Yet when I get an hour of vacancie,
I can fight too my friends, a little does well,
I would be loth to learn to fight.

1 Cly. But and't please you Sir,
His fighting has neglected all our business,
We are undone, our causes cast away, Sir,

His not appearance.

Sam. There he fought too long,
A little and fight well, he fought too long indeed friends;
But ne'r the less things must be as they may,
And there be ways —

1 Cly. We know, Sir, if you please —

Sam. Something I'll do: goe rally up your Causes.

Enter La-writ, and a Gentleman, at the door.

2 Cly. Now you may behold Sir,
And be a witness, whether we lie or no. (men,)

La-writ. I'll meet you at the Ordinary, sweet Gentle-
And if there be a wench or two —

Gen. We'll have 'em.

La-writ. No handling any Duells before I come,
We'll have no going else, I hate a coward.

Gen. There shall be nothing done.

La-writ. Make all the quarrels
You can devise before I come, and let's all fight,
There is no sport else.

Gen. We'll see what may be done, Sir.

1 Cly. Ha? Monsieur La-writ,

La-writ. Baffled in way of business,
My causes cast away, Judgement against us?
Why there it goes.

2 Cly. What shall we do the whilst Sir?

La-wr. Breed new dissentions, goe hang your selves
'Tis all one to me; I have a new trade of living.

1 Cli. Do you hear what he saies Sir?

Sam. The Gentleman speaks finely.

La-wr. Will any of you fight? Fighting's my occupation
If you find your selves aggriev'd.

Sam. A compleat Gentleman.

La-writ. Avant thou buckram budget of petitions,
Thou spittle of lame causes; I lament for thee,
And till revenge be taken —

Sam. 'Tis most excellent.

La-wr. There, every man chuse his paper, and his place.
I'll answer ye all, I will neglect no mans business
But he shall have satisfaction like a Gentleman,
The Judge may do and not do, he's but a Monsieur.

Sam. You have nothing of mine in your bag, Sir.

La-writ. I know not Sir,
But you may put any thing in, any fighting thing.

Sam. It is sufficient, you may hear hereafter.

La-writ. I rest your servant Sir.

Sam. No more words Gentlemen
But follow me, no more words as you love me,
The Gentleman's a noble Gentleman.
I shall do what I can, and then —

Cli. We thank you Sir. [Ex. Sam. and Clients.]

Sam. Not a word to disturb him, he's a Gentleman.

La-writ. No cause go o' my side? the judge cast all?
And because I was honourably employed in action,
And not appear'd, pronounce? 'tis very well,
'Tis well faith, 'tis well, Judge.

Enter Cleremont.

Cler. Who have we here?
My little furious Lawyer?

La-writ. I say 'tis well,
But mark the end.

Cler. How he is metamorphos'd?
Nothing of Lawyer left, not a bit of buckram,
No solliciting face now,
This is no simple conversion.
Your servant Sir, and Friend.

La-writ. You come in time, Sir,

Cler. The happier man, to be at your command then.

La-writ. You may wonder to see me thus; but that's all
Time shall declare; 'tis true I was a Lawyer, (one,)
But I have mew'd that coat, I hate a Lawyer,
I talk'd much in the Court, now I hate talking,
I did you the office of a man.

Cler

Cler. I must confess it.

Law. And budg'd not, no I budg'd not.

Cler. No, you did not.

Law. There's it then, one good turn requires another.

Cler. Most willing Sir, I am ready at your service.

Law. There, read, and understand, and then deliver it.

Cler. This is a Challenge, Sir,

Law. 'Tis very like, Sir,

I seldom now write Sonnets.

Cler. O admirantis,

To Monsieur Vertaign, the President.

Law. I chuse no Fool, Sir.

Cler. Why, he's no Sword-man, Sir.

Law. Let him learn, let him learn,

Time, that trains Chickens up, will teach him quickly.

Cler. Why, he's a Judge, an Old Man.

Law. Never too Old

To be a Gentleman; and he that is a Judge

Can judge best what belongs to wounded honour.

There are my griefs, he has cast away my causes,

In which he has bowed my reputation.

And therefore Judge, or no Judge.

Cler. 'Pray be rul'd Sir,

This is the maddest thing——

Law. You will not carry it.

Cler. I do not tell you so, but if you may be perswaded.

Law. You know how you us'd me when I would not

Do you remember, Gentleman? (fight,

Cler. The Devil's in him.

Law. I see it in your Eyes, that you dare do it,

You have a carrying face, and you shall carry it.

Cler. The least is Banishment.

Law. Be banish'd then;

'Tis a friends part, we'll meet in Africa,

Or any part of the Earth.

Cler. Say he will not fight.

Law. I know then what to say, take you no care, Sir,

Cler. Well, I will carry it, and deliver it,

And to morrow morning meet you in the Louver,

Till when, my service.

Law. A Judge, or no Judge, no Judge. [Exit La-writ.]

Cler. This is the prettiest Rogue that e'r I read of,

None to provoke to th' field, but the old President;

What face shall I put on? if I come in earnest,

I am sure to wear a pair of Bracelets;

This may make some sport yet, I will deliver it,

Here comes the President.

Enter Vertaign, with two Gentlemen.

Vert. I shall find time, Gentlemen,

To do your causes good, is not that Cleremont?

Gent. 'Tis he my Lord.

Vert. Why does he smile upon me?

Am I become ridiculous? has your fortune, Sir,

Upon my Son, made you contemn his Father?

The glory of a Gentleman is fair bearing.

Cler. Mistake me not my Lord, you shall not find that,

I come with no blown Spirit to abuse you,

I know your place and honour due unto it,

The reverence to your silver Age and Vertue.

Vert. Your face is merry still.

Cler. So is my business,

And I beseech your honour mistake me not,

I have brought you from a wild or rather Mad-man

As mad a piece of—— you were wont to love mirth

In your young days, I have known your Honour woo it,

This may be made no little one, 'tis a Challenge, Sir,

Nay, start not, I beseech you, it means you no harm,

Nor any Man of Honour, or Understanding,

'Tis to steal from your serious hours a little laughter;

I am bold to bring it to your Lordship.

Vert. 'Tis to me indeed:

Do they take me for a Sword-man at these years? (Sir,

Cler. 'Tis only worth your Honours Mirth, that's all

'T had been in me else a sawcy rudeness.

Vert. From one La-writ, a very punctual Challenge.

Cler. But if your Lordship mark it, no great matter.

Vert. I have known such a wrangling Advocate,

Such a little figent thing; Oh I remember him,

A notable talking Knave, now out upon him,

Has challeng'd me downright, defied me mortally

I do remember too, I cast his Causes.

Cler. Why, there's the quarrel, Sir, the mortal quarrel.

Vert. Why, what a Knave is this? as y'are a Gentle-

Is there no further purpose but meer mirth? (man,

What a bold Man of War! he invites me roundly.

Cler. If there should be, I were no Gentleman,

Nor worthy of the honour of my Kindred.

And though I am sure your Lordship hates my Person,

Which Time may bring again into your favour,

Yet for the manners——

Vert. I am satisfied,

You see, Sir, I have out-liv'd those days of fighting,

And therefore cannot do him the honour to beat him my

But I have a Kinsman much of his ability, (self;

His Wit and Courage, for this call him Fool,

One that will spit as senseless fire as this Fellow.

Cler. And such a man to undertake, my Lord?

Vert. Nay he's too forward; these two pitch Barrels to-Cler. Upon my soul, no harm. (gether.

Vert. It makes me smile,

Why, what a stinking smother will they utter?

Yes, he shall undertake, Sir, as my Champion,

Since you propound it mirth, I'll venture on it,

And shall defend my cause, but as y'are honest

Sport not with blood.

Cler. Think not so basely, good Sir.

Vert. A Squire shall wait upon you from my Kinsman,

To morrow morning make you sport at full,

You want no Subject; but no wounds.

Cler. That's my care.

Vert. And so good day. [Ex. Vertaign, and Gentlemen.]

Cler. Many unto your honour.

This is a noble Fellow, of a sweet Spirit,

Now must I think how to contrive this matter,

For together they shall go.

Enter Dinant.

Din. O Cleremont,

I am glad I have found thee.

Cler. I can tell thee rare things.

Din. O, I can tell thee rarer,

Dost thou love me?

Cler. Love thee?

Din. Dost thou love me dearly?

Dar'st thou for my sake?

Cler. Any thing that's honest.

Din. Though it be dangerous?

Cler. Pox o' dangerous.

Din. Nay wondrous dangerous.

Cler. Wilt thou break my heart?

Din. Along with me then.

Cler. I must part to morrow.

Din. You shall, you shall, be faithful for this night,

And thou hast made thy friend.

Cer. Away, and talk not. [Exeunt.]

Enter Lamira, and Nurse.

Lam. O Nurse, welcome, where's Dinant?

Nurse. He's at my back.

'Tis the most liberal Gentleman, this Gold

He gave me for my pains, nor can I blame you,

If you yield up the fort.

Lam. How? yield it up?

Nurse. I know not, he that loves, and gives so largely,

And a young Lord to boot, or I am cozen'd,

May enter every where.

Lam. Thou'lt make me angry.

Enter

Enter Dinant, and Cleremont.

Nur. Why, if you are, I hope here's one will please you,
Look on him with my Eyes, good luck go with you:
Were I young for your sake——

Din. I thank thee, Nurse.

Nur. I would be tractable, and as I am——

Lam. Leave the room,
So old, and so immodest I and be careful,
Since whispers will 'wake sleeping jealousies,
That none disturb my Lord. [Exit Nurse.]

Cler. Will you dispatch?

Till you come to the matter be not rapt thus,
Walk in, walk in, I am your scout for once,
You owe me the like service.

Din. And will pay it.

Lam. As you respect our lives, speak not so loud.

Cler. Why, do it in dumb shew then, I am silent'd.

Lam. Be not so hasty, Sir, the golden Apples
Had a fell Dragon for their Guard, your pleasures
Are to be attempted with Herculean danger,
Or never to be gotten.

Din. Speak the means.

Lam. Thus briefly, my Lord sleeps now, and alas,
Each Night, he only sleeps.

Cler. Go, keep her stirring.

Lam. Now if he 'wake, as sometimes he does,
He only stretches out his hand and feels,
Whether I am a bed, which being assur'd of,
He sleeps again; but should he miss me, Valour
Could not defend our lives.

Din. What's to be done then?

Lam. Servants have servile faiths, nor have I any
That I dare trust; on noble Cleremont
We safely may rely.

Cler. What man can do,
Command and boldly.

Lam. Thus then in my place,
You must lye with my Lord.

Cler. With an old man?
Two Beards together, that's preposterous.

Lam. There is no other way, and though 'tis dangerous,
He having servants within call, and arm'd too,
Slaves fed to act all that his jealousy
And rage commands them, yet a true friend should not Check at the hazard of a life.

Cler. I thank you,
I love my friend, but know no reason why
To hate my self; to be a kind of pander,
You see I am willing,
But to betray mine own throat you must pardon.

Din. Then I am lost, and all my hopes defeated,
Were I to hazard ten times more for you,
You should find, Cleremont——

Cler. You shall not outdo me,
Fall what may fall, I'll do't.

Din. But for his Beard——

Lam. To cover that you shall have my night Linnen,
And you dispos'd of, my Dinant and I
Will have some private conference.

Enter Champernel, privately.

Cler. Private doing,
Or I'll not venture.

Lam. That's as we agree. [Exeunt.]

Enter Nurse, and Charlotte, pass over the Stage with Pillows, Night cloaths, and such things. (Nour?)

Cham. What can this Woman do, preserving her ho-
I have given her all the liberty that may be,
I will not be far off though, nor I will not be jealous,
Nor trust too much, I think she is vertuous,
Yet when I hold her best, she's but a Woman,
As full of frailty as of faith, a poor sleight Woman,

And her best thoughts, but weak fortifications,
There may be a Mine wrought: Well, let 'em work then,
I shall meet with it, till the signs be monstrous,
And stick upon my head, I will not believe it, [Stands private]
She may be, and she may not, now to my observation.

Enter Dinant, and Lamira.

Din. Why do you make me stay so? if you love me——

Lam. You are too hot and violent.

Din. Why do you shift thus
From one Chamber to another?

Lam. A little delay, Sir,
Like fire, a little sprinkled o'r with water
Makes the desires burn clear, and ten times hotter.

Din. Why do you speak so loud? I pray'e go in,
Sweet Mistriss, I am mad, time steals away,
And when we would enjoy——

Lam. Now fie, fie, Servant,
Like sensual Beasts shall we enjoy our pleasures?

Din. 'Pray do not kiss me then.

Lam. Why, that I will, and you shall find anon, servant.

Din. Softly, for heavens sake, you know my friend's en-
A little now, now; will ye go in again? (gag'd,

Lam. Ha, ha, ha, ha.

Din. Why do you laugh so loud, Precious?
Will you betray me; ha' my friends throat cut!

Lam. Come, come, I'll kiss thee again.

Cham. Will you so? you are liberal,
If you do cozen me——

Enter Nurse with Wine.

Din. What's this?

Lam. Wine, Wine, a draught or two.

Din. What does this Woman here?

Lam. She shall not hinder you.

Din. This might have been spar'd,
'Tis but delay and time lost; pray send her softly off.

Lam. Sit down, and mix your spirits with Wine,
I will make you another Hercules.

Din. I dare not drink;
Fie, what delays you make? I dare not,
I shall be drunk presently, and do strange things then.

Lam. Not drink a cup with your Mistriss! O the pleasure.

Din. Lady, why this? [Musick]

Lam. We must have mirth to our Wine, Man.

Din. Pl—— o' the Musick.

Champ. God-a-mercy Wench,
If thou dost cuckold me I shall forgive thee.

Din. The house will all rise now, this will disturb all.
Did you do this?

Lam. Peace, and sit quiet, fool,
You love me, come, sit down and drink.

Enter Cleremont above.

Cler. What a Devil ail you?

How cold I sweat! a hogs pox stop your pipes, [Musick]
The thing will 'wake; now, now, methinks I find
His Sword just gliding through my throat. What's that?
A vengeance choak your pipes. Are you there, Lady?
Stop, stop those Rascals; do you bring me hither
To be cut into minced meat? why Dinant?

Din. I cannot do withal;

I have spoke, and spoke; I am betray'd and lost too.

Cler. Do you hear me? do you understand me?
'Plague dam your Whistles. [Musick ends.]

Lam. 'Twas but an over-sight, they have done, lye down.

Cler. Would you had done too,
You know not

In what a misery and fear I lye.

You have a Lady in your arms.

Din. I would have ——

Champ. I'll watch you Goodman Wou'd have. [again.]

Cler. Remove for Heavens sake,
And fall to that you come for.

Lam.

The Recorders

Lam. Lie you down,
'Tis but an hours endurance now.
Cler. I dare not, softly sweet Lady—— heart?
Lam. 'Tis nothing but your fear, he sleeps still soundly,
Lie gently down.
Cler. 'Pray make an end.
Din. Come, Madam.
Lam. These Chambers are too near. [Ex. Din. Lam.
Cham. I shall be nearer;
Well, go thy wayes, I'le trust thee through the world,
Deal how thou wilt: that that I never feel,
I'le never fear. Yet by the honour of a Souldier,
I hold thee truly noble: How these things will look,
And how their blood will curdle! Play on Children,
You shall have pap anon. O thou grand Fool,
That thou knew'st but thy fortune—— [Musick done.
Cler. Peace, good Madam,
Stop her mouth, Dinant, it sleeps yet, 'pray be wary,
Dispatch, I cannot endure this misery,
I can hear nothing more; I'll say my prayers,
And down again—— [Whistle within.
A thousand Alarms fall upon my quarters,
Heaven send me off; when I lye keeping Courtes.
Pl—— o' your fumbling, Dinant; how I shake!
'Tis still again: would I were in the Indies. [Exit Cler.

Enter Dinant, and Lamira: a light within.

Din. Why do you use me thus? thus poorly? basely?
Work me into a hope, and then destroy me?
Why did you send for me? this new way train me?
Lam. Mad-man, and fool, and false man, now I'll shew
Din. 'Pray put your light out. (thee.
Lam. Nay I'll hold it thus,
That all chaste Eyes may see thy lust, and scorn it.
Tell me but this when you first doted on me,
And made suit to enjoy me as your Wife,
Did you not hold me honest?
Din. Yes, most vertuous.
Lam. And did not that appear the only lustre
That made me worth your love and admiration?
Din. I must confes——
Lam. Why would you deal so basely?
So like a thief, a Villain?
Din. Peace, good Madam.
Lam. I'll speak aloud too; thus maliciously,
Thus breaking all the Rules of honesty,
Of honour and of truth, for which I lov'd you,
For which I call'd you servant, and admir'd you;
To steal that Jewel purchas'd by another,
Piously set in Wedlock, even that Jewel,
Because it had no flaw, you held unvaluable:
Can he that has lov'd good, dote on the Devil?
For he that seeks a Whore, seeks but his Agent;
Or am I of so wild and low a blood?
So nurs'd in infamies?
Din. I do not think so,
And I repent.
Lam. That will not serve your turn, Sir.
Din. It was your treaty drew me on.
Lam. But it was your villany
Made you pursue it; I drew you but to try
How much a man, and nobly thou durst stand,
How well you had deserv'd the name of vertuous;
But you like a wild torrent, mix'd with all
Beastly and base affections came floating on,
Swelling your poyson'd billows——
Din. Will you betray me?
Lam. To all the miseries a vext Woman may.
Din. I let me but out,
Give me but room to tofs my Sword about me,
And I will tell you y'are a treacherous woman,
O that I had but words!
Lam. They will not serve you.
Din. But two-edg'd words to cut thee; a Lady traytor?

Perish by a proud Puppet? I did you too much honour,
To tender you my love, too much respected you
To think you worthy of my worst embraces.
Go take your Groom, and let him dally with you,
Your greasie Groom; I scorn to imp your lame stock,
You are not fair, nor handsome, I lye'd loudly,
This tongue abus'd you when it spoke you beauteous.

Lam. 'Tis very well, 'tis brave.
Din. Put out your light,
Your lascivious eyes are flames enough
For Fools to find you out; a Lady Plotter!
Must I begin your sacrifice of mischief?
I and my friend, the first-fruits of that blood,
You and your honourable Husband aim at?
Crooked and wretched you are both.
Lam. To you, Sir,
Yet to the Eye of Justice straight as Truth.
Din. Is this a womans love? a womans mercy?
Do you profes this seriously? do you laugh at me?
Lam. Ha, ha.
Din. Pl—— light upon your scorns, upon your flatteries,
Upon your tempting faces, all distractions;
A bedrid winter hang upon your cheeks,
And blast, blast, blast those buds of Pride that paint you;
Death in your eyes to fright men from these dangers:
Raife up your trophy, Cleremont.
Cler. VVhat a vengeance ail you?
Din. VVhat dismal noise! is there no honour in you?
Cleremont, we are betrayed, betrayed, sold by a woman;
Deal bravely for thy self.
Cler. This comes of rutting;
Are we made stales to one another?
Din. Yes, we are undone, lost.
Cler. You shall pay for't grey-beard.
Up, up, you sleep your last esse. { Lights above, two Ser-
1 Serv. No, not yet, Sir, { vants and Anabel.
Lady, look up, would you have wrong'd this Beauty?
VVake so tender a Virgin with rough terms?
You wear a Sword, we must entreat you leave it.
2 Serv. Eye Sir, so sweet a Lady?
Cler. Was this my bed-fellow, pray give me leave to look,
I am not mad yet, I may be by and by.
Did this lye by me?
Did I fear this? is this a Cause to shake at?
Away with me for shame, I am a Rascal.
Enter Champenel, Beaupre, Verdone, Lamira,
Anabel, Cleremont, and two Servants.
Din. I am amaz'd too.
Beaup. VVe'll recover you.
Verd. You walk like Robin good-fellow all the house over,
And every man afraid of you.
Din. 'Tis well, Lady;
The honour of this deed will be your own,
The world shall know your bounty.
Beaup. VVhat shall we do with 'em?
Cer. Geld me,
For 'tis not fit I should be a man again,
I am an Ass, a Dog.
Lam. Take your revenges,
You know my Husbands wrongs and your own losses.
Anab. A brave man, an admirable brave man;
VVell, well, I would not be so tryed again;
A very handsome proper Gentleman.
Cler. VVill you let me lye by her but one hour more,
And then hang me? (bravely,
Din. We wait your malice, put your swords home
You have reason to seek blood.
Lam. Not as you are noble.
Cham. Hands off, and give them liberty, only disarm 'em.
Beaup. We have done that already.
Cham. You are welcome, Gentlemen,
I am glad my house has any pleasure for you,
I keep a couple of Ladies here, they say fair,

And you are young and handsome, Gentlemen;
Have you any more mind to Wenches?

Cler. To be abus'd too? Lady, you might have help'd this.

Ana. Sir now 'tis past, but 't may be I may stand
Your friend hereafter, in a greater matter.

Cler. Never whilst you live.

Ana. You cannot tell—— now, Sir, a parting hand.

Cler. Down and Roses:

Well I may live to see you again. A dull Rogue,
No revelation in thee.

Lam. Were you well frightened?

Were your fits from the heart, of all colds and colours?
That's all your punishment.

Cler. It might have been all yours,
Had not a block-head undertaken it.

Cham. Your swords you must leave to these Gentlemen.

Verd. And now, when you dare fight,
We are on even Ice again.

Din. 'Tis well:

To be a Mistress, is to be a monster,
And so I leave your house, and you for ever.

Lam. Leave your wild lusts, and then you are a master.

Cham. You may depart too.

Cler. I had rather stay here.

Cham. Faith we shall fright you worse.

Cler. Not in that manner,

There's five hundred Crowns, fright me but so again.

Din. Come Cleremont, this is the hour of fool.

Cler. Wiser the next shall be or we'll to School. [Exeunt.

Champ. How coolly these hot gallants are departed?

Faith Cousin, 'twas unconscionably done,
To lye so still, and so long.

Anab. 'Twas your pleasure,
If 'twere a fault, I may hereafter mend.

Champ. O my best Wife,
Take now what course thou wilt, and lead what life.

Lam. The more trust you commit, the more care still,
Goodness and vertue shall attend my will.

Cham. Let's laugh this night out now, and count our gains.
We have our honours home, and they their pains.

[Exeunt omnes.

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Cleremont, Dinant.

Din. It holds, they will go thither.

Cler. To their Summer-house?

Din. Thither i'th' evening, and which is the most infliction,
Only to insult upon our miseries.

Cler. Are you provided?

Din. Yes, yes.

Cler. Thoroughly?

Din. Thoroughly.

Cler. Basta, enough, I have your mind, I will not fail you.

Din. At such an hour.

Cler. Have I a memory?

A Cause, and Will to do? thou art so fullen——

Din. And shall be, till I have a fair reparation.

Cler. I have more reason, for I scaped a fortune,
Which if I come so near again: I say nothing,
But if I sweat not in another fashion——

O, a delicate Wench.

Din. 'Tis certain a most handsome one.

Cler. And me thought the thing was angry with it self too
It lay so long conceal'd, but I must part with you,
I have a scene of mirth, to drive this from my heart,
And my hour is come.

Din. Miss not your time.

Cler. I dare not.

[Exeunt severally.

Enter Sampson, and a Gentleman.

Gent. I presume, Sir, you now need no instruction,
But fairly know, what belongs to a Gentleman;
You bear your Uncles cause.

Sam. Do not disturb me,

I understand my cause, and the right carriage.

Gent. Be not too bloody.

Sam. As I find my enemy; if his sword bite,
If it bite, Sir, you must pardon me.

Gent. No doubt he is valiant,

He durst not undertake else,

Sam. He's most welcome,

As he is most valiant, he were no man for me else.

Gent. But say he should relent.

Sam. He dies relenting,

I cannot help it, he must dies relenting,

If he pray, praying, ipso facto, praying,

Your honourable way admits no prayer,

And if he fight, he falls, there's his quietus.

Gent. Y'are nobly punctual, let's retire and meet 'em,
But still, I say, have mercy.

Samp. I say, honour.

[Exeunt.

Enter Champernel, Lamira, Anabel, Beaupre, Verdane, Charlotte and a Servant.

Lam. Will not you go sweet-heart?

Champ. Go? Ple fly with thee.

I stay behind?

Lam. My Father will be there too,

And all our best friends.

Beau. And if we be not merry,

We have hard luck, Lady.

Verd. Faith let's have a kind of play.

Cham. What shall it be?

Verd. The story of Dinant.

Lam. With the merry conceits of Cleremont,
His Fits and Feavers.

Ana. But Ple lie still no more.

Lam. That, as you make the Play, 'twill be rare sport,
And how 'twill vex my gallants, when they hear it?
Have you given order for the Coach?

Charl. Yes, Madam.

Cham. My easie Nag, and padd.

Serv. 'Tis making ready.

Champ. Where are your Horses?

Beau. Ready at an hour, Sir: we'll not be last.

Cham. Fie, what a night shall we have!

A roaring, merry night.

Lam. We'll flie at all, Sir.

Cham. Ple flie at thee too, finely, and so ruffle thee,
Ple try your Art upon a Country pallet.

Lam. Brag not too much, for fear I should expect it,
Then if you fail——

Cham. Thou saiest too true, we all talk.

But let's in, and prepare, and after dinner

Begin our mirthful pilgrimage.

Lam. He that's sad,

A crab-face'd Mistress cleave to him for this year. [Exeunt.

Enter Cleremont, and La-writ.

La-writ. Since it cannot be the Judge——

Cler. 'Tis a great deal better.

La-writ. You are sure, he is his kinsman? a Gentleman?

Cler. As arrant a Gentleman, and a brave fellow,
And so near to his blood——

La-writ. It shall suffice,

I'll set him further off, I'll give a remove

Shall quit his kindred, I'll lopp him.

Cler. Will ye kill him?

(him,

La-w. And there were no more Cousins in the world I kill
I do mean, Sir, to kill all my Lords kindred.

For every cause a Cousin.

Cler. How if he have no more Cousins?

La-writ.

La-writ. The next a kin then to his Lordships favour ;
The man he smiles upon.

Cler. Why this is vengeance, horrid, and dire.

La-writ. I love a dire revenge :

Give me the man that will all others kill,
And last himself,

Cler. You stole that resolution.

La-writ. I had it in a Play, but that's all one,
I wou'd see it done.

Cler. Come, you must be more merciful.

La-writ. To no Lords Cousins in the world, I hate 'em ;

A Lords Cousin to me is a kind of Cockatrice,
If I see him first, he dies.

A strange Antipathy.

Cler. What think you of their Nieces ?

La-writ. If I like 'em,
They may live, and multiply ; 'tis a cold morning.

Cler. 'Tis sharp indeed ; you have broke your fast ?

La-writ. No verily.

Cler. Your valour would have ask'd a good foundation.

La-writ. Hang him, I'll kill him fasting.

Enter Sampson and the Gent.

Cler. Here they come,
Bear your self in your language, smooth and gently,
When your swords argue.

La-writ. 'Pray Sir, spare your precepts.

Gent. I have brought you, Sir——

La-writ. 'Tis very well, no words,
You are welcome, Sir.

Sam. I thank you, Sir, few words.

La-writ. I'll kill you for your Uncles sake.

Sam. I love you,
I'll cut your throat for your own sake.

La-writ. I esteem of you.

Cler. Let's render 'em honest, and fair, Gentlemen,
Search my friend, I'll search yours.

Gent. That's quickly done.

Cler. You come with no Spells, nor Witchcrafts ?

Sam. I come fairly to kill him honestly.

La-writ. Hang Spells, and Witchcrafts,
I come to kill my Lords Nephew like a Gentleman,
And so I kiss his hand.

Gent. This Doublet is too stiff.

La-writ. Off with't, I hate it,
And all such fortifications, feel my skin,
If that be stiff, flea that off too.

Gent. 'Tis no soft one.

La-writ. Off with't, I say :

I'll fight with him like a flea'd Cat.

Gent. You are well, you are well.

Cler. You must uncase too.

Sam. Yes, Sir.

But tell me this, why should I mix mine honour
With a fellow, that has ne're a lace in's shirt ?

Gent. That's a main point, my friend has two.

Cler. That's true, Sir.

La-w. Base and degenerate Cousin, dost not thou know
An old, and tatter'd colours, to the enemy,
Is of more honour, and shews more ominous ?
This shirt, five times, victorious I have fought under,
And cut through squadrons of your curious cut-works,
As I will do through thine, shake, and be satisfied.

Cler. This is unanswerable.

Sam. But may I fight with a foul shirt ?

Gent. Most certain, so it be a fighting shirt,
Let it be ne're so foul, or lowsie, Casár wore such a one.

Sam. Saint Denis then : I accept your shirt.

Cler. Not so forward, first you must talk,
'Tis a main point, of the French method,
Talk civilly, and make your cause Authentick.

Gent. No weapon must be near you, nor no anger.

Cler. When you have done, then stir your resolutions,
Take to your Weapons bravely.

La-writ. 'Tis too cold ;
This for a Summer fight.

Cler. Not for a world you should transgress the rules.

Sam. 'Tis pievish weather,
I had rather fight without.

Gent. An 'twere in a River:

Cler. Where both stood up to th' chins.

La-writ. Then let's talk quickly,
Pl—— o' this circumstance.

Cler. Are the Horses come yet ?

Gent. Yes certain : give your swords to us, now civilly.

Cler. We'll stand a while off ; take the things, and leave 'em,
You know when, and let the children play :

This is a dainty time of year for puppies,
Would the old Lord were here.

Gent. He would dye with laughter.

Cler. I am sorry I have no time to see this game out,
Away, away.

Gent. Here's like to be a hot fight,
Call when y'are fit.

[Ex. Cler. and Gent.

La-writ. Why look you Sir, you seem to be a Gentleman,
And you come in honour of your Uncle, boh, boh, 'tis very
Your Uncle has offer'd me some few affronts, (cold ;
Pait flesh and blood to bear : boh, boh, wondrous cold.

Sam. My Lord, mine Uncle, is an honourable man,
And what he offers, boh, boh, cold indeed,
Having made choice of me, an unworthy kinsman,
Yet take me with you : boh, boh, pestilence cold,
Not altogether.

La-writ. Boh, boh, I say altogether.

Sam. You say you know not what then ? boh, boh, Sir.

La-writ. Sir me with your sword in your hand ;
You have a scurvy Uncle, you have a most scurvy cause,
And you are—— boh, boh.

Sam. Boh, boh, what ?

La-writ. A shitten scurvy Cousin.

Samp. Our Swords ; our Swords ;
Thou art a Dog, and like a Dog, our Swords.

La-w. Our weapons Gentlemen: ha ? where's your second ?

Sam. Where's yours ?

La-writ. So ho ; our weapons.

Sam. Wa, ha, ho, our weapons ;
Our Doublets and our weapons, I am dead.

La-w. First, second, third, a pl—— be wi'you Gentlemen.

Sam. Are these the rules of honour ? I am starv'd.

La-w. They are gone, and we are here ; what shall we do ?

Sam. O for a couple of Faggots.

La-w. Hang a couple of Faggots.

Dar'ft thou take a killing cold with me ?

Sam. I have it already.

(Doublets ?

La-w. Rogues, Thieves, boh, boh, run away with our
To fight at Buffets now, 'twere such a May-game.

Sam. There were no honour in't, pl—— on't, 'tis scurvy.

La-w. Or to revenge my wrongs at fifty-cuffs.

Sam. My Lord, mine Uncles cause, depend on Boxes ?

La-w. Let's go in quest, if we ever recover 'em.

Sam. I, come, our Colds together, and our Doublets.

La-w. Give me thy hand ; thou art a valiant Gentleman,
I say if ever we recover 'em——

Sam. Let's get into a house and warm our hearts.

La-w. There's ne're a house within this mile, beat me,
Kick me and beat me as I go, and I'll beat thee too,

To keep us warm ; if ever we recover 'em——

Kick hard, I am frozen : so, so, now I feel it.

Sam. I am dull yet.

La-w. I'll warm thee, I'll warm thee—— Gentlemen ?
Rogues, Thieves, Thieves : run now I'll follow thee. [Exeunt.

Enter Vertaign, Champernel, Beaupre, Verdone, Lamira, Annabel, Charlotte, Nurse.

Verta. Use legs, and have legs.

Cham. You that have legs say so,
I put my one to too much strefs.

Verdo. Your Horse, Sir,

Will meet you within half a mile.

Lam. I like

The walk so well, I should not miss my Coach,
Though it were further. Amabel thou art sad:
What ails my Niece?

Beau. She's still musing, Sister,
How quietly her late bed-fellow lay by her.

Nurse. Old as I am, he would have startled me,
Nor can you blame her.

Char. Had I ta'ne her place,
I know not, but I fear, I should ha' shreek'd,
Though he had never offer'd—

Ana. Out upon thee,
Thou wouldst have taught him.

Char. I think, with your pardon,
That you wish now you had.

Ana. I am glad I yield you
Such ample scope of mirth.

Cornet.

[Musick within.]

Verta. Nay, be not angry,
There's no ill meant: ha? Musick, and choice Musick?

Cham. 'Tis near us in the Grove; what courteous bounty
Bestows it on us? my dancing days are done;
Yet I would thank the giver, did I know him.

Verdo. 'Tis questionless, some one of your own Village,
That hearing of your purpos'd journey thither,
Prepares it for your entertainment, and
The honour of my Lady.

Lam. I think rather,
Some of your Lordships Clients.

Beaup. What say you Cousin,
If they should prove your Suitors?

Verd. That's most likely.

Nurse. I say if you are noble, be't who will,
Go presently and thank 'em: I can jump yet,
Or tread a measure.

Lam. Like a Millers Mare.

Nurf. I warrant you well enough to serve the Country,
I'll make one, and lead the way. [Exit.]

Charl. Do you note,
How zealous the old Crone is?

Lam. And you titter
As eagerly as she: come sweet, we'll follow,
No ill can be intended.

[Musick ends.]

Cham. I ne're fear'd yet.

[Exeunt.]

SONG in the Wood.

THIS way, this way come and hear,
You that hold these pleasures dear,
Fill your ears with our sweet sound,
Whilst we melt the frozen ground:
This way come, make haste oh fair,
Let your clear eyes gild the Air;
Come and bless us with your sight,
This way, this way, seek delight.

Enter a company of Gentlemen, like Russians.

1 Gent. They are ours, but draw them on a little further
From the foot path into the neighbouring thicket,
And we may do't, as safe as in a Castle.

2 Gent. They follow still; the President Vertaigne
Comes on a pace, and Champernel limps after;
The Women, as if they had wings, and walk't
Upon the Air, fly to us.

1 Gent. They are welcome,
We'll make 'em sport; make a stand here, all know
How we are to proceed.

2 Gent. We are instructed.

Still Musick within.

1 Gent. One strain or two more.

[Gent. off.]

Enter Vertaigne, Champernel, Beaupre, Verdone, Lamira, Anabel, Nurse, Charlotte.

Excellent, they are come.

Nurse. We cannot miss, in such a business, yet

Mine ear ne'r fail'd me.

[Musick for the Dance.]

Charl. Would we were at it once,
I do not walk, but Dance.

1 Gent. You shall have dancing.

Begin, and when I give the word—

2 Gent. No more:

We are instructed.

[Dance.]

Beaupre. But win us fairly—

1 Gent. O Sir, we do not come to try your valour,
But to possess you, yet we use you kindly
In that, like English Thieves, we kill you not,
But are contented with the spoil.

Verta. Oh Heaven!

How hath mine age deserv'd this?

Cham. Hell confound it,

This comes of walking; had I kept my legs,
Or my good Horse, my Armour on,
My Staff in my rest, and this good Sword too, friend,
How I would break and scatter these.

All Gent. Ha, ha, ha.

Cham. Do you scorn me Rogues?

Nurf. Nay, Gentlemen, kind Gentlemen,
Or honest keepers of these woods, but hear me,
Be not so rough; if you are taken with
My beauty, as it hath been worth the seeking,
Some one or two of you try me in private,
You shall not find me squeamish.

Charl. Do not kill me,
And do your worst, I'll suffer.

Lam. Peace vile creatures,

Vert. Do you know me, or my place, that you presume not
To touch my person?

1 Gent. If you are well, rest so,
Provoke not angry Wasps.

Verta. You are Wasps indeed,
Never created to yield Wax or Honey,
But for your Countries torment; yet if you are men,
(As you seem such in shape) if true born French-men,
However want compels you to these courses,
Rest satisfied with what you can take from us,
(These Ladies honours, and our liberties safe)
We freely give it.

1 Gent. You give but our own.

Verta. Look on these grey hairs, as you would be old,
Their tears, as you would have yours to find mercy
When Justice shall o'rtake you.

Cham. Look on me,

Look on me Rascals, and learn of me too,
That have been in some part of your profession,
Before that most of you ere suck'd, I know it,
I have rode hard, and late too.

Verta. Take heed, Sir.

Cham. Then use me like a Brother of the Trade,
For I have been at Sea, as you on land are,
Restore my Matrimony undefil'd,
Wrong not my Niece, and for our gold or silver,
If I pursue you, hang me.

Nurf. 'Tis well offer'd,
And as I said, sweet Gentlemen, with sovre faces,
If you are high, and want some sport, or so,
(As living without action here, you may do)
Forbear their tender grissels, they are meat
Will wash away, there is no substance in it,
We that are expert in the game, and tough too,
Will hold you play.

Enter Dinant and Cleremont.

1 Gent. This Hen longs to be troden.

Din. Lackey, my Horse.

Cler. This way, I heard the cries
Of distress'd Women.

2 Gent. Stand upon your guard.

Din. Who's here? my witty, scornful Lady-plot
In the hands of Russians?

Cler.

Cler. And my fine cold virgini,
That was insensible of man, and woman?

Din. Justice too,
Without a sword to guard it self?

Cler. And valour with its hands bound?

Din. And the great Souldier dull?

Why this is strange.

Lam. Dinant as thou art noble ———

Ana. As thou art valiant Cleremont ———

Lam. As ever I appear'd lovely ———

Ana. As you ever hope

For what I would give gladly ———

Cler. Pretty conjurations.

Lam. All injuries a little laid behind you.

Ana. Shew your selves men, and help us.

Din. Though your many

And gross abuses of me should more move me
To triumph in your miseries than relieve you,—

Yet that hereafter you may know that I
The scorn'd and despis'd Dinant, know what does Belong to honour, thus ———

Cler. I will say little,
Speak thou for me.

Fight.

Cham. 'Tis bravely fought.

Verta. Brave tempers,
To do thus for their enemies.

Cham. They are lost yet.

1 Gent. You that would rescue others, shall now feel
What they were born to.

2 Gent. Hurry them away. [Ex. Manent Vert.

Cham. That I could follow them. and Champernel.

Verta. I only can lament my fortune, and desire of heaven
A little life for my revenge.

Cham. The Provost

Shall fire the woods, but I will find 'em out,
No cave, no rock, nor hell shall keep them from
My searching vengeance.

Enter La-writ, and Sampson.

La-writ. O cold! O fearfull cold! plague of all seconds.

Samp. O for a pint of burnt wine, or a sip
Of aqua-fortis.

Cham. The rogues have met with these two
Upon my life and rob'd 'em.

La-writ. As you are honourable Gentlemen,
Impart unto a couple of cold combatants.

Sam. My Lord, mine uncle as I live.

La-writ. Pox take him.

How that word has warm'd my mouth?

Verta. Why how now Cousin?

Why, why? and where man, have you been? at a Poulterers
That you are cas'd thus like a rabbit? I could laugh now,
And I shall laugh, for all I have lost my Children,
Laugh monstrously.

Cham. What are they?

Verta. Give me leave Sir,
Laugh more and more, never leave laughing.

Cham. Why Sir?

Verta. Why 'tis such a thing I smell it Sir, I smell it,
Such a ridiculous thing, ———

La-writ. Do you laugh at me my Lord?

I am very cold, but that should not be laught at.

Cham. What art thou?

La-writ. What art thou?

Sam. If he had his doublet. ———

And his sword by his side, as a Gentleman ought to have.

Verta. Peace Monsieur Sampson.

Cham. Come hither little Gentleman.

La-writ. Bafe is the slave commanded: come to me.

Verta. This is the little advocate.

Cham. What advocate?

Verta. The little advocate that sent me a challenge,
I told you that my Nephew undertook it,
And what 'twas like to prove: now you see the issue.

Cham. Is this the little Lawyer?

La-writ. You have a sword Sir,
And I have none; you have a doublet too
That keeps you warm, and makes you merry.

Sam. If your Lordship knew
The nature, and the nobleness of the Gentleman,
Though he shew slight here, and at what gulfs of danger
His manhood has arrived,
But that

Mens fates are foolish,
And often headlong overrun their fortunes.

La-writ. That little Lawyer would so prick his ears up,
And bite your honour by the nose.

Cham. Say you so Sir? (too.

La-writ. So niggle about your grave shins Lord Vertagine

Sam. No more sweet Gentleman, no more of that Sir.

La-writ. I will have more, I must have more.

Verta. Out with it.

Sam. Nay he is as brave a fellow.—

Cham. Have I caught you? [Strikes him down.

Verta. Do not kill him, do not kill him.

Cham. No, no, no, I will not. Do you peep again?
Down down proud heart.

Sam. O valour,
Look up brave friend, I have no means to rescue thee,
My Kingdom for a sword.

Cham. Ple sword you presently,
Ple claw your skin coat too.

Verta. Away good Sampson,

You goe to gras else instantly.

Sam. But do not murder my brave friend.

Verta. Not one word.

Cham. If you do sirra—

Sam. Must I goe off dishonour'd?
Adversity tries valour, so I leave thee. [Exit.

Cham. Are you a Lawyer Sir?

La-writ. I was, I was Sir.

Cham. Nay never look, your Lawyers pate is broken,
And your litigious blood about your ears sirra;
Why do you fight and snarle?

La-writ. I was possest.

Cham. Ple dispossess you.

Verta. Ha, ha, ha.

La-writ. Et tu Brute?

Verta. Beat him no more.

Cham. Alas Sir I must beat him,
Beat him into his business again, he will be lost else.

Verta. Then take your way.

Cham. Ly still, and doe not struggle.

La-writ. I am patient,

I never saw my blood before, it jades me,
I have no more heart now than a goose. (of living,

Cham. Why sirra, why do you leave your trade, your trade
And send your challenges like thunderbolts,
To men of honour'd place?

La-writ. I understand Sir,

I never understood before your beating.

Cham. Does this work on you?

La-writ. Yes.

Cham. Do you thank me for't?

La-writ. As well as a beaten man can.

Cham. And do you promise me,
To fall close to your trade again? leave brawling?

La-writ. If you will give me leave and life.

Cham. And ask this noble man forgiveness?

La-writ. Heartily. (you

Cham. Rise then, and get you gone, and let me hear of
As of an advocate new vampt; no more words,
Get you off quickly, and make no murmurs,
I shall pursue you else.

La-writ. I have done sweet Gentlemen. [Exit.

Verta. But we forget our selves, our friends and Children.

Cham. We'l raise the country first, then take our fortunes.

[Excunt.
Enter

Enter one Gentleman, and Lamira.

1 Gent. Shall I entreat for what I may command?

Lam. Think on my birth.

1 Gent. Here I am only Noble,
A King, and thou in my dominions, fool,
A subject and a slave.

Lam. Be not a Tyrant,
A ravisher of honour, gentle Sir,
And I will think ye such, and on my knees,
As to my Sovereign, pay a Subjects duty,
With prayers and tears.

1 Gent. I like this humble carriage,
I will walk by, but kneel you still and weep too,
It shews well, while I meditate on the prey;
Before I seize it.

Lam. Is there no mercie, Heaven?

Enter second Gent. and Anabel.

2 Gent. Not kiss you?
I will kiss and kiss again.

Ana. Savage villain!
My Innocence be my strength, I do despise thee,
Thou scorn and spit at thee; will you come on Sir?
You are hot, there is a cooler.

2 Gent. A virago? (desp.)

Ana. No, loathsome Goat, more, more, I am that God-
That here with whips of steel in hell hereafter
Scourge rape and theft.

2 Gent. I'll try your deity.

Ana. My chastity, and this knife held by a Virgin,
Against thy lust, thy sword and thee a Beast,
Call on for the encounter.

2 Gent. Now what think you? Throws her and takes her Knife.

Ana. In me their power suffers,
That should protect the Innocent.

1 Gent. I am all fire,
And thou shalt quench it, and serve my pleasures.

Come partner in the spoil and the reward,
Let us enjoy our purchase.

Lam. O Dinant!

O Heaven! O Husband!

Ana. O my Cleremont!

1 Gent. Two are our slaves they call on, bring 'em forth
As they are chain'd together, let them see
And suffer in the object.

Enter Dinant, and Cleremont, bound by the rest of the Gent.

2 Gent. While we sit
And without pity hear 'em.

Cler. By my life,
I suffer more for thee than for my self.

Din. Be a man Cleremont, and look upon 'em
As such that not alone abus'd our service,
Fed us with hopes most bitter in digestion,
But when love fail'd, to draw on further mischief,
The baits they laid for us, were our own honours,
Which thus hath made us slaves too, worse than slaves.

2 Gent. He dies.

1 Gent. Pray hold, give him a little respite.

Din. I see you now beyond expression wretched,
The wit you brag'd of fool'd, that boasted honour,
As you believ'd compass'd with walls of brass,
To guard it sure, subject to be o'rthrown
With the least blast of lust.

Lam. A most sad truth.

Din. That confidence which was not to be shaken
In a perpetual fever, and those favours,
Which with so strong and Ceremonious duty
Your lover and a Gentleman long sought for,
Sought, sued, and kneel'd in vain for, must you yield up
To a licentious villain, that will hardly

Allow you thanks for't.

Cler. Something I must say too,
And to you pretty one, though crying one;
To be hang'd now, when these worshipful benchers please,
Though I know not their faces that condemn me,
A little startles me, but a man is nothing,
A Maidenhead is the thing, the thing all aim at;
Do not you wish now, and wish from your heart too,
When scarce sweet with my fears, I long lay by you
Those fears you and your good Aunt put upon me,
To make you sport, you had given a little hint,
A touch or so, to tell me I was mortal,
And by a mortal woman?

Ana. Pray you no more.

Cler. If I had loos'd that virgin Zone, observe me,
I would have hired the best of all our Poets
To have sung so much, and so well in the honour
Of that nights joy, that Ovids afternoon,
Nor his Corinna should again be mention'd.

Ana. I do repent, and wish I had.

Cler. That's comfort,
But now ———

2 Gent. Another that will have it offer'd,
Compel it to be offer'd, shall enjoy it.

Cler. A rogue, a ruffian.

2 Gent. As you love your throat, ———

1 Gent. Away with them.

Ana. O Cleremont!

Lam. O Dinant!

Din. I can but add your sorrows to my sorrows,
Your fears to my fears.

Cler. To your wishes mine,
This slave may prove unable to perform,
Till I perform the task that I was born for.

Ana. Amen, amen.

1 Gent. Drag the slaves hence, for you
A while I'll lock you up here, study all ways
You can to please me, or the deed being done,
You are but dead.

2 Gent. This strong Vault shall contain you,
There think how many for your maidenhead
Have pin'd away, and be prepar'd to lose it
With penitence.

1 Gent. No humane help can save you.

Ladies. Help, help?

2 Gent. You cry in vain, rocks cannot hear you.

Actus Quintus. Scena Prima.

A Horrid noise of Musique within,
Enter one and opens the door, in which Lamira and Anabel were shut, they in all fear.

Lam. O Cousin how I shake all this long night!
What frights and noises we have heard, still
The villains put on shapes to torture us, (they encrease,
And to their Devils form such preparations
As if they were a hatching new dishonours,
And fatal ruine, past dull mans invention.
Goe not too far, and pray good Cousin Anabel,
Hark a new noise. A strange Musick.

Ana. They are exquisite in mischief, Sackbut & Troop

I will goe on, this room gives no protection, Musick.
More than the next, what's that? how sad and hollow,
The sound comes to us. Thieves peeping.

Lam. Groaning? or singing is it? Louder.

Ana. The wind I think, murmuring amongst old rooms.

Lam. Now it grows lower, sure some sad preface
Of our soul lots ——— look now they peep.

Ana. Pox peep 'em.

Lam. O give them gentle language.

Ana. Give 'em rats-bane.

Peep above.
Lam.

Lam. Now they are above.
 Ana. I would they were i'th' Center.
 Lam. Thou art so foolish desperate.
 Ana. Since we must lose.
 Lam. Call 'em brave fellows, Gentlemen.
 Ana. Call 'em rogues,
 Rogues as they are, rude rogues, uncivil villains. (ger ?
 Lam. Look an thou woo't beware, dost thou feel the dan-
 Ana. Till the danger feel me, thus will I talk still,
 And worse when that comes too ; they cannot eat me.
 This is a punishment, upon our own prides
 Most justly laid ; we must abuse brave Gentlemen,
 Make 'em tame fools, and hobby-horses, laugh and jeer at
 Such men too, and so handfom and so Noble,
 That howsoe're we seem'd to carry it ———
 Wou'd 'twere to do again.
 Lam. I do confes cousin,
 I was too harsh, too foolish.
 Ana. Do you feel it ?
 Do you find it now ? take heed o'th' punishment,
 We might have had two gallant Gentlemen,
 Proper, young, O how it tortures me !
 Two Devils now, two rascals, two and twenty ———
 Lam. O think not so.
 Ana. Nay an we 'scape so modestly ———
 Lam. May we be worthy any eyes, or knowledge,
 When we are used thus ?
 Ana. Why not ? why do you cry ?
 Are we not women still ? what were we made for ?
 Lam. But thus, thus basely ———
 Ana. 'Tis against our villis,
 And if there come a thousand so, ———
 Lam. Out on thee.
 Ana. You are a fool, what we cannot resist,
 Why should we grieve and blush for ? there be women,
 And they that bear the name of excellent women
 Would give their whole estates to meet this fortune.
 Lam. Hark, a new noise. New sound within.
 Ana. Let 'em goe on, I fear not,
 If wrangling, fighting and scratching cannot preserve me,
 Why so be it Cousin ; if I be ordain'd
 To breed a race of rogues. ———
Enter four over the stage with Beaupre, and Verdone, bound and halters about their necks.
 Lam. They come. Ana. Be firm,
 They are welcom.
 Lam. What mask of death is this ? O my dear Brother.
 Ana. My Couz too ; why now y'are glorious villains.
 Lam. O shall we lose our honours ?
 Ana. Let 'em goe,
 When death prepares the way, they are but Pageants.
 Why must these dye ?
 Beau. Lament your own misfortunes,
 We perish happily before your ruins.
 Ana. Has mischief ne'r a tongue ?
 I Gent. Yes foolish woman,
 Our Captains will is death.
 Ana. You dare not do it.
 Tell thy base boisterous Captain what I say,
 Thy lawless Captain that he dares not ;
 Do you laugh you rogue ? you pamper'd rogue ?
 Lam. Good Sir,
 Good Cousin gently, as y'are a Gentleman, —
 Ana. A Gentleman ? a slave, a dog, the devils harbinger.
 Lam. Sir as you had a Mother.
 Ana. He a Mother ?
 Shame not the name of Mother, a she Bear
 A bloody old wolf bitch, a woman Mother ?
 Looks that rude lump, as if he had a Mother ?
 Intreat him ? hang him, do thy worst, thou dar'st not,
 Thou dar'st not wrong their lives, thy Captain dares not,
 They are persons of more price.
 Ver. What e're we suffer

Let not your angers wrong you.
 Ana. You cannot suffer,
 The men that do this deed, must live i'th' moon
 Free from the gripe of Justice.
 Lam. Is it not better ?
 Ana. Is it not better ? let 'em goe on like rascals
 And put false faces on ; they dare not do it ;
 Flatter such scabbs of nature ?
 Gent. Woman, woman
 The next work is with you.
 Ana. Unbind those Gentlemen,
 And put their fatal fortunes on our necks,
 Lam. As you have mercy do.
 Ana. As you are monsters. (nours
 Lam. Fright us no more with shipwrack of our ho-
 Nor if there be a guilt by us committed
 Let it endanger those.
 Ana. I say they dare not,
 There be a thousand galloufes, ye rogues,
 Tortures, ye bloody rogues, wheels.
 Gent. Away. Lam. Stay. Ana. Stay.
 Stay and I'll flatter too : good sweet fac'd Gentlemen,
 You excellent in honesty ; O Kinsmen !
 O Noble kinsmen !
 Gent. Away with 'em. [Ex. Ver. Beaup. and Gent.
 Ana. Stay yet.
 The Devil and his lovely dam walk with you,
 Come fortify your self, if they do dy,
 Which all their ruggedness cannot rack into me ;
 They cannot find an hour more Innocent,
 Nor more friends to revenge 'em.
Enter Cleremont, disguis'd.
 Lam. Now stand constant,
 For now our tryal's come.
 Cler. This beautie's mine,
 Your minute moves not yet.
 Lam. She sinks if Christian,
 If any spark of noble heat. ———
 Cler. Rise Lady
 And fearless rise, there's no dishonour meant you,
 Do you know my tongue ?
 Ana. I have heard it.
 Cler. Mark it better,
 I am one that loves you, fairly, nobly loves you,
 Look on my face ? Ana. O Sir ?
 Cler. No more words, softly
 Hark, but hark wisely how, understand well,
 Suspect not, fear not.
 Ana. You have brought me comfort.
 Cler. If you think me worthy of your husband,
 I am no rogue nor Begger, if you dare do thus ———
 Ana. You are Monsieur Cleremont.
 Cler. I am the same,
 If you dare venture, speak, if not I leave you,
 And leave you to the mercy of these villains
 That will not woove ye much.
 Ana. Save my reputation,
 And free me from these slaves.
 Cler. By this kifs I'll do it,
 And from the least dishonour they dare aim at you,
 I have a Priest too, shall be ready.
 Ana. You are forward.
 Lam. Is this my constant cousin ? how she whispers,
 Kisses and hugs the thief !
 Ana. You'll offer nothing.
 Cler. Till all be tyed,
 Not as I am a Gentleman.
 Ana. Can you relieve my Aunt too ?
 Cler. Not yet Mistris,
 But fear nothing, all shall be well, away quickly
 It must be done i'th' moment or ——— Ana. I am with ye.
 Cler. I'll know now who sleeps by me, keep your standing.
 [Ex. Cler. and Anabel.
 Lam.

Lam. Well, go thy way, and thine own shame dwell with
Is this the constancy she shew'd, the bravery? (thee.
The dear love and the life she ow'd her kinsmen?
O brave tongue, valiant glorious woman?
Is this the noble anger you arriv'd at?
Are these the thieves you scorn'd, the rogues you rail'd at?
The scabs and scums of nature? O fair modesty,
Excellent virtue, whither art thou fled?
What hand O Heaven is over us, when strong virgins
Yield to their fears, and to their fears their fortunes?
Never belief come near me more, farewell wench,
A long farewell from all that ever knew thee:
My turn is next,
I am resolv'd, it comes
But in a nobler shape, ha?

Enter Dinant.

Din. Bless'd ye Lady.

Lam. Indeed Sir, I had need of many blessings,
For all the hours I have had since I came here,
Have been so many curses. How got you liberty?
For I presume you come to comfort me.

Din. To comfort you, and love you, 'tis most true,
My bondage was as yours, as full of bitterness
And every hour my death.

Lam. Heaven was your comfort.

Din. Till the last evening, sitting full of sadness,
Wailing, sweet Mistress, your unhappy fortunes,
(Mine own I had the least care of) round about me
The Captain and the company stood gaping,
When I began the story of my love
To you fair Saint, and with so full a sorrow,
Follow'd each point, that even from those rude eyes,
That never knew what pity meant or mercy,
There stole down soft relentings: take heed Mistress,
And let not such unholy hearts outdo you,
The soft plum'd god will see again; thus taken,
As men transform'd with the strange tale I told,
They stood amaz'd, then bid me rise and live,
Take liberty and means to see your person,
And wish me prosperous in your love, wish you so,
Be wife and loving Lady, shew but you so.

Lam. O Sir, are these fit hours to talk of love in?
Shall we make fools of our afflictions?
Can any thing sound sweetly in mine ears,
Where all the noise of bloody horror is?
My Brother, and my Cousin, they are dead Sir,
Dead, basely dead, is this an age to fool in?
And I my self, I know not what I shall be,
Yet I must thank you, and if happily
You had ask'd me yesterday, when these were living,
And my fears less, I might have hearkned to you.

Din. Peace to your grief, I bind you to your word.

Enter Cleremont, Anabel, Beaupre, Verdone, Charlotte, Nurse, the two Gentlemen.

Lam. How? do you conjure?

Din. Not to raise dreadfull apparitions, Madam,
But such as you would gladly see.

Lam. My Brother, and nephew living?

Beau. And both owe their lives
To the favour of these Gentlemen.

Verd. Who deserve
Our service, and for us, your gracious thanks.

Lam. Which I give freely, and become a suitor,
To be hereafter more familiar
With such great worth and virtue.

1 Gent. Ever think us
Your servants, Madam.

Cler. Why if thou wilt needs know
How we are freed, I will discover it,
And with laconick brevity: these Gentlemen
This night incountring with those outlaws that Yesterday made us prisoners, and as we were

Attempted by 'em they with greater courage,
(I am sure with better fortune) not alone,
Guarded themselves, but forc'd the bloody thieves,
Being got between them, and this hellish Cave,
For safety of their lives, to fly up higher
Into the woods, all left to their possession,
This sav'd your Brother, and your nephew from
The gibbet, this redeem'd me from my Chains,
And gave my friend his liberty, this preserv'd
Your honour ready to be lost.

Din. But that

I know this for a ly, and that the thieves
And gentlemen, are the same men, by my practice
Suborn'd to this, he does deliver it
With such a constant brow, that I am doubtful,
I should believe him too.

1 Gent. If we did well,
We are rewarded.

2 Gent. Thanks but takes away
From what was freely purpos'd.

Cler. Now by this hand,
You have so cunningly discharg'd your parts,
That while we live, rest confident you shall Command Dinant and Cleremont; nor Beaupre,
Nor Verdone scents it: for the Ladies, they
Were easie to be gull'd.

1 Gent. 'Twas but a jest,
And yet the jest may chance to break our necks
Should it be known.

Cler. Fear nothing. Din. Cleremont,
Say, what success?

Cler. As thou wouldst wish, 'tis done Lad,
The grove will witness with me, that this night
I lay not like a block: but how speed you?

Din. I yet am in suspence, devise some means
To get these off, and speedily.

Cler. I have it,
Come, we are dull, I think that the good fellows,
Our predecessors in this place, were not
So foolish, and improvident husbands, but
'Twill yield us meat and wine.

1 Gent. Let's ransack it,
'Tis ours now by the Law.

Cler. How say you sweet one,
Have you an appetite? Ana. To walk again
I'th' Woods, if you think fit, rather than eat.

Cler. A little respite prethee; nay blush not,
You ask but what's your own, and warrantable:

Monsieur, Beaupre, Verdone,
What think you of the motion?

Verd. Lead the way.

Beau. We follow willingly. [Ex. Man. Din. and Lam.]

Cler. When you shall think fit,
We will expect you. Din. Now be mistress of Your promise Lady.

Lam. 'Twas to give you hearing.

Din. But that word hearing, did include a grant,
And you must make it good.

Lam. Must? Din. Must and shall,
I will be fool'd no more, you had your tricks;
Made properties of me, and of my friend;
Presum'd upon your power, and whip'd me with
The rod of mine own dotage: do not flatter
Your self with hope, that any humane help
Can free you, and for aid by miracle
A base unthankfull woman is unworthy.

Lam. You will not force me?

Din. Rather than enjoy you
With your consent, because I will torment you;
I'll make you feel the effects of abus'd love,
And glory in your torture.

Lam. Brother, Nephew,
Help, help, for Heavens sake.

Din. Tear your throat, cry louder,

Though every leaf, these trees bear, were an Echo,
And summon'd in your best friends to redeem you,
It should be fruitless: 'tis not that I love you,
Or value those delights you prize so high,
That I'll enjoy you, a French crown will buy
More sport, and a companion, to whom,
You in your best trim are an Ethiop.

Lam. Forbear me then.

Din. Not so, I'll do't in spite,
And break that stubborn disobedient will,
That hath so long held out, that boasted honour
I will make equal with a common Whores;
The spring of Chastity, that fed your pride,
And grew into a River of vain glory,
I will defile with mudd, the mudd of lust,
And make it loathsome even to goats!

Lam. O Heaven!

No pity Sir? Din. You taught me to be cruel,
And dare you think of mercy? I'll tell thee fool,
Those that surpriz'd thee, were my instruments,
I can plot too, good Madam, you shall find it:
And in the stead of licking of my fingers,
Kneeling and whipping like a boy new breech'd,
To get a toy forsooth, not worth an apple,
Thus make my way, and with Authority
Command what I would have.

Lam. I am lost for ever:

Good Sir, I do confess my fault, my gross fault,
And yield my self up, miserable guilty;
Thus kneeling I confess, you cannot study
Sufficient punishments to load me with;
I am in your power, and I confess again,
You cannot be too cruel: if there be,
Besides the loss of my long guarded honour,
Any thing else to make the ballance even,
Pray put it in, all hopes, all helps have left me;
I am girt round with sorrow, hell's about me,
And ravishment the least that I can look for,
Do what you please.

Din. Indeed I will do nothing,
Nor touch nor hurt you Lady, nor had ever
Such a lewd purpose.

Lam. Can there be such goodness,
And in a man so injur'd?

Din. Be confirm'd in't.

I seal it thus: I must confess you vex'd me,
In fooling me so often, and those fears
You threw upon me call'd for a requital,
Which now I have return'd, all unchast love
Dinant thus throws away; live to man-kind,
As you have done to me, and I will honour
Your virtue, and no more think of your beauty.

Lam. All I possess, comes short of satisfaction.

Din. No complements: the terrors of this night
Imagine but a fearful dream, and so
With ease forget it: for Dinant, that labour'd
To blast your honour, is a Champion for it,
And will protect and guard it.

Lam. 'Tis as safe then,
As if a compleat Army undertook it.

[Exeunt.]

Enter La-writ, Sampson, Clyents.

La-writ. Do not persuade me gentle Monsieur Sampson,
I am a mortal man again, a Lawyer,
My martial part I have put off.

Sam. Sweet Monsieur,
Let but our honours teach us.

La-writ. Monsieur Sampson,
My honourable friend, my valiant friend,
Be but so beaten, forward my brave Clients,
I am yours, and you are mine again, be but so thrasht,
Receive that Castigation with a cudgel.

Sam. Which calls upon us for a Reparation.

La-writ. I have, it cost me half a crown, I bear it

All over me, I bear it Monsieur Sampson;
The oyls, and the old woman that repairs to me,
To 'noint my beaten body.

Sam. It concerns you,
You have been swing'd.

La-writ. Let it concern thee too;
Goe and be beaten, speak scurvy words, as I did,
Speak to that Lion Lord, waken his anger,
And have a hundred Baltinado's, doe;
Three broken pates, thy teeth knockt out, do Sampson,
Thy valiant arms and leggs beaten to Poultesses,
Do silly Sampson, do.

1 Cly. You wrong the Gentleman,
To put him out of his right mind thus:
You wrong us, and our Causes.

La-writ. Down with him Gentlemen,
Turn him, and beat him, if he break our peace,
Then when thou hast been Lam'd, thy small guts perisht,
Then talk to me, before I scorn thy counsell,
Feel what I feel, and let my Lord repair thee.

Sam. And can the brave La-writ—

2 Cly. Tempt him no further,
Be warn'd and say no more.

La-writ. If thou doest, Sampson,
Thou see'st my Mirmidons, I'll let 'em loose,
That in a moment —

Sam. I say nothing, Sir, but I could wish —

La-writ. They shall destroy thee wishing;
There's ne'r a man of these, but have lost ten causes,
Dearer then ten mens lives; tempt, and thou die'st:
Goe home, and smile upon my Lord, thine Uncle,
Take Mony of the men thou mean'st to Cousin,
Drink Wine, and eat good meat, and live discreetly,
Talk little, 'tis an antidote against a beating; (placket,
Keep thy hand from thy sword, and from thy Laundress
And thou wilt live long.

1 Cly. Give ear, and be instructed.

La-writ. I find I am wiser than a Justice of Peace now,
Give me the wisdom that's beaten into a man
That sticks still by him: art thou a new man?

Sam. Yes, yes,
Thy learned precepts have enchanted me.

La-writ. Goe my son Sampson, I have now begot thee,
I'll send thee causes; speak to thy Lord, and live,
And lay my share by, goe and live in peace,
Put on new suits, and shew fit for thy place;
That man neglects his living, is an Ass: [Exit Samp.
Farewel; come chearily boyes, about our business,
Now welcom tongue again, hang Swords.

1 Cly. Sweet Advocate. [Exeunt.]

Enter Nurse, and Charlotte.

Nur. I know not wench, they may call 'em what they will,
Outlawes, or thieves, but I am sure, to me
One was an honest man, he us'd me well,
What I did, 'tis no matter, he complain'd not.

Char. I must confess, there was one bold with me too,
Some coy thing would say rude, but 'tis no matter,
I was to pay a Waiting womans ransom,
And I have don't, and I would pay't again,
Were I ta'n to morrow.

Nur. Alas, there was no hurt,
If't be a sin for such as live at hard meat,
And keep a long Lent, in the woods as they do,
To taste a little flesh.

Char. God help the Courtiers,
That lye at rack and manger. Nur. I shall love
A thief the better for this while I live,
They are men of a charitable vocation,
And give where there is need, and with discretion,
And put a good speed penny in my purse,
That has been empty twenty years.

Char. Peace Nurse,
Farewel, and cry not rost meat, me thinks Cleremont

And

And my Lady Anabel are in one night,
Familiarly acquainted. Nur. I observe it,
If she have got a penny too.

Enter Vertaign, Champernel, and Provost.

Charl. No more,
My Lord Monsieur Vertaigne, the provost too,
Haste and acquaint my Lady. [Ex. Nur. and Char.]

Pro. Wonderous strange.

Vert. 'Tis true Sir, on my credit.

Cham. O mine honour.

Pro. I have been provost-Marshal twenty years,
And have trussed up a thousand of these rascals,
But so near Paris yet I never met with
One of that Brotherhood.

Cham. We to our cost have,
But will you search the wood? Pro. It is beset,
They cannot scape us, nothing makes me wonder,
So much as having you within their power
They let you goe; it was a Courtesy,
That French thieves use not often, I much pity
The Gentle Ladies, yet I know not how,
I rather hope than fear.

Enter Dinant, Cleremont, Verdone, Beaupre, Lamira, Anabel, Charlotte, Nurse.

Are these the prisoners? Din. We were such.

Verd. Kill me not, excess of joy.

Cham. I see thou livest, but hast thou had no foul play?

Lam. No on my soul, my usage hath been noble,
Far from all violence,

Cham. How were you freed?
But kiss me first, we'll talk of that at leisure,

I am glad I have thee; Niece how you keep off,
As you knew me not? Ana. Sir, I am where
I owe most duty. Cler. 'Tis indeed most true Sir,
The man that should have been your bed fellow
Your Lordships bed fellow, that could not smell out
A Virgin of sixteen, that was your fool,
To make you merry, this poor simple fellow
Has met the maid again, and now she knows
He is a man. Cham. How! is she dishonoured?

Cler. Not unless marriage be dishonourable,
Heaven is a witness of our happy contract,
And the next Priest we meet shall warrant it
To all the world: I lay with her in jeast,
'Tis turn'd to earnest now.

Cham. Is this true, Niece?

Din. Her blushing silence grants it; nay Sir storm not,
He is my friend, and I can make this good,
His birth and fortunes equal hers, your Lordship
Might have sought out a worse, we are all friends too,
All differences end thus. Now Sir, unless
You would raise new dissentions, make perfect
What is so well begun.

Vert. That were not manly.

Lam. Let me perswade you.

Cham. Well God give you joy,
She shall not come a Begger to you Sir.
For you Monsieur Dinant 'ere long I'll shew you
Another Niece, to this not much inferiour,
As you shall like proceed.

Din. I thank you Sir.

Cham. Back then to Paris: well that travel ends
That makes of deadly enemies perfect friends.

[Exeunt omnes.]

Prologue.

TO promise much, before a play begin,
And when 'tis done, ask pardon, were a sin
We'll not be guilty of: and to excuse
Before we know a fault, were to abuse
The writers and our selves, for I dare say
We all are fool'd if this be not a Play,
And such a play as shall (so should plays do)
Imp times dull wings, and make you merry too.
'Twas to that purpose writ, so we intend it
And we have our wisht ends, if you commend it.

Epilogue.

Gentlemen,

I Am sent forth to enquire what you decree
Of us and of our Poets, they will be
This night exceeding merry, so will we
If you approve their labours. They profess
You are their Patrons, and we say no less,
Resolve us then, for you can only tell
Whether we have done id'ly or done well.

Enter Balbus, Proculus, Chilax, Licinius.

Bal. I Never saw the like, she's no more stirr'd,
 No more another Woman, no more alter'd
 With any hopes or promises laid to her
 (Let 'em be ne're so weighty, ne're so winning)
 Than I am with the motion of mine own legs.

Pro. Chilax,

You are a stranger yet in these designs,
 At least in Rome; tell me, and tell me truth,
 Did you ere know in all your course of practice,
 In all the ways of Women you have run through (For I presume you have been brought up Chilax,
 As we to fetch and carry.)

Chi. True I have so.

Pro. Did you I say again in all this progress,
 Ever discover such a piece of beauty,
 Ever so rare a Creature, and no doubt
 One that must know her worth too, and affect it;
 I and be flatter'd, else 'tis none: and honest?
 Honest against the tide of all temptations,
 Honest to one man, to her Husband only,
 And yet not eighteen, not of age to know
 Why she is honest?

Chi. I confess it freely,
 I never saw her fellow, nor e're shall,
 For all our Grecian Dames, all I have tri'd,
 (And sure I have tri'd a hundred, if I say two

I speak within my compass) all these beauties,
And all the constancy of all these faces,
Maids, Widows, Wives, of what degree or calling,
So they be Greeks, and fat, for there's my cunning,
I would undertake and not sweat for't, Proculus,
Were they to try again, say twice as many,
Under a thousand pound, to lay 'em bedrid;
But this Wench staggers me.

Lyc. Do you see these Jewels?
You would think these pretty baits; now I'll assure ye
Here's half the wealth of Asia.

Bal. These are nothing
To the full honours I propounded to her;
I bid her think, and be, and presently
What ever her ambition, what the Counsel
Of others would add to her, what her dreams
Could more enlarge, what any President
Of any Woman rising up to glory,
And standing certain there, and in the highest,
Could give her more, nay to be Empress.

Pro. And cold at all these offers?

Bal. Cold as Crystal,
Never to be thaw'd again.

Chi. I tri'd her further,
And so far, that I think she is no Woman,
At least as Women go now.

Lyc. Why what did you?

Chi. I offered that, that had she been but Mistress
Of as much spleen as Doves have, I had reach'd her;
A safe revenge of all that ever hates her,
The crying down for ever of all beauties
That may be thought come near her.

Pro. That was pretty.

Chi. I never knew that way fail, yet I'll tell ye
I offer'd her a gift beyond all yours,
That, that had made a Saint start, well consider'd,
The Law to be her creature, she to make it,
Her mouth to give it, every creature living
From her aspect, to draw their good or evil
Fix'd in 'em spight of Fortune; a new Nature
She should be called, and Mother of all ages,
Time should be hers, and what she did, lame vertue
Should bless to all posterities: her Air
Should give us life, her earth and water feed us.
And last, to none but to the Emperour,
(And then but when she pleas'd to have it so)
She should be held for mortal.

Lyc. And she heard you?

Chi. Yes, as a Sick man hears a noise, or he
That stands condemn'd his judgment, let me perish,
But if there can be vertue, if that name
Be any thing but name and empty title,
If it be so as fools have been pleas'd to feign it,
A power that can preserve us after ashes,
And make the names of men out-reckon ages,
This Woman has a God of vertue in her.

Bal. I would the Emperor were that God.

Chi. She has in her
All the contempt of glory and vain seeming
Of all the Stoicks, all the truth of Christians,
And all their Constancy: Modesty was made
When she was first intended: when she blushes
It is the holiest thing to look upon;
The purest temple of her sect, that ever
Made Nature a blest Founder.

Pro. Is there no way
To take this Phenix?

Lyc. None but in her ashes.

Chi. If she were fat, or any way inclining
To ease or pleasure, or affected glory,
Proud to be seen and worship'd, 'twere a venture;
But on my soul she is chaster than cold Camphire.

Bal. I think so too; for all the waies of Woman,
Like a full sail she bears against: I askt her

After my many offers walking with her,
And her as many down-denyals, how
If the Emperour grown mad with love should force her;
She pointed to a Lucrece, that hung by,
And with an angry look, that from her eyes
Shot Vestal fire against me, she departed.

Pro. This is the first wench I was ever pos'd in,
Yet I have brought young loving things together
This two and thirty years.

Chi. I find by this wench
The calling of a Bawd to be a strange,
A wise, and subtle calling; and for none
But staid, discreet, and understanding people:
And as the Tutor to great Alexander,
Would say, a young man should not dare to read
His moral books, till after five and twenty;
So must that he or she, that will be bawdy,
(I mean discreetly bawdy, and be trusted)
If they will rise, and gain experience,
Well stept in years, and discipline, begin it,
I take it 'tis no Boys play.

Bal. Well, what's thought of?

Pro. The Emperour must know it.

Lyc. If the woman should chance to fail too.

Chi. As 'tis ten to one.

Pro. Why what remains, but new nets for the purchase?

Chi. Let's go consider then: and if all fail,
This is the first quick Eele, that fav'd her tail. [Exeunt.]

S C E N E II.

Enter Lucina, Ardelia and Phorba.

Ardel. You still insist upon that Idol, Honour,
Can it renew your youth, can it add wealth,
That takes off wrinkles: can it draw mens eyes,
To gaze upon you in your age? can honour,
That truly is a Saint to none but Souldiers,
And look'd into, bears no reward but danger,
Leave you the most respected person living?
Or can the common kisses of a Husband,
(Which to a sprightly Lady is a labour)
Make ye almost Immortal? ye are cozen'd,
The honour of a woman is her praises;
The way to get these, to be seen, and sought too,
And not to bury such a happy sweetness
Under a smoaky roof.

Luci. Ple hear no more.

Phor. That white, and red, and all that blessed beauty,
Kept from the eyes, that make it so, is nothing;
Then you are rarely fair, when men proclaim it;
The Phenix, were she never seen, were doubted;
That most unvalued Horn the Unicorn
Bears to oppose the Huntsman, were it nothing
But tale, and meer tradition, would help no man;
But when the vertue's known, the honour's doubled:
Vertue is either lame, or not at all,
And love a Sacrilege, and not a Saint,
When it bars up the way to mens Petitions.

Ard. Nay ye shall love your Husband too; we come not
To make a Monster of ye.

Luc. Are ye women?

Ard. You'll find us so, and women you shall thank too,
If you have grace to make your use.

Luc. Fye on ye.

Phor. Alas poor bashful Lady, by my soul,
Had ye no other vertue, but your blushes,
And I a man, I should run mad for those:
How daintily they set her off, how sweetly!

Ard. Come Goddess, come, you move too near the earth,
It must not be, a better Orb stays for you:
Here: be a Maid, and take 'em.

Luc. Pray leave me.

Phor. That were a sin sweet Lady, and a way
To make us guilty of your melancholy:

You must not be alone; in conversation
Doubts are resolv'd, and what sticks near the conscience
Made easie, and allowable.

Luc. Ye are Devils,

Ard. That you may one day blest for your damnation.

Luc. I charge ye in the name of Chastity,
Tempt me no more; how ugly ye seem to me?
There is no wonder men defame our Sex,
And lay the vices of all ages on us,
When such as you shall bear the names of women;
If ye had eyes to see your selves, or fence
Above the base rewards ye play the bawds for:
If ever in your lives ye heard of goodness,
(Though many Regions off, as men hear Thunder)
If ever ye had Mothers, and they souls:
If ever Fathers, and not such as you are;
If ever any thing were constant in you,
Besides your sins, or coming, but your courses;
If ever any of your Ancestors
Dyed worth a noble deed, that would be cherish'd;
Soul-frighted with this black infection,
You would run from one another, to repentance,
And from your guilty eyes drop out those sins,
That made ye blind, and beasts.

Phor. Ye speak well, Lady;
A sign of fruitful education,
If your religious zeal had wisdom with it.

Ard. This Lady was ordain'd to blest the Empire,
And we may all give thanks for't.

Phor. I believe ye.

Ard. If any thing redeem the Emperour
From his wild flying courses, this is she;
She can instruct him if ye mark; she is wise too.

Phor. Exceeding wise, which is a wonder in her,
And so religious, that I well believe,
Though she would sin she cannot.

Ard. And besides,
She has the Empires cause in hand, not loves;
There lies the main consideration,
For which she is chiefly born.

Phor. She finds that point
Stronger than we can tell her, and believe it
I look by her means for a reformation,
And such a one, and such a rare way carried
That all the world shall wonder at.

Ard. 'Tis true;
I never thought the Emperor had wisdom,
Pity, or fair affection to his Country,
Till he profess'd this love: gods give 'em Children,
Such as her vertues merit, and his zeal.
I look to see a Numa from this Lady,
Or greater than Octavius.

Phor. Do you mark too,
Which is a Noble vertue, how she blushes,
And what a flowing modesty runs through her,
When we but name the Emperour?

Ard. But mark it,
Yes, and admire it too, for she considers,
Though she be fair as Heaven, and vertuous
As holy truth, yet to the Emperour
She is a kind of nothing but her service,
Which she is bound to offer, and she'll do it,
And when her Countries cause commands affection;
She knows obedience is the key of vertues;
Then flye the blushes out like Cupid's arrows,
And though the tie of Marriage to her Lord
Would fain cry, stay Lucina, yet the cause
And general wisdom of the Princes love,
Makes her find surer ends and happier,
And if the first were chaste, this is twice doubled.

Phor. Her tartness unto us too.

Ard. That's a wife one.

Phor. I rarely like, it shews a rising wisdom;
That chides all common fools as dare enquire

What Princes would have private.

Ard. What a Lady
Shall we be blest to serve?

Luc. Go get ye from me:
Ye are your purses Agents, not the Princes:
Is this the vertuous Lore ye train'd me out to?
Am I a woman fit to imp your vices?
But that I had a Mother, and a woman
Whose ever living fame turns all it touches,
Into the good it self is, I should now
Even doubt my self, I have been search't so near
The very soul of honour: why should you two,
That happily have been as chaste as I am,
Fairer, I think, by much, for yet your faces,
Like ancient well built piles, shew worthy ruins,
After that Angel age, turn mortal Devils?
For shame, for woman-hood, for what ye have been,
For rotten Cedars have born goodly branches,
If ye have hope of any Heaven, but Court,
Which like a Dream, you'll find hereafter vanish,
Or at the best but subject to repentance,
Study no more to be ill spoken of;
Let women live themselves, if they must fall,
Their own destruction find 'em, not your Favours.

Ard. Madam, ye are so excellent in all,
And I must tell it you with admiration;
So true a joy ye have, so sweet a fear,
And when ye come to anger, 'tis so noble,
That for mine own part, I could still offend,
To hear you angry; women that want that,
And your way guided (else I count it nothing)
Are either Fools, or Cowards.

Phor. She were a Mistis for no private greatness;
Could she not frown a ravish'd kifs from anger,
And such an anger as this Lady learns us,
Stuck with such pleasing dangers. Gods (I ask ye)
Which of ye all could hold from?

Luc. I perceive ye,
Your own dark sins dwell with ye, and that price
You sell the chastity of modest wives at
Runs to diseases with your bones: I scorn ye,
And all the nets ye've pitch't to catch my vertues
Like Spiders Webs, I sweep away before me.
Go tell the Emperour, ye have met a woman;
That neither his own person, which is God-like,
The world he rules, nor what that world can purchase,
Nor all the glories subject to a Cesar,
The honours that he offers for my body,
The hopes, gifts, everlasting flatteries,
Nor any thing that's his, and apt to tempt me,
No not to be the Mother of the Empire,
And Queen of all the holy fires he worships;
Can make a Whore of.

Ard. You mistake us Lady.

Luc. Yet tell him this has thus much weaken'd me;
That I have heard his Knaves, and you his Matrons;
Fit Nurses for his sins, which gods forgive me;
But ever to be leaning to his folly,
Or to be brought to love his lust, assure him,
And from her mouth, whose life shall make it certain,
I never can: I have a noble Husband,
Pray tell him that too, yet a noble name,
A Noble Family, and last a Conscience:
Thus much for your answer: For your selves,
Ye have liv'd the shame of women, dye the better.

Phor. What's now to do?

Ard. Ev'n as she said, to dye,
For there's no living here, and women thus,
I am sure for us two.

Phor. Nothing stick upon her?

Ard. We have lost a mass of money; well Dame Vertue;
Yet ye may halt if good luck serve.

Phor. Worms take her,
She has almost spoil'd our trade.

Arđ. So godly ;
This is ill breeding, Phorba.

Phor. If the women
Should have a longing now to see this Monster,
And the convert 'em all.

Arđ. That may be, Phorba,
But if it be, I'll have the young men gelded ;
Come, let's go think, the must not 'scape us thus ;
There is a certain season, if we hit,
That women may be rid without a Bit. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.

Enter Maximus, and Æcius.

Max. I cannot blame the Nations, noble friend,
That they fall off so fast from this wild man,
When (under our Allegiance be it spoken,
And the most happy tie of our affection) (virtue,
The worlds weight groans beneath him ; Where lives
Honour, discretion, wisdom ? who are call'd
And chosen to the steering of the Empire
But Bawds, and singing Girls ? O my Æcius
The glory of a Souldier, and the truth
Of men made up for goodness sake, like shells
Grow to the ragged walls for want of action ;
Only your happy self, and I that love you,
Which is a larger means to me than favour. (truths,

Æci. No more, my worthy friend, though these be
And though these truths would ask a Reformation,
At least a little squaring : yet remember,
We are but Subjects, Maximus ; obedience
To what is done, and grief for what is ill done,
Is all we can call ours : The hearts of Princes
Are like the Temples of the gods ; pure incense,
Until unhallowed hands defile those offerings,
Burns ever there ; we must not put 'em out,
Because the Priests that touch those sweets, are wicked ;
We dare not, dearest Friend, nay more, we cannot,
While we consider who we are, and how,
To what laws bound, much more to what Law-giver ;
Whilest Majesty is made to be obeyed,
And not to be inquired into, whilst gods and angels
Make but a rule as we do, though a stricter ;
Like desperate and unseason'd Fools let fly
Our killing angers, and forsake our honours.

Max. My noble Friend, from whose instructions
I never yet took surfeit, weigh but thus much,
Nor think I speak it with ambition,
For by the gods, I do not ; why Æcius,
Why are we thus, or how become thus wretched ?

Æcius. You'll fall again into your fit.

Max. I will not ;

Or are we now no more the Sons of Romans,
No more the followers of their happy fortunes,
But conquer'd Gauls, or Quivers for the Parthians ?
Why, is this Emperour, this man we honour,
This God that ought to be ?

Æcius. You are too curious.

Max. Good, give me leave, why is this Author of us ?

Æcius. I dare not hear ye speak thus.

Max. I'll be modest,

Thus led away, thus vainly led away,
And we Beholders ? misconceive me not,
I saw no danger in my words ; But wherefore,
And to what end, are we the Sons of Fathers
Famous and fast to Rome ? why are their Vertues
Stamp't in the dangers of a thousand Battels ?
For goodness sake, their honours, time outdaring ?
I think for our example.

Æcius. Ye speak nobly.

Max. Why are we seeds of these then, to shake hands
With Bawds and base informers, kiss discredit,
And court her like a Mistress ? 'pray, your leave yet ;
You'll say the Emperour is young, and apt

To take impresson rather from his pleasures
Than any constant worthiness, it may be,
But why do these, the people call his pleasures,
Exceed the moderation of a man ?
Nay to say justly, friend, why are they vices,
And such as shake our worths with forreign Nations ?

Æcius. You search the fore too deep, and I must tell ye,
In any other man this had been boldness,
And forwarded ; 'pray depress your spirit,
For though I constantly believe you honest,
Ye were no friend for me else, and what now
Ye freely spake, but good you owe to th' Empire,
Yet take heed, worthy Maximus, all ears
Hear not with that distinction mine do, few
You'll find admonishers, but urgers of your actions,
And to the heaviest (friend ;) and pray consider
We are but shadows, motions others give us,
And though our pities may become the times,
Justly our powers cannot ; make me worthy
To be your friend ever in fair Allegiance,
But not in force ; For durst mine own soul urge me,
(And by that Soul I speak my just affections)
To turn my hand from Truth, which is obedience,
And give the helm my Vertue holds, to Anger ;
Though I had both the Blessings of the Bruti,
And both their instigations, though my Cause
Carried a face of Justice beyond theirs,
And as I am a servant to my fortunes,
That daring soul, that first taught disobedience,
Should feel the first example : say the Prince,
As I may well believe, seems vicious,
Who justly knows 'tis not to try our honours ?
Or say he be an ill Prince, are we therefore Fit fires to purge him ? No, my dearest friend,
The Elephant is never won with anger,
Nor must that man that would reclaim a Lion,
Take him by th' teeth.

Max. I pray mistake me not.

Æcius. Our honest actions, and the light that breaks
Like morning from our service, chaste and blushing,
Is that that pulls a Prince back ; then he sees,
And not till then truly repents his errours,
When Subjects Crystal Souls are glasses to him.

Max. My ever honour'd friend, I'll take your counsel.
The Emperour appears, I'll leave ye to him.
And as we both affect him, may he flourish. [Exit Max.

Enter the Emperour, and Chilax.

Emp. Is that the best news ?

Chil. Yet the best we know, Sir.

Emp. Bid Maximus come to me, and be gone then ;
Mine own head be my helper, these are fools :

How now Æcius, are the Souldiers quiet ?

Æcius. Better I hope, Sir, than they were.

Emp. They are pleas'd, I hear,
To censure me extreemly for my pleasures,
Shortly they'll fight against me.

Æcius. Gods defend, Sir.

And for their censures they are such shrew'd Judgers ;
A donative of ten Scstertias
I'll undertake shall make 'em ring your praises
More than they sang your pleasures.

Emp. I believe thee ;

Art thou in love, Æcius, yet ?

Æcius. O no Sir ;

I am too course for Ladies ; my embraces,
That only am acquainted with Alarms,
Would break their tender Bodies.

Emp. Never fear it,

They are stronger than ye think, they'll hold the Hammer.
My Empress swears thou art a lusty Souldier,
A good one I believe thee.

Æcius. All that goodness
Is but your Graces Creature.

Emp.

Emp. Tell me truly,
For thou dar'lt tell me.

Æcius. Any thing concerns ye,
That's fit for me to speak and you to pardon.

Emp. What say the Souldiers of me, and the same words,
Mince 'em not, good Æcius, but deliver
The very forms and tongues they talk withal.

Æcius. I'll tell your Grace, but with this caution
You be not stir'd, for should the gods live with us,
Even those we certainly believe are righteous,
Give 'em but drink, they would censure them too.

Emp. Forward.

Æcius. Then to begin, they say you sleep too much,
By which they judge your Majesty too sensual,
Apt to decline your strength to ease and pleasures,
And when you do not sleep, you drink too much,
From which they fear suspicions first, then ruines;
And when ye neither drink nor sleep, ye wench much,
Which they affirm first breaks your understanding,
Then takes the edge of Honour, makes us seem,
That are the ribs, and rampires of the Empire,
Fencers, and beaten Fools, and so regarded;
But I believe 'em not; for were these truths,
Your vertue can correct them.

Emp. They speak plainly.

Æc. They say moreover (since your Grace will have it,
For they will talk their freedoms, though the Sword
Were in their throat) that of late time, like Nero,
And with the same forgetfulness of glory,
You have got a vein of fiddling, so they term it.

Emp. Some drunken dreams, Æcius.

Æcius. So I hope, Sir:

And that you rather study cruelty,
And to be fear'd for blood, than lov'd for bounty,
Which makes the Nations, as they say, despise ye,
Telling your years and actions by their deaths,
Whose truth and strength of duty made you Caesar:
They say besides you nourish strange devourers,
Fed with the fat o'th' Empire, they call Bawds,
Lazie and lustful Creatures that abuse ye,
A People as they term 'em, made of paper,
In which the secret sins of each man's monies
Are seal'd and sent a working.

Emp. What sin's next?

For I perceive they have no mind to spare me.

Æcius. Nor hurt you o' my soul, Sir; but such People
(Nor can the power of man restrain it)
When they are full of meat and ease, must prattle.

Emp. Forward.

Æcius. I have spoken too much, Sir.

Emp. I'll have all.

Æcius. It fits not

Your ears should hear their Vanities; no profit
Can justly rise to you from their behaviour,
Unless ye were guilty of those crimes.

Emp. It may be

I am so, therefore forward.

Æcius. I have ever

Learn'd to obey, nor shall my life resist it.

Emp. No more Apologies.

Æcius. They grieve besides, Sir,

To see the Nations, whom our ancient Vertue
With many a weary march and hunger conquer'd,
With loss of many a daring life subdu'd,
Fall from their fair obedience, and even murmur
To see the warlike Eagles mew their honours
In obscure Towns, that wont to prey on Princes,
They cry for Enemies, and tell the Captains
The fruits of Italy are luscious, give us Egypt,
Or sandy Africk to display our valours,
There where our Swords may make us meat, and danger
Digest our well got Vyands; here our weapons
And bodies that were made for shining bras,
Are both unedg'd and old with ease and women.

And then they cry again, where are the Germans,
Lin'd with hot Spain, or Gallia, bring 'em on,
And let the Son of War, steel'd Mithridates,
Lead up his winged Parthians like a storm,
Hiding the face of Heaven with showers of Arrows?
Yet we dare fight like Romans; then as Souldiers
Tir'd with a weary march, they tell their wounds
Even weeping ripe they were no more nor deeper,
And glory in those scars that make them lovely,
And sitting where a Camp was, like sad Pilgrims
They reckon up the times, and living labours
Of Julius or Germanicus, and wonder
That Rome, whose Turrets once were topt with Honours,
Can now forget the Custom of her Conquests;
And then they blame your Grace, and say Who leads us,
Shall we stand here like Statues? were our Fathers
The Sons of lazie Moors, our Princes Persians,
Nothing but silks and softness? Curfes on 'em
That first taught Nero wantonness and blood,
Tiberius doubts, Caligula all vices;
For from the spring of these, succeeding Princes——
Thus they talk, Sir.

Emp. Well,

Why do you hear these things?

Æcius. Why do you do 'em?

I take the gods to witness, with more sorrow,
And more vexation do I hear these tainters
Than were my life dropt from me through an hour-glass.

Emp. Belike then you believe 'em, or at least
Are glad they should be so; take heed, you were better
Build your own Tomb, and run into it living,
Than dare a Princes anger.

Æcius. I am old, Sir,

And ten years more addition, is but nothing;
Now if my life be pleasing to ye, take it,
Upon my knees, if ever any service,
(As let me brag some have been worthy notice)
If ever any worth, or trust ye gave me
Deserv'd a fair respect, if all my actions,
The hazards of my youth, colds, burnings, wants;
For you, and for the Empire, be not vices;
By that stile ye have stamp't upon me, Souldier;
Let me not fall into the hands of Wretches.

Emp. I understand you not.

Æcius. Let not this body

That has look'd bravely in his blood for Caesar,
And covetous of wounds, and for your safety,
After the 'scape of Swords, Spears, Slings, and Arrows;
'Gainst which my beaten body was mine armour,
The Seas and thirsty Desarts now be purchase
For Slaves, and base Informers; I see anger, (ter,
And death look through your Eyes; I am markt for slaugh-
And know the telling of this truth has made me
A man clean lost to this World; I embrace it;
Only my last Petition, sacred Caesar,
Is, I may dye a Roman.

Emp. Rise, my friend still,

And worthy of my love, reclaim the Souldier,
I'll study to do so upon my self too,
Go, keep your Command, and prosper.

Æcius. Life to Caesar——

[Exit Æcius]

Enter Chilax.

Chi. Lord Maximus attends your Grace.

Emp. Go tell him

I'll meet him in the Gallery:
The honesty of this Æcius,
Who is indeed the Bull-wark of the Empire,
Has div'd so deep into me, that of all
The sins I covet, but this Womans beauty,
With much repentance now I could be quit of;
But she is such a pleasure, being good,
That though I were a god, she'd fire my blood.

[Exeunt.
Actus]

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter the Emperour, Maximus, Licinius, Proculus,
Chilax, as at Dice.

Emp. Nay ye shall set my hand out, 'tis not just
I should neglect my fortune now 'tis prosperous.

Lic. If I have any thing to set your Grace,
But Cloaths or good conditions, let me perish.
You have all my money, Sir.

Pro. And mine.

Chi. And mine too.

Max. Unless your Grace will credit us.

Emp. No bare board.

Lic. Then at my Garden-House.

Emp. The Orchard too.

Lic. And't please your Grace.

Emp. Have at 'em.

Pro. They are lost.

Lic. Why, farewell Fig-trees.

Emp. Who sets more?

Chi. At my horse, Sir.

Emp. The dapl'd Spaniard?

Chi. He.

Emp. He's mine.

Chi. He is so.

Max. Your short horse is soon curried.

Chi. So it seems, Sir,

So may your Mare be too, if luck serve.

Max. Ha?

Chi. Nothing my Lord, but grieving at my fortune.

Emp. Come Maximus, you were not wont to flinch thus.

Max. I have lost all.

Emp. There's a Ring yet.

Max. This was not made to lose, Sir.

Emp. Some love token;

Set it I say.

Max. I do beseech your Grace,
Rather name any house I have.

Emp. How strange

And curious you are grown of toys! redeem't
If so I win it, when you please, to morrow,
Or next day, as you will, I care not,
But only for my lucks sake; 'tis not Rings
Can make me richer.

Max. Will you throw, Sir? there 'tis.

Emp. Why, then have at it fairly, mine.

Max. Your Grace

Is only ever fortunate; to morrow,
And't be your pleasure, Sir, I'll pay the price on't.

Emp. To morrow you shall have it without price, Sir,
But this day 'tis my Victory; good Maximus,
Now I bethink my self, go to Aecius,
And bid him muster all the Cohorts presently;
They mutiny for pay I hear, and be you
Assistant to him; when you know their numbers,
Ye shall have monies for 'em, and above,
Something to stop their tongues withal.

Max. I will Sir,

And gods preserve you in this mind still.

Emp. Shortly I'll see 'em march my self.

Max. Gods ever keep ye——

[Exit Maximus.

Emp. To what end do you think this Ring shall serve
For ye are Fellows only know by rote, (now?)
As Birds record their lessons.

Chi. For the Lady.

Emp. But how for her?

Chi. That I confess I know not.

Emp. Then pray for him that does: fetch me an Eunuch
That never saw her yet; and you two see
The Court made like a Paradise.

[Exit Chilax.

Lic. We will, Sir.

Emp. Full of fair shews and Musicks; all your arts
(As I shall give instructions) screw to th' highest,
For my main piece is now a doing; and for fear
You should not take, I'll have another Engine,
Such as if vertue be not only in her,
She shall not chuse but lean to, let the Women
Put on a graver shew of welcome.

Pro. Well Sir.

Emp. They are a thought too eager.

Enter Chilax, and Lycias the Eunuch.

Chi. Here's the Eunuch.

Eun. Long life to Caesar.

Emp. I must use you, Lycias:

Come, let's walk in, and then I'll shew ye all;
If women may be frail, this wench shall fall.

[Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter Claudia, and Marcellina.

Claud. Sirrah, what ails my Lady that of late
She never cares for Company?

Mar. I know not,

Unless it be that Company causes Cuckolds.

Claud. That were a childish fear.

Mar. What were those Ladies,

Came to her lately

From the Court?

Claud. The same wench,
Some grave instructors on my life, they look
For all the world like old hatcht hilts.

Mar. 'Tis true, Wench,

For here and there, and yet they painted well too,
One might discover where the Gold was worn,
Their iron ages.

Claud. If my judgement fail not,
They have been sheathed like rotten Ships.

Mar. It may be.

Claud. For if you mark their rudders, they hang weakly.
Mar. They have past the line belike; wouldst live Claudia
Till thou wert such as they are?

Claud. Chimney pieces:

Now heaven have mercy upon me, and young men,
I had rather make a drallery till thirty,
While I am able to endure a tempest,
And bear my fights out bravely, till my tackle
Whist'd i'th' Wind, and held against all weathers,
While I were able to bear with my tyres,
And so discharge 'em, I would willingly
Live, Marcellina, not till barnacles
Bred in my sides.

Mar. Thou art i'th' right, Wench;
For who would live whom pleasures had forsaken,
To stand at mark, and cry a Bow short, Seigneur?
Were there not men came hither too?

Claud. Brave fellows:

I fear me Bawds of five i'th' Pound.

Mar. How know you?

Claud. They gave me great lights to it.

Mar. Take heed, Claudia.

Claud. Let them take heed, the spring comes on.

Mar. To me now

They seem'd as noble Visitants.

Claud. To me now

Nothing less, Marcellina, for I markt 'em,
And by this honest light, for yet 'tis morning,
Saving the reverence of their gilded doublets,
And Millan skins.

Mar. Thou art a strange Wench, Claudia.

Claud. Ye are deceiv'd, they shew'd to me directly
Court Crabs that creep a side-way for their living,
I know 'em by the Breeches that they beg'd last.

Mar. Peace, my Lady comes; what may that be?

Enter

Enter Lucina, and Lycias, the Eunuch.

Clau. A Sumner
That cites her to appear.
Mar. No more of that wench.
Eun. Madam, what answer to your Lord?
Luci. Pray tell him, I am subject to his will.
Eun. Why weep you Madam?
Excellent Lady, there are none will hurt you.
Luci. I do beseech you tell me Sir.
Eun. What, Lady?
Luci. Serve ye the Emperor?
Eun. I do.
Luci. In what place?
Eun. In's chamber Madam.
Luci. Do ye serve his will too?
Eun. In fair and just commands.
Luci. Are ye a Roman?
Eun. Yes noble Lady, and a Mantuan.
Luci. What office bore your parents?
Eun. One was Pretor.
Luci. Take heed then how you stain his reputation.
Eun. Why worthy Lady?
Luci. If ye know, I charge ye,
Ought in this Message, but what honesty,
The trust and fair obedience of a servant
May well deliver, yet take heed, and help me.
Eun. Madam, I am no Broker.
Claud. I'll be hang'd then.
Eun. Nor base procurer of mens lusts; Your husband,
Pray'd me to do this office, I have done it,
It rests in you to come, or no.
Luci. I will Sir.
Eun. If ye mistrust me, do not.
Luci. Ye appear so worthy,
And to all my sense so honest,
And this is such a certain sign ye have brought me,
That I believe.
Eun. Why should I cozen you?
Or were I brib'd to do this villany,
Can many prosper, or the fool that takes it,
When such a vertue falls?
Luci. Ye speak well Sir;
Would all the rest that serve the Emperour,
Had but your way.
Claud. And so they have ad unguem.
Luci. Pray tell my Lord, I have receiv'd his Token,
And will not fail to meet him; yet good Sir, thus much
Before you goe, I do beseech ye too,
As little notice as ye can, deliver
Of my appearance there.
Eun. It shall be Madam,
And so I wish you happinefs.
Luci. I thank you

SCENA II.

Enter Æcius, pursuing Pontius, the Captain, and Maximus, following.

Max. Temper your self Æcius.
Pon. Hold my Lord,
I am a Roman, and a Souldier.
Max. Pray Sir.
Æci. Thou art a lying Villain, and a Traytor;
Give me my self, or by the Gods my friend
You'll make me dangerous; how dar'ft thou pluck
The Souldiers to sedition, and I living,
And sow Rebellion in 'em, and even then
When I am drawing out to action?
Pon. Hear me.
Max. Are ye a man?
Æci. I am a true hearted, Maximus,
And if the Villain live, we are dishonour'd.
Max. But hear him what he can say.

[Exeunt.
{ Tumult & noise within.

Æci. That's the way,
To pardon him; I am so easie natur'd,
That if he speak but humbly I forgive him.
Pon. I do beseech ye noble General.
Æci. Has found the way already, give me room,
One stroak, and if he scape me then he's mercy.
Pon. I do not call ye noble, that I fear ye,
I never car'd for death; if ye will kill me,
Consider first for what, not what you can do;
'Tis true, I know ye for my General,
And by that great Prerogative may kill:
But do it justly then.
Æci. He argues with me,
A made up Rebel.
Max. Pray consider,
What certain grounds ye have for this.
Æci. What grounds?
Did I not take him preaching to the Souldier
How lazily they liv'd, and what dishonours
It was to serve a Prince so full of woman?
Those were his very words, friend.
Max. These, Æcius,
Though they were rashly spoke, which was an error
(A great one Pontius) yet from him that hungers
For wars, and brave imployment, might be pardon'd.
The heart, and harbour'd thoughts of ill, make Traytors,
Not spleeny speeches.
Æci. Why should you protect him?
Goe to, it shews not honest.
Max. Taint me not,
For that shews worfe Æcius: All your friendship
And that pretended love ye lay upon me,
Hold back my honesty, is like a favour
You do your slave to day, to morrow hang him,
Was I your bosome piece for this?
Æci. Forgive me,
The nature of my zeal, and for my Country,
Makes me sometimes forget my self; for know,
Though I most strive to be without my passions,
I am no God: For you Sir, whose infection
Has spread it self like poyson through the army,
And cast a killing fog on fair allegiance,
First thank this noble Gentleman, ye had dy'd else;
Next from your place, and honour of a Souldier,
I here seclude you.
Pon. May I speak yet?
Max. Hear him.
Æci. And while Æcius holds a reputation,
At least command, ye bear no arms for Rome Sir.
Pon. Against her I shall never: the condemn'd man
Has yet that priviledge to speak, my Lord;
Law were not equall else.
Max. Pray hear Æcius,
For happily the fault he has committed,
Though I believe it mighty, yet considered,
If mercy may be thought upon, will prove
Rather a hastie sin, than heynous.
Æci. Speak.
Pon. 'Tis true my Lord, ye took me tir'd with peace,
My words almost as ragged as my fortunes.
'Tis true I told the Souldier, whom we serv'd,
And then bewail'd, we had an Emperour
Led from us by the flourishes of Fencers;
I blam'd him too for women.
Acc. To the rest Sir.
Pon. And like enough I blest him then as Souldiers
Will do sometimes: 'Tis true I told 'em too,
We lay at home, to show our Country
We durst goe naked, durst want meat, and mony,
And when the slave drinks wine, we durst be thirstie:
I told 'em this too, that the Trees and Roots
Were our best pay-masters; the Charity
Of longing women, that had bought our bodies,
Our beds, fires, Taylers, Nurfes. Nay I told 'em,

(For you shall hear the greatest sin, I said Sir)
By that time there be wars again, our bodies
Laden with scars, and aches, and ill lodgings,
Heats, and perpetual wants, were fitter prayers
And certain graves, than cope the foe on crutches:
'Tis likely too, I counsell'd 'em to turn
Their warlike pikes to plough-shares, their sure Targets
And Swords hatcht with the blood of many Nations,
To Spades, and pruning Knives, for those get mony,
Their warlike Eagles, into Daws, or Starlings,
To give an Ave Cesar as he pass'es,
And be rewarded with a thousand drachm.'s,
For thus we get but years and beets.

Acci. What think you,
Were these words to be spoken by a Captain,
One that should give example?

Max. 'Twas too much.

Pon. My Lord, I did not wooe 'em from the Empire,
Nor bid 'em turn their daring steel 'gainst Cesar,
The Gods for ever hate me, if that motion
Were part of me: Give me but employment, Sir;
And way to live, and where you hold me vicious,
Bred up in mutiny, my Sword shall tell ye,
And if you please, that place I held, maintain it,
'Gainst the most daring foes of Rome. I am honest,
A lover of my Country, one that holds
His life no longer his, than kept for Cesar.
Weigh not (I thus low on my knee beseech you)
What my rude tongue discovered, 'twas my want,
No other part of Pontius: you have seen me,
And you my Lord, do something for my Country,
And both beheld the wounds I gave and took,
Not like a backward Traytor.

Acci. All this language
Makes but against you Pontius, you are cast,
And by mine honour, and my love to Cesar,
By me shall never be restor'd, In my Camp
I will not have a tongue, though to himself
Dare talk but near sedition; as I govern,
All shall obey, and when they want, their duty
And ready service shall redress their needs,
Not prating what they would be.

Pon. Thus I leave ye,
Yet shall my prayers still, although my fortunes
Must follow you no more, be still about ye,
Gods give ye where ye fight the Victory,
Ye cannot cast my wishes.

Acci. Come my Lord,
Now to the Field again.

Max. Alas poor Pontius. ———

[Exeunt.]

SCENA IV.

Enter Chilax, at one door, Licinius, and Balbus, at another.

Lici. How how?

Chi. She's come.

Bal. Then I'll to'th Emperour. ———

[Exit Balbus.]

Chi. Do; Is the Musick placed well?

Lici. Excellent.

Chi. Licinius, you and Proclus receive her
In the great Chamber, at her entrance,
Let me alone; and do you hear Licinius,
Pray let the Ladies ply her further off,
And with much more discretion: one word more.

Lici. Well.

Chi. Are the Jewels, and those ropes of Pearl,
Enter Emperour, Balbus, and Proclus.

Laid in the way she pass'es?

Lici. Take no care man ———

[Exit Licinius.]

Emp. What is she come?

Chi. She is Sir; but 'twere best,
Your Grace were seen last to her.

Emp. So I mean;

Keep the Court emptie Proclus.

Pro. 'Tis done Sir.

Emp. Be not too sudden to her.

Chi. Good your Grace,

Retire, and man your self; let us alone,
We are no children this way: do you hear Sir?

'Tis necessary that her waiting women
Be cut off in the Lobby, by some Ladies,
They'd break the business else.

Emp. 'Tis true, they shall.

Chi. Remember your place Proclus.

Pro. I warrant ye. ——— [Exeunt Emp. Bal. and Pro.]

Enter Lucina, Claudia, and Marcellina.

Chi. She enters: who are waiters there? the Emperour
Calls for his Horse to air himself.

Luci. I am glad,
I come so happily to take him absent,
This takes away a little fear; I know him,
Now I begin to fear again: O honour,
If ever thou hadst temple in weak woman,
And sacrifice of modesty burnt to thee,
Hold me fast now, and help me.

Chi. Noble Madam,
Ye are welcom to the Court, most nobly welcom,
Ye are a stranger Lady.

Luci. I desire so.

Chi. A wondrous stranger here,
Nothing so strange:
And therefore need a guide I think.

Luci. I do Sir,
And that a good one too.

Chi. My service Lady,
Shall be your guide in this place; But pray ye tell me,
Are ye resolv'd a Courtier?

Luci. No I hope Sir.

Clau. You are, Sir?

Chi. Yes, my fair one.

Clau. So it seems,
You are so ready to bestow your self,
Pray what might cost those Breeches?

Chi. Would you wear 'em?
Madam ye have a witty woman.

Mar. Two Sir,
Or else ye underbuy us.

Luci. Leave your talking:
But is my Lord here, I beseech ye, Sir?

Chi. He is sweet Lady, and must take this kindly,
Exceeding kindly of ye, wondrous kindly
Ye come so far to visit him: I'll guide ye.

Luci. Whither?

Chi. Why to your Lord.

Luci. Is it so hard Sir,
To find him in this place without a Guide?
For I would willingly not trouble you.

Chi. It will be so for you that are a stranger;
Nor can it be a trouble to do service
To such a worthy beauty, and besides ———

Mar. I see he will goe with us.

Clau. Let him amble.

Chi. It fits not that a Lady of your reckoning
Should pass without attendants.

Luci. I have two Sir.

Chi. I mean without a man; You'll see the Emperour?

Luci. Alas I am not fit Sir.

Chi. You are well enough,
He'll take it wondrous kindly: Hark.

Luci. Ye flatter,
Good Sir, no more of that.

Chi. Well, I but tell ye.

Luc. Will ye goe forward, since I must be man'd,
Pray take your place.

Claud. Cannot ye man us too Sir?

Chi.

Chil. Give me but time.
Mar. And you'll try all things.
Chil. No:

Ple make no such promise.

Claud. If ye do Sir,
Take heed ye stand to't.

Chil. Wondrous merry Ladies.

[Ex.

Enter Licinius, and Proculus, Balbus.

Luci. The wenches are dispos'd, pray keep your way Sir.

Lici. She is coming up the stairs; Now the Musick;
And as that stirs her, let's set on: perfumes there.

Pro. Discover all the Jewels.

Lici. Peace.

Musick.

SONGS.

Now the lusty Spring is seen,
Golden yellow, gaudy Blew,
Daintily invite the view.
Every where, on every Green,
Roses blushing as they blow,
And inticing men to pull,
Lillies whiter than the snow,
Woodbines of sweet hony full.
All Loves Emblems and all cry,
Ladys, if not pluckt we dye.

Yet the lusty Spring hath staid,
Blushing red and purest white,
Daintily to love invite,
Every Woman, every Maid,
Cherries kissing as they grow;
And inviting men to taste,
Apples even ripe below,
Winding gently to the waste:
All loves emblems and all cry,
Ladies, if not pluckt we dye.

SECOND.

Hear ye Ladies that despise
What the mighty Love has done,
Fear examples, and be wise,
Fair Calisto was a Nun,
Læda sailing on the stream,
To deceive the hopes of man,
Love accounting but a dream,
Doted on a silver Swan,
Danae in a Brazen Tower,
Where no love was, lov'd a Showr.

Hear ye Ladys that are coy,
What the mighty Love can do,
Fear the fierceness of the Boy,
The chaste Moon he makes to wooe:
Vesta kindling holy fires,
Circled round about with spies,
Never dreaming loose desires,
Doting at the Altar dies.
Ilion in a short hour higher
He can build, and once more fire.

Enter Chilax, Lucina, Claudia, and Marcellina.

Luci. Pray Heaven my Lord be here, for now I fear it.
Well Ring, if thou bee'st counterfeit, or stoln,
As by this preparation I suspect it,
Thou hast betrai'd thy Mistris: pray Sir forward,
I would fain see my Lord.

Chil. But tell me Madam,
How do ye like the Song?

Luci. I like the air well,
But for the words, they are lascivious,

And over light for Ladies.

Chil. All ours love 'em.

Luci. 'Tis like enough, for yours are loving Ladies.

Lici. Madam, ye are welcom to the Court. Who waits?
Attendants for this Lady.

Luci. Ye mistake Sir;

I bring no triumph with me.

Lici. But much honour.

Pro. Why this was nobly done; and like a neighbour,
So freely of your self to be a visitant,
The Emperour shall give ye thanks for this.

Luci. O no Sir;

There's nothing to deserve 'em:

Pro. Yes, your presence.

Luci. Good Gentlemen be patient, and believe
I come to see my husband, on command too,
I were no Courtier else.

Lici. That's all one Lady,
Now ye are here, y'are welcom, and the Emperour
Who loves ye, but too well.

Luci. No more of that Sir.

I came not to be Catechiz'd.

Pro. Ah Sirrah;

And have we got you here? faith Noble Lady,
We'll keep you one month Courtier.

Luci. Gods defend Sir,

I never lik'd a trade worse.

Pro. Hark ye.

Luci. No Sir.

Pro. Ye are grown the strangest Lady:

Luci. How?

Pro. By Heaven,

'Tis true I tell ye, and you'll find it. Luci. I?
I'll rather find my grave, and so inform him.

Pro. Is it not pity Gentlemen, this Lady,
(Nay I'll deal roughly with ye, yet not hurt ye)
Shold live alone, and give such heavenly beauty
Only to walls, and hangings?

Luci. Good Sir, patience:

I am no wonder, neither come to that end,
Ye do my Lord an injury to stay me,
Who though ye are the Princes, yet dare tell ye
He keeps no wife for your wayes.

Bal. Well, well Lady;

However you are pleas'd to think of us,
Ye are welcom, and ye shall be welcome.

Luci. Shew it

In that I come for then, in leading me
Where my lov'd Lord is, not in flattery:—
Nay ye may draw the Curtain, I have seen 'em,
But none worth half my honesty.

Claud. Are these Sir,
Laid here to take?

Pro. Yes, for your Lady, Gentlewomen.

Mar. We had been doing else.

Bal. Meaner Jewels

Would fit your worths

Claud. And meaner clothes your bodies.

Luci. The Gods shall kill me first.

Lici. There's better dying;

I' th' Emperours arms goe to, but be not angry—
These are but talks sweet Lady.

Enter Phorba, and Ardelia.

Phor. Where is this stranger? rushes, Ladys, rushes;
Rushes as green as Summer for this stranger.

Pro. Here's Ladies come to see you.

Luci. You are gone then?

I take it 'tis your Qu

Pro. Or rather manners,

You are better fitted Madam, we but tire ye,
Therefore we'll leave you for an hour, and bring
Your much lov'd Lord unto you——

Luci. Then I'll thank ye,

[Exeunt.

I am betray'd for certain; well Lucina,
If thou do'st fall from vertue, may the Earth
That after death should shoot up gardens of thee,
Spreading thy living goodness into branches,
Fly from thee, and the hot Sun find thy vices.

Tho. You are a welcom woman.

Ard. Bless me Heaven,
How did you find the way to Court?

Luci. I know not,
Would I had never trod it.

Phor. Prethee tell me,
Good noble Lady, and good sweet heart love us,
For we love thee extremely; is not this place
A Paradise to live in?

Luci. To those people
That know no other Paradise but pleasure,
That little I enjoy contents me better.

Ard. What, heard ye any Musick yet?

Luci. Too much.

Phor. You must not be thus froward; what, this gown
Is one o'th' prettiest by my troth Ardelia,
I ever saw yet; 'twas not to frown in Lady,
Ye put this gown on when ye came.

Ard. How do ye?

Alas poor wretch how cold it is!

Luci. Content ye;
I am as well as may be, and as temperate,
If ye will let me be so: where's my Lord?
For there's the business that I came for Ladies.

Phor. We'll lead ye to him, he's i'th' Gallery.

Ard. We'll shew ye all the Court too.

Luci. Shew me him,
And ye have shew'd me all I come to look on.

Phor. Come on, we'll be your guides, and as ye goe,
We have some pretty tales to tell ye Lady,
Shall make ye merry too; ye come not here,
To be a sad Lucina.

Luci. Would I might not.——

[Exeunt.]

Enter Chilax, and Balbus.

Chil. Now the soft Musick; Balbus run——

Bal. I flye Boy—— [Exit Balbus.]

Chil. The women by this time are worming of her,——
If she can hold out them, the Emperour
Takes her to task: he has her; hark the Musick.

Enter Emperour, and Lucina.

Luci. Good your Grace,
Where are my women Sir?

Emp. They are wife, beholding
What you think scorn to look on, the Courts bravery:
Would you have run away so sily Lady,
And not have seen me?

Luci. I beseech your Majestie,
Consider what I am, and whose.

Emp. I do so.

Luci. Believe me, I shall never make a whore Sir.

Emp. A friend ye may, and to that man that loves ye,
More than you love your vertue.

Luci. Sacred Cesar.

Emp. You shall not kneel to me sweet.

Luci. Look upon me,
And if ye be so cruel to abuse me,
Think how the Gods will take it; does this beauty
Afflict your soul? I'll hide it from you ever,
Nay more, I will become so leprous,
That ye shall curse me from ye: My dear Lord
Has serv'd ye ever truly, fought your Battels,
As if he daily long'd to dye for Cesar,
Was never Traytor Sir, nor never tainted
In all the actions of his life.

Emp. I know it.

Luci. His fame and family have grown together,
And spread together like to sailing Cedars,

Over the Roman Diadem; O let not,
As ye have any flesh that's humane in you,
The having of a modest wife decline him,
Let not my vertue be the wedge to break him.
I do not think ye are lascivious,
These wanton men belye ye, you are Cesar,
Which is the Father of the Empires honour,
Ye are too near the nature of the Gods,
To wrong the weakest of all creatures, women.

Emp. I dare not do it here, rise fair Lucina,
I did but try your temper, ye are honest,
And with the commendations wait on that
I'll lead ye to your Lord, and give you to him:
Wipe your fair eyes: he that endeavours ill,
May well delay, but never quench his hell.——

[Exeunt.]

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter Chilax, Licinius, Proculus, and Balbus.

Chil. 'TIS done Licinius.

Lici. How?

Chil. I shame to tell it,
If there be any justice, we are Villains,
And must be so rewarded.

Bal. If it be done,
I take it 'tis no time now to repent it,
Let's make the best o'th' trade.

Pro. Now vengeance take it,
Why should not he have settled on a beauty,
Whose honesty stuck in a piece of tissue,
Or one a Ring might rule, or such a one
That had an itching husband to be honourable,
And ground to get it: if he must have women,
And no allay without 'em, why not those
That know the misery, and are best able
To play a game with judgement? such as she is,
Grant they be won with long siege, endless travel,
And brought to opportunity with millions,
Yet when they come to motion, their cold vertue
Keeps 'em like cakes of Ice; I'll melt a Crystal,
And make a dead flint fire himself, e're they Give greater heat, than new departing embers
Give to old men that watch 'em.

Lici. A good Whore
Had sav'd all this, and happily as wholsom,
I, and the thing once done too, as well thought of,
But this fame chastity forsooth.

Pro. A Pox on't,
Why should not women be as free as we are?
They are, but not in open, and far freer,
And the more bold ye bear your self, more welcom,
And there is nothing you dare say, but truth,
But they dare hear.——

Enter Emperour, and Lucina.

Chi. The Emperour! away,
And if we can repent, let's home and pray. [Exit.]

Emp. Your only vertue now is patience,
Take heed, and save your honour; if you talk.

Luci. As long as there is motion in my body,
And life to give me words, I'll cry for justice.

Emp. Justice shall never hear ye, I am justice.

Luci. Wilt thou not kill me, Monster, Ravisher,
Thou bitter bane o'th' Empire, look upon me,
And if thy guilty eyes dare see these ruines,
Thy wild lust hath laid level with dishonour,
The sacrilegious razing of this Temple,
The mother of thy black sins would have blush'd at,
Behold and curse thy self; the Gods will find thee,
That's all my refuge now, for they are righteous,
Vengeance and horror circle thee; the Empire,

In which thou liv'st a strong continued surfeit,
Like poyson will disgorge thee, good men raze thee
For ever being read again, ——— but vicious
Women, and fearfull Maids, make vows against thee :
Thy own Slaves, if they hear of this, shall hate thee ;
And those thou hast corrupted first fall from thee ;
And if thou let't me live, the Souldier,
Tir'd with thy Tyrannies, break through obedience,
And shake his strong Steel at thee.

Emp. This prevails not ;
Nor any Agony ye utter Lady,
If I have done a sin, curse her that drew me,
Curse the first cause, the witchcraft that abus'd me,
Curse those fair eyes, and curse that heavenly beauty,
And curse your being good too.

Luci. Glorious thief,
What restitution canst thou make to save me ?

Emp. I'll ever love, and honour you.

Luci. Thou canst not,
For that which was mine honour, thou hast murdered,
And can there be a love in violence ?

Emp. You shall be only mine.

Luci. Yet I like better
Thy villany, than flattery, that's thine own,
The other basely counterfeit ; flye from me,
Or for thy safety sake and wisdom kill me,
For I am worse than thou art ; thou maist pray,
And so recover grace ; I am lost for ever,
And if thou let'st me live, th'art lost thy self too.

Emp. I fear no losse but love, I stand above it.

Luci. Call in your Lady Bawds, and guilded Pander's
And let them triumph too, and sing to Cesar,
Lucina's fall, the chaste Lucina's conquer'd ;
Gods ! what a wretched thing has this man made me ?
For I am now no wife for Maximus,
No company for women that are vertuous,
No familie I now can claim, nor Country,
Nor name, but Cesar's whore ; O sacred Cesar,
(For that should be your title) was your Empire,
Your Rods, and Axes, that are types of Justice,
Those fires that ever burn, to beg you blessings,
The peoples adoration, fear of Nations,
What victory can bring ye home, what else
The usefull Elements can make your servants,
Even light it self, and suns of light, truth, Justice,
Mercy, and starlike pietie sent to you,
And from the gods themselves, to ravish women ?
The curses that I owe to Enemies,
Even those the Sabines sent, when Romulus,
(As thou hast me) ravish'd their noble Maids,
Made more, and heavier, light on thee.

Emp. This helps not.

Luci. The sins of Tarquin be remember'd in thee,
And where there has a chaste wife been abus'd,
Let it be thine, the shame thine, thine the slaughter,
And last for ever thine, the fear'd example.
Where shall poor vertue live, now I am falln ?
What can your honours now, and Empire make me,
But a more glorious Whore ?

Emp. A better woman,
But if ye will be blind, and scorn it, who can help it ?
Come leave these lamentations, they do nothing,
But make a noyse, I am the same man still,
Were it to do again ; therefore be wiser,
By all this holy light, I should attempt it,
Ye are so excellent, and made to ravish,
There were no pleasure in ye else.

Luci. Oh villain.

Emp. Sobred for mans amazement, that my reason
And every help to hold me right has lost me ;
The God of love himself had been before me
Had he but power to see ye ; tell me justly,
How can I choose but err then ? if ye dare
Be mine, and only mine, for ye are so pretious,

I envie any other should enjoy ye,
Almost look on ye ; and your daring husband
Shall know h'as kept an offering from the Empire,
Too holy for his Altars ; be the mightiest,
More than my self I'll make it : if ye will not
Sit down with this, and silence, for which wisdom
Ye shall have use of me, and much honour ever,
And be the same you were ; if ye divulge it,
Know I am far above the faults I do,
And those I do I am able to forgive too ;
And where your credit in the knowledge of it,
May be with gloss enough suspected, mine
Is as mine own command shall make it :
Princes though they be sometime subject to loose whispers,
Yet wear they two edged swords for open censures :
Your husband cannot help ye, nor the Souldier ;
Your husband is my creature, they my weapons,
And only where I bid 'em strike ; I feed 'em,
Nor can the Gods be angry at this action,
For as they make me moit, they mean me happiest,
Which I had never been without this pleasure :
Consider, and farewell : you'll find your women
At home before ye, they have had some sport too,
But are more thankful for it. ——— [Exit Emperour.]

Luci. Destruction find thee.

Now which way must I go ? my honest house
Will shake to shelter me, my husband flee me,
My Family, because they are honest, and desire to be so,
Must not endure me, not a neighbour know me :
What woman now dare see me without blushes,
And pointing as I pass, there, there, behold her,
Look on her little Children, that is she,
That handsome Lady, mark ; O my sad fortunes,
Is this the end of goodness, this the price
Of all my early prayers to protect me,
Why then I see there is no God but power,
Nor vertue now alive that cares for us,
But what is either lame or sensual,
How had I been thus wretched else ?

Enter Maximus, and Accius.

Acci. Let Titius

Command the company that Pontius lost,
And see the Fosses deeper.

Max. How now sweet heart,
What make you here, and thus ?

Acci. Lucina weeping !
This must be much offence.

Max. Look up and tell me,
Why are you thus ? My Ring ? O friend, I have found it,
Ye are at Court, sweet.

Luci. Yes, this brought me hither.

Max. Rise, and goe home : I have my fears Accius :
Oh my best friend, I am ruin'd ; go Lucina,
Already in thy tears I have read thy wrongs,
Already found a Cesar ; go thou Lilly,
Thou sweetly drooping flower : go silver Swan,
And sing thine own sad requiem : goe Lucina,
And if thou dar'st, outlive this wrong.

Luci. I dare not.

Acci. Is that the Ring ye lost ?

Max. That, that, Accius,
That cursed Ring, my self, and all my fortunes :
'Thas pleas'd the Emperour, my noble master,
For all my services, and dangers for him,
To make me mine own Pander, was this justice ?
Oh my Accius, have I liv'd to bear this ?

Luci. Farewel for ever Sir.

Max. That's a sad saying,
But such a one becomes ye well Lucina :
And yet me thinks we should not part so lightly,
Our loves have been of longer growth, more rooted
Than the sharp word of one farewell can scatter,
Kiss me : I find no Cesar here ; these lips

Talke not of Ravisher in my opinion.

Was it not so?

Luc. O yes.

Max. I dare believe thee,
For thou wert ever truth it self, and sweetness;
Indeed she was, Æcius.

Æcius. So she is still.

Max. Once more, O my Lucina, O my Comfort,
The blessing of my Youth, the life of my life.

Æcius. I have seen enough to stagger my obedience;
Hold me ye equal Gods, this is too sinful.

Max. Why wert thou chosen out to make a Whore of?
To me thou wert too chaste; fall Crystal Fountains,
And ever feed your streams you rising sorrows,
Till you have dropt your Mistress into Marble:
Now go for ever from me.

Luc. Long farewell, Sir.

And as I have been loyal, gods think on me.

Max. Stay, let me once more bid farewell, Lucina,
Farewel thou excellent example of us,
Thou starry Vertue, fare thee well, seek Heaven,
And there by Cassiopea shine in Glory,
We are too base and dirty to preserve thee.

Æcius. Nay, I must kiss too; such a kiss again,
And from a Woman of so ripe a Vertue,

Æcius must not take; Farewel thou Phoenix,
If thou wilt dye, Lucina; which well weigh'd,
If you can cease a while from these strange thoughts,
I wish were rather alter'd.

Luc. No.

Æcius. Mistake not;

I would not stain your honour for the Empire,
Nor any way decline you to discredit,
'Tis not my fair profession, but a Villains;
I find and feel your loss as deep as you do,
And am the same, Æcius, still as honest,
The same life I have still for Maximus,
The same Sword wear for you, where Justice wills me,
And 'tis no dull one; therefore misconceive me not;
Only I would have you live a little longer,
But a short year.

Max. She must not.

Luc. Why so long, Sir,

Am I not grey enough with grief already?

Æci. To draw from that wild man a sweet repentance,
And goodness in his days to come.

Max. They are so,

And will be ever coming, my Æcius.

Æcius. For who knows but the sight of you, presenting
His sworn sins at the full, and your fair virtues,
May like a fearful Vision fright his follies,
And once more bend him right again? which blessing
(If your dark wrongs would give you leave to read)
Is more than death, and the reward more glorious;
Death, only eases you, this, the whole Empire;
Besides, compell'd and forc'd with violence,
To what ye have done, the deed is none of yours,
No, nor the justice neither; ye may live,
And still a worthier Woman, still more honoured;
For are those trees the worse we tear the fruits from?
Or should the eternal gods desire to perish
Because we daily violate their truths,
Which is the Chastity of Heaven? No, Lady,
If ye dare live, ye may; and as our sins
Make them more full of equity and justice,
So this compulsive wrong makes you more perfect;
The Empire too will bless you.

Max. Noble Sir,

If she were any thing to me but honour,
And that that's wedded to me too, laid in,
Not to be worn away without my being;
Or could the wrongs be hers alone, or mine,
Or both our wrongs, not ty'd to after issues,
Not born anew in all our names and kindreds,

I would desire her live, nay more, compel her:
But since it was not Youth, but Malice did it,
And not her own, nor mine, but both our losses,
Nor stays it there, but that our names must find it,
Even those to come; and when they read, she liv'd,
Must they not ask how often she was ravish'd,
And make a doubt she lov'd that more than Wedlock?
Therefore she must not live.

Æcius. Therefore she must live,
To teach the world, such deaths are superstitious.

Luc. The tongues of Angels cannot alter me,
For could the World again restore my Credit,
As fair and absolute as first I bred it,
That world I should not trust again: The Empire
By my life, can get nothing but my story,
Which whilst I breath must be but his abuses;
And where ye counsel me to live, that Cæsar
May see his errors and repent, I'll tell ye,
His penitence is but encrease of pleasures,
His prayers never said but to deceive us,
And when he weeps (as you think) for his Vices,
'Tis but as killing drops from baleful Yew-Trees,
That rot their honest Neighbour; If he can grieve
As one that yet desires his free Conversion,
And almost glories in his penitence,
I'll leave him Robes to mourn in, my sad ashes.

Æcius. The farewells then of happy souls be with thee,
And to thy memory be ever sung
The praises of a just and constant Lady,
This sad day whilst I live, a Souldiers tears
I'll offer on thy Monument, and bring
Full of thy noble self with tears untold yet,
Many a worthy Wife, to weep thy ruine.

Max. All that is chaste upon thy Tomb shall flourish,
All living Epitaphs be thine, Time, Story;
And what is left behind to piece our lives
Shall be no more abus'd with tales and trifles,
But full of thee, stand to eternity.

Æci. Once more farewell, go find Elyzium, (sings,
There where the happy Souls are crown'd with Bless-
There where 'tis ever Spring and ever Summer. (nour,

Max. There where no bedrid justice comes; truth, ho-
Are keepers of that blessed Place; go thither,
For here thou liv'st chaste Fire in rotten Timber.

Æcius. And so our last farewells.

Max. Gods give thee Justice—— [Exit Lucina.

Æcius. His thoughts begin to work, I fear him, yet
He ever was a noble Roman, but
I know not what to think on't, he hath suffered
Beyond a man if he stand this.

Max. Æcius,

Am I alive, or has a dead sleep seiz'd me?
It was my Wife the Emperour abus'd thus,
And I must say I am glad I had her for him;
Must I not, my Æcius?

Æcius. I am stricken

With such a stiff amazement, that no answer
Can readily come from me, nor no comfort;
Will ye go home, or go to my house?

Max. Neither;

I have no home, and you are mad, Æcius,
To keep me company, I am a fellow
My own Sword would forsake, not tyed unto me;
A Pander is a Prince, to what I am fall;
I dare do nothing.

Æcius. Ye do better.

Max. I am made a branded Slave, Æcius,
And yet I bless the Maker;
Death o' my Soul, must I endure this tamely?
Must Maximus be mention'd for his tales?
I am a Child too; what should I do railing?
I cannot mend my self, 'tis Cæsar did it,
And what am I to him?

Æcius. 'Tis well consider'd;

However you are tainted, be no Traitor
Time may outwear the first, the last lives ever.

Max. O that thou wert not living, and my friend.

Æcius. I'll bear a wary Eye upon your actions,
I fear ye, Maximus, nor can I blame thee
If thou break'st out, for by the gods thy wrong
Deserves a general ruine: do ye love me?

Max. That's all I have to live on.

Æcius. Then go with me,
Ye shall not to your own house.

Max. Nor to any.

My griefs are greater far than Walls can compass,
And yet I wonder how it happens with me,
I am not dangerous, and o' my Conscience,
Should I now see the Emperour i'th' heat on't,
I should not chide him for't, an awe runs through me,
I feel it sensibly that binds me to it,
'Tis at my heart now, there it sits and rules,
And methinks 'tis a pleasure to obey it.

Æcius. 'This is a mask to cozen me; I know ye,
And how far ye dare do; no Roman farther,
Nor with more fearless Valour; and I'll watch ye,
Keep that obedience still.

Max. Is a Wifes loss
(For her abuse much good may do his Grace, I'll make as bold with his Wife, if I can)
More than the fading of a few fresh colours,
More than a lusty spring lost?

Æcius. No more, Maximus,
To one that truly lives.

Max. Why, then I care not, I can live well enough,
For look you friend, for vertue, and those trifles,
They may be bought they say.

Æcius. He's craz'd a little,
His grief has made him talk things from his Nature.

Max. But Chastity is not a thing I take it
To get in Rome, unless it be bespoken
A hundred years before; Is it Æcius?
By'r Lady, and well handled too i'th' breeding.

Æcius. Will ye go any way?

Max. I'll tell thee, friend;
If my Wife for all this should be a Whore now,
A kind of Kicker out of sheets, 'twould vex me,
For I am not angry yet; the Emperour
Is young and handsome, and the Woman Flesh,
And may not these two couple without scratching?

Æcius. Alas, my noble friend.

Max. Alas not me,
I am not wretched, for there's no man miserable
But he that makes himself so.

Æcius. Will ye walk yet? (truth on't,

Max. Come, come, she dare not dye, friend, that's the
She knows the inticing sweets and delicacies
Of a young Princes pleasures, and I thank her,
She has made a way for Maximus to rise by.
Will't not become me bravely? why do you think
She wept, and said she was ravish'd? keep it here
And I'll discover to you.

Æcius. Well.

Max. She knows
I love no bitten flesh, and out of that hope
She might be from me, she contriv'd this knavery;
Was it not monstrous, friend?

Æcius. Does he but seem so,
Or is he mad indeed?

Max. Oh gods, my heart!

Æcius. Would it would fairly break.

Max. Methinks I am somewhat wilder than I was,
And yet I thank the gods I know my duty.

Enter Claudia.

Claud. Nay, you may spare your tears; she's dead.
She is so.

Max. Why, so it should be: how?

Claud. When first she enter'd

Into her house, after a world of weeping,
And blushing like the Sun-set, as we see her;
Dare I, said she, defile this house with Whore,
In which his noble Family has flourish'd?

At which she fell, and stir'd no more; we rub'd her. Exit

Max. No more of that; be gone; now my Æcius, Clau.
If thou wilt do me pleasure, weep a little,
I am so parch'd I cannot: Your example
Has brought the rain down now: now lead me friend,
And as we walk together, let's pray together truly,
I may not fall from faith.

Æcius. That's nobly spoken.

Max. Was I not wild, Æcius?

Æcius. Somewhat troubled.

Max. I felt no sorrow then; Now I'll go with ye,
But do not name the Woman; fye, what fool
Am I to weep thus? Gods, Lucina, take thee,
For thou wert even the best and worthiest Lady.

Æcius. Good Sir, no more, I shall be melted with it.

Max. I have done, and good Sir comfort me;
Would there were wars now.

Æcius. Settle your thoughts, come.

Max. So I have now, friend,

Of my deep lamentations here's an end. [Exeunt.]

Enter Pontius, Phidias, and Aretus.

Phid. By my faith, Captain Pontius, besides pity
Of your fallen fortunes, what to say I know not,
For 'tis too true the Emperour desires not,
But my best master, any souldier near him:

Aret. And when he understands, he cast your fortunes
For disobedience, how can we incline him,
(That are but under persons to his favours)
To any fair opinion? Can ye sing?

Pont. Not to please him, Aretus, for my Songs
Go not to th' Lute, or Viol, but to th' Trumpet,
My tune kept on a Target, and my subject
The well struck wounds of men, not love, or women.

Phid. And those he understands not.

Pont. He should, Phidias.

Aret. Could you not leave this killing way a little?
You must, if here you would plant your self, and rather Learn as we do, to like what those affect
That are above us; wear their actions,
And think they keep us warm too; what they say,
Though oftentimes they speak a little foolishly,
Not stay to construe, but prepare to execute,
And think however the end falls, the business
Cannot run empty handed.

Phid. Can ye flatter,
And if it were put to you, lye a little?

Pont. Yes, if it be a living

Aret. That's well said then.

Pont. But must these lies and flatteries be believ'd then?

Phid. Oh yes, by any means.

Pont. By any means then

I cannot lie nor flatter.

Aret. Ye must swear too,

If ye be there.

Pont. I can swear if they move me.

Phid. Cannot ye forswear too?

Pont. The Court for ever,

If it be grown so wicked.

Aret. You should procure a little too.

Pont. VVhat's that?

Mens honest sayings for my truth?

Aret. Oh no, Sir;

But womens honest actions for your trial.

Pont. Do you do all these things?

Phid. Do you not like 'em?

Pont. Do you ask me seriously, or trifle with me?

I am not so low yet to be your mirth.

Aret. You do mistake us, Captain, for sincerely,

VVe ask you how you like 'em?

Pont. Then sincerely,

I tell ye I abhor 'em; they are ill ways,
And I will stave before I fall into 'em,
The doers of 'em Wretches, their base hungers
Care not whose Bread they eat, nor how they get it.

Arct. What then, Sir?

Pont. If you profess this wickedness,
Because ye have been Souldiers, and born Arms,
The Servants of the brave Æcius,
And by him put to th' Emperour, give me leave,
Or I must take it else, to say ye are Villains,
For all your Golden Coats, debosh'd, base Villains,
Yet I do wear a Sword to tell you so,
Is this the way you mark out for a Souldier,
A Man that has commanded for the Empire,
And born the Reputation of a Man?
Are there not lazie things enough call'd fools and cowards,
And poor enough to be prefer'd for Panders,
But wanting Souldiers must be Knaves too? ha!
This the trim course of li'e; were not ye born Bawds,
And so inherit but your Rights? I am poor,
And may expect a worse; yet digging, pruning,
Mending of broken ways, carrying of water,
Planting of Worts and Onions, any thing
That's honest, and a Mans, I'll rather chuse,
I, and live better on it, which is juster,
Drink my well gotten water with more pleasure,
When my endeavours done, and wages paid me,
Than you do wine, eat my course Bread, not curst,
And mend upon't, your diets are diseases,
And sleep as soundly, when my labour bids me,
As any forward Pander of ye all,
And rise a great deal honest; my Garments,
Though not as yours, the soft sins of the Empire,
Yet may be warm, and keep the biting wind out,
When every single breath of poor opinion
Finds you through all your Velvets.

Arct. You have hit it,

Nor are we those we seem, the Lord Æcius
Put us good men to th' Emperour, so we have serv'd him,
Though much neglected for it; So dare be still;
Your Curses are not ours; we have seen your fortune,
But yet know no way to redeem it: Means,
Such as we have, ye shall not want, brave Pontius,
But pray be temperate, if we can wipe out
The way of your offences, we are yours, Sir;
And you shall live at Court an honest Man too.

Phid. That little meat and means we have, we'll share it,
Fear not to be as we are; what we told ye,
Were but meer tryals of your truth: y'are worthy,
And so we'll ever hold ye; suffer better,
And then you are a right Man, Pontius,
If my good Master be not ever angry,
Ye shall command again.

Pont. I have found two good men: use my life,
For it is yours, and all I have to thank ye— [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Maximus.

Max. There's no way else to do it, he must dye,
This friend must dye, this soul of Maximus,
Without whom I am nothing but my shame,
This perfectness that keeps me from opinion,
Must dye, or I must live thus branded ever:
A hard choice, and a fatal; Gods ye have given me
A way to credit, but the ground to go on,
Ye have levell'd with that precious life I love most,
Yet I must on, an i'though, for if I offer
To take my way without him, like a Sea
He bears his high Command 'twixt me and vengeance,
And in mine own road sinks me, he is honest,
Of a most constant loyalty to Cesar,
And when he shall but doubt, I dare attempt him,
But make a question of his ill, but say

What is a Cesar, that he dare do this,
Dead sure he cuts me off; Æcius dyes,
Or I have lost my self: why should I kill him?
Why should I kill my self? for 'tis my killing,
Æcius is my root, and wither him,
Like a decaying Branch I fall to nothing.
Is he not more to me than Wife, than Cesar?
Though I had now my safe revenge upon him,
Is he not more than rumour, and his friendship
Sweeter than the love of women? what is honour
We all so strangely are bewitch'd withal?
Can it relieve me if I want? he has;
Can honour 'twixt the incensed Prince and Envy,
Bear up the lives of worthy men? he has;
Can honour pull the wings of fearful Cowards,
And make 'em turn again like Tigers? he has;
And I have liv'd to see this, and preserv'd so:
Why should this empty word incite me then
To what is ill and cruel? let her perish.
A friend is more than all the world, than honour;
She is a woman and her loss the less,
And with her go my griefs; but hark ye Maximus,
Was she not yours? Did she not dye to tell ye
She was a ravish'd woman? Did not Justice
Nobly begin with her that not deserv'd it,
And shall he live that did it? Stay a little,
Can this abuse dye here? Shall not mens tongues
Dispute it afterward, and say I gave (Affecting dull obedience, and tame duty,
And led away with fondness of a friendship)
The only vertue of the world to slander?
Is not this certain, was not she a chaste one,
And such a one, that no compare dwelt with her,
One of so sweet a vertue that Æcius,
Even he himself, this friend that holds me from it,
Out of his worthy love to me, and justice,
Had it not been on Cesar, had reveng'd her?
He told me so; what shall I do then?

Enter a Servant.

Can other men affect it, and I cold?
I fear he must not live.

Serv. My Lord, the General
Is come to seek ye.

Max. Go, entreat him to enter;
O brave Æcius, I could wish thee now
As far from friendship to me, as from fears,
That I might cut thee off, like that I weigh'd not,
Is there no way without him to come near it?
For out of honesty he must destroy me
If I attempt it, he must dye as others,
And I must lose him; 'tis necessity,
Only the time and means is the difference;
But yet I would not make a murder of him,
Take him directly for my doubts; he shall dye,
I have found a way to do it, and a safe one,
It shall be honour to him too: I know not
What to determine certain, I am so troubled,
And such a deal of conscience presses me;

Enter Æcius.

Would I were dead my self.

Æcius. You run away well;
How got you from me, friend?

Max. That that leads mad men,
A strong imagination made me wander.

Æcius. I thought you had been more settled.

Max. I am well,
But you must give me leave a little sometimes
To have a buzzing in my brains.

Æcius. Ye are dangerous,
But I'll prevent it if I can; ye told me
You would go to th' Army.

Max. Why, to have my throat cut?
Must he not be the bravest man, Æcius,
That strikes me first?

Æci. You promised me a freedom
From all these thoughts, and why should any strike you?

Max. I am an Enemy, a wicked one,
Worse than the fogs of Rome, I am a Coward,
A Cuckold, and a Coward, that's two causes
Why every one should beat me.

Æci. Ye are neither;
And durst another tell me so, he dyed for't,
For thus far on mine honour, I'll assure you
No man more lov'd than you, and for your valour,
And what ye may be, fair; no man more follow'd.

Max. A doughty man indeed: but that's all one,
The Emperour nor all the Princes living
Shall find a flaw in my Coat; I have suffer'd,
And can yet; let them find inflictions,
I'll find a body for 'em, or I'll break it.

'Tis not a Wife can thrust me out, some look't for't;
But let 'em look till they are blind with looking,
They are but fools; yet there is anger in me,
That I would fain disperse, and now I think on't,
You told me, friend, the Provinces are stirring,
We shall have sport I hope then, and what's dangerous,
A Battle shall beat from me.

Æci. Why do ye eye me,
With such a fetled look?

Max. Pray tell me this,
Do we not love extremly? I love you so.

Æci. If I should say I lov'd not you as truly,
I should do that I never durst do, I ye.

Max. If I should dye, would it not grieve you much?

Æci. Without all doubt.

Max. And could you live without me?

Æci. It would much trouble me to live without ye.
Our loves, and loving souls have been so us'd
But to one household in us: but to dye
Because I could not make you live, were woman,
Far much too weak, were it to save your worth,
Or to redeem your name from rooting out,
To quit you bravely fighting from the foe,
Or fetch ye off, where honour had ingag'd ye,
I ought, and would dye for ye.

Max. Truly spoken.
What beast but I, that must, could hurt this man now?
Would he had ravish'd me, I would have paid him,
I would have taught him such a trick, his Eunuchs
Nor all his black-eyed Boys dreamt of yet;
By all the Gods I am mad now; now were Cesar
Within my reach, and on his glorious top
The pile of all the world, he went to nothing;
The Destinies, nor all the dames of Hell,
Were I once grapp'd with him, should relieve him,
No not the hope of mankind more; all perished;
But this is words, and weakness.

Æci. Ye look strangely.

Max. I look but as I am, I am a stranger.

Æci. To me?

Max. To every one, I am no Roman;
Nor what I am do I know.

Æci. Then I'll leave ye.

Max. I find I am best so, if ye meet with Maximus
Pray bid him be an honest man for my sake,
You may do much upon him; for his shadow,
Let me alone.

Æci. Ye were not wont to talk thus,
And to your friend; ye have some danger in you,
That willingly would run to action,
Take heed, by all our love take heed.

Max. I danger?
I, willing to do any thing, I dig.
Has not my Wife been dead two dayes already?
Are not my mournings by this time moth-eaten?

Are not her sins dispers'd to other Women,
And many one ravish'd to relieve her?
Have I shed tears these twelve hours?

Æci. Now ye weep.

Max. Some lazie drops that staid behind.

Æci. I'll tell ye

And I must tell ye truth, were it not hazard,
And almost certain loss of all the Empire,
I would join with ye: were it any mans
But his life, that is life of us, he lost it
For doing of this mischief: I would take it,
And to your rest give ye a brave revenge:
But as the rule now stands, and as he rules,
And as the Nations hold in disobedience,
One pillar failing, all must fall; I dare not:
Nor is it just you should be suffer'd in it,
Therefore again take heed: On forraign foes
We are our own revengers, but at home
On Princes that are eminent and ours,
'Tis fit the Gods should judge us: be not rash,
Nor let your angry steel cut those ye know not,
For by this fatal blow, if ye dare strike it,
As I see great aims in ye, those unborn yet,
And those to come of them, and these succeeding
Shall bleed the wrath of Maximus: for me
As ye now bear your self, I am your friend still,
If ye fall off I will not flatter ye,
And in my hands, were ye my soul, you perish'd:
Once more be careful, stand, and still be worthy,
I'll leave you for this hour. [Exit.

Max. Pray do, 'tis done:

And friendship, since thou canst not hold in dangers.
Give me a certain ruin, I must through it. [Exit.

Æcius Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Emperour, Licinius, Chilax, and Balbus.

Emper. Dead?

Chil. So 'tis thought, Sir.

Emper. How?

Lici. Grief, and disgrace,
As people say.

Empe. No more, I have too much on't,
Too much by you, you whetters of my follies,
Ye Angel formers of my sins, but Devils;
Where is your cunning now? you would work wonders,
There was no chastity above your practice,
You would undertake to make her love her wrongs,
And doate upon her rape: mark what I tell ye,
If she be dead——

Chil. Alas Sir.

Empe. Hang ye Rascals,
Ye blasters of my youth, if she be gone,
'Twere better ye had been your Fathers Camels,
Groan'd under daily weights of wood and water:
Am I not Cesar?

Lici. Mighty and our Maker.

Empe. Than thus have given my pleasures to destruction.
Look she be living, slaves.

Lici. We are no Gods Sir,

If she be dead, to make her new again.

Empe. She cannot dye, she must not dye; are those
I plant my love upon but common livers?

Their hours as others, told 'em? can they be ashes?
Why do ye flatter a belief into me
That I am all that is, the world's my creature,
The Trees bring forth their fruits when I say Summer;
The Wind that knows no limit but his wildness,
At my command moves not a leaf; the Sea
With his proud mountain waters envying Heaven,
When I say still, run into Crystal mirrors,

Can I do this and sine dye? Why ye bubbles
That with my least breath break, no more remembred;
Ye moths that fly about my flame and perish,
Ye golden canker-worms, that eat my honours,
Living no longer than my spring of favour:
Why do ye make me God that can do nothing?
Is she not dead?

Chil. All Women are not with her.

Empe. A common Whore serves you, and far above ye,
The pleasures of a body lam'd with lewdness;
A meer perpetual motion makes ye happy:
Am I a man to traffick with Diseases?
Can any but a chastity serve Cesar?
And such a one that Gods would kneel to purchase?
You think because you have bred me up to pleasures,
And almost run me over all the rare ones,
Your Wives will serve the turn: I care not for 'em,
Your Wives are Fencers Whores, and shall be Footmens,
Though sometimes my nice will, or rather anger
Have made ye Cuckolds for variety;
I would not have ye hope, nor dream ye poor ones
Alwaies so great a blessing from me; go
Get your own infamy hereafter Rascals,
I have done too nobly for ye, ye enjoy
Each one an heir, the Royal seed of Cesar,
And I may curse ye for't; your wanton Gennets
That are so proud, the wind get's 'em with fillies,
Taught me this foul intemperance: Thou Licinius
Hast such a Messalina, such a Lais,
The backs of Bulls cannot content, nor Stallions,
The sweat of fifty men a night do's nothing.

Lici. Your Grace but jets I hope.

Empe. 'Tis Oracle.

The sins of other Women put by hers
Shew off like sanctities: Thine's a fool, Chilax,
Yet she can tell to twenty, and all lovers,
And all lien with her too, and all as she is,
Rotten, and ready for an Hospital.
Yours is an holy Whore, friend Balbus.

Bal. Well Sir.

Empe. One that can pray away the sins she suffers,
But not the punishments: she has had ten Bastards,
Five of 'em now are Lictors, yet she prays;
She has been the Song of Rome, and common Paquil;
Since I durst see a Wench, she was Camp Mistris,
And muster'd all the cohorts, paid 'em too,
They have it yet to shew, and yet she prays;
She is now to enter old men that are Children,
And have forgot their rudiments: am I
Left for these withered vices? and but one,
But one of all the world that could content me,
And snatch'd away in shewing? If your Wives
Be not yet Witches, or your selves now be so
And save your lives, raise me this noble beauty
As when I forc'd her, full of constancy,
Or by the Gods—

Lici. Most sacred Cesar.

Empe. Slaves.

Enter Proculus.

Lici. Good Proculus.

Pro. You shall not see it,
It may concern the Empire.

Emp. Ha: what said'st thou?
Is she not dead?

Pro. Not any one I know, Sir;
I come to bring your Grace a Letter, here
Scatter'd belike i'th' Court: 'tis sent to Maximus
And bearing danger in it.

Emp. Danger? where?
Double our Guard.

Pro. Nay no where, but i'th' Letter.

Emp. What an afflicted Conscience do I live with,
And what a beast I am grown? I had forgotten

To ask Heaven mercy for my fault, and was now
Even ravishing again her memory,
I find there must be danger in this deed:
Why do I stand disputing then and whining?
For what is not the gods to give, they cannot
Though they would link their powers in one, do mischief.
This Letter may betray me, get ye gone [Exit
And wait me in the Garden, guard the house well,
And keep this from the Empress: the name Maximus
Runs through me like a favour, this may be
Some private Letter upon private business,
Nothing concerning me: why should I open't?
I have done him wrong enough already; yet
It may concern me too, the time so tells me;
The wicked deed I have done, assures me 'tis so.
Be what it will, I'll see it, if that be not Part of my fears, among my other sins,
I'll purge it out in prayers:
How? what's this?

Letter read] Lord Maximus, you love Arcius,
And are his noble friend too; bid him be less,
I mean less with the people, times are dangerous:
The Army's his, the Emperour in doubts;
And as some will not stick to say, declining,
You stand a constant man in either fortune;
Perswade him, he is lost else: Though ambition
Be the last sin he touches at, or never;
Yet what the people mad with loving him,
And as they willingly desire another
May tempt him to, or rather force his goodness,
Is to be doubted mainly: he is all,
(As he stands now) but the meer name of Cesar,
And should the Emperour inforce him lesser,
Not coming from himself, it were more dangerous:
He is honest, and will hear you: doubts are scatter'd,
And almost come to growth in every household:
Yet in my foolish judgment, were this master'd,
The people that are now but rage, and his,
Might be again obedience: you shall know me
When Rome is fair again; till when I love you.
No name! this may be cunning, yet it seems not;
For there is nothing in it but is certain,
Besides my safety.
Had not good Germanicus,
That was as loyal, and as straight as he is,
If not prevented by Tiberius,
Been by the Souldiers forc'd their Emperour?
He had, and 'tis my wisdom to remember it.
And was not Corbulo, even that Corbulo,
That ever fortunate and living Roman,
That broke the heart-frings of the Parthians,
And brought Arsaces line upon their knees,
Chain'd to the awe of Rome, because he was thought
(And but in wine once) fit to make a Cesar,
Cut off by Nero? I must seek my safety:
For 'tis the same again, if not beyond it:
I know the Souldier loves him more than Heaven,
And will adventure all his gods to raise him;
Me he hates more than peace: what this may breed,
If dull security and confidence
Let him grow up, a fool may find and laught at.
But why Lord Maximus I injur'd so,
Should be the man to counsel him, I know not;
More than he has been friend, and lov'd allegiance:
What now he is I fear, for his abuses
Without the people dare draw blood; who waits there?

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Your Grace.

Emp. Call Phidias and Aretus hither:
I'll find a day for him too; times are dangerous,
The Army his, the Emperour in doubts:
I find it is too true; did he not tell me
1. As if he had intent to make me odious,

2. And to my face; and by a way of terror,
What vices I was grounded in, and almost Proclaim'd the Souldiers hate against me? is not
The sacred name and dignity of Cesar
(Were this Accius more than man) sufficient
To shake off all his honesty? He's dangerous
Though he be good, and though a friend, a fear'd one,
And such I must not sleep by: are they come yet?
I do believe this fellow, and I thank him;
'Twas time to look about, if I must perish,
Yet shall my fears go foremost.

Enter Phidias, and Aretus.

Phi. Life to Cesar.

Emp. Is Lord Accius waiting?

Phi. Not this morning,

I rather think he's with the Army.

Emp. Army?

I do not like that Army: go unto him,
And bid him straight attend me, and do ye hear,
Come private without any; I have business
Only for him.

Phi. Your Graces pleasure———[Exit Phidias.

Emp. Go;

What Souldier is the same, I have seen him often,
That keeps you company, Aretus?

Are. Me Sir?

Emp. I you, Sir.

Are. One they call Pontius,

And't please your Grace.

Emp. A Captain?

Are. Yes, he was so;

But speaking something roughly in his want,
Especially of Wars, the Noble General
Ouz of strict allegiance cast his fortunes.

Emp. H'as been a valiant fellow.

Are. So he's still.

Emp. Alas, the General might have pardon'd follies,
Souldiers will talk sometimes.

Are. I am glad of this.

Emp. He wants preferment as I take it.

Are. Yes Sir;

And for that noble Grace his life shall serve.

Emp. I have a service for him:

I shame a Souldier should become a Begger:

I like the man Aretus.

Are. Gods protect ye.

Emp. Bid him repair to Proculus, and there
He shall receive the business, and reward for't:
Ple see him settled too, and as a Souldier,
We shall want such.

Are. The sweets of Heaven still crown ye.

Emp. I have a fearful darkness in my soul,
And till I be deliver'd, still am dying.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.

Enter Maximus alone.

Max. My way has taken: all the Court's in guard,
And business every where, and every corner
Full of strange whispers: I am least in rumour,

Enter Accius and Phidias.

And so I'll keep my self. Here comes Accius,
I see the bait is swallow'd: If he be lost
He is my Martyr, and my way stands open,
And honour on thy head, his blood is reckon'd. (arm'd?)

Acc. Why how now friend, what makes ye here un-
Are ye turn'd Merchant?

Max. By your fair persuasions,
And such a Merchant trafficks without danger;
I have forgotten all, Accius,
And which is more, forgiven.

Acc. Now I love ye,

Truly I do, ye are a worthy Roman.

Max. The fair repentance of my Prince to me
Is more than sacrifice of blood and vengeance,
No eyes shall weep her ruins, but mine own.

Acc. Still ye take more love from me: virtuous friend
The gods make poor Accius worthy of thee.

Max. Only in me y'are poor Sir: and I worthy
Only in being yours:

But why your arm thus,
Have ye been hurt Accius?

Acc. Bruis'd a little:
My horse fell with me friend: which till this morning
I never knew him do.

Max. Pray gods it boad well;
And now I think on't better, ye shall back,
Let my persuasions rule ye.

Acc. Back, why Maximus?
The Emperour commands me come.

Max. I like not
At this time his command.

Acc. I do at all times,
And all times will obey it, why not now then?

Max. I'll tell ye why, and as I have been govern'd,
Be you so, noble friend: The Court's in Guard,
Arm'd strongly, for what purpose, let me fear;
I do not like your going.

Acc. Were it fire;
And that fire certain to consume this body,
If Cesar sent, I would goe; never fear man,
If he take me, he takes his arms away,
I am too plain and true to be suspected.

Max. Then I have dealt unwisely.

Acc. If the Emperour,
Because he meercly may, will have my life,
That's all he has to work on, and all shall have:
Let him, he loves me better: here I wither,
And happily may live, till ignorantly
I run into a fault worth death: nay more, dishonour.
Now all my sins, I dare say those of duty
Are printed here, and if I fall so happy,
I blefs the grave I lye in, and the gods
Equal, as dying on the Enemy,
Must take me up a Sacrifice.

Max. Goe on then,

And I'll goe with ye.

Acc. No, ye may not friend.

Max. He cannot be a friend, bars me Accius,
Shall I forsake ye in my doubts?

Acc. Ye must.

Max. I must not, nor I will not; have I liv'd
Only to be a Carpet friend for pleasure?
I can endure a death as well as Cato.

Acc. There is no death nor danger in my going,
Nor none must goe along.

Max. I have a sword too,
And once I could have us'd it for my friend.

Acc. I need no sword, nor friend in this, pray leave me;
And as ye love me, do not overlove me;
I am commanded none shall come: at supper
I'll meet ye, and we'll drink a cup or two,
Ye need good Wine, ye have been sad: Farewel.

Max. Farewel my noble friend, let me embrace ye
E're ye depart; it may be one of us
Shall never do the like again.

Acc. Yes often.

Max. Farewel good dear Accius.

Acc. Farewel Maximus

Till night: indeed you doubt too much.——— [Exit.

Max. I do not:

Goe worthy innocent, and make the number
Of Cesars sins so great, Heaven may want mercy:
I'll hover hereabout to know what passes:
And if he be so devilish to destroy thee,
In thy blood shall begin his Tragedy.———

SCENA III.

Enter Proculus, and Pontius.

Pro. Besides this, if you do it, you enjoy
The noble name Patrician: more than that too,
The friend of Cæsar ye are stil'd: there's nothing
Within the hopes of Rome, or present being,
But you may safely say is yours.

Pon. Pray stay Sir;
What has Accius done to be destroy'd?
At least I would have a colour.

Pro. Ye have more,
Nay all that may be given, he is a Traitor,
One, any man would strike that were a subject.

Pon. Is he so foul?

Pro. Yes, a most fearfull Traytor.

Pon. A fearfull plague upon thee, for thou lye'st;
I ever thought the Souldier would undoe him
With his too much affection.

Pro. Ye have hit it,
They have brought him to ambition.

Pon. Then he is gone.

Pro. The Emperour out of a foolish pitie,
Would save him yet.

Pon. Is he so mad?

Pro. He's madder!

Would goe to th' Army to him.

Pon. Would he so?

Pro. Yes Pontius; but we consider ———

Pon. Wisely.

Pro. How else man, that the state lies in it.

Pon. And your lives too.

Pro. And every mans.

Pon. He did me

All the disgrace he could.

Pro. And scurvily.

Pon. Out of a mischief meerly: did you mark it?

Pro. Yes well enough.

Now ye have means to quit it,
The deed done, take his place.

Pon. Pray let me think on't,

'Tis ten to one I do it.

Pro. Do and be happy. ——— [Exit Pro.]

Pon. This Emperour is made of nought but mischief,
Sure, Murther was his Mother: none to lop,
But the main link he had? upon my conscience
The man is truly honest, and that kills him;
For to live here, and study to be true,
Is all one to be Traitors: why should he die?
Have they not Slaves and Rascals for their Offerings
In full abundance; Bawds more than beasts for slaughter?
Have they not singing whores enough, and knaves too,
And millions of such Martyrs to sink Charon,
But the best sons of Rome must sail too? I will shew him
(since he must dye) a way to do it truly:
And though he bears me hard, yet shall he know,
I am born to make him blefs me for a blow. ——— [Exit.]

SCENA II.

Enter Phidias, Aretus, and Æcius.

Phi. Yet ye may 'scape to th' Camp, we'l hazard with ye.

Aret. Lose not your life so basely Sir: ye are arm'd,
And many when they see your sword out, and know why,
Must follow your adventure.

Æci. Get ye from me:

Is not the doom of Cæsar on this body,
Do not I bear my last hour here, now sent me?
Am I not old Accius, ever dying?
You think this tenderness and love you bring me,
'Tis treason, and the strength of disobedience,
And if ye tempt me further, ye shall feel it:
I seek the Camp for safety, when my death

Ten times more glorious than my life, and lasting
Bids me be happy? Let the fool fear dying,
Or he that weds a woman for his honour,
Dreaming no other life to come but kisses;
Accius is not now to learn to suffer:
If ye dare shew a just affection, kill me,
I stay but those that must: why do ye weep?
Am I so wretched to deserve mens pities?
Goe give your tears to those that lose their worths,
Bewail their miseries, for me wear Garlands,
Drink wine, and much; sing Pæans to my praise,
I am to triumph friends, and more than Cæsar,
For Cæsar fears to die, I love to die.

Phi. O my dear Lord!

Æci. No more, goe, goe I say;
Shew me not signs of sorrow, I deserve none:
Dare any man lament, I should die nobly?
Am I grown old to have such enemies?
When I am dead, speak honourably of me,
That is, preserve my memory from dying;
There if you needs must weep your ruin'd Master,
A tear or two will seem well: this I charge ye,
(because ye say you yet love old Accius)
See my poor body burnt, and some to sing
About my Pile, and what I have done and suffer'd,
If Cæsar kill not that too: at your banquets
When I am gone, if any chance to number
The times that have been sad and dangerous,
Say how I fell, and 'tis sufficient:
No more I say, he that laments my end
By all the gods dishonours me; be gone
And suddainly, and wisely from my dangers,
My death is catching else.

Phi. We fear not dying.

Æci. Yet fear a wilfull death, the just Gods hate it,
I need no company to that that Children
Dare do alone, and Slaves are proud to purchase;
Live till your honesties, as mine has done,
Make this corrupted age sick of your vertues,
Then dye a sacrifice, and then ye know
The noble use of dying well, and Roman.

Aret. And must we leave ye Sir?

Æci. We must all die,

All leave our selves, it matters not where, when,
Nor how, so we die well: and can that man that does so
Need lamentation for him? Children weep
Because they have offended, or for fear;
Women for want of will, and anger; is there
In noble man, that truly feels both poyfes
Of life and death, so much of this wet weakness,
To drown a glorious death in child and woman?
I am asham'd to see ye; yet ye move me,
And were it not my manhood would accuse me,
For covetous to live, I should weep with ye.

Phi. O we shall never see you more.

Æci. 'Tis true;

Nor I the miseries that Rome shall suffer,
Which is a benefit life cannot reckon:
But what I have been, which is just, and faithfull;
One that grew old for Rome, when Rome forgot him,
And for he was an honest man durst die,
Ye shall have daily with ye: could that dye too,
And I return no traffick of my travels,
No pay to have been Souldier, but this Silver,
No Annals of Æcius, but he liv'd,
My friends, ye had cause to weep, and bitterly;
The common overflows of tender women,
And children new born crying, were too little
To shew me then most wretched: if tears must be,
I should in justice weep 'em, and for you,
You are to live, and yet behold those slaughters
The drie, and wither'd bones of death would bleed at:
But sooner, than I have time to think what must be,
I fear you'l find what shall be;

If ye love me,
Let that word serve for all, be gone and leave me;
I have some little practice with my soul,
And then the sharpest sword is welcome't; goe,
Pray be gone, ye have obey'd me living,
Be not for shame now stubborn; so I thank ye,
And fare ye well, a better fortune guide ye

[Exeunt Phi. and Aretus.]

I am a little thirstie, not for fear,
And yet it is a kind of fear, I say so;
Is it to be a just man now again,
And leave my flesh unthought of? 'tis departed:
I hear 'em come, who strikes first?
I stay for ye:

— Enter Balbus, Chilax, Licinius.

Yet I will dye a Souldier, my sword drawn,
But against none:

Why do ye fear? come forward.

Bal. You were a Souldier Chilax.

Chil. Yes, I muster'd

But never saw the Enemy.

Lici. He's drawn,

By heaven I dare not do it.

Acci. Why do ye tremble?

I am to die, come ye not now from Cesar

To that end, speak?

Bal. We do, and we must kill ye,

'Tis Cesar's will.

Chil. I charge you put your sword up,
That we may do it handsomly.

Acci. Ha, ha, ha,

My sword up, handsomly? where were ye bred?

Ye are the merriest murderers my masters

I ever met withal; Come forward fools,

Why do ye stare? upon mine honour Bawds,

I will not strike ye.

Lici. I'll not be first.

Bal. Nor I.

Chil. You had best die quietly: the Emperour
Sees how you bear your self.

Acci. I would die Rascals,

If you would kill me quietly.

Bal. ——— of Proculus,

He promis'd us to bring a Captain hither,
That has been used to kill.

Acci. I'll call the Guard,

Unless you will kill me quickly, and proclaim
What beastly, base, and cowardly companions
The Emperour has trusted with his safetie:

Nay I'll give out, ye fell of my side, villains,
Strike home ye bawdy slaves.

Chil. He will kill us,

I mark'd his hand, he waits but time to reach us,
Now do you offer.

Acci. If ye do mangle me,

And kill me not at two blows, or at three,
Or not so stagger me, my senses fail me,
Look to your selves.

Chil. I told ye.

Acci. Strike me manly,

And take a thousand strokes. ———

Enter Pontius.

Bal. Here's Pontius.

Pon. Not kill'd him yet?

Is this the love ye bear the Emperour?

(Lici. runs

Nay then I see ye are Traitors all, have at ye. ——— away.

Chi. Oh I am hurt.

Bal. And I am kill'd ———

[Exeunt Chil. and Bal.]

Pon. Dye Bawds;

As ye have liv'd and flourish'd.

Acci. Wretched fellow,

What hast thou done?

Pon. Kill'd them that durst not kill,
And you are next.

Acci. Art thou not Pontius?

Pon. I am the same you cast Accius,
And in the face of all the Camp disgrac'd.

Acc. Then so much nobler, as thou wert a Souldier,
Shall my death be: is it revenge provok'd thee,
Or art thou hir'd to kill me?

Pon. Both.

Acci. Then do it.

Pon. Is that all?

Acci. Yes.

Pon. Would you not live?

Acci. Why should I,
To thank thee for my life?

Pon. Yes, if I spare it.

Acci. Be not deceiv'd, I was not made to thank
For any courtesie, but killing me,
A fellow of thy fortune; do thy duty.

Pon. Do not you fear me?

Acci. No.

Pon. Nor love me for it?

Acci. That's as thou dost thy business.

Pon. When you are dead,
Your place is mine Accius.

Acci. Now I fear thee,

And not alone thee Pontius, but the Empire.

Pon. Why, I can govern Sir.

Acci. I would thou couldst,

And first thy self: Thou canst fight well, and bravely,
Thou canst endure all dangers, heats, colds, hungers;
Heavens angry flashes are not suddainer,
Than I have seen thee execute; nor more mortal;
The winged feet of flying enemies
I have stood and view'd thee mow away like rushes,
And still kill the killer: were thy minde,
But half so sweet in peace, as rough in dangers,
I died to leave a happy heir behind me;
Come strike, and be a General.

Pon. Prepare then:

And, for I see your honour cannot lessen,
And 'twere a shame for me to strike a dead man,
Fight your short span out.

Acci. No thou knowst I must not,
I dare not give thee so much vantage of me,
As disobedience.

Pon. Dare ye not defend ye
Against your enemy?

Acci. Not sent from Cesar,

I have no power to make such enemies;
For as I am condemn'd, my naked sword
Stands but a hatchment by me; only held
To shew I was a Souldier; had not Cesar
Chain'd all defence in this doom, let him die,
Old as I am, and quench'd with scarrs, and sorrows,
Yet would I make this wither'd Arm do wonders,
And open in an enemy such wounds
Mercy would weep to look on.

Pon. Then have at ye,
And look upon me, and be sure ye fear not:
Remember who you are, and why you live,
And what I have been to you: cry not hold,
Nor think it base injustice I should kill ye.

Acci. I am prepar'd for all.

Pon. For now Accius,
Thou shalt behold and find I was no traitor, { Pontius
And as I do it, blefs me; die as I do. ——— } kills himself
Acci. Thou hast deceiv'd me Pontius, and I thank thee;
By all my hopes in Heaven, thou art a Roman.

Pon. To shew you what you ought to do, this is not;
For slanders self would shame to find you coward,
Or willing to out-live your honestie:
But noble Sir, ye have been jealous of me,
And held me in the rank of dangerous persons,

And I must dying say it was but justice,
 Ye cast me from my credit; yet believe me,
 For there is nothing now but truth to save me,
 And your forgiveness, though ye held me hainous,
 And of a troubled spirit, that like fire
 Turns all to flames it meets with, ye mistook me;
 If I were foe to any thing, 'twas ease,
 Want of the Souldiers due, the Enemy
 The nakedness we found at home, and scorn,
 Children of peace, and pleasures, no regard
 Nor comfort for our scars, but how we got 'em,
 To rusty time, that eat our bodies up,
 And even began to prey upon our honours,
 To wants at home, and more than wants, abuses,
 To them, that when the Enemy invaded
 Made us their Saints, but now the foes of Rome;
 To silken flattery, and pride plain'd over,
 Forgetting with what wind their feathers sail,
 And under whose protection their soft pleasures
 Grow full and numberless: to this I am foe,
 Not to the state, or any point of duty:
 And let me speak but what a Souldier may,
 Truly I ought to be so; yet I err'd,
 Because a far more noble sufferer
 Shew'd me the way to patience, and I lost it:
 This is the end I die Sir; to live basely,
 And not the follower of him that bred me,
 In full account and virtue, Pontius dare not,
 Much less to out-live what is good, and flatter.

Acci. I want a name to give thy virtue Souldier,
 For only good is far below thee Pontius,
 The gods shall find thee one; thou hast fashion'd death
 In such an excellent, and beauteous manner,
 I wonder men can live: Canst thou speak once more,
 For thy words are such harmony, a soul
 Would choose to flye to Heaven in.

Pon. A farewell:
 Good noble General your hand, forgive me,
 And think what ever was displeasing you,
 Was none of mine: ye cannot live.

Acci. I will not:
 Yet one word more.

Pon. Dye nobly: Rome farewell:
 And Valentinian fall, thou hast broke thy Basis.
 In joy ye have given me a quiet death,
 I would strike more wounds, if I had more breath

(he dyes.)

Acci. Is there an hour of goodness beyond this?
 Or any man would out-live such a dying?
 Would Cesar double all my honours on me,
 And stick me o're with favours, like a Mistis;
 Yet would I grow to this man: I have loved,
 But never doated on a face till now:
 O death thou art more than beautie, and thy pleasure
 Beyond posterity: Come friends and kill me;
Cesar be kind, and send a thousand swords,
 The more, the greater is my fall: why stay ye?
 Come, and I'll kiss your weapons: fear me not,
 By all the gods I'll honour ye for killing:
 Appear, or through the Court, and world, I'll search ye:
 My sword is gone; ye are Traitors if ye spare me,
 And Cesar must consume ye: all base cowards?
 I'll follow ye, and ere I dye proclaim ye
 The weeds of Italy; the drops of nature——
 Where are ye, villains, traytors, slaves.—— [Exit.]

Enter Proculus, and 3 others running over the Stage.

Pro. I knew
 H'ad kill'd the Captain.

1. Here's his sword.

Pro. Let it alone, 'twill fight it self else; friends,
 An hundred men are not enough to do it,
 I'll to the Emperour, and get more aid.

Acci. None strike a poor condemned man?

Pro. He is mad:

Shift for your selves my Masters.——

[Exeunt.]

—— Enter Aecius.

Aecius. Then Aecius,
 See what thou darst thy self; hold my good sword,
 Thou hast been kept from blood too long, I'll kiss thee,
 For thou art more then friend now, my preserver,
 Shew me the way to happiness, I seek it:
 And all you great ones, that have fallen as I do,
 To keep your memories, and honours living,
 Be present in your virtues, and assist me,
 That like strong Cato, I may put away
 All promises, but what shall crown my ashes;
Rome, fare thee well: stand long, and know to conquer
 Whilst there is people, and ambition:
 Now for a stroak shall turn me to a Star:
 I come ye blessed spirits, make me room
 To live for ever in Elyzium:
 Do men fear this? O that posterity
 Could learn from him but this, that loves his wound,
 There is no pain at all in dying well, (kills himself.)
 Nor none are lost, but those that make their hell

—— Enter Proculus, and two others.

1 Within. He's dead, draw in the Guard again.

Pro. He's dead indeed,

And I am glad he's gone; he was a Devil:

His body, if his Eunuchs come, is theirs;

The Emperour out of his love to virtue,

[Exeunt.]

Has given 'em that: Let no man stop their entrance.

—— Enter Phidias, and Aretus.

Phi. O my most noble Lord, look here Aretus,
 Here's a sad sight. Aret. O cruelty! O Cesar!
 O times that bring forth nothing but destruction,
 And oversows of blood: why wast thou kill'd?
 Is it to be a just man now again,
 As when Tiberius and wild Nero reign'd,
 Only assurance of his overthrow?

Phil. It is Aretus: he that would live now,
 Must like the Toad, feed only on corruptions,
 And grow with those to greatness: honest virtue,
 And the true Roman honour, faith and valour
 That have been all the riches of the Empire,
 Now like the fearful tokens of the Plague,
 Are meer fore-runners of their ends that owe 'em.

Aret. Never enough lamented Lord: dear Master ——

Enter Maximus.

Of whom now shall we learn to live like men?
 From whom draw out our actions just, and worthy?
 Oh thou art gone, and gone with thee all goodness,
 The great example of all equitie,
 O thou alone a Roman, thou art perish'd,
 Faith, fortitude, and constant nobleness,
 Weep Rome, weep Italy, weep all that knew him,
 And you that fear'd him as a noble Foe,
 (If Enemies have honourable tears)
 Weep this decay'd Aecius fallen, and scattered——
 By foul, and base suggestion.

Pho. O Lord Maximus,
 This was your worthy friend.

Max. The gods forgive me:
 Think not the worse my friends, I shed not tears,
 Great griefs lament within; yet now I have found 'em:
 Would I had never known the world, nor women,
 Nor what that cursed name of honour was,
 So this were once again Aecius:
 But I am destin'd to a mighty action,
 And begg my pardon friend, my vengeance taken,
 I will not be long from thee: ye have a great loss,
 But bear it patiently, yet to say truth
 In justice 'tis not sufferable: I am next,
 And were it now, I would be glad on't: friends,

Who

Who shall preserve you now ?

Are. Nay we are lost too.

Max. I fear ye are, for likely such as love
The man that's slain, and have been nourish'd by him,
Do not stay long behind: 'Tis held no wisdom.
I know what I must do. O my Æcius,
Canst thou thus perish, pluckt up by the roots,
And no man feel thy worthiness? From boys
He bred you both I think.

Phi. And from the poorest.

Max. And lov'd ye as his own.

Are. We found it Sir.

Max. Is not this a loss then?

Phi. O, a loss of losses;

Our lives, and ruines of our families,
The utter being nothing of our names,
Were nothing near it.

Max. As I take it too,
He put ye to the Emperour.

Are. He did so.

Max. And kept ye still in credit.

Phi. 'Tis most true Sir.

Max. He fed your Fathers too, and made them means,
Your Sisters he prefer'd to noble Wedlocks,
Did he not friends?

Are. Oh yes Sir. Max. As I take it
This worthy man would not be now forgotten,
I tell ye to my grief, he was basely murdered;
And something would be done, by those that lov'd him:
And something may be: pray stand off a little,
Let me bewail him private: O my dearest.

Phi. Aretus, if we be not sudden, he outdoes us,
I know he points at vengeance; we are cold,
And base ungratefull wretches, if we shun it:
Are we to hope for more rewards, or greatness,
Or any thing but death, now he is dead?
Dar'st thou resolve? Are. I am perfect.

Phi. Then like flowers
That grew together all we'll fall together,
And with us that that bore us: when 'tis done
The world shall stile us two deserving servants:
I fear he will be before us.

Are. This night Phidias. Phi. No more.
Max. Now worthy friends I have done my mournings,
Let's burn this noble body: Sweets as many
As sun-burnt Meroe breeds, I'll make a flame of,
Shall reach his soul in Heaven: he that shall live
Ten ages hence, but to rehearse this story,
Shall with the sad discourse on't, darken Heaven,
And force the painful burdens from the wombs
Conceiv'd a new with sorrow: even the Grave
Where mighty Sylla sleeps shall rend asunder
And give her shadow up, to come and groan
About our piles, which will be more, and greater Than green Olympus, Ida, or old Latmus
Can feed with Cedar, or the East with Gums,
Greece with her wines, or Thessalie with flowers,
Or willing heaven can weep for in her showres.

[Exeunt.]

Actus Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter Phidias, with his dagger in him, and Aretus, poyson'd.

Are. HE has his last.

Phi. Then come the worst of danger,
Æcius to thy soul we give a Caesar.
How long is't since ye gave it him?

Are. An hour,
Mine own two hours before him: how it boils me!

Phi. It was not to be cur'd I hope.

Are. No Phidias,

I dealt above his Antidotes: Physicians
May find the cause, but where the cure?

Phi. Done bravely,

We are got before his Tyranny Aretus.

Are. We had lost our worthiest end else Phidias.

Phi. Canst thou hold out a while?

Are. To torture him

Anger would give me leave, to live an age yet;
That man is poorly spirited, whose life
Runs in his blood alone, and not in's wishes,
And yet I swell, and burn like flaming Aetna,
A thousand new found fires are kindled in me,
But yet I must not die this four hours Phidias.

Phi. Remember who dies with thee, and despise death.

Are. I need no exhortation, the joy in me
Of what I have done, and why, makes poyson pleasure,
And my most killing torments mistresses.
For how can he have time to dye, or pleasure
That falls as fools unsatisfied, and simple?

Phi. This that consumes my life, yet keeps it in me,
Nor do I feel the danger of a dying,
And if I but endure to hear the curses
Of this fell Tyrant dead, I have half my Heaven.

Are. Hold thy soul fast but four hours Phidias,
And thou shalt see to wishes beyond ours,
Nay more beyond our meanings.

Phi. Thou hast steel'd me:
Farewel Aretus, and the souls of good men,
That as ours do, have left their Roman bodies
In brave revenge for vertue, guide our shadows,
I would not faint yet.

Are. Farewel Phidias

And as we have done nobly, gods look on us. ———

[*Exeunt
severally.*]

SCENA II.

Enter Lycias, and Proculus.

Lyci. Sicker, and sicker Proculus?

Pro. Oh Lycias,
What shall become of us? would we had di'd
With happy Chilax, or with Balbus, bedrid ———

Enter Licinius.

And made too lame for justice.

Licinius. The soft Musick;
And let one sing to fasten sleep upon him:
Oh friends, the Emperour.

Pro. What say the Doctors?

Lici. For us a most sad saying, he is poyson'd,
Beyond all cure too. Lici. Who?

Lici. The wretch Aretus,
That most unhappy villain.

Lici. How do you know it?

Lyci. He gave him drink last: let's disperse and find him,
And since he has opened misery to all,
Let it begin with him first: Softly he slumbers.

Enter Emperour, sick in a Chair, with Eudoxia the Empress, and Physicians, and Attendants.

Musick and SONG.

Care charming sleep, thou easer of all woes,
Brother to death, sweetly thy self dispose
On this afflicted Prince, fall like a Cloud
In gentle showrs, give nothing that is lowd,
Or painfull to his slumbers; easie, sweet,
And as a purling stream, thou son of night,
Pass by his troubled senses; sing his pain
Like hollow murmuring wind, or silver Rain,
Into this Prince gently, Oh gently slide,
And kiss him into slumbers like a Bride.

Exeunt.

Emp. O gods, gods: drink, drink, colder, colder
Than snow on Scythian Mountains: O my heart-strings.

Eudo. How does your Grace?

Phyf. The Empress speaks Sir.

Emp. Dying,

Dying Eudoxia, dying.

Phyf. Good Sir patience.

Eudo. What have ye given him?

Phyf. Precious things dear Lady

We hope shall comfort him.

Emp. O flatter'd fool,

See what thy god-head's come to: Oh Eudoxia.

Eudo. O patience, patience Sir.

—Enter Proculus, Licinius, with Arctus.

Emp. Danubius

I've brought through my body.

Eudo. Gods give comfort.

Emp. And Volga, on whose face the North wind freezes,
I find an hundred hals, a hundred Piles
Already to my Funerals are flaming,
Shall I not drink?

Phyf. You must not Sir.

Emp. By Heaven

I've let my breath out that shall burn ye all
If ye deny me longer: tempests blow me,
And inundations that have drunk up Kingdoms
Flow over me, and quench me: where's the villain?
Am I immortal now ye slaves? by Numa
If he do scape: Oh, oh.

Eudo. Dear Sir.

Emp. Like Nero,

But far more terrible, and full of slaughter,
I'th' midst of all my flames I've fire the Empire:
A thousand fans, a thousand fans to cool me:
I invite the gentle winds Eudoxia.

Eudo. Sir.

Emp. Oh do not flatter me, I am but flesh,
A man, a mortal man: drink, drink, ye dunces;
What can your doses now do, and your scrapings,
Your oyles, and Mithridates? if I do die,
You only words of health, and names of sickness
Finding no true disease in man but money,
That talk your selves into Revenues, oh
And e're ye kill your patients, begger'em,
I've have ye dead, and dri'd.

Pro. The Villain Sir;

The most accursed wretch.

Emp. Be gone my Queen,

This is no sight for thee: goe to the Vestals,
Cast holy incense in the fire, and offer
One powerfull sacrifice to free thy Cesar.

Pro. Goe goe and be happy.

[Exit Eudoxa.

Arct. Goe, but give no ease,

The Gods have set thy last hour Valentinian,
Thou art but man, a bad man too, a beast,
And like a sensuall bloody thing thou die'st.

Pro. Oh Traitor.

Arct. Curse your selves ye flatterers,

And howle your miseries to come ye wretches,
You taught him to be poyson'd.

Emp. Yet no comfort?

Arct. Be not abus'd with Priests, nor Potheccaries,

They cannot help thee; Thou hast now to live
A short half hour, no more, and I ten minutes:

I gave thee poyson for Accius sake,
Such a destroying poyson would kill nature;

And, for thou shalt not die alone, I took it.

If mankind had been in thee at this murder,

No more to people earth again, the wings

Of old time clipt for ever, reason lost,

In what I had attempted, yet O Cesar

To purchase fair revenge, I had poyson'd them too.

Emp. O villain: I grow hotter, hotter. Arct. Yes;

But not near my heat yet; what thou feel'st now,
Mark me with horror Cesar, are but Embers
Of lust and leachery thou hast committed:
But there be flames of murder.

Emp. Fetch out tortures.

Arct. Do, and I'll flatter thee, nay more I'll love thee:

Thy tortures to what now I suffer Cesar,
At which thou must arrive too, e're thou dy'st,
Are lighter, and more full of mirth and laughter.

Emp. Let 'em alone: I must drink.

Arct. Now be mad,

But not near me yet.

Emp. Hold me, hold me, hold me,
Hold me; or I shall burst else.

Arct. See me Cesar,

And see to what thou must come for thy murder;
Millions of womens labours, all diseases.

Emp. Oh my afflicted soul too.

Arct. Womens fears, horrors,
Despairs, and all the Plagues the hot Sun breeds.—

Emp. Accius, O Accius: O Lucina.

Arct. Are but my torments shadows?

Emp. Hide me mountains;

The gods have found my sins:

Now break.

Arct. Not yet Sir;

Thou hast a pull beyond all these.

Emp. Oh Hell,

Oh villain, cursed villain.

Arct. O brave villain,

My poyson dances in me at this deed:
Now Cesar, now behold me, this is torment,
And this is thine before thou die'st, I am wildfire:
The brazen Bull of Phalaris was feign'd,
The miseries of souls despising Heaven
But Emblems of my torments.

Emp. Oh quench me, quench me, quench me.

Arct. Fire, a flattery;

And all the Poets tales of sad Avercus,
To my pains less than fictions: Yet to know thee
What constant love I bore my married master;
Like a Southwind, I have sung through all these tempests
My heart, my wither'd heart, fear, fear thou Monster,
Fear the just gods, I have my peace.— He dies.

Emp. More drink.

A thousand April snowres fall in my bosom:
How dare ye let me be tormented thus?
Away with that prodigious body, gods,
Gods, let me ask ye what I am, ye lay
All your inflictions on me, hear me, hear me;
I do confesse I am a ravisher,
A murderer, a hated Cesar; oh,
Are there not vows enough, and flaming altars,
The fat of all the world for sacrifice,
And where that fails, the blood of thousand captives?
To purge those sins? but I must make the incense?
I do despise ye all, ye have no mercy,
And wanting that, ye are no Gods, your paroll
Is only preach'd abroad to make Fools fearfull,
And women made of awe, believe your heaven:
Oh torments, torments, torments, pains above pains,
If ye be any thing but dreams, and ghosts,
And truly hold the guidance of things mortal;
Have in your selves times past, to come, and present,
Fashion the souls of men, and make flesh for 'em,
Weighing our fates, and fortunes beyond reason,
Be more than all the Gods, great in forgiveness,
Break not the goodly frame ye build in anger;
For you are things men teach us, without passions,
Give me an hour to know ye in: Oh save me
But so much perfect time ye make a foul in,
Take this destruction from me; no, ye cannot,
The more I would believe ye, more I suffer,
My brains are ashes, now my heart, my eyes friends;

I goe,

I goe, I goe, more air, more air ; I am mortal. — He dyes.

Pro. Take in the body : oh Licinius,
The misery that we are left to suffer ;
No pity shall find us.

Lici. Our lives deserve none :
Would I were chain'd again to slavery,
With any hope of life.

Pro. A quiet grave,
Or a consumption now Licinius,
That we might be too poor to kill, were something.

Lici. Let's make our best use, we have mony Proculus,
And if that cannot save us, we have swords.

Pro. Yes, but we dare not dye.

Lici. I had forgot that :
There's other countries then.

Pro. But the same hate still,
Of what we are.

Lici. Think any thing, I'll follow —

Enter a Messenger.

Pro. How now, what news ?

Mess. Shift for your selves, ye are lost else :
The Souldier is in arms for great Aecius,
And their Lieutenant general that stopt 'em,
Cut in a thousand pieces : they march hither :
Beside, the women of the Town have murder'd
Phorba, and loose Ardelia, Cesar's she-Bawds.

Lici. Then here's no staying Proculus ?

Pro. O Cesar,
That we had never known thy lusts : Let's fly,
And where we find no womans man let's dye. —

SCENA III.

Enter Maximus.

Max. Gods, what a sluice of blood have I let open !
My happy ends are come to birth, he's dead,
And I reveng'd ; the Empire's all a fire,
And desolation every where inhabits :
And shall I live that am the author of it,
To know Rome from the awe o'th' world, the pity ?
My friends are gone before too of my sending,
And shall I stay ? is ought else to be liv'd for ?
Is there an other friend, another wife,
Or any third holds half their worthiness,
To linger here alive for ? Is not vertue
In their two everlasting souls departed,
And in their bodies first flame fled to heaven ?
Can any man discover this, and love me ?
For though my justice were as white as truth,
My way was crooked to it, that condemns me :
And now Aecius, and my honored Lady,
That were preparers to my rest and quiet,
The lines to lead me to Elyzium :
You that but stept before me, on assurance
I would not leave your friendship unrewarded,
First smile upon the sacrifice I have sent ye,
Then see me coming boldly : stay, I am foolish,
Somewhat too suddain to mine own destruction,
This great end of my vengeance may grow greater :
Why may not I be Cesar ? Yet no dying ;
Why should not I catch at it ? fools and children
Have had that strength before me, and obtain'd it,
And as the danger stands, my reason bids me,
I will, I dare ; my dear friends pardon me,
I am not fit to dye yet, if not Cesar ;
I am sure the Souldier loves me, and the people,
And I will forward, and as goodly Cedars
Rent from Oeta by a sweeping tempest
Jointed again and made tall malls, desie
Those angry winds that split 'em, so will I
New piece again ; above the fate of women,
And made more perfect far, than growing private,
Stand and desie bad fortunes : If I rise,

My wife was ravish'd well ; If then I fall,
My great attempt honours my Funeral. —

[Exit.

SCENA IV.

Enter 3 Senators, and Affranius.

1. Guard all the posterns to the Camp Affranius,
And see 'em fast, we shall be rifled else,
Thou art an honest, and a worthy Captain.

2. Promise the Souldier any thing.

3. Speak gently,
And tell 'em we are now in council for 'em,
Labouring to choose a Cesar fit for them,
A Souldier, and a giver.

1. Tell 'em further,
Their free and liberal voices shall goe with us.

2. Nay more, a negative say we allow 'em.

3. And if our choice displease 'em, they shall name him.

1. Promise three donatives, and large, Affranius.

2. And Cesar once elected, present foes,
With distribution of all necessaries,
Corn, Wine, and Oyle.

3. New garments, and new Arms,
And equal portions of the Provinces
To them, and to their families for ever.

1. And see the City strengthned.

Affra. I shall do it. — [Exit Affranius.

2. Sempronius, these are wofull times.

3. O Brutus,

We want thy honesty again ; these Cesars,
What noble Consuls got with blood, in blood
Consume again, and scatter.

1. Which way shall we ?

2. Not any way of safety I can think on.

3. Now go our wives to ruin, and our daughters,
And we beholders Fulvius.

1. Every thing

Is every mans that will.

2. The Vestals now
Must only feed the Souldiers fire of lust,
And sensual Gods be glutted with those Offerings,
Age like the hidden bowels of the earth,
Open'd with swords for treasure.

Gods defend us,
We are chaff before their fury else.

2. Away,
Let's to the Temples.

1. To the Capitol.

'Tis not a time to pray now, let's be strengthned---

Enter Affranius.

3. How now Affranius : what good news ?

Affra. A Cesar.

1. Oh who ?

Affr. Lord Maximus is with the Souldier,
And all the Camp rings, Cesar, Cesar, Cesar :
He forced the Empre's with him for more honour.

2. A happy choice : let's meet him.

3. Blessed fortune !

1. Away, away, make room there, room there, room.

— [Exeunt Senators, Flourish.

Within. Lord Maximus is Cesar, Cesar, Cesar ;
Hail Cesar Maximus.

Affra. Oh turning people !
Oh people excellent in war, and govern'd,
In peace more raging than the furious North,
When he ploughs up the Sea, and makes him brine,
Or the lowd falls of Nile ; I must give way,
Although I neither love nor hope this :
Or like a rotten bridge that dares a current,
When he is swell'd and high crackt, and farewell.

Enter

Enter Maximus, Eudoxa, Senat. and Souldiers.

Sen. Room for the Emperour.

Soul. Long life to Cæsar.

Afra. Hail Cæsar Maximus.

Emp. Max. Your hand Afranius.

Lead to the Palace, there my thanks in general,
I'll showre among ye all: gods give me life,
First to defend the Empire, then you Fathers,
And valiant friends, the heirs of strength and vertue,
The rampires of old Rome, of us the refuge;
To you I open this day all I have,
Even all the hazard that my youth hath purchas'd,
Ye are my Children, family, and friends
And ever so respected shall be, forward.
There's a Proscription, grave Sempronius,
Gainst all the flatterers, and lazie Bawds
Led loose-liv'd Valentinian to his vices,
See it effected.

[Flourish.]

Sen. Honour wait on Cæsar.

Sould. Make room for Cæsar there. [Exeunt all but Afra.]

Afra. Thou hast my fears,

But Valentinian keeps my vows: Oh gods,
Why do we like to feed the greedy Ravenne
Of these blown men, that must before they stand,
And fixt in eminence, cast life on life,
And trench their safeties in with wounds, and bodies?
Well froward Rome, thou wilt grow weak with changing,
And die without an heir, that lov'st to breed
Sons for the killing hate of sons: for me,
I only live to find an enemy.

[Exit.]

SCENE V.

Enter Paulus (a Poet,) and Licippus (a Gent.)

Pau. When is the Inauguration?

Lic. Why to morrow.

Paul. 'Twill be short time.

Lic. Any device that's handsome,
A Cupid, or the God o'th' place will do it,
Where he must take the Fasces.

Pau. Or a Grace.

Lic. A good Grace has no fellow.

Pau. Let me see,

Will not his name yield something? Maximus
By th' way of Anagram? I have found out Axis,
You know he bears the Empire.

Lic. Get him wheels too,
'Twill be a cruel carriage else.

Pau. Some songs too.

Lic. By any means some songs: but very short ones,
And honest language Paulus, without bursting,
The air will fall the sweeter.

Pau. A Grace must do it,

Lic. Why let a Grace then.

Pau. Yes it must be so;

And in a Robe of blew too, as I take it.

Lic. This Poet is a little kin to th' Painter
That could paint nothing but a ramping Lion,
So all his learned fancies are blew Graces.

Pau. What think ye of a Sea-nymph, and a Heaven?

Lic. Why what should she do there man? there's no water.

Pau. That's true, it must be a Grace, and yet
Me thinks a Rain bow.

Lic. And in blew.

Pau. Oh yes;

Hanging in arch above him, and i'th' midle—

Lic. A showre of Rain.

Pau. No, no, it must be a Grace.

Lic. Why prethee Grace him then.

Pau. Of Orpheus,
Coming from Hell.

Lic. In blew too.

Pau. 'Tis the better;

And as he rises, full of fires.

Lic. Now blefs us,
Will not that spoil his Luteftrings, Paulus?

Pau. Singing,
And crossing of his arms.

Lic. How can he play then?

Pau. It shall be a Grace, I'll do it.

Lic. Prethee do,
And with as good a grace as thou canst possible;
Good fury Paulus, be i'th' morning with me,
And pray take measure of his mouth that speaks it. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.

Enter Maximus and Eudoxa.

Max. Come my best lov'd Eudoxa: let the souldier
Want neither Wine nor any thing he calls for,
And when the Senate's ready, give us notice:
In the mean time leave us.
Oh my dear sweet.

Eud. Is't possible your Grace
Should undertake such dangers for my beauty,
If it were excellent?

Max. 'Tis all
The world has left to brag of.

Eud. Can a face
Long since bequeath'd to wrinkles with my sorrows,
Long since ras'd out o'th' book of youth and pleasure,
Have power to make the strongest man o'th' Empire,
Nay the most staid, and knowing what is Woman;
The greatest aim of perfectness men liv'd by,
The most true constant lover of his wedlock,
Such a still blowing beauty, earth was proud of,
Lose such a noble wife, and wilfully;
Himself prepare the way, nay make the rape.
Did ye not tell me so?

Max. 'Tis true Eudoxa.

Eud. Lay desolate his dearest piece of friendship,
Break his strong helm he stear'd by, sink that vertue,
That valour, that even all the gods can give us,
Without whom he was nothing, with whom worthiest,
Nay more, arrive at Cæsar, and kill him too,
And for my sake? either ye love too dearly,
Or deeply ye dissemble, Sir?

Max. I do so;

And till I am more strengthen'd, so I must do;
Yet would my joy, and Wine had fashion'd out
Some safer lye: Can these things be, Eudoxa,
And I dissemble? Can there be but goodness
And only thine dear Lady, any end,
Any imagination but a lost one,
Why I should run this hazard? O thou vertue!
Were it to do again, and Valentinian
Once more to hold thee, sinful Valentinian,
In whom thou wert set, as Pearls are in salt Oysters,
As Roses are in rank weeds, I would find,
Yet to thy sacred self a dearer danger,
The Gods know how I honour thee.

Eud. What love, Sir,
Can I return for this, but my obedience?
My life, if so you please, and 'tis too little.

Max. 'Tis too much to redeem the world.

Eud. From this hour,
The sorrows for my dead Lord, fare ye well,
My living Lord has dried ye; and in token,
As Emperour this day I honour ye,
And the great caster new of all my wishes,
The wreath of living Lawrel, that must compass
That sacred head, Eudoxa makes for Cæsar:
I am methinks too much in love with fortune;
But with you ever Royal Sir my maker,
The once more Summer of me, meer in love,
Is poor expression of my doting.

Max. Sweetest.

Eud.

Eud. Now of my troth ye have bought me dear Sir.

Max. No,
Had I at los of mankind.

Enter a Messenger.

Eud. Now ye flatter.

Meff. The Senate waits your Grace.

Max. Let 'em come on,
And in a full form bring the ceremony:
This day I am your servant, dear, and proudly,
I'll wear your honoured favour.

Eud. May it prove so.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.

Enter Paulus and Licippus.

Lic. Is your Grace done?

Paul. 'Tis done.

Lic. Who speaks?

Paul. A Boy.

Lic. A dainty blue Boy, Paulus?

Paul. Yes.

Lic. Have ye viewed
The work above?

Paul. Yes, and all up, and ready.

Lic. The Empress does you simple honour, Paulus,
The wreath your blue Grace must present, she made.
But hark ye, for the Souldiers?

Paul. That's done too:

I'll bring 'em in I warrant ye.

Lic. A Grace too?

Paul. The same Grace serves for both.

Lic. About it then:

I must to th' Cupbord; and be sure good Paulus
Your Grace be fasting, that he may hang cleanly.
If there should need another voice, what then?

Paul. I'll hang another Grace in.

Lic. Grace be with ye.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VIII.

Enter in state Maximus, Eudoxa, with Souldiers and Gentlemen of Rome, the Senators, and Rods and Axes born before them.

A Synnet with } { With a Banket prepared, with Trumpets. } { Hoboies, Musick, Song, wreath.

3 Sen. Hale to thy imperial honour sacred Cæsar,
And from the old Rome take these wishes;
You holy gods, that hitherto have held
As justice holds her Ballance equal pois'd,
This glory of our Nation, this full Roman,
And made him fit for what he is, confirm him:
Look on this Son O Jupiter our helper,
And Romulus, thou Father of our honour,
Preserve him like thy self, just, valiant, noble,
A lover, and increaser of his people,
Let him begin with Numa, stand with Caro,
The first five years of Nero be his wishes,
Give him the age and fortune of Emylius,
And his whole raign renew a great Augustus.

SONG.

*Honour that is ever living,
Honour that is ever giving,
Honour that sees all and knows
Both the ebbs of man and flowes,
Honour that rewards the best,
Sends thee thy rich labours rest;
Thou hast studied still to please her,
Therefore now she calls thee Cæsar:*
Chor. Hale, hale, Cæsar, hale and stand,
And thy name outlive the Land.
Noble Fathers to his brows
Bind this wreath with thousand vows.

All. Stand to eternity.

Max. I thank ye Fathers,
And as I rule, may it still grow or wither:
Now to the Banket, ye are all my guessts,
This day be liberal friends, to wine we give it;
And smiling pleasures: Sit, my Queen of Beauty;
Fathers, your places: these are fair Wars Souldiers,
And thus I give the first charge to ye all;
You are my second, sweet, to every cup,
I add unto the Senate a new honour,
And to the sons of Mars a donative.

SONG.

*God Lyeus ever young,
Ever honour'd, ever sung;
Stain'd with blond of lusty Grapes,
In a thousand lusty shapes;
Dance upon the Mazers brim,
In the Crimson liquor swim:
From thy plenteous hand divine,
Let a River run with Wine:
God of youth, let this day here.
Enter neither care nor fear.*

Boy. Bellona's seed, the glory of old Rome,
Envy of conquer'd Nations, nobly come
And to the fulness of your war-like noise
Let your feet move, make up this hour of joys;
Come, come I say, range your fair Troop at large,
And your high measure turn into a charge.

Semp. The Emperor's gown heavy with his wine.

Afra. The Senate staies Sir for your thanks.

Semp. Great Cæsar.

Eud. I have my wish.

Afra. Wilt please your Grace speak to him?

Eud. Yes, but he will not hear Lords.

Semp. Stir him Lucius; the Senate must have thanks.

2 Sen. Luc. Your Grace, Sir Cæsar.

Eud. Did I not tell you he was well? he's dead.

Semp. Dead? treason, guard the Court, let no man pass,
Souldiers, your Cæsar's murdered.

Eud. Make no tumult,

Nor arm the Court, ye have his killer with ye;
And the just cause, if ye can stay the hearing:
I was his death; that wreath that made him Cæsar,
Has made him earth.

Sould. Cut her in thousand pieces.

Eud. Wife men would know the reason first: to die,
Is that I wish for, Romans, and your swords,
The heaviest way of death: yet Souldiers grant me
That was your Empress once, and honour'd by ye,
But so much time to tell ye why I kill'd him,
And weigh my reasons well, if man be in you;
Then if ye dare do cruelly, condemn me.

Afr. Hear her ye noble Romans, 'tis a Woman,
A subject not for swords, but pity: Heaven
(If she be guilty of malicious murder)
Has given us Laws to make example of her,
If only of revenge, and blood hid from us,
Let us consider first, then execute.

Semp. Speak bloody Woman.

Eud. Yes; This Maximus,

That was your Cæsar, Lords, and noble Souldiers,
(And if I wrong the dead, Heaven perish me;
Or speak to win your favours but the truth)
Was to his Country, to his friends, and Cæsar
A most malicious Traitor.

Semp. Take heed woman.

Eud. I speak not for compassion. Brave Acidius
(Whose blessed soul if I live shall afflict me)
The man that all the world lov'd, you ador'd,
That was the master-piece of Arms, and bounty;
Mine own grief shall come last: this friend of his,
This Souldier, this your right Arm, noble Romans,

By a base letter to the Emperor;
 Stuff full of fears, and poor suggestions,
 And by himself, unto himself directed;
 Was cut off basely, basely, cruelly;
 Oh loss, O innocent, can ye now kill me?
 And the poor stale my Noble Lord, that knew not
 More of this villain, than his forc'd fears;
 Like one foreseen to satisfie, dy'd for it:
 There was a murder too, Rome would have blusht at;
 Was this worth being Cesar? or my patience? nay his Wife
 By Heaven he told it me in wine, and joy;
 And swore it deeply, he himself prepar'd
 To be abus'd, how? let me grieve not tell ye;
 And weep the sins that did it: and his end
 Was only me, and Cesar: But me he lyed in:
 These are my reasons Romans, and my soul

Tells me sufficient; and my deed is justice:
 Now as I have done well, or ill, look on me.
Afra. What less could nature do, what less had we done,
 Had we known this before? Romans, she is righteous;
 And such a piece of justice Heaven must smile on:
 Bend all your swords on me, if this displease ye.
 For I must kneel, and on this vertuous hand;
 Seal my new joy and thanks, thou hast done truly.
Semp. Up with your arms, ye strike a Saint else Romans,
 May'st thou live ever spoken our Protector:
Rome yet has many Noble Heirs: Let's in
 And pray, before we choose, then plant a Cesar
 Above the reach of envy, blood, and murder.
Afra. Take up the body nobly to his urn,
 And may our sins, and his together burn.

[Exeunt.
 A dead March.]

EPILOGUE.

WE would fain please ye, and as fain be pleas'd;
 'Tis but a little liking, both are eas'd:
 We have your money, and you have our ware,
 And to our understanding good and fair:
 For your own wisdoms sake, be not so mad,
 To acknowledge ye have bought things dear and bad:
 Let not a brack i'th' Stuff, or here and there
 The fading gloss, a general loss appear:
 We know ye take up worse Commodities,
 And dearer pay, yet think your bargains wise;
 We know in Meat and Wine, ye fling away
 More time and wealth, which is but dearer pay,
 And with the Reckoning all the pleasure lost.
 We bid ye not unto repenting cost:
 The price is easie, and so light the Play,
 That ye may new digest it every day.
 Then noble friends, as ye would choose a Miss,
 Only to please the eye a while and kiss,
 Till a good Wife be got: So let this Play
 Hold ye a while until a better may.

Monfieur Thomas.

A

COMEDY.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Alice, and Valentine.

Alice. HOW dearly welcome you are!
Val. I know it, (fright,
 And my best Sister, you are as dear to my
 And pray let this confirm it: how you have govern'd

 My poor state in my absence, how my servants,
 I dare, and must believe, else I should wrong ye,
 The best and worthiest.

Alice. As my womans wit, Sir,
 Which is but weak and crazie.

Val. But good Alice,
 Tell me how fares the gentle Cellide,
 The life of my affection, since my travel,
 My long and lazie Travel? is her love still
 Upon the growing hand? does it not stop
 And wither at my years? has she not view'd
 And entertain'd some younger smooth behaviour,
 Some Youth but in his blossom, as her self is?
 There lies my fears.

Alice. They need not, for believe me
 So well you have manag'd her, and won her mind,
 Even from her hours of childhood, to this ripeness,
 And in your absence, that by me enforc'd still,
 So well distill'd your gentleness into her,
 Observ'd her, fed her fancy, liv'd still in her,
 And though Love be a Boy, and ever youthful,
 And young and beauteous objects ever aim'd at,
 Yet here ye have gone beyond love, better'd nature,
 Made him appear in years, in grey years fiery,
 His Bow at full bent ever; fear not Brother,
 For though your body has been far off from her,
 Yet every hour your heart, which is your goodness,
 I have forc'd into her, won a place prepar'd too,
 And willingly to give it ever harbour;
 Believe she is so much yours, and won by miracle,
 (Which is by age) so deep a stamp set on her
 By your observances, she cannot alter.
 Were the Child living now ye lost at Sea
 Among the Genona Gallies, what a happiness!
 What a main Blessing!

Val. O no more, good Sister,
 Touch no more that string, 'tis too harsh and jarring.
 With that Child all my hopes went, and you know
 The root of all those hopes, the Mother too
 Within few days.

Alice. 'Tis too true, and too fatal,
 But peace be with their souls.

Val. For her loss

I hope the beauteous Cellide.

Alice. You may, Sir,
 For all she is, is yours.

Val. For the poor Boys loss,
 I have brought a noble friend, I found in Travel,
 A worthier mind, and a more temperate spirit,
 If I have so much judgment to discern 'em,
 Man yet was never master of.

Alice. What is he?

Val. A Gentleman, I do assure my self,
 And of a worthy breeding, though he hide it;
 I found him at Valentia, poor and needy,
 Only his mind the master of a Treasure.
 I fought his friendship, won him by much violence,
 His honesty and modesty still fearing
 To thrust a charge upon me; how I love him,
 He shall now know, where want and he hereafter
 Shall be no more Companions; use him nobly,
 It is my will, good Sister, all I have
 I make him free companion in, and partner,
 But only——

Alice. I observe ye, hold your Right there,
 Love and high Rule allows no Rivals, Brother,
 He shall have fair regard, and all observance.

Enter Hylas.

Hylas. You are welcome, noble Sir.

Val. What, Monsieur Hylas!
 I'm glad to see your merry Body well yet.
Hyl. 'Faith y'are welcome home, what news beyond seas?
Val. None, but new men expected, such as you are,
 To breed new admirations; 'Tis my Sister,
 'Pray ye know her, Sir.

Hylas. With all my heart; your leave Lady?

Alice. You have it, Sir.

Hylas. A shrewd smart touch, which does prognosticate
 A Body keen and active, somewhat old,
 But that's all one; age brings experience
 And knowledge to dispatch: I must be better,
 And nearer in my service, with your leave, Sir,
 To this fair Lady.

Val. What, the old 'squire of Dames still! (now,

Hyl. Still the admirer of their goodness, with all my heart
 I love a woman of her years, a pacer
 That lays the bridle in her Neck, will travel
 Forty, and somewhat fulsome is a fine dish.
 These young Colts are too skittish.

Enter Mary.

Alice. My Cousin Mary
 In all her joy, Sir, to congratulate

D d d 2

Your

Your fair return.

Val. My loving and kind Cousin,
A thousand welcomes.

Mary. A thousand thanks to heaven, Sir,
For your safe voyage, and return.

Val. I thank ye;
But where's my Blessed Cellide? her slackness
In visitation.

Mary. Think not so, dear Uncle,
I left her on her knees, thanking the gods
With tears and prayers.

Val. Ye have given me too much comfort.

Mary. She will not be long from ye.

Hyl. Your fair Cousin?

Val. It is so, and a bait you cannot balk Sir,
If your old rule reign in you, ye may know her:
A happy stock ye have, right worthy Lady,
The poorest of your servants vows his duty
And obliged faith.

Mary. O 'tis a kiss you would, Sir,
Take it, and tye your tongue up.

Hylas. I am an Ass
I do perceive now, a blind Ass, a Blockhead;
For this is handsomness, this that that draws us
Body and Bones: Oh what a mounted forehead,
What eyes and lips, what every thing about her!
How like a Swan she swims her pace, and bears
Her silver Breasts! this is the Woman, she,
And only she, that I will so much honour
As to think worthy of my love, all older Idols
I heartily abhor, and give to Gunpowder,
And all Complexions besides hers, to Gypsies.

Enter Francis at one door, and Cellide at another.

Val. O my dear life, my better heart, all dangers,
Distresses in my travel, all misfortunes,
Had they been endless like the hours upon me,
In this kiss had been buried in oblivion;
How happy have ye made me, truly happy?

Cell. My joy has so much overmastered me,
That in my tears for your return——

Val. O dearest;
My noble friend too! what a Blessedness
Have I about me now! how full my wishes
Are come again, a thousand hearty welcomes
I once more lay upon ye; all I have,
The fair and liberal use of all my servants
To be at your command, and all the uses
Of all within my power.

Fran. Ye are too munificent,
Nor am I able to conceive those thanks, Sir.

Val. Ye wrong my tender love now, even my service,
Nothing accepted, nothing stuck between us
And our intire affections but this woman,
This I beseech ye friend.

Fran. It is a jewel,
I do confess, would make a Thief, but never
Of him that's so much yours, and bound your servant,
That were a base ingratitude.

Val. Ye are noble,
'Pray be acquainted with her, keep your way, Sir,
My Cousin and my Sister.

Alice. Ye are most welcome.

Mary. If any thing in our poor powers, fair Sir,
To render ye content, and liberal welcome
May but appear, command it.

Alice. Ye shall find us
Happy in our performance.

Fran. The poor Servant
Of both your goodness's presents his service.

Val. Come, no more Complement; Custom has made it
Dull, old, and tedious; ye are once more welcome
As your own thoughts can make ye, and the same ever.
And so we'll in to ratifie it.

Hyl. Hark ye, Valentine:
Is wild Oats yet come over?

Val. Yes, with me, Sir.

Mary. How does he bear himself?

Val. A great deal better;
Why do you blush? the Gentleman will do well.

Mary. I should be glad on't, Sir

Val. How does his father?

Hyl. As mad a worm as e'er he was.

Val. I lookt for't:

Shall we enjoy your Company?

Hyl. I'll wait on ye:

Only a thought or two.

Val. We bar all prayers.

[Exeunt all but Hylas.]

Hyl. This last Wench! I, this last wench was a fair one,
A dainty Wench, a right one; a Devil take it,
What do I ail? to have fifteen now in liking,
Enough a Man would think to stay my stomach?
But what's fifteen, or fifteen score to my thoughts?
And wherefore are mine Eyes made, and have lights,
But to encrease my Objects? This last Wench
Sticks plaguey close to me, a hundred pound
I were as close to her; If I lov'd now,
As many foolish men do, I should run mad.

SCENE II.

Enter old Sebastian, and Launcelot.

Seb. Sirrah, no more of your French shrugs I advise you.
If you be lowzie shift your self.

Laun. May it please your Worship.

Seb. Only to see my Son, my Son, good Launcelot;
Your Master and my Son; Body O me Sir,
No money, no more money, Monsieur Launcelot,
Not a Denier, sweet Signior; bring the Person,
The person of my Boy, my Boy Tom, Monsieur Thomas,
Or get you gone again, du gata whee, Sir;
Bassamicu, good Launcelot, valetote.
My Boy or nothing.

Laun. Then to answer punctually.

Seb. I say to th' purpose.

Laun. Then I say to th' purpose,
Because your Worships vulgar Understanding
May meet me at the nearest; your Son, my Master,
Or Monsieur Thomas, (for so his Travel stiles him)
Through many foreign plots that Vertue meets with,
And dangers (I beseech ye give attention)
Is at the last arriv'd

To ask your (as the French man calls it sweetly)
Benediction de jour en jour.

Seb. Sirrah, do not conjure me with your French furies.

Laun. Che ditt'a vou, Monsieur.

Seb. Che dog'a vou, Rascal;
Leave me your rotten language, and tell me plainly,
And quickly, Sirrah, lest I crack your French Crown,
What your good Master means; I have maintain'd
You and your Monsieur, as I take it, Launcelot,
These two years at your ditty vous, your jours.
Four me no more, for not another penny
Shall pass my purse.

Laun. Your Worship is erroneous,
For as I told you, your Son Tom, or Thomas,
My master and your Son is now arriv'd
To ask you, as our Language bears it nearest,
Your quotidian Blessing, and here he is in Person.

Enter Thomas.

Seb. What, Tom! Boy, welcome with all my heart, Boy
Welcome, 'faith thou hast gladdened me at soul, Boy,
Infinite glad I am, I have pray'd too, Thomas,
For you wild Thomas, Tom, I thank thee heartily
For coming home.

Thom. Sir, I do find your Prayers
Have much prevail'd above my sins.

Seb. How's this?

Thom. Else certain I had perish'd with my rudeness,
Ere I had won my self to that discretion,
I hope you shall hereafter find.

Seb. Humh, humh,
Discretion? is it come to that? the Boy's spoil'd.

Thom. Sirrah, you Rogue, look for't, for I will make thee
Ten times more miserable than thou thought'st thy self
Before thou travell'dst; thou hast told my Father,
I know it, and I find it, all my Rogueries
By meer way of prevention to undo me.

Laun. Sir, as I speak eight languages, I only
Told him you came to ask his benediction,
De jour en jour.

Thom. But that I must be civil,
I would beat thee like a Dog. Sir, however
The Time I have mispent may make you doubtful,
Nay harden your belief 'gainst my Conversion.

Seb. A pox o' travel, I say.

Thom. Yet dear Father
Your own experience in my after courses.

Enter Dorothea.

Seb. Prithee no more, 'tis scurvy; there's thy Sister
Undone without Redemption; he eats with picks,
Utterly spoil'd, his spirit baffled in him:
How have I find that this affliction
Should light so heavy on me? I have no more Sons;
And this no more mine own, no spark of Nature
Allows him mine now, he's grown tame; my grand curse
Hang o'r his head that thus transform'd thee: travel?
I'll send my horse to travel next; we Monsieur.
Now will my most canonical dear Neighbours
Say I have found my Son, and rejoyce with me,
Because he has mew'd his mad tricks off: I know not,
But I am sure this Monsieur, this fine Gentleman
Will never be in my Books like mad Thomas,
I must go seek an Heir, for my inheritance
Must not turn Secretary; my name and quality
Has kept my Land three hundred years in madness,
And it slip now, may it sink.

[Exit.]

Thom. Excellent Sister,
I am glad to see thee well; but where's thy father?

Dor. Gone discontent, it seems.

Thom. He did ill in it
As he does all; for I was uttering
A handsome Speech or two, I have been studying
E'r since I came from Paris: how glad to see thee!

Dor. I am gladder to see you, with more love too
I dare maintain it, than my Father's sorry
To see (as he supposes) your Conversion;
And I am sure he is vext, nay more, I know it,
He has pray'd against it mainly; but it appears, Sir,
You had rather blind him with that poor opinion
Than in your self correct it: dearest Brother,
Since there is in our uniform resemblance,
No more to make us two but our bare Sexes;
And since one happy Birth produc'd us hither,
Let one more happy mind.

Thom. It shall be, Sister,
For I can do it when I list; and yet, Wench,
Be mad too when I please; I have the trick on't:
Beware a Traveller.

Dor. Leave that trick too.

Thom. Not for the world: but where's my Mistress,
And prithee say how does she? I melt to see her,
And presently: I must away.

Dor. Then do so,

For o' my faith, she will not see you Brother.

Thom. Not see me? I'll——

Dor. Now you play your true self;
How would my father love this! I'll assure you
She will not see you; she has heard (and loudly)
The gambols that you plaid since your departure,

In every Town ye came, your several mischiefs,
Your rowfes and your wenches; all your quarrels,
And the no causes of 'em; these I take it
Although she love ye well, to modest ears,
To one that waited for your reformation,
To which end travel was propounded by her Uncle,
Must needs, and reason for it, be examined,
And by her modesty, and fear'd too light too,
To fyie with her affections; ye have lost her
For any thing I see, exil'd your self.

Thom. No more of that, sweet Doll, I will be civil.

Dor. But how long?

Thom. Would'st thou have me lose my Birth-right?
For yond old thing will disinherite me
If I grow too demure; good sweet Doll, prithee,
Prithee, dear Sister, let me see her.

Dor. No.

Thom. Nay, I beseech thee, by this light.

Dor. I, swagger.

Thom. Kifs me, and be my friend, we two were twins,
And shall we now grow strangers?

Dor. 'Tis not my fault.

Thom. Well, there be other women, and remember
You, you were the cause of this; there be more lands too,
And better People in 'em, fare ye well,
And other loves; what shall become of me
And of my vanities, because they grieve ye? (there?)

Dor. Come hither, come, do you see that Cloud that flies
So light are you, and blown with every fancy:

Will ye but make me hope ye may be civil?
I know your Nature's sweet enough, and tender,
Not grated on, nor curb'd: do you love your Mistress?

Thom. He lies that says I do not.

Dor. Would ye see her?

Thom. If you please, for it must be so.

Dor. And appear to her

A thing to be belov'd?

Thom. Yes.

Dor. Change then

A little of your wildness into wisdom,
And put on a more smoothness;
I'll do the best I can to help ye, yet
I do protest she swore, and swore it deeply,
She would never see you more; where's your mans heart
What, do you faint at this? (now?)

Thom. She is a woman;

But him she entertains next for a servant,
I shall be bold to quarter.

Dor. No thought of fighting;

Go in, and there we'll talk more, be but rul'd,
And what lies in my power, ye shall be sure of. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Alice, and Mary:

Alice. He cannot be so wild still.

Mary. 'Tis most certain,
I have now heard all, and all the truth.

Alice. Grant all that;

Is he the first that has been giv'n a lost man,
And yet come fairly home? he is young and tender,
And fit for that impression your affections
Shall stamp upon him, age brings on discretion,
A year hence, these mad toys that now possess him
Will shew like Bugbears to him, shapes to fright him;
Marriage dissolves all these like mists.

