll help thee.

Exeunt

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Rossella, Clarinda, Crocale, Juletta, Hippolita.

Ros. I Am deaf to all your intreaties: she that moves me
 For pity or compassion to these Pirats,
 Digs up her Fathers, or her Brothers Tomb,
 And spurns about their ashes.
 Couldst thou remember what a Father thou hadst once,
 'Twould steel thy heart against all foolish pity.
 By his memory and the remembrance of his dear embraces,
 I am taught, that in a Noble cause revenge is Noble;
 And they shall fall the sacrifices to appease
 His wandring Ghost, and my incensed fury.

Cl. The new come prisoner too!

Ros. He too yet that we may learn
 Whether they are the same, or near ally'd
 To those that forc'd me to this cruel course,
 Better their poor allowance, and permit 'em
 To meet together and confer,
 Within the distance of your ear; perhaps
 They may discover something that may kill
 Despair in me, and be a means to save 'em
 From certain ruine.

Geo. That shall be my charge.

Ros. Yet to prevent
 All hope of rescue: for this new-come Captain
 Hath both a Ship and Men not far from us,
 Though ignorant to find the only Port,
 That can yield entrance to our happy Island,
 Guard the place strongly, and e'r the next Sun
 Ends his diurnal progress, I will be Happy in my revenge, or set 'em free.

Exeunt.

Enter Crocale, Juletta, Hippolita. A Table furnish'd.

Cro. So serve it plentifully,
 And lose not time to enquire the cause;
 There is a main design that hangs upon this bounty.
 See the Table furnisht with Wine too,
 That discovers secrets which tortures cannot open:
 Open the doors too of the several prisons,
 And give all free entrance into this room.
 Undiscover'd I can here mark all.

Enter Tib. Mast.

Here's Captain careless, and the tough Ship-master,
 The slaves are nos'd like Vultures

How

How wild they look.

Tib. Ha, the mystery of this,
Some good Hobgoblin rise and reveal:

Mast. I'm amazed at it: nor can I found the intent.

Tib. Is not this bread,
Substantial bread, not painted?

Mast. But take heed,
You may be poisoned.

Tib. I am sure I am famish'd;
And famine, as the wise man says,
Gripes the guts as much as any Mineral.
This may be Treacle sent to preserve me
After a long Fast: or be it Vipers spittle,
I'll run the hazard.

Mast. We are past all fear, I'll take part with ye.

Tib. Do: and now i'faith, howd'ye feel your self?
I find great ease in't. What's here;

Wine, and it bethy Will;
Strong lusty Wine. Well, fools may talk
Of Mythridate, Cordials, and Elixirs.
But from my youth this was my only Physick.
Here's a colour, what Ladies cheek,
Though cerus'd over, comes near it?
It sparkles too: hangs out Diamonds.

Oh my sweet-heart, how I will hug thee,
Again, and again! They are poor drunkards,
And not worth thy favors,

That number thy moist kisses in these Crystals.

Mast. But Mounseur,
Here are Suckets, and sweet dishes.

Tib. Tush, boys meat,
I am past it; here's strong food fit for men:
Nectar, old lad. Mistribs of merry hearts,
Once more I am bold with you.

Mast. Take heed (man)
Too much will breed distemper.

Tib. Hast thou liv'd at Sea
The most part of thy life, where to be sober
While we have Wine aboard, is capital Treason;
And dost thou preach sobriety?

Mast. Prethee forbear,
We may offend in it; we know not for whom
It was provided.

Tib. I am sure for me: therefore footra,
When I am full, let 'em hang me, I care not.

Enter Albert, Aminta, Raymond, Lamure, Morrillat, Franvile, severally.

Mast. This has been his temper ever.
See, provoking dishes; candid Eringoes,
And Potatoes.

Tib. I'll not touch 'em, I will drink;
But not a bit on a march, I'll be an Eunuch rather.

Mast. Who are these?

Tib. Marry, who you will;
I keep my Text here.

Alb. Raymond!

Ray. Albert!

Tib. Away, I'll be drunk alone;
Keep off Rogues, or I'll belch ye into air;
Not a drop here.

Amint. Dear brother, put not in your eyes such anger;
Those looks poison'd with fury, shot at him,
Reflect on me. Oh brother, look milder, or
The Crystal of his temperance
Will turn 'em on your self.

Alb. Sir, I have sought ye long
To find your pardon: you have plough'd the Ocean
To wreak your vengeance on me, for the rape
Of this fair Virgin. Now our fortune guides us
To meet on such hard terms, that we need rather
A mutual pitty of our present state,
Than to expostulate of breaches past,

Which cannot be made up. And though it be Far from you power, to force me to confess,
That I have done ye wrong, or such submission
Failing to make my peace, to vent your anger;
You being your self slav'd, as I to others:
Yet for you Sisters sake, her blessed sake,
In part of recompence of what she has suffer'd
For my rash folly; the contagion
Of my black actions, catching hold upon
Her purer innocence, I crave your mercy;
And wish however several motives kept us
From being friends, while we had hope to live,
Let death which we expect, and cannot fly from,
End all contention.

Tib. Drink upon't, 'tis a good motion;
Ratify it in Wine, and 'tis authentical.

Ray. When I consider
The ground of our long difference, and look on
Our not to be avoided miseries,
It doth beget in me I know not how
A soft Religious tenderness; which tells me,
Though we have many faults to answer for
Upon our own account, our Fathers crimes
Are in us punish'd. Oh Albert, the course
They took to leave us rich, was not honest,
Nor can that friendship last, which virtue joyns not.
When first they forc'd the industrious Portugals,
From their Plantations in the Happy Islands.

Cro. This is that I watch for.

Ray. And did omit no tyranny, which men,
Inured to spoil, and mischief could inflict,
On the griex'd sufferers; when by lawless rapine
They reap'd the harvest, which their Labourers sow'd;
And not content to force 'em from their dwelling,
But laid for 'em at sea, to ravish from 'em
The last remainder of their wealth: then, then,
After a long pursuit, each doubting other,
As guilty of the Portugals escape,
They did begin to quarrel, like in men;
(Forgive me piety, that I call 'em so)
No longer love, or correspondence holds,
Than it is cemented with prey or profit:
Then did they turn these swords they oft had bloodi'd
With innocent gore, upon their wretched selves,
And paid the forfeit of their cruelty
Shewn to Sebastian, and his Colonie,
By being fatal enemies to each other.
Thence grew Amintas rape, and my desire
To be reveng'd. And now observe the issue:
As they for spoil ever forgot compassion
To women, (who should be exempted
From the extremities of a lawful War)
We now, young able men, are fall'n into
The hands of Women; that, against the soft
Tenderness familiar to their Sex,
Will shew no mercy.

Enter Crocale.

Cro. None, unless you shew us
Our long lost Husbands.
We are those Portugals you talk'd of.

Ray. Stay,
I met upon the Sea in a tall Ship
Two Portugals, famish'd almost to death.

Tib. Our Ship by this Wine.
And those the rogues that stole her,
Left us to famish in the barren Islands.

Ray. Some such tale they told me,
And something of a Woman, which I find;
To be my Sister.

Cro. Where are these men?

Ray. I left 'em,

Suppose they had deluded me with forg'd tales,
In the Island, where they said
They had liv'd many years the wretched owners
Of a huge mass of treasure.

Alb. The same men; and that the fatal muck
We quarrell'd for.

Cro. They were Portugals you say.

Ray. So they profess'd.

Cro. They may prove such men as may save your lives,
And so much I am taken with fair hope,
That I will hazard life to be resolv'd on't:
How came you hither?

Ray. My ship lies by the Rivers mouth,
That can convey ye to these wretched men,
Which you desire to see.

Cro. Back to your prisons,
And pray for the success: if they be those
Which I desire to find, you are safe;
If not, prepare to die to morrow:
For the world cannot redeem ye.

Alb. However, we are arm'd
For either fortune.

Tib. What must become of me now
That I am not dismiss'd?

Cro. Oh Sir, I purpose
To have your company.

Ti. Take heed wicked woman,
I am apt to mischief now.

Cro. You cannot be so unkind,
To her that gives you liberty.

Ti. No, I shall be too kind, that's the devil on't;
I have had store of good wine: and when I am drunk,

Joan is a Lady to me, and I shall Lay about me like a Lord: I feel strange motions:
Avoid me temptation.

Cro. Come Sir, I'll help ye in.

Exit.

Exeunt.

Enter Sebastian and Nicusa.

Nicu. What may that be
That moves upon the Lake?

Sebast. Still it draws nearer,
And now I plainly can discern it.
'Tis the French Ship.

Nicu. In it a woman,
Who seems to invite us to her,

Sebast. Still she calls with signs of Love to hasten to her;
So lovely hope doth still appear:
I feel nor age, nor weakness.

Nicu. Though it bring death,
To us 'tis comfort: and deserves a meeting.
Or else fortune tyr'd with what we have suffer'd,
And in it overcome, as it may be,
Now sets a period to our misery.

Exeunt.

Horrid Musick.

Enter severally, Raymond, Albert, Aminta.

Ray. What dreadful sounds are these?

Amint. Infernal Musick,
Fit for a bloody Feast.

Alb. It seems prepar'd
To kill our courages e'r they divorce
Our souls and bodies.

Ray. But they that fearless fall,
Deprive them of their triumph.

An Altar prepar'd.

Enter Rossilia, Clarinda, Juletta, Hippolita, &c.

Amin. See the suries,
In their full trym of cruelty,

Rof. 'Tis the last

Duty that I can pay to my dead Lord,

Set out the Altar, I my self will be

The Priest, and boldly do those horrid Rites

You shake to think on, lead these Captains nearer,

For they shall have the honor to fall first

To my Sebastian's ashes: and now wretches,

As I am taught already, that you are;

And lately by your free confession,

French Pirats, and the sons of those I hate,

Even equal with the devil; hear with horror,

What 'tis invites me to this cruel course,

And what you are to suffer, no Amazons we,

But women of Portugal that must have from you

Sebastian and Nicusa; we are they

That groan'd beneath your fathers wrongs:

We are those wretched women,

Their injuries pursu'd, and overtook;

And from the sad remembrance of our losses

We are taught to be cruel; when we were forc'd

From that sweet air we breathed in, by their rapine,

And fought a place of being; as the Seas

And Winds conspir'd with their ill purposes,

To load us with afflictions in a storm

That fell upon us; the two ships that brought us,

To seek new fortunes in an unknown world

Were sever'd: the one bore all the able men,

Our Treasure and our Jewels: in the other,

We Women were imbarqu'd: and fell upon,

After long tossing in the troubled main,

This pleasant Island: but in few months,

The men that did conduct us hither, died,

We long before had given our Husbands lost:

Remembering what we had suff'r'd by the French

We took a solemn Oath, never to admit

The curs'd society of men: necessity

Taught us those Arts, not usual to our Sex,

And the fertile Earth yielding abundance to us,

We did resolve, thus shap'd like Amazons

To end our lives; but when you arriv'd here,

And brought as presents to us, our own Jewels;

Those which were boorn in the other Ship,

How can ye hope to scape our vengeance?

Amint. It boots not then to swear our innocence?

Alb. Or that we never forc'd it from the owners?

Ray. Or that there are a remnant of that wrack,
And not far off?

Rof. All you affirm, I know,

Is but to win time; therefore prepare your throats,

The world shall not redeem ye: and that your cries

May find no entrance to our ears,

To move pity in any: bid loud Musick sound

Their fatal knells; if ye have prayers use 'em quickly,

To any power will own ye; but ha!

Enter Crocale, Sebastian, Nicusa, Tibalt.

Who are these? what spectacles of misfortune?

Why are their looks

So full of Joy and Wonder?

Cro. Oh! lay by

These instruments of death, and welcome

To your arms, what you durst never hope to imbrace:

This is Sebastian, this Nicusa, Madam:

Preserv'd by miracle: look up dear Sir,

And know your own Rossella: be not lost

In wonder and amazement; or if nature

Can by instinct, instruct you what it is,

To be bless'd with the name of Father,

Freely enjoy it in this fair Virgin.

Seb. Though my miseries,

And many years of wants I have endur'd,

May well deprive me of the memory

Of all joys past; yet looking on this building,

This ruin'd building of a heavenly form
In my Rosilla; I mult remember, I am Sebastian.

Ros. Oh my joyes!

Seb. And here,

I see a perfect model of thy self,
As thou wert when thy choice first made thee mine:
These cheeks and fronts, though wrinkled now with time
Which Art cannot restore: had equal pureness,
Of natural white and red, and as much ravishing:

Which by fair order and succession,
I see descend on her: and may thy virtues
Wind into her form, and make her a perfect dower:
No part of thy sweet goodness wanting to her.

I will not now Rosilla, ask thy fortunes,
Nor trouble thee with hearing mine;
Those shall hereafter serve to make glad hours
In their relation: All past wrongs forgot;
I 'm glad to see you Gentlemen; but most,
That is in my power to save your lives;
You fav'd ours, when we were near starv'd at Sea,
And I despair not, for if she be mine,
Rosilla can deny Sebastian nothing.

Ros. She does give up her self,

Her power and joys, and all, to you,
To be discharged of 'em as too burthenfom;
Welcome in any shape.

Seb. Sir, in your looks,
I read your fate of my Clarinda: she is yours:
And Lady, if it be in me to confirm
Your hopes in this brave Gentleman,
Presume I am your servant.

Alb. We thank you Sir.

Amin. Oh happy hour!

Alb. O my dear Aminia;
Now all our fears are ended.

Tib. Here I fix: she's mettle,
Steel to the back: and will cut my leaden dagger,
If not us'd with discretion.

Cro. You are still no changling.

Sebast. Nay,

All look chearfully, for none shall be Deny'd their lawful wishes; when a while
We have here refresh'd our selves; we'll return
To our severall homes; and well that voyage ends,
That makes of deadly enemies, faithful friends.

Exeunt.

--	---

The Scene, London.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Sir Perfidious Old-craft an old Knight, and Witty-pate his Son.

Witty.  I R, I'm no boy, I'm deep in one and twenty,
 The second years approaching,
 Old K. A fine time
 For a youth to live by his wits then I should think,

If e'er he mean to make account of any.

Witty. Wits, Sir?

Old K. I Wits Sir, if it be so strange to thee,
 I'm sorry I spent that time to get a Fool,
 I might have employ'd my pains a great deal better;
 Thou know'st all that I have, I ha' got by my wits,
 And yet to see how urgent thou art too;
 It grieves me thou art so degenerate
 To trouble me for means, I never offer'd it
 My Parents from a School-boy, past nineteen once.
 See what these times are grown to, before twenty
 I rush'd into the world, which is indeed

Much like the Art of swimming, he that will attain to't
 Must fall plump, and duck himself at first,
 And that will make him hardy and advent'rous,
 And not stand putting in one foot, and shiver,
 And then draw t'other after, like a quake-buttock;
 Well he may make a padler i'th' world,
 From hand to mouth, but never a brave Swimmer,
 Born up by th' chin, as I bore up myself,
 With my strong industry that never fail'd me;
 For he that lies born up with Patrimonies,
 Looks like a long great Afs that swims with bladders,
 Come but one prick of adverse fortune to him
 He sinks, because he never try'd to swim
 When Wit plaies with the billows that choak'd him.
 Witty. Why is it not a fashion for a Father, Sir,
 Out of his yearly thousands to allow
 His only Son, a competent brace of hundreds;
 Or such a toy?

Old K. Yes, if he mean to spoil him,
 Or mar his wits he may, but never I,
 This is my humor, Sir, which you'll find constant;

I love

I love Wit so well, because I liv'd by't,
 That I'll give no man power out of my means to hurt it,
 And that's a kind of gratitude to my raiser,
 Which great ones oft forget; I admire much
 This Ages dulness, when I scarce writ man,
 The first degree that e'er I took in thriving,
 I lay intelligencer close for wenching,
 Could give this Lord or Knight a true Certificate
 Of all the Maiden-heads extant, how many lay
 'Mongst Chamber-maids, how many 'mongst Exchange
 Though never many there I must confess
 They have a trick to utter Ware so fast;
 I knew which Lady had a mind to fall, (breaking,
 Which Gentlewoman new divorc'd, which Tradesman
 The price of every sinner to a hair,
 And where to raise each price; which were the Tearmers,
 That would give Velvet Petticoats, Tissue Gowns,
 Which Pieces, Angels, Suppers, and Half Crowns;
 I knew how to match, and make my market.
 Could give intelligence where the Pox lay leidger,
 And then to see the Letchers shift a point,
 'Twas sport and profit too; how they would shun
 Their ador'd Mistriſs chambers, and run fearfully,
 Like Rats from burning houses, so brought I
 My Clyents the game still safe together,
 And noble gamesters lov'd me, and I felt it.
 Give me a man that lives by his wits, say I,
 And's never left a Groat, there's the true Gallant.
 When I grew somewhat purse, I grew then
 In mens opinions too, and confidences,
 They put things call'd Executorships upon me,
 The charge of Orphans, little senseless creatures,
 Whom in their Childhoods I bound forth to Felt-makers,
 To make 'em lose, and work away their Gentry,
 Disguise their tender natures with hard custom,
 So wrought 'em out in time, there I rise urgently,
 Nor do I fear to discourse this unto thee,
 I'm arm'd at all points against treachery,
 I hold' my humor firm, if I can see thee thrive by Thy wits while I live, I shall have the more courage
 To trust thee with my Lands when I dye; if not,
 The next best wit I can hear of, carries 'em:
 For since in my time and knowledge, so many rich children
 Of the City, conclude in beggery, I'de rather
 Make a wise stranger my Executor, then a foolish
 Son my Heir, and to have my Lands call'd after my Wit, than after my name; and that's my nature.

Witty. 'Tis a strange harsh one, must I still shift then?
 I come brave Cheats, once to my trade agen,
 And I'll ply't harder now than e'er I did for't,
 You'll part with nothing then, Sir?

Old K. Not a jot, Sir.

Witty. If I should ask you blessing e'r I goe, Sir,
 I think you would not give't me.

Old K. Let me but hear thou liv'st by thy wits once
 Thou shalt have any thing, thou'rt none of mine else,
 Then why should I take care for thee?

Witty. Thank your bounty. Exit.

Old K. So wealth love me, and long life, I beseech it,
 As I do love the man that lives by his wits,
 He comes so near my nature; I'm grown old now,
 And even arriv'd at my last cheat I fear me,
 But 'twill make shift to bury me, by day-light too,
 And discharge all my Legacies, 'tis so wealthy,
 And never trouble any Interest money:
 I've yet a Neece to wed, over whose steps
 I have plac'd a trusty watchful Guardianess,
 For fear some poor Earl steal her, 't has been threat'ned,
 To redeem mortgag'd Land, but he shall miss on't;
 To prevent which, I have sought out a match for her,
Fop of Fop-Hall, he writes himself, I take it,
 The antient'st Fop in England, with whom I've privately
 Compounded for the third part of her portion.

Enter Sir Gregory Fop, and Cuningham.

And she seems pleas'd, so two parts rest with me,
 He's come; Sir Gregory, welcome, what's he Sir?

Sir Greg. Young Cunningham, a Norfolk Gentleman;
 One that has liv'd upon the Fops, my kindred,
 Ever since my remembrance; he's a wit indeed,
 And we all strive to have him, nay, 'tis certain
 Some of our name has gone to Law for him;
 Now 'tis my turn to keep him, and indeed
 He's plaguy chargeable, as all your wits are,
 But I will give him over when I list,
 I ha' us'd wits so before.

Old K. I hope when y'are married Sir, you'll shake him off.

Sir Greg. Why what do you take me to be, old Father-i' Law that shall be, do you think I'll have any of the Wits hang upon me, after I am married once? none of my kindred ever had before me; but where's this Neece? is't a fashion in London, to marry a woman and never see her?

Old K. Excuse the niceness, Sir, that care's your friend's,
 Perhaps had she been seen, you had never seen her;
 There's many a spent thing call'd, and't like your honor,
 That lies in wait for her, at first snap she's a Countess,
 Drawn with six Marcs through Fleetstreet, and a Coachman,
 Sitting bare-headed to their Flanders buttocks,
 This whets him on.

Sir Greg. Pray let's clap up the business, Sir,
 I long to see her, are you sure you have her,
 Is she not there already, Hark? Hark, oh hark.

Old K. How now, what's that Sir?

Sir Greg. Every Caroach goes by,
 Goes ev'n to th' heart of me-

Old K. I'll have that doubt eas'd, Sir,
 Instantly eas'd, Sir Gregory, and now I think on't
 A toy comes i' my mind, seeing your friend there,
 We'll have a little sport, give you but way to't,
 And put a trick upon her, I love Wit pretiously,
 You shall not be seen yet, we'll stale your friend first;
 If't please but him to stand for the Anti-mask.

Sir Gr. Puh, he shall stand for any thing, why his supper
 Lies i' my breeches here, I'll make him fast else.

Old K. Then come you forth more unexpectedly
 The Mask it self, a thousand a year joynture,
 The cloud, your friends will be then drawn away,
 And only you the beauty of the Play.

Sir Gr. For Red and Black, I'll put down all your Fullers,
 Let but your Neece bring White, and we have three colours.

Exit Sir Greg.

Old K. I'm given to understand you are a Wit, Sir.

Cuning. I'm one that Fortune shews small favour to, Sir.

Old K. Why there you conclude it, whether you will or no, Sir;
 To tell you truth, I'm taken with a Wit.

Cun. Fowlers catch Woodcocks so, let not them know so much,

Old K. A pestilence mazard, a Duke Humphrey spark
 Had rather lose his dinner than his jest,
 I say I love a Wit the best of all things.

Cun. Always except your self,

Old K. Has giv'n't me twice now.

Enter Neece and Guardianess.

All with a breath, I thank him; but that I love a Wit
 I should be heartily angry; cuds, my Neece,
 You know the business with her,

Cun. With a Woman?

'Tis ev'n the very same it was I'm sure
 Five thousand years ago, no fool can miss it.

Old K. This is the Gentleman I promis'd Neece,
 To present to your affection.

Cun. Ware that Arrow.

Old K. Deliver me the truth now of your liking.

Cuning.

Cun. I'm spoil'd already, that such poor lean Game Should be found out as I am.

Old K. Go set to her Sir—ha, ha, ha.

Cun. How noble is this virtue in you, Lady? Your eye may seem to commit a thousand slaughters On your dull servants which truly tasted Conclude all in comforts.

Old K. Puh.

Neece. It rather shews what a true worth can make, Such as yours is.

Old K. And that's not worth a groat, How like you him Neece?

Neece. It shall appear how well, Sir, I humbly thank you for him.

Old K. Hah? ha, good gullery, he does it well i'faith, Light, as if he meant to purchase Lip-land there: Hold, hold, bear off I say, slid your part hangs too long.

Cun. My joys are mockeries.

Neece. Y'have both exprest a worthy care and love, Sir, Had mine own eye been set at liberty, To make a publick choice (believe my truth, Sir) It could not ha' done better for my heart Than your good providence has.

Old K. You will say so then, Alas sweet Neece, all this is but the scabbard, Now I draw forth the weapon.

Neece? How?

Old K. Sir Gregory, Approach thou lad of thousands.

Enter Sir Gregory.

Sir Gr. Who calls me?

Neece. What motion's this, the Model of Ninivie?

Old K. Accost her daintily now; let me advise thee,

Sir Gr. I was advis'd to bestow dainty cost on you.

Neece. You were ill advis'd, back, and take better counsel;

You may have good for an Angel, the least cost You can bestow upon a woman, Sir Trebles ten Counsellors Fees in Lady-ware, Y'are over head and ears, e'r you be aware, Faith keep a batchelor still, and go to Bowls, Sir, Follow your Mistress there, and prick and save, Sir; For other Mistresses will make you a slave, Sir.

Sir Gr. So, so, I have my errepoop already.

Old K. Why how now Neece, this is the man I tell you.

Neece. He, hang him, Sir, I know you do but mock, This is the man you would say.

Old K. The Devil rides I think:

Cun. I must use cunning here.

Old K. Make me not mad, use him with all respect, This is the man I swear.

Neece. Would you could perswade me to that; Alas, you cannot go beyond me Uncle, You carry a Jest well, I must confess, For a man of your years, but—

Old K. I'm wrought beside my self.

Cun. I never beheld comeliness till this minute.

Guar. Oh good sweet Sir, pray offer not these words To an old Gentlewoman.

Neece. Sir.

Cun. Away fifteen, Here's Fifty one exceeds thee.

Neece. What's the business?

Cun. Give me these motherly creatures, come, ne'er smother it,

I know you are a teeming woman yet.

Guar. Troth a young Gent. might do much I think, Sir.

Cun. Go too then.

Guar. And I should play my part, or I were ingrateful.

Neece. Can you so soon neglect me!

Cun. Hence I'm busie.

Old K. This cross point came in luckily, impudent baggage.

Hang from the Gentleman, art thou not asham'd To be a Widows hind'rance?

Cun. Are you angry, Sir?

Old K. You're welcome, pray court on, I shall desire Your honest wife acquaintance; vex me not After my care and pains to find a match for thee, Lest I confine thy life to some out-chamber, Where thou shalt waste the sweetness of thy youth, Like a consuming Light in her own socket, And not allow'd a male creature about thee; A very Monkey, thy necessity Shall prize at a thousand pound, a Chimney-sweeper At Fifteen hundred.

Neece. But are you serious, Uncle?

Old K. Serious.

Neece. Pray let me look upon the Gentleman With more heed; then I did but hum him over In haste, good faith, as Lawyers Chancery sheets; Beshrew my blood, a tollerable man, Now I distinctly read him.

Sir Gr. Hum, hum, hum.

Neece. Say he be black, he's of a very good pitch, Well ankled, two good confident calves, they look As if they would not shrink at the ninth child; The redness i'th face, why that's in fashion, Most of your high bloods have it, sign of greatness marry; 'Tis to be taken down too with May-butter, I'll send to my Lady Spend-tail for her Medicine.

Sir Gr. Lum te dum, dum, dum, de dum.

Neece. He's qualified too, believe me.

Sir Gr. Lum te dum, de dum, de dum.

Neece. Where was my judgement?

Sir Gr. Lum te dum, dum, dum, te dum, te dum.

Neece. Perfections cover'd iness.

Sir Gr. Lum te dum, te dum, te dum.

Neece. It smoaks apparantly, pardon sweet Sir, The error of my Sex.

Old K. Why, well said Neece,

Upon submission you must pardon her now, Sir.

Sir Gr. I'll do't by course, do you think I'm an ass, Knight? Here's first my hand, now't goes to the Seal-Office.

Old K. Formally finish't, how goes this Suit forward?

Cun. I'm taking measure of the Widows mind, Sir, I hope to fit her heart.

Guar. Who would have dreamt Of a young morsel now? things come in minutes.

Sir Gr. Trust him not Widow, he's a younger brother, He'll swear and lie; believe me he's worth nothing.

Guar. He brings more content to a woman with that nothing,

Than he that brings his thousands without any thing, We have presidents for that amongst great Ladies.

Old K. Come, come, no language now shall be in fashion, But your Love-phrafe, the bell to procreation. Exeunt.

Enter Sir Ruinous Gentry, Witty-pate, and Priscian.

Witty- Pox, there's nothing puts me besides my wits, but this fourth, This last illiterate share, there's no conscience in't.

Ruin. Sir, it has ever been so, where I have practis'd, and must be.

Still where I am, nor has it been undeserv'd at the years End, and shuffle the Almanack together, vacations and Term-times, one with another, though I say't, my wife is a Woman of a good spirit, then it is no lay-share.

Pris. Faith for this five year, Ego possum probare, I have had

A hungry penurious share with 'em, and she has had as much As I always.

Witty. Present, or not present;

Pris. Residens aut non residens, per fidem.

Witty. And what president's this for me? because your Hic & hac, Turpis and Qui mihi discipulus brains (that never ver got any thing but by accident and uncertainty) did allow it, therefore I must, that have grounded conclusions of wit, hereditary rules from my Father to get by——

Ruin. Sir, be compendious, either take or refuse, I will bate no token of my wives share, make even the last reckonings, and either so unite, or here divide company.

Pris. A good resolution, profesto, let every man beg his own way, and happy man be his dole.

Witty. Well, here's your double share, and single brains Pol, & dipol, here's toward, a Castor ecastor for you, I will endure it a fortnight longer, but by these just five ends.——

Pris. Take heed, five's odd, put both hands together, or severally, they are all odd unjust ends.

Witty. Medius filius, hold your tongue, I depose you from half a share presently else, I will make you a particeps, and decline you, now you understand me, be you a quiet Conjunction amongst the undeclined; you and your Latine ends shall go shift, Solus cum solo together else, and then if ever they get ends of Gold and Silver, enough to serve that Gerundine maw of yours, that without Do will end in Di and Dum instantly.

Enter Old Knight and Sir Gregory.

Ruin. Enough, enough, here comes company, we lose five shares in wrangling about one.

Witty. My Father, put on Priscian he has Latine fragments too, but I fear him not, I'll case my face with a little more hair and relieve.

Old K. Tush Nephew (I'll call you so) for if there be No other obstacles than those you speak of They are but Powder-charges without pellets, You may safely front 'em; and warrant your own danger.

Sir Gr. No other that I can perceive i'faith, Sir, for I put her to't, and felt her as far as I could, and the strongest repulse was, she said, she would have a little Soldier in me, that (if need were) should defend her reputation.

Old K. And surely, Sir, that is a principle Amongst your principal Ladies, they require Valour, either in a friend or a Husband.

Sir Gr. And I allow their requests i'faith, as well as any womans heart can desire, if I knew where to get valour, I would as willingly entertain it as any man that blows.

Old K. Breaths; breaths Sir, that's the sweeter phrase.

Sir Gr. Blows for a Soldier, i'faith Sir, and I'm in Practise that way.

Old K. For a Soldier, I grant it.

Sir Gr. 'Slid, I'll swallow some bullets, and good round ones too, but I'll have a little Soldier in me,

Ruin. Will you on and beg, or steal and be hang'd.

Sir Gr. And some Scholar she would have me besides, Tush, that shall be no bar, 'tis a quality in a Gentleman, but of the least question.

Pris. Salvete Domini benignissimi, munificentissimi.

Old K. Salvete dicis ad nos? jubeo te salvare, Nay, Sir, we have Latine, and other metall in us too.

Sir Gr. I could find in my heart to talk with him too, If I could understand him.

Pris. Charissimi, Doctissimi, Domini, ex abundantia Charitatis vestrae estote propitii in me jejunum Miserum, pauperem, & omni consolatione exulem.

Old K. A pretty Scholar by my faith, Sir, but I'll to him agen.

Sir Gr. Does he beg or steal in this Language, can you tell Sir?

He may take away my good name from me, and I ne'er The wifer.

Old K. He begs, he begs, Sir.

Pris. Ecce, ecce, in oculis lachrymarum flumen, in ore Fames sitisq; ignis in vultu, pudor & impudentia, In omni parte necessitas & indigentia.

Old K. Audi tu bonus socius, tu es Scholasticus, sic intelligo, Ego faciam argumentum, mark now Sir, now I fetch Him up.

Sir Gr. I have been fetcht up a hundred times for this, Yet I could never learn half so much.

Old K. Audi, & responde, hoc est Argumentum, nomen est Nomen, ergo, quod est tibi nomen? Responde nunc, Responde argumentum meum. Have I not put him to't, Sir?

Sir Gr. Yes Sir, I think so.

Witty. Step in, the rascal is put out of his pen'd Speech, And he can go no farther.

Old K. Cur non respondes?

Pris. Ob Domine, tanta mea est miseria.

Witty. So, he's almost in agen.

Pris. Ut nocte mecum pernoctat egestas, luce quotidie Paupertas habitat.

Old K. Sed quod est tibi nomen: & quis dedit? Responde Argumentum.

Pris. Hem, hem,

Witty. He's dry he hems, on quickly.

Ruin. Courteous Gentlemen, if the brow of a Military face may not be offensive to your generous eye-balls, let his wounds speak better than his words, for some branch or small sprig of charity to be planted upon this poor barren soil of a Soldier.

Old K. How now, what Arms and Arts both go a begging?

Ruin. Such is the Post-progression of cold charity now a-days, who (for heat to her frigid Limbs) passes in so swift a motion, that two at the least had need be to stay her.

Sir G. Sir, lets rewardum I pray you, and be gone. If any quarrel should arise amongst us, I am able to answer neither of them, his Iron and Steel tongue is as hard as the t'others Latine one.

Old K. Stay, stay Sir I will talk a little with him first, Let me alone with both, I will try whether they Live by their wits or no; for such a man I love, And what? you both beg together then;

Pris. Conjunctis manibus, profestio, Domine.

Ruin. With equal fortunes, equal distribution, there's not the breadth of a sword's point uneven in our division.

Sir Gr. What two qualities are here cast away upon two poor fellows, if a man had um that could maintain um? what a doubleman were that, if these two fellows might be bought and foddin, and boil'd to a jelly, and eaten fasting every morning, I do not think but a man should find strange things in his stomach.

Old K. Come Sir, joyn your charity with mine, and we'll make up a couple of pence bevixt us.

Sir Gr. If a man could have a pennyworth for his penny, I would bestow more money with 'em.

Witty. Save you Gentlemen, how now? what are you encounter'd here? what fellows are these?

Old K. Faith Sir, here's Mars and Mercury, a pair of poor Planets it seems, that Jupiter has turn'd out to live by their wits, and we are e'en about a little spark of charity to kindle um a new fire.

Witty. Stay, pray you stay Sir, you may abuse your charity, nay, make that goodness in you no better than a vice; so many deceivers walk in these shadows now a days; that certainly your bounties were better spilt than reserv'd to so lewd and vicious uses; which is he that professes the Soldier?

Ruin. He that professes his own profession, Sir, and the dangerous life he hath led in it; this pair of half score years.

Witty. In what services have you been, Sir?

Ruin. The first that sleight me a Soldier, Sir, was that great battel at Alcazar in Barbary, where the noble English Stukely fell, and where that royal Portugal Sebastian ended his untimely days.

Witty. Are you sure Sebastian died there?

Ruin. Faith Sir, there was some other rumour hop't amongst us, that he, wounded, escap'd, and toucht on his Native shore agen, where finding his Countrey at home more distrest by the invasion of the Spaniard, than his loss abroad, forsook it, still supporting a miserable and unfortunate life, which (where he ended) is yet uncertain.

Witty. By my faith Sir, he speaks the nearest fame of truth in this.

Ruin. Since Sir, I serv'd in France, the Low Countreys, Lastly, at that memorable skirmish at Newport, where the forward and bold Scot there spent his life so freely, that from every single heart that there fell, came home from his resolution, a double honor to his Countrey.

Witty. This should be no counterfeit, Sir.

Old K. I do not think he is, Sir.

Witty. But Sir, methinks you do not shew the marks of a Soldier, could you so freely scape, that you brought home no scars to be your chronicle?

Ruin. Sir, I have wounds, and many, but in those parts where nature and humanity bids me shame to publish.

Witty. A good Soldier cannot want those badges.

Sir Greg. Now am not I of your mind in that, for I hold him the best soldier that scapes best, alwaies at a Cock-fencing I give him the best that has the fewest knocks.

Witty. Nay, I'll have a bout with your Scholar too, To ask you why you should be poor (yet richly learn'd) Were no question, at least, you can easily Answer it; but whether you have learning enough, To deserve to be poor or no (since poverty is Commonly the meed of Learning) is yet to be tryed; You have the Languages, I mean the chief, As the Hebrew, Syriack, Greek, Latine, &c.

Pris. Aliquantulum, non totaliter, Domine.

Old K. The Latine I have sufficiently tried him in, And I promise you Sir, he is very well grounded.

Witty. I will prove him in some of the rest.

Toiz miois faterois iste Cock-scomboy?

Pris. Kay yonkeron nigiton oyfouleroi Asinifoy.

Witty. Cheateron ton biton?

Pris. Tous pollous strikerous, Angelo io peefo. (Greek.)

Witty. Certainly Sir, a very excellent Scholar in the Old K. I do note a wondrous readines in him.

Sir Greg. I do wonder how the Trojans could hold out ten years siege (as 'tis reported against the Greeks, if Achilles spoke but this tongue? I do not think but he might have shaken down the Walls in a seven-night, and ne'er troubled the wooden horse.

Witty. I will try him so far as I can in the Syriack, Kircom bragnen, shag a douma dell mathon.

Pris. Hashagath rabgabosh shobos onoriadka.

Witty. Colpack Rubasca, gnawerthem shigshag. Naphamothem Ribsie bongomosh lashemech nagothi.

Witty. Gentlemen I have done, any man that can go farther, I confess my self at a Nonplus.

Sir Greg. Faith not I, Sir, I was at my farthest in my natural language, I was never double-tongu'd, I thank my hard fortune.

Witty. Well Gentlemen, 'tis pity, (walk farther off a little my friends) I say, 'tis pity such fellows so endow'd, so qualified with the gifts of Nature and Arts, yet should have such a scarcity of fortune's benefits, we must blame our Iron-hearted age for it.

Old K. 'Tis pity indeed, and our pity shall speak a little, Come Sir, here's my groat. for 'em;

Witty. A Groat Sir? oh sic, give nothing rather, 'twere better you rail'd on 'em for begging, and so quit your self, I am a poor Gentleman, that have but little but my wits to live on.

Old K. Troth and I love you the better, Sir.

Witty. Yet I'll begin a better example than so, here fellows, there's between you, take Purse and all, and I would it were here heavier for your sakes, there's a pair of Angels to guide you to your lodgings, a poor Gentleman's good Will.

Pris. Gratias, maximas gratias, benignissime Domine.

Old K. This is an ill example for us, Sir, I would this bountiful Gentleman had not come this way to day,

Sir Gr. Pox, we must not shame our selves now, Sir, I'll give as much as that Gentleman, though I never be Soldier or Scholar while I live; here friends, there's a piece, that if he were divided, would make a pair of Angels for me too, in the love I bear to the Sword and the Tongues.

Old K. My larges shall be equal too, and much good do you, this bounty is a little abatement of my wit, though I feel that.

Ruin. May soldiers ever defend such charities.

Pris. And Scholars pray for their increase.

Old K. Fare you well, Sir, these fellows may pray for you, you have made the Scholars Commons exceed to day, and a word with you, Sir, you said you liv'd by your wits, if you use this bounty, you'll begger your wits, believe it.

Witty. Oh Sir, I hope to encrease 'em by it, this seed never wants his harvest, fare you well, Sir. Exit.

Sir Gr. I think a man were as good meet with a reasonable Thief, as an unreasonable Begger sometimes, I could find in my heart to beg half mine back agen, can you change my piece my friends?

Pris. Tempora mutantur, & nos mutamur in illis.

Sir Gr. My Gold is turn'd into Latine.

Enter Witty-pate:

Look you good fellows, here's one round Shilling more that lay conceal'd.

Old K. Sir, away, we shall be drawn farther into damage else.

Sir Gr. A pox of the Fool, he live by his wits? if his wits leave him any money, but what he begs or steals very shortly, I'll be hang'd for him.

Exeunt the two Knights.

Ruin. This breakfast parcel was well fetcht off i' faith.

Witty. Tush, a by-blow for mirth, we must have better purchase, we want a fourth for another project that I have ripen'd.

Ruin. My wife she shares, and can deserve it.

Witty. She can change her shape, and be masculine.

Ruin. 'Tis one of the free'st conditions, she fears not the crack of a Pistol, she dares say Stand to a Grazier.

Pris. Probatum fuit, profecto Domine.

Witty. Good, then you Sir Bacchus, Apollo shall be dispatcht with her share, and some contents to meet us to morrow (at a certain place and time appointed) in the Masculine Gender, my Father has a Nephew, and I an own Cousin coming up from the Univerfity, whom he loves most indulgently, easie Master Credulous Oldcraft, (for you know what your meer Academique is) your Carrier never misses his hour, he must not be rob'd (because he has but little to lose) but he must joyn with us in a devise that I have, that shall rob my Father of a hundred pieces, and thank me to be rid on't, for there's the ambition of my wit, to live upon his profess'd wit, that has turn'd me out to live by my wits.

Pris. Cum birundinis alis tibi regratulor.

Witty. A male habit, a bag of an hunder'd weight, though it be Counters (for my Alchimy shall turn 'em into Gold of my Fathers) the hour, the place, the action shall be at large set down, and Father, you shall know, that I put my portion to use, that you have given me to live by; And to confirm your self in me renate, I hope you'll find my wits legitimate. Exeunt.

Añus.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Lady and Servants.

Serv. Nay Lady.

Lady. Put me not in mind on't, prethee,
You cannot do a greater wrong to Women,
For in our wants, 'tis the most chief affliction
To have that name remembered; 'tis a Title
That misery mocks us by, and the worlds malice,
Scorn and contempt has not wherewith to work
On humble Callings; they are safe, and lye
Level with pitty still, and pale distress
Is no great stranger to 'em; but when fortune
Looks with a stormy face on our conditions,
We find affliction work, and envy pastime,
And our worst enemy than that, most abuses us,
Is that we are call'd by, Lady, Oh my spirit,
Will nothing make thee humble? I am well methinks,
And can live quiet with my fate sometimes,
Until I look into the world agen,
Then I begin to rave at my Stars bitterness,
To see how many muckhills plac'd above me;
Peasants and Droyls, Caroches full of Dunghils,
Whose very birth stinks in a generous nostril,
Glistring by night like Glow-worms through the High streets
Hurried by Torch-light in the Foot-mans hands
That shew like running Fire-drakes through the City,
And I put to my shifts and wits to live,
Nay sometimes danger too; on Foot, on Horseback,
And earn my supper manfully e'r I get it,
May a meal I have purchas'd at that rate,

Enter Priscian.

Fed with a wound upon me, stamp't at midnight.
Hah, what are you?

Prisc. Now you may tell your self, Lady. } Pulls off's

Lady. Oh Mr. Priscian, what's the project, } beard.
For you ne'r come without one.

Prisc. First, your Husband,
Sir Ruinous Gentry greets you with best wishes,
And here has sent you your full share by me
In five Cheats and two Robberies.

Lady. And what comes it too?

Prisc. Near upon thirteen pound.

Lady. A goodly share,
'Twill put a Lady scarce in Philip and Cheyney,
With three small Bugle Laces, like a Chamber-maid,
Here's precious lifting.

Prisc. 'Las you must consider, Lady,
'Tis but young Term, Attornies ha small doings yet,
Then Highway Lawyers, they must needs ha little,
We've had no great good luck to speak troth, Beauty,
Since your stout Ladyship parted from's at Highgate,
But there's a fair hope now for a present hunder'd,
Here's mans Apparel, your Horse stands at door.

Lady. And what's the virtuous plot now?

Prisc. Marry Lady,
You, like a brave young Gallant must be robb'd.

Lady. I robb'd?

Prisc. Nay then——

Lady. Well, well, go on, let's hear Sir.

Prisc. Here's a seal'd bag of a Hunder'd, which indeed
Are Counters all, only some sixteen Groats
Of white money i'th' mouth on't.

Lady. So, what Saddle have I?

Prisc. Monsieur Laroon's the Frenchmans.

Lady. That agen,
You know so well it is not for my stride,
How oft have I complain'd on't?

Prisc. You may have Jock's then, the little Scotch one;
You must dispatch. Exit Prisc.

Lady. I'll soon be ready, Sir,
Before you ha shifted Saddles, many Women
Have their wealth flow to 'em, I was made I see
To help my fortune, not my fortune me. Exit.

Enter Cuningam

Cun. My ways are Goblin-led, and the night-Elf
Still draws me from my home, yet I follow,
Sure, 'tis not altogether fabulous,
Such Hagg's do get dominion of our tongues
So soon as we speak, the Inchantment binds;
I have dissembled such a trouble on me,
As my best wits can hardly clear agen;
Piping through this old reed, the Guardianess,
With purpose that my harmony shall reach
And please the Ladies ear, she stops below,
And echoes back my Love unto my Lips,
Perswaded by most violent arguments
Of self-love in her self; I am so self-fool,
To doat upon her hunder'd wrinkl'd face;
I could beggar her to accept the gifts
She would throw upon me; 'twere charity,
But for pities sake I will be a niggard
And undo her, refusing to take from her;
I'm haunted agen, if it take not now
I'll break the Spell.

Enter Guardianess.

Guard. Sweet Cuningam, welcome;
What? a whole day absent? Birds that build Nests
Have care to keep 'em.

Cun. That's granted,
But not continually to sit upon 'em;
Lefs in the youngling season, else they desire
To fly abroad, and recreate their labours,
Then they return with fresher appetite
To work agen.

Guard. Well, well, you have built a Nest
That will stand all storms, you need not mistrust
A weather-wrack, and one day it may be
The youngling season too, then I hope
You'll ne'er fly out of sight.

Cun. There will be pains,
I see to shake this Burr off, and sweetest,
Prethee how fares thy charge? has my good friend
Sir Gregory, the countenance of a Lover?

Guard. No by my troth, not in my mind, methinks
(Setting his Worship aside) he looks like a fool.

Cun. Nay i'faith, ne'r divide his Worship from him for Small matter; Fool and Worship are no such (that Strangers now adaies, but my meaning is,
Has he thy Ladies countenance of Love?
Looks she like a welcome on him? plainly,
Have they as good hope of one another,
As Cupid blefs us, we have?

Guard. Troth I know not,
I can perceive no forwardness in my charge,
But I protest I wish the Knight better
For your sake, Bird.

Cun. Why thanks sweet Bird, and with my heart I wish,
That he had as strong and likely hope of her
As thou hast of me.

Guard. Well, he's like to speed
Ne'er the worse for that good wish, and I'll tell you
Bird (for secrets are not to be kept betwixt us two)
My charge thinks well of you.

Cun. Of me? for what?

Guard. For my sake? I mean so, I have heard her
A hundred times, since her Uncle gave her
The first bob about you, that she'd doe somewhat
For my sake, if things went well together,
We have spoke of doors and bolts, and things and things,
Go too, I'll tell you all, but you'll find
Some advancement, for my sake, I do believe.

Cun. Faith be not sparing, tell me.

Guard. By my Lady
You shall pardon me for that, 'twere a shame
If men should hear all that women speak behind
Their backs sometimes.

Cun. You must give me leave yet,
At least to give her thanks.

Guard. Nor that neither,
She must not take notice of my blabbing,
It is sufficient you shall give me thanks,
For 'tis for my sake if she be bountiful,
She loves me, and loves you too for my sake.

Cun. How shall I, knowing this, but be ingrate,
Not to repay her with my dearest duty.

Guard. I, but you must not know it, if you tell
All that I open to you; you'll shame us both;
A far off you may kiss your hand, blush or so,
But I'll allow no nearer conference.

Cun. Whoop! you'll be jealous I perceive now.

Guard. Jealous? why there's no true love without it, Bird,
I must be jealous of thee, but for her,
(Were it within my duty to my Master)
I durst trust her with the strongest temper,
And I dare swear her now as pure a Virgin
As e'er was welcom'd to a marriage bed;
If thoughts may be untainted, hers are so.

Cun. And where's the cause of your fear then?

Guard. Well, well;
When things are past, and the wedding Torches
Lighted at Matches, to kindle better fire,
Then I'll tell you more.

Cun. Come, come, I see farther,
That if we were married, you'd be jealous.

Guard. I protest I should a little, but not of her
It is the married woman (if you mark it)
And not the Maid that longs, the appetite
Follows the first taste, when we have relisht
We wish cloying, the taste once pleas'd before,
Then our desire is whetted on to more,
But I reveal too much to you, i'faith Bird.

Cun. Not a whit i'faith, Bird, betwixt you and I,
I am beholding for bettering of my knowledg.

Guard. Nay, you shall know more of me, if you'll berul'd
But make not things common.

Cun. Ud' so, your Lady?

Guard. I, 'tis no matter, she'll like well of this,
Our familiarity is her content.

Enter Niece and Clown.

Nee. This present from Sir Gregory?

Clow. From my Master, the Worshipful, right Sir Gregery Fop.

Nee. A Ruffe? and what might be his high conceit
In sending of a Ruff? (high too)

Clow. I think he had two conceits in it forsooth, too Low, Ruff high, because as the Ruff does embrace your neck all day, so does he desire to throw his Knightly Arms.

Nee. But then I leave him off a-nights.

Clow. Why then he is ruffe low, a ruffian, a bold adventurous errand to do any rough service for his Lady.

Nee. A witty and unhappy conceit. does he mean
As he seems to say unto that reverence? (Toward Cuning.)
He does wooe her sure.

Clow. To tell you you truth, Lady, his conceit was far better than I have blaz'd it yet.

Nee. Do you think so, Sir?

Clow. Nay, I know it forsooth, for it was two days, e'r he compass'd it, to find a fitting present for your Lady-ship, he was sending once a very fine Puppy to you.

Nee. And that he would have brought himself.

Clow. So he would indeed, but then he alter'd his device, and sent this Ruffe; requesting with all, that whenso-ever it is foul, you (with your own hands) would bestow
the starching of it.

Nee. Else she woos him, now his eyes shoots this way;
And what was the reason for that, Sir? Toward Cun.

Clow. There lies his main conceit, Lady, for says he, In so doing she cannot chuse but in the starching, to clap it often between her hands, and so she gives a great liking and applause to my Present, whereas, if I should send a Puppy, she ever calls it to her with hiss, hiss, hiss, which is a fearful disgrace, he drew the device from a Play, at the Bull tother day.

Nee. I marry Sir, this was a rich conceit indeed.

Clow. And far fetch'd, therefore good for you, Lady.

Guard. How now? which way look you, Bird?

Cun. At the Fool Bird, shall I not look at the Fool?

Guard. At the Fool and I here? what need that? pray look
(this way.)

Nee. I'll fit him aptly, either I'll awake
His wits (if he have any,) or force him
To appear (as yet I cannot think him)
Without any. Sirrah, tell me one thing true
That I shall aske you now, Was this device
Your Masters own? I doubt his wit in it;
He's not so ingenuous.

Clow. His own I assure you, Madam.

Nee. Nay, you must not lye.

Clow. Not with a Lady, I'd rather lye with you, than lie with my Master, by your leave in such a case as this.

Guard. Yet agen your eye?

Cun. The fool makes mirth i'faith,
I would hear some.

Guard. Come, you shall hear none but me.

Nee. Come hither, friend, nay, come nearer me; did
Thy Master send thee to me? he may be wise,
But did not shew it much in that; men sometimes
May wrong themselves unawares, when they least think on't;
Was Vulcan ever so unwise to send Mars
To be his spokesman, when he went a wooing?
Send thee? hey-ho, a pretty rowling eye.

Clow. I can turn vp the white and the black too, and need be forsooth.

Nee. Why, here's an amorus nose.
You see the worst of my nose, forsooth

Nee. A cheek, how I could put it now in dalliance,
A pair of Lips, oh that we were uney'd,
I could suck Sugar from 'em, what a beard's here?
When will the Knight thy Master have such a
Stamp of man-hood on his face? nay, do not blush.

Clow. 'Tis nothing but my flesh and blood that rises so.

Cun. 'Death, she courts the fool.

Guard. Away, away, 'tis sport, do not mind it.

Nee. Give me thy hand, come, be familiar;
Here's a promising palm; what a soft
Handful of pleasure's here, here's Down compar'd
With Flocks and quilted Straw, thy Knights fingers
Are lean matrice rubbers to these Feathers,
I prethee let me lean my cheek upon't.
What a soft pillow's here?

Clow. Hum, umh, hu, hum.

Nee. Why there's a courage in that lively passion,
Measure thee all o'r, there's not a limb
But has his full proportion, it is my voice,
There's no compare betwixt the Knight and thee,
The goodlier man behalf, at once now
I see thee all over.

Clow. If you had seen me swim t'other day on my back, you would have sed you had seen, there was two Chambermaids that saw me, and my legs by chance were tangled in the flags, and when they saw how I was hang'd,
they

they cryed out, Oh help the man for fear he be drown'd.

Neece. They could do no less in pity, come thine arm, we'll walk together.

Cun. Blindness of Love and Women, why she dotes upon the fool.

Guard. What's that to you, mind her not.

Cun. Away you Burr.

Guard. How's that?

Cun. Hang of Fleshhook, fasten thine itchy claspe On some dry Toad-stool that will kindle with thee, And burn together.

Guard. Oh abominable, Why do you not love me?

Cun. No, never did; I took thee down a little way to Enforce a Vomit from my offended stomach, Now thou'rt up agen, I loath thee filthy.

Guard. Oh villain.

Cun. Why dost thou not see a sight. Would make a man abjure the sight of Women.

Neece. Ha, ha, ha,, he's vext; ha, ha, ha,

Clow. Ha, ha, ha.

Neece. Why dost thou laugh?

Clow. Because thou laugh'st, nothing else i'faith.

Cun. She has but mockt my folly, else she finds not The bosome of my purpose, some other way, Must make me know; I'll try her, and may chance quit The fine dexterity of her Lady-wit. Exit.

Neece. Yes introth, I laught to think of thy Master, Now, what he would think if he knew this?

Clow. By my troth I laugh at him too, faith sirrah, he's but a fool to say the truth, though I say't, that should not say't.

Neece. Yes, thou shouldst say truth, and I believe thee; Well, for this time we'll part, you perceive something, Our tongues betray our hearts, there's our weakness, But pray be silent.

Clow. As Mousé in Cheefe, or Goose in Hay i'faith.

Neece. Look, we are cut off, there's my hand where my Lips would be.

Clow. I'll wink, and think 'em thy Lips, farewell. Exit.

Neece. Now Guardianes, I need not ask where you have Guard. Oh Lady, never was woman so abus'd. (been.

Enter Clown.

Clow. Dost thou hear Lady, sweet-heart, I had forgot to tell thee, if you will, I will come back in the evening.

Neece. By no means, come not till I send for you.

Clow. If there be any need, you may think of things when I am gone, I may be convey'd into your chamber, I'll lye under the bed while midnight, or so, or you shall put me up in one of your little boxes, I can creep in at a small hole.

Neece. These are things I dare not venture, I charge you on my love, never come till I send for you.

Clow. Verbum insipienti, 'tis enough to the wife, nor I think it is not fit the Knight should know any thing yet.

Neece. By no means, pray you go now, we are suspected.

Clow. For the things that are past, let us use our secrets.

Neece. Now I'll make a firm trial of your love, As you love me, not a word more at this time, Not a syllable, 'tis the seal of love, take heed.

Clow. Hum, hum, hum, hum —

He hums loath to depart.

Exit Clown.

Neece. So, this pleasant trouble's gone, now Guardianes, What? your eyes easing your heart, the cause woman?

Guard. The cause is false man, Madam, oh Lady, I have been gull'd in a shining Carbuncle, A very Glo-worm, that I thought had fire in't, And 'tis as cold as Ice.

Neece. And justly serv'd, Wouldst thou once think that such an early spring Would dote upon, thine Autumn?

Guard. Oh, had you heard him but protest.

Neece. I would not have believ'd him,

Thou might'st have perceiv'd how I mock'd thy folly. In wanton imitation with the Fool, Go weep the sin of thy credulity, Not of thy loss, for it was never thine, And it is gain to miss it; wert thou so dull?

Nay, yet thou'rt stupid and uncapable, Why, thou wert but the bait to fish with, not The prey, the stale to catch another Bird with.

Guard. Indeed he call'd me Bird.

Neece. Yet thou perceiv'st not, It is your Neece he loves, wouldst thou be made A stalking Jade? 'tis she examine it, I'll hurry all awry, and tread my path Over unbeaten grounds, go level to the mark, Not by circular bouts, rare things are pleasing, And rare's but seldom in the simple fence, But has her Emphasis with eminence.

Guard. My Neece? she the rival of my abuse? My flesh and blood wrong me? I'll Aunt her for't;

Exit.

Enter Mirabel.

Oh opportunity, thou blest me Now Gentlewoman are you parted so soon? Where's your friend I pray? your Cuningam?

Mir. What say you Aunt?

Guard. Come, come, your Cuningame? I am not blind with age yet, nor deaf.

Mir. Dumb I am sure you are not, what ail you Aunt? Are you not well?

Guard. No, nor sick, nor mad, nor in my wits, nor sleeping, nor waking, not nothing, nor any thing; I know not what I am, nor what I am not,

Mir. Mercy cover us, what do you mean, Aunt?

Guard. I mean to be reveng'd.

Mir. On whom?

Guard. On thee Baggage.

Mir. Revenge should follow injury, Which never reacht so far as thought in me Towards you Aunt, Guard. Your cunning, minion.

Nor your Cuningame; can either blind me, The gentle Beggar loves you.

Mir. Beseech you,

Let me stay your error, I begin to hear, And shake off my amazement; if you think That ever any passage treating love Hath been betwixt us yet commenc'd, any Silent eye-glance that might but sparkle fire, So much as Brother and Sister might meet with, The Lip-salute, so much as strangers might Take a farewell with, the commixed hands, Nay, but the least thought of the least of these; In troth you wrong your bosom, by that truth (Which I think yet you durst be bail for in me, If it were offer'd ye) I am as free As all this protestation.

Guard. May I believe this?

Mir. If ever you'll believe truth: why, I thought he had spoke love to you, and if his heart prompted his tongue, sure I did hear so much.

Guard. Oh falsest man, Ixion's plague fell on me, Never by woman (such a masculine cloud) So airy and so subtle was embrac'd.

Mir. By no cause in me, by my life dear Aunt.

Guard. I believe you, then help in my revenge, And you shall do't, or lose my love for ever, I'll have him quitted at his equal weapon, Thou art young, follow him, bait his desires With all the Engines of a womans wit, Stretch modesty even to the highest pitch; He cannot freeze at such a flaming beauty; And when thou hast him by th' amorous gills, Think on my vengeance, choak up his desires, Then let his banquetings be Tantalisme,

Let thy disdain spurn the dissembler out;
Oh I should climb my Stars, and sit above,
To see him burn to ashes in his love.

Mir. This will be a strange taste, Aunt, and an Unwilling labour, yet in your injunction
I am a servant to't.

Guard. Thou'lt undertak't?

Mir. Yes, let the success commend it self hereafter.

Guard. Effect it Girl, my substance is thy store,
Nothing but want of Will makes woman poor. Exeunt.

Enter Sir Gregory, and Clown.

Sir Greg. Why Pompey, thou art not stark mad, art thou?
Wilt thou not tell me how my Lady does?

Clow. Your Lady?

Sir Greg. Did she receive the thing that I sent her kindly, or no:

Clow. The thing that you sent her, Knight, by the thing that you sent, was for the things sake that was sent to carry the thing that you sent, very kindly receiv'd; first, there is your Indenture, now go seek you a servant: secondly, you are a Knight: thirdly and lastly, I am mine own man: and fourthly, fare you well.

Sir Greg. Why Pompey? prethee let me speak with thee, I'll lay my life some hare has crost him.

Clow. Knight, if you be a Knight, so keep you; as for the Lady, who shall say that she is not a fair Lady, a sweet Lady, an honest and a virtuous Lady, I will say he is a base fellow, a blab of his tongue, and I will make him eat these fingers ends.

Sir Greg. Why, here's no body says so Pompey.

Clow. Whatsoever things have pass'd between the Lady and the other party, whom I will not name at this time, I say she is virtuous and honest, and I will maintain it, as long as I can maintain my self with bread and water.

Sir Greg. Why I know no body thinks otherwise.

Clow. Any man that does but think it in my hearing, I will make him think on't while he has a thought in his bosom; shall we say that kindnesses from Ladies are common? or that favours and protestations are things of no moment betwixt parties and parties? I say still, whatsoever has been betwixt the Lady and the party, which I will not name, that she is honest, and shall be honest, whatsoever she does by day or by night, by light or by darkness, with cut and long tail.

Sir Greg. Why I say she is honest.

Clow. Is she honest? in what sense do you say she is honest, Knight?

Sir Greg. If I could not find in my heart to throw my dagger at thy head, hilts and all, I'm an ass, and no Gentleman.

Clow. Throw your Dagger at me! do not Knight, I give you fair warning, 'tis but cast away if you do, for you shall have no other words of me, the Lady is an honest Lady, whatsoever reports may go of sports and toys, and thoughts, and words, and deeds, betwixt her and the party which I will not name; this I give you to understand, That another man may have as good an eye, as amorous a nose, as fair a stamp'd beard, and be as proper a man as a Knight, (I name no parties) a Servingman may be as good as a Sir, a Pompey as a Gregory, a Doodle as a Fop; so Servingman Pompey Doodle, may be respected as well with Ladies (though I name no parties) as Sir Gregory Fop; so farewell: Exit.

Sir Greg. If the fellow be not out of his wits, then will I never have any more wit while I live; either the sight of the Lady has gaster'd him, or else he's drunk, or else he walks in his sleep, or else 's a fool, or a knave, or both, one of the three, I'm sure 'tis; yet now I think on't, she has not us'd me so kindly as her Uncle promis'd me she should, but that's all one, he says I shall have her, and I dare take his word for the best worse I have, and that's a weightier thing than a Lady, I'm sure on't. Exit.

Enter Lady Ruinous (as a man) Witty-Pate, Sir Ruinous, Priscian, and Master Credulous (binding and robbing her, and in Scarfs) Credulous finds the bag.

Lady Ruin. Nay, I am your own, 'tis in your pleasure How you'll deal with me; yet I would intreat, You will not make that which is bad enough, Worse than it need be, by a second ill, When it can render you no second profit; If it be coin you seek, you have your prey, All my store I vow, (and it weighs a hundred) My life, or any hurt you give my body, Can enrich you no more.

Witty. You may pursue,

L Ruin. As I am a Gentleman; I never will, Only we'll bind you to quiet behaviour Till you call out for Bail, and on th' other Side of the hedge leave you; but keep the peace Till we be out of hearing, for by that We shall be out of danger, if we come back, We come with a mischief.

Lady. You need not fear me.

Prisc. Come, we'll bestow you then.

Exit Ruin. Prisc. and Lady.

Wit. Why law you Sir, is not this a swifter Revenue than, Sic probas, ergo's & igitur's can bring in? why is not this one of your Syllogismes in Barbara? Omne utile est honestum.

Cred. Well Sir, a little more of this acquaintance, Will make me know you fully, I protest.

You have (at first sight) made me conscious Of such a deed my dreams ne'er prompted, yet I could almost have wish'd rather ye'ad rob'd me Of my Cloak, (for my Purse 'tis a Scholars) Than to have made me a robber.

I had rather have answered three difficult questions, Than this one, as easie, as yet it seems.

Witty. Tush, you shall never come to farther answer for't;

Can you confess your penurious Uncle, In his full face of love, to be so strict A Nigard to your Commons, that you are fain To fize your belly out with Shoulder Fees? With Rumps and Kidneys, and Cues of single Beer, And yet make Daymy to feed more daintily, At this easier rate? he Master Credulous, I blush for you.

Cred. This is a truth undeniable.

Wit. Why go to then, I hope I know your Uncle, How does he use his Son, nearer than you?

Cred. Faith, like his Jade, upon the bare Commons, Turn'd out to pick his living as he can get it; He would have been glad to have shar'd in such A purchase, and thank'd his good fortune too.

Enter Ruinous and Priscian.

But mum no more——is all safe, Bullies? (his loss,

Ruin. Secure, the Gentleman thinks him most happy in With his safe life and limbs, and redoubles His first vow, as he is a Gentleman, Never to pursue us.

Wit. Well away then, Disperse you with Master Credulous, who still Shall bear the purchase, Priscian and I, Will take some other course: You know our meeting At the Three Cups in St Gile's, with this proviso, (For 'tis a Law with us) that nothing be open'd Till all be present, the looser saies a hundred, And it can weigh no less.

Ruin. Come, Sir, we'll be your guide.

Cred. My honesty, which till now was never forfeited, All shall be close till our meeting. Exit Cred. and Ruin.

Wit.

Witty. Tush, I believ't,
And then all shall out; where's the thief that's robb'd?

Enter Lady Ruinous.

L. Rui. Here Master Oldcraft, all follows now.

Witty. 'Twas neatly done, wench, now to turn that bag
Of counterfeits to current pieces, & actum est.

L. Rui. You are the Chymist, we'll blow the fire still,
If you can mingle the ingredients.

Witty. I will not miss a cause, a quantity, a dram,
You know the place.

Pris. I have told her that, Sir.

Witty. Good, turn Ruinous to be a Constable, I'm sure
We want not beards of all sorts, from the Worshipful Magistrate to the under Watchman;
Because we must have no danger of life,
But a cleanly cheat, attach Credulous,
The cause is plain, the theft found about him;
Then fall I in his own Cousins shape
By mere accident, where finding him distressed,
I with some difficulty must fetch him off,
With promise that his Uncle shall shut up all
With double restitution: Master Constable, Ruinous
His mouth shall be stop't; you, Mistress rob-thief,
Shall have your share of what we can gull my Father of;
Is't plain enough?

L. Rui. As plain a cozenage as can be, faith.

Witty. Father, I come again, and again when this is Past too, Father, one will beget another;
I'd be loath to leave your posterity barren,
You were best come to composition Father,
Two hundred pieces yearly allow me yet,
It will be the cheaper (Father) than my wit,
For I will cheat none but you, dear Father.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Old Knight, and Sir Gregory.

Old K. WHy now you take the course Sir Gregory Fop:
I could enforce her, and I list but love
That's gently won, is a man's own for ever,
Have you prepar'd good Musick?

Sir Gr. As fine a noise, Uncle, as heart can wish.

Old K. Why that's done like a Sutor,
They must be woo'd a hundred several ways,
Before you obtain the right way in a woman,
'Tis an odd creature, full of creeks and windings.
The Serpent has not more; for sh'as all his,
And then her own beside came in by her mother.

Sir Gr. A fearful portion for a man to venture on.

Old K. But the way found once by the wits of men,
There is no creature lies so tame agen.

Sir Gr. I promise you, not a house-Rabbit, Sir.

Old K. No sucker on 'em all.

Sir Gr. What a thing's that?

They're pretty fools I warrant, when they'r tame
As a man can lay his lips too.

Old K. How were you bred, Sir?

Did you never make a fool of a Tenants daughter?

Sir Gr. Never i'faith, they ha' made some fools for me,
And brought 'em many a time under their aprons.

Old R. They could not shew you the way plainlier, I think,

To make a fool again.

Sir Gr. There's fools enough, Sir,

'Lefs they were wiser.

Old K. This is wondrous rare,
Come you to London with a Maiden-head, Knight?
A Gentleman of your rank ride with a Cloak-bag?
Never an Hostels by the way to leave it with?
Nor Tapsters Sister? nor head-Ostlers Wife?
What no body?

Sir Gr. Well mock'd old Wit-monger,
I keep it for your Neece.

Old K. Do not say so for shame, she'll laugh at thee,
A wifene'er looks for't, 'tis a batchelors penny,
He may giv't to a begger-wench, i'th' progress time, Ex.
And ne'er be call'd to account for't.

Sir Gr. Would I had known so much,
I could ha' stop't a beggers mouth by th' way.

Enter Page and Fidlers boy.

That rail'd upon me, 'cause I'd give her nothing——
What, are they come?

Pag. And plac'd directly, Sir,
Under her window.

Sir Gr. What may I call you, Gentleman?

Boy. A poor servant to the Viol, I'm the Voice, Sir.

Sir Gr. In good time Master Voice.

Boy. Indeed good time does get the mastery.

Sir Gr. What Countreyman, Master Voice?

Boy. Sir, born at Ely, we all set up in Ela
But our house commonly breaks in Rutland-shire.

Sir Gr. A shrewd place by my faith, it may well break your voice,
It breaks many a mans back; come, set to your business.

SONG.

FAin would I wake you, Sweet, but fear
I should invite you to worse cheer;
In your dreams you cannot fare
Meaner than Musick; no compare;
None of your slumbers are compil'd
Under the pleasure makes a Child;
Your day-delights, so well compact,
That what you think, turns all to act:
I'd wish my life no better play,
Your dream by night, your thought by day.
Wake gently, wake,
Part softly from your dreams;
The morning flies
To your fair eyes,
To take her special beams:

Sir Gr. I hear her up, here Master Voice,
Pay you the Instruments, save what you can.

Enter Neece above.

To keep you when you're crackt.

Exit Boy.

Neece. Who should this be?

That I'm so much beholding to, for sweetness?
Pray Heaven it happens right.

Sir Gr. Good morrow, Mistress.

Neece. An ill day and a thousand come upon thee,

Sir Gr. 'Light, that's six hundred more than any Almanack has.

Neece. Comes it from thee? it is the mangiest Musick
That ever woman heard.

Sir Gr. Nay, say not so, Lady,
There's not an itch about 'em.

Neece. I could curse
My attentive powers, for giving entrance to't;
There is no boldness like the impudence

That's

That's lockt in a fools bloud, how durst you do this?
In conscience I abus'd you as sufficiently
As woman could a man; infatiate Coxcomb,
The mocks and spiteful language I have given thee,
Would o' my life ha' serv'd ten reasonable men,
And rise contented too, and left enough for their friends.
Thouglutton at abuses, never satisfied?
I am perswaded thou devour'st more flouts
Than a l thy Lady's worth, and still a hungred!
A mischief of that maw, prethee seek elsewhere,
Introth I am weary of abusing thee;
Get thee a fresh Mistress, thou'lt make work enough;
I do not think there's scorn enough in Town
To serve thy turn, take the Court-Ladies in,
And all their Women to 'em, that exceed 'em.

Sir Gr. Is this in earnest, Lady?

Neece. Oh unsatiable!

Dost thou count all this but an earnest yet?
I'd thought I'd paid thee all the whole sum, trust me;
Thou'lt begger my derision utterly
If thou stay'st longer, I shall want a laugh:
If I knew where to borrow a contempt
Would hold thee tack, stay and be hang'd, thou shouldst then:
But thou'lt no conscience now to extort hate from me,
When one has spent all she can make upon thee;
Must I begin to pay thee hire again?
After I have rid thee twice? faith 'tis unreasonable.

Sir Gr. Say you so? I'll know that presently. Exit.

Neece. Now he runs

To fetch my Uncle to this musty bargain,
But I have better ware always at hand.
And lay by this still, when he comes to cheapen.

Enter Cuningam.

Cun. I met the Musick now, yet cannot learn
What entertainment he receiv'd from her

Nee. There's some body set already, I must to't, I see,
Well, well, Sir Gregory?

Cun. Hah, Sir Gregory?

Nee. Where e'er you come, you may well boast your conquest.

Cun. She's lost y'faith, enough, has fortune then
Remembred her great boy? she seldom fails 'em.

Nee. H? was the unlikeliest man at first, methought,
To have my love, we never met but wrangled,

Cun. A pox upon that wrangling, say I still,

I never knew it fail yet, where e'er't came;

It never comes but like a storm of hail,

'Tis sure to bring fine weather at the tail on't,
There's not one match 'mongst twenty made without it,
It fights i' th' tongue, but sure to agree i' th' haunches.

Nee. That man that should ha' told me when time was.
I should ha' had him, had been laught at pitcously,
But see how things will change?

Cun. Here's a heart feels it—Oh the deceitful promises of love!

What trust should a man put i' th' lip of woman?

She kiss me with that strength, as if sh'ad meant

To ha' set the fair print of her soul upon me.

Nee. I would ha' sworn 'twould ne'er ha been a match once.

Cun. I'll hear no more, I'm mad to hear so much,
Why should I aim my thoughts at better fortunes
Than younger brothers have? that's a Maid with nothing.
Or some old Soap-boilers Widow, without Teeth,
There waits my fortune for me; seek no farther. Ex. Cun.

Enter Old Knight, and Sir Gregory

Old K. You tell me things, Sir Gregory, that cannot be.
She will not, nor she dares not.

Sir Gr. Would I were whipt then.

Nee. I'd make as little shew of love, Sir Gregory,
As ever Woman did, you shall not know

You have my heart a good while.

Old K. Heard you that?

Nee. Man will insult so soon, 'tis his condition,
'Tis good to keep him off as long as we can,
I've much ado, I swear; and love i' th' end
Will have his course, let Maids do what they can,
They are but frail things till they end in man.

Old K. What say you to this, Sir?

Sir Gr. This is somewhat handsome.

Nee. And by that little wrangling that I fain'd,
Now I shall try how constant his love is,
Although't went fore against my heart to chide him.

Sir Gr. Alas poor Gentlewoman.

Old K. Now y'are sure of truth,

You hear her own thoughts speak.

Sir Gr. They speak indeed.

Old K. Go, you're a brainless Coax; a Toy, a Fop, I'll go no farther than your name, Sir Gr.

I'll right my self there; were you from this place,

You should perceive I'm heartily angry with you,

Offer to sow strife 'twixt my Neece and I?

Good morrow Neece, good morrow.

Nee. Many fair ones to you, Sir. (ing?)

Old K. Go, you're a Coxcomb. How dost Neece this morn-

An idle shallow fool: sleep'st thou well, Girl?

Fortune may very well provide thee Lordships,

For honesty has left thee little manners.

Sir Gr. How am I bang'd o'both sides?

Old K. Abuse kindnesse? Will't take the air to day Neece?

Nee. When you please, Sir,

There stands the Heir behind you I must take,

(Which I'd as lieve take, as take him I swear.) now?

Old K. La' you; do you hear't continued to your teeth

A pox of all such Gregories; what a hand } Neece lets fall

Have I with you? } her Scarfe.

Sir Gr. No more y'feck, I ha' done, Sir:

Lady, your Scarf's fall'n down.

Nee. 'Tis but your luck, Sir,

And does presage the Mistress must fall shortly,

You may wear it, and you please.

Old K. There's a trick for you,

You're parlously belov'd, you should complain.

Sir Gr. Yes, when I complain, Sir,

Then do your worst, there I'll deceive you, Sir.

Old K. You are a Dolt, and so I leave you, Sir. Exit.

Sir Gr. Ah sirrah, Mistress were you caught, i'faith?

We overheard you all; I must not know

I have your heart, take heed o' that, I pray,

I knew some Scarf would come.

Nee. He's quite gone, sure:

Ah you base Coxcomb, couldst thou come again?

And so abus'd as thou wast?

Sir Gr. How?

Nee. 'Twould ha' kill'd

A sensible man, he would ha' gone to his chamber,

And broke his heart by this time.

Sir Gr. Thank you heartily.

Nee. Or fixt a naked Rapier in a Wall,

Like him that earn'd his Knighthood, e'r he had it,

And then refus'd upon't, ran up to th' hilts. (to't,

Sir Gr. Yes, let him run for me, I was never brought up

I never profest running i' my life. (vermin.

Nee. What art thou made on? thou tough villanous

Will nothing destroy thee?

Sir Gr. Yes, yes, assure your self

Unkind words may do much.

Nee. Why, dost thou want 'em?

I've e'en consum'd my spleen to help thee to 'em:

Tell me what sort of words they be would speed thee?

I'll see what I can do yet.

Sir Gr. I'm much beholding to you,

You're willing to bestow huge pains upon me.

Nee. I should account nothing too much to rid thee.

Sir Gr. I wonder you'd not offer to destroy me,

All the while your Uncle was here.

Neece. Why there thou betray'st thy house; we of the Old-Crafis

Were born to more wit than so.

Sir Greg. I wear your favor here.

Neece. Would it might rot thy arme off: if thou knewst
With what contempt thou hast it, what hearts bitterness,
How many cunning curles came along with it,
Thoud'st quake to handle it.

Sir Greg. A pox, tak't again then;
Who'd be thus plagu'd of all hands?

Neece. No, wear't still,
But long I hope thou shalt not, 'tis but cast
Upon thee, purposely to serve another
That has more right to't, as in some Countries they convey

Their treasure upon Asses to their friends;
If mine be but so wise, and apprehensive,
As my opinion gives him to my heart,
It staves not long on thy desertless arme;
I'll make thee e'er I ha' done, not dare to wear
Anything of mine, although I give't thee freely;
Kiss it you may, and make what shew you can,
But sure you carry't to a worthier Man,
And to good morrow to you.

Sir Greg. Hu hum, ha hum;
I han't the spirit now to dash my brains out,
Nor the audacity to kill my self,
But I could cry my heart out, that's as good,
For so't be out, no matter which way it comes,
If I can dye with a fillip, or depart
At hot-cockles, What's that to any man?
If there be so much death that serves my turn there.
Every one knows the state of his own body,
No Carrion kills a Kite, but then agen
There's Cheefe will choak a Daw; time I were dead I'faith,
If I knew which way without hurt or danger.
I am a Maiden-Knight, and cannot look
Upon a naked weapon with any modesty,
Else 'twould go hard with me, and to complain
To Sir Perfidious the old Knight agen,
Were to be more abus'd; perhaps he would beat me well,
But ne'er believe me.

Enter Cuningame.

And few Men dye o' beating, that were lost too:
Oh, here's my friend, I'll make my moan to him.

Cun. I cannot tear her memory from my heart,
That treads mine down, was ever man so fool'd
That profest wit?

Sir Greg. O Cuningame?

Cun. Sir Gregory?

The choice, the Victor, the Towns happy Man?

Sir Greg. 'Snigs, What do'st mean? come I to thee for comfort, and do'st abuse me too?

Cun. Abuse you? How Sir?

With justifying your fortune, and your joyes?

Sir Greg. Pray hold your hand, Sir, I've been bob'd enough,
You come with a new way now; strike me merrily,
But when a man's sore beaten o' both sides already,
Then the least tap in jest goes to the guts on him;
Wilt ha the truth? I'm made the rankest as
That e'er was born to Lordships.

Cun. What? No Sir?

Sir Greg. I had not thought my body could a yielded
All those foul scurvie names that she has call'd me,
I wonder whence she fetcht 'em?

Cun. Is this credible?

Sir Greg. She pin'd this Scarf upon me afore her Uackle,
But his back turn'd, she curst me so for wearing on't,
The very brawn of mine arme has ak'd ever since,
Yet in a manner forc't me to wear't still,

But hop't I should not long; if good luck serve
I should meet one that has more wit and worth
Should take it from me, 'twas but lent to me,
And sent to him for a token.

Cun. I conceit it, I know the Man
That lies in wait for't, part with't by all means,
In any case, you are way-laid about it.

Sir Greg. How Sir? way-laid?

Cun. Pox of a Scarf, say I,
I prize my friends life 'bove a million on 'em,
You shall be rul'd, Sir, I know more than you.

Sir Greg. If you know more than I, let me be rid on't,
'Lafs, 'tis not for my wearing, so she told me.

Cun. No, no, give me't, the knave shall miss his purpose,
And you shall live.

Sir Greg. I would, as long as I could, Sir.

Cun. No more replies, you shall, I'll prevent this,
Pompey shall march without it.

Sir Greg. What, is't he?
My Man that was?

Cun. Call him your deadly Enemy;
You give him too fair a name, you deal too nobly,
He bears a bloody mind, a cruel foe, Sir,
I care not if he heard me.

Sir Greg. But, Do you hear, Sir?
Can't sound with reason she should affect him?

Cun. Do you talk of reason? I never thought to have heard

Such a word come from you; reason in love?
Would you give that, no Doctor could e'er give?
Has not a Deputy married his Cook-maid?
An Aldermans Widow, one that was her turn-broach?
Nay, Has not a great Lady brought her Stable
Into her Chamber: lay with her Horse-keeper?

Sir Greg. Did ever love play such Jades tricks, Sir?

Cun. Oh thousands, thousands: Beware a sturdy Clown e're while you live, Sir;
'Tis like a huswifery in most Shires about us;
You shall ha' Farmers Widows wed thin Gentlemen,
Much like your self, but put'em to no strefs;
What work can they do, with small trap-stick legs?
They keep Clowns to stop gaps, and drive in pegs,
A drudgery fit for Hindes, e'en back agen, Sir,
Your're safest at returning.

Sir Greg. Think you so, Sir?

Cun. But, How came this Clown to be call'd Pompey first?

Sir Greg. Push, one good-man Cesar, a Pump-maker ker-fen'd him;

Pompey he writes himself, but his right name's Pumpey,
And stunk too when I had him, now he's trunk.

Cun. I'm glad I know so much to quell his pride, Sir,
Walk you still that way, I'll make use of this,
To resolve all my doubts, and place this favor
On some new Mistriss, only for a try,
And if it meet my thoughts, I'll swear 'tis I. Exit.

Sir Greg. Is Pompey grown so malepert? so frampel?
The onely cutter about Ladies honors?

Enter Old Knight.

And his blade soonest out?

O.K. Now, What's the news, Sir?

Sir Gre. I dare not say but good; oh excellent good, Sir.

O.K. I hope now you're resolv'd she loves you, Knight?

Sir Gr. Cuds me, What else Sir? that's not to do now.

O.K. You would not think how desperately you anger'd
me,

When you bely'd her goodness; oh you vex't me,
Even to a Palfey.

Sir Greg. What a thing was that Sir?

Enter Neece.

Neece. 'Tis, that 'tis; as I have hope of sweetness, the Scarfe's gone;
Worthy wise friend, I doat upon thy cunning,
We two shall be well matcht, our Issue-male, sure
Will be born Counsellors; is't possible?
Thou shalt have another token out of hand for't;
Nay, since the way's found, pittie thou shouldst want,
y'faith,
O my best joy, and dearest.
O. K. Well said, Neece,
So violent 'fore your Uncle? What will you do
In secret then?

Sir Greg. Marry call me slave, and rascal.

Neece. Your Scarfe —— the Scarfe I gave you ——

O. K. Mas that's true Neece,

I ne'er thought upon that; the Scarfe she gave you —— Sir?
What dumb? No answer from you? the Scarfe?

Sir Greg. I was way-laid about it, my life threatned;
Life's life, Scarfe's but a Scarfe, and so I parted from't.

Neece. Unfortunate woman! my first favor too?

O. K. Will you be still an ass? no reconcilment

'Twixt you and wit? Are you so far fallen out,

You'l never come together? I tell you true,

I'm very lowly asham'd on you,

That's the worst shame that can be;

Thus bayting on him: now his heart's hook't in,

I'l make him, e'er I ha' done, take her with nothing,

I love a man that lives by his wits alive;

Nay leave, sweet Neece, 'tis but a Scarfe, let it go.

Neece. The going of it never grieves me, Sir.

It is the maner, the manner ——

Sir Greg. O dissembling Marmaset! If I durst speak,

Or could be believ'd when I speak,

What a tale could I tell, to make hair stand upright now?

Neece. Nay, Sir, at your request you shall perceive,
Uncle,

With what renewing love I forgive this?

Here's a fair Diamond, Sir, I'll try how long

You can keep that?

Sir Greg. Not very long, you know't too,

Like a cunning witch as you are.

Neece. Y'are best let him ha' that too.

Sir Greg. So I were, I think, there were no living else,

I thank you, as you have handled the matter.

O. K. Why this is musical now, and Tuesday next

Shall tune your Instruments, that's the day set.

Neece. A match, good Uncle.

O. K. Sir, you hear me too?

Sir Greg. Oh very well, I'm for you.

Neece. What e'er you hear, you know my mind.

Exeunt Old Knight and Neece.

Sir Gre. I, a —— on't, too well, if I do not wonder how we two shall come together, I'm a Bear whelp? he talks of Tuesday next, as familiarly, as if we lov'd one another, but 'tis as unlikely to me, as 'twas seven year before I saw her; I shall try his cunning, it may be he has a way was never yet thought on, and it had need to be such a one, for all that I can think on will never do't; I look to have this Diamond taken from me very speedily, therefore I'll take it off of my finger, for if it be seen, I shall be way-laid for that too.

Exit.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Old Knight, and Witty-pate.

O. K. OH torture! torture! thou carriest a sting i'thy tail;
Thou never brought'st good news i'thy life yet,
And that's an ill quality, leave it when thou wilt.

Witty. Why you receive a blessing the wrong way, Sir,
Call you not this good newes? to save at once Sir
Your credit and your kinsmans life together;
Would it not vex your peace, and gaul your worth?
T'have one of your name hang'd?

O. K. Peace, no such words, boy.

Wit. Be thankful for the blessing of prevention then.

O. K. Le' me see, there was none hang'd out of our house since Brute,

I ha' search't both Stow, and Hollinshead.

Wit. O Sir.

O. K. I'll see what Polychronicon sayes anon too.

Wit. 'Twas a miraculous fortune that I heard on't,

O. K. I would thou'dst never heard on't,

Wit. That's true too,

So it had ne'er been done; to see the luck on't,
He was ev'n brought to Justice Aurums threshold,
There had flew'n forth a Mittimus straight for Newgate;
And note the fortune too, Sessions a Thursday,
Jury cull'd out a Friday, Judgment a Saturday,
Dungeon a Sunday, Tyburne a Munday,
Miseries quotidian ague, when't begins once,
Every day pulls him, till he pull his last.

O. K. No more, I say, 'tis an ill theam: where left you
him?

Wit. He's i'th' Constables hands below i'th' Hall, Sir,
Poor Gentleman, and his accuser with him.

O. K. What's he?

Wit. A Judges Son 'tis thought, so much the worse too,
He'l hang his enemy, an't shall cost him nothing,
That's a great priviledge.

O. K. Within there?

Enter Servant.

Ser. Sir?

O. K. Call up the folks i'th' Hall. I had such hope on
him,

For a Scholar too, a thing thou ne'er wast fit for Therefore erected all my joyes in him;
Got a Welch Benefice in reversion for him,
Dean of Cardigan, has his grace already,
He can marry and bury, yet ne'er a hair on's face;

Enter Credulous, Sir Ruinous (as a Constable,) and Lady Gentry (as a Man.)

Like a French Vicar, and, Does he bring such fruits to Town with him?

A Thief at his first lighting? Oh good den to you.

Wit. Nay, sweet Sir, you'r so vext now, you'l grieve
him,

And hurt your self.

O. K. Away, I'll hear no counsel;
Come you but once in seven year to your Uncle,
And at that time must you be brought home too?
And by a Constable?

Wit. Oh speak low, Sir,
Remember your own credit, you profess
You love a Man o'wit, begin at home, Sir,
Exprefs it i'your self.

Lady. Nay, Master Constable,

Shew

Shew your self a wise man, 'gainst your nature too.

Ruin. Sir, no Dish-porridgment, we have brought home As good men as ye.

O. K. Out, a North-Britain Constable, that tongue Will publish all, it speaks so broad already; Are you the Gentleman.

Lady. The unfortunate one, Sir, That fell into the power of merciless Thieves, Whereof this fellow, whom I'd call your kinsman; As little as I could (for the fair reverence I owe to fame and years) was the prime villain.

O. K. A wicked prime.

Wit. Nay, not so loud, sweet father.

Lad. The rest are fled, but I shall meet with 'em, Hang one of 'em I will certain, I ha' swore it, And 'twas my luck to light upon this first.

O. K. A Cambridge man for this? these your degrees, Sir? Nine years at University for this fellowship?

Wit. Take your voice lower, dear Sir.

O. K. What's your loss, Sir?

Lady. That which offends me to repeat, the Money's whole, Sir, 'Tis i'th' Constables hands there, a seal'd hundred, But I will not receive it.

O. K. No? Not the Money, Sir, Having confest 'tis all?

Lady. 'Tis all the Money, Sir, But 'tis not all I lost, for when they bound me, They took a Diamond hung at my shirt string; Which fear of life made me forget to hide; It being the sparkling witness of a Contract, 'Twixt a great Lawyers daughter and my self.

Wit. I told you what he was; What does the Diamond Concern my Cozen, Sir?

Lady. No more did the Money; But he shall answer all now.

Wit. There's your conscience, It shewes from whence you sprung.

Lady. Sprung? I had leapt a Thief, Had I leapt some of your alliance.

Wit. Slave!

Lady. You prevent me still.

O. K. 'Slid, Son, Are you mad?

Lady. Come, come, I'll take a legal course.

O. K. Will you undo us all? What's your demand, Sir? Now we're in's danger too.

Lady. A hundred Mark, Sir, I will not bate a doit.

Witty. A hundred Rascals.

Lady. Sir, find 'em out in your own blood, and take 'em.

Wit. Go take your course, follow the Law, and spare not.

O. K. Does fury make you drunk? know you what you say?

Wit. A hundred dogs dungs, do your worst.

O. K. You do I'm sure; Whose loud now?

Wit. What his own asking?

O. K. Not in such a case?

Wit. You shall have but threescore pound; spite a your teeth,

I'll see you hang'd first.

O. K. And what's seven pound more man? That all this coyle's about? stay, I say, he shall ha't.

Wit. It is your own, you may do what you please with it;

Pardon my zeal, I would ha' sav'd you money; Give him all his own asking?

O. K. What's that to you, Sir?

Be sparing of your own, teach me to pinch In such a case as this? go, go, live by your wits, go.

Wit. I practise all I can.

O. K. Follow you me, Sir, And, Master Constable, come from the knave, And be a witness of a full recompence.

Wit. Pray stop the Constables mouth, what ere you do Sir.

O. K. Yet agen? as if I meant not to do that my self, Without your counsel? As for you, precious kinsman, Your first years fruits in Wales shall go to rack for this, You lie not in my house, I'll pack you out, And pay for your lodging rather.

Exit Knight, Ruin, and Lady.

Witty. Oh fie Cozen, These are ill courses, you a Scholar too?

Cred. I was drawn into't most unfortunately, By filthy deboult company.

Wit. I, I, I.

'Tis even the spoil of all our youth in England. What were they Gentlemen?

Cred. Faith so like some on 'em, They were ev'n the worse agen.

Wit. Hum.

Cred. Great Tobacco whiffers, They would go near to rob with a pipe in their mouths.

Wit. What, no?

Cred. Faith leave it Cozen, because my Rascals use it,

Wit. So they do meat and drink, must worthy Gentle- men.

Refrain their food for that? an honest man May eat of the same Pig some Parson dines with, A Lawyer and a fool feed of one Woodcock, Yet one ne'er the simpler, t'other ne'er the wiser; 'Tis not meat, drink, or smoak, dish, cup, or pipe, Co-operates to the making of a Knave, 'Tis the condition makes a slave, a slave, There's London Philosophy for you; I tell you Cozen, You cannot be too cautelous, nice, or dainty, In your society here, especially When you come raw from the University, Before the World has hard'ned you a little, For as a butter'd loaf is a Scholars breakfast there, So a poacht Scholar is a cheaters dinner here, I ha' known seven of 'em supt up at a Meale.

Cred. Why a poacht Scholar?

Wit. 'Cause he powres himself forth, And all his secrets, at the first acquaintance, Never so crafty to be eaten i'th' shell, But is outstript of all he has at first, And goes down glib, he's swallowed with sharp wit; Stead of Wine Vinegar.

Cred. I shall think, Cozen, O' your poacht Scholar, while I live.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Master Credulous, Your Uncle wills you to forbear the House, You must with me, I'm charg'd to see you plac'd In some new lodging about Theeving Lane, What the conceit's, I know not, but commands you To be seen here no more, till you hear further.

Cred. Here's a strange welcome, Sir.

Wit. This is the World, Cozen; When a Man's fame's once poyson'd, fare thee well Lad.

Exit Cred. and Servant.

This is the happiest cheat I e'er claim'd share in, It has a two-fold fortune, gets me coyne, And puts him out of grace, that stood between me, My fathers Cambridge Jewel, much suspected To be his Heir, now there's a bar in's hopes.

Enter Ruinous, and Lady Gentry.

Ruin. It chinks, make haste.

Lady. The Goat at Smithfield Pens.

Enter Cunningame.

Wit. Zo, zo, sufficient. Master Cunningame?
I never have ill luck when I meet a wit.

Cun. A Wit's better to meet, than to follow then,
For I ha' none so good I can commend yet,
But commonly men unfortunate to themselves,
Are luckiest to their friends, and so may I be.

Wit. I run o'er so much worth, going but in haste from you,
All my deliberate friendship cannot equal.

Cun. 'Tis but to shew, that you can place sometimes,

Enter Mirabell.

Your modesty a top of all your virtues. Exit Wit.
This Gentleman may pleasure me yet agen;
I am so haunted with this broad-brim'd hat,
Of the last progress block, with the young hat-band,
Made for a sucking Devil of two years old,
I know not where to turn my self.

Mir. Sir?

Cun. More torture?

Mir. 'Tis rumor'd that you love me.

Cun. A my troth Gentlewoman,
Rumor's as false a knave as ever pist then,
Pray tell him so from me; I cannot fain
With a sweet Gentlewoman, I must deal down right.

Mir. I heard, though you dissembled with my Aunt, Sir,
And that makes me more confident.

Cun. There's no falsehood,
But payes us our own some way, I confess
I fain'd with her, 'twas for a weightier purpose,
But not with thee, I swear.

Mir. Nor I with you then,
Although my Aunt enjoyn'd me to dissemble,
To right her splene, I love you faithfully.

Cun. Light, this is worse than 'twas.

Mir. I find such worth in you,
I cannot, nay I dare not dally with you,
For fear the flame consume me.

Cun. Here's fresh trouble,
T'is drives me to my conscience, for 'tis foul
To injure one that deals directly with me.

Mir. I crave but such a truth from your love, Sir,
As mine brings you, and that's proportionable.

Cun. A good Geometrician, shrew my heart;
Why are you out o' your wits, pretty plump Gentlewo-
man,

You talk so desperately? 'tis a great happiness,
Love has made one on's wiser than another,
We should be both cast away else;

Yet I love gratitude, I must requite you,
I shall be sick else, but to give you me,
A thing you must not take, if you mean to live,
For a' my troth I hardly can my self;

No wise Physitian will prescribe me for you.
Alas, your state is weak, you had need of Cordials,
Some rich Electuary, made of a Son an Heir,
An elder brother, in a Cullisse, whole,
'T must be some wealthy Gregory, boyl'd to a Jelly,
That must restore you to the state of new Gowns,
French Ruffs, and mutable head-tires,

Mir. But, Where is he, Sir?
One that's so rich will ne'er wed me with nothing.

Cun. Then see thy Conscience, and thy wit together,
Would'st thou have me then, that has nothing neither?
What say you to Pop Gregory the first, yonder?

Will you acknowledge your time amply recompenc'd?
Full satisfaction upon loves record?
Without any more suit, if I combine you?

Mir. Yes, by this honest kiss.

Cun. You're a wise Clyent,
To pay your fee before-hand, but all do so,
You know the worst already, that's the best too.

Mir. I know he's a fool,

Cun. You'r shrewdly hurt then;
This is your comfort, your great wisest Women
Pick their first Husband still out of that house,
And some will have 'em to chuse, if they bury twenty.

Mir. I'm of their minds, that like him for a Husband,
To run youths race with, 'tis very pleasant,
But when I'm old, I'd alwayes wish for a wifer.

Cun. You may have me by that time:
For this first business,
Rest upon my performance.

Mir. With all thankfulness.

Cun. I have a project you must aid me in too.

Mir. You bind me to all lawful action, Sir,

Cun. Pray wear this Scarf about you;

Mir. I conjecture now —

Cun. There's a Court Principle for't, one office must help another;

As for example, for your cast o' Manchits out o'th' Pantry,
I'll allow you a Goose out o'th' Kitchin.

Mir. 'Tis very sociably done, Sir, farewell performance,
I shall be bold to call you so.

Cun. Do, sweet confidence,

Enter Sir Gregory.

If I can match my two broad brim'd hats;
'Tis he, I know the Maggot by his head;
Now shall I learn newes of him, my precious chief.

Sir Greg. I have been seeking for you i'th' bowling-
Green,

Enquir'd at Nettletons, and Antonies Ordinary,
T'ha's vext me to the heart, look, I've a Diamond here,
And it cannot find a Master.

Cun. No? That's hard y'faith.

Sir Greg. It does belong to some body, a — on him,
I would he had it, do's but trouble me,
And she that sent it, is so waspish too,
There's no returning to her till't be gone.

Cun. Oh, ho, ah sirrah, are you come?

Sir Greg. What's that friend?

Cun. Do you note that corner sparkle?

Sir Greg. Which? which? which Sir?

Cun. At the West end o'th' Coller.

Sir Greg. Oh I see't now.

Cun. 'Tis an apparent mark; this is the stone, Sir,
That so much blood is threatned to be shed for.

Sir Greg. I pray.

Cun. A tun at least.

Sir Greg. They must not find't i'me then, they must Goe where 'tis to be had.

Cun. 'Tis well it came to my hands first, Sir Gregory,
I know where this must go.

Sir Greg. Am I discharg'd on't?

Cun. My life for yours now. Draws.

Sir Greg. What now?

Cun. 'Tis discretion, Sir,
I'll stand upon my Guard all the while I ha't.

Sir Greg. 'Troth thou tak'st too much danger on thee still,

To preserve me alive.

Cun. 'Tis a friends duty, Sir,

Nay, by a toy that I have late thought upon,
I'll undertake to get your Mistress for you.

Sir Greg. Thou wilt not? Wilt?

Cun. Contract her by a trick, Sir,
When she least thinks on't.

Sir Greg. There's the right way to't,
For if she think on't once, shee'l never do't.

Cun. She does abuse you still then?

Sir Greg. A — damnably,

Everytime worse than other; yet her Uncle
Thinks the day holds a Tuesday; say it did, Sir,
She's so familiarly us'd to call me Rascal,
She'll quite forget to wed me by my own name,
And then that Marriage cannot hold in Law, you know.

Cun. Will you leave all to me?

Sir Greg. Who should I leave it to?
Cun. 'Tis our luck to love Neecces; I love a Neecc too.
Sir Greg. I would you did y'faith.
Cun. But mine's a kind wretch.
Sir Greg. I marry Sir, I would mine were so too.
Cun. No rascal comes in her mouth.
Sir Greg. Troth, and mine has little else in hers.
Cun. Mine sends me tokens,
 All the World knows not on.
Sir Greg. Mine gives me tokens too, very fine tokens,
 But I dare not wear 'em.
Cun. Mine's kind in secret.
Sir Greg. And there mine's a hell-cat.
Cun. We have a day fet too.
Sir Greg. 'Slid, so have we man,
 But there's no sign of ever coming together.
Cun. I'll tell thee who 'tis, the old womans Neece.
Sir Greg. Is't she?
Cun. I would your luck had been no worfe for mildnefs;
 But mum, no more words on't to your Lady,
Sir Greg. Foh!
Cun. No blabbing, as you love me.
Sir Greg. None of our blood
 Were ever bablers
Cun. Prethee convey this Letter to her,
 But at any hand let not your Mistrifs see't.
Sir Greg. Yet agen Sir?
Cun. There's a Jewel in't,
 The very art would make her doat upon't.
Sir Greg. Say you so?
 And she shall see't for that trick only.
Cun. Remember but your Mistrifs, and all's well.
Sir Greg. Nay, if I do not, hang me. Exit.
Cun. I believe you;
 This is the onely way, to return a token,
 I know he will do't now, 'cause he's charg'd to'th' contrary.
 He's the nearest kin to a Woman, of a thing
 Made without substance, that a man can find agen,
 Some Petticoat begot him, I'll be whipt else,
 Engendring with an old pair of paund hose,
 Lying in some hot chamber o'er the Kitchin:
 Very steame bred him,
 He never came where Rem in Re e'er grew;
 The generation of a hundred such
 Cannot make a man stand in a white sheet,
 For 'tis no act in Law, nor can a Constable
 Pick out a bawdy business for Bridewell in't;

Enter Clown (as a Gallant.)

A lamentable case, he's got with a Mans Urine, like a Mandrake.
 How now? hah? What prodigious bravery's this?
 A most preposterous Gallant, the Doublet sits
 As if it mock't the breeches.
Clow. Save you, Sir,
Cun. H'as put his tongue in the fine suit of words too.
Clow. How does the party?
Cun. Takes me for a Scrivener. Which of the parties?
Clow. Hum, simplicity betide thee —
 I would fain hear of the party; I would be loath to go Farther with her; honor is not a thing to be dallied with-
 all,
 No more is reputation, nor honor fame, I take it, I must not
 Have her wrong'd when I'm abroad; my party is not To be compell'd with any party in an oblique way;
 'Tis very dangerous to deal with Women;
 May prove a Lady too, but shall be nameless,
 I'll bite my tongue out, e'er it prove a Traitor.
Cun. Upon my life I know her.
Clow. Not by me,
 Know what you can, talk a whole day with me,

Y'are ne'er the wifer, she comes not from these lips.
Cun. The old Knights Neece.
Clow. 'Slid he has got her, pox of his heart that told
 him,
 Can nothing be kept secret? let me entreat you
 To use her name as little as you can, though.
Cun. 'Twill be small pleasure, Sir, to use her name.
Clow. I had intelligence in my solemn walks,
 'Twixt Paddington and Panridge, of a Scarfe,
 Sent for a token, and a Jewel follow'd,
 But I acknowledge not the receipt of any,
 How e'er 'tis carried, believe me, Sir,
 Upon my reputation I receiv'd none.
Cun. What, neither Scarfe nor Jewel?
Clow. 'Twould be seen
 Some where about me, you may well think that,
 I have an arme for a Scarfe, as others have,
 An Ear, to hang a Jewel too, and that's more
 Then some men have, my betters a great deal,
 I must have restitution, where e'er it lights.
Cun. And reason good.
Clow. For all these tokens, Sir,
 Pass i' my name.
Cun. It cannot otherwise be.
Clow. Sent to a worthy friend.
Cun. I, that's to thee.
Clow. I'm wrong'd under that title.
Cun. I dare sware thou art,
 'Tis nothing but Sir Gregories circumvention,
 His envious spite, when thou'rt at Paddington,
 He meets the gifts at Panridge.
Clow. Ah false Knight?
 False both to honor, and the Law of Arms?
Cun. What wilt thou say if I be reveng'd for thee?
 Thou sit as Witness?
Clow. I should laugh in state then.
Cun. I'll fob him, here's my hand.
Clow. I shall be as glad as any Man alive, to see him well fob'd, Sir; but now you talk of fobbing, I wonder the Lady sends not for me according to promise? I ha' kept out o' Town these two dayes, a purpose to be sent for; I am almost starv'd with walking.
Cun. Walking gets men a stomach.
Clow. 'Tis most true, Sir, I may speak it by experience, for I ha' got a stomach six times, and lost it agen, as often as a traveller from Chelisy shall lose the sight of Pauls, and get it agen.
Cun. Go to her, Man.
Clow. Not for a Million, enfringe my oath? there's a toy call'd a Vow, has past between us, a poor trifle, Sir; Pray do me the part and office of a Gentleman, if you chance to meet a Footman by the way, in Orange tawny ribbands, running before an empty Coach, with a Buzard i'th' Poop on't, direct him and his horses toward the new River by Islington, there they shall have me looking upon the Pipes, and whistling. Exit. Clow.
Cun. A very good note; this love makes us all Monkeyes,
 But to my work: 'Scarfe first? and now a Diamond? these should be sure signs of her affections truth;
 Yet I'll go forward with my surer proof. Exit.

Enter Neece, and Sir Gregory.

Neece. Is't possible?
Sir Greg. Nay, here's his Letter too, there's a fine Jewel in't,
 Therefore I brought it to you.
Neece. You tedious Mongril! Is't not enough
 To grace thee, to receive this from thy hand,
 A thing which makes me almost sick to do,
 But you must talk too?
Sir Greg. I ha' done.
Neece. Fall back,
 Yet backer, backer yet, you unmannerly puppy,

Do you not see I'm going about to read it?

Sir Greg. Nay, these are golden dayes, now I stay by't, She was wont not to endure me in her sight at all, The World mends, I see that.

Neece. What an ambiguous Superſcription's here? To the best of Neece's. Why that title may be mine, And more than her's:

Sure I much wrong the neatness of his art; 'Tis certain sent to me, and to require My cunning in the carriage of my Tokens, Us'd the same Fop for his.

Sir Greg. She nodded now to me, 'twill come in time.

Neece. What's here? an entire Rubye, cut into a heart, And this the word, Istud Amoris opus?

Sir Greg. Yes, yes, I have heard him say, that love is the best stone-cutter.

Neece. Why thou sawcy issue of some travelling Sow-gelder, What makes love in thy mouth? Is it a thing That ever will concern thee? I do wonder How thou dar'st think on't? hast thou ever hope To come i' the same roome where lovers are; And scape unbrain'd with one of their velvet slippers?

Sir Greg. Love tricks break out I see, and you talk of slippers once,

'Tis not far off to bed time.

Neece. Is it possible thou canst laugh yet? I would ha' undertook to ha' kill'd a spider With less venome far, than I have spit at thee.

Sir Greg. You must conceive,

A Knight's another manner a piece of flesh.

Neece. Back, Owles-face.

Within. O. K. Do, do.

Neece. 'Tis my Unckles voice, that.

Why keep you so far off, Sir Gregory?

Are you afraid, Sir, to come near your Mistrifs?

Sir Greg. Is the proud heart come down? I lookt for this still.

Neece. He comes not this way yet: Away, you dog-whelp,

Would you offer to come near me, though I said so? I'll make you understand my mind in time; You run in greedily, like a hound to his breakfast, That chops in head and all to beguile his fellows; I'm to be eaten, Sir, with Grace and leisure, Behaviour and discourse, things that ne'er trouble you; After I have pelted you sufficiently, I tro you will learn more manners.

Sir Greg. I'm wondring still when we two shall come together?

Tuesday's at hand, but I'm as far off, as I was at first, I swear.

Enter Gardians.

Gard. Now Cuningame, I'll be reveng'd at large: Lady, what was but all this while suspicion, Is truth, full blown now, my Neece wears your Scarfe.

Neece. Hah?

Gard. Do but follow me, I'll place you instantly Where you shall see her courted by Cuningame.

Neece. I go with greediness; we long for things That break our hearts sometimes, there's pleasures misery, (Exeunt Neece and Gard.)

Sir Greg. Where are those gad-flies going? to some Junktet now;

That some old bumble-bee toles the young one forth To sweet meats after kind, let 'em look to't, The thing you wot on be not mist or gone, I bring a Maiden-head, and I look for one.

Which is only a Puppet so drest.

Exit.

Enter Cuningame (in discourse with a Mask'd Gentlewoman in a broad hat, and scarf'd,) Neece at another door.

Cun. Yes, yes.

Neece. Too manifest now, the Scarfe and all.

Cun. It cannot be, you're such a fearful soul.

Neece. I'll give her cause of fear e'er I part from her.

Cun. Will you say so? Is't not your Aunts desire too?

Neece. What a dissembling croane's that? she'll forswear't now.

Cun. I see my project takes, yonder's the grace on't.

Neece. Who would put confidence in wit again, I'm plagu'd for my ambition, to desire A wife Man for a husband, and I see Fate will not have us go beyond our stint, We are allow'd but one dish, and that's Woodcock, It keeps up wit to make us friends and servants of, And thinks any thing's good enough to make us husbands; Oh that Whores hat o' thine, o' the riding block, A shade for lecherous kisses.

Cun. Make you doubt on't? is not my love of force?

Neece. Yes, me it forces

To tear that forcerous strumpet from th' imbraces.

Cun. Lady?

Neece. Oh thou hast wrong'd the exquisit'st love—

Cun. What mean you, Lady?

Neece. Mine, you'll answer for't.

Cun. Alas, What seek you?

Neece. Sir, mine own with loss.

Cun. You shall.

Neece. I never made so hard a bargain.

Cun. Sweet Lady?

Neece. Unjust man, let my wrath reach her, As you owe virtue duty; (Cun. falls on purpose.)

Your cause trips you, Now Minion, you shall feel what loves rage is, Before you taste the pleasure; smile you false, Sir?

Cun. How can I chuse? to see what pains you take, Upon a thing will never thank you for't.

Neece. How?

Cun. See what things you women be, Lady, When cloaths are taken for the best part of you? This was to show you, when you think I love you not, How y'are deceiv'd still, there the Moral lies, 'Twas a trap set to catch you, and the only bait To take a Lady nibbling, is fine clothes; Now I dare boldly thank you for your love, I'm pretty well resolv'd in't by this fit, For a jealous ague alwayes ushers it.

Neece. Now blessings still maintain this wit of thine, And I have an excellent fortune coming in thee, Bring nothing else I charge thee.

Cun. Not a groat I warrant ye.

Neece. Thou shalt be worthily welcome, take my faith for't, Next opportunity shall make us.

Cun. The old Gentlewoman has fool'd her revenge sweetly.

Neece. 'Lafs, 'tis her part, she knows her place so well yonder;

Alwayes when Women jumpe upon threescore, Love shoves e'm from the chamber to the door.

Cun. Thou art a precious she-wit.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Cunningame (at one door) Witty-Pate, Ruinous,
L. Ruinous, and Priscian (at the other.)

Cun. Friend, met in the harvest of our designs,
Not a thought but's busie.

Wit. I knew it Man,

And that made me provide these needful Reapers,
Hooks, Rakers, Gleaners; we'll sing it home
With a melodious Horne-pipe; this is the Bond,
That as we further in your great affair,
You'll suffer us to glean, pick up for crums,
And if we snatch a handful from the sheaf,
You will not look a churle on's.

Cun. Friend, we'll share
The sheaves of gold, only the Love Aker
Shall be peculiar.

Wit. Much good do you, Sir,
Away, you know your way, and your stay; get you
The Musick ready, while we prepare the dancers.

Ruin. We are a consort of our selves.

Pris. And can strike up lustily.

Wit. You must bring Sir Fop.

Cun. That's perfect enough.

Ruin. Bring all the Fops you can, the more, the better fare

So the proverb runs backwards. Exeunt Ruin. and Pris.

L. Ruin. I'll bring the Ladies.

Wit. Do so first, and then the Fops will follow;
I must to my Father, he must make one. Exit.

Enter two Servants with a Banquet.

Cun. While I dispatch a business with the Knight,
And I go with you. Well fed, I thank you,
This small Banquet will furnish our few Guests
With taste and state enough; one reach my Gown.
The action craves it rather than the weather.

1 Serv. There's one stays to speak with you, Sir.

Cun. What is he?

1 Serv. Faith I know not what, Sir, a Fool, I think,
That some Brokers shop has made half a Gentleman;
Has the name of a Worthy too.

Cun. Pompey? Is't not?

1 Serv. That's he, Sir.

Cun. Alas, poor fellow, prethee enter him, he will need too.

Enter second Servant with a Gown.

He shall serve for a Witness. Oh Gramercy:
If my friend Sir Gregory comes, you know him,

Enter Clown.

Entertain him kindly. Oh Master Pompey, How is't man?

Clow. 'Snails, I'm almost starv'd with Love, and cold, and one thing or other;

Has not my Lady sent for me yet?

Cun. Not that I hear, sure some unfriendly Messenger
Is employ'd betwixt you,

Clow. I was ne'er so cold in my life, in my Conscience I have been seven mile in length; along the New River; I have seen a hundred-stickle bags; I do not think but there's gudgeons too; 'twill ne'er be a true water.

Cun. Why think you so?

Clow. I warrant you, I told a thousand Millers thumbs in it,
I'll make a little bold with your Sweet-meats.

Cun. And welcome Pompey.

Clow. 'Tis a strange thing, I have no taste in any thing.

Cun. Oh, that's Love, that distasts any thing but it self.

Clow. 'Tis worse than Cheese in that point, may not a Man break his word with a Lady? I could find in my heart and my hose too.

Cun. By no means, Sir, that breaks all the Laws of Love.

Clow. Well, I'll ne'er pass my word without my deed to
A Lady, while I live agen, I would fain recover my taste.

Cun. Well, I have news to tell you.

Clow. Good news, Sir?

Cun. Happy news, I help you away with a Rival your Master bestow'd.

Clow. Where, for this Plumbs sake —

Cun. Nay, listen me.

Clow. I warrant you, Sir, I have two ears to one mouth,
I hear more than I cat, I'de ne'er row by Queen Hive
While I liv'd else.

Cun. I have a Wife for him, and thou shalt witness the Contract.

Clow. The old one I hope, 'tis not the Lady?

Cun. Choak him first, 'tis one which thou shalt see,
See him, see him deceiv'd, see the deceit, only
The injunction is, you shall smile with modesty.

Clow. I'll simper I'faith, as cold as I am yet, the old one
I hope.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Sir, here's Sir Gregory.

Cun. Up'd so, shelter, shelter, if you be seen,
All's ravell'd out again; stand there private,
And you'll find the very opportunity
To call you forth, and place you at the Table.

Enter Sir Gregory.

You are welcome, Sir, this Banquet will serve,
When it is crown'd with such a dainty as you Expect, and must have.

Sir Greg. 'Tush, these sweet-meats are but fauce to that,
Well, if there be any honesty, or true word in a dream,
She's mine own, nay, and chang'd extremly,
Not the same Woman.

Cun. Who, not the Lady?

Sir Greg. No, not to me, the edge of her tongue is taken off,

Gives me very good words, turn'd up-side-down to me,
And we live as quietly as two Tortoisés, if she hold on,
As she began in my dream. Soft Musick;

Cun. Nay, if Love send forth such Predictions,
You are bound to believe 'em, there's the watch-word
Of her coming; to your practis'd part now,
If you hit it, Æquus Cupido nobis.

Both go into the Gown.

Sir Greg. I will warrant you, Sir, I will give armes to Your Gentry, look you forward to your business,
I am an eye behind you, place her in that Chair,
And let me alone to grope her out.

Enter Mirabell.

Cun. Silence, Lady, your sweet presence illustrates
This homely roof, and, as course entertainment;
But where affections are both Host and Guest,
They cannot meet unkindly; please you sit,
Your something long stay made me unmannerly,
To place before you, you know this friend here,
He's my Guest, and more especially,
That this our meeting might not be too single,

Without

Without a witness to't.

Mirab. I came not unresolv'd, Sir,
And when our hands are clasp'd in that firm faith
Which I expect from you; fame shall be bold
'To speak the loudest on't: oh you grasp me
Somewhat too hard friend.

Cun. That's Loves eager will,
I'll touch it gentlier.

Kisses her hand.

Mirab. That's too low in you,
Lest it be doubly recompenc'd in me. She kisses his hand.

Clow. Puh, I must stop my mouth, I shall be choakt else.

Cun. Come, we'll not play and trifle with delays,
We met to joyn these hands, and willingly
I cannot leave it till confirmation.

Mirab. One word first, how does your friend, kind Sir Gregory?

Cun. Why do you mention him? you love him not?

Mir. I shall love you the less if you say so, Sir,
In troth I love him, but 'tis you deceive him,
This flattering hand of yours does rob him now,
Now you steal his right from him, and I know
I shall have hate for't, his hate extreemly.

Cun. Why I thought you had not come so weakly arm'd,

Upon my life the Knight will love you for't,
Exceedingly love you, for ever love you.

Mir. I, you'll persuade me so.

Cun. Why he's my friend,
And wishes me a fortune equal with him,
I know, and dare speak it for him.

Mir. Oh, this hand betrayes him, you might remember him in some courtesie yet at least.

Cun. I thank your help in't, here's to his health
Where e'er he be.

Mir. I'll pledge it, were it against my health.

Clow. Oh, oh, my heart hops after twelve mile a day, upon a good return, now could I walk three hundred mile a foot, and laugh forwards and backwards.

Mir. You'll take the Knights health, Sir,

Clow. Yes, yes forsooth, oh my sides! such a Banquet once a week, would make me grow fat in a fortnight.

Cun. Well, now to close our meeting, with the close
Of mutual hands and hearts, thus I begin,

Here in Heavens eye, and all loves sacred powers,
(Which in my Prayers stand propitious)

I knit this holy hand fast, and with this hand
The heart that owes this hand, ever binding.

By force of this initiating Contract
Both heart and hand in love, faith, loyalty,
Estate, or what to them belongs, in all the dues,
Rights and honors of a faithful husband,
And this firm vow, henceforth till death, to stand
Irrevocable, seal'd both with heart and hand.

Mir. Which thus I second, but oh, Sir Gregory.

Cun. Agen? this interposition's ill, believe me.

Mir. Here, in Heavens eye, and all Loves sacred powers,
I knit this holy hand fast, and with this hand
The heart that owes this hand, ever binding
Both heart and hand in love, honor, loyalty,
Estate, or what to them belongs in all the dues,
Rights, and duties of a true faithful Wife;
And this firm Vow, henceforth till death, to stand,
Irrevocable, seal'd both with heart and hand.

Sir Greg. A full agreement on both parts.

Cun. I, here's witness of that.

Sir Greg. Nay, I have over-reacht you Lady, and that's much,
For any Knight in England to over-reach a Lady.

Mir. I rejoyce in my deceit, I am a Lady
Now, I thank you, Sir.

Clow. Good morrow Lady Fop.

Sir Greg. 'Snails, I'm gull'd, made a worshipful ass, this is not my Lady.

Cun. But it is Sir, and true as your dream told you,

That your Lady was become another Woman.

Sir Greg. I'll have another Lady, Sir, if there were no more Ladies in London, blind-man buff is an unlawful Game.

Cun. Come, down on your knees first, and thank your Stars.

Sir Greg. A fire of my stars, I may thank you, I think.

Cun. So you may pray for me, and honor me,
That have preserv'd you from a lasting torment,
For a perpetual comfort; Did you call me friend?

Sir Greg. I pray pardon me for that, I did miscall you, I confess.

Cun. And should I, receiving such a thankful name,
Abuse it in the act? Should I see my friend

Basted, disgrac'd, without any reverence
To your title, to be call'd slave, rascal?

Nay curst to your face, fool'd, scorn'd, beaten down
With a womans peevish hate, yet I should stand
And suffer you to be lost, cast away?

I would have seen you buried quick first,
Your spurs of Knighthood to have wanted rowels,
And to be kickt from your heels; slave, rascal?

Hear this Tongue?

Mir. My dearest Love, sweet Knight, my Lord, my Husband.

Cun. So, this is not slave, and rascall then.

Mir. What shall your eye command, but shall be done,
In all the duties of a loyal Wife?

Cun. Good, good, are not curses fitter for you? wer't not better

Your head were broke with the handle of a fan,
Or your nose bor'd with a silver bodkin?

Mir. Why, I will be a servant in your Lady.

Cun. 'Pox, but you shall not, she's too good for you,
This contract shall be a nullity, I'll break't off,
And see you better bestow'd.

Sir Greg. 'Slid, but you shall not, Sir, she's mine own, and I am hers, and we are one anothers lawfully, and let me see him that will take her away by the Civil Law: if you be my friend, keep you so, if you have done me a good turn, do not hit me i'th' teeth with't, that's not the part of a friend.

Cun. If you be content——

Sir Greg. Content? I was never in better contention in my life.

I'll not change her for both the Exchanges, New or the Old;
Come, kiss me boldly.

Clow. Give you joy, Sir.

Sir Greg. Oh Sir, I thank you as much as though I did, you are below'd of Ladies, you see we are glad of under-
women.

Clow. Ladies? let not Ladies be disgrac'd, you are as it were a Married Man, and have a family, and for the parties sake that was unnam'd before, being Pese-cod time, I am pleas'd, yet I would wish you make a Ruler of your Tongue.

Cun. Nay, no dissention here, I must bar that,
And this (friend) I entreat you, and be advis'd,
Let this private contract be yet conceal'd,
And still support a seeming face of love
Unto the Lady; mark how it avails you,
And quits all her scorns, her Unckle is now hot
In pursuit of the match, and will enforce her,
Bend her proud stomach, that she shall proffer
Her self to you, which when you have flouted,
And laught your fill at, you shall scorn her off,
With all your disgraces trebled upon her,
For there the pride of all her heart will bow,
When you shall foot her from you, not she you.

Sir Greg. Good I'faith; I'll continue it, I'd fain laugh at the old fellow too, for he has abus'd me as scurvily as his Neece, my Knight-hoods upon the spur, we'll go to Bed, and then to Church as fast as we can.

Exit Sir Greg. and Mirab.

Clow. I

Clow. I do wonder I do not hear of the Lady yet.

Cun. The good minute may come sooner than you are aware of,

I do not think but 'twill e'r night yet, as near as 'tis.

Clow. Well, I will go walk by the New River, in that meditation, I am o'er shoes, I'm sure upon the drie bank, this gullery of my Master will keep me company this two hours too, if love were not an enemy to laughter, I should drive away the time well enough; you know my walk, Sir, if she sends, I shall be found angling, for I will try what I can catch for luck sake, I will fish fair for't,

Oh Knight, that thou shouldst be gull'd so; ha, ha, it does me good at heart,

But oh Lady, thou tak'st down my merry part. Exit.

Enter Witty-pate.

Witty. Friend.

Cun. Here friend.

Witty. Alls afoot, and will goe smooth away, The woman has conquer'd the women, they are gone, Which I have already complain'd to my Father, Suggesting that Sir Gregory is fall'n off From his charge, for neglects and ill usage, And that he is most violently bent On Gentries wife (whom I have call'd a widow) And that without most sudden prevention He will be married to her.

Cun. All this is wrong, This wings his punishment, and will be before me; I am lost for ever.

Witty. No, stay, you shall not go But with my Father, on my wit let it lie, You shall appear a friendly assistant, To help in all affairs, and in execution Help your self only.

Cun. Would my belief Were strong in this assurance.

Witty. You shall credit it, And my wit shall be your slave, if it deceive you.

Enter Old Knight.

My Father ——

Old K. Oh Sir? you are well met, where's the Knight your friend?

Cun. Sir, I think your Son has told you.

Witty. Shall I stand to tell't agen? I tell you he loves, But not my Kinswoman, her base usage, And your slack performance which he accuses most Indeed, has turn'd the Knights heart upside down.

Old K. I'll curb her for't, can he be but recover'd, He shall have her, and she shall be dutiful, And love him as a Wife too.

Witty. With that condition, Sir, I dare recall him where he enter'd the Church, So much interest of love I assure in him.

Old K. Sir, it shall be no loss to you if you do.

Witty. I, but these are words still, will not the deeds Be wanting at the recovery, if it should be agen;

Old K. Why here fool, I am provided, five hunder'd in earnest, Of the thousands in her Dower, but were they married once,

I'd cut him short enough, that's my agreement.

Witty. I, now I perceive some purpose in you, Father..

Old K. But wherefore is she then stol'n out of doors to him?

Witty. To him? oh fie upon your error, she has another object, believe it, Sir.

Old K. I never could perceive it.

Cun. I did Sir, and to her shame I should speak it, To my own sorrow I saw it, dalliance, Nay, dotage with a very Clown, a Fool.

Old K. Wit and wantons? nothing else? nothing else? She love a fool? she'll sooner make a fool Of a wife man.

Cun. I, my friend complains so, Sir Gregory lays flatly, she makes a fool of him, And these bold circumstances are approv'd: Favours have been sent by him, yet he ignorant: Whither to carry 'em; they have been understood, And taken from him, certain, Sir, there is An unsuspected fellow lies conceal'd, What, or where e'er he is, these slight neglects Could not be of a Knight else.

Old K. Well Sir, you have promis'd (if we recover him Unmarried) to salve all these old bruises?

Cun. I'll do my best, Sir.

Old K. I shall thank you, costly Sir, and kindly too.

Witty. Will you talk away the time here, Sir, and come behind all your purposes?

Old K. Away good Sir.

Witty. Then stay a little, good Sir, for my advice, Why, Father are you broke? your wit beggar'd; Or are you at your wits end? or out of Love with wit? no trick of wit to surprize Those designs, but with open Hue and Cry, For all the world to talk on, this is strange, You were not wont to stubber a project so.

Old K. Can you help at a pinch now? shew your self? My Son, go too, I leave this to your wit, Because I'll make a proof on't.

Witty. 'Tis thus then, I have had late intelligence, they are now Buckfom as Bacchus Froes, revelling, dancing, Telling the Musicks numbers with their feet, Awaiting the meeting of permonish'd friends, That's questionless, little dreading you, Now Sir, with a dexterous trick indeed, suddain And sufficient were well, to enter on um As something like the abstract of a Masque; What though few persons? if best for our purpose That commends the project.

Old K. This takes up time.

Witty. Not at all, I can presently furnish With loose disguises that shall fit that Scene.

Old K. Why what wants then?

Witty. Nothing but charge of Musick, That must be paid, you know.

Old K. That shall be my charges, I'll pay the Musick. What e'er it cost.

Witty. And that shall be all your charge, Now on, I like it, there will be wit in't Father.

Exit Old K. and Witty.

Cun. I will neither distrust his wit nor friendship, Yet if his Master brain should be o'er-thrown My resolution now shall seize mine own. Exit.

Enter Necce, Lady Ruinous, Guardianess, Ruinous, Priscian, (with instruments masqu'd.)

L. Rui. Nay, let's have Musick, let that sweet breath at least

Give us her airy welcome, 'twill be the best I fear this ruin'd receptacle will yield, But that most freely.

Nee. My welcome follows me, Else I am ill, come hither, you assure me Still Mr. Cunningame will be here, and that it was His kind entreaty that wish'd me meet him.

L. Rui. Else let me be that shame unto my Sex; That all belief may flie um.

Nee. Continue still The Knights name unto my Guardianess, She expects no other.

Ruin. He will, he will, assure you Lady, Sir Gregory will be here, and suddainly

B b b

This

This Musick fore-ran him, is't not so comforts?

Ruin. Yes Lady, he stays on some device to bring along
Such a labour he was busie in, some witty device.

Nee. 'Till be long e'r he comes then, for wits a great Labour to him.

Guard. Well, well, you'll agree better one day.

Nee. Scarce two I think.

Guard. Such a mock-beggar suit of cloaths as led me
Into the fools pair-of-Dice, with Dewze Ace,
He that would make me Mistress Cun, Cun, Cunnie,
He's quite out of my mind, but I shall ne'er
Forget him, while I have a hole in my head;
Such a one I think would please you better,
Though he did abuse you.

Ruin. Fye, speak well of him now,
Your Neece has quitted him.

Guard. I hope she has,
Else she loses me for ever; but for Sir Gregory.
Would he were come, I shall i'll answer this Unto your Uncle else.

Nee. You know 'tis his pleasure
I should keep him company.

Guard. I, and should be your own
If you did well too: Lord, I do wonder
At the niceness of you Ladies now a days,
They must have Husbands with so much wit forsooth.
Worship and wealth were both wont to be
In better request I'm sure, I cannot tell,
But they get ne'er the wiser children that I see.

L. Ruin. La, la, la, la, Sol, this Musick breaths in vain;
Methinks 'tis dull to let it move alone,
Let's have a female motion, 'tis in private,
And we'll grace't our selves, however it deserves.

Nee. What say you Guardianes?

Guard. 'Las I'm weary with the walk,
My jaunting days are done.

L. Ru. Come, come, we'll fetch her in by course, or else
She shall pay the Musick.

Guard. Nay, I'll have a little for my money then.

They Dance, a Cornet is winded.

L. Ru. Hark? upon my life the Knight; 'tis your friend,
This was the warning-piece of his approach.

Enter Old Knight, Witty-pate, Cunningame, Masqu'd, and take them to Dance.

L. Ru. Ha? no words but mum? well then,
We shall need no counsel-keeping

Nee. Cunningam?

Cun. Yes, fear nothing.

Nee. Fear? why do you tell me of it?

Cun. Your Uncles here.

Nee. Aye me.

Cun. Peace.

Old K. We have caught 'em.

Witty. Thank my wit Father.

Guard. Which is the Knight think you?

Nee. I know not, he will be found when he speaks,
No Masque can disguise his tongue.

Witty. Are you charg'd?

Old K. Are you awake?

Witty. I'm answer'd in a question.

Cun. Next change we meet, we lose our hands no more.

Nee. Are you prepar'd to tye 'em?

Cun. Yes,

You must go with me.

Guard. Whither Sir? not from my charge believe me.

Cun. She goes along.

Nee. Will you venture and my Uncle here?

Cun. His stay's prepar'd for!

Guard. 'Tis the Knight sure, I'll follow.

Exit Cun. Nee. Guard.

Old K. How now, the Musick tir'd before us?

Ruin. Yes Sir, we must be paid now.

Witty. Oh that's my charge, Father.

Old K. But stay, where are our wanton Ladies gone?
Son, where are they?

Witty. Only chang'd the room in a change, that's all sure.

Old K. I'll make 'em all sure else, and then return to you.

Ruin. You must pay for your Musick first, Sir.

Old K. Must? are there musty Fidlers? are Beggars choosers now?

Ha? why Witty-pate, Son, where am I?

Witty. You were dancing e'en now, in good measure,
Sir,

Is your health miscarried since? what ail you, Sir?

Old K. Death, I may be gull'd to my face, where's my Neece?

What are you?

L. Ru. None of your Neece, Sir?

Old K. How now? have you loud instruments too? I'll hear

No more, I thank you; what have I done tro
To bring these fears about me? Son, where am I?

Witty. Not where you should be, Sir, you shall be paying

For your Musick, and you are in a maze.

Old K. Oh, is't so, put up, put up, I pray you,
Here's a crown for you.

L. Ruin. Pish, a crown?

Ruin. Prif. Ha, ha, ha, a crown?

Old K. Which way do you laugh? I have seen a crown
Has made a Consort laugh heartily.

Witty. Father,

To tell you truth, these are no ordinary
Musicians, they expect a bounty
Above their punctual desert.

Old K. A — on your Punks, and their deserts too.
Am I not cheated all this while think you?

Is not your pate in this?

Witty. If you be cheated,
You are not to be indicted for your own goods,
Here you trifle time to market your bounty
And make it base, when it must needs be free
For ought I can perceive.

Old K. Will you know the lowest price, Sir?

Witty. That I will Sir, with all my heart.

Old K. Unless I was discover'd, and they now fled
Home agen for fear, I am absolutely beguil'd,
That's the best can be hop'd for.

Witty. Faith 'tis somewhat too dear yet, Gentlemen.

Ruin. There's not a Denier to be bated, Sir.

Old K. Now Sir, how dear is it?

Witty. Bate but the 'tother ten pound?

Prif. Not a Bawbee, Sir.

Old K. How? bate ten pound? what's the whole sum
then?

Witty. Faith Sir, a hundred pound, with much adoe,
I got fifty bated, and faith Father, to say truth,
'Tis reasonable for men of their fashion.

Old K. La, la, la, down, a hunder'd pound? la, la, la,
You are a Consort of Thieves, are you not?

Witty. No Musicians, Sir, I told you before.

Old K. Fiddle faddle, is it not a robbery? a plain robbery.

Witty. No, no, no, by no means Father, you have receiv'd
For your money, nay and that you cannot give back,
'Tis somewhat dear I confess, but who can help it?
If they had been agreed with before-hand,
'Twas ill forgotten.

Old C. And how many snares have you in this? I see my force,

Cafe up your instruments, I yield, here, as robb'd and Taken from me, I deliver it.

Witty. No Sir, you have perform'd your promise now,
Which was, to pay the charge of Musick, that's all.

Old K. I have heard no Musick, I have receiv'd none, Sir, There's

There's none to be found in me, nor about me.

Witty. Why Sir, here's witness against you, you have danc'd,

And he that dances, acknowledges a receipt of Musick.

Old K. I denie that, Sir, look you, I can dance without Musick, do you see, Sir? and I can sing without it too; you are a Consort of Thieves, do you hear what I do?

Witty. Pray you take heed, Sir, if you do move the Musick agen, it may cost you as much more.

Old K. Hold, hold, I'll depart quietly, I need not bid you farewell, I think now, so long as that hundred pound lasts with you.

Enter Guardianes.

Ha, ha, am I snapt i'faith?

Guar. Oh, Sir, Perfidious,

Old K. I, I, some howling another while, Musick's too damnable dear.

Guar. Oh Sir, my heart-strings are broke, if I can but live to tell you the tale, I care not, your Neece my charge is——

Old K. What, is she sick?

Guar. No, no Sir, she's lustily well married.

Old K. To whom?

Guar. Oh, to that cunning dissembler, Cuningam.

Old K. I'll hang the Priest, first, what was he?

Guar. Your kinsman, Sir, that has the Welch Benefice.

Old K. I sav'd him from the Gallows to that end, good: is there any more?

Guar. And Sir Gregory is married too.

Old K. To my Neece too, I hope, and then I may hang her.

Guar. No Sir, to my Neece, thank Cupid; and that's all that's likely to recover me, she's Lady Fop now, and I am One of her Aunts, I thank my promotion.

Enter Credulous, Cuningam, Neece, Sir Gregory, and Mirabel.

Cred. I have perform'd your best, Sir.

Old K. What have you perform'd, Sir?

Witty. Faith Sir I must excuse my Cousin in this act,

If you can excuse your self for making him A Priest, there's the most difficult answer. I put this practise on him, as from your desire, A truth, a truth, Father.

Cred. I protest, Sir, he tells you truth, he mov'd me to't in your namh.

Old K. I protest, Sir, he told you a lye in my name, and were you so easie, Mr. Credulous, to believe him?

Cred. If a man should not believe his Cousin, Sir, whom should he believe?

Old K. Good'en to you, good Mr. Cousin Cuningam, And your fair Bride, my Cousin Cuningam too, And how do you Sir Gregory, with your fair Lady?

Sir Greg. A little better than you would have had me, I thank you Sir, the days of Puppy, and Slave, and Rascal, are pretty well blown over now, I know Crabs from Verjuyce, I have'tryed both, and thou'dst give me thy Neece for nothing, I'd not have her.

Cun. I think so Sir Gregory, for my fake you would not.

Sir Gr. I wou'd thou hadst scap'd her too, and then she had died of the Green sickness: know this, that I did marry in spight, and I will kiss my Lady in spight, and love her in spight, and beget children of her in spight, and when I dye, they shall have my Lands in spight; this was my resolution, and now 'tis out.

Nee. How spightful are you now, Sir Gregory? Why look you, I can love my dearest Husband, With all the honors, duties, sweet embraces, That can be thrown upon a loving man,

Sir Gr.——This is afore your Uncles face, but behind his back, in private, you'll shew him another tale——

Cun. You see, Sir, now the irrecoverable state of all these things before you: come out of your muse, they have been but Wit-weapons, you were wont to love the Play.

Enter Clown.

Old K. Let me alone in my muse a little, Sir, I will wake to you anon.

Cun. U'd so, your friend Pompey, how will you answer him?

Nee. Very well, if you'll but second it, and help me.

Clow. I do hear strange stories, are Ladies things obnoxious?

Nee. Oh, the dissembling falsest wretch is come.

Cun. How now Lady?

Nee. Let me come to him, and instead of love Let me have revenge.

Witty. Pray you now, will you first examine, whether he be guilty or no.

Nee. He cannot be excus'd,

How many Messengers (thou perjurd man) Hast thou return'd with Vows and Oaths, that thou Wouldst follow, and never till this unhappy hour Could I set eye of thee, since thy false eye Drew my heart to it? oh I could tear thee now, Instead of soft embraces, pray give me leave——

Witty. Faith this was ill done of you Sir, if you promis'd otherwise.

Clow. By this hand, never any Messenger came at me, since the first time I came into her company; that a man should be wrong'd thus?

Nee. Did not I send thee Scarfs and Diamonds?

And thou return'dst me Letters, one with a false heart in't.

Witty. Oh fie, to receive favours, return fallhoods, and hold a Lady in hand——

Clow. Will you believe me, Sir? if ever I receiv'd Diamonds, or Scarf, or sent any Letter to her, would this sword might ne'er go through me.

Witty. Some bad Messengers have gone between you then.

Nee. Take him from my sight if I shall see to morrow.

Witty. Pray you forbear the place, this discontent may impair her health much.

Clow. 'Foot, if a man had been in any fault, 'twould ne'er a griev'd him, Sir, if you'll believe.

Witty. Nay, nay, protest no more, I do believe you, But you see how the Lady is wrong'd by't; She has cast away her self, it is to be fear'd, Against her Uncles Will, nay, any consent, But out of a mere neglect, and spight to her self, Married suddainly without any advice.

Clow. Why, who can help it? if she be cast away, she may thank her self, she might have gone farther and far'd worse; I could do no more than I could do: 'twas her own pleasure to command me, that I should not come, til I was sent for, I had been with her every minute of an hour else.

Witty. Truly I believe you.

Clow. Night and day she might have commanded me, and that she knew well enough; I said as much to her between her and I; yet I protest, she's as honest a Lady for my part, that I'd say, if she would see me hang'd: if she be cast away I cannot help it, she might have stay'd to have spoke with a man.

Witty. Well, 'twas a hard misf on both parts.

Clow. So 'twas, I was within one of her, for all this cross luck, I was sure I was between the Knight and home.

Nee. Not gone yet? oh my heart! none regard my health?

Witty. Good Sir, forbear her sight awhile, you hear how ill she brooks it.

Clow. Foolish woman, to overthrow her fortunes so; I shall think the worse of a Ladies wit, while I live for't—— I could almost cry for anger, if she should miscarry now, 'twould touch my conscience a little, and who knows what love and conceit may do? what would people say, as I go along? there goes he that the Lady died for love on, I am sure to hear on't i'th' streets, I shall weep before hand; foolish woman, I do grieve more for thee now, than I did love thee before; well, go thy ways, wouldst thou spare thy Husbands head, and break thine own heart? if thou hadst any wit, I would some other had been the cause of thy undoing, I shall be twitted i'th' teeth with it, I'm sure of that, foolish Lady.

Exit.

Nee. So, so, this trouble's well shook off, Uncle, how d'ye there's a Dowrie due, Sir.

Cun. We have agreed it sweetest,
And find your Uncle fully recover'd, kind to both of us.

Witty. To all the rest I hope;

Old K. Never to thee, nor thee, easie cosin Credulous,
Was your wit so raw?

Cred. Faith yours Sir, so long season'd
Has been faulty too, and very much to blame,
Speaking it with reverence, Uncle.

Sir Gr. Yes faith, Sir, you have paid as dear for your time, as any man here.

Witty. I Sir, and I'll reckon it to him. Imprimis, The first preface cheat of a pair of pieces to the Beggars, you remember that I was the example to your bounty there, I spake Greek and Syriack, Sir, you understand me now. Next, the Robbery put upon your indulgent Cosin, which indeed was no Robbery, no Constable, no Justice, no Thief, but all Cheaters; there was a hunder'd Mark, mark you that: Lastly, this memorable 100 pounds worth of Musick, this was both cheats and wit too, and for the assistance of this Gentleman to my Cosin (for which I am to have a Fee) that was a little practice of my wit too, Father; will you come to composition yet, Father?

Cun. Yes faith Sir, do, two hunder'd a year will be easier than so much weckly, I do not think he's barren if he should be put to't agen.

Old K. Why this was the day I look'd for, thou shalt have't,

And the next cheat makes it up three hunder'd;
Live thou upon thy ten pound Vicarage,
Thou get't not a penny more, here's thy full Hire now.

Cred. I thank you, Sir.

Witty. Why there was the sum of all my Wit, Father,
To shuve him out of your favour, which I fear'd
Would have disinherited me.

Old K. Most certain it had,
Had not thy wit recover'd it; is there any here
That had a hand with thee?

Witty. Yes, all these, Sir.

Old K. Nephew, part a hunder'd pound amongst 'em,
I'll repay it; wealth, love me as I love wit;
When I die,

I'll build an Alms-house for decay'd wits.

Sir Gr. I'll entertain one in my life time; Scholar, you shall be my Chaplain, I have the gift of twenty Benefices, simple as I am here.

Pris. Thanks my great Patron.

Cun. Sir your Gentry and your name shall both be rais'd as high as my fortunes can reach 'em, for your friends fake.

Witty. Something will be in my present power, the future more,
You shall share with me.

Ruin and Wife. Thanks worthy Gentlemen.

Nee. Sir, I would beg one thing of you?

Sir Gr. You can beg nothing of me.

Witty. Oh Sir, if she begs, there's your power over her.

Sir Gr. She has begg'd me for a fool already, but 'tis no matter.

I have begg'd her for a Lady, that she might have been,
That's one for another.

Witty. Nay, but if she beg——

Sir Gr. Let her beg agen then.

Nee. That your man Pompey's Coat may come over his ears back agen, I would not he should be lost for my fake.

Sir Gr. Well, 'tis granted, for mine own fake.

Mirab. I'll intreat it Sir.

Sir Gr. Why then 'tis granted for your fake.

Old K. Come, come, down with all weapons now, 'tis
Musick time,

So it be purchas'd at an easie rate;
Some have receiv'd the knocks, some giv'n the hits,
And all concludes in love, there's happy wits.

Exeunt

The Epilogue at the reviving of this Play.

WE need not tell you Gallants, that this night
The Wits have jumpt, or that the Scenes hit right
'Twould be but labor lost for to excuse
What Fletcher had to do in: his brisk Muse
Was so Mercurial, that if he but writ
An Act, or two, the whole Play rose up wit.

We'll not appeal unto those Gentlemen
Judge by their Cloaths, if they sit right, nor when
The Ladies smile, and with their Fanns delight
To whisk a clinch aside, then all goes right:
'Twas well receiv'd before, and we dare say,
You now are welcome to no vulgar Play.

PROLOGUE.

Plays have their fates, not as in their true sence
They're understood, but as the influence
Of idle custom, madly works upon
The dross of many tongu'd opinion.
A worthy story, howsoever writ
For Language, modest Mirth, Conceit or Wit,
Meets oftentimes with the sweet commendation
Of hang't, 'tis scurvy, when for approbation
A Jigg shall be clapt at, and every rhyme

Prais'd and applauded by a clamorous chime.
Let ignorance and laughter dwell together,
They are beneath the Muses pity. Hither
Come nobler Judgements, and to those the strain
Of our invention is not bent in vain,
The Fair Maid of the Inn to you commends
Her hopes and welcomes, and withal intends
In th' Entertains to which she doth invite ye,
All things to please, and some things to delight ye.

Actus Primus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Cesario, and Clarissa.

Cesario.

Interpret not Clarissa, my true zeal
In giving you counsel, to transcend the bounds
That should confine a brother; 'tis your honor,
And peace of mind (which honor last will leave you)
I labor to preserve, and though you yet are

Pure and untainted, and resolve to be so:
Having a Fathers eye, and Mothers care
In all your ways to keep you fair, and upright.
In which respects my best advices must Appear superfluous; yet since love, dear Sister
Will sometimes tender things unnecessary,
Misconstrue not my purpose.

Clarif. Sir, I dare not:
But still receive it as a large addition,
To the much that I already stand engag'd for,

Yet

Yet pardon me, though I profess upon
A true examination of my self,
Even to my private thoughts I cannot find
(Having such strong supporters to uphold me)
On what slight ground the least doubt can be rais'd
To render me suspected, I can fall,
Or from my Fame or Virtue.

Cesar. Far be it from me,
To nourish such a thought; and yet excuse me,
As you would do a Lapidary, whose whole fortunes
Depend upon the safety of one Jewel,
If he think no case precious enough
To keep it in full lustre, nor no locks,
Though lending strength to Iron doors sufficient
To guard it, and secure him; you to me are
A Gemm of more esteem, and priz'd higher
Than Usurers do their Muck, or great men Title
And any flaw (which heaven avert) in you,
Whose reputation like a Diamond
Cut newly from the rock, women with envie,
And men with covetous desires look up at)
By prying eies discovered in a moment
Would render what the braveries of Florence
For want of counterpoize, forbear to cheapen,
Of little or no value,

Clarif. I see brother
The mark you shoot at, and much thank your love;
But for my Virgin Jewel which is brought
In comparison with your Diamond, rest assur'd
It will not fall in such a workmans hands
Whose ignorance or malice shall have power
To cast one cloud upon it, but still keep
Her native splendor.

Cesar. 'Tis well, I commend you;
And study your advancement with that care
As I would do a Sisters, whom I love
With more than common order.

Clarif. That from me,
I hope's return'd to you.

Cesar. I do confess it,
But let me tell you, (but still with that love,
I wish to increase between us) that you are Loved against the gravity long maintain'd
In Ital (where to see a maid unmasqu'd
Is held a blemish) to be over-frequent
In giving or receiving visits.

Clarif. How?

Cesar. Whereas the custom is here to wooe by Picture,
And never see the substance: you are fair,
And beauty draws temptations on; You know it,
I wou'd not live to see a willing grant
From you, to one unworthy of your birth,
Feature or fortune; yet there have been Ladies
Of rank, proportion, and of means beyond you,
That have prov'd this no miracle.

Clarif. One unworthy?
Why, pray you gentle brother, who are they
That I vouchsafe these bounties to? I hope
In your strict Criticisme of me, and my manners,
That you will not deny they are your equals.

Cesar. Angry?

Clarif. I have reason, but in cold blood tell me,
Had we not one Father?

Cesar. Yes, and Mother too.

Clarif. And he a Soldier.

Cesar. True;

Clarif. If I then borrow
A little of the boldness of his temper.
Imparting it to such as may deserve it;
(However indulgent to your selves, you brothers Allow no part of freedom to your Sisters)
I hope 'twill not pass for a crime in me,
To grant access and speech to noble suitors;
And you escape for innocent, that descend

To a thing so far beneath you. Are you touch'd?
Why did you think that you had Giges Ring,
Or the Herb that gives invisibility?
Or that Biancha's name had ne'er been mention'd;
The fair Maid of the grand Ostervia, brother,

Cesar. No more.

Clarif. A little, brother. Your night walks,
And offer'd presents; which coy she, contemn'd,
Your combats in disguises with your Rivals,
Brave Muletiers. Scullions perfum'd with greafe,
And such as want meat for Cats must be remembred;
And all this pother for a common trull,
A tempting sign, and curiously set forth,
To draw in riotous guests, a thing expos'd
To every Ruffians rude assault; and subject
For a poor salary, to a rich mans lust,
Though made up of diseases.

Cesar. Will you end yet?

Clarif. And this a Mistress for Albertus Son,
One that I should call Sister?

Cesar. Part not with

Your modesty in this violent heat; the truth is,
(For you shall be my Confessor) I love her,
But virtuously; report that gives her out
Only for fair, and adds not she is chaste,
Detracts much from her: for indeed she is,
Though of a low condition; compos'd
Of all those graces, dames of highest birth,
Though rich in natures bounties, should be proud of;
But leave her, and to you my nearest care,
My dearest best Clarissa. Do not think
(For then you wrong me) I wish you should live
A barren Virgin life; I rather aim at
A noble Husband, that may make you mother
Of many children; one that when I know him
Worth your embraces, I may serve, and sue too:
And therefore scorn not to acquaint me with
That man, that happy man; you please to favour.

Clarif. I ever purpos'd it, for I will like
With your allowance:

Cesar. As a pawn of this;

Receive this Ring, but e'r you part with it
On any terms, be certain of your choice;
And make it known to me.

Enter Servants with Lights, Alberto, Baptista, Mariana, Mentivole.

Clarif. You have my hand for't;

Cesar. Which were it not my Sisters, I should kiss:
With too much heat.

Clarif. My Father and his guests, Sir.

Alber. Oh my old friend, my tri'd friend, my Baptista:
These days of rest and feasting, sute not with
Our tougher natures, those were golden ones,
Which were enjoy'd at Sea; that's our true Mother:
The Land's to us a step-dame; there we sought
Honor, and wealth through dangers: yet those dangers
Delighted more than their rewards, though great ones,
And worth the undertakers: here we study
The Kitchin Arts, to sharpen appetite,
Dull'd with abundance; and dispute with Heaven;
If that the least puff of the rough North-wind,
Blast our times burthen, rendring to our Palats
The charming juice less pleasing; whereas there
If we had Bisket, powder'd flesh, fresh water,
We thought them Persian delicates, and for Musick
If a strong gale but made the main yard crack,
We danc'd to the loud Minstrel.

Bapt. And fear'd less,
(So far we were in love with noble action)
A tempest than a calm.

Alber. 'Tis true Baptista;
There, there, from mutual aids lent to each other,

And

And virtuous emulation to exceed
In manly daring, the true School of friendship,
We learnt those principles, which confirm'd us friends
Never to be forgot.

Baptist. Never I hope.

(non,

Alber. We were married there, for bells the roaring Ca-
Aloud proclaim'd it lawful, and a prize
Then newly ta'en, and equally divided,
Serv'd as a dowry to you, then stil'd my wife ;
And did enable me to be a Husband,
Fit to encounter so much wealth, though got
With blood and horror.

Maria. If so got, 'tis fit Sir
Now you possess it, that you should enjoy it
In peace, and quiet ; I, your Son, and Daughter
That reap the harvest of your winters labour,
Though debtors for it yet have often trembled,
When, in way of discourse, you have related
How you came by it.

Alber. Trembled? how the softness
Of your sex may excuse you, I'll not argue,
But to the world, howe'er I hold thee noble
I should proclaim this boy some cowards bastard,
And not the Image of Albertus youth :
If when some wish'd occasion calls him forth,
To a brave trial, one weak artery
Of his, should show a fever, though grim death
Put on a thousand dreadful shapes to fright him ;
The Elements, the Sea, and all the Winds
We number on our compass, then conspiring
To make the Scène more ghastly ; I must have thee
Sirrah, I must, if once you grapple with An enemies ship, to board her, though you see
The desperate Gunner ready to give fire,
And blow the deck up, or like Cesar's Soldier
Thy hands like his cut off, hang by the teeth,
And die undaunted.

Maria. I even die to hear you :
My son, my lov'd Cesario run such hazards ?
Bless'd Saints forbid it : you have done enough
Already for one family, that rude way ;
I'll keep him safe at home, and train him up
A compleat Courtier : may I live to see him,
By sweet discourse. and gracious demeanor,
Winn, and bring home a fair Wife. and a rich ;
'Tis all I rest ambitious of.

Alber. A Wife !

As if there were a course to purchase one
Prevailing more than honourable action ?
Or any Intercessors move so far,
To take a Mistress of a noble spirit,
As the true fame of glorious victories,
Atchiev'd by sweat and blood ! Oh the brave dames
Of warlike Genova ! they had eyes to see
The inward man, and only from his worth,
Courage, and conquests : the blind Archer knew
To head his shafts, or light his quenched Torch,
They were proof against them else.
No Carpet Knight
That spent his youth in Groves, or pleasant Bowers ;
Or stretching on a Couch his lazy limbs,
Sung to his Lute such soft and melting Notes,
As Ovid, nor Anacreon ever knew,
Could work on them, nor once bewitch'd their sense ;
Though he came so perfund as he had robb'd
Sabea, or Arabia, of their wealth ;
And stor'd it in one sute :
I still remember,
And still remember it with joy, Baptista,
When from the rescue of the Genova Fleet,
Almost surpriz'd by the Venetian Gallies,
Thou didst return, and wert receiv'd in triumph.
How lovely in thy honor'd wounds and scars
Thou didst appear what worlds of amorous glances

The beauties of the City (where they stood, Fix'd like so many of the fairest stars)
Shot from their windows at thee? how it fir'd
Their bloods to see the enemies captive streams
Born through the streets? nor could chaste Juliana
The Duke's fair Neece, though guarded with her greatness
Resist this gallant charge, but laying by Desparity of fortune from the object,
Yielded her self thy prisoner.

Bap. Pray you chuse some other theme.

Mari. Can there be one more pleasing?

Bap. That triumph drew on me a greater torture,
And 'tis in the remembrance little less
Than ever Captive suffer'd.

Mari. How? to gain the favour of so great a Lady?

Bap. Yes, since it prov'd fatal, 't have been happy, Madam,
Adds to calamity, and the heavy loss
Of her I durst not hope for, once enjoy'd,
Turns what you think a blessing to a curse,
Which grief would have forgotten.

Alber. I am sorry I touch'd upon it.

Maria. I burn rather, Sir,
With a desire to hear the story of
Your loves, and shall receive it as a favour,
Which you may grant.

Bap. You must not be deny'd,
Yet with all brevity I must report it ;
'Tis true, fair Juliana (Genova's pride)
Enamour'd of my actions, lik'd my person ;
Nor could I but with joy meet her affection ;
Since it was lawful, for my first wife dead ;
We were closely married, and for some few months
Tasted the fruits of 't ; but malicious fate,
Envyng our too much happiness, wrought upon
A faithless servant, privy to our plot,
And Cabinet-Counselor to Juliana,
Who either for hope, or reward, or fear,
Discover'd us to the incensed Duke :
Whose rage made her close prisoner, and pronounc'd
On me perpetual banishment : some three years
I wander'd on the Seas, since entertain'd
By the great Duke of Florence ; but what fate
Attended her? or Prospero my friend,
That staid at Genova, to expect the issue,
Is yet uncertain.

Enter a Gentleman.

Alber. From the Duke :

Bap. He's welcome, to end my forc'd relation.

Alber. Signior Baptista ;

The Great Dukes Will commands your present care,

Gent. It points indeed at both of you ;

Bap. I wait it.

Alber. In Mariana, to your rest.

Bap. Nay leave us, we must be private,

Maria. Stay not long Cesario :

— Exeunt. Manet Cesario, Mentivole.

Mentivo. So these old men vanish'd, 'tis allow'd
That we may speak, and howsoe'r they take Delight in the discourse of former dangers,
It cannot hinder us to treat a little
Of present pleasures.

Cesario. Which if well enjoy'd,
Will not alone continue, but increase
In us their friendship.

Ment. How shall we spend the night?

To snore it out like drunken Dutchmen, would Sort ill with us Italians. We are made
Of other metall, fiery, quick, and active ;
Shall we take our fortune? and while our cold fathers
(In whom long since their youthful heats were dead,)
Talk much of Mars, serve under Venus Ensigns,
And seek a Mistress,

Cesar.

Cesar. That's a game dear friend,
That does admit no rival in chafe of it.
And either to be undertook alone,
Or not to be attempted.

Ment. I'll not press you;
What other sports to entertain the time with
The following morning?

Cesar. Any that may become us.

Ment. Is the Neopolitan horse the Viceroy sent you,
In a fit plight to run?

Cesar. So my Groom tells me.
I can boast little of my horsemanship;
Yet upon his assurance, I dare wager
A thousand Crowns, 'gainst any horse in Florence,
For an eight mile course,

Ment. I would not win of you,
In respect you are impatient of loss:
Else I durst match him with my Barbary
For twice the sum. (beaten)

Cesar. You do well to excuse it, being certain to be

Ment. Tush. You know the contrary.

Cesar. To end the controversie
Put it to trial, by my life I'll meet you.

Enter Clarissa.

With the next rising Sun.

Ment. A match. But here
Appears a Cynthia, that scorns to borrow
A beam of light from the great eye of Heaven,
She being her self all brightness; how I envy
Those amorous smiles, those kisses, but sure chaste ones
Which she vouchsafes her brother?

Clarif. You are wanton:
Pray you think me not Biancha, leave I pray you;
My Mother will not sleep before she see you,
And since you know her tenderness, nay fondness;
In every circumstance that concerns your safety,
You are not equal to her.

Cesar. I must leave you, but will not fail to meet you

Ment. Soft sleeps to you.

Within. Mariana: Cesario.

Clarif. You are call'd again.

Cesar. Some Sops
Complain of too much rigor in their Mothers;
I of too much indulgence; you will follow.— Exit.

Clarif. You are her first care, therefore lead the way.

Ment. she stais: best opportunity, she stais:
As she invited conference, she was ever
Noble, and free: but thus to tempt my frailty,
Araves a yielding in her; or contempt
Of all that I dare offer; stand I now
Consulting? No, I'll put it home.

Clarif. Who waits there? more Lights.

Ment. You need them not, they are as useles,
As at noon-day; can there be darkness, where Nature then wisely liberal, vouchsaf'd
To lend two Suns.

Clarif. Hyperboles:

Ment. No, truths:
Truths beauteous Virgin, so my love-sick heart
Assures me, and my understanding tells me
I must approach them wisely, should I rashly
Press near their scorching beams, they would consume me
And on the contrary, should your disdain
Keep me at too much distance, and I want
Their comfortable heat, the frost of death
Would seize on all my faculties.

Cl. Pray you pause, Sir.
This vehemency of discourse must else needs tire you.
These gay words take not me, 'tis simple faith
Honest integrity; and lawful flames
I am delighted with:

Ment. Such I bring with me, and therefore Lady,

Cl. But that you took me off
E're I came to a period; I had added.
A long experience must be requir'd
Both of his faith and trust, with whom a Virgin
Trafficks for, what's dearest in this life,
Her liberty, and honor; I confess
I oft have view'd you with an eye of favour,
And with your generous parts the many tenders
Of doing me all fair offices, have won
A good opinion from me.

Ment. Oh speak ever, I never heard such Musick;

Cl. A plain tune, Sir:

But 'tis a hearty one; when I perceive
By evident proofs, your aims are truly noble,
And that you bring the Engines of fair Love,
Not of foul Lust, to shake and undermine
My Maiden-fortress: I may then make good
What now I dare not promise.

Ment. You already
In taking notice of my poor deservings,
Have been magnificent, and 'twill appear
A frontless impudence to ask beyond this
Yet qualifie, though not excuse my error,
Though now I am ambitious to desire
A confirmation of it.

Cl. So it wrong not my modesty to grant it,

Ment. 'Tis far from me,

I only am a suitor, you would grace me
With some toy, but made rich in that you wore it,
To warrant to the world that I usurp not
When I presume to stile my self your servant,
A ribond from your shooe:

Cl. You are too humble,
I'll think upon't; and something of more value
Shall witness how I prize you, it grows late,
I'll bring you to the door,

Ment. You still more bind me.—

Exeunt.

Enter Duke of Florence, Alberto, Baptista, Magistrates, and Attendants.

Duke. You find by this assur'd intelligence
The preparation of the Turks against us.
We have met him oft and beat him; now to fear him
Would argue want of courage, and I hold it
A safer policie for us and our signories
To charge him in his passage o'er the Sea,
Than to expect him here.

Alb. May it please your Highness
Since you vouchsafe to think me worthy of
This great employment, if I may deliver
My judgement freely, 'tis not flattery
Though I say my opinion waits on you,
Nor would I give my suffrage and consent
To what you have propos'd, but that I know it
Worth the great speaker, though that the denial
Call'd on your heavy anger. For my self
I do profess thus much, if a blunt Soldier,
May borrow so much from the oyl'd tongu'd Courtier,
(That echoes whatso'er the Prince allows of)
All that my long experience hath taught me
That have spent three parts of my life at Sea,
(Let it not taste of arrogance that I say it)
Could not have added reasons of more weight
To fortifie your affections' than such
As your grace out of observation meerly
Already have propounded.

Bap. With the honor to give the daring enemy an affront
In being the first opposer it will teach
Your Soldiers boldness: and strike fear in them
That durst attempt you.

1 Magi. Victuals and Ammunition,
And Money too, the sinews of the War, are stor'd up in the Magazine.

2 Magi.

2. Magi. And the Gallies new rig'd and train'd up,
And at two dayes warning fit for the service.

Duke. We commend your care,
Nor will we e'er be wanting in Our counsels,
As we doubt not your action; you Baptista
Shall stay with us; that Merchant is not wise,
That ventures his whole fortunes in one bottom.

Albert. Be our Admiral, spare your thanks,
'Tis Merit in you that invites this honor,
Preserve it such; ere long you shall hear more,
Things rashly undertaken end as ill,
But great acts thrive when reason guides the will.

— Exeunt. Enter 3 Gentlemen.

1. No question 'twas not well done in Cæsario,
To cross the horse of young Mentivole
In the midst of this course.

2. That was not all, the switching him dall'd him.

3. Would that both the jades
Had broke their necks, when they first started; 'Slight,
We stand here prating, give them leave to whisper,
And when they have cut one anothers throats

Enter Mentivolé, and Cæsario.

Make in to part 'em.

2. There is no such hazard,
Their Fathers friendship, and their love forbid it;
See where they come!

1. With fury in their looks.

Ment. You have the wager, with what foul play got I'll not dispute:

Cæsar. Foul play?

Ment. I cannot speak it
In a fairer language, and if some respects
Familiar to my self chain'd not my tongue,
I should say no more. I should, but I'll sit down,
With this disgrace; how e'er press me no farther.
For if once more provok'd, you'll understand
I dare no more suffer an Injury,
Than I dare do one.

Cæsar. Why Sir are you injur'd
In that I take my right which I would force,
Should you detain it?

Ment. Put it to judgment.

Cæsar. No; my will in this shall carry it.

Ment. Your will? nay, farewell softness then.

They suddenly draw.

3. This I foresaw.

2. Hold, hold.

Cæsar. I am hurt.

2. Shift for your self, 'tis death.

Men. As you respect me, bear him off with care,
If he miscarry since he did the wrong,
I'll stand the shock of't.

2. Gently, he will faint else—

Exeunt Gent. with Cæsario.

Ment. And speedily, I beseech you; my rage over,
That pour'd upon my reason clouds of error,
I see my folly, and at what dear loss
I have exchang'd a real innocence,
To gain a meer fantastical report,
Transported only by vain popular wind,
To be a daring, nay, fool-hardy Man.

Enter Baptista.

But could I satisfy my self within here,
How should I bear my fathers frown? They meet me,
My guilt conjures him hither.

Bap. Sirrah:

Mentiv. Sir:

Bap. I have met the trophies of your russion sword;
Was there no other Anvilc to make triall
How far thou durst be wicked, but the bosome
Of him, which under the adulterate name
Of friendship, thou hast murder'd.

Ment. Murder'd Sir?

My dreams abhor so base a fact; true valour
Imploy'd to keep my reputation fair
From the austereft Judge, can never merit
To be branded with that title; you begot me
A man, no coward; and but call your youth
To memory, when injur'd, you could never Boast of the Asses fortitude, slave-like patience:
And you might justly doubt I were your son,
If I should entertain it; if Cæsario
Recover, as I hope his wound's not mortal,
A second tryal of what I dare doe
In a just cause, shall give strong witness for me
I am the true heir to Baptista's courage,
As to his other fortunes.

Baptist. Boy, to neither:

But on this strict condition, which intreaties
From Saints, nay Angels, shall not make me alter.
A friendship so began, and so continu'd
Between me and Alberto my best friend,
Your brawls shall not dissolve; it is my will,
And as I am thy Father, I command thee,
That instantly, on any termes, how poor
So e'er, it skills not, thou desire his pardon,
And bring assurance to me, he has sign'd it,
Or by my Fathers soul I'll never know thee:
But as a stranger to my blood; perform it,
And suddenly, without reply, I have said it.

Ment. And in it given a heavier sentence on me
Than the most cruel death; you are my father
And your will to be serv'd, and not disputed
By me, that am your Son: But I'll obey,
And though my heart-strings crack for't, make it known,
When you command, my faculties are your own. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Alberto, Physitian, and a Chirurgion.

Phys. HAVE patience, Noble Sir; your son Cæsario
Will recover without question.

Surgeon. A slight wound.

Though it pierc't his body, it hath mis'd the vitals.

Phys. My life for't, he shall take the air again within these ten dayes.

Alber. O but from a friend,
To receive this bloody measure from a friend!
If that a man should meet a violent death,
In a place where he had taken sanctuary,
Would it not grieve him? such all Florence held
Their friendship, and 'tis that which multiplies
The injury.

Physi. Have patience worthy Signior.

C c c

Alber. I

Alber. I do protest, as I am Man and Soldier,
If I had buried him in a wave at Sea,
(Lost in some honorable action)
I would not, to the saltness of his grave,
Have added the least tear; but these quarrels

Enter Mariana, and Clarissa.

Bred out of game and wine, I had as live
He should have died of a Surfet.

Maria. Oh what comfort? How is it with our Son Sir?

Alber. His Work-masters
Bear me in hand here, as my Lawyer does,
When I have a crackt Title, or bad Sute in Law,
All shall go well.

Maria. I pray you Gentlemen, what think you of his wound.

Physi. 'Tis but a scratch, nothing to danger.

Clarif. But he receiv'd it from a friend,
And the unkindness ta'en at that, may kill him.

Mari. Let me see him :

Physi. By no means, he slumbers.

Mari. Then I cannot believe you,
When you tell me there's hope of him.

Alber. Yet many Ladies
Do give more faith to their Physitian
Than to their Confessor.

Clarif. O my poor lost brother,
And friend more dear than Brother.

Alber. More loud instruments
To disturb his slumbers! goe, goe, take Caroch:
And as you love me, you and the Girle retire
To our Summer house, i'th' Country; I'll be with you
Within these two days.

Maria. I am yours in all things,
Though with much sorrow to leave him.

Exeunt Maria, Clarif.

Alber. I pray you Gentlemen,
With best observance tend your Patient;
The loss of my heir-male, lies now a bleeding.

Enter Mentivole.

And think what payment his recovery
Shall show'r upon you,
Of all men breathing;

Exeunt Physitian, Chirur.

Wherefore do you arrive here? Are you mad?
My injury begins to bleed afresh
At sight of you; why this affront of yours
I receive more malicious than the other.
Your hurt was only danger to my son:
But your sight to me is death; Why come you hither?
Do you come to view the wounds, which you have made?
And glory in them?

Menti. Rather worthy Sir, to pour Oyl into them.

Alber. I am a Soldier Sir,
I cast part of a Courtier, and understand
By your smooth Oyl,
Your present flattery.

Menti. Sir, for my Fathers sake acknowledge me
To be born a Gentleman, no slave; I ever
Held flatterers of that breed; do not misconstrue
In your distaste of me, the true intent
Of my coming hither, for I do protest
I do not come to tell you I am sorry
For your sons hurt.

Alber. Not sorry?

Menti. No not sorry; I have to the lowest ebbe, lost all my fury:

But I must not lose my honesty; 'twas he Gave heat unto the injury, which return'd
(Like a Petar, ill lighted, into 'th' bosome
Of him, gave fire to't) yet I hope his hurt,
Is not so dangerous, but he may recover;

When if it please him, call me to account,
For the loss of so much blood, I shall be ready
To do him noble reason.

Alber. You are arm'd me thinks with wondrous confidence.

Menti. O with the best Sir;
For I bring penitence, and satisfaction.

Alber. Satisfaction? Why I heard you say but now,
You were not sorry for his wounds.

Menti. Nor am I: the satisfaction which I bring Sir, is to you;

You are a Gentleman ne'er injur'd me;
One ever lov'd my Father, the right way,
And most approv'd of noble amity.

Yet I have run my sword quite through your heart,
And slightly hurt your son; for't may be fear'd,

A grief ta'en at these years for your sons loss,
May hazard yours: And therefore I am sent
By him that has most interest in your sorrow;

Who having chid me almost to the ruin
Of a disinheritance, for violating
So continued and so sacred a friendship

Of 50 Winters standing: such a friendship,
That ever did continue like the spring;
Ne'er saw the fall o'th' leaf; by him I am sent

To say the wrong I have done Sir, is to you:
And that I have quite lost him for a Father,

Until I find your pardon; nay there follows
A weightier deprivation; his Estate

I could with a less number of sighs part with.
Fortune might attend my youth, and my deservings

In any Climate: but a Fathers blessing,
To settle and confirm that fortune, no where;

But only here. Your pardon, give me that;
And when you have done, kill me; for 'tis that Takes from me the effect of excommunication;

A Fathers heavy curse.

Alber. Nay, may that curse
Light on himself, for sending thee in this minute:

When I am grown as deaf to all compassion,
As the cruellest Sea-fight, or most horrid tempest.

That I had drown'd i'th' Sea a thousand duckets;
Thou hadst not made this visit: rash young man;

Thou tak'st me in an ill Planet, and hast cause
To curse thy Father; for I do protest,

If I had met thee in any part o'th' World,
But under my own rooffe, I would have kill'd thee.

Within there.—Enter Physitian, Chirurgion, and Servants.

Look you!

Here's a triumph sent for the death of your young Master.

Serv. Shall we kill him?

Alber. No, I'll not be so unhospitable; but Sir,
By my life, I vow to take assurance from you,
That right hand never more shall strike my son.

Menti. That will be easily protested.

Alber. Not easily, when it must be exacted, and a bloody seal to't.

Bind him, and cut off's right hand presently:
Fair words shall never fatisie foul deeds.

Chop's hand off.

Menti. You cannot be so unrighteous, to your own honor.

Phy. O Sir, collect your self;
And recall your bloody purpose.

Alber. My intents of this nature, do ever come to action.

Chirur. Then I must fetch another stickler. — Exit.

Alber. Yet I do grieve at heart;
And I do curse thy Father heartily,
That's the cause of my dishonor; sending thee
In such an hour, when I am apt for mischief:

Apt, as a Dutch-man after a Sea-fight,
When his enemy kneels afore him; come dispatch.

Physi. Intreat

Phys. Intreat him, Noble Sir;
Menti. You shall excuse me;
 Whatsoever he dares do, that I dare suffer.

Enter Cæsario, and Chirurgion.

Cæsar. Oh Sir, for honors sake stay your foul purpose,
 For if you do proceed thus cruelly,
 There is no question in the wound you give him,
 I shall bleed to death for't.

Alber. Thou art not of my temper,
 What I purpose, cannot be alter'd.

Serv. Sir; the Duke
 With all speed expects you. You must instantly
 Ship all your followers, and to sea.

Alber. My blessing stay with thee upon this condition,
 Take away his use of fighting; as thou hop'st
 To be accounted for my son, perform't —

Exit.

Cæsar. You hear what I am injoynd to.

Menti. Pray thee take it,
 Only this ring, this best esteem'd Jewel:
 I will not give't to th' hangman chops it off;
 It is too dear a relique. I'll remove it nearer my heart.

Cæsar. Ha, that Rings my Sisters.
 The Ring I injoynd her never part withal
 Without my knowledge; come, Sir, we are friends;
 Pardon my fathers heat, and melancholy;
 Two violent Fevers which he caught at Sea,
 And cannot yet shake off: only one promise
 I must injoynd you to, and seriously.
 Hereafter you shall never draw a Sword
 To the prejudice of my life.

Menti. By my best hopes I shall not.

Cæsar. I pray deliver me your sword
 On that condition.

Menti. I shall Sir, may it hereafter
 Ever fight on your part.

Cæsar. Noble Sir, I thank you;
 But for performance of your vow, I intreat
 Some gage from you.

Menti. Any Sir.

Cæsar. Deliver me that ring.

Menti. Ha, this Ring? indeed this Jewel binds me,
 If you knew the vertue of it, never more
 To draw my sword against you.

Cæsar. Therefore I will have it.

Menti. You may not.

Cæsar. Come: you must.

I that by violence could take your hand,
 Can inforce this from you; this is a token Sir,
 That we may prove friends hereafter. Fare you well.

Phys. Why did you cease his Sword Sir?

Cæsar. To perform what my Father bade me;
 I have for the present ta'en away his
 Use of fighting.

Phys. Better so,

Than take that which your Father meant.

Exeunt Manet, Mentivole.

Menti. Was ever the like usage? O that Ring!
 Dearer than life, Whither is honor fled?

Cæsario. Thou art unmanly in each part,
 To seize my sword first, and then split my heart. Exit.

Enter Host, and Clown.

Host. Thy Master that lodges here in my Osteria,
 Is a rare man of art, they say he's a Witch.

Clow. A Witch? Nay, he's one step of the Ladder to preferment higher, he is a Conjurer?

Host. Is that his higher title?

Clow. Yes, I assure you, for a Conjurer is the Devils Master, and commands him; whereas a Witch is the Devils Prentice, and obeys him.

Host. Bound Prentice to the Devil!

Clow. Bound and inroll'd I assure you, he cannot start;

and therefore I would never wish any Gentleman to turn Witch.

Host. Why Man?

Clow. Oh he loses his Gentility by it, the Devil in this case cannot help him, he must go to the Herald for new Armes believe it.

Host. As I am true Inkeeper, yet a Gentleman born,
 I'll ne'er turn Witch for that trick;
 And thou hast been a great Traveller?

Clow. No indeed, not I Sir;

Host. Come, you are modest.

Clow. No, I am not modest, for I told you a lye, that you might the better understand I have been a Traveller,

Host. So Sir, they say your Master is a great Physitian too.

Clow. He was no fool told you that, I assure you.

Host. And you have been in England? but they say, Ladies in England take a great deal of Physick.

Clow. Both wayes on my reputation.

Host. So 'tis to be understood:

But they say, Ladies there take Physick for fashion.

Clow. Yes Sir, and many times dye to keep fashion.

Host. How? dye to keep fashion!

Clow. Yes, I have known a Lady sick of the small Pocks, onely to keep her face from Pitholes, take cold, strike them in again, kick up the heels, and vanish.

Host. There was kicking up the heels with a witness.

Clow. No Sir; I confess a good face has many times been the motive to the kicking up of the heels with a witnefs: but this was not.

Enter Hostess, and Bianca.

Host. Here comes my wife and daughter.

Clow. You have a pretty commodity of this night-worm?

Host. Why Man?

Clow. She is a pretty lure to draw custom to your ordinary.

Host. Do'st think I keep her to that purpose?

Clow. When a Dove-house is empty, there is cuminsfeed used to, purloine from the rest of the neighbors; In England you have several Adamants, to draw in spurs and rapi-ers; one keeps silk-worms in a Gallery: A Milliner has choice of Monkies, and Paraketoes; another shewes bawdy
 East-Indian Pictures, worse than ever were Aretines: a Goldsmith keeps his Wife wedged into his shop like a Mermaid, nothing of her to be seen (thats Woman) but her upper part?

Host. Nothing but her upper part?

Clow. Nothing but her upper bodies, and he lives at the more hearts ease.

Host. What's the reason?

Clow. Because her nether part can give no temptation;
 by your leave, Sir, I'll tend my Master, and instantly be with you for a cup of Cherally this hot weather.

Host. A nimble pated Rascal, come hither Daughter,
 When was Cæsario here?

Bian. Sir, not this fortnight.

Host. I do not like his visits, commonly
 He comes by Owl-light, both the time and manner
 Is suspitious; I do not like it.

Bian. Sir, the Gentleman

Is every way so noble, that you need not
 Question his intent of coming, though you did;
 Pray Sir preserve that good opinion of me,
 That though the custome of the place I was born in,
 Makes me familiar to every guest,
 I shall in all things keep my self a stranger
 To the vices they bring with them.

Hostis. Right my daughter:

She has the right strain of her Mother.

Host. Of her Mother?

And I would speak, I know from whence she took it;
 When I was as young, I was as honest.

Hostess. Leave your prating.
And study to be drunk; and abuse your guests over and over.

Enter Forobosco, and Clown.

Host. Peace Wife. My honorable guest.

Foro. My indear'd Landlord?
And the rest o'th' complements o'th' house.

Host. Breakfast is ready Sir;
It waits only the tide of your stomach.

Clow. And mine gapes for't like a stale Oyster.
Ere you go to bed, fail not of that I pray.

— Exeunt all but Forobosco, and Clown.

Foro. We will instantly be with you;
Now we are all fellows.

Nine a Clock, and no Clyents come
Yet, sure thou do'st not set up bills enough.

Clow. I have set up bills in abundance.

Foro. What Bills?

Clow. Marry for curing of all diseases,
Recovery of stoln goods,
And a thousand such impossibilities.

Foro. The place is unlucky.

Clow. No certain, 'tis scarcity of mony; do not you hear the Lawyers complain of it? Men have as much Malice as ever they had to wrangle, but they have no Mony: Whither should this Mony be travell'd?

Foro. To the Devil I think.

Clow. 'Tis with his Cofferer I am certain, that's the Usurer.

Foro. Our cheating does not prosper so well as it was wont to do.

Clow. No sure, why in England we coo'd cozen 'em as familiarily, as if we had travell'd with a Brief, or a Lottery.

Foro. P'th' Low-countries we did pretty well.

Clow. So so: as long as we kept the Mop-headed butter-boxes sober; marry when they were drunk, then they grew buzards: You should have them reel their heads together, and deliberate; your Dutchman indeed, when he is foxt, is like a Fox; for when he's sunk in drink; quite earth to a Mans thinking, 'tis full Exchange time with him, then he's subtlest; but your Switzer, 'twas nothing to cheat
him.

Foro. Nothing?

Clow. No, nor conscience to be made of it; for since nature afore-hand cozen'd him of his wit, 'twas the less sin for us to cozen him of his Mony.

Foro. But these Italians are more nimble-pated, we must have some new trick for them; I protest but that our Hostess's daughter is a sweet Lass, and draws great resort to'th' house, we were as good draw teeth a horseback.

Clow. I told 'em in the Market-place you could conjure, and no body would believe me: but ere long I will make
'em believe you can conjure with such a figuary.

Foro. What language shall's conjure in? high Dutch I think, that's full i'th' mouth.

Clow. No, no, Spanish, that roars best; and will appear more dreadful.

Foro. Prethee tell me thy conceit thou hast to gull them.

Clow. No, no, I will not stael it; but my dear Jew-trump, for thou art but my instrument, I am the plotter, and when we have cozen'd 'em most titely, thou shalt steal away the Inn-keepers daughter, I'll provide my self of another moveable: and we will most purely retire our selves to Genoa.

Foro. Thou art the compass I sail by.

Enter Baptista and Mentivole.

Bap. Was ever expectation of so Noble
A requital answered with such contumely!
A wild Numidian that had suck'd a Tigress,

Would not have been so barbarous; Did he threat
To cut thy hand off?

Ment. Yes Sir, and his slaves were ready to perform't.

Bapt. What hind'ed it?

Ment. Only his sons intreaty.

Bapt. Noble youth,

I wish thou wert not of his blood; thy pitty
Gives me a hope thou art not.

Ment. You mistake Sir,
The injury that followed from the son,
Was worse than the fathers; he did first disarmé
And took from me a Jewel, which I prize
Above my hand or life.

Bapt. Take thy sword from thee?
He stole it like a Thief rather, he could not
I'th' Field deprive thee of it.

Ment. He took it from me,
And sent me forth so thin, and so unmade up,
As if I had been a Foot-boy.

Bapt. O my fury!

I must now ask thee forgiveness, that my rashness;
Bred out of too much friendship, did expose thee
To so eminent a danger; which I vow

I will revenge on the whole Family:
All the calamities of my whole life,
My banishment from Genoa, my wifes loss
Compar'd to this indignity, is nothing;
Their Family shall repair't; it shall be to them
Like a plague, when the Dog-star reigns most hot:

An Italian's revenge may pause, but's ne'er forgot. Exit.

Ment. I would I had conceal'd this from my Father,
For my interest in Clarissa; my care now
Must be to untangle this division,
That our most equal flames may be united;
And from these various and perturbed streames,
Rise, like a sweet Morn, after terrible dreams. — Exit.

Enter Clarissa and Cæsario.

Clar. Brother, I am happy in your recovery,
Cæs. And I Sister, am ever best pleas'd in your happiness:
But I miss a toy should be on your finger.

Clar. My Ring; this morning when I wash't
I put it off, 'tis in my Window.

Cæs. Where's your Looking-glass?

Clar. Here, Sir.

Cæs. 'Tis a fair one.

Clar. 'Tis pure Chrystal.

Cæs. Can a Diamond cut in Crystal? let me see,
I'll grave my name in't.

Clar. Oh, you'll spoyle my glass.

Would you not have your brother in your eye?

Cæs. I had thought he had been Planted in your heart,
Look you, the Diamond cuts quaintly, you are cozen'd,
Your Chrystal is too brittle.

Clar. 'Tis the Ring.

I gave unto Mentivole, sure the same.

You put me to amazement Sir, and horror;

How came you by that Ring?

Cæs. Does the blood rise?

Clar. Pray Sir resolve me, O for pitty do,
And take from me a trembling at the heart,
That else will kill me: for I too much fear
Nothing but Death could ravish it from his hand
That wore it.

Cæsario. Was it given to Mentivola on that condition?

Clar. Tell me of his health first.

And then I'll tell you any thing.

Cæsario. By my life he's well,

In better health than I am.

Clar. Then it was Sir.

Cæsario. Then shall I ever hate thee, Oh thou false one;
Hast thou a Faith to give unto a friend,
And break it to a brother? Did I not,

By all the tyes of blood importune thee
Never to part with it without my knowledge?
Thou might'st have given it to a Muliter,
And made a contract with him in a stable,
At as cheap a price of my vengeance: never more
Shall a Womans trust beguile me; You are all
Like Relicks: you may well be look't upon,
But come a Man to'th' handling of you once,
You fall in pieces.

Clar. Dear Sir, I have no way
Look't either beneath reason, or my self,
In my election; there's parity in our blood,
And in our fortunes, antient amity
Betwixt our parents: to which wants nothing,
But the Fruit of blest Marriage between us,
To add to their posterities: nor does now
Any impeachment rise, except the sad
And unexpected quarrel, which divided
So noble, and so excellent a friendship,
Which as I ne'er had Magick to foresee,
So I could not prevent.

Cesar. Well, you must give me leave
To have a hand in your disposing, I shall,
In the absence of my Father, be your Guardian;
His Suit must pass through my office. Mentivole;
He has too much of my blood already; he has,
And he get's no more of't—
Wherefore weep you Mother?

Enter Mariana, and a Sailor.

Marian. 'Tis occasion'd by a sorrow,
Wherein you have a Child's part, and the mainest;
Your Father's dead.

Cesar. Dead?

Marian. There's one can relate the rest.

Sailor. I can Sir, your Father's drown'd,
Most unfortunately drown'd.

Cesar. How? In a tempest?

Sailor. No Sir, in a calm,
Calm as this evening; the Gunner being drunk,
Forgot to fasten the Ordnance to their ports,
When came a sudden gust, which tumbled them
All to the Starboard side, o'erturn'd the Ship,
And sunk her in a moment, some six men
That were upon the deck were sav'd: the rest
Perish'd with your Father.

Clarif. O my dearest Father—

Cesar. I pray thee leave us.

Maria. I have a sorrow of another nature, equal to the former.

Cesar. And most commonly they come together.

Maria. The Family of the Baptisti
Are grown to faction, and upon distast
Of the injury late offer'd in my house,
Have vow'd a most severe, and fell revenge
'Gainst all our family, but especially
'Gainst you my dear Cesario.

Cesar. Let them threaten, I am prepar'd to oppose them.

Maria. And is your loss then
Of so easie an estimation? What comfort
Have I but in your life, and your late danger
Presents afore me what I am to suffer,
Should you miscarry; therefore I'll advise you
When the Funeral is over, you would travel,
Both to prevent their fury, and wear out th' injury.

Cesar. No Mother, I will not travel,
So in my absence he may marry my Sister,
I will not travel certain.

Maria. O my Cesario,
Whom I respect and love 'bove my own life,
Indeed with a kind of dotage, he shall never

Go forth o' doors, but the contrary faction
Will indanger's life, and then am I most wretched.
I am thinking of a strange prevention,
Which I shall witness with a bleeding eye,
Fondness sometimes is worse than cruelty. — Exunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Host, Hostess, and Bianca.

Host. HAunted, my house is haunted with goblins. I shall be frighted out of my wits, and set up a sign only to invite Carriers and Foot-posts; scar-crows to keep off the Cavalry, and Gentry of the best rank. I will nail up my doors, and wall up my Girle (wife) like an Anchore's; or she will be ravisht before our faces, by rascalls and cacafugo's (wife) cacafugo's.

Hostess. These are your In-comes, remember your own proverb, the favor of every gain smelt sweet; thank no body but your self for this trouble.

Host. No gauling (dear Spouse) no gauling, every days new vexation abates me two inches in the waste, terrible pennance for an Host, Girle, girle, girle, Which of all this gally-maufray of Mans flesh appears tolerable to thy choice; speak shortly, and speak truly: I must and will know, must and will; Hear ye that?

Bian. Sir, be not jealous of my care and duty;
I am so far from entertaining thoughts
Of liberty, that much more excellent objects
Than any of such course contents as these are,
Could not betray mine eye to force my heart;
Conceive a wish of any dearer happiness
Than your direction warrant's. I am yours Sir.

Hostess. What thinks the Man now? Is not this strange at 13.

Host. Very good words, there's a tang in e'm, and a sweet one, 'tis musick (wife) and now I come t'ee. Let us a little examine the several conditions of our Paragraphistical suitsors. The first, a travelling Tailor, who by the mystery of his Needle and Thimble, hath survey'd the fashions of the French, and English; this Signior Ginger-bread, stitcht up in the shreds of a gudy outside, sows Linings with his cross-leg'd complement, like an Ape doing tricks ever a staffe, cringes, and crouches, and kisses his forefinger.

Hostess. Out upon him.

Host. A second, a lavolteteere, a saltatory, a dancer with a Kit at his Bum, one that, by teaching great Madonnas to foot it, has miraculously purchast a ribanded Wastcote, and four clean pair of socks; a fellow that skips as he walkes, and instead of sensible discourse, vents the curious conceit
of some new tune stolen from a Mask, or a bawdy dittie, elevated for the Pole Artick of a Ladies chamber, in that file stands another of your inamoratoes.

Hostess. Hang him and his Fiddle together, he never fiddles any child of ours.

Host. The third, a Mongrel, got by a Switzer on an Italian; this puppy, being left well estated, comes to Florence, that the world may take notice, how impossible it is for experience to alter the course of nature; a fool (wife) and indeed, a Clown turn'd Gallant, seldom or never proves other than a gallant fool, this toy prates to little purpose other than What's a Clock? Shall's go drink? De'e forsooth?
and thank ye heartily; I fear no art in him to catch thee, and yet we must be tormented with this buzard amongst the rest.

Hostess. 'Tis

Hostess. 'Tis your own folly, forbid him the House.

Host. The fourth, a Mule-driver, a stubborn and a harsh knave: the fifth a School-Master, a very amorous Pedant, run almost mad with study of Sonnets, and Complements out of old Play-ends, the last an Advocates Clerk, that speaks pure Fustian in Law-terms: excellent Courtiers all, and all as neate as a Magnifico's post new painted, at his entrance to an office; thou shalt have none of 'em. Laugh at 'em, do. I say thou shalt have none of 'em.

Bian. Still your command to me shall stand a Law.

Host. Now they throng like so many horse-courfers at a fair, in clusters about the Man of Art, for Love-powders, ingredients, potions, counsels, postures, complements, philters: the Devil and the — How now? Tumults? Batteries, Noise? ha, get from my sight. Clown cries within.

Enter Forobosco, and Clown, his head bloody.

Clow. Murder me, do, pound me to Mummy, do; see what will come on't.

Foro. Dog, leave thy snarling, or I'll cut thy tongue out, Thou un ickt Bear, dar'st thou yet stand my fury, My generous rage? yet! by the sulphurous damps That feed the hungry and incessant darkness, Which curls around the grim Alastors back; Mutter again, and with one powerful word, Ill call an Host up from the Stygian Lakes, Shall waft thee to the Acherontick fens; Where choak't with Mists as black as thy impostures, Thou shalt live still a dying.

Clow. Conjure me to the Devil and you can, I live in Hell upon earth already, and you had any mercy, you would not practice upon a kind heart thus.

Host. You have drawn blood from him Signior, Is his offence unpardonable?

Foro. A lump of ignorance, pray speak not for him, A drowsie grossness, in all Christian Kingdoms, The mention of my art, my name, my practise, Merit and Glory hath begot at once Delight and wonder; I'll not be entreated; Spare intercession for him, — O thou scorn Of learning, shame of duty; must thy sloth Draw my just fame in question? I discharge thee From my service; see me no more henceforth.

Clow. Discharge me! Is that my years wages? I'll not be so answer'd.

Foro. Not Camel? Sirrah I am liberal to thee; Thou hast thy life, be gone.

Clow. Vengeance, sweet vengeance.

Foro. De'e mumble?

Clow. I'll be reveng'd, monstrously, suddenly, and insatiably; my bulk begins to swell.

Foro. Homotolenton, Pragmatophoros, Heliofycorax.

Clow. Call up your Spirits, I despise 'em; well, I'll have Law for my broken pate, twelve ounces of pure blood; Troy-weight. In despite of thee my Master, and thy Master the grand Devil himself, vindicta, vindicta. — Exit.

Host. Signior, you are exceeding mov'd.

Hostess. Mercy upon us, What terrible words thou talk'st?

Foro. A slave, a curr—but be not you affrighted Young Virgin, 'twere an injury to sweetness: Should any rough sound draw from your cheeks, The precious tincture which makes nature proud Of her own workmanship.

Host. Wife, Mark, mark that Wife.

Bian. Shake then your anger off Sir;

Foro. You command it

Fair one, mine Host and Hostess, with your leaves I have a motion joyn'tly to you all.

Hostess. An honest one I hope.

Host. Well put in Wife.

Foro. A very necessary one, the Mefs And half of suitors, that attend to usher Their Loves sir-reverence to your daughter, wait

With one consent, which can best please her eye; In offering at a Dance, I have provided Musick. And, 'twill be something I dare promise Worthy your laughter, Shall they have admittance?

Host. By any means, for I am perswaded the manner will be so

Ridiculous, that it will confirm the assurance of their Miserable fooleries, but no longer trouble with 'em here, Than they are in these May-games.

Foro. So I am resolv'd.

Hostess. Nor any wise word of senceless love.

Foro. Not any; I have charm'd them, Did you see How they prepar'd themselves? how they stroak up Their foretops, how they juggle for the Looking-glasses, To set their faces by it; See they Muster. You would look for some most impossible antick.

Enter Tailor, Dancer, Mule-driver, School-Master, Clark: (all with several papers, and present 'em to Forobosco.)

Host. So, so, so, so, here flutter the nest of Hornets, the hotch-potch of rascallity; now, now, now, now, the dung-hill of corruption hath yawn'd forth the burthen of abomination. I am vext, vext to the soul, will rid my house of this unchristen'd fry, and never open my doors again.

Foro. Some other time, I'll give no answer now, But have preferred your suits, here shew your cunning. First, every one in order do his honor To the fair mark you shoot at; courtly, courtly, Convey your several loves in lively measure:

Come, let us take our seats; some sprightly Musick.

Host. Dance all and part, 'tis a very necessary farewell.

Enter Cæsario, They all make ridiculous congés; Bianca: rank themselves, and dance in several postures: during the dance, Enter Cæsario, and stands off.

Host. Well done my lusty bloods, precisely well done, One lusty rouse of Wine, and take leave on all sides.

Cesar. Thanks for your Revels Gentlemen; accept This Gold, and drink as freely as you danc'd.

Host. My noble Lord Cæsario, clear the rooms Sirs.

Foro. Away. Attend your answers.

— Exeunt Foro, and those that danc'd.

Cesar. With your favor Rolando, I would change a word or two with your fair daughter.

Host. At your Lordships pleasure, come Wife, no muttering, have a care Girle, my love, service, and duty to your good Lordship. — Exeunt and Wife.

Cesar. My often visits (sweet Bianca) cannot But constantly inform thy judgment, wherein Thy happiness consists, for to steal minutes From great employments, to converse with beauty, Lodg'd in so mean a fortune, to lay by Consideration of the unequal distance Between my blood and thine, to shun occasions Of courtship with the Ladies of the time: Noble, and fair, only for love to thee, Must of necessity invite a tenderness; As low as nature could have stamp'd a Bondwomans, To entertain quick motions of rare gratitude For my uncommon favors.

Bian. 'Deed my Lord, as far as my simplicity can lead me, I freely thank your curtesies.

Cesar. To thank them, is to reward them pretty one.

Bian. Then teach me How I may give them back again; in truth I never yet receiv'd a pair of Gloves: A trifling Ring from any that expected An equall satisfaction, but as willingly I parted with the gift unto the owner, as he bestow'd it.

Cesar. But

Cesar. But I pour before thee
Such plenties, as it lies not in the ability
Of thy whole kindred, to return proportionable
One for a thousand.

Bian. You my Lord conclude
For my instruction, to ingage a debt
Beyond a possibility of payment,
I ever thought a sin; and therefore justly
Without conceit of scorn, or curious rudeness,
I must refuse your bounty.

Cesar. Canst thou love?

Bian. Love! Is there such a word in any Language
That carries honest sense?

Cesar. Never dwelt ignorance
In so sweet-shap'd a building: love, Bianca,
Is that firm knot which ties two hearts in one:
Shall ours be tied so?

Bian. Use a plainer word,
My Lord. In stead of ties, say marries hearts;
Then I may understand.

Cesar. Their hearts are married
Whose interchange of pleasures, and embraces;
Soft kisses, and the privacies of sweets,
Keeps constant league together, when temptation
Of great mens oaths and gifts, shall urge contempt,
Rather than batter resolution, novelty
Of sights, or taste of new delights in wantonness,
Breeds surfeit more than appetite in any
Reserv'd to noble vowes; my excellent Maid,
Live thou but true to me, and my contents,
Mine only, that no partner may partake.
The treasure of those sweets thy youth yet glories in;
And I will raise thy lowness to abundance
Of all varieties, and more triumph
In such a Mistress, than great Princes doating
On truth-betraying Wives.

Bian. Thus to yield up then
The cottage of my virtue, to be swallow'd
By some hard-neighbouring Landlord, such as you are,
Is in effect to love, a Lord so vicious!
O where shall innocence find some poor dwelling;
Free from temptations tyranny.

Cesar. Nay prethee.

Bian. Gay clothes, high feeding, easie beds of lust,
Change of unseemly sights; with base discourse,
Draw curses on your Pallaces; for my part,
This I will be confirm'd in, I will eat
The bread of labour, know no other rest
Than what is earn'd from honest pains, ere once more
Lend ear to your vile toyles; Sir, would you were
As noble in desires, as I could be in knowing virtue.
Pray do not afflict a poor soul thus.

Cesar. I swear — to me? — (Bianca steals off;

Enter a Gentleman.

Gent. The Duke my Lord commands your speedy presence
For answering agrievances lately urg'd
Against you by your Mother?

Cesar. By my Mother.

Gent. The Court is near on sitting.

Cesar. I wait on it Sir, — — Exeunt:

Enter Duke, Magistrate, Secretary, Baptista, Attendants, Mentivole: (they sit) Mentivole stands by.

Duke. What waste of blood, what tumults, what divisions,
What outrages, what uprores in a State,
Factions, though issuing from mean springs at first;
Have (not restrain'd) flow'd to, the sad example
At Rome, between the Ursins and Columni's:
Nay, here at home, in Florence, 'twixt the Neers
And the Bianchi, can too mainly witness.
I sit not at the Helm (my Lords) of Sovereignty
Deputed Pilot for the Common-wealth,
To sleep while others steere (as their wild fancies Shall counsel) by the compass of disorders.
Baptista, This short Preface is directed

Chiefly to you, the petty brawls and quarrels
Late urg'd betwixt th' Alberti and your family;
Must, yes, and shall, like tender unknit joynts,
Fasten again together of themselves:
Or like an angry Chyrurgion, we will use
The roughness of our justice, to cut off
The stubborn rancour of the limbes offending.

Bap. Most gracious Florence.

Duke. Our command was signified,
That neither of the followers of each party
Should appear here with weapons.

Bap. 'Tis obey'd Sir, on my side.

Duke. We must leave the general cause
Of State employments, to give ear to brawls
Of some particular grudges, politick government
For tutor'd Princes, but no more henceforth.

Enter Mariana, and Clarissa at one door, Cefario at the other.

Our frown shall check presumption, not our clemency:

Mari. All blessings due to unpartial Princes,
Crown Florence with eternity of happiness.

Cesar. If double Prayers can double blessings (great Sir)
Mine joyn for your prosperity with my Mothers.

Duke. Rise both; now briefly (Lady) without circumstance

Deliver those agrievances; which lately
Your importunity possess our Counsel,
Were fit for audience, wherein you petition'd,
You might be heard without an Advocate,
Which boon you find is granted.

Mari. Though divided.

I stand between the Laws of truth and modesty;
Yet let my griefs have vent: Yet the clearness
Of strange necessity requires obedience
To nature and your Mercy, in my weeds
Of mourning, emblems of too dear misfortunes,
Badges of griefs, and Widdowhood, the burthen
Of my charg'd soul, must be laid down before you;
Wherein, if strict opinion cancel shame,
My frailty is my plea;
Stand forth young Man,
And hear a story that will strike all reason
Into amazement.

Cesar. I attend.

Mar. Alberto (peace dwell upon his ashes) still the husband

Of my remembrance and unchanging vowes,
Has, by his death, left to his heir possession
Of fair renew, which this young man claims
As his inheritance. I urg'd him gently,
Friendly, and privately, to grant a partage
Of this estate to her who owns it all,
This his supposed Sister.

Bap. How supposed?

Cesar. Pray Madam recollect your self.

Mar. The relish

Of a strange truth begins to work like Physick
Already: I have bitterness to mingle
With these preparatives, so deadly loathsome;
It will quite choak digestion; shortly hear it
Cesario, for I dare not rob unjustly
The poor soul of his name; this, this Cesario
Neither for Father had Alberto, me
For Mother, nor Clarissa for his Sister.

Clarif. Mother, O Mother.

Ment. I am in a Dream sure.

Duke. No interruptions. Lady on.

Mari. Mistake not,

Great Duke of Tuscany, or the beginning
Or process of this novelty; my husband
The now deceas'd Alberto, from his youth
In-ur'd to an impatiency, and roughness
Of disposition, when not many months
After our Marriage were worn out, repin'd

At the unfruitful barrenness of youth,
Which, as he pleas'd to terme it, cut our hopes off
From blessing of some issue; to prevent it
I grew ambitious of no fairer honor
Than to preserve his love, and as occasions
Still call'd him from me, studied in his absence
How I might frame his welcome home with comfort.
At last I fain'd my self with Child; the Message
Of freedom, or relief, to one half starv'd
In prison, is not utter'd with such greediness
Of expectation, and delight, as this was
To my much affected Lord; his care, his goodness;
(Pardon me that I use the word) exceeded
All former fears, the hour of my deliverance
As I pretended, drawing near, I fashion'd
My birth-rights at a Country Garden-house,
Where then my Faulk'ners Wife was brought a bed
Of this Cesario; him I own'd for mine;
Presented him unto a joyful Father.

Duke. Can you prove this true?

Mari. Procf; I have most evident;
But oh the curse of my impatience; shortly,
E'r three new Moons had spent their borrow'd Lights,
I grew with Child indeed, so just is Heaven,
The issue of which burthen was this Daughter;
Judge now most gracious Prince, my Lords and you,
What combats then, and since, I have indur'd,
Between a Mothers piety, and weakness
Of a Soul trembling Wife; to have reveal'd
This secret to Alberto, had been danger
Of ruin to my fame, besides the conflict
Of his distractions; now to have suppress'd it,
Were to defeat my Child, my only Child,
Of her most lawful honors, and inheritance.
Cesario, th'art a Man still, Education
Hath moulded thee a Gentleman, continue so;
Let not this fall from greatness sink thee lower
Than worthy thoughts may warrant, yet disclaim
All interest in Alberto's blood, thou hast not
One drop of his or mine.

Duke. Produce your witness.

Marian. The Faulconers Wife his Mother,
And such women as waited then upon me,
Sworn to the privacy of this great secret.

Duke. Give them all their Oaths.

Cesar. O let me crave forbearance, gracious Sir,
Vouchsafe me hearing.

Duke. Speak Cesario.

Cesar. Thus long

I have stood silent, and with no unwillingness,
Attended the relation of my fall,
From a fair expectation; what I fear'd
(Since the first syllable this Lady utter'd
Of my not being hers) benevolent Fates
Have cas'd me off; for to be basely born,
If not base-born, detracts not from the bounty
Of natures freedom, or an honest birth.
Nobility claim'd by the right of blood,
Shewes chiefly, that our Ancestors desir'd
What we inherit; but that Man whose actions
Purchase a real merit to himself,
And ranks him in the file of praise and honor,
Creates his own advancement; let me want
The fuel which best feeds the fires of greatness,
Lordly possessions, yet shall still my gratitude
By some attempts, of mention not unworthy,
Endeavour to return a fit acquittance
To that large debt I owe your favours (Madam)
And great Alberto's memory and goodness;
O that I could as gently shake off passion
For the loss of that great brave Man, as I can shake off
Remembrance of that once I was reputed;
I have not much to say, this Princely presence
Needs not too strictly to examine farther

The truth of this acknowledgment; a Mother
Dares never disavow her only son,
And any woman must come short of Piety,
That can, or disinherit her own issue,
Or fears the voice of rumor for a stranger.
Madam, you have confest, my Father was
A servant to your Lord and you: by interest
Of being his son, I cannot but claim justly
The honor of continuing still my service
To you and yours; which granted, I beg leave
I may for this time be dismiss'd.

Duke. Bold spirit.

Bap. I love thee now with pitty;

Duke. Go not yet —

A sudden tempest that might shake a rock,
Yet he stands firm against it; much it moves me,
He, not Alberto's son, and she a Widdow,
And she a Widdow, — Lords your ear.

Omnes. Your pleasure. — Whispers.

Duke. So, Lady, what you have avouch'd is truth.

Mari. Truth only, gracious Sir.

Duke. Hear then our Sentence.

Since from his cradle you have fed and foster'd
Cesario as your Son, and train'd him up
To hopes of greatness; which now in a moment
You utterly again have ruin'd, this way
We with our Counsel are resolv'd, you being
A Widdow, shall accept him for a husband.

Maria. Husband to me, Sir?

Duke. 'Tis in us to raise him

To honors, and his vertues will deserve 'em.

Maria. But Sir, 'tis in no Prince, nor his Prerogative,
To force a Womans choice against her heart.

Duke. True, if then you appeale to higher Justice,
Our Doom includes this clause upon refusal,
Out of your Lords revenues shall Cesario
Assure to any, whom he takes for Wife,
The inheritance of three parts; the less remainder
Is dowry large enough to marry a daughter;
And we, by our Prerogative, which you question,
Will publickly adopt him into th' name
Of your decess'd Alberto, that the memory
Of so approv'd a Peer may live in him
That can preserve his memory; 'less you find out
Some other means, which may as amply satisfy
His wrong, our Sentence stands irrevocable:
What think you Lords?

Omnes. The Duke is just and honorable.

Bap. Let me embrace Cesario, henceforth ever
I vow a constant friendship.

Mentivole. I remit all former difference.

Cesar. I am too poor

In words to thank this Justice. Madam, alwayes
My studies shall be love to you, and duty.

Duke. Replies we admit none. Cesario wait on us.

Exeunt. Manent, Mentivole, Bap. Mari. Clarif.

Bap. Mentivole.

Menti. My Lord.

Bap. Look on Clarissa, she's noble, rich, young, fair.

Mentivole. My Lord, and virtuous.

Bap. Mentivole and virtuous. — Madam.

Maria. Tyranny of Justice, I shall live report; derision,
That am compell'd to exchange a graceful Widdow-hood
For a continual Martyrdome in Marriage,
With one so much beneath me.

Bap. I'll plead for ye

Boldly and constantly, let your daughter only

Admit my son her servant, at next visit,

Madam, I'll be a messenger of comfort.

Mentivole, be confident and earnest.

Exit.

Maria. Married again, to him too! better 'thad been
The young Man should have still retain'd the honors
Of old Alberto's son, than I the shame
Of making him successor of his bed; I was too blame.

Ment. Indeed

Ment. Indeed without offence,
Madam I think you were,
Claris. You urge it fairly, and like a worthy friend.
Maria. Can you say any thing
In commendation of a Mushroom withered
As soon as started up?

Ment. You scorn an Innocent
Of noble growth, for whiles your husband liv'd
I have heard you boast Cesar in all actions
Gave matter of report of Imitation,
Wonder and envy; let not discontinuance
Of some few dayes strange a sweet opinion
Of virtue, chiefly when, in such extremity,
Your pittie not contempt will argue goodnes.

Maria. O Sir,
Cl. If you would use a thriving courtship,
You cannot utter a more powerfull language
That I shall listen to with greater goodnes
Than th'argument you prosecute; this speaks you
A man compleat and excellent.

Ment. I speak not, they are his own deserts.
Maria. Good Sir forbear,
I am now fully sensible of running
Into a violent Lethargy, whose deadlines
Locks up all reason, I shall never henceforth
Remember my past happiness.

Ment. These clouds may be disperst.
Maria. I fear continuall night
Will over-shroud me, yet poor youth his trespass
Lies in his fortune, not the cruelty
Of the Duke's sentence.

Cl. I dare think it does.
Maria. If all fail I will learn thee to conquer
Adversity with sufferance.
Ment. You resolve Nobly. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Cesar and a Servant.

Cesar. Let any friend have entrance.

Servant. Sir a'shall.

Cesar. Any, I except none.

Serv. We know, your mind Sir —Exit.

Cesar. Pleasures admit no bounds.

I am pitcht so high
To such a growth of full prosperities
That to conceal my fortunes were an injury
To gratefulness, and those more liberall favours
By whom my glories prosper. He that flows
In gracious and swolne tydes of best abundance,
Yet will be Ignorant of his own fortunes,
Deserves to live contemn'd, and dye forgotten;
The harvest of my hopes is now already
Ripen'd and gather'd, I can fatten youth
With choice of plenty, and supplies of comforts,
My fate springs in my own hand, and I'll use it.

Enter 2 Servants and Biancha.

1 'Tis my place,

2 Yours? here fair one, I'll acquaint my Lord.

1 He's here, go to him boldly.

2 Please you to let him understand how readily

I waited on your errand?

1 Saucy fellow, you must excuse his breeding.

Cesar. What's the matter?

Biancha, my Biancha, to your offices. Exit Ser.

This visit (Sweet) from thee (my pretty dear)
By how much more 'twas unexpected, comes
So much the more timely: witness this free welcome,
What ere occasion led thee.

Bian. You must guess Sir,
Yet indeed 'tis a rare one.

Ces. Prethee speak it, my honest virtuous maid.

Bian. Sir I have heard
Of your misfortunes, and I cannot tell you
Whether I have more cause of joy or sadness,
To know they are a truth.

Ces. What truth Biancha? misfortunes, how, wherein?

Bian. You are disclaym'd
For being the Lord Alberto's Son, and publickly Acknowleg'd of as mean a birth as mine is,
It cannot chuse but greve ye.

Ces. Greive me? ha ha ha ha? is this all?

Bian. This all?

Ces. Thou art sorry for't
I warrant thee: alas good soul, Biancha,
That which thou call'st misfortune is my happiness,
My happiness Biancha.

Bian. If you love me, it may prove mine too.

Ces. May it? I will love thee.

My good, good maid,
If that can make thee happy,
Better and better love thee,

Bian. Without breach then
Of modesty I come to claime the Interest
Your protestations, both by vows and letters,
Have made me owner of: from the first hour
I saw you, I confess I wisht I had been
Or not so much below your rank and greatness,
Or not so much above those humble flames
That should have warm'd my bosome with a temperate
Equality of desires in equal fortunes.

Still as you utter'd Language of affection,
I courted time to pass more slowly on
That I might turn more fool to lend attention
To what I durst not credit, nor yet hope for:
Yet still as more I heard, I wisht to hear more.

Ces. Didst thou introth wench?

Bian. Willingly betraid
My self to hopeles bondage.

Ces. A good girl,
I thought I should not miss
What ere thy answer was.

Biancha. But as I am a maid Sir, and I'faith
You may believe me, for I am a maid,
So dearly I respected both your fame
And quality, that I would first have perisht
In my sick thoughts than ere have given consent
To have undone your fortunes by inviting
A marriage with so mean an one as I am.
I should have dyed sure, and no creature known
The sickness that had kill'd me.

Ces. Pretty heart, good Soul, alas, alas.

Bian. Now since I know
There is no difference 'twixt your birth and mine,
Not much 'twixt our estates, if any be,
The advantage is on my side, I come willingly
To tender you the first fruits of my heart,
And am content t'accept you for my husband,
Now when you are at lowest.

Ces. For a husband?
Speak sadly, dost thou mean so?

Bian. In good deed Sir,
'Tis pure love makes this proffer.

Ces. I believe thee,
What counsail urg'd thee on, tell me, thy Father
My worshipfull smug Host? wast not he wench?
Or mother Hostess? ha?

Bian. D'ee mock my parentage?

D d d

I doe

I doe not scorn yours.
Mean folks are as worthy
To be well spoken of if they deserve well,
As some whose onely fame lies in their blood,
O y^e are a proud poor man: all your oaths falshood,
Your vows deceit, your letters forg'd, and wicked.

Cef. Thou'dst be my wife, I dare sweare.

Bian. Had your heart.

Your hand and tongue been twins, you had reputed
This courtesy a benefit.

Cef. Simplicity,

How prettily thou mov'st me? why Biancha,
Report has coz'ned thee, I am not fallen
From my expected honors, or possessions,
Though from the hope of birthright.

Bian. Are you not?

Then I am lost again, I have a suit too;
You'll grant it if you be a good man.

Cef. Any thing,

Bian. Pray doe not talk of ought what I have said t'ee.

Cef. As I wish health I will not.

Bian. Pity me, but never love me more.

Cef. Nay now y^e are cruell,

Why all these tears?—Thou shalt not go.

Bian. I'll pray for ye

That you may have a virtuous wife, a fair one,
And when I am dead—

Cef. Fy, fy.

Bian. Think on me sometimes,
With mercy for this trespass.

Cef. Let us kiss

At parting as at coming.

Bian. This I have

As a free dower to a virgins grave,
All goodness dwell with ye.—Exit.

Cef. Harmeless Biancha! unskill'd;
What handsome toys are maids to play with?

Enter Mariana and Clarissa.

How innocent? but I have other thoughts
Of nobler meditation.—my felicity,
Thou comest as I could wish, lend me a lip
Soft as melting as when old Alberto
After his first nights triall taking farewell
Of thy youth's conquest tasted.

Maria. You are uncivill.

Cef. I will be Lord of my own pleasures, Madam
Y^e are mine, mine freely,
Come, no whimpering henceforth
New can the lessons of loves best experience,
That our delights may meet in equal measure
Of resolutions and desires; this fullness
Is scurvy, I like it not,

Mar. Be modest.

And do not learn Cesario how to prostitute
The riot of thy hopes to common folly;
Take a sad womans word, how ere thou doat'st
Upon the present graces of thy greatnes.
Yea I am not fallen so below my constancy
To virtue, nor the care which I once tend'red
For thy behoof that I prefer a sentence
Of cruelty before my honor.

Cef. Honor!

Maria. Hear me, thou seest this girl! now the comfort
Of my last days. She is the onely pledge
Of a bed truly noble: shee had a father
(I need not speak him more than thou remembrest)
Whom to dishonor by a meaner choice,
Were injury and infamy.

Clarif. To goodnes,
To time and virtuous mention.

Mar. I have vow'd,

Observe me now Cesario, that how ere
I may be forc'd to marry, yet no tyranny,
Persuasions, flattery, guifts, intreats, or tortures,
Shall draw me to a second bed.

Clar. Tis just too.

Maria. Yes and 'tis just Clarissa. I allow
The Duke's late sentence, am resolv'd young man
To be thy wife, but when the ceremony
Of marriage is perform'd, in life I will be,
Though not in name, a widdow.

Cef. Pray a word t'ee,

Shall I in earnest never be your bedfellow?

Maria. Never, O never; and 'tis for your good too.

Cef. Prove that.

Mar. Alas too many years are numbred
In my account to entertain the benefit
Which youth in thee Cesario, and ability
Might hope for and require, it were Injustice
To rob a gentleman deserving memory
Of Issue to preserve it.

Cef. No more herein,

You are an excellent pattern of true piety,
Let me now turn your advocate. Pray look into The order of the Duke. Injoyn'd, admit
I satisfie the sentence without marriage
With you, how then?

Mar. Cesario.

Cef. If I know

How to acquit your fears, yet keep th'injunction
In every clause whole and entire, your charity
Will call me still your servant.

Mar. Still my son.

Cef. Right Madam, now you have it, still your son.
The Genius of your blessings hath instructed
Your tongue oraculously, we will forget
How once I and Clarissa enterchang'd
The eyes of brother and of sister, henceforth
New stile us man and wife.

Cl. By what authority?

Cef. Heavens great appointment, yet in all my dotage
On thy perfections, when I thought Clarissa
We had been pledges of one womb, no lose
No wanton heat of youth, desir'd to claime
Priority in thy affections, other
Than nature might commend. Chastly I tend'red
Thy welfare as a brother ought; but since
Our bloods are strangers, let our hearts contract
A long life-lasting unity, for this way
The sentence is to be observ'd or no way.

Mar. Then no way.

Cef. I expected other answer Madam from you.

Mar. No, every age shall curse me,
The monster, and the prodigie of nature,
Horrors beyond extremity.

Cl. Pray mother confine the violence of greif.

Cef. Yes mother, pray do.

Mar. Thus some catch at a matrons honor
By flying lust to plot incestuous witchcrafts.
More terrible than whoredomes; cruell mercy!
When to preserve the body from a death
The soul is strangled.

Cef. This is more than passion,
It comes near to distraction.

Mar. I am quieted.

Cesario, thou mayest tell the Duke securely
Alberto's titles, honors and revenues,
The Duke may give away, enjoy them thou.
Clarissas birthright, Marianas dower
Thou shalt be Lord of; turn us to the world
Vnpittied and unfriended, yet my bed
Thou never sleep'st in; as for her; she hears me,
If she as much as in a thought consent;
That thou may'st call her wife, a Mothers curse
Shall never leave her.

Clar.

Clar. As a brother once
I lov'd you, as a noble friend yet honor ye,
But for a husband sir, I dare not own you,
My faith is given already.

Cef. To a Villain, I'll cut his throat.

Mar. Why this is more than passion?
It comes near a distraction.

Clar. Call to mind Sir.
How much you have abated of that goodness
Which once reign'd in ye, they appear'd so lovely
That such as friendship led to observation

Enter Baptista and Mentivole.

Courted the great example.

Cef. Left, and flatter'd into a broad derision?

Mar. Why d'ee think so?

My Lord Baptista, is your Son grown cold in hasting on the marriage, which his vows
Have seal'd to my wrong'd daughter?

Bap. We come Lady, to consummate the contract.

Cef. With Mentivole? is he the man?

Ment. Clarissas, troth and mine,
Cesario, are recorded in a character
So plain and certain, that except the hand
Of heaven, which writ it first, would blot it out again,
No humane power can raze it.

Cef. But say you so too young Lady?

Cl. I should else betray

My heart to falsehood, and my tongue to perjury.

Cef. Madam, you know the sentence.

Bap. From the Duke,
I have particular comforts which require
A private care.

Mar. I shall approve it gladly

We are resolv'd Cesario.

Bap. Be not insolent upon a Princes favor.

Cl. Loose no glory,

Your younger years have purchast.

Ment. And deserved too, y'have many worthy freinds.

Bap. Preserve and use them. Exeunt: Mant & far.

Cef. Good, very good, why here's a complement
Of mirth in desperation, I could curse
My fate: O with what speed men tumble down
From hopes that soar too high. Biancha now
May scorn me justly too, Clarissa married,
Albertos widdow resolute, Biancha
Refus'd, and I forsaken: let me study,
I can but die a batchelor that's the worst on't. Exit.

Enter Host, Taylor, Muliter, Dancer, Pedant, Coxcombe.

Host. Come Gentlemen,
This is the day that our great artist hath
Promis'd to give all your severall suits satisfaction.

Dancer. Is he stirring?

Host. He hath been at his book these to hours.

Pedant. He's a rare Phylitian.

Host. Why I'll tell you,
Were Paracelsus the German now
Living, he'd take up his single rapier against his Terrible long sword, he makes it a matter of nothing
To cure the gout, sore eyes he takes out as familiarly,
Washes them, and puts them in again,
As you'd blanch almonds.

Tay. They say he can make gold.

Host. I, I, he learnt it of Kelly in Germany.
There's not a Chymist
In christendome can goe beyond him for multiplying.

Pedant. Take heed then;

He get not up your daughters belly my Host.

Host. You are a merry Gentleman
And the man of art will love you the better.

Dancer. Does he love mirth and crotchets?

Host. O he's the most courteous Phylitian,
You may drink or drab in's company freely,
The better he knows how your disease grows,
The better he knows how to cure it.

Danc. But I wonder my Host
He has no more resort of Ladyes to him.

Host. Why Sir?

Dan. O divers of them have great beleif in conjurers:
Lechery is a great help to the quality.

Host. He's scarce known to be in town yet,
Ere long we shall have 'em come
Hurrying hither in Fetherbeds.

Dan. How? bedridden?

Host. No sir, in fetherbeds that move upon 4 wheels in Spanish caroches.

Ped. Pray acquaint him we give attendance.

Host. I shall gentlemen; I would fain be rid
Of these rascalls, but that they raise profit
To my wine ce ar.

When I have made use of them sufficiently,
I will intreat the conjurer to tye crackers to their tails,
And send them packing.

Enter Forebosco as in his Study. (A paper)

Foro. Come hither mine Host, look here,

Host. What's that?

Foro. A challenge from my man.

Host. For breaking's pate?

Foro. He writes here if I meet him not i'th' Feild within this half hour,
I shall hear more from him.

Host. O sir, minde your profit,
Ne'er think of the rascall, here are the gentlemen.

Foro. 'Morrow my worthy clients,
What are you all prepar'd of your questions;
That I may give my resolution upon them?

Omnes. We are Sir.

Pedant. And have brought our mony.

Foro. Each then in order,
And differ not for precedency.

Dan. I am buying of an office Sir,
And to that purpose I would fain learn
To dissemble cunningly.

Foro. Doe you come to me for that? you should rather Have gone to a cunning woman.

Danc. I sir but their Instructions are but like woman,
Pretty well but not to the depth, as I'd have it:
You are a conjurer, the devils Master,
And I would learn it from you so exactly.

Foro. That the devil himself
Might not go beyond you.

Danc. You are i'th' right Sir.

Foro. And so your mony for your purchase
Might come in again within a 12 month.

Danc. I would be a Graduate sir, no freshman.

Foro. Here's my hand sir,
I will make you dissemble so methodically,
As if the divell should be sent from the great Turk,
In the shape of an Embassador
To set all the christian princes at variance.

Danc. I cannot with any modesty desire any more.
There's your mony sir.

Foro. For the art of dissembling.

Cox. My suit sir will be news to you when I tell it.

Foro. Pray on.

Cox. I would set up a press here in Italy,
To write all the Corantos for Christendome:

Foro. That's news indeed,
And how would you employ me in't?

Cox. Marry sir, from you
I would gain my intelligence.

Foro. I conceive you, you would have me furnish you
With a spirit to informe you.

Cox. But as quiet a Divell as the woman,
The first day and a half after she's married,
I can by no means indure a terrible one.

Foro. No, no, I'll qualifie him,
He shall not fright you,
It shall be the ghost of some lying Stationer,
A Spirit shall look as if butter would not melt in his mouth. A new Mercurius Gallo-belgicus.

Cox. O there was a captain was rare at it.

Foro. Ne'er thinke of him,
Though that captain writ a full hand gallop,
And wasted indeed more harmeles paper than Ever did laxative Physick,
Yet will I make you to ont-scribble him,
And set down what you please,
The world shall better believe you.

Cox. Worthy sir I thank you, there's mony.

Foro. A new office
For writing pragmatikall Curranto's
Pedant. I am a school-master sir,
And would fain conferre with you
About erecting 4 new sects of religion at Amsterdam.

Foro. What the Divell should
New sects of religion doe there?

Pedant. I assure you I would get
A great deal of money by it.

Foro. And what are the 4 new sects
Of religion you would plant there?

Ped. Why that's it I come about sir,
'Tis a Divel of your raising must invent 'em,
I confeis I am too weak to compass it.

Foro. So sir, then you make it a matter of no difficulty
To have them tolerated.

Pedant. Trouble not your self for that,
Let but your Divel set them a foot once.
I have Weavers, and Ginger-bread makers,
And mighty Aquavita-men, shall set them a going.

Foro. This is somewhat difficult,
And will aske some conference with the divell.

Ped. Take your own leasure sir,
I have another business too, because I mean
To leave Italy, and bury my self in those neather parts
Of the low countries.

Foro. What's that sir.

Ped. Marry I would fain make 9 dayes to the week, for the more ample benefit of the captain.

Foro. You have a shrewd pate sir.

Ped. But how this might be compass'd?

Foro. Compass'd easily; tis but making
A new Almanack, and dividing the compass
Of the year into larger penny-worths,
As a Chandler with his compass makes
A Geom trick proportion of the Holland cheefe
He retails by stivers.

But for getting of it licenc'd?

Ped. Trouble not your self with that sir,
There's your mony,

Foro. For four new sects of religions,
And 9 dayes to the week.

Ped. To be brought in at general pay-dayes,
Write I beseech you.

Foro. At generall pay-dayes.

Taylor. I am by profession a Taylor,
You have heard of me.

Foro. Yes sir, and will not steal from you
The least part of that commendation I have heard utter'd.

Taylor. I take measure of your worth sir,
And because I will not afflict you with any large bill
Of circumstances, I will snip off particulars.
I would fain invent some strange
And exquisite new fashions.

Foro. Are you not travel'd sir.

Tay. Yes sir, but have observ'd all we can see
Or invent, are but old ones with new names to 'em,

Now I would some way or other grow more curious.

Foro. Let me see; to devise new fashions—
Were you never in the Moon?

Tay. In the Moon tavern! yes sir, often.

Foro. No, I do mean in the new world,
In the world that's in the Moon yonder.

Tay. How? a new world 'ith' moon?

Foro. Yes I assure you.

Tay. And peopled?

Foro. O most fantastikally peopled.

Tay. Nay certain then there's work for taylors?

Foro. That there is I assure you.

Tay. Yet I have talked with a Scotch taylor
That never discover'd so much to me,
Though he has travell'd far, and was a pedlar in Poland.

Foro. That was out of his way,

This lies beyond China:

You would study new fashions you say?

Take my counsell, make a voyage,
And discover that new world.

Tay. Shall I be a moon-man?

Foro. I am of opinion, the people of that world
(If they be like the nature of that climate they live in)
Do vary the fashion of their cloaths oftener than any Quick-silver'd nation in Europe.

Tay. Not unlikely, but what should that be we call
The man in the moon then?

Foro. Why 'tis nothing but an Englishman
That stands there stark naked,
With a pair of sheers in one hand,
And a great bundle of broad cloath in the other
(Which resembles the bush of thorns)
Cutting out of new fashions.

Taylor. I have heard somewhat like this,
But how shall I get thither?

Foro. I'll make a new compass shall direct you.

Tay. Certain?

Foro. Count me else for no man of direction.

Tay. There's 20 duckats in hand, at my return
I'll give you a 100.

Foro. A new voyage to discover new fashions.

Mul. I have been a traveller too sir,
That have shewed strange beasts in Christendome,
And got money by them, but I find the trade to decay.
Your Camelion, or East-Indian hedg-hog
Gets very little mony, and your Elephant devours
So much bread, brings in so little profit,
His keeper were better every morning
Cram 15 Taylors with white manchet:
I would have some new spectacle,
And one that might be more attractive.

Foro. Let me see, were you ever in Spain?

Mule. Not yet Sir.

Foro. I would have you go to Madrill, and against some great festivall, when the court lies there; provide a great and spacious English Oxe, and roast him whole, with a pudding in's bely; that would be the eighth wonder of the world in those parts I assure you.

Mule. A rare project without question.

Foro. Goe beyond all their garlike olle padridoes, though you sod one in Garguontuas couldron, bring in more money, then all the monsters of Affrick.

Host. Good Sir do your best for him; he's of my acquaint-tance, and one if ye knew him-----

Foro. What is he?

Host. He was once a man of infinite letters.

Foro. A Scholar?

Host. No sir, a packet carrier, which is alwaies a man of many letters, you know: then he was Mule-driver, now he's a gentleman, and feeds monsters.

Foro. A most ungratefull calling.

Mule. There's money for your direction; the price of the Oxe Sir?

Foro. A hundred French crowns, for it must be a Lincolne shire shire Oxe, and a prime one:

For a rare and monstrous spectacle, to be seen at Madrid.

Enter Clown, Hostess, and Bianca.

Hostess. Pray forbear sir, we shall have a new quarrell.

Clown. You durst not meet me 'ith field, I am therefore come to spoyl your market.

Foro. What's the newes with you sir.

Clown. Gentlemen, you that come hither to be most abominably cheated, listen, and be as wise as your planet will suffer you, keep your mony, be not gul'd, be not laught at.

Pedant. What means this? would I had my mony again in my pocket.

Host. The fellow is full of malice, do not mind him.

Clown. This profest cheating rogue was my master, and I confesse my self a more preternotorious rogue than himself, in so long keeping his villainous counsell.

Foro. Come, come, I will not hear you.

Clown. No couz'ner, thou wouldst not hear me, I do but dare thee to suffer me to speak, and then thou and all thy divells spit fire, and spout Aqua fortis.

Foro. Speak on, I freely permit thee.

Clown. Why then know all you simple animals, you whose purses are ready to cast the calf, if they have not cast it already, if you give any credit to this jugling rascal, you are worse than simple widgins, and will be drawn into the net by this decoy duck, this tame cheater.

Foro. Ha, ha, ha, pray mark him

Clown. He does profess Physicke, and counjuring; for his Physick; he has but two medicines for all manner of diseases; when he was i'th' low cuntryes, he us'd nothing but butter'd beer, colour'd with Allegant, for all kind of maladies, and that he called his catholick med'cine; sure the Dutch smelt out it was butter'd beer, else they would never have endur'd it for the names sake: then does he minister a grated Dogs turd instead of Rubarb, many times of Unicornes horn, which working strongly with the conceit of the Patient, would make them bescummer to the height of a mighty purgation.

Foro. The rogue has studied this invective.

Clown. Now for his conjuring, the witches of Lapland are the divells chare-women to him, for they will sell a man a wind to some purpose; he sells wind, and tells you for tie lyes over and over.

Hostess. I thought what we should find of him.

Host. Hold your prating, be not you an heretick.

Clown. Conjure! I'll tell you, all the divells names he calls upon are but fustion names, gather'd out of welch heraldry; in breif, he is a rogue of six reprieves, four pardons of course, thrice pilloried, twice sung Lacrymæ to the Virginalls of a carts tail, h'as five times been in the Gallies, and will never truly run himself out of breath, till he comes to the gallowes.

Foro. You have heard worthy gentlemen, what this lying, detracting rascal has vomited.

Tay. Yes certain, but we have a better trust in you, for you have ta'en our money.

Foro. I have so, truth is he was my servant, and for some chastisement I gave him, he does practise thus upon me; speak truly sirra, are you certain I cannot conjure?

Clown. Conjure! ha, ha, ha.

Foro. Nay, nay, but be very sure of it.

Clown. Sure of it? why I'll make a bargain with thee, before all these gentlemen, use all thy art, all thy roguery, and make me do any thing before al this company I have not a mind to, I'll first give thee leave to claime me for thy bond slave, and when thou hast done hang me.

Foro. 'Tis a match, sirra, I'll make you caper i'th' air presently.

Clown. I have too solid a body, and my belief is like a Puritans on Good-Friday, too high fed with capon.

Foro. I will first send thee to Green-land for a haunch of venison, just of the thickness of thine own tallow.

Clown. Ha, ha, ha, I'll not stir an inch for thee.

Foro. Thence to Ambayna i'th' East Indies, for pepper to bake it.

Clown. To Ambayna? so I might be pepper'd.

Foro. Then will I convey thee stark naked to Develing to beg a pair of brogs, to hide thy mountainous buttocks.

Clown. And no doublet to 'em?

Foro. No sir, I intend to send you of a sleeveless errand; but before you vanish, in regard you say I cannot conjure, and are so stupid, and opinionated a slave, that neither I, nor my art can compell you to do any thing that's beyond your own pleasure, the gentlemen shall have some sport, you cannot endure a cat sirra?

Clown. What's that to thee lugler?

Foro. Nor you'll do nothing at my entreaty?

Clown. I'll be hang'd first.

Foro. Sit Gentlemen, and whatsoever you see, be not frightened,

Hostess. Alas I can endure no conjuring.

Host. Stir not wife.

Bian. Pray let me go sir, I am not fit for these fooleries.

Host. Move not daughter,

For. I wil make you dance a new dance call'd leap-frog

Clown. Ha, ha, ha.

For. And as naked as a frog.

Clown. Ha, ha, ha, I desie thee.

Forobosco looks in a book, strikes with his wand, Musick plays.

Enter 4. Boyes shap'd like Frogs, and dance.

Padant. Sprits of the water in the likeness of frogs.

Tay. He has fisht fair believe me.

Mule. See, see, he sweats and trembles.

Foro. Are you come to your quavers?

Clown. Oh, ho, ho.

Foro. I'll make you run division on that o'r ere I leave you, looke you, here are the playfellows that are so indear'd to you; come sir, first uncase, and then dance, nay I'll make him dance stark naked.

Host. Oh let him have his shirt on and his Mogols breeches, here are Women ith' house.

Foro. Well for their sakes he shall.

Clown teares off his doublet, making strange faces as if compel'd to it, falls into the Dance.

Tay. He dances, what a lying rogue was this to say the gentleman could not conjure?

Foro. He does prettily well, but 'tis voluntary, I assure you, I have no hand in't.

Clown. As you are a Counjurer, and a rare Artist, free me from these couplets; of all creatures I cannot endure a Frog.

Foro. But your dancing is voluntary, I can compell you to nothing.

Hostess. O me, daughter, lets take heed of this fellow, he'll make us dance naked, an' we vex him.

— Exeunt Hostess and Bianca.

Foro. Now cut capers sirra, I'll plague that chine of yours

Clown. Ho, ho, ho, my kidneys are roasted. I drop away like a pound of butter roasted.

Tayl. He will dance himself to death.

Foro. No matter I'll sell his fat to the Pothecaries, and repair my injury that way.

Host. Enough in conscience.

Foro. Well, at your entreaty vanish. And now I wil only make him break his neck in doing a sommerfet, and that's all the revenge I mean to take of him.

Clown. O gentlemen, what a rogue was I to belye so an approved Master in the noble dark science? you can witness, this I did only to spoyle his practise and deprive you of the happyness of enjoying his worthy labors; rogue that I was to do it, pray sir forgive me.

Fero. With what face canst thou ask it?

Clow. With such a face as I deserve, with a hanging look, as all here can testifye.

Fero. Well gentlemen, that you may perceive the goodness of my temper, I will entertain this rogue againe in hope of amendment, for should I turn him off, he would be hang'd.

Clow. You may read that in this foul copy.

Fero. Only with this promise, you shall never cozen any of my patients.

Clow. Never.

Fero. And remember hence forward, that though I cannot conjure, I can make you dance sirra, go get your self into the cottage again.

Enter Cesario.

Clow. I will never more dance leap-Frog: now I have got you into credit, hold it up, and cozen them in abundance.

Fero. Oh rare rascal.

—— Exit Clow.

Cesar. How now, a Frankford mart here, a Mountebank, and his worshipfull auditory?

Host. They are my guests Sir.

Cesar. A —— upon them, shew your juggling tricks in some other room.

Host. And why not here Sir?

Cesar. Hence; or sirra I shall spoil your figure flinging, and all their radicall questions.

Omnes Sir we vanish.

Exeunt. Manet Host. & Cesar.

Host. Signior Cesario, you make bold with me, And somewhat I must tell you to a degree Of ill manners: they are my guests, and men I live by, And I would know by what authority You command thus far.

Cesar. By my interest in your daughter.

Host. Interest do you call't? as I remember I never put her out to Vsury on that condition.

Cesar. Pray thee be not angry.

Enter Bianca and Hostess.

I am come to make thee happy, and her happy: She's here; alas my pretty soul, I am come To give assurance that's beyond thy hope, Or thy beleif, I bring repentance 'bout me, And satisfaction, I will marry thee.

Bianca. Ha?

Cesar. As I live I will, but do not entertain't With too quick an apprehension of joy, For that may hurt thee, I have heard some dye of 't, Bian. Do not fear me.

Cesar. Then thou think'st I feign This protestation, I will instantly Before these testifye my new alliance, Contract my self unto thee, then I hope We may be more private.

Host. But thou shalt not sir, For so has many a maiden-head been lost, and many a bastard gotten,

Ces. Then to give you the best of any assurance in the world,

Entreat thy father to go fetch a Preist Wee will instantly to bed, and there be married.

Bian. Pride hath not yet forsaken you I see, Though prosperity has.

Host. Sir you are too confident To fashion to your self a dream of purchase When you are a begger.

Ces. You are bold with me.

Hostess. Doe we not know your value is cried down Fourscore i'th' hundred.

Bian. Oh sir I did love you

With such a fixed heart, that in that minute Wherein you slighted, or contemn'd me rather, I took a vow to obey your last decree, And never more look up at any hope Should bring me comfort that way: and though since Your Foster-mother, and the fair Clarissa Have in the way of marriage despis'd you, That hath not any way bred my revenge, But compassion rather. I have found So much sorrow in the way to a chaste wedlock That here I will set down, and never wish To come to'th' journies end. Your suit to mee Henceforth be ever silenc'd.

Cesar. My Bianca.

Hostess. Henceforward pray forbear her and my house: She's a poor virtuous wench, yet her estate May weigh with yours in a gold balance.

Host. Yes, and her birth in any Heralds office in Christendom.

Hostess. It may prove so:

When you'll say, you have leapt a Whiting.

Exit

Enter Baptista and Mentivole.

Ces. How far am I grown behind hand with fortune?

Bap. Here's Cesario!

My son Sir, is to morrow to be married Unto the fair Clarissa.

Ces. So.

Ment. Wee hope you'll be a guest there.

Ces. No I will not grace your triumph so much.

Bap. I will not tax your breeding.

But it alters not your birth Sir, fare you well.

Ment. Oh Sir, doe not greive him,

He has too much affliction already.

Exeunt.

Enter a Sailor.

Ces. Every way scorn'd and lost, Shame follow you

For I am grown most miserable.

Sail. Sir do you know a Ladies son in town here They cal Cesario?

Cesar. There's none such I assure thee;

Sail. I was told you were the man.

Cesar. What's that to thee?

Sail. A —— on't. You are melancholy, will you drink Sir?

Cesar. With whom?

Sail. With me Sir; despise not this pitch'd Canvas; the time was we have known them lin'd with Spanish Duckets; I have news for you:

Cesar. For me!

Sail. Not unless you'll drink;

We are like our Sea provision, once out of pickle, We require abundance of drink; I have news to tell you,

That were you Prince,

Would make you send your mandate

To have a thousand bonfires made i'th' City

And pist out agen with nothing but Greek wine.

Cesar. Come, I will drink with thee howsoever,

Sail. And upon these terms I will utter my mind to you.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Alberto, Prospero, Juliana and Sailors.

Sail. Shall we bring your necessaries ashore my Lord?

Alb. Do what you please, I am land-sick, worse by far Than ere I was at sea,

Prof. Collect your self.

Alber. O my most worthy Prospero, my best friend, The noble favor I receiv'd from thee In freeing me from the Turks I now accompt Worse than my death; for I shall never live To make requitall; what do you attend for?

Sail. To understand your pleasure.

Alber. They do mock me;

I do protest I have no kind of pleasure In any thing i'th' world, but in thy friendship, I must ever except that.

Prof. Pray leave him, leave him. — Exeunt Sailors.

Alber. The news I heard related since my landing Of the division of my Family, How is it possible for any man To bear't with a set patience?

Prof. You have suffer'd

Since your imprisonment more waighty sorrows.

Alber. I, then I was man of flesh and blood, Now I am made up of fire, to the full height Of a deadly Calenture; O these vild women That are so ill preservers of mens honors, They cannot govern their own honesties. That I should thirty and odd winters feed My expectation of a noble heir, And by a womans falshood find him now A fiction, a mere dream of what he was; And yet I love him still.

Prof. In my opinion

The sentence (on this tryall) from the Duke Was noble, to repair Cesar's loss With the marriage of your wife, had you been dead.

Alber. By your favor but it was not, I conceive T'was disparagement to my name, to have my widdow Match with a Faulkeiners son, and yet beli've't I love the youth still, and much pittie him. I do remember at my going to Sea, Upon a quarrel, and a hurt receiv'd From young Mentivole, my rage so far Oretopt my nobler temper, I gave charge To have his hand cut off, which since I heard, And to my comfort, brave Cesar, Worthyly prevented.

Prof. And 'twas nobly done.

Alber. Yet the revenge, for this intent of mine Hath bred much slaughter in our families, And yet my wife (which infinitely moans me) Intends to marry my sole heir Clarissa To the head branch of the other faction.

Prof. 'Tis the mean to work reconcilment.

Alber. Between whom?

Prof. Your self and the worthy Baptista.

Alber. Never.

Prof. O you have been of a noble and remarkable friendship,

And by this match 'tis generally in Florence Hop'd, 'twill fully be reconcil'd; to me 'Twould be absolute content.

Julia. And to my self, I have main interest in it.

Alb. Noble Sir, you may command my heart to break for you

But never to bend that way; poor Cesar, Whien thou put't on thy mournfull willow-garland, Thy enemy shall be fitted (I do vow) In the same livery, my Cesar Loved as my foster child, though not my Son, Which in some countrys formerly were barbarous, Was a name held most affectionate; thou art lost, Vnfortunate young man, not only slighted Where thou received'st thy breeding, but since scorn'd I th' way of marriage, by the poor Bianca The In-keepers daughter.

Prof. I have heard of that too; But let not that afflict you: for this Lady May happily deliver at more leasure A circumstance may draw a fair event, Better than you can hope for. For this present we must leave you, And shall visit you again within these two hours.

— Enter Cesar.

Alber. Ever to me most welcome, — O my Cesar.

Cesar. I am none of yours Sir, so 'tis protested; And I humbly beg,

Since 'tis not in your power to preserve me Any longer in a noble course of life, Give me a worthy death.

Alber. The youth is mad.

Cesar. Nay Sir, I will instruct you in a way To kill me honorably.

Alber. That were most strange.

Cesar. I am turning Pirate, You may be employed By the Duke to fetch me in; and in a Sea-fight Give me a noble grave.

Alber. Questionless he's mad: I would give any Doctor A thousand crowns to free him from this sorrow.

Cesar. Here's the Physitian. — Shows a Pouard.

Alber. Hold Sir, I did say

To free you from the sorrow, not from life.

Cesar. Why life and sorrow are uneparable.

Alber. Be comforted Cesar, Mentivole Shall not marry Clarissa.

Cesar. No Sir, ere he shall, I'll kill him.

Alber. But you forfeit your own life then.

Cesar. That's worth nothing.

Alber. Cesar, be thy self, be mine Cesar: Make not thy self incapable of that portion I have full purpose to confer upon thee? By falling into madness: bear thy wrongs With noble patience, the afflicted's friend Which ever in all actions crowns the end.

Ces. You well awak'd me; nay recover'd me Both to sence and full life, O most noble sir, Though I have lost my fortune, and lost you For a worthy Father: yet I will not lose My former virtue, my integrity Shall not yet forsake me; but as the wild Ivy, Spreads and thrives better in some pittious ruin Of tower, or defac'd Temple, than it does Planted by a new building; so shall I Make my adversity my instrument To winde me up into a full content.

Alber. 'Tis worthily resolv'd; our first adventure Is to stop the marriage; for thy other losses, Practis'd by a womans malice, but account them Like conjurers winds rais'd to a fearfull blast, And do some mischief, but do never last. Exeunt.

Enter Forobosco and Clown.

Clow. Now sir, will you not acknowledge that I have mightily advanc'd your practice?

Forobos. 'Tis confest, and I will make thee a great man for't.

Clow.

Clow. I take a course to do that my self, for I drink sack in abundance.

Foro. O my rare rascall! We must remove.

Clow. Whither?

Foro. Any whither: Europe is too little to be coz'ned by us, I am ambitious to go to the East-Indies, thou and I to ride on our brace of Elephants.

Clow. And for my part I long to be in England agen; you will never get so much as in England, we have shifted many countreys, and many names: but trance the world over you shall never purse up so much gold as when you were in England, and call'd your self Doctor Lambertones.

Foro. 'Twas an attractive name I confess, women were then my only admirers.

Clow. And all their visits was either to further their lust, or revenge injuries.

Foro. You should have forty in a morning beleaguer my closet, and strive who should be cozen'd first, amongst fourscore love-sick waiting women that has come to me in a morning to learn what fortune should betide them in their first marriage, I have found above 94 to have lost their maidenheads,

Clow. By their own confession, but I was fain to be your male midwife, and work it out of them by circumstance.

Foro. Thou wast, and yet for all this frequent resort of women and thy handing of their urinals and their cases, thou art not given to lechery, what should be the reason of it? thou hast wholesome flesh enough about thee; me thinks the divell should tempt thee to't.

Clow. What need he do that, when he makes me his instrument to tempt others.

Foro. Thou canst not chuse but utter thy rare good parts; thou wast an excellent baud I acknowledge.

Clow. Well, and what I have done that way, I will spare to speak of all you and I have done sir, and though we should—

Foro. We will for England, that's for certain.

Clow. We shall never want there.

Foro. Want? their Court of Wards shall want money first: for I profess my self Lord Paramount over fools and mad-folkes.

Clow. Do but store your self with lyes enough against you come thither.

Foro. Why that's all the familiarity I ever had with the Divell, my guift of lying, they say he's the Father of lyes; and though I cannot conjure, yet I profess my self to be one of his poor gossips. I will now reveale to thee a rare peece of service.

Clow. What is it my most worshipful Doctor Lambertones?

Foro. There is a Captain come lately from Sea, They call Prosper, I saw him this morning Through a chink of wainscote that divides my lodging, And the Host of the house, withdraw my Host, and Hostess, the fair Biancha, and an antient gentlewoman into their bedchamber; I could not overhear their conference, but I saw such a mass of gold & Jewels, & when he had done he lock't it up into a casket; great joy there was amongst them, & forth they are gone into the city, and my Host told me at his going forth he thought he should not return till after supper: now Sir, in their absence will we fall to our picklocks, enter the chamber, seize the Jewels, make an escape from Florence, and we are made for ever.

Clow. But if they should go to a true conjurer, and fetch us back in a whirle-wind?

Foro. Do not believe there is any such fetch in Astrology, and this may be a means to make us live honest hereafter.

Clow. 'Tis but an ill road to't that lyes through the high way of theeving.

Foro. For indeed I am weary of this trade of fortune-telling; and mean to give all over, when I come into England, for it is a very ticklish quality,

Clow. And it's end will hang by a twine thred.

Foro. Besides the Island has too many of the profession, they hinder on anothers market.

Clow. No, no, the pillory hinders their market.

Foro. You know there the juggling captain.

Clow. I there's a sure card.

Foro. Only the fore-man of their jury is dead, but he dyed like a Roman.

Clow. Else 'tis thought he had made work for the hangman.

Foro. And the very Ball, of your false prophets, he's qualst too.

Clow. He did measure the stars with a false yard, and may now travail to Rome, with a mortar on's head to see if he can recover his money that way.

Foro. Come, come, lets fish for this casket, and to Sea presently.

Clow. We shall never reach London, I fear; My mind runs so much of hanging, landing at Wapping.

Enter Mariana.

Exeunt.

This well may be a day of joy long wish'd for To my Clarissa, she is innocent.

Nor can her youth but with an open bosome Meet Hymens pleasing bounties, but to me That am environ'd with black guilt and horror It does appear a funeral though promising much In the conception were hard to mannage

But sad in event, it was not hate

But fond indulgence in me to preserve

Cesarid's threaten'd life in open court

Then forc'd me to disclaime him, choosing rather

To rob him of his birth-right, and honor

Than suffer him to run the hazard of

Inrag'd Baptista's fury, while he lives;

I know I have a Son, and the Dukes sentence

A while deluded, and this tempest over,

When he assures himself despair hath seiz'd him,

Knock, wilbin.

Enter Baptista.

I can relieve and raise him—speak, who is it

That presses on my privacies? Sir your pardon.

You cannot come unwelcome, though it were

To read my secret thoughts.

Bap. Lady to you

Mine shall be ever open; Lady said I,

That name keeps too much distance, sister rather

I should have stild you, and I now may claime it,

Since our divided families are made one

By this blessed marriage; to whose honor comes

The Duke in person, waited on by all

The braveries of his Court, to witness it,

And then to be our ghests, is the bride ready

To meet and entertain him?

Maria. She attends the coming of your Son.

Bap. Pray you bring her forth.

The Duke's at hand—Musick, in her loud voyce,

Speaks his arrivall.

Maria. She's prepar'd to meet it.

—Exit.

Enter

Enter Mariana, Clarissa, led by two Maids: at the other door, Baptista meets with Mentivole, led by two Couriers, the Duke, Bishop; divers Attendants: (A Song) whilst they salute.

Duke. It were impertinent to wish you joy, Since all joys dwell about you, Hymens torch Was never lighted with a luckier Omen. Nor burnt with so much splendor, to defer With fruit less compliment, the means to make Your certain pleasures lawful to the world; Since in the union of your hearts they are Confirm'd already: would but argue us A boaster of our favours; to the Temple, And there the sacred knot once ti'd, all triumphs Our Dukedom can afford, shall grace your Nuptials.

Enter Alberto and Cesario.

Bap. On there.

Ment. I hope it is not in the power Of any to cross us now.

Alber. But in the breach Of a wrong'd Father I forbid the Banes.

Cesar. What, do you stand at gaze?

Bap. Risen from the dead!

Maria. Although the Sea had vomited up the Figure In which thy better part liv'd long imprison'd, True love despising fear, runs thout to meet it.

Clarif. In duty I kneel to it.

Alber. Hence vile wretches, To you I am a substance incorporeal, And not to be prophan'd, with your vile touch? That could so soon forget me, but such things Are neither worth my Anger, nor reproof. To you great Sir, I turn my self and these Immediate Ministers of your Government, And if in my rude language I transgress; Ascribe it to the cold remembrance of My services, and not my rugged temper.

Duke. Speak freely, be thy language ne'er so bitter, To see thee safe Alberto, signs thy pardon.

Alber. My pardon? I can need none, if it be not Receiv'd for an offence. I tamely bear Wrongs, which a slave-born Muscovite would check at. Why if for Treason I had been deliver'd Up to the Hangmans Axe, and this dead trunk Unworthy of a Christian Sepulchre; Expos'd a prey to feed the ravenous Vulture, The memory of the much I oft did for you, Had you but any touch of gratitude, Or thought of my deservings, would have stopp'd you From these unjust proceedings.

Duke. Hear the motives that did induce us.

Alber. I have heard them all, Your Highness sentence, the whole Court abus'd, By the perjuries and practice of this woman. (We pest thou Crocodile) my hopeful son, Whom I dare swear mine own, degraded of The honors that descend to him from me: And from that, in his love scorn'd by a creature Whose base birth, though made eminent by her beauty, Might well have mark'd her out Cesar's servant, All this I could have pardon'd and forgot; But that my daughter with my whole Estate So hardly purchas'd, is assign'd a Dower; To one whose Father, and whose Family I so detest; that I would lose my essence And be transformed to a Basiliske To look them dead, to me's an injury Admits no satisfaction.

Bap. There's none offer'd.

Alber. Nor would not be accepted,

Though upon thy knees 'twere tender'd, Maria. Now the storm grows high. Bap. But that I thought thee dead, and in thy death The brinie Ocean had entomb'd thy name; I would have sought a Wife in a Bordello For my Mentivole, and gladly hugg'd Her spurious issue as my lawful Nephews, Before his blood should e'er have mix'd with thine; So much I scorn it.

Alber. I'll not bandy words, but thus dissolve the contract.

Bap. There I meet thee, and seize on what's mine own.

Alber. For all my service,

Great Sir, graunt me the combat with this wretch, That I may scourge his intolence.

Bap. I kneel for it.

Cesar. And to approve my self Alberto's Son, I'll be his second upon any odds, 'Gainst him that dare moist of Baptista's race.

Ment. Already upon honourable terms, In me thou hast met thy better, for her sake I'll add no more.

Alber. Sir, let our swords decide it.

Maria. Oh stay Sir, and as you would hold the Title Of a just Prince, e'er you grant licence to These mad-mens fury, lend your private ear To the most distress'd of Women.

Duke. Speak, 'tis granted. He takes Mariana aside.

Clar. In the meantime, let not Clarissa be A patient looker on, though as yet doubtful, To whom to bend her knee first, yet to all I stoop thus low in duty, and would wash The dust of fury with my Virgin tears, From his bless'd feet, and make them beautiful That would move to conditions of peace, Though with a snail-like pace, they all are wing'd To bear you to destruction: reverend Sirs, Think on your ancient friendship cemented With so much blood, but shed in noble action, Divided now in passion for a brawl; The Makers blush to own, much lov'd Cesario. Brother, or friend, (each Title may prevail,) Remember with what tenderness from our childhood We lov'd together, you preferring me Before your self, and I so fond of you That it begot suspicion in ill minds That our affection was incestuous. Think of that happy time, in which I know That with your dearest blood you had prevented This shower of tears from me; Mentivole, My Husband, registred in that bright star-chamber, Though now on earth made strangers, be the example And offer in one hand the peaceful Olive Of concord, or if that can be denied By powerful intercession in the other Carry the Hermian rod, and force attonement, Now we will not be all marble. Death's the worst then And he shall be my Bridegroom. (Offers to kill her self.)
Ment. Hold Clarissa, his loving violence needs must Offer in spite of honor—

He snatches away her knife, and sets it to his own breast, she stais his hand.

Duke. Was it to that end then on your Religion?

Mar. And my hope in Heaven, Sir.

Duke. We then will leave intreaties, and make use Of our authority, must I cry ai-me To this unheard of intolence? in my presence To draw your swords, and as all reverence That's due to Majesty were forfeited, Cherish this wildeness! Heath them instantly, And shew an alteration in your looks, or by my power

Alber. Cut off my head.

Bap. And mine, rather than hear of peace with this bad

I'll not alone, give up my throat, but suffer
Your rage to reach my family.

Enter Prospero, Juliana, Biancha.

Alb. And my name to be no more remembred.

Duke. What are these?

Ces. Biancha, 'tis Biancha, still Biancha: but strangely alter'd.

Bapt. If that thirteen years
Of absence could raze from my memory
The figure of my friend, I might forget thee;
But if thy Image be graven on my heart,
Thou art my Prospero.

Prof. Thou my Baptista?

Duke. A suddain change!

Bapt. I dare not ask, dear friend
If Juliana live! for that's a blessing
I am unworthy of, but yet denie not
To let me know the place she hath made happy
By having there her Sepulchre.

Prof. If your Highness please to vouchsafe a patient
Ear, we shall make a true relation of a story
That shall call on your wonder.

Duke. Speak, we hear you.

Prof. Baptista's fortune in the Genova Court,
His banishment, with his fair Wife's restraint
You are acquainted with; what since hath follow'd
I faithfully will deliver. E'r eight Moons
Alter Baptista's absence were compleat,
Fair Juliana found the pleasures, that
They had enjoy'd together, were not barren,
And blushing at the burthen of her womb,
No father near to own it, it drew on
A violent sickness, which call'd down compassion
From the angry Duke, then careful of her health.
Physitians were enquir'd of, and their judgment
Prescrib'd the Baths of Luca as a means
For her recovery; to my charge it pleas'd her
To be committed; but as on the way
We journey'd, those throws only known to Women
Came thick upon her, in a private Village.

Bapt. She died?

Prof. Have patience, she brought to the world
A hopeful Daughter; for her bodies sickness
It soon decay'd, but the grief of her mind
Hourly increas'd, and life grew tedious to her,
And desperate e'er to see you; she injoyn'd me
To place her in a Greekish Monastery,
And to my care gave up her pretty Daughter.

Bapt. What Monastery? as a Pilgrim bare-foot,
I'll search it out.

Prof. Pray you interrupt me not,
Now to my fortunes; the girl well dispos'd of
With a faithful friend of mine, my cruel fate
Made me a prisoner to the Turkish Gallies,
Where for 12 years, these hands tugg'd at the Oar,
But fortune tyr'd at length with my afflictions,
Some Ships of Malta met the Ottoman Fleet,
Charg'd them, and boarded them, and gave me freedom.
With my deliverers I serv'd, and got
Such reputation with the great Master
That he gave me command over a tall
And lusty ship, where my first happy service
Was to redeem Alberto rumour'd dead,
But was like me surpriz'd by Cortugogly.

Alb. I would I had died there.

Prof. And from him learning
Baptista liv'd, and their dissolv'd friendship,
I hois'd up sails for Greece, found Juliana
A votary at her Beads; having made known
Both that you liv'd, and where you were: she borrow'd
So much from her devotion, as to wish me
To bring her to you; if the object please you,

With joy receive her.

Bapt. Rage and fury leave me. Throws away his sword.
I am so full of happiness, there's no room left
To entertain you, oh my long lost Jewel,
Light of mine eyes, my souls strength.

Julia. My best Lord, having embrac'd you thus,
Death cannot fright me.

Bapt. Live long to do so, though I should fix here.
Pardon me Prospero, though I enquire my daughters fortune.

Prof. That your happiness
May be at all parts perfect, here she is!

Ces. Biancha, daughter to a Princess.

Prof. True with my faithful Host I left her,
And with him till now she hath resided,
Ignorant both of her birth and greatness.

Bapt. Oh my blest one. Joy upon joy o'erwhelms me.

Duke. Above wonder.

Alb. I do begin to melt too, this strange story
Works much upon me.

Duke. Since it hath pleas'd heaven
To grace us with this miracle, I that am
Heavens instrument here, determine thus; Alberto
Be not unthankful for the blessings shown you,
Nor you Baptista; discord was yet never
A welcome sacrifice; therefore rage laid by,
Embrace as friends, and let pass'd difference
Be as a dream forgotten.

Bapt. 'Tis to me.

Alber. And me, and thus confirm it.

Duke. And to tie it
In bonds not to be broken, with the marriage
Of young Mentivole, and fair Clarissa,
So you consent great Lady, your Biancha
Shall call Casario Husband.

Julia. 'Tis a motion I gladly yield to.

Cesar. One in which you make a sad man happy.

Offers to kneel.

Bian. Kneel not, all forgiven.

Duke. With the Duke your Uncle I will make attonement, and will have no denial.

Enter Host, Ferobosco, Clown and Officers.

Mar. Let this day be still held sacred.

Host. Now if you can conjure, let the Devil unbind
you.

Foro. We are both undone.

Clow. Already we feel it.

Host. Justice Sir.

Duke. What are they?

Prof. I can resolve you, slaves freed from the Gallies
By the Viceroy of Sicilia.

Duke. What's their offence?

Host. The robbing me of all my Plate and Jewels,
I mean the attempting of it.

Clow. Please your Grace I will now discover this Var-let in earnest, this honest pestilent rogue, profess the Art of Conjuring, but all the skill that ever he had in the black Art, was in making a Seacole fire; only with wearing strange shapes, he begot admiration amongst Fools and Women.

Foro. Wilt thou peach thou varlet?

Duke. Why does he goggle with his eyes, and stalk so?

Clow. This is one of his Magical raptures.

Foro. I do vilise your censure, you demand if I am guilty, whir says my cloak by a trick of Legerdemain, now I am not guilty, I am guarded with innocence, pure Silver Lace I assure you.

Clow. Thus have I read to you your virtues, which notwithstanding I would not have you proud of.

Foro. Out thou concealment of Tallow, and counterfeit Mummi.

Duke.

Duke. To the Gallies with them both.

Clow. The only Sea-physick for a knave, is to be basted in a Gally, with the oil of a Bulls Peefel.

Foro. And will not you make a four-face at the same fauce, firrah? I hope to find thee so lean in one fortnight, thou mayst be drawn by the ears through the hoop of a firkin.

Duke. Divide them, and away with them toth' Gallies.

Clow. This will take down your pride, lugler.

Duke. This day that hath given birth to blessings beyond hope, admits no criminal sentence: to the Temple, and there with humbleness, praise heavens bounties; For blessings ne'er descend from thence, but when A sacrifice in thanks ascends from men. Exeunt omnes

Bacha's, Maid.

Urania's Maid.

Servants and Attendants.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Dorialus, Agenor, Nifus.

Agenor.

Tell me my Lord Dorialus, I had mist of this, if you had not call'd me; I thought the Princess's birth-day had been to morrow.

Nifus. Why, did your Lordship sleep out the day.

Dor. I marvel what the Duke meant to make such an idle vow.

Nif. Idle, why?

Dor. Is't not idle, to swear to grant his Daughter any thing she shall ask on her birth-day? she may ask an impossible thing: and I pray heaven she do not ask an unfit thing at one time or other; 'tis dangerous trusting a mans vow upon the discretion on's Daughter.

Age. I wonder most at the Marquis her Brother, who is always vehemently forward to have her desires granted.

Dor. He's acquainted with 'em before.

Age. She's doubtless very chaste and virtuous

Dor. So is Leucippus her brother.

Nif. She's twenty year old, I wonder She aske not a Husband.

Dor. That were a folly in her; having refus'd all the Great Princes in one part of the world; She'll die a Maid.

Age. She may ask but one, may she?

Nif. A hundred times this day if she will; And indeed, every day is such a day, for though The Duke has vow'd it only on this day, He keeps it every day: he can deny Her nothing.

Cornets.

Enter Hidaspes, Leucippus, Leontius, Timantas, Tellamon.

Leon. Come fair Hidaspes, thou art Duches to day, Art thou prepar'd to aske, thou knowest My oath will force performance. And Leucippus, if she now ask ought that shall, Or would have performance After my death, when by the help of heaven, This Land is thine, accursed be thy race, May every one forget thou art my Son, And so their own obedience.

Leucip. Mighty Sir, I do not wish to know that fatal hour, That isto make me King, but if I do, I shall most hastily, (and like a Son) Perform your grant to all, chiefly to her: Remember that you aske what we Agreed upon.

Leon. Are you prepar'd? then speak.

Hida. Most Royal Sir, I am prepar'd,
Nor shall my Will exceed a Virgins bounds,
What I request shall both at once bring Me a full content.

Leon. So it ever does:
Thou only comfort of my feeble age,
Make known thy good desire,
For I dare swear thou lov'st me.

Hidas. This is it I beg,
And on my knees. The people of your Land,
The Lycians, are through all the Nations
That know their name, noted to have in use
A vain and fruitless superstition;
So much more hateful, that it bears the shew
Of true Religion, and is nothing else
But a false-pleasing bold lasciviousness.

Leon. What is it?

Hidas. Many ages before this,
When every man got to himself a Trade,
And was laborious in that chosen course,
Hating an idle life, far worse than death:
Some one that gave himself to Wine and Sloth;
Which breed lascivious thoughts;
And found himself conjoyn'd
For that by every painful man,
To take his stain away, fram'd to himself
A god, whom he pretended to obey,
In being thus dishonest, for a name
He call'd him Cupid. This created god,
Mans nature being ever credulous
Of any vice that takes part with his blood;
Had ready followers enow: and since
In every age they grew, especially Amongst your Subjects, who do yet remain
Adorers of that drowsie Deitie:
Which drink invented: and the winged Boy,
(For so they call him) has his sacrifices.
These loose naked statues through the Land,
And in every Village, nay the palace
Is not free from 'em. This is my request,
That these erect obscene Images
May be pluckt down and burnt: and every man
That offers to 'em any sacrifice, may lose his life.

Leon. But be advis'd my fairest daughter, if he be
A god, he will expresse it upon thee my child:
Which heaven avert.

Leucip. There is no such power:
But the opinion of him fills the Land
With lustful sins: every young man and maid
That feel the least desire to one another,
Dare not suppress it, for they think it is Blind Cupid's motion: and he is a god.

Leon. This makes our youth unchaste. I am resolv'd:
Nephew Ismenus, break the Statues down
Here in the Palace, and command the City
Do the like, let proclamations
Be drawn, and hastily sent through the Land
To the same purpose.

Ismen. Sir, I will break down none my self,
But I will deliver your command:
Hand I will have none in't, for I like it not.

Leon. Goe and command it. Pleasure of my life,
Wouldst thou ought else? make many thousand suits:
They must and shall be granted.

Hid. Nothing else.

Exit Ismenus.

Leon. But go and meditate on other suits,
Some six days hence I'll give thee Audience again,
And by a new oath, bind my self to keep it:
Ask largely for thy self, dearer than life
In whom I may be bold to call my self,
More fortunate than any in my age,
I will deny thee nothing.

Leu. 'Twas well done, Sister.

Exeunt all but these three Lords.

Nis. How like you this request my Lord?

Dor. I know not yet, I am so full of wonder,
We shall be gods our selves shortly,
And we pull 'em out of Heaven o' this fashion.

Age. We shall have wenches now when we can Catch 'em, and we transgress thus.

Nis. And we abuse the gods once, 'tis a Justice
We should be held at hard meat: for my part,
I'll e'en make ready for mine own affection
I know the god incenst must send a hardness
Through all good Womens hearts, and then we have Brought our Eggs and Muskadine to a fair Market:
Would I had giv'n an i'col. for a tolleration,
That I might but use my conscience in mine
Own house,

Dor. The Duke he's old and past it, he would Never have brought such a plague upon the Land else,
'Tis worse than Sword and Famine:
Yet to say truth, we have deserv'd it, we have liv'd
So wickedly, every man at his Livery, and wou'd that Wou'd have suffic'd us: we murmur'd at this Blessing, that was nothing; and cry'd out to the God for endless pleasures, he heard us,
And suppi'd us, and our Women were new still
As we need 'em: yet we like beasts still cry'd,
Poor men can number their woers, give us
Abundance: we had it, and this curse withal.

Age. Berlady we are like to have a long Lent on't,
Flesh shall be flesh: now Gentlemen I had rather
Have anger'd all the gods, than that blind Ganner.
I remember once the people did but slight him
In a sacrifice: and what followed?
Women kept their houses, grew good huswives
Honest forsooth? was not that fine?

Wore their own faces,
Though they wear gay cloaths without surveying;
And which was most lamentable,
They lov'd their Husbands.

Nis. I do remember it to my grief,
Young Maids were as cold as Cowcubers
And much of that complexion:
Bawds were abolisht: and, to which misery
It must come again,
There were no Cuckolds,
Well, we had need pray to keep these Divels from us,
The times grow mischievous.
There he goes, Lord!

Enter one with an Image.