Mary. They are grounded
Hereditary in him, from his father,
And to his grave they will haunt him.

Alice. 'Tis your fear

Which is a wife part in you; yet your love
However you may seem to lessen it
With these dislikes, and choak it with these errors,
Do what you can, will break out to excuse him,

Ye have him in your heart, and planted, Cousin,
From whence the power of reason, nor discretion
Can ever root him.

Mary. Planted in my heart, Aunt?
Believe it no, I never was so liberal;
What though he shew a so so comely fellow
Which we call pretty? or say it may be handfom?
What though his promises may stumble at
The power of goodness in him, sometimes use too?

Al. How willingly thy heart betrays thee, Cousin?
Cozently self no more; thou hast no more power
To leave off loving him than he that's thirsty
Has to obtain from drink standing before him;
His mind is not so monstrous for his shape,
If I have Eyes, I have not seen his better.
A handsome brown Complexion.

Mary. Reasonable,
Inclining to a tawney.

Alice. Had I said so
You would have wish'd my tongue out; then his making.

Mary. Which may be mended; I have seen legs straighter,
And cleaner made.

Alice. A body too.

Mary. Far neater,
And better set together.

Alice. God forgive thee,
For against thy Conscience thou lyest stubbornly.

Mary. I grant 'tis neat enough.

Alice. 'Tis excellent,
And where the outward parts are fair and lovely,
(Which are but moulds o'th'mind) what must the soul be?
Put case youth has his swinge, and fiery Nature
Flames to mad uses many times.

Mary. All this
You only use to make me say I love him;
I do confess I do, but that my fondness
Should fling it self upon his desperate follies.

Alice. I do not counsel that, see him reclaim'd first,
Which will not prove a miracle, yet Mary,
I am afraid 'twill vex thee horribly
To stay so long.

Mary. No, no Aunt, no, believe me.

Alice. What was your dream to night? for I observ'd ye
Hugging of me, with good dear sweet Tom.

Mary. Fye, Aunt,
Upon my Conscience.

Alice. On my word 'tis true, Wench;
And then ye kiss'd me, Mary, more than once too,
And sigh'd, and O sweet Tom again; nay, do not blush,
Ye have it at the heart, Wench.

Mary. I'll be hang'd first,
But you must have your way.

Enter Dorothea.

Alice. And so will you too,
Or break down hedges for it. Dorothea,
The welcom'st woman living; how does thy Brother?
I hear he's turn'd a wondrous civil Gentleman
Since his short travel.

Dor. 'Pray Heaven he make it good, Alice.

Mary. How do ye friend? I have a quarrel to ye,
Ye stole away and left my company.

Dor. O pardon me, dear friend, it was to welcome
A Brother that I have some Cause to love well.

Mary. Prithce how is he? thou speak'st truth.

Dor. Not perfect,
I hope he will be.

Mary. Never: h'as forgot me,
I hear Wench, and his hot love too.

Alice. Thou would'st howl then.

Mary. And I am glad it should be so; his travels
Have yielded him variety of Mistresses,
Fairer in his eye far.

Alice. O cogging Rascal!

Mary. I was a fool, but better thoughts I thank heaven.

Dor. 'Pray do not think so, for he loves you dearly,
Upon my troth most firmly, would fain see you.

Mary. See me friend! do you think it fit?

Dor. It may be,
Without the loss of credit too; he's not
Such a prodigious thing, so monstrous,
To fling from all society.

Mary. He's so much contrary
To my desires, such an antipathy
That I must sooner see my grave.

Dor. Dear friend,
He was not so before he went.

Mary. I grant it,
For then I daily hop'd his fair Conversion.

Alice. Come, do not mask your self, but see him freely,
Ye have a mind.

Mary. That mind I'll master then.

Dor. And is your hate so mortal?

Mary. Not to his person,
But to his qualities, his mad-cap follies,
Which still like Hydras heads grow thicker on him.
I have a credit, friend, and Maids of my sort,
Love where their modesties may live untainted.

Dor. I give up that hope then; 'pray for your friends sake,
If I have any interest within ye,
Do but this courtesie, accept this Letter.

Mary. From him?

Dor. The same; 'tis but a minutes reading,
And as we look on shapes of painted Devils,
Which for the present may disturb our fancy,
But with the next new object lose 'em, so
If this be foul, ye may forget it, 'pray.

Mary. Have ye seen it, friend?

Dor. I will not lie; I have not,
But I presume, so much he honours you,
The worst part of himself was cast away
When to his best part he writ this.

Mary. For your sake,
Not that I any way shall like his scribbling.

Alice. A shrewd dissembling Quean.

Dor. I thank ye, dear friend,
I know she loves him.

Alice. Yes, and will not lose him,
Unless he leap into the Moon, believe that,
And then she'll scramble too; young wenches loves
Are like the course of quartans, they may shift
And seem to cease sometimes, and yet we see
The least distemper pulls 'em back again,
And seats 'em in their old course; fear her not,
Unless he be a Devil.

Mary. Now Heaven blefs me.

Dor. What has he writ?

Mary. Out, out upon him.

Dor. Ha, what has the mad man done?

Mary. Worse, worse, and worse still.

Alice. Some Northern Toy, a little broad.

Mary. Still fouler?

Hey, hey Boys, goodness keep me; Oh.

Dor. What ail ye?

Mary. Here, take your Spell again, it burns my fingers.
Was ever Lover writ so sweet a Letter?

So elegant a style? pray look upon't;
The rarest inventory of rank Oaths
That ever Cut-purse cast.

Alice. What a mad Boy is this?

Mary. Only i'th' bottom
A little Julip gently sprinkled over
To cool his mouth, lest it break out in blisters,
Indeed law. Yours for ever.

Dor. I am sorry.

Mar. You shall be welcome to me, come when you please,
And ever may command me vertuously,
But for your Brother, you must pardon me,

Till I am of his nature, no access friend,
No word of visitation, as ye love me,
And so for 'now I'le leave ye.

[Exit.

Alice. What a letter
Has this thing written, how it roars like thunder?
With what a state he enters into stile?
Dear Mistrefs.

Dor. Out upon him bedlam.

Alice. Well, there be waies to reach her yet: such likenefs
As you two carry me thinks.

Dor. I am mad too,
And yet can apprehend ye: fare ye well,
The fool shall now fish for himself.

Alice. Be sure then
His tewgh be tith and strong: and next no swearing,
He'l catch no fish else, Farewel Dol.

Dor. Farewel Alice.

[Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Valentine, Alice, and Cellide.

Cel. I Ndeed he's much chang'd, extremly alter'd,
His colour faded strangely too.

Val. The air,
The sharp and nipping air of our new climate
I hope is all, which will as well restore
To health again th' affected body by it,
And make it stronger far, as leave it dangerous;
How do's my sweet, our blessed hour comes on now
Apace my Cellide, (it knocks at door)
In which our loves, and long desires like rivers
Rising asunder far, shall fall together,
Within these too daies dear.

Cel. When heaven, and you Sir
Shall think it fit: for by your wills I am govern'd.

Alice. 'Twere good some preparation.

Enter Frank.

Val. All that may be:
It shall be no blind wedding: and all the joy
Of all our friends I hope: he looks worse hourly,
How does my friend, my self? he sweats too coldly,
His pulse, like the slow dropping of a spout,
Scarce gives his function: how is't man, alas Sir,
You look extreme ill: is it any old grief,
The weight of which?

Fra. None, gentle Sir, that I feel,
Your love is too too tender,
Nay believe Sir.

Cel. You cannot be the master of your health,
Either some feaver lyes in wait to catch ye,
Whose harbinger's already in your face
We see preparing: or some discontent,
Which if it lye in this house, I dare say
Both for this noble Gentleman, and all
That live within it, shall as readily
Be purg'd away, and with as much care soften'd,
And where the cause is.

Fra. 'Tis a joy to be ill,
Where such a vertuous fair Physitian
Is ready to relieve: your noble cares
I must, and ever shall be thankfull for,
And would my service (I dare not look upon her)
But be not fearfull, I feel nothing dangerous,
A grudging caus'd by th' alteration
Of air, may hang upon me: my heart's whole,
(I would it were.)

Val. I knew the cause to be so.

Fra. No, you shall never know it.

Alice. Some warm broths
To purge the blood, and keep your bed a day Sir,

And sweat it out.

Cel. I have such cordials,
That if you will but promise me to take 'em,
Indeed you shall be well, and very quickly,
I'le be your Doctor, you shall see how finely
I'le fetch ye up again.

Val. He sweats extremly:
Hot, very hot: his pulse beats like a drum now,
Feel Sister, feel, feel sweet.

Fra. How that touch stung me?

Val. My gown there.

Cel. And those julips in the window.

Alice. Some see his bed made.

Val. This is most unhappy,
Take courage man; 'tis nothing but an ague.

Cel. And this shall be the last fit.

Fra. Not by thousands:

Now what 'tis to be truly miserable,
I feel at full experience.

Alice. He grows fainter.

Val. Come, lead him in, he shall to bed: a vomit,
I'le have a vomit for him.

Alice. A purge first,
And if he breath'd a vein.

Val. No, no, no bleeding,
A Clyster will cool all.

Cel. Be of good cheer Sir.

Alice. He's loth to speak.

Cel. How hard he holds my hand aunt?

Alice. I do not like that sign.

Val. Away to's chamber,
Softly, he's full of pain, be diligent
With all the care ye have: would I had scus'd him.

[Exeunt.

SCENA II.

Enter Dorothea, and Thomas.

Dor. Why do you rail at me? do I dwell in her
To force her to do this or that? your letter,
A wilde-fire on your letter; your sweet Letter;
You are so learned in your writs: ye stand now
As if ye had worried sheep: you must turn tippet,
And suddenly, and truly, and discreetly
Put on the shape of order and humanity,
Or you must marry Malkyn the May Lady:
You must, dear Brother: do you make me carrier
Of your confound-mee's, and your culverings?
Am I a seemly agent for your oaths?
Who would have writ such a debosh'd?

Thom. Your patience,
May not a man profess his love?

Dor. In blasphemies?
Rack a maids tender ears, with dam's and Devils?

Thom. Out, out upon thee,
How would you have me write?
Begin with my love premised? surely,
And by my truly Mistrefs.

Dor. Take your own course,
For I see all persuasion's lost upon ye:
Humanitie, all drown'd: from this hour fairly
I'le wash my hands of all ye do: farewell Sir.

Tho. Thou art not mad?

Dor. No, if I were, dear Brother
I would keep you company: get a new Mistrefs
Some suburb Saint, that six pence, and some others
Will draw to parley: carowse her health in Cans
And candles ends, and quarrel for her beauty,
Such a sweet heart must serve your turn: your old love
Releaseth ye of all your tyes; disclaims ye
And utterly abjures your memory
Till time has better manag'd ye, will ye command me—

Thom. What, bob'd of all sides?

Dor. Any worthy service

Unto my Father Sir, that I may tell him
 Even to his peace of heart, and much rejoicing
 Ye are his true Son Tom still? will it please ye
 To beat some half a dozen of his servants presently,
 That I may testify you have brought the same faith
 Unblemish'd home, ye carried out? or if it like you
 There be two chambermaids within, young wenches,
 Handfom and apt for exercise: you have been good, Sir,
 And charitable though I say it Signiour
 To such poor orphans: and now, by th' way I think on't
 Your young rear Admiral, I mean your last bastard
Don John, ye had by Lady Blanch the Dairy Maid,
 Is by an Academy of learned Gypsies,
 Foreseeing some strange wonder in the infant
 Stolen from the Nurse, and wanders with those Prophets.
 There is plate in the parlour, and good store Sir,
 When your wants shall supply it. So most humbly
 (First rendring my due service) I take leave Sir. [Exit.]

Tho. Why Doll, why Doll I say: my letter sub'd too,
 And no access without I mend my manners?
 All my designs in Limbo? I will have her,
 Yes, I will have her, though the Devil roar,
 I am resolv'd that, if she live above ground,
 I'll not be bob'd i'th' nose with every bobtail:
 I will be civil too, now I think better,
 Exceeding civil, wondrous finely carried:
 And yet be mad upon occasion,
 And stark mad too, and save my land: my Father,
 I'll have my will of him, how e're my wench goes. [Exit.]

Enter Sebastian, and Launcelot.

Seb. Sirrah, I say still you have spoil'd your Master: leave
 I say thou hast spoil'd thy Master. (your stitches:)

Lau. I say how Sir?

Seb. Marry thou hast taught him like an arrant rascal,
 First to read perfectly: which on my blessing
 I warn'd him from: for I knew if he read once,
 He was a lost man. Secondly, Sir Launcelot,
 Sir lowsie Launcelot, ye have suffer'd him
 Against my power first, then against my precept,
 To keep that simpring sort of people company,
 That sober men call civil: mark ye that Sir?

Lau. And't please your worship.

Seb. It does not please my worship,
 Nor shall not please my worship: thirdly and lastly,
 Which if the law were here, I would hang thee for,
 (However I will lame thee) like a villain,
 Thou hast wrought him
 Clean to forget what 'tis to do a mischief,
 A handfom mischief, such as thou knew'st I lov'd well.
 My servants all are sound now, my drink sower'd,
 Not a horse pawn'd, nor plaid away: no warrants
 Come for the breach of peace.
 Men travel with their mony, and nothing meets 'em:
 I was accurs'd to send thee, thou wert ever
 Leaning to laziness, and loss of spirit,
 Thou slept'st still like a cork upon the water.

Lau. Your worship knows, I ever was accounted
 The most debosh'd, and please you to remember,
 Every day drunk too, for your worships credit,
 I broke the Butlers head too.

Seb. No, base Palliard,
 I do remember yet that anslaight, thou wast beaten,
 And fledst before the Butler; a black jack
 Playing upon thee furiously, I saw it:
 I saw thee scatter'd rogue, behold thy Master.

Enter Thomas, with a Book.

Thom. What sweet content dwells here!

Lau. Put up your Book Sir,
 We are all undone else.

Seb. Tom, when is the horse-race?

Thom. I know not Sir.

Seb. You will be there?

Tho. Not I Sir,
 I have forgot those journeys.

Seb. Spoil'd for ever.

The Cocking holds at Derby, and there will be Jack Wild-oats, and Will Purfer.

Tho. I am sorry, Sir,
 They should employ their time so slenderly,
 Their understandings will bear better courses.

Seb. Yes, I will marry again: but Monsieur Thomas,
 What say ye to the Gentleman that challeng'd ye
 Before he went, and the fellow ye fell out with?

Tho. O good Sir,
 Remember not those follies; where I have wrong'd, Sir,
 (So much I have now learn'd to discern my self)
 My means, and my repentance shall make even,
 Nor do I think it any imputation
 To let the Law perswade me.

Seb. Any Woman:

I care not of what colour, or complexion,
 Any that can bear Children: rest ye merry. [Exit.]

La. Ye have utterly undone; clean discharg'd me,
 I am for the ragged Regiment.

Tho. Eight languages,
 And wither at an old mans words?

La. O pardon me.

I know him but too well: eightscore I take it
 Will not keep me from beating, if not killing:
 I'll give him leave to break a leg, and thank him:
 You might have sav'd all this, and sworn a little:
 What had an oath or two been? or a head broke,
 Though 'thad been mine, to have satisfied the old man?

Tho. I'll break it yet.

La. Now 'tis too late, I take it:
 Will ye be drunk to night, (a less intreaty
 Has serv'd your turn) and save all yet? not mad drunk,
 For then ye are the Devil, yet the drunker,
 The better for your Father still: your state is desperate,
 And with a desperate cure ye must recover it:
 Do something, do Sir: do some drunken thing,
 Some mad thing, or some any thing to help us.

Tho. Go for a Fidler then: the poor old Fidler
 That sayes his Songs: but first where lyes my Mistris,
 Did ye enquire out that?

La. I'th' Lodge, alone Sir,
 None but her own Attendants.

Tho. 'Tis the happier:
 Away then, find this Fidler, and do not mis me
 By nine a Clock.

La. Via.

Tho. My Father's mad now,
 And ten to one will disinherite me:
 I'll put him to his plunge, and yet be merry.
 What Ribabald?

Enter Hylas and Sam.

Hyl. Don Thomasio.
De bene venew.

Tho. I do embrace your body:
 How do'st thou Sam?

Sam. The same Sam still: your friend Sir.

Tho. And how is't bouncing boyes?

Hyl. Thou art not alter'd,
 They said thou wert all Monsieur.

Tho. O believe it,
 I am much alter'd, much another way:
 The civil'st Gentleman in all your Country:
 Do not ye see me alter'd? yea, and nay Gentlemen,
 A much converted man: where's the best wine boyes?

Hyl. A sound Convertite.

Tho. What, hast thou made up twenty yet?

Hyl. By'r Lady,
 I have giv'n a shrewd push at it, for as I take it,
 The last I fell in love with, scor'd sixteen.

Tho. Look to your skin, Rambaldo the sleeping Gyant

Will rowze and rent thee piece-meal.

Sam. He ne'r perceives 'em
Longer than looking on.

Thom. Thou never meanest then
To marry any that thou lov'st?

Hyl. No surely,
Nor any wife man I think; marriage?
Would you have me now begin to be prentice,
And learn to cobble other mens old Boots?

Sam. Why, you may take a Maid.

Hyl. Where? can you tell me?
Or if 'twere possible I might get a Maid,
To what use should I put her? look upon her,
Dandle her upon my knee, and give her sugar-sops?
All the new Gowns i'th' Parish will not please her,
If she be high bred, for there's the sport she aims at,
Nor all the feathers in the Fryars.

Thom. Then take a Widow,
A good stanch wench, that's tith.

Hyl. And begin a new order,
Live in a dead mans monument, not I, Sir;
I'll keep mine own road, a true mendicant;
What pleasure this day yields me, I never covet
To lay up for the morrow; and methinks ever
Another mans Cook dresses my diet neatest. (nosed,

Thom. Thou wast wont to love old women, fat and flat
And thou would'st say they kifs'd like Flounders, flat
All the face over.

Hyl. I have had such damfels
I must confes.

Thom. Thou hast been a precious Rogue.

Sam. Only his eyes; and o' my Conscience
They lye with half the Kingdom.

[Enter over the Stage, Physicians and others.

Thom. What's the matter?
Whither go all these men-menders, these Physicians?
Whose Dog lies sick o'th' mulligrubs?

Sam. O the Gentleman,
The young smug Seignour, Master Valentine,
Brought out of travel with him, as I hear,
Is faln sick o'th' sudder, desperate sick,
And likely they go thither.

Thom. Who? young Frank?
The only temper'd spirit, Scholar, Souldier,
Courtier; and all in one piece? 'tis not possible.

Enter Alice.

Sam. There's one can better fatisfie you.

Thom. Mistres Alice,
I joy to see you, Lady.

Alice. Good Monsieur Thomas,
You're welcome from your travel; I am hasty,
A Gentleman lyes sick, Sir.

Thom. And how dost thou?
I must know, and I will know.

Alice. Excellent well,
As well as may be, thank ye.

Thom. I am glad on't,
And prithee hark.

Alice. I cannot stay.

Thom. A while, Alice. (still.

Sam. Never look so narrowly, the mark's in her mouth

Hyl. I am looking at her legs, prithee be quiet.

Alice. I cannot stay.

Thom. O sweet Alice.
Hyl. A clean instep,
And that I love a life, I did not mark
This woman half so well before, how quick
And nimble like a shadow, there her leg shew'd;
Byt' mafs a neat one, the colour of her Stocking,
A much inviting colour.

Alice. My good Monsieur,
I have no time to talk now.

Hyl. Pretty Breeches,

Finely becoming too.

Thom. By Heaven.

Alice. She will not,
I can assure you that, and so.

Thom. But this word.

Alice. I cannot, nor I will not, good Lord. [Exit.

Hyl. Well, you shall hear more from me.

Thom. We'll go visit,
'Tis Charity; besides, I know she is there;
And under visitation I shall see her;

Will ye along?

Hyl. By any means.

Thom. Be sure then
I be a civil man: I have sport in hand, Boys,
Shall make mirth for a Marriage-day.

Hyl. Away then. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.

Enter three Physicians with an Urinal.

1 Phy. A Pleurisie, I see it.

2 Phy. I rather hold it

For tremor Cordis.

3 Phy. Do you mark the Faces?

'Tis a most pestilent contagious Feaver,
A surfeit, a plaguey surfeit; he must bleed.

1 Phy. By no means.

3 Phy. I say bleed.

1 Phy. I say 'tis dangerous;

The Person being spent so much before-hand,
And Nature drawn so low, Clysters, cool Clysters.

2 Phy. Now with your favours I should think a Vomit:
For take away the Cause, the Effect must follow,
The Stomach's foul and fur'd, the pot's unflam'd yet.

3 Phy. No, no, we'll rectifie that part by mild means,
Nature so sunk must find no violence.

Enter a Servant.

Serv. Will't please ye draw near? the weak Gentleman
Grows worse and worse still.

1 Phy. Come, we will attend him.

2 Phy. He shall do well, my friend.

Serv. My Masters love, Sir.

1 Excellent well I warrant thee, right and straight, friend.

3 Phy. There's no doubt in him, none at all, ne'r fear him. [Exeunt.

SCENE IV.

Enter Valentine, and Michael.

Mich. That he is desperate sick I do believe well;
And that without a speedy cure it kills him,
But that it lyes within the help of Physick
Now to restore his health, or art to cure him;
Believe it you are cozen'd; clean beside it.
I would tell ye the true cause too, but 'twould vex ye;
Nay, run ye mad.

Val. May all I have restore him?
So dearly and so tenderly I love him,
I do not know the cause why, yea my life too.

Mich. Now I perceive ye so well set, I'll tell you,
Hei mihi quod nullis Amor est medicabilis herbis.

Val. 'Twas that I only fear'd: good friend go from me,
I find my heart too full for further conference;
You are assur'd of this?

Mich. 'Twill prove too certain,
But bear it nobly; Sir, Youth hath his errors.

Val. I shall do, and I thank ye; pray ye no words on't.

Mich. I do not use to talk; Sir. [Exit.

Val. Ye are welcome;

Is there no Constancy in earthly things,
Nor happiness in us, but what must alter?
No life without the heavy load of Fortune?
What miseries we are, and to our selves,

Even then when full content seems to sit by us,
What daily fores and sorrows ?

Enter Alice.

Alice. O dear Brother,
The Gentleman if ever you will see him
Alive as I think.

Enter Cellide.

Cel. O he faints, for Heavens sake,
For Heavens sake, Sir.

Val. Go comfort him, dear Sister. [Exit Alice.]
And one word, sweet, with you : then we'll go to him.
What think you of this Gentleman ?

Cel. My pity thinks, Sir,
'Tis great misfortune that he should thus perish.

Val. It is indeed, but Cellide, he must dye.

Cel. That were a cruelty, when care may cure him,
Why do you weep so, Sir ? he may recover.

Val. He may, but with much danger ; my sweet Cellide,
You have a powerful tongue.

Cel. To do you service.

Val. I will betray his grief ; he loves a Gentlewoman,
A friend of yours, whose heart another holds,
He knows it too ; yet such a sway blind fancy,
And his not daring to deliver it,
Have won upon him, that they must undo him :
Never so hopeful and so sweet a Spirit,
Misfortune fell so foul on.

Cel. Sure she's hard hearted,
That can look on, and not relent, and deeply
At such a misery ; she is not married ?

Val. Not yet.

Cel. Nor near it ?

Val. When she please.

Cel. And pray Sir,
Does he deserve her truly, that she loves so ?

Val. His love may merit much, his Person little,
For there the match lyes mangled.

Cel. Is he your friend ?

Val. He should be, for he is near me.

Cel. Will not he dye then,
When th'other shall recover ?

Val. Ye have pos'd me.

Cel. Methinks he should go near it, if he love her ;
If she love him.

Val. She does, and would do equal.

Cel. 'Tis a hard task you put me ; yet for your sake
I will speak to her, all the art I have ;
My best endeavours ; all his Youth and Person,
His mind more full of beauty ; all his hopes
The memory of such a sad example,
Ill spoken of, and never old ; the curses
Of loving maids, and what may be alledg'd
I'll lay before her : what's her Name ? I am ready.

Val. But will you deal effectually ?

Cel. Most truly ;

Nay, were it my self, at your entreaty.

Val. And could ye be so pitiful ?

Cel. So dutiful ;
Because you urge it, Sir.

Val. It may be then
It is your self.

Cel. It is indeed, I know it,
And now know how ye love me.

Val. O my dearest,
Let but your goodness judge ; your own part's pity ;
Set but your eyes on his afflictions ;
He is mine, and so becomes your charge : but think
What ruine Nature suffers in this young man,
What less humanity, and noble manhood ;
Take to your better judgment my declining,
My Age hung full of impotence, and ills,
My Body budding now no more : see Winter

Hath seal'd that sap up, at the best and happiest
I can but be your infant, you my Nurse,
And how unequal dearest ; where his years,
His sweetness, and his ever spring of goodness,
My fortunes growing in him, and my self too,
Which makes him all your old love ; misconceive not,
I say not this as weary of my bondage,
Or ready to infringe my faith ; bear witness,
Those eyes that I adore still, those lamps that light me
To all the joy I have.

Cel. You have said enough, Sir,
And more than e'r I thought that tongue could utter,
But you are a man, a false man too.

Val. Dear Cellide.

Cel. And now, to shew you that I am a woman
Rob'd of her rest, and fool'd out of her fondness,
The Gentleman shall live, and if he love me,
Ye shall be both my triumphs ; I will to him,
And as you carelessly fling off your fortune,
And now grow weary of my easie winning,
So will I lose the name of Valentine,
From henceforth all his flatteries, and believe it,
Since ye have so slightly parted with affection,
And that affection you have pawn'd your faith for ;
From this hour no repentance, vows, nor prayers
Shall pluck me back again ; what I shall do,
Yet I will undertake his cure, expect it,
Shall minister no comfort, no content
To either of ye, but hourly more vexations.

Val. Why, let him dye then.

Cel. No, so much I have loved
To be commanded by you, that even now,
Even in my hate, I will obey your wishes.

Val. What shall I do ?

Cel. Dye like a fool unforrow'd,
A bankrupt fool, that flings away his Treasure ;
I must begin my cure.

Val. And I my Crosses.

[Exeunt.]

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter Frank sick, Physicians, and an Apothecary.

1 Phy. Clap on the Cataplasim.
Frank. Good Gentlemen,
Good learned Gentlemen.

2 Phy. And see these broths there,
Ready within this hour, pray keep your arms in,
The air is raw, and ministers much evil.

Fran. Pray leave me ; I beseech ye leave me, Gentlemen,
I have no other sickness but your presence,
Convey your Cataplasms to those that need 'em,
Your Vomits, and your Clysters.

3 Phy. Pray be rul'd, Sir.

1 Phy. Bring in the Lettice Cap ; you must be shaved, Sir,
And then how suddenly we'll make you sleep !

Frank. Till dooms-day : what unnecessary nothings
Are these about a wounded mind ?

2 Phy. How do ye ?

Fra. What questions they propound too ! how do you, Sir ?
I am glad to see you well.

3 Phy. A great distemper, it grows hotter still.

1 Phy. Open your mouth, I pray, Sir.

Frank. And can you tell me
How old I am then ? there's my hand, pray shew me
How many broken shins within this two year.
Who would be thus in fetters, good master Doctor,
And you dear Doctor, and the third sweet Doctor,
And precious master Apothecary, I do pray ye
To give me leave to live a little longer,
Ye stand before me like my Blacks.

2 Phy. 'Tis dangerous,
For now his fancy turns too.

Enter

Enter Cellide.

Cell. By your leave Gentlemen :
And pray ye your leave a while too, I have ſomething
Of ſecret to impart unto the Patient.

1. With all our hearts.

3 I mary ſuch a Phyſick

May chance to find the humour : be not long Lady,
For we muſt miniſter within this half hour. [Ex. Phyſ.]

Cell. You ſhall not ſtay for me.

Fra. Would you were all rotten

That ye might only intend one anothers itches :
Or would the Gentlemen with one conſent
Would drink ſmall Beer but ſeven years, and abolifh
That wild fire of the blood, unfatiate wenching,
That your two Indies, ſprings and falls might fail ye,
What torments theſe intruders into bodies.

Cell. How do you worthy Sir?

Fran. Bleſs me, what beams

Flew from theſe Angel eyes! O what a miſery
What a moſt ſtudied torment 'tis to me now
To be an honeſt man! dare ye ſit by me?

Cell. Yes, and do more than that too: comfort ye,
I ſee ye have need.

Fran. You are a fair Phyſician:

You bring no bitterneſs guilt o're, to gull us,
No danger in your looks, yet there my death lyes.

Cell. I would be ſorry, Sir, my charity
And my good wiſhes for your health ſhould merit
So ſtubborn a conſtruction: will it pleaſe ye
To taſte a little of this Cordial

Enter Valentine.

For this I think muſt cure ye.

Fra. Of which Lady?

Sure ſhe has found my grief: why do you bluſh ſo?

Cell. Do you not underſtand? of this, this Cordial.

Val. O my afflicted heart: ſhe is gone for ever.

Fra. What heaven have ye brought me Lady?

Cell. Do not wonder:

For 'tis no impudence, nor want of honour
Makes me do this: but love to ſave your life, Sir,
Your life too excellent to loſe in wiſhes,
Love, vertuous love.

Fra. A vertuous bleſſing crown ye,
O goodly ſweet, can there be ſo much charity
So noble a compaſſion in that heart
That's fill'd up with anothers fair affections?
Can mercy drop from thoſe eyes?

Can miracles be wrought upon a dead man,
When all the power ye have, and perfect object
Lyes in anothers light, and his deſerves it?

Cell. Do not deſpair: nor do not think too boldly,
I dare abuſe my promiſe, 'twas your friends
And ſo faſt tyed, I thought no time could ruin:
But ſo much has your danger, and that ſpell
The powerful name of friend, prevail'd above him
To whom I ever owe obedience,
That here I am, by his command to cure ye,
Nay more for ever, by his full reſignment,
And willingly I ratifie it.

Fra. Hold for Heaven ſake,

Muſt my friends miſery make me a triumph?

Bear I that noble name, to be a Traitor?

O vertuous goodneſs, keep thy ſelf untainted:

You have no power to yield, nor he to render,
Nor I to take: I am reſolv'd to die firſt.

Val. Ha! ſaiſt thou ſo? nay then thou ſhalt not periſh.

Fra. And though I love ye above the light ſhines on me,
Beyond the wealth of Kingdoms, free content,
Sooner would ſnatch at ſuch a bleſſing offer'd
Than at my pardon'd life by the law forfeited,
Yet, yet O noble Beauty, yet O Paradife
For you are all the wonder reveal'd of it,

Yet is a gratitude to be preſerv'd,
A worthy gratitude to one moſt worthy
The name, and nobleneſs of friends.

Cell. Pray tell me

If I had never known that Gentleman,
Would not you willingly embrace my offer?

Fra. Do you make a doubt?

Cell. And can ye be unwilling

He being old and impotent? his aim too
Level'd at you, for your good? not conſtrain'd,
But out of cure, and counſel? Alas conſider,
Play but the Woman with me, and conſider
As he himſelf does, and I now dare ſee it;
Truly conſider, Sir, what miſery.

Fra. For vertues ſake take heed!

Cell. What loſs of youth,

What everlaſting baniſhment from that
Our years do only covet to arrive at,
Equal affections and ſhot together:
What living name can dead age leave behind him,
What art of memory but fruitleſs doating?

Fra. This cannot be.

Cell. To you unleſs ye apply it

With more and firmer faith, and ſo digeſt it,
I ſpeak but of things poſſible, not done
Nor like to be, a Poſſet cures your ſickneſs,
And yet I know ye grieve this; and howſoever
The worthineſs of friend may make ye ſtagger,
Which is a fair thing in ye, yet my Patient,
My gentle Patient, I would fain ſay more
If you would underſtand.

Val. O cruel Woman.

Cell. Yet ſure your ſickneſs is not ſo forgetful,
Nor you ſo willing to be loſt.

Fra. Pray ſtay there:

Me thinks you are not fair now; me thinks more,
That modeſt vertue, men delivered of you,
Shews but like ſhadow to me, thin, and fading.

Val. Excellent friend.

Fra. Ye have no ſhare in goodneſs:

Ye are belyed; you are not Cellide,
The modeſt, immaculate: who are ye?
For I will know: what Devil, to do miſchief
Unto my vertuous friend, hath ſhifted ſhapes
With that unblemifhed beauty?

Cell. Do not rave, Sir,

Nor let the violence of thoughts diſtract ye;
You ſhall enjoy me: I am yours: I pity,
By thoſe fair eyes I do.

Fra. O double hearted!

O Woman, perfect Woman! what diſtraction
Was meant to mankind when thou waſ't made a Devil?
What an inviting Hell invented? tell me,
And if you yet remember what is goodneſs,
Tell me by that, and truth, can one ſo cheriſh'd
So fainted in the ſoul of him, whoſe ſervice
Is almoſt turn'd to ſuperſtition,
Whoſe every day endeavours and deſires
Offer themſelves like Incenſe on your Altar,
Whoſe heart holds no intelligence, but holy
And moſt Religious with his love; whoſe life
(And let it ever be remembred Lady)
Is drawn out only for your ends.

Val. O miracle!

Fra. Whoſe all, and every part of man: pray make me
Like ready Pages wait upon your pleaſures;
Whoſe breath is but your bubble. Can ye, dare ye,
Muſt ye caſt off this man, though he were willing,
Though in a nobleneſs, ſo croſs my danger
His frienſhip durſt confirm it, without baſeneſs,
Without the ſtain of honour? ſhall not people
Say liberally hereafter, there's the Lady
That loſt her Father, friend, herſelf, her faith too,
To fawn upon a ſtranger, for ought you know

As faithless as your self, in love as fruitless.

Val. Take her with all my heart, thou art so honest
That 'tis most necessary I be undone.

Call. With all my soul possess her. [Exit Val.]

Till this minute,
I scorn'd, and hated ye, and came to cozen ye :
Utter'd those things might draw a wonder on me,
To make ye mad.

Fra. Good Heaven, what is this Woman ?

Call. Nor did your danger, but in charity,
Move me a whit : nor you appear unto me
More than a common object ; yet now truly,
Truly, and nobly I do love ye dearly,
And from this hour ye are the man I honour,
You are the man, the excellence, the honesty,
The only friend, and I am glad your sickness
Fell so most happily at this time on ye,
To make this truth the worlds.

Fra. Whither do you drive me ?

Call. Back to your honesty, make that good ever,
'Tis like a strong built Castle, seated high,
That draws on all ambitions, still repair it,
Still fortifie it : there are thousand foes
Besides the Tyrant Beauty, will assail it :
Look to your Centinels that watch it hourly,
Your eyes, let them not wander.

Fra. Is this serious ?

Or dos the play still with me ?

Call. Keep your ears,
The two main Ports that may betray ye, strongly
From light belief first, then from flattery,
Especially where Woman beats the parley :
The body of your strength, your noble heart
From ever yielding to dishonest ends,
Rig'd round about with virtue, that no breaches,
No subtil minds may meet ye.

Fra. How like the Sun
Labouring in his Eclipse, dark, and prodigious,
She shew'd till now ? when having won her way,
How full of wonder he breaks out again,
And sheds his vertuous beams : excellent Angel,
For no less can that heavenly mind proclaim thee,
Honour of all thy sex, let it be lawful,
And like a Pilgrim thus I kneel to beg it,
Not with prophane lips now, nor burnt affections,
But, reconcil'd to faith, with holy wishes,
To kiss that virgin hand.

Cl. Take your desire, Sir,
And in a nobler way, for I dare trust ye,
No other fruit my love must ever yield ye,
I fear no more : yet your most constant memory
(So much I am wedded to that worthiness)
Shall ever be my Friend, Companion, Husband.
Farewel, and fairly govern your affections,
Stand, and deceive me not : O noble young man,
I love thee with my soul, but dare not say it :
Once more farewel, and prosper.

Fra. Goodness guide thee :
My wonder like to fearful shapes in dreams,
Has wakened me out of my fit of folly,
But not to shake it off : a spell dwells in me,
A hidden charm shot from this beauteous Woman,
That fate can ne'r avoid, nor Physick find,
And by her counsel strengthen'd : only this
Is all the help I have, I love fair virtue.
Well, something I must do, to be a friend,
Yet I am poor, and tardy : something for her too
Though I can never reach her excellence,
Yet but to give an offer at a greatness.

Enter Valentine, Thomas, Hylas, and Sam.

Val. Be not uncivil Tom, and take your pleasure.
Tho. Do you think I am mad ? you'll give me leave
To try her fairly ?

Val. Do your best.

Tho. Why there Boy,
But where's the sick man ?

Hyl. Where are the Gentlewomen
That should attend him ? there's the Patient.
Me thinks these Women——

Tho. Thou think'st nothing else.

Val. Go to him friend, and comfort him : I'll lead ye :
O my best joy, my worthiest friend, pray pardon me,
I am so over-joy'd I want expression :
I may live to be thankful : bid your friends welcome.

Tho. How do'st thou Frank ? how do'st thou Boy ? bear
What, shrink i'th' sinews for a little sickness ? (up man :
Deavolo morte.

Fra. I am o'th' mending hand. (man ?

Tho. How like a Flute thou speak'st : o'th' mending hand
Gogs bores, I am well, speak like a man of worship.

Fran. Thou art a mad companion : never staid Tom.

Tho. Let Rogues be staid that have no habitation,
A Gentleman may wander : sit thee down Frank,
And see what I have brought thee : come discover,
Open the Scene, and let the work appear.
A friend at need you Rogue is worth a million.

Fra. What hast thou there, a julip ?

Hyl. He must not touch it,

'Tis present death.

Tho. Ye are an Ass, a wirepipe,
A Jeffery John bo peepe, thou mimifer,
Thou mend a left-handed pack-saddle, out puppyey,
My friend Frank, but a very foolish fellow :
Do'st thou see that Bottle ? view it well.

Fran. I do Tom.

Tho. There be as many lives in't, as a Cat carries,
'Tis everlasting liquor.

Fran. What ?

Tho. Old Sack, Boy,
Old reverend Sack, which for ought that I can read yet,
Was that Philosophers Stone the wife King Ptolomus
Did all his wonders by.

Fran. I see no harm Tom,

Drink with a moderation.

Tho. Drink with fuger,
Which I have ready here, and here a glass boy,
Take me without my tools.

Sam. Pray Sir be temperate,

You know your own state best.

Fra. Sir, I much thank ye,
And shall be careful : yet a glass or two
So fit I find my body, and that so needful.

Tho. Fill it, and leave your fooling : thou say'st true Frank.

Hyl. Where are these Women I say ?

Tho. 'Tis most necessary,
Hang up your Julips and your Portugal Possets,
Your barley Broths, and sorrel Sops, they are mangy,
And breed the Scratches only : give me Sack :
I wonder where this Wench is though : have at thee.

Hyl. So long, and yet no bolting ?

Fra. Do, I'll pledge thee. (man

Tho. Take it off thrice, and then cry heigh like a Hunt-
With a clear heart, and no more fits I warrant thee.

The only Cordial, Frank. [Phys. and Serv. within.]

Phys. Are the things ready ?

And is the Barber come ?

Ser. An hour ago, Sir.

Phys. Bring out the Oyls then.

Fran. Now or never Gentlemen,

Do me a kindness and deliver me.

Tho. From whom boy ?

Fra. From these things, that talk within there,
Physicians, Tom, Physicians, scowring-sticks,
They mean to read upon me.

Enter three Phys. Apoth. and Barber.

Hyl. Let 'em enter.

Tho. And be thou confident, we will deliver thee :
For look ye Doctor, say the Devil were sick now,
His horns saw'd off, and his head bound with a Biggin,
Sick of a Calenture, taken by a Surfeit
Of stinking souls at his Nephews, and St Dunstons,
What would you minister upon the fudden ?
Your judgment short and found.

1 Phy. A fools head.

Tho. No Sir,

It must be a Physicians for three causes,
The first because it is a bald-head likely,
Which will down easily without Applepap.

3 Phy. A main cause.

Tho. So it is, and well consider'd.

The second, for 'tis fill'd with broken Greek, Sir,
Which will so tumble in his stomach, Doctor,
And work upon the crudities, conceive me,
The fears, and the fiddle-strings within it,
That those damn'd souls must disembogue again.

Hyl. Or meeting with the Itygian humour.

Tho. Right, Sir.

Hyl. Forc'd with a Cataplasm of Crackers.

Tho. Ever.

Hyl. Scowre all before him, like a Scavenger.

Tom. Satisficisti domine, my last cause,
My last is, and not least, most learned Doctors,
Because in most Physicians heads (I mean those
That are most excellent, and old withal,
And angry, though a Patient say his prayers,
And Paracelsians that do trade with poisons,
We have it by tradition of great writers)
There is a kind of Toad-stone bred, whose vertue
The Doctor being dri'd.

1 Phy. We are abus'd sirs.

Hyl. I take it so, or shall be, for say the Belly-ake
Caus'd by an inundation of Pease-porridge,
Are we therefore to open the port Vein,
Or the port Esquiline ?

Sam. A learned question :

Or grant the Diaphragma by a Rupture,
The sign being then in the head of Capricorn.

Tho. Meet with the passion Hyperchondriaca,
And so cause a Carnosity in the Kidneys.
Must not the brains, being butter'd with this humour—
Answer me that.

Sam. Most excellently argued.

2 Phy. The next fit you will have, my most fine Scholar,
Bedlam shall find a Salve for : fare ye well Sir,
We came to do you good, but these young Doctors
It seems have bor'd our Noses.

3 Phy. Drink hard Gentlemen,

And get unwholesome drabs : 'tis ten to one then
We shall hear further from ye, your note alter'd. [Exeunt.]

Tho. And wilt thou be gone, saies one ?

Hyl. And wilt thou be gone, saies t'other ?

Tho. Then take the odd crown

To mend thy old Gown.

Sam. And we'll be gone all together.

Fra. My learned Tom.

Enter Servant.

Ser. Sir, the young Gentlewomen
Sent me to see what company ye had with ye,
They much desire to visit ye.

Fra. Pray ye thank 'em,
And tell 'em my most sickness is their absence :
Ye see my company.

Tho. Come hither Crab,
What Gentlewomen are these? my Mistris?

Ser. Yes Sir.

Hyl. And who else ?

Ser. Mistris Alice.

Hyl. Oh!

Tho. Hark ye firrah,
No word of my being here, unless she know it.

Ser. I do not think she does.

Tho. Take that, and mum then.

Ser. You have ty'd my tongue up.

Tho. Sit you down good Francis,
And not a word of me till ye hear from me,
And as you find my humour, follow it :
You two come hither, and stand close, unseen Boys,
And do as I shall tutor ye.

Fran. What, new work ?

Tho. Prethee no more but help me now.

Hyl. I would fain talk

With the Gentlewomen.

Tho. Talk with the Gentlewomen ?

Of what forsooth ? whose Maiden-head the last Mask
Suffer'th' impression ? or whose Clyster wrought best ?
Take me as I shall tell thee.

Hyl. To what end ?

What other end came we along ?

Sam. Be rul'd though.

Tho. Your weafel face must needs be ferretting

About the Farthing-ale ;

Do as I bid ye,

Or by this light—

Hyl. Come then.

Thom. Stand close and mark me.

Fran. All this forc'd foolery will never do it.

Enter Alice and Mary.

Ali. I hope we bring ye health, Sir : how is't with ye ?

Ma. You look far better trust me, the fresh colour
Creeps now again into his cheeks.

Ali. Your enemy

I see has done his worst. Come, we must have ye
Lusty again, and frolick man; leave thinking.

Ma. Indeed it does ye harm, Sir.

Fran. My best visitants,
I shall be govern'd by ye.

Ali. You shall be well then,

And suddenly, and soundly well.

Ma. This Air, Sir,

Having now season'd ye, will keep ye ever.

Tho. No, no, I have no hope, nor is it fit friends,
My life has been so lewd, my loose condition,
Which I repent too late, so lamentable,
That any thing but curses light upon me,
Exorbitant in all my wayes.

Ali. Who's that, Sir,

Another sick man ?

Ma. Sure I know that voice well.

Tho. In all my courses, careless disobedience.

Fran. What a strange fellow's this ?

Tho. No counsel friends,
No look before I leapt.

Ali. Do you know the voyce, Sir ?

Fra. Yes, 'tis a Gentlemans that's much afflicted
In's mind : great pity Ladies.

Ali. Now heaven help him.

Fra. He came to me, to ask free pardon of me,
For some things done long since, which his distemper
Made to appear like wrong, but 'twas not so.

Ma. O that this could be truth.

Hyl. Perfwade your self.

Tho. To what end Gentlemen, when all is perish'd
Upon a wrack, is there a hope remaining ?

The Sea, that ne'r knew sorrow, may be pitiful,
My credit's split, and sunk, nor is it possible,
Were my life lengthened out as long as—

Ma. I like this well.

Sam. Your mind is too mistrustful.

Tho. I have a virtuous Mistris, but I scorn'd her,

A Mistris too, a noble Gentlewoman,
For goodness all out going.

Alice. Now I know him.

Tho. With these eyes friends, my eyes must never see more.

Alice. This is for your sake Mary: take heed Cousin,
A man is not so soon made.

Tho. O my fortune!

But it is just, I be despis'd and hated.

Hyl. Despair not, 'tis not manly: one hours goodness
Strikes off an infinite of ills.

Alice. Weep truly
And with compassion, Cousin.

Fra. How exactly
This cunning young Thief playes his part!

Ma. Well Tom,
My Tom again, if this be truth.

Hyl. She weeps Boy.

Tho. O I shall die.

Ma. Now Heaven defend.

Sam. Thou hast her.

Tho. Come lead me to my Friend to take his farewell,
And then what fortune shall befall me, welcome,
How does it show?

Hyl. O rarely well.

Ma. Say you so, Sir.

Fra. O ye grand Afs.

Ma. And are ye there my Juggler?
Away we are abus'd, Alice.

Alice. Fool be with thee. [Ex. Mary and Alice.]

Tho. Where is she?

Fra. Gone; she found you out, and finely,
In your own noose she halter'd ye: you must be whispering
To know how things shew'd: not content to fare well
But you must roar out roast-meat; till that suspicion
You carried it most neatly, she believed too
And wept most tenderly; had you continu'd,
Without doubt you had brought her off.

Tho. This was thy Roguing,
For thou wert ever whispering: fye upon thee
Now could I break thy head.

Hyl. You spoke to me first.

Tho. Do not anger me,
For by this hand I'll beat the buzard blind then.
She shall not scape me thus: farewell for this time.

Fra. Good night, 'tis almost bed time: yet no sleep
Must enter these, till I work a wonder. [Exit.]

Tho. Thou shalt along too, for I mean to plague thee
For this nights sins, I will never leave walking of thee
Till I have worn thee out.

Hyl. Your will be done, Sir.

Tho. You will not leave me, Sam.

Sam. Not I.

Tho. Away then: I'll be your guide now, if my man be trusty,
My spiteful Dame, I'll pipe ye such a hunsup
Shall make ye dance a tipvaes: keep close to me. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Sebastian, and Dorothy.

Seb. Never perswade me, I will marry again,
What should I leave my state to, Pins and Poaking sticks,
To Farthingals, and frownces? to fore-horses
And an old Leather Bawdy house behind 'em,
To thee?

Dor. You have a Son, Sir.

Seb. Where, what is he?
Who is he like?

Dor. Your self.

Seb. Thou lyest, thou hast marr'd him,
Thou, and thy prayer books: I do disclaim him:
Did not I take him singing yesternight
A godly Ballad, to a godly tune too,
And had a Catechism in's pocket, Damsel,
One of your dear disciples, I perceive it?

When did he ride abroad since he came over?

What Tavern has he us'd to? what things done
That shews a man, and mettle? when was my house
At such a shame before, to creep to bed
At ten a clock, and twelve, for want of company?
No singing, nor no dancing, nor no drinking?
Thou think'st not of these scandals; when, and where
Has he but shew'd his sword of late?

Dor. Despair not

I do beseech you, Sir, nor tempt your weakness,
For if you like it so, I can assure you
He is the same man still.

Seb. Would thou wert ashes
On that condition; but believe it Gossip
You shall know you have wrong'd.

Dor. You never, Sir,
So well I know my duty: and for Heaven sake,
Take but this counsel with ye ere you marry,
You were wont to hear me: take him, and confess him,
Search him to the quick, and if you find him false,
Do as you please; a Mothers name I honour.

Seb. He is lost, and spoil'd, I am resolv'd my roof
Shall never harbour him: and for you Minion
I'll keep you close enough, lest you break loose,
And do more mischief; get ye in: who waits? [Exit Dor.]

Enter Servant.

Ser. Do you call, Sir?

Seb. Seek the Boy: and bid him wait
My pleasure in the morning: mark what house
He is in, and what he does: and truly tell me.

Ser. I will not fail, Sir.

Seb. If ye do, I'll hang ye. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Thomas, Hylas, and Sam.

Tho. Keep you the back door there, and be sure
None of her servants enter, or go out,
If any Woman pass, she is lawful prize, Boys,
Cut off all convoyes.

Hyl. Who shall answer this?

Tho. Why, I shall answer it, you fearful widgeon,
I shall appear to th' action.

Hyl. May we discourse too,
On honourable terms?

Tho. With any Gentlewoman
That shall appear at window: ye may rehearse too
By your commission safely, some sweet parcels
Of Poetry to a Chamber-maid.

Hyl. May we sing too?
For there's my master-piece.

Tho. By no means, no Boys,
I am the man reserv'd for Air, 'tis my part,
And if she be not rock, my voyce shall reach her:
Ye may record a little, or ye may whistle,
As time shall minister, but for main singing,
Pray ye satisfie your selves: away, be careful.

Hyl. But hark ye, one word Tom, we may be beaten,
Tho. That's as ye think good your selves: if you deserve it,
Why 'tis the easiest thing to compass: beaten?

What Bugbears dwell in thy brains? who should beat thee?

Hyl. She has men enough.

Tho. Art not thou man enough too?
Thou hast flesh enough about thee: if all that mass
Will not maintain a little spirit, hang it,
And dry it too for dogs-meat: get you gone;
I have things of moment in my mind: that door,
Keep it as thou would'st keep thy Wife from a Servingman.
No more I say: away, Sam.

Sam. At your will, Sir. [Exeunt Hylas and Sam.]

Enter Launcelot, and Fidler.

Lan. I have him here, a rare Rogue, good sweet Master,
Do

Do something of some favour suddenly,
That we may eat, and live: I am almost starv'd,
No point manieur, no point devcin, no Signieur,
Not by the vertue of my languages,
Nothing at my old matters to be hoped for,
O Signieur du, nothing to line my life with,
But cold Pyes with a cudgel, till you help us.

Tho. Nothing but famine frights thee: come hitler Fidler,
What Ballads are you seen in best? be short Sir.

Fidler. Under your masterships correction, I can sing
The Duke of Norfolk, or the merry Ballad
Of Diverus and Lazarus, the Rose of England,
In Creet when Dedimus first began,
Jonas his crying out against Coventry.

Tho. Excellent,
Rare matters all.

Fid. Mawdlin the Merchants Daughter,
The Devil, and ye dainty Dames.

Tom. Rare still.

Fid. The landing of the Spaniards at Bow,
With the bloody battel at Mile-end.

Tho. All excellent:
No tuning as ye love me; let thy Fidle
Speak Welch, or any thing that's out of all tune,
The vilder still the better, like thy self,
For I presume thy voice will make no trees dance.

Fid. Nay truly, ye shall have it ev'n as homely.

Tho. Keep ye to that key, are they all abed trow?

Lan. I hear no stirring any where, no light
In any window, 'tis a night for the nonce Sir.

Tho. Come strike up then: and say the Merchants daughter,
We'l bear the burthen: proceed to incision Fidler. Song.

Enter Servant, above.

Ser. Who's there? what noise is this? what rogue
At these hours?

Thom. O what is that to you my fool?

O what is that to you,

Pluck in your face you bawling Ass,

Or I will break your brow. hey down, down, down.

A new Ballad, a new, a new.

Fid. The twelfth of April, on May day,
My house and goods were burnt away, &c. Maid above.

Maid. Why who is this?

Lan. O damsel dear,

Open the door, and it shall appear,

Open the door,

O gentle squire.

Maid. I'll see thee hang'd first: farewell my dear,

'Tis master Thomas, there he stands.

Enter Mary above.

Mary. 'Tis strange
That nothing can redeem him: rail him hence,
Or sing him out in's own way, any thing
To be deliver'd of him.

Maid. Then have at him:

My man Thomas did me promise.

He would visit me this night.

Tho. I am here Love, tell me dear Love,

How I may obtain thy sight.

Maid. Come up to my window love, come, come, come,

Come to my window my dear,

The wind, nor the rain shall trouble thee again,

But thou shalt be lodged here.

Thom. And art thou strong enough?

Lan. Up, up, I warrant ye.

Mary. What do'st thou mean to do?

Maid. Good Mistres peace,

I'll warrant ye we'l cool him: Madge. Madge above.

Madge. I am ready.

Tho. The love of Greece, and it tickled him so,

That he devised a way to goe.

Now sing the Duke of Northumberland.

Fidler. And climbing to promotion,
He fell down suddenly. Madge with a Devils
vizard roaring, offers to kiss him, and he falls down.

Maid. Farewel Sir.

Mary. What hast thou done? thou hast broke his neck.

Maid. Not hurt him,

He pitcht upon his legs like a Cat.

Tho. O woman:

O miserable woman, I am spoil'd,

My leg, my leg, my leg, oh both my legs!

Mary. I told thee what thou hadst done, mischief go with Tho. O I am lam'd for ever: O my leg, (thee.

Broken in twenty places: O take heed,

Take heed of women, Fidler: oh a Surgeon,

A Surgeon, or I dye: oh my good people,

No charitable people, all despightfull,

Oh what a misery am I in! oh my leg.

Lan. Be patient Sir, be patient: let me bind it.

Enter Samuel, and Hylas, with his head broken.

Tho. Oh do not touch it rogue.

Hyl. My head, my head,

Oh my head's kill'd.

Sam. You must be courting wenches

Through key-holes, Captain Hylas, come and be comforted,

The skin is scarce broke.

Tho. O my leg. Sam. How do ye Sir?

Tho. Oh maim'd for ever with a fall, he's spoil'd too,

I see his brains.

Hyl. Away with me for Gods sake,

A Surgeon.

Sam. Here's a night indeed.

Hyl. A Surgeon. [Ex. all but Fidler.

Enter Mary, and Servant below.

Mary. Go run for help.

Tho. Oh.

Mary. Run all, and all too little,

O curfed beast that hurt him, run, run, flye,

He will be dead else.

Tho. Oh.

Mary. Good friend go you too.

Fid. Who pays me for my Musick?

Mary. Pox o' your Musick,

There's twelve pence for ye.

Fid. There's two groats again forfooth,

I never take above, and rest ye merry. [Exit.

Ma. A greafe pot guild your fidle strings: how do you,

How is my dear?

Tom. Why well I thank ye sweet heart,

Shall we walk in, for now there's none to trouble us?

Ma. Are ye so crafty, Sir? I shall meet with ye,

I knew your trick, and I was willing: my Tom,

Mine own Tom, now to fatisie thee, welcom, welcom,

Welcom my best friend to me, all my dearest.

Tom. Now ye are my noble Mistres: we lose time sweet.

Ma. I think they are all gone.

Tom. All, ye did wisely.

Ma. And you as craftily.

Tom. We are well met Mistres.

Ma. Come, let's goe in then lovingly: O my Skarf Tom.

I lost it thereabout, find it, and wear it

As your poor Mistres favour. [Exit.

Tom. I am made now,

I see no venture is in no hand: I have it,

How now? the door lock't, and she in before?

Am I so trim'd?

Ma. One parting word sweet Thomas,

Though to save your credit, I discharg'd your Fidler,

I must not fatisie your folly too Sir,

Ye're subtle, but believe it Fox, I'll find ye;

The Surgeons will be here straight, roar again boy,

And break thy legs for shame, thou wilt be sport else,

Good night.

Tom. She saies most true, I must not stay: she has bob'd me,
Which if I live, I'll recompence, and shortly,
Now for a Ballad to bring me off again.
All young men be warn'd by me, how you do goe a wooing.
Seek not to climb, for fear ye fall, thereby comes your undoing, &c.
[Exeunt.]

Æius Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Valentine, Alice, and Servant.

Val. HE cannot goe and take no farewel of me,
Can he be so unkind? he's but retir'd
Into the Garden or the Orchard: see Sirs.

Ali. He would not ride there certain, those were planted
Only for walks I take it.

Val. Ride? nay then,
Had he a horse out?

Ser. So the Groom delivers
Somewhat before the break of day.

Val. He's gone,
My best friend's gone Alice; I have lost the noblest,
The truest, and the most man I e're found yet.

Alice. Indeed Sir, he deserves all praise.

Val. All Sister,
All, all, and all too little: O that honesty,
That ermine honesty, unspotted ever,
That perfect goodness.

Alice. Sure he will return Sir,
He cannot be so harsh.

Val. O never, never,
Never return, thou know'st not where the cause lyes.

Alice. He was the worthiest welcome.

Val. He deserv'd it.

Alice. Nor wanted, to our knowledge.

Val. I will tell thee,
Within this hour, things that shall startle thee,
He never must return.

Enter Michael.

Mich. Good morrow Signieur.

Val. Good morrow Master Michael.

Mich. My good neighbour,
Me thinks you are stirring early since your travel,
You have learn'd the rule of health sir, where's your mistress?
She keeps her warm I warrant ye, i' bed yet?

Val. I think she does.

Alice. 'Tis not her hour of waking.

Mich. Did you lye with her, Lady?

Alice. Not to night Sir,
Nor any night this week else.

Mich. When last saw ye her?

Alice. Late yeste night.

Mich. Was she 'bed then?

Alice. No Sir,

I left her at her prayers: why do ye ask me?

Mich. I have been strangely haunted with a dream
All this long night, and after many wakings,
The same dream still; me thought I met young Cellide
Just at S. Katherines gate the Nunnery.

Val. Ha?

Mich. Her face slubber'd o're with tears, and troubles,
Me thought she cry'd unto the Lady Abbess,
For charity receive me holy woman,
A Maid that has forgot the worlds affections,
Into thy virgin order: me thought she took her,
Put on a Stole, and sacred robe upon her,
And there I left her. Val. Dream?

Mich. Good Mistress Alice
Do me the favour (yet to satisfie me)
To step but up, and see.

Alice. I know she's there Sir,

And all this but a dream.

Mich. You know not my dreams,
They are unhappy ones, and often truths;
But this I hope, yet. Alice. I will satisfie ye. [Exit.]

Mich. Neighbours, how does the Gentleman?
Val. I know not,
Dream of a Nunnery?

Mich. How found ye my words
About the nature of his sickness Valentine?
Val. Did she not cry out, 'twas my folly too
That forc'd her to this nunnery? did she not curse me?
For God sake speak: did you not dream of me too,
How basely, poorly, tamely, like a fool,
Tir'd with his joyes?

Mich. Alas poor Gentleman,
Ye promis'd me Sir to bear all these crosses.

Val. I bear 'em till I break again.

Mich. But nobly,
Truly to weigh.

Val. Good neighbours, no more of it,
Ye do but sling flax on my fire: where is she?

Enter Alice.

Ali. Not yonder Sir, nor has not this night certain
Been in her bed.

Mich. It must be truth she tells ye,
And now I'll shew ye why I came: this morning
A man of mine being employed about business,
Came early home, who at S. Katherines Nunnery,
About day peep, told me he met your Mistress,
And as I spoke it in a dream, so troubled
And so received by the Abbess, did he see her,
The wonder made me rise, and hast unto ye
To know the cause.

Val. Farewel, I cannot speak it. [Exit Val.]

Alice. For Heaven sake leave him not.

Mich. I will not Lady.

Alice. Alas, he's much afflicted,

Mich. We shall know shortly more, apply your own care
At home good Alice, and trust him to my counsel,
Nay, do not weep, all shall be well, despair not. [Exeunt.]

SCENA II.

Enter Sebastian, and a Servant.

Seb. At Valentines house so merry?

Ser. As a pie Sir.

Seb. So gamefom dost thou say?

Ser. I am sure I heard it.

Seb. Ballads, and Fiddles too?

Ser. No, but one Fidle;
But twenty noyses.

Enter Launcelot.

Seb. Did he do devises?

Ser. The best devises Sir: here's my fellow Launcelot
He can inform ye all: he was among 'em,
A mad thing too: I stood but in a corner.

Seb. Come Sir, what can you say? is there any hope yet
Your Master may return?

Laun. He went far else,
I will assure your worship on my credit
By the faith of a Travellor, and a Gentleman,
Your son is found again, the son, the Tom.

Seb. Is he the old Tom?

Laun. The old Tom.

Seb. Go forward.

Laun. Next, to consider how he is the old Tom.

Seb. Handle me that.

Laun. I would ye had seen it handled
Last night Sir, as we handled it: cap à pe,
Footra for leers, and learings; O the noise,
The noise we made.

Seb. Good, good.

Laun.

Lan. The windows clattering
And all the Chambermaids in such a whobub,
One with her smock half off, another in haste
With a ferving mans hose upon her head.

Seb. Good still.

Lan. A fellow railing out of a loop-hole there,
And his mouth stopt with dirt.

Seb. P' faith a fine Boy.

Lan. Here one of our heads broke.

Seb. Excellent good still.

Lan. The Gentleman himself, young M. Thomas,
Inviron'd with his furious Myrmidons
The fiery Fidler, and my self; now singing,
Now beating at the door, there parlying,
Courting at that window, at the other scalling
And all these several noises to two Trenchers,
Strung with a bottom of brown thred, which show'd admi-

Seb. There eat, and grow again, I am pleas'd. (rable.

Lan. Nor here Sir,

Gave we the frolick over : though at length
We quit the Ladies Skonce on composition ;
But to the silent streets we turn'd our furies :
A sleeping watchman here we stole the shooes from,
There made a noise, at which he wakes, and follows :
The streets are durty, takes a queen-hith cold,
Hard cheefe, and that choaks him o' Munday next :
Windows, and signs we sent to Erebus ;
A crue of bawling curs we entertain'd last,
When having let the pigs loose in out parishes,
O the brave cry we made as high as Algate!
Down comes a Constable, and the Sow his Sister
Most traiterously tramples upon Authority,
There a whole stand of rug gowns rowted manly
And the Kings peace put to flight : a purblind pig here
Runs me his head into the Admirable Lanthorn,
Out goes the light, and all turns to confusion :
A potter rises, to enquire this passion,
A Boar imboss takes sanctuary in his shop,
When twenty dogs rush after, we still cheering,
Down goe the pots, and pipkins, down the pudding pans,
The cream-bolls cry revenge here, there the candlesticks.

Seb. If this be true, thou little tyney page,
This tale that thou tell'st me,
Then on thy back will I presently hang
A handfom new Livery :
But if this be false, thou little tyney page
As false it well may be,
Then with a cudgel of four foot long
P'le beat thee from head to toe.

Enter Servant.

Seb. Will the boy come ?

Ser. He will Sir.

Enter Thomas.

Seb. Time tries all then.

Lan. Here he comes now himself Sir.

Seb. To be short Thomas,

Because I feel a scruple in my conscience
Concerning thy demeanour, and a main one,
And therefore like a Father would be fatish'd,
Get up to that window there, and presently
Like a most compleat Gentleman, come from Tripoly.

Tom. Good Lord Sir, how are you misled : what fancies
(Fitter for idle boys, and drunkards, let me speak't,
And with a little wonder I beseech ou)

Choak up your noble judgement ?

Seb. You Rogue Launcelot,
You lying Rascal.

Lan. Will ye spoil all again Sir.
Why, what a Devil do you mean ?

Tom. Away knave,
Ye keep a company of sawcy fellows,
Deboish'd, and daily drunkards, to devour ye,

Things, whose dull souls, tend to the Celler only,
Ye are ill advis'd Sir, to commit your credit.

Seb. Sirrah, Sirrah.

Lan. Let me never eat again Sir,
Nor feel the blessing of another blew-coat,
If this young Gentleman, sweet Master Thomas,
Be not as mad as heart can wish : your heart Sir,
If yesternights discourse : speak fellow Robin,
And if thou speakest less than truth.

Tom. 'Tis strange these varlets.

Ser. By these ten bones Sir, if these eyes, and ears
Can hear and see.

Tom. Extreame strange, should thus boldly
Bud in your sight, unto your son.

Lan. O den guin

Can ye deny, ye beat a Constable
Last night ?

Tom. I touch Authoritie, ye Rascal ?
I violate the Law ?

Lan. Good Master Thomas.

Ser. Did you not take two wenches from the watch too
And put 'em into pudding lane ?

Lan. We mean not

Those civil things you did at M. Valentines,
The Fiddle, and the fa'las.

Tom. O strange impudence !

I do beseech you Sir give no such licence
To knaves and drunkards, to abuse your son thus :
Be wise in time, and turn 'em off : we live Sir
In a State govern'd civilly, and soberly,
Where each mans actions should confirm the Law,
Not crack, and cancel it.

Seb. Lancelot du Lake,

Get you upon adventures : cast your coat
And make your exit.

Lan. Pur lamour de dieu.

Seb. Pur me no purs : but pur at that door, out Sirrah,
P'le beat ye purblind else, out ye eight languages.

Lan. My blood upon your head.

[Exit Lan.]

Tom. Purge me 'em all Sir.

Seb. And you too presently.

Tom. Even as you please Sir.

Seb. Bid my maid servant come, and bring my Daughter,
I will have one shall please me.

[Exit servant.]

Tom. 'Tis most fit Sir.

Seb. Bring me the mony there : here M. Thomas.

Enter two Servants with two bags.

I pray sit down, ye are no more my son now,
Good Gentleman be cover'd.

Tom. At your pleasure.

Seb. This mony I do give ye, because of whilom
You have been thought my son, and by my self too,
And some things done like me : ye are now another :
There is two hundred pound, a civil summe
For a young civil man : much land and Lordship
Will as I take it now, but prove temptation
To dread ye from your settled, and sweet carriage.

Tom. You say right Sir.

Seb. Nay I beseech ye cover.

Tom. At your dispose : and I beseech ye too Sir,
For the word civil, and more settled course
It may but put to use, that on the interest
Like a poor Gentleman.

Seb. It shall, to my use,
To mine again : do you see Sir : good fine Gentleman,
I give no brooding mony for a Scrivener,
Mine is for present traffick, and so I'll use it.

Tom. So much for that then.

Enter Dorothy, and four Maids.

Seb. For the main cause Monsieur,
I sent to treat with you about, behold it ;
Behold that piece of stony work, and view it.

I want a right heir to inherit me,
Not my estate alone, but my conditions,
From which you are revolted, therefore dead,
And I will break my back, but I will get one.

Tom. Will you choose there Sir?

Seb. There, among those Damsels,
In mine own tribe: I know their qualities
Which cannot fail to please me: for their beauties
A matter of a three farthings, makes all perfect,
A little beer, and beef broth: they are found too.
Stand all a breast: now gentle M. Thomas
Before I choose, you having liv'd long with me,
And happily sometimes with some of these too,
Which fault I never frown'd upon; pray shew me
(For fear we confound our Genealogies)
Which have you laid aboard? speak your mind freely,
Have you had copulation with that Damsel?

Tom. I have.

Seb. Stand you aside then: how with her Sir?

Tom. How, is not seemly here to say.

Dor. Here's fine sport.

Seb. Retire you too: speak forward M. Thomas.

Tom. I will: and to the purpose; even with all Sir.

Seb. With all? that's somewhat large.

Dor. And yet you like it.

Was ever sin so glorious?

Seb. With all Thomas?

Tom. All surely Sir.

Seb. A sign thou art mine own yet,

In again all: and to your several functions. [Ex. Maids.]

What say you to young Luce, my neighbours Daughter,
She was too young I take it, when you travel'd;
Some twelve years old?

Tom. Her will was fifteen Sir.

Seb. A pretty answer, to cut off long discourse,
For I have many yet to ask ye of,
Where I can choose, and nobly, hold up your finger
When ye are right: what say ye to Valeria
Whose husband lies a dying now? why two,
And in that form?

Tom. Her husband is recover'd.

Seb. A witty moral: have at ye once more Thomas,
The Sisters of St. Albons, all five; dat boy,
Dat's mine own boy.

Dor. Now out upon thee Monster.

Tom. Still hoping of your pardon.

Seb. There needs none man:

A straw on pardon: prethee need no pardon:
I'll aske no more, nor think no more of marriage,
For o' my conscience I shall be thy Cuckold:
There's some good yet left in him: bear your self well,
You may recover me, there's twenty pound Sir,
I see some sparkles which may flame again,
You may eat with me when you please, you know me.

[Exit Seb.]

Dor. Why do you lye so damnably, so foolishly?

Tom. Do'st thou long to have thy head broke? hold thy
And do as I would have thee, or by this hand (peace)
I'll kill thy Parrat, hang up thy small hand,
And drink away thy dowry to a penny.

Dor. Was ever such a wilde Ass?

Tom. Prethee be quiet.

Dor. And do'st thou think men will not beat thee mon-
For abusing their wives and children? (strously)

Tom. And do'st thou think
Mens wives and children can be abus'd too much?

Dor. I wonder at thee.

Tom. Nay, thou shalt adjure me
Before I have done.

Dor. How stand ye with your mistress?

Tom. I shall stand nearer
E're I be twelve hours older: there's my business,
She is monstrous subtle Dol.

Dol. The Devil I think

Cannot out-subtile thee.

Tom. If he play fair play,
Come, you must help me presently.

Dor. I discard ye.

Tom. Thou shalt not sleep nor eat.

Dor. I'll no hand with ye,
No bawd to your abuses.

Tom. By this light Dol,
Nothing but in the way of honesty.

Dor. Thou never knew'st that road: I hear your vigils.

Tom. Sweet honey Dol, if I do not marry her,
Honestly marry her, if I mean not honourably,
Come, thou shalt help me, take heed how you vex me,
I'll help thee to a husband too, a fine Gentleman,
I know thou art mad, a tall young man, a brown man,
I swear he has his maidenhead, a rich man.

Dor. You may come in to dinner, and I'll answer ye.

Tom. Nay I'll go with thee Dol: four hundred a year wench.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Michael, and Valentine.

Mich. Good Sir go back again, and take my counsel,
Sores are not cur'd by sorrows, nor time broke from us,
Pull'd back again by sighs.

Val. What should I do friend?

Mich. Do that that may redeem ye, go back quickly,
Sebastians Daughter can prevail much with her,
The Abbess is her Aunt too.

Val. But my friend then
Whose love and loss is equal ty'd.

Mich. Content ye,
That shall be my task if he be alive,
Or where my travel and my care may reach him,
I'll bring him back again.

Val. Say he come back
To piece his poor friends life out? and my Mistress
Be vow'd for ever a recluse?

Mich. So suddenly
She cannot, hast ye therefore instantly away Sir,
To put that Daughter by; first as to a Father,
Then as a friend she was committed to ye,
And all the care she now has: by which priviledge
She cannot do her this violence,
But you may break it, and the law allows ye.

Val. O but I forc'd her to it.

Mich. Leave disputing
Against your self, if you will needs be miserable
Spight of her goodness, and your friends periwasions.
Think on, and thrive thereafter.

Val. I will home then.

And follow your advice, and good, good Michael.

Mich. No more, I know your soul's divided, Valentine,
Cure but that part at home with speedy marriage
E're my return, for then those thoughts that vext her,
While there ran any stream for loose affections,
Will be stopt up, and chaste ey'd honour guide her.
Away, and hope the best still: I'll work for ye,
And pray too heartily, away, no more words. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.

Enter Hylas, and Samuel.

Hyl. I care not for my broken head,
But that it should be his plot, and a wench too,
A lowzie, lazie wench prepar'd to do it.

Sam. Thou hadst as good be quiet, for o' my conscience
He'll put another on thee else.

Hyl. I am resolv'd
To call him to account, was it not manifest
He meant a mischief to me, and laughed at me,
When he lay roaring out, his leg was broken,
And no such matter? had he broke his neck,

Indeed

Indeed 'twould ne'r have griev'd me ; gallows gall him.

Why should he chuse out me ?

Sam. Thou art ever ready

To thrust thy self into these she occasions,
And he as full of knavery to accept it.

Hyl. Well, if I live I'll have a new trick for him.

Sam. That will not be amifs, but to fight with him
Is to no purpose ; besides, he's truly valiant,
And a most deadly hand ; thou never fought'st yet,
Nor o' my Conscience haft no faith in fighting.

Hyl. No, no, I will not fight.

Sam. Besides the quarrel,

Which has a woman in't to make it scurvey,
Who would lye stinking in a Surgeons hands,
A month or two this weather ? for believe it,
He never hurts under a quarters healing.

Hyl. No, upon better thought, I will not fight, Sam,
But watch my time.

Sam. To pay him with a project ;
Watch him too, I would wish ye ; prithee tell me,
Dost thou affect these women still ?

Hyl. Yes, 'faith, Sam,

I love 'em ev'n as well as e'r I did,
Nay, if my brains were beaten out, I must to 'em.

Sam. Dost thou love any woman ?

Hyl. Any woman

Of what degree or calling.

Sam. Of any age too ?

Hyl. Of any age, from fourscore to fourteen, Boy,
Of any fashion.

Sam. And defect too ?

Hyl. Right,

For those I love to lead me to repentance ;
A woman with no Nose, after my surquedry,
Shews like King Philip's Moral, Memento mori ;
And she that has a wooden leg, demonstrates
Like Hypocrites, we halt before the gallows ;
An old one with one tooth, seems to say to us,
Sweets meats have fowr fauce ; she that's full of aches,
Crum not your Bread before you taste your Porridge,
And many morals we may find.

Sam. 'Tis well, Sir,
Ye make so worthy uses ; but quid igitur,
What shall we now determine ?

Hyl. Let's consider

An hour or two how I may fit this fellow.

Sam. Let's find him first, he'll quickly give occasion,
But take heed to your self, and say I warn'd ye ;
He has a plaguey pate.

Hyl. That at my danger.

[Exeunt.

[Musick.

SCENE V.

Enter Saylers singing to them, Michael, and Francis.

Sayl. Aboard, aboard, the wind stands fair.

Mich. These call for Passengers, I'll stay and see
What men they take aboard.

Fran. A Boat, a Boat, a Boat.

Sayl. Away then.

Fran. Whither are ye bound, Friends ?

Sayl. Down to the Straits.

Mich. Ha ! 'tis not much unlike him.

Fran. May I have passage for my money ?

Sayl. And welcome too.

Mich. 'Tis he, I know 'tis he now.

Fran. Then merrily aboard, and noble friend,
Heavens goodness keep thee ever, and all vertue
Dwell in thy bosome, Cellide, my last tears
I leave behind me thus, a sacrifice,
For I dare stay no longer to betray ye.

Mich. Be not so quick, Sir ; Saylers I here charge ye
By virtue of this Warrant, as you will answer it,
For both your Ship and Merchant I know perfectly,

Lay hold upon this fellow.

Fran. Fellow ?

Mich. I, Sir.

Sayl. No hand to Sword, Sir, we shall master ye,
Fetch out the manacles.

Fran. I do obey ye ;

But I beseech you, Sir, inform me truly
How I am guilty.

Mich. You have rob'd a Gentleman,
One that you are bound to for your life and being ;
Money and horse unjustly ye took from him, (man.
And something of more note, but—— for y'are a Gentle-

Fra. It shall be so, and here I'll end all miseries,
Since friendship is so cruel, I confess it,
And which is more, a hundred of these robberies :

This Ring I stole too from him, and this Jewel,
The first and last of all my wealth ; forgive me
My innocence and truth, for saying I stole 'em,
And may they prove of value but to recompence
The thousandth part of his love, and bread I have eaten ;
'Pray see 'em render'd noble Sir, and so
I yield me to your power.

Mich. Guard him to th' water,
I charge you, Saylers ; there I will receive him,
And back convey him to a Justice.

Sayl. Come, Sir,
Look to your neck, you are like to fail i'th' air now.

[Exeunt.

SCENE VI.

Enter Thomas, Dorothy, and Maid.

Thom. Come quickly, quickly, paint me handsomely,
Take heed my nose be not in grain too ;
Come Doll, Doll, disen me.

Dor. If you should play now
Your Devils parts again.

Thom. Yea and nay, Dorothy.

Dor. If ye do any thing, but that ye have sworn to,
Which only is access.

Thom. As I am a Gentleman ;
Out with this hair, Doll, handsomely.

Dor. You have your Breeches ? (ticklish,

Thom. I prithee away, thou know'st I am monstrous
What, dost thou think I love to blast my Buttocks ?

Dor. I'll plague ye for this Roguery ; for I know well
What ye intend, Sir.

Thom. On with my muffler.

Dor. Ye are a sweet Lady ; come, let's see you courtesie ;
What, broke i'th' bum ? hold up your head.

Thom. Plague on't,
I shall bepifs my Breeches if I cowr thus,
Come, I am ready.

Maid. At all points as like, Sir,
As if you were my Mistress.

Dor. Who goes with ye ?

Thom. None but my fortune, and my self. [Exit Tho.

Dor. 'Bless ye :

Now run for thy life, and get before him,
Take the by-way, and tell my Cousin Mary
In what shape he intends to come to cozen her ;
I'll follow at thy heels my self, fly Wench.

Maid. I'll do it.

[Exit.

Enter Sebastian, and Thomas.

Dor. My Father has met him ; this goes excellent,
And I'll away in time ; look to your Skin, Thomas. [Exit.

Seb. What, are you grown so corn fed, Goody Gillian,
You will not know your Father ? what vagaries
Have you in hand ? what out-leaps, dirty heels,
That at these hours of night ye must be gadding,
And through the Orchard take your private passage ?
What, is the breeze in your Breech ? or has your Brother
Appointed you an hour of meditation

How to demean himself; get ye to bed, drab,
Or I'll so crab your Shoulders; ye demure Slut,
Ye civil dish of sliced Beef, get ye in.

Thom. I wi' not, that I wi' not.

Seb. Is't ev'n so, Dame?

Have at ye with a night Spell then.

Thom. 'Pray hold, Sir.

Seb. St. George, St. George, our Ladies Knight,
He walks by day, so does he by night,
And when he had her found,
He her beat, and her bound,
Until to him her troth she plight,
She would not stir from him that night.

Thom. Then have at ye with a Counter Spell,
From Elves, Hobs, and Fayries, that trouble our Dayries,
From Fire-Drakes and Fiends, and such as the Devil sends,
Defend us good Heaven. [Exit.]

Enter Launcelot.

Laun. Bless me master; look up, Sir, I beseech ye
Up with your eyes to heaven.

Seb. Up with your nose, Sir,
I do not bleed, 'twas a found knock she gave me,
A plaguey mankind Girl, how my brains totters?
Well, go thy ways, thou hast got one thousand pound more
With this dog trick,
Mine own true spirit in her too.

Laun. In her? alas Sir,
Alas poor Gentlewomen, she a hand so heavy,
To knock ye like a Calf down, or so brave a courage
To beat her father? if you could believe, Sir. (Devil?)

Seb. Who would'st thou make me believe it was, she

Laun. One that spits fire as fast as he sometimes, Sir,
And changes shapes as often; your Son Thomas;
Never wonder, if it be not he, straight hang me.

Seb. He? if it be so,
I'll put thee in my Will, and there's an end on't.

Laun. I saw his legs, h'as Boots on like a Player,
Under his wenches cloaths, 'tis he, 'tis Thomas
In his own Sisters Cloaths, Sir, and I can wait him.

Seb. No more words then, we'll watch him, thou'lt not be-
How heartily glad I am. (lieve Launce,

Laun. May ye be gladder,
But not this way, Sir.

Seb. No more words, but watch him. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.

Enter Mary; Dorothy, and Maid.

Mary. When comes he?

Dor. Presently.

Mary. Then get you up, Doll,
Away, I'll straight come to you: is all ready?

Maid. All.

Mary. Let the light stand far enough.

Maid. 'Tis placed so.

Mary. Stay you to entertain him to his chamber,
But keep close, Wench, he flies at all.

Maid. I warrant ye.

Mary. You need no more instruction?

Maid. I am perfect. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VIII.

Enter Valentine, and Thomas.

Tho. More stops yet? sure the fiend's my ghostly father,
Old Valentine; what wind's in his poop?

Val. Lady,
You are met most happily; O gentle Doll,
You must now do me an especial favour.

Tho. What is it, master Valentine? I am sorely troubled
With a salt rheum fall'n i' my gums.

Val. I'll tell ye,
And let it move you equally; my blest Mistress,

Upon a slight occasion taking anger,
Took also (to undo me) your Aunts Nunnery,
From whence by my persuasion to redeem her,
Will be impossible: nor have I liberty
To come and visit her; my good, good Dorothy,
You are most powerful with her, and your Aunt too,
And have access at all hours liberally,
Speak now or never for me.

Thom. In a Nunnery?

That course must not be suffered, Master Valentine,
Her Mother never knew it; rare sport for me;
Sport upon sport, by th' break of day I'll meet ye,
And fear not, Man, we'll have her out I warrant ye,
I cannot stay now.

Val. You will not break?

Thom. By no means.

Good night.

Val. Good night kind Mistress Doll. [Exit.]

Thom. This thrives well,
Every one takes me for my Sister, excellent;
This Nunnery's fall'n so pat too, to my figure,
Where there be handsome wenches, and they shall know it,
If once I creep in, ere they get me out again;
Stay, here's the house, and one of her Maids.

Enter Maid.

Maid. Who's there?

O Mistress Dorothy! you are a stranger.

Thom. Still Mistress Dorothy? this geer will cotton.

Maid. Will you walk in, Forsooth?

Thom. Where is your Mistress?

Maid. Not very well; she's gone to bed, I am glad
You are come so fit to comfort her.

Thom. Yes, I'll comfort her.

Maid. 'Pray make not much noise, for she is sure asleep,
You know your side, creep softly in, your company
Will warm her well.

Thom. I warrant thee I'll warm her.

Maid. Your Brother has been here, the strangest fellow.

Thom. A very Rogue, a rank Rogue.

Maid. I'll conduct ye
Even to her Chamber-door, and there commit ye. [Exeunt.]

SCENE IX.

Enter Michael, Francis, and Officers.

Mich. Come Sir, for this night I shall entertain ye,
And like a Gentleman, how e'r your fortune
Hath cast ye on the worst part.

Fran. How you please, Sir,
I am resolv'd, nor can a joy or misery
Much move me now.

Mich. I am angry with my self now
For putting this forc'd way upon his patience,
Yet any other course had been too slender:
Yet what to think I know not, for most liberally
He hath confess'd strange wrongs, which if they prove so,
How e'r the others long love may forget all,
Yet 'twas most fit he should come back, and this way.
Drink that; and now to my care leave your Prisoner,
I'll be his guard for this night.

Officers. Good night to your Worship.

Mich. Good night, my honest friends; come, Sir, I hope
There shall be no such cause of such a sadness
As you put on.

Fran. 'Faith, Sir, my rest is up,
And what I now pull shall no more afflict me
Than if I plaid at span-Counter, nor is my face
The map of any thing I seem to suffer,
Lighter affections seldom dwell in me, Sir.

Mich. A constant Gentleman; would I had taken
A Fever when I took this harsh way to disturb him.
Come, walk with me, Sir; ere to morrow night
I doubt not but to see all this blown over. [Exeunt.]

Actus Quintus, Scena Prima.

Enter Hylas.

Hyl. I Have dog'd his Sister, sure 'twas she,
And I hope she will come back again this night too;

Sam. I have lost of purpose; now if I can
With all the art I have, as she comes back,
But win a parley for my broken Pate,
Off goes her maiden-head, and there's vindicta.
They stir about the house, I'll stand at distance. [Exit.

Enter Mary and Dorothy, and then Thomas and Maid.

Dor. Is he come in?

Mary. Speak softly,

He is, and there he goes.

Thom. Good night, good night, Wench.

[A Bed discovered with a Black-moore in it.

Maid. As softly as you can. [Exit.

Thom. I'll play the mouse, Nan,

How close the little thief lies!

Mary. How he itches?

Dor. What would you give now to be there, and I
At home, Mall?

Mary. Peace for shame.

Thom. In what a figure.

The little fool has pull'd it self together!

Anon you will lye straighter;

Ha! there's rare circumstance

Belongs to such a treatise; do ye tumble?

I'll tumble with ye straight, wench: she sleeps soundly,

Full little think 'st thou of thy joy that's coming,

The sweet, sweet joy, full little of the kisses,

But those unthought of things come ever happiest.

How soft the Rogue feels! O ye little Villain,

Ye delicate coy Thief, how I shall thrum ye?

Your fy away, good servant, as you are a Gentleman.

Mary. Prithee leave laughing.

Thom. Out upon ye, Thomas,

What do you mean to do? I'll call the house up.

O God, I am sure ye will not, shall not serve ye,

For up ye go now and ye were my father.

Maid. Your courage will be cool'd anon.

Thom. If it do I'll hang for't,

Yet I'll be quartered here first.

Dor. O fierce Villain.

Ma. What would he do indeed, Doll?

Dor. You had best try him.

Tho. I'll kiss thee ere I come to bed, sweet Mary.

Ma. Prithee leave laughing.

Dor. O for gentle Nicholas.

Tho. And view that stormy face that has so thundred me,

A coldness crept over't now? by your leave, candle,

And next door by yours too, so, a pretty, pretty,

Shall I now look upon ye? by this light it moves me.

Ma. Much good may it do you, Sir.

Thom. Holy Saints defend me,

The Devil, Devil, Devil, O the Devil.

Ma. Dor. Ha, ha, ha, ha, the Devil, O the Devil.

Thom. I am abus'd most damnedly, most beastly,

Yet if it be a she-Devil; but the house is up,

And here's no staying longer in this Cassock.

Woman, I here disclaim thee; and in vengeance

I'll marry with that Devil, but I'll vex thee.

Ma. By'r Lady, but you shall not, Sir, I'll watch ye.

Tho. Plague o' your Spanish leather hide: I'll waken ye;

Devil good night: good night, good Devil.

Moor. Oh.

Thom. Roar again, Devil, roar again. [Exit Tho.

Moor. O, O, Sir.

Ma. Open the doors before him; let him vanish:

Now, let him come again, I'll use him kinder.

How now Wench?

Moor. 'Pray lye here your self next, Mistrefs,
And entertain your sweet-heart.

Ma. What said he to thee?

Moor. I had a soft Bed, and I slept out all
But his kind farewell: ye may bake me now,
For o' my conscience, he has made me Venison.

Ma. Alas poor Kate: I'll give thee a new Petticoat.

Dor. And I a Wastecoat, wench.

Ma. Draw in the Bed, Maids,
And see it made again; put fresh sheets on too,
For Doll and I; come Wench, let's laugh an hour now.
To morrow, early, will we see young Cellide,
They say she has taken a Sanctuary; Love and they
Are thick fown, but come up so full of thistles.

Dor. They must needs, Mall, for 'tis a pricking age grown,
Prithee to bed, for I am monstrous sleepy.

Mary. A match, but art not thouthy Brother?

Dor. I would I were, Wench,
You should hear further.

Ma. Come, no more of that, Doll. [Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter Hylas, and Thomas.

Hyl. I heard the doors clap; now, and't be thy will, wench.
By th' Mafs she comes; you are surely met fair Gentlewo-
I take it, Mistrefs Doll Sebastian's Daughter. (man,

Thom. I take right, Sir; Hylas, are you ferretting?
I'll fit you with a penny-worth presently. (guarded?

Hyl. How dare you walk so late, sweet, so weak

Thom. 'Faith Sir, I do no harm, nor none I look for;
Yet I am glad I have met so good a Gentleman,
Against all chances; for though I never knew ye,
Yet I have heard much good spoke of ye.

Hyl. Hark ye,
What if a man should kiss ye?

Thom. That's no harm, Sir;

'Pray God he 'scapes my Beard, there lies the mischief.

Hyl. Her lips are monstrous rugged, but that surely
Is but the sharpness of the weather; hark ye once once more,
And in your ear, sweet Mistrefs, for ye are so,
And ever shall be from this hour: I have vow'd it:

Enter Sebastian, and Launcelot.

Seb. Why, that's my daughter, Rogue, dost thou not see Kissing that fellow there, there in that corner? (her

Laun. Kissing?

Seb. Now, now, now they agree o'th' match too.

Thom. Nay then you love me not.

Hyl. By this white hand, Doll.

Thom. I must confess I have long desir'd your sight, Sir.

Laun. Why, there's the Boots still, Sir.

Seb. Hang Boots, Sir,

Why, they'll wear Breches too.

Thom. Dishonest me?

Not for the World.

Seb. Why, now they kiss again, there
I knew 'twas she, and that her crafty stealing
Out the back way must needs have such a meaning.

Laun. I am at my small wits ends.

Thom. If ye mean honourably.

Laun. Did she ne'r beat ye before, Sir?

Seb. Why dost thou follow me?

Thou Rascal, Slave, hast thou not twice abus'd me?
Hast thou not spoil'd the Boy? by thine own Covenant,
Wouldst thou not now be hang'd?

Laun. I think I would, Sir,

But you are so impatient; does not this shew, Sir,
(I do beseech ye speak, and speak with judgment;
And let the case be equally consider'd)

Far braver in your Daughter? in a Son now,
'Tis nothing, of no mark; every man does it;
But to beget a Daughter, a man maiden,

That

That reaches at these high exploits, is admirable;
Nay, she goes far beyond him; for when durst he,
But when he was drunk, do any thing to speak of?
This is Sebastian truly.

Seb. Thou sayest right, Luince,
And there's my hand once more.

Thom. Not without Marriage.

Seb. Didst thou hear that?

Luinc. I think she spoke of Marriage.

Seb. And he shall marry her, for it seems she likes him,
And their first Boy shall be my heir.

Luinc. I, marry,
Now ye go right to work.

Thom. Fye, fie, Sir,
Now I have promis'd ye this night to marry,
Would ye be so intemperate? are ye a Gentleman?

Hyl. I have no maw to marriage, yet this Rascal
Tempt me extremely: will ye marry presently?

Thom. Get you afore, and stay me at the Chapel,
Close by the Nunnery, there you shall find a night Priest,
Little Sir Hugh, and he can say the Matrimony
Over without Book, for we must have no company,
Nor light, for fear my Father know, which must not yet be;
And then to morrow night.

Hyl. Nothing to night, Sweet?

Thom. No, not a bit, I am sent of business,
About my dowry, Sweet, do not spoil all now,
'Tis of much haste: I can scarce stay the marriage,
Now if you love me, get you gone.

Hyl. You'll follow?

Thom. Within this hour, my sweet Chick.

Hyl. Kifs.

Thom. A Rope kifs ye,
Come, come, I stand o' thorns.

Hyl. Methinks her mouth still
Is monstrous rough, but they have ways to mend it,
Farewel.

Thom. Farewel, I'll fit ye with a wife, Sir.

Seb. Come, follow close, I'll see the end she aims at,
And if he be a handsome fellow, Launcelot,
Fiat, 'tis done, and all my 'state is settled. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Abbess, Cellide, and Nuns.

Ab. Come to your Mattins Maids; these early hours
My gentle Daughter, will disturb a while
Your fair eyes, nurtur'd in ease.

Cel. No, vertuous Mother,
'Tis for my holy health, to purchase which,
They shall forget the Child of ease, soft slumbers.
O my afflicted heart, how thou art tortur'd!
And Love, how like a Tyrant thou reign'st in me,
Commanding and forbidding at one instant;
Why came I hither, that desire to have
Only all liberty to make me happy?
Why didst thou bring that young man home, O Valentine,
That vertuous Youth? why didst thou speak his goodness
In such a phrase, as if all tongues, all praises
Weremade for him? O fond and ignorant!
Why didst thou foster my affection
Till it grew up to know no other Father,
And then betray it?

Ab. Can ye sing?

Cel. Yes, Mother,
My sorrows only.

Ab. Be gone, and to the Quire then. [Exeunt.]

[Musick singing.]

SCENE IV.

Enter Michael and Servant, and Francis.

Mich. Hast thou enquir'd him out?

Serv. He's not at home, Sir,
His Sister thinks he's gone to th' Nunnery.

Mich. Most likely; I'll away, an hour hence, Sirrah,
Come you along with this young Gentleman,
Do him all service, and fair office.

Serv. Yes Sir. [Exeunt.]

SCENE V.

Enter Hylas, and Sam.

Sam. Where hast thou been, man?

Hyl. Is there ne'r a shop open?

I'll give thee a pair of Gloves, Sam.

Sam. What's the matter?

Hyl. What dost thou think?

Sam. Thou art not married?

Hyl. By th' mas but I am, all to be married,
I am i'th' order now, Sam.

Sam. To whom prithee?

I thought there was some such trick in't, you stole from me,
But who, for Heavens sake?

Hyl. Ev'n the sweetest woman,
The rarest Woman, Samuel, and the lustiest,
But wondrous honest, honest as the ice, Boy,
Not a bit before hand, for my life, Sirrah,
And of a lusty kindred.

Sam. But who, Hylas?

Hyl. The young Gentleman and I are like to be friends
The fates will have it so. (again,

Sam. Who, Monsieur Thomas?

Hyl. All wrongs forgot.

Sam. O now I smell ye, Hylas;

Does he know of it?

Hyl. No, there's the trick I owe him;
'Tis done, Boy, we are fast'faith, my Youth now
Shall know I am aforehand, for his qualities.

Sam. Is there no trick in't?

Hyl. None, but up and ride, Boy:

I have made no Joynture neither, there I have paid him.

Sam. She's a brave wench.

Hyl. She shall be as I'll use her,
And if she anger me, all his abuses
I'll clap upon her Cassock.

Sam. Take heed, Hylas.

Hyl. 'Tis past that, Sam, come, I must meet her presently,
And now shalt see me a most glorious Husband. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.

Enter Dorothy, Mary, Valentine.

Dor. In troth, Sir, you never spoke to me.

Val. Can ye forget me?

Did not you promise all your help and cunning
In my behalf, but for one hour to see her,
Did you not swear it? by this hand, no strictness
Nor rule this house holds, shall by me be broken.

Dor. I saw ye not these two days.

Val. Do not wrong me,
I met ye, by my life, just as you entred
This gentle Ladies Lodge, last night, thus suited
About eleven a clock.

Dor. 'Tis true, I was there,
But that I saw or spoke to you.

Mar. I have found it,
Your Brother Thomas, Doll.

Dor. Pray Sir, be satisfi'd,
And wherein I can do you good, command me.
What a mad fool is this? stay here a while, Sir,
Whilst we walk in, and make your peace. [Exit.]

Enter Abbess.

Val. I thank ye. [Squeak within.]

Ab. Why, what's the matter there among these maids?
Now benedicite, have ye got the breeze there?
Give me my holy sprinkle.

Enter

Enter 2 Nuns.

1 Nun. O Madam, there's a strange thing like a Gentlewo-
Like Mistrefs Dorothy, I think the fiend (man,
Crept into th' Nunnery we know not which way,
Plays revel rout among us.

Ab. Give me my holy water-pot.

1 Nun. Here, Madam.

Ab. Spirit of earth or air, I do conjure thee, } Squeak
Of water or of fire. } within.

1 Nun. Hark Madam, hark.

Ab. Be thou Ghost that cannot rest,
Or a shadow of the blest,
Be thou black, or white, or green,
Be thou heard, or to be seen.

Enter Thomas and Cellide.

2 Nun. It comes, it comes.

Cell. What are ye? speak, speak gently,
And next, what would ye with me?

Tho. Any thing you'll let me.

Cell. You are no Woman certain.

Tho. Nor you no Nun, nor shall not be.

Cell. What make ye here?

Tho. I am a holy Fryer.

Ab. Is this the Spirit?

Tho. Nothing but spirit Aunt.

Ab. Now out upon thee.

Tho. Peace, or I'll conjure too, Aunt.

Ab. Why come you thus?

Tho. That's all one, here's my purpose:
Out with this Nun, she is too handsome for ye,
I'll tell thee, Aunt, and I speak it with tears to thee,
If thou keepst her here, as yet I hope thou art wiser,
Mark but the mischief follows.

Ab. She is a Votrefs.

Tho. Let her be what she will, she will undo thee,
Let her but one hour out, as I direct ye,
Or have among your Nuns again.

Ab. You have no project
But fair and honest?

Tho. As thine eyes, sweet Abbefs.

Ab. I will be rul'd then.

Tho. Thus then and perswade her,
But do not juggle with me, if ye do Aunt.

Ab. I must be there my self.

Tho. Away and fit her.

Ab. Come Daughter, you must now be rul'd, or never.

Cell. I must obey your will.

Ab. That's my good Daughter.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VII.

Enter Dorothy, and Mary.

Ma. What a coyle has this fellow kept i'th' Nunnery,
Sure he has run the Abbefs out of her wits.

Do. Out of the Nunnery I think, for we can neither see her,
Nor the young Cellide.

Ma. Pray Heavens he be not teasing. (structures.

Dor. Nay you may thank your self, 'twas your own

Enter Hylas, and Sam.

Sam. Why there's the Gentlewoman.

Hyl. Mafs 'tis she indeed;

How smart the pretty Thief looks? 'morrow Mistrefs.

Dor. Good morrow to you, Sir.

Sam. How strange she bears it?

Hyl. Maids must do so, at first.

Dor. Would ye ought with us, Gentlemen?

Hyl. Yes marry would I,

A little with your Ladyship.

Dor. Your will, Sir.

Hyl. Doll, I would have ye presently prepare your self
And those things you would have with you,
For my house is ready.

Dor. How, Sir?

Hyl. And this night not to fail, you must come to me,
My friends will all be there too: for Trunks, and those things,
And household-stuff, and cloaths you would have carried,
To morrow, or the next day, I'll take order:
Only what mony you have, bring away with ye,
And Jewels.

Dor. Jewels, Sir?

Hyl. I, for adornment,

There's a bed up, to play the game in, Dorothy:
And now come kiss me heartily.

Dor. Who are you?

Hyl. This Lady shall be welcome too.

Ma. To what, Sir?

Hyl. Your neighbour can resolve ye.

Dor. The man's foolish,

Sir, you look soberly: who is this fellow,
And where's his business?

Sam. By Heaven, thou art abus'd still.

Hyl. It may be so: Come, ye may speak now boldly,
There's none but friends, Wench.

Dor. Came ye out of Bedlam?

Alas, 'tis ill, Sir, that ye suffer him
To walk in th' open Air thus: 'twill undo him.

A pretty handsome Gentleman: great pity.

Sam. Let me not live more if thou be'st not cozen'd.

Hyl. Are not you my Wife? did not I marry you last night
At S^t Michael's Chapel?

Dor. Did not I say he was mad?

Hyl. Are not you Mistrefs Dorothy, Thomas's Sister?

Mar. There he speaks fence, but I'll assure ye, Gentleman,
I think no Wife of yours: at what hour was it?

Hyl. 'S pretious; you'll make me mad; did not the Priest,
Sir Hugh, that you appointed, about twelve a Clock
Tye our hands fast? did not you swear you lov'd me?
Did not I court ye, coming from this Gentlewoman's?

Ma. Good Sir, go sleep: for if I credit have,
She was in my arms then, abed.

Sam. I told ye.

Hyl. Be not so confident.

Dor. By th' mafs, she must, Sir;

For I'll no Husband here, before I know him:

And so good morrow to ye: Come, let's go seek 'em.

Sam. I told ye what ye had done.

Hyl. Is the Devil stirring?

Well, go with me; for now I will be married. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VIII.

Enter Michael, Valentine, and Alice.

Mich. I have brought him back again.

Val. You have done a friendship,
Worthy the love you bear me.

Mich. Would he had so too.

Val. O he's a worthy young man.

Mich. When all's try'd,
I fear you'll change your faith: bring in the Gentleman.

Enter Francis, Servant, Abbefs, and Cellide, severally.

Val. My happy Mistrefs too! now Fortune help me,
And all you Stars that govern chaste desires
Shine fair, and lovely.

Ab. But one hour, dear Daughter,
To hear your Guardian, what he can deliver
In Loves defence, and his: and then your pleasure.

Cell. Though much unwilling, you have made me yield,
More for his sake I see: how full of sorrow

Sweet catching sorrow, he appears? O love,
That thou but knew'st to heal, as well as hurt us.

Mich. Be rul'd by me: I see her eye fast on him:
And what ye heard, believe, for 'tis so certain
He neither dar'd, nor must oppose my evidence;
And be you wise, young Lady, and believe too,
This man you love, Sir?

Val. As I love my soul, Sir.

Mich. This man you put into a free possession
Of what his wants could ask: or your self render?

Val. And shall do still.

Mich. Nothing was barr'd his liberty
But this fair Maid; that friendship first was broken,
And you, and she abus'd; next, (to my sorrow
So fair a form should hide so dark intentions)
He hath himself confess'd (my purpose being
Only to stop his journey, by that policy
Of laying Felony to his charge, to fright the Sailers)
Divers abuses done, Thefts often practis'd,
Monyes, and Jewels too, and those no trifles.

Cell. O where have I bestrew'd my faith! in neither!
Let's in for ever now, there is virtue.

Mich. Nay do not wonder at it, he shall say it:
Are ye not guilty thus?

Fran. Yes: O my Fortune!

Mich. To give a proof I speak not enviously,
Look here; do you know these Jewels?

Cell. In, good Mother.

Enter Thomas, Dorothy, and Mary: then Sebastian, and Launcelot.

Val. These Jewels I have known.

Dor. You have made brave sport.

Tho. I'll make more, if I live Wench,
Nay do not look on me; I care not for ye.

Lan. Do you see now plain? that's Mistress Dorothy,
And that's his Mistress.

Seb. Peace, let my joy work easily,
Ha, boy! art there my boy? mine own boy, Tom, boy,
Home Lance, and strike a fresh piece of Wine, the Town's

Val. Sure, I have know these Jewels. (ours.)

Alice. They are they, certain.

Val. Good Heaven, that they were.

Alice. I'll pawn my life on't,
And this is he; come hither Mistress Dorothy,
And Mistress Mary: who does that face look like;
And view my Brother well?

Dor. In truth like him.

Ma. Upon my troth exceeding like.

Mich. Beshrew me,
But much, and main resemblance, both of face
And lineaments of body: now Heaven grant it.

Ali. My Brother's full of passion, I'll speak to him.
Now, as you are a Gentleman, resolve me,
Where did you get these Jewels?

Fran. Now I'll tell ye,
Because blind fortune yet may make me happy,
Of whom I had 'em I have never heard yet,
But from my infancy, upon this arm
I ever wore 'em.

Ali. 'Tis Francisco, Brother,
By Heaven I ty'd 'em on: a little more, Sir,
A little, little more, what parents have ye?

Fra. None,
That I know yet: the more my stubborn fortune,
But as I heard a Merchant say that bred me,
Who, to my more affliction, dyed a poor man,
When I reach'd eighteen years.

Ali. What said that Merchant?

Fra. He said, an infant, in the Genoway Gallies,
But from what place he never could direct me,
I was taken in a Sea-fight, and from a Mariner,
Out of his manly pity he redeem'd me.

He told me of a Nurse that waited on me;
But she, poor soul, he said was killed.
A Letter too I had enclos'd within me,
To one Castruccio a Venetian Merchant,
To bring me up: the man, when years allow'd me,
And want of friends compell'd, I fought, but found him
Long dead before, and all my hopes gone with him.
The Wars was my retreat then, and my travel
In which I found this Gentlemans free bounty,
For which Heaven recompenc'd him: now ye have all.

Val. And all the worldly blifs that Heaven can send me,
And all my prayers and thanks.

Alice. Down o' your knees, Sir,
For now you have found a Father, and that Father
That will not venture ye again in Gallies.

Mich. 'Tis true, believe her, Sir, and we all joy with ye.

Val. My best friend still: my dearest: now Heaven blefs
And make me worthy of this benefit. (thee,
Now my best Mistress.

Cell. Now Sir, I come to ye.

Ab. No, no, let's in Wench.

Cell. Not for the world, now, Mother,
And thus, Sir, all my service I pay to you,
And all my love to him.

Val. And may it prosper,
Take her Francisco: now no more young Callidon,
And love her dearly, for thy Father does so.

Fran. May all hate seek me else, and thus I seal it.

Val. Nothing but mirth now, friends.

Enter Hylas and Sam.

Hyl. Nay, I will find him.

Sam. What do all these here?

Tho. You are a trusty Husband,
And a hot lover too.

Hyl. Nay then, good morrow,
Now I perceive the Knavery.

Sam. I still told ye.

Tho. Stay, or I'll make ye stay: come hither, Sister.

Val. Why how now Mistress Thomas?

Tho. Peace a little,
Thou would'st fain have a Wife?

Hyl. Not I, by no means. (Hylas,

Tho. Thou shalt have a wife, and a fruitful wife, for I find,
That I shall never be able to bring thee Children.

Seb. A notable brave boy.

Hyl. I am very well, Sir. (a year,

Tho. Thou shalt be better, Hylas, thou hast 7 hundred pound
And thou shalt make her 3 hundred joynture.

Hyl. No.

Tho. Thou shalt boy, and shalt bestow
Two hundred pound in Cloaths, look on her,
A delicate lusty wench, she has fifteen hundred,
And feasible: strike hands, or I'll strike first.

Dor. You'll let me like?

Mar. He's a good handsome fellow,
Play not the fool.

Tho. Strike, Brother Hylas, quickly.

Hyl. If you can love me, well.

Dor. If you can please me.

Tho. Try that out soon, I say, my Brother Hylas.

Sam. Take her, and use her well, she's a brave Gentlewo-

Hyl. You must allow me another Mistress. (man.

Dor. Then you must allow me another Servant.

Hyl. Well, let's together then, a lusty kindred.

Seb. I'll give thee five hundred pound more for that word.

Ma. Now Sir, for you and I to make the feast full.

Tho. No, not a bit, you are a vertuous Lady,
And love to live in contemplation.

Ma. Come fool, I am friends now.

Tho. The fool shall not ride ye,
There lye my Woman, now my man again,
And now for travel once more.

Seb. Ple barr that firſt.

Ma. And I next.

Tho. Hold your ſelf contented: for I ſay I will travel,
And ſo long I will travel, till I find a Father
That I never knew, and a Wife that I never look'd for,
And a ſtate without expectation,
So reſt you merry Gentlemen.

Ma. You ſhall not,
Upon my faith, I love you now extreamly,
And now Ple kiſs ye.

Tho. This will not do it, Miſtreſs.

Ma. Why when we are married, we'l do more.

Seb. There's all Boy,

The keys of all I have, come, let's be merry,
For now I ſee thou art right.

Tho. Shall we to Church ſtraight?

Val. Now preſently, and there with nuptial
The holy Prieſt ſhall make ye happy all.

Tho. Away then, fair afore.

Exeunt.

Dead Author's Works and Memory,

Maſter C H A R L E S C O T T O N.

SIR,

M*Y directing of this piece unto you, renders me obvious to many cenſures, which I would willingly prevent by declaring mine own and your right thereto. Mine was the fortune to be made the unworthy preſerver of it; yours is the worthy opinion you have of the Author and his Poems; neither can it eaſily be determined, whether your affection to them hath made you (by obſerving) more able to judge of them, than your ability to judge of them hath made you to affect them, deſervedly, not partially. In this preſumptuous act of mine, I expreſs my twofold zeal; to him and your noble ſelf, who have built him a more honourable monument in that fair opinion you have of him, than any inſcription ſubject to the wearing of time can be.
You will find him in this Poem as active as in others, to many of which, the dull apprehenſions of former times gave but ſlender allowance, from malicious cuſtom more than reaſon: yet they have ſince by your candid ſelf and others, been clearly vindicated. You ſhall oblige by your acceptance of this acknowledgment (which is the beſt I can render you, mine own weak labours being too unworthy your judicious peruſal) him that is ambitious to be known*

Your moſt humble Servant,

RICHARD BROME.

THE CHANCES.
A

Don John, } two Spanish Gentlemen, and Come-Don Frederick, } rades.

Antonio, an old stout Gentleman, Kinsman to Petruccio.

Three Gentlemen, friends to the Duke.

Two Gentlemen, friends to Petruccio.

Francisco, a Musician, Antonio's Boy.

Peter Vecchio, a Teacher of Latine and Musick, a reputed Wizard.

*Peter and }
Anthony, } two Servants to Don John and Frederick.
A Surgeon.*

W O M E N.

Constancia, Sister to Petruccio, and Mistress to the Duke.

Gentlewoman, Servant to Constancia.

Old Gentlewoman, Landlady to Don John and Frederick.

Constancia, a Whore to old Antonio.

Bawd.

The Scene Bologna.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter 2. Serving-men, Peter and Anthony.

Peter. I WOULD we were remov'd from this town, (Anthony,
That we might taste some quiet; for mine own (part,

I'm almost melted with continual trotting;
After enquiries, dreams, and revelations,
Of who knows whom, or where? serve wenching soldiers,
That knows no other Paradise but Plackets:
I'll serve a Priest in Lent first, and eat Bell-ropes.

Ant. Thou art the froward'st fool——

Pet. Why, good tame Anthony?

Tell me but this; to what end came we hither?

Ant. To wait upon our Masters.

Pet. But how, Anthony?

Answer me that; resolve me there, good Anthony?

Ant. To serve their uses.

Pet. Shew your uses, Anthony.

Ant. To be employ'd in any thing.

Pet. No Anthony,

Not any thing I take it; nor that thing
We travel to discover, like new islands;
A salt itch serve such uses; in things of moment

Concerning things, I grant ye, not things errant,
Sweet Ladies things, and things to thank the Surgeon;
In no such things, sweet Anthony, put case——

Ant. Come, come, all will be mended; this invisible wo-
Of infinite report for shape and vertue, (man
That bred us all this trouble to no purpose,
They are determin'd now no more to think on,
But fall close to their studies.

Pet. Was there ever
Men known to run mad with report before?

Or wonder after they know not where
To find? or if found, how to enjoy? are mens brains
Made now adays of malt, that their affections
Are never sober? but like drunken People
Founder at every new Fame? I do believe too
That men in love are ever drunk, as drunken men
Are ever loving.

Ant. Prithee be thou sober,
And know, that they are none of those, not guilty
Of the least vanity of love, only a doubt
Fame might too far report, or rather flatter
The Graces of this Woman, made them curious
To find the truth, which since they find so blocked

And

And lockt up from their searches, they are now settled
To give the wonder over.

Pet. Would they were settled
To give me some new shoes too: for I'll be sworn
These are e'en worn out to the reasonable souls
In their good worships business; and some sleep
Would not do much amiss, unless they mean
To make a Bell man on me; and what now
Mean they to study, Anthony, moral Philosophy
After their mar-all women?

Ant. Mar a fools head.

Pet. 'Twill mar two fools heads and they take not heed,
Besides the Giblets to 'em.

Ant. Will you walk, Sir,
And talk more out of hearing? your fools head
May chance to find a wooden night-cap else.

Pet. I never lay in any.

Enter Don John, and Frederick.

Ant. Then leave your lying,
And your blind prophesying: here they come,
You had best tell them as much.

Pet. I am no tell-tale.

[Exeunt.]

John. I would we could have seen her though; for sure
She must be some rare Creature, or Report lies.
All mens Reports too.

Fred. I could well wish I had seen her;
But since she is so conceal'd, so beyond venture
Kept and preserv'd from view, so like a Paradise,
Plac'd where no knowledge can come near her; so guarded,
As 'twere impossible, though known, to reach her,
I have made up my belief.

John. Hang me from this hour
If I more think upon her, or believe her,
But as she came a strong Report unto me,
So the next Fame shall lose her.

Fred. 'Tis the next way;
But whither are you walking?

John. My old Round
After my meat, and then to Bed.

Fred. 'Tis healthful.

John. Will not you stir?

Fred. I have a little business.

John. Upon my life this Lady still

Fred. Then you will lose it.

John. 'Pray let's walk together.

Fred. Now I cannot.

John. I have something to impart.

Fred. An hour hence

I will not miss to meet you.

John. Where?

Fred. I th' high street;
For not to lie, I have a few Devotions
To do first, then I am yours.

John. Remember.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Petruchio, Antonio, and two Gentlemen.

Ant. Cut his wind-pipe I say.

1 Gent. Fye, Antonio.

Ant. Or knock his brains out first, and then forgive him,
If you do thrust, be sure it be to th'hilts,
A Surgeon may see through him.

1 Gent. You are too violent.

2 Gent. Too open undiscreef.

Pet. Am I not ruin'd?

The honour of my house crack'd? my blood poyson'd?
My Credit and my Name?

2 Gent. Be sure it be so,
Before ye use this violence: Let not doubt,
And a suspecting anger so much sway ye,
Your wisdom may be question'd.

Ant. I say kill him,

And then dispute the cause; cut off what may be,
And what is shall be safe.

2 Gent. Hang up a true man,
Because 'tis possible he may be thievish!
Alas, is this good Justice?

Pet. I know as certain
As day must come again, as clear as truth,
And open as belief can lay it to me,
That I am basely wrong'd, wrong'd above recompence;
Maliciously abus'd, blasted for ever
In name and honour, lost to all remembrance,
But what is smear'd, and shameful; I must kill him,
Necessity compells me.

1 Gent. But think better.

Pet. There is no other cure left; yet witness with me,
All that is fair in man, all that is noble,
I am not greedy of this life I seek for,
Nor thirst to shed mans blood, and would 'twere possible,
I wish it with my soul, so much I tremble
To offend the sacred Image of my Maker,
My Sword could only kill his Crimes; no, 'tis Honour,
Honour, my noble friends, that Idol, Honour,
That all the world now worships, not Petruchio
Must do this Justice.

Ant. Let it once be done,
And 'tis no matter, whether you, or honour,
Or both, be accessary.

2 Gent. Do you weigh, Petruchio,
The value of the person, power, and greatness,
And what this spark may kindle?

Pet. To perform it,
So much I am ty'd to Reputation,
And Credit of my house, let it raise wild-fires,
That all this Dukedom smoak, and storms that tofs me
Into the waves of everlasting ruine,
Yet I must through; if ye dare side me.

Ant. Dare?

Pet. Y'are friends indeed, if not.

2 Gent. Here's none flies from you,
Do it in what design ye please, we'll back ye.

1 Gent. But then be sure ye kill him.

2 Gent. Is the cause
So mortal, nothing but his life?

Pet. Believe me,
A less offence has been the desolation
Of a whole name.

2 Gent. No other way to purge it?

Pet. There is, but never to be hoped for.

2 Gent. Think an hour more,
And if then ye find no safer Road to guide ye,
We'll set up our Rests too.

Ant. Mine's up already,
And hang him for my part
Goes less than life.

2 Gent. If we see noble cause, 'tis like our Swords
May be as free and forward as your words. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Don John.

John. The civil order of this Town, Bologna,
Makes it belov'd and honour'd of all Travellers,
As a most safe retirement in all troubles;
Beside the wholesome seat, and noble temper
Of those minds that inhabit it, safely wise,
And to all strangers vertuous; But I see
My admiration has drawn night upon me,
And longer to expect my friend may pull me
Into suspicion of too late a stirrer,
Which all good Governments are jealous of.
I'll home, and think at liberty: yet certain,
'Tis not so far night as I thought; for see,
A fair house yet stands open, yet all about it
Are close, and no lights stirring, there may be foul play;

I'll venture to look in: if there be knaves,
I may do a good office.

(woman within.)

Within. Signieur?

John. What? how is this?

Within. Signieur Fabritio?

John. I'll go nearer.

Within. Fabritio?

Job. This is a womans tongue, here may be good done.

Within. Who's there?

Fabritio?

John. I.

Within. Where are ye?

Job. Here.

Within. O come, for Heavens sake!

Job. I must see what this means.

Enter Woman with a Child.

Within. I have stay'd this long hour for you, make no
For things are in strange trouble: here, be secret, (noise,
'Tis worth your care; begon now; more eyes watch us,
Than may be for our safeties.

Job. Hark ye?

Within. Peace: good night.

Job. She is gone, and I am loaden; fortune for me;
It weighs well, and it feels well; it may chance
To be some pack of worth: byth' mafs 'tis heavie;
If it be Coyn or Jewels, 'tis worth welcom:
I'll ne're refuse a fortune: I am confident
'Tis of no common price: now to my lodging:
If it hit right, I'll blefs this night.

[Exit.]

SCENE IV.

Enter Frederick.

Fred. 'Tis strange,
I cannot meet him; sure he has encountred
Some light o' love or other, and there means
To play at in and in for this night. Well Don John,
If you do spring a leak, or get an itch,
Till ye claw off your curl'd pate, thank your night-walks:
You must be still a bootehalling: one round more,
Though it be late, I'll venture to discover ye,
I do not like your out-leaps.

[Exit.]

SCENE V.

Enter Duke, and 3 Gentlemen.

Duke. Welcom to Town, are ye all fit?

1 Gent. To point Sir.

Duke. Where are the horses?

2 Gent. Where they were appointed.

Duke. Be private, and whatsoever fortune
Offer it self, let's stand sure.

3 Gent. Fear not us,
E're ye shall be endangered, or deluded,
We'll make a black night on't.

Duke. No more, I know it;
You know your Quarters?

1 Gent. Will you go alone Sir?

Du. Ye shall not be far from me, the least noise
Shall bring ye to my rescue.

2 Gent. We are counsell'd.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.

Enter Don John.

John. Was ever man so paid for being curious?
Ever so bob'd for searching out adventures,
As I am? did the Devil lead me? must I needs be peeping
Into mens houses where I had no business,
And make my self a mischief? 'Tis well carried;
I must take other mens occasions on me,
And be I know not whom: most finely handled:
What have I got by this now? what's the purchase?

A piece of evening Arras work, a child,
Indeed an Infidel: this comes of peeping:
A lump got out of laziness; good white bread
Let's have no bawling with ye: 'death, have I
Known wenches thus long, all the ways of wenches,
Their snares and subtilties? have I read over
All their School learnings, div'd into their quiddits,
And am I now bum-sidled with a Bastard?
Fetch'd over with a Card of five, and in mine old days,
After the dire massacre of a million
Of Maiden heads? caught the common way, i'th' night too
Under anothers name, to make the matter
Carry more weight about it? well Don John,
You will be wiser one day, when ye have purchas'd
A beavy of these Butter-prints together,
With searching out conceal'd iniquities,
Without commission: why, it would never grieve me,
If I had got this Ginger-bread: never stirr'd me,
So I had had a stroak for't: 't had been Justice
Then to have kept it; but to raise a dayrie
For other mens adulteries, consume my self in candles,
And scowring works, in Nurfses Bells and Babies,
Only for charity, for meer I thank you,
A little troubles me: the least touch for it,
Had but my breeches got it, had contented me.
Whose e're it is, sure 't had a wealthy Mother,
For 'tis well clothed, and if I be not cozen'd,
Well lin'd within: to leave it here were barbarous,
And ten to one would kill it: a more sin
Then his that got it: well, I will dispose on't,
And keep it, as they keep deaths heads in rings,
To cry memento to me; no more peeping.
Now all the danger is to qualifie
The good old gentlewoman, at whose house we live;
For she will fall upon me with a Catechism
Of four hours long: I must endure all;
For I will know this Mother: Come good wonder,
Let you and I be jogging: your starv'd trebble
Will waken the rude watch else: all that be
Curious night-walkers, may they find my fee.

[Exit.]

SCENE VII.

Enter Frederick.

Fred. Sure he's gone home:
I have beaten all the purlaws,
But cannot bolt him: if he be a bobbing,
'Tis not my care can cure him: To morrow morning
I shall have further knowledge from a Surgeon's
Where he lyes moor'd, to mend his leaks.

Enter Constantia.

Con. I'm ready,
And through a world of dangers am flown to ye.
Be full of haste and care, we are undone else:
Where are your people? which way must we travel?
For Heaven sake stay not here Sir.

Fred. What may this prove?

Con. Alas I am mistaken, lost, undone,
For ever perish'd. Sir, for Heaven sake tell me,
Are ye a Gentleman?

Fred. I am.

Con. Of this place?

Fred. No, born in Spain.

Con. As ever you lov'd honour,
As ever your desires may gain their ends,
Do a poor wretched woman but this benefit,
For I am forc'd to trust ye.

Fred. Y'ave charm'd me,
Humanity and honour bids me help ye;
And if I fail your trust.

Con. The time's too dangerous
To stay your protestations: I believe ye,
Alas, I must believe ye: From this place,

Good noble Sir, remove me instantly,
And for a time, where nothing but your self,
And honest conversation may come near me,
In some secure place fertle me: what I am
And why thus boldly I commit my credit
Into a strangers hand, the fears and dangers,
That force me to this wild course, at more leisure
I shall reveal unto you.

Fred. Come, be hearty,
He must strike through my life that takes me.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE VIII

Enter Petruccio, Antonio, and others.

Petr. He will sure come. Are ye well?

Ant. Never fear us.

Here's that will make 'em dance with a fiddle.

Petr. We are to look for no weak foes, my friends,
Nor unadvised ones.

Ant. Best gamesters make the best game,
We shall fight close and handfom then.

1 Gent. Antonio,

You are a thought too bloody.

Ant. Why? all Physicians

And penny Almanacks allow the opening
Of veins this moneth: why do ye take me bloody?

What come we for, to fall to cuffs and blows?

What, would ye make the cause a quarrel?

On what terms stands this man? Is not his honour

Open'd to his hand, and pickt out like an Oyiter?

His credit like a quart pot knockt together,

Able to hold no liquor? clear but this point.

Petr. Speak softly, gentle cousin.

Ant. Ple speak truly;

What should men do ally'd to these disgraces,
Lick o're his enemy, sit down, and dance him?

2 Gent. You are as far o'th' bow hand now.

Ant. And crie;

That's my fine boy, thou wilt do so no more child.

Petr. Here are no such cold pitie.

Ant. By Saint Jaques

They shall not find me one: here's old tough Andrew,

A special friend of mine, and he but hold,

Ple strike 'em such a hornpipe: knocks I come for,

And the best blood I light on; I profess it,

Not to scare Coster-mongers; If I lose mine own,

Mine audits cast, and farewell five and fifty.

Petr. Let's talk no longer, place your selves with silence,

As I directed ye, and when time calls us,

As ye are friends, so shew your selves.

Ant. So be it.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IX.

Enter Don John, and his Land-lady.

Land. Nay Son, if this be your regard.

John. Good Mother.

Land. Good me no goods; your cousin, and your self
Are welcom to me, whilst you bear your selves
Like honest and true Gentlemen: Bring hither
To my house, that have ever been reputed
A Gentlewoman of a decent, and fair carriage,
And so behav'd my self

John. I know ye have.

Land. Bring hither, as I say, to make my name
Stink in my neighbours nostrils? your Devises,
Your Brats, got out of Alligant, and broken oaths?
Your Linsy Woolfy work, your hasty puddings?
I, foster up your filch'd iniquities?
Y'are deceiv'd in me, Sir, I am none
Of those receivers.

John. Have I not sworn unto you,

'Tis none of mine, and shew'd you how I found it?

Land. Ye found an easie fool that let you get it,

She had better have worn patterns.

John. Will ye hear me? (ends,

Lan. Oaths? what do you care for oaths to gain your

When ye are high and pamper'd? What Saint know ye?

Or what Religion, but your purpos'd lewdness,

Is to be look'd for of ye? nay, I will tell ye,

You will then swear like accus'd Cut-purses,

As far off truth too; and lye beyond all Faulconers:

I'm sick to see this dealing.

John. Heaven forbid Mother.

Lan. Nay, I am very sick.

John. Who waits there?

Ant. Sir. [within.]

John. Bring down the bottle of Canary wine.

Lan. Exceeding sick, Heav'n help me.

John. Haste ye Sirrah,

I must ev'n make her drunk; nay gentle mother.

Lan. Now fie upon ye, was it for this purpose

You fetch'd your evening walks for your digestions,

For this pretended holiness? no weather,

Not before day could hold ye from the Matins.

Were these your bo-peep prayers? ye've pray'd well,

And with a learned zeal: watcht well too; your Saint

It seems was pleas'd as well: still sicker, sicker.

Enter Anthony, with a bottle of wine.

John. There is no talking to her till I have drencht her.

Give me: here mother take a good round draught,

'Twill purge spleen from your spirits: deeper mother.

Lan. I, I, son, you imagine this will mend all.

John. All i' faith Mother.

Lan. I confes the Wine

Will do his part.

John. Ple pledge ye.

Lan. But son John.

John. I know your meaning mother; touch it once more,

Alas you look not well; take a round draught,

It warms the blood well, and restores the colour,

And then we'll talk at large.

Land. A civil Gentleman?

A stranger? one the Town holds a good regard of?

John. Nay I will silence thee.

Lan. One that should weigh his fair name? oh, a stitch!

John. There's nothing better for a stitch, good Mother,

Make no spare of it, as you love your health,

Mince not the matter.

Land. As I said, a Gentleman,

Lodge in my house? now heav'ns my comfort, Signior!

John. I look'd for this.

Lan. I did not think you would have us'd me thus;

A woman of my credit: one, heaven knows,

That lov'd you but too tenderly.

John. Dear Mother,

I ever found your kindness, and knowledge it.

Lan. No, no, I am a fool to counsel ye. Where's the in-

Come, let's see your Workmanship. (fant?)

John. None of mine, Mother,

But there'tis, and a lusty one.

Land. Heaven blefs thee,

Thou hadst a hasty making; but the best is,

'Tis many a good mans fortune: as I live

Your own eyes Signior, and the nether lip

As like ye, as ye had spit it.

John. I am glad on't.

Lan. Blefs me, what things are these?

John. I thought my labour

Was not all lost, 'tis gold, and these are jewels,

Both rich, and right I hope.

Lan. Well, well son John,

I see ye are a wood-man, and can chuse

Your dear, though it be i'th' dark, all your discretion

Is not yett lost; this was well clapt aboard:

Here I am with you now; when as they say

Your pleasure comes with profit; when ye must needs do,

Do where ye may be done to, 'tis a wisdom
Becomes a young man well : be sure of one thing,
Lose not your labour and your time together,
It feals on of a fool, son, time is pretious,
Work wary whilst ye have it : since ye must traffick
Sometimes this slippery way, take sure hold Signior,
Trade with no broken Merchants, make your lading,
As you would make your rest, adventurously,
But with advantage ever.

John. All this time Mother,
The child wants looking to, wants meat and Nurfes.

Lan. Now b'essing o' thy care ; it shall have all,
And instantly ; I'll seek a Nurse my self, son ;
'Tis a sweet child : ah my young Spaniard,
Take you no further care Sir.

John. Yes of these Jewels,
I must by your leave Mother : these are yours,
To make your care the stronger : for the rest
I'll find a Master ; the gold for bringing up on't,
I freely render to your charge.

Lan. No more words,
Nor no more children, (good son) as you love me,
This may do well.

John. I shall observe your Morals.
But where's Don Frederick, Mother ?

Lan. Ten to one
About the like adventure : he told me,
He was to find you out. [Exit.]

John. Why should he stay thus ?
There may be some ill chance in't : sleep I will not,
Before I have found him : now this woman's pleas'd,
I'll seek my friend out, and my care is eas'd. [Exit.]

SCENE X.

Enter Duke, and Gentlemen.

1 Gent. Believe Sir, 'tis as possible to do it,
As to remove the City ; the main faction
Swarm though the streets like hornets, arm'd with angers
Able to ruine States : no safety left us,
Nor means to dye like men, if instantly
You draw not back again.

Duke. May he be drawn
And quarter'd too, that turns now ; were I surer
Of death than thou art of thy fears, and with death
More than those fears are too.

1 Gent. Sir, I fear not.

Du. I would not crack my vow, start from my honour,
Because I may find danger ; wound my soul,
To keep my body safe. 1 Gent. I speak not Sir,
Out of a baseness to you. Du. No, nor do not
Out of a baseness leave me : what is danger,
More than the weakness of our apprehensions ?
A poor cold part o'th' blood ? who takes it hold of ?
Cowards, and wicked livers : valiant minds
Were made the Masters of it : and as hearty Sea-men
In desperate storms, stem with a little Rudder
The tumbling ruines of the Ocean :
So with their cause and swords do they do dangers.
Say we were sure to dye all in this venture,
As I am confident against it : is there any
Amongst us of so fat a sense, so pamper'd,
Would chuse luxuriously to lye a bed,
And purge away his spirit, send his soul out
In Sugar-sops, and Syrups ? Give me dying
As dying ought to be, upon mine enemy,
Parting with man-kind, by a man that's manly :
Let 'em be all the world, and bring along
Cain's envy with 'em, I will on.

2 Gent. You may Sir,
But with what safety ?

1 Gent. Since 'tis come to dying,
You shall perceive Sir, here be those amongst us
Can dye as decently as other men,

And with as little ceremony : on brave Sir.

Duke. That's spoken heartily.

1 Gent. And he that flinches,
May he dye lowzie in a ditch.

Duke. No more dying,
There's no such danger in it :
What's a clock ?

3 Gent. Somewhat above your hour.

Duke. Away then quickly,
Make no noise, and no truble will attend us. [Exeunt.]

SCENE XI.

Enter Frederick, and Peter, (with a candle.)

Fred. Give me the candle : so, go you out that way.

Peter. What have we now to do ?

Fred. And o' your life Sirrah,
Let none come near the door without my knowledge,
No not my Landlady, nor my friend. Peter. 'Tis done Sir.

Fred. Nor any serious business that concerns me.

Peter. Is the wind there again ?

Fred. Be gone. Peter. I am Sir. [Exit.]

Enter Constantia.

Fre. Now enter without fear. ——— And noble Lady
That safety and civility ye wish'd for
Shall truly here attend you : no rude tongue
Nor rough behaviour knows this place, no wishes
Beyond the moderation of a man,
Dare enter here ; your own desires and Innocence,
Joyn'd to my vow'd obedience, shall protect you,
Were dangers more than doubts.

Const. Ye are truly noble,
And worth a womans trust : let it become me,
(I do beseech you, Sir) for all your kindness,
To render with my thanks, this worthless trifle ;
I may be longer troublesome. Fred. Fair offices
Are still their own rewards : Heav'n blefs me Lady
From selling civil courtesies : may it please ye,
If ye will force a favour to oblige me,
Draw but that cloud aside, to satisfie me
For what good Angel I am engag'd.

Const. It shall be,
For I am truly confident ye are honest :
The Piece is scarce worth looking on.

Fred. Trust me
The abstract of all beauty, foul of sweetness,
Defend me honest thoughts, I shall grow wild else :
What eyes are there, rather what little heavens,
To stir mens contemplations ? what a Paradise
Runs through each part she has ? good blood be temperate :
I must look off : too excellent an object
Confounds the sense that sees it. Noble Lady,
If there be any further service to cast on me,
Let it be worth my life, so much I honour ye,
Or the engagement of whole Families.

Const. Your service is too liberal, worthy Sir,
Thus far I shall entreat.

Fred. Command me Lady,
You make your power too poor.

Const. That presently
With all convenient haste, you would retire
Unto the street you found me in.

Fred. 'Tis done.

Const. There, if you find a Gentleman oppress
With force and violence, do a mans office,
And draw your sword to rescue him.

Fred. He's safe,
Be what he will, and let his foes be Devils,
Arm'd with your pity, I shall conjure 'em.
Retire, this key will guide ye : all things necessary
Are there before ye.

Const. All my prayers go with ye. [Exit.]

Fred. Ye clap on proof upon me : men say gold

Does

Does all, engages all, works through all dangers :
 Now I say beauty can do more : The Kings Exchequer,
 Nor all his wealthy Indies, could not draw me
 Through half those miseries this piece of pleasure
 Might make me leap into : we are all like sea-Cards,
 All our endeavours and our motions,
 (As they do to the North) still point at beauty,
 Still at the fairest : for a handsom woman,
 (Setting my soul aside) it should go hard,
 But I would strain my body : yet to her,
 Unless it be her own free gratitude,
 Hopes ye shall dye, and thou tongue rot within me,
 E're I infringe my faith : now to my rescue. [Exit.]

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Duke, pursued by Petruccio, Antonio, and that Faction.

Duke. You will not all oppress me? (him.
 Ant. Kill him i'th' wanton eye : let me come to Duke. Then ye shall buy me dearly.
 Petr. Say you so Sir?
 Ant. I say cut his Wezand, spoil his piping ;
 Have at your love-sick heart Sir.

Enter Don John.

John. Sure 'tis fighting.
 My friend may be engag'd : fie Gentlemen,
 This is unmanly odds.
 Ant. Ple stop your mouth Sir. { Du. falls down,
 John. Nay, then have at thee freely : Don John be-
 There's a plumb Sir to satisfy your longing. strides him.
 Petr. Away : I hope I have sped him : here comes rescue,
 We shall be endangered : where's Antonio?
 Ant. I must have one thrust more Sir.
 John. Come up to me.
 Ant. A mischief confound your fingers.
 Petr. How is't?
 Ant. Well :
 Ha's given me my quietus est, I felt him
 In my small guts, I'me sure, has feez'd me :
 This comes of siding with ye.
 2 Gent. Can you go Sir?
 Ant. I should go man, and my head were off,
 Never talk of going.
 Petr. Come, all shall be well then,
 I hear more rescue coming.

Enter the Dukes Faction.

Ant. Let's turn back then ;
 My skull's uncloven yet, let me but kill.
 Petr. Away for Heaven sake with him.
 John. How is't?
 Duke. Well Sir,
 Only a little stagger'd.
 Faction Duke. Let's pursue 'em.
 Du. No not a man, I charge ye : thanks good coat,
 Thou hast sav'd me a shrewd welcom : 'twas put home too,
 With a good mind I'me sure on't.
 John. Are ye safe then?
 Duke. My thanks to you brave Sir, whose timely valour,
 And manly courtesie came to my rescue.
 John. Ye had foul play offer'd ye, and shame befall him
 That can pass by oppression.
 Duke. May I crave Sir,
 But thus much honour more, to know your name?
 And him I am so bound to?
 John. For the Bond Sir,
 'Tis every good mans tye : to know me further
 Will little profit ye ; I am a stranger,
 My Country Spain ; my name Don John, a Gentleman

That lye here for my study.

Duke. I have heard Sir,
 Much worthy mention of ye, yet I find
 Fame short of what ye are.

John. You are pleas'd Sir,
 To express your courtesie : may I demand
 As freely what you are, and what mischance
 Cast you into this danger?

Duke. For this present
 I must desire your pardon : you shall know me
 E're it be long Sir, and a nobler thanks
 Than now my will can render.

John. Your will's your own Sir.

Duke. What is't you look for sir, have you lost any thing?

John. Only my hat i'th' scuffle ; sure these fellows
 Were night-snaps.

Duke. No, believe Sir : pray ye use mine,
 For 'twill be hard to find your own now.

John. No Sir.

Du. Indeed ye shall, I can command another :
 I do beseech ye honour me.

John. I will Sir,
 And so I'll take my leave.

Duke. Within these few days
 I hope I shall be happy in your knowledge,
 Till when I love your memory. [Exit Duke, &c.]

John. I yours.

This is some noble fellow.

Enter Frederick.

Fred. 'Tis is tongue sure.

Don John?

John. Don Frederick?

Fred. Ye're fairly met Sir :

I thought ye had been a Bat-fowling : prethee tell me,
 What Revelations hast thou had to night,
 That home was never thought of?

John. Revelations?

I'll tell thee Frederick, but before I tell thee,
 Settle thy understanding.

Fred. 'Tis prepar'd, Sir.

John. Why then mark what shall follow. This night
 This bawdy night.

Fred. I thought no less.

John. This blind night,
 What dost think I have got?

Fred. The Pox it may be.

John. Would 'twere no worse : ye talk of Revelations,
 I have got a Revelation will reveal me
 An arrant Coxcomb while I live.

Fred. What is't?

Thou hast lost nothing?

John. No, I have got I tell thee.

Fred. What hast thou got?

John. One of the Infantry, a child.

Fred. How?

John. A chopping child, man.

Fred. 'Give ye joy, Sir.

John. A lump of lewdness Frederick, that's the truth on't:
 This Town's abominable.

Fred. I still told ye John

Your whoring must come home ; I counsell'd ye :
 But where no grace is——

John. 'Tis none o' mine, man.

Fred. Answer the Parish so.

John. Cheated intoth :

Peeping into a house, by whom I know not,
 Nor where to find the place again : no Frederick,
 Had I but kist the ring for't ; 'tis no poor one,
 That's my best comfort, for't has brought about it
 Enough to make it man.

Fred. Where is't?

John. At home.

Fred. A saving voyage : But what will you say Signior,
 To

To him that searching out your serious worship,
Has met a stranger fortune?

John. How, good Frederick?

A militant girl now to this boy would hit it? (Sir

Fred. No, mine's a nobler venture: What do you think
Of a distressed Lady, one whose beauty
Would overfell all Italy?

John. Where is she——

Fred. A woman of that rare behaviour,
So qualified, as admiration
Dwells round about her: of that perfect spirit——

John. I marry Sir.

Fred. That admirable carriage,
That sweetness in discourse; young as the morning,
Her blushes staining his.

John. But where's this creature?
Shew me but that.

Fred. That's all one, she's forth-coming,
I have her sure Boy.

John. Hark ye Frederick,
What truck betwixt my Infant?

Fred. 'Tis too light Sir,
Stick to your charges good Don John, I am well.

John. But is there such a wench?

Fred. First tell me this,
Did ye not lately as ye walk'd along,
Discover people that were arm'd, and likely
To do offence?

John. Yes marry, and they urg'd it
As far as they had spirit.

Fred. Pray go forward.

John. A Gentleman I found ingag'd amongst 'em,
It seems of noble breeding, I'm sure brave metal,
As I return'd to look you, I set in to him,
And without hurt (I thank heaven) rescued him,
And came my self off safe too.

Fred. My work's done then:
And now to satisfy you, there is a woman,
Oh John, there is a woman——

John. Oh, where is she?

Fred. And one of no less worth than I assure ye;
And which is more, fallen under my protection.

John. I am glad of that: forward sweet Frederick.

Fred. And which is more than that, by this night's wan-
And which is most of all, she is at home too Sir. (dring,

John. Come, let's be gone then.

Fred. Yes, but 'tis most certain,
You cannot see her, John.

John. Why?

Fred. She has sworn me
That none else shall come near her: not my Mother,
Till some few doubts are clear'd.

John. Not look upon her? What chamber is she in?

Fred. In ours.

John. Let's go I say:

A woman's oaths are wafers, break with making,
They must for modestie a little: we all know it.

Fred. No, I'll assure you Sir.

John. Not see her?

I smell an old dog trick of yours, well Frederick,
Ye talkt to me of whoring, let's have fair play,
Square dealing I would wish ye.

Fred. When 'tis come,
(Which I know never will be) to that issue,
Your spoon shall be as deep as mine Sir.

John. Tell me,

And tell me true, is the cause honourable,
Or for your ease?

Fred. By all our friendship, John,
'Tis honest, and of great end.

John. I am answer'd:

But let me see her though: leave the door open
As ye go in.

Fred. I dare not.

John. Not wide open,
But just so, as a jealous husband
Would level at his wanton wife through.

Fred. That courtesie,
If ye desire no more, and keep it strictly,
I dare afford ye: come, 'tis now near morning.

[Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter Peter, and Anthony.

Pet. Nay the old woman's gone too.

Ant. She's a Catterwauling
Among the gutters: But conceive me, Peter,
Where our good Masters should be?

Pet. Where they should be
I do conceive, but where they are, good Anthony——

Ant. I, there it goes: my Masters bo-peep with me,
With his slye popping in and out again,
Argued a cause, a frippery cause.

Pet. Believe me,
They bear up with some carvel.

Ant. I do believe thee,
For thou hast such a Master for that chase,
That till he spend his main Mast——

Pet. Pray remember
Your courtesie good Anthony, and withal,
How long 'tis since your Master sprung a leak,
He had a found one since he came.

Ant. Hark. Pet. What?

Ant. Dost not hear a Lute?

Again? Pet. Where is't?

Ant. Above in my Masters chamber.

Pet. There's no creature: he hath the key himself man.

{ Lute sounds within.

SING within.

Merciless Love, whom nature hath deny'd
The use of eyes, lest thou should'st take a pride
And glorie in thy murders: Why am I
That never yet transgress'd thy deity,
Never broke vow, from whose eyes never Flew disdainfull dart
Whose hard heart never,
Slew those rewarders?
Thou art young and fair,
Thy Mother soft and gentle as the air,
Thy holy fire still burning, blown with praier.
Then everlasting Love restrain thy will
'Tis God-like to have power but not to kill.

Ant. This is his Lute: let him have it.

Pet. I grant you; but who strikes it?

Ant. An admirable voice too, hark ye.

Pet. Anthony,

Art sure we are at home?

Ant. Without all doubt, Peter.

Pet. Then this must be the Devil.

Ant. Let it be, [Sing again.

Good Devil sing again: O dainty Devil!

Peter believe it, a most delicate Devil,

The sweetest Devil——

Enter Frederick, and Don John.

Fred. If ye could leave peeping.

John. I cannot by no means.

Fred. Then come in softly,
And as ye love your faith, presume no further
Than ye have promised.

John. Basta.

Fred. What make you up so early Sir?

John. You Sir in your contemplations.

Pet. O pray ye peace Sir.

Fred. Why peace Sir?

Pet.

Pet. Do you hear?
John. 'Tis your Lute.
Fred. Pray ye speak softly,
 She's playing on't.
Ant. The house is haunted Sir,
 For this we have heard this half year.
Fred. Ye saw nothing?
Ant. Not I.
Pet. Nor I Sir.
Fred. Get us our breakfast then,
 And make no words on't; we'll undertake this spirit,
 If it be one.
Ant. This is no Devil Peter.
 Mum, there be Bats abroad. Sing.
[Exeunt Servants.
Fred. Stay, now she sings.
John. An Angels voice I'le swear.
Fred. Why did'st thou shrug so?
 Either allay this heat; or as I live
 I will not trust ye.
John. Pafs: I warrant ye. [Exeunt.

Enter Constantia.

Con. To curse those stars, that men say govern us,
 To rail at fortune, fall out with my Fate,
 And tax the general world, will help me nothing:
 Alas, I am the same still, neither are they
 Subject to helps, or hurts: Our own desires
 Are our own fates, our own stars, all our fortunes,
 Which as we sway 'em, so abuse, or bless us.

Enter Frederick, and Don John, peeping.

Fred. Peace to your meditations.
John. Pox upon ye,
 Stand out o'th' light.
Const. I crave your mercy Sir,
 My minde o're-charg'd with care made me unmannerly.
Fred. Pray ye set that mind at rest, all shall be perfect.
John. I like the body rare; a handsom body,
 A wondrous handsom body: would she would turn:
 See, and that spiteful puppy be not got
 Between me and my light again.
Fred. 'Tis done,
 As all that you command shall be: the Gentleman
 Is safely off all danger.
John. O de dios.
Const. How shall I thank ye Sir? how satisfie?
Fr. Speak softly, gentle Lady, all's rewarded,
 Now does he melt like Marmalad.
John. Nay, 'tis certain,
 Thou art the sweetest woman I e're look'd on:
 I hope thou art not honest.
Fred. None disturb'd ye?
Const. Not any Sir, nor any sound came near me,
 I thank your care.
Fred. 'Tis well.
John. I would fain pray now,
 But the Devil and that flesh there, o' the world,
 What are we made to suffer?
Fred. He'll enter;
 Pull in your head and be hang'd.
John. Hark ye Frederick,
 I have brought ye home your Pack-saddle.
Fred. Pox upon ye.
Con. Nay let him enter: fie my Lord the Duke,
 Stand peeping at your friends.
Fred. Ye are cozen'd Lady,
 Here is no Duke.
Const. I know him full well Signior.
John. Hold thee there wench.
Fred. This mad-brain'd fool will spoil all.
Const. I do beseech your grace come in.
John. My Grace,
 There was a word of comfort.
Fred. Shall he enter?

Who e're he be?

John. Well follow'd Frederick.
Const. With all my heart.
Fred. Come in then.

Enter Don John.

John. 'Bless ye Lady.
Fr. Nay start not, though he be a stranger to ye;
 He's of a noble Itrain, my kinsman, Lady,
 My Country-man, and fellow Traveller,
 One bed contains us ever, one purse feeds us;
 And one faith free between us; do not fear him,
 He's truly honest.

John. That's a lye.

Fred. And trusty:

Beyond your wishes: valiant to defend,
 And modest to converse with, as your blushes:
Jo. Now may I hang my self; this commendation
 Has broke the neck of all my hopes: for now
 Must I cry, no forsooth, and I forsooth, and surely,
 And truly as I live; and as I am honest.
 Has done these things for 'noncetoo; for he knows
 Like a most envious Rascal as he is,
 I am not honest, nor desire to be,
 Especially this way: h'as watch'd his time,
 But I shall quit him.

Const. Sir, I credit ye.

Fred. Go kits her John.

John. Plague o' your commendation's.

Const. Sir, I shall now desire to be a trouble:

John. Never to me, sweet Lady: Thus I seal
 My faith, and all my service.

Const. One word Signior.

John. Now 'tis impossible I should be honest,
 She kisses with a conjuration
 Would make the Devil dance: what points she at?
 My leg I warrant, or my well knit body;
 Sit fast Don Frederick.

Fred. 'Twas given him by that Gentleman
 You took such care of; his own being lost i'th' scuffle.

Con. With much joy may he wear it: 'tis a right one;
 I can assure ye Gentleman, and right happy
 May you be in all fights for that fair service.

Fred. Why do ye blush?

Const. 'T had almost cozen'd me,
 For not to lye, when I saw that, I look'd for Another Master of it: but 'tis well. [Knock within.

Fred. Who's there?

Enter Anthony.

Stand ye a little close: Come in Sir, [Exit Const.
 Now what's the news with you?

Anth. There is a Gentleman without,
 Would speak with Don John.

John. Who Sir?

Ant. I do not know Sir; but he shews a man
 Of no mean reckoning.

Fred. Let him shew his name,
 And then return a little wiser.

Ant. Well Sir. [Exit Anthony.

Fred. How do you like her John?

John. As well as you Frederick,
 For all I am honest: you shall find it so too.

Fred. Art thou not honest?

John. Art thou an Ass?
 And modest as her blushes? What block-head
 Would e're have popt out such a dry Apologie;
 For his dear friend? and to a Gentlewoman,
 A woman of her youth, and delicacy.

They are arguments to draw them to abhor us.
 An honest moral man? 'tis for a Constable:
 A handsome man, a wholesome man, a tough man;
 A liberal man, a likely man, a man
 Made up like Hercules, unslak'd with service:

The same to night, to morrow night, the next night,
And so to perpetuities of pleasures,
These had been things to hearken to, things catching :
But you have such a ipic'd consideration,
Such qualms upon your worships conscience,
Such chil-blains in your blood, that all things pinch ye,
Which nature, and the liberal world makes custom,
And nothing but fair honour, O sweet honor,
Hang up your Eunuch honour : That I was trusty,
And valiant, were things well put in ; but modest !
A modest Gentleman ! O wit where wast thou ?

Fred. I am sorrie John.

John. My Ladies Gentwoman
Would laugh me to a Shool-boy, make me blush
With playing with my Codpiece point : fie on thee,
A man of thy discretion ?

Fred. It shall be mended :
And henceforth ye shall have your due.

Enter Anthony.

John. I look for't : How now, who is't ?

Ant. A Gentleman of this Town
And calls himself Petrucchio.

Enter Constantia.

John. Ple attend him.

Const. How did he call himself ? Fred. Petrucchio,
Does it concern you ought ?

Const. O Gentlemen,
The hour of my destruction is come on me,
I am discover'd, lost, left to my ruine :
As ever ye had pity ———

John. Do not fear,
Let the great devil come, he shall come through me:
Lost here, and we about ye ?

Fred. Fall before us ?

Const. O my unfortunate estate, all angers
Compar'd to his, to his ———

Fred. Let his, and all mens,
Whilst we have power and life — stand up for heaven sake.

Con. I have offended heaven too ; yet heaven knows ———

John. We are all evil :
Yet Heaven forbid we should have our deserts.
What is he ? Con. Too too near to my offence Sir ;
O he will cut me piece-meal.

Fred. 'Tis no Treason ?

John. Let it be what it will, if he cut here,
I'll find him cut-work.

Fred. He must buy you dear,
With more than common lives.

John. Fear not, nor weep not :
By heaven I'll fire the Town before ye perish,
And then, the more the merrier, we'll jog with ye.

Fred. Come in, and dry your eyes.

John. Pray no more weeping :
Spoil a sweet face for nothing ? my return
Shall end all this I warrant you.

Const. Heaven grant it.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Petrucchio, with a Letter.

Petr. This man should be of special rank :
For these commends carry no common way,
No slight worth with 'em :
He shall be he.

Enter Don John.

John. 'Save ye Sir : I am sorrie
My business was so unmannerly, to make ye
Wait thus long here.

Petr. Occasions must be serv'd Sir :
But is your name Don John ?

John. It is Sir. Petr. Then,

First, for your own brave sake I must embrace ye :
Next, from the credit of your noble friend
Hernando de Alvara, make ye mine :
Who lays his charge upon me in this Letter
To look ye out, and for the goodness in ye,
Whilst your occasions make ye resident
In this place, to supply ye, love and honour ye ;
Which had I know sooner ———

John. Noble Sir,

You'll make my thanks too poor : I wear a sword, Sir,
And have a service to be still dispos'd of,
As you shall please command it.

Petr. Gentle Sir,

That manly courtesie is half my business :
And to be short, to make ye know I honour ye,
And in all points believe your worth like Oracle,
And how above my friends, which are not few,
And those not slack, I estimate your vertues,
Make your self understand, This day Petrucchio,
A man that may command the strength of this place,
Hazard the boldest spirits, hath made choice
Only of you, and in a noble office.

John. Forward, I am free to entertain it.

Petr. Thus then :

I do beseech ye mark me.

John. I shall do it.

Petr. Ferrara's Duke, would I might call him worthie,
But that he has raz'd out from his family,
As he has mine with Infamie, This man,
Rather this powerfull Monster, we being left
But two of all our house, to stock our memories,
My Sister, and my self ; with arts, and witchcrafts,
Vows, and such oaths heaven has no mercy for,
Drew to dishonour this weak maid, by stealths,
And secret passages I knew not of,
Oft he obtain'd his wishes, oft abus'd her :
I am asham'd to say the rest : This purchas'd,
And his hot blood allay'd, as friends forsake us
At a miles end upon our way, he left her,
And all our name to ruine.

John. This was foul Play,
And ought to be rewarded so.

Petr. I hope so ;

He scap'd me yester-night : which if he dare
Again adventure for, Heaven pardon him,
I shall with all my heart.

John. For me, brave Signior,
What do ye intend ?

Petr. Only, fair Sir, this trust,
Which from the commendations of this Letter,
I dare presume well plac'd, nobly to bear him
By word of mouth a single challenge from me,
That man to man, if he have honour in him,
We may decide all difference.

John. Fair, and noble,
And I will do it home : When shall I visite ye ?

Petr. Please you this after-noon, I will ride with you :
For at a Castle six miles hence, we are sure
To find him.

John. I'll be ready.

Petr. To attend ye,
My man shall wait : with all my love.

[Ex. Petr.]

John. My service shall not fail ye.

Enter Frederick.

Fred. How now ?

John. All's well : who dost thou think this wench is ?
Ghes, and thou canst ?

Fred. I cannot.

John. Be it known then,
To all men by these presents, this is she,
She, she, and only she, our curious coxcombs
Were errant two moneths after.

Fred. Who, Constantia ?

Thou talk'st of Cocks and Bulls.

John. I talk of wenches,
Of cocks and Hens Don Frederick; this is the Pullet
We two went proud after.

Fred. It cannot be.

John. It shall be;
Sister to Don Petrucchio: I know all man.

Fred. Now I believe.

John. Go to, there has been stirring,
Fumbling with Linnen Frederick;

Fred. 'Tis impossible,

You know her fame was pure as fire.

John. That pure fire

Has melted out her maiden-head: she is crackt;
We have all that hope of our side, boy.

Fred. Thou tell'st me,
To my imagination, things incredible:
I see no loose thought in her.

John. That's all one,
She is loose i'th' hilts by heaven: but the world must know
A fair way, upon vow of marriage.

Fred. There may be such a slip.

John. And will be, Frederick;
Whil'st the old game's a foot: I fear the boy
Will prove hers too I took up.

Fred. Good circumstance
May cure all this yet.

John. There thou hitst it, Frederick:
Come, let's walk in and comfort her: her being here
Is nothing yet suspected: anon I'll tell thee
Wherefore her Brother came, who by this light
Is a brave noble fellow, and what honour
H'as done to me a stranger: there be Irons
Heating for some, will hiss into their heart blouds,
E're all be ended; so much for this time.

Fred. Well Sir.

[Exeunt.]

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter Land-lady, and Peter.

Land. Come, ye do know.

Pet. I do not by this hand Mistress.
But I suspect.

Land. What?

Peter. That if egges continue
At this price, women will ne're be fav'd
By their good works.

Land. I will know.

Peter. Ye shall, any thing
Lyes in my power: The Duke of Lorraine now
Is seven thousand strong: I heard it of a fish-wife,
A woman of fine knowledge.

Land. Sirrah, Sirrah.

Pet. The Popes Bulls are broke loose too, and 'tis suspected
They shall be baited in England:

Land. Very well Sir.

Peter. No, 'tis not so well neither:

Land. But I say to ye,
Who is it keeps your Master company?

Peter. I say to you, Don John.

Land. I say what woman?

Peter. I say so too.

Land. I say again, I will know.

Peter. I say 'tis fit ye should.

Land. And I tell thee
He has a woman here.

Peter. And I tell thee

'Tis then the better for him.

Land. You are no Bawd now?

Peter. Would I were able to be call'd unto it:
A worshipfull vocation for my elders;

For as I understand it is a place
Fitting my betters far.

Land. Was ever Gentlewoman
So frumpt off with a fool? well sawcy Sirrah,
I will know who it is, and for what purpose;
I pay the rent, and I will know how my house
Comes by these Inflammations: if this geer hold,
Best hang a sign-post up, to tell the Signiors,
Here ye may have lewdness at Liverie.

Enter Frederick.

Peter. 'Twould be a great ease to your age.

Fred. How now?

Why what's the matter Land-lady?

Land. What's the matter?

Ye use me decently among ye Gentlemen.

Fred. Who has abus'd her, you Sir?

Land. 'Ods my witness

I will not be thus treated, that I will not.

Peter. I gave her no ill language.

Land. Thou lyest lewdly,

Thou tookst me up at every word I spoke,
As I had been a Mawkin, a flurt Gillian;
And thou thinkst, because thou canst write and read,
Our noses must be under thee.

Fred. Dare you Sirrah?

Pet. Let but the truth be known Sir, I beseech ye,
She raves of wenches, and I know not what Sir.

Land. Go to, thou know'st too well, thou wicked varlet,
Thou instrument of evil.

Peter. As I live Sir,

She is ever thus till dinner.

Fred. Get ye in,

I'll answer you anon Sir.

Peter. By this hand

I'll break your Posset pan.

Land. Then by this hood

I'll lock the meat up.

Fred. Now your grief, what is't?

For I can ghesse ———

Land. Ye may with shame enough,
If there were shame amongst ye; nothing thought on,
But how ye may abuse my house? not satisfi'd
With bringing home your Bastards to undoe me,
But you must drill your whores here too? my patience
(Because I bear, and bear, and carry all,
And as they say am willing to groan under)
Must be your make-sport now.

Fred. No more of these words,
Nor no more murmurings Lady: for you know
That I know something. I did suspect your anger,
But turn it presently and handsomely,
And bear your self discreetly to this woman,
For such an one there is indeed.

Land. 'Tis well son.

Fred. Leaving your devils Matins, and your melancholies,
Or we shall leave our lodgings.

Land. You have much need

To use these vagrant ways, and to much profit:
Ye had that might content

(At home within your selves too) right good Gentlemen,
Wholsome, and ye said handsom: But you gallants,
Beast that I was to believe ye ———

Fred. Leave your suspicion:

For as I live there's no such thing.

Land. Mine honour;

And 'twere not for mine honour.

Fred. Come, your honour,
Your house, and you too, if you dare believe me,
Are well enough: sleek up your self, leave crying,
For I must have ye entertain this Lady
With all civility, she well deserves it,
Together with all secrecie: I dare trust ye;
For I have found ye faithfull: when you know her,

You will find your own fault : no more words, but do it.

Land. You know you may command me.

Enter Don John.

John. Worshipful Lady;
How does thy velvet Scabbard? by this hand
Thou lookst most amiably, now could I willingly,
And 'twere not for abusing thy Geneva print there,
Venture my Body with thee.

Land. You'll leave this Roguery
When you come to my years.

John. By this light
Thou art not above fifteen yet, a meer Girl,
Thou hast not half thy teeth: come——

Fred. Prithee John
Let her alone, she has been vex'd already;
She'll grow stark mad, man.

John. I would see her mad,
An old mad woman——

Fred. Prithee be patient.
John. Is like a Millers Mare, troubled with tooth-ach.
She'll make the rarest faces.

Fred. Go, and do it,
And do not mind this fellow.

Land. Well, Don John,
There will be times again; when O good Mother,
What's good for a Carnosity in the Bladder?
O the green water, Mother.

John. Doting take ye;
Do ye remember that?

Fred. She has paid ye now, Sir.

Land. Clary, sweet mother, clary.

Fred. Are ye satisfied?

Land. I'll never whore again, never give petticoats
And Waistcoats at five pound apiece: good mother,
Quickly mother; now mock on Son.

John. A Devil grind your old Chaps. [Exit Landlady.]

Fred. By this hand, wench,
I'll give thee a new hood for this.
Has she met with your Lordship?

John. Touch-wood take her.

Enter Anthony.

She's a rare ghostly Mother.

Ant. Below attends ye
The Gentlemans man, Sir, that was with you.

John. Well, Sir;
My time is come then; yet if my project hold,
You shall not stay behind; I'll rather trust

Enter Constantia.

A Cat with sweet milk, Frederick; by her face,
I feel her fears are working.

Const. Is there no way,
I do beseech ye think yet, to divert
This certain danger?

Fred. 'Tis impossible;
Their Honours are engag'd.

Const. Then there must be murther,
Which, Gentlemen, I shall no sooner hear of,
Than make one in't: you may if you please, Sir,
Make all go less yet.

John. Lady, were't mine own Cause,
I could dispense; but loaden with my friends trust,
I must go on; though general massacres
As much I fear——

Const. Do ye hear, Sir; for Heavens pity
Let me request one love of you.

Fred. Yes, any thing.

Const. This Gentleman I find too resolute,
Too hot and fiery for the Cause; as ever
You did a vertuous deed, for honours sake
Go with him, and allay him; your fair temper
And noble disposition, like wish'd shows,

May quench those eating fires, that would spoil all else.
I see in him destruction.

Fred. I will do it;
And 'tis a wise consideration,
To me a bounteous favour, hark ye, John;
I will go with ye.

John. No.

Fred. Indeed I will,
Ye go upon a hazard; no denial,
For as I live, I'll go.

John. Then make ye ready,
For I am straight o' horse-back.

Fred. My Sword on,
I am as ready as you; what my best labour,
With all the art I have can work upon 'em,
Be sure of, and expect fair end; the old Gentlewoman
Shall wait upon you; she is both grave and private,
And ye may trust her in all points.

Const. You are noble;
And so I kiss your hand.

John. That seal for me too,
And I hope happy issue, Lady.

Const. All Heavens Care upon ye, and my Prayers.

John. So,
Now my mind's at rest.

Fred. Away, 'tis late, John.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Antonio, a Surgeon; and 2 Gentlemen.

1 Gent. Come, Sir, be hearty, all the worst is past.

Ant. Give me some Wine.

Sur. 'Tis death, Sir.

Ant. 'Tis a Horse, Sir.

To be dress'd to the tune of Ale only!
Nothing but sawces to my fores!

2 Gent. Fie, Antonio,
You must be govern'd.

Ant. H'as given me a damn'd Clyster,
Only of sand and snow water, Gentlemen,
Has almost scour'd my guts out.

Sur. I have giv'n you that, Sir,
Is fittest for your state.

Ant. And here he feeds me
With rotten ends of Rooks, and drown'd Chickens,
Stew'd Pericraniums, and Pia-maters;
And when I go to bed (by Heaven 'tis true Gentlemen)
He rolls me up in Lints, with Labels at 'em,
That I am just the man i'th' Almanack,
In Head and Face, is Aries place.

Sur. Will't please ye
To let your friends see you open'd?

Ant. Will't please you, Sir,
To let me have a wench? I feel my Body
Open enough for that yet.

Sur. How, a Wench?

Ant. Why look ye, Gentlemen; thus I am us'd still,
I can get nothing that I want.

1 Gent. Leave these things,
And let him open ye.

Ant. D'ye hear, Surgeon?

Send for the Musick, let me have some pleasure
To entertain my friends, besides your Sallads,
Your green salves, and your searches, and some Wine too,
That I may only smell to it; or by this light
I'll dye upon thy hand, and spoil thy custome.

1 Gent. Let him have Musick.

Enter Rowl. with Wine.

Sur. 'Tis in the house, and ready,
If he will ask no more but Wine——

2 Gent. He shall not drink it.

Sur. Will these things please ye?

Ant. Yes, and let 'em sing

[Musick.]

John

John Dorrie.

2 Gent. 'Tis too long.

Ant. I'll have John Dorrie,

For to that warlike tune I will be open'd : (geon,
Give me some drink, have ye stopt the leaks well, Sur-
All will run out else?

Surg. Fear not.

Ant. Sit down, Gentlemen :

And now advance your Plaisters. [Song of John Dorrie.
Give 'em ten shillings, friends ; how do ye find me ?
What symptoms do you see now ?

Surg. None, Sir, dangerous ;
But if you will be rul'd——

Ant. What time ?

Surg. I can cure you
In forty days, if you will not transgress me.

Ant. I have a Dog shall lick me whole in twenty ;
In how long canst thou kill me ?

Surg. Presently.

Ant. Do it, there's more delight in't.

1 Gent. You must have patience.

Ant. Man, I must have business ; this foolish fellow
Hinders himself ; I have a dozen Rascals
To hurt within these five days ; good man-mender,
Stop me with some Parsley, like stuf Beef,
And let me walk abroad.

Surg. Ye shall walk shortly.

Ant. For I must find Petrucchio.

2 Gent. Time enough. (these three days

1 Gent. Come, lead him in, and let him sleep : within We'll beg ye leave to play.

2 Gent. And then how things fall,
We'll certainly inform ye.

Ant. But Surgeon, promise me
I shall drink Wine then too.

Surg. A little temper'd.

Ant. Nay, I'll no tempering, Surgeon.

Surg. Well, as't please ye,
So ye exceed not.

Ant. Farewell : and if ye find
The mad Slave that thus slash'd me, commend me to him,
And bid him keep his Skin close.

1 Gent. Take your rest, Sir.

[Exeunt.

SCENE III.

Enter Constantia, and Land-lady.

Const. I have told ye all I can, and more than yet
Those Gentlemen know of me ; ever trusting
Your Counsel and Concealment ; for to me
You seem a worthy Woman ; one of those
Are seldom found in our Sex ; wife and vertuous,
Direct me I beseech ye.

Land. Ye say well, Lady,
And hold ye to that point, for in these businesses
A Womans Counsel that conceives the matter,
(Do ye mark me ? that conceives the matter, Lady)
Is worth ten mens engagements : She knows something,
And out of that can work like Wax ; when men
Are giddy-headed, either out of Wine,
Or a more Drunkenness, vain Ostentation,
Discovering all ; there is no more keep in 'em
Than hold upon an Eeles tail ; Nay, 'tis held fashion
To defame now all they can.

Const. I, but these Gentlemen——

Land. Do not you trust to that ; these Gentlemen
Are as all Gentlemen of the same Barrel ;
I, and the self same pickle too. Be it granted,
They have us'd ye with respect and fair behaviour,
Ere since ye came, do you know what must follow ?
They are Spaniards, Lady, Gennets of high mettle,
Things that will thrash the Devil, or his Dam,
Let 'em appear but cloven.

Const. Now Heaven blefs me.

Land. Mad Colts will court the wind ; I know 'em, Lady,
To the least hair they have ; and I tell you,
Old as I am, let but the pint pot blefs 'em,
They'll offer to my years——

Const. How ?

Land. Such rude gambols——

Const. To you ?

Land. I, and so handle me, that oft I am forc'd
To fight of all four for my safety ; there's the younger,
Don John, the arrantest Jack in all this City ;
The other, Time has blasted, yet he will stoop,
If not o'rflown, and freely on the quarry ;
Has been a Dragon in his days. But Tarmont,
Don Jenkin is the Devil himself, the dog days,
The most incomprehensible Whore master,
Twenty a night is nothing ; Beggars, Broom-women,
And those so miserable, they look like famine,
Are all sweet Ladies in his drink.

Const. He's a handsome Gentleman ;
Pity he should be master of such follies.

Land. He's ne'r without a noife of Sirynges in's Pocket, those proclaim him ; birding Pills,
Waters to cool his Conscience, in small Viols :
With thousand such sufficient emblems ; the truth is,
Whose Chastity he chops upon he cares not,
He flies at all ; Bastards upon my conscience,
He has now in making, multitudes ; the last night
He brought home one ; I pity her that bore it,
But we are all weak Vessels, some rich Woman
(For wife I dare not call her) was the mother,
For it was hung with Jewels ; the bearing Cloth
No less than Crimson Velvet.

Const. How ?

Land. 'Tis true, Lady.

Const. Was it a Boy too ?

Land. A brave Boy ; deliberation
And judgment shew'd in's getting, as I'll say for him,
He's as well paced for that sport——

Const. May I see it ?

For there is a neighbour of mine ; a Gentlewoman,
Has had a late mischance, which willingly
I would know further of ; now if you please
To be so courteous to me.

Land. Ye shall see it :

But what do ye think of these men now ye know 'em,
And of the cause I told ye of ? Be wise,
Ye may repent too late else ; I but tell you
For your own good, and as you will find it, Lady.

Const. I am advis'd.

Land. No more words then ; do that,
And instantly, I told ye of. be ready ;
Don John, I'll fit you for your frumps.

Const. I shall be :

But shall I see this Child ?

Land. Within this half hour,
Let's in, and there think better ; she that's wife
Leaps at occasion first ; the rest pay for it.

[Exeunt.

SCENE IV.

Enter Petrucchio, Don John, and Frederick.

John. Sir, he is worth your knowledg, and a Gentleman
If I that so much love him, may commend him,
Of free and vertuous parts ; and one, if foul play
Should fall upon us, for which fear I brought him,
Will not flye back for phillips.

Pet. Ye much honour me ;

And once more I pronounce ye both mine.

Fred. Stay, what Troop

Is that below i' th' Valley there ?

John. Hawking I take it.

Pet. They are so ; 'tis the Duke, 'tis even he, Gentlemen,
Sirrah, draw back the Horses till we call ye,
I know him by his Company.

Fred.

Fred. I think too
He bends up this way.

Pet. So he does.

John. Stand you still

Within that Covert till I call: you, Frederick,
By no means be not seen, unless they offer
To bring on odds upon us; he comes forward,
Here will I wait him fairly: to your Cabins.

Pet. I need no more instruct ye?

John. Fear me not,
I'll give it him, and boldly. [Ex. Pet. and Fred.

Enter Duke and his faction.

Duke. Feed the Hawks up,
We'll lie no more to day, O my blest fortune!
Have I so fairly met the man?

John. Ye have, Sir,
And him you know by this.

Duke. Sir all the honour,
And love——

John. I do beseech your Grace stay there,
(For I know you too now) that love and honour
I come not to receive; nor can you give it,
Till ye appear fair to the world; I must beseech ye
Dismiss your train a little.

Duke. Walk aside,
And out of hearing I command ye: Now, Sir.

John. Last time we met, I was a friend.

Duke. And Nobly,
You did a friends office; let your business
Be what it may, you must be still——

John. Your pardon,
Never a friend to him, cannot be friend
To his own honour.

Duke. In what have I transgress'd it?
Ye make a bold breach at the first, Sir.

John. Bolder,
You made that breach that let in infamy,
And ruine, to surprize a noble stock.

Duke. Be plain, Sir.

John. I will, and short;
Ye have wrong'd a Gentleman,
Little behind your self, beyond all justice,
Beyond mediation of all friends.

Duke. The man, and manner of wrong?

John. Petrucchio,
The wrong, ye have Whor'd his Sister.

Duke. What's his will in't?

John. His will is to oppose you like a Gentleman,
And single, to decide all.

Duke. Now stay you, Sir,
And hear me with the like belief: this Gentleman,
His Sister that you nam'd, 'tis true I have long lov'd,
Nor was that love lascivious, as he makes it;
As true, I have enjoy'd her: no less truth,
I have a Child by her: but that she, or he,
Or any of that family are tainted,
Suffer disgrace, or ruin, by my pleasures,
I wear a Sword to satisfy the world no,
And him in this cause when he please; for know, Sir,
She is my Wife, contracted before Heaven,
(Witness I owe more tye to, than her Brother)
Nor will I flye from that name, which long since
Had had the Churches approbation,
But for his jealous danger.

John. Sir, your pardon,
And all that was my anger, now my service.

Duke. Fair Sir, I knew I should convert ye; had we
But that rough man here now too——

John. And ye shall, Sir,
Whoa, hoa, hoo.

Duke. I hope ye have laid no Ambush?

Enter Petrucchio.

John. Only friends.

Duke. My noble Brother welcome:
Come put your anger off, we'll no fighting,
Unless you will maintain I am unworthy
To bear that name.

Pet. Do you speak this heartily?

Duke. Upon my soul, and truly; the first Priest
Shall put you out of these doubts.

Pet. Now I love ye;
And I beseech you pardon my suspicions,
You are now more than a Brother, a brave friend too.

John. The good man's over-joy'd.

Enter Frederick.

Fred. How, how, how goes it? (Frederick,

John. Why, the man has his Mare again, and all's well,
The Duke professes freely he's her Husband.

Fred. 'Tis a good hearing.

John. Yes, for modest Gentlemen.
I must present ye: may it please your Grace,
To number this brave Gentleman, my friend,
And noble kinsman, amongst those your servants. (me

Duke. O my brave friend! you shower your bounties on Amongst my best thoughts, Signior, in which number
You being worthily dispos'd already,
May place your friend to honour me.

Fred. My love, Sir,
And where your Grace dares trust me, all my service.

Pet. Why? this is wondrous happy: But now Brother,
Now comes the bitter to our sweet: Constantia.

Duke. Why, what of her?

Pet. Nor what, nor where, do I know?
Wing'd with her fears last night, beyond my knowledge,
She quit my house, but whither——

Fred. Let not that——

Duke. No more good Sir, I have heard too much.

Pet. Nay sink not,
She cannot be so lost.

John. Nor shall not, Gentlemen;
Be free again, the Lady's found; that smile, Sir,
Shews ye distrust your Servant.

Duke. I do beseech ye.

John. Ye shall believe me: by my soul she is safe.

Duke. Heaven knows, I would believe, Sir.

Fred. Ye may safely.

John. And under noble usage: this fair Gentleman
Met her in all her doubts last night, and to his Guard,
(Her fears being strong upon her) she gave her person,
Who waited on her to our lodging; where all respect,
Civil and honest service now attend her.

Pet. Ye may believe now.

Duke. Yes, I do, and strongly:
Well my good friends, or rather my good Angels,
For ye have both preserv'd me; when these vertues
Dye in your friends remembrance——

John. Good your Grace,
Lose no more time in complement, 'tis too precious,
I know it by my self there can be no Hell
To his that hangs upon his hopes; especially
In way of lustly pleasures.

Pet. He has hit it.

Fred. To horse again then, for this night I'll crown
With all the joyes ye wish for.

Pet. Happy Gentlemen. [Exeunt.

Enter Francisco.

Fran. This is the maddest mischief: never fool
Was so sob'd off, as I am; made ridiculous,
And to my self mine own Ass: trust a Woman?
I'll trust the Devil first; for he dare be Better than's word sometime: what faith have I broke?
In what observance fail'd? Let me consider,

Enter

Enter Don John, and Frederick.

For this is monstrous usage.

Fred. Let them talk,

We'll ride on fair and softly.

Fran. Well, Constantia.

Fred. Constantia, what's this fellow? stay by all means.

Fran. Ye have spun your self a fair thread now.

Fred. Stand still, John.

Fran. What cause had you to fly? what fear possest ye?

Were you not safely lodg'd from all suspicion?

Us'd with all gentle means? did any know

How ye came thither, or what your sin was.

Fred. John,

I smell some juggling, John.

John. Yes, Frederick, I fear it will be found so.

Fran. So strangely,

Without the counsel of your friends; so desperately

To put all dangers on ye?

Fred. 'Tis she.

Fran. So deceitfully,

After a strangers lure!

John. Did ye mark that, Frederick?

Fran. To make ye appear more monster; and the Law

More cruel to reward ye? to leave all,

All that should be your safegard, to seek evils?

Was this your wisdom? this your promise? well,

He that incited ye——

Fred. Mark that too.

John. Yes Sir.

Fran. 'Had better have plough'd farther off; now Lady,

What will your last friend, he that should preserve ye,

And hold your credit up, the brave Antonio,

Think of this slip? he'll to Petrucchio,

And call for open justice.

John. 'Tis she, Frederick.

Fred. But what that he is, John?

Fra. I do not doubt yet

To bolt ye out, for I know certainly

Ye are about the Town still: ha, no more words. [Exit.

Fred. Well.

John. Very well.

Fred. Discreetly.

John. Finely carried.

Fred. You have no more of these tricks?

John. Ten to one, Sir,

I shall meet with 'em if ye have.

Fred. Is this honest?

John. Was it in you a friends part to deal double?

I am no As Don Frederick.

Fred. And Don John,

It shall appear I am no fool:

Disgrace me to make your self a lecher?

'Tis boyish, 'tis base.

John. 'Tis false, and most unmanly to upbraid me,

Nor will I be your bolster, Sir.

Fra. Thou wanton boy, thou hadst better have been Eunuch,

Thou common womans courtesie, than thus

Lascivious, basely to have bent mine honour.

A friend? I'll make a horse my friend first.

John. Holla, holla,

Ye kick too fast, Sir: what strange brains have you got,

That dare crow out thus bravely? I better been an Eunuch?

I privy to this dog trick? clear your self,

For I know where the wind sits, and most nobly,

Or as I have a life——

Fred. No more: they're horses. [A noise within

Nor shew no discontent: to morrow comes; [like horses.

Let's quietly away: if she be at home,

Our jealousies are put off.

John. The fellow,

Enter Duke, Petrucchio.

We have lost him in our spleens, like fools.

Duke. Come, Gentlemen,
Now set on roundly: suppose ye have all Mistresses,
And mend your pacc according.

Petr. Then have at ye.

[Exeunt.

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Duke, Petrucchio, Frederick, and John.

Petr. NOW to Bologna, my most honoured Brother,
I dare pronounce ye a hearty, and safe welcome,
Our loves shall now way-lay ye; welcome, Gentlemen.

John. The same to you brave Sir; Don Frederick,

Will ye step in and give the Lady notice

Who comes to honour her?

Petr. Bid her be sudden,

We come to see no curious wench: a night-gown

Will serve the turn: here's one that knows her nearer.

Fred. I'll tell her what ye say, Sir. [Exit Fred.

Duke. My dear brother,

Ye are a merry Gentleman.

Petr. Now will the sport be,

To observe her alterations; how like a wildfire

She'll leap into your bosom; then seeing me,

Her conscience, and her fears creeping upon her,

Dead as a fowl at soufe, she'll sink.

Duke. Fair Brother,

I must intreat you——

Petr. I conceive your mind, Sir,

I will not chide her: yet ten Duckets, Duke,

She falls upon her knees, ten more she dare not——

Duke. I must not have her frightened.

Petr. Well you shall not:

Enter Frederick, and Peter.

But like a Summers evening against heat,

Mark how I'll guild her cheeks?

John. How now?

Fred. Ye may, Sir:

Not to abuse your patience, noble friends,

Nor hold ye off with tedious circumstance;

For you must know——

Petr. What?

Duke. Where is she?

Fred. Gone, Sir.

Duke. How?

Petr. What did you say, Sir?

Fred. Gone, by Heaven removed,

The woman of the house too.

John. Well Don Frederick,

Fred. Don John, it is not well, but——

Petr. Gone?

Fred. This fellow

Can testifie I lye not.

Petr. Some four hours after

My Master was departed, with this Gentleman,

My fellow and my self being sent of business,

(As we must think) of purpose——

Petr. Hang these circumstances,

They appear like Owls, to ill ends.

John. Now could I eat

The Devil in his own broth, I am so tortur'd.

Gone?

Petr. Gone?

(me say?)

Fred. Directly gone, fled, shifted: what would you have

Duke. Well, Gentlemen,

Wrong not my good opinion.

Fred. For your Dukedom

I will not be a Knave, Sir.

John. He that is,

A rot run in his bloud.

Petr. But hark ye Gentlemen,

Are ye sure ye had her here, did ye not dream this?

John. Have you your nose, Sir?

Petr. Yes, Sir.

John. Then we had her.

Petr. Since you are so short, believe your having her shall suffer more construction.

John. Let it suffer,

But if I be not clear of all dishonour,
Or practice that may taint my reputation,
And ignorant of where this Woman is,
Make me your Cities monster.

Duke. I believe ye.

John. I could lye with a Witch now, to be reveng'd,
Upon that Rascal did this.

Fred. Only thus much

I would desire your Grace, for my mind gives me
Before night yet she is yours: stop all opinion,
And let no anger out, till full cause call it,
Then every mans own work's to justify him,
And this day let us give to search: my man here
Tells me, by chance he saw out of a window
(Which place he has taken notice of) such a face
As our old Landladies, he believes the same too,
And by her hood assures it: Let's first thither,
For she being found, all's ended.

Duke. Come, for Heavens sake,
And Fortune, and thou be'st not ever turning,
If there be one firm step in all thy reelings,
Now settle it, and save my hopes: away friends.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Antonio and his Servant.

Ant. With all my Jewels?

Ser. All, Sir.

Ant. And that mony

I left i'th' trunk?

Ser. The Trunk broke, and that gone too.

Ant. Francisco of the plot?

Ser. Gone with the wench too.

Ant. The mighty pox go with 'em: belike they thought
I was no man of this world, and those trifles
Would but disturb my conscience.

Ser. Sure they thought, Sir,
You would not live to persecute 'em.

Ant. Whore and Fidler,
Why, what a consort have they made? Hen and Bacon?
Well my sweet Mistris, well good Madam mar-tail?
You that have hung about my neck, and lick't me,
I'll try how handfomely your Ladyship
Can hang upon a Gallows, there's your Master-piece;
But hark ye Sirrah, no imagination
Of where they should be?

Ser. None, Sir, yet we have search'd
All places we suspected; I believe, Sir,
They have taken towards the Ports.

Ant. Get me a conjurer,
One that can raise a water Devil, I'll port 'em;
Play at duck and drake with my mony; take heed Fidler;
I'll dance ye by this hand, your Fiddle-stick
I'll grease of a new fashion, for presuming
To meddle with my degamboys: get me a Conjurer,
Enquire me out a man that lets out Devils:
None but my C. Cliffe serve your turn?

Ser. I know not—

Ant. In every street, Tom fool, any blear-ey'd people
With red heads, and flat noses can perform it;
Thou shalt know 'em by their half Gowns and no Breeches:
Mount my Mare Fidler? ha boy! up at first dash?
Sit sure, I'll clap a nettle, and a smart one,
Shall make your Filly firke: I will fine Fidler,
I'll put you to your plunge, Boy: Sirrah meet me
Some two hours hence at home; in the mean time
Find out a conjurer and know his price,

How he will let his Devils by the day out,
I'll have 'em, and they be above ground.

[Ex. Ant.]

Ser. Now blefs me,

What a mad man is this? I must do something
To please his humour: such a man I'll ask for,
And tell him where he is: but to come near him,
Or have any thing to do with his don Devils,
I thank my fear, I dare not, nor I will not.

[Exit.]

SCENE III.

Enter Duke, Petrucchio, Frederick, John, Peter, and Servant with Bottles.

Fred. Whither wilt thou lead us?

Petr. 'Tis hard by, Sir.

And ten to one this wine goes thither.

Duke. Forward.

Petr. Are they grown so merry?

Duke. 'Tis most most likely,
She has heard of this good fortune, and determines
To wash her sorrows off.

Petr. 'Tis so; that house, Sir,
Is it: out of that window certainly
I saw my old Mistresses face.

Petr. They are merry indeed,
Hark I hear Musick too.

[Musick.]

Duke. Excellent Musick.

John. Would I were ev'n among 'em, and alone now;
A pallat for the purpose in a corner,
And good rich Wine within me; what gay sport
Could I make in an hour now?

SONG.

*Welcome sweet liberty, and care farewell,
I am mine own,
She is twice damn'd, that lives in Hell,
When Heaven is shown.
Budding beauty, blooming years
Were made for pleasure, farewell fears,
For now I am my self, mine own command,
My fortune always in my hand.*

Fred. Hark a voice too;
Let's not stir yet by any means.

John. Was this her own voice?

Duke. Yes, sure.

Fred. 'Tis a rare one.

Enter Bawd (above.)

Du. The Song confirms her here too: for if ye mark it,
It spake of liberty, and free enjoying
The happy end of pleasure.

Petr. Look ye there, Sir,
Do ye know that head?

Fred. 'Tis my good Landlady,
I find fear has done all this.

John. She I swear,
And now do I know by the hanging of her Hood,
She is parcel drunk: shall we go in?

Duke. Not yet, Sir.

Petr. No, let 'em take their pleasure

Duke. When it is highest, [Musick.]
We'll step in, and amaze 'em: peace, more Musick.

John. This Musick murders me: what bloud have I now?

Fred. I should know that face. [Enter Fran. and Exis.]

John. By this light 'tis he, Frederick,
That bred our first suspicions, the same fellow.

Fred. He that we overtook, and overheard too,
Discoursing of Constantia.

John. Still the same;
Now he slips in.

Duke. What's that?

Fred.

Fred. She must be here Sir:
This is the very fellow; I told your Grace

Enter Francisco.

We found upon the way; and what his talk was.

Petr. Why, sure I know this fellow; yes, 'tis he,
Francisco, Antonio's Boy, a rare Musician,
He taught my Sister on the Lute, and is ever
(She loves his voice so well) about her: certain,
Without all doubt she is here: it must be so.

John. Here? that's no question: what should our hen o'th'
Do here without her? if she be not here (game else
(I am so confident) let your grace believe,
We two are arrant Rascals, and have abus'd ye.

Fred. I say so too.

John. Why there's the hood again now,
The guard that guides us; I know the fabrick of it,
And know the old tree of that saddle yet, 'twas made of,
A hunting hood, observe it.

Duke. Who shall enter?

Petr. I'll make one.

John. I, another.

Duke. But so carry it,
That all her joys flow not together.

John. If we told her,
Your grace would none of her?

Duke. By no means Signior,
'Twould turn her wild, stark frantick.

John. Or assur'd her ———

Duke. Nothing of that stern nature: this ye may Sir,
That the conditions of our fear yet stand
On nice and dangerous knittings: or that a little
I seem to doubt the child.

John. Would I could draw her
To hate your grace with these things.

Petr. Come let's enter. [Ex. Petr. and John.

And now he sees me not, I'll search her soundly.

Duke. Now luck of all sides. [Musick.

Fred. Doubt it not: more Musick:
Sure she has heard some comfort.

Duke. Yes, stand still Sir.

Fred. This is the maddest song.

Duke. Applied for certain
To some strange melancholy she is loaden with.

Fred. Now all the sport begins—hark?

Duke. They are amongst 'em,
The fears now, and the shakings? [Trampling above.

Fred. Our old Lady

(Hark how they run) is even now at this instant
Ready to lose her head-piece by Don John,

Or creeping through a Cat hole. [Petr. and John within.

Petr. Bring 'em down,
And you Sir, follow me.

Duke. He's angry with 'em,
I must not suffer this.

John, within. Bowl down the Bawd there
Old Erra mater: you Lady leachery,
For the good will I bear to th' game, most tenderly
Shall be lead out, and lash'd.

Enter Petrucchio, John, Whore, and Bawd, with Francisco.

Duke. Is this Constantia?
Why Gentlemen? what do you mean? is this she?

Whore. I am Constantia Sir.

Duke. A whore ye are Sir.

Whore. 'Tis very true: I am a whore indeed Sir.

Petr. She will not lye yet, though she steal.

Whore. A plain whore,
If you please to imploy me.

Duke. And an impudent ———

Whore. Plain dealing now is impudence.
One, if you will Sir, can shew ye as much sport
In one half hour, and with as much variety,

As a far wiser woman can in half a year:
For there my way lies.

Duke. Is she not drunk too?

Whore. A little guilded o're Sir,
Old sack, old sack boys:

Petr. This is saliant.

John. A brave bold quean.

Duke. Is this your certainty?

Do ye know the man ye wrong thus, Gentlemen?
Is this the woman meant? Fred. No.

Duke. That your Land-lady?

John. I know not what to say.

Duke. Am I a person
To be your sport, Gentlemen?

John. I do believe now certain

I am a knave; but how, or when ———

Duke. What are you?

Petr. Bawd to this piece of pye meat.

Bawd. A poor Gentlewoman
That lyes in Town, about Law busines;
And't like your worships.

Petr. You shall have Law, believe it.

Bawd. I'll shew your Mastership my case.

Petr. By no means,
I had rather see a Custard.

Bawd. My dead Husband
Left it even thus Sir.

John. Bless mine eyes from blasting,
I was never so frighted with a case.

Bawd. And so Sir ———

Petr. Enough, put up good velvet head.

Duke. What are you two now,
By your own free confessions?

Fred. What you shall think us,
Though to my self I am certain, and my life
Shall make that good and perfect, or fall with it.

John. We are sure of nothing, Fred. that's the truth on't:
I do not think my name's Don John, nor dare not Believe any thing that concerns me, but my debts,
Nor those in way of payment: things are so carried,
What to entreat your grace, or how to tell ye
We are, or we are not, is past my cunning,
But I would fain imagine we are honest,
And o' my conscience, I should fight in't ———

Duke. Thus then,
For we may be all abus'd.

Petr. 'Tis possible,
For how should this concern them?

Duke. Here let's part ———
Until to morrow this time: we to our way,
To make this doubt out, and you to your way;
Pawning our honours then to meet again,
When if she be not found.

Fred. We stand engaged
To answer any worthy way we are call'd to.

Duke. We ask no more.

Whore. Ye have done with us then?

Petr. No, Dame.

Duke. But is her name Constantia?

Petr. Yes a moveable
Belonging to a friend of mine: come out Fidler,
What say you to this Lady? be not fearfull.
Fra. Saving the reverence of my Masters pleasure,
I say she is a whore, and that she has robb'd him,
Hoping his hurts would kill him.

Whore. Who provok't me?
Nay Sirrah squeak, I'll see your treble strings
Ty'd up too; if I hang, I'll spoil your piping,
Your sweet face shall not save ye.

Petr. Thou damn'd impudence,
And thou dry'd Devil; where's the officer?

Petr. He's here Sir.

Enter Officer.

Petr. Lodge these safe, till I send for 'em;
Let none come to 'em, nor no noise be heard
Of where they are, or why: away.

John. By this hand
A handfom whore: Now will I be arrested,
And brought home to this officers: a stout whore,
I love such stirring ware: pox o' this business,
A man must hunt out morsels for another,
And starve himself: a quick-ey'd whore, that's wild-fire,
And makes the blood dance through the veins like billows.
I will relieve this whore.

Duke. Well, good luck with ye.

Fred. As much attend your grace.

Petr. To morrow certain ———

John. If we out-live this night Sir.

Fred. Come Don John,
We have something now to do.

John. I am sure I would have.

Fred. If she be not found, we must fight.

John. I am glad on't,
I have not fought a great while.

Fred. If we dye ———

Jo. There's so much mony sav'd in lecherie. [Exit.

Actus Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter Duke, Petrucchio, below, and Vecchio, above.

Duke. IT should be hereabouts.

Petr. Your grace is right,
This is the house, I know it.

Vec. Grace? Duke. 'Tis further
By the description we received.

Petr. Good my Lord the Duke,
Believe me, for I know it certainly,
This is the very house.

Vec. My Lord the Duke?

Duke. Pray Heaven this man prove right now.

Petr. Believe it, he's a most sufficient Scholar,
And can do rare tricks this way; for a figure,
Or raising an appearance, whole Christendom
Has not a better; I have heard strange wonders of him.

Duke. But can he shew us where she is?

Petr. Most certain,
And for what cause too she departed.

Duke. Knock then,
For I am great with expectation,
Till this man satisfy me: I fear the Spaniards,
Yet they appear brave fellows: can he tell us?

Petr. With a wet finger, whether they be false.

Duke. Away then. Petr. Who's within here?

Enter Vecchio.

Vec. Your grace may enter.

Duke. How can he know me?

Petr. He knows all.

Vec. And you Sir. [Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter Don John, and Frederick.

John. What do you call his name?

Fred. Why, Peter Vecchio.

John. They say he can raise Devils,
Can he make 'em
Tell truth too, when he has rais'd 'em? for believe it,
These Devils are the lyingst Rascals.

Fred. He can compel 'em.

John. With what? can he
Tye squibs in their tails, and fire the truth out?

Or make 'em eat a bawling Puritan,
VVhose sanctified zeal shall rumble like an Earth-quake?

Fred. VVith Spells man.

John. I with spoons as soon, dost thou think
The Devil such an Ass as people make him?
Such a poor coxcomb? such a penny foot-post?
Compel'd with crosses and pile to run of errands?
VVith Asteroth, and Behemoth, and Belfagor?
VVhy should he shake at sounds, that lives in a smiths forge?
Or if he do ———

Fred. VVithout all doubt he do's John.

John. VVhy should not Bilbo raise him, or a pair of bul-
They go as big as any? or an unshod Car, (lyons,
VVhen he goes tumble, tumble o're the stones,
Like Anacreons drunken verses,
These make as fell a noise; me thinks the colick
VVell handled, and fed with small beer ———

Fred. 'Tis the vertue ———

John. The vertue? nay, and goodness fetch him up once,
H'as lost a friend of me; the wise old Gentleman
Knows when, and how; I'le lay this hand to two pence,
Let all the Conjurers in Christendom,
VVith all their spells, and vertues call upon him,
And I but think upon a wench, and follow it,
He shall be sooner mine than theirs; where's vertue?

Fred. Thou art the most sufficient, (I'le say for thee)
Not to believe a thing ———

John. O Sir, slow credit
Is the best child of knowldge; I'le go with ye,
And if he can do any thing, I'le think
As you would have me.

Fred. Let's enquire along,
For certain we are not far off.

John. Nor much nearer. [Exit.

SCENE III.

Enter Duke, Petrucchio, and Vecchio.

Vec. You lost her yester-night.

Petr. How think you Sir?

Duke. Is your name Vecchio?

Vec. Yes Sir. Du. And you can shew me
These things you promise.

Vec. Your graces word bound to me,
No hand of Law shall seize me.

Duke. As I live Sir ———

Petr. And as I live, that can do something too Sir.

Vec. I take your promises: stay here a little,
Till I prepare some Ceremonies, and I'le satisfy ye.
The Ladies name's Constantia? Petr. Yes.

Vec. I come straight. [Exit Vec.

Duke. Sure he's a learned man.

Petr. The most now living;
Did your grace mark when we told all these circumstances,
How ever and anon he bolted from us
To use his studies help?

Duke. Now I think rather
To talk with some familiar.

Petr. Not unlikely,
For sure he has 'em subject.

Duke. How could he else
Tell when she went, and who went with her?

Petr. True.

Du. Or hit upon mine honour: or assure me
The Lady lov'd me dearly?

Enter Vecchio, in his habiliments.

Petr. 'Twas so.

Vec. Now,
I do beseech your grace sit down, and you Sir;
Nay pray sit close like Brothers.

Petr. A rare fellow.

Vec. And what ye see, stir not at, nor use a word,
Until I ask ye; for what shall appear

Is but weak apparition and thin air,
Not to be held, nor spoken to: [Knocking within.]

[John, Frederick, and a Servant within.]

Duke. We are counsell'd—

Vec. What noise is that without there?

Fred. within. We must speak with him.

Serv. within. He's busie, Gentlemen.

John within. That's all one friend,
We must and will speak with him.

Duke. Let 'em in, Sir,
We know their tongues and businefs, 'tis our own,
And in this very cause that we now come for,
They also come to be instructed.

Vec. Let 'em in then:
Sit down, I know your meaning.

Enter Frederick, John, and Servant.

Fred. The Duke before us?
Now we shall sure know something.

Vec. Not a question,
But make your Eyes your Tongues—

John. This is a strange Jugler,
Neither indent before-hand for his payment,
Nor know the Breadth of the businefs; sure his Devil
Comes out of Lapland, where they sell men Winds
For dead drink, and old Doublets.

Fred. Peace, he conjures.

John. Let him, he cannot raise my Devil.

Fred. Prithee Peace.

Vec. *Appear, appear,
And you soft Winds so clear,
That dance upon the leaves, and make them sing
Gentle Love-lay: to the Spring,
Gilding all the Vales below,
With your Verdure as ye blow,
Raise these forms from under ground
With a soft and happy sound.* [Soft Musick.

John. This is an honest Conjurer, and a pretty Poet;
I like his words well, there's no bumbast in 'em,
But do you think now he can cudgel up the Devil
With this short Staff of Verfes?

Fred. Peace, the Spirits— [2 Shapes of women pass]

John. Nay, and they be no worse— (sing by.)

Vec. Do ye know these faces?

Duke. No. (lows;)

Vec. Sit still upon your lives then, and mark what fol-
Away, away.

John. These Devils do not paint sure?
Have they no sweeter shapes in Hell?

Fred. Hark now, John. [Constantia passes by.]

John. I, marry, this moves something like, this Devil
Carries some metal in her gate.

Vec. I find ye,
You would see her face unvail'd?

Duke. Yes.

Vec. Be uncovered.

Duke. O Heaven!

Vec. Peace.

Pet. See how she blushes.

John. Frederick,

This Devil for my mony; this is she, Boy,
Why dost thou shake? I burn.

Vec. Sit still, and silent.

Duke. She looks back at me, now she smiles, Sir.

Vec. Silence.

Duke. I must rise, or I burst. [Exit Constantia.]

Vec. Ye see what follows—

Duke. O gentle Sir, this shape agen.

Vec. I cannot.

'Tis all dissolv'd again; this was the Figure?

Duke. The very same, Sir.
No hope once more to see it?

Vec. You might have kept it longer, had ye spar'd it,
Now 'tis impossible.

Du. No means to find it?

Vec. Yes, that there is, sit still a while, there's Wine
To thaw the wonder from your hearts; drink well, Sir. [Exit Vecchio.]

John. This Conjurer is a right good fellow too,
A Lad of mettle; two such Devils more
Would make me a Conjurer; what wine is it?

Fred. Hollock.

John. The Devil's in it then; look how it dances:
Well, if I be—

Pet. We are all before ye,
That's your best comfort, Sir.

John. By th' Mafs, brave Wine;
Nay, and the Devils live in this Hell, I dare venture
Within these two months yet to be delivered
Of a large Legion of 'em.

Enter Vecchio.

Du. Here he comes,
Silence of all sides, Gentlemen.

Vec. Good your Grace,
Observe a stricter temper, and you too, Gallants,
You'll be deluded all else. This merry Devil
That next appears, for such a one you'll find it,
Must be call'd up by a strange incantation,
A Song, and I must sing it: 'pray bear with me,
And pardon my rude Pipe; for yet, ere parting
Twenty to one I please ye.

Du. We are arm'd, Sir.

Pet. Nor shall you see us more transgress.

Fred. What think'st thou
Now, John?

John. Why, now do I think, Frederick,
(And if I think amiss Heaven pardon me)
This honest Conjurer, with some four or five
Of his good fellow Devils, and my self,
Shall be yet drunk ere midnight.

SONG.

Come away, thou Lady gay,
Hoist; how she stumbles?
Hark how she mumbles.
Dame Gillian. Answer. I come, I come.
By old Claret I enlarge thee,
By Canary thus I charge thee,
By Britain, Mathewglin, and Peeter,
Appear and answer me in meeter.

Why when?

Why Gill?

Why when?

Answer. You'll tarry till I am ready.

Once again I conjure thee,
By the Pose in thy Nose,
And the Gout in thy Toes;
By thine old dryed Skin,
And the Mummie within;
By thy little, little Ruff,
And thy Hood that's made of Stuff;
By thy Bottle at thy Breech,
And thine old salt Itch;
By the Stakes, and the Stones,
That have worn out thy Bones.

Appear.

Appear.

Appear.

Answer. Oh I am here.

Fred. Peace, he conjures.

(now,

John. Why, this is the Song, Frederick; twenty pound
To see but our Don Gillian.

Enter Landlady and the Child.

Fred. Peace, it appears.

John. I cannot peace; Devils in French hoods, Frederick?
Satan's old Syringes? Duke. What's this?

Vec. Peace. John. She, Boy.

Fred. What dost thou mean?

John. She, Boy, I say. Fred. Ha?

John. She Boy,

The very Child too, Frederick,

Fred. She laughs on us

Aloud, John, has the Devil these affections?

I do believe 'tis she, indeed.

Vec. Stand still.

John. I will not;

Who calls Feronimo from his naked Bed?

Sweet Lady, was it you? if thou beest the Devil,

First, having cost me self, to keep out wildfire,

Then said some special Prayers to defend me

Against thy most unhallowed Hood, have at thee.

Land. Hold, Sir, I am no Devil.

John. That's all one.

Land. I am your very Landlady.

John. I defie thee;

Thus as St. Dunstan blew the Devil's Nose

With a pair of tongs, even so, Right Worshipful--

Land. Sweet Son, I am old Gillian.

Duke. This is no Spirit.

John. Art thou old Gillian, flesh and bone?

Land. I am, Son.

Vec. Sit still, Sir, now I'll shew you all. [Ex. Vec.]

John. Where's thy Bottle?

Land. Here, I beseech ye, Son—

John. For I know the Devil

Cannot assume that shape.

Fred. 'Tis she, John, certain—

John. A hogs pox o' your mouldy chaps, what makes you
Tumbling and juggling here?

Land. I am quit now, Seignior,

For all the pranks you plaid, and railings at me,

For to tell true, out of a trick I put

Upon your high behaviours, which was a lie,

But then it serv'd my turn, I drew the Lady

Un o my Kinsman's here, only to torture

Your Don ships for a day or two; and secure her

Out of all thoughts of danger; here she comes now.

Enter Vecchio, and Constantia.

Duke. May I yet speak?

Vec. Yes, and embrace her too,

For one that loves you dearer—

Duke. O my Sweetest.

Pet. Blush not, I will not chide ye.

Const. To add more

Unto the joy I know, I bring ye, see Sir,

The happy fruit of all our Vows!

Duke. Heavens Blessing

Be round about thee ever.

John. Pray bless me too,

For if your Grace be well instructed this way,

You'll find the keeping half the getting.

Duke. How, Sir?

John. I'll tell you that anon.

Const. 'Tis true, this Gentleman

Has done a charity worthy your favour,

And let him have it, dear Sir.

Duke. My best Lady

He has, and ever shall have: so must you, Sir,

To whom I am equal bound as to my being.

Fred. Your Graces humble servant—

Du. Why kneel you, Sir?

Vec. For pardon for my boldness: yet 'twas harmless,

And all the art I have, Sir; those your Grace saw,

Which you thought spirits, were my Neighbours Children

Whom I instruct in Grammar here, and Musick;

Their shapes, the Peoples fond opinions,

Believing I can conjure, and oft repairing
To know of things stoln from 'em, I keep about me,
And always have in readiness, by conjecture
Out of their own confessions, I oft tell 'em
Things that by chance have fallen out so; which way (Having the persons here, I knew you sought for)
I wrought upon your Grace; my end is mirth,
And pleasing, if I can, all parties.

Duke. I believe it,

For you have pleas'd me truly: so well pleas'd me,
That when I shall forget it—

Pet. Here's old Antonio,

I spy'd him at a window, coming mainly
I know about his Whore, the man you light on,
As you discovered unto me; good your Grace,
Let's stand by all, 'twill be a mirth above all,
To observe his pelting fury.

Vec. About a wench, Sir?

Pet. A young whore that has rob'd him.

Vec. But do you know, Sir,

Where she is?

Pet. Yes, and will make that perfect—

Vec. I am instructed well then.

John. If he come

To have a Devil shew'd him, by all means
Let me be he, I can roar rarely.

Pet. Be so,

But take heed to his anger.

Vec. Slip in quickly,

There you shall find suits of all sorts: when I call
Be ready and come forward. [Exeunt all but Vecchio.]

Who's there comes in?

Enter Antonio.

Ant. Are you the Conjurer?

Vec. Sir, I can do a little

That way, if you please to employ me.

Ant. Presently, shew me a Devil that can tell—

Vec. Where your wench is.

Ant. You are i'th' right; as also where the Fidler
That was consenting to her.

Vec. Sit ye there, Sir,

Ye shall know presently: can ye pray heartily?

Ant. Why, is your Devil so furious?

Vec. I must shew ye

A form may chance affright ye.

Ant. He must fart fire then:

Take you no care for me.

Vec. Ascend, Asterth,

Enter Don John like a Spirit.

Why, when, appear I say— Now question him.

Ant. Where is my whore, Don Devil?

John. Gone to China,

To be the great Chams Mistrefs.

Ant. That's a lye, Devil,

Where are my jewels?

John. Pawn'd for Petticoats.

Ant. That may be: where's the Fidler?

John. Condemn'd to th' Gallows

For robbing of a Mill.

Ant. The lyingst Devil

That e'r I dealt withal, and the unlikeliest!
What was that Rascal hurt me?

John. I.

Ant. How?

John. I.

Ant. Who was he?

John. I.

Ant. Do you hear conjurer,
Dare you venture your Devil?

Vec. Yes.

Ant. Then I'll venture my dagger;
Have at your Devils pate; do you mew?

Enter

Enter all.

Vcc. Hold.
 Pet. Hold there,
 I do command you hold.
 Ant. Is this the Devil?
 Why, Conjuror——
 Pet. He has been a Devil to you, Sir;
 But now you shall forget all; your whore's safe,
 And all your jewels, your Boy too.
 John. Now the Devil indeed
 Lay his ten claws upon thee, for my pate
 Finds what it is to be a Fiend.
 Ant. All safe?
 Pet. 'Pray ye know this person; all's right now.
 Ant. Your Grace

May now command me then: but where's my whore?
 Pet. Ready to go to whipping.
 Ant. My whore whipt?
 Pet. Yes, your whore without doubt, Sir.
 Ant. Whipt! 'pray Gentlemen.
 Duke. VVhy, would you have her once more rob ye? the
 You may forgive, he was entic'd. (young Boy)
 John. The whore, Sir,
 VVould rather carry pity: a handsome whore:
 Ant. A Gentleman I warrant thee.
 Pet. Let's in all,
 And if we see contrition in your whore, Sir,
 Much may be done.
 Duke. Now my dear fair to you,
 And the full consummation of my Vow, [Exeunt]

Prologue.

A Ptness for Mirth to all, this instant Night
 Thalia hath prepar'd for your delight,
 Her Choice and curious Viands, in each part
 Season'd with rarities of Wit and Art;
 Nor fear I to be tax'd for a vain boast,
 My Promise will find Credit with the most,
 When they know ingenious Fletcher made it, he
 Being in himself a perfect Comedie:
 And some sit here, I doubt not, dare averr
 Living he made that House a Theatre
 Which he pleas'd to frequent; and thus much we Could not but pay to his loud Memorie.
 For our selves, we do extreat that you would not Expect strange turns, and windings in the Plot,
 Objects of State, and now and then a Rhime,
 To gall particular Persons with the time;
 Or that his towering Muse hath made her flight
 Nearer your apprehension than your sight;

But if that sweet Expressions, quick Conceit,
 Familiar Language, fashion'd to the weight
 Of such as speak it, have the power to raise
 Your Grace to us, with Trophies to his Praise;
 We may profess, presuming on his Skill,
 If his Chances please not you, our Fortune's ill.

Epilogue.

WE have not held you long, nor do I see
 One Brow in this selected Companie
 Assuring a dislike, our Pains were eas'd
 Could we be confident that all rise pleas'd:
 But such ambition soars too high; If We
 Have satisfi'd the best, and they agree
 In a fair Censure, We have our Reward,
 And in them arm'd desire no surer Guard.

Enter Gisbert and Baldwin.

Bal. THE Brothers then are met?

Gif. They are, Sir.

Bald. 'Tis thought, they may be reconcil'd.

Gif. 'Tis rather wish't, for such, whose reason

Doth direct their thoughts without self flattery,
 Dare not hope it.

Bald. The fires of Love, which the dead Duke believ'd
 His equal care of both would have united,
 Ambition hath divided: and there are Too many on both parts, that know they cannot
 Or rise to wealth or honour, their main ends,
 Unless the tempest of the Princes fury
 Make troubled Seas, and those Seas yield fit Billows
 In their bad Arts to give way to a calm,
 Which yielding rest and good, prove their ruin,

And in the shipwrack of their hopes and fortunes,
 The Dukedom might be sav'd, had it but ten
 That stood affected to the general good,
 With that confirm'd zeal which brave Aubrey does.

Gif. He is indeed the perfect character
 Of a good man, and so his actions speak him.

Bald. But did you observe the many doubts, and cautions
 The Brothers stood upon before they met?

Gif. I did; and yet, that ever Brothers should Stand on more nice terms, than sworn Enemies
 After a War proclaim'd, would with a stranger
 Wrong the reporters credit; they saluted
 At distance; and so strong was the suspicion
 Each had of other, that before they durst
 Embrace, they were by sev'ral servants searcht,
 As doubting conceal'd weapons, Antidotes
 Ta'ne openly by both, fearing the room

Appointed for the enter-view was poyson'd,
The Chairs, and Cushions, with like care survey'd;
And in a word in every circumstance
So jealous on both parts, that it is more
Than to be fear'd, concord can never joyn,
Minds so divided.

Bald. Yet our best endeavours,
Should not be wanting, Gisbert.

Gif. Neither shall they.

Enter Grandpree, and Verdon.

But what are these?

Bald. They are without my knowledge;
But by their manners, and behaviours,
They should express themselves.

Grand. Since we serve Rollo
The Elder Brother, we'll be Rollians,
Who will maintain us, lads, as brave as Romans;
You stand for him?

Ver. I do.

Grand. Why, then observe
How much the business, your so long'd for business,
By men that are nam'd from their swords, concerns you.
Lethery, our common friend, so long kept under,
With whips, and beating fatal hems, shall rise,
And Bawdery, in a French-hood plead, before her
Virginity shall be Carted.

Ver. Excellent!

Grand. And Hell but grant, the quarrel that's between
The Princes may continue, and the business
That's of the sword, t'outlast three suits in Law,
And we will make Attornies Lansprisdoces,
And our brave gown-men practisers of back-sword;
The pewter of all Serjeants maces shall
Be melted, and turn'd into common Flaggons,
In which it shall be lawful to carouse
To their most lowly fortunes.

Bald. Here's a Statesman.

Grand. A creditor shall not dare, but by Petition,
To make demand of any debt; and that
Only once every leap-year, in which, if
The debtor may be won for a French Crown,
To pay a Soulz, he shall be registred
His benefactor.

Ver. The Chancellor hears you.

Grand. Fear not, I now dare speak as loud as he,
And will be heard, and have all I speak, Law;
Have you no eyes? there is a reverence due,
From Children of the Gown, to Men of Action.

Gif. How's this?

Gran. Even so; the times, the times are chang'd,
All business is not now prefer'd in Parchment,
Nor shall a grant pass that wants this broad seal;
This seal d'ye see? your gravity once laid
My head and heels together in the Dungeon,
For cracking a scald Officers crown, for which
A time is come for vengeance, and expect it;
For know, you have not full three hours to live.

Gif. Yes, somewhat longer.

Gran. To what end?

Gif. To hang you; think on that, Ruffian.

Gran. For you, School-master,

You have a pretty Daughter; let me see,
Near three a Clock, (by which time I much fear,
I shall be tyr'd with killing some five hundred)
Provide a Bath, and her to entertain me,
And that shall be your Ransom.

Bald. Impudent Rascal.

Enter to them Trevile and Duprete.

Gif. More of the crew?

Grand. What are you? Rollians?

Tre. No; this for Rollo, and all such as serve him;
We stand for Otto.

Grand. You seem men of fashion,
And therefore I'll deal fairly, you shall have
The honour this day to be Chronicled
The first men kill'd by Grandpree; you see this sword,
A pretty foolish toy, my valour's Servant,
And I may boldly say a Gentleman,
It having made when it was Charlemaigns,
Three thousand Knights; this, Sir, shall cut your throat,
And do you all fair service else.

Tre. I kiss your hands for the good offer; here's another too, the servant of your servant shall be proud to be scour'd in your sweet guts; till when pray you command me.

Grand. Your Idolater, Sir. [Exeunt. Manent Gif. & Bal.]

Gif. That e're such should hold the names of men,
Or Justice be held cruelty, when it labours
To pluck such weeds up!

Bald. Yet they are protected, and by the great ones.

Gif. Not the good ones, Baldwin.

Enter to them Aubrey.

Aub. Is this a time to be spent thus by such
As are the principal Ministers of the State?
When they that are the heads, have fill'd the Court
With factions, a weak Woman only left
To stay their bloody hands? can her weak arms
Alone divert the dangers ready now
To fall upon the Common-wealth, and bury
The honours of it, leaving not the name
Of what it was. Oh Gisbert, the fair tryals,
And frequent proofs which our late master made,
Both of your love and faith, gave him assurance;
To chuse you at his death a Guardian; nay,
A Father to his Sons; and that great trust,
How ill do you discharge? I must be plain,
That, at the best, y'are a sad looker on
Of those bad practices you should prevent.
And where's the use of your Philosophy
In this so needful a time? be not secure;
For, Baldwin, be assur'd, since that the Princes,
When they were young, and apt for any form,
Were given to your instruction, and grave ordering;
'Twill be expected that they should be good,
Or their bad manners will b' imputed yours.

Bald. 'Twas not in one, my Lord, to alter nature.

Gif. Nor can my counsels work on them that will not Vouchsafe me hearing.

Aub. Do these answers sort,
Or with your place, or persons, or your years?
Can Gisbert being the pillar of the Laws,
See them trod under foot, or forc'd to serve
The Princes unjust ends; and with a frown
Be silenc'd from exclaiming on th' abuse?
Or Baldwin only weep the desp'rate madness
Of his seduced pupills? see their minds,
Which with good Arts he labour'd to build up
Examples of succeeding times, o'return'd
By undermining parasites; no one precept
Leading to any Art, or great, or good,
But is forc'd from their memory, in whose room
Black counsels are receiv'd, and their retirements,
And secret conference producing only
Dev'lish designs, a man would shame to father;
But I talk when I should do, and chide others
For that I now offend in: see't confirm'd,
Now do, or never speak more.

Gif. We are yours.

Enter Rollo, Latorch, Trevile, Grandpree, Otto, Verdon, and Duprete.

Rol. You shall know who I am.

Otto. I do, my equal.

Rol. Thy Prince; give way — were we alone, I'de force
In thy best blood, to write thy self my subject,
And glad I would receive it.

Aub.

Aub. Sir. Gif. Dear Lord.

Otto. Thy subject?

Rol. Yes, nor shall tame patience hold me
A minute longer, only half my self;
My birth gave me this Dukedom, and my sword
Shall change it to the common grave of all
That tread upon her bosom, e're I part with
A piece of earth, or title that is mine.

Otto. It needs not, and I would scorn to receive,
Though offer'd, what I want not: therefore know
From me, though not deliver'd in great words,
Eyes red with rage, poor pride, and threatned action;
Our Father at his death, then, when no accent,
Wer't thou a Son, could fall from him in vain,
Made us Co-heirs, our part of Land and Honours
Of equal weight; and to see this confirm'd,
The Oaths of these are yet upon record,
Who though they should forsake me, and call down
The plagues of perjury on their sinful heads,
I would not leave my self.

Tre. Nor will we see the Will of the dead Duke infring'd.

Lar. Nor I the elder rob'd of what's his right.

Grand. Nor you?

Let me take place, I say, I will not see't;
My sword is sharpest.

Aub. Peace you tinder-boxes,
That only carry matter to make a flame,
Which will consume you.

Rol. You are troublesome, [To Baldwin.]
This is no time for arguments, my Title
Needs not your School-defences, but my sword,
With which the Gordian of your Sophistry
Being cut, shall shew th' Imposture. For your laws { To Gif-
It is in me to change them when I please, } bert.
I being above them; Gisbert, would you have me protect (them;
Let them now stretch their extreamest rigour,
And seize upon that Traytor; and your tongue
Make him appear first dangerous, then odious;
And after, under the pretence of safety
For the sick State, the Lands and Peoples quiet,
Cut off his head: and I'll give up my sword,
And fight with them at a more certain weapon
To kill, and with Authority. (out

Gif. Sir, I grant the Laws are useful weapons, but found
T'assure the Innocent, not to oppress.

Rol. Then you conclude him Innocent? (Crime.

Gif. The power your Father gave him, must not prove a

Aub. Nor should you so receive it.

Bald. To which purpose,
All that dare challenge any part in goodness,
Will become suppliants to you.

Rol. They have none
That dare move me in this: hence, I despise you,
Be of his party, bring it to your Laws,
And thou thy double heart, thou popular fool,
Your moral rules of justice and her ballance;
I stand on mine own guard.

Otto. Which thy injustice
Will make thy enemies; by the memory
Of him, whose better part now suffers for thee,
Whose reverend ashes with an impious hand
Thou throw'st out to contempt, in thy repining
At this so just decree; thou art unworthy
Of what his last Will, not thy merits, gave thee,
That art so swoln within, with all those mischiefs
That e're made up a Tyrant, that thy breast,
The prison of thy purposes, cannot hold them,
But that they break forth, and in thy own words
Discover, what a monster they must serve
That shall acknowledge thee.

Rol. Thou shalt not live to be so happy.

Aub. Nor your miseries begin in murder.

[He offers his sword at Otto, the faction joyning,

[Aubrey between severs the Brothers.

Duty, allegiance, and all respects of what you are, forsake me.
Do you flare on? is this a Theater?
Or shall these kill themselves, like to mad fencers,
To make you sport? keep them asunder, or
By Heaven I'll charge on all.

Grand. Keep the peace,
I am for you, my Lord, and if you'll have me,
I'll act the Constables part.

Aub. Live I to see this?
Will you do that your enemies dare not wish,
And cherish in your selves those furies, which Hell would cast out? Do, I am ready; kill me,
And these, that would fall willing sacrifices
To any power that would restore your reason,
And make you men again, which now you are not.

Rol. These are your bucklers boy.

Otto. My hinderances;
And were I not confirm'd, my justice in
The taking of thy life, could not weigh down
The wrong, in shedding the least drop of blood
Of these whose goodness only now protects thee,
Thou should'st feel I in act would only prove my self
What thou in words do'st labour to appear.

Rol. Hear this, and talk again? I'll break through all,
But I will reach thy heart.

Otto. 'Tis better guarded.

Enter Sophia.

Soph. Make way, or I will force it, who are those?
My Sons? my shames; turn all your swords on me,
And make this wretched body but one wound,
So this unnatural quarrel find a grave
In the unhappy womb that brought you forth:
Dare you remember that you had a Mother,
Or look on these gray hairs, made so with tears,
For both your goods, and not with age; and yet
Stand doubtful to obey her? from me you had
Life, Nerves, and faculties, to use these weapons;
And dare you raise them against her, to whom
You owe the means of being what you are?

Otto. All peace is meant to you.

Soph. Why is this War then?
As if your arms could be advanc'd, and I
Not set upon the rack? your blood is mine,
Your dangers mine, your goodness I should share in;
I must be branded with those impious marks
You stamp on your own foreheads and on mine,
If you go on thus: for my good name therefore,
Though all respects of honour in your selves
Be in your fury choakt, throw down your swords;
Your duty should be swifter than my tongue;
And joyn your hands while they be innocent;
You have heat of blood, and youth apt to Ambition,
To plead an easie pardon for what's past:
But all the ills beyond this hour committed,
From Gods or men must hope for no excuse.

Gif. Can you hear this unmov'd?
No Syllable of this so pious charm, but should have power
To frustrate all the juggling deceits,
With which the Devil blinds you.

Otto. I begin to melt, I know not how.

Rol. Mother, I'll leave you;
And, Sir, be thankful for the time you live,
Till we meet next (which shall be soon and sudden)
To her persuasion for you.

Soph. O yet, stay,
And rather than part thus, vouchsafe me hearing,
As enemies; how is my soul divided?
My love to both is equal, as my wishes;
But are return'd by neither; my griev'd heart,
Hold yet a little longer, and then break.
I kneel to both, and will speak so, but this Takes from me th' authority of a mothers power;

And therefore, like my self, Otto, to thee,
(And yet observe, son, how thy mothers tears
Outstrip her forward words, to make way for 'em)
Thou art the younger, Otto, yet be now
The first example of obedience to me,
And grow the elder in my love.

Otto. The means to be so happy?