This is a sacrilege I have not heard of:
Would I were gelt, that I might not Feel what follows.

Age. And I too. You shall see within these Few years, a fine confusion i'the Countrey: mark it:
Nay, and we grow for to depose the Powers,
And set up Chastity again, well, I have done.
A fine new goddess certainly, whose blessings
Are hunger and hard beds.

Nis. This comes of fulness, a sin too frequent with us
I believe now we shall find shorter commons.

Dor. Would I were married, somewhat has some favour;
The race of Gentry will quite run out now,
'Tis only left to Husbands, if younger Sisters
Take not the greater charity, 'tis lawful.

Age. Well, let come what will come,
I am but one, and as the plague falls,
I'll shape my self: If Women will be honest, I'll be sound.
If the god be not too unmerciful,
I'll take a little still, where I can get it,
And thank him, and say nothing.

Nis. This ill wind yet may blow the City good,
And let them, (if they can) get their own children,

They

They have hung long enough in doubt, but howsoever, the old way was the surer, then they had 'em.

Des. Farewel my Lords, I'll e'en take up what Rent I can before the day, I fear the year will fall out ill.

Age. We'll with you Sir: And love so favourus, As we are still thy servants. Come my Lords; Let's to the Duke, and tell him to what folly His doting now has brought him.

Exeunt.

Priest of Cupid, with four young men and Maids.

Priest. Come my children, let your feet, In an even measure meet: And your cheerful voices rise. For to present this Sacrifice; Lo great Cupid, in whose name, I his Priest begin the same. Young men take your Loves and kiss, Thus our Cupid honour'd is Kiss again, and in your kissing, Let no promises be missing: Nor let any Maiden here, Dare to turn away her ear, Unto the whisper of her Love, But give Bracelet, Ring or Glove, As a token to her sweeting, Of an after secret meeting: Now boy sing to stick our hearts Fuller of great Cupid's darts.

S O N G.

I Overs rejoyce, your pains shall be rewarded,
The god of Love himself grieves at your crying:
No more shall frozen honor be regarded,
Nor the coy faces of a Maids denying.
No more shall Virgins sigh, and say we dare not,
For men are false, and what they do they care not,
All shall be well again, then do not grieve,
Men shall be true, and Women shall believe.

Lovers rejoyce, what you shall say henceforth,
When you have caught your Sweet-hearts in your arms,
It shall be accounted Oracle, and Worth:
No more faint-hearted Girls shall dream of harms.
And cry they are too young, the god hath said,
Fifteen shall make a Mother of a Maid:
Then wise men, pull your Roses yet unblown,
Love hates the too ripe fruit that falls alone.

The Measure.

After the Measure, Enter Nilo and others.

Nilo. No more of this: here break your Rights for ever, The Duke commands it so; Priest do not stare, I must deface your Temple, though unwilling, And your god Cupid here must make a Scare-crow For any thing I know, or at the best, Adorn a Chimney-piece.

Priest. Oh Sacrilege unheard of?

Nilo. This will not help it, take down the Image And away with 'em. Priest, change your coat you had best, all service now Is given to men: Prayers above their hearing Will prove but hablings: learn to lye and thrive, 'Twill prove your best profession: for the gods, He that lives by 'em now, must be a beggar. There's better holiness on earth they say,

Pray God it ask not greater sacrifice. Go home, And if our god be not deaf as well as blind, He will some smooak for it.

Gent. Sir——

Nilo. Gentlemen, there is no talking, This must be done and speedily;

I have commission that I must not break.

Gent. We are gone, to wonder what shall follow.

Nilo. On to the next Temple.

Exeunt.

Cornets.

Descendit Cupid.

Cupid. Am I then scorn'd? is my all-doing Will And Power, that knows no limit, nor admits none, Now look'd in on by less than gods? and weak'n'd Am I, whose low struck terror through the earth, No less than Thunder, and in this, exceeding Even gods themselves; whose knees before my Altars Now shook off, and contemn'd by such, whose lives Are but my recreation! anger rise My sufferance and my self are made the subject Of sins against us. Go thou out displeasure, Displeasure of a great god, flying thy self Through all this Kingdom: sow what ever evils Proud flesh is taking off, amongst these Rebels: And on the first heart that despise my Greatness, Lay a strange misery, that all may know Cupid's revenge is mighty; with his Arrow Hotter than plagues or mine own anger, will I Now nobly right my self: nor shall the prayers Nor smooaks on my Altars hold my hand, Till I have left this a most wretched Land,

Exit

Enter Hidaspes, and Cleophila.

Hidaspes. Cleophila, what was he that went hence?

Cleo. What means your Grace now?

Hidaspes. I mean that handsome man, That something more than man I met at door.

Cleo. Here was no handsome man.

Hidaspes. Come, he's some one

You would preserve in private, but you want Cunning to do it, and my eyes are sharper Than yours, and can with one neglecting glance, See all the graces of a man. Who was't?

Cleo. That went hence now?

Hidaspes. That went hence now, I, he

Cleo. Faith here was no such one as your Grace thinks. Zoylous your Brothers Dwarf went out but now.

Hidaspes. I think 'twas he: how bravely he past by: Is he not grown a goodly Gentleman?

Cleo. A goodly Gentleman, Madam? He is the most deformed fellow i'the Land.

Hidaspes. Oh blasphemy: he may perhaps to thee Appear deform'd, for he is indeed Unlike a man: his shape and colours are Beyond the Art of Painting; he is like Nothing that we have seen, yet doth resemble Apollo, as I oft have fancied him, When rising from his bed, he stirs himself And shakes day from his hair.

Cleo. He resembles Apollo's Recorder.

Hidaspes. Cleophila, go send a Page for him, And thou shalt see thy error, and repent. Alas, what do I feel, my blood rebels, And I am one of those I us'd to scorn, My Maiden-thoughts are fled against my self? I harbor Traitors in my Virginity, That from my Childhood kept me company, Is heavier than I can endure to bear: Forgive me Cupid, for thou art a god, And I a wretched creature; I have sinn'd, But be thou merciful, and grant that yet I may enjoy what thou wilt have me, Love.

Exit Cleo.

Enter

Enter Cleo. and Zoy.

Zoylus is here Madam.

Hida. He's there indeed.

Now be thine own Judge; see thou worse than mad,
Is he deformed? look upon those eyes,
That let all pleasure out into the world,
Unhappy that they cannot see themselves;
Look on his hair, that like so many beams,
Streaking the East, shoot light o'er half the world,
Look on him altogether, who is made
As if two Natures had contention
About their skill, and one had brought forth him.

Zoy. Ha, ha, ha: Madam, though Nature
Hath not given me so much

As others in my outward shew;
I bear a heart as loyal unto you
In this unsightly body (which you please
To make your mirth) as many others do
That are far more befriended in their births;
Yet I could wish my self much more deformed
Than yet I am, so I might make your Grace
More merry than you are, ha, ha, ha.

Hidas. Beshrew me then if I be merry;
But I'm content whilst thou art with me:
Thou that art my Saint:

By hope of whose mild favour I do live
To tell thee so: I pray thee scorn me not;
Alas what can it add unto thy worth
To triumph over me, that am a Maid,
Without deceit? whose heart doth guide her tongue,
Drown'd in my passions; yet I will take leave
To call it reason that I dote on thee.

Cleo. The Princess is besides her Grace I think,
To talk thus with a fellow that will hardly Serve i'th' dark when one is drunk.

Hida. What answer wilt thou give me?

Zoy. If it please your Grace to jest on, I can abide it.

Hida. If it be jest, not to esteem my life,
Compar'd with thee: If it be jest in me,
To hang a thousand kisses in an hour
Upon those Lips, and take 'em off again:
If it be jest for me to marry thee,
And take obedience on me whilst I live:
Then all I say is jest:
For every part of this, I swear by those
That see my thoughts, I am resolv'd to do,
And I beseech thee, by thine own white hand,
(Which pardon me, that I am bold to kiss
With so unworthy Lips) that thou wilt swear
To marry me, as I do here to thee,
Before the face of heaven.

Zoy. Marry you? ha, ha, ha,

Hida. Kill me or grant, wilt thou not speak at all?

Zoy. Why I will do your Will for ever.

Hida. I ask no more: but let me kiss that mouth
That is so merciful; that is my will:
Next go with me before the King in haste,
That is my Will; where I will make our Peers
Know, that thou art their better.

Zoy. Ha, ha, ha, that is fine, ha, ha, ha.

Cleo. Madam, what means your Grace?
Consider for the love of Heaven to what
You run madly; will you take this Viper
Into your bed?

Hida. Away, hold off thy hands:
Strike her sweet Zoylus, for it is my Will,
Which thou hast sworn to doe.

Zoy. Away for shame.

Know you no manners: ha, ha, ha.

Cleo. Thou know'st none I fear,
This is just Cupid's Anger, Venus look down mildly on us:
And command thy Son to spare this Lady once, and let me be in love withal: and none in love with me.

Exit.

Exit.

Enter Ismenius, and Timantus.

Timan. Is your Lordship for the Wars this Summer?

Ismen. Timantus, wilt thou go with me?

Timan. If I had a Company, my Lord.

Ismen. Of Fiddlers: Thou a company?

No, no, keep thy Company at home, and cause cuckolds:
The Wars will hurt thy face, there's no Semsters,
Shoomakers, nor Taylors, nor Almond-milk i'th' morning,
Nor poach'd Eggs to keep your worship soluble,
No man to warm your Shirt, and blow your Roses:
Nor none to reverence your round lace Breeches:
If thou wilt needs goe, and goe thus,
Get a Cafe for thy Captainship, a shower will spoil thee else.
Thus much for thee.

Tim. Your Lordship's wondrous witty, very pleasant be-lieve't.

Exit.

Enter Telamon, Dorialus, Agenor, Nifus, Leonti.

Leon. No news yet of my Son?

Tela. Sir, there be divers out in search:
No doubt they'll bring the truth where he is,
Or the occasion that led him hence.

Tim. They have good eyes then.

Leon. The gods goe with them:

Who be those that wait there?

Tela. The Lord Ismenius, your General, for his dispatch.

Leon. Oh Nephew: we have no use to imploy your Virtue in our War: now the Province is well settled.
Hear you ought of the Marquis?

Ismen. No Sir?

Leon. 'Tis strange he should be gone thus:
These five days he was not seen,

Tim. I'll hold my hold, I could bolt him in an hour:

Leon. Where's my Daughter?

Dori. About the purging of the Temples, Sir.

Leon. She's chaste and virtuous; fetch her to me,
And tell her I am pleas'd to grant her now
Her last request, without repenting me.

Exit Nif.

Be it what it will: she is wife, Dorialus
And will not press me farther than a Father.

Dor. I pray the best may follow: yet if your Grace
Had taken the opinions of your people,
At least of such, whose wisdoms ever wake
About your safety, I may say it, Sir,
Under your noble pardon: that this change
Either had been more honor to the gods,
Or I think not at all. Sir, the Princess.

Enter Hidaspes, Nifus, and Zoylus.

Leon. Oh my Daughter, my health!
And did I say my soul, I ly'd not;
Thou art so near me, speak, and have whatever
Thy wife Will leads thee too: had I a Heaven,
It were too poor a place for such a goodness.

Dor. What's here?

Agen. An Apes skin stuff I think, 'tis so plump.

Hida. Sir, you have past your word,
Still be a Prince, and hold you to it.
Wonder not I press you, my life lies in your word:
If you break that, you have broke my heart, I must ask
That's my shame, and your Will must not deny me:
Now for Heaven be not forsworn.

Leon. By the gods I will not,
I cannot, were there no other power,
Than my love call'd to a witness of it.

Dor. They have much reason to trust,
You have forsworn one of 'em out o'th' countrey already.

Hida. Then this is my request: This Gent.
Be not ashamed, Sir:

You are worth a Kingdom.

Leon. In what?

Hida. In the way of marriage.

Leon.

Leon. How?

Hida. In the way of marriage, it must be so,
Your oath is t' d to Heaven: as my love to him.

Leon. I know thou dost but try my age,
Come ask again.

Hida. If I should ask all my life-time, this is all still.
Sir, I am ferious, I must have this worthy man without enquiring why; and suddenly, and freely:
Doe not look for reason or obedience in my words: my Love admits no wisdom:
Only haste, and hope hangs on my fury,
Speak Sir, speak, but not as a Father,
I am deaf and dull to counsel: inflamed blood
Hears nothing but my Will;
For Gods sake speak.

Dor. Here's a brave alteration.

Nij. This comes of Chastity.

Hida. Will not you speak Sir?

Agem. The god begins his vengeance; what a sweet youth he has sent us here, with a pudding in's belly?

Leon. Oh let me never speak,
Or with my words let me speak out my life;
Thou power abus'd: great Love, whose vengeance now we feel and fear, have mercy on this Land.

Nij. How does your Grace?

Leon. Sick, very sick I hope.

Dor. Gods comfort you.

Hida. Will not you speak? is this your Royal word?
Do not pull perjurie upon your soul.

Sir, you are old, and near your punishment; remember.

Leon. Away base woman.

Hida. Then be no more my Father, but a plague,
I am bound to pray against: be any sin
May force me to despair, and hang my self,
Be thy name never more remembred King
But in example of a broken faith,
And curst even to forgetfulness:
May thy Land bring forth such Monsters as thy Daughter is?
I am weary of my rage. I pray forgive me,
And let me have him, will you Noble Sir?

Leon. Mercy, mercy heaven:
Thou heir of all dishonor, shamest thou not to draw
This little moisture left for life, thus rudely from me?
Carry that slave to death.

Zoy. For heavens sake Sir, it is no fault of mine,
That she will love me.

Leon. To death with him, I say.

Hida. Then make haste Tyrant, or I'll be for him:
This is the way to Hell.

Leon. Hold fast, I charge you away with him.

Hida. Alas old man, Death hath more doors than one,
And I will meet him. Exit Hida.

Leon. Dorialis, Pray see her in her chamber,
And lay a guard about her:
The greatest curse the gods lay on our frailties,
's Will and Disobedience in our Issues,
Which we beget as well as them to plague us,
With our fond loves; Beasts you are only blest
That have that happy dulness to forget
What you have made, your young ones grieve not you
They wander where they list, and have their ways
Without dishonor to you; and their ends,
Fall on 'em without sorrow of their Parents,
Or after ill remembrance: Oh this Woman
Would I had made my self a Sepulcher,
When I made her: Nephew, where is the Prince?
Pray God he have not more part of her baseness
Than of her blood about him.
Gentlemen: where is he?

Ifm. I know not Sir.

H'as his ways by himself, is too wise for my company.

Leon. I do not like this hiding of himself,
From such society as his person:
Some of it yeneeds must know.

Ifm. I am sure not I: nor have known twice this ten days, which if I were as proud as some of 'em, I should take scurvily, but he is a young man.

Let him have this swinge, 'twill make him.

Timantus whispers to the Duke.

There's some good matter now in hand:
How the slave jeers and grins; the Duke is pleas'd,
There's a new pair of Scarlet Hose now, and as much Money to spare, as will fetch the old from pawn, a Hat and a Cloak to goe out to morrow:
Garters and Stockings come by nature.

Leon. Be sure of this.

Tim. I durst not speak else, Sir.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Cornets.

Descend Cupid.

Cupid. L Encippus thou art shot through with a shaft
That will not rankle long, yet sharp enough
To sow a world of helpless misery —
In this unhappy Kingdom, dost thou think
Because thou art a Prince, to make a part
Against my power, but it is all the fault
Of thy old Father, who believes this age
Is cold enough to quench my burning Darts,
But he shall know e'r long, that my smart loose,
Can thaw Ice, and inflame the wither'd heart
Of Nestor, thou thy self art lightly struck,
But his mad love, shall publish that the rage
Of Cupid, has the power to conquer Age. Exit.

Enter Bacha, and Leucippus, Bacha, a Handkerchief.

Leon. Why, what's the matter?

Bacha. Have you got the spoil
You thirsted for? Oh tyrannie of men!

Leon. I pray thee leave,

Bacha. Your envy is, Heaven knows,
Beyond the reach of all our feeble sex:
What pain alas, could it have been to you,
If I had kept mine honor? you might still
Have been a Prince, and still this Countreys Heir,
That innocent Guard which I till now had kept,
For my defence, my virtue, did it seem
So dangerous in a State, that your self came to suppress it?

Leon. Drie thine eyes again, I'll kiss thy tears away,
This is but folly, 'tis past all help.

Bacha. Now you have won the treasure,
'Tis my request that you would leave me thus:
And never see these empty Walls again,
I know you will do so, and well you may:
For there is nothing in 'em that's worth
A glance, I loath my self, and am become Another Woman; One methinks with whom
I want acquaintance.

Leon. If I do offend thee, I can be gone,
And though I love thy sight, so highly do I prize thine own content, that I will leave thee.

Bac. Nay, you may stay now;
You should have gone before: I know not now
Why I should fear you: All I should have kept
Is stol'n: Nor is it in the power of man
To rob me farther: if you can invent,
Spare not; No naked man fears robbing less
Than I doe: now you may for ever stay

Leon. Why, I could do thee farther wrong.

Bacha.

Bac. You have a deeper reach in evil than I :
'Tis past my thoughts.

Leu. And past my will to act : but trust me I could do it.

Bac. Good Sir do, that I may know there is a wrong beyond what you have done me.

Leu. I could tell all the world what thou hast done.

Bac. Yes you may tell the world
And do you think I am so vain to hope
You will not ? you can tell the world but this,
That I am a widow, full of tears in shew,
My Husband dead : And one that lov'd me so,
Hardly a week, forgot my modestie,
And caught with youth and greatness,
Gave my self to live in sin with you ;
This you may tell : And this I do deserve.

Leu. Why dost thou think me so base to tell !
These limbs of mine shall part
From one another on a wrack,
Ere I disclose ; But thou dost utter words
That much afflict me : you did seem as ready
Sweet Bacha, as my self.

Bac. You are right a man : when they have 'wicht us into miserie, poor innocent souls,
They lay the fault on us :
But be it so ; for Prince Leucippus sake
I will bear any thing.

Leucip. Come weep no more,
I wrought thee to it, it was my fault :
Nay, see if thou wilt leave ? Here, take this pearl,
Kiss me sweet Bacha, and receive this purse.

Bacha. What should I do with these ? they will not deck my mind.

Leucip. Why keep 'em to remember me.
I must be gone, I have been absent long :
I know the Duke my Father is in rage,
But I will see thee suddenly again.
Farewell my Bacha.

Bacha. Gods keep you,
Do you here Sir : pray give me a point to wear.

Leu. Alas good Bacha, take on, I pray thee where thou wilt.

Bac. Coming from you. This Point is of as high Esteem with me, as all pearl and gold : nothing but good be ever with or near you.

Leu. Fare thee well mine own good Bacha ;
I will make all haste.

Bacha. Just as you are a Dofen I steem you :
No more, does he think I would prostitute
My self for love ? it was the love of these pearls
And gold that won me, I confesse
I lust more after him than any other,
And would at any rate if I had store,
Purchase his fellowship : but being poor,
I'll both enjoy his bodie and his purse,
And he a Prince, nere think my self the worse.

Enter Leontius, Leucippus, Ismenus, Timantus.

Leu. Nay, you must back and shew us what it is,
That 'witches you out of your Honor thus :

Bacha. Who's that ?

Tima. Look there Sir.

Leu. Lady, never flye you are betray'd.

Bacha. Leave me my tears a while,
And to my Just rage give a little place :
What saucy man are you, that without leave,
Enter upon a Widows mournfull house ?
You hinder a dead man from many tears.
Who did deserve more than the world can shed ;
Though they should weep themselves to Images.
If not for love of me, yet of your self
Away, for you can bring no comforts to me.
But you may carry hence, you know not what.

Nay forrow is infectious.

Leon. Thou thy self
Art grown infectious : wouldst thou know my name ?
I am the Duke, father to this young-man
Whom thou corrupt'st ?

Bacha. Has he than told him all ?

Leu. You do her wrong Sir.

Bacha. O he has not told. Sir I beseech you pardon
My wild tongue, directed by a weak distemper'd head
Madd'd with grief : Alas I did not know
You were my Sovereign ; but now you may Command my poor unworthy life,
Which will be none I hope ere long.

Leon. All thy dissembling will never hide thy shame :
And wer't not more respecting Woman-hood in General, than any thing in thee, thou shouldst
Be made such an example, that posteritie,
When they would speak most bitterly, should say,
Thou art as impudent as Bacha was.

Bacha. Sir, though you be my King, whom I will Serve in all just causes : yet when wrongfully
You seek to take my Honor, I will rise
Thus, and defie you ; for it is a Jewell
Dearer than you can give, which whilst I keep,
(Though in this lowly house) I shall esteem
My self above the Princes of the earth
That are without it. If the Prince your son,
Whom you accuse me with know how to speak
Dishonor of me, if he do not do it,
The plagues of hell light on him, may he never Govern this Kingdome : here I challenge him
Before the face of heaven, my Liege, and these,
To speak the worst he can : if he will lye,
To lose a womans fame, I'll say he is Like you (I think I cannot call him worse.)
He's dead, that with his life would have defended
My reputation and I forst to play
(That which I am) the foolish woman,
And use my liberal tongue.

Leu. Is't possible ! we men are children in our Carriages, compar'd with women : 'wake thy self
For shame, and leave not her whose honor thou
Shou'dst keep safe as thine own, alone to free her self :
But I am prest I know not how, with guilt,
And feel my conscience (never us'd to lye)
Loth to allow my tongue to add a lye
To that too much I did : but it is lawfull
To defend her, that only for my Love lov'd evil.

Leon. Tell me, why did you Leucip : stay here so long ?

Leu. If I can urge ought from me but a truth, hell
Take me.

Leon. What's the matter, why speak you not ?

Tima. Alas good Sir, forbear
To urge the Prince, you see his shamefastness.

Bacha. What does he say Sir ? if thou be a Prince
Shew it, and tell the truth.

Ismen. If you have lain with her tell your Father
No doubt but he has done as ill before now :
The Gentlewoman will be proud on't.

Bacha. For God's sake speak.

Leu. Have you done prating yet ?

Ismen. Who prates ?

Leu. Thou know'st I do not speak to thee Ismenus :
But what said you Tima ; concerning my shamefastness ?

Tima. Nothing I hope that might displease your Highness.

Leu. If any of thy great, Great-grandmothers
This thousand years, had been as chaste as she,
It would have made thee honest, I stay'd
To here what you wou'd say : she is by heaven
Of the most strict and blameless chastic
That ever woman was : (good gods forgive me)
Had Tarquin, met with her, she had been kil'd
With a Slave by her ere she had agreed :

I lye with her! wou'd I might perish then.
Our Mothers, whom we all must reverence,
Could nere exceed her for her chasticite,
Upon my soul: for by this light she's
A most obllinate modest creature.

Leon. What did you with her then so long Leucippus?

Leu. I'll tell you Sir: You see she's beautifull.

Leon. I see it well.

Leu. Mov'd by her face,
I came with lustful thoughts,
Which was a fault in me:

But telling truth, something more pardonable,
(And for the world I will not lye to you:)
Proud of my self, I thought a Princes name
Had power to blow 'em down flat of their backs;
But here I found a Rock not to be shook:
For as I hope for good Sir, all the battery
That I could lay to her, or of my person,
My greatnes, or gold, could nothing move her.

Leon. 'Tis very strange, being so young and fair.

Leu. She's almost thirty Sir.

Leon. How do you know her age so just?

Leu. She told it me her self

Once when she went about to shew by reason
I should leave wooing her.

Leon. She stains the ripest Virgins of her age.

Leu. If I had sin'd with her, I would be loth
To publish her disgrace: but by my life
I would have told it you, because I think
You would have pardon'd me the rather:
And I will tell you father: By this light Sir,
(but that I never will bestow my self
But to your liking) if she now would have me,
I now would marry her.

Leon. How's that Leucippus!

Leu. Sir, will you pardon me one fault, which yet
I have not done, but had a will to do, and I will tell it?

Leon. Be't what it will I pardon thee.

Leu. I offered marriage to her.

Leon. Did she refuse it?

Leucip. With that earnestnes, and almost scorn
To think of any other after her lost Mate, that she Made me think my self unworthy of her.

Leon. You have stay'd too long Leucippus

Leu. Yes Sir, forgive me Heaven, what multitude
Of oaths have I bestow'd on lies, and yet they were Officious lyes, there was no malice in 'em.

Leon. She is the fairest creature that ever I beheld;
And then so chaste, 'tis wonderfull: the more I look
On her, the more I am amaz'd.

I have long thought of a wife, and one I would have Had, but that I was afraid to meet a woman
That might abuse my age: but here she is Whom I may trust to; of a chasticite
Impregnable, and approved so by my son:
The meanes of her birth will still preserve her
In due obedience; and her beauty is
Of force enough to pull me back to youth.
My son once sent away, whose rivall-ship
I have just cause to fear, if power, of gold,
Or wit, can win her to me, she is mine.
Nephew Ismenus, I have new intelligence,
Your Province is unquiet still.

Ismen. I am glad on't.

Leon. And so dangerously, that I must send the Prince in person with you.

Ismen. I am glad of that too: Sir, will you dispatch
Us we shall wither here for ever.

Leon. You shall be dispatcht within this hour:
Leucippus, never wonder, nor ask, it must be thus.
Lady I ask your pardon, whose virtue I have Slubberd with my tongue, and you shall ever be Chast in my memory hereafter;
But we old men often doat: to make amends for

My great fault, receive that Ring:
I'm sorry for your grief, may it soon leave you:
Come my Lords lets begon.

Exeunt.

Bach. Heaven bless your Grace.

One that had but so much modestie left, as to blush,
Or shrink a little at his first encounter,
Had been undone; where I come off with honor,
And gain too: they that never wou'd be tract
In any course, by the most subtle sense
Must bear it through with frontless impudence.

Exit.

Enter Dorialus, Agenor, Nifus.

Dor. Gentlemen this is a strange peece of Justice,
To put the wretched Dwarf to death because
She deated on him; Is she not a woman, and Subject to those mad figaries her whole Sex
Is infected with? Had she lov'd you, or you, or I,
Or all on's (as indeed the more the merryer still
With them) must we therefore have our heads par'd
With a Hatchet? So she may love all the Nobility
Out o'th Dukedome in a month, and let the raskals in.

Nif. You will not, or you do not see the need
That makes this just to the world?

Dor. I cannot tell, I would beloth to feel it:
But the best is, she loves not proper men, we three
Were in wise cases else: but make me know this need.

Eif. Why yes: He being taken away, this base incon-tinence dyes presently, and she must see her shame and sorrow for it.

Dor. Pray God she do: but was the Sprat beheaded,
Or did they swing him about like a chickin, and so break his neck?

Agen. Yes, he was beheaded, and a solemn Justice made of it.

Dor. That might have been deducted.

Agenor. Why how would you have had him dyed?

Dori. Faith I would have had him rosted like a warden in a brown paper, and no more talk on't: or a feather stuck in's head, like a Quail: or a hanged him in a Dog-coller: what should he be beheaded? we shall have it grow so base shortly, Gentlemen will be out of love with it.

Nif. I wonder from whence this of the Dwarf's first sprung?

Dor. From an old leacherous pair of breeches that lay upon a wench to keep her warm: for certainly they are no mans work: and I am sure a Monkey would get one of the guard to this fellow, he was no bigger than a small Portmanteu, and much about that making if'tad legs.

Age. But Gentlemen, what say you to the Prince?

Nif. I, concerning his being sent I know not whither.

Dorialus. Why then he will come home I know not when: you shall pardon me, I'll talk no more of this subject, but say, gods be with him where ere he is, and send him well home again: For why, he is gone, or when he will return, let them know that directed him:
Only this, there's mad Morisco's in the state; but what they are, I'll tell you when I know. Come, let's go, hear all, and say nothing.

Agen. Content.

Exeunt.

Enter Timantus, and Telamon.

Tela. Timantus, is the Duke ready yet?

Tima. Almost.

Tela. What ails him?

Tima. Faith I know not, I think he has dreamt he's but eighteen: has been worfs since he sent you forth for the frizzling iron.

Tel. That cannot be, he lay in Gloves all night, and this morning I brought him a new Periwig, with a lock at

at it, and knockt up a swing in's chamber.

Tim. O but since, his Taylor came, and they have fallen out about the fashion on's cloaths: and yonders a fellow come, has board a hole in's ear; and he has bespoken a Vaulting-horse, you shall see him come forth presently: he looks like Winter, stuck here and there with fresh flowers.

Tela. Will he not Tilt think you?

Tim. I think he will.

Tela. What does he mean to doe?

Tim. I know not: but by this light I think he is in love; he wou'd ha' bin shav'd but for me.

Tela. In love with whom?

Tim. I could guess, but you shall pardon me: he will take me along with him some-whither,

Tela. I over-heard him ask your opinion of some bodies beauty.

Tima. Yes, there it goes, that makes him so youthfull, and h'as layd by his Crutch, and halts now with a leading staff.

Enter Leontine with a staff and a looking glass.

Leon. Timantus.

Tim. Sir.

Leon. This Feather is not large enough.

Tim. Yes faith, 'tis such an one as the rest of the young Gallants wear.

Leon. Telamon, does it doe well?

Tela. Sir, it becomes you, or you become it, the rare-liest—

Leon. A way, dost think so?

Tela. Think Sir, I know it. Sir, the Princess, is past all hope of life since the Dwarf was put to death.

Leon. Let her be so, I have other matters in hand: but this same Taylor angers me, he has made my doublet so wide: and see, the knave has put no points at my arme.

Tima. Those will be put to quickly Sir, upon any occasion.

Leon. Telamon, have you bid this Dancer come a mornings?

Tela. Yes Sir.

Leon. Temantus, let me see the glass again: look you how careless you are grown, is this tooth well put in?

Tima. Which Sir?

Leon. This Sir.

Tima. It shall be.

Telam. Me thinks that tooth should put him in mind on's years: and Timantus, stands as if (seeing the Duke, in such a youthfull habit) he were looking in's mouth how old he were.

Leon. So, so.

Tela. Will you have your Gown sir?

Leon. My Gown? why, am I sick? bring me my Sword.

Exit Tela.

Leon. Let a couple of the great horses be brought out for us

Tima. He'll kill himself. Why, will you ride Sir?

Leon. Ride? Dost thou think I cannot ride?

Timan. O yes Sir, I know it: but as I conceive your journey, you wou'd have it private; and then you were better take a Coach.

Leon. These Coaches make me sick: yet 'tis no matter, let it be so.

Enter Telamon with a sword.

Tel. Sir, here's your sword.

Leon. O well sed: let me see it, I could me thinks Why Telamon, bring me another: what, thinkst thou I will wear a sword in vain?

Tela. He has not strength enough to draw it, A yoke of Fleas ty'd to a hair would have drawnit.

'Tis out sir now, the Scabbard is broke.

Leon. O put it up again, and on with it; me thinks I am not drest till I feel my sword on.

Leon. Telamon, if any of my counsell aske for me, Say I am gone to take the air.

Tima. He has not been drest this twenty years then, If this vain hold but a week, he will learn to play o'th base violl and sing to't: He's poetical alreadie; For I have spide a Sonnet on's making lye by's beds side, I'll be founmannerly to read it.

Exit.

He's dead, he's dead, and I am following.

Enter Hidaspes, Cleophila, and Hero, Hidaspes in a Bed.

Cleo. Ask Cupid mercie Madam.

Hida. O my heart.

Cleo. Help!

Hero. Stir her:

Hida. O, O!

Cleo. She's going, wretched woman that we are: Look to her, and I'll pray the while.

Hero. Why Madam?

Shee kneels.

Cleo. Cupid, pardon what is past, And forgive our sins at last,

Then we will be coy no more,

But thy Deity Adore,

Troths at fifteen we will plight,

And will tread a Dance at night.

In the fields, or by the Fire,

With the youths that have desire.

(How does she yet?)

Hero. O ill:

Cleo. Given Ear-rings we will wear,

Bracelets of our Lovers hair,

Which they on our Arms shall twist,

With their Names carv'd on our wrist:

All the money that we owe,

We in Tokens will bestow:

And learn to write, that when 'tis sent,

Onely our Loves know what it meant:

O then pardon what is past,

And forgive our Sins at last.

(What, Mends she?)

Hero. Nothing, you do it not wantonly, you shou'd sing.

Hero. Leave, leave, 'tis now too late.

Cleo. Why?

Shee is dead:

Hero. Her last is breathed.

Cleo. What shall we doe.

Hero. Go run,

And tell the Duke; And whilst I'll close her eyes.

Thus I shut thy faded light,

And put it in eternall night.

Where is she can boldly say

Though she be as fresh as May;

She shall not by this Corps be laid,

Ere to morrows light doe fade.

Let us all now living be,

Warn'd by thy strict Chastitie;

And marry all fast as we can,

Till then we keep a piece of man,

Wrongfully from them that owe it

Soon may every Maid bestow it.

Exeunt.

Enter Bacha and a Maid.

Bac. Who is it?

Maid. Forsooth there's gallant Coach at the dore, And the brave old man in't, that you said was the Duke.

Bacha. Cupid, grant he may be taken.

Away:

Maid. He is coming up, and looks the swaggeringst, and has such glorious cloaths.

Bac. Let all the house see me sad, and see all handsome.

Enter Leontius, and Timantus, a Jewell and a Ring.

Leon. Nay widow flie not back, we come not now to chide, stand up and bid me welcome.

Bac. To a poor widows house that knows no end of her ill fortune: your Highness is most welcome.

Leon. Come kiss me then, this is but manners widow: Nere sling your head aside, I have more cause of grief than you: my Daughters dead: but what? 'Tis nothing. Is the rough French horse brought to the dore?

They say he is a high goer, I shall soon try his mettle.

Tim. He will be Sir, and the gray Barbary, they are fiery both.

Leon. They are the better: Before the gods I am light-some, very light-some: How dost thou like me widow?

Bac. As a person in whom all graces are.

Leon. Come, come, ye flatter: I'll clap your cheek for that, and you shall not be angry.

Hast no Musick: Now could I cut three times with ease, and do a cross point, should shame all your gallants.

Bac. I do believe you, and your self too:

Lord what a fine old Zany my Love has made him? 'tis mine, I am sure: Heaven make me thankful for him.

Leon. Tell me how old thou art, my pretty sweet heart?

Timantus. Your Grace will not buy her, she may trip Sir?

Bac. My sorrow shoves me elder then I am by many years?

Leon. Thou art so witty I must kiss agen.

Tim. Indeed her Age lyes not in her mouth: nere look it there Sir, she has a better Register, if it be not burnt.

Leon. I will kiss thee, I am a fire Timantus.

Tim. Can you chuse Sir, having such heavenly fire before you?

Leon. Widow, guess why I come, I prethee do,

Bac. I cannot Sir, unless you be pleas'd to make a mirth out of my rudeness: and that I hope your pity will not let ye, the subject is so Barren: Bite King, Bite, I'll let you play a while.

Leon. Now as I am an honest man, I'll tell thee truly, how many foot did I Jump yesterday Timantus?

Tim. Fourteen of your own, and some three fingers.

Bac. This fellow lyes as lightly, as if hee were in cut Taffata.

Alas good Almanack get thee to Bed, and tell what weather we shall have to morrow.

Leon. Widow I am come in short to be a Suiter.

Bac. For whom?

Leon. Why by my troth, I come to woo thee wench: And win thee for my self: Nay, look upon me: I have about me that will do it.

Bac. Now Heaven defend me, your Whore shall never: I thank the Gods, I have a little left me to keep me warm, and honest: if your grace take not that, I seek no more.

Leon. I am so far from taking any thing, I'll add unto thee.

Bac. Such Additions may be for your ease Sir, Not my honestie: I am well in being single, good Sir seek another, I am no meat for money.

Leon. Shall I fight for thee?

This sword shall cut his throat, that dars lay claim But to a Finger of thee, but to a look, I would see such a fellow.

Bac. It would be but a cold fight to you: This is the father of S. George a foot-back, Can such dry mumming talk.

Tim. Before the gods, your grace lookes like Aneas.

Bac. He looks like his old father upon his back, Crying to get A board.

Leon. How shall I win thy love, I pray thee tell me? I'll marry thee if thou desirest that: That is an honest Courie, I am in good earnest, and presently within this hour, am mad for thee: prethee deny me not, For as I live I'll pine thee, but I'll have thee

Bac. Now he's in the Toyl, I'll hold him fast.

Tim. You do not know what 'tis to be a Queen, Go too you Maid, else what the old man falls short of, there's others can cech out, when you please to call on 'em.

Bac. I understand you not, Love I adore thee, Sir, on my knees I give you hearty thanks, for so much Honoring your humble Hand-mayd above her birth: Far more her weak deservings, I dare not trust the Envious tongues of all that must repine at my unworthy rising.

Beside, you have many fair ones in your Kingdome Born to such worth: O turn your self about And make a Noble choice.

Leon. If I do, let me famish: I will have thee, Or break up house, and board here.

Bac. Sir, you may command an unwilling woman to obey ye: but heaven knows——

Leon. No more: these half a dozen kisses, and this Jewell, and every thing I have, and away with me, and clap it up; and have a boy by morning. Timantus let one be sent post for my son again: and for Ismenus, they are scarce twenty miles on their way yet, by that time we'll be married.

Tim. There shall Sir.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertii.

Scena Prima.

Enter Dorialis, Agenor, Nisus.

Nisus. Is not this a fine marriage?

Agenor. Yes, yes, let it alone.

Dor. I, I, the King may marry whom's list, let's talk of other matters.

Nis. Is the Prince coming home certainly?

Dor. Yes, yes, he was sent post for yesterday, lets make haste we'll see how his new Mother-in-law will entertain him.

Nis. Why well I warrant you: did you not mark how humbly she carried her self to us on her marriage day, acknowledging her own unworthiness, and that she would be our servant.

Dor. But mark what's done.

Nis. Regard not shew.

Age. O God! I knew her when I have been offred her to be brought to my bed for five pounds: whether it could have been perform'd or no, I know not.

Nis. Her Daughters a pretty Lady.

Dor. Yes: and having had but mean bringing up, it talks the pretiest and innocentiest, the Queen will be so angry to hear her betray her breeding by her language: but I am perswaded she's well dispos'd.

Agenor. I think better than her Mother.

Nis. Come, we stay too long.

Exeunt.

Enter Leucippus, and Ismenus.

Isme. How now man, strook dead with a tale?

Leon. No, but with a truth.

Isme. Stand off your self: can you endure blows, and shrink at words?

Leon. Thou knowst I have told thee all.

Isme.

Isme. But that all's nothing to make you thus: your Sisters dead.

Leu. That's much, but not the most.

Isme. Why, for the other let her marry and hang, 'tis no purpos'd fault of yours: and if your Father will needs have your cast Whore, you shall shew the duty of a child better in being contented, and bidding much good doe his good old heart with her, than in repining thus at it; let her go: what, there are more wenches man, we'll have another.

Leu. O thou art vain, thou knowst I doe not love her: What shall I doe? I would my tongue had led me To any other thing, but blasphemy, So I had mist commending of this woman, Whom I must reverence now: she is my Mother, My sin Ismenus has wrought all this ill: And I beseech thee, to be warn'd by me, And doe not lye, if any man should aske thee But How thou dost, or What a clock 'tis now. Be sure thou doe not lye, make no excuse For him that is most near thee: never let The most officious falsehood scape thy tongue, For they above (that are intirely truth) Will make that seed, which thou hast sown Of lyes, yield miseries a thousand fold Upon thine head, as they have done on mine.

Enter Timantus.

Tim. Sir, your Highness is welcome home, the Duke and Queen will presently come forth to you.

Leu. I'll wait on them.

Tima. Worthy Ismenus, I pray you, have you sped in your wars?

Isme. This Rogue mocks me. Well Timantus, Pray how have you sped here at whom at shovelboard?

Tim. Faith reasonable. How many Towns have you taken in this Summer?

Isme. How many Stags have you been at the death of this grafs?

Tima. A number: 'Pray how is the Province settled?

Isme. Prethee how does the dun Nag?

Tim. I think you mock me my Lord.

Isme. Mock thee? Yes by my troth doe I: why what wouldst thou have me doe with thee; Art good for any thing else?

Enter Leontius, Bacha, Dorialus, Agenor, Nifus, Telamon.

Leu. My good Ismenus, hold me by the wrist: And if thou see'st me fainting, wring me hard, For I shall swoon again else —

Leon. Welcome my son; rise, I did send for thee Back from the province, by thy Mothers counsell, Thy good Mother here, who loves thee well: She would not let me venture all my joy Amongst my enemies: I thank thee for her, And none but thee. I took her on thy word.

Leucip. Pinch harder.

Leon. And she shall bid thee welcome: I have now Some near affairs, but I will drink a Health To thee anon: Come Telamon, I am grown Lustier, I thank thee for't, since I married; I can stand now alone, why Telamon, And never stagger.

Exit Leontius, Telamon.

Bac. Welcome most noble Sir, whose fame is come Hither before you: out alas you scorn me, And teach me what to doe.

Leu. No, you are my Mother.

Bacha. Far unworthy of that name God knows:

But trust me, here before these Lords, I am no more but Nurse unto the Duke; Nor will I breed a faction in the State, It is too much for me that I am rais'd Unto his bed, and will remain the servant Of you that did it.

Leu. Madam I will serve you As shall become me. O dissembling woman! Whom I must reverence though. Take from thy Quiver, sure-aim'd Apollo; one of thy swift darts, Headed with thy consuming golden beams, And let it melt this body into mist, That none may find it.

Bac. Shall I beg my Lords This Room in private for the Prince and me?

Exeunt all but Leu. and Bach.

Leu. What will she say now?

Bach. I must still enjoy him:

Yet there is still left in me a spark of woman, That wishes he should move it, but he stands, As if he grew there with his eyes on earth, Sir, you and I when we were last together Kept not this distance as we were afraid Of blasting by our selves.

Leu. Madam 'tis true, Heaven pardon it.

Bach. Amen Sir.

You may think that I have done you wrong in this strange marriage.

Leu. 'Tis past now.

Bach. But it was no fault of mine: The world had call'd me mad, had I refus'd The King: nor layd I any train to catch him, It was your own Oaths did it.

Leu. 'Tis a truth: that takes my sleep away, but Would to Heaven, if it had so been pleas'd, you had Refus'd him, though I had gratifi'd that courtesie With having you my self: But since 'tis thus, I doe beseech you that you will be honest From henceforth; and not abuse his credulous Age, Which you may easily doe. As for my self What I can say, you know alas too well Is ty'd within me, here it will sit like lead, But shall offend no other, it will pluck me Back from my ent'rance into any mirth, As if a servant came, and whisper'd with me Of some friends death, but I will bear my self, To you, with all the due obedience A son owes to a Mother: more than this, Is not in me, but I must leave the rest to the Just gods: who in their blessed time, When they have given me punishment enough, For my rash Sin, will mercifully find As unexpected means to ease my grief As they did now to bring it.

Bac. Grown so godly? this must not be. And I will be to you, no other than a natural Mother ought; And for my honesty, so you will swear Never to urge me, I shall keep it safe from any other.

Leu. Bless me I should urge you?

Bacha. Nay but swear then that I may be at peace, For I doe feel a weakness in my self, That can denie you nothing, if you tempt me, I shall embrace Sin as it were a friend, and run to meet it.

Leu. If you knew how far It were from me, you would not urge an Oath. But for your satisfaction, when I tempt you.

Bac. Swear not: I cannot move him, this sad talk Of things past help, does not become us well. Shall I send one for my Musicians, and we'll dance?

Leu. Dance Madam?

Bac. Yes, Alalanta.

Leu. I cannot dance Madam.

Bac. Then lets be merry.

Len.

Leu. I am as my Fortunes bid me.

Do not you see me lowr?

Bac. Yes.

And why think you I smile?

Leu. I am so far from any joy my self,
I cannot fancie a cause of mirth.

Bac. I'll tell you, we are alone:

Leu. Alone?

Bac. Yes.

Leu. 'Tis true: what then?

Bac. What then? you make my smiling now
Break into laughter: what think you is to be done then?

Leu. We shou'd pray to Heaven for mercy.

Bacha. Pray? that were a way indeed
To pass the time: but I will make you blush,
To see a bashfull woman teach a man
What we should doe alone: try again
If you can find it out.

Leu. I dare not think I understand you.

Bac. I must teach you then; Come, kiss me.

Leu. Kiss you?

Bac. Yes, be not asham'd:

You did it not your self, I will forgive you.

Leuc. Keep you displeas'd gods, the due respect
I ought to bear unto this wicked woman,
As she is now my Mother, Haste within me,
Lest I add sins to sins, till no repentance will cure me.

Bac. Leave these melancholly moods,
That I may swear thee welcome on thy Lipps
A thousand times.

Leuc. Pray leave this wicked talk,
You doe not know to what my Fathers wrong
May urge me.

Bac. I'm careless, and doe weigh
The world, my life, and all my after hopes
Nothing without thy Love, mistake me not:
Thy Love, as I have had it, free and open
As wedlock is, within it self, what say you?

Leu. Nothing.

Bac. Pitty me, behold a Duchefs
Kneels for thy mercie, and I swear to you
Though I should lye with you, it is no Lust,
For it desires no change, I could with you
Content my self; what answer will you give?

Leuc. They that can answer must be less amaz'd,
Than I am now: you see my tears deliver
My meaning to you.

Bac. Shall I be contem'd? thou art a beast, worse than a savage beast,

To let a Lady kneel, to beg that thing
Which a right man would offer.

Leu. 'Tis your will Heaven: but let me hear me like
My self, how ever she does.

Bac. Were you made an Eunuch, since you went hence?
Yet they have more desire than I can find in you:
How fond was I to beg thy love? I'll force thee to my will

Dost thou not know that I can make the King
Dote as my list? yield quickly, or by Heaven
I'll have thee kept in prison for my purpose,
Where I will make thee serve my turn, and have thee fed
With such meats as best shall fit my ends
And not thy health, why dost not speak to me?

And when thou dost displeaseme, and art grown
Less able to perform; then I will have thee
Kill'd and forgotten: Are you stricken dumb?

Leu. All you have nam'd but making of me sin
With you, you may command, but never that;
Say what you will, I'll hear you as becomes me,
If you speak, I will not follow your counsell,
Neither will I tell the world to your disgrace,
But give you the just honor

That is due from me to my Father's wife.

Bac. Lord how full of wife formality you'r grown

Of late: but you were telling me

You could have wisht that I had marry'd you,
If you will swear so yet, I'll make away the King.

Leuc. You are a strumpet.

Bacha. Nay, I care not

For all your Railings: They will Batter walls
And take in Towns, as soon as trouble me:

Tell him, I care not, I shall undoe you only, which is no matter.

Leu. I appeal to you still, and for ever, that are
And cannot be other, Madam, I see 'tis in your power
To work your will on him: And I desire you
To lay what trains you will for my wish'd death,
But suffer him to find his quiet grave
In peace; Alas he never did you wrong,
And farther I beseech you pardon me,
For the ill word I gave you, for how ever
You may deserve, it became not me
To call you so, but passion urges me
I know not whither: my heart break now, & ease me ever

Bacha. Pray you get you hence

With your goodly humor, I am weary of you extreamely:

Leu. Trust me, so am I of my self too:

Madam, I'll take my leave; gods set all right.

Bacha. Amen, Sir, get you gon;

Am I deny'd? it does not trouble me

That I have mov'd, but that I am refus'd:

I have lost my patience: I will make him know

Lust is not Love, for Lust will find a mate

While there are men, and so will I: and more.

Enter Timantus.

Than one, or twenty: yonder is Timantus,
A fellow void of any worth, to raise himself,
And therefore like to catch at any evil
That will but pluck him up: him will I make Mine own: Timantus, Timantus. Madam?

Bac. Thou know'st well

Thou wert by chance, a means of this my raising:
Brought the Duke to me, and though 'twere but chance
I must reward thee.

Tim. I shall bend my service unto your Highness.

Bacha. But do it then entirely, and in every thing,
And tell me, couldst thou now think that thing
Thou wouldst not do for me?

Timant. No by my soul Madam.

Bacha. Then thou art right.

Go to my Lodging, and I'll follow thee.

Exit Timantus.

With my instruction I do see already,
This Prince that did but now contemn me, dead:
Yet will I never speak an evil word
Unto his Father of him, till I have won
A belief, I love him, but I'll make
His virtues his undoing, and my praises
Shall be so many swords against his breast,
Which once perform'd, I'll make Urania
My Daughter, the Kings heir, and plant my issue
In this large Throne: nor shall it be withstood,
They that begin in Lust, must end in Blood.

Exit.

Enter Dorialus, Agenor, Nifus.

Doria. We live to know a fine time, Gentl.

Nif. And a fine Duke, that through his doting age
Suffers him to be a child again
Under his Wives tuition.

Agen. All the Land holds in that tenor too: in womans service? sure we shall learn to spinn.

Dor. No, that's too honest: we shall have other Liberal Sciences taught us too soon;
Lying, and flattering, those are the studies now:

And

And Murther shortly I know, will be humanity, Gent.
If we live here we must be knaves, believe it.

Nisus. I cannot tell my Lord Doristus, though my Own nature hate it, if all determine to be knaves,
I'll try what I can do upon my self: that's certain,
I will not have my throat cut for my goodnes,
The virtue will not quit the pain.

Age. But pray you tell me,
Why is the Prince now ripe and full experient,
Not made a dore in the State?

Nis. Because he is honest.

Enter Timantus.

Tim. Goodnes attend your Honors.

Dor. You must not be amongst us then.

Tim. The Dutchesss, whose humble servant I am proud to be, would speak with you.

Age. Sir, we are pleas'd to wait: when is it?

Tim. An hour hence my good Lords, and so I leave my service.

Dor. This is one of her Ferrets that she bolts busines out withall: this fellow, if he were well ript, has all the linings of a knave within him: how slye he looks?

Nis. Have we nothing about our cloaths that he may catch at?

Age. O my conscience, there's no treason in my dublet, if there be, my elbows will discover it, they are out.

Dor. Faith, and all the harm that I can find in mine is, that they are not pay'd for; let him make what he can of that, so he discharge that. Come, let's go.

Exeunt.

Enter Bach, Leontius, Tella.

Bac. And you shall find Sir what blessing heaven gave you in such a son.

Le. Pray gods, I may, Let's walk & change our subject.

Bac. O Sir, can any thing come sweeter to you, or strike a deeper joy into your heart than your son's virtue?

Leon. I allow his virtues: but 'tis not handsome thus to feed my self with such moderate praises of mine own.

Bac. The subject of our comedations is it self grown so infinite in goodnes, that all the glory we can lay upon it, though we should open volumes of his praises, is a mere modesty in his expression, and shews him lame still, like an ill wrought peece wanting proportion.

Leo. Yet still he is a man, and subject still to more inordinate vices, than our love can give him blessing.

Bac. Else he were a god. yet so near as he is, he comes to heaven, that we may see so far as flesh can point us things only worthy them, and only these in all his actions.

Leon. This is too much my Queen.

Bach. Had the gods, lov'd me; that my unworthy womb had bred this brave man.

Leon. Still you run wrong.

Bach. I would have liv'd upon the comfort of him; fed on his growing hopes.

Leo. This touches me.

Bach. I know no friends, nor Being, but his virtues.

Le. You have laid out words enough upon a subject.

Bach. But words cannot express him, Sir: why what a shape Heaven has conceiv'd him in, oh Nature made him up!

Leon. I wonder Dutchesss.

Bach. So you must: for less than admiration loses this god-like man.

Leon. Have you done with him?

Bach. Done with? O good gods, what frailties thus pass by us without reverence?

Leon. I see no such perfection.

Bac. O dear Sir: you are a father, and those joys
To you, speak in your heart, not in your tongue.

Leo. This leaves a tall behind it worse than physick.

Baca. Then for all his wisdom, valour,
Good fortune, and all those friends of honor,
They are in him as free and natural, as passions
In a Woman.

Leon. You make me blush at all these years
To see how blindly you have hung your praises
Upon a Boy, a very child, and worthless,
Whilst I live, of these Honors.

Bac. I would not have my love Sir, make my tongue
Shew me so much a woman: as to praise
Or dispraise, where my will is, without reason,
Or generall allowance of the people.

Leon. Allowance of the people, what allow they!

Bac. All, I have sed for truth, and they must do it,
And doat upon him: love him, and admire him.

Leon. How's that?

Bac. For in this youth and noble forwardnes
All things are bound together that are kingly,
A fitness to bear rule:

Leon. No more.

Bac. And Sovereignty not made to know command.

Leon. I have sed, no more.

Bac. I have done Sir, though unwilling, and pardon me.

Leon. I do, not a word more.

Baca. I have gi'n thee poyson
Of more infection than the Dragons tooth,
Or the gross Air o'er heated.

Leon. Timantus when saw you the Prince?

Tim. I left him now Sir.

Leon. Tell me truly, out of your free opinion without courting. How you like him.

Tim. How I like him?

Leon. Yes: for you in conversation may see more
Than a Father.

Bac. It works.

Timantus. Your Grace has chosen out an ill observer.

Leon. Yes, I mean of his ill: you talk rightly.

Tim. But you take me wrong: All I know by him
I dare deliver boldly: He is the store-house
And head of virtue; your great self excepted,
That feeds the Kingdome.

Leon. These are flatteries: speak me his vices, there you do a service worth a Fathers thanks.

Tim. Sir, I cannot. If there be any, sure they are the times which I could wish less dangerous.
But pardon me, I am too bold.

Leon. You are not, forward and open what these dangers are.

Timan. Nay, good Sir.

Leon. Nay, fall not off again, I will have all.

Timan. Alas Sir, what am I, you should believe
My eyes or ears, so subtle to observe
Faults in a State: all my main business
Is service to your Grace, and necessities
For my poor life.

Leon. Do not displease me Sirrah,
But that you know tell me, and presently.

Timan. Since your Grace will have it
I'll speak it freely: Always my obedience
And love preserv'd unto the Prince:

Leon. Prethee to the matter.

Tim. For Sir, if you consider
How like a Sun in all his great employments,
How full of heat.

Leon. Make me understand what I desire.

Tim. And then at his return.

Leon. Do not anger me.

Tim. Then thus Sir: All mislike ye,
As they would do the gods, if they did dwell with 'em.

Leon. What?

Tim. Talke and prate, as their ignorant rages
Leads 'em without Allegiance or Religion.
For Heavens sake have a care of your own person:
I cannot tell, their wickedness may lead
Farther than I dare think yet.

Leo. O base people.

Tim. Yet the Prince, for whom this is pretended may Persuade 'em, and no doubt will: virtue is ever watchfull,
But be you still secur'd and comforted.

Leon. Heaven how have I offended, that this rod
So heavy and unnaturall, should fall upon me
When I am old and helpless.

Tim. Brave Gentl. that such a madding love should follow thee, to rob thee of a Father:
All the Court is full of dangerous whispers.

Leon. I perceive it, and 'spight of all their strengths will make my safety: I'll cut him shorter.
I'll cut him shorter first, then let him rule.

Bac. What a foul Age is this, when Virtue is made a sword to smite the virtuous? Alas, alas:

Leon. I'll teach him to fly lower.

Tim. By no means Sir, rather, make more your love,
And hold your favor to him: for 'tis now
Impossible to yoke him, if his thoughts,
As I must ne'er believe, run with their rages,
He never was so innocent, but what reason
His Grace has to withdraw his love from me,
And other good men that are near your person,
I cannot yet find out: I know my duty
Has ever been attending.

Leon. 'Tis too plain: He means to play the villain,
I'll prevent him, not a word more of this, be private.

Exit Leontius.

Tim. Madam 'tis done.

Bac. He cannot escape me. Have you spoken with the noble men?

Tim. Yes Madam they are here: I wait a farther service.

Bac. Till yet be the Prince, you need no more instructions.

Tim. No, I have it.

Exit Timantus.

Enter Dorialus, Nisus, Agenor.

Bac. That fool that willingly provoks a woman,
Has made himself another evill Angell,
And a new Hell, to which all other torments
Are but mere pastime: Now my noble Lords,
You must excuse me, that unmannerly
We have broke your private business.

Agen. Your good Grace may command us, and that.

Bac. Faith my Lord Agenor: 'Tis so good a cause
I am confident, you cannot loose by it.

Dorialus. Which way does she fish now?
The devill is but a fool to a right woman.

Nisus. Madam, we must needs win in doing service to such a gracious Lady.

Bac. I thank you, and will let you know the business:
So I may have your helps, never be doubtfull,
For 'tis so just a cause, and will to you
Upon the knowledge seem so honorable,
That I assure my self your willing hearts
Will strait be for me in it.

Age. If she should prove good now, what wer't like?

Dorial. Thunder in Ianuarie, or a good woman,
That's stranger than all Africk.

Bac. It shall not need your wonder, this it is:
The Duke you know is old, and rather subject
To ease and prayers now, than all those troubles,
Cares, and continuall watchings, that attend
A Kingdomes safety, therefore to prevent
The fall of such a flourishing Estate

As this has been, and to put off
The murmure of the people that encrease
Against my government, which the gods knows
I onely feel the trouble of: I present
The Prince unto your loves, a Gent.
In whom all Excellencies are knit together,
All peeces of a true man, let your prayers
Win from the Duke half his Vexation,
'That he may undertake it, whose discretion
I must confesse, though it be from the Father,
Yet now is stronger, and more apt to governi.
'Tis not my own desire, but all the Lands,
I know the weakeness of it.

Nisus. Madam, this noble care and love has won us
For ever to your lives, we'll to the King,
And since your Grace has put it in our mouths,
We'll win him with the cunning'st words we can.

Dorial. I was never coufen'd in a woman before:
For commonly they are like Apples: If once they bruise
They will grow rotten thorow, and serve for nothing but to asswage swellings.

Bac. Good Lords delay no time, since 'tis your good
Pleasures to think my counsell good, and by no means
Let the Prince know it, whose affections
Will stir mainly against it: besides his Father
May hold him dangerous, if it be not carried
So that his forward will appear not in it,
Go, and be happy.

Dorial. Well, I would not be Chronicl'd as thou
Wilt be for a good woman, for all the world.

Nisus. Madam, we kiss your hand, and so inspire.
Nothing but happiness can crown our prayers. Exeunt.

Actus Quarti

Scena Prima.

Enter Leucippus, Ismenus.

Leu. AND thus she has us'd me, is't not a good mother?
Ismenus. Why kill'd you her not?

Leu. The gods forbid it.

Ismenus. S'light, if all the women i'th' world were bar-ren, shee had dy'd.

Leuc. But 'tis not reason directs thee thus.

Ismen. Then have I none at all, for all I have in me
Directs me: Your Father's in a pretty rage.

Leucippus. Why?

Ismenus. Nay, 'tis well, if he know himself, but some of the Nobility have deliver'd a petition to him: what's in't, I know not, but it has put him to his trumps: he has taken a months time to answer it, and chafes like himself.

Enter Leontius, Bacha, and Tellamon.

Leu. He's here Ismenus.

Leon. Set me down Tellamon. Leucippus.

Leu. Sir.

Bach. Nay good Sir, be at peace, I dare swear he knows not of it.

Leon. You are foolish: peace.

Bach. All will go ill, deny it boldly Sir, trust me he cannot prove it by you.

Leu. What?

Bach. You'll make all worse too with your facing it.

Leuc. What is the matter?

Leon. Know'st thou that petition?

Look on it well: wouldst thou be joyn'd with me
(Unnaturall child to be weary of me)

E'r Fate esteem me fit for other worlds.

Bac. May he know not o' fit.

Leu. Oh strange carriages!

Sir, as I have hope that there is any thing
To reward doing well, my usages
Which have been (but 'tis no matter what)
Have put me so far from the thought of Greatness,
That I should welcome it like a disease
That grew upon me, and I could not cure.
They are my enemies that gave you this,
And yet they call me friend, and are themselves
I fear abus'd. I am weary of my life,
For Gods sake take it from me: it creates
More mischief in the State than it is worth,
The usage I have had, I know would make
Wisdom her self run frantick through the streets,
And Patience quarrel with her shadow.
Sir, this sword—

Bac. Alas! help for the love of Heaven,
Make way through me first, for he is your Father.

Leon. What, would he kill me?

Bac. No Sir, no.

Leon. Thou always makes mak'st the best on't, but I fear—

Leu. Why do you use me thus? who is't can think
That I would kill my Father, that can yet
Forbear to kill you? Here Sir, is my sword;
I dare not touch it, lest she say again
I would have kill'd you: let me not have mercy
When I most need it, if I would not change
Place with my meanest servant. Let these faults
Be mended Madam: if you saw how ill
They did become you, you would part with them;

Bac. I told the Duke as much before.

Leu. What? what did you tell him?

Bac. That it was only an ambition,
Nurst in you by your youth, provok'd you thus,
Which age would take away.

Leon. It was his doing then? come hither Love.

Bac. No indeed, Sir.

Leu. How am I made, that I can bear all this?
If any one had us'd a friend of mine ne'r this,
My hand had carried death about it.

Leon. Lead me hence Tellamon: come my dear
Bacha, I shall find time for this.

Ism. Madam, you know I dare not speak before
The King; but you know well, if not, I'll tell you,
You are the most wicked'st, and most murderous
Strumpet, that ever was call'd Woman.

Bac. My Lord, what can I do for him? he shall command
me.

Leon. I know thou art too kind; away I say.

Exit Leon. Bac. Tim. Tella.

Isme. Sir, I am sure we dream, this cannot be.

Leu. Oh that we did, my wickedness has brought
All this to pass, else I should bear my self.

Enter Urania.

Isme. Look, doe you see who's there? your virtuous Mothers issue: kill her, yet take some little piddling revenge.

Leu. Away, the whole Court calls her virtuous; for they say, she is unlike her Mother, and if so, she can have no vice:

Ism. I'll trust none of 'em that come of such a breed.

Leu. But I have found

A kind of love in her to me: alas,
Think of her death! I dare be sworn for her,
She is as free from any hate to me
As her bad Mother's full. She was brought up
I'th' Countrey, as her tongue will let you know;

Enter Urania.

If you but talk with her, with a poor Uncle,
Such as her Mother had.

Ism. She's come again.

Ura. I would fene speak to the good Marquess my brother, if I but thought he could abaid me.

Leu. Sister, how do you?

Ura. Very well I thank you.

Ism. How does your good Mother?

Leu. Fie, fie, Ismenus for shame, mock such an innocent soul as this.

Ura. Feth a she be no good, god may her so.

Leu. I know you wish it with your heart dear Sister, but she is good I hope.

Ism. Are you so simple, to make so much of this?
Do you not know,

That all her wicked Mother labours for, is but to raise
Her to your right, and leave her this Dukedom?

Ura. I, but ne'r Sir be afred;
For though she take th' ungain'ft weas she can,
I'll ne'er ha't fro' you.

Leu. I should hate my self Ismenus;
If I should think of her simplicity,
Ought but extremly well.

Ism. Nay, as you will

Ura. And though she be my Mother,
If she take any cause to do you wrong,
If I can see't, youst quickly hear on't Sir:
And so I'll take my leave.

Leu. Farewel good Sister, I thank you.

Exit Urania.

Ism. You believe all this.

Leu. Yes.

Enter Timantus.

Ism. A good faith doth well, but methinks
It were no hard matter now, for her Mother to send her:
Yonder's one you may trust if you will too.

Leu. So I wi'l, if he can shew me as apparent signs
Of truth as she did; Does he weep Ismenus?

Ism. Yes, I think so: some good's happen'd I warrant:
Do you hear, you? What honest man has scap'd misery, that thou art crying thus?

Tim. Noble Ismenus, where's the Prince?

Ism. Why there? hast wept thine eyes out?

Tim. Sir, I beseech you hear me.

Leu. Well, speak on.

Ism. Why, will you hear him?

Leu. Yes Ismenus, why?

Ism. I would hear blasphemy as willingly:

Leu. You are too blame.

Tim. No Sir: he is not to blame:

If I were as I was.

Ism. Nor as thou art, yfaith awhit too blame,

Leu. What's your business?

Tim. Faith Sir, I am ashamed to speak before you;
My conscience tells me I have injur'd you,

And by the earnest instigation
Of others, have not done you to the King
Always the best and friendliest offices;

Which pardon me, or I will never speak.

Ism. Never pardon him and silence, a knave.

Leu. I pardon thee.

Tim. Your Mother sure is naught.

Leu. Why shouldst thou think so?

Tim. Oh noble, Sir, your honest eyes perceive not
The dangers you are led to; shame upon her,
And what fell miseries the gods can think on Shower down upon her wicked head, she has plotted
I know too well your death: would my poor life
Or thousand such as mine is, might be offer'd

G g g

Like

Like sacrifices up for your preserving,
 What free oblations would she have to glut her,
 But she is merciless, and bent to ruin;
 If heaven and good men step not to your rescue,
 And timely, very timely: Oh this Dukedom!
 I weep, I weep for the poor Orphans i'th' Countrey
 Left with but Friends or Parents.

Leu. Now Ismenus, what think you of this fellow?
 This was a lying knave, a flatterer,
 Does not this Love still shew him so.

Ism. This Love? this Halter: if he prove not yet
 The cunning'st rankest rogue that ever Canted,
 I'll never see man again: I know him to bring,
 And can interpret every new face he makes;
 Look how he wrings like a good fool for a tear:
 Take heed, Children and Fools
 First feel the smart, Then weep.

Leu. Away, away, such an unkind distrust,
 Is worse than a dissembling, if it be one,
 And sooner leads to mischief, I believe it,
 And him an honest man: he could not carry
 Under an evil cause, so true a sorrow.

Ism. Take heed, this is your Mothers scorpion,
 That carries stings even in his tears,
 Whose soul is a rank poison through: Touch
 Not at him, if you do, you are gone, if you had twenty Lives: I knew him for a Roguish boy, when
 He would poison Dogs, and keep tame Toads,
 He lay with his Mother, and infected her, and now
 She begs i'th' Hospital, with a patch of Velvet,
 Where her Nose stood: like the Queen of Spades.
 And all her teeth in her purse, the Devil and this Fellow are so near, 'Tis not yet known which is the eviler Angel.

Leu. Nay, then I see 'tis spite: Come hither friend.
 Hast thou not heard the cause yet that incens'd my Mother to my death, for I protest I feel none in my self?

Tim. Her Will Sir, and Ambition, as I think,
 Are the provokers of it, as in Women,
 Those two are ever powerful to destruction,
 Beside a hate of your still growing virtues,
 She being only wicked.

Leu. Heavens defend me as I am innocent,
 And ever have been from all immoderate thoughts and Actions, that carry such rewards along with 'em.

Tim. Sir, all I know, my duty must reveal,
 My Countrey and my Love command it from me,
 For whom I'll lay my life down: this night coming,
 A Counsel is appointed by the Duke,
 To sit about your apprehension:
 If you dare trust my faith: which by all good things
 Shall ever watch about you: goe along,
 And to a place I'll guide you: where no word
 Shall scape without your hearing, nor no plot.
 Without discovering to you, which once known, you have your answers and prevention.

Ism. You are not so mad to goe; shift off this fellow, you shall be rul'd once by a wise man: Ratsbane get you gone, or —

Leu. Peace, peace for shame, thy love is too suspicious,
 'tis a way offer'd to preserve my life, and I will take it: be my Guide Timantus. and do not mind this angry man, thou know'st him: I may live to requite thee.

Tim. Sir, this service is done for virtues sake, not for reward, however he may hold me.

Ism. The great pox on you: but thou hast that curse so much, 'twill grow a blessing in thee shortly. Sir, for wis-doms sake court not your death, I am your friend and subject, and I shall lose in both: if I lov'd you not, I would laugh at you, and see you run your neck into the noose, and cry a Woodcock.

Leu. So much of man, and so much fearful; fie, pre-thee have peace within thee: I shall live yet many a golden day to hold thee here dearest and nearest to me: Go on Timantus, I charge you by your love no more, no more.

Exeunt Leu. Tim.

Ism. Goe, and let your own rod whip you:
 I pity you. And dog, if he miscarry thou shalt pay for't,
 I'll study for thy punishment, and it shall last longer and sharper than a tedious Winter,
 Till thou blasphem'st, and then thou diest and damn'st.

Exit.

Enter Leontius and Tellamon.

Leon. I wonder the Dutchess comes not.

Tel. She has heard, Sir, your Will to speak with her:
 But there is something leaden at her heart;
 (Pray God it be not mortal) that even keeps her
 From conversation with her self.

Enter the Dutchess.

B. Oh whither will you my cross affections pull me?
 Fortune, Fate, and you whose powers direct our actions,
 And dwell within us: you that are Angels
 Guiding to virtue, wherefore have you given
 So strong a hand to evil? wherefore suffer'd
 A Temple of your own, you Deities
 Where your fair selves dwelt only, and your goodness
 Thus to be soyl'd with sin?

Leon. Heaven bless us all.

From whence comes this distemper? speak my fair one.

Bac. And have you none, Love and Obedience,
 You ever faithful Servants to employ
 In this strange story of impiety,
 But me a Mother; Must I be your strumpet?
 To lay black Treason upon, and in him,
 In whom all sweetness was: in whom my love
 Was prov'd to have a Being, in whom Justice,
 And all the gods for our imaginations
 Can work into a man, were more than virtues,
 Ambition down to hell, where thou wert foster'd,
 Thou hast poison'd the best soul, the purest, whitest,
 And meekest innocent'st it self that ever
 Mens greedy hopes gave life to.

Leon. This is still stranger: lay this treason
 Open to my correction.

Bac. Oh what a combat duty and affection
 Breeds in my blood!

Leon. If thou conceal'st him, may,
 Beside my death, the curses of the Countrey,
 Troubles of conscience, and a wretched end,
 Bring thee unto a poor forgotten grave.

Bac. My Being: for another tongue to tell it,
 Cease, a Mother! some good man that dares
 Speak for his King and Countrey: I am full
 Of too much womans pity: yet oh Heaven,
 Since it concerns the safety of my Sovereign,
 Let it not be a cruelty in me,
 Nor draw a Mothers name in question,
 Amongst unborn people, to give up that man
 To Law and Justice, that unrightcoufly
 Has sought his Fathers death: be deaf: be deaf Sir,
 Your Son is the offender: Now have you all,
 Would I might never speak again.

Leon. My Son! Heaven help me.
 No more! I thought it, and since
 His life is grown so dangerous: Let them that Gave him, take him: he shall dye,
 And with him all my fears.

Bac. Oh use your mercy: you have a brave subject
 To bestow it on. I'll forgive him, Sir; and for his Wrong to me, I'll be before ye.

Leon. Durst his villany extend to thee?

Bac. Nothing but heats of youth, Sir.

Leon.

Leon. Upon my life he fought my bed.

Bacha. I must confess he loved me
Somewhat beyond a Son : and still pursu'd it
With such a Lust, I will not say Ambition :
That clean forgetting all obedience,
And only following his first heat unto me,
He hotly fought your death, and me in Marriage.

Leon. Oh Villain!

Bac. But I forget all : and am half asham'd
To press a man so far.

Enter Timantus.

Tim. Where is the Duke? for Gods sake bring me to him:

Leon. Here I am: each corner of the Dukedom
Sends new affrights forth : what wouldst thou? speak.

Tim. I cannot Sir, my fear ties up my tongue :

Leon. Why, what's the matter? Take thy courage
To thee, and boldly speak, where are the Guard?
In the gods name, out with it :

Tim. Treason, treason.

Leon. In whom?

Bacha. Double the Guard.

Tim. There is a fellow, Sir.

Leon. Leave shaking man.

Timan. 'Tis not for fear, but wonder.

Leon. Well.

Timan. There is a fellow, Sir, close i'th' Lobby :
You o'the Guard, look to the door there.

Leon. But let me know the business.

Timan. Oh that the hearts of men should be so hard'ned
Against so good a Duke, for Gods sake, Sir,
Seek means to save your self; This wretched slave
Has his sword in his hand, I know his heart:
Oh it hath almost kill'd me with the thought of it.

Leon. Where is he?

Enter the Guard, and bring him in.

Timan. P'th' Lobby Sir, close in a corner :
Look to your selves for Heavens sake,
Me thinks he is here already.
Fellows of the Guard be valiant.

Leon. Goe Sirs, and apprehend him; Treason shall Never dare me in mine own Gates.

Tim. 'Tis done.

There they bring the Prince in.

Bacha. And thou shalt find it to thy best content.

Leon. Are these the comforts of my age?

They're happy that end their daies contented
With a little, and live aloof from dangers, to a King
Every content doth a new peril bring.
Oh let me live no longer, fname of Nature,
Bastard to Honor: Traytor, Murderer,
Devil in a humane shape. Away with him,
He shall not breathe, his hot affection here.

Leon. Sir, hear me.

Leon. Am I or he your Duke? away with him
To a close prison: your Highness now shall know,
Such branches must be cropt before they grow.

Leon. Whatever fortune comes, I bid it welcome,
My innocency is my Armor: gods preserve you.

Exit.

Bacha. Fare thee well, I shall never see so brave a Gent.
Would I could weep out his offences.

Tim. Or I could weep out mine eyes.

Leon. Come Gentlemen, we'll determine presently
About his death: we cannot be too forward in our Safety: I am very sick, lead me unto my bed. Exeunt.

Enter Citizen and his Boy.

Cit. Sirrah, goe fetch my Fox from the Cutlers :
There's money for the scowring: Tell him I stop a groat since the last great Muster: he had in stone Pitch for the bruise: he took with the recoyling of his Gun.

Boy. Yes Sir.

Cit. And do you hear? when you come, Take down my Buckler, and sweep the Cobwebs off: and grind the pick out, and fetch a Nailor two: and tack on bracers: your Mistress made a pot-lid ont'r,
I thank her, at her Mans Wedding, and burnt off the Handle.

Boy. I will Sir.

Exit.

Cit. Who's within here, hoe Neighbor, not stirring
yet?

2 Cit. Oh, good morrow, good morrow: what news,
what news?

1 Cit. It holds, he dies this morning.

2 Cit. Then happy man be his fortune, I am resolv'd.

1 Cit. And so am I, and forty more good fellows,
That will not give their heads for the washing, I take it.

2 Cit. 'Sfoot man, who would not hang in such good company, and such a cause? A Fire, a Wife and Children; 'Tis such a jest that men should look behind 'em to the world: and let their honors, their honors neighbor, slip.

1 Cit. I'll give thee a pint of Bastard and a Roll for that bare word.

2 Cit. They say, that we Tailors, are things that lay one another, and our Geese hatch us: I'll make some of 'em feel they are Geese o'th' game then.

I'fack, take down my Bill, 'tis ten to one I use it. Take a good heart man, all the low ward is ours, with a wet finger.

An lay my cut-sing' red Gantlet ready for me,
That, that I us'd to work in, when the Gentli.were
Up against us, and beaten out of Town, and almost out o'
Debt too: for a plague on 'em they never paid well since:

And take heed sirrah, your Mistress hears not of this Business, she's near her time: yet if she do,
I care not, she may long for Rebellion,
For she has a devilish spirit.

1 Cit. Come, let's call up the new Iremonger, he's as tough as steel, and has a fine wit in these resurrections;
Are you stirring neighbor?

3. Within. Oh, Good morrow neighbors,
I'll come to you presently.

2. Goeto, this is his Mothers doing; she's a Polecat.

1. As any is in the world.

2. Then say, I have hit it, and a vengeance on her, let her be what she will.

1. Amen say I, she has brought things to a fine pass with her wisdom: do you mark it?

2. One thing I am sure she has, the good old Duke, she gives him pap again they say, and dandles him, and hangs a corral and bells about his neck, and makes him believe his teeth will come agen; which if they did, and I he, I would worry her as never Curr was worried: I would neighbor, till my teeth met I know where, but that's counsel.

Enter 3 Citizen.

3. Good morrow neighbors: hear you the sad news?

1. Yes, would we knew as well how to prevent it.

3. I cannot tell, methinks 'twere no great matter, if men were men: but —

2. You do not twit me with my calling neighbor?

3. No surely: for I know your spirit to be tall; pray be not vext.

2. Pray forward with your counsel:

I am what I am, and they that prove me shall find me to their cost: do you mark me neighbor, to their cost I say.

1. Nay, look how soon you are angry?

2. They shall neighbors: yes, I say they shall.

3. I do believe they shall.

1. I know they shall.

2. Whether you do or no I care not two pence,
I am no beast, I know mine own strength neighbors;
Cod bless the King, your companies is fair.

1. Nay neighbor, now ye erre, now I must tell you so,
and ye are twenty Neighbors.

3. You had best goe peach, doe, peach.

2. Peach; I scorn the motion.

3. Doe, and see what follows: I'll spend an hundred pound, and be two I care not: but I'll undoe thee.

2. Peach, Oh disgrace! Peach in thy face, and doe the worst thou canst: I am a true-man, and a free-man:
peach!

1. Nay, look, you will spoil all.

2. Peach!

1. Whilst you two brawl together, the Prince will lose his life.

3. Come, give me your hand, I love you well, are you for the action?

2. Yes: but Peach provokes me, 'tis a cold fruit, I feel it cold in my stomach still.

3. No more, I'll give you Cake to digest it.

Enter the Fourth.

4. Shut up my shop, and be ready at a call boys, and one of you run over my old tuck with a few ashes, 'tis grown odious with toasting Cheefe: and burn a little Juniper in my Murrin, the Maid made it her Chamber-pot: an hour hence
I'll come again; and as you hear from me, send me a clean flirt.

3. The Chandler by thy Wharf, and it be thy Will.

2. Gossip, good morrow.

4. Oh good morrow Gossip: good morrow all, I see ye of one mind you cleave so close together: come 'tis time,
I have prepared an hundred if they stand.

1. 'Tis well done: shall we sever, and about it?

3. First, let's to the Tavern, and a pint a piece will make us Dragons.

2. I will have no mercy, come what will of it.

4. If my tuck hold, I'll spit the Guard like Larks with sage between 'em.

2. I have a foolish Bill to reckon with 'em, will make some of their hearts ake, and I'll lay it on: now shall I fight,
'twill do you good to see me.

3. Come, I'll do something for the Town to talk of when I am rotten: pray God there be enough to kill, that's all.

Exeunt.

Enter Dorialus, Nifus, Agenor.

Age. How black the day begins!

Dor. Can you blame it, and look upon such a deed as shall be done this morning?

Nif. Does the Prince suffer to day?

Dor. Within this hour they say.

Agen. Well, they that are most wicked are most safe:
'twill be a strange justice, and a lamentable, gods keep us from the too soon feeling of it.

Doria. I care not if my throat were next: for to live still, and live here, were but to grow fat for the Shambles.

Nif. Yet we must do it, and thank 'em too, that our lives may be accepted.

Age. Faith I'll go starve my self, or grow diseas'd to shame the hangman; for I am sure he shall be my Herald, and quarter me.

Dor. I, a plague on him, he's too excellent at Arms.

Nifus. Will you goe feethis sad fight, my Lord Agenor?

Age. I'll make a mourner.

Dor. If I could do him any good, I would goe,
The bare sight else will but afflict my spirit,
My prayers shall be as near him as your eyes:
As you find him settled, remember my love and service to his Grace.

Nif. We will weep for you, Sir: farewell. Exeunt.

Dor. Farewell to all our happinefs, a long farewell.

Thou angry power, whether of Heaven or Hell,
Thou laist this sharp correction on our Kingdom
For our offences, infinite and mighty!

Oh hear me, and at length be pleas'd, be pleas'd
With pity to draw back thy vengeance,

Too heavy for our weaknes; and accept,
(Since it is your discretion, heavenly Wilsdoms,

To have it so) this sacrifice for all,

That now is flying to your happinefs,

Only for you most fit: let all our sins suffer in him.

A shout within.

Gods, what's the matter? I hope 'tis joy;
How now my Lords?

Enter Agenor and Nifus.

Nif. I'll tell you with that little breath I have;
More joy than you dare think, The Prince is safe from danger.

Dor. How!

Age. 'Tis true, and thus it was; his hour was come
To lose his life, he ready for the stroke,
Nobly, and full of Saint-like patience,
Went with his Guard: which when the people saw,
Compassion first went out, mingled with tears,
That bred desires, and whispers to each other,
To do some worthy kindness for the Prince,
And e'r they understood well how to do,
Fury stept in, and taught them what to do,
Thrusting on every hand to rescue him,
As a white innocent: then flew the roar
Through all the streets, of Save him, save him, save him:
And as they cry'd, they did; for catching up
Such sudden weapons as their madnes shew them.
In short, they beat the Guard, and took him from 'em,
And now march with him like a royal Army.

Dor. Heaven, heaven I thank thee,
What a slave was I to have my hand so far from
This brave rescue, 't'ad been a thing to brag on When I was old. Shall we run for a wager to the Next Temple, and give thanks?

Nif. As fast as wishes.

Enter Leucippus and Ismenus: the people within stops.

Leu. Good friends goe home again, there's not a man shall goe with me.

Isme. Will you not take revenge? I'll call them on.

Leuc. All that love me, depart:

I thank you, and will serve you for your loves:

But I will thank you more to suffer me

To govern 'em once: more, I do beg ye,

For my sake to your houses.

All within. Gods preserve you.

Isme. And what house will you goe to?

Leu. Ismenus, I will take the wariest courses that I can think of to defend my self, but not offend.

Isme. You may kill your Mother, and never offend your Father, an honest man.

Leu. Thou know'st I can scape now, that's all I look for:
I'll leave.

Isme. Timantus, a pox take him, would I had him here,
I would kill him at his own weapon single, sithes we have built enough on him: plague on't, I'm out of all patience:
discharge such an Army as this, that would have followed you without paying, Oh gods!

Leu. To what end should I keep 'em? I am free.

Isme. Yes, free o' th' Traitors, for you are proclaim'd
one.

Leu. Should I therefore make my self one?

Isme.

Isme. This is one of your moral Philosophy, is it? Heaven blefs me from subtilties to undoe my self with: But I know, if reason her self were here, She would not part with her own safety.

Leu. Well, pardon Ismenus, for I know My courses are most just; nor will I stain 'em With one bad action; for thy self thou know'st, That though I may command thee, I shall be A ready servant to thee if thou needst: and so I'll take my leave.

Isme. Of whom?

Leu. Of thee.

Isme. Heart, you shall take no leave of me.

Leu. Shall I not?

Isme. No, by the gods shall you not: nay, if you have no more wit but to goe absolutely alone, I'll be in a little.

Leu. Nay, prethee good Ismenus part with me.

Isme. I wonnot i'faith, never move it any more; for by this good light I wonnot.

Leu. This is an ill time to be thus unruly:

Ismenus, You must leave me.

Isme. Yes, if you can beat me away: else the gods refuse me if I will leave you till I see more reason; you sha'nt undoe your self.

Leu. But why wilt not leave me?

Isme. Why I'll tell you: Because when you are gone, then—— life, if I have not forgot my reason—— hell take me: you put me out of patience so: Oh! marry when you are gone, then will your Mother (a pox confound her) she never comes in my head, but she spoils my memory too: there are a hundred reasons.

Leu. But shew me one.

Isme. Shew you; what a stir here is; why I will shew you: Do you think; well, well, I know what I know, I pray come, 'Tis in vain: but I am sure. Devils take 'em; what do I meddle with 'em? You know your self. Soul, I think I am: is there any man i'th' world? as if you knew not this already better than I. Pish, pish, I'll give no reason.

Leu. But I will tell thee one, why thou shouldst stay: I have not one friend in the Court but thou, On whom I may be bold to trust to send me Any intelligence: and if thou lov'st me Thou wilt do this, thou needst not fear to stay, For there are new-come Proclamations out, Where all are pardon'd but my self.

Isme. 'Tis true, and in the same Proclamation, your fine Sister Urania, whom you us'd so kindly, is proclaim'd Heir apparent to the Crown.

Leu. What though, thou mayst stay at home without danger?

Isme. Danger, hang danger, what tell you me of danger?

Leu. Why if thou wilt not do't, I think thou dar'st not.

Isme. I dare not: if you speak it in earnest, you are a Boy.

Leu. Well Sir, if you dare, let me see you do't:

Isme. Why so you shall, I will stay.

Leu. Why God-a-mercy-

Isme. You know I love you but too well.

Leu. Now take these few directions: farewell, fend to me by the wariest ways thou canst: I have a soul tells me we shall meet often. The gods protect thee.

Isme. Pox o' my self for an ass, I'm crying now, God be with you, if I never see you again: why then pray get you gone, for grief and anger wonnot let me know what I say, I'll to the Court as fast as I can, and see the new Heir apparent.

Exeunt.

Aelus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Urania and her Woman.

Uran. WHat hast thou found him?

Wo. Madam, he is coming in.

Uran. Gods blefs my brother, wherefoe'er he is: And I beseech you keep me fro the bed Of any naughty Tyrant, whom my Mother Would ha me have to wrong him.

Enter Ismenus.

Isme. What would her new Grace have with me?

Ura. Leave us a while. My Lord Ismenus. Exit M.
I pray for the love of Heaven and God,
That you would tell me one thing, which I know
You can do weell.

Isme. Where's her fain Grace?

Ura. You know me well inough, but that you mock, I am she my fen.

Isme. God blefs him that shall be thy husband, if thou wear'st the breeches thus soon, thou'lt be as impudent a thy Mother.

Ura. But will you tell me this one thing?

Ism. What is't? if it be no great matter whether I do or no, perhaps I will.

Ura. Yes faith, 'tis matter.

Ism. And what is't?

Ura. I pray you let me know whaire the Prince my Brother is.

Ism. I'faith you shan be hang'd first, is your Mother so foolish to think your good Grace can sift it out of me?

Ura. If you have any mercy left i' you to a poor wench, tell me.

Ism. Why wouldst thou not have thy brains beat out for this, to follow thy Mothers steps so young?

Ura. But believe me, she knows none of this.

Ism. Believe you? why do you think I never had wits? or that I am run out of them? how should it belong to you to know, if I could tell?

Ura. Why I will tell you, and if I speak false Let the devil ha me: yonder's a bad man, Come from a Tyrant to my Mother, and what name They ha' for him, good faith I cannot tell.

Isme. An Ambassador.

Ura. That's it: but he would carry me away, And have me marry his Master; and I'll day E'r I will ha' him.

Ism. But what's this to knowing where the Prince is?

Ura. Yes: for you know all my Mother does: Agen the Prince is but to ma me great.

Ism. Pray, I know that too well, what ten?

Ura. Why I could goe to the good Marquis my Brother, and put my self into his hands, that so He may preserve himself.

Ism. Oh that thou hadst no seed of thy Mother in thee, and couldst mean this now.

Ura. Why feth I do, wou'd I might ne'er stir more if I do not.

Ism. I shall prove a ridiculous fool, I'll be damn'd else: hang me if I do not half believe thee.

Ura. By my troth you may.

Ism. By my troth I doe: I know I'm an Ass for't, But I cannot help it.

Ura. And won you tell me then?

Ism. Yes faith will I, or any thing else i'th' world: for I think thou art as good a creature as ever was born.

Ura. But ail' goe i' this ladst apparel:

But

But you must help me to Silver.

Ism. Help thee? why the pox take him that will not help thee to any thing i' th' world, I'll help thee to Money, and I'll do't presently too, and yet foul, If you should play the Karvy Harlotry little pocky baggage now and cosin me, what then?

Ura. Why, an I do, wou'd I might ne'er see day agen.

Ism. Nay, by this light, I do not think thou wilt: I'll presently provide thee Money and a Letter. Exit. Ism.

Ura. I, but I'll ne'er deliver it.

When I have found my Brother, I will beg
To serve him; but he shall never know who I am:
For he must hate me then for my bad mother:
I'll say I am a Countrey Lad that want a service,
And have straid on him by chance, lest he discover me;
I know I must not live long, but that taimé
I ha'to spend, shall be in serving him.
And though my Mother seek to take his life away,
In a day my brother shall be taught
That I was ever good, though she were naught. Exit.

Enter Bacha and Timantus: Bacha reading a Letter.

Bac. Run away, the Devil be her guide.

Tim. Faith she's gone: there's a Letter I found it in her pocket, would I were with her, she's a handsome Lady, a plague upon my bashfulness, I had bobbed her long ago else.

Bac. What a base whore is this, that after all My ways for her advancement, should so poorly Make virtue her undoer, and choose this time, The King being deadly sick, and I intending A present marriage with some forreign Prince, To strengthen and secure my self. She writes here Like a wife Gentlewoman, She will not stay: And the example of her dear brother, makes her Fear her self, to whom she means to flie.

Tim. Why, who can help it?

Bac. Now Poverty and Lechery, which is thy end, rot thee, where e'er thou goest with all thy goodness.

Tim. Berlady they'll bruze her: and she were of brass I am sure they'll break stone Walls: I have had experience of them both, and they have made me desperate: but there's a messenger, Madam, come from the Prince with a Letter to Ismenus, who by him returns an answer.

Bac. This comes as pat as wishes: thou shalt presently away Timantus.

Tim. Whither Madam?

Ba. To the Prince, and take the Messenger for guide:

Tim. What shall I do there? I have done too much mischief to be believ'd again; or indeed, to scape with my head on my back, if I be once known.

Bac. Thou art a weak shallow fool: get thee a disguise, and withal, when thou com'st before him, have a Letter fain'd to deliver him: and then, as thou hast ever hope of goodness by me, or after me, strike one home stroke that shall not need another: dar'st thou speak, dar'st thou? if thou say'st off, go be a Rogue again, and lie and pander to procure thy meat? dar'st thou? speak to me?

Tim. Sure I shall never walk when I am dead: I have no spirit, Madam, I'll be drunk but I'll do it, that's all my refuge. Exit.

Bac. Away, no more, then I'll raise an Army whilst the King yet lives, if all the means and power I have can do it, I cannot tell.

Enter Ismenus and three Lords.

Ism. Are you inventing still? we'll ease your studies.

Bac. Why how now saucy Lords?

Ism. Nay, I'll shake ye; yes devil, I will shake ye.

Bac. Do not you know me Lords?

Nis. Yes deadly sin we know ye, would we did not.

Ism. Doe you hear whore, a plague a God upon thee, the Duke is dead.

Bac. Dead!

Ism. I, wild-fire and brimstone take thee: good man he is dead, and past those miseries which thou, salt infection-like; like a disease flungst upon his head. Dost thou hear, and 'twere not more respect in Womanhood in general than thee, because I had a Mother, who I will not say she was good, she liv'd so near thy time, I would have thee in vengeance of this man, whose peace is made in heaven by this time, tied to a post; and dried i' th' sun, and after carried about, and shewn at Fairs for money, with a long story of the devil thy father, that taught thee to be whorish, envious, bloody.

Bac. Ha, ha, ha.

Ism. You fleeing harlot, I'll have a horse to leap thee, and thy base issue shall carry Sumpters. Come Lords, bring her along, we'll to the Prince all, where her hell hood shall wait his censure; and if he spare the she-Goat, may he lie with thee again: and beside, maist thou lay upon him some nasty foul disease, that hate still follows, and his end a dry ditch. Lead you corrupted whore, or I'll draw a goad shall make you skip: away to the Prince.

Bac. I la, ha, ha, I hope yet I shall come coo late to find him.

Cornets.

Cupid from above.

Enter Leucippus, Urania: Leucippus with a bloody Handkerchief.

Leu. Alas poor boy, why dost thou follow me? What canst thou hope for? I am poor as thou art.

Ura. In good seth I shall be weel and rich enough If you will love me, and not put me from you.

Leu. Why dost thou choose out me Boy to undo thee? Alas, for pittie take another Master, That may be able to deserve thy love In breeding thee hereafter: me thou knowest not, More than my misery: and therefore canst not Look for rewards at my hands: would I were able My pretty knave, to doe thee any kindness: truly Good Boy, I would upon my faith, thy harmless Innocence moves me at heart: wilt thou goe Save thy self; why dost thou weep? Alas, I do not chide thee.

Ura. I cannot tell if I go from you; Sir, I shall ne'er dawn day more: Pray if you can, I will be true to you: Let me wait on you: if I were a man, I would fight for you: Sure you have some ill-willers, I would slay em.

Leu. Such harmless souls are ever Prophets: well, I take thy wish, thou shalt be with me still: But prethee eat, my good boy: Thou wilt die my child if thou fast one day more. This four daies thou hast tasted nothing: Goe into the Cave and eat: thou shalt find something for thee, to bring thy blood again, and thy fair colour.

Ura. I cannot eat, God thank you.

But I'll eat to morrow.

Leu. Thou't be dead by that time.

Ura. I should be well then, for you will not love me.

Leu. Indeed I will. This is the prettiest passion that e'er I felt yet: why dost thou look so earnestly upon me?

Ura. You have fain eyes Master.

Leu. Sure the boy dotes: why dost thou sigh my child?

Ura. To think that such a fine man should live, and no gay Lady love him.

Leu. Thou wilt love me?

Ura. Yes sure till I die, and when I am in heaven, I'll e'en wish for you.

Leu. And I'll come to thee boy. This is a Love I never yet heard tell of: come, thou art sleepy child; goe in, and I'll sit with thee: heaven what portends this?

Ura. You are sad, but I am not sleepy, would I could do ought to make you merry: shall I sing?

Leu. If thou wilt good Boy.
Alas my boy, that thou shouldst comfort me, and art far worse than I!

Enter Timantus with a Letter disguised.

Ura. Law Master, there's one, look to your self;

Leu. What art thou that in this dismal place,
Which nothing could find out but misery,
Thus boldly stepst? Comfort was never here,
Here is no food, nor beds, nor any house
Built by a better Architect than beasts;
And e'r you get dwelling from one of them,
You must fight for it: if you conquer him,
He is your meat: if not, you must be his.

Tim. I come to you (for if I not mistake, you are the Prince) from that most Noble Lord Ismenus with a Letter.

Ura. Alas, I fear I shall be discover'd now.

Leu. Now I feel my self the poorest of all mortal things.
Where is he that receives such courtesies
But he has means to shew his gratefulness
Some way or other? I have none at all:
I know not how to speak so much as well
Of thee, but to these trees.

Leucippus opening the Letter, the whilst Timantus runs at him, and Urania steps before.

Tim. His Letters speak him, Sir —

Ura. Gods keep me but from knowing him till I die:
aye me, sure I cannot live a day, Oh thou foul Traitor:
How do you Master?

Leu. How dost thou my child? alas, look on his, it may make thee repentant, to behold those innocent drops that thou hast drawn from thence.

Ura. 'Tis nothing Sir, and you be well.

Tim. Oh pardon me, know you me now, Sir?

Leu. How couldst thou find me out?

Tima. We intercepted a Letter from Ismenus, and the bearer directed me.

Leu. Stand up Timantus boldly,
The world conceives that thou art guilty
Of divers treasons to the State and me:
But oh far be it from the innocence
Of a just man, to give a Traitor death
Without a tryal: here the Countrey is not To purge thee or condemn thee; therefore
A nobler trial than thou dost deserve,
Rather than none at all, here I accuse thee
Before the face of Heaven, to be a Traitor
Both to the Duke my Father and to me, and the Whole Land: speak, is it so or no?

Tima. 'Tis true Sir, pardon me.

Leu. Take heed Timantus how thou dost cast away thy self, I must proceed to execution hastily if thou confests it:
speak: once againe, is it so or no?

Tima. I am not guilty, Sir.

Fight here: the Prince gets his sword, and gives it him.

Leu. Gods and thy sword acquit thee, here it is.

Tima. I will not use any violence against your Highness.

Leu. At thy peril then, for this must be thy trial: and from henceforth look to thy self.

Timantus draws his sword, and runs at him when he turns aside.

Tim. I do beseech you, Sir, let me not fight.

Leu. Up, up again Timantus,
There is no way but this, believe me.
Now if — Fie, fie Timantus, is there no
Usage can recover thee from baseness, wert thou
Longer to converse with men, I would have chid
Thee for this: be all thy faults forgiven.

Tim. Oh spare me Sir, I am not fit for death.

Leu. I think thou art not, yet trust me, sifter than for life: Yet tell me e'r thy breath be gone, know'st of any other plots against me?

Tim. Of none.

Leu. What course wouldst thou have taken, when thou hadst kill'd me?

I would have ta'en your Page, and married her.

Leu. What Page?

Tim. Your boy there. — Dies.

Urania sounds.

Leu. Is he fall'n mad in death, what does he mean?
Some good god help me at the worst: how dost thou?
Let not thy misery vex me, thou shalt have
What thy poor heart can wish: I am a Prince,
And I will keep thee in the gayest cloaths,
And the finest things, that ever pretty boy had given him.

Ura. I know you well enough,
Feth I am dying, and now you know all too.

Leu. But stir up thy self; look what a Jewel here is,
See how it glisters: what a pretty shew
Will this make in thy little ear? ha, speak,
Eat but a bit, and take it.

Ura. Do you not know me?

Leu. I prethee mind thy health: why that's well said my good boy, smile still.

Ura. I shall smile till death an I see you,
I am Urania, your Sister-in-law.

Leu. How?

Ura. I am Urania.

Leu. Dulness did seize me, now I know thee well;
Alas, why cam'st thou hither?

Ura. Feth for love, I would not let you know till I was dying; for you could not love me, my Mother was so naught.

Leu. I will love thee, or any thing: what? wilt
Thou leave me as soon as I know thee?

Speak one word to me: alas she's past it,

She will ne'er speak more

What noise is that? it is no matter who

Enter Ismenus with the Lords.

Comes on me now. What worse than mad are you
That seek out sorrows? if you love delights
Begone from hence.

Isme. Sir, for you we come, as Soldiers to revenge the wrongs you have suffer'd under this naughty creature:
what shall be done with her? say, I am ready.

Leu. Leave her to Heaven, brave Cosin, they shall tell her how she has sinn'd against 'em, my hand shall never be itain'd with such base blood: live wicked Mother: that reverend Title be your pardon, for I will use no extremity against you, but leave you to Heaven.

Bacha. Hell take you all, or if there be a place
Of torment that exceeds that, get you thither:
And till the devils have you, may your lives
Be one continued plague, and such a one,
That knows no friends nor ending.

May all ages that shall succeed, curse you as I do!

And if it be possible, I ask it heaven,

That your base issues may be ever Monsters,

That must for shame of nature and succession,

Be drown'd like dogs.

Would I had breath to please you.

Leu. Would you had love within you, and such grief
As might become a Mother: look you there,
Know you that face? that was Urania:

These are the fruits of those unhappy Mothers,

That labour with such horrid births as you do:

If you can weep, there's cause; poor innocent,

Your wickedness has kill'd her: I'll weep for you.

Isme. Monstrous woman,

Mars would weep at this, and yet she cannot.

Leu. Here lies your Minion too, slain by my hand,

I will

I will not say you are the cause: yet certain,
I know you were too blame, the gods forgive you,

Isme. See, she stands as if she were inventing
Some new destruction for the world.

Leu. Ismenus, thou art welcome yet to my sad company.

Isme. I come to make you somewhat sadder, Sir.

Leu. You cannot, I am at the height already.

Isme. Your Fathers dead.

Leu. I thought so, Heaven be with him: Oh woman, woman, weep now or never, thou hast made more sorrows than we have eyes to utter,

Is. Now let Heaven fall, I am at the worst of evils, a a thing so miserably wretched, that every thing, the last of humane comforts hath left me: I will not be so base and cold, to live and wait the mercies of these men I hate, no, 'tis just I die, since fortune hath left me, my step discent attends me: hand, strike thou home, I have soul enough to guide; and let all know, as I stood a Queen, the same I'll fall, and one with me.

She stabs the Prince with a knife.

Leu. Ho.

Isme. How do you, Sir?

Leu. Nearer my health, than I think any here, my tongue begins to falter: what is man? or who would be one, when he sees a poor weak woman can in an instant make him none.

Dor. She is dead already.

Isme. Let her be damn'd already as she is: post all for Surgeons.

Leu. Let not a man stirr, for I am but dead:
I have some few words which I would have you hear,
And am afraid I shall want breath to speak 'em:

First to you my Lords, you know Ismenus is Undoubtedly Heir of Lycia, I do beseech you all,
When I am dead, to shew your duties to him.

Lords. We vow to do't.

Leu. I thank you.

Next to you Cousin Ismenus, that shall be the Duke,
I pray you let the broken Image of Cupid
Be re-edified, I know all this is done by him.

Isme. It shall be so.

Leu. Last, I beseech you that my Mother-in-law may have a burial according to ————— Dies.

Isme. To what, Sir?

Dor. There is a full point.

Isme. I will interpret for him; she shall have burial according to her own deserts, with dogs.

Dor. I would your Majesty would haste for setting of the people.

Isme. I am ready.

Age. Goe, and let the Trumpets sound
Some mournful thing, whilst we convey the body
Of this unhappy Prince unto the Court,
And of that virtuous Virgin to a Grave:
But drag her to a ditch, where let her lie,
Accurst, whilst one man has a memory.

Exeunt.

Cupid's Speech.

*The time now of my Revenge draws near.
Nor shall it lessen as I am a god,
With all the cries and prayers that have been;
And those that be to come, though they be infinite,
In need and number.*

PROLOGUE

Florish.

NEW Plays and Maidenheads are near a-kin,
Much follow'd both; for both much money gi'n,
If they stand sound, and well: And a good Play (Whose modest Scenes blush on his marriage day,
And shake to loose his honour) is like hir
That after holy Tie, and first nights stir
Yet still is Modesty, and still retains
More of the Maid to sight, than Husbands pains;
We pray our Play may be so; for I'm sure
It has a noble breeder, and a pure,
A Learned, and a Poet never went
More famous yet 'twixt Po, and silver Trent:
Chaucer (of all admir'd) the Story gives,
There constant to eternity it lives:
If we let fall the Nobleness of this,
And the first sound this Child hear, be a hiss,

How will it shake the bones of that good man
And make him cry from under-ground, Oh fan
From me the witless chaff of such a writer
That blasts my Bayes, and my fam'd Works makes light-
Than Robin Hood, this is the fear we bring
For to say Truth, it were an endless thing:
And too ambitious to aspire to him;
Weak as we are, and almost breathless swim
In this deep water. Do but you hold out
Your helping hands, and we shall tack about,
And something do to save us: You shall hear
Scenes, though below his Art, may yet appear
Worth two hours travel. To his bones sweet sleep:
Content to you. If this Play do not keep,
A little dull time from us, we perceive
Our losses fall so thick, we must needs leave.

Florish.

Actus Primus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Hymen with a Torch burning: a Boy, in a white Robe before, singing, and strewing Flowers: after Hymen, a Nymph, encompass'd in her Tresses, bearing a wheaten Garland. Then Theseus between two other Nymphs, with wheaten Chaplets on their heads. Then Hippolita the Bride lead by Theseus, and another holding a Garland over her head (her Tresses likewise hanging.) After her Emelia holding up her Train.

The SONG.

Musick.

Ofes their sharp spines being gone,
Not royal in their smells alone,
But in their hew,
Maiden-Pinks, of odour faint,
Daizies smell less, yet most quaint
And sweet Time true.

Primrose first born, child of Ver,
Merry Spring time's Harbinger,

With her bells dimm.
Oxlips in their Cradles growing;
Marigolds on death-beds blowing,
Larks-beels trim.

All dear natures children sweet,
Lie fore Bride and Bridegrooms feet;
Blessing their sence.
Not an Angel of the Air,
Bird melodious, or Bird fair,
Is absent hence.

The Crow, the slanderous Cuckooe, nor
The boading Raven, nor Clough be
Nor chatt'ring Pie,
May on our Bridehouse perch or sing,
Or with them any discord bring
But from it fly.

Strew
Flowers.

Enter

Enter three Queens in Black, with nails stain'd, with Imperial Crowns. The first Queen falls down at the foot of Thefeus; The second falls down at the foot of Hippolita. The third before Emilia.

1 Qu. For pities sake, and true gentilities,
Hear and respect me.

2 Qu. For your Mothers sake.
And as you with your womb may thrive with fair ones,
Hear and respect me,

3 Qu. Now for the love of him whom Jove hath mark'd
The honor of your Bed, and for the sake
Of clear Virginity, be Advocate
For us, and our distresses: This good deed
Shall raze you out o'th' Book of Trespasses
All you are set down there.

Thef. Sad Lady rise.

Hip. Stand up.

Emil. No knees to me.

What Woman I may steed that is distress,
Does bind me to her.

Thef. What's your request? Deliver you for all?

1 Qu. We are three Queens, whose Sovereigns fell before
The wrath of cruel Creon; who endur'd
The Beaks of Ravens, Tallents of the Kites,
And pecks of Crows in the foul field of Thebes.
He will not suffer us to burn their bones,
To urne their ashes, nor to take th' offence
Of mortal loathsomness from the blest eye
Of holy Phæbus, but infects the winds
With stench of our slain Lords. Oh pity Duke,
Thou purger of the earth, draw thy fear'd Sword
That does good turns to th' world; give us the Bones
Of our dead Kings, that we may Chappel them;
And of thy boundless goodness take some note
That for our crowned heads we have no roof,
Save this which is the Lions and the Bears,
And vault to every thing.

Thef. Pray you kneel not,
I was transported with your Speech, and suffer'd
Your knees to wrong themselves; I have heard the fortunes
Of your dead Lords, which gives me such lamenting
As wakes my vengeance, and revenge for 'em:
King Capaneus, was your Lord the day
That he should marry you, at such a season,
As now it is with me, I met your Groom,
By Mars's Altar, you were that time fair;
Not Juno's Mantle, fairer than your Tresses,
Nor in more bounty spread her. Your wheaten wreath
Was then not thrash'd, nor blasted; Fortune at you
Dimpled her Cheek with smiles: Hercules our kinsman
(Then weaker than your eyes) laid by his Club,
He tumbled down upon his Nenuan hide
And swore his sinews thaw'd: Oh grief, and time,
Fearful consumers, you will all devour.

1 Qu. Oh I hope some God,
Some God hath put his mercy in your manhood
Whereto he'll infuse power, and press you forth
Our undertaker.

Thef. Oh no knees, none Widow,
Unto the Helmeted-Belona use them,
And pray for me your Soldier.
Troubl'd I am.

Turns away.

2 Qu. Honoured Hippolita
Most dreaded Amazonian, that hast slain
The Sith-tusk'd-Bore; that with thy Arm as strong
As it is white, was't near to make the make
To thy Sex captive; but that this thy Lord
Pern to uphold Creation, in that honor
First nature stil'd it in, shrunk thee into
The bound thou wast o'er-flowing; at once subduing
Thy force, and thy affection: Soldieres
That equally canst poize sternness with pity,

Whom now I know hast much much more power on him
Than ever he had on thee, who ow't his strength,
And his Love too; who is a Servant for
The Tenor of the Speech. Dear Glas of Ladies.
Bid him that we whom flaming war doth scorch,
Under the shadow of his Sword, may cool us:
Require him he advance it o'er our heads;
Speak't in a womans key: like such a woman
As any of us three; weep e'r you fail; lend us a knee;
But touch the ground for us no longer time
Than a Doves motion, when the head's pluckt off:
Tell him if he i'th' blood-ciz'd field, lay swoln
Shewing the Sun his Teeth, grinning at the Moon.
What you would do.

Hip. Poor Lady say no more:

I had as leif trace this good action with you
As that whereto I'm going, and never yet
Went I so willing, way. My Lord is taken
Heart deep with your distress: Let him consider;
I'll speak anon.

3 Qu. Oh my petition was, Kneel to Emilia.
Set down in Ice, which by hot grief uncandied
Melts into drops, so sorrow wanting form is prest with deeper matter.

Emil. Pray stand up,
Your grief is written in your cheek.

3 Qu. Oh woe,
You cannot read it there; there through my tears,
Like wrinkl'd pebbles in a Glas stream
You may behold 'em (Lady, Lady, alack)
He that will all the treasure know o'th' earth
Must know the Center too; he that will fish
For my least minnow, let him lead his line
To catch one at my heart. Oh pardon me;
Extremity that sharpens sundry wits
Makes me a fool.

Emil. Pray you say nothing, pray you,
Who cannot feel, nor see the rain being in't,
Knows neither wet, nor dry, if that you were
The ground-piece of some Painter, I would buy you
T' instruct me 'gainst a capital grief indeed
Such heart-pierc'd demonstration; but alas
Being a natural Sister of our Sex
Your sorrow beats so ardently upon me:
That it shall make a counter-reflect 'gainst
My Brothers heart, and warm it to some pity
Though it were made of stone: pray have good comfort:

Thef. Forward to th' Temple, leave not out a jot
O'th' sacred ceremony.

1 Qu. Oh this celebration
Will long last, and be more costly than
Your Suppliants war: Remember that your Fame
Knows in the ear o'th' world: what you do quickly,
Is not done rashly; your first thought is more,
Than others laboured meditate: your premeditating
More than their actions: But oh Jove, your actions,
Soon as they move, as Asprays do the fish,
Subdue before they touch: think, dear Duke think What beds our slain Kings have.

2 Qu. What griefs our beds
That our dear Lords have none.

3 Qu. None fit for th' dead:
Those that with Cords, Knives, Drams precipitance,
Weary of this worlds light, have to themselves
Been deaths most horrid Agents, humane grace
Affords them dust and shadow.

1 Qu. But our Lords
Lie blist'ring 'fore the visitating Sun,
And were good Kings, when living.

Thef. It is true, and I will give you comfort,
To give your dead Lords graves:
The which to do must make some work with Creon.

1 Qu. And that work presents it self to th' doing:
Now 'twill take form, the heats are gone to morrow,

Then

Then bootless toil must recompence it self,
With its own sweat; Now he's secure,
Not dretms, we stand before your puillance
Wrinching our holy begging in our eyes
To make petition clear.

2 Qu. Now you may take him,
Drunk with his victory.

3 Qu. And his Army full
Of Bread, and sloth.

Theb. Artesis that best knowest
How to draw out, fit to this enterprize,
The prim'st for this proceeding, and the number
To carry such a business, forth and levy
Our worthiest Instruments, whilst we dispatch
This grand act of our life, this daring deed
Of Fate in wedlock.

1 Qu. Dowagers, take hands
Let us be Widows to our woes, delay
Commends us to a famishing hope.

All. Farewell.

2 Qu. We come unseasonably: But when could grief
Cull forth as unpang'd judgement can, fit'time
For best solicitation.

Theb. Why good Ladies,
This is a service, whereto I am going,
Greater than any was; it more imports me
Than all the actions that I have foregone,
Or futurely can cope.

1 Qu. The more proclaiming
Our suit shall be neglected, when her Arms,
Able to lock Jove from a Synod, shall
By warranting Moon-light corslet thee, oh when Her twining Cherries shall their sweetness fall
Upon thy tastful Lips, what wilt thou think
Of rotten Kings, or blubber'd Queens, what care
For what thou feel'st not? what thou feel'st being able To make Mars spurn his Drom. Oh if thou couch
But one night with her, every hour in't will Take hostage of thee for a hundred, and Thou shalt remember nothing more, than what
That Banquet bids thee too.

Hip. Though much unlike
You should be so transported, as much sorry
I should be such a Suitor; yet I think
Did I not by th' abstaining of my joy
Which breeds a deeper longing, cure their surfeit
That craves a present medicine, I should pluck
All Ladies scandal on me. Therefore Sir
As I shall here make trial of my Prayers,
Either presuming them to have some force,
Or sentencing for ay their vigor dumb.
Prorogue this business, we are going about, and hang
Your Shield afore your heart, about that neck
Which is my Fee, and which I freely lend
To do these poor Queens service.

All Queens. Oh help now
Our Cause cries for your knee.

Emil. If you grant not
My Sister her petition in that force,
With that Celerity, and nature which
She makes it in: from henceforth I'll not dare
To ask you any thing, nor be so hardy
Ever to take a Husband.

Theb. Pray stand up.
I am intreating of my self to do
That which you kneel to have me; Pyritibus
Lead on the Bride; get you and pray the gods
For success, and return omit not any thing
In the pretended Celebration; Queens
Follow your Soldier (as before) hence you
And at the banks of Anly meet us with
The forces you can raise, where we shall find
The moiety of a number, for a business,
More bigger look't; since that our Theme is haste

I stamp this kiss upon thy currant Lip,
Sweet keep it as my token; let you forward
For I will see you gone. Exeunt towards the Temple.
Farewel my beauteous Sister; Pyritibus
Keep the Feast full, bate not an hour on't.

Pyri. Sir,
I'll follow you at heels; The Feasts solemnity
Shall want till your return.

Theb. Cousin I charge you
Budge not from Atneas; we shall be returning
E'r you can end this Feast; of which I pray you
Make no abatement; once more farewell all. (world.)

1 Qu. Thus dost thou still make good the tongue o' th'

1 Qu. And earnest a Deity equal with Mars.

3 Qu. If not above him, for
Thou being but mortal, makest affections bend
To godlike honors; they themselves some say
Groan under such a Mast'ry.

Theb. As we are men
Thus should we doe, being sensually subdu'd
We loose our humane Title; good cheer Ladies. Flourish.
Now turn we towards our Comforts. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Palamon, and Arcite.

Arcite. Dear Palamon, dearer in Love than Blood
And our prime Cousin, yet unhard'ned in
The Crimes of nature; Let us leave the City
Thebes, and the temptings in't, before we further
Sully our gloss of youth,
And here to keep in abstinence we shame
As in Incontinence; for not to swim
I' th' aid o' th' current, were almost to sink,
At least to frustrate striving, and to follow
The common stream, 't would bring us to an Eddy
Where we should turn or drown; if labour through,
Our gain but life, and weakness.

Pal. Your advice
Is cry'd up with example; what strange ruins
Since first we went to School, may we perceive
Walking in Thebes? Skars, and bare weeds
The gain o' th' Martialist, who did propound
To his bold ends, honor, and golden Ingots,
Which though he won, he had not, and now flurled
By peace, for whom he fought, who then shall offer
To Mars's so scorn'd Altar? I doe bleed
When such I meet, and with great Juno would Resume her antient fit of jealousie
To get the Soldier work, that peace might purge
For her repletion, and retain anew
Her charitable heart now hard, and harsher
Than strife, or war could be.

Arcite. Are you not out?
Meet you no ruin, but the Soldier in
The crancks and turns of Thebes? you did begin
As if you met decays of many kinds:
Perceive you none, that do arouse your pity
But th' unconsider'd Soldier?

Pal. Yes, I pity
Decays where-e'er I find them, but such most
That sweating in an honourable toil
Are paid with Ice to cool 'em.

Arcite. 'Tis not this
I did begin to speak of, this is virtue
Of no respect in Thebes, I spake of Thebes
How dangerous if we will keep our honors,
It is for our residing, where every evil
Hath a good colour; where ev'ry seeming good's
A certain evil, where not to be ev'n jump
As they are, here were to be strangers, and Such things to be meer Monsters.

Pal. 'Tis in our power,
(Unless we fear that Apes can Tutor's) to

Be Masters of our manners: what need I
Affect anothers gate, which is not catching
Where there is faith, or to be fond upon
Anothers way of speech, when by mine own
I may be reasonably conceiv'd; fav'd too,
Speaking it truly; why am I bound
By any generous bond to follow him
Follows his Taylor, haply so long, until
The follow'd, make pursuit? or let me know,
Why mine own Barber is unblest, with him
My poor Chinn too, for 'tis not Cizard just
To such a Favorites glass: What Cannon is there
That does command my Rapier from my hip
To dangle't in my hand, or to goe tip toe
Before the street be foul? either I am
The fore-horse in the Team, or I am none
That draw i'th' sequent trace: these poor slight fores,
Need not a Plantain; That which tips my bosome
Almost to th' heart's,

Arcite. Our Uncle Creon.

Pal. He,

A most unbounded Tyrant, whose successes
Makes Heaven unfeard, and villany assured
Beyond its power: there's nothing, almost puts Faith in a Favor, and deifies alone
Voluble chance, who only attributes
The faculties of other Instruments
To his own Nerves and ast; Commands men service,
And what they win in't, boot and glory on;
That fears not to harm; good, dares not; Let
The blood of mine that's libbe to him, be suckt
From me with Leeches, let them break and fall
Off me with that corruption.

Arc. Clear spirited Cosin

Let's leave his Court, that we may nothing share,
Of his loud infamy: for our milk,
Will relish of the pasture, and we must
Be vile, or disobedient, not his kinsmen
In blood, unless in quality.

Pal. Nothing truer:

I think the echoes of his shames have deaf't
The ears of heav'nly Justice: widdows cries
Descend again into their throats, and have not Due audience of the gods: Valerius

Enter Valerius.

Val. The King calls for you; yet be leaden-footed
Till his great rage be off him. Phebus when He broke his whipstock, and exclaim'd against
The Horses of the Sun, but whisper'd to
The loudness of his fury.

Pal. Small winds shake him,
But what's the matter?

Val. Thebes (who where he threats appals,) hath sent Deadly defiance to him, and pronounces
Ruin to Thebes, who is at hand to seal
The promise of his wrath.

Arc. Let him approach:

But that we fear the gods in him, he brings not
A jot of terror to us; yet what man
Thirds his own worth (the case is each of ours)
When that his actions dregg'd, with mind assur'd
'Tis lad he goes about.

Pal. Leave that unreason'd.

Our services stand now for Thebes, not Creon,
Yet to be neutral to him, were dishonor;
Rebellious to oppose: therefore we must
With him stand to the mercy of our Fate,
Who hath bound our last minute.

Arc. So we must;

ist sed this wars afoot? or it shall be
On fail of some condition.

Val. 'Tis in motion

The intelligence of state came in the instant
With the desier.

Pol. Let's to the King, who, were he
A quarter carrier of that honor, which
His enemy came in, the blood we venture
Should be as for our health, which were not spent,
Rather laid out for purchase: but alas
Our hands advanc'd before our hearts, what will
The fall o' th' stroke do damage?

Arci. Let th' event,

That never-erring Arbitrator, tell us
When we know all our selves, and let us follow
The becking of our chance.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Perithous, Hippolita, Emilia.

Pir. No further.

Hip. Sir farewell; repeat my wishes
To our great Lord, of whose success I dare not Make any timorous question; yet I wish him
Excess, and overflow of power, and't might be
To dure ill-dealing fortune; speed to him,
Store never hurts good Governors.

Pir. Though I know

His Ocean needs not my poor drops, yet they Must yield their tribute there: My precious Maid,
Those best affections that the heavens infuse
In their best temper'd pieces, keep enthron'd
In your dear heart.

Emil. Thanks Sir; remember me
To our all-Royal Brother, for whose speed
The great Bellona I'll solícite; and Since in our terrene State, petitions are not Without gifts understood: I'll offer to her
What I shall be advis'd she likes; our hearts
Are in his Army, in his Tent.

Hip. In's bosom:

We have been Soldiers, and we cannot weep
When our Friends do'n their helms, or put to Sea,
Or tell of Babes broach'd on the Launce, or Women
That have sod their Infants in (and after eat them)
The brine, they wept at killing 'em; Then if You stay to see of us such Spinsters, we Should hold you here for ever,

Pir. Peace be to you

As I pursue this war, which shall be then Beyond further requiring.

Exit Pir.

Emil. How his longing

Follows his friend; since his depart, his sports
Though craving seriousness, and skill, past slightly
His careless execution, where nor gain
Made him regard, or loss consider, but Playing o'er business in his hand, another
Directing in his head, his mind, nurse equal
To these so diff'ring Twins; have you observ'd him.
Since our great Lord departed?

Hip. With much labour:

And I did love him for't, they two have Cabin'd
In many as dangerous, as poor a corner,
Peril and want contending, they have skift
Torrents, whose roaring tyranny and power
I'th' least of these was dreadful, and they have Fought out together, where Death's-self was lodg'd,
Yet Fate hath brought them off: their knot of love
Ti'd, weav'd, intangl'd, with so true, so long,
And with a finger of so deep a cunning
May be out-worn, never undone. I think
Thebes cannot be umpire to himself
Cleaving his conscience into twain, and doing
Each side like Justice, which he loves best.

Emil. Doubtless

There is a best, and reason has no manners

To

To say it is not you : I was acquainted
Once with a time, when I enjoy'd a Play-fellow ;
You were at wars, when she the grave enrich'd,
Who made too proud the Bed, took leave o' th' Moon
(Which then lookt pale at parting) when our count
Was each eleven.

Hip. 'Twas Flavia.

Two Hearses ready with Palamon, and Arcite:
The three Queens. Theseus, and his Lords ready.

Emil. Yes,

You talk of Pirithous and Theseus love ;
Theirs has more ground, is more maturely season'd,
More buckled with strong judgement, and their needs
The one of th' other may be said to water
Their intertangled roots of love, but I
And she (I sigh and spoke of) were things innocent,
Lov'd for we did, and like the Elements
That know not what, nor why, yet do effect
Rare issues by their operance ; our souls
Did so to one another ; what she lik'd,
Was then of me approv'd, what not condemn'd
No more arraignment, the flower that I would pluck
And put between my breasts, oh (then but beginning
To swell about the blossom) she would long
Till she had such another, and commit it
To the like innocent Cradle, where Phoenix-like
They di'd in perfume : on my head no toy
But washer pattern, her affections (pretty
Though happily, her careles, were, I followed
For my most serious decking, had mine ear
Stol'n some new air, or at adventure humm'd on
From musical Coynage, why, it was a Note
Whereon her spirits would sojourn (rather dwell on)
And sing it in her slumbers ; This rehearful
(Which fury innocent wots well) comes in
Like old importments-bastard, has this end ;
That the true love 'twween Maid, and Maid, may be More than in sex individual.

Hip. Y'are out of breath
And this high speeded-pace, is but to say
That you shall never (like the Maid Flavina)
Love any that's call'd Man.

Emil. I 'm sure I shall not.

Hip. Now alack weak Sister,
I must no more believe thee in this point
(Though in't I know thou dost believe thy self)
Then I will trust a sickly appetite,
That loaths even as it longs, but sure my Sister
If I were ripe for your persuasion, you
Have said enough to shake me from the Arm
Of the all noble Theseus, for whose fortunes,
I will now in, and kneel with great assurance,
That we, more than his Pirithous, possess
The high Throne in his heart.

Emil. I am not against your faith,
Yet I continue mine.

Exeunt.
Cornets.

Scena Quarta.

A Battel struck within: then a Retreat: Florish. Then Enter Theseus (victor) the three Queens meet him, and fall on their faces before him.

1 Qu. To thee no Star be dark.

2 Qu. Both Heaven and Earth
Friend thee for ever.

3 Qu. All the good that may Be wish'd upon thy head, I cry Amen to't.

Thef. Th'impartial gods, who from the mounted heavens
View us their mortal Herd, behold who erre,
And in their time chastise : goe and find out
The bones of your dead Lords, and honor them
With treble ceremony, rather than a gap
Should be in their dear rights, we would supply't.

But those we will depute, which shall invest
You in your dignities, and even each thing
Our haste does leave imperfect ; So adieu
And heavens good eyes look on you, what are those ?

Exeunt Queens.

Herald. Men of great quality, as may be judg'd
By their appointment ; some of Thebs have told's
They are Silters children, Nephews to the King.

Thef. By th' Helme of Mars, I saw them in the War,
Like to a pair of Lions, sinear'd with prey,
Make lanes in troops agast. I fixt my note
Constantly on them ; for they were a mark
Worth a god's view : what prisoner was't that told me
When I enquir'd their names ?

Herald. We leave, they'r called Arcite and Palamon,

Thef. 'Tis right, those, those
They are not dead ?

Three Hearses ready.

Her. Nor in a state of life, had they been taken
When their last hurts were given, 'twas possible
They might have been recover'd ; Yet they breathe
And have the name of men.

Thef. Then like men use 'em
The very lees of such (millions of rates)
Exceed the Wine of others, all our Surgeons
Convent in their behoof, our richest balines
Rather than niggard waste, their lives concern us,
Much more than Thebs is worth, rather than have 'em
Freed of this plight, and in their morning state
(Sound and at liberty) I would 'em dead,
But forty thousand fold, we had rather have 'em
Prisoners to us, than death ; bear 'em speedily
From our kind air, to them unkind, and minister
What man to man may do for our sake more,
Since I have known frights, fury, friends, beheasts,
Loves, provocations, zeal, a Mistris taske,
Desire of liberty, a feavor, madness,
Hath set a mark which nature could not reach too
Without some imposition, sickness in Will
Or wrestling strength in reason, for our Love
And great Apollo's mercy, all our best,
Their best skills tender. Lead into the City,
Where having bound things scatter'd, we will post. Florish.
To Athens for our Army.

Exeunt.
Musick.

Scena Quinta.

Enter the Queens, with the Hearses of their Knights, in a Funeral Solemnity, &c.

Urns and Odours, bring away,
Vapors, sighs, darken the day,
Our dole more deadly looks, than dying
Balmes, and Gummis, and heavy cheers,

Sacred viols fill'd with tears,
And clamors, through the wild air flying :

Come all sad and solemn Shows,
That are quick-ey'd pleasures foes ;
We convent nought else but woes.
We convent, &c.

3 Qu. This funeral path, brings to your household graver
Joy seize on you again : peace, sleep with him.

2 Qu. And this to yours.

1 Qu. Yours this way : Heavens lend
A thousand differing ways to one sure end.

3 Qu. This world's a City full of straying streets,
And Death's the Market-place, where each one meets.

Exeunt severally.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Jaylor and Woocr.

Jail. I May depart with little, while I live, something I
May cast to you, not much: Alas the Prison I
Keep, though it be for great ones, yet they seldom Come; before one Salmon, you shall take a number
Of Minnows: I am given out to be better lin'd
Than it can appear, to me report is a true
Speaker: I would I were really, that I am Deliver'd to be: Marry, what I have (be it what It will) I will assure upon my daughter at
The day of my death.

Woocr. Sir, I demand no more than your own offer,
And I will estate your Daughter, in what I
Have promised,

Jail. Well, we will talk more of this, when the solemnity
Is past; But have you a full promise of her?

Enter Daughter.

When that shall be seen, I tender my consent.

Woocr. I have Sir; here she comes.

Jail. Your friend and I have chanced to name
You here, upon the old business: but no more of that.
Now, so soon as the Court-hurry is over, we will Have an end of it: I th' mean time look tenderly
To the two prisoners. I can tell you they are Princes.

Daugh. These strewings are for their Chamber; 'tis pity
Are in prison, and 'twere pity they should be out: I (they Do think they have patience to make any adversity
Asham'd; the prison it self is proud of 'em; and
They have all the world in their Chamber.

Jail. They are fam'd to be a pair of absolute men.

Daugh. By my troth, I think Fame but stammers 'em, they Stand a grief above the reach of report. (doers.)

Jail. I heard them reported in the battel, to be the only

Daugh. Nay, most likely, for they are noble sufferers; I Marvel how they would have look'd, had they been Victors, that with such a constant Nobility, enforce
A freedom out of bondage, making misery their Mirth, and affliction a toy to jest at.

Jail. Doe they so?

Daugh. It seems to me, they have no more sence of their Captivity, than I of ruling Athens: they eat
Well, look merrily discourse of many things,
But nothing of their own restraint, and disasters:
Yet sometime a divided sigh, martyr'd as 'twere
I th' deliverance, will break from one of them,
When the other presently gives it so sweet a rebuke,
That I could wish my self a sigh to be so chid,
Or at least a sigher to be comforted.

Woocr. I never saw 'em.

Jail. The Duke himself came privately in the night.

Enter Palamon, and Arcite above.

And so did they, what the reason of it is, I Know not: Look, yonder they are; that's Arcite looks out.

Daugh. No Sir, no, that's Palamon: Arcite is the Lower of the twain; you may perceive a part
Of him.

Jail. Go to, leave your pointing; they would not Make us their object; out of their sight.

Daugh. It is a holliday to look on them: Lord, the Diff'rence of men.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Palamon, and Arcite in prison.

Pal. How do you, Noble Cofin?

Arcite. How do you, Sir?

Pal. Why, it rong enough to laugh at misery,
And bear the chance of war yet, we are prisoners
I fear for ever Cofin.

Arcite. I believe it,
And to that destiny have patiently
Laid up my hour to come.

Pal. Oh Cofin Arcite,
Where is Thybs now? where is our noble Countrey?
Where are our friends, and kindreds? never more
Must we behold those comforts, never see
The hardy youths strive for the Games of honor
(Hung with the painted favours of their Ladies)
Like tall Ships under Sail: then start amongst 'em
And as an Eastwind leave 'em all behind us,
Like lazy Clouds, whilst Palamon and Arcite.
Even in the wagging of a wanton leg
Out-stript the peoples praises, won the Garlands, E'r they have time to wish 'em ours. Oh never Shall we two exercise, like twins of honor,
Our Arms again, and feel our fiery horses,
Like proud Seas under us, our good Swords, now (Better the red-ey'd god of War nev'r were)
Bravish'd our sides, like age, must run to rust,
And deck the Temples of those gods that hate us,
These hands shall never draw 'em out like light'ning
To blast whole Armies more.

Arcite. No Palamon,

Those hopes are prisoners with us, here we are
And here the graces of our youths must wither
Like a too-timely Spring; here age must find us,
And which is heaviest (Palamon) unmarried,
The sweet embraces of a loving wife
Loaden with kisses, arm'd with thousand Cupids
Shall never claspe our necks, no issue know us,
No figures of our selves shall we ev'r see,
To glad our age, and like young Eagles teach 'em
Foldly to gaze against bright arms, and say
Remember what your Fathers were, and conquer.
The fair-cy'd Maids, shall weep our banishments,
And in their Songs, curse ever-blinded fortune
Till she for shame see what a wrong she has done
To youth and nature; This is all our world;
We shall know nothing here, but one another,
Hear nothing, but the clock that tels our woes.
The Vine shall grow, but we shall never see it:
Summer shall come, and with her all delights;
But dead-cold winter must inhabit here still.

Pal. 'Tis too true Arcite. To our Theban hounds,
That shook the aged Forrest with their ecchoes,
No more now must we hollo, no more shake
Our pointed Javelins, whilst the angry Swine
Flies like a Parthian quiver from our rages,
Struck with our well-steel'd Darts: All valiant uses,
(The food and nourishment of noble minds,)
In us two here shall perish; we shall die
(Which is the curse of honor) lastly,
Children of grief, and Ignorance,

Arc. Yet Cofin,
Even from the bottom of these miseries
From all that fortune can inflict upon us,
I see two comforts rising, two meer blessings,
If the gods please to hold here a brave patience,
And the enjoying of our griefs together.
Whilst Palamon is with me, let me perish
If I think this our prison.

Pal. Certainly,
'Tis a main goodnes, Cofin, that our fortunes

Were

Were twin'd together; 'tis most true, two souls
Put in two noble bodies, let 'em suffer
The gaul of hazard, so they grow together,
Will never sink, they must not, say they could,
A willing man dies sleeping, and all's done.

Arc. Shall we make worthy uses of this place
That all men hate so much?