Soph. This; yield up thy sword,
And let thy piety give thy mother strength
To take that from thee, which no enemies force
Could e're despoil thee of: why do'st thou tremble,
And with a fearful eye fixt on thy Brother,
Observ'st his ready sword, as bent against thee?
I am thy armour, and will be pierc'd through,
Ten thousand times, before I will give way
To any peril may arrive at thee;
And therefore fear not.

Otto. 'Tis not for my self,
But for you, mother; you are now engag'd
In more that lies in your unquestion'd vertue;
For, since you have disarm'd me of defence,
Should I fall now, though by his hand, the world
May say it was your practice.

Soph. All worlds perish,
Before my piety turn treasons parent,
Take it again, and stand upon your guard,
And while your Brother is, continue arm'd;
And yet, this fear is needless, for I know,
My Rollo, though he dares as much as man,
So tender of his yet untainted valour,
So noble, that he dares do nothing basely.
You doubt him; he fears you; I doubt and fear
Both; for others safety, and not mine own.
Know yet, my sons, when of necessity
You must deceive, or be deceiv'd; 'tis better
To suffer Treason, than to act the Traytor;
And in a War like this, in which the glory
Is his that's overcome; consider then
What 'tis for which you strive: is it the Dukedom?
Or the command of these so ready subjects?
Desire of wealth? or whatsoever else
Fires your ambition? This still desp'rate madness,
To kill the people which you would be Lords of;
With fire, and sword to lay that Country waste
Whose rule you seek for: to consume the treasures,
Which are the sinews of your Government,
In cherishing the factions that destroy it:
Far, far be this from you: make it not question'd
Whether you have interest in that Dukedom,
Whose ruine both contend for.

Otto. I desire but to enjoy my own, which I will keep.

Rol. And rather than posterity shall have cause
To say I ruin'd all, divide the Dukedom,
I will accept the moiety.

Ott. I embrace it.

Soph. Divide me first, or tear me limb by limb,
And let them find as many several Graves
As there are villages in Normandy:
And 'tis less sin, than thus to weaken it.
To hear it mention'd doth already make me
Envy my dead Lord, and almost Blaspheme
Those powers that heard my prayer for fruitfulness,
And did not with my first birth close my womb:
To me alone my second blessing proves
My first of misery, for if that Heaven
Which gave me Rollo, there had staid his bounty,
And Otto, my dear Otto, ne're had been,
Or being, had not been so worth my love,
The stream of my affection had run constant
In one fair current, all my hopes had been Laid up in one; and fruitful Normandy
In this division had not lost her glories:
For as 'tis now, 'tis a fair Diamond,
Which being preserv'd intire, exceeds all value,

But cut in pieces (though these pieces are Set in fine gold by the best work-mans cunning)
Parts with all estimation: So this Dukedom,
As 'tis yet whole, the neighbouring Kings may covet,
But cannot compass; which divided, will Become the spoil of every barbarous foe
That will invade it.

Gif. How this works in both!

Bal. Prince Rollo's eyes have lost their fire.

Gif. And anger, that but now wholly possessed
Good Otto, hath given place to pity. (gun.

Aub. End not thus Madam, but perfect what's so well be-

Soph. I see in both, fair signs of reconciliation,
Make them sure proofs they are so: the Fates offer
To your free choice, either to live Examples
Of Piety, or wickedness: if the later
Blinds so your understanding, that you cannot
Pierce through her painted outside, and discover
That she is all deformity within,
Boldly transcend all precedents of mischief,
And let the last, and the worst end of tyrannies;
The murder of a Mother, but begin
The stain of blood you after are to heighten:
But if that vertue, and her sure rewards,
Can win you to accept her for your guide,
To lead you up to Heaven, and there fix you
The fairest Stars in the bright Sphere of honour;
Make me the parent of an hundred sons,
All brought into the world with joy, not sorrow,
And every one a Father to his Country,
In being now made Mother of your concord.

Rol. Such, and so good, loud fame for ever speak you.

Bal. I, now they meet like Brothers.

[The Brothers cast away their Swords and embrace.

Gif. My hearts joy flows through my eyes.

Aub. May never Womans tongue
Hereafter be accus'd, for this ones Goodness.

Otto. If we contend, from this hour, it shall be
How to o'recome in brotherly affection.

Rol. Otto is Rollo now, and Rollo, Otto,
Or as they have one mind, rather one name:
From this atonement let our lives begin,
Be all the rest forgotten.

Aub. Spoke like Rollo.

Soph. And to the honour of this reconciliation,
We all this night will at a publick Feast
With choice Wines drown our late fears, and with Musick
Welcome our comforts.

Bald. Sure and certain ones. [Exeunt.

[Manent Grandpree, Verdon, Trevile and Duprete.

Grand. Did ever such a hopeful business end thus?

Ver. 'Tis fatal to us all, and yet you Grandpree,
Have the least cause to fear.

Grand. Why; what's my hope?

Ver. The certainty that you have to be hang'd;
You know the Chancellours promise.

Grand. Plague upon you.

Ver. What think you of a Bath, and a Lords Daughter
To entertain you?

Grand. Those desires are off.

Frail thoughts, all friends, no Rollians now, nor Ottoes:
The sev'ral court'sies of our swords and servants
Defer to after consequence; let's make use
Of this nights freedom, a short Parliament to us,
In which it will be lawful to walk freely.
Nay, to our drink we shall have meat too, that's
No usual business to the men o'th' sword.
Drink deep with me to night, we shall to morrow,
Or whip, or hang the merrier.

Tre. Lead the way then.

[Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Latorch, and Rollo.

Lato. WHY should this trouble you?

Rol. It does, and must do till I find ease.

Lato. Consider then, and quickly;
And like a wise man, take the current with you,
Which once turn'd head, will sink you; blest occasion
Offers her self in thousand safeties to you;
Time standing still to point you out your purpose,
And resolution (the true child of Vertue)
Readie to execute: what dull cold weaknes
Has crept into your bosom, whose meer thoughts
Like tempests, plowing up the sayling Forests,
Even with their swing were wont to shake down hazards.
What is't, your Mothers tears?

Rol. Pray thee be patient.

Lato. Her hands held up? her prayers, or her curses?
Oh power of paper dropt through by a woman!
Take heed the Souldiers see it not; 'tis miserable,
In Rollo below miserable; take heed your friends,
The sinews of your cause, the strength you stir by,
Take heed, I say, they find it not: take heed
Your own repentance (like a passing-bell)
Too late, and too loud, tell the world y'are perisht:
What noble spirit, eager of advancement,
Whose imployment is his plough; what sword whose sharp-
Waits but the arm to wield it; or what hope, (nefs)
After the world has blown abroad this weaknes,
Will move again, or make a wish for Rollo?

Rol. Are we not friends again by each oath ratified,
Our tongues the Heralds to our hearts?

Lato. Poor hearts then.

Rol. Our worthier friends.

Lato. No friends Sir, to your honour;
Friends to your fall: where is your understanding,
The noble vessel that your full soul sail'd in,
Rib'd round with honours; where is that? 'tis ruin'd,
The tempest of a womans sighs has sunk it.
Friendship, take heed Sir, is a smiling harlot
That when she kisses, kills, a soder'd friendship
Piec'd out with promises; O painted ruine!

Rol. Latorch, he is my Brother.

Lato. The more doubted;

For hatred hatcht at home is a tame Tiger,
May fawn and sport, but never leaves his nature;
The jars of Brothers, two such mighty ones,
Is like a small stone thrown into a river,
The breach scarce heard, but view the beaten current,
And you shall see a thousand angry rings
Rise in his face, still swelling and still growing;
C. jars circling distrusts, distrusts breed dangers,
And dangers death, the greatest extreme shadow,
Till nothing bound 'em but the shoar their graves;
There is no manly wisdom, nor no safety
In leaning to this league, this piec'd patcht friendship;
This rear'd up reconcilment on a billow,
Which as it tumbles, totters down your fortune;
Is't not your own you reach at? Law and nature
Ushering the way before you; is not he
Born and bequeath'd your subject?

Rol. Ha.

Lato. What fool would give a storm leave to disturb his
When he may shut the casement? can that man (peace,
Has won so much upon your pity,
And drawn so high, that like an ominous Comet,
He darkens all your light; can this toucht Lyon
(Though now he licks and locks up his fell paws, Craftily humming, like a catt to cozen you)
But when ambition whets him, and time fits him,
Leap to his prey, and seiz'd once, suck your heart out?

Do you make it conscience?

Rol. Conscience, Latorch, what's that?

Lato. A fear they tye up fools in, natures coward,
Palling the blood, and chilling the full spirit
With apprehension of meer clouds and shadows.

Rol. I know no conscience, nor I fear no shadows.

Lato. Or if you did, if there were conscience,
If the free soul could suffer such a curb
To the fiery mind, such puddles to put it out;
Must it needs like a rank Vine, run up rudely,
And twine about the top of all our happiness,
Honour and rule, and there sit shaking of us?

Rol. It shall not, nor it must not; I am satisfied,
And once more am my self again:

My Mothers tears and womanish cold prayers,
Farewel, I have forgot you; if there be conscience,
Let it not come betwixt a crown and me,
Which is my hope of blis, and I believe it:

Otto, our friendship thus I blow to air,
A bubble for a boy to play withal;
And all the vows my weaknes made, like this,
Like this poor heartless rush, I rend in pieces.

Lato. Now you go right, Sir, now your eyes are open.

Rol. My Fathers last petition's dead as he is,
And all the promises I clos'd his eyes with,
In the same grave I bury.

Lato. Now y'are a man, Sir.

Rol. Otto, thou shewst my winding sheet before me,
Which e're I put it on, like Heavens blest fire
In my descent I'll make it blush in blood;
A Crown, A Crown, Oh sacred Rule, now fire me,
Nor shall the pity of thy youth, false Brother,
Although a thousand Virgins kneel before me,
And every dropping eye a court of mercy,
The same blood with me, nor the reverence
Due to my mothers blest womb that bred us,
Redeem thee from my doubts: thou art a wolf here,
Fed with my fears, and I must cut thee from me:
A Crown, A Crown; Oh sacred Rule, now fire me:
No safety else.

Lato. But be not too much stir'd, Sir, nor too high
In your execution: swallowing waters
Run deep and silent, till they are satisfied,
And smile in thousand Circles, to guild their craft;
Let your sword sleep, and let my two edg'd wit work,
This happy feast, the full joy of your friendships
Shall be his last.

Rol. How, my Latorch?

Lato. Why thus, Sir;

I'll presently go dive into the Officers
That minister at Table: gold and goodness,
With promise upon promise, and time necessary,
I'll pour into them.

Rol. Canst thou do it neatly?

Lato. Let me alone, and such a bait it shall be,
Shall take off all suspicion.

Rol. Go, and prosper.

Lato. Walk in then, and your smoothest face put on Sir.

[Exeunt.

SCENE II.

Enter the Master Cook, Butler, Pantler, Yeoman of the Cellar, with a Jack of Beer and a Dish.

Cook. A hot day, a hot day, vengeance hot day boys,
Give me some drink, this fire's a plaguy fretter:
Body of me, I'm dry still; give me the Jack boy;
This wooden Skiff holds nothing.

Pant. And faith master, what brave new meats; for here
Will be old eating.

Coo. Old and young, boy, let 'em all eat, I have it;
I have ballast for their bellies, if they eat a gods name,
Let them have ten tire of teeth a piece, I care not;

But. But what new rare munition?

Coo. Fish, a thousand;

I'll make you piggs speak French at table, and a fat swan
Come sailing out of England with a challenge;
I'll make you a dish of calves feet dance the Canaries,
And a consort of cramm'd capons fiddle to 'em;
A calves head speak an Oracle, and a dozen of Larks
Rife from the dish, and sing all supper time;
'Tis nothing boyes: I have framed a fortification
Out of Rye paste, which is impregnable,
And against that, for two long hours together,
Two dozen of marrow-bones shall play continually:
For fish, I'll make you a standing lake of white broth,
And pikes come ploughing up the plums before them;
Arion, like a Dolphin, playing Lachrymæ,
And brave King Herring with his oyle and onyon
Crown'd with a Limon pill, his way prepar'd
With his strong Guard of Pilchers.

Pant. I marry Master.

Coo. All these are nothing: I'll make you a stubble Goose
Turn o'th' toe thrice, do a cross point presently,
And sit down again, and cry come eat me:
These are for mirth. Now Sir, for matter of mourning,
I'll bring you in the Lady Loyn of Veal,
With the long love she bore the Prince of Orenge.

All. Thou boy, thou.

Coo. I have a trick for thee too,
And a rare trick, and I have done it for thee.

Yeo. What's that good master?

Coo. 'Tis a sacrifice.

A full Vine bending, like an Arch, and under
The blown god Bacchus, sitting on a Hogthead,
His Altar Beer: before that, a plump Vintner
Kneeling, and offering incense to his deitie,
Which shall be only this, red Sprats and Pilchers.

But. This when the Table's drawn, to draw the wine on.

Coo. Thou hast it right, and then comes thy Song, Butler.

Pant. This will be admirable.

Yeo. Oh Sir, most admirable.

Coo. If you'll have the patty speak, 'tis in my power,
I have fire enough to work it; come, stand close,
And now rehearse the Song, we may be perfect,
The drinking Song, and say I were the Brothers.

The drinking SONG.

Drink to day and drown all sorrow,
You shall perhaps not do it to morrow.
Best while you have it use your breath,
There is no drinking after death.

Wine works the heart up, wakes the wit,
There is no cure 'gainst age but it.
It helps the head ach, cough and tiffick,
And is for all diseases Physick.

Then let us swill boyes for our health,
Who drinks well, loves the common-wealth.
And he that will to bed go sober,
Falls with the leaf still in October.

Well have you born your selves; a red Deer Pye, Boyes,
And that no lean one, I bequeath your vertues;
What friends hast thou to day? no citizens?

Pant. Yes Father, the old Crew.

Coo. By the mass true wenches:

Sirrah, set by a chine of Beef, and a hot Pasty,
And let the Joll of Sturgeon be corrected:
And do you mark Sir, stalk me to a Pheasant,
And see if you can shoot her in the Sellar.

Pant. God a mercy Lad, send me thy roaring bottles,
And with such Nestar I will see 'em fill'd,
That all thou speak'st shall be pure Helicon.

Enter Latorch.

Monseur Latorch? what news with him? Save you.

Lat. Save you Master, save you Gentlemen,
You are casting for this preparation;
This joyfull supper for the royal Brothers:
I'm glad I have met you fitly, for to your charge
My bountifull brave Butler, I must deliver
A Bevie of young Lasses, that must look on
This nights solemnity, and see the two Dukes,
Or I shall lose my credit; you have Stowage?

But. For such freight I'll find room, and be your servant.

Coo. Bring them, they shall not starve here, I'll send 'em
(Victuals)

Shall work you a good turn, though't be ten days hence, Sir.

Lat. God a mercy noble Master.

Coo. Nay, I'll do't.

Yeo. And wine they shall not want, let 'em drink like Ducks.

Lat. What misery it is that minds so royal,
And such most honest bounties, as yours are,
Should be confin'd thus to uncertainties?

But. I, were the State once settled, then we had places.

Yeo. Then we could shew our selves, and help our friends,

Coo. I, then there were some favour in't, where now (Sir)
We live between two stools, every hour ready
To tumble on our noses; and for ought we know yet,
For all this Supper, ready to fast the next day.

Lat. I would fain speak unto you out of pitie,
Out of the love I bear you, out of honesty,
For your own goods; nay, for the general blessing.

Coo. And we would as fain hear you, pray go forward.

Lat. Dare you but think to make your selves up certainties
Your places and your credits ten times doubled,
The Princes favour, Rollo's?

But. A sweet Gentleman.

Yeo. I, and as bounteous, if he had his right too.

Coo. By the mass, a Royal Gentleman indeed Boyes,
He'd make the chimneys smoak.

Lat. He would do't friends,
And you too, if he had his right, true Courtiers;
What could you want then? dare you?

Coo. Pray you be short Sir.

Lat. And this my soul upon't, I dare assure you,
If you but dare your parts.

Coo. Dare not me Monsieur,
For I that fear nor fire nor water, Sir,
Dare do enough, a man would think.

Yeo. Believ't, Sir;
But make this good upon us you have promis'd,
You shall not find us flinchers.

Lat. Then I'll be fudden.

Pant. What may this mean? and whither would he drive

Lat. And first, for what you must do, because all danger
Shall be apparantly ty'd up and muzl'd,
The matter seeming mighty: there's your pardons.

Pant. Pardon's? is't come to that? gods defend us. (nest,

Lat. And here's five hundred Crowns in bounteous ear.
And now behold the matter. Latorch gives

But. What are these, Sir?

each a paper.

Yeo. And of what nature? to what use?

Lat. Imagine.

Coo. Will they kill Rats? they eat my pyes abominably,
Or work upon a woman cold as Cbrilmas?
I have an old Jade sticks upon my fingers,
May I taste them?

Lat. Is your will made?

And have you said your prayers? for they'll pay you:
And now to come up to you, for your knowledge,
And for the good you never shall repent you
If you be wise men now.

Coo. Wife as you will, Sir.

Lat. These must be put then into the several meats
Young Otto loves, by you into his wine, Sir,
Into his bread by you, by you into his linnen.
Now if you desire, you have found the means
To make you, and if you dare not, you have Found your ruine; resolve me e're you go.

K k k 2

But

But. You'll keep your faith with us.
Lat. May I no more see light else.
Coo. Why 'tis done then?
But. 'Tis done.
Pan. 'Tis done which shall be undone.
Lat. About it then, farewell, y'are all of one mind.
Coo. All?
All. All, All.
Lat. Why then, all happye. [Exit.
But. What did we promise him?
Yeo. Do you ask that now?
But. I would be glad to know what 'tis.
Pan. I'll tell you,
 It is to be all villains, knaves, and traytors.
Coo. Fine wholesome titles.
Pan. But if you dare, go forward.
Coo. We may be hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd.
Pan. Very true, Sir.
Coo. What a goodly swing I shall give the gallows? yet
 I think too, this may be done, and yet we may be rewarded, not with a rope, but with a royal master: and yet we may be hang'd too.
Yeo. Say it were done; who is it done for? is it not for Rollo?
 And for 'tis right?
Coo. And yet we may be hang'd too.
But. Or say he take it, say we be discover'd?
 Is not the same man bound still to protect us?
 Are we not his?
But. Sure, he will never fail us.
Coo. If he do, friends, we shall find that will hold us.
 And yet me thinks, this prologue to our purpose,
 These crowns should promise more: 'tis easily done,
 As ease as a man would roast an egge,
 If that be all; for look you, Gentlemen,
 Here stand my broths, my finger slips a little,
 Down drops a dose, I stir him with my ladle,
 And there's a dish for a Duke: Olla Podrida.
 Here stands a bak'd meat, he wants a little seasoning,
 A foolish mistake; my Spice-box, Gentlemen,
 And put in some of this, the matter's ended;
 Dredge you a dish of plovers, there's the Art on't.
Yeo. Or as I fill my wine.
Coo. 'Tis very true, Sir,
 Blessing it with your hand, thus quick and neatly first, 'tis
 And done once, 'tis as easie (past
 For him to thank us for it, and reward us.
Pan. But 'tis a damn'd fin.
Coo. O, never fear that.
 The fire's my play-fellow, and now I am resolv'd, boyes.
But. Why then, have with you.
Yeo. The same for me.
Pan. For me too.
Coo. And now no more our worships, but our Lordships.
Pan. Not this year, on my knowledge, I'll unlord you.

SCENE III.

Enter Servant, and Sewer.

Ser. Perfume the room round, and prepare the table,
 Gentlemen officers, wait in your places.

Sew. Make room there,
 Room for the Duke's meat. Gentlemen, be bare there,
 Clear all the entrance: Guard, put by those gapers,
 And Gentlemen-ushers, see the gallery clear,
 The Dukes are coming on.

Hoboyes, a banquet.

Enter Sophia, between Rollo, and Otto, Aubry,
Latoch, Gispert, Baldwin, Attendants,
Hamond, Matilda, Edith.

Ser. 'Tis certainly inform'd.

Ot. Reward the fellow, and look you mainly to it.

Ser. My life for yours, Sir.

Soph. Now am I straight, my Lords, and young again,

My long since blasted hopes shoot out in blossomes,
 The fruits of everlasting love appearing;
 Oh! my blest boys, the honour of my years,
 Of all my cares, the bounteous fair rewarders.
 Oh! let me thus embrace you, thus for ever
 Within a Mothers love lock up your friendships:
 And my sweet sons, once more with mutual twinings,
 As one chaste bed begot you, make one body:
 Blessings from heaven in thousand showers fall on you.
Aub. Oh! womans goodness never to be equal'd,
 May the most sinfull creatures of thy sex
 But kneeling at thy monument, rise saints.
Soph. Sit down my worthy sons; my Lords, your places.
 I, now me thinks the table's nobly furnisht;
 Now the meat nourishes; the wine gives spirit;
 And all the room stuck with a general pleasure,
 Shews like the peacefull boughs of happiness.
Aub. Long may it last, and from a heart fill'd with it
 Full as my cup; I give it round, my Lords.
Bald. And may that stubborn heart be drunk with sorrow
 Refuses it; men dying now should take it,
 And by the vertue of this ceremony
 Shake off their miseries, and sleep in peace.
Rol. You are sad, my noble Brother.
Ot. No, indeed, Sir.
Soph. No sadness my son this day.
Rol. Pray you eat,
 Something is here you have lov'd; taste of this dish,
 It will prepare your stomach.
Ot. Thank you brother: I am not now dispos'd to eat.
Rol. Or that,
 You put us out of heart man, come, these bak't meats
 Were ever your best dyet.
Ot. None, I thank you.
Soph. Are you well, noble child?
Ot. Yes, gracious Mother.
Rol. Give him a cup of wine, then, pledge the health,
 Drink it to me, I'll give it to my Mother.
Soph. Do, my best child.
Ot. I must not, my best Mother,
 Indeed I dare not: for of late, my body
 Has been much weakned by excess of dyet;
 The promise of a fever hanging on me,
 And even now ready, if not by abstinence——
Rol. And will you keep it in this general freedom;
 A little health prefer'd before our friendship?
Ot. I pray you excuse me, Sir.
Rol. Excuse your self Sir,
 Come 'tis your fear, and not your favour Brother,
 And you have done me a most worthy kindness
 My Royal Mother, and you noble Lords;
 Here, for it now concerns me to speak boldly;
 What faith can be expected from his vows,
 From his dissembling smiles, what fruit of friendship
 From all his dull embraces, what blest issue,
 When he shall brand me here for base suspicion?
 He takes me for a poysoner.
Sop. Gods defend it son.
Rol. For a foul knave, a villain, and so fears me.
Ot. I could say something too.
Sop. You must not so Sir,
 Without your great forgetfulness of vertue;
 This is your Brother, and your honour'd Brother.
Rol. If he please so.
Sop. One noble Father, with as noble thoughts,
 Begot your minds and bodies: one care rockt you,
 And one truth to you both was ever sacred;
 Now see my Otto, whither flies your goodness?
 Because the right hand has the power of cutting,
 Shall the left presently cry out 'tis maimed?
 They are one my child, one power, and one performance,
 And joy'd together thus, one love, one body.
Aub. I do beseech your grace, take to your thoughts
 More certain counsellors than doubts or fears,

They strangle nature, and disperse themselves
(If once believ'd) into such fogs and errors
That the bright truth her self can never sever:
Your Brother is a royal Gentleman
Full of himself, honour, and honesty,
And take heed Sir, how nature bent to goodness,
(So streight a Cedar to himself) uprightnes
Be wrested from his true use, prove not dangerous.

Rol. Nay my good Brother knows I am too patient.

Lat. Why should your grace think him a poysoner?
Has he no more respect to piety?
And but he has by oath ty'd up his fury
Who durst but think that thought?

Aub. Away thou firebrand.

Lat. If man of his sort, of his power, and place
The eldest son in honour to this Dukedom. (togue)

Bald. Fo. shame contain thy tongue, thy poysonous
That with her burning venome will infect all,
And once more blow a wilde fire through the Dukedom.

Gif. Latorch, if thou be'st honest, or a man,
Contain thy self.

Aub. Go to, no more, by Heaven
You'll find y'have plai'd the fool else, not a word more.

Sop. Prethee sweet son.

Rol. Let him alone sweet Mother, and my Lords
To make you understand how much I honour
This sacred peace, and next my innocence,
And to avoid all further difference

Discourse may draw on to a way of danger
I quit my place, and take my leave for this night,
Wishing a general joy may dwell among you.

Aub. Shall we wait on your grace?

Rol. I dare not break you. Latorch. [Ex. Rol. and Lat.]

Or. Oh Mother that your tenderness had eyes,
Discerning eyes, what would this man appear then?
The tale of Synon when he took upon him
To ruine Troy; with what a cloud of cunning
He hid his heart, nothing appearing outwards;
But came like innocence, and dropping pity,
Sighs that would sink a Navie, and had tales
Able to take the ears of Saints, belief too,
And what did all these? blew the fire to Ilium.
His crafty art (but more refin'd by study)
My Brother has put on: oh I could tell you
But for the reverence I bear to nature,
Things that would make your honest blood run backward.

Sop. You dare tell me?

Or. Yes, in your private closet
Where I will presently attend you; rise
I am a little troubled, but 'twill off.

Sop. Is this the joy I look'd for?

Or. All will mend,
Be not disturb'd dear Mother, Ple not fail you.

[Ex. Sop. and Otto.]

Bald. I do not like this.

Aub. That is still in our powers,
But how to make it so that we may like it.

Bald. Beyond us ever; Latorch me thought was busie,
That fellow, if not lookt to narrowly, will do a suddain

Aub. Hell look to him, (mischief.
For if there may be a Devil above all, yet
That Rogue will make him; keep you up this night,
And so will I, for much I fear a danger.

Bald. I will, and in my watches use my prayers.

[Exeunt.]

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter Sophia, Otto, Matilda, Edith.

Or. You wonder Madam, that for all the shews
My Brother Rollo makes of hearty love
And free possession of the Dukedom 'twixt us;
I notwithstanding should stand still suspicious,
As if beneath those veils, he did convey
Intents and practices of hate, and treason?

Sob. It breeds indeed my wonder.

Or. Which makes mine,
Since it is so safe and broad a beaten way,
Beneath the name of friendship to betray.

Sop. Though in remote and further off affections,
These falsehoods are so common, yet in him
They cannot so force nature.

Or. The more near
The bands of truth bind, the more oft they sever,
Being better cloaks to cover falshood over.

Sop. It cannot be, that fruits the tree so blasting
Can grow in nature; take heed gentle Son
Lest some suborn'd suggester of these treasons,
Believ'd in him by you, provok'd the rather
His tender envies, to such foul attempts;
Or that your too much love to rule alone
Breed not in him this jealous passion;
There is not any ill we might not bear
Were not our good held at a price too dear.

Or. So apt is treachery to be excused,
That innocence is still aloud abused,
The fate of vertue even her friends perverts,
To plead for vice oft times against their hearts,
Heavens blessing is her curse, which she must bear
That she may never love.

Sop. Alas, my son, nor fate, nor heaven it self,
Can or would wrest my whole care of your good
To any least secureness in your ill:
What I urge issues from my curious fear,
Lest you should make your means to scape your snare.
Doubt of sincereness is the only mean
Not to incense it, but corrupt it clean.

Or. I rest as far from wrong of sincereness,
As he flies from the practice, trust me Madam,
I know by their confessions, he suborn'd,
What I should eat, drink, touch, or only have scented,
This evening feast was poysoned, but I fear
This open violence more, that treacherous odde
Which he in his insatiate thirst of rule
Is like to execute.

Sop. Believe it Son,
If still his stomach be so foul to feed
On such gross objects, and that thirst to rule
The state alone be yet unquench'd in him,
Poysons and such close treasons ask more time
Than can suffice his fiery spirits halt:
And were there in him such desire to hide
So false a practice, there would likewise rest
Conscience and fear in him of open force,
And therefore close nor open you need fear.

Mat. Good Madam, stand not so inclin'd to trust
What proves his tenderest thoughts to doubt it just,
Who knows not the unbounded flood and sea,
In which my Brother Rollo's appetites
Alter and rage with every puffe and breath?
His swelling blood exhales, and therefore hear,
What gives my temperate Brother cause to use
His readiest circumspection, and consult
For remedy against all his wicked purposes;
If he arm, arm, if he strew mines of treason,
Meet him with countermines, it is justice still (For goodness sake) t'encounter ill with ill.

Sop. Avert from us such justice, equal heaven,
And all such cause of justice.

Or. Past all doubt
(For all the sacred privilege of night)
This is no time for us to sleep or rest in;
Who knows not all things holy are prevented
With ends of all impietic, all but
Lust, gain, ambition.

Enter Rollo, armed, and Latorch.

Rol. Perish all the world
E're I but lose one foot of possible Empire,
Be slights and colour us'd by slaves and wretches,
I am exempt by birth from both these curbs,
And since above them in all justice, since
I sit above in power, where power is given,
Is all the right suppos'd of Earth and Heaven.

Lat. Prove both Sir, see the traytor.

Or. He comes arm'd, see Mother, now your confidence.

Sop. What rage affects this monster?

Rol. Give me way or perish.

Sop. Make thy way viper, if thou thus affect it.

Or. This is a treason like thee.

Rol. Let her go.

Sop. Embrace me, wear me as thy shield, my Son;
And through my breast let his rude weapon run,
To thy lives innocence.

Or. Play not two parts,
Traicher and coward both; but yield a sword,
And let thy arming thee be odds enough
Against my naked bosom.

Rol. Loose his hold.

Mat. Forbear base murtherer.

Rol. Forsake our Mother.

Sop. Mother, dost thou name me, and put'st off nature thus?

Rol. Forsake her traytour,
Or by the spouse of nature through hers
This leads unto thy heart.

Or. Hold.

Sop. Hold me still.

Or. For twenty hearts and lives I will not hazard
One drop of blood in yours.

Sop. Oh thou art lost then.

Or. Protect my innocence, Heaven.

Sop. Call out murther.

Mat. Be murthered all, but save him.

Ed. Murther, murther.

Rol. Cannot I reach you yet?

Or. No, fiend.

Rol. Latorch, rescue, I'me down.

Lat. Up then, your sword cools Sir,
Ply it i'th' flame, and work your ends out.

Rol. Ha, have at your there Sir.

Enter Aubrey.

Aub. Author of prodigies, what sights are these?

Or. Oh give me a weapon, Aubrey.

Sop. Oh part 'em, part 'em.

Aub. For Heavens sake no more.

Or. No more resist his fury, no rage can Add to his mischief done. Dyes.

Sop. Take spirit my Otto,
Heaven will not see thee dye thus. (goodness.)

Mat. He is dead, and nothing lives but death of every

Sop. Oh he hath slain his Brother, curse him heaven.

Rol. Curse and be cursed, it is the fruit of cursing,

Latorch, take off here, bring too, of that blood
To colour o're my shirt, then raise the Court
And give it out how he attempted us
In our bed naked: shall the name of Brother
Forbid us to enlarge our state and powers?
Or place affects of blood above our reason?
That tells us all things good against another,
Are good in the same line against a Brother.

[Exit.]

Enter Gisbert, Baldwin.

Gif. What affairs inform these out-cries?

Aub. See and grieve.

Gif. Prince Otto slain!

Bal. Oh execrable slaughter!

What hand hath author'd it?

Aub. Your Scholars, Baldwin.

Bald. Unjustly urg'd, Lord Aubrey, as if I,
For being his Schoolmaster, must own this doctrine,
You are his Counsellours, did you advise him
To this foul parricide?

Gif. If rule affect this licence, who would live
To worse, than dye in force of his obedience?

Bal. Heavens cold and lingring spirit to punish sin,
And humane blood so fiery to commit it,
One so outgoes the other, it will never
Be turn'd to fit obedience.

Aub. Burst it then

With his full swing given, where it brooks no bound,
Complaints of it are vain; and all that rests
To be our refuge (since our powers are strengthless)
Is to conform our wills to suffer freely,
What with our murmurs we can never master;
Ladys, be pleas'd with what heavens pleasure suffers,
Erect your princely countenances and spirits,
And to redress the mischiefs now resistless,
Sooth it in shew, rather than curse or cross it;
Which all amends, and vow to it your best,
But till you may perform it, let it rest.

Gif. Those temporizings are too dull and servile,
To breath the free air of a manly soul,
Which shall in me expire in execrations,
Before for any life I sooth a murtherer.

Bal. Pour lives before him, till his own be dry
Of all lives services and humane comforts;
None left that looks at heaven is half so base
To do those black and hellish actions grace.

Enter Rollo, Lat. Ham. and Guard.

Rol. Haste Latorch

And raise the Citie as the Court is rais'd,
Proclaiming the abhor'd conspiracy
In plot against my life.

Lat. I haste my Lord.

[Exit.]

Rol. You there that mourn upon the justly slain,
Arise and leave it if you love your lives,
And hear from me what (kept by you) may save you.

Mat. What will the Butcher do? I will not stir.

Rol. Stir, and unforc't stir, or stir never more:
Command her, you grave Beldam, that know better
My deadly resolutions, since I drew them
From the infective fountain of your own,
Or if you have forgot, this fiery prompter
Shall fix the fresh impresson on your heart.

Sop. Rise Daughter, serve his will in what we may,
Left what we may not he enforce the rather,
Is this all you command us?

Rol. This addition only admitted, that when I endeavour
To quit me of this slaughter, you presume not
To cross me with a syllable for your souls;
Murmur, nor think against it, but weigh well,
It will not help your ill, but help to more,
And that my hand wrought thus far to my will,
Will check at nothing till his circle fill.

Mat. Fill it, so I consent not, but who sooths it
Consents, and who consents to tyrannie, does it.

Rol. False traytrefts die then with him.

(self)

Aub. Are you mad, to offer at more blood, and make your
More horrid to your people? I'le proclaim,
It is not as your instrument will publish.

Rol. Do, and take that along with you—so nimble!
Resign my sword, and dare not for thy soul

To

To offer what thou insolently threatnest ;
One word, proclaiming cros to what Latorch
Hath in Commission, and intends to publish.

Aub. Well, Sir, not for your threats, but for your good,
Since more hurt to you would more hurt your Country,
And that you must make Vertue of the need
That now compels you, I'll consent as far
As silence argues to your will proclaimed :
And since no more Sons of your Princely Father
Survive to rule but you, and that I wish
You should rule like your Father, with the love
And zeal of all your Subjects ; this foul slaughter
That now you have committed made ashamed
With that fair blessing, that in place of plagues,
Heaven trys our mending disposition with :
Take here your sword, which now use like a Prince,
And no more like a Tyrant.

Rol. This sounds well, live and be gracious with us.

Gif. and Bal. Oh Lord Aubrey.

Mat. He flatter thus ?

Sop. He temporizes fitly.

Rol. Wonder invades me ; do you two think much,
That he thus wisely, and with need consents
To what I authour for your Countries good ?
You being my Tutor, you my Chancellour.

Gif. Your Chancellour is not your Flatterer, Sir.

Bal. Nor is it your Tutors part to shield such doctrine.

Rol. Sir, first know you,

In praise of your pure Oratory that rais'd you,
That when the people, who I know by this
Are rais'd out of their rests, and hastening hither
To witness what is done here, are arrived
With our Latorch, that you, ex tempore,
Shall fashion an Oration to acquit
And justifie this forced fact of mine ;
Or for the proud refusal lose your head.

Gif. I fashion an Oration to acquit you ?
Sir, know you then, that 'tis a thing less easie
To excuse a parricide than to commit it.

Rol. I do not wish you, Sir, to excuse me,
But to accuse my Brother, as the cause
Of his own slaughter by attempting mine.

Gif. Not for the World, I should pour blood on blood ;
It were another murder to accuse
Him that fell innocent.

Rol. Away with him, hence, hail him straight to execution.

Aub. Far slye such rigour, your amendful hand.

Rol. He perishes with him that speaks for him ;
Guard do your office on him, on your lives pain.

Gif. Tyrant, 'twill haste thy own death.

Rol. Let it wing it,
He threatens me, Villains tear him piece-meal hence.

Guard. Avant Sir.

Ham. Force him hence.

Rol. Dispatch him, Captain,
And bring me instant word he is dispatched,
And how his Rhetorick takes it.

Ham. I'll not fail, Sir.

Rol. Captain, besides remember this in chief ;
That being executed, you deny
To all his friends the Rites of Funeral,
And cast his Carcass out to Dogs and Fowls.

Ham. 'Tis done, my Lord.

Rol. Upon your life not fail.

Bal. What impious daring is there here of Heaven !

Rol. Sir, now prepare your self, against the people
Make here their entry, to discharge the Oration,
He hath denied my will.

Bal. For fear of death ? ha, ha, ha.

Rol. Is death ridiculous with you ?

Works misery of Age this, or thy judgment ?

Bal. Judgment, false Tyrant.

Rol. You'll make no Oration then ?

Bal. Not to excuse, but aggravate thy murder if thou wilt,

Which I will so enforce, I'll make thee wreek it
(With hate of what thou win't by't) on thy self,
With such another justly merited murder.

Rol. I'll answer you anon.

Enter Latorch.

Lat. The Citizens are hasting, Sir, in heaps, all full re.
By my perswasion of your Brothers Treasons. (solv'd,

Rol. Honest Latorch.

Enter Hamond.

Ham. Sec, Sir, here's Gisberts head.

Rol. Good speed ; was't with a Sword ?

Ham. An Axe, Sir.

Rol. An Axe ? 'twas vilely done, I would have had
My own fine Headfman done it with a Sword ;
Go, take this Dotard here, and take his head
Off with a Sword.

Ham. Your Schoolmaster ?

Rol. Even he.

Bal. For teaching thee no better ; 'tis the best
Of all thy damned justices ; away,
Captain, I'll follow. (and fury,

Ed. Oh stay there, Duke, and in the midst of all thy blood
Hear a poor Maids Petitions, hear a Daughter,
The only Daughter of a wretched Father ;
Oh stay your haste as you shall need this mercy.

Rol. Away with this fond woman.

Ed. You must hear me

If there be any spark of pity in you,
If sweet humanity and mercy rule you ;
I do confesse you are a Prince, your anger
As great as you, your Execution greater.

Rol. Away with him.

Ed. Oh Captain, by thy manhood,
By her soft soul that bare thee, I do confesse, Sir,
Your doom of justice on your foes most righteous ;
Good noble Prince look on me.

Rol. Take her from me.

Ed. A curse upon his life that hinders me ;
May Fathers Blessing never fall upon him,
May Heaven never hear his Prayers : I beseech you,
Oh Sir, these few tears beseech you ; these chaste hands woo
That never yet were heav'd but to things holy, (you,
Things like your self, you are a god above us ;
Be as a God then, full of saving mercy ;
Mercy, Oh mercy, for his sake mercy ;
That when your stout heart weeps shall give you pity ;
Here I must grow.

Rol. By Heaven, I'll strike thee, woman.

Ed. Most willingly, let all thy anger seek me,
All the most studied torments, so this good man,
This old man, and this innocent escape thee.

Rol. Carry him away I say.

Ed. Now blessing on thee, Oh sweet pity,
I see it in thy Eyes, I charge you Souldiers
Even by the Princes power, release my Father ;
The Prince is merciful, why do you hold him ?
He is old, why do you hurt him ? speak, Oh speak, Sir ;
Speak as you are a man ; a mans life hangs, Sir,
A friends life, and a foster life upon you :
'Tis but a word, but mercy quickly spoke, Sir ;
Oh speak, Prince, speak.

Rol. Will no man here obey me ?

Have I no rule yet ? as I live he dyes
That does not execute my will, and suddenly. (me.

Bal. All that thou canst do takes but one short hour from

Rol. Hew off her hands.

Ham. Lady hold off.

Ed. Nay, hew 'em,

Hew off my innocent hands as he commands you.

[Exeunt Guard, Count Baldwin.

They'll hang the faster on for Deaths convulsion.

Thou seed of Rocks, will nothing move thee then ?

Are all my tears lost? all my righteous Prayers
Drown'd in thy drunken wrath? I stand thus then,
Thus boldly, bloody Tyrant,
And to thy face in Heavens high Name defie thee;
And may sweet mercy when thy soul sighs for it,
When under thy black mischiefs thy flesh trembles,
When neither strength, nor youth, nor friends, nor gold
Can stay one hour, when thy most wretched Conscience
Wak'd from her dream of death, like fire shall melt thee,
When all thy Mothers tears, thy Brothers wounds,
Thy Peoples fears and curses, and my loss,
My aged fathers loss shall stand before thee.

Rol. Save him I say, run, save him, save her Father,
Fly, and redeem his head. [Exit Latorch.

Ed. May then that pity,
That comfort thou expect'st from Heaven, that mercy
Be lockt up from thee, fly thee, howling find thee,
Despair, Oh my sweet father, storms of terrours,
Blood till thou burst again.

Rol. Oh fair sweet anger.

Enter Latorch and Hamond with a Head.

Lat. I am too late, Sir, 'twas dispatch'd before,
And his Head is here.

Rol. And my Heart there; go bury him,
Give him fair Rites of Funeral, decent Honours.

Ed. Wilt thou not take me, Monster? highest Heaven
Give him a punishment fit for his mischief.

Lat. I fear thy Prayer is heard, and he rewarded:
Lady, have patience, 'twas unhappy speed;
Blame not the Duke, 'twas not his fault, but Pates;
He sent, you know, to stay it, and commanded
In care of you, the heavy object hence
Soon as it came: have better thoughts of him.

Enter Citizens.

1 Cit. Where's this young Traytor?

Lat. Noble Citizens, here,
And here the wounds he gave your sovereign Lord.

1 Cit. This Prince of force must be
Belov'd of Heaven, whom Heaven hath thus preserv'd.

2 Cit. And if he be belov'd of Heaven, you know,
He must be just, and all his actions so.

Rol. Concluded like an Oracle, Oh how great
A grace of Heaven is a wife Citizen!
For Heaven 'tis makes 'em wise, as't makes me just,
As it preserves me, as I now survive
By his strong hand to keep you all alive:
Your Wives, your Children, Goods and Lands kept yours,
That had been else preys to his tyrannous Power,
That would have prey'd on me, in Bed assaulted me
In sacred time of Peace; my Mother here,
My Sister, this just Lord, and all had felt
The certain Gulph of this Conspiracy,
Of which my Tutor and my Chancellour,
(Two of the gravest, and most counted honest
In all my Dukedom) were the monstrous Heads;
Oh trust no honest men for their sakes ever,
My politick Citizens, but those that breathe
The Names of Cut-throats, Usurers and Tyrants,
Oh those believe in, for the foul-mouth'd World
Can give no better terms to simple goodness:
Even me it dares blaspheme, and thinks me tyrannous
For saving my own life fought by my Brother;
Yet those that fought his life before by poyson
(Though mine own servants, hoping to please me)
I'll lead to death for't, which your Eyes shall see.

1 Cit. Why, what a Prince is here!

2 Cit. How just!

3 Cit. How gentle!

Rol. Well, now my dearest Subjects, or much rather
My Nerves, my Spirits, or my vital Blood;
Turn to your needful rests, and settled peace,
Fix'd in this root of steel, from whence it sprung

In Heavens great help and Blessing: but ere sleep
Bind in his sweet oblivion your dull senses,
The Name and Vertue of Heavens King advance
For yours, in chief, for my deliverance.

Cit. Heaven and his King save our most pious Sovereign.
[Exit Citizens.

Rol. Thanks my good people. Mother, and kind Sister,
And you my noble Kinsmen, things born thus
Shall make ye all command what ever I
Enjoy in this my absolute Empire,
Take in the Body of my Princely Brother,
For whose Death, since his Fate no other way
Would give my eldest birth his supream Right;
We'll mourn the cruel influence it bears,
And wash his Sepulchre with kindly tears.

Ans. If this game end thus, Heavens will rule the set.
What we have yielded to, we could not let.

[Exit omnes præter Latorch, and Edith.

Lat. Good Lady rise, and raise your Spirits withal,
More high than they are humbled; you have cause,
As much as ever honour'd happiest Lady;
And when your Ears are freer to take in
Your most amendful and unmatched fortunes,
I'll make you drown a hundred helpless deaths
In Sea of one life pour'd into your Bosome;
With which shall flow into your arms, the Riches,
The Pleasures, Honours, and the rules of Princes;
Which though death stop your ears, methinks should open
Assay to forget death. ('em,

Ed. Oh slaughter'd Father.

Lat. Taste of what cannot be redress'd, and bless
The Fate that yet you curse so; since for that
You spake so movingly, and your sweet eyes
With so much Grace fill'd, that you set on fire
The Dukes affection, whom you now may rule
As he rules all his Dukedome, is't not sweet?
Does it not shine away your sorrows Clouds?
Sweet Lady, take wise heart, and hear and tell me.

Ed. I hear no word you speak.

Lat. Prepare to hear then,
And be not barr'd up from your self, nor add
To your ill fortune with your far worse judgment;
Make me your servant to attend with all joys,
Your sad estate, till they both bless and speak it:
See how they'll bow to you, make me wait, command me
To watch out every minute, for the stay
Your modest sorrow fancies, raise your graces,
And do my hopes the honour of your motion,
To all the offered heights that now attend you:
Oh how your touches ravish! how the Duke
Is slain already with your flames embrac'd!
I will both serve and visit you, and often.

Ed. I am not fit, Sir.

Lat. Time will make you, Lady.

[Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter the Guard, 3 or 4 Boys, then the Sheriff, Cook, Yeoman of the Cellar, Butler, Pantler to execution.

1 Guard. Come, bring in these fellows, on, away with 'em.

2 Guard. Make room before there, room for the Priso(ners.

1 Boy. Let's run before, Boys, we shall have no places else.

2 Boy. Are these the youths?

Cook. These are the youths you look for,
And, pray my honest friends, be not so hasty,
There will be nothing done till we come, I assure you.

3 Boy. Here's a wife hanging; are there no more?

Butl. Do you hear, Sir? you may come in for your share
if you please.

Cook. My friend, if you be unprovided of a hanging,
You

You look like a good fellow, I can afford you
A reasonable penny-worth.

2 Boy. Afore, afore, Boys, here's enough to make us sport.

Yeom. 'Pox take you,

Do you call this sport? are these your recreations?
Must we be hang'd to make you mirth?

Cook. Do you hear?

You Cullard Pate, we go to't for high Treason,
An honourable fault: thy foolish Father
Was hang'd for stealing Sheep.

Boys. Away, away, Boys.

Cook. Do you see how that sneaking Rogue looks now?
You, Chip, Pantler, you peaking Rogue, that provided us these Necklaces; you poor Rogue, you coltive Rogue, you.

Pant. Pray, pray, fellows.

Cook. 'Pray for thy crusty soul? where's your reward now,
Goodman Manchet, for your fine discovery?

I do beseech you, Sir, where are your Dollers?

Draw with your fellows and be hang'd.

Yeom. He must now;

For now he shall be hang'd first, that's his comfort,
A place too good for thee, thou meal-mouth'd Rascal.

Coo. Hang handfomly for shame, come, leave your praying.

You peaking Knave, and dye like a good Courtier,

Dye honestly, and like a man; no preaching,

With I beseech you take example by me,

I liv'd a lewd man, good People. 'Pox on't, (you.

Dye me as if thou hadst din'd, say Grace, and God be with Guard. Come, will you forward?

Cook. Good Mr. Sheriff, your leave, this hasty work
Was ne'r done well; give us so much time as but to sing

Our own Ballads, for we'll trust no man,

Nor no tune but our own; 'twas done in Ale too,

And therefore cannot be refus'd in Justice.

Your penny-pot Poets are such pelting thieves,

They ever hang men twice; we have it here, Sir,

And so must every Merchant of our Voyage.

He'll make a sweet return else of his Credit.

Yeom. One fit of our own mirth, and then we are for you.

Guard. Make haste then, dispatch.

Yeom. There's day enough, Sir. (younger.

Cook. Come, Boys, sing chearfully, we shall ne'r sing
We have chosen a loud tune too, because it should like well.

The SONG.

*Come, Fortune's a Whore, I care not who tell her,
Would offer to strangle a Page of the Celler,
That should by his Oath to any Mans thinking,
And place, have had a defence for his drinking;
But thus she does still, when she pleases to palter,
Instead of his Wages, she gives him a Halter.*

Three merry Boys, and three merry Boys, and three merry
Boys are we,
Asever did sing in a hempen string under the Gallow-tree.

II.

*But I that was so lusty,
And ever kept my Bottles,
That neither they were musty,
And seldome less than Pottles;
For me to be thus stopt now,
With Hemp instead of Cork, Sir,
And from the Gallows lopt now,
Shews that there is a fork, Sir,
In death, and this the token,
Man may be two ways killed,
Or like the Bottle, broken,
Or like the Wine, be spilled.*

Three merry Boys, &c.

III.

*Oh yet but look on the Master Cook, the glory of the Kitchen,
In sowing whose sate, at so lofty a rate, no Taylor e'r had stitching,
For though he makes the Man, the Cook yet makes the Dishes,
The which no Taylor can, wherein I have my wishes,*

*That I who at so many a Feast, have pleas'd so many tasters,
Should now my self come to be drest, a dish for you my Masters.
Three merry Boys, &c.*

Cook. There's a few Copies for you; now farewell friends:
And good Mr. Sheriff let me not be printed
With a bras Pot on my head.

But. March fair, march fair, afore, good Captain Pantler.

IV.

Pant. *Oh man or beast, or you at least,
That wear or brow or antler,
Prick up your ears, unto the tears
Of me poor Paul the Pantler,
That thus am clipt, because I chipt
The cursed Crust of Treason
With Loyal Knife; Oh doleful strife,
To hang thus without reason.*

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Aubrey, and Latorch.

Aub. Latorch, I have waited here to speak with you,
And you must hearken; set not forth your leg
Of hatte, nor put your face of business on;
An honest affair than this I urge too,
You will not easily think on; and 'twill be
Reward to entertain it; 'tis your fortune
To have our Masters ear above the rest
Of us that follow him, but that no man envies;
For I have well considered, Truth sometimes
May be convey'd in by the same Conduits
That Falshood is; These courfes that he takes Cannot but end in ruine; Empire got
By blood and violence, must so be held;
And how unsafe that is, he first will prove,
That toiling still to remove Enemies
Makes himself more; It is not now a Brother,
A faithful Councillour of estate or two,
That are his danger; they are far dispatch'd;
It is a multitude that begin to fear,
And think what began there must end in them;
For all the fine Oration that was made 'em,
And they are not an easie Monster quell'd.
Princes may pick their suffering Nobles out;
And one by one employ 'em to the block; but when they once grow formidable to their Clowns, and Coblers, ware
then, guard themselves; if thou durst tell him this, Latorch, the service would not discredit the good name you hold with men, besides the profit to your Master, and the publick.

Lat. I conceive not so, Sir: (fancy?
They are airy fears; and why should I object them unto his Wound what is yet found? your counfels colour not,
With reason of state, where all that's necessary still is just.
The actions of the Prince, while they succeed,
Should be made good, and glorified; not question'd.
Men do but shew their ill affections, that——

Aub. What? speak out.

Lat. Do; murmur against their Masters.

Aub. Is this to me?

Lat. It is to whosoever mislikes of the Dukes courfes.

Aub. I! is't so? at your stateward, Sir?

Lat. I'm sworn to hear nothing may prejudice the Prince.

Aub. Why do you? or have you, ha? (times.

Lat. I cannot tell, mens hearts shew in their words some-

Aub. I ever thought thee

Knave of the Chamber, art thou the Spye too?

Lat. A watchman for the State, and one that's known;
Sir, to be rightly affected.

Aub. Bawd of the State;

No less than of thy matters lusts. I now
 See nothing can redeem thee; dost thou mention
 Affection, or a Heart, that ne'r hadst any?
 Knowst not to love or hate, but by the State,
 As thy Prince does't before thee? that dost never Wear thy own face, but put'st on his, and gather'st
 Baits for his Ears: liv'st wholly at his beck,
 And e're thou dar'st utter a thought's thine own,
 Must expect his; creep'st forth and wad'st into him
 As if thou wert to pass a Ford, there proving
 Yet if thy tongue may step on safely or no;
 Then bring'st his vertue asleep, and stay'st the wheel
 Both of his reason and judgment, that they move not,
 Whit'st over all his vices; and at last
 Dost draw a Cloud of words before his eyes,
 Till he can neither see thee nor himself?
 Wretch, I dare give him honest counsels, I,
 And love him while I tell him truth; old Aubrey
 Dares goe the straightest way, which still's the shortest,
 Walk on the thorns thou scatter'st, Parasite,
 And tread 'em into nothing: and if thou
 Then let'st a look fall, of the least dislike,
 I'll rip thy Crown up with my Sword at height,
 And pluck thy skin over thy face, in sight
 Of him thou flatter'st; unto thee I speak it,
 Slave, against whom all Laws should now conspire,
 And every Creature that hath sense, be arm'd,
 As 'gainst the common Enemy of Mankind;
 That sleep'st within thy Masters Ear, and whisper'st
 'Tis better for him to be fear'd than lov'd;
 Bid'st him trust no mans friendship, spare no blood
 That may secure him: 'tis no cruelty
 That hath a specious end; for Sovereignty
 Break all the Laws of kind; if it succeed,
 An honest, noble, and praise-worthy deed;
 While he that takes thy poysons in, shall feel
 Their virulent workings in a point of time,
 When no Repentance can bring aid, but all
 His spirits shall melt, with what his Conscience burn'd,
 And dying in flatterers arms, shall fall unmourn'd.
 There's matter for you now.

Lat. My Lord, this makes not for loving of my Master.

Aub. Loving? no;

They hate ill Princes most that make them so.

Enter Rollo, Hamond, Allan, Guard.

Rol. I'll hear no more.

Ham. Alas, 'tis for my Brother: I beseech your Highness.

Rol. How, a Brother? had not I one my self? did tittle
 Move me when it was fit that he should dye? away.

All. Brother, lose no word more, leave my good Cause
 T'upbraide the Tyrant, I'm glad I'm slain
 Now in those times that will'd some great example
 T'assure men we can dye for honesty.

Rol. Sir, you are brave, 'pray that you hold your neck
 As bravely forth anon unto your Headsman.

All. Would he would strike as bravely, and thou by,
Rollo, 'twould make thee quake to see me dye.

Aub. What's his offence?

(Master.)

Ham. For giving Gisbert burial, who was sometimes his

All. Yes, Lord Aubrey,

My gratitude and humanity are my crimes.

Rol. Why bear you him not hence?

Aub. My Lord, (stay Souldiers)

I do beseech your Highness, do not lose
 Such men for such slight causes. This is one
 Has still been faithful to you, a try'd soul
 In all your fathers Battles; I have seen him
 Besstride a friend against a score of Foes,
 And look, he looks as he would kill his hundred
 For you, Sir, were you in some danger.

All. Till he kill'd his Brother, his Chancellour, then his Master, to which he can add nought to equal Nero,
 but killing of his Mother.

Aub. Peace, brave Fool,
 Thou valiant Ass: here is his Brother too, Sir,
 A Captain of your Guard, hath serv'd you long,
 With the most noble witnesses of his truth
 Mark'd in his face, and every part about him,
 That turns not from an enemy. But view him,
 Oh do not grieve him, Sir, if you do mean
 That he shall hold his place: it is not safe
 To tempt such spirits, and let them wear their Swords,
 You'll make your Guards your terrours by these Acts,
 And throw more hearts off from you than you hold;
 And I must tell you, Sir, (with my old freedom,
 And my old faith to boot) you have not liv'd so
 But that your state will need such men, such hands
 Of which here's one, shall in an hour of tryal,
 Do you more certain service with a stroke,
 Than the whole bundle of your flatterers
 With all the unfavory unktion of their tongues.

Rol. Peace, talker.

Aub. One that loves you yet, my Lord,
 And would not see you pull on your own ruines.
 Mercy becomes a Prince, and guards him best,
 Awe and affrights are never eyes of Love;
 And when men begin to fear the Prince, they hate him.

Rol. Am I the Prince, or you?

Aub. My Lord, I hope I have not utter'd ought should urge that question.

Rol. Then practise your obedience, see him dead.

Aub. My Lord?

Rol. I'll hear no more.

Aub. I'm sorry then; there's no small despair, Sir, of their Safety, whose ears are blockt up against truth; come, captain.

Ham. I thank you, Sir.

(honest?)

Aub. For what? for seeing thy brother die a man, and Live thou so, Captain, I will assure thee,
 Although I die for't too; come—— [Ex. all but Rol. & Lat.]

Rol. Now Latorch, what do you think? (of the boldest.)

Lat. That Aubrey's speech and manners sound somewhat

Rol. 'Tis his custome.

Lat. It may be so, and yet be worth a fear. (ly too.)

Rol. If we thought so, it should be worth his life, and quick-

Lat. I dare not, Sir, be authour

Of what I would be, 'tis so dangerous:

But with your Highness favour and your licence.

Rol. He talks, 'tis true; he is licens'd: leave him,

We now are Duke alone, Latorch, secur'd;

Nothing left standing to obscure our prospect,

We look right forth, beside, and round about us,

And see it ours with pleasure: only one

Wish'd joy there wants to make us to possess it,

And that is Edith, Edith, she that got me

In blood and tears, in such an opposite minute,

As had I not at once felt all the flames

And shafts of Love shot in me (his whole armory)

I should have thought him as far off as Death.

Lat. My Lord, expect a while, your happiness

Is nearer than you think it, yet her griefs

Are green and fresh, your vigilant Latorch

Hath not been idle; I have leave already

To visit her, and send to her.

Rol. My life.

Lat. And if I find not out as speedy ways,

And proper instruments to work and bring her

To your fruition; that she be not watch'd

Tame to your Highness wish, say you have no servant

Is capable of such a trust about you,

Or worthy to be Secretary of your pleasure.

Rol. Oh my Latorch, what shall I render thee

For all thy travels, care, and love? (grant me.)

Lat. Sir, one suit, which I will ever importune, till you

Rol. About your Mathematicians?

Lat. Yes, to have

The Scheme of your Nativity judg'd by them,

I have't already erected; O my Lord,

You do not know the labour of my fears,
My doubts for you are such as cannot hope
Any security, but from the Stars;
Who, being rightly ask'd, can tell man more
Than all power else, there being no power beyond them.

Rol. All thy petitions still are care of us,
Ask for thy self.

Lat. What more can concern me, than this?

Rol. Well, rise true honest man, and go then,
We'll study our selves a means how to reward thee.

Lat. Your grace is now inspir'd; now, now your highness
Begins to live, from this hour count your joyes:
But, Sir, I must have warrants, with blanks figur'd,
To put in names, such as I like.

Rol. You shall.

Lat. They dare not else offer, Sir, at your figure?

Oh I shall bring you wonders; there's a Frier
Rufee, an admirable man, another
A Gentleman, and then Lafiske,
The mirrour of his time; 'twas he that set it.
But there's one Norbret, (him I never saw)
Has made a mirrour, a meer Looking-glass,
In shew you'd think't no other; the form oval,
As I am given to understand by letter,
Which renders you such shapes, and those so differing;
And some that will be question'd and give answers;
Then has he set it in a frame, that wrought
Unto the revolutions of the Stars,
And so compact by due proportions
Unto their harmony, doth move alone
A true automaton; thus Dædalus Statues,
Or Vulcans Tools ———

Rol. Dost thou believe this?

Lat. Sir? why, what should stay my faith, or turn my
He has been about it above twenty years, (sense?)
Three sevens, the powerfull, and the perfect numbers;
And Art and time, Sir, can produce such things.

What do I read there of Hiarbas banquet?
The great Gymnosophist, that had his Butlers
And carvers of pure gold waiting at table?
The images of Mercury, too, that spoke?
The wooden door that flew? a snake of brasse
That hiss'd? and birds of Silver that did sing?
All those new done by the Mathematicks,
Without which there's no science, nor no truth.

Rol. You are in your sphear, Latorch: and rather Than I'll contend w'ye for it, I'll believe it,
Y'have won upon me that I wish to see
My fate before me now, what e're it be.

Lat. And I'll endeavour, you shall know with speed,
For which I should have one of trust go with me,
If you please, Hamond, that I may by him
Send you my first dispatches; after I
Shall bring you more, and as they come still more.

Rol. Take your way,
Choose your own means, and be it prosperous to us.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Rufee, de Bube, la Fiske, Norbret, Pippeau.

Ruf. Come, bear up Sirs, we shall have better days,
My Almanack tells me.

Bub. What is that? your rump?

Ruf. It never itch'd in vain yet, slide la Fiske,
Throw off thy sluggish face, I cannot abide
To see thee look like a poor Jade i'th' pound,
That saw no meat these three days.

Fiske. 'Slight, to me
It seems thirteen dayes since I saw any.

Ruf. How?

Fis. I can't remember that I ever saw
Or meat or mony, you may talk of both
To open a mans stomach or his purse,
But feed 'em still with air.

Bub. Friar, I fear

You do not say your Office well a dayes.

Nor. Pox, he feeds

With leachery, and lives upon th'exchange
Of his two Eggs and Puddings with the market women.

Ruf. And what do you Sir, with the Advocates wife,
Whom you perswade, upon your Doctoral bed,
To take the Mathematical trance so often?

Fis. Come, we are stark naught all, bad's the best of us,
Four of the seven deadly spots we are;
Besides our Leachery, we are envious,
And most, most gluttonous when we have it thus,
Most covetous now we want it; then our Boy
He is a fifth spot, sloth and he undoes us.

Bub. 'Tis true, the child was wont to be industrious,
And now and then sent to a Merchants wife
Sick of the Husband, or a swearing Butler
That mist of his Bowls, a crying Maid
Had lost a Silver spoon; the Curry comb
Sometimes was wanting; there was something gotten;
But now ———

Pip. What now? Did not I yester-morning
Bring you in a Cardecu there from the Peasant,
Whose ass I had driven aside, and hid, that you
Might conjure for him? and then last night,
Six Soulz from the Cooks wife, you shar'd among you
To set a figure for the Pestle I stole,
It is not at home yet; these things, my Masters,
In a hard time, they would be thought on: you
Talk of your lands and Castles in the air,
Of your twelve houses there: but it is I
That bring you in your rents for 'em, 'tis Pippeau
That is your bird-call.

Nor. Faith he does well,
And cuts through the Elements for us, I must needs say
In a fine dextrous line.

Fis. But not as he did
At first, then he would sail with any wind
Int' every Creek and Corner.

Pip. I was light then,
New built and rigg'd when I came to you, Gentlemen,
But now with often and far venturing for you
Here be leaks sprung, and whole Planks wanting see you;
If you'll new sheath me again, yet I am for you
To any bog or sleights, where e're you'll send me,
For as I am, where can this ragged Bark
Put in for any service; 'less it be
O'th' Isle of Rogues, and there turn Pirate for you.

Nor. Faith he says reason, Fryer, you must leave
Your neat crisp Claret, and fall to your Cyder
A while; and you la Fiske, your larded Capons
And Turkys for a time, and take a good Clean Tripe in your way; de Bube too must content him with wholsom two souz'd petitoes, no more Crown Ordinaries, till we have cloath'd our Infant.

Bub. So you'll keep
Your own good motions, Doctor, your dear self.

Fis. Yes, for we all do know the Latitude
Of your Concupiscence.

Ruf. Here about your belly.

Bub. You'll pick a bottle open or a whimsey,
As soon as the best of us.

Fis. And dip your wrist-bands,
(For Cuffs y'have none) as comely in the sauce [the Bell
As any Courtier — hark, the Bell, who is there? rings.

Ruf. Good luck I do conjure thee; Boy look out.

Pip. They are Gallants, courtiers, one of 'em is [Exit and
Of the Dukes bed-chamber. enter again.

Ruf. Latorch, down,
On with your gown, there's a new suite arriv'd, [To Nor-
Did I not tell you, Sons of hunger? Crowns, bret.

Crowns are coming toward you, wine and wenches
You shall have once again, and Fidlers:
Into your studies close; each lay his ear

To his door, and as you hear me to prepare you
So come, and put me on that visard only.

Enter Latorch, Hamond.

Lat. You'l not be far hence Captain, when the Business is done you shall receive present dispatch.

Ham. Ple walk Sir, in the Cloyster.

Ruf. Monsieur Latorch; my Son,
The Stars are happy still that guide you hither.

Lat. I'me glad to hear their Secretary say so,
My learned Father Ruffe; where's la Fiske,
Monsieur de Bube, how do they?

Ruf. At their studies,
They are the Secretaries of the Stars, Sir,
Still at their books, they will not be pull'd off,
They stick like cupping glasses; if ever men
Spoke with the tongue of destiny, 'tis they.

Lat. For loves sake let's salute 'em.

Ruf. Boy, go see,
Tell them who's here, say, that their friends do challenge
Some portion of their time, this is our minute,
Pray 'em they'l spare it: they are the Sun and Moon
Of knowledge; pity two such noble lights
Should live obscur'd here in an University,
Whose beams were fit to illumine any court
Of Christendom.

Enter la Fisk, de Bube, and Pippeau.

Lat. The Duke will shortly know 'em.

Fif. Well, look upon the Astrolabe; you'l find it
Four Almucanturies at least.

Bub. It is so.

Ruf. Still of their learned stuff, they care for nothing,
But how to know, as negligent of their bodies
In dyet, or else, especially in their cloaths,
As if they had no change.

Pip. They have so little
As well may free them from the name of shifters.

Fif. Monsieur Latorch?

Lat. How is it, learned Gentlemen, with both your ver-

Bub. A most happy hour, when we see you, Sir. (tues?)

Lat. When you hear me then

It will be happier; the Duke greets you both
Thus, and though you may touch no money, Father,
Yet you may take it.

Ruf. 'Tis his highness bounty,
But yet to me, and these that have put off
The world, superfluous.

Fif. We have heard of late of his highness good success.

Bub. And gratulate it.

Lat. Indeed he hath scap'd a strange Conspiracy,
Thanks to his Stars; which Stars he prays by me,
You would again consult, and make a Judgement
On what you lately erected for my love.

Ruf. Oh, Sir, we dare not.

Fif. For our lives.

Bub. It is the Princes Schem.

Lat. T'incounter with that fear,
Here's to assure you, his Signet, write your names,
And be secured all three.

Bud. We must intreat some time, Sir.

Lat. I must then intreat, it be as present as you can.

Fif. Have you the Schem here?

Lat. Yes.

Ruf. I would you had Sir another warrant.

Lat. What would that do?

Ruf. Marry we have a Doctor Sir, that in this business
Would not perform the second part.

Lat. Not him that you writ to me of?

Ruf. The very same.

Lat. I should have made it, Sir, my suit to see him,
Here is a warrant Father, I conceiv'd
That he had solely applyed himself to Magick.

Ruf. And to their studies too Sir, in this field

He was initiated, but we shall hardly
Draw him from his chair.

Lat. Tell him he shall have gold.

Fif. Oh, such a syllable would make him to forswear
Ever to breath in your sight.

Lat. How then?

Fif. Sir, he if you do please to give him any thing,
Must have't convey'd under a paper.

Ruf. Or left behind some book in his study.

Bub. Or in some old wall. (him, Sir.)

Fif. Where his familiars may tell him of it, and that pleases

Bub. Or else I'll go and assay him.

Lat. Take gold with you.

Ruf. That will not be amiss; give it the Boy, Sir,
He knows his holes, and how to bait his Spirits.

Pip. We must lay in several places, Sir.

Ruf. That's true, that if one come not, the other may hit.

Lat. Well, go then, is he so learned, Gentlemen?

Fif. The very top of our profession; mouth of the fates,
Pray Heaven his Spirits be in a good humor to take,
They'l sling the gold about the house else.

Bub. I, and beat the Fryer if he go not well
Furnisht with holy-water,

Fif. Sir, you must observe him.

Bub. Not cross him in a word, for then he's gone.

Fif. If he do come, which is a hazard, yet—
Mafs he's here, this is speed.

Enter Norbert, Rufs, Pippeau.

Nor. Where is our Scheme,
Let's see, dispatch, nay fumbling now, who's this?

Ruf. Chief Gentleman of the Dukes Chamber, Doctor.

Nor. Oh, let him be, good even to him, he's a courtier,
I'll spare his complement, tell him: what's here?

The geniture Nocturnal, Longitude
At forty nine and ten minutes? How are the cardins?

Fif. Libra in twenty four, forty four minutes,
And Capricorn.

Nor. I see it, see the Planets,
Where, how are they dispos'd? the Sun and Mercury,
Mars with the Dragons tail in the third house,
And pars Fortuna in the Imo Caeli,

Then Jupiter in the twelfth, the Cacodemon.

Bub. And Venus in the second Inferna Porta.

Nor. I see it, peace, then Saturn in the Fifth,
Luna i'th' Seventh, and much of Scorpio,
Then Mars his Gaudium, rising in th'alcendent,
And joyn'd with Libra too, the house of Venus,
And Juniu Caeli, Mars his exaltation
In the seventh house, Aries being his natural house
And where he is now seated, and all these shew him
To be the Almuten.

Ruf. Yes, he's Lord of the Geniture,
Whether you examine it by Ptolomeys way,
Or Messethales, Lael, or Alkindus.

Fif. No other Planet hath so many dignities
Either by himself, or in regard of the Cusps.

Nor. Why hold your tongue then if you know it; Venus
The Lady of the Horoscope, being Libra,
The other part, Mars rules: So that the geniture,
Being Nocturnal, Luna is the highest,
None else being in sufficient dignity,
She being in Aries in the Seventh house,
Where Sol exalted, is the Alchoroden.

Bub. Yes, for you see he hath his Termin
In the degrees where she is, and enjoys
By that, six dignities.

Fif. Which are clearly more
Than any else that view her in the Schem.

Nor. Why I saw this, and could have told you too,
That he beholds her with a Trine aspect
Here out of Sagittary, almost partile,
And how that Mars out of the self same house,
(But another Sign) here by a Platique aspect

Looks at the Hilege, with a Quartile ruling
The house where the Sun is; all this could I
Have told you, but that you'll outrun me; and more,
That this same Quartile aspect to the Lady of life,
Here in the seventh, promises some danger,
Cauda Draconis being so near Mars,

And Caput Algol in the house of Death.

Lat. How, Sir? I pray you clear that.

Nor. What is the question first?

Ruf. Of the Dukes life, what dangers threaten him?

Nor. Apparent, and those suddain, when the Hyley
Or Alchorodon by direction come
To a Quartile opposition of the place
Where Mars is in the Geniture (which is now
At hand) or else oppose to Mars himself; expect it.

Lat. But they may be prevented.

Nor. Wisdom only

That rules the Stars, may do it; for Mars being
Lord of the Geniture in Capricorn,
Is, if you mark it, now a Sextile here,
With Venus Lady of the Horoscope.
So she being in her Exilium, which is Scorpio,
And Mars his Gaudium, is o'rerul'd by him,
And clear debilitated five degrees
Beneath her ordinary power, so
That, at the most she can but mitigate.

Lat. You cannot name the persons bring this danger?

Nor. No, that the Stars tell us not, they name no man,
That is a work, Sir, of another place.

Ruf. Tell him whom you suspect, and he'll guess shrewdly.

Lat. Sir, we do fear one Aubrey; if 'twere he
I should be glad; for we should soon prevent him.

Fif. I know him, the Dukes Kinsman, a tall man?
Lay hold of 't Norbret.

Nor. Let me pause a little,
Is he not near of kin unto the Duke?

Lat. Yes, reverend Sir. (what high of stature?)

Nor. 'Fart for your reverence, keep it till then; and some-

Lat. He is so.

Nor. How old is he?

Fif. About seven and fifty.

Nor. His head and beard inclining to be grey.

Lat. Right, Sir.

Fif. And fat?

Nor. He is somewhat corpulent, is he not?

Lat. You speak the man, Sir.

Nor. Well, look to him, farewell. [Exit Norb.]

Lat. Oh, it is Aubrey; Gentlemen, I pray you,

Let me receive this under all your hands.

Ruf. Why, he will shew you him in his Magick glass
If you intreat him, and but gratifie
A spirit or two more.

Lat. He shall eat gold

If he will have it, so shall you all; there's that Amongst you first, let me have this to send
The Duke in the mean time; and then what fights
You please to shew; I'll have you so rewarded
As never Artists were, you shall to Court
Along with me, and there wait you fortunes.

Bub. We have a pretty part of 't in our pockets;
Boy we will all be new, you shall along too. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Sophia, Matilda, and Edith.

Mat. Good Madam, hear the suit that Edith urges,
With such submits beseeches; nor remain
So strictly bound to sorrow for your son,
That nothing else, though never so besitting,
Obtains your ears, or observation.

Sop. What would she say? I hear.

Edith. My suit is, Madam,
That you would please to think as well of justice
Due to your sons revenge, as of more wrong added

To both your selves for it, in only grieving.
Th' undaunted power of Princes should not be
Confin'd in deedless cold calamity;
Anger, the Twin of sorrow, in your wrongs
Should not be smother'd, when his right of birth
Claims th' Air as well, and force of coming forth.

Sop. Sorrow is due already, anger never
Should be conceived but where it may born
In some fact fit t'employ his active flame,
That else consumes who bears it, and abides
Like a false star that quenches as it glides.

Ed. I have such means t'employ it as your wish
Can think no better, easier, or securer;
And such as but th' honours I intend
To your partakings, I alone could end:
But your parts in all dues to crying blood
For vengeance in the shedder, are much greater:
And therefore should work your hands to his slaughter.
For your consent to which, 'twere infinite wrong
To your severe and most impartial justice,
To move you to forget so false a son
As with a Mothers duty made you curse him.

Mat. Edith, he is forgot, for any son
Born of my Mother, or to me a Brother.
For should we still perform our rights to him
We should partake his wrongs, and as foul be
In blood and damned parricide as he.

And therefore tell the happy means that Heaven
Puts in thy hand, for all our long'd for freedom
From so abhor'd and impious a monster.

Sop. Tell what she will, I'll lend nor hand nor ear
To whatsoever Heaven puts in her power. [Exit Sophia.]

Mat. How strange she is to what she chiefly wishes?
Sweet Edith be not any thought the more
Discourag'd in thy purpose, but assured,
Her heart and prayers are thine; and that we two
Shall be enough to all we wish to do.

Edith. Madam, my self alone, I make no doubt
Shall be afforded power enough from Heaven
To end the murderer; all I wish of you,
Is but some richer Ornaments and Jewels
Than I am able to provide my self,
To help out the defects of my poor Beauty,
That yet hath been enough, as now it is,
To make his fancy mad with my desire?
But you know, Madam, Women never can
Be too fair to torment an amorous man;
And this mans torments I would heighten still,
Till at their highest he be fit to kill.

Mat. Thou shalt have all my Jewels and my Mothers,
And thou shalt paint too, that his bloods desire
May make him perish in a painted fire;
Hast thou been with him yet?

Edith. Been with him? no;
I set that hour back to haste more his longing;
But I have promis'd to his instruments,
The admittance of a visit at our house,
Where yet I would receive him with all lustre
My sorrow would give leave to, to remove
Suspicion of my purpose.

Mat. Thou shalt have
All I can add, sweet wench, in Jewels, tyres,
I'll be my self thy dresser; nor may I
Serve my own love with a contracted Husband
More sweetly, nor more amply than maist thou
Thy forward will with his bewitch'd affections:
Affect'st thou any personal aid of mine
My noblest Edith?

Edith. Nought but your kind prayers
For full effect and speed of my affair.

Mat. They are thine, my Edith, as for me, my own;
For thou well know'st, if blood shed of the best
Should cool and be forgotten, who would fear
To shed blood still? or where, alas, were then

The endless love we owe to worthy men?

Ed. Love of the worthiest ever blefs your highness. [Exit.

Actus Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter Rollo with a glass, Aubrey, and Servants.

Rol. I Never studied my glass till now,
It is exceeding well; now leave me; Cousin,
How takes your eye the object?

Aub. I have learn'd

So much Sir of the Courtier, as to say
Your person does become your habit;
But being called unto it by a noble War,
Would grace an armour better.

Rol. You are still

For that great Art of which you are the Master;
Yet I must tell you, that to the encounters
We oft attempt, arm'd only thus, we bring
As troubled blood, fears mixt with flatt'ring hopes,
The danger in the service too as great,
As when we are to charge quite through and through
The body of an Army.

Aub. I'll not argue

How you may rank the dangers, but will die in't,
The ends which they arrive at, are as distant
In every circumstance, as far as honour
Is from shame and repentance.

Rol. You are fowr?

Aub. I would speak my free thoughts, yet not appear so;
Nor am I so ambitious of the title
Of one that dares talk any thing that was Against the torrent of his own opinion,
That I affect to speak ought may offend you:
And therefore gracious Sir, be pleas'd to think
My manners or discretion have inform'd me
That I was born, in all good ends, to serve you:
And not to check at what concerns me not:
I look not with fore eyes on your rich out-side,
Nor rack my thoughts to find out to what purpose
'Tis now employ'd; I wish it may be good,
And that, I hope, offends not for a subject
Towards his Prince in things indifferent;
To use the austereness of a censuring Cato
Is arrogance, not freedom.

Rol. I commend

This temper in you, and will cherish it.

Enter Hamond with Letters.

They come from Rome, Latorch employed you?

Ham. True Sir.

Rol. I must not now be troubled with a thought
Of any new design; good Aubrey read 'em,
And as they shall direct you, use my power,
Or to reply or execute.

Aub. I will, Sir.

Rol. And Captain bring a squadron of our Guard
To th' house that late was Baldwins, and there wait me.

Ham. I shall.

Rol. Some two hours hence.

Ham. With my best care.

Rol. Inspire me Love, and be thy deity,
Or scorn'd or fear'd, as now thou favour'st me. [Exit Rollo.

Ham. My stay to do my duty, may be wrongs
Your Lordships privacy.

Aub. Captain, your love
Is ever welcome; I intreat your patience
While I peruse these.

Ham. I attend your pleasure.

Aub. How's this, a plot on me?

Ham. What is contain'd
In th' letters that I brought, that thus transports him?

Aub. To be wrought on by Rogues, and have my head
Brought to the Axe by Knaves that cheat for bread?

The Creatures of a Parasite, a slave;
I find you here Latorch, not wonder at it;
But that this honest Captain should be made
His instrument, afflicts me; I'll make trial
Whether his will or weakness made him do it.
Captain you saw the Duke when he commanded
I should do what these letters did direct me,
And I presume you think I'll not neglect
For fear or favour, to remove all dangers
How near soever that man can be to me
From whom they should have birth.

Ham. It is confirm'd.

Aub. Nor would you Captain, I believe, refuse,
Or for respect of thankfulness, or hopes,
To use your sword with fullest confidence
Where he shall bid you strike.

Ham. I never have done.

Aub. Nor will I think——

Ham. I hope it is not question'd.

Aub. The means to have it so, is now propos'd you.
Draw, so, 'tis well, and next cut off my head.

Ham. What means your Lordship?

Aub. 'Tis, Sir, the Dukes pleasure:
My innocence hath made me dangerous,
And I must be remov'd, and you the man
Must act his will.

Ham. I'll be a Traytor first, before I serve it thus.

Aub. It must be done,

And that you may not doubt it, there's your warrant,
But as you read, remember Hamond, that
I never wrong'd one of your brave profession;
And, though it be not manly, I must grieve
That man of whose love I was most ambitious
Could find no object of his hate but me.

Ham. It is no time to talk now, honour'd Sir,
Be pleas'd to hear thy servant, I am wrong'd,
And cannot, being now to serve the Duke,
Stay to express the manner how; but if
I do not suddenly give you strong proofs,
Your life is dearer to me than my own,
May I live base, and dye so: Sir, your pardon. [Exit Ham.

Aub. I am both waies ruin'd, both waies mark't for slaugh-
On every side, about, behind, before me, (ter

My certain fate is fix't: were I a Knaves now,
I could avoid this: had my actions
But meer relations to their own ends, I could 'scape now:
Oh honesty! thou elder child of vertue,
Thou seed of Heaven, why to acquire thy goodness
Should malice and distrust stick thorns before us,
And make us swim unto thee, hung with hazards?
But Heaven is got by suffering, not disputing;
Say he knew this before-hand, where am I then?
Or say he does know it, where's my Loyalty?
I know his nature, troubled as the Sea,
And as the Sea devouring when he's vex'd,
And I know Princes are their own expounders.
Am I afraid of death? of dying nobly?
Of dying in mine innocence uprightly?
Have I met death in all his forms, and fears,
Now on the points of Swords, now pitch'd on Lances?
In fires, and storms of Arrows, Battels, breaches,
And shall I now shrink from him, when he courts me
Smiling and full of sanctity? I'll meet him;
My Loyal hand and heart shall give this to him,
And though it bear beyond what Poets feign
A punishment, duty shall meet that pain;
And my most constant heart to do him good,
Shall check at neither pale affright nor blood.

Enter Messenger.

Mess. The Dutchess presently would crave your presence.

Aub. I come; and Aubrey now resolve to keep
Thy honour living, though thy body sleep.

[Exit.
SCENE

SCENE II.

Enter Edith, a Boy, and a Banquet set out.

Edith. Now for a Fathers murther, and thy ruine,
All chastity shall suffer if he raigin ;
Thou blessed soul, look down, and steel thy Daughter,
Look on the sacrifice she comes to send thee,
And through the bloody clouds behold my piety,
Take from my cold heart fear, from my sex pity,
And as I wipe these tears off, shed for thee,
So all remembrance may I lose of mercy ;
Give me a womans anger bent to blood,
The wildness of the winds to drown his prayers,
Storm-like may my destruction fall upon him,
My rage like roving billows as they rise,
Pour'd on his soul to sink it, give me flattery,
(For yet my constant soul ne'r knew dissembling)
Flattery the food of Fools, that I may rock him
And lull him in the Down of his desires ;
That in the height of all his hopes and wishes,
His Heaven forgot, and all his lusts upon him,
My hand, like thunder from a cloud, may seize him.
I hear him come, go boy, and entertain him.

Enter Rollo.

SONG.

Take, Oh take those lips away
That so sweetly were forsworn,
And those eyes, like break of day,
Lights that do mislead the Morn,
But my kisses bring again,
Seals of love, though seal'd in vain.

Hide, Oh hide those hills of Snow,
Which thy frozen blossome bears,
On whose tops the Pinks that grow
Are of those that April wears,
But first set my poor heart free,
Bound in those Ivy chains by thee.

Rol. What bright star, taking beauties form upon her,
In all the happy lustre of Heavens glory,
Has drop'd down from the Skye to comfort me ?
Wonder of nature, let it not prophane thee
My rude hand touch thy beauty, nor this kiss,
The gentle sacrifice of love and service,
Be offer'd to the honour of thy sweetness.

Edi. My gracious Lord, no deity dwells here,
Nor nothing of that vertue, but obedience,
The servant to your will affects no flattery.

Rol. Can it be flattery to swear those eyes
Are loves eternal lamps he fires all hearts with ?
That tongue the smart string to his bow ? those sighs
The deadly shafts he sends into our souls ?
Oh, look upon me with thy spring of beauty.

Edi. Your grace is full of game.

Rol. By Heaven, my Edith,
Thy Mother fed on Roses when she bred thee.

Ed. And thine on brambles that have prick'd her heart out.

Rol. The sweetness of the Arabian wind still blowing
Upon the treasures of perfumes and spices,
In all their pride and pleasures call thee Mistris.

Edi. Will't please you sit Sir ?

Rol. So you please sit by me.

Fair gentle maid, there is no speaking to thee,
The excellency that appears upon thee
Tyes up my tongue : pray speak to me.

Edi. Of what Sir ?

Rol. Of any thing, any thing is excellent.

Will you take my directions ? speak of love then ;
Speak of thy fair self Edith ; and while thou speak'st,
Let me, thus languishing, give up my self wench.

Edi. H'as a strange cunning tongue, why do you sigh Sir ?
How masterly he turns himself to catch me ?

Rol. The way to Paradise, my gentle maid ;

Is hard and crooked, scarce Repentance finding,
With all her holy helps, the door to enter,
Give me thy hand, what dost thou feel ?

Edi. Your tears Sir.

You weep extreemly ; strengthen me now justice.
Why are these sorrows Sir ?

Rol. Thou't never love me

If I should tell thee, yet there's no way left
Ever to purchase this blest Paradise,
But swimming thither in these tears.

Edi. I stagger. Rol. Are they not drops of blood ?

Edi. No. Rol. They're for blood then,
For guiltless blood, and they must drop, my Edith,
They must thus drop, till I have drown'd my mischiefs.

Edi. If this be true, I have no strength to touch him.

Rol. I prethee look upon me, turn not from me ;

Alas I do confesse I'me made of mischiefs,
Begot with all mans miseries upon me ;
But see my sorrows, maid, and do not thou,
Whose only sweetest sacrifice is softness,
Whose true condition, tenderness of nature.

Edi. My anger melts, Oh, I shall lose my justice.

Rol. Do not thou learn to kill with cruelty,
As I have done, to murder with thy eyes,
(Those blessed eyes) as I have done with malice,
When thou hast wounded me to death with scorn,
(As I deserve it Lady) for my true love,
When thou hast loaden me with earth for ever,
Take heed my sorrows, and the stings I suffer ;
Take heed my nightly dreams of death and horrour
Pursue thee not : no time shall tell thy griefs then,
Nor shall an hour of joy adde to thy beauties.
Look not upon me as I kill'd thy Father,
As I was smear'd in blood, do not thou hate me,
But thus in whiteness of my wash't repentance,
In my hearts tears and truth of love to Edith,
In my fair life hereafter.

Edi. He will fool me.

Rol. Oh with thine Angel eyes behold and close me,
Of Heaven we call for mercy and obtain it ;
To Justice for our right on Earth and have it ;
Of thee I beg for love, save me, and give it.

Edi. Now heaven thy help, or I am gone for ever,
His tongue has turn'd me into melting pity.

Enter Hamond, and Guard.

Ham. Keep the doors safe, and upon pain of death
Let no man enter till I give the word.

Guard. We shall Sir.

[Exeunt.]

Ham. Here he is in all his pleasure ; I have my wish.

Rol. How now ? why dost thou stare so ?

Edi. A help, I hope.

Rol. What dost thou here ? who sent thee ?

Ham. My Brother, and the base malicious Office
Thou mad'st me do to Aubrey ; pray. Rol. Pray ?

Ham. Pray, pray if thou canst pray, I shall kill thy soul else,
Pray suddenly. Rol. Thou can'st not be so trayterous.

Ham. It is a Justice ; stay Lady ;

For I perceive your end ; a womans hand
Must not rob me of vengeance. Edi. 'Tis my glory.

Ham. 'Tis mine, stay, and share with me ; by the gods, Rollo ;
There is no way to save thy life. Rol. No ?

Ham. No, it is so monstrous, no repentance cures it.

Rol. Why then thou shalt kill her first, and what this blood
Will cast upon thy cursed head. Ham. Poor Guard Sir.

Edi. Spare not brave Captain.

Rol. Fear, or the Devil has thee.

Ham. Such fear Sir as you gave your honor'd Mother ;
When your most vertuous Brother, shield-like, held her ;
Such I'll give you, put her away.

Rol. I will not, I will not die so tamely. (on thee ?)

Ham. Murtherous villain, wilt thou draw seas of blood up-

Edi. Fear not, kill him good Captain, any way dispatch
Him, my body's honor'd with that sword that through me,
Sends

Sends his black soul to Hell : Oh, but for one hand.

Ham. Shake him off bravely.

Edi. He's too strong, strike him.

Ham. Oh, am I with you Sir ? now keep you from him, What, has he got a knife ?

Edi. Look to him Captain, for now he will be mischievous.

Ham. Do you smile Sir ?

Do's it so tickle you ? have at you once more.

Edi. Oh bravely thrutt ; take heed he come not in Sir ; To him again, you give him too much respite.

Rol. Yet will you save my life, and I'll forgive thee, And give thee all, all honours, all advancements, Call thee my friend. Ed. Strike, strike, and hear him not, His tongue will tempt a Saint. Rol. Oh for my foul sake.

Edi. Save nothing of him.

Ham. Now for your farewell, Are you so wary ? take you that. Rol. Thou, that too ; Oh thou hast kill'd me basely, basely, basely. (Dies.)

Edi. The just reward of murder falls upon thee.

How do you Sir ? has he not hurt you ?

Ham. No, I feel not any thing.

Aub. I charge you let us passe. [within.]

Gua. You cannot yet Sir. Aub. I'll make way then.

Gua. We are sworn to our Captain, and till he give the word.

Enter Sophia, Matilda, Aubrey, Lords and attendants.

Ham. Now let them in there. Sop. Oh, here he lies, Sorrow on sorrow seeks me, Oh, in his blood he lyes.

Aub. Had you spoke sooner This might have been prevented ; Take the Dutchess, And lead her off, this is no sight for her eyes.

Mat. Oh, bravely done wench.

Edi. There stands the noble doer.

Mat. My honour ever seek thee for thy justice, Oh 'twas a deed of high and brave adventure, A justice even for heaven to envy at, Farewel my sorrows, and my tears take truce, My wishes are come round : Oh bloody Brother, Till this hour never beauteous ; till thy life, Like a full sacrifice for all thy mischiefs, Flow'd from thee in these rivers, never righteous : Oh how my eyes are quarri'd with their joys now ? My longing heart even leaping out for lightness ? But dye thy black sins with thee, I forgive thee.

Aub. Who did this deed ?

Ham. I, and I'll answer it. (Dies.)

Edi. He faints, oh that same cursed knife has kill'd him.

Aub. How ?

Edi. He snatch'd it from my hand, for whom I bore it, And as they grapp'd.

Aub. Justice is ever equal, Had it not been on him, th'adst dy'd too honest. Did you know of his death ?

Edi. Yes, and rejoyce in't.

Aub. I'me sorry for your youth then ; though the strictness Of Law shall not fall on you, that of life Must presently, go to a Cloyster, carry her, And there for ever lead your life in penitence.

Edi. Best Father to my soul, I give you thanks, Sir, And now my fair revenges have their ends, My vows shall be my kin, my prayers my friends. [Exit.]

Enter Latorch, and Juglers.

Lat. Stay there, I'll step in and prepare the Duke.

Nor. We shall have brave rewards ?

Fif. That is without question.

Lat. By this time where's my huffing friend Lord Aubrey ? Where's that good Gentleman ? oh, I could laugh now, And burst my self with meer imagination ; A wise man, and a valiant man, a just man ; To suffer himself be juggl'd out of the world, By a number of poor Gipseys ? farewell Swash-buckler, For I know thy mouth is cold enough by this time ;

A hundred of ye I can shave as neatly, And ne'r draw blood in shew : now shall my honour, My power and vertue walk alone : my pleasure Observ'd by all, all knees bend to my worship, All futes to me as Saint of all their fortunes, Prefer'd and crowded to, what full place of credit, And what place now ? your Lordship ? no, 'tis common, But that I'll think to morrow on ; now for my business.

Aub. Who's there ?

Lat. Dead, my Master dead ? Aubrey alive too ?

Gua. Latorch, Sir. Aub. Seize his body.

Lat. My Master dead ?

Aub. And you within this half hour ; Prepare your self good Devil, you must to it, Millions of gold shall not redeem thy mischief, Behold the Justice of thy practice, villain ; The mass of murders thou hast drawn upon us : Behold thy doctrine ; you look now for reward, Sir, To be advanc'd, I'm sure, for all your labours ? And you shall have it, make his gallows higher By ten foot at the least, and then advance him. Lat. Mercy, mercy. Aub. 'Tis too late fool, Such as you meant for me, away with him. He is led out. What gaping knaves are these, bring 'em in fellows, Now, what are you ?

Nor. Mathematicians, if it please your Lordship.

Aub. And you drew a figure ?

Fif. We have drawn many.

Aub. For the Duke, I mean ; Sir Latorchs knaves you are.

Nor. We know the Gentleman.

Aub. What did he promise you ?

Nor. We are paid already.

Aub. But I will see you better paid, go whip them.

Nor. We do beseech your Lordship, we were hir'd.

Aub. I know you were, and you shall have your hire ; Whip 'em extremely, whip that Doctor there, Till he record himself a Rogue.

Nor. I am one, Sir.

Aub. Whip him for being one, and when th'are whip't, Lead 'em to the gallows to see their patron hang'd ; Away with them. They are led out.

Nor. Ah, good my Lord.

Aub. Now to mine own right, Gentlemen.

1 Lord. You have the next indeed, we all confesse it, And here stand ready to invest you with it.

2 Lord. Which to make stronger to you, and the surer Than blood or mischiefs dare infringe again, Behold this Lady, Sir, this noble Lady, Full of the blood as you are, of that nearness, How blessed would it be ?

Aub. I apprehend you, and so the fair Matilda dare accept Me her ever constant servant.

Mat. In all pureness, In all humility of heart and services, To the most noble Aubrey, I submit me.

Aub. Then this is our first tye, now to our business.

1 Lord. We are ready all to put the honour on you, Sir.

Aub. These sad rites must be done first, take up the bodys, This, as he was a Prince, so Princely funeral Shall wait upon him : on this honest Captain, The decency of arms ; a tear for him too.

So, sadly on, and as we view his blood, May his Example in our Rule raise good.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Monsieur De Gard, and a Foot-Boy.

Sirrah, you know I have rid hard ; stir my Horse well And let him want no Litter.
 Boy. I am sure I have run hard, Would some body would walk me, & see me Litter'd ;
 For I think my fellow-horse, cannot in reason Desire more rest, nor take up his Chamber before me, But we are the Beasts now, and the Beasts are our Masters.
 De Ga. When you have done, step to the Ten-Crown Ordinary.
 Boy. With all my heart, Sir ;
 For I have a Twenty Crown stomach.
 De Ga. And there bespeak a dinner.
 Boy. Yes Sir, presently.

De Ga. For whom, I beseech you, Sir?
 Boy. For my self, I take it, Sir.
 De Ga. In truth ye shall not take it, 'tis not meant for you, There's for your Provender : Bespeak a Dinner For Monsieur Mirabell, and his Companions, They'll be in Town within this hour.
 When you have done, Sirrah,
 Make ready all things at my Lodging, for me, And wait me there.
 Boy. The Ten Crown Ordinary?
 De Ga. Yes Sir, if you have not forgot it.
 Boy. I'll forget my feet first ;
 'Tis the best part of a Foot-mans faith.
 De Ga. These youths

[Exit Boy.]

For all they have been in Italy, to learn thrift,
And seem to wonder at mens lavish waies,
Yet they cannot rub off old friends, their French itches;
They must meet sometimes to disport their Bodies
With good Wine, and good Women; and good store too.
Let 'em be what they will, they are Arm'd at all points,
And then hang saving. Let the Sea grow high,
This Ordinary can fit 'em of all sizes,

Enter La-Castre and Oriana.

They must salute their Country with old customes.

Ori. Brother.

De G. My dearest Sister.

Ori. Welcome, welcome:

Indeed ye are welcome home, most welcome.

De G. Thank ye,

You are grown a handsome woman, Oriana,
(Blush at your faults) I am wondrous glad to see ye.

Monieur La-Castre: Let not my Affection
To my fair Sister, make me be held unmannerly:

I am glad to see ye well, to see ye lusty,

Good health about ye, and in your company,

Believe me, I am proud——

La-Cast. Fair Sir, I thank ye:

Monieur de Gard, you are welcome from your journey,
Good men, have still good welcome: give me your hand, Sir.
Once more, you are welcome home: you look still younger.

De G. Time has no leisure to look after us.

We wander every where: Age cannot find us.

La-Cast. And how does all?

De G. All well, Sir; and all lusty.

La-Cast. I hope my Son be so, I doubt not, Sir,
But you have often seen him in your journeys,
And bring me some fair News.

De G. Your Son is well, Sir,

And grown a proper Gentleman: he is well, and lusty,
Within this eight hours, I took leave of him,
And over-ey'd him, having some slight business
That forc'd me out o' th' way: I can assure you
He will be here to night.

La-Cast. Ye make me glad, Sir,
For o' my faith, I almost long to see him,
Me thinks he has been away——

De G. 'Tis but your tenderness;

What are three years? a love-sick wench will allow it:
His friends that went out with him are come back too;
Belleur, and young Pinac: he bid me say little,
Because he means to be his own glad Messenger.

La-Ca. I thank ye for this news, Sir, he shall be welcome,
And his friends too: indeed I thank you heartily:

And how (for I dare say, you will not flatter him)

Has Italy wrought on him? has he mew'd yet

His wild fantastick Toyes? they say that Climate

Is a great purger of those humorous Fluxes.

How is he improved, I pray ye?

De G. No doubt, Sir, well.

H'as born himself a full, and noble Gentleman,
To speak him farther is beyond my Charter.

La-Cast. I am glad to hear so much good; Come, I see
You long to enjoy your Sister: yet I must intreat ye
Before I go, to sup with me to night

And must not be deny'd.

De G. I am your servant.

(pany.

La-C. Where you shall meet fair, merry, and noble Com-neighbour Naiot, and his two fair Daughters.

De G. Your supper's season'd well, Sir. I shall wait upon ye.

La-C. Till then I'll leave ye: and ye are once more welcome.

De G. I thank ye, noble Sir. Now, Oriana, (Exit.

How have ye done since I went? have ye had your health

And your mind free? (well?

Ori. You know I am not bated;

Merry, and eat my meat.

De G. A good preservative.

And how have you been us'd? You know, Oriana,

Upon my going out, at your request,
I left your Portion in La-Castre's hands,
(The main Means you must stick to) for that reason
(And 'tis no little one) I ask ye, Sister,
With what humanity he entertains ye,
And how ye find his courtesie?

Ori. Most ready.

I can assure you, Sir, I am us'd most nobly.

De G. I am glad to hear it: But I prethee tell me,
(And tell me true) what end had you, Oriana,
In trusting your mony here? He is no Kinsman,
Nor any tie upon him of a Guardian;
Nor dare I think ye doubt my prodigality.

Or. No, certain, Sir, none of all this provok'd me;
Another private reason.

De G. 'Tis not private,
Nor carry'd so: 'tis common (my fair Sister)

Your love to Mirabel; your blushes tell it:

'Tis too much known, and spoken of too largely;

And with no little shame I wonder at it.

Ori. Is it a shame to love?

De G. To love indiscreetly:

A Virgin should be tender of her honour,
Close, and secure.

Ori. I am as close as can be,
And stand upon as strong and honest guards too;
Unless this Warlike Age need a Port-cullis:
Yet I confess, I love him.

De G. Hear the people.

Ori. Now I say hang the people: He that dares
Believe what they say, dares be mad, and give
His Mother, nay his own Wife up to Rumor;
All grounds of truth they build on, is a Tavern,
And their best censure's Sack, Sack in abundance:
For as they drink, they think: they ne're speak modestly
Unless the wine be poor, or they want mony.
Believe them? believe Amadis de Gaul,
The Knight o' th' Sun, or Palmerin of England;
For these, to them, are modest, and true stories.
Pray understand me; if their tongues be truth,
And if in Vino veritas be an Oracle,

What Woman is, or has been ever honest?

Give 'em but ten round cups, they'll swear Lucretia

Dy'd not for want of power to resist Tarquin,

But want of Pleasure, that he stay'd no longer:

And Portia, that was famous for her Piety

To her lov'd Lord, they'll face ye out, dy'd o' th' Pox.

De G. Well, there is something, Sister.

Ori. If there be, Brother,

'Tis none of their things, 'tis not yet so monstrous;

My thing is Marriage: And at his return

I hope to put their Quint-eyes right again.

De G. Marriage? 'tis true; his Father is a rich man;

Rich both in land and money: he his heir,

A young and handsome man, I must confess too;

But of such qualities, and such wild flings,

Such admirable imperfections, Sister,

(For all his Travel, and bought experience)

I should be loth to own him for my Brother:

Methinks a rich mind in a state indifferent

Would prove the better fortune.

Ori. If he be wild,

The reclaiming him to good, and honest, (Brother)

Will make much for my honour; which, if I prosper,

Shall be the study of my love, and life too. (too.

De G. Ye say well; would he thought as well, and lov'd

He Marry? he'll be hanged first: he knows no more

What the conditions and the ties of Love are,

The honest purposes and grounds of Marriage,

Nor will know, nor be ever brought t' endeavour,

Than I do how to build a Church; he was ever

A loose and strong deser of all order,

His Loves are wanderers, they knock at each door,

And taste each dish, but are no residents:

Or say he may be brought to think of Marriage,
(As 'twill be no small labour) thy hopes are strangers.
I know there is a labour'd match, now follow'd,
(Now at this time, for which he was sent for home too)
Be not abus'd, Natolet has two fair Daughters,
And he must take his choice.

Or. Let him take freely;
For all this I despair not; my mind tells me
That I, and only I, must make him perfect;
And in that hope I rest.

De-Gar. Since y'are so confident,
Prosper your hope; I'll be no adversary;
Keep your self fair and right, he shall not wrong ye.

Or. When I forget my vertue, no man know me.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Mirabel, Pinac, Bellure, and Servants.

Mir. Welcome to Paris once more, Gentlemen;
We have had a merry and a lusty Ordinary,
And Wine, and good meat, and a bounding Reckoning;
And let it go for once; 'Tis a good Physick,
Only the Wenches are not for my diet,
They are too lean and thin; their embraces brawn-faln.
Give me the plump Venetian, fat, and lusty,
That meets me soft and supple; finiles upon me,
As if a Cup of full Wine leapt to kiss me;
These slight things I affect not.

Pin. They are ill built;
Pin-buttockt, like your dainty Barbaries,
And weak i'th' pasterns; they'll endure no hardnes.

Mir. There's nothing good, or handsom bred amongst us:
Till we are travel'd, and live abroad, we are Coxcombs:
Ye talk of France, a slight unseason'd Country,
Abundance of gross food, which makes us Block-heads:
We are fair set out indeed, and soare fore-horses:
Men say we are great Courtiers, men abuse us:
We are wise, and valiant too, non credo, Seigneur:
Our Women the best Linguists? they are Parrats;
O' this side the Alpes they are nothing but meer Drolleries:
Ha, Roma la Santa, Italy for my money,
Their policies, their customs, their frugalities,
Their courtesies so open, yet so reserved too,
As when ye think y'are known best, ye are a stranger;
The very pick-teeth speak more man than we do,
And season of more salt.

Pin. 'Tis a brave Country:
Not pester'd with your stubborn precise Puppies,
That turn all useful and allow'd contentments
To scabs and scruples; hang 'em Capon-worshippers.

Bel. I like that freedom well, and like their Women too,
And would fain do as others do; but I am so bashful,
So naturally an Afs: Look ye, I can look upon 'em,
And very willingly I go to see 'em,
(There's no man willinger) and I can kiss 'em,
And make a shift——

Mir. But if they chance to flout ye,
Or say ye are too bold; fie, Sir, remember;
I pray sit farther off;——

Bel. 'Tis true, I am humbled,
I am gone, I confess ingenuously I am silenced,
The spirit of Amber cannot force me answer.

Pin. Then would I sing and dance.

Bel. You have wherewithal, Sir.

Pin. And charge her up again.

Bel. I can be hang'd first;
Yet where I fasten well I am a tyrant.

Mir. Why, thou darst fight?

Bel. Yes, certainly, I dare fight;
And fight with any man at any weapon,
Would the other were no more; but a pox on't,
When I was sometimes in my height of hope,
And reasonable valiant that way, my heart harden'd,

Some scornful jest or other chops between me (men)
And my desire: what would ye have me to do then, Gentle
Mir. Belvere, you must be bolder: Travel three years,
And bring home such a Baby to betray ye
As bashfulness? a great fellow, and a Souldier?

Bel. You have the gift of impudence, be thankful;
Every man has not the like talent: I will study
And if it may be reveal'd to me.

Mir. Learn of me,
And of Pinac: no doubt you'll find employment;
Ladies will look for Courtship.

Pin. 'Tis but fleshing, (marriage?)
But standing one good brunt or two: hast thou any mind to
We'll provide thee some soft natur'd wench, that's dumb too.

Mir. Or an old woman that cannot refuse thee in charity.

Bel. A dumb woman, or an old woman, that were eager
And car'd not for Discourse, I were excellent at.

Mir. You must now put on boldness, there's no avoiding it;
And stand all hazards; flye at all games bravely;
They'll say you went out like an Oxe, and return'd like an

Bel. I shall make danger sure. (Afs else.)

Mir. I am sent for home now,
I know it is to marry, but my Father shall pardon me,
Although it be a witty Ceremony,

And may concern me hereafter in my Gravity;
I will not lose the freedom of a Traveller;
A new strong lusty Bark cannot ride at one Anchor;

Shall I make divers suits to shew to the same eyes?
'Tis dull and home-spun; Study several pleasures,
And want employments for 'em? I'll be hang'd first;
Tye me to one smock? make my travels fruitless?
I'll none of that; for every fresh behaviour,
By your leave, Father, I must have a fresh Mistress,
And a fresh favour too.

Bel. I like that passingly;
As many as you, will so they be willing,
Willing, and gentle, gentle.

Pin. There's no reason
A Gentleman, and a Traveller should be clapt up,
For 'tis a kind of Bæboes to be married
Before he manifest to the World his good parts:
Tug ever like a Rascal at one Oar?
Give me the Italian liberty.

Mir. That I study;
And that I will enjoy; Come, go in Gentlemen,
There mark how I behave my self, and follow. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter La-Castre, Natolet, Lugien, Rosa Lieura, Lylia-Biancha. (come,

La-Cas. You and your beauteous daughters are most wel-
Beshrew my blood they are fair ones; welcom Beauties,
Welcome, sweet Birds.

Nat. They are bound much to your courtesies.

La-Cas. I hope we shall be nearer acquainted.

Nat. That's my hope too.
For certain, Sir, I much desire your Alliance:
You see 'em, they are no Gypsies, for their breeding,
It has not been so coarse, but they are able
To rank themselves with women of fair fashion;
Indeed they have been trained well.

Lug. Thank me.

Nat. Fit for the Heirs of that State I shall leave 'em;
To say more, is to sell 'em. They say your Son
Now he has travel'd must be wondrous curious,
And choice in what he takes: these are no coarse ones;
Sir, here's a merry wench, let him look to himself,
(All heart, i'faith) may chance to startle him;
For all his care, and travel'd caution,
May creep into his Eye; if he love Gravity,
Affect a solemn face, there's one will fit him.

La-C. So young, and so demure?

Nat. She is my Daughter,

Else I would tell you, Sir, she is a Mistress
Both of those manners and that modesty
You would wonder at: She is no often Speaker,
But when she does, she speaks well; Nor no Reveller,
Yet she can dance, and has studied the Court Elements,
And sings, as some say, handsomely; if a woman,
With the decency of her Sex, may be a Scholar,
I can assure ye, Sir, she understands too.

La.C. These are fit Garments, Sir.

Lug. Thank them that cut 'em; (too;
Yes, they are handsome women; they have handsome parts
Pretty becoming parts.

La.C. 'Tis like they have, Sir.

Lug. Yes, yes, and handsome Education they have had too,
Had it abundantly: they need not blush at it;
I taught it, I'll avouch it.

La.C. You say well, Sir.

Lug. I know what I say, Sir, and I say but right, Sir;
I am no Trumpet of their Commendations
Before their Father; else I should say farther.

La.C. 'Pray ye, what's this Gentleman?

Nat. One that lives with me, Sir;
A man well bred and learn'd, but blunt and bitter,
Yet it offends no wise man; I take pleasure in't:
Many fair gifts he has, in some of which
That lye most easie to their understandings,
H'as handsomely bred up my Girls, I thank him.
I have put it to 'em, that's my part, I have urg'd it,
It seems they are of years now to take hold on't.
He's wondrous blunt.

La.C. By my faith I was afraid of him:
Does he not fall out with the Gentlewomen sometimes?

Nat. No, no, he's that way moderate, and discreet, Sir.

Rof. If he did, we should be too hard for him.

Lug. Well said Sulphur:
Too hard for thy Husbands head if he wear not armour.

Enter Mirabel, Pinac, De-Gard, and Oriana.

Nat. Many of these bickrings, Sir.

La.C. I am glad they are no Oracles;
Sure, as I live, he beats them, he's so puisant.

Or. Well, if ye do forget——

Mir. Prithee hold thy peace;
I know thou art a pretty wench; I know thou lov'st me,
Preserve it till we have a fit time to discourse on't,
And a fit place: I'll ease thy heart I warrant thee:
Thou see'st I have much to do now.

Or. I am answer'd, Sir:
With me ye shall have nothing on these conditions.

De-Gard. Your Father and your friends.

La.C. You are welcome home, 'Sir;
'Bless ye, ye are very welcome:
'Pray know this Gentleman,
And these fair Ladies.

Nat. Monsieur Mirabell,
I am much affected with your fair return, Sir;
You bring a general joy.

Mir. I bring you service,
And these bright Beauties, Sir.

Nat. Welcome home, Gentlemen,
Welcome, with all my heart.

Bel. Pin. We thank ye, Sir.

La.C. Your friends will have their share too.

Bel. Sir, we hope
They'll look upon us, though we shew like strangers.

Nat. Monsieur De Gard, I must salute you also,
And this fair Gentlewoman: you are welcome from your
All welcome, all. (Travel too.)

De-Gard. We render ye our loves, Sir:
The best Wealth we bring home: By your Favours, Beauties,
One of these two: you know my meaning.

Or. Well, Sir:
They are fair and handsome, I must needs confes it;
And let it prove the worst, I shall live after it,

Whilst I have meat and drink Love cannot starve me;
For if I dye o' th' first fit I am unhappy,
And worthy to be buried with my heels upward.

Mir. To marry, Sir?

La.C. You know I am an old man,
And every hour declining to my Grave,
One foot already in, more Sons I have not,
Nor more I dare not seek whilst you are worthy,
In you lies all my hope, and all my name,
The making good or wretched of my memory,
The safety of my state.

Mir. And you have provided
Out of this tenderness these handfom Gentlewomen,
Daughters to this rich man, to take my choice of?

La.C. I have, dear Son.

Mir. 'Tis true, ye are old, and feebled;
Would ye were young again, and in full vigor;
I love a bounteous Fathers life, a long one,
I am none of those that when they shoot to ripeness,
Do what they can to break the boughs they grew on;
I wish ye many years and many Riches,
And pleasures to enjoy 'em: But for Marriage,
I neither yet believe in't, nor affect it,
Nor think it fit.

La.C. You will render me your reasons?

Mir. Yes, Sir, both short and pithy, and these they are:
You would have me marry a Maid?

La.C. A Maid? what else?

Mir. Yes, there be things called Widows, dead mens
I never lov'd to prove those; nor never long'd yet
To be buried alive in another mans cold monument.

And there be maids appearing, and maids being:
The appearing are fantastick things, meer shadows;
And if you mark 'em well, they want their heads too;
Only the World to cozen misty eyes,

Has clapt 'em on new faces. The maids being,
A man may venture on, if he be so mad to marry;
If he have neither fear before his eyes, nor fortune;
And let him take heed how he gathers these too,
For look ye, father, they are just like melons,
Musk-melons are the emblems of these maids;
Now they are ripe, now cut 'em, they taste pleasantly,
And are a dainty fruit, digested easily:

Neglect this present time, and come to morrow,
They are so ripe they are rotten gone, their sweetness
Run into humour, and their taste to surfeit.

La.C. Why, these are now ripe, Son.

Mir. I'll try them presently,
And if I like their taste——

La.C. 'Pray ye please your self, Sir.

Mir. That liberty is my due, and I'll maintain it:
Lady, what think you of a handfom man now?

Rof. A wholsom too, Sir.

Mir. That's as you make your Bargain.
A handfom, wholsom man then, and a kind man,
To cheer your heart up, to rejoyce you, Lady?

Rof. Yes Sir, I love rejoycing.

Mir. To lye close to you?
Close as a Cockle? keep the cold nights from you?

Rof. That will be lookt for too, our bodies ask it.

Mir. And get two Boys at every Birth?

Rof. That's nothing,
I have known a Cobler do it, a poor thin Cobler;
A Cobler out of mouldy Cheese perform it,
Cabbage, and coarse black Bread; methinks a Gentleman
Should take foul scorn to have an awl outname him.
Two at a Birth? why, every house-Dove has it:
That man that feeds well, promises as well too,
I should expect indeed something of worth from.
Ye talk of two?

Mir. She would have me get two dozen,
Like Buttons, at a Birth.

Rof. You love to brag, Sir.

If you proclaim these offers at your Marriage,

You are a pretty timber'd man, take heed.
They may be taken hold of, and expected,
Yes, if not hoped for at a higher rate too.

Mir. I will take heed, and thank ye for your counsel:
Father, what think you?

La-C. 'Tis a merry Gentlewoman;
Will make, no doubt, a good wife.

Mir. Not for me:
I marry her, and happily get nothing;
In what a state am I then? Father, I shall suffer
For any thing I hear to the contrary, more majorum,
I were as sure to be a Cuckold, Father,
A Gentleman of Antler.

La-C. Away, away, fool.

Mir. As I am sure to fail her expectation,
I had rather get the Pox than get her Babies.

La-C. Ye are much to blame; if this do not affect ye,
'Pray try the other; she's of a more demure way.

Bel. That I had but the audacity to talk thus!
I love that plain-spoken Gentlewoman admirably,
And certain I could go as near to please her,
If down-right doing— she has a per'ous Countenance,
If I could meet one that would believe me,
And take my honest meaning without circumstance.

Mir. You shall have your will, Sir, I will try the other,
But 'twill be to small use. I hope, fair Lady
(For methinks in your eyes I see more mercy)
You will enjoin your Lover a less penance;
And though I'll promise much, as men are liberal,
And vow an ample sacrifice of service,
Yet your discretion, and your tenderness,
And thriftiness in Love, good huswives carefulness
To keep the stock entire—

Lil. Good Sir, speak louder,
That these may witness too ye talk of nothing,
I should be loth alone to bear the burthen
Of so much indiscretion.

Mir. Hark ye, hark ye;
Ods bobs, you are angry, Lady.

Lil. Angry? no, Sir;
I never own'd an anger to lose poorly.

Mir. But you can love for all this, and delight too,
For all your set-austerity, to hear
Of a good husband, Lady?

Lil. You say true, Sir:
For by my troth, I have heard of none these ten years,
They are so rare, and there are so many, Sir,
So many longing-women on their knees too,
That pray the dropping down of these good husbands,
The dropping down from heaven; for they are not bred there,
That you may guess at all my hope, but hearing—

Mir. Why may not I be one?

Lil. You were near 'em once, Sir,
When ye came over the Alpes; those are near Heaven;
But since ye mis'd that happiness, there is no hope of ye.

Mir. Can ye love a man?

Lil. Yes, if the man be lovely;
That is, be honest, modest; I would have him valiant,
His anger slow, but certain for his honour;
Travell'd he should be, but through himself exactly;
For 'tis fairer to know manners well than Countries;
He must be no vain Talker, nor no Lover
To hear himself talk, they are brags of a wanderer,
Of one finds no retreat for fair behaviour;
Would ye learn more?

Mir. Yes.

Lil. Learn to hold your peace then,
Fond Girls are got with tongues, women with tempers.

Mir. Women, with I know what; but let this vanish:
Go thy way good Wife Bias; sure thy Husband (else.
Must have a strong Philosophers stone, he will ne'r please thee
Here's a starcht piece of austerity; do you hear, Father?
Do you hear this moral Lecture?

La-C. Yes, and like it.

Mir. Why, there's your judgment now; there's an old bolt
This thing must have the strangest observation, (shot:
Do you mark me (father?) when she is married once,
The strangest custom too of admiration
On all she does and speaks, 'twill be past sufferance;
I must not lie with her in common language,
Nor cry have at thee, Kate, I shall be his'd then;
Nor eat my meat without the sawce of sentences,
Your powder'd Beef, and Problems, a rare diet;
My first Son, Monsieur Aristotle, I know it,
Great Master of the Metaphysicks, or so;
The second Solon, and the best Law-setter;
And I must look Egyptian God-fathers,
Which will be no small trouble: my eldest daughter
Sapho, or such a sidling kind of Poetess,
And brought up, invita Minerva, at her needle.
My dogs must look their names too, and all Spartan,
Lelaps, Melampus; no more Fox and Baudiface.
I married to a fullen set of sentences?

To one that weighs her words and her behaviours
In the gold weights of discretion? I'll be hang'd first.

La-C. Prithee reclaim thy self.

Mir. 'Pray ye give me time then;
If they can set me any thing to play at,
That seems fit for a Gamester, have at the fairest.
Till I see more, and try more.

La-C. Take your time then,
I'll bar ye no fair liberty: come Gentlemen,
And Ladies come: to all once more welcome;
And now let's in to supper.

Mir. How dost' like 'em?

Pin. They are fair enough, but of so strange behaviours.

Mir. Too strange for me; I must have those have mettle,
And mettle to my mind; Come, let's be merry.

Bel. 'Bless me from this woman: I would stand the Can,
Before ten words of hers. (non

De-Gar. Do you find him now?
Do you think he will be ever firm?

Or. I fear not.

[Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Mirabel, Pinac, Belleur.

Mir. NE'r tell me of this happiness, 'tis nothing;
The state they bring with being sought to scur-
I had rather make mine own play, and I will do. (vey,
My happiness is in mine own content,
And the despising of such glorious trifles,
As I have done a thousand more. For my humour;
Give me a good free fellow, that sticks to me;
A jovial fair Companion; there's a Beauty:
For women, I can have too many of them;
Good women too, as the Age reckons 'em,
More than I have employment for.

Pin. You are happy.

Mir. My only fear is, that I must be forced
Against my nature, to conceal my self.
Health, and an able Body are two jewels.

Pi. If either of these two women were offered to me now,
I would think otherwise, and do accordingly:
Yes, and recant my heresies, I would fain, Sir;
And be more tender of opinion,
And put a little off my travel'd liberty
Out of the way, and look upon 'em seriously:
Methinks this grave carried wench.

Bel. Methinks the other,
The home-spoken Gentlewoman, that desires to be fruitful,
That treats of the full manage of the matter,
For there lies all my aim; that wench, methinks
If I were but well set on; for she is a fable,
If I were but hounded right, and one to teach me:

She

She speaks to th' matter, and comes home to th' point :
Now do I know I have such a body to please her,
As all the Kingdom cannot fit her with, I am sure on't,
If I could but talk my self into her favour.

Mir. That's easily done.

Bel. That's easily said, would 'twere done ;
You should see then how I would lay about me ;
If I were virtuous, it would never grieve me,
Or any thing that might justify my modesty,
But when my nature is prone to do a charitie,
And my calfs tongue will not help me.

Mir. Will ye go to 'em ?

They cannot but take it courteously.

Pi. I'll do my part,

Though I am sure 'twill be the hardest I e're plaid yet,
A way I never try'd too, which will stagger me,
And if it do not shame me, I am happy.

Mir. Win 'em, and wear 'em, I give up my interest.

Pi. What say ye, Monsieur Bellure ?

Bel. Would I could say,
Or sing, or any thing that were but handsom,
I would be with her presently.

Pi. Yours is no venture ;
A merry ready wench.

Bel. A vengeance squibber ;
She'll flee me out of faith too.

Mir. I'll be near thee ;
Pluck up thy heart, I'll second thee at all brunts ;
Be angry if she abuse thee, and beat her a little,
Some women are won that way.

Bel. Pray be quiet,
And let me think : I am resolv'd to go on ;
But how I shall get off again ———

Mir. I am perswaded
Thou wilt so please her, she will go near to ravish thee.

Bel. I would 'twere come to that once: let me pray a little.

Mir. Now for thine honour Pinac; board me this modesty,
Warm but this frozen snow-ball, 'twill be a conquest
(Although I know thou art a fortunate Wencher,
And hast done rarely in thy daies) above all thy ventures.

Bel. You will be ever near ?

Mir. At all necessities,
And take thee off, and set thee on again, Boy ;
And cherish thee, and stroak thee.

Bel. Help me out too ?
For I know I shall stick i'th' mire : if ye see us close once,
Be gone, and leave me to my fortune, suddenly,
For I am then determin'd to do wonders.
Farewel, and sling an old shooc : how my heart throbs !
Would I were drunk : Farewel Pinac ; Heaven send us
A joyfull and a merry meeting, man. Pi. Farewel,
And chear thy heart up ; and remember Bellure
They are but women.

Bel. I had rather they were Lyons.

Mir. About it ; I'll be with you instantly. [Exeunt.

Enter Oriana.

Shall I ne'r be at rest ? no peace of conscience ?
No quiet for these creatures ? Am I ordain'd
To be devour'd quick by these she-Canibals ?
Here's another they call handsom, I care not for her,
I ne'r look after her : when I am half tripled
It may be I should turn her, and peruse her,
Or in my want of women, I might call for her ;
But to be haunted when I have no fancie,
No maw to th' matter ——— Now, why do you follow me ?

Ori. I hope, Sir, 'tis no blemish to my vertue,
No need you (out of scruple) ask that question,
If you remember ye, before your Travel
I contract you ty'd to me : 'tis my love, Sir,
I cannot let me see't; ye, to confirm your memory,
Asking being fair and good, I cannot suffer :

Mir. To what ?

Ori. For that fair piece of honesty ye shew'd, Sir,
That constant nobleness.

Mir. How ? for I am short headed.

Ori. Ple tell ye then ; for refusing that free offer
Of Monsieur Natolets ; those handsom Beauties,
Those two prime Ladies, that might well have prest ye,
If not to have broken, yet to have bow'd your promise,
I know it was for my sake, for your faith sake,
You slipt 'em off : your honesty compell'd ye.
And let me tell ye, Sir, it shew'd most handsomly.

Mir. And let me tell thee, there was no such matter :
Nothing intended that way of that nature ;
I have more to do with my honesty than to fool it,
Or venture it in such leak barks as women ;
I put 'em off, because I lov'd 'em not,
Because they are too queazie for my temper,
And not for thy sake, nor the Contract sake,
Nor vows, nor oaths ; I have made a thousand of 'em,
They are things indifferent, whether kept or broken ;
Meer venial slips, that grow not near the conscience ;
Nothing concerns those tender parts ; they are trifles ;
For, as I think, there was never man yet hop'd for Either constancie, or secrecie, from a woman,
Unless it were an As's ordain'd for sufferance ;
Nor to contract with such can be a Tial ;
So let them know again ; for 'tis a Justice,
And a main point of civil policie,
What e're we say or swear, they being Reprobates,
Out of the state of faith, we are clear of all sides,
And 'tis a curious blindness to believe us.

Ori. You do not mean this sure ?

Mir. Yes sure, and certain,
And hold it positively, as a Principle, (fluxes,
As ye are strange things, and made of strange fires and
So we are allow'd as strange wayes to obtain ye,
But not to hold ; we are all created Errant.

Ori. You told me other tales.

Mir. I not deny it ;
I have tales of all sorts for all sorts of women,
And protestations likewise of all sizes,
As they have vanities to make us coxcombs ;
If I obtain a good turn, so it is,
I am thankfull for it: if I be made an As's,
The mends are in mine own hands, or the Surgeons,
And there's an end on't.

Ori. Do not you love me then ?

Mir. As I love others, heartily I love thee,
When I am high and lusty, I love thee cruelly :
After I have made a plenteous meal, and satisfi'd
My senses with all delicates, come to me,
And thou shalt see how I love thee.

Ori. Will not you marry me ?

Mir. No, certain, no, for any thing I know yet ;
I must not lose my liberty, dear Lady,
And like a wanton slave cry for more shackles.
What should I marry for ? Do I want any thing ?
Am I an inch the farther from my pleasure ?
Why should I be at charge to keep a wife of mine own,
When other honest married men will ease me ?
And thank me too, and be beholding to me :
Thou thinkst I am mad for a Maiden-head, thou art cozen'd ;
Or if I were addicted to that diet
Can you tell me where I should have one ? thou art eighteen
And if thou hast thy Maiden-head yet extant, (now,
Sure 'tis as big as Cods-head : and those grave dishes
I never love to deal withal : Do'st thou see this book here ?
Look over all these ranks ; all these are women, (quests,
Maids, and pretenders to Maiden-heads ; these are my con-
All these I swore to marry, as I swore to thee,
With the same reservation, and most righteously,
Which I need not have done neither ; for alas they made no
And I enjoy'd 'em at my will, and left 'em : (scruple,
Some of 'em are married since, and were as pure maids again,
Nay o' my conscience better than they were bred for ;

The

The rest fine sober women.

Ori. Are ye not ashamed, Sir?

Mir. No by my troth, Sir; there's no shame belongs to it; I hold it as commendable to be wealthy in pleasure, As others do in rotten sheep, and pasture.

Enter de Gard.

Ori. Are all my hopes come to this? is there no faith? No troth? nor modesty in men?

de Ca. How now Sister, Why weeping thus? did I not prophesie? Come tell me why ———

Ori. I am not well; 'pray ye pardon me. [Exit.]

de Ga. Now Monsieur Mirabel, what ails my Sister? You have been playing the wag with her.

Mir. As I take it, She is crying for a cod-piece; is she gone? Lord, what an Age is this! I was calling for ye, For as I live I thought she would have ravish'd me.

de Ga. Ye are merry Sir.

Mir. Thou know'st this book, de Gard, this Inventory.

de Ga. The debt-book of your Mistresses, I remember it.

Mir. Why this was it that anger'd her; she was stark mad She found not her name here, and cry'd down-right, Because I would not pity her immediately, And put her in my list.

de Ga. Sure she had more modesty.

Mir. Their modesty is anger to be over-done; They'll quarrel sooner for precedence here, And take it in more dudgeon to be slighted, Than they will in publique meetings; 'tis their natures: And alas I have so many to dispatch yet, And to provide my self for my affairs-too, That in good faith ———

de Gard. Be not too glorious foolish; Summe not your Travels up with vanities, It ill becomes your expectation: Temper your speech, Sir; whether your loose story Be true, or false (for you are so free, I fear it) Name not my Sister in't; I must not hear it; Upon your danger name her not: I hold her A Gentlewoman of those happy parts and carriage, A good mans tongue may be right proud to speak her.

Mir. Your Sister, Sir? d'ye blench at that? d'ye cavil? Do you hold her such a piece, she may not be play'd withal? I have had an hundred handfomer and nobler, Have su'd to me too for such a courtesie: Your Sister comes i'th' rear: since ye are so angry, And hold your Sister such a strong Recusant, I tell ye I may do it, and it may be will too, It may be have too, there's my free confession; Work upon that now.

de Gard. If I thought ye had, I would work, And work such stubborn work, should make your heart ake; But I believe ye, as I ever knew ye, A glorious talker, and a Legend maker Of idle tales, and trifles; a depraver Of your own truth; (their honours fly about ye; And so I take my leave, but with this caution, Your sword be surer than your tongue, you'll smart else.

Mir. I laugh at thee, so little I respect thee; And I'll talk louder, and despise thy Sister; Set up a Chamber-maid that shall out-shine her, And carry her in my Coach too, and that will kill her. Go get thy Rents up, go.

de Gard. Ye are a fine Gentleman. [Exit.]

Mir. Now have at my two youths, I'll see how they do, How they behave themselves, and then I'll study What wench shall love me next, and when I'll lose her. [Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter Pinac, and a Servant.

Pinac. Art thou her servant, saist thou?

Ser. Her poor creature, But servant to her horse, Sir.

Pinac. Canst thou shew me The way to her chamber? or where I may conveniently See her, or come to talk to her?

Ser. That I can, Sir; But the question is whether I will or no.

Pinac. Why I'll content thee.

Ser. Why I'll content thee then; now ye come to me.

Pi. There's for your diligence.

Ser. There's her chamber, Sir; And this way she comes out; stand ye but here, Sir, You have her at your prospect, or your pleasure.

Pi. Is she not very angry?

Ser. You'll find that quickly: May be she'll call ye sawcy scurvey fellow, Or some such familiar name: 'may be she knows ye, And will fling a Pifs-pot at ye, or a Pantofle, According as ye are in acquaintance: if she like ye, 'May be she'll look upon ye, 'may be no, And two moneths hence call for ye.

Pinac. This is fine. She is monstrous proud then?

Ser. She is a little haughtie; Of a small body, she has a mind well mounted. Can ye speak Greek?

Pinac. No, certain.

Ser. Get ye gone then; And talk of stars, and firmaments, and fire-drakes. Do you remember who was Adams School-master, And who taught Eve to spin? she knows all these, And will run ye over the beginning o'th' world As familiar as a Fidler. Can ye sit seven hours together, and say nothing? Which she will do, and when she speaks, speak Oracles; Speak things that no man understands, nor her self neither.

Pi. Thou mak'st me wonder.

Ser. Can ye smile?

Pi. Yes willingly:

For naturally I bear a mirth about me.

Ser. She'll ne'r endure ye then; she is never merry; If she see one laugh, she'll swoond past Aqua vite: Never come near her, Sir; if ye chance to venture, And talk not like a Doctor, you are damn'd too; I have told enough for your crown, and so good speed ye. [Ex.]

Pi. I have a pretty task, if she be thus curious, As sure it seems she is; if I fall off now, I shall be laugh'd at fearfully; if I go forward, I can but be abus'd, and that I look for; And yet I may hit right, but 'tis unlikely. Stay, in what mood and figure shall I attempt her? A careles way? no, no, that will not waken her; Besides, her gravity will give me line still, And let me lose my self; yet this way often Has hit, and handsomly. A wanton method? I, if she give it leave to sink into her consideration; But there's the doubt: if it but stir her blood once, And creep into the crannies of her phansie, Set her a gog: but if she chance to flight it, And by the pow'r of her modesty fling it back, I shall appear the arrantest Rascal to her, The most licentious knave, for I shall talk lewdly. To bear my self austerely? rate my words, And fling a general gravitie about me, As if I meant to give Laws? but this I cannot do, This is a way above my understanding; Or if I could, 'tis odds she'll think I mock her; For serious and sad things are ever still suspicious. Well, Ple say something.

But learning I have none, and less good manners; Especially for Ladies; well, I'll set my best face;

Enter Lilia, Petella.

I hear some coming; this is the first woman

I ever

I ever fear'd yet, the first face that shakes me,
Li. Give me my hat Petella, take this veil off,
 This fullen cloud, it darkens my delights;
 Come wench be free, and let the Musick warble,
 Play me some lusty measure.

Pi. This is the sure,
 The very same I saw, the very woman,
 The Gravitie I wonder'd at: Stay, stay,
 Let me be sure; ne'r trust me, but she danceth,
 Summer is in her face now, and she skippeth:
 I'll go a little nearer.

Li. Quicker time fellows,

Enter Mirabel.

I cannot find my legs yet, now Petella.

Pi. I am amaz'd, I am founder'd in my fancies.

Mr. Hah, say ye so; is this your gravitie?
 This the austeritie ye put upon ye?
 I'll see more o' this sport.

Lil. A Song now;
 Call in for a merry, and a light Song,
 And sing it with a liberal spirit.

Enter a Man.

Man. Yes, Madam. (company.)

Lil. And be not amaz'd Sirrah, but take us for your own
 Let's walk our selves: come wench, would we had a man or

Pi. Sure she has spi'd me, and will abuse me dreadfully, (two.)
 She has put on this for the purpose; yet I will try her.

Madam, I would be loth my rude intrusion,
 Which I must crave a pardon for ———

Lil. O ye are welcom,
 Ye are very welcom, Sir, we want such a one;
 Strike up again: I dare presume ye dance well:
 Quick, quick, Sir, quick, the time steals on.

Pi. I would talk with ye.

Lil. Talk as ye dance.

Mr. She'll beat him off his legs first,
 This is the finest Masque.

Lil. Now how do ye, Sir?

Pi. You have given me a shrewd heat.

Lil. I'll give ye a hundred.
 Come sing now, sing; for I know ye sing well,
 I see ye have a singing face.

Pi. A fine Modesty!
 If I could, she'd never give me breath,
 Madam would I might sit and recover.

Lil. Sit here, and sing now,
 Let's do things quickly, Sir, and handfomly,
 Sit close wench, close, begin, begin.

Song.

Pi. I am lesson'd.

Lil. 'Tis very pretty i'faith, give me some wine now.

Pi. I would fain speak to ye.

Lil. You shall drink first, believe me:
 Here's to ye a lusty health.

Pi. I thank ye Lady,
 Would I were off again; I smell my misery;
 I was never put to this rack; I shall be drunk too. (much)

Mr. If thou be'st not a right one, I have lost mine aim
 I thank Heaven that I have scap'd thee; To her Pinac;
 For thou art as sure to have her, and to groan for her——
 I'll see how my other youth does; this speeds trimly:
 A fine grave Gentlewoman, and worth much honour. [Exit.]

Lil. Now? how do ye like me, Sir?

Pi. I like ye rarely.

Lil. Ye see, Sir, though sometimes we are grave and silent,
 And put on sadder dispositions,
 Yet we are compounded of free parts, and sometimes too
 Our lighter, airie, and our fierie mettles (Sir?)
 Break out, and shew themselves; and what think you of that

Pi. Good Lady sit, for I am very weary;
 And then I'll tell ye.

Lil. Fic, a young man idle?
 Up, and walk; be still in action.

The motions of the body are fair beauties,
 Besides 'tis cold; ods-me Sir, let's walk faster,
 What think ye now of the Lady Felicia?
 And Bella fronte the Dukes fair Daughter? ha?
 Are they not handfom things? there is Duarta,
 And brown Olivia.

Pi. I know none of 'em.

Lil. But brown must not be cast away, Sir; if young Lelia
 Had kept her self till this day from a Husband,
 Why what a Beauty, Sir? you know Ismena
 The fair Iem of Saint German's?

Pi. By my troth I do not.

Lil. And then I know you must hear of Brisac,
 How unlike a Gentleman ———

Pi. As I live I have heard nothing.

Lil. Strike me another Galliard.

Pi. By this light I cannot;
 In troth I have sprain'd my leg, Madam.

Lil. Now sit ye down, Sir,
 And tell me why ye came hither, why ye chose me out?
 What is your business? your errant? dispatch, dispatch?
 'May be ye are some Gentlemans man, and I mistook ye,
 That have brought me a Letter, or a haunch of Venison,
 Sent me from some friend of mine.

Pi. Do I look like a Carrier?

You might allow me what I am, a Gentleman.

Lil. Cry 'ye mercie, Sir, I saw ye yesterday,
 You are new come out of Travel, I mistook ye;
 And how do all our impudent friends in Italie?

Pi. Madam, I came with duty, and fair courtesie,
 Service, and honour to ye.

Lil. Ye came to jear me:
 Ye see I am merry, Sir, I have chang'd my copy:
 None of the Sages now, and 'pray ye proclaim it,
 Fling on me what asperion you shall please, Sir,
 Of wantonnefs, or wildness, I look for it;
 And tell the world I am an hypocrite,
 Mask in a forc'd and borrow'd shape, I expect it;
 But not to have you believ'd; for mark ye, Sir,
 I have won a nobler estimation,
 A stronger tie by my discretion
 Upon opinion (how e're you think I forced it)
 Than either tongue or art of yours can slubber,
 And when I please I will be what I please, Sir,
 So I exceed not Mean; and none shall brand it
 Either with scorn or shame, but shall be slighted.

Pi. Lady, I come to love ye.

Lil. Love your self, Sir,
 And when I want observers, I'll send for ye:
 Heigh, ho; my fit's almost off, for we do all by fits, Sir:
 If ye be weary, sit till I come again to ye. [Exit.]

Pi. This is a wench of a dainty spirit; but hang me if I know yet
 Either what to think, or make of her, she had her will of me,
 And baited me abundantly, I thank her,
 And I confess I never was so blurred,
 Nor ever so abus'd; I must bear mine own sins;
 Ye talk of Travels, here's a curious Country,
 Yet I will find her out, or forswear my facultie. [Exit.]

SCENE III.

Enter Rosalura, and Oriana.

Ros. Ne'r vex your self, nor grieve; ye are a fool then.

Or. I am sure I am made so: yet before I suffer
 Thus like a girl, and give him leave to triumph——

Ros. You say right; for as long as he perceives ye
 Sink under his proud scornings, he'll laugh at ye:
 For me secure your self; and for my Sister,
 I partly know her mind too: howsoever
 To obey my Father we have made a tender
 Of our poor beauties to the travel'd Monsieur;
 Yet two words to a bargain; he slights us
 As skittish things, and we shun him as curious.
 May be my free behaviour turns his stomach,

And

And makes him seem to doubt a loose opinion.
I must be so sometimes, though all the world saw it.

Ori. Why should not ye? Are our minds only measur'd?
As long as here ye stand secure.

Rof. Ye say true;
As long as mine own Conscience makes no question,
What care I for Report? That Woman's miserable
That's good or bad for their tongues sake: Come let's retire.
And get my veil Wench: By my troth your sorrow,
And the consideration of mens humorous maddings,
Have put me into a serious contemplation.

Enter Mirabel and Belleur.

Oria. Come 'faith, let's sit, and think.

Rof. That's all my business. (ward.

Mir. Why standst thou peeping here? thou great slug, for-

Bel. She is there, peace.

Mir. Why standst thou here then,
Sneaking, and peaking, as thou would'st steal linnen?
Hast thou not place and time?

Bel. I had a rare speech
Studied, and almost ready, and your violence
Has beat it out of my brains.

Mir. Hang your rare speeches,
Go me on like a man.

Bel. Let me set my Beard up.
How has Pinac performed?

Mir. He has won already:
He stands not thrumming of caps thus.

Bel. Lord, what should I ail? (Hum.
What a cold I have over my stomach; would I had some Certain I have a great mind to be at her:
A mighty mind.

Mir. On fool.

Bel. Good words, I beseech ye;
For I will not be abused by both.

Mir. Adieu, then,
I will not trouble you, I see you are valiant,
And work your own way.

Bel. Hift, hift, I will be rul'd,
I will 'faith, I will go presently:
Will ye forsake me now and leave me i'th' fuds?
You know I am false-hearted this way; I beseech ye,
Good sweet Mirabel; I'le cut your throat if ye leave me,
Indeed I will sweet heart.

Mir. I will be ready,
Still at thine elbow; take a mans heart to thee,
And speak thy mind: the plainer still the better.
She is a woman of that free behaviour,
Indeed that common courtesie, she cannot deny thee;
Go bravely on.

Bel. Madam— keep close about me,
Still at my back. Madam, sweet Madam—

Rof. Ha;
What noise is that, what faucy sound to trouble me?

Mir. What said she?

Bel. I am faucy.

Mir. 'Tis the better.

Bel. She comes; must I be faucy still?

Mir. More faucy.

Rof. Still troubled with these vanities? Heaven bless us;
What are we born to? would ye speak with any of my people?
Go in, Sir, I am busie.

Bel. This is not she sure:
Is this two Children at a Birth? I'le be hang'd then:
Mine was a merry Gentlewoman, talkt daintily,
Talkt of those matters that befitted women;
This is a parcel-pray'r-book; I'm serv'd sweetly;
And now I am to look too; I was prepar'd for th' other way.

Rof. Do you know that man?

Oria. Sure I have seen him, Lady.

Rof. Methinks 'tis pity such a lusty fellow
Should wander up and down and want employment.

Bel. She takes me for a Rogue: you may do well, Madam,

To stay this wanderer, and set him a work, forsooth,
He can do something that may please your Ladiship.
I have heard of Women that desire good breedings,
Two at a birth, or so.

Rof. The fellow's impudent.

Oria. Sure he is crazed.

Rof. I have heard of men too, that have had good manners;
Sure this is want of grace; indeed 'tis great pity.
The young man has been bred so ill; but this lewd Age
Is full of such examples.

Bel. I am founder'd,
And some shall rue the setting of me on.

Mir. Ha? so bookish, Lady, is it possible?
Turn'd holy at the heart too? I'le be hang'd then:
Why this is such a feat, such an activity,
Such fast and loose: a veyl too for your Knavery?
O dio, dio!

Rof. What do you take me for, Sir?

Mir. An hypocrite, a wanton, a dissembler,
How e're ye seem, and thus ye are to be handled.
Mark me Belleur, and this you love, I know it.

Rof. Stand off, bold Sir.

Mir. You wear good Cloaths to this end,
Jewels, love Feasts, and Masques.

Rof. Ye are monstrous faucy.

Mir. All this to draw on fools? and thus, thus Lady,
Ye are to be lull'd.

Bel. Let her alone, I'le swinge ye else,
I will 'faith; for though I cannot skill o'this matter
My self, I will not see another do it before me,
And do it worse.

Rof. Away, ye are a vain thing;
You have travell'd far, Sir, to return again
A windy and poor Bladder: you talk of Women,
That are not worth the favour of a common one;
The grace of her grew in an Hospital:
Against a thousand such blown fooleries
I am able to maintain good Womens honours,
Their freedoms, and their fames, and I will do it.

Mir. She has almost struck me dumb too.

Rof. And declaim
Against your base malicious tongues; your noises;
For they are nothing else: You teach behaviours?
Or touch us for our freedoms? teach your selves manners,
Truth and sobriety, and live so clearly
That our lives may shine in ye; and then task us:
It seems ye are hot, the suburbs will supply ye.
Good Women scorn such Gamesters; so I'le leave ye,
I am sorry to see this: 'faith Sir, live fairly. [Exit.

Mir. This woman, if she hold on, may be vertuous,
'Tis almost possible: we'll have a new day.

Bel. Ye brought me on, ye forced me to this foolery;
I am asham'd, I am scorn'd, I am flurtd; yes, I am so:
Though I cannot talk to a woman like your worship,
And use my phrases, and my learned figures,
Yet I can fight with any man.

Mir. Fie.

Bel. I can, Sir,
And I will fight.

Mir. With whom?

Bel. With you, with any man;
For all men now will laugh at me.

Mir. Prethee be moderate.

Bel. And I'le beat all men. Come.

Mir. I love thee dearly.

Bel. I beat all that love, Love has undone me;
Never tell me, I will not be a History.

Mir. Thou art not.

Bel. 'Sfoot I will not; give me room,
And let me see the proudest of ye jeer me,
And I'le begin with you first.

Mir. 'Prethee Belleur;

If I do not satisfie thee—

Bel. Well, look ye do:

But now I think on't better, 'tis impossible ;
I must beat some body, I am maul'd my self,
And I ought in justice——

Mir. No, no, no, ye are couzen'd ;
But walk, and let me talk to thee.

Bel. Talk wisely,
And see that no man laugh upon no occasion ;
For I shall think then 'tis at me.

Mir. I warrant thee.

Bel. Nor no more talk of this.

Mir. Do'st think I am maddish ?

Bel. I must needs fight yet ; for I find it concerns me,
A pox on't, I must fight.

Mir. Faith thou shalt not.

[Exeunt.]

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter De Gard, and Leverdure, alias Lugier.

De G. Know ye are a Scholar, and can do wonders.

Lug. There's no great Scholarship belongs to this,
What I am, I am ; I pity your poor Sister,
And heartily I hate these Travellers,
These Gim-cracks, made of Mops, and Motions :
There's nothing in their houses here but hummings ;
A Bee has more brains. I grieve, and vex too
The insolent licentious carriage
Of this out-facing fellow, Mirabell,
And I am mad to see him prick his plumes up.

De Gar. His wrongs you partly know.

Lug. Do not you stir, Sir,
Since he has begun with wit, let wit revenge it ;
Keep your sword close, we'll cut his throat a new way.
I am asham'd the Gentlewoman should suffer
Such base lewd wrongs.

De Gar. I will be rul'd, he shall live,
And left to your revenge.

Lug. I, I, I'll fit him :
He makes a common scorn of handsome Women ;
Modesty, and good manners are his May-games :
He takes up Maidenheads with a new Commission ;
The Church warrant's out of date : follow my Counsel,
For I am zealous in the Cause.

De Gar. I will, Sir ;
And will be still directed : for the truth is
My Sword will make my Sister seem more monstrous :
Besides there is no honour won on Reprobates.

Lug. You are i'th' right: The slight he has shew'd my Pupils,
Sets me a fire too : go I'll prepare your Sister,
And as I told ye.

De Gar. Yes all shall be fit, Sir.

Lug. And seriously, and handsomely.

De Gar. I warrant ye.

Lug. A little counsel more.

De Gar. 'Tis well.

Lug. Most stately.
See that observ'd ; and then.

De Gar. I have ye every way.

Lug. Away then and be ready.

De Gar. With all speed, Sir.

[Exit.]

Enter Lillia, Rosalure, and Oriana.

Lug. We'll learn to travel too, may be beyond him.
Good day, Fair beauties.

Lil. You have beautified us.
We thank ye, Sir, ye have set us off most gallantly
With your grave precepts.

Ros. We expected Husbands
Out of your Documents, and taught behaviours ; (us,
Excellent Husbands, thought men would run stark mad on Men of all Ages, and all states: we expected
An Inundation of desires, and offers,

A Torrent of trim Suitors : all we did,
Or said, or purpos'd to be Spells about us,
Spells to provoke——

Lil. Ye have provoke'd us finely,
We follow'd your directions, we did rarely,
We were Stately, Coy, Demure, Careless, Light, Giddy,
And play'd at all points : This you swore would carry.

Ros. We made Love, and contemn'd Love. Now seem'd holy
With such a reverent put-on Reservation
Which could not miss according to your Principles,
Now gave more hope again. Now close, now publick,
Still up and down, we beat it like a Billow ;
And ever those behaviours you read to us,
Subtil, and new. But all this will not help us.

Lil. They help to hinder us of all Acquaintance,
They have frighted off all Friends : what am I better
For all my Learning, if I love a Dunce,
A handsome dunce ? to what use serves my Reading ?
You should have taught me what belongs to Horses,
Doggs, Dice, Hawks, Banquets, Masks, free and fair Meet-
To have studied Gowns and Dressings. (ings,

Lug. Ye are not mad sure.

Ros. We shall be if we follow your encouragements ;
I'll take mine own way now.

Lil. And I my fortune :
We may live Maids else till the Moon drop Mil-stones ;
I see your modest Women are taken for monsters,
A Dowry of good breeding is worth nothing. (yet,

Lug. Since ye take it so to th' heart, pray'ye give me leave
And ye shall see how I'll convert this Heretick ;
Mark how this Mirabell——

Lil. Name him no more :
For, though I long for a Husband, I hate him,
And would be married sooner to a Monkey,
Or to a Jack of Straw, than such a Juggler.

Ros. I am of that mind too ; he is too nimble,
And plays at fast and loose too learnedly
For a plain-meaning Woman ; that's the truth on't.
Here's one too, that we love well, would be angry ;
And reason why : No, no, we will not trouble ye
Nor him, at this time : may he make you happy.
We'll turn our selves loose now, to our fair fortunes,
And the down-right way.

Lil. The winning-way we'll follow,
We'll bait, that men may bite fair, and not be frighted ;
Yet we'll not be carryed so cheap neither : we'll have some
Some mad-Morris or other for our mony, Tutor. (sport,

Lug. 'Tis like enough : prosper your own Devices ;
Ye are old enough to choose : But for this Gentlewoman,
So please her, give me leave.

Oria. I shall be glad, Sir,
To find a friend, whose pity may direct me.

Lug. I'll do my best, and faithfully deal for ye ;
But then ye must be ruled.

Oria. In all, I vow to ye.

Ros. Do, do : he has a lucky hand sometimes, I'll assure ye :
And hunts the recovery of a lost Lover deadly.

Lug. You must away straight.

Oria. Yes.

Lug. And I'll instruct ye :
Here ye can know no more.

Oria. By your leave, sweet Ladies,
And all our Fortunes, arrive at our own wishes.

Lil. Amen, Amen.

Lug. I must borrow your man.

Lil. Pray take him ;
He is within : to do her good, take any thing,
Take us, and all.

Lug. No doubt ye may find Takers ;
And so we'll leave ye to your own disposcs. [Exeunt.

Lil. Now which way, Wench.

Ros. We'll go a brave way ; fear not :
A safe, and sure way too : and yet a by-way,
I must confess I have a great mind to be married.

—Lil.

Lel. So have I too, a grudging of good-will that way ;
And would as fain be dispatch'd. But this Monsieur Quicksilver.

Rof. No, no : we'll bar him, by, and Main : Let him trample ;
There is no safety in his Surquedrie :

An Army-Royal of women, are too few for him,
He keeps a Journal of his Gentlenefs,
And will go near to print his fair dispatches,
And call it his triumph over time and women :
Let him pass out of memory : what think ye
Of his two Companions ?

Lel. Pinac methinks is reasonable ;
A little modestie he has brought home with him,
And might be taught in time some handfom duty.

Rof. They say he is a wench too.

Lel. I like him better :
A free light touch or two becomes a Gentleman,
And sets him seemly off : so he exceed not,
But keep his compass, clear he may be lookt at ;
I would not marry a man that must be taught,
And conjur'd up with kisses ; the best game
Is plaid still by the best Gamesters.

Rof. Fie upon thee !
What talk hast thou ?

Lel. Are not we alone, and merry ? (Gentleman)
Why should we be ashamed to speak what we think ? thy
The tall fat fellow ; he that came to see thee.

Rof. Is't not a goodly man ?

Lel. A wondrous goodly !
H'as weight enough I warrant thee : Mercy upon me ;
What a Serpent wilt thou seem under such a S. George.

Rof. Thou art a fool ; give me a man brings Mettle,
Brings substance with him ; needs no Broths to Lare him :
These little fellows shew like Fleas in boxes,
Hop up and down, and keep a stir to vex us ;
Give me the puissant Pike, take you the small shot.

Lel. Of a great thing I have not seen a duller,
Therefore methinks, sweet Sister ———

Rof. Peace : he's modest :
A bashfulness, which is a point of grace, wench :
But when these fellows come to moulding, Sister,
To heat, and handling : as I live, I like him ;

Enter Mirabel.

And methinks I could form him.

Lel. Peace : the Fire-drake.

Mir. 'Bless ye sweet beauties: sweet incomparable Ladies:
Sweet wits : sweet humours : 'Bless you, learned Lady,
And you, most holy Nun ; 'Bless your Devotions. (Sir,

Lel. And 'bless your brains, Sir, your most pregnant brains,
They are in Travel, may they be delivered
Of a most hopeful Wild-Goose.

Rof. 'Bless your manhood :
They say ye are a Gentleman of action,
A fair accomplish'd man ; and a rare Engineer,
You have a trick to blow up Maidenheads,
A subtle trick, they say abroad.

Mir. I have Lady.

Rof. And often glory in their Ruines.

Mir. Yes forsooth ;
I have a speedy trick : please you to try it :
My Engine will dispatch ye instantly.

Rof. I would I were a woman, Sir, fit for ye,
As there be such, no doubt, may Engine you too ;
May with a Counter-mine blow up your valour :
But in good faith, Sir, we are both too honest :
And the plague is, we can not be perswaded :
For, look ye : if we thought it were a glory
To be the last of all your lovely Ladies. (Market ;

Mir. Come, come ; leave prating : this has spoil'd your
This pride, and pufft-up heart, will make ye fast, Ladies,
Fast, when ye are hungry too.

Rof. The more our pain, Sir.

Lel. The more our health, I hope too.

Mir. Your behaviours

Have made men stand amaz'd ; those men that lov'd ye ;
Men of fair States and parts ; your strange conventions
Into I know not what, nor how, nor wherefore ;

Your scorns of those that came to visit ye ;
Your studied Whim-whams ; and your fine set faces :
What have these got ye ? proud, and harsh opinions :
A Travel'd Monsieur, was the strangest Creature,
The wildest Monster to be wondred at :

His Person made a publique Scoff, his knowledge,
(As if he had been bred 'mongst Bears or Bandoggs)
Shunn'd and avoided : his conversation snufft at.
What Harvest brings all this ?

Rof. I pray ye proceed, Sir.

Mir. Now ye shall see in what esteem a Traveller,
An understanding Gentleman, and a Monsieur
Is to be held, and to your griefs confess it,
Both to your griefs, and galls.

Lel. In what I pray ye, Sir ?
We would be glad to understand your excellence.

Mir. Go on, (sweet Ladies) it becomes ye rarely.
For me, I have blest me from ye, scoff on seriously,
And note the Man ye mock'd : you, (Lady Learning)
Note the poor Traveller, that came to visit ye,
That flat unfurnish'd fellow : note him throughly,
You may chance to see him anon.

Lel. 'Tis very likely.

Mir. And see him Courted by a Travell'd Lady,
Held dear, and honour'd by a vertuous virgin,
May be a Beautie, not far short of yours, neither
It may be, clearer.

Lel. Not unlikely. Mir. Younger :
As killing eyes as yours : a wit as poynant
May be, a State to that may top your Fortune ;
Enquire how she thinks of him, how she holds him ;
His good parts ; in what precious price already ;
Being a stranger to him, how she courts him ;
A stranger to his Nation too, how she dotes on him :
Enquire of this ; be sick to know : Curse, Lady,
And keep your chamber : cry, and curse: a sweet one,
A thousand in yearly land, well bred, well friended :
Travell'd, and highly followed for her fashions.

Lel. 'Bless his good fortune, Sir.

Mir. This scurvy fellow ;
I think they call his name Pinac ; this serving-man
That brought ye Venison, as I take it, Madam ;
Note but this Scab ; 'tis strange that this course creature,
That has no more set off, but his jugglings ;
His travell'd tricks.

Lel. Good, Sir, I grieve not at him,
Nor envy not his fortune : yet I wonder,
He's handfom ; yet I see no such perfection.

Mir. Would I had his fortune : for 'tis a woman
Of that sweet temper'd nature, and that judgment,
Besides her state, that care, clear understanding,
And such a wife to bless him.

Rof. Pray ye whence is she ?

Mir. Of England, and a most accomplish'd Lady ;
So modest that mens eyes are frighted at her,
And such a noble carriage. How now Sirrah ?

Enter a Boy.

Boy. Sir, the great English Lady.

Mir. What of her, Sir ?

Boy. Has newly left her coach, and coming this way ;
Where you may see her plain : Monsieur Pinac,
The only man that leads her.

Enter Pinac, Mariana, and Attendants.

Mir. He is much honored ;
Would I had such a favour : now vex Ladies,
Envy, and vex, and rail.

Rof. Ye are short of us, Sir.

Mir. 'Bless your fair fortune, Sir.

Pi. I nobly thank ye.

Mir. Is she married, friend?

Pi. No, no.

Mir. A goodly Lady;
A sweet and delicate aspect: mark, mark, and wonder!
Hast thou any hope of her?

Pi. A little.

Mir. Follow close then:
Lose not that hope.

Pi. To you, Sir.

Mir. Gentle Lady.

Ref. She is fair indeed.

Lel. I have seen a fairer, yet
She is well.

Ref. Her clothes sit handfom too.

Lel. She dresses prettily.

Ref. And by my faith she is rich, she looks still sweeter.
A well bred woman, I warrant her.

Lel. Do you hear, Sir;
May I crave this Gentlewoman's name?

Pi. Mariana, Lady.

Lel. I will not say I owe ye a quarrel Monsieur
For making me your Stale: a noble Gentleman
Would have had more courtesie; at least, more faith,
Than to turn off his Mistress at first trial:
You know not what respect I might have shew'd ye;
I find ye have worth.

Pi. I cannot stay to answer ye;
Ye see my charge: I am beholding to ye
For all your merry tricks ye put upon me,
Your bobs, and base accounts: I came to love ye,
To wooe ye, and to serve ye; I am much indebted to ye
For dancing me off my legs; and then for walking me;
For telling me strange tales I never heard of,
More to abuse me; for mistaking me,
When ye both knew I was a Gentleman,
And one deier'd as rich a match as you are.

Lel. Be not so bitter, Sir.

Pi. You see this Lady:
She is young enough, and fair enough to please me,
A woman of a loving mind, a quiet,
And one that weighs the worth of him that loves her,
I am content with this, and blefs my fortune,
Your curious Wits, and Beauties.

Lel. Faith see me once more.

Pi. I dare not trouble ye.

Lel. May I speak to your Lady?

Pi. I pray ye content your self: I know ye are bitter,
And in your bitterness, ye may abuse her;
Which if she comes to know, (for she understands ye not)
It may breed such a quarrel to your kindred,
And such an indiscretion sling on you too;
For she is nobly friended. Lel. I could eat her.

Pi. Rest as ye are, a modest noble Gentlewoman,
And afford your honest neighbours some of your prayers.

[Exit.]

Mir. What think you now?

Lel. Faith she's a pretty Whiting;
She has got a pretty catch too.

Mir. You are angry;
Monstrous angry now; grievously angry;
And the pretty heart does swell now.

Lel. No in troth, Sir.

Mir. And it will cry anon; a pox upon it:
And it will curse it self: and eat no meat, Lady;
And it will fight.

Lel. Indeed you are mistaken;
It will be very merry.

Ref. Why, Sir, do you think
There are no more men living, nor no handfomer
Than he, or you, By this light there be ten thousand?
Ten thousand thousand: comfort your self, dear Monsieur,
Faces, and bodies, Wits, and all Abiliments
There are so many we regard 'em not.

Enter Belleur, and two Gentlemen.

Mir. That such a noble Lady, I could burst now,
So far above such trifles?

Bel. You did laugh at me,
And I know why ye laughed.

1 Gent. I pray ye be satisfied;
If we did laugh, we had some private reason,
And not at you.

2 Gent. Alas, we know you not, Sir.

Bel. Ple make you know me; set your faces soberly;
Stand this way, and look sad; I'll be no May-game;
Sadder; demurer yet.

Ref. What's the matter?
What ails this Gentleman?

Bel. Go off now backward, that I may behold ye;
And not a simper on your lives.

Lel. He's mad sure.

Bel. Do you observe me too?

Mir. I may look on ye.

Bel. Why do you grin? I know your minde.

Mir. You do not,
You are strangely humorous: is there no mirth, nor pleasure,
But you must be the object?

Bel. Mark, and observe me;
Where ever I am nam'd;
The very word shall raise a general sadness,
For the disgrace this scurvy woman did me;
This proud pert thing; take heed ye laugh not at me;
Provoke me not, take heed.

Ref. I would fain please ye;
Do any thing to keep ye quiet.

Bel. Hear me,
Till I receive a satisfaction
Equal to the disgrace, and scorn ye gave me:
Ye are a wretched woman; till thou woo'st me,
And I scorn thee as much, as seriously
Jear, and abuse thee; ask what Gill thou art;
Or any baser name; I will proclaim thee;
I will so sing thy vertue; so be-paint thee.

Ref. Nay, good Sir, be more modest.

Bel. Do you laugh again?
Because ye are a woman ye are lawless,
And out of compass of an honest anger.

Ref. Good Sir, have a better belief of me.

Lel. Away dear Sister.

[Exit.]

Mir. Is not this better now, this seeming madness,
Than falling out with your friends?

Bel. Have I not frightened her?

(humor,

Mir. Into her right wits, I warrant thee: follow this
And thou shalt see how prosperously 'twill guide thee.

Bel. I am glad I have found a way to woo yet, I was afraid
I never should have made a civil Suiter.

(once

Well, I'll about it still.

[Exit.]

Mir. Do, do, and prosper.

What sport do I make with these fools? What pleasure
Feeds me, and fats my sides at their poor innocence?

Enter Leverduce, alias Lugier, Mr. Illiard.

Wooing and wiving, hang it: give me mirth,
Witty and dainty mirth: I shall grow in love sure
With mine own happy head. Who's this? To me, Sir?
What youth is this?

Lev. Yes, Sir, I would speak with you,
If your name be Monsieur Mirabel.

Mir. Ye have hit it,
Your business, I beseech ye?

Lev. This it is, Sir,
There is a Gentlewoman hath long time affected ye,
And lov'd ye dearly.

Mir. Turn over, and end that story,
'Tis long enough: I have no faith in women, Sir.

Lev. It seems so, Sir: I do not come to woo for her,
Or sing her praises, though she well deserve 'em,

I come

I come to tell ye, ye have been cruel to her,
Unkind and cruel, falser of faith, and careles,
Taking more pleasure in abusing her,
Wresting her honour to your wild disposes,
Than noble in requiting her affection:
Which, as ye are a man, I must desire ye
(A Gentleman of rank) not to persist in,
No more to load her fair name with your injuries.

Mir. Why, I beseech ye, Sir?

Lev. Good Sir, Ple tell ye,
And Ple be short: Ple tell ye, because I love ye,
Because I would have you shun the shame may follow:
There is a noble man, new come to Town, Sir,
A noble and a great man that affects her,
A Coutrey-man of mine, a brave Savoyan,
Nephew to th'Duke, and so much honours her,
That 'twill be dangerous to pursue your old way,
To touch at any thing concerns her honour,
Believe, most dangerous: her name is Oriana,
And this great man will marry her: take heed, Sir;
For howfoe'r her Brother, a staid Gentleman,
Lets things pass upon better hopes, this Lord, Sir,
Is of that fiery, and that poynant metal,
(Especially provok'd on by affection)
That 'twill be hard: but you are wise.

Mir. A Lord, Sir?

Lev. Yes, and a noble Lord.

Mir. Send her good fortune,
This will not stir her Lord; a Barronness,
Say ye so; say ye so? by'r Lady, a brave title;
Top, and top gallant now; 'save her great Ladiship.
I was a poor servant of hers, I must confess, Sir,
And in those daies, I thought I might be jovy,
And make a little bold to call into her:
But Basto, now; I know my rules and distance;
Yet, if she want an Usher: such an implement;
One that is throughly pac'd; a clean made Gentleman;
Can hold a hanging up; with approbation
Plant his hat formally, and wait with patience
I do beseech you, Sir.

Lev. Sir, leave your scoffing;
And as ye are a Gentleman, deal fairly:
I have given ye a friends counsel, so Ple leave ye.

Mir. But hark ye, hark ye, Sir; is't possible
I may believe what you say?

Lev. You may chuse, Sir. (Nooses?)

Mir. No Baits? No Fish-hooks, Sir? No Gins? No
No Pitfals to catch Puppies?

Lev. I tell ye certain;
You may believe; if not, stand to the danger. [Exeunt.]

Mir. A Lord of Savoy saies he? The Dukes Nephew?
A man so mighty? By Lady a fair marriage;
By my faith, a handfom fortune: I must leave prating;
For to confess the truth, I have abused her,
For which I should be sorry, but that will seem scurvy;
I must confess, she was ever since I knew her
As modest, as she was fair: I am sure she lov'd me;
Her means good; and her breeding excellent;
And for my sake she has refus'd fair matches:
I may play the fool finely. Stay who are these?

Enter De-Gard, Oriana, and Attendants.

'Tis she, I am sure; and that the Lord it should seem,
He carries a fair Port; is a handfom man too:
I do begin to feel, I am a Coxcomb.

Ori. Good my Lord, chuse a nobler: for I know
I am so far below your rank and honour,
That what ye can say this way, I must credit
But spoken to beget your self sport: Alas, Sir,
I am so far off from deserving you,
My beauty so unfit for your Affection,
That I am grown the scorn of common Railers,
Of such injurious things, that when they cannot

Reach at my person, lie with my reputation:
I am poor besides.

de-Ga. Ye are all wealth and goodness;
And none but such as are the scum of men,
The Ulcers of an honest state; Spight weavers,
That live on poyson only, like twoln spiders,
Dare once profane such excellence, such sweetness.

Mir. This man speaks loud indeed.

de-Ga. Name but the men, Lady;
Let me but know, these poor, and base depravers;
Lay but to my revenge their persons open,
And you shall see how suddenly, how fully
For your most beauteous sake, how direfully
Ple handle their despights. Is this thing one?
Be what he will.

Mir. Sir.

de-Ga. Dare your malicious tongue, Sir?

Mir. I know you not; nor what you mean.

Ori. Good my Lord.

de-Ga. If he, or any he.

Ori. I beseech your honour.

This Gentleman's a stranger to my knowledge,
And no doubt, Sir, a worthy man.

de-Ga. Your mercy;
But had he been a tainter of your honour;
A blaster of those beauties raign within ye;
But we shall find a fitter time: dear Lady,
As soon as I have freed ye from your Guardian,
And done some honour'd offices unto ye,
Ple take ye with those faults the world flings on ye;
And dearer than the whole world Ple esteem ye. [Exeunt.]

Mir. This is a thundring Lord; I am glad I scap'd him:
How lovingly the wench disclaim'd my villany?
I am vext now heartily that he shall have her;
Not that I care to marry, or to lose her;
But that this Bilbo-Lord shall reap that Maiden-head
That was my due; that he shall rig and top her;
I'de give a thousand Crowns now, he might miss her.

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Nay, if I bear your blows, and keep your counsel, you have good luck, Sir; Ple teach ye to strike lighter.

Mir. Come hither, honest fellow; canst thou tell me
Where this great Lord lies? This Savoy Lord? Thou met'st
He now went by thee certain. (him)

Ser. Yes, he did, Sir;
I know him; and I know you are fool'd.

Mir. Come hither,
Here's all this, give me truth.

Sir. Not for your mony;
(And yet that may do much) but I have been beaten:
And by the worshipfull Contrivers beaten, and Ple tell ye;
This is no Lord, no Savoy Lord.

Mir. Go forward.

Ser. This is a Trick, and put upon ye grossly
By one Lugier; the Lord is Monsieur de-Gard, Sir;
An honest Gentleman, and a neighbour here;
Their ends you understand better than I, sure.

Mir. Now I know him.
Know him now plain.

Ser. I have discharg'd my colours; so God b'y ye, sir. [Exit.]

Mir. What a purblind Puppy was I; now I remember
All the whole cast on's face, though 'twere umber'd, (him)
And mask'd with patches: what a dunder-whelp
To let him domineer thus: how he strutted,
And what a load of Lord he clapt upon him?
Would I had him here again, I would so bounce him,
I would so thank his Lordship for his lewd plot: (bird-pots.)
Do they think to carry it away, with a great band made of
And a pair of pin-buttock breeches? Ha! 'Tis he again
He comes, he comes, he comes; have at him.

Enter de-Gard, Oriana, &c.

Sings. My Savoy Lord; why dost thou frown on me?

And

And will that favour never sweeter be?
 Wilt thou I say, for ever play the fool?
de Gard be wise, and Savoy go to School.
 My Lord de-Gard, I thank ye for your Antick;
 My Lady bright, that will be sometimes Frantick;
 You worthy Train, that wait upon this Pair,
 'Send you more wit, and they a bouncing Baire
 And so I take my humble leave of your honours. [Exit.
de-Ga. We are discover'd, there's no remedy
Lelia Biancha's man upon my life,
 In stubbornness, because Lugier corrected him.
 (A shameless slaves plague on him for a Rascal.)
Ori. I was in a perfect hope; the bane on't is now,
 He will make mirth on mirth, to persecute us.
de-Ga. We must be patient; I am vext to the proof too,
 P'le try once more; then if I fail: Here's one speaks.
Ori. Let me be lost, and scorn'd first.
de-Ga. Well, we'll consider,
 Away, and let me shift; I shall be hooted else.

[Exeunt.]

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Lugier, Lelia, Servants.

Lug. Faint not; but do as I direct ye, trust me;
 Believe me too, for what I have told ye, Lady,
 As true as you are Lelia, is Authentick;
 I know it, I have found it; 'tis a poor courage
 Flies off for one repulse; these Travellers
 Shall find before we have done, a home-spun wit,
 A plain French understanding may cope with 'em;
 They have had the better yet, thank your sweet Squire, here;
 And let 'em brag: you would be reveng'd?

Lel. Yes surely.Lug. And married too? Lel. I think so.Lug. Then be Counsel'd,

You know how to proceed: I have other Irons
 Heating as well as yours: and I will strike
 Three blows with one Stone home, be rul'd, and happie;
 And so I leave ye. Now is the time.

Lel. I am ready,
 If he do come to do me.

Ser. Will ye stand here,
 And let the people think, ye are God knows what Mistris?
 Let Boys, and Prentices presume upon ye?

Lel. Pre'thee hold thy peace.Ser. Stand at his dore, that hates ye?Lel. Pre'thee leave prating.

(there,

Sir. 'Pray ye go to th' Tavern. P'le give ye a Pint of wine
 If any of the Mad-cap Gentlemen should come by
 That take up women upon speciall warrant,
 You were in a wise case now.

Enter Mirabel, Pinac, Mariana, Priest, Attendants.Lel. Give me the Garland,
 And wait you here.

Mir. She is here to seek thee, Sirrah.
 I told thee what would follow; she is mad for thee;
 Shew, and advance. So early stirring Lady?
 It shews a busie mind, a fancie troubled:
 A willow Garland too? Is't possible?
 'Tis pity so much beautie should lie mustic,
 But 'tis not to be help'd now.

Lel. The more's my Miseric.

Good fortune to ye, Ladie, you deserve it:
 To me, too late Repentance; I have sought it:
 I do not envy, though I grieve a little,
 You are Mistris of that happiness, those Joies
 That might have been, had I been wise: but fortune.

Pi. She understands ye not, 'pray ye do not trouble her;

And do not cross me like a Hare thus, 'tis as ominous.

Lel. I come not to upbraid your Levitic
 Though ye made shew of Love, and though I lik'd ye
 To claim an interest; we are yet both Strangers,
 But what we might have been, had you persever'd, Sir,
 To be an eye-fore to your loving Lady;
 This garland shews, I give my self forsaken;
 (Yet she must pardon me, 'tis most unwillingly:)
 And all the power and interest I had in ye;
 As I perswade my self, somewhat ye lov'd me;
 Thus patiently I render up, I offer
 To her that must enjoy ye: and so bless ye;
 Only, I heartily desire this Courtesie,
 And would not be deni'd: to wait upon ye
 This day, to see ye ty'd, then no more trouble ye.

Pi. It needs not, Ladie.Lel. Good Sir, grant me so much.Pi. 'Tis private, and we make no invitation.Lel. My presence, Sir, shall not proclaim it publick.Pi. May be 'tis not in Town.Lel. I have a Coach, Sir,

And a most ready will to do you service.

Mir. Strike now or never; make it sure: I tell thee,
 She will hang her self, if she have thee not.

Pi. 'Pray ye, Sir,

Entertain my noble Mistris: only a word or two
 With this importunate woman, and I'll relieve ye.
 Now ye see what your flings are, and your fancies,
 Your states, and your wild stubbornness, now ye mind
 What 'tis to gird and kick at mens fair services,
 To raise your pride to such a pitch, and glory
 That goodness shews like gnats, scorn'd under ye,
 'Tis ugly, naught, a self will in a woman,
 Chain'd to an over-weening thought, is pestilent,
 Murthers fair fortune first; then fair opinion:
 There stands a Pattern, a true patient Pattern,
 Humble, and sweet.

Lel. I can but grieve my ignorance,
 Repentance some say too, is the best sacrifice;
 For sure, Sir, if my chance had been so happy,
 (As I confess I was mine own destroyer)
 As to have arrived at you; I will not prophesie,
 But certain, as I think, I should have pleas'd ye;
 Have made ye as much wonder at my courtesie,
 My love, and duty, as I have dishearten'd ye,
 Some hours we have of youth, and some of folly;
 And being free-born Maids, we take a liberty,
 And to maintain that, sometimes we strain highly.

Pi. Now ye talk reason.

Lel. But being yoak'd, and govern'd,
 Married, and those light vanities purg'd from us;
 How fair we grow, how gentle, and how tender,
 We twine about those loves that shoot-up with us?
 A fullen woman fear, that talks not to ye;
 She has a sad and darkn'd soul, loves dully:
 A merry and a free wench, give her liberty;
 Believe her in the lightest form she appears to ye,
 Believe her excellent, though she despise ye,
 Let but these fits and flashes pass, she will shew to ye;
 As Jewels rub'd from dust, or Gold new burnish'd:
 Such had I been, had you believ'd.

Pi. Is't possible?

Lel. And to your happiness, I dare assure ye
 If True love be accounted so; your pleasure,
 Your will, and your command had tyed my Motions:
 But that hope's gone; I know you are young, and giddy,
 And till you have a Wife can govern with ye,
 You sail upon this wold-Sea, light and empty;
 Your Bark in danger daily; 'tis not the name neither
 Of Wife can steer ye; but the noble nature,
 The diligence, the care, the love, the patience,
 She makes the Pilot, and preserves the Husband,
 That knows, and reckons every Rib he is built on;
 But this I tell ye, to my shame.

Pi.

Pin. I admire ye,
And now am sorry, that I aim beyond ye.

Mir. So, so, so, fair and softly. She is thine own, Boy,
She comes now, without Lure.

Pin. But that it must needs
Be reckon'd to me as a wantonness,
Or worse, a madness, to forsake a Blessing,
A Blessing of that hope.

Lel. I dare not urge ye,
And yet, dear Sir.

Pin. 'Tis most certain, I had rather,
If 'twere in my own choice, for you are my country-woman,
A Neighbour, here born by me, she a Stranger;
And who knows how her friends?

Lel. Do as you please, Sir,
If ye be fast; not all the World; I love ye,
'Tis most true, and clear, I would perswade ye;
And I shall love you still.

Pin. Go, get before me;
So much you have won upon me; do it presently:
Here's a Priest ready; I'll have you.

Lel. Not now, Sir,
No, you shall pardon me; advance your Lady,
I dare not hinder your most high Preferment,
'Tis honour enough for me I have unmask'd ye.

Pin. How's that?
Lel. I have caught ye, Sir, alas, I am no States-woman,
Nor no great Traveller, yet I have found ye,
I have found your Lady too, your beauteous Lady;
I have found her birth and breeding too, her discipline;
Who brought her over, and who kept your Lady;
And when he laid her by, what vertuous Nunnery
Receiv'd her in; I have found all these: are ye blank now?
Methinks such travel'd wisdoms should not fool thus;
Such excellent indiscretions.

Mir. How could she know this? (now,
Lel. 'Tis true, she's English born, but most part French
And so I hope you'll find her, to your comfort,
Alas, I am ignorant of what she cost ye;
The price of these hired cloaths I do not know Gentlemen;
Those Jewels are the Brokers, how ye stand bound for 'em.

Pin. Will you make this good?
Lel. Yes, yes, and to her face, Sir,
That she is an English Whore, a kind of fling dust,
One of your London Light o' Loves; a right one,
Came over in thin Pumps, and half a Petticoat,
One Faith, and one Smock, with a broken Haberdasher;
I know all this without a Conjurer;
Her name is jumping Joan, an ancient Sin-Weaver;
She was first a Ladies Chamber-maid, there slip'd
And broke her leg above the knee; departed
And set up shop her self. Stood the fierce Conflicts
Of many a furious Term; there lost her colours,
And last slip'd over hither.

Mir. We are betray'd.
Lel. Do you come to fright me with this mystery?
To stir me with a stink none can endure, Sir?
I pray ye proceed, the Wedding will become ye;
Who gives the Lady? you? an excellent Father;
A careful man, and one that knows a Beauty,
'Send ye fair Shipping, Sir, and so I'll leave ye,
Be wife and manly, then I may chance to love ye. [Exit.

Mir. As I live I am ashamed, this wench has reach'd me,
Monstrous ashamed, but there's no remedy,
This skew'd eye'd Carrion.

Pin. This I suspected ever,
Come, come, unsafe, we have no more use of ye;
Your Cloaths must back again.

Mar. Sir, ye shall pardon me;
'Tis not our English use to be degraded;
If you will visit me, and take your venture,
You shall have pleasure for your properties;
And so sweet heart.

Mir. Let her go, and the Devil go with her;

We have never better luck with these preludiums;
Come, be not daunted; think she is but a woman,
And let her have the Devils wit, we'll reach her.

[Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter Rosalure, and Lugier.

Ros. Ye have now redeem'd my good opinion, Tutor,
And ye stand fair again.

Lug. I can but labour,
And sweat in your affairs; I am sure Belleur
Will be here instantly, and use his anger,
His wonted harshness.

Ros. I hope he will not beat me.
Lug. No sure, he has more manners; be you ready.
Ros. Yes, yes, I am, and am resolv'd to fit him,
With patience to outdo all he can offer;
But how does Oriana?

Lug. Worse, and worse still;
There is a sad house for her: she is now,
Poor Lady, utterly distracted.

Ros. Pity!
Infinite pity! 'tis a handsome Lady,
That Mirabel's a Beast, worse than a Monster,
If this affliction work not.

Enter Lelia Biancha.

Lel. Are ye ready?
Belleur is coming on, here, hard behind me,
I have no leisure to relate my Fortune.
Only I wish you may come off as handsomely,
Upon the sign you know what.

[Exit.

Ros. Well, well, leave me.

Enter Belleur.

Bel. How now?
Ros. Ye are welcome, Sir.
Bel. 'Tis well ye have manners:
That Court'sie again, and hold your Countenance staidly;
That look's too light; take heed: so, sit ye down now,
And to confirm me that your Gall is gone,
Your bitterness dispers'd, for so I'll have it:
Look on me stedfastly, and whatsoe'r I say unto ye,
Move not, nor alter in your face, ye are gone then;
For if you do expresse the least distaste,
Or shew an angry wrinkle, mark me, woman,
We are now alone, I will so conjure thee;
The third part of my Execution
Cannot be spoke.

Ros. I am at your dispose, Sir. (ty:
Bel. Now rise, and woo me a little, let me hear that facult:
But touch me not, nor do not lie I charge ye.
Begin now.

Ros. If so mean and poor a Beauty
May ever hope the Grace.

Bel. Ye cog, ye flatter,
Like a lewd thing ye lie: may hope that grace?
Why, what grace canst thou hope for? Answer not,
For if thou dost, and liest again I'll swindle thee:
Do not I know thee for a pestilent Woman?

A proud at both ends? Be not angry,
Nor stir not o' your life.

Ros. I am counsell'd, Sir.
Bel. Art thou not now (confess, for I'll have the truth out)
As much unworthy of a man of merit,
Or any of ye all? Nay, of meer man?
Though he were crooked, cold, all wants upon him:
Nay, of any dishonest thing that bears that figure:
As Devils are of mercy?

Ros. We are unworthy.
Bel. Stick to that truth, and it may chance to save thee.
And is it not our bounty that we take ye?
That we are troubled, vex'd, or tortur'd with ye?

Our

Our meer and special bounty ?

Ros. Yes.

Bel. Our pity,

That for your wickedness we swindle ye soundly ;
Your stubbornness, and your stout hearts, we be-labour ye,
Answer to that.

Ros. I do confess your pity.

Bel. And dost not thou deserve in thine own person ?

(Thou Impudent, thou Pert ; do not change countenance.)

Ros. I dare not, Sir.

Bel. For if ye do.

Ros. I am settled.

Bel. Thou Wag-tail, Peacock, Puppy, look on me:

I am a Gentleman.

Ros. It seems no less, Sir.

Bel. And darest thou in thy Surquedry ?

Ros. I beseech ye ;

It was my weakness, Sir, I did not view ye,
I took no notice of your noble parts,
Nor call'd your person, nor your proper fashion.

Bel. This is some amends yet.

Ros. I shall mend, Sir, daily,
And study to deserve.

Bel. Come a little nearer ;

Canst thou repent thy villainy ?

Ros. Most seriously.

Bel. And be ashamed ?

Ros. I am ashamed.

Bel. Cry.

Ros. It will be hard to do, Sir.

Bel. Cry instantly ;

Cry monstrously, that all the Town may hear thee ;
Cry seriously, as if thou hadst lost thy Monkey ;
And as I like thy tears.

Enter Lelia, and four Women laughing.

Ros. Now.

Bel. How ? how ? do ye jeer me ?

Have ye broke your bounds again, Dame ?

Ros. Yes, and laugh at ye,
And laugh most heartily.

Bel. What are these, Whirl-winds ?

Is Hell broke loose, and all the Furies flutter'd ?

Am I greas'd once again ?

Ros. Yes indeed are ye ;

And once again ye shall be, if ye quarrel ;

Do you come to vent your fury on a Virgin ?

Is this your Manhood, Sir ?

1 Wom. Let him do his best,
Let's see the utmost of his indignation,
I long to see him angry ; Come, proceed, Sir.
Hang him, he dares not stir, a man of Timber.

2 Wom. Come hither to fright maids with thy Bul-faces ?
To threaten Gentlewomen ? Thou a man ? A May-pole,
A great dry Pudding.

2 Wom. Come, come, do your worst, Sir ;
Be angry if thou darst.

Bel. The Lord deliver me !

4 Wom. Do but look scurvily upon this Lady,
Or give us one foul word. We are all mistaken,
This is some mighty Dairy-maid in Mans Cloaths.

Lil. I am of that mind too.

Bel. What will they do to me !

Lil. And hired to come and abuse us ; a man has manners,
A Gentleman, Civility, and Breeding :
Some Tinkers Trull, with a Beard glew'd on.

1 Wom. Let's search him ;
And as we find him.

Bel. Let me but depart from ye,
Sweet Christian-women.

Lil. Hear the Thing speak, Neighbours.

Bel. 'Tis but a small request ; if e'r I trouble ye,
If e'r I talk again of beating Women,
Or beating any thing that can but turn to me ;

Of ever thinking of a handsome Lady
But virtuously and well ; of ever speaking
But to her honour ; This I'll promise ye,
I will take Rhubarb, and purge Cholera mainly ;
Abundantly I'll purge.

Lil. I'll send ye Broths, Sir.

Bel. I will be laugh'd at, and endure it patiently,
I will do any thing.

Ros. I'll be your Bayl then ;
When ye come next to woo, 'pray come not boisterously,
And furnish'd like a Bear-ward.

Bel. No in truth, forfooth.

Ros. I scented ye long since.

Bel. I was to blame sure,

I will appear a Gentleman.

Ros. 'Tis the best for ye,
For a true noble Gentleman's a brave thing ;
Upon that hope we quit ye. You fear seriously ?

Bel. Yes truly do I ; I confess I fear ye,
And honour ye, and any thing.

Ros. Farewel then.

Wom. And when ye come to woo next bring more mercy.
[Exeunt.]

Enter two Gentlemen.

Bel. A Dairy-maid ! a Tinkers-Trull ! Heaven blefs me !
Sure if I had provok'd 'em, they had quarter'd me.
I am a most ridiculous Ass, now I perceive it :
A Coward, and a Knave too.

1 Gent. 'Tis the mad Gentleman :
Let's set our Faces right.

Bel. No, no, laugh at me ;
And laugh aloud.

2 Gent. We are better manner'd, Sir.

Bel. I do deserve it ; call me Patch, and Puppy,
And beat me if you please.

1 Gent. No indeed, we know ye.

Bel. 'Death, do as I would have ye.

2 Gent. You are an Ass then ;
A Coxcomb, and a Calf.

Bel. I am a great Calf ;
Kick me a little now : Why, when ? Sufficient :
Now laugh aloud, and scorn me ; so good b'ye ;
And ever when ye meet me laugh.

1 Gent. We will, Sir.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Nantolet, La-Castre, De-Gard, Lugier, Mirabel.

Mir. Your patience, Gentlemen ; why do ye bait me ?

Nan. Is't not a shame you are so stubborn hearted,
So stony and so dull to such a Lady,
Of her Perfections, and her Misery ?

Lug. Does she not love ye ? does not her distraction
For your sake only, her most pitied lunacie
Of all but you, shew ye ? does it not compel ye ? (ly.

Mir. Soft and fair, Gentlemen, pray ye proceed temperate-

Lug. If ye have any feeling, any sense in ye,
The least touch of a noble heart.

La-Cas. Let him alone ;

It is his glory that he can kill Beauty,
Ye bear my Stamp, but not my Tenderness ;
Your wild unfavoury Courses set that in ye !
For shame, be sorry, though ye cannot cure her,
Shew something of a Man, of a fair Nature.

Mir. Ye make me mad.

De-Gard. Let me pronounce this to ye,
You take a strange felicity in slighting
And wronging Women, which my poor Sister feels now,
Heavens hand be gentle on her : Mark me, Sir,
That very hour she dies, there's small hope otherwise,
That minute you and I must grapple for it,
Either your life or mine.

Mir. Be not so hot, Sir,
I am not to be wrought on by these policies,

In truth I am not ; Nor do I fear the tricks,
Or the high founding threats of a Savoyan ;
I glory not in Cruelty, ye wrong me ;
Nor grow up water'd with the tears of Women ;
This let me tell ye, howsoe'r I shew to ye,
Wild, as ye please to call it, or self-will'd ;
When I see cause I can both do and suffer,
Freely, and feelingly, as a true Gentleman.

Enter Rosalure, and Lelia.

Ros. O pity, pity, thousand, thousand pities !

Lel. Alas poor Soul ! she will dye ; she is grown senseless ;
She will not know, nor speak now.

Ros. Dye for love !

And love of such a Youth ! I would dye for a Dog first,
He that kills me I'll give him leave to eat me ;
I'll know men better ere I sigh for any of 'em.

Lel. Ye have done a worthy act, Sir ; a most famous ;
Ye have kill'd a Maid the wrong way, ye are a conqueror.

Ros. A Conquerour ? a Cobler ; hang him Sowter ;
Go hide thy self for shame, go lose thy memory ;
Live not 'mongst Men ; thou art a Beast, a Monster ;
A Blatant Beast.

Lel. If ye have yet any honesty,
Or ever heard of any ; take my Counsel ;
Off with your Garters : and seek out a Bough, (tleman ;)
A handsom Bough ; (for I would have ye hang like a Gen-
And write some doleful matter to the World,
A Warning to hard hearted men.

Mir. Out Kitlings !

What Catterwauling's here ? what Gibbing ?
Do you think my heart is softned with a black Santis ?
Shew me some reason.

Enter Oriana on a Bed.

Ros. Here then, here is a reason.

Nant. Now, if ye be a man, let this sight shake ye.

La-C. Alas poor Gentlewoman ! do you know me, Lady ?

Lug. How she looks up, and stares !

Ori. I know ye very well ;

You are my Godfather ; and that's the Monsieur.

De-Gar. And who am I ?

Ori. You are Amadis de Gaul, Sir.

Oh oh, my heart ! were ye never in love, sweet Lady ?
And do you never dream of Flowers and Gardens ?
I dream of walking Fires ; take heed, it comes now ;
Who's that ? pray stand away ; I have seen that face sure ;
How light my head is !

Ros. Take some rest.

Ori. I cannot,

For I must be up to morrow to go to Church,
And I must drefs me, put my new Gown on,
And be as fine to meet my Love : Heigh ho !

Will not you tell me where my Love lies buried ?

Mir. He is not dead : beshrew my heart, she stirs me.

Ori. He is dead to me.

Mir. Is't possible my Nature
Should be so damnable, to let her suffer ?

Give me your hand.

Ori. How soft you feel, how gentle !

I'll tell you your fortune, Friend.

Mir. How she stares on me !

Ori. You have a flattering face, but 'tis a fine one ;

I warrant you may have a hundred Sweet-hearts ;

Will ye pray for me ? I shall dye to morrow,

And will ye ring the Bells ?

Mir. I am most unworthy,

I do confes, unhappy ; do you know me ?

Ori. I would I did.

Mir. Oh fair tears, how ye take me !

Ori. Do you weep too ? you have not lost your Lover ;
You mock me ; I'll go home, and pray.

Mir. 'Pray ye pardon me :

Or if it please ye to consider justly,

Scorn me, for I deserve it : Scorn, and shame me :
Sweet Oriana.

Lel. Let her alone, she trembles ;

Her fits will grow more strong if ye provoke her.

La-Caf. Certain she knows ye not, yet loves to see ye :
How she smiles now ! (me ;

Bel. Where are ye ? Oh, why do you laugh ? come, laugh at
What a Devil ? art thou sad, and such a subject,
Such a ridiculous subject as I am
Before thy face ?

Mir. Prithee put off this lightness ; (on't :
This is no time for mirth, nor place ; I have us'd too much
I have undone my self, and a sweet Lady,
By being too indulgent to my foolery,
Which truly I repent ; look here.

Bel. What ails she ?

Mir. Alas, she's mad.

Bel. Mad ?

Mir. Yes, too sure for me too. (fo ;

Bel. Dost thou wonder at that ? by this light they are all
They are coz'ning mad, they are brawling mad, they are (proud mad :

They are all, all mad ; I came from a World of mad Women.
Mad as March-Hares ; get 'em in Chains, then deal with 'em.
There's one that's mad ; she seems well, but she is dog mad.
Is she dead dost' think ?

Mir. Dead ! Heaven forbid.

Bel. Heaven further it ;

For till they be key cold dead, there's no trusting of 'em,
Whate'r they seem, or howsoe'r they carry it,
Till they be chap fain, and their Tongues at peace,
Nail'd in their Coffins sure, I'll ne'r believe 'em,
Shall I talk with her ?

Mir. No, dear friend, be quiet,

And be at peace a while.

Bel. I'll walk aside,

And come again anon : but take heed to her,
You say she is a Woman ? Mir. Yes.

Bel. Take great heed :

For if she do not cozen thee, then hang me.

Let her be mad, or what she will, she'll cheat thee. [Exit.

Mir. Away, wild Fool : how vile this shews in him now !

Now take my faith, before ye all I speak it,

And with it, my repentant love.

La-C. This seems well.

Mir. Were but this Lady clear again, whose sorrows
My very heart melts for ; were she but perfect
(For thus to marry her would be two miseries,)
Before the richest and the noblest Beauty,
France, or the World could shew me ; I would take her
As she is now, my Tears and Prayers shall wed her.

De-Gar. This makes some small amends.

Ros. She beckons to ye,

To us too, to go off.

Nant. Let's draw aside all.

Ori. Oh my best friend ; I would fain.

Mir. What ? she speaks well,

And with another voice.

Ori. But I am fearful,

And shame a little stops my tongue.

Mir. Speak boldly. (not ;

Ori. Tell ye, I am well, I am perfect well : 'pray ye mock

And that I did this to provoke your Nature,

Out of my infinite and restless love,

To win your pity ; pardon me.

Mir. Go forward ;

Who set ye on ?

Ori. None, as I live, no Creature ;

Not any knew, or ever dream'd what I meant ;

Will ye be mine ?

Mir. 'Tis true, I pity ye :

But when I marry ye, ye must be wiser :

Nothing but Tricks ? Devices ?

Ori. Will ye shame me ?

Mir. Yes, marry will I: Come near, come near, a miracle;
The Woman's well; she was only mad for Marriage,
Stark mad to be ston'd to death; give her good counsel,
Will this world never mend? are ye caught, Damfel?

Enter Belleur, La-Castre, Lugier, Nantolet, De Gard, Rosalure, and Bianca.

Bel. How goes it now?

Mir. Thou art a kind of Prophet,
The Woman's well again, and would have gull'd me;
Well, excellent well: and not a taint upon her.

Bel. Did not I tell ye? Let 'em be what can be;
Saints, Devils, any thing, they will abuse us;
Thou wert an Ass to believe her so long, a Coxcomb;
Give 'em a minute they'll abuse whole millions.

Mir. And am not I a rare Physician, Gentlemen,
That can cure desperate mad minds?

De Gard. Be not insolent.

Mir. Well, go thy waies: from this hour, I disclaim thee,
Unless thou halt a trick above this: then I'll love thee.

Ye owe me for your Cure; pray have a care of her,
For fear she fall into Relapse: come Belleur
We'll set up Bills, to Cure Diseas'd Virgins.

Bel. Shall we be merry?

Mir. Yes.

Bel. But I'll no more projects;
If we could make 'em mad, it were some mastery. [Exeunt.]

Lil. I am glad she is well again.

Ros. So am I, certain,
Be not ashamed.

Oria. I shall never see a man more.

De Gard. Come ye are a fool: had ye but told me this trick,
He should not have gloried thus.

Lug. He shall not long neither.

La-C. Be rul'd, and be at peace: ye have my consent,
And what power I can work with.

Nant. Come, leave blushing;
We are your friends; an honest way compell'd ye;
Heaven will not see so true a love unrecompenc'd;
Come in, and slight him too.

Lug. The next shall hit him. [Exeunt.]

AÆius Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter De Gard, and Lugier.

De G. 'T Will be discover'd.

Lug. That's the worst can happen:
If there be any way to reach, and work upon him;
Upon his nature suddenly, and catch him: that he loves,
Though he dissemble it, and would shew contrary,
And will at length relent, I'll lay my Fortune,
Nay more, my life.

De G. Is she won?

Lug. Yes, and ready,
And my designments set.

De G. They are now for Travel,
All for that Game again: they have forgot wooing.

Lug. Let 'em; we'll travel with 'em.

De G. Where's his Father?

Lug. Within; he knows my mind too and allows it;
Pities your Sisters Fortune most sincerely;
And has appointed, for our more assistance,
Some of his secret Friends.

De G. 'Speed the Plough.

Lug. Well said;
And be you serious too.

De G. I shall be diligent.

Lug. Let's break the Ice for one, the rest will drink too
(Believe me, Sir) of the same Cup; my young Gentlewomen
Wait but who sets the game a foot; though they seem stubborn, and proud now, yet I know their hearts, (born,

Their Pulses how they beat, and for what cause, Sir;
And how they long to venture their Abilities
In a true Quarrel; Husbands they must, and will have,
Or Nunneties, and thin Collations
To cool their bloods; let's all about our business,
And if this fail, let Nature work.

De G. Ye have arm'd me.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Mirabel, Nantolet, and La-Castre.

La-Cast. Will ye be wilful then?

Mir. 'Pray, Sir, your pardon,
For I must Travel: lie lazy here,
Bound to a Wife? Chain'd to her subtleties,
Her humours, and her wills, which are meer Fetters;
To have her to day pleas'd, to morrow peevish,
The third day mad, the fourth rebellious?
You see, before they are married, what Moriscoes,
What Masques, and Mummeries they put upon us,
To be ty'd here, and suffer their Lavalto's?

Nan. 'Tis your own seeking.

Mir. Yes, to get my freedom;
Were they as I could wish 'em.

La-Cast. Fools, and Meacocks,
To endure what you think fit to put upon 'em:
Come, change your mind.

Mir. Not before I have chang'd Air, Father.
When I know Women worthy of my company,
I will return again and wait upon 'em;
Till then (dear Sir) I'll amble all the world over,
And run all hazards, misery, and poverty,

Enter Pinac, and Belleur.

So I escape the dangerous Bay of Matrimony.

Pin. Are ye resolv'd?

Mir. Yes certain; I will out again.

Pin. We are for ye, Sir; we are your servants once more;
Once more we'll seek our fortune in strange Countries;
Ours is too scornful for us.

Bel. Is there ne're a Land

That ye have read, or heard of, (for I care not how far it be, Nor under what pestiferous Star it lies)

A happy Kingdom where there are no Women?

Nor have been ever? Nor no mention

Of any such lewd things, with lewder qualities?

For thither would I Travel; where 'tis Felony

To confess he had a Mother: a Misstris, Treason.

La-Cast. Are you for Travel too?

Bel. For any thing;

For living in the Moon, and stopping hedges,

E're I stay here to be abus'd, and baw'd. (Daughters;

Nan. Why did ye not break your minds to me? they are my

And sure I think I should have that command over 'em,

To see 'em well bestow'd: I know ye are Gentlemen,

Men of fair Parts and States; I know your Parents;

And had ye told me of your fair Affections—

Make but one tryal more; and let me second ye.

Bel. No I'll make Hob-nails first, and mend old Kettles:

Can ye lend me an Armour of high proof, to appear in,

And two or three Field-pieces to defend me?

The Kings Guard are meer Pigmeys.

Nant. They will not eat ye.

Bel. Yes, and you too, and twenty fatter Monfieurs,

If their high stomachs hold: they came with Chopping-knives,

To cut me into Rands, and Sirloins, and so powder me.

Come, shall we go?

Nant. You cannot be so discourteous

(If ye intend to go) as not to visit 'em,

And take your leaves.

Mir. That we dare do, and civilly,

And thank 'em too.

Pin. Yes, Sir, we know that honesty.

Bel. I'll come i'th' Rear, forty foot off, I'll assure ye,
With

With a good Gun in my hand ; I'le no more Amazons,
I mean, no more of their frights ; I'le make my three legs
Kifs my hand twice ; and if I smell no danger ;
If the enterview be clear, may be I'le speak to her ;
I'le wear a privy coat too ; and behind me,
To make those parts secure, a Bandog.

La-Cast. You are a merry Gentleman.

Bel. A wary Gentleman ; I do assure ye,
I have been warn'd, and must be arm'd.

La-Cast. Well, Son,

These are your hafty thoughts, when I see you are bent to it,
Then I'le believe, and joyn with ye ; So we'll leave ye :
There's a Trick will make ye stay.

Nant. I hope so.

[Exeunt.

Mir. We have won immortal Fame now, if we leave 'em.

Pin. You have, but we have lost.

Mir. Pinac, thou art cozen'd ;

I know they love ye ; and to gain ye handfomly,
Not to be thought to yield, they would give millions ;
Their Fathers willingnes, that must needs shew ye.

Pin. If I thought so.

Mir. Ye shall be hang'd, ye Recreant,
Would ye turn Renegado now ?

Bel. No let's away, Boys,
Out of the Air, and tumult of their Villanies ;
Though I were married to that Grasshopper, (me.
And had her fast by th' legs I should think she would cozen

Enter a young Factor.

Fac. Monsieur Mirabel, I take it ?

Mir. Y'are i'th' right, Sir. (Fathers,

Fac. I am come to seek ye, Sir ; I have been at your
And understanding you were here.

Mir. Ye are welcom :

May I crave your name ?

Fac. Fof, Sir, and your servant ;
That you may know me better ; I am Factor
To your old Merchant, Leverdure.

Mir. How do's he ?

Fac. Well, Sir, I hope : he is now at Orleance,
About some business.

Mir. You are once more welcom,
Your Master's a right honest man ; and one
I am much beholding to, and must very shortly
Trouble his love again.

Fac. You may be bold, Sir.

Mir. Your business if you please now ?

Fac. This it is, Sir,
I know ye well remember in your travel
A Genoa Merchant.

Mir. I remember many.

Fac. But this man, Sir, particular ; your own benefit
Must needs imprint him in ye : one Alberto ;
A Gentleman you sav'd from being Murther'd
A little from Bollonia,
I was then my self in Italie, and suppli'd ye,
Though haply, you have forgot me now.

Mir. No, I remember ye,
And that Alberto too : a noble Gentleman :
More to remember, were to thank my self, Sir.
What of that Gentleman ?

Fac. He is dead.

Mir. I am sorry.

Fac. But on his death-bed, leaving to his Sister
All that he had, beside some certain Jewels,
Which with a Ceremony, he bequeath'd to you,
In gratefull memory : he commanded strictly
His Sister, as she lov'd him and his peace,
To see those Jewels safe, and true deliver'd ;
And with them, his last love. She, as tender
To observe his will, not trusting friend, nor servant,
With such a weight, is come her self to Paris,
And at my Masters house.

Mir. You tell me a wonder.

Fac. I tell ye a truth, Sir : She is young, and handfom,
And well attended : of much State, and Riches ;
So loving, and obedient to her Brother ;
That on my conscience, if he had given her also,
She would most willingly have made her tender.

Mir. May not I see her ?

Fac. She desires it heartily.

Mir. And presently ?

Fac. She is now about some business,
Passing accompts of some few debts here owing ;
And buying Jewels of a Merchant.

Mir. Is she wealthy.

Fac. I would ye had her, Sir, at all adventure,
Her Brother had a main State.

Mir. And fair too ?

Fac. The prime of all those parts of Italie,
For beautie, and for Courtesie.

Mir. I must needs see her.

Fac. 'Tis all her business, Sir. Ye may now see her,
But to morrow will be fitter for your visitation ;
For she is not yet prepared.

Mir. Only, her sight, Sir ;
And when you shall think fit for further visit.

Fac. Sir, ye may see her ; and I'le wait your coming.

Mir. And I'le be with ye instantly. I know the house,
Mean time, my love, and thanks, Sir.

Fac. Your poor Servant.

[Exit Alberto.

Pin. Thou hast the strangest Luck : what was that ?

Mir. An honest noble Merchant, 'twas my chance
To rescue from some rogues had almost slain him ;
And he in kindness to remember this.

Bel. Now we shall have you,
For all your protestations, and your forwardness,
Find out strange fortunes in this Ladies eyes,
And new enticements to put off your journey ;
And who shall have honour then ?

Mir. No, no, never fear it :

I must needs see her, to receive my Legacy.

Bel. If it be ty'd up in her smock, heaven help thee :
May not we see too ?

Mir. Yes, afore we go :

I must be known my self e're I be able
To make thee welcom : wouldst thou see more women ?
I thought you had been out of love with all.

Bel. I may be,
I find that, with the least encouragement :
Yet I desire to see whether all Countries
Are naturally possess'd with the same spirits ;
For if they be, I'le take a Monastery,
And never travel ; for I had rather be a Frier,
And live mew'd up, than be a fool, and flouted.

Mir. Well, well, I'le meet ye anon ; then tell you more, boys ;
How e'er stand prepar'd, prest for our journey ;
For certain, we shall go, I think, when I have seen her,
And view'd her well.

Pin. Go, go, and we'll wait for ye ;
Your fortune directs ours.

Bel. You shall find us i'th' Tavern,
Lamenting in Sack and Sugar for our losses ;
If she be right Italian, and want servants,
You may prefer the properest man.
How I could worry a woman now ?

Pin. Come, come, leave prating ;
Ye may have enough to do, without this boasting.

[Exeunt.

SCENE III.

Enter Lugier, de-Gard, Rosalu. and Lelia.

Lug. This is the last adventure.

de-Ga. And the happiest,
As we hope too.

Rof. We should be glad to find it.

Lel. Who shall conduct us thither ?

Lug. Your man is ready,

For I must not be seen; no, nor this Gentleman;
That may beget suspicion: all the rest
Are people of no doubt; I would have ye, Ladies,
Keep your old liberties, and as we instruct ye:
Come, look not pale; you shall not lose your wishes;
Nor beg 'em neither: but be your selves; and happy.

Ros. I tell ye true, I cannot hold off longer,
Nor give no more hard language.

de-Ga. You shall not need.

Ros. I love the Gentleman, and must now show it;
Shall I beat a proper man out of heart?

Lug. There's none advises ye.

Lel. 'Faith I repent me too.

Lug. Repent, and spoil all,
Tell what ye know, ye had best.

Lel. Ple tell what I think;

For if he ask me now, if I can love him,
Ple tell him yes, I can: The man's a kind man;
And out of his true honesty affects me;
Although he plaid the fool, which I requited;
Must I still hold him at the staves end?

Lug. You are two strange women.

Ros. We may be, if we fool still.

Lug. Dare ye believe me?

Follow but this advice I have set you in now,
And if ye lose: would ye yield now so basely?
Give up without your honours saved?

de-Gard. Fie, Ladies.

Persevere your freedom still.

Lel. Well, well, for this time.

Lug. And carry that full state.

Ros. That's as the wind stands:

If it begin to chop about, and scant us;
Hang me, but I know what I'll do: come direct us,
I make no doubt, we shall do handsomly.

de-Ga. Some part o'th' way we'll wait upon ye, Ladies;
The rest your man supplies.

Lug. Do well, Ple honour ye.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.

Enter Factor, and Mirabel, Oriana, and two Merchants.

Fac. Look ye, Sir, there she is, you see how busie;
Methinks you are infinitely bound to her, for her journey.

Mir. How gloriously she shews! She is a tall woman.

Fac. Of a fair Size, Sir. My Master not being at home,
I have been so out of my wits, to get her company:
I mean, Sir, of her own fair sex, and fashion.

Mir. Afar off, she is most fair too.

Fac. Near, most Excellent.

At length, I have entreated two fair Ladies,
And happily you know 'em: the young Daughters
Of Monsieur Nantoleet.

Mir. I know 'em well, Sir.

What are those? Jewels?

Fac. All.

Mir. They make a rich shew?

Fac. There is a matter of ten thousand pounds too
Was owing here: you see those Merchants with her;
They have brought it in now.

Mir. How handsomly her shape shews?

Fac. Those are still neat: your Italians are most curious:
Now she looks this way.

Mir. She has a goodly presence,
How full of courtesie? Well, Sir, Ple leave ye,
And if I may behold to bring a friend or two;
Good noble Gentlemen.

Fac. No doubt, ye may, Sir.

For you have most command.

Mir. I have seen a wonder.

[Exit.]

Ori. Is he gone?

Fac. Yes.

Ori. How?

Fac. Taken to the utmost,
A wonder dwells about him.

Ori. He did not guess at me?

Fac. No, be secure; ye shew another woman,
He is gone to fetch his friends.

Ori. Where are the Gentlewomen?

Fac. Here, here, now they are come,
Sit still, and let them see ye.

Enter Rosalure, Lelia, Servant.

Ros. Pray ye, where's my friend, Sir? (woman,

Fac. She is within, Ladies, but here's another Gentle-
A stranger to this Town: so please you visit her;
'Twill be well taken.

Lel. Where is she?

Fac. There, above, Ladies.

Ser. 'Bless me: what thing is this? two Pinacles
Upon her pate! Is't not a glode to catch Wood-cocks?

Ros. Peace, ye rude knave.

Ser. What a bouncing Bum she has too?
There's Sail enough for a Carrack.

Ros. What is this Lady?

For as I live, she's a goodly woman.

Fac. Ghess, ghess.

Lel. I have not seen a nobler Prefence. (pence,

Ser. 'Tis a lustie wench: now could I spend my forty-
With all my heart, to have but one fling at her;
To give her but a washing blow.

Lel. Ye Rascal.

Ser. I that's all a man has, for's good will: 'twill be long
Before ye cry come Anthonie, and kiss me. (enough,

Lel. Ple have ye whipt.

Ros. Has my friend seen this Lady?

Fac. Yes, yes, and is well known to her.

Ros. I much admire her Prefence.

Lel. So do I too:

For I protest, she is the handsomest,
The rarest, and the newest to mine eye
That ever I saw yet.

Ros. I long to know her;
My friend shall do that kindness.

Ori. So she shall Ladies,

Come, pray ye come up.

Ros. O me.

Lel. Hang me if I knew her:
Were I a man my self, I should now love ye;
Nay, I should doat.

Ros. I dare not trust mine eyes;
For as I live ye are the strangest alter'd,
I must come up to know the truth.

Ser. So must I, Lady;
For I am a kind of unbeliever too.

Lel. Get ye gone, Sirrah;
And what ye have seen, be secret in: you are paid else,
No more of your long tongue.

Fac. Will ye go in Ladies,
And talk with her? These venturers will come straight:
Away with this fellow.

Lel. There, Sirrah, go, disport ye.

Ser. I would the trunk-hos'd-woman would go with me.

[Exit.]

SCENE V.

Enter Mirabel, Pinac, Belleur.

Pin. Is she so glorious handsome?

Mir. You would wonder:

Our Women look like Gipsies, like Gills to her:
Their Clothes and fashions beggerly, and Bankrupt:
Base, old, and scurvy.

Bel. How looks her face?

Mir. Most heavenly:

And the becoming-motion of her bodie
So sets her off.

Bel.

Bel. Why then we shall stay.
Mir. Pardon me :
 That's more than I know : if she be that woman,
 She appears to be.
Bel. As 'tis impossible.
Mir. I shall then tell ye more :
Pin. Did ye speak to her ?
Mir. No, no, I only saw her : She was busie :
 Now I go for that end : and mark her, Gentlemen,
 If she appear not to ye one of the sweetest,
 The handsomest, the fairest in behaviour : (her,
 We shall meet the two wenches there too, they come to visit
 To wonder, as we do.
Pin. Then we shall meet 'em.
Bel. I had rather meet two Bears.
Mir. There you may take your leaves, dispatch that business,
 And as ye find their humours.
Pin. Is your love there too ?
Mir. No certain, she has no great heart to set out again.
 This is the house, I'll usher ye.
Bel. I'll bless me,
 And take a good heart if I can.
Mir. Come, nobly. [Exeunt.]

SCENE VI.

Enter Factor, Rosalure, Lelia, Oriana.

Fac. They are come in : Sit you two off, as strangers,
 There Ladie : where's the boy ? be readie, Sirrah,
 And clear your Pipes, the Musick now : they enter. [Musick]

Enter Mirabel; Pinac, and Belleur.

Pin. What a state she keeps ! how far off they sit from her !
 How rich she is ! I marry, this shews bravely.
Bel. She is a lusty wench : and may allure a good man,
 But if she have a tongue, I'll not give two pence for her :
 There sits my Fury : how I shake to see her !
Fac. Madam, this is the Gentleman.
Mir. How sweet she kisses !
 She has a Spring dwells on her lips : a paradise :
 This is the Legacie.

SONG.

From the honor'd dead I bring
 Thus his love and last offering.
 Take it nobly, 'tis your due,
 From a friendship ever true.
 From a faith &c.

Ori. Most noble Sir,
 This from my now dead Brother, as his love,
 And gratefull memory of your great benefit :
 From me my thanks, my wishes, and my service.
 Till I am more acquainted I am silent,
 Only I dare say this, you are truly noble.

Mir. What should I think ?

Pin. Think ye have a handfom fortune,
 Would I had such another.

Ros. Ye are well met Gentlemen,
 We hear ye are for travel ?

Pin. Ye hear true, Ladie,
 And come to take our leaves.

Lel. We'll along with ye,
 We see you are grown so witty by your Journey,
 We cannot choose but step out too : This Lady
 We mean to wait upon as far as Italy

Bel. I'll travel into Wales, amongst the mountains;
 I hope they cannot find me.

Ros. If you go further;
 So good, and free society we hold ye,
 We'll jog along too.

Pin. Are ye so valiant Lady ?

Lel. And we'll be merry, Sir, and laugh.

Pin. It may be
 We'll go by Sea:
Lel. Why 'tis the only voyage;
 I love a Sea-voyage, and a blustering tempest;
 And let all split.

Pin. This is a dainty Damosel :
 I think 'twill tame ye : can ye ride post ?

Lel. O excellently : I am never weary that way :
 A hundred mile a day is nothing with me.

Bel. I'll travel under ground : do you hear (sweet Lady ?)
 I find it will be dangerous for a woman.

Ros. No danger, Sir, I warrant ; I love to be under.

Bel. I see she will abuse me all the world over :
 But say we pass through Germany, and drink hard ?

Ros. We'll learn to drink and swagger too.

Bel. She'll beat me.

Lady, I'll live at home.

Ros. And I'll live with thee ;

And we'll keep house together.

Bel. I'll keep hounds first ;

And those I hate right heartily.

Pin. I go for Turkey,

And so it may be up into Persia.

Lel. We cannot know too much, I'll travel with ye.

Pin. And you'll abuse me ?

Lel. Like enough.

Pin. 'Tis dainty.

Bel. I will live in a bawdy-house.

Ros. I dare come to ye.

Bel. Say, I am dispos'd to hang my self ?

Ros. There I'll leave ye.

Bel. I am glad I know how to avoid ye.

Mir. May I speak yet ?

Fac. She beckons to ye.

Mir. Lady, I could wish, I knew to recompence,
 Even with the service of my life, those pains,
 And those high favours you have thrown upon me ;
 Till I be more desertful in your eye ;

And till my duty shall make known I honour ye :
 Noblest of women, do me but this favour,
 To accept this back again, as a poor testimony.

Ori. I must have you too with 'em ; else the will,
 That says they must rest with ye, is infring'd, Sir ;
 Which pardon me, I dare not do.

Mir. Take me then ;
 And take me with the truest love.

Ori. 'Tis certain,
 My Brother lov'd ye dearly, and I ought
 As dearly to preserve that love. But, Sir,
 Though I were willing, these are but your Ceremonies.

Mir. As I have life, I speak my soul.

Ori. I like ye.
 But how you can like me, without I have Testimony,
 A Stranger to ye.

Mir. I'll marry ye immediately,
 A fair State I dare promise ye.

Bel. Yet she'll couzen thee.

Ori. Would some fair Gentleman durst promise for ye.

Mir. By all that's good.

Enter La-Castre, Nantolet, Lugier, & de-Gard.

All. And we'll make up the rest, Lady.

Ori. Then Oriana takes ye ; nay, she has caught ye ;
 If ye start now let all the world cry shame on ye :
 I have out-travell'd ye.

Bel. Did not I say she would cheat thee ?

Mir. I thank ye, I am pleas'd, ye have deceiv'd me ;
 And willingly I swallow it, and joy in't ;
 And yet perhaps I know ye : whose plot was this ?

Lug. He is not ashamed that cast it : he that executed,
 Followed your Fathers will.

Mir. What a world's this, nothing but craft, and cozenage ?

Ori. Who begun, Sir ?

Mir. Well ; I do take thee upon meer Compassion ;

And

And I do think, I shall love thee. As a Testimony,
I'll burn my book, and turn a new leaf over,
But these fine clothes you shall wear still.

Ori. I obey you, Sir, in all. (Gentlemen?)

Nant. And how! how, daughters! what say you to these
What say ye, Gentlemen, to the Girls?

Pen. By my troth — if she can love me.

Lel. ——— How long?

Pin. Nay, if once ye love.

Lel. Then take me,

And take your chance.

Pin. Most willingly, ye are mine, Lady:
And if I use ye not, that ye may love me.

Lel. A Match i' faith.

Pin. Why now ye travel with me.

Rof. How that thing stands!

Bel. It will if ye urge it.

'Bless your five wits.

Rof. Nay, 'prethee stay, I'll have thee.

Bel. You must ask me leave first.

Rof. Wilt thou use me kindly;
And beat me but once a week?

Bel. If ye deserve no more.

Rof. And wilt thou get me with child?

Bel. Dost thou ask me seriously?

Rof. Yes indeed do I.

Bel. Yes, I will get thee with child: come presently,
And 't be but in revenge, I'll do thee that courtesie.

Well, if thou wilt fear God, and me; have at thee.

Rof. I'll love ye, and I'll honour ye.

Bel. I am pleas'd then.

(sides.

Mir. This Wild-Goose Chase is done, we have won o' both
Brother, your love: and slow to Church of all hands;
Let's lose no time.

Pin. Our travelling, lay by.

Bel. No more for Italy; for the Low-Countries. [Exeunt.

Cleanthes, Menallo, and Attendants.

Sor. WILL your Grace speak?
Fre. Let me alone, Sorano,
 Although my thoughts seem sad, they (are welcome to me.)

Sor. You know I am private as your secret wishes,
 Ready to fling my soul upon your service,
 E're your command be on't.

Fre. Bid those depart.

Sor. You must retire my Lords.

Cam. What new design is hammering in his head now?

Cle. Let's pray heartily
 None of our heads meet with it, my Wife's old,
 That's all my comfort.

Men. Mine's ugly, that I am sure on,
 And I think honest too, 'twould make me start else.

Cam. Mine's troubled in the Country with a Feaver,
 And some few infirmities else; he looks again,
 Come let's retire, certain 'tis some she-busines,
 This new Lord is imployed.

Val. I'll not be far off, because I doubt the cause. [Ex.

Fre. Are they all gone?

Sor. All but your faithful Servant.

Fre. I would tell thee,

But

But 'tis a thing thou canst not like.

Sor. Pray ye speak it, is it my head? I have it ready for ye, Is't any action in my power? my wit?

I care not of what nature, nor what follows.

Fred. I am in love.

Sor. That's the least thing of a thousand, The easiest to achieve.

Fred. But with whom, Sorano?

Sor. With whom you please, you must not be deny'd, Sir.

Fred. Say it be with one of thy Kinswomen.

Sor. Say withal,

I shall more love your Grace, I shall more honour ye, And would I had enough to serve your pleasure.

Fred. Why 'tis thy Sister then, the fair Evanthe, P'le be plain with thee.

Sor. P'le be as plain with you, Sir, She brought not her perfections to the world, To lock them in a case, or hang 'em by her, The use is all she breeds 'em for, she is yours, Sir.

Fred. Dost thou mean seriously?

Sor. I mean my Sister,

And if I had a dozen more, they were all yours: Some Aunts I have, they have been handsome Women, My Mother's dead indeed, and some few Cousins That are now shooting up, we shall see shortly.

Fred. No, 'tis Evanthe.

Sor. I have sent my man unto her, Upon some business to come presently Hither, she shall come; your Grace dare speak unto her? Large golden promises, and sweet language, Sir, You know what they work, she is a compleat Courtier, Besides P'le set in.

Fred. She waits upon my Queen, What jealousy and anger may arise, Incensing her?

Sor. You have a good sweet Lady, A Woman of so even and still a temper, She knows not anger; say she were a fury, I had thought you had been absolute, the great King, The fountain of all honours, plays and pleasures, Your will and your commands unbounded also; Go get a pair of Beads and learn to pray, Sir.

Enter Servant.

Ser. My Lord, your servant stays.

Sor. Bid him come hither, and bring the Lady with him.

Fred. I will woo her, And either lose my self, or win her favour.

Sor. She is coming in.

Fred. Thy eyes shoot through the door, They are so piercing, that the beams they dart Give new light to the room.

Enter Podramo and Evanthe.

Evan. Whither dost thou go? This is the Kings side, and his private lodgings, What business have I here?

Pod. My Lord sent for ye.

Evan. His lodgings are below, you are mistaken, We left them at the stair foot.

Pod. Good sweet Madam,

Evan. I am no Counsellor, nor important Tutor, Nor have no private business through these Chambers, To seek him this way, o' my life thou art drunk, Or worse than drunk, hir'd to convey me hither To some base end; now I look on thee better, Thou hast a bawdy face, and I abhor thee, A beastly bawdy face, P'le go no further.

Sor. Nay shrink not back, indeed you shall good Sister, Why do you blush? the good King will not hurt ye, He honours ye, and loves ye.

Evan. Is this the business?

Sor. Yes, and the best you ever will arrive at if you be wife.

Evan. My Father was no bawd, Sir,

(Sir: Nor of that worshipful stock as I remember.

Sor. You are a Fool.

Evan. You are that I shame to tell ye.

Fred. Gentle Evanthe.

Evan. The gracious Queen, Sir, Is well and merry, Heaven be thanked for it, And as I think she waits you in the Garden.

Fred. Let her wait there, I talk not of her Garden, I talk of thee sweet Flower.

Evan. Your Grace is pleasant, To mistake a Nettle for a Rose.

Fred. No Rose, nor Lilly, nor no glorious Hyacinth Are of that sweetness, whiteness, tenderness, Softness, and satisfying blessedness As my Evanthe.

Evan. Your Grace speaks very feelingly, I would not be a handsome wench in your way, Sir, For a new Gown.

Fred. Thou art all handsomness, Nature will be ashamed to frame another Now thou art made, thou hast rob'd her of her cunning: Each several part about thee is a beauty.

Sor. Do you hear this Sister?

Evan. Yes, unworthy Brother, but all this will not do.

Fred. But love Evanthe.

Thou shalt have more than words, wealth, ease, and honours, My tender Wench.

Evan. Be tender of my credit, And I shall love you, Sir, and I shall honour ye.

Fred. I love thee to enjoy thee, my Evanthe, To give thee the content of love.

Evan. Hold, hold, Sir, ye are too fleet, I have some business this way, your Grace can ne'r content.

Sor. You stubborn toy.

Evan. Good my Lord Bawd I thank ye.

Fred. Thou shalt not go believe me, sweet Evanthe, So high I will advance thee for this favour, So rich and potent I will raise thy fortune, And thy friends mighty.

Evan. Good your Grace be patient, I shall make the worst honourable wench that ever was, Shame your discretion, and your choice.

Fred. Thou shalt not.

Evan. Shall I be rich do you say, and glorious, And shine above the rest, and scorn all beauties, And mighty in command?

Fred. Thou shalt be any thing.

Eva. Let me be honest too, and then P'le thank ye. Have you not such a title to bestow too?

If I prove otherwife, I would know but this, Sir; Can all the power you have or all the riches, But tye mens tongues up from discoursing of me, Their eyes from gazing at my glorious folly, Time that shall come, from wondering at my impudence, And they that read my wanton life from curses? Can you do this? have ye this Magick in ye? This is not in your power, though you be a Prince, Sir, No more than evil is in holy Angels, Nor I, I hope: get wantonness confirm'd By Act of Parliament an honesty, And so receiv'd by all, P'le hearken to ye. Heaven guide your Grace.

Fred. Evanthe, stay a little,

P'le no more wantonness, P'le marry thee.

Evan. What shall the Queen do?

Fred. P'le be divorced from her.

Eva. Can you tell why? what has she done against ye? Has she contrived a Treason 'gainst your Person? Abus'd your bed? does disobedience urge ye?

Fred. That's all one, 'tis my will.

Evan. 'Tis a most wicked one, A most absurd one, and will show a Monster; I had rather be a Whore, and with less sin, To your present lust, than Queen to your injustice.

Yours is no love, Faith and Religion lly it,
Nor has no taste of fair affection in it,
Some Hellish flame abuses your fair body,
And Hellish furies blow it; look behind ye,
Divorce ye from a Woman of her beauty,
Of her integrity, her piety?
Her love to you, to all that honours ye,
Her chaste and vertuous love, are these fit causes?
What will you do to me, when I have cloy'd ye?
You may find time out in eternity,
Deceit and violence in heavenly Justice,
Life in the grave, and death among the blessed,
Ere stain or brack in her sweet reputation.

Sor. You have fool'd enough, be wife now, and a woman,
You have shew'd a modesty sufficient,
If not too much for Court.

Evan. You have shew'd an impudence,
A more experienc'd bawd would blush and shake at;
You will make my kindred mighty.

Fred. Prethee hear me.

Evan. I do Sir, and I count it a great offer.

Fred. Any of thine.

Evan. 'Tis like enough you may clap honour on them;
But how 'twill sit, and how men will adore it,
Is still the question. I'll tell you what they'll say, Sir,
What the report will be, and 'twill be true too,
And it must needs be comfort to your Master,
These are the issues of her impudence:

I'll tell your Grace, so dear I hold the Queen,
So dear that honour that she nurs'd me up in,
I would first take to me, for my lust, a Moor,
One of your Gally-slaves, that cold and hunger,
Decrepit misery, had made a mock-man,
Than be your Queen.

Fred. You are bravely resolute.

Evan. I had rather be a Leper, and be shun'd,
And dye by pieces, rot into my grave,
Leaving no memory behind to know me,
Than be a high Whore to eternity.

Fra. You have another Gamester I perceive by ye,
You durst not slight me else,

Sor. I'll find him out,
Though he lye next thy heart hid, I'll discover him,
And ye proud peat, I'll make you curse your insolence.

Val. Tongue of an Angel, and the truth of Heaven,
How am I blest! [Exit Val.]

Sor. Podramo go in haste
To my Sisters Gentlewoman, you know her well,
And bid her send her Mistress presently
The lesser Cabinet she keeps her Letters in,
And such like toys, and bring it to me instantly. Away.

Pod. I am gone. [Exit.]

Enter the Queen with two Ladies.

Sor. The Queen.

Fred. Let's quit the place, she may grow jealous. [Exit Fred. Sorano.]

Queen. So suddenly departed! what's the reason?
Does my approach displease his Grace? are my eyes
So hateful to him? or my conversation
Infected, that he flies me? Fair Evanthe,
Are you there? then I see his shame.

Evan. 'Tis true, Madam,
'Thas pleas'd his goodness to be pleasant with me.

Que. 'Tis strange to find thy modesty in this place,
Does the King offer fair? does thy face take him?
Ne'r blush Evanthe, 'tis a very sweet one,
Does he rain gold, and precious promises
Into thy lap? will he advance thy fortunes?
Shalt thou be mighty, Wench?

Evan. Never mock, Madam;
'Tis rather on your part to be lamented,
At least reveng'd, I can be mighty Lady,
And glorious too, glorious and great, as you are.

Que. He will Marry thee?

Evan. Who would not be a Queen, Madam?

Que. 'Tis true Evanthe; 'tis a brave ambition,
A golden dream, that may delude a good mind,
What shall become of me?

Evan. You must learn to pray,
Your age and honour will become a Nunnery.

Que. Wilt thou remember me? [Weeps.]

Evan. She weeps. Sweet Lady
Upon my knees I ask your sacred pardon,
For my rude boldness; and know, my sweet Mistress;
If e're there were ambition in Evanthe,
It was and is to do you faithful duties;
'Tis true I have been tempted by the King,
And with no few and potent charms, to wrong ye;
To violate the chaste joyes of your bed;
And those not taking hold, to usurp your state;
But she that has been bred up under ye,
And daily fed upon your vertuous precepts,
Still growing strong by example of your goodness,
Having no errant motion from obedience,
Flies from these vanities; as meer illusions;
And arm'd with honesty, defies all promises:
In token of this truth; I lay my life down
Under your sacred foot, to do you service.

Que. Rise my true friend, thou vertuous bud of beauty,
Thou Virgins honour, sweetly blow and flourish,
And that rude nipping wind, that seeks to blast thee;
Or taint thy root, be curst to all posterity;
To my protection from this hour I take ye;
Yes, and the King shall know——

Evan. Give his heat way, Madam,
And 'twill go out again, he may forget all. [Exit.]

Enter Camillo, Cleanthes, and Menallo.

Cam. What have we to do with the times? we cannot cure
Let 'em go on, when they are swoln with Surfeits 'em.
They'll burst and stink, then all the world shall smell 'em.

Cle. A man may live a bawd, and be an honest man.

Men. Yes, and a wise man too, 'tis a vertuous calling.

Cam. To his own Wife especially, or to his Sister,
The nearer to his own blood, still the honestest;
There want such honest men, would we had more of 'em.

Men. To be a villain is no such rude matter:

Cam. No, if he be a neat one, and a perfect;
Art makes all excellent: what is it, Gentlemen,
In a good cause to kill a dozen Coxcombs,
That blunt rude fellows call good Patriots?
Nothing, nor ne'r look'd after.

Men. 'Tis e'en as much, as easie too, as honest, and as clear,
To ravish Matrons, and deflower coy Wenches,
But here they are so willing, 'tis a complement.

Cle. To pull down Churches with pretension
To build 'em fairer, may be done with honour,
And all this time believe no gods. (angers,

Cam. I think so, 'tis faith enough if they name 'em in their
Or on their rotten Tombs ingrave an Angel;
Well, brave Alphonso, how happy had we been,
If thou had'st raig'n'd!

Men. Would I had his Disease,
Tyed like a Leprosie to my posterity,
So he were right again.

Cle. What is his Malady?

Cam. Nothing but sad and silent melancholy,
Laden with griefs and thoughts, no man knows why neither;
The good Brandino Father to the Princess,
Used all the art and industry that might be,
To free Alphonso from this dull calamity,
And seat him in his rule, he was his eldest
And noblest too, had not fair nature stopt in him;
For which cause this was chosen to inherit,
Frederick the younger.

Cle. Does he use his Brother
With that respect and honour that befits him?

Cam. He is kept privately, as they pretend,
To give more ease and comfort to his sickness;
But he has honest servants, the grave Ruggio,
And Fryar Marco, that wait upon his Person.
And in a Monastery he lives.

Men. 'Tis full of sadness,
To see him when he comes to his Fathers Tomb,
As once a day that is his Pilgrimage,
Whilst in Devotion, the Quire sings an Anthem:
How piously he kneels, and like a Virgin
That some cross Fate had cozen'd of her Love,
Weeps till the stubborn Marble sweats with pity,
And to his groans the whole Quire bears a Chorus.

Enter Frederick, Sorano, with the Cabinet, and Podramo.

Cam. So do I too. The King with his Contrivers,
This is no place for us. [Exeunt Lords.]

Fred. This is a jewel,
Lay it aside, what paper's that?

Pod. A Letter,
But 'tis a womans, Sir, I know by the hand,
And the false Orthography, they write old Saxon.

Fred. May be her ghostly Mother's that instructs her.

Sor. No, 'tis a Cousins, and came up with a great Cake.

Fred. What's that?

Sor. A pair of Gloves the Dutchess gave her,
For so the outside says

Fred. That other paper? (Saints and Crosses.)

Sor. A Charm for the tooth-ach, here's nothing but

Fred. Look in that Box, methinks that should hold secrets.

Pod. 'Tis Paint, and curls of Hair, she begins to exercise.
A glass of Water too, I would fain taste it,
But I am wickedly afraid 'twill silence me,
Never a Conduit-Pipe to convey this water.

Sor. These are all Rings, Deaths heads, and such Memento's
Her Grandmother, and worm-eaten Aunts left to her,
To tell her what her Beauty must arrive at.

Fred. That, that. (dies;)

Pod. They are written songs, Sir, to provoke young La-
Lord, here's a Prayer-Book, how these agree!
Here's a strange union. (tient.)

Sor. Ever by a surfeit you have a julep set to cool the Pa-

Fred. Those, those.

Sor. They are Verses to the blest Evanthe.

Fred. Those may discover,
Read them out, Sorano.

To the blest Evanthe.

Let those complain that feel Loves cruelty,
And in sad legends write their woes,
With Roses gently has corrected me,
My War is without rage or blows:
My Mistriss eyes shine fair on my desires,
And hope springs up inflam'd with her new fires.
No more an Exile will I dwell,
With folded arms, and sighs all day,
Reckoning the torments of my Hell,
And flinging my sweet joys away:
I am call'd home again to quiet peace,
My Mistriss smiles, and all my sorrows cease.
Yet what is living in her Eye?
Or being blest with her sweet tongue,
If these no other joys imply?
A golden Give, a pleasing wrong:
To be your own but one poor Month, I'd give
My Youth, my Fortune, and then leave to live.

Fred. This is my Rival, that I knew the hand now.

Sor. I know it, I have seen it, 'tis Valerio's,
That hopeful Gentlemans, that was brought up with ye,
And by your charge, nourish'd and fed
At the same Table, with the same allowance.

Fred. And all this courtesie to ruine me?
Cross my desires? 'had better have fed humbler,

And stood at greater distance from my fury:
Go for him quickly, find him instantly,
Whilst my impatient heart swells high with choler;
Better have lov'd despair, and safer kiss'd her. [Ex. Lords.]

Enter Evanthe, and Cassandra.

Evan. Thou old weak fool, dost thou know to what end,
To what betraying end he got this Casket?
Durst thou deliver him without my Ring,
Or a Command from mine own mouth, that Cabinet
That holds my heart? you unconsiderate Ass,
You brainless Ideot.

Cas. I saw you go with him,
At the first word commit your Person to him,
And make no scruple, he is your Brothers Gentleman,
And for any thing I know, an honest man;
And might not I upon the same security deliver him a Box?

Evan. A Bottle-head.

Fred. You shall have cause to chafe, as I will handle it.

Evan. I had rather thou hadst delivered me to Pirates,
Betray'd me to incurable diseases,
Hung up my Picture in a Market-place,
And sold me to wild Bawds.

Cas. As I take it, Madam,
Your maiden-head lies not in that Cabinet,
You have a Closer, and you keep the Key too,
Why are you vex'd thus?

Evan. I could curse thee wickedly,
And wish thee more deformed than Age can make thee,
Perpetual hunger, and no teeth to satisfy it,
Wait on thee still, nor sleep be found to ease it;
Those hands that gave the Casket, may the Palsie
For ever make unuseful, even to feed thee:
Long winters, that thy Bones may turn to Iicles,
No Hell can thaw again, inhabit by thee.
Is thy Care like thy Body, all one crookedness?
How scurvily thou cryest now? like a Drunkard,
I'll have as pure tears from a dirty spout;
Do, swear thou didst this ignorantly, swear it,
Swear and be damn'd, thou half Witch.

Cas. These are fine words, well Madam, Madam.

Evan. 'Tis not well, thou mummy,
'Tis impudently, basely done, thou dirty——
Fred. Has your young sanctity done railing, Madam,
Against your innocent 'Squire? do you see this Sonnet,
This loving Script? do you know from whence it came too?

Evan. I do, and dare avouch it pure, and honest.

Fred. You have private Visitants, my noble Lady,
That in sweet numbers court your goodly Vertues,
And to the height of adoration.

Evan. Well, Sir,
There's neither Heresie nor Treason in it. (with ye;
Fred. A Prince may beg at the door, whilst these feast
A favour or a grace, from such as I am,

Enter Valerio, and Podramo.

Course common things. You are welcome; Pray come near
Do you know this paper? (Sir,

Val. I am betray'd; I do, Sir,
'Tis mine, my hand and heart, if I dye for her,
I am thy Martyr, Love, and time shall honour me.

Cas. You sawcy Sir, that came in my Ladies name,
For her gilt Cabinet, you cheating Sir too,
You scurvly Usher, with as scurvly legs,
And a worse face, thou poor base hanging holder,
How durst thou come to me with a lye in thy mouth?
An impudent lye?

Pod. Hollow, good Gill, you hobble.

Cas. A stinking lye, more stinking than the teller,
To play the pilfering Knave? there have been Rascals
Brought up to fetch and carry, like your Worship,
That have been hang'd for less, whipt they are daily,
And if the Law will do me right——

Pod. What then old Maggot?

Cas.

Caf. Thy Mother was carted younger ; I'll have thy hide,
Thy mangy hide, embroider'd with a dog-whip,
As it is now with potent Pox, and thicker.

Fred. Peace good Antiquity, I'll have your Bones else
Ground into Gunpowder to shoot at Cats with ;
One word more, and I'll blanch thee like an almond,
There's no such cure for the she-falling sickness
As the powder of a dryed Bawds Skin, be silent.
You are very prodigal of your service here, Sir,
Of your life more it seems.

Val. I repent neither,
Because your Grace shall understand it comes
From the best part of Love, my pure affection,
And kindled with chaste flame, I will not flye from it,
If it be errour to desire to marry,
And marry her that sanctity would dote on,
I have done amifs, if it be a Treason
To graft my soul to Vertue, and to grow there,
To love the tree that bears such happinefs ;
Conceive me, Sir, this fruit was ne'r forbidden ;
Nay, to desire to taste too, I am Traytor ;
Had you but plants enough of this blest Tree, Sir,
Set round about your Court, to beautifie it,
Deaths twice so many, to dismay the approachers,
The ground would scarce yield Graves to noble Lovers.

Fred. 'Tis well maintain'd, you wish and pray to fortune,
Here in your Sonnet, and she has heard your prayers,
So much you dote upon your own undoing,
But one Month to enjoy her as your Wife,
Though at the expiring of that time you dye for't.

Val. I could wish many, many Ages, Sir,
To grow as old as Time in her embraces,
If Heaven would grant it, and you smile upon it ;
But if my choice were two hours, and then perish,
I would not pull my heart back.

Fred. You have your wish,
To morrow I will see you nobly married,
Your Month take out in all content and pleasure ;
The first day of the following Month you dye for't ;
Kneel not, not all your Prayers can divert me ;
Now mark your sentence, mark it, scornful Lady,
If when Valerio's dead, within twelve hours,
For that's your latest time, you find not out
Another Husband on the same condition
To marry you again, you dye your self too.

Evan. Now you are merciful, I thank your Grace.

Fred. If when you are married, you but seek to 'scape
Out of the Kingdom, you, or she, or both,
Or to infect mens minds with hot commotions,
You dye both instantly ; will you love me now, Lady ?
My tale will now be heard, but now I scorn ye. [Exit.

[Moment Valerio, and Evanthe.

Evan. Is our fair love, our honest, our entire,
Come to this hazard ? (lice for it,

Val. 'Tis a noble one, and I am much in love with ma-
Envy could not have studied me a way,
Nor fortune pointed out a path to Honour,
Straighter and nobler, if she had her eyes ;
When I have once enjoy'd my sweet Evanthe,
And blest my Youth with her most dear embraces,
I have done my journey here, my day is out,
All that the World has else is foolery,
Labour, and loss of time ; what should I live for ?
Think but mans life a Month, and we are happy.
I would not have my joys grow old for any thing ;
A Paradise, as thou art, my Evanthe,
Is only made to wonder at a little,
Enough for human eyes, and then to wander from.
Come, do not weep, sweet, you dishonour me,
Your tears and griefs but question my ability,
Whether I dare dye ; Do you love intirely ?

Evan. You know I do.

Val. Then grudge not my felicity.

Evan. I'll to the Queen.

Val. Do any thing that's honest,
But if you sue to him, in Death I hate you. [Exit.

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Camillo, Cleanthes, and Menallo.

Cam. WAS there ever heard of such a Marriage ?
Men. Marriage and Hanging go by destiny,
'Tis the old Proverb, now they come together.

Cle. But a Month married, then to lose his life for't ?
I would have a long Month sure, that pays the Souldiers.

Enter Tony with Urinal.

Cam. Or get all the Almanacks burnt, that were a rare
And have no Month remembered. How now Tony ? (trick ;
Whose water are you casting ?

Tony. A sick Gentlemans,
Is very sick, much troubled with the Stone,
He should not live above a Month, by his Urine,
About St. David's Day it will go hard with him,
He will then be troubled with a pain in his Neck too.

Men. A pestilent fool ; when wilt thou marry, Tony ?

Ton. When I mean to be hang'd, & 'tis the surer contract.

Cle. What think you of this Marriage of Valerio's ?

Tony. They have given him a hot Custard, and mean to burn his mouth with it ; had I known he had been given to dye honourably, I would have helpt him to a Wench ; a rare one, should have kill'd him in three weeks, and sav'd the sentence. (too.

Cam. There be them would have spared ten days of that

Tony. It may be so, you have Women of all Vertues :
There be some Guns that I could bring him too,
Some mortar-pieces that are plac'd i'th' Suburbs,
Would tear him into quarters in two hours,
There be also of the race of the old Cockatrices,
That would dispatch him with once looking on him.

Men. What Month wouldst thou chuse, Tony, if thou hadst the like Fortune ?

Tony. I would chuse a mull'd sack-month, to comfort my Belly, for sure my Back would ake for't, and at the months end I would be most dismally drunk, & scorn the gallows:

Me. I would chuse March, for I would come in like a Lion.

To. But you'd go out like a Lamb when you went to hang-

Ca. I would take April, take the sweet o'th' year, (ing.
And kiss my Wench upon the tender flowrets,
Tumble on every Green, and as the Birds sung,
Embrace, and melt away my Soul in pleasure.

Tony. You would go a Maying gayly to the Gallows.

Cle. Prithee tell us some news.

Tony. I'll tell ye all I know,
You may be honest, and poor fools, as I am,
And blow your fingers ends.

Cam. That's no news, Fool. (knaves,

Tony. You may be knaves then when you please, stark
And build fair houses, but your heirs shall have none of 'em.

Men. These are undoubted.

Tony. Truth is not worth the hearing,
I'll tell you news then ; There was a drunken Saylor,
That got a Mermaid with child as she went milking ;
And now she sues him in the Bawdy-Court for it,
The infant-Monster is brought up in Fish-Street.

Cam. I, this is something.

Tony. I'll tell you more, there was a Fish taken,
A monstrous Fish, with a sword by his side, a long sword,
A Pike in's Neck, and a Gun in's Nose, a huge Gun,
And letters of Mart in's mouth, from the Duke of Florence.

Cle. This is a monstrous lye.

Tony. I do confests it : (em ?
Do you think I would tell you truths, that dare not hear
You are honest things, we Courtiers scorn to converse with.

[Exit.

Cam.

Cam. A plaguey fool: but let's consider, Gentlemen,
Why the Queen strives not to oppose this sentence,
The Kingdoms honour suffers in this cruelty.

Men. No doubt the Queen, though she be vertuous,
Winks at the Marriage, for by that only means
The Kings flame lessens to the youthful Lady,
If not goes out; within this Month, I doubt not,
She hopes to rock asleep his anger also;
Shall we go see the preparation?

'Tis time, for strangers come to view the wonder. (dings.

Cam. Come, let's away, send my friends happier wed-
[Exeunt.

Enter Queen and Evanthe.

Queen. You shall be merry, come, I'll have it so,
Can there be any nature so unnoble?
Or anger so inhumane to pursue this?

Evan. I fear there is.

Queen. Your fears are poor and foolish,
Though he be hasty, and his anger death,
His will like torrents, not to be resisted,
Yet Law and Justice go along to guide him;
And what Law, or what Justice can he find
To justify his Will? what Act or Statute,
By Humane, or Divine establishment,
Left to direct us, that makes Marriage death?
Honest fair Wedlock? 'twas given for encrease,
For preservation of Mankind I take it;
He must be more than man then that dare break it.
Come, dress ye handsomely, you shall have my jewels,
And put a face on that contemns base fortune,
'Twill make him more insult to see you fearful,
Outlook his anger.

Evan. O my Valerio!

Be witness my pure mind, 'tis thee I grieve for.

Queen. But shew it not, I would so crucifie him
With an innocent neglect of what he can do,
A brave strong pious scorn, that I would shake him;
Put all the wanton Cupids in thine eyes,
And all the graces on that nature gave thee,
Make up thy beauty to that height of excellence,
I'll help thee, and forgive thee, as if Venus
Were now again to catch the god of War,
In his most rugged anger, when thou hast him,
(As 'tis impossible he should resist thee)
And kneeling at thy conquering feet for mercy,
Then shew thy Vertue, then again despise him,
And all his power, then with a look of honour
Mingled with noble chastity, strike him dead.

Evan. Good Madam dress me,
You arm me bravely.

Queen. Make him know his cruelty
Begins with him first, he must suffer for it,
And that thy sentence is so welcome to thee,
And to thy noble Lord, you long to meet it.
Stamp such a deep impression of thy Beauty
Into his soul, and of thy worthiness,
That when Valerio and Evanthe sleep
In one rich earth, hung round about with blessings,
He may run mad, and curse his act; be lusty,
I'll teach thee how to dye too, if thou fear'st it.

Ev. I thank your Grace, you have prepar'd me strongly,
And my weak mind.

Queen. Death is unwelcome never,
Unless it be to tortur'd minds and sick souls,
That make their own Hells; 'tis such a benefit
When it comes crown'd with honour, shews so sweet too!
Though they paint it ugly, that's but to restrain us,
For every living thing would love it else,
Fly boldly to their peace ere Nature call'd 'em;
The Rest we have from labour, and from trouble
Is some incitement, every thing alike,
The poor Slave that lies private has his liberty,
As amply as his Master, in that Tomb

The Earth as light upon him, and the flowers
That grow about him, smell as sweet, and flourish.
But when we love with honour to our ends,
When Memory and Vertue are our Mourners;
What pleasure's there! they are infinite, Evanthe;
Only, my vertuous Wench, we want our senses,
That benefit we are barr'd, 'twould make us proud else,
And lazy to look up to happier life,
The Blessings of the people would so swell us.

Evan. Good Madam, dress me, you have dress'd my soul,
The merriest Bride I'll be for all this misery,
The proudest to some Eyes too.

Queen. 'Twill do better, come, shrink no more.

Evan. I am too confident. [Exeunt.

Enter Frederick, and Sorano.

Sor. You are too remis and wanton in your angers,
You mold things handsomely, and then neglect 'em;
A powerful Prince should be constant to his power still,
And hold up what he builds, then People fear him:
When he lets loose his hand it shews a weakness,
And men examine or contemn his greatness:
A scorn of this high kind should have call'd up
A revenge equal, not a pity in you.

Fred. She is thy Sister.

Sor. And she were my Mother,
Whilst I conceive 'tis you she has wrong'd, I hate her,
And shake her nearness off; I study, Sir,
To satisfy your angers that are just,
Before your pleasures.

Fred. I have done that already,
I fear has pull'd too many curses on me.

Sor. Curses or envies, on Valerio's head,
Would you take my counsel, Sir, they should all light,
And with the weight not only crack his skull,
But his fair credit; the exquisite vexation
I have devis'd, so please you give way in't,
And let it work, shall more afflict his soul,
And trench upon that honour that he brags of,
Than fear of Death in all the frights he carries;
If you sit down here they will both abuse ye,
Laugh at your poor relenting power, and scorn ye.
What satisfaction can their deaths bring to you,
That are prepar'd, and proud to dye, and willingly,
And at their ends will thank you for that honour?
How are you nearer the desire you aim at?
Or if it be revenge your anger covets,
How can their single deaths give you content, Sir?
Petty revenges end in blood, sleight angers,
A Princes rage should find out new diseases,
Death were a pleasure too, to pay proud fools with.

Fred. What should I do?

Sor. Add but your power unto me,
Make me but strong by your protection,
And you shall see what joy, and what delight,
What infinite pleasure this poor Month shall yield him.
I'll make him wish he were dead on his Marriage-day,
Or bed-rid with old age, I'll make him curse,
And cry and curse, give me but power.

Fred. You have it,
Here, take my Ring, I am content he pay for't.

Sor. It shall be now revenge, as I will handle it,
He shall live after this to beg his life too,
Twenty to one by this thread, as I'll weave it,
Evanthe shall be yours.

Fred. Take all authority, and be most happy.

Sor. Good Sir, no more pity. [Exeunt.

Enter Tony, three Citizens, and three Wives.

1 Wife. Good Master Tony, put me in.

Tony. Where do you dwell?

(Mutton.

1 Wife. Forsooth, at the sign of the great Shoulder of

Ton. A hungry man would hunt your house out instantly,
Keep the Dogs from your door; Is this Lettice Ruff your Husband?

Husband? a fine sharp faller to your sign.

2 Wife. Will you put me in too?

3 Wife. And me, good Master Tony.

Tony. Put ye all in? you had best come twenty more; you Think 'tis easie, a trick of legerdemain, to put ye all in, 'Twould pose a fellow that had twice my body, Though it were all made into chines and fillets.

2 Wi. Put's into th' wedding, Sir, we would fain see that.

1 Wife. And the brave Masque too.

To. You two are pretty women, are you their husbands?

2 Citiz. Yes, for want of better.

Tony. I think so too, you would not be so mad else To turn 'em loose to a company of young Courtiers, That swarm like Bees in May, when they see young wen- You must not squeak. (ches;

3 Wife. No Sir, we are better tutor'd.

Tony. Nor if a young Lord offer you the courtesie——

2 Wife. We know what 'tis, Sir.

Tony. Nor you must not grumble, If you be thrust up hard, we thrust most furiously.

1 Wife. We know the worst.

Tony. Get you two in then quietly, And shift for your selves; we must have no old women, They are out of use, unless they have petitions, Besides they cough so loud they drown the Musick. You would go in too, but there is no place for ye? I am sorry for't, go and forget your wives, Or pray they may be able to suffer patiently. You may have Heirs may prove wise Aldermen, Go, or I'll call the Guard.

3 Citiz. We will get in, we'll venture broken pates else.

[Ex. Citiz. and Women.]

Tony. 'Tis impossible, You are too securely arm'd; how they flock hither, And with what joy the women run by heaps To see this Marriage: they tickle to think of it, They hope for every month a husband too; Still how they run, and how the wittals follow 'em, The weak things that are worn between the leggs, That brushing, dressing, nor new naps can mend, How they post to see their own confusion? This is a merry world.

Enter Frederick.

Fred. Look to the door Sirrah, Thou art a fool, and may'st do mischief lawfully.

Tony. Give me your hand, you are my Brother fool, You may both make the Law, and marr it presently. Do you love a wench?

Fred. Who does not, fool? (marry her.)

Tony. Not I, unless you will give me a longer lease to

Fre. What are all these that come, what business have they?

Tony. Some come to gaze, those are my fellow fools; Some to get home their wives, those be their own fools; Some to rejoyce with thee, those be the times fools; And some I fear to curse thee, those are poor fools,

Enter Cassander, an old Lady passing over.

A set people call them honest. Look, look King, look, A weather-beaten Lady new caresn'd,

Fred. An old one.

Tony. The glasses of her eyes are new rub'd over, (ly? And the worm-eaten records in her face are daub'd up neat- She layes her breasts out too, like to poch'd eggs That had the yolks sucked out; they get new heads also, New teeth, new tongues, for the old are all worn out, And as 'tis hop'd, new tayls. Fred. For what?

Tony. For old Courtiers, The young ones are too stirring for their travels.

Fred. Go leave your knavery, and help to keep the door I will have no such prefs. (well,

Tony. Lay thy hand o'thy heart King.

Fred. I'll have ye whipt.

Tony. The fool and thou art parted.

Fred. Sorano work, and free me from this spell, 'Twixt love and scorn there's nothing felt but hell. [Exit.]

Enter Valerio, Camillo, Cleanthes, Menallo, and Servants.

Val. Tye on my Scarf, you are so long about me, Good my Lords, help, give me my other Cloak, That Hat and Feather, Lord what a Taylor's this, To make me up thus straight! one sigh would burst me, I have not room to breath, come button, button, Button, apace.

Cam. I am glad to see you merry Sir.

Val. 'Twould make you merry had you such a wife, And such an age to enjoy her in.

Men. An age Sir?

Val. A moneth's an age to him that is contented; What should I seek for more? give me my sword. Ha my good Lords, that every one of you now Had but a Lady of that youth and beauty To bless your selves this night with, would ye not? Pray ye speak uprightly:

Cle. We confes ye happy; And we could well wish such another Banquet; But on that price my Lord——

Val. 'Twere nothing else, No man can ever come to aim at Heaven, But by the knowledge of a Hell. These shoes are heavy, And if I should be call'd to dance they'll clog me, Get me some pumps; I'll tell ye brave Camillo; And you dear friends, the King has honour'd me, Out of his gracious favour has much honour'd me, To limit me my time, for who would live long? Who would be old? 'tis such a weariness, Such a disease, that hangs like lead upon us. As it increases, so vexations, Griefs of the minde, pains of the feeble body, Rheums, coughs, catarrhs, we are but our living coffins; Besides, the fair soul's old too, it grows covetous, Which shews all honour is departed from us, And we are Earth again.

Cle. You make fair use Sir.

Val. I would not live to learn to lye Cleanthes For all the world, old men are prone to that too; Thou that hast been a Souldier, Menallo, A noble Souldier, and defied all danger, Adopted thy brave arm the heir to victory, Would'st thou live so long till thy strength forsook thee? Till thou grew'st only a long tedious story Of what thou hadst been? till thy sword hang by, And lazie Spiders fill'd the hilt with cobwebs?

Men. No sure, I would not;

Val. 'Tis not fit ye should, To dye a young man is to be an Angel, Our great good parts put wings unto our souls: We'll have a rouse before we go to bed friends, Pray ye tell me, is't a handsome Mask we have?

Cam. We understand so.

Val. And the young gent. dance?

Cle. They do Sir, and some dance well.

Val. They must before the Ladies, We'll have a rouse before we go to bed friends, A lusty one, 'twill make my blood dance too. [Musick]

Cam. Ten if you please.

Val. And we'll be wondrous merry, They stay sure, come, I hear the Musick forward, You shall have all Gloves presently. [Exit.]

Men. We attend Sir, but first we must look to th' Doors. Knocking within. The King has charged us. [Exeunt.]

Enter two Servants:

1 Ser. What a noise do you keep there? call my fellows O' the Guard; you must cease now untill the King be Enter'd, he is gone to th' Temple now.

2 Ser.

2 Serv. Look to that back door, and keep it fast,
They swarm like Bees about it.

Enter Camillo, Cleanthes, Menallo, Tony, following.

Cam. Keep back those Citizens, and let their wives in,
Their handsome wives.

Tony. They have crowded me to Veriuyce,
I sweat like a Butter-box.

1 Serv. Stand further off there.

Men. Take the women aside, and talk with 'em in private,
Give 'em that they came for.

Tony. The whole Court cannot do it;
Besides, the next Mask if we use 'em so,
They'l come by millions to expect our larges;
We have broke a hundred heads.

Cle. Are they so tender?

Ton. But 'twas behind, before they have all murrions.

Cam. Let in those Ladies, make 'em room for shame there.

Ton. They are no Ladies, there's one bald before 'em,
A gent. bald, they are curtail'd queans in hired clothes,
They come out of Spain I think, they are very sultry.

Men. Keep 'em in breath for an Embassadour.

Knocks within.

Me thinks my nose shakes at their memories,
What bounting's that?

Within. I am one of the Musick Sir.

Within. I have sweat-meats for the banquet.

Cam. Let 'em in.

Ton. They lye my Lord, they come to seek their wives,
Two broken Citizens.

Cam. Break 'em more, they are but brusled yet.
Bold Rascals, offer to disturb your wives?

Cle. Lock the doors fast, the Musick, hark, the King comes.

A Curtain drawn.

The King, Queen, Valerio, Evanthe, Ladies, Attendants, Camillo, Cleanthes, Sorano, Menallo.

A Mask.

Cupid descends, the Graces sitting by him, Cupid being bound the Graces unbind him, he speaks.

Cup. Unbind me, my delight, this night is mine,
Now let me look upon what Stars here shine,
Let me behold the beauties, then clap high
My cullor'd wings, proud of my Deity;
I am satisfied, bind me again, and fast,
My angry Bow will make too great a wast
Of beauty else, now call my Maskers in,
Call with a Song, and let the sports begin;
Call all my servants the effects of love,
And to a measure let them nobly move.
Come you servants of proud love,

Come away:

Fairly, nobly, gently move.
Too long, too long you make us stay;
Fancy, Desire, Delight, Hope, Fear,
Distrust and Jealousie, be you too here;
Consuming Care, and raging Ire,
And Poverty in poor attire,
March fairly in, and last Despair;
Now full Musick strike the Air.

Enter the Maskers, Fancy, Desire, Delight, Hope, Fear, Distrust, Jealousie, Care, Ire, Despair, they dance, after which Cupid speaks.

Cup. Away, I have done, the day begins to light,
Lovers, you know your fate, good night, good night.

Cupid and the Graces ascend in the Chariot.

King. Come to the Banquet, when that's ended Sir,
'le see you i' bed, and so good night; be merry,
You have a sweet bed fellow.

Val. I thank your Grace,

And ever shall be bound unto your noblenefs.

King. I pray I may deserve your thanks, set forward.

[Exeunt.]

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter divers Monks, Alphonso going to the Tomb, Rugio, and Frier Marco, discover the Tomb and a Chair.

Mar. THe night grows on, lead softly to the Tomb,
And sing not till I bid ye; let the Musick
Play gently as he passes.

Rug. O fair picture,

That wert the living hope of all our honours;
How are we banisht from the joy we dreamt of?
Will he ne're speak more?

Mar. 'Tis full three moneths Lord Rugio,
Since any articulate sound came from his tongue,
Set him down gently. Sits in a Chair.

Rug. What should the reason be Sir?

Mar. As 'tis in nature with those loving Husbands,
That sympathize their wives pains, and their throes
When they are breeding, and 'tis usuall too,
We have it by experience; so in him Sir,
In this most noble spirit that now suffers;
For when his honour'd Father good Brandino
Fell sick, he felt the griefs, and labour'd with them,
His fits and his disease he still inherited,
Grew the same thing, and had not nature check'd him,
Strength, and ability, he had dyed that hour too.

Rug. Embleme of noble love!

Mar. That very minute
His Fathers breath forfook him, that same instant,
A rare example of his piety,
And love paternal, the Organ of his tongue
Was never heard to sound again; so near death
He seeks to wait upon his worthy Father,
But that we force his meat, he were one body.

Rug. He points to'th' Tomb.

Mar. That is the place he honours,
A house I fear he will not be long out of.
He will toth' Tomb, good my Lord lend your hand;
Now sing the Funeral Song, and let him kneel,
For then he is pleas'd. A Song.

Rug. Heaven lend thy powerfull hand,
And ease this Prince.

Mar. He will pass back again. [Exeunt.]

Enter Valerio.

Val. They drink abundantly, I am hot with wine too,
Lustily warm, 'le steal now to my happiness,
'Tis midnight, and the silent hour invites me,
But she is up still, and attends the Queen;
Thou dew of wine and sleep hang on their eye-lids,
Steep their dull senses in the healths they drink,
That I may quickly find my lov'd Evanthe.
The King is merry too, and drank unto me,
Sign of fair peace, O this nights blessedness!
If I had forty heads I would give all for 't.
Is not the end of our ambitions,
Of all our humane studies, and our travels,
Of our desires, the obtaining of our wishes?
Certain it is, and there man makes his Center.
I have obtain'd Evanthe, I have married her,
Can any fortune keep me from enjoying her?

Enter Sorano.

I have my wish, what's left me to accuse now?
I am friends with all the world, but thy base malice;
Go glory in thy mischiefs thou proud man,
And cry it to the world thou hast ruin'd vertue;

How

How I contemn thee and thy petty malice!
And with what scorn, I look down on thy practice!

Sor. You'lsing me a new Song anon Valerio,
And with these hot words ———

Val. I despise thee fellow,
Thy threats, or flatteries, all I sling behind me;
I have my end, I have thy noble Sister,
A name too worthy of thy blood; I have married her,
And will enjoy her too.

Sor. 'Tis very likely.

Val. And that short moneth I have to blefs me with her
P'le make an age, P'le reckon each embrace
A year of pleasure, and each night a Jubile,
Every quick kifs a Spring; and when I mean
To lose my self in all delightfulness,
Twenty sweet Summers I will tye together
In spite of thee, and thy malignant Master:
I will dye old in love, though young in pleasure.

Sor. But that I hate thee deadly, I could pity thee,
Thou art the poorest miserable thing
This day on earth; P'le tell thee why Valerio,
All thou esteemeft, and build'ft upon for happiness,
For joy, for pleasure, for delight is past thee,
And like a wanton dream already vanisht.

Val. Is my love false?

Sor. No, she is constant to thee,
Constant to all thy misery she shall be,
And curse thee too.

Val. Is my strong body weakn'd,
Charim'd, or abus'd with subtle drink? speak villain.

Sor. Neither, I dare speak, thou art still as lusty
As when thou lov'dst her first, as strong and hopeful,
The month thou hast given thee is a month of misery,
And where thou think'ft each hour shall yield a pleasure,
Look for a killing pain, for thou shalt find it
Before thou dyest, each minute shall prepare it,
And ring so many knels to sad afflictions;
The King has given thee a long month to dye in,
And miserably dye.

Val. Undo thy Riddle,
I am prepar'd what ever fate shall follow.

Sor. Dost thou see this Ring?

Val. I know it too.

Sor. Then mark me,
By vertue of this Ring this I pronounce to thee,
'Tis the Kings will.

Val. Let me know it suddenly.

Sor. If thou dost offer to touch Euanthes body
Beyond a kifs, though thou art married to her,
And lawfully as thou think'ft may'ft enjoy her,
That minute she shall dye.

Val. O Devil ———

Sor. If thou discover this command unto her,
Or to a friend that shall importune thee;
And why thou abstainest, and from whose will, ye all perish,
Upon the self-same forfeit: are ye fitted Sir?
Now if ye love her, ye may preserve her life still,
If not, you know the worst, how falls your month out?

Val. This tyranny could never be invented
But in the school of Hell, Earth is too innocent;
Not to enjoy her when she is my wife?
When she is willing too?

Sor. She is most willing,

And will run mad to mis; but if you hit her,
Be sure you hit her home, and kill her with it;
There are such women that will dye with pleasure:
The Axe will follow else, that will not fail
To fetch her Maiden head, and dispatch her quickly;
Then shall the world know you are the cause of Murder,
And as 'tis requisite your life shall pay for't.

Val. Thou dost but jest, thou canst not be so monstrous
As thou proclaim'ft thy self; thou art her Brother,
And there must be a feeling heart within thee
Of her afflictions; wert thou a stranger to us,

And bred amongst wild rocks, thy nature wild too,
Affection in thee as thy breeding, cold,
And unrelenting as the rocks that nourisht thee,
Yet thou must shake to tell me this; they tremble
When the rude sea threatens divorce amongst 'em,
They that are senceless things shake at a tempest;
Thou art a man ———

Sor. Be thou too then, 'twill try thee,
And patience now will best become thy nobleness.

Val. Invent some other torment to afflict me,
All, if thou please, put all afflictions on me,
Study thy brains out for 'em, so this be none
I care not of what nature, nor what cruelty,
Nor of what length.

Sor. This is enough to vex ye.

Val. The tale of Tantalus is now prov'd true;
And from me shall be registred Authentick;
To have my joyes within my arms, and lawfull;
Mine own delights, yet dare not touch.
Even as thou hatest me Brother, let no young man know this,
As thou shalt hope for peace when thou most needest it,
Peace in thy soul, desire the King to kill me,
Make me a traitor, any thing, P'le yield to it,
And give thee cause so I may dye immediately;
Lock me in Prison where no Sun may see me,
In walls so thick no hope may e're come at me;
Keep me from meat, and drink, and sleep, P'le blefs thee;
Give me some damned potion to deliver me,
That I may never know my self again, forget
My Country, kindred, name and fortune; last,
That my chaste love may never appear before me,
This were some comfort.

Sor. All I have I have brought ye,
And much good may it do ye my dear Brother,
See ye observe it well; you will find about ye
Many eyes set, that shall o're-look your actions,
If you transgress ye know, and so I leave ye. [Exit.]

Val. Heaven be not angry, and I have some hope yet. [Exit.]

Enter Frederick, and Sorano.

Fred. Hast thou been with him?

Sor. Yes, and given him that Sir
Will make him curse his Birth; I told ye which way:
Did you but see him Sir, but look upon him,
With what a troubled and dejected nature
He walks now in a mist, with what a silence,
As if he were the shrowd he wrapt himself in,
And no more of Valerio but his shadow,
He seeks obscurity to hide his thoughts in,
You would wonder and admire for all you know it;
His jollity is down, valed to the ground Sir,
And his high hopes of full delights and pleasures
Are turn'd tormenters to him, strong diseases:

Fred. But is there hope of her?

Sor. It must fall necessary,
She must dislike him, quarrel with his person,
For women once deluded are next Devils,
And in the height of that opinion Sir,
You shall put on again, and she must meet ye.

Fred. I am glad of this.

Sor. P'le tell ye all the circumstance
Within this hour, but sure I heard your grace
To day as I attended, make some stops,
Some broken speechs, and some sighs between,
And then your Brothers name I heard distinctly,
And some sad wishes after.

Fred. Ye are i'th' right Sir,
I would he were as sad as I could wish him,
Sad as the Earth.

Sor. Would ye have it so?

Fred. Thou hearest me,
Though he be sick with small hope of recovery,
That hope still lives, and mens eyes live upon it,

And in their eye their wishes; my Sorano,
Were he but cold once in the tomb he dotes on,
As 'tis the fittest place for melancholy,
My Court should be another Paradise,
And flow with all delights.

Sor. Go to your pleasures, let me alone with this,
Hope shall not trouble ye, nor he three dayes.

Fred. I shall be bound unto thee.

Enter Valerio, Camillo, Cleanthes, Menallo.

Sor. I'll do it neatly too, no doubt shall catch me. (Em.

Fred. Be gone, they are going to bed, I'll bid good night to

Sor. And mark the man, you'll scarce know 'tis Valerio.
[Exit.

Cam. Cheer up my noble Lord, the minute's come,
You shall enjoy the abstract of all sweetness,
We did you wrong, you need no wine to warm ye,
Desire shoots through your eyes like sudden wild-fires.

Val. Beshrew me Lords, the wine has made me dull,
I am I know not what.

Fred. Good pleasure to ye,
Good night and long too, as you find your appetite
You may fall to.

Val. I do beseech your grace,
For which of all my loves and services
Have I deserved this?

Fred. I am not bound to answer ye.

Val. Nor I bound to obey in unjust actions.

Fred. Do as you please, you know the penalty,
And as I have a soul it shall be executed;
Nay look not pale, I am not used to fear Sir,
If you respect your Lady, good night to ye.

Val. But for respect to her and to my duty,
That reverent duty that I owe my Soveragin,
Which anger has no power to snatch me from,
The good night should be thine; good night for ever.
The King is wanton Lords, he would needs know of me
How many nick chafes I would make to night.

Men. My Lord, no doubt you'll prove a perfect gamester.

Val. Faith no, I am unacquainted with the pleasure,
Bungle a set I may: how my heart trembles,
And beats my breast as it would break his way out!
Good night my noble friends.

Cle. Nay we must see you toward your bed my Lord.

Val. Good faith it needs not,
'Tis late, and I shall trouble you.

Cam. No, no, till the Bride come Sir.

Val. I beseech you leave me,
You will make me bashfull else, I am so foolish,
Besides, I have some few devotions Lords,
And he that can pray with such a book in's arms— (ye.

Cam. We'll leave ye then, and a sweet night wait upon

Men. And a sweet issue of this sweet night crown ye.

Cle. All nights and days be such till you grow old Sir.
[Exit Lords.

Val. I thank ye, 'tis a curse sufficient for me,
A labour'd one too, though you mean a blessing.
What shall I do? I am like a wretched Debtor,
That has a summe to tender on the forfeit
Of all he is worth, yet dare not offer it.
Other men see the Sun, yet I must wink at it;
And though I know 'tis perfect day, deny it:
My veins are all on fire, and burn like Aina,
Youth and desire beat larums to my blood,
And adde fresh fuel to my warm affections.
I must enjoy her, yet when I consider,
When I collect my self, and weigh her danger,
The tyrants will, and his power taught to murder,
My tender care contralls my blood within me,
And like a cold fit of a peevish Ague
Creeps to my soul, and flings an Ice upon me,

Enter Queen, Evanthe, Ladies, and Fool.

That locks all powers of youth up: but prevention--

O what a blessedness 'twere to be old now,
To be unable, bed-rid with diseases,
Or halt on Crutches to meet holy Hymen;
What a rare benefit! but I am curst,
That that speaks other men most freely happy,
And makes all eyes hang on their expectations,
Must prove the bane of me, youth, and ability.
She comes to bed, how shall I entertain her?

Tony. Nay I come after too, take the fool with ye,
For lightly he is ever one at Weddings.

Queen. Evanthe, make ye unready, your Lord staies for ye,
And prethee be merry.

Tony. Be very merry, Chicken,
Thy Lord will pipe to thee anon, and make thee dance too.

Lady. Will he so, good-man afs?

Tony. Yes good filly,
And you had such a Pipe, that piped so sweetly, (pace.
You would dance to death, you have learnt your sinque a

Evan. Your grace desires that that is too free in me,
I am merry at the heart.

Tony. Thou wilt be anon, the young smug boy will give (thee a sweet cordial.

Evan. I am so taken up in all my thoughts,
So posselt Madam with the lawfull sweets
I shall this night partake of with my Lord,
So far transported (pardon my immodesty.)

Val. Alas poor wench, how shall I recompence thee?

Evan. That though they must be short, and snatcht away
E're they grow ripe, yet I shall far prefer 'em (too,
Before a tedious pleasure with repentance.

Val. O how my heart akes!

Evan. Take off my Jewels Ladies;
And let my Ruff loose, I shall bid good night to ye,
My Lord staies here.

Queen. My wench, I thank thee heartily,
For learning how to use thy few hours handsomly,
They will be years I hope; off with your Gown now,
Lay down the bed there?

Tony. Shall I get into it and warm it for thee? a fools fire
And I'll so bus thee. (is a fine thing,

Queen. I'll have ye whipt ye Rascal.

Tony. That will provoke me more, I'll talk with thy hus-
He's a wife man I hope. (band,

Evan. Good night dear Madam,
Ladies, no further service, I am well,
I do beseech your grace to give us this leave,
My Lord and I to one another freely,
And privately, may do all other Ceremonies,
Women and Page we'll be to one another,
And trouble you no farther.

Tony. Art thou a wife man?

Val. I cannot tell thee Tony, ask my neighbours.

Tony. If thou beest so, go'ye with me to night,
The old fool will lye quieter than the young one,
And give thee more sleep, thou wilt look to morrow else
Worse than the prodigal fool the Ballad speaks of,
That was squeez'd through a horn.

Val. I shall take thy counsel.

Queen. Why then good night, good night my best Evan-
My worthy maid, and as that name shall vanish, (the,
A worthy wife, a long and happy; follow Sirrah.

Evan. That shall be my care,
Goodness rest with your Grace.

Queen. Be lusty Lord, and take your Lady to ye,
And that power that shall part ye be unhappy.

Val. Sweet rest unto ye, to ye all sweet Ladies;
Tony good night.

Tony. Shall not the fool stay with thee?

Queen. Come away Sirrah. [Exit Queen, Ladies.

Tony. How the fool is sought for! sweet Malt is made of (ealie fire,
A hasty horse will quickly tire, a sudden leaper sticks i'th' (mire,
Phlebotomy

Phlebotomy and the word lye nigher, take heed of friend I (thee require;
This from an Almanack I stole, and learn this Lesson from a (fool.
Good night my Bird. [Exit Tony.

Evant. Good night wife Master Tony;
Will ye to bed my Lord? Come, let me helpe ye.
Val. To bed Evanthe, art thou sleepy?
Evant. No, I shall be worse if you look sad upon me,
Pray ye let's to bed.
Val. I am not well my love.
Evant. I'll make ye well, there's no such Physick for ye
As your warm Mistris arms.
Val. Art thou so cunning?
Evant. I speak not by experience, 'pray ye mistake not;
But if you love me ———
Val. I do love so dearly,
So much above the base bent of desire,
I know not how to answer thee.

Evant. To bed then,
There I shall better credit ye; fie my Lord,
Will ye put a maid to't, to teach ye what to do?
An innocent maid? Are ye so cold a Lover?
In truth you make me blush, 'tis midnight too,
And 'tis no stoln love, but authorised openly,
No sin we covet, pray let me undress ye,
You shall help me; prethee sweet Valerio;
Be not so sad, the King will be more mercifull.
Val. May not I love thy mind?
Evant. And I yours too,
'Tis a most noble one, adorn'd with vertue;
But if we love not one another really,
And put our bodies and our mind together,
And so make up the concord of affection,
Our love will prove but a blind superstition:
This is no school to argue in my Lord,
Nor have we time to talk away allow'd us,
Pray let's dispatch, if any one should come
And find us at this distance, what would they think?
Come, kiss me and to bed.

Val. That I dare do, and kiss again.
Evant. Spare not, they are your own Sir.
Val. But to enjoy thee is to be luxurious;
Too sensuall in my love, and too ambitious;
O how I burn! to pluck thee from the stalk,
Where thou grow'st a sweet bud and a beauteous,
And best the prime and honour of the Garden,
Is but to violate thy spring, and spoil thee.

Evant. To let me blow, and fall alone would anger ye.
Val. Let's sit together thus, and as we sit

Feed on the sweets of one anothers souls,
The happiness of love is contemplation,
The blessedness of love is pure affection,
Where no allay of actual dull desires,
Of pleasure that partakes with wantonness,
Of humane fire that burns out as it kindles,
And leaves the body but a poor repentance,
Can ever mix, let's fix on that Evanthe,
That's everlasting, the tother casuall;
Eternity breeds one, the other fortune,
Blind as her self, and full of all afflictions.
Shall we love vertuously?

Evant. I ever loved so.
Val. And only think our love; the rarest pleasure,
And that we most desire, let it be humane,
If once enjoyed grows stale, and cloyes our appetites;
I would not lessen in my love for any thing,
Nor find thee but the same in my short journey,
For my loves safety.

Evant. Now I see I am old Sir,
Old and ill favour'd too, poor and despis'd,
And am not worth your noble Fellowship,
Your fellowship in Love, you would not else
Thus cunningly seek to betray a maid,

A maid that honours you thus piously;
Strive to abuse the pious love she brings ye.
Farewel my Lord, since ye have a better Mistris,
For it must seem so, or ye are no man,
A younger, happier, I shall give her room,
So much I love ye still.

Val. Stay my Evanthe,
Heaven bear me witness, thou art all I love,
All I desire, and now have pity on me,
I never lyed before; forgive me Justice,
Youth and affection stop your ears unto me.

Evant. Why do you weep? if I have spoke too harshly,
And unbefecming, my beloved Lord,
My care and duty, pardon me.

Val. O hear me,
Hear me Evanthe; I am all on torture,
And this lye tears my conscience as I vent it;
I am no man.

Evant. How Sir?

Val. No man for pleasure, no womans man.

Eva. Goodness forbid my Lord, sure you abuse your self.

Val. 'Tis true Evanthe;

I shame to say you will find it.

Weeps.

Evant. He weeps bitterly,
'Tis my hard fortune, bless all young maids from it;
Is there no help my Lord in art will comfort ye?

Val. I hope there is.

Evant. How long have you been destitute?

Val. Since I was young.

Evant. 'Tis hard to dye for nothing,
Now you shall know 'tis not the pleasure Sir,
(For I am compell'd to love you spiritually)
That women aim at, I affect ye for,
'Tis for your worth; and kiss me, be at peace,
Because I ever loved ye, I still honour ye,
And with all duty to my Husband follow ye;
Will ye to bed now? ye are asham'd it seems;
Pygmalion pray'd and his cold stone took life,
You do not know with what zeal I shall ask Sir,
And what rare miracle that may work upon ye;
Still blush? prescribe your Law.

Val. I prethee pardon me,
To bed, and I'll sit by thee, and mourn with thee,
Mourn both our fortunes, our unhappy ones:
Do not despise me, make me not more wretched,
I pray to Heaven when I am gone Evanthe,
As my poor date is but a span of time now,
To recompence thy noble patience,
Thy love and vertue with a fruitfull husband,
Honest and honourable.

Evant. Come, you have made me weep now,
All fond desire dye here, and welcom chastity,
Honour and chastity, do what you please Sir. [Exit.

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter at one door Rugio, and Frier Marco, at the other door Sorano, with a little glass viol.

Rug. WHat ails this piece of mischief to look sad?
He seems to weep too.

Mar. Something is a hatching,
And of some bloody nature too, Lord Rugio,
This Crocodile mourns thus cunningly.

Sor. Hail holy Father,
And good day to the good Lord Rugio,
How fares the sad Prince I beseech ye Sir?

Rug. 'Tis like you know, you need not ask that question,
You have your eyes and watches on his miseries
As near as ours, I would they were as tender.

Mar. Can you do him good? as the King and you appoin-
So he is still, as you desir'd I think too, (ted him,

For every day he is worse (Heaven pardon all)
 Putoff your sorrow, you may laugh now Lord,
 He cannot last long to disturb your Master,
 You have done worthy service to his Brother,
 And he most memorable love.

Sor. You do not know Sir
 With what remorse I ask, nor with what weariness
 I groan and bow under this load of honour,
 And how my soul sighs for the beastly services,
 I have done his pleasures, these be witnesses with me,
 And from your piety believe me Father,
 I would as willingly unclothe my self
 Of title, that becomes me not I know ;
 Good men, and great names best agree together ;
 Cast off the glorious favours, and the trappings
 Of sound and honour, wealth and promises,
 His wanton pleasures have slung on my weakness,
 And chuse to serve my countries cause and virtues,
 Poorly and honestly, and redeem my ruines,
 As I would hope remission of my mischiefs.

Rug. Old and experienc'd men, my Lord Sorano,
 Are not so quickly caught with gilt hypocrisie,
 You pull your claws in now and fawn upon us,
 As lions do to intice poor foolish beasts ;
 And beasts we should be too if we believ'd ye,
 Go exercise your Art.

Sor. For Heaven sake scorn me not,
 Nor adde more Hell to my afflicted soul
 Than I feel here ; as you are honourable,
 As you are charitable look gently on me,
 I will no more to Court, be no more Devil,
 I know I must be hated even of him
 That was my Love now, and the more he loves me
 For his foul ends, when they shall once appear to him,
 Muster before his conscience and accuse him,
 The fouler and the more falls his displeasure,
 Princes are fading things, so are their favours. (morse.

Mar. He weeps again, his heart is toucht sure with re-

Sor. See this, and give me fair attention good my Lord,
 And worthy Father see, within this viol
 The remedy and cure of all my honour,
 And of the sad Prince lyes.

Rug. What new trick's this ?

Sor. 'Tis true, I have done Offices abundantly
 Ill and prodigious to the Prince Alphonso,
 And whilst I was a knave I sought his death too.

Rug. You are too late convicted to be good yet.

Sor. But Father, when I felt this part afflict me,
 This inward part, and call'd me to an audit
 Of my misdeeds and mischiefs ———

Mar. Well, go on Sir.

Sor. O then, then, then what was my glory then Father ?
 The favour of the King, what did that ease me ?
 What was it to be bow'd to by all creatures ?
 Worship, and courted, what did this avail me ?
 I was a wretch, a poor lost wretch.

Mar. Still better.

Sor. Till in the midst of all my grief I found
 Repentance, and a learned man to give the means to it,
 A Jew, an honest and a rare Physician,
 Of him I had this Jewel ; 'tis a Jewel,
 And at the price of all my wealth I bought it :
 If the King knew it I must lose my head,
 And willingly, most willingly I would suffer,
 A child may take it, 'tis so sweet in working.

Mar. To whom would you apply it ?

Sor. To the sick Prince,
 It will in half a day dissolve his melancholy.

Rug. I do believe, and give him sleep for ever.
 What impudence is this, and what base malice,
 To make us instruments of thy abuses ?
 Are we set here to poison him ?

Sor. Mistake not, yet I must needs say, 'tis a noble care,
 And worthy vertuous servants ; if you will see

A flourishing estate again in Naples,
 And great Alphonso reign that's truly good,
 And like himself able to make all excellent ;
 Give him this drink, and this good health unto him. Drinks.
 I am not so desperate yet to kill my self,
 Never look on me as a guilty man,
 Nor on the water as a speedy poison :
 I am not mad, nor laid out all my treasure,
 My conscience and my credit to abuse ye ;
 How nimbly and how chearfully it works now
 Upon my heart and head ! sure I am a new man,
 There is no sadness that I feel within me,
 But as it meets it, like a lazic vapour
 How it flies off. Here, give it him with speed,
 You are more guilty than I ever was,
 And worthier of the name of evil subjects,
 If but an hour you hold this from his health.

Rug. 'Tis some rare vertuous thing sure, he is a good man,
 It must be so, come, let's apply it presently,
 And may it sweetly work.

Sor. Pray let me hear on't, and carry it close my Lords.

Mar. Yes, good Sorano. [Ex. Rugio, Marco.

Sor. Do my good fools, my honest pious coxcombs,
 My wary fools too : have I caught your wifedom's ?
 You never dream't I knew an Antidote,
 Nor how to take it to secure mine own life ;
 I am an Ass, go, give him the fine cordial,
 And when you have done go dig his grave, good Frier,
 Some two hours hence we shall have such a bawling,
 And roaring up and down for Aqua vita,
 Such rubbing, and such nointing, and such cooling,
 I have sent him that will make a bonfire in's belly,
 If he recover it, there is no heat in Hell sure. [Exit.

Enter Frederick, and Podrano.

Fred. Podrano ? Pod. Sir.

Fred. Call hither Lord Valerio, and let none trouble us.

Pod. It shall be done Sir. [Exit.

Fred. I know he wants no additions to his tortures,
 He has enough for humane blood to carry,
 Yet I must vex him further ;
 So many that I wonder his hot youth
 And high-bred spirit breaks not into fury ;
 I must yet torture him a little further,
 And make my self sport with his miseries,
 My anger is too poor else. Here he comes,

Enter Val.

Now my young married Lord, how do you feel your self ?
 You have the happiness you ever aim'd at,
 The joy and pleasure.

Val. Would you had the like Sir.

Fred. You tumble in delights with your sweet Lady,
 And draw the minutes out in dear embraces,
 You live a right Lords life.

Val. Would you had tryed it,
 That you might know the vertue but to suffer,
 Your anger though it be unjust and insolent,
 Sits handsomer upon you than your scorn,
 To do a wilfull ill and glory in it,
 Is to do it double, double to be damn'd too.

Fred. Hast thou not found a loving and free Prince,
 High in his favours too ; that has confer'd
 Such hearts ease, and such heaps of comfort on thee,
 All thou cou'dst ask ?

Val. You are grown a tyrant too
 Upon so suffering, and so still a subject ;
 You have put upon me such a punishment,
 That if your youth were honest it would blush at :
 But you are a shame to nature, as to vertue.
 Pull not my rage upon ye, 'tis so just,
 It will give way to no respect ; my life,
 My innocent life, I dare maintain it Sir,
 Like a wanton prodigal you have slung away,
 Had I a thousand more I would allow 'em,

And be as careles of 'em as your will is ;
But to deny those rights the Law hath given me,
The holy Law, and make her life the penance,
Is such a studied and unheard of malice,
No heart that is not hired from Hell dare think of ;
To do it then too, when my hopes were high,
High as my Blood, all my desires upon me,
My free affections ready to embrace her,

Enter Cassandra.

And she mine own ; do you smile at this ? is't done well ?
Is there not Heaven above you that sees all ? [Exit Val.]

Fred. Come hither Time, how does your noble Mistress ?

Cas. As a Gentlewoman may do in her case that's newly married, Sir :

Sickly sometimes, and fond on't, like your Majesty.

Fred. She is breeding then ?

Cas. She wants much of her colour,
And has her qualms as Ladies use to have, Sir,
And her disgusts.

Fred. And keeps her Chamber ?

Cas. Yes Sir.

Fred. And eats good Broths and Jellies.

Cas. I am sure she sighs, Sir, and weeps, good Lady.

Fred. Alas, good Lady, for it,
She should have one could comfort her, Cassandra,
Could turn those tears to joys, a lusty Comforter.

Cas. A comfortable man does well at all hours,
For he brings comfortable things. (eaten Onions,

Fred. Come hither, & hold your fann between, you have
Her breath stinks like a Fox, her teeth are contagious,
These old women are all Elder-Pipes, do ye mark me ?

[Gives a Purse.]

Cas. Yes, Sir, but does your Grace think I am fit, . . .
That am both old and vertuous ?

Fred. Therefore the fitter, the older still the better,
I know thou art as holy as an old Cope,
Yet upon necessary use —

Cas. 'Tis true, Sir.

Fred. Her feeling sense is fierce still, speak unto her,
You are familiar ; speak I say, unto her,
Speak to the purpose ; tell her this, and this.

Cas. Alas, she is honest, Sir, she is very honest,
And would you have my gravity —

Fred. I, I, your gravity will become the cause the better,
I'll look thee out a Knight shall make thee a Lady too,
A lusty Knight, and one that shall be ruled by thee,
And add to these, I'll make 'em good, no mincing,
Nor ducking out of nicety, good Lady,
But do it home, we'll all be friends too, tell her,
And such a joy —

Cas. That's it that stirs me up, Sir,
I would not for the World attempt her Chastity,
But that they may live lovingly hereafter.

Fred. For that I urge it too. (good, Sir,

Cas. A little evil may well be suffered for a general
I'll take my leave of your Majesty. [Exit.]

Enter Valerio.

Fred. Go fortunately, be speedy too: here comes Valerio,
If his affliction have allayed his spirit
My work has end. Come hither, Lord Valerio,
How do you now ?

Val. Your Majesty may guess,
Not so well, nor so fortunate as you are,
That can tie up mens honest wills, and actions.

Fred. You clearly see now, brave Valerio,
What 'tis to be the Rival to a Prince,
To interpose against a raging Lion ;
I know you have suffer'd, infinitely suffer'd,
And with a kind of pity I behold it,
And if you dare be worthy of my mercy,
I can yet heal you, yield up your Evantbe,
Take off my sentence also.

Val. I fall thus low, Sir,
My poor sad heart under your feet I lay,
And all the service of my life.

Fred. Do this then, for without this 'twill be impossible,
Part with her for a while.

Val. You have parted us,
What should I do with that I cannot use Sir ?

Fred. 'Tis well consider'd, let me have the Lady,
And thou shalt see how nobly I'll befriend thee,
How all this difference —

Val. Will she come do you think, Sir ?

Fred. She must be wrought, I know she is too modest,
And gently wrought, and cunningly.

Val. 'Tis fit, Sir.

Fred. And secretly it must be done.

Val. As thought.

Fred. I'll warrant ye her honour shall be fair still,
No soil nor stain shall appear on that, Valerio,
You see a thousand that bear sober faces,
And shew of as inimitable modesties ;
You would be sworn too that they were pure Matrons,
And most chaste maids : and yet to augment their fortunes,
And get them noble friends —

Val. They are content, Sir,
In private to bestow their Beauties on 'em. (for't,

Fred. They are so, and they are wise, they know no want
Nor no eye sees they want their honesties.

Val. If it might be carried thus.

Fred. It shall be, Sir.

Val. I'll see you dead first, with this caution,
Why, sure I think it might be done.

Fred. Yes, easily.

Val. For what time would your Grace desire her Body ?

Fred. A month or two, it shall be carried still
As if she kept with you, and were a stranger,
Rather a hater of the grace I offer ;
And then I will return her with such honour —

Val. 'Tis very like I dote much on your Honour.

Fred. And load her with such favour too, Valerio —

Val. She never shall claw off ? I humbly thank ye.

Fred. I'll make ye both the happiest, and the richest,
And the mightiest too —

Val. But who shall work her, Sir ?
For on my Conscience she is very honest,
And will be hard to cut as a rough Diamond. (tongue,

Fred. Why, you must work her, any thing from your Set off with golden, and perswasive Language,
Urging your dangers too.

Val. But all thistime

Have you the conscience, Sir, to leave me nothing,
Nothing to play withal ?

Fred. There be a thousand, take where thou wilt.

Val. May I make bold with your Queen,
She is useles to your Grace, as it appears, Sir,
And but a loyal Wife that may be lost too ;
I have a mind to her, and then 'tis equal ?

Fred. How, Sir ?

Val. 'Tis so, Sir, thou most glorious impudence,
Have I not wrongs enow to suffer under,
But thou must pick me out to make a Monster ?
A hated Wonder to the World ? Do you start
At my intrenching on your private liberty,
And would you force a high-way through mine honour,
And make me pave it too ? But that thy Queen
Is of that excellent honesty,
And guarded with Divinity about her,
No loose thought can come near, nor flame unhallowed,
I would so right my self.

Fred. Why, take her to ye,
I am not vex'd at this, thou shalt enjoy her,
I'll be thy friend if that may win thy courtesie.

Val. I will not be your Bawd, though for your Royalty.
Was I brought up, and nourish'd in the Court,
With thy most Royal Brother, and thy self,

Upon thy Fathers charge, thy happy Fathers,
And suckt the sweetness of all humane arts,
Learn'd Arms and Honour, to become a Rascal;
Was this the expectation of my Youth,
My growth of Honour? Do you speak this truly,
Or do you try me, Sir? for I believe not,
At least I would not, and methinks 'tis impossible
There should be such a Devil in a Kings shape,
Such a malignant Fiend.

Fred. I thank ye, Sir,
To-morrow is your last day, and look to it,
Get from my sight, away.

Val. Ye are— Oh, my heart's too high and full to think (upon ye.
[Exeunt.

Enter Evanthe, and Cassandra.

Evan. You think it fit then, mortified Cassandra,
That I should be a Whore?

Caf. Why a Whore, Madam?
If every Woman that upon necessity
Did a good turn, for there's the main point, mark it,
Were term'd a Whore, who would be honest, Madam?
Your Lords life, and your own are now in hazard,
Two precious lives may be redeem'd with nothing,
Little or nothing; say an hours or days sport,
Or such a toy, the end to it is wantonness.
(That we call lust that maidens lose their fame for)
But a compell'd necessity of honour,
Fair as the day, and clear as innocence,
Upon my life and conscience, a direct way——

Evan. To be a Rascal.

Caf. 'Tis a kind of Rape too,
That keeps you clear, for where your will's compell'd
Though you yield up your Body you are safe still.

Evan. Thou art grown a learned Bawd, I ever look'd
Thy great sufficiency would break out.

Caf. You may,
You that are young, and fair scorn us old Creatures,
But you must know my years, ere you be wife, Lady,
And my experience too; say the King loved ye?
Say it were nothing else?

Evan. I, marry wench, now thou comest to me.

Caf. Do you think Princes favours are such sleight things,
To sling away when you please? there be young Ladies
Both fair and honourable, that would leap to reach 'em,
And leap aloft too.

Evan. Such are light enough;
I am no Vaultcr, Wench, but canst thou tell me,
Though he be a King, whether he be found or no?
I would not give my Youth up to infection.

Caf. As found as honour ought to be, I think, Lady;
Go to, be wise, I do not bid you try him;
But if he love you well, and you neglect him,
Your Lords life hanging on the hazard of it,
If you be so wilful proud.

Evan. Thou speakest to the point still; (woman?)
But when I have lain with him, what am I then, Gentle-

Caf. What are you? why, the same you are now, a wo- (man,
A virtuous Woman, and a noble Woman,
Touching at what is noble, you become so.
Had Lucrece e'r been thought of but for Tarquin?
She was before a simple unknown Woman,
When she was ravish'd, she was a reverend Saint;
And do you think she yielded not a little?
And had a kind of will to have been re-ravish'd?
Believe it, yes: there are a thousand stories
Of wondrous loyal Women, that have slipt,
But it has been on the ice of tender honour,
That kept 'em cool till to the World. I think you are blest,
If at have such an occasion in your hands to beget a Chro-
A faithful one. (nicle,

Evan. It must needs be much honour.

Caf. As you may make it, infinite, and safe too,

And when 'tis done, your Lord and you may live
So quietly, and peaceably together,
And be what you please.

Evan. But suppose this, Wench,
The King should so delight me with his Company,
I should forget my Lord, and no more look on him.

Caf. That's the main hazard, for I tell you truly,
I have heard report speak he is an infinite pleasure,
Almost above belief; there be some Ladies,
And modest to the world too, wondrous modest,
That have had the blessedness to try his body,
That I have heard proclaim him a new Hercules.

Evan. So strongly able?

Caf. There will be the danger,
You being but a young and tender Lady,
Although your mind be good, yet your weak Body,
At first encounter too, to meet with one
Of his unconquer'd strength.

Evan. Peace, thou rude Bawd,
Thou studied old corruptness, tye thy tongue up,
Your hired base tongue; is this your timely counsel?
Dost thou seek to make me dote on wickedness?
Because 'tis ten times worse than thou deliver'st it?
To be a Whore, because he has sufficiency
To make a hundred? O thou impudence!
Have I reliev'd thy Age to mine own ruine?
And worn thee in my Bosome, to betray me?
Can years and impotence win nothing on thee
That's good and honest, but thou must go on still?
And where thy blood wants heat to sin thy self,
Force thy decrepit will to make me wicked?

Caf. I did but tell ye.

Evan. What the damnedst Woman,
The cunning'st and the skilfull'st Bawd comes short of;
If thou hadst liv'd ten Ages to be damn'd in,
And exercis'd this Art the Devil taught thee,
Thou could'st not have express'd it more exactly.

Caf. I did not bid you sin.

Evan. Thou woo'd'st me to it,
Thou that art fit for Prayer and the Grave,
Thy Body Earth already, and Corruption,
Thou taught'st the way; go follow your fine function,
There are houses of delight, that want good Matrons,
Such grave Instructors, get thee thither, Monster,
And read variety of sins to wantons,
And when they roar with pains, learn to make plaisters.

Caf. This we have for our good wills.

Evan. If e'r I see thee more,
Or any thing that's like thee, to affright me,
By this fair light I'll spoil thy Bawdery,
I'll leave thee neither Eyes nor Nose to grace thee.
When thou wantest Bread, and common pity towards thee,

Enter Frederick.

And art a starving in a Ditch, think of me,
Then dye, and let the wandring Bawds lament thee;
Be gone, I charge thee leave me.

Caf. You'll repent this.

Fred. She's angry, and t'other crying too, my suit's cold.
I'll make your heart ake, stubborn Wench, for this;
Turn not so angry from me, I will speak to you,
Are you grown proud with your delight, good Lady,
So pamper'd with your sport you scorn to know me?

Evan. I scorn ye not, I would you scorn'd not me, Sir,
And forc't me to be weary of my duty,
I know your Grace, would I had never seen ye.

Fred. Because I love you, because I dote upon ye,
Because I am a man that seek to please ye.

Evan. I have man enough already to content me,
As much, as noble, and as worthy of me,
As all the World can yield.

Fred. That's but your modesty,
You have no man, nay never look upon me,

I know

I know it, Lady, no man to content ye,
No man that can, or at the least, that dares,
Which is a poorer man, and nearer nothing.

Evan. Be nobler, Sir, inform'd.

Fred. I'll tell thee, Wench,
The poor condition of this poorer fellow,
And make thee blush for shame at thine own error,
He never tendred yet a husbands duty,
To thy warm longing bed.

Evan. How should he know that?

Fred. I am sure he did not, for I charg'd him no,
Upon his life I charg'd him, but to try him;
Could any brave or noble spirit stop here?
Was life to be preferr'd before affection?
Lawful and long'd for too?

Evan. Did you command him?

Fred. I did in policy to try his spirit.

Evan. And could he be so dead cold to observe it?
Brought I no beauty, nor no love along with me?

Fred. Why, that is it that makes me scorn to name him.
I should have lov'd him if he had ventur'd for't,
Nay, doted on his bravery.

Evan. Only charg'd?

And with that spell sit down? dare men fight bravely
For poor slight things, for drink, or ostentation?
And there indanger both their lives and fortunes,
And for their lawful loves fly off with fear? (thee?)

Fred. 'Tis true, and with a cunning base fear too to abuse
Made thee believe, poor innocent Evanthe,
Wretched young Girl, it was his impotency;
Was it not so? deny it. (young man!)

Evan. O my anger! at my years to be cozen'd with a

Fred. A strong man too, certain he lov'd ye dearly.

Evan. To have my shame and love mingled together,
And both slung on me like a weight to sink me,
I would have dyed a thousand times.

Fred. So would any,
Any that had the spirit of a man;
I would have been kill'd in your arms.

Evan. I would he had been,
And buried in mine arms, that had been noble,
And what a monument would I have made him?
Upon this breast he should have slept in peace,
Honour, and everlasting love his mourners;
And I still weeping till old time had turn'd me,
And pitying powers above into pure crystal.

Fred. Hadst thou lov'd me, and had my way been stuck
With deaths, as thick as frosty nights with stars,
I would have ventur'd. (Coward.)

Evan. Sure there is some trick in't: Valerio ne'r was

Fred. Worse than this too,
Tamer, and seasoning of a baser nature,
He set your woman on ye to betray ye,
Your bawdy woman, or your sin solicitor;
I pray but think what this man may deserve now,
I know he did, and did it to please me too.

Evan. Good Sir afflict me not too fast, I feel
I am a woman, and a wrong'd one too,
And sensible I am of my abuses,
Sir, you have loved me. (upon thy person.)

Fred. And I love thee still, pity thy wrongs, and dote

Evan. To set my woman on me 'twas too base, Sir.

Fred. Abominable vile.

Evan. But I shall fit him.

Fred. All reason and all Law allows it to ye,
And ye are a fool, a tame fool, if you spare him.

Evan. You may speak now, and happily prevail too,
And I beseech your Grace be angry with me.

Fred. I am at heart. She staggers in her faith,
And will fall off I hope, I'll ply her still.
Thou abused innocence, I suffer with thee,
If I should give him life, he would still betray thee;
That fool that fears to dye for such a Beauty,
Would for the same fear sell thee unto misery.

I do not say he would have been Bawd himself too.

Evan. Follow'd thus far? nay then I smell the malice,
It tastes too hot of practis'd wickedness,
There can be no such man, I am sure no Gentleman;
Shall my anger make me whore, and not my pleasure?
My sudden inconsiderate rage abuse me?

Come home again, my frightened faith, my virtue,
Home to my heart again; he be a Bawd too?

Fred. I will not say he offered fair Evanthe.

Evan. Nor do not dare, 'twill be an impudence,
And not an honour for a Prince to lye;
Fye, Sir, a person of your rank to trifle,
I know you do lye.

Fred. How?

(but one day,

Evan. Lye shamefully, and I could wish my self a man
To tell you openly you lye too basely.

Fred. Take heed, wild fool.

Evan. Take thou heed, thou tame Devil,
Thou all Pandora's Box in a Kings figure,
Thou hast almost whor'd my weak belief already,
And like an Engineer blown up mine honour;
But I shall countermine, and catch your mischief,
This little Fort you seek, I shall man nobly,
And strongly too, with chaste obedience
To my dear Lord, with vertuous thoughts that scorn ye.
Victorious Thomyris ne'r won more honour
In cutting off the Royal head of Cyrus,
Than I shall do in conquering thee; farewell,
And if thou canst be wise, learn to be good too.
'Twill give thee nobler lights than both thine eyes do;
My poor Lord and my self are bound to suffer,
And when I see him faint under your sentence,
I'll tell ye more, it may be then I'll yield too.

Fred. Fool unexampled, shall my anger follow thee?

[Exeunt.]

Enter Rugio, and Fryar Marco, amazed.

Rugio. Curse on our sights, our fond credulities,
A thousand curses on the Slave that cheated us,
The damn'd Slave.

Mar. We have e'n sham'd our service,
Brought our best care and loyalties to nothing,
'Tis the most fearful poyson, the most potent,
Heaven give him patience; Oh it works most strongly,
And tears him, Lord.

Rug. That we should be so stupid
To trust the arrant'st Villain that e'r flatter'd,
The bloodiest too, to believe a few soft words from him,
And give way to his prepar'd tears.

Within, Alphonso. Oh, Oh, Oh.

Rug. Hark, Fryar Marco, hark, the poor Prince, that we should be such Block-heads,
As to be taken with his drinking first! (for't;
And never think what Antidotes are made for!
Two wooden sculls we have, and we deserve to be hang'd
For certainly it will be laid to our charge;
As certain too, it will dispatch him speedily,
Which way to turn, or what to——

Mar. Let's pray, Heavens hand is strong.

Rug. The poyson's strong, you would say.

Enter Alphonso, carried on a Couch by two Fryars.

Would any thing—— He comes, let's give him comfort.

Alph. Give me more air, air, more air, blow, blow,
Open thou Eastern Gate, and blow upon me,
Distill thy cold dews, O thou icy Moon,
And Rivers run through my afflicted spirit.
I am all fire, fire, fire, the raging dog star
Reigns in my blood, Oh which way shall I turn me?
Aetna, and all his flames burn in my head,
Fling me into the Ocean or I perish;

Dig, dig, dig, till the Springs fly up,
The cold, cold Springs, that I may leap into 'em,
And bathe my scorcht Limbs in their purling Pleasures.

Or

Or shoot me up into the higher Region,
Where treasures of delicious Snow are nourisht,
And Banquets of sweet Hail.

Rug. Hold him fast Fryer, O how he burns!

Alph. What will ye sacrifice me?
Upon the Altar lay my willing body,
And pile your Wood up, fling your holy incense;
And as I turn me you shall see all flame,
Consuming flame, stand off me, or you are ashes.

Barb. Most miserable wretches.

Alph. Bring hither Charity
And let me hug her, Fryer, they say she's cold,
Infinite cold Devotion cannot warm her;
Draw me a river of false lovers tears
Clean through my breast, they are dull, cold, and forgetful,
And will give ease, let Virgins sigh upon me,
Forfaken souls, the sighs are precious,
Let them all sigh: Oh hell, hell, hell, Oh horror.

Mar. To bed, good Sir.

Alph. My bed will burn about me,
Like Phaeton, in all consuming flames
I am inclosed, let me fly, let me fly, give room;
Betwixt the cold Bear, and the raging Lyon
Lyes my safe way; O for a cake of Ice now,
To clap unto my heart to comfort me;
Decrepit Winter hang upon my shoulders,
And let me wear thy frozen Isicles
Like Jewels round about my head, to cool me;
My eyes burn out, and sink into their sockets,
And my infected brain like brimstone boils,
I live in Hell, and several furies vex me;
O carry me where no Sun ever shew'd yet
A face of comfort, where the earth is Crystal,
Never to be dissolv'd, where naught inhabits
But night and cold, and nipping frosts, and winds
That cut the stubborn rocks and make them shiver;
Set me there friends. (he has?)

Rug. Hold fast, he must to bed, Fryer, what scalding sweats

Mar. He'll scald in Hell for't, that was the cause.

Alph. Drink, drink, a world of drink,
Fill all the cups and all the antick vessels,
And borrow pots, let me have drink enough,
Bring all the worthy drunkards of the time,
The experienc'd drunkards, let me have them all,
And let them drink their worst, I'll make them Ideots,
I'll lye upon my Back and swallow Vessels;
Have Rivers made of cooling Wine run through me,
Not stay for this mans health, or this great Princes,
But take an Ocean, and begin to all; Oh, oh.

Mar. He cools a little, now away with him,
And to his warm bed presently.

Alph. No drink? no wind? no cooling air?

Rug. You shall have any thing.

His hot fit lessens, Heaven put in a hand now,
And save his life; there's drink Sir in your chamber,
And all cool things.

Alph. Away, away, let's fly to 'em.

[Exeunt.]

Enter Valerio and Evanthe.

Evan. To say you were impotent, I am ashamed on't,
To make your self no man, to a fresh Maid too,
A longing Maid, upon her wedding night also,
To give her such a dor.

Val. I prethee pardon me.

Evan. Had you been drunk, 't had been excusable,
Or like a Gentleman under the Surgions hands,
And so not able, there had been some colour,
But wretchedly to take a weakness to ye,
A fearful weakness, to abuse your body,
And let a lye work like a spell upon ye,
A lye, to save your life.

Val. Will you give me leave, sweet?

Ev. You have taken too much leave, and too base leave too,
To wrong your love; hast thou a noble spirit?

And canst thou look up to the peoples loves,
That call thee worthy, and not blush, Valerio?
Canst thou behold me that thou hast betray'd thus,
And no shame touch thee?

Val. Shame attend the sinful, I know my innocence.

Evan. Ne'r think to face it, that's a double weakness,
And shews thee falser still; the King himself,
Though he be wicked, and our Enemy,
But juster than thou art, in pity of my injuries,
Told me the truth.

Val. What did he tell thee, Evanthe?

Evan. That but to gain thy life a fortnight longer,
Thy lov'd poor life, thou gav'st up all my duties.

Val. I swear 'tis false; my life and death are equal,
I have weigh'd 'em both, and find 'em but one fortune,
But Kings are men, and live as men, and dye too,
Have the affections men have, and their falsehoods;
Indeed they have more power to make 'em good;
The King's to blame, it was to save thy life Wench,
Thy innocent life, that I forbore thy bed,
For if I had toucht thee thou hadst dyed, he swore it.

Evan. And was not I as worthy to dye nobly?

To make a story for the time that follows,
As he that married me? what weakness, Sir,
Or disability do you see in me,
Either in mind or body? to defraud me
Of such an opportunity? Do you think I married you
Only for pleasure, or content in lust?

To lull you in my arms, and kifs you hourly?
Was this my end? I might have been a Queen, Sir,
If that had caught me, and have known all delicates;
There's few that would have shun'd so fair an offer.
O thou unfaithful fearful man, thou hast kill'd me,
In saving me this way, thou hast destroy'd me,
Rob'd me of that thy love can never give more;
To be unable to save me? O misery!

Had I been my Valerio, thou Evanthe,
I would have lye with thee under a Gallows,
Though the Hangman had been my Hymen, and the furies
With iron whips and forks, ready to torture me.

I would have hug'd thee too, though Hell had gap'd at me;
Save my life! that expected to dye bravely,
That would have woo'd it too: Would I had married
An Eunuch, that had truly no ability,
Then such a fearful lyar, thou hast done me
A scurvy courtesie, that has undone me.

Val. I'll do no more, since you are so nobly fashion'd,
Made up so strongly, I'll take my share with ye,
Nay, dear, I'll learn of you.

Evan. He weeps too tenderly;
My anger's gone, good my Lord pardon me,
And if I have offended, be more angry,
It was a Womans flash, a sudden valour,
That could not lye conceal'd.

Val. I honour ye, by all the rites of holy marriage,
And pleasures of chaste love, I wonder at ye,
You appear the vision of a Heaven unto me,
Stuck all with stars of honour shining clearly,
And all the motions of your mind Celestial;
Man is a lump of Earth, the best man spiritless,
To such a woman; all our lives and actions
But counterfeits in Arras to this vertue;
Chide me again, you have so brave an anger,
And flows so nobly from you, thus deliver'd,
That I could suffer like a Child to hear ye,
Nay make my self guilty of some faults to honour ye.

Eva. I'll chide no more, you have rob'd me of my courage,
And with a cunning patience checkt my impudence;
Once more forgiveness? [She kneels.]

Val. Will this serve, Evanthe? [Kisses her.]
And this my love? Heavens mercy be upon us;
But did he tell no more? (me;

Evan. Only this trifle: you set my woman on me, to betray
'Tis true, she did her best, a bad old woman,

It stir'd me, Sir.

Val. I cannot blame thee, Jewel. (way—

Evan. And me thought when your name was founded that

Val. He that will spare no fame, will spare no name, sweet;

Though as I am a man, I am full of weakness,

And may slip happily into some ignorance,

Yet at my years to be a bawd, and cozen

Mine own hopes with my Doctrine— (row.

Evan. I believe not, nor never shall; our time is out to mor-

Val. Let's be to night then full of fruitfulness,

Now we are both of one mind, let's be happy,

I am no more a wanting man, Evanthe,

Thy warm embraces shall dissolve that impotence,

And my cold lye shall vanish with thy kisses;

You hours of night be long, as when Alcmena

Lay by the lusty side of Jupiter;

Keep back the day, and hide his golden beams,

Where the chaste watchful morning may not find 'em;

Old doting Typhon hold Aurora fast,

And though she blush the day-break from her cheeks,

Conceal her still; thou heavy Wain stand firm,

And stop the quicker revolutions;

Or if the day must come, to spoil our happiness,

Thou envious Sun peep not upon our pleasure,

Thou that all Lovers curse, be far off from us.

Enter Castruchio with Guard.

Evan. Then let's to bed, and this night in all joys
And chaste delights—

Cast. Stay, I must part ye both;

It is the Kings command, who bids me tell ye,

To morrow is your last hour.

Val. I obey, Sir,

In Heaven we shall meet, Captain, where King Frederick
Dare not appear to part us. (Office,

Cast. Mistake me not, though I am rough in doing of my
You shall find, Sir, you have a friend to honour ye.

Val. I thank ye, Sir.

Evan. Pray captain tell the King,
They that are sad on Earth, in Heaven shall sing. [Exeunt.

Aëius Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter Fryer Marco, and Rugio.

Rug. Have you writ to the Captain of the Castle?

Mar. Yes, and charged him
Upon his souls health, that he be not cruel,
Told him Valerio's worth among the people,
And how it must be punisht in posterity,
Though he scape now.

Rug. But will not he, Fryer Marco, betray this to the King?
(yet he is honest,

Mar. Though he be stubborn, and of a rugged nature,
And honours much Valerio.

Rug. How does Alphonso?
For now me thinks my heart is light again,
And pale fear fled.

Mar. He is as well as I am;
The Rogue against his will has sav'd his life,
A desperate poison has re-cur'd the Prince.

Rug. To me 'tis most miraculous.
Mar. To me too, till I consider why it should do so,
And now I have found it a most excellent Physick,
It wrought upon the dull cold misty parts,
That clog'd his soul, which was another poison;
A desperate too, and found such matter there,
And such abundance also to resist it,
And wear away the dangerous heat it brought with it,
The pure blood and the spirits scap'd untainted.

Rug. 'Twas Heavens high hand; none of Sorano's pity.

Mar. Most certain 'twas; had the malicious villain

Enter Castruchio.

Given him a cooling poison, he had paid him.

Rug. The Captain of the Castle.

Mar. O ye are welcome, how does your Prisoner?

Cast. He must go for dead;

But when I do a deed of so much villany,
I'll have my skin pull'd o're mine ears, my Lord,

Enter Alphonso and Fryers.

Though I am the Kings, I am none of his abuses;
How does your Royal charge? that I might see once.

Mar. I pray see now, you are a trusty Gentleman.

Alph. Good Fathers, I thank Heaven, I feel no sickness.

Cast. He speaks again.

Alph. Nothing that bars the free use of my spirit,
Me thinks the air's sweet to me, and company

A thing I covet now, Castruchio. (pate Lord,

Cast. Sir, he speaks; and knows, for Heaven sake break my
That I may be sure I sleep not.

Alph. Thou wert honest,
Ever among the rank of good men counted,

I have been absent long out of the world,

A dream I have lived, how does it look Castruchio?

What wonders are abroad? (goodness,

Cast. I fling off duty to your dead Brother, for he is dead in
And to the living hope of brave Alphonso,

The noble heir of nature, and of honour,
I fasten my Allegiance. (blest secret,

Mar. Softly Captain, we dare not trust the Air with this
Good Sir, be close again, Heaven has restor'd ye,

And by miraculous means, to your fair health,

And made the instrument your enemies malice,

Which does prognosticate your noble fortune;

Let not our careless joy lose you again, Sir,

Help to deliver ye to a further danger,

I pray you pass in, and rest a while forgotten,

For if your Brother come to know you are well again,

And ready to inherit as your right,

Before we have strength enough to assure your life,

What will become of you? and what shall we

Deserve in all opinions that are honest,

For our loss of judgment, care, and loyalty?

Rug. Dear Sir, pass in, Heaven has begun the work,

And blest us all, let our indeavours follow,

To preserve this blessing to our timely uses,

And bring it to the noble end we aim at;

Let our cares work now, and our eyes pick out

An hour to shew ye safely to your Subjects,

A secure hour.

Alph. I am counsel'd; ye are faithful.

Cast. Which hour shall not be long, as we shall handle it.
Once more the tender of my duty.

Alph. Thank ye.

Cast. Keep you the Monastery.

Rug. Strong enough I'll warrant ye. [Exeunt.

Enter the Fool, and Podrano.

Pod. Who are all these that crowd about the Court, Fool?
Those strange new faces?

Fool. They are Suitors, Coxcomb,
Dainty fine Suitors to the Widow Lady, (handsomly
Thou hadst best make one of 'em, thou wilt be hang'd as
At the Month's end, and as much joy follow'd,
And 'twere to morrow; as many mourning Bawds for thee,
And holy Nuns, whose vestal fire ne'r vanishes,
In sackcloth Smocks, as if thou wert Heir apparent
To all the impious Suburbs, and the sink-holes.

Pod. Out you base Rogue.

Fool. Why dost abuse thy self?

Thou art to blame, I take thee for a Gentleman,
But why does not thy Lord and Master marry her?

Pod. Why, she is his Sister.

Fool. 'Tis the better, Fool,

He may make bold with his own flesh and blood,
For o' my conscience there's none else will trust him;
Then he may pleasure the King at a dead pinch too,
Without a Mephestophilus, such as thou art,
And ingross the Royal disease like a true Subject.

Pod. Thou wilt be whipt.

Fool. I am sure thou wilt be hang'd,
I have lost a Ducklet else, which I would be loth to venture
Without certainty. They appear. [Suitors pass by.]

Pod. Why these are Rascals. (better kindred?)

Fool. They were meant to be so, does thy Master deserve

Pod. There's an old Lawyer,
Trim'd up like a Gally Foist, what would he do with her?

Fool. As Usurers do with their Gold, he would look on her,
And read her over once a day, like a hard report,
Feed his dull eye, and keep his fingers itching;
For any thing else, she may appeal to a Parliament,
Sub Pœna's and Post Kaes have spoil'd his Codpiece;
There's a Physician too, older than he,
And Gallen Gallinacius, but he has lost his spurs,
He would be nibbling too.

Pod. I marked the man, if he be a man.

Fool. H'as much ado to be so,
Searcloths and SIRRUPS glew him close together,
He would fall a pieces else; mending of the Patients,
And then trying whether they be right or no
In his own person, there's the honest care on't,
Has mollifi'd the man; if he do marry her,
And come but to warm him well at Cupids Bonfire,
He will bulge so subtilly and suddenly,
You may snatch him up by parcels, like a Sea Rack:
Will your Worship go, and look upon the rest, Sir?
And hear what they can say for themselves. [Exeunt.]

Pod. I'll follow thee.

Enter Camillo, Menallo, Cleanthes, and Castruchio.

Cam. You tell us wonders.

Cast. But I tell you truths, they are both well.

Men. Why are not we in Arms then?

And all the Island given to know—— (else,

Cast. Discreetly and privately it must be done, 'twill miss
And prove our ruines; most of the noble Citizens
Know it by me, and stay the hour to attend it,
Prepare your hearts and friends, let their's be right too,
And keep about the King to avoid suspicion;

Enter Frederick and Sorano.

When you shall hear the Castle Bell, take courage,
And stand like men, away, the King is coming.

[Exeunt Lords.]

Fre. Now Captain, what have you done with your prisoner?

Cast. He is dead, Sir, and his body flung into the Sea,
To feed the fishes, 'twas your will, I take it,
I did it from a strong Commission,
And stood not to capitulate.

Fred. 'Tis well done,
And I shall love you for your faith. What anger
Or sorrow did he utter at his end?

Cast. Faith little, Sir, that I gave any ear to,
He would have spoke, but I had no Commission
To argue with him, so I flung him off;
His Lady would have seen, but I lockt her up,
For fear her womans tears should hinder us.

Fred. 'Twas trusty still. I wonder, my Sorano,
We hear not from the Monastery; I believe
They gave it not, or else it wrought not fully.

Cast. Did you name the Monastery?

Fred. Yes, I did Captain.

Cast. I saw the Fryer this morning, and Lord Rugio,
Bitterly weeping, and wringing of their hands,
And all the holy men hung down their heads.

Sora. 'Tis done I'll warrant ye.

Cast. I ask'd the reason.

Fred. What answer hadst thou?

Cast. This in few words, Sir,
Your Brother's dead, this morning he deceas'd,
I was your servant, and I wept not, Sir,
I knew 'twas for your good.

Fred. It shall be for thine too,
Captain, indeed it shall. O my Sorano,
Now we shall live.

Sor. I, now there's none to trouble ye.

Fred. Captain, bring out the woman, and give way
To any Suitor that shall come to marry her,
Of what degree soever.

Cast. It shall be done, Sir.

[Exit Cast.]

Fre. O let me have a lusty Banquet after it,

Enter Evanthé, Camillo, Cleanthes, Menallo, Fool.

I will be high and merry.

Sor. There be some Lords

That I could counsel ye to fling from Court, Sir,
They pry into our actions, they are such
The foolish people call their Countries honours,
Honest brave things, and stile them with such Titles,
As if they were the patterns of the Kingdom,
Which makes them proud, and prone to look into us,
And talk at random of our actions,
They should be lovers of your commands,
And followers of your will; bridles and curbs
To the hard headed Commons that malign us,
They come here to do honour to my Sister,
To laugh at your severity, and fright us;
If they had power, what would these men do?
Do you hear, Sir, how privily they whisper?

Fred. I shall silence 'em,
And to their shames within this week Sorano,
In the mean time have patience.

Sor. How they jeer, and look upon me as I were a Monster?
And talk and jeer? how I shall pull your plumes, Lords
How I shall humble ye within these two daies?

Your great names, nor your Country cannot save ye.

Fred. Let in the Suitors. Yet submit, I'll pardon ye,
You are half undone already, do not wind
My anger to that height, it may consume ye,

Enter Lawyer, Physician, Captain Cutpurse.

And utterly destroy thee, fair Evanthe: yet I have mercy.

Evan. Use it to your bawds,
To me use cruelty, it best becomes ye,
And shews more Kingly: I contemn your mercy,
It is a cozening, and a bawdy mercy;
Can any thing be hoped for, to relieve me? (Lord.

Or is it fit? I thank you for a pity, when you have kill'd my

Fred. Who will have her?

Evan. My tears are gone,
My tears of love to my dear Valerio,
But I have fill'd mine eyes again with anger;
O were it but so powerful to consume ye.
My tongue with curses I have arm'd against ye,
With Maiden curses, that Heaven crowns with horrors,
My heart set round with hate against thy tyranny;
O would my hands could hold the fire of Heaven,
Wrapt in the thunder that the Gods revenge with,
That like stern Justice I might fling it on thee;
Thou art a King of Monsters, not of men,
And shortly thou wilt turn this Land to Devils.

Fred. I'll make you one first, and a wretched Devil,
Come who will have her?

Law. I an't like your Majesty, I am a Lawyer,
I can make her a Joynture of any mans Land in Naples,
And she shall keep it too, I have a trick for it.

Fool. Canst thou make her a Joynture of thine honesty?
Or thy ability, thou lewd abridgment?
Those are non suted and flung o're the bar.

Phy. An't please your Majesty to give me leave,
I dare accept her; and though old I seem, Lady,
Like Aeson, by my art I can renew youth and ability.

Fool.

Fool. In a powdering Tub
Stew thy self tender again, like a Cock Chicken,
The broth may be good, but the flesh is not fit for dogs sure.

Capt. Lady, take me, and I'll maintain thine honour,
I am a poor Captain, as poor people call me,
Very poor people, for my Souldiers
They are quartered in the outside of the City,
Men of ability, to make good a high way;
We have but two grand Enemies that oppose us,
The Don Gout, and the Gallows. (Jointure;

Fool. I believe ye, and both these you will bind her for a
Now Signior firr.

Cut-purse. Madam, take me and be wife,
I am rich and nimble, and those are rare in one man,
Every mans pocket is my Treasury,
And no man wears a Sute but fits me neatly;
Cloaths you shall have, and wear the purest Linnen,
I have a tribute out of every Shop, Lady,
Meat you shall eat, I have my Caters out too,
The best and lustiest, and drink good Wine, good Lady,
Good quickening Wine, Wine that will make you caper.
And at the worst—

Fool. It is but capering short, Sir,
You seldom stay for Agues or for Surfeits,
A shaking fit of a whip sometimes o'retakes ye,
Marry you dye most commonly of choakings,
Obstructions of the halter are your ends ever;
Pray leave your horn and your knife for her to live on.

Eva. Poor wretched people, why do you wrong your selves?
Though I fear'd death, I should fear you ten times more,
You are every one a new death, and an odious,
The earth will purifie corrupted bodies,
You'll make us worse and stink eternally.
Go home, go home and get good Nurfes for you,
Dream not of Wives.

Fred. You shall have one of 'em, if they dare venture for ye.

Evan. They are dead already,
Crawling diseases that must creep into
The next grave they find open, are these fit Husbands
For her you have loved, Sir? though you hate me now,
And hate me mortally, as I hate you,
Your nobleness, in that you have done other wise,
And named Evanthe once as your poor Mistris,
Might offer worthier choice. (dye?)

Fred. Speak, who dare take her for one moneth, and then

Phy. Dye, Sir?

Fred. I, dye Sir, that's the condition.

Phy. One moneth is too little
For me to repent in for my former pleasure,
To go still on, unless I were sure she would kill me,
And kill me delicately before my day,
Make it up a year, for by that time I must dye,
My body will hold out no longer.

Fred. No Sir, it must be but a moneth.

Law. Then farewell Madam,
This is like to be a great year of dissention
Among good people, and I dare not lose it,
There will me money got.

Capt. Bles your good Ladiship, there's nothing in the (grave but bones and ashes,
In Taverns there's good wine, and excellent wenches,
And Surgeons while we live.

Cutp. Adieu sweet Lady,
Lay me when I am dead near a rich Alderman,
I cannot pick his Purse, no, I'll no dying,
Though I steal Linnen, I'll not steal my shrowd yet.

All. Send ye a happy match. [Exeunt.]

Fool. And you all halters, you have deserved 'em richly.
These do all Villanies, and mischiefs of all sorts, yet those (they fear not,
To flinch where a fair wench is at the stake.

Evan. Come, your sentence, let me dye: you see, Sir,
None of your valiant men dare venture on me,
A Moneth's a dangerous thing.

Enter Valerio disguised.

Fred. Away with her, let her dye instantly.

Evan. Will you then be willing
To dye at the time prefixt? that I must know too,
And know it beyond doubt.

Fred. What if I did wench?

Evan. On that condition if I had it certain,
I would be your any thing, and you should enjoy me,
How ever in my nature I abhor you,
Yet as I live I would be obedient to you;

But when your time came how I should rejoyce,
How then I should bestir my self to thank ye
To see your throat cut, how my heart would leap, Sir!
I would dye with you, but first I would so torture ye,
And cow you in your end, so despise you,
For a weak and wretched coward, you must end sure;
Still make ye fear, and shake, despised, still laugh at ye.

Fred. Away with her, let her dye instantly.

Cam. Stay, there's another, and a Gentleman,
His habit shews no less, may be his business
Is for this Ladies love.

Fred. Say why ye come, Sir, and what you are.

Val. I am descended nobly, a Prince by birth, and by my trade
A Princes fellow, Abidos brought me forth, (a Souldier,
My Parents Duke Agenor, and fair Egla,
My business hither to renew my love.

With a young noble spirit, call'd Valerio;
Our first acquaintance was at Sea, in fight
Against a Turkish man of War, a stout one,
Where Lyon-like I saw him shew his valour,
And as he had been made of compleat vertue,
Spirit, and fire, no dregs of dull earth in him. (him.)

Evan. Thou art a brave Gentleman, and bravely speakest

Val. The Vessel dancing under him for joy,
And the rough whistling winds becalm'd to view him;
I saw the child of honour, for he was young,
Deal such an Alms amongst the spiteful Pagans,
His towering sword flew like an eager Falcon,
And round about his reach invade the Turks,
He had intrencht himself in his dead quarries;
The silver Crescents on the tops they carried
Shrunk in their heads to see his rage so bloody,
And from his fury suffered sad eclipses;
The game of death was never plaid more nobly,
The meager thief grew wanton in his mischiefs,
And his shrunk hollow eyes smil'd on his ruines.

Evan. Heaven keep this Gentleman from being a Suitor,
For I shall ne'r deny him, he's so noble.

Val. But what can last long? strength and spirit wasted,
And fresh supplies flew on upon this Gentleman,
Breathless and weary with oppression,
And almost kill'd with killing, 'twas my chance
In a tall Ship I had to view the fight;
I set into him, entertain'd the Turk,
And for an hour gave him so hot a breakfast,
He clapt all linnen up he had to save him,
And like a Lovers thought he fled our fury;
There first I saw the man I lov'd, Valerio,
There was acquainted, there my soul grew to him,
And his to me, we were the twins of friendship.

Evan. Fortune protect this man, or I shall ruine him.

Val. I made this voyage to behold my friend,
To warm my love anew at his affection;
But since I landed, I have heard his fate:
My Father's had not been to me more cruel,
I have lamented too, and yet I keep
The treasure of a few tears for you Lady,
For by description you were his Evanthe.

Evan. Can he weep that's a stranger to my story?
And I stand still and look on? Sir, I thank ye;
If noble spirits after their departure,
Can know, and wish, certain his soul gives thanks too;
There are your tears again, and when yours fail, Sir,

Pray ye call to me, I have some store to lend ye. Your name?

Val. Urbino.

Evan. That I may remember,
That little time I have to live, your friendships,
My tongue shall study both. (Urbino?)

Fred. Do you come hither, only to tell this story, Prince

Val. My business now is, Sir, to woo this Lady.

Evan. Blessing defend ye; do you know the danger?

Val. Yes, and I fear it not, danger's my play-fellow,
Since I was man 'thas been my best companion,
I know your doom, 'tis for a Moneth you give her,
And then his life you take that marries her.

Fred. 'Tis true, nor can your being born a Prince,
If you accept the offer, free you from it.

Val. I not desire it, I have cast the worst,
And even that worst to me is many blessings;
I lov'd my friend, not measur'd out by time,
Nor hired by circumstance of place and honour,
But for his wealthy self and worth I lov'd him,
His mind and noble mold he ever mov'd in,
And wooe his friend because she was worthy of him,
The only relique that he left behind, Sir;
To give his ashes honour, Lady take me,
And in me keep Valerio's love alive still,
When I am gone, take those that shall succeed me,
Heaven must want light, before you want a Husband,
To raise up heirs of love and noble memory,
To your unfortunate—— (affliction?)

Evan. Am I still hated? hast thou no end, O fate, of my
Was I ordain'd to be a common Murtherer?

And of the best men too? Good Sir——

Val. Peace Sweet, look on my hand.

Evan. I do accept the Gentleman, I faint with joy.

Fr. I stop it, none shall have her, convey this stranger hence.

Val. I am no stranger—— Hark to the bell, that rings,
Hark, hark, proud Frederick, that was King of mischief,
Hark, thou abhorred man, dost thou hear thy sentence?
Does not this bell ring in thine ears thy ruine?

Fred. What bell is this?

Cam. The Castle bell: Stand sure, Sir, and move not, if (you do you perish.)

Men. It rings your knell; Alphonso, King Alphonso.

All. Alphonso, King Alphonso.

Fred. I am betray'd, lock fast the Palace.

Cam. We have all the keys, Sir.

And no door here shall shut without our Licence.

Cle. Do you shake now, Lord Sorano? no new trick?
Nor speedy poison to prevent this business?

No bawdy meditation now to fly to?

Fred. Treason, Treason, Treason.

Cam. Yes, we hear ye,

Enter Alphonso, Rugio, Marco, Castruchio, Queen, with Guard.

And we have found the Traytor in your shape, Sir,
We'll keep him fast too.

Fred. Recover'd! then I am gone,
The Sun of all my pomp is set and vanish.

Alp. Have you not forgot this face of mine, King Frederick?
Brother, I am come to see you, and have brought
A Banquet to be merry with your Grace;
I pray sit down, I do beseech your Majesty,
And eat, eat freely, Sir, why do you start?
Have you no stomach to the meat I bring you?
Dare you not taste? have ye no Antidotes?
You need not fear; Sorano's a good Apothecary,
Me thinks you look not well, some fresh wine for him,
Some of the same he sent me by Sorano;
I thank you for't, it sav'd my life, I am bound to ye,
But how 'twill work on you—— I hope your Lordship
Will pledge him too, me thinks you look but scurvily,
And would be put into a better colour,
But I have a candid Toad for your Lordship.

Sor. Would I had any thing that would dispatch me,

So it were down, and I out of this fear once.

Fred. Sir, Thus low as my duty now compells me,
I do confess my unbounded sins, my errours,
And feel within my soul the smarts already;
Hide not the noble nature of a Brother,
The pity of a friend, from my afflictions;
Let me a while lament my misery,
And cast the load off of my wantonness,
Before I find your fury, then strike home,
I do deserve the deepest blow of Justice,
And then how willingly, O death, I'll meet thee!

Alp. Rise, Madam, those sweet tears are potent speakers,
And Brother live, but in the Monastery,
Where I lived, with the self same silence too,
I'll teach you to be good against your will, Brother,
Your tongue has done much harm, that must be dumb now;
The daily pilgrimage to my Fathers Tomb,
Tears, sighs, and groans, you shall wear out your daies with,
And true ones too, you shall perform dear Brother;
Your diet shall be slender to enforce these; too light a pe-
Fred. I do confess it. (nance, Sir.)

Alph. Sorano you shall——

Sor. How he studies for it!

Hanging's the least part of my penance certain.

[Evanthe Kneels.]

Alph. What Lady's that that kneels?

Cast. The chaste Evanthe.

Alph. Sweet, your Petition?

Evan. 'Tis for this bad man, Sir,
Abominable bad, but yet my Brother.

Alph. The bad man shall attend as bad a Master,
And both shall be confin'd within the Monastery;
His rank flesh shall be pull'd with daily fasting,
But once a week he shall swell meat, he will surfeit else,
And his immodest mind, compell'd to prayer;
On the bare boards he shall lye, to remember
The wantonness he did commit in beds;
And drink fair water, that will ne'r inflame him;
He sav'd my life, though he purpos'd to destroy me,
For which I'll save his, though I make it miserable:
Madam, at Court I shall desire your company,
You are wise and vertuous, when you please to visit
My Brother Frederick, you shall have our Licence,
My dear best friend, Valerio.

Val. Save Alphonso.

Omn. Long live Alphonso, King of us, and Naples.

Alph. Is this the Lady that the wonder goes on?
Honour'd sweet Maid, here take her my Valerio,
The King now gives her, she is thine own without fear:
Brother, have you so much provision that is good?
Not season'd by Sorano and his Cooks?
That we may venture on with honest safety,
We and our friends?

Fred. All that I have is yours, Sir.

Alph. Come then, let's in, and end this Nuptial,
Then to our Coronation with all speed:
My vertuous Maid, this day I'll be your Bride-man,
And see you bedded to your own desires too;
Beshrew me Lords, who is not merry hates me,
Only Sorano shall not bear my cup:
Come, now forget old pains and injuries,
As I must do, and drown all in fair healths;
That Kingdom's blessed, where the King begins
His true love first, for there all loves are twins.

[Exeunt Omnes.]

Prologue.

Prologue.

You are wellcome Gentlemen, and would our Feast
 Were so well season'd, to please every Guest;
 Ingenious appetites, I hope we shall,
 And their examples may prevail in all.
 Our noble friend, who writ this, bid me say,
 He had rather dress, upon a Triumph day,
 My Lord Majors Feast, and make him Sawces too,
 Sawce for each several mouth, nay further go,
 He had rather build up those invincible Pyes
 And Castle Custards that affright all eyes,
 Nay eat 'em all and their Artillery,
 Than dress for such a curious company
 One single dish; yet he has pleas'd ye too,
 And you've confest he knew well what to do;
 Be hungry as you were wont to be, and bring,
 Sharp stomachs to the stories he shall sing,

And he dare yet, he saies, prepare a Table
 Shall make you say, well drest, and be well able.

Epilogue.

WE have your favours, Gentlemen, and you
 Have our indeavours, (dear Friends grudge not now,)
 There's none of you, but when you please can sell
 Many a lame Horse, and many a fair tale tell;
 Can put off many a Maid unto a friend,
 That was not so since th' action at Mile-end;
 Ours is a Virgin yet, and they that love
 Untainted flesh, we hope our friends will prove.

Robert Benfield.	}	John Underwood.
Thomas Polard.	}	Richard Sharpe.
George Birch.	}	John Thomson.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Leon, and Mallfort.

Mal.

AND as I told you, Sir.

Leon. I understand you,
Clarinda's still perverse.

Mal. She's worse, obdurate,
Finty, relentless, my love-passions jeer'd at,
My Presents scorn'd

Leon. 'Tis strange a waiting woman,
In her condition apt to yield, should hold out
A man of your place, reverend Beard and shape,
Besieging her.

Mal. You might add too my wealth,
Which she contemns, five hundred Crowns per annum,
For which I have ventur'd hard, my Conscience knows it,
Not thought upon, though offer'd for a Joynture;

This Chain which my Lords Pefants worship, flouted;
My solemn hums and ha's, the servants quake at,
No Rhetorick with her; every hour she hangs out
Some new Flag of defiance to torment me;
Last Lent, my Lady call'd me her Poor John,
But now I am grown a walking Skeleton,
You may see through, and through me.

Leon. Indeed you are much faln away.

Mal. I am a kind of nothing,
As she hath made me; Love's a terrible Clyster,
And if some Cordial of her favours help not,
I shall like an Italian, dye backward,
And breathe my last the wrong way.

Leon. As I live, you have my pity; but this is cold comfort,
And in a friend lip-physick; and now I think on't,
I should do more, and will, so you deny not

Your

Your self the means of comfort.

Mal. I'll be hang'd first ; one dram of't I beseech you.

Leon. You are not jealous of any mans access to her ?

Mal. I would not receive the Dor, but as a bosome
You shall direct me, still provided that (friend
I understand who is the man, and what
His purpose, that pleads for me.

Leon. By all means :

First, for the undertaker, I am he ;
The means that I will practise, thus——

Mal. Pray you forward.

Leon. You know your Lady, chaste Calista loves her.

Mal. Too well, that makes her proud.

Leon. Nay, give me leave,

This beauteous Lady, I may stile her so,
(Being the paragon of France for feature)
Is not alone contented in her self
To seem, and be good, but desires to make
All such as have dependance on her, like her ;
For this Clarinda's liberty is restrain'd ;
And though her kinsman, the gate's shut against me ;
Now if you please to make your self the door,
For my conveyance to her, though you run
The hazard of a check for't, 'tis no matter.

Mal. It being for mine own ends.

Leon. I'll give it o'r,

If that you make the least doubt otherwise :
Study upon't : good morrow.

Mal. Pray you stay, Sir ;

You are my friend ; yet as the Proverb says,
When love puts in, friendship is gone : suppose
You should your self affect her ?

Leon. Do you think I'll commit incest ? for it is no less,
She being my Cousin German. Fare you well, Sir.

Mal. I had forgot that, for this once forgive me.

Only to ease the throbbing of my heart,
(For I do feel strange pangs) instruct me what
You will say for me.

Leon. First, I'll tell her that

She hath so far besotted you, that you have Almost forgot to cast accompt.

Mal. Meer truth, Sir.

Leon. That of a wife and provident Steward,
You are turn'd stark Asfs.

Mal. Urge that point home, I am so.

Leon. That you adore the ground she treads upon,
And kiss her footsteps.

Mal. As I do when I find their print in the snow.

Leon. A loving fool I know it,
By your bloudless frosty lips ; then having related
How much you suffer for her, and how well
You do deserve it——

Mal. How ? to suffer ?

Leon. No, Sir, to have your love return'd.

Mal. That's good, I thank you.

Leon. I will deliver her an Inventory

Of your good parts : as this, your precious nose
Dropping affection ; your high forehead reaching
Almost to the Crown of your head ; your slender waste,
And a back not like a threshers, but a bending,
And Court-like back, and so forth, for your Body.
But when I touch your mind, for that must take her,
(Since your out-side promises little) I'll enlarge it,
(Though ne'r so narrow) as your arts to thrive,
Your composition with the Cook and Butler
For Cony-Skins and Chippings, and half a share
With all the under Officers of the house,
In strangers bounties, that she shall have all,
And you as'twere her Bailiff.

Mal. As I will be.

Leon. As you shall, so I'll promise. Then your qualities,
As playing on a Gyttern, or a Jews-Trump.

Mal. A little too on the Viol.

Leon. Fear you nothing.

Then singing her asleep with curious Catches
Of your own making ; for as I have heard,
You are Poetical.

Mal. Something given that way ;
Yet my works seldom thrive : and the main reason
The Poets urge for't, is, because I am not
As poor as they are.

Leon. Very likely ; fetch her
While I am in the vein.

Mal. 'Tis an apt time, my Lady being at her Prayers.

Leon. Let her pray on.

Nay go, and if upon my intercession
She do you not some favour, I'll disclaim her ;
I'll ruminat on't the while.

Mal. A hundred Crowns is your reward.

Leon. Without 'em —— nay no trifling. [Ex. Mal.

That this dull clod of ignorance should know
How to get money, yet want eyes to see
How grossly he's abus'd, and wrought upon!
When he should make his will, the Rogue's turn'd rampant,
As he had renew'd his youth ; a handsome wench,
Love one a spittle-whore would run away from ?
Well, Matter Steward, I will plead for you
In such a method, as it shall appear
You are fit to be a property.

Enter Malfort, and Clarinda.

Mal. Yonder he walks

That knows my worth and value, though you scorn it.

Clar. If my Lady know not this——

Mal. I'll answer it :

If you were a Nun I hope your Cousin German
Might talk with you through a grate, but you are none,
And therefore may come closer ; ne'r hang off,
As I live you shall bill ; ye may salute as strangers
Custom allows it. Now, now, come upon her
With all your Oratory,
As a young Advocate should, and leave no Vertue
Of mine unmentioned, I'll stand centinel ;
Nay keep the door my self. [Exit.

Clar. How have you work'd

This picce of motley to your ends ?

Leon. Of that at leisure, Mistrißs. [Kissing.

Clar. Lower, you are too loud,

Though the fool be deaf, some of the house may hear you.

Leon. Suppose they should, I am a Gentleman,
And held your Kinsman, under that I hope
I may be free.

Clar. I grant it, but with caution ;

But be not seen to talk with me familiarly,
But at fit distance, or not seen at all,
It were the better ; you know my Ladies humour ;
She is all honour, and compos'd of goodness,
(As she pretends) and you having no business,
How jealous may she grow ?

Leon. I will be rul'd.

But you have promis'd, and I must enjoy you.

Clar. We shall find time for that ; you are too hasty,
Make your self fit and I shall make occasion,
Deliberation makes best in that business,
And contents every way.

Leon. But you must feed

This foolish Steward with some shadow of
A future favour, that we may preserve him
To be our instrument.

Clar. Hang him.

Leon. For my sake, Sweet,
I undertook to speak for him, any Bauble,
Or slight employment in the way of service,
Will feed him fat.

Enter Malfort.

Clar. Leave him to me.

Mal. She comes, my Lady.

Clar.

Clar. I will satisfy her.

Malf. How far have you prevail'd?

Leon. Observe.

Clar. Monsieur Malfort,

I must be brief, my cousin hath spoke much
In your behalf, and to give you some proof,
I entertain you as my servant,
You shall have the grace.

Leon. Upon your knee receive it.

Clar. And take it as a special favour from me,
To tie my shoe.

Malf. I am o're-joy'd.

Leon. Good reason.

Clar. You may come higher in time.

Leon. No more, the Lady.

Enter Calista.

Malf. She frowns.

Clar. I thank you for this visit cousin,
But without leave hereafter from my Lady,
I dare not change discourse with you.

Malf. Pray you take your mornings draught.

Leon. I thank you: [Exeunt Leon, Malf.

Happiness attend your honour.

Calist. Who gave warrant to this private parle?

Clar. My innocence; I hope
My conference with a kinsman cannot call
Your anger on me.

Calist. Kinsman? Let me have
No more of this, as you desire you may continue mine.

Clar. Why madam (under pardon)
Suppose him otherwise: yet coming in
A lawful way, it is excusable.

Calist. How's this?

Clar. I grant you are made of pureness,
And that your tenderness of honour holds
The soveraigntie o're your passions. Yet you have
A noble Husband, with allow'd embraces,
To quench lascivious fires, should such flame in you,
As I must ne're believe. Were I the wife
Of one that could but zanic brave Cleander,
Even in his least perfections, (excuse
My o're-bold inference) I should desire
To meet no other object.

Cal. You grow saucie. Do I look further?

Clar. No, dear Madam: and
It is my wonder or astonishment rather,
You could deny the service of Lisander;
A man without a rival: one the King
And Kingdom gazes on with admiration,
For all the excellencies a Mother could Wish in her only Son.

Cal. Did not mine honour
And obligation to Cleander, force me
To be deaf to his complaints?

Clar. 'Tis true; but yet
Your rigor to command him from your presence,
Argu'd but small compassion; the Groves
Witness his grievous sufferings, your fair name
Upon the rinde of every gentle Poplar,
And amorous Myrtle, (trees to Venus sacred)
With adoration carv'd, and knee'd unto,
This you (unseen of him) both saw and heard
Without compassion, and what receiv'd he
For his true sorrows? but the heavy knowledge,
That 'twas your peremptory will and pleasure,
(How e're my Lord liv'd in him) he should quit
Your sight and house for ever.

Cal. I confess I gave him a strong potion to work
Upon his hot blood, and I hope 'twill cure him:
Yet I could wish the cause had concern'd others,
I might have met his sorrows with more pity;
At least have lent some counsel to his miseries,
Though now for honours sake, I must forget him,

And never know the name more of Lisander:

Yet in my justice I am bound to grant him,
(Laying his love aside) most truly noble.
But mention him no more, this instant hour
My Brother Lidian, new return'd from travel,
And his brave friend Clarange, long since rivals
For fair and rich Olinda, are to hear
Her absolute determination, whom
She pleases to elect: see all things ready
To entertain 'em: and on my displeasure
No more words of Lisander.

(her own:

Clar. She endures to hear him nam'd by no tongue but
How e're she carries it, I know she loves him. [Exit.

Cal. Hard nature: hard condition of poor women!

That where we are most su'd to, we must flye most.

The trees grow up, and mix together freely,
The Oak's not envious of the failing Cedar,
The lustie Vine not jealous of the Ivie
Because she clips the Elm; the flowers shoot up,
And wantonly kifs one another hourly,
This blossome glorying in the others beauty,
And yet they smell as sweet, and look as lovely:

But we are ty'd to grow alone. O honour,
Thou hard Law to our lives, chain to our freedoms
He that invented thee had many curses;
How is my soul divided? O Cleander,
My best deserving husband! O Lisander,
The truest lover that e're sacrific'd
To Cupid against Hymen! O mine honour;
A Tyrant, yet to be obey'd! and 'tis
But justice we should thy strict Laws endure,
Since our obedience to thee keeps us pure. [Exit.

Enter Cleander, Lidian, and Clarange.

Clean. How insupportable the difference
Of dear friends is, the sorrow that I feel
For my Lisanders absence, one that stamps
A reverend print on friendship, does assure me.
You are rivals for a Lady, a fair Lady,
And in the acquisition of her favours,
Hazard the cutting of that Gordian knot
From your first childhood to this present hour,
By all the tyes of love and amity fasten'd.
I am blest in a wife (Heaven make me thankfull)
Inferiour to none (sans pride I speak it)
Yet if I were a free-man, and could purchase
At any rate the certainty to enjoy
Lisanders conversation while I liv'd,
Forgive me my Calista, and the Sex,
I never would seek change.

Lid. My Lord and Brother,
I dare not blame your choice, Lisanders worth
Being a Mistress to be ever courted;
Nor shall our equal suit to fair Olinda
Weaken, but adde strength to our true affection,
With zeal so long continued.

Clar. When we know
Whom she prefers, as she can choose but one,
By our so long tri'd friendship we have vow'd
The other shall desist.

Clea. 'Tis yet your purpose,
But how this resolution will hold
In him that is refus'd, is not alone
Doubtfull, but dangerous.

Enter Malfort.

Malf. The rich heir is come Sir.

Cleand. Madam Olinda?

Malf. Yes Sir, and makes choice,
After some little conference with my Lady,
Of this room to give answer to her suitors.

Cle. Already both look pale, between your hopes
To win the prize, and your despair to lose
What you contended for.

Lid.

Lid. No Sir, I am arm'd.

Clar. I confident of my interest.

Cle. I'll believe ye when you have endur'd the test.

Enter Calista, Olinda, and Clarinda.

Malf. Is not your garter
Unty'd? you promis'd that I should grow higher
In doing you service.

Clar. Fall off or you lose me. [Exit Malfort.]

Cle. Nay take your place, no Paris now sits judge
On the contending goddesses. You are
The Deitie that must make curst or happy
One of your languishing servants.

Oli. I thus look with equal eyes on both; either deserves
A fairer fortune than they can in reason
Hope for from me; from Lidian I expect,
When I have made him mine, all pleasures that
The sweetness of his manners, youth, and virtues
Can give assurance of: but turning this way
To brave Clarange, in his face appears
A kind of Majesty which should command,
Not sue for favour. If the fairest Lady
Of France, set forth with natures best endowments
Nay should I adde a Princess of the blood,
Did now lay claim to either for a husband,
So vehement my affection is to both,
My envie at her happiness would kill me.

Cle. The strangest love I ever heard.

Cal. You can enjoy but one.

Clar. The more I say the merrier.

Oli. Witness these tears I love both, as I know
You burn with equal flames, and so affect me;
Abundance makes me poor; such is the hard
Condition of my fortune; be your own judges;
If I should favour both, 'twill taint my honour,
And that before my life I must prefer;
If one I lean to, the other is disvalued;
You are fierie both, and love will make you warmer.

Clar. The warmer still the fitter. You are a fool Lady.

Oli. To what may love, and the Devil jealousy spur you
Is too apparent: my name's call'd in question:
Your swords flie out, your angers range at large:
Then what a murder of my modesty follows?

Clar. Take heed of that by any means: O innocent,
That will deny a blessing when 'tis offer'd,
Would I were murder'd so, I would thank my modesty.

Cle. What pause you on?

Oli. It is at length resolv'd.

Clar. We are on the Rack, uncertain expectation
The greatest torture.

Lidi. Command what you please,
And you shall see how willingly we will execute.

Oli. Then hear what for your satisfaction,
And to preserve your friendship I resolve
Against my self, and 'tis not to be alter'd:
You are both brave gentlemen, I'll still profess it,
Both noble servants, for whose gentle offers,
The undeserving, and the poor Olinda
Is ever bound; you love both, fair, and vertuously;
Would I could be so happy to content both:
Which since I cannot, take this resolute answer;
Go from me both contentedly, and he
That last makes his return, and comes to visit,
Comes to my bed. You know my will: farewell;
My heart's too big to utter more: come friend.

Cal. I'll wait on you to your Coach.

[Exit Olinda, Calista, Clarinda.]

Cle. You both look blank, I cannot blame you.

Lid. We have our dispatches.

Clara. I'll home.

Lid. And I'll abroad again, Farewel.

Clara. Farewel to ye.

[Exit Clarange, and Lidian.]

Cle. Their blunted departure troubles me: I fear

A suddain and a dangerous division
Of their long love will follow: have you took
Your leave of fair Olinda?

Enter Calista, with a purse.

Cl. She is gone Sir.

Cle. Had you brought news Lisander were return'd too,
I were most happy.

Cal. Still upon Lisander?

Cle. I know he loves me, as he loves his health:
And Heaven knows I love him.

Cal. I find it so:

For me you have forgot, and what I am to you.

Cle. O think not so. If you had lost a Sister
You lock'd all your delights in, it would grieve you:
A little you would wander from the fondness
You ow'd your husband: I have lost a friend,
A noble friend, all that was excellent
In man, or man kind, was contain'd within him,
That loss my wife ———

Enter Malfort.

Malf. Madam, your noble Father ———
A fee for my good news.

Cal. Why? what of him Sir?

Mal. Is lighted at the door, and longs to see you.

Calist. Attend him hither.

Clean. O my dear Lisander.

But I'll be merry: let's meet him my Calista.

Cal. I hope Lisander's love will now be buried:
My Father will bring joy enough for one moneth,
To put him out of memorie.

Enter Dorilaus, his arm in a scarff.

Dor. How do you Son?
Bless my fair child, I am come to visit yee,
To see what house you keep, they say you are bountifull,
I like the noise well, and I come to trie it.
Ne're a great belly yet? how have you triff'd?
If I had done so (Son) I should have heard on't
On both sides by Saint Demis.

Clean. You are nobly welcom Sir:
We have time enough for that.

Dorilaus. See how she blushes!
'Tis a good sign you'll mend your fault, how dost thou,
My good Calista?

Cal. Well, now I see you Sir;
I hope you bring a fruitfulness along with ye.

Dor. Good luck, I never miss, I was ever good at it:
Your mother groan'd for't wench, so did some other,
But I durst never tell.

Cal. How does your arm Sir?

Cle. Have you been let blood of late?

Dor. Against my will Sir.

Cal. A fall dear Father?

Dor. No, a Gun, dear Daughter;
Two or three Guns; I have one here in my buttock,
'T would trouble a Surgeons teeth to pull it out.

Cal. O me! O me!

Dor. Nay, if you fall to fainting,
'Tis time for me to trudge: art such a coward,
At the meer name of hurt to change thy colour?
I have been shot that men might see clean through me,
And yet I fainted not: besides my self,
Here are an hospital of hurt men for ye.

Enter Servants, wounded in several places.

Clean. What should this wonder be?

Cal. I am amaz'd at it.

(soudly,

Doril. What think ye of these? they are every one hurt
Hurt to the proof, they are through, and through I assure ye;
And that's good game, they scorn your puling scratches.

Cal. Who did this Sir?

Dor. Leave crying, and I'll tell you,

And

And get your plaiters, and your warm stupes ready :
Have you ne're a Shepherd that can tar us over ?

'Twill prove a business else, we are so many.

Coming to see you, I was set upon,
I and my men, as we were singing frolickly,
Not dreaming of an ambush of base Rogues,
Set on i'th' forest, I have forgot the name ———

Cle. 'Twixt this, and Fountain-Bleau,
In the wild Forest ?

Dor. The same, the same, in that accursed Forest,
Set on by villains, that make boot of all men,
The Peers of France are pillage there, they shot at us,
Hurt us, un-hors'd us, came to the sword, there plid us,
Opprest us with fresh multitudes, fresh shot skill,
Rogues that would hang themselves for a fresh doublet,
And for a Scarlet Callock kill their Fathers.

Cle. Lighted you among these ?

Dor. Among these murderers,
Our poor blonds were engag'd : yet we strook bravely,
And more than once or twice we made them shun us,
And shrink their rugged heads : but we were hurt all.

Cle. How came you off ? for I even long to hear that.

Dor. After our prayers made to Heaven to help us,
Or to be mercifull unto our souls ;
So near we were. Alas poor wench, wipe, wipe.
See Heaven sends remedy.

Cle. I am glad 'tis come Sir,
My heart was even a bleeding in my body.

Dor. A curl'd hair Gentleman slept in, a stranger,
As he rod by, belike he heard our bickering,
Saw our distresses, drew his sword, and prov'd
He came to execute, and not to argue.
Lord what a lightning methought flew about him,
When he once toss'd his blade ! in face Adonis,
While peace inhabited between his eye-brows :
But when his noble anger stirr'd his metal,
And blew his fierie parts into a flame,
Like Pallas, when she sits between two armies,
Viewing with horrid brows their sad events,
Such then he look'd : and as her shield had arm'd him.

Cle. This man Sir were a friend to give an age for.
This Gentleman I must love naturally :
Nothing can keep me off ; I pray you go on Sir.

Dor. I will, for now you please me : this brave youth,
This bud of Mars, for yet he is no riper,
When once he had drawn blood, and flesh'd his sword,
Fitted his manly metal to his spirit,
How he bestirr'd him ! what a lane he made !
And through their fierie Bullets thrust securely :
The hardned villains wondring at his confidence,
Lame as I was I follow'd, and admir'd too,
And stirr'd, and laid about me with new spirit,
My men too with new hearts thrust into action,
And down the Rogues went.

Cle. I am struck with wonder.

Dor. Remember but the storie of strong Hector,
When like to lightning he broke through his vanguard,
How the Greeks frighted ran away by Troops,
And trod down Troops to save their lives : so this man
Dispers'd these slaves : had they been more and mightier,
He had come off the greater, and more wonder.

Cle. Where is the man, good Sir, that we may honour him ?

Cal. That we may fall in superstition to him.

Dor. I know not that, from me he late departed,
But not without that pious care to see safe
Me, and my weak men lodg'd, and dress'd ; I urg'd him
First hither, that I might more freely thank him :
He told me he had business, crav'd my pardon,
Business of much import.

Cle. Know you his name ?

Dor. That he deny'd me too : a vow had bar'd him.

Cal. In that he was not noble to be nameless.

Dor. Daughter you must remember him when I am dead,
And in a noble sort requite his piety,

'Twas his desire to dedicate this service
To your fair thoughts.

Cal. He knows me then ?

Dor. I nam'd you,

And nam'd you mine : I think that's all his knowledge.

Cle. No name, no being ?

Cal. Now I am mad to know him :
Saving mine honour, any thing I had now
But to enjoy his sight, but his bare picture ;
Make me his Saint, I must needs honour him.

Serv. I know his name.

Cal. There's thy reward for't, speak it.

Ser. His man told me, but he desir'd my silence.

Cal. O Jasper speak, 'tis thy good Masters cause too :
We all are bound in gratitude to compel thee.

Ser. Lisander ? Yes, I am sure it was Lisander.

Cal. Lisander ? 'twas Lisander.

Cle. 'Tis Lisander. O my base thoughts ! my wicked !
To make question this act could be another mans :

'Tis Lisander, a handsome timber'd man ?

Ser. Yes.

(mourn'd ?)

Cle. My Lisander ! Was this friends absence to be

Cal. I grant it :

I'le mourn his going now, and mourn it seriously :
When you weep for him, Sir, I'le bear you company.

That so much honour, so much honesty
Should be in one man, to do things thus bravely,
Make me his Saint, to me give this braye service :

What may I do to recompence his goodness ?
I cannot tell.

Cle. Come Sir, I know you are sickly, so are your men.

Dor. I must confess I am weak,
And fitter for a bed than long discourses.

Cle. You shall hear to morrow, to morrow provide Sur-

Dor. Lisander ———

(geons.

Cal. What new fire is this ? Lisander ——— [Exit.

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Lisander, and Lancelot.

Lis. PRethee good Lancelot remember that Thy Master's life is in thy trust, and therefore
Be very carefull.

Lanc. I will lose mine own, rather than hazard yours.

Lisa. Take what disguise
You in your own discretion shall think fittest,
To keep your self unknown.

Lanc. I warrant ye ;

'Tis not the first time I have gone invisible :
I am as fine a Fairie in a business
Concerning night-work ———

Lisa. Leave your vanities :
With this purse (which deliver'd,
You may spare your Oratory) convey this Letter to Calista's woman.

Lanc. 'Tis a handsom girle, Mistris Clarinda.

Lisa. I have made her mine. You know your work.

Lanc. And if I sweat not in it,
At my return discard me.

[Exit.

Lisa. O Calista ! the fairest ! cruellest !

Enter Clarange.

Clar. So early stirring ? a good day to you.

Lisa. I was viewing Sir,
The site of your house, and the handsomness about it :
Believe me it stands healthfully and sweetly.

Clar. The house and Master of it really
Are ever at your service.

Lisa. I return it :

Now if you please go forward in your storie

Of your dear friend and Mistress.

Clar. I will tell it,
And tell it short, because 'tis breakfast time,
(And love is a tedious thing to a quick stomach)
You eat not yester-night.

Lisa. I shall endure Sir.

Clara. My self (and as I then deliver'd to you)
A Gentleman of noble hope, one Lidian,
Both brought up from our infancy together,
One company, one friendship, and one exercise
Ever affecting, one bed holding us,
One grief, and one joy parted still between us,
More than companions, twins in all our actions,
We grew up till we were men, held one heart still :
Time call'd us on to Arms, we were one Souldier,
Alike we fought our dangers and our honours,
Gloried alike one in anothers nobleness :
When Arms had made us fit, we were one lover;
We lov'd one woman, lov'd without division,
And woo'd a long time with one fair affection ;
And she, as it appears, loves us alike too.
At length considering what our love must grow to,
And covet in the end, this one was parted,
Rivals and honours make men stand at distance.
We then woo'd with advantage, but were friends still,
Saluted fairly, kept the peace of love,
We could not both enjoy the Ladies favour,
Without some scandal to her reputation,
We put it to her choice, this was her sentence,
To part both from her, and the last returning
Should be her Lord ; we obey'd, and now you know it ;
And for my part, (so truly I am touch'd with't)
I will go far enough, and be the last too,
Or ne're return.

Lisa. A sentence of much cruelty ;
But mild, compar'd with what's pronounc'd on me.
Our loving youth is born to many miseries.

What is that Lidian pray ye? (Lady.)

Clar. Calista's Brother, if ever you have heard of that fair

Lisa. I have seen her Sir.

Clar. Then you have seen a wonder.

Lisa. I do confes: of what years is this Lidian?

Clar. About my years : there is not much between us.

Lisa. I long to know him.

Clar. 'Tis a vertuous longing,
As many hopes hang on his noble head,
As blossoms on a bough in May, and sweet ones.

Lisa. Ye are a fair storie of your friend.

Clar. Of truth Sir: now, what's the matter ?

Enter a Servant.

Serv. There is a Gentleman
At door, would speak with you on private businefs.

Clar. With me ?

Serv. He saies so, and brings haste about him.

Clar. Wait on him in. [Exit Servant.]

Lisa. I will retire the while, to the next room.

Clar. We shall not long disturb you.

Enter Alcidon.

Alci. Save ye, Sir:

Clara. The like to you, fair Sir: pray you come near.

Alci. Pray you instruct me for I know you not.
With Monsieur Clarange I would speak.

Clar. I am he, Sir:

Ye are nobly welcome; I wait your businefs.

Alci. This will inform you.

Clar. Will you please to sit down? [Reads.]

He shall command me Sir, I'll wait upon him
Within this hour.

Alci. Y're a noble Gentleman,
Will't please you bring a friend? we are two of us,
And pity either; Sir, should be unfurnish'd.

Clar. I have none now, and the time is set so short,

'Twill not be possible.

Alci. Do me the honour:

I know you are so full of brave acquaintance,
And worthy friends, you cannot want a partner:
I would be loth to stand still, Sir; besides,
You know the custom, and the vantage of it,
if you come in alone.

Clar. And I must meet it.

Alci. Send, we'll defer an hour, let us be equal:
Games won and lost on equal terms shew fairest.

Clar. 'Tis to no purpose to send any whither,
Unless men be at home by Revelation:
So please you breath a while; when I have done with him,
You may be exercis'd too: I'll trouble no man.

Enter Lifander.

Lisa. They are very loud. Now what's the news?

Clar. I must leave you,
Leave you a while, two hours hence I'll return friend.

Lisa. Why, what's the matter?

Clar. A little business.

Lisa. And't be but a little, you may take me with ye.

Clar. 'Twill be a trouble to you.

Lisa. No indeed, to do you service, I account a pleasure.

Clar. I must alone.

Lisa. Why?

Clar. 'Tis necessity ———

Before you pass the walks, and back again,
I will be with ye.

Lisa. If it be not unmannerly
To press you, I would go.

Clar. I'll tell you true, Sir,
This Gentleman and I upon appointment,
Are going to visit a Lady.

Lisa. I am no Capuchin, why should not I go?

Alci. Take the Gentleman,
Come he may see the Gentlewoman too,
And be most welcom, I do beseech you take him.

Lis. By any means, I love to see a Gentlewoman,
A prettie wench too.

Clar. Well, Sir, we'll meet you,
And at the place: My service to the Lady.

Alci. I kiss your hand.

Clar. Prethee read o're her Letter.

[Exit.]

Lifander reads.

Monsieur,

I know you have consider'd the dark sentence Olinda gave us and that (however she disguis'd it) it pointed more at swords edges than our bodies barshments; the last must inie
if we retire, our youths are lost in wandring; in emul shall grow old men, and feeble, which is the scorn of rust of honour, and so return more fit to wed our Sepu
the Saint we aim at; let us therefore make our journey our hearts ready, and with our swords in our hands put it to tune, which shall be worthy to receive that blessing, I'll stay on the mountain, our old hunting place, this Gentleman alone runs the hazard with me, and so I kiss your hand.

Your Servant Lidian.

Is this your wench? you'll find her a sharp Mistress.
What have I thrust my self into? is this that Lidian
You told me of?

Clar. The same.

Lisa. My Ladies Brother?

No cause to heave my sword against but his?
To save the Father yesterday, and this morning,
To help to kill the Son? this is most courteous?
The only way to make the Daughter doat on me.

Clar. Why do you muse? would ye go off?

Lisa. No, no, I must on now; this will be kindly taken;
No life to sacrifice, but part of hers?
Do you fight straight?

S f f

Clara.

Clara. Yes, presently.

Lisander. To morrow then,
The balefull tidings of this day will break out,
And this nights Sun will set in blood; I am troubl'd:
If I am kill'd, I am happy.

Clara. Will you go friend?

Lisander. I am ready Sir, fortune thou hast made me monstrous.

[Exeunt.]

Enter Malfort, and Clarinda.

Malf. Your cousin, and my true friend, lusty Leon,
Shall know how you use me.

Clara. Be more temperate,
Or I will never use, nor know you more
P'th' way of a servant: all the house takes notice
Of your ridiculous fopperie; I have no sooner
Perform'd my duties in my Ladies chamber,
And the scarce down the stairs, but you appear
Like my evil spirit to me.

(der)

Malf. Can the fish live out of the water, or the Salaman-
Out of the fire? or I live warm, but in
The frying-pan of your favour?

Clara. Pray you forget
Your curious comparisons, borrowed from
The pond, and kitchen, and remember what
My Ladies pleasure is for th' entertainment
Of her noble Father.

Mal. I would learn the art of memory in your table book.

Clara. Very good sir, no more but up and ride, I apprehend
Your meaning, soft fire makes sweet mault Sir:
P'le answer you in a Proverb.

Mal. But one kiss from thy hony lip.

Clara. You fight too high, my hand is
A fair ascent from my foot, his slavering kisses
Spoil me more gloves,—enough for once, you'l surfeit
With too much grace.

Mal. Have you no employment for me?

Clara. Yes, yes, go send for Leon, and convey him
Into the private Arbour, from his mouth
I hear your praises with more faith.

Mal. I am gone; yet one thing e're I go, there's at the door
The rarest Fortune-teller, he hath told me
The strangest things; he knows ye are my Mistris,
And under seal deliver'd how many Children
I shall beget on you, pray you give him hearing,
He'l make it good to you.

Clara. A cunning man
Of your own making, how soe'er P'le hear him
At your intreaty.

Mal. Now I perceive ye love me,
At my entreaty, come in friend—remember
To speak as I directed, he knows his lesson,
And the right way to please her; this it is
To have a head-piece.

[Exit.]

Enter Lancelot, like a Fortune-teller, with a Purse, and two Letters in it.

Clara. 'Tis said you can tell fortunes to come.

Lan. Yes Mistris and what's past;
Unglove your hand, by this straight line I see
You have lain crooked.

Clara. How? lain crooked?

Lan. Yes; and in that posture plaid at the old game,
(No body hears me, and P'le be no blab)
And at it lost your maiden-head.

Clara. A shrewd fellow;
'Tis truth, but not to be confes'd; in this
Your palmistry deceives you, something else Sir.

Lan. Ye are a great woman with your Lady, and Acquainted with her counsels.

Clara. Still more strange.

Lan. There is a noble Knight Lisander loves her,
Whom she regards not, and the destinies
With whom I am familiar, have deliver'd

That by your means alone, he must enjoy her.
Your hand again, yes, yes; you have already
Promis'd him your assistance, and what's more,
Tasted his bounty, for which, from the skye
There are 200. crowns dropp'd in a Purse,
Look back, you'l find it true; nay, open it,
'Tis good Gold I assure you.

(to my Lady?)

Clara. How, two Letters? the first indors'd to me? this Subscrib'd Lisander?

Lan. And the fortune-teller, his servant Lancelot.

Clara. How had I lost my eyes,
That I could not know thee? not a word of the loss
Of my virginity.

Lan. Nor who I am.

Clara. P'le use all speedy means for your dispatch
With a welcom answer, but till you receive it,
Continue thus disguis'd, Monsieur Malfort
(You know the way to humour him) shall provide
A lodging for you, and good entertainment;
Nay, since we trade both one way, thou shalt have
Some feeling with me, take that.

(ment.)

Lan. Bountifull wench may'st thou ne're want employ-

Clara. Nor such pay boy.

[Exeunt.]

Enter Lidian, Alcidon, (at one door) Lisander, Clarange, (at another.)

Lidian. You're welcom.

Alcidon. Let us do our office first,
And then make choice of a new piece of ground
To try our fortunes.

Lisander. All's fair here.

Alcidon. And here, their swords are equal.

Lisander. If there be any odds in mine, we will exchange.

Alcidon. We'l talk of that

When we are farther off, farewell.

Lisander. Farewel friend.

[Ex. Lisander, and Alcidon.]

Lidian. Come let us not be idle.

Clara. I will find you employment, fear not.

Lidian. You know Sir, the cause that brings us hither.

Clara. There needs no more discourfing,
No time, nor place for repetition now.

Lidian. Let our swords argue, and I wish Clarange,
The proud Olinda saw us.

Clara. Would she did;

What ever estimation she holds of me,
She should behold me like a man fight for her.

Lidian. 'Tis nobly said; set on love; and my fortune—

Clara. The same for me, come home brave Lidian,
'Twas manly thrust, this token to the Lady,
Ye have it Sir, deliver it, take breath,
I see ye bleed apace, ye shall have fair play.

Enter Lisander.

Lisander. You must lye there a while, I cannot help you.

Lidian. Nay, then my fortune's gone, I know I must dye:
Yet dearly will I sell my love, come on both,
And use your fortunes, I expect no favour;
Weak as I am, my confidence shall meet ye.

Clara. Yield up your cause and live.

Lidian. What dost thou hold me?

A recreant, that prefers life before credit?
Though I bleed hard, my honour finds no Issue,
That's constant to my heart.

Clara. Have at your life then.

Lisander. Hold, or P'le turn, and bend my sword against ye;
My cause Clarange too, view this brave Gentleman,
That yet may live to kill you, he stands nobly,
And has as great a promise of the day
As you can tye unto your self, he's ready,
His sword as sharp, view him with that remembrance,
That you deliver'd him to me Clarange:
And with those eyes, that clearness will become ye:
View him, as you reported him; survey him,
Fix on your friendship Sir, I know you are noble,

And

And step but inward to your old affection ;
Examine but that soul grew to your bosom,
And try then if your sword will bite, it cannot,
The edge will turn again, asham'd, and blunted ;
Lidian, you are the pattern of fair friendship,
Exampled for your love, and imitated,
The Temple of true hearts, stor'd with affections,
For sweetness of your spirit made a Saint,
Can you decline this nobleness to anger ?
To mortal anger ? 'gainst the man ye love most ?
Have ye the name of vertuous, not the nature ?

Lid. I will sit down.

Clar. And I'll sit by you, Lidian. (things ?)

Lif. And I'll go on, can Heaven be pleas'd with these
To see two hearts that have been twin'd together,
Married in friendship to the world, to wonder,
Of one growth, of one nourishment, one health,
Thus mortally divorc'd for one weak woman ?
Can love be pleas'd ? love is a gentle spirit,
The wind that blows the April flowers, not softer ;
She is drawn with doves to shew her peacefulness,
Lions and bloody Pards are Mars's servants ;
Would ye serve love ? do it with humbleness,
Without a noise, with still prayers, and soft murmurs ;
Upon her Altars offer your obedience,
And not your brawls ; she's won with tears, not terrors :
That fire ye kindle to her deity
Is only gratefull when it's blown with sighs,
And holy Incense stung with white hand-innocence ;
Ye wound her now ; ye are too superstitious,
No sacrifice of blood, or death she longs for :

Lid. Came he from Heaven ?

Clar. He tells us truth good Lidian.

Lisa. That part of noble love which is most sweet,
And gives eternal being to fair beauty,
Honour, you hack i' pieces with your swords,
And that ye fight to crown, ye kill, fair credit.

Clar. Thus we embrace, no more fight, but all friendship,
And where love pleases to bestow his benefits,
Let us not argue.

Lid. Nay, brave Sir, come in too ;
You may love also, and may hope, if ye do,
And not rewarded for't, there is no justice ;
Farewel friend, here let's part upon our pilgrimage,
It must be so, Cupid draws on our sorrows.
And where the lot lights ———

Clar. I shall count it happiness,
Farewel, dear friend.

Lif. First, let's relieve the Gentleman
That lyes hurt in your cause, and bring him off,
And take some care for your hurts, then I will part too,
A third unfortunate, and willing wanderer. [Exeunt.]

Enter Olinda, and Calista.

Oli. My fears foresaw 'twould come to this.

Cal. I would your sentence had been milder.

Olin. 'Tis past help now.

Cal. I share in your despair, and yet my hopes
Have not quite left me, since all possible means
Are practis'd to prevent the mischief following
Their mortal meeting, my Lord is coasted one way,
My Father, though his hurts forbid his travel,
Hath took another, my Brother in Law Beronte
A third, and every minute we must look for
The certain knowledge, which we must endure
With that calm patience heav'n shall please to lend us.

Enter Dorilaus, and Cleander, severally.

Dor. Dead both ?

Clea. Such is the rumour, and 'tis general.

Olin. I hear my passing bell.

Cal. I am in a fevour.

Cle. They say their seconds too; but what they are,
Is not known yet, some worthy fellows certain.

Dor. Where had you knowledge ?

Clea. Of the Country people, 'tis spoken every where.

Dor. I heard it so too ;

And 'tis so common, I do half believe it,
You have lost a Brother, wench, he lov'd you well,
And might have liv'd to have done his country service,
But he is gone, thou fell'st untimely, Lidian,
But by a valiant hand, that's soine small comfort,
And took him with thee too, thou lov'st brave company,
Weeping will do no good, you lost a servant,
He might have liv'd to have been your Master, Lady,
But you fear'd that.

Olin. Good Sir, be tender to me,
The news is bad enough, you need not press it,
I lov'd him well, I lov'd 'em both.

Dor. It seems so.

How many more have you to love so Lady ?
They were both fools to fight for such a Fiddle ;
Certain there was a dearth of noble anger,
When a slight woman was thought worth a quarrel.

Olin. Pray you think nobler.

Dor. I'll tell thee what I think, the plague, war, famine,
Nay put in dice and drunkenness (and those You'll grant are pretty helps) kill not so many
(I mean so many noble) as your loves do,
Rather your lewdness, I crave your mercy, women,
Be not offended if I anger ye.

I am sure ye have touch'd me deep, I came to be merry,
And with my children, but to see one ruin'd
By this fell accident ——— are they all dead ?
If they be, speak ?

Clea. What news ?

Enter Beronte, Alcidon, Clarinda, following with a Letter.

Ber. What, dead ? ye pose me ;
I understand you not.

Clea. My Brother Lidian, Clarange, and their seconds.

Ber. Here is one of 'em, and sure this Gentleman's alive.

Alci. I hope so, so is your Son, Sir, so is brave Clarange :
They fought indeed, and they were hurt sufficiently ;
We were all hurt, that bred the general rumour,
But friends again all, and like friends we parted.

Clea. Heard ye of Lisander ?

Ber. Yes, and miss'd him narrowly : (man,
He was one of the combatants, fought with this Gentle-
Second against your Brother, by his wisdom
(For certainly good fortune follows him)
All was made peace, I'll tell you the rest at dinner;
For we are hungry.

Alci. I before I eat
Must pay a vow I am sworn to ; my life, Madam,
Was at Lisander's mercy, I live by it ;
And for the noble favour, he desir'd me
To kiss your fair hand for him, offering
This second service as a Sacrifice
At the Altar of your virtues.

Dor. Come joy on all sides ;
Heaven will not suffer honest men to perish.

Clea. Be proud of such a friend.

Dor. Forgive me, Madam,
It was a grief might have concern'd you near too.

Clea. No work of excellence but still Lisander,
Go thy waies, Worthy.

Olin. We'll be merry too,
Were I to speak again, I would be wiser.

[Ex. Manent Cal. Clarin.
Cal. Too much of this rare cordial makes me sick,
However I obey you.

Clarin. Now or never is an apt time to move her, Madam.

Cal. Who's that ?

Clarin. Your servant, I would speak with your Ladyship.

Cle. Why dost thou look about ?

Clarin. I have private business

That none must hear but your Lisander——

Cal. Where?

Clar. Nay, is not here, but would entreat this favour,
Some of your Balsam from your own hand given,
For he is much hurt, and that he thinks would cure him.

Cal. He shall have all, my Prayers too.

Clar. But conceive me,
It must be from your self immediately,
Pity so brave a Gentleman should perish,
He is superstitious, and he holds your hand
Of infinite power; I would not urge this, Madam,
But only in a mans extreams to help him. (happy in't,

Cal. Let him come (good wench) 'tis that I wish, I am
My husband his true friend, my noble father,
The fair Olinda, all desire to see him;
He shall have many hands.

Clar. That he desires not,
Nor eyes but yours, to look upon his miseries,
For then he thinks 'twould be no perfect cure, Madam,
He would come private.

Cal. How can that be here?
I shall do wrong unto all those that honour him,
Besides my credit.

Clar. Dare ye not trust a hurt man?
Not strain a courtesie to save a Gentleman?
To save his life that has sav'd all your family?
A man that comes like a poor mortifi'd Pilgrim,
Only to beg a Blessing and depart again?
He would but see you, that he thinks would cure him.
But since you find fit reasons to the contrary,
And that it cannot stand with your clear honour,
Though you best know how well he has deserv'd of yet
I'll send him word back though I grieve to do it,
Grieve at my soul, for certainly 'twill kill him,
What your will is.

Cal. Stay, I will think upon't; where is he, Wench?

Clar. If you desire to see him,
Let not that trouble you, he shall be with you,
And in that time that no man shall suspect ye;
Your honour, Madam, is in your own free keeping;
Your care in me; in him all honesty;
If ye desire him not, let him pass by ye,
And all this business reckon but a dream.

Cal. Go in, and counsel me, I would fain see him,
And willingly comfort him.

Clar. 'Tis in your power;
And if you dare trust me, you shall do it safely,
Read that, and let that tell you, how he honours you.
[Exeunt.]

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter Clarinda with a Key, and Leon.

Leon. THis happy Night. [Kisses her.]

Clar. Preserve this eagerness
Till we meet nearer, there is something done
Will give us opportunity.

Leon. Witty Girl, the plot?

Clar. You shall hear that at leisure,
The whole house reels with joy at the report
Of Lidians safety, and that joy encreas'd
From their affection to the brave Lisander,
In being made the happy instrument to compound
The bloody difference.

Leon. They will hear shortly that
Will turn their mirth to mourning, he was then
The principal means to save two lives, but since
There are two slain, and by his single hand,
For which his life must answer, if the King,
Whose arm is long, can reach him. (this Key,

Clar. We have now no spare time to hear stories, take

'Twill make your passage to the banquetting house
I'th' Garden free.

Leon. You will not fail to come? (sander.

Clar. For mine own sake ne'r doubt it; now for Li-
[Exit.]

Enter Dorilaus, Cleander, Servants with lights.

Dor. To bed, to bed, 'tis very late.

Clean. To bed all, I have drunk a health too much.

Dor. You'll sleep the better,
My usual physick that way.

Clean. Where's your Mistress?

Clar. She is above, but very ill, and aguish;
The late fright of her Brother has much troubl'd her:
She would entreat to lye alone.

Clean. Her pleasure. (health,

Dor. Commend my love to her, and my Prayers for her
I'll see her ere I go. [Exeunt; manet Clarinda.]

Clar. All good rest to ye;
Now to my watch for Lisander, when he is furnish'd,
For mine own friend, since I stand Centinel,
I love to laugh i'th' evenings too, and may,
The priviledg of my place will warrant it. [Exit.]

Enter Lisander, and Lancelot.

Lis. You have done well hitherto; where are we now?

Lanc. Not far from the house, I hear by th' Owls,
There are many of your Welch falkoners about it;
Here were a night to chuse to run away with Another mans Wife, and do the feat.

Lis. Peace Knave,
The house is here before us, and some may hear us;
The Candles are all out.

Lanc. But one i'th' Parlour,
I see it sinper hither, pray come this way.

Lis. Step to the Garden-door, and feel and't be open.

Lanc. I am going, luck deliver me from the saw-pits,
Or I am buried quick; I hear a Dog,
No, 'tis a Cricket, ha? here's a Cuckold buried,
Take heed of his horns, Sir, here's the door, 'tis open.
[Clarinda at the door.]

Clar. Who's there?

Lis. Friend.

Clar. Sir, Lisander?

Lis. I.

Clar. Ye are welcome, follow me, and make no noise.

Lis. Go to your horse, and keep your watch with care,
And be sure ye sleep not. (Sirrah,
[Exeunt Lisander, Clarinda.]

Lanc. Send me out the Dairy-maid
To play at trump with me, and keep me waking,
My fellow horse and I must now discourse
Like two learned Almanack-Makers, of the Stars,
And tell what a plentiful year 'twill prove of Drunkards.
If I had but a pottle of Sack, like a sharp prickle,
To knock my Nose against when I am nodding,
I should sing like a Nightingale, but I must Keep watch without it, I am apt to dance,
Good fortune guide me from the Faries Circles. [Exit.]

Enter Clarinda with a Taper, and Lisander with a Pistol, two Chairs set out.

Clar. Come near, [Calista sitting behind a Curtain.]
I'll leave ye now, draw but that Curtain,
And have your wish; now, Leon, I am for thee;
We that are servants must make use of stoln hours,
And be glad of snatch'd occasions. [Exit.]

Lis. She is asleep,
Fierce Love hath clos'd his lights, I may look on her,
Within her eyes 'has lockt the graces up,
I may behold and live; how sweet she breaths!
The orient morning breaking out in odours
Is not so full of perfumes, as her breath is;
She is the abstract of all Excellence, and scorns a Parallel.
Cal.

Cal. Who's there?

Lif. Your servant, your most obedient slave (adored Lady)
That comes but to behold those eyes again,
And pay some Vows I have to sacred Beauty,
And so pass by; I am blind as ignorance,
And know not where I wander, how I live,
Till I receive from their bright influence
Light to direct me, for Devotions sake,
You are the Saint I tread these holy steps to,
And holy Saints are all relenting sweetness,
Be not enrag'd, nor be not angry with me;
The greatest attribute of Heaven is mercy;
And 'tis the Crown of Justice, and the glory
Where it may kill with right, to save with pity.

Cal. Why do you kneel? I know you come to mock me,
T'upbraid me with the benefits you have giv'n me,
Which are too many, and too mighty, Sir,
For my return; and I confess 'tis justice,
That for my cruelty you should despise me,
And I expect however you are calm now,
A foyl you strive to set your cause upon,
It will break out; Calista is unworthy,
Coy, proud, disdainful, I acknowledge all,
Colder of Comfort than the frozen North is,
And more a stranger to Lisanders worth,
His youth and faith, than it becomes her gratitude,
I blush to grant it, yet take this along,
A sovereign medicine to allay displeasure,
May be an argument to bring me off too;
She is married, and she is chaste, how sweet that sounds?
How it perfumes all air 'tis spoken in?

O dear Lisander! would you break this union?

Lif. No, I adore it; let me kiss your hand,
And seal the fair faith of a Gentleman on it.

Cal. You are truly valiant, would it not afflict ye
To have the horrid name of Coward touch you?
Such is the Whore to me.

Lif. I nobly thank ye;
And may I be the same when I dishonour ye;
This I may do again. [Kissing her hand.]

Cal. Ye may, and worthily;
Such comforts Maids may grant with modesty,
And neither make her poor nor wrong her bounty;
Noble Lisander, how fond now am I of ye?
I heard you were hurt.

Lif. You dare not heal me, Lady?
I am hurt here; how sweetly now she blushes?
Excellent Objects kill our sight, she blinds me;
The Roses in the pride of May shew pale to her;
O Tyrant, Custom! and O Coward, Honour!
How ye compel me to put on mine own Chains?
May I not kiss ye now in superstition?
For you appear a thing that I would kneel to;
Let me err that way. [Kisses her.]

Cal. Ye shall err for once, I have a kind of noble pity on Among your manly sufferings, make this most, (you,
To err no farther in desire, for then, Sir,
You add unto the gratuities I owe you;
And after death, your dear friends soul shall bless you.

Lif. I am wondrous honest.
Cal. I dare try. [Kisses.]
Lif. I have tasted a blessedness too great for dull morta-
Once more, and let me dye. (lity,

Cal. I dare not murder,
How will maids curse me if I kill with kisses?
And young men fly th' embraces of fair Virgins?
Come, pray sit down, but let's talk temperately.

Lif. Is my dear friend abed?
Cal. Yes, and asleep;
Secure asleep, 'tis midnight too, Lisander,
Speak not so loud.

Lif. You see I am a Statue,
I could not stand else as I had eaten Ice,
Or took into my blood a drowzie Poyson,

And Natures noblest, brightest flame burns in me;
Midnight? and I stand quietly to behold it so?
The Alarm rung, and I sleep like a Coward?
I am worn away, my faith, my dull obedience
Like Crutches, carry my decayed Body
Down to the Grave, I have no youth within me,
Yet happily you love too.

Cal. Love with honour.

Lif. Honour? what's that? 'tis but a specious title
We should not prize too high.

Cal. Dearer than life.

Lif. The value of it is as time hath made it,
And time and custome have too far insulted,
We are no gods, to be always tyed to strictness,
'Tis a presumption to shew too like 'em;
March but an hour or two under Loves Ensigns,
We have Examples of great memories——

Cal. But foul ones too, that greatness cannot cover,
That Wife that by Example sins, sins double,
And pulls the Curtain open to her shame too;
Methinks to enjoy you thus——

Lif. 'Tis no joy, Lady,
A longing Bride if she stop here, would cry,
The Bridegroom too, and with just cause curse Hymen;
But yield a little, be one hour a Woman,
(I do not speak this to compel you, Lady)
And give your Will but motion, let it stir
But in the taste of that weak fears call evil,
Try it to understand it, we'll do nothing,
You'll ne'r come to know pure good else.

Cal. Fie, Sir.

Lif. I have found a way, let's slip into this error
As Innocents, that know not what we did;
As we were dreaming both, let us embrace;
The sin is none of ours then, but our fancies;
What have I said? what blasphemy to honour?
O my base thoughts! pray ye take this and shoot me.

My Villain thoughts! [Noise within.]

Cal. I weep your miseries, and would to heaven--- what
Lif. It comes on louder. (noise?)

Kill me, and save your self; save your fair honour,
And lay the fault on me, let my life perish,
My base lascivious life, shoot quickly, Lady.

Cal. Not for the World, retire behind the hangings,
And there stand close—— my husband, close, Lisander.

Enter Cleander with a Taper.

Clean. Dearest, are you well?

Cal. O my sad heart, my head, my head.

Clean. Alas, poor soul! what do you do out of your bed?
You take cold, my Calista; how do ye?

Cal. Not so well, Sir, to lie by ye, my Brothers fright——

Clean. I had a frightful dream too,
A very frightful dream, my best Calista;
Methought there came a Dragon to your Chamber;
A furious Dragon (Wife) I yet shake at it;
Are all things well?

Lif. Shall I shoot him?

Cal. No, all well, Sir,
'Twas but your care of me, your loving care,
Which always watches.

Clean. And methought he came
As if he had risen thus out of his Den;
As I do from these Hangings.

Lif. Dead.

Cal. Hold, good Sir.

Clean. And forc'd ye in his arms thus.

Cal. 'Twas but fancy
That troubled ye, here's nothing to disturb me;
Good Sir, to rest again, and I am now drowzie,
And will to bed; make no noise, dear Husband,
But let me sleep; before you can call any body, I am abed.

Clean. This, and sweet rest dwell with ye. [Exit.]

Cal. Come out again, and as you love, Lisander,

Make

Make haste away, you see his mind is troubled ;
Do you know the door ye came in at ?

Lis. Well, sweet Lady.

Cal. And can ye hit it readily ?

Lis. I warrant ye ;

And must I go ? Must here end all my happiness ?
Here in a dream, as if it had no substance ?

Cal. For this time, friend, or here begin our ruins ;
We are both miserable.

Lis. This is some comfort
In my afflictions ; they are so full already,
They can find no increase.

Cal. Dear, speak no more.

Lis. You must be silent then.

Cal. Farewel, Lisander, thou joy of man, farewel.

Lis. Farewel, bright Lady,
Honour of woman-kind, a heavenly blessing.

Cal. Be ever honest.

Lis. I will be a dog else ;
The vertues of your mind I'll make my Library,
In which I'll study the celestial beauty ;
Your Constancy, my Armour that I'll fight in ;
And on my Sword your Chastity shall sit,
Terror to rebel blood.

Cal. Once more, farewel ; [Noise within.
O that my modesty cou'd hold you still, Sir—— he comes Lis. Heaven keep my hand from murder, (again.

Murder of him I love.

Cal. Away, dear friend,
Down to the Garden stairs, that way, Lisander,
We are betray'd else.

Enter Cleander.

Lis. Honour guard the innocent. [Exit Lisander.

Clean. Still up ? I fear'd your health.

Cal. 'Has mis'd him happily ;

I am going now, I have done my meditations,
My heart's almost at peace.

Clean. To my warm Bed then.

Cal. I will, pray ye lead. [A Pistol shot within.

Clean. A Pistol shot i'th' house ?

At these hours ? sure some thief, some murderer ;
Rise, ho ! rise all, I am betray'd.

Cal. O Fortune !
O giddy thing ! he has met some opposition,
And kill'd ; I am confounded, lost for ever.

Enter Dorilaus.

Dor. Now, what's the matter ?

Clean. Thieves, my noble Father, Villains and Rogues.

Dor. Indeed ! I heard a Pistol, let's search about.

Enter Malfort, Clarinda, and Servants.

Mal. To bed again, they are gone, Sir,
I will not bid you thank my valour for't ;
Gone at the Garden door ; there were a dozen,
And bravely arm'd, I saw 'em.

Clar. I am glad, glad at the heart.

Serv. One shot at me, and mis'd me.

Mal. No, 'twas at me, the Bullet flew close by me,
Close by my ear ; another had a huge Sword,
Flourish'd it thus ; but at the point I met him,
But the Rogue taking me to be your Lordship,
(As sure your Name is terrible, and we
Not much unlike in the dark) roar'd out aloud,
'Tis the kill-Crow, Dorilaus, and away
They ran as they had flown ; now you must love me,
Or fear me for my Courage, Wench.

Clar. O Rogue !

O lying Rogue, Lisander stumbled, Madam,
At the Stair-head, and in the fall the shot went off ;
Was gone before they rose.

Cal. I thank Heaven for't.

Clar. I was frighted too, it spoil'd my game with Leon.

Cle. You must sit up ; and they had come to your Chamber
What pranks would they have plaid ? how came the door
Ma. I heard 'em when they forc'd it ; up I rose, (open ?
Took Durindana in my hand ; and like
Orlando, issu'd forth.

Clar. I know you are valiant.

Clean. To bed again,
And be you henceforth provident, at sun-rising
We must part for a while.

Dor. When you are a bed,
Take leave of her, there 'twill be worth the taking ;
Here 'tis but a cold Ceremony, ere long
We'll find Lisander, or we have ill-fortune.

Clean. Lock all the doors fast.

Mal. Though they all stood open,
My name writ on the door, they dare not enter. [Exeunt.

Enter Clarange, Fryar with a letter.

Clar. Turn'd Hermit ?

Fry. Yes, and a devout one too ; I heard him preach.

Clar. That lessens my belief,
For though I grant my Lidian a Scholar,
As far as fits a Gentleman, he hath studied
Humanity, and in that he is a Master ;
Civility of manners, Courtship, Arms ;
But never aim'd at (as I could perceive)
The deep points of Divinity.

Fry. That confirms his Devotion to be real, no way tainted
With ostentation, or hypocrisy,
The cankers of Religion ; his Sermon
So full of gravity, and with such sweetness
Deliver'd, that it drew the admiration
Of all the hearers on him ; his own Letters
To you, which witness he will leave the World,
And these to fair Olinda, his late Mistress,
In which he hath with all the moving language
That ever express'd Rhetorick, solicited
The Lady to forget him, and make you
Blessed in her embraces, may remove
All scrupulous doubts.

Clar. It strikes a sadness in me.
I know not what to think of't.

Fry. Ere he entred
His solitary Cell, he pen'd a Ditty,
His long, and last farewel to Love and Women,
So feelingly, that I confess however
It stands not with my order to be taken
With such poetical Raptures ; I was mov'd,
And strangely with it.

Clar. Have you the Copy ?

Fry. Yes, Sir ;
My Novice too can sing it, if you please
To give him hearing.

Clar. And it will come timely,
For I am full of melancholy thoughts,
Against which I have heard with reason Musick
To be the speediest cure, 'pray you apply it.

A Song by the Novice.

A Dieu fond love, farewel you wanton powers,
I am free again ;
Thou dull Disease of blood, and idle hours ;
Bewitching pain,
Flye to the Fools that sigh away their time,
My nobler love to Heaven doth climb,
And there behold Beauty still young,
That Time can ne'r corrupt, nor Death destroy ;
Immortal sweetness by fair Angels sung,
And honour'd by Eternity and Joy :
There lives my love, thither my hopes aspire,
Fond love declines, this heavenly loves grows higher.

Fri. How do ye approve it ?

Clar. To its due desert,
It is a Heavenly Hymn, no ditty Father,
It passes through my ears unto my soul,
And works divinely on it ; give me leave
A little to consider ; shall I be Outdone in all things ? nor good of my self,
Nor by example ? shall my loose hope still,
The viands of a fond affection, feed me
As I were a sensual beast ? spiritual food
Refus'd by my sick palat ? 'tis resolv'd.
How far off Father, doth this new made Hermit
Make his abode ?

Fri. Some two dayes journey Son.

Clar. Having reveal'd my fair intentions to ye,
I hope your piety will not deny me
Your aids to further 'em ?

Fri. That were against a good mans charity.

Clar. My first request is,
You would some time, for reasons I will shew you,
Defer delivery of Lidians Letters
To fair Olinda.

Fri. Well Sir.

Clar. For what follows,
You shall direct me ; something I will do,
A new born zeal, and friendship prompts me to. [Ex.

Enter Dorilaus, Cleander, Chamberlain, Table,
Tapers, and three stools.

Clea. We have suppd well friend ; let our beds be ready,
We must be stirring early.

Cham. They are made Sir.

Dor. I cannot sleep yet, where's the jovial host
You told me of ? 'thas been my custom ever
To parley with mine host.

Clea. He's a good fellow,
And such a one I know you love to laugh with ;
Go call your Master up.

Cham. He cannot come Sir.

Dor. Is he a bed with his wife ?

Cham. No certainly.

Dor. Or with some other guests ?

Cham. Neither and't like ye.

Clea. Why then he shall come by your leave my friend,
I'll fetch him up my self.

Cham. Indeed you'll fail Sir.

Dor. Is he i'th' house ?

Cham. No, but he is hard by Sir ;
He is fast in's grave, he has been dead these three weeks.

Dor. Then o' my conscience he will come but lamely,
And discourse worse.

Clea. Farewel mine honest Host then,
Mine honest merry Host ; will you to bed yet ?

Dor. No, not this hour, I prethee sit and chat by me.

Clea. Give us a quart of wine then, we'll be merry.

Dor. A match my Son ; pray let your wine be living,
Or lay it by your Master.

Cham. It shall be quick Sir. [Exit.

Dor. Has not mine Host a wife ?

Dor. A good old woman.

Dor. Another coffin, that is not so handsom ;
Your Hostesses in Innes should be blith things,
Pretty, and young to draw in passengers ;
She'll never fill her beds well, if she be not beauteous.

Clea. And courteous too.

Enter Chamberlain, with wine.

Dor. I, I, and a good fellow,
That will mistake sometimes a Gentleman
For her good man ; well done ; here's to Lisander.

Clea. My full love meets it ; make fire in our lodgings,
We'll trouble thee no farther ; to your Son. [Ex. Cham.

Dor. Put in Clarange too ; off with't, I thank ye ;
This wine drinks merrier still, O for mine Host now,

Were he alive again, and well dispos'd,
I would so claw his pate.

Clea. Y'are a hard drinker.

Dor. I love to make mine Host drunk, he will lye then
The rarest, and the roundest, of his friends,
His quarrels, and his guests, and they are the best bauds too,
Take 'em in that tune.

Clea. You know all.

Dor. I did Son, but time, and arms have worn me out.

Clea. 'Tis late Sir, I hear none stirring. A lute is struck,

Dor. Hark, what's that, a Lute ?

'Tis at the door I think.

Clea. The doors are shut fast.

Dor. 'Tis morning sure, the Fiddlers are got up
To fright mens sleeps, have we ne're a pispot ready ?

Clea. Now I remember, I have heard mine Host that's Touch a lute rarely, and as rarely sing too, (dead,
A brave still mean.

Dor. I would give a brace of French Crowns
To see him rise and Fiddle—— Hark, a Song.

A SONG.

'TIS late and cold, stir up the fire ;
Sit close, and draw the Table nigher ;
Be merry, and drink wine that's old,
A hearty medicine 'gainst a cold.
Your bed of wanton down's the best,
Where you shall tumble to your rest ;
I could wish you wenches too,
But I am dead and cannot do ;
Call for the best the house may bring,
Sack, White, and Claret let them bring,
And drink apace while breath you have ;
You'll find but cold drink in the grave ;
Plover, Partridge for your dinner,
And a Capon for the sinner,
You shall find ready when you are up,
And your horse shall have his sup :
Welcom welcom shall flye round,
And I shall smile though under ground.

Clea. Now as I live, it is his voice.

Dor. He sings well, the Devil has a pleasant pipe.

Clea. The fellow lyed fure.

Enter Host.

He is not dead, he's here : how pale he looks !

Dor. Is this he ?

Clea. Yes.

Host. You are welcom noble Gentlemen,
My brave old guest most welcom.

Clea. Lying knaves,

To tell us you were dead, come sit down by us ;
We thank ye for your Song.

Host. Would 't had been better.

Dor. Speak, are ye dead ?

Host. Yes indeed am I Gentlemen,
I have been dead these three weeks.

Dor. Then here's to ye, to comfort your cold body.

Clea. What do ye mean ? stand further off.

Dor. I will stand nearer to him,
Shall he come out on's coffin to bear us company ;
And we not bid him welcom ? come mine Host,
Mine honest Host, here's to ye.

Host. Spirits Sir, drink not.

Clea. Why do ye appear ?

Host. To wait upon ye Gentlemen,
'Thas been my duty living, now my farewell ;
I fear ye are not us'd accordingly.

Dor. I could wish you warmer company mine Host,
How ever we are us'd.

Host. Next to entreat a courtesie,
And then I go to peace.

Clea.

Clea. Is't in our power?

Hofst. Yes and 'tis this, to see my body buried
In holy ground, for now I lye unhallowed,
By the clarks fault; let my new grave be made
Amongst good fellows, that have died before me,
And merry Hofstes of my kind.

Clea. It shall be done.

Dor. And forty stoops of wine drank at thy funeral.

Clea. Do you know our travel?

Hofst. Yes, to seek your friends,
That in afflictions wander now.

Clea. Alas!

Hofst. Seek 'em no farther, but be confident
They shall return in peace.

Dor. There's comfort yet.

(Hofst.

Clea. Pray ye one word more, is't in your power mine
Answer me softly, some hours before my death,
To give me warning?

Hofst. I cannot tell ye truly,
But if I can, so much alive I lov'd ye,
I will appear again, adieu.

[Exit.

Dor. Adieu, Sir.

Clea. I am troubl'd; these strange apparitions are
For the most part fatal.

Dor. This if told, will not Find credit, the light breaks apace, let's lie down
And take some little rest, an hour or two,
Then do mine host's desire, and so return,
I do believe him.

Clea. So do I, to rest, Sir.

[Exeunt.

Enter Calista, and Clarinda.

Cal. Clarinda?

Clarinda. Madam.

Cal. Is the house well ordered?

The doors look'd to now in your Masters absence?
Your care, and diligence amongst the Servants?

Clarinda. I am stirring, Madam.

Cal. So thou art, Clarinda,
More than thou ought'st I am sure, why dost thou blush?

Clarinda. I do not blush.

Cal. Why dost thou hang thy head wench?

Clarinda. Madam, ye are deceiv'd, I look upright,
I understand ye not: she has spied Leon,
Shame of his want of caution.

[Aside.

Cal. Look on me; what, blush again?

Clarinda. 'Tis more than I know, Madam;
I have no cause that I find yet.

Cal. Examine then.

Clarinda. Your Ladyship is set I think to shame me.

Cal. Do not deserv't, who lay with you last night?
What bed-fellow had ye? none of the maids came near ye.

Clarinda. Madam, they did.

Cal. 'Twas one in your Cousins cloaths then,
And wore a sword; and sure I keep no Amazons;
Wench do not lye, 'twill but proclaim thee guilty;
Lyes hide our sins like nets; like perspectives,
They draw offences nearer still, and greater:
Come, tell the truth.

Clarinda. You are the strangest Lady
To have these doubts of me; how have I liv'd, Madam?
And which of all my careful services deserves these shames?

Cal. Leave facing, 'twill not serve ye,
This impudence becomes thee worse than lying.
I thought ye had liv'd well, and I was proud of't;
But you are pleas'd to abuse my thoughts; who was't?
Honest repentance yet will make the fault less.

Clarinda. Do ye compel me? do you stand so strict too?
Nay, then have at ye; I shall rub that fore, Madam,
(Since ye provoke me) will but vex your Ladyship;
Let me alone.

Cal. I will know.

Clarinda. For your own peace,
The peace of your own conscience ask no farther;

Walk in, and let me alone.

Cal. No, I will know all.

Clarinda. Why, then I'll tell ye, 'twas a man I lay with,
Never admire, 'tis easie to be done, Madam,
And usual too, a proper man I lay with;
Why should you vex at that? young as Lisander,
And able too; I grudge not at your pleasure,
Why should you stir at mine? I steal none from ye.

Cal. And dost thou glory in this sin?

Clarinda. I am glad on't, to glory in't is for a mighty Lady
That may command.

Cal. Why didst thou name Lisander?

Clarinda. Does it anger ye? does it a little gall ye?
I know it does, why would ye urge me Lady?
Why would ye be so curious to compel me?

I nam'd Lisander as my president,
The rule I err'd by, you love him, I know it,
I grudg'd not at it, but am pleas'd it is so;
And by my care and diligence you enjoy'd him,
Shall I for keeping counsel, have no comfort?

Will you have all your self? ingross all pleasure
Are ye so hard hearted? why do ye blush now, Madam?

Cal. My anger blushes, not my shame, base woman.

Clarinda. I'll make your shame blush, since you put me to't.
Who lay with you t'other night?

Cal. With me? ye monster.

(bands;

Clarinda. Whose sweet embraces circled ye? not your hus-
I wonder ye dare touch me in this point, Madam?
Stir her against ye in whose hand your life lies?

More than your life, your honour? what smug Amazon
Was that I brought you? that maid had ne're a petticoat?

Cal. She'll half perswade me anon, I am a beast too,
And I mistrust my self, though I am honest
For giving her the Helm, thou knowest, Clarinda,

(Ev'n in thy conscience) I was ever vertuous;
As far from lust in meeting with Lisander,
As the pure wind in welcoming the morning;
In all the conversation I had with him,
As free, and innocent, as yon fair Heaven;
Didst not thou perswade me too?

Clarinda. Yes, I had reason for't,
And now you are perswaded I'll make use on't.

Cal. If I had sin'd thus, and my youth entic'd me,
The nobleness and beauty of his person,
Beside the mighty benefits I am bound to,

Is this sufficient warrant for thy weakness?
If I had been a whore, and crav'd thy counsel
In the conveyance of my fault and faithfulness,
Thy secrecie, and truth in hiding of it;

Is it thy justice to repay me thus?
To be the Master sinner to compel me?

And build thy lusts security on mine honour?
Clarinda. They that love this sin, love their security;
Prevention, Madam, is the nail I knock'd at,
And I have hit it home, and so I'll hold it,
And you must pardon me, and be silent too,
And suffer what ye see, and suffer patiently;
I shall do worse else.

Cal. Thou canst not touch my credit:

Truth will not suffer me to be abus'd thus. (Madam,

Clarinda. Do not you stick to truth, she is seldom heard,
A poor weak tongue she has, and that is hoarse too
With pleading at the bars, none understand her,
Or if you had her, what can she say for ye?
Must she not swear he came at midnight to ye,
The door left open, and your husband cozen'd
With a feign'd sickness? (honest,

Cal. But by my soul I was honest, thou know'st I was

Clarinda. That's all one what I know,
What I will testify is that shall vex ye;
Trust not a guilty rage, with likelihoods,
And on apparent proof, take heed of that, Madam;
If you were innocent (as it may be ye are)
I do not know, I leave it to your conscience,

It were the weakest and the poorest part of ye,
Men being so willing to believe the worst,
So open eyed in this age to all infamie,
To put your fame in this weak bark to the venture.

Cal. What do I suffer! O my precious honour,
Into what box of evils have I lock'd thee!
Yet rather than be thus outbrav'd, and by
My drudg, my footstool, one that sued to be so;
Perish both life, and honour. Devil thus
I dare thy worst, despise thee, spit at thee,
And in my vertuous rage, thus trample on thee;
Awe me thy Mistris, whore, to be thy baud?
Out of my house, proclaim all that thou knowest,
Or malice can invent, fetch jealousy
From Hell, and like a surie breath it in
The bosom of my Lord; and to thy utmost
Blast my fair fame, yet thou shalt feel with horror
To thy fear'd conscience, my truth is built
On such a firm base, that if e're it can
Be forc'd, or undermin'd by thy base scandals,
Heaven keeps no guard on innocence.

Clarin. I am lost,
In my own hopes forsaken, and must fall
The greatest torment to a guilty woman
Without revenge, till I can fashion it
I must submit, at least appear as if
I did repent, and would offend no farther.
Monsieur Beronte my Lords Brother is Oblig'd unto me for a private favour;
'Tis he must mediate for me; but when time
And opportunity bids me strike, my wreak
Shall pour it self on her nice chaltitie
Like to a torrent, deeds, not words shall speak me. [Exit.]

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Alcidon, and Beronte, severally.

Alci. YE are opportunely met. (some fear.)

Ber. Your countenance expresses hast mixt with Alci. You'l share with me in both, as soon as you are made
Acquainted with the cause, if you love vertue,
In danger not secure; I have no time
For circumstance, instruct me if Lisander
Be in your Brothers house?

Ber. Upon my knowledge he is not there.

Alci. I am glad on't.

Ber. Why good Sir?

(Without offence I speak it) there's no place
In which he is more honour'd, or more safe,
Than with his friend Cleander.

Alci. In your votes

I grant it true, but as it now stands with him,
I can give reason to make satisfaction
For what I speak; you cannot but remember
The ancient difference between Lisander
And Cloridon, a man in grace at Court?

Ber. I do; and the foul plot of Cloridons kinsman
Upon Lisanders life, for a fall given to Cloridon
'Fore the King, as they encountred at a solemn tilting:

Alci. It is now reveng'd:

In brief, a challenge was brought to Lisander
By one Chrystantes; and as far as valour
Would give him leave, declin'd by bold Lisander:
But peace refus'd, and braves on braves heap'd on him;
Alone he met the opposites, ending the quarrel
With both their lives.

Ber. I am truly sorry for't.

Alci. The King incens'd for his favorites death,
Hath set a price upon Lisanders head,
As a reward to any man that brings it

Alive, or dead; to gain this, every where
He is pursu'd, and laid for; and the friendship
Between him and your noble Brother known,
His house in reason cannot pass unsearcht,
And that's the principal cause that drew me hither,
To hasten his remove, if he had chosen
This Castle for his sanctuary.

Ber. 'Twas done nobly,
And you most welcom; this night pray you take
A lodging with us; and at my intreaty
Conceal this from my Brother, he is grown
Exceeding sad of late; and the hard fortune
Of one he values at so high a rate,
Will much encrease his melancholy.

Alci. I am tutor'd: pray you lead the way.

Ber. To serve you I will shew it. [Exeunt.]

Enter Cleander, with a Book.

Cle. Nothing more certain than to dye, but when
Is most uncertain: if so, every hour
We should prepare us for the journey, which
Is not to be put off, I must submit
To the divine decree, not argue it,
And chearfully I welcom it: I have
Dispos'd of my estate, confess'd my sins,
And have remission from my Ghostly Father;
Being at peace too here: the apparition
Proceeded not from fancy, Dorilaus
Saw it, and heard it with me, it made answer
To our demands, and promis'd, if 'twere not
Deny'd to him by fate, he would forewarn me
Of my approaching end, I feel no symptome
Of sickness, yet I know not how a dulness
Invades me all over. Ha?

Enter Host.

Host. I come Sir,
To keep my promise; and as far as spirits
Are sensible of sorrow for the living,
I grieve to be the messenger to tell you,
E're many hours pass, you must resolve
To fill a grave.

Cle. And feast the worms?

Host. Even so Sir.

Clea. I hear it like a man.

Host. It well becomes you, there's no evading it.

Cle. Can you discover by whose means I must dye?

Host. That is deny'd me:

But my prediction is too sure; prepare
To make your peace with heaven. So farewell Sir. [Ex.]

Cle. I see no enemy near; and yet I tremble
Like a pale coward: my sad doom pronounc'd
By this aerial voice, as in a glass
Shews me my death in its most dreadfull shape.
What rampire can my humane frailty raise
Against the assault of fate? I do begin
To fear my self, my inward strengths forsake me;
I must call out for help. Within there? haste,
And break in to my rescue.

Enter Dorilaus, Calista, Olinda, Beronte, Alcidon,
Servants, and Clarinda, at several doors.

Dor. Rescue? where? shew me your danger.

Cal. I will interpose

My loyall breast between you and all hazard.

Ber. Your Brothers Sword secures you.

Alci. A true friend will dye in your defence.

Clean. I thank ye,

To all my thanks. Encompass'd thus with friends
How can I fear? and yet I do, I am wounded,
Mortally wounded: nay it is within,
I am hurt in my minde: One word——

Dor. A thousand.

Cl. I shall not live to speak so many to you.

Dor. Why? what forbids you?

Cl. But even now the spirit

Of my dead Host appear'd, and told me, that
This night I should be with him: did you not meet it?
It went out at that door.

Dor. A vain Chimera

Of your imagination: can you think
Mine Host would not as well have spoke to me now,
As he did in the Inn? these waking dreams
Not alone trouble you, but strike a strange
Distraction in your Family: see the tears
Of my poor Daughter, fair Olinda's sadness,
Your Brothers, and your friends grief, servants sorrow.
Good Son bear up, you have many years to live
A comfort to us all: let's in to supper;
Ghosts never walk till after mid-night, if
I may believe my Grannam. We will wash
These thoughts away with Wine, spight of Hobgoblins.

Cl. You reprehend me justly: gentle Madam,
And all the rest, forgive me, I'll endeavour
To be merry with you.

Dor. That's well said.

Beron. I have procur'd your pardon.

Cal. Once more I receive you
Into my service: but take especial care
You fall no further.

Clar. Never Madam: Sir,
When you shall find fit time to call me to it,
I will make good what I have said.

Ber. Till when, upon your life be silent.

Dor. We will have a health unto Lisander.

Cl. His name, Sir,
Somewhat revives me; but his sight would cure me.
How ever let's to supper.

Olin. Would Clarange

And Lidian were here too, as they should be,
If wishes cou'd prevail.

Cal. They are fruitless, Madam.

[Ex.

Enter Leon.

Leon. If that report speak truth, Clarinda is Discharg'd her Ladies service, and what burthen
I then have drawn upon me is apparent,
The crop she reapt from her attendance was
Her best Revenue, and my principal means
Clarinda's bounty, though I labour'd hard for't,
A younger Brother's fortune: must I now
Have soure fawce after sweet meats? and be driv'n
To leavie half a Crown a week, besides
Clouts, Sope, and Candles, for my heir Apparent,
If she prove, as she swears she is with child;
Such as live this way, find like me, though wenching
Hath a fair face, there's a Dragon in the tail of't
That stings toth' quick. I must skulk here, until
I am resolv'd: how my heart pants between
My hopes and fears! she's come; are we in the Port?
If not, let's sink together.

Enter Clarinda.

Clar. Things go better
Than you deserve; you carry things so openly,
I must bear every way, I am once more
In my Ladies grace.

Leon. And I in yours.

Clar. It may be; but I have sworn unto my Lady never
To sin again.

Leon. To be surpriz'd—— the sin
Is in it self excusable; to be taken
Is a crime, as the Poet writes.

Clar. You know my weakness,
And that makes you so confident. You have got
A fair sword; was it not Lisanders?

Leon. Yes Wench,

And I grown valiant by the wearing of it:
It hath been the death of two. With this Lisander
Slew Clorindon, and Chrysanthes. I took it up,
Broken in the handle, but that is reform'd,
And now in my possession; the late Master
Dares never come to challenge it: this sword,
And all the weapons that I have, are ever
Devoted to thy service: Shall we bill?
I am very gamefome.

Clar. I must first dispose of
The fool Malfort; he hath smoak'd you, and is not,
But by some new device to be kept from me:
I have it here shall fit him: you know where
You must expect me, with all possible silence
Get thither.

Leon. You will follow?

Clar. Will I live?

She that is forfeited to lust must dye,
That humour being unfed; begone, here comes [Exit Le.

Enter Malfort in Armour.

My champion in Armour.

Malf. What adventure
I am bound upon I know not, but it is
My Mistresses pleasure that I should appear thus,
I may perhaps be terrible to others,
But as I am, I am sure my shadow frights me,
The clashing of my Armour in my ears,
Sounds like a passing-bell; and my Buckler, puts me
In mind of a Bier; this my broad Sword a pick-axe
To dig my grave: O love, abominable love,
What Monsters issue from thy dismal den,
Clarinda's placket, which I must encounter,
Or never hope to enter?

Clar. Here's a Knight errant, Monsieur Malfort.

Malf. Stand, stand, or I'll fall for ye.

Clar. Know ye not my voice?

Malf. Yes, 'twas at that I trembl'd.

But were my false friend Leon here——

Clar. 'Tis he.

Malf. Where? where?

Clar. He is not come yet.

Malf. 'Tis well for him,
I am so full of wrath.

Clar. Or fear—— This Leon,
Howe're my Kinsman, hath abus'd you grossly,
And this night vowes to take me hence perforce,
And marry me to another: 'twas for this,
(Prefuming on your love) I did entreat you
To put your armour on, that with more safety
You might defend me.

Mal. And I'll do it bravely.

Clar. You must stand here to beat him off, and suffer
No humane thing to pass you, though it appear
In my Lords shape, or Ladies: be not cozen'd
With a disguise.

Mal. I have been fool'd already, but now I am wise.

Clar. You must swear not to stir hence.

Mal. Upon these lips.

Clar. Nor move until I call you?

Mal. I'll grow here rather.

Clar. This nights task well ended,
I am yours to morrow. Keep sure guard. [Exit Clar.

Malf. Adieu;

My honey-comb how sweet thou art, did not
A nest of Hornets keep it? what impossibilities
Love makes me undertake? I know my self
A natural Coward, and should Leon come,
Though this were Cannon proof, I should deliver
The wench before he ask'd her. I hear some footing:
'Tis he; where shall I hide my self? that is
My best defence.

Enter

Enter Cleander.

Cle. I cannot sleep, strange visions
Make this poor life, I fear'd of late to lose,
A toy that I grow weary of.

Malf. 'Tis Leon.

Cle. What's that?

Malf. If you are come, Sir, for Clarinda;
I am glad I have her for you; I resign
My interest; you'll find her in her Chamber,
I did stay up to tell you so.

Clean. Clarinda, and Leon!

There is something more in this
Than I can stay to ask.

[Exit.

Malf. What a cold pickle

(And that none of the sweetest) do I find
My poor self in?

Clean. [Speaks within.] Yield villain.

Enter Clarinda and Leon, running.

Cleander following.

Clar. 'Tis my Lord,
Shift for your self.

Leon. His life
Shall first make answer
For this intrusion.

[Kills Cleander.

Malf. I am going away,
I am gone already.

[Falls in a swoon.

Clean. Heaven take mercy on
My soul; too true presaging Host.

Clar. He's dead,
And this wretch little better:
Do you stare upon your Handy work?

Leon. I am amaz'd.

Clar. Get o're the Garden wall, flye for your life,
But leave your sword behind; enquire not why:
I'll fashion something out of it, though I perish,
Shall make way for revenge.

Leon. These are the fruits
Of lust, Clarinda.

Clar. Hence, repenting Milk-sop. [Exit Leon.
Now 'tis too late. Lisander's sword, I that, } Puts the sword in
That is the Base I'll build on. So, I'll raise } Malfort's hand.
The house. Help, murder, a most horrid
Murder. Monsieur Beronte, noble Dorilaus,
All buried in sleep? Aye me a murder,
A most unheard-of murder.

Enter Dorilaus as from bed.

Dor. More lights Knaves;
Beronte, Alcidon; more lights.

Enter Beronte, Alcidon, and Servants with lights.

Clar. By this I see too much.

Dor. My Son Cleander bathing
In his own gore. The Devil, to tell truth, i'th' shape of An Host!

Ber. My Brother?

Malf. I have been
I'th' other world, in Hell I think, these Devils
With fire-brands in their paws sent to torment me,
Though I never did the deed, for my lewd purpose
To be a Whore-master.

Dor. Who's that?

Alci. 'Tis one in Armour. A bloody sword in his hand.

Dor. Sans question the murderer.

Malf. Who I? you do me wrong,
I never had the heart to kill a Chicken;
Nor do I know this sword.

Alc. I do, too well.

Ber. I have seen Lisander wear it.

Clar. This confirms
What yester-night I whisper'd: let it work,

The circumstance may make it good.

Malf. My Lord? and I his murtherer?

Ber. Drag the villain hence,
The Rack shall force a free confession from him.

Malf. I am struck dumb;
You need not stop my mouth.

Ber. Away with him.

[Exit with Malfort.

Enter Calista, and Olinda.

Cal. Where is my Lord?

Dor. All that

Remains of him lies there: look on this object,
And then turn marble.

Cal. I am so already,
Made fit to be his Monument: but wherefore
Do you, that have both life and motion left you,
Stand sad spectators of his death.

And not bring forth his murtherer?

Ber. That lies in you: you must, and shall produce him.

Dor. She, Beronte?

Ber. None else.

Dor. Thou ly'st, I'll prove it on thy head,
Or write it on thy heart.

Alc. Forbear, there is Too much blood shed already.

Ber. Let not choler
Stifle your judgment; many an honest Father
Hath got a wicked Daughter. If I prove not
With evident proofs her hand was in the blood
Of my dear Brother, (too good a Husband for her)
Give your revenge the reins, and spur it forward.

Dor. In any circumstance but shew her guilty,
I'll strike the first stroak at her.

Ber. Let me ask
A question calmly: do you know this Sword?
Have you not seen Lisander often wear it?

Dor. The same with which he rescued me.

Cal. I do, what inference from this to make me guilty?

Ber. Was he not with you in the house to night?

Cal. No on my soul.

Ber. Nor ever heretofore
In private with you, when you feign'd a sickness,
To keep your Husband absent?

Cal. Never, Sir, to a dishonest end.

Ber. Was not this Woman
Your instrument? her silence does confess it:
Here lyes Cleander dead, and here the sword
Of false Lisander, too long cover'd with
A masque of seeming truth.

Dor. And is this all
The proof you can alledge? Lisander guilty,
Or my poor Daughter an Adulteress?
Suppose that she had chang'd discourse with one
To whom she ow'd much more?

Cal. Thou hast thy ends, wicked Clarinda. [She falls.

Oli. Help, the Lady sinks, malice hath kill'd her.

Dor. I would have her live,
Since I dare swear she's innocent: 'tis no time
Or place to argue now: this cause must be Decided by the Judge; and though a Father,
I will deliver her into the hands
Of Justice. If she prove true gold when try'd,
She's mine: if not, with curses I'll disclaim her:
Take up your part of sorrow, mine shall be Ready to answer with her life the fact
That she is charg'd with.

Ber. Sir, I look upon you as on a Father.

Dor. With the eyes of sorrow
I see you as a Brother: let your witness
Be ready.

Ber. 'Tis my care.

Alc. I am for Lidian.

This accident no doubt will draw him from His Hermits life.

Clar. Things yet go right, persist, Sir.

Enter Lisander, and Lancelot.

Lisan. Are the horses dead?

Lanc. Out-right. If you ride at this rate,
You must resolve to kill your two a day,
And that's a large proportion.

Lisan. Will you please
At any price, and speedily, to get fresh ones.
You know my danger, and the penalty
That follows it, should I be apprehended.
Your duty in obeying my commands,
Will in a better language speak your service,
Than your unnecessary, and untimely care of my expence.

Lanc. I am gone, Sir.

[Exit.]

Lisan. In this thicket
I will expect you: Here yet I have leisure
To call my self unto a strict account
For my pass'd life, how vainly spent: I would
I stood no farther guilty: but I have
A heavier reckoning to make: This hand
Of late as white as innocence, and unspotted,
Now wears a purple colour, dy'd in gore,
My soul of the same tincture; pur-blind passion,
With flattering hopes, would keep me from despair,
Pleading I was provok'd to it; but my reason
Breaking such thin and weak defences, tells me
I have done a double murder; and for what?
Was it in service of the King? his Edicts
Command the contrary: or for my Country?
Her Genius, like a mourning mother, answers
In Cloridon, and Chrysanthes she hath lost
Two hopeful sons, that might have done their parts,
To guard her from Invasion: for what cause then?
To keep th' opinion of my valour upright,
Th' popular breath, a sandy ground to build on;
Bought with the Kings displeasure, as the breach
Of Heavens decrees, the loss of my true comforts,
In Parents, Kinsmen, Friends, as the fruition
Of all that I was born to, and that sits
Like to a hill of Lead here, in my exile,
(Never to be repeal'd, if I escape so)
I have cut off all hopes ever to look on

Enter Lidian, like a Hermite.

Divine Calista, from her sight, and converse,
For ever banish'd.

Lid. I should know this voice,
His naming too my Sister, whom Lisander
Honour'd, but in a noble way, assures me
That it can be no other: I stand bound
To comfort any man I find distress'd:
But to aid him that sav'd my life, Religion
And Thankfulness commands, and it may be
High providence for this good end hath brought him
Into my solitary walk. Lisander, noble Lisander.

Lif. Whatfoe'er thou art,
That honorable attribute thou giv'st me,
I can pretend no right to: come not near me,
I am infectious, the sanctity
Of thy profession (for thou appearest
A reverend Hermite) if thou flye not from me,
As from the Plague or Leprosie, cannot keep thee
From being polluted.

Lid. With good counsel, Sir,
And holy prayers to boot I may cure you,
Though both wayes so infect'd. You look wildly,
Peace to your conscience, Sir, and stare upon me,
As if you never saw me: hath my habit
Alter'd my face so much, that yet you know not
Your servant Lidian?

Lif. I am amaz'd!
So young, and so religious? (world:

Lid. I purpose (Heaven make me thankful for't) to leave the

[Exeunt.]
I have made some trial of my strengths in this
My solitary life; and yet I find not
A faintness to go on.

Lif. Above belief: do you inhabit here?

Lid. Mine own free choice, Sir:

I live here poorly, but contentedly,
Because I find enough to feed my fortunes;
Indeed too much: these wild fields are my gardens,
The Crystal Rivers they afford their waters,
And grudge not their sweet streams to quench afflictions;
The hollow rocks their beds, which though they are hard,
(The Emblems of a doting lovers fortune)
Yet they are quiet; and the weary slumbers
The eyes catch there, softer than beds of Down, Friend;
The Birds my Bell to call me to devotions;
My Book the story of my wandring life,
In which I find more hours due to repentance
Than time hath told me yet.

Lif. Answer me truly.

Lid. I will do that without a conjuration.

Lif. Th' depth of meditation do you not
Sometimes think of Olinda?

Lid. I endeavour

To raze her from my memory, as I wish
You would do the whole Sex, for know, Lisander,
The greatest curse brave man can labour under,
Is the strong Witch-craft of a Womans eyes;
Where I find men I preach this doctrine to 'em:
As you are a Scholar, knowledge make your Mistress,
The hidden beauties of the Heavens your study;
There shall you find fit wonder for your faith,
And for your eye in-imitable objects:
As you are a profess'd souldier, court your honour,
Though she be stern, she is honest, a brave Mistress;
The greater danger you oppose to win her,
She shews the sweeter, and rewards the nobler;
Womans best loves to hers meer shadows be,
For after death she weds your memory.
These are my contemplations.

Lif. Heavenly ones;

And in a young man more remarkable.
But wherefore do I envy, and not tread in
This blessed tract? here's in the heart no falshood
To a vow'd friend, no quarrels seconded
With Challenges, which answer'd in defence
Of the word Reputation, murder follows.
A man may here repent his sins, and though
His hand like mine be stain'd in blood, it may be
With penitence and true contrition wash'd off;
You have prov'd it, Lidian.

Lid. And you'll find it true, if you persevere.

Lif. Here then ends my flight,
And here the fury of the King shall find me
Prepar'd for Heaven, if I am mark'd to dye;
For that I truly grieve for.

Enter Fryar, and Clarange in Fryars habit.

Fry. Keep your self conceal'd, I am instructed.

Clar. How the sight
Of my dear friend confirms me.

Lif. What are these?

Lid. Two reverend Fryers, one I know.

Fry. To you
This journey is devoted.

Lid. Welcome, Father.

Fry. I know your resolution so well grounded,
And your adieu unto the world so constant,
That though I am th' unwilling messenger
Of a strange accident to try your temper,
It cannot shake you. You had once a friend,
A noble friend, Clarange.

Lid. And have still, I hope, good Father.

Fry. Your false hopes deceive you,
He's dead.

Lif. Clarange dead ?

Fry. I buried him ;
Some said he dy'd of melancholy, some of love,
And of that fondness perish'd.

Lid. O Clarange !

Clar. Hast thou so much brave nature, noble Lidian,
So tenderly to lovethy Rivals memory ?
The bold Lisander weeps too.

Fry. I expected that you would bear this better

Lid. I am a man, Sir, and my great loss weigh'd duly—

Fry. His last words were

After confession, live long, dear Lidian,
Possess'd of all thy wishes ; and of me
He did desire, bathing my hand with tears,
That with my best care, I should seek, and find you,
And from his dying mouth prevail so with you,
That you a while should leave your Hermits strictness,
And on his Monument pay a tear or two,
To witness how you lov'd him. (he had not

Lid. O my heart ! to witness how I lov'd him ? would Lid me into his Grave, but sacrific'd

His sorrows upon mine, he was my friend,
My noble friend, I will bewail his ashes ;
His fortunes, and poor mine were born together,
And I will weep 'em both ; I will kneel by him,
And on his hallow'd Earth do my last duties.
I'll gather all the pride of Spring to deck him,
Wood-bines shall grow upon his honour'd Grave ;
And as they prosper, clasp to shew our friendship,
And when they wither, I'll dye too.

Clar. Who would not
Desire to dye, to be bewail'd thus nobly ?

Fry. There is a Legacy he hath bequeath'd you ;
But of what value I must not discover,
Until those Rites and pious Ceremonies
Are duly tender'd.

Lid. I am too full of sorrow to be inquisitive.

Lif. To think of his,
I do forget mine own woes.

Enter Alcidon.

Alc. Graze thy fill, now
Thou hast done thy business ; ha ! who have we here ?

Lisander, Lidian, and two Reverend Fryars ?
What a strange scene of sorrow is express'd
In different postures, in their looks and station ?

A common Painter eying these to help
His dull invention, might draw to the life
The living Sons of Priam, as they stood
On the pale Walls of Troy, when Hector fell
Under Achilles's Spear ; I come too late,
My Horse, though good and strong, mov'd like a Tortoise ;
Ill News had wings, and hath got here before me.
All Pythagoreans ? not a word ?

Lid. O Alcidon—
Deep Rivers with soft murmurs glide along
The shallow roar ; Clarange !

Lif. Cloridon, Chrysanthus, spare my grief, and apprehend
What I should speak.

Alc. Their fates I have long since
For your sakes mourn'd ; Clarange's death, for so
Your silence doth confirm, till now I heard not ;
Are these the bounds that are prescrib'd unto
The swelling seas of sorrow ?

Lif. The bounds, Alcidon ?
Can all the winds of mischief, from all Quarters,
Euphrates, Ganges, Tigris, Volga, Po,
Paying at once their tribute to this Ocean,
Make it swell higher ? I am a Murthrer,
Banish'd, proscrib'd, is there ought else that can
Be added to it ?

Lid. I have lost a friend,
Priz'd dearer than my being, and he dead,
My miseries at the height condemn the worst

Of Fortunes malice.

Alc. How our humane weakness,
Grown desperate from small disasters, makes us
Imagine them a period to our sorrows !
When the first syllable of greater woes
Is not yet written.

Lid. How ?

Lif. Speak it at large,
Since grief must break my heart, I am ambitious
It should be exquisite.

Alc. It must be told,
Yet ere you hear it, with all care put on
The surest armour anvil'd in the Shop
Of passive fortitude ; the good Cleander,
Your friend, is murth'r'd.

Lif. 'Tis a terrible pang,
And yet it will not do, I live yet, act not
The Torturers part ; if that there be a blow
Beyond this, give it, and at once dispatch me.

Alc. Your Sword died in his heart-bloud was found near
Your private Conference at mid-night urg'd (him,
With fair Calista ; which by her whose pure truth,
Would never learn to tell a lie, being granted,
She by enrag'd Beronte is accus'd
Of Murth'r and Adultery, and you
(However I dare swear it false) concluded
Her principal Agent,

Lid. Wave upon wave rowls o'r me.
My Sister ? my dear Sister ?

Clar. Hold, great heart.

Fry. Tear open his Doublet.

Lif. Is this wound too narrow
For my life to get out at ? Bring me to
A Cannon loaded, and some pitying friend
Give fire unto it, while I nail my breast
Unto his thundring mouth, that in the instant ;
I may be piece-meal torn, and blown so far,
As not one joint of my dismember'd limbs
May ever be by search of man found out.

Cleander ! Yet, why name I him ? however
His fall deserv'd an Earth-quake, if compar'd
With what true honour in Calista suffers,
Is of no moment ; my good Angel keep me
From Blasphemy, and strike me dumb before,
In th' agony of my spirit, I do accuse
The Powers above, for their unjust permission
Of Vertue, innocent Vertue, to be branded
With the least vicious mark.

Clar. I never saw a man so far transported.

Alc. Give it way, 'tis now no time to stop it:

Enter Lancelot.

Lanc. Sir, I have bought
Fresh horses ; and as you respect your life,
Speedily back 'em ; the Archers of the Kings guard
Are every where in quest of you.

Lif. My life ?
Perish all such with thee that wish it longer,
Let it but clear Calista's innocence, [Strikes Lancelot.
And Nestor's Age, to mine was Youth, I'll flye
To meet the rage of my incensed King,
And wish his favourites Ghost appear'd in Flames,
To urge him to revenge ; let all the tortures
That Tyranny e're found out circle me,
Provided Justice set Calista free.

[Exeunt Lisander, Alcidon; and Lancelot.

Alc. I'll follow him.

Lid. I am rooted here. (dangers,

Fry. Remember your dear friends last request, your sisters
With the aids that you may lend her

Lid. Pray you support me,
My Legs deny their Office.

Clar. I grow still

Farther

Farther engag'd unto his matchless vertues,
And I am dead indeed, until I pay
The debt I owe him in a noble way.

[Exeunt.]

Actus Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter Dorilaus, and Servant.

Dor. Thou hast him safe?

Serv. As fast as locks can make him;
He must break through three doors, and cut the throats
Of ten tall fellows, if that he 'scape us;
Besides, as far as I can apprehend,
He hath no such invention, for his looks
Are full of penitence.

Dor. Trust not a Knaves look,
They are like a Whores Oaths;
How does my poor Daughter
Brook her restraint?

Serv. With such a resolution
As well becomes your Lordships Child.

[Knock within.]

Dor. Who's that?

Enter Lemure.

Serv. Monsieur Lemure.

Dor. This is a special favour,
And may stand an example in the Court
For courtelic; it is the Clients duty
To wait upon his Patron; you prevent me,
That am your humble Suitor.

Lem. My near place
About the King, though it swell others, cannot Make me forget your worth and Age, which may Challenge much more respect; and I am sorry
That my endeavours for you have not met with
The good success I wish'd; I mov'd the King
With my best advantage both of time and place,
I th' favour of your Daughter.

Dor. How do you find his Majesty affected?

Lem. Not to be

Sway'd from the rigour of the Law; yet so far
The rarity of the Cause hath won upon him,
That he resolves to have in his own person
The hearing of it; her tryal will be noble,
And to my utmost strength, where I may serve her
My aids shall not be wanting.

Dor. I am your servant.

Lem. One word more; if you love Lisanders life,
Advise him, as he tenders it, to keep
Out of the way; if he be apprehended,
This City cannot ransom him; so good morrow.

[Exit.]

Dor. All happiness attend you; go thy ways,
Thou hast a clear and noble soul; for thy sake
I'll hold that man mine enemy, who dares mutter,
The Court is not the sphere where vertue moves,
Humanity, and Nobleness waiting on her.

Enter Servant.

Serv. Two Gentlemen (but what they are I know not,
Their faces are so muffled) press to see you,
And will not be deny'd.

Dor. What e'r they are, I am too old to fear.

Serv. They need no Usher, they make their own way.

Enter Lisander, Alcidon.

Dor. Take you yours, Lisander; [Exit Servant.]
My joy to see you, and my sorrow for
The danger you are in, contend so here,
Though different passions, nay oppos'd in Nature,
I know not which to entertain.

(justice,

Lis. Your hate should win the victory from both, with
You may look on me as a Homicide,

A man whose life is forfeited to the Law,
But if (howe'r I stand accus'd) in thought
I sin'd against Cleanders life, or live
Guilty of the dishonour of your Daughter,
May all the miseries that can fall on man
Here, or hereafter, circle me.

Dor. To me this protestation's useless, I embrace you,
As the preserver of my life, the man
To whom my son owes his, with life, his honour,
And howsoever your affection
To my unhappy Daughter, though it were
(For I have sifted her) in a noble way,
Hath printed some taint on her fame, and brought
Her life in question, yet I would not purchase
The wish'd recovery of her reputation,
With strong assurance of her innocence
Before the King her Judge, with certain loss
Of my Lisander, for whose life, if found,
There's no redemption; my excess of love,
(Though to enjoy you one short day would lengthen
My life a dozen years) boldly commands me,
Upon my knees, which yet were never bent,
But to the King and Heaven, to entreat you
To fly hence with all possible speed, and leave
Calista to her fortune.

Lis. O blessed Saints, forsake her in affliction? can you
Be so unnatural to your own blood,
To one so well deserving, as to value
My safety before hers? shall innocence
In her be branded, and my guilt escape
Unpunish'd? does she suffer so much for me,
For me unworthy, and shall I decline
(Eating the bitter bread of banishment)
The course of Justice to draw out a life?
(A life? I style it false, a living death)
Which being un-compell'd, laid down will clear her,
And write her name anew in the fair legend
Of the best women? seek not to dissuade me,
I will not, like a careless Poet, spoil
The last Act of my Play, till now applauded,
By giving the World just cause to say, I fear'd
Death more than loss of Honour.

Dor. But suppose Heaven hath design'd some
Other saving means for her deliverance?

Lis. Other means? that is
A mischief above all I have groan'd under;
Shall any other pay my debt, while I
Write my self Bankrupt? or Calista owe
The least beholdingness for that which she
On all the bonds of gratitude I have seal'd to,
May challenge from me to be freely tender'd?
Avert it mercy! I will go to my Grave,
Without the curses of my Creditors;
I'll vindicate her fair name, and so cancel
My obligation to her, to the King,
To whom I stand accountable for the loss
Of two of his lov'd subjects lives, I'll offer
Mine own in satisfaction, to Heaven
I'll pay my true Repentance, to the times,
Present, and future, I'll be register'd
A memorable President to admonish
Others, however valiant, not to trust
To their abilities to dare, and do,
And much less for the airy words of Honour,
And false stamp'd reputation to shake off
The Chains of their Religion and Allegiance,
The principal means appointed to prefer
Societies and Kingdoms.

[Exit.]

Dor. Let's not leave him; his mind's much troubled.

Alc. Were your Daughter free,
Since from her dangers his distraction rises,
His cause is not so desperate for the slaughter
Of Cloridon, and Chrysanthes, but it may Find passage to the mercy of the King,

The motives urg'd in his defence, that forc'd him
To act that bloody Scene.

Dor. Heaven can send ayds,
When they are least expected, let us walk,
The hour of tryal draws near.

Alci. May it end well.

[Exeunt.]

Enter Olinda, and Lidian.

Oli. That for my love you should turn Hermit Lidian,
As much amazes me, as your report Clarange's dead.

Lidi. He is so, and all comforts
My youth can hope for, Madam, with him buried;
Nor had I ever left my cell, but that
He did injoin me at his death to shed
Some tears of friendship on his Monument,
And those last Rites perform'd, he did dequeath you
As the best legacie a friend could give,
Or I indeed could wish to my embraces.

Oli. 'Tis still more strange, is there no foul play in it?
I must confes I am not sorry Sir
For your fair fortune; yet 'tis fit I grieve
The most untimely death of such a Gentleman,
He was my worthy Servant.

Lid. And for this acknowledgment, if I could prize you at
A higher rate I should, he was my friend:
My dearest friend.

Oli. But how should I be assur'd Sir
(For slow belief is the best friend of truth)
Of this Gentlemans death? if I should credit it,
And afterward it fall out contrary,
How am I sham'd? how is your vertue tainted?

Lid. There is a Frier that came along with me,
His business to deliver you a Letter
From dead Clarange: You shall hear his Testimonie.
Father, my reverend Father, look upon him,
Such holy men are Authors of no Fables.

Enter Clarange, (with a Letter writ out) and Frier.

Oli. They should not be, their lives and their opinions,
Like brightest purest flames should still burn upwards,
To me Sir? (delivers the Letter.)

Clar. If you are the fair Olinda——

Frier. I do not like these crosse points.

Clar. Give me leave, I am nearest to my self. What I have
Shall be pursu'd: you must not over-rule me. (plotted)

Oli. Do you put the first hand to your own undoing?
Play to betray your game? Mark but this letter.
Lady I am come to claim your noble promise, (Reads.)
If you be Mistris of your word, ye are mine,
I am last return'd: your riddle is dissolv'd,
And I attend your faith. Your humble servant Clarange.
Is this the Frier that saw him dead? Lid. 'Tis he.

Clarange on my life: I am defeated:
Such reverend habits juggle? my true sorrow
For a false friend not worth a tear derided?

Fri. You have abus'd my trust.

Oli. It is not well, nor like a Gentleman.

Clar. All stratagems

In love, and that the sharpest war, are lawfull,
By your example I did change my habit,
Caught you in your own toyle, and triumph in it,
And what by policy's got, I will maintain
With valour, no Lisander shall come in again to fetch you off.

Lid. His honour'd name
Pronounc'd by such a treacherous tongue is tainted,
Maintain thy treason with thy sword? With what Contempt I hear it! in a WilderNESS
I durst encounter it, and would, but that
In my retired hours, not counterfeited
As thy religious shape was, I have learn'd
When Justice may determine such a cause,
And of such weight as this fair Lady is,
Must not be put to fortune, I appeal
Unto the King, and he whose wisdom knows

To do his subjects right in their estates,
As graciously with judgement will determine
In points of honour.

Oli. Ple steer the same course with you.

Clar. Ple stand the tryal.

Fri. What have you done? or what intend you?

Clar. Ask not, ple come off with honour. [Exeunt.]

Enter Beronte, Clarinda, Malfort, a Bar set forth, Officers

Ber. Be constant in your proofs: should you shrink back
Your life must answer it, nor am I safe. (now,)
My honour being engag'd to make that good
Which you affirm.

Clar. I am confident, so dearly
I honour'd my dead Lord, that no respect,
Or of my Ladies bounties (which were great ones
I must confes) nor of her former life,
For while that she was chaste, indeed I lov'd her,
Shall hinder me from lending my assistance
Unto your just revenge—— mine own I mean,
If Leon keep far off enough, all's secure:
Lisander dares not come in, modest blushes
Parted with me long since, and impudence
Arm'd with my hate, unto her innocence shall be
The weapon I will fight with now.

Aside.

Ber. The rack
Being presented to you, you'l roar out
What you conceal yet,

Mal. Conceal? I know nothing
But that I shall be hang'd, and that I look for,
It is my destiny, I ever had
A hanging look; and a wise woman told me,
Though I had not the heart to do a deed
Worthy the halter, in my youth or age,
I should take a turn with a wry mouth, and now
'Tis come about: I have pen'd mine own ballad
Before my condemnation, in fear
Some rimer should prevent me: here's my Lady?
Would I were in heaven, or a thousand miles hence,
That I might not blush to look on her.

Enter Dorilaus, Calista, Olinda.

Dor. You behold this preparation, and the enemies
Who are to fight against your life, yet if
You bring no witness here, that may convince ye
Of breach of faith to your Lords bed, and hold up
Unspotted hands before the King, this tryal
You are to undergo, will but refine,
And not consume your honour.

Cal. How confirm'd
I am here, whatsoever Fate falls on me,
You shall have ample testimony; till the death
Of my dear Lord, to whose sad memory
I pay a mourning widows tears, I liv'd
Too happy in my holy-day trim of glorie,
And courted with felicitie, that drew on me,
With other helps of nature, as of fortune,
The envie, not the love of most that knew me;
This made me to perfume too much, perhaps
Too proud; but I am humbled; and if now
I do make it apparent, I can bear
Adversity with such a constant patience
As will set off my innocence, I hope Sir,
In your declining age, when I should live
A comfort to you, you shall have no cause,
How e're I stand accus'd, to hold your honour
Ship-wrack'd in such a Daughter.

Oli. O best friend, my honour's at the stake too, for——

Dor. Be silent; the King.

Enter King, Lemure, and Attendants.

Lem. Sir, if you please to look upon
The Prisoner, and the many services
Her Father hath done for you——

King.