Pal. How gentle Cousin?

Arc. Let's think this prison, Holy Sanctuary,
To keep us from corruption of worse men,
We are young, and yet desire the ways of honour,
That liberty and common conversation,
The poison of pure spirits, might, like women,
Wooe us to wander from. What worthy blessing
Can be but our imaginations
May make it ours? And here being thus together,
We are an endless mine to one another;
We are one anothers Wife, ever begetting
New births of love; we are Father, Friends, Acquaintance,
We are, in one another, Families,
I am your Heir, and you are mine: This place
Is our Inheritance: no hard oppressor
Dare take this from us; here with a little patience
We shall live long, and loving; No surfeits seek us;
The hand of War hurts none here, nor the Seas
Swallow their youth: were we at liberty,
A Wife might part us lawfully, or business,
Quarrels consume us: Envy of ill men
Crave our acquaintance, I might sicken Cousin,
Where you should never know it, and so perish
Without your noble hand to close mine eyes,
Or prayers to the gods; a thousand chances
Were we from hence, would sever us.

Pal. You have made me
(I thank you Cousin Arcite) almost wanton
With my Captivity: what a misery
It is to live abroad? and every where:
'Tis like a Beast me thinks: I find the Court here,
I'm sure a more content, and all those pleasures
That wooe the Wills of men to vanity,
I see through now; and am sufficient
To tell the world, 'tis but a gaudy shadow,
That old Time, as he passes by, takes with him,
What had we been old in the Court of Creon,
Where sin is Justice, Lust, and Ignorance,
The virtues of the great ones: Cousin Arcite
Had not the loving gods found this place for us
We had di'd as they doe, ill old men unwept,
And had their Epitaphs, the peoples Curses,
Shall I say more?

Arc. I would hear you still.

Pal. Ye shall.

Is there record of any two that lov'd
Better than we two Arcite?

Arc. Sure there cannot.

Pal. I do not think it possible our friendship
Should ever leave us.

Arc. Till our deaths it cannot.

Enter Emilia and her Woman.

And after death our spirits shall be led
To those that love eternally. Speak on Sir.
This Garden has a world of pleasures in't.

Emil. What Flower is this?

Wom. 'Tis call'd Narcissus, Madam.

Emil. That was a fair Boy certain, but a fool,
To love himself, were there not Maids enough?

Arc. Pray forward.

Pal. Yes.

Emil. Or were they all hard-hearted?

Wom. They could not be to one so fair.

Emil. Thou wouldst not.

Wom. I think I should not, Madam.

Emil. That's a good wench:
But take heed to your kindness though,

Wom. Why Madam?

Emil. Men are mad things.

Arcite. Will ye go forward, Cousin?

Emil. Canst not thou work such Flowers in Silk wench?

Wom. Yes.

Emil. I'll have a Gown full of 'em, and of these,
This is a pretty colour, wil't not do
Rarely upon a skirt wench?

Wom. Dainty Madam.

Arc. Cousin, Cousin, how do you, Sir? Why Palamon?

Pal. Never till now, I was in prison Arcite.

Arc. Why, what's the matter man?

Pal. Behold, and wonder.

By heaven she is a Goddess.

Arcite. Ha.

Pal. Do reverence.

She is a Goddess Arcite.

Emil. Of all Flowers,

Methinks a Rose is best.

Wom. Why gentle Madam?

Emil. It is the very Emblem of a Maid.
For when the West wind courts her gently
How modestly she blows, and paints the Sun;
With her chaste blushes? When the North comes near her,
Rude and impatient, then like Chastity
She locks her beauties in her bud again,
And leaves him to base briers,

Wom. Yet good Madam,
Sometimes her modesty will blow so far
She falls for't: a Maid

If she have any honor, would be loth
To take example by her.

Emil. Thou art wanton.

Arc. She is wondrous fair.

Pal. She is all the beauty extant.

Emil. The Sun grows high, let's walk in, keep these flowers,
We'll see how near Art can come near their colours;
I'm wondrous merry-hearted, I could laugh now,

Wom. I could lie down I am sure.

Emil. And take one with you?

Wom. That's as we bargain, Madam,

Emil. Well, agree then.

Exeunt Emilia and Woman.

Pal. What think you of this beauty?

Arc. 'Tis a rare one.

Pal. Is't but a rare one?

Arc. Yes, a matchless beauty,

Pal. Might not a man well lose himself, and love her?

Arc. I cannot tell what you have done, I have,
Besheiw mine eyes for't, now I feel my Shackles.

Pal. You love her then?

Arc. Who would not?

Pal. And desire her?

Arc. Before my liberty.

Pal. I saw her first.

Arc. That's nothing

Pal. But it shall be.

Arc. I saw her too.

Pal. Yes, but you must not love her.

Arc. I will not as you do; to worship her;
As she is heavenly, and a blessed goddess;
(I love her as a woman, to enjoy her)
So both may love.

Pal. You shall not love at all.

Arc. Not love at all;

Who shall deny me?

Pal. I that first saw her; I that took possession
First with mine eye of all those beauties
In her reveal'd to mankind: if thou lov'st her;
Or entertain'st a hope to blast my wishes,
Thou art a Traitor Arcite, and a fellow
False as thy Title to her: friendship, blood

And

And all the ties between us I disclaim
If thou once think upon her.

Arc. Yes, I love her,
And if the lives of all my name lay on it,
I must do so, I love her with my soul,
If that will lose ye, farewell Palamon.
I say again, I love, and in loving her, maintain
I am as worthy and as free a Lover
And have as just a title to her beauty
As any Palamon, or any living
That is a mans Son.

Pal. Have I call'd thee friend?

Arc. Yes, and have found me so; why are you mov'd thus?
Let me deal coldly with you, am not I
Part of your blood, part of your soul? you have told me
That I was Palamon, and you were Arcite.

Pal. Yes.

Arc. Am not I liable to those affections,
Those joys, griefs, angers, fears, my friend shall suffer?
Pal. Ye may be.

Arc. Why then would you deal so cunningly,
So strangely, so unlike a Noble Kinsman
To love alone? speak truly, do you think me
Unworthy of her sight?

Pal. No, but unjust,
If thou pursue that sight.

Arc. Because another
First sees the Enemy, shall I stand still
And let mine honor down, and never charge?

Pal. Yes, if he be but one.

Arc. But say that one
Had rather combat me?

Pal. Let that one say so,
And use thy freedom: else if thou pursuest her,
Be as that cursed man that hates his Country,
A branded villain.

Arc. You are mad.

Pal. I must be.

Till thou art worthy, Arcite, it concerns me,
And in this madness, if I hazard thee
And take thy life, I deal but truly.

Arc. Fie Sir.

You play the child extremly: I will love her,
I must, I ought to do so, and I dare,
And all this justly.

Pal. Oh that now, that now
Thy false-self, and thy friend, had but this fortune
To be one hour at liberty, and graspe
Our good swords in our hands, I would quickly teach thee
What 't were to such affection from another:

Thou art baser in it than a Cutpurse;
Put but thy head out of this window more,
And as I have a soul, I'll nail thy life to't.

Arc. Thou dar'st not fool, thou canst not, thou art feeble.
Put my head out? I'll throw my Body out,
And leap the Garden, when I see her next.

Enter Keeper.

And pitch between her Arms to anger thee.

Pal. No more; the Keepers coming; I shall live
To knock thy brains out with my Shackles.

Arc. Doe.

Keep. By your leave, Gentlemen.

Pal. Now honest Keeper?

Keep. Lord Arcite, you must presently to th' Duke;

The cause I know not yet.

Arc. I am ready Keeper.

Keep. Prince Palamon, I must awhile bereave you
Of your fair Cousins company.

Exeunt Arcite, and Keeper.

Pal. And me too,
Even when you please of life; why is he sent for?
It may be he shall marry her, he's goodly,

And like enough the Duke hath taken notice
Both of his Blood and Body: but his falshood,
Why should a friend be treacherous? if that
Get him a Wife so noble, and so fair;
Let honest men ne'er love again. Once more
I would but see this fair one: blessed Garden,
And Fruit, and Flowers more blessed that still blossom
As her bright eyes shine on ye. Would I were
For all the fortune of my life hereafter
Yon little Tree, yon blooming Apricock;
How I would spread, and sling my wanton arms
In at her window; I would bring her fruit
Fit for the gods to feed on: youth and pleasure
Still as she tasted should be doubled on her,
And if she be not heavenly, I would make her
So near the gods in nature, they should fear her.

Enter Keeper.

And then I'm sure she would love me: how now Keeper,
Where's Arcite?

Keep. Banish'd: Prince Pirithous
Obtain'd his liberty; but never more
Upon his oath and life must he set foot
Upon this Kingdom.

Pal. He's a blessed man,
He shall see Thebes again, and call to Arms
The bold young men, that when he bids 'em charge,
Fall on like fire: Arcite shall have a Fortune,
If he dare make himself a worthy Lover,
Yet in the Field to strike a battel for her;
And if he lose her then, he's a cold Coward;
How bravely may he bear himself to win her
If he be noble Arcite; thousand ways
Were I at liberty, I would do things
Of such a virtuous greatness, that this Lady,
This blushing Virgin should take manhood to her
And seek to ravish me.

Keep. My Lord for you
I have this charge too.

Pal. To discharge my life.

Keep. No, but from this place to remove your Lordship,
The windows are too open.

Pal. Devils take 'em
That are so envious to me; prethee kill me.

Keep. And hang for't afterward.

Pal. By this good light
Had I a sword I would kill thee.

Keep. Why my Lord?

Pal. Thou bring'st such pelting scurvy news continually
Thou art not worthy life; I will not go.

Keep. Indeed you must my Lord.

Pal. May I see the Garden?

Keep. No.

Pal. Then I am resolv'd, I will not go.

Keep. I must constrain you then: and, for you are dangerous
I'll clap more irons on you.

Pal. Doe good Keeper,

I'll shake 'em so, ye shall not sleep,
I'll make ye a new Morriffe, must I goe?

Keep. There is no remedy.

Pal. Farewell kind window.

May rude wind never hurt thee. Oh my Lady,
If ever thou hast felt what sorrow was,
Dream how I suffer. Come; now bury me.

Exeunt Palamon and Keeper.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Arcite.

Arcite. Banish'd the Kingdom? 'tis a benefit,
A mercy I must thank 'em for, but banish'd
The free enjoying of that face I die for,

Oh 'twas a studded punishment. a death
 Beyond Imagination: Such a vengeance
 That were I old and wicked, all my sins
 Could never pluck upon me, Palamon;
 Thou hast the Start now, thou shalt stay and see
 Her bright eyes break each morning 'gainst thy window,
 And let in life into thee; Thou shalt feed
 Upon the sweetness of a noble beauty,
 That nature never exceeded, nor never shall:
 Good gods? what happiness has Palamon?
 Twenty to one, he'll come to speak to her,
 And if she be as gentle, as she's fair,
 I know she's his, he has a Tongue will tame Tempests, and make the wild Rocks wanton. Come what can come,
 The worst is death; I will not leave the Kingdom,
 I know mine own is but a heap of ruins,
 And no redress there, if I go, he has her,
 I 'm resolv'd an other shape shall make me,
 Or end my fortunes. Either way, I 'm happy:
 I'll see her, and be near her, or no more.

Enter 4. Country people, & one with a garland before them.

1. My Masters, I'll be there that's certain.
 2. And I'll be there.
 3. And I.
 4. Why then have with ye Boys; 'Tis but chiding,
 Let the plough play to day, I'll tickle' out
 Of the jades tails to morrow.

1. I 'm sure
 To have my wife as jealous as a Turkey:
 But that's all one, I'll goe through, let her mumble.
 2. Clap her aboard to morrow night, and stoa her,
 And all's made up again.
 3. I, do but put a fesku in her fist, and you shall see her
 Take a new lesson out, and be a good wench.
 Doe we all hold, against the Maying?

4. Hold? what should ail us?
 3. Arcas, will be there.
 2. And Sennois.
 And Rycas, and 3. Better lads never danc'd under green Tree,
 And yet know what wenches: ha?
 But will the dainty Domine, the Schoolemaster keep touch
 Doe you think: For he do's all ye know.
 3. He'll eat a hornbook ere he fail: goe too, the matter's too far driven between him, and the Tanners daughter, to let slip now, and she must see the Duke, and she must dance too.

4. Shall we be lusty.
 2. All the Boys in Athens blow wind i'th' breech on's, and here I'll be and there I'll be, for our Town, and here again, and there again: Ha, Boys, heigh for the weavers.

1. This must be done i'th' woods.
 4. O pardon me.
 2. By any means our thing of learning fees so: Where he himself will edifie the Duke most parlously in our behalves: He's excellent i'th' woods, bring him to'th' plains, his learning makes no cry.

3. We'll see the sports, then every man to's Tackle: and Sweet Companions lets rehearse by any means, before
 The Ladies see us, and doe sweetly, and God knows what May come on't.

4. Content; the sports once ended, we'll perform. Away
 Boys and hold.

Arc. By your leaves honest friends: Pray you wither goe
 you.

4. Whither? Why, what a question's that?
Arc. Yes, 'tis a question, to me that know not.
 3. To the Games, my Friend
 2. Where were you bred you know it not?
Arc. Not far Sir,
 Are there such Games, to day?

1. Yes marry are there:
 And such as you never saw; The Duke, himself
 Will be in person there.

Arc. What pastimes are they?
 2. Wrangling, and Running; 'Tis a pretty Fellow.
 3. Thou wilt not goe along.
Arc. Not yet Sir.
 4. Well Sir

Take your own time, come Boys.

1. My mind misgives me
 This fellow has a veng'ance trick o'th hip,
 Marke how his Bodi's made for't

2. I'll be hang'd though
 If he dare venture, hang him plumb-porredge,
 He wrestle? He rost eggs. Come lets be gon Lads. Exeunt 4.

Arc. This is an offer'd opportunity
 I durst not wish for. Well, I could have wrestled,
 The best men call'd it excellent, and run
 Swifter, than wind upon a feild of Corn
 (Curling the weaky ears) never flew: I'll venture,
 And in some poor disguise be there, who knows
 Whether my brows may not be girt with garlands?
 And happiness prefer me to a place,
 Where I may ever dwell in sight of her. Exit Arcite

Scena Secunda.

Enter Jailors Daughter alone.

Daugh. Why should I love this Gentleman? 'Tis odds
 He never will affect me; I 'm base,
 My Father the mean Keeper of his Prison,
 And he a Prince; To marry him is hopeles;
 To be his whore, is witles; Out upon't;
 What pushes are we wenches drivn to
 When fifteen once has found us? First I saw him,
 I (seeing) though the was a goodly man;
 He has as much to please a woman in him,
 (If he please to bestow it so) as ever
 These eyes yet lookt on; Next, I pittied him,
 And so would any young wench o'my Conscience
 That ever dream'd, or vow'd her Maidenhead
 To a young hanfom Man; Then I lov'd him,
 (Extremely lov'd him) infinitely lov'd him;
 And yet he had Cosen, fair as he too;
 But in my heart was Palamon, and there
 Lord, what a coyl he keeps? To hear him
 Sing in an evening, what a Heaven it is?
 And yet his Songs are sad-ones; Fairer spoken,
 Was never Gentleman, When I come in
 To bring him water in a morning, first
 He bows his noble body, then salutes me, thus:
 Fair, gentle Mayd, good morrow, may thy goodnes,
 Get thee a happy husband; Once he kist me,
 I lov'd my lips the better ten daies after,
 Would he would doe so ev'ry day; He greives much,
 And me as much to see his misery:
 What should I doe, to make him know I love him,
 For I would fain enjoy him? Say I ventur'd
 To set him free? What saies the Law then? Thus much
 For Law, or kindred; I will doe it,
 And this night, or to morrow he shall love me. Exit.

This short flourish of Cornets and Showtes within.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Theseus, Hippolita, Piribous, Emilia: Arcite
 with a Garland, &c.

Thes. You have done worthily, I have not seen
 Since Hercules, a man of tougher finews;
 What ere you are, you run the best, and wrestle,
 That these times can allow.

Arcite. I'm proud to please you.

Thes. What Countrie bred you?

Arcite. This; But far off, Prince.

Thes. Are you a Gentleman?

Arcite. My father said so;

And to those gentle uses gave me life.

Thes. Are you his heir?

Arcite. His youngest Sir.

Thes. Your Father

Sure is a happy Suite, then: What proves you?

Arcite. A little of all noble Qualities:

I could have kept a Hawk, and well have hollow'd
To a deep cry of Dogs; I dare not praise
My feat in horsemanship: yet they that knew me
Would say it was my best peece: last, and greatest,
I would be thought a Soldier.

Thes. You are perfect.

Perib. Upon my soul, a proper man.

Emilia. He is so.

Per. How doe you like him Ladie?

Hip. I admire him,

I have not seen so young a man, so noble
(If he say true,) of his sort.

Emil. Believe,

His mother was a wondrous handsome woman,
His face me thinks, goes that way.

Hip. But his Body

And fire mind, illustrate a brave Father.

Per. Mark how his virtue, like a hidden Sun,
Breaks through his baser garments.

Hip. He's well got sure.

Thes. What made you seek this place Sir?

Arc. Noble Thesens.

To purchase name, and doe my ablest service
To such a well-found wonder, as thy worth,
For only in thy Court, of all the world
Dwells fair-ey'd honor.

Per. All his words are worthy.

Thes. Sir, we are much indebted to your travell,
Nor shall you loose your wish: Peribous
Dispose of this faire Gentleman.

Perib. Thanks Thesens.

What ere you are y'are mine, and I shall give you
To a most noble service, to this Lady,
This bright young Virgin; Pray observe her goodnes;
You have honour'd her fair birth-day, with your virtues,
And as your due y'are hers: kifs her fair hand Sir.

Arc. Sir, y'are a noble Giver: dearest Beautie,
Thus let me seal my vow'd faith: when your Servant
(Your most unworthie Creature) but offends you,
Command him die, he shall.

Emil. That were too cruell.

If you deserve well Sir; I shall soon see't:
Y'are mine, and somewhat better than your ranck I'll use
you.

Per. I'll see you furnish'd, and because you say
You are a horseman, I must needs intreat you
This after noon to ride, but 'tis a rough one.

Arc. I like him better (Prince) I shall not then Freeze in my Saddle.

Thes. Sweet, you must be readie,
And you Emilia, and you (Friend) and all
To morrow by the Sun, to doe observance
To flowry May, in Dian's wood: wait well Sir,
Upon your Mistris: Emely, I hope
He shall not goe a foot.

Emil. That were a shame Sir,
While I have horses: take your choice, and what
You want at any time, let me but know it;
If you serve faithfully, I dare assure you
You'll find a loving Mistris.

Arc. If I doe not,
Let me find that my Father ever hated,
Disgrace, and blows.

Thes. Go lead the way; You have won it:
It shall be so; You shall receive all dues
Fit for the honor you have won; 'Twere wrong else.
Sister, beshrew my heart, you have a Servant,
That if I were a woman, would be Master,
But you are wise.

Emil. I hope too wise for that Sir.

Florish.
Exeunt omnes.

Scena 6.

Enter Jaylors Daughter alone.

Daughter. Let all the Dukes, and all the divells rore,
He is at liberty: I have ventur'd for him:
And out I have brought him to a little wood
A mile hence, I have sent him, where a Cedar,
Higher than all the rest, spreads like a plane
Falt by a Brook, and there he shall keep close,
Till I provide him Fyles, and food; for yet
His yron bracelets are not off. O Love
What a stout hearted child thou art! My Father
Durst better have indur'd cold iron, than done it:
I love him beyond love, and beyond reason,
Or wit, or safetie: I have made him know it
I care not, I am desperate: If the Law
Find me, and then condemne me for't; Some wenches,
Some honest hearted Maids, will sing my Dirge;
And tell to memory, my death was noble,
Dying almost a Martyr: That way he takes,
I purpose is my way too: Sure he cannot
Be so unmanly, as to leave me here,
If he doe, Maids will not so easily
Trust men again: And yet he has not thank'd me
For what I have done: no not so much as kist me,
And that (me thinks) is not so well; Nor scarcely
Could I persuade him to become a Freeman,
He made such scruples of the wrong he did
To me, and to my Father. Yet I hope
When he considers more, this love of mine
Will take more root within him: Let him doe
What he will with me, so he use me kindly,
For use me so he shall, or I'll proclaim him,
And to his face, no man: I'll presently
Provide him necessaries, and pack my cloaths up,
And where there is a path of ground I'll venture
So he be with me; By him, like a shadow
I'll ever dwell; Within this hour the whoobub
Will be all o'er the prison: I'm then
Kissing the man they look for: Farewell Father,
Get many more such prisoners, and such daughters,
And shortly you may keep your self. Now to him:

Cornets in sundry places. Noise and hollowing as people a Maying.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Arcite alone.

Arcite. THe Duke has lost Hypolita; Each took
A severall land. This is a solemn Right
They owe bloom'd May, and the Athenians pay it
To'th' heart of Ceremony: O Queen Emilia
Fresher than May, sweeter
Then her gold Buttons on the bows, or all
Th'enamell'd knocks o'th' Mead, or garden, ye
(We challenge too) the banck of any Nymph
That makes the stream seem flowers; Thou o Jewell O'th'

O'th wood, o'th world, hast likewise blest a pace
 With thy sole presence, in thy rumination
 That I poor man might estoones come betwen
 And chop on some cold thought, thrice blessed chance
 To drop on such a Mistris, expectation
 Most guiltless on't: tell me O Lady Fortune
 (Next after Emely my Sovereign) how far
 I may be proud. She takes strong note of me,
 Hath made me near her; and this beauteous Morn
 (The prim'st of all the year) presents me with
 A brace of horses, two such Steeds might well
 Be by a pair of Kings backt, in a Field
 That their crowns titles tried: Alas, alas
 Poor Cosen Palamon, poor prisoner, thou
 So little dream'st upon my fortune, that Thou thinkst thy self, the happier thing, to be
 So near Emilia, me thou deem'st at Thebes,
 And therein wretched, although free; But if Thou knew'st my Mistris breath'd on me, and that I ear'd her language, liv'd in her eye; O Coz.
 What passion would enclose thee.

Enter Palamon as out of a Bush, with his Shackles: bends his fist at Arcite.

Palamon. Traytor kinsman,
 Thou shouldst perceive my passion, if these signs
 Of prisonment were off me, and this hand
 But owner of a Sword: By all oaths in one
 I, and the justice of my love would make thee
 A confest Traytor: O thou most perfidious
 That ever gently look'd the voydes of honor.
 That ev'r bore gentle Token; falsest Cosen
 That ever blood made kin, call'st thou her thine?
 I'll prove it in my Shackles, with these hands,
 Void of appointment, that thou ly'st, and art
 A very thief in love, a Chaffy Lord
 Nor worth the name of villain: had I a Sword
 And these house cloggs away.

Arc. Dear Cosin Palamon.

Pal. Cosoner Arcite, give me language, such
 As thou hast shew'd me feat.

Arc. Not finding in

The circuit of my breast, any gross stuff
 To form me like your blazon, holds me to
 This gentleness of answer; 'tis your passion
 That thus mistakes, the which to you being enemy,
 Cannot to me be kind: honor, and honestie
 I cherish, and depend on, how so ev'r
 You skip them in me, and with them fair Coz.
 I'll maintain my proceedings; pray be pleas'd
 To shew in generous terms, your griefs since that
 Your question's with your equall, who professes
 To clear his own way, with the mind and Sword
 Of a true Gentleman.

Pal. That thou durst Arcite.

Arc. My Coz, my Coz. you have been well advertis'd
 How much I dare, y'ave seen me use my Sword
 Against th' advice of fear: sure of another
 You would not hear me doubted, but your silence
 Should break out, though i'th' Sanctuary.

Pal. Sir,

I have seen you move in such a place, which well
 Might justify your manhood, you were call'd
 A good knight and a bold; But the whole week's not fair
 If any day it rayn: Their valiant temper
 Men loose when they encline to trecherie,
 And then they fight like coupel'd Beeres, would fly
 Were they not ty'd.

Arc. Kinsman, you might as well
 Speak this, and act it in your Glafs, as to His ear, which now disdains you.

Pal. Come up to me,
 Quit me of these cold Gyves, give me a Sword

Though it be rustie, and the charity
 Of one meal lend me; Come before me then,
 A good Sword in thy hand, and doe but say
 That Emely is thine, I will forgive
 The trespass thou hast done my, ye my life
 If then thou carry't, and brave souls in shades
 That have di'd manly, which will seek of me
 Some news from earth, they shall get none but this,
 That thou art brave, and noble.

Arc. Be content,

Again betake you to your hawthorn house,
 With counsel of the night, I will be here
 With wholesome viands; these impediments
 Will I take off; you shall have garments, and Perfumes to kill the smell o'th' prison, after
 When you shall stretch your self, and say but Arcite
 I'm in plight, there shall be at your choice
 Both Sword, and Armor.

Pal. Oh you heavens, dare any
 So noble bear a guilty business! none
 But only Arcite, therefore none but Arcite
 In this kind is so bold.

Arc. Sweet Palamon.

Pal. I doe embrace you, and your offer, for Your offer do't I only, Sir your person
 Without hypocrisy I may not wish

Wind horns of Cornets.

More than my Swords edge ont.

Arc. You hear the Horns;

Enter your Musick least this match between's
 Be crost e'r met, give me your hand, farewell.
 I'll bring you every needfull thing: I pray you
 Take comfort and be strong.

Pal. Pray hold your promise;
 And doe the deed with a bent brow, most certain
 You love me not, be rough with me, and pour
 This oil ont of your language; by this ayr
 I could for each word, give a Cuff: my stomach
 Not reconcil'd by reason,

Arc. Plainly spoken,

Yet pardon me hard language, when I spur

Wind horns.

My horse, I chide him not; content, and anger
 In me have but one face. Hark Sir, they call
 The scatter'd to the Banket; you must guess
 I have an office there.

Pal. Sir your attendance
 Cannot please heaven, and I know your office
 Unjustly is atcheiv'd.

Arc. If a good title,

I'm persuaded this question sick between's,
 By bleeding must be cur'd. I'm a Suitor,
 That to your Sword you will bequeath this plea,
 And talk of it no more.

Pal. But this one word:

You are going now to gaze upon my Mistris,
 For note you, mine she is.

Arc. Nay then.

Pal. Nay pray you,
 You talk of feeding me to breed me strength
 You are going now to look upon a Sun
 That strengthens what it looks on, there
 You have a vantage o'er me, but enjoy't till
 I may enforce my remedy. Farewell.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Taylors daughter alone.

Daugh. He has mistook; the Beak I meant, is gone
 After his fancy, 'Tis now welnigh morning,
 No matter, would it were perpetuall night,
 And darkness Lord o'th' world, Hark 'tis a wolf:
 In me hath grief slain fear, and but for one thing
 I care for nothing, and that's Palamon.

Twreak not if the wolves would jaw me, so
 He had this File; what if I hollow'd for him?
 I cannot hollow: if I whoop'd; what then?
 If he not answer'd, I should call a wolf,
 And doe him but that service. I have heard
 Strange howls this live-long night, why may't not be
 They have made prey of him? he has no weapons,
 He cannot run, the Jengling of his Gives
 Might call fell things to listen, who have in them
 A sence to know a man unarm'd, and can Smell where resistance is. I'll set it down
 He's torn to peeces, they howl'd many together
 And then they fed on him: So much for that,
 Be bold to ring the Bell; How stand I then?
 All's char'd when he is gone, No, no I lye,
 My Father's to be hang'd for his escape,
 My self to beg, if I priz'd life so much
 As to deny my act, but that I would not,
 Should I try death by dussions: I am mop't,
 Food took I non these two daies.
 Sipt some water, I have not clos'd mine eyes
 Save when my lids scowrd off their bine; alas
 Dissolve my life, Let not my sence unsettle
 Least I should drown, or stab or hang my self.
 O state of Nature, fail together in me,
 Since thy best props are warpt: So which way now?
 The best way is, the next way to a grave:
 Each errant step beside is torment. Loe.
 The Moon is down, the Cr'ckers chirpe, the Schreich-owl
 Calls in the dawn; all offices are done
 Save what I fail in: But the point is this
 An end, and that is all.

Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Arcite, with Meat, Wine, and Files.

Arc. I should be near the place, hoa. Cosen Palamon.

Enter Palamon.

Pal. Arcite?

Arc. The same: I have brought you food and files,
 Come forth and fear not, here's no Thefens.

Pal. Nor none so honest Arcite.

Arc. That's no matter,
 We'll argue that hereafter: Come take courage,
 You shall not dye thus beastly, here Sir drink:
 I know you're faint, then I'll talk further with you.

Pal. Arcite, thou mightst now poyson me.

Arc. I might.

But I must fear you first: Sit down, and good now
 No more of these vain parlies; let us not Having our ancient reputation with us
 Make talk for Fools, and Cowards, To your health. &c.

Pal. Doe.

Arc. Pray sit down then, and let me entreat you
 By all the honesty and honor in you,
 No mention of this woman, 't will disturb us,
 We shall have time enough.

Pal. Well Sir, I'll pledge you.

Arc. Drinke a good hearty draught, it breeds good blood
 man.

Doe not you feel it thaw you?

Pal. Stay, I'll tell you after a draught or two more.

Arc. Spare it not, the Duke has more Cuz: Eat now.

Pal. Yes.

Arc. I'm glad you have so good a stomach.

Pal. I'm gladder I have so good meat to't.

Arc. Is't not mad lodging here in the wild woods Cosen?

Pal. Yes, for them that have wild Consciences.

Arc. How tastes your victuals? your hunger needs no sawce
 I see.

Pal. Not much.

But if it did, yours is too tart: sweet Cosen: what is this?

Arc. Venison.

Pal. 'Tis a lusty meat:

Give me more wine; here Arcite to the wenches
 We have known in our daies. The Lord Stewards daughter.
 Doe you remember her?

Arc. After you Cuz.

Pal. She lov'd a black-hair'd man.

Arc. She did so; well Sir.

Pal. And I have heard some call him Arcite; and Arc. Out with't faith.

Pal. She met him in an Arbor:

What did she there Cuz? play o'the virginals?

Arc. Something she did Sir.

Pal. Made her groan a Month for't; or 2. or 3. or 10.

Arc. The Marshals Sister,

Had her share too, as I remember Cosen,
 Else there be tales abroad, you'll pledge her?

Pal. Yes.

Arc. A pretty brown wench 'tis: There was a time
 When young men went a hunting, and a wood,
 And a broad beech: and thereby hangs a tale: heigh ho.Pal. For Emily, upon my life, fool
 A way with this strain'd mirth; I say again
 That sigh was breath'd for Emily; bafe Cosen, Dar'st thou break first?

Arc. You are wide.

Pal. By heaven and earth, there's nothing in thee honest.

Arc. Then I'll leave you: you are a Beast now:

Pal. As thou mak'st me, Traytor.

Arc. There's all things needfull, files and shirts, and perfumes.I'll come again some two hours hence, and bring
 That that shall quiet all.

Pal. A Sword and Armor.

Arc. Fear me not; you are now too fowl; farewell.
 Get off your Trinkets, you shall want nought;

Pal. Sir ha:

Arc. I'll here no more.

Exit.

Pal. If he keep touch, he dies for't.

Exit.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Jaylors daughter.

Daugh. I am very cold, and all the Stars are out too,
 The little Stars, and all, that look like aglets:
 The Sun has seen my Folly: Palamon;
 Alas no; he's in heaven; where am I now?
 Yonder's the sea, and there's a Ship; how't tumbles
 And there's a Rock lies watching under water;
 Now, now, it beats upon it; now, now, now,
 There's a leak sprung, a sound one, how they cry?
 Upon her before the wind, you'll loose all els:
 Up with a course or two, and tack about Boys.
 Good night, good night, y'are gone; I'm very hungry,
 Would I could find a fine Frog; he would tell me
 News from all parts o'th' world, then would I make
 A Careck of a Cockle-shell, and sayll
 By East and North East to the King of Pigmies,
 For he tels fortunes rarely. Now my Father
 Twenty to one is trust up in a trice
 To morrow morning, I'll say never a word.

Sing.

For I'll cut my green coat, afoot above my knee,
 And I'll clip my yellow locks; an inch below mine eie.

bey, nonny, nonny, nonny.

He's buy me a whit Cut, forth for to ride

And I'll goe seek him, throw the world that is so wide.

bey nonny, nonny, nonny.

O for a prick now like a Nightingale, to put my brest
 Against. I shall sleep like a Top elle.

Exit.

Scena Sexta.

Enter a School-master 4. Countrymen: and Baum.
2. or 3. wenches, with a Taborer.

Sch. Fy, fy, what tediousness, & difensanity is here among ye? have my Rudiments bin labour'd so long with ye? milk'd unto ye, and, by a figure, even the very plumbroth & marrow of my understanding laid upon ye? and do you still cry where, and how, & wherefore? you most course freeze capacities, ye jave Judgements, have I said thus let be, and there let be, and then let be, and no man understand me, proh deum, medius fidius, ye are all dunces: For why here stand I. Here the Duke comes, there are you close in the Thicket; the Duke appears, I meet him, and unto him I utter learned things, and many figures, he hears, and nods, and hums, and then cries rare, and I goe forward, at length I sling my Cap up mark there; then do you as once did Meleager, and the Bore break comely out before him: like true lovers, cast your selves in a Body decently, and sweetly, by a figure trace, and turn Boys.

1. And sweetly we will doe it Master Gerrold.
2. Draw up the Company, Where's the Taborer?
3. Why Timothy?

Tab. Here my mad boys, have at ye.

Sch. But I say where's their woman;

4. Here's Friz and Maudline.

2. And little Luce, with the white legs, and bouncing Barbary.

1. And freckled Nel; that never fail'd her Master.

Sch. Where be your Ribands maids? swym with your Bodies And carry it sweetly, and deliverly And now and then a favor, and a friske.

Nel. Let us alone Sir.

Sch. Where's the rest o'th' Musick.

3. Dispers'd as you commanded.

Sch. Couple then

And see what's wanting; where's the Bavian? My friend, carry your tail without offence Or scandall to the Ladies; and be sure You tumble with audacity, and manhood, And when you bark doe it with judgement.

Bau. Yes Sir.

Sch. Quo usque tandem? Here is a woman wanting.

4. We may goe whistle: all the fat's i'th' fire.

Sch. We have,

As learned Authors utter, wash'd a Tile, We have been fatuus, and labour'd vainly.

2. This is that scornfull peece, that scurvy hilding That gave her promise faithfully, she would be here, Cicely the Sempsters daughter:

The next gloves that I give her shall be dogs-skin; Nay and she fail me once, you can tell Arcas, She swore by wine, and bread, she would not break.

Sch. An Eeel and woman,

A learned Poet sayes: unles by'th' tail And with thy teeth thou hold, will either fail, In manners this was false position.

1. A fire ill take her; do's she flinch now?

3. What

Shall we determine Sir?

Sch. Nothing,

Our business is become a nullity Yea, and a woefull, and a pittious nullity.

4. Now when the credit of our Town lay on it, Now to be frampall, now to pifs o'th' nettle, Goe thy ways, I'll remember thee, I'll fit thee.

Enter Taylor's daughter.

Daughter,
The George alow, came from the South, from
The coast of Barbary a.

And there be met with brave gallants of war

By one, by two, by three, a.

Well hail'd, well hail'd, you jolly gallants, Chair and
And whither now are you bound a? stools out.

O let me have your compny till come to the sound a.

There was three fools, fell out about an howlet:

The one sed it was an owl

The other he sed nay,

The third he sed it was a hawk, and her bells were cut away.

3. There's a dainty mad woman Mr. comes i'th' Nick, as mad as a march Hare; If we can get her dance, we are made again: I warrant her, she'll do the rarest gambols.

1. A mad woman? we are made Boys.

Sch. And are you mad good woman?

Daugh. I would be sorry else,

Give me your hand.

Sch. Why?

Daugh. I can tell your fortune.

You are a fool: tell ten, I have poz'd him: But.

Friend you must eat no white bread, if you do

Your teeth will bleed extremely, shall we dance ho?

I know you, y'are a Tinker: Sir, ha Tinker

Stop no more holes, but what you should.

Sch. Dii boni. A Tinker Damzell?

Daug. Or a Conjurer: raise me a devill now, and let him play.

Quipassa, o'th' bells and bones.

Sch. Go take her, and fluently persuade her to a peace:

Et opus exegi, quod nec Jovis ira, nec ignis.

Strike up, and lead her in.

2. Come Lads, lets trip it.

Daugh. I'll lead.

(Wind Horns:

3. Doe, doe.

Sch. Persuasively, and cunningly: away boys,

(Ex. all but Schoolemaster.

I hear the horns: give me some Meditation, and mark your Cue; Pallas inspire me.

Enter Thef. Pir. Hip. Emil. Arcite: and train.

Thef. This way the Stag took.

Sch. Stay, and edifie.

Thef. What have we here?

Per. Some Countrey sport, upon my life Sir.

Thef. Well Sir, goe forward, we will edifie, Ladies sit down, we'll stay it.

Sch. Thou doughtie Duke all hail: all hail sweet Ladies.

Thef. This is a cold beginning.

Sch. If you but favor; our Country pastime made is, We are a few of those collected here

That ruder Tongues distinguish villager,

And to say veritie, and not to fable;

We are a merry rout, or else a rable

Or company, or by a figure, Chorus

That for thy dignitie will dance a Morris.

And I that am the rectifier of all

By title Pedagogus, that let fall

The Birch upon the breeches of the small ones,

And humble with a Ferula the tall ones,

Doe here present this Machine, or this frame

And daintie Duke, whose doughtie dismall fame

From Dis to Dedalus, from post to pillar

Is blown abroad; help me thy poor well willer,

And with thy twinkling eyes, look right and straight

Upon this mighty Morr—of mickle waight

Is—now comes in, which being glew'd together

Makes

Makes Morris, and the cause that we came hither
The body of our sport of no small study
I first appear, though rude, and raw, and muddy,
To speak before thy noble grace, this tenner:
At whole great feet I offer up my penner.
The next the Lord of May, and Lady bright,
The Chambermaid, and Servingman by night
That seek out silent hanging: Then mine Host
And his fat Spouse, that welcomes to their cost
The gauled Traveller, and with a beck'ning
Informs the Tapster to inflame the reck'ning:
Then the beast eating Clown, and next the fool,
The Bavian, with long tail, and eke long tool
Cum multis aliis, that make a dance,
Say I, and all shall presently advance.

Thes. I, I by any means, dear Domine.

Per. Produce.

Musick Dance:

Intrate filii, Come forth, and foot it.

Knock for Schoolm. Enter The Dance.

Ladies, if we have been merry
And have pleas'd thee with a derry,
And a derry, and a down
Say the School-master's no Clown:
Duke, if we have pleas'd thee too
And have done as good Boys should doe,
Give us but a tree or 'twaine
For a Maypole, and again
Ere another year run out,
We'll make thee laugh and all this rout.

Thes. Take 20. Domine; how does my sweet heart?

Hip. Never so pleas'd Sir.

Emil. 'Twas an excellent dance, and for a preface

I never heard a better,

Thes. School-master, I thank you, One see'em all re-warded.

Per. And heer's something to paint your Pole withall.

Thes. Now to our sports again.

Sch. May the Stag thou huntst stand long,

And thy dogs be swift and strong:

May they kill him without lets,

And the Ladies eat his dowlets: Come we are all made.

Wind Horns.

Dii Deaq; Omnes, ye have danc'd rarely wenches. Exeunt.

Scena Septima.

Enter Palamon from the Bush.

Pal. About this hour my Cosen gave his faith
To visit me again, and with him bring
Two Swords, and two good Armors; If he fail
He's neither man, nor Soldier; When he left me
I did not think a week could have restor'd
My lost strength to me, I was grown so low,
And Crest-sal'n with my wants: I thank thee Arcite,
Thou art yet a fair Foe; And I feel my self
With this refreshing, able once again
To out-dure danger: To delay it longer
Would make the world think when it comes to hearing,
That I lay fatting like a Swine, to fight
And not a Soldier: Therefore this blest morning
Shall be the last; And that Sword he refuses,
If it but hold, I kill him with; 'tis Justice:
So love, and Fortune for me: O good morrow.

Enter Arcite with Armors and Swords.

Arc. Good morrow noble kinsman,

Pal. I have put you

To too much pains Sir.

Arc. That too much fair Cosen,

Is but a debt to honor, and my duty.

Pal. Would you were so in all Sir; I could wish ye

As kind a kinsman, as you force me find

A beneficiall foe, that my embraces
Might thank ye, not my blows.

Arc. I shall think either

Well done, a noble recompence.

Pal. Then I shall quit you.

Arc. Defy me in these fair terms, and you show

More than a Mistris to me, no more anger

As you love any thing that's honorable:

We were not bred to talk man, when we are arm'd

And both upon our guards, then let our fury

Like meeting of two tides, fly strongly from us,
And then to whom the birthright of this Beauty

Truely pertains (without obbraidings, scorns,

Displings of our persons, and such powtings

Fitter for Girles and Schooleboyes) will be seen

And quickly, yours, or mine: Wilt please you arme Sir?

Or if you feel your self not fitting yet

And furnish'd with your old strength, I'll stay Cosen

And ev'ry day discourse you into health,

As I'm spar'd, your person I'm friends with

And I could wish I had not said I lov'd her

Though I had did; But loving such a Lady

And justifying my Love, I must not fly from't.

Pal. Arcite, thou art so brave an enemy

That no man but thy Cosen's fit to kill thee,

I'm well, and lusty, choose your Armes.

Arc. Choose you Sir.

Pal. Wilt thou exceed in all, or do'st thou doe it

To make me spare thee?

Arc. If you think so Cosen,

You are deceiv'd, for as I'm a Soldier.

I will not spare you.

Pal. That's well said.

Arc. You'll find it.

Pal. Then as I'm an honest man and love,

With all the justice of affection

I'll pay thee foundly: This I'll take.

Arc. That's mine then,

I'll arme you first.

Pal. Do: Pray thee tell me Cosen,

Where gotst thou this good Armor?

Arc. 'Tis the Dukes,

And to say true, I stole it, doe I pinch you?

Pal. No.

Arc. Is't not too heavie?

Pal. I have worn a lighter,

But I shall make it serve.

Arc. I'll buckl't close.

Pal. By any means.

Arc. You care not for a Grand guard?

Pal. No, no, we'll use no horses, I perceive

You would fain be at that Fight.

Arc. I'm indifferent.

Pal. Faith so am I: Good Cosen, thrust the buckle

Through far enough.

Arc. I warrant you.

Pal. My Cask now.

Arc. Will you fight bare-arm'd?

Pal. We shall be the nimbler.

Arc. But use your Gantlets though; those are o'th' least,

Prethee take mine good Cosen.

Pal. Thank you Arcite.

How doe I look, am I fallen much away?

Arc. Faith very little; Love has us'd you kindly.

Pal. I'll warrant thee, I'll strike home.

Arc. Doe, and spare not;

I'll give you cause sweet Cosen.

Pal. Now to you Sir,

Me thinks this Armor's very like that, Arcite.

Thou wor'ft that day the 3. Kings fell, but lighter.

Arc. That was a very good one, and that day

I well remember, you out-did me Cosen,

I never saw such valour: When you charg'd

Upon the left wing of the Enemie,
I spur'd hard to come up, and under me
I had a right good horse.

Pal. You had indeed
A bright Bay I remember.

Arc. Yes but all
Was vainly labour'd in me, you out-went me,
Nor could my wishes reach you; Yet a little
I did by imitation.

Pal. More by virtue,
You are modest Cosen.

Arc. When I saw you charge first,
Me thought I heard a dreadfull clap of Thunder
Break from the Troop.

Pal. But still before that flew
The lightning of your valour: Stay a little,
Is not this peece too streight?

Arc. No, no, 'tis well.

Pal. I would have nothing hurt thee but my Sword;
A bruise would be dishonor.

Arc. Now I 'm perfect.

Pal. Stand off then.

Arc. Take my Sword, I hold it better.

Pal. I thank ye: No, keep it, your life lyes on it,
Here's one, if it but hold, I aske no more,
For all my hopes: My Cause and honor guard me.

They bow severall wayes: then advance and stand.

Arc. And me my love: Is there ought else to say?

Pal. This only, and no more: Thou art mine Aunts Son.
And that blood we desire to shed is mutuall.

In me, thine, and in thee, mine: My Sword
Is in my hand, and if thou killst me

The gods, and I forgive thee; If there be
A place prepar'd for those that sleep in honor,
I wish his wearie soul, that falls may win it:
Fight bravely Cosen, give me thy noble hand.

Arc. Here Palamon: This hand shall never more
Come near thee with such friendship.

Pal. I commend thee.

Arc. If I fall, curse me, and say I was a coward,
For none but such, dare die in these just Tryalls.
Once more farewell my Cosen.

Pal. Farewell Arcite.

Fight.

Horns within: they stand.

Arc. Loe Cosen, loe, our Folly has undone us.

Pal. Why?

Arc. This is the Duke, a hunting as I told you,
If we be found, we 're wretched, O retire
For honors sake, and safely presently
Into your Bush agen; Sir we shall find
Too many hours to dye in, gentle Cosen:
If you be seen you perish instantly
For breaking prison, and I, if you reveal me,
For my contempt; Then all the world will scorn us,
And say we had a noble difference,
But base disposers of it.

Pal. No, no, Cosen

I will no more be hidden, nor put off
This great adventure to a second Tryall
I know your cunning, and I know your cause,
He that faints now, shame take him, put thy self
Upon thy present guard.

Arc. You are not mad?

Pal. Or I will make th'advantage of this hour
Mine own, and what to come shall threaten me,
I fear less then my fortune: Know weak Cosen
I love Emilia, and in that I'll bury Thee, and all crosses else.

Arc. Then come, what can come
Thou shalt know Palamon, I dare as well
Die, as discourse, or sleep: Only this fears me,
The law will have the honor of our ends,
Have at thy life.

Pal. Look to thine own well Arcite.

Fight again. Horns.

Enter Theseus, Hippolita, Emilia, Perithous and train.

Theseus. What ignorant and mal' malicious Traitors,
Are you? That 'gainst the tenor of my Laws
Are making Battail, thus like Knights appointed,
Without my leave, and Officers of Armes?
By Castor both shall dye.

Pal. Hold thy word Theseus,
We are certainly both Traitors, both despisers
Of thee, and of thy goodness: I 'm Palamon
That cannot love thee, he that broke thy Prison,
Think well, what that deserves; And this is Arcite
A bolder Traytor never trod thy ground,
A Fallier never seem'd friend: This is the man
Was beg'd and banish'd, this is he contemnes thee
And what thou dar'st doe; and in this disguise
Against this own Edict follows thy Sister,
That fortunate bright Star, the fair Emilia
Whose servant, (if there be a right in seeing,
And first bequeathing of the soul to) justly
I 'm, and which is more, dares think her his.
This treacherie like a most trusty Lover,
I call'd him now to answer; If thou be'st
As thou art spoken, great and virtuous,
The true descider of all injuries,
Say, Fight again, and thou shalt see me Theseus
Doc such a Justice, thou thy self wilt envie
Then take my life, I'll wooe thee to't.

Per. O Heaven,
What more than man is this!

Thes. I have sworn.

Arc. We seek not

Thy breath of mercy Theseus, 'Tis to me
A thing as soon to dye, as thee to say it,
And no more mov'd: where this man calls me Traitor,
Let me say thus much; If in love be Treason,
In service of so excellent a Beautie,
As I love most, and in that faith will perish,
As I have brought my life here to confirme it,
As I have serv'd her truest, worthiest,
As I dare kill this Cosen, that denies it,
So let me be most Traitor, and ye please me:
For scorning thy Edict Duke, aske that Lady
Why she is fair, and why her eyes command me
Stay here to love her. And if she say Traytor,
I 'm a villain fit to lye unburied.

Pal. Thou shalt have pity of us both, O Theseus,
If unto neither thou shew mercy, stop
(As thou art just) thy noble ear against us,
As thou art valiant; For thy Cosen's soul
Whose 12. strong labors crown his memory,
Let's die together, at one instant, Duke,
Only a little let him fall before me,
That I may tell my Soul he shall not have her.

Thes. I grant your wish, for to say true, your Cosen
Has ten times more offended, for I gave him
More mercy than you found, Sir, your offences
Being no more than his: None here speak for 'em
For ere the Sun set, both shall sleep for ever.

Hippol. Alas the pity, now or never Sister
Speak not to be denied; That face of yours
Will bear the curses else of after ages
For these lost Cosen.

Emil. In my face dear Sister
I find no anger to 'em; Nor no ruin,
The misadventure of their own eyes kill 'em;
Yet that I will be woman, and have pity,
My knees shall grow to 'th' ground but I'll get mercie.
Help me dear Sister, in a deed so virtuous,
The powers of all women will be with us,
Most royall Brother.

Hippol. Sir by our tye of Marriage.

Emil. By your own spotless honor.

Hip.

Hip. By that faith,
That fair hand, and that honest heart you gave me.

Emil. By that you would have pity in another,
By your own virtues infinite.

Hip. By valor,
By all the chaste nights I have ever pleas'd you

Thes. These are strange Conjurings.
Per. Nay then I'll in too: By all our friendship Sir, by all our dangers,

By all you love most, wars; And this sweet Lady.

Emil. By that you would have trembled to deny
A blushing Maid.

Hip. By your own eyes: By strength
In which you swore I went beyond all women,
Almost all men, and yet I yielded Thesens.

Per. To crown all this; By your most noble soul
Which cannot want due mercie, I beg first.

Hip. Next hear my prayers.

Emil. Last let me intreat Sir.

Per. For mercie.

Hip. Mercie.

Emil. Mercie on these Princes.

Thes. Ye make my faith reel: Say I felt
Compassion to'em both, how would you place it?

Emil. Upon their lives: But with their banishments.

Thes. You are a right woman, Sister; You have pity,
But want the understanding where to use it.

If you desire their lives, invent a way
Safely than banishment: Can these two live
And have the agony of love about 'em,
And not kill one another? Every day

'They'd fight about you; Hourly bring your honor
In publique question with their Swords; Be wise then

And here forget 'em; It concerns your credit,

And my o'th equally: I have said they die,

Better they fall byth' Law, than one another.

Bow not my honor.

Emil. O my noble Brother,
That o'th was rashly made, and in your anger,
Your reason will not hold it, if such vows
Stand for express will, all the world must perish.

Beside, I have another oath, gainst yours
Of more authority, I 'm sure more love,
Not made in passion neither, but good heed.

Thes. What is it Sister?

Per. Urge it home brave Lady.

Emil. That you would never deny me any thing

Fit for my modest suit, and your free granting:

I tye you to your word now, if ye fall in't,

Think how you maim your honor;

(For now I 'm set a begging Sir, I 'm deaf

To all but your compassion) how, their lives

Might breed the ruin of my name; Opinion,

Shall any thing that loves me perish for me?

That were a cruell wisdom, doe men proyn

The straight young Bows that blush with thousand Blossoms

Because they may be rotten? O Duke Thesens

The goodly Mothers that have groan'd for these,

And all the longing Maids that ever lov'd,

If your vow stand, shall curse me and my Beauty,

And in their funerals songs, for these two Cofens

Despise my crueltie, and cry woe worth me,

Till I 'm nothing but the scorn of women;

For Heavens sake save their lives, and banish 'em.

Thes. On what conditions?

Emil. Swear 'em never more

To make me their Contention, or to know me,

To tread upon the Dukedome, and to be

Where ever they shall travel, ever strangers to one another.

Pal. I'll be cut a peeces

Before I take this oath, forget I love her?

O all ye gods despise me then: Thy Banishment

I not mislike, so we may fairly carry

Our Swords, and cause along: Else never trifle,

But take our lives Duke, I must love and will,
And for that love, must and dare kill this Cofen
On any peeces the earth has.

Thes. Will you Arcite

Take these conditions?

Pal. He's a villain then.

Per. These are men.

Arcite. No, never Duke: 'Tis worse to me than begging

To take my life so basely, though I think

I never shall enjoy her, yet I'll preserve

The honor of affection, and dye for her,

Make death a Devill.

Thes. What may be done? For now I feel compassion.

Per. Let it not fall again Sir.

Thes. Say Emilia

If one of them were dead, as one must, are you

Content to take th'other to your husband?

They cannot both enjoy you; They are Princes

As goodly as your own eyes, and as noble

As ever fame yet spoke of: Look upon 'em,

And if you can love, end this difference,

I give consent, are you content too, Princes?

Bob. With all our souls.

Thes. He that she refuses

Must dye then.

Bob. Any death thou canst invent Duke.

Pal. If I fall from that mouth, I fall with favor:

And Lovers yet unborn shall bless my ashes.

Arc. If she refuse me, yet my grave will wed me,

And Soldiers sing my Epitaph.

Thes. Make choice then.

Emil. I cannot Sir, they are both too excellent

For me, a hayr shall never fall of these men.

Hip. What will become of 'em?

Thes. Thus I ordain it,

And by mine honor, once again it stands,

Or both shall dye. You shall both to your Countrey,

And each within this month accompanied

With three fair Knights, appear again in this place,

In which I'll plant a Pyramid; And whether

Before us that are here, can force his Cofen

By fair and knightly strength to touch the Pillar,

He shall enjoy her: The other loose his head,

And all his friends: Nor shall he grudge to fall;

Nor think he dies with interest in this Lady:

Will this content ye?

Pal. Yes: Here Cofen Arcite

I 'm friends again, till that hour.

Arc. I embrace ye.

Thes. Are you content Sister?

Emil. Yes, I must Sir,

Ecel both miscarry.

Thes. Come shake hands again then,

And take heed, as you are Gentlemen, this Quarrell

Sleep till the hour perfixt, and hold your course.

Pal. We dare not fail thee Thesens.

Toes. Come, I'll give ye

Now usage like to Princes, and to Friends:

When ye return, who wins, I'll settle here,

Who loses, yet I'll weep upon his Beer.

Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Jailor and his freind.

Jail. HEar you no more? was nothing said of me
Concerning the escape of Palamon?
Good Sir remember.

1 Fr. Nothing that I heard,
For I came home before the busines
Was fully ended: yet I might perceive
E'r I departed, a great likelihood
Of both their pardons: for Hippolita,
And fair-ey'd Emilia, upon their knees,
Begg'd with such handsome pittie, that the Duke
Methought stood staggering whether he should follow
His rash oath, or the sweet compassion
Of those two Ladies; and to second them,
That truly noble Prince Peribous.
Half his own heart, set in too, that I hope
All shall be well: neither heard I one question
Of your name, or his scape.

Enter 2 Friends.

Jail. Pray Heaven it hold so.
2 Fr. Be of good comfort man; I bring you news
Good news.

Jail. They are welcome,
2 Fr. Palamon has clear'd you, (Daughter's,
And got your pardon, and discover'd
How, and by whose means he scap'd, which was your Whose pardon is procured too, and the prisoner
Not to be held ungrateful to her goodnes,
Has given a sum of money to her Marriage,
A large one I'll assure you.

Jail. Ye are a good man
And ever bring good news.
1 Fr. How was it ended?
2 Fr. Why, as it should be; they that ne'er begg'd
But they prevail'd, had their suits fairly granted.
The prisoners have their lives.

1 Fr. I knew't would be so.
2 Fr. But there be new conditions, which you'll hear of
At better time.

Jail. I hope they are good.
2 Fr. They are honourable,
How good they'll prove, I know not.

Enter Wooser.

1 Fr. 'Twill be known.
Woo. Alas Sir, where's your Daughter?

Jail. Why do you ask?
Woo. Oh Sir, when did you see her?
2 Fr. How he looks?

Jail. This morning. sleep?
Woo. Was she well? was she in health Sir? when did she 1 Fr. These are strange questions.

Jail. I do not think she was very well, for now
You make me mind her, but this very day
I ask'd her questions, and she answer'd me
So far from what she was, so childishly,
So sillily, as if she were a fool,
An Innocent, and I was very angry.
But what of her Sir: (as good by me

Woo. Nothing but my pity, but you must know it, and
As by another that less loves her:

Jail. Well Sir.
1 Fr. Not right?
2 Fr. Not well? —
Woo. No Sir, not well.
Woo. 'Tis too true, she is mad.
1 Fr. It cannot be.
Woo. Believe, you'll find it so.
Jail. I half suspected

What you told me: the gods comfort her:
Either this was her love to Palamon,
Or fear of my miscarrying on his scape,
Or both,

Woo. 'Tis likely.
Jail. But why all this haste, Sir?
Woo. I'll tell you quickly. As I late was angling
In the great Lake that lies behind the Palace,
From the far shore, thick set with Reeds and Sedges.
As patiently I was attending sport,
I heard a voice, a shrill one, and attentive
I gave my ear, when I might well perceive
'T was one that sung, and by the smallness of it
A Boy or Woman. I then left my angle
To his own skill, came near, but yet perceiv'd not
Who made the sound; the Rushes, and the Reeds
Had so encompass't it: I laid me down
And listned to the words she sung, for then
Through a small glade cut by the Fisher-men,
I saw it was your Daughter.

Jail. Pray goe on Sir?
Woo. She sung much, but no fence; only I heard her
Repeat this often. Palamon is gone,
Is gone to th' wood to gather Mulberries,
I'll find him out to morrow.

1 Fr. Pretty foul.
Woo. His shackles will betray him, he'll be taken,
And what shall I do then? I'll bring a beavy,
A hundred black-ey'd Maids that love as I do
With Chaplets on their heads with Daffadillies,
With cherry lips, and cheeks of Damask Roses,
And all we'll dance an Antique fore the Duke,
And beg his pardon; then the talk'd of you, Sir;
That you must lose your head to morrow morning
And the must gather Flowers to bury you,
And see the house made handsome, then she sung
Nothing but willow, willow, willow, and between Ever was, Palamon, fair Palamon,
And Palamon, was a tall young man. The place
Was knee deep where she sat; her careless Tresses,
A wreak of Bull-rush rounded; about her stuck
Thousand fresh Water Flowers of several colours.
That methought she appear'd like the fair Nymph
That feeds the lake with waters, or as Iris
Newly dropt down from heaven; Rings she made
Of Rushes that grew by, and to 'em spoke
The prettiest poesies: thus our true love's ty'd,
This you may loose, not me, and many a one:
And then she wept, and sung again, and sigh'd,
And with the same breath smil'd, and kiss'd her hand.

2 Fr. Alas what pity it is?
Woo. I made into her,
She saw me, and straight fought the flood, I sav'd her,
And set her safe to land: when presently
She slipt away, and to the City made,
With such a cry, and swiftness, that believe me
She left me far behind her; three, or four,
I saw from far off cross her, one of 'em
I knew to be your brother, where we staid,
And fell, scarce to be got away: I left them with her,

Enter Brother, Daughter, and others.

And hither came to tell you: Here they are.
Daugh. May you never more enjoy the light, &c.
Is not this a fine Song?

Bro. Oh, a very fine one.
 Daugh. I can sing twenty more.
 Bro. I think you can,
 Daugh. Yes truly can I, I can sing the Broom,
 And Bonny Robbin. Are not you a Tailor?
 Bro. Yes.
 Daugh. Where's my wedding-Gown?
 Bro. I'll bring it to morrow.
 Daugh. Doe, very rarely, I must be abroad else
 To call the Maids, and pay the Minstrels
 For I must loose my Maidenhead by cock-light
 'Twill never thrive else.
Ob fair, ob sweet, &c.
 Bro. You must ev'n take it patiently.
 Jay. 'Tis true,
 Daugh. Good ev'n, good men, pray did you ever hear
 Of one young Palamon?
 Jay. Yes wench, we know him.
 Daugh. Is't not a fine young Gentleman?
 Jay. 'Tis Love.
 Bro. By no mean crosses her, she is then distemper'd
 For worse than now she shows.
 1 Fr. Yes, he's a fine man.
 Daugh. Oh, is he so? you have a Sister.
 1 Fr. Yes.
 Daugh. But she shall never have him, tell her so,
 For a trick that I know, y' had best look to her,
 For if she see him once, she's gone, she's done,
 And undone in an hour. All the young Maids
 Of our Town are in love with him, but I laugh at 'em
 And let 'em all alone, is't not a wise course?
 1 Fr. Yes. (by him,
 Daugh. There is at least two hundred now with child
 There must be four; yet I keep close for all this,
 Close as a Cockle; and all these must be boys,
 He has the trick on't, and at ten years old
 They must be all gelt for Musicians,
 And sing the wars of Theseus.
 2 Fr. This is strange.
 Daugh. As ever your heard, but say nothing.
 1 Fr. No. (him,
 Daugh. They come from all parts of the Dukedom to I'll warrant ye, he had not so few last night
 As twenty, to dispatch, he'll tickle't up
 In two hours, if his hand be in.
 Jay. She's lost
 Past all cure.
 Bro. Heaven forbid man.
 Daugh. Come hither, you are a wise man.
 1 Fr. Does she know him?
 2 Fr. No, would she did.
 Daugh. You are master of a Ship?
 Jay. Yes.
 Daugh. Where's your Compass?
 Jay. Here.
 Daugh. Set it to th' North.
 And now direct your course to th' wood, where Palamon
 Lies longing for me; for the Tackling
 Let me alone; come weigh my hearts, cheerly.
 All. Owgh, owgh, owgh, 'tis up, the wind's fair, top the Bowling; out with the main fail, where's your Whistle Master?
 Bro. Let's get her in.
 Jay. Up to the top Boy.
 Bro. Where's the Pilot?
 1 Fr. Here.
 Daugh. What ken'st thou?
 3 Fr. A fair wood.
 Daugh. Bear for it master: tack about:
When Cinthia with her borrowed light, &c.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Emilia alone, with two Pictures.

Emil. Yet I may bind those wounds up, that must open
 And bleed to death for my sake else; I'll choose,
 And end their strife: two such young handsome men
 Shall never fall for me, their weeping Mothers,
 Following the dead cold ashes of their Sons
 Shall never curse my cruelty: Good Heaven;
 What a sweet face has Arcite, if wise nature
 With all her best endowments, all those beauties
 She shews into the births of noble bodies,
 Were here a mortal woman, and had in her
 The coy denials of young Maids, yet doubtless;
 She would run mad for this man: what an eye?
 Of what a fiery sparkle, and quick sweetness:
 Has this young Prince? here Love himself sits smiling,
 Just such another wanton Ganimed,
 Set Love a fire with, and enforc'd the god
 Snatch up the goodly Boy, and set him by him
 A shining constellation: what a brow,
 Of what a spacious Majesty he carries?
 Arch'd like the great ey'd Juno's, but far sweeter,
 Smoother than Pelops Shoulder? Fame and Honor
 Methinks from hence, as from a Promontory
 Pointed in heaven, should clap their wings, and sing
 To all the under world, the Loves, and Fights
 Of gods, and such men near 'em. Palamon,
 Is but his foil, to him, a mere dull shadow,
 He's swarth, and meagre, of an eye as heavy
 As if he had lost his mother; a still temper,
 No stirring in him, no alacrity,
 Of all this sprightly sharpness, not a smile;
 Yet these that we count errors, may become him?
Narcissus was a sad Boy, but a heavenly:
 Oh who can find the bent of womans fancy?
 I'm a fool, my reason is lost in me,
 I have no choice, and I have ly'd so lewdly
 That Women ought to beat me. On my knees
 I ask thy pardon: Palamon, thou art alone,
 And only beautiful, and these thy eyes,
 These the bright lamps of Beauty that command
 And threaten Love, and what young Maid dare cross 'em
 What a bold gravity, and yet inviting
 Has this brown manly face? Oh Love, this only
 From this hour is complexion: lye there Arcite,
 Thou art a changling to him, a mere Gipsie.
 And this the noble Bodie: I am fotted,
 Utterly lost: My Virgins faith has fled me.
 For if my Brother, but even now had ask'd me
 Whether I lov'd, I had run mad for Arcite.
 Now if my Sister; More for Palamon,
 Stand both together: now, come ask me Brother,
 Alas, I know not: ask me now sweet Sister,
 I may go look; what a mere child is Fancie,
 That having two fair gawds of equal sweetness,
 Cannot distinguish, but must cry for both.

Enter Emil. and Gent.

Emil. How now Sir?
 Gent. From the Noble Duke your Brother
 Madam, I bring you news: the Knights are come.
 Emil. To end the quarrel?
 Gent. Yes.
 Emil. Would I might end first:
 What sins have I committed, chaste Diana,
 That my unspotted youth must now be foil'd
 With blond of Princes? and my Chastity
 Be made the Altar, where the Lives of Lovers,
 Two greater, and two better never yet
 Made Mothers joy, must be the sacrifice
 To my unhappy Beauty?

Enter

Enter Theseus, Hippolita, Perithous, and Attendants

Thes. Bring 'em in quickly,
By any means I long to see 'em.
Your two contending Lovers are return'd,
And with them their fair Knights: Now my fair Sister,
You must love one of them.

Emil. I had rather both,
So neither for my sake should fall untimely.

Enter Messenger. Curtis.

Thes. Who saw 'em?

Per. I a while.

Gent. And I.

Thes. From whence come you, Sir?

Mess. From the Knights.

Thes. Pray speak

You that have seen them, what they are.

Mess. I will Sir,

And truly what I think: six braver spirits
Than those they have brought, (if we judge by the outside)
I never saw, nor read of: he that stands

In the first place with Arcite, by his seeming
Should be a stout man, by his face a Prince,
(His very looks so say him) his complexion,
Nearer a brown, than black; stern, and yet noble,
Which shews him hardy, fearless, proud of dangers:
The circles of his eyes, shew fair within him.

And as a heated Lion, so he looks:

His hair hangs long behind him, black and shining
Like Ravens wings: his shoulders broad, and strong,
Arm'd long and round, and on his Thigh a Sword
Hung by a curious Bauldrick: when he frowns
To seal his Will with, better o' my conscience
Was never Soldiers friend.

Thes. Thou hast well describ'd him.

Per. Yet, a great deal short

Methinks, of him that's first with Palamon.

Thes. Pray speak him friend.

Per. I ghefs he is a Prince too,

And if it may be, greater; for his show
Has all the ornament of honor in't:

He's somewhat bigger than the Knight he spoke of,
But of a face far sweeter; his complexion
Is (as a ripe Grape) ruddy: he has felt
Without doubt, what he fights for, and so apter
To make this cause his own: in's face appears
All the fair hopes of what he undertakes,
And when he's angry, then a settled valour
(Not tainted with extremes) runs through his body,
And guides his arm to brave things: Fear he cannot,
He shews no such soft temper, his head's yellow,
Hard hair'd, and curl'd, thick twin'd, like Ivy tops,
Nor to undoe with thunder; in his face
The Livery of the warlike Maid appears,
Pure red and white, for yet no beard has blest him.

And in his rowling eyes sits victory,

As if she ever meant to correct his valour:

His Nose stands high, a Character of honor,

His red Lips, after fights, are fit for Ladies.

Emil. Must these men die too?

Per. When he speaks, his tongue

Sounds like a Trumpet; all his lineaments
Are as a man would wish 'em, strong and clean,
He wears a well-steel'd Axe, the staffe of Gold,
His age some five and twenty.

Mess. There's another,

A little man, but of a tough soul, seeming

As great as any, fairer promises

In such a Body yet I never look'd on.

Per. Oh he that's freckle fac'd?

Mess. The same my Lord,

Are they not sweet ones?

Per. Yes, they are well.

Mess. Methinks.

Being so few, and well dispos'd, they shew
Great, and fine Art in nature, he's white hair'd,
Not wanton white, but such a manly colour
Next to an aborn, tough, and nimble set,
Which shows an active soul: his arms are brawny
Lin'd with strong sinews: to the shoulder-piece,
Gently they swell, like Women new conceiv'd,
Which speaks him prone to labour, never fainting
Under the weight of Arms, stout hearted still,
But when he frowns, a Tiger; he's greyey'd,
Which yields compassion where he conquers: sharp
To spie advantages, and where he finds 'em,
He's swift to make 'em his: He does no wrongs,
Nor takes none; he's round fac'd, and when he smiles
He shows a Lover, when he frowns, a Soldier:
About his head he wears the winners oak,
And in it stuck the favour of his Lady:
His age, some six and thirty. In his hand
He bears a Charging Staffe, emboid with Silver.

Thes. Are they all thus?

Per. They are all the sons of honor.

Thes. Now as I have a soul, I long to see 'em,
Lady, you shall see men sight now.

Hip. I wish it,

But not the cause my Lord; They would shew
Bravely about the Titles of two Kingdoms;
'Tis pity Love should be so tyrannous:
Oh my soft-hearted Sister, what think you?
Weep not, till they weep blood: Wench it must be.

Thes. You have steel'd 'em with your Beauty: honor'd
To you I give the Field; pray order it, (friend
Fitting the persons that must use it.

Per. Yes Sir.

Thes. Come, I'll go visit 'em: I cannot stay,
Their fame has fir'd me so; till they appear,
Good friend be royal.

Per. There shall want no bravery.

Emil. Poor wench go weep, for whosoever wins,
Looses a noble Cousin, for thy sins.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Jailer, Wooer, Doctor.

Doct. Her distraction is more at some time of the Moon,
Than at other some, is it not?

Jay. She is continually in a harmless distemper, sleeps
Little, altogether without appetite, save often drinking,
Dreaming of another world, and a better; and what Broken piece of matter so e'er she's about, the name
Palamon lards it, that she farces ev'ry business.

Enter Daughter.

Withal, sits it to every question; Look where
She comes, you shall perceive her behaviour:

Daugh. I have forgot it quite; the burden on't was Down
A down a: and penn'd by no worse man, than Girardo, Emilias Schoolmaster; he's as Fantastical too, as ever he may goe upon's legs,
For in the next world will Dido see Palamon, and Then will she be out of love with Aeneas.

Doct. What stuff's here? poor soul.

Jay. Ev'n thus all day long.

Daugh. Now for this Charm, that I told you of, you must Bring a piece of silver on the tip of your tongue,
Or no ferry: then if it be your chance to come where
The blessed spirits, as there's a sight now; we Maids
That have our Livers, perisht, crackt to pieces with Love, we shall come there, and do nothing all day long
But pick Flowers with Proserpine, then will I make Palamon a Nosegay, then let him mark me, — then.

Doct. How prettily she's amiss? note her a little farther.
Dau. Faith I'll tell you, sometime we goe to Barly-break,
 We of the blessed; alas, 'tis a sore life they have i' th'
 Other place, such burning, frying, boiling, hissing,
 Howling, chatt'ring, cursing, oh they have shrowd
 Measure, take heed; if one be mad, or hang, or Drown themselves, thither they goe, Jupiter blefs
 Us, and there shall we be put in a Cauldron of Lead, and Usurers greafe, amongst a whole million of Cut-purses, and there boil like a Gamon of Bacon
 That will never be enough. Exit.

Doct. How her brain coins?
Dau. Lords and Courtiers, that have got Maids with child, they are in this place, they shall stand in fire up to the Navel, and in Ice up to th' heart, and there th' offending part burns, and the deceiving part freezes; in troth a very grie-vious punishment, as one would think, for such a Trifle, believe me one would marry a leprous witch, to be rid on't
 I'll assure you.

Doct. How she continues this fancie? 'Tis not an engrafted madnes but a most thick, and profound melancholly.

Dau. To hear there a proud Lady, and a proud City wife, howl together: I were a beast, and I'd call it good sport: one cries, oh this sinoak, another this fire; one cries oh that I ever did it behind the Arras, and then howls;
 th' other curses a suing fellow and her Garden-house.

Sings. I will be true, my Stars, my Fate, &c.

Jay. What think you of her, Sir? (minister to. Exit Dau.)

Doct. I think she has a perturbed mind, which I cannot

Jay. Alas, what then?

Doct. Understand you, she ever affected any man, e'r
 She beheld Palamon?

Jay. I was once, Sir, in great hope she had fix'd her
 Liking on this Gentleman my friend.

Woo. I did think so too, and would account I had a great Pen'worth on't, to give half my state, that both
 She and I at this present stood unfaindly on the same terms. (the

Doct. That intemperate surfet of her eye, hath distemper'd
 Other senses, they may return and settle again to Execute their preordained faculties, but they are Now in a most extravagant vagary. This you Must doe, confine her to a place, where the light
 May rather seem to steal in, than be permitted; take Upon you (young Sir, her friend) the name of Palamon; say you come to eat with her, and to Commune of Love; this will catch her attention, for This her mind beats upon; other objects that are Inferted 'tween her mind and eye, become the pranks
 And frisks of her madnes; sing to her such green
 Songs of Love, as she says Palamon hath sung in Prison; Come to her, stuck in as sweet Flowers as the Season is mistris of, and thereto make an addition of Some other compounded odors, which are grateful to the Sense: all this shall become Palamon, for Palamon can Sing, and Palamon is sweet, and ev'ry good thing desire
 To eat with her, carve her, drink to her, and still Among, intermingle your petition of grace and acceptance
 Into her favour: learn what Maids have been her Companions, and Play-pheers; and let them repair to Her with Palamon in their mouths, and appear with Tokens, as if they suggested for him, it is a falshood
 She is in, which is with falshoods to be combated.

This may bring her to eat, to sleep, and reduce what's Now out of square in her, into their former Law, and Regiment; I have seen it approved, how many times
 I know not, but to make the number more, I have Great hope in this. I will between the passages of This project, come in with my aplyance: Let us
 Put it in execution; and hasten the success, which doubt not
 Will bring forth comfort. Florish. Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Theseus, Perithous, Hippolita, Attendants.

Thes. NOW let 'em enter, and before the gods
 Tender their holy Prayers: Let the Temples
 Burn bright with sacred fires, and the Altars
 In hallowed clouds commend their swelling Incense
 To those above us: Let no due be wanting,

Florish of Cornets.

They have a noble work in hand, will honor
 The very powers that love 'em.

Enter Palamon and Arcite, and their Knights.

Per. Sir, they enter.

Thes. You valiant and strong-hearted enemies
 You royal German foes, that this day come
 To blow that nearness out, that flames between ye;
 Lay by your anger for an hour, and Dove-like
 Before the holy Altars of your helpers
 (The all-fear'd gods) bow down your stubborn bodies,
 Your Ire is more than mortal; So your help be,
 And as the gods regard ye, fight with Justice,
 I'll leave you to your prayers, and betwixt ye
 I part my wishes.

Per. Honor crown the worthiest.

Exit Theseus and his train.

Pal. The glass is running now that cannot finish
 Till one of us expire: think you but thus,
 That were there ought in me which strove to shew
 Mine enemy in this business, were't one eye
 Against another: Arm oppress'd by Arm:
 I would destroy th' offender, Coz. I would Though parcel of my self: then from this gather
 How I should tender you.

Arc. I am in labour

To push your name, your antient love, our kindred
 Out of my memory; and i' th' self-same place
 To feat something I would confound: so hoist we
 The sails, that must these vessels port, even where
 The heavenly Lymiter pleases.

Pal. You speak well;

Before I turn, let me embrace thee Cofin
 This I shall never do agen.

Arc. One farewell.

Pal. Why let it be so: Farewel Coz.

Exeunt Palamon and his Knights.

Arc. Farewel Sir;

Knights, Kinsmen, Lovers, yea my Sacrifices
 True worshipers of Mars, whose spirit in you
 Expells the seeds of fear, and th' apprehension
 Which still is farther off it, goe with me
 Before the god of our profession: There
 Require of him the hearts of Lions, and
 The breath of Tygers, yea, the fierceness too,
 Yea, the speed also, to go on, I mean
 Else wish we to be snails: you know my prize
 Must be dragg'd out of bloud, force and great fear
 Must put my Garland on, where she sticks
 The Queen of Flowers: our intercession then
 Must be to him that makes the Camp, a Cestron
 Brim'd with the blood of men: give me your aid
 And bend your spirits towards him. They kneel.

Thou mighty one, that with thy power hast turn'd
 Green Neptune into purple.
 Comets prewarn, whose havock in vast Field
 Unearthed skulls proclaim, whose breath blows down,
 The teeming Cores soyzon, who dost pluck

With

With hand armenipotent from both blew clouds,
The mason'd Turrets, that both mak't and break't
The stony girths of Cities: me thy pupil,
Youngeſt follower of thy Drum, intruſt this day .
With military ſkill, that to thy laud
I may advance my ſtreamer, and by thee,
Be ſtil'd the Lord o' th' day, give me great Mars
Some token of thy Pleaſure.

Here they fall on their faces as formerly, and there is heard clanging of Armour, with a ſhort Thunder, as the buſt of a battel, whereupon they all riſe, and bow to the Altar.

Oh great Corrector of enormous times,
Shaker of o'er-rank States, thou grand decider
Of duſty, and old Titles, that heal't with blood
The earth when it is ſick, and curſt the world
O' th' pleuſie of people; I do take Thy ſigns auſpiciously, and in thy name
To my deſign; march boldly, let us goe.

Exeunt.

Enter Palamon and his Knights, with the former obſervance.

Pal. Our Stars muſt gliſter with new fire, or be
To day extindt; our argument is love,
Which if the goddeſs of it grant, ſhe gives
Victory too, then blend your ſpirits with mine,
You, whoſe free nobleneſs do make my cauſe
Your personal hazard; to the goddeſs Venus
Commend we our proceeding, and implore
Her power unto our partie.

Here they kneel as formerly.

Hail Sovereign Queen of ſecrets, who haſt power
To call the fierceſt Tyrant from his rage;
And weep unto a Girl; that haſt the might Even with an eye-glance, to choak Mars's Drum
And turn th' alarm to whiſpers, that canſt make
A Cripple ſoriſh with his Crutch, and cure him
Before Apollo; that may't force the King
To be his ſubjects vaſſal, and induce Stale gravity to, the pould Batchelor
Whoſe youth like wanton boys through Bonfires
Have ſkipt thy flame, at ſeventy, thou canſt catch
And make him to the ſcorn of his hoarſe throat
Abuſe young lays of Love; what godlike power
Haſt thou not power upon? To Phabus thou
Add't flames, hotter than his the heavenly fires
Did ſcorch his mortal Son, thine him; the huntreſs
All moiſt and cold, ſome ſay, began to throw
Her Bow away, and ſigh: take to thy grace
Me thy vow'd Soldier, who do bear thy yoaſe
As'twere a wreath of Roſes, yet is heavier
Than Lead it ſelf, ſtings more than Nettles;
I have never been foul-mouth'd againſt thy Law,
Ne'er reveal'd ſecret, for I knew none; would not
Had I ken'd all that were; I never practis'd
Upon mans wife, nor would the Libels read
Of liberal wits: I never at great feaſts
Sought to betray a beauty, but have bluſh'd
At ſimpring Sirs that did: I have been harſh
To large Confellors, and have hotly ask'd 'em
If they had Mothers, I had one, a woman,
And women 't were they wrong'd. I knew a man
Of eighty winters, this I told them, who
A Laſs of fourteen bridged, 'twas thy power
To put life into duſt, the aged Cramp
Had ſcrew'd his ſquare foot round,
The Gout had knit his fingers into knots,
Torturing Convulſions from his globy eies,
Had almoſt drawn their ſpheres, that what was life
In him ſeem'd torture: this Anatomie
Had by his young fair Sphere a Boy, and I
Believ'd it was his, for ſhe ſwore it was,

And who would not believe her? brief I am
To thoſe that prate, and have done; no Companion
To thoſe that boaſt and have not; a deſyer
To thoſe that would and cannot; a Rejoycer.
Yea him I do not love, that tells cloſe offices
The fouleſt way, nor names concealments in
The holdeſt language, ſuch a one I am,
And vow that lover never yet made ſigh
Truer than I. Oh then moſt ſoft ſweet goddeſs
Give me the victory of this queſtion, which
Is true loves merit, and bleſs me with a ſign
Of thy great pleaſure.

Here Muſick is heard, Doves are ſeen to flutter, they fall again upon their faces, then on their knees.

Pal. Oh thou that from cleven to ninety reign't
In mortal boſoms, whoſe Chafe is this world
And we in Herds thy Game; I give thee thanks
For this fair Token, which being laid unto Mine innocent true heart, arms in aſſurance
My body to this buſineſs; Let us riſe

They bow.

And bow before the goddeſs: Time comes on. Exeunt.
Still Muſick of Records.

Enter Emilia in white, her hair about her ſhoulders, a wheaten wreath: One in white, holding up her train, her hair ſtuck with Flowers: One before her carrying a ſilver Hyal, in which is conveyed Incenſe and ſweet odors, which being ſet upon the Altar, her Muids ſtanding aloof, ſhe ſets fire to it, then they cur'tſy and kneel.

Emil. Oh ſacred, ſhadowy, cold and conſtant Queen,
Abandoner of Revels, mute contemplative,
Sweet, ſolitary, white as chaſte, and pure
As wind-fan'd Snow, who to thy femal Knights
Allow't no more blood than will make a bluſh,
Which is their Orders Robe. I here thy Priest
Am humbled for thine Altar, oh vouchſafe
With that thy rare green eye, which never yet
Beheld thing maculate, look on thy Virgin,
And ſacred ſilver Miſtriſs, lend thine ear
(Which ne'r heard ſcurril term, into whoſe port Ne'er entred wanton ſound,) to my petition
Season'd with holy fear; this is my laſt
Of veſtal office, I'm Bride-habited,
But Maiden-hearted: a Husband I have pointed,
But do not know him, out of two, I ſhould
Chooſe one, and pray for his ſucceſs, but I
Am guiltleſs of election of mine eyes,
Were I to loſe one, they are equal precious,
I could doome neither, that which periſh'd ſhould
Go to't unſentenc'd: Therefore moſt modeſt Queen,
He of the two Pretenders, that beſt loves me
And has the trueſt Title in't, let him
Take off my wheaten Garland, or elſe grant
The file and quality I hold, I may Continue in thy Band.

Here the Hind vaniſhes under the Altar: and in the place aſcends a Roſe-Tree, having one Roſe upon it.

See what our General of Ebbs and Flows
Out from the bowels of her holy Altar
With ſacred Act advances: But one Roſe,
If well inſpir'd, this Battel ſhall confound
Both theſe brave Knights, and I a Virgin Flower
Muſt grow alone unpluck'd.

Here is heard a ſodain twang of Inſtruments, and the Roſe falls from the Tree.

The Flower is fall'n, the Tree deſcends: oh Miſtriſs
Thou here diſchargeſt me, I ſhall be gather'd,
I think ſo, but I know not thine own Will;

Unclasp the Mistry : I hope she's pleas'd,
Her Signs were gracious.

They curt'sey, and Exeunt.

Scenes Seconds.

Enter Doctor, Jaylor, and Wooer, in habit of Palamon

Doct. Has this advice I told you, done any good upon her?

Woo. Oh very much; the Maids that kept her company
Have half perswaded her that I am Palamon; within this Half hour she came smiling to me, and ask'd me what I
Would eat, and when I would kiss her: I told her,
Presently, and kiss her twice.

Doct. 'Twas well done; twenty times had been far better,
For there the cure lies mainly.

Woo. Then she told me
She would watch with me to night, for well she knew
What hour my fit would take me.

Doct. Let her do so,
And when your fit comes, fit her home,
And presently.

Wooer. She would have me sing.

Doct. You did so?

Woo. No.

Doct. 'Twas very ill done then,
You should observe her ev'ry way.

Woo. Alas

I have no voice Sir, to confirm her that way.

Doct. That's all one, if ye make a noise,
If she intreat again, do any thing,
Lie with her if she ask you.

Jail. Hoa there Doctor.

Doct. Yes, in the way of cure.

Jail. But first, by your leave.

I' th' way of honesty.

Doct. That's but a niceness,
Nev'r cast your child away for honesty;
Cure her first this way, then if she will be honest,
She has the path before her.

Jail. Thank ye Doctor.

Doct. Pray bring her in,
And let's see how she is.

Jail. I will, and tell her
Her Palamon staies for her: but Doctor,
Methinks you are i' th' wrong still.

Exit Jaylor.

Doct. Goe, goe: you Fathers are fine fools: her honesty?
And we should give her physick till we find that:

Woo. Why, do you think she is not honest, Sir?

Doct. How old is she?

Woo. She's eighteen.

Doct. She may be,

But that's all one, 'tis nothing to our purpose,
What ev'r her Father saies, if you perceive
Her Mood inclining that way that I spoke of.
Videlicet, The way of flesh, you have me.

Woo. Yes very well Sir.

Doct. Please her appetite
And do it home, it cures her ipso facto,
The melancholly humor that infects her.

Woo. I am of your mind, Doctor.

Enter Jaylor, Daughter, Maid.

Doct. You'll find it so; she comes, pray honor her.

Jail. Come, your Love Palamon stays for you child,
And has done this long hour, to visit you

Daugh. I thank him for his gentle patience,
He's a kind Gentleman, and I am much bound to him,
Did you never see the horse he gave me?

Jail. Yes.

Daugh. How do you like him?

Jail. He's a very fair one

Daugh. You never saw him dance?

Jail. No.

Daugh. I have often,
He dances very finely, very comely,
And for a Jigg, come cut and long tail to him,
He turns ye like a Top.

Jail. That's fine indeed.

Daugh. He'll dance the Morris twenty mile an hour,
And that will founder the best hobby-horse
(If I have any skill) in all the parish,
And gallops to the turn of Light a' love,
What think you of this horse?

Jail. Having these virtues
I think he might be brought to play at Tennis.

Daugh. Alas that's nothing.

Jail. Can he write and read too?

Daugh. A very fair hand, and casts himself th' accounts
Of all his Hay and Provender: that Hostler
Must rise betime that cozens him; you know
The Chestnut Mare the Duke has?

Jail. Very well.

Daugh. She is horribly in love with him, poor beast,
But he is like his Master, coy and scornful.

Jail. What Dowry has she?

Daugh. Some two hundred Bottles,
And twenty strike of Oats; but he'll ne'er have her;
He lissps, in's neighing, able to entice
A Millers Mare,
He'll be the death of her,

Doct. What stuff she utters?

Jail. Make curt'sie, here your love comes.

Woo. Pretty foul

How doe ye? that's a fine Maid, there's a curt'sie.

Daugh. Yours to command i' th' way of honesty;
How far is't now to th' end o' th' world my Masters?

Doct. Why a days journey wench.

Daugh. Will you go with me?

Woo. What shall we do there wench?

Daugh. Why play at Stool-ball.
What is there else to do?

Woo. I am content

If we shall keep our wedding there

Daugh. 'Tis true

For there I will assure you, we shall find
Some blind Priest for the purpose, that will venture
To marry us, for here they are nice and foolish;
Besides, my Father must be hang'd to morrow
And that would be a blot i' th' business
Are not you Palamon?

Woo. Do not you know me?

Daugh. Yes, but you care not for me; I have nothing
But this poor Petticoat, and two course Smocks.

Woo. That's all one, I will have you.

Daugh. Will you surely?

Woo. Yes, by this fair hand will I.

Daugh. We'll to bed then.

Woo. Ev'n when you will.

Daugh. Oh Sir, you would fain be nibbling.

Woo. Why do you rub my kifs off?

Daugh. 'Tis a sweet one,
And will perfume me finely against the wedding.
Is not this your Cofin Arcite?

Doct. Yes Sweet heart,
And I am glad my Cofin Palamon
Has made so fair a choice.

Daugh. Do you think he'll have me?

Doct. Yes without doubt.

Daugh. Do you think so too?

Jail. Yes.

Daugh. We shall have many children: Lord, how y'are
My Palamon I hope will grow too finely
Now he's at liberty: alas poor Chicken,
He was kept down with hard Meat, and ill Lodging,
But I'll kifs him up again.

Enter

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. What do you here? you'll lose the noblest fight,
That e'er was see.

Fail. Are they i'th' field?

Mess. They are
You bear a charge there too.

Fail. I'll away straight
I must ev'n leave you here.

Doct. Nay, we'll goe with you;
I will not loose the Fight.

Fail. How did you like her?

Doct. I'll warrant you within these three or four days
I'll make her right again. You must not from her
But still preserve her in this way.

Woo. I will.

Doct. Let's get her in.

Woo. Come Sweet, we'll go to dinner
And then we'll play at Cards.

Daugh. And shall we kifs too?

Woo. A hundred times.

Daugh. And twenty.

Woo. I, and twenty.

Daugh. And then we'll sleeptogether.

Doct. Take her offer.

Woo. Yes marry will we.

Daugh. But you shall not hurt me.

Woo. I will not Sweet.

Daugh. If you do (Love) I'll cry.

Flourish Exennt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter These us, Hippolita, Emilia, Perithous: and some Attendants, T. Tuck: Curtis.

Emil. I'll no step further.

Per. Will you loose this sight?

Emil. I had rather see a Wren hawk at a Fly
Than this decision; ev'ry blow that falls
Threats a brave life, each stroke laments
The place whereon it falls, and sounds more like
A Bell, than Blade, I will stay here,
It is enough, my hearing shall be punish'd,
With what shall happen, 'gainst the which there is No deafing, but to hear; not taint mine eye
With dread fights, it may shun.

Per. Sir, my good Lord
Your Sifter will no further.

Thes. Oh she must.

She shall see deeds of Honor in their kind,
Which sometime shew well pencill'd. Nature now
Shall make, and act the Story, the belief
Both seal'd with eye, and ear; you must be present,
You are the victors meed, the price, and garland
To crown the Questions Title.

Emil. Pardon me,
If I were there, I'd wink

Thes. You must be there;
Thistrial is as 'twere i' th' night, and you
The only Star to shine.

Emil. I am extinct,
There is but envy in that light, which shows
The one the other: darkness which ever was
The dame of horror; who does stand accurst
Of many mortal Millions, may even now
By casting her black mantle over both
That neither could find other, get her self
Some part of a good name, and many a murthes
Set off whereto she's guilty.

Hip. You must go.

Emil. In faith I will not.

Thes. Why the Knights must kindle
Their valour at your eye: know of this war

You are the Treasure, and must needs be by
To give the Service pay.

Emil. Sir, pardon me,
The Title of a Kingdom may be try'd
Out of it self.

Thes. Well, well then, at your pleasure,
Those that remain with you, could wish their office
To any of their enemies.

Hip. Farewel Sister,
I am like to know your Husband 'fore your self
By some small start of time, he whom the gods
Doe of the two, know best, I pray them, he
Be made your Lot,

Enter Theseus, Hippolita, Perithous, &c.

Emil. Arcite is gently visag'd; yet his eye
Is like an Engine bent, or a sharp weapon
In a soft sheath; mercy, and manly courage
Are bedfellows in his visage: Palamon
Has a most menacing aspect, his brow
Is grav'd, and seems to bury what it frowns on,
Yet sometimes 'tis not so, but alters to
The quality of his thoughts; long time his eye
Will dwell upon his object. Melancholly
Becomes him nobly; so does Arcite's mirth,
But Palamon's sadness is a kind of mirth,
So mingled, as if mirth did make him sad.
And sadness, merry; those darker humors that Stick mis-becomingly on others, on them
Live in fair dwelling.

Cornets. Trumpets sound as to a Charge.

Hark how your spurs to spirit doe incite
The Princes to their proof, Arcite may win me,
And yet may Palamon wound Arcite, to
The spoiling of his figure. Oh what pity Enough for such a chance; if I were by
I might do hurt, for they would glance their eies Toward my Seat, and in that motion might Omit a Ward, or forfeit an offence
Which crav'd that very time: it is much better

(Cornets. A great cry, and noise within, crying a Palamon.)

I am not there, oh better never born
Than minister to such harm, what is the chance?

Enter Servant.

Ser. The cry's a Palamon.

Emil. Then he has won: 'twas ever likely,
He look'd all grace and success, and he is Doubtless the prim'st of men: I prethee run
And tell me how it goes.

Shout, and Cornets: crying a Palamon.

Ser. Still Palamon.

Emil. Run and enquire, poor Servant thou hast lost,
Upon my right side still I wore thy Picture,
Palamon's on the left, why so I know not,
I had no end in't; else chance would have it so.

Another cry and shout within, and Cornets.

On the sinister side the heart lies; Palamon
Had the best bo'ing chance: this burst of clamor
Is sure th' end o'th' combat.

Enter Servant.

Ser. They said that Palamon had Arcite's body
Within an inch o'th' Pyramid, that the cry
Was general a Palamon: but anon,
Th' Assistants made a brave redemption, and
The two bold Tytlers, at this instant are Hand to hand at it.

Emil. Were they metamorphos'd
Both into one; oh why? there were no woman
Worth so compos'd a man: their single share,

Their

The prejudice of disparity values shortness
Cornets. Cry within, Arcite, Arcite.
 To any Lady breathing—More exulting?
Palamon Kill?
Sir. Nay, now the sound is Arcite.
Emil. I prethee lay attention to the Cry.
Cornets. A great shout, and cry, Arcite, victory.
 Set both thine ears to th' business.
Sir. The cry is
Arcite, and victory, hark Arcite, victory,
 The Combats consummation is proclaim'd
 By the wind Instruments.
Emil. Half fights saw
 That Arcite was no babe; god's lye, his richness
 And costliness of spirit lookt through him; it could
 No more be hid in him, than fire in flax,
 Than humble banks can go to law with waters,
 That drift winds, force to raging: I did think
 Good Palamon would miscarry, yet I knew not
 Why I did think so; Our reasons are not prophets
 When oft our fancies are: they are coming off:
 Alas poor Palamon.

Enter Theseus, Hippolita, Perithous, Arcite as Victor and Attendants, &c.

Thef. Lo, where our Sister is in expectation,
 Yet quaking, and unsetled: fairest Emilia,
 The gods by their Divine arbitrament
 Have given you this Knight, he is a good one
 As ever struck at head: Give me your hands;
 Receive you her, you him, be plighted with
 A love that grows, as you decay;
Arcite. Emily.
 To buy you I have lost what's dearest to me,
 Save what is bought, and yet I purchase cheaply,
 As I do rate your value.
Thef. Oh loved Sister,
 He speaks now of as brave a Knight as e'er
 Did spur a noble Steed: surely the gods
 Would have him die a batchelor, lest his race
 Should show i'th' world too godlike: his behaviour
 So charm'd me, that methought Alcides was
 To him a Sow of Lead: if I could praise
 Each part of him to th' all; I have spoke, your Arcite
 Did not lose by't; for he that was thus good
 Encountred yet his Better, I have heard
 Two emulous Philomels, beat the ear o'th' night
 With their contentious throats, now on the higher,
 Anon the other, then again the first,
 And by and by out-breasted, that the sense
 Could not be judge between 'em: so it far'd
 Good space between these kinsmen; till heavens did
 Make hardly one the winner: wear the Garland
 With joy that you have won: for the subdu'd,
 Give them our present Justice, since I know
 Their lives but pinch 'em, let it here be done:
 The Scene's not for our seeing, goe we hence,
 Right joyful, with some sorrow. Arm your prize,
 I know you will not lose her: Hippolita
 I see one eye of yours conceives a tear
 The which it will deliver.

Cornets.

Florish.

Emil. Is this winning?
 Oh all you heavenly powers, where is your mercy?
 But that your wills have said it must be so,
 And charge me live to comfort this unfriended,
 This miserable Prince that cuts away
 A life more worthy from him, than all women;
 I should, and would die too,
Hip. Infinite pity
 That four such eyes should be so fix'd on one
 That two must needs be blind for't, Thef. So it is.

Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Palamon and his Knights pinion'd: Jailor Executioner, &c. Gard.

There's many a man alive that hath out-liv'd
 The love o'th' people, yea, i'th' self-same state
 Stands many a Father with his child; some comfort
 We have by so considering: we expire
 And not without mens pity. To live still,
 Have their good wishes, we prevent
 The lothsome misery of age, beguile
 The Gout and Rheum, that in lag hours attend
 For grey approachers; we come towards the gods
 Young, and unwapper'd, not halting under Crimes
 Many and stale: that sure shall please the gods
 Sooner than such, to give us Nectar with 'em,
 For we are more clear Spirits. My dear kinsmen.
 Whose lives (for this poor comfort) are laid down,
 You have sold 'em too too cheap.

1 K. What ending could be
 Of more content? o'er us the victors have Fortune, whose Title is as momentary,
 As to us death is certain: a grain of honor
 They not o'er-weigh us.

2 K. Let us bid farewell;
 And, with our patience, anger tottering Fortune,
 Who at her certain't reels.

3 K. Come: who begins?

Pal. Ev'n he that led you to this Banquet, shall Taste to you all: ah ha my Friend, my Friend,
 Your gentle daughter gave me freedom once;
 You'll see't done now for ever: pray how does she?
 I heard she was not well; her kind of ill
 Gave me some sorrow.

Jail. Sir, she's well restor'd,
 And to be married shortly.

Pal. By my short life
 I am most glad on't; 'tis the latest thing
 I shall be glad of, prethee tell her so:
 Commend me to her, and to piece her portion Tender her this.

1 K. Nay, let's be offerers all.

2 K. Is it a maid?

Pal. Verily I think so,
 A right good creature, more to me deserving
 Than I can quight or speak of.

All K. Commend us to her. They give their purses.

Jail. The gods requite you all,
 And make her thankful.

Pal. Adieu; and let my life be now as short,
 As my leave taking. Lies on the Block.

1 K. Lead courageous Cofin.

1. 2. K. We'll follow cheerfully.

A great noise within, crying, run, save, hold.

Enter in haste a Messenger.

Mess. Hold, hold, oh hold, hold, hold.

Enter Pirithous in haste.

Pir. Hold, hoa: It is a curfed haste you made
 If you have done so quickly: noble Palamon,
 The gods will shew their glory in a life.
 That thou art yet to lead.

Pal. Can that be,
 When Venus I have said is false? How do things fare?

Pir. Arise great Sir, and give the tidings ear
 That are most early sweet, and bitter.

Pal. What
 Hath wak't us from our dream
Pir. Lift then: your Cofin

Mounted upon a Steed that Emily
 Did first bellow on him, a black one, owing
 Not a hayr worth of white, which some will say
 Weakens his price, and many will not buy
 His goodnes with this note : Which superstition
 Hear finds allowance : On this horse is Arcite
 Trotting the stones of Athens, which the Calkins
 Did rather tell, than trample ; For the horse
 Would make his length a mile, if't pleas'd his Rider
 To put pride in him : as he thus went counting
 The flinty pavement, dancing as t'were to'th' Musick
 His own hoofs made ; (For as they say from iron Came Musicks origen) what envious Flint,
 Cold as old Saturne, and like him possicst
 With fire malevolent, darted a Spark,
 Or what feirce sulphur esse, to this end made,
 I comment not ; The hot horse, hot as fire,
 Took Toy at this, and fell to what disorder
 His power could give his will, bounds, comes on end,
 Forgets-school dooing, being therein train'd,
 And of kiud mannage, pig-like he whines
 At the sharp Rowell, which he frets at rather Than any jot obeyes ; Seeks all foul means
 Of boystrous and rough lad'rie, to dis-seat
 His Lord, that kept it bravely : When nought ferv'd,
 When neither Curb would crack, girth break, nor diff'ring plunges
 Dis-root his Rider whence he grew, but that
 He kept him 'tween his legs, on his hind hoofs

(on end he stands)
 That Arcites, legs being higher than his head
 Seem'd with strange art to hang : His victors wreath
 Even then fell off his head : And presently
 Backward the jade comes o'er, and his full poyze
 Becomes the Riders load : Yet is he living,
 But such a vessell 'tis that floats but for
 The surge that next approaches : He much desires
 To have some speech with you : Loe he appears.

Enter Theseus, Hippolita, Emilia, Arcite, in a chair.

Pal. O miserable end of our alliance
 The gods are mightie Arcite, if thy heart,
 Thy worthie, manly heart be yet unbroken :
 Give me thy last words, I'm Palamon,
 One that yet loves thee dying.

Arc. Take Emilia
 And with her, all the worlds joy : Reach thy hand,
 Farewell : I have told my last hour ; I was false,
 Yet never treacherous : Forgive me Cosen :

One kifs from fair Emilia : 'Tis done :
 Take her : I die.

Pal. Thy brave soul seek Elizium.

Emil. I'll close thine eyes, Prince ; Blessed souls be with thee

Thou art a right good man, and while I live,
 This day I give to tears.

Pal. And I to honor.

These. In this place first you fought : Even very here
 I fundred you, acknowledg to the gods

Our thanks that you are living :

His part is play'd, and though it were too short
 He did it well : your day is length'ned, and
 The blissfull dew of heaven do's arowze you :
 The powerfull Venus, well hath grac'd her Altar,
 And given you your love : Our Master Mars,
 Haft vouch'd his Oracle, and to Arcite, gave
 The grace of the Contention : So the Deities
 Have shew'd due justice : Bear this hence.

Pal. O Cosen,

That we should things desire, which doe cost us
 The los of our desire ; That nought could buy
 Dear love, but los of dear love.

These. Never Fortune

Did play a subtler Game : The conquer'd triumphs,
 The victor has the Los : yet in the passage,
 The gods have been most equall : Palamon,
 Your kinsman hath confest the right o'th' Lady
 Did lye in you, for you first saw her, and Even then proclaim'd your fancie : He restor'd her
 As your stolen Jewell, and desir'd your spirit
 To send him hence forgiven ; The gods my justice
 Take from my hand, and they themselves become
 The Executioners : Lead your Lady off,
 And call your Lovers from the stage of death,
 Whom I adopt my Friends. A day or two
 Let us look sadly, and give grace unto
 The Funerall of Arcite, in whose end
 The visages of Bridegroomes we'll put on
 And smile with Palamon ; For whom an hour,
 But one hour since, I was as dearly sorry,
 As glad of Arcite : And am now as glad,
 As for him sorry. O you heavenly Charmers,
 What things you make of us ? For what we lack
 We laugh, for what we have, are sorry still,
 Are children in some kind. Let us be thankfull
 For that which is, and with you leave dispute
 That are above our question : Let's goe off,
 And bear us like the time.

EPILOGUE

! Would now aske ye how ye like the Play,
 But as it is with School Boys, cannot say,
 I'm cruell fearefull : pray yet stay a while,
 And let me look upon ye : No man smile ?
 Then it goes hard I see ; He that has Lov'd a young handsome wench then, show his face :
 'Tis strange if none be here, and if he will
 Against his Conscience let him hiss and kill
 Our Market : 'Tis in vain, I see to stay ye,

Have at the worst can come, then ; Now what say ye ?
 And yet mistake me not : I am not bold
 We have no such cause. If th' tale we have told (For 'tis no other) any way content ye)
 (For to that honest purpose it was ment ye)
 We have our end ; And ye shall have ere long
 I dare say many a better, to prolong
 Your old loves to us : We, and all our might,
 Rest at your service, Gentlemen, good night.

THE TRAGEDY

O F

Thierry and Theodoret.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Theodoret, Brunbalt, Bawdber.

BRUNHALT.

Axe me with these hot tainters?

Theodoret. You are too sudain;

I doe but gently tell you what becomes you
And what may bend your honor! how these courses

Of loose and lazie pleasures; not suspected

But done and known, your mind that grants no limit

And all your Actions follows, which loose people

Dare see but through a mist of circumstance

Dare term ambitious; all your wayes hide sores

Opening in the end to nothing but ulcers.

Your instruments like these may call the world

And with a fearfull clamor, to examine

Why, and to what we govern. From example

If not for vertues sake ye may be honest:

There have been great ones, good ones, and 'tis necessary

Because you are your self, and by your self

A self-peece from the touch of power and Justice,

You should command your self, you may imagine

Which cozens all the world, but chiefly women.

The name of greatness glorifies your actions

And strong power like a pent-house, promise

To fraide you from opinion; Take heed mother,

And let us all take heed these most abuse us

The sins we doe, people behold through opticks,

Which shews them ten times more than common vices,

And often multiplies them: Then what justice

Dare we inflict upon the weak offenders

When we are theeves our selves?

Brun. This is, Martell,

Studied and pen'd unto you, whose base person

I charge you by the love you owe a mother

And as you hope for blessings from her prayers,

Neither to give belief to, nor allowance,

Next I tell you Sir, you from whom obedience

Is so far fied, that you dare taxe a mother;

Nay further, brand her honor with your slanders,

And break into the treasures of her credit,

Your easiness is abused, your faith fraited

With lyes, malicious lyes, your merchant mischief,

He that never knew more trade then Tales, and tumbling

Suspicious into honest hearts; What you or he,

Or all the world dare lay upon my worth,

This for your poor opinions: I am mee,

And so will bear my self, whose truth and whiteness

Shall ever stand as far from these detections

As you from dutie, get you better servants

People of honest actions without ends,

And whip these knaves away, they eat your favours,

And turn 'em unto poysons: my known credit
Whom all the Courts o' this side Nile, have envied,
And happy she could site me, brought in question
Now in my hours of age and reverence,
When rather superstition should be rendred
And by a Rush that one days warmth
Hath shot up to this swelling; Give me justice,
Which is his life.

Theod. This is an impudence, and he must tell you, that till now mother brought ye a sons obedience, and now breaks it
Above the sufferance of a Son.

Bawd. Bless us?

For I doe now begin to feel my self

Turning into a halter, and the ladder

Turning from me, one pulling at my legs too.

Theod. These truths are no mans tales, but all mens troubles,

They are, though your strange greatness would out-stare u'm:

Witness the daily Libels, almost Ballads

In every place, almost in every Province,

Are made upon your lust, Tavern discourses,

Crowds cram'd with whispers; Nay, the holy Temples,

Are not without your curses: Now you would blush,

But your black tainted blood dare not appear

For fear I should fright that too.

Brun. O ye gods!

Theod. Do not abuse their names: They see your actions
And your conceal'd sins, though you work like Moles,
Lies level to their justice.

Brun. Art thou a Son?

Theod. The more my shame is of so bad a mother,

And more your wretchedness you let me be so;

But womam, for a mothers name hath left me

Since you have left your honor; Mend these ruins,

And build again that broken fame, and fairly;

Your most intemperate fires have burnt, and quickly

Within these ten days take a Monasterie,

A most strickt house; a house where none may whisper,

Where no more light is known but what may make ye

Believe there is a day where no hope dwells,

Nor comfort but in tears.

Brun. O miserie!

Theod. And there to cold repentance, and starv'd penance

Tye your succeeding days; Or curse me heaven

If all your gilded knaves, brokers, and bedders.

Even he you built from nothing, strong Protalyde,

Be not made ambling Geldings; All your maids,

If that name doe not sname 'em, fed with sponges

To suck away their rauckness; And your self

Onely to empty Pictures and dead Arras

Offer your old desires.

Brun. I will not curse you,

Nor lay a prophesie upon your pride,

Though heaven might grant me both: unthankfull, no,

I nourish'd ye, 'twas I, poor I groan'd for you,
'Twas I felt what you suffer'd, I lamented
When sickness or sad hours held back your sweetness;
'Twas I pay'd for your sleeps, I watch'd your wakings:
My daily cares and fears, that rid, plaid, walk'd,
Discours'd, discover'd, fed and fashion'd you
To what you are, and I am thus rewarded,

Theod. But that I know these tears I could dote on 'em,
And kneell to catch 'em as they fall, then knit 'em
Into an Armlet, ever to be honor'd;
But woman they are dangerous drops, deceitfull,
Full of the weeper, anger and ill nature.

Brun. In my last hours despis'd.

Theod. That Text should tell
How ugly it becomes you to err thus;
Your flames are spent, nothing but smoke maintains ye;
And those your favour and your bounty suffers
Lye not with you, they do but lay lust on you
And then embrace you as they caught a palfie;
Your power they may love, and like Spanish Jennetts
Commit with such a gust.

Bawd. I would take whipping,
And pay a fine now.

Exit Bawdber.

Theod. But were ye once disgraced,
Or fallen in wealth, like leaves they would flie from you,
And become browse for every beast; You will'd me
To stock my self with better friends, and servants,
With what face dare you see me, or any mankind,
That keep a race of such unheard of relicks,
Bawds, Leachers, Letches, female fornications,
And children in their rudiments to vices,
Old men to shew examples: and left Art
Should loose her self in act, to call back custome, Leave these, and live like Niobe. I told you how
And when your eyes have dropt away remembrance
Of what you were. I'm your Son! performe it.

Brun. Am I a woman, and no more power in me,
To tye this Tyger up, a foul to no end,
Have I got shame and lost my will? Brunbalt
From this accursed hour, forget thou bor'st him,
Or any part of thy blood gave him living,
Let him be to thee an Antipathy,
A thing thy nature sweats at, and turns backward:
Throw all the mischiefs on him that thy self,
Or woman worse than thou art, have invented,
And kill him drunk, or doubtfull.

Enter Bawdber, Protaldie, Lecure.

Bawd. Such a sweat,
I never was in yet, clipt of my minstrels,
My toys to prick up wenches withall; Uphold me,
It runs like snow-balls through me.

Brun. Now my varlets,
My slaves, my running thoughts, my executions.

Baw. Lord how she looks!

Brun. Hell take ye all.

Baw. We shall be gelt.

Brun. Your Mistres,
Your old and honor'd Mistres, you tyr'd curtals
Suffers for your base sins; I must be cloyster'd, Mew'd up to make me virtuous who can help this?
Now you stand still like Statues; Come Protaldye,
One kifs before I perish, kifs me strongly,
Another, and a third.

Lecure. I fear not gelding
As long she holds this way.

Brun. The young courser
That unlikt lump of mine, will win thy Mistres;
Must I be chast Protaldye?

Pro. Thus and thus Lady.

Brun. It shall be so, let him seek fools for Vestalls,
Here is my Cloyster.

Lecure. But what safety Madam
Find you in staying here?

Brun. Thou hast hit my meaning,
I will to Thierry Son of my blessings,
And there complain me, tell my tale so subtilly,
That the cold stoncs shall sweate; And Statues mourn,
And thou shalt weep Protaldye in my witness,
And there forswear.

Bawd. Yes, any thing but gelding,
I'm not yet in quiet Noble Lady,
Let it be done to night, for without doubt
To morrow we are capons,

Brun. Sleep shall not seize me,
Nor any food befriend me but thy kisses.
E're I forsake this desert, I live honest;
He may as well bid dead men walk, I humbled,
Or bent below my power; let night-dogs tear me,
And goblins ride me in my sleep to jelly,
Ere I forsake my sphear.

Lecure. This place you will.

Brun. What's that to you, or any,
Ye dofs, you powder'd pigsbones, rubarbe glister:
Must you know my designs? a colledge on you,
The proverbe makes but fools.

Prota. But Noble Lady.

Brun. You a sawcie afs too, off I will not,
If you but anger me, till a sow-gelder
Have cut you all like colts, hold me and kifs me,
For I'm too much troubled; Make up my treasure,
And get me horses private, come about it.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Theodoret, Martell, &c.

Theod. Though I assure my self (Martell) your counsell
Had no end but allegiance and my honor:
Yet I'm jealous, I have pass'd the bounds
Of a sons duty; For suppose her worse
Than you report, not by bare circumstance,
But evident proof confirm'd has given her out:
Yet since all weaknes in a kingdome, are
No more to be severely punished than
The faults of Kings are by the Thunderer
As oft as they offend, to be reveng'd:
If not for piety, yet for policie,
Since some are of necessitie to be spar'd,
I might, and now I wish I had not look'd
With such strict eyes into her follies.

Mart. Sir, a duty well discharg'd is never follow'd
By sad repentance, nor did your Highness ever
Make payment of the debt you ow'd her, better
Than in your late reproofs not of her, but Those crimes that made her worthy of reproof.
The most remarkeable point in which Kings differ
From private men, is that they not alone
Stand bound to be in themselves innocent,
But that all such as are allyed to them
In nearness, to dependance, by their care
Should be free from suspition of all crime;
And you have reap'd a double benefit
From this last great act: first in the restraint
Of her lost pleasures, you remove th' example
From others of the like licentiousness,
Then when 'tis known that your severitie
Extended to your mother, who dares hope for

The least indulgence or connivence in
The easiest slips that may prove dangerous
To you, or to the Kingdome?

Theod. I must grant
Your reason good (Martell) if as she is
My mother, she had been my subject, or
That only here she could make challenge to A place of Being; But I know her temper
And fear (if such a word become a King,)
That in discovering her, I have let lose
A Tygers, whose rage being shut up in darkness,
Was grievous only to her self; Which brought Into the view of light, her cruelty,
Provok'd by her own shame, will turn on him
That foolishly presum'd to let her see
The loath'd shape of her own deformitie.

Mart. Beasts of that nature, when rebellious threats
Begin to appear only in their eyes,
Or any motion that may give suspicion
Of the least violence should be chain'd up;
Their fangs and teeth, and all their means of hurt,
Far'd off, and knockt out, and so made unable
To do ill; They would soon begin to loath it.
I'll apply nothing: but had your Grace done,
Or would doe yet, what your less forward zeal
In words did only threaten, far less danger
Would grow from acting it on her, than may Perhaps have Being from her apprehension
Of what may once be practis'd: For believe it,
Who confident of his own power, presumes
To spend threats on an enemy, that hath means
To shun the worit they can effect, gives armor
To keep off his own strength; Nay more, disarms
Himself, and lyes-unguarded 'gainst all harms,
Or doubt, or malice may produce.

Theod. 'Tis true.
And such a desperate cure I would have us'd,
If the intemperate patient had not been
So near me as a mother; but to her,
And from me gentle unguents only were
To be appli'd: and as physicians
When they are sick of fevers, eat themselves
Such viands as by their directions are Forbid to others though alike diseas'd;
So she considering what she is, may challenge
Those cordials to restore her, by her birth,
And priviledge, which at no suit must be Granted to others.

Mart. May your pious care
Effect but what it aim'd at, I am silent.

Enter Devitry.

Theod. What laught you at Sir?
Vitry. I have some occasion,
I should not else; And the same cause perhaps
That makes me do so, may beget in you
A contrary effect.
Theod. Why, what's the matter?
Vitry. I see and joy to see that sometimes poor men,
(And most of them are good) stand more indebted
For mean's to breathe to such as are held vitious,
Than those that wear, like Hypocrites on their foreheads,
Th'ambitious titles of just men and vertuous.
Mart. Speak to the purpose.
Vitry. Who would e'er have thought
The good old Queen, your Highness reverend mother,
Into whose house (which was an Academ,)
In which all principles of lust were practis'd:
No soldier might presume to set his foot;
At whose most blessed intercession
All offices in the state, were charitably
Confer'd on Panders, o'er-worn chamber wrestlers,
And such physicians as knew how to kill

With safety under the pretence of saving,
And such like children of a monstrous peace,
That she I say should at the length provide
That men of war, and honest younger brothers,
That would not owe their feeding to their cod-peece,
Should be esteem'd of more than mothers, or drones,
Or idle vagabonds.

Theod. I am glad to hear it,
Prethee what course takes she to doe this?

Vitry. One that cannot fail, she and her virtuoustrain,
With her jewels, and all that was worthy the carrying,
The last night left the court, and, as 'tis more
Than said, for 'tis confirm'd by such as met her,
She's fled unto your brother.

Theod. How?

Vitry. Nay storm not,
For if that wicked tongue of hers hath not Forgot ti's pace, and Thierry, be a Prince
Of such a fiery temper, as report
Has given him out for; You shall have cause to use
Such poor men as my self; And thank us too
For comming to you, and without petitions;
Pray heaven reward the good old woman for't.

Mart. I foresaw this.

Theod. I hear a tempest comming,
That sings mine & my kingdomes ruin: haste,
And cause a troop of horse to fetch her back:
Yet stay, why should I use means to bring in
A plague that of her self hath left me? Muster
Our Soldiers up, we'll stand upon our guard,
For we shall be attempted; Yet forbear
The inequality of our powers will yield me
Nothing but loss in their defeature: something
Must be done, and done suddainly, save your labor,
In this I'll use no counsell but mine own,
That course though dangerous is best. Command
Our daughter be in readines, to attend us:
Martell, your company, and honest Vitry,
Thou wilt along with me.

Vitry. Yes any where,
To be worse than I 'm here, is past my fear.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Thierry, Brunhalt, Bawdber, Lecure, &c.

Thier. You are here in a sanctuary; and that viper
(Who since he hath forgot to be a Son,
I much disdain to think of as a brother)
Had better, in despite of all the gods,
To have raiz'd their Temples, and spurn'd down their Altars,

Than in his impious abuse of you,
To have call'd on my just anger.

Brun. Princely Son;
And in this, worthy of a near name
I have in the relation of my wrongs,
Been modest, and no word my tongue deliver'd
T'express my insupportable injuries,
But gave my heart a wound: Nor has my grief
Being from what I suffer; But that he,
Degenerate as he is, should be the actor
Of my extremes; And force me to divide
The fiers of brotherly affection,
Which should make but one flame.

Thier. That part of his

As

As it deserves shall burn no more: or if
The tears of Orphans, Widows, or all such As dare acknowledge him to be their Lord, loyn'd to your wrongs, with his heart blood have power
To put it out: and you, and these your servants,
Who in our favours shall find cause to know
In that they left not you, how dear we hold them;
Shall give Theodoret to understand,
His ignorance of the prizeless Jewel, which
He did possess in you, mother in you,
Of which I am more proud to be the donor,
Than if th' absolute rule of all the world
Were offer'd to this hand; Once more you are welcome,
Which with all ceremony due to greatness
I would make known, but that our just revenge
Admits not of delay; Your hand Lord Generall.

Enter Protaldie, with soldiers.

Brun. Your favor and his merit I may say
Have made him such, but I am jealous how
Your subjects will receive it.

Tbier. How my subjects?
What do you make of me? Oh heaven! My subjects!
How base should I esteem the name of Prince
If that poor dust, were anything before
The whirl-wind of my absolute command?
Let 'em be happy and rest so contented:
They pay the tribute of their hearts & knees,
To such a Prince that not alone has power,
To keep his own but to increase it; That Although he hath a body may add to
The fam'd night labor of strong Hercules:
Yet is the master of a continence
That so can temper it, that I forbear
Their daughters, and their wives, whose hands though strong,

As yet have never drawn by unjust mean
Their proper wealth into my treasury,
But I grow glorious, and let them beware
That in their least repining at my pleasures,
They change not a mild Prince, (for if provok'd
I dare and will be so) into a Tyrant.

Brun. You see there's hope that we shall rule again,
And your fal'n fortunes rise.

Bawd. I hope your Highness
Is pleas'd that I should still hold my place with you;
For I have been so long us'd to provide you
Fresh bits of flesh since mine grew stale, that surely
If cashir'd now, I shall prove a bad Cator
In the Fish-market of cold chastity,

Lecure. For me I am your own, nor since I first
Knew what it was to serve you, have remembred
I had a soul, but such an one whose essence
Depended wholly on your Highness pleasure,
And therefore Madam---

Brun. Rest assur'd you are Such instruments we must not lose.

Lecure. Bawd. Our service.

Tbier. You have view'd them then, what's your opinion of them?

In this dull time of peace, we have prepar'd 'em
Apt for the war. Ha?

Protal. Sir, they have limbs
That promise strength sufficient, and rich armors
The Soldiers best lov'd wealth: More, it appears
They have been drill'd, nay very pretily drill'd:
For many of them can discharge their muskets
Without the danger of throwing off their heads,
Or being offensive to the standers by,
By sweating too much backwards; Nay I find
They know the right, and left hand file, and may
With some impulsion no doubt be brought To pass the A, B, C, of war, and come

Unto the Horn-book.

Tbier. Well, that care is yours;
And see that you effect it.

Protal. I am slow
To promise much; But if within ten days,
By precepts and examples, not drawn from Worm-eaten presidents of the Roman wars
But from mine own, I make them not transcend
All that e'er yet bore armes, let it be laid,
Protaldie brags, which would be unto me
As hatefull as to be esteem'd a coward:
For Sir, few Captaines know the way to win 'em,
And make the foldiers valiant. You shall seem Lie with them in their trenches, talk, and drink,
And be together drunk; And, what seems stranger,
We'll sometimes wench together, which once practis'd
And with some other care and hidden acts,
They being all made mine, I'll breath into them
Such fearless resolution and such fervor,
That though I brought them to besiege a fort,
Whose walls were steeple high, and cannon proof,
Not to be undermin'd, they should fly up,
Like swallows; and the parapet once won,
For proof of their obedience, if I will'd them
They should leap down again, and what is more,
By some directions they should have from me,
Not break their necks.

Tbi. This is above belief.

Brun. Sir, on my knowledg though he hath spoke much,
He's able to do more.

Lecure. She means on her.

Brun. And howsoever in his thankfulness,
For some few favors done him by my self,
He left Austracia, not Theodoret,
Though he was chiefly aim'd at, could have laid
Withall his Dukedomes power, that shame upon him,
Which in his barborous malice to my honor,
He swore with threats to effect.

Tbier. I cannot but Believe you Madam, thou art one degree
Grown nearer to my heart, and I am proud
To have in thee so glorious a plant
Transported hither; In thy conduct, we Go on assur'd of conquest; our remove
Shall be with the next Sun.

Enter Theoderet, Memberge, Martell, Devitry.

Lecure. Amazement leave me, 'tis he.

Bawd. We are again undone.

Prot. Our guilt hath no assurance nor defence.

Bawd. If now your ever ready wit fail to protect us,
We shall be all discover'd

Brun. Be not so
In your amazement and your foolish fears,
I am prepar'd for't.

Theod. How? Not one poor welcome,
In answer of so long a journey made
Only to see your brother.

Tbier. I have stood
Silent thus long, and am yet unresolv'd
Whether to entertaine thee on my sword,
As fits a parricide of a mothers honor;
Or whether being a Prince, I yet stand bound
(Though thou art here condemn'd) to give thee hearing
Before I execute. What foolish hope,
(Nay pray you forbear) or desperate madness rather,
(Unless thou com'st assur'd, I stand in debt
As far to all impiety as thy self)
Has made thee bring thy neck unto the axe?
Since looking only here, it cannot but
Draw fresh blood from thy fear'd up conscience,
To make thee sensible of that horror, which

They ever bear about them, that like Nero.
Like said I? Thou art worse: since thou dar'st strive in her defame to murder thine alive.

Theod. That she that long since had the boldness to Be a bad woman, (though I wish some other should so report her) could not want the cunning, (Since they go hand in hand) to lay fair colors
On her black crimes, I was resolv'd before,
Nor make I doubt but that she hath impoyson'd
Your good opinion of me, and so far incens'd your rage against me, that too late
I come to plead my innocence.

Brun. To excuse thy impious scandalls rather.

Prot. Rather forc'd with fear to be compell'd to come.

Thierry. Forbear.

Theod. This moves not me, and yet had I not been Transported on my own integrity,
I neither am so odious to my subjects,
Nor yet so barren of defence, but that
By force I could have justified my guilt,
Had I been faulty, but since innocence is to it self an hundred thousand gards,
And that there is no Son, but though he owe
That name to an ill mother, but stands bound
Rather to take away with his own danger
From the number of her faults, than for his own Security, to add unto them. This,
This hath made me to prevent th'expence
Of blood on both sides, the injuries, the rapes,
(Pages, that ever wait upon the war:)
The account of all which, since you are the cause,
Believe it, would have been required from you;
Rather I say to offer up my daughter,
Who living onely could revenge my death,
With my heart blood a sacrifice to your anger
Than that you should draw on your head more curses
Than yet you have deserved.

Thier. I do begin
To feel an alteration in my nature,
And in his full sail'd confidence, a showre
Of gentle rain, that falling on the fire
Of my hot rage hath quenched it, ha! I would Once more speak roughly to him, and I will,
Yet there is something whispers to me, that I have said too much. How is my heart divided Between the duty of a Son, and love
Due to a brother! yet I am sway'd here,
And must aske of you, how 'tis possible
You can effect me that have learned to hate,
Where you should pay all love?

Theod. Which joy'd with duty,
Upon my knees I should be proud to tender,
Had she not us'd her self so many swords
To cut those bonds that tide me to it.

Thier. Fie no more of that.

Theod. Alas it is a theme,
I take no pleasure to discourse of; Would
It could as soon be buried to the world,
As it should die to me: nay more, I wish
(Next to my part of heaven) that she would spend
The last part of her life so here, that all Indifferent Judges might condemn me, for
A most malicious slanderer, nay texde it
Upon my forehead, if you hate me mother,
Put me to such a shame, pray you do, believe it
There is no glory that may fall upon me,
Can equall the delight I should receive
In that disgrace; provided the repeal
Of your long banish'd virtues, and good name,
Lifter'd me to it.

Thier. See, she shews her self

An ensie mother, which her tears confirme.

Theod. 'Tis a good sign, the comfortablest rain
I ever saw.

Thier. Embrace: Why this is well,
May never more but love in you, and duty
On your part rise between you.

Bawd. Do you hear Lord Generall,
Does not your new stamp'd honor on the suddain
Begin to grow sick?

Prot. Yes I find it fit,
That putting off my armor I should think of
Some honest hospitall to retire to.

Bawd. Sure although I am a bawd, yet being a Lord,
They cannot whip me for't, what's your opinion?

Lecure. The beadle will resolve you, for I cannot,
There is something that more near concerns my self,
That calls upon me.

Mart. Note but yonder scarabs,
That liv'd upon the dung of her base pleasures,
How from the fear that she may yet prove honest
Hang down their wicked heads.

Vitry. What is that to me?
Though they and all the polcats of the Court,
Were trust together, I perceive not how
It can advantage me a cardkue,
To help to keep me honest.

A born.

Enter a Post.

Thier. How, from whence?

Post. These letters will resolve your grace.

Thier. What speak they?

Reads.

How all things meet to make me this day happy?
See mother, brother, to your reconcilment
Another blessing almost equall to it,
Is coming towards me; My contracted wife
Ordella, daughter of wife Datarick,
The King of Aragon is on our confines;
Then to arrive at such a time, when you
Are happily here to honor with your presence
Our long deser'd, but much wish'd nuptiall,
Falls out above expression; Heaven be pleas'd
That I may use these blessings powr'd on me
With moderation.

Brun. Hell and furies ayd me,
That I may have power to avert the plagues
That pres upon me.

Thier. Two dayes journey sayest thou,
We will set forth to meet her: in the mean time
See all things be prepar'd to entertain her;
Nay let me have your companies, there's a Forrest
In the mid way shall yeild us hunting sport,
To ease our travel, I'll not have a brow
But shall wear mirth upon it, therefore clear them.
We'll wash away, all sorrow in glad feasts;
And the war we mean to men, we'll make on beasts.

Exeunt omnes, præter Brun. Bawdber, Portaldy. Lecure.

Brun. Oh that I had the Magick to transforme you
Into the shape of such, that your own hounds
Might tear you peece-meale; Are you so stupid?
No word of comfort? have I fed you mothers
From my excess of moisture, with such cost
And can you yeild no other retribution,
But to devour your maker, pandar sponge,
Impoysoner, all grown barren?

Prot. You your self
That are our mover, and for whom alone
We live, have fail'd your self in giving way
To the reconcilment of your Son.

Lecure. Which if
You had prevented, or would teach us how
They might again be sever'd, we could easily
Remove all other hind'rances that stop
The passage of your pleasures.

Bawd. And for me,

If I fail in my office to provide you
Fresh delicats, hang me.

Brun. Oh you are dull, and find not
The cause of my vexation; Their reconcilment
Is a mock castle built upon the sand
By children, which when I am pleas'd to o'rethrow,
I can with ease spurn down.

Lecure. If so, from whence
Grows your affliction?

Brun. My grief comes along
With the new Queen, in whose grace all my power
Must suffer shipwrack: for me now,
That hitherto have kept the first, to know
A second place, or yeeld the least precedence
To any others death; To have my sleeps
Less enquir'd after, or my rising up
Saluted with less reverence, or my gates
Empty of suitors, or the Kings great favours
To pass through any hand but mine, or he Himself to be directed by another,
Would be to me: doe you understand me, yet
No meanes to prevent this.

Protz. Fame gives her out
To be a woman of chastity
Not to be wrought upon; and therefore Madam
For me, though I have pleas'd you, to attempt her
Were to no purpose.

Brun. Tush, some other way.

Bard. Faith I know none else, all my bringing up
Aim'd at no other learning.

Lecure. Give me leave,
If my art fail me not, I have thought on
A speeding project.

Brun. What i't? but effect it,
And thou shalt be my Aesculapius,
Thy image shall be set up in pure gold,
To which I'll fall down and worship it.

Lecure. The Lady is fair.

Brun. Exceeding fair.

Lecure. And young.

Brun. Some fifteen at the most.

Lecure. And loves the King with equall ardor.

Brun. More, she dotes on him.

Lecure. Well then, think you if I make a drink
Which given unto him on the bridall night
Shall for five days so rob his faculties,
Of all ability to pay that duty,
Which new made wives expect, that she shall swear
She is not match'd to a man.

Protz. 'Twere rare.

Lecure. And then,
If she have any part of woman in her,
She'll or fly out, or at least give occasion
Of such a breach which nere can be made up,
Since he that to all else did never fail
Of as much as could be perform'd by man
Proves only Ice to her.

Brun. 'Tis excellent.

Bard. The Physitian
Helps ever at a dead lift; a fine calling,
That can both raise, and take down, out upon thee.

Brun. For this one service I 'm ever thine,
Prepare it; I'll give it him my self, for you Protaldye,
By this kiss, and our promis'd sport at night,
Doe conjure you to bear up, not minding
The opposition of Theodoret,
Or any of his followers; What so ere
You are, yet appear valiant, and make good
The opinion that is had of you: For my self
In the new Queens remove, being made secure,
Fear not, I'll make the future building sure,

Exeunt.

Wind horns.

Enter Theodoret, Thierry.

Theod. This Stag stood well, and cunningly.

Thierry. My horse,
I 'm sure, has found it, for her sides are Blooded from flank to shoulder, where's the troop?

Enter Martell.

Theodoret. Past homeward, weary and tir'd as we are,
Now Martell, have you remembred what we thought of?

Mart. Yes Sir, I have singled him, and if there be Any desert in his blood; beside the itch,
Or manly heat, but what decoctions
Leaches, and callises have cram'd into him,
Your Lordship shall know perfect.

Thier. What's that, may not I know too;

Theod. Yes Sir,
To that end we cast the project..

Thierry. What i't?

Mart. A desire Sir,
Upon the gilded flag your Graces favor
Has stuck up for a Generall, and to inform you,
For this hour he shall pass the test, what valour,
Staid judgement, soul, or safe discretion
Your mothers wandring eyes, and your obedience
Have slung upon us, to assure your knowledge,
He can be, dare be, shall be, must be nothing,
Load him with piles of honors; Set him off
With all the cunning foys that may deceive us:
But a poor, cold, unspirited, unmanner'd,
Unhonest, unaffected, undone, fool,
And most unheard of coward, a meer lump
Made to loade beds withall, and like a night-mare,
Ride Ladies that forget to say their prayers,
One that dares only be diseas'd, and in debt,
Whose body mewes more plaisters every month,
Than women doe old faces.