King. We must look on
The cause, and not the persons. Yet beholding
With an impartial eye, th' excelling beauties
Of this fair Lady, which we did believe
Upon report, but till now never saw'em,
It moves a strange kind of compassion in me;
Let us survey you nearer, she's a book
To be with care perus'd; and 'tis my wonder,
If such mishapen guests, as lust and murder,
At any price should ever find a lodging
In such a beauteous Inn! Mistake us not,
Though we admire the outward structure, if
The rooms be foul within, expect no favour.
I were no man, if I could look on beautie
Distress'd, without some pity; but no King,
If any superficial gloss of feature
Could work me to decline the course of Justice.
But to the cause, Cleander's death, what proofs
Can you produce against her?

Ber. Royal Sir, touching that point my Brothers death,
We build on suppositions. (demn'd

King. Suppositions? how? Is such a Lady Sir to be con-
On suppositions? Ber. They are well grounded Sir:
And if we make it evident she is guilty
Of the first crime we charge her with, Adulterie,
That being the parent, it may find belief,
That murder was the issue. King. We allow
It may be so; but that it may be, must not Infer a necessary consequence
To cast away a Ladies life. What witnesses
To make this good?

Ber. The principal, this woman,
For many years her servant; she hath taken
Her oath in Court. Come forward.

King. By my Crown a lying face.

Clar. I swore Sir for the King:
And if you are the partie, as I do
Believe you are, for you have a good face,
How ever mine appears, swearing for you Sir,
I ought to have my oath pass.

King. Impudent too? well, what have you sworn?

Clar. That this Lady was
A goodly tempting Lady, as she is:
How thinks your Majestie? and I her servant,
Her officer as one would say, and trusted
With her closest Chamber-service; that Lisander
Was a fine timber'd Gentleman, and active,
That he cou'd do fine gambolls
To make a Lady merrie; that this pair,
A very loving couple, mutually
Affected one another: so much for them Sir.
That I, a simple waiting-woman, having taken
My bodily oath, the first night of admittance
Into her Ladiships service, on her slippers,
(That was the book) to serve her will in all things,
And to know no Religion but her pleasure,
'Tis not yet out of fashion with some Ladies;
That I, as the premisses shew, being commanded
To do my function, in conveyance of Lisander to her chamber, (my Lord absent,
On a pretended sickness) did the feat,
(It cannot be deny'd) and at dead mid-night
Left 'em together: what they did, some here
Can easily imagine? I have said, Sir.

Dor. The Devils Oratrix.

King. Then you confess you were her Bawd?

Clar. That's course, her Agent Sir.

King. So, goodie Agent? and you think there is No punishment due for you agentship?

Clar. Let her suffer first,
Being my better, for adulterie,
And I'll endure the Mulfet impos'd on Bawds,
Call it by the worst name.

Cal. Live I to hear this?

King. Take her aside. Your answer to this Lady?

Cal. Heav'n grant me patience: to be thus confronted,
(O pardon Royal Sir a womans passion)
By one, and this the worst of my mis-fortunes,
That was my slave, but never to such ends Sir,
Would give a statue motion into furie:
Let my pass'd life, my actions, nay intentions,
Be by my grand accuser justly censur'd,
(For her I scorn to answer) and if they
Yield any probability of truth
In that she urges, then I will confess
A guilty cause; the peoples voyce, which is
The voyce of truth, my husbands tenderness
In his affection to me, that no dotage
But a reward, of humbleness, the friendship
Echo'd through France between him and Lisander,
All make against her; for him, in his absence,
(What ever imputation it draw on me)
I must take leave to speak: 'tis true, he lov'd me,
But not in such a wanton way, his reason
Master'd his passions: I grant I had
At mid-night conference with him; but if he Ever receiv'd a farther favour from me,
Than what a Sister might give to a Brother,
May I sink quick: and thus much, did he know
The shame I suffer for him, with the loss
Of his life for appearing, on my soul
He would maintain.

Enter Lisander, and Alcidon.

Lisa. And will, thou clear example of womens pureness.

King. Though we hold her such,
Thou hast express'd thy self a desperate fool,
To thrust thy head into the Lions jaws,
The justice of thy King.

Lisan. I came prepar'd for't,
And offer up a guilty life to clear
Her innocence; the oath she took, I swear to;
And for Cleanders death, to purge my self
From any colour malice can paint on me,
Or that she had a hand in't, I can prove
That fatal night when he in his own house fell,
And many daies before, I was distant from it
A long daies journey.

Clarin. I am caught. Ber. If so,
How came your sword into this stewards hands? stand forth.

Mal. I have heard nothing that you spake:
I know I must dye, and what kind of death
Pray you resolve me, I shall go away else
In a qualm; I am very faint.

Enter Leon, Servants, and Guard.

King. Carry him off, his fear will kill him. [Ex. with Mal.

Dor. Sir, 'twas my ambition,
My Daughters reputation being wounded
I th' general opinion, to have it
Cur'd by a publick trial; I had else
Forborn your Majesties trouble: I'll bring forth
Cleanders murderer, in a wood I heard him
As I rode sadly by, unto himself
With some compunction, though this devil had none,
Lament what he had done, cursing her lust,
That drew him to that bloody fact. Le. To lessen
The foulness of it, for which I know justly
I am to suffer, and with my last breath
To free these innocents, I do confess all;
This wicked woman only guilty with me.

Clari. Is't come to this? thou puling Rogue, dye thou
With prayers in thy mouth; I'll curse the laws
By which I suffer, all I grieve for is,
That I dye unreveng'd. Leon. But one word more Sir,
And I have done; I was by accident where
Lisander met with Cloridon, and Crysanthes,
Was an ear witness when he fought for peace,

Nay, begg'd it upon colder terms than can
Almost find credit, his past deeds considered,
But they deaf to his reasons, severally
Assaulted him, but such was his good fortune,
That both fell under it; upon my death
I take it uncompel'd, that they were guilty
Of their own violent ends; and he against
His will, the instrument.

Alci. This I will swear too, for I was not far off.

Dor. They have alledg'd

As much to wake your sleeping mercy, Sir,
As all the Advocates of France can plead
In his defence. King. The criminal judge shall sentence
These to their merits — with mine own hand, Lady,
I take you from the bar and do my self
Pronounce you innocent. [Ex. with Leon, and Clari.]

All. Long live the King.

King. And to confirm you stand high in our favour,
And as some recompence for what you have
With too much rigour in your trial suffered;
Ask what you please, becoming me to grant,
And be posses'd of't. Cal. Sir, I dare not doubt
Your royal promise, in a King it is
A strong assurance, that emboldens me
Upon my humble knees to make my boon,
Lisander's pardon.

Dor. My good Genius did prompt her to it.

Leon. At your feet thus prostrate, I second her petition.

Alci. Never King

Pour'd forth his mercie on a worthier subject.

Ber. To witness my repentance for the wrong
In my unjust suspicion I did both;
I join in the same suit. Lis. The life you give,
Still ready to lay down for your service,
Shall be against your enemies employ'd,
Nor hazarded in brawles. All. Mercie, dread Sir.

King. So many pressing me, and with such reasons
Moving compassion, I hope it will not
Be censur'd levity in me, though I borrow
In this from justice to relieve my mercy;
I grant his pardon at your intercession,
But still on this condition; you Lisander,

In expiation of your guilt, shall build
A monument for my Cloridon, and Crysanthus;
And never henceforth draw a Sword, but when
By us you are commanded, in defence of
The flower de Luce, and after one years sorrow
For your dear friend, Cleanders wretched fate, Marry Calista.

Enter Lidian.

Lis. On your sacred hand, I vow to do it seriously.

Lid. Great Sir, stay,
Leave not your seat of justice, till you have Given sentence in a cause as much important
As this you have determined.

King. Lidian?

Enter Clarange, and Frier.

Lid. He Sir, your humblest subject, I accuse Clarange
Of falshood in true friendship at the height;
We both were suiters to this Lady, both
Injoyn'd one pennance. Clar. Trouble not the King
With an unnecessary repetition
Of what the court's familiar with already. King. Clarange?

Dor. With a shaven crown? Olin. Most strange.

Clar. Look on thy rival, your late servant, Madam,
But now devoted to a better Mistress,
The Church, whose orders I have took upon me:
I here deliver up my interest to her;
And what was got with cunning as you thought,
I simply thus surrender: heretofore,
You did outstrip me in the race of friendship,
I am your equal now. Dor. A suit soon ended.

Clar. And joyning thus your hands, I know both willing,
I may do in the Church my Friers Office
In marrying you. Lid. The victory is yours, Sir.

King. It is a glorious one, and well sets off
Our Scene of mercy; to the dead we tender
Our sorrow, to the living ample wishes
Of future happiness: 'tis a Kings duty
To prove himself a Father to his subjects:
And I shall hold it if this well succeed,
A meritorious, and praise worthy deed.

[Exeunt.]

Prologue.

A Story, and a known one, long since writ,
Truth must take place, and by an able wit,
Foul mouth'd detraction daring not deny
To give so much to Fletcher's memory;
If so, some may object, why then do you
Present an old piece to us for a new?
Or wherefore will your profest Writer be
(Not tax'd of theft before) a Plagiary?
To this he answers in his just defence,
And to maintain to all our Innocence,
Thus much, though he hath travell'd the same way,
Demanding, and receiving too the pay
For a new Poem, you may find it due,
He having neither cheated us, nor you;
He vows, and deeply, that he did nor spare
The utmost of his strengths, and his best care
In the reviving it, and though his powers

Could not as be desired, in three short hours
Contract the Subject, and much less express
The changes, and the various passages
That will be lock'd for, you may hear this day
Some Scenes that will confirm it is a play,
He being ambitious that it should be known
What's good was Fletcher's, and what ill his own.

Epilogue.

Still doubtfull, and perplex'd too, whether he
Hath done Fletcher right in this Historie;
The Poet sits within, since he must know it,
He with respect desires that you would shew it
By some accustomed sign, if from our action,
Or his indeavours you meet satisfaction,
With ours he hath his ends, we hope the best,
To make that certainty in you doth rest.

Nicholas Toolie.		John Underwood.
Robert Benfield.		George Birch.
John Thompson.		James Horn.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Alphonso, Curio, and Seberto.

Curio Signior Alphonso, ye are too rugged to her,
 Believe too full of harshness.
Alph. Yes, it seems so.
Seb. A Father of so sweet a child, so happy,
 Eye, Sir, so excellent in all endowments,
 In blessedness of beauty, such a mirror.
Alph. She is a fool, away.
Seb. Can ye be angry?
 Can any wind blow rough, upon a blossom
 So fair, and tender? Can a Fathers nature,

A noble Fathers too?

Alp. All this is but prating:
 Let her be rul'd; let her observe my humour,
 With my eyes let her see; with my ears listen;
 I am her Father: I begot her, bred her,
 And I will make her——

Cur. No doubt ye may compel her,
 But what a mischievous, unhappy fortune
 May wait upon this will of yours, as commonly
 Such forcings ever end in hates and ruines.

Alph. Is't not a man I wish her to? a strong man?
 What can she have? what could she have? a Gentleman?

A young man? and an able man? a rich man?
A handsome man? a valiant man? do you mark me?
None of your pieced-companions, your pin'd-Gallants,
That flie to fitters, with every flaw of weather:
None of your impt bravadoes: what can she ask more?
Is not a metal'd man fit for a woman?

A strong chin'd man? I'll not be fool'd, nor flurled.

Seb. I grant ye Roderigo is all these,
And a brave Gentleman: must it therefore follow
Upon necessity he must doat upon him?

Will ye allow no liberty in choosing?

Cur. Alas she is tender yet.

Alp. Enough, enough, enough, Sir:
She is malleable: she'll endure the hammer,
And why not that strong workman that strikes deepest?
Let me know that? she is fifteen, with the vantage,
And if she be not ready now for mannage—

Seb. You know he is a banish'd man: an Out-law;
And how he lives: his nature rough, and bloody
By customary Rapines: now, her sweet humour
That is as easie as a calm, and peaceful,
All her affections, like the dews on Roses,
Fair as the flowers themselves: as sweet and gentle:
How would you have these meet?

Alp. A bed, a bed, Sir:
Let her be the fairest Rose, and the sweetest,
Yet I know this fair Rose must have her prickles:
I grant ye Roderigo is an out-Law.
An easie composition calls him in again,
He is a valiant man, and he is a rich man,
And loves the fool: a little rough by custom:
She'll like him ten times better. She'll doat upon him,
If ere they come to grappling, run mad for him;
But there is another in the wind, some Castrel
That hovers over her, and dares her daily,
Some flickring slave.

Cur. I dare not think so poorly.

Alp. Something there is, and must be: but I shall scent it
And hunt it narrowly.

Seb. I never saw her yet
Make offer at the least glance of affection,
But still so modest, wise—

Alp. They are wise to gull us.
There was a fellow, old Ferando's son,
I must confess handsome, but my enemy,
And the whole family I hate: young Pearo,
That fellow I have seen her gaze upon,
And turn, and gaze again, and make such offers,
As if she would shoot her eyes like Meteors at him:
But that cause stands removed.

Cur. You need not doubt him,
For long since as 'twas thought on a griev'd Conscience,
He left his Father, and his Friends: more pity:
For truth reports he was a noble Gentleman.

Alp. Let him be what he will: he was a beggar,
And there I'll leave him.

Seb. The more the Court must answer;
But certainly I think, though she might favour him,
And love his goodness, as he was an honest man:
She never with loose eyes stuck on his person.

Alp. She is so full of Conscience too, and charity,
And outward holiness, she will undo me:
Relieves more Beggars, than an Hospital;

Enter Alinda, and Julietta.

And all poor Rogues, that can but say their prayers,
And tune their pipes to Lamentations,
She thinks she is bound to dance to: good morrow to you,
And that's as ye deserve too: you know my mind,
And study to observe it: do it cheerfully,
And readily, and home.

Alin. I shall obey ye.

But, noble Sir.

Alp. Come, come, away with your flatteries,
And your fine phrases.

Cur. Pray ye be gentle to her.

Alp. I know 'em; and know your feats: if you will find me
Noble and loving, seek me in your duty,
You know I am too indulgent.

Seb. Alas, poor Lady.

Alp. To your devotions: I take no good thing from you.
Come Gentlemen; leave pitying, and moaning of her
And praising of her vertues: and her whim-whams,
It makes her proud, and sturdy.

Seb. Cur. Good hours wait on ye.

[Exeunt.]

Alin. I thank ye, Gentlemen: I want such comforts:
I would thank you too Father: but your cruelty
Hath almost made me senseless of my duty,
Yet still I must know: would I had known nothing.
What Poor attend my charity to day, wench?

Jul. Of all sorts, Madam; your open handed bounty
Make's 'em flock every hour: some worthy your pity,
But others that have made a trade of begging.

Alin. Wench, if they ask it truly, I must give it:
It takes away the holy use of charity
To examine wants.

Jul. I would you would be merry:
A cheerful giving hand, as I think, Madam,
Requires a heart as chearful.

Alin. Alas Julietta,
What is there to be merry at? what joy now,
Unless we fool our own afflictions,
And make them shew ridiculous?

Jul. Sure, Madam,
You could not seem thus serious, if you were married;
Thus sad, and full of thoughts.

Alin. Married? to whom, wench?
Thou thinkst if there be a young handsome fellow,
As those are plentiful, our cares are quenched then.

Jul. Madam, I think a lusty handsome fellow
If he be kind, and loving, and a right one,
Is even as good a Pill, to purge this melancholy,
As ever Galen gave, I am sure more natural:
And merrier for the heart, than Wine and Saffron:
Madam, wanton youth is such a Cataplasme.

Alin. Who has been thy Tutor, Wench?

Jul. Even my own thoughts, Lady:
For though I be bar'd the liberty of talking,
Yet I can think unhappily, and as near the mark, Madam,
'Faith, marry, and be merry.

Alin. Who will have me?
Who will be troubled with a pettish Girl?
It may be proud, and to that vice expenceful?
Who can assure himself, I shall live honest?

Jul. Let every man take his fortune.

Alin. And o' my Conscience
If once I grow to breeding, a whole Kingdom
Will not contain my stock.

Jul. The more the merrier:
'Tis brave to be a mother of new Nations.

Alin. Why, I should bury a hundred Husbands.

Jul. 'Tis no matter!
As long as ye leave sufficient men to stock ye.

Alin. Is this thy mirth? are these the joyes of marriage?
Away light-headed fool; are these contentments?
If I could find a man—

Jul. You may a thousand.

Alin. Meer men I know I may: and there a Woman
Has liberty, (at least she'll venture for it)
To be a monster and become the time too;
But to enjoy a man, from whose example
(As from a compass) we may steer our fortunes,
Our actions, and our age; and safe arrive at
A memory that shall become our ashes,
Such things are few, and far to seek; to find one
That can but rightly mannage the wild beast, Woman,
And sweetly govern with her. But no more of this, Wench,
'Tis not for thy discourse: Let's in, and see
What poor afflicted wait our charity.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter a Porter, 4 Beggers, Pedro, and a Pilgrim.

Por. Stand off, and keep your ranks: twenty foot further:
There louse your selves with reason and discretion.
The Sun shines warm: the farther still the better,
Your beasts will bolt anon, and then 'tis dangerous.

1 Beg. Heaven blefs our Mistris.

Por. Does the crack go that way?
'Twill be o'th' other side anon.

2 Beg. Pray ye friend.

Por. Your friend? and why your friend? why goodman turn-
What dost thou see within me, or without me,
Or what itch dost thou know upon me, tell me,
That I should be thy friend? what do I look like
Any of thy acquaintance hung in Gibbets?
Hast thou any Friends, Kindred, or Alliance,
Or any higher ambition, than an Alms-basket?

2 Beg. I would be your worships friend.

Por. So ye shall, Sirrah,
When I quarter the same louse with ye.

3 Beg. 'Tis twelve o' clock.

Por. 'Tis ever so with thee, when thou hast done scratching,
For that provokes thy stomach to ring noon;
O the infinite Seas of Porridge thou hast swallow'd!
And yet thou lookst as if they had been but Glysters;
Thou feedst abundance, thou hadst need of sustenance;
Alms do you call it to relieve these Rascals?

Enter Alphonso, Curio, and Seberto.

Nothing but a general rot of sheep can satisfie 'em.

Alp. Did not I tell you, how she would undo me?
What Marts of Rogues, and Beggers?

Seb. 'Tis charity
Methinks, you are bound to love her for——

Alp. Yes, I warrant ye,
If men could sale to Heaven in Porridge-pots, (make?)
With malts of Beef, and Mutton, what a Voyage should I
What are all these?

1 Beg. Poor people, and 't like your worship.

1 Beg. Wretched poor people.

3 Beg. Very hungry people.

Alp. And very Lousy.

4 Beg. Yes forsooth, so, so.

Por. I'll undertake five hundred head about 'em,
And that's no needy Grafsier.

Alp. What are you?

Pil. Strangers that come to wonder at your charity,
Yet people poor enough to beg a blessing.

Cur. Use them with favour, Sir, their shews are reverent,
It seems ye are holy Pilgrims?

Pil. Ye guess right, Sir,
And bound far off, to offer our devotions.

Alp. What make ye this way? we keep no Reliques here,
Nor holy Shrines.

Pil. The holiest we ere heard of;
Ye keep a living monument of goodness,
A Daughter of that pious excellence,
The very Shrines of Saints sink at her vertues,
And swear they cannot hold pace with her pieties,
We come to see this Lady: not with prophane eyes,
Nor wanton bloods. to doat upon her beauties,
But through our tedious wayes to beg her blessings.

Alp. This is a new way of begging, and a neat one,
And this cries mony for reward, good store too;
These commendations beg not with bag, and bottle;
Well, well, the Saining of this Woman, Gentlemen,
I know what it must come to: these Women Saints
Are plaguy heavy Saints: they out-weigh a he-saint
Three thousand thick; I know: I feel.

Seb. Ye are more afraid than hurt, Sir.

Alp. Have you your commendations ready too?
He bows, and nods.

Cur. A handsome well built person.

Alp. What Country-craver are you? nothing but motion?
A puppet-Pilgrim?

Pil. He's a stranger, Sir;
This four days I have Travel'd in his Company,
But little of his business, or his Language
As yet I have understood.

Seb. Both young and handsome,
Only the Sun has been too saucy with him. (blessing)

Alp. Would ye have mony, Sir, or meat? what kind of Does your devotion look for? Still more ducking?
Be there any Saints, that understand by signs only?
More motion yet? this is the prettiest Pilgrim,
The pink of Pilgrims: I'll be for ye, Sir;
Do ye discourse with signs? ye are heartily welcome:
A poor viaticum; very good gold, Sir:
But holy men affect a better treasure.

I kept it for your goodness, but ne'rtheless
Since it can prove but burthensome to your holiness,
And that you affect light prayer, fit for carriage,
I'll put this up again.

Cur. Ye are too unreverent.

Alp. Ye talk too broad! must I give way, and wealth too
To every toy, that carries a grave seeming?
Must my good Angels wait on him? if the proud hilding
Would yield but to my will, and know her duty
I know what I would suffer.

Seb. Good Sir, be patient,
The wrongs ye do these men, may light on you,
Too heavy too: and then you will wish you had said less;
A comely and sweet usage becomes strangers.

Alp. We shall have half the Kingdom strangers shortly,
And this fond prodigality be suffer'd;
But I must be an Ass, see 'em relieved, sirrah;
If I were young again, I would sooner get Bear-whelps,
And safer too, than any of these she-saints,
But I will break her.

Cur. Such a face for certain.

Seb. Me thinks I have seen it too: but we are cozen'd;
But fair befall thee Pilgrim, thou lookst lovely. [Exit.]

Por. Will ye troop up, ye Porridge Regiment?

Enter Alinda, and Julietta.

Captain Poors quarter will ye move?

Alin. Ye dull Knave,
Are not these wretches served yet?

Beg. 'Bless my Mistris.

Alin. Do you make sport, Sir, with their miseries?
Ye droulie Rogue.

Por. They are too high fed, Madam,
Their stomachs are a sleep yet.

Alin. Serve 'em plentifully,
Or I'll serve you out next: even out o' doors, sirrah;
And serve 'em quickly too.

Beg. Heaven blefs the Lady.

Alin. Bless the good end I mean it for.

Jul. I would I knew it:

If it be for any mans sake, I'll cry Amen too.
Well, Madam, ye have even as pretty a port of Pensioners.

Alin. Vain glory would seek more, and handsomer.
But I appeal to vertue what my end is; [Ex. Beggers.]
What men are these?

Jul. It seems they are holy Pilgrims:
That handsome youth should suffer such a penance,
Would I were even the Saint they make their vows to,
How easily I would grant!

Pil. Heavens grace in-wheel ye:
And all good thoughts, and prayers dwell about ye,
Abundance be your friend; and holy charity
Be ever at your hand to crown ye glorious.

Alin. I thank ye, Sir; peace guide your travels too,
And what you wish for most, end all your troubles;
Remember me by this: and in your prayers
When your strong heart melts, meditate my poor fortunes.

Pil. All my Devotions wait upon your service.

Alin. Are you of this Country, Sir?

Pil. Yes, worthiest Lady,
But far off bred; my Fortunes farther from me.

Alin. Gentle, I dare believe.

Pil. I have liv'd freer.

Alin. I am no inquisitor, that were too curious;
Whatever Vow, or Penance pulls you on, Sir;
Conscience, or Love, or stubborn Disobedience,
The Saint ye kneel to, hear, and ease your travels.

Pil. Yours ne'r begin; and thus I seal my Prayers.

[Exit.

Alin. How constantly this man looks? how he sighs?
Some great affliction hatches his Devotions,
Right holy Sir, how young, and sweet he suffers?

Jul. Would I might suffer with him.

Alin. He turns from us;

Alas, he weeps too; something presses him
He would reveal, but dare not; Sir, be comforted,
Ye come for that; and take it; if it be want, Sir,
To me ye appear so worthy of relieving,
I am your Steward; Speak, and take; he's dumb still;
Now as I have a faith, this man so stirs me,
His modesty makes me afraid I have trespassed.

Jul. Would he wou'd stir me too, I like his shape well.

Alin. May be he would speak alone; go off, Juletta,
Afflicted hearts fear their own motions.

Be not far off.

Jul. Would I were nearer to him,
A young smug handsom holiness has no fellow. [Exit.

Al. Why do you grieve? do you find your penance sharp?

Or are the vows ye've made too mighty for ye?
Does not the World allure ye to look back,
And sorrow for the sweet time ye have lost?
Ye are young, and fair; be not deluded, Sir,
A manly made-up heart contemns these shadows,
And yours appear no less, griefs for your fears,
For hours ill-spent, for wrongs done rash, and rudely,
For foul contempts, for faiths ill violated,
Become fears well; I dare not task your goodness;
And then a sorrow shews in his true glory,
When the whole heart is excellently sorry,
I pray ye be comforted.

Ped. I am, dear Lady,
And such a comfort ye have cast upon me,
That though I struggle with mine own calamities
Too mighty, and too many for my mannage,
And though, like angry waves, they curl'd upon me,
Contending proudly who should first devour me,
Yet I would stem their danger.

Alin. He speaks nobly;
What do you want?

Ped. All that can make me happy;
I want my self.

Alin. Your self? who rob'd ye, Pilgrim?
Why does he look so constantly upon me?
I want my self; indeed, ye holy Wanderers
Are said to seek much, but to seek your selves—

Ped. I seek my self, and am but my self's shadow,
'Have lost my self; and now am not so noble.

Alin. I seek my self; something I yet remember
That bears that Motto; 'tis not he, he's younger,
And far more tender; for that self-sake (Pilgrim)
Be who it will, take this.

Ped. Your hand I dare take,
That be far from me, Lady, thus I kiss it;
And thus I bless it too; Be constant fair still,
Be good, and live to be a great example. [Exit.

Alin. One word more (Pilgrim) has amaz'd me strang-
Be constant fair still; 'tis the Posie here; (ly,
And here without, Be good; he wept to see me. Juletta.

Enter Juletta.

Jul. Madam.

Alin. Take this Key, and fetch me

The marygold-Jewel that lies in my little Cabinet;
I think 'tis that; what eyes had I to miss him? [Ex. Jul.
O me, what thoughts? he had no beard then, and
As I remember well, he was more ruddy.

Enter Juletta.

If this be he, he has a manly face yet;
A goodly shape.

Jul. Here Madam.

Alin. Let me see it;
'Tis so true, it must be he, or nothing,
He spake the words just as they stand engraven here:
I seek my self, and am but my self's shadow;
Alas, poor man! didst thou not meet him, Juletta?
The Pilgrim, Wench?

Jul. He went by long ago, Madam.

Alin. I forgot to give him something.

Jul. 'Twas ill done, Lady;
For o' my troth, he is the handsomest man
I saw this many a day; would he had all my wealth,
And me to boot; what ails she to grow so fullen?

Alin. Come, I forgot, but I will recompence it.

[Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Alphonso, Curio, Seberto, Juletta,
Porter, and Servants.

(solve me;

Alph. CAN she slip through a Cat-hole? tell me that; re-
Can she fly in the air? is she a thing invisible?
Gone, and none know it!

Seb. You amaze your servants. (ing,

Alph. Some pelting Rogue has watcht her hour of itch-
And claw'd her, claw'd her, do you mark me? claw'd her;
Some that I foster up.

Cur. They are all here, Sir.

Alph. Let 'em be where they will, they are arrant Rascals,
And by this hand, I'll hang all.

Seb. Deal calmly;

You will not give 'em time to answer ye.

Al. I'll choak 'em, famish 'em, what say you, Wagtail?
You knew her mind; you were of counsel with her,
Tell me, and tell me true.

Cur. Ask with discretion.

Alph. Discretion? hang discretion, hang ye all:
Let me know where she is.

Jul. Would you know o' me, Sir?

Al. O' thee, Sir? I, o' thee, Sir; what art thou Sir?

Jul. Her woman, Sir, and't like your Worship, Sir.

Alph. Her Bawd, her Fiddle-stick;
Her Lady-fairy, to oyl the doors o' nights,
That they may open with discretion,
Her Gin, her Nut-Crack.

Jul. 'Tis very well, Sir. (ble;

Alph. Thou lyest; 'tis damnable ill, 'tis most abomina-
Will ye confess (Thing?)

Jul. Say I were guilty, Sir;
I would be hang'd before I would confess;
Is this a World to confess in?

Cur. Deal directly.

Jul. Yes, if my matter lye direct before me;
But when I am forc'd, and ferretted.

Alph. Tell me the truth,
And as I live, I'll give thee a new Petticoat.

Jul. And you would give me ten, I would not tell ye,
Truths bear a greater price than you are aware of.

Seb. Deal modestly.

Jul. I do not pluck my Cloaths up,

Al. What say you, Sirrah? you? or you? are ye dumb all?
Port. I saw her last night, and't shall like your Worship,
When I serv'd in her Livery.

Alph

Alph. What's that, Sirrah?

Port. Her Chamber-pot, and't please you.

Seb. A new Livery.

Alph. Where lay she? who lay with her?

Port. In truth, not I, Sir;

I lay with my fellow Frederick in the flea-Chamber,
And't like your Worship, we are almost worried.

Jul. I left her by her self, in her own Closet,
And there I thought she had slept.

Alph. Why lay you from her?

Jul. It was her will I should; she is my Mistress,
And my part is obedience.

Alph. Were all the doors lock'd?

Port. All mine.

Ser. And mine; she could not get out those ways
Unless she leapt the walls; and those are higher
Than any Womans courage dare aspire at.

Alph. Come, you must know.

Cur. Conceal it not, but deal plain.

Jul. If I did know, and her trust lay upon me,
Not all your angers nor your flatteries
Should make me speak, but having no more interest
Than I may well deliver to the air,
I'll tell ye what I know, and tell it liberally,
I think she is gone, because we cannot find her;
I think she is weary of your tyranny,
And therefore gone; may be she is in love;
May be in love, where you show no great liking,
And therefore gone; May be some point of Conscience,
Or vow'd Devotion.

Alph. These are nothing, minion;
You that can aim at these, must know the truth too.

Jul. Any more truth than this if I know, hang me,
Or where to search for it, if I make a lye
To gain your love, and envy my best Mistress,
Pin me against a wall with my heels upward,

Alph. Out of my doors.

Jul. That's all my poor petition;
For if your house were Gold, and she not in it,
Sir, I should count it but a Cage to whistle in.

Alph. Whore, if she be above ground, I will have her.

Jul. I would live in a Coal-pit then, were I your daughter.

Seb. Certain she does not know, Sir. (ter.)

Alph. Hang her, hang her;

She knows too much; search all the house, all corners,
And where'tis possible she may go out, [Ex. Servants.]
If I do find your tricks.

Jul. Reward me for 'em.

Or if I had such tricks, you could discover
So weak, and slightly woven, you might look through,
All the young Girls should hoot me out o' th' Parish;
You are my Master, but you own an anger
Becomes a School-Boy that hath lost his Apples;
Will ye force things into our knowledges?

Alph. Come hither, Julietta, thou didst love me.

Jul. And do still,

You are my Ladies Father, and I reverence ye.

Alph. Thou would'st have pleas'd my humour.

Jul. Any good way,
That carried not suspicion in't, or flattery,
Or fail of trust.

Alph. Come, come, thou wouldst have——

Jul. Stay, Sir.

Alph. And thou hast felt my bounty for't, and shalt do.
Dost thou want Cloaths or Money?

Jul. Both.

Alph. 'Shalt have both.

Jul. But not this way, I had rather be an Adamite,
And bring Fig-tree leaves into fashion again.
If you were young, Sir,
Handsome, and fitted to a Womans appetite;
And I a giddy-headed Girl, that car'd for nothing,
Much might be done; then you might fumble with me,
And think to grope out matters of some moment,

Which now you will put too short for;

For what you have seen hitherto,
And know by me, has been but honest service,
Which I dare pin i'th' market-place to answer;
And let the World, the Flesh, and Devil examine it,
And come you in too, I dare stand your strictest.
And so much good may do you, with your dreams of cour-
Alph. This is most monstrous. (teste)

Enter Porter, and Servants.

Seb. Sure she does not know, Sir;
She durst not be so confident, and guilty. (covered?)

Alph. How now, what news? what hopes and steps dis-
Speak any thing that's good, that tends to th' matter;
Do you stand staring still?

1 Serv. We are no gods, Sir,
To say she is here or there, or what she is doing;
But we have search'd.

Port. I am sure she is not i'th' Cellar;
For look you, Sir, if she had been i'th' Cellar——

Alph. I am sure thou hast been there.

Port. As I carried the matter,
For I search'd every piece of Wine; yes sure, Sir,
And every little Terefe, that could but testify;
And I drew hard to bolt her out.

Alph. Away with him;
Fling him i'th' Hay-mow, let him lye a mellowing;
He stinks of Muskadel like an English Christmas;
Are these your cares? your services?

2 Serv. Pray ye hear, Sir,
We have found where she went out, her very footing.

Alph. Where, where? go on.

Cur. Observe then with more stayedness.

2 Ser. Searching the Garden at the little Postern
That opens to the Park, we first discovered it.

Alph. A little foot?

1 Serv. It must be hers, or none, Sir.

Alph. How far beyond that?

1 Serv. To the Park it leads us,
But there the ground being hard, we could not mark it.

Alph. She always kept that Key; I was a Coxcomb,
A Fool, an Ass, to give a Girl that liberty;
Saddle my Horses, Rogues, ye drunken Varlets,
Your precious diligence lies in Pint-pots,
Your Brains in Butts, my Horses, ye pin-Buttocks.
You'll bear me Company?

Seb. We dare not leave ye,
Unless we found a quieter soul within ye.

Cur. If we may do the Lady any service,
Sweet, gentle Soul.

Alph. I say again, my horses,
Are ye so hot? have ye your private Pilgrimages?
Must ye be jumping, Joan? I'll wander with ye;
I'll jump ye, and I'll juggle ye, my horses;
And keep me this young Lirry-poop within doors,
I will discover, Dame.

Jul. 'Tis fit you should, Sir,
If ye knew what; well Love, if thou beest with her,
Or what power else that arms her resolution,
Conduct her fair, and keep her from this mad-man,
Direct her to her wishes; dwell about her,
That no dishonourable end o'rtake her,
Danger, or want; and let me try my fortune.

Alph. You know the place we meet in?

Seb. We shall hit it.

Alph. And as ye are honest Gentlemen, endeavour.

Cur. We'l search the best we can; if she light in our hands.

Alph. I'll tye her to the horse-tail.

Seb. We know how to use her,
But not your way, for all your state.

Alph. Make haste there; (Damsel,
And get you in, and look to th' house. If you stir out,
Or set a foot any new motion this way,
When I come home (which will be suddenly)

You know my mind ; if you do play the Rascal,
I have my eyes and ears in fundry places,
If ye do prounce.

Fil. I shall do that that's fit, Sir ;
And fit to cross your fooleries ; I'll fail else :
And so I'll to my Chamber.

Alph. To your Prayers,
And leave your stubborn tricks ; she is not far yet,
She cannot be, and we dividing suddenly.

Cur. Keep her from thy hands, I beseech.

Alph. Our horses ;
Come cheerfully. I'll teach her to run gadding. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Roderigo, and four Out-Laws.

1 Out-law. Captain, y'are not merry.

Rod. We get nothing,
We have no sport ; whoring and drinking spoils us,
We keep no Guards.

2 Out-law. There come no Passengers,
Merchants, nor Gentlemen, nor whosoever,
But we have tribute.

Rod. And whilst we spend that idly,
We let those pass that carry the best purchase.
I'll have all search'd, and brought in : Rogues, and Beggars,
Have got the trick now to become Bank-masters.
I'll have none scape ; only my friends and neighbours,
That may deliver to the King my innocence ;
Those I would have regarded ; 'tis policy.
But otherwise nor gravities, nor shadows,
Appear they how they will, they may have purses,
For they shall pay.

3 Out-law. You speak now like a Captain.
And if we spare, fley us, and coin our Cassocks,
Will ye look blith ?

Rod. You hear no preparation
The King intends against us yet ?

4 Out-law. Not a word, Sir,
Good man, he's troubled with matter of more moment,
Humming of higher nature vex his brains, Sir,
Do not we see his Garrisons ?

Rod. Who are out now ? (stirring)

4 Out-law. Good fellows, Sir, that if there be any purchase
Will strike it dead ; Jaques, and Lopez, Lads,
That know their Quarters, as they know their Knapfacks ;
And will not off.

Rod. Where is the Boy ye brought me ?
A pretty Lad, and of a quick capacity,
And bred up neatly.

1 Out-law. He's within at meat, Sir,
The Knave is hungry, yet he seasons all
He eats or drinks with many tears and sighings,
The saddest appetite I ever lookt on ;
The Boy is young, 'tis fear, and want of company,
He knows, and loves ; use him not rough, and harshly,
He will be quickly bold ; I'll entertain him ;
I want a pretty Boy to wait upon me,
And when I am sad or sleepy, to prate to me ;
Besides there's something in his face I like well.
And still the more I look, more like ; let him want nothing,
And use him gently, all.

2 Out-law. Here's a small Box, Sir,
We took about him, which he griev'd to part with,
May be some Wealth.

Rod. Alas, some little money
The poor Knave carried to defray his lodgings,
I'll give it him again, and add unto it.
'T were sin to open such a petty purchase.

Enter Lopez, and Jaques with Pedro. (diers ?)

How now, who is this ? what have you brought me, Soul-
Lop. We know not well, what a strange staving fellow,
Sullen enough I am sure.

Rod. Where took ye him ?

Jaq. Upon the Skirt o' th' wood, viewing, and gaping,
And sometime standing still, as if he had meant
To view the best accesles to our quarters ;
Money he has enough ; and when we threatned him,
He smil'd, and yielded ; but not one word utter'd.

Lop. His habit says he's holy, if his heart
Keep that proportion too, 'tis best ye free him,
We keep his wallet here ; I am sure 'tis heavy.

Rod. Pilgrim, come hither, Sir, are you a Pilgrim ?
A piece of pretty holiness ; do you shrink, Sir ?
A simg young Saint. What Country were you born in ?
Ye have a Spanish face ; In a dumb Province ?
And had your Mother too this excellent Vertue ?
No tongue do you say ? sure she was a matchless woman ;
What a fine family is this man sprung from !

Certain he was begotten in a Calm,
When all was hush'd ; the Midnight was dumb Midnight ;
Are ye seal'd up ? or do you scorn to answer ?
Ye are in my hands, and I have Medicines for ye
Can make ye speak : pull off his Bonnet, Souldiers ;
Ye have a speaking face.

Lop. I am sure a handsome ;
This Pilgrim cannot want She-Saints to pray to.

Rod. Stand nearer, ha ?

Ped. Come, do your worst, I am ready. (him ;)

Rod. Is your tongue found ? go off, and let me talk with
And keep your watches round.

All. We are ready, Captain.

Rod. So, now what are ye ?

Ped. Am I ?

My habit shews me what I am.

Rod. Thy heart
A desperate fool, and so thy fate shall tell thee.
What Devil brought thee hither ? for I know thee.

Ped. I know thou dost, and since it is my fortune
To light into thy fingers, I must think too
The most malicious of all Devils brought me,
Yet some men say thou art noble.

Rod. Not to thee,
That were a benefit to mock the Giver ;
Thy father hates my friends, and family,
And thou hast been the heir of all this malice.
Can two such storms meet then, and part with kissing ?

Ped. You have the mightier hand.

Rod. And so I'll use it.
Ped. I cannot hinder ye ; less can I beg
Submissive at his knees that knows not honour,
That bears the Stamp of Man, and not his Nature ;
Ye may do what ye please.

Rod. I will do all. (ruine,
Ped. And when you have done all, which is my poor
(For farther your base malice cannot venture)
Dishonours self will cry you out a Coward.
Hadst thou been brave, and noble, and an Enemy,
Thou wouldst have fought me whilst I carried Arms,
Whilst my good Sword was my profession,
And then have cryed out, Pedro, I despise thee ;
Then stuck Alphonso's quarrel on the point,
The mercenary anger thou serv'st under,
To get his Daughter. Then thou shouldst have brav'd me,
And arm'd with all thy Families hate upon thee,
Done something worthy feat ; Now poor and basely
Thou setst Toyls to betray me ; and like the Peasant,
That dares not meet the Lion in the face,
Dig'st crafty pit-falls : thou sham'st the Spanish Honour ;
Thou hast neither point of Man, nor Conscience in thee.

Rod. Sir, Sir, y'are brave, ye plead now in a Sanctuary,
You think your Pilgrims Bulwark can defend ye ;
You will not find it so,

Ped. I look not for't.
The more unhallowed soul hast thou to offer it. (est,

Rod. When you were bravest, Sir, and your sword sharp-
I durst affront ye ; when the Court Sun gilded ye,
And

And every cry was the young hopeful Pedro,
Alonso's sprightly Son; then durst I meet ye,
 When you were Master of this fame, and fashion,
 And all your glories in the full Meridian,
 The Kings proof-favour buckled on your body;
 Had we then come to competition,
 Which I have often sought.

Pedro. And I desir'd too. (slight it,

Rod. You should have seen this Sword, how e're you
 And felt it too; sharper than sorrow felt it,
 In execution quicker than thy scorns;
 Thou should'st have seen all this, and shrunk to see it,
 Then like a Gentleman I would have us'd thee,
 And given thee the fair fortune of thy being,
 Then with a Souldiers arm I had honour'd thee;
 But since thou stealst upon me like a Spie,
 And thief-like thinkst that holy case shall carry thee
 Through all my purposes, and so betray me,
 Base as the act, thy end be, and I forget thee.

Ped. What poor evasions thou buildst on, to abuse me?
 The goodness of a man ne'r taught these principles.
 I come a Spie? durst any noble spirit
 Put on this habit, to become a Traitor?
 Even in an Enemy shew me this antipathy
 Where there is Christian faith, and this not reverenced:
 I come a Spie? no Roderigo, no,
 A hater of thy person, a maligner?
 So far from that, I brought no malice with me,
 But rather when I meet thee, tears to soften thee;
 When I put on this habit, I put off
 All fires, all angers, all those starts of youth
 That clapt too rank a bias to my being,
 And drew me from the right mark all should aim at;
 In stead of stubborn steel, I put on prayers;
 For rash and hasty heats, a sweet repentance:
 Long weary steps, and vows, for my vain-glories.

O Roderigo.

Rod. If thy tongue could save thee,
 Prating be thy bail, thou hast a rare benefit.
 Souldiers, come out, and bring a halter with ye;
 I'll forgive your holy habit, Sir, but I'll hang you.

Enter Out-laws, Loper, Jaques.

1 Out-l. Wherefore this halter Captain?

Rod. For this traytor.

Go, put it on him, and then tie him up.

1. Do you want a Band Sir? this is a course wearing,
 'Twill fit but scurvily upon this collar;
 But patience is as good as a French Pickadel.

Lop. What's his fault, Captain?

Rod. 'Tis my will he perish,
 And that's his fault.

Ped. A Captain of good government.
 Come Souldiers, come, ye are roughly bred, and bloody,
 Shew your obedience, and the joy ye take
 In exccuting impious commands;
 Ye have a Captain seals your liberal pardons,
 Be no more Christians, put religion by,
 'Twill make ye cowards: feel no tendernefs,
 Nor let a thing call'd conscience trouble ye;
 Alas, 'twill breed delay. Bear no respect
 To what I seem; were I a Saint indeed,
 Why should that stagger ye? you know not holiness:
 To be excellent in evil, is your goodness;
 And be so, 'twill become ye: have no hearts,
 For fear you should repent: that will be dangerous:
 For if there be a knocking there, a pricking,
 And that pulse beat back to your considerations,
 How ye have laid a stiff hand on Religion——

Rod. Trufts him I say.

Ped. And violated faith.

Rod. Hear him not prate.

Ped. Why, what a thing will this be?
 What strange confusion then will breed among ye?

Rod. Will none of ye obey?

Ped. What Devils vex ye?

The fears ye live in and the hourly dangers
 Will be delights to these: those have their ends,
 But these outlive all time, and all repentance:
 And if it creep into your conscience once,
 Be sure ye lock that close.

Rod. Why stand ye gazing?

Ped. Farewel sleep, peace, all that are humane comforts,
 Better ye had been Trees, or Stones, and happier;
 For those die here, and seek no further being,
 Nor hopes, nor punishments.

Rod. Rots take ye, Rascals.

Jaq. What would you have us do?

Rod. Dispatch the prater.

Jaq. And have religious blood hang on our consciences?
 We are bad enough already: sins enough
 To make our graves even loath us.

Rod. No man love me?

Lop. Although I be a thief, I am no hangman;
 They are two mens trades, and let another execute.
 Lay violent hands on holy things?

Rod. Base Cowards,

Put to your powers, ye rascals, I command ye.
 Holy, or unholy, if I say it,
 I'll have it done.

1 Out-l. If I do't, let me starve for't.

2. Or I.

3. Or I: we will obey things handfom,
 And bad enough, and overdo obedience:
 But to be made such instruments of mischief.

Jaq. I have done as many villanies as another,
 And with as little reluctance,
 Let me come clear of these, and wipe that score off.
 Put me upon a felt and known perdition?

Rod. Have ye conspir'd, ye slaves?

Ped. How vilely this shows,
 In one that would command anothers temper,
 And bear no bound in's own?

Rod. Am I thus jaded?

Ped. Is it my life thou long'st for Roderigo?
 And can no sacrifice appease thy malice,
 But my blood spilt? do it thy self, dispatch it;
 And as thou takst the whole revenge unto thee,
 Take the whole sin upon thee; and be mighty,
 Mighty in evil, as thou art in anger:
 And let not these poor wretches houl for thy sake.
 Those things that in thine own glass seem most monstrous,
 Wouldst thou abuse their weak fights with, for amiable?
 Is it, thou thinkst to fear me with thy terrors,
 And into weak condition draw my vertue?
 If I were now to learn to die I would sue thee:
 Or did I fear death, then I would make thee glorious.
 But knowing what, and how far I can suffer;
 And all my whole life being but deaths preface,
 My sleep but at next door.

Rod. Are ye so valiant?

I'll make ye feel: I'll make ye know, and feel too;
 And Rascals, you shall tremble. Keep him here,
 And keep him safe too: if he scape your guards——

Ped. Fear not, I will not.

Rod. As I live, ye die for't;

I will not be thus baffled.

[Exit.
Ja. What a Devil have ye done, Pilgrim? or what mischief
 Have you conspir'd, that he should rage and rave thus?
 Have you kill'd his Father, or his Mother? or strangled any (of his kindred?)

Lop. Has he no Sisters? have you not been bouncing
 About their belly-pieces?

Jaq. Why should that be dangerous,
 Or any way deserve death? is it not natural?

Bar us the Christian liberty of women,
 And build us up with brick, take away our free-stone. (ence

1 Out-l. Because thou art holier than he, upon my consci-
 He

He does not envy thee : that's not his quarrel ;
For, look you, that might be compounded without prayers.

Lop. Nor that thou seemst an honest man : for here
We have no trading with such Tinsel-stuff ;
To be an excellent thief, is all we aim at. (us?)
Wilt thou take a spit and stride, and see if thou canst outrun

Ped. I scorn to shift his fury, keep your obedience ;
For though your government admit no president,
Keep your selves carefull in't.

Faq. Thou wilt be hang'd then.

Ped. I cannot die with fewer faults upon me. (in him
2 Out-l. 'Tis ten to one he will shoot him : for the Devil's
If he hang him himself.

Lop. He has too proud a nature :
He will compel some one.

Faq. I am confident.

Lop. And so are all I think.

Ped. Be not molested,

If I must die, let it not trouble you ;
It stirs not me : it is the end I was born for.

Only this honest office I desire ye,
(If there be courtesie in men of your breed)

To see me buried ; not to let his fury
Expose my body to the open violence
Of beasts, and fowls : so far I urge humanity.

Enter Roderigo, Alinda.

Faq. He shall not deny us that : we'll see ye under ground,
And give ye a volly of as good cups of Sack,
For that's our Discipline.

Lop. He comes again,
As high in rage as ever ; the boy with him.

1 Out-l. Will he compel the child ?

Lop. He is bent to do it,
And must have some body.

Rod. If thou lov'st me do it :
Love me, or love me not, I say thou shalt do it :
Stare not, nor stagger, Sirrah ; if ye deny me,
Do you see this Rogue ?

Alin. What would ye have me do Sir ?
Heavens goodness blefs me.

Rod. Do ? why hang a Rascal,
That would hang me.

Alin. I am a boy, and weak, Sir.

Rod. Thou art strong enough to tie him to a Bough,
And turn him off : come, thou shalt be my Jewel,
And I'll allow thee horse, and all thy pleasures,
And twenty gallant things : I'll teach thee arms too ;
Make thee mine heir.

Alin. Let me inherit death first.

Rod. Make me not angry, Sirrah.

Alin. Which is the man, Sir ?
I'll pluck up the best heart I can yet.

Rod. Fear not,
It is my will : That in the Pilgrims coat there,
That Devil in the Saints skin.

Alin. Guard me goodness.

Rod. Dispatch him presently.

Ped. I wait your worst, Sir.

Faq. Will the boy do it ? is the rogue so confident ?
So young, so deep in blood ?

Lop. He shakes, and trembles. (ence,

Ped. Dost thou seek more coals still to fear thy consci-
Work sacred innocence, to be a Devil ?
Do't thy self for shame, thou best becom'st it.

Rod. Sirrah, I scorn my finger should be fil'd with thee ;
And yet I'll have it done : this child shall strangle thee,
A crying Girle, if she were here, should master thee.

Alin. How should I save him ? how my self from violence ?

Ped. Leave your tongue-valour, and dispatch your hate, Sir ;
The patience of my death, shall more torment thee,
(Thou painted honour, thou base man made backward)
Than all my life has fear'd thee.

Rod. Gag him, Sirrah.

Faq. The Boy looks cheerfully now : sure he will do it.

Lop. He will mall him else.

Alin. Are ye prepar'd to die, Sir ?

Ped. Yes boy, and ready ; prethee to thy business.

Alin. Why are ye then so angry ? so perplext, Sir ?
Patience wins Heaven, and not the heat of passion.
Why do you rayle ?

Lop. The boy's a pretty Priest.

Ped. I thank ye gentle child, you teach me truly.

Alin. You seem to fear too.

Ped. Thou feest more, than I feel, boy.

Alin. You tremble sure.

Ped. No sure boy, 'tis thy tenderness :
Prethee make haste, and let that gulph be satisfied.

Alin. Are ye so willing to go to it ?

Ped. Most willing :

I would not borrow from his courtesie
One hour of life, to gain an age of glory.

Alin. And is your reckoning straight Sir ?

Ped. As straight as truth, boy :

I cannot go more joyfully to a wedding.

Alin. Then to your prayers : I'll dispatch ye presently.

Now guide my tongue, thou blessedness.

Rod. A good boy.

Alin. But hark ye Sir, one word ; and pray ye resolve me.
Let me speak privately.

Rod. What wouldst thou have child ?

Alin. Shall this man die ?

Rod. Why dost thou make that question ?

Alin. Pray ye be not angry : if he must, I'll do it.
But must he now ?

Rod. What else ? who dare reprieve him ?

Alin. Pray ye think again ; and as your injuries
Are great, and full, you suffer from this fellow,
Do not ye purpose so to suit your vengeance ?

Rod. I do, and must.

Alin. You cannot if he die now.

Rod. Cannot ?

Alin. No, cannot : be not vext, you'll find it :
I have considered, and I know it certain,
Ye suffer below him : lose all your angers.

Rod. Why, my best boy ?

Alin. I love, and tender ye,
I would not tell ye else. Is that revenge,
To slight your cause, and Saint your enemy,
Clap the Doves wings of downy peace unto him,
And let him soar to Heaven, whilst you are fighting ?
Is this revenge ?

Rod. I would have him die.

Alin. Prepar'd thus ?

The blessing of a Father never reach'd it :
His contemplation now scorns ye, contemns ye,
And all the tortures ye can use. Let him die thus ;
And these that know and love revenge will laugh at ye :
Here lies the honour of a well-bred anger,
To make his enemy shake and tremble under him ;
Doubt, nay, almost despair, and then confound him.
This man ye rock asleep, and all your rages
Are Requiems to his parting soul, meer Anthems.

Rod. Indeed he is strongly built.

Alin. You cannot shake him ;
And the more weight ye put on his foundation,
Now as he stands, ye fix him still the stronger ;
If ye love him, honour him, would heap upon him
Friendships and benefits beyond example,
Hope him a Star in Heaven, and there would stick him,
Now take his life.

Rod. I had rather take mine own, Boy.

Alin. I'll ease him presently.

Rod. Stay, be not hasty.

Alin. Bless my tongue still.

Lop. What has the boy done to him ?
How dull, and still he looks ?

Alin. You are a wise man,

And long have buckled with the worlds extremities,
A valiant man, and no doubt know both fortunes,
And would ye work your Master piece thus madly,
Take the bare name of honour, that will pity ye
When the world knows ye have prey'd on a poor Pilgrim?

Rod. The boy has stagger'd me: what would'st thou have

Al. Have ye? do you not feel Sir? do's it not stir ye? (me?)
Do you ask a child? I would have ye do most bravely,
Because I most affect ye: like your self Sir,
Scorn him, and let him go; seem to contemn him,
And now ye have made him shake, seal him his pardon,
When he appears a subject fit for anger,
And fit for you, his pious Armour off,
His hopes no higher than your sword may reach at,
Then strike, and then ye know revenge; then take it.
I hope I have turn'd his mind.

Rod. Let the fool go there,
I scorn to let loose so base an anger
May light on thee: See me no more, but quit me;
And when we meet again.

Ped. Ple thank ye Captain.

Alin. Why this was like your self: but which way goes
Shall we ne're happy meet? [Exit. (he?)

Rod. I am drowlic: Boy,
Go with me, and discourse: I like thy company
O Child! I love thy tongue.

Alin. I shall wait on ye.

Lop. The Boy has don't: a Plaguey witty Rascal.
And I shall love him terribly.

Jaq. 'Twas he most certain,
For if ye mark, how earnest he was with him,
And how he labour'd him.

Lop. A cunning villain,
But a good rogue; 'This boy will make's all honest.

1 Out-l. I scarce believe that: but I like the boy well.
Come let's to Supper; then upon our watches.

Lop. This Pilgrim scap'd a joyfull one.

Jaq. Let's drink round
To the boys health, and then about our business.

[Exit.

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter Roderigo, Jaques, Lopez, and three Out-Laws.

Rod. None of you know her?

Jaq. Alas Sir, we never saw her:
Nor ever heard of her, but from your report.

Rod. No happy eye?

Lop. I do not think 'tis she, Sir,
Me thinks a woman dares not.

Rod. Thou speak'st poorly,
What dares not woman, when she is provok'd?
Or what seems dangerous to Love, or fury?
That it is she, this has confirm'd me certain,
These Jewels here, a part of which I sent her,
And though unwilling, yet her Father wrought her
To take, and wear.

Lop. A wench, and we not know it?
And among us? where were our understandings?
I could have guess'd unhappily: have had some feeling
In such a matter: Here are as pretty fellows,
At the discovery of such a jigambob:
A handsome wench too? sure we have lost our faculties,
We have no motions: what should she do here, Sir?

Rod. That's it that troubles me: O that base rascal!
There lies the misery: how cunningly she quit him,
And how she urg'd? had ye been constant to me,
I ne're had suffer'd this.

1 Out-l. Ye might have hang'd him:
And would he had been hang'd, that's all we care for't:
So our hands had not don't.

Rod. She is gone again too,
And what care have ye for that? gone, and contemn'd me;
Matter'd my will, and power, and now laughs at me.

Lop. The Devil that brought her hither, Sir I think
Has carry'd her back again invisible,
For we ne're knew, nor heard of her departure.

Jaq. No living thing came this night through our watches.
She went with you.

Rod. Was by me till I slept,
But when I wak'd, and call'd: O my dull pate here,
If I had open'd this when it was given me,
This Roguy Box.

Enter Alphonso, and 2 Out-laws.

Lop. We could but give it ye.

Rod. Pilgrim? a Pox o' Pilgrims, there the game goes,
There's all my fortune fled; I know it, I feel it.

Al. Bring me unto thy Captain: where's thy Captain?
I am founder'd, melted, some fairy thing or other
Has led me dancing; the Devil has haunted me
I'th' likeness of a voyce: give me thy Captain.

2 Out-l. He's here Sir, there he stands.

Al. How do'st thou Captain?
I have been fool'd and jaded, made a dog-bolt.
My Daughter's run away: I have been haunted too,
I have lost my horse; I am hungry, and out of my wits also.

Rod. Come in: Ple tell you what I know: strange things
And take your ease; Ple follow her recovery,
These shall be yours the whil'st, and do ye service.

Al. Let me have drink enough: I am almost choak'd too.

Rod. You shall have any thing; what think you now,
Jaq. I think a woman, is a woman, that's (Souldiers?)
any thing.

The next we take, we'l search a little nearer,
We'l not be boyed again with a pair of breeches. [Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter Juletta.

Jul. He's gone in here: This is Roderigo's quarter,
And I'll be with him soon: Ple startle him,
A little better than I have done: all this long night
I have let him out o'th' way, to try his patience,
And made him swear, and curse; and pray, and swear again,
And cry for anger; I made him leave his horse too,
Where he can never find him more; whistled to him,
And then he would run through thick and thin, to reach me,
And down in this ditch; up again, and shake him,
And swear some certain blessings; then into that bush
Pop goes his pate, and all his face is comb'd over,
And I sit laughing: a hundred tricks, I have serv'd him:
And I will double 'em, before I leave him;
Ple teach his anger to dispute with women.
But all this time, I cannot meet my Mistress,
I cannot come to comfort her; that grieves me,
For sure she is much afflicted: till I do,
Ple haunt thy Ghost Alphonso; Ple keep thee waking,
Yes, I must get a Drum: I am villanous weary,
And yet Ple trot about these villages
Till I have got my will, and then have at ye.
Ple make your anger drop out at your elbows e're I leave ye.
[Exit.

SCENE III.

Enter Seberto, and Curio.

Seb. 'Tis strange, in all the circuit we have ridden,
We cannot cross her: no way light upon her.

Cur. I do not think she is gone thus far, or this way,
For certain if she had, we should have reach'd her, (thing.
Made some discovery, heard some news; we have seen no-

Seb. Nor pass by any body that could promise any thing.
She is certainly disguis'd, her modesty
must never venture else. Cur. Let her take any shape,
And let me see it once, I can distinguish it.

Seb.

Seb. So should I think too: has not her Father found her:
Cur. No, Ple be hang'd then; he has no patience
 Unless she light in's teeth, to look about him.
 He guesles now, and chafes and frets like Tinsel.
Seb. Let him go on, he cannot live without it.
 But keeper her from him, heaven: where are we Curio?
Cur. In a wood I think, hang me if I know else.
 And yet I have ridden all these coasts, at all hours,
 And had an aim.
Seb. I would we had a guide.
Cur. And if I be not much awry Seberto,
 Not far off should be Roderigo's quarter,
 For in this fastness if I be not cozen'd,
 He and his out-laws live.
Seb. This is the place then

Enter Alinda.

We appointed him to meet in.
Cur. Yes, I think so. (that there?)
Seb. Would we could meet some living thing: what's
Cur. A boy, I think, stay; why may not he direct us?
Alin. I am hungry, and I am weary, and I cannot find him.
 Keep my wits Heaven, I feel 'em wavering,
 O God my head.
Seb. Boy, dost thou hear, thou stripling?
Alin. Now they will tear me, torture me, now Roderigo
 Will hang me without mercy; ha?
Cur. Come hither.
 A very pretty boy: what place is this, child?
 And whither dost thou travel? how he stares!
 Some stubborn Master has abus'd the boy,
 And beaten him: how he complains! whither goest thou?
Alin. I go to Segovia Sir, to my sick Mother,
 I have been taken here by drunken thieves,
 And (O my bones!) I have been beaten Sir.
 Mis-us'd, and rob'd: extreamly beaten Gentlemen,
 O God, my side!
Seb. What beasts would use a boy thus?
 Look up, and be of good cheer.
Alin. O, I cannot.
 My back, my back, my back.
Cur. What thieves?
Alin. I know not.
 But they call the Captain Roderigo.
Cur. Look ye,
 I knew we were thereabouts.
Seb. Dost thou want any thing?
Alin. Nothing but ease, but ease, Sir.
Cur. There's some mony,
 And get thee to thy Mother.
Alin. I thank ye Gentlemen.
Seb. This was extreamly foul, to vex a child thus.
 Come, let's along, we cannot lose our way now. [Ex.
Alin. Though ye are honest men, I fear your fingers,
 And glad I am got off; O how I tremble!
 Send me but once within his arms dear fortune,
 And then come all the world: what shall I do now?
 'Tis almost night again, and where to lodge me,

Enter Julietta.

Or get me meat, or any thing, I now not.
 These wild woods, and the fancies I have in me,
 Will run me mad.
Jul. Boy, Boy.
Alin. More set to take me?
Jul. Dost thou hear boy? thou pointer.
Alin. 'Tis a boy too,
 A Lacky Boy: I need not fear his fierceness.
Jul. Canst thou beat a Drum?
Alin. A Drum?
Jul. This thing, a Drum here. (ble?)
 Didst thou never see a Drum? Canst thou make this grum-
Alin. Juliettas face, and tongue; is she run mad too?
 Here may be double craft: I have no skill in't.

Jul. Ple give thee a royal but to go along with me.
Alin. I care not for thy royal, I have other business,
 Drum to thy self, and daunce to it.
Jul. Sirrah, Sirrah. (me)
 Thou scurvy Sirrah; thou snotty-nos'd scab, dost thou hear
 If I lay down my Drum.

Enter Roderigo, and two Outlaws.

Alin. Here comes more Company,
 I fear a plot, Heaven send me fairly from it. [Exit.
Jul. Basto; who's here?
Lop. Captain, do you need me farther?
Rod. No not a foot: give me the gown: the sword now.
Jul. This is the Devil thief, and if he take me,
 Woe be to my Gally gaskins.
Lop. Certain Sir,
 She will take her patches off, and change her habit.
Rod. Let her do what she please: No, no Alinda
 You cannot cozen me again in a Boys figure,
 Nor hide the beauty of that face in patches,
 But I shall know it.
Jul. A boy his face in patches?
Rod. Nor shall your tongue again bewitch mine anger,
 If she be found i'th' woods, send me word presently,
 And I'll return; she cannot be far gone yet:
 If she be not, expect me; when ye see me,
 Use all your service to my friend Aphonso,
 And have a care to your business: farewell,
 No more, farewell. [Exeunt.
Jul. I am heartily glad thou art gone yet.
 This boy in patches, was the boy came by me,
 The very same, how hastily it shifted?
 What a mop-eyed ass was I, I could not know her,
 This must be she, this is she, now I remember her;
 How loth she was to talk too, how she fear'd me:
 I could now piss mine eyes out for meer anger:
 Ple follow her, but who shall vex her Father then?
 One flurt at him, and then I am for the voyage,
 If I can cross the Captain too: Come Tabor. [Exit.

SCENE IV.

Enter Jaques, and 1 Out-Law.

Jaq. Are they all set?
1 Out-l. All, and each quarter quiet.
Jaq. Is the old man asleep?
1 Out-l. An hour agoe Sir.
Jaq. We must be very carefull in his absence,
 And very watchfull.
1 Out-l. It concerns us nearly,
 He will not be long from us.
Jaq. No, he cannot.
1 Out-l. A little heat of love, which he must wander out.
 [Drum a far off.
 And then again: hark.
Jaq. What?
1 Out-l. 'Tis not the wind sure:
 That's still and calm, no noise, nor flux of waters.
Jaq. I hear a Drum, I think.
1 Out-l. That, that;
 It beats again now.
Jaq. Now it comes nearer: sure we are surprized, Sir;
 Some from the Kings command: we are lost, we are (dead all.
1 Out-l. Hark, hark, a charge now: my Captain has (betray'd us,
 And left us to this ruine, run away from us.

Enter two Out-Laws.

Lop. Another beats o' that side.
2 Out-l. Fly, lie, Jaques,
 We are taken in a toyle: snapt in a pitfall;
 Methinks I feel a Sword already shave me.
3 Out-l. A thousand horse and foot, a thousand pioneers,
 X x x 2 If

If we get under-ground, to fetch us out again;
And every one an Axe to cut the woods down.

Lop. This is the dismalst night——

Enter Alphoso.

Alp. Where's my Nag now?
And what make I here to be hang'd? What Devil
Brought me into this danger? Is there ne'er a hole,
That I may creep in deep enough, and die quickly?
Ne'er an old ditch to choke in? I shall be taken
For their Commander now, their General,
And have a commanding Gallows set up for me
As high as a May-pole; and nasty Songs made on me,
Be printed with a Pint-pot and a Dagger.
They are all kill'd by this time: Can I pray?
Let me see that first: I have too much fear to be faithful.
Where's all my State now? I must go hunt for Daughters;
Daughters, and Damfels of the Lake, damned Daughters.
A hundred Crowns for a good tod of Hay,
Or a fine hollow Tree, that would contain me;
I hear 'em coming: I feel the nooze about me.

Enter Seberto, Curio, Outlaws, and Jaques.

Seb. Why do you fear, and fly? here are no Souldiers;
None from the King to vex ye.

1 Outl. The Drum, the Drum, Sir.

Cur. I never saw such Pigeon-hearted people: (there?)
What Drum? what danger? who's that that shakes behind
Mercy upon me, Sir, why are ye fear'd thus?

Alp. Are we all kill'd, no mercy to be hoped for?
Am I not shot do you think?

Seb. You are strangely frightened,
Shot with a fiddle-stick: who's here to shoot ye?
A drum we saw indeed, a boy was beating it,
And hunting Squirrels by Moon-light.

Lop. Nothing else, Sir?

Cur. Not any thing: no other person stirring.

Alp. O that I had that boy: 'tis that Devil,
That fairy Rogue, that haunted me last night;
H'as sleeves like Dragons wings.

Seb. A little Foot-boy.

Alp. Come, let's go in, and let me get my cloaths on;
If ere I stay here more to be thus martyr'd——
Did ye not meet the wench?

Seb. No sure, we met her not.

Alp. She has been here in Boys apparel, Gentlemen,
A gallant thing, and famous for a Gentlewoman.
And all her face patcht over for discovery:
A Pilgrim too, and thereby hangs a circumstance,
That she hath plaid her master-prize, a rare one.
I came too short.

Cur. Such a young Boy we met, Sir.

Alp. In a gray Hat.

Cur. The same: his face all patcht too.

Alp. 'Twas she, a rot run with her; she, that rank she;
Walk in, I'll tell ye all, and then we'll part again,
But get some store of Wine: this fright sits here yet. [Exit.

Enter Juletta.

Jul. What a fright I have put 'em in; what a brave hurry.
If this do bolt him, I'll be with him again
With a new part, was never play'd; I'll ferk him.
As he hunts her, so I'll hunt him: I'll claw him.
Now will I see if I can cross her footing:
Yet still I'll watch his water, he shall pay for't;
And when he thinks most malice, and means worse,
I'll make him know the Mare's the better Horse. [Exit.

SCENE V.

Enter Pedro, and a Gentleman.

Gent. Ye are a stranger, Sir, and for humanity,
Being come within our walls, I would shew you something.
Ye have seen the Castle?

Ped. Yes Sir, 'tis a strong one,
And well maintain'd.

Gent. Why are you still thus sad, Sir?
How do ye like the walks?

Ped. They are very pleasant;
Your Town stands cool and sweet.

Gent. But that I would not Affect you with more sadness, I could shew ye
A place worth view.

Ped. Shows seldom alter me, Sir;
Pray ye speak it, and then shew it.

Gent. 'Tis a house here
Where people of all forts, that have been visited
With Lunacies, and Follies wait their cures,
There's fancies of a thousand stamps and fashions,
Like flies in several shapes buz round about ye,
And twice as many gestures; some of pity,
That it would make ye melt to see their passions:
And some as light again, that would content ye.
But I see, Sir, your temper is too modest,
Too much inclin'd to contemplation,
To meet with these?

Ped. You could not please me better;
And I beseech you, Sir, do me the honour
To let me wait upon ye.

Gent. Since ye are willing,
To me it shall be a pleasure to conduct ye.

Ped. I never had such a mind yet to see misery. [Exit.

SCENE VI.

Enter two Keepers.

1 Keep. Carry mad Befs some meat, she roars like Thunder;
And tie the Parson short, the Moon's i'th' full,
H'as a thousand Pigs in's brains: Who looks to the Prentice?
Keep him from Women, he thinks h'as lost his Mistris;
And talk of no silk stuffs, 'twill run him horn mad.

2 Keep. The Justice keeps such a stir yonder with his
And such a coil with warrants. (Charges,

1 Keep. Take away his Statutes;
The Devil has possess't him in the likeness
Of penal Laws: keep him from Aqua vita,
For if that spirit creep into his Quorum,
He will commit us all: how is it with the Scholar?

2 Keep. For any thing I see, he's in his right wits.

1 Keep. Thou art an ass; in's right wits, goodman coxcomb?
As though any man durst be in's right wits, and be here.
It is as much as we dare be that keep 'em.

Enter English madman.

Engl. Give me some drink.

1 Keep. O, there's the English man.

Engl. Fill me a thousand pots, and froth 'em, froth 'em.
Down o' your knees, ye Rogues, and pledge me roundly;
One, two, three, and four; we shall all be merry within this
To the great Turk. (hour.

1 Keep. Peace, peace thou Heathen drunkard;
These English are so Malt-mad, there's no meddling with 'em;
When they have a fruitful year of Barly there,
All the whole Island's thus.

Engl. A snuff, a snuff, a snuff.

A lewd notorious snuff: give't him again, boy.

Enter she-fool.

Fool. God-ye-good even, Gaffer.

2 Keep. Who let the Fool loose?

1 Keep. If any of the mad-men take her, she is pepper'd,
They'll bounce her loins.

Fool. Will ye walk into the coal house?

1 Keep. She is as leacherous too as a she-Ferret.

2 Keep. Who a vengeance looks to her? go in Kate,
I'll give thee a fine Apple.

Fool. Will ye buss me?

And tickle me, and make me laugh?

1 Keep.

1 Keep. I'll whip ye.
Engl. Fool, fool, come up to me fool.
Fool. Are ye peeping?
Engl. I'll get thee with five fools.
Fool. O fine, O dainty.
Engl. And thou shalt lie in a horse-cloth, like a Lady.
Fool. And shall I have a Coach?
Engl. Drawn with four Turkeys,
 And they shall tread thee too.
Fool. We shall have eggs then;
 And shall I sit upon 'em?
Engl. I, I, and they shall be all addle,
 And make an admirable Tanzey for the Devil.
 Come, come away, I am taken with thy love fool,
 And will mightily belabour thee.
 1 Keep. How the fool bridles? how she twitters at him?
 These English men would stagger a wise woman.
 If we should suffer her to have her will now,
 We should have all the women in Spain as mad as she here.
 2 Keep. They would strive who should be most fool:
 Away with her.

Enter Master, three Gentlemen, a mad Scholar, and Pedro.

Fool. Pray ye stay a little: let's hear him sing, h'as a fine breast.
 1 Keep. Here comes my Master; to the spit ye whore,
 And stir no more abroad, but tend your business;
 You shall have no more sops i'th' pan else, nor no Porridge:
 Besides, I'll whip your breech.
Fool. I'll go in presently.
 1 Gent. I'll assure ye, Sir, the Cardinal's angry with ye
 For keeping this young man.
Master. I am heartily sorry.
 If ye allow him sound, pray ye take him with ye.
 1 Gent. This is the place, and now observe their humours.
 2 Gent. We can find nothing in him light, nor tainted;
 No startings, nor no rubs, in all his answers,
 In all his Letters nothing but discretion,
 Learning, and handsome stile.
Master. Be not deceived, Sir,
 Mark but his look.
 1 Gent. His grief, and his imprisonment
 May stamp that there.
Master. Pray talk with him again then. (enough,
 2 Gent. That will be needless, we have tried him long
 And if he had a taint we should have met with't.
 Yet to discharge your care—
Ped. A sober youth:
 Pity so heavy a cross should light upon him.
 2 Gent. You find no sickness?
Schol. None Sir, I thank Heaven,
 Nor nothing that diverts my understanding.
 1 Gent. Do you sleep a nights?
Schol. As sound, and sweet, as any man.
 2 Gent. Have ye no fearful dreams?
Schol. Sometimes, as all have
 That go to bed with raw and windy stomachs;
 Else I am all one piece.
 1 Gent. Is there no unkindness
 You have conceiv'd from any friend or parent?
 Or scorn from what ye lov'd?
Schol. No, truly Sir:
 I never yet was master of a faith
 So poor, and weak, to doubt my friend or kindred,
 And what love is, unless it lie in learning
 I think I am ignorant.
 1 Gent. This man is perfect,
 A civiller discourser I ne'r talk'd with.
Master. You'll find it otherwise.
 2 Gent. I must tell ye true, Sir,
 I think ye keep him here to teach him madness.
 Here's his discharge from my Lord Cardinal;
 And come Sir, go with us.
Schol. I am bound unto ye,
 And farewell Master.

Master. Farewel Stephano,
 Alas poor man.
 1 Gent. What flaws, and whirls of weather,
 Or rather storms have been aloft these three daies;
 How dark, and hot, and full of mutiny!
 And still grows louder.
Master. It has been stubborn weather.
 2 Gent. Strange work at Sea, I fear me there's old tumbling.
 1 Gent. Bless my old Unkles Bark, I have a venture.
 2 Gent. And I more than I would wish to lose.
Schol. Do you fear?
 2 Gent. Ha! how he looks?
Master. Nay, mark him better Gentlemen.
 2 Gent. Mercy upon me: how his eyes are altered?
Master. Now tell me how ye like him: whether now
 He be that perfect man ye credited?
Schol. Do's the Sea stagger ye?
Master. Now ye have hit the nick.
Schol. Do ye fear the billows?
 1 Gent. What ails him? who has stir'd him?
Schol. Be not shaken,
 Nor let the singing of the storm shoot through ye,
 Let it blow on, blow on: let the clouds wrastle,
 And let the vapours of the earth turn mutinous,
 The Sea in hideous mountains rise and tumble
 Upon a Dolphins back, I'll make all tremble,
 For I am Neptune.
Master. Now what think ye of him?
 2 Gent. Alas poor man.
Schol. Your Bark shall plough through all,
 And not a Surge so saucy to disturb her.
 I'll see her safe, my power shall sail before her.

*Down ye angry waters all,
 Ye loud whistling whirlwinds fall;
 Down ye proud Waves, ye storms cease;
 I command ye, be at peace.
 Fright not with your churlish Notes,
 Nor bruise the Keel of Bark that flotes:
 No devouring Fish come nigh,
 Nor Monster in my Empery,
 Once shew his head, or terror bring;
 But let the weary Saylor sing:
 Amphitrite with white arms
 Strike my Lute, I'll sing Charms.*

Master. He must have Musick now: I must observe him,
 His fit will grow too full else. [Musick, Song.]
 2 Gent. I must pity him.
Master. Now he will in himself most quietly,
 And clean forget all, as he had done nothing.
 1 Gent. We are sorry, Sir: and we have seen a wonder;
 From this hour we'll believe, and so we'll leave ye. [Ex.]
Ped. This was a strange fit.
Master. Did ye mark him, Sir?
Ped. He might have cozen'd me with his behaviour.
Master. Many have sworn him right, and I have thought so:
 Yet on a sudden, from some word, or other,
 When no man could expect a fit, he has flown out:
 I dare not give him will.

Enter Alinda.

Ped. Pray Heaven recover him.
Alin. Must I come in too?
Master. No, my pretty Lad;
 Keep in thy Chamber Boy; 'shalt have thy supper.
Ped. I pray ye what is he, Sir?
Master. A strange Boy, that last night
 Was found i'th' Town, a little craz'd, distracted,
 And so sent hither.
Ped. How the pretty Knave looks,
 And plays, and peeps upon me! sure such eyes
 I have seen, and lov'd: what fair hands? certainly—
Master. Good Sir, you'll make him worse.
Ped. I pray believe not.

Alas, why should I hurt him? how he smiles!
The very shape, and sweetness of Alinda;
Let me look once again: were it in such clothes
As when I saw her last; this must be she.
How tenderly it stroaks me?

Mastr. Pray ye be mild Sir;
I must attend elsewhere.

[Exit.

Ped. Pray ye be secure Sir,
What would ye say? how my heart beats and trembles!
He holds me hard by th' hand; O my life, her flesh too!
I know not what to think: her tears, her true ones;
Pure orient tears: Hark, do you know me little one?

Alin. O Pedro Pedro!

Ped. O my foul!

Gent. What fit's this?

The Pilgrim's off the hooks too.

Alin. Let me hold thee,
And now come all the world, and all that hate me.

Ped. Be wise, and not discovered: O how I love ye!
How do ye now?

Alin. I have been miserable;
But your most vertuous eyes have cur'd me, Pedro;
Pray ye think it no immodesty, I kiss ye,
My head's wild still.

Ped. Be not so full of passion,
Nor do not hang so greedily upon me;
'Twill be ill taken.

Alin. Are ye weary of me?
I will hang here eternally, kiss ever,
And weep away for joy.

Enter Master.

Master. I told ye Sir,
What ye would do: for shame do not afflict him;
You have drawn his fit upon him fearfully:
Either depart, and presently; I'll force ye else.
Who waits within?

Enter two Keepers to fetch 'em off.

Ped. Alas good Sir.
This is the way never to hope recovery. (Governour,
Mastr. Stay but one minute more, I'll complain to the Bring in the boy: do you see how he swells, and tears himself?
Is this your cure? Be gone; if the boy miscarry
Let me ne'r find you more, for I'll so hamper ye——

Gent. You were to blame: too rash.

Ped. Farewel for ever.

[Exeunt.

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Alphonso, Gent. Juletta.

Gent. YOU are now within a mile o'th' Town Sir: if (my business
Would give me leave, I would turn and wait upon ye;
But for such Gentlemen as you enquire of,
Certain, I saw none such: But for the boy ye spoke of,
I will not say 'tis he, but such a one;
Just of that height.

Alph. In such clothes?

Gent. I much mistake else,
Was sent in th' other night, a little maddish,
And where such people wait their cures——

Alph. I understand ye.

Gent. There you may quickly know.

Alph. I thank ye Sir.

Jul. So do I too: and if there be such a place,
I ask no more: but you shall hear more of me,
She may be there, and you may play the tyrant;
I'll see what I can do: I am almost foundred
In following him; and yet I'll never leave him,
I'll crawl of all four first; my cause is meritorious,

And come what can come.

Gent. All you have told me is certain;
Complexion, and all else.

Alph. It may be she then;
And I'll so fumble her: is she grown mad now?
Is her blood set so high? I'll have her maddened,
I'll have her worm'd.

Jul. Mark but the end, old Master,
If thou beest not sick o'th' Bots within these five hours,
And kickst and roar'st; I'll make ye fart fire, Signior.

Enter Alinda, as a fool.

Gent. Here's one o'th' house, a fool, an idiot Sir;
May be she is going home; she'll be a guide to ye:
And so I kiss your hand.

[Exit.

Alph. I am your servant.

Alin. O now I am lost, lost, lost, Lord, how I tremble!
My Father, arm'd in all his hates and angers;
This is more misery than I have escap'd yet.

Alph. Fool, fool.

Alin. He knows me not; will ye give me two pence?
And gaffer, here's a Crow-flower, and a Dazie;
I have some pie in my pocket too.

Alph. This is an arrant fool,
An ignorant thing.

Alin. Believe so, and I am happy.

Alph. Dost thou dwell in Sigovia, fool?

Alin. No no, I dwell in Heaven.

And I have a fine little house, made of Marmalad.
And I am a lone woman, and I spin for Saint Peter; (me.
I have a hundred little children, and they sing Psalms with

Alph. 'Tis pity this pretty thing should want understanding.
But why do I stand talking with a coxcombe?
If I do find her, if I light upon her,
I'll say no more. Is this the way to th' Town, fool?

Alin. You must go over the top of that high steeple, Gaf-

Alph. A plague o' your fools face. (fer.

Jul. No, take her counsel. (over,

Alin. And then you shall come to a River twenty mile
And twenty mile and ten: and then you must pray, Gaffer;
And still you must pray, and pray.

Alph. Pray Heaven deliver me
From such an ass, as thou art.

Alin. Amen, sweet Gaffer.

And fling a sop of Sugar-cake into it;
And then you must leap in naked.

Jul. Would he would believe her.

Alin. And sink seven daies together; can ye sink Gaffer?

Alph. Yes coxcomb, yes; prethee farewel: a pox on thee.
A plague o' that fool too, that set me upon thee.

Alin. And then I'll bring you a sup of Milk shall serve ye:
I am going to get Apples.

Alph. Go to th' Devil:

Was ever man tormented with a puppy thus?
Thou tell me news? thou be a guide?

Alin. And then Nunkle—— (rail now

Alph. Prethee keep on thy way (good Naunt) I could
These ten hours at mine own improvidence:
Get Apples, and be choak'd: farewel. [Exit.

Alin. Farewel Nunkle.

Jul. I rejoyce in any thing that vexes him;
And I shall love this fool extremely for't:
Could I but see my Mistris now, to tell her
How I have truly, honestly wrought for her,
How I have worn my self away, to serve her.
Fool, there's a Royal for the sport thou mad'st me,
In crossing that old fool, that parted from thee.

Alin. Thou art honest sure; but yet thou must not see me:
I thank ye little Gentleman: Heaven blefs ye
And I'll pray for ye too: pray ye keep this Nutmeg.
'Twas sent me from the Lady of the Mountain,
A golden Lady.

Jul. How prettily it prattles!

Alin. 'Tis very good to rub your understanding:

And

And so good night, the Moon's up.

Ful. Pretty innocent.

Alm. Now fortune, if thou darst do good, protect me.

[Exit.

Ful. I'll follow him to yond'Town; he shall not scape me. Stay, I must counterfeit a Letter by the way first, (elle, And one that must carry some credit with it; I am wide And all this to no purpose that I aim at.

A Letter must be had, and neatly handled; And then, if Goodwife Fortune do not fail me, Have at his Skirts; I shall worse anger him Than ever I have done, and worse torment him.

It does me good to think how I shall conjure him, And crucifie his crabbedness; he's my Master, But that's all one; I'll lay that on the left hand, He would now persecute my harmless Mistribs, A fault without forgiveness, as I take it; And under that bold Banner flies my vengeance, A meritorious War, and so I'll make it.

I'th' name of innocence, what's this the fool gave me? She said 'twas good to rub my understanding. nut; What strange Concealment? Bread or Cheese, or a Chef-

Ha! 'tis a Ring, a pretty Ring, a right one; A Ring I know too! the very same Ring; O admirable Blockhead! O base Eyes!

A Ring my Mistribs took from me, and wore it; I know it by the Posie:

None could deliver this, but she her self too; Am I twice sand-blind? twice so near the Blessing I would arrive at? and block-like never know it?

I am veng'ance angry, but that shall light on thee, And heavily, and quickly, I pronounce it; There are so many cross ways, there's no following her; And yet I must not now; I hope she is right still, For all her outward shew, for sure she knew me; And in that hope, some few hours I'll forget her. [Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter Roderigo.

Rod. She is not to be recovered, which I vex at; And he beyond my veng'ance, which torments me; O! I am fool'd and sleighted, made a Rascal; My hopes are flatter'd, as my present fortunes; Why should I wander thus, and play the Coxcomb? Tire out my peace and pleasure for a Girl? A Girl that scorns me too? a thing that hates me? And considered at the best, is but a short Breakfast For a hot appetite: why should I walk and walk thus? And fret my self, and travel like a Carrier, (me, And peep, and watch? want Meat, and Wine, to cherish When thousand women may be had, ten thousand, And thank me too, and I sit still: well, trim Beauty And Chastity, and all that seem to ruine me, Let me not take ye, let me not come near ye, For I'll so trim ye, I'll so bustle with ye; 'Tis not the name of Virgin shall redeem ye, I'll change that property: nor tears, nor angers; I bear a hate about me scorns those follies. To find this Villain too, for there's my main prize: And if he snap me then.

Enter Alinda.

Alind. Is not that Pedro?

'Tis he, 'tis he: O!

Rod. What art thou?

Alind. Ha? now, now, now, O now most miserable.

Rod. What a Devil art thou?

Alin. No end of my misfortunes, Heaven?

Rod. What antick?

Speak Puppet, speak.

Alind. That habit to betray me?

Ye holy Saints, can ye see this?

Rod. It danceth;

The Devil in a Fools Coat, is he turn'd Innocent? What mops and mows it makes! heigh! how it frisketh? Is't not a Fairy, or some small Hobgoblin? It has a mortal face, and I have a great mind to it, But if it should prove the Devil then.

Alin. Come hither.

Rod. I think 'twill ravish me, It is a handsome thing, but horribly Sun-burnt; What's that it points at?

Alin. Dost thou see that star there, That just above the Sun? Prithee go thither, and light me this Tobacco, And stop it with the horns o'th' Moon.

Rod. The thing's mad, Abominably mad, her brains are butter'd, Go sleep, fool, sleep.

Alin. Thou canst not sleep so sweetly; For so I can say my Prayers, and then slumber.

*I am not proud, nor full of Wine,
This little Flower will make me fine;
Cruel in Heart, for I will cry,
If I see a Sparrow dye;
I am not watchful to do ill,
Nor glorious to pursue it still;
Nor pitiless to those that weep;
Such as are, bid them go sleep.*

Do, do, do, and see if they can.

Rod. It said true.

I feel it sink into me forcibly: Sure 'tis a kind of Sibyl, some mad Prophet; I feel my wildness bound, and fetter'd in me.

Alin. Give me your hand, and I'll tell you what's your Rod. Here, prithee speak. (fortune.

Alin. Fye, fye, fye, fye, fye.

Wash your hands, and pare your nails, and look finely, You shall never kiss the Kings Daughter else.

Rod. I wash 'em daily.

Alin. But still you foul 'em faster.

Rod. This goes nearer.

Alin. You'll have two Wives.

Rod. Two Wives?

Alin. I, two fine Gentlewomen, Make much of 'em; for they'll stick close to you, Sir: And these two, in two days.

Rod. That's a fine Riddle.

Alin. To day you shall wed sorrow, And repentance will come to morrow.

Rod. Sure she's inspired.

Alin. I'll sing ye a fine Song, Sir.

*He called down his merry men all,
By one, by two, by three,
William would fain have been the first,
But now the last is he.*

Rod. This the meer Chronicle of my mishaps. (yonder,

Alin. I'll bid you good ev'n, for my Boat stays for me And I must sup with the Moon to Night in the Mediterraneum. [Exit.

Rod. When fools and mad folks will be Tutors to me, And feel my sores, yet I unsensible; Sure it was set by Providence upon me To steer my heart right, I am wondrous weary, My thoughts too, which add more burthen to me; I have been ill, and (which is worse) pursu'd it, And still run on; I must think better, nobler, And be another thing, or not at all.

Enter four Pesants.

Still I grow heavier, heavier, Heaven defend me; I'll lye down, and take rest; and goodness guard me.

1 Pes. We have 'scap'd to day well; certain if the Out-laws Had known we had been stirring, we had paid for't.

2 Pes. 'Plague on 'em, they have rob'd me thrice.

3 Pef. And me five times:
Beside they made my Daughter one of us too
An arrant Drum: O, they are the lewdest Rascals,
The Captain such a damn'd piece of iniquitie:
But we are far enough off on 'em, that's the best on't,
They cannot hear.

4. They'le come to me familiarly
And eat up all I have: drink up my wine too,
And if there be a Servant that contents 'em,
Let her keel hold, they'l give her Stowage enough:
We have no Children now, but Thieves, and Outlaws.
The very Brats in their Mothers bellies have their qualities.
They'l steal into the world.

1. Would we had some of 'em here.

3. I, o' that condition we could Master 'em,
They are sturdy knaves.

3. A Devil take their sturdiness,
We can neither keep our wives from 'em nor our States,
We pay the Rent, and they possess the benefit.

1. What's this lies here? is it drunk, or sober?
It sleeps, and soundly too.

2. 'Tis an old woman

That keeps sheep hereabouts: it turns, and stretches.

4. Do's she keep sheep with a sword?

3. It has a Beard too.

1. Peace, peace: it is the Devil Roderigo,
Peace of all hands, and look.

2. 'Tis he.

3. Speak softly.

4. Now we may sit him.

3. Stay, stay: let's be provident.

1. Kill him, and wake him then.

4. Let me come to him,

Ev'n one blow at his pate, if e're he wake more.

3. So, so, so, lay that by.

2. I must needs kill him,

It stands with my reputation,

3. Stand off, I say:

And let us some way make him sure; then torture him.

To kill him presently, has no pleasure in't.

H'as been tormenting of us, at least this twelve moneth.

Rod. Oh me!

All. He comes: he comes.

4. Has he no Guns about him?

3. Softly again: no, no: take that hand easily,
And tye it fast there: that to th' other bough there.

Fast, fast, and easie lest he wake.

2. Have we got ye?

This was a benefit we never aim'd at.

3. Out with your knives, and let's carve this Cockthief,
Daintily carve him.

2. I would he had been used thus

Ten year agoe; we might have thought we had children.

3. O, that Sir Nicholas now our Priest were here,

What a sweet Homily would he say over him,

For ringing all in, with his wife in the Bell-frey?

He would stand up stiffe girt, now pounce him lightly

And as he roars, and rages, let's go deeper:

Come near: you are dim-ey'd: on with your spectacles.

Rod. O, what torments me thus? what slaves, what
O spare me, do not murder me. (villains?)

3. We'l but tickle ye,

You have tickled us at all points.

4. Where are his Emblemes?

Enter Pedro.

Rod. As ye are men, and Christians.

2. Yes we hear ye,

And you shall hear of us too.

Rod. Oh no mercy.

Ped. What noise is this? what roar? I cannot find her,
She is got free again: but where, or which way?

Rod. O villains, beasts.

Ped. Murdering a man, ye Rascals?

Ye inhumane slaves, off, off, and leave this cruelty,
Or as I am a Gentleman: do ye brave me?
Then have among ye all, ye slaves, ye cowards,
Take up that sword, and stand: stay ye base rascals,
Ye cut-throat rogues.

All. Away, away.

[Exeunt Pef.]

Ped. Ye dog-whelps.

Rod. O, I am now more wretched far, than ever.

Ped. A violence to that habit? ha? Roderigo,
What makes he here, thus clad? is it repentance,
Or only a fair shew to guile his mischiefs?

Rod. This benefit has made me shame to see him,
To know him, blush.

Ped. You are not much hurt?

Rod. No Sir;

All I can call a hurt, sticks in my conscience,
That pricks and tortures me.

Ped. Have ye consider'd

The nature of these men, and how they us'd ye?
Was it fair play? did it appear to you handfom?

Rod. I dare not speak: or if I do 'tis nothing
Can bring me off, or justifie me.

Ped. Was it noble

To be o're-laid with odds, and violence?

Manly, or brave in these thus to oppress ye?

Do you blush at this, in such as are meer rudeness,

That have stopt souls, that never knew things gentle?

And dare you glorifie worse in your self Sir?

Ye us'd me with much honour, and I thank ye,

In this I have requited some: ye know me:

Come turn not back, ye must, and ye shall know me;

Had I been over season'd with base anger,

And suited all occasions to my mischiefs,

Bore no respect to honesty, Religion,

No faith, no common tye of man, humanity,

Had I had in me, but given reins, and licence

To a tempestuous will, as wild as winter,

This day, know Roderigo, I had set

As small a price upon thy life and fortunes,

As thou didst lately on mine innocence;

But I reserve thee to a nobler service.

Rod. I thank ye, and I'll study more to honour ye:

You have the nobler soul, I must confesse it,

And are the greater Master of your goodness.

Though it be impossible I would now recover,

And my rude will grow handfom in an instant,

Yet touching but the pureness of your metal,

Something shall shew like gold, at least shall glister,

That men may hope, although the mind be rugged,

Stony, and hard to work, yet time, and honour

Shall find and bring forth that, that's rich and worthy.

Ped. I'll trie that: and toth' purpose: ye told me Sir

In noble emulation, so I take it;

I'll put your hatred far off, and forget it,

You had a fair desire to try my valour:

You seem'd to court me to it; you have found a time,

A weapon in your hand, an equal enemy,

That, as he puts this off, puts off all injuries,

And only now for honours sake defies ye:

Now, as you are a man, I know you are valiant,

As you are gentle bred, a Souldier fashioned.

Rod. His vertue startles me. I dare fight Pedro.

Ped. And as you have a Mistris that you honour,

Mark me, a Mistris.

Rod. Ha?

Ped. A handsome Mistris,

As you dare hold your self deserving of her.

Rod. Deserving? what a word was that to fire me?

Ped. I could compel ye now without this circumstance,

But I'll deal free, and fairly, like a Gentleman:

As ye are worthy of the name ye carry,

A daring man.

Rod. O that I durst not suffer:

For all I dare do now, implies but penance.

Ped.

Ped. Now do me noble right.

Rod. I'll satisfie ye;

But not by th' sword, pray you hear me, and allow me;
I have been rude; but shall I be a Monster,
And teach my Sword to hurt that that preserv'd me?
Though I be rough by nature, shall my name
Inherit that eternal stain of barbarous?
Give me an enemy, a thing that hates ye,
That never heard of yet, nor felt your goodness,
That is one main antipathy to sweetness;
And set me on, you cannot hold me Coward;
If I have ever err'd, 'thas been in hazard;
The temper of my Sword starts at your Vertue,
And will fly off, nay it will weep to light ye;
Things excellently mingled, and of pure nature,
Hold sacred Love, and peace with one another,
See how it turns.

Ped. This is a strange Conversion:

And can ye fail your Mistress? can ye grow cold
In such a case?

Rod. Those heats that they add to us;

(O noble Pedro) let us feel 'em rightly;
And rightly but consider how they move us:

Ped. Is not their honour ours?

Rod. If they be vertuous,

And then the Sword adds nothing to their lustre,
But rather calls in question what's not doubted;
If they be not, the best Swords, and best valours
Can never fight 'em up to fame again;
No, not a Christian War; and that's held pious.

Ped. How bravely now he is tempered! I must fight,
And rather make it honourable, than angry,
I would not task those sins to me committed.

Rod. You cannot, Sir, you have cast those by: discarded
And in a noble mind, so low, and loosely
To look back, and collect such lumps, and lick 'em
Into new horrid forms again—

Ped. Still braver.

Rod. To fight, because I dare, were worse and weaker
Than if I had a woman in my cause, Sir,
And more proclaim'd me fool: yet I must confess
I have been covetous of all occasions,
And this I have taken upon trust, for noble,
The more shame mine: devise a way to fight thus,
That like the wounded air, no blood may issue,
Nor where the Sword shall enter, no lost spirit,
And set me on: I would not scare that body,
That vertuous, valiant body, nor deface it
To make the Kingdom mine: if one must bleed,
Let me be both the Sacrifice and Altar,
And you the Priest; I have deserv'd to suffer.

Ped. The noble Roderigo, now I call ye,
And thus my love shall ever count, and hold ye,

Rod. I am your servant, Sir, and now this habit;
Devotion, not distrust shall put upon me,
I'll wait upon your fortunes, that's my way now,
And where you grieve, or joy, I'll be a Partner.

Ped. I thank ye, Sir, I shall be too proud of ye,
O I could tell ye strange things.

Rod. I guess at 'em,
And I could curse my self, I made 'em stranger;
Yet my mind says you are not far from happiness.

Ped. It shall be welcome; come, let's keep up thus still,
And be as we appear; Heavens hand may bless us.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Alphonso, Master and Keepers.

Maft. Yes, Sir, here be such people; but how pleasing
They will appear to you.

Alph. 'Pray let me see 'em,
I come to that end; 'pray let me see 'em all.

Maft. They will confound ye, Sir, like Bells rung back-
They are nothing but Confusion, and meer Noises.

Alph. May be I love a noise; but hark ye, Sir,
Have ye no Boys? handsome young Boys?

Maft. Yes, one, Sir,
A very handsome Boy.

Alph. Long here?

Maft. But two days;
A little crazed; but much hope of recovery.

Alph. I, that Boy, let me see, may be I know him,
That Boy I say; this is the Boy he told me of,
And it must need be she; that Boy, I beseech ye, Sir,
That Boy I come to see.

Maft. And ye shall see him;
Or any else: but pray be not too violent.

Alph. I know what to do, I warrant ye; I am for all fan-
I can talk to 'em, and dispute.

1 Keep. As madly;

For they are very mad, Sir!

Alph. Let 'em be horn mad. (their own, Sir,

1 Keep. We have few Citizens: they have Bedlams of
And are mad at their own charges.

Alph. Who lyes here?

Maft. 'Pray ye do not disturb 'em, Sir, here lie such youths
Will make you start if they but dance their trenchmores,
Fetch out the Boy, Sirrah; hark!

[Shake Irons within. English mad-men; Scholar,
[Parson, Jerkin.]

Alph. Heigh Boys.

Eng. Bounce,
Clap her o'th' star-board; bounce, top the Can.

Schol. Dead ye dog, dead, do ye quarrel in my Kingdom?
Give me my trident.

Eng. Bounce, 'twixt wind and water,
Loaden with Mackrel; O brave meat.

Schol. My Sea horses;
I'll charge the Northern Wind, and break his Bladder,

Parf. I'll sell my Bells before I be out-brav'd thus.

Alph. What's he? what's he?

Maft. A Parson, Sir, a Parson

That run mad for tyth Goslings.

Alph. Green sawce cure him.

Parf. I'll curse ye all, I'll excommunicate ye;

Thou English Heretick, give me the tenth Pot.

Eng. Sue me, I'll drink up all, bounce I say once more,
O have I split your Mizen? blow, blow thou West-wind;

Blow till thou rive, and make the Sea run roaring.

I'll hiss it down again with a Bottle of Ale.

Schol. Triton, why Triton:

Eng. Triton's drunk with Metheglin.

Seb. Strike, strike the farges, strike.

Eng. Drink, drink, 'tis day light;

Drink, didle, didle, didle, drink, Parson, proud Parson;

A Pigs tail in thy teeth, and I defie thee.

Par. Give me some porridg, or I'll damn thee, English.

Alph. How comes this English mad man here?

Maft. Alas, that's no question;

They are mad every where, Sir;

Their fits are cool now, let 'em rest.

Enter Keepers and She-fools.

Alph. Mad Gallants;

Most admirable mad; I love their faces. (lookt to him?)

1 Keep. Ye stinking Whore, who knew of this? who
'Pox take him, he was sleepy when I left him.

2 Keep. Certain he made the fool drunk.

Maft. How now, who's this here?

Where is the Boy?

1 Keep. The Boy, Sir?

Maft. I, the Boy, Sir.

1 Keep. Here's all the Boys we found.

Maft. These are his Cloaths.

But where's the Boy?

She-fool. The Boy is gone a Maying, (ster?)

He'll bring me home a Cuckows Nest; do you hear; Ma-

I put my Cloaths off, and I dizen'd him,
And pin'd a Plum in's forehead, and a feather;

And bul's'd him twice, and bid him go seek his fortune;
He gave me this fine money, and fine Wine too,
And bid me sop; and gave me these trim Cloaths too,
And put 'em on.

Alph. Is this the Boy you would shew?

She fool. I'll give you two pence, Master.

Alph. Am I fool'd of all sides?

I met a fool i'th' Woods, they said she dwelt here,
In a long pied Coat.

Maft. That was the very Boy, Sir.

She-f. I, I, I, I gave him leave to play, forsooth,
He'll come again to morrow, and bring peascods.

Maft. I'll bring your bones.

Alph. 'Pox o' your fools, and Bedlams,
'Plague o' your Owls and Apes.

Maft. 'Pray ye, Sir, be tamer,
We cannot help this presently, but we shall know;
I'll recompence your Care too.

Alph. Know me, a pudding,
You juggle, and ye fiddle; fart upon ye;
I am abused.

Maft. 'Pray ye, Sir. [Welsh mad-man.]

Alph. And I will be abused, Sir,
And you shall know I am abused.

Welsh. Whaw, Mr. Keeper.

Alph. 'Pox o' thy whaws, and thy whyms,
'Pox o' thy urship. (wash-brew,

Wel. Give me some Ceeze, and Onions; give me some
I have—in my bellies, give me abundance,
Pendragon was a Shentleman, marg you, Sir,
And the Organs at Rixum were made by Revelations,
There is a spirit blows, and blows the Bellows,
And then they sing.

Alph. What Moon-calf's this? what dream?

Maft. 'Pray ye, Sir, observe him,
He is a Mountaineer, a man of Goteland.

Welsh. I will beat thy face as black as a blue Clout,
I will leave no more sheet in thine eyes.

Maft. He will not hurt ye.

Welsh. Give me a great deal of Guns; thou art the Devils,
I know thee by thy tails; poor Owen's hungry,
I will peg thy bums full of Bullets.

Alph. This is the rarest Rascal,
He speaks as if he had butter-milk in's mouth,
Is this any thing akin to th' English?

Maft. The elder Brother, Sir,
He run mad because a Rat eat up's Cheefe.

Alph. H'ad a great deal of reason, Sir.

Welsh. Basilus manus, is for an old Codpifs, mark ye,
I will borrow thy Urships Whore to seal a Letter.

Maft. Now he grows villainous.

Alph. Methinks he's best now.

Maft. Away with him.

Alph. He shall not.

Maft. Sir, he must.

Welsh. I will sing and dance,
Do any thing.

Alph. Wilt thou declaim in Greek?

Maft. Away with the fool,

And whip her soundly, Sirrah.

She fool. I'll tell no more tales.

Alph. Or wilt thou flye i'th' air?

Eng. Do, and I'll catch thee,
And like a wisp of Hay, I'll whirl, and whirl thee,
And puff thee up, and puff thee up.

Schol. I'll save thee,

And thou shalt fall into the Sea, soft, softly. (men.)

Welsh. I'll get upon a mountain, and call my Country.

Maft. They all grow wild, away with him for Heavens
Sir, ye are much to blame. (fake,

Alph. No, no, 'tis brave, Sir,

Ye have cozen'd me; I'll make you mad.

Maft. In with him,

And lock him fast.

Alph. I'll see him in his lodging.

[Exit.]

Maft. What means this Gentleman?

Enter Julietta.

Jul. He's in; have at him,
Are you the Master, Sir?

Maft. What would you with him?

Jul. I have a business from the Duke of Medina,
Is there not an old Gentleman come lately in?

Maft. Yes, and a wild one too, but not a Prisoner.

Jul. Did you observe him well? 'tis like it may be he.

Maft. I have seen younger men of better temper.

Jul. You have hit the cause I come for; there's a Letter,
Pray ye peruse it well; I shall be wi' ye;
And suddenly, I fear not, finely, daintily,
I shall so feed your fierce vexation,

And raise your Worships storms; I shall so niggle ye,
And juggle ye, and fiddle ye, and firk ye:
I'll make ye curse the hour ye vex a Woman;
I'll make ye shake when our Sex are but founded;
For the Lords sake we shall have him at; I long to see it
As much as for my wedding night; I gape after it.

Maft. This Letter says the Gentleman is lunatick;
I half suspected it.

Jul. 'Tis very true, Sir,
And such pranks he has plaid.

Maft. He's some great man;
The Duke commands me with such care to look to him,

And if he grow too violent, to correct him,
To use the speediest means for his recovery,
And those he must find sharp.

Jul. The better for him.

Maft. How got ye him hither?

Jul. With a train, I told him;
He's in love with a Boy, there lyes his melancholy.

Maft. Hither he came to seek one.

Jul. Yes, I sent him,

Now had we dealt by force, we had never brought him.

Maft. Here was a Boy.

Jul. He saw him not?

Maft. He was gone first.

Jul. It is the better; look you to your charge well;
I'll see him lodged, for so the Duke commanded me,
He will be very rough.

Maft. We are us'd to that, Sir,
And we as rough as he, if he give occasion.

Jul. You will find him gainful, but be sure ye curb him,
And get him, if ye can fairly, to his lodging,

Enter Alphonso.

I am afraid ye will not.

Maft. We must sweat then. (noise,

Alph. What dost thou talk to me of noises? I'll have more
I'll have all loose, and all shall play their prizes;
Thy Master has let loose the Boy I lookt for,
Bafely convey'd him hence.

Keep. Will ye go out, Sir?

Alph. I will not out; I will have all out with me,

[Shake Irons.]

I'll have thy Master in; he's only mad here: (Boys.)
And Rogues, I'll have ye all whipt; heigh, mad Boys, mad

Jul. Do you perceive him now?

Maft. 'Tis too apparent.

Jul. I am glad she is gone; he raves thus.

Maft. Do you hear, Sir?

'Pray will ye make less stir, and see your Chamber,
Call in more help, and make the Clofets ready. (ye.)

Keep. I thought he was mad; I'll have one long lash at

Alph. My Chamber? where my Chamber? why my Where's the young Boy? (Chamber?)

Maft. Nay, Pray ye, Sir, be more modest

For your own Credit sake; the people see ye,
And I would use ye with the best.

Alph. Best, hang ye,

What

What dost thou think me mad ?

Mast. Pray, and be civil,
Heaven may deliver ye.

Alph. Into a rogues hands.

Mast. You do but draw more misery upon ye,
And add to your disease.

Alph. Get from me.

Mast. No Sir,

You must not be left so : bear your self civilly,
And 'twill be better for ye : swell not, nor chafe not.

Alph. I am a Gentleman, and a neighbour, rascal.

Mast. A great deal the more pity : I have heard of ye.

Jul. Excellent Master.

Mast. The Duke is very tender too.

Alph. Am I lunatique ? am I run mad ?

What dost thou talk to me of Dukes, and Devils,
Why do the people gape so ?

Mast. Do not anger 'em,
But go in quietly, and slip in softly
They will so tew ye, else, I am commanded Sir.

Alph. Why, prethee why ?

Mast. Ye are dog-mad : you perceive it not,
Very far mad : and whips will scant recover ye.

Alph. Ha ! whips ?

Mast. I whips, and fore whips, and ye were a Lord Sir,
If ye be stubborn here.

Alph. Whips ? what am I grown ?

Jul. O I could burst : hold, hold, hold, hold o' both ends,
How he looks, pray heaven, he be not mad indeed.

Alph. I do not perceive I am so ; but if you think it,
Nor I'le be hangd if 't be so.

Mast. Do you see this Sir ? Irons brought in.
Down with that Devil in ye.

Alph. Indeed I am angry,
But I'le contain my self : O I could burst now,
And tear my self, but these rogues will torment me,
Mad in mine old days ? make mine own afflictions ?

Mast. What do you mutter Sir ?

Alph. Nothing, Sir, nothing ;
I will go in, and quietly, most civilly : (me,
And good Sir, let none of your tormentors come about
You have a gentle face ; they look like Dragons.

Mast. Be civil and be safe : come, for these two daies
Ye must eat nothing neither : 'twill ease your fits Sir.

Alph. 'Twill starve me Sir ; but I must bear it joyfully.
I may sleep ?

Mast. Yes, a little : go in with these men.

Alph. O miserable me ! [Exit.

Mast. I'le follow presently,
You see 'tis done Sir.

Jul. Ye have done it handsomely,
And I'le inform the Duke so : pray ye attend him,
Let him want nothing, but his will:

Mast. He shall not,
And if he be rebellious ———

Jul. Never spare him :
H'as flesh, and hide enough, he loves a whipping.

Mast. My service to his Grace. [Exit.

Jul. I shall commend it.
So, thou art fast : I must go get some fresh room
To laugh, and caper in : O how it tickles me !
O how it tumbles me with joy ! thy mouth's stopt :
Now if I can do my Mistris good, I am Sainted. [Exit.

Aëius Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter Seberto, Curio.

Seb. NOW, o' my conscience, we have lost him utterly,
He's not gone home : we heard from thence this
And since our parting last at Roderigo's (morning,
You know what ground we have travel'd.

Cur. He's asleep sure :

For if he had been awake, we should have met with him :
'Faith let's turn back, we have but a fruitless journey ;
And to hope further of Alindas recovery,
(For sure she'l rather perish than return)
Is but to seek a Moth i'th' Sun.

Seb. We'l on sure ;
Something we'l know, some cause of all this fooling,
Make some discovery.

Cur. Which way shall we cast then,
For all the Champion Country, and the villages,
And all those sides ?

Seb. We'l cross these woods awhile then :
Here if we fail, we'l gallop to Segovia.
And if we light of no news there, hear nothing ;
We'l even turn fairly home, and coast the other side.

Cur. He may be sick, or falln into some danger ;
He has no guide, nor no man to attend him.

Seb. He's well enough, he has a travel'd body,
And though he be old, he's tough, and will endure well ;
But he is so violent to finde her out,
That his anger leads him a thousand wild-goose chases :
I'le warrant he is well.

Cur. Shall we part company ?

Seb. By no means, no : that were a sullen business :
No pleasure in our journey : come, let's cross here first,
And where we find the paths, let them direct us.

[Exit.

SCENE II.

Enter Juletta, Alinda.

Jul. Why are you still so fearfull of me, Lady ?
So doubtfull of my faith, and honest service ?
To hide your self from me, to fly my company ?
Am I not yours ? all yours ? by this light you shake still ;
Do ye suspect me false ? did I ever fail ye ?
Do you think I am corrupted ? base ? and treacherous ?
Lord, how ye look ! Is not my life ty'd to ye ?
And all the power I have to serve, and honour ye ?
Still do ye doubt ? still am I terrible ?

I will not trouble ye : good Heaven preserve ye,
And send ye what ye wish : I will not see ye,
Nor once remember I had such a Mistris.
I will not speak of ye, nor name Alinda,
For fear you should suspect I would betray ye :
Goodness and peace conduct ye.

Alin. Prethee pardon me,
I know thou art truly faithfull : and thou art welcom,
A welcom partner to my miseries ;
Thou knowst I love thee too.

Jul. I have thought so, Lady.

Alin. Alas, my fears have so distracted me
I durst not trust my self.

Jul. Come, pray ye think better,
And cast those by : at least consider, Lady,
How to prevent 'em : pray ye put off this fools coat,
Though it have kept ye secret for a season,
'Tis known now, and will betray ye ; your arch enemy
Roderigo is abroad : many are looking for ye.

Alin. I know it : and those many I have cozen'd.

Jul. You cannot still do thus.

Alin. I have no means to shift it.

Jul. I have : and shift you too. I lay last night
At a poor widows house here in the Thicket,
Whither I will conduct ye, and new shape ye,
My self too to attend ye.

Alin. What means hast thou ?
For mine are gone.

Jul. Fear not, enough to serve ye ;
I came not out so empty.

Alin. Prethee tell me,
(For thou hast struck a kind of comfort through me.)
When saw'st thou Roderigo ?

Jul. Even this morning,

And in these woods : take heed, h'as got a new shape.

Alm. The habit of a Pilgrim ? yes, I know it,
And I hope shall prevent it ; was he alone ?

Jul. No Madam, and which made me wonder mightily,
He was in company with that handsom Pilgrim,
That had sweet man.

Alm. That I forgot to give to ?

Jul. The same, the very same, that you so pitied,
A man as fit to suit his villanies.

Alm. And did they walk together ?

Jul. Wondrous civilly.

Alm. Talk, and discourse ?

Jul. I think so, for I saw 'em
Make many stands, and then embrace each other,

Alm. The Pilgrim is betray'd, a Judas dwells with him,
A Simon, that will seem a Saint to choak him.
Canst thou but shew me this ?

Jul. Lord how she trembles !
Not thus, for all the world, ye are undone then ;
But let's retire, and alter, then we'll walk free ;
And then I'll shew ye any thing.

Alm. Come, good wench,
And speedily : for I have strange faiths working,
As strange fears too, I'll tell thee all my life then.

Jul. Come quick, I'll conduct ye, and still serve ye,
And do not fear ; hang fear, it spoils all projects.
This way ; I'll be your guide.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Governour, Verdugo, Citizens.

Gov. Use all your sports,
All your solemnities ; 'tis the Kings day to morrow,
His birth-day, and his marriage, a glad day,
A day we ought to honour, all.

1 Cit. We will Sir,
And make Segovia ring with our rejoycings.

Gov. Be sumptuous, but not riotous ; be bounteous,
But not in drunken Bacchanals : free to all strangers,
Easie, and sweet in all your entertainments,
For 'tis a Royal day admits no rudeness. (your self,

2 Cit. Your Lordship will do us the honour to be here
And grace the day ?

Gov. 'Tis a main part of my service. (deration

3 Cit. I hope your honour has taken into your confi-
The miseries we have suffered by these Out-laws,
The losses, hourly tears ; the rude abuses
Strangers that travel to us are daily loaden with,
Our Daughters, and our wives complaints.

Gov. I am sorry for't,
And have Commission from the King to ease it :
You shall not be long vext.

1 Cit. Had we not walls, Sir,
And those continually man'd too with our watches,
We should not have a bit of meat to feed us.
And yet they are our friends, and we must think so,
And entertain 'em so sometimes, and feast 'em,
And send 'em loaden home too, we are lost else. (Christians,

2 Cit. They'll come to Church amongst us, as we hope
When all their zeal is but to steal the Chalice ;
At this good time now, if your Lordship were not here,
To awe their violence with your authority,
They would play such gombals.

Gov. Are they grown so heady ? (Bonfires ;

2 Cit. They would drink up all our Wine, piss out our
Then, like the drunken Centaures, have at the fairest,
Nay, have at all : four-score and ten's a Goddess,
Whilst we, like fools, stand shaking in our cellars.

Gov. Are they so fierce upon so little sufferance ?
I'll give 'em such a purge, and suddenly.

Verdugo, after this solemnity is over,
Call on me for a charge of men, of good men,
To see what house these knaves keep : of good Souldiers,
As sturdy as themselves : that dare dispute with 'em,

Dare walk the woods as well as they, as fearless,
But with a better faith belabour 'em ;
I'll know what claim they have to their possession.

'Tis pity of their Captain Roderigo,
A well-bred Gentleman, and a good Souldier,
And one his Majesty has some little reason
To thank, for sundry services, and fair ones ;
That long neglect bred this, I am sorry for him.

Ver. The hope of his estate keeps back his pardon,
There's divers wasps, that buz about that hony-box,
And long to lick themselves full.

Gov. True Verdugo,
Would he had but the patience to discern it,
And policy to wipe their lips.

Verd. To fetch him in Sir,
By violence, he being now no infant,
Will ask some bloody crowns. I know his people
Are of his own choice men, that will not totter,
Nor blench much at a Bullet ; I know his order,
And though he have no multitude, h'as manhood ;
The elder-twin to that too, staid experience.

But if he mult be forced, Sir,——
Gov. There's no remedy,
Unless he come himself.

Ver. That will be doubtfull.

Did you never hear yet of the noble Pedro ?

Gov. I cannot by no means : I think he's dead sure ;
The court bewails much his untimely loss :
The King himself laments him.

Verd. He was sunk ;
And if he be dead, he died happily,
He buried all he had in the Kings service,
And lost himself.

Gov. Well : if he be alive, Captain,
(As hope still speaks the best) I know the Kings mind
So inwardly and full, he will be happy.
Come, to this preparation ; when that's done,
The Out-laws expedition is begun.

Cit. We'll contribute all to that, and help our selves too.
[Exeunt.]

SCENE IV.

Enter Roderigo, Pedro.

Rod. How sweet these solitary places are ! how wantonly
The wind blows through the leaves, and courts, and playes
(with 'em !

Will ye sit down, and sleep ? the heat invites ye.
Hark how yond purling stream dances, and murmurs,
The Birds sing softly too : pray take some rest, Sir.
I would fain wooe his fancie to a peace,
It labours high and hastily upon him ;
Pray ye sit, and I'll sit by.

Ped. I cannot sleep friend,
I have those watches here admit no slumbers,
Saw ye none yet ?

Rod. No creature.

Ped. What strange Musick
Was that we heard as far off ?

Rod. I cannot guess ;
'Twas loud, and shrill : sometimes it shew'd hard by us,
And by and by the sound fled as the wind does ;
Here's no inhabitants.

Ped. It much delighted me.

Rod. They talk of Fairies, and such demi-devils,
This is a fine place to dance their gambols.——

Ped. Me thought I heard a voyce. [Musick and Birds.

Rod. They can sing admirably, (way
They never lose their maiden-heads : I would fool any
To make him merry now : methink yond rocks yonder
Shew like enchanted Cells, where they inhabit.

[Musick as far off. Pot Birds.
Ped. 'Tis here again, hark gentle Roderigo,
Hark, hark : O sweet, sweet, how the Birds record too !
Mark how it flies now every way. O love,

In such a harmony art thou begotten,
In such soft air, so gentle, lull'd and nourish'd,
O my best Mistress!

Rod. How he weeps! dear Heaven
Give him his hearts content, and me forgive too.
I must melt too.

Ped. The Birds sing louder, sweeter,
And every note they emulate one another. (hours,
Lie still and hear: These when they have done their la-

Enter Alinda, and Juletta, like old Women.

Their pretty airs, fall to their rests, enjoy 'em.
Nothing rocks Love asleep, but death.

Rod. Who are these?

Ped. What.

Rod. Those there, those, those things that come upon us,
Those grandam things, those strange antiquities.
Did not I say these woods begot strange wonders?

Jul. Now ye may view 'em.

Alin. Ha?

Jul. The men ye long'd for,
Here they are both: now ye may boldly talk with 'em,
And never be ghets'd at: be not afraid, nor faint not;
They wonder at us; let's maintain that wonder;
Shake not, but what ye purpose do discreetly,
And from your tongue I'll take my part.

Alin. Ha?

Jul. There: before ye, there, do not turn coward Mistress,
If ye do love, carry your Love out handsomely.

Alin. 'Tis he and Roderigo; what a peace
Dwells in their faces, what a friendly calm
Crowns both their souls?

Rod. They show as if they were mortal,
They come upon us still.

Ped. Be not afraid; Man,
Let 'em be what they will, they cannot hurt us,
Rod. That thing i'th' Button'd-cap looks terribly.
She has Guns in her eyes, the Devils Ingeneer.

Ped. Come, stand, and let's go meet 'em.

Rod. Go you first.

I have less faith: when I have said my Prayers —

Ped. There needs no fear, hale reverend dames.

Alin. Good even.

What do ye seek?

Ped. We would seek happier fortunes.

Rod. That little devil has main need of a Barber,
What a trim beard she has?

Alin. Seek 'em, and make 'em,
Lie not still, nor longer here,
Here inhabits nought but fear,
Be constant good, in faith be clear,
Fortune will wait ye every where.

Ped. Whither should we go? for we believe thy reverence,
And next obey.

Alin. Go to Segovia,
And there before the Altar pay thy vows,
Thy gifts, and prayers: unload thy heaviness,
To morrow shed thy tears, and gain thy fruit,
Such honest noble shows, ne're wanted fruit.

Jul. Stand you out too.

Rod. I shall be hang'd, or whipt now:
These know, and these have power.

Jul. See how he shakes.

A secure conscience never quakes,
Thou hast been ill; be so no more,
A good retreat is a great store.
Thou hast commanded men of might,
Command thy self, and then thou art right.

Alin. Command thy will: thy foul desires.
Put out and quench thy unhallowed fires:
Command thy mind, and make that pure;
Thou art wise then, valiant, and secure.
A blessing then thou maist beget.

Jul. A curse else that shall never set
Will light upon thee: Say thy Prayers,
Thou hast as many sins, as hairs.
Thou art a Captain, let thy men
Be honest, and good thoughts, and then
Thou maist command, and lead in chief,
Yet thou art bloody, and a thief.

Rod. What shall I do? I do confess.

Alin. Retire,
And purge thee perfect in his fire:
His life observe; live in his School,
And then thou shalt put off the fool.

Jul. Pray at Segovia too, and give
Thy Offerings up, repent, and live.

Alin. Away, away: enquire no more,
Do this, ye are rich, else fools, and poor;
What musick's this?

Jul. Retire? 'tis some neat Joy,
In honour of the Kings great day: they wonder,
This comes in right to confirm their reverence.
Away, away, let them admire, it makes
For our advantage: how the Captain shakes!

Ped. This was the Musick.

Rod. Yes, yes, how I sweat!
I was never so deserted; sure these woods
Are only inhabited with rare dreams, and wonders;
I would not be a knave again, a villain:
O how I loath it now: for these know all Sir,
And they would find me out.

Ped. They are excellent women,
Deep in their knowledge, friend.

Rod. I would not be traitor,
And have these of my Jury; how light I am,
And how my heart laughs now me thinks within me?
Now I am Catechiz'd, I would ever dwell here,
For here is a kind of Court of Reformation;
Had I been stubborn friend.

Ped. They would have found it.

Rod. And then they would have handled me a new way,
The Devils dump had been danced then.

Ped. Let's away
And do their great commands, and do 'em handsomely:
Contrite, and true, for I believe Roderigo,
And constantly believe, we shall be happy.

Rod. So you do well; fall edge or flat o' my side;
All I can stagger at is the Kings anger,
Which if it come, I am prepar'd to meet it.

Ped. The King has mercy, friend, as well as Justice:
And when you fall: no more —

Rod. I hope the fairest.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE V.

Enter Master, Seberto, Curio.

(Sought him:
Cur. We have told ye what he is: what time we have
His nature, and his name: the seeming Boy too
Ye had here, how, and what by your own relation, (him
All circumstances we have clear'd: That the Duke sent
We told ye how impossible; he knows him not;
That he is mad himself, and therefore fit
To be your Prisoner, we dare swear against it. (him;

Seb. Take heed Sir, be not madder than you would make
Though he be rash, and suddain (which is all his wildness)
Take heed ye wrong him not: he is a Gentleman,
And so must be restor'd and clear'd in all points;
The King shall be a Judge else.

Cur. 'Twas some trick
That brought him hither: the boy, and letter counterfeit,
Which shall appear, if ye dare now detain him.

Master. I dare not Sir; nor will not: I believe ye,
And will restore him up: had I known sooner
H'ad been a neighbour, and the man you speak him;
(Though as I live, he carried a wild seeming)

My

My Service, and my self had both attended him
How I have us'd him, let him speak.

Seb. Let's in, and visit him :
Then to the holy Temple : there pay our duties,
And so we'll take our leaves.

Majr. Ple wait upon you.

[Exeunt.

SCENE VI.

An Altar prepar'd.

Solemn Musick.

Enter Governour, Verdugo, Courtiers, Ladies, &c.

Gov. This to devotion sacred be,
This to the Kings prosperity,
This to the Queen, and Chastity.

(Musick.

Ver. These Oblations first we bring
To purge our selves : These to the King.
To love, and beautie these : now sing.

(Musick.

Ladies. Holy Altar, daign to take
These for our selves : For the Kings sake
And honour these : These sacred bye
To Vertue, Love, and Modesty,
Our wishes to Eternity.

(Musick.

Enter Pedro, and Roderigo.

Ped. For our selves first, thus we bend,
Forgive us heaven, and be our friend.

Rod. And happy fortune to us send.

Ped. To the King, honour, and all Joy,
Long, and happy from annoy.

Rod. Prosperous be all his dayes
Every new hour, a new praise.

Ped. Every minute thus be seen,

Both. And thousand honours Crown the Queen. Musick.

Enter Alphonso, Curio, Seberto.

Seb. Come to the Altar : let us do our duties.

Alph. I have almost forgot a Church.

Cur. Kneel reverently.

Alph. For my loft wits (let me see)
First I pray : and secondly
To be at home again, and free,
And if I travel more, hang me.
For the King, and for the Queen,
That they may be wise, and seen
Never in the Mad-mans Inne.
For my Daughter, I would pray
But she has made a holy day,
And needs not my devotion now
Let her take her own course, Heaven,
Whether it be odd, or even,

(Musick.

Enter Alinda, and Juletta, like Shepherds.

And if that please not, take her you.

Seb. A short, and sweet Meditation : what are these here?

Alin. Hale to this sacred place.

Jul. They are all here, Madam :

No violence dare touch here ; be sectre :
My Bilbo Master too : how got he loose again ?
How lamentably he looks ! he has had discipline.
I dare not let him know my pranks.

Seb. 'Tis she sure. Cur. 'Tis certainly.

Ped. Ha ! do I dazel ?

Rod. 'Tis the fair Alinda.

Gov. What wonder stand these strangers in ?

Rod. Her woman by her.

The same Sir, as I live,

Alph. I had a Daughter,
With such a face once : such eyes and nose too,
Ha, let me see, 'tis wondrous like Alinda,

Their devotion ended, Ple mark 'em and nearer.
And she had a Filly that waited on her,
Just with such a favour :

Do they keep Goats now ?

Alin. Thus we kneel, and thus we pray
A happy honour to this day,
Thus our Sacrifice we bring
Ever happy to the King.

Jul. These of Purple, Damask green
Sacred to the vertuous Queen
Here we hang.

Alin. As these are now
Her glories ever spring, and show.
These for our selves : our hopes, and loves,
Full of pinks, and Ladies gloves,
Of hearts-ease too, which we would fain.

As we labour for, attain ;
Hear me Heaven, and as I bend,
Full of hope, some comfort send.

Jul. Hear her : hear her : if there be
A spotless Sweetness, this is she.

(Musick.

Ped. Now Roderigo stand.

Rod. He that divides ye

Divides my life too.

Gov. Pedro, Noble Pedro,
Do not you know your friend ?

Ped. I know, and honour ye.

Gov. Lady this leave Ple crave, pray be not angry,
I will not long divide you : how happy, Pedro,
Would all the court be now, might they behold thee ?
Might they but see you thus, and thus embrace you ?
The King will be a joyfull man believe it,
Most joyfull, Pedro.

Ped. I am his humble Servant.

Nay, good Sir, speak your will, I see you wonder, one easie word from you ———

Alph. I dare say nothing

My tongue's a new tongue Sir, and knows his tither,
Let her do what she please, I dare do nothing,
I have been damn'd for doing, will the King know him ?
That fellow there, will he respect and honour him ?
He has been look'd upon they say : will he own him ?

Gov. Yes certainly and grace him, ever honour him,
Restore him every way, he has much lamented him.

Alp. Is't your will too ? this is the last time of asking.

Rod. I am sure, none else shall touch her, none else en-
If this, and this hold. (joy her.

Al. You had best begin the game then, I have notitle in her,
Pray take her, and dispatch her, and commend me to her,
And let me get me home, and hope I am sober :
Kiss, kiss, it must be thus : stand up Alinda,
I am the more child, and more need of blessing.
Ye had a waiting woman, one Juletta,
A pretty desperate thing, just such another
As this sweet Lady ; we call'd her nimble chaps.
I pray is this the party ? Jul. No indeed Sir,
She is at home ; I am a little Foot-Boy,
That walk a nights, and fright old Gentlemen ;
Make 'em lose Hats and Cloaks.

Alph. And Horses too. (ditches ;

Jul. Sometimes I do Sir, teach 'em the way through
And how to break their worships shins, and noses
Against old broken Stiles, and Stumps.

Alph. A fine art.

I feel it in my bones yet.

Jul. I am a Drum Sir,

A Drum at mid-night, ran tan tan tan tan Sir,
Do you take me for Juletta ? I am a Page Sir,
That brought a letter from the Duke of Medina
To have one senior Alphonso, just such another
As your old worship, worm'd for running mad Sir.
Alas, you are mistaken.

Alph. Thou art the Devil,
And so thou hast used me.

Ful. I am any thing,
An old woman, that tells fortunes.

Rod. Ha.

Ful. And frights good people,
And sends them to Segovia for their fortunes:
I am strange airs, and excellent sweet voyces.
I am any thing, to do her good, believe me;
She now recovered, and her wishes crown'd
I am Fuletta again, pray Sir forgive me.

Alph. I dare not do otherwise, for fear thou should'st (still follow me,

Prethee be forgiven, and I prethee forgive me too:
And if any of you will marry her.

Ful. No I beseech you Sir;
My Mistress is my husband, with her I'll dwell still,
And when you play any more pranks you know where to (have me.

Ped. You know him Sir.

Gov. Know him, and much lament him:

The King's incens'd much, much Sir, I can assure you.

Ped. Noble Governour.

Gov. But since he is your friend, and now appears,
In honour of this day and love to you Sir:

I'll try the power I have, to the pinch I'll put it;
Here's my hand Roderigo, I'll set you fair again.

Rod. And here's mine, to be true, and full of service.

Gov. Your people too, shall have their general pardons,
We'll have all peace and love.

Rod. All shall pray for you.

Gov. To my house now, and suite you to your worths;
Off with these weeds, and appear glorious:
Then to the Priest, that shall attend us here,
And this be stil'd Loves new and happy year.

Rod. The Kings and Queens, two noble honours meet,
To grace this day, two true loves at their feet.

Alph. Well well, since wedding will come after wooing,
Give me some Rose-Mary, and let's be going.

[Exeunt.

Frank.*
 Lelia, a cunning wanton Widow.
 Waiting-woman.
 Maid Servants.

The Scene Venice, Spain.

The principal Actors were,

Richard Burbadge. } William Ostler.
Henry Condell. } Alexander Cooke.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Lodovico, and Pifo.

Lodovico.

TH E truth is, Pifo, so she be a woman
 And rich and wholsome, let her be of what
 Condition and Complexion it please,
 She shall please me I am sure; Those men are fools
 That make their eyes their choosers, not their needs.

Pifo. Me thinks I would have her honest too, and handsom.

Lod. Yes if I could have both, but since they are Wishes so near impossibilities,
 Let me have that that may be.

Pifo. If it were so,
 I hope your conscience would not be so nice
 To start at such a blessing.

Lod. No believe me,
 I do not think I should.

Pifo. But thou would'st be
 I do not doubt upon the least suspicion
 Unmercifully jealous.

Lod. No I should not,
 For I believe those mad that seek vexations.
 A Wife, though she be honest, is a trouble;
 Had I a Wife as fair as Hellen was
 That drew so many Cuckolds to her cause,
 These eyes should see another in my Saddle
 Ere I believe my beast would carry double.

Pifo. So should not I by your Lady, and I think
 My patience (by your leave) as good as yours,
 Report would stir me mainly, I am sure on't.

Lod. Report? You are unwise; report is nothing;
 For if there were a truth in what men talk,
 I mean of this kind, this part of the world
 I am sure would be no more call'd Christendom.

Pifo.

Piso. What then?

Lod. Why Cuckoldom, for we should lose
Our old faiths clean, and hold their new opinions:
If talk could make me swear, before I would marry
I'd tie a surer knot, and hang my self;
I tell thee there was never woman yet,
(Nor never hope there shall be) though a Saint,
But she has been a subject to mens tongues,
And in the worse sense: and that desperate Husband,
That dares give up his peace, and follow humours
(Which he shall find too busie, if he seek 'em)
Besides the forcing of himself an Ass
He dyes in chains, eating himself with anger.

Piso. Having these Antidotes against opinion
I would marry any one; an arrant Whore.

Lod. Thou dost not feel the nature of this Physick
Which I prescribe not to beget diseases,
But where they are, to stop them.

Piso. I conceive ye:
What thinkest thou, thy way, of the widow Lelia?

Lod. Faith thou hast found out one I must confess
Would stagger my best patience: From that woman
As I would bless my self from plagues and surfeits,
From Men of war at Sea, from storms, and quicksands,
From hearing Treason and concealing it,
From daring of a Madman, or a Drunkard,
From Heresie, ill Wine, and stumbling post Horse;
So would I pray each morning, and each night
(And if I said each hour, I should not lye)
To be delivered of all these in one,
The woman thou hast named.

Enter Julio, Angelo, and Father.

Piso. Thou hast set her in a pretty Litany.

Ang. Pray take my counsel.

Jul. When I am my self
I'll hear you any way; love me though thus
As thou art honest, which I dare not be Left I despise my self. Farewel. [Exit Julio.]

Piso. Do you hear my friend: Sir, are you not a setter,
For the fair widow here of famous memory?

Fa. Ha? am I taken for a Bawd? Oh Heaven!
To mine own child too? misery, I thank thee
That keptst me from their knowledge: Sir, believe me
I understand ye not.

Lod. You love plain dealing.
Are you not parcel Bawd? confess your Function,
It may be we would use it.

Fa. Were she worse,
As I fear strangely she is ill enough,
I would not hear this tamely.

Piso. Here's a shilling
To strike good luck withal.

Fa. Here's a Sword, Sir,
To strike a Knave withal, thou lyeest, and basely,
Be what thou wilt.

Ang. Why how now Gentlemen?

Fa. You are many: I shall meet you, Sir, again,
And make you understand, y'have wrong'd a Woman
Compar'd with whom thy Mother was a sinner. Farewel.

Piso. He has amazed me. [Exit Father.]

Ang. With a blow?
By'r Lady 'twas a sound one; are ye good
At taking knocks? I shall know you hereafter:
You were to blame to tempt a man so far
Before you knew him certain: h'as not hurt ye?

Piso. No I think.

Lod. We were to blame indeed to go so far,
For men may be mistaken: if he had swinged us
H'had serv'd us right: Beshrew my heart, I think,
We have done the Gentlewoman as much wrong too,
For hang me if I know her
In my particular.

Piso. Nor I; this 'tis to credit

Mens idle tongues; I warrant they have said
As much by our two Mothers.

Lod. Like enough.

Ang. I see a beating now and then does more
Move and stir up a mans contrition
Than a sharp Sermon, here probatum est.

Enter Frederick, and Servant.

Ser. What shall I tell your Sister?

Fred. Tell her this,
Till she be better conversation'd
And leave her walking by her self, and whining
To her old melancholy Lute, I'll keep
As far from her as the Gallows. [Exit Servant.]

Ang. Who's that, Frederick?

Fred. Yes marry is't. O Angelo how dost thou?

Ang. Save you Sir, how does my Mistress?

Fred. She is in love I think, but not with you
I can assure you: saw ye Fabritio?

Ang. Is he come over?

Fred. Yes a week ago: Shall we dine?

Ang. I cannot.

Fred. Prethee do.

Ang. Believe me I have business.

Fred. Have you too, Gentlemen?

Piso. No Sir.

Fred. Why then let's dine together.

Lod. With all my heart.

Fred. Go then: Farewel good Angelo;
Commend me to your friend.

Ang. I will. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Frank, and Clora.

Clo. Do not dissemble Frank, mine eyes are quicker
Than such observers, that do ground their faith
Upon one smile or tear; y'are much alter'd,
And are as empty of those excellencies
That were companions to you; I mean mirth
And free disposure of your blood and Spirit;
As you were born a mourner.

Fran. How I prethee?
For I perceive no such change in my self.

Clo. Come, come, this is not wise, nor provident
To halt before a Cripple: if you love,
Be liberal to your friend, and let her know it,
I see the way you run, and know how tedious
'Twill prove without a true companion.

Fran. Sure thou wouldst have me love.

Clo. Yes marry would I;
I should not please ye else.

Fran. And who for Heavens sake?
For I assure my self, I know not yet:
And prethee Clora, since thou'lt have it so
That I must love, and do I know not what:
Let him be held a pretty handsome fellow,
And young, and if he be a little valiant
'Twill be the better; and a little wife,
And faith a little honest.

Clo. Well I will found ye yet for all your craft.

Fran. Heigh ho! I'll love no more.

Clo. Than one; and him
You shall love Frank.

Fran. Which him? thou art so wise
People will take thee shortly for a Witch:
But prethee tell me Clora, if I were
So mad as thou wouldst make me, what kind of man
Wouldst thou imagine him?

Clo. Faith some pretty fellow,
With a clean strength, that cracks a cudgel well
And dances at a Wake, and plays at Nine-holes.

Fran. O what pretty commendations thou hast given him!
Faith if I were in love as I thank Heaven

I do not think I am; this short Epistle
before my love would make me burn the Legend.

Clor. You are too wild, I mean some Gentleman.

Fran. So do not I, till I can know 'em wiser:
Some Gentleman? no Clora, till some Gentleman
Keep some land, and fewer whores, believe me
I'll keep no love for him, I do not long
To go a foot yet, and solicit causes.

Clor. What think you then of an adventurer?
I'm an some wealthy Merchant.

Fra. Let him venture
In some decay'd Ware, or Carack of his own: he shall not
Rig me out, that's the short bn't; out upon't:
What young thing of my years would endure
To have her Husband in another Country
Within a month after she is married
Chopping for rotten Rattins, and lye pining
At home under the mercy of his fore-man? no,
Thoug' they be wealthy, and indifferent wise
I do not see that I am bound to love 'em.

Clor. I see ye are hard to please; yet I will please ye.

Fra. Faith not so hard neither, if considered
What woman may deserve as she is worthy:
But why do we bestow our time so idly?
Prethee let us entertain some other talk,
This is as sickly to me as faint weather.

Clor. Now I believe I shall content you Frank,
What think you of a Courtier?

Fran. Faith so ill,
That if I should be full, and speak but truth,
I would shew as if I wanted charity,
For the good wench let me not rail upon 'em,
Yet I have an excellent stomach, and must do it;
I have no mercy of these Infidels
Since I am put in mind on't, good wench bear with me.

Clor. Can no man sit you? I will find him out.

Fran. This Summer fruit, that you call Courtier,
While you continue cold and frosty to him
Hangs fast, and may be found: but when you sling
Too full a heat of your affections
Upon his foot, and make him ripe too soon,
You'll find him rotten i'th' handling;
His oaths and affections are all one
With his apparel, things to set him off,
He has as many Mistresses as Faiths,
And all Apocrypha: his true belief
Is only in a private Surgion,
And for my single self, I'd sooner venture
A new conversion of the Indies,
Than to make Courtiers able men, or honest.

Clor. I do believe you love no Courtier,
And by my troth to ghes you into love
With any I can think of, is beyond
Either your will, or my imagination.
And yet I am sure y'are caught: and I will know him.
There's none I ft now worthy the thinking of,
Unless it be a Souldier, and I am sure,
I would ever bless my self from such a fellow.

Fran. Why prethee?

Clor. Out upon 'em fire-locks,
They are nothing i'th' world but Buff and Scarlet,
Tough un'hewn pieces, to hack swords upon;
I had as lieve be courted by a Cannon,
As one of those

Fran. Thou art too malicious,
Upon my faith me thinks they're worthy men.

Clor. Say ye so? Ple pull ye on a little further.
What worth can be in those men, whose profession
Is nothing i'th' world but drink and damn me,
Out of whose violence they are possess'd
With legions of unwholsome whores and quarrels;
I am of that opinion, and will dye in't,
There is no understanding, nor can be
In a stout Souldier.

Fran. Now 'tis ignorance

I easily perceive that thus provokes thee,
And not the love of truth; I'll lay my life
If thou'dst been made a man, thou hadst been a coward.

Clor. If to be valiant, be to be a Souldier; I'll tell ye true,
I had rather be a Coward, I am sure with less sin.

Fra. This Herefie must be look'd to in time: for if it spread
'Twill grow too Pestilent; were I a Scholar
I would so hamper thee for thy opinion,
That ere I left, I would write thee out of credit
With all the world, and make thee not believ'd
Even in indifferent things; that I would leave thee
A reprobate out of the state of honour.
By all good things, thou hast flung aspersions
So like a fool (for I am angry with thee)
Upon a sort of men, that let me tell thee
Thy mothers mother would have been a Saint
Had she conceiv'd a Souldier; they are people
(I may commend 'em, while I speak but truth)
Of all the old world, only left to keep
Man as he was, valiant and vertuous.
They are the model of those men, whose honours
We heave our hands at when we hear recited.

Clor. They are, and I have all I fought for, 'tis a souldier
You love, hide it no longer; you have betray'd your self;
Come, I have found your way of commendations,
And what I said, was but to pull it from ye.

Fran. 'Twas pretty, are you grown so cunning, Clora?
I grant I love a souldier; But what souldier
Will be a new task to ye? But all this
I do imagine was but laid to draw me
Out of my melancholy.

Clor. I will have the man
Ere I forsake ye.

Fran. I must to my Chamber.

Clor. May not I go along?

Fran. Yes, but good wench
Move me no more with these fond questions,
They work like Rhubarb with me.

Clor. Well, I will not.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Lelia and her Waiting-woman.

Lel. How now? who was that you staid to speak withal.

Wom. The old man forsooth.

Lel. What old man? (you call Father.)

Wom. The poor old man that uses to come hither, he that

Lel. Have you dispatched him?

Wom. No, he would fain speak with you.

Lel. Wilt thou never learn more manners,
Than to draw in such needy Rascals to disquiet me?
Go, answer him I will not be at leaseure.

Wom. He will needs speak with you; and good old man he
That by my troth I have not the heart to deny him,
Pray let him speak with you.

Lel. Lord how tender stomach'd you are grown of late?
You are not in love with him, are ye?

If ye be, strike up the match; you shall have
Three l. and a pair of blankets! will ye go answer him?

Wom. Pray let him speak with you, he will not away else.
(Heaven I am

Lel. Well, let him in then if there be no remedy; I thank
Able to abuse him, I shall ne'r come clear else of him.

Enter Father.

Now Sir, what is your business? pray be short; for I have other
Matters of more moment to call me from ye.

Fa. If you but look upon me like a Daughter
And keep that love about ye that makes good
A Fathers hope, you'll quickly find my business;
And what I would say to you, and before
I ask, will be a giver: say that sleep,
I mean that love, or be but num'd within ye,

The nature of my want is such a searcher,
And of so mighty power, that where he finds
This dead forgetfulness, it works so strongly,
That if the least heat of a child's affection
Remain unperish'd, like another nature,
It makes all new again; pray do not scorn me,
Nor seem to make your self a greater business
Than my relieving.

Lel. If you were not old
I should laugh at ye; what a vengeance ails ye
To be so childish to imagine me
A founder of old fellows? make him drink, wench,
And if there be any cold meat in the Buttery,
Give him some broken bread, and that, and rid him.

Fa. Is this a child's love? or a recompence
Fit for a Fathers care? O Lelia,
Had I been thus unkind, thou hadst not been;
Or like me miserable: But 'tis impossible
Nature should dye so utterly within thee,
And lose her promises; thou art one of those
She set her stamp more excellently on,
Than common people, as fore-telling thee,
A general example of her goodness;
Or say she could lye, yet Religion
(For love to Parents is Religious)
Would lead thee right again: Look well upon me,
I am the root that gave thee nourishment,
And made thee spring fair, do not let me perish
Now I am old and sapless.

Lelia. As I live
I like ye far worse now ye grow thus holy,
I grant you are my Father; am I therefore
Bound to consume my self, and be a Beggar
Still in relieving you? I do not feel
Any such mad compassion yet within me.

Fa. I gave up all my state to make yours thus.

Lel. 'Twas as ye ought to do, and now ye cry for't
As children do for babies back again.

Fath. How wouldst thou have me live?

Lel. I would not have ye,
Nor know no reason Fathers should desire
To live, and be a trouble, when children
Are able to inherit, let them dye,
'Tis fit, and lookt for, that they should do so.

Fa. Is this your comfort?

Lel. All that I feel yet.

Fa. I will not curse thee.

Lel. If you do I care not.

Fa. Pray you give me leave to weep.

Lel. Why pray take leave;
If it be for your ease.

Fa. Thy Mother dyed,
Sweet peace be with her, in a happy time.

Lel. She did, Sir, as she ought to do, would you
Would take the pains to follow; what should you,
Or any old man do wearing away
In this world with Diseases, and desire
Only to live to make their Children scourge-sticks,
And hoard up mill-mony? me thinks a Marble
Lyes quieter upon an old mans head
Than a cold fit o'th' Palsy.

Fa. O good Heaven!
To what an impudence thou wretched woman,
Hast thou begot thy self again! well, justice
Will punish disobedience.

Lel. You mistake, Sir;
'Twill punish Beggars, fye for shame go work,
Or serve, you are grave enough to be a Porter
In some good man of worships house, and give Sententious answers to the comers in.
A pretty place; or be of some good Consort,
You had a pleasant touch o'th' Cistern once,
If idleness have not bereft you of it:
Be any thing but old and Beggarly,

Two sins that ever do outgrow compassion;
If I might see you offer at a course
That were a likely one, and shew'd some profit,
I would not stick for ten Groats, or a Noble.

Fath. Did I beget this woman?

Lel. Nay, I know not:

And till I know, I will not thank you for't;
How ever, he that got me had the pleasure,
And that me thinks, is a reward sufficient.

Fath. I am so strangely stricken with amazement,
I know not where I am, nor what I am. (bring ye

Lel. You had best take fresh air some where else, 'twill
Out of your trance the sooner.

Fath. Is all this

As you mean, Lelia?

Lel. Yes believe me is it,

For yet I cannot think you are so foolish,
As to imagine you are young enough
To be my heir, or I so old to make
A Nurse at these years for you, and attend
While you sup up my state in penny pots
Of Malmsey: when I am excellent at Cawdles,
And Cullices, and have enough spare gold
To boil away, you shall be welcome to me;
'Till when I'd have you be as merry, Sir,
As you can make your self with that you have,
And leave to trouble me with these relations;
Of what you have been to me, or you are,
For as I hear them, so I lose them; this
For ought I know yet, is my resolution.

Fath. Well, God be with thee, for I fear thy end
Will be a strange example. [Exit Father.

Lel. Fare ye well, Sir;

Now would some poor tender hearted fool have wept,
Relented, and have been undone: such Children
(I thank my understanding) I hate truly,
For by my troth I had rather see their tears
Than feel their pities: my desires and ends
Are all the Kindred that I have, and friends:

Enter Woman.

Is he departed?

Wom. Yes, but here's another.

Lel. Not of his tribe I hope; bring me no more
I would wish you such as he is; if thou see'st
They look like men of worth, and state, and carry
Ballast of both sides like tall Gentlemen
Admit 'em, but no snakes to poyson us
With poverty; wench you must learn a wise rule;
Look not upon the youths of men, and making,
How they descend in blood, nor let their tongues,
Though they strike suddainly, and sweet as musick
Corrupt thy fancy: see, and say them fair too,
But ever keep thy self without their distance;
Unless the love thou swallow be a pill
Gilded to hide the bitterness it brings,
Then fall on without fear, wench, yet so wisely
That one encounter cloy him not; nor promise
His love hath made thee more his, than his monies;
Learn this and thrive,
Then let thine honour ever
(For that's the last rule) be so stood upon,
That men may fairly see
'Tis want of means, not vertue makes thee fall;
And if you weep 'twill be a great deal better,
And draw on more compassion, which includes
A greater tenderness of love and bounty:
This is enough at once, digest it well:
Go let him in wench, if he promise profit;
Not else.

Enter Julio.

O you are welcome my fair Servant,
Upon my troth I have been longing for ye:

Z z z 2

Wom.

Wom. This, by her rule, should be a liberal man,
I see the best on's may learn every day.

Lel. There's none come with you?

Jul. No.

Lel. You do the wifer,
For some that have been here (I name no man)
Out of their malice, more than truth, have done me
Some few ill offices.

Jul. How, Sweet?

Lel. Nay, nothing,

Only have talkt a little wildly of me;
As their unruly Youth directed 'em;
Which though they bite me not, I would have wisht
Had light upon some other that deserv'd 'em.

Jul. Though the deserve this of the loofest tongue
(Which makes my sin the more) I must not see it;
Such is my misery. I would I knew him.

Lel. No, no, let him go,

He is not worth your anger; I must chide you
For being such a stranger to your Mistress,
Why would you be so, Servant?

Jul. I should chide,
If chiding would work any thing upon you,
For being such a stranger to your Servant,
I mean to his desires; when, my dear Mistress,
Shall I be made a happy man?

Lel. Fye, Servant,

What do you mean? unhand me, or, by Heav'n,
I shall be very angry, this is rudeness.

Jul. 'Twas but a kiss or two, that thus offends you.

Lel. 'Twas more I think, than you have warrant for.

Jul. I am sorry I deserv'd no more.

Lel. You may,

But not this rough way, Servant; we are tender,
And ought in all to be respected so;
If I had been your Horse, or Whore, you might
Back me with this intemperance; I thought
You had lov'd as worthy men, whose fair affections
Seek pleasures warranted, not pull'd by violence,
Do so no more:

Jul. I hope you are not angry?

Lel. I should be with another man, I am sure,
That durst appear but half thus violent.

Jul. I did not mean to ravish ye.

Lel. You could not.

Jul. You are so willing——

Lel. How?

Jul. Methinks this shadow,
If you had so much shame as fits a woman,
At least of your way, Mistress, long e're this
Had been laid off to me that understand ye.

Lel. That understand me? Sir, ye understand,
Nor shall, no more of me than modesty
Will, without fear, deliver to a stranger;
You understand I am honest, else I tell ye,
(Though you were better far than Julia)
You, and your understanding are two foals,
But were we Saints, thus we are still rewarded:
I see that Woman had a pretty catch on't,
That had made you the Master of a kindness,
She durst not answer openly; O me!
How easily we Women may be cozen'd!

I took this Julio, as I have a faith,
(This young Dissembler with the sober Vizard)
For the most modest, temper'd Gentleman,
The coolest, quietest, and best Companion;
For such an one I could have wish'd a Woman.

Jul. You have wish'd me ill enough o' conscience,
Make me no worse for shame; I see the more
I work by way of service to obtain ye,
You work the more upon me. Tell me truly
(While I am able to believe a Woman,
For if you use me thus, that faith will perish)
What is your end, and whither you will pull me;

Tell me, but tell me that I may not start at,
And have a cause to curse ye.

Lel. Bless me goodness!

To curse me did you say, Sir? let it be
For too much loving you then, such a curse
Kill me withal, and I shall be a Martyr,
You have found a new way to reward my doting,
And I confess a fit one for my folly,
For you your self, if you have good within ye,
And dare be Master of it, know how dearly
This heart hath held you ever; Oh good Heaven!
That I had never seen that false mans eyes,
That dares reward me thus with fears and curses;
Nor never heard the sweetness of that tongue,
That will, when this is known, yet cozen women;
Curse me, good Julio, curse me bitterly,
I do deserve it for my confidence,
And I beseech thee if thou hast a goodness
Or power yet in thee to confirm thy wishes,
Curse me to earth, for what should I do here
Like a decaying flower, still withering
Under his bitter words, whose kindly heat
Should give my poor heart life? No, curse me, Julio,
Thou canst not do me such a benefit
As that, and well done, that the Heav'n's may hear it.

Jul. O fair tears! were you but as chaste as subtil,
Like Bones of Saints, you would work miracles;
What were these women to a man that knew not
The thousand, thousand ways of their deceiving?
What riches had he found? O he would think
Himself still dreaming of a blessedness,
That like continual spring should flourish ever.
For if she were as good as she is seeming,
Or, like an Eagle, could renew her virtues,
Nature had made another world of sweetness.
Be not so griev'd, sweet Mistress, what I said,
You do, or should know, was but passion;
Pray wipe your eyes and kiss me; take these trifles,
And wear them for me, which are only rich
When you will put them on: indeed I love ye,
Beswew my sick heart, if I grieve not for ye.

Lel. Will you dissemble still? I am a fool,
And you may easily rule me, if you flatter,
The sin will be your own.

Jul. You know I do not.

Lel. And shall I be so childish once again,
After my late experience of your spight
To credit you? you do not know how deep
(Or if you did you would be kinder to me.)
This bitterness of yours has struck my heart.

Jul. I pray, no more.

Lel. Thus you would do I warrant,
If I were married to you.

Jul. Married to me?

Is that your end?

Lel. Yes, is not that the best end,
And, as all hold, the noblest way of love?
Why do you look so strange, Sir? do not you
Desire it should be so?

Jul. Stay.

Lel. Answer me.

Jul. Farewel.

Lel. I! are you there? are all these tears lost then?
Am I so overtaken by a fool
In my best days and tricks? my wife fellow,
I'll make you smart for't, as I am a woman,
And if thou beest not timber, yet I'll warm thee;
And is he gone?

Enter Woman.

Wom. Yes.

Lel. He's not so lightly struck,
To be recovered with a base repentance,
I should be sorry then; Fortune, I prithee

Give

Give me this man but once more in my arms,
And if I lose him, women have no charms.

[Exeunt.]

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Jacomo, and Fabricio.

Jac. Signior, what think you of this sound of Wars?

Fab. As only of a sound; they that intend
To do, are like deep waters that run quietly,
Leaving no face of what they were, behind 'em.
This rumour is too common, and too loud
To carry truth.

Jac. Shall we never live to see
Men look like men again,
Upon a March?
This cold dull rusty peace makes up appear
Like empty Pictures, only the faint shadows
Of what we should be;
Would to Heaven my Mother
Had given but half her will to my begetting,
And made me woman, to sit still and sing,
Or be sick when I list, or any thing
That is too idle for a man to think of;
Would I had been a Whore, 't had been a course
Certain, and (o' my Conscience) of more gain
Than two commands, as I would handle it:
'Faith, I could wish I had been any thing
Rather than what I am, a Souldier;
A Carrier or a Cobler, when I knew
What 'twas to wear a Sword first; for their trades
Are, and shall be a constant way of life,
While men fend Cheefes up, or wear out Buskins.

Fab. Thou art a little too impatient,
And mak'st thy anger a far more vexation
Than the not having Wars; I am a Souldier,
Which is my whole inheritance, yet I
Though I could wish a breach with all the world,
If not dishonourable, I am not so malicious,
To curse the fair peace of my Mother Country;
But thou want'st money, and the first supply
Will bury these thoughts in thee.

Jac. 'Pox o' peace,
It fills the Kingdom full of holydays,
And only feeds the wants of Whores and Pipers;
And makes the idle drunken Rogues get Spinsters:
'Tis true, I may want money, and no little,
And almost Cloaths too; of which if I had both
In full abundance; yet against all peace,
That brings up mischiefs thicker than a shower,
I would speak louder than a Lawyer;
By Heaven, it is the surfeit of all youth,
That makes the toughness, and the strength of Nations
Melt into Women. 'Tis an ease that broods
Thieves, and Bastards only.

Fab. This is more,
(Though it be true) than we ought to lay open,
And favours only of an indiscretion.
Believe me, Captain, such distemper'd spirits
Once out of motion, though they be proof valiant,
If they appear thus violent and fiery,
Breed but their own disgraces; and are nearer
Doubt and suspect in Princes, than rewards.

Jac. 'Tis well they can be near 'em any way.
But call you those true spirits ill affected,
That whilst the wars were, serv'd like walls and ribs
To girdle in the Kingdom?
And now fall
Through a faint Peace into affliction,
Speak but their miseries? come, come, Fabricio,
You may pretend what patience ye please,
And seem to yoak your wants like passions;

But while I know thou art a Souldier,
And a deserver, and no other Harvest
But what thy Sword reaps for thee to come in,
You shall be pleas'd to give me leave to tell ye,
You wish a Devil of this musty peace;
To which Prayer,
As one that's bound in Conscience, and all
That love our trade, I cry, Amen.

Fab. Prithee no more, we shall live well enough,
There's ways enough besides the wars to men
That are not logs, and lye still for the hands
Of others to remove 'em.

Jac. You may thrive, Sir,
Thou art young and handsome yet, and well enough
To please a Widow; thou canst sing, and tell
These foolish love-tales, and indite a little;
And if need be, compile a pretty matter,
And dedicate it to the honourable,
Which may awaken his compassion,
To make ye Clark o'th' Kitchen, and at length,
Come to be married to my Ladies Woman,
After she's crackt i'th' Ring.

Fab. 'Tis very well, Sir.

Jac. But what dost thou think shall become of me,
With all my imperfections? let me dye,
If I think I shall ever reach above
A forlorn Tapster, or some frothy fellow,
That stinks of stale Beer.

Fab. Captain Jacomo,

Why should you think so hardly of your vertues?

Jac. What vertues? by this light, I have no vertue,
But down-right buffetting, what can my face,
That is no better than a ragged Mapnow
Of where I have march'd and travell'd, profit me?
Unless it be for Ladies to abuse, and say
'Twas spoil'd for want of a Bongrace when I was young,
And now 'twill make a true prognostication
Of what man must be? Tell me of a fellow
That can mend Noses, and complain,
So tall a Souldier should want teeth to his Stomach;
And how it was great pity, that it was,
That he that made my Body was so buffed
He could not stay to make my Legs too; but was driven
To clap a pair of Cat-tlicks to my Knees, for which I am indebted to two School-Boys; this Must follow necessary.

Fab. There's no such matter.

Jac. Then for my Morals, and those hidden pieces,
That Art bestows upon me, they are such,
That when they come to light, I am sure will shame me,
For I can neither write, nor read, nor speak
That any man shall hope to profit by me;
And for my Languages, they are so many,
That put them all together, they will scarce
Serve to beg single Beer in; the plain truth is,
I love a Souldier, and can lead him on,
And if he fight well, I dare make him drunk;
This is my vertue, and if this will do,
I'll scramble yet amongst 'em.

Fab. 'Tis your way

To be thus pleasant still, but fear not, man,
For though the Wars fail, we shall screw our selves
Into some course of life yet.

Jac. Good Fabricio,

Have a quick eye upon me, for I fear
This Peace will make me something that I love not;
For by my troth, though I am plain and dudgion,
I would not be an Afs; and to sell parcels,
I can as soon be hang'd: prithee bestow me,
And speak some little good, though I deserve not.

Enter Eather.

Fab. Come, we'll consider more; stay, this Should be another wind-fall of the Wars.

Jac. He looks indeed like an old tatter'd Colours,
That every wind would borrow from the Staff :
These are the hopes we have for all our hurts ;
They have not cast his tongue too.

Fath. They that say
Hope never leaves a wretched man that seeks her,
I think are either patient fools, or liers,
I am sure I find it so, for I am master'd,
With such a misery and grief together
That that stay'd Anchor, men lay hold upon
In all their needs, isto me Lead that bows,
Or breaks with every strong sea of my sorrows.
I could now question Heaven (were it well
To look into their Justice) why those faults,
Those heavy sins others provoke 'em with
Should be rewarded on the head of us,
That hold the least alliance to their vices ;
But this would be too curious ; for I see
Our sufferings, not disputing, is the end,
Reveal'd to us of all these miseries.

Jac. Twenty such holy Hermits in a Camp
Would make 'em all Carthusians, I'll be hang'd
If he know what a Whore is, or a health,
Or have a nature liable to learn,
Or so much honest nurture to be drunk.
do not think he has the spleen to swear
A greater Oath than Semiters utter Socks with,
S'pur him a question.

Fath. They are strangers both
To me, as I to them I hope ; I would not have
Me and my shame together known by any,
I'll rather lie my self unto another.

Fab. I need not ask you, Sir, your Country,
I hear you speak this tongue, 'pray what more are you ?
Or have you been ? if it be not offensive
To urge ye so far, misery in your years
Gives every thing a tongue to question it.

Fath. Sir, though I could be pleas'd to make my ills
Only mine own, for grieving other men,
Yet to so fair and courteous a demander
That promises compassion, at worst pity,
I will relate a little of my story.

I am a Gentleman, however thus
Poor and unhappy ; which believe me, Sir,
Was not born with me ; for I well have try'd
Both the extreams of Fortune, and have found
Both dangerous ; my younger years provok'd me,
Feeling in what an ease I slept at home,
Which to all stirring spirits is a sickness,
To see far-Countrys, and observe their Customs :
I did so, and I travell'd till that course
Stor'd me with language, and some few slight manners,
Scarce worth my money ; when an itch possess'd me
Of making Arms my active end of travel.

Fab. But did you so ?

Fath. I did, and twenty Winters
I wore the Christian Cause upon my Sword
Against his Enemies, at Buda Siege
Full many a cold Night have I lodg'd in armour,
When all was frozen in me but mine Honour ;
And many a day, when both the Sun and Cannon
Strove who should most destroy us ; have I stood
Mail'd up in Steel, when my tough sinew shrunk,
And this parch'd Body ready to consume
As soon to ashes, as the Pike I bore ;
Want has been to me as another Nature,
Which makes me with this patience still profess it ;
And if a Souldier may without vain glory
Tell what h'as done, believe me, Gentlemen,
I could turn over annals of my dangers ;
With this poor weakness have I man'd a breach,
And made it firm with so much blood, that all
I had to bring me off alive was anger ;
Thrice was I made a Slave, and thrice redeem'd

At price of all I had ; The miseries
Of which times, if I had a heart to tell,
Would make ye weep like Children ; but 'll spare ye.

Jac. Fabricio, we two have been Souldiers
Above these fourteen years, yet o' my Conscience,
All we have seen, compar'd to his experience
Has been but cudgel-play, or Cock-fighting.
By all the faith I have in Arms, I reverence
The very poverty of this brave fellow ;
Which were enough it self, and his to strengthen
The weakest town against half Christendom.

I was never so asham'd of service
In all my life before, now I consider
What I have done, and yet the Rogues would swear
I was a valiant fellow ; I do find
The greatest danger I have brought my life through,
Now I have heard this worthy, was no more
Than stealing of a May pole, or at worst,
Fighting at single Billet with a Barge-man.

Fab. I do believe him, Jacomo.

Jac. Believe him ?

I have no faith within me, if I do not.

Fath. I see they are Souldiers ;
And if we may judge by affections,
Brave and deserving men ; how they are stir'd
But with a meer relation of what may be ?
Since I have won belief, and am not known,
Forgive me, Honour, I'll make use of thee.

Fab. Sir, would I were a man, or great, or able
To look with liberal eyes upon your vertue.

Jac. Let's give him all we have, and leave off prating.
Here, Souldier, there's even five months pay, be merry,
And get thee handsom Cloaths.

Fab. What mean you, Jacomo ?

Jac. Ye are a fool,

The very story's worth a hundred pound.
Give him more money.

Fath. Gentlemen, I know not
How I am able to deserve this blessing ;
But if I live to see fair days again,
Something I'll do in honour of your goodness,
That shall shew thankfulness, if not desert.

Fab. If you please, Sir, till we procure ye place,
To eat with us, or wear such honest Garments
As our poor means can reach to, you shall be
A welcome man ; to say more, were to feed ye
Only with words ; we honour what y'have been,
For we are Souldiers, though not near the worth
You spake of lately.

Fath. I do guess ye so,
And knew, unless ye were a Souldier,
Ye could not find the way to know my wants.

Jac. But methinks all this while y'are too temperate ;
Do you not tell men sometimes of the dulness
When you are grip't, as now you are with need ?
I do, and let them know those silks they wear,
The War weaves for 'em ; and the bread they eat
We sow, and reap again to feed their hunger ;
I tell them boldly, they are masters of
Nothing but what we fight for ; their fair women
Lye playing in their arms, whilst we, like Lares
Defend their pleasures ; I am angry too,
And often rail at these forgetful great men
That suffer us to sue for what we ought
To have flung on us, e're we ask.

Fath. I have

Too often told my griefs that way, when all
I reapt, was rudeness of behaviour ;
In their opinion men of War that thrive,
Must thank 'em when they rail, and wait to live.

Fab. Come, Sir, I see your wants need more relieving,
Than looking what they are ; pray go with us.

Fath. I thank you, Gentlemen ; since you are pleas'd
To do a benefit, I dare not cross it,

And what my service or endeavours may
Stand you in stead, you shall command, not pray.

[Exeunt.

Jac. So you shall us, I'll to the Taylors with you bodily.

SCENE II.

Enter Frederick, Lodovico, and Pifo.

Lod. Well, if this be true, I'll believe a Woman
When I have nothing else to do.

Pifo. 'Tis certain, if there be a way of truth
In blushes, smiles, and commendations;
For by this light, I have heard her praise yond' fellow
In such a pitch, as if sh'ad studied
To crowd the worths of all men into him,
And I imagine these are seldom us'd
Without their special ends, and by a maid
Of her desires and youth.

Fred. It may be so.

She's free, as you, or I am, and may have
By that Prerogative, a liberal choice
In the bestowing of her love.

Lod. Bestowing?

If it be so, she has bestow'd her self
Upon a trim youth, Pifo, what do you call him?

Pifo. Why, Captain Jacomo.

Lod. O, Captain Jack-boy,
That is the Gentleman.

Fred. I think he be
A Gentleman at worst.

Lod. So think I too,
Would he would mend, Sir.

Fred. And a tall one too.

Lod. Yes, of his teeth; for of my faith I think
They are sharper than his sword, and dare do more
If the Buff meet him fairly.

Fred. Very well.

Pifo. Now do I wonder what she means to do
When she has married him.

Lod. Why, well enough;
Trail his Pike under him, and be a Gentlewoman
Of the brave Captains Company.

Fred. Do you hear me?
This woman is my Sister, Gentlemen.

Lod. I am glad she is none of mine; but Frederick
Thou art not such a fool sure to be angry
Unless it be with her; we are thy friends, man.

Fred. I think ye are.

Lod. Yes, 'faith, and do but tell thee
How she will utterly overthrow her credit,
If she continue gracing of this pot-gun.

Pifo. I think she was bewicht, or mad or blind,
She would never have taken such a scar-Crow else
Into protection; of my life he looks
Of a more rusty swarth Complexion
Than an old arming Doublet.

Lod. I would send
His face to the Cutlers then, and have it sanguin'd,
'Twill look a great deal sweeter; then his Nose
I would have shorter, and my reason is,
His face will be ill mounted else.

Pifo. For his Body,
I will not be my own Judge, lest I seem
A Railer, but let others look upon't,
And if they find it any other thing
Than a Trunk seller, to send wines down in,
Or a long walking bottle, I'll be hang'd for't;
His Hide (for sure he is a Beast) is ranker
Than the Muscovy-Leather, and grain'd like it:

And by all likelihoods he was begotten
Between a stubborn pair of Winter boots;
His body goes with straps, he is so churlish.

Lod. He's poor and beggarly besides all this,
And of a nature far uncapable

Of any benefit; for his manners cannot
Shew him a way to thank a man that does one,
He's so uncivil; you may do a part
Worthy a Brother, to persuade your Sister
From her undoing; if she prove so foolish
To marry this call Captain, look to find her
Within a month, where you, or any good man,
Would blush to know her; selling cheese and pines,
And retail'd Bottle-Ale; I grieve to think,
Because I lov'd her, what a march this Captain
Will set her into.

Fred. You are both, believe me,
Two arrant Knaves, and were it not for taking
So just an execution from his hands
You have bely'd thus, I would swaddle ye,
Till I could draw off both your skins like Scabbards.
That man that you have wrong'd thus, though to me
He be a stranger, yet I know so worthy,
However low in fortune, that his worst parts,
The very wearing of his Cloaths, would make
Two better Gentlemen than you dare be,
For there is vertue in his outward things.

Lod. Belike you love him then?

Fred. Yes marry do I.

Lod. And will be angry for him.

Fred. If you talk,

Or pull your face into a stich again,
As I love truth I shall be very angry.
Do not I know thee, though thou hast some land
To set thee out thus among Gentlemen,
To be a prating, and vain-glorious Ass?
I do not wrong thee now, for I speak truth.
Do not I know thou hast been a cunning Coward,
That has no cure for shame but Cloath of Silver
And think'st the wearing of a gawdy Suit
Hides all disgraces?

Lod. I understand you not, you hurt not me,
Your anger flies so wide.

Pifo. Signior Frederick,
You much mistake this Gentleman.

Fred. No, Sir.

Pifo. If you would please to be less angry,
I would tell you how.

Fred. You had better study, Sir,
How to excuse your self if ye be able,
Or I shall tell you once again.

Pifo. Not me, Sir;
For I protest what I have said, was only
To make you understand your Sisters danger.

Lod. He might, if it pleas'd him, conceive it so.

Fred. I might, if it pleas'd me, stand still and hear
My Sister made a May-game, might I not?
And give allowance to your liberal jests
Upon his Person, whose least anger would Consume a Legion of such wretched people,
That have no more to justify their actions
But their tongues ends? that dare lie every way
As a Mill grinds? from this hour, I renounce
All part of fellowship that may hereafter
Make me take knowledg of ye, but for Knaves;
And take heed, as ye love whole skins and coxcombs,
How, and to whom, ye prate thus; for this time,
I care not if I spare ye; do not shake,
I will not beat ye, though ye do deserve it
Richly.

Lod. This is a strange Course, Frederick;
But sure you do not, or you would not know us;
Beat us?

Pifo. 'Tis somewhat low, Sir, to a Gentleman.

Fred. I'll speak but few words, but I'll make 'em truths;
Get you gone both, and quickly, without murmuring,
Or looking big; and yet before you go,
I will have this confess'd, and seriously,
That you two are two Rascals.

Lod.

Lod. How?

Fred. Two Rascals.

Come speak it from your hearts, or by this light
My sword shall lye among ye; answer me,
And to the point directly.

Piso. You shall have

Your will for this time: since we see y'are grown
So far untemperate; Let it be so Sir
In your opinion.

Fred. Do not mince the matter,
But speak the words plain; and you Lodovick
That stand so tally on your reputation,
You shall be he shall speak it.

Lod. This is pretty.

Fred. Let me not stay upon't.

Lod. Well we are Rascals,

Yes Piso, we are Rascals. [Ex. Lod. and Piso.]

Fred. Get ye gone now, not a word more, y'are Rascals.

Enter Fabricio, and Jacomo.

Fab. That should be Frederick,

Jac. 'Tis he: Frederick?

Fred. Who's that?

Jac. A friend Sir.

Fred. It is so, by the voyce:

I have sought you Gentlemen, and since I have found you,
So near our house, I'll force ye stay a while,
I pray let it be so.

Fab. It is too late,
We'll come and dine to morrow with your Sister,
And do our services.

Jac. Who were those with you?

Fab. We met two came from hence.

Fred. Two idle fellows,
That you shall beat hereafter, and I'll tell ye
Some fitter time a cause sufficient for it.

Fab. But Frederick, tell me truly; do you think
She can affect my friend?

Fred. No certainer

Than when I speak of him, or any other,
She entertains it with as much desire
As others do their recreations.

Fabr. Let not him have this light by any means;
He will but think he's mockt, and so grow angry,
Even to a quarrel: he's so much distrustfull
Of all that take occasion to commend him

Women especially: for which he shuns
All conversation with 'em, and believes
He can be but a mirth to all their Sex.
Whence is this musique?

Fred. From my Sisters chamber.

Fab. The touch is excellent, let's be attentive.]

Jac. Hark, are the Waits abroad?

Fab. Be softer prethee,

'Tis private musick.

Jac. What a dyn it makes?

I had rather hear a Jews trump than these Lutes,
They cry like School-boys.

Fabr. Prethee Jacomo.

Jac. Well I will hear, or sleep, I care not whether

THE SONG.

Enter at the Window Frank, and Clora.

1. Tell me dearest what is Love?
2. 'Tis a lightning from above,
'Tis an arrow, 'tis a fire,
'Tis a boy they call Desire.
Both. 'Tis a grave,
Gapes to have
Those poor fools that long to prove.

1. Tell me more, are Women true?

2. Yes, some are, and some as you.

Some are willing, some are strange,
Since you men first taught to change.

Both. And till troth

Be in both,

All shall love, to love anew.

1. Tell me more yet can they grieve?

2. Yes, and sicken sore, but live:

And be wise, and delay,
When you men are as wise as they.

Both. Then I see

Faith will be,

Never till they both believe.

Fran. Clora, come hither; who are these below there?

Clor. Where? Fran. There.

Clor. Ha? I should know their shapes
Though it be darkish; there are both our Brothers,
What should they make thus late here?

Fran. What's the tother?

Clor. What tother?

Fran. He that lyes along there.

Clor. O, I see him

As if he had a branch of some great Petigree
Grew out on's belly.

Fran. Yes.

Clor. That should be,
If I have any knowledge in proportion.

Fab. They see us.

Fred. 'Tis no matter.

Fab. What a log

Is this, to sleep such musique out?

Fred. No more, let's hear 'em.

Clor. If I have any knowledge in proportion
The Captain Jacomo, those are his legs
Upon my conscience.

Fran. By my faith, and neat ones.

Clor. You mean the boots, I think they are neat by nature.

Fra. As thou art knavish, would I saw his face!

Clor. 'T would scare you in the dark.

Fran. A worse than that

Has never scar'd you Clora to my knowledge.

Clor. 'Tis true, for I never have seen a worse;
Nor while I say my prayers heartily,
I hope I shall not.

Fran. Well, I am no tell tale:

But is it not great pity, tell me Clora,
That such a brave deserving Gentleman
As every one delivers this to be,
Should have no more respect, and worth flung on him
By able men? Were I one of these great ones,
Such vertues should not sleep thus.

Clor. Were he greater

He would sleep more I think: I'll waken him.

Fran. Away ye fool.

Clor. Is he not dead already, and they two taking order
About his Blacks? me thinks they are very busie,
A fine clean coarse he is: I would have him buried
Even as he lyes, cross legg'd, like one o'th' Templers
(If his Westphalia gammons will hold crossing)
And on his brest, a buckler with a pike in't,
In which I would have some learned Cutler
Compile an Epitaph, and at his feet
A musquet, with this word upon a Label
Which from the cocks mouth thus should be delivered,
I have discharg'd the office of a Souldier.

Fran. Well, if thy Father were a Souldier
Thus thou wouldst use him.

Clora. Such a Souldier,
I would indeed.

Fab. If he hear this, not all
The power of man could keep him from the windows

Till they were down and all the doors broke open :
For Gods sake make her cooler : I dare not venture
To bring him else : I know he will go to buffers
Within five words with her, if she holds this spirit ;
Let's waken him, and away, we shall hear worfe else.

Fran. Well if I be not even with thee Clora
Let me be hang'd for this : I know thou dost it
Only to anger me, and purge thy wit
Which would break out else.

Clora. I have found ye,
I'll be no more cross, bid 'em good night.

Fran. No, no, they shall not know we have seen 'em ;
Shut the window. [Ex. Fran. and Clora.]

Fab. Will you get up Sir ?

Jac. Have you paid the Fiddlers ?

Fab. You are not left to do it : Fie upon thee,
Hast thou forsworn manners ?

Jac. Yes unless

They would let me eat my meat without long graces
Or drink without a preface to the pledger ;
Oft, will it please you, shall I be so bold Sir,
Let me remember your good bed-fellow,
And lye and kiss your hand unto my Mistris
As often as an Ape does for an Aple ;
These are meer Schisms in Souldiers ; where's my friend ?
These are to us as bitter as purgations,
We love that general freedom we are bred to ;
Hang these faint fooleries, they smell of peace,
Do they not friend ?

Fab. Faith Sir to me they are
As things indifferent, yet I use 'em not,
Or if I did, they would not prick my conscience.

Fred. Come, shall we go ? 'tis late.

Jac. Yes any whither,

But no more Musick, it has made me dull.

Fab. Faith any thing but drinking disturbs thee Jacomo,
We'll ev'n to bed. Jac. Content.

Fab. Thou wilt dream of wenches.

Jac. I never think of any I thank Heaven
But when I am drunk, and then 'tis but to cast
A cheap way how they may be all destroy'd
Like vermine ; let's away, I am very sleepy.

Fab. I, thou art ever so, or angry, come. [Exeunt.]

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter Julio, and Angelo.

Jul. I Will but see her once more Angelo,
That I may hate her more, and then I am
My self again.

Ang. I would not have thee tempt lust,
'Tis a way dangerous, and will deceive thee,
Hadst thou the constancy of all men in thee.

Jul. Having her sins before me, I dare see her
Were she as catching as the plague, and deadly,
And tell her she is fouler than all those
And far more pestilent, if not repentant,
And like a strong man, chide her well, and leave her.

Ang. 'Tis easily said, of what complexion is she ?

Jul. Make but a curious frame unto thy self
As thou wouldst shape an Angel in thy thought ;
Such as the Poets, when their fancies sweat,
Imagine Juno is, or fair ey'd Pallas,
And one more excellent, than all those figures
Shalt thou find her ; she's brown, but of a sweetness,
(If such a poor word may exprefs her beauty)
Believe me Angelo, would do more mischief
With a forc't smile, than twenty thousand Cupids
With their love quivers, full of Ladies eyes,
And twice as many flames, could fling upon us.

Ang. Of what age is she ?

Jul. As a Rose at fairest,
Neither a bud, nor blown, but such a one ;
Were there a Hercules to get again
With all his glory, or one more than he,
The god would choose out amongst a race of women
To make a Mother of : she is outwardly
All that bewitch's sense ; all that entices,
Nor is it in our vertue to uncharm it.
And when she speaks, oh Angelo, then musick
(Such as old Orpheus made, that gave a soul
To aged mountains, and made rugged beasts
Lay by their rages ; and tall trees that knew
No sound but tempests, to bow down their branches
And hear, and wonder ; and the Sea, whose surges
Shook their white heads in Heaven, to be as mid-night
Still, and attentive) steals into our souls
So suddenly, and strangely, that we are
From that time no more ours, but what she pleases.

Ang. Why look, how far you have thrust your self again
Into your old disease ? are you that man
With such a resolution, that would venture
To take your leave of folly, and now melt
Even in repeating her ?

Jul. I had forgot me.

Ang. As you will still do.

Jul. No, the strongest man
May have the grudging of an ague on him,
This is no more ; let's go, I would fain be fit
To be thy friend again, for now I am no mans.

Ang. Go you, I dare not go, I tell you truly
Nor were it wise I should.

Jul. Why ? Ang. I am well,
And if I can, will keep my self so.

Jul. Ha ? thou mak'st me smile, though I have little cause,
To see how prettily thy fear becomes thee ;
Art thou not strong enough to see a woman ?

Ang. Yes, twenty thousand : but not such a one
As you have made her : I'll not lye for th' matter :
I know I am frail, and may be cozen'd too
By such a Syren.

Jul. Faith thou shalt go, Angelo.

Ang. Faith but I will not ; no I know how far Sir
I am able to hold out, and will not venture
Above my depth : I do not long to have
My sleep ta'ne from me, and go pulingly
Like a poor wench had lost her market-mony ;
And when I see good meat, sit still and sigh,
And call for small beer ; and consume my wit
In making Anagrams, and faithful posies ;
I do not like that Itch, I am sure I had rather
Have the main pox, and safer.

Jul. Thou shalt go,

I must needs have thee as a witness with me
Of my repentance ; as thou lov'st me go.

Ang. Well I will go, since you will have it so,
But if I prove a fool too, look to have me
Curse you continually, and fearfully,

Jul. And if thou see'st me fall again, good Angelo
Give me thy counfel quickly lest I perish.

Ang. Pray Heaven I have enough to save my self ;
For as I have a soul, I had rather venture
Upon a savage Island, than this woman. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Father, and Servant.

Fath. From whom Sir, comes this bounty ? for I think
You are mistaken.

Serv. No Sir, 'tis to you
I am sure my Mistris sent it.

Fath. Who's your Mistris,
That I may give her thanks ?

Serv. The vertuous Widow.

Fath. The vertuous widow Sir ? I know none such :

A a a

Pray

Pray what's her name? Ser. Lælia.

Fath. I knew you err'd,
'Tis not to me I warrant ye; there Sir,
Carry it to those she feeds fat with such favours,
I am a stranger to her.

Serv. Good Sir take it,
And if you will, I'll swear she sent it to you,
For I am sure mine eye never went off ye
Since you forsook the Gentlemen you talk'd with Just at her door.

Fath. Indeed I talkt with two
Within this half hour in the street.

Serv. 'Tis you Sir,
And none but you I am sent to: wiser men
Would have been thankful sooner, and receiv'd it,
'Tis not a fortune every man can brag of,
And from a woman of her excellence.

Fa. Well Sir, I am Catechiz'd; what more belongs to't?

Ser. This only Sir; she would intreat you come
This evening to her without fail.

Fath. I will.

Serv. You ghes where.

Fath. Sir I have a tongue else. [Exit Ser.]
She is down right Devil; or else my wants
And her disobedience have provok't her
To look into her foul self, and be sorry.
I wonder how she knew me? I had thought
I had been the same to all, I am to them
That chang'd me thus: Heaven pardon me for lying,
For I have paid it home: many a good man
That had but found the profit of my way
Would forswear telling true again in haste.

Enter Lodovico, and Pifo.

Here are my praters; now if I did well
I should belabour 'em, but I have found
Away to quiet 'em, worth a thousand on't.

Lod. If we could get a fellow that would do it.

Fat. What villany is now in hand?

Pif. 'Twill be hard to be done in my opinion
Unless we light upon an English-man
With seven-score surfeits in him.

Lod. Are the English-men such stubborn drinkers?

Pifo. Not a leak at Sea

Can suck more liquor; you shall have their children
Christened in mull'd sack, and at five years old, able To knock a Dane down: Take an English-man
And cry St. George, and give him but a rasher,
And you shall have him upon even terms
Defy a hoghead; such a one would do it
Home boy, and like a work-man: at what weapon?

Lod. Sherry sack: I would have him drink stark dead
If it were possible: at worst past portage.

Pifo. What is the end then?

Lod. Dost thou not perceive it?

If he be drunk dead, there's a fair end of him.
If not, this is my end, or by enticing,
Or by deceiving, to conduct him where
The fool is, that admires him; and if sober,
His nature be so rugged, what will't be
When he is hot with wine? come let's about it,
If this be done but handsomely, I'll pawn
My head she hath done with Souldiers.

Pifo. This may do well.

Fat. Here's a new way to murder men alive,
I'll choak this train: God save ye Gentlemen.
It is to you, stay: yes it is to you.

Lod. VVhat's to me?

Fath. You are fortunate,
I cannot stand to tell you more now, meet me
Here soon, and you'll be made a man. [Exit Father.]

Lod. What Vision's this?

Pifo. I know not.

Lod. Well, I'll meet it,

Think you o'th' other, and let me a while
Dream of this fellow.

Pifo. For the Drunkard, Lodovick,
Let me alone.

Lod. Come, let's about it then. [Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Clora, and Frank.

Clor. Ha, ha, ha, pray let me laugh extreamly.

Fra. Why? prethee why? hast thou such cause?

Clor. Yes faith, my Brother will be here straightway,
Fra. VVhat? (and ———)

Clor. The other party: ha, ha, ha.

Fra. VVhat party?

VVench thou art not drunk?

Clor. No faith.

Fra. Faith thou hast been among the bottles Clora.

Clor. Faith but I have not Frank: Prethee be handfom,
The Captain comes along too, wench.

Fra. O is that it

That tickles ye?

Clor. Yes, and shall tickle you too,
You understand me?

Fran. By my troth thou art grown
A strange lewd wench: I must e'ne leave thy company,
Thou wilt spoil me else.

Clor. Nay, thou art spoil'd to my hand;
Hadst thou been free, as a good wench ought to be,
When I went first a birding for thy Love,
And roundly said, that is the man must do it,
I had done laughing many an hour agoe.

Fra. And what dost thou see in him, now thou knowst him
To be thus laught at?

Clor. Prethee be not angry
And I'll speak freely to thee.

Fran. Do, I will not.

Clor. Then as I hope to have a handfom husband,
This fellow in mine eye, (and Frank I am held
To have a shrewd ghes at a pretty fellow)
Appears a strange thing.

Fra. Why, how strange for Gods sake?
He is a man, and one that may content
(For any thing I see) a right good woman:
And sure I am not blind.

Clor. There lyes the question?
For, (but you say he is a man, and I
Will credit you,) I should as soon have thought him
Another of Gods creatures; out upon him,
His body, that can promise nothing
But laziness and long strides.

Fra. These are your eyes;
Where were they Clora, when you fell in love
With the old foot-man, for singing of Queen Dido?
And swore he look'd in his old velvet trunks
And his sic't Spanish Jerkin, like Don John?
You had a parlous judgment then, my Clora.

Clora. Who told you that?

Fran. I heard it.

Clora. Come, be friends,
The Souldier is a Mars, no more, we are all
Subject to slide away.

Fra. Nay, laugh on still.

Clor. No faith, thou art a good wench, and 'tis pity
Thou shouldst not be well quarried at thy entring,
Thou art so high flown for him: Look, who's there?

Enter Fabricio, and Jacomo.

Jac. Prethee go single, what should I do there?
Thou knowst I hate these visitations,
As I hate peace or perry.

Fab. Wilt thou never
Make a right man?

Jac. You make a right fool of me
To lead me up and down to visit women,
And be abus'd and laugh'd at; let me stavre
If I know what to say, unless I ask 'em
What their shoes cost?

Fab. Fye upon thee, coward,
Canst thou not sing?

Jac. Thou knowest I can sing nothing
But Plumpton park.

Fab. Thou't be bold enough,
When thou art enter'd once.

Jac. I had rather enter
A breach: if I miscarry, by this hand
I will have you by th' ears for't.

Fab. Save ye Ladies.

Clo. Sweet Brother I dare swear, you're welcom hither,
So is your Friend;

Fab. Come, blush not, but salute 'em.

Fra. Good Sir believe your Sister; you are most welcom,
So is this worthy Gentleman whose vertues
I shall be proud to be acquainted with.

Jac. She has found me out already, and has paid me;
Shall we be going?

Fab. Peace;
Your goodnes Lady
Will ever be afore us, for my self
I will not thank you single, lest I leave
My friend, this Gentleman, out of acquaintance.

Jac. More of me yet?

Fra. Would I were able, Sir,
From either of your worths to merit thanks.

Clor. But Brother, is your friend thus sad still? methinks
'Tis an unseemly nature in a Souldier.

Jac. What hath she to do with me, or my behaviour?

Fab. He do's but shew so, prethee to him Sister.

Jac. If I do not break thy head, I am no Christian,
If I get off once.

Clor. Sir, we must intrcat you
To think your self more welcom, and be merry,
'Tis pity a fair man of your proportion
Should have a foul of sorrow.

Jac. Very well;
Pray Gentlewoman what would you have me say?

Clora. Do not you know, Sir?

Jac. Not so well as you
That talk continually.

Fra. You have hit her, Sir.

Clora. I thank him, so he has,
Fair fall his sweet face for't.

Jac. Let my face
Alone, I would wish you, lest I take occasion
To bring a worse in question.

Clora. Meaning mine?
Brother, where was your friend brought up? h'as sure
Been a great lover in his youth of pottage,
They lye so dull upon his understanding.

Fab. No more of that, thou'lt anger him at heart.

Clo. Then let him be more manly, for he looks
Like a great School-boy that had been blown up
Last night at dust-point.

Fra. You will never leave
Till you be told how rude you are, fye Clora.
Sir will it please you sit?

Clora. And I'll sit by you.

Jac. Woman be quiet, and be rul'd I would wish you.

Clora. I have done, Sir Captain.

Fab. Art thou not asham'd?

Jac. You are an asse, I'll tell you more anon,
You had better have been hang'd than brought me hither.

Fab. You are grown a fullen fool; either be handsome,
Or by this light I'll have wenches bait thee;
Go to the Gentlewoman, and give her thanks;
And hold your head up; what?

Jac. By this light I'll brain thee:

Fra. Now o' my faith this Gentleman do's nothing
But it becomes him rarely; Clora, look
How well this little anger, if it be one,
Shews in his face.

Clo. Yes, it shews very sweetly.

Fra. Nay do not blush Sir, o' my troth it does,
I would be ever angry to be thus.

Fabritio, o' my conscience if I ever
Do fall in love, as I will not forswear it
Till I am something wiser, it must be,
I will not say directly with that face,
But certainly, such another as that is,
And thus dispose my chance to hamper me.

Fab. Dost thou hear this, and stand still?

Jac. You will prate still;
I would you were not women, I would take
A new course with ye.

Clora. Why couragious?

Jac. For making me a stone to whet your tongues on.

Clora. Prethee sweet Captain.

Jac. Go, go spin, go hang.

Clo. Now could I kiss him.

Jac. If you long for kicking,
You'r best come kiss me, do not though, I'de wish ye;
I'll send my Foot-man to thee, he shall leap thee,
And thou wantst horsing: I'll leave ye Ladies.

Fra. Bewhrew my heart you are unmannerly
To offer this unto a Gentleman
Of his deserts, that comes so worthily
To visit me, I cannot take it well.

Jac. I come to visit you, you foolish woman?

Fra. I thought you did Sir, and for that I thank you,
I would be loth to lose those thanks; I know
This is but some odd way you have, and faith
It do's become you well to make us merry;
I have heard often of your pleasant vein.

Fab. What wouldst thou ask more?

Jac. Pray thou scurvy fellow
Thou hast not long to live; adieu dear Damsels,
You filthy women farewell, and be sober,
And keep your chambers.

Clor. Farewel old Don Diego.

Fra. Away, away, you must not so be angry,
To part thus roughly from us; yet to me
This do's not shew, as if it were yours, the wars
May breed men something plain I know,
But not thus rude; give me your hand good Sir
I know 'tis white, and ———

Jac. If I were not patient,
What would become of you two prating houswives?
Clo. For any thing I know, we would in to supper,
And there begin a health of lusty Claret
To keep care from our hearts, and it should be ———

Fab. Faith to whom? Mark but this Jacomo.

Clo. Even to the handsomest fellow now alive.

Fab. Do you know such a one?

Fra. He may be ghest at,
Without much travel.

Fab. There's another item.

Clor. And he should be a Souldier.

Fra. 'Twould be better.

Clor. And yet not you sweet Captain.

Fra. Why not he?

Jac. Well; I shall live to see your husbands beat you,
And his 'em on like ban-dogs.

Clora. Ha, ha, ha.

Jac. Green sicknesses and serving-men light on ye
With greasy Codpieces, and woollen stockings,
The Devil (if he dare deal with two women)
Be of your counsels: farewell Plaisterers ——— [Exit Jac.

Clora. This fellow will be mad at Mid-summer
Without all doubt.

Fab. I think so too.

Fra. I am sorry,

He's gone in such a rage; but sure this holds him
Net every day.

Fab. Faith every other day
If he come near a woman.

Clor. I wonder how his mother could endure
To have him in her Belly, he's so boysterous.

Fra. He's to be made more tractable I doubt not.

Clor. Yes, if they taw him as they do whit-leather
Upon an iron, or beat him soft like Stock-fish.

SCENE IV.

Enter Lelia and her waiting-woman with a Vail.

Lel. Art t' sure 'tis he?

Wom. Yes, and another with him.

Lel. The more the merrier; did you give that money
And charg'd it to be delivered where I shew'd you?

Wom. Yes, and what else you bad me.

Lel. That brave fellow,
Though he be old, whate'r he be, shews toughnefs,
And such a one I long for, and must have
At any price; these young soft melting gristles
Are only for my safer ends.

Wom. They are here.

Lel. Give me my Vail, and bid the Boy go sing
That song above, I gave him; the sad song;
Now if I miss him, I am curst, go, wench,
And tell 'em I have utterly forsworn
All company of men, yet make a venture
At last to let 'em in; thou knowst these things,
Do 'em to th' life.

Wom. I warrant you I am perfect.

Lel. Some ill woman for her use would give
A million for this Wench, she is so subtle.

Enter to the door Julio, and Angelo.

Wom. Good Sir, desire it not, I dare not do it,
For since your last being here, Sir, believe me,
She has griev'd her self out of all Company,
And (sweet Soul) almost out of life too.

Jul. Prithee,
Let me but speak one word.

Wom. You will offend, Sir,
And yet your name is more familiar with her
Than any thing but sorrow, good Sir, go.

Ang. This little Varlet hath her Lesson perfect,
These are the baits they bob with.

Jul. 'Faith I will not.

Wom. I shall be chidden cruelly for this;
But you are such a Gentleman——

Jul. No more.

(nough.)

Ang. There's a new Tyre, wench; peace, thou art well e-

Jul. What, has she musick?

Wom. Yes, for Heavens sake stay,
'Tis all she feeds upon.

Jul. Alas, poor soul.

Ang. Now will I pray devoutly, for there's need on't.

The SONG.

A Way delights, go seek some other dwelling,
For I must dye:

Farewel false Love, thy tongue is ever telling
Lye after Lye.

For ever let me rest now from thy smarts,

Alas, for pity go,
And fire their hearts

That have been hard to thee, mine was not so.

Never again deluding Love shall know me,

For I will dye;

And all those griefs that think to over-grow me,
Shall be as I:

For ever will I sleep, while poor Maids cry,

Alas, for pity stay,

And let us dye

With thee, men cannot mock, us in the day.

Jul. Mistrifs? not one word, Mistrifs if I grieve ye
I can depart again.

Ang. Let's go then quickly,
For if she get from under this dark Cloud,
We shall both sweat I fear, for't.

Jul. Do but speak

Though you turn from me, and speak bitterly,
And I am gone, for that I think will please you.

Ang. Oh, that all women were thus silent ever,
What fine things they were!

Jul. You have look'd on me,
When (if there be belief in Womens words Spoken in tears) you swore you lov'd to do so.

Lel. O me, my heart!

Ang. Now, Julio, play the man,
Or such another O me will undo thee:
Would I had any thing to keep me busie,
I might not hear her; think but what she is,
Or I doubt mainly, I shall be i'th' mash too.

Jul. 'Pray speak again.

Lel. Where is my Woman?

Wom. Here.

Ang. Mercy upon me! what a face she has?
Would it were vail'd again.

Lel. Why did you let

This flattering man in to me? did not I
Charge thee to keep me from his eyes again,
As carefully as thou wouldst keep thine own?
Thou hast brought me poyson in a shape of Heaven,
Whose violence will break the hearts of all,
Of all weak Women, as it hath done mine,
That are such fools to love, and look upon him.
Good Sir, be gone, you know not what an ease
Your absence is.

Ang. By Heaven she is a wonder,
I cannot tell what 'tis, but I am quamish.

Jul. Though I desire to be here more than Heaven,
As I am now, yet if my sight offend you,
So much I love to be commanded by you,
That I will go; farewell——

Lel. I should say something
E're you depart, and I would have you hear me;
But why should I speak to a man that hates me,
And will but laugh at any thing I suffer?

Jul. If this be hate——

Lel. Away, away, deceiver.

Jul. Now help me, Angelo!

Ang. I am worse than thou art.

Lel. Such tears as those might make another Woman
Believe thee honest, Julio, almost me,
That know their ends, for I confes they stir me.

Ang. What will become of me? I cannot go now
If you would hang me, from her; O brave Eye!
Steal me away, Julio.

Jul. Alas, poor man! I am lost again too, strangely.

Lel. No, I will sooner trust a Crocodile
When he sheds tears, for he kills suddenly,
And ends our cares at once; or any thing
That's evil to our Natures, than a man;
I find there is no end of his deceivings,
Nor no avoiding 'em, if we give way;
I was requesting you to come no more
And mock me with your service, 'tis not well,
Nor honest, to abuse us so far; you may love too;
For though, I must confes, I am unworthy
Of your love every way; yet I would have you Think I am somewhat too good to make sport of.

Jul. Will you believe me?

Lel. For your Vows and Oaths,
And such deceiving tears as you shed now,
I will, as you do, study to forget 'em.

Jul. Let me be most despis'd of men——

Lel. No more;

There is no new way left, by which your cunning

Shall once more hope to catch me ; no, thou false man,
I will avoid thee, and for thy sake all
That bear thy stamp, as counterfeit in love,
For I am open ey'd again, and know thee ;
Go, make some other weep, as I have done,
That dare believe thee ; go, and swear to her
That is a stranger to thy cruelty,
And knows not yet what man is, and his lyings,
How thou di'st daily for her ; pour it out
In thy best lamentations ; put on sorrow,
As thou canst, to deceive an Angel, Julio,
And vow thy self into her heart, that when
I shall leave off to curse thee for thy falsehood,
Still a forsaken Woman may be found,
To call to Heaven for vengeance.

Ang. From this hour,
I heartily despise all honest Women ;
I care not if the World took knowledg on't,
I see there's nothing in them, but that folly
Of loving one man only ; give me henceforth,
(Before the greatest Blessing can be thought of)
If this be one, a Whore ; that's all I aim at.

Jul. Mistress, the most offending man is heard
Before his sentence, why will you condemn me
E're I produce the truth to witness with me,
How innocent I am of all your angers ?

Lel. There is no trusting of that tongue, I know't,
And how far if it be believ'd, it kills ; no more, Sir.

Jul. It never lied to you ; if it did,
'Twas only when it call'd you mild and gentle.

Lel. Good Sir, no more ; make not my understanding,
After I have suffer'd thus much evil by you,
So poor to think I have not reach'd the end
Of all your forc'd affections ; yet because
I once lov'd such a sorrow too too dearly,
As that would strive to be ; I do forgive ye
Even heartily, as I would be forgiven,
For all your wrongs to me ; my charity
Yet loves you so far, (though again I may not)
And wish when that time comes, you will love truly,
(If you can ever do so) you may find
The worthy fruit of your affections,
True love again, not my unhappy Harvest,
Which, like a fool, I sow'd in such a heart,
So dry and stony, that a thousand showers
From these two eyes, continually raining,
Could never ripen.

Jul. Y' have conquer'd me ;
I did not think to yield, but make me now,
Even what you will, my Lelia, so I may
Be but so truly happy to enjoy you.

Lel. No, no, those fond imaginations,
Are dead and buried in me, let 'em rest.

Jul. I'll marry you.

Ang. The Devil thou wilt, Julio,
How that word waken'd me ! come hither, friend,
Thou art a fool, look stedfastly upon her,
Though she be all that I know excellent,
As she appears, though I could fight for her,
And run through fire ; though I am stark mad too
Never to be recover'd, though I would Give all I had i'th' World to lye with her
Even to my naked soul, I am so far gone,
Yet, methinks still, we should not dote away
That that is something more than ours, our honours.
I would not have thee marry her by no means,
Yet I should do so ; is she not a Whore ?

Jul. She is ; but such a one——

Ang. 'Tis true, she's excellent,
And when I well consider, Julio,
I see no reason we should be confin'd
In our affections ; when all Creatures else
Enjoy still where they like.

Jul. And so will I then.

Lel. He's fast enough I hope now, if I hold him.

Ang. You must not do so though, now I consider
Better what 'tis.

Jul. Do not consider, Angelo,
For I must do it.

Ang. No, I'll kill thee first,
I love thee so well, that the worms shall have thee
Before this Woman, friend.

Jul. It was your counsel.

Ang. As I was a Knave,
Not as I lov'd thee.

Jul. All this is lost upon me, Angelo,
For I must have her ; I will marry ye
When ye please : pray look better on me.

Ang. Nay then no more, friend ; farewell, Julio,
I have so much discretion left me yet
To know, and tell thee, thou art miserable.

Jul. Stay, thou art more than she, and now I find it.

Lel. Is he so ?

Jul. Mistress.

Lel. No, I'll see thee starv'd first. [Exit Lelia.

Jul. Friend.

Ang. Fly her as I do, Julio, she's a Witch.

Jul. Beat me away then, I shall grow here still else.

Ang. That were the way to have me grow there with thee,
Farewel for ever. [Exit Angelo.

Jul. Stay, I am uncharm'd,
Farewel thou curf'd house, from this hour be
More hated of me than a Leprosie.

[Exit Julio.

Enter Lelia.

Lel. Both gone ? a plague upon 'em both,
Am I deceiv'd again ? Oh, I would rail
And follow 'em, but I fear the spight of people,
Till I have emptied all my gall ; the next
I seize upon shall pay their follies
To the last penny ; This will work me worse,
He that comes next, by Heav'n shall feel their curse. [Exit.

SCENE V.

Enter Jacomo at one door, Fabricio at another.

Fab. O, ye are a sweet youth, so uncivilly
To rail, and run away ?

Jac. O ! are you there, Sir ?
I am glad I have found ye, you have not now your Ladies,
To shew your wit before.

Fab. Thou wou'lt not, wou'lt 'ou ?

Jac. What a sweet youth I am, as you have made me,
You shall know presently.

Fab. Put up your Sword,
I have seen it often, 'tis a Fox.

Jac. It is so,
And you shall feel it too ; will you dispatch, Sir ?
And leave your mirth out ? or I shall take occasion
To beat ye, and disgrace ye too.

Fab. Well, since there is no other way to deal with you,
Let's see your Sword, I am sure you scorn all odds,
I will fight with you——

Jac. How now ? [They measure, and Fab. gets his Sword.

Fab. Nay, stand out,
Or by this light, I'll make ye.

Jac. This is scurvy,
And out of fear done.

Fab. No, Sir, out of judgment,
For he that deals with thee, thou'rt grown so boysterous,
Must have more wits, or more lives than another ;
Or always be in Armour, or enchanted,
Or he is miserable.

Jac. Your end of this, Sir ?

Fab. My end is only mirth to laugh at thee,
Which now I'll do in safety ; ha, ha, ha.

Jac. 'Sheart ? then I am grown ridiculous.

Fab. Thou art ;

And

And wilt be shortly sport for little Children,
If thou continuest this rude stubbornness.

Fac. O God, for any thing that had an edge?

Fab. Ha, ha, ha.

Fac. Fye, what a shame it is,
To have a Lubber shew his teeth?

Fab. Ha, ha.

Fac. Why dost thou laugh at me, thou wretched fellow?
Speak with a Pox; and look ye render me
Just such a reason——

Fab. I shall dye with laughing.

Fac. As no man can find fault with; I shall have Another Sword, I shall, ye flearing Puppy.

Fab. Does not this tellness shew finely in thee?
Once more take heed of Children, if they find thee,
They'll break up School to bear thee Company,
Thou wilt be such a pastime, and whoot at thee,
And call thee Bloody-Bones, and Spade, and Spit-fire,
And Gaffer Mad-man; and go by Feronimo,
And will with a wisp, and come aloft, and crack rope,
And old Saint Dennis with the dudgeon Codpifs?
And twenty such names.

Fac. No, I think they will not.

Fab. Yes, but they will; and Nurfs still their Children
Only with thee, and here take him, Jacomo.

Fac. God's precious, that I were but over thee
One Steeple height, I would fall and break thy Neck.

Fab. This is the reason I laugh at thee,
And while thou art thus, will do; tell me one thing.

Fac. I wonder how thou durst thus question me;
Prithee restore my Sword.

Fab. Tell me but one thing,
And it may be I will; Nay Sir, keep out. (Sir.)

Fac. Well, I will be your fool now, speak your mind,

Fab. Art thou not breeding teeth?

Fac. How? Teeth?

Fab. Yes, teeth, thou wouldst not be so froward else.

Fac. Teeth?

Fab. Come, 'Twill make thee
A little rheumatick, but that's all one,
We'll have a Bib, for spoiling of thy Doublet;
And a fring'd Muckender hang at thy Girdle,
I'll be thy Nurfe, and get a Coral for thee,
And a fine Ring of Bells.

Fac. 'Faith, this is somewhat
Too much, Fabricio, to your friend that loves you;
Methinks your goodness rather should invent
A way to make my follies less, than breed 'em;
I should have been more moderate to you,
But I see ye despise me.

Fab. Now I love ye,
There, take your Sword: continue so; I dare not Stay now to try your patience, soon I'll meet ye,
And as you love your honours, and your state,
Redeem your self well to the Gentlewoman,
Farewel till soon. [Exit Fabricio.]

Fac. Well, I shall think of this. [Exit Jacomo.]

SCENE IV.

Enter Hofst, Piso, and Boy with a Glass of Wine.

Pis. Nothing i'th' World, but a dry'd Tongue or two——

Hofst. Taste him, and tell me.

Pis. Is a valiant wine,
This must be mine, Hofst.

Hofst. This shall be ipse,
Oh, he's a devilish biting wine, a Tyrant
Where he lays hold, Sir, this is he that scorns
Small Beer should quench him; or a foolish Caudle
Bring him to Bed; no, if he flinch I'll shame him,
And draw him out to mull amongst old Midwives.

Pis. There is a Souldier, I would have thee better
Above the rest, because he thinks there's no man
Can give him drink enough.

Hofst. What kind of man?

Pis. That thou mayst know him perfectly, he's one
Of a left-handed making, a lank thing;
As if his Belly were ta'n up with straw
To hunt a match.

Hofst. Has he no Beard to shew him?

Pis. 'Faith, but a little, yet enough to note him,
Which grows in parcels, here and there a remnant;
And that thou mayst not miss him, he is one
That wears his forehead in a velvet scabbard.

Hofst. That note's enough, he's mine, I'll fuddle him,
Or lye i'th' fuds; you will be here too?

Pis. Yes, 'Till soon, farewel, and bear up.

Hofst. If I do not,
Say I am recreant, I'll get things ready.

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Julio, and Angelo.

Jul. 'TIS strange thou should'st be thus, with thy dif-
Ang. I am sure I am so. (cretion.)

Jul. I am well you see.

Ang. Keep your self warm then, and go home, & sleep,
And pray thou mayst continue so;
Would I had gone to th' Devil of an arrant,
When I was made a fool to see her; Leave me,
I am not fit for conversation.

Jul. Why, thou art worse than I was.

Ang. Therefore leave me,
The nature of my sickness is not eas'd
By company or counsel, I am mad,
And if you follow me with questions,
Shall shew my self so.

Jul. This is more than error.

Ang. 'Pray be content, that you have made me thus,
And do not wonder at me. (gone.)

Jul. Let me know, but what you mean to do, and I am
I would be loth to leave you thus else.

Ang. Nothing
That needs your fear, that is sufficient;
Farewel, and pray for me.

Jul. I would not leave you.

Ang. You must, and shall.

Jul. I will then, would yond' Woman
Had been ten fathom under ground, when first
I saw her eyes.

Ang. Yet she had been dangerous,
For to some wealthy Rock of precious stone,
Or mine of Gold, as tempting, her fair Body
Might have been turn'd, which once found out by labour,
And brought to use, having her Spells within it,
Might have corrupted States, and ruin'd Kingdoms,
Which had been fearful, (Friend) go, when I see thee
Next, I will be as thou art, or no more.

'Pray do not follow me, you'll make me angry.

Jul. Heav'n grant you may be right again.

Ang. Amen. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Tavern-Boys, &c.

Boy. Score a gallon of Sack, and a pint of Olives to the U.
Above, within. Why drawer? (nicorn.)

Boy. Anon, anon.

Another Boy. Look into the Nags-head there.

2. Boy. Score a quart of Claret to the Bar,
And a pound of Saufages into the Flower-pot.

Enter first Servant with Wine.

1. Serv. The Devil's in their throats; anon, anon.

Enter

Enter second Servant.

2 Ser. Mull a pint of Sack there for the women in the Flower-deluce, and put in ginger enough, they belch like (potguns, And Robin fetch Tobacco for the Peacock, they will not be Drunk till mid-night else : how now, how does my Master?

2 Boy. Faith he lyes drawing on a pace.

1 Boy. That's an ill sign.

2 Boy. And fumbles with the pots too.

1 Boy. Then there's no way but one with him.

2 Boy. All the rest,

Except the Captain, are in Limbo patrum, Where they lye sod in sack.

1 Boy. Does he bear up still?

2 Boy. Afore the wind still, with his lights up bravely,

All he takes in I think he turns to Juleps,

Or h'as a world of Stowage in his belly,

The rest look all like fire-drakes, and lye scatter'd

Like rushes round about the room. My Master

Is now the loving'st man, I think, above ground.

1 Boy. Would he were always drunk then.

Within. Drawer.

2 Boy. Anon, anon Sir.

1 Boy. And swears I shall be free to morrow, and so weeps And calls upon my Mistress.

2 Boy. Then he's right. (her

1 Boy. And swears the Captain must lye this night with

And bad me break it to her with discretion,

That he may leave an issue after him,

Able to entertain a Dutch Ambassador,

And tells him feelingly how sweet she is,

And how he stole her from her friends i'th' Country;

And brought her up disguiz'd with the Carriers,

And was nine nights bereaving her her maidenhead,

And the tenth got a drawer, here they come.

Enter Giacomo, Host, Lod. Pifo.

Within cry drawer. Anon, anon, speak to the Tyger, Peter.

Host. There's my Bells boys, my silver Bell.

Pifo. Would he were hang'd

As high as I could ring him.

Host. Captain. Fac. Hoe Boy.

Lod. Robin, sufficient single Beer, as cold as crystal,

Quench Robin, quench.

1 Boy. I am gone Sir.

Host. Shall we bear up still? Captain how I love thee!

Sweet Captain let me kiss thee, by this hand

I love thee next to Malmsey in a morning,

Of all things transitory.

Fac. I love thee too, as far as I can love a fat man.

Host. Do'st thou Captain?

Sweetly? and heartily?

Fac. With all my heart Boy. (Captain

Host. Then welcom death, come close mine eyes sweet

Thou shalt have all.

Fac. What shall your wife have then? (spoon,

Host. Why she shall have besides my blessing, and a silver

Enough to keep her stirring in the world,

Three little Children, one of them was mine

Upon my conscience, th' other two are Pagans.

Fac. 'Twere good she had a little foolish mony,

To rub the time away with.

Host. Not a rag,

Not a Deniere, no, let her spin a Gods name:

And raise her house again.

Fac. Thou shalt not dye though:

Boy see your Master safe delivered,

He's ready to lye in.

Host. Good night.

Fac. Good morrow,

Drink till the Cow come home, 'tis all pay'd boyes.

Lod. A pox of Sack.

Host. Marry blefs my Buts, Sack is a jewel,

'Tis comfortable, Gentlemen.

Fac. More Beer boy,
Very sufficient single Beer.

Boy. Here Sir.

How is it Gentlemen?

Fac. But ev'n so, so.

Host. Go before finely Robin, and prepare
My wife, bid her be right and streight, I come boy.

And Sirrah, if they quarrel, let 'em use

Their own discretions, by all means, and stir not,

And he that's kill'd shall be as sweetly buried;

Captain, adieu, adieu sweet bully Captain,

One kiss before I dye, one kiss.

Fac. Farewel Boy.

Host. All my sweet boys farewell. [Exit Host.

Lod. Go sleep, you are drunk.

Fac. Come gentlemen, I'll see you at your lodging,

You look not lustily, a quart more.

Lod. No Boy.

Pifo. Get us a Torch.

Boy. 'Tis day Sir.

Fac. That's all one.

Pifo. Are not those the stars, thou scurvy Boy?

Lod. Is not Charles-wain there, tell me that, there?

Fac. Yes;

I have paid 'em truly: do not vex him Sirrah.

Pifo. Confess it Boy, or as I live I'll beat

Mid-night into thy brains.

Boy. I do confess it.

Pifo. Then live, and draw more small Beer presently.

Fac. Come Boyes, let's hug together, and be loving,

And sing, and do brave things cheerly my hearts,

A pox o' being sad; now could I fly

And turn the world about upon my finger,

Come ye shall love me, I am an honest fellow:

Hang care and fortune, we are friends.

Lod. No Captain.

Fac. Do not you love me? I love you two dearly.

Pifo. No by no means; you are a fighting Captain,

And kill up such poor people as we are, by th' dozens.

Lod. As they kill flies with Fox-tails, Captain.

Fac. Well Sir.

Lod. Me thinks now as I stand, the Captain shews

To be a very mercifull young man.

(And pre'thee Pifo, let me have thy opinion)

Pifo. Then he shall have mercy, that merciful is,

Or all the Painters are Apocrypha.

Fac. I am glad you have your wits yet, will ye go?

Pifo. You had best say we are drunk.

Fac. Ye are. Lod. Ye lye.

Fac. Y'are rascals, drunken rascals.

Pifo. 'Tis sufficient.

Fac. And now I'll tell you why, before I beat ye,

You have been tampring any time these three days,

Thus to disgrace me.

Pifo. That's a lye too.

Fac. Well Sir,

Yet I thank fate I have turn'd your points on you,

For which I'll spare ye somewhat, half a beating.

Pifo. I'll make you fart fire Captain, by this hand;

And ye provoke, do not provoke I'de wish you.

Fac. How do you like this?

Lod. Sure I am enchanted.

Pifo. Stay till I draw.

Fac. Dispatch then, I am angry.

Pifo. And thou shalt see how suddenly I'll kill thee. (ards,

Fac. Thou darst not draw, ye cold, tame, mangy Cow-

Ye drunken Rogues, can nothing make you valiant?

Not wine, nor beating?

Lod. If this may be suffer'd,

'Tis very well.

Fac. Go there's your way, go and sleep:

I have pity on you, you shall have the rest

To morrow when we meet.

Piso. Come Lodowick,
He's monitrous drunk now, there's no talking with him.
Jac. I am so; when I am sober, I'll do more.
[Ex. Lod. and Piso.]

Boy where's mine Host?
Boy. He's on his bed asleep Sir. [Ex. Boy.]
Jac. Let him alone then: now am I high proof
For any action, now could I fight bravely,
And charge into a wild fire; or I could love
Any man living now, or any woman,
Or indeed any creature that loves Sack
Extreamly, monstrously; I am so loving,
Just at this instant, that I might be brought
I feel it, with a little labour, now to talk
With a Justice of peace, that to my nature
I hate next an ill Sword: I will do
Some strange brave thing now, and I have it here:
Pray Heaven the air-keep out; I feel it buzzing. [Exit.]

SCENE III.

Enter Frederick, Frank, Clora.

Clora. She loves him too much, that's the plain truth
For which if I might be believ'd, I think her
A strange forgetter of her self; there's Julio,
Or twenty more. [Frederick,

Fred. In your eye I believe you,
But credit me the Captain is a man,
Lay but his rough affections by, as worthy.

Clora. So is a resty Jade a horse of service,
If he would leave his nature; give me one
By your leave Sir to make a husband of
Not to be wean'd, when I should marry him;
Me thinks a man is misery enough.

Fred. You are too bitter,
I would not have him worse.
Yet I shall see you hamper'd one day Lady,
I do not doubt it, for this heresie.

Clora. I'll burn before; come pre'thee leave this sadness;
This walking by thy self to see the Devil,
This mumps, this Lachrymæ, this love in sippets;
It fits thee like a French-hood.

Fra. Does it so?
I am sure it fits thee to be ever talking,
And nothing to the purpose, take up quickly;
Thy wit will founder of all four else wench,
If thou hold'st this pace; take up when I bid thee.

Clora. Before your Brother, fy?
Fred. I can endure it.

Enter Giacomo.

Clora. Here's Raw-head come again; Lord how he looks!
Pray we 'scape with broken pates.

Fra. Were I he,
Thou should'st not want thy wish, he has been drinking,
Has he not Frederick?

Fred. Yes, but do not find it.

Clora. Peace and let's hear his wisdom.

Fred. You will mad him.

Jac. I am somewhat bold, but that's all one.

Clora. A short and pithy saying of a Soukdier.

Fra. A I live

Thou art a strange mad wench.

Clora. To make a Parson.

Jac. Ladies I mean to kiss ye.

Clora. How he wipes his mouth like a young Preacher;
We shall have it.

Jac. In order as you lye before me; first
I'll begin with you.

Fra. With me Sir?

Jac. Yes.

Fra. If you will promise me to kiss in ease,
I care not if I venture.

Jac. I will kiss according to mine own inventions

As I shall see cause; sweetly I would wish you,
I love ye.

Fra. Do you Sir?

Jac. Yes indeed do I,
Would I could tell you how.

Fra. I would you would Sir.

Jac. I would to Heaven I could, but 'tis sufficient,
I love you with my heart.

Fra. Alas poor heart.

Jac. And I am sorry; but we'll talk of that Hereafter, if it please Heaven.

Fra. Ev'n when you will Sir.

Clora. He's dismal drunk, would he were muzzled.

Jac. You

I take it are the next.

Fra. Go to him fool.

Clora. Not I, he will bite me.

Jac. When wit? when?

Clora. Good Captain.

Jac. Nay, and you play bo-peep; I'll ha' no mercy
But catch as catch may.

Fred. Nay, I'll not defend ye.

Clora. Good Captain do not hurt me, I am sorry
That e're I anger'd ye.

Jac. I'll tew you for't

By this hand wit, unless you kiss discreetly.

Clora. No more Sir.

Jac. Yes a little more sweet wit,
One tast more o' your office: go thy wayes
With thy small kettle Drums; upon my conscience
Thou art the best, that e're man laid his leg o'er.

Clora. He smells just like a Cellar,
Fye upon him.

Jac. Sweet Lady now to you.

Clora. For loves sake kiss him.

Fred. I shall not keep my countenance.

Fra. Trye pre'thee.

Jac. Pray be not coy sweet woman, for I'll kiss ye,
I am blunt

But you must pardon me.

Clora. O God, my sides.

All. Ha, ha, ha, ha.

Jac. Why ha, ha, ha? why laugh?
Why all this noise sweet Ladies?

Clora. Lusty Laurence,

See what a Gentlewoman you have saluted;
Pray God she prove not quick.

Fred. Where were thine eyes

To take me for a woman? ha, ha, ha.

Jac. Who art 'a, art 'a mortal?

Fred. I am Frederick.

Jac. Then Frederick is an Ass,
A scurvy Frederick to laugh at me.

Fra. Sweet Captain.

Jac. Away woman;
Go stich and serve, I despise thee woman,
And Frederick shall be beaten; 'Sfute ye Rogue
Have you none else to make your puppies of, but me?

Fred. I pre'thee be more patient

There's no hurt done.

Jac. 'Sfute but there shall be, Scab.

Clora. Help, help for loves sake.

Fra. Who's within there?

Fred. So now you have made a fair hand.

Jac. Why?

Fred. You have kill'd me ——— [Fall as kill'd.]

Clora. Call in some Officers, and stay the Captain.

Jac. You shall not need.

Clora. This is your drunkenness.

Fra. O me, unhappy Brother, Frederick,
Look but upon me, do not part so from me,
Set him a little higher, he is dead.

Clora. O villain, villain.

Enter

Enter Fabritio, and Servants.

Fab. How now what's the matter ?

Fra. O Sir my Brother ! O my dearest Brother !

Clor. This drunken trowgh has kill'd him.

Fab. Kill'd him ?

Clor. Yes.

For Heavens sake hang him quickly, he will do
Ev'ry day such a murder else, there is nothing
But a strong Gallows that can make him quiet,
I finde it in his nature too late.

Fab. Pray be quiet,
Let me come to him.

Clor. Some go for a Surgeon.

Fra. O what a wretched woman has he made me !
Let me alone good Sir.

Fab. To what a fortune,
Hast thou reserv'd thy life !

Jac. Fabritio.

Fab. Never entreat me, for I will not know thee,
Nor utter one word for thee, unless it be
To have thee hang'd ; for Heaven sake be more temperate.

Jac. I have a sword still, and I am a villain.