Thier. No more, I know him,
I now repent my error, take your time
And try him home, ever thus far reserv'd;
You tie your anger up.

Mart. I lost it else Sir.

Thier. Bring me his sword fair taken without violence.
For that will best declare him.

Theod. That's the thing.

Thier. And my best horse is thine.

Mart. Your Graces servant.

Theod. You I'll hunt no more Sir.

Thier. Not to day, the weather
Is grown too warm, besides the dogs are spent,
We'll take a cooler morning, let's to horse,
And hollow in the troop. Exeunt. Wind horns.

Enter 2 Huntsmen.

1. I marty Twainer,
This woman gives indeed, these are the Angels
That are the keepers faints.

2. I like a woman
That handles the deers dowsets with discretion;
And payes us by proportion.

1. 'Tis no treason
To think this good old Lady has a stump yet
That may require a corral.

2. And the bells too.

Enter Protaldye.

Shee has lost a friend of me else, but here's the clark,
No more for feare o'th' bell ropes.

Protz. How now Keepers,
Saw you the King?

1. Yes

1. Yes Sir, he's newly mounted,
And as we take 't ridden home.

Pro. Farewil then.

Exit Keepers.

Enter Martell.

My honour'd Lord, Fortune has made me happy
To meet with such a man of men to side me.

Protald. How Sir, I know ye not
Nor what your fortune means.

Mart. Few words shall serve, I am betrai'd Sir:
Innocent and honest; malice and violence,
Are both against me, basely and foully layd for;
For my life Sir, danger is now about me,
Now in my throat Sir.

Protald. Where Sir?

Mart. Nay I fear not,
And let it now powr down in storms upon me,
I have met with a noble guard.

Prot. Your meaning Sir,
For I have present business.

Mart. O my Lord,
Your honor cannot leave a gentleman
At least a fair design of this brave nature,
To which your worth is wedded, your profession
Hatcht in, and made one peece in such a perill,
There are but six my Lord.

Prot. What six?

Mart. Six villains sworn, and in pay to kill me.

Protaldye. Six?

Mart. Alas Sir, what can six do, or sixscore, now you are present?

Your name will blow 'em off: say they have shot too,
Who dare present a peece? your valour's proof Sir.

Prot. No, I'll assure you Sir, nor my discretion
Against a multitude; 'Tis true, I dare fight
Enough, and well enough, and long enough:
But wisdom Sir, and weight of what is on me,
In which I am no more mine own, nor yours Sir,
Nor as I take it any single danger,
But what concerns my place, tels me directly,
Beside my person, my fair reputation,
If I thrust into crowds, and seek occasions
Suffers opinion, six? Why Hercules
Avoyled two men, yet not to give example;
But only for your present dangers sake Sir,
Were there but four Sir, I car'd not if I kill'd them,
They will serve to whet my sword.

Mart. There are but four Sir,
I did mistake them; but four such as Europe,
Excepting your great valour.

Prot. Well consider'd,
I will not meddle with 'em, four in honor,
Are equall with fourscore, besides they're people
Only directed by their fury.

Mart. So much nobler shall be your way of justice.

Prot. That I find not.

Mart. You will not leave me thus?

Prot. I would not leave you, but look you Sir,
Men of my place and business, must not Be question'd thus.

Mart. You cannot pass Sir,
Now they have seen me with you without danger.
They are here Sir, within hearing, take but two.

Prot. Let the law take 'em; take a tree Sir
I'll take my horse, that you may keep with safety,
If they have brought no hand-saws, within this hour
I'll send you rescue, and a toyl to take 'em.

Mart. You shall not goe so poorly, stay but one Sir.

Prot. I have been so hamper'd with these rescues,
So hew'd an tortur'd, that the truth is Sir,
I have mainly vowd against 'em, yet for your sake,
If as you say there be but one, I'll stay.

And see fair play o' both sides.

Mart. There is no

More Sir, and as I doubt a base one too.

Prot. Fie on him, goe lug him out by th' ears.

Mart. Yes,

This is he Sir, the basest in the kingdome.

Prot. Do you know me?

Mart. Yes, for a generall fool,
A knave, a coward, and upstart stallion bawb;
Beast, barking puppy, that dares not bite.

Prot. The best man best knows patience.

Mart. Yes,

This way Sir, now draw your sword, and right you,
Or render it to me, for one you shall doe.

Pro. If wearing it may do you any honor,
I shall be glad to grace you, there it is Sir.

Mart. Now get you home, and tell your Lady Mistris,
Shee has shot up a sweet mushrum; quit your place too,
And say you are counsell'd well, thou wilt be beaten else
By thine own lanceprisadoes; when they know thee,
That tuns of oyl of roses, will not cure thee;
Goe get you to your foyning work at Court,
And learn to sweat again, and eat dry mutton;
An armor like a frost will search your bones
And make you roar you rogue; Not a reply,
For if you doe, your ears goe off.

Prot. Still patience.

Exeunt.

Loud musick, A Banquet set out.

Enter Thierry, Ordella, Brunhalt, Theodoret, Lecure, Barbher. &c.

Thier. It is your place, and though in all things else
You may and ever shall command me, yet
In this I'll be obey'd.

Ordella. Sir, the consent,
That made me yours, shall never teach me to Repent I am so; yet be you but pleas'd
To give me leave to say so much; The honor
You offer me were better given to her,
To whom you owe the power of giving.

Thier. Mother,
You hear this and rejoyce in such a blessing
That payes to you so large a share of duty,
But fie no more, for as you hold a place
Nearer my heart than she, you must sit nearest
To all those graces, that are in the power
Of Majesty to bestow.

Brun. Which I'll provide,
Shall be short liv'd Lecure.

Lecure. I have it ready.

Brun. 'Tis well, wait on our cup.

Lecure. You honor me.

Thier. We are dull,
No object to provoke mirth.

Theod. Martell,
If you remember Sir, will grace your Feast,
With some thing that will yield matter of mirth,
Fit for no common view.

Thier. Touching Protaldye.

Theod. You have it.

Brun. What of him, I fear his baseness
In spite of all the titles that my favours
Have cloth'd him, which will make discovery
Of what is yet conceal'd.

aside

Enter Martell.

Theod. Look Sir, he has it,
Nay we shall have peace when so great a soldier
As the renown'd Portaldye, will give up
His sword rather than use it.

Brun. 'Twas thy plot,
Which I will turn on thine own head.

*aside
Thier.*

Thie. Pray you speak,
How won you him to part from't ?

Mart. Won him Sir,
He would have yielded it upon his knees
Before he would have hazarded the exchange
Of a philip of the forehead : had you will'd me
I durst have undertook he should have sent you
His Nose, provided that the loss of it
Might have sav'd the rest of his face : he is, Sir
The most unutterable coward that e'er nature
Blest with hard shoulders, which were only given him,
To the ruin of bastinados.

Thier. Possible?

Theod. Observe but how she frets.

Mart. Why believe it:

But that I know the shame of this disgrace,
Will make the beast to live with such, and never Presume to come more among men; I'll hazard
My life upon it, that a boy of twelve
Should scourge him hither like a Parish Top,
And make him dance before you.

Brun. Slave thou liest,
Thou dar'st as well speak Treason in the hearing
Of those that have the power to punish it,
As the least syllable of this before him,
But 'tis thy hate to me.

Martel. Nay, pray you Madam,
I have no ears to hear you, though a foot
To let you understand what he is.

Brun. Villany.

Theod. You are too violent.

Enter Protaldye.

The worst that can come
Is blanketing; for beating, and such virtues
I have been long acquainted with.

Mart. Oh strange!

Bawdb. Behold the man you talk of.

Brun. Give me leave,
Or free thy self, (think in what place you are)
From the foul imputation that is laid
Upon thy valour (be bold, I'll protect you)
Or here I vow (deny it or forswear it)
These honors which thou wear'st unworthily,
Which be but impudent enough, and keep them,
Shall be torn from thee with thy eyes.

Prot. I have it,
My valour! is there any here beneath,
The stile of King, dares question it?

Thier. This is rare.

Prot. Which of my my actions, which have still been noble,
Has rend'rd me suspected?

Thier. Nay Martel
You must not fall off.

Mart. Oh Sir, fear it not,
Doe you know this sword?

Prot. Yes.

Mart. Pray you on what terms
Did you part with it?

Prot. Part with it say you?

Mart. So.

Thier. Nay, study not an answer, confess freely:
Prot. Oh I remember't now at the Stags falls,
As we to day were hunting, a poor fellow,
And now I view you better, I may say
Much of your pitch: this silly wretch I spoke of
With his petition falling at my feet,
(Which much against my Will he kist,) desir'd
That as a special means for his preferment,
I would vouchsafe to let him use my sword,
To cut off the Stags head,

Brun. Will you hear that?

Bawdb. This Lye bears a similitude of Truth.

Prot. I ever courteous, (a great weakness in me)
Granted his humble suit.

Mart. Oh impudence?

Thier. This change is excellent.

Mart. A word with you,
Deny it not, I was that man disguis'd,
You know my temper, and as you respect
A daily cudgeling for one whole year,
Without a second pulling by the ears,
Or tweaks by th' nose, or the most precious balm
You us'd of patience, patience do you mark me,
Confess before these Kings with what base fear
Thou didst deliver it.

Prot. Oh, I should burst,
And if I have not instant liberty
To tear this fellow limb by limb, the wrong:
Will break my heart, although Herculean,
And somewhat bigger; there's my gage, pray you hear,
Let me redeem my credit.

Thier. Ha, ha, forbear.

Mart. Pray you let me take it up, and if I do not,
Against all odds of Armor and of Weapons,
With this make him confess it on his knees
Cut off my head.

Prot. No, that's my office,

Bawdb. Fic, you take the Hangmans place!

Ordel. Nay, good my Lord
Let me atone this difference, do not suffer
Our bridal night to be the Centaurs Feast.
You're a Knight, and bound by oath to grant
All just suits unto Ladies; for my sake
Forget your suppos'd wrong.

Prot. Well let him thank you,
For your sake he shall live, perhaps a day;
And may be, on submission longer.

Theod. Nay Martel you must be patient.

Mart. I am yours,
And this slave shall be once more mine!

Thier. Sit all;
One health, and so to bed, for I too long
Deferr my choicest delicates.

Brun. Which if poison
Have any power, thou shalt like Tantalus
Behold and never taste, be careful.

Lecu. Fear not.

Brun. Though it be rare in our Sex; yet for once
I will begin a health.

Thier. Let it come freely.

Brun. Lecure, the cup; here to the son we hope
This night shall be an Embrion.

Thier. You have nam'd
A blessing that I most desir'd, I pledge you;
Give me a larger cup, that is too little Unto so great a god.

Brun. Nay, then you wrong me,
Follow as I began.

Thier. Well as you please.

Brun. Is't done?

Lecu. Unto your wish I warrant you,
For this night I durst trust him with my Mother.

Thier. So 'tis gone round, lights.

Brun. Pray you use my service.

Ordel. 'Tis that which I shall ever owe you, Madam,
And must have none from you, pray pardon me.

Thier. Good rest to all.

Theod. And to your pleasant labour.

Mart. Your company, Madam, good night

Exeunt all but Brunhalt, Protal, Lecure, Bawdber.

Brun. Nay, you have cause to blush, but I will hide it,
And what's more, I forgive you; is't not pity
That thou that art the first to enter combat
With any Woman, and what is more, o'ercome her,
In which she is best pleas'd, should be so
To meet a man.

M m m

Prot.

Prot. Why would you have me lose
That blood that is dedicated to your service
In any other quarrel?

Brun. No, reserve it.

As I will study to preserve thy credit:
You errah, be't your care to find out one
That is poor, though valiant, that at any rate
Will, to redeem my servants reputation,
Receive a publique baffling.

Bawdb. Would your Highness

Were pleas'd to inform me better of your purpose.

Brun. Why one, Sir, that would thus be box'd
Or kick'd, do you apprehend me now?

Bawdb. I feel you Madam,

The man that shall receive this from my Lord,
Shall have a thousand crowns.

Pro. He shall,

Bawdb. Besides

His day of bastinadoing past o'er,
He shall not lose your grace, nor your good favour?

Brun. That shall make way to it.

Bawdb. It must be a man

Of credit in the Court, that is to be
The foil unto your valour.

Prot. True, it should.

Bawdb. And if he have place there, 'tis not the worse.

Brun. 'Tis much the better.

Bawdb. If he be a Lord,

'Twill be the greater grace

Brun. Thou art in the right.

Bawdb. Why then behold that valiant man and Lord,

That for your sake will take a cudgeling:
For be assur'd, when it is spread abroad
That you have dealt with me, they'll give you out
For one of the Nine Worthies.

Brun. Out you pandar,

Why, to beat thee is only exercise
For such as do affect it, lose not time
In vain replies, but do it: come my solace
Let us to bed, and our desires once quench'd
We'll there determine of Theodore's death
For he's the Engine us'd to ruin us;
Yet one work more, Lecure, art thou assur'd
The potion will work?

Lecure. My life upon it,

Brun. Come my Protaldye, then glut me with Those best delights of man, that are deny'd
To her that does expect them, being a Bride.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Thierry, and Ordella, as from bed.

Thier. SURE I have drunk the blood of Elephants:
The tears of Mandrake, and the Marble dew,
Mixt in my draught, have quencht my natural heat,
And left no spark of fire, but in mine eyes,
With which I may behold my miseries:
Ye wretched flames which play upon my sight,
Turn inward, make me all one piece, though earth.
My tears shall over-whelm you else too.

Or. What moves my Lord to this strange sadness?
If any late discerned want in me,
Give cause to your repentance, care and duty
Shall find a painful way to recompence.

Thier. Are you yet frozen veins, feel you a breath,
Whose temperate heat would make the North Star reel,

Her icy pillars thaw'd, and do you not melt?

Draw nearer, yet nearer,
That from thy barren kifs thou maist confesse
I have not heat enough to make a blush.

Ordell. Speak nearer to my understanding, like a Husband.

Thier. How should he speak the language of a Husband.
Who wants the tongue and organs of his voice?

Ordell. It is a phrase will part with the same ease
From you, with that you now deliver.

Thier. Bind not his ears up with so dull a charm
Who hath no other sense left open, why should thy words
Find more restraint than thy free speaking actions,
Thy close embraces, and thy midnight sighs
The silent Orators to slow desire?

Ordell. Strive not to win content from ignorance
Which must be lost in knowledge: heaven can witness
My farthest hope of good, reacht at your pleasure,
Which seeing alone, may in your look be read:
Add not a doubtful comment to a text
That in it self is direct and easie.

Thier. Oh thou hast drunk the juyce of hemlock too,
Or did upbraided nature makethis pair
To shew she had not quite forgot her first Justly prais'd Workmanship, the first chaste couple
Before the want of joy, taught guilty fight
A way through shame and sorrow to delight:
Say, may we mix, as in their innocence
When Turtles kist, to confirm happiness,
Not to beget it.

Ordell. I know no bar.

Thier. Should I believe thee, yet thy pulse beats, woman,
And says the name of Wife did promise thee
The blest reward of duty to thy mother,
Who gave so often witness of her joy,
When she did boast thy likeness to her Husband.

Ordell. 'Tis true, that to bring forth a second to your,
self.

Was only worthy of my Virgin loss;
And should I prize you less, unpattern'd Sir?
Then being exemplify'd, is't not more honor
To be possessor of unequal'd virtue,
Than what is paralell'd, give me belief,
The name of mother, knows no way of good,
More than the end in me: who weds for Lust
Is oft a widow: when I married you,
I lost the name of Maid to gain a Title
Above the wish of change, which that part can
Only maintain, is still the same in man,
His virtue and his calm society,
Which no gray hairs can threaten to dissolve
Nor wrinkles bury.

Thier. Confine thy self to silence, lest thou take
That part of reason from me, is only left
To give persuasion to me, I'm a man:
Or say thou hast never seen the Rivers haste
With gladsome speed, to meet th' amorous sea.

Ordell. We are but to praise the coolness of their streams.

Thier. Nor view'd the Kids, taught by their lustful fires,
Pursue each other through the wanton lawns,
And lik'd the sport.

Ordell. As it made way unto their envied rest
With weary knots, binding their harmless eyes.

Thier. Nor do you know the reason why the Dove,
One of the pair, your hands wont hourly feed,
So often clipt and kist her happy mate.

Ordell. Unless it were to welcome his wish'd sight,
Whose absence only gave her mourning voice.

Thier. And you could, Dove-like to a single object,
Bind your loose spirits to one, nay, such a one
Whom only eyes and ears must flatter good,
Your surer'sence made useless, my self, nay
As in my all of good, already known.

Ordell.

Ordel. Let proof plead for me; let me be mew'd up.
Where never eye may reach me, but your own;
And when I shall repent, but in my looks, if sigh.

Thier. Or shed a tear that's warm.

Ordel. But in your sadness.

Thier. Or when you hear the birds call for their mates.
Ask if it be St. Valentine, their coupling day.

Ordel. If any thing may make a thought suspected
Of knowing any happiness but you,
Divorce me, by the Title of Most Falshood.

Thier. Oh, who would know a wife, that might have such a friend?
Posterity henceforth, lose the name of blessing
And leave the earth inhabited to people heaven.

Enter Theodoret, Brunhalt, Martel, Protaldye.

Mart. All happiness to Thierry and Ordella.

Thier. 'Tis a desire but borrowed from me, my happiness.

Shall be the period of all good mens wishes,
Which friends, nay dying Fathers shall bequeath,
And in my one give all: is there a duty
Belongs to any power of mine, or love
To any virtue I have right to? here, place it here,
Ordella's name shall only bear command,
Rule, Title. Sovereignty.

Brun. What passion sways my Son?

Thier. Oh Mother, she has doubled every good
The travel of your blood made possible
To my glad being.

Prot. He should have done
Little to her, he is so light hearted.

Thier. Brother, friends, if honor unto shame
If wealth to want enlarge the present sense,
My joys are unbounded, instead of question
Let it be envy, not bring a present
To the high offering of our mirth, Banquets, and Masques;
Keep waking our delights, mocking nights malice,
Whose dark brow would fright pleasure from us,
Our Court be but one stage of Revels, and each ye
The Scene where our content moves.

Theod. There shall want
Nothing to express our shares in your delight, Sir.

Mart. Till now I ne'er repented the estate
Of Widower.

Thier. Musick, why art thou so slow voic'd? it staies thy presence

My Ordella, this chamber is a sphere
Too narrow for thy all-moving virtue.

Make way, free way I say;
Who must alone, her Sexes want supply,
Had need to have a room both large and high.

Mart. This passion's above utterance.

Theod. Nay, credulity.

Exit all but Thierry, Brunhalt.

Brun. Why Son what mean you, are you a man?

Thier. No Mother I am no man, were I a man?
How could I be thus happy?

Brun. How can a wife be author of this joy then?

Thier. That being no man, I am married to no woman;
The best of men in full ability,
Can only hope to satisfy a wife,
And for that hope ridiculous, I in my want
And such defective poverty, that to her bed
From my first Cradle brought no strength but thought
Have met a temperance beyond hers that rockt me,
Necessity being her bar; where this
Is so much senseless of my depriv'd fire;
She knows it not a loss by her desire.

Brun. It is beyond my admiration.

Thier. Beyond your sexes faith,

The unripe Virgins of our age, to hear't
Will dream themselves to women, and convert
Th' example to a miracle.

Brun. Alas, 'tis your defect moves my amazement,
But what ill can be separate from ambition?
Cruel Theodoret.

Thier. What, of my brother?

Brun. That to his name your barrenness adds rule;
Who loving the effect, would not be strange
In favouring the cause; look on the profit,
And gain will quickly point the mischief out.

Thier. The name of Father, to what I possess
Is shame and care.

Brun. Were we begot to single happiness
I grant you; but from such a wife, such virtue
To get an heir, what hermet would not find
Deserving argument to break his vow
Even in his age of chastity?

Thier. You teach a deaf man language.

Brun. The cause found out, the malady may cease,
Have you heard of one Forts?

Thier. A learned Astronomer, great Magician,
Who lives hard by retir'd.

Brun. Repair to him, with the just hour and place
Of your nativity; fools are amaz'd at fate,
Griefs but conceal'd are never desperate.

Thier. You have timely waken'd me, nor shall I sleep
Without the satisfaction of his Art. Exit Thierry

Enter Lecure.

Brun. Wisdom prepares you to't, Lecure, met happily.

Lecure. The ground answers your purpose, the convenience
Being secure and easie, falling just Behind the state set for Theodoret.

Brun. 'Tis well, your trust invites you to a second charge,
You know Leforte's Cell.

Lecure. Who constellated your fair birth.

Brun. Enough, I see thou know'st him, where's Bawdber?

Lec. I left him careful of the project cast,
To raise Protaldie's credit.

Brun. A fore that must be plaister'd, in whose wound
Others shall find their graves, think themselves found,
Your ear, and quickest apprehension. Exit.

Enter Bawdber and a servant.

Bawdb. This man of war will advance.

Lecu. His hour's upon the stroke.

Bawdb. Wind him back, as you favour my ears,
I have no noise in my head, my brains have hitherto
Been employ'd in silent businesses.

Enter Devitry.

Lecu. The Gentleman is within your reach Sir. Exit.

Bawdb. Give ground, whilst I drill my wits to the encounter,

Devitry, I take it.

Devi. All's that left of him.

Bawdb. Is there another parcel of you, if it be at pawn
I will gladly redeem it, to make you wholly mine.

Vitry. You seek too hard a pennyworth.

Bawdb. You too ill to keep such distance; your parts have been long known
To me, howsoever you please to forget acquaintance.

Vit. I must confess I have been subject to lewd company.

Bawdb. Thanks for your good remembrance,
You have been a soldier Devitry, and born Arms.

Vit. A couple of unprofitable ones, that have only serv'd to get me a stomach to my dinner.

Bawdb. Much good may it do you, Sir.

Vitry. You shall have heard me say I had din'd first, I have built on an unwholsome ground, rais'd up a house, before I knew a Tenant, matcht to meet weariness, fought to find want and hunger.

Bawdb. It is time you put up your sword, and run away for meat, Sir, nay, if I had not withdrawn e'r now, I might have kept thee; fast with you: but since the way to thrive is never late, what is the nearest course to profit think you?

Vitry. It may be your worship will say bawdry.

Bawdb. True sense, bawdry.

Vitry. Why, is their five kinds of them, I never knew but one.

Bawdb. I'll shew you a new way of prostitution, fall back, further yet, farther, there is fifty crowns, do but as much to Protaldye the Queens favorite, they are doubled.

Vitry. But thus much.

Bawdb. Give him but an affront as he comes to the presence, and in his drawing make way, like a true bawd to his valour, the son's thy own; if you take a scratch in the arm or so, every drop of blood weighs down a duckett.

Vitry. After that rate, I and my friends would begger the kingdom. Sir, you have made me blush to see my want, whose cure is such a cheap and easie purchase, this is Male-bawdry belike.

Enter Protaldy, a Lady, and Revellers.

Bawdb. See, you shall not be long earning your wages, your work's before your eyes.

Vitry. Leave it to my handling, I'll fall upon't instantly.

Bawdb. What opinion will the managing of this affair Bring to my wisdom? my invention tickles With apprehension on't:

Pro. These are the joyes of marriage, Lady, Whose sighs are able to dissolve Virginitie. Speak freely, do you not envy the Brides felicity?

Lady. How should I, being partner of't?

Pro. What you enjoy is but the Banquets view, The taste stands from your pallat; if he impart By day so much of his content, think what night gave?

Vitry. Will you have a relish of wit, Lady?

Bawdb. This is the man.

Lady. If it be not dear, Sir,

Vitry. If you affect cheapness, how can you prize this sullied ware so much? mine is fresh, my own, not retail'd.

Pro. You are saucy, sirrah.

Vitry. The fitter to be in the dish with such dry Stock-fish as you are, how, strike?

Bawdb. Remember the condition as you look for payment.

Vitry. That box was left out of the bargain.

Pro. Help, help, help.

Bawdb. Plague of the Scriveners running hand, What a blow is this to my reputation?

Enter Thierry, Theodoret, Brunhalt, Ordella, Memberge, Martell.

Thier. What villain dares this outrage?

Devitry. Hear me, Sir, this creature hir'd me with fifty crowns in hand, to let Protaldye have the better of me at single Rapier on a made quarrel; he mistaking the weapon, laies me over the chops with his club fist, for which I was bold to teach him the Art of memory.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha, ha.

Theo. Your General, Mother, will display himself. 'Spight of our Peace I see.

Thier. Forbear these civil jars, sic Protaldy, So open in your projects, avoid our presence, sirrah.

Devi. Willingly; if you have any more wages to earn, You see I can take pains.

Theo. There's somewhat for thy labour, More than was promis'd, ha, ha, ha.

Bawdb. Where could I wish my self now? in the Iste of Dogs.

So I might scape scratching, for I see by her Cats eyes I shall be claw'd fearfully.

Thier. We'll hear no more on't,

Soft Musick.

Musick drown all sadness; Command the Revellers in, at what a rate I do purchase My Mothers absence, to give my spleen full liberty.

Brun. Speak not a thoughts delay, it names thy ruin.

Pro. I had thought my life had born more value with you.

Brun. Thy loss carries mine with't, let that secure thee. The vault is ready, and the door conveys to't Falls just behind his chair, the blow once given, Thou art unseen.

Pro. I cannot feel more than I fear, I'm sure. Withdraws.

Brun. Begone, and let them laugh their own destruction.

Thier. You will add unto her rage.

Theod. 'Foot, I shall burst, unless I vent my self, ha, ha, ha.

Brun. Me Sir, you never could Have found a time to invite more willingness In my dispose to pleasure.

Memb. Would you would please to make some other choise.

Revel. 'Tis a disgrace would dwell upon me, Lady, Should you refuse.

Memb. Your reason conquers; my Grandmothers looks Have turn'd all air to earth in me, they sit Upon my heart like night-charms, black and heavy.

They Dance.

Thier. You are too much libertine.

Theod. The fortune of the fool perswades my laughter More than his cowardize; was ever Rat Ta'en by the tail thus? ha, ha, ha.

Thier. Forbear I say.

Prot. No eye looks this way, I will wink and strike, Left I betray my self. Behind the State Stabs Theodoret?

Theo. Ha, did you not see one near me?

Thier. How near you, why do you look so pale, brother? Treason, treason.

Memb. Oh my presage! Father.

Ordella. Brother,

Mart. Prince, Noble Prince.

Thier. Make the gates sure, search into every angle And corner of the Court, oh my shame! Mother, Your Son is slain, Theodoret, noble Theodoret, Here in my arms, too weak a Sanctuary 'Gainst treachery and murder, say, is the Traitor taken?

Guard. No man hath past the chamber on my life Sir.

Thier. Set present fire unto the place, that all unseen May perish in this mischief, who moves slow to't. Shall add unto the flame.

Brun. What mean you? give me your private hearing.

Thier. Perswasion is a partner in the crime, I will renounce my claim unto a mother, If you make offer on't.

Brun. E'er a Torch can take flame, I will produce The author of the fact.

Thier. Withdraw but for your Lights.

Memb. Oh my too true suspicion.

Exeunt Martel, Memberge.

Thier. Speak, where's the Engine to this horrid act?

Brun. Here you do behold her, upon whom make good Your causeless rage; the deed was done by my incitement, Not yet repented.

Thier. Whether did nature start, when you conceiv'd? A birth so unlike woman? say, what part Did not consent to make a son of him, Reserv'd it self within you to his ruine.

Brun. Ha, ha, a son of mine! doe not disserve

Thy fathers dust, shaking his quiet urn,
To which my breath would send so foul an issue.
My Son, thy Brother?

Thier. Was not Theodoret my brother, or is thy tongue
Confederate with thy heart, to speak and do
Only things monstrous?

Brun. Hear me and thou shalt make thine own belief,
Thy, still with sorrow mention'd, father liv'd
Three careful years, in hope of wish'd heirs,
When I conceiv'd, being from his jealous fear
Injoyn'd to quiet home, one fatal day:
Transported with my pleasure to the chase,
I forc'd command, and in pursuit of game
Fell from my horse, lost both my child and hopes.
Despair which only in his love saw life
Worthy of being, from a Gard'ners Arms
Snatcht this unlucky brat, and call'd it mine,
When the next year repaid my loss with thee:
But in thy wrongs preserv'd my misery,
Which that I might diminish, though not end,
My sighs, and wet eies from thy Fathers Will,
Bequeath this largest part of his Dominions
Of France unto thee, and only left
Austracia unto that changling, whose life affords
Too much of ill 'gainst me to prove my words,
And call him stranger.

Thier. Come, doe not weep, I must, nay do believe you.
And in my fathers satisfaction count it
Merit, not wrong, or loss:

Brun. You doe but flatter, there's anger yet flames
In your eyes.

Thier. See, I will quench it, and confesse that you
Have suffer'd double travel for me.

Brun. You will not fire the house then?

Thier. Rather reward the author who gave cause
Of knowing such a secret, my oath and duty
Shall be assurance on't.

Brun. Protaldye, rise good faithful servant, heaven knows.
How hardly he was drawn to this attempt.

Enter Protaldye.

Thier. Protaldye? he had a Gard'ners face I'll swear:
Tell by thy hand, Sir, we doe owe unto you for this service.

Brun. Why lookest thou so dejected?

Enter Martel.

Prot. I want a little shift, Lady, nothing else.

Mart. The fires are ready, please it your grace withdraw,
Whilst we perform your pleasure.

Thier. Reserve them for the body; since he had the fate
To live and die a Prince, he shall not lose
The Title in his Funeral.

Exit.

Mart. His fate to live a Prince,
Thou old impiety, made up by lust and mischief,
Take up the body. Exeunt with the body of Theod.

Enter Lecure and a Servant.

Lecu. Dost think Leforte's sure enough?

Serv. As bonds can make him, I have turn'd his eyes to the East; and left him gaping after the Morning star, his head is a meer Astrolobe, his eyes stand for the Poles, the gag in his mouth being the Coachman, his five teeth have the nearest resemblance to Charles Wain.

Lecure. Thou hast cast a figure which shall raise thee, direct my hair a little: and in my likeness to him, read a fortune suiting thy largest hopes.

Ser. You are so far 'bove likeness, you are the same,
If you love mirth, perswade him from himself.
'Tis but an Astronomer out of the way,
And lying, will bear the better place for't

Lecure. I have profitabler use in hand, haste to the
And tell her how you left me chang'd. (Queen)

Exit Servant.

Who would not serve this virtuous active Queen?
She that loves mischief 'bove the man that does it,
And him above her pleasure, yet knows no heaven else.

Enter Thierry.

Thier. How well this loansuits the Art I seek,
Discovering secret, and succeeding Fate,
Knowledge that puts all lower happiness on,
With a remis and careless hand,
Fair peace unto your meditations, father.

Lecure. The same to you, you bring, Sir.

Thier. Drawn by your much fam'd skill. I come to know
Whether the man who owes his character,
Shall e'er have issue.

Lecure. A resolution falling with most ease,
Of any doubt you could have nam'd, he is a Prince
Whose fortune you enquire.

Thie. He is nobly born.

Lecure. He had a Dukedom lately fall'n unto him,
By one, call'd Brother, who has left a Daughter.

Thier. The question is, of Heirs, not Lands.

Lecure. Heirs, yes, he shall have Heirs.

Thier. Begotten of his body, why look'st thou pale?
Thou canst not suffer in his want.

Lecure. Nor thou, I neither can nor will Give farther knowledge to thee.

Thier. Thou must, I am the man myself,
Thy Sovereign, who must owe unto thy wisdom
In the concealing of my barren shame.

Lecure. Your Grace doth wrong your Stars; if this be yours,
You may have children.

Thier. Speak it again.

Lecure. You may have fruitful issue.

Thie. By whom? when? how?

Lecure. It was the fatal means first struck my blood
With the cold hand of wonder, when I read it
Printed upon your birth.

Thier. Can there be any way unsmooth, has end
So fair and good?

Lecure. We that behold the sad aspects of Heaven,
Leading sence blinded, men feel grief enough
To know, though not to speak their miseries.

Thier. Sorrow must lose a name, where mine finds life;
If not in thee, at least ease pain with speed,
Which must know no cure else.

Lecure. Then thus,
The first of Females which your eye shall meet
Before the Sun next rise, coming from out
The Temple of Diana, being slain, you live
Father of many sons.

Thier. Call'st thou this sadness, can I beget a Son?
Deserving less than to give recompence
Unto so poor a loss? what e'er thou art,
Rest peaceable blest creature, born to be
Mother of Princes, whose grave shall be more fruitful
Than others marriage beds: methinks his Art
Should give her form and happy figure to me,
I long to see my happiness, he is gone,
As I remember, he nam'd my brothers Daughter,
Were it my Mother, 'twere a gainful death
Could give Ordella's virtue living breath.

Exeunt

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Thierry and Martel,

Mart. Your Grace is early stirring.
Thier. How can he sleep,
 Whose happiness is laid up in an hour.
 He knows comes stealing towards him, Oh Martel !
 Not possible the longing Bride, whose wishes
 Out-runs her fears, can on that day she is married
 Contume in slumbers, or his Arms rust in ease,
 That hears the charge, and sees the honor'd purchase
 Ready to gil'd his valour? Mine is more
 A power above these passions; this day France,
France that in want of issue withers with us;
 And like an aged River, runs his head
 Into forgotten ways, again Iransome,
 And his fair course turn right: this day Thierry,
 The Son of France, whose manly powers like prisoners
 Have been tied up, and fetter'd, by one death
 Give life to thousand ages; this day beauty
 The envy of the world, Pleasure the glory,
 Content above the world, desire beyond it
 Are made mine own, and useful.

Mart. Happy Woman
 That dies to do these things.

Thier. But ten times happier
 That lives to do the greater; oh Martel,
 The gods have heard me now, and those that scorn'd me,
 Mothers of many children, and blest fathers
 That see their issues like the Stars un-number'd,
 Their comfort more than them, shall in my praises
 Now teach their Infants songs; and tell their ages
 From such a Son of mine, or such a Queen,
 That chaste Ordella brings me blessed marriage
 The chain that links two Holy Loves together
 And in the marriage, more than blest Ordella,
 That comes so near the Sacrament it self,
 The Priests doubt whether purer.

Mart. Sir, y'are lost.

Thier. I prethee let me be so.

Mart. The day wears,
 And those that have been offering early prayers,
 Are now retiring homeward.

Thier. Stand and mark then.

Mart. Is it the first must suffer.

Thier. The first Woman.

Mart. What hand shall do it, Sir?

Thier. This hand Martell,
 For who less dare presume to give the gods
 An incense of this offering?

Mart. Would I were she,
 For such away to die, and such a blessing
 Can never crown my parting.

Enter two men passing over.

Thier. What are those?

Mart. Men, men, Sir, men.

Thier. The plagues of men light on 'em,
 They croise my hopes like Hares, who's that?

Enter a Priest.

Mart. A Priest, Sir.

Thier. Would he were gelt.

Mart. May not these rascals serve, Sir,
 Well hang'd and quarter'd?

Thier. No.

Mart. Here comes a woman.

Enter Ordella veil'd.

Thier. Stand and behold her then.

Mart. I think a fair one.

Thier. Move not whilst I prepare her: may her peace
 Like his whose innocence the gods are pleas'd with,
 And offering at their Altars, gives his soul
 Far purer than those fires; pull heaven upon her,
 You holy powers, no humane spot dwell in her,
 No love of any thing, but you and goodness,
 Tie her to earth, fear be a stranger to her,
 And all weak blouds affections, but thy hope
 Let her bequeath to Women: hear me heaven,
 Give her a spirit masculine, and noble,
 Fit for your selves to ask, and me to offer.
 Oh let her meet my blow, doat on her death;
 And as a wanton Vine bows to the pruner,
 That by his cutting off, more may increase,
 So let her fall to raise me fruit; hail woman.
 The happiest, and the best (if the dull Will Do not abuse thy fortune) France e'er found yet.

Ordel. Sh'is more than dull, Sir, less, and worse than Woman,

That may inherit such an infinite
 As you propound, a greatness so near goodness;
 And brings a Will to rob her.

Thier. Tell me this then,
 Was there e'er woman yet, or may be found,
 That for fair Fame, unspotted memory,
 For virtues sake, and only for it self sake
 Has, or dare make a story?

Ordel. Many dead Sir,
 Living I thing as many.

Thier. Say, the kingdom
 May from a womans Will receive a blessing,
 The King and kingdom, not a private safety.
 A general blessing, Lady.

Ordel. A general curse
 Light on her heart, denies it.

Thier. Full of honor;
 And such examples as the former ages
 Were but dim shadows of, and empty figures.

Ordel. You strangely stir me, Sir, and were my weakness
 In any other flesh but modest womans,
 You should not ask more questions, may I do it?

Thier. You may, and which is more, you must.

Ordel. I joy in't,
 Above a moderate gladness, Sir, you promise
 It shall be honest.

Thier. As ever time discover'd.

Ordel. Let it be what it may then, what it dare,
 I have a mind will hazard it.

Thier. But hark ye,
 What may that woman merit, makes this blessing!

Ordel. Only her duty, Sir.

Thier. 'Tis terrible.

Ordel. 'Tis so much the more noble.

Thier. 'Tis full of fearful shadows.

Ordel. So is sleep, Sir.

Or any thing that's meerly ours, and mortal,
 We were begotten gods else; but those fears
 Feeling but once the fires of nobler thoughts.
 Flie like the shapes of clouds we form, to nothing.

Ordel. Suppose it death.

Ordel. I do.

Thier. And endless parting
 With all we can call ours, with all our sweetness,
 With youth, strength, pleasure, people, time, nay reason:
 For in the silent grave, no conversation,
 No joyful tread of friends, no voice of Lovers,
 No careful Fathers counsel, nothing's hard,

Nor nothing is, but all oblivion,
Dust and an endless darkness, and dare you woman
Desire this place?

Ordel. 'Tis of all sleeps the sweetest,
Children begin it to us, strong men seek it,
And Kings from height of all their painted glories
Fall like spent exhalations, to this centre:
And those are fools that fear it, or imagine
A few unhandsome pleasures, or lifes profits
Can recompence this place; and mad that staies it;
Till age blow out their lights, or rotten humors,
Bring them dispers'd to th' earth.

Thier. Then you can suffer?

Ordel. As willingly as say it.

Thier. Martell, a wonder,
Her e's a woman that dares die, yet tell me,
Are you a Wife?

Ordel. I am Sir.

Thier. And have children?

She sighs and weeps.

Ordel. Oh none Sir.

Thier. Dare you venture
For a poor barren praise you ne'er shall hear,
To part with these sweet hopes?

Ordel. With all but Heaven,
And yet die full of children; he that reads me
When I am ashes, is my Son in wishes,
And those chaste dames that keep my memory,
Singing my yearly requiems, are my Daughters.

Thier. Then there is nothing wanting but my knowledg.

And what I must doe, Lady?

Ordel. You are the King, Sir,
And what you do I'll suffer, and that blessing
That you desire, the gods show on the Kingdom.

Thier. Thus much before I strike then, for I must kill
you,

The gods have will'd it so, they're made the blessing
Must make France young again, and me a man,
Keep up your strength still nobly.

Ordel. Fear me not.

Thier. And meet death like a measure.

Ordel. I am stedfast.

Thier. Thou shalt be fainter woman, and thy Tomb
Cut out in Chrystal, pure and good as thou art;
And on it shall be graven every age,
Succeeding Peers of France that rise by thy fall,
Tell thou liest there like old and fruitful nature,
Darest thou behold thy happiness?

Ordel. I dare Sir.

Mart. Oh Sir, you must not doe it.

Thier. No, I dare not.

There is an Angel keeps that Paradiſe,
A fiery Angel friend; oh virtue, virtue,
Ever and endless virtue.

Ordel. Strike, Sir, strike;
And if in my poor death fair France may merit,
Give me a thousand blows, be killing me
A thousand days.

Thier. First let the earth be barren,
And man no more remembred, rise Ordella,
The nearest to thy maker, and the purest
That ever dull flesh shewed us,—oh my heart-strings. Exit.

Mart. I see you full of wonder, therefore noblest,
And truest amongst Women, I will tell you
The end of this strange accident.

Ordel. Amazement
Has so much wove upon my heart, that truly
I feel my self unfit to hear, oh Sir,
My Lord has flighted me.

Mart. Oh no sweet Lady.

Ordel. Robb'd me of such a glory by his pity;
And most unprovident respect.

Mart. Dear Lady,
It was not meant to you.

Ordel. Else where the day is,
And hours distinguish time, time runs to ages,
And ages end the world, I had been spoken.

Devi. I'll tell you what it was, if but your patience
Will give me hearing.

Ordel. If I have transgressed,
Forgive me, Sir.

Mart. Your noble Lord was counsel'd,
Grieving the barrenness between you both,
And all the Kingdom with him, to seek out
A man that knew the secrets of the gods,
He went, found such an one, and had this answer,
That if he wou'd have issue, on this morning,
For this hour was prefixt him, he should kill
The first he met, being Female, from the Temple;
And then he should have children, the mistake
Is now too perfect, Lady.

Ordel. Still 'tis I, Sir,
For may this work be done by common women?
Durst any but my self that knew the blessing,
And felt the benefit, assume this thing
In any other, 't'ad been lost, and nothing,
A curse and not a blessing; I was figur'd;
And shall a little fondness barr my purchase?

Mart. Where should he then seek children?

Ordel. Where they are
In wombs ordain'd for issues, in those beauties
That bless a marriage-bed, and makes it proceed
With kisses that conceive, and fruitful pleasures;
Mine like a grave, buries those loyal hopes,
And to a grave it covets.

Mart. You are too good,
Too excellent, too honest; rob not us
And those that shall hereafter seek example,
Of such inestimable worthies in woman,
Your Lord of such obedience, all of honor
In coveting a cruelty is not yours,
A Will short of your Wisdom; make not error
A Tomb-stone of your virtues, whose fair life
Deserves a constellation: your Lord dare not;
He cannot, ought not, must not run this hazard,
He makes a separation, nature shakes at,
The gods deny, and everlasting justice
Shrinks back, and sheaths her sword at.

Ordel. All's but talk, Sir,
I find to what I am reserv'd, and needful,
And though my Lord's compassion makes me poor,
And leaves me in my best use, yet a strength
Above mine own, or his dull fondness finds me;
The gods have given it to me.

Draws a knife.

Mart. Self-destruction!
Now all good Angels bless thee, oh sweet Lady,
You are abus'd, this is a way to shame you,
And with you all that knows you, all that loves you,
To ruin all you build, would you be famous?
Is that your end?

Ordel. I would be what I should be. (den

Mart. Live and confirm the gods then, live and be loa-
With more than Olive-bear, or fruitful Autumn;
This way you kill your merit, kill your cause,
And him you would raise life to, where, or how Got you these bloody thoughts? what Devil durst
Look on that Angel face, and tempt? doe you know
What is't to die thus, how you strike the Stars,
And all good things above, do you feel
What follows a self-blood, whether you venture,
And to what punishment? excellent Lady,
Be not thus cozen'd, do not fool your self,
The Priest was never his own sacrifice,
But he that thought his hell here.

Ordel. I am counsel'd,

Mart. And I am glad on't, lie, I know you dare not.

Ordel.

Ordel. I never have done yet.

Mart. Pray take my comfort,
Was this a soul to lose? two more such women
Would save their sex; see, she repents and prays,
Oh hear her, hear her, if there be a faith
Able to reach your mercies, she hath sent it.

Ordel. Now good Martel confirm me.

Mart. I will Lady,
And every hour advise you, for I doubt
Whether this plot be heavens, or hells; your mother
And I will find it, if it be in mankind
To search the center of it: in the mean time
I'll give you out for dead, and by your self,
And shew the instrument, so shall I find
A joy that will betray her.

Ordel. Do what's fittest;
And I will follow you.

Mart. Then ever live
Both able to engross all love, and give.

Exeunt.

Enter Brunhalt, Protaldye.

Brun. I'm in labour
To be deliver'd of that burthenous project
I have so long gone with; ha, here's the Midwife,
Or life, or death.

Enter Lecure.

Lecu. If in the supposition
Of her death in whose life you die, you ask me,
I think you are safe.

Brun. Is she dead?

Lecu. I have us'd
All means to make her so, I saw him waiting
At the Temple door, and us'd such Art within,
That only she of all her Sex was first
Giv'n up unto his fury.

Brun. Which if love
Or fear made him forbear to execute
The vengeance he determin'd, his fond pity
Shall draw it on himself, for were there left
Not any man but he, to serve my pleasures,
Or from me to receive commands, which are
The joys for which I love life, he should be Remov'd, and I alone left to be Queen
O'er any part of goodness that's left in me.

Lecu. If you are so resolv'd, I have provided
A means to snip him hence: look upon this,
But touch it sparingly, for this once us'd.
Say but to dry a tear, will keep the eye-lid
From closing, until death perform that office.

Brun. Give't me, I may have use of it, and on you
I'll make the first experiment: if one sigh
Or heavy look beget the least suspicion,
Childish compassion can thaw the Ice
Of your so long congeal'd and flinty hardness.
Slight, go on constant, or I shall.

Prot. Best Lady,
We have no faculties which are not yours.

Lecu. Nor will be any thing without you.

Brun. Be so, and we will stand or fall together, for Since we have gone so far, that death must stay
The journey, which we wish should never end;
And innocent, or guilty, we must die,
When we do so, let's know the reason why.

Enter Thierry and Courtiers.

Lecu. The King.

Thier. We'll be alone.

Prot. I would I had
A Convoy too, to bring me safe off.
For rage although it be allai'd with sorrow,

Appears so dreadful in him, that I shake
To look upon't.

Brun. Coward I will meet it,
And know from whence 't has birth: Son, kingly Thierry.

Thier. Is cheating grown so common among men?
And thrives so well here, that the gods endeavour
To practise it above?

Brun. Your Mother.

Thier. Ha! or are they only careful to revenge,
Not to reward? or when, for your offences
We study satisfaction, must the cure
Be worse than the disease?

Brun. Will you not hear me?

Thier. To lose th' ability to perform those duties
For which I entertain'd the name of Husband,
Ask'd more than common sorrow; but t' impose
For the redress of that defect, a torture
In marking her to death, for whom alone
I felt that weakness as a want, requires
More than the making the head bald: or falling
Thus flat upon the earth, or cursing that way,
Or praying this, oh such a Scene of grief,
And so set down, (the world the stage to act on)
May challenge a Tragedian better practis'd
Than I am to express it; for my cause
Of passion is so strong, and my performance
So weak, that though the part be good, I fear
Th' ill acting of it, will defraud it of
The poor reward it may deserve, mens pity.

Brun. I have given you way thus long, a King, and what Is more, my Son, and yet a slave to that
Which only triumphs over cowards sorrow,
For shame look up.

Thier. Is't you, look down on me:
And if that you are capable to receive it,
Let that return to you, that have brought forth
One mark'd out only for it: what are these?
Come they upon your privilege to tread on
The Tomb of my afflictions?

Prot. No, not we Sir.

Thier. How dare you then omit the ceremony
Due to the funeral of all my hopes.
Or come unto the marriage of my sorrows,
But in such colours as may sort with them.

Prot. Alas; we will wear any thing.

Brun. This is madness
Take but my counsel.

Thier. Yours? dare you again
Though arm'd with th' authority of a mother,
Attempt the danger that will fall on you
If such another syllable awake it?
Goe, and with yours be safe, I have such cause
Of grief, nay more, to love it, that I will not Have such as these be sharers in it.

Lecu. Madam.

Prot. Another time were better.

Brun. Do not stir,
For I must be resolv'd, and will, be statues.

Enter Martel.

Thier. I, thou art welcome, and upon my soul
Thou art an honest man, do you see, he has tears
To lend to him whom prodigal expence
Of sorrow, has made bankrupt of such treasure,
Nay, thou dost well.

Mart. I would it might excuse.
The ill I bring along.

Thier. Thou mak'st me smile
I the height of my calamities, as if
There could be the addition of an Atome,
To the gyant-body of my miseries.
But try, for I will hear thee, all sit down, 'tis death

To any that shall dare to interrupt him
In look, gesture, or word.

Mart. And such attention

As is due to the last, and the best story
That ever was deliver'd, will become you,
The griev'd Ordella, (for all other titles
But take away from that) having from me
Prompted by your last parting groan, enquir'd,
What drew it from you, and the cause soon learn'd:
For she whom barbarism could deny nothing,
With such prevailing earnestness desir'd it,
'Twas not in me, though it had been my death,
To hide it from her, she I say, in whom
All was, that Athens, Rome, or warlike Sparta,
Have registred for good in their best Women:
But nothing of their ill, knowing her self Mark'd out, (I know not by what power, but sure
A cruel one) to dye, to give you children;
Having first with a settled countenance
Look'd up to Heaven, and then upon her self,
(It being the next best object) and then smil'd,
As if her joy in death to do you service,
Would break forth, in despite of the much sorrow
She shew'd she had to leave you: and then taking Me by the hand, this hand which I must ever
I love better than I have done, since she touch'd it,
Go said she, to my Lord, (and to goe to him
Is such a happiness I must not hope for)

And tell him that he too much priz'd a trifle
Made only worthy in his love, and her
Thankful acceptance, for her sake to rob
The Orphan Kingdom of such guardians, as Must of necessity descend from from him;
And therefore in some part of recompence
Of his much love, and to shew to the world
That 'twas not her fault only, but her fate,
That did deny to let her be the mother
Of such most certain blessings: yet for proof,
She did not envy her, that happy her,
That is appointed to them, her quick end
Should make way for her, which no sooner spoke,
But in a moment this too ready engine
Made such a battery in the choicest Castle
That ever nature made to defend life,
That strait it shook, and sunk.

Thier. Stay, dares any

Presume to shed a tear before me? or
Ascribe that worth unto themselves to merit:
To do so for her? I have done, now on.

Mart. Fall'n thus, once more she smil'd, as if that death
For her had studied a new way to sever
The soul and body, without sense of pain;
And then tell him (quothe she) what you have seen,
And with what willingness 'twas done: for which My last request unto him is, that he Would instantly make choice of one (most happy
In being so chosen) to supply my place,
By whom if heaven blest him with a daughter,
In my remembrance let it bear my name
Which said she dy'd.

Thier. I hear this, and yet live;
Heart! art thou thunder proof, will nothing break thee?
She's dead, and what her entertainment may be
In th'other world without me is uncertain,
And dare I stay here unresolv'd?

Mart. Oh Sir!

Brun. Dear son.

Prot. Great King.

Thier. Unhand me, am I fall'n
So low, that I have lost the power to be Disposer of my own life?

Mart. Be but pleas'd

To borrow so much time of sorrow, as
To call to mind her last request, for whom

(I must confess a loss beyond expression)
You turn your hand upon your self, 'twas hers
And dying hers, that you should live and happy
In seeing little models of your self,
By matching with another, and will you
Leave any thing that she desir'd ungranted?
And suffer such a life that was laid down
For your sake only to be fruitless?

Thier. Oh thou dost throw charms upon me, against which I cannot stop my ears, bear witness heaven
That not desire of life, nor love of pleasure
Nor any future comforts, but to give
Peace to her blessed spirit in satisfying
Her last demand, makes me defer our meeting,
Which in my choice, and suddain choice shall be
To all apparent,

Brun. How? doe I remove one mischief
To draw upon my head a greater?

Thier. Go, thou only good man, to whom for her self Goodness is dear, and prepare to inter it
In her that was; oh my heart! my Ordella,
A monument worthy to be the casket
Of such a jewel.

Mart. Your command that makes way
Unto my absence is a welcome one,
For but your self there's nothing here Martel,
Can take delight to look on; yet some comfort
Goes back with me to her, who though she want it Deserves all blessings.

Exit.

Brun. So soon to forget
The loss of such a wife, believe it will
Be censur'd in the world.

Thier. Pray you no more,
There is no argument you can use to cross it,
But does increase in me such a suspicion
I would not cherish — who's that?

Enter Membrege.

Memb. One, no guard
Can put back from access, whose tongue no threats
Nor praises can silence, a bold suitor, and
For that which if you are your self, a King,
You were made so to grant it, Justice, Justice.

Thier. With what assurance dare you hope for that Which is deny'd to me? or how can I Stand bound to be just, unto such as are Beneath me, that find none from those that are Above me?

Memb. There is justice, 'twere unfit
That any thing but vengeance should fall on him,
That by his giving way to more than murder,
(For my dear fathers death was parricide)
Makes it his own.

Brun. I charge you hear her not.

Memb. Hell cannot stop just prayers from ent'ring heaven,
I must and will be heard Sir; but remember
That he that by her plot fell, was your brother,
And the place where, your Palace, against all
Th'inviolable rites of hospitality,
Your word, a Kings word, given up for his safety,
His innocence, his protection, and the gods
Bound to revenge the impious breach of such
So great and sacred bonds; and can you wonder,
(That in not punishing such a horrid murder
You did it) that heavens favour is gone from you?
Which never will return, until his blood
Be wash'd away in hers.

Brun. Drag hence the wretch.

Thier. Forbear, with what variety
Of torments do I meet? oh thou halt open'd
A Book, in which writ down in bloody Letters,
My conscience finds that I am worthy of
More than I undergoe, but I'll begin
For my Ordella's sake, and for thine own

To make less heavens great anger : thou hast lost
A father, I to thee am so ; the hope
Of a good Husband, in me have one ; nor
Be fearful I am still no man, already
That weakness is gone from me.

Brun. That it might

Have ever grown inseparably upon thee,
What will you do? Is such a thing as this Worthy the lov'd Ordella's place, the daughter
Of a poor Gardener?

Memb. Your Son.

Thier. The power

To take away that lowness is in me.

Brun. Stay yet, for rather than thou shalt add Incest unto thy other sins, I will
With hazard of my own life, utter all,
Theodoret was thy Brother.

Thier. You deny'd it.

Upon your oath, nor will I now believe you,
Your Protean turnings cannot change my purpose.

Memb. And for me, be assur'd the means to be Reveng'd on thee, vile hag, admits no thought,
But what tends to it.

Brun. Is it cometo that?

Then have at the last refuge: art thou grown Insensible in all, that thou goest on Without the least compunction? there, take that
To witness, that thou hadst a mother, which Forefaw thy cause of grief, and sad repentance,
That so soon after blest Ordella's death
Without a tear thou canst embrace another,
Forgetful man.

Thier. Mine eyes when she is nam'd
Cannot forget their tribute, and your gift
Is not unuseful now

Lecu. He's past all cure, that only touch is death.

Thier. This night I'll keep it,
To morrow I will send it you, and full of my affliction.

Exit Thierry.

Brun. Is the poison mortal?

Lecu. Above the help of Physick.

Brun. To my wish,

Now for our own security, you Protaldye
Shall this night post towards Austracia,
With Letters to Theodore's bastard son,
In which we will make known what for his rising
We have done to Thierry : no denial,
Nor no excuse in such acts must be thought of,
Which all dislike, and all again commend
When they are brought unto a happy end.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Devitry and four Soldiers.

Devi. NO War, no Money, no Master; banish'd the Court, not trusted in the City, whipt out of the Countrey, in what a triangle runs our misery? let me hear which of you has the best voice to beg in, for other hopes or fortunes I see you have not; be not nice, nature provided you with tones for the purpose, the peoples charity was your heritage, and I would see which of you deserves his birth-right.

Omnes. We understand you not Captain.

Devi. You see this cardique, the last, and the only quin-tescence of 50 Crowns, distill'd in the limbeck of your gard-age, of which happy piece thou shalt be treasurer: now he that can soonest perswade him to part with't, enjoys it, possesses it, and with it, me and my future countenance.

1. If they want Art to perswade it, I'll keep it my self.
Devi. So you be not a partial judge in your own cause, you shall.

Omnes. A match.

Aside. 2. I'll begin to you, brave Sir; be proud to make him happy by your liberality, whose tongue vouchsafes now to petition, was never heard before less than to command.
I am a Soldier by profession, a Gentleman by birth, and an Officer by place, whose poverty blushes to be the cause, that so high a virtue should descend to the pity of your charity.

1. In any case keep your high stile, it is not charity to shame any man, much less a virtue of your eminence, wherefore preserve your worth, and I'll preserve my money.

3. You perswade? you are shallow, give way to merit:
ah by the bread of a good man, thou hast a bonny countenance and a blith, promising mickle good to a sicker womb, that has trode a long and a sore ground to meet with friends, that will owe much to thy reverence, when they shall hear of thy courtesie to their wandring countreyman.

1. You that will use your friends so hardly to bring them in debt, Sir, will deserve worse of a stranger, wherefore pead on, pead on, I say.

4. It is the Welch must do't I see, comrade man of ur-ship, St. Tavy be her Patron, the gods of the mountains keep her cow and her cupboard; may she never want the green of the Leek, and the fat of the Onion, if she part with her bounties to him, that is a great deal away from her cozines, and has two big suits in law to recover her heritage.

1. Pardon me Sir, I will have nothing to do with your suits, it comes within the statute of maintenance: home to your cozines, and some garlick and hempseed, the one will stop your hunger; the other end your suits, gammawash comrade, gammawash.

4. 'Foot he'll hoord all for himself.

Vitry. Yes, let him; now comes my turn, I'll see if he can answer me; save you Sir, they say, you have that I want, Money.

1. And that you are like to want, for ought I perceive
yet.

Vitry. Stand, deliver.

1. 'Foot what mean you, you will not rob the Exchequer?

Vit. Do you prate?

1. Hold, hold, here Captain.

2. Why I could have done this before you?

3. And I.

4. And I.

Vit. You have done this, brave man be proud to make him happy, by the bread of God man, thou hast a bonny countenance, comrade man of urship, St. Tavy be her patron, out upon you, you uncurried colts, walking cans that have no souls in you, but a little Rosin to keep your ribs sweet, and hold in liquor.

Omnes. Why, what would you have us to do Captain?

Devi. Beg, beg, and keep Constables waking, wear out stocks and whipcord, maunder for butter-milk, dye of the Jaundice, yet have the cure about you, Lice, large Lice, begot of your own dust, and the heat of the Brick-kills, may you starve, and fear of the gallows, which is a gentle consumption to't, only prefer it, or may you fall upon your fear, and be hanged for selling those purses to keep you from famine, whose monies my valour empties, and be cast without other evidence; here is my Fort, my Castle of defence, who comes by shall pay me toll, the first purse is your mitimus slaves.

2. The purse, 'foot we'll share in the money Captain, if any come within a furlong of our fingers.

4. Did you doubt but we could steal as well as your self,
did not I speak Welch?

3. We are thieves from our cradles, and will dye so.

Vit. Then you will not beg again.

Omnes. Yes, as you did, stand, and deliver.

2. Hark,

2. Hark, here comes handfel, 'tis a Trade quickly set up, and as soon cast down.

Vitry. Have goodness in your minds varlets, and to't like men; he that has more money than we, cannot be our friend, and I hope there is no law for spoiling the enemy.

3. You need not instruct us farther, your example pleads enough.

Devitry. Disperse your selves, and as their company is, fall on.

2. Come, there are a band of 'em, I'll charge single.

Enter Protaldye. Exit Soldier.

Prot. 'Tis wonderful dark, I have lost my man, and dare not call for him, lest I should have more followers than I would pay wages to; what throws am I in, in this travel? these be honourable adventures; had I that honest blood in my veins again Queen, that your feats and these frights have drain'd from me, honor should pull hard, e'r it drew me into these brakes.

Devitry. Who goes there?

Prot. Hey ho, here's a pang of preferment.

Devi. 'Heart, who goes there?

Prot. He that has no heart to your acquaintance, what shall I do with my Jewels and my Letter, my codpiece that's too loose; good, my boots, who is't that spoke to me? here's a friend.

Devi. We shall find that presently, stand, as you love your safety, stand.

Prot. That unlucky word of standing, has brought me to all this, hold, or I shall never stand you.

Devi. I should know that voice, deliver.

Enter Soldiers.

Prot. All that I have is at your service Gentlemen, and much good may it do you.

Devi. Zones down with him, do you prate?

Prot. Keep your first word as you are Gentlemen, and let me stand, alas, what do you mean?

2. To tye you to us Sir, bind you in the knot of friendship.

Prot. Alas Sir, all the physick in Europe cannot bind me.

Devi. You should have jewels about you, stones, precious stones.

1. Captain away, there's company within hearing, if you stay longer, we are surpriz'd.

Devi. Let the Devil come, I'll pillage this Fregat a little better yet.

2. 'Foot we are lost, they are upon us.

Devi. Ha, upon us, make the least noise, 'tis thy parting gaipe.

3. Which way shall we make Sir?

Devi. Every man his own; do you hear, only bind me, bind me before you goe, and when the company's past, make to this place again, this karvel should have better lading in him, you are slow, why do you not tye harder?

1. You are sure enough I warrant you Sir.

Devi. Darkness befriend you, away. Exit Soldiers.

Prot. What tyrants have I met with, they leave me alone in the dark, yet would not have me cry. I shall grow wondrous melancholly if I stay long here without company; I was wont to get a nap with saying my prayers, I'll see if they will work upon me now; but then, if I should talk in my sleep, and they hear me, they would make a Recorder of my windpipe, slit my throat: heaven be prais'd, I hear some noise, it may be new purchase, and then I shall have fellows.

Devi. They are gone past hearing, now to taske Devitry, help, help, as you are men help; some charitable hand, relieve a poor distressed miserable wretch, thieves, wicked thieves have robb'd me; bound me.

Prot. 'Foot, would they had gagg'd you too, your noise will betray us, and fetch them again.

Devi. What blessed tongue spake to me, where, where where are you Sir?

Prot. A plague of your bawling throat, we are well enough if you have the grace to be thankful for't, do but snore to me, and 'tis as much as I desire, to pass away time with, till morning, then talk as loud as you please Sir, I am bound not to stir, therefore lie still and snore I say.

Devi. Then you have met with thieves too I see.

Prot. And desire to meet with no more of them.

Devi. Alas, what can we suffer more? they are far enough by this time, have they not all, all that we have Sir?

Prot. No by my faith have they not Sir; I gave them one trick to boot for their learning, my Boots Sir, my Foots, I have sav'd my stock, and my jewels in them, and therefore desire to hear no more of them.

Devi. Now blessing on your wit, Sir, what a dull slave was I? dreamt not of your conveyance, help to unbind me Sir, and I'll undoe you, my life for yours, no worse thief than my self meets you again this night.

Prot. Reach me thy hands,

Devi. Here Sir, here, I could beat my brains out, that could not think of boots, boots Sir, wide topt boots, I shall love them the better whilst I live, but are you sure your Jewels are here Sir?

Prot. Sure sayst thou? ha, ha, ha.

Devi. So ho, il'o ho.

Within Soldiers.

Here Captain, here.

Prot. 'Foot what do you mean Sir?

Enter Soldiers.

Devi. A trick to boot, say you; here you dull slaves, purchase, purchase the soul of the Rock, Diamonds, sparkling Diamonds.

Prot. I'm betraid, lost, past recovery, lost as you are men.

Devi. Nay rook, since you will be prating, we'll have your carrion with you, have you any other conveyance now Sir?

1. 'Foot here are Letters, Epistles, familiar Epistles, we'll see what treasure is in them, they are seal'd sure.

Prot. Gentlemen, as you are Gentlemen spare my Letters, and take all willingly, all: I'll give you a release, a general release, and meet you here to morrow with as much more.

Devi. Nay, since you have your tricks, and your conveyances, we will not leave a wrinkle of you unscar'd.

Prot. Hark, there comes company, you will be betraid, as you love your safeties, beat out my brains, I shall betray you else.

Devi. Treason, unheard of Treason, monstrous, monstrous villainies.

Prot. I confess my self a Traitor, shew your selves good subjects, and hang me up for't.

1. If it be treason, the discovery will get our pardon, Captain.

Devi. Would we were all lost, hang'd, quarter'd, to save this one, one innocent Prince; Thierry's poison'd, by his mother poison'd, the Mistress to this stallion, who by that poison ne'er shall sleep again.

2. 'Foot let us mince him by piece-meals, till he eat himself up.

3. Let us dig out his heart with needles, and half broil him, like a Mussel.

Prot. Such another and I prevent you, my blood's settled already.

Devi. Here's that shall remove it, toad, viper, drag him unto Martel, unnatural paricide, cruel, bloody woman.

Omnes. On you dogfish, leech, caterpillar.

Devi. A longer sight of him will make my rage turn pity, and with his suddain end, prevent revenge and torture, wicked, wicked Brunhalt.

Exit.

Enter Bawdber and three Courtiers.

1. Not sleep at all, no means. 2. No Art can do it.

Bawdb. I will assure you, he can sleep no more Than a hooded Hawks, a centinel to him, Or one of the City Constables are tops.

3. How came he so?

Bawdb. They are too wise that dare know, Something's amiss, heaven help all.

1. What cure has he? Bawdb. Armies of those we call Physitians, some with glisters, Some with Lettice-caps, some posset-drinks, some Pills, Twenty consulting here about a drench,

Enter Messenger.

The bringing in of Leonor the bastard
Son to your murther'd brother, her Phyſitian
By this time is attacht to that damn'd devil.

M.ſſ. 'Tis like he will be ſo, for e'er we came Fearing an equal juſtice for his miſchiefs,
He drencht himſelf.

Brun. He did like one of mine then.

Thier. Muſt I ſtill ſee theſe miſeries, no night
To hide me from their horrors, that Protaldy
See juſtice fall upon.

Brun. Now I could ſleep too.

Enter Ordella.

Mart. I'll give you yet more Poppy, bring the Lady
And heaven in her embraces; gives him quiet,
Madam, unveil your ſelf.

Ordel. I do forgive you,
And though you fought my blood, yet I'll pray for you.

Brun. Art thou alive?

Mart. Now could you ſleep?

Brun. For ever.

Mart. Go carry her without wink of ſleep, or quiet,
Where her ſtrong knave Protaldy's broke o'th' wheel,
And let his cries and roars be muſick to her,
I mean to waken her.

Thier. Do her no wrong.

Mart. Nor right, as you love juſtice.

Brun. I will think,

And if there be new curſes in old nature,
I have a ſoul dare ſend them.

Mart. Keep her waking.

Exit Brunhalt.

Thier. What's that appears ſo ſweetly? there's that face.

Mart. Be moderate, Lady.

Thier. That Angels face.

Mart. Goe nearer.

Thier. Martel. I cannot laſt long, ſee the ſoul,
I ſee it perfectly of my Ordella,
The heavenly figure of her ſweetneſs there,
Forgive me gods, it comes, Divineſt ſubſtance,
Kneel, kneel, kneel every one, Saint of thy Sex,
If it be for my cruelty thou comeſt,
Do ye ſee her hoe?

Mart. Yes Sir, and you ſhall know her.

Thier. Down, down again, to be reveng'd for blood,
Sweet Spirit I am ready, ſhe ſmiles on me,
O bleſſed ſign of Peace.

Mart. Goe nearer Lady.

Ordel. I came to make you happy.

Thier. Hear you that, Sir?

She comes to crown my ſoul away, get ſacrifice
Whilst I with holy Honors.

Mart. She's alive, Sir.

Thier. In everlaſting life, I know it friend,
Oh happy, happy ſoul.

Ordel. Alas, I live Sir,
A mortal woman ſtill.

Thier. Can ſpirits weep too?

Mart. She's no ſpirit Sir, pray kiſs her, Lady,
Be very gentle to him.

Thier. Stay, ſhe is warm,
And by my life the ſame lips tell me brightneſs,
Are you the ſame Ordella ſtill?

Mart. The ſame, Sir.

Whom heavens and my good Angel ſtaid from ruin.

Thier. Kiſs me again.

Ordel. The ſame ſtill, ſtill your ſervant.

Thier. 'Tis ſhe, I know her now Martel; ſit down ſweet.

Oh bleſt and happieſt woman, a dead ſlumber
Begins to creep upon me, oh my jewel!

Enter Meſſenger and Memberge.

Ordel. Oh ſleep my Lord.

Thier. My joyes are too much for me.

Meſſ. Brunhalt impatient of her constraint to ſee
Protaldy tortur'd, has choak'd her ſelf.

Mart. No more, her ſins go with her.

Thier. Love, I muſt die, I faint, cloſe up my glaſſes.

1 Doct. The Queen faints too, and deadly.

Thier. One dying kiſs.

Ordel. My laſt Sir, and my deareſt, and now
Cloſe my eyes too.

Thier. Thou perfect woman.

Martel, the Kingdom's yours, take Memberge to you,
And keep my line alive; nay, weep not, Lady,
Take me, I go.

Ordel. Take me too, farewel honour

Die both.

2 Doct. They are gone for ever.

Mart. The peace of happy ſouls go after them,
Bear them to their laſt beds, whilst I ſtudy
A Tomb to ſpeak their loves; whilst old time laſteth
I am your King in ſorrows.

Omnes. We your ſubjects.

Mart. Devitry, for your ſervice, be near us,
Whip out theſe inſtruments of this mad mother
From Court, and all good people; and becauſe
She was born Noble, let that Title find her
A private grave, but neither tongue nor honor:
And now lead on, they that ſhall read this ſtory,
Shall find that Virtue lives in Good, not Glory.

Exeunt Omnes.

The Woman-Hater.

P R O L O G U E.

Gentlemen, Inductions are out of date, and a Prologue in Verse, is as stale as a black Velvet Cloak, and a Bay Garland: therefore you shall have it plain Prose, thus: If there be any amongst you, that come to hear lascivious Scenes, let them depart: for I do pronounce this, to the utter discomfort of all two-penny Gallery men, you shall have no bawdery in it: or if there be any lurking amongst you in corners, with Table-books, who have some hope to find fit matter to feed his — malice on, let them claspe them up, and slink away, or stay and be converted. For he that made this Play, means to please Auditors so, as he may be an Auditor himself hereafter, and not purchase them with the dearness of his cares: I dare not call it Comedy or Tragedy; 'tis perfectly neither: A Play it is, which was meant to make you laugh, how it would please you, is not written in my Part: for though you should like it to day, perhaps your selves know not how you should digest it to morrow: Some things in it you may meet with, which are out of the common road: a Duke there is, and the Scæne lies in Italy, as those two things lightly we never miss. But you shall not find in it the ordinary and over-worn Trade of jesting at Lords and Courtiers, and Citizens, without taxation of any particular or new vice by them found out, but at the persons of them: such, he, that made this, thinks vile, and for his own part vows; That he did never think, but that a Lord, Lord born might be a wise man, and a Courtier an honest man.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Duke of Millain, Arrigo, Lucio, and two Courtiers.

Is now the sweetest time for sleep, the night is scarce spent; Arrigo, what's a clock?

Arri. Past four.

Duke. Is it so much, and yet the morn not up?

See yonder where the shamefac'd Maiden comes

Into our sight, how gently doth she slide,
Hiding her chaste cheeks, like a modest Bride,
With a red veil of blushes; as if she,
Even such all modest virtuous Women be.

Why thinks your Lordship I am up so soon?

Lucio. About some weighty State plot.

Duke. And what thinks your knighthood of it?

Arri. I do think to cure some strange corruptions in the Common-wealth.

Duke. Y'are well conceited of your selves to think
I chuse you out to bear me company
In such affairs and business of state:
For am not I a pattern for all Princes,
That break my soft sleep for my subjects good?
Am I not careful? very provident?

Luc. Your Grace is careful.

Arri. Very provident.

Duke. Nay, knew you how my serious working plots,
Concern the whole Estates of all my subjects,

I, and their lives; then Lucio thou wouldst swear,
I were a loving Prince.

Luc. I think your Grace intends to walk the publick streets disguis'd, to see the streets disorders.

Duke. It is not so

Arri. You secretly will cross some other states, that do conspire against you.

Duke. Weightier far:

You are my friends, and you shall have the cause;
I break my sleeps thus soon to see a wench.

Luc. Y'are wond'rous careful for your subjects good.

Arri. You are a very loving Prince indeed.

Duke. This care I take for them, when their dull eyes,
Are clos'd with heavy slumbers.

Arri. Then you rise to see your wenches?

Luc. What Milan beauty hath the power, to charm her Sovereign eyes, and break his sleeps:

Duke. Sister to Count Valore, she's a Maid
Would make a Prince forget his throne, and stare,
And lowly kneel to her: the general fate
Of all mortality, is hers to give;
As she disposeth, so we die and live.

Luc. My Lord, the day grows clear, the Court will rise.

Duk. We stay too long, is the Umbrances head as we commanded, sent to the sad Gondarino, our General?

Arri. 'Tis sent.

Duke. But stay, where shines that light?

Arri. 'Tis in the chamber of Lazarello.

Duke. Lazarillo? what is he?

Arri. A Courtier my Lord, and one that I wonder your Grace knows not: for he hath followed your Court, and your last predecessors, from place to place, any time this seven years, as faithfully as your Spits and your Dripping-pans have done, and almost as greedily.

Duke. Oh we know him, as we have heard, he keeps a Kalender of all the dishes of meat, that have been in the Court, ever since our great Grandfathers time; and when he can thrust in at no Table, he makes his meat of that.

Lucio. The very same my Lord.

Duke. A Courtier call'st thou him?

Believe me Lucio, there be many such About our Court, respected, as they think, Even by our self; with thee I will be plain: We Princes do use, to preferre many for nothing, and to take particular and free knowledg, almost in the nature of acquaintance of many; whom we do use only for our pleasures, and to give largely to numbers; more out of policy to be thought liberal, and by that means to make the people strive to deserve our Love; than to reward any particular desert of theirs, to whom we give: and do suffer our selves to hear flatterers, more for recreation Than for love of it, though we seldom hate it: And yet we know all these, and when we please, Can touch the wheel, and turn their names about.

Luc. I wonder they that know their states so well, should fancy such base slaves.

Duke. Thou wond'rest Lucio, Dost not thou think, if thou wert Duke of Milan, Thou should'st be flattered?

Luc. I know my Lord, I would not.

Duke. Why so, I thought till I was Duke, I thought I should have left me no more flatterers, than there are now Plain-dealers; and yet for all this my resolution, I am most palpably flattered: the poor man may loath covetousness and flattery, but fortune will alter the mind when the wind turns: there may be well a little conflict, but it will drive the billows before it.

Arri it grows late, for see, fair Thetis hath undone the bars

To Phebus team; and his unrival'd light, Hath chac'd the mornings modest blush away: Now must we to our love, bright Paphian Queen; Thou Cytherean goddess, that delights In stirring glances, and art still thy self, More toying than thy team of Sparrows be; Thou laughing Errecina, oh inspire Her heart with love, or lessen my desire.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Lazarillo and his boy.

Laz. Go run, search, pry in every nook and angle of the Kitchens, Larders, and Pasteries, know what meat's boil'd, bak'd, rost, stew'd, fri'd, or fous'd, at this dinner to be serv'd directly, or indirectly, to every several Table in the Court, be gone.

Boy. I run, but not so fast as your mouth will do upon the stroke of Eleven.

Exit Boy.

Laz. What an excellent thing did God bestow upon man, when he gave him a good stomach? what unbounded graces there are pour'd upon them that have the continual command of the very best of these blessings? 'tis an excellent thing to be a Prince; he is serv'd with such admirable variety of Fare; such innumerable choice of Delicates; his Tables are full fraught with most nourishing food, and his Cubbards heavy laden with rich Wines; his Court is still filled with most pleasant variety: In the Summer, his Palace is full of Green Geese; and in Winter it swarmeth with Woodcocks,

Oh thou goddess of Plenty

Fill me this day with some rare delicates

And I will every year most constantly, As this day celebrate a sumptuous Feast, If thou wilt send me victuals in thine honor? And to it shall be bidden for thy sake, Even all the valiant stomachs in the Court: All short-cloak'd Knights, and all cross-garter'd Gentlemen; All pump and pantoffe, foot-cloth riders; With all the swarming generation Of long stocks, short pain'd hose, and huge stuff'd doublets: All these shall eat, and which is more than yet Hath e'er been seen, they shall be satisfied I wonder my Ambassador returns not?

Enter Boy.

Boy. Here I am Master.

Laza. And welcome:

Never did that sweet Virgin in her smock, Fair-cheek'd Andromeda, when to the rock Her Ivorie limbs were chain'd, and straight before A huge Sea-monster, tumbling to the shore, To have devour'd her, with more longing sight Expect the coming of some hardy Knight, That might have quell'd his pride, and set her free, Than I with longing sight have look'd for thee.

Boy. Your Perseus is come Master, that will destroy him, The very comfort of whose presence shuts The monster hunger from your yelping guts Laza. Brief boy, brief, discourse the service of each several Table compendiously.

Boy. Here's a Bill of all Sir.

Laza. Give it me, a Bill of all the several services this day appointed for every Table in the Court, I, this is it on which my hopes relye, Within this paper all my joyes are clos'd: Boy, open it, and read it with reverence.

Boy. For the Captain of the Guards Table, three chines of Beef, and two joals of Sturgeon.

Laza. A portly service, but gross, gross, proceed to the Dukes own Table, dear boy, to the Dukes own Table,

Boy. For the Dukes own Table, the head of an Umbrana.

Laza. Is't possible? can Heaven be so propitious to the Duke?

Boy. Yes, I'll assure you Sir, 'tis possible, Heaven is so propitious to him.

Laza. Why then he is the richest Prince alive: He were the wealthiest Monarch in all Europe, Had he no other Territories, Dominions, Provinces, Seats,, Not Palaces, but only that Umbrana's head.

Boy. 'Tis very fresh and sweet, Sir, the fish was taken but this night, and the head, as a rare novelty, appointed by special commandement for the Dukes own Table, this dinner.

Laza. If poor unworthy I may come to eat Of this most sacred dish, I here do vow (If that blind Hufwife, Fortune will bestow But means on me) to keep a sumptuous house, A board groaning under the heavy burden of the beasts that cheweth the cudd, and the Fowl that cutteth the Air: I shall not like the Table of a cuntry Justice, besprinkled over with all manner of cheap Sallads, sliced Beef, Giblets, and Petitoes, to fill up room, nor should there stand any great, cumberfom, un-cut-up pies, at the nether end fill'd with moss and stones, partly to make a shew with and partly to keep the lower Mefs from eating, nor shall my meat come in sneaking, like the City service, one dish a quarter of an hour after another, and gone, as if they had appointed to meet there, and had mistook the hour, nor should it, like the new Court service, come in in haste, as if it fain would be gone again, all courses at once, like a hunting breakfast, but I would have my several courses, and my dishes well fill'd, my first course should be brought in after the antient manner, by a score of old bleer-ey'd Serving-men, in long blew coats, (marry they shall buy Silk, Facing, and Buttons themselves) but that's by the way.

Boy.

Boy. Master the time calls on, will you be walking?

Exit Boy.

Laza. Follow boy, follow, my guts were half an hour since in the privy Kitchin.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Count, and his Sister Oriana.

Oria. Faith brother, I must needs go yonder.

Count. And faith Sister what will you do yonder?

Oria. I know the Lady Honorio will be glad to see me.

Count. Glad to see you? faith the Lady Honorio cares for you as she doth for all other young Ladies, she's glad to see you, and will shew you the Privy Garden, and tell you how many Gowns the Duchefs had; Marry if you have ever an old Uncle, that would be a Lord, or ever a kinsman that hath done a murther, or committed a robbery, and will give good store of Money to procure his pardon, then the Lady Honorio will be glad to see you.

Oria. I, but they say one shall see fine sights at the Court.

Count. I'll tell you what you shall see, you shall see many faces of mans making, for you shall find very few as God left them: and you shall see many legs too; amongst the rest you shall behold one pair, the feet of which, were in times past, sockless, but are now through the change of time (that alters all things) very strangely become the legs of a Knight and a Courtier; another pair you shall see, that were heir apparent legs to a Glover, these legs hope shortly to be honourable; when they pass by they will bow, and the mouth to these legs, will seem to offer you some Courtship; it will not swear, but it will lye, hear it not.

Oria. Why, and are not these fine sights?

Count. Sister, in seriousness you yet are young And fair, a fair young Maid, and apt.

Oria. Apt?

Count. Exceeding apt to be drawn to.

Oria. To what?

Count. To that you should not be, 'tis no dispraise,

She is not bad that hath desire to ill,
But she that hath no power to rule that Will:

For there you shall be wooed in other kinds
Than yet your years have known, the chiefest men
Will seem to throw themselves
As vassals at your voice, kiss your hand,
Prepare your Banquets, Masques, Shews, all inticements
That Wit and Lust together can devise,
To draw a Lady from the state of Grace
To an old Lady widdows Gallery;
And they will praise your virtues, beware that,
The only way to turn a Woman whore,
Is to commend her chastity: you'll goe?

Oria. I would go, if it were but only to shew you, that I could be there, and be mov'd with none of these tricks.

Count. Your servants are ready!

Oria. An hour since.

Count. Well, if you come off clear from this hot service,
Your praise shall be the greater. Farewel Sister.

Oria. Farewel Brother.

Count. Once more, if you stay in the presence till candle-light, keep on the fore-side o'th' Curtain; and do you hear, take heed of the old Bawd, in the cloth of Tissue sleeves, and the knit Mittines. Farewel Sister. Exit Oria.

Now am I idle, I would I had been a Scholar, that I might a studied now: the punishment of meaner men is, they have too much to do; our only misery is, that without company we know not what to do; I must take some of the common courses of our Nobility; which is thus: if I can find no company that likes me, pluck off my Hatband, throw an old Cloak over my face, and as if I would not be known, walk hastily through the streets, till I be discovered; then there goes Count such a one, says one; there goes Count such a one, says another: Look how fast he goes, says a third; there's some great matters in hand questionless, says a fourth; when all my business is to have them say so: this hath been used; or if I can find any company, I'll after dinner to the Stage, to see a Play; where, when I first enter, you shall have a murmure in the house, every one that does not know cries, What Nobleman is that? all the Gallants on the Stage rise, vail to me, kiss their hand, offer me their places: then I pick out some one, whom I please to grace among the rest, take his seat, use it, throw my cloak over my face, and laugh at him: the poor Gentleman imagines himself most highly grac'd, thinks all the Auditors esteem him one of my bolom friends; and in right special regard with me. But here comes a Gentleman, that I hope will make me better sport, than either street and stage fooleries.

Enter Lazarello and Boy.

This man loves to eat good meat, always provided, he do not pay for it himself, he goes by the name of the Hungry Courtier, marry, because I think that name will not sufficiently distinguish him, for no doubt he hath more fellows there, his name is Lazarello, he is none of these ordinary eaters, that will devour three breakfasts, and as many dinners, without any prejudice to their Beavers, Drinkings, or Suppers; but he hath a more courtly kind of hunger, and doth hunt more after novelty, than plenty, I'll over-hear him.

Laza. Oh thou most itching kindly appetite,
Which every creature in his stomach feels;
Oh leave, leave yet at last thus to torment me.
Three several Sallads have I sacrific'd,
Bedew'd with precious oil and vinegar
Already to appease thy greedy wrath. Boy.

Boy. Sir.

Laza. Will the Count speak with me?

Boy. One of his Gentlemen is gone to inform him of your coming, Sir.

Laza. There is no way left for me to compass the Fish-head, but by being presently made known to the Duke.

Boy. That will be hard Sir.

Laza. When I have tasted of this sacred dish,
Then shall my bones rest in my Fathers tomb
In peace; then shall I dye most willingly,
And as a dish be serv'd to satisfie,
Deaths hunger, and I will be buried thus:
My Bier shall be a charger born by four,
The Coffin where I lye, a powd'ring-tub,
Bestrew'd with Lettice, and cool Sallad herbs,
My Winding-sheet of Tansies, the black Guard
Shall be my solemn Mourners, and instead
Of ceremonies, wholsom burial Prayers:
A printed dirge in rhyme, shall bury me.
Instead of tears, let them pour Capon sauce upon my hearse,
And salt instead of dust, Manchets for stones, for other glorious shields

Give me a Volder; and above my Hearse
For a Trutch sword, my naked knife stuck up.

The Count discovers himself.

Boy. Master, the Count's here.

Laza. Where? my Lord I do beseech you.

Count. Y'are very welcome Sir, I pray you stand up, you shall dine with me.

Laza. I do beseech your Lordship by the love
I still have born to your honourable house.

Count. Sir, what need all this? you shall dine with me,
I pray rise.

Laza. Perhaps your Lordship takes me for one of these same fellows, that do as it were respect victuals.

Count. Oh Sir by no means.

Laza. Your Lordship has often promised, that whensoever I should affect greatness, your own hand should help to raise me.

Count.

Count. And so much still assure your self of.

Laz. And though I must confess, I have ever snu'd popularity, by the example of others, yet I do now feel my self a little ambitious, your Lordship is great, and though young, yet a Privy Counsellor.

Count. I pray you Sir leap into the matter, what would You have me do for you?

Laz. I would intreat your Lordship to make me known to the Duke.

Count. When Sir?

Laz. Suddainly my Lord, I would have you present me unto him this morning.

Count. It shall be done, but for what virtues, would you have him take notice of you?

Laz. Your Lordship shall know that presently.

Count. 'Tis pity of this fellow, he is of good wit, and sufficient understanding, when he is not troubled with this greedy worm.

Laz. 'Faith, you may intreat him to take notice of me for anything; for being an excellent Farrier, for playing well at Span-counter, or sticking knives in walls, for being impudent, or for nothing; why may not I be a Favorite on the suddain? I see nothing against it.

Count. Not so Sir, I know you have not the face to be a Favourite on the suddain.

Laz. Why then you shall present me as a Gentleman well qualified, or one extraordinary seen in divers strange mysteries.

Count. In what Sir? as how?

Laz. Marry as thus.

Enter Intelligencer.

Count. Yonder's my old Spirit, that hath haunted me daily, ever since I was a privy Counsellor, I must be rid of him, I pray you stay there, I am a little busie, I will speak with you presently.

Laz. You shall bring me in, and after a little other talk taking me by the hand, you shall utter these words to the Duke: May it please your grace, to take note of a Gentleman, well read, deeply learned, and throughly grounded in the hidden knowledge of all Sallads and Pot-herbs whatsoever.

Count. 'Twill be rare if you will walk before, Sir, I will overtake you instantly.

Laz. Your Lordships ever.

Count. This fellow is a kind of an informer, one that lives in Alehouses and Taverns, and because he perceives some worthy men in this Land, with much labour and great expence, to have discovered things dangerously hanging over the State; he thinks to discover as much out of the talk of drunkards in Tap-houses: he brings me informations, pick'd out of broken words, in mens common talk, which, with his malicious mis-application, he hopes will seem dangerous, he doth besides, bring me the names of all the young Gentlemen in the City, that use Ordinaries, or Taverns, talking (to my thinking) only as the freedom of their youth teach them, without any further ends; for dangerous and seditious spirits; he is besides, an arrant whoremaster, as any is in Milan, of a Lay-man; I will not meddle with the Clergy: he is parcel Lawyer, and in my conscience much of their religion, I must put upon him some piece of service; come hither Sir, what have you to do with me?

Int. Little my Lord, I only come to know how your Lordship would employ me.

Count. Observed you that Gentleman, that parted from me but now?

Int. I saw him now my Lord.

Count. I was sending for you, I have talked with this man, and I do find him dangerous.

Int. Is your Lordship in good earnest?

Count. Hark you Sir, there may perhaps be some within ear-shots.

He whispers with him.

Enter Lazarello and his Boy.

Laz. Sirrah, will you venture your life, the Duke hath sent the Fish-head to my Lord?

Boy. Sir if he have not, kill me, do what you will with me.

Laz. How uncertain is the state of all mortal things? I have these crosses from my Cradle, from my very Cradle, insomuch that I do begin to grow desperate: Fortune I do despise thee, do thy worst; yet when I do better gather my self together, I do find it is rather the part of a wise man, to prevent the storms of Fortune by stirring, than to suffer them by standing still, to pour themselves upon his naked body, I will about it.

Count. Who's within there?

Enter a Servingman.

Let this Gentleman out at the back door, forget not my instructions, if you find anything dangerous; trouble not your self to find out me, but carry your informations to the Lord Lucio, he is a man grave, and well experienced in these businesses.

Int. Your Lordships Servant.

Exit Intelligencer and Servingman.

Count. Your Lordships servant.

Laz. Will it please your Lordship to walk?

Count. Sir I was coming, I will overtake you.

Laz. I will attend you over against the Lord Gonderinoes house.

Count. You shall not attend there long.

Laz. Thither must I to see my Loves face, the chaste Virgin head

Of a dear Fish, yet pure and undeflowred,
Not known of man no rough bred countrey hand,
Hath once toucht thee, no Pandars withered paw,
Nor an un-napkin'd Lawyers greasie fist,
Hath once flubbered thee: no Ladies supple hand,
Wash'd o'er with Urine, hath yet seiz'd on thee
With her two nimble talents: no Court hand,
Whom his own natural filth, or change of air,
Hath bedeck'd with scabs, hath marr'd thy whiter grace:
Oh let it be thought lawful then for me,
To crop the flower of thy Virginity.

Exit Lazarello.

Count. This day I am for fools, I am all theirs,
Though like to our young wanton cocker'd heirs,
Who do affect those men above the rest,
In whose base company they still are best:
I do not with much labour strive to be
The wisest ever in the company:
But for a fool, our wisdom oft amends,
As enemies do teach us more than friends.

Exit Count.

Actus

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Gondarino and his servants.

Serv. MY Lord :

Gond. Ha!

Serv. Here's one hath brought you a present,

Gond. From whom? from a woman? if it be from a woman, bid him carry it back, and tell her she's a whore; what is it?

Serv. A Fish head my Lord.

Gond. What Fish head?

Serv. I did not aske that my Lord.

Gond. Whence comes it?

Serv. From the Court.

Gond. O 'tis a Cods-head.

Serv. No my Lord, 'tis some strange head, it comes from the Duke.

Gond. Let it be carried to my Mercer, I doe owe him money for silks, stop his mouth with that.

Exit Serv.

Was there ever any man that hated his wife after death but I? and for her sake all women, women that were created only for the preservation of little dogs.

Enter Servant.

Serv. My Lord the Count's sister being overtaken in the streets, with a great hail-storm, is light at your gate, and desires Rome till the storm be overpast.

Gond. Is she a woman?

Serv. I my Lord I think so.

Gond. I have none for her then: bid her get her gone, tell her she is not welcome.

Serv. My Lord, she is now coming up.

Gond. She shall not come up, tell her any thing; tell her I have but one great room in my house, and I am now in it at the close stool.

Serv. She's here my Lord.

Gond. O impudence of women: I can keep dogs out of my house, or I can defend my house against theeves, but I cannot keep out women.

Enter Oriana, a waiting woman, and a Page.

Now Madam, what hath your Ladyship to say to me?

Oria. My Lord, I was bold to crave the help of your house against the storm.

Gond. Your Ladyships boldness in coming will be impudence in staying; for you are most unwelcome.

Oriana. Oh my Lord!

Gond. Doe you laugh? by the hate I bear to you, 'tis true.

Orian. Y'are merry my Lord.

Gond. Let me laugh to death if I be, or can be whilst thou art here, or livest; or any of thy sex.

Oriana. I commend your Lordship.

Gond. Doe you commend me? why doe you commend me? I give you no such cause: thou art a filthy impudent whore; a woman, a very woman.

Oria. Ha, ha, ha.

Gond. Begot when thy father was drunk.

Orian. Your Lordship hath a good wit.

Gond. How? what have I a good wit?

Orian. Come my Lord, I have heard before of your Lordships merry vain in jesting against our Sex, which I being desirous to hear, made me rather choose your Lordships house, than any other, but I know I am welcome.

Gond. Let me not live if you be: me thinks it doth not become you, to come to my house being a stranger to you,

I have no woman in my house, to entertain you, nor to shew you your chamber; why should you come to me? I have no Galleries, nor banqueting houses, nor bawdy pictures to shew your Ladyship.

Orian. Believe me this your Lordships plainness makes me think my self more welcome, than if you had sworn by all the pretty Court oaths that are, I had been welcomer than your soul to your body.

Gond. Now she's in, talking treason will get her out, I durit sooner undertake to talk an Intelligencer out of the room, and speak more than he durst hear, than talk a woman out of my company.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. My Lord the Duke being in the streets, and the storm continuing, is entred your gate, and now coming up.

Gond. The Duke! now I know your Errand Madam; you have plots and private meetings in hand: why doe you choose my house? are you afraid to goe to't in the old coupling place, though it be less suspicious here; for no Christian will suspect a woman to be in my house? yet you may do it cleaner there, for there is a care had of those businells; and wheresoever you remove, your great maintainer and you shall have your lodgings directly opposite, it is but putting on your night-gown, and your shippers, Madam, you understand me?

Orian. Before I would not understand him, but now he speaks riddles to me indeed.

Enter the Duke, Arrigo, and Lucio.

Duke. 'Twas a strange hail-storm.

Lucio. 'Twas exceeding strange.

Gond. Good morrow to your grace.

Duke. Good morrow Gondarino.

Gond. Justice great Prince.

Duke. Why should you beg for justice, I never did you wrong; What's the offender?

Gond. A woman.

Duke. I know your ancient quarrell against that Sex; but what heinous crime hath she committed?

Gond. She hath gone abroad.

Duke. What? it cannot be.

Gond. She hath done it.

Duke. How? I never heard of any woman that did so before.

Gond. If she have not laid by that modesty That should attend a Virgin, and, quite void Of shame, hath left the house where she was born, As they should never doe; let me endure The pains that she should suffer.

Duke. Hath she so? Which is the woman?

Gond. This, this.

Duke. How! Arrigo: Lucio:

Gond. I then it is a plot, no Prince alive Shall force me make my house a Brothell house; Not for the sins, but for the womans sake, I will not have her in my doors so long: Will they make my house as bawdy as their own are?

Duke. Is it not Oriana?

Lucio. 'Tis.

Duke. Sister to Count Valero?

Arri. The very same.

Duke. She that I love?

Lucio. She that you love.

Duke. I do suspect

Lucio. So doe I.

Duke. This fellow to be but a counterfeit, One that doth seem to loath all woman-kind, To hate himself, because he hath some part Of woman in him; seems not to endure To see, or to be seen of any woman, Only, because he knows it is their nature To wish to tast that which is most forbidden: And with this shew he may the better compass

(And with far less suspicion) his base ends.

Lucio. Upon my life 'tis so.

Duke. And I doe know,
Before his slain wife gave him that offence,
He was the greatest servant to that Sex
That ever was: what doth this Lady here
With him alone? why should he rail at her to me?

Lucio. Because your grace might not suspect.

Duke. 'Twas so: I doe love her strangely:
I would fain know the truth: counsell me.

They three whisper.

Enter Count, Lazarello, and his boy.

Count. It falls out better than we could expect Sir, that we should find the Duke and my Lord Gondarino together; both which you desire to be acquainted with.

Laz. 'Twas very happy: Boy, goe down into the kitchen, and see if you can spy that same; I am now in some hope: I have me thinks a kind of fever upon me. Exit Boy.

A certain gloominess within me, doubting as it were, betwixt two passions: there is no young maid upon her wedding night, when her husband sets first foot in the bed, blushes, and looks pale again, oftner than I doe now. There is no Poet acquainted with more shakings and quakings, towards the latter end of this new play, when he's in that case, that he stands peeping betwixt Curtains, so fearfully that a Bottle of Ale cannot be opened, but he thinks some body hilles, than I am at this instant.

Count. Are they in consultation? If they be, either my young Duke hath gotten some Bastard, and is persuading my Knight yonder to father the child, and marry the wench, or else some Cock-pit is to be built.

Laz. My Lord! what Nobleman's that?

Count. His name is Lucio, 'tis he that was made a Lord at the request of some of his friends for his wives sake: he affects to be a great States-man, and thinks it consists in night-caps and jewells, and tooth-picks?

Laz. And what's that other?

Count. A Knight Sir, that pleaseth the Duke to favour, and to raise to some extraordinary fortunes, he can make as good men as himself, every day in the week, and doth--

Laz. For what was he raised?

Count. Truly Sir, I am not able to say directly, for what; But for wearing of red breeches as I take it; he's a brave man, he will spend three Knighthoods at a Supper without Trumpets.

Laza. My Lord I'll talk with him, for I have a friend, that would gladly receive the humor.

Count. If he have the itch of Knighthood upon him, let him repair to that Physitian, he'll cure him: but I will give you a note; is your friend fat or lean?

Laz. Something fat.

Count. 'Twill be the worse for him.

Laza. I hope that's not material.

Count. Very much, for there is an impost set upon Knighthoods, & your friend shall pay a Noble in the pound.

Duke. I doe not like examinations,
We shall find out the truth more easily,
Some other way less noted, and that course,
Should not be us'd, till we be sure to prove
Some thing directly, for when they perceive Themselves suspected, they will then provide
More warily to answer.

Luc. Doth she know your Grace doth love her?

Duke. She hath never heard it.

Luc. Then thus my Lord. They whisper

Laz. What's he that walks again alone so sadly with his hands behind him?

Count. The Lord of the house, he that you desire to be acquainted with, he doth hate women for the same cause that I love them.

Laz. What's that?

Count. For that which Apes want: you perceive me Sir?

Laz. And is he sad? Can he be sad that hath so rich a gem under his roof, as that which I doe follow.

What young Lady's that?

Count. Which? Have I mine eye-sight perfect, 'tis my sister: did I say the Duke had a Bastard? What should she make here with him and his Councell? She hath no papers in her hand to petition to them, she hath never a husband in prison, whose release she might sue for: That's a fine trick for a wench; to get her husband clapt up, that she may more freely, and with less suspicion, visit the private studies of men in authority. Now I doe discover their consultation, yon fellow is a Pander without all salvation: But let me not condemn her too rashly without weighing the matter; she's a young Lady, she went forth early this morning with a waiting woman, and a Page, or so: This is no garden house, in my conscience she went forth with no dishonest intent: for she did not pretend going to any Sermon in the further end of the City: Neither went she to see any odd old Gentlewoman, that mourns for the death of her husband, or the loss of her friend, and must have young Ladys come to comfort her: those are the damnable Bawds: 'Twas no set meeting certainly; for there was no wafer-woman with her these three days on my knowledge: I'll talk with her; Good morrow my Lord.

Gond. Y'are welcome Sir: here's her brother come now to doe a kind office for his sister; is it not strange?

Count. I am glad to meet you here sister.

Orian. I thank you good brother: and if you doubt of the cause of my coming I can satisfie you.

Count. No faith, I dare trust thee, I doe suspect thou art honest; for it is so rare a thing to be honest amongst you, that some one man in an age, may perhaps suspect some two women to be honest, but never believe it verily.

Luci. Let your return be suddain.

Arri. Unsuspected by them.

Duke. It shall; so shall I best perceive their Love, if there be any; Farewell.

Count. Let me entreat your grace to stay a little, To know a gentleman, to whom your self is much beholding; he hath made the sport For your whole Court these eight years, on my knowledge.

Duke. His name?

Count. Lazarello.

Duke. I heard of him this morning, which is he?

Count. Lazarello, pluck up thy spirits, thy Fortune is now raising, the Duke calls for thee, and thou shalt be acquainted with him.

Laz. He's going away, and I must of necessity stay here upon business.

Count. 'Tis all one, thou shalt know him first.

Laz. Stay a little, if he should offer to take me away with him, and by that means I should loose that I seek for; but if he should I will not goe with him.

Count. Lazarello, the Duke stayes, wilt thou lose this opportunity?

Laz. How must I speak to him?

Count. 'Twas well thought of: you must not talk to him as you doe to an ordinary man, honest plain fence, but you must wind about him: for example, if he should aske you what a clock, it is, you must not say; If it please your grace 'tis nine; but thus; thrice three a clock, so please my Sovereign: or thus;

Look how many Muses there doth dwell
Upon the sweet banks of the learned Well;
And just so many stroaks the clock hath struck,
And so forth; And you must now and then enter into a description.

Laz. I hope I shall doe it.

Count. Come: May it please your grace to take note of a Gentleman, well seen, deeply read, and thoroughly grounded in the hidden knowledge of all fallets and pot-herbs whatsoever.

Duke. I shall desire to know him more inwardly.

Laz. I kiss the Ox-hide of your graces foot.

Count. Very well: will your grace question him a little?

Duke. How old are you?

Laz. Full eight and twenty several Almanacks
Have been compiled, all for several years
Since first I drew this breath, four prentiships
Have I most truly served in this world:
And eight and twenty times hath Phabus Car
Run out his yearly course since-

Duke. I understand you Sir.

Luci. How like an ignorant Poet he talks.

Duke. You are eight and twenty years old? what time of the day doe you hold it to be?

Laz. About the time that mortals whet their knives
On thresholds, on their shoe soles, and on flairs,
New bread is grating, and the teffy Cook
Hath much to doe now, now the Tables all.

Duk. 'Tis almost dinner time?

Laz. Your grace doth apprehend me very rightly.

Count. Your grace shall find him in your further conference
Grave, wise, courtly, and scholar like, understandingly read
In the necessities of the life of man.

He knows that man is mortal by his birth;
He knows that man must dye, and therefore live;
He knows that man must live, and therefore eat,
And if it shall please your grace, to accompany your self with him, I doubt not, but that he will, at the least, make good my commendations.

Duk. Attend us Lazarello, we doe want
Men of such Action, as we have received you
Reported from your honorable friend.

Laza. Good my Lord stand betwixt me and my overthrow, you know I 'm ti'd here, and may not depart, my gracious Lord, so waightie are the busineses of mine own, which at this time do call upon me, that I will rather chuse to die, than to neglect them.

Count. Nay you shall perceive, besides the virtues that I have already inform'd you of, he hath a stomach which will stoop to no Prince alive.

Duk. Sir at your best leisure, I shall thirst to see you.

Laza. And I shall hunger for it.

Duk. Till then farewell all.

Con. Count. Long life attend your Grace.

Duk. I doe not taste this sport, Arrigo Luci.

Arrigo. Luci. We doe attend.

Exeunt Duke, Arrigo, Luci.

Hellen with me, I 'm no pander for him, neither can I be won with the hope of gain, or the itching desire of tasting my Lords lecherie to him, to keep her at (my house) or bring her in disguise, to his bed Chamber.

The twyns of Adders, and of Scorpions
About my naked brest, will seem to me
More tickling than those claspes, which men adore;
The lustfull, dull, ill spirited embraces
Of women; The much prayesd Amazones,
Knowing their own infirmities so well,
Made of themselves a people, and what men
They take amongst them, they condemne to die,
Perceiving that their folly made them fit
To live no longer that would willingly
Come in the worthless presence of a woman.
I will attend, and see what my young Lord will doe with his sister.

Enter Lazarilloes Boy.

Boy. My Lord; The fish head is gone again.

Count. Wither?

Boy. I know whither my Lord.

Count. Keep it from Lazarillo: Sister shall I confer with you in private, to know the cause of the Dukes coming hither, I know he makes you acquainted with his busines of State.

Oria. I'll satisfie you brother, for I see you are jealous of me.

Gond. Now there shall be some course taken for her conveiance.

Laza. Lazarillo, thou art happy, thy carriage hath begot love, and that love hath brought forth fruits, thou art here in the company of a man honorable, that will help thee to taste of the bounties of the Sea, and when thou shalt doe thou shalt retire thy self unto the court, and there taste of the delicates of the earth, and be great in the eyes of thy Sovereign: now no more shalt thou need to scramble for thy meat, nor remove thy stomach with the Court; But thy credit shall command thy hearts desire, and all novelties shall be sent as presents unto thee.

Count. Good Sister, when you see your own time, will you return home.

Oria. Yes brother, and not before.

Laza. I will grow popular in this State, and overthrow the fortunes of a number, that live by extortion.

Count. Lazarello, bestir thy self nimbly and sodainly, and hear me with patience to hear.

Laza. Let me not fall from my self; Speak I 'm bound.

Count. So art thou to revenge, when thou shalt hear the fish head is gone, and we know not whither.

Laza. I will not curse, nor swear, nor rage, nor rail,
Nor with contemptuous tongue, accuse my Fate;
Though I might justly doe it, nor will I
With my self uncreated for this evil:
Shall I entreat your Lordship to be seen
A little longer in the company
Of a man cross'd by Fortune?

Count. I hate to leave my friend in his extremities.

Laza. 'Tis noble in you, then I take your hand,
And doe protest, I doe not follow this
For any malice or for private ends,
But with a love, as gentle and as chaste,
As that a brother to his sister bears:
And if I see this fish head yet unknown;
The last words that my dying father spake,
Before his eye strings brake, shall not of me
So often be remembred, as our meeting:
Fortune attend me, as my ends are just,
Full of pure love, and free from servile lust.

Count. Farewell my Lord, I was entreated to invite your Lordship to a Lady's upsting.

Gond. O my ears, why Madam, will not you follow your brother? you are waited for by great men, heel bring you to him.

Oria. I 'm very well my Lord, you doe mistake me, if you think I affect greater company than your self.

Gond. What madness possesseth thee, that thou canst imagine me a fit man to entertain Lady's; I tell thee, I doe use to tear their hair, to kick them, and twindge their noses, if they be not carefull in avoiding me.

Oria. Your Lordship may discant upon your own behavior as please you, but I protest, so sweet and courtly it appeares in my eye, that I mean not to leave you yet.

Crnd. I shall grow rough,

Oria. A rough carriage is best in a man,
I'll dine with you my Lord.

Gond. Why I will starve thee, thou shalt have nothing.

Oria. I have heard of your Lordships nothing, I'll put that to the venture.

Gond. Well thou shalt have meat, I'll send it to thee.

Oria. I'll keep no state my Lord, neither doe I mourn,
I'll dine with you.

Gond. Is such a think as this allowed to live?
What power hath let the loose upon the earth
To plague us for our Sins? Out of my doors.

Oria. I would your Lordship did but see how well
This fury doth become you, it doth shew
So near the life, as it were natural.

Gond. O thou damn'd woman, I will flie the vengeance
That hangs above thee, follow if thou dar'st. Exit Gondurino.

Oria. I must not leave this fellow, I will torment him to madness,

To teach his passions against kind to move,
The more he hates, the more I'll seem to love.

Exeunt Oriana and Maid.

O O O 2

Enter

Enter Pandar and Mercer a citizen.

Pand. Sir, what may be done by art shall be done,
I wear not this black cloak for nothing.

Mer. Perform this, help me to this great heir by learning, and you shall want no black cloaks; ruffaties, silkgrögrans, sattins and velvets are mine, they shall be yours; perform what you have promis'd, and you shall make me a lover of Sciences, I will study the learned languages, and keep my shop-book in Latine.

Pand. Trouble me not now, I will not fail you within this hour at your shop.

Mer. Let Art have her course.

Exit Mercer.

Enter Curtezan.

Pand. 'Tis well spoken, Madona.

Mad. Hast thou brought me any customers.

Pan. No.

Ma. What the devil do'st thou in black?

Pa. As all solemn professors of settled courses, doe, cover my knavery with it: will you marry a citizen; Reasonably rich, and unreasonably foolish, silks in his shop, mony in his purse, and no wit in his head?

Ma. Out upon him, I could have otherwise than so, there was a Knight swore he would have had me, if I would have lent him but forty shillings to have redeem'd his cloak, to goe to Church in.

Pan. Then your wastcote wayter shall have him, call her in?

Ma. Franceffina?

Fr. Anon?

Ma. Get you to the Church, and shrive your self, For you shall be richly marryed anon.

Pan. And get you after her, I will work upon my citizen whilst he is warm, I must not suffer him to consult with his neighbours, the openest fools are hardly coufened, if they once grow jealous.

Exeunt

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Gondarino flying the Lady.

Gond. SAve me ye better powers, let me not fall
Between the lose embracements of a woman:
Heaven, if my Sins be ripe grown to a head,
And must attend your vengeance: I beg not to divert my fate,
Or to reprove a while thy punishment
Only I crave, and hear me equall heavens,
Let not your furious rod, that must afflict me
Be that imperfect peece of nature,
That art makes up, woman, unfatiate woman.
Had we not knowing souls, at first infus'd
To teach a difference, 'twixt extremes and goods?
Were we not made our selves, free, unconfin'd
Commanders of our own affections?
And can it be, that this most perfect creature,
'This image of his maker, well squar'd man,
Should leave the handfast, that he had of grace,
To fall into a womans case armes.

Enter Oriana.

Oriana. Now Venus, be my speed, inspire me with all the severall subtil temptations, that thou hast already given, or hast in store heareafter to bestow upon our Sex: grant that I may apply that Physick that is most apt to work upon him: whether he will soonest be mov'd with wantonness, singing, dancing, or being passionate, with scorn; or with sad and serious looks, cunningly mingled with sighs, with smiling, lisping, kissing the hand, and making short curt'sies, Or with whatsoever other nimble power, he may be caught, doe thou infuse into me, and when I have him, I will sacrifice him up to thee.

Gond. It comes again; New apparitions,
And tempting spirits: Stand and reveal thy self,
Tell why thou followest me? I fear thee
As I fear the place thou can'st from: Hell.

Oriana. My Lord, I 'm in a woman, and such a one—

Gond. That I hate truly, thou hadst better bin a devill, Oriana. Why my unpatient Lord?

Gond. Devils were once good, there they excell'd you woman.

Oriana. Can ye be so uneasie, can ye freeze, and Such a summers heat so ready

To dissolve? nay gentle Lord, turn not away in scorn,
Nor hold me less fair than I am: look on these cheeks,
They have yet enough of nature, true complexion,
If to be red and white, a forehead high,
An easie melting lip, a speaking eye,
And such a tongue, whose language takes the ear
Of strict religion, and men most austere:
If these may hope to please, look here.

Gond. This woman with entreaty wo'd show all,
Lady there lies your way, I pray ye farewell.

Oriana. Y'are yet too harsh, too dissonant,
There's no true musick in your words, my Lord.

Gond. What shall I give thee to be gone?

Here's ta, and tha wants lodging, take my house, 'tis big enough, 'tis thine own, 'twill hold five leacherous Lords, and their lackies without discovery: there's stoves and bathing tubs.

Oriana. Dear Lord: y'are too wild.

Gond. Shalt have a Doctor too, thou shalt, 'bout six and twentie, 'tis a pleasing age; Or I can help thee to a handsome Vsher: or if thou lack'st a page, I'll give thee one, preethee keep house, and leave me.

Oriana. I doe confesse I 'm too easie, too much woman,
Not coy enough to take affection,
Yet I can'frown and nip a passion,

Even in the bud: I can say
Men please their present heats; Then please to leave us.
I can hold off, and, by my Chymick power,
Draw Sonnets from the melting lovers brain;
Ayme's, and Elegies: yet to you my Lord
My Love, my better self, I put these off,
Doing that office, not befits our sex,
Entreat a man to love;

Are ye not yet relenting? ha'ye blood and Spirit
In those veins? ye are no image, though ye be as hard
As marble: sure ye have no liver, if ye had,
'Twould send a lively and desiring heat
To every member; Is not this miserable?
A thing so truly form'd, shapt out by Symetry,
Has all the organs that belong to man,
And working too, yet to shew all these
Like dead motions moving upon wyers?

Then good my Lord, leave off what you have been,
And freely be what you were first intended for, a man.

Gond. Thou art a precious peece of sic damnation,
I will be deaf, I will lock up my ears,
Tempt me not, I will not love; If I doe.

Oriana. Then I'll hate you.

Gond. Let me be 'nointed with hony, and turn'd into the Sun,

To be stung to death with horse-flies,
Hear'st thou, thou breeder, here I'll sit,
And, in despight of thee, I will say nothing.

Oriana. Let me with your fair patience, sit beside you.

Gond. Madam, Lady, tempter, tongue, woman, ayr.
Look to me, I shall kick; I say again,

Look to me I shall kick.

Oria. I cannot think your better knowledg can use a woman so uncivilly.

Gond. I cannot think, I shall become a coxcombe, To ha'my hair curl'd, by an idle finger, My cheeks turn Tabers, and be plaid upon, Mine eyes lookt babies in, and my nose blowd to my hand, I say again I shall kick, sure I shall.

Oria. 'Tis but your outside that you shew, I know your mind

Never was guilty of so great a weaknes, Or could the tougues of all men joyn'd together. Possess me with a thought of your dislike My weaknes were above a womans, to fall off From my affection, for one crack of thunder, O wo'd you could love, my Lord.

Gond. I wo'd thou wouldst sit still, and say nothing: what mad-man let thee lose to do more mischief than a dousen whirlwinds, keep thy hands in thy muff, and warm the idle worms in thy fingers ends: will ye be doing still? will no entreating serve ye? no lawfull warning? I must remove and leave your Ladyship; Nay never hope to stay me, for I will run, from that Smooth, Smiling, Witching, Coufening, Tempting, Damning face of thine, as far as I can find any land, where I will put my self into a daily course of Curses for thee, and all thy Familie.

Oria. Nay good my Lord sit still, I'll promise peace And fold mine Armes up, let but mine eye discourse; Or let my voyce, set to some pleasing cord, found out The fullen strains of my neglected love.

Gond. Sing till thou crack thy treble-string in peeces, And when thou hast done, put up thy pipes and walk, Doe any thing, sit still and tempt me not.

Oria. I had rather sing at doors for bread, than sing to this fellow, but for hate: if this should be told in the Court, that I begin to woe Lords, what a troop of the untruff nobilitie should I have at my lodging to morrow morning?

SONG.

*Some sleep, and with the sweet deceiving,
Lock me in delight a while,
Let some pleasing Dreams beguile
All my fancies; That from thence,
I may feel an influence,
All my powers of care bereaving.*

*Though but a shadow, but a sliding,
Let me know some little Ioy,
We that suffer long annoy
Are contented with a thought
Through an idle fancie wrought
O let my joyes, have some abiding.*

Gond. Have you done your wassayl? 'tis a handsome drowfie dittie I'll assure ye, now I had as leave hear a Cat cry, when her tail is cut off, as hear these lamentations, these lowsie love-layes, these bewailements: you think you have caught me Lady, you think I melt now, like a dish of May butter, and run, all into brine, and passion? yes, yes, I 'm taken, look how I cross my arms, look pale, and dwyndle, and wo'd cry, but for spoyling my face; we must part, nay we'll avoyd all Ceremony, no kissing Lady, I desire to know your Ladiship no more; death of my soul the Duke!

Oria. God keep your Lordship.

Gond. From thee and all thy sex.

Oria. I'll be the Clark, and crie, Amen,
Your Lordships ever assured enemy Oriana.

Exit. Oriana, Manet Gondarino.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Duke, Arrigo, Lucio.

Gond. ALL the days good, attend your Lordship.
Duk. We thank you Gondarino, is it possible? Can belief lay hold on such a miracle, To see thee, one that hath cloyl'd up all passion, Turn'd wilfull votary, and forsworn converse with women, in company and fair discourse, with the best beauty of Millain?

Gon. 'Tis true, and if your Grace that hath the sway Of the whole State, will suffer this lude sex, These women: to pursue us to our homes, Not to be prayd, not to be rail'd away, But they will woe, and dance, and sing, And, in a manner, looser than they are By nature (which should seem impossible) To throw their armes, on our unwilling necks.

Duk. No more, I can see through your yillore, dissemble it no more.

Doe not I know thou hast us'd all Art, To work upon the poor simplicitie Of this yong Maid, that yet hath known none ill? Thinkest that damnation will fright those that woe From oaths, and lies? But yet I think her chaste, And will from thee, before thou shalt apply Stronger temptations, bear her hence with me.

Gond. My Lord, I speak not this to gain new grace, But howsoever you esteeme my words, My love and dutie will not suffer me To see you favour such a prostitute, And I stand by dumb; Without Rack, Torture, Or Strappado, I unrip my self: I doe confess I was in company with that pleasing peece of frailtie, that we call woman; I doe confess after along and tedious seige, I yielded.

Duke. Forward.

Gond. Faith my Lord to come quickly to the point, the woman you saw with me is a whore; An arrant whore.

Duke. Was she not Count Valores, Sister?

Gond. Yes, that Count Valores Sister is naught.

Duk. Thou dar'st not say so.

Gond. Not if it be distasting to your Lordship, but give me freedome, and I dare maintain, she ha's imbrac'd this body, and grown to it as close, as the hot youthfull vine to the elme.

Duk. Twice have I seen her with thee, twice my thoughts were prompted by mine eye, to hold thy strictness false and imposterous: Is this your mewing up, your strict retirement, your bitterness and gaul against that sex? Have I not heard thee say, thou wouldst sooner meet the Basilisks, dead doing eye, than meet a woman for an object? Look it be true you tell me, or by our countries Saint your head goes off: if thou prove a whore, no womans face shall ever move me more.

Exeunt.

Manet Gondarino.

Gond. So, so, 'tis as 't should be, are women grown so mankind? Must they be wooing, I have a plot shall blow her up, she flies, she mounts; I'll teach her Ladyship to dare my fury, I will be known, and fear'd, and more truly hated of women than an Eunuch.

Enter Oriana.

She's here again, good gaul be patient, for I must dissemble.

Oriana. Now my cold, frosty Lord, my woman-Hater, you that have sworn an everlasting hate to all our sex: by my troth good Lord, and as I'm yet a maid, my thought 'twas excellent sport to hear your honor swear out an Alphabet, chafe nobly like a Generall, kick like a resty Jade, and make ill faces: Did your good Honor think I was in love? where did I first begin to take that heat? From those two radiant eyes, that piercing sight? oh they were lovely, if the balls stood right; and there's a leg made out of a dainty staff, Where, the Gods be thanked, there is calf enough.

Good. Pardon him Lady, that is now a convert. Our beauty, like a Saint hath wrought this wonder.

Oriana. Alas, ha's it been prick'd at the heart? is the stomach come down? will it rail no more at women, and call 'em Divells, the Cats, and Goblins?

Good. He that shall marry thee, had better spend the poor remainder of his days in a dung-barge, for two pence a week, and find himself.

Down again Spleen, I prethee down again, shall I find favour Lady? shall at length my true unfeigned penitence get pardon for my harsh unseasoned follies? I'm no more an Atheist, no I doe acknowledge, that dread powerfull Deity, and his all quickning heats burn in my breast: oh be not as I was, hard unrelenting; but as I'm, be partner of my fires.

Oriana. Sure we have store of Larks, the Skies will not hold 'em long, I should have look'd as soon for Frost in the dog days, or another Inundation, as hop'd this strange conversion above miracle: let me look upon your Lordship; is your name Gondarino? are you Millains Generall, that great Bug-bear bloody-bones, at whose name all women, from the Lady to the Landress, shake like a cold fit?

Good. Good patience help me, this Fever will inrage my blood again: Madam I'm that man; I'm even he that once did owe unreconcil'd hate to you, and all that bear the name of woman: I'm the man that wrong'd your Honor to the Duke: I'm the man that said you were unchast, and prostitute, yet I'm he that dare deny all this.

Oriana. Your big Nobility is very merry.

Good. Lady 'tis true that I have wrong'd you thus, And my contritiou is as true as that, Yet have I found a means to make all good again, I doe beseech your beautie, not for my self, My merits are yet in conception, But for your honors safety and my zeal Retire a while, while I unsay my self unto the Duke, And cast out that ill Spirit I have posses't him with, I have a house conveniently private.

Oriana. Lord, thou hast wrong'd my innocence, but thy confession hath gain'd thee faith.

Good. By the true honest service, that I owe these eyes strangely,

My meaning is as spotless as my faith.

Oriana. The Duke doubt mine honor? a may judge 'Twill not be long, before I'll be enlarg'd again.

Good. A day or two.

Oriana. Mine own servants shall attend me.

Good. Your Ladyships command is good.

Oriana. Look you be true.

Exit Oriana.

Good. Else let me lose the hopes my soul aspires to: I will be a scourge to all females in my life, and after my death, the name of Gondarino, shall be terrible to the mighty women of the earth; They shall shake at my name, and at the sound of it, their knees shall knock together; And they shall run into Nurseries, for they and I are beyond all hope irreconcilable: for if I could endure an ear with a hole in't, or a pleated lock, or a bare headed Coachman, that fits like a sun where great Ladys are to be sold within; agreement betwixt us, were not to be despair'd of; if I could be but brought to endure to see women, I would have them come all once a week, and kiss me, as Witches doe the devill, in token of homage: I must not live here, I will to the Court, and there pursue my plot, when it hath took, women shall stand in awe, but of my look.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Tertia.

Enter two Intelligencers, discovering treason in the Courtiers words.

1. Intel. THere take your standing, be close and vigilant, here will I set my self, and let him look to his language, a shall know the Duke has more ears in Court than two.

2. Int. I'll quote him to a tittle, let him speak wisely, and plainly, and as hidden as a can, or I shall crush him, a shall not scape charracters, though a speak Babel, I shall crush him: we have a Fortune by this service hanging over us, that within this year or two, I hope we shall be called to be examiners, wear politick gowns garded with copper lace, making great faces full of fear and office, our labors may deserve this.

1. Int. I hope it shall: why has not many men been raised from this worming trade, first to gain good access to great men, then to have commissions out for search, and lastly, to be worthily nam'd at a great Arraignment: yes, and why not we? They that endeavor well deserve their Fee. Close, close, a comes: mark well, and all goes well.

Enter Count, Lazarello, and his Boy.

Laz. Farewell my hopes, my Anchor now is broken, Farewell my quondam joys, of which no token Is now remaining, such is the sad mischance, Where Lady Fortune leads the slipp'ry dance. Yet at the length, let me this favour have, Give me my wishes, or a wished grave.

Count. The gods defend so brave and valiant maw, Should slip into the never satiate jaw Of black Despair; no, thou shalt live and know Thy full desires, hunger thy ancient foe, Shall be subdued; those guts that daily tumble Through ayr and appetite, shall cease to rumble: And thou shalt now at length obtain thy dish, That noble part, the sweet head of a fish.

Laz. Then am I greater than the Duke.

2. Int. There, there's a notable peece of treason, greater than the Duke, mark that.

Count. But how, or where, or when this shall be compass'd, is yet out of my reach.

Laz. I am so truly miserable, that might I be now knockt oth' head, with all my heart I would forgive a dog-killer.

Count. Yet doe I see through this confusedness some little comfort.

Laz. The plot my Lord, as er'e you came of a woman, discover.

1. Int. Plots, dangerous plots, I will deserve by this most liberally.

Count. 'Tis from my head again.

Laz. O that it would stand me, that I might fight, or have some venture for it, that I might be turn'd loose, to try my fortune amongst the whole frie in a Colledge, or an Inn of Court; or scramble with the prisoners in the dungeon; nay were it set down in the outward court, And all the Guard about it in a ring, With their knives drawn, which were a dismall fight, And after twenty leisurely were told, I to be let loose only in my shirt, To trie the valour, how much of the spoyl, I would recover from the enemies mouths:

I would

Upon coun try people in progress time, and Wilt thou lose this opinion, for the cold head of a Fish?
I say, let it goe: I'll help thee to as good a dish of meat.

Laz. God let me not live, if I doe not wonder,
Men should talk so propanely:
But it is not in the power of loose words,
Of any vain or misbelieving man,
To make me dare to wrong thy purity.
Shew me but any Lady in the Court,
That hath so full an eye, so sweet a breath,
So soft and white a flesh: this doth not lie
In almond-gloves, nor ever hath bin washt
In artificiall baths: no traveller
That hath brought doctor home with him, hath dar'd
With all his waters, powders, Fucuses,
To make thy lovely corps sophisticate.

Count. I have it, 'tis now infus'd, be comforted.

Laz. Can there be that little hope yet left in nature? shall I once more erect up Trophies? Shall I enjoy the sight of my dear Saint, and bless my palate with the best of creatures, ah good my Lord, by whom I breathe again, shall I receive this Being?

Count. Sir I have found by certain calculation, and settled revolution of the stars, the Fish is sent by the Lord Gondarino
to his Mercer, now 'tis a growing hope to know where 'tis.

Laz. O 'tis far above the good of women, the Patbick cannot yield more pleasing titilation.

Count. But how to compass it search, cast about, and bang your braius, Lazarello, thou art too dull and heavy to deserve a blessing.

Laz. My Lord, I will not be idle; now Lazarello, think, think, think,

Count. Yonder's my informer
And his fellow with table books, they nod at me
Upon my life, they have poor Lazarello, that beats
His brains about no such waighty matter, in for Treason before this---

Laz. My Lord, what doe you think, if I should shave
my self,

Put on midwives apparell, come in with a hand-kercher,
And beg a piece for a great bellied woman, or a sick child?

Count. Good, very good.

Laz. Or corrupt the waiting prentise to betray the reversion.

1. Inte. There's another point in's plot, corrupted with money; to betray: sure 'tis some Fort a means: mark, have a care.

Laz. And 'twere the bare vinegar 'tis eaten with, it would in some sort satisfie nature: but might I once attain the dish it self, though I cut out my means through sword and fire, through poison, through any thing that may make good my hopes.

2. Int. Thanks to the gods, and our officiousness, the plots discover'd, fire, steel, and poison, burn the Palace, kill the Duke and poison his privie Councill.

Count. To the mercers, let me see: how, if before we can attain the means, to make up our acquaintance, the fish be eaten?

Laz. If it be eaten, here he stands, that is the most dejected, most unfortunate, miserable, accursed, forsaken slave this Province yields: I will not sure outlive it, no I will dye bravely, and like a Roman; and after death, amidst the Elizian shades, I'll meet my love again.

1. In. I will dye bravely, like a Roman: have a care, mark that, when he hath done all, he will kill himself.

Count. Will nothing ease your appetite but this?

Laz. No could the Sea throw up his vastness,
And offer free his best inhabitants: 'twere not so much as a bare temptation to me.

Count. If you could be drawn to affect Beef, Venison, or Fowl, 'twould be far the better.

Laza. I doe beseech your Lordships patience,
I doe confesse that in this heat of blood,
I have contemn'd all dull and grosser meats,

But I protest I doe honor a Chine of Beef,
I doe reverence a loyn of Veal,
But good my Lord, give me leave a little to adore this:
But my good Lord, would your Lordship, under color of taking up some silks, goe to the Mercers, I would in all humilitie attend your honor, where we may be invited, if Fortune stand propitious.

Count. Sir you shall work me as you please.

Laza. Let it be suddenly, I doe beseech your Lordship,
'tis now upon the point of dinner time.

Count. I am all yours.

Exeunt Lazarello and Count.

1. In. Come let us confer,
Imprimis he saith, like a blasphemous villain, he's greater than the Duke, this peppers him, and there were nothing else.

2. In. Then he was naming plots; did you not hear?

1. In. Yes but he fell from that unto discovery, to corrupt by money, and so attain.

2. In. I, I, he meant some Fort, or Cyttadell the Duke hath, his very face betraid his meaning, O he is very subtle and a dangerous knave, but if he deal a Gods name, we shall worm
him

1. In. But now comes the Stroak, the fatall blow, Fire,
Sword and Poyson, O Canibal, thou bloody Canibal.

2. In. What had become of this poor state, had we not been?

1. In. Faith it had lyen buried in his own ashes; had not a greater hand been in't.

2. In. But note the rascalls resolution, after th'acts done, because he wo'd avoid all fear of torture, and coufen the Law,
he wo'd kill himself; was there ever the like danger brought to light in this age? sure we shall merit much, we shall be able to keep two men a peece, and a two hand-sword between us, we will live in favour of the State, betray our ten or twelve treasons a week, and the people shall fear us:
come, to the Lord Lucio, the Sun shall not goe down till he be hang'd.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena quarta.

Enter Mercer.

Mer. Look to my shop, and if there come ever a Scholar in black, let him speak with me; we that are shopkeepers in good trade, are so pester'd, that we can scarce pick out an hour for our mornings meditation: and how-soever we are all accounted dull, and common jesting stocks for your gallants; There are some of us doe not deserve it:
for, for my own part, I doe begin to be given to my book,
I love a scholar with my heart, for questionless there are merveilous things to be done by Art: why Sir, some of them will tell you what is become of horses, and silver spoons, and will make wenches dance naked to their beds: I am yet unmarried, and because some of our neighbours are said to be Cuckolds, I will never be married without the consent of some of these scholars, that know what will come of it.

Enter Pander.

Pan. Are you busie Sir?

Mer. Never to you Sir, nor to any of your coat.

Sir is there any thing to be done by Art, concerning the great heir we talk'd on?

Pan. Will she, will she: she shall come running into my house at the farther corner, in Sa. Marks street, betwixt three and four.

Mer. Betwixt three and four? she's brave in cloaths, is she not?

Pan. O rich! rich! where should I get cloaths to dress her in? Help me invention: Sir, that her running through the street

street may be less noted, my Art more shown, and your fear to speak with her less, she shall come in a white waist-coat, And--

Mer. What shall she?

Pan. And perhaps torn stockings, she hath left her old wont else.

Enter Prentice.

Prent. Sir my Lord Gond. hath sent you a rare fish head.

Mer. It comes right, all things sure right with me since I began to love scholars, you shall have it home with you against she come: carrie it to this Gentleman's house.

Pan. The fair white house at the farther corner at S. Marks street, make haste, I must leave you too Sir, I have two hours to study; buy a new Accedence, and ply your book, and you shall want nothing that all the scholars in the Town can doe for you.

Exit Pander.

Mer. Heaven prosper both our studies, what a dull slave was I before I fell in love with this learning? not worthy to tread upon the earth, & what fresh hopes it hath put in to me? I doe hope within this twelve-month to be able by Art to serve the Court with silks, and not undoe my self; to trust Knights, and yet get in my money again; to keep my wife brave, and yet she keep no body else so.

Enter Count, and Lazarello.

Your Lordship is most honourably welcome in regard of your Nobility, but most especially in regard of your scholarship: did your Lordship come openly?

Count. Sir this cloak keeps me private, besides no man will suspect me to be in the company of this Gentleman, with whom, I will desire you to be acquainted, he may prove a good customer to you.

Laz. For plain silks and velvets.

Mer. Are you scholasticall?

Laz. Something addicted to the Muses.

Count. I hope they will not dispute.

Mer. You have no skill in the black Art.

Enter a Prentice.

Prent. Sir yonder's a Gentleman enquires hastily for Count Valore,

Count. For me? what is he?

Prent. One of your followers my Lord I think.

Count. Let him come in.

Mer. Shall I talk with you in private Sir?

Enter a Messenger with a Letter to the Count, he reads.

Count. Count, come to the Court your business calls you thither, I will goe, farewell Sir, I will see your silks some other time: Farewell Lazarillo.

Mer. Will not your Lordship take a peice of Beef with me?

Count. Sir I have greater business than eating; I will leave this Gentleman with you.

Exeunt Count. & Mes.

Laz. No, no, no, no: now doe I feel that strain'd struggling within me, that I think I could prophesie.

Mer. The Gentleman is meditating.