Clor. &c. Hold, hold, hold. Jac. Ha ?

Clor. Away with him for Heavens sake
He's too desperate for our enduring.

Fab. Come, you shall sleep, come strive not
I'll have it so, here take him to his lodging, and See him laid before you part. [Exeunt Jac. with Ser.

Serv. We will Sir.

Fred. Ne're wonder, I am living yet, and well,
I thank you Sister for your grief, pray keep it
Till I am fitter for it.

Fab. Do you live Sir ?

Fred. Yes, but 'twas time to counterfeit, he was grown
To such a madness in his wine.

Fab. 'Twas well Sir,
You had that good respect unto his temper,
That no worse follow'd. (perish'd.

Fred. If I had stood him, certain one of us must have
How now Frank ?

Fra. Beshrew my heart I tremble like an aspin.

Clor. Let him come here no more for Heavens sake
Unless he be in chains.

Fra. I would fain see him
After he has slept, Fabritio, but to try
How he will be ; chide him, and bring him back.

Clor. You'll never leave till you be worried with him.

Fra. Come Brother, we'll walk in, and laugh a little
To get this Fever off me.

Clor. Hang him squib,
Now could I grind him into priming powder.

Fra. Pray will you leave your fooling ?

Fab. Come, all friends.

Fra. Thou art enough to make an age of men so,
Thou art so cross and peevish.

Fab. I will chide him,
And if he be not graceless, make him cry for't.

Clor. I would go a mile (to see him cry) in slippers
He would look so like a whey cheefe.

Fra. Would we might see him once more.

Fab. If you dare
Venture a second tryal of his temper
I make no doubt to bring him.

Clor. No, good Frank,
Let him alone, I see his vein lyes only
For falling out at Wakes and Bear-baitings,
That may express him sturdy.

Fab. Now indeed
You are too sharp sweet Sister, for unless
It be this sin, which is enough to drown him,
I mean this fownness, he's as brave a fellow,
As forward, and as understanding else
As any he that lives.

Fra. I do believe you,
And good Sir when you see him, if we have
Distasted his opinion any way,
Make peace again.

Fab. I will : I'll leave ye Ladies.

Clor. Take heed you had best, h'as sworn to pay you else.

Fab. I warrant you, I have been often threatned. (ach,

Clor. When he comes next, I'll have the cough or tooth-
Or something that shall make me keep my chamber,
I love him so well.

Fra. Would you would keep your tongue. [Exeunt.

SCENE IV.

Enter Angelo.

Ang. I cannot keep from this ungodly woman,
This Lelia, whom I know too, yet am caught,
Her looks are nothing like her ; would her faults
Were all in Paris print upon her face,
Cum Privilegio, to use 'em still,
I would write an Epistle before it, on the inside of her masque
And dedicate it to the whore of Babylon, with a preface upon
Her nose to the gentle Reader ; and they should be to be sold
At the sign of the whores head i'th' pottage pot, in what Street you please. But all this helps not me ; ——— I Am made to be thus catch'd, past any redress, with a thing
I contemn too.

I have read Epictetus twice over against the Desire of these outward things, and still her face runs in My mind, I went to say my prayers, and they were
So laid out o'th' way, that if I could find any prayers I
Had, I'm no Christian, ———
This is the door, and the short
Is, I must see her again. ——— [He knocks.

Enter Maid.

Maid. Who's there ?

Ang. 'Tis I, I would speak with your Mistress.

Maid. Did she send for you ?

Ang. No, what then ? I would see her, prethee by thy leave.

Maid. Not by my leave ; for she will not see you, but doth hate you, and ——— (so proper
Your friend, and doth wish you both hang'd, which being
Men, is great pity, that you are not.

Ang. How's this ? (perswaded your

Maid. For your sweet self in particular, who she resolves
Friend to neglect her, she deemeth whip-cord the most Convenient unction for your back and shoulders.

Ang. Let me in, I'll satisfy her. (my speeches,

Ma. And if it shall happen that you are in doubt of these Infomuch that you shall spend more time in arguing at the Door, I am fully perswaded that my Mistress in person from Above, will utter her mind more at large by way of Urine upon your head, that it may sink the more soundly
Into your understanding faculties.

Ang. This is the strangest thing, good pretty soul, why
dost thou use me so ?
I pray thee let me in sweet-heart.

Maid. Indeed I cannot sweet-heart. (not become thee.

Ang. Thou art a handsome one, and this crossness do's

Maid. Alas I cannot help it. (said I lik'd thee of

Ang. Especially to me ; thou knowst when I was here, I
All thy Mistress Servants. (press

Maid. So did I you, though it be not my fortune to ex-
It at this present : for truly if you would cry, I cannot Let you in. (you

Ang. Pox on her, I must go the down-right way : look
Here is ten pound for you, let me speak with her.

Maid. I like your gold well, but it is a thing by heaven
I cannot do, she ——— (affairs.

Will not speak with you, especially at this time, she has
Ang. This makes her leave her jesting yet, but take it
And let me see her, bring me to a place
Where undiscerned of her self I may

Feed my desiring eyes but half an hour.

Maid. Why faith I think I can, and I will stretch my wits
And body too for gold: if you will swear as you
Are gentle, not to stir, or speak, where you shall (you.
See or hear, now, or hereafter: give me your gold, I'll plant

Ang. Why, as I am a Gentleman, I will not.

Maid. Enough, quick, follow me.

[Ex. Angelo, and Maid.

Enter Servant.

S. Why where's this maid, she has much care of her business,
I think she be sunk; — why Nell — whiew — (Nell?

Maid within. What's the matter?

Enter Maid.

Ser. I pray you heartily come away, oh, come, come, the (Gentleman
My Mistress invited, is coming down the street, and the (banquet

Not yet brought out? — (They bring in the Banquet.

Lel. within. Nell, Sirrah.

Maid. I come forsooth. (in hand, my

Ser. Now must I walk: when there's any fleshly matters
Mistress sends me of a four hours errand: but if I go not
About mine own bodily business as well as she, I am a Turk.

[Exit Servant.

Enter Father.

Fa. What, all wide open? 'Tis the way to sin
Doubtless; but I must on; the gates of Hell
Are not more passable than these; how they Will be to get out, God knows, I must try.

'Tis very strange, if there be any life
Within this house, would it would shew it self.
What's here? a Banquet? and no mouth to eat,
Or bid me do it? this is something like

The entertainment of adventurous Knights
Entering enchanted Castles: For the manner
Though there be nothing dismal to be seen
Amazes me a little; what is meant

By this strange invitation? I will sound
My Daughters meaning ere I speak to her,
If it be possible, for by my voice —

She will discover me! hark, whence is this.

[Musique.

The SONG.

Come hither you that love, and hear me sing of joys still growing
Green, fresh, and lusty, as the pride of Spring, and ever blowing.

Come hither youths that blush, and dare not know what is desire,
And old men worse than you, that cannot blow
one spark of fire.

And with the power of my enchanting Song,
Boyes shall be able men, and old men young.

Enter Angelo, above.

Come hither you that hope, and you that cry,
leave off complaining,
Youth, strength, and beauty, that shall never dye,
are here remaining.

Come hither fools, and blush, you stay so long
from being blest,
And mad men worse than you, that suffer wrong,
Yet seek no rest.

And in an hour, with my enchanting Song,
You shall be ever pleas'd, and young maids long.

Enter Lelia, and her Maid with a Night-gown and Slippers.

Lel. Sir you are welcom hither, as this kiss
Given with a larger freedom than the use

Of strangers will admit, shall witness to you.
Put the gown on him, in this chair sit down;
Give him his slippers: be not so amaz'd,
Here's to your health, and you shall feel this wine;
Stir lively in me, in the dead of night,
Give him some wine; fall to your banquet Sir,
And let us grow in mirth; though I am set
Now thus far off you, yet four glasses hence
I will sit here,

And try, till both our bloods
Shoot up and down to find a passage out,
Then mouth to mouth will we walk up to bed,
And undress one another as we go;
Where both my treasure, body, and my soul
Are your's to be dispos'd of.

Fa. Umh, umh. — Makes signs of his white head & beard.

Lel. You are old,

Is that your meaning? why, you are to me
The greater novelty, all our fresh youth
Are daily offer'd me, though you perform
As you think little, yet you satisfy

My appetite: from your experience
I may learn something in the way of lust
I may be better for. But I can teach

These young ones;

But this day I did refuse

A paire of 'em, Julio, and Angelo,

And told them they were as they were

Raw fools and whelps. ^a

Maid. Pray God he speak not. ^b Ang. makes discontented signs.
Lel. Why speak you not sweet sir? ^b Maid lates her finger cross her mouth to him.

Fath. Umh. — (Stops his ears, shews he is troubled with Lel. Peace there, that mulique, now Sir speak (the Musick

To me.

Fath. Umh. —

Points at the Maid.

Lel. Why? would you have her gone? you need not keep

Your freedom in for her; she knows my life

That she might write it;

Think she is a stone.

She is a kind of bawdy Confessor,

And will not utter secrets.

Fath. Umh. —

(Points at her again.)

Lel. Be gone then, since he needs will have it so,

'Tis all one. [Exit Maid. — Fath. locks the door.

Is all now as you would? come meet me then,

And bring a thousand kisses on thy lips,

And I will rob thee of 'em, and yet leave

Thy lips as wealthy as they were before.

Fath. Yes, all is as I would but thou.

Lel. By Heaven 'tis my Father. —

Starts.

Fath. And I do beseech thee

Leave these unheard of lusts which worse become thee,

Than mocking of thy Father; let thine eyes

Reflect upon thy soul, and there behold

How loathed black it is; and whereas now

Thy face is heavenly fair, but thy mind foul,

Go but into thy Closet, and there cry

Till thou hast spoil'd that face, and thou shalt find

How excellent a change thou wilt have made

For inward beauty. Lel. Though I know him now

To be my Father, never let me live

If my lust do abate,

I'll take upon me

To have known him all this while.

Fath. Look, dost thou know me?

Lel. I knew ye Sir before.

Fath. What didst thou do?

Lel. Knew you, and so unmov'dly have you born

All the sad crosses that I laid upon you,

With such a noble temper, which indeed

I purposely cast on you, to discern

Your carriage in calamity, and you

Have undergone 'em with that brave contempt,

That I have turn'd the reverence of a child

Into the hot affection of a Lover.
Nor can there on the earth be found but yours
A spirit fit to meet with mine.

Fath. A woman? thou art not sure.

Lel. Look and believe.

Fath. Thou art

Something created to succeed the Devil
When he grows weary of his envious course,
And compassing the World; but I believe thee
Thou didst but mean to try my patience,
And dost so still; but better be advis'd,
And make thy tryal with some other things,
That safer will admit a dalliance;
And if it should be earnest, understand
How curst thou art, so far from Heaven,
That thou believ'st it not enough to damn alone,
Or with a stranger, but wouldst heap all sins
Unnatural upon this aged head,
And draw thy Father to thy Bed, and Hell.

Lel. You are deceiv'd, Sir, 'tis not against nature
For us to lye together; if you have
An Arrow of the same Tree with your Bow,
Is't more unnatural to shoot it there
Than in another? 'Tis our general nature
To procreate, as fire is to consume,
And it will trouble you to find a stick
The fire will turn from; If't be Natures will
We should not mix, she will discover to us
Some most apparent crossness, as our organs
Will not be fit; which, if we do perceive,
We'll leave, and think it is her pleasure
That we should deal with others.

Fath. The doors are fast, thou shalt not say a Prayer,
'Tis not Heavens will thou shouldst; when this is done
I'll kill my self, that never man may tell me
I got thee.

[Father draws his Sword, Angelo discovers himself.]

Lel. I pray you, Sir, help her, for Heavens sake, Sir.

Ang. Hold, Reverend Sir, for honour of your Age.

Fath. Who's that?

Ang. For safety of your Soul, and of the Soul
Of that too-wicked woman yet to dye.

Fath. What art thou? and how cam'st thou to that place?

Ang. I am a man so strangely hither come,
That I have broke an Oath in speaking this,
But I believe 'twas better broke than kept,
And I desire your patience; let me in,
And I protest I will not hinder you
In any act you wish, more than by word,
If so I can perswade you, that I will not
Use violence, I'll throw my Sword down to you;
This house holds none but I, only a maid
Whom I will lock fast in as I come down.

Fath. I do not know thee, but thy tongue doth seem
To be acquainted with the truth so well,
That I will let thee in; throw down thy Sword.

Ang. There 'tis.

Lel. How came he there? I am betray'd to shame,
The fear of sudden death struck me all over
So violently, that I scarce have breath

[He lets in Angelo, and locks the Door.]

To speak yet; but I have it in my head,
And out it shall, that (Father) may perhaps
O'r-reach you yet.

Enter Father, and Angelo.

Fath. Come, Sir, what is't you say?

Lel. My Angelo, by all the joys of love,
Thou art as welcome as these pliant arms
Twin'd round, and fast about thee, can perswade thee.

Ang. Away.

Lel. I was in such a fright before thou cam'st;
Yond' old mad fellow (it will make thee laugh,
Though it feared me) has talkt so wildly here—

Sirrah, he rush'd in at my doors, and swore
He was my Father, and I think believ'd it;
But that he had a Sword, and threatned me—
I' faith he was good sport, good, thrust him out,
That thou and I may kifs together; wilt thou?

Fath. Are you her Champion? and with these fair words
Got in to rescue her from me? [Offers to run at him.]

Ang. Hold, Sir,
I swear I do not harbour such a thought,
I speak it not, for that you have two Swords,
But for 'tis truth.

Lel. Two Swords, my Angelo?
Think this, that thou hast two young brawny arms
And ne'r a Sword, and he has two good Swords,
And ne'r an arm to use 'em; rush upon him,
I could have beaten him with this weak Body,
If I had had the spirit of a man.

Ang. Stand from me, and leave talking, or, by Heaven,
I'll trample thy last damning word out of thee.

Fath. Why do you hinder me then? stand away,
And I will rid her quickly.

Lel. Would I were
Clear of this business, yet I cannot pray.

Ang. Oh, be advis'd, why you were better kill her
If she were good, convey her from this place,
Where none but you, and such as you appoint,
May visit her; where, let her hear of nought
But death and damning, which she hath deserv'd,
Till she be truly, justly sorrowful,
And then lay mercy to her, who does know
But she may mend?

Fath. But whither should I bear her?

Ang. To my house,
'Tis large, and private, I will lend it you.

Fath. I thank you, Sir, and happily it fits
With some design I have: but how shall we Convey her?

Lel. Will they carry me away?

Fath. For she will scratch and kick, and scream so loud
That people will be drawn to rescue her.

Ang. Why? none can hear her here but her own maid,
Who is as fast as she.

Fath. But in the street?

Ang. Why, we will take 'em both into the Kitchen,
There bind 'em, and then gag 'em, and then throw 'em
Into a Coach I'll bring to the back-door,
And hurry 'em away.

Fath. It shall be so,
I owe you much for this, and I may pay you,
There is your Sword, lay hold upon her quickly,
This way with me, thou disobedient Child,
Why does thy stubborn heart beat at thy breast?
Let it be still, for I will have it search'd
Till I have found a Well of living tears
Within it, that shall spring out of thine eyes,
And flow all o'r thy Body foul'd with sin,
Till it have wash'd it quite without a stain. [They drag her.]

Lel. Help, help, ah! ah!
Murder, I shall be murdered, I shall be murdered.

Fath. This helps thee not.

Lel. Basely murdered, basely.

Fath. I warrant you.

[Exeunt.]

Æius Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter Lodowick, and Pifo.

Lod. THis roguey Captain has made fine work with us.
Pif. I would the Devil in a storm would carry Home to his Garrison again; I take all over, (him
That I am sure of; certainly my Body of a wild-fire, for my head rings backward;

Or else I have a morise in my brains.

Lod. I'll deal no more with Souldiers; well remembred,
Did not the Vision promise to appear
About this time again?

Pis. Yes, here he comes;
He's just on's word.

Enter Father.

Fath. O, they be here together,
She's penitent, and by my troth I stagger
Whether (as now she is) either of these
Two fools be worthy of her; yet because
Her youth is prone to fall again, ungovern'd,
And marriage now may stay her, one of 'em;
And Piso, since I understand him abler,
Shall be the man; the other bear the charges,
And willingly, as I will handle it.
I have a Ring here, which he shall believe
Is sent him from a woman I have thought of;
But e're I leave it, I'll have one of his
In pawn worth two on't; for I will not lose
By such a mess of sugar-fops as this is:
I am too old.

Lod. It moves again, let's meet it.

Fath. Now if I be not out, we shall have fine sport,
I am glad I have met you, Sir, so happily,
You do remember me I am sure.

Lod. I do, Sir.

Pis. This is a short præludium to a challenge.

Fa. I have a message, Sir, that much concerns you,
And for your special good; nay, you may hear too.

Pis. What should this fellow mean?

Fath. There is a Lady,
(How the poor thing begins to warm already)
Come to this town, (as yet a stranger here, Sir)
Fair, young, and rich, both in possessions,
And all the graces that make up a Woman,
A Widow, and a vertuous one; it works,
He needs no broth upon't.

Lod. What of her, Sir?

Fath. No more but this; she loves you.

Lod. Loves me?

Fath. Yes,

And with a strong affection, but a fair one, (matter.
If ye be wise and thankful ye are made; there's the whole

Lod. I am sure I hear this.

Fath. Here is a Ring, Sir, of no little value;
Which after she had seen you at a window,
She bad me haste, and give it, when she blush'd
Like a blown Rose.

Lod. But pray, Sir, by your leave——
Methinks your years should promise no ill meaning.

Fath. I am no Bawd, nor Cheater, nor a Courser
Of broken-winded women; if you fear me,
I'll take my leave, and let my Lady use
A fellow of more form; an honest
I am sure she cannot.

Lod. Stay, you have confirm'd me,
Yet let me feel; you are in health?

Fath. I hope so,

My water's well enough, and my pulse.

Lod. Then

All may be excellent; pray pardon me,
For I am like a Boy that had found money,
Afraid I dream still.

Pis. Sir, what kind of woman?
Of what proportion is your Lady?

Lod. I.

Fath. I'll tell you presently her very Picture,
Do you know a woman in this town they call
(Stay, yes, it is so) Lelia?

Piso. Not by sight.

Fath. Nor you, Sir?

Lod. Neither.

Fath. These are precious Rogues
To rail upon a woman they never saw;
So they would use their Kindred.

Pis. We have heard though
She is very fair and goodly.

Fath. Such another,
Just of the same Complexion, making, speech,
But a thought sweeter is my Lady.

Lod. Then
She must be excellent indeed.

Fath. Indeed she is,
And you will find it so; you do believe me?

Lod. Yes marry do I, and I am so alter'd——

Fath. Your happiness will alter any man:
Do not delay the time, Sir; at a house
Where Don Valasco lay, the Spanish Seignior
(Which now is Seignior Angelo's) she is.

Lod. I know it.

Lod. But before you shew your self,
Let it be night by all means, willingly
By day she would not have such Gallants seen
Repair unto her, 'tis her modesty.

Lod. I'll go and fit my self.

Fath. Do, and be sure
You send provision in, in full abundance,
Fit for the Marriage; for this night I know
She will be yours, Sir, have you never a token
Of worth to send her back again? you must,
She will expect it.

Lod. Yes, pray give her this.
And with it all I have; I am made for ever. [Exit Lod.]

Pis. Well, thou hast fools luck; should I live as long
As an old Oak, and say my prayers hourly,
I should not be the better of a penny;
I think the Devil be my ghostly father;
Upon my conscience I am full as handsome,
I am sure I have more wit, and more performance,
Which is a pretty matter.

Fath. Do you think, Sir,
That your friend, Seignior Piso, will be constant
Unto my Lady? you should know him well.

Piso. Who? Seignior Piso?

Fath. Yes, the Gentleman.

Piso. Why, you are wide, Sir.

Fath. Is not his name Piso?

Piso. No, mine is Piso.

Fath. How?

Piso. 'Tis indeed, Sir,

And his is Lodowick.

Fath. Then I am undone, Sir,
For I was sent at first to Piso; what a Rascal
Was I, so ignorantly to mistake you?

Piso. Peace,
There is no harm done yet.

Fath. Now 'tis too late,
I know my errour;
At turning of a Street,
For you were then upon the right hand of him,
You chang'd your places suddenly; where I
(Like a cross block-head) lost my memory;
What shall I do? my Lady utterly
Will put me from her favour.

Piso. Never fear it,
I'll be thy guard I warrant thee; O, O,
Am I at length reputed? for the Ring,
I'll fetch it back with a light vengeance from him;
H'ad better keep tame Devils than that Ring;
Art thou not Steward?

Fath. No.

Pis. Thou shalt be shortly.

Fath. Lord, how he takes it!

Piso. I'll go shift me streight;

Art t' sure was to Piso?

Fath. O, too sure, Sir.

Piso. I'll mount thee if I live for't,
Give me patience, heav'n, to bear this blessing I beseech thee,
I am but man, I prithee break my head
To make me understand I am sensible.

Fath. Lend me your Dagger, and I will, Sir.

Piso. No.

I believe now like a good Christian.

Fath. Good Sir, make hast; I dare not go without ye
Since I have so mistaken.

Piso. 'Tis no matter,
Meet me within this half hour at St. Marg'rets.

Well, go thy ways, old Lad, thou hast the trick on't.

[Exit Piso.]

Enter Angelo, and Julio.

Ang. How now? the news?

Fath. Well, passing well, I have 'em,
Both in a leash, and made right for my purpose.

Jul. I am glad on't, I must leave you.

Ang. VVhither man?

Jul. If all go right I may be fast enough too.

Ang. I cry you mercy, Sir, I know your meaning,
Clora's the woman, she's Frank's Bedfellow,

Commend me to 'em, go, Julio,
Bring 'em to supper all, to grace this matter;
They will serve for witnesses.

Jul. I will, farewell.

[Exit Julio at one door, and Ang. and Fath. at another.]

SCENE II.

Enter Clora, Frank, and Frederick, and Maid.

Fred. Sister, I brought you Jacomo to the door,
He has forgot all that he said last night;
And shame of that makes him loth to come,
I left Fabricio perswading him, but 'tis in vain.

Fran. Alas, my fortune, Clora.

Clor. Now Frank, see what a kind of man you love,
That loves you when he's drunk. Fran. If so,

'Faith, I would marry him; my friends I hope
Would make him drink. (mours then,

Clor. 'Tis well consider'd, Frank, he has such pretty hu
Besides, being a Souldier, 'tis better he should love
You when he's drunk, than when he's sober, for then he
Will be sure to love you the greatest part on's life.

Fran. And were not I a happy woman then?

Clor. That ever was born, Frank, i' faith——

Fred. How now, what says he?

Enter Fabricio.

(and Bell

Fab. 'Faith, you may as well 'tice a Dog up with a Whip
As him, by telling him of Love and Women, he swears
They mock him.

Fred. Look how my Sister weeps.

Fab. Why, who can help it?

Fred. Yes, you may safely swear she loves him.

Fab. Why, so I did; and may do all the oaths,
Arithmetick can make, e're he believe me;
And since he was last drunk, he is more jealous
They would abuse him; if we could perswade him
She lov'd, he would embrace it.

Fred. She her self

Shall bate so much of her own modesty
To swear it to him, with such tears as now
You see rain from her.

Fab. I believe 'twould work,
But would' you have her do't i'th' open street?
Or if you would, he'll run away from her,
How shall we get him hither?

Fred. By entreaty.

Fab. 'Tis most impossible, no, if we could
Anger him hither, as there is no way
But that to bring him, and then hold him fast,

Women, and men, whilst she delivers to him the truth
Seal'd with her tears, he would be plain
As a pleas'd Child; he walks below for me
Under the window.

Clor. We'll anger him I warrant ye,
Let one of the maids take a good Bowl of water,
Or say it be a piss-pot, and pour't on's head.

Fab. Content, hang me if I like not the cast of it rarely,
(for no question

It is an approv'd Receipt to fetch such a fellow; (one,
Take all the women-kind in this house, betwixt the Age of
And one hundred, and let them take unto them a pot or a
Bowl containing seven quarts or upwards, and let them
Never leave, till the above named

Pot or Bowl become full, then let one of them stretch out
Her Arm, and pour it on his head, and probatum est, it
Will fetch him, for in his anger he will run up, and then let Us alone.

Clor. Go you and do it.

[Exit Maid.

Fran. Good Clora, no.

(that

Clor. Away I say, & do it, never fear, we have enough of Water ready distill'd.

Fran. Why, this will make him mad, Fabricio,
He'll neither love me drunk nor sober now.

Fab. I warrant you; what, is the wench come up?

Enter Wench.

Clor. Art thou there, wench?

Wench. I.

Fab. Look out then if thou canst see him. (could not
Wench. Yes, I see him, and by my troth he stands so fair I
Hold were he my Father, his hat's off too, and he's scratching
His head.

Fab. O, wash that hand I prithee. (thrown thee

Wench. 'Send thee good luck, this the second time I have
Out to day, ha, ha, just on's head.

Fran. Alas!

Fab. What does he now? (Street windows.

Wench. He gathers stones, God's light, he breaks all the

Jac. VVhorses, Bawds, your windows, your windows.

Wench. Now he is breaking all the low windows with His Sword, (him,

Excellent sport, now he's beating a fellow that laugh'd at
Truly the man takes it patiently; now he goes down the street
Gravelly, looking on each side, there's not one more dare

Fran. Does he go on?

(laugh.

Wench. Yes.

Fran. Fabricio, you have undone a Maid

[Frank kneels.

By treachery; know you some other better,
You would prefer your friend to? if you do not
Bring him again, I have no other hope,
But you that made me lose hope, if you fail me,
I ne'r shall see him, but shall languish out
A discontented life, and dye contemn'd.

Fab. This vexes me, I pray you be more patient,

[Lifts her up.

If I have any truth, let what will happen,
I'll bring him presently, do ye all stand
At the Street door, the maids, and all, to watch
VVhen I come back, and have some private place
To shuffle me into; for he shall follow
In fury, but I know I can out-run him
As he comes in, clap all fast hold on him;
And use your own discretions.

Fred. VVe will do it.

Fab. But suddenly, for I will bring him hither
VVith that unstopt speed, that he shall run over
All that's in's way; and though my life be ventur'd
'Tis no great matter, I will do't.

Fran. I thank you,

VVorthy Fabricio.

[Exeunt.

SCENE

SCENE III.

Enter Jacomo.

Jac. I ever knew no woman could abide me,
But am I grown so contemptible, by being once drunk
Amongst 'em, that they begin to throw piss on my head?
For surely it was piss, huh, huh. (Seem to smell.)

Enter Fabritio.

Fab. Jacomo, how do'st thou?

Jac. Well, something troubled with waterish humours.

Fab. Foh, how thou stink'st! pre'thee stand further off me,
Me thinks these humours become thee better than thy dry
Cholerick humours, or thy wine-wet humours; ha?

Jac. You're pleasant, but Fabritio know I am not in the Suffering jests. (mood of)

Fab. If you be not i'th' mood I hope you will not be moody,
But truly I cannot blame the Gentlewomen, you stood
Under their window, and would not come up. (evesdropping)

Jac. Sir, I suspect now, by your idle talk
Your hand was in't, which if I once believe,
Be sure you shall account to me. (you already,

Fab. The Gentlewomen and the Maids have counted to
The next turn I see is mine.

Jac. Let me dye but this is very strange; good Fabritio
Do not provoke me so. (there's no)

Fab. Provoke you? you're grown the strangest fellow;
Keeping company with you, phish; take you that.

Jac. O all the Devils! stand Slave. Fab. gives him a box o'th' ear suddenly, and throws him from him, and goes his way, whilst Jaco. draws his sword.

Fab. Follow me if thou dar'st.

Jac. Stay coward, stay. ——— Jac. runs after Fabritio.

SCENE IV.

Enter Fred. Fra. Clora, and Servant, and Maid.

Clora. Be ready for I see Fabritio running,
And Jacomo behind him.

Enter Fabritio.

Fab. Where's the place?

Fred. That way Fabritio. [Exit Fabritio.

Enter Jacomo.

Jac. Where art thou traitor, Fred. Clor. and Maid, lay hold on Jacomo.
What is the matter Sirs?

Why do you hold me? I am basely wrong'd,
Torture, and hell be with you; let me go. they drag him to a chair and hold him down in't.

Fred. Good Jac. be patient, and but hear
What I can say, you know I am your friend,
If you yet doubt it, by my soul I am.

Jac. S'death stand away;
I would my breath were poyson.

Fred. As I have life, that which was thrown on you,
And this now done, were but to draw you hither
For causes weighty, that concern your self,
Void of all malice, which this Maid my Sister
Shall tell you.

Jac. Puh, a pox upon you all; you will not hold me
For ever here, and till you let me go,
I'll talk no more.

Fran. As you're a Gentleman
Let not this boldness make me be believ'd
To be immodest; if there were a way
More silently to be acquainted with you,
God knows, that I would choose, but as it is
Take it in plainness: I do love you more
Than you do your content, if you refuse
To pity me, I'll never cease to weep,
And when mine eyes be out I will be told
How fast the tears I shed for you do fall,
And if they do not flow abundantly,

I'll fetch a sigh shall make 'em start, and leap,
As if the fire were under.

Jac. Fine mocking, fine mocking.

Fred. Mocking? look how she weeps.

Jac. Do's she counterfeit crying too?

Fred. Behold how the tears flow, or pity her
Or never more be call'd a man. (sible think you,

Jac. How's this? soft you, soft you my Masters: is't pos-
She should be in earnest? (sleeps,

Clor. Earnest? I in earnest: she's a fool to break so many
That would have been found ones, & venture such a fane, and
So much life, for e're an humorous assé i'th' world.

Fra. Why Clora? I have known you cry as much
For Julio, that has not half his worth,
All night you write and weep too much I fear,
I do but what I should.

Clora. If I do write,
I am answer'd Frank,

Fran. I would I might be so.

Jac. Good Frederick let me go, I would fain try
If that thing do not counterfeit.

Fred. Give me your Sword then.

Jac. No, but take my word,

As I am man, I will not hurt a creature
Under this roof, before I have deliver'd
My self, as I am now, into your hands,
Or have your full consent.

Fred. It is enough.

Jac. Gentlewoman, I pray you let me feel your face; I am an Infidel, if she do not weep: Stay, where's my handkerchief?
I'll wipe the old wet off, fresh tears come, pox on't
I am a handsom, gracious fellow amongst women, and (are Knew't not Gentlewoman; how should I know these tears
For me? is not your Mother dead?

Fran. By heaven they are for you. (morrow

Jac. 'Slight I'll have my head curl'd, and powder'd to
By break of day; if you love me, I pray you kiss me,
For if I love you, it shall be such love, as I will not be Asham'd of, if this be a mock ——— (kisses.

It is the heartiest, and the sweetest mock
That e're I tasted, mock me so again ——— (kiss again

Fred. Fy Jacomo? why do you let her kneel
So long?

Jac. It's true I had forgot it ——— (lifts her up.
And should have done this twelve-moneth; pray you rise.

(she could
Frederick, if I could all this while have been perswaded
Have lov'd me, dost thou think I had not rather kiss her
Than another should? and yet you may gull me for ought
I know, but if you do, hell take me if I do not cut
All your throats sleeping.

Fred. Oh do not think of such a thing.

Jac. Otherwise, if she be in earnest, the short is I am.

Fran. Alas, I am.

Jac. And I did not think it possible any woman
Could have lik'd this face, it's good for nothing, is't?

Clor. Yes it's worth forty shillings to pawn, being lin'd (almost quite

Through with velvet.

Fran. 'Tis better than your Julio's.

Jac. Thou thinkest so,
But other wife, in faith it is not Frank ——— whilst Jacomo is kissing Frank.

Enter Fabritio.

Fab. Hist Jacomo; How do'st thou Boy? ha?

Jac. Why very well, I thank you Sir. (fages

Fab. Do'st thou perceive the reason of matters, and pas-
Yet Sirrah, or no?

Jac. 'Tis wondrous good Sir. (ten to some

Fab. I have done simply for you, but now you are bea-
Understanding, I pray you dally not with the Gentlewoman
But dispatch your Matrimony, with all convenient speed.

Fred. He gives good counsel.

Jac. And I will follow it.

Fab.

Fab. And I you, prethee do not take it unkindly,
For trust me I boxt thee for thy advancement,
A foolish desire I had to joggle thee into preferment.

Jac. I apprehend you Sir, and if I can ludy out a course
How a bastinadoing may any wayes raise your fortunes
In the State, you shall be sure on't.

Fab. Oh Sir keep your way, God send you much joy.

Clora. And me my Julio.

O God I hear his voyce, now he is true, (but Fred.
Have at a marriage Frank, as soon as you — [Exit all

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Sir I would speak with you.

Fred. What is your hastily business friend? (Court.

Mess. The Duke commands your present attendance at

Fred. The cause?

Mess. I know not in particular; but this
Many are sent for more, about affairs
Forraign I take it Sir.

Fred. I will be there

Within this hour, return my humble service.

Mess. I will Sir. [Exit Messenger.

Fred. Farewel friend, what new's with you?

Enter a Servant.

Ser. My Mistris would desire you Sir to follow
With all the hast you can, she is gone to Church,
To marry Captain Jacomo, and Julio
To do as much for the young merry Gentlewoman,
Fair Mistris Clora? Fred. Julio marry Clora?
Thou art deceiv'd I warrant thee.

Ser. No sure Sir,
I saw their lips as close upon the bargain
As Cockles.

Fred. Give 'em joy, I cannot now go,
The Duke hath sent for me in hast. (where they are. [Ex.

Ser. This note Sir, when you are free, will bring you

Fred. reads. You shall find us all at Signeur Angelo's,
Where Piso, and the worthy Lelia
Of famous memory are to be married,
And we not far behind.

Would I had time
To wonder at this last couple in hell.

Enter Messenger again.

Mess. You are stai'd for Sir.

Fred. I come, pray God the business
Hold me not from this sport, I would not lose it. [Exit.

SCENE V.

Enter Father, Piso, Angelo, and Lelia.

Ang. God give you joy, and make you live together
A happy pair.

Piso. I do not doubt we shall.

There was never poor gentleman had such a sudden fortune,
I could thrust my head betwixt two pales, and strip me out of
My old skin like a Snake: will the guests come thou saidst
Thou sentest for to solemnize the Nuptials?

Fath. They will, I lookt for 'em e're this.

Enter Julio, Jacomo, Fabritio, Frank, Clora.

Jul. By your leave all.

Fath. They're here Sir.

Jul. Especially fair Lady

I ask your pardon, to whose marriage-bed
I with all good success, I have here brought you
Such guests as can discern your happiness,
And best do know how to rejoyce at it;
For such a fortune they themselves have run,
The worthy Jacomo, and his fair Bride,
Noble Fabritio, whom this age of peace
Has not yet taught to love ought but the warrs,
And his true friends, this Lady who is but

A piece of me.

[Exit Father.

Leli. Sir, you are welcom all,

Are they not Sir? (fool

Piso. Bring in some wine, some of the wine Lodowick the Sent hither: who ever thou bid'st welcom shall find it.

Leli. An unexpected honour you have done
To our too hally wedding.

Jac. Faith Madam, our weddings were as hasty as yours,
We are glad to run up and down any whither, to see where
We can get meat to our wedding.

Piso. That Lodowick hath provided too, good Assé.

Ang. I thought you Julio would not thus have stolen a (marriage

Without acquainting your friends.

Jul. Why I did give thee inklings. (e're almost

Ang. If a marriage should be thus stubber'd up in a play,
Any body had taken notice you were in love, the Spectators
Would take it to be but ridiculous.

Jul. This was the first, and I will never hide
Another secret from you.

Enter Father.

Fath. Sir, yonder's your friend Lodowick, hide your self
And 'twill be the best sport —

Piso. Gentlemen, I pray you take no notice, I'm here.
The coxcomb Lodowick is coming in.

Enter Lodowick.

Lod. Is that the Lady?

Fath. That is my Lady.

Lod. As I live she's a fair one; what make all these here?

Fath. O Lord Sir she is so pester'd —

Fab. Now will the sport be, it runs right as Julio told us.

Lod. Fair Lady health to you; some words I have, that Require an utterance more private,
Than this place can afford.

Leli. Ple call my husband,
All business I hear with his ears now.

Lod. Good Madam no, but I perceive your jest,
You have no husband, I am the very man
That walk'd the streets so comely.

Leli. Are you so?

Lod. Yes faith, when Cupid first did prick your heart.
I am not cruel, but the love begun
I'th' street I'le satisfie i'th' chamber fully.

Leli. To ask a Madman whether he be mad
Were but an idle question, if you be,
I do not speak to you, but if you be not
Walk in the streets again; and there perhaps
I may dote on you, here I not endure you.

Lod. Good Madam stay, do not you know this Ring?

Leli. Yes it was mine, I sent it by my Man,
To change and so he did, it has a blemish,
And this he brought me for it; did you change it?
Are you a Goldsmith?

Lod. Sure the world is mad,
Sirrah, did you not bring me this ring from your Lady?

Fath. Yes surely Sir, did I, but your worship must ev'n (bear with me;

For there was a mistaking in it, and so, as I was Saying to your worship, my Lady is now married.

Lod. Married? to whom?

Fa. To your worships friend Piso.

Lod. S'death to Piso?

Piso within. Ha, ha, ha.

Ang. Yes Sir I can assure you she's married to him, I saw't
With these gray eyes.

Lod. Why what a Rogue art thou then? thou hast made
Me send in provision too. (in's mouth.

Fa. O a Gentleman should not have such foul words
But your Worships provision could not have come in at a (fitter time;

Will it please you to tast any of your own wine?
It may be the Vintner has cozen'd you.

Lod.

Lod. Pox I am mad.
Ang. You have always plots Sir, and see how they fall out.
Jac. You had a plot upon me, how do you like this?
Lod. I do not speak to you.
Fab. Because you dare not. (this Ring.
Lod. But I will have one of that old Rogues teeth set in Fat. Do'st not thou know that I can beat thee?
 Dost thou know it now? (discovers himself.)
Lod. He beat me once indeed.
Fat. And if you have for got it, I can call a witness,
 Come forth Piso — remember you it?
Piso. Faith I do call to minde such a matter.
Fat. And if I cannot still do't, you are young
 And will assist your Father in law.
Piso. My Father in law?
Ang. Your Father in law, as sure as this is widow Lelia.
Piso. How widow Lelia?
Fat. I' faith 'tis she, Son.
Lod. Ha, ha, ha, let my provision go, I am glad I
 Have mist the woman.
Piso. Have you put a whore upon me?
Lel. By heaven you do me wrong, I have a heart
 As pure as any womans, and I mean
 To keep it so for ever.
Fa. There is no starting now, Son, if you offer't
 I can compel you, her estate is great,
 But all made o're to me, before this match,
 Yet if you use her kindly, as I swear
 I think she will deserve, you shall enjoy it
 During your life, all save some slender piece
 I will reserve for my own maintenance,
 And if God blefs you with a child by her,
 It shall have all.

Piso. So I may have the means,
 I do not much care what the woman is:
 Come my sweet heart, as long as I shall find
 Thy kisses sweet, and thy means plentiful,
 Let people talk their tongues out.
Lel. They may talk
 Of what is past, but all that is to come
 Shall be without occasions.
Jul. Shall we not make Piso, and Lodowick friends?
Jac. Hang 'em they dare not be Enemies, or if they be,
 The danger is not great, welcom Frederick.

Enter Frederick.

Fred. First joy unto you all; and next I think
 We shall have wars.
Jac. Give me some wine, I'le drink to that.
Fab. Ple pledge.
Fran. But I shall lose you then. (a Souldier.
Jac. Not a whit wench; I'le teach thee presently to be
Fred. Fabritio's command, and yours are both restor'd.
Jac. Bring me four glasses then.
Fab. Where are they?
Ang. You shall not drink 'em here, 'tis supper time,
 And from my house no creature here shall stir
 These three dayes, mirth shall flow as well as wine.
Fa. Content, within I'le tell you more at large
 How much I am bound to all, but most to you,
 Whose undeserved liberality
 Must not escape thus unrequited.
Jac. 'Tis happiness to me, I did so well:
 Of every noble action, the intent
 Is to give worth reward, vice, punishment.

[Exeunt Om.

Prologue.

TO please you with this Play, we fear will be
 (So does the Author too) a mystery
 Somewhat above our Art; For all mens eyes,
 Ears, faiths, and judgements, are not of one size.
 For to say truth, and not to flatter ye,
 This is nor Comedy, nor Tragedy,
 Nor History, nor any thing that may (Yet in a week) be made a perfect Play:
 Yet those that love to laugh, and those that think
 Twelve pence goes farther this way than in drink,
 Or Damsels, if they mark the matter through,
 May stumble on a foolish toy, or two
 Will make 'em shew their teeth: pray, for my sake
 (That likely am your first man) do not take

A distaste before you feel it: for ye may
 When this is hist to ashes, have a Play.
 And here, to out-his this; be patient then,
 (My honour done) y'are welcom Gentlemen.

Epilogue.

IF you mislike (as you shall ever be
 Your own free Judges) this Play utterly,
 For your own Nobleness yet do not his,
 But as you go by, say it was amiss;
 And we will mend: Chide us, but let it be
 Never in cold blood: O' my honesty
 (If I have any) this Ple say for all,
 Our meaning was to please you still, and shall.

Enter Charinus, Aurelia, Niger.

Cha. YOU buz into my head strange likelihoods,
 And fill me full of doubts; but what proofs,
 (Niger,
 What certainties, that my most noble Bro(ther

Came to his end by murthrer? Tell me that,
 Assure me by some circumstance.

Niger. I will, Sir,
 And as I tell you truth, so the gods prosper me,

I have often nam'd this Aper.

Char. True, ye have done;
 And in mysterious fenses I have heard ye
 Break out o'th' sudder, and abruptly.

Niger. True, Sir;
 Fear of your unbelief, and the times giddiness
 Made me I durst not then go farther. So your Grace please,
 Out of your wonted goodness, to give credit,
 I shall unfold the wonder.

Aur. Do it boldly;
 You shall have both our hearty loves, and hearings.

C c c c

Niger.

Niger. This Aper then, this too much honour'd Villain,
(For he deserves no mention of a good man)
Great Sir, give ear; this most ungrateful, spiteful,
Above the memory of mankind, mischievous,
With his own bloody hands.

Char. Take heed.

Nig. I am in, Sir;
And if I make not good my story.

Aur. Forward;

I see a truth would break out; be not fearful.

Nig. I say this Aper, and his damn'd Ambition,
Cut off your Brothers hopes, his life, and fortunes;
The honour'd Numerianus fell by him,
Fell basely, most untimely, and most treacherously:
For in his Litter, as he bore him company,
Most privately and cunningly he kill'd him;
Yet still he fills the faithful Souldiers ears
With stories of his weakness, of his life,
That he dare not venture to appear in open,
And shew his warlike face among the Souldiers;
The tenderness and weakness of his eyes
Being not able to endure the Sun yet.

Slave that he is, he gives out this infirmity
(Because he would dispatch his honour too)
To arise from wantonness, and love of women,
And thus he juggles still.

Aur. O most pernicious,
Most bloody, and most base! Alas, dear Brother,
Art thou accus'd, and after death thy memory
Loaden with shames and lies? Those pious tears
Thou daily shower'st upon my Fathers monument,
(When in the Persian Expedition
He fell unfortunately by a stroke of Thunder)
Made thy defame and sins? those wept out eyes,
The fair examples of a noble nature,
Those holy drops of Love, turn'd by depravers
(Malicious poyson'd tongues) to thy abuses?
We must not suffer this.

Char. It shows a truth now;
And sure this Aper is not right nor honest,
He will not come near me.

Nig. No, he dare not;
He has an inmate here, that's call'd a conscience,
Bids him keep off.

Char. My Brother honour'd him,
Made him first Captain of his Guard, his next friend;
Then to my Mother (to assure him nearer)
He made him Husband.

Nig. And withal ambitious;
For when he trod so nigh, his false feet itch'd, Sir,
To step into the State.

Aur. If ye believe, Brother,
Aper a bloody Knaves (as 'tis apparent)
Let's leave disputing, and do something noble.

Char. Sister, be rul'd, I am not yet so powerful
To meet him in the field; he has under him
The Flower of all the Empire, and the strength,
The Britain, and the German Cohorts; pray ye be patient,
Niger, how stands the Souldier to him?

Nig. In fear more, Sir,
Than love or honour; he has lost their fair affections,
By his most covetous and greedy griping:
Are ye desirous to do something on him,
That all the World may know ye lov'd your Brother?
And do it safely too without an Army?

Char. Most willingly.

Nig. Then send out a Proscription,
Send suddenly; And to that man that executes it
(I mean, that brings his head) add a fair payment,
No common Suram; then ye shall see I fear not,
Even from his own Camp, from those men that follow him,
Follow, and flatter him, we shall find one,
And if he mis, one hundred that will venture it.

Aur. For his reward, it shall be so, dear Brother,

So far I'll honour him that kills the Villain;
For so far runs my love to my dead Brother,
Let him be what he will, base, old, or crooked,
He shall have me; nay, which is more, I'll love him.
I will not be deny'd.

Char. You shall not, Sister;
But ye shall know, my love shall go along too;
See a Proscription drawn; and for his recompence,
My Sister, and half Partner in the Empire;
And I will keep my word.

Aur. Now ye do bravely.

Nig. And though it cost my life, I'll see it publish'd.

Char. Away then for the business.

Nig. I am gone, Sir;
You shall have all dispatch'd to night.

Char. Be prosperous.

Aur. And let the Villain fall.

Nig. Fear nothing, Madam.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Delphia, and Drusilla.

Dru. 'Tis true, that Diocles is courteous,
And of a pleasant nature, sweet and temperate;
His Cousin Maximian proud and bloody.

Delph. Yes, and mistrustful too, my Girl, take heed,
Although he seem to love thee, and affect
Like the more Courtier, curious complement;
Yet have a care.

Dru. You know all my affection,
And all my heart-desires are set on Diocles;
But, Aunt, how coldly he requites this courtesie!
How dull and heavily he looks upon me!
Although I woo him sometimes beyond modesty,
Beyond a Virgins care; how still he slights me,
And puts me still off with your Prophecy,
And the performance of your late prediction,
That when he is Emperour, then he will marry me;
Alas, what hope of that?

Del. Peace, and be patient,
For though he be now a man most miserable,
Of no rank, nor no badge of honour on him,
Bred low and poor, no eye of favour shining;
And though my sure Prediction of his Rising
(Which can no more fail than the day or night does, Nay, let him be asleep, will overtake him)
Hath found some rubs and stops, yet hear me, Neece,
And hear me with a faith, it shall come to him;
I'll tell thee the occasion.

Dru. Do, good Aunt;
For yet I am ignorant.

Del. Chiding him one day
For being too near, and sparing for a Souldier,
Too griping, and too greedy; he made answer,
When I am Cesar, then I will be liberal.
I, presently inspir'd with holy fire,
And my prophetick Spirit burning in me,
Gave answer from the gods, and this it was,
Imperator eris Romæ, cum Aprum grandem interfeceris:
Thou shalt be Emperour, O Diocles,
When thou hast kill'd a mighty Boar. From that time
(As giving credit to my words) he has employ'd
Much of his life in hunting; many Boars
Hideous and fierce, with his own hands he has kill'd too,
But yet not lighted on the fatal one,
Should raise him to the Empire; Be not sad, Neece,
E're long he shall; Come, let's go entertain him,
For by this time I guess he comes from hunting;
And by my Art I find this very instant
Some great design's o' foot.

Dru. The gods give good, Aunt.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE

SCENE III.

Enter Diocles, Maximinian, Geta, with a Boar.

Dio. Lay down the Boar.

Get. With all my heart; I am weary on't; I shall turn Jew if I carry many such burthens: Do you think, Master, to be Emperour With killing Swine? you may be an honest Butcher, Or allied to a seemly family of sowse-wives.

Can you be such an Ass, my Reverend Master, To think these springs of Pork will shoot up Cesars?

Max. The fool says true.

Dio. Come, leave your fooling, Sirrah, And think of what thou shalt be when I am Emperour.

Get. Would it would come with thinking, for then o' my I should be at least a Senator. (conscience,

Max. A Sowter;

For that's a place more fitted to thy nature, If there could be such an expectation; Or say, the Devil could perform this wonder; Can such a Rascal as thou art, hope for honour? Such a log carrying Lowt?

Get. Yes, and bear it too, And bear it swimmingly, I am not the first Ass, Sir, Has born good office, and perform'd it reverently.

(a Senator?)

Dio. Thou being the Son of a Tiler, canst thou hope to be

Get. Thou being the Son of a Tanner, canst thou hope to (be an Emperour?)

Dio. Thou sayst true, Geta, there's a stop indeed; But yet the bold and vertuous——

Get. Ye are right, Master, Right as a Gun; For we the vertuous, Though we be Kennel-rakers, Scabs, and Scoundrels, We the discreet and bold; and yet, now I remember it, We Tilers may deserve to be Senators; And there we step before you thick-skin'd Tanners, For we are born three stories high; no base ones, None of your groundlings, master.

Dio. I like thee well, Thou hast a good mind, as I have, to this Honour.

Get. As good a mind, Sir, of a simple plaisterer—— And when I come to execute my office, Then you shall see.

Max. What?

Get. An Officer in fury; An Officer as he ought to be; do you laugh at it? Is a Senator (in hope) worth no more reverence? By these hands I'll clap you by th' heels the first hour of it.

Max. O' my Conscience, the fellow believes.

Dio. I, do, do, Geta, For if I once be Emperour——

Get. Then will I (For wise men must be had to prop the Republick) Not bate ye a single ace of a sound Senator.

Dio. But what shall we do the whilst?

Get. Kill Swine, and sowse 'em, And eat 'em when we have bread.

Max. Why didst thou run away When the Boar made toward thee? art thou not valiant?

Get. No indeed am I not; and 'tis for mine honour too; I took a Tree, 'tis true, gave way to the Monster; Hark what discretion says, let fury pass; From the tooth of a mad Beast, and the tongue of a Slanderer Preserve thine honour.

Dio. He talks like a full Senator: Go, take it up, and carry it in, 'tis a huge one, We never kill'd so large a Swine, so fierce too, I never met with yet.

Max. Take heed, it stirs again; How nimbly the Rogue runs up! he climbs like a Squirrel.

Dio. Come down, ye Dunce, is it not dead?

Get. I know not.

Dio. His throat is cut, and his bowels out.

Get. That's all one,

I am sure his teeth are in; and for any thing I know, He may have Pigs of his own nature in's Belly.

Dio. Come, take him up I say, and see him dress'd, He is fat, and will be lusty in at: away with him, And get some of him ready for our Dinner.

Get. Shall he be roasted whole, And serv'd up in a souce-tub? a portly service, I'll run i'th' wheel my self.

Max. Sirrah, leave your prating, And get some piece of him ready presently, We are weary both, and hungry.

Get. I'll about it.

What an inundation of Brewiss shall I swim in? [Exit.

Dio. Thou art ever dull and melancholy, Cousin, Distrustful of my hopes.

Max. Why, can you blame me?

Do men give credit to a Jugler?

Dio. Thou knowst she is a Prophetess.

Max. A small one, And as small profit to be hop'd for by her.

Dio. Thou art the strangest man; how does thy hurt? The Boar came near you, Sir.

Max. A scratch, a scratch.

Dio. It akes and troubles thee, and that makes thee angry.

Max. Not at the pain, but at the practice, Uncle, The butcherly, base custom of our lives now; Had a brave enemies Sword drawn so much from me, Or danger met me in the head o'th' Army, To have blush'd thus in my blood, had been mine honour. But to live base, like Swine-herds, and believe too, To be fool'd out with tales, and old wives dreams, Dreams, when they are drunk.

Dio. Certain you much mistake her. (ors,

Max. Mistake her? hang her; to be made her Purvey-To feed her old Chaps; to provide her daily, And bring in Feasts while she sits farting at us, And blowing out her Prophecies at both ends.

Dio. Prithee be wise; Dost thou think, Maximilian, So great a reverence, and so staid a knowledge——

Max. Sur-reverence, you would say; what truth? what What any thing but eating is good in her? (knowledg?) 'T would make a fool prophesie to be fed continually; What do you get? your labour and your danger; Whilst she sits bathing in her larded fury, Inspir'd with full deep Cups, who cannot prophesie? A Tinker, out of Ale, will give Predictions; But who believes?

Dio. She is a holy Druid, A woman noted for that faith, that piety, Belov'd of Heaven.

Max. Heaven knows, I do not believe it: Indeed I must confes they are excellent Juglers; Their age upon some fools too flings a confidence: But what grounds have they? what elements to work on: Show me but that; the Sieve, and Sheers? a learned one, I have no patience to dispute this Question, 'Tis so ridiculous; I think the Devil does help 'em, Or (rather mark me well) abuse 'em, Uncle; For they are as fit to deal with him; these old women, They are as jump, and squar'd out to his nature——

Dio. Thou hast a perfect malice.

Max. So I would have Against these purblind Prophets; for look ye, Sir, Old women will lie monstrously; so will the Devil, Or else he has had much wrong; upon my knowledge, Old women are malicious; so is he; They are proud and covetous, revengeful, lecherous; All which are excellent attributes of the Devil; They would at least seem holy; so would he; And to vail over these villainies, they would prophesie; He gives them leave now and then to use their cunningings, Which is, to kill a Cow, or blast a Harvest,

Make young Pigs pipe themselves to death, choak poultry,
And chase a dairy-wench into a fever
With pumping for her butter.

But when he makes these Agents to raise Emperours,
When he disposes Fortune as his Servant,
And ties her to old wives tails——

Dio. Gothy ways,
Thou art a learned Scholar, against credit,
You hear the Prophecie?

Max. Yes, and I laugh at it;
And so will any man can tell but twenty,
That is not blind, as you are blind and ignorant:
Do you think she knows your fortune?

Dio. I do think it.
Max. I know she has the name of a rare Sooth-sayer;
But do you in your Conscience believe her holy?
Inspir'd with such prophetick Fire?

Dio. Yes, in my conscience.
Max. And that you must upon necessity,
From her words, be a Cesar?

Dio. If I live.
Max. There's one stop yet.
Dio. And follow her directions.

Max. But do not juggle with me.
Dio. In faith, Cousin,
So full a truth hangs ever on her Prophecies,
That how I should think otherwise.

Max. Very well, Sir;
You then believe (for methinks 'tis most necessary)
She knows her own Fate?

Dio. I believe it certain.
Max. Dare you but be so wise to let me try it,
For I stand doubtful.

Dio. How?
Max. Come nearer to me,
Because her cunning Devil shall not prevent me;
Close, close, and hear; If she can turn this destiny,
I'll be of your faith too.

Dio. Forward, I fear not;
For if she knows not this, sure she knows nothing;
Enter Delphia.

I am so confident——
Max. 'Faith, so am I too,
That I shall make her Devils sides hum.

Dio. She comes here;
Go take your stand.
Max. Now holly, or you howl for't. [Exit.]

Dio. 'Tis pity this young man should be so stubborn.
Valiant he is, and to his valour temperate,
Only distrustful of delays in Fortune;
I love him dearly well.

Del. Now, my Son Diocles,
Are ye not weary of your game to day?
And are ye well?

Dio. Yes, Mother, well and lusty,
Only ye make me hunt for empty shadows. (day:
Del. You must have patience, Rome was not built in one
And he that hopes, must give his hopes their Currents.
You have kill'd a mighty Boar.

Dio. But I am no Emperour:
Why do you fool me thus, and make me follow
Your flattering expectation hour by hour?

Rise early, and sleep late? to feed your appetites,
Forget my Trade, my Arms? forsake mine honour,
Labour and sweat to arrive at a base memory?
Oppose my self to hazards of all sorts,
Only to win the barbarous name of Butcher?

Del. Son, you are wise.
Dio. But you are cunning, Mother;
And with that Cunning, and the faith I give you,
Ye lead me blindly to no end, no honour:
You find ye are daily fed, you take no labour;
Your family at ease, they know no market,
And therefore to maintain this, you speak darkly,

As darkly still ye nourish it, whilst I,
Being a credulous and obsequious Coxcomb,
Hunt daily, and sweat hourly, to find out
To clear your mystery; kill Boar on Boar,
And make your Spits and Pots bow with my Bounties;
Yet I still poorer, further still——

Del. Be provident,
And tempt not the gods dooms; stop not the glory
They are ready to fix on ye. Ye are a fool then;
Chearful and grateful takers, the gods love,
And such as wait their pleasures with full hopes;
The doubtful and distrustful man Heaven frowns at.
What I have told you by my inspiration,
I tell ye once again, must, and shall find ye.

Dio. But when? or how?
Del. Cum Aprum interfeceris.
Dio. I have kill'd many.

Del. Not the Boar they point ye;
Nor must I reveal further, till you clear it.
The lots of glorious men are wrapt in mysteries,
And so deliver'd; common and slight Creatures,
That have their ends as open as their actions,
Ease and open fortunes follow.

Max. I shall try
How deep your inspiration lies hid in ye,
And whether your brave spirit have a buckler
To keep this arrow off, I'll make you smoke else.

Dio. Knowing my fortune so precisely, punctually,
And that it must fall without contradiction,
Being a stranger, of no tie unto ye,
Methinks you should be studied in your own,
In your own destiny, methinks, most perfect,
And every hour, and every minute, Mother,
So great a care should Heaven have of her Ministers;
Methinks your fortunes both ways should appear to ye,
Both to avoid and take. Can the Stars now,
And all those influences you receive into you,
Or secret inspirations ye make shew of,
If an hard fortune hung, and were now ready
To pour it self upon your life, deliver ye?
Can they now say, take heed?

Del. Ha? pray ye come hither. (ye,
Max. I would know that; I fear your Devil will cozen
And stand as close as ye can, I shall be with ye.

Del. I find a present ill.
Dio. How?
Del. But I scorn it.

Max. Do ye so? do ye so?
Del. Yes, and laugh at it, Diocles.

Is it not strange these wild and foolish men
Should dare to oppose the power of Destiny?
That power the gods shake at? Look yonder, Son.

Max. Have ye spy'd me? then have at ye.
Del. Do, shoot boldly,
Hit me, and spare not, if thou canst.

Dio. Shoot, Cousin.
Max. I cannot; mine arm's dead, I have no feeling;
Or if I could shoot, so strong is her arm'd Vertue,
She would catch the arrow flying.

Del. Poor doubtful people,
I pity your weak faiths.
Dio. Your mercy, Mother,
And from this hour a Deity I crown ye.

Del. No more of that.
Max. O let my Prayers prevail too,
Here like a tree, I dwell else; free me, Mother,
And greater than great Fortune, I'll adore thee.

Del. Be free again, and have more pure thoughts in ye.
Dio. Now I believe your words most constantly,
And when I have that power ye have promis'd to me.
Del. Remember then your Vow, my Niece Drusilla,
I mean to marry her, and then ye prosper.

Dio. I shall forget my life else.
Del. I am a poor weak woman, to me no worship.

Enter

Enter Niger, Geta, and Souldiers.

Get. And shall he have as you say, that kills this Aper?

Del. Now mark and understand.

Nig. The Proscription's up
I'th' Market place, 'tis up, there ye may read it,
He shall have half the Empire.

Get. A pretty farm i' faith.

Nig. And the Emperours Sister, bright Aurelia,
Her to his wife.

Get. Ye say well, Friend, but hark ye,
Who shall do this?

Nig. You, if you dare.

Get. I think so;

Yet I could poyson him in a Pot of Perry,
He loves that veng'ancely; But when I have done this,
May I lye with the Gentlewoman?

Nig. Lye with her? what else, man?

Get. Yes, man,

I have known a man married that never lay with his Wife:
Those dancing days are done.

Nig. These are old Souldiers,
And poor it seems, I'll try their appetites.
'Save ye, brave Souldiers.

Max. Sir, ye talkt of Proscriptions?

Nig. 'Tis true, there is one set up from the Emperour
Against Volutius Aper.

Dio. Aper?

Del. Now;

Now have you found the Boar?

Dio. I have the meaning;

And blessed Mother——

Nig. He has scorn'd his Master,
And bloodily cut off by treachery
The noble Brother to him.

Dio. He lives here, Sir,
Sickly and weak.

Nig. Did you see him?

Max. No.

Nig. He is murdered;

So ye shall find it mentioned from the Emperour;
And honest faithful Souldiers, but believe it;
For, by the gods, ye will find it so, he is murdered,
The manner how, read in the large Proscription.

Del. It is most true, Son; and he cozens ye,
Aper's a Villain false.

Dio. I thank ye, Mother,
And dare believe ye; hark ye, Sir, the recompence?
As ye related.

Nig. Is as firm as faith, Sir;
Bring him alive or dead.

Max. You took a fit time, (him not,
The General being out o' th' Town; for though we love
Yet had he known this first, you had paid for't dearly.

Dio. 'Tis Niger, now I know him; honest Niger,
A true sound man, and I believe him constantly;
Your business may be done, make no great hurry
For your own safety.

Nig. No, I am gone; I thank ye. [Exit.

Dio. Pray, Maximinian, pray.

Max. I'll pray, and work too.

Dio. I'll to the Market-place, and read the offer,
And now I have found the Boar.

Del. Find your own faith too,
And remember what ye have vow'd.

Dio. O Mother,

Del. Prosper. (ours,

Get. If my master and I do this, there's two Empe-
And what a show will that make? how we shall bounce it?

[Exeunt.

Aetus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Drusilla, and Delphia.

Dru. Leave us, and not vouchsafe a parting kiss
To her that in his hopes of greatnets lives,
And goes along with him in all his dangers?

Del. I grant 'twas most inhumane.

Dru. O, you give it

Too mild a name; 'twas more than barbarous,
And you a Partner in't.

Del. I, Drusilla?

Dru. Yes,

You have blown his swoln Pride to that vastness,
As he believes the Earth is in his fathom,
This makes him quite forget his humble Being;
And can I hope that he, that only fed
With the imagin'd food of future Empire,
Disdains even those that gave him means and life
To nourish such desires, when he's possess'd
Of his ambitious ends (which must fall on him,
Or your Predictions are false) will ever
Descend to look on me!

Del. Were his intents

Perfidious as the Seas or Winds, his heart
Compos'd of falshood; yet the benefit,
The greatnets of the good he has from you,
(For what I have confer'd, is thine, Drusilla)
Must make him firm, and thankful; But if all
Remembrance of the debts he stands engag'd for,
Find a quick Grave in his Ingratitude,
My powerful Art, that guides him to this height
Shall make him curse the hour he e'r was rais'd,
Or sink him to the Centre.

Dru. I had rather

Your Art could force him to return that ardour
To me, I bear to him; or give me power
To moderate my passions; yet I know not,
I should repent your grant, though you had sign'd it,
(So well I find he's worthy of all service)
But to believe that any check to him
In his main hopes, could yield content to me,
Were treason to true love, that knows no pleasure;
The object that it dotes on ill affected.

Del. Pretty simplicity; I love thee for't,

And will not sit an idle looker on,
And see it cozen'd; dry thy innocent eyes,
And cast off jealous fears, (yet promises
Are but lip comfort) and but fancy ought
That's possible in Nature, or in Art,
That may advance thy comfort, and be bold
To tell thy Soul 'tis thine; therefore speak freely.

Dru. You new create me. To conceal from you

My virgin-fondness, were to hide my sickness
From my Physician! O dear Aunt, I languish
For want of Diocles's sight; he is the Sun
That keeps my blood in a perpetual Spring;
But in his absence, cold-benumbing Winter
Seizes on all my faculties. Would you bind me
(That am your Slave already) in more fetters,
And (in the place of service) to adore you?

O bear me then (but 'tis impossible;

I fear to be effected) where I may
See how my Diocles breaks thro'ow his dangers,
And in what heaps his honours flow upon him,
That I may meet him, in the height and pride
Of all his glories; and there (as your gift)
Challenge him as mine own.

Del. Enjoy thy wishes;

This is an easie Boon, which at thy years,
I could have given to any; but now grown

Perfect in all the hidden mysteries
Of that inimitable Art, which makes us
Equal even to the gods, and Natures wonders,
It shall be done, as fits my skill and glory:
To break thorow bolts, and locks, a Scholars prize
For Thieves, and Pick-locks: to pass thorow an Army
Cover'd with night, or some disguise, the practice
Of poor and needy Spies: No, my Drusilla,
From Ceres I will force her winged Dragons,
And in the air hung over the Tribunal;
(The Musick of the Spheres attending on us.)
There, as his good Star, thou shalt shine upon him,
If he prove true, and as his Angel guard him.
But if he dare be false, I, in a moment
Will put that glorious light out, with such horreur,
As if the eternal Night had seiz'd the Sun,
Or all things were return'd to the first Châos,
And then appear like Furies.

Dru. I will do

What e're you shall command.

Del. Rest then assur'd,

I am the Mistress of my Art, and fear not.

[Exeunt.

[Soft Musick.

SCENE II.

Enter Aper, Camurius, Guard, a Litter covered.

Aper. Your care of your sick Emperour, fellow-fouldiers,
In colours to the life, doth shew your love,
And zealous duty: O continue in it.
And though I know you long to see and hear him,
Impute it not to pride, or Melancholy,
That keeps you from your wishes: such State-vices (Too too familiar with great Princes) are Strangers to all the actions of the life
Of good Numerianus: Let your patience
Be the Physitian to his wounded eyes,
(Wounded with pious sorrow for his Father)
Which time and your strong Patience will recover,
Provided it prove constant.

1 Guard. If he counterfeit,
I will hereafter trust a prodigal heir,
When he weeps at his Fathers Funeral. (band,

2 Guard. Or a young widow following a bed-rid hus-
(After a three years groaning) to the Fire.

3 Guard. Note his humility, and with what soft murmurs
He does enquire his pleasures.

1 Guard. And how soon
He is instructed.

2 Guard. How he bows again too.

Aper. All your commands (dread Cesar) I'll impart
To your most ready Souldier, to obey them;
So take your rest in peace. It is the pleasure
Of mighty Cesar (his thanks still remembred
For your long patience, which a donative,
Fitting his State to give, shall quickly follow)
That you continue a strict Guard upon
His sacred person, and admit no stranger
Of any other Legion, to come near him;
You being most trusted by him. I receive
Your answer in your silence. Now, Camurius,
Speak without flattery; Hath thy Aper acted
This passion to the life?

Cam. I would applaud him,
Were he saluted Cesar: but I fear
These long protracted counsels will undo us;
And 'tis beyond my reason, he being dead,
You should conceal your self, or hope it can Continue undiscover'd.

Aper. That I have kill'd him,
Yet feed these ignorant fools with hopes he lives,
Has a main end in't. The Pannonian Cohorts
(That are my own, and sure) are not come up,
The German Legions waver, and Charinus
(Brother to this dead dog) (hells plagues on Niger)

Is jealous of the murther; and, I hear,
Is marching up against me. 'Tis not safe,
Till I have power, to justify the Act,
To shew my self the authour: be therefore careful
For an hour or two (till I have fully sounded
How the Tribunes and Centurions stand affected)
That none come near the Litter. If I find them
Firm on my part, I dare profess my self,
And then live Aper's equal.

Cam. Does not the body
Begin to putrifie?

Aper. That exacts my haste:
When, but even now, I feign'd obedience to it,
As I had some great business to impart,
The scent had almost choak'd me: be therefore curious:
All keep at distance. [Exit.

Cam. I am taught my part;
Haste you to perfect yours.

1 Guard. I had rather meet
An enemy in the field, than stand thus nodding
Like to a rug-gown'd Watch-man.

Enter Diocles, Maximinian, Geta.

Geta. The Watch at noon?
This is a new device.

Cam. Stand.

Dio. I am arm'd
Against all danger.

Max. If I fear to follow,
A Cowards name pursue me.

Dio. Now my Fate
Guide and direct me.

Cam. You are rude and sawcy,
With your forbidden feet to touch this ground,
Sacred to Cesar only, and to these
That do attend his person; Speak, what are you?

Dio. What thou, nor any of thy faction are,
Nor ever were: Souldiers, and honest men.

Cam. So blunt?

Geta. Nay, you shall find he's good at the sharp too.

Dio. No instruments of craft: engines of murther,
That serve the Emperour only with oil'd tongues,
Sooth and applaud his vices, play the Bauds
To all his appetites; and when you have wrought
So far upon his weakness, that he's grown
Odious to the subject and himself,
And can no further help your wicked ends,
You rid him out of the way.

Cam. Treason?

Dio. 'Tis truth,
And I will make it good.

Cam. Lay hands upon 'em,
Or kill them suddenly.

Geta. I am out at that;
I do not like the sport.

Dio. What's he that is
Owner of any vertue worth a Roman,
Or does retain the memory of the Oath
He made to Cesar, that dares lift his Sword
Against the man that (careless of his life)
Comes to discover such a horrid Treason,
As when you hear't, and understand how long
Y'ave been abus'd, will run you mad with fury?
I am no stranger, but (like you) a Souldier,
Train'd up one from my youth: and there are some
With whom I have serv'd, and (not to praise my self)
Must needs confess they have seen Diocles
In the late Britain wars, both dare and do
Beyond a common man.

1 Guard. Diocles?

2 Guard. I know him,
The bravest Souldier of the Empire.

Cam. Stand:
If thou advance an inch, thou art dead. [Dio. kills Camu.

Dio.

Dio. Die thou,
That durst oppose thy self against a truth
That will break out, though mountains cover it.

Get. I fear this is a sucking Pig; no Boar,
He falls so easie.

Dio. Hear me, fellow Souldiers;
And if I make it not apparent to you
This is an act of Justice, and no Murther,
Cut me in pieces; I'll disperse the cloud
That hath so long obscur'd a bloody act
Ne'r equal'd yet: you all knew with what favours
The good Numerianus ever grac't
The Provost Aper?

Guard. True.

Dio. And that those bounties
Should have contain'd him (if he e're had learn'd
The Elements of honesty and truth)
In loyal duty: But ambition never
Looks backward on desert, but with blind haste
Boldly runs on. But I lose time. You are here
Commanded by this Aper to attend
The Emperours person; to admit no stranger
To have access to him, or come near his Litter,
Under pretence (forsooth) his eyes are sore,
And his minde troubled: no, my friends, you are cozen'd;
The good Numerianus now is past
The sence of wrong or injury.

Guard. How, dead?

Dio. Let your own eyes inform you.

Get. An Emperours Cabinet?
Fough, I have known a Charnel-house smell sweeter.
If Emperours flesh have this favour, what will mine do,
When I am rotten?

1 Guard. Most unheard of villany.

2 Guard. And with all cruelty to be reveng'd.

3 Guard. Who is the murtherer? name him, that we may Punish it in his family.

Dio. Who but Aper?

The barbarous and most ingrateful Aper,
His desperate Poniard printed on his breast
This deadly wound: hate to vow'd enemies
Finds a full satisfaction in death;
And Tyrants seek no farther. He (a Subject,
And bound by all the Ties of love and duty)
Ended not so; but does deny his Prince (Whose ghost forbad passage to his rest,
Mourns by the Stygian shore) his Funeral-Rites.
Nay, weep not; let your loves speak in your anger;
And, to confirm you gave no suffrage to
The damned Plot, lend me your helping hands
To wreak the Parricide: and if you find
That there is worth in Diocles to deserve it,
Make him your leader.

Guard. A Diocles, a Diocles.

Dio. We'll force him from his Guards. And now, my
If you have any good for me in store, (Stars,
Shew it, when I have slain this fatal Boar. [Exeunt.

SCENE III.

Enter Delphia and Drusilla, in a Throne drawn by Dragons.

Del. Fix here, and rest a while your Sail-stretch'd wings
That have out-strip'd the winds: the eye of Heaven
Durst not behold your speed, but hid it self
Behind the grossest clouds; and the pale Moon
Pluckt in her silver horns, trembling for fear
That my strong Spells should force her from her Sphere;
Such is the power of Art.

Dru. Good Aunt, where are we?

Del. Look down, Drusilla, on these lofty Towers,
These spacious streets, where every private house
Appears a Palace to receive a King:
The site, the wealth, the beauty of the place,

Will soon inform thee 'tis imperious Rome,
Rome, the great Mistress of the conquer'd world.

Dru. But without Diocles, it is to me
Like any wilderness we have pass'd o're:
Shall I not see him?

Del. Yes, and in full glory,
And glut thy greedy eyes with looking on
His prosperous success: Contain thy self;
For though all things beneath us are transparent,
The sharpest sighted, were he Eagle-ey'd,
Cannot discover us: nor will we hang
Idle Spectators to behold his triumph:

*Enter Diocles, Maximinian, Guard, Aper,
Senators, Geta, Officers, with Litter.*

But when occasion shall present it self,
Do something to add to it. See, he comes.

Dru. How god-like he appears! with such a grace
The Giants that attempted to scale Heaven,
When they lay dead on the Phlegrean plain,
Mars did appear to Jove.

Del. Forbear.

Dio. Look on this,
And when with horror thou hast view'd thy deed,
(Thy most accursed deed) be thine own judge,
And see (thy guilt consider'd) if thou canst
Perswade thy self (whom thou stand'st bound to hate)
To hope or plead for mercy.

Aper. I confess
My life's a burden to me.

Dio. Thou art like thy name,
A cruel Boar, whose snout hath rooted up
The fruitfull Vineyard of the common-wealth:
I long have hunted for thee, and since now
Thou art in the Toyl, it is in vain to hope
Thou ever shalt break out: thou dost deserve
The Hangmans hook, or to be punished
More majorum, whipt with rods to death,
Or any way, that were more terrible.

Yet, since my future fate depends upon thee,
Thus, to fulfill great Delphia's Prophecie,
Aper (thou fatal Boar) receive the honour [Kills Aper.
To fall by Diocles hand. Shine clear, my Stars,
That usher'd me to taste this common air
In my entrance to the world, and give applause
To this great work. [Musick

Del. Strike Musick from the Spheres.

Dru. O now you honour me.

Dio. Ha! in the Air!

All. Miraculous.

Max. This shews the gods approve
The Person, and the Act: then if the Senate
(For in their eyes I read the Souldiers love)
Think Diocles worthy to supply the place
Of dead Numerianus, as he stands
His Heir, in his revenge, with one consent
Salute him Emperour.

Senat. Long live Diocles:
Augustus, Pater Patriæ, and all Titles,
That are peculiar only to the Cæsars,
We gladly throw upon him.

Guard. We confirm it,
And will defend his honour with our Swords
Against the world: raise him to the Tribunal.

1 Sen. Fetch the Imperial Robes: and as a sign
We give him absolute power of life and death,
Bind this Sword to his side.

2 Sen. Omit no Ceremony
That may be for his honour.

SONG.

Max. Still the gods
Express that they are pleas'd with this election.
Geta. My Master is an Emperour, and I feel

A Senators Itch upon me : would I could hire
These fine invisible Fiddlers to play to me
At my instalment.

Dio. I embrace your loves,
And hope the honours that you heap upon me,
Shall be with strength supported. It shall be
My studie to appear another Atlas,
To stand firm underneath this heaven of Empire,
And bear it boldly. I desire no Titles,
But as I shall deserve 'em. I will keep
The name I had, being a private man,
Only with some small difference ; I will add
To Diocles but two short syllables,
And be called Dioclesianus.

Geta. That is fine :
I'll follow the fashion ; and when I am a Senator,
I will be no more plain Geta, but be call'd
Lord Getianus.

Dru. He ne'er thinks of me,
Nor of your favour.

Enter Niger.

Del. If he dares prove false,
These glories shall be to him as a dream,
Or an enchanted banquet.

Niger. From Charinus,
From great Charinus, who with joy hath heard
Of your proceedings, and confirms your honours :
He, with his beauteous Sister, fair Aurelia,
Are come in person, like themselves attended
To gratulate your fortune. [Loūd Musick.]

Enter Charinus, Aurelia, Attendants.

Dio. For thy news,
Be thou in France Pro-consul : let us meet
The Emperour with all honour, and embrace him.

Dru. O Aunt, I fear this Princess doth eclipse
Th' opinion of my beauty, though I were
My self to be the judge.

Del. Rely on me.

Char. 'Tis vertue, and not birth that makes us noble :
Great actions speak great minds, and such should govern ;
And you are grac't with both. Thus, as a Brother,
A fellow, and Co-partner in the Empire,
I do embrace you : may we live so far
From difference, or emulous Competition,
That all the world may say, Although two Bodies,
We have one Mind.

Aur. When I look on the Trunk
Of dear Numerianus, I should wash
His wounds with tears, and pay a Sisters sorrow
To his sad fate : but since he lives again
In your most brave Revenge, I bow to you,
As to a power that gave him second life,
And will make good my promise. If you find
That there is worth in me that may deserve you,
And that in being your wife, I shall not bring
Disquiet and dishonour to your Bed,
Although my youth and fortune should require
Both to be su'd and sought to, here I yield
My self at your devotion.

Dio. O you gods,
Teach me how to be thankful : you have pour'd
All blessings on me, that ambitious man
Could ever fancie : till this happy minute,
I ne'er saw beauty, or believ'd there could be Perfection in a woman. I shall live
To serve and honour you : upon my knees
I thus receive you ; and, so you vouchsafe it,
This day I am doubly married ; to the Empire,
And your best-self.

Del. False and perfidious villain.——

Dru. Let me fall headlong on him : O my stars !
This I foresaw and fear'd.

Cha. Call forth a Flamen,
This knot shall now be ti'd.

Del. But I will loose it,
If Art or Hell have any strength.

Enter a Flamen, Thunder, and Lightning.

Cha. Prodigious !

Max. How soon the day's orecast !

Fla. The Signs are fatal :

Juno smiles not upon this Match, and shews too
She has her thunder.

Dio. Can there be a stop
In my full fortune ?

Cha. We are too violent,
And I repent the haste : we first should pay
Our latest duty to the dead, and then
Proceed discreetly. Let's take up the body,
And when we have plac'd his ashes in his Urn,
We'll try the gods again for wise men say,
Marriage and Obsequies do not suit one day.

[Senate Exit.]

Del. So, 'tis deferr'd yet, in despite of falshood :
Comfort Drusilla, for he shall be thine,
Or wish, in vain, he were not. I will punish [Ascend.]
His perjury to the height. Mount up, my birds ;
Some Rites I am to perform to Hecate,
To perfect my designs ; which once perform'd,
He shall be made obedient to thy Call,
Or in his ruine I will bury all. [Ascends throne.]

Actus Tertius. Scena Prima.

Enter Maximinian, (solus.)

Max. What powerful Star shin'd at this mans Nativity ?
And bless'd his homely Cradle with full glory ?
What throngs of people press and buz about him,
And with their humming flatteries sing him Cesar ?
Sing him aloud, and grow hoarse with saluting him ?
How the fierce-minded Souldier steals in to him,
Adores and courts his honour ? at his devotion
Their lives, their vertues, and their fortunes laying ?
Charinus sues, the Emperour intreats him,
And as a brighter flame, takes his beams from him.
The bless'd and bright Aurelia, she doats on him,
And, as the god of Love, burns incense to him.
All eyes live on him. Yet I am still Maximinian,
Still the same poor and wretched thing, his servant.
What have I got by this ? where lies my glory ?
How am I rais'd and honour'd ? I have gone as far
To woo this purblind honour, and have pass'd
As many dangerous Expeditions,
As noble, and as high ; nay, in his destinie
(Whilst 'twas unknown) have run as many hazards,
And done as much ; sweat thorow as many perils ;
Only the Hang-man of Voluntius Aper
(Which I mistook) has made him Emperour,
And me his slave.

Enter Delphia, and Drusilla.

Del. Stand still ; he cannot see us,
Till I please : mark him well, this discontentment
I have forc'd into him, for thy cause, Drusilla.

Max. Can the gods see this ;
See it with justice, and confer their blessings
On him, that never slung one grain of incense
Upon their Altars ? never bow'd his knee yet ;
And I that have march'd foot by foot, struck equally,
And whilst he was a gleaner, have been praying,
Contemning his base covetous ——

Del. Now we'll be open.

Max. Bless me, and with all reverence.

Del.

Del. Stand up, Son,
And wonder not at thy ungratefull Uncle :
I know thy thoughts, and I appear to ease 'em.

Max. O Mother, did I stand the tenth part to ye
Engag'd and fetter'd, as mine Uncle does,
How would I serve, how would I fall before ye ?
The poorer powers we worship.

Del. Peace, and flatter not ;
Necessitie and anger draws this from ye ;
Of both which I will quit ye : For your Uncle
I spoke this honour, and it fell upon him ;
Fell, to his full content : he has forgot me,
For all my care ; forgot me, and his vow too :
As if a dream had vanish'd, so h'as lost me,
And I him : let him now stand fast. Come hither ;
My care is now on you.

Max. O blessed Mother !

Del. Stand still, and let me work. So now, Maximilian,
Go, and appear in Court, and eye Aurelia :
Believe, what I have done, concerns ye highly.
Stand in her view, make your addresses to her :
She is the Stair of honour. I'll say no more,
But Fortune is your servant : go.

Max. With reverence ; ———

All this as holy truths. [Exit.]

Del. Believe, and prosper.

Dru. Yet all this cures not me ; but as much credit,
As much belief from Dioclesian.

Enter Geta, Lictors, and Suitors, (with Petitions.)

Del. Be not dejected ; I have warn'd ye often :
The proudest thoughts he has, I'll humble. Who's this ?
O 'tis the fool and knave grown a grave Officer :
Here's hot and high preferment.

Get. What's your Bill ?

For Gravel for the Appian way, and Pills ?
Is the way rheumatick ?

1 Suitor. 'Tis Piles, and't please you.

Get. Remove me those Piles to Port Esquiline,
Fitter the place, my friend : you shall be paid.

1 Suit. I thank your worship.

Get. Thank me when ye have it ;
Thank me another way, ye are an Ass else.
I know my office : you are for the streets, Sir.
Lord, how ye throng ! that knave has eaten Garlick ;
Whip him, and bring him back.

3 Suitor. I beseech your Worship ;

Here's an old reckoning for the dung and dirt, Sir.

Get. It stinks like thee : away. Yet let him tarry,
His Bill shall quit his Breath. Give your Petitions
In seemly sort, and keep your hat off, decently.
For scowring the water-courses thorow the Cities ?
A fine periphrafs of a kennel-raker.

Did ye scour all, my friend ? ye had some business :
Who shall scour you ? you are to be paid, I take it,
When Surgeons swear you have perform'd your office.

4 Suit. Your Worship's merry.

Get. We must be sometimes wittie,
To nick a knave ; 'tis as useful as our gravitie.
I'll take no more Petitions ; I am peester'd ;
Give me some rest.

4 Suit. I have brought the gold (and't please ye)
About the Place ye promised.

Get. See him enter'd.

How does your Daughter ?

4 Suit. Better your worship thinks of her.

Get. This is with the least. But let me see your Daughter.
'Tis a good forward maid ; I'll joyn her with ye.
I do beseech ye, leave me.

Lictor. Ye see the Edile's busie.

Get. And look to your places, or I'll make ye smoke else.
Sirrah, I drank a cup of wine at your house yesterday ;
A good smart wine.

Lictor. Send him the piece, he likes it.

Get. And ate the best wild Boar at that same Farmers.

2 Su. I have half left yet : your worship shall command it.

Get. A bit will serve : give me some rest : gods help me.
How shall I labour when I am a Senator ?

Del. 'Tis a fit place indeed. 'Save your Master ship ;
Do you know us, Sir ?

Get. These women are still troublesome.
There be houses providing for such wretched women,
And some small Rents, to set ye a spinning.

Dru. Sir,

We are no Spinsters ; nor, if you look upon us,
So wretched as you take us.

Del. Docs your Mightiness
That is a great destroyer of your Memorie,
Yet understand our faces ?

Get. 'Prethee keep off, woman ;
It is not fit I should know every creature.
Although I have been familiar with thee heretofore,
I must not know thee now : my place neglects thee.
Yet, because I daign a glimpse of your remembrances,
Give me your Suits, and wait me a month hence.

Del. Our Suits are, Sir, to see the Emperour,
The Emperour Dioclesian, to speak to him,
And not to wait on you. We have told you all, Sir.

Get. I laugh at your simplicitie, poor women :
See the Emperour ? why you are deceiv'd : now
The Emperour appears but once in seven years,
And then he shines not on such weeds as you are.
Forward, and keep your State, and keep beggers from me.

Dru. Here is a prettie youth. [Exeunt.]

Enter Diocles.

Del. He shall be prettie,
Or I will want my will, since ye are so high, Sir :
I'll raise ye higher, or my art shall fail me.
Stand close, he comes.

Dio. How am I cross'd and tortur'd ?
My most wish'd happiness, my lovely Mistris,
That must make good my hopes, and link my greatness,
Yet fever'd from mine arms ? Tell me, high heaven,
How have I sinn'd, that you should speak in thunder,
In horrid thunder, when my heart was ready
To leap into her breast ? the Priest was ready ?
The joyful virgins and the young men ready ?
When Hymen stood with all his flames about him
Blessing the bed ? the house with full joy sweating ?
And expectation, like the Roman Eagle,
Took stand, and call'd all eyes ? It was your honour ;
And e're you give it full, do you destroy it ?
Or was there some dire Star ? some Devil that did it ?
Some sad malignant Angel to mine honour ?
With you I dare not rage.

Del. With me thou canst not,
Though it was I. Nay, look not pale and frighted ;
I'll fright thee more. With me thou canst not quarrel ;
I rais'd the thunder, to rebuke thy falshood :
Look here, to her thy falshood. Now be angry,
And be as great in evil as in Empire.

Dio. Bless me, ye Powers.

Del. Thou hast full need of blessing.
'Twas I, that at thy great Inauguration,
Hung in the air unseen : 'twas I that honour'd thee
With various Musicks, and sweet sounding airs :
'Twas I inspir'd the Souldiers heart with wonder,
And made him throw himself, with love and duty,
Low at thy feet : 'twas I that fix'd him to thee,
But why did I all this ? To keep thy honestie,
Thy vow and faith ; that once forgot and slighted
Aurelia in regard, the Marriage ready,
The Priest and all the Ceremonies present,
'Twas I that thundred loud ; 'twas I that threatned ;
'Twas I that cast a dark face over heaven,
And smote ye all with terrour. Dru. Yet consider,
As ye are noble, as I have deserv'd ye ;

D d d d

For

For yet ye are free : if neither faith nor promise,
The deeds of elder times may be remembred,
Let these new-dropping tears ; for I still love ye,
These hands held up to heaven.

Dio. I must not pity ye ;

'Tis not wise in me.

Del. How ? not wise ?

Dio. Nor honourable.

A Princess is my Love, and doats upon me :
A fair and lovely Princess is my Mistress.
I am an Emperour : consider, Prophetess,
Now my embraces are for Queens and Princesses,
For Ladies of high mark, for divine beauties :
To look so low as this cheap common sweetness,
Would speak me base, my names and glories nothing.

I grant I made a vow ; what was I then ?
As the is now, of no fort, (hope made me promise)
But now I am ; to keep this vow, were monstrous,
A madness, and a low inglorious fondness.

Del. Take heed, proud man.

Drus. Princes may love with Titles,
But I with Truth.

Del. Take heed ; here stands thy destinie ;
Thy Fate here follows.

Dio. Thou doating Sorceress,
Wouldst have me love this thing, that is not worthy
To kneel unto my Saint ? to kiss her shadow ?
Great Princes are her slaves ; selected beauties
Bow at her beck : the mighty Persian's Daughter
(Bright as the breaking East, as mid-day glorious)
Waits her commands, and grows proud in her pleasures.
I'll see her honour'd : some Match I shall think of,
That shall advance ye both ; mean time I'll favour ye. [Exit.]

Del. Mean time I'll haunt thee. Cry not (wench) be con-
E're long, thou shalt more pity him (observe me) (fident,
And pity him in truth, than now thou seek'st him :
My art and I are yet companions. Come, Girl. [Exeunt.]

SCENE II.

Enter Geta, Lictors.

Get. I am too merciful, I find it, friends,
Of too soft a nature to be an Officer ;
I bear too much remorse.

1 Lict. 'Tis your own fault, Sir ;
For look you, one so newly warm in Office
Should lay about him blindfold, like true Justice,
Hit where it will : the more ye whip and hang, Sir,
(Though without cause ; let that declare it self afterward)
The more ye are admired.

Get. I think I shall be. ———

2 Lict. Your worship is a man of a spare body,
And prone to anger.

Get. Nay, I will be angry,
And, the best is, I need not shew my reason.

2 Lict. You need not, Sir, your place is without reason ;
And what you want in growth and full proportion,
Make up in rule and rigour.

Get. A rare Counsellor ;
Instru't me further. Is it fit, my friends,
The Emperour my Master Dioclesian
Should now remember or the times or manners
That call'd him plain down Diocles ?

1 Lict. He must not,
It stands not with his Royaltie.

Get. I grant ye,
I being then the Edile Getianus,
A man of place, and Judge, is it held requisite
I should commit to my consideration
Those Rascals of removed and ragged hours,
That with unreverend mouths call'd me Slave Geta ?

2 Lict. You must forget their names ; your honour bids

Get. I do forget ; but I'll hang their natures : (ye.
I will ascend my place, which is of Justice ;

And mercy, I forget thee. Suitor. A rare Magistrate !
Another Solon sure.

Get. Bring out the offenders.

1 Lict. There are none yet, Sir, but no doubt there will be.
But if you please touch some things of those natures.

Get. And am I ready, and mine anger too ?
The melancholy of a Magistrate upon me,
And no offenders to execute my fury ?

Ha ? no offenders, knaves ?

1 Lict. There are knaves indeed, Sir,
But we hope shortly to have 'em for your worship.

Get. No men to hang or whip ? are you good officers,
That provide no fuel for a Judges fury ?
In this place something must be done ; this Chair, I tell ye,
When I sit down, must favour of Severitie :
Therefore I warn ye all, bring me lewd people,
Or likely to be lewd ; twigs must be cropt too :

Let me have evil persons in abundance,
Or make 'em evil ; 'tis all one, do but say so,
That I may have fit matter for a Magistrate ;
And let me work. If I sit empty once more,
And lose my longing, as I am true Edile,
And as I hope to rectifie my Countrie,
You are those scabs I will scratch off from the Common-
You are these Rascals of the State I treat of, (wealth ;
And you shall find and feel. ———

2 Lict. You shall have many,
Many notorious people.

Get. Let 'em be people,
And take ye notorious to your selves. Mark me, my Lictors,
And you, the rest of my Officials ;
If I be angry, as my place will ask it,
And want fit matter to dispose my Authoritie,
I'll hang a hundred of ye : I'll not stay longer,
Nor enquire no further into your offences :
It is sufficient that I find no Criminals,
And therefore I must make some : if I cannot,
Suffer my self ; for so runs my Commission.

Suitor. An admirable, zealous and true Justice

1 Lict. I cannot hold : if there be any people,
Of what degree foever, or what qualitie,
That would behold the wonderful works of Justice
In a new Officer, a man conceal'd yet,
Let him repair, and see, and hear, and wonder
At the most wise and gracious Getianus.

Enter Delphia, and Drusilla.

Get. This qualifies a little. What are these ?

Del. You shall not mourn still : times of recreation,
To allay this sadness, must be sought. What's here ?
A superstitious flock of senseless people
Worshipping a sign in Office ?

Get. Lay hold on her,
And hold her fast,
She'll slip thorow your fingers like an Eel else ;
I know her tricks : hold her, I say, and bind her,
Or hang her first, and then I'll tell her wherefore.

Del. What have I done ?

Get. Thou hast done enough to undo thee ; (warrant,
Thou hast pressed to the Emperours presence without my
I being his key and image.

Del. You are an image indeed,
And of the courtest stuff, and the worst making (Affe.
That e're I look'd on yet : I'll make as good an image of an
Get. Besides, thou art a woman of a lewd life.

Del. I am no whore, Sir, nor no common fame
Has yet proclaim'd me to the people, vitious.

Get. Thou art to me a damnable lewd woman,
Which is as much as all the people swore it ;
I know thou art a keeper of tame Devils :
And whereas great and grave men of my place
Can by the Laws be allow'd but one apiece,
For their own services and recreations ;

Thou,

Thou, like a traitorous quean; keepst twenty devils;
Twenty in ordinary.

Del. Pray ye, Sir, be pacified,
If that be all: and if ye want a servant,
You shall have one of mine shall serve for nothing;
Faithful, and diligent, and a wise Devil too;
Think for what end.

Get. Let her alone, 'tis us'ful;
We men of business must use speedie servants:
Let me see your family.

Del. Think but one, he is ready.

Get. A Devil for intelligence? No, no,
He will lye beyond all travellers. A State Devil?
Neither; he will undo me at mine own weapon.
For execution? he will hang me too.

I would have a handfom, pleasant and a fine she-devil,
To entertain the Ladies that come to me;
A travell'd Devil too, that speaks the tongues,
And a neat carving Devil. [Musick.

Enter a she-devil.

Del. Be not fearful.

Get. A prettie brown devil i'faith; may I not kifs her?

Del. Yes, and embrace her too; she is your servant.
Fear not; her lips are cool enough.

Get. She is marvellous well mounted; what's her name?

Del. Lucifera.

Get. Come hither, Lucifera, and kifs me.

Del. Let her sit on your knee.

Get. The Chair turns: hey-boys:

Pleasant i'faith, and a fine facetious Devil. [Dance.

Del. She would whisper in your ear, and tell ye wonders.

Get. Come; what's her name?

Del. Lucifera.

Get. Come, Lucie, come, speak thy mind. I am certain

[Exeunt.

I have a kind of Glasse-house in my cod-piece.
Are these the flames of State? I am roasted over,
Over, and over-roasted. Is this Office?
The pleasure of authoritie? I'le no more on't,
Till I can punish Devils too; I'le quit it.
Some other Trade now, and some course less dangerous,
Or certainly I'le tyle again for two pence. [Exit.

SCENE III.

Enter Charinus, Aurelia, Cassana, Ambassadors, Attendants.

Aur. Never dispute with me; you cannot have her:
Nor name the greatness of your King; I scorn him:
Your knees to me are nothing; should he bow too,
It were his dutie, and my power to flight him.

Cha. She is her woman; never sue to me;
And in her power to render her, or keep her;
And she, my Silter, not to be compell'd,
Nor have her own snatch'd from her.

Amb. We desire not,
But for what ransom she shall please to think of;
Jewels, or Towns, or Provinces. Aur. No ransom,
No, not your Kings own head, his crown upon it,
And all the low subjections of his people.

Amb. Fair Princes should have tender thoughts.

Aur. Is she too good
To wait upon the mighty Emperours Sister?
What Princess of that sweetness, or that excellence,
Sprung from the proudest, and the mightiest Monarchs,
But may be highly blest to be my servant?

Cas. 'Tis most true, mighty Lady.

Aur. Has my fair usage
Made you so much despise me and your fortune,
That ye grow weary of my entertainments?
Henceforward, as ye are, I will command ye,
And as you were ordain'd my prisoner,
My slave, and one I may dispose of any way,
No more my fair Companion: tell your King so:

And if he had more Sisters, I would have 'em,
And use 'em as I please. You have your answer. (it. [Ex
Amb. We must take some other way: force must compe

Enter Maximinian.

Max. Now if thou beest a Prophetess, and canst do
Things of that wonder that thy tongue delivers,
Canst raise me too: I shall be bound to speak thee:
I half believe, confirm the other to me,
And Monuments to all succeeding Ages,
Of thee, and of thy piety. — Now she eyes me.
Now work great power of art: she moves unto me:
How sweet, how fair, and lovely her aspects are!
Her eyes like bright Eoan flames shoot thorow me.

Aur. O my fair friend, where have you been?

Max. What am I?

What does she take me for? work still, work strongly.

Aur. Where have you fled, my loves and my embraces?

Max. I am beyond my wits.

Aur. Can one poor Thunder,
Whose causes are as common as his noises,
Make ye defer your lawful and free pleasures?
Strike terrour to a Souldiers heart, a Monarchs?
Thorow all the fires of angry heaven, thorow tempests
That sing of nothing but destruction,
Even underneath the bolt of Jove, then ready,
And aiming dreadfully, I would seek you,
And flie into your arms.

Max. I shall be mighty,
And (which I never knew yet) I am goodly;
For certain, a most handfom man.

Cha. Fie, Sister,
What a forgetful weakness is this in ye?
What a light presence? these are words and offers
Due only to your husband Dioclesian;
This free behaviour only his.

Aur. 'Tis strange
That only empty names compel affections:
This man, ye see, give him what name or title,
Let it be ne're so poor, ne're so despis'd, Brother,
This lovely man. —

Max. Though I be hang'd, I'le forward:
For, certain, I am excellent, and knew not.
Aur. This rare and sweet young man, see how he looks,
Max. I'le juggle hard, dear Uncle. (Sir.
Aur. This thing, I say,
Let him be what he will, or bear what fortune,
This most unequal'd man, this spring of beauty
Deserves the bed of Juno.

Cha. You are not mad.

Max. I hope she be; I am sure I am little better.

Aur. O fair, sweet man!

Cha. For shame refrain this impudence. (blessing:
Max. Would I had her alone, that I might seal this
Sure, sure she should not beg: if this continue,
As I hope, Heaven, it will; Uncle, I'le nick ye,
I'le nick ye, by this life. Some would fear killing
In the pursuit now of so rare a venture;

Enter Diocles.

I am covetous to die for such a beauty.
Mine Uncle comes: now, if she stand, I am happie.

Cha. Be right again, for honours sake.

Dio. Fair Mistris —

Aur. What man is this? Away. What sawcy fellow?
Dare any such base groom press to salute me?
Dio. Have ye forgot me, Fair, or do you jest with me?
I'le tell ye what I am: come, pray ye look iovely.
Nothing but frowns and scorns?

Aur. Who is this fellow?

Dio. I'le tell ye who I am: I am your husband.

Aur. Husband to me?

Dio. To you. I am Dioclesian.

Max. More of this sport, and I am made, old Mother:
D d d d z Effect

effect but this thou hast begun.

Dio. I am he, Lady,

Revenge'd your Brothers death; slew cruel Aper;
I am he the Souldier courts, the Empire honours,
Your Brother loves; am he (my lovely Mistress)
Will make you Empress of the World.

Max. Still excellent;

Now I see too, mine Uncle may be cozen'd:
An Emperour may suffer like another.

Well said, old Mother, hold up this miracle.

Aur. Thou liest, thou art not he: thou a brave fellow?

Char. Is there no shame, no modesty in women?

Aur. Thou one of high and full mark?

Dio. Gods! what ails she?

Aur. Generous and noble? Fie, thou liest most basely.

Thy face, and all aspects upon thee, tell me
Thou art a poor Dalmatian Slave, a low thing,
Not worth the name of Roman; stand off farther.

Dio. What may this mean?

Aur. Come hither, my Endymion;

Come, shew thy self, and all eyes be blessed in thee.

Dio. Ha? what is this?

Aur. Thou fair star that I live by,

Look lovely on me, break into full brightness;
Look, here's a face now, of another making,
Another mold; here's a divine proportion,
Eyes fit for Phœbus self to gild the World with;
And there's a brow arch'd like the State of Heaven;
Look how it bends, and with what radiance,
As if the Synod of the gods sate under;
Look there, and wonder; now behold that fellow,
That admirable thing, cut with an Axe out. (pence,

Max. Old Woman, though I cannot give thee recom-
Yet certainly, I'll make thy name as glorious.

Dio. Is this in truth?

Char. She is mad, and you must pardon her.

Dio. She hangs upon him; see.

Char. Her fit is strong now,

Be not you passionate.

Dio. She kisses.

Char. Let her;

'Tis but the fondness of her fit.

Dio. I am fool'd,

And if I suffer this.

Char. Pray ye, friend, be pacified,

This will be off anon; she goes in.

[Exit Aurelia.

Dio. Sirrah.

Max. What say you, Sir?

Dio. How dare thy lips, thy base lips?

Max. I am your Kinsman, Sir, and no such base one;

I fought no kisses, nor I had no reason
To kick the Princess from me; 'twas no manners;
I never yet compell'd her; of her courtesie,
What she bestows, Sir, I am thankful for.

Dio. Be gone, Villain.

Max. I will, and I will go off with that glory,
And magnifie my fate.

[Exit.

Dio. Good Brother, leave me,

I am to my self a trouble now.

Char. I am sorry for't;

You'll find it but a woman-fit to try ye.

Dio. It may be so, I hope so.

Char. I am astonish'd, and what I think I blush at. [Exit.

Dio. What misery hath my fortune bred me?

And how far must I suffer? Poor and low States,
Though they know wants and hungers, know not these,
Know not these killing Fates; little contents them,
And with that little they live, Kings commanding,
And ordering both their ends and loves. O Honour!
How greedily men seek thee, and once purchased,
How many Enemies to mans peace bringst thou!
How many griefs and sorrows, that like sheers,
Like fatal Sheers, are sheering off our lives still!
How many sad Eclipses do we shine thorow!

Enter Delphia, Drusilla, vail'd.

When I presum'd I was blessed in this fair woman,

Del. Behold him now, and tell me how thou lik'st him.

Dio. When all my hopes were up, and Fortune dealt me
Even for the greatest, and the happiest Monarch,
Then to be cozen'd, to be cheated basely?

By mine own Kinsman cross'd? O villain Kinsman!

Curse of my blood; because a little younger,

A little smother fac'd; O false, false woman,

False and forgetful of thy faith; I'll kill him.

But can I kill her hate too? No, he woos not,

Nor worthy is of death, because she follows him,

Because she courts him; Shall I kill an innocent?

O Diocles! would thou hadst never known this,

Nor surfeited upon this sweet Ambition,

That now lies bitter at thy heart; O Fortune,

That thou hast none to fool, and blow like bubbles,

But Kings, and their Contents!

Del. What think you now, Girl?

Dru. Upon my life, I pity his misfortune:
See how he weeps; I cannot hold.

Del. Away, fool;

He must weep bloody tears before thou hast him.

How fare ye now, brave Dioclesian?

What! lazy in your loves? has too much pleasure

Dull'd your most mighty faculties?

Dio. Art thou there!

More to torment me? dost thou come to mock me?

Del. I do, and I do laugh at all thy sufferings:

I, that have wrought 'em, come to scorn thy wailings;

And as thou uselt her, so thou shalt prosper.

It is not in thy power to turn this destiny,

Nor stop the torrent of those miseries

(If thou neglectst her still) shall fall upon thee.

Sith that thou art dishonest, false of faith,

Proud, and dost think no Power can cross thy pleasures;

Thou wilt find a Fate above thee.

Dru. Good Aunt, speak mildly;

See how he looks and suffers.

Dio. I find and feel, woman,

That I am miserable.

Del. Thou art most miserable.

Dio. That as I am the most, I am most miserable.

But didst thou work this?

Del. Yes, and will pursue it.

Dio. Stay there, and have some pity, fair Drusilla

Let me persuade thy mercy, thou hast lov'd me,

Although I know my suit will sound unjustly

To make thy love the means to lose it self,

Have pity on me.

Dru. I will do.

Del. Peace, Niece,

Although this softness may become your love,

Your care must scorn it. Let him still contemn thee,

And still I'll work; the same affection

He ever shews to thee, be it sweet or bitter,

The same Aurelia shall shew him; no further;

Nor shall the wealth of all his Empire free this.

Dio. I must speak fair. Lovely young Maid, forgive me,

Look gently on my sorrows; you that grieve too,

I see it in your eyes, and thus I meet it.

Dru. O Aunt, I am bless'd.

Dio. Be not both young and cruel,

Again I beg it thus.

Dru. Thus, Sir, I grant it.

Enter Aurelia.

He's mine own now, Aunt.

Del. Not yet, Girl, thou art cozen'd.

(ence?

Aur. O my dear Lord, how have I wrong'd your pati-

How wandred from the truth of my affections?

How (like a wanton fool) shun'd that I lov'd most?

But you are full of goodness, to forgive, Sir,

As I of grief to beg, and shame to take it;
Sure I was not my self, some strange illusion,
Or what you please to pardon.

Dio. All, my Dearest;
All, my Delight; and with more pleasure take thee;
Than if there had been no such dream: for certain,
It was no more.

Aur. Now you have seal'd forgiveness,
I take my leave, and the gods keep your goodness.

Del. You see how kindness prospers; be but so kind
To marry her, and see then what new fortunes;
New joys and pleasures; far beyond this Lady,
Beyond her Greatness too.

Dio. I'll dye a dog first:
Now I am reconcil'd, I will enjoy her
In spite of all thy spirits, and thy witchcrafts.

Del. Thou shalt not, fool.
Dio. I will, old dotting Devil;
And wert thou any thing but air and spirit,
My Sword should tell thee.

Del. I contemn thy threatnings,
And thou shalt know I hold a power above thee.
We must remove Aurelia; Come, farewell, fool,
When thou shalt see me next, thou shalt bow to me.

Dio. Look thou appear no more to cross my pleasures.

[Exit.]

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter CHORUS.

So full of matter is our Historie,
Yet mixt I hope with sweet varietie,
The accidents not vulgar too, but rare,
And fit to be presented, that there wants
Room in this narrow Stage, and time to express
In Action to the life, our Dioclesian
In his full lustre: Yet (as the Statuary,
That by the large size of Alcides's foot,
Guess'd at his whole proportion) so we hope
Your apprehensive judgments will conceive
Out of the shadow we can only shew,
How fair the Body was; and will be pleas'd,
Out of your wonted goodness, to behold
As in a silent Mirror, what we cannot
With fit conveniency of time, allow'd
For such Presentments, cloath in vocal sounds.
Yet with such Art the Subject is convey'd,
That every Scene and passage shall be clear
Even to the grossest Understander here.

[Loud Musick.]

Dumb Shew.

Enter, at one Door, Delphia, Ambassadors,
They whisper together; they take an Oath upon her hand; She circles them (kneeling) with her Magick-rod; they rise and draw their Swords. Enter, at the other door, Dioclesian, Charinus, Maximinian, Niger, Aurelia,
Cassana, Guard; Charinus and Niger perswading Aurelia; She offers to embrace Maximini- an; Diocles draws his Sword, keeps off Maxi- minian, turns to Aurelia, kneels to her, lays his Sword at her feet, she scornfully turns away:

Delphia gives a sign; the Ambassadors and Souldiers rush upon them, seize on Aurelia, Cas- sana, Charinus, and Maximinian; Dioclesian, and others offer to rescue them; Delphia raises a mist; Exeunt Ambassadors and Prisoners, and the rest discontented.

The skilful Delphia finding by sure proof
The presence of Aurelia dim'd the Beauty
Of her Drusilla; and in spite of Charms,
The Emperour her Brother, Great Charinus,
Still urg'd her to the love of Dioclesian,
Deals with the Persian Legats, that were bound
For the Ransom of Cassana, to remove Aurelia, Maximinian, and Charinus
Out of the sight of Rome; but takes their Oaths
(In lieu of her assistance) that they shall not
On any terms, when they were in their power,
Presume to touch their lives; This yielded to,
They lye in ambush for 'em. Dioclesian
Still mad for fair Aurelia, that doted
As much on Maximinian, twice had kill'd him,
But that her frown restrain'd him: He pursues her
With all humility; but she continues
Proud and disdainful. The sign given by Delphia,
The Persians break thorow, and seize upon
Charinus and his Sister, with Maximinian,
And free Cassana. For their speedy rescue,
Enraged Dioclesian draws his Sword,
And bids his Guard assist him; Then too weak
Had been all opposition and resistance
The Persians could have made against their fury,
If Delphia by her Cunning had not rais'd
A foggy Mist, which, as a Cloud, conceal'd them,
Deceiving their Pursuers. Now be pleas'd,
That your imaginations may help you
To think them safe in Persia, and Dioclesian
For this disaster circled round with sorrow,
Yet mindful of the wrong. Their future fortunes
We will present in Action; and are bold,
In that which follows, that the most shall say,
'Twas well begun, but the End crown'd the Play.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter Diocles, Niger, Senators, Guard.

Dio. Talk not of comfort; I have broke my faith,
And the gods fight against me; and proud man,
However magnified, is but as dust
Before the raging whirl-wind of their justice.
What is it to be great? ador'd on Earth?
When the immortal Powers that are above us
Turn all our Blessings into horrid Curses,
And laugh at our resistance, or prevention
Of what they purpose? O the Furies that
I feel within me! whipt on, by their angers,
For my tormentors. Could it else have been
In Nature, that a few fugitive Persians,
Unfriended, and unarmed too, could have rob'd me
(In Rome, the World's Metropolis, and her glory;
In Rome, where I command, environ'd round
With such invincible Troops that know no fear,
But want of noble Enemies) of those jewels
I priz'd above my life, and I want power
To free them, if those gods I have provok'd
Had not given spirit to the undertakers,
And in their deed protected 'em?

Nig. Great Caesar,
Your safety does confirm you are their care,
And that howe'r their practices reach others,

You

You stand above their malice.

1 Sen. Rome in us

Offers (as means to further your revenge)
The lives of her best Citizens,
And all they stand possess'd of.

1 Guard. Do but lead us on

With that invincible and undaunted Courage
Which waited bravely on you, when you appear'd
The minion of Conquest; married rather
To glorious Victory, and we will drag
(Though all the Enemies of life conspire Against our undertakings) the proud Persian,
Out of his strongest hold.

2 Guard. Be but your self,
And do not talk but do.

3 Guard. You have hands and swords,
Limbs to make up a well proportion'd Army,
That only want in you an Head to lead us.

Dio. The gods reward your goodness; and believe,
Howe'r (for some great sin) I am mark't out
The object of their hate, though Jove stood ready
To dart his three-fold thunder on this head,
It could not fright me from a fierce pursuit
Of my revenge; I will redeem my friends,
And with my friends mine honour; at least fall
Like to my self, a Souldier.

Nig. Now we hear
Great Dioclesian speak.

Dio. Draw up our Legions,
And let it be your care (my much lov'd Niger)
To hasten the remove; And, fellow Souldiers,
Your love to me will teach you to endure
Both long and tedious Marches.

1 Guard. Dye he accurs'd
That thinks of rest or sleep, before he sets
His foot on Persian-Earth.

Nig. We know our glory;
The dignity of Rome, and what's above
All can be urg'd, the quiet of your mind
Depends upon our haste.

Dio. Remove to night;
Five days shall bring me to you.

All. Happiness

To Cesar, and glorious victory.

[Exeunt.]

Dio. The cheerfulness of my Souldiers gives assurance
Of good success abroad; if first I make
My peace at home here. There is something chides me,
And sharply tells me, that my breach of faith
To Delphia and Drusilla, is the ground
Of my misfortunes; And I must remember,
While I was lov'd, and in great Delphia's Grace,
She was as my good Angel, and bound Fortune
To prosper my designs; I must appease her;
Let others pay their Knees, their Vows, their Prayers
To weak imagin'd Powers; She is my All,
And thus I do invoke her. Knowing Delphia,
Thou more than Woman, and though thou vouchsafest
To grace the Earth with thy celestial Steps,
And taste this grosser air, thy heavenly Spirit
Hath free access to all the secret Counsels
Which a full Senate of the gods determine
When they consider man: The brass-leav'd Book
Of Fate lies open to thee, where thou read'st,
And fashionest the destinies of men
At thy wish'd pleasures; Look upon thy creature,
And as thou twice hast pleas'd to appear
To reprehend my fallhood, now vouchsafe
To see my low submission. [Delphia and Drusilla appear.]

Del. What's thy Will?
False, and unthankful, (and in that deserving
All humane sorrows) darst thou hope from me
Relief or Comfort?

Dio. Penitence does appease
Th' incens'd Powers, and Sacrifice takes off

Their heavy angers; thus I tender both;
The Master of great Rome, and in that, Lord
Of all the Sun gives heat and being to,
Thus sues for mercy; Be but as thou wert;
The Pilot to the Bark of my good fortunes,
And once more steer my actions to the Port
Of glorious Honour, and if I fall off
Hereafter from my faith to this sweet Virgin;
Joyn with those Powers that punish perjury,
To make me an example to deter
Others from being false.

Dru. Upon my soul,
You may believe him; nor did he e'r purpose
To me but nobly; he made tryal how
I could endure unkindness; I see Truth
Triumphant in his sorrow. Dearest Aunt,
Both credit him, and help him; and on assurance
That what I plead for, you cannot deny,
I raise him thus, and with this willing kiss
I seal his pardon.

Dio. O that I e'r lookt
Beyond this abstract of all womans goodness.

Del. I am thine again; thus I confirm our league;
I know thy wishes, and how much thou suffer'st
In honour for thy friends; thou shalt repair all;
For to thy Fleet I'll give a fore-right wind
To pass the Persian Gulf; remove all lets
That may molest thy Souldiers in their March
That pass by land, and destiny is false,
If thou prove not victorious; Yet remember,
When thou art rais'd up to the highest point
Of humane happiness, such as move beyond it
Must of necessity descend. Think on't,
And use those Blessings that the gods pour on you
With moderation.

Dio. As their Oracle
I hear you, and obey you, and will follow
Your grave directions.

Del. You will not repent it.

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter Niger, Geta, Guard, Souldiers, Ensigns.

Nig. How do you like your entrance to the War?
When the whole Body of the Army moves,
Shews it not gloriously?

Get. 'Tis a fine May-game;
But eating and drinking I think are forbad in't,
(I mean, with leisure) we walk on, and feed
Like hungry Boys that haste to School; or as
We carried Fish to the City, dare stay no where,
For fear our ware should stink.

1 Guard. That's the necessity
Of our speedy March.

Get. Sir, I do love my ease,
And though I hate all Seats of Judicature,
I mean in the City, for conveniency,
I still will be a Justice in the War,
And ride upon my foot-cloth. I hope a Captain
(And a gown'd-Captain too) may be dispenc'd with.
I tell you, and do not mock me, when I was poor,
I could endure like others, cold and hunger;
But since I grew rich, let but my finger ake,
Or feel but the least pain in my great Toe,
Unless I have a Doctor, mine own Doctor,
That may assure me, I am gone.

Nig. Come, fear not;
You shall want nothing.

1 Guard. We will make you fight,
As you were mad.

Get. Not too much of fighting, friend;
It is thy trade, that art a common Souldier;
We Officers, by our place, may share the spoil,
And never sweat for't.

2 Guard.

2 Guard. You shall kill for practice
But your dozen or two a day.

Get. Thou talkst as if
Thou wert lousing thy self; but yet I will make danger,
If I prove one of the Worthies, so; However,
I'll have the fear of the gods before my eyes,
And do no hurt I warrant you.

Nig. Come, march on,
And humour him for our mirth.

1 Guard. 'Tis a fine peak-Goose.

Nig. But one that fools to the Emperour, and in that,
A wife man, and a Souldier.

1 Guard. True morality.

[Exeunt.

SCENE IV.

Enter Cosroe, Cassana, Persians; and Charinus, Maximilian, Aurelia, bound, with Souldiers.

Cof. Now by the Persian gods, most truly welcome,
Encompas'd thus with tributary Kings,
I entertain you. Lend your helping hands
To seat her by me; and thus rais'd, bow all
To do her honour; O my best Cassana,
Sister, and Partner of my Life and Empire,
We'll teach thee to forget with present pleasures
Thy late Captivity; and this proud Roman,
That us'd thee as a Slave, and did disdain
A Princely Ransome, shall, if she repine,
Be forc'd by various Tortures, to adore
What she of late contemn'd.

Caf. All greatness ever
Attend Cosroe; though Persia be styl'd
The Nurse of Pomp and Pride, we'll leave to Rome
Her native Cruelty. For know, Aurelia,
A Roman Princess, and a Casars Sister
Though late, like thee captiv'd, I can forget
Thy barbarous usage; and though thou to me
(When I was in thy power) didst shew thy self,
A most insulting Tyranness, I to thee
May prove a gentle Mistriss.

Aur. O my Stars,
A Mistriss? can I live and owe that name
To flesh and blood? I was born to command,
Train'd up in Sovereignty; and I, in death
Can quit the name of Slave; she that scorns life,
May mock Captivity.

Char. Rome will be Rome
When we are nothing; and her power's the same
Which you once quak'd at.

Max. Dioclesian lives;
Hear it and tremble; Lives (thou King of Persia)
The Master of his Fortune, and his Honour;
And though by devilish arts we were surpriz'd,
And made the prey of Magick and of Theft,
And not won nobly, we shall be redeem'd,
And by a Roman War; and every wrong
We suffer here, with interest, be return'd
On the insulting doer.

1 Per. Sure these Romans
Are more than men.

2 Per. Their great hearts will not yield,
They cannot bend to any adverse Fate,
Such is their Confidence.

Cof. They then shall break.
Why, you rebellious Wretches, dare you still Contend when the last breath, or nod of mine
Marks you out for the fire? or to be made
The prey of Wolves or Vulturs? the vain name
Of Roman Legions, I slight thus, and scorn;
And for that boasted bug-bear, Dioclesian,
(Which you presume on) would he were the master
But of the spirit, to meet me in the field,
He soon should find that our immortal Squadrons,
That with full numbers ever are supply'd,

(Could it be possible they should decay)
Dare front his boldest Troops, and scatter him;
As an high to wing Falcon on her stretches,
Severs the fearful fowl. And by the Sun,
The Moon, the Winds, the nourishers of life,
And by this Sword, the instrument of death,
Since that you fly not humbly to our mercy
But yet dare hope your liberty by force;
If Dioclesian dare not attempt
To free you with his Sword, all slavery
That cruelty can find out to make you wretched;
Falls heavy on you.

Max. If the Sun keep his course,
And the Earth can bear his Souldiers march, I fear not.

Aur. Or liberty, or revenge.

Char. On that I build too.

[A Trumpet.

Aur. A Roman Trumpet!

Max. 'Tis; comes it not like
A pardon to a man condemn'd?

Cof. Admit him.

Enter Niger.

The purpose of thy coming?

Nig. My great Master,
The Lord of Rome, (in that all Power is spoken)
Hoping that thou wilt prove a noble Enemy,
And (in thy bold resistance) worth his conquest;
Desies thee, Cosroe.

Max. There is fire in this.

Nig. And to encourage thy laborious powers
To tug for Empire, dares thee to the field,
With this assurance, if thy Sword can win him,
Or force his Legions with thy barbed horse,
But to forsake their ground, that not alone
Wing'd Victory shall take stand on thy Tent,
But all the Provinces, and Kingdoms held
By the Roman Garrisons in this Eastern World,
Shall be deliver'd up, and he himself
Acknowledge thee his Sovereign. In return
Of this large offer, he asks only this,
That till the doubtful Die of War determine
Who has most power, and should command the other,
Thou wouldst entreat thy Prisoners like their Births,
And not their present Fortune; and to bring 'em,
Guarded, into thy Tent, with thy best strengths,
Thy ablest men of War, and thou thy self
Sworn to make good the place. And if he fail
(Maugre all opposition can be made)
In his own person to compel his way,
And fetch them safely off, the day is thine;
And he, like these, thy Prisoner.

Cof. Though I receive this
But as a Roman Brave, I do embrace it,
And love the sender. Tell him, I will bring
My Prisoners to the field, and without odds,
Against his single force, alone defend 'em;
Or else with equal numbers. Courage, noble Princes,
And let Posterity record, that we
This memorable day restor'd to Persia,
That Empire of the World, great Philip's Son,
Ravish'd from us, and Greece gave up to Rome.
This our strong comfort, that we cannot fall
Ingloriously, since we contend for all.

[Exeunt.

[Flourish. Alarms.

SCENE V.

Enter Geta, Guard, Souldiers.

Get. I'll swear the Peace against 'em, I am hurt,
Run for a Surgeon, or I faint.

1 Guard. Bear up, man,
'Tis but a scratch.

Get. Scoring a man o'r the Coxcomb
Is but a scratch with you! ———o' your occupation,

Your

Your scurvy scuffling trade; I was told before
My face was bad enough; but now I look
Like bloody Bone, and raw head, to fright Children;
I am for no use else.

2 Guard. Thou shalt fright men.

1 Guard. You look so terrible now; but see your face
In the Pummel of my Sword.

Get. I dye, I am gone.
Oh my sweet physiognomy.

Enter three Persians.

2 Guard. They come,
Now fight, or dye indeed.

Get. I will 'scape this way;
I cannot hold my Sword; what would you have
Of a main'd man?

1 Guard. Nay, then I have a goad
To prick you forward, Oxe.

2 Guard. Fight like a Man,
Or dye like a Dog.

Get. Shall I, like Cæsar, fall
Among my friends? no mercy? Et tu Brute?
You shall not have the honour of my death,
I'll fall by the Enemy first.

1 Guard. O brave, brave Geta, [Persians driven off.
He plays the Devil now.

Enter Niger.

Nig. Make up for honour,
The Persians shrink. The passage is laid open,
Great Dioclesian, like a second Mars,
His strong arm govern'd by the fierce Bellona,
Performs more than a man; his shield struck full
Of Persian Darts, which now are his defence
Against the Enemies Swords, still leads the way.
Of all the Persian Forces, one strong Squadron,

[Alarm's continued.

In which Cosroe in his own person fights,
Stands firm, and yet unrouted; Break thorow that,
The day, and all is ours. [Retreat.

All. Victory, Victory. [Exeunt. Flourish.

SCENE VI.

Enter, in Triumph with Roman Ensigns, Guard, Dioclesian, Charinus, Aurelia, Maximinian, Niger, Geta, Cosroe, Cassana, Persians, as Prisoners; Delphia, and Drufilla, privately.

Dio. I am rewarded in the Act; your freedome
To me's ten thousand Triumphs; You Sir, share,
In all my glories. And unkind Aurelia,
From being a Captive, still command the Victor.
Nephew, remember by whose gift you are free;
You I afford my pity; baser minds
Insult on the afflicted, you shall know,
Vertue and Courage are admir'd and lov'd
In Enemies; but more of that hereafter.
Thanks to your valour; to your Swords I owe
This Wreath triumphant. Nor be thou forgot
My first poor Bondman, Geta, I am glad
Thou art turn'd a fighter.

Get. 'Twas against my will;
But now I am content with't.

Char. But imagine
What honours can be done to you beyond these,
Transcending all example; 'tis in you
To will, in us to serve it.

Nig. We will have
His Statue of pure gold set in the Capitol,
And he that bows not to it as a god,
Makes forfeit of his head.

Max. I burst with envy;
And yet these honours, which conferr'd on me,

Would make me pace on air, seem not to move him.

Dio. Suppose this done, or were it possible
I could rise higher still, I am a man,
And all these glories, Empires heap'd upon me,
Confirm'd by constant friends, and faithful Guards,
Cannot defend me from a shaking Feaver,
Or bribe the uncorrupted Dart of Death
To spare me one short minute. Thus adorn'd
In these triumphant Robes, my body yields not
A greater shadow, than it did when I
Liv'd both poor and obscure; a Swords sharp point
Enters my flesh as far; dreams break my sleep
As when I was a private man; my passions
Are stronger tyrants on me; nor is Greatness
A saving Antidote to keep me from
A Traytors poyson. Shall I praise my fortune,
Or raise the building of my happiness
On her uncertain favour? or presume
She is mine own, and sure, that yet was never Constant to any? Should my reason fail me
(As flattery oft corrupts it) here's an example,
To speak how far her smiles are to be trusted;
The rising Sun, this morning, saw this man
The Persian Monarch, and those Subjects proud
That had the honour but to kiss his feet;
And yet e're his diurnal progress ends,
He is the scorn of Fortune: but you'll say,
That she forsook him for his want of courage,
But never leaves the bold. Now by my hopes
Of peace and quiet here, I never met
A braver Enemy; and to make it good,
Cosroe, Cassana, and the rest, be free,
And ransomless return.

Cos. To see this vertue
Is more to me than Empire; and to be
O'rcome by you, a glorious victory.

Max. What o' Devil means he next?

Dio. I know that glory
Is like Alcides's Shirt, if it stay on us
Till pride hath mixt it with our blood; nor can we
Part with it at pleasure: when we would uncase,
It brings along with it both flesh and sinews,
And leaves us living Monsters.

Max. Would it were come
To my turn to put it on: I'd run the hazard.

Dio. No, I will not be pluck'd out by the ears
Out of this glorious Castle; uncompell'd
I will surrender rather; Let it suffice
I have toucht the height of humane happiness,
And here I fix nil ultra. Hitherto
I have liv'd a servant to ambitious thoughts,
And fading glories; what remains of life,
I dedicate to Vertue; and to keep
My faith untainted, farewell Pride and Pomp,
And circumstance of glorious Majestie,
Farewel for ever. Nephew, I have noted,
That you have long with sore eyes look'd upon
My flourishing Fortune; you shall have possession
Of my felicity; I deliver up
My Empire, and this gem I priz'd above it,
And all things else that made me worth your envy,
Freely unto you. Gentle Sir, your suffrage,
To strengthen this; the Souldiers love I doubt not;
His valour, Gentlemen, will deserve your favours,
Which let my prayers further. All is yours;
But I have been too liberal, and giv'n that
I must beg back again.

Max. What am I fallen from!

Dio. Nay, start not; it is only the poor Grange,
The Patrimony which my father left me,
I would be Tenant to.

Max. Sir, I am yours;
I will attend you there.

Dio. No, keep the Court;

Seek you in Rome for honour : I will labour
To find content elsewhere. Disswade me not,
By —, I am resolv'd. And now Drusilla,
Being as poor as when I vow'd to make thee
My wife, if thy love since hath felt no change,
I am ready to perform it. Drus. I still lov'd
Your Person, not your fortunes : in a cottage,
Being yours, I am an Empress.

Del. And I'll make
The change most happy.

Dio. Do me then the honour,
To see my vow perform'd. You but attend
My Glories to the urn ; where be it ashes,
Welcom my mean estate : and as a due,
With rest to me, I honour unto you.

[Exit.]

Actus Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter CHORUS.

Cho. The War with glory ended ; and Cosroc
(Acknowledging his fealtie to Charinus)
Dismiss'd in peace, returns to Persia :
The rest, arriving safely unto Rome,
Are entertain'd with triumphs : Maximinian,
By the grace and intercession of his Uncle,
Saluted Cæsar : but good Dioclesian,
Weary of Pomp and State, retires himself
With a small Train, to a most private Grange
In Lombardie ; where the glad Countrey strives
With Rural Sports to give him entertainment :
With which delighted, he with ease forgets
All specious trifles, and securely tastes
The certain pleasures of a private life.
But oh Ambition, that eats into
With venom'd teeth, true thankfulness, and honour,
And to support her greatness, fashions fears,
Doubts, and preventions to decline all dangers,
Which in the place of safetie, prove her ruine :
All which be pleas'd to see in Maximinian,
To whom, his confer'd Soveraginsy was like
A large sail fill'd full with a fore-right wind,
That drowns a smaller Bark : and he once fall'n
Into ingratitude, makes no stop in mischief,
But violently runs on. Allow Maximinian all,
Honour, and Empire, absolute command ;
Yet being ill, long great he cannot stand.

[Exit.]

SCENE II.

Enter Maximinian, and Aurelia.

Aur. Why droops my Lord, my Love, my life, my Cæsar?
How ill this dulness doth comport with greatness !
Does not (with open arms) your fortune court you ?
Rome know you for her Master, I my self
Confess you for my husband ? love, and serve you ?
If you contemn not these, and think them curses,
I know no blessings that ambitious flesh
Could wish to feel beyond 'em. Max. Best Aurelia,
The parent and the nurse to all my Glories,
'Tis not that thus embracing you, I think
There is a Heaven beyond it, that begets
These sad retirements ; but the fear to lose
What it is hell to part with : better to have liv'd
Poor and obscure, and never scal'd the top
Of hilly Empire, than to die with fear
To be thrown headlong down, almost as soon
As we have reach'd it. Aur. These are Pannick terrours
You fashion to your self : Is not my Brother
(Your equal and copartner in the Empire)
Vow'd and confirm'd your friend ? the Souldier constant ?
Hath not your Uncle Dioclesian taken

His last farewell o'th' world ? What then can shake ye ?

Max. The thought I may be shaken : and assurance
That what we do possess is not our own,
But has depending on anothers favour :
For nothing's more uncertain (my Aurelia)
Than power that stands not on his proper Basis,
But borrows his foundation. I'll make plain
My cause of doubts and fears ; for what should I
Conceal from you, that are to be familiar
With my most private thoughts ? Is not the Empire
My Uncles gift ? and may he not resume it
Upon the least distaste ? Does not Charinus
Cross me in my detigus ? And what is Majestie
When 'tis divided ? Does not the insolent Souldier
Call my command his donative ? And what can take
More from our honour ? No (my wife Aurelia,)
If I to you am more than all the world,
As sure you are to me ; as we desire
To be secure, we must be absolute,
And know no equal : when your Brother borrows
The little splendor that he has from us,
And we are serv'd for fear, not at entreaty,
We may live safe ; but till then, we but walk
With heavie burthens on a sea of glass,
And our own weight will sink us.

Aur. Your Mother brought you
Into the world an Emperour : you perswade
But what I would have counsell'd : Nearness of blood,
Respect of pietie, and thankfulness,
And all the holy dreams of vertuous fools
Mult vanish into nothing, when Ambition
(The maker of great minds, and nurse of honour)
Puts in for Empire. On then, and forget
Your simpl' Uncle ; think he was the Master
(In being once an Emperour) of a Jewel,
Whose worth and use he knew not : For Charinus,
No more my Brother, if he be a stop
To what you purpose ; he to Me's a stranger,
And so to be remov'd. Max. Thou more than woman,
Thou masculine Greatness, to whose roaring spirit
To touch the stars seems but an easie night ;
O how I glory in thee ! those great women
Antiquitie is proud of, thou but nam'd,
Shall be no more remembred : but persevere,
And thou shalt shine among those lesser lights,

Enter Charinus, Niger, Guard.

To all posteritie like another Phebe,
And so ador'd as she is. Aur. Here's Charinus,
His brow furrow'd with anger.

Max. Let him storm,
And you shall hear me thunder. Cha. He dispose of
My Provinces at his pleasure ? and confer
Those honours (that are only mine to give)
Upon his creatures ? Nig. Mighty Sir, ascribe it
To his assurance of your love and favour,
And not to pride or malice. Cha. No, good Niger,
Courtesie shall not fool me ; he shall know
I lent a hand to raise him, and defend him,
While he continues good : but the same strength
If pride make him usurp upon my Right,
Shall strike him to the Center. You are well met, Sir.

Max. As you make the Encounter : Sir, I hear,
That you repine, and hold your self much griev'd,
In that, without your good leave, I bestow'd
The Gallian Proconsulship upon
A follower of mine. Cha. 'Tis true : and wonder
You durst attempt it.

Max. Durst, Charinus ? Cha. Durst :
Again, I speak it : Think you me so tame,
So leaden and unactive, to sit down
With such dishonour ? But, recal your grant,
And speedily ; or by the Roman —
Thou triplst thine own heels up, and hast no part

E. e. e. e

In

In Rome, or in the Empire. Max. Thou hast none,
But by permission: Alas, poor Charinus,
Thou shadow of an Emperour, I scorn thee,
Thee, and thy foolish threats: the gods appoint him
The absolute disposer of the Earth,
That has the sharpest sword. I am sure, Charinus,
Thou wear'st one without edge. When cruel Aper
Had kill'd Numerianus, thy Brother,
(An act that would have made a trembling coward
More daring than Alcides) thy base fear
Made thee wink at it: then rose up my Uncle
(For the honour of the Empire, and of Rome)
Against the Traitor, and among his Guards
Punish'd the treason: This bold daring act
Got him the Souldiers suffrages to be Cesar.
And howsoever his too gentle nature
Allow'd thee the name only, as his gift,
I challenge the succession.

Cha. Thou are cozen'd.
When the receiver of a courtesie
Cannot sustain the weight it carries with it,
'Tis but a Trial, not a present Act.
Thou hast in a few dayes of thy short Reign,
In over-weening pride, riot and lusts,
Sham'd noble Dioclesian, and his gift:
Nor doubt I, when it shall arrive unto
His certain knowledge, how the Empire groans
Under thy Tyranny, but he will forsake
His private life, and once again resume
His laid-by Majestie: or at least, make choice
Of such an Atlas as may bear this burthen,
Too heavie for thy shoulders. To effect this,
Lend your assistance, Gentlemen, and then doubt not
But that this mushroom (sprung up in a night)
Shall as soon wither. And for you, Aurelia,
If you esteem your honour more than tribute
Paid to your loathsome appetite, as a Furie
Flic from his loose embraces: so farewell;
E're long you shall hear more.

Aur. Are you struck dumb,
That you make no reply?

Max. Sweet, I will do,
And after talk: I will prevent their plots,
And turn them on their own accursed heads.
My Uncle? good: I must not know the names
Of Pictie or Pitie. Steel my heart,
Desire of Empire, and instruct me, that
The Prince that over others would bear sway,
Checks at no Let that stops him in his way.

[Exeunt.]

[Exeunt.]

SCENE III.

Enter three Shepherds, and two Countrey-men.

1 Shep. Do you think this great man will continue here?
2 Shep. Continue here? what else? he has bought the (great Farm;

A great man, with a great Inheritance,
And all the ground about it, all the woods too;
And stock'd it like an Emperour. Now, all our sports again
And all our merry Gambols, our may-Ladies,
Our evening-daunces on the Green, our Songs,
Our Holiday good cheer, our Bag-pipes now Boyes,
Shall make the wanton Lasses skip again,
Our Sheep-sheerings, and all our knacks.

3 Shep. But hark ye,
We must not call him Emperour.

1 Count. That's all one;
He is the King of good fellows, that's no treason;
And so Ple call him still, though I be hang'd for't.
I grant ye, he has given his honour to another man,
He cannot give his humour: he is a brave fellow,
And will love us, and we'll love him. Come hither Ladon,
What new Songs, and what geers?

3 Shep. Enough: Ple tell ye

He comes abroad anon to view his grounds,
And with the help of Thirsis, and old Egon,
(If his whorson could be gon) and Amaryllis,
And some few more o'th' wenches, we will meet him,
And strike him such new springs, and such free welcomes,
Shall make him scorn an Empire, forget Majestie,
And make him blest the hour he liv'd here happy.

2 Count. And we will second ye, we honest Carters,
We lads o'th' lash, with some blunt entertainment,
Our Teams to two pence, will give him some content;
Or we'll bawl fearfully.

3 Shep. He cannot expect now
His Courtly entertainments, and his rare Musicks,
And Ladies to delight him with their voyces;
Honest and cheerful toys from honest meanings,
And the best hearts they have. We must be neat all:
On goes my russet jerkin with blue buttons.

1 Shep. And my green slops I was married in; my bonnet
With my carnation point with Silver tags, boyes:
You know where I won it.

1 Count. Thou wilt ne're be old, Alexis.

1 Shep. And I shall find some toys that have been favors,
And nose-gayes, and such knacks: for there be wenches.

3 Shep. My mantle goes on too I plaid young Paris in,
And the new garters Amaryllis sent me.

1 Count. Yes, yes: we'll all be handfom, and wash our faces.
Neighbour, I see a remnant of March duft
That's hatch'd into your chaps: I pray ye be careful,

Enter Geta.

And mundifie your muzzel.

2 Count. Ple to th' Barbers,
It shall cost me I know what. Who's this?

3 Shep. Give room, neighbours,
A great man in our State: gods blest your worship.

2 Count. Encrease your Mastership.

Get. Thanks, my good people:
Stand off, and know your duties: as I take it
You are the labouring people of this village,
And you that keep the sheep. Stand farther off yet,
And mingle not with my authoritie,
I am too mighty for your companie.

3 Shep. We know it Sir; and we desire your worship
To reckon us amongst your humble servants,
And that our Country Sports, Sir, ———

Get. For your Sports, Sir,
They may be seen, when I shall think convenient,
When out of my discretion, I shall view 'em,
And hold 'em fit for licence. Ye look upon me,
And look upon me seriously, as ye knew me:

'Tis true, I have been a Rascal, as you are,
A fellow of no mention, nor no mark,
Just such another piece of durt, so fashion'd:
But Time, that purifies all things of merit,
Has set another stamp. Come nearer now,
And be not fearfull; I take off my austeritie:
And know me for the great and mighty Steward
Under this man of honour: know ye for my vassals,
And at my pleasure I can dispeople ye,
Can blow you and your cattel out o'th' Country:
But fear me, and have favour. Come, go along with me,
And I will hear your Songs, and perhaps like 'em.

3 Shep. I hope you will, Sir.

Geta. 'Tis not a thing impossible,
Perhaps Ple sing my self, the more to grace ye,
And if I like your women.

3 Shep. We'll have the best, Sir,
Handfom young Girls.

Geta. The handfomer, the better.

Enter Delphia.

'May bring your wives too, 'twill be all one charge to ye;
For I must know your families. Del. 'Tis well said,
'Tis well said, honest friends; I know ye are hatching

Some

Some pleasurable sports for your great Landlord :
Fill him with joy, and win him a friend to ye,
And make this little Grange seem a large Empire,
Let out with home contents : I'll work his favour,
Which daily shall be on ye.

3 Shep. Then we'll sing daily,
And make him the best Sports.

Del. Instruct 'em Geta,
And be a merry man again.

Geta. Will ye lend me a devil,
That we may dance a while ?

Del. I'll lend thee two.
And Bag-pipes that shall blow alone.

Get. I thank ye :
But I'll know your devils of a cooler complexion first.
Come, follow, follow ; I'll go sit and see ye. [Exit.

Enter Diocles, and Drusilla.

Del. Do ; and be ready an hour hence, and bring 'em ;
For in the Grove you'll find him. Dio. Come Drusilla,
The partner of my best contents : I hope now
You dare believe me. Dru. Yes, and dare say to ye,
I think ye now most happy. Dio. You say true, Sweet,
For by my ———, I find now by experience,
Content was never Courtier.

Dru. I pray ye walk on, Sir ;
The cool shades of the Grove invite ye.

Dio. O my Dearest !
When man has cast off his ambitious greatness,
And sunk into the sweetness of himself ;
Built his foundation upon honest thoughts,
Not great, but good desires his daily servants ;
How quietly he sleeps ! how joyfully
He wakes again, and looks on his possessions,
And from his willing labours feeds with pleasure ?
Here hang no Comets in the shapes of Crowns,
To shake our sweet contents : nor here, Drusilla,
Cares, like Eclipses, darken our endeavours :
We love here without rivals, kiss with innocence ;
Our thoughts as gentle as our lips ; our children
The double heirs both of our forms and faiths.

Dru. I am glad ye make this right use of this sweetness,
This sweet retiredness.

Dio. 'Tis sweet indeed, love,
And every circumstance about it, shews it.
How liberal is the spring in every place here ?
The artificial Court shews but a shadow,
A painted imitation of this glory.
Smell to this flower, here nature has her excellence :
Let all the perfumes of the Empire pass this,
The carefullest Ladies cheek shew such a colour,
They are gilded and adulterate vanities.
And here in Poverty dwells noble nature.
What pains we take to cool our wines, to allay us,

[Musick below.

And bury quick the fuming god to quench us,
Methinks this Crystal Well. — Ha ! what strange Musick ?
'Tis underneath, sure : how it stirs and joys me ?
How all the birds set on ? the fields redouble
Their odoriferous sweets ? Hark how the echo's ———

Enter a Spirit from the Well.

Dru. See, Sir, those flowers
From out the Well, spring to your entertainment.

Enter Delphia.

Dio. Bless me.

Dru. Be not afraid, 'tis some good Angel
That's come to welcome ye.

Del. Go near and hear, Son. [SONG.

Dio. O Mother, thank ye, thank ye, this was your will.

Del. You shall not want delights to bless your presence.
Now ye are honest, all the Stars shall honour ye.

Enter Shepherds and dancers.

Stay, here are Country-shepherds ; here is some sport too,
And you must grace it, Sir ; 'twas meant to welcome ye ;
A King shall never feel your joy. Sit down Son.

A dance of Shepherds and Shepherdesses ; Pan leading the men, Ceres the maids.

Hold, hold, my Messenger appears : leave off, friends,
Leave off a while, and breathe.

Dio. What news ? ye are pale, Mother.

Del. No, I am careful of thy safety, Son,
Be not affrighted, but sit still ; I am with thee.

Enter Maximinian, Aurelia, Souldiers.

And now dance out your dance. Do you know that person ?
Be not amaz'd, but let him shew his dreadfullest.

Max. How confident he sits amongst his pleasures,
And what a cheerful colour shews in's face,
And yet he sees me too, the Souldiers with me.

Aur. Be speedie in your work, (you will be stooped else)
And then you are an Emperour.

Max. I will about it.

Dio. My Royal Cousin, how I joy to see ye,
You, and your Royal Emperess !

Max. You are too kinde, Sir.

I come not to eat with ye, and to surfeit
In these poor Clownish pleasures ; but to tell ye
I look upon ye like my Winding-sheet,
The Coffin of my Greatness, nay, my Grave :
For whilst you are alive ———

Dio. Alive, my Cousin ?

Max. I say, Alive. I am no Emperour ;
I am nothing but mine own disquiet. Dio. Stay, Sir.

Max. I cannot stay. The Souldiers doat upon ye.
I would fain spare ye ; but mine own securitie
Compels me to forget you are my Uncle,
Compels me to forget you made me Cesar :
For whilst you are remembred, I am buried.

Dio. Did not I make ye Emperour, dear Cousin,
The free gift from my special grace ?

Del. Fear nothing.

Dio. Did not I chuse this povertie, to raise you ?
That Royal woman gave into your arms too ?
Bless'd ye with her bright beautie ? gave the Souldiers,
The Souldier that hung to me, fix'd him on ye ?
Gave ye the worlds command ?

Max. This cannot help ye.

Dio. Yet this shall ease me. Can ye be so base, Cousin,
So far from Nobleness, so far from nature,
As to forget all this ? to tread this Tie out ?
Raise to your self so foul a monument
That every common foot shall kick a funder ?
Must my blood glue ye to your peace ?

Max. It must, Uncle ;

I stand too loose else, and my foot too feeble :
You gone once, and their love retir'd, I am rooted.

Dio. And cannot this remov'd poor State obscure me ?
I do not seek for yours, nor enquire ambitiously
After your growing fortunes. Take heed, my kinsman,
Ungratefulness and blood mingled together,
Will, like two furious Tides ———

Max. I must sail thorow 'em :

Let 'em be Tides of death, Sir, I must stem up.

Dio. Hear but this last, and wisely yet consider :
Place round about my Grange a Garison,
That if I offer to exceed my limits,

Or ever in my common talk name Emperour,
Ever converse with any greedy Souldier,
Or look for adoration, nay, for courtesie
Above the days salute. ——— Think who has fed ye,
Think, Cousin, who I am. Do ye slight my misery ?
Nay, then I charge thee ; nay, I meet thy cruelty.

Max. This cannot serve ; prepare : now fall on, souldiers,
And all the treasure that I have. [Thunder and Lightning.
Sould.

Sould. The Earth shakes ;
We totter up and down ; we cannot stand, Sir ;
Me thinks the mountains tremble too.

2 Sould. The flames
How thick and hot they come ? we shall be burn'd all.

Del. Fall on, Souldiers :
You that fell innocent blood, fall on full bravely.

Sould. We cannot stir.
Del. You have your libertie,
So have you, Lady. One of you come do it.

Do you stand amaz'd ? Look o're thy head, Maximinian,
Look to thy terrour, what over-hangs thee :
Nay, it will nail thee dead ; look how it threatens thee :
The Bolt for vengeance on ungrateful wretches ;
The Bolt of innocent blood : read those hot characters,
And spell the will of heaven. Nay, lovely Lady,
You must take part too, as spur to ambition,
Are ye humble ? Now speak ; my part's ended.
Does all your glory shake ?

Max. Hear us, great Uncle,
Cool and great Sir, be pitiful unto us :
Below your feet we lay our lives : be merciful :
Begin you, heaven will follow.

Aur. Oh, it shakes still.
Max. And dreadfully it threatens. We acknowledge
Our base and foul intentions. Stand between us ;
For faults confes'd, they say, are half forgiven.
We are sorry for our sins. Take from us, Sir,
That glorious weight that made us swell, that poison'd us ;
That mass of Majestie I laboured under,
(Too heavie and too mighty for my manage)
That my poor innocent days may turn again,
And my mind pure, may purge me of these curses ;

By your old love, the blood that runs between us.

[The hand taken in.

Aur. By that love once ye bare to me, by that Sir,
That blessed maid enjoys ———

Dio. Rise up, dear Cousin,
And be your words your judges : I forgive ye :
Great as ye are, enjoy that greatness ever,
Whilst I mine own content make mine own Empire.
Once more I give ye all ; learn to deserve it,
And live to love your Good more than your Greatness.
Now shew your loves to entertain this Emperour
My honest neighbours. Geta, see all handsom.
Your Grace must pardon us, our house is little ;
But such an ample welcom as a poor man
And his true love can make you and your Empress.
Madam, we have no dainties.

Aur. 'Tis enough, Sir ;
We shall enjoy the riches of your goodness.

Sould. Long live the good and gracious Dioclesian.
Dio. I thank ye, Souldiers, I forgive your rashness.
And Royal Sir, long may they love and honour ye.

[Drums march afar off.

What Drums are those ?

Del. Meet 'em, my honest Son,
They are thy friends, Charinus and the old Souldiers
That come to rescue thee from thy hot Cousin.
But all is well, and turn all into welcoms :
Two Emperours you must entertain now.

Dio. O dear Mother,
I have will enough, but I want room and glory. (rily,

Del. That shall be my care. Sound your pipes now mer-
And all your handsom sports. Sing 'em full welcoms.

Dio. And let 'em know, our true love breeds more stories
And perfect joys, than Kings do, and their glories.

[Exeunt.

Actus Primus, Scæna Prima

Enter Neanthes, Soficles, Eraton.

Era. He General is returned then?
Nean. With much honour.
Sof. And peace concluded with the Prince of Argos?
Nean. To the Queens wishes: the conditions sign'd
So far beyond her hopes, to the advantage
Of Corinth, and the good of all her Subjects;
That though Leonidas our brave General
Ever came home a fair and great example,
He never yet return'd, or with less loss

Or more deserved honour.
Era. Have you not heard
The motives to this general good?
Nean. The main one
Was admiration first in young Agenor,
(For by that name we know the Prince of Argos)
Of our Leonidas wisdom and his valour,
Which though an enemy, first in him bred wonder;
That liking, Love succeeded that, which was Followed by a desire to be a friend
Upon what terms soever to such goodness;
They had an interview; and that their friendship

A

Might

Might with our peace be ratified, 'twas concluded,
Agenor yielding up all such strong places
 As he held in our territories, should receive
 (With a sufficient Dower, paid by the Queen)
 The fair Merione for his wife.

Era. But how
 Approves the Queen of this? since we well know
 Nor was her Highness ignorant, that her Son
 The Prince Theanor made love to this Lady,
 And in the noblest way.

Nean. Which she allowed of,
 And I have heard from some familiar with
 Her nearest secrets, she so deeply priz'd her
 Being from an Infant train'd up in her service,
 (Or to speak better, rather her own Creature)
 She once did say, That if the Prince should steal
 A Marriage without her leave, or knowledge,
 With this Merione, with a little suit
 She should grant both their pardons: whereas now
 To shew her self forsooth a Spartan Lady,
 And that 'tis in her power, now it concerns
 The common good, not alone to subdue
 Her own affections, but command her Sons;
 She has not only forc'd him with rough threats
 To leave his Mistress, but compell'd him when Agenor made his entrance into Corinth
 To wait upon his Rival.

Sof. Can it be
 The Prince should sit down with this wrong?

Nean. I know not,
 I am sure I should not.

Era. Trust me nor I,
 A Mother is a name, but put in ballance
 With a young Wench 'tis nothing; where did you leave him?

Nean. Near Vesta's Temple, for there he disinis'd me,
 And full of troubled thoughts, calling for Crates:
 He went with him, but whither, or to what purpose
 I am a stranger.

Enter Theanor and Crates.

Era. They are come back Neantbes.

The. I like the place well.

Cra. Well Sir? it is built
 As if the Architect had been a Prophet,
 And fashion'd it alone for this night's action;
 The Vaults so hollow, and the Walls so strong,
 As Dian there might suffer violence,
 And with loud shrieks in vain call Jove to help her;
 Or should he hear, his Thunder could not find
 An entrance to it.

The. I give up my self
 Wholly to thy direction, worthiest Crates;
 And yet the desperate cure that we must practice
 Is in it self so foul, and full of danger,
 That I stand doubtful whether 'twere more manly
 To dye not seeking help, or that help being
 So deadly, to pursue it.

Cra. To those reasons
 I have already urg'd, I will add these.
 For but consider Sir——

Era. It is of weight
 What e'r it be, that with such vehement action,
 Of Eye, Hand, Foot, may all his bodies motion,
Crates incites the Prince to.

Nean. Then observe,
 With what variety of passions he
 Receives his reasons; now he's pale, and shakes
 For fear or anger; now his natural red
 Comes back again, and with a pleasing smile
 He seems to entertain it; 'tis resolv'd on
 Be it what 'twill: to his ends may it prosper
 Though the State sink for't.

Cra. Now you are a Prince

Fit to rule others, and in shaking off
 The Bonds in which your Mother fetters you
 Discharge your debt to nature, she's your guide,
 Follow her boldly, Sir.

The. I am confirm'd,
 Fall what may fall.

Cra. Yet still disguise your malice
 In your humility.

The. I am instructed.

Cra. Though in you heart there rage a thousand tempests,
 All calmness in your looks.

The. I shall remember.

Cra. And at no hand, though these are us'd as agents
 Acquaint them with your purpose till the instant
 That we employ them; 'tis not fit they have
 Time to consider, when 'tis done, reward
 Or fear will keep them silent: yet you may
 Grace them as you pass by, 'twill make them surer,
 And greedier to deserve you.

The. I'll move only
 As you would have me: Good-day Gentleman;
 Nay, spare this ceremonious form of duty
 To him that brings love to you, equal love,
 And is in nothing happier, than in knowing
 It is return'd by you; we are as one.

Sof. I am o'r-joy'd, I know not
 How to reply: but——

Era. Hang all butts; my Lord,
 For this your bounteous favour——

Nean. Let me speak,
 If to feed Vultures here, after the halter
 Has done his part, or if there be a Hell
 To take a swinge or two there, may deserve this.

Sof. We are ready.

Era. Try us any way.

Nean. Put us to it.

The. What jewels I have in you?

Cra. Have these souls,
 That for a good look, and a few kind words
 Part with their Essence?

The. Since you will compell me
 To put that to the tryal, which I doubt not,
Crates, may be, suddainly will instruct you
 How, and in what to shew your loves; obey him
 As you would bind me to you:

Cra. 'Tis well-grounded;
 Leave me to rear the building.

Nean. We will do.

Cra. I know it.

Era. Any thing you'll put us to.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda,

Enter Leonidas, Merione, Beliza, Servants.

Leo. Sister, I reap the harvest of my labours
 In your preferment, be you worthy of it,
 And with an open bosom entertain
 A greater fortune than my love durst hope for;
 Be wife, and welcome it: play not the coy
 And foolish wanton, with the offered bounties
 Of him that is a Prince. I was woo'd for you,
 And won Merione: then if you dare
 Believe the object that took me was worthy,
 Or trust my judgement, in me think you were
 Courted, sued to, and conquer'd.

Mer. Noble Brother,
 I have, and still esteem you as a Father,
 And will as far obey you; my heart speaks it:
 And yet without your anger, give me leave
 To say, That in the choice of that on which
 All my lifes joyes or sorrows have dependance,
 It had been fit e'r you had made a full
 And absolute grant of me to any other,
 I should have us'd mine own eyes, or at least

Made you to understand, whether it were Within my power to make a second gift
Of my poor self.

Leo. I know what 'tis you point at,
The Prince Theanor's love; let not that cheat you;
His vows were but meer Courtship; all his service
But practice how to entrap a credulous Lady:
Or grant it serious, yet you must remember
He's not to love, but where the Queen his Mother
Must give allowance, which to you is barr'd up
And therefore study to forget that ever
You cherish such a hope.

Mer. I would I could.

Leo. But brave Agenor, who is come in person
To celebrate this Marriage, for your love
Forgives the forfeit of ten thousand lives,
That must have fall'n under the sword of War
Had not this peace been made; which general good
Both Countreys owe to his affection to you:
O happy Sister, ask this noble Lady
Your bosome friend (since I fail in my credit)
What palme Agenor's name, above all Princes
That Greece is proud of, carries, and with lustre.

Bel. Indeed Fame gives him out for excellent;
And friend, I doubt not but when you shall see him (Ent. a Ser.)
He'll so appear to you. Art sure 'tis he?

Ser. As I live Madam —

Bel. Virtue enable me to contain my joy.

'Tis my Euphanes.

Ser. Yes.

Bel. And he's in health?

Ser. Most certainly Madam.

Bel. I'll see him instantly.

So prethee tell him.

Exit Ser.

Mer. I yield my self too weak
In argument to oppose you: you may lead me
Whither you please.

Leo. 'Tis answer'd like my Sister;
And if in him you find not ample cause
To pray for me, and daily on your knees,
Conclude I have no judgement.

Mer. May it prove so:
Friend, shall we have your company?

Bel. Two hours hence

I will not fail you.

Leo. At your pleasure Madam. Ex. Leo. and Mer.

Enter Euphanes.

Bel. Could I in one word speak a thousand welcomes
(And hearty ones) you have 'em: Fie, my hand,
We stand at no such distance, by my life
The parting kiss you took before your travel
Is yet a Virgin on my lips, preserv'd
With as much care as I would do my fame
To entertain your wish'd return.

Euph. Best Lady,
That I do honour you, and with as much reason
As ever man did virtue; that I love you,
Yet look upon you with that reverence
As Holy men behold the Sun, the Stars,
The Temples, and their gods, they all can witness;
And that you have deserv'd this duty from me;
The life, and means of life, for which I owe you,
Commands me to profess it, since my fortune
Affords no other payment.

Bel. I had thought,
That for the trifling courtesies, as I call them,
(Though you give them another name) you had
Made ample satisfaction in th' acceptance,
And therefore did presume you had brought home
Some other Language.

Euph. No one I have learn'd
Yields words sufficient to express your goodness;

Nor can I ever choose another theme
And not be thought unthankful.

Bel. Pray you no more
As you respect me.

Euph. That charm is too powerful
For me to disobey it: 'Tis your pleasure,
And not my boldness Madam.

Bel. Good Euphanes,
Believe I am not one of those weak Ladies,
That (barren of all inward worth) are proud
Of what they cannot truly call their own,
Their birth or fortune, which are things without them:
Nor in this will I imitate the world,
Whose greater part of men think when they give
They purchase bondmen, not make worthy friends;
By all that's good I swear, I never thought
My great estate was an addition to me,
Or that your wants took from you.

Euph. There are few
So truly understanding or themselves
Or what they do possess.

Bel. Good Euphanes,
Where benefits
Are ill conferr'd, as to unworthy men,
That turn them to bad uses, the bestower
For wanting judgement how, and on whom to place them,
Is partly guilty: but when we do favours
To such as make them grounds on which they build
Their noble actions, there we improve our fortunes
To the most fair advantage. If I speak
Too much, though I confess I speak well,
Prethee remember 'tis a womans weakness,
And then thou wilt forgive it.

Euph. You speak nothing
But what would well become the wisest man:
And that by you deliver'd is so pleasing
That I could hear you ever.

Bel. Fly not from
Your word, for I arrest it: and will now
Express my self a little more, and prove
That whereas you profess your self my debtor,
That I am yours.

Euph. Your Ladyship then must use
Some Sophistry I ne'r heard of.

Bel. By plain reasons,
For look you, had you never sunk beneath
Your wants, or if those wants had found supply
From Crates, your unkind and covetous brother,
Or any other man, I then had mis'd
A subject upon which I worthily
Might exercise my bounty: whereas now
By having happy opportunity
To furnish you before, and in your travels,
With all conveniencies that you thought useful,
That Gold which would have rusted in my Coffers
Being thus employ'd, has rendred me a partner
In all your glorious actions. And whereas
Had you not been, I should have dy'd a thing
Scarce known, or soon forgotten: there's no Trophy
In which Euphanes for his worth is mentioned,
But there you have been careful to remember,
That all the good you did came from Beliza.

Euph. That was but thankfulness.

Bel. 'Twas such an honour,
And such a large return for the poor trash
I ventur'd with you, that if I should part
With all that I possess, and my self too
In satisfaction for it, 'twere still short
Of your deservings.

Euph. You o'r-prize them Madam.

Bel. The Queen her self hath given me gracious thanks
In your behalfe, for she hath heard Euphanes
How gallantly you have maintain'd her honour
In all the Courts of Greece: and rest assur'd

(Though yet unknown) when I present you to her,
Which I will do this evening, you shall find
That he intends good to you.

Euph. Worthiest Lady,
Since all you labour for is the advancement
Of him that will live ever your poor servant,
He must not contradict it.

Bel. Here's your Brother,
'Tis strange to see him here.

Enter Crates.

Cra. You are welcome home, Sir,
(Your pardon Madam) I had thought my house,
Considering who I am, might have been worthy
Of your first visit.

Euph. 'Twas not open to me
When last I saw you ; and to me 'tis wonder
That absence which still renders men forgotten
Should make my presence wish'd for.

Bel. That's not it,
Your too kind Brother understanding that
You stand in no need of him, is bold to offer
His entertainment.

Cra. He had never wanted,
Or yours, or your assistance, had he practis'd
The way he might have took, to have commanded,
Whatever I call mine,

Euph. I studied many,
But could find none.

Cra. You would not find your self, Sir,
Or in your self, what was due to me from you :
The privilege my birth bestow'd upon me
Might challenge some regard.

Euph. You had all the Land, Sir,
What else did you expect ? and I am certain
You kept such strong Guards to preserve it yours
I could force nothing from you.

Cra. Did you ever
Demand help from me ?

Euph. My wants have, and often,
With open mouths, but you nor heard, nor saw them ;
May be you look'd I should petition to you
As you went to your Horse ; flatter your servants,
To play the Brokers for my furtherance,,
Sooth your worst humors, act the Parasite
On all occasions, write my name with thiers
That are but one degree remov'd from slaves,
Be drunk when you would have me, then wench with you,
Or play the Pander ; enter into Quarrels
Although unjustly grounded, and defend them
Because they were yours ; these are the tyrannies
Most younger Brothers groan beneath ; yet bear them
From the insulting Heir, selling their freedoms
At a less rate than what the State allows
The fallary of base and common Strumpets :
For my part, e'r on such low terms I feed
Upon a Brothers trencher, let me dye
The Beggars death, and starve.

Cra. 'Tis bravely spoken,
Did what you do rank with it.

Bel. Why, what does he
You would not wish were yours ?

Cra. I'll tell you Lady,
Since you rise up his Advocate, and boldly,
(For now I find, and plainly in whose favor
My Love and Service to you was neglected)
For all your wealth, nay, add to that your beauty,
And put your virtues in, if you have any,
I would not yet be pointed at, as he is.
For the fine Courtier, the womans man,
That tells my Lady stories, dissolves Riddles,
Ushers her to her Coach, lies at her feet
At solemn Masks, applauding what she laughs at ;

Reads her asleep anights, and takes his oath
Upon her Pantoffles, that all excellence
In other Madams do but zany hers:
These you are perfect in, and yet these take not
Or from your birth and freedom.

Euph. Should another
Say this, my deeds, not looks should shew —

Bel. Contemn it :
His envie fains this, and he's but reporter,
Without a second, of his own dry fancies.

Cra. Yes Madam, the whole City speaks it with me,
And though in my distaste, 'tis certain you
Are brought into the scene, and with him censur'd ;
For you are given out for the provident Lady,
That not to be unfurnish'd for her pleasures
(As without them to what vain use is greatness)
Have made choice of an able man, a young man
Of an Herculean back to do you service,
And one you may command too, that is active,
And does what you would have him.

Bel. You are foul-mouth'd.

Cra. That can speak well, write Verses too, and good ones,
Sharp and conceited, whose wit you may lie with
When his performance fails him ; one you have
Maintain'd abroad to learn new ways to please you,
And by the gods you well reward him for it,
No night (in which while you lye sick and panting)
He watches by you, but is worth a talent :
No conference in your Coach, which is not paid with
A Scarlet Suit ; this the poor people mutter,
Though I believe, for I am bound to do so,
A Lady of your youth, that feeds high too,
And a most exact Lady, may do all this
Out of a virtuous love, the last bought vizard
That Leachery purchas'd.

Euph. Not a word beyond this,
The reverence I owe to that one womb
In which we both were embrions, makes me suffer
What's past ; but if continu'd —

Bel. Stay your hand,
The Queen shall right my honor.

Cra. Let him do it,
It is but marrying him ; and for your anger
Know that I slight it : when your goddess here
Is weary of your sacrifice, as she will be,
You know my house, and there amongst my servants
Perhaps you'll find a livery.

Bel. Be not mov'd,
I know the rancor of his disposition,
And turn it on himself by laughing at it ;
And in that let me teach you.

Euph. I learn gladly.

Exit.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Neanthes, Sofines, and Eraton severally.

Neau. You are met unto my wishes, if you ever
Desir'd true mirth so far as to adventure
To dye with the extremity of laughter,
I come before the object that will do it ;
Or let me live your fool.

Sof. Who is't Neanthes ?

Nea. Lamprias the Ufurers Son.

Era. Lamprias ? the youth
Of six and fifty ?

Sof. That was sent to travel
By rich Beliza, till he came to age,
And was fit for a Wife ?

Nea. The very same,
This gallant with his Guardian, and his Tutor,
(And of the three, who is most fool I know not)
Are newly come to Corinth, I'll not stale them
By giving up their characters, but leave you
To make your own discoveries: here they are, Sir.

Enter

Enter Onos, Uncle and Tutor.

Tutor. That leg a little higher; very well.
Now put your Face into the Travellers posture;
Exceeding good.

Uncle. Do you mark how they admire him?

Tut. They will be all my Scholars; when they know
And understand him truly.

Era. Phobus guard me
From this new Python.

Sof. How they have trimm'd him up
Like an old Reveller?

Nea. Curl'd him and perfum'd him,
But that was done with judgement, for he looks
Like one that purg'd perpetually; trust me,
That Witches face of his is painted too,
And every ditch upon it buries more
Then would set off ten Bawds, and all their tenants.

Sof. See how it moves towards us.

Nea. There's a salutation:

'Troth Gentlemen, you have bestowed much travel
In training up your Pupil.

Tut. Sir, great buildings
Require great labours, which yet we repent not,
Since for the Countreys good we have brought home
An absolute man.

Unc. As any of his years,
Corinth can shew you.

Era. He's exceeding meagre.

Tut. His contemplation——

Unc. Besides, 'tis fit
Learners should be kept hungry.

Nea. You all contemplate;
For three such wretched pictures of lean famine
I never saw together.

Unc. We have fat minds, Sir,
And travell'd to save charges. Do you think
'Twas fit a young and hopeful Gentleman
Should be brought up a glutton? he's my Ward,
Nor was there ever where I bore the bag
Any superfluous waste.

Era. Pray you can it speak?

Tut. He knows all Languages, but will use none,
They are all too big for his mouth, or else too little
'T'express his great conceits: and yet of late
With some impulsion he hath set down
In a strange method by the way of question,
And briefly to all business whatsoever
That may concern a Gentleman.

Nea. Good Sir, let's hear him.

Tut. Come on, Sir.

Nea. They have taught him like an Ape,
To do his tricks by signs: now he begins.

Onos. When shall we be drunk together?

Tut. That's the first.

Onos. Where shall we whore to night?

Unc. That ever follows.

Era. 'Odds me, he now looks angry.

Onos. Shall we quarrel?

Nea. With me at no hand, Sir.

Onos. Then lets protest.

Era. Is this all?

Tut. These are, Sir, the four new Virtues
That are in fashion: many a mile we measur'd
Before we could arrive to this knowledge.

Nea. You might have spar'd that labour, for at home here
There's little else in practice: Ha? the Queen?
Good friends, for half an hour remove your motion,
To-morrow willingly when we have more leisure
We'll look on him again.

Onos. Did I not rarely?

Unc. Excellent well.

Tut. He shall have six Plumbs for it.

Exeunt.

Enter Agenor, Leonidas, Theanor, Queen, Merione, Beliza, Euphanes, Crates, Ladies, Attendants with Lights.

Qu. How much my Court is honour'd Princely Brother?
In your vouchsafing it your long'd-for presence
Were tedious to repeat, since 'tis already
(And heartily) acknowledg'd; may the gods
That look into Kings actions, smile upon
The league we have concluded; and their justice
Find me out to revenge it, if I break
One Article.

Age. Great miracle of Queens,
How happy I esteem my self in being
Thought worthy to be numbred in the rank
Of your confederates; my love and best service
Shall teach the world hereafter: but this gift
With which you have confirm'd it, is so far
Beyond my hopes and means e'r to return,
That of necessity I must dye oblig'd
To your unanswer'd bounty.

The. The sweet Lady
In blushes gives your Highness thanks.

Qu. Believe it
On the Queens word, she is a worthy one,
And I am so acquainted with her goodness,
That but for this peace that hath chang'd my purpose,
And to her more advancement, I should gladly
Have call'd her Daughter.

The. Though I am depriv'd of
A blessing, 'tis not in the Fates to equal,
To shew my self a Subject as a Son,
Here I give up my claim, and willingly
With mine own hand deliver you what once
I lov'd above my self; and from this hour
(For my affection yields now to my duty)
Vow never to sollicite her.

Cra. 'Tis well cover'd;
Neanthes, and the rest, Exeunt Cra. Nea. Sof. Era.

Qu. Nay, for this night
You must (for 'tis our Countrey fashion, Sir)
Leave her to her Devotions, in the morning
We'll bring you to the Temple.

Leo. How in this
Your Highness honours me?

Mer. Sweet rest to all.

Age. This kiss, and I obey you

Bel. Please it your Highness,
This is the Gentleman.

Qu. You are welcome home, Sir,
(Now as I live, one of a promising presence)
I have heard of you before, and you shall find
I'll know you better: find out something that
May do you good, and rest assur'd to have it.
Were you at Sparta lately?

Euph. Three daies since
Madam, I came from thence.

Qu. 'Tis very late,
Good night my Lord, do you Sir follow me,
I must talk further with you.

Ag. All rest with you. Exeunt.

Enter Crates, Neanthes, Eraton, Sosicles disguis'd.

Cra. She must pass through this Cloyster, suddainly
And boldly seize upon her.

Nea. Where's the Prince?

Cra. He does expect us at the place I shew'd you.

Enter Merione and Servant.

I hear ones footing, peace, 'tis she;

Mer. Now leave me,
I know the way, though Vesta witness with me
I never trode it with such fear: help, help.

Cra. Stop her mouth close, out with the Light, I'll guide
you. Exeunt.
Actus

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Merione (as newly ravished.)

Mer. TO whom now shall I cry? What pow'r thus kneel
And beg my ravilht honor back upon me (to?)
Deaf, deaf, you gods of goodness, deaf to me,
Deaf Heaven to all my cries; deaf hope, deaf justice,
I am abus'd, and you, that see all, saw it;
Saw it, and smil'd upon the villain did it:
Saw it, and gave him strength: why have I pray'd to ye,
When all the world eyes have been sunk in slumbers?
Why have I then pow'r'd out my tears? kneel'd to ye?
And from the Altar of a pure heart sent ye
Thoughts like your selves, white, innocent, vows purer
And of a sweeter flame than all the earths odours?
Why have I sung your praises, strew'd your Temples,
And crown'd your Holy Priests with Virgin Roses?
Is it we hold ye powerful, to destroy us?
Believe, and honor ye, to see us ruin'd?
These tears of anger thus I sprinkle toward ye,
You that dare sleep secure whilst Virgins suffer,
These stick like Comets, blaze eternally,
Till, with the wonder, they have wak'd your justice,
And forc't ye fear our curses, as we yours.

Enter Theanor, Crates, with vizards.

My shame still follows me, and still proclaims me;
He turns away in scorn, I am contemned too,
A more unmanly violence than the other;
Bitten, and flung away? What e'r you are
Sir, you that have abus'd me, and now most basely
And sacrilegiously robb'd this fair Temple,
I fling all these behind me, but look upon me,
But one kind loving look, be what ye will,
So from this hour you will be mine, my Husband;
And you his hand in mischief, I speak to you too,
Counsel him nobly now; you know the mischief,
The most unrighteous act he has done, perswade him,
Perswade him like a friend, knock at his Conscience
Till fair Repentance follow: yet be worthy of me,
And shew your self, if ever good thought guided ye;
You have had your soul will, make it yet fair with marriage;
Open your self and take me, wed me now: } Draws his
More fruits of villany? your Dagger? come } Dagger.
Ye are merciful, I thank you for your medicine:
Is that too worthy too?

Enter the rest disguis'd.

Devil, thou with him,
Thou penny Bawd to his Lust, will not that stir thee?
Do you work by tokens now? Be sure I live not,
For your own safeties knaves. I will sit patiently:
But as ye are true villains, the Devils own servants,
And those he loves and trusts, make it as bloody
An Act, of such true horror, Heaven would shake at,
'Twill shew the braver: goodness hold my hope fast,
And in thy mercies look upon my ruines,
And then I am right: my eyes grow dead and heavy:

Enter six disguis'd, singing and dancing to a horrid Musick,
and sprinkling water on her face.

Wrong me no more as ye are men.

The. She is fast.

Cra. Away with her.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Agenor, and Gentlemen.

Age. Now Gentlemen, the time's come now t' enjoy
That fruitful happinels my heart has long'd for:
This day be happy call'd, and when old Time
Brings it about each year, crown'd with that sweetness
It gives me now, see every man observe it,
And laying all aside bears shew of business,
Give this to joy and triumph: How sits my cloaths?

1 Gen. Handsome, and wondrous well, Sir.

Age. Do they shew richly?

For to those curious eyes even beauty envies,
I must not now appear poor, or low fashion'd;
Methinks I am younger than I was, far younger;
And such a promise in my blood I feel now,
That if there may be a perpetual youth
Bestowed on man, I am that soul shall win it:
Does my hair stand well, Lord how ill-favour'dly
You have dress'd me to day? how baldly? why this Cloak?

2 Gen. Why 'tis the richest, Sir,

Age. And here ye have put me on

A pair of Breeches look like a pair of Bagpipes.

1 Gen. Believe Sir, they shew bravely.

Age. Why these Stockins?

2 Gen. Your Leg appears——

Age. Peuh, I would have had 'em Peach-colour,
All young, and new about me: and this Scarf here
A goodly thing: you have trickt me like a Puppet.

1 Gen. I'll undertake to rig forth a whole Navy,
And with less labor than one man in love.

They are never pleas'd.

2 Gen. Methinks he looks well.

1 Gen. Well:

As man can look, as handsome: now do I wonder
He found not fault his Nose was put on ugly,
Or his Eyes lookt too gray, and rail at us,
They are the waywards things, these Lovers.

2 Gen. All will be right

When once it comes to th' push.

1 Gen. I would they were at it

For our own quiet sake.

Age. Come, wait upon me,

And bear your selves like mine, my friends, and nobly. Ex

Scena Tertia.

Enter Theanor, Crates, and Erates, bringing Merione.

Erat. This is her Brothers door.

Cra. There lay her down then.

Lay her along: she is fast still.

Ser. As forgetfulness.

Cra. Be not you stirr'd now, but away to your Mother
Give all attendance, let no stain appear
Of fear, or doubt in your face: carry your self confidently.

The. But whither runs your drift now?

Cra. When she wakes,

Either what's done will shew a meer dream to her,
And carry no more credit: or say she find it,
Say she remember all the circumstances,
Twenty to one the shapes in which they were acted,
The horrors, and the still affrights we shew'd her,
Rising in wilder figures to her memory
Will run her mad, and no man guessthe reason:
If all these fail, and that she rise up perfect,
And so collect her self, believe this, Sir,
Not knowing who it was that did this to her,
Nor having any power to ghes; the thing done too
Being the utter undoing of her honor
If it be known, and to the worlds eye publish'd,
Especially at this time when Fortune courts her,
She must and will conceal it; nay, forget it,
The woman is no Lucrece; get you gone Sir,
And as you would have more of this sport, fear not.

The.

The. I am confirm'd, farewell.

Crz. Farewel, away Sir:

Disperse your selves, and as you love his favour,
And that that crowns it, Gold, no tongues amongst ye.
You know your charge, this way goes no suspicion. Ex.

Enter Agenor, and Leonides, with two Gent.

Ag. You are stirring early, Sir.

Leo. It was my duty

To wait upon your Grace.

Ag. How fares your Sister,

My beauteous Mistris, what is she ready yet? (way

Leo. No doubt she'll lose no time Sir, young Maids in her

Tread upon thorns, and think an hour an age

Till the Priest has done his part, that theirs may follow:

I saw her not since yesterday i' th' evening:

But Sir, I am sure she is not slack; believe me,

Your grace will find a loving soul.

Ag. A sweet one,

And so much joy I carry in the thought of it,

So great a happiness to know she is mine;

Believe me noble Brother, that to express it

Methinks a Tongue's a poor thing: can do nothing,

Imagination less: who's that that lies there?

Leo. Where Sir?

Ag. Before the door, it looks like a woman:

Leo. This way I came abroad, but then there was no
One of the Maids o'rwatch'd belike; (thing,

Ag. It may be.

Leo. But methinks this is no fit place to sleep in.

i Gent. 'Tis sure a woman Sir, she has jewels on too:

She fears no foul play sure.

Leo. Bring a Torch hither,

Yett'tis not perfect day: I should know those Garments.

Ag. How sound she sleeps?

Leo. I am sorry to see this.

Ag. Do you know her?

Leo. And you now I am sure Sir.

Ag. My Mistris, how comes this?

Enter Queen, Theonor, Beliza, Euphanes, Neanthes, Attendants.

Leo. The Queen and her train?

Qu. You know my pleasure.

Euph. And will be most careful.

Qu. Be not long absent, the suit you prefer'd
Is granted.

Nea. This fellow mounts apace, and will
Towre o'rus like a Falcon.

Qu. Good morrow to ye all, why stand ye wondring?

Enter the house Sir, and bring out your Mistris,

You must observe our Ceremonies: what's the matter?

What's that ye stand at? How Merione?

Asleep i' th' street? belike some sudden Palsie

As she slept out last night upon devotion,

To take her farewell of her Virgin state,

The air being sharp and piercing, struck her suddenly:

See if she breath.

Leo. A little.

Qu. Wake her then,

'Tis sure a fit.

Ag. She wakes her self,

Give room to her.

Qu. See how the spirits struggle to recover,

And strongly reinforce their strength; for certain

This was no natural sleep.

The. I am of your mind, Madam.

Qu. No Son, it cannot be.

The. Pray Heaven no trick in't;

Good Soul she little merits such a mischief.

Qu. She is broad awake now, and her sence cleers up,

'Twas sure a fit; stand off.

Mer. The Queen, my Love here,

And all my noble friends? Why where am I?

How am I tranç'd, and moap'd? i' th' street? Heaven blefs me,
Shame to my Sex; o th' ground too? O I remember —

Leo. How wild she looks?

Ag. Oh my cold heart, how she trembles?

Mer. Oh I remember, I remember.

Qu. What's that?

Mer. My shame, my shame, my shame: Oh I remember
My never-dying shame.

The. Here has been villanic.

Qu. I fear so too.

Mer. You are no Furies are ye?

No horrid shapés sent to affright me?

Ag. No sweet,

We are your friends: look up, I am Agenor,

O my Merione, that loves you dearly:

And come to marry ye.

Leo Sister, what ail ye?

Speak out your griefs, and boldly —

Ag. Something sticks here

Will choak ye else.

Mer. I hope it will.

Qu. Be free Lady,

You have your loving friends about ye.

Ab. Dear Merione,

By the unspotted love I ever bore ye,

By thine own goodness —

Mer. Oh 'tis gone, 'tis gone Sir,

I am now I know not what: pray ye look not on me,

No name is left me, nothing to inherit

But that detested, base, and branded —

Ag. Speakit,

And how; diseases of most danger

Their causes once discover'd are easily cur'd:

My fair Merione.

Mer. I thank your love Sir;

When I was fair Merione, unspotted,

Pure, and unblasted in the bud you honour'd,

White as the heart of truth, then Prince Agenor,

Even then I was not worthy of your favour;

Wretch that I am, less worthy now of pitty:

Let no good thing come near me, virtue flie me;

You that have honest noble names despise me,

For I am nothing now but a main pestilence

Able to poison all. Send those unto me

That have forgot their names, ruin'd their fortunes,

Despis'd their honours; those that have been Virgins

Ravish'd and wrong'd, and yet dare live to tell it.

The. Now it appears too plain.

Mer. Send those sad people

That hate the light, and curse society; (nually

Whose thoughts are Graves, and from whose eyes conti-

Their melting souls drop out, send those to me;

And when their sorrows are most excellent,

So full that one grief more cannot be added,

My Story like a torrent shall devour 'em.

Hark, it must out; but pray stand close together;

And let not all the world hear.

Leo. Speak it boldly.

Mer. And Royal Lady, think but charitably,

Your Grace has known my breeding.

Qu. Prethee speak it.

Mer. Is there no stranger here? send off your servants,

And yet it must be known: I shake.

Ag. Sweet Mistris.

Mer. I am abus'd, basely abus'd; do you ghes yet?

Come close, I'll tell ye plainer; I am whor'd,

Ravish'd, and robb'd of Honour.

Leo. Oh the Devil.

Ag. What hellish Slave was this?

The. A wretch, a wretch,

A damned wretch: do you know the Villain, Lady?

Mer. No.

The. Not by ghes?

Mer. Oh no.

The. It must be known,

Qu. Where was the place?

Mer. I know not neither.

Ag. O Heaven,

Is this the happy time? my hope to this come?

Leo. Neither the man nor circumstances?

The. His tongue,

Did you not hear his tongue, no voice?

Mer. None, none Sir:

All I know of him was his violence.

Ag. How came ye hither, Sweet?

Mer. I know not neither.

The. A cunning piece of villany.

Mer. All I remember

Is only this: Going to Vestas Temple

To give the goddess my last Virgin prayers,

Near to that place I was suddenly surpriz'd,

By five or six disguis'd, and from thence violently

To my dishonour hal'd: that Act perform'd,

Brought back, but how, or whether, till I wak'd here.—

The. This is so monstrous, the gods cannot suffer it;

I have not read in all the villainies

Committed by the most obdurate Rascals,

An act so truly impious.

Leo. Would I knew him.

The. He must be known, the Devil cannot hide him.

Qu. If all the Art I have, or power can do it,

He shall be found, and such a way of justice

Inflicted on him: A Lady wrong'd in my Court,

And this way rob'd, and ruin'd?

The. Be contented Madam,

if he be above ground I will have him.

Ag. Fair virtuous Maid, take comfort yet and flourish,

In my love flourish: the stain was forc'd upon ye

None of your wills, nor yours; rise, and rise mine still,

And rise the same white, sweet, fair soul, I lov'd ye,

Take me the same.

Mer. I kneel and thank ye, Sir,

And I must say ye are truly honourable:

and dare confess my Will, yet still a Virgin;

But so unfit and weak a Cabinet

To keep your love and virtue in am I now,

That have been forc'd and broken, lost my lustre,

I mean this body, so corrupt a Volume

For you to study goodness in, and honor,

I shall intreat your Grace, confer that happiness

Upon a beauty sorrow never saw yet:

And when this grief shall kill me, as it must do,

Only remember yet ye had such a Mistress;

And if ye then dare shed a tear, yet honour me:

Good Gentlemen, express your pities to me,

In seeking out this villany; and my last suit

Is to your Grace, that I may have your favour

To live a poor recluse Nun with this Lady,

From Court and company, till Heaven shall hear me,

And send me comfort, or death end my misery.

Qu. Take your own Will, my very heart bleeds for thee.

Ag. Farewell Merione, since I have not thee.

I'll wed thy goodness, and thy memory.

Leo. And I her fair revenge.

The. Away: let's follow it,

For he is so rank i' th' wind we cannot miss him. Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Crates and Conon.

Cra. Conon, you are welcome home, ye are wondrous

Is this your first arrival? (welcome,

Co. Sir, but now

I reacht the Town.

Cra. Ye are once more welcome then.

Co. I thank ye, noble Sir.

Cra. Pray ye do me the honor

To make my poor house first—

Con. Pray Sir excuse me,

I have not seen mine own yet; nor made happy

These longing eyes with those I love there: what's this a

Cra. It seems so by the outside.

(Tavern?)

Co. Step in here then,

And since it offers it self so freely to us,

A place made only for liberal entertainment,

Let's seek no further, but make use of this,

And after the Greek fashion, to our friends

Crown a round cup or two.

Enter Vintner and Drawer.

Cra. Your pleasure, Sir.

Drawers, who waits within?

Draw. Anon, anon Sir.

Vint. Look into the Lilly-pot: why Mark there;

You are welcome Gentlemen; heartily welcome

My noble friend.

Cra. Let's have good Wine mine Host,

And a fine private room.

Vint. Will ye be there Sir?

What is't you'll drink? I'll draw your Wine my self:

Quillions ye knaves: why when?

Enter Drawer.

Draw. Anon, anon Sir.

Vint. Chios, or Lebos, Greek?

Cra. Your best and neatest.

Vint. I'll draw ye that snall dance.

Cra. Away, be quick then.

Exit. Vintner

Con. How does your Brother, Sir, my noble friend

The good Euphanes? in all my course of travel

I met not with a Gentleman so furnish'd

In gentleness and courtesie; believe Sir,

So many friendly Offices I receiv'd from him,

So great, and timely, and enjoy'd his company

In such an open and a liberal sweetness,

That when I dare forget him—

Cra. He's in good health, Sir,

But you will find him a much alter'd man,

Grown a great Courtier, Sir.

Co. He's worthy of it.

Cra. A man drawn up, that leaves no print behind him

Of what he was: those goodnesses you speak of

That have been in him, those that you call freedoms,

Societies, and sweetness, look for now, Sir,

You'll find no shadows of them left, no sound,

The very Air he has liv'd in alter'd: now behold him,

And you shall see a thing walk by, look big upon ye,

And cry for place; I am the Queens, give room there:

If you bow low, may be he'll touch the Bonnet,

Or sling a forced smile at ye for a favour.

Co. He is your brother, Sir.

Cra. These forms put off,

Which travel, and Court Holy-water sprinkle on him,

I dare accept, and know him: you'll think it strange, Sir,

That even to me, to me his natural Brother,

And one by birth he owes a little honor too—

Enter Vintner with Wine.

(But that's all one) come, give me some Wine, mine Host,
Here's to your fair return.

Con. I wonder at it,

But sure he has found a nature not worth owning

In this way; else I know he is tender carried.

I thank ye, Sir: and now durst I presume

For all you tell me of these alterations,

And stops in his sweet nature, which till I find so,

I have known him now so long, and look'd so through him,

You must give me leave to be a little faithless:

I say for all these, if you please to venture

O my fair Sir, Lampree, the careful Unkle
To this young hopeful issue; Monsieur Tutor too,
The father to his mind; Gome, come, let's hug Boyes,
Why what a bunch of travel do I embrace now,
Methinks I put a Girdle about Europe;
How has the boy profited?

Unc. He has enough Sir,
If his too fiery mettle do not mar it.

Con. Is he not thrifty yet?

Tut. That's all his fault,
Too bounteous minded being under age too,
A great consumer of his stock in Pippins,
Had ever a hot stomach.

Con. Come hither Onos,
Will you love me for this fine Apple?

Onos. We.

Con. And will ye be rul'd by me sometimes?

Onos. Faith I will.

Con. That's a good boy.

Unc. Pray give not the child so much fruit,
He's of a raw Complexion

Euph. You Monsieur hard ege,
Do you remember me? Do you remember
When you and your Consort travell'd through Hungary?

Con. He's in that circuit still.

Euph. Do you remember
The cantell of immortal Cheese ye carried with ye,
The half cold Gabbedge in a leather Sachell,
And those invincible Eggs that would lye in your bowells
A fortnight together, and then turn to bedstaves;
Your sowre milk that would choak an Irish man,
And bread was bak'd in Cæsars time for the Army?

Con. Providence, providence.

Tut. The soul of travel.

Euph. Can the boy speak yet?

Tut. Yes, and as fine a Gentleman,
I thank my able knowledge, he has arriv'd at,
Only a little sparing of his Language,
Which every man of observation —

Unc. And of as many tongues.

Tut. Pray be content Sir,
You know you are for the bodily part, the Purse,
I for the magazin, the mind.

Euph. Come hither springall.

On. That in the Almain Tongue signifies a Gentleman.

Euph. What think you of the forms of Italy or Spain?

Onos. I love mine own Countrey Pippin.

Tut. Nobly answer'd,
Born for his Countrey first.

Euph. A great Philosopher:
What Horses do you prefer?

Onos. The white horse Sir,
There where I lye; honest and a just beast,
Tut. O caput lepidum: a Child to say this,
Are these figures for the mouths of Infants?

Con. Onos, what wenches?

Come, tell me true.

On. I cannot speak without book.

Con. When shall we have one, lia?

On. Steal me from mine Unkle,
For look you, I am broke out horribly
For want of fleshy Physick: they say I am too young,
And that 'twill spoyle my growth but could you help me?

Con. Meet me to morrow man, no more.

Euph. You think now
Ye have open'd such a shame to me of travell,
By shewing these thin Cubs: ye have honour'd us
Against your will, proclaim'd us excellent:
Three Frails of Sprats carried from Mart; to Mart,
Are as much Meat as these, to more use travell'd;
A bunch of bloted fools: me thinks your judgment
Should look abroad sometimes without your envy.

Cra. Such are most of you: so I take my leave,
And when you find your Womens favor fail,

'Tis ten to one you'll know your self, and seek me
Upon a better Muster of your manners.

Con. This is not handsome Sir.

Euph. Pray take your pleasure,
You wound the wind as much —

Cra. Come you with me,
I have business for you presently: there's for your Wine,
I must confes I lost it.

On. Shall I steal to ye
And shall we see the Wench?

Con. A dainty one.

On. And have a dish of Pippins?

Con. What a peck man.

Tut. Will you wait Sir.

Con. Pray let's meet oftner Gentlemen,
I would not lose ye.

Tut. O sweet Sir.

Con. Do you think I would,
Such noted men as you?

Onos, Unc. Tut. We are your Servants. Exeunt.

Euph. That thing they would keep in everlasting nonage,
My brother for his own ends has thrust on
Upon my Mistris, 'tis true, he shall be rich
If ever he can get that Rogue his Unkle
To let him be of years to come to inherit it,
Now what the main drift is —

Con. Say ye so? no more words,
I'll keep him company till he be of years,
Though it be a hundred years, but I'll discover it;
And ten to one I'll cross it too.

Euph. You are honest,
And I shall study still your love: farewell Sir,
For these few hours I must desire your pardon,
I have business of importance: once a day
At least I hope you'll see me: I must see you else:
So, once more ye are welcome.

Con. All my thanks Sir,
And when I leave to love you, life go from me. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Theanor and Crates.

Cra. WHY Sir, the Kingdomes his, and no man now
Can come to Corinth, or from Corinth go
Without his Licence; he puts up the tithes
Of every office through Achaia;
From Courtier to the Carter hold of him:
Our Lands, our Liberties, nay very Lives
Are shut up in his Closet, and let loose
But at his pleasure; Books, and all discourse
Have now no Patron, nor direction,
But glorified Euphanes: our Cups are guilty
That quench our thirsts, if not unto his health;
Oh, I could eat my heart, and fling away
My very Soul for anguish: gods, nor men
Should tolerate such disproportion.

The. And yet is he belov'd: whether't be virtue,
Or seeming virtue which he makes the cloak
To his ambition.

Cra. Be it which it will:
Your Highness is too tame, your eyes too film'd
To see this, and sit still: the Lion should not
Tremble to hear the bellowing of the Bull;
Nature excuse me, though he be my Brother,
You are my Countries Father, therefore mine:
One parallel line of Love I bend on him,

All lines of love and duty meet in you
As in their Center: therefore hear, and weigh
What I shall speak: You know the Queen your Mother
Did, from a private state your Father raise,
So all your Royalty you hold from her;
She is older than she was, therefore more doating,
And what know we but blindness of her love
(That hath from underneath the foot of fortune Set even Euphanes foot, on fortunes head)
Will take him by the hand, and cry, Leap now
Into my bed; 'tis but a trick of age;
Nothing impossible.

The. What do you infer on this?

Cra. Your pardon Sir:

With reverence to the Queen; yet why should I
Fear to speak plain what pointeth to your good?
A good old Widow is a hungry thing,
(I speak of other Widows, not of Queens.)

The. Speak to thy purpose.

Cra. I approach it: Sir,

Should young Euphanes claspe the Kingdome thus,
And please the good old Lady some one night;
What might not she be wrought to put on you,
Quite to supplant your birth? neither is she
Past children as I take it.

The. Crates, Thou shak'st me;

Thou, that dost hate thy Brother for my love,
In my love find one; henceforth be my brother:
This Gyant I will fell beneath the earth;
I will shine out, and melt his artful wings:
Euphanes, from my mothers sea of favors
Spreads like a River, and runs calmly on,
Secure yet from my stormes; like a young pine
He grows up planted under a fair Oake,
Whose strong large branches yet do's shelter him,
And every Traveller admires his beauty;
But like a wind, I'll work into his crancks,
Trouble his stream, and drown all Vessels that
Ride on his Greatness: under my Mothers arms,
Like to a stealing tempest will I search,
And rend his root from her protection.

Cra. I, now Theanor speaks like Prince Theanor.

The. But how shall we provoke him to our snares?
He has a temper malice cannot move
To exceed the bounds of judgement; he is so wise,
That we can pick no cause to affront him.

Cra. No?

What better than his crossing your intent?
The suit I had to ye? Conons forfeit state
(Before he travel'd) for a Riot he
Hath from your Mother got restored to him:

The. Durst he? what is this Conon?

Cra. One that hath,
As people say, in foreign Countries pleasur'd him.

Enter Onos, Uncle, Tutor, Neanthes, Socrates, Eraton.

But now no more;
They have brought the Travellers I told you of,
That's the sweet youth, that is my Brothers Rivall,
That curls his head, for he has little hair,
And paints his vizer, for it is no face,
That so desires to follow you, my Lord:
Shew 'em some countenance, and it will beget
Our sport at least.

The. What villanous Crab-tree legs he makes?
His shins are full of true-love knots.

Cra. His legs were ever villanous, since I knew him.

Era. Faith his Uncles shanks are somewhat the better.

Nea. But is't possible he should believe he is not of age?
He is so man, in's Jubile I warrant: s'light, he (why
Looks older then a goat, the very stamp on's face is Worne out with handling. (him speak,

Sof. Why I tell you all men believe it when they hear

He utters such single matter in so instantly a voice.

Nea. He looks as like a fellow that I have seen accommodate Gentlemen with Tobacco in our Theaters.

Onos. Most illustrious Prince.

Era. A pox on him, he is guelt, how he trebles?

Onos. I am a Gentleman a both sides.

Tut. He means (sot' please your highness) both by *Fa-
Sof.* Thou a Gentleman? thou an As. (ther and Mother.

Nea. He is nere the farther from being a Gent. I assure you.

Tut. May it please your Grace, I am another,

Nea. He is another As. he says, I believe him.

Uncle. We be three; Heroicall Prince.

Nea. Nay then we must have the Picture of 'em, and the Word Nos sumus.

Tut. That have travell'd all parts of the Globe together.

Unc. For my part, I have seen the vicissitude of fortune before.

Onos. Peace Uncle, for though you speak a little better

Nea. 'Tis a very little, in truth. (than I

Onos. Yet we must both give place, as they say to the
The Tutor. (best Speaker

Tut. Yet since it hath pleased your radiance to decline so
Poor and unworthy dunghils— (low, as on us,

Nea. What a stinking knaves this?

Tut. Our Peregrination was nere so facilitated, as since we enter'd the line of your gracious favor, under whose beamy aspect, and by which infallible Mathematical compass, may we but hereafter presume to sail, our industries have reach't their desir'd termination and period; and we shall voluntarily sacrifice our lives to your resplendent eyes, both the Altars and fires of our devoted offerings.

Onos. Oh divine Tutor!

Cra. Can you hold Sir? (in Corinth.

Era. He has spoken this very speech to some Whore

Nea. A plague on him for a fustian Dictionary; on my conscience this is the Ulyssian Traveller that sent home
his Image riding upon Elephants to the great Mogoll.

Sof. The same: his wit is so huge, nought but an Elephant could carry him.

Era. So heavy you mean.

Nea. These three, are ev'n the fin'st one fool tripartite, that was ere discovered.

Sof. Or a treatise of famine divided into three branches.

Era. The Prince speaks.

The. I thank ye for your loves; but as I told you,
I have so little means, to do for those Few followers I have already, that
I would have none shiprack themselves, and fortune,
Upon my barren shelf: Sue to Euphanes.
For he is Prince, and Queen, I would have no man
Curse me in his old age.

Cra. Alas Sir, they desire to follow you
But a far off, the farther off the better.

Tut. I Sir, and't be seven mile off, so we may but follow you, only to countenance us in the confronts and affronts, which (according to your Highness will) we mean on all occasions to put upon the Lord Eupha-nes.

Onos. He shall not want gibing nor jceering, I warrant him, if he do, I'll forswear wit.

Nea. It has forsworn thee, I'll swear, it is the ancient enemy to thy house.

The. Well, be it so; I here receive ye; for my followers a great way off.

Nea. Seven miles, my Lord, no further.

Onos. By what time, Sir, (by this measure) may I come to follow him in his Chamber?

Nea. Why when his Chamber, Sir, is seven miles long.

Enter Euphanes, Conon, Page, Gent. Attendants.

Gent. Make way there for my Lord Euphanes.

Cra. Look Sir, Jove appears;
The Peacock of our State, that spreads a train
Brighter than Iris blushes after rain.

Euph. You need not thank me Conon; in your love

You Antidated what I can do for you,
And I, in gratitude, was bound to this,
And am to much more: and what ere he be
Can with unthankfulness assoile me, let him
Dig out mine eyes, and sing my name in verse,
In Ballad verse, at every drinking house,
And no man be so charitable to lend me
A Dogg to guide my steps.

Nes. Haile to Euphanes.

Sof. Mighty Euphanes.

Er. The great Prince Euphanes.

Tut. Key of the Court, and Jewell of the Queen.

Uns. Sol in our Firmament.

Onos. Pearl in the States eye.

Nes. Being a black man.

Er. Mistress of the Land.

Nes. Our humble, humble poor Petitions are,
That we may hold our places.

All. May we?

Euph. Yes; be you malicious knaves still; and you fools.

Con. This is the Princes, and your brothers spight.

Euph. I know't, but will not know it.

Con. Yonder they are.

Who's fine child's this?

Uns. Sir.

Onos. Uncle, le'be,

Let him alone, he is a mighty Prince.

Euph. I ask your Highness pardon: I protest
By Jupiter I saw you not.

The. Humh, it may be so,

You have rais'd such mountaines 'twixt your eyes and me,
(That I am hidden quite: what do ye mean Sir?
You much forget your self.

Euph. I should much more,
Not to remember my due duty to your Grace;
I know not wherein I have so transgress'd
My service to your Highness, to deserve
This rigour and contempt, not from you only
But from your followers, with the best of whom
I was an equal in my lowest ebbe:
Beseech you Sir, respect me as a Gentleman,
I will be never more in heart to you:
Five fair Descents I can derive my self,
From Fathers worthy both in Arts and Armes.
I know your goodness companies your greatness
But that you are perverted: Royal Sir,
I am your humblest subject, use your pleasure,
But do not give protection to the wrongs
Of these subordinate Slaves, whom I could crush
For that great destined favor, which my Mistress
And your majestick Mother deignes to me,
But in respect of you: I know lean envy
Waites ever on the steps of virtue advanc'd:
But why your Mothers grace gets me disgrace,
Or renders me a slave to bear these wrongs
I do not know.

On Mediocrity,

Thou prizeless jewel, only mean men have
But cannot value; like the precious Jem,
Found in the Mukhill by the ignorant Cock.

The. Your creamy words, but cozen: how durst you
Intercept me so lately to my Mother?
And what I meant your Brother, you obtain'd
Unto the forfeitoe again.

Cra. Your answer to that my Lord, my Brother.

Euph. May I perish

If ere I heard you intended such a suit,
Though 'twould have stuck an ignominious brand
Upon your Highness, to have given your servant
A Gentlemans whole state of worth and quality,
Confiscate only for a youthful brawle.

The. Your rudiments are too sawcy: teach your Page.

Con. I, so are all things but your flatterers.

Onos. Hold you your prating.

Con. You know where you are, you flecten face.

Euph. Yet Sir, to appease and fatisfie your anger.
Take what you please from me, and give it him
In lieu of this: you shall not take it neither,
I freely will impart it, half my state,
Which Brother if you please——

Cra. Ile starve in Chains first,
Eat my own armes.

Euph. Oh that you saw your self:
You ne'r made me such offer in my poorness,
And 'cause (to do you ease) I fought not to you.
You thus maligne me; yet your nature must not
Corrupt mine, nor your rude examples lead me:
If mine can mend you, I shall joy; you know
I fear you not: you have seen me proved a man
In every way of fortune, 'tis my comfort
I know no more such Brothers in the World
As Crates is.

Con. Nor I such as Euphanes:
The temper of an Angel reigns in thee.

Euph. Your Royal Mother Sir, (I had forgot)
Entreats your presence.

The. You have done her errand,
I may do yours.

Euph. Let it be truth my Lord.

Con. Crates, Ile question you for this.

Cra. Pish, your worst.

Con. Away you hounds after your scent.

Onos. Come, we'll scorn to walk to'm: now they are gone,
We'l away too.

Con. Why bear you this my Lord?

Euph. To shew the passive fortitude the best;
Vertue's a solid Rock, whereat being aym'd
The keenest darts of envy, yet unhurt
Her Marble Heroes stand, built of such Bases,
Whilst they recoyle, and wound the Shooters faces.

Enter Queen and Ladies.

Con. My Lord, the Queen.

Quee. Gentle Euphanes, how,
How do'st thou honest Lord? oh how I joy
To see what I have made, like a choyce Workman,
That having fram'd a Master-piece, doth reap
An universal commendation.
Princes are Gods in this. I'll build thee yet
(The good foundation so pleases me)
A story or two higher; let dogs bark,
They are fools that hold them dignified by blood,
They should be only made great that are good.

Euph. Oraculous Madam.

Quee. Sirrah, I was thinking
If I should marry thee, what merry tales
Our neighbour Islands would make of us;
But let that pass, you have a Mistress
That would forbid our Banes: troth I have wish'd
A thousand times that I had been a man,
Than I might sit a day with thee alone,
And talk,
But as I am I must not; there's no skill
In being good, but in not being thought ill.
Sirrah, who's that?

Euph. So't please your Majesty

Conon, the friend I su'd for.

Quee. 'Tis dispatch'd.

Con. Gracious Madam.

I owe the gods and you my life.

Quee. I thank you,

I thank you heartily; and I do think you
A very honest man, he says you are:
But now I'll chide thee; what's the cause my Son,
For my eye's every where, and I have heard,
So insolently do's thee Contumelies
Past sufferance (I am told) yet you complain not,
As if my justice were so partial

As not to right the meauelt: credit me,
I'll call him to a strict account, and fright,
By his example, all that dare curb me
In any thing that's just: I sent you for him.

Euph. Humbly he did return, he would wait on you:
But let me implore your Majesty, not to give
His Highness any check, for worthless me;
They are Court canckers, and not Counsellors
That thus inform you: they do but hate the Prince,
And would subvert me: I should curse my fortune
Even at the highest, to be made the ginne
To unscrew a Mothers love unto her Son:
Better had my pale flame in humble shades
Been spent unseen, than to be raised thus high,
Now to be thought a meteor to the State,
Portending ruine and contagion:

Beseech you then rest satisfi'd, the Prince
Is a most noble natur'd Gentleman,
And never did to me but what I took
As favors from him, my blown billowes must not Strive 'gainst my shore, that should confine me, nor Justle with Rocks to break themselves to pieces.

Quee. Well, thou'rt the composition of a god:
My Lion, Lamb, my Eaglet, and my Dove,
Whose soul runs clearer then Dianas Fount,
Nature pick'd several flowers from her choyce banks
And bound them up in thee, sending thee forth
A Poise for the bosome of a Queen.

Lady. The Prince attends you.

Quee. Farewell my good Lord.
My honest man; stay, hast no other suit?
I prathee tell me; Sirrah, thine eye speaks
As if thou hadst: out with it modest fool.

Euph. With favor Madam, I would crave your leave
To Marry, where I am bound in gratitude,
The immediate means she was to all my Being:
Nor do I think your wisdom sacred Queen
Fetters in favors, taking from me so
The liberty that meanest men enjoy.

Quee. To marry? you are a fool: thou'lt anger'd me:
Leave me, I'll think on't: Exit Euph. and Conon.
Only to try thee this, for though I love thee,

Enter Theanor.

I can subdue my self: but she that can
Enjoy thee, doth enjoy more than a man.
Nay rise without a blessing, or kneel still:
What's Sir the reason you oppose me thus,
And seek to darken what I would have shine?
Eclipse a fire much brighter than thy self,
Making your Mother not a competent Judge
Of her own actions?

The. Gracious Madam, I
I have done no more than what in royalty
(And to preserve your fame) was fit to do:
Heard you the peoples talk of you, and him
You favor so, his greatness, and your love,
The pittie given to me, you would excuse me,
They prate as if he did dishonor you:
And what know I, but his own lavish tongue
Has uttered some such speeches; he is call'd
The King of Corinth.

Quee. They are traitors all:
I wear a Christal casement 'fore my heart,
Through which each honest eye may look in to't:
Let it be prospect unto all the world,
I care not this.

The. This must not be my way;
Your pardon gracious Madam: these incitements
Made me not shew so clear a countenance
Upon the Lord Euphanes as I would:
Which since your Majesty affects so grievously
I'll clear the black cloud of it, and henceforth

Vow on this knee all love and grace to him.

Quee. Rise with my blessing, and to prove this true,
Bear him from me this Cabinet of Jewels
In your own person, tell him, for his marrying
He may dispose him how, and when he please. Exit Quee
The. I shall discharge my duty and your will. Crates?

Enter Crates.

Cra. I have heard all my Lord, how luckily
Fate pops her very spindle in our hands:
This Marriage with Beliza you shall cross,
Then have I one attempt for Lamprias more
Upon this Phaeton: where's Merione's Ring,
That in the Rape you took from her?

The. 'Tis here.

Cra. In and affect our purpose: you my Lord
Shall disobey your Mothers charge, and send
This Cabinet by some servant of her own,
That what succeeds may have no reference
Unto your Highness.

The. On, my engine on.

Cra. Now, if we be not struck by Heavens own hand,
We'l ruine him, and on his ruines stand. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Agenor, Leonidas, Merione, Beliza.
A sad Song.

WEEP no more, nor sigh nor groan
Sorrow calls no time that's gone
Violets pluck'd, the sweetest raine
Makes not fresh nor grow again;
Trim thy locks, look cheerefully
Fates bidd', ends, eyes cannot see.
Joyes as winged dreams fly fast
Why should sadness longer last.
Grief is but a wound to woe
Gent'lest fair, mourne, mourne no moe.

Ag. These heavy Ayres feed sorrow in her Lady;
And nourish it too strongly; like a Mother
That spoiles her Child with giving on't the will.

A lighter Song.

COURT Ladies laugh, and wonder. Here is one
That weeps because her Maiden head is gone
Whilst you do never fret, nor chafe, nor cry
But when too long it keeps you company,
Too well you know, Maids are like Towns on fire
Wasting themselves, if no man quenck desire.
Weep then no more fool: a new Maidenhead
Thou suffer'st loss of, in each chaste tear shed.

Bel. Some lighter note.

Leo. How like a hill of Snow she sits, and melts
Before the unchaste fire of others lust?

What heart can see her passion and not break?

Ag. Take comfort gentle Madam; you know well
Even actual sins committed without will,
Are neither sins nor shame, much more compell'd;
Your honor's no whit less, your Chastity
No whit impair'd, for fair Merione
Is more a Virgin yet then all her Sex:
Alas, 'tis done; why burne these Tapers now?
Wicked and frantick Creatures joy in night.

Leo. Imagine faire Merione had dream'd
She had been ravish'd, would she sit thus then Excruciate?

Mer. Oh.

Bel. Fye, fye, how fond is this?
What reason for this surfeit of remorse?
How many that have done ill and proceed,

Women that take degrees in wantonness,
Commence, and rise in rudiments of Lust,
That feel no scruple of this tenderness?

Mer. Pish.

Bel. Nor are you matchless in misnap, even I
Do bear an equal part of misery;
That love, belov'd, a man the Crown of men,
Whom I have friended, and how rais'd 'tis better
That all do know and speak it than my self:
When he sail'd low I might have made him mine,
Now at his full gale, it is questionable
If ever I o're-take him.

Ag. Wherefore sits
My Phebe strowdow'd in a sable cloud?
Those pearly drops which thou let's fall like beades,
Numbring on them thy vestal Orisons
Alas are spent in vain: I love thee still,
In mid't of all these showres thou sweetlier sent'st,
Like a green Meadow on an April day,
In which the Sun and west-wind play together,
Striving to catch and drink the balmy drops.

Enter Euphanes and Servant.

Ser. The Lord Euphanes Madam.

Exit Mer.

Ag. Poor Merione,

She loathes the light, and men.

Exit.

Euph. The virtuous gods preserve my Mistress.

Bel. O my most honor'd Lord, those times are chang'd,

Euph. Let times and men change, could Heaven change,
Should never change, to be devoted ever

(Euphanes)

To fair Beliza, should my load of honors,
Or any Grace which you were Author of
Detract mine honor, and diminish Grace?

The gods forbid: you here behold your servant,
Your Creature, gentle Lady, whose sound sleeps
You purchas'd for him: whose food you paid for,
Whose garments were your charge, whose first preferment
You founded: then, what since the gracious Queen
Hath, or can rear, is upon your free Land,
And you are Mistress of.

Bel. Mock me not gentle Lord,
You shine now in too high a spear for me,
We are Planets now disjoyn'd for ever: yet
Poor superstitious innocent that I am,
Give leave that I may lift my hands, and love
Not in Idolatry, but perfect zeal:
For credit me, I repent nothing I have done,
But were it to begin would do the same.

Euph. There are two Seas in Corinth, and two Queens,
And but there, not two such in the spacious Universe;
I came to tender you the man you have made,
And like a thankful stream to retribute
All you my Ocean have enrich'd me with.
You told me once you'd marry me.

Bel. Another mock? you were wont to play fair play,
You scorn poor helps; he that is sure to win,
May slight mean hearts, whose hand commands the Queen.

Euph. Let me be held the Knave through all the Stock
When I do slight my Mistress; you know well
The gracious inclination of the Queen,
Who sent me leave this morning to proceed
To marry as I saw convenience,
And a great gift of Jewels: Three days hence
The general sacrifice is done to Vesta,
And can you by then be accommodated
Your servant shall wait on you to the Temple.

Bel. Till now
I never felt a real joy indeed.

Euph. Here then I seal my duty, here my love,
Till which vouchsafe to wear this Ring, dear Mistress;
'Twas the Queens Token, and shall celebrate
Our Nuptials.

Bel. Honour still raise, and preserve

My honor'd Lord, as he preserves all honor. Exit Euph.

Enter Agenor, Leonidas, Merione.

Ag. Why shift you places thus Merione,
And will not lend a word? Could'st thou so soon
Leave sorrow as the place, how blest were I,
But 'twill not be; grief is an impudent guest,
A follower every where, a hanger on,
That words nor blows can drive away.

Leo. Dear Sister.

Bel. Who can be sad? out with these Tragick Lights,
And let day repossess her natural howres:
Tear down these blacks, cast ope' the Casements wide,
That we may joycondly behold the Sun.

I did partake with sad Merione
In all her mourning: let her now rejoyce
With glad Beliza, for Euphanes is
As full of love, full of humility
As when he wanted.

Mer. Oh — that.

Leo. Help, she faints:

Her grief has broke her heart.

Mer. No — that — that.

Ag. Mistress, what point you at?
Her lamps are out, yet still she extends her hand

As if she saw something antipathous
Unto her virtuous life.

Leo. Still, still she points,
And her lips move, but no articulate sound
Breathes from 'em: Sister, speak, what moves you thus?

Bel. Her spirits return.

Mer. Oh, hide that fatal Ring,
Where had it you Beliza?

Bel. What hid fate
Depends on it? Euphanes gave it me
As holy pledge of future Marriage.

Mer. Then is Euphanes the foul Ravisher?
Let me speak this and dye. That dismal night
Which seal'd my shame upon me, was that Ring,
The partner of my rob'd virginity.

Leo. Euphanes?

Ag. Strange.

Bel. Impossible.

Mer. Impossible to have redress on him,
Chief servant to the Queen — ha! I have read
Somewhere I am sure, of such an injury
Done to a Lady: and how she durst dye.

Exit.

Ag. Oh follow her Beliza.

Bel. To assure her,
The unlikelihood of this.

Ag. Love hides all sins.

What's to be done Leonidas?

Exit.

Leo. Why this:

Amazement takes up all my faculties;
The plagues of gods and men will muster all
To avenge this tyranny. Oh frontless man,
To dare do ill, and hope to bear it thus:
First let's implore, then cure.

Ag. Who, who can trust
The gentle looks and words of two-fac'd man?
Like Corinths double torrent, you and I
Will rush upon the Land; nor shall the Queen
Defend this Villain in his villany:
Lusts violent flames can never be withstood
Nor quench'd, but with as violent streams of blood.

Scena Prima.

Enter Crates, Uncle, Tutor, and Onos

Ono. THinks he to carry her and live.

Cra. It seems so,
And she will carry him the story says.

On. Well, hum—
Have I for this thou fair but falsest fair
Stretch'd this same simple leg over the Sea?
What though my bashfulness, and tender years,
Durst ne're reveal my affection to thy teeth?
Deep love ne're tattles, and (say they) loves bit
The deeper dip'd, the sweeter still is it.

Tut. Oh, see the power of Love: he speaks in ryme.

Cra. Oh, love would make a dog howle in ryme:
Of all the Lovers yet I have heard or read
This is the strangest: but his Guardian,
And you his Tutor should inform him better,
Thinks he, that love is answer'd by instinct?

Tut. He should make means,
For certain Sir, his bashfulness undo's him,
For from his Cradle h'had a shameful face.
Thus walks he night and day, eats not a bit,
Nor sleeps one jot, but's grown so humerous;
Drinks Ale, and takes Tobacco as you see;
Wear's a Steeletto at his Codpeece close,
Stabs on the least occasion: stroaks his beard,
Which now he puts i'th posture of a T.
The Roman T. your T. beard is the fashion,
And twifold doth expresse the enamour'd Courtier,
As full as your fork-carving Travellor.

On. Oh, black clouds of discontent invelopp me,
Garters fly off: go Hatband, bind the browes
Of some dull Citizen that fears to ake:
And Leg appear now in simplicity
Without the trapings of a Courtier:
Burst Bottons, burst, your Bachelor is worm'd.

Cra. A worm-eaten Batchelor th'rt indeed.

On. And Devil melancholly posselles me now.

Unc. Cross him not in this fit I advise you Sir.

On. Dye crimson Rose, that didst adorn these cheeks,
For yth of love is now broke forth on me. (scabby.)

Unc. Poor Boy, 'tis true: his wrists and hands are Burn eyes out in your sockets, sink and sink:

Teeth I will pick ye to the very bones,
Hang hair like Hemp, or like the Ifling Curs,
For never Powder, nor the Crisping-iron
Shall touch these dangling locks — oh — Ruby lips,
Love hath to you been like Wine-vinegar,
Now you look wan and pale, lips, ghosts ye are,
And my disgrace sharper than Mustard-seed.

Cra. How like a Chaundler he do's vent his passions,
Risum teneatis?

On. Well sung the Poet,
Love is a golden bubo, full of Dreams:
That ripen'd breaks, and fills us with extreame.

Tut. A gold buble, pupill, Oh gross solacisme
To chaster eares that understand the Latine.

On. I will not be corrected now:
I am in love, revenge is now the Cud
That I do chew: I'll challenge him.

Cra. I marry Sir.

Unc. Your honor bids you Nephew, on, and prosper.

On. But none will bear it from me, times are dangerous.

Cra. Carry it your self man.

On. Tutor, your counsel: I'll do nothing Sir
Without him.

Unc. This may rid thee, (valiant Cuz.)
Whom I have kept this forty year my Ward:
Fain would I have his state, and now of late
He did inquire at Ephesus for his age,
But the Church Book being burnt with Dian's Temple
He lost his ayne: I have try'd to famish him,
Marry he'll live o'th stones: and then for Poysons,
He is an Antidote 'gainst all of 'em;
He sprung from Mitbridates; he is so dry and hot,
He will eat Spiders faster than a Monkey:
His Maw (unhurt) keeps Quicksilver like a bladder,
The largest dose of Camphire, Opium,
Harmes not his Brain; I think his Skul's as empty
As a suckt Egg; Vitriol and Oyle of Tartar
He will eat tolls of: Henbane I am sure
And Hemlock I have made his Pot-herbs often.

Cra. If he refuse you, yours is then the honor:
If he accept, he being so great, you may
Crave both to choose the Weapon, time, and place,
Which may be ten years hence, and Calicut,
Or underneath the line to avoid advantage.

On. I am resolved.

Tut. By your favor Pupill,
Whence shall this challenge rise? for you must ground it
On some such fundamental base, or matter
As now the Gentry set their lives upon.
Did you ere cheat him at some Ordinary,
And durst he say so, and be angry? if thus,
Then you must challenge him: liath he call'd your whore,
Whore; though she be (beside yours) twenty mens?
Your honor, reputation is touched then,
And you must challenge him: Has he deny'd
On thirty damme's to accommodate money,
Though he have broke threescore before to you?
Here you must challenge him: Durst he ever shun
To drink two pots of Ale wi'ye? or to wench
Though weighty business otherwise importun'd?
He is a proud Lord,
And you may challenge him: Has he familiarly
Dislik'd your yellow Starch, or said your Dublet
Was not exactly frenchif'd? or that, that report
In fair terms was untrue? or drawn your Sword,
Cry'd 'twas ill mounted? Has he given the lye
In circle, or oblique, or semi-circle,
Or direct parrallel? you must challenge him.

On. He never gave my direct apparel the lye in's life.

Tut. But for the crown of all, Has he refus'd
To pledge your Mistris health though he were sick?

Enter Neanthes and Page.

And crav'd your pardon? you must challenge him,
There's no avoiding: one or both must drop.

On. Exquisite Tutor.

(here
Nean. Crates, I have sought you long, what make you
Fooling with these three farthings, while the Town is all in uproar, and the Prince our Master Seis'd by Leonidas, and Agenor) carried
And Prisoner kept i'the Castle, flanckes
The west part of the City, where they vow
To hold him, till your Brother, Lord Euphanes
Be rendr'd to 'em, with his life to satisfie
The Rape, by him suspected to Merione?
The Queen refuses to deliver him,
Pawning her knowledge for his-innocency,
And dares 'em do their worst on Prince Theonor,
The whole State's in combustion.

Cra. Fatall Ring.

Unc. What will become of us?

Nean. And she hath given Commission to Euphanes
And Conon (who have leaved men already)
With violence to surprize the Towre, and take 'em.

What

What will you do?

Crates. Along wi'ye, and prevent
A farther mischief: Gentlemen, our intents
We must defer: you are the Princes followers.

Nes. Will ye walk with us?

Unc. You shall pardon us.

Tut. We are his followers afar off you know.
And are contented to continue so.

Exit Crates and Neant.

Onor. Sir Boy.

Page. Sir Fool? a Challenge to my Lord?
How dar'st thou, or thy ambs--ace here think of him,
Ye Crow-pick'd heads, which your thin shoulders bear
As does the Poles on Corinth Bridge the Traitors:
Why you three Nine-pins you talk of my Lord,
And challenges? you shall not need: come draw,
His Page is able to swindle three such whelpes:
Uncle, why stand ye off: long-man advance.

Onos. Sight, what have we done Tutor?

Tut. He is a Boy,

And we may run away with honour.

Page. That ye shall not,
And being a Boy I am fitter to encounter
A Child in Law as you are, under twenty:
Thou sot, thou three-score Sot, and that's a Child
Again I grant you.

Unc. Nephew, here's an age:
Boyes are turn'd men, and men are Children.

Page. Away you Pezants with your bought Gentry;
Are not you he, when your fellow Passengers,
Your last transportment being assay'd by a Galley
Hid your self i'the Cabbin: and the Fight done
Peep'd above Hatches, and cry'd, Have we taken,
Or are we tane? Come, I do want a slipper,
But this shall serve: Swear all as I would have you,
Or I will call some dozen brother Pages,
(They are not far off I am sure) and we will blanket
You untill you piss again.

All. Nay, we will swear Sir.

Page. T'is your best course:
First, you shall swear never to name my Lord,
Or hear him nam'd hereafter, but bare-headed.
Next, to begin his health in every place,
And never to refuse to pledge it, though
You surfeit to the death. Lastly, to hold
The poorest, litlest Page in reverence;
To think him valianter, and a better Gentleman
Than you three stamp'd together: and to give him
Wine and Tobacco whereoe're you meet,
And the best meat if he can stay.

All. We swear it loyally.

Page. Then I dismiss you
True Leigemen to the Pantoffle:
I had more Articles, but I have business
And cannot stay now: so adieu dear Monsieur,
Tres noble & tres puissant.

Unc. Adieu Monsieur.