Laz. Hunger, valour, love, ambition are alike pleasing, and let our Philosophers say what they will, are one kind of heat, only hunger is the safest: ambition is apt to fall; love and valour are not free from dangers; only hunger, begotten of some old limber Courtier, in pan'de hose, and nars'd by an Attourneys wife; now so thriven, that he need not fear to be of the great Turks guard: is so free from all quarrels and dangers, so full of hopes, joyes, and ticklings, that my life is not so dear to me as his acquaintance.

Enter Lazarello's boy.

Boy. Sir the Fish head is gone.

Laz. Then be thou henceforth dumb, with thy ill-boding voice.

Farewell Millain, farewell Noble Duke,
Farewell my fellow Courtiers all, with whom,
I have of yore made many a scrambling meal
In corners, behind Aralles, on stairs;
And in the action oftentimes have spoil'd,
Our Doublets and our Hose with liquid stuff:
Farewell you lusty Archers of the Guard,
To whom I now doe give the bucklers up,
And never more with any of your coat
Will eat for wagers, now you happy be,
When this shall light upon you, think on me:
You sewers, carvers, ushers of the court
Surnamed gentle for your fair demean,
Here I doe take of you my last farewell,
May you stand stily in your proper places, and execute your offices aright.

Farewell you Maidens, with your mother eke,
Farewell you courtly Chaplains that be there
All good attend you, may you never more
Marry your Patrons Ladys wayting-woman,
But may you raised be by this my fall
May Lazarillo suffer for you all.

Mer. Sir I was hearkning to you.

Laz. I will hear nothing, I will break my knife, the Ensign of my former happy state, knock out my teeth, have them hung at a Barbers, and enter into Religion.

Boy. Why Sir, I think I know whither it is gone.

Laz. See the rashness of man in his nature, whither? I do unfay all that I have said, go on, go on: Boy, I humble my self and follow thee; Farewell Sir.

Mer. Not so Sir, you shall take a piece of Beef with me.

Laz. I cannot stay.

Mer. By my fay but you shall Sir, in regard of your love to learning, and your kill in the black Art.

Laz. I do hate learning, and I have no skill in black Art; I would I had.

Mer. Why your desire is sufficient to me, you shall stay.

Laz. The most horrible and detested curses that can be imagined, light upon all the professors of that Art; may they be drunk, and when they goe to conjure, and reel in the Circle, may the spirits by them rais'd, tear 'em in pieces, and hang their quarters on old broken walls and Steeple tops.

Mer. This speech of yours, shews you to have some skill in the Science, wherefore in civilitie, I may not suffer you to depart empty.

Laz. My stomach is up, I cannot endure it, I will fight in this quarrell as soon as for my Prince.

Draws his Rapier

Exeunt Omnes.

Room, make way:

Hunger commands, my valour must obey.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Count and Arrigo.

Count. IS the Duke private?

Arr. He is alone, but I think your Lordship may enter.

Exit Count.

Enter Gondarino.

Gond. Who's with the Duke?

Arr. The Count is new gone in; but the Duke will come forth orth, before you can be weary of waiting.

Gond. I will attend him here.

Arri. I must wait without the door. Exit Arrigo.

Gond. Doth he hope to clear his Sister? she will come no more to my house, to laugh at me: I have sent her to a habitation, where when she shall be seen, it will set a gloss upon her name; yet upon my soul I have bestow'd her amongst the purest hearted creatures of her sex, and the freest from dissimulation; for their deeds are all alike, only they dare speak, what the rest think: the women of this age, if there be any degrees of comparison amongst their sex, are worse than those of former times; for I have read of women, of that truth, spirit, and constancy; that were they now living, I should endure to see them: but I fear the writers of the time belied them, for how familiar a thing is it with the Poets of our age, to extoll their whores, which they call Mistresses, with heavenly praises? but I thank their furies, and their craz'd brains, beyond belief: nay, how many that would fain seem serious, have dedicated grave Works to Ladies, toothless, hollow-ey'd, their hair shedding, purple fac'd, their nails apparently coming off; and the bridges of their noses broken down, and have call'd them the choice handy works of nature, the patterns of perfection, and the wonderment of Women. Our Women begin to swarm like Bees in the Summer: as I came hither, there was no pair of stairs, no entry, no lobby, but was pestered with them: methinks there might be some course taken to destroy them.

Enter Arrigo, and an old deaf country Gentlewoman suior to the Duke.

Arri. I do accept your money, walk here, and when the Duke comes out, you shall have fit opportunity to deliver your petition to him.

Gentlew. I thank you heartily, I pray you who's he that walks there?

Ar. A Lord, and a Soldier, one in good favour with the Duke; if you could get him to deliver your Petition —

Gentlew. What do you say, Sir?

Ar. If you could get him to deliver your petition for you, or to second you, 'twere sure.

Gentlew. I hope I shall live to requite your kindness.

Ar. You have already. Exit Arri.

Gentlew. May it please your Lordship —

Gond. No, no.

Gentlew. To consider the estate —

Gond. No.

Gentlew. Of a poor oppressed country Gentlewoman.

Gond. No, it doth not please my Lordship.

Gentlew. First and foremost, I have had great injury, then I have been brought up to the Town three times.

Gond. A pox on him, that brought thee to the Town.

Gentlew. I thank your good Lordship heartily; though I cannot hear well, I know it grieves you; and here we have been delaid, and sent down again, and fetch'd up again, and sent down again, to my great charge: and now at last they have fetch'd me up, and five of my daughters —

Gond. Enough to damn five worlds.

Gentlew. Handsome young women, though I say it, they are all without, if it please your Lordship I'll call them in.

Gond. Five Women! how many of my fences should I have left me then? call in five Devils first.

*No, I will rather walk with thee alone,
And hear thy tedious tale of injury,
And give thee answers; whisper in thine ear,
And make thee understand through thy French hood:
And all this with tame patience.*

Gentlew. I see your Lordship does believe, that they are without, and I perceive you are much mov'd at our injury: here's a paper will tell you more.

Gond. Away.

Gentlew. It may be you had rather hear me tell it viva voce, as they say.

Gond. Oh no, no, no, no, I have heard it before.

Gentlew. Then you have heard of enough injury, for a poor Gentlewoman to receive.

Gond. Never, never, but that it troubles my conscience, to wish any good to these women; I could afford them to be valiant, and able, that it might be no disgrace for a Soldier to beat them.

Gentlew. I hope your Lordship will deliver my petition to his grace, and you may tell him withal —

Gond. What? I will deliver any thing against myself, to be rid on thee.

Gentlew. That yesterday about three a clock in the afternoon, I met my adversary.

Gond. Give me thy paper, he can abide no long tales.

Gentlew. 'Tis very short my Lord, and I demanding of him —

Gond. I'll tell him that shall serve thy turn.

Gentlew. How?

Gond. I'll tell him that shall serve thy turn, begone: man never doth remember how great his offences are, till he do meet with one of you, that plagues him for them: why should Women, above all other creatures that were created for the benefit of man, have the use of speech? or why should any deed of theirs, done by their fleshly appetites, be disgraceful to their owners? nay, why should not an act done by any beast I keep, against my consent, disparage me as much as that of theirs?

Gentlew. Here's some few Angels for your Lordship.

Gond. Again? yet more torments?

Gentlew. Indeed you shall have them.

Gond. Keep off.

Gentlew. A small gratuity for your kindness.

Gond. Hold away.

Gentlew. Why then I thank your Lordship, I'll gather them up again, and I'll be sworn, it is the first money that was refus'd since I came to the Court.

Gond. What can she devise to say more?

Gentlew. Truly I would have willingly parted with them to your Lordship.

Gond. I believe it, I believe it.

Gentlew. But since it is thus —

Gond. More yet.

Gentlew. I will attend without, and expect an answer.

Gond. Do, begone, and thou shalt expect, and have any thing, thou shalt have thy answer from him; and he were best to give thee a good one at first, for thy deaf importunity, will conquer him too, in the end.

Gentlew. God bless your Lordship, and all thar favour a poor distressed country Gentlewoman. Exit Gentlew.

Gond. All the diseases of man light upon them that doe, and upon me when I do. A week of such days, would either make me stark mad or tame me: yonder other woman that I have sure enough, shall answer for thy sins: dare they incense me still, I will make them fear as much to be ignorant of me and my moods, as men are to be ignorant of the law they live under. Who's there? My blood grew cold, I began to fear my Suiters return; 'tis the Duke.

Enter the Duke and the Count.

Count. I know her chaite, though she be young and free, And is not of that forc'd behaviour That many others are, and that this Lord, Out of the boundless malice to the sex, Hath thrown this scandal on her.

Gond. Fortune befriended me against my Will, with this good old country gentlewoman; I beseech your grace, to view favourably the petition of a wronged Gentlewoman.

Duke. What Gondarino, are you become a petitioner for your enemies?

Gond. My Lord, they are no enemies of mine, I confess, the better to recover my deeds, which sometimes were loose enough, I pretended it, as it is wisdom, to keep close our incontinence, but since you have discover'd me, I will no more put on that vizard, but will as freely open all my thoughts to you, as to my Confessor.

Duke. What say you to this?

Count. He that confesses he did once dissemble, I'll never trust his words: can you imagine A Maid, whose beauty could not suffer her To live thus long untempted, by the noblest, Richest, and cunningst Masters in that Art And yet hath ever held a fair repute; Could in one morning, and by him be brought, To forget all her virtue, and turn whore?

Gond. I would I had some other talk in hand, Than to accuse a Sister to her Brother: Nor do I mean it for a publick scandal, Unless by urging me you make it so.

Duke. I will read this at better leisure:

Gond. Where is the Lady?

Count. At his house.

Gond. No, she is departed thence,

Count. Whither?

Gond. Urge it not thus, or let me be excus'd, If what I speak betray her chastity, And both increase my sorrow, and your own?

Count. Fear me not so, if she deserve the fame Which she hath gotten, I would have it publisht, Brand her my self, and whip her through the City: I wish those of my blood that doe offend, Should be more strictly punish, than my foes. Let it be prov'd.

Duke. Gondarino, thou shalt prove it, or suffer worse than she should do.

Gond. Then pardon me, if I betray the faults Of one, I love more dearly than my self, Since opening hers, I shall betray mine own: But I will bring you where she now intends Not to be virtuous, pride and wantonness, That are true friends indeed, though not in shew, Have entr'd on her heart, there she doth bathe, And sleek her hair, and practise cunning looks To entertain me with; and hath her thoughts As full of lust, as ever you did think Them full of modesty.

Duke. Gondarino, lead on, we'll follow thee.

Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Pandar.

Pan. Here hope I to meet my Citizen, and hopes he to meet his Scholar; I am sure I am grave enough, to his eyes, and knave enough to deceive him: I am believ'd to conjure, raise storms, and devils, by whose power I can do wonders; let him believe so still, belief hurts no man; I have an honest black cloak, for my knavery, and a general pardon for his foolery, from this present day, till the day of his breaking. Is't not a misery, and the greatest of our age, to see a handsome, young, fair enough, and well mounted wench, humble her self, in an old stammel petticoat, standing possess'd of no more fringe, than the street can allow her: her upper parts so poor and wanting, that ye may see her bones through her bodies: shoes she would have, if our Captain were come over, and is content the while to devote her self to antient slippers. These premises well considered, Gentlemen, will move, they make me melt

I promise ye, they stirr me much: and wer't not for my smooth, soft, silken Citizen, I would quit this transitory Trade, get me an everlasting Robe, fear up my conscience, and turn Serjeant. But here he comes, is mine as good as prize: Sir Pandar be my speed, ye are most fitly met Sir.

Enter Mercer.

Mer. And you as well encount' red, what of this heir? hath your Books been propitious?

Pan. Sir, 'tis done, she's come, she's in my house, make your self apt for Courtship, stroke up your stockings, loose not an inch of your legs goodneis; I am sure ye wear socks.

Mer. There your Books fail ye Sir, in truth I wear no socks.

Pand. I would you had, Sir, it were the sweeter grace for your legs; get on your Gloves, are they perfum'd.

Mer. A pretty wash I'll assure you.

Pand. 'Twill serve: your offers must be full of bounty, Velvets to furnish a Gown, Silks for Peticots, and Foreparts Shag for lining; forget not some pretty Jewel to fasten, after some little compliment? if she deny this courtesie, double your bounties, be not wanting in abundance, fulness of gifts, link'd with a pleasing tongue, will win an Anchorite. Sir, ye are my friend, and friend to all that professes good Letters; I must not use this office else, it fits not for a Scholar, and a Gentleman: those stockins are of Naples, they are silk.

Mer. Ye are again beside your Text, Sir, they 're of the best of Wooll, and the clipped Jersey.

Pan. Sure they are very dear.

Mer. Nine shillings, by my love to learning.

Pan. Pardon my judgement, we Scholars use no other objects, but our Books.

Mer. There is one thing entomb'd in that grave breast, that makes me equally admire it with your Scholarship.

Pand. Sir; but that in modesty I am bound not to affect mine own commendation, I would enquire it of you.

Merc. Sure you are very honest; and yet ye have a kind of modest fear to shew it: do not deny it, that face of yours is a worthy, learned modest face.

Pand. Sir, I can blush.

Mer. Virtue and grace are always pair'd together: but I will leave to stirr your blood Sir, and now to our business.

Pand. Forget not my instructions.

Mer. I apprehend ye Sir, I will gather my self together with my best phrases, and so I shall discourse in some sort takingly.

Pand. This was well worded Sir, and like a Scholar.

Mer. The Muses favour me as my intents are virtuous; Sir, ye shall be my Tutor, 'tis never too late Sir, to love Learning.

When I can once speak true Latine —

Pand. What do you intend Sir?

Mer. Marry I will then begger all your bawdy Writers, and undertake, at the peril of my own invention, all Pageants, Poesies, for Chimneys, Speeches for the Dukes entertainment, whensoever and whatsoever; nay I will build, at mine own charge, an Hospital, to which shall retire all diseas'd opinions, all broken Poets, all Prose-men that are fall'n from small fence, to meet Letters; and it shall be lawful for a Lawyer, if he be a civil man, though he have undone others and himself by the language, to retire to this poor life, and learn to be honest.

Pand. Sir, ye are very good, and very charitable: ye are a true pattern for the City Sir.

Merc. Sir, I doe know sufficiently, their Shop-books cannot save them, there is a farther end —

Pand. Oh Sir, much may be done by manuscript.

Mer. I do confess it Sir, provided still they be Canonical, and I have some worthy hands set to 'um for probation: but we forget our selves.

Pand.

Pand. Sir, enter when you please, and all good language tip your tongue.

Merc. All that love Learning pray for my good success.
Exit Mercer.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Lazarello and his Boy.

Laz. WHereabouts are we?

Boy. Sir, by all tokens this is the house, bawdy I am sure, because of the broken windows, the Fifth head is within; if ye dare venture, here you may surprize it.

Laz. The misery of man may fitly be compar'd to a Dapper, who when she is under water, past our sight, and indeed can seem no more to us, rises again; shakes but her felt, and is the same she was, so is it still with transitory man, this day: oh but an hour since, and I was mighty, mighty in knowledge, mighty in my hopes, mighty in blessed means, and was so truly happy, that I durst have said, live Lazarello, and be satisfied: but now—

Boy. Sir, ye are yet afloat, and may recover, be not your own wreck, here lies the harbor, goe in and ride at ease.

Laz. Boy, I am receiv'd to be a Gentleman, a Courtier, and a man of action, modest, and wise, and be it spoken with thy reverence, Child, abounding virtuous; and wouldst thou have a man of these choise habits, covet the cover of a bawdy-house? yet if I goe not in, I am but—

Boy. But what Sir?

Laz. Dust boy, but dust, and my soul unsatisfied, shall haunt the keepers of my blessed Saint, and I will appear.

Boy. An ass to all men; Sir, these are no means to stay your appetite, you must resolve to enter.

Laz. Were not the house subject to Martial Law—

Boy. If that be all, Sir, ye may enter, for ye can know nothing here that the Court is ignorant of, only the more eyes shall look upon you, for there they wink one at another faults.

Laz. If I doe not.

Boy. Then ye must beat fairly back, again fall to your physical mess of porridge, and the twice sack'd carcases of a Capon: Fortune may favour you so much, to send the bread to it: but it's a meet venture, and money may be put out upon it.

Laz. I will go in and live; pretend some love to the Gentlewoman, screw my self in affection, and so be satisfied.

Pan. This Fly is caught, is mash'd already, I will suck him, and lay him by.

Boy. Muffle your self in your cloak by any means, 'tis a receiv'd thing among gallants, to walk to their leachery, as though they had the rheum, 'twas well you brought not your horse.

Laz. Why Boy?

Boy. Faith Sir, 'tis the fashion of our Gentry, to have their horses wait at door like men, while the beasts their Masters, are within at rack and manger, 'twould have discover'd much.

Laz. I will lay by these habits, forms, and grave respects of what I am, and be my self; only my appetite, my fire, my soul, my being, my dear appetite shall go along with me, arm'd with whose strength, I fearless will attempt the greatest danger dare oppose my fury: I am resolv'd where ever that thou art, most sacred dish, hid from unhallow'd eyes, to find thee out.

Be't thou in Hell, rap't by Proserpina,
To be a rival in black Pluto's love;

Or mov't thou in the heavens, a form Divine:
Lashing the lazie Spear,
Or if thou be't return'd to thy first Being,
Thy mother Sea, then will I seek thee forth.
Earth, Air, nor Fire,
Nor the black shades below shall bar my sight
So daring is my powerful appetite.

Boy. Sir, you may save this long voyage, and take a shorter cut: you have forgot your self, the fish head's here, your own imaginations have made you mad.

Laz. Term it a jealous fury, good my boy.

Boy. Faith Sir term it what you will, you must use other terms before you can get it.

Laz. The looks of my sweet love are fair,
Fresh and feeding as the air.

Boy. Sir, you forget your self.

Laz. Was never seen so rare a head,
Of any Fish alive or dead.

Boy. Good Sir remember: this is the house, Sir.

Laz. Cursed be he that dare not venture.

Boy. Fity your self, Sir, and leave this fury

Laz. For such a prize, and so I enter.

Exit Lazarello and Boy.

Pan. Dun's i'th' mire, get out again how he can:
My honest gallant, I'll shew you one trick more
Than e'er the fool your father dream'd of yet.
Madona Julia?

Enter Madona Julia, a Whore.

Julia. What news my sweet rogue, my dear fins-broker, what good news?

Pan. There is a kind of ignorant thing,
Much like a Courtier, now gone in.

Jul. Is he gallant?

Pan. He shines not very gloriously, nor does he wear one skin perfum'd to keep the other sweet; his coat is not in Or, nor does the world run yet on wheels with him; he's rich enough, and has a small thing follows him, like to a boat tyed to a tall ships tail: give him entertainment, be light, and flashing like a Meteor, hug him about the neck, give him a kiss, and lisping cry, good Sir; and he's thine own, as fast as he were tied to thine arms by Indenture.

Jul. I dare doe more than this, if he be o'th' true Court cut; I'll take him out a lesson worth the Learning: but we are but their Apes; what's he worth?

Pan. Be he rich, or poor; if he will take thee with him, thou maist use thy trade from Constables, and Marshals: who hath been here since I went out?

Jul. There is a Gentlewoman sent hither by a Lord, she's a piece of dainty stuff my rogue, smooth and soft, as new Sattin; she was never gumm'd yet boy, nor fretted.

Pan. Where lies she?

Jul. She lies above, towards the street, not to be spoke with, but by my Lord that sent her, or some from him, we have in charge from his servants.

Enter Lazarello.

Pan. Peace, he comes out again upon discovery; up with all your Canvas, hale him in; and when thou hast done, clap him aboard bravely, my valiant Pinnace.

Jul. Begone, I shall doe reason with him.

Laz. Are you the special beauty of this house?

Jul. Sir, you have given it a more special regard by your good language, than these black brows can merit,

Laz. Lady, you are fair

Jul. Fair Sir: I thank ye? all the poor means I have left to be thought grateful, is but a kiss, and ye shall have it Sir.

Laz. Ye have a very moving lip.

Jul. Prove it again Sir, it may be your sense was set too high, and so over-wrought it self.

Laz. 'Tis still the same: how far may ye hold the time to be spent Lady?

Jul. Four a clock, Sir.

Laz. I have not eat to day.

Jul. You will have the better Stomach to your supper; in the mean time I'll feed you with delight.

Laz. 'Tis not so good upon an empty Stomach: if it might be without the trouble of your house, I would eat?

Jul. Sir, we can have a Capon ready,

Laz. The day?

Jul. 'Tis Friday, Sir.

Laz. I do eat little flesh upon these days.

Jul. Come sweet, ye shall not think on meat; I'll drown it with a better appetite.

Laz. I feel it work more strangely, I must eat.

Jul. 'Tis now too late to send; I say ye shall not think on meat: if ye do, by this kiss I'll be angry.

Laz. I could be far more sprightly, had I eaten, and more lasting.

Jul. What will you have Sir? name but the Fish, my Maid shall bring it, if it may be got,

Laz. Methinks your house should not be so unfurnish'd, as not to have some pretty modicum.

Jul. It is now: but cou'd ye stay till supper?

Laz. Sure I have offended highly, and much, and my afflictions makes it manifest, I will retire henceforth, and keep my chamber, live privately, and dye forgotten.

Jul. Sir, I must crave your pardon, I had forgot my self; I have a dish of meat within, and it is fish; I think this Dukedom holds not a daintier: 'tis an Umbranoes head.

Laz. This kiss is yours, and this.

Jul. Hoe? within there? cover the board, and set the Fish head on it.

Laz. Now am I so truly happy, so much above all fate and fortune, that I should despise that man, durst say, remember Lazarello, thou art mortal.

Enter Intelligencers with a Guard.

2 Int. This is the villain, lay hold on him.

Laz. Gentlemen, why am I thus intreated? what is the nature of my crime?

2 Int. Sir, though you have carried it a great while privately, and (as you think) well; yet we have seen you Sir, and we do know thee Lazarello, for a Traitor.

Laz. The gods defend our Duke,

2 Int. Amen, Sir, Sir, this cannot save that stiff neck from the halter.

Jul. Gentlemen, I am glad you have discover'd him, he should not have eaten under my roof for twenty pounds; and surely I did not like him, when he call'd for Fish,

Laz. My friends, will ye let me have that little favour—

1 Int. Sir, ye shall have Law, and nothing else.

Laz. To let me stay the eating of a bit or two, for I protest I am yet fasting.

Jul. I'll have no Traitor come within my house.

Laz. Now could I wish my self I had been a Traitor, I have strength enough for to endure it, had I but patience: Man thou art but grass, thou art a bubble, and thou must perish.

Then lead along, I am prepar'd for all:
Since I have lost my hopes, welcome my fall.

2 Int. Away Sir.

Laz. As thou hast hope of man, stay but this dish this two hours, I doubt not but I shall be discharged: by this light I will marry thee.

Jul. You shall marry me first then.

Laz. I do contract my self unto thee now, before these Gentlemen.

Jul. I'll preserve jt till you be hang'd or quitted.

Laz. Thanks, thanks.

2 Int. Away, away, you shall thank her at the gallows.

Laz. Adieu, adieu.

Exeunt Laz. 2 Int. and Guard.

Jul. If he live I'll have him, if he be hang'd, there's no loss in it.

Exit.

Enter Oriana and her waiting woman, looking out at a window.

Oriana. Hast thou provided one to bear my Letter to my brother?

Wait. I have enquir'd, but they of the house will suffer no Letter nor message to be carried from you, but such as the Lord Gondarino shall be acquainted with: truly Madam I suspect the house to be no better than it should be.

Ori. What dost thou doubt?

Wait. Faith I am loth to tell it, Madam.

Ori. Out with it, 'tis not true modesty to fear to speak that thou dost think.

Wait. I think it to be one of these Bawdy houses.

Ori. 'Tis no matter wench, we are warm in it, keep thou thy mind pure, and upon my word, that name will do thee no hurt: I cannot force my self yet to fear any thing; when I do get out, I'll another encounter with my Woman-Hater. Here will I sit, I may get sight of some of my friends, it must needs be a comfort to them to see me here.

Enter Duke, Gondarino, Count, Arrigo.

Gond. Are we all sufficiently disguis'd? for this house where she attends me, is not to be visited in our own shapes.

Duke. We are not our selves.

Arr. I know the house to be sinful enough, yet I have been heretofore, and durst now, but for discovering of you, appear here in my own likeness.

Duke. Where's Lucio?

Arri. My Lord, he said the affairs of the Common-wealth would not suffer him to attend always.

Duke. Some great ones questionless that he will handle.

Count. Come, let us enter.

Gond. See how Fortune strives to revenge my quarrel upon these women, she's in the window, were it not to undoe her, I should not look upon her.

Duke. Lead us Gondarino.

Gond. Stay; since you force me to display my shame, look there, and you my Lord, know you that face?

Duke. Is't she?

Count. It is.

Gond. 'Tis she, whose greatest virtue ever was Dissimulation; she that still hath strove More to sin cunningly, than to avoid it: She that hath ever sought to be accounted Most virtuous, when she did deserve most scandal: 'Tis she that itches now, and in the height Of her intemperate thoughts, with greedy eyes Expects my coming to allay her Lust: Leave her; forget she's thy sister.

Count. Stay, stay.

Duke. I am as full of this, as thou canst be, The memory of this will easily Hereafter stay my loose and wandring thought] From any Woman.

Count. This will not down with me, I dare not trust this fellow.

Duke. Leave her here, that only shall be her punishment, never to be fetcht from hence; but let her use her trade to get her living.

Count. Stay good my Lord, I do believe all this, as great men as I, have had known whores to their Sisters, and have laugh't at it: I would fain hear how she talks, since she grew thus light: will your grace make him shew himself to her, as if he were now come to satisfy her longing! whilst we, unseen of her, over-hear her wantonness, let's make our best of it now, we shall have good mirth.

Duke. Do it Gondarino.

Gond. I must; fortune assist me but this once.

Count. Here we shall stand unseen, and near enough.

Gond. Madam, Oriana.

Oria.

Oria. Who's that ? oh ! my Lord ?

Gond. Shall I come up ?

Oria. Oh you are merry, shall I come down ?

Gond. It is better there.

Oria. What is the confession of the lye you made to the Duke, which I scarce believe, yet you had impudence enough to do ? did it not gain you so much faith with me, as that I was willing to be at your Lordships bestowing, till you had recover'd my credit, and confest your self a lyar, as you pretended to do ? I confest I began to fear you, and desir'd to be out of your house, but your own followers forc'd me hither.

Gond. 'Tis well suspected, dissemble still, for there are some may hear us.

Oria. More tricks yet, my Lord ? what house this is I know not, I only know my self : it were a great conquest, if you could fasten a scandal upon me : 'faith my Lord, give me leave to write to my brother ?

Duke. Come down.

Count. Come down.

Arr. If it please your Grace, there's a back door.

Count. Come meet us there then.

Duke. It seems you are acquainted with the house.

Arr. I have been in it.

Gond. She saw you and dissembled.

Duke. Sir, we shall know that better,

Gond. Bring me unto her, if I prove her not To be a strumpet, let me be contemn'd Of all her sex.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Lucio.

Luc. NOW whilst the young Duke follows his delights,
We that do mean to practise in the State,
Must pick our times, and set our faces in,
And nod our heads as it may prove most fit
For the main good of the dear Common-wealth :
Who's within there ?

Enter a Servant.

Serv. My Lord ?

Luc. Secretary, fetch the Gown I use to read Petitions in, and the Standish I answer French Letters with : and call in the Gentleman that attends : Exit Serv.
Little know they that do not deal in State,
How many things there are to be observ'd,
Which seem but little ; yet by one of us
(Whose brains do wind about the Common-wealth)
Neglected, cracks our credits utterly.

Enter Gentleman and a Servant.

Sir, but that I do presume upon your secrecie, I would not have appear'd to you thus ignorantly attir'd without a tooth-pick in a ribbond, or a Ring in my bandstring.

Gent. Your Lordship send for me ?

Luc. I did : Sir, your long practice in the State, under a great man, hath led you to much experience.

Gent. My Lord.

Luc. Suffer not your modesty to excuse it : in short, and in private, I desire your direction, I take my study already to be furnisht after a grave and wise method.

Gent. What will this Lord do ?

Luc. My Book-frings are futable, and of a reaching colour.

Gent. How's this ?

Luc. My Standish of Wood, strange and sweet, and my fore-flap hangs in the right place, and as near Machiavel's, as can be gathered by tradition.

Gent. Are there such men as will say nothing abroad, and play the fools in their Lodgings ? this Lord must be followed : and hath your Lordship some new made words to scatter in your speeches in publick, to gain note, that the hearers may carry them away, and dispute of them at dinner ?

Luc. I have Sir : and besides, my several Gowns and Caps agreeable to my several occasions.

Gent. 'Tis well, and you have learn'd to write a bad hand, that the Readers may take pains for it.

Luc. Yes Sir, and I give out I have the palfie.

Gent. Good, 'twere better though, if you had it : your Lordship hath a Secretary, that can write fair, when you purpose to be understood.

Luc. 'Faith Sir I have one, there he stands, he hath been my Secretary these seven years, but he hath forgotten to write.

Gent. If he can make a writing face, it is not amiss, so he keep his own counsel : your Lordship hath no hope of the Gout ?

Luc. Uh, little Sir, since the pain in my right foot left me.

Gent. 'Twill be some scandal to your wisdom, though I see your Lordship knows enough in publick business.

Luc. I am not employ'd (though to my desert) in occasions foreign, nor frequented for matters domestical.

Gent. Not frequented ? what course takes your Lordship ?

Luc. The readiest way, my door stands wind, my Secretary knows I am not denied to any.

Gent. In this (give me leave) your Lordship is out of the way : make a back door to let out Intelligencers ; seem to be ever busie, and put your door under keepers, and you shall have a troop of Clients sweating to come at you.

Luc. I have a back door already, I will henceforth be busie, Secretary, run and keep the door. Exit Secretary.

Gent. This will fetch 'um ?

Luc. I hope so.

Enter Secretary.

Secr. My Lord, there are some require access to you, about weighty affairs of State.

Luc. Already ?

Gent. I told you so.

Luc. How weighty is the business ?

Secr. Treason my Lord.

Luc. Sir, my debts to you for this are great.

Gent. I will leave your Lordship now.

Luc. Sir, my death must be suddain, if I requite you not : at the back door good Sir.

Gent. I will be your Lordships Intelligencer for once.

Exit Gentleman.

Enter Secretary.

Secr. My Lord.

Luc. Let 'em in, and say I am at my study.

Enter Lazarello, and two Intelligencers, Lucio being at his study.

1 Int. Where is your Lord ?

Secr. At his study, but he will have you brought in.

Laza. Why Gentlemen, what will you charge me withal ?

2 Int. Treason, horrible treason, I hope to have the leading of thee to prison, and prick thee on i'th' arse with a Halbert : to have him hang'd that salutes thee, and call all those in question that spit not upon thee.

Laz. My thred is spun, yet might I but call for this dish

of

of meat at the gallows, instead of a Psalm, it were to be endur'd: the Curtain opens, now my end draws on.

Secretary draws the Curtain.

Luc. Gentlemen, I am not empty of weighty occasions at this time; I pray you your business.

1 Int. My Lord, I think we have discover'd one of the most bloody Traitors, that ever the world held.

Luc. Signior Lazarillo, I am glad ye are one of this discovery, give me your hand.

2 Int. My Lord, that is the Traitor.

Luc. Keep him off, I would not for my whole estate have touch'd him.

Laz. My Lord.

Luc. Peace Sir, I know the devil is at your tongue's end, to furnish you with speeches: what are the particulars you charge him with?

They deliver a paper to Lucio, who reads.

Both Int. We conferr'd our Notes, and have extracted that, which we will justifie upon our oaths.

Luc. That he would be greater than the Duke, that he had cast plots for this, and meant to corrupt some to betray him, that he would burn the City, kill the Duke, and poison the Privy Council; and lastly kill himself. Though thou deserv'st justly to be hang'd, with silence yet I allow thee to speak, be short.

Laz. My Lord, so may my greatest wish succeed, So may I live, and compass what I seek, As I had never treason in my thoughts, Nor ever did conspire the overthrow Of any creatures but of brutish beasts, Fowls, Fishes, and such other humane food, As is provided for the good of man. If stealing Custards, Tarts, and Florentines By some late Statute be created Treason; How many fellow-Courtiers can I bring, Whose long attendance and experience, Hath made them deeper in the plot than I?

Luc. Peace, such hath ever been the clemency of my gracious Master the Duke, in all his proceedings, that I had thought, and thought I had thought rightly; that malice would long e'r this have hid her self in her Den, and have turn'd her own sting against her own heart: but I well perceive, that so froward is the disposition of a deprav'd nature, that it doth not only seek revenge, where it hath receiv'd injury, but many times thirst after their destruction, where it hath met with benefits.

Laz. But my good Lord —

2 Int. Let's gag him.

Luc. Peace again, but many times thirst after destruction, where it hath met with benefits; there I left: Such, and no better are the business that we have now in hand.

1 Int. He's excellently spoken.

1 Int. He'll wind a Traitor I warrant him,

Luc. But surely methinks, setting aside the touch of conscience, and all inward convulsions.

2 Int. He'll be hang'd, I know by that word.

Laz. Your Lordship may consider —

Luc. Hold thy peace: thou canst not answer this speech: no Traitor can answer it: but because you cannot answer this speech, I take it you have confess'd the Treason.

1 Int. The Count Valore was the first that discover'd him, and can witness it; but he left the matter to your Lordship's grave consideration.

Luc. I thank his Lordship, carry him away speedily to the Duke.

Laz. Now Lazarillo thou art tumb'd down The hill of fortune, with a violent arm; All plagues that can be, Famine, and the Sword Will light upon thee, black despair will boil In thy despairing breast, no comfort by, Thy friends far off, thy enemies are nigh.

Luc. Away with him, I'll follow you, look you pinion him, and take his money from him, lest he swallow a shilling, and kill himself.

2 Int. Get thou on before.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Tertia.

Enter the Duke, the Count, Gondarino, and Arrigo.

Duke. NOW Gondarino, what can you put on now That may deceive us?

Have ye more strange illusions, yet more mists, Through which, the weak eye may be led to error: What can ye say that may do satisfaction Both for her wrong'd honor, and your ill?

Gond. All I can say, or may, is said already: She is unchaste, or else I have no knowledge, I do not breathe, nor have the use of sense.

Duke. Dare ye be yet so wilful, ignorant of your own nakedness? did not your servants

In mine own hearing confess They brought her to that house we found her in, Almost by force: and with a great distrust Of some ensuing hazard?

Count. He that hath begun so worthily, It fits not with his resolution

To leave off thus, my Lord, I know these are but idle proofs.

What says your Lordship to them?

Gond. Count, I dare yet pronounce again, thy Sister is not honest.

Count. You are your self my Lord, I like your settledness.

Gond. Count, thou art young, and unexperienc'd in the dark, hidden ways of Women: Thou dar'st affirm with confidence, a Lady of fifteen may be a Maid.

Count. Sir, if it were not so, I have a Sister would set near my heart.

Gond. Let her sit near her shame, it better fits her: call back the blood that made our stream in nearness, and turn the Current to a better use; 'tis too much mudded, I do grieve to know it.

Duke. Dar'st thou make up again, dar'st thou turn face, knowing we know thee, hast thou not been discover'd openly? did not our ears hear her deny thy courtings? did we not see her blush with modest anger, to be so overtaken by a trick; can ye deny this Lord?

Gond. Had not your Grace, and her kind brother

Been within level of her eye, You should have had a hotter volley from her, More full of blood and fire, ready to leap the window where she stood.

So truly sensual is her appetite.

Duke. Sir, Sir, these are but words and tricks, give me the proof.

Count. What need a better proof than your Lordship? I am sure ye have lain with her my Lord.

Gond. I have confess'd it Sir.

Duke. I dare not give thee credit without witness.

Gond. Does your grace think we carry seconds with us, to search us, and see fair play: your Grace hath been ill tutor'd in the business; but if you hope to try her truly, and satisfy your self what frailty is, give her the Test: do not remember Count she is your Sister; nor let my Lord the Duke believe she is fair; but put her to it without hope or pity, then ye shall see that golden form flie off, that all eyes wonder at for pure and fixt, and under't base blushing Copper; metall not worth the meanest meanest honor : you shall behold her then my Lord transparent, look through her heart, and view the spirits how they leap, and tell me then I did belie the Lady.

Duke. It shall be done : come Gondarino bear us company, We do believe thee : she shall die, and thou shalt see it.

Enter Lazarello, two Intelligencers, and Guard.

How now my friends, who have you guarded hither?

2 Int. So please your Grace we have discover'd a villain and a Traitor : the Lord Lucio hath examin'd him, and sent him to your Grace for Judgement.

Count. My Lord, I dare absolve him from all sin of Treason : I know his most ambition is but a dish of meat, which he hath hunted with so true a scent, that he deserveth the Collar not the Halter.

Duke. Why do they bring him thus bound up? the poor man had more need have some warm meat, to comfort his cold stomach.

Count. Your Grace shall have the cause hereafter, when you shall laugh more freely : But these are call'd Informers : men that live by Treason, as Rat-catchers do by poison.

Duke. Would there were no heavier prodigies hung over us, than this poor fellow, I durst redeem all perils ready to pour themselves upon this State, with a cold Custard.

Count. Your Grace might do it without danger to your person.

Laz. My Lord, if ever I intended treason against your Person, or the State, unless it were by wishing from your Table some dish of meat, which I must needs confess, was not a subjects part : or coveting by stealth, sups from those noble bottles, that no mouth, keeping allegiance true, should dare to taste : I must confess, with more than covetous eye, I have beheld those dear conceal'd dishes, that have been brought in by cunning equipage, to wait upon your Graces pallat : I do confesse, out of this present heat, I have had Stratagems and Ambuscado's; but God be thank'd they have never took.

Duke. Count, this business is your own; when you have done, repair to us.

Exit Duke.

Count. I will attend your Grace : Lazarello, you are at liberty, be your own man again; and if you can be master of your wishes, I wish it may be so.

Laz. I humbly thank your Lordship : I must be unmanly, I have some present business, once more I heartily thank your Lordship.

Exit Lazarillo.

Count. Now even a word or two to you, and so farewell, you think you have deserv'd much of this State by this discovery : y^e are a slavish people, grown subject to the common course of all men. How much unhappy were that noble spirit, could work by such baser gains? what misery would not a knowing man put on with willingness, e^r he see himself grown fat and full fed, by fall of those you rise by? I do discharge ye my attendance; our healthful State needs no such Leeches to suck out her blood.

1 Int. I do beseech your Lordship.

2 Int. Good my Lord.

Count. Go learn to be more honest, what I see you work your means from honest industry,

Exeunt Informers.

I will be willing to accept your labours :
Till then I will keep back my promis'd favours;
Here comes another remnant of folly :

Enter Lucio.

I must dispatch him too. Now Lord Lucio, what business brings you hither?

Luc. Faith Sir, I am discovering what will become of that notable piece of treason, intended by that Varlet Lazarillo; I have sent him to the Duke for judgement.

Count. Sir, you have perform'd the part of a most careful Statesman, and let me say it to your face, Sir, of a Father to this State : I would wish you to retire, and insconce your self in study : for such is your daily labour, and our fear, that our loss of an hour may breed our overthrow.

Luc. Sir, I will be commanded by your judgement, and though I find it a trouble scant to be waded through, by these weak years : yet for the dear care of the Common-wealth, I will bruise my brains, and confine my self to much vexation.

Count. Go, and maist thou knock down Treason like an Ox.

Luc. Amen.

Exeunt.

Enter Mercer, Pandar, Francissima.

Mer. Have I spoke thus much in the honor of Learning? learn'd the names of the seven liberal Sciences, before my marriage; and since, have in haste written Epistles congratulatory, to the Nine Muses, and is the prov'd a Whore and a Begger?

Pan. 'Tis true, you are not now to be taught, that no man can be learn'd of a suddain; let not your first project discourage you, what you have lost in this, you may get again in Alchumie.

Fran. Fear not Husband, I hope to make as good a wife, as the best of your neighbors, have, and as honest.

Mer. I will goe home; good Sir, do not publish this, as long as it runs amongst our selves; 'tis good honest mirth : you'll come home to supper; I mean to have all her friends, and mine, as ill as it goes.

Pan. Do wisely Sir, and bid your own friends, your whole wealth will scarce feast all hers, neither is it for your credit, to walk the streets with a woman so noted; get you home and provide her cloaths : let her come an hour hence with an Hand-basket, and shift her self, she'll serve to sit at the upper end of the Table, and drink to your customers.

Mer. Art is just, and will make me amends.

Pan. No doubt Sir.

Mer. The chief note of a Scholar you say, is to govern his passions; wherefore I do take all patiently; in sign of which, my dear Wife, I do kiss thee, make haste home after me, I shall be in my study.

Exit Mercer.

Pan. Go, avaunt, my new City Dame, send me what you promis'd me for consideration; and may'st thou prove a Lady.

Fran. Thou shalt have it, his Silks shall flie for it.

Exeunt.

Enter Lazarello and his boy.

Laz. How sweet is a Calm after a Tempest, what is there now that can stand betwixt me and felicity? I have gone through all my crosses constantly; have confounded my enemies, and know where to have my longing satisfied : I have my way before me, there's the door, and I may freely walk into my delights : knock boy.

Jul. Who's there?

Within.

Laz. Madona, my Love, not guilty, not guilty, open the door.

Enter Julia.

Jul. Art thou come sweet-heart?

Laz. Yes, to my soft embraces, and the rest of my overflowing blisses; come, let us in and swim in our delights : a short Grace as we go, and so to meat.

Julia.

Jul. Nay my dear Love, you must bear with me in this; we'll to the Church first.

Laz. Shall I be sure of it then?

Jul. By my love you shall.

Laz. I am content, for I do now wish to hold off longer, to whet my appetite, and do desire to meet with more troubles, so I might conquer them:

And as a holy Lover that hath spent
The tedious night with many a sigh and tears;
Whilst he pursu'd his wench: and hath observ'd
The smiles, and frowns, not daring to displease
When at last, hath with his service won
Her yielding heart; that she begins to dote
Upon him, and can hold no longer out,
But hangs about his neck, and woos him more
Than ever he desir'd her love before:
Then begins to flatter his desert,
And growing wanton, needs will cast her off;
Try her, pick quarrels, to breed fresh delight,
And to increase his pleasing appetite.

Jul. Come Mousé will you walk?

Laz. I pray thee let me be deliver'd of the joy I am so big with, I do feel that high heat within me, that I begin to doubt whether I be mortal:

How I contemn my fellows in the Court,
With whom I did but yesterday converse?
And in a lower, and an humbler key
Did walk and meditate on grosser meats?
There are they still poor rogues, shaking their chops,
And sneaking after Cheeses, and do run
Headlong in chace, of every Jack of Beer
That crosseth them, in hope of some repast,
That it will bring them to, whilst I am here,
The happiest wight that ever set his tooth
To a dear novelty: approach my love,
Come, let's go to knit the True Loves knot,
That never can be broken.

Boy. That is to marry a whore.

Laz. When that is done, then will we taste the gift,

Which Fates have sent my Fortunes up to lift.

Boy. When that is done, you'll begin to repent upon a full stomach; but I see, 'tis but a form in destiny, not to be alter'd.

Exeunt.

Enter Arrigo and Oriana.

Oria. Sir, what may be the current of your business, that thus you single out your time and place?

Arri. Madam, the business now impos'd upon me, concerns you nearly, I wish some worse man might finish it.

Oria. Why are ye chang'd so? are ye not well Sir?

Arri. Yes Madam, I am well, wo'd you were so.

Oria. Why Sir, I feel my self in perfect health.

Arri. And yet ye cannot live long, Madam.

Oria. Why good Arrigo?

Arri. Why? ye must dye.

Oria. I know I must, but yet my fate calls not upon me.

Arri. It does; this hand the Duke commands shall give you death.

Oria. Heaven, and the powers Divine, guard well the innocent.

Arri. Lady, your Prayers may do your soul some good.

That sure your body cannot merit by 'em:
You must prepare to die.

Oria. What's my offence? what have these years committed,

That may be dangerous to the Duke, or State?
Have I conspir'd by poison, have I giv'n up,

My honor to some loose unsetl'd blood

That may give action to my plots?

Dear Sir, let me not dye ignorant of my faults?

Arri. Ye shall not.

Then Lady, you must know, you're held unhonest;
The Duke, your Brother, and your friends in Court,
With too much grief condemn ye: though to me,
The fault deserves not to be paid with death.

Oria. Who's my accuser?

Arri. Lord Gondarino.

Oria. Arrigo, take these words, and bear them to the Duke,

It is the last petition I shall ask thee:

Tell him the child this present hour brought forth
To see the world has not a soul more pure, more white,

More Virgin than I have; Tell him Lord Gondarino's Plot, I suffer for, and willingly: tell him it had been a greater honor, to have sav'd than kill'd: but I have done: strike, I am arm'd for heaven. Why, stay you? is there any hope?

Arri. I would not strike.

Oria. Have you the power to save?

Arri. With hazard of my life, if it should be known.

Oria. You will not venture that?

Arri. I will Lady: there is that means yet to escape your death, if you can wisely apprehend.

Oria. Ye dare not be so kind?

Arri. I dare, and will, if you dare but deserve't.

Oria. If I should slight my life, I were too blame.

Arri. Then Madam, this is the means, or else you die:
I love you.

Oria. I shall believe it, if you save my life.

Arri. And you must lie with me.

Oria. I dare not buy my life so.

Arri. Come, ye must resolve, say yea or no.

Oria. Then no; nay, look not ruggedly upon me,
I am made up too strong to fear such looks:

Come, do your Butchers part: before I would wish life, with the dear loss of honour, I dare find means to free
my self.

Arri. Speak, will ye yield?

Oria. Villain, I will not; Murtherer, do thy worst, thy base un noble thoughts dare prompt thee to; I am above thee slave.

Arri. Wilt thou not be drawn to yield by fair persuasions?

Oria. No, nor by ——

Arri. Peace, know your doom then; your Ladyship must remember, you are not now at home, where you dare feast all that come about you: but you are fallen under my mercy, which shall be but small; if thou refuse to yield: hear what I have sworn unto my self; I will enjoy thee, though it be between the parting of thy soul and body; yield yet and live.

Oria. I'll guard the one, let Heaven guard the other,

Arri. Are you so resolute then?

Duke from above.

Hold, hold I say.

Oria. What I? yet more terror to my tragedy?

Arri. Lady, the Scene of blood is done; ye are now as free from scandal, as from death.

Enter Duke, Count, and Gondarino.

Duke. Thou Woman which wert born to teach men virtue,

Fair, sweet, and modest Maid, forgive my thoughts,
My trespass was my love.

Seize Gondarino, let him wait our dooms.

Gond. I do begin a little to love this woman; I could endure her already twelve miles off.

Count

Count. Sister, I am glad you have brought your honor off so fairly, without loss: you have done a work above your sex, the Duke admires it: give him fair encounter.

Duke. Best of all comforts, may I take this hand, and call it mine?

Ori. I am your Graces handmaid.

Duke. Would ye had fed my self: might it not be so Lady?

Count. Sister, say I, I know you can afford it.

Ori. My Lord, I am your subject, you may command me, provided still, your thoughts be fair and good.

Duke. Here I am yours, and when I cease to be so, Let heaven forget me: thus I make it good.

Ori. My Lord, I am no more mine own.

Count. So; this bargain was well driven.

Gond. Duke, thou hast sold away thy self to all perdition; thou art this present hour becoming Cuckold: methinks I see thy gaul grate through thy veins, and jealousy seize thee with her talons: I know that womans nose must be cut off, she cannot scape it.

Duke. Sir, we have punishment for you.

Orian. I do beseech your Lordship, for the wrongs this man hath done me, let me pronounce his punishment.

Duke. Lady, I give't to you, he is your own.

Gond. I do beseech your Grace, let me be banisht with all the speed that may be.

Count. Stay still, you shall attend her sentence.

Orian. Lord Gondarino, you have wrong'd me highly; yet since it sprung from no peculiar hate to me, but from a general dislike unto all women, you shall thus suffer for it; Arrigo, call in some Ladies to assist us; will your Grace make your State?

Gond. My Lord, I do beseech your Grace for any punishment saving this woman, let me be sent upon discovery of some Island; I do desire but a small Gondela, with ten Holland Cheeses, and I'll undertake it.

Oria. Sir, ye must be content, will ye sit down? nay, do it willingly: Arrigo, tie his Arms close to the chair, I dare not trust his patience.

Cond. Mayst thou be quickly old and painted; mayst thou dote upon some sturdy Yeoman of the Wood-yard, and he be honest; mayst thou be barr'd the lawful lechery of thy Coach, for want of instruments; and last, be thy womb unopen'd.

Duke. This fellow hath a pretty gaul.

Count. My Lord, I hope to see him purg'd e'r he part,

Enter Ladies.

Oria. Your Ladyships are welcome: I must desire your helps, though you are no Physicians, to do a strange cure upon this Gentleman.

Ladies. In what we can assist you Madam, ye may command us.

Gond. Now do I sit like a Conjuror within my circle, and these the Devils that are rais'd about me, I will pray that they may have no power upon me.

Oria. Ladies, fall off in couples, then with a soft still march, with low demeanors, charge this Gentleman, I'll be your Leader.

Gond. Let me be quarter'd Duke quickly, I can endure it: these women long for Mans flesh, let them have it.

Duke. Count, have you ever seen so strange a passion? what would this fellow do, if he should find himself in bed with a young Lady?

Count. Faith my Lord, if he could get a knife, sure he wou'd cut her throat, or else he wou'd do as Hercules did by Lycas, siving out her soul: h'as the true hate of a woman in him.

Oria. Low with your Curses Ladies.

Gond. Come not too near me, I have a breath will poison ye, my lungs are rotten, and my stomach is raw: I am given much to belching: hold off, as you love sweet airs; Ladies, by your first nights pleasure, I conjure you, as you wou'd have your Husbands proper men, strong backs, and little legs, as you would have 'em hate your Waiting-women.

Oria. Sir, we must court ye, till we have obtain'd some little favour from those gracious eyes, 'tis but a kifs a piece.

Gond. I pronounce perdition to ye all; ye are a parcel of that damned crew that fell down with Lucifer, and here ye staid on earth to plague poor men; vanish, avaunt, I am fortified against your charms; heaven grant me breath and patience.

1 Lady. Shall we not kifs then?

Gond. No fear my lips with hot irons first, or stitch them up like a Ferrets: oh that this brunt were over!

2 Lady. Come, come, little rogue, thou art too maidenly by my troth, I think I must box thee till thou be'st bolder; the more bold, the more welcome: I prethee kifs me, be not afraid.

She sits on his knee.

Gond. If there be any here, that yet have so much of the fool left in them, as to love their mothers, let them on her, and loath them too.

2 Lady. What a slovenly little villain art thou, why dost thou not stroke up thy hair? I think thou ne'er comb'd it: I must have it lie in better order; so, so, so, let me see thy hands, are they wash'd?

Gond. I would thy were loose for thy sake.

Duke. She tortures him admirably.

Count. The best that ever was.

2 Lady. Alas, how cold they are, poor golls, why dost thee not get thee a Muff?

Arri. Madam, here's an old Countrey Gentlewoman at the door, that came nodding up for justice, she was with the Lord Gondarino to day, and would now again come to the speech of him, she says.

Oria. Let her in, for sports sake, let her in.

Gond. Mercy, oh Duke, I do appeal to thee: plant Canons there, and discharge them against my breast rather: nay, first let this she-fury sit still where she does, and with her nimble fingers stroke my hair, play with my fingers ends, or any thing, until my panting heart have broke my breast.

Duke. You must abide her censure.

The Lady rises from his knee.

Enter old Gentlewoman.

Gond. I see her come, unbutton me, for she will speak.

Gentlew. Where is he Sir?

Gond. Save me, I hear her.

Ar. There he is in state to give you audience

Gentlew. How does your Lordship?

Gond. Sick of the spleen.

Gentlew. How?

Gond. Sick.

Gentlew. Will you chew a Nutmeg, you shall not refuse it, it is very comfortable.

Gond. Nay, now thou art come, I know it is the Devils Jubile, Hell is broke loose: My Lord, if ever I have done you service, Or have deserv'd a favour of your Grace, Let me be turn'd upon some present action, Where I may sooner die, than languish thus; Your Grace hath her petition, grant it her, and ease me now at last.

Duke. No Sir, you must endure,

Gentlew. For my petition, I hope your Lordship hath remembred me.

Oria. Faith I begin to pity him, Arrigo, take her off, bear her away, say her petition is granted.

Gentlew. Whether do you draw me Sir? I know it is not my Lords pleasure I should be thus used, before my business be dispatched?

Arr. You shall know more of that without.

Oria. Unbind him Ladies, but before he go, this he shall promise; for the love I bear to our own sex, I would have them still hated by thee, and injoyne thee as a punishment, never hereafter willingly to come in the presence, or fight of any woman, nor never to seek wrongfully, the publick disgrace of any.

Gond. 'Tis that I would have sworn, and do: when I meditate with them, for their good, or their bad; may

Time will call back this day again, and when I come in their companies, may I catch the pox, by their breath, and have no other pleasure for it.

Duke. Ye are most merciful.

Oria. My Lord, I shew'd my sex the better.

Gond. All is over-blown Sister: y'are like to have a fair night of it, and a Prince in your Arms: let's goe my Lord.

Duke. Thus through the doubtful streams of joy and grief,

True Love doth wade, and finds at last relief.

Exeunt omnes.

The Scene Genoua.

The PROLOGUE at the reviving of this Play.

IT's grown in fashion of late in these days,
To come and beg a suffrage to our Plays
Faith Gentlemen, our Poet ever writ
Language so good, mixt with such sprightly wit,
He made the Theatre so Sovereign
With his rare Scenes, he scorn'd this crouching vein:

We stabb'd him with keen daggers when we pray'd
Him write a Preface to a Play well made.
He could not write these toys, 'twos easier far,
To bring a Felon to appear at th' Barr
So much he hated baseness; which this day,
His Scenes will best convince you of in's Play.

Actus Primus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Duke, Shamont, and four Gentlemen.

Duke.

Shamont, welcome; we have miss'd thee long,
Though absent but two days: I hope your Answer your time and wishes. (sports

Sham. Very nobly Sir;
We found game, worthy your delight my
It was so royal. (Lord,

Duke. I've enough to hear on't.

Prethee bestow't upon me in discourse.

1 Gent. What is this Gentleman, Coz? you are a Courtier,
Therefore know all their insides.

2 Gent. No farther than the Taffaty goes, good Coz.
For the most part, which is indeed the best part
Of the most general inside; marry thus far
I can with boldness speak this one mans character,
And upon honor, pass it for a true one;
He has that strength of manly merit in him,
That it exceeds his Sovereigns power of gracing;
He's faithfully true to valour, that he hates
The man from Caesar's time, or farther off,
That ever took disgrace unreveng'd:
And if he chance to read his abject story,
He tears his memory out; and holds it virtuous,
Not to let shame have so much life amongst us;
There is not such a curious piece of courage

Q q q 2

Among 1

Amongst mans fellowship, or one so jealous
Of honours loss, or reputations glory:

There's so much perfect of his growing story.

1 Gent. 'Twould make one dote on virtue as you tell it.

2 Gent. I have told it to much loss, believe it Coz.

3 Gent. How the Duke graces him? what is he brother?

4 Gent. Do you not yet know him? a vain-glorious Cox-
As proud as he that fell for't:

(comb,

Set but aside his valour; no virtue;

Which is indeed, not fit for any Courtier;

And we his fellows are as good as he,

Perhaps as capable of favour too,

For one thing or another, if 'twere look'd into:

Give me a man, were I a Sovereign now

Has a good stroke of Tennis, and a stiff one,

Can play at Æquinoctium with the Line,

As even, as the thirteenth of September,

When day and night lie in a scale together;

Or may I thrive, as I deserve at Billiards;

No otherwise at Chess, or at Primero:

These are the parts requir'd, why not advanc'd?

Duke. Trust me, it was no less than excellent pleasure,

And I'm right glad 'twas thine. How fares our kinsman?

Who can resolve us best?

1 Gent. I can my Lord.

Duke. There, if I had a pity without bounds,

It might be all bestowed——A man so lost

In the wild ways of passion, that he's sensible

Of nought, but what torments him?

1 Gent. True my Lord,

He runs through all the Passions of mankind,

And shifts 'em strangely too: one while in love,

And that so violent, that for want of business,

He'll court the very Prentice of a Landress,

Though she have kib'd heels: and in's melancholly agen,

He will not brook an Empress though thrice fairer

Than ever Mind was; or higher spirited

Than Cleopatra, or your English Countess:

Then on a suddain he's so merry again,

Out-laughs a Waiting-woman before her first Child:

And turning of a hand, so angry——

Has almost beat the Northern fellow blind;

That is for that use only; if that mood hold my Lord,

Had need of a fresh man; I'll undertake,

He shall bruise three a month.

Duke. I pity him dearly:

And let it be your charge, with his kind brother

To see his moods observ'd; let every passion

Be fed ev'n to a surfet, which in time

May breed a loathing: let him have enough

Of every object, that his fence is wrapt with;

And being once glutted, then the taste of folly

Will come into his relish.

Exit.

1 Gent. I shall see

Your charge my Lord, most faithfully effected:

And how does noble Shamount?

Sham. Never ill man

Until I hear of baseness, then I sicken:

I am the healthfull'st man i'th' kingdom else.

Enter Lapet.

1 Gent. Be arm'd then for a fit,

Here comes a fellow

Will make you sick at heart, if baseness do't.

Sh. Let me be gone: what is he?

1 Gent. Let me tell you first,

It can be but a qualm: pray stay it out Sir,

Come, y've born more than this.

Sh. Born? never any thing

That was injurious.

2 Gent. Ha, I am far from that.

Sham. He looks as like a man as I have seen one:

What would you speak of him? speak well I prethee,

Even for humanities cause.

1 Gent. You'd have it truth though?

Sham. What else Sir? I have no reason to wrong heav'n

To favour nature; let her bear her own shame

If she be faulty.

1 Gent. Monstrous faulty there Sir.

Sham. I'm ill at ease already.

1 Gent. Pray bear up Sir.

Sham. I prethee let me take him down with speed then;
Like a wild object that I would not look upon.

1 Gent. Then thus: he's one that will endure as much
As can be laid upon him.

Sham. That may be noble:
I'm kept too long from his acquaintance.

1 Gent. Oh Sir,
Take heed of rash repentance, y'are too forward.

To find out virtue where it never setl'd:

Take the particulars first, of what he endures;

Videlicet, Bastinadoes by the great.

Sham. How! (fale.

1 Gent. Thumps by the dozen, and your kicks by whole-

Sham. No more of him.

1 Gent. The twinges by the nostril he snuffs up,
And holds it the best remedy for sneezing.

Sham. Away.

1 Gent. Has been thrice switch'd from 7 a clock till 9.

Yet with a Cart-Horse stomach, fell to breakfast;

Forgetful of his smart.

Sham. Nay, the disgrace on't;

There's no smart but that: base things are felt

More by their shames than hurts, Sir. I know you not.

But that you live an injury to nature:

I'm heartily angry with you.

Lap. Pray give your blow or kick, and begone then;

For I ne'er saw you before; and indeed,

Have nothing to say to you, for I know you not.

Sham. Why wouldst thou take a blow?

Lap. I would not Sir,

Unless 'twere offer'd me; and if from an enemy?

I'd be loth to deny it from a stranger.

Sham. What, a blow?

Endure a blow? and shall he live that gives it?

Lap. Many a fair year——why not Sir?

Sham. Let me wonder!

As full a man to see to, and as perfect——

I prethee live not long——

Lap. How?

Sham. Let me intreat it:

Thou dost not know what wrong thou dost mankind,

To walk so long here; not to dye betimes.

Let me advise thee, while thou hast to live here,

Ev'n for man's honour sake, take not a blow more.

Lap. You should advise them not to strike me then Sir,

For I'll take none I assure you, 'less they are given.

Sham. How fain would I preserve mans form from shame

And cannot get it done? however Sir,

I charge thee live not long.

Lap. This is worse than beating.

Sham. Of what profession art thou, tell me Sir,

Besides a Tailor? for I'll know the truth.

Lap. A Tailor? I'm as good a Gentleman——

Can shew my Arms and all,

Sham. How black and blew they are?

Is that your manifestation? upon pain

Of pounding thee to dust, assume not wrongfully

The name of Gentleman, because I'm one,

That must not let thee live.

Lap. I have done, I have done Sir.

If there be any harm, bestrew the Herald,

I'm sure I ha' not been so long a Gentleman,

To make this anger: I have nothing no where,

But what I dearly pay for.

Sham. Groom begone;

I never was so heart-sick yet of man.

Exit.

Enter

Enter Lady, the Duke's Sister, Lapet's wife.

I Gent. Here comes a cordial, Sir, from th'other sex,
Able to make a dying face look chearful.

Sham. The blessedness of Ladies —

Lady. Y'are well met Sir.

Sham. The sight of you has put an evil from me,
Whose breath was able to make virtue sicken,

Lady. I'm glad I came so fortunately. What was't Sir?

Sham. A thing that takes a blow, lives, and eats after it,
In very good health; you ha' not seen the like, Madam,
A Monster worth your sixpence, lovely worth,
Speak low Sir; by all likely-hoods 'tis her Husband, Lady,
That now bestow'd a visitation on me. Farewel Sir. Exit.

Sham. Husband? is't possible that he has a wife?
Would any creature have him? 'tis some forc'd match,
If he were not kick'd to th' Church o' th' wedding day,
I'll never come at Court. Can be no otherwise:

Perhaps he was rich, speak mistress Lapet, was't not so?

Wife. Nay, that's without all question.

Sh. O ho, he would not want kickers enow then;
If you are wise, I much suspect your honesty;
For wisdom never fastens constantly,
But upon merit: if you incline to fool,
You are alike unfit for his society;
Nay, if it were not boldness in the man
That honors you, to advise you, troth his company
Should not be frequent with you.

Wife. 'Tis good counsel Sir.

Sham. Oh, I am so careful where I reverence,
So just to goodness, and her precious purity,
I'm as equally jealous, and as fearful,
That any undeserved stain might fall
Upon her sanctified whiteness, as of the sin
That comes by wilfulness.

Wife. Sir, I love your thoughts,
And honor you for your counsel and your care.

Sham. We are your servants.

Wife. He's but a Gentleman o'th' chamber; he might have kiss me:

Faith, where shall one find less courtesie, than at Court?

Say I have an undeserver to my Husband:

That's ne'er the worse for him: well strange lip'd men,
'Tis but a kiss lost, there'll more come agen. Exit.

Enter the passionate Lord, the Dukes kinsman, makes a congie or two to nothing.

I Gent. Look, who comes here Sir, his love-fit's upon him:
I know it, by that sett smile, and those congies.

How courteous he's to nothing? which indeed,

Is the next kin to woman; only shadow

The elder Sister of the twain, because 'tis seen too

See how it kisses the fore-finger still;

Which is the last edition, and being come

So near the thumb, every Cobler has got it.

Sham. What a ridiculous piece, humanity
Here makes it self?

I Gent. Nay good give leave a little, Sir,
Y'are so precise a manhood —

Sham. It afflicts me
When I behold unseemliness in an Image
So near the Godhead, 'tis an injury
To glorious Eternity.

I Gent. Pray use patience, Sir.

Paf. I do confess it freely, precious Lady,
And loves suit is so, the longer it hangs
The worse it is; better cut off, sweet Madam;
Oh, that same drawing in your neather Lip there,
Fore-shews no goodness, Lady; make you question on't?
Shame on me, but I love you.

I Gent. Who is't Sir,
You are at all this pains for? may I know her?

Paf. For thee thou fairest, yet the falsest woman,
That ever broke man's heart-strings.

I Gent. How? how's this Sir?

Paf. What the old trick of Ladies? man's apparel,
Will't ne'er be left amongst you? steal from Court in't?

I Gent. I see the Fit grows stronger.

Paf. Pray let's talk a little.

Sham. I can endure no more.

I Gent. Good, let's alone a little:

You are so exact a work: love light things somewhat, Sir.

Sham. Th'are all but shames.

I Gent. What is't you'd say to me, Sir?

Paf. Can you be so forgetful to enquire it Lady?

I Gent. Yes truly, Sir.

Paf. The more I admire your flintiness:
What cause have I given you, illustrious Madam,
To play this strange part with me?

I Gent. Cause enough,

Do but look back Sir, into your memory,
Your love to other women, oh lewd man:
'Tas almost kill'd my heart, you see I'm chang'd with it,

I ha' lost the fashion of my Sex with grief on't,
When I have seen you courting of a Dowdie;
Compar'd with me, and kissing your fore-finger
To one o'th' Black-Guards Mistresses: would not this

Crack a poor Ladies heart, that believ'd love,
And waited for the comfort? but 'twas said, Sir,

A Lady of my hair cannot want pitying:

The Countrey's coming up, farewell to you Sir.

Paf. Whither intend you, Sir?

I Gent. A long journey, Sir:

The truth is, I'm with child, and goe to travel.

Paf. With child? I never got it.

I Gent. I heard you were buse

At the same time, Sir, and was loth to trouble you.

Paf. Why, are not you a whore then, excellent Madam?

I Gent. Oh by no means, 'twas done Sir in the state

Of my belief in you, and that quits me;

It lies upon your fallhood.

Paf. Does it so?

You shall not carry her though Sir, she's my contract:

Sham. I prethee, thou four Elements ill brued,

Torment none but thy self; away I say

Thou beast of passion, as the drunkard is

The beast of Wine; dishonor to thy making,

Thou man in fragments.

Paf. Hear me, precious Madam.

Sham. Kneel for thy wits to Heaven.

Paf. Lady, I'll father it,

Who e'er begot it: 'tis the course of greatness:

Sham. How virtue groans at this?

Paf. I'll raise the Court, but I'll stay your flight.

Sham. How wretched is that piece? Ex. Paf. Lord.

I Gent. He's the Dukes kinsman, Sir.

Sham. That cannot take a passion away, Sir,
Nor cut a Fit, but one poor hour shorter;

He must endure as much as the poorest begger,

That cannot change his money; there's th' equality

In our impartial Essence:

What's the news now?

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Your worthy brother, Sir, 'has left his charge,
And come to see you.

Enter Shamount's brother, a Soldier.

Sham. Oh the noblest welcome
That ever came from man, meet thy deservings:
Methinks I've all joyes treasure in mine arms now,

Sold. You are so fortunate in prevention, brother,
You always leave the answerer barren, Sir,
You comprehend in few words so much worth —

Sham.

Sham. 'Tis all too little for thee: come th'art welcome
So I include all: take especial knowledge pray,
Of this dear Gentleman, my absolute friend,
That loves a Soldier far above a Mistress,
Thou excellently faithful to 'em both.
But love to manhood, owns the purer troth.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Shamont's brother, a Soldier and a Lady, the Dukes Sister.

Lady. THere should be in this Gallery—oh th'are here,
Pray sit down, believe me Sir, I'm weary.

Sold. It well becomes a Lady to complain a little
Of what she never feels: your walk was short, Madam,
You can be but afraid of weariness;
Which well employs the softness of your Sex,
As for the thing it self, you never came to't.

La. You're wond'rously well read in Ladies, Sir.

Sold. Shall I think such a creature as you Madam,
Was ever born to feel pain, but in Travel?
There's your full portion,
Besides a little tooth-ach in the breeding,
Which a kind Husband too, takes from you, Madam.

La. But where do Ladies, Sir, find such kind Husbands?
Perhaps you have heard

The Rheumatick story of some loving Chandler now,
Or some such melting fellow that you talk
So prodigal of mens kindness: I confess Sir,
Many of those wives are happy, their ambition
Does reach no higher, than to Love and Ignorance,
Which makes an excellent Husband, and a fond one:
Now Sir, your great ones aim at height, and cunning,
And so are oft deceiv'd, yet they must venture it;
For 'tis a Ladies contumely, Sir,
To have a Lord an Ignorant; then the worlds voice
Will deem her for a wanton, e'r she taste on't:
But to deceive a wise man, to whose circumspection,
The world resigns it self, with all his envy;
'Tis less dishonor to us, than to fall,
Because his believ'd wisdom keeps out all.

Sold. Would I were the man, Lady, that should venture
His wisdom to your goodness.

La. You might fail

In the return, as many men have done, Sir:
I dare not justify what is to come of me,
Because I know it not, though I hope virtuously;
Marry what's past, or present, I durst put Into a good mans hand, which if he take
Upon my word for good, it shall not cozen him.

Sol. No, nor hereafter?

La. It may hap so too, Sir:

A womans goodness, when she is a wife,
Lies much upon a mans desert, believe it Sir,
If there be fault in her, I'll pawn my life on't,
'Tis first in him, if she were ever good,
That makes one; knowing not a Husband yet,
Or what he may be: I promise no more virtues,
Than I may well perform, for that were cozenage.

Sol. Happy were he that had you with all fears,
That's my opinion, Lady.

Enter Shamont and a servant list'ning.

Serv. What say you now, Sir?

Dare you give confidence to your own eyes?

Sham. Not yet I dare not.

Serv. No?

Sham. Scarce yet, or yet:

Although I see 'tis he. Why can a thing,
That's but my self divided, be so false?

Serv. Nay, do but mark how the chair plays hie part too:
How amorously 'tis bent.

Sham. Hell take thy bad thoughts,
For they are strange ones. Never take delight
To make a torment worse. Look on 'em heaven,
For that's a brother: send me a fair enemy,
And take him; for a fouler Fiend there breathes not:
I will not sin to think there's ill in her,
But what's of his producing.

Yet goodness, whose inclosure is but flesh,
Holds out oft times but sorrily. But as black Sir,
As ever kindred was: I hate mine own blood,
Because is is so near thine. Live without honesty,
And mayst thou dye with an unmoist'ned eye,
And no tear follow thee.

Ex. Shamont, Servant.

La. Y'are wond'rous merry Sir; I would your Brother

Sold. Oh my Sister, heard you.

I would not out o'th' way, let fall my words Lady,
For the precisest humor.

Enter passionate Lord.

Paf. Yea, so close.

Sold. Th'are merry, that's the worst you can report on Th'are neither dangerous, nor immodest.

Paf. So Sir,
Shall I believe you, think you?

Sold. Who's this Lady?

La. Oh the Dukes Cousin, he came late from travel; Sir.

Sold. Respect belongs to him.

Paf. For as I said, Lady,
Th'are merry, that's the worst you can report of 'em:
Th'are neither dangerous, nor immodest.

Sold. How's this?

Paf. And there I think I left.

Sold. Abuses me.

Paf. Now to proceed, Lady; perhaps I swore I lov'd you,
If you believe me not, y'are much the wiser.

Sold. He speaks still in my person, and derides me.

Paf. For I can cog with you.

La. You can all do so:

We make no question of mens promptness that way.

Paf. And smile, and wave a chair with comely grace too,
Play with our Tattle gently, and do fine things,
That catch a Lady sooner than a virtue.

Sold. I never us'd to let man live so long
That wrong'd me.

Paf. Talk of Battalions, wooe you in a skirmish;
Divine my mind to you Lady; and being sharp set,
Can court you at Half pike: or name your weapon,
We cannot fail you Lady.

Enter 1 Gentleman.

Sold. Now he dies:

Were all succeeding hopes stor'd up within him.

1 Gent. Oh fie, i'th' Court, Sir?

Sold. I most dearly thank you, Sir.

1 Gent. 'Tis rage ill spent upon a passionate mad man.

Sold. That shall not privilege him for ever, Sir:
A mad man call you him? I have found too much reason
Sound in his injury to me, to believe him so.

1 Gent. If ever truth from mans lips may be held
In reputation with you, give this confidence;
And this his Love-fit, which we observe still,
By's flattering and his fineness: at some other time,
He'll go as slovenly as heart can wish.

The love and pity that his Highness shews to him,
Makes every man the more respectful of him:
Has never a passion, but is well provided for,
As this of Love, he is full fed in all
His swinge, as I may tear it: have but patience,
And yeshall witness somewhat.

Sold.

Sold. Still he mocks me:
Look you, in action, in behaviour, Sir;
Hold still the chair, with a grand mischief to you,
Or I'll let so much strength upon your heart, Sir——
Paf. I feel some power has restrain'd me Lady:
If it be sent from Love, say, I obey it,
And ever keep a voice to welcome it.

S O N G.

Thou Deity, swift winged Love,
Sometimes below, sometimes above,
Little in shape, but great in power,
Thou that mak'st a heart thy Tower,
And thy loop-holes Ladies eyes,
From whence thou strik'st the fond and wise.
Did all the Shafts in thy fair Quiver
Stick fast in my ambitious Liver;
Yet thy power would I adore.
And call upon thee to shoot more,
Shoot more, shoot more.

Enter one like a Cupid, offering to shoot at him.

Paf. I prethee hold though, sweet Celestial boy;
I'm not requited yet with love enough,
For the first Arrow that I have within me;
And if thou be an equal Archer Cupid,
Shoot this Lady, and twenty more for me.

La. Me Sir?

1 Gent. 'Tis nothing but device, fear it not Lady;
You may be as good a Maid after that shaft, Madam,
As e'er your mother was at twelve and a half:
'Tis like the boy that draws it, 'tas no sting yet.

Cup. 'Tis like the miserable Maid that draws it——Aside.
That sees no comfort yet, seeing him so passionate,

Paf. Strike me the Duchess of Valois in love with me,
With all the speed thou canst, and two of her Women.

Cu. You shall have more.

Exit.

Paf. Tell 'em I tarry for 'em.

now?

1 Gent. Who would be angry with that walking trouble
That hurts none but it self?

Sold. I am better quieted.

Paf. I'll have all women-kind struck in time for me
After thirteen once:
I see this Cupid will not let me want,
And let him spend his forty shafts an hour,
They shall be all found from the Dukes Exchequer;
He's come already.

Enter again the same Cupid, two Brothers, six Women, Maskers, Cupid's Bow bent all the way towards them, the first woman singing and playing, a Priest.

S O N G.

OH turn thy bow,
Thy power we feel and know,
Fair Cupid turn away thy Bow:
They be those golden Arrows,
Bring Ladies all their sorrows,
And till there be more truth in men,
Never shoot at Maid agen.

Paf. What a felicity of whores are here?
And all my Concubines struck bleeding new:
A man can in his life time, make but one woman,
But he may make his fifty Queans a month.

Cu. Have you remembered a Priest, honest brothers?

1 Bro. Yes Sister, and this is the young Gentleman,
Make you no question of our faithfulness.

2 Bro. His growing shame, Sister, provokes our care:

Priest. He must be taken in this fit of Love, Gentlemen.

1 Bro. What else Sir, he shall do't.

2 Bro. Enough.

1 Bro. Be chearful wench. A dance. Cupid leading.

Paf. Now by the stroke of pleasure, a deep oath,
Nimbly hopt Ladies all; what height they bear too?

A story higher than your common statures;

A little man must go up stairs to kiss 'em:

What a great space there is Betwixt Loves Dining Chamber, and his Garret?

I'll try the utmost height — the Garret stoops methinks;

The rooms are made all bending, I see that,

And not so high as a man takes 'em for.

Cu. Now if you'll follow me Sir, I've that power,
To make them follow you.

Paf. Are they all shot?

Cu. All, all Sir, every mothers daughter of 'em. (Shot)

Paf. Then there's no fear of following; if they be once
They'll follow a man to th' devil — As for you, Sir——

Ex. with the Lady and the Masquers.

Sold. Me Sir?

1 Gent. Nay sweet Sir.

Sold. A noise, a threatening, did you not hear it Sir?

1 Gent. Without regard, Sir, so would I hear you

Sold. This must come to something, never talk of that Sir.
You never saw it otherwise.

1 Gent. Nay dear merit——

Sold. Me above all men?

1 Gent. Troth you wrong your anger.

Sold. I will be arm'd, my honourable Letcher.

1 Gent. Oh fie sweet Sir.

Sold. That devours womens honesties by lumps,
And never chaw'st thy pleasure:

2 Gent. What do you mean, Sir?

Sold. What does he mean t'ingross all to himself?
There's others love a whore as well as he Sir.

1 Gent. Oh, if that be part o' th' fury, we have a City
Is very well provided for that case;

Let him alone with her, Sir, we have Women

Are very charitable to proper men,

And to a Soldier that has all his limbs;

Marry the sick and lame gets not a penny:

Right womens charity, and the Husbands follow't too:

Here comes his Highness Sir.

Enter Duke and Lords.

Sold. I'll walk to cool my self.

Exit.

Duke. Who's that?

1 Gent. The brother of Shamont.

Duke. He's Brother then

To all the Courts love, they that love discreetly,

And place their friendliness upon desert:

As for the rest, that with a double face

Look upon merit much like fortunes visage,

That looks two ways, both to life's calms and storms,

I'll so provide for him, chiefly for him,

He shall not wish their loves, nor dread their envies.

And here comes my Shamont.

Enter Shamont.

Sham. That Ladies virtues are my only joyes,
And he to offer to lay siege to them?

Duke. Shamont.

Sham. Her goodness is my pride: in all discourfes,

As often as I hear rash tongu'd gallants,

Speak rudely of a woman, presently

I give in but her name, and th'are all silent:

Oh who would loofe this benefit?

Duke

Duke. Come hither Sir.

Sham. 'Tis like the Gift of Healing, but Diviner;
For that but cures diseases in the body,
This works a cure on Fame, on Reputation:
The noblest piece of Surgery upon earth.

Duke. Shamont; he minds me not.

Sham. A Brother do't?

Duke. Shamont I say.

Gives him a touch with his switch.

Sham. Ha?

If he be mortal, by this hand he perishes;
Unless it be a stroke from heaven, he dies for't.

Duke. Why, how now Sir? 'twas I.

Sham. The more's my misery.

Duke. Why, what's the matter prethee?

Sham. Can you ask it, Sir?

No man else should; stood forty lives before him,
By this I would have op'd my way to him;
It could not be you Sir, excuse him not,
What e'er he be, as y'are dear to honor,
That I may find my peace agen.

Duke. Forbear I say,

Upon my love to truth, 'twas none but I.

Sham. Still miserable?

Duke. Come, come, what ails you Sir?

Sham. Never fate shame cooling so long upon me,
Without a satisfaction in revenge,
And heaven has made it here a sin to wish it.

Duke. Hark you Sir?

Sham. Oh y'ave undone me.

Duke. How?

Sham. Cruelly undone me;

I have lost my peace and reputation by you:
Sir, pardon me, I can never love you more.

Exit.

Duke. What language call you this Sirs?

1 Gent. Truth my Lord, I've seldom heard a stranger—

2 Gent. He is a man of a most curious valour,
Wondrous precise, and punctual in that virtue.

Duke. But why to me so punctual? my last thought
Was most intirely fixt on his advancement:

Why, I came now to put him in possession
Of his fair fortunes: what a mis-conceiver 'tis?
And from a Gentleman of our Chamber meerly,
Made him Vice-Admiral: I was settled in't.

I love him next to health: call him Gentlemen;
Why would not you, or you, ha' taken as much,
And never murmur'd?

Exit 1 Gent.

2 Gent. Troth, I think we should, my Lord,
And there's a fellow walks about the Court,
Would take a hundred of 'em.

Duke. I hate you all for't,
And rather praise his high pitch'd fortitude,
Though in extreams for niceness: now I think on't,
I would I had never done't—Now Sir, where is he?

Enter 1 Gentleman.

1 Gent. His sute is only Sir, to be excus'd.

Duke. He shall not be excus'd, I love him dearlier:
Say we intreat him; goe, he must not leave us

Exit two Gentlemen.

So virtue blefs me, I ne'er knew him paralell'd;
Why, he's more precious to me now, than ever.

Enter two Gentlemen, and Shamont.

2 Gent. With much fair language w'ave brought him?

Duke. Thanks——Where is he?

2 Gent. Yonder Sir.

Duke. Come forward man.

Sham. Pray pardon me, I'm asham'd to be seen Sir.

Duke. Was ever such a touchie man heard of?

Prethee come nearer.

Sham. More into the light?

Put not such cruelty into your requests my Lord,
First to disgrace me publickly, and then draw me
Into mens eye-sight, with the shame yet hot
Upon my reputation.

Duke. What disgrace, Sir?

Sham. What?

Such as there can be no forgiveness for,
That I can find in honour.

Duke. That's most strange, Sir.

Sham. Yet I have search'd my bosom to find one,
And wrestled with my inclination,
But 'twill not be: would you had kill'd me Sir.
With what an ease had I forgiven you then?
But to endure a stroke from any hand
Under a punishing Angel, which is justice,
Honor disclaim that man, for my part chiefly:
Had it been yet the malice of your sword.
Though it had cleft me, 't had been noble to me;
You should have found my thanks paid in a smile
If I had fell unworded; but to shame me,
With the correction that your horse should have,
Were you ten thousand times my royal Lord,
I cannot love you never, nor desire to serve you more.

If your drum call me, I am vowed to valour,
But peace shall never know me yours agen,
Because I've lost mine own, I speak to dye Sir;
Would you were gracious that way to take off shame,
With the same swiftnes as you pour it on:
And since it is not in the power of Monarchs
To make a Gentleman, which is a substance
Only begot of merit, they should be careful
Not to destroy the worth of one so rare,
Which neither they can make; nor lost, repair.

Exit.

Duke. Y'ave set a fair light Sir before my judgement,
Which burns with wondrous clearness; I acknowledge it,
And your worth with it: but then Sir, my love,
My love——what gone agen?

1 Gen. And full of scorn, my Lord.

Duke. That language will undoe the man that keeps it.
Who knows no diff'rence, 'twixt contempt and manhood.
Upon your love to goodness, Gentlemen,
Let me not lose him long: how now?

Enter a Huntsman.

Hunf. The game's at height my Lord.

Duke. Confound both thee and it: hence break it off;
He hates me, brings me news of any pleasure:
I felt not such a conflict since I cou'd;
Distinguish betwixt worthiness and bloud.

Ex.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter the two Brothers, 1 Gentleman, with those that were the Masquers, and the Cupid.

1 Gent. Heartily commend your project, Gentlemen,
'Twas wise and virtuous.

1 Bro. 'Twas for the safety
Of precious honour Sir, which near bloud binds us to:
He promis'd the poor easie fool there, marriage,
There was a good Maiden-head lost i'th' belief on't,
Beshrew her hasty confidence.

1 Gent. Oh no more, Sir,
You make her weep agen; alas poor Cupid:
Shall she not shift her self?

1 Bro. Oh by no means Sir:
We dare not have her seen yet, all the while

She keeps this shape, 'tis but thought device,
And she may follow him so without suspicion,
To see if she can draw all his wild passions,
To one point only, and that's love, the main point :
So far his Highness grants, and gave at first,
Large approbation to the quick conceit,
Which then was quick indeed.

1 Gent. You make her blush insooth.

1 Bro. I fear 'tis more the flag of shame, than grace Sir.

1 Gent. They both give but one kind of colour, Sir :

If it be bashfulness in that kind taken,
It is the same with grace ; and there she weeps agen.
In truth y'are too hard, much, much too bitter Sir,
Unless you mean to have her weep her eyes out,
To play a Cupid truly.

1 Bro. Come ha' done then :

We should all fear to sin first ; for 'tis certain,
When 'tis once lodg'd, though entertain'd in mirth,
It must be wept out, if it e'er come forth.

1 Gent. Now 'tis so well, I'll leave you.

1 Bro. Faithfully welcome, Sir,

Go Cupid to your charge ; he's your own now ;
If he want love, none will be blam'd but you.

Cu. The strangest marriage, and unfortunat'st Bride
That ever humane memory contain'd ;
I cannot be my self for't.

Exit.

Enter the Clown.

Clow. Oh Gentlemen ? —

1 Bro. How now, Sir, what's the matter ?

Clow. His melancholly passion is half spent already,
Then comes his angry fit at the very tail on't,
Then comes in my pain, gentlemen ; h'as beat me e'en to a
Cullis, I am nothing ; right worshipful, but very pap,
And jelly : I have no bones, my body's all one business,
They talk of ribs and chines most freely abroad i'th' world,
Why, I have no such thing ; who ever lives to see me dead,
Gentlemen, shall find me all mummie good to fill Gallipots,
And long dildo glasses : I shall not have a bone to throw
At a dog.

Omnes. Alas poor vassal ; how he goes ?

Clow. Oh Gentlemen,

I am unjoynted, do but think o' that :
My breast is beat into my maw, that what I eat,
I am fain to take't in all at mouth with spoons ;
A lamentable hearing ; and 'tis well known, my belly
Is driven into my back.
I earn'd four Crowns a month most dearly Gentlemen,
And one he must have when the fit's upon him,
The Privy-purse allows it, and 'tis thriftiness,
He would break else some forty pounds in Cafements,
And in five hundred years undo the Kingdom :
I have cast it up to a quarrel.

1 Bro. There's a fellow kickt about Court, I would

He had his place, brother, but for one fit of his indignation.

2 Bro. And suddainly I have thought upon a means for't.

1 Bro. I prethee how ?

2 Bro. 'Tis but preferring, Brother

This stockfish to his service, with a Letter
Of commendations, the same way he wishes it,
And then you win his heart : for o' my knowledge
He has laid wait this half year for a fellow
That will be beaten, and with a safe conscience
We may commend the carriage of this man in't ;
Now servants he has kept, lusty tall feeders,
But they have beat him, and turn'd themselves away :
Now one that would endure, is like to stay,
And get good wages of him ; and the service too
Is ten times milder, Brother, I would not wish it else.
I see the fellow has a fore crush'd body,

And the more need he has to be kick'd at ease. (Master.

Clow. I sweet Gentlemen, a kick of ease, fend me to such a

2 Bro. No more I say, we have one for thee, a soft footed
One that wears wooll in's toes. (Master,

Clow. Oh Gentlemen, soft garments may you wear,
Soft skins may you wed,
But as plump as pillows, both for white and red.
And now will I reveal a secret to you,
Since you provide for my poor flesh so tenderly,
Has hir'd meer rogues out of his chamber window,
To beat the Soldier, Monsieur Shamont's Brother :

1 Bro. That nothing concerns us, Sir.

Clow. For no cause, Gentlemen,
Unless it be for wearing Shoulder-points,
With longer taggs than his.

2 Bro. Is not that somewhat ?

Birlakin Sir, the difference of long taggs,
Has cost many a mans life, and advanc'd other some,
Come follow me.

Clow. See what a gull am I :

Oh every man in his profession ;
I know a thump now as judiciously,
As the proudest he that walks, I'll except none ;
Come to a tagg, how short I fall ? I'm gone.

Exeunt

Enter Lapet.

Lap. I have been ruminating with my self,
What honor a man loses by a kick :
Why ; what's a kick ? the fury of a foot,
Whose indignation commonly is stamp't
Upon the hinder quarter of a man :
Which is a place very unfit for honor,
The world will confesse so much :
Then what disgrace I pray, does thot part suffer
Where honor never comes, I'de fain know that ?
This being well forc'd, and urg'd, may have the power
To move most Galants to take kicks in time,
And spurn out the dueiloes out o'th' kingdom,
For they that stand upon their honor most,
When they conceive there is no honor lost,
As by a Table that I have invented
For that purpose alone, shall appear plainly,
Which shews the vanity of all blows at large.
And with what ease they may be took of all sides,
Numbring but twice o'er the Letters patience
From C.P. to E.I. doubt not but in small time
To see a dissolution of all bloud-shed,
If the reform'd Kick do but once get up :
For what a lamentable folly 'tis,
If we observe't, for every little juffle,
Which is but the ninth part of a sound thump,
In our meek computation, we must fight forlooth, yes,
If I kill, I'm hang'd ; if I be kill'd my self,
I dye for't also : is not this trin wisdom ?
Now for the Con, a may may be well beaten,
Yet pass away his fourscore years smooth after :
I had a Father did it, and to my power
I will not be behind him.

Enter Shamont.

Sham. Oh well met.

Lap. Now a fine punch or two, I look for't duly.

Sham. I've been to seek you.

Lap. Let me know your Lodging, Sir,

I'll come to you once a day, and use your pleasure, Sir,

Sham. I'm made the fittest man for thy society :

I'll live and dye with thee, come shew me a chamber ;

There is no house but thine, but only thine,

That's fit to cover me : I've took a blow, sirrah.

Lap. I would you had indeed : why, you may see, Sir ;

You'll all come to't in time, when my Book's out.

Sham. Since I did see thee last, I've took a blow.

Lap. Pha Sir, that's nothing : I ha' took forty since.

Sham. What ? and I charg'd thee thou shouldst not ?

Lap. I Sir, you might charge your pleasure,

But they would give't me, whether I would or no.

R r r

Sham.

Sham. Oh, I walk without my peace, I've no companion
 Prethee relolve me, for I cannot aske (now ;
 A man more beaten to experience,
 Than thou art in this kind, what manner of blow
 Is held the most disgraceful, or distasteful?
 For thou dost only censure 'em by the hurt,
 Not by the shame they do thee : yet having felt
 Abuses of all kinds, thou may'st deliver,
 Though't be by chance, the most injurious one.

Lap. You put me to't, Sir; but to tell you truth,
 They're all as one with me, little exception.

Sham. 'Tis at little may do much, let's have it from you.

Lap. With all the speed I may, first then. and foremost,
 I hold so reverently of the Bajinado, Sir,
 That if it were the dearest friend i'th' world,
 I'de put it into his hand.

Sham. Go too, I'll pass that then.

Lap. Y'are the more happy, Sir,
 Would I were past it too:
 But being accusom'd to't. It is the better carried.

Sham. Will you forward? (doubt,

Lap. Then there's your souce, your wherit and your Tags on the hair, your bob o' th' lips, a whelp on't,
 I ne'er could find much difference : Now your thump,
 A thing deriv'd first from your Hemp-beaters,
 Takes a mans wind away, most spitefully :
 There's nothing that destroys a Collick like it,
 For't leaves no wind i'th' body.

Sham. On Sir, on.

Lap. Pray give me leave, I'm out of breath with thinking

Sham. This is far off yet. (on't.

Lap. For the twinge by th' nose,
 'Tis certainly unfightly, so my Tables says,
 But helps against the head-ach, wond'rous strangely,

Sham. Is't possible?

Lap. Oh your crush'd nostrils flakes your opilation,
 And makes your pent powers flush to wholsome sneezes.

Sham. I never thought there had been half that virtue in a wrung nose before.

Lap. Oh plenitude, Sir:

Now come we lower to our modern Kick,
 Which has been mightily in use of late,
 Since our young men drank Coltsfoot: and I grant you,
 'Tis a most scornful wrong, cause the foot plays it;
 But mark agen, how we that take't, requite it
 With the like scorn, for we receive it backward ;
 And can there be a worse disgrace retorted?

Sham. And is this all?

Lap. All but a Lug by th' ear,
 Or such a trifle.

Sham. Happy sufferer,
 All this is nothing to the wrong I bear :
 I see the worst disgrace, thou never felt'st yet ;
 It is so far from thee, thou canst not think on't ;
 Nor dare I let thee know, it is so abject. (for't

Lap. I would you would though, that I might prepare
 For I shall ha't at one time or another :
 If't be a thwack, I make account of that ;
 There's no new fashion'd swap that e'er came up yet,
 But I've the first on 'em, I thank 'em for't.

Enter the Lady and Servants.

La. Hast thou enquir'd?

1 Serv. But can hear nothing, Madam.

Sham. If there be but so much substance in thee
 To make a shelter for a man disgrac'd,
 Hide my departure from that glorious woman
 That comes with all perfection about her :
 So noble, that I dare not be seen of her,
 Since shame took hold of me: upon thy life
 No mention of me.

Lap. I'll cut out my tongue first,
 Before I'll loose my life, there's more belongs to't.

Lad. See there's a Gentleman, enquire of him.

2 Ser. For Monsieur Shamont, Madam?

Lad. For whom else, Sir?

1 Serv. Why, this fellow dares not see him.

Lad. How?

1 Serv. Shamont, Madam?

His very name's worse than a Feaver to him,
 And when he cries, there's nothing kills him sooner ;
 Madam, your Page of thirteen is too hard for him,
 'Twas try'd i'th' wood-yard.

Lad. Alas poor griev'd Merit!

What is become of him? if he once fail,
 Virtue shall find small friendship: farewell then
 To Ladies worths, for any hope in men,
 He lov'd for goodness, not for Wealth, or Lust,
 After the worlds foul dotage, he ne'er courted
 The body, but the beauty of the mind,
 A thing which common courtship never thinks on :
 All his affections were so sweet and fair,
 There is no hope for fame if he despair,

Exit Lady and Serv.

Enter the Clown. He kicks Lapet.

Lap. Good morrow to you agen most heartily, Sir,
 Cry you mercy, I heard you not, I was somewhat busie.

Clow. He takes it as familiarly, as an Ave,
 Or precious salutation: I was sick till I had one,
 Because I am so us'd to't.

Lap. However you deserve, your friends and mine, here
 Give you large commendations i'this Letter,
 They say you will endure well.

Clow. I'de be loath

To prove 'em liars: I've endur'd as much
 As mortal pen and ink can set me down for.

Lap. Say youme so?

Clow. I know and feel it so, Sir,
 I have it under Black and White already ;
 I need no Pen to paint me out.

Lap. He fits me,

And hits my wishes pat, pat : I was ne'er
 In possibility to be better mann'd,
 For he's half lame already, I see't plain,
 But take no notice on't, for fear I make
 The rascal proud, and dear, to advance his wages ;
 First, let me grow into particulars with you ;
 What have you endur'd of worth? let me hear.

Clow. Marry Sir, I'm almost beaten blind.

Lap. That's pretty well for a beginning,
 But many a Mill-horse has endur'd as much.

Clow. Shame o'th' Millers heart for his unkindness then.

Lap. Well Sir, what then?

Clow. I've been twice thrown down stairs, just before sup-

Lap. Puh, so have I, that's nothing. (per.

Clow. I but Sir,

Was yours pray before supper ;

Lap. There thou posest me.

Clow. I marry, that's it, 't had been less grief to me,
 Had I but fill'd my belly, and then tumbled,
 But to be slung down fasting, there's the dolour.

Lap. It would have griev'd me, that indeed : proceed Sir.

Clow. I have been pluck'd and tugg'd by th' hair o'th' head
 About a Gallery, half an Acre long.

Lap. Yes, that's a good one, I must needs confess,
 A principal good one that, an absolute good one,
 I have been trode upon, and spurn'd about,
 But never tugg'd by th' hair, I thank my fates.

Clow. Oh 'tis a spiteful pain.

Lap. Peace, never speak on't,
 For putting men in mind on't.

Clow. To conclude,

I'm bursten Sir: my belly will hold no meat.

Lap. No? that makes amends for all.

Clow. Unless 't be puddings.

Or such fast food, any loose thing beguiles me, I'm ne'er the Lap. Sheeps-heads will stay with thee? (better for't

Clo. Yes Sir, or Chaldrons.

Lap. Very well sir:

Your bursten fellows must take heed of fursets:

Strange things it seems, you have endur'd;

Clo. Too true Sir.

Lap. But now the question is, what you will endure
Hereafter in my service?

Clo. Any thing

That shall be reason Sir, for I'm but froth;
Much like a thing new calv'd, or come more nearer Sir,
Y'ave seen a cluster of Frog-spawns in April,
E'en such a starch am I, as weak and tender
As a green woman yet.

Lap. Now I know this,
I will be very gently angry with thee,
And kick thee carefully.

Clo. Oh I, sweet Sir.

Lap. Peace, when thou art offer'd well, lest I begin now.
Your friends and mine have writ here for your truth,
They'll pass their words themselves, and I must meet 'em.

Clo. Then have you all: Exit.
As for my honesty, there is no fear of that,
For I have ne'er a whole bone about me. Exit.

Musick. Enter the passionate Cosin, rudely, and carelessly apparel'd, unbrac'd, and untruss'd. The Cupid following.

(some,

Cup. Think upon love, which makes all creatures hand-
Seemly for eye-sight; goe not so diffusedly,
There are great Ladies purpose Sir to visit you.

Pas. Grand plagues, shut in my casements, that the breaths
Of their Coach-mares reek not into my nostrils;
Those beasts are but a kind of bawdy fore-runners.

Cup. It is not well with you,
When you speak ill of fair Ladies.

Pas. Fair mischiefs, give me a nest of Owls and take 'em;
Happy is he, say I, whose window opens

To a brown Bakers chimney, he shall be sure there
To hear the Bird sometimes after twilight:

What a fine thing 'tis methinks to have our garments
Sit loose upon us thus, thus carelessly,

It is more manly, and more mortifying;

For we're so much the readier for our shrouds:

For how ridiculous wer't, to have death come,

And take a fellow, pinn'd up like a Mistress?

About his neck a Ruff, like a pinch'd Lanthorn,

Which School-boys make in winter; and his doublet

So close and pent, as if he fear'd one prison

Would not be strong enough, to keep his soul in;

But's Tailor makes another:

And trust me, (for I know't when I lov'd Cupid.)

He does endure much pain, for the poor praise

Of a neat fitting suit.

Cup. One may be handsome, Sir,

And yet not pain'd, nor proud.

Pas. There you lie Cupid,

As bad as Mercury: there is no handsomness,

But has a wash of Pride and Luxury,

And you go there too Cupid. Away dissembler,

Thou tak'st the deeds part, which befools us all;

Thy Arrow heads shoot out sinners: hence away,

And after thee I'll send a powerful charm,

Shall banish thee for ever.

Cup. Never, never,

I am too sure thine own. Exit.

Pas. Sings.

Hence all you vain Delights,
As short as are the nights,
Wherein you spend your folly,
There's nought in this life sweet,
If man were wise to see't.

But only melancholly,

Oh sweetest melancholly.

Welcome folded Arms, and fixed Eyes,
A sigh that piercing mortifies,
A look that's fast'ned to the ground,
A tongue chain'd up without a sound.

Fountain heads, and pathless Groves,
Places which pale passion loves:

Moon-light walks, when all the Fowls
Are warmly hous'd, save Bats and Owls;

A mid-night Bell, a parting groan,

These are the sounds we feed upon;

Then stretch our bones in a still gloomy valley,
Nothing's so dainty sweet, as lovely melancholly.

Exit.

Enter at another door Lapet, the Cupid's Brothers watching his coming.

1 Bro. So, so, the Woodcock's ginn'd;
Keep this door fast brother.

2 Bro. I'll warrant this.

1 Bro. I'll goe incense him instantly;
I know the way to't.

2 Bro. Will't not be too soon think you,
And make two fits break into one?

1 Bro. Pah, no, no; the tail of his melancholy
Is always the head of his anger, and follows as close,
As the Report follows the powder.

Lap. This is the appointed place, and the hour struck,
If I can get security for's truth,
I'll never mind his honesty, poor worm,
I durst lay him by my wife, which is a benefit
Which many Masters ha' not: I shall ha' no Maid
Now got with child, but what I get my self,
And that's no small felicity: in most places
Th'are got by th' Men, and put upon the Masters,
Nor shall I be resisted when I strike,
For he can hardly stand; these are great blessings.

Pas. I want my food, deliver me a Varlet. Within.

Lap. How now, from whence comes that?

Pas. I am allow'd a carkass to insult on;
Where's the villain?

Lap. He means not me I hope.

Pas. My maintenance rascals; my bulk, my exhibition.

Dap. Bless us all,

What names are these? Would I were gone agen.

The passionate man enters in fury with a Truncheon.

He Sings.

A Curse upon thee for a slave,
Art thou here, and heardst me rave?
Fly not sparkles from mine eye,
To shew my indignation nigh?
Am I not all foam, and fire,
With voice as hoarse as a Town-crier?
How my back opes and shuts together,
With fury, as old mens with weather?
Could'st thou not hear my teeth gnash hither?

R R 2

Lap.

Lap. No truly, Sir, I thought 't had been a Squirrel,
Shaving a Hazel-nut.

Paf. Death, Hell, Fiends, and darkness.
I will thrash thy maungy carkas.

Lap. Oh sweet Sir.

Paf. There cannot be too many tortures,
Spent upon those louzie Quarters.

Lap. Hold, oh.

Paf. Thy bones shall rue, thy bones shall rue. Falls down for dead.

Sings again.

Thou nasty, scurvy, mongril Toad,
Mischief on thee;
Light upon thee,
All the plagues
That can confound thee
Or did ever raigin abroad:
Better a thousand lives it cost,
Than have brave anger spilt or lost.

Exit.

Lap. May I open mine eyes yet, and safely peep:
I'll try a groon first—oh—Nay then he's gone.
There was no other policy but to dy,
He would ha' made me else. Ribs are you fore?
I was ne'er beaten to a tune before.

Enter the two Brothers.

1 Bro. Lapet.

Lap. Agen?

Falls again.

1 Bro. Look, look, he's flat agen,
And stretched out like a Coarse, a handful longer
Than he walks, trust me brother. Why Lapet
I hold my life we shall not get him speak now:
Monsieur Lapet; it must be a privy token,
If any thing fetch him, he's so far gone.
We come to pass our words for your mans truth.

Lap. Oh Gentlemen y'are welcome: I have been thrash'd
2 Bro. How? thrash'd Sir? (1st faith.)

Lap. Never was Shrove-tuesday Bird
So cudgell'd, Gentlemen.

1 Bro. Pray how? by whom Sir?

Lap. Nay, that I know not.

1 Bro. Not who did this wrong?

Lap. Only a thing came like a Walking Song?

1 Bro. What beaten with a Song?

Lap. Never more tightly, Gentlemen:
Such crotchets happen now and then, methinks
He that endures well, of all waters drinks.

Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Shamont's Brother, the Soldier, and 1 Gentleman.

Sold. YEs, yes, this was a Madman, Sir, with you,
A passionate Mad-man.

1 Gen. Who would ha' lookt for this, Sir?

Sold. And must be priviledg'd: a pox priviledge him:
I was never so dry beaten since I was born,
And by a litter of rogues, meer rogues, the whole twenty
Had not above elbows amongst 'em all too:
And the most part of those left-handed rascals,

The very vomit, Sir, of Hospitals,
Bridewels, and Spittle-houfes; such nasty smellers,
That if they'd been unfurnish'd of Club-Truncheons,
They might have cudgell'd me with their very stinks,
It was so strong, and sturdy: and shall this,
This filthy injury, be set off with madnes?

1 Gen. Nay, take your own blouds counsel, Sir, hereafter,
I'll deal no further in't: if you remember,
It was not come to blows, when I advis'd you.

Sold. No, but I ever said, 'twould come to something,
And 'tis upon me, thank him: were he kin
To all the mighty Emperors upon earth.
He has not now in life three hours to reckon;
I watch but a free time.

Enter Shamont.

1 Gen. Your noble brother, Sir, I'll leave you now. Ex.

Sham. Soldier, I would I could perswade my thoughts
From thinking thee a brother, as I can
My tongue from naming on't: thou hast no friend here,
But fortune and thy own strength trust to them.

Sham. Treachery to virtue;
Thy treachery, thy faithless circumvention:
Has Honor so few daughters, never fewer,
And must thou aim thy treachery at the best?
The very front of virtue, that blest Lady? the Dukes Sister?
Created more for admirations cause,

Than for loves ends; whose excellency sparkles
More in Divinity, than mortal beauty;
And as much difference 'twixt her mind and body,
As 'twixt this earths poor centre, and the Sun:
And could'st thou be so injurious to fair goodness,
Once to attempt to court her down'r frailty?

Or put her but in mind that there is weakness,
Sin, and desire, which she should never hear of?
Wretch, thou'st committed worse than Sacrilege,
In the attempting on't, and ought'st to dye for't.

Sold. I rather ought to do my best, to live, Sir.
Provoke me not; for I've a wrong sits on me,
That makes me apt for mischief; I shall lose
All respects suddainly of friendship, Brother-hood,
Or any found that way.

Sham. But 'ware me most;
For I come with a two-edg'd injury;
Both my disgrace, and thy apparent falshood,
Which must be dangerous.

Sold. I courted her, Sir;
Love starve me with delays, when I confess it not.

Sham. There's nothing then but death
Can be a pennance fit for that confession.

Sold. But far from any vitious taint.

Sham. Oh Sir,
Vice is a mighty stranger grown to courtship.

Sold. Nay, then the fury of my wrong light on thee.

Enter 1 Gentleman, and others.

1 Gen. Forbear, the Duke's at hand,
Here, hard at hand, upon my reputation.

Sold. I must do something now.

Ex. Sold.

Sham. I'll follow you close Sir.

1 Gen. We must intreat you must not; for the Duke
Desires some conference with you:

Sham. Let me go,
As y'are Gentlemen.

2 Gen. Faith we dare not Sir.

Sham. Dare ye be false to honor, and yet dare not Do a man justice? give me leave——

1 Gen. Good sweet Sir,
H'as sent twice for you.

Sham. Is this brave, or manly?

1 Gen. I prethee be conform'd.

Sham. Death——

Enter

Enter Duke.

2 Gent. Peace, he's come in troth.

Sham. Oh have you betray'd me to my shame afresh?
How am I bound to loath you?

Duke. Shamont, welcome,
I sent twice.

2 Gent. But my Lord, he never heard on't.

Sham. Pray pardon him, for his falseness, I did Sir,
Both times; I'd rather be found rude, than faithless.

Duke. I love that bluntness dearly: h'as no vice,
But is more manly than some others virtue,
That lets it out only for shew or profit.

Sham. Will't please you quit me, Sir, I've urgent business?

Duke. Come, you're so hasty now, I sent for you
To a better end.

Sham. And if it be an end,
Better or worse, I thank your goodness for't.

Duke. I've ever kept that bounty in condition,
And thankfulness in blood, which well becomes
Both Prince and Subject, that where any wrong
Bears my impression, or the hasty figure
Of my repented anger, I'm a Law
Ev'n to my self, and doom my self most strictly
To Justice, and a noble satisfaction:

So that, what you, in tenderness of honor,
Conceive to be loss to you, which is nothing
But curious opinion, I'll restore agen,
Although I give you the best part of Genoa,
And take to boot but thanks for your amends.

Sham. Oh miserable satisfaction,
Ten times more wretched than the wrong it self;
Never was ill better made good with worse:
Shall it be said, that my posterity
Shall live the sole heir of their fathers shame?
And raise their wealth and glory from my stripes?
You have provided nobly, bounteous Sir,
For my disgrace, to make it live for ever,
Out-lasting Brass or Marble:

This is my fears construction, and a deep one,
Which neither argument nor time can alter:
Yet I dare swear, I wrong your goodness in't Sir,
And the most fair intent on't, which I reverence
With admiration, that in you a Prince,
Should be so sweet and temperate a condition,
To offer to restore where you may ruine,
And do't with justice, and in me a servant,
So harsh a disposition, that I cannot

Forgive where I should honor, and am bound to't.

But I have ever had that curiosity
In blood, and tenderness of reputation
Such an antipathy against a blow,
I cannot speak the rest: Good Sir discharge me,
It is not fit that I should serve you more,
Nor come so near you; I'm made now for privacy,
And a retir'd condition, that's my suit:

To part from Court for ever, my last suit;
And as you profess bounty, grant me that Sir.

Duke. I would deny thee nothing.

Sham. Health reward you, Sir.

Duke. He's gone agen already, and takes hold
Of any opportunity: not riches

Can purchase him, nor honors, peaceably; (him,
And force were brutish: what a great worth's gone with
And but a Gentleman? well, for his sake,
I'll ne'er offend more, those I cannot make,
They were his words, and shall be dear to memory.

Say I desire to see him once agen;
Yet stay, he's so well forward of his peace,
'Twere pity to disturb him: he would groan
Like a soul fetch'd agen; and that were injury,
And I've wrong'd his degree too much already.
Call forth the Gentleman of our chamber instantly.

1 Serv. I shall my Lord.

Wabin.

Duke. I may forget agen.
And therefore will prevent: the strain of this Troubles me so, one would not hazard more.

Enter 1 Gent. and divers others.

Gent. Your Will my Lord?

Duke. Yes; I discharge you all.

2 Gent. My Lord——

Duke. Your places shall be otherwise dispos'd of.

4 Gent. Why Sir?

Duke. Reply not, I dismiss you all:
Y'are Gentlemen, your worths will find you fortunes;
Nor shall your farewell tax me of ingratitude.

I'll give you all noble remembrances,
As testimonies 'gainst reproach and malice,
That you departed lov'd.

3 Gen. This is most strange, Sir.

1 Gent. But how is your Grace furnish'd, these dismiss'd?

Duke. Seek me out Grooms.
Men more insensible of reputation,
Less curious and precise in terms of honor,
That if my anger chance let fall a stroke,
As we are all subject to impetuous passions,
Yet it may pass unmurmur'd, undisputed,
And not with braver fury prosecuted.

Exit.

1 Gent. It shall be done, my Lord.

3 Gent. Know you the cause, Sir?

1 Gent. Not I kind Gentlemen, but by conjectures,
And so much shall be yours when you please.

4. Thanks Sir.

3 Gent. We shall i'th mean time think our selves guilty
Of some foul fault, through ignorance committed.

1 Gent. No, 'tis not that, nor that way.

4 Gent. For my part,
I shall be dis-inherited, I know so much.

1 Gent. Why Sir, for what?

4 Gent. My Sire's of a strange humor,
He'll form faults for me, and then swear 'em mine,
And commonly the first begins with leachery,
He knows his own youths trespass,

1 Gent. Before you go,
I'll come and take my leave, and tell you all Sirs.

3 Gent. Thou wert ever just and kind.

Exit.

1 Gent. That's my poor virtue, Sir,
And parcel valiant; but it's hard to be perfect:
The choosing of these fellows now will puzzle me,
Horribly puzzle me; and there's no judgement
Goes true upon mans outside, there's the mischief:
He must be touch'd, and try'd, for gold or dross;
There is no other way for't, and that's dangerous too;
But since I'm put in trust, and I will attempt it:
The Duke shall keep one daring man about him.

Enter a Gallant.

Soft, who comes here? a pretty bravery this:
Every one goes so like a Gentleman,
'Tis hard to find a difference, but by th' touch.
I'll try your mettal sure.

Gal. Why what do you mean Sir?

1 Gent. Nay, and you understand it not, I do not.

Gal. Yes, would you should well know,
I understand it for a box o'th' ear Sir.

1 Gent. And o'my troth, that's all I gave it for.

Gal. 'Twere best it be so.

1 Gent. This is a brave Coward,
A jolly threat'ning Coward; he shall be Captain:
Sir, let me meet you an hour hence i'th' Lobby.

Gal. Meet you? the world might laugh at you then i'faith.
1 Ge. Lay by your scorn and pride, they're scurvy qualities,
And meet me, or I'll box you while I have you,
And carry you gambil'd thither like a Mutton.

Gal. Nay, and you be in earnest, here's my hand
I will not fail you.
1 Gent. 'Tis for your own good.
Gal. Away.
1 Gent. Too much for your own good, Sir, a pox on you.
Gal. I prethee curse me all day long so.
1 Gent. Hang you.
Gal. I'll make him mad: he's loth to curse too much to me;
Indeed I never yet took box o' th' ear,
But it redounded, I must needs say so ——
1 Gent. Will you be gone?
Gal. Curse, curse, and then I goe.
Look how he grins, I've anger'd him to th' kidneys. Ex.
1 Gent. Was ever such a priggish coxcomb seen?
One might have beat him dumb now in this humor,
And he'd ha' grin'd it out still:

Enter a plain fellow.

Oh, here's one made to my hand,
Methinks looks like a Craven;
Lefs pains will serve his trial: some slight justle.
Plain. How? take you that Sir:
And if that content you not——
1 Gent. Yes very well, Sir, I desire no more.
Plain. I think you need not;
For you have not lost by't. Exit.
1 Gent. Who would ha' thought this would have prov'd
(a Gentleman?)

I'll never trust long chins and little legs agen,
I'll know 'em sure for Gentlemen hereafter:
A gristle but in shew, but gave his cuff
With such a fetch, and reach of gentry,
As if h' had had his arms before the floud;
I have took a villanous hard taske upon me;
Now I begin to have a feeling on't.

Enter Lapet, and Clown his servant, and so habited.

Oh, here comes a try'd piece, now, the reformed kick.
The millions of punches, spurns, and nips
That he has endur'd? his buttock's all black Lead,
He's half a Negro backward; he was past a Spaniard
In Eighty eight, and more Egyptian like;
His Table and his Book come both out shortly,
And all the cowards in the Town expect it;
So, if I fail of my full number now,
I shall be sure to find 'em at Church corners,
Where Dives, and the suff'ring Ballads hang.

Lap. Well, since thou art of so mild a temper,
Of so meek a spirit, thou mayst live with me,
Till better times do smile on thy deserts.
I am glad I am got home again.

Clow. I am happy in your service, Sir,
You'll keep me from the Hospital.

Lap. So, bring me the last proof, this is corrected.

Clow. I, y'are too full of your correction, Sir,

Lap. Look I have perfect Books within this half hour.

Clow. Yes Sir.

Lap. Bid him put all the Thumps in Pica Roman.

And with great T's, (you vermin) as Thumps should be.

Clow. Then in what Letter will you have your Kicks?

Lap. All in Italica, your backward blows

All in Italica, you Hermophrodite:

When shall I teach you wit?

Clow. Oh let it alone,

Till you have some your self, Sir.

Lap. You mumble?

Clow. The victuals are lockt up;
I'm kept from mumbling.

Exit.

Lap. He prints my blows upon Pot Paper too, the rogue,
Which had been proper for some drunken Pamphlet!

1 Gent. Monsieur Lapet? how the world rings of you, Sir?
Your name sounds far and near.

Lap. A good report it bears, for an enduring name——
1 Gent. What luck have you Sir?
Lap. Why, what's the matter?
1 Gent. I'm but thinking on't.
I've heard you wish these five years for a place.
Now there's one fall'n, and freely without money too;
And empty yet, and yet you cannot have't.
Lap. No? what's the reason? I'll give money for't,
Rather than go without Sir.
1 Gent. That's not it Sir:
The troth is, there's no Gentleman must have it
Either for love or money, 'tis decreed so;
I was heartily sorry when I thought upon you,
Had you not been a Gentleman, I had fitted you.
Lap. Who I a Gentleman? a pox I'm none, Sir.
1 Gent. How?
Lap. How? why did you ever think I was?
1 Gent. What? not a Gentleman?
Lap. I would thou'dst put it upon me i' faith;
Did not my Grand-father cry Cony-skings?
My Father Aquavite? a hot Gentleman:
All this I speak on, i' your time and memory too;
Only a rich Uncle dy'd, and left me chattels,
You know all this so well too——
1 Gent. Pray excuse me, Sir, ha' not you Arms?
Lap. Yes, a poor couple here,
That serve to thrust in wild-Fowl.
1 Gent. Heralds Arms,
Symbols of Gentry, Sir: you know my meaning;
They've been shewn and seen.
Lap. They have,
1 Gent. I fex have they.
Lap. Why I confes, at my wives instigation once,
(As Women love these Heralds kickshawes naturally)
I bought 'em: but what are they think you? puffs.
1 Gent. Why, that's proper to your name being Lapet.
Which is La fart, after the English Letter.
Lap. The Herald, Sir, had much adoe to find it.
1 Gent. And can you blame him?
Why, 'tis the only thing that puzzles the devil.
Lap. At last he lookt upon my name agen,
And having well compar'd it, this he gave me,
The two Cholliques playing upon a wind Instrument.
1 Gent. An excellent proper one; but I pray tell me,
How does he express the Cholliques?
They are hard things.
Lap. The Cholliques? with hot trenchers at their bellies;
There's nothing better, Sir, to blaze a Chollique.
1 Gent. And are not you a Gentleman by this Sir?
Lap. No, I disclaim't: no belly-ake upon earth
Shall make me one: he shall not think
To put his gripes upon me.
And wring out gentry so, and ten pound first.
If the wind Instrument will make my wife one,
Let her enjoy't, for she was a Harpers Grand-child:
But Sir, for my particular, I renounce it.
1 Gent. Or to be call'd so?
Lap. I Sir, or imagin'd.
1 Gent. None fitter for the place: give me thy hand.
Lap. A hundred thousand thanks, beside a Bribe, Sir.
1 Gent. Yov must take heed
Of thinking toward a Gentleman, now.
Lap. Pish, I am not mad, I warrant you: nay, more Sir,
If one should twit me i'th' teeth that I'm a Gentleman,
Twit me their worst, I am but one since Lammas,
That I can prove, if they would see my heart out.
2 Gent. Marry, in any case keep me that evidence.

Enter Clown.

Lap. Here comes my servant; Sir. Galoshio,
Has not his name for nought, he will be trode upon:
What says my Printer now?

Clow. Here's your last Proof, Sir.

You shall have perfect Books now in a twinkling.

Lap. These marks are ugly.

Clow. He says, Sir, they're proper :

Blows should have marks, or else they are nothing worth.

La. But why a Peel-crow here ?

Clow. I told 'em so Sir :

A scare-crow had been better.

Lap. How slave ? look you, Sir,

Did not I say, this Whirrit, and this Bob,

Should be both Pica Roman.

Clow. So said I, Sir, both Picked Romans,

And he has made 'em Welch Bills,

Indeed I know not what to make on 'em.

Lap. Hay-day ; a Soufe, Italica ?

Clow. Yes, that may hold, Sir,

Soufe is a bonaroba, so is Flops too.

Lap. But why stands Bastinado so far off here ?

Clow. Alas, you must allow him room to lay about hini, Sir.

La. Why lies this Spurn lower than that Spurn, Sir ?

Clow. Marry, this signifies one kick down stairs, Sir,

The other in a Gallery : I ask'd him all these questions.

1 Gent. Your Books name ?

Præhee Lapet mind me, you never told me yet.

La. Marry but shall Sir : 'tis call'd the Uprising of the
And the downfall of the Duello (kick ;

1 Gent. Bring that to pass, you'll prove a happy member,

And do your Countrey service : your young blouds

Will thank you then, why they see fourscore.

Lap. I hope

To save my hundred Gentlemen a month by't,

Which will be very good for the private house.

Clow. Look you, your Table's finish'd, Sir, already.

Lap. Why then behold my Master-piece : fee, fee, Sir,

Here's all your Blows, and Blow-men whatsoever ;

Set in their lively colours, givers, and takers.

1 Gent. Troth wondrous fine, Sir.

Lap. Nay, but mark the postures,

The standing of the takers, I admire more than the givers ;

They sit and scornfully, most contumeliously, I like not them,

Oh here's one cast into a comely Figure. (headlong

Clow. My Master means him there that's cast down

Lap. How sweetly does this fellow take his Dorst ?

Stoops like a Cammel, that Heroick beast,

At a great load of Nutmegs ; and how meekly

This other fellow here receives his Whirrit ?

Clow. Oh Master, here's a fellow stands most gallantly,

Taking his kick in private, behind the hangings,

And raising up his hips to't. But oh, Sir,

How daintily this man lies trampled on ?

Would I were in thy place, what e'er thou art :

How lovely he endures it ? (think you ?

1 Gent. But will not these things, Sir, be hard to practise,

Lap. Oh, easie, Sir : I'll teach 'em in a Dance.

1 Gent. How ? in a dance ?

Lap. I'll lose my new place else,

What e'er it be ; I know not what 'tis yet.

1 Gent. And now you put me in mind, I could employ

For your grace, specially : For the Dukes Cofin (it well,

Is by this time in's violent fit of mirth,

And a device must be sought out for suddainly,

To over-cloy the passion.

Lap. Say no more, Sir,

I'll fit you with my Scholars, new practitioners,

Endurers of the time.

Clow. Whereof I am one Sir.

1 Gent. You carry it away smooth ; give me thy hand, Sir.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter the two Brothers.

Paf. HA, ha, ha.

Within.

2 Bro. Hark, hark, how loud his fit's grown.

Paf. Ha, ha, ha.

1 Bro. Now let our Sister lose no time, but ply it
With all the power she has.

2 Bro. Her shame grows big, brother ;
The Cupid's shape will hardly hold it longer,
'Twould take up half an Ell of China Damask more,
And all too little : it struts per'lously :

There is no tamp'ring with these Cupids longer,
The meer conceit with Woman-kind works strong.

Paf. Ha, ha, ha.

2 Bro. The laugh comes nearer now,
'Twere good we were not seen yet.

Ex. Bro.

Enter Passion, and Base, his jester.

Paf. Ha, ha, ha,
And was he bastinado'd to the life ? ha, ha, ha.
I præhee say, Lord General, how did the rascals
Entrench themselves ?

Base. Most deeply, politickly, all in ditches.

Paf. Ha, ha, ha.

Base. 'Tis thought he'll ne'r bear Arms in field agen,
Has much ado to lift 'em to his head, Sir.

Paf. I would he had.

Base. On either side round Truncheons plaid so thick.
That Shoulders, Chines, nay Flanks were paid to th' quick.

Paf. Well said Lord-General : ha, ha, ha.

Base. But pray how grew the diff'rence first betwixt you ?

Paf. There was never any, Sir ; there lies the jest man ;

Only because he was taller than his brother ;
There's all my quarrel, to him ; and methought
He should be beaten for't, my mind so gave me, Sir,
I could not sleep for't : Ha, ha, ha, ha.

Another good jest quickly, while 'tis hot now ;

Let me not laugh in vain : ply me, oh ply me,

As you will answer't to my cosin Duke.

Base. Alas, who has a good jest ?

Paf. I fall, I dwindle in't.

Base. Ten Crowns for a god jest: ha' you a good jest, Sir ?

Enter Servant.

Serv. A pretty moral one,

Base. Let's ha't, what e'er it be.

Serv. There comes a Cupid
Drawn by six fools.

Base. That's nothing.

Paf. Help it, help it then.

Base. I ha' known six hundred fools drawn by a Cupid.

Paf. I that, that, that's the smarter Moral : ha, ha, ha.
Now I begin to be Song-ripe methinks.

Base. I'll sing you a pleasant Air Sir, before you ebb.

S O N G.

Paf. Oh how my Lungs do tickle ? ha, ha, ha.

Base. Oh how my Lungs do tickle ? oh, oh, ho, ho.

Paſ. Sings.

Set a ſharp Jeſt
Againſt my breaſt,
Then how my Lungs do tickle?
As Nightingales,
And things in Cambrick rails,
Sing beſt againſt a prickle,
Ha, ha, ha, ha.

Baſ. Ho, ho, ho, ho, ha.

Paſ. Laugh. Baſ. Laugh. Paſ. Laugh. Baſ. Laugh.

Paſ. Wide. Baſ. Loud, Paſ. And vary.

Baſ. A ſmile is for a ſimpering Novice.

Paſ. One that ne'er taſted Carveare,

Baſ. Nor knows the ſmack of dear Anchovis.

Paſ. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

Baſ. Ho, ho, ho, ho, ho.

Paſ. A gigling waiting wench for me,
That ſhews her teeth how white they be.

Baſ. A thing not fit for gravity,

For theirs are foul, and hardly three.

Paſ. Ha, ha, ha.

Baſ. Ho, ho, ho.

Paſ. Democritus, thou antient Fleeerer,
How I miſs thy laugh, and ha' ſince.

Baſ. There you nam'd the famous Feerer,
That ever jeer'd in Rome, or Athens.

Paſ. Ha, ha, ha.

Baſ. Ho, ho, ho.

Paſ. How brave lives he that keeps a fool,
Although the rate be deeper?

Baſ. But he that is his own fool, Sir,
Does live a great deal cheaper.

Paſ. Sure I ſhall burſt, burſt, quite break, thou art ſo witty.

Baſ. 'Tis rare to break at Court, for that belongs to th' City.

Paſ. Ha, ha, my spleen is almoſt worn to the laſt laughter.

Baſ. Oh keep a corner for a friend, a jeſt may come here(after.

Enter Lapet and Clown, and four other, like fools dancing, the Cupid leading, and bearing his Table, and holding it up to Lapet at every ſtrain, and acting the poſtures.

Lap. Twinge all now, twinge I ſay.

Souſe upon Souſe.

2 Strain.

Donſes ſingle.

3 Strain.

Juſtle ſides.

4 Strain.

Knee Belly.

5 Strain.

Kickſee Buttock.

6 Strain.

7 Strain.

L. a. Dcwinderry.

Enter Soldier, Shamont's brother; his ſword drawn.

Sol. Not angry Law, nor doors of Braſs ſhall keep me,
From my wrongs expiation to thy Bowels,
I return my diſgrace; and after turn
My face to any death that can be ſentenc'd,

Biſe. Murder, oh murder, ſtop the murderer there—

Lap. I am glad he's gone; h'as almoſt trode my guts out;
Follow him who liſt for me, I'll ha' no hand in't.

Cl. Oh 'twas your luck and mine to be ſquelch'd, Mr.
Has ſtain'd my very Puddings into Pancakes.

Cup. Oh brothers, oh, I fear 'tis mortal: help, oh help,
I'm made the wretchedſt woman by this accident,
That ever love begui'd.

Enter two Brothers.

2 Bro. We are undone Brother,
Our ſhames are too apparent: Away receptacle
Of Luxury, and diſhonor, moſt unfortunate,
To make thy ſelf but lucky to thy ſpoil,
After thy Sexes-manner: liſt him up Brother;
He breaths not to our comfort, he's too waſted
Ever to cheer us more: A Chirurgeon ſpeedily;
Hence; the unhappieſt that e'er ſtept aſide,
She'll be a Mother, before ſhe's known a Bride.

Cup. Thou hadſt a moſt unfortunate conception,
What e'er thou prov'd to be; in miſt of mirth
Comes ruine, for a welcome, to thy birth.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Shamont.

Sham. This is a beautiful life now; privacy
The ſweetneſs and the benefit of Eſſence:
I ſee there is no man, but may make his Paradice;
And it is nothing but his love, and dotage
Upon the worlds foul joves, that keeps him out on't:
For he that lives retir'd in mind, and ſpirit,
Is ſtill in Paradice, and has his innocence,
Partly allow'd for his companion too,
As much as ſtands with juſtice: here no eyes
Shoot their ſharp pointed ſcorns upon my ſhame;
They know no terms of reputation here,
No punctual limits, or preciſe dimenſions:
Plain down-right honeſty is all the beauty
And elegancy of life, found amongſt Shepherds;
For knowing nothing nicely, or deſiring it,
Quits many a vexation from the mind,
With which our quaint knowledge does abuſe us;
The name of envy is a ſtranger here,
That dries mens bloods abroad, robs Health and Reſt,
Why here's no ſuch fury thought on: no, nor falſhood,
That brotherly diſeaſe, fellow-like devil,
That plays within our boſom, and betrays us.

Enter 1 Gent.

1 Gent. Oh are you here?

Sham. La Nove, 'tis ſtrange to ſee thee.

1 Gent. I ha' rid one horſe to death,
To find you out, Sir.

Sham. I am not to be found of any man
That ſaw my ſhame, nor ſeen long.

1 Gent. Good, your attention:

You ought to be ſeen now, and found out, Sir,
If ever you deſire before your ending
To perform one good office, nay, a dear one,
Mans time can hardly match it.

Sham. Be't as precious
As reputation; if it come from Court
I will not hear on't.

1 Gent. You muſt hear of this, Sir.

Sham. Muſt?

1 Gent. You ſhall hear it.

Sham. I love thee, that thou'lt dye.

1 Gent. 'Twere nobler in me,
Than in you living: you will live a murderer,
If you deny this office.

Sham. Even to death, Sir.

1 Gent. Why then you'll kill your brother.

Sham. How?

1 Gent. Your Brother, Sir:
Bear witneſs heaven, this man deſtroys his Brother
When he may ſave him, his leaſt breath may ſave him:
Can there be wilfuller deſtruction?
He was forc'd to take a moſt unmanly wrong,

Above

Above the suffering virtue of a Soldier,
Has kill'd his injurer, a work of honor;
For which, unless you save him, he dies speedily
My conscience is discharg'd, I'm but a friend,
A Brother should go forward where I end.

Exit.

Sham. Dyes?
Say he be naught, that's nothing to my goodness,
Which ought to shine through use, or else it loses
The glorious name 'tis known by: he's my brother;
Yet peace is above blood: Let him go; I,
But where's the nobleness of affection then?
That must be car'd for too, or I'm imperfect,
The same blood that stood up in wrath against him,
Now in his misery, runs all to pity;
I'd rather dye than speak one syllable
To save my self, but living as I am,
There's no avoiding on't, the worlds humanity
Expects it hourly from me: curse of fortune,
I took my leave so well too: Let him dye,
'Tis but a brother lost; so pleasingly.
And swiftly I came off, 'twere more than irksomeness,
To tread that path agen; and I shall never Depart so handsomely: but then where's posterity?
The consummation of our house and name?
I'm torn in pieces betwixt love and shame,

Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Lapet, Clown, Poultrout, Moulbazon, and others, the new Court Officers.

Lap. Good morrow fellow Poltrot, and Moulbazon;
Good morrow fellows all.
Pol. Monsieur Lapet? (you.
Lap. Look, I've remembred you, here's books apiece for Moul. Oh Sir, we dearly thank you.
Lap. So you may:
There's two impressions gone already, Sirs.
Pol. What no? in so short a time?
Lap. 'Tis as I tell you, Sir.
My Kick sells gallantly, I thank my stars.
Clow. So does your Table; you may thank the Moon too.
Lap. 'Tis the Book sells the Table.
Clow. But 'tis the Bookfeller
That has the money for 'em, I'm sure o' that.
Lap. 'Twill much enrich the Company of Stationers,
'Tis thought 'twill prove a lasting benefit,
Like the Wise Masters, and the Almanacks.
The hundred Novels, and the Book of Cookery,
For they begin already to engross it,
And make it a Stock-book, thinking indeed
'Twill prove too great a benefit, and help,
For one that's new set up: they know their way,
And make him Warden, e'r his beard be gray.
Moul. Is't possible such virtue should lye hid,
And in so little Paper?
Lap. How? why there was the Carpenter,
An unknown thing; an odoriferous Pamphlet,
Yet no more Paper, by all computation,
Than Ajax Telamon would use at once,
Your Herring prov'd the like, able to buy
Another Fishers Folly, and your Pasquil
Went not below the mad-caps of that time,
And shall my elaborate Kick come behind, think you?
Clow. Yes, it must come behind, 'tis in Italica too,
According to your humor.
Lap. Not in sale, Varlet.
Clow. In sale, Sir? it shall sail beyond 'em all I tro.
Lap. What have you there now? oh Page 21.
Clow. That Page is come to his years, he should be a Ser-
Lap. Mark how I snap up the Duello there: (ving man.
One would not use a dog so,
I must needs say; but's for the common good.
Clow. Nay Sir, your Commons seldom fight at sharp,

But bullet in a Warehouse.

Lap. This will save
Many a Gentleman of good blood from bleeding, Sirs,
I have a curse from many a Barber-Surgeon;
They'd give but too much money to call't in;
Turn to Page 45. see what you find there.

Clow. Oh, out upon him,
Page 45. that's an old thief indeed.

Enter Duke, the Lady his Sister, 1 Gent.

Lap. The Duke, clap down your Books; away Galshio.
Clow. Indeed I am too foul to be i' th' presence,
They use to shake me off at the chamber door still. Ex.

Lady. Good my Lord, grant my suit: let me not rise
Without the comfort on't: I have not often
Been tedious in this kind.

Duke. Sister, you wrong your self,
And those great virtues that your Fame is made of,
To waste so much breath for a murderers life.

Lad. You cannot hate th' offence more than I do, Sir,
Nor the offender, the respect I owe
Unto his absent brother, makes me a suitor,
A most importunate Sister, make me worthy
But of this one request.

Duke. I am deaf
To any importunacy, and sorry
For your forgetfulness; you never injur'd
Your worth so much, you ought to be rebuk'd for't:
Pursue good ways, end as you did begin,
'Tis half the guilt to speak for such a sin.

La. This is loves beggery right, that now is ours,
When Ladies love, and cannot shew their powers. Ex.

Du. La Nove?

1 Gent. My Lord.

Duke. Are these our new Attendants?

Lap. We are my Lord, and will endure as much
As better men, my Lord, and more I trust.

Duke. What's he?

1 Gent. My Lord, a decay'd Gentleman,
That will do any service.

Duke. A decay'd one?

1 Gent. A renounc'd one indeed: for this place only.

Duke. We renounce him then; go, discharge him instantly.
He that disclaims his gentry for meer gains,
That man's too base to make a vassal on.

Lap. What says the Duke?

1 Duke. Faith little to your comfort, Sir,
You must be a Gentleman agen.

Lap. How?

1 Gent. The's no remedy.

Lap. Marry, the fates forefend: ne'r while I breathe, Sir,

1 Gent. The Duke will have it so, there's no resisting,
He spy'd it i' your forehead.

Lap. My wife's doing.

She thought she should be put below her betters now,
And su'd to ha' me a Gentleman agen.

1 Gent. And very likely, Sir,

Marry, I'll give you this comfort when all's done,
You'll never pass but for a scurvy one,
That's all the help you have: come shew your pace.

Lap. The heaviest Gentleman that e'er lost place;
Bear witness, I am forc'd to't.

Exit.

Duke. Though you have a courser Title yet upon you,
Than those that left your places, without blame,
'Tis in your power to make your selves the same:
I cannot make you Gentlemen, that's a work
Rais'd from your own deservings, merit, manners,
And in-born virtue does it. Let your own goodness
Make you so great, my power shall make you greater;
And more t'encourage you, this I add agen,
There's many Grooms, now exact Gentlemen.

Enter Shamont.

Sham. Methinks 'tis strange to me to enter here:
Is there in nature such an awful power,
To force me to this place? and make me do this?
Is mans affection stronger than his Will?
His resolution? was I not resolv'd
Never to see this place more? Do I bear
Within my breast one blood that confounds th' other?
The blood of Love, and Will, and the last weakest?
Had I ten Millions, I would give it all now,
I were but part it, or 'twould never come;
For I shall never do't, or not do't well,
But spoil it utterly betwixt two passions,
Yonder's the Duke himself, I will not do't now,
Had twenty lives their several sufferings in him.

Duke. Who's that went out now?

Pol. I saw none my Lord.

Duke. Nor you?

Mou. I saw the glimpse of one my Lord.

Duke. What e'er it was, methought it pleas'd me strangely
And suddenly my joy was ready for't.
Did you not mark it better?

Pol. & Mou. Troth my Lord,
We gave no great heed to't.

Enter Shamont.

Sham. 'Twill not be answer'd,
It brings me hither still; by main force hither:
Either I must give over to profess humanity,
Or I must speak for him.

Duke. 'Tis here agen:
No marvel 'twas so pleasing, 'tis delight
And worth it self, now it appears unclouded.

Sham. My Lord——
He turns away from me: by this hand
I am ill-us'd of all sides: 'tis a fault
That fortune ever had t' abuse a goodness.

Duke. Methought you were saying somewhat.

Sham. Mark the Language,
As coy as fate; I see 'twill ne'er be granted.

Duke. We little look'd in troth to see you here yet.

Sham. Not till the day after my brother's death, I think.

Duke. Sure some great business drew you.

Sham. No insooth, Sir,
Only to come to see a brother dye, Sir,
That I may learn to go too; and if he deceive me not,
I think he will do well in't of a soldier,
Manly, and honestly: and if he weep then,
I shall not think the worse on's manhood for't,
Because he's leaving of that part that has it.

Duke. Has slain a noble Gentleman, think on't, Sir,

Sham. I would I could not, Sir.

Duke. Our kinsman too.

Sham. All this is but worse, Sir.

Duke. When 'tis at worst,

Yet seeing thee, he lives.

Sham. My Lord——

Duke. He lives,

Believe it as thy bliss, he dies not for't:

Will this make satisfaction for things past?

Sham. Oh my Lord——

Duke. Will it? speak.

Sham. With greater shame to my unworthiness.

Duke. Rise then, we're even: I never found it harder

To keep just with a man: my great work's ended.

I knew your brother's pardon was your suit, Sir.

However your nice modesty held it back.

Sham. I take a joy now, to confess, it, Sir.

Enter 1 Gent.

1 Gent. My Lord——

Duke. Hear me first, Sir, what e'er your news be:
Set free the Soldier instantly.

1 Gent. 'Tis done, my Lord.

Duke. How?

1 Gent. In effect: 'twas part of my news too,
There's fair hope of your noble kinsman's life, Sir.

Duke. What sayst thou?

1 Gent. And the most admired change
That living flesh e'r had; he's not the man my Lord;
Death cannot be more free from passions, Sir,
Than he is at this instant: he's someek now,
He makes those seem passionate, was never thought of:
And for he fears his moods have oft disturb'd you, Sir,
He's only hasty now for his forgiveness,
And here behold him, Sir.

Enter Passion, the Cupid, and two Brothers.

Duke. Let me give thanks first: our worthy Cousin——

Pas. Your unworthy trouble, Sir;
For which, with all acknowledg'd reverence,
I ask your pardon; and for injury
More known and wilful, I have chose a wife,
Without your counsel, or consent, my Lord.

Duke. A wife? where is she, Sir?

Pas. This noble Gentlewoman.

Duke. How?

Pas. Whose honor my forgetful times much wrong'd.

Duke. He's madder than he was.

1 Gent. I would ha' sworn for him.

Duke. The Cupid, Cousin?

Pas. Yes, this worthy Lady, Sir.

Duke. Still worse and worse.

1 Bro. Our Sister under pardon, my Lord.

Duke. What?

2 Bro. Which shape Love taught her to assume.

Duke. Is't truth then? (Lord.)

1 Gent. It appears plainly now, below the waste, my

Duke. Shamont, didst ever read of a She-Cupid?

Sham. Never in fiction yet: but it might hold, Sir;
For desire is of both Genders.

Enter the Duke's Sister.

Duke. Make that good here: { He joyns Shamont's hand
I take thee at thy word, Sir. } and his Sisters.

Sham. Oh my Lord,
Love would appear too bold, and rude from me,
Honour and admiration are her rights,
Her goodness is my Saint, my Lord,

Duke. I see,
Y'are both too modest to bestow your selves:
I'll save that virtue still, 'tis but my pains: come,
It shall be so.

Sham. This gift does but set forth my poverty.

La. Sir, that which you complain of, is my riches.

Enter Shamont's brother the Soldier.

Duke. Soldier, now every noise founds peace, th'art wel- (come.
Sol. Sir, my repentance sues for your blest favour,
Which once obtain'd, no injury shall lose it;
I'll suffer mightier wrongs.

Duke. Rise, lov'd and pardon'd:
For where Hope fail'd, nay Art it self resign'd,
Thou'st wrought that cure, which skill could never find;
Nor did there cease, but to our peace extend;
Never could wrongs boast of a nobler end.

Exeunt.

EPILOGUE.

EPILOGUE.

Our Poet bid us say for his own part,
 He cannot lay too much forth of his Art :
 But fears our over-acting passions may,
 As not adorn, deface his labour'd Play,
 Yet still he's resolute, for what is writ.
 Of Nicer valour, and assumes the wit :

But for the Love-Scenes which he ever meant,
 Cupid in's Peticcoat should represent,
 He'll stand no shock of censure ; the Play's good,
 He says he knows it, (if well understood.)
 But we (blind god) beg, if thou art Divine.
 Thou'lt shoot thy Arrows round, this Play was thine.

Mr. Francis Beaumonts Letter to Ben. Johnson, written before he and Mr. Fletcher came to London, with two of the precedent Comedies then not finish'd, which deferr'd their merry meetings at the Mermaid.

THe Sun which doth the greatest comfort bring
To absent friends, because the self-same thing
They know they see however absent, is,
Here our best Hay-makers forgive me this,
It is our Countreys stile. In this warm shine,
I'll e and dream of your full Mermaid Wine.
Oh we have water mixt with Claret Lees,
Drink apt to bring in dryer Heresies
Than Beer, good only for the Sonnets strain,
With fustian Metaphors to stuff the brain,
So mixt, that given to the thirstiest one,
'Twill not prove Alms, unless he have the stone:
I think with one draught mans invention fades,
Two Cups had quite spoil'd Homers Illiads;
'Tis Liquor that will find out Sutcliff's wit,
Lye where he will, and make him write worse yet;
Fill'd with such moisture in most grievous qualms;
Did Rob. Wisdom write his Singing Psalms;
And so must I do this, and yet I think
It is a potion sent us down to drink,
By special Providence keeps us from fights,
Makes us not laugh, when we make legs to knights
'Tis this that keeps our minds fit for our States,
A Medicine to obey our Magistrates:
For we do live more free than you, no hate,
No envy at one anothers State
Moves us, we are all equal ev'ry whit:
Of Land that God gives men here is their wit:
If we consider fully, for our best,
And gravest men will with his main house jest,
Scarce please you; we want subtilty to do
The City tricks, lye, hate, and flatter too:
Here are none that can bear a painted show,
Strike when you winch, and then lament the blow:
Who like Mills set the right way for to grind,
Can make their gains alike with every wind:
Only some fellows with the subtil'st pate
Amongst us, may perchance equivocate
At selling of a Horse, and that's the most.
'Tis like the little wit I had is lost
Since I saw you, for Wit is like a Rest
Held up at Tennis, which men do the best,

With the best gamesters: what things have we seen,
Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been
So nimble, and so full of subtil flame,
As if that every one from whence they came,
Had meant to put his whole wit in a jest,
And had resolv'd to live a fool, the rest
Of his dull life; then when there hath been thrown Wit able enough to justifie the Town
For three days past, wit that might warrant be
For the whole City to talk foolishly
Till that were cancell'd, and when that was gone,
We left an Air behind us, which alone,
Was able to make the two next Companies
Right witty; though but downright fools, more wise.
When I remember this, and see that now
The Countrey Gentlemen begin to allow
My wit for dry bobs, then I needs must cry,
I see my days of Ballating grow nigh;
I can already Riddle, and can Sing
Ketches, sell bargains, and I fear shall bring
My self to speak the hardest words I find,
Over, as oft as any, with one wind,
That takes no medicines: But one thought of thee
Makes me remember all these things to be
The wit of our young men, fellows that show
No part of good, yet utter all they know:
Who like trees of the Guard, have growing souls.
Only strong destiny, which all controuls,
I hope hath left a better fate in store,
For me thy friend, than to live ever poor,
Banisht unto this home; fate once again
Bring me to thee, who canst make smooth and plain
The way of Knowledge for me, and then I,
Who have no good but in thy company,
Protest it will my greatest comfort be
To acknowledge all I have to flow from thee.
Ben. when these Scenes are perfect, we'll taste
wine;
I'll drink thy Muses health, thou shalt quaff mine,

The Scene France.

The principal Actors were

Nathan Field,
Rob. Benfield,
Emanuel Read,

Joseph Taylor,
Will. Eglestone,
Thomas Basse.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter the Duke of Orleans, and the Earl of Amiens, at several doors.

Amiens.

Orrow, my Lord of Orleans.

Orl. You salute me like a stranger; brother Orleans were to me a Title more be longing, whom you call the Husband of your Sister.

Ami. Would the circumstances of your brotherhood, had never offer'd cause to make our conversation less familiar: I meet you like a hindrance in your way: your great Law-suit is now upon the tongue, and ready for a judgement.

Orl. Came you from the Hall now?

Ami. Without stay; the Court is full, and such a press of people does attend the issue, as if some great man were brought to his arraignment.

Orl. Every mothers son of all that multitude of hearers, went to be a witness of the misery your Sisters fortunes must have come to, if my adversary who did love her first, had been her Husband.

Ami. The success may draw a testimony from them, to confirm the same opinion, but they went prepar'd with no such hope or purpose.

Orl. And did you intreat the number of them, that are come with no such hope or purpose.

Ami. Tush, your own experience of my heart can answer ye.

Orl.

Orl. This doubtful, makes me clearly understand your disposition.

Ami. If your cause be just,
I wish you a conclusion like your cause.

Orl. I can have any common charity to such a Prayer
From a friend I would expect a love to prosper in ;
Without exceptions such a love as might
Make all my undertakings thankful to't ;
Precisely just is seldom faithful in our wishes
To another mans desires : Farewel. Exit Orl.

Ester Montague having a Purse, Duboys, Longueville,
and Voramer the Page, with two Caskets.

Dub. Here comes your adversarie's brother-in-law.

Long. The Lord of Amiens.

Dub. From the Hall I think.

Ami. I did so : save your Lordship. sent state,

Mount. That's a wish my Lord, as courtcous to my pre-
As ever honest mind was thankful for ;
For now my safety must expose it self
To question : yet to look for any free
Or hearty salutation (Sir) from you
Would be unreasonable in me.

Ami. Why ?

Mount. Your Sister is my adversarie's wife ;
That nearness needs must consequently draw
Your inclination to him.

Ami. I will grant
Him all the nearness his alliance claims,
And yet be nothing less impartial,
My Lord of Montague.

Mount. Lord of Montague yet :
But (Sir) how long the dignity or state
Belonging to it will continue, stands
Upon the dangerous passage of this hour.
Either for evermore to be confirm'd,
Or like the time wherein 'twas pleaded, gone :
Gone with it, never to be call'd again.

Ami. Justice direct your proces to the end ;
To both your persons my respect shall still
Be equal ; but the righteous cause is that
Which bears my wishes to the side it holds,
Where-ever may it prosper. Exit Amiens.

Mount. Then my thanks
Are proper to you, if a man may raise
A confidence upon a lawful ground
I have no reason to be once perplex'd
With any doubtful motion, Longueville,
That Lord of Amiens, (didst observe him ?) has
A worthy nature in him.

Long. Either 'tis his nature or his cunning,
Mount. That's the vizard of most mens actions,
Whose dissembled lives
Do carry only the similitude
Of goodness on 'em : but for him
Honest behaviour makes a true report,
What disposition does inhabit him,
Essential virtue.

Long. Then 'tis pity that Injurious Orleans is his brother.

Dub. He is but his brother-in-law.

Long. Law ? that's as bad.

Dub. How is your Law as bad ? I rather wish
The hangman thy Executor than that Equivocation should be ominous.

Enter two Lawyers, and two Creditors.

Long. Some of your Lawyers —

1 Law. What is ominous ?

2 Law. Let no distrust trouble your Lordships thought.

1 Law. The evidences of your question'd Land
Ha' not so much as any literal

Advantage in 'em to be made against Your Title.

2 Law. And your Council understands
The business fully.

1 Law. Th'are industrious, just.

2 Law. And very confident.

1 Law. Your state endures
A voluntary trial ; like a man
Whose honors are maliciously accus'd.
2 Law. The accusation serves to clear his cause.

1 Law. And to approve his truth more.

2 Law. So shall all
Your adversarie's pleadings strengthen your Possession.

1 Law. And beset upon record
To witness the hereditary right
Of you and yours.

2 Law. Courage, you have the law.

Long. And you the profits.

Mount. If discouragement
Could work upon me, your assurances
Would put me strongly into heart again ;
But I was never fearful : and let fate
Deceive my expectation, yet I am Prepared against dejection.

1 Cre. So are we.

2 Cre. We have received a comfortable hope
That all will speed well.

Long. What is he Duboys ?

Dub. A Creditor.

Long. I thought so, for he speaks
As if he were a partner in his state.

Mount. Sir, I am largely indebted to your loves,

Long. More to their purses.

Mount. Which you shall not lose.

1 Cred. Your Lordship.

Dub. That's another creditor.

1 Cred. Has interest in me.

Long. You have more of him.

1 Cred. And I have had so many promises
From these, and all your learned Counsellors ;
How certainly your cause will prosper : that —

Long. You brought no Serjeants with you ?

Dub. To attend his ill success.

Mount. Good Sir, I will not be Unthankful either to their industries
Or your affections.

1 Law. All your Land (my Lord)
Is at the barr now, give me but ten Crowns
I'll save you harmless.

Long. Take him at his word ;
If he does lose, you're sav'd by miracle,
For I never knew a Lawyer yet undone.

1 Law. Then now you shall, Sir, if this prospers not.

Long. Sir, I beseech you do not force your voice
To such a loudness, but be thrifty now ;
Preserve it till you come to plead at bar
It will be much more profitable in
The satisfaction than the promise.

1 Law. Is not this a satisfaction to engage
My self for this assurance, if he

Mount. No Sir, my ruin never shall import
Anothers loss, if not by accident,
And that my purpose is not guilty of :
You're engag'd in nothing but your care.

Attend the Procurator to the Court, Ex. Law.
Observe how things incline, and bring me word.

Long. I dare not, Sir, if I be taken there,
Mine ears will be in danger.

Mount. Why ? hast thou
Committed something that deserves thine ears ?

Long. No, but I fear the noise ; my hearing will be Perished by the noise ; 'tis as good 't want
A member, as to loose the use —

A member as to lose the use —

Mont. The ornament is excepted.

Long. Well my Lord

I'll put 'em to the hazard.

1 Cred. Your desires be prosperous to you.

2 Cred. Our best Prayers wait

Upon your fortune.

Dub. For your selves, not him.

Mont. Thou canst not blame 'em: I am in their debts.

Ver. But had your large expence (a part whereof
You owe 'em) for unprofitable Silks
And Laces, been bestowed among the poor,
That would have prayed the right way for you:
Not upon you.

Mont. For unprofitable Silks
And Laces? now believe me honest boy
Th'ast hit upon a reprehension that belongs
Unto me.

Ver. By — my Lord,
I had not so unmannerly a thought,
To reprehend you.

Mont. Why I love thee for't.
Mine own acknowledgement confirms thy words:
For once I do remember, coming from
The Mercers, where my Purse had spent it self
On those unprofitable toys thou speak'st of,
A man half naked with his poverty
Did meet me, and requested my relief:
I wanted whence to give it, yet his eyes
Spoke for him, those I could have satisfied
With some unfruitful sorrow, (if my tears
Would not have added rather to his grief,
Than eas'd it) but the true compassion that I should have given I had not: this began
To make me think how many such mens wants
The vain superfluous cost I wore upon
My outside, would have clothed, and left my self
A habit as becoming: to increase
This new consideration there came one
Clad in a garment plain and thrifty, yet
As decent as these fair dear follies; made
As if it were of purpose to despise
The vanity of shew: his purse had still
The power to do a charitable deed,
And did it.

Dub. Yet your inclination, Sir,
Deserv'd no less to be commended, than his action.

Mont. Prethee do not flatter me;
He that intends well, yet deprives himself
Of means, to put his good thoughts into deed,
Deceives his purpose of the due reward
That goodness merits: oh antiquity
Thy great examples of Nobility
Are out of imitation, or at least
So lamely follow'd, that thou art as much
Before this age in virtue, as in time,

Dub. Sir, it must needs be lamely followed, when
The chiefest men love to follow it
Are for the most part cripples.

Mont. Who are they?

Dub. Soldiers, my Lord, soldiers.

Mont. 'Tis true *Duboy*s: but if the law disables me no
For Noble actions, than good purposes, (more
I'll practice how to exercise the worth
Commended to us by our ancestors;
The poor neglected soldier shall command
Me from a Ladies Courtship, and the form
I'll study shall no more be taught me by
The Taylor, but the Scholar; that expence
Which hitherto has been to entertain
Th'intemperate pride and pleasure of the taste
Shall fill my Table more to satisfy,
And less to surfeit.
What an honest work it would be; when we find

A Virgin in her poverty, and youth
Inclining to be tempted, to employ
As much persuasion, and as much expence
To keep her upright, as men use to do upon her falling.

Dub. 'Tis charity that many Maids will be unthankful for,
And some will rather take it for a wrong,
To buy 'em out of their inheritance,
The thing that they were born to.

Enter Longueville.

Mont. Longueville, thou bringst a cheerful promise in thy
There stands no pale report upon thy cheek,
To give me fear or knowledge of my loss, 'tis red and lively.
How proceeds my suit? (Hercules,

Long. That's with leave, Sir, a labour that to those of May add another; or (at least) be call'd
An imitation of his burning shirt:
For 'twas a pain of that merciful
Perplexity, to shoulder through the throng
Of people, that attended your success:
My sweaty linnen fixt upon my skin,
Still as they pull'd me, took that with it; 'twas
A fear I should have left my flesh among 'em:
Yet I was patient, for (methought) the toil
Might be an emblem of the difficult
And weary passage to get out of Law.
And to make up the dear similitude,
When I was forth seeking my handkerchief
To wipe my sweat off, I did find a cause
To make me sweat more, for my Purse was lost
Among their fingers.

Dub. There 'twas rather found.

Long. By them.

Dub. I mean so.

Mont. Well, I will restore
Thy damage to thee: how proceeds my suit?

Lang. Like one at Brokers; I think forfeited.
Your promising Counsel at the first
Put strongly forward with a labour'd speed,
And such a violence of pleading, that
His Fee in Sugar-candy scarce will make
His throat a satisfaction for the hurt
He did it, and he carried the whole cause
Before him, with so clear a passage, that
The people in the favour of your side
Cried Montague, Montague: in the spite of him
That cryed out silence, and began to laugh
Your adversaries advocate to scorn:
Who like a cunning Footman set me forth
With such a temperate easie kind of course
To put him into exercise of strength,
And follow'd his advantages so close,
That when your hot mouth'd pleader thought h' had won,
Before he reacht it, he was out of breath,
And then the other stript him.

Mont. So all is lost.

Long. But how I know not; for, (methought) I stood
Confounded with the clamour of the Court,
Like one embark'd upon a storm at Sea,
Where the tempestuous noise of Thunder mixt
With roaring of the billows, and the thick,
Imperfect language of the Sea-men, takes
His understanding and his safety both
Together from him.

Mont. Thou dost bring ill news

Long. Of what I was unwilling to have been
The first reporter.

Mont. Didst observe no more?

Long. At least no better

Mont. Then th'art not inform'd
So well as I am; I can tell thee that
Will please thee, for when all else left my cause,
My very adversaries took my part.

Long.

Long — Whosoever told you that, abused you.

Mont. Credit me, he took my part
When all forsook me.

Long. Took it from you.

Mont. Yes I mean so, and I think he had just cause
To take it, when the verdict gave it him.

Dub. His Spirit would ha' sunk him, e'r he could Have carried an ill fortune of this weight so lightly.

Mont. Nothing is a misery, unless our weakness apprehend it so;

We cannot be more faithful to our selves
In any thing that's manly, than to make
Ill fortune as contemptible to us
As it makes us to others.

Enter Lawyers.

Long. Here come they Whose very countenances will tell you how Contemptible it is to others.

Mont. Sir?

Long. The Sir of Knighthood may be given him, e'r
They hear you now?

Mont. Good Sir but a word.

Dub. How soon the loss of wealth makes any man
Grow out of knowledge.

Long. Let me see, I pray, Sir,
Never stood you upon the Pillory?

1 Law. The Pillory?

Long. Oh now I know you did not.
Y'ave ears, I thought ye had lost 'em; pray observe,
Here's one that once was gracious in your eyes.

1 Law. Oh my Lord, have an eye upon him.

Long. But ha' you ne'er a Counsel to redeem
His Land yet from the judgement?

2 Law. None but this, a Writ of error to remove the cause.

Long. No more of error, we have been in that too much already.

2 Law. If you will reverse the judgement, you must trust to that delay.

Long. Delay? indeed he's like to trust to that,
With you has any dealing- (Sessionem.

2 Law. E'r the Law proceeds to an Habere facias pos-

Dub. That's a language Sir, I understand not.

Long. Th'art a very strange unthankful fellow to have taken Fees of such a liberal measure, and then give a man hard words for's money.

1 Law. If men will hazard their salvations,
What should I say; I've other business.

Mont. Y'are i'th' right;
That's it you should say, now prosperity has left me.

Enter two Creditors.

1 Cred. Have an eye upon him; if
We lose him now, he's gone for ever; stay
And dog him: I'll go fetch the Officers.

Long. Dog him you Bloud-hound: by this point thou shalt more safely dog an angry Lion, than attempt him.

Mont. What's the matter: (your loss)

Long. Do but stir to fetch a Serjeant; and besides
Of labour, I'll have you beaten, till
Those casement in your faces be false lights.

Dub. Falser than those you sell by.

Mont. Who gave you Commission to abuse my friends
thus?

Lon. Sir, are those your friends that would betray you?

Mont. 'Tis to save themselves rather than betray me.

1 Cred. Your Lordship makes a just construction of it.

2 Cred. All our desire is but to get our own.

Long. Your wives desires and yours do differ then.

Mont. So far as my ability will go

You shall have satisfaction Longeville.

Long. And leave your self neglected; every man

Is first a debtor to his own demands, being honest.

Mont. As I take it, Sir, I did
Not entertain you for my Counselor.

Long. Counsel's the office of a servant,
When the master falls upon a danger; as Defence is; never threaten with your eyes,
They are no cockatrices; do you hear?
Talk with the Girdler, or the Mill'ner,
He can inform you of a kind of men
That first undid the profit of those trades
By bringing up the form of carrying Their Morglays in their hands: with some of those
A man may make himself a priviledge
To ask a question at the prison gates
Without your good permission.

2 Cred. By your leave.

Mont. Stay Sir, what one example since the time
That first you put your hat off to me, have
You noted in me to encourage you
To this presumption? by the justice now
Of thine own rule, I should begin with thee,
I should turn thee away ungratified
For all thy former kindness, forget
Thou ever didst me any service: 'tis not fear
Of being arrested, makes me thus incline
To satisfy you; for you see by him,
I lost not all defences with my state;
The curses of a man to whom I am
Beholding, terrify me more, than all
The violence he can pursue me with.

Dubois, I did prepare me for the worst;
These two small Cabinets do comprehend
The sum of all the wealth that it hath pleased
Adversity to leave me, one as rich
As th'other, both in Jewels; take thou this,
And as the Order put within it, shall Direct thee, distribute it half between Those Creditors, and th'other half among
My servants: for (Sir) they are my Creditors
As well as you are, they have trusted me
With their advancement: if the value fail,
To please you all, my first increase of means
Shall offer you a fuller payment; be content
To leave me something, and imagine that
You put a new beginner into credit.

Cred. So prosper our own blessings, as we wish you to your merit.

Mont. Are you silences of discontent, or of sorrow?

Dub. Sir, we would not leave you.

Long. Do but suffer us to follow you, and what our present means, or industries hereafter can provide, shall serve you.

Mont. Oh desire me not to live
To such a baseness, as to be maintained
By those that serve me; pray begone, I will Defend your honesties to any man
That shall report, you have forsaken me;
I pray begone. Exeunt Servants and Creditors.

Why, dost thou weep my boy,
Because I do not bid thee go to?

Ver. No, I weep (my Lord) because I would not go;
I fear you will command me.

Mont. No my child,
I will not; that would discommend th' intent
Of all my other actions: thou art yet
Unable to advise thy self a course,
Should I put thee to seek it; after that I must excuse, or at the least forgive
Any charitable deed that can be done against my self.

Ver. Every day (my Lord) I tarry with you, I'll account
A day of blessing to me; for I shall Have so much less time left me of my life
When I am from you: and if misery
Befall you (which I hope so good a man

Was never born to) I will take my part,
And make my willingness increase my strength
To bear it. In the Winter I will spare
Mine own cloths from my self to cover you;
And in the Summer, carry some of yours
To ease you: I'll doe any thing I can.

Mont. Why, thou art able to make misery
Ashamed of hurting, when thy weakness can
Both bear it, and despise it: Come my boy
I will provide some better way for thee
Than this thou speakest of: 'tis the comfort that I'll fortune has undone me into the fashion:
For now in this age most men do begin,
To keep but one boy, that kept many men.

Enter Orleans, a Servant, his Lady following.

Orl. Where is she? call her.

Lady. I attend you Sir.

Orl. Your friend sweet Madam.

Lady. What friend, good my Lord?

Orl. Your Montague, Madam, he will shortly want
Those Courtly graces that you love him for;
The means wherewith he purchased this, and this;
And all his own provisions to the least
Proportion of his feeding, or his clothes,
Came out of that inheritance of land
Which he unjustly lived on: but the law
Has given me right in't, and possession; now
Thou shalt perceive his bravery vanish, as
This Jewell does from thee now, and these Pearls
To him that owes 'em.

Lady. Ye are the owner Sir of every thing that does belong to me.

Orl. No, not of him, sweet Lady.

Lady. O good Heaven!

Orl. But in a while your mind will change, and be
As ready to disclaim him; when his wants
And miseries have perish'd his good face,
And taken off the sweetness that has made
Him pleasing in a womans understanding.

La. O Heaven, how gracious had Creation been
To women, who are born without defence,
If to our hearts there had been doors through which
Our husbands might have lookt into our thoughts,
And made themselves undoubtfull.

Orl. Made 'em mad.

La. With honest women.

Orl. Thou dost still pretend
A title to that virtue: prethee let
Thy honesty speak free to me now.
Thou know'st that Montague, of whose Land
I 'm the master, did affect thee first,
And should have had thee, if the strength of friends
Had not prevail'd above thine own consent.
I have undone him; tell me how thou dost
Consider his ill fortune and my good.

La. I'll tell you justly his undoing is
An argument for pity and for tears
In all their dispositions that have known
The honor and the goodness of his life:
Yet that addition of prosperity,

Which you have got by't, no indifferent man
Will malice or repine at, if the Law
Be not abused in't; howsoever since
You have the upper fortune of him, 'twill
Be some dishonor to you to bear your self
With any pride or glory over him.

Orl. This may be truly spoken, but in thee
It is not honest.

La. Yes, so honest, that I care not if the chaste Penelope
Were now alive to hear me.

Enter Amiens.

Orl. Who comes there?

La. My brother.

Am. Save ye.

Orl. Now Sir, you have heard of prosperous Montague,

Am. No Sir, I have heard of Montague,
But of your prosperity.

Orl. Is he distracted.

Am. He does bear his loss with such a noble strength
Of patience that,
Had fortune eyes to see him, she would weep
For having hurt him, and pretending that Shee did it but for triall of his worth:
Hereafter ever love him.

Orl. I perceive you love him, and because (I must confess)
He does deserve that though for some respects,
I have not given him that acknowledgement,
Yet in mine honor I did still conclude to use him nobly.

Am. Sir, that will become your reputation and make me grow proud of your alliance.

Orl. I did reserve the doing of this friendship till I had
His fortunes at my mercy, that the world
May tell him 'tis a willing courtesie.

La. This change will make me happy.

Orl. 'Tis a change; thou shalt behold it: then observe me when

That Montague, had possession of my Land,
I was his rivall, and at last obtain'd
This Lady who, by promise of her own
Affection to him, should ha' bin his wife;
I had her, and withheld her like a pawn,
Till now my Land is rend'ed to me again,
And since it is so, you shall see I have
The conscience not to keep her—give him her— draws
For by the faithfull temper of my sword, she shall not tarry with me.

Am. Give me way— draws.

Thou most unworthy man—give me way;
Or by the wrong he does the Innocent,
I'll end thy misery and his wickedness, together.

Lady. Stay and let me justifie

My husband in that, I have wrong'd his bed. Exeunt Am: Orl.

Enter Orleans in amazement, the servants following him.

Never— all shames that can afflict me fall
Upon me if I ever wrong'd you;

Orl. Didst thou not confess it;

La. 'Twas to save your blood from shedding, that has Turn'd my brothers edge;
He that beholds our thoughts as plainly as
Our faces, knowes it, I did never hurt
My honesty but by accusing it.

Orl. Womens consents are sooner credited
Than their denials: and I'll never trust
Her body that prefers any defence
Before the safety of her honor—here

Enter Servant.

Show forth that stranger—give me not a word
Thou feest a danger readie to be tempted.

La. Cast that upon me rather than my shame,
And as I am now dying I will vow—
That I am honest.

Orl. Put her out of dores; but that I fear my land
May go again to Montague, I would kill thee, I am loth,
To make a beggar of him that way; or else—

Go now you have the liberty of flesh,
And you may put it to a double use,
One for your pleasure, th'other to maintain
Your wellbelov'd, he will want.
In such a charitable exercise
The virtue will excuse you for the vice.

Exit Lady.

Exit Orleans.

Enter Amiens drawn, Montague, Veramor meeting.

Mont. What means your Lordship?

Ver. For the love of Heaven.

Am. Thou hast advantage of me, cast away this buckler.

Mont. So he is Sir, for he lives

With one that is undone — avoyd us boy.

Ver. I'll first avoid my safety,
Your Rapier shall be button'd with my head, before it touch my Master.

Am. Montague?

Mont. Sir.

Am. You know my sister?

Mont. Yes Sir.

Am. For a whore?

Mont. You lye, and shall lie lower if you dare abuse her honor.

Enter Lady.

La. I am honest.

Am. Honest!

La. Upon my faith I am.

Am. What did then persuade thee to condemn thy self?

La. Your safety.

Am. I had rather be expos'd

To danger, than dishonor; th'ast betray'd
The reputation of my familie
More basely by the falseness of that word,
Than if thou hadst delivered me asleep
Into the hands of base enemies.
Relief will never make thee sensible
Of thy disgraces; let thy wants compell thee to it.

Exit.

La. O I am a miserable woman.

Mont. Why Madam? are you utterly without means to relieve you?

La. I have nothing Sir, unless by changing of these cloaths for worse, and then at last the worst for nakedness.

Mont. Stand off boy, nakedness would be a change
To please us Madam, to delight us both.

La. What nakedness Sir?

Mont. Why the nakedness of body Madam, we were Lovers once.

La. Never dishonest Lovers.

Mont. Honestie has no allowance now to give our selves.

La. Nor you allowance against honestie.

Mont. I'll send my Boy hence, opportunite
Shall be our servant, come and meet me first
With kisses like a stranger at the door,
And then invite me nearer to receive
A more familiar inward welcome; where,
Instead of tapers made of Virgins wax
Th'increasing flames of our desires shall light
Us to a banquet: and before the taste
Be dull with satisfaction, I'll prepare
A nourishment compos'd of every thing
That bears a naturall friendship to the blood,
And that shall set another edge upon 't,
Or else between the courses of the feast
We'll dallie out an exercise of time,
That ever as one appetite expires another may succeed it.

La. O my Lord, how has your nature lost her worthiness?
When our affections had their liberty,

Our kisses met as temperately as
The hands of sisters, or of brothers, that
Our bloods were then as moving; then you were So noble, that I durst have trusted your Embraces in an opportunity

Silent enough to serve a ravisher,
And yet come from you.--undishonor'd--how
You think me altered, that you promise your Attempt success I know not; but were all
The sweet temptations that deceive us set
On this side, and one that side all the waiters,
These neither should persuade me, nor these force.

Mont. Then misery may waste your body.

Lady. Yes, but lust shall never.

Mont. I have found you still as uncorrupted as I left you first

Continue so; and I will serve you with
As much devotion as my word, my hand
Or purse can show you; and to justify
That promise, here is half the wealth I have,
Take it, you owe me nothing, till you fall
From virtue, which the better to protect
I have bethought me of a present means:

Give me the Letter; this commends my Boy
Into the service of a Lady, whose

Free goodness you have bin acquainted with, Lamira.

Lady. Sir I know her.

Mont. Then believe her entertainment will be noble to you?

My boy shall bring you thither: and relate
Your manner of misfortune if your own
Report needs any witness: so I kiss your hand good Lady.

Lady. Sir, I know not how to promise, but I cannot be unthankfull.

Mont. All that you can implore in thankfulness
Be yours, to make you the more prosperous.

Farwell my boy,—I am not yet oppress'd. Exit Lady
Having the power to helpe one that's distress'd. Ver.

Exeunt..

Actus Secundi

Scena Prima.

Enter Longaville and Dubois.

Long. WHat shall we do now: swords are out of use,
And words are out of credit.

Dub. We must serve.

Long. The means to get a service will first spend
Our purses; and except we can allow
Our selves an entertainment, service will Neglect us; now 'tis grown into a doubt
Whether the Mr. or the servants gives the countenance.

Dub. Then fall in with Mistresses.

Long. They keep more servants now (indeed) than men,
But yet the age is grown so populous
Of those attendants, that the women are Grown full too.

Dub. What shall we propound our selves?

Long. I'll think on't.

Dub. Do; Old occupations have too many setters up to prosper, some uncommon trade would thrive now.

Long. We'll e'en make up some half a dozen proper men.

And should not we get more
Than all your female sinners?

Dub. If the house be seated as it should be privately.

Long. I, but that would make a multitude of witches.

Dub.

Dub. Witches? how prethee?

Long. Thus the bauds would all turn witches to revenge
Themselves upon us, and the women that Come to us, for disguises must wear beards,
And that's they say, a token of a witch.

Dub. What shall we then do;

Long. We must study on't
With more consideration; stay Duboyes
Are not the Lord of Orleans and the Lord
Of Amiens enemies?

Dub. Yes, what of that.

Long. Methinks the factions of two such great men.
Should give a promise of advancement now
To us that want it.

Dub. Let the plot be thine, and in the enterprize I'll second thee.

Long. I have it we will first set down our selves
The Method of a quarrell; and make choyce
Of some frequented Tavern; or such a place
Of common notice, to perform it in
By way of undertaking to maintain
The severall honors of those enemies.

Thou for the Lord of Orleans; I for Amiens.

Dub. I like the project, and I think 'twill take
The better, since their difference first did rise
From his occasion whom we followed once.

Long. We cannot hope less after the report,
Than entertainment or gratuity,
Yet those are ends, I do not aim at most;
Great spirits that are needy, and will thrive,
Must labour whiles such troubles are alive.

Exeunt.

Enter Laverdine and La-poope.

La-p. Slander is sharper than the sword. I have fed this three dayes upon leaf Tobacco, for want of other Victuals.

Lav. You have liv'd the honestest Captain; but be not so dejected, but hold up thy head, and meat will sooner fall i'thy mouth.

La-p. I care not so much for meat, so I had but good liquor, for which my guts croak like so many Frogs for rain.

Lav. It seems, you are troubled with the wind-Collick, Captain, swallow a bullet: 'tis present remedy I'll assure
you.

La-p. A bullet? I'll tell you Sir, my panch is nothing but a pile of bullets; when I was in any service I stood between my Generall and the shot, like a mud-wall; I am all lead, from the crown of the head to the soal of the foot, not a sound bone about me.

Lav. It seems you have bin in terrible hot service
Captain.

La-p. It has ever bin the fate of the low Country wars to spoil many a man, I ha' not bin the first nor shall not be the last: but I'll tell you Sir, (hunger has brought it in to mind) I served once at the Siege of Braste, 'tis memorable to this day, where we were in great distress for victuals; whole troops fainted more for want of food then for blood, and died, yet we were resolved to stand it out; I my self was but then Gentleman of a Company, and had as much need as any man, and indeed I had perished had not a miraculous providence preserved me.

Lav. As how good Captain?

La-p. Marry Sir, e'en as I was fainting and falling down for want of sustenance, the enemy made a shot at me, and struck me full i'th' panch with a penny loaf.

Lav. Instead of a bullet!

La-p. In stead of a bullet.

Lav. That was miraculous indeed; and that loaf sustained you.

La-p. Nourished me or I had famished with the rest.

Lav. You have done worthy acts being a soldier, and now you shall give me leave to requite your tale, and to acquaint you with the most notorious deeds that I have done being a Courtier. I protest Captain I will be no more than you have done.

La-p. I can indure no lies.

Lav. I know you cannot Captain, therefore I'll only tell you of strange things: I did once a deed of charity for it self; I assisted a poor widow in a sute, and obtained it, yet I protest I took not a penny for my labor.

La-p. 'Tis no such strange thing.

Lav. By Mars Captain, but it is, and a very strange thing too in a Courtier, it may take the upper hand of your penny loaf for a miracle. I could ha' told you how many Ladyes have languished for my love, and how I was once solicited by the mother, the daughter, and grand-mother; out of the least of which I might have digg'd my self a fortune; they were all great Ladyes, for two of them were so big I could hardly embrace them:
but I was sluggish in my rising courses, and therefore let them pass; what means I had is spent upon such as had the wit to cheat me; That wealth being gone, I have only bought experience with it, with a strong hope to cheat others; but see here comes the much declined Montague, who had all the Manor houses, which were the body of his estate, overthrown by a great wind.

Enter Montague, Mallicorne.

La-p. How by a great wind? was he not overthrown by law?

Lav. Yes, marry was he: but there was terrible puffing and blowing before he was overthrown, if you observ'd, and believe it Captain, there's no wind so dangerous to a building as a lawyers breath.

La-p. What's he with him?

Lav. An eminent Citizen. Mounsier Mallicorne, let's stand a side and listen their design.

Mal. Sir, profit is the Crown of labor, it is the life, the soul of the industrious Merchant, in it he makes his paradise, and for it neglects Wife, Children, Friends, Parents, nay all the world, and delivers up himself to the violence of storms, and to be tos'd into unknown ayts;
as there is no faculty so perillous, so there's none so worthy profitable.

Mont. Sir, I am very well possess'd of it, and what of my poore fortunes remains, I would gladly hazard upon the Sea: it cannot deal worse with me than the Land, though it sink or throw it in the hands of Pirats. I have yet five hundred pounds left, and your honest and worthy acquaintance may make me a young Merchant; th'one moiety of what I have I would gladly adventure.

Mal. How adventure? you shall hazard nothing: you shall only joyn with me in certain commodities that are safe arrived unto the Key; you shall neither be in doubt of danger nor dammage; But so much money dis-burst, so much receive; Sir, I would have you conceive
I pursue it not for any good your money will do me, but meerly out of mine own freeness and courtesie to pleasure
you.

Mont. I can believe no less, and you express a noble nature, seeking to build up a man so ruin'd as my self.

Lav. Captain here is subject for us to work upon if we have wit; you hear that there is money yet left, and it is going to be layd out in Rattels, Bels, Hobby-
Horses, brown paper, or some such like sale commodities;
now it would do better in our purses, upon our backs in good Gold-lace, and Scarlat, and then we might pursue our projects, and our devices towards my Lady Annabella; go to, there's a conceit newly landed; heark!
stand in good reputation with him, and therefore may the better cheat him : Captain , take a few instructions from me.

Mont. What monies I have is at your disposing, and upon twelve I will meet you at the Pallace with it.

Mal. I will there expect you, and so I take my leave. Exit.

Lav. You apprehend me ?

La-p. Why do ye think I am a dunce ?

Lav. Not a dunce Captain, but you might give me leave to misdoubt that pregnancy in a Soldier, which is proper and hereditary to a Courtier ; but prosecute it, I will both second, and give credit to it. Good Mounsier Montague, I would your whole revenues lay within the circuit of mine armes, that I might as easily bestow, or restore it unto you as my curtesie.

La-p. My zealous wishes Sir, do accompany his for your good fortunes.

Lav. Believe it Sir, our affection towards you is a strong band of friendship.

Mont. To which I shall most willingly seal. But believe me Gentlemen in a broken estate, the bond of friendship o't is forfeited, but that it is your free and ingenuous nature to renew it.

Lav. Sir, I will amply extend my self to your use, and am very zealously afflicted as not one of your least friends for your crooked fate ; But let it not seise you with any dejection, you have as I hear a sufficient competency left, which well disposed may erect you as high in the worlds account as ever.

Mont. I cannot live to hope it, much less enjoy it, nor is it any part of my endeavor ; my study is to render every man his own, and to contain my self within the limits of a Gentleman.

Lav. I have the grant of an Office given me by some noble favorites of mine in Court, there stands but a small matter between me and it, if your ability be such to lay down the present summ, out of the love I bear you, before any other man, it shall be confirmed yours.

Mont. I have heard you often speak of such a thing ; If it be assur'd to you I will gladly deal in it : that portion I have, I would not hazard upon one course, for I see the most certain is incertain.

La-p. Having money Sir , you could not light upon men that could give better direction ; there is at this time a friend of mine upon the Seas, to be plain with you, he is a pyrate, that hath wrote to me to work his freedom, and by this Gentlemans means, whose acquaintance is not small at Court ; we have the word of a worthy man for it , only there is some money to be suddainly disburs'd, and if your happiness be such to make it up you shall receive treble gain by it, and good assurance for it.

Mont. Gentlemen, out of the weakness of my estate you seem (to have some knowledge of my brest) that wou'd if it were possible advance my declined fortunes, to satisfie all men of whom I have had credit, and I know no way better than these which you propose ; I have some money ready under my command, some part of it is already promis'd, but the remainder is yours to such uses as are propounded.

Lav. Appoint some certain place of meeting, for these affaires require expedition.

Mont. I will make it my present business : at twelve, I am to meet Mallicorne, the Marchant at the Pallace, you know him Sir , about some negotiation of the same nature, there I will be ready to tender you that money, upon such conditions as we shall conclude of.

Lav. The care of it be yours, so much as the affair concerns you.

Mont. Your caution is effectually, and till then I take my leave.

La. Good Mr Montague.

Exit.

Within a clamor , down with their weapons.

Enter Longavile, and Dubois, their swords drawn, servants and others between them.

Ser. Nay Gentlemen what mean you? pray be quiet, have some respect unto the house.

Long. A treacherous slave.

Du. Thou dost revile thy self base Longavile.

Long. I say thou art a villain and a corrupt one, that hast some seven years fed on thy masters trencher, yet never bredst good blood towards him : for if thou hadst, thou'dst have a sounder heart.

Du. So Sir, you can use your tongue something nimbler than your sword.

Long. Wou'd you cou'd use your tongue well of your Master, friend you might have better employment for your sword.

Du. I say again, and I will speak it loud and often, that Orleans, is a noble Gentleman with whom Amiens is too light to poyse the scale.

Long. He is the weaker for taking of a prayse out of thy mouth.

Du. This hand shall seal his merit at thy heart.

Lav. Part them my masters, part them.

Ser. Part them Sir , why do you not part them , you stand by with your sword in your hand , and cry part 'em.

Lav. Why you must know my friend my cloaths are better than yours, and in a good suit, I do never use to part any body.

La-p. And it is discretion.

Lav. I marry is it Captain.

Long. Dubois though this place priviledge thee , know where next we meet, the blood which at thy heart flows drops at thy feet.

Enter Amience in haste, his sword drawn.

Du. I would not spend it better than in this quarrell, and on such a hazard.

Ami. What uprore's this, must my name here be question'd in Tavern brawls, and by affected Ruffins?

Lav. Not we indeed Sir.

Du. Fear cannot make me shrink out of your fury, though you were greater than your name doth make you, I am one, and the opposer ; if your swoln rage have ought in malice to enforce express it.

Ami. I seek thee not, nor shalt thou ever gain That credit, which a blow from me wou'd give thee, By my—I more detest that fellow

Which took my part than thee, that he durst offer To take my honor in his feeble armes, And spend it in a drinking room ; which way went he ?

Lav. That way Sir, I wou'd you wou'd after ; for I do fear we shall have some more scuffling.

Ami. I'll follow him, and if my speed o'er take him, I shall ill thank him, for his forwardness. Exit.

Lav. I am glad he's gone, for I doe not love to see a sword drawn in the hand of a man that lookes so furious, there's no jesting with edge tooles, how say you Captain ?

Cap. I say 'tis better jesting than to be in earnest with them.

Enter Orleance.

Orl. How now ? what's the difference ? they say there have bin swords drawn, and in my quarrell : let me know that man, whose love is so sincere to spend his blood for my sake, I will bounteously requite him.

Lav. We were all of your side, but there he stands begun it.

Orl. What's thy name ?

Dub. Dubyses ?

Orl. Give me thy hand, hast received no hurt?

Dub. Not any, nor were this body stuck full of wounds, I should not count them hurts, being taken in so honorable a cause as the defence of my most worthy Lord.

Orl. The dedication of thy love to me requires my ample bounty, thou art mine, for I do find thee made unto my purposes: Mounfieur Laverdine, pardon my neglect I not observed you, and how runs rumour?

Lav. Why, it runs my Lord like a foot-man without a cloak, to show that what's once rumour'd it cannot be hid.

Orl. And what say the rable, am not I the subject of their talk?

Lav. Troth my Lord the common mouth speaks foul words.

Orl. Of me, for turning away my wife, do they not?

Lav. Faith the men do a little murmure at it and say, 'tis an ill president in so great a man; marry the women; they rayl out right.

Orl. Out upon them rampallions. I'll keep my self safe enough out of their fingers, but what say my pritty jolly composed gallants that censure every thing more desperate than it is dangerous; what say they?

Lav. Marry they are laying wagers, what death you shall die; one offers to lay five hundred pounds; And yet he had but a groat about him, & that was in two two-pences too to, any man that wou'd make it up a shilling; that you were kil'd with a Pistoll charg'd with white Powder; another offerd to pawn his soul for five shillings, and yet no body wou'd take him, that you were stab'd to death, and shou'd die with more wounds than Cesar.

Orl. And who shou'd be the Butchers that shou'd do it? Montague and his associates?

Lav. So 'tis conjectured.

La-p. And believe it; sweet Printe, it is to be feared, and therefore prevented.

Orl. By turning his purpose on himself, were not that the way?

Lav. The most direct path for your safety. For where doth danger sit more furious than in a desperate man?

La-p. And being you have declined his means, you have increast his malice.

Lav. Besides the generall report that steems in every mans breath, and stains you all over with infamy, that Time the devourer of all things cannot eat out.

La-p. I, for that former familiarity, which he had with your Lady.

Lav. Men speak it as boldly as words of compliment; good morrow, good even, or save you Sir, are not more usuall; if the word cuckold had been written upon your forehead in great Capitall Letters; it could not have been dilated with more confidence.

Orl. He shall not sleep another night, I will have his blood, though it be required at my hands again.

Lav. Your Lordship may, and without hazarding your own person; here's a Gentleman in whose looks I see a resolution to perform it.

Dub. Let his Lordship give me but his honorable word for my life, I'll kill him as he walks.

Lav. Or pistoll him as he sits at meat.

La-p. Or at game.

Lav. Or as he is drinking.

Dub. Any way.

Orl. Wou't thou? call what is mine thine own, thy reputation shall not be brought in question for it, much less thy life; it shall be nam'd a deed of valour in thee, not murder: Farewell.

Exit.

Dub. I need no more encouragement, it is a work I will persuade my self that I was born to.

Laver. And you may persuade your self too that you shall be sav'd by it, being that it is for his honorable Lordship.

Dub. But you must yield me means, how, when and where.

Lav. That shall be our tasks; Nay more, we will be agents with thee:

This hour we are to meet him, on the receipt of certain moneys,

Which indeed we purpose honestly to cheat him of, And that's the main cause I wou'd have him slain, Who works with safety makes a double gain.

Exeunt.

Enter Longaville, Amiens following him.

Ami. Stay Sir, I have took some pains to overtake you. —Your name is Longaville.

Long. I have the word of many honest men for't, I crave your Lordships pardon, your sudden apprehension on my steps made me to frame an answer unwitting and unworthy your respect.

Ami. Doe you know me?

Long. Yes, my Lord.

Ami. I know not you; nor am I well pleased to make this time, as the affair now stands, the induction of your acquaintance; you are a fighting fellow.

Long. How my Lord?

Ami. I think I too much grace you; rather you are a fellow dares not fight, but spit and puffe and make a noyse, whilst your trembling hand draws out your Sword, to lay it upon andirons, stools or tables, rather than on a man,

Long. Your honor may best speak this; yet — with little safety, if I thought it serious.

Ami. Come, you are a verie braggart. and you have given me cause to tell you so: what weakness have you ever seen in me to prompt your self, that I could need your help; or what other reason could induce you to it? you never yet had a meals meat from my Table, nor as I remember from my Wardrop any cast Suit.

Lon. 'Tis true, I never durst yet have such a servile spirit, to be the minion of a full swoln Lord; but alwaies did detest such slavery: a meals meat, or a cast Suit? I wou'd first eat the stones, and from such rags the dung-hills doe afford, pick me a garment.

Ami. I have mistook the man, his resolute spirit Proclaimes him generous, he has a noble heart As free to utter good deeds as to act them; For had he not been right, and of one piece, He would have crumpled, curled, and struck himself Out of the shape of man into a shaddow.

But prethee tell me, if no such sawning hope Did lead thee on to hazard life for my sake; What was it that incited thee?

Tell me; speak it without the imputation of a Sycophant.

Long. Your own desert, and with it was joyn'd the unfained friendship that I judged you ever held unto my former Lord.

Ami. The noble Montague?

Long. Yes, the noble and much injured Montague.

Ami. To such a man as thou art, my heart shall be A Casket: I will lock thee up there, And esteem thee as a faithfull friend, The richest Jewell that a man enjoyes; And being thou didst follow once my friend, And in thy heart still dost not with his fortunes casting him off,

Thou shalt go hand in hand with me, and share As well in my ability as love; 'tis not my end To gain men for my use, but a true friend.

Exeunt.

Enter

Enter Duboys.

Dub. There's no such thriving way to live in grace,
As to have no fence of it; his back nor belly shall not want warning that can practise me mischief;
I walk now with a full purse, grow high and wanton,
Prune and briske my self in the bright shine
Of his good Lordships favours; and for what virtue?
For fashioning my self a murderer.
O noble Montague, to whom I owe my heart,
With all my best thoughts, though my tongue have promis'd
To exceed the malice of thy destiny,
Never in time of all my service knew I
Such a sin tempt thy bounty; those that did feed
Upon thy charge had merit or else need.

Enter Laverdine, and La-poope, with disguises.

Lav. Duboys, most prosperously met.

Dub. How now? will he come this way?

La. This way, immediately; therefore thy assistance,
dear Duboys.

Dub. What have you cheated him of the money you spoke of?

Lav. Fough, as easily as a silly Countrey wench of her maydenhead; we had it in a twinkling.

Dub. 'Tis well Captain, let me help you, you must be our leader in this action.

La-p. Tut, fear not, I'll warrant you if my Sword hold, we'll make no sweating sickness of it.

Dub. Why that's well said, but let's retire a little, that we may come on the more bravely; this way, this way.

Exeunt.

Enter Montague in the bands of three Officers, and three Creditors.

1 Cred. Officers look to him, and be sure you take good security before he part from you.

Mont. Why but my friends, you take a strange course with me; the sums I owe you are rather forgetfulness, they are so slight, than want of will or honesty to pay
you.

1 Cred. I Sir, it may be so; but we must be paid, and we will be paid before you scape: we have wife and children, and a charge, and you are going down the wind, as a man may say; and therefore it behooves us to look to't in time.

2 Cred. Your cloak here wou'd satisfy me, mine's not above a three pound matter, besides the arrest.

3 Cred. Faith and mine is much about that matter too; your Girdle and Hangers, and your Beaver, shall be sufficient bail for't.

1 Cred. If you have ever a plain black sute at home, this Silken one, with your Silke-stockings, Garters, and Roses shall pacifie me too; for I take no delight, if I have a sufficient pawn, to cast any Gentleman in prison;
therefore 'tis but an untrussing matter: and you are free,
we are no unreasonable creatures you see; for mine own part, I protest I am loth to put you to any trouble for security.

Mont. Is there no more of you? he wou'd next demand
my skin,

1 Cred. No Sir, here's no more of us, nor do any of us demand your skin, we know not what to do with it; but it may be if you ow'd your Glover any money, he knew what use to make of it.

Mont. Ye dregs of baseness, vultures amongst men,
That tyre upon the hearts of generous spirits.

1 Cred. You do us wrong Sir, we tyre no generous spirits, we tyre nothing but our hackneys.

Enter Mallicorne.

Mont. But here comes one made of another piece;
A man well meriting that free born name
Of Citizen; welcome my deliverer, I am fallen
Into the hands of blood-hounds, that for a sum
Lesser than their honesties, which is nothing,
Wou'd tear me out of my skin.

Mal. Why Sir, what's the matter?

1 Cred. Why Sir the matter is, that we must have our money, which if we cannot have, we'll satisfy our selves with his carcass, and be payd that wayes: you had as good Sir, not have been so peremptory. Officer, hold fast.

1 Off. The strenuous fist of vengeance now is clutcht;
therefore fear nothing.

Mal. What may be the debt in gross?

Mont. Some forty Crowns, nay rather not so much, 'tis quickly cast.

Mal. 'Tis strange to me, that your estate shou'd have so low an ebb, to stick at such sleight sums: why my friends, you are too strict in your accounts, and call too sudden on this Gentleman, he has hopes left yet to pay you all.

1 Cred. Hopes? I marry; bid him pay his friends with hopes, and pay us with currant Coyn: I knew a gallant once that fed his creditors still with hopes, and bid 'em they shou'd fear nothing, for he had 'em tyed in a string; and trust me so he had indeed, for at last he and all his hopes hopt in a halter.

Mont. Good Sir, with what speed you may, free me out of the company of these slaves, that have nothing but their names to show 'em men.

Mal. What wou'd you wish me do Sir? I protest I ha' not the present sum (small as it is) to lay down for you;
and for giving my word, my friends no later than yesternight made me take bread and eat it, that I shou'd not do it for any man breathing i'th' world; therefore I pray hold me excused.

Mont. You do not speak this seriously?

Mal. As ever I said my prayers, I protest to you.

Mont. What may I think of this?

Mal. Troth Sir thought is free for any man; we abuse our betters in it, I have done it myself.

Mont. Trust me, this speech of yours doth much amaze me; pray leave this language, and out of that same sum you lately did receive of me, lay down as much as may discharge me.

Mal. You are a merry man Sir, and I am glad you take your crosses so temperately; fare you well Sir, and yet I have something more to say to ye, a word in your ear
I pray; to be plain with you I did lay this plot to arrest you to enjoy this money I have of yours, with the more safety. I am a fool to tell you this now; but in good faith I could not keep it in. And the money wou'd a done me little good else. An honest Citizen cannot wholly enjoy his own wife for you, they grow old before they have true use of them, which is a lamentable thing, and truly much hardens the hearts of us Citizens against you:
I can say no more, but am heartily sorry for your heaviness,
and so I take my leave.

Exit Mallicorne.

1 Cred. Officers take hold on him again, for Mounfier
Mallicorne will do nothing for him I perceive.

Enter Duboys, Lapoope, and Laverdine.

Dub. Nay come my masters, leave dancing of the old measures, and let's assault him bravely.

Lav. By no means; for it goes against my stomach to kill a man in an unjust quarrell.

La-p. It must needs be a clog to a mans conscience all his life time.

Lav. It must indeed Captain: besides doe ye not see he has gotten a guard of friends about him, as if he had some knowledge of our purpose?

Dub. Had he a guard of Devils, as I think them little better, my Sword should doe the message that it came for.

Lav. If you will be so desperate, the blood lie upon your own neck, for we'll not meddle in't.

Dub. runs upon Montague, and struggling yields him his Sword; the Officers draw, Laverdine and La-poope in the scuffling retire, Montague chaseth them off the Stage, himself wounded.

Dub. I am your friend and servant. Struggle with me and take my Sword; Noble Sir, make your way, you have slain an Officer.

Mont. Some one of them has certainly requited me; for I doe lose much blood.

1 Offic. Udsprecious, we have lost a brother, pursue the Gentleman,

2 Offic. I'll not meddle with him: you see what comes on't; besides I know he will be hang'd ere he be taken.

1 Offic. I tell thee yeoman he must be taken ere he be hanged; he is hurt in the guts, run afore therefore and know how his wife will rate his Sawfages a pound.

3 Offic. Stay brother, I may live, for surely I find I'm but hurt in the leg, a dangerous kick on the shin-bone.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Madam Lamira, Madam le Orleans, Veramour.

Lam. YOU see Lady What harmless sports our Countrey life affords; And though you meet not here with City dainties, Or Courtly entertainment, what you have is free and hearty.

L. Or. Madam, I find here What is a stranger to the Court, content, And receive curtesies done for themselves, Without an expectation of return, Which binds me to your service.

Lam. Oh your love; My homely house built more for use than shew Observes the Golden mean equally distant From glittering pomp, and sordid avarice; For Maskes, we will observe the works of nature, And in the place of visitation, read: Our Physick shall be wholesome walks, our viands, Nourishing, not provoking: for I find Pleasures are tortures that leave stings behind.

L. Or. You have a great estate.

Lam. A competency Sufficient to maintain me and my rank, Nor am I, I thank Heaven, so Courtly bred As to imploy the utmost of my Rents In paying Tailors for phantastick Robes; Or rather than be second in the fashion, Eat out my Officers and my Revenues With grating usury; my back shall not Be the base on which your soothing Citizen Erects his Summer-houses; nor on th' other side Will I be so penuriously wife, As to make money (that's my slave) my Idoll, Which yet to wrong, merits as much reproof, As to abuse our servant.

L. Or. Yet with your pardon

I think you want the Crown of all contentment.

Lam. In what good Madam?

L. Or. In a worthy husband.

Lam. — It is strange the galley-slave should praise His Oar, or stroaks; or you, that have made ship-wrack Of all delight upon this Rock, call'd marriage, Should sing Eurymions on't.

L. Or. Madam, though one fall From his horse and break his neck, will you Conclude from that it is unfit to ride? Or must it follow, because Orleans My Lord's pleased to make his passionate triall Of my suspected patience, that my brother, (Were he not so, I might say, worthy Amiens) Will imitate his ills, that cannot fancy What's truly Noble in him?

Lam. I must grant

There's as much worth in him as can be lookt for From a young Lord, but not enough to make Me change my golden liberty and consent To be a servant to it, as wives are To the Imperious humors of their Lords: Me thinks I'm well, I rise and goe to bed When I think fit, eat what my appetite Desires without controle, my servants study Is my contentment, and to make me merry Their farthest ayms; my sleeps are enquired after, My rising up saluted with respect: Command and liberty now wait upon My Virgin state; what would I more; change all, And for a husband? no; these freedoms die, In which they live with my Virginity; 'Tis in their choice that's rich to be a wife, But not being yoakt to chuse the single life.

Ver. Madam.

Lam. How like you the Countrey?

Ver. I like the ayr of it well Madam, and the rather because, as on Irish Timber your Spider will not make his web, so for ought I see yet your Cheater, Pander, and Informer being in their dispositions too foggy for this piercing climate, shun it, and chose rather to walk in mists in the City.

Lam. Who did you serve first boy?

Ver. A rich Merchants widow, and was by her preferred to a young Court-Lady.

L. Or. And what difference found you in their service?

Ver. Very much: for look how much my old City Madam gave to her young visitants, so much my Lady received from her hoary Court-servants.

Lam. And what made you to leave her?

Ver. My father (Madam) had a desire to have me a tall-man, took me from thence.

Lam. Well, I perceive you inherit the wag, from your father.

Ver. Doves beget Doves; and Eagles, Eagles, Madam: A Citizen here, tho left never so rich, seldome at the best proves a Gentleman: the son of an Advocate, tho dub'd like his father, will shew a relish of his descent, and the fathers thriving practice, as I have heard: she that of a Chambermayd is metamorphosed into a Madam, will yet remember how oft her daughter by her mother ventured to lie upon the rushes before she could get in that which makes many Ladies.

L. Or. But what think you of your late Master?

Ver. Oh Madam— Sighs.

Lam. Why doe you sigh? you are sorry that you left him,

He made a wanton of you.

Ver. Not for that:

Or if he did, for that my youth must love him. Oh pardon me, if I say liberty Is bondage, if compar'd with his kind service; And but to have power now to speak his worth To its desert; I should be well content

To be an old man when his praise were ended:
 And yet, if at this instant you were pleas'd,
 I should begin, the livery of age
 Would take his lodging upon this head
 Ere I should bring it to a period.
 'n brief he is a man (for Heaven forbid
 That I should ever live to say he was
 Of such a shape as would make one beloved,
 That never had good thought;) and to his body
 He hath a mind of such a constant temper in which virtues throng to have a room:
 Yet 'gainst this noble Gentleman, this Montague,
 For in that name I comprehend all goodness,
 Wrong, and the wrested law, false witness's,
 And envy sent from hell, have rose in Armes,
 And though not pierc'd, batter'd his honor'd shield.
 What shall I say? I hope you will forgive me,
 That if you were but pleas'd to love,
 I know no Juno worthy such a Jove.

Enter Charlot with a letter.

Lam. 'Tis well yet that I have the second place
 In your affection: From whence?

Charl. From the Lord Amiens, Madam.

Lam. 'Tis wellcome, though it bear his usual language:
 I thought so much, his love-suit speaks his health.
 What's he that brought it?

Charl. A Gentleman of good rank, it seems.

Lam. Where is he?

Charl. Receiving entertainment in your house
 Sorting with his degree.

Lam. 'Tis well.

Charl. He waits your Ladyships pleasure.

Lam. He shall not wait long:
 I'll leave you for a while; nay stay you boy,
 Attend the Lady. Exeunt Lam. Charl.

Vir. Would I might live once
 To wait on my poor Master.

L. Or. That's a good boy:
 This thankfulness looks lovely on thy forehead,
 And in it, as a book, me thinks I read
 Instructions for my self, that am his debtor,
 And wou'd do much that I might be so happy
 To repair that which to our grief is ruin'd.

Vir. It were a work a King might glory in,
 If he saw with my eyes: If you please Madam,
 For sure to me you seem unapt to walk,
 To sit, although the churlish Birds deny
 To give us musick in this grove, where they Are prodigall to others: I'll strain my voyce
 For a sad Song, the place is safe and private.

L. Or. 'Twas my desire; begin good Viramour.

Musick, a Song, at the end of it enter Montague, fainting, his Sword drawn.

L. Or. What's he Viramour?

Vir. A goodly personage.

Mont. Am I yet safe? or is my flight a dream;
 My wounds and hunger tell me that I wake:
 Whither have my fears born me? no matter where,
 Who hath no place to goe to, cannot err:
 What shall I do? cunning calamity!
 That others gross wits uses to refine,
 When I most need it duls the edg of mine.

L. Or. Is not this Montagues voyce?

Vir. My Masters? sic.

Mont. What sound was that, 'pish,
 Fear makes the wretch think every leaf oth' Jury:
 What course to live, 'beg? better men have done it,
 But in another kind: steal? Alexander
 Though stil'd a Conqueror, was a proud thief,
 Though he rob'd with an Army; sic how idle
 These meditations are: though thou art worse

Than forrows tongue can speak thee, thou art still,
 Or shouldst be, honest Montague.

L. Or. 'Tis too true.

Vir. 'Tis he: what villains hands did this? oh that my flesh
 Were Balm; in faith Sir, I would pluck it off
 As readily as this; pray you accept
 My will to do you service: I have heard
 The Mouse once sav'd the Lyon in his need,
 As the poor Scarab spild the Eagles seed.

L. Or. How do you?

Mont. As a forsaken man.

L. Or. Do not say so, take comfort,
 For your misfortunes have been kind in this,
 To cast you on a hospitable h
 Where dwels a Lady--

Vir. She to whom, good Master,
 You prefer'd me.

L. Or. In whose house, whatsoever
 Your dangers are, I'll undertake your safety.

Mont. I fear that I am pursued, and doubt that I,
 In my defence have kild an Officer.

Vir. Is that all? there's no law under the Sun
 But will I hope confess, one drop of blood
 Shed from this arme is recompence enough
 Though you had cut the throats of all the Catchpoles
 In France, nay in the world.

Mont. I would be loth
 To be a burthen, or feed like a drone
 On the industrious labor of a Bee,
 And baser far I hold it to owe for
 The bread I eat, what's not in me to pay;
 Then since my full fortunes are declin'd,
 To their low ebb I'll fashion my high mind.
 It was no shame to Hecuba, to serve
 When Troy was fir'd: if't be in your power
 To be a means to make her entertainment,
 And far from that I was; but to supply
 My want with habit fit for him that serves,
 I shall owe much to you.

L. Or. Leave that care to me.

Vir. Good Sir, lean on my shoulder; help good Madam: oh that I were a horse for half an hour, that I might carry you home on my back: I hope you will love me still?

Mont. Thou dost deserve it boy, that I should live
 To be thus troublesome.

L. Or. Good Sir, 'tis none.

Vir. Trouble? most willingly I would be chang'd
 Like Apuleius, weare his Asses ears,
 Provided I might still this burthen bear.

L. Or. 'Tis a kind boy.

Mont. I find true proof of it.

Exeunt.

Enter Amiens, and Longeville, with a Paper.

Ami. You'll carry it.

Long. As I live although my packet were like Bellerophon's, what have you seen in me or my behavior since your favors so plentifully show'd upon my wants, that may beget distrust of my performance?

Ami. Nay, be not angry, if I entertained
 But the least scruple of your love, or courage,
 I would make choyce of one which my estate
 Should do me right in this, nor can you blame me
 If in a matter of such consequence
 I am so importunate.

Long. Good my Lord let me prevent your farther conjurations

To rayse my spirit, I know this is a challenge
 To be delivered unto Orleane hand,
 And that my undertaking ends not there,

But

But I must be your second, and in that
Not alone search your enemy, measure weapons,
But stand in all your hazards, as our blouds
Ran in the self-same veins, in which if I
Better not your opinion, as a limb
That's putrid and useles, cut me off,
And underneath the Gallows bury it.

Ami. As full you understand me, and in this
Bind me, and what's mine to you and yours,
I will not so much wrong you as to add
One syllable more, let it suffice I leave
My honor to your guard: and in that prove,
You hold the first place in my heart and love. Ex. Ami.

Long. The first place in a Lords affection? very good;
and how long doth that last? perhaps the changing of some three shirts in the Tennis-Court; well, it were very necessary that an order were taken (if it were possible,) that younger brothers might have more wit, or more money:
for now, however the fool hath long been put upon him that inherits, his revenue hath bought him a sponge, and wip't off the imputation, and for the understanding of the younger, let him get as much Rhetorick as he can, to grace his language.

Enter Dubois.

They will see, he shall have gloss little enough to set out his Bark; stand Dubois, look about, 's all safe?

Dub. Approach not near me but with reverence Lawrel and adorations, I have done more than deserves, a hundred thanks.

Long. How now, what's the matter?

Dub. With this hand, only aided by this brain,
Without an Orpheus Harp redeem'd from Hells
Three headed Porter, our Euridice.

Long. Nay, prethee speak fence, this is like the stale bragart in a Play.

Dub. Then in plain Prose thus, and with as little action as thou canst desire, the three headed Porter, were three unexorable Catch-poles, out of whose jaws without the help of Orpheus Harp, bait or bribe; for those two strings make the Musick, that molifies those flinty furies, I rescued our Euridice, I mean my old Master Montague.

Long. And is this all? a poor rescue; I thought thou hadst revers'd the judgement for his overthrow in his fate, or wrought upon his adversary Orleance, taken the shape of a Ghost, frighted his mind into distraction, and for the appeasing of his conscience, forc'd him to make restitution of Montague's Lands, or such like rescue; S'light I would have hired Acrocheture for two Cardekues, to have done so much with his whip.

Dub. You wood Sir and yet 'tis more than three on their foot-cloaths, durst do for a sworn Brother, in a Coach.

Long. Besides, what proof's of it? for ought I know, this may be a trick, I had rather have him a prisoner, where I might visit him, and do him service, than not at all, or I know not where.

Dub. Well Sir, the end will shew it, what's that, a challenge?

Long. Yes, where's Orleance? though we fight in jest, he must meet with Amiens in earnest, - fall off, we are discovered; my horse garçon; ha!

Dub. Were it not in a house, and in his presence,
To whom I owe all duty—

Long. What would it do? prate as it does? but be as far from striking, as he that owes it Orleance. Dub. How?

Long. I think thou art his Porter,
Set here to answer creditors, that his Lordship
Is not within, or takes the diet: I am sent,
And will grow here until I have an answer,
Not to demand a debt of money, but
To call him to a strict account for wrong
Done to the honors of a Gentleman,
Which nothing but his heart-bloud shall wash off.

Dub. Shall I hear this?

Long. And more, that if I may not Have access to him, I will fix this here

To his disgrace and thine.

Dub. And thy life with it.

Long. Then have the copies of it pasted on posts,
Like Pamphlet Titles, that sue to be sold;
Have his disgrace talk for Tobacco-shops,
His picture balled.

Dub. All respect away, wa't in a Church—draw bath.

Long. This is the book I pray with.

Enter Orleance.

Orl. Forbear upon your lives.

Long. What are you rouz'd? I hope your Lordship can read (though he stain not his birth with Scholarship) doth it not please you now? if you are a right Mounseieur, mulster up the rest of your attendance, which is a Page, a Cook, a Pander, Coach-man, and a Footman, in these days a great Lords train, pretending I am unworthy to bring you a challenge, instead of answering it, have me kick'd.

Dub. If he does, thou deserv't it.

Long. I dare you all to touch me, I'll not stand still,
What answer?

Orl. That thou hast done to Amiens
The office of a faithful friend, which I
Would cherish in thee, were he not my foe,
How ever since on honourable terms
He calls me forth, say I will meet with him,
And by Dubois e'r Sun-set make him know
The time and place, my sword's length, and what ever
Scruple of circumstance he can expect.

Long. This answer comes unlookt for, fare you well,
Finding your temper thus, wou'd I had said less. Exit.

Orl. Now comes thy love to the test.

Dub. My Lord, 'twill hold,
And in all dangers prove it self true Gold. Exeunt.

Enter Laverdine, La-poop, Malicorn, servant

Ser. I will acquaint my Lady with your coming.
Please you repose your selves here.

Mal. There's a Tester, nay, now I am a wooer, I must be bountiful.

Ser. If you would have two three-pences for it Sir,
To give some of your kindred as you ride, I'll see if I can get them; we use not (tho servants) to take bribes. Ex.

Lav. Then thou art unfit to be in office, either in Court or City.

La-p. Indeed, corruption is a Tree, whose branches are of an unmeasurable length, they spread every where, and the dew, that drops from thence, hath infected some chairs and stools of authority.

Mal. Ah Captain! lay not all the fault upon Officers, you know you can shark, tho you be out of action, witness Montague.

Lav. Hang him, he's safe enough; you had a hand in it too, and have gained by him; but I wonder you Citizens, that keep so many books, and take such strict accounts for every farthing due to you from others, reserve not so much as a memorandum for the courtesies you receive.

Mal. Would you have a Citizen book those? thankfulness is a thing, we are not sworn to in our Indentures: you may as well urge conscience.

Lav. Talk no more of such vanities, Mountague is irrecoverably sunk, I would we had twenty more to send after him; the Snake that would be a Dragon, and have wings, must eat; and what implies that, but this, that in this Cannibal age, he that would have the sute of wealth, must not care—whom he feeds on? and as I have heard, no flesh battens better, then that of a profest friend; and he that would mount to honor, must not make dainty to use the head of his mother, back of his Father, or neck of his Brother, for ladders to his preferment; for, but observe, and you shall find for the most part, cunning villany sit at a Feast as principal guest, and innocent honesty wait as a contemn'd servant with a trencher.

La-p. The Ladies.

U u u

Enter.

Enter Montague bare-headed, Lamira, Lady Orleance, Charlotte and Voramour, Mont. Do ye smell nothing?

Char. Not I Sir.

Mont. The carrion of knaves is very strong in my nostrils

Lav. we came to admire, and find Fame was a niggard, Which we thought prodigal in our report before we saw you.

Lam. Tush Sir, this Courtship's old.

La-p. I'll fight for thee, sweet wench, This is my tongue, and woes for me.

Lam. Good man of War, Hands off; if you take me, it must be by siege, Not by an onset; and for your valour, I think that I have deserved few enemies, And therefore need it not.

Mal. Thou need'st nothing, sweet Lady, but an obsequious husband, and where wilt thou find him, if not in the City? We are true Muscovites to our Wives, and are never better pleased; than when they use us as leaves, bridle and Saddle us; Have me, thou shalt command all my wealth as thine own, thou shalt sit like a Queen in my Ware-house; And my Factors at the return with my ships, shall pay thee tribute of all the rarities of the earth, thou shalt wear gold, feed on delicates, the first Peacocks, Strawberries, Grapes, Cherries shall—

Lam. Be mine? I apprehend what you would say, Those dainties which the City pays so dear for, The Countrey yields for nothing, and as early; And, credit me, your far-fet viands please not My appetite better than those that are near hand. Then for your promis'd service and subjection To all my humors, when I am your wife, Which is as it seems, is frequent in the City, I cannot find what pleasure they receive In using their fond Husbands like their Maids; But of this, more hereafter: I accept Your proffer kindly, and yours; my house stands open To entertain you, take your pleasure in it; And ease after your journey.

La. Orl. Do you note the boldness of the fellows?

Lam. Alas Madam, a Virgin must in this be like a Lawyer, And as he takes all Fees, she must hear all suitors; the One for gain, the other for her mirth; stay with the Gentlemen, we'll to the Orchards.

Exeunt Lamira, Lady Orleance, Vera. and Charl.

La-p. ——— What art thou?

Mont. An honest man, though poor; And look they like to monsters, are they so rare?

Lav. Rose from the dead.

Mal. Do you hear Monsieur Servitude, didst thou never hear of one Montague, a prodigal gull, that lives about Paris?

Mont. So Sir.

Lav. One that after the loss of his main estate in a Law-sute, bought an Office in the Court.

La-p. And should have Letters of Mari, to have the Spanish treasure as it came from the Indies; were not thou and he twins? put off thy Hat, let me see thy Fore-head.

Mont. Though you take priviledge to use your tongue, I pray you hold your fingers, 'Twas your base cozenages made me as I am: And were you somewhere else, I would take off This proud film from your eyes, that will not let you, Know I am Montague.

Enter Lamira behind the Arras.

Lam. I will observe this better.

Lav. And art thou he? I will do thee grace; give me thy hand: I am glad thou hast taken so good a course; serve God, and please thy Mistress; if I prove to be thy Master, as I am very likely, I will do for thee.

Mal. Faith the fellow's well made for a Serving-man, and will no doubt, carry a chine of Beef with a good grace.

La-p. Prethee be careful of me in my chamber, I will remember thee at my departure.

Mont. All this I can endure under this roof, And so much owe I her, whose now I am, That no wrong shall incense me to molest, Her quiet house, while you continue here, I will not be ashamed to do you service More than to her, because such is her pleasure. But you that have broke thrice, and fourteen times Compounded for two shillings in the pound, Know I dare kick you in your shop; do you hear? If ever I see Paris, though an Army Of musty Murrions, rusty brown Bills and Clubs, Stand for your guard — I have heard of your tricks, And you that smell of Amber at my charge, And triumph in your cheat; well, I may live To meet thee, be it among a troop of such That are upon the fair face of the Court Like running Ulcers, and before thy whore Trampel upon thee.

La-p. This a language for a Livery? take heed, I am a Captain.

Mont. A Coxcomb are you not? that thou and I, To give proof, which of us dares most, were now In midst of a rough Sea, upon a piece Of a split Ship, where only one might ride, Lamira from the Arras.

I would — but foolish anger makes me talk Like a Player.

Lam. Indeed you act a part Doth ill become you my servant; is this your duty?

Mont. I crave your pardon, and will hereafter be more circumspect.

Lav. Oh the power of a Womans tongue: it hath done more than we three with our swords durst undertake; put a mad man to silence.

Lam. Why firrah, these are none of your comrades To drink with in the Cellar; one of them For ought you know, may live to be your Master.

La-p. There's some comfort yet.

Lam. Here's choice of three, a wealthy Merchant.

Mal. Hem, she's taken, she hath spy'd my good Calf, And many Ladies chuse their Husbands by that.

Lam. A Courtier that's in grace, a valiant Captain, And are these mates for you, away, begone.

Mont. I humbly pray you will be pleased to pardon, And to give satisfaction to you Madam, (Although I break my heart) I will confess That I have wrong'd them too, and make submission.

Lam. No I'll spare that; go bid the Cook haste supper.

Exit Mont.

La-p. Oh brave Lady, thou art worthy to have servants, to be commandres of a Family, that knowest how to use and govern it.

Lav. You shall have many Mistresses that will so mistake, as to take their Horse-keepers, and Footmen instead of their Husbands, thou art none of those.

Mal. But she that can make distinction of men, and knows when she hath gallants, and fellows of rank and quality in her house —

Lam. Gallants indeed, if it be the Gallants fashion To triumph in the miseries of a man, Of which they are the cause: one that transcends (In spite of all that fortune hath, or can be done) A million of such things as you, my doors Stand open to receive all such as wear The shape of Gentlemen, and my gentler nature (I might say weaker) weighs not the expence Of entertainment; think you I'll forget yet What's due unto my self? do not I know, That you have dealt with poor Montague, but like Needy Commanders, cheating Citizens,

And

And perjur'd Courtiers? I am much mov'd, else use not
To say so much, if you will bear your selves
As fits such, you would make me think you are,
You may stay; if not, the way lies before you. Exit.

Mal. What think you of this Captain?

La-p. That this is a bawdy-house, with Pinacles and Turrets, in which this disguised Montague goes to Rut gratis, and that this is a landed pandress, and makes her house a brothel for charity.

Mal. Come, that's no miracle; but from whence derive you the supposition?

La-p. Observe but the circumstance; you all know that in the height of Mountagues prosperity, he did affect, and had his love return'd by this Lady Orleans; since her divorcement, and his decay of estate, it is known they have met, not so much as his boy but is wanting; and that this can be any thing else than a meer plot for their night-work, is above my imagination to conceive.

Mal. Nay, it carries probability, let us observe it better, but yet with such caution, as our prying be not discovered:
here's all things to be had without cost, and therefore good staying here.

La-p. Nay, that's true, I would we might wooe her twenty years, like Penelopes sutors; come Laverdine.

Exeunt Malli. La Poop.

La-p. I follow instantly, yonder he is.

Enter Viramor.

The thought of this boy hath much cool'd my affection to his Lady, and by all conjectures, this is a disguised whore;
I will try if I can search this Mine, Page —

Ver. Your pleasure, Sir?

La-p. Thou art a pretty boy.

Ver. And you a brave man: now I am out of your debt.

La-p. Nay, prethee stay.

Ver. I am in haste, Sir.

La-p. By the faith of a Courtier.

Ver. Take heed what you say, you have taken a strange oath.

La-p. I have not seen a youth that hath pleased me better; I would thou couldst lie me, so far as to leave thy Lady and wait on me, I would maintain thee in the bravest cloaths.

Ver. Though you took them up on trust, or bought 'em at the Brokers.

La-p. Or any way: then thy employments should be so neat and cleanly, thou shouldst not touch a pair of pan-tables in a month, and thy lodging —

Ver. Should be in a brothel.

La-p. No, but in mine arms.

Ver. That may be the circle of a Bawdy-house, or worse.

La-p. I mean thou should'st lye with me.

Ver. Lie with you? I had rather lye with my Ladies
Monkey; 'twas never a good world, since our French
Lords learned of the Neapolitans, to make their Pages their Bed-fellows, doth more hurt to the Suburb Ladies, than twenty dead vacations; 'Tis supper time, Sir.

Exit Veram.

La-p. I thought so, I know by that 'tis a woman, for because, peradventure she hath made trial of the Monkey, she prefers him before me, as one unknown; well, these are standing creatures, and have strange desires; and men must use strange means to quenceh strange fires.

Exit.

Aclus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Montague alone in mean habit.

Mont. NOW Montague, who discerns thy spirit now?
Thy breeding, or thy blood? here's a poor cloud

Eclipseth all thy splendor; who can read
In thy pale face, dead eye, or lenten shute,
The liberty thy ever-giving hand
Hath bought for others, manacling it self
In gyves of parchment indissoluble?
The greatest hearted man supplied with means,
Nobility of birth and gentlest parts,
I thought the right hand of his Sovereign,
If virtue quit her seat in his high soul,
Glitters but like a Palace set on fire,
Whose glory whilst it shines, but ruins him,
And his bright show each hour to ashes tending
Shall at the last be rak'd up like a sparkle,
Unless mens lives and fortunes feed the flame.
Not for my own wants, though blame I my Stars,
But suffering others to cast love on me,
When I can neither take, nor thankful be.
My Ladies woman, fair and virtuous
Young as the present month, sollicites me
For love and marriage now being nothing worth —

Enter Veramour.

Ver. Oh! Master, I have sought you a long hour,
Good faith, I never joy'd out of your sight;
For Heavens sake, Sir, be merry) or else bear
The buffets of your fortunes with more scorn;
Do but begin to rail, teach me the way,
And I'll sit down, and help your anger forth:
I have known you wear a suit, full worth a Lordship,
Give to a man whose need ne'er frighted you
From calling of him friend, five hundred Crowns
E'er sleep had left your senses to consider
Your own important present uses; yet
Since I have seen you with a tencher wait,
Void of all scorn, therefore I'll wait on you.

Mont. Would Heaven thou wert less honest.

Ver. Would to Heaven you were less worthy: I am ev'n w'e Sir.

Mon. Is not thy Master strangely fall'n, when thou
Servest for no wages, but for charity?
Thou dost surcharge me with thy plenteous love:
The goodness of thy virtue shown to me,
More opens still my disability
To quit thy pains: credit me loving boy,
A free and honest nature may be oppress'd,
Tir'd with courtesies from a liberal spirit,
When they exceed his means of gratitude.

Ver. But 'tis a due in him that to that end
Extends his love or duty,

Mont. Little world

Of virtue, why dost love and follow me?

Ver. I will follow you through all Countreys,
I'll run (fast as I can) by your horse side,
I'll hold your stirrop when you do alight,
And without grudging, wait till you return:
I'll quit offer'd means, and expose my self
To cold and hunger, still to be with you;
Fearless I'll travel through a wilderness,
And when you are weary, I will lay me down
That in my bosom you may rest your head,
Where whilst you sleep, I'll watch, that no wild beast
Shall hurt or trouble you: and thus we'll breed a story

To make every hearer weep,

When they discourse our fortunes and our loves,

Mont. Oh what a scoff might men of women make,
If they did know this boy? but my desire
Is, that thou wouldest not (as thou usest still:
When like a servant, I'mong servants sit)
Wait on my Trencher, fill my cups with Wine:
Why should'st thou do this boy? prethee consider,
I am not what I was.

Ver. Could be the day when I forget that Montague was my Lord, or not remember him my Master still.

Mont. Rather curse me, with whom thy youth hath spent,
So many hours, and yet untaught to live
By any worldly quality.

Ver. Indeed you never taught me how to handle Cards
To cheat and cozen men with oaths and lies:
Those are the worldly qualities to live:
Some of our scarlet Gallants teach their boys
These worldly qualities.
Since stumbling fortune then leaves virtue thus
Let me leave fortune, e'r be vicious.

Mont. Oh lad, thy love will kill me.

Ver. In truth, I think in conscience I shall dye for you:
Good Master weep not, do you want aught, Sir?
Will you have any money, here's some Silver;
And here's a little Gold, 'twill serve to play,
And put more troublesome thoughts out of your mind:
I pray Sir take it, I'll get more with singing.
And then I'll bring it you, my Lady ga't me,
And—it was not covetousness,
But I forgot to tell you sooner on't.

Mont. Alas boy, thou art not bound to tell it me,
And less to give it, buy thee Scarfs and Garters,
And when I have money, I will give thee a sword:
Nature made thee a beauteous Cabinet
To lock up all all the goodness of the earth.

Enter Charlotte.

Ver. I have lost my voice with the very sight of this Gentlewoman? good Sir steal away, you were wont to be a curious avoider of womens company.

Mont. Why boy, thou dar'st trust me any where, dar'st thou not?

Ver. I had rather trust you by a roaring Lion, than a ravening woman.

Mont. Why boy?

Ver. Why truly she devours more mans flesh——

Mont. I, but she roars not boy.

Ver. No Sir, why she is never silent but when her mouth is full.

Charl. Monsieur Montague.

Mont. My sweet fellow, since you please to call me so,

Ver. Ah my conscience, she wou'd be pleas'd well enough to call you bed-fellow: oh Master, do not hold her by the hand so: a woman is a Lime-bush, that catcheth all the toucheth.

Charl. I do most dangerously suspect this boy to be a wench; art thou not one? come hither, let me feel thee.

Ver. With all my heart.

Charl. Why dost thou pull off thy Glove?

Ver. Why, to feel whether you be a boy, or no.

Charl. Fic boy, go too. I'll not look your head, nor comb your locks any more, if you talk thus.

Ver. Why, I'll sing to you no more then.

Charl. Fic upon't, how sad you are? a young Gentleman that was the very Sun of France.

Mont. But I am in the eclipse now.

Charl. Suffer himself to be over-run with a Lethargy of melancholy and discontent! rouze up thy spirit, man, and shake it off:

A Noble Soul is like a Ship at Sea,
That sleeps at Anchor when the Ocean's calm;
But when she rages, and the wind blows high,

He cuts his way with skill and Majesty.

I would turn a Fool, or Poet, or any thing, or marry, to make you merry; prethee let's walk: good Veramour, leave thy Master and me, I have earnest business with him.

Ver. Pray do you leave my Master, and me: we were very merry before you came, he does not covet womens company.

What have you to do with him? come Sir will you go?

And I'll sing to you again:

I'faith his mind is stronger than to credit Womens vows, and too pure to be capable of their loves.

Charl. The boy is jealous, sweet lad leave us: my Lady call'd for you I swear: that's a good child, there's a piece of Gold for thee, go buy a Feather.

Ver. There's two pieces for you, do you go and buy one, or what you will, or nothing, so you go. Nay then I see you would have me go. Sir; why, i'faith I will, now I perceive you love her better than you do me; but Heaven bless you whatever you do, or intend, I know you are a very honest man. Exit.

Charl. Still will I wooe thee, whilst thy ears reply I cannot, or I will not marry thee?

Why hast thou drawn the bloud out of my cheeks,

And given a quicker motion to my heart?

Oh thou hast bred a Fever in my veins

Call'd love, which no Physitian can cure;

Have mercy on a Maid, whose simple youth——

Mont. How your example, fairest, teacheth me
A ceremonious Idolatry! Kneels.

By all the joy of love, I love thee better,

Than I or any man can tell another;

And will express the mercy which thou crav'st,

I will forbear to marry thee: consider

Thou art Nature's heir in feature, and thy parents,

In fair Inheritances; rise with these thoughts,

And look on me; but with a womans eye,

A decaid fellow, void of means and spirit.

Charl. Of spirit?

Mont. Yes, could I tamely live,
Forget my Fathers bloud, wait, and make legs,
Stain my best breeches, with the servile drops
That fall from others draughts. (spirit,

Charl. This vizard wherewith thou wouldest hide thy
Is perspective, to shew it plainlier.

This undervalue of thy life, is but

Because I should not buy thee, what more speaks

Greatness of man, than valiant patience,

That shrinks not under his fates strongest strokes?

These Roman deaths, as falling on a sword,

Opening of veins, with poison quenching thirst,

(Which we erroneously do stile the deeds

Of the heroick and magnanimous man)

Was dead-ey'd cowardize, and white-cheek'd fear,

Who doubting tyranny, and fainting under

Fortunes false Lottery, desperately run

To death, for dread of death; that foul's most stout,

That bearing all mischance, dares last it out;

Will you perform your word, and marry me,

When I shall call you to't?

Enter Longueville with a riding-rod.

Mont. I'faith I will.

Charl. Who's this alights here?

Long. With leave, fair creature, are you the Lady Mistress of the house?

Charl. Her servant, Sir.

Long. I pray then favour me, to inform your Lady, and Duke Orleans wife,

A business of import awaits 'em here,

And craves for speedy answer.

Charl. Are you in post, Sir?

Long. No, I am in Satin; Lady; I would you would be in post.

Charl.

Charl. I will return, Sweet.

Exit.

Long. Honest friend, do you belong to the house?
I pray be covered.

Mont. Yes Sir, I do.

Long. Ha, dream'st thou Longaville? sure 'tis not he: Sir
I should know you.

Mont. So should I you, but that I am ashamed.
But though thou know'st me, prethee Longaville,
Mock not my poverty, pray remember your self;
Shows it not strangely for thy cloaths to stand
Without a Hat to mine? mock me no more.

Long. The—embroider me all over, Sir,
If ever I began to mock you yet.
The—on me, why should I wear Velvet
And Silver Lace?—I will tear it off.

Mont. Why Mad-man?

Long. Put on my Hat? yes, when I am hang'd I will:
—I could break my head.

For holding eyes that knew not you at first:
But time and fortune run your courses with him,
He'll laugh and storm you, when you shew most hate.

Enter Lamira, Orlean's Lady, Laverdine, La Poop, Malycorn, Veramour, Charlot.

Lam. You're a fair Mounseur.

Long. Do you mock me, Lady?

Lam. Your business, Sir, I mean.

Lady. Regard your self good Mounseur Longueville.

Lam. You are too negligent of your self and place,
Cover your head sweet Mounseur.

Long. Mistake me not fair Ladies,
'Tis not to you, nor you, that I stand bare.

Lav. Nay sweet dear Mounseur, let it not be to us then.

La Poop.—A compliment.

Mal. And—of manners.

Pray hide your head, your gallants use to do't.

Long. And you your foreheads, why you needful acceffary rascals,

That cannot live without your mutual knaveries,
More than a Bawd, a Pandor, or a Whore
From one another; how dare you suspect
That I stand bare to you? what make you here?
Shift your house, Lady of 'em, for I know 'em,
They come to steal Napkins, and your Spoons;
Look to your Silver-bodkin, (Gentlewoman)
'Tis a dead Vienfil, and Page 'ware your pockets;
My reverence is unto this man, my Master,
Whom you, with protestations, and oaths
As high as Heaven, as deep as Hell, which would Deceive the wisest man of honest nature,
Have cozen'd and abus'd; but I may meet you,
And beat you one with th' other.

Mont. Peace, no more.

Long. Not a word, Sir.

Lav. I am something thick of hearing; what said he?

La poop. I hear him, but regard him not.

Mal. Nor I, I am never angry fasting.

Long. My love keeps back my duty, noblest Lady;
If Husband or brother merit love from you,
Prevent their dangers, this hour brings to trial
Their hereto sleeping hates; by this time each
Within a yard is of the others heart,
And met to prove their causes and their spirits
With their impartial swords points; haste and save,
Or never meet them more, but at the grave.

Lady. Oh my distracted heart, that my wrackt honor Should for a Brothers, or a Husbands life, through thy undoing, die.

Lam. Amiens engag'd; if he miscarry all my hopes and
I now confess it loudly, are undone: (joys,
Caroch, and haste, one minute may betray
A life more worth than all time can repay.

Exeunt Ladies and Mont.

Mal. Hump: Monsieur Laverdine pursues this boy ex-treamly, Captain, what will you do?

La p. Any thing but follow to this Land-service; I am a Sea-Captain you know, and to offer to part 'em, without we could do't like Watermen with long slaves, a quarter of a mile off, might be dangerous.

Mal. Why then let's retire and pray for 'em, I am resolv'd to stop your intent; abus'd more than we have been we cannot be, without they fall to flat beating on's.

Exeunt Maly, La-poop.

Lav. And that were unkindly done i' faith.

Ver. But you are the troublesomest Ass that e'er I met with; retire, you smell like a womans chamber, that's newly up, before she have pinsh't her vapours in with her cloaths.

Lav. I will haunt thee like thy Grandames Ghost, thou shalt never rest for me.

Ver. Well, I perceive 'tis vain to conceal a secret from you: believe it Sir, indeed I am a woman.

Lav. Why la; I knew't, this Propheticall tongue of mine never fail'd me; my mother was half a witch, never any thing that she forespake, but came to pass: a woman? how happy am I? now we may lawfully come together without fear of hanging; sweet wench, be gracious, in honourable sort I woe, no otherwife.

Ver. Faith, the truth is, I have loved you long.

Lav. See, see.

Ver. But durst not open it.

Lav.— I think so.

Ver. But briefly, when you bring it to the test, if there be not one Gentleman in this house, will challenge more interest in me, than you can, I am at your disposal.

Exit.

Lav. Oh Fortunatus, I envy thee not
For Cap, or pouch, this day I'll prove my Fortune,
In which your Lady doth elect her Husband,
Who will he Amiens, 'twill save my wedding dinner,
Povera, La Poop, and Malicorn: if all fail,
I will turn Citizen, a beauteous wife
Is the Horn-book to the richest Tradesmans life.

Exeunt.

*Enter Duboys, Orleans, Longueville, Amiens, two

Dub. Here's a good even piece of ground my Lords:
Will you fix here?

Orl. Yes, any where; Lacquey, take off my spurs;
Upon a bridge, a rail, but my swords breadth upon a battle-
I'll fight this quarrel.

Dub. O' the Ropes, my Lord.

Orl. Upon a Line.

Dub. So all our Countrey Duels are carried, like a firework on a thred.

Orl. Go now, stay with the horses, and, do you hear?
Upon your lives, till some of us come to you,
Dare not to look this way.

Dub. Except you see strangers or others that by chance or purpose are like to interrupt us.

Orl. Then give warning.

Long. Who takes a sword? the advantage is so small,
As he that doubts, hath the free leave to choose.

Orl. Come, give me any, and search me; 'tis not
The ground, weapon, or seconds that can make Odds in those fatal trials: but the cause.

Ami. Most true, and, but it is no time to wish
When men are come to do, I would desire
The cause 'twixt us were other than it is;
But where the right is, there prevail our Swords.
And if my Sister have out-liv'd her honor,
I do not pray I may out-live her shame.

Orl. Your Sister Amiens, is a whore, at once.

Ami. You oft have spoke that sence to me before,
But never in ths language Orleance;
And when you spoke it fair, and first, I told you

That

That it was possible you might be abus'd :
 But now, since you forget your manners, you shall find,
 If I transgress my custom, you do lye,
 And are a villain, which I had rather yet
 My sword had prov'd, than I been forc'd to speak:
 Nay, give us leave, and since you stand so haughtily
 And highly on your cause, let you and I,
 Without engaging these two Gentlemen, singly determine Long. My Lord, you'll pardon us. (it.
Dub. I trust your Lordships may not do us that affront.
Ami. As how?
Dub. We kiss your Lordships hand, and come to serve you here with swords.
Long. My Lord, we understand our selves.
Dub. We have had the honor to be call'd unto the businesses, and we must not now quit it on terms.
Ami. Not terms of reason?
Long. No, no treason for the quitting of our calling.
Dub. True, if I be call'd to't I must ask no reason.
Long. Nor hear none neither, which is less :
 It is a favour, if my throat be cut,
 Your Lordship does me; which I never can,
Noise within, crying down with your swords.
 Nor must have hope how to requite: what noise?
 What cry is that my Lord upon your guard?
 So, treachery is a foot.

Enter Lady Orleans, Lamira, Montague.

Lady. Oh here they are:
 My Lord (dear Lady help me) help me all;
 I have so woful interest in both,
 I know not which to fear for most: and yet
 I must prefer my Lord. Dear brother,
 You are too understanding, and too noble
 To be offended, when I know my duty,
 Though scarce my tears will let me so to do it.
Orl. Out-loathed strumpet.
Lady. Oh my dearest Lord,
 If words could on me cast the name of whore,
 I then were worthy to be loath'd; but know,
 Your unkindness cannot make me wicked;
 And therefore should less use that power upon me.
Orl. Was this your Art to make these Actors come,
 To make this interlude? withdraw, cold man,
 And if thy spirit be not frozen up,
 Give me one stroke yet at thee for my vengeance.
Ami. Thou shalt have strokes, and strokes, thou glorious
 man,
 Till thou breath'st thinner air than that thou talkest.
Lam. My Lord, Count Amiens.
Lady. Princely Husband.
Orl. Whore.
 You wrong her impudent Lord; oh that I had the bulk
 Of those dull men; look how they stand, and no man
 Will revenge an innocent Lady.
Ami. You hinder it Madam.
Lam. I would hinder you; is there none else to kill him?
Lady. Kill him, Madam? have you learn'd that bad language? oh repent,
 And be the motive, rather both kill me.
Orl. Then dye my infamy.
Mont. Hold bloody man.
Orl. Art thou there Basilisk?
Mont. To strike thee dead, but that thy fate deserves some weightier hand.
Dub. Sweet my Lord.
Orl. Oh here's a plot; you bring your champions with you; the adulteress with the adulterer: Out-howling——
Dub. Good my Lord.
Orl. Are you her Graces countenancer, Lady, the receiver to the poor vicious couple.
Dub. Sweet my Lord.

Orl. Sweet rascal, didst not thou tell me, false fellow,
 This Montague here was murdered?
Dub. I did so; but he was falser, and a worthless Lord,
 Like thy foul self that would have had it so.
Long. Orleanse 'tis true, and shall be prov'd upon thee.
Mont. Thy malice Duke, and thisthy wicked nature, are all as visible as thou; but I born to contemnthy injuries, do know, that though thy greatness may corrupt a Jury, and make a Judge afraid, and carry out a world of evils with thy Title: yet thou art not quiet at home, thou bear-est about thee that, that doth charge thee, and condemn thee too. The thing that grieves me more, and doth indeed displeaseme, is, to think that so much baseness stands here to have encountred so much honor: Pardon me my Lord, what late my passion spake, when you provok'd my innocence.
Orl. Yes, do, oh! flattery becomes him better than the suit he wears; give him a new one, Amiens.
Ami. Orleanse, 'tis here no time nor place, to jest or rail
 Poorly with you, but I will find a time to Whisper you forth to this, or some fit place;
 As shall not hold a second interruption.
Mont. I hope your Lordships honor, and your life
 Are destined unto higher hazards; this is of A meaner arm.
Dub. Yes faith, or none.
Long. He is not fit to fall by an honest Sword,
 A Prince and lye!
Dub. And slander, and hire men
 To publish the false rumours he hath made.
Long. And stick 'em on his friends, and innocents.
Dub. And practice against their lives after their fames.
Long. In men that are the matter of all lewdness,
 Bawds, Thieves, and Cheaters, it were monstrous.
Dub. But in a man of blood, how more conspicuous?
Ami. Can this be?
Lady. They do slander him.
Orl. Hang them, a pair of railing hangbics.
Long. How? stand Orleanse; stay, give me my Pistols boy, Hinder me not, by——
 I will kill him
Lady. Oh, stay his fury,
Ami. Longueville, my friend.
Long. Not for my self, my Lord, but for mankind,
 And all that have an interest to virtue,
 Or title unto innocence.
Ami. Why hear me.
Long. For justice sake.
Ami. That cannot be.
Long. To punish his wives, your honor, and my Lords wrongs here, whom I must ever call so; for your loves
 I'll swear I'll sacrifice——
Ami. Longueville, I did not think you a murtherer before.
Long. I care not what you thought me.
Ami. By—— If thou attempt
 His life, thy own is forfeit.
Mont. Foolish frantick man, the murder will be of us, not him.
Lady. Oh Heaven!
Mont. We could have kill'd him, but we would not take
 The justice out of fates.——
 Sinsge but a hair of him, thou diest.
Long. No matter, shoot.
Ami. Villain.
Dub. My Lord, your Sister is slain.
Ami. Biancha?
Mont. Oh hapless, and most wretched chance. (made?
Lam. Standst thou looking upon the mischief thou hast
 Thou godless man, feeding thy blood-shot eyes
 With the red spectacle, and art not turn'd to stone
 With horror? Hence, and take the wings of thy black
 Infamy, to carry thee beyond the shoot of looks,
 Or sound of curses, which will pursue thee still:
 Thou

Thou hast out-fled all but thy guilt.

Orl. Oh wish it off again, for I am crack'd
Under the burden, and my heart will break.
How heavy guilt is, when men come to feel?
If you could know the mountain I sustain
With horror, you would each take off your part,
And more, to ease me: I cannot stand,
Forgive where I have wrong'd, I pray.

Ami. Look to him Montague. (for fear,

Long. My Lords and Gentlemen, the Lady is well, but Culeis that have shot her;

I have the worst on't, that needs would venture
Upon a trick had like to ha' cost my guts:
Look to her, she'll be well, it was but Powder
I charg'd with, thinking that a guilty man
Would have been frighted sooner; but I'm glad He's come at last.

Lan. How is Byncha? well?

Ami. Lives she? see Sister, doth she breathe?

Lady. Oh Gentlemen, think you I can breathe,
That am restored to the hate'ul sense
Of feeling in me my dear husbands death?
Oh no, I live not; life was that I left;
And what you have call'd me to, is death indeed:
I cannot weep so fast as he doth bleed.

Dub. Pardon me, Madam, he is well.

Lady. Ha' my Husband.

Orl. I cannot speak whether my joy or shame
Be greater, but I thank the Heavens for both.
Oh look not black upon me, all my friends,
To whom I will be reconcil'd, or grow unto
This earth, till I have wept a trench
That shall be great enough to be my grave,
And I will think them too most manly tears,
if they do move your pities: it is true,
Man should do nothing that he should repent;
But if he have, and say that he is sorry,
It is a worse fault, if he be not truly.

Lam. My Lord, such sorrow cannot be suspected:
Here take your honoured wife, and joyn your hands.

—She hath married you again:
And Gentlemen, I do invite you all,
This night to take my house, where on the morrow,
To heighten more the reconciling feast,
I'll make my self a Husband and a guest.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Montague, and Charlotte.

Charl. Well now I am sure you are mine.

Mont. I am sure I am glad
I have one to own then; you'll find me honest
As these days go, enough; poor without question,
Which beggars hold a virtue; give me meat, and I Shall do my work, else knock my shooes off,
And turn me out again.

Char. You are a merry fellow.

Mont. I have no great cause.

Char. Yes, thy love to me.

Mont. That's as we make our game.

Char. Why, you repent then?

Mont. Faith no, worse than I am I cannot be;
Much better I expect not: I shall love you,
And when you bid me go to bed, obey,
Lie still or move, as you shall minister;
Keep a four-Nobles Nag, and a Jack

Merling, learn to love Ale, and play at Two-hand Irish,
And there's then all I aim at.

Char. Nay sweet fellow, I'll make it something better

Mont. If you do, you'll make me worse:
Now I am poor, and willing to do well,
Hold me in that course; of all the Kings creatures,
I hate his coin, keep me from that, and save me;
For if you chance out of your housewivery
To leave a hundred pound or two, bestow it
In Plumb-broth e'r I know it, else I take it;
Seek out a hundred men that want this money,
Share it among 'em, they'll cry noble Montague,
And so I stand again at livery.

Char. You have pretty fancies, Sir, but married once,
This charity will fall home to your self.

Mont. I would it would, I am afraid my looseness
Is yet scarce stopt, though it have nought to work on
But the meer air of what I have had.

Char. Pretty.

Mont. I wonder sweet heart why you'll marry me,
I can see nothing in my self deserves it,
Unless the handsome wearing of a band,
For that's my stock now, or a pair of garters;
Necessity will not let me loose.

Char. I see Sir, a great deal more, a handsome man, a Husband,

To make a right good woman truly happy.

Mont. Lord, where are my eyes, either you are foolish
As wenches once a year are, or far worse,
Extreamly virtuous, can you love a poor man
That relies on cold meat, and cast stockings,
One only suit to his back, which now is mewing?
But what will be the next coat will pose Triptam.
If I should leavy from my friends a fortune:
I could not raise ten groats to pay the Priest now.

Char. I'll do that duty; 'tis not means nor money
Makes me pursue your love, were your mind bankrupt,
I would never love you.

Enter Lamira.

Mont. Peace wench, here's my Lady.

Lam. Nay, never shrink i'th' wetting, for my presence;
D'ye find her willing Montague?

Mont. Willing Madam?

Lam. How dainty you make of it, do not I know
You two love one another?

Mont. Certain Madam, I think ye've revelations of Your Ladyship cannot tell me when I kist her.

Lam. But she can, Sir.

Mont. But she will not Madam;
For when they talk once, 'tis like Fairy-Money,
They get no more close kisses.

Lam. Thou art wanton.

Mont. Heaven knows I need not, yet I would be lusty:
But—my Provender scarce pricks me.

Lam. It shall be mended Montague, I am glad you are grown so merry.

Mont. So am I too Madam.

Lam. You two will make a pretty handsome Consort.

Mont. Yes Madam, if my Fiddle fail me not.

Lam. Your Fiddle? why your Fiddle? I warrant thou meanest madly:

Mont. Can you blame me? alas I am in love.

Char. 'Tis very well, Sir.

Lam. How long have you been thus?

Mont. How thus in love?

Lam. You are very quick, Sir: no, I mean thus pleasant.

Mont.—Ever since I was poor.

Lam. A little wealth would change you then?

Mont. Yes Lady, into another suit, but never more into another man: I'll bar that mainly,
The wealth I get hence-forward shall be charm'd
For ever hurting me, I'll spend it fasting:

As I live noble Lady, there is nothing
I have found directly, cures the melancholy,
But want and wedlock; when I had store of money,
I simper'd sometime, and spoke wondrous wise,
But never laugh'd out-right; now I am empty,
My heart sounds like a Bell, and strikes at both sides.

Lam. You are finely temper'd, Montague. (fended.

Mont. Pardon Lady, if any way my free mirth have of-
'Twas meant to please you: if it prove too saucy,
Give it a frown, and I am ever silenc'd.

Lam. I like it passing well; pray follow it:
This is my day of choice, and shall be yours too,
'Twere pity to delay ye: call to the Steward,
And tell him 'tis my pleasure he should give you
Five hundred Crowns: make your self handsome Montague,
Let none wear better cloaths, 'tis for my credit;
But pray be merry still. (hundreds,

Mont. If I be not, and make a fool of twice as many Clap me in Canvas, Lady. Exeunt.

Enter La-poop, Laverdine, and Malycorne.

Lav. I am strangely glad, I have found the mystery
Of this disguised boy out: I ever trusted
It was a woman; and how happily
I have found it so; and for my self, I am sure,
One that would offer me a thousand pound now
(And that's a pretty sum to make one stagger)
In ready Gold for this concealment, could not Buy my hope of her, she's a dainty wench,
And such a one I find I want extremely,
To bring me into credit: beauty does it.

Mal. Say we should all meach here, and stay the Feast, now, what can the worst be? we have plaid the knaves,
that's without question.

La-p. True, and as I take it, this is the first truth
We told these ten years, and for any thing
I know, may be the last: but grant we are knaves,
Both base and beastly knaves——

Mal. Say so then.

Lav. Well.

La-p. And likewise let it be considered, we have wrong'd,
And most maliciously, this Gentlewoman
We cast to stay with, what must we expect now?

Mal. I, there's the point, we would expect good eating.

La-p. I know we would, but we may find good beating.

Lav. You say true Gentlemen, and by——

Though I love meat as well as any man,
I care not what he be, if a eat a Gods name;
Such a crab-fauce to my meat will turn my pallate.

Mal. There's all the hazard, for the frozen Montague
Has now got spring again, and warmth in him,
And without doubt, dares beat us terribly.
For not to mint the matter, we are cowards,
And have, and shall be beaten, when men please
To call us into cudgeling.

La-p. I feel we are very prone that way.

Lav. The sons of Adam.

La-p. Now, here then rests the state o'th' question;
Whether we yield our bodies for a dinner
To a sound dog-whip? for I promise ye,
If men be given to correction,
We can expect no less; or quietly
Take a hard Egg or two, and ten mile hence
Bait in a ditch, this we may do securely;
For, to stay hereabout will be all one,
If once our moral mischiefs come in memory.

Mal. But pray ye hear me, is not this the day
The Virgin Lady doth elect her Husband?

Lav. The dinner is to that end.

Mal. Very well then, say we all stay, and say we all scape this whipping, and be well entertained, and one of us carry the Lady. (stay, how fitly

La-p. 'Tis a seemly saying, I must confess, but if we
We may apply it to our selves (i'th' end)

Will ask a Christian fear; I cannot see,
If I say true, what special ornaments
Of Art or Nature, (lay aside our lying Whoring and drinking, which are no great virtues)
We are endued withal, to win this Lady.

Mal. Yet Women go not by the best parts ever; that I have found directly.

Lav. Why should we fear then? they choose men
As they feed; sometimes they settle
Upon a White broth'd face, a sweet smooth gallant,
And him they make an end of in a night;
Sometimes a Goose, sometimes a grosser meat,
A rump of Beef will serve 'em at some season,
And fill their belliestoo, though without doubt
They are great devourers: Stock-fish is a dish,
If it be well drest, for the tuffness sake
Will make the proud't of 'em long and leap for't.
They'll run mad for a Pudding, e'r they'll starve,.

La-p. For my own part I care not, come what can come,
If I be whipt, why so be it; if cudgell'd,
I hope I shall out-live it, I am sure
'Tis not the hundredth time I have been serv'd so,
And yet I thank Heaven I am here.

Mal. Here's resolution.

La-p. A little patience, and a rotten Apple
Cures twenty worse diseases; what say you, Sir?

Lav. Marry I say Sir, if I had been acquainted
With lamming in my youth, as you have been
With whipping, and such benefits of nature,
I should do better: as I am, I'll venture,
And if it be my luck to have the Lady,
I'll use my fortune modestly; if beaten,
You shall not hear a word, one I am sure of,
And if the worst fall, she shall be my Physick.
Lets go then, and a merry wind be with us.

Mal. Captain, your shooes are old, pray put 'em off,
And let one sling 'em after us; be bold, Sirs,
And howsoever our fortune falls, lets bear
An equal burden; if there be an odd lash,
We'll part it afterwards.

La-p. I am arm'd at all points. Exeunt

Enter four serving in a Banquet.

1. Then my Lady will have a bedfellow to night.
2. So she says; Heaven! what a dainty arm-full shall he enjoy, that has the launching of her, what a fight she'll make.
3. I marry boys, there will be sport indeed, there will be grappling, she has a murderer lies in her prow, I am afraid will fright his main Mast, Robin.

4. Who dost thou think shall have her of thy conscience, thou art a wife man?

3. If she go the old way, the way of lot, the longest cut sweeps all without question.

1. She has lost a friend of me else; what think ye of the Courtier?

2. Hang him Hedge-hog: h'as nothing in him but a piece of Euphues, and twenty dozen of tweldepenny ribond, all about him, he is but one Pedlers shop of Gloves and Garters, pick-teeth and pomander.

3. The Courtier, marry God blefs her Steven, she is not mad yet, she knows that trindle-tail too well, he's crest-fall'n, and pin-buttock't, with leaping Landressles.

4. The Merchant, sure she will not be so base to have him.

1. I hope so Robin, he'll sell us all to the Moors to make Mummy; nor the Captain.

4. Who Potgun? that's a sweet youth indeed, will he stay, think ye?

3. Yes, without question, and have halfe din'd too, e'r the Grace be done; he's good for nothing in the world but eating, lying and sleeping; what other men devour in drink, he takes in potage, they say h'as been at Sea, a Herring-fishing, for without doubt he dares not hale an Eel-boat, i'th' way of War.

2. I think so, they would beat him off with Butter.

3. When he brings in a prize, unless it be Cockles, or Callis sand to scour with, I'll renounce my Five Mark a year, and all the hidden Art I have in carving, to teach young Birds to whistle Walsingham; leave him to the Lime-Boats; now, what think you of the brave Amiens?

1. That's a thought indeed.

2. I marry, there's a person fit to feed upon a dish so dainty, and he'll do't I warrant him i'th' nick boys, has a body world without end.

4. And such a one my Lady will make no little of; but is not Montague married to day?

3. Yes faith, honest Montague must have his bout too.

2. He's as good a lad as ever turn'd a trencher; must we leave him?

3. He's too good for us, Steven, I'll give him health to his good luck to night i'th' old Beaker, and it shall be Sack too.

4. I must have a Garter; and boys I have bespoken a Posset, some body shall give me thanks fort, 'tas a few toys in't will raise commotions in a bed, lad.

1. Away; my Lady.

Exeunt.

Enter Orleance and his Lady, arm in arm, Amiens, Lamira, Charlotte, like a Bride, Montague brave, Laverdine, Longaville, Dubois, Mallycorn, La-poop.

Lam. Seat your selves noble Lords and Gentlemen, You know your places; many royal welcomes I give your Grace; how lovely shews this change? My house is honor'd in this reconciliation.

Orl. Thus Madam must you do, my Lady now shall see You made a Woman;

And give you some short lessons for your voyage.

Take her instructions Lady, she knows much.

Lam. This becomes you, Sir.

Lam. My Lord must have his Will.

Orl. 'Tis all I can do now, sweet-heart, fair Lady; This to your happy choice, brother Amiens,

You are the man I mean it to.

Ami. I'll pledge you.

Orl. And with my heart.

Ami. With all my love I take it.

Lam. Noble Lords, I am proud ye have done this day, so much content, and me such estimation, that this hour (In this poor house) shall be a league for ever, For so I know ye mean it.

Ami. I do Lady.

Orl. And I my Lord.

Omnes. Y'ave done a work of honor.

Ami. Give me the Cup, where this health stops, let

That man be either very sick, or very simple;

Or I am very angry; Sir, to you;

Madam, methinks this Gentleman might fit too;

He would become the best on's.

Orl. Pray sit down, Sir, I know the Lady of the Feast expects not this day so much old custom.

Ami. Sit down Montague; nay, never blush for the matter.

Mont. Noble Madam, I have too reasons against it, and I dare not; duty to you first, as you are my Lady, and I your poorest servant, next the custom of this days ceremony.

Lam. As you are my servant, I may command you then.

Mont. To my life, Lady.

Lam. Sit down, and here, I'll have it so.

Ami. Sit down man, never refuse so fair a Ladies offer.

Mont. It is your pleasure, Madam, not my pride, And I obey; I'll pledge ye now my Lord, Monsieur Longaville.

Long. I thank you, Sir.

Mont. This to my Lady, and her fair choice to day, and happiness.

Lon. 'Tis a fair health, I'll pledge you though I sink for't.

Lam. Montague you are too modest; come, I'll add a little more wine t'ye, 'twill make you merry, this to the good I wish. —

Mont. Honour'd Lady, I shall forget my self with this great bounty.

Lam. You shall not Sir, give him some Vine,

Ami. By Heaven you are a worthy woman, and that Man is blest can come near such a Lady.

Lami. Such a bleiling wet weather washes.

Mont. At all, I will not go a lip less, my Lord.

Orl. 'Tis well cast, Sir,

Mal. If Montague get more Wine, we are all like to hear on't.

Lav. I do not like that sitting there.

Mal. Nor I, methinks he looks lik a Judge.

La-p. Now have I a kind of grudging of a beating on me, I fear my hot fit:

Mal. Drink apace, there's nothing allays a cudgel like it.

Lami. Montague, now I'll put my choice to you; who do you hold in all this honor'd company, a Husband fit to enjoy thy Lady? speak directly.

Mont. Shall I speak, Madam?

Lami. Montague you shall.

Mont. Then as I have a foul, I'll speak my conscience, Give me more Wine, in vino veritas, Here's to my self, and Montague have a care.

Lami. Speak to th' cause.

Mont. Yes Madam, first I'll begin to thee.

Lav. Have at us.

La-p. Now for a Psalm of mercy.

Mont. You good Monsieur, you that belye the noble name of Courtier, and think your claim good here, hold up your hand; your Worship is endited here, for a vain glorious fool.

Lav. Good, oh Sir.

Mont. For one whose wit

Lies in a ten pound waistcoat; yet not warm; Ye have travell'd like a Fidler to make faces, And brought home nothing but a case of tooth-picks. You would be married and no less than Ladies, And of the best sort can serve you; thou Silk-worm, What hast thou in thee to deserve this woman?

Name but the poorest piece of man, good manners, There's nothing sound about thee, faith, th'ast none, It lies pawn'd at thy Silk-man's, for so much Lace; Thy credit with his wife cannot redeem it, Thy cloaths are all the soul thou hast, for so Thou sav'st them handsome for the next great tilting, Let who will take the t'other, thou wert never christen'd (Upon my conscience) but in Barbers water; Thou art never out o'th' Basin, thou art rotten, And if thou dar'st tell truth, thou wilt confess it; — Thy skin

Looks of a Chestnut colour, greaz'd with Amber, All women that on earth do dwell, thou lov'st,

Yet none that understand, love thee again, But those that love the Spittle; get thee home Poor painted Butter-flie, the Summers pait; Go sweat, and eat dry Mutton, thou may'st live To do so well yet; a bruise'd Chamber-Maid May fall upon thee, and advance thy follies. You have your sentence; now it follows Captain,

I treat of you.

La-p. Pray Heaven I may deserve it.

Orl. Beshrew my heart, he speaks plain.

Ami. That's plain dealing.

Mont. You are a rascal Captain.

La-p. A fine Calling.

Mont. A Water-coward.

Ami. He would make a pretty stuff.

Mont. May I speak freely, Madam?

Lami. Here's none ties you.

Mont. Why shouldst thou dare come hither with a (thought To find a wife here fit for thee? are all Thy single money whores that fed on Carrrots,

End fill'd the high Grass with familiars all'n off to Footmen; prethee tell me truly,
For now I know thou dar'st not lie, couldst thou not
With thy self beaten well with all thy heart now,
And out of pain? say that I broke a rib,
Or cut thy nose off, wer't not merciful for this ambition?

La-p. Do your pleasure, Sir, beggars must not be choosers.
Orl. He longs for beating.

Mont. But that I have nobler thoughts possess my soul,
Than such brown Bisket, such a piece of Dog-fish,
Such a most maungy Mackril eater as thou art,
That dares do nothing that belongs to th' Sea,
But spue, and catch Rats, and fear men of War,
Though thou hast nothing in the world to loose
Aboard thee, but one piece of Beef, one Musket
Without a cock for peace sake, and a Pitch-barrel,
I'll tell thee, if my time were not more pretious
Than thus to loose it, I would rattle thee,
It may be beat thee, and thy pure fellow,
The Merchant there of Catskins, till my words,
Or blows, or both, made ye two branded wretches
To all the world hereafter; you would fain to Venture your Bills of lading for this Lady;
What would you give now for her? some five frayl
Of rotten Figs, good Godson, would you not, Sir?
Or a Parrot that speaks High Dutch? can all thou ever saw'st
Of thine own fraughts from Sea, or cosenage
(At which thou art as expert as the Devil)
Nay, sell thy soul for wealth to, as thou wilt do,
Forfeit thy friends, and raise a mint of Money,
Make thee dream all these double, could procure
A kiss from this good Lady? canst thou hope
She would lye with such a nook of Hell as thou art,
And hatch young Merchant-furies? oh ye dog-bolts!
That fear no Hell but Dunkirk, I shall see you
Serve in a lowly Lime-boat, e'r I dye,
For mouldy Cheese and Butter, Billinggate
Would not endure, or bring in rotten Pippins
To cure blew eyes, and swear they came from China.

Lami. Vex 'em no more, alas they shake:

Mont. Down quickly on your marrow-bones, and thank this Lady.

I would not leave you thus else, there are blankets,
And such delights for such knaves; but fear still;
'Twill be revenge enough to keep you waking.
Ye have no mind of marriage, ha' ye?

La-p. Surely no great mind now.

Mont. Nor you.

Mal. Nor I, I take it.

Mont. Two eager suitors.

Lov. Troth 'tis wondrous hot, Heaven bless us from him.

Lami. You have told me Montagne
Who are not fit to have me, let me know
The man you would point out for me

Mont. There he sits; my Lord of Amiens, Madam, is my choice, he's noble every way, and worthy a wife with all the dowries of —

Ami. Do you speak Sir, out of your friendship to me?

Mont. Yes my Lord, and out of truth, for I could never flatter.

Ami. I would not say how much I owe you for it,
For that were but a promise, but I'll thank ye,
As now I find you, in despite of fortune,
A fair and noble Gentleman. (made

Lami. My Lords, I must confess the choice this man hath is every way a great one, if not too great,
And no way to be slighted: yet because
We love to have our own eyes sometimes new,
Give me a little liberty to see,
How I could fit my self, if I were put to't.

Ami. Madam we must.

Lami. Are ye all agreed?

Omnes. We be.

Lami. Then as I am a Maid, I shall choose here.

Montagne I must have thee.

Mont. Why Madam, I have learnt to suffer more Than you cau(out of pity) mock me with this way especially.

Lami. Thou think'st I jest now;
But by the love I bear thee, I will have thee.

Mont. If you could be so weak to love a fall'n man,
He must deserve more than I ever can,
Or ever shall (dear Lady;) look but this way
Upon that Lord, and you will tell me then
Your eyes are no true choosers of good men.

Ami. Do you love him truly?

Lami. Yes my Lord, I will obey him truly, for I'll marry him, and justly think he that has so well serv'd me with his obedience, being born to greatness, must use me nobly of necessity, when I shall serve him.

Ami. 'Twere a deep sin to cross ye, noble Montagne,
I wish ye all content, and am as happy
In my friends good as it were meerly mine.

Mont. Your Lordship does ill to give up your right;
I am not capable of this great goodness,
There sits my wife that holds my troth.

Cha. I'll end all, I wooed you for my Lady, and now give up my Title, alas poor wench, my aims are lower far.

Mont. How's this sweet-heart?

Lami. Sweet-heart 'tis so, the drift was mine to hide
My purpose till it struck home.

Omnes. Give you joy.

Lami. Prethee leave wondring, by this kiss I'll have thee.

Mont. Then by this kiss, and this, I'll ever serve ye.

Long. This Gentleman and I Sir, must needs hope once more to follow ye.

Mont. As friends and fellows, never as servants more.

Long. Dub. You make us happy.

Orl. Friend Montagne, ye have taught me so much honor, I have found a fault in my self, but thus I'll purge my conscience of it, the late Land I took by false play, from you, with as much contrition, and entireness of affection to this most happy day again, I render; be master of your own, forget my malice, and make me worthy of your love,
L. Montagne.

Mont. You have won me and honor to your name.

Mal. Since your Lordship has begun good deeds, we'll follow; good Sir forgive us, we are now those men fear you for goodness sake; those sums of money unjustly we detain from you, on your pardon shall be restor'd again, and we your servants.

La-p. You are very forward Sir, it seems you have money, I pray you lay out, I'll pay you, or pray for you, as the Sea-works.

Lav. Their pennance Sir, I'll undertake, so please ye
To grant me one concealment.

Long. A right Courtier, still a begging.

Mont. What is it Sir?

Lav. A Gentlewoman.

Mont. In my gift?

Lav. Yes Sir, in yours.

Mont. Why, bring her forth, and take her.

Lami. What wench would he have?

Mont. Any wench I think.

Enter Laverdine and Veramour like a woman.

Lav. This is the Gentlewoman.

Mont. 'Tis my Page, Sir.

Ver. No Sir, I am a poor disguis'd Lady, (wot.
That like a Page have followed you full long for love god-

Omnes. A Lady—Laverdine—yes, yes, 'tis a Lady.

Mont. It may be so, and yet we have lain together,
But by my troth I never found her, Lady.

L. Orl. Why wore you boys cloaths?

Ver. I'll tell you, Madam,

I took

I took example by two or three Plays, that methought Concerned me.

Mont. Why made you not me acquainted with it?

Ver. Indeed Sir, I knew it not my self, Until this Gentleman open'd my dull eyes, And by perswasion made me see it.

Ami. Could his power in words make such a change?

Ver. Yes, as truly woman as your self, my Lord.

Lav. Why, but hark you, are not you a woman?

Ver. If hands and face make it not evident, you shall see

Mal. Breeches, breeches, Laverdine. (more.)

La-p. 'Tis not enough, women may wear those cases. Search further Courtier.

Omnes. Ha, ha, ha.

La-p. Oh thou fresh-water Gudgeon, wouldst thou come To point of Marriage with an Ignoramus? Thou shouldst have had her Urin to the Doctors, The foolishhest Physitian could have made plain

The liquid Epicene; a blind man by the hand Could have discovered the ring from the Stone. Boy, come, to Sea with me, I'll teach thee to climb, And come down by the Rope, nay to eat Rats.

Ver. I shall devour my Malter before the prison then, Sir, I have began my Trade.

Mal. Trade? to the City, child, a flat-cap will become thee.

Mont. Gentlemen, I beseech you molest your selves no For his preferment it is determin'd. (further)

Lav. I am much ashamed, and if my cheek Gives not satisfaction, break my head.

Mont. Your shame's enough, Sir.

Ami. Montague, much joy attend thy marriage-bed; By thy example of true goodness, envy is exil'd, And to all honest men that truth intend, I wish good luck, fair fate be still thy friend.

Exeunt.

XXX 2

Upon

Upon an Honest Man's Fortune.

By Mr. JOHN FLETCHER.