On. A vostre service & commandement.

Tut. I told you Pupill, you'd repent this foolery.

On. Who, I repent? you are mistaken Tutor,
I ne're repented any thing yet in my life,
And scorne to begin now: Come, let's be melancholly.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Queen, Euphanes, Conon, Lords.

Lord. 'Twere better treat with 'em.

Queen. I will no Treaties
With a League-breaker and a Rebell; shall I
Article with a Traitor? be compell'd
To yield an innocent unto their fury
Whom I have prov'd so to you?

Euph. Gracious Queen,
Though your own god-like disposition
Would succor Virtue, and protect the right,

Yet for the publick good, for the dear safety
Of your most Royal only Son, consent
To give me up the sacrifice to their malice,
My life is aym'd at, and 'twere better far
The blood of twenty thousand such as I
Purpled our Seas, than that that your Princely Son
Should be endanger'd.

Queen. Still well said honest Fool,
Were their demand but one hair from thy head,
By all the gods I'd scorn 'em: were they here,
The Majesty that dwels upon this brow
Should strike 'em on their knees: As for my Son,
Let 'em no more dare than they'l answer, I
An equal Mother to my Countrey, am,
And every virtuous Son of it is Son
Unto my bosome, tender as mine own.

Con. Oh, you are heavenly Madam, and the gods
Can suffer nothing pass to injure you:
The life that Conon promis'd, he stands now
Ready to pay with joy.

Queen. Farewell both,
Success attend you: you have Souldiers been,
Tam Marti quam Mercurio: if you bring not peace
Bring me their heads.

Con. I will put fair for one. Exeunt Queen, Lords.

Euph. Double the Guard upon her Highness Person,

Conon. You must perform a friendly part,
Which I shall counsel you.

Con. I am your servant. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Theanor, Agenor, Leonidas above.

Leo. Make good that Fortification, and the Watch
Keep still upon the Battlements; Royall Sir,
Weigh but our injuries, we have told you fully
The manner and the matter hailes us thus;
Nor shall this upstart Musstrum bred i'th night,
Sit brooding underneath your Mothers wings
His damn'd impieties.

Ag. For your self brave Prince,
Fear nothing that this face of arms presents:
We ask the Ravisher, and have no means
To win him from your most indulgent Mother
But by this practice.

The. Stout Leonidas,
Princely Agenor, your wrongs cry so loud,
That who so would condemn you is not heard:
I blame you not, who but Euphanes durst
Make Stories like to this? My wrong's as strong
Aske my revengeful arm to strengthen yours:
As for my fear, know you, and Greece throughout.

Enter Euphanes and Conon.

Our Mother was a Spartan Princess born,
That never taught me to spell such a word.

Con. Sir, you do tempt your life.

Euph. Conon, no more.
Do thus as thou wouldst save it. Sound Trumpet within.

Ag. What Trumpet's this?

Leo. Beneath I do perceive
Two armed men, single, that gives us summons
As they would treat.

Ag. Let us descend.

Con. My Lord,
I would you would excuse me, and proceed
According to the Queens directions.

Euph. Friend,
As thou wouldst wear that title after death.

Enter below Theanor, Agenor, Leonidas, and Soldiers.
Perform my charge: no Soldier on his life
Approach us nearer.

Con.

Con. Safety to both the Princes, Loyalty
To you Lord General, the Queen, your Mistriſs
As well as ours, though not to fear, to cut
Civil diſſention from her Land, and ſave
Much guiltleſs blood, that uprore ever thirſts,
And for the ſafeguard of her Son, by me
(As you demand) hath ſent the Lord Euphanes
To plead his own cauſe, or to ſuffer death
As you ſhall find him worthy; ſo delivering
The Prince back, I ſhall leave him to your Guard.

Leo. The Queen is good and gracious: kiſs her hand.

Ag. And ſeal our duties: Sir, depart in peace.

The. Oh Sir, you now perceive, when in the ſcales
Nature, and fond affection weigh together,
One poizes like a feather, and you know my Lords
What's to be done.

Euph. Your Highneſs is unarm'd,
Pleaſe you to uſe mine, and to lead the Army
Back to your Mother: Conon, march you with 'em.

Con. I will my Lord: But not ſo far as not
To bring you help if danger look upon you.

Euph. Why do you look ſo ſtrangely, fearfully,
Or ſtay your deathful hand, be not ſo wiſe
To ſtop your rage: look how unmov'dly, here
I give my ſelf my Countreys ſacrifice,
An innocent ſacrifice: Truth laughs at death,
And terrifies the killer more than kill'd;
Integrity thus armleſs ſeeks her foes,
And never needs the Target nor the Sword,
Bow, nor invenom'd ſhafts.

Leo. We are amaz'd,
Not at your eloquence, but impudence,
That dare thus front us.

Ag. Kill him, who knows not
The iron forehead that bold miſchief wears.

Leo. Forbear a while Agenor, I do tremble,
And ſomething ſits like virtue in his face,
Which the gods keep.

Euph. Agenor, ſtrike Leonidas
You that have purchas'd Fame on certain grounds,
Loſe it on ſuppoſition? ſnear your hands
In guiltleſs blood, laugh at my Martyrdom:
But yet remember, when Poſterity
Shall read your Volumes fill'd with virtuous acts,
And ſhall arrive at this black bloody leaf,
Noting your fooliſh barbariſms, and my wrong,
(As time ſhall make it plain) what follows this Diſciplining any noble deed of yours
Shall be quite loſt, for men will read no more.

Leo. Why? dare you ſay you are innocent?

Euph. By all the gods, as they
Of this foul crime, why Gent. pry clean through my life,
Then weigh theſe circumſtances: think you that he
Which made day night, and men to furies turn'd,
Durſt not truſt ſilence, vizors, nor her ſence
That ſuffer'd; but with Charms and Potions
Caſt her aſleep, (for all this I have enquir'd
Acted the Fable of Proſerpines Rape,
The place (by all deſcription) like to Hell:
And all to perpetrate unknown his Luſt,
Would fondly in his perſon bring a Ring,
And give it a betrothed Wife, ith' ſame houſe
Where the poor injur'd Lady liv'd and groan'd.

Ag. Hell gives us Art to reach the depth of ſin,
But leaves us wretched fools, when we are in.

Euph. Had it given me that Art, and left me ſo,
I would not thus into the Lions jaws
Have thruſt my ſelf (defenceleſs for your good,
The Princes ſafety, or the Common-weals:
You know the Queen deny'd me, and ſent us
Commanders to ſurprize you, and to raze
This Tower down, we had power enough to do it,
Or ſtarve you, as you ſaw, and not to tender
My Perſon to your wrath, which I have done,

Knowing my heart as pure as infants ſleep.

Leo. What think you, Sir?

Ag. No harm I am ſure: I weep.

Euph. The gods are juſt, and mighty: but to give you
Further aſſurance, and to make your ſelves
Judges and witneſſes of my innocence
Let me demand this queſtion, On what night
Was this foul deed committed?

Ag. On the Eave before our Marriage meant.

Euph. Leonidas,
(Your rage being off, that ſtill drowns memory)
Where was your ſelf and I that very night,
And what our conference?

Leo. By the gods 'tis true:
Both in her Highneſs Chamber conferring
Even of this Match until an hour of day,
And then came I to call you: we are ſham'd.

Ag. Utterly loſt, and ſham'd.

Euph. Neither be chear'd,
He that could find this out, can pardon it,
And know this Ring was ſent me from the Queen;
How ſhe came by it, yet is not enquir'd,
Deeper occurrents hang on't: and pray Heaven
That my ſuſpicions prove as falſe as yours,
Which (for the World) till I have greater proof
I dare not utter what, nor whom they touch;
Only this build upon, with all my nerves
I'll labour with ye, till time waken truth.

Ag. There are our ſwords Sir, turn the points on us,

Leo. Punish rebellion, and revenge your wrong,

Euph. Sir, my revenge ſhall be to make your peace,
Neither was this rebellion, but raſh love.

Enter Conon.

Co. How's this? unarm'd left, now found doubly arm'd?
And thoſe that would have ſlain him at his feet?
Oh Truth, thou art a mighty Conquererſs:
The Queen (my Lord) perplex'd in care of you,
That croſs to her command; hazard your ſelf
In perſon, here is come into the Field,
And like a Leader, marches in the head
Of all her Troops, vows that ſhe will demolish
Each ſtone of this proud Tower be you not fafe:
She chafes like ſtorms in Groves, now ſighs, now weeps,
And both ſometimes, like Rain and Wind commixt,
Abjures her Son for ever, leſs himſelf
Do fetch you off in perſon, that did give
Your ſelf to ſave him of your own free will,
And ſwears he muſt not, nor is it to live.

Euph. Oh ſhe's a Miſtriſs for the gods.

Ag. And thou a godlike ſervant fit for her.

Leo. Wide Greece

May boaſt, becauſe ſhe cannot boaſt thy like.

Euph. Thus Conon tell her Highneſs.

Co. My joy flies.

Euph. Let's toward her march: ſtern Drum ſpeak gentle peace.

Leo. We are priſoners, lead us, ne'r was known
A preſident like this: one unarm'd man
(Suspected) to captive with golden words
(Truth being his ſhield) ſo many arm'd with ſwords. Ex.

Enter (at one door) Queen, Theanor, Crates, Conon, Lords, Soldiers, (at another) Euphanes (with two ſwords) Agenor, Leonidas, Soldiers: Euphanes preſents Leonidas on his knees to the Queen: Agenor bare-headed, makes ſhew of ſorrow to the Queen, ſhe ſtamps, and ſeems to be angry at the firſt. Euphanes perſwades her, lay as their ſwords at her feet, ſhe gives them their ſwords again, they kiſs her hand and embrace, the Soldiers liſt up Euphanes, and ſhout: Theanor and Crates diſcovered, Conon whiſpers with Crates, Euphanes with Agenor, and Leonidas obſerves it, who ſeem to promiſe ſomething, Euphanes directs his Page ſomewhat.

Exeunt all but Theanor and Crates.

The. We are not lucky Crates, this great torrent
Bears all before him.

Cra. Such an age as this
Shall ne'r be seen again: virtue grows fat,
And villany pines; the Furies are asleep,
Mischief 'gainst goodness aim'd, is like a stone,
Unnaturally forc'd up an eminent hill
Whose weight falls on our heads and buries us,
We springe our selves, we sink in our own bogs.

The. What's to be done?

Cra. Repent and grow good.

The. Pish,

'Tis not the fashion (fool) till we grow old:
The peoples love to him now scares me more
Than my fond Mothers: both which, like two floods
Bearing Euphanes up; will o'rflow me,
And he is worthy, would he were in Heaven,
But that hereafter: Crates help me now,
And henceforth be at ease.

Cra. Your Will my Lord?

The. Beliza is to marry him forthwith,
I long to have the first touch of her too,
That will a little quiet me.

Cra. Fie Sir,

You'll be the Tyrant to Virginity;
To fall but once is manly, to persevere
Beastly, and desperate.

The. Cross me not, but do't:

Are not the means, the place, the instruments
The very fame? I must expect you suddenly.

Cra. I must obey you.

Who is in evil once a companion
Can hardly shake him off, but must run on.
Here I appointed Conon to attend
Him, and his sword: he promis'd to come single.

Enter Conon and Page.

To avoid prevention: he is a man on's word.

Co. You are well met Crates.

Cra. If we part so Conon.

Co. Come, we must do these mutual offices,
We must be our own Seconds, our own Surgeons,
And fairly fight, like men, not on advantage.

Cra. You have an honest bosom.

Co. Yours seems so.

Cra. Let's pair our swords: you are a just Gentleman.

Co. You might be so: now shake hands if you please,
I hough't be the cudgel fashion, 'tis a friendly one.

Cra. So, stand off.

Page. That's my cue to beckon 'em.

Co. Crates, to expostulate your wrongs to me
Were to doubt of 'em, or wish your excuse
In words, and so return like maiden Knights:
I freely thus much I profess, your spleen
And rugged carriage toward your honour'd Brother
Hath much more stirr'd me up, than mine own cause,
For I did ne'r affect these bloody men,
Nor hold 'em fitter be made publick Hangmen:
Nor Butchers call'd, than valiant Gentlemen:
For true stamp'd valour does upon just grounds,
For whom justlier should I expose my life
To save him, unto whose virtue I owe all

Cra. Conon, you think by this great deed of yours
To insinuate your self a lodging nearer
To my Brothers heart: such men as you
Are on their undertakings for their Lords,
I more disable them by answering for 'em
Than if they sate still, make 'em but their whores,
Which end Gallants now adays do fight:
Where we come not to upbraid; what men
Do, the rash world will judge; but what they are
I know: and this—Horses, we are descry'd,
And broke for fear of laughter.

Enter Euphanes, Agenor, Leonidas, Page.

Half a score.

Euph. Hold, hold: on your allegiance hold.

Ag. He that strikes next—

Leo. Falls like a Traitor on our swords.

Euph. Oh Heaven, my Brother bleeds: Conon, thou art
A villain, an unthankful man, and shalt
Pay me thy blood for his, for his is mine:
Thou wert my friend, but he is still my Brother;
And though a friend sometimes be nearer said
In some gradation it can never be
Where that same Brother can be made a friend,
Which dearest Crates thus low I implore;
What in my poverty I would not seek,
Because I would not burthen you, now here
In all my height of bliss I beg of you,
Your friendship; my advancement, Sir, is yours;
I never held it strange, pray use it so:
We are but two, which Nature fram'd
In the most useful faculties of man,
To strengthen mutually and relieve each other:
Two eyes, two ears, two arms, two legs and feet,
That where one faild, the other might supply;
And I, your other eye, ear, your arm and leg,
Tender my service, help and succor to ye.

Ag. Leo. A most divine example.

Euph. For dear Brother,

You have been blind, and lame, and deaf to me,
Now be no more so: in humility
I give ye the duty of a younger Brother,
Which take you as a Brother, not a Father,
And then you'll pay a duty back to me.

Cra. Till now I have not wept these thirty years.

Euph. Discording Brothers, are like mutual legs
Supplanting one another: he that seeks
Aid from a stranger and forsakes his Brother,
Does but like him that madly lops his arm,
And to his body joyns a wooden one:
Cuts off his natural leg, and trusts a Crutch,
Plucks out his eye to see with Spectacles.

Cra. Most dear Euphanes, in this crimson floud
Wash my unkindness out: you have o'rcome me,
Taught me humanity and brotherhood;
Full well knew Nature thou wert fitter far
To be a Ruler o'r me than a Brother,
Which henceforth be: Jove surely did descend
When thou wert gotten in some heavenly shape
And greet my Mother, as the Poets tell
Of other Women.

Ag. Be this Holy-day.

Leo. And noted ever with the whitest stone.

Co. And pardon me my Lord, look you, I bleed
Faster than Crates; what I have done I did
To reconcile your loves, to both a friend,
Which my blood cement, never to part or end.

Ag. Most worthy Conon.

Leo. Happy rise, this day

Contracts more good than a whole age hath done.

Euph. Royal Agenor, brave Leonidas,
You are main causes, and must share the fame.

Cra. Which in some part this hour shall requite
For I have aim'd my black shafts at white marks,
And now I'll put the clew into your hands
Shall guide ye most perspicuously to the depth
Of this dark Labyrinth, where so long ye were lost
Touching this old Rape, and a new intent.
Wherein your counsel, and your active wit
My dearest Brother will be necessary.

Euph. My Prophecie is come, prove my hopes true
Agenor shall have right, and you no wrong,
Time now will pluck her daughter from her Cave:
Let's hence to prevent rumour; my dear Brother,
Nature's divided streams the highest shelf
Will over-run at last, and flow to it self.

Exeunt.

Actus

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Crates, Euphanes, Neanthes, Socrates, Eraton.

Euph. I Have won the Lady to it, and that good
Which is intended to her, your faith only
And secresie must make perfect; Think not Sir, (tryal.
I speak as doubting it, for I dare hazard My soul upon the

Cra. You may safely,
But are Agenor, and Leonidas ready
To rush upon him in the Act, and seize him
In the height of his security?

Euph. At all parts as you could wish them.

Cra. Where's the Lady?

Euph. There
Where you appointed her to stay.

Cra. 'Tis wisely order'd.

Euph. Last, when you have him sure, compel him this way,
For as by accident here I'll bring the Queen
To meet you, 'twill strike greater terror to him,
To be tane unprovided of excuse,
And make more for our purposes. Exit.

Cra. Come Neanthes, our Fames and all are at the stake.

Nea. 'Tis fit that since relying on your skill, we venture
So much upon one game, you play with cunning.

Enter Theanor.

Or we shall rise such losers as —

Sof. The Prince.

Cra. The plot is laid Sir, howsoe'r I seem'd
A little scrupulous, upon better judgement
I have effected it.

The. 'Tis the last service
Of this foul kind I will employ you in.

Cra. We hope so Sir.

The. And I will so reward it —

Nea. You are bound to that; in every Family
That does write lustful, your fine Bawd gains more
(For like your Broker, he takes fees on both sides)
Than all the Officers of the house.

Sof. For us then

To be a great mans Panders, and live poor,
That were a double fault.

Cra. Come, you lose time Sir,
We will be with you instantly: the deed done,
We have a Mask that you expect not.

The. Thou art ever careful: for Joves Mercury
I would not change thee.

Era. There's an honour for you.

Nea. To be compar'd with the celestial Pimp,
Joves smock-sworn Squire, Don Hermes.

Cra. I'll deserve it,
And Gentlemen be assur'd, though what we do now
Will to the Prince Theanor look like Treason
And base disloyalty, yet the end shall prove,
When he's first taught to know himself, then you,
In what he judg'd us false, we were most true. Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Euphanes, Agenor, Leonidas, Conon.

Euph. Only make haste (my Lords) in all things else
You are instructed: you may draw your swords
For shew if you think good, but on my life
You will find no resistance in his servants,
And he's himself unarm'd.

Aq. I would he were not,
My just rage should not then be lost.

Euph. Good Sir,
Have you a care no injury be done
Unto the person of the Prince: but Conon,
Have you an eye on both, it is your trust that I relye on.

Co. Which I will discharge, assure your self most faithfully.

Euph. For the Lady,

I know your best respect will not be wanting:
Then to avoid suspicion and discovery,
I hold it requisite, that as soon as ever
The Queen hath seen her, she forsake the place,
And sit her self for that which is projected
For her good, and your honour.

Leo. If this prosper, Believe it you have made a purchase of
My service and my life.

Euph. Your love I aim at.

Leo. Here I shall find you?

Euph. With the Queen.

Co. Enough Sir.

Enter Page.

Page. The Queen enquires for you my Lord, I have met
A dozen Messengers in search of you.

Enter Queen, Ladies, Attendants.

Euph. I knew I should be sought for, as I wish'd
She's come her self in person.

Qu. Are you found Sir?

I wonder where you spend your hours, methinks
Since I so love your company, and profess
'Tis the best comfort this life yields me; mine
Should not be tedious to you.

Euph. Gracious Madam,
To have the happiness to see and hear you,
Which by your bounty is conferr'd upon me,
I hold so great a blessing, that my honours
And wealth compar'd to that, are but as Cyphers
To make that number greater: yet your pardon
For borrowing from my duty so much time
As the provision for my sudden Marriage
Exacted from me.

Qu. I perceive this Marriage
Will keep you often from me: but I'll bear it.
She's a good Lady, and a fair, Euphanes,
Yet by her leave I will share with her in you:
I am pleas'd that in the night she shall enjoy you
And that's sufficient for a Wife: the day-time
I will divorce you from her.

Leo. within. We will force you if you resist.

Qu. What noise is that?

The. within. Base Traytors.

Euph. It moves this way.

Enter Agenor, Leonidas with Theanor, Nerione like Beliza.
Conon, Crates, Neanthes, Socrates Eraton, Guard.

Qu. What e'r it be I'll meet it,
I was not born to fear: Who's that Beliza?

Euph. My worthiest, noblest Mistriß.

Exit

Qu. Stay her, ha?

All of you look as you were rooted here,
And wanted motion: what new Gorgons head
Have you beheld, that you are all turn'd Statues?
This is prodigious: has none a tongue
To speak the cause?

Leo. Could every hair, great Queen
Upon my head yield an articulate sound,
And altogether speak, they could not yet
Express the villany we have discoverd,
And yet, when with a few unwilling words
I have deliver'd what must needs be known,
You'll say I am too eloquent, and wish
I had been born without a tongue.

Qu. Speak boldly,
For I, unmov'd with any loss, will hear.

Leo. Then know, we have found out the Ravisher
Of my poor Sister, and the place, and means
By which th'unfortunate, though fair Beliza
Hath met a second violence.

Euph. This confirms what but before I doubted to my ruine.
My Lady ravish'd.

Qu. Point me out the villain;

That guilty wretched monster that hath done this,
I hat I may look on him, and in mine eye
He reads his Sentence.

Leo. That I truly could
Name any other but the Prince, that heard,
You have it all.

Qu. Wonder not that I shake,
The miracle is greater that I live,
Having endur'd the thunder that thy words
Have thrown upon me: dar'it thou kneel, with hope
Of any favor, but a speedy death,
And that too in the dreadful'st shape that can
Appear to a despairing leprous soul,
If thou hast any? no, libidinous beast,
Thy lust hath alter'd so thy former Being,
By Heaven I know thee not.

Th. Although unworthy
Yet still I am your Son.

Qu. Thou lyest, lyest falsely,
My whole life never knew but one chaste bed,
Nor e'r desir'd warmth but from lawful fires,
Can I be then the Mother to a Goat,
Whose lust is more insatiate than the grave,
And like infectious air ingenders plagues,
To murder all that's chaste, or good in Woman?
The gods I from my youth have serv'd and fear'd,
Whose holy Temples thou hast made thy Brothels;
Could a Religious Mother then bring forth
So damn'd an Atheist? read but o'r my life,
My actions, manners, and made perfect in them
But look into the story of thy self
As thou art now, not as thou wert Theonor,
And reason will compel thee to confess,
Thou art a stranger to me.

Ag. Note but how heavy
The weight of guilt is: it so low hath sunk him
That he wants power to rise up in defence
Of this bad cause-

Qu. Perswade me not Euphanes,
This is no Prince, nor can claim part in me:
My Son was born a Free-man, this a Slave
To beastly passions, a Fugitive,
And run away from virtue: bring bonds for him.
By all the honour that I owe to Justice
He loses me for ever that seeks to save him:
Bind him I say, and 'ts like a wretch that knows
He stands condemn'd before he hears the Sentence,
With his base Agents, from my sight remove him,
And lodge them in the Dungeon: As a Queen
And Patroness to Justice I command it:
Thy tears are like unseasonable showers,
And in my heart now steel'd can make no entrance:
Thou art cruel to thy self (Fool) 'tis not want
In me of soft compassion; when thou left'st
To be a Son, I ceas'd to be a Mother;
Away with them: The children I will leave
To keep my name, to all posterities,
Shall be the great examples of my Justice,
The government of my Countrey which shall witness
How well I rul'd my self: bid the wrong'd Ladies
Appear in Court to morrow, we will hear them;
And by one Act of our severity
For fear of punishment, or love to virtue,
Teach others to be honest: all will shun
To tempt her Laws, that would not spare her Son. Ex.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Onos, Uncle, and Tutor.

Unc. Nay Nephew.

Tut. Pupill, hear but reason.

On. No, I have none, and will hear none; oh my honor,
My honor blasted in the bud, my youth,
My hopeful youth, and all my expectation
Ever to be a man, are lost for ever.

Unc. Why Nephew, we as well as you are dub'd
Knights of the Pantofle.

Tut. And are shouted at,
Kick'd, scorn'd, and laugh'd at by each Page and Groom,
Yet with erected heads we bear it.

Onos. Alas,
You have years, and strength to do it; but were you
(As I) a tender gristle, apt to bow,
You would like me with Cloaks enveloped,
Walk thus, then stamp, then stare.

Unc. He will run mad
I hope, and then all's mine.

Tut. Why look you Pupill,
There are for the recovery of your honor
Degrees of Medicines; for a tweak by the Nose
A man's to travel but six months, then blow it
And all is well again: the Bastinado
Requires a longer time, a year or two,
And then 'tis buried: I grant you have been baff'd,
'Tis but a journey of some thirty years
And it will be forgotten.

Onos. Think you so?

Tut. Assuredly.

Unc. He may make a shorter cut,
But hang or drown himself, and on my life
'Twill no more trouble him.

Onos. I could ne'r endure
Or Hemp or Water, they are dangerous tools
For youth to deal with: I will rather follow
My Tutors counsel,

Tut. Do so.

Onos. And put in
For my security, that I'll not return
In thirty years, my whole 'state to my Uncle.

Unc. That I like well of.

On. Still provided Uncle,
That at my coming home you will allow me
To be of age, that I may call to account
This Page that hath abus'd me.

Unc. 'Tis a match.

On. Then Corinth, thus the bashful Lamprias
Takes leave of thee: and for this little time
Of thirty years, will labour all he can,
Though he goes young forth, to come home a man. Ex.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Euphanes and Marshal.

Euph. Are your Prisoners ready?

Mar. When it shall please the Queen
To call them forth my Lord.

Euph. Pray you do me the favour
To tell me how they have born themselves this night
Of their imprisonment?

Mar. Gladly Sir; your Brother
With the other Courtiers willingly receiv'd
All courtesies I could offer; eat, and drank,
And were exceeding merry, so dissembling
Their guilt, or confident in their innocence,
That I much wondred at it. But the Prince,
That (as born highest) should have grac'd his fall
With greatest courage, is so sunk with sorrow,
That to a common judgement he would seem
To suffer like a Woman: but to me,
That from the experience I have had of many
Look further in him, I do find the deep
Consideration of what's past, more frights him
Than any other punishment.

Euph. That is indeed
True magnanimity: the other but
A desperate bastard valour.

Mar. I press'd to him,
And notwithstanding the Queens strict command,
(Having your Lordships promise to secure me)

Offer'd

Offer'd to free him from his bonds, which he Refus'd, with such a sorrow, mixt with scorn That it amaz'd me; yet I urg'd his Highness To give one Reason for't: he briefly answer'd, That he had fate in judgement on himself, And found that he deserv'd them: that he was A Ravisher, and so to suffer like one, Which is the reason of my tears: he addeth, For wer't not I again should break the Laws, By scorning all their rigor can inflict, I should dye smiling.

Euph. I forbear to wonder That you were mov'd that saw this: I am struck With the relation so. 'Tis very well; See all things ready. I do wish I could Send comfort to the Prince; be ready with him; 'Tis in the Queens breast only which for us } Bar brought } in. To search into were fauciness, to determine What she thinks fit.

Enter Leonidas with Merione (in white) Euphanes with Beliza (in black) Queen, Agenor, Conon, Marshal, with Theamor, Crates, Solicles, Eraton, Lords, Ladies, Guard.

Lord. Make way there for the Queen.

Quee. Read first the Law, and what our Ancestors Have in this case provided to deter Such like offenders: To you gentle Ladies This only, Would I could as well give comfort, As bid you you be secure from fear or doubt Of our displeasure be as confident As if your plea were 'gainst a common man, To have all right from us; I will not grieve For what's not worth my pitty: Read the Law.

Clerk reads.

Lycurgus the nineteenth against Rapes: It is provided: and publickly enacted and confirmed, That any man of what degree soever, offering violence to the chastity of a Virgin, shall (Ipso facto) be liable to her accusation, and according to the said Law be censur'd; Ever provided, that it shall be in the choice of the said Virgin so abused, either to compell the Offender to marry her without a Dowry, if so she will be satisfied, or demanding his head for the offence, to have that accordingly performed.

Qu. You hear this: what do you demand?

Mer. The benefit

The Law allows me.

Bel. For the injury

Done to mine Honor, I require his head.

Mer. I likewise have an eye upon mine Honor, But knowing that his death cannot restore it I ask him for my Husband.

Bel. I was ravish'd, And will have justice.

Mer. I was ravish'd too, I kneel for mercy.

Bel. I demand but what The Law allows me.

Mer. That which I desire Is by the same Law warranted.

Bel. The Rape

On me hath made a forfeit of his life, Which in revenge of my disgrace I plead for.

Mer. The Rape on me gives me the priviledge To be his Wife, and that is all I sue for.

Age. A doubtful case.

Leo. Such pretty Lawyers, yet I never saw nor read of.

Euph. May the Queen Favour your sweet plea, Madam

Bel. Is that justice?

Shall one that is to suffer for a Rape Be by a Rape defended? Look upon

The publick enemy of chastity, This lustful Satyr, whose enrag'd desires The ruine of one wretched Virgins honor Would not suffice; and shall the wrack of two Be his protection? May be I was ravish'd For his lust only, thou for his defence; O sine evasion! shall with such a slight Your Justice be deluded? your Laws cheated? And he that for one fact deserv'd to die, For sinning often, find impunity? But that I know thee I would swear thou wert A false Impostor, and suborn'd to this; And it may be thou art Merione: For hadst thou suffer'd truly what I have done, Thou wouldst like me complain, and call for vengeance, And our wrongs being equal, I alone Should not desire revenge: But be it so, If thou prevail, even he will punish it, And foolish mercy shew'd to him undo thee, Consider, fool, before it be too late, What joys thou canst expect from such a Husband, To whom thy first, and what's more, forc'd embraces, Which men say heighten pleasure, were distastful.

Mer. 'Twas in respect, that then they were unlawful, Unblest'd by Hymen, and left stings behind them, Which from the marriage-bed are ever banish'd. Let this Court be then the image of Joves throne, Upon which grace and mercy still attend, To intercede between him and his Justice; And since the Law allows as much to me As she can challenge, let the milder sentence, Which best becomes a Mother, and a Queen Now overcome; nor let your wisdom suffer In doing right to her, I in my wrong Indure a second Ravishment.

Bel. You can free him

Only from that which does concern your self, Not from the punishment that's due to me: Your injuries you may forgive, not mine; I plead mine own just wreak, which will right both, Where that which you desire robs me of justice; 'Tis that which I appeal to.

Mer. Bloody Woman, Dost thou desire his punishment? Let him live then; For any man to marry where he likes not Is still a lingring torment.

Bel. For one Rape

One death's sufficient, that way cannot catch me.

Mer. To you I fly then, to your mercy Madam, Exempting not your Justice, be but equal; And since in no regard I come behind her, Let me not so be undervalu'd in Your Highness favor, that the world take notice You so prefer'd her, that in her behalf You kill'd that Son, you would not save for me; Mercy, O mercy Madam.

Bel. Great Queen, justice.

Age. With what a Masculine constancy the grave Lady hath heard them both?

Leo. Yet how unmov'd she sits In that which most concerns her?

Con. Now she rises?

And having well weigh'd both their arguments, Resolves to speak.

Euph. And yet again she pauses; O Conon, such a resolution once A Roman told me he had seen in Cato Before he kill'd himself.

Qu. 'Tis now determin'd.

Merione, I could wish I were no Queen, To give you satisfaction; no Mother Beliza, to content you; and would part, Even with my being, both might have their wishes; But since that is impossible, in few words

I will deliver what I am resolv'd on:
 The end for which all profitable Laws
 Were made, looks two ways only, the reward
 Of innocent good men, and the punishment
 Of bad Delinquents: Ours, concerning Rapes,
 Provided that same latter of Marriage
 For him that had fall'n once, not then foreseeing
 Mankind could prove so monstrous, to tread twice
 A path so horrid. The great Law-giver
Draco, That for his strange severity
 Was said to write his stern Decrees in blood,
 Made none for Parricides, presuming that
 No man could be so wicked; Such might be
Lycurgus answer (did he live) for this.
 But since I find that in my Sonnet, which was not
 Doubted in any else, I will add to it;
 He cannot marry both, but for both dying,
 Both have their full revenge: You see Beliza
 You have your wish; with you Merione
 I'll spend a tear or two, so Heaven forgive thee.
The. Upon my knees I do approve your judgement,
 And beg that you would put it into act
 With all speed possible; only that I may,
 Having already made peace with my self,
 Part so with all the world: Princely Agenor
 I ask your pardon; yours my Lord Euphanes;
 And Crates with the rest too, I forgive you;
 Do you the like for me: Yours, gracious Mother,
 I dare not ask, and yet if that my death
 Be like a Son of yours, though my life was not,
 Perhaps you may vouchsafe it: Lastly, that
 Both these whom I have wrong'd, may with my ashes
 No heavy burden, e'r I suffer death,
 For the restoring of Meriones honor,
 Let me be married to her, and then dye
 For you Beliza.

Qu. Thou hast made in this
 Part of amends to me, and to the world,
 Thy suit is granted, call a Flamyn forth
 To do this holy work; with him a Headfman.

Enter Flamyn and Executioner.

Raise up thy weeping eyes Merione,
 With this hand I confirm thy Marriage,
 Wishing that now the gods would shew some miracle,
 That this might not divorce it.

Cra. To that purpose
 I am their Minister, stand not amaz'd,
 To all your comforts I will do this wonder,
 Your Majesty (with your pardon I must speak it)
 Allow'd once heretofore of such a Contract,

Which you repenting afterwards, revok'd it,
 Being fully bent to match her with Agenor,
 The griev'd Prince knowing this, and yet not daring
 To cross what you determin'd, by an oath
 Bound me and these his followers to do something
 That he might once enjoy her, we swore to it,
 And easily perswaded, being assur'd
 She was his Wife before the face of Heaven,
 Although some ceremonious forms were wanting,
 Committed the first Rape, and brought her to him,
 Which broke the Marriage; but when we perceiv'd
 He purpos'd to abuse our ready service
 In the same kind: upon the chaste Beliza,
 Holding our selves less ty'd to him than goodness;
 I made discovery of it to my Brother,
 Who can relate the rest.

Euph. It is most true.

Qu. I would it were:

Euph. In every circumstance

It is upon my soul: For this known to me,
 I wan Merione in my Ladies habit,
 To be again (but willingly) surpriz'd,
 But with Agenor, and her noble Brother,
 With my approv'd friend Conon, with such speed
 She was pursu'd, that the lewd act scarce ended,
 The Prince (assur'd he had enjoy'd Beliza,
 For all the time Meriones face was cover'd)
 Was apprehended and brought to your presence,
 But not till now discover'd, in respect
 I hop'd the imminent danger of the Prince,
 To which his loose unquenched heats had brought him,
 Being pursu'd unto the latest tryal
 Would work in him compunction, which it has done;
 And these two Ladies in their feign'd contentions,
 To your delight I hope have serv'd as Maskers
 To their own Nuptials.

Qu. My choice was worthy

When first I look'd on thee, as thou hast order'd
 All shall be done, and not the meanest that
 Plaid in this unexpected Comedy,
 But shall partake our bounty: And my Lord,
 That with the rest you may seem satisfi'd,
 If you dare venture on a Queen, not yet
 So far in debt to years, but that she may Bring you a lusty Boy, I offer up
 My self and Kingdom, during my life to you.

Ag. It is a blessing which I durst not hope for,
 But with all joy receive.

All. We all applaud it.

Qu. Then on unto the Temple, where the rights
 Of Marriage ended, we'll find new delights.

Exeunt.

Here endeth the Queen of Corinth.

Enter Bonduca, Daughters, Hengo, Nennius, Soldiers.

Bon.  He hardy Romans? O ye gods of Britain,
The rust of Arms, the blushing
shame of soldiers;
Are these the men that conquer
by inheritance?
The Fortune-makers? these the Julians.

Enter Caratach.

That with the Sun measure the end of Nature,
Making the World but one Rome and one Cæsar?
Shame, how they flee! Cæsar's soft soul dwells in 'em;

Their Mothers got 'em sleeping, Pleasure nurst 'em,
Their Bodies sweat with sweet Oils, Loves allurements,
Not lustie Arms. Dare they send these to seek us,
These Roman Girls? Is Britain grown so wanton?
Twice we have beat 'em, Nennius scatter'd 'em,
And through their big-bon'd Germans, on whose Pikes
The honour of their actions sit in triumph,
Made Themes for Songs to shame 'em, and a Woman,
A Woman beat 'em, Nennius; a weak Woman,
A Woman beat these Romans.

Car. So it seems.

A man would shame to talk so.

Bon. Who's that?

Car. I.

Bon. Cousin, do you grieve at my fortunes:

Car. No, Bonduca,

If I grieve, 'tis at the bearing of your fortunes;
You put too much wind to your sail: Discretion
And hardy valour are the twins of honour,
And nurs'd together, make a Conqueror:
Divided, but a talker. 'Tis a truth.

That Rome has fled before us twice, and routed;
A truth we ought to crown the gods for, Lady,
And not our tongues. A truth is none of ours,
Nor in our ends, more than the noble bearing:
For then it leaves to be a virtue, Lady;
And we that have been Victors, beat our selves,
When we insult upon our honors subject.

Bon. My valiant Cousin, is it foul to say
What liberty and honor bid us do,
And what the gods allow us?

Car. No, Bonduca,

So what we say exceed not what we do.
Ye call the Romans fearful, fleeing Romans,
And Roman Girls, the lees of tainted pleasures:
Does this become a doer? are they such?

Bon. They are no more.

Car. Where is your Conquest then?

Why are your Altars crown'd with wreaths of flowers,
The beasts with gilt horns waiting for the fire?
The holy Druides composing Songs
Of everlasting life to Victory?

Why are these triumphs, Lady? for a May-game?
For hunting a poor herd of wretched Romans?

Is it no more? shut up your Temples, Britains,
And let the Husbandman redeem his heifers;
Put out our holy fires; no Timbrel ring;
Let's home, and sleep; for such great overthrows;
A Candle burns too bright a sacrifice,
A Glow-worms tail too full of flame. O Nennius;
Thou hadst a noble Uncle knew a Roman,
And how to speak him, how to give him weight
In both his fortunes.

Bon. By—I think

Ye doat upon these Romans, Caratach.

Car. Witness these wounds, I do; they were fairly given,
I love an enemy, I was born a Soldier;
And he that in the head on's Troop defies me,
Bending my manly Body with his sword,
I make a Mistress. Yellow-tressed Hymen
Ne'er ty'd a longing Virgin with more joy,
Than I am married to that man that wounds me:
And are not all these Romans? Ten struck Battels
I suck'd these honour'd scars from, and all Roman:
Ten years of bitter nights and heavy marches,
When many a frozen storm sing thorow my Curaffe,
And made it doubtful whether that or I
Were the more stubborn metall, have I wrought thorow,
And all to try these Romans. Ten times a night
I have swom the Rivers, when the Stars of Rome
Shot at me as I floated, and the billows
Tumbled their watry ruins on my shoulders,
Charging my batter'd sides with troops of Agues;
And still to try these Romans, whom I found
(And if I lye, my wounds be henceforth backward,
And be you witness, gods, and all my dangers)
As ready, and as full of that I brought (Which was not fear nor flight) as valiant,
As vigilant, as wise, to do and suffer,
Ever advanced as forward as the Britains,
Their sleeps as short, their hopes as high as ours.
I, and as subtil, Lady. 'Tis dishonour,
And follow'd, will be impudence, Bonduca,
And grow to no belief, to taint these Romans.
Have not I seen the Britains——

Bon. What?

Car. Disheartned,

Run, run, Bonduca, not the quick rack swifter;

The Virgin from the hated Ravisher
Not half so fearful? not a flight drawn home.

A round stone from a sling, a Lovers wish
E'r made that haste that they have. By——
I have seen these Britains, that you magnifie,
Run as they would have out-run time and roaring
Bafely for mercy, roaring: the light shadows,
That in a thought scur o'r the fields of Corn,
Halted on crutches to'em.

Bon. O ye Powers,
What scandals do I suffer?

Car. Yes, Bonduca,

I have seen thee run too, and thee, Nennius;
Yea, run apace, both; then when Penyus
The Roman Girl, cut thorow your armed Carts,
And drive 'em headlong on ye down the hill:
Then when he hunted ye like Britain-Foxes.
More by the scent than fight: then did I see
These valiant and approved men of Britain;
Like boading Owls, creep into tods of Ivie.
And hoot their fears to one another nightly.

Nen. And what did you then, Caratach?

Car. I fled too,

But not for fast; your Jewel had been lost then,
Young Hengo there; he trasht me, Nennius:
For when your fears out-run him, then stept I,
And in the head of all the Romans fury
Took him, and, with my tough Belt, to my back
I buckled him: behind him, my sure Shield;
And then I follow'd. If I say I fought
Five times in-bringing off this bud of Britain,
I lye not, Nennius. Neither had ye heard
Me speak this, or ever seen the child more,
But that the Son of Virtue, Penyus
Seeing me steer thorow all these storms of danger,
My Helm still in my hand, my Sword my prow,
Turn'd to my foe my face, he cry'd out nobly,
Go Britain, bear thy Lions whelp off safely;
Thy manly sword has ransom'd thee: grow strong,
And let me meet thee once again in Arms;
Then if thou stand'st, thou art mine. I took his offer,
And here I am to honour him.

Bon. O Cousin,

From what a flight of honour hast thou checkt me?
What wouldst thou make me, Caratach?

Car. See, Lady,

The noble use of others in our losses:
Does this afflict ye? Had the Romans cry'd this,
And as we have done theirs, sung out these fortunes,
Rail'd on our base condition, hooted at us,
Made marks as far as the earth was ours, to shew us
Nothing but sea could stop our flights; despis'd us,
And held it equal, whether banqueting
Or beating of the Britains were more business,
It would have gall'd ye.

Bon. Let me think we conquer'd.

Car. Do; but so think, as we may be conquer'd:
And where we have found virtue, though in those
That came to make us slaves, let's cherish it.
There's not a blow we gave since Julius landed,
That was of strength and worth, but like records,
They file to after-ages. Our Registers,
The Romans, are for noble deeds of honour;
And shall we burn their mentions with upbraidings?

Bon. No more, I see my self: thou hast made me, Cousin,
More than my fortunes durst, for they abus'd me,
And wound me up so high, I swell'd with glory:
Thy temperance has cur'd that Tympany,
And given me health again, nay, more discretion.
Shall we have peace? for now I love these Romans.

Car. Thy love and hate are both unwise ones, Lady.

Bon. Your reason?

Nen. Is not peace the end of Arms?

Car. Not where the cause implies a general conquest:

Had we a difference with some petty Ille,
Or with our neighbors (Lady) for our Land-marks,
The taking in of some rebellious Lord,
Or making a head against Commotions,
After a day of Blood, Peace might be argued:
But where we grapple for the ground we live on,
The Liberty we hold as dear as life,
The gods we worship, and next those, our Honors;
And with those swords that know no end of Battel:
Those men beside themselves allow no neighbor;
Those minds that where the day is, claim inheritance,
And where the Sun makes ripe the fruits, their harvest,
And where they march, but measure out more ground
To add to Rome, and here i' th' bowels on us;
It must not be; no, as they are our foes,
And those that must be so, until we tire 'em,
Let's use the peace of Honor, that's fair dealing,
But in our ends, our swords. That hardy Romane
That hopes to graft himself into my stock;
Must first begin his kindred under-ground,
And be alli'd in asties.

Bon. Caratach,
As thou hast nobly spoken, shall be done;
And Hengo to thy charge I here deliver:
The Romans shall have worthy Wars.

Car. They shall.
And, little Sir, when your young bones grow stiffer,
And when I see ye able in a morning
To beat a dozen boys, and then to breakfast,
I'll tye ye to a sword.

Heng. And what then Uncle?
Car. Then ye must kill, Sir, the next valiant Romane that calls ye knave.

Hen. And must I kill but one?

Car. An hundred, boy, I hope.

Hen. I hope five hundred.

Car. That's a noble boy. Come, worthy Lady,
Let's to our several charges, and henceforth
Allow an enemy both weight and worth.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Junius and Petillius, two Roman Captains.

Pet. What ail'st thou, man? dost thou want meat?

Jun. No.

Pet. Clothes?

Jun. Neither. For heavens love, leave me.

Pet. Drink?

Jun. Ye tire me.

Pet. Come, 'tis drink; I know 'tis drink.

Jun. 'Tis no drink.

Pet. I say 'tis drink: for what affliction
Can light so heavy on a Soldier,
To dry him up as thou art, but no drink?
Thou shalt have drink.

Jun. Prethee Petillius—

Pet. And by mine honor, much drink, valiant drink:
Never tell me, thou shalt have drink. I see,
Like a true friend, into thy wants: 'tis drink;
And when I leave thee to a desolation,
Especially of that dry nature, hang me.

Jun. Why do you this to me?

Pet. For I see.

Although your modesty would fain conceal it,
Which sits as sweetly on a Soldier,
As an old side-saddle.

Jun. What do you see?

Pet. I see as far as day, that thou want'st drink.
Did I not find thee gaping like an Oyster
For a new tide? thy very thoughts lie bare
Like a low ebb? thy Soul that rid in Sack,
Lies moor'd for want of liquor? Do but see

Into thy self; for by—I do:

For all thy body's chapt and crackt like timber
For want of moisture, what is't thou wantst there, Junius,
And if it be not drink?

Jun. You have too much on't.

Pet. It may be a whore too; say it be: come, meecher,
Thou shalt have both: a pretty valiant fellow,
Die for a little lap and lechery?

No, it shall ne'r be said in our Countrey,
Thou dy'dst o' th' Chin-cough. Hear, thou noble Roman,
The Son of her that loves a Soldier,
Hear what I promised for thee; thus I said,
Lady, I take thy Son to my companion,
Lady, I love thy son, thy Son loves War,
The war loves danger, danger drink, drink discipline,
Which is society and lechery;

These two beget Commanders: fear not, Lady,
Thy Son shall lead,

Jun. 'Tis a strange thing, Petillius.
That so ridiculous and loose a mirth
Can master your affections.

Petil. Any mirth,
And any way, of any subject, Junius,
Is better than unmanly mustiness:
What harm's in drink, in a good wholesome wench?
I do beseech ye, Sir, what error? yet
It cannot out of my head handsomely,
But thou wouldst fain be drunk: come, no more fooling,
The General has new wine, new come over.

Jun. He must have new acquaintance for it too,
For I will none, I thank ye.

Pet. None I thank ye?

A short and touchie answer. None I thank ye:
Ye do not scorn it, do ye?

Jun. Gods defend, Sir;
I owe him still more honor.

Pet. None, I thank ye:

No company, no drink, no wench, I thank ye.
Ye shall be worse intreated, Sir.

Jun. Petillius,
As thou art honest, leave me.

Pet. None, I thank ye;

A modest and a decent resolution,
And well put on. Yes, I will leave ye, Junius,
And leave ye to the boys, that very shortly
Shall all salute ye, by your new surname

Of Junius None I thank ye. I would starve now,
Hang, drown, despair, deserve the forks, lie open
To all the dangerous passes of a wench,
Bound to believe her tears, and wed her aches,
E'r I would own thy follies. I have found ye,
Your lays, and out-leaps Junius, haunts, and lodges:
I have view'd ye, and I have found ye by my skill
To be a fool o' th' first head, Junius,
And I will hunt ye: ye are in love, I know it:
Ye are an ass, and all the Camp shall know it.
A peevish idle boy; your Dame shall know it;

Enter Corporal Judas, and four Soldiers.

Jud. A Bean? a Princely diet, a full Banquet,
To what we compass.

1 Sold. Fight like Hogs for Acorns?

2 Sold. Venture our lives for Pig-nuts?

Pet. What ail these Rascals?

3 Sold. If this hold, we are starv'd.

Jud. For my part, friends,
Which is but twenty Beans a day, a hard world
For Officers, and men of action;
And those so clipt by master Mouse, and rotten:
For understand 'em French Beans, where the fruits
Are ripen'd like the people in old tubs.
For mine own part, I say, I am starv'd already.
Not worth another Bean, consum'd to nothing,

D

Nothing

Nothing but flesh and bones left, miserable:
Now if this mustie provender can prick me
To honourable matters of atchievement, Gentlemen,
Why there's the point.

4 Sold. I'll fight no more.

Petill. You'll hang then,
A fovereign help for hunger. Ye eating Rascals,
Whose gods are Beef and Brewis, whose brave angers
Do execution upon these, and Chibbals:
Ye dogs heads i'th' porridge-pot; you fight no more?
Does Rome depend upon your resolution
For eating mouldy Pie-crust?

3. Sold. Would we had it.

Jud. I may do service, Captain.

Petill. In a Fish-market.

You, Corporal Curry-Comb, what will your fighting
Profit the Common-wealth? do you hope to triumph,
Or dare your vamping valour, goodman Coblér,
Clap a new soul to th' Kingdom? s'death, ye dog-whelps
You, fight, or not fight.

Jud. Captain.

Petill. Out, ye flesh-flies,
Nothing but noise and nastiness.

Jud. Give us meat,
Whereby we may do.

Petill. Whereby hangs your valour?

Jud. Good bits afford good blows.

Petill. A good position:

How long is't since thou eat'st last, wipe thy mouth,
And then tell truth.

Jud. I have not eat to th' purpose — Garlick?

Petill. To th' purpose? what's that? half a Cow and Ye Rogues, my company eat Turf, and talk not;
Timber they can digest, and fight upon't;
Old mats, and mud with spoons, rare meats. Your shoes
Dare ye cry out for hunger, and those extant? (slaves?)
Suck your Sword-hilts, ye slaves, if ye be valiant,
Honor will make 'em march-pain: to the purpose?
A grievous penance. Dost thou see that Gentleman,
That melancholly Monsieur?

Jun. Pray ye, Petillius.

Pet. He has not eat these three weeks.

2 Sold. 'Has drunk the more then,

3 Sold. And that's all one.

Petill. Nor drunk nor slept these two months.

Jud. Captain, we do beseech you as poor Soldiers,
Menthat have seen good days, whose mortal stomachs
May sometime feel afflictions.

Jun. This, Petillius,
Is not so nobly done.

Petill. 'Tis common profit;
Urge him to th' point, he'll find you out a food
That needs no teeth nor stomach; a strange furmity
Will feed ye up as fat as hens i'th' foreheads,
And make ye fight like Fichocks, to him.

Jud. Captain.

Jun. Do you long to have your throats cut?

Petill. See what metal

It makes in him: two meals more of this melancholly,
And there lies Caratach.

Jud. We do beseech ye,

2 Sold. Humbly beseech your valour.

Jun. Am I only

Become your sport Petillius?

Jud. But to render

In way of general good, in preservation.

Jun. Out of my thoughts, ye slaves.

4 Sold. Or rather pity.

3 Sold. Your warlike remedy against the maw-worms.

Jud. Or notable receipt to live by nothing.

Petill. Out with your Table-books.

Jun. Is this true friendship?

And must my killing-griefs make others May-games?

Stand from my swords point, slaves, your poor starv'd spirits

Can make me no oblations; else, O love,
Thou proudly blind destruction, I would send thee
Whole Hecatombs of hearts, to bleed my sorrows.

Jud. Alas, he lives by love, Sir.

Exit Junius.

Pet. So he does, Sir,

And cannot you do so too? All my Company
Are now in love, ne'r think of meat, nor talk
Of what Provant is: Aymeas, and Heartly hey-boes,
Are Sallets fit for Soldiers. Live by meat;
By larding up your bodies? 'tis lewd, and lazie,
And shews ye meerly mortal, dull, and drives ye
To fight like Camels, with baskets at your noses.
Get ye in love; ye can whore well enough,
That all the world knows: fast ye into Famine,
Yet ye can crawl like Crabs to wenches, handsomely,
Fall but in love now, as ye see example,
And follow it but with all your thoughts, probatum,
There's so much charge sav'd, and your hunger's ended.
Away, I hear the General: get ye in love all, } Drum afar
Up to the ears in love, that I may hear } off.
No more of these rude murmurings; and discreetly
Carry your stomachs, or I prophesie
A pickel'd Rope will choak ye. Jog, and talk not. Exeunt.

Enter Swetonius, Demetrius, Decius, Drum, Colours.

Swet. Demetrius, is the messenger dispatch'd
To Penyus, to command him to bring up
The Volans Regiment?

Dem. He's there by this time.

Swet. And are the Horse well view'd we brought from Dec. The Troops are full, and lusty. (Mona)

Swet. Good Petillius,

Look to those eating Rogues, that bawl for victuals,
And stop their throats a day or two: provision
Waits but the wind to reach us.

Pet. Sir, already

I have been tampring with their stomachs, which I find
As deaf as Adders to delays: your clemency
Hath made their murmurs, mutinies, nay, rebellions:
Now, and they want but Mustard, they'r in uproars
No oil but Candy, Lusitanian Figs
And Wine from Lesbos now can satisfie 'em:
The British waters are grown dull and muddy,
The fruit disgustful: Orontes must be sought for,
And Apples from the happy Isles: the truth is,
They are more curious now in having nothing,
Than if the sea and land turn'd up their treasures:
This lost the Colonies, and gave Bonduca
(With shame we must record it) time and strength
To look into our Fortunes; great discretion
To follow offered Victory; and last, full pride
To brave us to our teeth, and scorn our ruines.

Swet. Nay, chide not, good Petillius, I confess
My will to conquer Mona, and long stay
To executethat Will, let in these losses:
All shall be right again, and as a Pine
Rent from Oeta by a sweeping tempest,
Joynted again, and made a Mast, defies
Those angry winds that split him: so will I,
Pic'd to my never-failing strength and fortune,
Steer thorow these swelling dangers; plow their prides up,
And bear like thunder through their loudest tempests:
They keep the field still.

Dem. Confident and full.

Pet. In such a number, one would swear they grew,
The hills are wooded with their partizans.
And all the valleys overgrown with darts,
As moors are with rank rushes: no ground left us
To charge upon, no room to strike: say fortune
And our endeavours bring us in to 'em,
They are so infinite, so ever-springing.
We shall be kill'd with killing; of desperate Women,
That neither fear, or shame e'r found, the devil

Has rank'd amongst 'em multitudes: say the men fail,
They'll poison us with their petticoats: say they fail,
They have priests enough to pray us into nothing.

Sweet. These are imaginations, dreams of nothing,
The man that doubts or fears.

Dec. I am free of both.

Dem. The self-same I.

Petill. And I as free as any;
As careless of my flesh, of that we call life;
So I may lose it nobly; as indifferent
As if it were my diet. Yet, noble General,
It was a wisdom learn'd from you; I learn'd it,
And worthy of a Soldiers care, most worthy,
To weigh with most deliberate circumstance
The ends of accidents, above their offers;
How to go on and get, to save a Roman,
Whose one life is more worth in way of doing,
Than millions of these painted wasps; how viewing
To find advantage out; how, how, found, to follow it
With counsel and discretion, lest meer fortune
Should claim the victory.

Sweet. 'Tis true, Petilius,
And worthily remembred: the rule's certain,
Their uses no less excellent: but where time
Cuts off occasions, danger, time and all
Tend to a present peril, 'tis required
Our Swords and Manhoods be best counsellors,
Our expeditions, presidents. To win, is nothing,
Where reason, time and counsel are our Camp-masters:
But there to bear the field, then to be conquerors,
Where pale destruction takes us, takes us beaten,
In wants, and mutinies, our selves but handfuls,
And to our selves, our own fears, needs a new way,
A sudden and a desperate execution:
Here, how to save, is loss; to be wise, dangerous;
Only a present well-united strength,
And minds made up for all attempts, dispatch it:
Disputing and delay here, cools the courage;
Necessity gives time for doubts; things infinite,
According to the spirit they are preach'd to,
Rewards like them; and names for after-ages,
Must steel the Soldier; his own shame help to arm him;
And having forc'd his spirit, e'r he cools.
Fling him upon his enemies; sudden and swift,
Like Tigers amongst Foxes, we must fight for't:
Fury must be our Fortune; shame we have lost,
Spur ever in our sides to prick us forward:
There is no other wisdom nor discretion
Due to this day of ruine, but destruction;
The Soldiers order first, and then his anger.

Dem. No doubt they dare redeem all.

Sweet. Then no doubt

The day must needs be ours. That the proud Woman
Is infinite in number, better likes me,
Than if we dealt with squadrons: half her Army
Shall choak themselves, their own swords dig their graves.
I'll tell ye all my fears, one single valour,
The virtues of the valiant Caratach
More doubts me than all Britain: he's a Soldier
So forg'd out, and so temper'd for great fortunes,
So much man thrust into him, so old in dangers,
So fortunate in all attempts, that his mere name
Fights in a thousand men, himself in millions,
To make him Roman. But no more. Petilius,
How stands your charge?

Petill. Ready for all employments,
To be commanded too, Sir.

Sweet. 'Tis well govern'd;
To morrow we'll draw out, and view the Cohorts:
I'th' meantime, all apply their offices.

Where's Junius?

Petill. In's Cabin,
Sick o' th' mumps, Sir.

Sweet. How?

Petill. In love, indeed in love, most lamentably loving;
To the tune of Queen Dido.

Dec. Alas poor Gentleman.

Sweet. 'Twill make him fight the nobler. With what Lady?
I'll be a spokesman for him.

Petill. You'll scant speed, Sir.

Sweet. Who is't?

Petill. The devil's dam, Bonduca's daughter,
Her youngest, crackt i'th' ring.

Sweet. I am sorry for him:
But sure his own discretion will reclaim him,
He must deserve our anger else. Good Captains,
Apply your selves in all the pleading forms
Ye can, unto the Soldiers; fire their spirits,
And set 'em fit to run this action;
Mine own provision shall be shar'd amongst 'em,
Till more come in: tell 'em, if now they conquer,
The fat of all the kingdom lies before 'em.
Their shames forgot, their honors infinite,
And want for ever banisht. Two days hence,
Our fortunes, and our swords, and gods be for us. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Penyus, Regulus, Macer, Drufius.

Pen. I must come?

Ma. So the General commands, Sir.

Pen. I must bring up my Regiment?

Ma. Believe, Sir,
I bring no lye.

Pen. But did he say, I must come?

Ma. So delivered.

Pen. How long is't, Regulus, since I commanded
In Britain here?

Reg. About five years, great Penyus.

Pen. The General some five months. Are all my actions
So poor, and lost, my services so barren,
That I'm remembred in no nobler language
But Must come up?

Ma. I do beseech ye, Sir,
Weigh but the times estate.

Pen. Yes, good Lieutenant,
I do, and his that sways it. Must come up;
Am I turn'd bare Centurion? Must, and shall,
Fit Embasses to court my honor?

Ma. Sir——

Pen. Set me to lead a handful of my men
Against an hundred thousand barbarous slaves
That have marcht name by name with Romes best doers?
Serve 'em up some other meat; I'll bring no food
To stop the jaws of all those hungry wolfs.
My Regiment's mine own. I must, my language.

Enter Curius.

Cur. Penyus, where lies the Host?

Pen. Where fate may find 'em.

Cur. Are they ingirt?

Pen. The Battel's lost.

Cur. So soon?

Pen. No; but 'tis lost, because it must be won:
The Britains must be Victors. Who e'r saw
A troop of bloody vultures hovering
About a few corrupted carcasses,
Let him behold the silly Roman host,
Girded with millions of fierce Baitains Swains,
With deaths as many as they have had hopes;

And then go thither, he that loves his shame ;
I scorn my life, yet dare not lose my name.

Cur. Do not you hold it a most famous end,
When both our names and lives are sacrific'd
For Rome's increase?

Pen. Yes, Curius ; but mark this too ;
What glory is there, or what lasting Fame
Can be to Rome or us? what full example,
When one is smother'd with a multitude,
And crouded in amongst a nameless prefs?
Honor got out of Flint, and on their heads
Whose virtues, like the Sun, exhal'd all valours,
Must not be lost in mists and fogs of people,
Noteless, and out of name, but rude and naked :
Nor can Rome task us with impossibilities,
Or bid us fight against a flood : we serve her,
That she may proudly say she has good soldiers,
Not slaves to choak all hazards. Who but fools,
That make no difference betwixt certain dying,
And dying well, would fling their Fames and Fortunes
Into this Britain-gulf, this quick-sand ruine,
That sinking, swallows us, What noble hand
Can find a subject fit for blood there? or what sword
Room for his execution? What air to cool us,
But poison'd with their blasting breaths and curses,
Where we lie buried quick above the ground,
And are with labouring sweat, and breathless pain,
Kill'd like to slaves, and cannot kill again?

Dru. Penusus, mark antient Wars, and know that then
Captains weigh'd an hundred thousand men.

Pen. Drusus, mark antient wisdom, and you'll find then,
He gave the overthrow that sav'd his men,
I must not go.

Reg. The soldiers are desirous,
Their Eagles all drawn out, Sir.

Pen. Who drew up, Regulus ?
Ha? speak: did you whose bold Will durst attempt this?
Drawn out? why, who commands, Sir? on whose warrant
Durst they advance?

Reg. I keep mine own obedience.

Dru. 'Tis like the general cause, their love of honor,
Relieving of their wants.

Pen. Without my knowledge?
Am I no more? my place but at their pleasures?
Come, who did this?

Dru. By—Sir, I am ignorant.

{ Drum softly within; then enter Soldiers with Drum and Colours.

Pen. What am I grown a shadow? Harke, they march.
I will know, and will be my self. Stand, disobedience;
He that advances one foot higher, dies for't.
Run thorow the Regiment upon your duties,
And charge 'em on command: beat back again,
By—I'll tith'em all else

Reg. We'll do our best.

Exeunt Drusus and Regulus

Pen. Back; cease your bawling Drums there,
I'll beat the Tubs about your brains else. Back:
Do I speak with less fear than Thunder to ye?
Must I stand to beseech ye? home, home: ha?
Do ye stare upon me? Are those minds I moulded,
Those honest valiant tempers I was proud
To be a fellow to, those great discretions
Made your names fear'd and honor'd, turn'd to wild-fires?
O gods, to disobedience? Command, farewell:
And be ye witness with me, all things sacred,
I have no share in these mens shames. March, Soldiers,
And seek your own sad ruines; your old Penusus
Dares not behold your murders.

Sold. Captain.

2 Sold. Captain.

3 Sold. Dear honour'd Captain.

Pen. Too too dear lov'd Soldiers,

Which made ye weary of me: and Heaven yet knows,
Though in your mutinies, I dare not hate you;
Take your own Wills; 't is fit your long experience
Should now know how to rule your selves: I wrong ye,
In wishing ye to save your lives and credits,
To keep your necks whole from the Ax hangs o'r ye:
Alas, I much dishonour'd ye: go, seek the Britains,
And say ye come to glut their sacrifices;
But do not say I sent ye. What ye have been,
How excellent in all parts, good, and govern'd,
Is only left of my Command, for story;
What now ye are, for pitie. Fare ye well.

Enter Drusus and Regulus.

Dru. Oh turn again, great Penusus; see the Soldier
In all points apt for duty.

Reg. See his sorrow
For his disobedience, which he says was haste,
And haste (he thought) to please you with. See Captain,
The toughness of his courage turn'd to water;
See how his manly heart melts.

Pen. Go, beat homeward,
There learn to eat your little with obedience,
And henceforth strive to do as I direct ye.

Exeunt Soldiers.

Ma. My answer, Sir.

Pen. Tell the Great General
My Companies are no fagots to fill breaches;
My self no man that must, or shall, can carry:
Bid him be wise; and where he is, he's safe then;
And when he finds out possibilities,
He may command me. Commend me to the Captains.

Ma. All this I shall deliver.

Pen. Farewel, Macer.

Exit Penusus.

Cur. Pray gods this breed no mischief.
Reg. It must needs,

If stout Suetonius win; for then his anger,
Besides the Soldiers loss of due, and honor,
Will break together on him.

Dru. He's a brave fellow;
And but a little hide his haughtiness,
(Which is but sometimes neither, on some causes)
He shews the worthiest Roman this day living.
You may, good Curius, to the General
Make all things seem the best.

Cur. I shall endeavour:
Pray for our fortunes, Gentlemen, If we fall,
This one farewell serves for a Funeral.
The gods make sharp our swords, and steel our hearts;
We dare, alas, but cannot fight our parts.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Junius, Petillius and a Herald observing Junius.

Petill. Let him go on: stay, now he talks.

Jun. Why?

Why should I love mine enemy? what is beauty?
Of what strange violence, that like the plague,
It works upon our spirits? blind they feign him,
I am sure, I find it so.

Petill. A Dog shall lead ye.

Jun. His fond affections blinder.

Petill. Hold ye there still.

Jun. It takes away my sleep.

Petill. Alas, poor chicken.

Jun. My company, content; almost my fashion.

Petill. Yes, and your weight too, if you follow it.

Jun. 'Tis sure the plague, for no man dare come near me
Without an Antidote: 'tis far worse; Hell.

Petill. Thou art damn'd without redemption then.

Jun. The way to't

Strew'd

Strew'd with fair Western smiles, and April blushes,
Led by the brightest constellations; eyes,
And sweet proportions, envying heaven: but from thence
No way to guide, no path, no wisdom bring us.

Petill. Yes, a smart water, Junius.

Jun. Do I fool?

Know all this, and fool still? Do I know further,
That when we have enjoy'd our ends, we lose 'em,
And all our appetites are but as dreams
We laugh at in our ages.

Petill. Sweet Philosopher!

Jun. Do I know on still, and yet know nothing? Mercy
Why am I thus ridiculous? (gods,

Petill. Motley on thee,
Thou art an arrant Ass.

Jun. Can red and white,
An Eye, a Nose, a Cheek,

Petill. But one cheek, Junius?
An half-fac'd Mistress?

Jun. With a little trim,
That wanton fools call Fashion, thus abuse me?
Take me beyond my reason? Why should not I
Doat on my horse well trapt, my sword well hatch'd?
They are as handsome things, to me more useful,
And possible to rule too. Did I but love,
Yet 'twere excusable, my youth would bear it;
But to love there, and that no time can give me,
Mine honor dare not ask: she has been ravish'd
My nature must not know; she hates our Nation.
Thus to dispose my spirit!

Petill. Stay a little,
He will declaim again,

Jun. I will not love; I am a man, have reason,
And I will use it: I'll no more tormenting,
Nor whining for a wench, there are a thousand,

Petill. Hold thee there boy.

Jun. A thousand will intreat me.

Petill. Ten thousand, Junius,

Jun. I am young and lusty,
And to my fashion valiant; can please nightly.

Petill. I'll swear thy back's probatum, for I have known Leap at sixteen like a strong Stallion. (thee

Jun. I will be man again.

Petill. Now mark the working,
The devil and the spirit tug for't: twenty pound
Upon the devils head.

Jun. I must be wretched.

Petill. I knew I had won,

Jun. Nor have I so much power
To shun my fortune.

Petill. I will hunt thy fortune
With all the shapes imagination breeds, Musick.
But I will fright thy devil: Stay, he sings now.

Song, by Junius, and Petillius, after him in mockage.

Jun. Must I be thus abus'd?

Petill. Yes marry must ye.

Let's follow him close: oh, there he is, now read it.

Herald reads. It is the Generals command, that all sick, persons old and unable, retire within the Trenches; he that fears his liberty, to leave the Field: Fools, Boys, and Lovers must not come near the Regiments, for fear of their infections; especially those Cowards they call Lovers.

Jun. Ha?

Petill. Read on.

Herald. If any common Soldier love an enemy, he's whip'd and made a slave: If any Captain, cast, with loss of honors, flung out o'th' Army, and made unable ever after to bear the name of a Soldier.

Jun. The — consume ye all, Rogues. Exit Jun.

Petill. Let this work:

H'as something now to chew upon: he's gone,
Come, shake no more.

Her. Well, Sir, you may command me,
But not to do the like again for Europe;
I would have given my life for a bent two-pence.
If I e'r read to Lovers whilst I live again,
Or come within their confines—

Petill. There's your payment,
And keep this private.

Her. I am school'd for talking.

Exit Herald.

Enter Demetrius.

Petill. How now, Demetrius, are we drawn?

Dem. 'Tis doing:

Your Company stands fair; but pray ye, where's Junius?
Half his command are wanting, with some forty
That Decius leads.

Petill. Hunting for Victuals:
Upon my life free-booting Rogues, their stomachs
Are like a widows lust, ne'r satisfied.

Dem. I wonder how they dare stir, knowing the enemy
Master of all the Countrey.

Petill. Resolute hungers
Know neither fears nor faiths, they tread on ladders,
Ropes, Gallows, and overdoe all dangers.

Dem. They may be hang'd though.

Petill. There's their joyful supper,
And no doubt they are at it.

Dem. But for heavens sake,
How does young Junius?

Petill. Drawing on, poor Gentleman.

Dem. What, to his end?

Petill. To th' end of all flesh: woman.

Dem. This Love has made him a stout Soldier.

Petill. O, a great one,
Fit to command young Gossings: but what news?

Dem. I think the messengers come back from Penys
By this time, let's go know.

Petill. What will you say now
If he deny to come, and take exceptions
At some half syllable, or sound deliver'd
With an ill accent, or some stile left out?

Dem. I cannot think he dare.

Petill. He dare speak treason,
Dare say, what no man dares believe, dares do—
But that's all one: I'll lay you my black armor
To twenty crowns, he comes not.

Dem. Done.

Petill. You'll pay.

Dem. I will.

Petill. Then keep thine old use Penys,
Be stubborn and vain glorious, and I thank thee.
Come let's go pray for six hours: most of us
I fear will trouble heaven no more: two good blows
Struck home at two Commanders of the Britains,
And my part's done.

Dem. I do not think of dying.

Petill. 'Tis possible we may live. But Demetrius,
With what strange legs, and arms, and eyes, and noses,
Let Carpenters and Copper-smiths consider.
If I can keep my heart whole, and my wind-pipe,
That I may drink yet like a Soldier—

Dem. Come, let's have better thoughts; mine's on your Armour.

Petill. Mine's in your purse, Sir; Let's go try the wager.

Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Judas and his four companions (halters about their necks) Bonduca, her Daughters, Nennius following.

Bon. Come, hang 'em presently.

Nen. What made your Rogueships
Harrying for victuals here? Are we your friends;
Or do you come for Spies? tell me directly,
Would you not willingly be hang'd now? do not ye long for't?

Jud.

Jud. What say ye? shall we hang in this vain? Hang
And 'tis as good to dispatch it merrily, (we must
As pull an arle like dogs to't.

1 Sold. Any way,
So it be handsome.

3 Sold. I had as lief 'twere toothsome too: but all agree,
And I'll not out Boys.

4 Sold. Let's hang pleasantly.

Jud. Then pleasantly be it: Captain, the truth is,
We had as lief hang with meat in our mouths,
As ask your pardon empty.

Ben. These are brave hungers.

What say you to a leg of Beef now, s'irrah?

Jud. Bring me acquainted with it, and I'll tell ye.

Ben. Torment 'em wench: I must back; then hang 'em.

Jud. We humbly thank your Grace.

1 Daugh. The Rogues laugh at us.

2 Daugh. S'irrah, What think you of a wench now?

Jud. A wench, Lady?

I do beseech your Ladyship, retire.

I'll tell ye presently, ye see the time's short;
One crash; even to the settling of my conscience.

Nen. Why, is't no more but up, boys?

Jud. Yes, ride too Captain
Will you but see my seat?

1 Daugh. Ye shall be set, Sir,
Upon a jade shall shake ye.

Jud. Sheets, good Madam,
Will do it ten times better.

1 Daugh. Whips, good Soldier.
Which ye shall taste before ye hang, to mortifie ye;
'Tis pity ye should die thus desperate.

2 Daugh. These are the merry Romans the brave mad-
'Tis ten to one we'll cool your resolutions. (caps.
Bring out the whips.

Jud. Would your good Ladyships
Would exercise 'em too.

4 Sold. Surely Ladies,
We'll shew you a strange patience.

Nen. Hang 'em Rascals,
They'll talk thus on the wheel.

Enter Caratach.

Car. Now, what's the matter?
What are these fellows? what's the crime committed,
That they wear necklaces?

Nen. They are Roman Rogues,
Taken a Forraging.

Car. Is that all, Nennius?

Jud. Would I were fairly hang'd; this is the devil,
The kill-cow, Caratach,

Car. And you would hang 'em.

Nen. Are they not enemies?

1 Sol. My breech makes buttons.

1 Daugh. Are they not our tormentors?

Car. Tormentors? Flea-traps.

Pluck off your halters, fellows.

Nen. Take heed, Caratach,

Taint not your wisdom.

Car. Wisdom, Nennius?

Why, who shall fight against us, make our honors,
And give a glorious day into our hands,
If we dispatch our foesthus? what's their offence?
Stealing a loaf or two to keep out hunger,
A piece of greazie bacon, or a pudding?

Do these deserve the gallows, they are hungry,
Poor hungry knaves, no meat at home left, starv'd:
Art thou not hungry?

Jud. Monstrous hungry.

Car. He looks like hungers self: get 'emsome victuals,
And Wine to cheer their hearts, quick: Hang up poor pil-

2 Sold. This is the bravest Captain— (chers?)

Nen. Caratach,

I'll leave you to your Will.

Car. I'll answer all, Sir.

2 Daugh. Let's up and view his entertainment of e'm.

I am glad they are shifted any way, their tongues esse
Would still have murdred us.

1 Daugh. Let's up and see it.

Exeunt.

Enter Hengo.

Car. Sit down poor knaves: why where's this Wine and Victuals?
Who waits there?

Swet. within. Sir, 'tis coming.

Hen. Who are these Uncle?

Car. They are Remans, boy.

Hen. Are these they

That vex mine Aunt so? can these fight? they look
Like empty scabbards, all, no mettle in 'em,
Like men of clouts, set to keep crows from orchards;
Why, I dare fight with these.

Car. That's my good chicken. And how do ye?
How do you feel your stomachs?

Jud. Wonderful apt, Sir,
As shall appear when time calls.

Car. That's well, down with't,
A little grace will serve your turns: eat softly,
You'll choak ye knaves else: give 'em Wine.

Jud. Not yet, Sir,
We're even a little busie.

Hen. Can that fellow
Do any thing but eat? thou fellow.

Jud. Away boy,
Away, this is no boys play.

Hen. By—, Uncle,
If his valour lie in's teeth, he's the most valiant.

Car. I am glad to hear ye talk, Sir,

Hen. Good Uncle tell me,
What's the price of a couple of cramm'd Romans

Car. Some twenty Britains boy; these are good Soldiers,

Hen. Do not the cowards eat hard too?

Car. No more, boy.

Come, I'll sit with you too; sit down by me, boy.

Jud. Pray bring your dish then.

Car. Hearty knaves: More meat there.

1 Sol. That's a good hearing.

Car. Stay now and pledge me.

Jud. This little piece, Sir.

Car. By— square eaters,
More meat I say: upon my conscience

The poor Rogues have not eat this month: how terribly
They charge upon their victuals: dare ye fight thus?

Jud. Believe it, Sir, like devils.

Car. Well said famine,

Here's to thy General.

Jud. Most excellent Captain, I will now pledg thee.

Car. And to morrow night say to him,

His Head is mine.

Jud. I can assure ye Captain,

He will not give it for this washing.

Car. Well said.

Daughters above.

1 Daugh. Here's a strange entertainment: how the thieves drink.

2 Daugh. Danger is dry, they look'd for colder liquor.

Car. Fill 'em more wine, give 'em full bowls; which of you all now

In recompence of this good, dare but give me
A sound knock in the battel?

Jud. Delicate Captain,

To do thee a sufficient recompence,

I'll knock thy brains out.

Car. Do it.

Hen. Thou dar'st as well be damn'd: thou knock his brains out.

Thou skin of man? Uncle, I will not hear this.

Jud. Tie up your whelp.

Hen. Thou kill me Uncle?

Would

Would I had but a sword for thy sake, thou dry'd dog.

Car. What a mettle
This little vermin carries.

Heng. Kill mine Uncle?

Car. He shall not, child.

Hen. He cannot: he's a Rogue,
An only eating Rogue: Kill my sweet Uncle?
Oh that I were a man.

Jud. By this Wine,
Which I will drink to Captain Junius, (daughter
Who loves the Queens most excellent Majesties little
Most sweetly, and most fearfully I will do it,

Heng. Uncle, I'll kill him with a great pin.

Car. No more, Boy.

I'll pledge thy Captain: To ye all good fellows.

2 Daugh. In love with me? that love shall cost your lives all:

Come Sister, and advise me; I have here
A way to make an easie conquest of 'em,
If fortune favour me.

Car. Let's see ye sweat
Tomorrow, blood and spirit, Boys, this Wine
Turn'd to stern valour.

1 Sold. Hark ye Judas,
If he should hang us after all this.

Jud. Let him:

I'll hang like a Gentleman and a Roman:

Car. Take away there,
They have enough.

Jud. Captain, we thank you heartily
For your good cheer, and if we meet to-morrow,
One of us pays for't.

Car. Get 'em guides, their Wine
Has over-master'd 'em.

Enter second Daughter, and a Servant.

2 Daugh. That hungry fellow
With the red beard there, give it him, and this,
To see it well delivered.

Car. Farewel knaves;
Speak nobly of us, keep your words to-morrow.

Enter a Guide.

And do something worthy your meat. Go, guide 'em,
And see 'em fairly onward.

Jud. Meaning me, Sir?

Serv. The same.

The youngest daughter to the Queen intreats ye
To give this privately to Captain Junius,
This for your pains

Jud. I rest her humble servant,
Commend me to thy Lady. Keep your Files, boys.

Serv. I must instruct ye farther.

Jud. Keep your Files there.
Order, sweet friends: faces about now.

Guide. Here Sir;
Here lies your way.

Jud. 'Bless the Founders, I say
Fairly, good foldiers, fairly march now: close, boys.

Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Swetonius, Petillius, Demetris, Decius, Macer.

Swet. Bid me be wise, and keep me where I am,
And so be safe: not come, because commanded;
Was it not thus?

Ma. It was, Sir.

Pet. What now think ye?

Swet. Must come, so hainous to him, so distasteful?

Pet. Give me my money.

Dem. I confes 'tis due, Sir,
And presently I'll pay it.

Swet. His obedience.
So blind at his years and experience.
It cannot find where to be tendred?

Ma. Sir,
The Regiment was willing, and advanc'd too,
The Captains at all points steel'd up: their preparations
Full of resolve, and confidence; Youth and fire,
Like the fair breaking of a glorious day,
Guilded their Phalanx: when the angry Penynus
Stept like a stormy cloud 'twixt them and hopes,

Swet. And stopt their resolutions?

Ma. True: his reason
To them was ods, and ods so infinite,
Discretion durst not look upon.

Swet. Well Penynus,
I cannot think thee coward yet; and treacherous
I dare not think thou hast lopt a limb off from me,
And let it be thy glory, thou wast stubborn,
Thy wisdom, that thou leftst thy General naked:
Yet e'r the Sun set, I shall make thee see,
All valour dwels not in thee; all command
In one experience. Thou wilt too late repent this,
And wist, I must come up, had been thy blessing.

Petill. Let's force him.

Swet. No, by no means; he's a torrent
We cannot easily stemme.

Petill. I think, a Traitor.

Swet. No ill words: let his own shame first revile him.

That Wine I have, see it (Demetrius)
Distributed amongst the soldiers,
To make 'em high and lusty: when that's done;
Petillius, give the word through, that the Eagles
May presently advance: no man discover,
Upon his life, the enemies full strength,
But make it of no value: Decius,
Are your starv'd people yet come home?

Dec. I hope so.

Swet. Keep 'em in more obedience: This is no time
To chide, I could be angry else, and say more to ye:
But come, let's order all: whose sword is sharpest,
And valour equal to his sword this day,
Shall be my Saint.

Petill. We shall be holy all then.

Exeunt.

Enter Judas and his company,

Jud. Captain, Captain, I have brought 'em off again;
The drunkennest slaves.

Dec. — Confound your Rogueships;
I'll call the General, and have ye hang'd all.

Jud. Pray who will you command then:

Dec. For you, sirrah,
That are the ring-leader to these devises,
Whose maw is never cramm'd, I'll have an engine.

Jud. A wench, sweet Captain.

Dec. Sweet Judas, even the Forks.
Where ye shall have two Lictors with two whips
Hammer your hide.

Jud. Captain, good words, fair words,
Sweet words, good Captain; if you like not us;
Farewell, we have employment.

Dec. Where hast thou been;

Jud. There where you dare not be with all your valour.

Dec. Where's that?

Jud. With the best good fellow living.

1 Sold. The king of all good fellows.

Dec. Who's that?

Jud. Caratach.

Shake now, and say, We have done something worthy,
Mark me; with Caratach: By this — Caratach:
Do you as much now and you dare: sweet Caratach.
Ye talk of a good fellow, of true drinking;

Well,

Well, go thy waies old Caratach : besides the drink Captain,
The bravest running Banquet of black puddings,
Pieces of glorious beef.

Dec. How scap'd ye hanging?

Jud. Hanging's a dog's death, we are Gentlemen,
And I say still, old Caratach.

Dec. Belike then,
You are turn'd Rebels all.

Jud. We are Roman boys all,
And boys of mettle: I must do that Captain,
This day, this very day.

Dec. Away, ye Rascal.

Jud. Fair words, I say again.

Dec. What must you do, Sir?

Jud. I must do that my heart-strings yern to do:
But my word's past.

Dec. What is it?

Jud. Why, kill Caratach.

That's all he ask'd us for our entertainment.

Dec. More than you'll pay.

Jud. Would I had sold my self
Unto the skin I had not promis'd it:
For such another Caratach——

Dec. Come Fool,

Have ye done your Countrey service?

Jud. I have brought that

To Captain Junius.

Dec. How?

Jud. I think will do all:

I cannot tell, I think so.

Dec. How? to Junius?

I'll more enquire of this: You'll fight now?

Jud. Promise:

Take heed of promise, Captain.

Dec. Away, and rank then.

Jud. But harke ye Captain, there is Wine distributing,
I would fain know what share I have.

Dec. Be gone,

Ye have too much,

Jud. Captain, no Wine, no fighting.

There's one call'd Caratach that has Wine.

Dec. Well, Sir,

If you'll be rul'd now, and do well.

Jud. Do excellent.

Dec. Ye shall have Wine, or any thing: go file;
I'll see ye have your share: drag out your dormise,
And stow 'em somewhere, where they may sleep handsomly,
They'll hear a hunt's up shortly.

Jud. Now I love thee:

But no more Forks nor Whips.

Dec. Deserve 'em not then:

Up with your men, I'll meet ye presently;

And get 'em sober quickly.

Jud. Arm, arm, Bullies;

All's right again and straight; and which is more,
More Wine, more Wine: Awake ye men of Memphis,
Be sober and discreet, we have much to do boys.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter a Messenger.

Mess. Prepare there for the sacrifice, the Queen comes.

(Musick.
Enter in solemnity the Druids singing, the second Daughter strewing Flowers: then Bonduca, Nennius, and others.

Bond. Ye powerful gods of Britain, hear our prayers;
Hear us you great Revengers, and this day
Take pity from our swords, doubt from our valours,
Double the sad remembrance of our wrongs
In every brest; the vengeance due to those.
Make infinite and endless: on our pikes.
This day pale terror sit, horrors and ruines
Upon our executions; claps of thunder
Hang on our armed carts. and 'fore our Troops
Despair and death; shame beyond these attend 'em.
Rise from the dust, ye relics of the dead,
Whose noble deeds our holy Druids sing,
Oh rise, ye valiant bones, let not base earth
Oppress your honors, whilst the pride of Rome
Treads on your Stocks, and wipes out all your stories.

Nen. Thou great Tiranes, whom our sacred Priests,
Armed with dreadful thunder, plac'd on high
Above the rest of the immortal gods,
Send thy consuming fires, and deadly bolts,
And shoot 'em home, stick in each Roman heart
A fear fit for confusion; blast their spirits,
Dwell in 'em to destruction; thorow their Phalanx
Strike, as thou strik'st a proud tree; shake their Bodies,
Make their strengths totter, and their toplefs fortunes
Unroot and reel to ruine.

1 Daugh. O thou god,
Thou feared god, if ever to thy justice
Insulting wrongs, and ravishments of Women,
Women deriv'd from thee, their flames, the sufferings
Of those that daily fill'd thy Sacrifice
With Virgin incense, have access, now hear me,
Now snatch thy thunder up, now on these Romans,
Despisers of thy power, of us defacers,
Revenge thy self, take to thy killing anger,
To make thy great work full, thy justice spoken,
An utter rooting from this blessed Isle
Of what Rome is or has been.

Bon. Give more incense,
The gods are deaf and drowsie; no happy flame
Rises to raise our thoughts: Pour on.

2 Daugh. See heaven.
And all you pow'rs that guide us, see, and shame
We kneel so long for pity over your Altars;
Since 'tis no light oblation that you look for,
No incense offering, will I hang mine eyes;
And as I wear these stones with hourly weeping,
So will I melt your pow'rs into compassion.
This tear for Prosutagus my brave Father,
Ye gods, now think on Rome; this for my Mother,
And all her miseries; yet see, and save us;
But now ye must be open-ey'd. See; heaven,
Oh see thy show'rs stoln from thee; our dishonours,

A smook from the Altar.
Oh Sister, our dishonors: can ye be gods,
And these sins smother'd?

Bon. The fire takes.

Car. It does so,
But no flame rises. Cease your fearful prayers,

Your

Your whinnings, and your tame petitions;
 The gods love courage arm'd with confidence,
 And prayers fit to pull them down: weak tears
 And troubled hearts, the dull twins of cold spirits,
 They sit and smile at. Hear how I salute 'em:
 Divine Andate, thou who hold'st the reins
 Of furious Battels, and disordred War,
 And proudly roll'st thy swarty chariot wheels
 Over the heaps of wounds and carcasses,
 Sailing through seas of blood; thou sure-steel'd sternness,
 Give us this day good hearts, good enemies,
 Good blowes o'both sides, wounds that fear or flight
 Can claim no share in; steel us both with angers,
 And warlike executions fit thy viewing;
 Let Rome put on her best strength, and thy Britain,
 Thy little Britain, but as great in fortune,
 Meet her as strong as she, as proud, as daring;
 And then look on, thou red'ey'd god: who does best,
 Reward with honor; who despair makes she,
 Unarm for ever, and brand with infamy:
 Grant this, divine Andate, 'tis but justice;
 And my first blow thus on thy holy Altar A flame arises.
 I sacrifice unto thee.

Bon. It flames out Musick.

Car. Now sing ye Druides. Song.

Bon. 'Tis out again.

Car. H'as given us leave to fight yet; we ask no more,
 The rest hangs in our resolutions:
 Tempt her no more.

Bon. I would know farther Cosen.

Car. Her hidden meaning dwels in our endeavors;
 Our valors are our best gods. Cheer the Soldier,
 And let him eat.

Mes. He's at it, Sir.

Car. Away then;

When he has done, let's march. Come, fear not Lady,
 This day the Roman gains no more ground here,
 But what his body lies in.

Bon. Now I am confident. Exeunt.
Recorders.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Junius, Curius, Decius.

Dec. We dare not hazard it: beside our lives,
 It forfeits all our understandings.

Jun. Gentlemen,
 Can ye forsake me in so just a service,
 A service for the Common-wealth, for honor?
 Read but the Letter; you may love too.

Dec. Read it:
 If there be any safety in the circumstance,
 Or likelihood 'tis love, we will not fail ye.
 Read it good Curius.

Cur. Willingly.

Jun. Now mark it.

Cur. reads. Health to thy heart, my honoured Junius,
 And all thy love requited: I am thine,
 Thine everlastingly, thy love has won me,
 And let it breed no doubt; our new acquaintance
 Compels this, 'tis the gods decree to bless us.
 The times are dangerous to meet; yet fail not,
 By all the love thou bear'st me I conjure thee,
 Without distrust of danger, to come to me,
 For I have purpos'd a delivery
 Both of my self and fortune this blest day
 Into thy hands, if thou thinkst good: to shew thee
 How infinite my Love is, even my Mother
 Shall be thy prisoner, the day yours without hazard;
 For I beheld your danger like a Lover,
 A just affecter of thy faith: Thy goodness,
 I know, will use us nobly, and our Marriage

If not redeem, yet lessen Romes Ambition.
 I 'm weary of these miseries: Use my Mother,
 (if you intend to take her) with all honour,
 And let this disobedience to my parents
 Be laid on love, not me. Bring with thee, Junius,
 Spirits resolv'd to fetch me off, the noblest,
 Forty will serve the turn; just at the joyning
 Of both the battels, we will be weakly guarded;
 And for a guide, within this hour shall reach thee
 A faithful friend of mine: the gods, my Junius,
 Keep thee, and me to serve thee: young Bonvica.

Cur. This letter carries much belief, and most objections
 Answer'd, we must have doubted.

Dec. Is that fellow

Come to ye for a guide yet?

Jun. Yes.

Dec. And examin'd?

Jun. Far more then that; he has felt tortures, yet
 He vows he knows no more than this truth.

Dec. Strange.

Cur. If she mean what she writes, as't may be probable,
 'Twill be the happiest vantage we can lean to.

Jun. I'll pawn my soul she means truth.

Dec. Think an hour more,
 Then if your confidence grow stronger on ye,
 We'll set in with ye.

Jun. Nobly done; I thank ye;
 Ye know the time.

Cur. We will be either ready
 To give ye present counsell, or joyn with ye.

Enter Swetonius, Petillius, and Demetrius, Macer.

Jun. No more as ye are Gentlemen. The general.

Swet. Draw out apace, the enemy waits for us;
 Are ye all ready?

Jun. All our Troops attend, Sir.

Swet. I am glad to hear you say so, Junius.
 I hope ye are dispossest.

Jun. I hope so too, Sir,

Swet. Continue so. And Gentlemen, to you now;
 To bid you fight is needless, ye are Romans,
 The name will fight it self; To tell ye who
 You go to fight against, his power, and nature,
 But loss of time: yet know it, know it poor,
 And oft have made it so. To tell ye farther,
 His Body shows more dreadful than it has done,
 To him that fears, less possible to deal with,
 Is but to stick more honor on your actions,
 Load ye with virtuous names, and to your memories
 Tye never dying time, and fortune constant.
 Go on in full assurance, draw your swords
 As daring and as confident as justice;
 The gods of Rome fight for ye; loud Fame calls ye,
 Pitch'd on the topless Apenine, and blows
 To all the under world: all Nations,
 The seas, and unfrequented deserts, where the snow dwels,
 Wakens the ruin'd monuments, and there
 Where nothing but eternal death and sleep is,
 Informs again the dead bones. With your virtues,
 Go on, I say, valiant and wise, rule heaven,
 And all the great aspects attend 'em. Do but blow
 Upon this enemy, who, but that we want foes,
 Cannot deserve that name; and like a myff,
 A lazie fog, before your burning valors
 You'll find him fly to nothing, This is all,
 We have swords, and are the sons of antient Romans,
 Heirs to their endless valors, fight and conquer.

De. Dem. 'Tis done.

Petill. That man that loves not this day,
 And hugs not in his arms the noble danger,
 May he dye fameless and forgot.

Swet. Sufficient,
 Up to your Troops, and let your drums beat thunder,
E
March

March close, and sudden like a tempest: all executions

March.

Done without sparkling of the Body: keep your phalanx
Sure lin'd, and piec'd together; your pikes forward,
And so march like a moving Fort: ere this day run,
We shall have ground to add to Rome, well won. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Caratach and Nennius.

Nen. The Roman is advanc'd from yound' hills brow,
We may behold him, Caratach. A March.

Drums within at one place afar off.

Car. Let's thither,
I see the dust flie. Now I see the body,
Observe 'em, Nennius, by—a handsome Body,
And of a few, strongly and wisely joynted:
Suetonius is a Souldier.

Nen. As I take it,
That's he that gallops by the Regiments,
Viewing their preparations.

Car. Very likely,
He shews no less than General: see how bravely
The Body moves, and in the head how proudly
The Captains stick like plumes: he comes apace on;
Good Nennius go, and bid my stout Lieutenant
Bring on the first square Body to oppose 'em,
And as he charges, open to inclose 'em:
The Queen move next with hers, and wheel about,
To gain their backs, in which I'll lead the Vantguard.
We shall have bloody crowns this day, I see by't;
Hast thee good Nennius, I'll follow instantly.

Exit Nennius.

How close they march, as if they grew together? March.
No place but lin'd alike: fuge from oppression;
They will not change this figure: we must charge 'em,
And charge 'em home at both ends, Van and Rere,

Drums in another place afar off.

They never totter else. I hear our Musick,
And must attend it: Hold good sword, but this day,
And bite hard where I hound thee, and hereafter
I'll make a relique of thee, for young Souldiers
To come like Pilgrimes to, and kiss for Conquests.

Exit.

Scena quarta.

Enter Junius, Curius, and Decius.

Jun. Now is the time, the fellow stays.

Dec. What think ye?

Cur. I think 'tis true.

Jun. Alas, if 'twere a question,
If any doubt or hazzard fell into't,
Do ye think mine own discretion so self-blind,
My care of you so naked, to run headlong?

Dec. Let's take Petilius with us.

Jun. By no means:

He's never wise but to himself, nor courteous,
But where the end' his own: we are strong enough,
If not to many. Behind yonder hill
The fellow tells me she attends, weak guarded,
Her Mother and her Sister.

Car. I would venture.

Jun. We shall not strike five blows for't, weigh the good,
The general good may come.

Dec. Away, I'll with ye,
But with what doubt?

Jun. Fear not, my soul for all.

Exeunt.

Alarms, Drums and Trumpets in several places afar off, as at a main Battell.

Scena Quinta.

Enter Drufus and Penyus above.

Dru. Here ye may see 'em all, Sir; from this hill
The Country shews off levell.

Pen. Gods defend me,
What multitudes they are, what infinites?
The Roman power shews like a little Star
Hedg'd with a double hollo. Now the knell rings,

Loud shouts.

Heark how they shout to th' battel; how the air
Totters and reels, and rends apieces, Drufus,
With the huge vollied clamours.

Dru. Now they charge.
Oh gods, of all sides, fearfully.

Pen. Little Rome,
Stand but this growing Hydra one short hour,
And thou hast out-done Hercules.

Dru. The dust hides 'em,
We cannot see what follows.

Pen. They are gone,
Gone, swallow'd Drufus, this eternal Sun
Shall never see 'em march more.

Dru. O turn this way,
And see a modell of the field, some forty,
Against four hundred.

Pen. Well fought, bravely follow'd;
O nobly charg'd again, charg'd home too: Drufus,
They seem to carry it: now they charge all, Loud.
Close, close, I say; they follow it: ye gods,
Can there be more in men? more daring spirits?
Still they make good their fortunes. Now they are gone too,

For ever gone: see Drufus at their backs
A fearful Ambush rises. Farewell valours,
Excellent valours: O Rome, where's thy wisdom?

Dru. They are gone indeed, Sir.

Pen. Look out toward the Army,
I am heavy with these slaughters.

Dru. 'Tis the same still,
Covered with dust and fury.

Enter the two Daughters, with Junius, Curius, Decius, and Souldiers.

2. Daugh. Bring 'em in,
Tie 'em, and then unarm 'em.

1. Daugh. Valiant Romans,
Ye are welcome to your Loves.

2. Daugh. Your death, fools.

Dec. We deserve 'em,
And women do your worst.

1. Daugh. Ye need not beg it.

2. Daugh. Which is kind Junius?

Serv. This.

2. Daugh. Are you my sweet heart?
It looks ill on't: how long is't, pretty soul,
Since you and I first lov'd? Had we not reason
To doat extreanly upon one another?
How does my Love? this is not he: my chicken
Could prate finely, sing a love-song.

Jun. Monster.

2. Daugh. Oh, now it courts.

Jun. Arm'd with more malice
Then he that got thee has the divell.

2. Daugh. Good.

Proceed, sweet chick.

Jun. I hate thee, that's my last.

2. Daugh. Nay, and ye love me, forward: No? Come
Let's prick our answers on our arrows points, (sister,
And make 'em laugh a little. Ye damn'd Leachers,
Ye proud improvident fools, have we now caught ye?
Are ye i'th' noose? Since ye are such loving creatures,
We'll be your Cupids: Do ye see these arrows?

Wee'11

We'll send them to your wanton livers, goats.

1. Dau. O how I'll trample on your hearts, ye villains, Ambitious salt-itch slaves: Romes master sins, The mountain Rams topt your hot mothers.

2. Daugh. Dogs, To whose brave founders a salt whore gave suck; Theeves, honors hangmen, do ye grin? perdition Take me for ever, if in my self anger, Enter Caratach. I do not out-do all example.

Car. Where, Where are these Ladies? ye keep noble quarters, Your Mother thinks ye dead or taken; upon which, She will not move her Battel. Sure these faces I have beheld and known, they are Roman Leaders, How came they here?

2. Daugh. A trick Sir, that we us'd, A certain policy conducted 'em Unto our snare: we have done ye no small service; These us'd as we intend, we are for th' battel,

Car. As you intend? taken by treachery?

1. Daugh. Is't not allow'd?

Car. Those that should gild our Conquest, Make up a Battel worthy of our winning, Catch'd up by craft?

2. Daugh. By any means that's lawful.

Car. A womans wisdom in our triumphs? out, Out ye sluts, ye follies; from our swords Filch our revenges basely? arm again, Gentlemen: Soldiers, I charge ye help 'em.

2. Daugh. By—— Uncle, We will have vengeance for our rapes.

Car. By——

You should have kept your legs close then: dispatch there.

1. Daug. I will not off thus.

Car. He that stirs to execute, Or she, though it be your selves, by him that got me, Shall quickly feel mine anger: one great day given us, Not to be snatch'd out of our hands but basely; And we must shame the gods from whence we have it, With setting snares for Soldiers? I'll run away first, Be hooted at, and children call me coward, Before I set up scales for Victories: Give 'em their swords.

2. Daugh. O gods.

Car. Bear off the women Unto their Mother.

2. Dau. One shot, gentle Uncle.

Car. One cut her fiddle-string: Bear 'em off I say.

1. Dau. The—— take this fortune.

Car. Learn to spin, And curse your knotted hemp: go Gentlemen, Exeunt Daughters.

Safely go off, up to your Troops: be wiser, There thank me like tall Soldiers: I shall seek ye. Exit Caratach.

Cur. A noble worth.

Dec. Well Junius.

Jun. Pray ye no more.

Cur. He blushes, do not load him.

Dec. Where's your love now? Drums loud again.

Jun. Puffe, there it flies: Come, let's redeem our follies. Exeunt Junius, Curius, Decius.

Dru. Awake, Sir; yet the Roman Bodie's whole, I see 'em clear again.

Pen. Whole? 'tis not possible:

Drusus they must be lost.

Dru. By—— they are whole, Sir, And in brave doing; see, they wheel about To gain more ground.

Pen. But see there, Drusus, see, See that huge Battel moving from the mountains, Their gilt coats shine like Dragons scales, their march Like a rough tumbling storm; see them, and view 'em, And then see Rome no more: say they fail; look,

Look where the armed carts stand; a new Army: Look how they hang like falling rocks, as murdring Death rides in triumph Drusus: fell destruction Lashes his fiery horse, and round about him His many thousand ways to let out souls. Move me again when they charge, when the mountain Melts under their hot wheels, and from their Ax'trees Hnge claps of thunder plough the ground before 'em, Till then I'll dream what Rome was.

Enter Swetonius, Petillius, Demetrius, Macer.

Swet. O bravely fought; honor till now nere show'd Her golden fate i'th' field. Like Lions, Gentlemen, Y'have held your heads up this day: Where's young Junius, Curius and Decius?

Petill. Gone to heaven, I think, Sir. do ye?

Sw. Their worths go with 'em: breathe a while: How

Pet. Well; some few scurvy wounds, my heart's whole

Dem. Would they would give us more ground. (yet.

Swet. Give? we'll have it.

Petill. Have it? and hold it too, despight the devill.

Enter Junius, Decius, Curius.

Jun. Lead up to th' head, and line: sure the Qs. Battell Begins to charge like wild-fire: where's the General?

Swet. Oh, they are living yet. Come my brave foldiers, Come, let me powr Romes blessing on ye; Live, Live, and lead Armies all: ye bleed hard.

Jun. Best:

We shall appear the sterner to the foe.

Dec. More wounds, more honor.

Petill. Lose no time.

Swet. Away then,

And stand this shock, ye have stood the world.

Petill. Wee'll grow to't.

Is not this better than lowsie loving?

Jun. I am my self, Petillius.

Petill. 'Tis I love thee. Exeunt Romans.

Enter Bonduca, Caratach, Daughters, Nennius.

Car. Charge 'em i'th' flanks: O ye have plaid the fool, The fool extreemly, the mad fool.

Bon. Why Cousin?

Car. The woman fool. Why did you give the word Unto the carts to charge down, and our people In gross before the Enemy? we pay for't, Our own swords cut our throats: why? —— on't; Why do you offer to command? the divell, The divell, and his dam too, who bid you Meddle in mens affairs? Exeunt Queen, &c.

Bond. I'll help all.

Car. Home,

Home and spin woman, spin, go spin, ye trifle.

Open before there, or all's ruine. How, Shows within.

Now comes the Tempest; on our selves, by——

Victoria within.

O woman, scurvie woman, beastly woman. Exeunt.

Dru. Victoria, Victoria.

Pen. How's that, Drusus?

(Sir,

Dru. They win, they win, they win; oh look, look, look, For heavens sake look, the Britains fly, the Britains fly. Victoria.

Enter Swetonius, Soldiers, and Captains.

Swet. Soft, soft, pursue it soft; excellent Soldiers, Close, my brave fellows, honorable Romans: Oh cool thy mettle Junius, they are ours, The world cannot redeem 'em: stern Petillius, Govern the conquest nobly: soft, good Soldiers. Exeunt.

Enter Bonduca, Daughters, and Britains.

Bond. Shame, whither flie ye, ye unlucky Britains?
Will ye creep into your mothers wombs again? Back cowards.

Hares, fearful Hares, Doves in your angers; leave me?
Leave your Queen desolate? her hapless children.

Enter Caratach and Hengo.

To Roman rape again and fury?

Car. Flye, ye buzzards,
Ye have wings enough, ye fear: get thee gone, woman,
Loud shout within.

Shame tread upon thy heels: all's lost, all's lost, heark,
Heark how the Romans ring our knels. Ext. Bond, &c.

Hen. Good Uncle,
Let me go too.

Car. No boy, the fortune's mine,
I must not leave thee; get behind me; shake not,

Enter Petillius, Junius, Decius.

I'll breech ye, if ye do boy: Come, brave Romans,
All is not lost yet.

Jun. Now I'll thank thee, Caratach. Fight. Drums.

Car. Thou art a Soldier: strike home, home, have at ye.

Pen. His blows fall like huge sledges on an anvil.

Dec. I am weary.

Pet. So am I.

Car. Send more swords to me.

Jun. Let's sit and rest. Sit down.

Drum. What think ye now?

Pen. O Drusus,

I have lost mine honor, lost my name,
Lost all that was my light: these are true Romans,
And I a Britain coward, a base Coward;
Guide me where nothing is but desolation,
That I may never more behold the face
Of Man, or Mankind know me: O blind Fortune,
Hast thou abus'd me thus?

Drum. Good Sir, be comforted;

It was your wisdom rul'd ye; pray ye go home,
Your day is yet to come, when this great fortune
Shall be but soil unto it. Retreat.

Pen. Fool, fool, Coward. Exit Penus and Drusus.

Enter Swetonius, Demetrius, Soldiers, Drum and Colours.

Swet. Draw in, draw in: well have you fought, and worthy
Romes noble recompence; look to your wounds,
The ground is cold and hurtful: the proud Queen
Has got a Fort, and there she and her Daughters
Defie us once again. To morrow morning
Wee'll seek her out, and make her know, our Fortunes
Stop at no stubborn walls: Come, sons of honor,
True virtues heirs; thus hatch'd with Britain blood,
Let's march to rest, and set in gules like Suns.
Beat a soft march, and each one ease his neighbours.

Exeunt.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Petillius, Junius, Decius, Demetrius singing.

Petill. Smooth was his cheek,

Dec. And his chin it was sleek,

Jun. With whoop, he has done wooing.

Dem. Junius was this Captains name,

A lad for a lasses viewing,

Pet. Full black his eye, and plump his thigh,

Dec. Made up for loves pursuing:

Dem. Smooth was his cheek,

Petill. And his chin it was sleek.

Jun. With whoop, he has done wooing.

Petill. O my vex'd thief, art thou come home again?
Are thy brains perfect?

Jun. Sound as bells.

Petill. Thy back-worm

Quiet, and cast his sting, boy?

Jun. Dead, Petillius,

Dead to all folly, and now my anger only.

Pet. Why, that's well said: hang Cupid and his quiver,
A drunken brawling Boy; thy honour'd faint
Be thy ten shillings, Junius, there's the money,
And there's the ware; square dealing: this but sweats thee
Like a Mesh nag, and makes thee look pin buttock'd;
The other runs thee whining up and down
Like a pig in a storm, fills thy brains full of madness,
And shews thee like a long Lent, thy brave body
Turn'd to a tail of green-fish without butter.

Dec. When thou lov'st next, love a good cup of Wine,
A Mistress for a King, she leaps to kiss thee,
Her red and white's her own; she makes good blood,
Takes none away; what she heats sleep can help,
Without a groping Surgeon.

Jun. I am counsell'd,

And henceforth, when I doat again,—

Dem. Take heed,

Ye had almost paid for't.

Petill. Love no more great Ladies,

Thou canst not step amidst them; there's no delight in 'em;
All's in the whistling of their snacht up silks;
They're only made for handsome view, nor handling;
Their bodies of so weak and wasp a temper,
A rough pac'd bed will shake 'em all to pieces;
A tough hen pulls their teeth out, tyres their souls;
Plene rimarum sunt, they are full of rynnnet,
And take the skin off where they are tasted; shun 'em,
They live in cullisies like rotten cocks
Stew'd to a tenderness, that holds no tack:
Give me a thing I may crush.

Jun. Thou speak'st truly:

The Wars shall be my Mistress now.

Petill. Well chosen,

For she's a bownsing lass, she'll kiss thee at night, boy,
And break thy pate i'th' morning.

Jun. Yesterday

I found those favors infinite.

Dem. Wench good enough,

But that she talks too loud.

Pet. She talks to th' purpose,

Which never Woman did yet: she'll hold grappling,
And he that layes on best, is her best servant:

All other loves are meer catching of dotrels,
Stretching of legs out only, and trim laziness.

Here comes the General. Enter Swet. Curius, & Macer.

Swet. I am glad ye have found ye:

Are those come in yet that pursu'd bold Caratach?

Pet. Not yet Sir, for I think they mean to lodge him;
Take him I know they dare not, 'twill be dangerous.

Swet. Then haste Petillius, haste to Penus,

I fear the strong conceit of what disgrace

Has pull'd upon himself, will be his ruine:

I fear his soldiers fury too; haste presently,

I would not lose him for all Britain. Give him, Petillius,

Petill. That that shall, choak him.

Swet. All the noble counsell,
His fault forgiven too, his place, his honor,

Petill. For me, I think, as handsome.

Swet. All the comfort.

And

And tell the Soldier, 'twas on our command
He drew not to the Battell.
Petill. I conceive Sir,
And will do that shall cure all.
Swet. Bring him with ye
Before the Queens Fort, and his Forces with him,
There you shall find us following of our Conquest:
Make halte.

Petill. The best I may. Exit.

Swet. And noble Gentlemen,
Up to your Companies: we'll presently
Upon the Queens pursuit: there's nothing done
Till she be seiz'd; without her nothing won. Exeunt.
Short flourish.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Caratach and Hengo.

Car. How does my Boy?

Hen. I would do well, my heart's well;
I do not fear.

Car. My good Boy.

Hen. I know, Uncle,
We must all dye; my little brother dy'd,
I saw him dye, and he dy'd smiling; sure,
There's no great pain in't Uncle. But pray tell me,
Whither must we go when we are dead?

Car. Strange questions!
Why, to the blessed't place Boy: ever sweetness
And happiness dwells there.

Hen. Will you come to me?

Car. Yes, my sweet boy.

Hen. Mine Aunt too, and my Cousins?

Car. All, my good child.

Hen. No Romans, Uncle?

Car. No Boy.

Heng. I should be loath to meet them there.

Car. No ill men,

That live by violence, and strong oppression,
Come thither: 'tis for those the gods love, good men.

Heng. Why, then I care not when I go; for surely
I am perswaded they love me: I never
Blasphem'd 'em, Uncle, nor transgress't my parents;
I always said my Prayers.

Car. Thou shalt go then,
Indeed thou shalt.

Heng. When they please.

Car. That's my good boy.

Art thou not weary, Hengo?

Heng. Weary, Uncle?

I have heard you say you have march'd all day in Armour.

Car. I have, boy.

Heng. Am not I your Kinsman?

Car. Yes.

Heng. And am not I as fully allyed unto you
In those brave things, as blood?

Car. Thou art too tender.

Heng. To go upon my legs? they were made to bear me.
I can play twenty mile a day, I see no reason
But to preserve my Countrey and my self,
I should march forty.

Car. What, wouldst thou be
Living to wear a mans strength?

Heng. Why a Caratach,
A Roman-hater, a scourge sent from Heaven Drum
To whip these proud thieves from our Kingdom. Heark,
Heark, Uncle, heark, I hear a Drum.

Enter Judas and his people to the door.

Jud. Beat softly,
Softly, I say; they are here: who dare charge?

i. sold. He.

That dares be knockt o'th' head: I'll not come near him.

Jud. Retire again, and watch then. How he stares!

H'as eyes would kill a dragon: mark the boy well;

If we could take or kill him. A—on ye,

How fierce ye look? see how he broods the boy;

The devil dwels in's scabbard. Back, I say,

Apace, apace, h'as found us.

They retire.

Car. Do ye hunt us?

Heng. Uncle, good Uncle see, the thin starv'd Rascal,

The eating Roman, see where he thrids the thickets:

Kill him, dear Uncle, kill him; one good blow

To knock his brains into his breech; strike's head off,

That I may piss in's face.

Car. Do ye make us Foxes?

Here, hold my charging staff, and keep the place boy.

I'am at bay, and like a bull I'll bear me.

Stand, stand, ye Rogues, ye Squirrels.

Exit.

Heng. Now he pays'em:

O that I had a mans strength.

Enter Judas, &c.

Jud. Here's the boy;

Mine own, I thank my Fortune.

Heng. Uncle, uncle;

Famine is falln upon me, uncle.

Jud. Come, Sir,

Yield willingly, your Uncle's out of hearing,

I'll ticle your young tail else.

Heng. I defie thee,

Thou mock-made man of mat: charge home, sirha:

Hang thee, base slave, thou snak'ft.

Jud. Upon my conscience

The boy will beat me: how it looks, how bravely,

How confident the worm is: a scabb'd boy

To handle me thus? yield or I cut thy head off.

Heng. Thou dar'st not cut my finger: here't is, touch it.

Jud. The boy speaks sword and buckler, Prethee yield,

Come, here's an apple, yield. (boy:

Heng. By——he fears me.

I'll give you sharper language: When, ye coward,

When come ye up?

Jud. If he should beat me——

Heng. When, Sir?

I long to kill thee; come, thou can'st not scape me.

I have twenty ways to charge thee; twenty deaths

Attend my bloody staff.

Jud. Sure't is the devil,

A dwarf, devil in a doublet.

Heng. I have kill'd a Captain, sirha, a brave Captain,

And when I have done, I have kickt him thus. Look here,

See how I charge this staff.

Jud. Most certain

This boy will cut my throat yet.

Enter two Soldiers running.

i. Sold. Flee, flee, he kills us.

2. Sould. He comes, he comes.

Jud. The devil take the hindmost. (Rogues.

Heng. Run, run, ye Rogues, ye precious Rogues, ye rank

A comes, a comes, a comes, a comes: that's he, boys.

What a brave cry they make?

Enter Caratach with a head.

Car. How does my chicken?

Heng. 'Faith, uncle, grown a Soldier, a great Soldier;

For by the virtue of your charging-staff,

And a strange fighting face I put upon't,

I have outbrav'd hunger.

Car. That's my boy, my sweet boy.

Here, here's a Roman's head for thee.

Heng. Good provision.

Before I starve, my sweet-fac'd Gentleman,

I'll trie your favour.

Car.

Car. A right compleat Soldier.
Come, chicken, let's go seek some place of strength
(The Countrey's full of Scouts) to rest a while in,
Thou wilt not else be able to endure
The journey to my Countrey, fruits, and water,
Must be your food a while, boy.

Heng. Any thing:
I can eat moss, I can live on anger,
To vex these Romans. Let's be wary, Uncle.

Car. I warrant thee; come cheerfully.

Heng. And boldly

Scena Tertia.

Enter Penyus, Drufus, and Regulus.

Reg. The soldier shall not grieve ye.

Pen. Pray ye forsake me;
Look not upon me, as ye love your Honors;
I am so cold a coward, my infection
Will choke your virtues like a damp else.

Dru. Dear Captain.

Reg. Most honour'd Sir.

Pen. Most hated, most abhor'd;
Say so, and then ye know me, nay, ye please me.
O my dear credit, my dear credit.

Reg. Sure
His mind is dangerous.

Dru. The good gods cure it. (breaches)

Pen. My honour got thorow fire, thorow stubborn
Thorow Battels that have been as hard to win as heaven,
Thorow death himself, in all his horrid trims,
Is gone for ever, ever, ever, Gentlemen,
And now I am left to scornful tales and laughters,
To hootings at, pointing with fingers, That's he,
That's the brave Gentleman forsook the battel,
The most wise Penyus, the disputing coward.
O my good sword, break from my side, and kill me;
Cut out the coward from my heart.

Reg. Ye are none.

Pen. He lyes that says so: by—he lyes, lyes basely,
Baser than I have done. Come, soldiers, seek me,
I have robb'd ye of your virtues: Justice, seek me,
I have broke my fair obedience, lost: shame take me,
Take me, and swallow me, make ballads of me;
Shame, endless shame: and pray do you forsake me.

Dru. What shall we do?

Pen. Good Gentlemen forsake me:
You were not wont to be commanded. Friends, pray do it,
And do not fear; for as I am a coward
I will not hurt my self: when that mind takes me,
I'll call to you, and ask your help. I dare not.

Enter Petillius.

Petill. Good morrow, Gentlemen; where's the Tribune?

Reg. There.

Dru. Whence come ye, good Petillius?

Petill. From the General.

Dru. With what, for heavens sake?

Petill. With good counsel, Drufus,
And love, to comfort him.

Dru. Good Regulus

Step to the Soldier, and allay his anger;
For he is wild as winter.

Exit Drufus and Regulus.

Petill. O, are ye there? have at ye. Sure he's dead,
It cannot be he dare out-live this fortune:
He must die, 'tis most necessary; men expect it;
And thought of life in him, goes beyond coward.
Forsake the field so basely? lie upon't:
So poorly to betray his worth; so coldly
To cut all credit from the soldier? sure

If this man mean to live, as I should think it
Beyond belief, he must retire where never
The name of Rome, the voice of Arms, or Honour
Was known or heard of yet: he's certain dead,
Or strongly means it; he's no Soldier else,
No Roman in him; all he has done, but outside,
Fought either drunk or desperate. Now he rises.
How does Lord Penyus?

Pen. As ye see.

Petill. I am glad on't;
Continue so still. The Lord General,
The valiant General, great Svetonius——

Pen. No more of me is spoken; my name's perish'd.

Petill. He that commanded fortune and the day
By his own valour and discretion,
When, as some say, Penyus refused to come,
But I believe 'em not, sent me to see ye.

Pen. Ye are welcome; and pray see me; see me well,
Ye shall not see me long.

Petill. I hope so, Penyus;
The gods defend, Sir.

Pen. See me, and understand me: This is he Left to fill up your triumph; he that basely
Whistled his honour off to th'wind; that coldly
Shrunk in his politick head, when Rome like reapers
Sweat blood, and spirit, for a glorious harvest,
And bound it up, and brought it off: that fool,
That having gold and copper offer'd him,
Refus'd the wealth, and took the waft: that soldier
That being courted by loud fame and fortune,
Labour in one hand, that propounds us gods,
And in the other, glory that creates us,
Yet durst doubt, and be damned.

Petill. It was an errour.

Pen. A foul one, and a black one.

Petill. Yet the blackest
May be wash'd white again.

Pen. Never.

Petill. Your leave, Sir,
And I beseech ye note me; for I love ye,
And bring all comfort: Are we gods,
Alli'd to no infirmities? are our natures
More than mens natures? when we slip a little
Out of the way of virtue, are we lost?
Is there no medicine called Sweet mercy?

Pen. None, Petillius;
There is no mercy in mankind can reach me,
Nor is it fit it should; I have sinn'd beyond it.

Petill. Forgiveness meets with all faults.

Pen. 'Tis all faults,
All sins I can commit, to be forgiven:
'Tis loss of whole man in me, my discretion
To be so stupid, to arrive at pardon.

Petill. O but the General——

Pen. He's a brave Gentleman,
A valiant, and a loving; and I dare say
He would, as far as honor durst direct him,
Make even with my fault, but 'tis not honest,
Nor in his power: examples that may nourish
Neglect and disobedience in whole bodies.
And totter the estates and faiths of armies,
Must not be plaid withall; nor out of pitty
Make a General forget his duty:
Nor dare I hope more from him than is worthy.

Petill. What would ye do?

Pen. Dye.

Petill. So would fullen children,
Women that want their wills, slaves, disobedient,
That fear the law, die. Fie, great Captain; you
A man to rule men, to have thousand lives
Under your Regiment, and let your passion
Betray your reason? I bring you all forgiveness,
The noblest kind commends, your place, your honour.

Pen. Prethee no more; 'tis foolish: didst not thou?

By—— thou didst, I over-heard thee, there,
There where thou standst now, deliver me for fascal,
Poor, dead, cold coward, miserable, wretched,
If I out-liv'd this ruine?

Petill. I?

Pen. And thou dist it nobly,
Like a true man, a souldier: and I thank thee,
I thank thee, good Petillius; thus I thank thee,

Petill. Since ye are so justly made up, let me tell ye,
'Tis fit ye dye indeed.

Pen. O how thou lov'st me! (pers

Petill. For say he had forgiven ye; say the peoples whif-
Were tame again, the time run out for wonder,
What must your own Command think, from whose Swords
Ye have taken off the edges, from whose valours
The due and recompence of Arms; nay, made it doubtful
Whither they knew obedience? must not these kill ye?

Say they are won to pardon ye, by meer miracle
Brought to forgive ye; what old valiant Souldier,
What man that loves to fight, and fight for Rome,
Will ever follow you more? dare ye know these ventures?
If so, I bring ye comfort; dare ye take it?

Pen. No, no, Petillius, no.

Petill. If your mind serve ye.

Ye may live still; but how? yet pardon me,
You may outwear all too, but when? and certain
There is a mercy for each fault, if tamely
A man will take't upon conditions.

Pen. No, by no means: I am only thinking now, Sir,
(For I am resolv'd to go) of a most base death,
Fitting the baseness of my fault. I'll hang.

Petill. Ye shall not; y^e are a Gentleman I honor,
I would else flatter ye, and force ye live,
Which is far baser. Hanging? 'tis a dogs death,
An end for slaves.

Pen. The fitter for my baseness.

Petill. Besides, the man that's hang'd, preaches his end,
And sits a sign for all the world to gape at.

Pen. That's true: I'll take a fitter poison.

Petill. No,

'Tis equal ill; the death of rats and women,
Lovers, and lazie boys, that fear correction,
Die like a man.

Pen. Why my sword then.

Petill. I, If your Sword be sharp, Sir,
There's nothing under heaven that's like your Sword;
Your Sword's a death indeed.

Pen. It shall be sharp, Sir.

Petill. Why Mithridates was an arrant assie
To dye by poison, if all Bosphorus
Could lend him Swords: your Sword must do the deed:
'Tis shame to dye choak'd, fame to dye and bleed.

Pen. Thou hast confirmed me: and, my good Petillius,
Tell me no more I may live.

Petill. 'Twas my Commission;
But now I see ye in a nobler way,
A way to make all even.

Pen. Fare-well, Captain:
Be a good man, and fight well: be obedient:
Command thy self, and then thy men. Why shakest thou?

Petill. I do not Sir.

Pen. I would thou hadst, Petillius:
I would find something to forsake the world with Worthy the man that dies: a kind of earth-quake
Through all stern valors but mine own.

Petill. I feel now
A kind of trembling in me.

Pen. Keep it still,
As thou lov'st virtue, keep it.

Petill. And brave Captain,
The graet and honoured Penynus.

Pen. That again:
O how it heightens me! again, Petillius.

Petill. Most excellent Commander.

Pen. Those were mine,
Mine, only mine.

Petill. They are still.

Pen. Then to keep 'em
For ever falling more, have at ye, heavens,
Ye everlasting powers, I am yours: The work's done,
Kills himself.

That neither fire nor age, nor melting envy
Shall ever conquer. Carry my last words
To the great General: kiss his hands and say,
My soul I give to heaven, my fault to justice
Which I have done upon my self: my virtue,
If ever there was any in Poor Penynus,
Made more, and happier, light on him. I faint.
And where there is a foe. I wish him fortune.
I dye: lye lightly on my ashes, gentle earth.

Petill. And on my sin. Farewell, great Penynus, Noise within.

The souldier is in fury. Now I am glad
'Tis done before he comes. This way, for me,
The way of toile; for thee, the way of honor. Exit.

Enter Drusus and Regulus with Souldiers.

Sould. Kill him, kill him, kill him.

Dru. What will ye do?

Reg. Good soldiers, honest soldiers.

sould. Kill him, kill him, kill him.

Dru. Kill us first; we command too.

Reg. Valiant Soldiers,

Consider but whose life ye seek. O Drusus,
Bid him be gone, he dies else. Shall Rome say
(Ye most approved Souldiers) her dear children
Devoured the fathers of the fights? shall rage
And stubborn fury guide those swords to slaughter,
To slaughter of their own, to civil ruine?

Dru. O let 'em in: all's done, all's ended, Regulus,
Penynus has found his last eclipse. Come, Souldiers,
Come, and behold your miseries: come bravely,
Full of your mutinous and bloody angers,
And here bestow your darts. O only Romane,
O father of the Wars.

Reg. Why stand ye stupid?

Where be your killing furies? whose sword now
Shall first be sheath'd in Penynus? do ye weep?
Howl out, ye wretches, ye have cause: howl ever.
Who shall now lead ye fortunate? whose valor
Preserve ye to the glory of your Countrey?
Who shall march out before ye, coy'd and courted
By all the Mistresses of War, care, counsel,
Quick-ey'd experience, and victory twin'd to him?
Who shall beget ye deeds beyond inheritance
To speak your names, and keep your honors living,
When children fail, and time that takes all with him,
Build houses for ye to oblivion?

Dru. O ye poor desperate fools: no more now, souldiers?
Go home, and hang your arms up; let rust rot 'em;
And humble your stern valors to soft prayers;
For ye have sunk the frame of all your virtues;
The sun that warm'd your bloods is set for ever:
I'll kiss thy honor'd cheek. Farewell, great Penynus,
Thou thunder-bolt, farewell. Take up the body:
To morrow morning to the Camp convey it.
There to receive due Ceremonies. That eye
That blinds himself with weeping, gets most glory.

Exeunt with a dead march.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Swetonius, Junius, Decius, Demetrius, Curius, and Souldiers: Bonduca, two Daughters, and Nennius, above. Drum and Colours.

Swet. Bring up the Catapults and shake the wall,
We will not be out out-brav'd thus.

Nen.

Nen. Shake the earth,
Ye cannot shake our souls. Bring up your Rams,
And with their armed heads, make the Fort totter;
Ye do but rock us into death.

Exit Nennius.

Jun. See, Sir,
See the Icenian Queen in all her glory
From the strong battlements proudly appearing,
As if she meant to give us lalkes.

Dec. Yeild, Queen.

Bond. I am unacquainted with that language, Roman.

Swet. Yield honour'd Lady, and expect our mercy,

Exit Decius.

We love thy nobleness.

Bond. I thank ye, ye say well;
But mercy and love are sins in Rome and hell.

Swet. Ye cannot scape our strength; ye must yield, Lady,
Ye must adore and fear the power of Rome.

Cond. If Rome be earthly, why should any knee
With bending adoration worship her?
She's vitious; and your partial selves confesse,
Aspires the height of all impiety:

Therefore 'tis fitter I should reverence
The thatched houses where the Britains dwell
In careless mirth, where the blest household gods
See nought but chaste and simple purity.

'Tis not high power that makes a place divine,
Nor that the men from gods derive their line.

But sacred thoughts in holy bosoms stor'd,
Make people noble, and the place ador'd.

Swet. Beat the wall deeper.

Bond. Beat it to the center,
We will not sink one thought.

Swet. I'll make ye.

Bond. No.

2. Dau. O mother, these are fearful hours: speak gently.

Enter Petillius.

To these fierce men, they will afford ye pitty.

Bond. Pitty? thou fearful girl; 'tis for those wretches
That misery makes tame. Wouldst thou live less?

Wast not thou born a Princess? Can my blood,
And thy brave fathers spirit, suffer in thee
So base a separation from thy self,
As mercy from these Tyrants? Thou lov'st lust sure,
And long'st to prostitute thy youth and beauty
To common slaves for bread. Say they had mercy;
The diuel a relenting conscience:
The lives of Kings rest in their Diadems,
Which to their bodies lively souls do give,
And ceasing to be Kings, they cease to live.
Show such another fear, and ———

I'll sling thee to their fury.

Swet. He is dead then?

Petill. I think so certainly; yet all my means, Sir,
Even to the hazzard of my life ———

Swet. No more:

We must not seem to mourn here.

Enter Decius.

Dec. There's a breach made,
Is it your will we charge, Sir?

Swet. Once more mercy,
Mercy to all that yield

Bond. I scorn to answer:
Speak to him girl; and hear thy Sister.

1. Dau. General,
Hear me, and mark me well, and look upon me
Directly in my face, my womans face.
Whose only beauty is the hate it bears ye;
See with thy narrowest eyes, thy sharpest wishes,
Into my soul, and see what there inhabits;
See if one fear, one shadow of a terror,
One paleness dare appear but from my anger,
To lay hold on your mercies. No, ye fools,
Poor fortunes fools, we were not born for triumphs,
To follow your gay sports, and fill your slaves

With hoots and acclamations.

Petill. Brave behaviour.

1. Dau. The children of as great as Rome, as noble,
Our names before her, and our deeds her envy;
Must we guild ore your Conquest, make your State,
That is not fairly strong, but fortunate?

No, no, ye Romans, we have ways to scape ye,
To make ye poor again, indeed our prisoners,
And stick our triumphs full.

Petill. 's death, I shall love her.

1. Dau. To torture ye with suffering, like our slaves;
To make ye curse our patience, with the world
Were lost again, to win us only, and esteem
The end of all ambitions.

Bond. Do ye wonder?

We'll make our monuments in spite of fortune,
In spite of all your Eagles wings: we'll work
A pitch above ye; and from our height we'll stoop
As fearless of your bloody soars; and fortunate,
As if we prey'd on heartless doves.

Swet. Strange stiffness.

Decius, go charge the breach.

Exit Decius.

Bond. Charge it home, Roman,
We shall deceive thee else. Where's Nennius?

Enter Nennius.

Nen. They have made a mighty breach.

Bond. Stick in thy body,
And make it good but half an hour.

Nen. I'll do it.

1. Dau. And then be sure to dye.

Nen. It shall go hard else.

Bond. Fare well with all my heart; we shall meet yonder,
Where few of these must come.

Nen. Gods take thee, Lady.

Exit Nennius.

Bond. Bring up the swords, and poison.

Enter one with Swords, and a great Cup.

2. Dau. O my fortune!

Bond. How, how, ye whore?

2. Dau. Good mother, nothing to offend ye.

Bond. Here, wench:

Behold us, Romans.

Swet. Mercy yet.

Bond. No talking:

Puff, there goes all your pitty. Come, short prayers,
And let's dispatch the business: you begin,
Shrink not; I'll see ye do't.

2. Dau. O gentle mother,

O Romans, O my heart; I dare not.

Swet. Woman, woman,

Unnatural woman.

2. Dau. O perswade her, Romans:

Alas, I am young, and would live. Noble mother,
Can ye kill that ye gave life? are my years
Fit for destruction?

Swet. Yield, and be a Queen still,
A mother and a friend.

Bond. Ye talk: come, hold it,
And put it home.

1. Dau. Fie, sister, fie,
What would you live to be?

Bond. A whore still.

2. Dau. Mercy.

Swet. Hear her, thou wretched woman.

2. Dau. Mercy, mother:

O whither will you send me? I was once
Your darling, your delight.

Bond. O gods,

Fear in my family? do it, and nobly.

2. Dau. O do not frown then.

1. Dau.

1 Daugh. Do it, worthy Sister:
'Tis nothing, 'tis a pleasure; we'll go with ye,
2 Daugh. Oh if I knew but whither.
1 Daugh. To the blessed,
Where we shall meet our Father.
Swet. Woman.
Bond. Talk not.
1 Daugh. Where nothing but true joy is. (close to thee.
Bond. That's a good wench, mine own sweet girl; put it
2 Daugh. Oh comfort me still for heavens sake.
1 Daugh. Where eternal
Our youths are, and our beauties; where no Wars come,
Nor lustful slaves to ravish us.
2 Daugh. That steels me:
Along farewell to this world.
Bond. Good: I'll help thee.
1 Daugh. The next is mine.
Shew me a Roman Lady in all our stories,
Dare do this for her honor: they are cowards,
Eat coals like compell'd Cats: your great Saint Lucrece
Dy'd not for honor; Tarquin topt her well,
And mad she could not hold him, bled.
Petil. By——
am in love: I would give an hundred pound now
But to lie with this womans behaviour. Oh the devil.
1 Daugh. Ye shall see me example, All your Rome,
If I were proud and lov'd ambition;
If I were lustful, all your ways of pleasure;
If I were greedy, all the wealth ye conquer——
Bond. Make haste.
1 Daugh. I will. Could not intice to live
But two short hours this frailty: would ye learn
How to die bravely Romans, to sling off
This case of flesh, lose all your cares for ever?
Live as we have done, well, and fear the gods,
Hunt Honor, and not Nations with your swords,
Keep your minds humble, your devotions high;
So shall ye learn the noblest part, to die. Dies.
Bond. I come, wench; to ye all Fates hangmen; you
That ease the aged destinies, and cut
The threads of Kingdoms, as they draw 'em: here,
Here's the draught would ask no less than Cæsar
To pledge it for the glories sake.
Cur. Great Lady.
Swet. Make up your own conditions.
Bond. So we will.
Swet. Stay.
Dem. Stay,
Swet. Be any thing.
Bond. A Saint, Svetonius,
When thou shalt fear, and die like a slave. Ye fools,
Ye should have ti'd up death first, when ye conquer'd,
Ye sweat for us in vain else: see him here,
He's ours still, and our friend; laughs at your pities;
And we command him with as easie reins
As do our enemies. I feel the poison.
Poor vanquish'd Romans, with what matchless tortures
Could I now rack ye? But I pittie ye,
Desiring to die quiet: nay, so much
I hate to prosecute my victory,
That I will give ye counsel e'r I die.
If you will keep your Laws and Empire whole,
Place in your Romans flesh, a Britain soul. Dies.

Enter Decius.

Swet. Desperate and strange,
Dec. 'Tis won, Sir, and the Britains
All put to th' sword.
Swet. Give her fair Funeral;
She was truly noble, and a Queen.
Pet. — Take it,
A Love-mange grown upon me? what, a spirit?
Jun. I am glad of this, I have found ye.

Petil. In my belly,
Oh how it tumbles?
Jun. Ye good gods, I thank ye.

Exeunt.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Caratach upon a rock, and Hengo by him, sleeping.

Car. Thus we afflicted Britains climb for safeties,
And to avoid our dangers, seek destructions;
Thus we awake to sorrows. O thou Woman,
Thou agent for adversities, what curses
This day belong to thy improvidence?
To Britanie by thy means, what sad millions
Of Widows weeping eyes? The strong mans valour
Thou hast betray'd to fury; the childs fortune
To fear and want of friends: whose pieties
Might wipe his mournings off, and build his sorrows
A house of rest by his blest Ancestors:
The Virgins thou hast rob'd of all their wishes,
Blasted their blowing hopes, turn'd their songs,
Their mirthful marriage-sons to funerals,
The Land thou hast left a wilderness of wretches.
The boy begins to stir: thy safety made,
Would my soul were in Heaven.

Heng. O noble Uncle,
Look out: I dream'd we were betray'd.

A soft dead march within.

Car. No harm, boy;
'Tis but thy emptiness that breeds these fancies:
Thou shalt have meat anon,
Heng. A little, Uncle,
And I shall hold out bravely. What are those?
Look, Uncle, look, those multitudes that march there?
They come upon us stealing by.

Car. I see 'em;
And prethee be not fearful.

Heng. Now ye hate me,
Would I were dead.

Car. Thou know'st I love thee dearly.
Heng. Did I e'r shrink yet, Uncle? were I a man now,
I should be angry with ye.

Enter Drufus, Regulus, and Soldiers, with Penysus's
Herse, Drums and Colours.

Car. My sweet chicken,
See, they have reach'd us, and as it seems they bear
Some soldiers body, by their solemn gestures,
And sad solemnities; it well appears too
To be of eminence. Most worthy Soldiers,
Let me intreat your knowledge to inform me
What noble Body that is which you bear
With such a sad and ceremonious grief,
As if yemeant to wooe the World and Nature
To be in love with death? Most honorable
Excellent Romans, by your antient valours,
As ye love Fame, resolve me.

Sold. 'Tis the Body
Of the great Captain Penysus, by himself
Made cold and spiritless.

Car. O stay, ye Romans,
By the Religion which you owe those gods
That lead ye on to Victories, by those glories
Which made even pride a virtue in ye.

Dru. Stay:
What's thy Will, Caratach

Car. Set down the body,
The body of the noblest of all Romans,

As ye expect an offering at your Graves
From your friends sorrows, set it down awhile.
That with your griefs an enemy may mingle;
A noble enemy that loves a Soldier;
And lend a tear to virtue, even your foes,
Your wild foes, as you call'd us, are yet stor'd
With fair affections, our hearts fresh, our spirits,
Though sometime stubborn, yet when virtue dies,
Soft and relenting as a Virgins prayers,
Oh set it down.

Drum. Set down the body, soldiers.

Car. Thou hallowed relique, thou rich Diamond
Cut with thine own dust; thou for whose wide fame
The world appears too narrow, mans all thoughts,
Had they all tongues, too silent; thus I bow
To thy most honour'd ashes: though an enemy,
Yet friend to all thy worths: sleep peaceably;
Happiness crown thy soul, and in thy earth
Some Lawrel fix his seat, there grow, and flourish,
And make thy grave an everlasting triumph.
Farewell all glorious Wars, now thou art gone,
And honest Arms adieu: all noble battels
Maintain'd in thirst of honour, not of blood,
Farewell for ever.

Heng. Was this Roman, Uncle,
So good a man?

Car. Thou never knew'st thy Father.

Heng. He dy'd before I was born.

Car. This worthy Roman

Was such another piece of endless honor,
Such a brave soul dwelt in him: their proportions
And faces were not much unlik, boy, excellent nature,
See how it works into his eyes, mine own boy.

Heng. The multitudes of these men, and their fortunes,
Could never make me fear yet: one mans goodness —

Car. O now thou pleasest me: weep still, my child,
As if thou saw'st me dead; with such a flux
Or flood of sorrow: still thou pleasest me.
And worthy soldiers, pray receive these pledges,
These hatchments of our griefs, and grace us so much
To place 'em on his Hearse. Now if ye please,
Bear off the noble burden; raise his pile
High as Olympus, make heaven to wonder
To see a star upon earth out-shining theirs.
And ever loved, ever living be
Thy honoured and most sacred memory.

Drum. Thou hast done honestly, good Caratach,
And when thou die'st, a thousand virtuous Romans
Shall sing thy soul to heaven. Now march on, soldiers.

Exeunt. A dead march.

Car. Now dry thine eyes, my boy.

Heng. Are they all gone?

I could have wept this hour yet.

Car. Come, take cheer,
And raise thy spirit, child: if but this day
Thou canst bear out thy faintness, the night coming
I'll fashion our escape.

Heng. Pray fear not me;
Indeed I am very hearty.

Car. Be so still;
His mischiefs lessen, that controuls his ill.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Petillius.

Pet. What do I ail, i'th' name of heaven I did but see her,
And see her die: she stinks by this time strongly,
Abominably stinks: she was a woman,
A thing I never car'd for: but to die so,
So confidently, bravely, strongly; Oh the devil,
I have the bots, by — she scorn'd us strangely,
All we could do, or durst do; threatned us
With such a noble anger, and so governed

With such a fiery spirit —; the plain bots;
A — upon the bots, the love-bots: hang me,
Hang me even out o' th' way, directly hang me.
Oh penny pipers, and most painful penners
Of bountiful new Ballads, what a subject,
What a sweet subject for your silver sounds,
Is crept upon ye?

Enter Junius.

Jun. Here he is; have at him.

Sings.

She set the sword unto her Breast.

great pity it was to see,

That three drops of her Life-warm blood,
run trickling down her knee.

Art thou there, bonny boy? and i'faith how dost thou?

Petil. Well, gramercie, how dost thou? h'as found me,
Sented me out: the shame the devil ow'd me.

H'as kept his day with. And what news, Junius?

Jun. It was an old tale ten thousand times told,

Of a young Lady was turn'd into mold,

Her life it was lovely, her death, it was bold.

Pet. A cruel rogue, now h'as drawn, pursue it on me,

He hunts me like a devil. No more singing;

Thou hast got a cold: come, let's go drink some Sack, boy.

Jun. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha,

Pet. Why dost thou laugh?

What Mares nest hast thou found?

Jun. Ha, ha, ha.

I cannot laugh alone: Decius, Demetrius,

Curius, oh my sides, Ha, ha, ha,

The strangest jest.

Petil. Prethee no more.

Jun. The admirablest fooling.

Pet. Thou art the prettiest fellow.

Jun. Sirs.

Pet. Why Junius,

Prethee away, sweet Junius.

Jun. Let me sing then.

Pet. Whoa, here's a stir now: sing a song o' six pence,

By — (if) prethee; — on't: Junius.

Jun. I must either sing; or laugh.

Pet. And what's your reason?

Jun. What's that to you?

Pet. And I must whistle.

Jun. Do so.

Oh, I hear 'em coming.

Pet. I have a little business.

Jun. Thou shalt not go, believe it: what a Gentleman
Of thy sweet conversation?

Pet. Captain Junius,

Sweet Captain, let me go with all celerity;

Things are not always one: and do not question,

Nor jeer, nor gybe: none of your doleful Ditties,

Nor your sweet conversation, you will find then

I may be anger'd.

Jun. By no means, Petillius;

Anger a man that never knew passion?

'Tis most impossible: a noble Captain,

A wife and and generous Gentleman?

Pet. Tom Puppie.

Leave this way to abuse me: I have found ye,

But for your mothers sake I will forgive ye.

Your subtil understanding may discover

(As you think) some trim toy to make you merry;

Some straw to tickle ye; but do not trust to't;

Y'are a young man, and may do well: be sober:

Carry your self discreetly.

Enter Decius, Demetrius, Curius.

Jun. Yes forsooth.

Dem. How does the brave Petillius?

Jun. Monstrous merry:

We two were talking what a kind of thing
I was when I was in love; what a strange monster
For little Boys and Girls to wonder at;
How like a fool I lookt.

Dec. So they do all,
Like great dull flavering fools.

Jun. Petillius saw too.

Pet. No more of this, 'tis scurvie, peace.

Jun. How nastily,
Indeed, how beastly all I did became me?
How I forgot to blow my nose? there he stands,
An honest and a wise man; if himself
(I dare avouch it boldly, for I know it)
Should find himself in love—

Petill. I am angry.

Jun. Surely his wife self would hang his beastly self,
His understanding-self so mawl his afs-self—

Dec. He's bound to do it; for he knows the follies,
The p'verties, and baseness that belongs to't,
Ha's ready on the reformations long.

Petill. I am so.

He's bound to do it, and he must do't:
Nor is it fit indeed any such coward—

Petill. You'll leave prating.

Jun. Should care come near the Regiments, especially Those curious puppies (for believe there are such)
That only love behaviours: those are dog-whelps,
Dwindle away, because a Woman dies well;
Commit with passions only: fornicate
With the free spirit merely: you, Petillius,
For you have long observ'd the World.

Petill. Dost thou hear?

I'll beat thee damnably within these three hours:
Go pray; may be I'll kill thee. Farewel Jack-daws. Exit.

Dec. What a strange thing he's grown?

Jun. I am glad he is so;

And stranger he shall be before I leave him.

Cur. Is't possible her mere death—

Jun. I observ'd him,

And found him taken, infinitely taken
With her bravery, I have follow'd him,
And seen him kiss his sword since, court his scabbard,
Call dying, dainty deer; her brave mind, Mistriss;
Casting a thousand ways, to give those forms,
That he might lie with 'em, and get old Armors:
He had got me o' th' hip once: it shall go hard, friends,
But he shall find his own coin.

Enter Macer.

Dec. How now Macer?

Is Judas yet come in?

Enter Judas.

Mac. Yes, and has lost

Most of his men too. Here he is.

Car. What news?

Jud. I have lodg'd him; rouze him he that dares.

Dem. Where, Judas?

Jud. On a steep rock i' th' woods, the boy too with him,
And there he swears he will keep his Christmas Gentlemen,
But he will come away with full conditions,
Bravely, and like a Britain: he paid part of us.
Yet I think we fought bravely: for mine own part,
I was four several times at half sword with him,
Twice stood his partizan: but the plain truth is,
He's a meer devil, and no man; i' th' end he swing'd us,
And swing'd us soundly too, he fights by Witchcraft:
Yet for all that I see him lodg'd.

Jun. Take more men,

And scout him round. Macer, march you along.
What victuals has he?

Jud. Not a piece of Bisket,
Not so much as will stop a tooth; nor Water,
More than they make themselves: they lie
Just like a brace of Bear-whelps, close, and crafty,

Sucking their fingers for their food.

Dec. Cut off then

All hope of that way: take sufficient forces.

Jun. But use no foul play, on your lives: that man
That does him mischief by deceit, I'll kill him.

Macer. He shall have fair play, he deserves it.

Jud. Hark ye.

What should I do there then? you are brave Captains,
Most valiant men; go up your selves; use virtue,
See what will come on't: pray the Gentleman
To come down, and be taken. Ye all know him,
I think ye have felt him too: there ye shall find him,
His sword by his side, plums of a pound weight by him
Will make your chops ache: you'll find it a more labour
To win him living, than climbing of a Crows-nest.

Dec. Away, and compass him; we shall come up
I am sure within these two hours. Watch him close.

Macer. He shall flee thorow the air, if he escape us.

A sad noise within.

Jun. What's this loud lamentation?

Mac. The dead body

Of the great Penyus is new come to the Camp, Sir.

Dem. Dead!

Macer. By himself, they say.

Jun. I fear'd that fortune.

Cur. Peace guide him up to heaven.

Jun. Away good Macer. Exeunt Macer and Judas.

Enter Swetonius, Drufus, Regulus, Petillius.

Swet. If thou be'st guilty,
Some fullen plague thou hat'st most light upon thee:
The Regiment return on Junius,
He well deserves it.

Petill. So.

Swet. Draw out three Companies,
Yours Decius, Junius, and thou Petillius,
And make up instantly to Caratach,
He's in the Wood before ye; we shall follow
After due ceremony done to the dead,
The noble dead: Come: let's go burn the Body.

Exeunt all but Petillius.

Petill. The Regiment given from me; disgrac'd openly;
In love too with a triflet o' abuse me?

A merry world, a fine world: serv'd seven years

To be an afs o' both sides, sweet Petillius, Sir,

You have brought your hogs to a fine market: you are wise,

Your honourable brain-pan full of crotchets,

An understanding Gentleman; your projects

Cast with assurance ever: wouldst not thou now

Be bang'd about the pate, Petillius

Answer to that sweet soldier; surely, surely,

I think ye would; pull'd by the nose, kick'd; hang thee,

Thou art the arrant'st Rascal: trust thy wisdom

With any thing of weight; the wind with feathers.

Out ye blind puppie; you command? you govern?

Dig for a groat a day, or serve a Swine-herd;

Too noble for thy nature too. I must up;

But what I shall do there, let time discover. Exit

Scena Tertia.

Enter Macer and Judas, with meat and a bottle,

Mac. Hang it o' th' side o' th' rock, as though the Britains
Stole hither to relieve him; who first ventures
To fetch it off, is ours. I cannot see him.

Jud. He lies close in a hole above, I know it;

Gnawing upon his anger: ha? no, 'tis not he,

Macer. 'Tis but the shaking of the boughs,

Jud.—— Shake 'em,

I am sure they shake me soundly. There:

Macer. 'Tis nothing.

Jud. Make no noise if he stir, a deadly tempest
Of huge stones fall upon us: 'tis done: away close. Exit.

Enter Caratach.

Car. Sleep still, sleep sweetly child, 'tis all thou feedst on.
No gentle Britain near; no valiant charity
To bring thee food: poor knave, thou art sick extreme sick,
Almost grown wild for meat; and yet thy goodnefs
Will not confess, nor shew it. All the woods
Are double lin'd with soldiers; no way left us
To make a noble scape: I'll sit down by thee,
And when thou wak'st, either get meat to save thee,
Or lose my life i'th' purchase, Good gods comfort thee.

Enter Junius, Decius, Petillius, Guide.

Guide. Ye are not far off now, Sir.

Jun. Draw the Companies
The closest way thorow the woods; we'll keep on this way.

Guide. I will Sir: half a furlong more you'll come
Within the sight o' th' Rock; keep on the left side,
You'll be discover'd else: I'll lodge your Companies
In the wild Vines beyond ye.

Dec. Do ye mark him?

Jun. Yes, and am sorry for him.

Petill. Junius,

Pray let me speak two words with you.

Jun. Walk afore,

I'll overtake ye straight.

Dec. I will.

Jun. Now, Captain.

Petill. You have oft told me, you have lov'd me, Junius.

Jun. Most sure I told you truth then.

Petill. And that love

Should not deny me any honest thing.

Jun. It shall not.

Petill. Dare ye swear it?

I have forgot all passages between us

That have been ill, forgiven too, forgot you:

Jun. What would this man have? By —— I do, Sir,
So it be fit to grant ye.

Petill. 'Tis most honest.

Jun. Why, then I'll do it.

Petill. Kill me.

Jun. How?

Petill. Pray kill me.

Jun. Kill ye?

Pet. I, kill me quickly, suddenly,
Now kill me.

Jun. On what reason? ye amaze me.

Pet. If ye do love me, kill me, ask me not why:
I would be killed, and by you.

Jun. Mercy on me,

What ails this man? Petillius.

Petill. Pray ye dispatch me,
Ye are not safe whilst I live: I am dangerous,
Troubled extreemly, even to mischief, Junius,
An enemy to all good men: fear not, 'tis justice;
I shall kill you else.

Jun. Tell me but the cause,
And I will do it.

Petill. I am disgrac'd, my service
Slighted, and unrewarded by the General,
My hopes left wild and naked; besides these,
I am grown ridiculous, an ass, a folly
I dare not trust my self with: prethee kill me.

Jun. All these may be redeem'd as easily
As you would heal your finger.

Petill. Nay——

Jun. Stay, I'll do it,
You shall not need your anger: But first, Petillius,
You shall unarm your self; I dare not trust
A man so bent to mischief.

Petill. There's my sword;
And do it handsomely.

Jun. Yes, I will kill ye,
Believe that certain: but first I'll lay before ye
The most extreme fool ye have plaid in this,
The honor purpos'd for ye, the great honor
The General intended ye,

Petill. How?

Jun. And then I'll kill ye,
Because ye shall die miserable. Know Sir,
The Regiment was given me, but till time
Call'd yet to do some worthy deed, might stop
The peoples ill thoughts of ye, for Lord Penys,
I mean his death. How soon this time's come to ye,
And halted by Swetonius? Go, says he,
Junius and Decius, and go thou Petillius;
Distinctly, thou Petillius, and draw up,
To take stout Caratach; there's the deed purpos'd,
A deed to take off all faults, of all natures:
And thou Petillius; Mark it, there's the honor,
And that done, all made even.

Petill. Stay.

Jun. No, I'll kill ye.

He knew thee absolute, and full in soldier,
Daring beyond all dangers, found thee out
According to the boldness of thy spirit,
A Subject, such a Subject.

Petill. Harke ye Junius,
I will live now.

Jun. By no means. Wooed thy worth,
Held thee by the chin up, as thou sunk'st, and shew'd thee
How Honor held her arms out: Come, make ready,
Since ye will die an ass.

Petill. Thou wilt not kill me?

Jun. By——but I will, Sir: I'll have no man dangerous Live to destroy me afterward. Besides, you have gotten Honor enough, let young men rise now. Nay,
I do perceive too by the General, (which is
One main cause ye shall die) how e'r he carry it,
Such a strong doting on ye, that I fear,
You shall command in chief: how are we paid then?
Come, if you will pray, dispatch it.

Petill. Is there no way?

Jun. Not any way to live.

Petill. I will do any thing,
Redeem my self at any price: good Junius,
Let me but die upon the Rock, but offer
My life up like a Soldier.

Jun. You will seek then
To out-doe every man.

Petill. Believe it Junius,
You shall goe stroke by stroke with me.

Jun. You'll leave off too,
As you are noble, and a soldier,
For ever these mad fancies.

Petill. Dare ye trust me?
By all that's good and honest.

Jun. There's your sword then,
And now come on a new man: Virtue guide thee. Exeunt.

Enter Caratach, and Hengo on the Rock.

Car. Courage my Boy, I have found meat: look Hengo,
Look where some blessed Britain, to preserve thee,
Has hung a little food and drink: cheer up Boy,
Do not forsake me now.

Hengo. Oh Uncle. Uncle,
I feel I cannot stay long: yet I'll fetch it,
To keep your noble life: Uncle, I am heart-whole,
And would live.

Car. Thou shalt, long I hope.

Hen. But my head, Uncle:
Methinks the Rock goes round.

Enter

Enter Macer and Judas.

M^a. Mark 'em well, Judas.

J^{ud}. Peace, as you love your life.

H^{en}. Do not you hear

The noise of Bels?

C^{ar}. Of Bels Boy? 'tis thy fancie,

Alas, thy bodies full of wind.

H^{en}. Methinks, Sir,

They ring a strange sad knell, a preparation
To some near funeral of State: nay, weep not,
Mine own sweet Uncle, you will kill me sooner.

C^{ar}. Oh my poor chicken.

H^{en}. Fie, faint-hearted Uncle:

Come, tie me in your Belt, and let me down.

C^{ar}. I'll go my self Boy.

H^{en}g^o. No, as ye love me, Uncle;

I will not eat it, if I do not fetch it;

The danger only I desire: pray tie me.

C^{ar}. I will, and all my care hang o'r thee: come child,
My valiant child,

H^{en}. Let me down apace, Uncle,

And ye shall see how like a Daw I'll whip it
From all their policies: for 'tis most certain

A Roman train: and ye must hold me sure too,
You'll spoil all else. When I have brought it Uncle,

We'll be as merry—

C^{ar}. Go! th' name of heaven, Boy.

H^{en}. Quick, quick, Uncle, I have it. Oh.

Judas shoots Hengo.

C^{ar}. What ail'st thou?

H^{en}. O my best Uncle, I am slain.

C^{ar}. I see ye, and heaven direct my hand: destruction

Caratach kills Judas with a stone from the rock.

Go with thy coward soul. How dost thou Boy?

Oh villain, pocky villain.

H^{en}. Oh Uncle, Uncle,

Oh how it pricks me: am I preserv'd for this?

Extremely pricks me.

C^{ar}. Coward, rascal Coward,

Dogs eat thy flesh.

H^{en}. Oh I bleed hard: I faint too, out upon't,

How sick I am? the lean Rogue, Uncle.

C^{ar}. Look Boy,

I have laid him sure enough.

H^{en}. Have ye knockt his brains out?

C^{ar}. I warrant thee for stirring more: cheer up, child.

H^{en}. Hold my sides hard, stop, stop, oh wretched fortune,

Must we part thus? Still I grow sicker, Uncle.

C^{ar}. Heaven look upon this noble child.

H^{en}. I once hop'd

I should have liv'd to have met these bloody Romans

At my swords point, to have reveng'd my Father,

To have beaten 'em: oh hold me hard. But Uncle—

C^{ar}. Thou shalt live still I hope Boy. Shall I draw it?

H^{en}. Ye draw away my soul then, I would live

A little longer; spare me heavens, but only

To thank you for your tender love. Good Uncle,

Good noble Uncle weep not.

C^{ar}. Oh my chicken,

My dear Boy, what shall I lose?

H^{en}. Why, a child,

That must have died however: had this scap'd me,
Feaver or famine—I was born to die. Sir.

C^{ar}. But thus unblown, my boy?

H^{en}. I go the straighter

My journey to the gods: Sure I shall know ye

When ye come, Uncle.

C^{ar}. Yes, Boy

H^{en}. And I hope

We shall enjoy together that great blessedness

You told me of.

C^{ar}. Most certain, child.

H^{en}. I grow cold,

Mine eyes are going.

C^{ar}. Lift 'em up.

H^{en}. Pray for me;

And noble Uncle, when my bones are ashes;

Think of your little Nephew. Mercy.

C^{ar}. Mercy.

You blessed Angels take him.

H^{en}. Kiss me: so.

Farewel, farewel.

Dies.

C^{ar}. Farewel the hopes of Britain,

Thou Royal graft, farewel for ever. Time and Death,

Ye have done your worst. Fortune now see, now proudly

Pluck off thy vail, and view thy triumph: Look

Look what thou hast brought this Land to. Oh fair flower,

How lovely yet thy ruins show, how sweetly

Even death embraces thee! The peace of heaven,

The fellowship of all great souls be with thee.

Enter Petillius and Junius on the rock.

Hah? dare ye Romans? ye shall win me bravely.

Thou art mine.

Fight

J^{un}. Not yet, Sir,

C^{ar}. Breath ye, ye poor Romans,

And come up all, with all your antient valors,

Like a rough wind I'll shake your souls, and send 'em—

Enter Swetonius, and all the Roman Captains.

Swet. Yield thee bold Caratach; by all—

As I am Soldier, as I envie thee,

I'll use thee like thy self, the valiant Britain.

Pet. Brave soldier yield; thou stock of Arms and Honor,

Thou filler of the World with Fame and Glory.

J^{un}. Most worthy man, we'll wooe thee, be thy prisoners.

Swet. Excellent Britain, do me but that Honor,

That more to me than Conquests, that true happiness,

To be my friend.

C^{ar}. Oh Romans, see what here is:

Had this Boy liv'd—

Swet. For Fames sake, for thy Swords sake,

As thou desirest to build thy virtues greater:

By all that's excellent in man, and honest—

C^{ar}. I do believe: Ye have had me a brave foe;

Make me a noble friend, and from your goodnes,

Give this Boy honourab'e earth to lie in.

Swet. He shall have fitting Funeral.

C^{ar}. I yield then.

Not to your blows, but your brave courtesies.

Petill. Thus we conduct then to the arms of Peace

The wonder of the World.

Swet. Thus I embrace thee,

Flourish.

And let it be no flattery that I tell thee,

Thou art the only Soldier.

C^{ar}. How to thank ye,

I must hereafter find upon your usage.

I am for Rome.

Swet. Ye must.

C^{ar}. Then Rome shall know

The man that makes her spring of glory grow.

Swet. Petillius, you have shown much worth this day,

redeem'd much error,

Ye have my love again, preserve it, Junius,

With you I make him equal in the Regiment.

J^{un}. The elder and the nobler: I'll give place, Sir.

Swet. Ye shew a friends soul.

March on, and through the Camp in every tongue.

The Virtues of great Caratach be sung.

Exant.

THE

The Knight of the Burning Pestle.

To the Readers of this COMEDY.

Gentlemen, the World is so nice in these our times, that for Apparel, there is no fashion, For Musick, which is a rare Art, (though now slighted) No Instrument; For Diet, none but the French Kickshoes that are delicate; and for Plaies, no invention but that which now runneth an invective way, touching some particular persons, or else it is contemned before it is throughly understood. This is all that I have to say, That the Author had no intent to wrong any one in this Comedy, but as a merry passage, here and there interlaced it with delight, which he hopes will please all, and be hurtful to none.

The PROLOGUE.

Where the Bee can suck no Honey, she leaves her sting behind; and where the Bear cannot find Origanum to heal his grief, he blasteth all other leaves with his breath. We fear it is like to fare so with us; that seeing you cannot draw from our labours sweet content, you leave behind you a sower mis-like, and with open reproach blame our good meaning, because you cannot reap the wonted mirth. Our intent was at this time to move inward delight, not outward lightness; and to breed (if it might be) soft smiling, not loud laughing: knowing it (to the wise) to be a great pleasure, to hear Counsel mixed with Wit, as to the foolish to have sport mingled with rudeness. They were banished the Theater of Athens, and from Rome hissed, that brought Parasites on the Stage with apish actions, or Fools with uncivil habits, or Courtezans with immodest words. We have endeavoured to be as far from unseemly speeches, to make your ears glow, as we hope you will be free from unkind reports, or mistaking the Authors intention (who never aimed at any one particular in this Play,) to make our cheeks blush. And thus I leave it, and thee to thine own censure, to like, or dislike. Vale.

Enter Prologue.

From all that's near the Court, from all that's great
Within the compass of the City-walls
We now have brought our Scene.

Enter Citizen.

Cit. Hold your peace good-man boy.

Pro. What do you mean Sir?

Cit. That you have no good meaning: These seven years there hath been Plays at this House, I have observed it, you have still girds at Citizens; and now you call your Play The London Merchant. Down with your Title, Boy, down with your Title.

Pro. Are you a member of the noble City?

Cit. I am.

Pro. And a Free-man?

Cit. Yea, and a Grocer.

Pro. So Grocer, then by your sweat favour, we intend no abuse to the City.

Cit.

Cit. No sir,
Yes sir,
If you were not resolv'd to play the Jacks,
What need you study for new subjects,
Purposely to abuse your betters?
Why could not you be contented,
As well as others,
With the Legend of Whittington,
Or the life and death of Sir Thomas Gresham?
With the building of the Royal Exchange?
Or the storie of Queen Elenor,
With the rearing of London bridge upon Woollfacks?

Pro. You seem to be an understanding man:
What would you have us do sir?

Cit. Why?
Present something notably
In honor of the Commons of the City.

Pro. Why,
What do you say, to the life and death of fat Drake,
Or the repairing of Fleet Privies?

Cit. I do not like that,
But I will have a Citizen,
And he shall be of my own Trade.

Pro. Oh,
You should have told us your mind
A month since,
Our Play is ready to begin now.

Cit. 'Tis all one for that,
I will have a Grocer,
And he shall do admirable things.

Pro. What will you have him do?

Cit. Marry I will have him —

Wife. Husband, Husband.

Wife below. Ralph below.

Ralph. Peace, Mistrifs.

Wife. Hold thy peace Ralph,
I know what I do,
I warrant ye.
Husband, Husband.

Cit. What say'st thou Conie?

Wife. Let him kill a Lion with a Pestle Husband,
Let him kill a Lion with a Pestle.

Cit. So he shall,
I'll have him kill a Lion with a pestle.

Wife. Husband,
Shall I come up Husband?

Cit. I Cony.

Ralph. help your Mistrifs this way:
Pray Gentlemen make her a little room,
I pray you sir
Lend me your hand to help up my Wife:
I thank you sir.
So.

Wife. By your leave Gentlemen all,
I'm something troublesome,
I'm a stranger here,
I was ne'r at one of these Play, as they say, before;
But I should have seen Jane Shore once,
And my Husband
Hath promised me any time this Twelvemonth,
To carrie me to the Bold Beauchams,

But in truth he did not,
I pray you bear with me.

Cit. Boy,
Let my Wife and I have a couple of stools,
And then begin,
And let the Grocer do rare things.

Pro. But sir,
We have never a Boy to play him,
Every one hath a part already.

Wife. Husband, Husband,
For gods fake let Ralph play him,
Beshrew me if I do not think
He will go beyond them all.

Cit. Well remembered wife,
Come up Ralph,
I'll tell you Gentlemen,
Let them but lend him a suit of reparable,
and necessaries,
And by gad,
If any of them all blow wind in the tail on him,
I'll be hang'd.

Wife. I pray you youth,
Let him have a suit of reparable,
I'll be sworn Gentlemen,
My Husband tells you true,
He will a^d you sometimes at our house,
That all the neighbors cry out on him:
He will fetch you up a couraging part so in the Garret,
That we are all as fear'd I warrant you,
That we quake again:
We'll fear our children with him,
If they be never so unruly,
Do but cry,
Ralph comes, Ralph comes to them,
And they'll be as quiet as Lambs.
Hold up thy head Ralph,
Shew the Gentlemen what thou canst do,
Speak a huffing part,
I warrant you the Gentlemen will accept of it.

Cit. Do Ralph, do.

Ralph. By heaven
(Methinks) it were an easie leap
To pluck bright honor from the pale-fac'd Moon,
Or dive into the bottom of the Sea,
Where never fathome line toucht any ground,
And pluck up drowned honor
From the lake of Hell.

Cit. How say you Gentlemen,
Is it not as I told you?

Wife. Nay Gentlemen,
He hath plaid before, my husband says, Musidorus
Before the Wardens of our company.

Cit. I, and he should have plaid Jeronimo
With a shoo-maker for a wager.

Pro. He shall have a suit of apparel,
If he will go in.

Cit. In Ralph, in Ralph,
And set out the Grocers in their kind,
If thou lov'st me.

Wife. I warrant our Ralph will look finely,
When he's drest,

Pro. But what will you have it call'd?

Cit. The Grocers Honor.

Pro. Methinks,

Me thinks The Knight of the burning Pestle were better.

Wife. I'll be sworn Husband.
That's as good a name as can be.

Cit. Let it be so, begin, begin;
My Wife and I will sit down.

Pro. I pray you do.

Cit. What stately Musick have you?
You have Shawnes.

Pro. Shawns? no.

Cit. No?
I'm a thief if my mind did not give me so.
Ralph plaies a stately part,
And he must needs have Shawns:
I'll be at the charge of them my self,
Rather than we'll be without them.

Pro. So you are like to be.

Cit. Why and so I will be,
There's two shillings,
Let's have the Waits of Southwark,
They are as rare fellows as any are in England;
And that will fetch them all o'r the water, with a vengeance,
As if they were mad.

Pro. You shall have them:
Will you sit down then?

Cit. I, come Wife.

Wife. Sit you merry all Gentlemen,
I'm bold to sit amongst you for my ease.

Pro. From all that's near the Court,
From all that's great
Within the compass of the City walls,
We now have brought our Scène:
Flie far from hence
All private taxes, immodest phrases,
What e'r may but shew like vicious:
For wicked mirth never true pleasure brings,
But honest minds are pleas'd with honest things.
Thus much for that we do:
But for Ralph's part
You must answer for your self.

Cit. Take you no care for Ralph,
He'll discharge himself I warrant you.

Wife. P'faith Gentlemen,
I'll give my word for Ralph.

Actus Primus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Merchant and Jasper his Man.

Merch. Sirrah, I'll make you know you are my Prentice,
And whom my charitable love redeem'd
Even from the fall of fortune; gave thee heat
And growth, to be what now thou art, new cast thee,
Adding the trust of all I have at home,
In forreign Staples, or upon the Sea
To thy direction, ti'de the good opinions
Both of self and friends to thy endeavors,
So fair were thy beginnings: but with these
As I remember you had never charge,
To love your Masters Daughter, and even then,
When I had found a wealthy Husband for her,
I take it, Sir, you had not: but however,
I'll break the neck of that Commission,
And make you know you are but a Merchants Factor.

Jasp. Sir,
I do liberally confes I am yours,
Bound both by love and duty to your service;
In which my labor hath been all my profit;
I have not lost in bargain, nor delighted
To wear your honest gains upon my back,
Nor have I given a pension to my bloud,
Or lavishly in play consum'd your stock.
These, and the miseries that do attend them,
I dare with innocence, proclaim are strangers
To all my temperate actions: for your Daughter,
If there be any love to my deservings,
Born by her virtuous self, I cannot stop it:
Nor am I able to refrain her wishes.
She's private to her self, and best of knowledge,
Whom she'll make so happy as to sigh for:
Besides, I cannot think you mean to match her,
Unto a fellow of so lame a presence,
One that hath little left of Nature in him.

Mer. 'Tis very well, Sir, I can tell your wisdom
How all this shall be cur'd.

Jasp. Your care becomes you.

Merc. And thus it shall be, Sir, I here discharge you,
My house, and service, take your liberty,
And when I want a Son I'll fend for you.

Exit.

Jasp. These be the fair rewards of them that love,
Oh you that live in freedom never prove
The travel of a mind led by desire.

Enter Luce.

Luce. Why how now friend, struck with my Fathers thun-
(der?)

Jasp. Struck, and struck dead, unless the remedy
Be full of speed and virtue; I am now,
What I expected long, no more your father's.

Luce. But mine.

Jasp. But yours, and only yours I am,

That's

That's all I have to keep me from the statute :
You dare be constant still ?

Luce. O fear me not.

In this I dare be better than a woman.
Nor shall his anger, nor his offers move me,
Were they both equal to a Princes power.

Jasp. You know my Rival ?

Luce. Yes, and love him dearly,
Even as I love an ague, or foul weather,
I prethee Jasper fear him not.

Jasp. Oh no,

I do not mean to do him so much kindness,
But to our owne desires you know the plot
We both agreed on.

Luce. Yes, and will perform
My part exactly.

Jasp. I desire no more,
Farewel, and keep my heart, 'tis yours.

Luce. I take it,
He must do miracles,
Makes me forsake it.

Exeunt.

Cit. Fie upon 'em little infidels,
What a matter's here now ?
Well, I'll be hang'd for a half-penny,
If there be not some abomination knavery in this Play,
Well, let 'em look to't,

Ralph must come,

And if there be any tricks a brewing —

Wife. Let 'em brew and bake too Husband, a gods name,
Ralph will find all out I warrant you,
And they were older than they are.

I pray my pretty youth, is Ralph ready ?

Boy. He will be presently.

Wife. Now I pray you make my commendations unto him,
And withal, carry him this stick of Licoras,
Tell him his Mistris sent it him,
And bid him bite apiece,
'Twill open his pipes the better, say.

Enter Merchant, and Master Humphrey.

Mer. Come, Sir, she's yours, upon my faith she's yours,
You have my hand, for other idle letts
Between your hopes and her, thus, with a wind,
They are scattered, and no more: my wanton Prentice,
That like a bladder blew himself with love,
I have lett out, and sent him to discover
New masters yet unknown.

Humph. I thank you Sir,
Indeed I thank you, Sir, and e'r I stir,
It shall be known however you do deem,
I am of gentle blood and gentle seem.

Mer. Oh Sir, I know it certain.

Hum. Sir, my friend,
Although as Writers say, all things have end,
And that we call a Pudding, hath his two,
Oh let it not seem strange I pray to you,
If in this bloody simile, I put
My love, more endless, than frail things or gut.

Wife. Husband,
I prethee sweet lamb tell me one thing,
But tell me truly:
Stay youths I beseech you,
Till I question my Husband.

Cit. What is it Mouse ?

Wife. Sirrah,
Didst thou ever see a prettier child ?
How it behaves it self, I warrant ye:
And speaks and looks, and pearts up the head ?
I pray you brother with your favour,
Were you never none of Mr. Moncasters Scholars ?

Cit. Chickin,

I prethee heartily contain thy self,
The childer are pretty childer,
But when Ralph comes, Lamb.

Wife. I when Ralph comes, Conic,
Well my youth you may proceed

Mar. Well Sir, you know my love, and rest, I hope
Assur'd of my consent; get but my daughters,
And wed her when you please: you must be bold,
And clap in close unto her, come, I know
You have language good enough to win a wench.

Wife. A whorefone tyrant,
Hath been an old stringer in his days,
I warrant him.

Hum. I take your gentle offer, and withal
Yield love again for love reciprocal.

Enter Luce.

Mar. What Luce, within there ?

Luce. Call'd you Sir ?

Mer. I did

Give entertainment to this Gentleman,
And see you be not froward to her, Sir :

Exit.

My presence will but be an eye-soar to you.

Hum. Fair Mistris Luce, how do you, are you well ?

Give me your hand, and then I pray you tell,
How doth your little Sister, and your Brother ?
And whether you love me or any other.

Luce. Sir, these are quickly answer'd.

Hum. So they are,

Where Women are not cruel: but how far
Is it now distant from the place we are in,
Unto that blessed place your Fathers Warren.

Luce. What makes you think of that, Sir ?

Hum. Even that face,
For stealing Rabbets whilome in that place,
God Cupid, or the Keeper, I know not whether,
Unto my cost and charges brought you thither,
And there began.

Luce. Your game, Sir.

Hum. Let no game,
Or anything that tendeth to the same,
Be evermore remembred, thou fair killer
For whom I sate me down and brake my Tiller.

Wife. There's a kind Gentleman, I warrant you, when will you do as much for me George ?

Luce. Beshrew me Sir, I am forry for your losses,
But as the proverb says, I cannot cry,
I would you had not seen me.

Hum. So would I.

Unless you had more maw to do me good.

Luce. Why, cannot this strange passion be withstood,
Send for a Constable and raise the Town.

Hum. Oh no, my valiant love will batter down
Millions of Constables, and put to flight,
Even that great Watch of Midsummer day at night.

Luce. Beshrew me, Sir, 'twere good I yielded then,
Weak Women cannot hope, where valiant men
Have no resistance.

Hum. Yield then, I am full
Of pity, though I say it, and can pull
Out of my pocket thus a pair of Gloves.
Look Lucy, look, the dogs tooth, nor the Doves
Are not so white as these; and sweet they be,
And whipt about with filk, as you may see:
If you desire the price, sute from your eye,
A beam to this place, and you shall espie
F. S. which is to say my sweetest Honey,
They cost me three and two pence, or no money.

G

Luce.

Luce. Well Sir, I take them kindly, and I thank you; What would you more?

Hum. Nothing.

Lu. Why then farewell.

Hum. Nor so, nor so, for Lady I must tell, Before we part, for what we met together, God grant me time, and patience, and fair weather.

Luce. Speak and declare your mind in terms so brief.

Hum. I shall; then first and foremost for relief I call to you, if that you can afford it, I care not at what price, for on my word, it shall be repaid again, although it cost me More than I'll speak of now, for love hath tost me In furious blanket like a Tennis-ball, And now I rise aloft, and now I fall.

Luce. Alas good Gentleman, alas the day.

Hum. I thank you heartily, and as I say, Thus do I still continue without rest, P'th' morning like a man, at night a beast, Roaring and bellowing mine own disquiet, That much I fear, forsaking of my diet, Will bring me presently to that quandary, I shall bid all adieu.

Lu. Now by S. Mary That were great pity.

Hum. So it were beshrew me,

Then ease me lusty Luce, and pity shew me.

Luce. Why Sir, you know my will is nothing worth Without my Fathers grant, get his consent, And then you may with assurance try me.

Hum. The Worshipful your Sire will not deny me, For I have ask'd him, and he hath reply'd, Sweet Master Humphrey, Luce shall be thy Bride.

Luce. Sweet Master Humphrey then I am content.

Hum. And so am I in truth.

Lu. Yet take me with you, There is another clause must be annex, And this it is I swore, and will perform it, No man shall ever joy me as his wife, But he that stole me hence: if you dare venture, I am yours; you need not fear, my father loves you: If not, farewell for ever.

Hum. Stay Nymph, stay, I have a double Gelding coloured bay, Sprung by his Father from Barbarian kind, Another for my self, though somewhat blind, Yet true as trusty tree.

Luce. I am satisfied, And so I give my hand, our course must lie Through Walshum Forrest, where I have a friend Will entertain us, so farewell Sir Humphrey. Exit Luce. And think upon your business.

Hum. Though I die, I am resolv'd to venture life and lim, For one so young, so fair, so kind, so trim, Exit Hum.

Wife. By my faith and troth George, and as I am virtuous, it is e'n the kindest young man that ever trode on shoe-leather: well, go thy waies, if thou hast her not, 'tis not thy fault 'faith.

Cit. I prethee Mousse be patient, a shall have her, or I'll make some of 'em smoak for't.

Wife. Thats my good lamb George, sic, this stinking Tobacco kills men, would there were none in England: now I pray Gentlemen, what good does this stinking Tobacco? do you nothing; I warrant you make chimneys a your faces: Oh Husband, Husband, now, now there's Ralph, there's Ralph.

Enter Ralph, like a Grocer in's shop, with two Prentices, reading Palmerin of England.

Cit. Peace fool, let Ralph alone, hark you Ralph; do not strain your self too much at the first, peace, begin Ralph.

Ralph. Then Palmerin and Trineus snatching their Lances from their Dwarfs, and clasping their Helmets, gallopt amain after the Giant, and Palmerin having gotten a fight of him, came posting amain, saying, Stay traiterous thief, for thou maist not so carry away her, that is worth the greatest Lord in the World, and with these words gave him a blow on the Shoulder, that he struck him besides his Elephant; and Trineus coming to the Knight that had Agricola behind him, set him soon besides his horse, with his neck broken in the fall, so that the Princess getting out of the throng, between joy and grief said; All happy Knight, the mirror of all such as follow Arms, now may I be well assured of the love thou bearest me, I wonder why the Kings do not raise an Army of fourteen or fifteen hundred thousand men, as big as the Army that the Prince of Portigo brought against Rosicler, and destroy these Giants, they do much hurt to wandring Damsels, that go in quest of their Knights.

Wife. Faith Husband, and Ralph says true, for they say the King of Portugal cannot sit at his meat, but the Giants and the Ettins will come and snatch it from him.

Cit. Hold thy tongue; on Ralph.

Ralph. And certainly those Knights are much to be commended, who neglecting their possessions, wander with a Squire and a Dwarf through the Defarts, to relieve poor Ladies.

Wife. I by my faith are they Ralph, let 'em say what they will, they are indeed: our Knights neglect their possessions well enough, but they do not the rest.

Ralph. There are no such courteous, and fair well-spoken Knights in this age, they will call one the Son of a whore, that Palmerin of England, would have called fair Sir; and one that Rosicler would have called Right beautiful Damsel, they will call Damn'd bitch.

Wife. I'll be sworn will they Ralph, they have called me so an hundred times about a scurvy pipe of Tobacco.

Ralph. But what brave spirit could be content to sit in his shop with a flapet of Wood, and a blew Apron before him selling Metbridatam and Dragons water to visited houses, that might pursue feats of Arms, and through his noble achievements, procure such a famous History to be written of, in his Heroick prowess.

Cit. Well said Ralph, some more of those words Ralph.

Wife. They go finely by my troth.

Ralph. Why should I not then pursue this course, both for the credit of my self and our company, for amongst all the worthy Books of Achievements, I do not call to mind, that I yet read of a Grocer Errant, I will be the said Knight: Have you heard of any that hath wandred unfurnished of his Squire and Dwarf? my elder Prentice Tom shall be my trusty Squire, and little George my Dwarf, hence my blew Apron, yet in remembrance of my former Trade, upon my shield shall be pourtraid a Burning Pestle, and I will be call'd the Knight of the burning Pestle.

Wife. Nay, I dare swear thou wilt not forget thy old Trade, thou wert ever meek. Ralph. Tim,

Tim. Anon.

Ralph. My beloved Squire, and George my Dwarf, I charge you that from henceforth you never call me by any other name, but the Right courteous and valiant Knight of the Burning Pestle, and that you never call any Female by the name of a Woman or Wench, but fair Lady, if she have her desires; if not, distressed Damsel; that you call all Forrests and Heaths, Defarts, and all Horses Palfries.

Wife. This is very fine: faith do the Gentlemen like Ralph, think you Husband?

Cit. I, I warrant thee, the Players would give all the shoes in their shop for him.

Ralph. My beloved Squire Tim, stand out, admit this were a Defart, and over it a Knight Errant pricking, and I should bid you enquire of his intents, what would you say?

Tim. Sir, my Master sent me to know whither you are riding?

Ralph.

Ralph. No, thus; fair Sir, the Right courteous, and valiant Knight of the Burning Pestle, commanded me to enquire upon what adventure you are bound, whether to relieve some distressed Damfel, or otherwife.

Cit. Whorson blockhead cannot remember.

Wife. P'faith, and Ralph told him on't before: all the Gentlemen heard him, did he not Gentlemen, did not Ralph tell him on't?

George. Right courteous and valiant Knight of the Burning Pestle, here is a distressed Damfel, to have a halfpenny worth of Pepper.

Wife. That's a good boy, see, the little boy can hit it, by my troth it's a fine child.

Ralph. Relieve her with all courteous language, now shut up shop, no more my Prentice, but my trusty Squire and Dwarf, I must bespeak my Shield, and arming Pestle.

Cit. Go thy ways Ralph, as I am a true man, thou art the best on 'em all.

Wife. Ralph, Ralph.

Ralph. What say you Mistrifs?

Wife. I prethee come again quickly, sweet Ralph.

Ralph. By and by. Exit Ralph.

Enter Jasper and his Mother Mistrifs Merry-thought.

Mist. Mer. Give thee my blessing? no, I'll never give thee my blessing, I'll see thee hang'd first; it shall ne'r be said I gave thee my blessing: thou art thy Fathers own Son, of the blood of the Merry-thoughts; I may curse the time that e'r I knew thy Father, he hath spent all his own, and mine too, and when I tell him of it, he laughs and dances, and sings and cries; A merry heart lives long-a. And thou art a wast-thrift, and art run away from thy Master, that lov'd thee well, and art come to me, and I have laid up a little for my younger Son Michael, and thou thinkst to bezie that; but thou shalt never be able to do it, Come hither Michael, come Michael, down on thy knees, thou shalt have my blessing. Enter Michael.

Mich. I pray you Mother pray to God to bless me.

Mist. Mer. God bless thee: but Jasper shall never have my blessing, he shall be hang'd first, shall he not Michael? how saist thou?

Mich. Yes forsooth Mother and grace of God.

Mist. Mer. That's a good boy.

Wife. P'faith it's a fine spoken child:

Jasp. Mother, though you forget a Parents love, I must preserve the duty of a child: I cannot from my Master, nor return To have your stock maintain my idleness.

Wife. Ungracious child I warrant him, harke how he chops Logick with his Mother: thou hadst best tell her she lies, do, tell her she lies.

Cit. If he were my son, I would hang him up by the heels, and flea him, and salt him, whorson halter-sack.

Jasp. My coming only is to beg your love, Which I ever though I never gain it, And howsoever you esteem of me, There is no drop of blood hid in these veins, But I remember well belongs to you, That brought me forth; and would be glad for you To rip them all again, and let it out.

Mist. Mer. P'faith I had sorrow enough for thee: (God knows) but I'll hamper thee well enough: get thee in thou vagabond, get thee in, and learn of thy brother Michael.

Old Mer. within. Nose, Nose, jolly red Nose, and who gave thee this jolly red Nose?

Mist. Mer. Hark my Husband he's singing and hoiting, And I'm fain to cark and care, and all little enough. Husband, Charles, Charles Merry-thought.

Enter Old Merry-thought.

Old Mer. Nutmegs and Ginger, Cinamon and Cloves, And they gave me this jolly red Nose.

Mist. Mer. If you would consider your estate, you would have little list to sing, I-wisse.

Old Mer. It should never be consider'd, while it were an estate, if I thought it would spoil my singing.

Mist. Mer. But how wilt thou do Charles, thou art an old man, and thou canst not work, and thou hast not forty shillings left, and thou eatest good meat, and drinkest good drink, and laughest?

Old Mer. And will doe.

Mist. Mer. But how wilt thou come by it Charles?

Old Mer. How? why how have I done hitherto these forty years? I never came into my Dining-room, but at eleven and six a clock, I found excellent meat and drink a'th' Table: my Cloaths were never worn out, but next morning a Tailor brought me a new suit; and without question it will be so ever! use makes perfectness, If all should fail, it is but a little straining my self extraordinary, and laugh my self to death.

Wife. It's a foolish old man this: is not he George?

Cit. Yes Cunny.

Wife. Give me a penny i' th' purse while I live George.

Cit. I by Lady Cunnie, hold thee there.

Mist. Mer. Well Charles, you promis'd to provide for Jasper, and I have laid up for Michael: I pray you pay Jasper his portion, he's come home, and he shall not consume Michaels stock: he saies his Master turn'd him away, but I promise you truly, I think he ran away.

Wife. No indeed Mistrifs Merry-thought, though he be a notable gallows, yet I'll assure you his Master did turn him away, even in this place, 'twas i' faith within this half hour, about his Daughter, my Husband was by.

Cit. Hang him rogue, he serv'd him well enough: love his Masters Daughter! by my troth Cunnie, if there were a thousand boys, thou wouldst spoil them all, with taking their parts; let his Mother alone with him.

Wife. I George, but yet truth is truth.

Old Mer. Where is Jasper? he's welcome however, call him in, he shall have his portion, is he merry?

Enter Jasper and Michael.

Mist. Mer. I foul chive him, he is too merry. Jasper. Michael.

Old Mer. Welcome Jasper, though thou run'st away, welcome, God bless thee, 'tis thy mothers mind thou shouldst receive thy portion: thou hast been abroad, and I hope hast learnt experience enough to govern it: thou art of sufficient years, hold thy hand: one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, there is ten shillings for thee, thrust thy self into the world with that, and take some settled course, if fortune cross thee, thou hast a retiring place; come home to me, I have twenty shillings left, be a good Husband, that is, wear ordinary Cloaths, eat the best meat, and drink the best drink; be merry, and give to the poor, and and believe me, thou hast no end of thy goods.

Jasp. Long may you live free from all thought of ill, And long have cause to be thus merry still. But Father?

Old Mer. No more words Jasper, get thee gone, thou hast my blessing, thy Fathers spirit upon thee. Farewel Jasper; but yet, or e'r you part (oh cruel!) kiss me, kiss me sweeting, mine own dear jewel: So, now begone; no words.

Enter Jasper,

Mist. Mer. So Michael, now get thee gone too.

Mich. Yes forsooth Mother, but I'll have my Father's blessing first.

Mist. Mer. No Michael, 'tis no matter for his blessing; thou hast my blessing, begone; I'll fetch my money and jewels, and follow thee: I'll stay no longer with him I warrant thee; truly Charles I'll begon too.

Old Mer. What you will not?

Old Mer. What you will not?

Mist. Mer. Yes indeed will I.

Old Mer. Hay ho, farewell Nan, I'll never trust wench more again, if I can.

Mist. Mer. You shall not think (when all your own is gone) to spend that I have been scraping up for Michael.

Old Mer. Farewel good wife, I expect it not; all I have to do in this world, is to be merry: which I shall, if the ground be not taken from me: and if it be, When Earth and Seas from me are rest, The Skies aloft for me are left.

Exeunt.

Boy danceth, Musick.

Finis Actus Primi.

Wife. I'll be sworn he's a merry old Gentleman for all that: Hark, hark Husband, hark, Fiddles, Fiddles; now surely they go finely. They say 'tis present death for these Fidlersto tune their Rebeck before the great Turks grace, is 't not George? But look, look, here's a youth dances: now good youth do a turn o' th' toe; Sweet:heart, I'faith I'll have Ralph come, and do some of his Gambols; he'll ride the Wild Mare Gentlemen, 'twould do your hearts good to see him: I thank you kind youth, pray bid Ralph come.

Cit. Peace Connie. Sirrah, you scurvy boy, bid the Players send Ralph, or by gods—and they do not, I'll tear some of their Periwigs beside their heads: this is all Riff-Raff.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Merchant and Humphrey.

Merch. And how faith? how goes it now Son Humphrey?

Hum. Right worshipful and my beloved friend And Father dear, this matter's at an end.

Merch. 'Tis well, it should be so, I'm glad the Girl is found so tractable.

Hum. Nay, she must whirl From hence, and you must wink: for so I say, The story tells to morrow before day.

Wife. George, dost thou think in thy conscience now 'twill be a match? tell me but what thou think'st sweet Rogue, thou see'st the poor Gentleman (dear heart) how it labours and throbs I warrant you, to be at rest: I'll go move the Father for't.

Cit. No, no, I prethee sit still Honey-suckle, thou'lt spoil all; if he deny him, I'll bring half a dozen good fellows my self, and in the shutting of an evening knock't up, and there's an end.

Wife. I'll bufs thee for that I'faith boy; well George, well you have been a wag in your days I warrant you: but God forgive you, and I do with all my heart.

Mer. How was it Son? you told me that to morrow Before day break, you must convey her hence.

Hum. I must, I must, and thus it is agreed, Your Daughter rides upon a brown-bay Steed, I on a Sorrel, which I bought of Brian, The honest Host of the red roaring Lion In Waltham situate: then if you may, Consent in seemly sort, lest by delay, The fatal Sisters come, and do the office, And then you'll sing another Song.

Merch. Alas.

Why should you be thus full of grief to me, That do as willing as your self agree To anything so it be good and fair? Then steal her when you will, if such a pleasure

Content you both, I'll sleep and never see it, To make your joys more full: but tell me why You may not here perform your marriage?

Wife. Gods blessing o'thy soul, old man, i' faith thou art loth to part true hearts: I see a has her, George, and I'm as glad on't, well, go thy ways Humphrey for fair a spoken man, I believe thou hast not thy fellow within the walls of London, and I should say the Suburbs too, I should not lie: why dost not thou rejoyce with me George?

Cit. If I could but see Ralph again, I were as merry as (mine Host i' faith.

Cit. The cause you seem to ask, I thus declare; Help me oh Muses nine, your Daughter sware A foolish oath, the more it was the pity: Yet none but my self within this City Shall dare to say so, but a bold defiance Shall meet him, were he of the noble Science. And yet she sware, and yet why did she swear? Truly I cannot tell, unless it were For her own ease: for sure sometimes an oath, Being sworn thereafter, is like cordial broth. And this it was, she swore never to marry, But such a one whose mighty arm could carry (As meaning me, for I am such a one) Her bodily away through stick and stone, Till both of us arrive at her request, Some ten miles off in the wide Waltham Forrest.

Merch. If this be all, you shall not need to fear Any denial in your love, proceed, I'll neither follow, nor repeat the deed.

Hum. Good night, twenty good nights, and twenty more, And twenty more good nights, that makes threescore.

Exeunt.

Enter Mistress Merry-thought, and her Son Michael.

Mist. Mer. Come Michael, art thou not weary Boy?

Mich. No forsooth Mother not I.

Mist. Mer. Where be we now child?

Mich. Indeed forsooth Mother I cannot tell, unless we be at Mile-end, is not all the world Mile-end, Mother?

Mist. Mer. No Michael, not all the world boy; but I can assure thee Michael, Mile-end is a goodly matter, there has been a pitch field my child, between the naughty Spaniels, and the Englishmen, and the Spaniels ran away Michael, and the Englishmen followed: my neighbor Coxstone was there boy, and kill'd them all with a birding-piece.

Mich. Mother forsooth.

Mist. Mer. What says my white boy?

Mich. Shall not my Father go with us too?

Mist. Mer. No Michael, let thy Father go snick up, he shall never come between a pair of sheets with me again, while he lives: let him stay at home and sing for his supper boy; come child sit down, and I'll shew my boy fine knacks indeed, look here Michael, here's a Ring, and here's a Bruch, and here's a Bracelet, and here's two Rings more, and here's Money, and Gold by th' eye my boy.

Mich. Shall I have all this Mother?

Mist. Mer. I Michael thou shalt have all Michael.

Cit. How lik'st thou this wench?

Wife. I cannot tell, I would have Ralph, George; I'll see no more else indeed: law, and I pray you let the youths understand so much by word of mouth, for I will tell you truly, I'm afraid o'my boy: come, come George, let's be merry and wise, the child's a fatherless child, and say they should put him into a strait pair of Gaskins, 'twere worse than knot-grafs, he would never grow after it.

Enter Ralph, Squire, and Dwarf.

Cit. Here's Ralph, here's Ralph

Wife. How do you Ralph? you are welcome Ralph, as I may say, it's a good boy, hold up thy head, and be not afraid, we are thy friends. Ralph, the Gentlemen will praise thee Ralph, if thou plai'st thy part with audacity, begin Ralph a Gods name.

Ralph.

Ralph. My trusty Squire unlace my Helme, give me my hat, where are we, or what desert might this be?

Dw. Mirror of Knighthood, this is, as I take it, the perilous Waltham Down; in whole bottom stands the enchanted Valley.

Mist. Mer. Oh Michael, we are betraid, we are betraid, here be Giants, flie boy, flie boy flie.

Exeunt Mother and Michael.

Ralph. Lace on my Helme again: what noise is this?

A gentle Lady flying the embrace
Of some uncourteous Knight, I will relieve her.
Go Squire, and say, the Knight that wears this Pestle
In honor of all Ladies swears revenge
Upon that recreant Coward that pursues her,
Goe comfort her, and that same gentle Squire
That bears her company.

Squ. I go brave Knight.

Ralph. My trusty Dwarf and friend, reach me my shield,
And hold it while I swear, first by my Knighthood,
Then by the soul of Amadis de Gaule,
My famous Ancestor, then by my Sword,
The beauteous Briouella girt about me,
By this bright burning Pestle of mine honor,
The living Trophie, and by all respect
Due to distressed Damsels, here I vow
Never to end the quest of this fair Lady,
And that forsaken Squire, till by my valour
I gain their liberty.

Dw. Heaven blefs the Knight

That thus relieves poor errant Gentlewomen. Exit.

Wife. I marry Ralph, this has some favour in't, I would see the proudest of them all offer to carry his Books after him. But George, I will not have him go away so soon, I shall be sick if he go away, that I shall; call Ralph again George, call Ralph again, I prethee sweetheart let him come fight before me, and let's ha some Drums, and Trumpets, and let him kill all that comes near him, and thou lov'st me George.

Cit. Peace a little bird, he shall kill them all, and they were twenty more on 'em then there are,

Enter Jasper.

Jasp. Now fortune, if thou be'st not only ill,
Shew me thy better face, and bring about
Thy desperate wheel, that I may climb at length
And stand, this is our place of meeting,
If love have any constancy. Oh age!

Where only wealthy men are counted happy:
How shall I please thee? how deserve thy smiles?
When I am only rich in misery?

My fathers blessing, and this little coin
Is my inheritance, a strong revenue,
From earth thou art, and to earth I give thee,
There grow and multiply, whilst fresher air
Breeds me a fresher fortune: how, illusion!
What hath the Devil coyn'd himself before me?
'Tis mettle good, it rings well, I am waking,
And taking too I hope, now Gods dear blessing
Upon his heart that left it here, 'tis mine,
These pearls, I take it, were not left for Swine. Exit.

Wife. I do not like that this unthrifty youth should embesil away the money, the poor Gentlewoman his mother will have a heavy heart for it, God knows.

Cit. And reason good, sweet heart.

Wife. But let him go, I'll tell Ralph a tale in's ear, shall fetch him again with a wanion, I warrant him, if he be above ground; and besides George, here be a number of sufficient Gentlemen can witness, and my self, and your self, and the Musicians, if we be call'd in question, but here comes Ralph, George, thou shalt hear him speak, as he were an Emperal.

Enter

Enter Ralph and Dwarf.

Ralph. Comes not Sir Squire again?

Dwarf. Right courteous Knight,
Your Squire doth come, and with him comes the Lady.

Enter Mistress Mer. and Michael, and Squire.

For and the Squire of Damsels as I take it.

Rafe. Madam, if any service or devoir
Of a poor errant Knight may right your wrongs,
Command it, I am prest to give you succor,
For to that holy end I bear my Armour.

Mist. Mer. Alas, Sir, I am a poor Gentlewoman, and I have lost my money in this Forrest.

Desart, you would say, Lady, and not lost
Whilst I have Sword and Launce, dry up your tears.
Which ill befits the beauty of that face:

And tell the story, if I may request it,
Of your disastrous fortune.

Mist. Mer. Ont alas, I left a thousand pound, a thousand pound, e'n all the money I had laid up for this youth, upon the sight of your Mastership, you lookt so grim, and as I may say it, saving your presence, more like a Giant than a mortal man.

Ralph. I am as you are, Lady, so are they
All mortal, but why weeps this gentle Squire?

Mist. Mer. Has he not cause to weep do you think, when he has lost his inheritance?

Ralph. Young hope of valour, weep not, I am here

That will confound thy foe, and pay it dear

Upon his coward head, that dare denie,

Distressed Squires, and Ladies equity.

I have but one horse, on which shall ride

This Lady fair behind me, and before

This courteous Squire, fortune will give us more

Upon our next adventure; fairly speed

Beside us Squire and Dwarf to do us need. Exeunt.

Cit. Did not I tell you Nell what your man would do? by the faith of my body wench, for clean action and good delivery, they may all cast their caps at him.

Wife. And so they may i'faith, for I dare speak it boldly, the twelve Companies of London cannot match him, timber for timber: well George, and he be not inveigled by some of these paltery Players, I ha much marvel: but George we had done our parts, if the Boy have any grace to be thankful.

Cit. Yes, I warrant you duckling.

Enter Humphrey and Luce.

Hum. Good Mistress Luce, how ever I in fault am,
For your lame horse; you're welcome unto Waltham.
But which way now to go, or what to say
I know not truly till it be broad day.

Luce. O fear not master Humphrey, I am guide
For this place good enough.

Hum. Then up and ride,
Or if it please you, walk for your repose,
Or sit, or if you will, go pluck a Rose:

Either of which shall be indifferent,
To your good friend and Humphrey, whose consent
Is so intangled ever to your will,

As the poor harmless horse is to the ill.

Luce. Faith and you say the word, we'll e'n sit down,
And take a nap.

Hum. 'Tis better in the Town,
Where we may nap together: for believe me,
To sleep without a snatch would mickle grieve me.

Luce. You're merry master Humphrey.

Hum. So I am,
And have been ever merry from my Dam.

Luce. Your Nurse had the less labour.

Hum.

Hum. Faith it may be,
Unless it were by chance I did beray me.

Enter Jasper.

Jasp. Luce, dear friend Luce,

Luce. Here Jasper.

Jasp. You are mine.

Hum. If it be so, my friend, you use me fine:
What do you think I am?

Jasp. An arrant Noddy.

Hum. A word of obloquie: now by gods body,
I'll tell thy Master, for I know thee well.

Jasp. Nay, and you be so forward for to tell,
Take that, and that, and tell him, Sir, I gave it:
And say I paid you well.

Hum. O Sir I have it,
And do confess the payment, pray be quiet.

Jasp. Go, get you to your night-cap and the dict,
To cure your beaten bones.

Luce. Alas, poor Humphrey,
Get thee some wholesome broth with Sage and Cumfrie:
A little oil of Roses and a Feather
To noint thy back withal.

Hum. When I came hither,
Would I had gone to Paris with John Dorry.

Luce. Farewel my pretty Nump, I am very sorry
I cannot bear thee company.

Hum. Farewel,
The Devils Dam was ne'r so bang'd in Hell. Exeunt.
Manet Humphrey.

Wife. This young Jasper will prove me another Things, a my conscience and he may be suffered; George, dost not see George how a swaggers, and flies at the very heads a fokes as he were a Dragon; well if I do not do his lesson for wronging the poor Gentleman, I am no true Woman, his friends that brought him up might have been better occupied, I wis, then have taught him these segaries: he's e'n in the high-way to the Gallows, God bless him.

Cit. You're too bitter, Connie, the young man may do well enough for all this.

Wife. Come hither master Humphrey, has he hurt you?
now beshrew his fingers for't, here Sweet-heart, here's some Green Ginger for thee, now beshrew my heart, but a has Pepper-nel in's head, as big as a Pullets egg: alas, sweet
Lamb, how thy Temples beat; take the peace on him sweet heart, take the peace on him.

Enter a Boy.

Cit. No, no, you talk like a foolish woman, I'll ha Ralph fight with him, and swinge him up well-favour'dly: sirrah boy come hither, let Ralph come in and fight with Jasper,

Wife. I and beat him well, he's an unhappy boy.

Boy. Sir, you must pardon us, the plot of our Play lies contrary, and 'twill hazard the spoiling of our Play.

Cit. Plot me no plots, I'll ha Ralph come out, I'll make your houte too hot for you else.

Boy. Why Sir, he shall, but if any thing fall out of order,
the Gentlemen must pardon us.

Cit. Go your ways good-man boy, I'll hold him a penny he shall have his belly full of fighting now, ho here comes Ralph, no more.

Enter Ralph, Mist. Merry. Michael, Squire. and Dwarf.

Ralph. What Knight is that, Squire, ask him if he keep
The passage bound by love of Lady fair,
Or else but prickant.

Hum. Sir, I am no Knight,
But a poor Gentleman, that this same night,
Had stoln from me on yonder Green,
My lovely Wife, and suffered to be seen

Yet extant on my shoulderr such a greeting,
That whilst I live, I shall think of that meeting.

Wife. I Ralph, he beat him unmercifully, Ralph, and thou spar't him Ralph, I would thou wert hang'd,

Cit. No more, wife, no more.

Ralph. Where is the Caitiff wretch hath done this deed,
Lady, your pardon, that I may proceed
Upon the quest of this injurious Knight.
And thou fair Squire repute me not the worse,
In leaving the great venture of the purse,

Enter Jasper and Luce.

And the rich Casket till some better leisure.

Hum. Here comes the Broker hath purloin'd my treasure.

Ralph. Go, Squire, and tell him I am here,
An Errant Knight at Arms, to crave delivery
Of that fair Lady to her own Knights arms.
If he deny, bid him take choice of ground,
And so desie him.

Squire. From the Knight that bears
The Golden Pestle, I desie thee Knight.
Unless thou make fair restitution
Of that bright Lady.

Jasp. Tell the Knight that sent thee
He is an ass, and I will keep the wench,
And knock his Head-piece.

Ralph. Thou art but dead,
If thou recall not thy uncourteous terms:

Wife. Break's pate Ralph, break's pate Ralph, foundly.

Jasp. Come Knight, I am ready for you, now your Pestle.
Snatches away his Pestle.

Shall try what temper, Sir, your Mortar's of:
With that he stood upright in his stirrops,
And gave the Knight of the Calve-skin such a knock,
That he forsook his horse, and down he fell,
And then he leaped upon him, and plucking off his Helmet.

Hum. Nay, and my noble Knight be down so soon,
Though I can scarcely go, I needs must run-

Exit Humphrey and Ralph.

Wife. Run Ralph, run Ralph, run for thy life boy, Jasper comes, Jasper comes.

Jasp. Come Luce, we must have other Arms for you,
Humphrey and Golden Pestle both adieu. Exeunt.

Wife. Sure the Devil, God bless us, is in this Springald, why George, didst ever see such a fire-drake, I am afraid
my boy's miscarried; if he be, though he were Master
Merry-thoughts Son a thousand times, if there be any Law in England, I'll make some of them smart for't.

Cit. No, no, I have found out the matter sweet-heart,
Jasper is enchanted as sure as we are here, he is enchanted,
he could no more have stood in Ralph's hands, than I can stand in my Lord Mayor's: I'll have a Ring to discover all enchantments, and Ralph shall beat him yet: be no more vext, for it shall be so.

Enter Ralph, Squire, Dwarf, Mistris Merry-thought, and Michael.

Wife. Oh Husband, here's Ralph again, stay Ralph, let me speak with thee, how dost thou Ralph? art thou not shrewdly hurt? the foul great Lungies laid unmercifully on thee, there's some Sugar-candy for thee, proceed, thou shalt have another bout with him.

Cit. If Ralph had him at the Fencing-School, if he did not make a puppy of him, and drive him up and down the School, he should ne'r come in my shop more.

Mist. Mer. Truly master Knight of the Burning Pestle, I am weary.

Mich. Indeed-law Mother, and I am very hungry.

Ralph. Take comfort gentle Dame, and your fair Squire.
For in this Desert there must needs be plac'd
Many strong Castles, held by courteous Knights,
And till I bring you safe to one of those
I swear by this my Order ne'r to leave you.

Wife.

Wife. Well said Ralph, George, Ralph was ever comfortable, was he not?

Cit. Yes Duck.

Wife. I shall ne'r forget him: when we had lost our child, you know it was straid almost alone, to Puddle-wharfe, and the Cryers were abroad for it, and there it had drown'd it self but for a Sculler, Ralph was the most comfortablest to me: peace Mistris, saies he, let it go, I'll get you another as good, did he not George? did he not say so?

Cit. Yes indeed did he Mouse.

Dwarfe. I would we had a mess of Pottage, and a pot of Drink, Squire, and were going to bed.

Squire. Why we are at Walsham Towns end, and that's the Bell Inne. (Squire,

Dwarfe. Take courage valiant Knight, Damsel, and I have discovered, not a stone cast off, An antient Castle held by the old Knight Of the most holy Order of the Bell,

Who gives to all Knights Errant entertain:
There plenty is of food, and all prepar'd,
By the white hands of his own Lady dear.
He hath three Squires that welcome all his Guests:
The first, High Chamberlain, who will see
Our beds prepar'd, and bring us snowy sheets,
Where never Footman stretch'd his butter'd Hams.

The second height Tapstro, who will see
Our pots full filled, and no froth therein;
The third, a gentle Squire Ostlero height,
Who will our Palfries lick with wisps of straw,
And in the Maunger put them Oats enough,
And never greafe their teeth with Candle-snuffe.

Wife. That same Dwarfe's a pretty boy, but the Squire's a grout-nold.

Ralph. Knock at the Gates my Squire, with stately Lance.

Enter Tapster.

Tap. Who's there, you're welcome Gentlemen, will you see a room?

Dwarfe. Right courteous and valiant Knight of the Burning Pestle, This is the Squire Tapstro.

Ralph. Fair Squire Tapstro, I a wandring Knight,
Height of the Burning Pestle in the quest
Of this fair Ladies Casket, and wrought purse,
Losing my self in this vast wilderness,
And to this Castle well by fortune brought,
Where hearing of the goodly entertain
Your Knight of holy Order of the Bell,
Gives to all Damsels, and all Errant Knights,
I thought to knock, and now am bold to enter.

Tapst. An't please you see a chamber, you are very welcome. Exeunt.

Wife. George, I would have something done, and I cannot tell what it is.

Cit. What is it Nell?

Wife. Why George, shall Ralph beat no body again? prethee sweet-heart let him.

Cit. So he shall Nell, and if I joyn with him, we'll knock them all.

Enter Humphrey and Merchant.

Wife. O George, here's master Humphrey again now, that lost Mistris Luce, and Mistris Luce's Father, master Humphrey will do some bodies arrant I warrant him.

Hum. Father, it's true in arms I ne'r shall clasp her, For she is stoln away by your man Jasper.

Wife. I thought he would tell him.

Mer. Unhappy that I am to lose my child:
Now I begin to think on Jasper's words,
Who oft hath urg'd to me thy foolishness,
Why didst thou let her go, thou lov'st her not,
That wouldst bring home thy life, and not bring her.

Hum. Father forgive me, I shall tell you true,

Look on my shoulders they are black and blue,
Whilst too and fro fair Luce and I were winding,
He came and basted me with a hedge binding.

Mer. Get men and horses straight, we will be there
Within this hour; you know the place again?

Hum. I know the place where lie my loins did swaddle,
I'll get six horses, and to each a saddle.

Mer. Mean time I'll go talk with Jasper's Father.

Exeunt.

Wife. George, What wilt thou lay with me now, that Master Humphrey has not Mistris Luce yet, speak George what wilt thou lay with me?

Cit. No Nell, I warrant thee, Jasper is at Puckeridge with her by this.

Wife. Nay George, you must consider Mistris Lucie's feet are tender, and besides, 'tis dark, and I promise you truly, I do not see how he should get out of Walsham Forrest with her yet.

Cit. Nay Cunny, what wilt thou lay with me that Ralph has her not yet.

Wife. I will not lay against Ralph, Honny, because I have not spoken with him: but look George, peace, here comes the merry old Gentleman again.

Enter old Merry-thought.

Old Mer. When it was grown to dark midnight,
And all were fast asleep,
In came Margarets grimly Ghost,
And stood at William's feet.

I have money, and meat, and drink before hand, till to morrow at noon, why should I be sad? methinks I have halfe a dozen jovial spirits within me, I am three merry men, and three merry men: To what end should any man be sad in this world? give me a man that when he goes to hanging cries troul the black bould to me: and a Woman that will sing a catch in her Travel. . I have seen a man come by my door, with a serious face, in a black cloak, without a Hatband, carrying his head as if he lookt for pins in the street. I have lookt out of my window halfe a year after, and have spied that mans head upon London Bridge: 'tis vile, never trust a Tailor that does not sing at his work, his mind is of nothing but filching.

Wife. Mark this George, 'tis worth noting: Godfrey my Tailor, you know never sings, and he had fourteen yards to make this Gown; and I'll be sworn, Mistris Penistone the Drapers Wife had one made with twelve.

Old Mer. 'Tis mirth that fills the veins with blood,
More than Wine, or Sleep, or Food,
Let each man keep his heart at ease
No man dies of that disease,
He that would his body keep
From diseases, must not weep,
But whoever laughs and sings,
Never his body brings
Into Feavers, Gouts, or Rhumes,
Or lingeringly his Lungs consumes:
Or meets with aches in the bone,
Or Catarrhs, or griping Stone:
But contented lives for aye,
The more he laughs, the more he may.

Wife. Look George, how sayst thou by this George? is't not a fine old man? Now Gods blessing a thy sweet lips. When wilt thou be so merry George? Faith thou art the frowningst little thing, when thou art angry, in a Countrey.

Enter Merchant.

Cit. Peace Conny, Thou shalt see him took down too I warrant thee: here's Luce's Father come now.

Old Mer. As you came from Walsingham, from the Holy Land, there met you not with my true love by the way as you came.

Mer. Oh Master Merry-thought! my Daughters gone,

This

I his mirth becomes you not, my Daughter's gone.

Old Mer. Why an if she be, what care I?

Or let her come, or go, or tarry.

Merch. Mock not my misery, it is your Son,
Whom I have made my own, when all forsook him,
Has stoln my only joy, my child away.

Old Mer. He set her on a milk white Steed, and himself up-
He never turn'd his face again, but he bore her quite away.

Merch. Unworthy of the kindness I have shewn
To thee, and thine: too late, I well perceive
Thou art consenting to my Daughters los.

Old Mer. Your Daughter, what a-stirs here wi' y'r daugh-
Let her go, think no more on her, but sing loud. If both my sons were on the gallows, I would sing down, down, down:
they fall down, and arise they never shall.

Merch. Oh might I behold her once again.
And she once more embrace her aged fire.

Old Mer. Fic, how scurvily this goes: and she once more embrace her aged fire? you'll make a dog on her, will ye;
she cares much for her aged fire, I warrant you.

Merch. She cares not for her Daddy, nor she cares not for her Mam-
For she is, she is, she is my Lord of Low-gaves Lassie.

Merch. For this thy scorn I will pursue
That son of thine to death.

Old Mer. Do, and when you ha kill'd him,
Give him flowers i' now Palmer, give him flowers i' now,
Give him red and white, and blue, green, and yellow.

Merch. I'll fetch my Daughter.

Old Mer. I'll hear no more o' your Daughter, it spoils my mirth.

Merch. I say I'll fetch my Daughter.

Old Mer. Was never man for Ladies sake, down, down,
Tormented as I Sir Guy? de derry down,
For Lucies sake, that Lady bright, down, down,
As ever men beheld with eye? de derry down.

Merch. I'll be reveng'd by heaven.

Exeunt.

Musick.

Finis Acti. Secund.

Wife. How dost thou like this George?

Cit. Why this is well Cunnie: but if Ralph were hot once:
thou shouldst see more.

Wife. The Fiddlers go again Husband.

Cit. I Nell, but this is scurvy Musick: I gave the whore-son gallows money, and I think he has not got me the Waits of Southwark, if I hear him not anan, I'll twinge him by the ears.

Your Musicians play Baloo.

Wife. No good George, let's ha Lachrymæ.

Cit. Why this is it Cunny.

Wife. It's all the better George: now sweet Lamb, what story is that painted upon the cloth? the confutation of Saint Paul?

Cit. No Lamb, that's Ralph and Lucrece.

Wife. Ralph and Lucrece? which Ralph? our Ralph?

Cit. No Mouse, that was a Tartarian.

Wife. A Tartarian? well, I wo'd the Fiddlers had done, that we might see our Ralph again.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Jasper and Luce.

Jasp. Come my dear, though we have lost our way,
We have not lost our selves: are you not weary
With this nights wandring, broken from your rest?
And frighted with the terror that attends
The darkness of this wild unpeopled place?

Luce. No my best friend, I cannot either fear,
Or entertain a weary thought, whilst you
(The end of all my full desires) stand by me:
Let them that lose their hopes, and live to languish
Amongst the number of forsaken Lovers,

Tell the long weary steps, and number time,
Start at a shadow, and shrink up their blood,
Whilst I (possess with all content and quiet)
Thustake my pretty love, and thus embrace him.

Jasp. You have caught me Luce, so fast, that whilst I live
I shall become your faithful prisoner:

And wear these chains for ever. Come, sit down,
And rest your body, too too delicate
For these disturbances; so, will you sleep?

Come, do not be more able than you are,
I know you are not skilful in these Watches,
For Women are no soldiers; be not nice,
But take it, sleep I say.

Luce. I cannot sleep.

Indeed I cannot friend.

Jasp. Why then we'll sing,
And try how that will work upon our senses.

Luce. I'll sing, or say, or any thing but sleep.

Jasp. Come little Mermaid, rob me of my heart
With that enchanting voice.

Luce. You mock me Jasper

S O N G.

Jasp. Tell me (dearest) what is Love?

Luce. 'Tis a lightning from above,

'Tis an Arrow, 'tis a Fire,

'Tis a Boy they call desire.

'Tis a smile

Doth beguile

Jasp. The poor hearts if men that prove,
Tell me more, are Women true?

Luce. Some Love change, and so do you.

Jasp. Are they fair, and never kind?

Luce. Yes, when men turn with the wind.

Jasp. Are they forward?

Luce. Ever toward

Those that love, to love anew.

Jasp. Dissemble it no more, I see the God
Of heavy sleep, lay on his heavy Mace,
Upon your eye-lids.

Luce. I am very heavy.

Jasp. Sleep, sleep, and quiet rest crown thy sweet thoughts:
Keep from her fair blood distempers, startings,
Horrors and fearful shapes: let all her dreams
Be joys, and chaste delights, embraces, wishes,
And such new pleasures as the ravish'd soul
Gives to the senses. So my charms have took.
Keep her you powers divine, whilst I contemplate
Upon the wealth and beauty of her mind.
She is only fair, and constant: only kind,
And only to thee Jasper. Oh my joyes!
Whither will you transport me? let not fulness
Of my poor buried hopes come up together,
And over-charge my spirits; I am weak,
Some say (how ever ill) the Sea and Women
Are govern'd by the Moon, both ebb and flow,
Both full of changes: yet to them that know,
And truly judge, these but opinions are,
And heresies to bring on pleasing War
Between our tempers, that without these were
Both void of after-love, and present fear.
Which are the best of Cupid. O thou child!
Bred from despair, I dare not entertain thee,
Having a love without the faults of Women,
And greater in her perfect goods than men:
Which to make good, and please my self the stronger,
Though certainly I am certain of her love,
I'll try her, that the world and memory
May sing to after-times her constancy.

Luce. Luce awake. Luce, why do you fright me friend,
With those distempered looks? what makes your sword
Drawn in your hand? who hath offended you?
I prethee Jasper sleep, thou art wild with watching,

Jasp.

Jasp. Come make your way to Heaven, and bid the world
(With all the villanies that stick upon it)
Farewell; you're for another life. Luce. Oh Jasper.
How have my tender years committed evil,
(Especially against the man I love)
Thus to be cropt untimely? Jasp. Foolish girl,
Canst thou imagine I could love his daughter
That flung me from my fortune into nothing?
Discharged me his service, shut the doors
Upon my poverty, and scorn'd my prayers,
Sending me, like a boat without a mast,
To sink or swim? Come, by this hand you dye,
I must have life and blood to satisfie
Your fathers wrongs.

Wife. Away George, away, raise the Watch at Ludgate, and bring a Mittimus from the Justice for this desperate Villain. Now I charge you Gentlemen, see the Kings peace kept. O my heart what a varlet's this, to offer Man-slaughter upon the harmless Gentlewo-man?

Cit. I warrant thee (sweet heart) we'll have him hampered.

Luce. Oh Jasper! be not cruel,
If thou wilt kill me, smite, and do it quickly.
And let not many deaths appear before me.
I am a woman made of fear and love
A weak, weak woman, kill not with thy eyes,
They shoot me through and through. Strike I am ready.
And dying still I love thee.

Enter Merchant, Humphrey, and his Men.

Merch. Whereabouts?

Jasp. No more of this, now to my self again.

Hum. There, there he stands with Sword like martial
Knight.

Drawn in his hand, therefore beware the fight
You that are wise: for were I good Sir Bevis,
I would not stay his coming, by your leaves.

Merc. Sirrah, restore my daughter. Jasp. Sirrah, no.

Merch. Upon him then.

Wife. So, down with him, down with him, down with him:
cut him i'the leg boyes, cut him i'th'leg.

Merc. Come your ways Minion, I'll provide a Cage for you, you're grown so tame. Horfe her away.

Hum. Truly I'm glad your forces have the day. Exeunt

Jasp. They are gone, and I am hurt, my Love is lost, manet
Never to get again. Oh me unhappy! Jasper.

Bleed, bleed, and dye, I cannot: Oh my folly!
Thou hast betray'd me, Hope where art thou fled?

Tell me if thou be'st any where remaining.

Shall I but see my love again? Oh no!

She will not dain to look upon her Butcher,

Nor is fit she should; yet I must venter.

Oh chance, or fortune, or what ere thou art

That men adore for powerful, hear my cry,

And let me loving live; or loosing dye.

Wife. Is a gone George?

Cit. I conny.

Wife. Marry and let him go (sweet heart) by the faith a my body a has put me into such a fright, that I tremble (as they say) as 'twere an Aspine leaf: look a my little finger
George, how it shakes: now in truth every member of my body is the worse for't.

Cit. Come, hug in mine arms sweet Mause, he shall not fright thee any more: alas mine own dear heart how it qui-vers.

Enter Mistris Merry-thought, Rafe, Michael, Squire,
Dwarfe, Host, and a Tapster.

Wife. O Rafe, how dost thou Rafe? how hast thou slept to night? has the Knight us'd thee well?

Cit. Peace Nell, let Rafe alone.

Tapst. Master, the reckoning is not paid.

Rafe. Right courteous Knight, who for the orders sake
Which thou hast tane, hang't out the holy Bell,
As I this flaming Pestle bear about,
We render thanks to your puissant self,
Your beauteous Lady, and your gentle Squires,
For thus refreshing of our wearied limbs,
Stifned with hard atchievements in wild Defart.

Tapst. Sir, there is twelve shillings to pay.

Rafe. Thou merry Squire Tapstero, thanks to thee,
For comforting our souls with double Jug,
And if adventurous Fortune prick thee forth,
Thou jovial Squire, to follow feats of Arms,
Take heed thou tender every Ladies cause,
Every true Knight, and every Danisel fair
But spill the blood of treacherous Sarazens;
And false enchanters, that with Magick spels,
Have done to death full many a noble Knight.

Host. Thou valiant Knight of the burning Pestle, give ear to me, there is twelve shillings to pay, and as I am a true
Knight, I will not bate a penny.

Wife. George, I prethee tell me, must Rafe pay twelve shillings now?

Cit. No, Nel, no, nothing but the old Knight is merry with Rafe.

Wife. O is't nothing else? Rafe will be as merry as he.

Rafe. Sir Knight, this mirth of yours becomes you well,
But to requite this liberal courtesie,
If any of your Squires will follow Arms,
He shall receive from my Heroick hand
A Knighthood, by the virtue of this Pestle.

Host. Fair Knight, I thank you for your noble offer,
Therefore gentle Knight,
Twelve shillings you must pay, or I must cap you.

Wife. Look George, did not I tell thee as much, the Knight of the Bell is in earnest, Rafe shall not be beholding to him, give him his money George, and let him go snick up.

Cit. Cap Rafe? no, hold your hand sir Knight of the Bell, there's your Money, have you any thing to say to Rafe
now? cap Rafe?

Wife. I would you should know it, Rafe has friends that will not suffer him to be capt for ten times so much, and ten times to the end of that, now take thy course Rafe.

M. mer. Come Michael, thou and I will go home to thy father, he hath enough left to keep us a day or two, and we'll set fellows abroad to cry our Purse and Casket: Shall we Michael?

Mich. I, I pray mother, in truth my feet are full of chilblains with travelling.

Wife. Faith and those chilblains are a foul trouble, Mi-stris Merry-thought when your youth comes home, let him rub
all the soles of his feet, and his heels, and his ankles, with a Moufeskine; or if none of your can catch a Mause, when he goes to bed, let him rowl his feet in the warm embers, and I warrant you he shall be well, and you may make him put his fingers between his toes, and smell to them, it's very sove-rain for his head, if he be costive.

Mist. mer. Master Knight of the burning Pestle, my son Michael, and I bid you farewell, I thank your Worship har-tily for your kindness.

Rafe. Fare-well fair Lady, and your tender Squire.
If pricking through these Defarts, I do hear
Of any traiterous Knight who through his guile,
Hath light upon your Casket and your Purse,
I will despoil him of them and restore them.

Mist. mer. I thank your Worship. Exit with Michael

Rafe. Dwarf bear my shield, Squire elevate my lance,
And now farewell you Knight of holy Bell,

Cit. I, I Rafe, all is paid.

Rafe. But yet before I go, speak worthy Knight,
If oft you do of sad adventures know,
Where errant Knights may through his prowess win
Eternal fame, and free some gentle souls,
From endless bounds of steel and lingring pain.