(Stars,
You that can look through Heaven, and tell the Observe their kind conjunctions, and their wars;
 Find out new Lights, and give them where you please,
 To these men honors, pleasures, to those ease;
 You that are God's Surveyers, and can show
 How far, and when, and why the wind doth blow;
 Know all the charges of the dreadful thunder,
 And when it will shoot over, or fall under:
 Tell me, by all your Art I conjure ye,
 Yes, and by truth, what shall become of me?
 Find out my Star, if each one, as you say,
 Have his peculiar Angel, and his way;
 Observe my fate, next fall into your dreams,
 Sweep clean your houses, and new line your Scaemes,
 Then say your worst: or have I none at all?
 Or is it burnt out lately? or did fall?
 Or am I poor? not able, no full flame?
 My Star, like me, unworthy of a name?
 Is it your Art can only work on those,
 That deal with dangers, dignities, and cloaths?
 With Love, or new Opinions? you all lye,
 A Fish-wife hath a fate, and so have I,
 But far above your finding; he that gives,
 Out of his providence, to all that lives,
 And no man knows his treasure, no, not you:
 He that made Egypt blind, from whence you grew
 Scabb, and lowzie, that the world might see
 Your Calculations are as blind as ye:
 He that made all the Stars, you daily read,
 And from thence filch a knowledge how to feed;
 Hath hid this from you, your conjectures all
 Are drunken things, not how, but when they fall:
 Man is his own Star, and the soul that can Render an honest, and a perfect man,
 Command's all light, all influence, all fate,
 Nothing to him falls early, or too late.
 Our Aëts our Angels are, or good or ill,
 Our fatal shadows that walk by us still,
 And when the Stars are labouring, we believe
 It is not that they govern, but they grieve
 For stubborn ignorance; all things that are Made for our general uses, are at war,
 Even we among our selves, and from the strife,
 Your first unlike opinions got a life.
 Oh man! thou Image of thy Makers good;
 What canst thou fear, when breath'd into thy blood,

*His spirit is, that built thee? what dull sence
 Makes thee suspect, in need, that Providence?
 Who made the morning, and who plac'd the light
 Guide to thy labours? who call'd up the night,
 And bid her fall upon thee like sweet showers
 In hollow murmurs, to lock up thy powers?
 Who gave thee knowledge, who so trusted thee,
 To let thee grow so near himself, the Tree?
 Must he then be distrusted? shall his frame
 Discourse with him, why thus, and thus I am?
 He made the Angels thine, thy fellows all,
 Nay, even thy servants, when Devotions call.
 Oh! canst thou be so stupid then, so dim,
 To seek a saving influence, and loose him?
 Can Stars protect thee? or can poverty,
 Which is the light to Heaven, put out his eye?
 He is my Star, in him all truth I find,
 All influence, all fate, and when my mind
 Is furnish'd with his fullness, my poor story
 Shall out-live all their age, and all their glory,
 The hand of danger cannot fall amiss,
 When I know what, and in whose power it is.
 For want, the cause of man, shall make me groan,
 A Holy Hermit is a mind alone.
 Doth not experience teach us all we can,
 To work our selves into a glorious man?
 Love's but an exhalation to best eyes
 The matter spent, and then the fools fire dies?
 Were I in love, and could that bright Star bring Increase to Wealth, Honor, and every thing:
 Were she as perfect good, as we can aim,
 The first was so, and yet she lost the Game.
 My Mistris then be knowledge and fair truth;
 So I enjoy all beauty and all youth,
 And though to time her Lights, and Laws she lends,
 She knows no Age, that to corruption bends.
 Friends promises may lead me to believe,
 But he that knows his own friend, knows to live.
 Affliction, when I know it is but this,
 A deep allay, whereby man tougher is
 To hear the hammer, and the deeper still,
 We still arise more image of his Will.
 Sicknes, an humorous cloud 'twixt us and light
 And death, at longest but another night.
 Man is his own Star, and that soul that can
 Be honest, is the only perfect man.*

MASQUE of the Gentlemen

O F

GRAYS-INNE and the INNER-TEMPLE;

Performed before the KING in the Banqueting-House in White-Hall, at the Marriage of the Illustrious Frederick and Elizabeth, Prince and Princess Palatine of the Rhine:

Written by FRANCIS BEAMONT Gent.

Enter Iris running, Mercury following, and catching hold of her.

Mercury.

*T*ay Light-loot Iris, for thou striv'st in vain,
 My wings are nimbler than thy feet.

Iris. Away,
 Dissembling Mercury, my messages
 Ask honest haste; not like those wanton ones,
 Your thundering Father sends,

Mer. Stay foolish Maid,
 Or I will take my rise upon a hill,
 When I perceive thee seated in a cloud,
 In all the painted glory, that thou hast,
 And never cease to clap my willing wing,
 Till I catch hold on thy discolour'd Bow,
 And shiver it beyond the angry power
 Of your mad Mistresses to make up again.

Iris, Hermes forbear, Juno will chide and strike;
 Is great Jove jealous that that I am employ'd
 On her Love-errands? she did never yet
 Claspe weak mortality in her white arms,
 As he has often done; I only come
 To celebrate the long wish'd Nuptials
 Here in Olympia, which are now perform'd
 Betwixt two goodly Rivers, that have mixt
 Their gentle winding waves, and are to grow
 Into a thousand streams, great as themselves.
 I need not name them, for the sound is loud
 In Heaven and Earth, and I am sent from her
 The Queen of marriage, that was present here,
 And smil'd to see them joyn, and hath not chid
 Since it was done. Good Hermes let me goe.

Merc. Nay, you must stay, Jove's message is the same;
 Whose eyes are lightning, and whose voice is thunder,
 Whose breath is airy wind, he will, who knows
 How to be first in Earth, as well as Heaven.

Iris. But what hath he to do with Nuptial rites?
 Let him sit pleas'd upon his Starry throne,
 And fright poor mortals with his Thunder-bolts,
 Leaving to us the mutual darts of eyes.

Merc. Alas, when ever offer'd, he t'abridge
 Your Ladies power, but only now, in these,
 Whose match concerns the general government?

Hath not each God a part in these high joyes?
 And shall not he the King of gods presume
 Without proud Juno's licence? let her know,
 That when enamour'd Jove first gave her power
 To link soft hearts in undissolving bands,
 He then foresaw, and to himself reserv'd
 The honor of this marriage: thou shalt stand
 Still as a Rock, while I to bless this Feast
 Will summon up with mine all-charming rod
 The Nymphs of Fountains, from whose watry locks, (Hung with the dew of blessing and increase)
 The greedy Riverstake their nourishment.
 Yea Nymphs, who bathing in your loved Springs,
 Beheld these Rivers in their infancy.
 And joy'd to see them, when their circled heads
 Refresh'd the Air, and spread the ground with Flowers;
 Rise from your Wells, and with your nimble feet
 Perform that office to this happy pair,
 Which in these Plains you to Alpheus did,
 When passing hence, through many Seas unmixt,
 He gain'd the favour of his Arethuse.

*The Nymphs rise, and dance a little,
 and then make a stand.*

Iris. Is Hermes grown a Lover? by what power
 Unknown to us, calls he the Maids?

Merc. Presumptuous Iris, I could make thee dance,
 Till thou forgetst thy Ladies messages,
 And rann'st back crying to her; thou shalt know
 My power is more, only my breath, and this Shall move fix'd Stars, and force the Firmament
 To yield the Hyades, who govern show'ers,
 And dewy clouds, in whose dispersed drops
 Thou form'st the shape of thy deceitful Bow.
 Yea Maids, who yearly at appointed times
 Advance with kindly tears, the gentle floods
 Descend, and pour your blessing on these streams,
 Which rolling down from Heaven-aspiring hills,
 And now united in the fruitful vales,
 Bear all before them, ravish'd with their joy,
 And swell in glory, till they know no bounds.

The Cloud descends with the Hyades, at which the Maids seem to be rejoyced; they all dance a while together, then make another stand, as if they wanted something.

Iris.

Iris. Great Wit and Power hath Hermes to contrive
A lively dance, which of one sex consists.

Merc. Alas poor Iris! Venus hath in store
A secret ambush of her winged boys,
Who lurking long within these pleasant groves,
First stuck these Lovers with their equal darts;
Those Cupids shall come forth, and joyn with these,
To honor that which they themselves began.

The Cupids come forth and dance, they are weary with their blind pursuing the Nymphs, and the Nymphs weary with flying them.

Iris. Behold the Statues which wild Vulcan plac'd
Under the Altar of Olympian Jove,
And gave to them an artificial life:
See how they move, drawn by this Heavenly joy,
Like the wild Trees, which followed Orpheus Harp.

The Statues come down, and they all dance, till the Nymphs out-run them, and lose them, then the Cupids go off, and last the Statues.

Merc. And what will Juno's Iris do for her?

Iris. Just match this shew, or mine inventions fail,
Had it been worthier, I would have invoc'd
The blazing Comets, Clouds, and falling Stars,
And all my kindred, Meteors of the air,
To have excell'd it; but I now must strive
To imitate confusion; therefore thou
Delightful Flora; if thou ever feltest
Increase of sweetness in those blooming Plants,
On which the horns of my fair Bow decline,
Send hither all that rural company,
Which deck the May-games with their clownish sports;
Juno will have it so.

The second Anti-Masque rushest in, they dance their measure, and as rudely depart.

Merc. Iris, we strive

Like winds at liberty, who should do worst
E'r we return. If Juno be the Queen
Of Marriages, let her give happy way
To what is done in honor of the State
She governs.

Iris. Hermes, so it may be done
Meerly in honor of the State, and those
That now have prov'd it; not to satisfy
The lust of Jupiter, in having thanks
More than his Juno; if thy Snaky rod
Have power to search the Heaven, or sound the Sea,
Or call together all the ends of earth,
To bring thee any thing that may do grace
To us, and these, do it, we shall be pleas'd.

Merc. Then know that from the mouth of Jove himself,
Whose words have wings, and need not to be born,
I took a message, and I bore it through
A thousand yielding clouds, and never staid
Till his high Will was done: the Olympian games,
Which long had slept, at these wish'd Nuptials,
He pleas'd to have renew'd, and all his Knights
Are gather'd hither, who within their Tents
Rest on this hill, upon whose rising head

The Altar is discovered with the Priests about it, and the Statues under it, and the Knights lying in their Tents on each side, near the top of the hill.

Behold Joves Altar, and his blessed Priests
Moving about it; come you Holy men,
And with your voices draw these youths along,
That till Joves Musick call them to their games.
Their active sports may give a blest content
To those, for whom they are again begun.

The first Song, when the Priests descend, and the Knights follow them.

*Shake off your heavy trance,
and leap into a dance,
Such as no mortals use to tread, fit only for Apollo
To play to, for the Moon to lead,
And all the Stars to follow,*

The second Song at the end of the first Dance.

*On blessed youths, for Jove doth pause,
Laying aside his graver Laws
For this device:
And at the wedding such a pair,
Each dance is taken for a prayer,
Each Song a Sacrifice.*

The third Song, after their many Dances, when they are to take out the Ladies.

Single.

*More pleasing were these sweet delights,
If Ladies mov'd as well as Knights;
Run everyone of you and catch
A Nymph, in honor of his match;
And whisper boldly in her ear,
Jove will but laugh, if you forswear.*

All.

*And this days sins he doth resolve,
That we his Priests should all absolve.*

The fourth Song, when they have parted with the Ladies, a shrill Musick sounds, supposed to be that, which calls them to the Olympian games, at which they all make a seeming preparation to depart.

*You should stay longer if we durst,
Away, alas! that he that first
Gave time wild wings to fly away,
H'as now no power to make him stay.
And though these games must needs be plaid,
I would these pair, when they are laid,
And not a creature nigh'em,
Might catch his fish, as he doth pass,
And clip his wings, and break his glass,
And keep him ever by'em.*

The fifth Song, when all is done, as they ascend

*Peace and silence be the guide
To the Man, and to the Bride:
If there be a joy yet new
In marriage, let it fall on you,
That all the world may wonder:
If we should stay, we should do worse,
And turn our blessings to a curse,
By keeping you asunder.*

F O U R P L A Y S O R Moral Representations I N O N E.

Enter Don Frigozo.

Frig.

Noise within.

Way with those bald-pated Rascals there, their wits are bound up in Vellom, they are not current here. Down with those City-Gentlemen, &c. Out with those—I say, and in with their wives at the back door. Worship and place, I am weary of ye, ye lye on my shoulders lik a load of Gold on an Allés back. A man in Authority, is but as a candle in the wind, sooner wasted or blown out, than under a bushel. How now, what's the matter?

Who are you, Sir?

Enter Rinaldo.

Rin. Who am I, Sir? why, do y' not know me?

Frig. No by my—do I not.

Rin. I am sure we din'd together to day.

Frig. That's all one: as I din'd with you in the City, and as you paid for my dinner there, I do know you, and am beholding to you: But as my mind is since transmigrated into my office, and as you come to Court to have me pay you again, and be beholding to me, I know you not, I know you not.

Rin. Nay, but look ye, Sir.

Frig. Pardon me: If you had been my bed-fellow these seven years, and lent me money to buy my place, I must not transgress principles: This very talking with you, is an ill example.

Rin. Pish, you are too punctual a Courtier, Sir: why, I am a Courtier too, yet never understood the place or name to be so infectious to humanity and manners, as to cast a man into a burning pride and arrogance, for which there is no cure. I am a Courtier, and yet I will know my friends, I tell you.

Frig. And I tell you, you will thrive accordingly, I warrant you.

Rin. But hark ye, Signior Frigozo, you shall first understand, I have no friends with me to trouble you,

Frig. Humh: That's a good motive.

Rin. Not to borrow money of you.

Frig. That's an excellent motive.

Rin. No my sweet Don, nor to ask what you owe me.

Frig. Why, that is the very motive of motives, why I ought and will know thee: and if I had not wound thee up to this promise, I would not have known thee these fifteen years, no more than the errantst, or most founder'd Cajillian that followed our new Queens Carriages a-foot.

Rin. Nor for any thing, dear Don, but that you would place me conveniently to see the Play to night.

Frig. That shall I, Signior Rinaldo: but would you had come sooner: you see how full the Scaffolds are, there is scant room for a Lovers thought here. Gentlewomen sit close for shame: Has none of ye a little corner for this Gentleman? I'll place ye, fear not. And how did our brave King of Portugal, Emanuel, bear himself to day? You saw the solemnity of the marriage.

Rin. Why, like a fit Husband for so gracious and excellent a Princess, as his worthy mate Isabella, the King of Castiles Daughter doth in her very external lianaments, mixture of colours, and joyning Dove-like behaviour assure her self to be. And I protest (my dear Don) seriously, I can sing prophetically nothing but blessed Hymns, and happy occasions to this sacred union of Portugal and Castile, which have so wisely and mutually conjoyned two such virtuous and beautiful Princes as these are; and in all opinion like to multiply to their very last minute.

Frig. The King is entring: Signior, hover here about, and as soon as the Train is set; clap into me, we'll stand near the State. If you have any Creditors here, they shall renew bonds a Twelvemonth on such a sight: but to touch the pomel of the King's Chair in the sight of a Citizen, is better security for a thousand double Duckets, than three of the best Merchants in Lisbon. Besides, Signior, we will censure, not only the King in the Play here, that Reigns his two hours; but the King himself, that is to rule his life time: Take my counsel: I have one word to say to this noble Assembly, and I am for you.

Rin. Your method shall govern me.

Frig. Prologues are bad Huishers before the wise; Why may not then an Huisher Prologize?

Here's a fair sight, and were ye oftner seen Thus gather'd here, would please our King and Queen Upon my conscience, ye are welcome all To Lisbon, and the Court of Portugal; Where your fair eyes shall feed on no worse sights Than preparations made for Kings delights. We wish to men content, the manliest treasure, And to the Women, their own wish'd for pleasure.

Flourish.

Enter

Enter King and Queen, Emanuel and Isabella,
Lords and attendants.

Em. Fair fountain of my life, from whose pure streams
The propagation of two Kingdoms flowes,
Never contention rise in eithers brest,
But contestation whose love shall be best.

Isab. Majestick Ocean, that with plenty feeds
Me, thy poor tributary Rivolet,
Sun of my beauty, that with radiant beams
Dost gild, and dance upon these humble streams,
Curst be my birth-hour, and my ending day,
When back your love-floods I forget to pay:
Or if this brest of mine, your crysfall brook,
Ever take other form in, other look
But yours, or ere produce unto your grace
A strange reflection, or anothers face,
But be your love-book clasp'd, open'd to none
But you, nor hold a storie, but your own;
A water fix'd, that ebbs nor floods pursue,
Frozen to all, onely dissolv'd to you.

Em. O, who shall tel the sweetness of our love
To future times, and not be thought to lye?
I look through this hour like a perspective,
And far off see millions of prosperous seeds,
That our reciprocally affection breeds.
Thus my white rib, close in my brest with me,
Which nought shall tear hence, but mortalitie.

Lords. Be Kingdoms blest in you, you blest in them.

Frig. Whist, Seignior; my strong imagination shews me
Love (me thinks) bathing in milk, and wine in her checks:
O! how she clips him, like a plant of Ivie.

Rin. I; Could not you be content to be an Owl in such an ivie-bush, or one of the Oaks of the City to be so clipt?

Frig. Equivocal Don, though I like the clipping well,
I could not be content either to be your Owl, or your Ox of the City. The Play begins. Flourish.

Enter a Poet with a garland.

Poet Prologue. Low at your sacred feet our poor Muse
Her, and her thunder-fearless virdant Bayes. (lays Four severall Triumphs to your Princely eyes,
Of Honor, Love, Death, and Time do rise
From our approaching subject, which we move
Towards you with fear, since that a sweeter Love,
A brighter Honor, purer Chastitie
March in your brests this day triumphantly,
Then our weak Scenes can show: then how dare we Present like Apes and Zanies, things that be Exemplifi'd in you, but that we know,
We ne'r crav'd grace, which you did not bestow?

Enter in triumph with Drums, Trumpets, Colours, Martius,
Valerius, Sophocles bound, Nicodemus, Cornelius,
Captains and Soldiers.

Mar. What means proud Sophocles?

Soph. To go even with Martius,
And not to follow him like his Officer:
I never waited yet on any man.

Mar. Why poor Athenian Duke, thou art my slave,
My blows have conquerd thee.

Soph. Thy slave? proud Martius,
Cato thy countrey-man (whose constancie,
Of all the Romans, I did honor most)
Rip'd himself twice to a void slavery,
Making himself his own Anatomie.

But look thee Martius, not a vein runs here
From head to foot, but Sophocles would unseame, and Like a spring garden shoot his scornfull blood
Into their eyes, durst come to tread on him:
As for thy blows, they did conquer me:
Seven Battailles have I met thee face to face,
And given thee blow for blow, and wound for wound,
And till thou taught'st me, knew not to retire;
Thy sword was then as bold, thy arm as strong;
Thy blows then Martius, cannot conquer me.

Val. What is it then?

Soph. Fortune.

Val. Why, yet in that

Thou art the worse man, and must follow him.

Soph. Young Sir, you erre: If Fortune could be call'd
Or his, or your's, or mine, in good or evil
For any certain space, thou hadst spoke truth:
But she but jests with man, and in mischance
Abhors all constancie, flowting him still
With some small touch of good, or seeming good
Midst of his mischief: which vicissitude
Makes him strait doff his armour, and his fence
He had prepar'd before, to break her strokes.
So from the very Zenith of her wheel,
When she has dandled some choice favorite,
Given him his boons in women, honor, wealth,
And all the various delectacies of earth;
That the fool scorns the gods in his excess,
She whirls, and leaves him at th' Antipodes.

Mar. Art sure we have taken him? Is this Sophocles?
His settred arms say no; his free soul, I.

Soph. Nor glory Martius, in this day of thine,
'Tis behind yesterday, but before to morrow:

Who knows what Fortune then will do with thee?
She never yet could make the better man,
The better chance she has: the man that's best
She still contends with, and doth favor least.

Mar. Me thinks a graver thunder then the skies
Breaks from his lips; I am amaz'd to hear,
And Athens words, more then her swords doth fear.

Soph. Martius, slave Sophocles, couldst thou acquire (And did thy Roman gods so love thy prayers.
And solemn sacrifice, to grant thy suit)
To gather all the valour of the Casars
Thy Predecessors, and what is to come,
And by their influence sling it on thee now,
Thou couldst not make my mind go less, not pare
With all their swords one virtue from my soul:
How am I vassall'd then? Make such thy slaves,
As dare not keep their goodness past their graves.
Know General, we two are chances-on
The die of Fate; now thrown, thy six is up,
And my poor one beneath thee, next the throw
May set me upmost, and cast thee below.

Mar. Yet will I trie thee more: Calamitie
Is mans true touchstone: Listen insolent Prince,
That dar'st contemn the Master of thy life,
Which I will force here 'fore thy City walls
With barbarous crueltie, and call thy wife
To see it, and then after send her——

Soph. Ha, ha, ha.

Mar. And then demolish Athens to the ground,
Depopulate her, fright away her fame,
And leave succession neither stone nor name.

Soph. Ha, ha, ha.

Mar. Dost thou deride me?

Val. Kneel, ask Martius
For mercy, Sophocles, and live happy still.

Soph. Kneel, and ask mercie? (Roman) art a god?
I never kneel'd, or begg'd of any else.
Thou art a fool, and I will loose no more
Instructions on thee: now I find thy eares

Solemn Musick.

Enter

Enter Dorigen, Ladies bearing a sword.

Are foolish, like thy tongue. My Dorigen?
Ch! must she see me bound?

1. Cap. There's the first sigh

He breath'd since he was born, I think.

2. Cap. Forbear,

All but the Lady his wife.

Soph. How my heart chides
The manacles of my hands, that let them not Embrace my Dorigen.

Val. Turn but thy face.

And ask thy life of Martius thus, and thou
(With thy fair wife) shalt live; Athens shall stand,
And all her priviledges augmented be.

Soph. 'Twere better Athens perish'd, and my wife
Which (Romans) I do know a worthie one,
Then Sophocles should shrink of Sophocles,
Commit profane Idolatry, by giving
The reverence due to gods to thee blown man.

Mar. Rough, stubborn Cynick.

Soph. Thou art rougher far,
And of a coufer wale, fuller of pride,
Less temperate to bear prosperity.
Thou seest my meer neglect hath rais'd in thee
A storm more boystrous then the Oceans,
My virtue, Patience, makes thee vitious.

Mar. Why, fair-ey'd Lady, do you kneel?

Dor. Great General,

Victorious, godlike Martius, your poor handmaid
Kneels, for her husband will not, cannot: speaks
Thus humbly, that he may not. Listen Roman,
Thou whose advanced front doth speak thee Roman
To every Nation, and whose deeds assure 't;
Behold a Princess (whose declining head
Like to a drooping lilly after storms
Bows to thy feet) and playing here the slave,
To keep her husbands greatness unabated:
All which doth make thy Conquest greater: For,
If he be base in ought whom thou hast taken,
Then Martius hath but taken a base prize.
But if this Jewell hold lustre and value,
Martius is richer then in that he hath won.
O make him such a Captive, as thy self
Unto another wouldst, great Captain, be;
Till then, he is no prisoner fit for thee.

Mar. Valerius, here is harmonie would have brought Old crabbed Saturn to sweet sleep, when Jove
Did first incense him with Rebellion:
Athens doth make women Philosophers,
And sure their children chat the talk of gods.

Val. Rise beauteous Dorigen.

Dor. Not untill I know

The Generals resolution,

Val. One soft word

From Sophocles would calm him into tears,
Like gentle showres after tempestuous winds.

Dor. To buy the world, he will not give a word,
A look, a tear, a knee, 'gainst his own judgement,
And the divine composure of his minde:
All which I therefore doe, and here present
This Victors wreath, this rich Athenian sword,
Trophies of Conquest, which, great Martius, wear,
And be appeas'd: Let Sophocles still live.

Mar. He would not live.

Dor. He would not beg to live.

When he shall so forget, then I begin
To command, Martius; and when he kneels,
Dorigen stands; when he lets fall a tear,
I dry mine eyes, and scorn him.

Mar. Scorn him now then,
Here in the face of Athens, and thy friends,

Self-will'd, stiff Sophocles, prepare to die,
And by that sword thy Lady honor'd me,
With which her self shall follow. Romans, Friends,
Who dares but strike this stroke, shall part with me
Half Athens, and my half of Victorie.

Cap. By —— not we.

Nic. Cor. We two will do it, Sir.

Soph. Away, ye fish-bell'd Rascals.

Val. Martius,

To Eclipse this great Eclipse labours thy fame;
Valerius thy Brother shall for once
Turn Executioner: Give me the sword.
Now Sophocles, I'll strike as suddenly
As thou dar'st die.

Soph. Thou canst not. And Valerius,
'Tis less dishonour to thee thus to kill me,
Then bid me kneel to Martius: 'tis to murder
The fame of living men, which great ones do;
Their studies strangle, poyson makes away,
The wretched hangman only ends the Play.

Val. Art thou prepar'd?

Soph. Yes.

Val. Bid thy wife farewell.

Soph. No, I will take no leave: My Dorigen,
Yonder above, 'bout Ariadnes Crown
My spirit shall hover for thee; prethee haste.

Dor. Stay Sophocles, with this tie up my sight,
Let not soft nature so transform'd be
(And lose her gentle sex'd humanitie)
To make me see my Lord bleed. So, 'tis well:
Never one object underneath the Sun
Will I behold before my Sophocles.
Farewell: now teach the Romans how to die.

Mar. Dost know what 'tis to die?

Soph. Thou dost not, Martius,
And therefore not what 'tis to live; to die
Is to begin to live: It is to end
An old stale weary work, and to commence
A newer and a better. 'Tis to leave
Deceitfull knaves for the societie
Of gods and goodness. Thou thy self must part
At last from all thy garlands, pleasures, Triumphs,
And prove thy fortitude, what then 'twill do.

Val. But ar't not griev'd nor vex'd to leave life thus?

Soph. Why should I grieve, or vex for being sent To them I ever lov'd best? now I'll kneel,
But with my back to ward thee; 'tis the last duty
This trunk can doe the gods.

Mar. Strike, strike, Valerius,
Or Martius heart will leap out at his mouth.
This is a man, a woman! Kiss thy Lord,
And live with all the freedom you were wont.
O Love! thou doubly hast afflicted me,
With virtue, and with beauty. Treacherous heart,
My hand shall cast thee quick into my urne,
E're thou transgress this knot of pietie.

Val. What ails my Brother?

Soph. Martius, oh Martius!

Thou now hast found a way to conquer me.

Dor. O star of Rome, what gratitude can speak
Fit words to follow such a deed as this?

Mar. Doth Juno talk, or Dorigen?

Val. You are observ'd.

Mar. This admirable Duke (Valerius)
With his disdain of Fortune, and of Death,
Captiv'd himself, hath captivated me:
And though my arm hath ta'ne his body here,
His soul hath subjugated Martius soul:
By Romulus, he is all soul, I think;
He hath no flesh, and spirit cannot by gyv'd;
Then we have vanquish'd nothing; he is free,
And Martius walks now in captivity.

Soph. How fares the noble Roman?

Mar. Why?

Dor. Your blood
Is sunk down to your heart, and your bright eyes
Have lost their splendor.

Mar. Baser fires go out,
When the Sun shines on 'em: I am not well,
An Apoplectick fit I use to have
After my heats in war carelesly coold.

Soph. Martius shall rest in Athens with his friends,
Till this distemper leave him: O! great Roman,
See Sophocles doe that for thee, he could not Do for himself, weep. Martius, by the ——
It grieves me that so brave a soul should suffer
Under the bodies weak infirmitie.
Sweet Lady, take him to thy loving charge,
And let thy care be tender.

Dor. Kingly Sir,
I am your Nurse and servant.

Mar. Oh deer Lady,
My Mistris, nay my Deity; guide me heaven,
Ten wreathes triumphant Martius will give,
To change a Martius for a Sophocles:
Can't not be done (Valerius) with this boot?
Inseparable affection, ever thus Colleague with Athens Rome.

Dor. Beat warlike tunes,
Whilest Dorigen thus honors Martius brow
With one victorious wreath more.

Soph. And Sophocles
Thus girds his Sword of conquest to his thigh,
Which ne'r be drawn, but cut out Victorie.

Lords. For ever be it thus.

Exeunt.

Corn. Corporall Nichodemus, a word with you.

Nic. My worthie Sutler Cornelius, it befits not Nichodemus the Roman Officer to parley with a fellow of thy rank: the affairs of the Empire are to be occupied.

Corn. Let the affaires of the Empire lie a while unoccupied, sweet Nichodemus I, do require the money at thy hands, which thou doest owe me; and if faire means cannot attain, force of Armes shall accomplish.

Nic. Put up and live.

Corn. I have put up too much already, thou Corporall of Concupiscence, for I suspect thou hast dishonored my flock-bed, and with thy foolish Eloquence, and that bewitching face of thine drawn my Wife, the young harlotrie baggage to prostitute her self unto thee. Draw therefore, for thou shalt find thy self a mortall Corporall.

Nichod. Stay thy dead-doing hand, and heare: I will rather descend from my honor, and argue these contumelies with thee, then clutch thee (poor flye) in these eaglet —— of mine: or draw my sword of Fate on a Pesant, a Besognio, a Cecoloch, as thou art. Thou shalt first understand this foolish eloquence, and intolerable beauty of mine (both which, I protest, are meerly naturall) are the gifts of the gods, with which I have neither sent baudy Sonnet, nor amorous glance, or (as the vulgar call it) sheeps eye to thy betrothed Florence.

Corn. Thou lyeest.

Nich. O gods of Rome, was Nichodemus born
To bear these braveries from a poor provant?
Yet when dogs bark, or when the asses bray,
The lion laughs, not roars, but goes his way.

Cornel. A —— o' your poeticall veine: This versifying my wife has hornified me. Sweet Corporall cod-shead, no more standing on your punctilio's and punketto's of honor, they are not worth a lowse: the truth is, thou art the Generals Bygamie, that is, his fool, and his knave; thou art miscreant and recreant, not an horse-boy in the Legions, but has beaten thee; thy beginning was knap-sack, and thy ending will be halter-sack.

Nich. Me thinks I am now Sophocles, the wise, and thou art Martius, the mad.

Cornel. No more of your tricks good Corporall Lether-chops: I say, thou hast dishonour'd me, and since honor now adaries is only repaired by money, pay me, and I am satisfied; Even reckoning keeps long friends.

Nic. Let us continue friends then, for I have been even with thee a long time; and though I have not paid thee, I have paid thy wife.

Corn. Flow forth my tears, thou hast deslowred her Tarquain, the Garden of my delight, hedg'd about, in which there was but one bowling-Alley for mine owne private procreation, thou hast, like a thief in the night, leap'd the hedge, entred my Alley, and without my privitie, plaid thine owne rubbers.

Nic. How long shall patience thus securely store?
Is it my fault, if these attractive eyes,
This budding chin, or rosie-colour'd cheek,
This comely body, and this waxen leg,
Have drawn her into a fools paradise?

By Cupids —— I do swear (no other)
She's chaster far then Lucrece, her grand-mother;
Pure as glass-window, ere the rider dash it,
Whiter then Ladies smock, when she did wash it:
For well thou wotst (though now my hearts Commandress)

I once was free, and she but the Camps Landress.

Corn. I, she then came sweet to me; no part about her but smelt of Soap-suds, like a Dryad out of a wassa-bowl Pray, or pay.

Nich. Hold.

Corn. Was thy cheefe mouldy, or thy peny-worths small?
Was not thy Ale the mightiest of the earth in Malt,
And thy stope fill'd like a tide: was not thy bed lost, and Thy Bacon fatter then a dropsie? Come, Sir.

Nich. Mars then inspire me with the fencing skill
Of our Tragedion Actors. Honor pricks;
And Sutler, now I come with thwacks and thwicks.
Grant us one crush, one pafs, and now a high, Cavalto fall:

Then up again, now down again, yet do no harm at all.

Enter Wife.

Wife. O that ever I was born: why Gent?

Corn. Messaline of Rome, away, disloyal Concubine: I will be deafer to thee, then thou art to others: I will have my hundred drachma's he owes me, thou arrant whore.

Wife. I know he is an hundred drachmaes o'the score; but what o' that? no bloodshed, sweet Cornelius. O my heart; o' my conscience 't is faln thorow the bottom o' my bellie. O my sweet Didimus, if either of ye miskil one another, what will become of yoor Florence? Pacific your selves, I pray.

Corn. Go to, my heart is not stone; I am not marble: drie your eyes, Florence; the scurvie apes-face knows my blinde side well enough: leave your puling; will this content ye? let him tast thy nether lip, which in signe of amitie I thus take off again: go thy ways, and provide the Cows udder.

Nich. Lilie of Concord. And now, honest Sutler, since I have had proof as well of thy good nature, as of thy wives before, I will acquaint thee with a project shau fully satsifie thee for thy debt. Thou shalt understand I am shortly to be knighted.

Corn. The devil thou art.

Nich. Renounce me else; for the sustenance of which Worship (which Worship many times wants sustenance) I have here the Generals grant to have the leading of two hundred men.

Corn. You jest, you jest.

Nich. Refuse me else to the pir.

Corn. Mercie on us: ha you not forgot your self? by you swearing you should be knighted already.

Nich. Damn me, Sir, here's his hand, read it.

Corn. Alas, I cannot.

Nich. I know that.

It has pleas'd the General to look upon my service. Now, Sir, shall you joyn with me in petitioning for fifty men more, in regard of my arrearages to you; which if granted, I will bestow the whole profit of those fifty men on thee and thine heirs for ever, till Atropos do cut this simple thread.

Cor. No more, dear Corporal, Sir Nichodemus, that shall be, I cry your wishes mercie: I am your servant both in goods, moveables and immoveables; use my house, use my wife, use me, abuse me, do what you list.

Nob. A figment is a candid lye: this is an old Pass. Mark what follows.

Exeunt.

Enter Martius, and two Captains.

Mar. Pray leave me: you are Romans, honest men, keep me not company, I am turn'd knave, I have lost my fame and nature. Athens, Athens, This Dorigen is thy Palladium: He that will sack thee, must betray her first, whose words wound deeper than her husbands sword; Her eyes make captive still the Conqueror, And here they keep her only to that end. O subtil devil, what a golden ball Did tempt, when thou didst cast her in my way! Why, foolish Sophocles, broughtst thou not to field Thy Lady, that thou mightst have overcome? Martius, had kneel'd, and yielded all his wreathes That hang like Jewels on the seven-fold hill, And bid Rome, send him out to fight with men, (For that she knew he durst) and not 'gainst Fate Or Deities, what mortal conquers them? Infatiate Julius, when his Victories Had run ore half the world, had he met her, There he had stopt the legend of his deeds, Laid by his Arms, been overcome himself, And let her vanquish th' other half. And fame Made beauteous Dorigen, the greater name. Shall I thus fall? I will not; no, my tears Cast on my heart, shall quench these lawless fires: He conquers best, conquers his lewd desires.

Enter Dorigen, with Ladies.

Dor. Great Sir, my Lord commands me visit you, And thinks your retir'd melancholy proceeds From some distast of worthless entertainment. Will't please you take your chamber? how d'ye do, Sir?

Mar. Lost, lost again; the wild rage of my blood Duth Ocean like orelow the shallow shore Of my weak virtue: my desire's a vane, That the least breath from her turns every way.

Dor. What says my Lord?

Mar. Dismiss your women, pray, And I'll reveal my grief.

Dor. Leave me.

Mar. Long tales of love (whilst love it self Might be enjoyed) are languishing delays. There is a secret strange lies in my brest, I will partake wi' you, which much concerns Your Lord, your self, and me. Oh!

Dor. Strange secrets, Sir, Should not be made so cheap to strangers: yet, If your strange secret do no lower lie Then in your brest, discover it.

Mar. I will.

O! can you not see it, Lady, in my sighs?

Dor. Sighs none can paint, and therefore who can see?

Mar. See me not, Dorigen, with mocks: Alcides, That mader'd monsters, was by beautie tain'd, Antioch smil'd his club out of his hand, And made him spin her sinocks, O sweet, I love you, And I love Sophocles: I must enjoy you, And yet I would not injure him.

Dor. Let go;

You hurt me, Sir: fare well. Stay, is this Martius?

I will not tell my Lord; he'll swear I lye. Doubt my fidelitic, before thy honor. How hast thou vex'd the gods, that they would let thee Thus violate friendship, hospitalitie, And all the bounds of sacred pietie?

Sure thou but tri'd me out of love to him, And wouldst reject me, if I did consent.

O Martius, Martius, wouldst thou in one minute, Blast all thy Laurels, which so many years Thou hast been purchasing with blood and sweat? Hath Dorigen never been written, read, Without the epithet of chaste, chaste Dorigen? And wouldst thou fall upon her chastic, Like a black drop of ink, to blot it out? When men shall read the records of thy valour, Thy hitherto-brave virtue, and approach (Highly content yet) to this foul assault Included in this leaf, this ominous leaf, They shall throw down the Book, and read no more, Though the best deeds ensue, and all conclude, That ravell'd the whole story, whose found heart (Which should have been) prov'd the most leprous part.

Mar. O! thou confut't divinely, and thy words Do fall like rods upon me; but they have Such silken lines, and silver hooks, that I Am faster snar'd: my love has ta'en such hold, That (like two wrestlers) though thou stronger be, And hast cast me, I hope to pull thee after. I must, or perish.

Dor. Perish, Martius, then; For I here vow unto the gods, These rocks, These rocks we see so fix'd, shall be removed, Made champion field, ere I so impious prove, To stain my Lords bed with adulterous love.

Enter Valerius.

Val. The gods protect fair Dorigen.

Dor. Amen,

From all you wolvis Romanes.

Exit.

Val. Ha? what's this?

Still, brother, in your moods? O than my doubts Are truths. Have at it: I must try a way To be resolv'd.

Mar. How strangely dost thou look? what ailst thou?

Val. What ailst thou?

Mar. Why, I 'm mad.

Val. Why, I 'm madder. Martius, draw thy sword, And lop a villain from the earth; for if Thou wilt not, on some tree about this place I'll hang my self: Valerius shall not live To wound his brothers honor, stain his Countrey, And branded with ingratitude to all times.

Mar. For what can all this be?

Val. I 'm in love.

Mar. Why so am I. With whom? ha?

Val. Dorigen.

Mar. With Dorigen? how dost thou love her? speak.

Val. Even to the height of lust; and I must have her or else I die.

Mar. Thou shalt, thou daring Traitor. On all the confines I have rid my horse, Was there no other woman for thy choice But Dorigen? Why, villain, she is mine: She makes me pine thus, sullen, mad, and fool; 'T is I must have her, or I die.

Val. O all ye gods, With mercy look on this declining rock Of valour, and of virtue; breed not up (From infancie) in honor, to full man, As you have done him, to destroy: here, strike; For I have ouely search'd thy wound: dispatch; Far, far be such love from Valerius, So far he scorns to live to be call'd brother

By him that dares own such folly and such vice.

Mar. 'Tis truth thou speak'st; but I do hate it: peace,
If heaven will snatch my sword out of my hand,
And put a rattle in it, what can I do?
He that is destin'd to be odious
In his old age, must undergo his fate.

Enter Cornelius and Nichodemus.

Corn. If you do not back me, I shall never do't.

Nich. I warrant you.

Corn. Humh, humh: Sir; my Lord, my Lord.

Mar. Hah? what's the matter?

Corn. Humh; concerning the odd fifty, my Lord, and
't please your Generality, his Worship, Sir Nichodemus.

Mar. What's here? a Pass? you would for Rome? you lubbers, doth one days laziness make ye covet home? away, ye boarish rogues; ye dogs, away.

Enter wife.

Wife. Oh, oh, oh:

How now man, are you satisfi'd?

Corn. I, I, I: a — o' your Corporal; I 'm paid soundly,
I was never better paid in all my life.

Wife. Maray the gods blessing on his honors heart: you have done a charitable deed, Sir, many more such may you live to do, Sir: the gods keep you, Sir, the gods protect you. Exit.

Mar. These peasants mock me sure (Valerius)
Forgive my dotage, see my ashes urn'd,
And tell fair Dorigen, (she that but now
Left me with this harsh vow, Sooner these rocks
Should be remov'd, then she would yield) that I
Was yet so loving, on her gift to die.

Val. O Jupiter forbid it, Sir, and grant
This my device may certifie thy mind:
You are my brother, nor must perish thus:

Be comforted: think you fair Dorigen
Would yield your wishes, if these envious rocks
By skill could be remov'd, or by fallacie
She made believe so?

Mar. Why, she could not chuse;
The Athenians are religious in their vows,
Above all nations.

Val. Soft, down yonder hill
The Lady comes this way, once more to trie her,
If she persist in obstinacie: by my skill
Learn'd from the old Caldean was my Tutor,
Who train'd me in the Mathematicks, I will
So dazle and delude her sight, that she Shall think this great impossibilitie
Effected by some supernatural means.
Be confident; this engine shall at least,
Till the gods better order, still this brest. Exit Valerius.

Mar. O my best brother, go; and for reward,
Chuse any part o'th' world, I'll give it thee.
O little Rome, men say thou art a god;
Thou mightst have got a fitter fool than I.

Enter Dorigen.

Dor. Art thou there, Basilisk? remove thine eyes,
For I 'm sick to death with thy infection.

Mar. Yet, yet have mercy on me; save him, Lady,
Whose single arm defends all Rome, whose mercie
Hath sav'd thy husband's and thy life.

Dor. To spoil
Our fame and honors? no, my vow is fixt,
And stands, as constant as these stones do, still.

Mar. Then pitie me, ye gods; you onely may Move her, by tearing these firm stones a way.

Solemn musick.

A mist ariseth, the rocks remove.

Enter Valerius like Mercury, singing.

Val. Martius rejoyce, Jove sends me from above,
His Messenger, to cure thy desperate love;
To shew rash vows cannot binde destinie:
Lady, behold, the rocks transplanted be.
Hard-hearted Dorigen, yield, lest for contempt,
They fix thee here a rock, whence they 're exempt.

Dor. What strange delusion's this? what Sorcery
Affrights me with these apparitions?

My colder Chastity's night turn'd to death.
Hence, lewd Magician; dar'st thou make the gods
Bawds to thy lust; will they do miracles
To further evil? or do they love it now?
Know, if they dare do so, I dare hate them,
And will no longer serve 'em. Jupiter,
Thy golden shower, nor thy snow-white Swan,
Had I been Læda, or bright Danae,
Had bought mine honor. Turn me into stone
For being good, and blush when thou hast done.

Exit Dorigen.

Enter Valerius,

Mar. O my Valerius, all yet will not do;
Unless I could so draw mine honestie
Down to the lees to be a ravisher;
She calls me witch, and villain.

Val. Patience, Sir,
The gods will punish perjury. Let her breathe
And ruminat on this strange sight, Time decays
The strongest fairest buildings we can finde;
But still Diana, fortifie her minde. Exeunt.

Enter Sophocles and Dorigen.

Soph. Weep not bright Dorigen; for thou hast stood
Constant and chaste (it seems 'gainst gods and men)
When rocks and mountains were remov'd. These wonders
Do stupifie my senses. Martius,
This is inhumane: was thy sickness lust?
Yet were this truth, why weeps she? Jealous soul,
What dost thou thus suggest? Vows, Magick, Rocks?
Fine tales; and tears? She ne'er complain'd before.
I bade her visit him; she often did,
Had many opportunities. Humh. 'tis naught: O!
No way but this. Come, weep no more, I have ponder'd
This miracle: the anger of the gods,
Thy vow, my love to thee, and Martius:
He must not perish, nor thou be forsworn,
Lest worse fates follow us; Go, keep thy oath:
For chaste, and whore, are words of equal length:
But let not Martius know, that I consent,
O! I 'm pull'd in pieces.

Dor. I? say you so?
I'll meet you in your path. O wretched men!
With all your valour and your learning, bubbles.
Forgive me, Sophocles. Yet why kneel I
For pardon, having been but over-diligent,
Like an obedient servant, antedating
My Lords command? Sir, I have often, and already given
This bosom up to his embraces, and Am proud that my dear Lord is pleas'd with it;
Whose gentle honorable minde I see
Participates even all, his wife and all,
Unto his friend. You are sad, Sir. Martius loves me,
And I love Martius with such ardencie,
As never married couple could: I must Attend him now. My Lord, when you have need
To use your own wife, pray Sir send for me;

Till then, make use of your Philosophic. Exit.

Soph. Stay, Dorigen: O me, inquitivive fool!
Thou that didst order this congested heap
When it was Chaos, 'twixt thy spacious palms
Forming it to this vast rotundie;
Dissolve it now; shuffle the elements,
Let no one proper by it self may stand:
Let the sea quench the sun, and in that instant
The sun drink up the sea: day, ne'er come down,
To light me to those deeds that must be done. Exit.

Drums and Colours.

Enter Martius, Valerius, Captains and soldiers, at one door, and Dorigen with Ladyes, at another.

Dor. Hail, General of Rome; from Sophocles
That honors Martius, Dorigen presents
Her self to be dishonour'd: do thy will;
For Sophocles commands me to obey.
Come, violate all rules of holiness,
And rend the consecrated knot of love.

Mar. Never, Valerius, was I blest till now:
Behold the end of all my weary steps,
The prize of all my Battels: leave us all;
Leave us as quick as thought. Thus joy begin,
In zealous love a minutes loss is sin.

Val. Can Martius, be so vile? or Dorigen?

Dor. Stay, stay, and monster, keep thou further of;
I thought thy brave soul would have much, much loath'd
To have gone on still on such terms as this.
See, thou ungrateful, since thy desperate lust
Nothing can cure but death, I'll die for thee,
Whilst my chaste name lives to posterity.

Mar. Live, live, thou Angel of thy sex: forgive,
Till by those golden tresses thou be'st snatch'd
Alive to Heaven: for thy corruption's
So little, that it cannot suffer death.
Was ever such a woman? O my mirror!
How perfectly thou shew'st me all my faults,
Which now I hate, and when I next attempt thee,
Let all the fires in the Zodiak
Drop on this curst head.

All. O blest event!

Dor. Rise like the sun again in all his glory,
After a dark Eclipse.

Mar. Never without a pardon.

Enter Sophocles, and two or three with him.

Dor. Sir, you have forgiven your self.

Soph. Behold their impudence: are my words just?
Unthankful man, viper to Arms, and Rome
Thy natural mother; have I warm'd thee here
To corrode ev'n my heart? Martius, prepare
To kill me, or be kill'd.

Mar. Why Sophocles?

Then prethee kill me; I deserve it highly;
For I have both transgress'd 'gainst men, and gods;
But am repentant now, and in best case
To uncase my soul of this oppressing flesh;
Which, though (Gods witness) nev'r was actually Injurious to thy wife and thee, yet 't was
Her goodness that restrain'd and held me now:
But take my life, dear friend, for my intent,
Or else forgive it.

Val. By the gods of Athens,
These words are true, and all direct again.

Soph. Pardon me, Dorigen.

Mar. Forgive me, Sophocles,
And Dorigen too, and every one that 's good.

Dor. Rise, noble Roman, belov'd Sophocles,
Take to thy brest thy friend.

Mar. And to thy heart

Thy matchless wife: Heaven has not stuff enough
To make another such: for if it could,
Martius would marry too. For thy blest sake

(O thou infinite of excellence)

Henceforth in mens discourse Rome shall not take The wall of Athens, as 'tore. But when
In their fair honors we to speak do come,
We'll say 'T was so in Athens, and in Rome.

Exeunt in pomp.

Diana descends.

Diana. Honor set ope thy gates, and with thee bring
My servant and thy friend, fair Dorigen:
Let her triumph with her, her Lord, and friend,
Who, though misled, still honor was their end.
Flourish.

Enter the Shew of Honors Triumph; a great flourish of Trumpets and Drums within; Then enter a noise of Trumpets sounding cheerfully. Then follows an armed Knight bearing a Crimson Banneret in hand, with the inscription Valour: by his side a Lady, bearing a Watchet Banneret, the inscription Clemencie: next Martius and Sophocles with Coronets. Next, two Ladyes, one bearing a white Banneret, the inscription Chastity; the other a black, the inscription Constancie. Then Dorigen crown'd. Last, a Chariot drawn by two Moors, in it a Person crown'd, with a Scepteron the top, in an antick Scutcheon, is written Honor. As they pass over, Diana ascends.

Rinald. How like you it?

Frig. Rarely; so well, I would they would do it again.
How many of our wives now adays would deserve to triumph in such a Chariot?

Rinald. That's all one; you see they triumph in Caroches.

Frig. That they do, by the mass; but not all neither;
many of them are content with Carts. But Seignior, I have now found out a great absurditie i'faith.

Rinald. What was 't?

Frig. The Prologue presenting four Triumphs, made but three legs to the King: a three-legged Prologue, 't was monstrous.

Rinald. 'T had been more monstrous to have had a four-legg'd one. Peace, the King speaks.

Em. Here was a woman, Isabel.

Isa. I, my Lord,

But that she told a lye to vex her husband;
Therein shs fail'd.

Em. She serv'd him well enough;
He that was so much man, yet would be cast
To jealousy for her integrity.
This teacheth us, the passion of love
Can fight with Soldiers, and with Scholars too.

Isa. In Martius, clemencie and valour shown,
In the other, courage and humanitie;
And therefore in the Triumph they were usher'd
By clemencie and valour.

Em. Rightly observ'd,
As she by chastitie and constancie;
What hurt 's now in a Play, against which some rail
So vehemently? thou and I, my love,
Make excellent use methinks: I learn to be
A lawful lover void of jealousy,
And thou a constant wife. Sweet Poetry 's
A flower, where men, like Bees and Spiders, may Bear poison, or else sweets and Wax away.
Be venom-drawing Spiders they that will;
I'll be the Bee, and suck the honey still. Flourish.

Cupid descends.

Cupid. Stay, clouds, ye rack too fast: bright Phabus see,
Honor has triumph'd with fair Chastity:
Give Love now leave, in purity to shew
Unchaste affeions flie not from his bowe.
Produce the sweet example of your youth.
Whilst I provide a Triumph for your Truth.

Flourish.

Enter.

Enter Violanta (with child) and Gerrard.

Viol. Why does my Gerrard grieve?

Ger. O my sweet Mistris,

'T is not life (which by our Milain law
My fact hath forfeited) makes me thus pensive;
That I would lose to save the little finger
Of this your noble burthen, from least hurt,
Because your blood is in't. But since your love
Made poor incompatible me the parent,
(Being we are not married) your dear blood
Falls under the same cruel penalty;
And can Heaven think sit ye die for me?
For Heavens sake say I ravish't you, I'll swear it,
To keep your life, and repute unstain'd.

Viol. O Gerrard, th' art my life and faculties:
And if I lose thee, I'll not keep mine own;
The thought of whom, sweetens all miseries.
Wouldst have me murder thee beyond thy death?
Unjustly scandal thee with ravishment?
It was so far from rape, that Heaven doth know,
If ever the first Lovers, ere they fell,
Knew simply in the state of innocence,
Such was this act, this, that doth ask no blush.

Ger. O! but my rarest Violanta, when
My Lord Randulpho brother to your father,
Shall understand this, how will he exclaim,
That my poor Aunt, and me, which his free alms
Hath nurs'd, since Millain by the Duke of Mantua
(Who now usurps it) was surpriz'd? that time
My father and my mother were both slain,
With my Aunts husband, as she says, their states
Despoil'd and seiz'd; 'tis past my memory,
But thus she told me: onely thus I know,
Since I could understand, your honor'd Uncle
Hath given me all the liberal education,
That his own son might look for, had he one;
Now will he say, Dost thou requite me thus?
O! the thought kills me.

Viol. Gentle, gentle Gerrard,
Be cheer'd, and hope the best. My mother, father,
And uncle love me most indulgently,
Being the onely branch of all their stocks:
But neither they, nor he thou wouldst not grieve
With this unwelcom news, shall ever hear
Violanta's tongue reveal, much less accuse
Gerrard to be the father of his own;
I'll rather silent die, that thou maist live
To see thy little of-spring grow and thrive.

Enter Dorothea.

Dor. Mistris, away your Lord and father seeks you;
I'll convey Gerrard out at the back door;
He has found a husband for you, and insults
In his invention, little thinking you
Have made your own choice, and posses't him too.

Viol. A husband? 't mus be Gerrard, or my death.
Fare well; be onely true unto thy self,
And know Heavens goodnes shall prevented be,
Ere worthiest Gerrard suffer harm for me.

Ger. Fare well, my life and soul. Aunt, to your counsel
I flee for aid. O unexpressible love! thou art
An undigested heap of mixt extremes,
Whose pangs are wakings, and whose pleasures dreams.

Exeunt.

Enter Benvoglio, Angelina, Ferdinand.

Ben. My Angelina, never didst thou yet
So please me, as in this consent; and yet
Thou hast pleas'd me well, I swear, old wench: ha, ha.
Ferdinand, she 's thine own; thou'lt have her, boy,

Ask thy good Lady else.

Ferd. Whom shall I have, Sir?

Ben. Whom d' ye think, ifaith?

Angel. Ghess.

Ferd. Noble Madam,

I may hope (prompted by shallow merit)
Through your profound grace, for your chamber-maid.

Ben. How 's that? how 's that?

Ferd. Her chamber-pot, my Lord. You modest as,
Thou never shew'dst thy self an as till now.
'Fore Heaven I am angrie with thee. Sirha, sirha,
This whitmeat-spirit's not yours, legitimate,
Advance your hope, and 't please you: ghess again.

Ang. And let your thoughts flee higher: aim them right;
Sir, you may hit, you have the fairest white.

Ferd. If I may be so bold then, my good Lord,
Your favour doth encourage me to aspire
To catch my Ladyes Gentlewoman.

Ben. Where?

Where would you catch her?

Do you know my daughter Violanta, Sir?

Ang. Well said: no more about the bush.

Ferd. My good Lord,

I have gaz'd on Violanta, and the stars,
Whose Heavenly influence I admir'd, not knew,
Nor ever was so sinful to believe
I might attain 't.

Ben. Now you are an as again;
For if thou ne'er attain'st, 't is onely long
Of that faint heart of thine, which never did it.
She is your Lords heir, mine, Benvoglio's heir,
My brothers too, Randulpho's; her descent
Not behinde any of the Millanois.

And Ferdinand, although thy parentage
Be unknown, thou know'st that I have bred thee up
From five yeers old, and (do not blush to hear it)
Have found thy wisdom, trust, and fair success
So full in all my affaris, that I am fitter
To call thee Master, then thou me thy Lord.

Thou canst not be but sprung of gentlest blood;
Thy minde shines thorow thee, like the radiant sun,
Although thy body be a beauteous cloud.

Come, seriously this is no flatterie,
And well thou know'st it, though thy modest blood
Rise like the morning in thy cheek to hear 't.
Sir, I can speak in earnest: Vertuous service,
So meritorious, Ferdinand, as yours,
(Yet bashful still, and silent?) should extract
A fuller price then impudence exact:
And this is now the wages it must have;
My daughter is thy wife, my wealth thy slave.

Ferd. Good Madam pinch; I sleep: does my Lord mock,
And you assist? Custom's inverted quite;
For old men now adays do flout the young.

Ben. Fetch Violanta. As I intend this Religiously, let my soul finde joy or pain.

Exit Angelina.

Ferd. My honor'd Lord and Master, if I hold
That worth could merit such felicitie,
You bred it in me, and first purchas'd it;
It is your own: and what productions
In all my faculties my soul begets,
Your very mark is on: you need not add
Rewards to him, that is in debt to you:
You sav'd my life, Sir, in the Massacre;
There you begot me new, since foster'd me.
O! can I serve to much, or pray for you?
Alas, 'tis slender paiment to your bountie.
Your daughter is a paradise, and I
Unworthie to be set there; you may chuse
The royallst seeds of Milain.

Ben. Prethee peace,
Thy goodnes makes me weep; I am resolv'd:

I am no Lord o' th' time, to tie my blood
To fordid muck; I have enough: my name,
My estate and honors I will store in thee,
Whose wisdom will rule well, keep and increase:
A knave or fool, that could confer the like,
Would bate each hour, diminish every day.
Thou art her price-lot than, drawn out by fate;
An honest wife man is a Princes mate.

Ferd. Sir, Heaven and you have over-charge'd my breast
With grace beyond my continuence; I shall burst:
The blessing you have given me (witness Saints)
I would not change for Millain: But, my Lord,
Is she prepar'd?

Ben. What needs Preparative,
Where such a Cordial is prescrib'd as thou?
Thy person and thy virtues in one scale,
Shall poize hers, with her beautie and her wealth;
If not, I add my will unto thy weight;
Thy mother's with her now. Son, take my keys,
And let this preparation for this Marriage,
(This welcome Marriage) long determin'd here,
Be quick, and gorgeous.—Gerrard.

Enter Gerrard.

Ger. My good Lord,
My Lord, your brother craves your conference
Instantly, on affairs of high import.

Ben. Why, what news?

Ger. The Tyrant, my good Lord,
Is sick to death of his old Apoplexie,
Whereon the States advise, that Letters-missive
Be straight dispatcht to all the neighbour-Countreys,
And Schedules too divulg'd on every post,
To enquire the lost Duke forth: their purpose is To re-instate him.

Ben. 'Tis a pious deed.

Ferdinand, to my daughter: this delay
(Though to so good a purpose) 'angers me;
But I'll recover it. Be secret, son.
Go woo with truth and expedition.

Exit.

Ferd. O my unfounded joy! how fares my Gerrard,
My noble twin-friend? fie, thy look is heavie,
Sullen, and sowre; blanch it: didst thou know
My cause of joy, thou 'ldst never sorrow more,
I know thou lov'st me so, How dost thou?

Ger. Well,
Too well: my fraught of health my sickness is;
In life, I am dead; by living dying still.

Ferd. What sublunary mischief can predominate
A wife man thus? or doth thy friendship play
(In this antipathous extreme) with mine,
Left gladness suffocate me? I, I, I do feel
My spirit's turn'd to fire, my blood to air,
And I am like a purish'd essence
Tri'd from all drossie parts.

Ger. Were 't but my life,
The loss were sacrific'd; but virtue
Must for me be slain, and innocence made dust.

Ferd. Fare well good Gerrard.

Ger. Dearest friend, stay.

Ferd. Sad thoughts are no companions for me now,
Much less sad words: thy bosom hides some secret,
Which do not trust me with; for mine retains
Another, which I must conceal from thee.

Ger. I would reveal it: 't is a heavie tale:
Canst thou be true, and secret still?

Ferd. Why, friend?

If you continue true unto your self,
I have no means of falsehood. Lock this door;
Come, yet your prisoner's sure.

Ger. Stay, Ferdinand.

Ferd. What is this trouble? Love?
Why, thou art capable of any woman.

Doth want oppress thee? I will lighten thee:
Hast thou offended law? My Lord and thine,
And I, will save thy life. Does servitude
Upbraid thy freedom, that she suffers it?
Have patience but three days, and I will make thee
Thy Lords companion. Can a friend do more?

Ger. Lend me the means. How can this be?

Ferd. First, let this Cabinet keep your pawn, and I will trust:

Yet for the form of satisfaction,
Take this my Oath to boot. By my presum'd
Gentrie, and sacred known Christianitie,
I'll die, ere I reveal thy trust.

Ger. Then hear it.

Your Lords fair daughter Violanta is
My betrothed wife, goes great with childe by me;
And by this deed both made a pray to Law.
How may I save her life? advise me, friend.

Ferd. What did he say? Gerrard, whose voice was that?
O death unto my heart, bane to my soul!
My wealth is vanish'd like the rich mans store:
In one poor minute all my daintie fare
But jugling dishes; my fat hope, despair.

Ger. Is this so odious? where 's your mirth?

Ferd. Why thou

Hast robb'd me of it. Gerrard, draw thy sword,
And if thou lov'st my Mistris chastitie,
Defend it, else I'll cut it from thy heart,
Thy theevish heart that stole it, and restore 't,
Do miracles to gain her.

Ger. Was she thine?

Ferd. Never, but in my wish, and her fathers vow,
Which now he left with me, on such sure terms;
He call'd me son, and will'd me to provide
My Wedding-preparation.

Ger. Strange.

Ferd. Come, let's

Kill one another quickly.

Ger. Ferdinand, my love is old to her, thine new begot:
I have not wrong'd thee; think upon thine Oath.

Ferd. It manacles me, Gerrard, else this hand
Should bear thee to the Law. Fare well for ever:
Since friendship is so fatal, never more
Will I have friend: thou hast put so sure a plea,
That all my weal's litigious made by thee.

Ger. I did no crime to you. His love transports him;
And yet I mourn, that cruel destinie
Should make us two thus one anothers cross:
We have lov'd since boys; for the same time cast him
On Lord Benvoglio, that my Aunt and I
Were succour'd by Randulpho: men have call'd us
The parallels of Millain; and some said
We were not much unlike. O Heaven divert,
That we should (ever since that time) be breeding
Mutual destruction.

Enter Dorothea.

Dor. O where are you? you have made a fair hand. By —yonder is your Aunt with my Lady; she came in, just as she was wooing your Mistris for another; and what did me she, but out with her purse, and shew'd all the naked truth, ifaith. Fie upon you, you should never trust an-old woman with a secret; they cannot hold; they cannot hold so well as we, and you'd hang 'em. First, there was swearing and staring, then there was howling and weeping, and O my daughter, and O my mother.

Ger. The effect, the effect.

Dor. Marry no way, but one with you.

Ger. Why welcom. Shall she scape?

Dor. Nay, she has made her scape already.

Ger. Why, is she gone?

Dor. The scape of her virginie, I mean.
You men are as dull, you can conceive nothing;

Yo uthink it is enough to beget.

Ger. I; but surely, Dorothea, that scap'd not; Her maiden-head suffer'd.

Dor. And you were the Executioner. (Doll?)

Ger. But what's the event? lord, how thou starv'st me,

Dor. Lord how thou starv'st me, Doll? By——I would fain see you cry a little. Do you stand now, as if you could get a child? Come, I'll rack you no more: This is the heart of the business: always provided, Signior, that if it please the fates to make you a Lord, you be not proud, nor forget your poor handmaid Doll, who was partly accessory to the incision of this Holofernian Maidenhead.

Ger. I will forget my name first. Speak.

Dor. Then thus; My Lady knows all; her sorrow is reasonably well digested; has vow'd to conceal it from my Lord, till delay ripen things better; Wills you to attend her this evening at the back gate; I'll let you in; where her own Confessor shall put you together lawfully, e'r the child be born; which birth is very near, I can allure you: all your charge is your vigilance; and to bring with you some trusty Nurse, to convey the Infant out of the house.

Ger. Oh beam of comfort, take! go, tell my Lady I pray for her as I walk: my joys so flow, That what I speak or do, I do not know. Exeunt.

Dumb Shew.

Enter Violanta at one door, weeping, supported by Cornelia and a Frier; at another door, Angelina weeping, attended by Dorothea. Violanta kneels down for pardon. Angelina shewing remorse, takes her up, and cheers her; so doth Cornelia. Angelina sends Dorothea for Gerrard. Enter Gerrard with Dorothea: Angelina and Cornelia seem to chide him, shewing Violanta's heavy plight: Violanta rejoiceth in him: he makes signes of sorrow, intreating pardon: Angelina brings Gerrard and Violanta to the Frier; he joins them hand in hand, takes a Ring from Gerrard, puts it on Violanta's finger; blesseth them; Gerrard kisseth her: the Frier takes his leave. Violanta makes shew of great pain, is instantly conveyed in by the Women, Gerrard is bid stay; he walks in meditation, seeming to pray. Enter Dorothea, whispers him, sends him out. Enter Gerrard with a Nurse blindfold; gives her a purse. To them Enter Angelina and Cornelia with an Infant; they present it to Gerrard; he kisseth and blesseth it; puts it into the Nurses arms, kneels, and takes his leave. Exeunt all severally.

Enter Benvoglio and Randulpho.

Ben. He's dead, you say then.

Rand. Certainly: and to hear

The people now dissect him now he's gone,
Makes my ears burn, that lov'd him not: such Libels;
Such Elegies and Epigrams they have made,
More odious than he was. Brother, great men
Had need to live by love, meting their deeds
With virtues rule; found, with the weight of judgement,
Their privat'st action: for though while they live
Their power and policie masque their villanics,
Their bribes, their lust, pride, and ambition,
And make a many slaves to worship 'em,
That are their flatterers, and their bawds in these:
These very slaves shall, when these great beasts dye,
Publish their bowels to the vulgar eye.

Ben. Fore Heaven 'tis true. But is Rinaldo (brother) our good Duke, heard of living?

Rand. Living, Sir, and will be shortly with the Senate: has

Been close conceal'd at Mantua, and reliev'd:

But what's become of his? no tidings yet?

But brother, till our good Duke shall arrive,
Carry this news, here. Where's your Ferdinand?

Ben. Oh busie, Sir, about this marriage:

And yet my Girl o'th' suddain is fall'n sick:
You'll see her e'r you go?

Rand. Yes; well I love her;
And yet I wish I had another daughter
To gratifie my Gerrard, who (by——)

Is all the glory of my family,
But has too much worth to live so obscure;

I'll have him Secretary of Estate

Upon the Dukes return: for credit me,

The value of that Gentleman's not known;

His strong abilities are fit to guide

The whole Republique: he hath Learning, youth,

Valour, discretion, honesty of a Saint;

His Aunt is wondrous good too.

Enter Violanta in a bed; Angelina and Dorothea sitting by her.

Ben. You have spoke
The very character of Ferdinand:
One is the others mirror. How now, Daughter?

Rand. How fares my Neece?

Viol. A little better, Uncle, then I was,
I thank you.

Rand. Brother, a meer cold. (thanked)

Angel. It was a cold and heat, I think: but Heaven be
We have broken that away.

Ben. And yet, Violanta,
You'll lie alone still, and you see what's got.

Dor. Sure, Sir, when this was got, she had a bed-fellow.

Rand. What has her chollick left her in her belly?

Dor. 'T has left her, but she has had a fore-fit.

Rand. I, that same Collick and Stone's inherent to us

O'th' womans side: our Mothers had them both.

Dor. So has she had, Sir. How these old fornicators talk?
she had more

Need of Mace-Ale, and Rhenish-wine Caudles, heaven knows,
Then your aged Discipline.

Ben. Say?

Enter Ferdinand.

Ang. She will have the man; and on recovery
Will wholly be dispos'd by you.

Ben. That's my wench:
How now? what change is this? why Ferdinand,
Are these your Robes of joy should be indu'd?

Doth Hymen wear black? I did send for you

To have my honorable Brother witness

The Contract I will make 'twixt you and her.

Put off all doubt; she loves ye? what d'ye say?

Rand. Speak man, Why look you so distractedly?

Ferd. There are your keys, I'll no Contract, I.

Divinest Violanta, I will serve you

Thus on my knees, and pray for you: Juno, Lucina fer opem.

My inequality ascends no higher:

I dare not marry you.

Ben. How's this?

Ferd. Good night,

I have a friend has almost made me mad:

I weep sometimes, and instantly can laugh:

Nay, I do dance, and sing, and suddenly

Roar like a storm. Strange tricks these, are they not?

And wherefore all this? Shall I tell you? no,

Thorow mine ears, my heart a plague hath caught,

And I have vow'd to keep it close, not shew

My grief to any; for it has no cure.

On, wand'ring steps, to some remote place move:

I'll keep my vow, though I have lost my Love. Exit.

Ben. Fore heaven, distracted for her! fare you well:

I'll watch his steps; for I no joy shall find,

Till I have found his cause, and calm'd his mind.

Stet. He's overcome with joy.

Z z z

Exit.

Ange

Angel. 'Tis very strange.

Rand. Well, Sister, I must leave you; the time's busie.
Violanta, cheer you up: and I pray Heaven
Restore each to their love, and health again.

Viol. Amen, Great Uncle. Mother, what a chance
Unluckily is added to my woe,
In this young Gentleman?

Angel. True, Violanta:
It grieves me much. Doll, go you instantly,
And find out Gerrard; tell him his friends hap,
And let him use best means to comfort him;
But as his life preserve this secret still.

Viol. Mother, I'd not offend you: might not Gerrard
Steal in, and see me in the evening?

Angel. Well,
Bid him do so.

Viol. Heavens blessing o' your heart.
Do ye not call Child-bearing, Travel, Mother?

Angel. Yes.

Viol. It well may be, The bare-foot traveller
That's born a Prince, and walks his pilgrimage,
Whose tender feet kiss the remorseless stones
Only, ne'er felt a travel like to it.

Alas, dear Mother, you groan'd thus for me,
And yet how disobedient have I been!

Angel. Peace, Violanta, thou hast always been Gentle and good.

Viol. Gerrard is better, Mother:
Oh if you knew the implicate innocence
Dwells in his breast, you'd love him like your Prayers.
I see no reason but my Father might
Be told the truth, being pleas'd for Ferdinand
To woo himself: and Gerrard ever was
His full comparative: my Uncle loves him,
As he loves Ferdinand.

Angel. No, not for the world,
Since his intent is cross'd: lov'd Ferdinand
Thus ruin'd, and a child got out of wedlock:
his madness would pursue ye both to death.

Viol. As you please (mother:) I am now, methinks,
Even in the land of ease; I'll sleep.

Angel. Draw in
The bed nearer the fire: silken rest,
Tie all thy cares up.

Exeunt.

Enter Ferdinand and Benvoglio privately after him

Ferd. Oh blessed solitude! here my griefs may speak;
And sorrow, I will argue with thee now:
Nothing will keep me company: the flowers
Die at my moan; the gliding silver streams
Hasten to flee my lamentations;
The air rolls from 'em; and the Golden Sun
Is smother'd pale as Phæbe with my sighs:
Only the earth is kind, that stays. Then earth,
To thee will I complain. Why do the Heavens
Impose upon me Love, what I can ne'er enjoy?
Before fruition was impossible,
I did not thirst it. Gerrard, she is thine,
Scal'd and deliver'd; but 'twas ill to stain
Her virgin state, e'er ye were married.
Poor Infant, what's become of thee? thou know'st not
The woe thy parents brought thee too. Dear earth,
Bury this close in thy sterility;
Be barren to this seed, let it not grow;
For if it do, 'twill bud no Violet
Nor Gillyflower, but wild Brier, or rank Rue,
Unfavorable and hurtful.

Ben. Ferdinand,
Thy steel hath digg'd the Earth, thy words my Heart.

Ferd. Oh! I have violated faith, betray'd
My friend and innocence.

Ben. Desperate youth,
Violate not thy soul too: I have showers
For thee, young man; but Gerrard flames for thee.
Was thy base pen made to dash out mine honor,

And prostitute my Daughter? Bastard, whore,
Come, turn thy femal tears into revenge,
Which I will quench my thirst with, e'er I see Daughter, or Wife, or branded Family.

By——both dye: and for amends,
Ferd'nando be my heir. I'll to my brother,
First tell him all, then to the Duke for justice:
This morning he's receiv'd. Mountains nor Seas
Shall bar my flight to vengeance: the foul stain
Printed on me, thy blood shall rinse again.

Exit

Ferd. I have transgress'd all goodness, witlessly
Rais'd mine own curse from posterity:
I'll follow, to redress in what I may;
If not, your heir can dye as well as they.

Exit.

Dumb Shew.

Enter Duke Rinaldo with Attendants, at one door;
States, Randulpho, and Gerrard, at another;
they kneel to the Duke, he accepts their obedience, and raises them up: they prefer Gerrard to the Duke, who entertains him: they seat the Duke in State. Enter Benvoglio and Ferdinand: Benvoglio kneels for justice; Ferd. seems to restrain him. Benvog. gives the Duke a paper; Duke reads, frowns on Gerr. shews the paper to the States, they seem sorry, consult, cause the Guard to apprehend him; they go off with him. Then Rand. and Benv.
seem to crave justice; Duke vows it, and exit with his attendants. Rand. Ben. and Ferd. confer.
Enter to them Cornelia with two servants; she seems to expostulate, Rand. in scorn, causeth her to be thrust out poorly. Exit Rand. Benv. beckons Ferd.
to him (with much seeming passion) swears him;
then stamps with his foot. Enter Dorothea with a Cup, weeping, she delivers it to Ferd. who with discontent exit; and exeunt Benvoglio and Dorothea.

Enter Violanta.

Viol. Gerrard not come? nor Dorothy return'd?
What adverse star rul'd my Nativity?
The time to night has been as dilatory
As languishing Consumptions. But till now
I never durst say, my Gerrard was unkind.
Heaven grant all things go well; and nothing does,
If he be ill, which I much fear: my dreams
Have been portentous. I did think I saw
My Love araid for battel with a beast,
A hideous Monster, arm'd with teeth and claws,
Grinning, and venemous, that sought to make
Both us a prey: on's tail wash lash'd in blood
Law: and his forehead I did plainly see
Held Characters that spell'd Authority.
This rent my slumbers; and my fearful soul
Ran searching up and down my dismaid breast,
To find a Port t'escape. Good faith, I am cold;
But Gerrard's love is colder: here I'll sit,
And think my self away.

Enter Ferdinand with a Cup and a Letter.

Ferd. The peace of Love
Attend the sweet Violanta: Read,
For the sad news I bring, I do not know;
Only I am sworn to give you that, and this.

Viol. Is it from Gerrard? gentle Ferdinand,
How glad am I to see you thus well restor'd?
In troth he never wrong'd you in his life,
Nor I, but always held fair thoughts of you,
Knew not my Fathers meaning, till of late;
Could never have known it soon enough: for Sir,
Gerrard's, and my affection began
In infancy: My Uncle brought him oft
In long coats hither; you were such another;

The

The little boy would kiss me, being a child,
And say, he lov'd me; give me all his toys,
Bracelets, Rings, Sweet-meats, all his Rosie-smiles:
I then would stand, and stare upon his eyes,
Play with his locks, and swear I lov'd him too;
For sure, methought, he was a little Love,
He woo'd so prettily in innocence,
That then he warm'd my fancy; for I felt
A glimmering beam of Love kindle my blood,
Both which, time since hath made a flame and flood:

Fer. Oh gentle innocent! methinks it talks
Like a child itill, whose white simplicity
Never arriv'd at sin. Forgive me, Lady,
I have destroy'd Gerrard, and thee; rebell'd
Against Heavens Ordinance; dis-pair'd two Doves,
Made 'em sit mourning; slaughter'd Love, and cleft
The heart of all integrity. This breast
Was trusted with the secret of your vow
By Gerrard, and reveal'd it to your Father.

Viol. Hah!

Ferd. Read, and curse me.

Viol. Neither: I will never
Nor Write, nor Read again.

Ferd. My penance be it.

Reads. Your Labyrinth is found, your Lust proclaim'd:

Viol. Lust? Humh:

My Mother sure felt none, when I was got:

Fer. I, and the Law implacably offended.

Gerrard's imprison'd, and to dye.

Viol. Oh Heaven!

Ferd. And you to suffer with reproach and scoffs
A publick execution; I have sent you

An Antidote 'gainst shame, poison; by him

You have most wrong'd: give him your penitent tears.

Viol. Humh: 'tis not truth.

Ferd. Drink, and farewell for ever:
And though thy whoredom blemish thy whole line,
Prevent the Hangmans stroke, and die like mine.

Viol. Oh woe is me for Gerrard: I have brought Confusion on the noblest Gentleman

That ever truly lov'd. But we shall meet
Where our condemners shall not, and enjoy
A more refin'd affection than here;
No Law, nor Father hinders marriage there
'Twi'x souls Divinely aff'd, as (sure) ours were:

There we will multiply, and generate joyes
Like fruitful Parents. Luckless Ferdinand,
Where's the good old Gentlewoman, my Husbands Aunt?

Ferd. Thrust from you Uncle o all poverty.

Viol. Alas the piry: reach me, Sir, the cup;
I'll say my prayers, and take my Fathers Physick.

Ferd. Oh villain that I was, I had forgot
To spill the rest, and am unable now
To stir to hinder her.

Viol. What ail you, Sir?

Ferd. Your Father is a monster, I a villain,
This tongue has kill'd you, pardon, Violanto,
Oh pardon, Gerrard; and for sacrifice,
Accept my life, to expiate my fault.
I have drunk up the poison.

Viol. Thou art not so
Uncharitable: a better fellow far,
Thou'st left me halfe. Sure death is now a-dry,
And calls for more blood still to quench his thirst.
I pledge thee Ferdinand, to Gerrard's health:
Dear Gerrard, poor Aunt, and unfortunate friend,
Ay me, that Love should breed true Lovers end.

Fer. Stay Madam, stay; help ho, for Heavens sake help
Improvident man, that good I did intend
For satisfaction, saving of her life;
My equal cruel Stars made me forget.

Enter Angelina with two Servants.

Ang. What spectacle of death assaults me? oh!

Viol. O dearest Mother, I am dead, I leave
Father, and friends, and life, to follow Love.
Good Mother, love my Child, that did no ill.
Fie, how men lie, that say, death is a pain:
Or has he chang'd his nature? like soft sleep
He seizes me. Your blessing. Last, I crave,
That I may rest by Gerrard in his grave.

Ferd. There lay me too: oh! noble Mistress, I
Have caus'd all this; and therefore justly dye.
That key will open all.

Ang. Oh viperous Father!
For Heavens sake, bear 'em in: run for Physitians,
And Medicines quickly: Heaven, thou shalt not have her
Yet; 'tis too soon: Alas, I have no more,
And taking her away, thou rob'st the poor.

Exeunt.

Flourish.

Enter Duke, States, Randulpho, Benvoglio, Gerrard, Executioner, Guard.

Duke. The Law, as greedy as your red desire
Benvoglio, hath cast this man: 'Tis pity
So many excellent parts are swallow'd up
In one foul wave. Is Violanta sent for?
Our Justice must not lop a branch, and let
The body grow still.

Ben. Sir, she will be here
Alive or dead, I am sure.

Cer. How cheerfully my countenance comments death?
That which makes men seem horrid, I will wear
Like to an Ornament. Oh Violanta!
Might my life only satisfy the Law,
How jocundly my soul would enter Heaven?
Why shouldst thou dye? thou wither'st in thy bud,
As I have seen a Rose, e'er it was blown.
I do beseech your Grace, the Statute may
(In this case made) be read: not that I hope
T'extenuate my offence or penalty,
But to see whether it lay hold on her.
And since my death is more exemplary
Than just, this publick Reading will advise Caution to others.

Duke. Read it.

Ran. Brother, does not
Your foul groan under this severity?

Statute read.

*A Statute provided in case of unequal Matches,
Marriages against Parents consent, stealing of Heirs, Rapes, Prostitutions, and such like: That if any person meanly descended, or ignorant of his own Parentage, which implies as much, shall with a foul intent, unlawfully sollicite the Daughter of any Peer of the Dukedom, he shall for the same offence forfeit his right hand: but if he further prostitute her to his Lust, he shall first have his right hand cut off, and then suffer death by the common Executioner. After whom, the Lady so offending, shall likewise the next day, in the same manner, dye for the Fact.*

Ger. This Statute has more cruelty than sense:
I see no ray of Mercy. Must the Lady
Suffer death too? suppose she were inforc'd,
By some confederates born away, and ravish'd;
Is she not guiltless?

Duke. Yes, if it be prov'd.

Z z z 2

Ger.

Ger. This case is so: I ravish'd Violanta,

State. Who ever knew a Rape produce a child?

Ben. Fish, these are idle. Will your grace command
The Executioner proceed?

Duke. Your Office.

Ger. Farewell to thy inticing vanity,
Thou round gilt box, that dost deceive man's eye:
The wise man knows, when open thou art broke,
The treasure thou includ'st, is dust and smoke,
Even thus, I cast thee by. My Lords, the Law
Is but the great mans mule, he rides on it,
And tramples poorer men under his feet;
Yet when they come to knock at yon bright Gate,
Ones Rags shall enter, 'fore the others State.
Peace to ye all: here, sirrah, strike: this hand
Hath Violanta kiss'd a thousand times;
It smells sweet ever since: this was the hand
Flighted my faith to her: do not think thou canst
Cut that in sunder with my hand. My Lord,
As free from speck as this armis, my heart
Is of foul Lust, and every vein glides here
As full of truth. Why does thy hand shake so?
'Tis mine must be cut off, and that is firm;
For it was ever constant.

Enter Cornelia.

Ger. Hold; your Sentence
Unjustly is pronounced, my Lord: this blow
Cuts your hand off; for his is none of yours:
But Violanta's given in Holy marriage
Before she was delivered, consummated
With the free Will of her Mother, by her Confessor,
In Lord Benvoglio's house.

Ger. Alas good Aunt,
That helps us nothing; else I had reveal'd it.

Duke. What woman's this?

Ben. A base confederate
In this proceeding, kept of alms long time
By him; who now expos'd to misery,
Talks thus distractedly. Attach her, Guard.

Ran. Your cruelty (brother) will have end.

Cor. You'd best
Let them attach my tongue.

Duke. Good woman, peace:
For were this truth, it doth not help thy Nephew;
The Law's infring'd by their disparity,
That forfeits both their lives.

Cor. Sir, with your pardon,
Had your Grace ever children?

Duke. Thou hast put
A question, whose sharp point toucheth my heart:
I had two little Sons, twins, who were both
(With my good Dutchess) slain, as I did hear;
At that time when my Dukedom was surpriz'd.

Cor. I have heard many say (my gracious Lord)
That I was wondrous like her.

All. Ha?

Duke. By all mans joy, it is Cornelia,
My dearest wife.

Cor. To ratifie me her,
Come down, Alphonso, one of those two twins,
And take thy Fathers blessing: thou hast broke
No Law, thy birth being above thy wives:

Ascanio is the other, nam'd Fernando,
Who by remote means, to my Lord, Benvoglio
I got preferr'd; and in poor habits clad,
(You fled, and th' innovation laid again)
I wrought my self into Randulpho's service,
With my eldest boy; yet never durst reveal
What they and I were, no, not to themselves,
Until the Tyrants death.

Duke. My joy has fill'd me
Like a full-winded sail: I cannot speak.

Ger. Fetch Violanta and my brother.

Ben. Run,

Run like a spout, you rogue: a—o' poison,
That little whore I trusted, will betray me.
Stay, hangman, I have work for you; there's Gold;
Cut off my head, or hang me presently.

Soft Musick.

Enter Angelina with the bodies of Ferdinand and Violanta on a bier; Dorothea carrying the Cup and Letter, which she gives to the Duke: he reads, seems sorrowful; shews it to Cornelia and Gerrard: they lament over the bier.
Randulpho and Benvoglio seem fearful, and seem to report to Angelina and Dorothea, what hath passed before.

Ran. This is your rashness, brother.

Duke. Oh joy, thou wert too great to last;
This was a cruel turning to our hopes,
Unnatural Father: poor Ascanio.

Ger. Oh mother! let me be Gerrard again,
And follow Violanta.

Cor. Oh my Son—

Duke. Your lives yet, bloody men shall answer this.

Dor. I must not see 'em longer grieve. My Lord,
Be comforted; let sadness generally
Forfake each eye and bosom; they both live:
For poison, I infus'd meer Opium;
Holding compulsive perjury less sin
Than such a loathed murder would have bin.

All. Oh blessed Madam.

Dor. Musick, gently creep
Into their ears, and fright hence lazy sleep.
Morpheus, command thy servant sleep
In leaden chains no longer keep
This Prince and Lady: Rise, wake, rise,
And round about convey your eyes:
Rise Prince, go greet thy Father and thy Mother;
Rise thou, t'imbrace thy Husband and thy Brother.

Duke Cor. Son, Daughter.

Ferd. Father, Mother, Brother.

Ger. Wife.

Viol. Are we not all in Heaven?

Ger. Faith, very near it.

Ferd. How can this be?

Duke. Hear it.

Dor. If I had serv'd you right, I should have seen
Your old pate off, e'r I had reveal'd.

Ben. Oh wench!

Oh honest wench! if my wife die, I'll marry thee:
There's my reward.

Ferd. 'Tis true.

Duke. 'Tis very strange.

Ger. Why kneel you honest Master?

Ferd. My good Lord.

Ger. Dear Mother.

Duke. Rise, rise, all are friends: I owe ye for all their boards: And wench, take thou the man Whose life thou sav'dst; less cannot pay the merit.
How shall I part my kiss? I cannot: Let
One generally therefore joyn our cheeks.
A pen of Iron, and a leaf of Brass,
To keep this Story to Eternity:
And a Promethean Wit. Oh sacred Love,
Nor chance, nor death can thy firm truth remove.

Exeunt.
Flourish.

King. Now Isabella.

Ifab. This can true Love do.

I joy they all so happily are pleas'd:
The Ladies and the Brothers must triumph.

King. They do:

For Cupid scorns but 't have his triumph too.

Flourish.
The

The TRIUMPH.

Enter divers Musicians, then certain Singers bearing Bannerets inscribed, Truth, Loyalty, Patience, Concord: Next Gerrard and Ferdinand with Garlands of Roses: Then Violanta, Last, a Chariot drawn by two Cupids, and a Cupid sitting in it.

Flourish.

Enter PROLOGUE.

Love, and the strength of fair affection
(Most royal Sir) what long seem'd lost, have won
Their perfect ends, and crown'd those constant hearts
With lasting Triumph, whose most virtuous parts,
Worthy desires, and love, shall never end.
Now turn we round the Scene, and (Great Sir) lend
A sad and serious eye to this of Death,
This black and dismal Triumph; where man's breath,
Desert, and guilty bloud ascend the Stage,
And view the Tyrant, ruin'd in his rage.

Exit.

Flourish.

Enter L'avall, Gabriella and Maria.

Gab. No, good my Lord, I am not now to find
Your long neglect of me; All those affections
You came first clad in to my love, like Summer,
Lusty and full of life: all those desires
That like the painted Spring bloom'd round about ye,
Giving the happy promise of an Harvest,
How have I seen drop off, and fall forgotten?
With the least lustre of anothers beauty,
How oft (forgetful Lord) have I been blastad?
Was I so eas'ly won? or did this body
Yield to your false embraces with less labour
Then if you had carried some strong Town?

Lav. Good Gabriella

Gab. Could all your subtilties and sighs betray me.
The vows ye shook me with, the tears ye drown'd me,
Till I came fairly off with honor'd Marriage?
Oh fie, my Lord.

Lav. Prethee good Gabriella.

Gab. Would I had never known ye, nor your honors,
They are stuck too full of griefs: oh happy women,
That plant your Love in equal honest bosoms,
Whose sweet desires like Roses set together,
Make one another happy in their blushes,
Growing and dying without sense of greatness,
To which I am a slave! I. and that blest Sacrament
That daily makes millions of happy mothers; link'd me
To this man's Lust alone, there left me
I dare not say I am his wife, 'tis dangerous:
His Love, I cannot say: alas, how many? (know,

Lav. You grow too watm; pray be ye content, you best
The times necessity, and how our marriage
Being so much unequal to mine honor,
While the Duke lives, I standing high in favour;
And whilst I keep that safe, next to the Dukedom,
Must not be known, without my utter ruine.
Have patience for a while, and do but dream wench,
The glory of a Dutches. How she tires me?
How dull and leaden is my appetite
To that stale beauty now? oh, I could curse
And crucifie my self for childish doating.
Upon a face that feeds not with fresh Figures
Every fresh hour: she is now a surfet to me.

Enter Gentile.

Who's that? Gentile? I charge ye, no acquaintance
You nor your Maid with him, nor no discourse
Till times are riper.

Gent. Fie, my Noble Lord,
Can you be now a stranger to the Court,
When your most virtuous Bride, the beauteous Hellen
Stands ready like a Star to gild your happiness,
When Hymens lusty fires are now a lighting,
And all the Flower of Anjou?

Lav. Some few trifles,
For matter of adornment, have a little
Made me so slow, Gentile, which now in readines,
I am for Court immediately.

Gent. Take heed, Sir,
This is no time for trifling, nor she no Lady
To be now entertain'd with toys: 'twill cost ye —

Lav. Y'are an old Cock, Gentile.

Gent. By your Lordships favour.

Lav. Prethee away; 'twill lose time.

Gent. Oh my Lord,

Pardon me that by all means.

Lav. We have business.

A-foot man, of more moment.

Gent. Then my manners?

I know none, nor I seek none.

Lav. Take to morrow.

(Beauty.

Gent. Even now, by your Lordships leave. Excellent
My service here I ever dedicate,
In honor of my best friend, your dead Father,
To you his living virtue, and wish heartily,
That firm affection that made us two happy,
May take as deep undying root, and flourish
Betwixt my Daughter Castra, and your goodness,
Who shall be still your servant.

Gab. I much thank ye.

Lav. — Oh this dreaming puppy, Will ye go, Sir?

Gent. A little more, Good Lord.

Lav. Not now, by —

Come, I must use ye.

Gent. Goodness dwell still with you.

Exeunt Gentill and Laval.

Gab. The sight of this old Gentleman, Maria,
Pulls to my mine eyes again the living Picture
Of Perolot his virtuous Son, my first Love,
That dy'd at Orleance.

Mar. You have felt both fortunes,
And in extrems, poor Lady; for young Perolot.
Being every way unable to maintain you,
Durst not make known his love to Friend or Father:
My Lord Lavall, being powerful, and you poor,
Will not acknowledge you.

Gab. No more: Let's in wench:
There let my Lute speak my Laments; they have tried me.

Exeunt.

Enter two Courtiers.

1 Court. I grant, the Duke is wondrous provident
In his now planting for succession,
I know his care as honourable in the choice too.
Marines fair virtuous daughter: but what's all this?
To what end excellent arrives this travel,
When he that bears the main roof, is so rotten?

2 Court. You have hit it now indeed: For if Fame ye not
He is untemperate.

1 Court. You express him poorly,
Too gentle Sir: the most deoboist and barbarous;
Believe it, the most void of all humanity,
Howe'r his cunning, cloak it to his Uncle,
And those his pride depends upon.

1 Court. I have heard too,
Given excessively to drink.

1 Court.

1 Court. Most certain,
And in that drink most dangerous: I speak these things
To one I know loves truth, and dares not wrong her.

2 Court. You may speak on.

1 Court. Uncertain as the Sea, Sir,
Proud and deceitful as his fins Great Master;
His appetite to Women, (for there he carries
His main Sail spread) so boundles, and abominably,
That but to have her name by that tongue spoken,
Poisons the virtue of the purest Virgin.

2 Court. I am sorry for young Gabriella then,
A Maid reputed, ever of fair carriage,
For he has been noted visiting.

1 Court. She is gone then,
Or any else, that promises, or power,
Gifts, or his guilful vows can work upon,
But these are but poor parcels.

2 Court. 'Tis great pity.

1 Court. Nor want these sins a chief Saint to befriend 'em,
The Devil follows him; and for a truth, Sir,
Appears in visible figure often to him,
At which time he's posses'd with sudden trances,
Cold deadly sweats, and griping of the conscience,
Tormented strangely, as they say.

2 Court. Heaven turn him:
This marriage-day mayst thou well curse, fair Hellen.
But let's go view the ceremony.

1 Court. I'll walk with you.

Exeunt.

Musick.

*Enter Gabriella, and Maria above. And Lavall, Bride,
States in solemnity as to marriage; and pass over; viz.
Duke, Marine, Longaville.*

Mar. I hear 'em come.

Gab. Would I might never hear more.

Mar. I told you still: but you were so incredulous.
See, there they kiss.

Gab. Adders be your embraces.
The poison of a rotten heart, oh Hellen!
Blast thee as I have been; just such a flattery,
With that same cunning face, that smile upon't,
Oh mark it Marie, mark it seriously,
That Master smile caught me.

Mar. There's the old Duke, and Marine her Father.

Gab. Oh!

Mar. There Longaville —
The Ladies now.

Gab. Oh, I am murder'd, Marie.
Beast, most inconstant beast.

Mar. There.

Gab. There I am not;
No more I am not there: Hear me, oh Heaven!
And all you powers of Justice bow down to me;
But you of pity dye. I am abus'd,
She that depended on your Providence,
She is abus'd: your honor is abus'd.
That noble piece ye made, and call'd it man,
Is turn'd to Devil: all the world's abus'd:
Give me a womans Will, provok'd to mischief,
A two-edg'd heart; my suffering thoughts to wild-fires,
And my embraces to a timeles grave turn.

Mar. Here I'll step in, for 'tis an act of merit.

Gab. I am too big to utter more.

Mar. Take time then.

Exeunt.

Enter Gentille and Casta.

Gent. This solitary life at home undoes thee,
Obscures thy beauty first, which should prefer thee;
Next fills thee full of sad thoughts, which thy years
Must not arrive at yet, they choak thy sweetness;

Follow the time, my Girl, and it will bring thee
Even to the fellowship of the noblest women,
Hellen her self, to whom I would prefer thee,
And under whom this poor and private carriage,
Which I am only able yet to reach at,
Being cast off, and all thy sweets at lustre,
Will take thee as a fair friend, and prefer thee.

Casta. Good Sir, be not so cruel as to seek
To kill that sweet content y'have bred me to:
Have I not here enough to thank Heaven for?
The free air uncorrupted with new flattery.
The water that I touch, unbrib'd with odours
To make me sweet to others: the pure fire
Not smothered up, and choak'd with lustful incense
To make my blood sweat; but burning clear and high,
Tells me my mind must flame up so to Heaven.
What should I do at Court, wear rich apparel?
Methinks these are as warm: And for your state, Sir,
Wealthy enough; Is it you would have me proud,
And like a Pageant, stuck up for amazements?
Teach not your child to tread that path, for fear (Sir)
Your dry bones after death, groan in your grave
The miseries that follow.

Gent. Excellent Casta.

Casta. When shall I pray again? (a Courtier)
Or when I do, to what God? what new body
And new face must I make me, with new manners?
For I must be no more my self. Whose Mistress
Must I be first? with whose sin-offering season'd?
And when I am grown so great and glorious
With prostitution of my burning beauties,
That great Lords kneel, and Princes beg for favours,
Do you think I'll be your Daughter, a poor Gentlemans,
Or know you for my Father?

Enter Lavall.

Gent. My best Casta.

Oh my most virtuous child! Heaven reigns within thee;
Take thine own choice, sweet child, and live a Saint still.
The Lord Lavall, stand by wench.

Lav. Gabriella,

She cannot, nor she dares not make it known,
My greatness crushes her, when e'r she offers:
Why should I fear her then?

Gent. Come, let's pass on wench.

Lav. Gentille, come hither: who's that Gentlewoman?

Gent. A child of mine, Sir, who observing custome,
Is going to the Monastery to her Prayers.

Lav. A fair one, a most sweet one; fitter far
To beautife a Court, than make a Votarist.
Go on, fair Beauty, and in your Orizons
Remember me: will ye, fair sweet?

Casta. Most humbly.

Lav. An admirable Beauty: how it fires me!

Exeunt.

Enter a Spirit.

But she's too full of grace, and I too wicked.
I feel my wonted fit: Defend me, goodness.
Oh! it grows colder still, and stiffer on me,
My hair stands up, my sinews shake and shrink;
Help me good Heaven, and good thoughts dwell within me.
Oh get thee gone, thou evil evil spirit,
Haunt me no more, I charge thee:

Spir. Yes Lavall:

Thou art my vassal, and the slave to mischief,
I blast thee with new sin: pursue thy pleasure;
Casta is rare and sweet, a blowing Beauty;
Set thy desires a fire, and never quench 'em
Till thou enjoy'st her; make her all thy Heaven,
And all thy joy, for she is all true happiness:
Thou art powerful, use command; if that prevail not,
Force her: I'll be thy friend.

Lav.

Lav. Oh help me, help me.

Spir. Her virtue, like a spell, sinks me to darkness. Exit.

Enter Gentile and Casta.

Gent. He's here still. How is't, noble Lord? me thinks, (Sir,
You look a little wildly. Is it that way?
Is't her you stare on so? I have spy'd your fire, Sir,
But dare not stay the flaming. Come.

Lav. Sweet creature,
Excellent Beauty, do me but the happiness
To be your humblest servant. Oh fair eyes,
Oh blessed, Blessed Sweetness, Divine Virgin!

Casta. Oh good my Lord, retire into your honor:
You're spoken good and virtuous, plac'd and Helme
To govern others from mischances: from example
Of such fair Chronicles as great ones are,
We do, or sure we should direct our lives.
I know y'are full of worth, a school of virtue
Daily instructing us that live below ye,
I make no doubt, dwells there.

Lav. I cannot answer,
She has struck me dumb with wonder.

Casta. Goodness guide ye.

Exeunt.

Lav. She's gone, and with her all light, and has left me
Dark as my black desires. Oh devil lust,
How dost thou hug my blood, and whisper to me,
There is no day again, no time, no living,
Without this lusty Beauty break upon me?
Let me collect my self, I strive like billows,
Beaten against a rock, and fall a fool still.
I must enjoy her, and I will: from this hour
My thoughts, and all my bus'ness shall be nothing.

Enter Maria.

My eating, and my sleeping, but her beauty,
And how to work it.

Mar. Health to my Lord Lavall!
Nay good Sir, do not turn with such displeasure;
I come not to afflict your new born pleasures;
My honour'd Mistress, neither let that vex ye,
For nothing is intended, but safe to you

Lav. What of your Mistress? I am full of bus'ness.

Mar. I will be short, my Lord; she, loving Lady,
Considering the unequal tie between ye,
And how your ruine with the Duke lay on it,
As also the most noble match now made,
By me sends back all links of marriage,
All Holy Vows, and Rights of Ceremony,
All promises, oaths, tears, and all such pawns
You left in hostage: only her love she cannot,
For that still follows ye, but not to hurt ye;
And still beholds ye Sir, but not to shame ye:
In recompence of which, this is her suit, Sir,
Her poor and last petition, but to grant her,
When weary nights have cloy'd ye up with kisses,
(As such must come) the honor of a Mistress,
The honor but to let her see those eyes,
(Those eyes she doats on, more than gods do goodness)
And but to kiss you only: with this prayer,
(a prayer only to awake your pity)
And on her knees she made it, that this night
You'd bless her with your company at supper.

Lav. I like this well, and now I think on't better,
I'll make a present use from this occasion:

Mar. Nay, good my Lord, be not so cruel to her
Because she has been yours.

Lav. And to mine own end
A rare way I will work.

Mar. Can love for ever,
The Love of her (my Lord) so perish in ye?
As ye desire in your desires to prosper.
What gallant under Heaven, but Anjou's Heir then

Can brag so fair a Wife, and sweet a Mistress?
Good noble Lord.

Lav. Ye mis-apply me, Marys;
Nor do I want true pity to your Lady:
Pity and love tell me, too much I have wrong'd her
To dare to see her more: yet if her sweetness
Can entertain a Mediation,
And it must be a great one that can cure me;
My love again, as far as honor bids me,
My service and my self—

Mar. That's nobly spoken.

Lav. Shall hourly see her; want shall never know her;
Nor where she has bestow'd her love, repent her.

Mar. Now whither drives he?

Lav. I have heard Maria,
That no two women in the world more lov'd,
Then thy good Mistress, and Gentile's fair Daughter.

Mar. What may this mean? you have heard a truth, my
But since the secret Love betwixt you two, (Lord:
My Mistress durst not entertain such friendship;
Casta is quick, and of a piercing judgement,
And quickly will find out a flaw.

Lav. Hold Marie:
Shrink not, 'tis good gold, wench: prepare a Banquet,
And get that Casta thither; for she's a creature
So full of forcible Divine persuasion,
And so unwearied ever with good offices,
And she shall cure my ill cause to my Mistress,
And make all errors up.

Mar. I'll do my best, Sir:
But she's too fearful, coy, and scrupulous,
To leave her Fathers house so late; and bashful
At any mans appearance, that I fear, Sir;
'Twill prove impossible.

Lav. There's more gold, Marie,
And fain thy Mistress wondrous sick to death, wench.

Mar. I have ye in the wind now, and I'll pay ye.

Lav. She cannot chuse but come; 'tis charity,
The chief of her profession: undertake this,
And I am there at night; if not, I leave ye.

Mar. I will not loose this offer, though it fall out
Clean cross to that we cast, I'll undertake it,
I will, my Lord; she shall be there.

Lav. By——?

Mar. By—— she shall.

Lav. Let it be something late then.
For being seen, now force or favour wins her.
My spirits are grown dull strong wine, and store,
Shall set 'em up again, and make me fit
To draw home at the enterprize I aim at.

Ma. Go thy way: false Lord, if thou hold'st, thou pay'st
The price of all thy lusts. Thou shalt be there
Thou modest Maid, if I have any working,
And yet thy honor safe; for which this thief
I know has set this meeting: but I'll watch him.

Enter Perelot.

Per. Maria.

Mar. Are mine eyes mine own? or bless me,
Am I deluded with a flying shadow?

Per. Why do you start so from me?

Mar. It speaks sensibly,
And shews a living body: yet I am fearful.

Per. Give me your hand, good Maria.

Mar. He feels warm too.

Per. And next your lips.

Mar. He kisses perfectly.

Nay, and the Devil be not worse: you are Perelot.

Per. I was, and sure I should be: Can a small distance,
And ten short months take from your memory
The figure of your friend, that you stand wondring?
Be not amaz'd, I am the self-same Perelot,
Living, and well; Son to Gentile, and Brother

To virtuous Cats, to your beauteous Mistriſs,
The long ſince poor betroth'd, and ſtill vow'd fervant.

Mar. Nay, ſure he lives. My Lord Lavall, your Maſter,
Brought news long ſince to your much mourning Miſtriſs,
Ye dy'd at Orleanſe; bound her with an oath too,
To keep it ſecret from your aged Father,
Leſt it ſhould rack his heart.

Per. A pretty ſecret
To try my Miſtriſs Love, and make my welcome
From travel of more worth; from whence, Heaven be thanked,
My buſineſs for the Duke diſpatch'd to th' purpoſe,
And all my money ſpent, I am come home, wench.
How does my Miſtriſs? for I have not yet ſeen
Any, nor will I, till I do her ſervice,

Mar. But did the Lord Lavall know of your love, Sir, before he went?

Per. Yes, by much more force he got it,
But none elle knew; upon his promiſe too
And honor to conceal it faithfully
Till my return; to further which, he told me,
My buſineſs being ended, from the Duke
He would procure a penſion for my ſervice,
Able to make my Miſtriſs a fit Husband.

Mar. But are you ſure of this?

Per. Sure as my ſight, wench.

Mar. Then is your Lord a baſe diſſembling villain,
A Devil Lord, the damn'd Lord of all lewdneſs,
And has betray'd ye, and undone my Miſtriſs,
My poor ſweet Miſtriſs: oh that leacher Lord,
Who, poor ſoul, ſince was married.

Per. To whom, Maria?

Mar. To that unlucky Lord, a —— upon him;
Whoſe hot horſe-appetite being allaid once
With her chaſte joyes, married again, ſcarce cool'd,
The Torch yet not out, the yellow Hymen
Lighted about the bed, the Songs yet ſounding, Mirine's young noble Daughter Helena,
Whoſe miſchief ſtands at door next. Oh that recreant!

Per. Oh villain! Oh moſt unmanly falſhood!
Nay then I ſee, my Letters were betray'd too.
Oh, I am full of this, great with his miſchiefs,
Loaden and burſt: Come, lead me to my Lady.

Mar. I cannot, Sir, Lavall keeps her conceal'd.
Beſides, her griefs are ſuch, ſhe will ſee no man.

Per. I muſt, and will go to her: I will ſee her:
There be my friend, or this ſhall be thy furtheſt. (me,

Mar. Hold, and I'll help thee: but firſt ye ſhall ſwear to
As you are true and gentle, as ye hate
This beaſtly and baſe Lord, where I ſhall place ye,
(Which ſhall be within ſight) till I diſcharge ye,
What-e'er you ſee or hear, to make no motion.

Per. I do by ——

Mar. Stay here about the houſe then,
Till it be later; yet the time's not perfect:
There at the back door I'll attend you truly.

Per. Oh monſtrous, monſtrous, beaſtly villain. Exit.

Mar. How croſs this falls, and from all expectation?
And what the end ſhall be, Heaven only yet knows:
Only I wiſh, and hope. But I forget ſtill,
Caſta muſt be the bait, or all miſcarries. Exeunt.

Enter Gentille with a Torch, Shalloon above.

Gent. Holla, Shalloon.

Shal. Who's there?

Gent. A word from the Duke, Sir.

Shal. Your pleaſure.

Gent. Tell your Lord he muſt to Court ſtrait.

Shal. He is ill at eaſe: and prays he may be pardon'd
The occaſions of this night.

Gent. Belike he is drunk then:
He muſt away; the Duke and his fair Lady,
The beauteous Helena, are now at Cent.
Of whom ſhe has ſuch fortune in her carding,
The Duke has loſt a thouſand Crowns, and ſwears,
He will not go to bed, till by Lavall.

The Tide of loſs be turn'd again. Awake him,
For 'tis the pleaſure of the Duke he muſt riſe.

Sha. Having ſo ſtrict command (Sir) to the contrary,
I dare not do it: I beſeech your pardon.

Gent. Are you ſure he is there?

Sha. Yes.

Gent. And aſleep?

Sha. I think ſo.

Gent. And are you ſure you will not tell him, Shaloon?

Sha. Yes, very ſure.

Gent. Then I am ſure, I will.

Open, or I muſt force,

Sha. Pray ye ſtay, he is not,

Nor will not be this night. You may excuſe it.

Gent. I knew he was gone about ſome womans labour.
As good a neighbor, though I ſay it, and as comfortable:
Many ſuch more we need Shaloon. Alas, poor Lady,
Thou art like to lie croſs-legg'd to night. Good Monsieur,
I will excuſe your Maſter for this once, Sir,
Becauſe ſometimes I have lov'd a wench my ſelf too.

Sha. 'Tis a good hearing, Sir.

Gent. But for your lye, Shaloon,
If I had you here, it ſhould be no good hearing.
For your pate I would pummel.

Sha. A fair good night, Sir.

Gent. Good night, thou noble Knight, Sir Pandarus.
My heart is cold o'th' ſuddain, and a ſtrange dulneſs
Poſſeſſes all my body: thy Will be done Heaven. Exit.

Enter Gabriella and Caſta: and Maria with a Taper.

Caſta. 'Faith Friend, I was even going to my bed,
When your Maid told me of your ſudden ſickneſs:
But from my grave (ſo truly I love you)
I think your name would raiſe me: ye look ill
Since laſt I ſaw ye, much decay'd in colour:
Yet I thank Heaven, I find no ſuch great danger
As your Maid frighted me withal: take courage
And give your ſickneſs courſe: ſome grief you have got
That feeds within upon your tender ſpirits,
And wanting open way to vent it ſelf,
Murders your mind, and choaks up all your ſweetneſs.

Gab. It was my Maids fault; worthy friend, to trouble ye,
So late, upon ſo light a cauſe: yet ſince I have ye
Oh my dear Caſta.

Caſta. Out with it, Gods name.

Gab. The Cloſſet of my heart, I will lock here, wench, Lavall knocks within.

And things ſhall make ye tremble. Who's that knocks there?

Mar. 'Tis Lavall.

Gab. Sit you ſtill. Let him in.

I am reſolv'd, and all you wronged women,
You noble ſpirits, that as I have ſuffer'd
Under this glorious beaſt-ſulſting man,
Lend me your cauſes, then your cruelties,
For I muſt put on madneſs above women.

Caſt. Why do you look ſo ghawtly?

Gab. Peace; no harm, Deer.

Enter Lavall.

Lav. There, take my cloak and ſword: Where is this
Mar. In the next room, (Banquet?)

Caſta. How came he here? Heaven bleſs me.

Lav. Give me ſome Wine wench; fill it full, and ſprightly,

Gab. Sit ſtill, and be not fearful.

Lav. Till my veins ſwell,

And my ſtrong ſinews ſtretch like that brave Centaur,
That at the Table ſnatch'd the Bride away
In ſpight of Hercules.

Caſta. I am betray'd.

Lav. Nay, ſtart not Lady; 'tis for you that I come,
And for your beauty: 'tis for you, Lavall
Honors this night; to you, the ſacred ſhrine
I humbly bow, offering my vows and prayers;
To you I live.

Gab. In with the powder quickly:
So, that and the Wine will rock ye.

Of the most beauteous and divine, fair Casta,
The star of sweetness.

Gab. Fear him not, I'll die first.
And who shall pledge ye?

Lav. Thou shalt, thou tann'd Gipsy:
And worship to that brightness give, cold Tartar:
By——ye shall not stir; ye are my Mistress,
The glory of my love, the great adventure,
The Mistress of my heart, and she my whore.

Gab. Thou ly'st, base, beastly Lord; drunker than anger,
Thou sowd Lord, got by a surfeit, thou lyest basely.
Nay, stir not: I dare tell thee so. Sit you still.

If I be whore, it is in marrying thee,
That art so absolute and full a villain,
No Sacrament can save that piece tied to thee.
How often hast thou woo'd in those flatteries,
Almo st those very words, my constancie
What goddesses have I not been, or what goodness?
What star that is of any name in Heaven,
Or brightness? which of all the virtues
(But drunkenness, and drabbing, thy two morals)
Have not I reach'd to? what Spring was ever sweeter?
What Scythian snow so white? what crystal chaster?
Is not thy new wife now the same too? Hang thee,
Base Bigamist, thou honor of ill women.

Cast. How's this? O! Heaven defend me.

Gab. Thou salt-itch,
For whom no cure but ever burning brimstone
Can be imagin'd.

Lav. Ha, ha, ha.
Gab. Dost thou laugh, thou breaker
Of all law, all religion, of all faith
Thou Soule contemner?

Lav. Peace, thou paltry woman:
And sit by me, Sweet.

Gab. By the Devil?

Lav. Come,
And lull me with delights

Gab. It works amain now.

Lav. Give me such kisses as the Queen of shadows
Gave to the sleeping boy she stole on Latmus;
Look round about in snake wreathes close folded,
Those rosie arms about my neck, O! Venus.

Gab. Fear not, I say.

Lav. Thou admirable sweetness,
Distill thy blessings like those silver drops,
That falling on fair grounds, rise all in roses:
Shoot me a thousand darts from those fair eyes,
And through my heart transfix 'em all, I'll stand 'em.

Send me a thousand smiles, and presently
I'll catch 'em in mine eyes, and by Love's power
Turn 'em to Cupids all, and sling 'em on thee,
How high she looks, and heavenly! More wine for me.

Gab. Give him more wine, and good friend be not fearful.

Lav. Here on my knee, thou Goddess of delights,
This lustie grape I offer to thy Beauties;
See how it leaps to view that perfect redness
That dwells upon thy lips: now, how it blushes
To be outblush'd. Oh! let me feed my fancie,
And as I hold the purple god in one hand
Dancing about the brim'd and proudly swelling,
Deck'd in the pride of nature young, and blowing,
So let me take fair Semele in the other,
And sing the loves of gods, then drink, their Nectar's
Not yet desir'd.

Cast. Oh!

Lav. Then like lustie Tarquin
Turn'd into flames with Lucrece coy denyals,
His blood and spirit equally ambitious,
I force thee for my own.

Cast. O help me Justice:
Help me, my Chastitie.

Lav. Now I am bravely quarried.

Per. 'Tis my Sister.

Perolet above.

Gab. No, bawdy slave, no Traacher, she is not carried Per. She's loose again, and gone. I'll keep my place still.
Mar. Now it works bravely: stand, he cannot hurt ye.

Lav. O my sweet Love, my life. He falls.
downe, and sleeps

Mar. He sinks.

Lav. My blessing,

Mar. So, now he is safe a while.

Gab. Lock all the doors, wench,

Then for my wrongs.

Per. Now I'll appear to know all.

Gab. Be quick, quick, good Marie, sure and sudden.

Per. Stay, I must in first.

Gab. O' my conscience!

It is young Perolet: Oh my stung conscience!

It is my first and noblest Love.

Mar. Leave wondring,
And recollect your self: the man is living.
Equally wrong'd as you, and by that Devil.

Per. 'Tis most true, Lady: your unhappy fortune
I grieve for as mine own, your fault forgive too,
If it be one. This is no time for kisses:

I have heard all, and known all, which mine ears
Arc crack'd apieces with, and my heart perish'd.
I saw him in your chamber, saw his fury.

And am a fire till I have found his heart out.

What do you mean to do? for I'll make one.

Gab. To make his death more horrid (for he shall dye)

Per. He must, he must.

Gab. We'll watch him till he wakes,

Then bind him, and then torture him.

Per. 'Tis nothing.

No, take him dead drunk now without repentance,
His leachery in seam'd upon him.

Gab. Excellent.

Per. I'll do it my self; and when 'tis done, provide ye,
For we'll away for Italy this night.

Gab. We'll follow thorow all hazards.

Per. Oh false Lord,

Unmanly, mischievous; how I could curse thee;
But that but blasts thy fame; have at thy heart, fool:
Loop-holes I'll make enough to let thy life out.

Lav. Oh! does the devil ride me?

Per. Nay then.

Lav. Murder.

Nay, then take my share too.

Per. Help; oh! he has slain me.

Bloody intentions must have blood.

Lav. Hah?

Per. Heaven.

Gab. He sinks, he sinks, for ever sinks: oh fortune!

Oh sorrow! how like seas thou flowest upon me?

Here will I dwell for ever. Weep Maria,

Weep this young man's misfortune: oh thou truest!

Enter Spirit.

Lav. What have I done?

Spir. That that has mark'd thy soul man.

Lav. And art thou come again thou dismal spirit?

Spir. Yes, to devour thy last.

Lav. Mercy upon thee,

Spir. Thy hour is come: succession, honor, pleasure,
And all the lustre thou so long hast look'd for Must here have end: Summon thy sins before thee.

Lav. Oh my affrighted soul!

Spir. There lies a black one;

Thy own best servant by thy own hand slain,
Thy drunkenness procur'd it: There's another:
Think of fair Gabriella, there she weeps;
And such tears are not lost.

Lav. Oh miserable!

Spir. Thy foul intention to the virtuous Cast.

Lav. No more, no more, thou wild-fire.

A a a

Spir.

Spir. Last, thy last wife,
Think on the wrong she suffers.

Lav. O my miserie.
Oh! whither shall I flie?

Spir. Thou halt no faith, fool.
Heark to thy knell. Sings, and vanishes.

Lav. Millions of sins muster about mine eyes now:
Murders, ambirions, lust, false faiths; O horror,
In what a stormie form of death thou rid't now!
Me thinks I see all tortures, fires, and frosts,
Deep smking caves, where nothing but despair dwels,
The balefull birds of night hovering about 'em;
A grave, me thinks, now opens, and a herse
Heng with my Arms tumbles into it; oh!
Oh! my afflicted soul: I cannot pray;
And the least child that has but goodnes in him
May strike my head off; so stupid are my powers:
I'd lift mine eyes up though.

Mar. Cease these laments,
They are too poor for vengeance: Lavall lives yet.

Gab. Then thus I drie all sorrows from these eyes,
Fury and rage possess 'em now: damn'd divell.

Lav. Hah?

Gab. This for young Perolot.

Lav. O mercy, mercy.

Gab. This for my wrongs.

Lav. But one short hour to cure me.

Knock within.

Oh be not cruell: Oh! oh.

Mar. Heark, they knock.
Make hast for Heavens sake, Mistris.

Gab. This for Casta.

Lav. Oh, O, O, O!

He dies.

Mar. He's dead: come quickly, let 's away with him,
'T will be too late else.

Gab. Help, help up to th' chamber,
Exeunt with Lavalls body.

Enter Duke, Hellena, Gentile, Casta, and attendants, with lights.

Duke. What frights are these?

Gent. I am sure here 's one past frightening.
Bring the lights neerer: I have enough already.
Out, out, mine eyes. Look, Castia.

Lord. 'T is young Perolot,

Duke. When came he over? Hold the Gentlewoman, she sinks; and bear her off.

Cast. O my dear brother!

Exit.

Gent. There is a time for all; for me, I hope, too,
And very shortly. Murdred?

Gabriella, Maria, with Lavalls body, above.

Duke. Who 's above there?

Gab. Look up, and see.

Duke. What may this mean?

Gab. Behold it;

Behold the drunken murderer
Of that young Gentleman; behold the rankest,
The vilest, basest slave that ever flourish'd.

Duke. Who kill'd him?

Gab. I; and there 's the cause I did it:
Read, if your eyes will give you leave.

Hell. Oh! monstrous.

Gab. Nay, out it shall: there, take this false heart to ye;
The base dishonor of a thousand women:
Keep it in gold, Duke, 'tis a precious jewel.
Now to my self; for I have liv'd a fair age,
Longer by some moneths than I had a mind to.

Duke. Hold.

Gab. Here, young Perolot; my first contracted
True love shall never go alone.

Duke. Hold, Gabriella.

I do forgive all.

Gab. I shall die the better,

Thus let me seek my grave, and my shames with me.

Mar. Nor shalt thou go alone my noble Mistris:
Why should I live, and thou dead?

Lord. Save the wench there.

Mar. She is, I hope; and all my sins here written.

Duke. This was a fatal night.

Gent. Heaven has his working,
Which we cannot contend against.

Duke. Alas!

Gent. Your Grace has your alas too.

Duke. Would 't were equal;

For thou hast lost an honest noble childe.

Gent. 'T is heir enough has lost a good remembrance.

Duke. See all their bodies buried decently,
Though some deserv'd it not. How do you, Lady?

Hell. Even with your Graces leave, ripe for a Monasterie;
There will I wed my life to tears and prayers,
And never know what man is more.

Duke. Your pleasure;

How does the maid within?

Lord. She is gone before, Sir,

The same course that my Lady takes.

Gent. And my course shall be my Beads at home; so
Please your Grace to give me leave to leave the Court.

Duke. In peace, Sir,

And take my love along.

Gent. I shall pray for ye.

Duke. Now to our selves retire we, and begin
By this example to correct each sin.

Exeunt.

Flourish.

King. Em. By this we plainly view the two imposthumes
That choke a kingdoms welfare; Ease, and Wantonness;
In both of which Lavall was capital:

For first, Ease stole away his minde from honor,
That active noble thoughts had kept still working,
And then deliver'd him to drink and women,
Lust and outragious riot; and what their ends are,
How infamous and foul, we see example.

Therefore, that great man that will keep his name,
And gain his merit out of Virtues schools,
Must make the pleasures of the world his fools.

Flourish.

The TRIUMPH.

Enter Musicians: next them, Perolot with the wound he died with. Then Gabriella and Maria, with their wounds: after them, four Furies with Bannerets in-crib'd Revenge, Murder, Lust and Drunkenness, singing. Next them, Lavall wounded. Then Chariot with Death, drawn by the Destinies.

Flourish.

Enter PROLOGUE.

*From this sad sight ascend your noble eye,
And see old Time helping triumphantly,
Helping his Master Man: view here his vanities
And see his false friends like those gluttet flies,
That when they've suckt their fill, fall off, and fade
From all remembrance of him, like a shade.
And last, view who relieves him; and that gone,
We hope your favour, and our Play is done.*

Flourish.

Enter Anthropos, Desire, and Vain Delight; Bounty.

Ant. What hast thou done, Desire, and how employ'd
The charge I gave thee, about levying wealth
For our supplies?

Desire. I have done all, yet nothing :
Tri'd all, and all my ways, yet all miscarried ;
There dwells a fordid dulness in their mindes
Thou son of earth, colder then that thou art made of,
I came to Craft, found all his hooks about him,
And all his nets baited and set; his slie felt
And greedie Lucre at a serious conference
Which way to tie the world within their statutes :
Busines of all sides and of all sorts swarming
Like Bees broke loose in summer : I declared
Your will and want together, both enforcing
With all the power and pains I had, to reach him ;
Yet all fell short.

Anth. His answer.

Desire. This he gave me.

Your wants are never ending ; and those supplies
That came to stop those breaches, are ever lavisht
Before they reach the main, in toys and trifles,
Gew-gaws, and gilded puppets: Vain delight
He says has ruin'd ye, with clapping all
That comes in for support, on clothes, and Coaches,
Perumes, and powder'd pates; and that your Mistris,
The Lady Pleasure, like a sea devours
At length both you and him too. If you have houses,
Or land, or jewels, for good pawn, he'll hear you,
And will be readie to supplie occasions;
If not, he locks his ears up, and grows stupid.
From him, I went to Vanity, whom I found
Attended by an endless troop of Tailors,
Mercers, Embroiderers, Feather-makers, Fumers,
All occupations opening like a Mart,
That serve to rig the body out with braverie ;
And th' row the roome new fashions flew like flies,
In thousand gaudie shapes ; Pride waiting on her,
And busily surveying all the breaches
Time and delaying Nature had wrought in her,
Which still with art she picc'd again, and strengthened.
I told your wants; she shew'd me gowns and head-tires,
Imbroider'd waistcoats, smocks seam'd thorow with cut-works,
Scarfs, mantles, petticoats, muffs, powders, paintings,
Dogs, monkeys, parrots, which all seemed to shew me
The way her money went. From her to Pleasure
I took my journey.

Anth. And what says our best Mistris?

Desire. She danc'd me out this answer presently :
Revels and Masques had drawn her drie already.
I met old Time too, mowing mankind down,
Who says you are too hot, and he must purge ye.

Anth. A cold quietus. Miserable creatures,
Born to support and beautifie your master,
The godlike man, set here to do me service,
The children of my will; why, or how dare ye,
Created to my use alone, disgrace me?
Beasts have more courtisie; they live about me,
Offering their warm wooll to the shearers hand,
To clothe me with their bodies to my labours;
Nay, even their lives they daily sacrifice,
And proudly pres with garlands to the altars,
To fill the gods oblations. Birds bow to me,
Striking their downie sails to do me service,
Their sweet airs ever ecchoing to mine honor,
And to my rest their plumie softs they send me.
Fishes, and plants, and all where life inhabits,
But mine own cursed kind, obey their ruler;
Mine have forgot me, miserable mine,
Into whose stonic hearts, neglect of dutie,
Squint-ey'd deceit, and self-love, are crept closely:
None feel my wants, not one mend with me.

Desire. None, Sir?

Ant. Thou hast forgot (Desire) thy best friend, Flatterie;
He cannot fail me.

Delight. Fail? he will sell himself,
And all within his power, close to his skin first.

Desire. I thought so too, and made him my first venture
But found him in a young Lords ear so busie,
So like a smiling showr pouring his soul
In at his portals, his face in a thousand figures
Catching the vain mind of the men: I pull'd him,
But still he hung like birdlime; spoke unto him,
His answer still was, By the Lord, sweet Lord,
And By my soul, thou master-piece of honor;
Nothing could stave him off: he has heard your flood's gone;
And on decaying things he seldom smiles, Sir.

Anth. Then here I break up state, and free my followers,
Putting my fortune now to Time, and Justice:
Go seek new masters now; for Anthropos
Neglected by his friends, must seek new fortunes.

Desire, to Avarice I here commend thee,
Where thou may'st live at full bent of thy wishes:
And Vain Delight, thou feeder of my follies
With light fantastickness, be thou in favour.
To leave thee, Bountie, my most worthie servant,
Troubles me more then my own misery;
But we must part: go plant thy self, my best friend,
In honorable hearts that truly know thee,
And there live ever like thy self, a virtue:
But leave this place, and seek the Countrey,
For Law, and lust, like fire lick all up here.
Now none but Poverty must follow me,
Despis'd patch'd Poverty; and we two married,
Will seek Simplicity, Content and Peace out.

Enter Poverty.

And live with them in exile. How uncall'd on My true friend comes!

Poverty. Here, hold thee, Anthropos,
Thou art almost arm'd at rest; put this on,
A penitential robe, to purge thy pleasures:
Off with that vanitie.

Anth. Here, Vain Delight,
And with this all my part, to thee again
Of thee I freely render.

Pov. Take this staff now,
And be more constant to your steps hereafter:
The staff is Staidness of affections.
A way you painted flies, that with mans summet
Take life and heat buzzing about his blossoms;
When growing full, ye turn to Caterpillers,
Gnawing the root that gave you life. Fly shadows.

Exeunt desire and delight.

Now to Content I'll give thee, Anthropos,
To Rest and Peace: no vanitie dwells there;
Desire and Pleasure, to delude thy mind more;
No Flatteries smooth-fil'd tongue shall poison thee.

Anth. O! Jupiter, if I have ever offer'd
Upon thy burning Altars but one Sacrifice
Thou and thy fair-ey'd Juno smil'd upon;
If ever, to thine honor, bounteous feasts,
Where all thy statuas sweet with wine and incense,
Have by the son of earth been celebrated:
Hear me (the child of shame now) hear thou helper,
And take my wrongs into thy hands, thou justice
Done by unmindful man, unmerciful,
Against his master done, against thy order;
And raise again, thou father of all honor,
The poor despis'd, but yet thy noblest creature.
Raise from his ruines once more this sunk Cedar,
That all may fear thy power, and I proclaim it. Exeunt.

Jupiter and Mercury descend severally. Trumpets small above.

Jup. Ho! Mercury, my winged son.

Mer. Your servant.

Jup. Whose powerful prayers were those that reach'd our ears,

Arm'd in such spells of pity now?

Mer. The sad petitions
Of the scorn'd ion of earth, the gold-like Anthropos,
He that has swell'd your sacred fires with incense,
And pil'd upon your Altars a thousand heifers;
He that beguil'd by Vanity and Pleasure,
Desire, Craft, Flattery, and smooth Hypocrisie)
Stands now despis'd and ruin'd, left to Poverty.

Jup. It must not be; he was not rais'd for ruine;
Nor shall those hands heav'd at my Altars, perish:
He is our noblest creature. Flee to Time,
And charge him presently release the bands
Of Poverty and Want this suitor sinks in:
Tell him, among the Sun-burnt Indians,
That know no other wealth but Peace and pleasure,
She shall find golden Plutus, god of riches,
Who idly is ador'd, the innocent people
Not knowing yet what power and weight he carries:
Bid him compell him to his right use, honor,
And presently to live with Anthropos.
It is our Will. Away.

Mer. I do obey it.

Jupiter and Mercury ascend again.

Musick. Enter Plutus, with a troop of Indians, singing and dancing wildly about him, and bowing to him: which ended, Enter Time.

Time. Rise, and away; 'tis Joves command.

Plut. I will not:

Ye have some fool to furnish now; some Midas
That to no purpose I must choak with riches:
Who must I go to?

Time. To the son of earth;
He wants the god of wealth.

Plut. Let him want still:
I was too lately with him, almost torn
Into ten thousand pieces by his followers:
I could not sleep, but Craft or Vanity
Were fling off my fingers; not eat, for fear
Pleasure would cast her self into my belly,
And there surprize my heart.

Time. These have forsaken him:
Make haste then, thou must with me: be not angry,
For fear a greater anger light upon thee.

Plut. I do obey then: but change my figure;
For when I willingly befriended a creature,
Goodly, and full of glory I shew to him;
But when I am compell'd, old, and decrepid,
I halt, and hang upon my staff. Farewell, friends,
I will not be long from ye; all my servants
I leave among ye still, and my chief riches.

Exeunt Indians with a dance.

Oh Time, what innocence dwells here, what goodness!
They know me not, nor hurt me not, yet hug me.
Away, I'll follow thee: but not too fast, Time.

Exeunt Plutus and Time.

Enter Anthropos, Honesty, Simplicity, Humility, Poverty.

Humil. Man, be not sad, nor let this divorce
From Mundus, and his many ways of pleasure,
Afflict thy spirits; which consider'd rightly
With inward eyes, makes thee arrive at happy.

Pov. For now what danger or deceit can reach thee?
What matter left for Craft or Covetize
To plot against thee? what Desire to burn thee?

Honest. Oh son of earth, let Honesty possess thee;
Be as thou wast intended, like thy Maker;
See throw those gawdy shadows, that like dreams
Have dwelt upon thee long: call up thy goodness,
Thy mind and man with thee, that lie shipwrack'd,
And then how thin and vain these fond'affections,

How lame this worldly love, how lump-like raw
And ill digested all these vanities
Will shew, let Reason tell thee,

Simpl. Crown thy mind
With that above the worlds wealth, joyful suff'ring,
And truly be the master of thy self.
Which is the noblest Empire; and there stand
The thing thou wert ordain'd, and set to govern.

Pov. Come, let us sing the worlds shame: hear us, Anthropos.

Song: And then Enter Time and Plutus.

Hon. Away; we are betrayd.

Exeunt all but Poverty.

Time. Get thou too after,
Thou needy bare companion; go for ever,
For ever, I conjure thee: make no answer.

Exit Poverty.

Amb. What mak'st thou here, Time? thou that to this Minute, never stood still by me?

Time. I have brought thee succour;
And now catch hold, I am thine: The god of riches (Compell'd by him that saw thy miseries,
The ever just and wakeful Jove, at length)
Is come unto thee: use him as thine own;
For 'tis the doom of Heaven: he must Obey thee.

Amb. Have I found pity then?

Time. Thou hast; and Justice
Against those false seducers of thine honor:
Come, give him present helps.

Exit Time.

Industry and the Arts discovered.

Plut. Come Industry,
Thou friend of life; and next to thee, rise Labour;
Plutus stamps. Labour rises.
Rise presently: and now to your employments;
But first conduct this mortal to the rock.

They carry Anthropos to a Rock, and fall a digging.

What see'st thou now?

Plutus strikes the Rock, and flames flie out.

Amb. A glorious Mine of Metal.

Oh Jupiter, my thanks..

Plut. To me a little.

Amb. And to the god of wealth, my Sacrifice.

Plut. Nay, then I am rewarded. Take heed now, Son,
You are afloat again, lest Mundus catch ye.

Amb. Neve betray me more.

Plut. I must to India,
From whence I came, where my main wealth lies buried,
And these must with me. Take that Book and Mattock,
And by those, know to live again.

Exeunt Plutus, Industry, Labour, &c.

Amb. I shall do.

Enter Fame sounding.

Fame. Thorow all the world, the fortune of great An,
Be known and wonder'd at; his riches envy'd
As far as Sun or Time is; his power fear'd too.

Exeunt,

MUSICK.

Enter Delight, Pleasure, Lucre; Craft, Vanity, &c. dancing (and Masqu'd) towards the Rock, offering service to Anthropos. Mercury from above. Musick heard. One half of a cloud drawn. Singers are discovered: then the other half drawn. Jupiter seen in glory.

Mer. Take heed, weak man, those are the sins that sunk thee:

True

Trust 'em no more : kneel, and give thanks to Jupiter.

Amb. Oh mighty power!

Jup. Unmask, ye gilded poisons:

Now look upon 'em, son of earth, and shame 'em;

Now see the faces of thy evil Angels,

Lead 'em to Time, and let 'em fill his Triumph:

Their memories be here forgot for ever.

Amb. Oh just great god! how many lives of service,

What ages only given to thine honor.

What infinites of vows, and holy prayers,

Can pay my thanks?

Jup. Rise up: and to assure thee

That never more thou shalt feel want. Strike Mercury.

Strike him; and by that stroke he shall for ever

Live in that rock of Gold, and still enjoy it.

Be't done, I say. Now sing in honor of him.

S O N G.

Enter the Triumph. First, the Musicians: then Vain Delight, Pleasure, Craft, Lucre, Vanity, and other of the Vices: Then a Chariot with the person of Time sitting in it, drawn by four persons, representing Hours, singing.

Exeunt.

Flourish.

King. Em. By this we note (sweet-heart) in Kings

(and Princes

A weakness, even in spite of all their wisdoms.

And often to be master'd by abuses:

Our natures here describ'd too, and what humors

Prevail above our Reasons to undo us.

But this the last and best. When no friend stands,

The gods are merciful, and lend their hands.

Flourish.

Epilogue

Now as the Husbandman, whose Costs and Pain,
 Whose Hopes and Helps lie buried in his Grain,
 Waiting a happy Spring to ripen full
 His long'd-for Harvest, to the Reapers pull;
 Stand we expecting, having sown our Ground
 With so much charge, (the fruitfulness not found)
 The Harvest of our Labours: For we know
 You are our Spring; and when you smile, we grow.
 Nor Charge nor Pain, shall bind us from your Pleasures,
 So you but lend your hands to fill our Measures.

FINIS.