Host. Sirrah go to Nick the Barber, and bid him prepare himself, as I told you before quickly.

Tap. I am gone Sir.

Exit Tapster.

Host. Sir Knight, this wilderness affordeth none But the great venture, where full many a Knight Hath tried his prowess, and come off with shame, And where I would not have you loose your life, Against no man, but furious fiend of Hell.

Rafe. Speak on Sir Knight, tell what he is, and where: For here I vow upon my blazing badge, Never to blaze a day in quietness; But bread and water will I only eat, And the green herb and rock shall be my couch Till I have queld that man, or beast, or fiend, That works such damage to all Errant Knights.

Host. Not far from hence, near a craggy cliff At the North end of this distressed Town, There doth stand a lowly house Ruggedly builded, and in it a Cave In which an ugly Giant now doth won, Ycleped Barbaroso: in his hand He shakes a naked Lance of purest steel, With sleeves turn'd up, and him before he wears, A motly garment to preserve his clothes From blood of those Knights which he massacres, And Ladies Gentle: without his door doth hang A copper bason, on a prickant Spear; At which, no sooner gentle Knights can knock, But the shrill sound, fierce Barbaroso hears, And rushing forth, brings in the Errant Knight, And sets him down in an enchanted chair:

Then with an Engine, which he hath prepar'd With forty teeth, he claws his courtly crown, Next makes him wink, and underneath his chin, He plants a brazen piece of mighty board, And knocks his bullets round about his cheeks, Whilst with his fingers, and an instrument With which he snaps his hair off, he doth fill The wretches ears with a most hideous noyse. Thus every Knight Adventurer he doth trim, And now no creature dares encounter him.

Rafe. In Gods name, I will fight with him, kind sir, Go but before me to this dismal Cave Where this huge Giant Barbaroso dwells, And by that virtue that brave Rosicleere, That damn'd brood of ugly Giants slew, And Palmer in Frannarco overthrew: I doubt not but to curb this Traytor foul, And to the Devil send his guilty Soul.

Host. Brave sprighted Knight, thus far I will perform This your request, I'll bring you within sight Of this most loathsome place, inhabited By a more loathsome man: but dare not stay, For his main force swoops all he sees away.

Rafe. Saint George set on before, march Squire and Page.

Exeunt.

Wife. George, dost think Rafe will confound the Giant?

Cit. I hold my cap to a farthing he does: why Nell, I saw him wrestle with the great Dutchman, and hurle him.

Wife. Faith and that Dutchman was a goodly man, if all things were answerable to his bigness: and yet they say there was a Scottishman higher than he, and that they two and a Knight met, and saw one another for nothing: but of all the fights that ever were in London, since I was married, methinks the little child that was so fair grown about the members, was the prettiest, that and the Hermaphrodite.

Cit. Nay, by your leave Nil, Ninivie was better.

Wife. Ninivie, O that was the story of Jone and the wall, was it not George?

Cit. Yes lamb.

Enter Mistris Merry-totgght.

Wife. Look George, here comes Mistris Merry-totgght, and I would have Rafe come and fight with the Gyant, I tell you true I long to see't.

Cit. Good Mistris Merry-totgght be aone, I pray you for my sake, I pray you forbear a little, you shall have audience presently, I have a little business.

Wife. Mistris Merry-totgght, if it please you to refrain your passion a little, till Rafe have dispatht the Giant out of the way, we shall think our selves much bound to thank you: I thank you good Mistris Merry-totgght.

Exit Mistris Merry-totgght.

Enter a Boy.

Cit. Boy, come hither, send away Rafe and this whore-son Giant quickly.

Boy. In good faith sir we cannot, you'll utterly spoil our Play, and make it to be hist, and it cost money, you will not suffer us to go on with our plots, I pray Gentlemen rule him.

Cit. Let him come now and dispatht this, and I'll trouble you no more.

Boy. Will you give me your hand of that?

Wife. Give him thy hand George, do, and I'll kiss him, I warrant thee the youth means plainly.

Boy. I'll send him to you presently.

Exit Boy.

Wife. I thank you little youth, feth the child hath a sweet breath George, but I think it be troubled with the Worms, Carduus Benedictus and Mares milk were the only thing in the world for't. O Rafe's here George; God send thee good luck Rafe.

Enter Rafe, Host, Squire, and Dwarf.

Host. Puissant Knight yonder his Mansion is, Lo, where the Spear and Copper Bason are, Behold the string on which hangs many a tooth, Drawn from the gentle jaw of wandring Knights, I dare not stay to sound, he will appear. Exit Host.

Rafe. O faint not heart, Susan my Lady dear: The Coblers Maid in Milkstreet, for whose sake, I take these Arms, O let the thought of thee, Carry thy Knight through all adventurous deeds, And in the honor of thy beauteous self, May I destroy this monster Barbaroso, Knock Squire upon the Bason till it break Enter. With the shrill strokes, or till the Giant spake. Barba.

Wife. O George, the Giant, the Giant, now Rafe for thy life.

Bar. What fond unknowing wight is this, that dares, So rudely knock at Barbarossa's Cell, Where no man comes, but leaves his fleece behind?

Rafe. I, traitorous Caitiffe, who am sent by fate To punish all the sad enormities Thou hast committed against Ladies gentle, And Errant Knights, Traytor to God and men: Prepare thy self, this is the disinal hour Appointed for thee to give strict account Of all thy beastly treacherous villanies.

Bar. Fool-hardy Knight, full soon thou shalt aby This fond reproach, thy body will I bang, He takes down his pole. And loe upon that string thy teeth shall hang: Prepare thy self, for dead soon shalt thou be.

Rafe. Saint George for me

They fight.

Barba. Gargantua for me.

Wife. To him Rafe, to him, hold up the Giant, set out thy leg before Rafe.

Cit. Falsifie a blow Rafe, falsifie a blow, the Giant lies open on the left side.

Wife. Bear't off, bear't off still; there boy, O Rafe's almost down, Rafe's almost down.

Rafe. Susan inspire me, now have up again.

Wife. Up, up, up, up, up, so Rafe, down with him, down with him Rafe.

Cit. Fetch him over the hip boy.

Wife. There boy, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill, Rafe.

Cit. No Rafe, get all out of him first.

Rafe.

Rafe. Presumptuous man, see to what desperate end
Thy treachery hath brought thee, the just Gods,
Who never prosper those that do despise them,
For all the villanies which thou hast done
To Knights and Ladies, now have paid thee home,
By my stiff arm, a Knight adventurous.
But say, vile wretch, before I send thy soul
To sad Avernus, whither it must go,
What captives holdst thou in thy fable cave?

Barb. Go in and free them all, thou hast the day.

Rafe. Go Squire and Dwarf, search in this dreadful ca. e,
And free the wretched prisoners from their bonds.

Exit Squire and Dwarf.

Barb. I crave for mercy as thou art a Knight,
And scornst to spill the blood of those that beg.

Rafe. Thou shewest no mercy, nor shalt thou have any,
Prepare thy self, for thou shalt surely dye.

Enter Squire leading one winking, with a Bason under his chin.

Squire. Behold brave Knight here is one prisoner,
Whom this wild man hath used as you see.

Wife. This is the wiseword I hear the Squire speak.

Rafe. Speak what thou art, and how thou hast been us'd,
That I may give him condign punishment.

1. Kni. I am a Knight that took my journey post
Northward from London, and in courteous wife,
This Gyant train'd me to his den,
Under pretence of killing of the itch,
And all my body with a powder strew'd,
That sinarts and stings, and cut away my beard,
And my curl'd locks wherein were Ribands ty'd,
And with a water washt my tender eyes,
Whilst up and down about me still he skipt,
Whose virtue is, that till my eyes be wip't
With a dry cloth, for this my foul disgrace,
I shall not dare to look i'th'face.

Wife. Alas poor Knight, relieve him Rafe, relieve poor
Knights whilst you live.

Rafe. My trusty Squire convey him to the Town,
Where he may find relief, adieu fair Knight. Exit Knight.

Enter Dwarf leading one with a patch o'er his Nose,

Dwar. Puissant Knight of the burning Pestle height,
See here another wretch, whom this foul beast
Hath scorcht and scor'd in this inhumane wise.

Rafe. Speak me thy name, and eke thy place of birth,
And what hath been thy usage in this Cave.

2. Knight. I am a Knight, Sir Pock-hole is my name,
And by my birth I am a Londoner,
Free by my Copy, but my Ancestors
Were Frenchmen all, and riding hard this way.
Upon a trotting horse my bones did ake,
And I faint Knight to ease my weary limbes,
Light at this Cave, when straight this furious fiend,
With sharpest instrument of purest steel,
Did cut the gristle of my Nose away,
And in the place this velvet plaster stands,
Relieve me gentle Knight out of his hands.

Wife. Good Rafe relieve Sir Pockhole, and send him away, for in truth his breath stinks.

Rafe. Convey him straight after the other Knight:
Sir Pockhole fare you well.

3. Knight. Kind Sir goodnight Exit.

Cries within.

Man. Deliver us. Woman. Deliver us.

Wife. Harke George, what a woful cry there is, I think some woman lyes in there. Man. Deliver us

Woman. Deliver us.

Rafe. What gantly noise is this? speak Barbaroso
Or by this blazing steel thy head goes off.

Barb. Prisoners of mine, whom I in diet keep,
Send lower down into the Cave,

And in a Tub that's heated smoaking hot,
There may they find them and deliver them.

Rafe. Run Squire and Dwarf, deliver them with speed.

Exeunt Squire and Dwarf.

Wife. But will not Rafe kill this Giant, surely I am afraid if he let him go he will do as much hurt, as ever he did.

Citizen. Not so Mouse neither, if he could convert him.

Wife. I George, if he could convert him; but a Gyant is not so soon converted as one of us ordinary people. There's a pretty tale of a Witch, that had the Divels mark about her, God blefs us, that had a Gyant to her son, that was call'd Lob-lie-by-the-fire, didst never hear it George.

Enter Squire leading a man with a glass of Lotion in his hand, and the Dwarf leading a woman, with Dyets-bread and Drink.

Cit. Peace Nell, here comes the prisoners.

Dwar. Here be these pined wretches, manfull Knight,
That for this six weeks have not seen a wight.

Raph. Deliver what you are, and how you came
To this sad Cave, and what your usage was?

Man. I am an errant Knight that followed Arms,
With spear and shield, and in my tender years
I stricken was with Cupids fiery shaft,
And fell in love with this my Lady dear,
And stole her from her friends in Turne-ball street,
And bore her up and down from Town to Town,
Where we did eat and drink and Musick here;
Till at the leugh at this unhappy Town
We did arrive, and coming to this Cave,
This beast us caught, and put us in a Tub,
Where we this two months sweat, and should have done.
Another Month if you had not relieved us.

Wom. This bread and water hath our dyet been,
Together with a rib cut from a neck
Of burned Mutton, hard hath been our fare,
Release us from this ugly Gyants snare.

Man. This hath been half the food we have receiv'd,
But only twice a day for novelty,
He gave a spoonful of his hearty broth Pulls out a sringe.
To each of us, through this same tender quill.

Raph. From this infernall Monster you shall go,
That useth Knights and gentle Ladies so.
Convey them hence. Exeunt man and woman.

Cit. Cunny, I can tell thee the Gentleman like Rafe.

Wife. I George, I see it well enough. Gentlemen I thank you all heartily for gracing my man Raph, and I promise you, you shall see him oftner.

Bar. Mercy great Knight, I do recant my ill,
And henceforth never gentle blood will spill.

Raph. I give thee mercy, but yet thou shalt swear
Upon my burning Pestle to perform
Thy promise utter'd.

Bar. I swear and kifs.

Raph. Depart then and amend.

Come Squire and Dwarf, the Sun grows towards his set,
And we have many more adventures yet. Exeunt.

Cit. Now Raph is in this humor, I know he would ha beaten all the boys in the house, if they had been set on him.

Wife. I George, but it is well as it is: I warrant you the gentlemen do consider what it is to overthrow a Gyant: but look George, here comes Mistris Merri-thought, and her son Michael, now you are welcome Mistris Merri-thought, now Raph has done you may go on.

Enter Mistris Merry-thought and Michael.

Mist. mer. Micke My Boy?

Mich. I forsooth Mother.

Mist. mer. Be merry Micke, we are at home now: where I warrant you, yon shall find the house flung out of the windows:

windows: Hark: hey dogs, hey, this is the old world y'faith with my Husband: I'll get in among them, I'll play them such lesson, that they shall have little list to come scraping hither again. Why Master Merry-thought, Husband, Charles Merry-thought.

Old Mer. within. If you will sing, and dance, and laugh, and hollow, and laugh again: and then cry there boys there: why then,

One, two, three, and four,
We shall be merry within this hour.

Mist. Mer. Why Charles do you not know your own natural wife? I say open the door, and turn me out those mangy companions; 'tis more than time that they were fellow like with you: you are a Gentleman Charles, and an old man, and father of two children; and I my self, (though I say it) by my mothers side, Niece to a Worshipful Gentleman, and a Conductor, he has been three times in his Majesties service at Chyster, and is now the fourth time, God bless him, and his charge upon his journey.

Old Mer. Go from my window, love go:
Go from my window my dear,
The wind and the rain will drive you back again,
You cannot be lodged here.

Hark you Mistress Merri-thought, you that walk upon Adventures, and forsake your Husband, because he sings with never a penny in his purse; what shall I think my self the worse? Faith no, I'll be merry.

You come not here, here's none but Lads of mettle, lives of a hundred years, and upwards, care never drunk their bloods, nor want made them warble.

Hey-ho, my heart is heavy.

Mist. Mer. Why M. Merri-thought, what am I that you should laugh me to scorn thus abruptly? am I not your fellow-feeler, (as we may say) in all our miseries? your comforter in health and sickness? have I not brought you Children? are they not like you Charles? look upon thine own Image, hard-hearted man; and yet for all this—

Old Mer. within. Begon, begon my juggy, my puggy, begon my love my dear.

The weather is warm, 'twill do thee no harm, thou canst not be lodged here.

Be merry boys, some light musick, and more wine.

Wife. He's not in earnest, I hope George, is he?

Cit. What if he be, sweet heart?

Wife. Marry if he be George, I'll make bold to tell him he's an ingrant old man, to use his bed-fellow so scurvily.

Cit. What how does he use her Honey?

Wife. Marry come up sir sauce-box, I think you'll take his part, will you not? Lord how hot are you grown: you are a fine man an you had a fine Dog, it becomes you sweetly.

Cit. Nay, prethee Nell chide not: for as I am an honest man, and a true Christian Grocer, I do not like his doings.

Wife. I cry you mercy then George, you know we are all frail, and full of infirmities. Deehear Master Merri-thought, may I crave a word with you?

Old Mer. within. Strike up lively lads.

Wife. I had not thought in truth, Master Merri-thought, that a man of your age and discretion (as I may say) being a Gentleman, and therefore known by your gentle conditions, could have used so little respect to the weakness of his wife: for your wife is your own flesh, the staff of your age, your yoke-fellow, with whose help you draw through the myre of this transitory world: Nay, she's your own rib. And again—

Old Mer. I come not hither for thee to teach,
I have no pulpit for thee to preach,
I would thou hadst kist me under the breech,
As thou art a Lady gay.

Wife. Marry with a vengeance,
I am heartily sorry for the poor Gentlewoman: but if I were thy wife, i'faith gray-beard, i'faith—

Cit. I prethee sweet Honey-suckle, be content.

Wife. Give me such words that am a Gentlewoman born, hang him hoary Rascal. Get me some drink George, I am almost molten with fretting: now beshrew his Knaves heart for it.

Old mer. Play me a light Lavalto: come, be frolick, fill the good fellows wine.

Mist. mer. Why Master Merri-thought, are you disposed to make me wait here: you'll open I hope, i'll fetch them that shall open else.

Old mer. Good woman, if you will sing, I'll give you something, if not—

S O N G.

You are no love for me Maraget, I am no love for you.
Come aloft Boys, aloft.

Mist. mer. Now a Charles fart in your teeth Sir: Come Mick, we'll not trouble him, a shall not ding us i'th'teeth with his bread and his broth, that he shall not: come boy, I'll provide for thee, I warrant thee: wee'll go to Master Venterwels the Merchant, I'll get his letter to mine Host of the Bell in Waltham, there I'll place thee with the Tapster, will not that do well for thee Mick? and let me alone for that old Cuckoldly Knave your father, I'll use him in his kind, I warrant ye.

Wife. Come George, where's the beer?

Cit. Here Love.

Wife. This old fornicating fellow will not out of my mind yet; Gentlemen, I'll begin to you all, I desire more of your acquaintance, with all my heart. Fill the Gentlemen some beer George.

Finis Actus Tertii. Musick.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Boy danceth.

Wife. Look George, the little boy's come again, methinks he looks something like the Prince of Orange in his long stocking, if he had a little harness about his neck. George, I will have him dance Fading; Fading, is a fine Jig I'll assure you Gentlemen: begin brother, now a capers sweet heart, now a turn a th'toe, and then tumble: cannot you tumble youth?

Boy. No indeed forsooth.

Wife. Nor eat fire? Boy. Neither.

Wife. Why then I thank you heartily, there's two pence to buy you points withall.

Enter Jasper and Boy.

Jasp. There boy, deliver this: but do it well. Hast thou provided me four lusty fellows?

Able to carry me? and art thou perfect In all thy business? Boy. Sir you need not fear, I have my lesson here, and cannot miss it: The men are ready for you, and what else Pertains to this employment. Jasp. There my boy, Take it, but buy no land. Boy. Faith sir 'twere rare To see so young a purchaser: I flie,
And on my wings carry your destiny. Exit.

Jasp. Go, and be happy: Now my latest hope Forfake me not, but sling thy Anchor out,
And let it hold: stand, fix thou rolling stone,

Till

Till I enjoy my dearest: hear me all
You powers that rule in men celestial. Exit.

Wife. Go thy ways, thou art as crooked a sprig as ever grew, in London, I warrant him he'll come to some naughty end or other: for his looks say no less: Besides, his father (you know George) is none of the best, you heard him take me up like a Gill flirt: and sing bawdy Songs upon me: but i'faith if I live George —

Cit. Let me alone sweet-heart, I have a trick in my head shall lodge him in the Arches for one year, and make him sing Peccavi, 'ere I leave him, and yet he shall never know who hurt him neither.

Wife. Do my good George, do.

Cit. What shall we have Rafe do now boy?

Boy. You shall have what you will sir.

Cit. Why so sir, go and fetch me him then, and let the Sophy of Persia come and christen him a child.

Boy. Believe me Sir, that will not do so well, 'tis stale, it has been had before at the Red Bull.

Wife. George, let Rafe travell over great hills, and let him be weary, and come to the King of Cracovia's house, covered with velvet, and there let the Kings daughter stand in her window all in beaten gold, combing her golden locks with a comb of Ivory, and let her spye Rafe, and fall in love with him, and come down to him, and carry him into her fathers house, and then let Rafe talk with her.

Cit. Well said Nel, it shall be so: boy let's ha't done quickly.

Boy. Sir, if you will imagine all this to be done already, you shall hear them talk together: but we cannot present a house covered with black Velvet, and a Lady in beaten gold.

Cit. Sir Boy, lets ha't as you can then.

Boy. Besides, it will shew ill-favoredly to have a Grocers Prentice to court a Kings daughter.

Cit. Will it so Sir? you are well read in Histories: I pray you what was Sir Dagonet? was not he Prentice to a Grocer in London? read the Play of the Four Prentices of London, where they tose their Pikes so: I pray you fetch him in Sir, fetch him in.

Boy. It shall be done, it is not our fault Gentlemen.

Exit.

Wife. Now we shall see fine doings I warrant thee George. O here they come; how prettily the King of Cracovia's daughter is drest.

Enter Rafe and the Lady, Squire and Dwarf.

Cit. I Nel, it is the fashion of that Countrey, I warrant thee.

Lady. Welcome sir Knight unto my fathers Court. King of Moldavia, unto me Pompiona His daughter dear: but sure you do not like Your entertainment, that will stay with us No longer but a night. Raph. Damsell right fair, I'm on many sad adventures bound, That call me forth into the Wilderness: Besides, my horses back is something gal'd, Which will enforce me ride a sober pace. But many thanks (fair Lady) be to you, For using errant Knight with courtesie.

Lady. But say (brave Knight) what is your name and birth?

Rafe. My name is Rafe, I am an Englishman, As true as steel, a hearty Englishman, And Prentice to a Grocer in the Strand, By deed indent, of which I have one part: But fortune calling me to follow Arms, On me this holy Order I did take, Of burning Pestle, which in all mens eyes, I bear, confounding Ladies enemies.

Lady. Oft have I heard of your brave Countrymen, And fertile soil, and store of wholesome food;

My father oft will tell me of a drink
In England found, and Nipitato call'd.
Which driveth all the sorrow from your hearts.

Rafe. Lady 'tis true, you need not lay your lips
To better Nipitato than there is.

Lady. And of a wild-fowl he will often speak,
Which poudred beef and mustard called is:
For there have been great Wars 'twixt us and you,
But truly Rafe, it was not long of me.

Tell me then Rafe could you contented be,
To wear a Ladies favor in your shield?

Rafe. I am a Knight of Religious Order,
And will not wear a favor of a Ladies
That trusts in Antichrist, and false traditions.

Cit. Well said Rafe, convert her if thou canst.

Rafe. Besides, I have a Lady of my own
In merry England; for whose virtuous sake
I took these Arms, and Susan is her name,
A Coblers maid in Milkstreet, whom I vow
Nere to forsake, whilst life and Pestle last.

Lady. Happy that Cobling Dame, who ere she be
That for her own (dear Rafe) hath gotten thee.
Unhappy I, that nere shall see the day
To see thee more, that bear'st my heart away.

Rafe. Lady farewell, I must needs take my leave.

Lady. Hard-hearted Rafe, that Ladies dost deceive.

Cit. Hark thee Rafe, there's money for thee; give something in the King of Cracovia's house, be not beholding to him.

Rafe. Lady before I go, I must remember
Your fathers Officers, who truth to tell,
Have been about me very diligent:
Hold up thy snowy hand thou princely maid,
There's twelvecence for your fathers Chamberlain.
And another shilling for his Cook,
For by my troth the Goose was roasted well.

And twelve pence for your fathers Horse-keeper,
For nointing my horse back, and for his butter
There is another shilling to the maid
That wash't my boot-hose, there's an English groat,
And twopence to the boy that wip't my boots.
And last, fair Lady, there is for your self
Three pence to buy you pins at Bumbo Fair.

Lady. Full many thanks, and I will keep them safe
Till all the heads be 'off, for thy sake Rafe.

Rafe. Advance my Squire and Dwarf, I cannot stay.

Lady. Thou kil'st my heart in parting thus away.

Exeunt.

Wife. I commend Rafe, yet that he will not stoop to a Cracovian, there's properer women in London than any are there I-wis. But here comes Master Humphrey, and his love again, now George.

Cit. I Cunny, peace.

Enter Merchant, Humphrey, Luce, and Boy.

Merc. Go get you up, I will not be intreated.
And Gossip mine I'll keep you sure hereafter
From gadding out again, with boys and unthrifts,
Come they are womens tears, I know your fashion.
Go sirrah, lock her in, and keep the key. Exit Luce and Boy.
Safe as your life. Now my son Humphrey,
You may both rest assured of my love
In this, and reap your own desire.

Hum. I see this love you speak of, through your daughter.
Although the hole be little, and hereafter
Will yield the like in all I may or can,
Fitting a Christian, and a Gentleman.

Merc. I Do believe you (my good son) and thank you.
For 'twere an impudence to think you flattered.

Hum. It were indeed, but shall I tell you why,
I have been beaten twice about the lye.

Merc. Well son, no more of complement, my daughter
Is yours again; appoint the time and take her.

Woe'l

Wee'll have no stealing for it, I my self
And some few of our friends will see you married.

Hum. I would you would i'faith, for be it known
I ever was afraid to lye alone.

Mer. Some three days hence then.

Hum. Three days, let me see,
'Tis somewhat of the molt, yet I agree,
Because I mean against the pointed day,
To visit all my friends in new array. Enter servant.

Ser. Sir, there's a Gentlewoman without would speak with your Worship. Mer. What is she?

Ser. Sir I askt her not.

Mer. Bid her come in.

Enter Mistress Merry-thought, and Michael.

Mist. mer. Peace be to your Worship, I come as a poor
Suitor to you Sir, in the behalf of this child.

Mer. Are you not wife to Merri-thought?

Mist. mer. Yestruly, would I had nere seen his eyes, he has undone me and himself, and his children, and there he lives at home and sings, and hoyts, and revels among his drunken companions, but I warrant you, where to get a penny to put bread in his mouth, he knows not:
And therefore if it like your Worship, I would intreat your Letter, to the honest Host of the Bell in Walham, that I may place my child under the protection of his *Tap-
ster*, in some settled course of life.

Mer. I'm glad the heavens have heard my prayers: thy
Husband

When I was ripe in sorrows laught at me,
Thy son, like an unthankful wretch, I having
Redeem'd him from his fall, and made him mine,
To shew his love again, first stole my daughter:
Then wrong'd this Gentleman, and last of all,
Gave me that grief, had almost brought me down
Unto my grave, had not a stronger hand
Reliev'd my sorrows, go, and weep as I did,
And be unpittied, for here I profess
An everlasting hate to all thy name.

Mist. mer. Will you so Sir, how say you by that? come
Micke, let him keep his wind to cool his Pottage, we'll go to thy Nurses, Micke, she knits silk stockings boy, and we'll knit too boy, and be beholding to none of them all.

Exeunt Michael and Mother.

Enter a Boy with a Letter.

Boy. Sir, I take it you are the Master of this house.

Mer. How then boy?

Boy. Then to your self Sir, comes this Letter.

Mer. From whom my pretty boy?

Boy. From him that was your servant, but no more
Shall that name ever be, for he is dead,
Grief of your purchas'd anger broke his heart,
I saw him dye, and from his hand receiv'd
This paper with a charge to bring it hither,
Read it, and satisfie your self in all.

LETTER.

Merch. SIR that I have wronged your love, I must confess, in which I have purchast to my self, besides mine own undoing, the ill opinion of my friends, let not your anger, good
Sir, outlive me, but suffer me to rest in peace with your forgiveness; let my body (if a dying man may so much prevail with you)
be brought to your daughter, that she may know my hot flames are now buried, and withall, receive a testimony of the zeal I bore her vertue: farewell for ever, and be ever happy.

Jasper.

Gods hand is great in this, I do forgive him,
Yet am I glad he's quiet, where I hope
He will not bite again: boy bring the bosly,
And let him have his will, if that be all.

Boy. 'Tis here without Sir. Mer. So Sir, if you please
You may conduct it in, I do not fear it.

Hum. I'll be your Usher boy, for though I say it,
He ow'd me something once, and well did pay it. Exeunt.

Enter Luce alone.

Luce. If there be any punishment inflicted
Upon the miserable, more than yet I feell,
Let it together seize me, and at once
Press down my soul, I cannot bear the pain
Of these delaying tortures: thou that art
The end of all, and the sweet rest of all;
Come, come oh death bring me to thy peace,
And blot out all the memory Inourish
Both of father and my cruel friend.
O wretch'd maid still living to be wretched,
To be a say to fortune in her changes.
And grow to number times and woes together,
How happy had I been, if being born
My grave had been my cradle? Enter servant.

Ser. By your leave
Young Mistress, here's a boy hath brought a Coffin,
What a would say I know not: but your father
Charg'd me to give you notice, here they come.

Enter two bearing a Coffin, Jasper in it.

Luce. For me I hope 'tis come, and 'tis most welcome.

Boy. Fair Mistress, let me not add greater grief
To that great store you have already; Jasper
That whilst he liv'd was yours, now dead,
And here inclos'd, commanded me to bring
His body hither, and to crave a tear
From those fair eyes, though he deserve not pitty,
To deck his Funeral; for so he bid me
Tell her for whom he di'd. Luce. He shall have many:

Exeunt Coffin-carrier and Boy.

Good friends depart a little, whilst I take
My leave of this dead man, that once I lov'd:
Hold, yet a little, life, and then I give thee
To thy first heavenly being; O my friend!
Hast thou deceiv'd me thus, and got before me?
I shall not long be after, but believe me,
Thou wert too cruel Jasper 'gainst thy self,
In punishing the fault I could have pardoned,
With so untimely death; thou didst not wrong me,
But ever wer't most kind, most true, most loving;
And I the most unkind, most false, most cruel.
Didst thou but ask a tear? I'll give thee all,
Even all my eyes can pour down, all my sigh's
And all my self, before thou goest from me
There are but sparing Rites: But if thy soul
Be yet about this place, and can behold
And see what I prepare to deck thee with,
It shall go up, born on the wings of peace,
And satisfied: first will I sing thy Dirge,
Then kiss thy pale lips, and then dye my self,
And fill one Coffin and one grave together.

SONG.

Come you whose loves are dead,
And whilst I sing
Weep and wring
Every hand and every bead,
Bind with Cipress and sad Ewe,
Ribbands black, and Candles blue,
For him that was of men most true.

Come with heavy mourning,
And on his grave
Let him have
Sacrifice of sighs and groaning,
Let him have fair flowers enow,

White and purple, green and yellow,
For him that was of men most true.

Thou sable cloth, sad cover of my joys,
I lift thee up, and thus I meet with death.

Jasp. And thus you meet the living. Luce. Save me Heaven.

Jisp. Nay, do not flye me fair, I am no spirit,
Look better on me, do you know me yet?

Luce. O thou dear shadow of my friend.

Jasp. Dear substance,
I swear I am no shadow feel my hand,
It is the same it was, I am your Jasper,
Your Jasper that's yet living, and yet loving,
Pardon my rash attempt, my foolish proof
I put in practice of your constancy:
For sooner should my sword have drunk my blood,
And set my soul at liberty, than drawn
The least drop from that body, for which boldness
Doom me to any thing: if death, I take it
And willingly. Luce. This death I'll give you for it,
So, now I am satisfied: you are no spirit,
But my own truest, truest, truest friend,
Why do you come thusto me?

Jasp. First, to see you,
Then to convey you hence.

Luce. It cannot be,
For I am lockt up here, and watcht at all hours,
That 'tis impossible for me to scape.

Jasp. Nothing more possible, within this Coffin
Do you convey your self, let me alone,
I have the wits of twenty men about me,
Only I crave the shelter of your Closet
A little, and then fear me not; creep in
That they may presently convey you hence:
Fear nothing dearest love, I'll be your second,
Lye close, so, all goes well yet; boy.

Boy. At hand Sir.

Jasp. Convey away the Coffin, and be wary.

Boy. 'Tis done already.

Jasp. Now must I go conjure.

Exit.

Enter Merchant.

Merch. Boy, boy.

Boy. Your servant Sir.

Merch. Do me this kindness boy, hold here's a crown: before thou bury the body of this fellow, carry it to his old merry father, and salute him from me, and bid him sing, he hath cause.

Boy. I will Sir.

Merch. And then bring me word what tune he is in, and have another crown: but do it truly.

I have fitted him a bargain, now, will vex him.

Boy. God blefs your Worships health Sir.

Merch. Farewell boy.

Exeunt.

Enter Master Merry-thought.

Wife. Ah old Merry-thought, art thou there again? let's hear some of thy Songs.

Old Mer. Who can sing a merrier note
Than he that cannot change a great?

Not a Dinner left, and yet my heart leaps; I do wonder yet, as old as I am, that any man will follow a Trade, or serve, that may sing and laugh, and walk the streets: my wife and both my sons are I know not where, I have nothing left, nor know I how to come by meat to supper, yet am I merry still; for I know I shall find it upon the Table at six a Clock; therefore hang Thought
I would not be a Servingman to carry the cloke-bag still.

Nor would I be a Fawloner the greedy Hawkes to fill.
But I would be in a good house, and have a good Master too:

But I would eat and drink of the best, and no work would
I do.

This is that keeps life and soul together, mirth: this is the Philosophers stone that they write so much on, that keeps a man ever young.

Enter a Boy.

Boy. Sir, they say they know all your Money is gone, and they will trust you for no more drink.

Old mer. Will they not? let 'em chuse: the best is I have mirth at home, and need not send abroad for that; let them keep their drink to themselves.

For Jillian of Berry, she dwells on a hill,
And she hath good Beer and Ale to sell,
And of good fellows she thinks no ill,
And thither will we go now, now, now, and thither
Will we go now.

And when you have made a little stay,
You need not know what is to pay,
But kiss your Hostess and go your way. And thither, &c.

Enter another Boy.

2. Boy. Sir, I can get no bread for supper.

Old mer. Hang bread and supper, let's preserve our mirth, and we shall never feel hunger, I'll warrant you, let's have a
Catch, boy follow me, come sing this Catch.

Ho, ho, no body at home, meat, nor drink, nor money ha we none, fill the pot Eedy, never more need I.

Old mer. So boyes enough, follow me, let's change our place and we shall laugh afresh.

Exeunt.

Wife. Let him go George, a shall not have any countenance from us, not a good word from any i'th' Company,
if I may strike stroke in't.

Cit. No more, a shannot love; but Nell, I will have Rafe, do a very notable matter now, to the eternal honour and glory of all Grocers: firrah, you there, boy, can none of you hear?

Boy. Sir, your pleasure.

Cit. Let Rafe come out on May day in the morning, and speak upon a Conduit with all his Scarfs about him, and his Feathers, and his Rings, and his Knacks.

Boy. Why sir, you do not think of our plot, what will become of that then?

Cit. Why sir, I care not what become on't, I'll have him come out, or I'll fetch him out my self, I'll have something done in honor of the City: besides he hath been long enough upon Adventures, bring him out quickly, for I come amongst you—

Boy. Well sir, he shall come out, but if our Play miscarry,
Sir you are like to pay for't.

Exit.

Cit. Bring him away then.

Wife. This will be brave i'faith: George shall not he dance the Morrice too for the credit of the Strand.

Cit. No sweet-heart it will be too much for the boy. O
there he is Nell, he's reasonable well in reparael, but he has not Rings enough.

Enter Rafe.

Rafe. London, to thee I do present the merry Mouth of May,

Let each true Subject be content to hear me what I say:
For from the top of Conduit head, as plainly may appear,
I will both tell my name to you, and wherefore I came here.
My name is Rafe, by due descent, though not ignoble I,
Yet far inferiour to the flock of gracious Grocery.
And by the Common-counsel of my fellows in the Strand,
Wish gilded Staff, and crossed Skarfe, the May-lord here
I stand.

Rejoyce

Rejoyce O English hearts, rejoyce, rejoyce O Lovers dear ;
 Rejoyce O City, Town, and Countrey, rejoyce eke eve ry
 Shire ;
 For now the flagrant flowers do spring and sprout in seemly sort,
 The little Birds do sit and sing, the Lambs do make fine
 sport,
 And now the Burchin Tree doth bud that makes the Schoolboy cry,
 The Morrice rings while Hobby horse doth foot it featuouf-
 ly :
 The Lords and Ladies now abroad for their disport and play,
 Do kiss sometimes upon the Grass, and sometimes in the Hay.
 Now butter with a leaf of Sage is good to purge the blood,
 Fly Venus and Phlebotomy for they are neither good.
 Now little fish on tender stone, begin to cast their bellies,
 And sluggish snails, that erst were mute, do creep out of their shellies,
 The rumbling Rivers now do warm for little boys to paddle,
 The Sturdy Steed, now goes to grass, and up they hang his saddle.
 The heavy Hart, the blowing Buck, the Rascall and the Pricket,
 Are now among the Yeomans Pease, and leave the fearful
 ibicket.
 And be like them, O you, I say, of this same noble Town,
 And lift aloft your velvet heads, and slipping of your gown :
 With bels on legs, and napkins clean unto your shoulders i'de,
 With Scarfs and Garters as you please, and Hey for our Town
 cry'd :
 March out and shew your willing minds, by twenty, and by twenty,
 To Hogsdon or to Newington, where Ale and Cakes are plenty.
 And let it nere be said for shame, that we the youths of London,
 Lay thruming of our caps at home, and left our custom undone.
 Up then I say, both young and old, both man and maid a
 Maying
 With Drums and Guns that bounce aloud, and merry Taber playing :
 Which to prolong, God save our King, and send his Countrey
 peace,
 And root out Treason from the Land, and so my friends I cease.

Finis Act. 4.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Merchant solus.

Merch. I will have no great store of company at the wedding, a couple of neighbors and their wives, and we will have a Capon in stewed broth, with marrow, and a good piece of beef, stuck with Rose-mary.

Enter Jasper and his face mealed.

Jasp. Forbear thy pains fond man, it is too late.
 Merch. Heaven blefs me: Jasper?

Jasp. I, I am his Ghost
 Whom thou hast injur'd for his constant love :
 Fond worldly wretch, who dost not understand
 In death that true hearts cannot parted be.
 First know thy daughter is quite born away,
 On wings on Angels: through the liquid Ayre
 Too far out of thy reach, and never more
 Shalt thou behold her face: But she and I
 Will in another world enjoy our loves,
 Where neither fathers anger, poverty,
 Nor any cross that troubles earthly men
 Shall make us sever our united hearts,
 And never shalt thou sit, or be alone
 In any place, but I will visit thee
 With gasty looks, and put into thy mind
 The great offences which thou didst to me.
 When thou art at thy Table with thy friends,
 Merry in heart, and fill'd with swelling wine,
 I'll come in midst of all thy pride and mirth,
 Invisible to all men but thy self,
 And whisper such a sad tale in thine ear,
 Shall make thee let the Cup fall from thy hand,
 And stand as mute and pale as Death it self.

Merch. Forgive me Jasper; Oh! what might I do?
 Tell me to satisfie thy troubled Ghost?

Jasp. There is no means, too late thou thinkst on this.

Mer. But tell me what were best for me to do?

Jasp. Repent thy deed, and satisfie my father,
 And beat fond Humphrey out of thy doors. Ex it Jasp

Enter Humphrey.

Wife. Look George, his very Ghost would have folks beaten.

Hum. Father, my bride is gone, fair Mistris Luce,
 My soul's the font of vengeance, mischiefs sluice.

Mer. Hence fool out of my sight, with thy fond passion,
 Thou hast undone me.

Hum. Hold my father dear,
 For Luce thy daughters fake, that had no peer.

Mer. Thy father fool? there's some blows more,
 begon.

Jasper, I hope thy Ghost be well appeas'd,
 To see thy will perform'd, now I'll go
 To satisfie thy father for thy wrongs. Exit.

Hum. What shall I do? I have been beaten twice.

And Mistris Luce is gone? help me device:
 Since my true-love is gone, I never more,
 Whilst I do live, upon the Skie will pore;
 But in the dark will wear out my shoo-soles
 In passion, in Saint Faiths Church under Pauls. Exit.

Wife. George call Rafe hither, if you love me call Rafe hither,
 I have the bravest thing for him to do George; prethee.
 call him quickly

Cit. Rafe, why Rafe boy.

Enter Rafe.

Rafe. Here Sir.

Cit. Come hither Rafe, come to thy Mistris Boy.

Wife. Rafe I would have thee call all the youths together in battle-ray, with Drums, and Guns, and flags, and march to Mile-end in pompous fashion, and there exhort your Souldiers to be merry and wise, and to keep their beards from burning Rafe, and then skirmish, and let your flags fly, and cry, kill, kill, kill: my husband shall lend you his Jerkin Rafe, and there's a Scarfe for the rest, the house shall furnish you, and we'll pay for't: do it bravely Rafe, and think before whom you perform, and what person you represent.

Rafe. I warrant you Mistris, if I do it not, for the honor of the City, and the credit of my Master, let me never hope for freedome.

Wife

Wife. 'Tis well spoken 'faith; go thy waies, thou art a spark indeed.

Cit. Ralph, double your files bravely Ralph.

Ralph. I warrant you Sir, Exit Ralph.

Cit. Let him look narrowly to his service, I shall take him else; I was there my self a Pike-man once, in the hottest of the day, wench, had my feather shot shaer away, the fringe of my pike burnt off with powder, my pate broken with a scouring-stick, and yet I thank God I am here.

Drum within.

Wife. Hark George, the Drums.

Cit. Ran, tan; tan, tan, ran tan: Oh wench an thou hadst but seen little Ned of Aldgate, drum Ned, how he made it roar again, and laid on like a tyrant: and then struck softly till the Ward came up, and then thundred again, and together we go: sa, sa, sa, bounce quoth the Guns: courage my hearts, quoth the Captains: Saint George, quoth the pike-men; and withal here they lay, and therè they lay: And yet for all this I am here wench.

Wife. Bethankful for it George, for indeed 'tis wonderful.

Enter Ralph and his company with Drums and Colours.

Ralph. March fair my hearts; Lieutenant beat the rear up: Ancient let your Colours flie; but have a great care of the Butchers hooks at White-Chappel, they have been the death of many a fair Ancient. Open your files, that I may take a view both of your persons and munition: Serjeant call a Muster.

Serg. A stand, William Hamerton Pewterer.

Ham. Here Captain.

Ralph. A Corlet and a Spanish Pike; 'tis well, can you shake it with a terror?

Ham. I hope so Captain.

Ralph. Charge upon me, 'tis with the weakest: put more strength William Hamerton, more strength: as you were again; proceed Serjeant.

Serj. George Green-goose, Poulterer.

Green. Here.

Ralph. Let me see your Peece neighbor Green-goose, when was she shot in?

Green. And like you master Captain, I made a snot even now, partly to scour her, and partly for audacity.

Ralph. It should seem so certainly, for her breath is yet inflamed: besides, there is a main fault in the touch-hole, it runs and stinketh; and I tell you moreover, and believe it. Ten such touch-holes would breed the Pox in the Army; Get you a Feather, neighbor, get you a Feather, sweet Oil, and Paper, and your Peece may do well enough yet. Where's your Powder?

Green. Here.

Ralph. What in a Paper? As I am a Soldier and a Gentleman, it craves a Martial Court: you ought to die for't. Where's your horn? answer me to that.

Green. An't like you Sir, I was oblivious.

Ralph. It likes me not it should be so; 'tis a shame for you, and a scandal to all our Neighbors, being a man of worth and estimation, to leave your horn behind you: I am afraid 'twill breed example. But let me tell you no more on't; stand, till I view you all. What's become o'th' nose of your flaske?

1 Sold. Indeed law Captain, 'twas blown away with powder.

Ralph. Put on a new one at the Cities Charge. Where's the stone of this Peece?

2 Sold. The Drummer took it out to light Tobacco.

Ralph. 'Tis a fault my friend, put it in again: you want a Nose, and you a Stone; Serjeant, take a note on't, for I mean to stop it in the pay. Remove and march, soft and fair Gentlemen; soft and fair: double and files, as you were, faces about. Now you with the foddren face, keep in there: look to your Match firrah, it will be in your fellows flask anon. So make a Crescent now, advance your Pikes; stand and give ear, Gentlemen, Countrey-men, Friends, and my fellow-Soldiers, I have brought you this day from the Shop of Security, and the Counters of Content, to measure out in these furious fields, Honor by the ell, and Prowess by the pound: Let it not, O let it not, I say, be told hereafter, the noble issue of this City fainted: but bear your selves in this fair action, like men, valiant men, and free men: Fear not the face of the enemy: nor the noise of the Guns: for believe me brethren, the rude rumbaling of a Brewers Carr is more terrible, of which you have a daily experience: Neither let the stink of Powder offend you, since a more valiant stink is nightly with you. To a resolved mind, his home is every where: I speak not this to take away the hope of your return; for you shall see (I do not doubt it) and that very shortly, your loving wives again, and your sweet children, whose care doth bear you company in baskets. Remember then whose cause you have in hand, and like a sort of true-born Scavengers, scour me this famous Realm of enemies. I have no more to say but this: Stand to your tacklings lads, and shew to the world, you can as well brandish a sword, as shake an Apron. Saint George, and on my hearts. Omnes. Saint George, Saint George. Exeunt.

Wife. 'Twas well done Ralph, I'll send thee a cold Capon a field, and a bottle of March-beer; and, it may be, come my self to see thee.

Cit. Nel, the boy hath deceiv'd me much, I did not think it had been in him: he has perform'd such a matter wench, that if I live, next year I'll have him Captain of the Gallioist, or I'll want my Will.

Enter Old Merry-thought.

Old Mer. Yet I thank God, I break not a rinkle more than I had, not a stoop boys? Care live with Cats, I defie thee, my heart is as sound as an Oak; and though I want drink to wet my whistle, I can sing.

Come no more there boys, come no more there:

For we shall never whilst we live, come any more there.

Enter a Boy with a Coffin.

Boy. God save you Sir.

Old Mer. It's a brave Boy: canst thou sing?

Boy. Yes Sir, I can sing, but 'tis not so necessary at this time.

Old Mer. Sing we, and chaunt it, whilst love doth grant it.

Boy. Sir, Sir, if you knew what I have brought you, you would have little list to sing.

Old Mer. Oh the Mimon round, full long I have thee fought. And now I have thee found, and what hast thou here brought?

Boy. A Coffin, Sir, and your dead Son Jasper in it.

Old Mer. Dead? why farewell he:

Thou wast a bonny boy, and I did love thee.

Enter Jasper.

Jasp. Then I pray you Sir, do so still.

Old Mer. Jasper's Ghost? thou art welcome from Stygi-an lake so soon,

Declare to me what wondrous things in Pluto's court are done

Jasp. By my troth sir, I ne'r came there, 'tis too hot for me Sir.

Old Mer. A merry Ghost, a very merry Ghost.

And where is your true love? Oh where is yours?

Jasp. Marry look you Sir.

Heaves up the Coffin.

Old Mer. Ah ha! Art thou good at that i' faith?

With hey trixie terlerie-whiskin, the world it runs on wheels. When the young mans — up goes the Maidens heels.

Mistress Merry-thought and Michael within.

Mist. Mer. What Mr. Merri-thought, will you not let's in? what do you think shall become of us?

Mist. Mer. What voice is that that calleth at our door?

Mist. Mer. You know me well enough, I am sure I have not been such a stranger to you.

Old Mer. And some they whistled, and some they sang, Hey down, down: and some did loudly say, ever as the Lord Barnets horn blew, Away Musgrave away.

Mist. Mer. You will not have us starve here, will you Master Merry-thought?

Jasp. Nay, good Sir be perswaded, she is my Mother: if her offences have been great against you, let your own love remember she is yours, and so forgive her.

Luce. Good master Merry-thought, let me intreat you, I will not be denied.

Mist. Mer. Why Master Merry-thought, will you be a vexed thing still?

Old Mer. Woman I take you to my love again, but you shall sing before you enter: therefore dispatch your song, and so come in.

Mist. Mer. Well, you must have your Will when all's done, Mich. what song canst thou sing Boy?

Mich. I can sing none forsooth, but a Ladies Daughter of Paris properly.

Mich. Mer. Song. It was a Ladies Daughter, &c.

Old Mer. Come, you're welcome home again.

If such danger be in playing, and jest must to earnest turn, You shall go no more a Maying.

Merch. within. Are you within Sir, Master Merry-thought?

Jasp. It is my Masters voice, good Sir, go hold him talk whilst we convey our selves into some inward room.

Old Mer. What are you? are you merry? you must be very merry if you enter.

Mer. I am Sir.

Old Mer. Sing then.

Mer. Nay, good Sir open to me.

Old Mer. Sing, I say, or by the merry heart, you come not in.

Mer. Well Sir, I'll sing.

Fortune my foe, &c.

Old Mer. You are welcome Sir, you are welcome: you see your entertainment, pray you be merry.

Mer. Oh Master Merry-thought, I am come to aske you Forgiveness for the wrongs I offered you, And your most virtuous Son, they're infinite, Yet my contrition shall be more than they. I do confesse my hardness broke his heart.

For which just heaven hath given me punishment More than my age can carry, his wandring spirit Not yet at rest, pursues me every where, Crying. I'll haunt thee for thy cruelty.

My Daughter she is gone, I know not how, Taken invisible, and whether living,

Or in grave, 'tis yet uncertain to me.

Oh Master Merry-thought, these are the Weights, Will sink me to my grave, forgive me Sir.

Old Mer. Why Sir, I do forgive you, and be merry. And if the wag in's life time, plaid the knave.

Can you forgive him too?

Mer. With all my heart Sir.

Old Mer. Speak it again, and heartily.

Mer. I do Sir.

Now by my soul I do.

Old Mer. With that came out his Paramour, She was as white as the Lilly Flower, Hey troul, trolie lolie.

Enter Luce and Jasper.

With that came out her own dear Knight, He was as true as ever did fight, &c.

Sir, if you will forgive 'em, clap their hands together, there's no more to be said i'th' matter.

Mer. I do, I do.

Cit. I do not like this, peace boys, hear me one of you, every bodies part is come to an end but Ralph's, and he's left out,

Boy. 'Tis long of your self Sir, we have nothing to do with his part.

Cit. Ralph. Come away, make on him as you have done of the rest- boys come.

Wife. Now good Husband, let him come out and die.

Cit. He shall Nell, Ralph, come away quickly and die boy.

Boy. 'Twill be very unfit he should die sir, upon no occasion, and in a Comedy too.

Cit. Take you no care for that Sir boy, is not his part at an end, think you, when he's dead? come away

Ralph.

Enter Ralph, with a forked arrow through his head.

Ralph. When I was mortal, this my costive corps Did lap up Figs and Raisons in the Strand, Where sitting I esp'd a lovely Dame, Whose Master wrought with Lingell and with All, And underground he vampied many a Boot, Straight did her love prick forth me, tender sprig: To follow feats of Arms in warlike wise, Through Waltham Defart; where I did perform Many achievements, and did lay on ground Huge Barbaroso, that insulting Giant, And all his Captives soon set at liberty. Then honor prickt me from my native soil, Into Moldavia, where I gain'd the love Of Pompiana his beloved Daughter: But yet prov'd constant to the black thumm'd Maid Susan, and scorn'd Pompianaes love: Yet liberal I was, and gave her pins, And money for her Fathers Officers, I then returned home, and thrust my self In action, and by all means chosen was The Lord of May, where I did flourish it, With Scarfs and Rings, and Poesie in my hand: Afer this action I preferred was, And chosen City-Captain at Mile-end, With Hat and Feather, and with leading staff, And train'd my men, and brought them all off clear Save one man that beraid him with the noise. But all these things I Ralph did undertake, Only for my beloved Susans sake.

Then coming home, and sitting in my shop With Apron blew, Death came unto my stall To cheapen Aquavita; but e'r I

Could take the bottle down, and fill a taste, Death came and caught a pound of Pepper in his hand, And sprinkled all my Face and Body o'r, And in an instant vanished away.

Cit. 'Tis a pretty fiction i'faith.

Ralph. Then took I up my Bow and Shaft in hand, And walkt in Moor-fields, to cool my self, But there grim cruel death met me again, And shot this forked Arrow through my head, And now I faint, therefore be warn'd by me, My fellows every one, of forked heads.

Farewel all you good boys in merry London, Ne'r shall we more upon Shrove-Tuesday meet, And pluck down houses of iniquity.

My pain increaseth: I shall never more Hold open, whilst another pumps both legs, Nor daub a Sattin Gown with rotten Eggs: Set up a stake, Oh never more I shall, I die, flie, flie my soul to Grocers Hall. oh, oh, oh, &c.

Wife. Well said Ralph, do your obeysance to the Gentlemen, and go your ways well said Ralph.

Exit Ralph.

Old Mer. Methinks all we, thus kindly and unexpectedly reconciled, should not part without a Song.

Merch. A good motion.

Old Mer. Strike up then.

SONG.

SONG.

Better Musick ne'r was known,
Than a Quire of hearts in one.
Let each other that hath been,
Troubled with the gall or spleen:
Learn of us to keep his brow,
Smooth and plain as ours are now.
Sing though before the hour of dying
He shall rise, and then be crying,
Hey ho, 'Tis nought but mirth,
That keeps the bodie from the earth.

Exeunt omnes.

Epilogus.

Cit. Come Nell. shall we go, the Play's done?
Wife. Nay, by my faith George, I have more manners than so, I'll speak to these Gentlemen first: I thank you all Gentlemen, for your patience and countenance to Ralph, a poor fatherless child, and if I may see you at my house, it should go hard, but I would have a pottle of Wine, and a Pipe of Tobacco for you, for truly I hope you like the youth, but I would be glad to know the truth: I refer it to your own discretions, whether you will applaud him or no, for I will wink, and whilst you shall do what you will, I thank you with all my heart, God give you good night, come George.

Actus Primus, Scæna Prima

Enter Incubo the Bailiff, Diego the Host.

Inc. Signior Don Diego, and mine Host, save thee.

Die. I thank you Mr. Bailiff.

Inc. O the block!

Die. Why, how should I have answer'd?

Inc. Not with that

Negligent rudeness: But I kiss your hands

Signior Don Incubo de Hambre, and then

My Titles: Master Bailiff of Castle-blanco:

Thou ne'er wilt have the elegance of an Host;

I sorrow for thee, as my friend and Gossip:

No smook, nor steam out-breathing from the kitchen?

There's little life i'th Hearth then.

Die. I, there, there,

That is his friendship, harkening for the spit,

And sorrow that he cannot smell the pot-boil.

Inc. Strange

An Inn should be so curst, and not the sign

Blasted, nor withered; very strange, three days now,

And not an Egg eat in it, nor an Onion. (traps, I,

Die. I think they ha' strew'd the high-ways with cal-

No horse dares pass 'em; I did never know

A week of so sad doings, since I first

Stood to my Sign-post,

Inc. Gossip, I have found

The root of all: kneel, it is thy self

Art cause thereof: each person is the Founder

Of his own fortune, good or bad; but mend it,

Call for thy Cloak, and Rapier.

Die. How?

Inc. Do, call,

And

And put 'em on in haste: Alter thy fortune,
By appearing worthy of her: Dolt thou think
Her good face e'r will know a man in cuervo?
In single body, thus? in Hose, and Doublet
The horse-boys garb? base blank, and halfe blank cuervo?
Did I, or Mr Dean of Sivil our neighbor
E'r reach our dignities in cuervo, think'st thou,
In squirting Hose and Doublet? Signior, no,
There went more to't: there were Cloaks, Gowns, Cassocks,
And other paramentos; Call, I say,
His Cloak, and Rapier here.

Enter Hostess.

Host. What means your Worship?

Inc. Bring forth thy Husbands Sword: so hang it on,
And now his cloak, here cast it up; I mean
Gossip, to change your luck, and brink you guests.

Host. Why? is there charm in this?

Inc. Expect; now walk,
But not the pace of one that runs on errands;
For, want of gravity in an Host, is odious:
You may remember Gossip, if you please,
(Your Wife being then th' Infanta of the Gipsies,
And your self governing a great mans Mules then)
Me a poor Squire at Madrid attending
A Master of Ceremonies; But a man, believe it,
That knew his place to the gold weight, and such
Have I heard him ought say, ought every Host
Within the Catholique Kings Dominions
Be in his own house.

Die. How?

Inc. A Master of Ceremonies;
At least Vice-Master, and to do nought in cuervo,
That was his Maxim, I will tell thee of him:
He would not speak with an Ambassadors Cook,
See a cold bake-meat from a forreign part
In cuervo: had a dog but staid without,
Or beast of quality, as an Englisb Cow,
But to present it self, he would put on
His Savoy chain about his neck, the ruff
And cuffs of Holland, then the Naples Hat
With the Rome Hat-band, and the Florentine Agat,
The Millan Sword, the Cloak of Genoa, set
With Flemish buttons; all his given pieces
To entertain 'em in, and complement Knock within.
With a tame Conie, as with the Prince that sent it.

Die. List. who is there?

Inc. A guest and 't be thy will.

Die. Look Spowfe, cry luck, and we be encounter'd: ha?

Host. Luck then, and good, for 't is a fine brave guest,
With a brave horse.

Inc. Why now, believe of cuervo.

Enter Theodosia.

As you shall see occasion: go, and meet him.

Theo. Look to my horse, I pray you, well.

Die. He shall, Sir.

Inc. Oh how beneath his rank and call was that now?
Your horse shall be entreated as becomes
A horse of fashion, and his inches.

Theo. Oh.

Inc. Look to the Cavalier: what ails he? stay
If it concern his horse, let it not trouble him,
He shall have all respect the place can yield him
Either of barley, or fresh straw.

Die. Good Sir

Look up.

Inc. He sinks, somewhat to cast upon him,
He'll go away in cuervo else.

Die. What, Wife!

Oh your hot waters quickly, and some cold
To cast in his sweet face.

Host. Alas, fair flower?

Die. Does any body entertain his Horse?

Host. Yes, Lazaro has him.

Enter Hostess with a glass of water.

Inc. Go you see him in person.

Host. Sir, taste a little of this, of mine own water,
I did distill't my self; sweat Lilly look upon me,
You are but newly blown, my pretty Tulip.
Faint not upon your stalk, 'tis firm and fresh
Stand up so bolt upright, you are yet in growing

The. Pray you let me have a chamber.

Host. That you shall, Sir.

The. And where I may be private, I intreat you.

Host. For that in troth Sir, we ha no choice: our house
Is but a vent of need, that now and then
Receives a guest, between the greater Towns
As they come late; only one room,

Inc. She means, Sir, it is none
Of those wild, scatter'd heaps, call'd Inns, where scarce
The Host is heard, though he wind his horn t' his people,
Here is a competent pile, wherein the man,
Wife, Servants, all do live within the whistle

Host. Only one room.

Inc. A pretty modest quadrangle
She will describe to you.

Host. Wherein stands two Beds Sir.

Enter Diego.

We have, and where, if any guest do come,
He must of force be lodg'd, that is the truth, Sir.

Theo. But if I pay you for both your beds, methinks
That should alike content you.

Host. That it shall, Sir.

If I be paid, I am paid.

Theo. Why, there's a Ducket
Will that make your content?

Host. Oh the sweet face on you:
A Ducket? yes, and there were three beds Sir,
And twice so many rooms, which is one more,
You should be private in 'em all, in all Sir,
No one should have a piece of a bed with you
Not master Dean of Sivil himself, I swear.
Though he came naked hither, as once he did
When h' had like t' have been tane a bed with the Moor
And guelt by her Master: you shall be as private,
As if you lay in's own great house that's haunted,
Where no body comes, they say:

Theo. I thank you Hostess.
Pray you, will you shew me in.

Host. Yes marry will I Sir,
And pray that not a flea, or a chink vex you.

Exit Host and Theo.

Inc. You forget supper: Gossip: move for supper
Die. 'Tis strange what love to a beast may do, his Horse
Threw him into this fit.

Inc. You shall excuse me
It was his being in cuervo, meerly caus'd it.

Die. Do you think so Sir?
Inc. Most unlucky cuervo.
Naught else, he looks as he would eat Partridge,
This guest; ha' you 'em ready in the house?
And a fine piece of Kid now? and fresh garlick

Enter Hostess.

With Sardinia and Zant Oil? how now?
Has he bespoke, what will he have a brace,
Or but one Partridge, or a short leg'd Hen,
Daintly carbonado'd?

Host. 'Las the dead
May be as ready for a supper as he.

Inc.

Inc. Ha?

Host. He has no mind to eat, more than his shadow:

Inc. Say you.

Die. How does your worship

Inc. I put on

My left shoe first to day, now I perceive it,
And skipt a bead in saying 'em 'ore; else
I could not be thus crois'd: He cannot be Above seventeen; one of his years, and have
No better a stomach?

Host. And in such good cloaths too.

Die. Nay, these do often make the stomach worse, wife,
That is no reason.

Inc. I could, at his years, Gossips
(As temperate as you see me now) have eaten
My brace of Ducks, with my half Goose, my Conie,
And drink my whole twelve Marcedis in Wine
As easie as I now get down three Olives

Die. And, with your temperance-favour, yet I think
Your worship would put to't at six and thirty
For a good wager; and the meal in too.

Inc. I do not know what mine old mouth can do.
I ha not prov'd it lately.

Die. That's the grief, Sir.

Inc. Put is he without hope then gone to bed?

Host. I fear so, Sir, h'as lock'd the door close to him
Sure he is very ill.

Inc. That is with fasting,
You should ha told him Gossip, what you had had,
Given him the Inventory of your kitchen,
It is the picklock in an Inn, and often
Opens a close barr'd stomach: what may he be troh?

Die. Oh a brave Jennet,
As e'r your worship saw.

Inc. And he eats?

Die. Strongly,

Inc. A mighty Solecifine, heaven give me patience,
What creatures has he?

Host. None.

Inc. And so well cloath'd,
And so well mounted?

Die. That's all my wonder, Sir,
Who he should be, he is attir'd and hors'd
For the Constables Son of Spain.

Inc. My wonders more
He should want appetite: well a good night
To both my Gossips: I will for this time
Put off the thought of supping: In the morning
Remember him of breakfast pray you.

Host. I shall Sir.

Die. A hungry time Sir.

Inc. We that live like mice } Exit
On others meat, must watch when we can get it. } Incubo.

Host. Yes, but I would not tell him: Our fair guest
Says, though he eats no supper he will pay for one.

Die. Good news: we'll eat it sponse, t' his health,
'Twas politickly done t' admit no sharers.

Enter Philippo.

Phi. Look to the Mules there, where's mine Host?

Die. Here Sir.

Another Fayerie.

Host. Elefs me.

Phi. From what sweet Hostess?
Are you afraid o' your guests?

Host. From Angels, Sir,
I think there's none but such come here to night,
My house had never so good luck afore
For brave, fine guests; and yet the ill luck on't is
I cannot bid you welcome.

Phi. No?

Host. Not lodge you Sir.

Phi. Not, Hostess?

Host. No in troth Sir, I do tell you
Because you may provide in time: my beds
Are both tane up by a young Cavalier
That will and must be private.

Die. He has paid Sir
For all our Chambers.

Host. Which is one: and Beds
Which I already ha told you are two: But Sir,
So sweet a creature, I am very sorry
I cannot lodge you by him; you look so like him
Yo' are both the loveliest pieces.

Phi. What train has he?

Die. None but himself

Phi. And will no less than both beds
Serve him?

Host. H'as given me a Duckt for 'em.

Phi. Oh.

You give me reason Hostess: Is he handsome,
And young do you say?

Host. Oh Sir, the delicat'st flesh
And finest cloths withal, and such a horse,
With such a Saddle.

Phi. She's in love with all.

The horse and him, and Saddle, and cloths, good woman,
Thou justifiest thy Sex; lov'st all that's brave:

Enter Incubo.

Sure though I lye o' th' ground, I'll stay here now
And have a sight of him: you'll give me house-room,
Fire, and fresh meat, for money, gentle Hostess;
And make me a pallat?

Inc. Sir, she shall do reason. . . .

I understood you had another Guest, Gossips,
Pray you let his Mule be lookt to, have good straw,
And store of bran: And Gossip, do you hear,
Let him not stay for supper: What good Fowl ha' you?
This Gentleman would eat a Pheasant.

Host. 'Lafs Sir;
We ha' no such.

Inc. I kiss your hands fair Sir.

What ha you then? speak what you have? I'm one Sir
Here for the Catholique King, an Officer
T'enquire what guests come to these places; you Sir
Appear a person of quality, and 'tis fit
You be accommodated: why speak you not,
What ha' you Woman? are you afraid to vent
That which you have?

Phi. This is a most strange man;
T'appoint my meat.

Host. The half of a cold hen, Sir,
And a boil'd quarter of Kid, is all i' th' house.

Inc. Why all's but cold; let him see it forth,
Cover, and give the eye some satisfaction,
A Travellers stomach must see bread and salt,
His belly is nearer to him, than his kindred;
Cold hen's a pretty meat Sir.

Phi. What you please;
I am resolv'd t'obey.

Inc. So is your Kid,
With Pepper, Garlick, and the juyce of an Orange:
She shall with Sallads help it, and clean linnen;
Dispatch; what news at Court Sir?

Phi. Faith, new tires
Most of the Ladies have, the men old Suits:
Only the Kings Fool has a new Coat
To serve you.

Inc. I did guess you came from thence, Sir.

Phi. But I do know I did not.

Inc. I mistook Sir.

What hear you of the Archdukes?

Phi. Troth your question.

Enter

Enter Hostess and Servants with Table.

Inc. Of the French business, What?

Pbi. As much.

Inc. No more?

They say the French: Oh that's well: come, I'll help you:
Have you no Jiblets now? or a broil'd rather.

Or some such present dish t' assist?

Hst. Not any Sir.

Inc. The more your fault: you nev'r should be without Such aids: what cottage would ha' lack'd a Pheasant
At such a time as this? well, bring your Hen,
And Kid forth quickly.

Pbi. That should be my prayer
To scape his Inquisition.

Inc. Sir, the French,
They say are divided 'bout their match with us,
What think you of it.

Pbi. As of naught to me, Sir.

Inc. Nay, it's as little to me too: but I love
To ask after these things, to know the affections
Of States and Princes, now and then for bettring.

Pbi. Of your own ignorance.

Inc. Yes Sir:

Pbi. Many do so.

Inc. I cannot live without it: what do you hear
Of our Indian Fleet; they say they are well return'd.

Pbi. I had no venture with 'em Sir; had you?

Enter Hostess and Servants with meat.

Inc. Why do you ask Sir?

Pbi. 'Cause it might concern you,
It does not me.

Inc. Oh here's your meat come.

Pbi. Thanks,

I welcome it at any price.

Inc. Some stools here,

And bid mine Host bring Wine, I'll try your Kid,
If he be sweet: he looks well, yes, he is good;
I'll carve you Sir.

Pbi. You use me too too Princely:

Taft, and carve too.

Inc. I love to do these Offices.

Pbi. I think you do: for whose sake?

Inc. For themselves Sir,

The very doing of them is reward

Pbi. 'Had little faith would not believe you, Sir.

Inc. Gossip, some Wine.

Enter Diego with Wine.

Die. Here 'tis: and right St. Martyn.

Inc. Measure me out a glass.

Pbi. I love the humanity

Us'd in this place:

Inc. Sir, I salute you here.

Phil. I kiss your hands Sir.

Inc. Good wine, it will beget an appetite:
Fill him, and sit down, Gossip, entertain
Your noble guest here, as becomes your title.

Die. Please you to like this Wine Sir?

Pbi. I dislike

Nothing mine Host, but that I may not see
Your conceal'd guest: here's to you.

Die. In good faith Sir,

I wish you as well as him: would you might see him

Inc. And wherefore may he not:

Die. 'Has lock'd himself Sir

Up, and has hir'd both the beds o' my wife
At extraordinary rate.

Pbi. I'll give as much

If that will do't, for one, as he for both;

What say you mine Host, the door once open

I'll fling my self upon the next bed to him
And there's an end of me till morning; noise
I will make none

Die. I wish your worship well — but

Inc. His honor is engag'd: And my she-Gossip
Hath past her promise, hath she not?

Die. Yes truly:

Inc. That toucheth to the credit of the house:
Well, I will eat a little, and think: how say you Sir
Unto this brawn o' th' Hen?

Pbi. I ha' more mind

To get this bed Sir.

Inc. Say you so: Why then

Giv't me agen, and drink to me: mine Host
Fill him his Wine: thou'rt dull, and dost not praise it,
I eat but to teach you the way Sir.

Phil. Sir:

Find but the way to lodge me in this chamber
I'll give mine Host two Duckets for his bed,
And you Sir two Reals: here's to you

Inc. Excuse me,

I am not mercenary: Gossip pledge him for me,
I'll think a little more; but ev'n a one bit
And then talk on: you cannot interrupt me.

Die. This piece of wine Sir, cost me

Inc. Stay: I have found:

This little morsel, and then: here's excellent garlick:
Have you not a bunch of grapes now: or some Bacon
To give the mouth a relish?

Die. Wife, do you hear?

Inc. It is no matter: Sir. give mine Host your Duckets.

Die. How Sir?

Inc. Do you receive 'em: I will save
The honesty of your house: and yours too Gossip,
And I will lodge the Gentleman: shew the chamber.

Die. Good Sir do you hear.

Inc. Shew me the chamber.

Die. Pray you Sir,

Do not disturb my guests.

Inc. Disturb? I hope

The Catholick King Sir, may command a lodging
Without disturbing in his Vassals house,
For any Minister of his, emplot

In business of the State. Where is the door?

Open the door, who are you there? within?

In the Kings name.

Theodosia within.

Theo. What would you have?

Inc. Your key Sir,

And your door open: I have here command
To lodge a Gentleman, from the Justice, sent Upon the Kings affairs.

Theod. Kings and necessities

Must be obey'd: the key is under the door.

Inc. How now Sir, are you fitted? you secur'd?

Pbi. Your two Reals are grown a piece of Eight.

Inc. Excuse me Sir.

Pbi. 'Twill buy a Hen; and Wine
Sir, for to morrow.

Exit Phil.

Inc. I do kiss your hands Sir

Well this will bear my charge yet to the Gallies
Where I am owing a Ducket: whither this night
By the Moonsleave I'll march: for in the morning

Early, they put from Port St. Maries. Ex. all but Diego.

Die. Lazaro.

Enter Lazaro.

How do the horses?

Laz. Would you would go and see Sir,
A — of all Jades, what a clap h'as given me:
As sure as you live Master he knew perfectly
I couzen'd him on's Oats: he lookt upon me
And then he sneer'd, as who should say, take heed firrah:
And when he saw our half Peck, which you know

Was but an old Court dish, lord how he stamp't :
I thought 't had been for joy, when suddenly
He cuts me a back caper with his heels
And takes me just o'th' crupper, down came I,
And all my ounce of Oats: Then he neigh'd out
As though he had had a Mare by th' tail.

Die. Faith Lazaro

We are too blame to use the poor dumb serviters
So cruelly.

Laz. Yonder's this other Gentleman's horse
Keeping our Lady Eve: the devil a bit
H'as got since he came in yet: there he stands
And looks, and looks, but 'tis your pleasure, Sir,
He shall look lean enough: h'as Hay before him
But 'tis as big as Hemp, and will as soon choak him,
Unless he eat it butter'd: he had four shooes
And good ones when he came: 'tis a strange wonder
With standing still he should cast three.

Die. O Lazaro.

The Devil's in this Trade: truth never knew it
And to the devil we shall travel, Lazaro
Unless we mend our manners: once every week
I meet with such a knock to mollifie me
Sometimes a dozen to awake my conscience
Yet still I sleep securely.

Laz. Certain Master

We must use better dealing.

Die. 'Faith for mine own part

Not to give ill example to our issues,
I could be well content to steal but two girths,
And now and then a saddle-cloth: change a bridle
Only for exercise.

Laz. If we could stay there

There were some hope on's Master: but the devil is
We are drunk so early we mistake whole Saddles
Sometimes a horse; and then it seems to us too
Every poor jade has his whole peck, and tumbles
Up to his ears in clean straw, and every bottle
Shews at the least a dozen; when the truth is, Sir,
There's no such matter, not a smell of Provinder,
Not so much straw as would tie up a horse tail,
Nor anything i' th' rack, but two old Cobwebs
And so much rotten Hay as had been a hens nest.

Die. Well, these mistakings must be mended, Lazaro,
These apparitions, that abuse our senses,
And make us ever apt to sweep the manger.
But put in nothing; these fancies must be forgot
And we must pray it may be reveal'd to us
Whose horse we ought, in conscience, to couzen,
And how, and when; A Parsons Horse may suffer
A little greazing in his teeth, 'tis wholesome;
And keeps him in a sober shuffle: and his Saddle
May want a stirrop. and it may be sworn
His Learning lay on one side, and so broke it:
H'as ever Oats in's Cloak-bag to prevent us
And therefore 'tis a meritorious office
To tythe him soundly.

Laz. And a Grazier may

(For those are pinching pucker-fists, and suspicious)
Suffer a myst before his eyes sometimes too,
And think he sees his horse eat halfe a bushel:
When the truth is, rubbing his gums with salt,
Till all the skin come off: he shall but mumble
Like an old Woman that were chewing Brawn,
And drop 'em out again.

Die. That may do well too,

And no doubt 'tis but venial, But good Lazaro
Have you a care of understanding horses,
Horses that know the world: let them have meat
Till their teeth ake; and rubbing till their ribs
Shine like a wench's forehead; they are devils

Laz. And look into our dealings: as sure as we live
These Courtiers horses are a kind of Welsh Prophets,
Nothing can be hid from 'em: For mine own part

The next I cozen of that kind shall be founde'd,
And of all four too: I'll no more such complements
Upon my crupper.

Die. Steal but a little longer
Till I am lam'd too, and we'll repent together,
It will not be above two daies.

Laz. By that time
I shall be well again, and all forgot Sir.

Die. Why then I'll stay for thee.

Exit

Scena Secunda.

Enter Theodosio and Phillipos on several Beds.

Theo. Oh,—ho? oh—ho?

Phi. Ha?

Theo. Oh—oh? heart—heart—heart—heart?

Phil. What's that?

Theo. When wilt thou break?—break, break, break?

Phil. Ha?

I would the voice were strong, or I nearer,

Theo. Shame, shame, eternal shame? what have I done?

Phil. Done?

Theo. And to no end, what a wild journey

Have I more wildly undertaken?

Phil. Journey?

Theo. How, without counsel? care? reason, or fear?

Phil. Whither will this fit carry?

Theo. Oh my folly,

Phil. This is no common sickness.

Theo. How have I left

All I should love, or keep? oh heaven.

Phil. Sir,

Theo. Ha?

Phil. How do you gentle Sir?

Theo. Alas my fortune

(nefs,

Phil. It seems your sorrow oppresses: please your good-
Let me bear half, Sir: a divided burthen
Is so made lighter.

Theo. Oh,

Phil. That sigh betraies

The fulness of your grief

Theo. I, if that grief

Had not bereft me of my understanding,
I should have well remembred where I was,
And in what company; and clapt a lock
Upon this tongue for talking.

Phil. Worthy Sir

Let it not add to your grief, that I have heard

A sigh or groan come from you: That is all Sir:

Theo. Good Sir no more: you have heard too much I fear,
Would I had taken Poppy when I spake it.

Phi. It seems you have an ill belief of me
And would have fear'd much more, had you spoke ought
I could interpret. But believe it Sir
Had I had means to look into your breast,
And tane you sleeping here, that so securely
I might have read all that your woe would hide
I would not have betraid you.

Theo. Sir, that speech

Is very noble, and almost would tempt
My need to trust you.

Phil. At your own election,

I dare not make my faith so much suspected
As to protest again: nor am I curious
To know more than is fit.

Theo. Sir, I will trust you

But you shall promise Sir to keep your bed,
And whatsoe'r you hear, not to importune
More I beseech you from me

Phi. Sir I will not.

Theo. Than I am prone to utter.

Phi. My faith for it.

Theo. If I were wise, I yet should hold my peace

You

You will be noble?

Phil. You shall make me so

If you'll but think me such.

Theo. I do : then know

You are deceiv'd with whom you have talk'd so long.

I am a most unfortunate lost woman.

Phil. Ha?

Theo. Do not stir Sir : I have here a Sword.

Phil. Not I sweet Lady : of what blood, or name,

Theo. You'll keep your faith.

Phil. I'll perish else.

Theo. Believe then

Of birth too noble for me, so descended—

I am ashamed, no less than I am affrighted.

Phil. Fear not : by all good things, I will not wrong you.

Theo. I am the Daughter of a noble Gentleman

Born in this part of Spain : my fathers name Sir :

But why should I abuse that reverence

When a child's duty has forsaken me.

Phil. All may be mended, in fit time too : speak it

Theo. Alphonso, sir.

Phil. Alphonso? What's your own name?

Theo. Any base thing you can invent.

Phil. Deal truly.

Theo. They call me Theodosia.

Phil. Ha? and love

Is that that hath chang'd you thus?

Theo. Ye have observ'd me

Too nearly Sir, 'tis that indeed : 'tis love Sir :

And love of him (oh heavens) why should men deal thus?

Why should they use their arts to cozen us?

That have no cunning, but our fears about us?

And ever that too late too ; no dissembling

Or double way but doating : too much loving?

Why should they find new oaths, to make more wretches?

Phil. What may his name be?

Theo. Sir, a name that promises

Methinks no such ill usage : Mark-Antonio

A noble neighbors son : Now I must desire ye

To stay a while : else my weak eyes must answer

Phil. I will :—Are ye yet ready? what is his quality?

Theo. His best a thief Sir : that he would be known by

Is heir to Leonardo, a rich Gentleman :

Next of a handsome body, had heaven made him

A mind fit to it. To this man my fortune,

(My more than purblind fortune) gave my faith,

Drawn to it by as many shews of service

And signs of truth, as ever false tongue utter'd :

Heaven pardon all.

Phil. 'Tis well said : forward Lady.

Theo. Contracted Sir, and by exchange of rings

Our souls deliver'd : nothing left unfinished

But the last work, enjoying me, and Ceremony.

For that I must confess was the first wife doubt

I ever made : yet after all this love Sir,

All this profession of his faith ; when daily

And hourly I expected the blest Priest

He left me like a dream, as all this story

Had never been, nor thought of, why, I know not ;

Yet I have called my conscience to confession,

And every syllable that might offend

I have had in shrift : yet neither loves Law Signior,

Nor ye of Maidens duty, but desiring

Have I transgressed in : left his father too,

Nor whither he is gone, or why departed

Can any tongue resolve me : All my hope

(Which keeps me yet alive, and would persuade me

I may be once more happy, and thus shapes me

A shame to all my modest Sex) is this Sir,

I have a Brother and his old Companion,

Student in Salamanca, there my last hope

If he be yet alive, and can be loving

Is left me to recover him : For which travel

In this Sute left at home of that dear Brothers

Thus as you find me, without fear, or wisdom,

I have wander'd from my Father, fled my friends,

And now am only child of hope and danger :

You are now silent Sir : this tedious story

(That ever keeps me waking) makes you heavy :

'Tis fit it should do so : for that, and I

Can be but troubles.

Phil. No, I sleep not Lady :

I would I could : oh heaven is this my comfort?

Theo. What ail you gentle Sir?

Phil. Oh.

Theo. Why do you groan so?

Phil. I must, I must ; oh misery ;

Theo. But now Sir,

You were my comfort : if any thing afflict ye

Am not I fit to bear a part on't? and by your own rule?

Phil. No ; if you could heal, as you have wounded me,

But 'tis not in your power.

Theo. I fear intemperance.

Phil. Nay, do not seek to shun me : I must see you :

By heaven I must : ho! there mine Host : a Candle :

Strive not, I will not stir ye.

Theo. Noble Sir

This is a breach of promise.

Phil. Tender Lady

It shall be none but necessary : ho! there,

Some light, some light for heavens sake.

Theo. Will ye betray me?

Are ye a Gentleman?

Phil. Good woman :

Theo. Sir.

Enter Diego with a light.

Phil. If I be prejudicial to you, curse me.

Dieg. Ye are early stirring Sir.

Phil. Give me your Candle

And so good morrow for a while.

Dieg. Good morrow Sir.

Theo. My Brother Don Philippo : nay Sir, kill me

I ask no mercy Sir, for none dare know me,

I can deserve none : As ye look upon me

Behold in infinite these foul dishonors,

My noble Father, then your self, last all

That bear the name of kindred, suffer in me :

I have forgot whose child I am ; whose Sister :

Do you forget the pity tied to that :

Let not compassion sway you : you will be then

As foul as I, and bear the same brand with me,

A favourer of my fault : ye have a sword Sir,

And such a cause to kill me in.

Phil. Rise Sister,

I wear no sword for Women : nor no anger

While your fair chastity is yet untouch'd.

Theo. By those bright Stars, it is Sir.

Phil. For my Sister

I do believe ye : and so neer blood has made us

With the dear love I ever bore your virtues

That I will be a Brother to your griefs too :

Becomforted, 'tis no dishonor Sister

To love, nor to love him you do : he is a Gentleman

Of as sweet hopes, as years, as many promises,

As there be growing Truths, and great ones.

Theo. O Sir I

Phil. Do not despair.

Theo. Can ye forgive?

Phil. Yes Sister,

Though this be no small error, a far greater.

Theo. And think me still your Sister?

Phil. My dear Sister.

Theo. And will you counsel me?

Phil. To your own peace too :

Ye shall love still.

Theo. How good ye are?

Phil. My business,

And duty to my Father : which now drew me

K

Exit.

From

From Salamanca I will lay aside
And only be your Agent to perswade ye
To leave both love, and him, and well retire ye;

Theo. Oh gentle Brother.

Phil. I perceive 'tis folly:

Delays in love, more dangerous.

Theo. Noble Brother.

Phil. Fear not, I'll run your own way: and to help you,
Love having rackt your passions beyond counsel:
I'll hazard mine own fame: whether shall we venture?

Theo. Alas, I know not Sir

Phil. Come, 'tis bright morning

Let's walk out, and consider: you'll keep this habit.

Theo. I would Sir.

Phil. Then it shall be: what must I call ye?

Come, do not blush: pray speak, I may spoil all else.

Theo. Pray call me Theodoro.

Enter Diego.

Dieg. Are ye ready?

The day draws on apace: once more good morrow.

Theo. Good morrow gentle Host: now I must thank ye:

Phil. Who dost thou think this is?

Dieg. Were you a wench Sir,
I think you would know before me.

Phil. Mine own Brother.

Dieg. By th' Masse your noses are akin: should I then
Have been so barbarous to have parted Brothers?

Phi. You knew it then.

Dieg. I knew 'twas necessary
You should be both together: Instinct Signior,
Is a great matter in an Host.

Theo. I am satisfied.

Enter Pedro.

Ped. Is not mine Host up yet?

Phi. Who's that?

Dieg. I'll see.

Phil. Sister, withdraw your self.

Ped. Signior Philippo.

Phil. Noble Don Pedro, where have you been this way?

Ped. I came from Port St. Maries, whence the Gallies
Put this last tide, and bound for Barcelona,

I brought Mark-antonie upon his way

Phi. Marc-antonie?

Ped. Who is turn'd Soldier,
And entertain'd in the new Regiment;
For Naples?

Phi. Is it possible?

Ped. I assure you.

Phi. And put they in at Barcelona?

Ped. So

One of the Masters told me.

Phi. Which way go you Sir?

Ped. Home.

Phi. And I for Sivil: pray you Sir; say not
That you saw me, if you shall meet the question,
I have some little business

Ped. Were it less Sir.

it shall not become me, to lose the caution:
Shall we breakfast together?

Phi. I'll come to you Sir:

Sister you hear this: I believe your fortune
Begins to be propitious to you: we will hire
Males of mine Host here: if we can, himself
To be our guide, and straight to Barcelona,
This was as happy news, as unexpected
Stay you till I rid him away.

Theo. I will.

Exeunt

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Alphonso and a Servant.

Alpb. Knock at the door.

Ser. 'Tis open Sir,
Alpb. That's all one,
Knock when I bid you.

Ser. Will not your Worship enter?

Alpb. Will not you learn more manners Sir, and do that
Your Master bids ye; knock ye knave, or I'll knock
Such a round peal about your pate: I enter
Under his roof, or come to say god save ye
To him, the Son of whose base dealings has undone me?
Knock louder, louder yet: I'll starve, and rot first,
This open air is every mans.

2 Ser. within. Come in Sir.

Enter two Servants.

Alpb. No, no Sir, I am none of these Come in Sirs,
None of those visitants: bid your wife Master
Come out, I have to talk unto him: go Sir

2 Ser. Your worship may be welcome.

Alpb. Sir, I will not,
I come not to be welcome: good my three Duckets,
My pickell'd sprat a day, and no oil to't,
And once a year a cotten coat, leave prating
And tell your Master I am here.

2 Ser. I will Sir.

This is a strange old man.

Exit.

Alpb. I welcome to him?

I'll be first welcome to a Pesthouse: Sirrah
Let's have your valour now cas'd up, and quiet
When an occasion calls, 'tis wisdom in ye,
A Servingman's discretion: if you do draw,

Enter Leonardo, and Don Zanchio (carried by two Servants in a chair.)

Draw but according to your entertainment;
Five Nobles worth of fury.

Leo. Signior Alphonso,

I hope no discontent from my Will given,
Has made ye shun my house:

An credit me amongst my fears 'tis greatest
To minister offences.

Alpb. O good Signior

I know ye for Italian breed, fair tongu'd,
Spare your Apologies, I care not for 'em,
As little for your love Sir; I can live
Without your knowledge, eat mine own, and sleep
Without dependences, or hopes upon ye.

I come to ask my Daughter.

Leo. Gentle Sir.

Alpb. I am not gentle Sir, nor gentle will be
Till I have justice, my poor child restor'd
Your caper-cutting boy has run away with?
Young Signior smooth-face, he that takes up wenches
With smiles, and sweet behaviors, Songs, and Sonnets,
Your high fed Jennet, that no hedge can hold
They say you bred him for a Stallion.

Zanch. Fie Signior, there be times, and terms of honor
To argue these things in, descidements able
To speak ye noble Gentlemen, ways punctual
And to the life of credit, ye are too rugged.

Alpb. I am too tame Sir.

Leo. Will ye hear but reason?

Alpb. No, I will hear no reason: I come not hither
To be popt off with reason; reason then.

Zanch.

Zanch. Why Signior, in all things there must be method,
Ye choak the child of honor else, discretion,
Do you conceive an injury?

Alph. What then Sir?

Zanch. Then follow it in fair terms, let your sword bite
When time calls, not your tongue.

Alph. I know Sir

Both when and what to do without directions,
And where, and how, I come not to be tutor'd,
My cause is no mans but mine own: you Signior,
Will ye restore my Daughter?

Leo. Who detains her?

Alph. No more of these slight shifts

Leo. Ye urge me Signior

With strange injustice: because my Son has err'd

Zanch. Mark him.

Leo. Out of the heat of youth: dos't follow
I must be father of his crimes,

Alph. I say still.

Leave off your Rhetorick, and restore my Daughter.
And suddainly: bring in your rebel too,
Mountdragon, he that mounts without commission
That I may see him punished, and severely,
Or by that holy Heaven, I'll fire your house,
And there's my way of honor.

Zanch. Pray give me leave

Was not man made the noblest creature?

Alph. Well Sir.

Zanch: Should not his mind then answer to his making,

And to his mind his actions, if this ought to be,
Why do we run a blind way from our worths,
And cancel our discretions, doing those things
To cure offences, are the most offences?

We have rules of justice in us; to those rules

Let us apply our angers: you can consider

The want in others of these terminations

And how unfurnish'd they appear.

Alph. Hang others,

And where the wrongs are open, hang respects,
I come not to consider.

Leo. Noble Sir,

Let us argue coolly, and consider like men.

Alph. Like men!

Leo. Ye are too suddain still.

Alph. Like men Sir?

Zanch. It is fair language, and ally'd to honor.

Alph. Why, what strange beast would your grave reve-
Make me appear? like men! (rence)

Zanch. Taste but that point Sir,
And ye recover all.

Alph. I tell thy wisdom

I am as much a man, and as good a man.

Leo. All this is granted Sir.

Alph. As wise a man.

Zanch. Ye are not tainted that way.

Alph. And a man

Dares make thee no man; or at best, a base man.

Zanch. Fie, fie, here wants much carriage.

Alph. Hang much carriage.

Leo. Give me good language.

Alph. Sirrah Signior, Give me my Daughter.

Leo. I am as gentle as your self, as free born.

Zanch. Observe his way.

Leo. As much respect ow'd to me.

Zanch. This hangs together nobly.

Leo. And for Civil,

A great deal more it seems: go look your Daughter.

Zanch. There ye went well off Signior.

Leo. That rough tongue

You understand at first: you never think Sir

Out of your mightiness, of my loss: here I stand

A patient Anvil, to your burning angers

Made subject to your dangers; yet my loss equal:

Who shall bring home my Son?

Alph. A whipping Beadle.

Leo. Why, is your Daughter whorish?

Alph. Ha, thou dar'st not,
By heaven I know thou dar'st not.

Leo. I dare more Sir

If you dare be uncivil.

Alph. Laugh too, Pidgeon.

Zanch. A fitter time for fames sake: two weak Nurses
Would laugh at this; are there no more days coming,
No ground but this to argue on? no swords left
Nor friends to carry this, but your own furies?
Alas! it shows too weakly.

Alph. Let it show,

I come not here for shews: laugh at me sirrah?

I'll give ye cause to laugh.

Leo. Ye are as like sir

As any man in Spain.

Alph. By heaven I will,

I will brave Leonardo.

Leo. Brave Alphonso.

I will expect it then.

Zanch. Hold ye there both,

These terms are noble.

Alph. Ye shall hear shortly from me.

Zanch. Now discreetly.

Alph. Assure your self ye shall: do ye see this sword sir?
He has not cast his teeth yet.

Zanch. Rarely carried.

Alph. He bites deep: most times mortal: Signior
I'll hound him at the fair and home.

Zanch. Still nobly.

Alph. And at all those that dare maintain ye.

Zanch. Excellent.

Leo. How you shall please sir, so it be fair, though certain,
I had rather give you reason.

Zanch. Fairly urg'd too.

Alph. This is no age for reason; prick your reason
Upon your swords point.

Zanch. Admirably follow'd.

Alph. And there I'll hear it: so till I please, live Sir. Exit.

Leo. And so farewell, you're welcome.

Zanch. The end crowns all things

Signior, some little business past, this cause I'll argue

And be a peace between ye, if't so please ye,

And by the square of honor to the utmost:

I feel the old man's master'd by much passion,

And too high rackt, which makes him overshoot all

His valour should direct at, and hurt those

That stand but by as blenchers: this he must know too,

As necessary to his judgement, doting women

Are neither safe nor wise adventurers: conceive me,

If once their will have wander'd; nor is't then

A time to use our rages: for why should I

Bite at the stone, when he that throws it wrongs me?

Do not we know that Women are most woers

Though closest in their carriage? Do not all men know,

Scarce all the compass of the Globe can hold 'em

If their affections be afoot? shall I then cover

The follies of a she-fool, that by nature

Must seek her like, by reason, be a woman,

Sink a tall ship, because the sails desie me?

No, I disdain that folly; he that ventures

Whilst they are fit to put him on, has found out

The everlasting motion in his scabbard.

I doubt not to make peace: and so for this time

My best love, and remembrance.

Leo. Your poor Servant.

Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Diego, Philippo, and Theodofia.

Phil. Where will our Horses meet us?

K 2

Die.

Diego. Fear not you Sir,
Some half mile hence my worships man will stay us,
How is it with my young bloods? come, be jovial,
Let's travel like a merry flock of wild Geese,
Every tongue talking.

Phil. We are very merry;
But do you know this way, Sir?

Theo. Is't not dangerous?
Methinks these woody thickets should harbor knaves.

Die. I fear none but fair wenches; those are thieves,
May quickly rob me of my good conditions,
If they cry Stand once: but the best is Signiors
They cannot bind my hands: for any else,
They meet an equal knave, and there's my Passport:
I have seen fine sport in this place: had these three tongues,
They would tell ye pretty matters: do not you fear, though — they are not every daies delights.

Phil. What sport Sir?

Die. Why to say true, the sport of all sports.

Phil. What was't?

Die. Such turning up of Taffataes; and you know
To what rare whistling tunes they go, far beyond
A soft wind in the shrowds: such stand there,
And down i'th' other place; such supplications
And subdivisions for those toys their honors,
One, as ye are a Gentleman in this bush,
And oh sweet Sir, what mean ye? there's a bracelet,
And use me I beseech ye like a woman;
And her petition's heard: another scratches,
And cries she will die first, and then swoonds: but certain
She is brought to life again, and does well after.
Another, save mine honor, oh mine honor,
My Husband serves the Duke, Sir, in his kitchen;
I have a cold pie for ye; fie, fie, fie Gentlemen,
Will nothing satisfy, where's my Husband?
Another cries, do ye see Sir how they use me,
Is there no Law for these things?

Theo. And good mine Host,
Do you call these fine sports?

Die. What should I call 'em,
They have been so call'd these thousand years and upwards.

Phil. But what becomes o'th' men?

Die. They're stript and bound,
Like so many Adams, with fig-leaves afore 'em,
And there's their innocence.

Theo. Would we had known this?
Before we reacht this place.

Phil. Come, there's no danger,
These are but sometimes chances.

Enter Bailiff.

Host. Now we must through.

Theo. Who's that?

Host. Stand to it Signiors.

Phil. No it needs not,
I know the face; 'tis honest.

Bayl. What mine Host:
Mine everlasting honest Host.

Host. Mafs Baily:
Now in the name of an ill reckoning
What make you walking this round?

Bayl. A—— of this round,
And of all business too, through woods, and rascals,
They have rounded me away a dozen Duckets,
Besides a fair round Cloak: Some of 'em knew me,
Else they had cas'd me like a Cunnie too,
As they have done the rest, and I think roasted me,
For they began to baste me soundly: my young Signiors,
You may thank heaven, and heartily, and hourly,
You set not out so early; ye had been smoak'd else
By this true hand he had Sirs, finely smoak'd,
Had ye been Women, smockt too.

Theo. Heaven defend us.

Bayl. Nay, that had been no prayer, there were those
That run that prayer out of breath, yet fail'd too.
There was a Fryer, now ye talk of prayer,
With a huge bunch of Beads, like a rope of Onions:
I am sure as big, that out of fear and prayer,
In halfe an hour, wore 'em as small as Bugles,
Yet he was flead too.

Phil. At what hour was this?

Bayl. Some two hours since.

Theo. Do you think the passage sure now.

Bayl. Yes, a rope take 'em, as it will, and bless 'em,
They have done for this day sure.

Phil. Are many rifled?

Bayl. At the least a dozen,
And there left bound.

Theo. How came you free?

Bayl. A curtesie

They use out of their rogueships, to bequeath
To one, that when they give a sign from far
Which is from out of danger; he may presently
Release the rest, as I met you, I was going,
Having the sign from yonder hill to do it.

Theo. Alas poor men.

Phil. Mine Host, pray go untie 'em.

Die. Let me alone for cancelling: where are they?

Bayl. In every bush, like black birds, you cannot miss 'em.

Die. I need not stalk unto 'em,

Exit.

Bayl. No, they'll stand ye,

My busie life for yours Sir: you would wonder
To see the several tricks and strange behaviours
Of the poor rascals in their miseries,
One weeps, another laughs at him for weeping,
A third is monstrous angry, he can laugh
And cries, go too, this is no time; he laughs still,
A fourth exhorts to patience: him a fifth man
Curses for tameness; him a Fryer schools,
All hoot the Fryer, here one sings a Ballad,
And there a little Curate confutes him,
And in this linsley-woolsey way, that would make a dog
Forget his dinner, or an old man fire,
They rub out for their ransoms: Amongst the rest,
There is a little boy rob'd, a fine child,
It seems a Page: I must confess my pitty
(As tis a hard thing in a man of my place)
To shew compassion, stirr'd at him, so finely
And without noise he carries his afflictions,
And looks as if he had but dreamt of losing.

Enter Host and Leocadia, and others as rob'd.

This boy's the glory of this robbery,
The rest but shame the action: now ye may hear 'em,
Host. Come lads, 'tis Holy-day: hang cloaths, 'tis hot,
And sweating Agues are abroad.

1, It seems so;

For we have met with rare Physicians
To cure us of that malady.

Host. Fine footing,

Light and deliver: now my boys: Master Fryer,
How does your Holiness, bear up man; what
A cup of neat Sack now and a toast: ha, Fryer,
A warm plaister to your belly Father,
There were a blessing now.

Fryer. Ye say your mind Sir.

Host. Where my fine Boy: my poynter.

Bayl. There's the wonder.

Host. A rank whore scratch their sides till the pox follow
For robbing thee, thou hast a thousand ways
To rob thy self boy, Dice, and a Chamber-Devil.

Leo. Ye are deceiv'd Sir.

Host. And thy Master too boy.

Phil. A sweet-fac'd boy indeed: what rogues were these?
What barbarous, brutish slaves to strip this beauty?

Theo. Come hither my boy: alas! he's cold, mine Host,

We

We must intreat your Cloak.
Host. Can ye intreat it.
Phil. We do presume so much, you have other garments.
Host. Will you intreat those too?
Theo. Your Mule must too,
 To the next Town, you say 'tis near: in pitty
 You cannot see this poor Boy perish.
 I know ye have a better soul, we'll satisfie ye.
Host. 'Tis a strange foolish trick I have, but I cannot help it,
 I am ever cozen'd with mine own commendations;
 It is determin'd then I shall be robb'd too.
 To make up vantage to this dozen: here Sir,
 Heaven has provided ye a simple garment
 To set ye off: pray keep it handfomer
 Than you kept your own; and let me have it render'd,
 Brush'd and discreetly folded.
Leo. I thank ye Sir.
Host. Who wants a Doublet?
 2. I.
Host. Where will you have it?
 2. From you Sir, if you please.
Host. Oh, there's the point, Sir.
Phil. My honest friends, I am sorry for your fortunes,
 But that's but poor relief: here are ten Duckets,
 And to your distribution, holy Sir,
 I render 'em: and let it be your care
 To see 'em, as your wants are, well divided.
Host. Plain dealing now my friends: and Father Fryer,
 Set me the Sadle right; no wringing Fryer,
 Norkthing to the Church, these are no duties;
 Scour me your conscience, if the Devil tempt ye
 Off with our cord, and swinge him.
Fry. Ye say well Sir.
All. Heaven keep your goodnes.
Theo. Peace keep you, farewell friends.
Host. Farewel light-Horse-men. Ex. the rob'd.
Phil. Which way travel you Sir.
Bayl. To the next Town.
Theo. Do you want any thing.
Bail. Only discretion to travel at good hours,
 And some warm meat to moderate this matter,
 For I am most outrageous cruel hungry.
Host. I have a stomach too such as it is.
 Would pose a right good pasty, I thank heaven for't.
Bayl. Cheese, that would break the teeth of a new handsaw,
 I could endure now like an Oastrich, or salt beef,
 That Cesar left in pickel.
Phil. Take no care,
 We'll have meat for you, and enough: I th' mean time
 Keep you the horse way, lest the fellow mis us,
 We'll meet ye at the end o' th' wood.
Host. Make haste then. Ex. Host and Bayl.
Theo. My pretty Sir till your necessities
 Be full supplied, so please you trust our friendships,
 We must not part.
Leo. Ye have pull'd a charge upon ye,
 Yet such a one as ever shall be thankful.
Phil. Ye have said enough, may I be bold to ask ye,
 What Province you were bred in? and of what Parents?
Leo. Ye may Sir: I was born in Andaluzia,
 My name Francisco, son to Don Henriques
De Cardinas.
Theo. Our noble neighbor.
Phil. Son to Don Henriques?
 I know the Gentleman: and by your leave Sir,
 I know he has no son.
Leo. None of his own Sir,
 Which makes him put that right upon his Brother
 Don Zanchio's childrne: one of which I am,
 And therefore do not much err.
Phil. Still ye do Sir,
 For neither has Don Zanchio any son;
 A Daughter, and a rare one is his heir,

Which though I uever was so blest to see,
 Yet I have heard great good of.
Theo. Urge no further,
 He is ashamed, and blushes.
Phil. Sir,
 If it might import you to conceal your self,
 I ask your mercy, I have been so curious:
Leo. Alas! I must ask yours Sir: for these lies,
 Yet they were useful ones; for by the claiming
 Such noble parents, I believ'd your bounties
 Would shew more gracious: The plain truth is Gentlemen,
 I am Don Zanchio's Stewards son, a wild boy,
 That for the fruits of his unhappines,
 Is fain to seek the wars.
Theo. This is a lie too.
 If I have any ears.
Phil. Why?
Theo. Mark his language,
 And ye shall find it of too sweet a relish
 For one of such a breed: I'll pawn my hand,
 This is no boy.
Phil. No boy? what would you have him?
Theo. I know no boy: I watch how fearfully,
 And yet how suddainly he cur'd his lies,
 The right wit of a Woman: Now I am sure.
Phil. What are ye sure?
Theo. That 'tis no boy: I'll burn in't.
Phil. Now I consider better, and take council,
 Methinks he shows more sweetness in that face,
 Than his fears dare deliver.
Theo. No more talk on't,
 There hangs some great weight by it: soon at night
 I'll tell ye more.
Phil. Come Sir, what e'r you are
 With us, embrace your liberty, and our helps
 In any need you have.
Leo. All my poor service
 Shall be at your commaund Sir, and my prayers.
Phil. Let's walk apace; hunger will cut their throats else.
Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

*Enter Rodorigo, Markantonio, and a Ship-master,
 two Chairs set out.*

Rod. Call up the Master.
Mastr. Here Sir.
Rod. Honest Master,
 Give order all the Gallies with this tyde
 Fall round, and near upon us; that the next wind
 We may weigh off together, and recover
 The Port of Bareelona, without parting.
Mastr. Your pleasure's done Sir. Ex.
Rod. Signior Markantonio,
 Till meat be ready, let's sit here and prepare
 Our stomachs with discourfes.
Mar. What you please Sir.
Rod. Pray ye answer me to this doubt.
Marc. If I can Sir.
Rod. Why should such plants as you are, pleasure children,
 That owe their blushing years to gentle objects,
 Tenderly bred, and brought up in all fulness,
 Desire the stubborn wars?
Marc. In those 'tis wonder,
 That make their ease their god, and not their honor:
 But noble General my end is other,
 Desire of knowledge Sir, and hope of tying
 Discretion to my time, which only shews me,
 And not my years, a man, and makes that more.
 Which we call handsome, the rest is but Boys beauty,
 And with the Boy consum'd.
Rod. Ye argue well Sir.

Mar. Nor do I wear my youth, as they wear breeches,
For object, but for use: my strength for danger,
Which is the liberal part of man, not dalliance,
The wars must be my Mistress Sir,

Rod. Oh Signior,
You'll find her a rough wench.

Mar. When she is won once,
She'll show the sweeter Sir.

Rod. You can be pleas'd, though
Sometimes to, take a tamer?

Mar. 'Tis a truth Sir,
So she be handsome, and not ill condition'd.

Rod. A Soldier should not be so curious.

Marc. I can make shift with any for a heat Sir.

Rod. Nay, there you wrong your youth too: and however
You are pleas'd to appear to me, which shows well Signior,
A tougher soul than your few years can testify:
Yet, my young Sir, out of mine own experience.
When my spring was, I am able to confute ye,
And say, y' had rather come to th' shock of eies,
And boldly march up to your Mistress mouth,
Then to the Cannons.

Mar. That's as their lading is Sir.

Rod. There be Trenches
Fitter and warmer for your years, and safer
Than where the bullet plaies.

Mar. Ther's it I doubt Sir.

Rod. You'll easily find that faith: But come, be liberal,
What kind of Woman, could you make best wars with

Mar. They are all but heavy marches.

Rod. Fie Marcantonio,
Beauty in no more reverence?

Mar. In the Sex Sir,
I honor it, and next to honor, love it,
For there is only beauty; and that sweetness.
That was first meant for modesty: sever it
And put it in one woman, it appears not,
'Tis of too rare a nature, she too gross
To mingle with it.

Rod. This is a meer heresie.

Marc. Which makes 'em ever mending; for that gloss
That cozens us for beauty, is but bravery,
An outward shew of things well set, no more:
For heavenly beauty, is as heaven it self Sir,
Too excellent for object, and what is seen
Is but the veil then, airy clouds; grant this
It may be seen, 'tis but like stars in twinklings.

Rod. 'Twas no small study in their Libraries
Brought you to this experience: But what think ye
Of that fair red and white, which we call Beauty?

Mar. Why? 'tis our creature Sir, we give it 'em,
Peccause we like those colours, else 'tis certain
A blew face with a motley nose would do it;
And be as great a beauty, so we lov'd it;
That we cannot give, which is only beauty,
Is a fair Mind.

Rod. By this rule, all our choices
Are to no ends.

Marc. Except the dull end, Doing.

Rod. Then all to you seem equal?

Mar. Very true Sir,
And that makes equal dealing: I love any
That's worth love.

Rod. How long love ye Signior?

Marc. Till I have other business.

Rod. Do you never
Love stedfastly one woman?

Mar. 'Tis a toil Sir
Like riding in one rode perpetually,
It offers no variety.

Rod. Right youth,
He must needs make a Soldier; nor do you think
One Woman, can love one man?

Mar. Yes, that may be.

Though it appear not often; they are things ignorant,
And therefore apted to that superstition
Of doting fondness; yet of late years Signior,
That worlds well mended with 'em, fewer are found now
That love at length, and to the right mark, all
Stir now as as the time stirs; fame and fashion
Are ends they aim at now, and to make that love
That wiser ages held ambition;
They that cannot reach this may love by Index;
By every days surveying who best promises,
Who has done best, who may do, and who mended
May come to do again: who appear nearest Either in new stamp'd clothes, or courtesies, (things
Done but from hand to mouth neither; nor love they these
Longer than new are making, nor that succession
Beyond the next fair feather: Take the City,
There they go to't by gold weight, no gain from 'em
All they can work by fire and water to 'em,
Profit is all they point at, if there be love
'Tis shew'd ye by so dark a light, to bear out
The bracks and old frains in it, that ye may purchase
French Velvet better cheap, all loves are endless.

Rod. Faith, if you have a Mistress, would she heard you.

Mar. 'T were but the vent'ring of my place, or swearing
I meant it but for argument, as Schoolmen
Dispute high questions.

Rod. What a world is this

When young men dare determine what those are Age and the best experience ne'r could aim at. (bigger

Marc. They were thick ey'd then Sir; now the print is
And they may read their fortunes without spectacles,

Rod. Did you ne'r love?

Mar. Faith yes, once after supper,

And the fit held till midnight.

Rod. Hot, or shaking.

Mar. To say true, both.

Rod. How did ye rid it?

Mar. Thus Sir,

I laid my hand upon my heart, and blest me
And then said over certain charms I had learn'd
Against mad dogs, for love and they are all one;
Last thought upon a windmill, and so slept,
And was well ever after.

Rod. A rare Physitian,
What would your practise gain ye?

Mar. The wars ended,
I mean to use my Art, and have these fools
Cut in the head like Cats, to save the kingdom;
Another Inquisition.

Rod. So old a Soldier
Out of the wars, I never knew yet practised.

Mar. I shall mend every day; but noble General,
Believe this, but as this you nam'd. discourses,

Rod. Oh ye are a cunning Gamester.

Mar. Mirths and toys

To cosin time withal, for o' my troth Sir,
I can love; I think, well too; well enough
And think as well of women as they are,
Pretty fantastick things, some more regardful,
And some few worth a service: I am so honest,
I wish 'em all in heaven, and you know how hard Sir
'Twill be to get in there with their great farthingals.

Rod. Well Marcantonio, I would not loose thy company
For the best Galley I command.

Mar. Faith General,
If these discourses please ye, I shall fit ye
Once every day.

Rod. Thou canst not please me better: hark, they call
Below to dinner: ye are my Cabbin guest,
My bosom's, so you please Sir.

Marc. Your poor Servant.

Knock within.

Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter second Host, and his Wife.

Host. Let 'em have meat enough Woman, half a Hen;
There be old rotten Pilchards, put 'em off too,
'Tis but a little new anointing of 'em.

And a strong onion, that confounds the stink.

Host. They call for more Sir.

Host. Knock a dozen eggs down,

But then beware your wench.

Host. More than this too?

Host. Worts, worts, and make 'em porridge: pop 'em up
But they shall pay for Cullyses.

Host. All this is nothing;

They call for Kid and Partridge.

Host. Well remembered,

Where's the Faulconers half dog he left?

Host. It stinks Sir,

Past all hope that way.

Host. Run it o'r with Garlick,

And make a Roman dish on't.

Host. Pray ye be patient,

And get provision in; these are fine gentlemen,

And liberal gentlemen; they have unde quare

No mangey Mulcters, nor pinching Posts.

That feed upon the parings of Musk-millions

And Radishes, as big and tough as Rasters:

Will ye be stirring in this business? here's your brother,

Mine old Host of Ossana, as wise as you are,

That is, as knavish; if ye put a trick,

Take heed he do not find it.

Host. I'll be wagging.

Host. 'Tis for your own commodity: why wench:

Anon forsooth.

Hostess. Who makes a fire there? and who gets in water? within.

Let Oliver goe to the Justice, and beseech his Worship

We may have two spits going; and do you hear Druce,

Let him invite his Worship, and his Wives Worship,

To the left-Meat to morrow.

Enter Bayliff.

Bayl. Where's this Kitchen?

Hostess. Even at the next door Signior: what old Don?

We meet but seldom.

Bayl. Prethee be patient Hostess,

And tell me where the meat is.

Host. Faith Master Baylie,

How have ye done? and how man?

Bayl. Good sweet Hostess,

What shall we have to dinner?

Hostess. How does your woman,

And a fine Woman she is, and a good Woman;

Lord, how you bear your years?

Bayl. Is't Veal or Mutton,

Beef, Bacon, Pork, Kid, Pheasant, or all these,

And are they ready all?

Host. The hours that have been

Between us two, the merry hours: Lord!

Bayl. Hostess,

Dear Hostess do but hear; I am hungry.

Hostess. Ye are merrily dispos'd Sir,

Bayl. Monstrous hungry,

And hungry after much meat, I have brought hither

Right worshipful to pay the reckoning,

Money enough too with 'em, desire enough

To have the best meat, and of that enough too:

Come to the point sweet wench, and so I kiss thee.

Hostess. Ye shall have any thing, and instantly

E'r you can lick your ears, Sir.

Bayl. Portly meat,

Bearing substantial stuff, and fit for hunger

I do beseech ye Hostess first, then some light garnish,

Two Pheasants in a dish, if ye have Leverits,
Rather for way of ornament, than appetite
They may be look'd upon, or Larks: for Fish,
As there is no great need, so I would not wish ye
To serve above four dishes, but those full ones;
Ye have no Cheefe of Parma?

Hostess. Very old Sir.

Bayl. The less will serve us, some ten pound,

Hostess. Alas Sir,

We have not halfe these dainties.

Bayl. Peace good Hostess,

And make us hope ye have.

Hostess. Ye shall have all Sir,

Bayl. That may be got for money.

Enter Diego, the Host, and a Boy.

Host. Diego, Where's your Master?

Bring me your Master, Boy: I must have liquor

Fit for the Mermydons; no dashing now child

No conjurings by candle light, I know all;

Strike me the oldest Sack, a piece that carries

Point blank to this place boy, and batters; Hostess,

I kiss thy hands through which many a round reckoning

And things of moment have had motion.

Hostess. Still mine old Brother.

Host. Die. Set thy Seller open,

For I must enter, and advance my Colours,

I have brought three Dons indeed wench, Dons with Duckets

And those Dons must have dainty Wine, pure Bacchus

That bleeds the life blood: what is your cure ended?

Bayl. We shall have Meat man,

Host. Die. Then we will have Wine man,

And Wine upon Wine, cut and drawn with Wine.

Hostess. Ye shall have all, and more than all.

Bayl. All, well then.

Host. Die. Away, about your business, you with her

For old acquaintance sake, to stay your stomach. Exit Ho-

And Boy, be you my guide, ad inferos,

For I will make a full descent in equipage.

Boy. I'll shew you rare Wine.

Host. Die. Stinging geer.

Boy. Divine Sir.

Host. Die. O divine boy, march, march my child, rare Wine (boy.

Boy. As any is in Spain Sir.

Host. Die. Old; and strong too,

Oh my fine boy, clear too?

Boy. As Christal Sir, and strong as truth.

Host. Die. Away boy,

I am enamor'd, and I long for Dalliance,

Stay no where child, not for thy fathers blessing,

I charge thee not to save thy Sisters honor,

Nor to close thy Dames eies, were she a dying

Till we arrive, and for thy recompence

I will remember thee in my Will.

Boy. Ye have said Sir,

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Philippo, and 2 Host.

Phi. Mine Host, is that Apparel got ye spoke of?

Ye shall have ready money.

2 Host. 'Tis come in, Sir, he has it on Sir

And I think 'twill be fit, and o' my credit

'Twas never worn but once Sir, and for necessity

Pawn'd to the man I told ye of.

Phi. Pray bargain for it,

And I will be the pay-master.

2 Host. I will Sir.

Phi.

Pbi. And let our meat be ready when you please,
I mean as soon.

2 Hof. It shall be presently.

Pbi. How far stands Barcelona?

2 Hof. But two Leagues off Sir,
You may be there by three a clock.

Pbi. I am glad on't.

[Exeunt.]

Scena Secunda.

Enter Theodosia, and Leocadia.

Theo. Signior Francisco, why I draw you hither
To this remote place, marvel not, for trust me
My innocence yet never knew ill dealing,
And as ye have a noble temper, start not
Into offence, at any thing my knowledge,
And for your special good, would be inform'd of,
Nor think me vainly curious.

Leo. Worthy Sir,

The courtesies you and your noble Brother,
Even then when few men find the way to do 'em,
I mean in want, so freely show'd upon me,
So truly, and so timely minister'd,
Must, if I should, suspect those minds that made 'em,
Either proclaim me an unworthy taker,
Or worse, a base beleever; Speak your mind Sir
Freely, and what you please, I am your Servant

Theo. Then my young Sir know, since our first acquaintance
Induc'd by circumstances that deceive not
To clear some doubts I have; nay blush not Signior,
I have beheld ye narrowly: more blushes.

Sir, ye give me so much light, I find ye
A thing confess'd already: yet more blushes?
You would ill cover an offence might sink ye
That cannot hide your self; why do ye shake so?
I mean no trouble to ye; this fair hand
Was never made for hardness, nor those eies
(Come do not hide 'em,) for rough objects, harke ye,
Ye have betraid your self, that sigh confirms me;
Another? and a third too? then I see
These boys cloths do but pinch ye, come, be liberal,
Ye have found a friend that has found you, disguise not
That loaden soul that labors to be open:
Now you must weep, I know it, for I see
Your eies down laden to the lids, another
Manifest token that my doubts are perfect;
Yet I have found a greater; tell me this
Why were these holes left open, there was an error,
A foul one my Francisco, have I caught ye?
Oh pretty Sir, the custom of our Countrey
Allows men none in this place: Now the show'r comes.

Leo. Oh Signior Theodoro.

Theo. This sorrow shows so sweetly
I cannot choose but keep it company:
Take truce and speak Sir: and I charge your goodness
By all those perfect hopes that point at virtue
By that remembrance these fair tears are shed for,
If any sad misfortune have thus form'd ye,
That either care or counsel may redeem,
Pain, purse, or any thing within the power
And honor of free gentlemen, reveal it,
And have our labors.

Leo. I have found ye noble

And ye shall find me true; your doubts are certain,
Nor dare I more dissemble; I am a woman,
The great example of a wretched woman.
Here you must give me leave to shew my sex;
And now to make ye know how much your credit
Has won upon my soul, so it please your patience,
I'll tell you my unfortunate sad story.

Theo. Sit down and say on Lady:

Leo. I am born Sir

Of good and honest parents, rich, and noble,
And not to lie, the Daughter of Don Zanchio,

If my unhappy fortune have not lost me:
My name call'd Leocadia, even the same
Your worthy brother did the special honor
To name for beautiful; and without pride
I have been often made believe so Signior;
But that's impertinent: Now to my sorrows;
Not far from us a Gentleman of worth,
A neighbor and a noble visitor,
Had his abode; who often met my Father
In gentle sports of Chase, and River-Hawking
In Course and Riding; and with him often brought
A Son of his, a young and hopeful Gentleman,
Nobly train'd up, in years fit for affection,
A sprightly man, of understanding excellent,
Of speech and civil 'haviour, no less powerful;
And of all parts, else my cies lied, abundant:
We grew acquainted, and from that acquaintance
Nearer into affection; from affection
Into belief.

Theo. Well.

Leo. Then we durst kiss.

Theo. Go forward.

Leo. But oh, man, unconstant, careless man,
Oh subtle man, how many are thy mischiefs;
Oh Mark-antonio, I may curse those kisses.

Theo. What did you call him Lady?

Leo. Mark-antonio

The name to me of misery.

Theo. Pray foreward.

Leo. From these we bred desires sir; but lose me heaven
If mine were lustful.

Theo. I believe.

Leo. This nearness

Made him importunate; When to save mine honor
Love having full possession of my powers,
I got a Contract from him.

Theo. Sealed?

Leo. And sworn too;

Which since, for some offence heaven laid upon me,
I lost among my monies in the robbery,
The loss that makes me poorest: this won from him
Fool that I was; and too too credulous,
I pointed him a by-way to my chamber
The next night at an hour.

Theo. Pray stay there Lady;

And when the night came, came he, kept he touch with ye?
Be not so shamefac'd; had ye both your wishes?
Tell me, and tell me true, did he enjoy ye,
Were ye in one anothers arms abed? the Contract
Confirm'd in full joys there? did he lie with ye?
Answer to that; ha? did your father know this,
The good old man, or kindred privy to't?
And had ye their consents? did that nights promise
Make ye a Mother?

Leo. Why do you ask so nearly?

Good Sir, do's it concern you any thing?

Theo. No Lady.

Only the pitty why you should be used so
A little stirs me, but did he keep his promise?

Leo. No, no Signior,

Alas he never came, nor never meant it,
My Love was fool'd, time numbred to no end,
My expectation flouted, and ghesse you Sir,
What dor unto a doating Maid this was,
What, a base breaking off?

Theo. All's well then Lady;

Go forward in your Story.

Leo. Not only fail'd Sir

Which is a curse in Love, and may he find it
When his affections are full-wing'd, and ready
To stoop upon the quarry, then when all
His full hopes are in's arms: not only thus Sir
But more injurious, faithless, treacherous,
Within two daies fame gave him far remov'd

With a new love, which much against my conscience
 But more against my cause, which is my hell
 I must confess a fair one, a right fair one,
 Indeed of admirable sweetness, Daughter
 Unto another of our noble neighbors
 The thief call'd Theodosia; whose perfections
 I am bound to ban for ever, curse to wrinkles,
 As heaven I hope will make 'em soon; and aches;
 For they have rob'd me poor unhappy wench
 Of all, of all Sir, all that was my glory
 And left me nothing but these tears, and travel:
 Upon this certain news, I quit my Father
 And if you be not milder in construction
 I fear mine honour too: and like a Page
 Stole to Ossuna, from that place to Sivil,
 From thence to Barcelona I was travelling
 When you o'er-took my misery, in hope to hear of Gallies bound up for Italy; for never
 Will I leave off the search of this bad man
 This filcher of affections, this love-Pedler,
 Nor shall my curses cease to blast her beauties
 And make her name as wrangling as her nature
 Till standing face to face before their lusts
 I call heavens justice down.

Theo. This shows too angry
 Nor can it be her fault she is belov'd,
 If I give meat, must they that eat it surfeit?

Leoc. She loves again Sir, there's the mischief of it
 And in despite of me to drown my blessings
 Which she shall dearly know.

Theo. Ye are too violent.

Leoc. She has Devils in her eyes, to whose devotion
 He offers all his service.

Theo. Who can say
 But she may be forsaken too? he that once wanders
 From such a perfect sweetness, as you promise
 Has he not still the same rule to deceive?

Leoc. No, no they are together, love together
 Past all deceit of that side; sleep together,
 Live, and delight together, and such deceit
 Give me in a wild desert.

Theo. By your leave Lady
 I see no honour in this cunning.

Leoc. Honour?
 True, none of her part, honour, she deserves none,
 'Tis ceas'd with wandring Ladies such as she is,
 So bold and impudent.

Theo. I could be angry
 Extremely angry now beyond my nature
 And 'twere not for my pitty: what a man
 Is this to do these wrongs: believe me Lady
 I know the maid, and know she is not with him.

Leoc. I would you knew she were in heaven.

Theo. And so well know her
 That I think you are cozen'd.

Leoc. So I say Sir.

Theo. I mean in her behaviour
 For trust my faith so much I dare adventure for her credit
 She never yet delighted to do wrong.

Leoc. How can she then delight in him? dare she think?
 Be what she will, as excellent as Angels
 My love so fond, my wishes so indulgent
 That I must take her prewnings; stop at that
 She has tyr'd upon; No Sir, I hold my beauty
 Wash but these sorrows from it, of a sparkle
 As right and rich as hers, my means as equal,
 My youth as much unblown; and for our worths
 And weight of virtue

Theo. Do not task her so far.

Leoc. By heaven she is cork, and clouds, light, light Sir, vapor
 But I shall find her out, with all her witchcrafts,
 Her paintings, and her pownings: for 'tis art
 And only art preserves her, and meer spels
 That work upon his powers; let her but shew me

A ruin'd cheek like mine, that holds his colour
 And writes but sixteen years in spite of sorrows
 An unbathed body, smiles, that give but shaddows,
 And wrinkle not the face; besides she is little,
 A demy dame, that makes no object.

Theo. Nay.

Then I must say you err; for credit me
 I think she is taller than your self.

Leoc. Why let her
 It is not that shall mate me; I but ask
 My hands may reach unto her.

Theo. Gentle Lady
 'Tis now ill time of farther argument,
 For I perceive your anger voyd of counsel,
 Which I could wish more temperate.

Leoc. Pray forgive me
 If I have spoken uncivilly: they that look on
 See more than we that play: and I beseech ye
 Impute it loves offence, not mine; whose torments,
 If you have ever lov'd, and found my crosses
 You must confess are seldom ty'd to patience,
 Yet I could wish I had said less.

Theo. No harm then;
 Ye have made a full amends; our company
 You may command, so please you in your travels
 With all our faith and furtherance; let it be so.

Leoc. Ye make too great an offer.

Theo. Then it shall be
 Go in and rest your self, our wholesome dyet
 Will be made ready straight: But heark ye Lady
 One thing I must entreat, your leave, and sufferance
 That these things may be open to my Brother
 For more respect and honor.

Leoc. Do your pleasure.

Theo. And do not change this habit by no means
 Unless ye change your self.

Leoc. Which must not yet be.

Theo. It carries ye concealed and safe.

Leoc. I am counsell'd.

Exit.

Enter Philipo.

Phil. What's done?

Theo. Why all we doubted; 'tis a woman,
 And of a noble strain too, ghefs.

Phil. I cannot.

Theo. You have heard often of her.

Phil. Stay I think not.

Theo. Indeed ye have; 'tis the fair Leocadia
 Daughter unto Don Zanbio, our noble neighbor.

Phil. Nay?

Theo. 'Tis she Sir, o'my credit.

Phil. Leocadia,
 Pish Leocadia, it must not be.

Theo. It must be, or be nothing.

Phil. Pray give me leave to wonder, Leocadia?

Theo. The very fame.

Phil. The Damsel Leocadia
 I ghest it was a woman, and a fair one
 I see it through her shape, transparent plain
 But that it should be she; tell me directly.

Theo. By heavens 'tis she.

Phil. By heaven then 'tis a sweet one.

Theo. That's granted too.

Phil. But heark ye, heark ye Sister,
 How came she thus disguis'd?

Theo. I'll tell you that too

As I came on the self-same ground, so us'd too.

Phil. By the same man?

Theo. The same too.

Phil. As I live
 You lovers have fine fancies,
 Wonderous fine ones.

Theo. Pray heaven you never make one.

L

Phil.

Phil. Faith I know not,
But in that mind I am, I had rather cobble,
'Tis a more Christian Trade; pray tell me one thing
Are not you two now monstrous jealous
Of one another?

Theo. She is much of me
And has ray'd at me most unmercifully
And to my face, and o'my conscience
Had she but known me, either she or I
Or both, had parted with strange faces
She was in such a fury.

Phil. Leocadia?
Do's she speak handsomly?

Theo. Wondrous well Sir
And all she do's becomes her, even her anger.

Phil. How seem'd she when you found her?

Theo. Had you seen
How sweetly fearful her pretty self
Betray'd her self, how neat her sorrow show'd,
And in what handsome phrase she put her story,
And as occasion stirr'd her how she started
Though roughly, yet most aptly into anger
You would have wonder'd.

Phil. Do's she know ye?

Theo. No,
Nor must not by no means.

Phil. How stands your difference?

Theo. I'll tell ye that some fitter time, but trust me
My Marc-antonio has too much to answer.

Phil. May I take knowledge of her?

Theo. Yes she is willing.

Phil. Pray use her as she is, with all respects then,
For she is a woman of a noble breeding.

Theo. Ye shall not find me wanting.

Phil. Which way bears she?

Theo. Our way, and to our end.

Phil. I am glad on't; hark ye,
She keeps her shape?

Enter Leocadia.

Theo. Yes, and I think by this time
Has mew'd her old.

Phil. She is here: by heaven a rare one,
An admirable sweet one, what an eye
Of what a full command she bears, how gracious.
All her aspect shows; bless me from a fever
I am not well o'th suddain.

Leoc. Noble friends
Your meat and all my service waits upon ye.

Phil. Ye teach us manners Lady; all which service
Must now be mine to you, and all too poor too;
Blush not, we know ye, for by all our faiths
With us your honor is in sanctuary
And ever shall be.

Leoc. I do well believe it,
Will ye walk nearer Sir.

Exit.

Theo. She shows still fairer,
Yonger in every change, and clearer, neater;
I know not, I may fool my self, and finely
Nourish a wolfe to eat my heart out; Certain
As she appears now, she appears a wonder,
A thing amazes me; what would she do then
In womans helps, in ornaments apt for her
And deckings to her delicacy? without all doubt
She would be held a miracle; nor can I think
He has forsaken her: Say what she pleas'd,
I know his curious-eye, or say he had,
Put case he could be so boy-blind and foolish;
Yet still I fear she keeps the Contract with her
Not stoln as she affirms, nor lost by negligence,
She would loose her self first, 'tis her life, and there
All my hopes are dispatch'd; O noble love
That thou couldst be without this jealousie,
Without this passion of the heart, how heavenly
Wouldst thou appear unto us? Come what may come
I'll see the end on't: and since chance has cast her

Naked into my refuge, all I can
She freely shall command, except the man.

Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Leonardo, and Don Pedro.

Leon. Don Pedro do you think assuredly
The Gallies will come round to Barcelona
Within these two days?

Ped. Without doubt.

Leo. And think ye
He will be with 'em certainly?

Ped. He is sir

I saw him at their setting off,

Leo. Must they needs

Touch there for water as you say?

Ped. They must sir

And for fresh meat too. few or none go by it
Beside so great a Fleet must needs want trimming
If they have met with fowl seas, and no harbor
On this side Spain, is able without danger.
To moore 'em, but that haven.

Leo. Are the wars

His only end?

Ped. So he professes.

Leo. Bears he

Any command amongst 'em?

Ped. Good regard

With all; which quickly will prefer him.

Leo. Pray Sir tell me,

And as you are a Gentleman be liberal.

Ped. I will Sir, and most true.

Leo. Who saw ye with him;

Ped. None but things like himself; young Souldiers
And Gentlemen desirous to seek honor.

Leo. Was there no woman there, nor none disguis'd
That might be thought a woman in his language?

Did he not let slip something of suspicion
Touching that wanton way.

Ped. Believe me Sir

I neither saw, nor could suspect that face
That might be doubted womans, yet I am sure
Aboard him I see all that past, and 'tis impossible
Among so many high set bloods there should be
A woman, let her clofe her self within a cockle,
But they would open her, he must not love
Within that place alone, and therefore surely
He would not be so foolish had he any,
To trust her there; for his discourse, 'twas ever
About his business, war, or mirth to make us
Relish a Can of Wine well; when he spoke private
'Twas only the remembrance of his service,
And hope of your good prayers for his health Sir,
And so I gave him to the seas.

Leo. I thank ye,

And now am satisfisd, and to prevent
Suspitions that may nourish dangers Signior,
For I have told you how the mad Alphonso
Chafes like a Stag i'th toyl, and bends his fury
'Gainst all, but his own ignorance; I am determin'd
For peace sake and the preservation
Of my yet untoucht honor, and his cure
My self to seek him there, and bring him back
As testimony of an unfought injury
By either of our actions; That the world,
And he if he have reason, may see plainly
Opinion is no perfect guide; nor all fames
Founders of truths: In the mean time this courtesie
I must intreat of you Sir, Be my self here
And as my self command my family.

Ped. Ye lay too much trust on me.

Leo. 'Tis my love Sir,
I will not be long from ye; if this question

Chance

Chance to be call'd upon ere my return
I leave your care to answer; so Farewell Sir.

Ped. Ye take a wise way; All my best endeavors
Shall labor in your absence; peace go with ye. Exit Lec.
A noble honest Gentleman, free hearted
And of an open faith, much loving, and much loved,
And father of that goodness only malice
Can truly stir against, what dare befall
Till his return I'll answer. Exit Ped.

Enter Alphonso, and Servant.

Alph. Walk off Sirrah,
But keep your self within my call?

Serv. I will Sir.

Alph. And stir my horse for taking cold: within there,
Hoe people; you that dwell there my brave Signior
What are ye all a sleep? is't that time with ye?
I'll ring a little louder.

Enter Pedro.

Ped. Sir who seek ye?

Alph. Not you Sir; Where's your Master?

Ped. I serve no man

In way of pay Sir.

Alph. Where's the man o'th house then?

Ped. What would you have with him Sir?

Alph. Do you stand here Sir

To ask men questions when they come?

Ped. I would sir

Being his friend, and hearing such alarmes
Know how men come to visit him.

Alph. Ye shall Sir,

Pray tell his nightiness here is a Gentleman
By name Alphonso, would intreat his conference
About affairs of State Sir, are ye answer'd?

Enter Sanchio carried.

Ped. I must be Sir,

Sanch. Stay, set me down, stay Signior,
You must stay, and ye shall stay.

Alph. Meaning me Sir?

Sanch. Yes you Sir, you I mean, I mean you.

Alph. Well Sir.

Why should I stay?

Sanch. There's reason.

Alph. Reason Sir?

Sanch. I reason Sir

My wrong is greatest, and I will be served first,
Call out the man of fame?

Alph. How serv'd Sir,

Sanch. Thus sir,

Alph. But not before me.

Sanch. Before all the world sir

As my case stands.

Alph. I have lost a daughter sir.

Sanch. I have lost another worth five score of her sir.

Alph. Ye must not tell me so.

Sanch. I have, and heark ye?

Make it up five score more: Call out the fellow,
And stand you by sir.

Ped. This is the mad morriss.

Alph. And I stand by?

Sanch. I say stand by, and do it.

Alph. Stand by among thy lungs.

Sanch. Tuin presently

And say thy prayers; thou art dead.

Alph. I scorn thee

And scorn to say my prayers more than thou do'st,
Mine is the most wrong, and my daughter dearest
And mine shall first be righted.

Sanch. Shall be righted.

Ped. A third may live I see, pray hear me Gentlemen.

Sanch. Shall be.

Alph. I shall be righted.

Sanch. Now?

Alph. Now.

Sanch. Instantly.

Alph. Before I stir.

Sanch. Before me.

Alph. Before any.

(friends here

Sanch. Dost thou consider what thou say'st? hast thou

Able to quench my anger, or perswade me
After I have beaten thee into one main bruist
And made thee spend thy state in rotten apples,
Thou canst at length be quiet, shall I kill thee
Divide thee like a rotten Pumpkin,
And leave thee stinking to posterity,
There's not the least blow I shall give; but do's this
Urge me no farther: I am first.

Alph. I'll hang first.

No goodman glory, 'tis not your bravado's,
Your punctual honor, nor foldadoship.

Sanch. Set me a little nearer.

Alph. Let him fally.

Sanch. Lin'd with your quircks of carriage and discretion
Can blow me off my purpose. Where's your credit
With all your school points now? your decent arguing
And apt time for performing: where are these toys,
These wise ways, and most honorable courses,
To take revenge? how dar'st thou talk of killing,
Or think of drawing any thing but squirts
When lechery has dry foundrerd thee?

Sanch. Neerer yet,

That I may spit him down: thou look'st like a man.

Ped. I would be thought so Sir.

Sanch. Prethee do but take me,
And fling me upon that Puppy.

Alph. Do for heavens sake,
And see but how I'll hug him,

Sanch. Yet take warning.

Ped. Faith Gentlemen, this is a needless quarrel.

Sanch. And do you desire to make one?

Ped. As a friend Sir,

To tell you all this anger is but lost Sir,
For Leonardo is from home.

Alph. No, no Sir.

Ped. Indeed he is.

Sanch. Where dare he be, but here Sir,
When men are wrong'd, and come for satisfaction.

Ped. It seems he has done none Sir; for his business
Clear of those cares, hath carried him for sometime
To Barcelona: if he had been guilty,
I know he would have stayd, and clear'd all difference
Either by free confession, or his sword.

Sanch. This must not be.

Ped. Sure as I live, it is Sir.

Alph. Sure, as we all live,

He's run away for ever: Barcelona!

Why? 'tis the key for Italy, from whence
He stole first hither.

Sanch. And having found his knaveries
Too gross to be forgiven, and too open,
He has found the same way back again: I believe too
The good graft Gentleman, for his own ease,
Has taken one o'th'Fillyes: Is not his stuff fold.

Alph. I fear his worships shoos too; to escape us,
I do not think he has a dish within doors,
A lonse left of his linnage.

Ped. Ye are too wide Sir.

Alph. Or one poor wooden spoon,

Ped. Come in and see Sir

Alph. I'll see his house on fire first.

Ped. Then be pleased Sir

To give better censure.

Sanch. I will after him,

And search him like conceal'd land, but I'll have him,
And though I find him in his shrift, I'll kill him.

Alph. I'll bear ye company.

Sanct. Pray have a care then,
A most special care, indeed a fear,
Ye do not anger me.

Alph. I will observe ye,
And if I light upon him handfomly.

Sanct. Kill but a piece of him, leave some Alphonso
For your poor Friends.

Ped. I fear him not for all this.

Alph. Shall we first go home,
For it may prove a voyage, and dispose
Of things there; heaven knows what may follow.

Sanct. No,
I'll kill him in this shirt I have on: let things
Govern themselves, I am master of my honor
At this time, and no more; let wife, and land,
Lie lay till I return.

Alph. I say amen to't:
But what care for our monies?

Sanct. I will not spend
Above three shillings, till his head be here,
Four is too great a sum for all his Fortunes.
Come take me up instantly.

Alph. Farewell to you Sir,
And if your friend be in a featherbed,
Sow'd up to shrowd his fears, tell him 'tis folly,
For no course but his voluntary hanging
Can get our pardons.

Ped. These I think would be
Offence enough, if their own indiscretions
Would suffer 'em: two of the old seditious,
When they want enemies, they are their own foes:
Were they a little wiser, I should doubt 'em:
Till when I'll ne'r break sleep, nor suffer hunger
For any harm he shall receive: for 'tis as easie
If he be guilty, to turn these two old men
Upon their own throats, and look on, and live still,
As 'tis to tell five pound: a great deal sooner,
And so I'll to my meat, and then to hawking.

Exeunt.

Exit.

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Markantonio, and a Gentleman.

Marc. Sir, this is complement; I pray you leave me.

Gent. Sir, it is not.

Marc. Why? I would only see the Town.

Gent. And only that I come to shew you.

Marc. Which I can see without you.

Gent. So you may
Plainly, not safely: For such difference
As you have seen betwixt the sea and earth
When waves rise high, and land would beat 'em back
As fearful of Invasion; such we find
When we land here at Barcelona.

Marc. Sir.

Gent. Besides our General of the Gallies, fearing
Your hasty nature, charg'd me not return
Without you safe.

Marc. O Sir, that Roderigo
Is noble, and do's mistake my temper.
There is not in the world, a mind less apt
To conceive wrongs, or do 'em; has he seen me
In all this voyage, in the which he pleases.

Enter Eugenia, with divers Attendants.

To call me friend, let slip a hasty word?
S'light Sir: yonder is a Lady valid,
For properness beyond comparison,
And sure her face is like the rest: we'll see't.

Gent. Why? you are hasty Sir already: know you
What 'tis you go about.

Marc. Yes, I would see
The womans face.

Gent. By heaven you shall not do't:
You do not know the custom of the place:
To draw that curtain here, though she were mean,
Is mortall.

Marc. Is it? earth must come to earth
At last, and by my troth, I'll try it Sir.

Gent. Then I must hold you fast. By all the faith
That can be plac'd in man, 'tis an attempt
More dangerous than death, 'tis death and shame:
I know the Lady well.

Marc. Is she a Lady?
I shall the more desire to see her Sir.

Gent. She is Alonso's wife, the Governor,
A noble Gentleman.

Marc. Then let me go,
If I can win her, you and I will govern
This Town Sir, fear it not, and we will alter
These barbarous customs then; for every Lady
Shall be seen daily, and seen over too.

Gent. Come, do not jest, nor let your passions bear you
To such wild enterprises: hold you still,
For as I have a foul, you shall not do't.

She is a Lady of unblemish'd fame,
And here to offer that affront, were base:
Hold on your way, and we will see the Town,
And overlook the Ladies.

Marc. I am school'd,
And promise you I will: but good Sir, see,
She will pass by us now; I hope I may
Salute her thus far off.

Gent. 'S foot, are you mad?
'Twill be as ill as th'other.

i. Attend. What's the matter?
What would that fellow have?

Gent. Good Sir forbear.

i. Atten. It seems you are new landed: would you beg
Any thing here?

Marc. Yes Sir, all happiness
To that fair Lady, as I hope.

Gent. Markantonio.

Marc. Her face, which needs no hiding: I would beg
A sight of.

Gent. Now go on, for 'tis too late
To keep this from a tumult.

i. Attend. Sirrah, you
Shall see a fitter object for your eyes,
Then a fair Ladies face.

Eug. For heavens sake, raise not
A quarrel in the streets for me.

i. Attend. Slip in then;
This is your door.

Eug. Will you needs quarrel then?
i. Attend. We must, or suffer
This outrage: is't not all your minds Sirs, speak?
All. Yes.

Eug. Then I do beseech ye, let my Lord.

Enter three or four Souldiers.

Not think the quarrel about me; for 'tis not.
Gent. See happily some of our Galley souldiers
Are come ahoar.

i. Attend. Come on Sir, you shall see

Exit.

Faces

Faces enough.

Gent. Some one of you call to.

Enter certain Townsmen.

Our General, the whole rore of the Town
Comes in upon us.

Marc. I have seen Sir better
Perhaps, than that was cover'd; and will yet.

Enter Philippo, Theodosia, and Leocadia.

See that, or spoil yours.

Phil. On, why start you back?

Theo. Alas Sir, they are fighting.

Leoc. Let's begon,

See, see, a handsome man strook down.

Gent. Ho General,

Look out, Antonio is in distress.

Enter Roderigo above.

Theo. Antonio.

Leoc. Antonio! 'tis he.

Rod. within. Ho, Gunner make a shot into the Town,
I'll part you: bring away Antonio a shot.
Into my Cabben. Exit Attendants

Gent. I will do that office. and Townsmen.

I fear it is the last, that I shall do him.

Exit Souldiers and Gentlemen with Marckantonio.

Theo. The last, why will he dye?

Leoc. Since I have found him: happiness leave me,
When I leave him.

Phil. Why Theodosia?

My sister; wake: alas, I griev'd but now
To see the streets so full; and now I grieve
To see them left so empty: I could wish,
Tumult himself were here, that yet at least
Amongst the band, I might espie some face
So pale and fearful, that would willingly
Embrace an arrand for a Cordial,
Or Aquaviva, or a cup of sack,
Or a Physitian: but to talk of these
She breaths: stand up, O Theodosia,
Speak but as thou wert wont, give but a sigh,
Which is but the most unhappy piece of life,
And I will ever after worship sadness,
Apply my self to grief; prepare and build
Altars to sorrow.

Theo. O Philippo, help me.

Phil. I do; these are my arms, Philippo's arms,
Thy Brothers arms that hold thee up.

Theo. You help me

To life: but I would see Antonio
That's dead.

Phil. Thou shalt see any thing; how dost thou?

Theo. Better, I thank you.

Phil. Why that's well: call up

Thy senses, and uncloud thy cover'd spirits.
How now?

Theo. Recover'd: but Antonio,

Where is he?

Phil. We will find him: art thou well?

Theo. Perfectly well, saving the miss of him;
And I do charge you here, by our allyance,
And by the love which would have been betwixt us,
Knew we no kindred; by that killing fear,
Mingled with twenty thousand hopes and doubts,
Which you may think, plac'd in a Lovers heart,
And in a Virgins too, when she wants help,
To grant me your assistance, to find out
This man alive, or dead; and I will pay you
In service, tears, or prayers, a world of wealth:
But other treasure, I have none: alas!

You men have strong hearts; but we feeble maids
Have tender eyes, which only given be
To blind themselves, crying for what they see.

Phil. Why dost thou charge me thus? have I been found

Slow to perform, what I could but imagine
Thy wishes were; have I at any time
Tender'd a business of mine own, beyond
A vanity of thine? have I not been
As if I were a senseless creature, made
To serve thee without pow'r of questioning,
If so, why fear'st thou?

Theo. I am satisfied.

Phil. Come; then let's go: where's Leocadia?

Theo. I know not Sir.

Phil. Where's Leocadia?

Theo. I do not know,

Phil. Leocadia,

This Tumult made the streets as dead as night,
A man may talk as freely: what's become
Of Leocadia? Theo. She's run away.

Phil. Begone, and let us never more behold
Each others face, till we may, both together,
Fasten our eyes on her: accursed be
Those tender cozening names of charity,
And natural affection, they have lost
Me only by observing them, what cost
Travel, and fruitless wishes may in vain.
Search through the world, but never find again.

Theo. Good Sir be patient, I have done no fault
Worthy this banishment.

Phil. Yes Leocadia,

The Lady so distress'd, who was content
To lay her story, and to lay her heart
As open as her story to your self,
Who was content, that I should know her Sex,
Before dissembl'd and to put her self
Into my conduct, whom I undertook
Safely to guard, is in this Tumult lost.

Theo. And can I help it Sir?

Phil. No, would thou couldst,

You might have done, but for that zeald religion
You women bear to swownings, you do pick
Your times to faint when some body is by:
Bound or by nature, or by love, or service
To raise you from that well dissembled death:
Inform me but of one that has been found
Dead in her private chamber by her self,
Where sickness would no more forbear, than here,
And I will quit the rest for her.

Theo. I know not

What they may do, and how they may dissemble;
But by my troth, I did not.

Phil. By my troth,

Would I had try'd; would I had let thee layn,
And followed her.

Theo. I would you had done so

Rather, than been so angry: where's Antonio?

Phil. Why dost thou vex me with these questions?

I'll tell thee where, he's carried to the Gallies,
There to be chain'd, and row, and beat, and row
With knotted ropes, and pizzels; if he swound,
He has a dose of bisket.

Theo. I am glad

He is alive.

Phil. Was ever man thus troubled,
Tell me where Leocadia is?

Theo. Good brother be not so hasty, and I think I can:
You found no error in me, when I first
Told you she was a woman, and believe me
Something I have found out, which makes me think.
Nay, almost know so well, that I durst swear
She follow'd hurt Antonio.

Phil. What do we

Enter

Enter the Governor, two Attendants, and the Townsmen.

Then lingering here; we will aboard the Galleys
And find her.

Gov. Made he a shot into the Town?

1. Attend. He did Sir.

Gov. Call back those Gentlemen.

1. Attend. The Governor, commands you back.

Phil. We will obey him Sir.

Gov. You gave him cause to shoot; I know, he is
So far from rash offence, and holds with me
Such curious friendship: could not one of you
Have call'd me while 'twas doing, such an uproar,
Before my dore too? (publick cause, of our own

1. Townsf. By my troth Sir, we were so busy in the Private falling out: that we forgot it: at home we see now
You were not, but as soon as the shot made us fly, we ran Away as fast as we could to seek your honor.

Gov. 'Twas gravely done; but no man tells the cause
Or chance, or what it was that made you differ.

1. Townsf. For my part Sir, if there were any that I knew
Of, the shot drove it out of my head, do you know any
all. Not we, not we. (neighbours.

Gov. Not we! nor can you tell.

1. Attend. No other cause,

But the old quarrel betwixt the Town and the Galleys.

Gov. Come nearer Gentlemen: what are your names?

Phil. My name Philippo.

Theo. And mine Theodoro.

Gov. Strangers you are it seems.

Phil. Newly arriv'd.

Gov. Then you are they begun this Tumult.

Phil. No Sir.

Gov. Speak one of you.

1. Attend. They are not, I can quit 'em.

Theo. Yet we saw part, and an unhappy part
Of this debate, a long fought friend of ours
Strook down for dead, and born unto the Galleys,
His name is Markantonio.

Phil. And another

Of our company, a Gentleman
Of noble birth, besides accompanied
With all the gifts of nature, raviſh'd hence
We know not how, in this dissention.

Gov. Get you home all, and work; and when I hear
You meddle with a weapon any more

Put those belonging to your Trades, I'll lay you

Where your best Customers shall hardly find you. Exit.

I am sorry gentlemen, I troubled you, Townsf-

Being both strangers, by your tongues, and looks, men.

Of worth: To make ye some part of amends

If there be any thing in this poor Town

Of Barcelona that you would command,

Command me.

Theo. Sir, this wounded Gentleman,
If it might please you, if your pow'r and love

Extend so far, I would be glad to wish

Might be remov'd into the Town for cure:

The Galleys stay not, and his wound I know

Cannot endure a voyage.

Gov. Sir, he shall,

I warrant you: Go call me hither Sirrah,

One of my other Servants. Exit 1. attendant.

Phil. And besides.

The Gentleman we lost, Signior Francisco,

Shall be render'd too.

Enter a Servant.

Gov. And he Sir too: Go sirrah, bear this ring

To Roderigo, my most noble friend,

The General of the Galleys: Tell him this. Exit servant.

Whispers to his Servant.

Theo. Now we shall have 'em both.

Phil. Blest be thy thoughts
For apprehending this: blest be thy breath
For uttering it.

Gov. Come Gentlemen, you shall
Enter my roof: and I will send for Surgeons,
And you shall see your friends here presently.

Theo. His name was Markantonio.

Gov. I know it,
And have sent word so.

Phil. Did you not forget
Francisco's name?

Gov. Nor his: y'are truly welcome,
To talk about it more, were but to say
The same word often over: you are welcome. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Markantonio, carried, Leocadia following; and the Servant. 2 Soldiers carrying him.

Serv. This is the house Sir.

Mar. Enter it, I pray you,
For I am faint, although I think my wound
Be nothing. Soldiers, leave us now: I thank you.

1. Sold. Heaven fend you health Sir.

Serv. Let me lead you in.

Mark. My wound's not in my feet; I shall entreat 'em
I hope to bear me so far. Exit. (neral made a

2. Sold. How seriously these land men fled, when our Ge-
Shot, as if he had been a warning to call 'em to their Hall.

1. Sold. I cannot blame 'em, What man have they now in the

Town, able to maintain a Tumult, or uphold a matter out
Of square if need be? O the quiet hurley burleys that I
Have seen in this Town, when we have fought four hours
Together, and not a man amongst us so impertinent or Modest to ask why? but now the pillars that bare
Up this blessed Town in that regular debate, and Scambling, are dead, the more's the pitty.

2. Sold. Old Ignatio lives still. (mans liver:

1. Sold. Yes, I know him: he will do prettily well at a
But where is there any man now living in the Town
That hath a steady hand, and understands Anatomy
Well? if it come to a particular matter of the lungs,
Or the spleen, why? alas Ignatio is to seek; are
There any such men left as I have known, that
Would say they would hit you in this place? is there
Ever a good heartist, or a member-percer, or a Small-gut man left in the Town, answer
Me that?

2. Sold. Mafs, I think there be not.

1. Sold. No, I warrant thee. Come, come, 'tis time
We were at the Galleys. Exeunt.

Enter Governor, Eugenia, Markantonio, Philippo, Theo-
dofia, Leocadia, Attendants.

Gov. Sir, you may know by what I said already,
You may command my house; but I must beg
Pardon to leave you, if the publick business
Forc'd me not from you, I myself should call it
Unmannerly: but good Sir, do you give it
A milder name: it shall not be an hour
Ere I return.

Mar. Sir, I was nere so poor.
In my own thoughts, as that I want a means
To requite this with.

Gov. Sir, within this hour. Exit.

Marc. This the Lady that I quarrell'd for?
O lust if wounds cannot restrain thy power,
Let shame: nor do I feel my hurt at all,
Nor is it ought, only I was well beaten:
If I pursue it, all the civil world

That

That ever did imagine the content
Found in the band of man and wife unbroke,
The reverence due to households, or the blemish
That may be stuck upon posterity
Will catch me, bind me, burn upon my forehead,
This is the wounded stranger, that receiv'd
For charity into a house, attempted——
I will not do it.

Eng. Sir, how do you do now?
That you walk off.

Marc. Worse Madam, than I was;
But it will over.

Eng. Sit, and rest a while.

Marc. Where are the Surgeons?

Eng. Sir, it is their manner,
When they have seen the wound especially,
The patient being of worth, to go consult,
Which they are now at in another room,
About the dressing.

Marc. Madam, I do feel my self not well

Theo. Alas!

Leoc. How do you Sir.

Eng. Will you drink waters?

Marc. No good Madam, 'tis not
So violent upon me; nor I think
Any thing dangerous: but yet there are
Some things that sit so heavy on my conscience,
That will perplex my mind, and stop my cure,
So that unless I utter 'em. A scratch
Here on my thumb will kill me: Gentlemen,
I pray you leave the room, and come not in
Your selves, or any other till I have
Open'd my self to this most honour'd Lady:

Phil. We will not

Theo. O blest! he will discover now
His love to me.

Leoc. Now he will tell the Lady
Our Contract.

Eng. I do believe he will confes to me
The wrong he did a Lady in the streets;
But I forgive him.

Marc. Madam, I perceive
My self grow worse and worse.

Eng. Shall I call back your friends?

Marc. O no, but e'r I do impart
What burthens me so sore, let me intreat you,
(For there is no trust in these Surgeons)
To look upon my wound; it is perhaps
My last request: But tell me truly too,
That must be in: how far do you imagine
It will have pow'r upon me.

Eng. Sir, I will.

Marc. For heavens sake, softly: oh, I must needs lay
My head down easily, whilst you do it.

Eng. Do Sir,
'Tis but an ordinary blow; a child
Of mine has had a greater, and been well;
Are you faint hearted?

Marc. Oh.

Eng. Why do you sigh?
There is no danger in the world in this;
I wonder it should make a man sit down;
What do you mean, why do you kiss my breasts?
Lift up your head, your wound, may well endure it.

Marc. O Madam, may I not express affection,
Dying-affection too I fear, to those
That do me favors, such as this of yours.

Eng. If you mean so, 'tis well; but what's the business
Lies on your conscience?

Marc. I will tell you Madam.

Eng. Tell me and laugh?

Marc. But I will tell you true
Though I do laugh, I know as well as you
My wound is nothing, nor the power of earth

Could lay a wound upon me in your presence,
That I could feel; but I do laugh to think
How covertly, how far beyond the reach
Of men, and wise men too, we shall deceive 'em,
Whilst they imagine I am talking here
With that short breath I have, ready to sfound
At every full point; you my ghostly Mother
To hear my sad confession, you and I
Will on that bed within, prepar'd for me,
Debate the matter privately.

Eng. Forbear,
Thou wert but now as welcome to this house
As certain cures to sick men, and just now
This sudden alteration makes thee look
Like plagues come to infect it; if thou knewst
How loathsome thou wilt be, thou wouldst intreat
These wals, or posts to help thee to a hurt,
Past thy dissimulation.

Mar. Gentle Madam
Call 'em not in?

Eng. I will not yet, this place
I know to be within the reach of tongue,
And ears, thou canst not force me; therefore hear me
What I will tell thee quickly, thou art born
To end some way more disesteem'd than this,
Or which is worse, to dye of this hurt yet,
Come Gentlemen.

Enter Leocadia.

Mar. Good Madam.

Eng. Gentlemen.

Leoc. Madam how is't? is Mark-antonio well?
Methinks your looks are alter'd, and I see
A strange distemper in you.

Eng. I am wrought
By that dissembling man, that fellow worth
Nothing but kicking.

Exit.

Enter Philippo and Theodosia.

Leo. Gentle Madam speak
To me alone let not them understand
His fault, he will repent I dare swear.

Eng. I'll tell it you in private.

Phil. Mark-antonio,
How do you?

Mar. Stand farther off I pray you
Give me some ayre.

Theo. Good Brother, will he scape;
The Surgeons say there is no danger.

Phil. Scape?
No doubt he will.

Leo. Alas will he not leave
This trying all; Madam, I do beseech you
Let me but speak to him, you and these by,
And I dare almost promise you to make him
Shew himself truly sorrowful to you, besides a story I shall
Not put in so good words but in it self (open to you,
So full of chance, that you will easily
Forgive my tediousness, and be well pleas'd
With that so much afflicts me.

Eng. Good Sir do.

Leo. And I desire no interruption
Of speech may trouble me till I have said
What I will quickly do.

Theo. What will she say.

Eng. Come Gentlemen, I pray you lend your ears,
And keep your voyces.

Leo. Signior Mark-antonio

How do you do?

Mar. Oh the Surgeons.

Leoc. Let me tell you

Who

Who know as well as you, you do dissemble,
It is no time to do so; leave the thoughts
Of this vain world, forget your flesh and blood,
And make your spirit an untroubled way
To pass to what it ought.

Mar. Y're not in earnest?

Why I can walk Sir, and am well.

Leoc. 'Tis true

That you can walk, and do believe y're well:
It is the nature, as your Surgeons say
Of these wounds, for a man to go, and talk,
Nay merrily, till his last hour, his minute:
For heaven sake Sir, sit down again.

Mar. Alas

Where are the Surgeons?

Leoc. Sir, they will not come,

If they should dress you, you would dye they say
Ere one would tell twenty; trouble not your mind,
Keep your head warm, and do not stir your body,
And you may live an hour.

Mar. Oh heavens, an hour?

Alas, it is to little too remember
But half the wrongs that I have done; how short
Then for contrition, and how least of all
For satisfaction?

Leoc. But you desire

To satisfy?

Mar. Heaven knows I do.

Leoc. Then know

That I am he, or she, or what you will
Most wrong'd by you; your Leocadia,
I know you must remember me.

Mar. Oh heaven!

Leoc. That lost her friends, that lost her fathers house,
That lost her fame in loosing of her Sex,
With these strange garments, there is no excuse
To hinder me it is within your power
To give me satisfaction; you have time
Left in this little piece of life to do it:
Therefore I charge you for your conscience sake,
And for our fame, which I would fain have live
When both of us are dead, to celebrate
That Contract; which you have both seal'd and sworn Yet ere you dye, which must be hastily
Heaven knows.

Mar. Alas, the sting of conscience
To death-ward for our faults; draw nearer all
And hear what I unhappy man shall say;
First Madam I desire your pardon; next
(I feel my spirits fail me) Gentlemen
Let me shake hands with you, and let's be friends,
For I have done wrong upon wrong so thick
I know not where, that every man methinks
Should be mine enemy; Forgive me both.
Lastly 'tis true (oh I do feel the power
Of death seize on me) that I was contracted
By seal and oath to Leocadia;

(I must speak fast, because I fear my life
Will else be shorter than my speech would be)
But 'tis impossible to satisfy

You Leocadia, but by repentance,
Though I can dyingly, and boldly say
I know not your dishonor, yet that was
Your virtue, and not mine, you know it well;
But herein lies th'impossibility,

O Theodosia, Theodosia

I was betroth'd to Theodosia

Before I ever saw thee; heaven forgive me
She is my wife this half hour whilst I live.

Theo. That's I, that's I, I'm Theodosia,
Hear me a little now, who have not suffer'd
Disgrace at all methinks, since you confess
What I so long have sought for, here is with me
Philippo too my Brother.

Mar. I am glad;
All happiness to him; come let me kiss thee
Beg pardon of that Maid for my offence,
And let me farther, with a dying breath
Tell in thine ear the rest of my desires.

Eug. I am afraid they will all four turn women
If we hold longer talk.

Leoc. Alas there is

No hope for me; that's Theodosia
And that her Brother, I am only sorry
I was beholding to 'em; I will search
Over the world, as careless of my fortunes,
As they of me, till I can meet a curse
To make these almost killing-furrows worse.

Exit.

Theo. Sir, as I live she ly'd, only to draw
A just confession from you, which she hath
A happy one for me, ask of this Lady,
Ask of my Brother.

Eug. Sir, she did dissemble,
Your wound is nothing.

Phil. Leocadia's gone.

Exit.

Theo. Rise up, and stir your self, 'tis but amazement
And your imagination that afflicts you,
Look you Sir now.

Mar. I think 'tis so indeed.

Theo. The Surgeons do not come, because they swear
It needs no dressing.

Eug. You shall talk with 'em

Within, for your own fancy.

Mar. Where's your Brother, and Leocadia?

Eug. Within belike.

Mar. I feel my self methinks as well as ever.

Eug. Keep then your mind so too; I do forgive
The fault you did to me; But here is one
Must not be wrong'd hereafter.

Mar. Neither shall she

When I make jests of oaths again, or make
My lust play with religion, when I leave
To keep true joys for her, and yet within
My self true sorrow for my pass'd deeds
May I want grace, when I would fain repent,
And find a great and sodain punishment.

Exeunt.

Actus V.

Scena Prima.

Enter Philippo, Diego, and Incubo.

Phil. WHere is mine Host, did not he see him neither?

Die. Not I, i'faith Sir.

Phil. Nor the muleter?

Inc. Nay he is past seeing, unless it be in's sleep;
By this time; all his visions were the pots,
Three hours since Sir.

Phil. Which way should she take?

Nay, look you now; do you all stand still? good Heaven
You might have lighted on him, now this instant?
For loves sake see him out, who ever find him
I will reward his fortune as his diligence;
Get all the Town to help, that will be hir'd,
Their pains I'll turn to annual holiday,
If it shall chance, but one bring word of her,
Pray you about it.

Inc. Her Sir? who do you mean?

Phil. (I had forgot my self) the Page I meant
That came along with us.

Die. He you gave the clothes too?

Phil. I ga' the clothes to; Rascal?

Die.

Die. Nay good Sir.

Phi. Why dost thou mention or upbraid my courtesies
Slave?

Die. For your honor Sir.

Phi. Wretch; I was honor'd,
That she would wear 'em (he, I would say) 's death?
Go, get, and find 'em out, or never see me,
I shall betray my love e'r I possess it,
Some Star direct me, or ill Planet strike me. Exit Phil.

Inc. Best to divide.

Die. I'll this way.

Inc. And I this.

Die. I, as you, find him for a Real.

Inc. 'Tis done.

Die. My course is now directly to some Pie-house
I know the Pages compafs.

Inc. I think rather

The smock-side o'th' Town, the surer harbor
At his years to put in.

Die. If I do find

The hungry haunt, I take him by the teeth now.

Inc. I by the tail, yet I as you.

Die. No more. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Philippo.

Phi. Dear Leocadia, where canst thou be fled
Thus like a spirit hence? and in a moment?
What cloud can hide thee from my following search
If yet thou art a body? sure she hath not
Tane any house? she did too late leave one
Where all humanity of a place receiv'd her,
And would, (if she had staid) have help'd to right
The wrong her fortune did her; yet she must
Be enter'd somewhere, or be found, no street,
Lane, passage, corner, turn, hath scap'd enquiry:
If her despair had ravish'd her to air
She could not yet be rarified so
But some of us should meet her? though their eyes
Perhaps be leaden, and might turn; mine would Strike out a lightning for her, and divide
A mist as thick as ever darkness was,
Nay see her through a quarry; they do lye,
Lye grossly that say love is blind; by him,
And heaven they lye; he has a sight can pierce
Through Ivory, as clear as it were horn,
And reach his object.

Enter Incubo.

Inc. Sir, he's found, he's found.

Phi. Ha? where? But reach that happy Note again
And let it relish truth, thou art an Angel.

Inc. He's here; fast by Sir, calling for a Boat
To go aboard the Gallies.

Phi. Where, where; hold thee. Exit.

Inc. He might ha' kept this now, I had nought to shew for't,
If he had had the wit, t' have gone from's word,
These direct men, they are no men of fashion,
Talk what you will, this is a very smelt. Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Leonardo with a Surgeon.

Leo. Upon your Art Sir, and your faith to assist it
Shall I believe you then his wound's not mortal?

Surg. Sir, 'tis not worth your question; less your fear.

Leo. You doe restore me Sir, I pray you accept
This small remembrance of a fathers thanks
For so assur'd a benefit.

Surg. Excuse me.

Leo. Sir, I can spare it, and must not believe
But that your fortune may receiv't, except
You'd ha' methink you live not by your practice.

Sur. I crave your pardon Sir; you teach me manners.

Leo. I crave your love and friendship, and require
As I have made now, both my self and business
A portion of your care, you will but bring me
Under the person of a call'd assistant

To his next opening, where I may but see him,
And utter a few words to him in private,
And you will merit me; for I am loth
Since here I have not to appear my self,
Or to be known unto the Governor,
Or make a tumult of my purpose.

Surg. Neither

I hope will be your need Sir; I shall bring you
Both there, and off again without the hazard. Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Philippo, and Leocadia.

Pb. Will you not hear me!

Leo. I have heard so much
Will keep me deaf for ever; No, Mark-antonio
After thy sentence, I may hear no more,
Thou hast pronounc'd me dead.

Phi. Appeal to reason,
She will reprieve you from the power of grief,
Which rules but in her absence; Hear me say
A sovereign message from her, which in duty,
And love to your own safety, you ought hear:
Why do you strive so? whither would you flie?
You cannot wrest your self away from care
You may from counsel; you may shift your place
But not your person; and another Clyme
Makes you no other.

Leo. Oh.

Phi. For passions sake,
(Which I do serve, honor, and love in you)
If you will sigh, sigh here; If you would vary
A sigh to tears, or out-cry, do it here.
No shade, no desert, darkness, nor the grave
Shall be more equal to your thoughts than I,
Only but hear me speak.

Leo. What would you say?

Phi. That which shall raise your heart, or pull down mine,
Quiet your passion, or provoke mine own;
We must have both one balsome, or one wound,
For know (lov'd fair) since the first providence
Made me your rescue, I have read you through,
And with a wondring pity look'd on you,
I have observ'd the method of your blood,
And waited on it even with sympathy
Of alike Red, and Paleness in mine own;
I knew which blush was angers, which was loves;
Which was the eye of sorrow, which of truth:
And could distinguish honor from disdain
In every change: and you are worth my study;
I saw your voluntary misery
Sustain'd in travel: A disguis'd Maid
Wearied with seeking: and with finding lost,
Neglected, where you hop'd most, or put by;
I saw it, and have laid it to my heart,
And though it were my Sister which was righted,
Yet being by your wrong, I put off nature,
Could not be glad, where I must bound to triumph;
My care for you, so drown'd respect of her;
Nor did I only apprehend your bonds,
But studied your release: and for that day
Have I made up a ransom, brought you a health
Preservative 'gainst chance, or injury
Please you apply it to the grief; my self.

Leo. Humph.

Phi. Nay, do not think me less than such a cure,
Antonio was not; And 'tis possible
Philippo may succeed: My blood and house

Are as deep rooted: and as fairly spread;
As Mark-antonio, and in that, all seek,
Fortune hath given him no precedency:
As for our thanks to Nature I may burn
Incense as much as he; I ever durst
Walk with Antonio by the self-same light
At any feast, or triumph, and ne'r car'd
Which side my Lady or her woman took
In their survey; I durst have told my tale too
Though his discourse new ended.

Leo. My repulse.

Phi. Let not that torture you, which makes me happy
Nor think that conscience (fair) which is no shame
'Twas no repulse, I was your Dowry rather:
For then methought a thousand graces met
To make you lovely, and ten thousand stories
Of constant virtue, which you then out-reach'd,
In one example did proclaim you rich:
Nor do I think you wretched, or disgrac'd,
After this suffering, and do therefore take Advantage of your need; but rather know
You are the charge and business of those powers,
Who, like best Tutors, do inflict hard tasks
Upon great Natures, and of noblest hopes;
Read trivial Lessons, and halfe lines to slugs;
They that live long, and never feel mischance,
Spend more than halfe their age in ignorance.

Leo. 'Tis well you think so.

Phi. You shall think so too,
You shall sweet Leocadia, and do so.

Leo. Good Sir no more; you have too fair a shape
To play so foul a part in, as the Tempter:
Say that I could not make peace with fortune, who,
Who should absolve me of my vow yet; ha?
My Contract made?

Phi. Your Contract?

Leo. Yes, my Contract,
Am I not his? his wife?

Phi. Sweet, nothing less.

Leo. I have no name then?

Phi. Truly then you have not;
How can you be his wife, who was before
Another's Husband?

Leo. Oh, though he dispence
With his faith given, I cannot with mine.

Phi. You do mistake (cleer soul) his precontract
Doth annul yours, and you have giv'n no faith:
That ties you in Religion, or humanity,
You rather sin against that greater precept,
To covet what's another's; Sweet, you do
Believe me, who dare not urge dishonest things,
Remove that scruple therefore, and but take
Your dangers now, into your judgements skale
And weigh them with your safeties: Think but whither
Now you can goe: what you can do to live?
How near you ha' barr'd all Ports to to your own succor,
Except this one that I here open Love
Should you be left alone, you were a prey
To the wild lust of any, who would look
Upon this shape like a temptation

And think you want the man you personate
Would not regard this shift, which love put on
As virtue forc'd, but covet it like vice;
So should you live the slander of each Sex,
And be the child of error and of shame,
And which is worse, even Mark-antonie.
Would be call'd just, to turn a wanderer off.
And Fame report you worthy his contempt;
Where if you make new choice, and settle here
There is no further tumult in this flood,
Each current keeps his course, and all suspicions
Shall return honors: Came you forth a Maid?
Go home a Wife? alone? and in disguise?
Go home a waited Leocadia:

Go home, and by the viruue of that charm
Transform all mischiefs, as you are transform'd;
Turn your offended Fathers wrath to wonder.
Add all his loud grief to a silent welcome:
Unfold the Riddles you have made, what say you?

Enter Sanchio carried, Alphonso, and Servants.

Now is the time; delay is but despair,
If you be chang'd, let a kiss tell me so.

Leo. I am: but how, I rather feel than know.

Sanc. Come Sir; you are welcome now to Barcelona;
Take off my hood.

Phi. Who be these? stay, let's view 'em?

Alph. 'Twas a long journey: are you not weary Sir?

Sanc. Weary? I could have rid it in mine Armour.

Leo. Alas!

Phi. What ail you dear?

Leo. It is my Father,

Phi. Your Father: which?

Leo. He that is carried: oh

Let us make hence.

Phi. For loves sake: good my heart.

Leo. Into some house before he see me.

Phi. Dear,

Be not thus frighted,

Leo. Oh his wrath is tempest.

Phi. Sweet, take your spirit to you, and stay, be't he,
He cannot know you in this habit, and me
I'm sure he less knows, for he never saw me.

Alph. Ha? who is that? my Son Philippo?

Phi. Sir,

Alph. Why, what make you here? Is this Salamanca?
And that your study? ha? nay stay him too,
We'll see him by his leave.

Serv. You must not strive Sir!

Alph. No, no, come near.

Sanc. My Daughter: Leocadia?

Alph. How Sir, your Daughter?

Sanc. Yes Sir, and as sure

As that's your Son: Come hither: what now? run
Out o' your sex? breech'd? was't not enough
At once to leave thy Father, and thine honor,
Unless th' hadst quit thy self too.

Phi. Sir, what fault

She can be urg'd of, I must take on me
The guilt and punishment.

Sanc. You must Sir: how

If you shall not, though you must? I deal not
With boys Sir; I, you have a Father here
Shall do me right.

Alph. Thou art not mad Philippo?

Art thou Mark-antonie? Son to Leonardo?
Our business is to them.

Sanc. No, no, no, no.

I'll ha' the business now: with you, none else,
Pray you let's speak, in private: (carry me to him)
Your Son's the ravisher Sir, and here I find him:
I hope you'll give me cause to think you noble,
And do me right, with your sword Sir, as becomes
One gentleman of honor to another;
All this is fair Sir: here's the Sea fast by,
Upon the sands, we will determine
'Tis that I call you to; let's make no daies on't;
I'll lead your way; to the sea-side Rascals.

Phil. Sir

I would beseech your stay; he may not follow you.

San. No, turn, I'll kill him here then: Slaves, Rogues,
Blocs.

Why do you not bear me to him? ha? you been Acquainted with my motions, loggs, so long
And yet not know to time 'em.

Phi. Were you Sir
Not impotent.

Alph. Hold you your peace Boy.

Sanc. Impotent,

'Death, I'll cut his throat first, and then his Fathers.

Alph. You must provide you then a sharper Razor Than is your tongue, for I not fear your sword.

Sanc. 'Heart bear me to either of 'em.

Pbi. Pray Sir your patience.

Enter Governor and Attendants.

Alph. My curse light on thee if thou stay him.

Pbi. Hold.

Gov. Why, what's the matter, Gentlemen, what tumult Is this you raise i'th' street? before my door?

Know you what 'tis to draw a weapon here?

Sanc. Yes, and to use it (bear me up to him, Rogues) Thus, at a Traitors heart.

Alph. Truer than thine.

Gov. Strike, strike; Some of the people difarm 'em, Kill 'em if they resist.

Pbi. Nay generous Sir

Let not your courtesie turn fury now.

Gov. Lay hold upon 'em, take away their weapons, I will be worth an answer, e'r we part.

Pbi. 'Tis the Governor Sir.

Alph. I yield my self.

(tell me.

Sanch. My Sword? what thinkst thou of me? pray thee

1 Attend. As of a Gentleman.

Sanch. No more?

1 Attend. Of worth,

And quality.

Sanch. And I should quit my sword There were small worth or quality in that friend; Pray thee learn thou more worth and quality Than to demand it.

Gov. Force it I say.

1 Attend. The Governor

You hear, commands.

Sanch. The Governr shall pardon me.

Pbi. How, Leocadia gone again?

Exit Phi.

Sanch. He shall friend

I' th' point of honor; by his leave, so tell him, His person and authority I acknowledge, And do submit me to it; but my Sword, He shall excuse me, were he fifteen Governors; That and I dwell together, and must yet Till my hands part, assure him.

Gov. I say force it.

Sanch. Stay, hear me. Hast thou ever read Caranza? Understandst thou honor, Noble Governor?

Gov. For that we'll have more fit dispute.

Sanch. Your name Sir?

Gov. You shall know that too: but on colder terms, Your blood and brain are now too hot to take it.

Sanch. Force my Sword from me? this is an affront.

Gov. Bring 'em away.

Sanch. You'll do me reparation.

Exeunt.

Enter Philippo.

Pbi. I have for ever lost her, and am lost, And worthily my tameness hath undone me; She's gone hence, ashamed of me; yet I seek her. Will she be ever found to me again, Whom she saw stand so poorly, and dare nothing In her defence, here? when I should have drawn This Sword out like a Meteor, and have shot it In both our Parents eies, and left 'em blind Unto their impotent angers? Oh I am worthy On whom this loss and scorn should light to death. Without the pity that should wish me better, Either alive, or in my Epitaph,

Enter Leonardo, Mark-Antonio.

Leo. Well Son, your Father is too near himself And hath too much of nature to put off Any affection that belongs to you, I could have only wish'd you had acquainted Her Father, whom it equally concerns, Though y'had presum'd on me: it might have open'd An easier gate, and path to both our joyes: For though I am none of those flinty Fathers That when their children do but natural things, Turn rock and offence straight: yet Mark-antonio; All are not of my quarry.

Mar. 'Tis my fear Sir; And if hereafter I should e'r abuse So great a piety, it were my malice.

Enter Attendants.

Atten. We must intreat you Gentlemen to take Another room, the Governor is coming Here, on some business.

Enter Governor, Sanchio, Alphonso. Attendants.

Mar. We will give him way.

Sanch. I will have right Sir on you; that believe; If there be any Marshals Court in Spain.

Gov. For that Sir we shall talk.

Sanch. — Do not slight me, Though I am without a Sword.

Gov. Keep to your Chair Sir.

Sanch. — Let me fall, and hurle my chair! (slaves) at him.

Gov. You are the more temper'd man Sir: let me intreat Of you the manner how this brawl fell out,

Alph. Fell out? I know not how: nor do I care much:

But here we came Sir to this Town together, Both in one business, and one wrong, engag'd, To seek one Leonardo, an old Genoese, I ha' said enough there; would you more? false father Of a false son, call'd Mark-antonio, Who had stole both our Daughters; and which Father Conspiring with his Son in treachery, It seem'd, to flie our satisfaction, Was, as we heard, come private to this Town Here to take ship for Italy,

Leo. You heard

More than was true then: by the fear, or falshood, And though I thought not to reveal my self (Pardon my manners in't to you) for some Important reasons; yet being thus character'd And challeng'd, know I dare appear, and doe To who dares threaten.

Mar. I say he is not worthy The name of man, or any honest preface, That dares report or credit such a slander. Do you Sir say it?

Alph. I doe say it.

Gov. Hold.

Is this your father Signior Mark-antonio? You have ill requited me thus to conceal him From him would honor him, and do him service,

Enter Eugenia.

Leon. 'Twas not his fault Sir.

Eug. Where's my Lord?

Gov. Sweet-heart.

Eug. Know you these Gentlemen? they are all the fathers Unto our friends.

Gov. So it appears my Dove.

Sanch. Sir, I say nothing: I do want a Sword. And till I have a Sword I will say nothing.

Eug. Good Sir, command these Gentlemen their Arms,
Entreat 'em as your friends, not as your prisoners.

Where be their Swords?
Gov. Restore each man his weapon.

Sanch. It seems thou hast not read Caranza, fellow
I must have reparation of honor,
As well as this: I find that wounded.

Gov. Sir,
I did not know your quality, if I had
'Tis like I should have done you more respects.

Sanch. It is sufficient, by Caranza's rule.

Eug. I know it is Sir.

Sanch. Have you read Caranza Lady?

Eug. If you mean him that writ upon the Duel,
He was my kinsman.

Sanch. Lady, then you know
By the right noble writings of your kinsman,
My honor is as dear to me, as the Kings.

Eug. 'Tis very true Sir.

Sanch. Therefore I must crave
Leave to go on now with my first dependance.

Eug. What ha' you more?

Gov. None here good Signior.

Sanch. I will, refer me to Caranza still.

Eug. Nay love, I prethee let me manage this.
With whom is't Sir?

Sanch. With that false man Alphonso.

Eug. Why he has th' advantage Sir, in legs.

Sanch. But I

In truth, in hand and heart, and a good Sword.

Eug. But how if he will not stand you Sir?

Alph. For that,

Make it no question Lady, I will stick
My feet in earth down by him, where he dare.

Sanch. O would thou wouldst.

Alph. I'll do't.

Sanch. Let me kiss him.

I fear thou wilt not yet.

Eug. Why Gentlemen,

If you'll proceed according to Caranza,
Methinks an easier way, were too good chairs,
So you would be content Sir, to be bound,
'Cause he is lame? I'll fit you with like weapons,
Pistols and Ponyards, and ev'n end it. If
The difference between you be so mortal.
It cannot be tane up.

Sanch. Tane up? take off

This head first.

Alph. Come bind me in a chair.

Eug. Yes, do.

Gov. What mean you, Dove.

Eug. Let me alone,

And set 'em at their distance: when you ha' done
Lend me two Ponyards; I'll have Pistols ready Quickly.

Exit.

Enter Philippo.

Phi. She is not here Mark-antonio,
Saw you not Leocadia?

Mar. Not I brother.

(her.

Phi. Brother let's speak with you; you were false unto

Mar. I was, but have ask'd pardon: why do you urge it?

Phi. You were not worthy of her.

Mar. Maybe I was not;

But 'tis not well, you tell me so.

Phi. My Sister

Is not so fair.

Mar. It skills not.

Phi. Nor so virtuous.

Mar. Yes, she must be as virtuous.

Phi. I would fain——

Mar. What brother?

Phi. Strike you.

Mar. I shall not bear strokes,

Though I do these strange words.

Phi. Will you not kill me?

Mar. For what good brother?

Phi. Why, for speaking well

Of Leocadia,

Mar. No indeed.

Phi. Nor ill

Of Theodosia?

Enter Eugenia, Leocadia, Theodosia, and one with two Pistols.

Mar. Neither.

Phi. Fare you well then.

Eug. Nay, you shall have as noble seconds too
As ever Duellists had; give 'em their weapons:

Now St. Jago:

Sanch. Are they charg'd?

Eug. Charg'd Sir?

I warrant you.

Alph. Would they were well discharg'd.

Sanch. I like a Sword much better I confess.

Eug. Nay, wherefore stay you? shall I mend your mark?
Strike one another, thorough these?

Phi. My love.

Alph. My Theodosia.

Sanch. I ha' not the heart.

Alph. Nor I.

Eug. Why here is a dependance ended.
Unbind that Gentleman; come take here to you
Your Sons and Daughters, and be friends. A feast
Waits you within, is better than your fray:
Lovers, take you your own, and all forbear
Under my roof, either to blush or fear.
My love, what say you? could Caranza himself
Carry a business better?

Gov. It is well:

All are content I hope, and we well eas'd.

If they for whom we have done all this be pleas'd.

Exeunt.

PROLOGUE.

TO this place Gentlemen, full many a day
We have bid ye welcome; and to many a Play:
And those whose angry souls were not diseas'd
With Law, or lending Money, we have pleas'd;
And make no doubt to do again. This night
No mighty matter, nor no light,
We must intreat you look for: A good tale,
Told in two hours, we will not fail
If we be perfect, to rehearse ye: New
I am sure it is, and handsome; but how true

Let them dispute that writ it. Ten to one
We please the Women, and I would know that man
Follows not their example? If ye mean
To know the Play well, travel with the Scene.
For it lies upon the Road; if we chance tire,
As ye are good men, leave us not i' th' mire,
Another bait may mend us: If you grow
A little gall'd or weary; cry but ho,
And we'll stay for ye. When our journey ends
Every mans Pot I hope, and all part friends.

Rich. Sharp.

Actus Primus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Virolet, and Boy.

Vir. Boy.
Boy. Sir?
Vir. If my wife seek me, tell her that Defigns of weight, too heavy for her knowledge,
 Exact my privacy
Boy. I shall, Sir.
Vir. Do then,
 And leave me to my self.

Boy. 'Tis a raw morning
 And would you please to interpret that for duty
 Which you may construe boldness, I could wish
 To arm your self against it, you would use
 More of my service.

Vir. I have heat within here,
 A noble heat (good boy) to keep it off,
 I shall not freeze; deliver my excuse,
 And you have done your part,

Boy. That is prevented,
 My Lady follows you.

Enter
 Juliana.

Vir.

Vir. Since I must be crost then,
Let her perform that office.

Boy. I obey you.

Vir. Prethee to bed; to be thus fond's more tedious
Than if I were neglected.

Jul. 'Tis the fault then
Of Love and Duty, which I would fall under,
Rather than want that care which you may challenge
As due to my obedience.

Vir. I confels
This tenderness argues a loving Wife,
And more deserves my hearts best thanks; than anger.
Yet I must tell ye Sweet, you do exceed
In your affection, if you would ingross me
To your delights alone.

Jul. I am not jealous,
If my embraces have distasted you,
As I must grant you every way so worthy
That 'tis not in weak woman to deserve you,
Much less in miserable me, that want
Those graces, some more fortunate are stor'd with.
Seek any whom you please, and I will study
With my best service to deserve those favors,
That shall yield you contentment.

Vir. You are mistaken.

Jul. No, I am patient Sir, and so good morrow;
I will not be offensive.

Vir. Hear my reasons.

Jul. Though in your life a widdows bed receives me,
For your sake I must love it. May she prosper
That shall succeed me in it, and your ardor
Last longer to her.

Vir. By the love I bear,
First to my Countreys peace; next to thy self
To whom compar'd, my life I rate at nothing;
Stood here a Lady that were the choice abstract
Of all the beauties nature ever fashion'd,
Or Art gave ornament to, compar'd to thee,
Thus as thou art obedient and loving,
I should contemn and loath her.

Jul. I doe believe.

How I am blest
In my assur'd belief? this is unfeign'd;
And why this sadness then?

Vir. Why Juliana,
Believe me, these my sad and dull retirements,
My often, nay almost continued Fasts,
Sleepbanisht from my eyes, all pleasures, strangers,
Have neither root nor growth from any cause
That may arrive at Woman. Shouldst thou be,
As chastity forbid, false to my bed,
I should lament my fortune, perhaps punish
Thy falsehood, and then study to forget thee:
But that which like a never-emptied spring;
Feeds high the torrent of my swelling grief,
Is what my Countrey suffers; there's a ground
Where sorrow may be planted, and spring up,
Through yielding rage, and womanish despair,
And yet not shame the owner.

Jul. I do believe it true,
Yet I should think my self a happy woman,
If, in this general and timely mourning,
I might or give to you, or else receive
A little lawful comfort.

Vir. Thy discretion
In this may answer for me; look on Naples
The Countrey where we both were born and bred,
Naples the Paradise of Italy,
As that is of the earth; Naples, that was
The sweet retreat of all the worthiest Romans,
When they had shar'd the spoils of the whole world;
This flourishing Kingdom, whose inhabitants
For wealth and bravery, liv'd like petty Kings,
Made subject now to such a tyrannie.

Exit.

As that fair City that receiv'd her name
From Constantine the great, now in the power
Of barbarous Infidels, may forget her own;
To look with pity on our miseries;
So far in our calamities we transcend her.
For since this Arragonian tyrant, Ferrand,
Seiz'd on the government, there's nothing left us
That we can call our own, but our afflictions.

Jul. And hardly those; the Kings strange cruelty,
Equals all presidents of tyranny.

Vir. Equal say you?
He has out-gone, the worst compar'd to him;
Nor Phalaris, nor Dionysus,
Caligula, nor Nero can be mention'd;
They yet as Kings, abus'd their Regal power;
This as a Merchant, all the Countreys fat.
He wholly does ingross unto himself;
Our Oils he buys at his own price, then sells them
To us, at dearer rates; our Plate and Jewels,
Under a fain'd pretence of publique use,
He borrows; which deny'd his instruments force,
The Races of our horses he takes from us;
Yet keeps them in our pastures; rapes of Matrons,
And Virgins, are too frequent; never man
Yet thank'd him for a pardon; for Religion,
It is a thing he dreams not of.

Jul. I have heard,
How true it is, I know not; that he sold
The Bishoprick of Tarent to a Jew,
For thirteen thousand Duckets.

Vir. I was present,
And saw the money paid; the day would leave me,
E'r I could number out his impious actions;
Or what the miserable Subject suffers;
And can you entertain in such a time,
A thought of dalliance? tears, and sighs, and groans,
Would better now become you.

Jul. They indeed are,
The only weapons, our poor Sex can use,
When we are injur'd; and they may become us;
But for me that were born free men, of Rank;
That would be Registred Fathers of their Countrey;
And to have on their Tombs in Golden Letters,
The noble stile of Tyrant-killers, written;
To weep like fools and Women, and not like wise men.
To practise a redress, deserves a name,
Which fits not me to give.

Vir. Thy grave reproof:
If what thou dost desire, were possible
To be effected, might well argue it,
As wise as loving; but if you consider,
With what strong guards this Tyrant is defended:
Ruffins, and male-contents drawn from all quarters;
That only know, to serve his impious Will;
The Cittadels built by him in the neck
Of this poor City; the invincible strength,
Nature by Art assisted, gave this Castle;
And above all his fear; admitting no man
To see him, but unarm'd; it being death
For any to approach him with a weapon.
You must confels, unless our hands were Cannons,
To batter down these walls; our weak breath Mines,
To blow his Forts up; or our curses lightning,
To force a passage to him; and then blast him;
Our power is like to yours, and we, like you,
Weep our misfortunes.

Jul. Walls of Brass resist not
A noble undertaking; nor can vice,
Raite any Bulwark, to make good the place,
Where virtue seeks to enter; then to fall
In such a brave attempt, were such an honor
That Brunus, did he live again, would envy,
Were my dead Father in you, and my Brothers;
Nay, all the Ancestors I am deriv'd from;

As you, in being what you are, are all these.
I had rather wear a mourning Garment for you,
And should be more proud of my widdowhood;
You dying for the freedom of this Countrey;
Than if I were assur'd, I should enjoy
A perpetuity of life and pleasure
With you, the Tyrant living.

Vir. Till this minute,
I never heard thee speak; O more than woman!
And more to be belov'd; can I find out
A Cabinet, to lock a secret in,
Of equal trust to thee? all doubts, and fears,
That scandalize your Sex, be far from me;
Thou shalt partake my near and dearest councils,
And further them with thine.

Jul. I will be faithful,
Vir. Know then this day, stand heaven propitious to us,
Our liberty begins.

Jul. In Ferrands death?
Vir. 'Tis plotted love, and strongly, and believe it,
For nothing else could do it, 'twas the thought,
How to proceed in this design and end it.
That made strange my embraces,

Jul. Curs'd be she,
That's so indulgent to her own delights,
That for their satisfaction, would give
A stop to such a glorious enterprize:
For me, I would not for the world, I had been Guilty of such a crime; go on and prosper.
Go on my dearest Lord, I love your Honor
Above my life; nay, yours; my prayers go with you;
Which I will strengthen with my tears: the wrongs
Of this poor Countrey, edge your sword; Oh may it
Pierce deep into this Tyrants heart, and then
When you return bath'd in his guilty blood;
I'll wash you clean with fountains of true joy.
But who are your assistants? though I am
So covetous of your glory, that I could wish
You had no sharer in it.

Vir. Be not curious.
They come, however you command my bosom,
To them I would not have you seen.

Jul. I am gone Sir,
Be confident; and may my resolution
Be present with you.

Vir. Such a Masculine spirit.
With more than Womans virtues, were a Dower
To weigh down a Kings fortune.

Enter Briffonet, Camillo, Ronvere.

Briff. Good day to you.

Cam. You are an early stirrer.

Vir. What new face,
Bring you along?

Ron. If I stand doubted Sir?
As by your looks I guess it: you much injure
A man that loves, and truly loves this Countrey,
With as much zeal as you doe; one that hates
The Prince by whom it suffers, and as deadly;
One that dares step as far to gain my freedom,
As any he that breaths; that wears a sword
As sharp as any's.

Cam. Nay, no more comparisons.

Ron. What you but whisper, I dare speak aloud,
Stood the King by; have means to put in act too
What you but coldly plot; if this deserve then
Suspition in the best, the boldest, wisest?
Pursue your own intents, I'll follow mine;
And if I not out-strip you —

Briff. Be assur'd Sir,
A conscience like this can never be ally'd
To treachery.

Cam. Who durst speak so much,

But one that is like us, a sufferer,
And stands as we affected?

Vir. You are cozen'd
And all undone; every Intelligencer
Speaks Treason with like licence; is not this
Ronvere, that hath for many years been train'd
In Ferrand's School, a man in trust and favour,
Rewarded too, and highly?

Cam. Grant all this,
The thought of what he was, being as he is now
A man disgrac'd, and with contempt thrown off;
Will spurr him to revenge, as swift as they,
That never were in favour.

Vir. Poor and childish.
Briff. His regiment is cast, that is most certain;
And his command in the Castle given away.

Cam. That on my knowledge.
Vir. Grosser still, what Shepheard
Would yield the poor remainder of his Flock,
To a known Wolf; though he put on the habit
Of a most faithful dog, and bark like one?
As this but only talks.

Cam. Yes, he has means too.
Vir. I know it to my grief, weak men I know it;
To make his peace, if there were any war
Between him and his Master, betraying
Our innocent lives.

Ron. You are too suspitious
And I have born too much, beyond my temper;
Take your own waies, I'll leave you.

Vir. You may stay now;
You have enough, and all indeed you fish'd for;
But one word Gentlemen: have you discover'd
To him alone our plot?

Briff. To him and others, that are at his devotion.

Vir. Worse and worse:
For were he only conscious of our purpose;
Though with the breach of Hospitable laws,
In my own house, I'd silence him for ever:
But what is past my help, is past my care:
I have a life to lose.

Knock.

Cam. Have better hopes. (further'd)

Ron. And when you know, with what charge I have
Your noble undertaking, you will swear me
Another man; the guards I have corrupted:
And of the choice of all our noblest youths,
Attir'd like Virgins; such as Hermits would
Welcome to their sad cells, prepar'd a Maske;
As done for the Kings pleasure.

Vir. For his safety
I rather fear; and as a pageant to Usher our ruine.

Ron. We as Torch-bearers
Will wait on these, but with such art and cunning;
I have convey'd sharp poniards in the Wax,
That we may pass, though search't through all his guards
Without suspition, and in all his glory,
Oppresshim, and with safety.

Cam. 'Tis most strange.

Vir. To be effected.

Ron. You are doubtful still.

Briff. But we resolv'd to follow him, and if you
Desist now Virolet, we will say 'tis fear,
Rather than providence.

Exeunt.

Cam. And so we leave you,

Enter Julian.

Jul. To your wise doubts, and to my better counsels;
Oh! pardon me my Lord, and trust me too;
Let me not like Cassandra prophesie truths,
And never be believ'd, before the mischief:
I have heard all; know this Ronvere a villain,
A villain that hath tempted me, and plotted

This for your ruine, only to make way
To his hopes in my embraces; at more leisure
I will acquaint you, wherefore I conceal'd it
To this last minute; if you stay, you are lost,
And all prevention too late. I know,
And 'tis to me known only, a dark cave
Within this house, a part of my poor Dower,
Where you may lie conceal'd, as in the center,
Till this rough blast be o'r, where there is air,
More then to keep in life; Ferrand will find you,
So curious his fears are.

Vir. 'Tis better fall
Than hide my head, now 'twas thine own advice,
My friends engag'd too.

Jul. You stand further bound,
Than to weak men that have betray'd themselves,
Or to my counsel, though then just and loyal:
Your phantise hath been good, but not your judgement,
In choice of such to side you; will you leap
From a steep Tower, because a desperate fool
Does it, and trusts the wind to save his hazard?
There's more expected from you; all menseies are fixt
On Violet, to help, not hurt them;
Make good their hopes and ours, you have sworn often,
That you dare credit me; and allow'd me wise
Although a woman; even Kings in great actions,
Wait opportunity, and so must you, Sir,
Or loose your understanding.

Vir. Thou art constant;
I am uncertain fool, a most blind fool;
Be thou my guide.

Jul. If I fail to direct you,
For torment or reward, when I am wretched,
May constancy forsake me.

Vir. I've my safety.

Enter Castruchio and Villio.

Vil. Why are you rapt thus?

Cast. Peace, thou art a fool.

Vil. But if I were a flatterer like your worship,
I should be wise and rich too;
There are few else that prosper, Bawds excepted,
They hold an equal place there.

Cast. A shrewd knave;
But oh the King, the happy King

Vil. Why happy?
In bearing a great burthen.

Cast. What bears he,
That's born on Princes shoulders?

Vil. A Crowns weight,
Which sets more heavy on his head, than the Oar
Slaves dig out of the Mines, of which 'tis made.

Cast. Thou worthily art his fool, to think that heavy
That carries him in the air; the reverence due
To that most sacred Gold, makes him ador'd,
His Footsteps kiss, his smiles to raise a begger
To a Lords fortune; and when he but frowns,
The City quakes.

Vil. Or the poor Cuckolds in it,
Coxcombs I should say, I am of a fool,
Grown a Philosopher, to hear this parasite.

Cast. The delicates he is serv'd with see and envy.
Vil. I had rather have an Onion with a stomach,
Than these without one.

Cast. The Celestial Musick,
Such as the motion of the eternal spheres
Yields Jove, when he drinks Nectar. Still musick.

Vil. Here's a fine knave, yet hath too many fellows.

Cast. Then the beauties,
That with variety of chice embraces,
Renew his age. These pass o'r.

Vil. Help him to crouch rather, (that way.)
And the French Cringe, they are excellent Surgeons

Cast. Oh Majesty! let others think of heaven,
While I contemplate thee.

Vil. This is not Asheisme, but Court observance.

Cast. Now the God appears, usher'd with earth-quakes.

Vil. Base Idolatry. Flourish.

Enter Ferrand, Guard, Women, Servants.

Fer. These meats are poisoned, hang
The Cooks; no note more on
Forfeit of your fingers; do you
Envie me a minutes slumber, what are these?

1 Gu. The Ladies appointed by your Majesty.

Fer. To the purpose, for what appointed?

1 Gu. For your graces pleasure.

Fer. To suck away the little blood is left me,
By my continual cares; I am not apt now,
Enjoy them first, taste of my Diet once;
And your turns serv'd, for fifty Crowns apiece
Their Husbands may redeem them.

Wo. Great Sir, mercy.

Fer. I am deaf, why stare you? is what we command
To be disputed, who's this? bring you the dead
T' upbraid me to my face?

Cast. Hold Emperor;
Hold mightiest of Kings, I am thy vassal,
Thy footstool that durst not presume to look
On thy offended face.

Fer. Castruchio rise.

Cast. Let not the lightning of thy eie consume me,
Nor hear that musical tongue, in dreadful thunder,
That speaks all mercy.

Vil. Here's no flattering rogue.

Cast. Ferrand, that is the Father of his people,
The glory of mankind.

Fer. No more, no word more;
And while I tell my troubles to my self,
Be Statues without motion of voice,
Though to be flatter'd is an itch to greatness;
It now offends me.

Vil. Here's the happy man;
But speak who dares.

Fer. When I was innocent;
I yet remember I could eat and sleep,
Walk unaffrighted, but now terrible to others:
My guards cannot keep fear from me
It still pursues me; Oh! my wounded conscience,
The Bed I would rest in, is stuf't with thorns;
The grounds strew'd o'r with adders, and with aspicks
Where e'r I set my foot, but I am in,
And what was got with cruelty, with blood,
Must be defended, though this life's a hell,
I fear a worse hereafter. Ha!

Enter Ronvere and Guard.

Ron. My Lord.

Fer. Welcome Ronvere, welcome my golden plummet
With which I found mine enemies depths and angers,
Hast thou discover'd.

Ron. All as you could wish Sir,
The Plot, and the contrivers; was made one
Of the conspiracie.

Fer. Is Violet in?

Ron. The head of all, he only scented me;
And from his fear, that I plaid false is fled;
The rest I have in fetters

Fer. Death and Hell.

Next to my mortal foe the pirate Sesse,
I aim'd at him; he's virtuous, and wise,
A lover of his freedom and his Countries
Dangerous to such as govern by the sword,
And so to me: no tract which way he went,
No means to overtake him?

Ron. There's some hope left;
But with a rough hand, to be seiz'd upon.

Fer. What is't?

Ron.

Ron. If any know, or where he is,
Or which way he is fled, it is his wife;
Her with his Father I have apprehended,
And brought among the rest.

Fer. 'Twas wisely order'd,
Go fetch them in, and let my executioners Exit Ronvere.
Appear in horror with the rack.

Vil. I take it Signior, this is no time for you to flatter,
Or me to fool in. (near Jove.)

Caj: Thou art wise in this, let's off; it is unsafe to be
When he begins to thunder.

Vil. Good morality. Exit.

Fer. I that have pierc'd into the hearts of men;
Forc'd them to lay open with my looks,
Secrets, whose least discovery was death,
Will rend for what concerns my life, the fortrefs,
Of a weak womans faith.

Enter Ronvere, Guard, Executioners, with a Rack, Camillo, Brissonet, Pandulfo, Juliana.

Ca. What e're we suffer,
The weight that loads a Traitors
Heart sits ever, heavy on thine.

Briff. As we are caught by thee,
Fall thou by others.

Ron. Pish poor fools, your curses will Never reach me.

Jul. Now by my Violet's life;
Father, this is a glorious stage of murder.
Here are fine properties too, and such spectators,
As will expect good action, to the life;
Let us perform our parts, and we shall live,
When these are rotten, would we might begin once;
Are you the Master of the company?
Troth you are tedious now.

Fer. She does deride me.

Jul. Thee and thy power, if one poor syllable
Could win me an assurance of thy favor,
I would not speak it, I desire to be
The great example of thy cruelty,
To what which on, know Ferrand, I alone
Can make discovery, where my Violet is,
Whose life, I know thou aim'st at, but if tortures
Compel me to't, may hope of heaven forsake me;
I dare thy worst.

Fer. Are we contemn'd?

Jul. Thou art,
Thou and thy Ministers, my life is thine;
But in the death of victory shall be mine.

Pand. We have such a Mistress here to teach us courage,
That cowards might learn from her.

Fer. You are slow; Put on the rack;
Begin the Scene thou miserable fool,
For so I'll make thee.

Jul. 'Tis not in thy reach;
I am happy in my sufferings, thou most wretched.

Fer. So brave! I'll tame you yet, pluck hard villains;
Is she insensible? no sigh nor groan? or is she dead?

Jul. No tyrant, though I suffer
More than a woman, beyond flesh and blood;
'Tis in a cause so honourable, that I scorn
With any sign that may express a sorrow
To shew I do repent.

Fer. Confess yet,
And thou shalt be safe.

Jul. 'Tis wrapt up in my soul,
From whence thou canst not force it.

Fer. I will be
Ten daies a killing thee.

Jul. Be twenty thousand,
My glory lives the longer.

Ron. 'Tis a miracle,
She tires th' executioners,
And me.

Fer. Unloose her, I am conquer'd, I must take
Some other way; reach her my chair, in honor
Of her invincible fortitude.

Ron. Will you not
Dispatch the rest?

Fer. When I seem merciful,
Assure thy self Ronvere, I am most cruel.
Thou wonder of thy Sex, and of this Nation,
That hast chang'd my severity to mercy,
Not to thy self alone, but to thy people,
In which I do include these men, my enemies:
Unbind them.

Pand. This is strange.

Fer. For your intent
Against my life, which you dare not denie,
I only ask one service.

Cam. Above hope.

Fer. There rides a Pyrate neer, the Duke of Sesse,
My enemy and this Countreys, that in bonds
Holds my dear friend Ascanio: free this friend:
Or bring the Pyrats head; besides your pardon,
And honor of the action, your reward
Is forty thousand Ducates. And because
I know that Violet is as bold as wise,
Be he your General, as pledge of your faith,
That you will undertake it, let this old man,
And this most constant Matron stay with me:
Of whom, as of my self, I will be careful;
She shall direct you where her Husband is.
Make choice of any ship you think most useful.
They are rig'd for you.

Exeunt Guard, with Juliana and Pand.

Briff. We with joy accept it.

Cam. And will proclaim King Ferrant merciful.

Exeunt.

Ron. The mysterie of this, my Lord? or are you
Chang'd in your nature?

Fer. I'll make thee private to it.
The lives of these weak men, and desperate woman,
Would no way have secur'd me, had I took them;
'Tis Violet I aim at; he has power,
And knows to hurt. If they encounter Sesse,
And he prove conqueror, I am assur'd
They'll find no mercy: if that they prove victors,
I shall recover, with my friend his head
I most desire of all men.

Ron. Now I have it.

Fer. I'll make thee understand the drift of all.
So we stand sure, thus much for those that fall.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Boatswain and Gunner.

Boatsf. Lay here before the wind; up with your Canvase,
And let her work, the wind begins to whistle;
Clap all her streamers on, and let her dance,
As if she were the Minion of the Ocean.
Let her bestride the billows till they roar,
And curl their wanton heads. Ho, below there:
Ho, ho, within.
Lay her North-east, and thrust her missen out,
The day grows fair and clear, and the wind courts us.
Oh for a luffy sail now, to give chase to.

Gun. A stubborn Bark, that wou'd but bear up to us,
And change a broadside bravely.

Boatsf. Where's the Duke?

Gun. I have not seen him stir to day.

Boatsf. Oh Gunner,

What bravery dwells in his age, and what valour?
And to his friends, what gentleness and bounty?
How long have we been inhabitants at Sea here?

Gun. Some fourteen years.

Boatf. By fourteen lives I swear then,
This Element never nourisht such a Pirate;
So great, so fearless, and so fortunate,
So patient in his want, in Act so valiant.
How many sail of well mann'd ships before us,
As the Bonito does the flying Fish,
Have we pursued and scour'd, that to outstrip us,
They have been fain to hang their very shirts on?
What Gallies have we bang'd, and sunk, and taken;
Whose only fraughts were fire, and stern defiance?
And nothing spoke but Bullet in all these.
How like old Neptune have I seen our General
Standing i' th' Poop, and tossing his Steel Trident,
Commanding both the Sea and Winds to serve him?

Gun. His Daughter too, which is the honor Boatswain,
Of all her sex; that Martial Maid.

Boatf. A brave wench.

Gun. How oftentimes, a fight being new begun,
Has she leap'd down, and took my Linstock from me,
And crying, now fly right, and fir'd all my chafers?
Then like the Image of the warlike Goddess,
Her Target brac'd upon her arm, her sword drawn,
And anger in her eies leapt up again,
And bravely hall'd the Bark. I have wondred Boatswain,
That in a body made so delicate,
So soft for sweet embraces, so much fire,
And manly soul, not starting at a danger.

Boatf. Her noble Father got her in his fury,
And so she proves a Soldier.

Gun. This too I wonder at
Taking so many strangers as he does,
He uses them with that respect and coolness,
Not making prize, but only borrowing
What may supply his want: nor that for nothing;
But renders back what they may stand in need of,
And then parts lovingly: Where, if he take
His Countrymen, that should be nearest to him,
And stand most free from danger, he sure pays for't:
He drowns or hangs the men, ransacks the Bark,
Then gives her up a Bonfire to his fortune. (trey)

Boatf. The wrongs he has receiv'd from that dull Coun-
That's all I know has purchas'd all his cruelty.
We fare the better; cheerly, cheerly boys,
The ship runs merrily, my Captain's melancholly,
And nothing cures that in him but a Sea-fight:
I hope to meet a sail-boy, and a right one.

Gun. That's my hope too; I am ready for the pastime.

Boatf. I' th' mean time let's bestow a Song upon him,
To shake him from his dumps, and bid good day to him.
Ho, in the hold.

Enter a Boy.

Boy. Here, here.

Boatf. To th' Main top, Boy.
And thou kenst a ship that dares despise us,
Here's Gold,

Boy. I am gone.

Exit Boy.

Boatf. Come sirs, a quaint Levet. Trump. a Levet.
To waken our brave General. Then to our labor.

Enter Duke of Sessie above, and his daughter Martia like an Amazon.

Ses. I thank you loving mates; I thank you all,
There's to prolong your mirth, and good morrow to you.

Daugh. Take this from me, you're honest, valiant friends;
And such we must make much of. Not a sail stirring?

Gun. Not any within ken yet.

Boatf. Without doubt Lady

The wind standing so fair and full upon us,
We shall have sport anon. But noble General,
Why are you still so sad? you take our edge off;
You make us dull, and spiritless.

Ses. I'll tell ye,

Because I will provoke you to be fortunate;
For when you know my cause, 'twill double arm you.
I his woman never knew it yet; my daughter,
Some discontents she has.

Daugh. Pray sir go forward.

Ses. These fourteen years, I have stored it here at Sea,
Where the most curious thought could never find it.

Boatf. Call up the Master, and all the Mates.

Enter below the Master and Sailors.

Ses. Good morrow.

Mastr. Good morrow to our General, a good one,
And to that Noble Lady all good wishes.

Daugh. I thank you Master.

Ses. Mark me, thus it is then;
Which I did never think to have discovered,
Till full revenge had wooed me; but to fatisfie
My faithful friends, thus I cast off my burden.
In that short time I was a Courtier,
And followed that most hated of all Princes,
Ferrant, the full example of all mischiefs,
Compell'd to follow to my soul a stranger,
It was my chance one day to play at Chess
For some few Crowns, with a mynion of this Kings,
A mean poor man, that only serv'd his pleasures;
Removing of a Rook, we grew to words;
From this to hotter anger: to be short,
I got a blow.

Daugh. How, how my Noble Father:

Ses. A blow my girl, which I had soon repaid,
And sunk the slave for ever, had not odds
Thrust in betwixt us. I went away disgrac'd —

Daugh. For honors sake not so Sir.

Ses. For that time, wench;

But call'd upon him, like a Gentleman,
By many private friends; knockt at his valour,
Court'd his honor hourly to repair me;
And though he were a thing my thoughts made slight on,
And only worth the fury of my footman,
Still I pursu'd him Nobly.

Daugh. Did he escape you?

My old brave father, could you sit down so coldly?
Ses. Have patience, and know all. Pursu'd him fairly,
Till I was laugh'd at, scorn'd, my wrongs made Maygames.

By him unjustly wrong'd, should be all justice,
The slave protected; yet at length I found him,
Found him, when he suppos'd all had been buried;
And what I had received, durst not be questioned;
And then he fell, under my Sword he fell,
For ever sunk; his poor life, like the air,
Blown in an empty bubble, burst, and left him,
No noble wind of memory to raise him.
But then began my misery, I fled;
The Kings frowns following, and my friends despair;
No hand that durst relieve: my Country fearful,
Bafely and weakly fearful of a tyrant;
Which made his bad Will worse, stood still and wondred,
Their virtues bedrid in 'em; then my girl,
A little one, I snatch'd thee from thy Nurse,
The modell of thy fathers miseries:
And some small wealth was fit for present carriage,
And got to Sea; where I profess my anger,
And will do, whilst that base ungrateful Country,
And that bad King, have blood or means to quench me.
Now ye know all.

Mastr. We know all, and admire all;
Go on, and do as still, and still be fortunate.

Daugh. Had you done less, or lost this Noble anger,
You

You had been worthy then mens empty pities,
And not their wonders. Go on, and use your justice,
And use it still with that fell violence,
It first appeared to you; if you go less,
Or take a dyating mercy to protection,
The honor of a Father I disclaim in you,
Call back all duty; and will be prouder of
Th' infamous and base name of a whore,
Than daughter to a great Duke and a coward.

Sef. Mine own sweet Martia, no: thou knowst my nature,
It cannot, must not be.

Daugh. I hope it shall not.

But why Sir do you keep alive still young Ascanio,
Prince of Rossana, King Ferrants most belov'd one,
You took two months agoe?

Why is not he flung overboard, or hang'd?

Sef. I'll tell thee girl:

It were a mercy in my nature now,
So soon to break the bed of his afflictions;
I am not so far reconcil'd yet to him,
To let him die that were a benefit.
Besides, I keep him as a bait and diet,
To draw on more, and nearer to the King,
I look each hour to hear of his Armados,
And a hot welcome they shall have.

Daugh. But hark you?

If you were overfway'd with odds—

Sef. I find you:

I would not yield; no girl, no hope of yielding,
Nor fling my self one hour into their mercies,
And give the tyrant hope to gain his kingdom.
No, I can sink wench, and make shift to die;
A thousand doors are open, I shall hit one.
I am no niggard of my life so it go nobly:
All waies are equal, and all hours; I care not.

Daugh. Now you speak like my father.

Mast. Noble General,

If by our means they inherit ought but bangs,
The mercy of the mainyard light upon us.
No, we can sink too, Sir, and sink low enough,
To pose their cruelties, to follow us:
And he that thinks of life, if the world go that way,
A thousand cowards suck his bones.

Gun. Let the worst come,
I can unbreech a Cannon, and without much help
Turn her into the Keel; and when she has split it,
Every man knows his way, his own prayers,
And so good night I think.

Mast. We have liv'd all with you,
And will die with you General.

Boy a top.

Sef. I thank you Gentlemen.

Boy above. A Sail, a Sail.

Mast. A cheerful sound.

Boy. A Sail.

Boatsf. Of whence? of whence boy?

Boy. A lusty Sail.

Daugh. Look right, and look again.

Boy. She plows the Sea before her,
And foimes i' th' mouth.

Boatsf. Of whence?

Boy. I ken not yet sir.

Sef. Oh may she prove of Naples.

Mast. Prove the Devil,

We'll spit out fire as thick as she.

Boy. Hoy.

Mast. Brave boy.

Boy. Of Naples, Naples, I think of Naples Master,
Methinks I see the Arms.

Mast. Up, up another,
And give more certain signs.

Exit Sailor.

Sef. All to your business,
And stand but right and true.

Boatsf. Hang him that halts now.

Boy. Sh'as us in chafe.

Mast. We'll spare her our main-top-sail,
He shall not look us long, we are no starters.
Down with the fore-sail too, we'll spoon before her.

Mart. Gunner, good noble Gunner, for my honor
Load me but these two Minions in the chape there;
And load 'em right, that they may bid fair welcome,
And be thine eye, and level as thy heart is.

Gun. Madam, I'll scratch 'em out, I'll piss 'em out else.

Sef. Of whence now?

Sail. Of Naples, Naples, Naples.

I see her top-Flag, how she quarters Naples.

I hear her Trumpets.

Sef. Down, she's welcome to us.

Exit. Mast. Boatsf. Gun. Sail.

Every man to his charge, mann her i' th' bow well.

And place your Rakers right, Daughter be sparing.

Mart. I swear I'll be above Sir, in the thickest,
And where most danger is, I'll seek for honor.

They have begun, hark how their Trumpets call us.

Hark how the wide-mouth'd Cannons sing amongst us.

Hark how they fail; out of our shels for shame Sir.

Sef. Now fortune and my cause.

Mart. Be bold and conquer.

Exit.

Charge Trumpets and shot within.

Enter Master and Boatswain.

Mast. They'll board us once again, they're tuff and valiant.

Boatsf. Twice we have blown 'em into th' air like feathers.
And made 'em dance.

Mast. Good boys, fight bravely, manly.
They come on yet, clap in her stern, and yoke 'em.

Enter Gunner.

Gun. You should not need, I have provision for 'em;
Let 'em board once again, the next is ours.

Stand bravely to your Pikes, away, be valiant.

I have a second course of service for 'em,

Shall make the bowels of their Bark ake, boy,

The Duke fights like a Dragon. Who dares be idle? Exit.

Charge Trumpets, Pieces go off.

Enter Master, Boatswain following.

Mast. Down with 'em, stow 'em in (the Sea.

Boatsf. Cut their throats, 'tis brotherhood to fling 'em into
The Duke is hurt, so is his lovely Daughter Martia.
We have the day yet.

Enter Gunner.

(yet flew.

Gun. Pox fire 'em, they have smoak'd us, never such plums
Boatsf. They have rent the ship, and bor'd a hundred holes
She swims still lustily.

Mast. She made a brave fight, and she shall be cur'd
And make a braver yet.

Gun. Bring us some Canns up, I am as hot as fire.

Enter boy with three Canns.

Boat. I am sure I am none o' th' coolest.

Gun. My Cannons rung like Bels. Here's to my Mistris.
The dainty sweet brags Minion: split their Fore-Mast,
She never fail'd. (men;

Mast. Ye did all well, and truly, like faithful honest

Boatsf. But is she rich Master? Trumpets flourish.

Enter Sesse, Martia, Virolet, Sailors.

Mast. Rich for my Captains purpose howsoever,
And we are his. How bravely now he shows,
Heated in blood and anger? how do you Sir?
Not wounded mortally I hope?

Sef. No Master, but only wear the livery of fury.
I am hurt, and deep.

Maft. My Miftrifs too?

Mart. A scratch man,
My needle would ha done as much good Sir?
Be provident and careful.

Sef. Prethee peace girl,
This wound is not the first blood I have blusht in,
Ye fought all like tall men, my thanks among ye,
That speaks not what my purse means, but my tongue, fol (diers.

Now Sir, to you that fought me out, that found me,
That found me what I am, the Tyrant's Tyrant;
You that were imp'd, the weak arm to his folly,
You are welcome to your death.

Vir. I do expect it,
And therefore need no compliment, but wait it.

Sef. Thou bor'ft the face once of a Noble Gentleman,
Rankt in the first file of the virtuous,
By every hopeful spirit, shewed and pointed,
Thy Countries love; one that advanc'd her honor,
Not tainted with the base and servile uses
The Tyrant ties mens souls to. Tell me Violet,
If shame have not forsook thee, with thy credit?

Vir. No more of these Racks; what I am, I am.
I hope not to go free with poor confessions;
Nor if I shew ill, will I seem a monster,
By making my mind prisoner; do your worst.
When I came out to deal with you, I cast it,
Only those base afflictions fit for slaves,
Because I am a Gentleman.——

Sef. Thou art none.
Thou wast while thou stoodst good, th'art now a villain.
And agent for the devil.

Vir. That tongue lies.
Give me my sword again, and stand all arm'd;
I'll prove it on ye all, I am a Gentleman,
A man as fair in honor, rate your prisoners,
How poor and like a Pedagogue it shews?
How far from Nobleness? 'tis fair, you may kill's;
But to defame your victory with foul language.

Sef. Go sling him over-board; I'll teach you sirrah.

Vir. You cannot teach me to die. I could kill you now
With patience, in despising all your cruelties.
And make you choke with anger.

Sef. Away I say.
Mar. Stay Sir, h'as given you such bold language,
I am not reconcil'd to him yet, and therefore
He shall not have his wish observ'd so nearly,
To die when he please; I beseech you stay Sir.

Sef. Do with him what thou wilt.
Mar. Carry him to th' Bilboes,
And clap him fast there, with the Prince.

Vir. Do Lady,
For any death you give, I am bound to bless you.

Exit Violet, and Sailors.

Mar. Now to your Cabin, Sir; pray lean upon me,
And take your rest, the Surgeons wait all for you.

Sef. Thou mak'st me blush to see thee bear thy fortunes;
Why, sure I have no hurt, I have not fought sure?

Maft. You bleed apace, Sir.

Mart. Ye grow cold too.
Sef. I must be rul'd, no leaning,
My deepest wounds scorn Crutches.

All. A brave General. Flour. Trumpets, Cornets.

Exeunt omnes.

Enter two Sailors.

1 Sail. Will they not moore her?
2 Sail. Not till we come to the Fort,
This is too weak a place for our defences,
The Carpenters are hard at work; she swims well,

And may hold out another fight. The ship we took Burns there to give us light.

1 Sail. She made a brave fight.

2 Sail. She put us all in fear.

1 Sail. Beshrew my heart did she.

Her men are gone to Candia, they are pepper'd,
All but this prisoner.

2 Sail. Sure he's a brave fellow.

1 Sail. A stubborn knave, but we have pul'd his bravery.

He discovers Violet and Alcanio in the Bilboes.

Look how he looks now: come let's go serve his dyet,
Which is but bread and water.

2 Sail. He'll grow fat on't.

Exeunt Sailors.

Asca. I must confess I have endur'd much misery,
Even almost to the ruine of my spirit,
But ten times more grows my affliction,
To find my friend here.

Vir. Had we serv'd our Country,
Or honesties, as we have serv'd our follies,
We had not been here now?

Asca. 'Tis too true Violet.

Vir. And yet my end in vent'ring for your safety,
Pointed at more than Ferrant's Will, a base one;
Some service for mine own, some for my Nation,
Some for my friend; but I am rightly paid,
That durst adventure such a noble office,
From the most treacherous command of mischief;
You know him now?

Asca. And when I nearer knew him,
Then when I waited, Heaven be witness with me,
(And if I lie my miseries still load me)
With what tears I have wooed him, with what prayers.

What weight of reasons I have laid, what dangers;
Then, when the peoples curses flew like storms;
And every tongue was whetted to defame him,
To leave his doubts, his tyrannies, his slaughters,
His fell oppressions: I know I was hated too.

Vir. And all mankind that knew him: these confessions
Do no good to the world, to heaven they may.

Let's study to die well, we have liv'd like coxcombs.

Asca. That my misfortune, should lose you too.

Vir. Yes;

And not only me, but many more, and better:
For my life, 'tis not this; or might I save yours,
And some brave friends I have engag'd, let me go;
It were the meritorious death I wish for,
But we must hang or drown like whelps.

Asca. No remedy.

Vir. On my part I expect none. I know the man,
And know he has been netted to the quick too,
I know his nature.

Asca. A most cruel nature.

Vir. His wrongs have bred him up. I cannot blame him.

Asca. He has a daughter too, the greatest scorner,
And most insulter upon misery.

Vir. For those, they are toys to laugh at, not to lead men:

A womans mirth or anger, like a meteor
Glides and is gone, and leaves no crack behind it;

Our miseries would seem like masters to us,

And shake our manly spirits into feavers;

If we respected those; the more they glory.

And raise insulting Trophies on our ruines;

The more our virtues shine in patience.

Sweet Prince, the name of death was never terrible

To him that knew to live; nor the loud torrent

Of all afflictions, singing as they swim,

A gall of heart, but to a guilty conscience:

Whilst we stand fair, though by a two-edg'd storm,

We find untimely falls, like early Roses;

Bent to the earth, we bear our native sweetnaess.

Asca. Good Sir go on.

Vir. When we are little children,
And cry and fret for every toy comes cross us;
How sweetly do we shew, when sleep steals on us?

When

When we grow great, but our affections greater,
 And struggle with this stubborn twin, born with us;
 And tug and pull, yet still we find a Giant:
 Had we not then the priviledge to sleep,
 Our everlasting sleep? he would make us Idiots;
 The memory and monuments of good men
 Are more than lives, and though their tombs want tongues,
 Yet have they eies that daily sweat their losses;
 And such a tear from stone, no tinte can value.
 To die both young and good, are natures curses
 As the world saies; ask truth, they are bounteous blessings:
 For then we reach at Heaven, in our full virtues,
 And fix our selves new Stars, crown'd with our goodnes.

Asc. You have double arm'd me. Strange Musick
 Hark what noise is this? within, Hoboys.
 What horrid noise is the Sea pleas'd to sing.
 A hideous Dinge to our deliverance?
Vir. Stand fast now.

Within strange cries, horrid noise, Trumpets.

Asc. I am fixt.
Vir. We fear ye not. Enter Martia.
 Let death appear in all shapes, we smile on him.

Asc. The Lady now.
Vir. The face o' th' Mask is alter'd.
Asc. What will she do?
Vir. Do what she can, I care not.
Asc. She looks on you Sir.
Vir. Rather she looks through me,
 But yet she stirs me not.

Mart. Poorwretched slaves,
 Why do you live? or if ye hope for mercy,
 Why do not you houl out, and fill the hold
 With lamentations, cries, and base submissions,
 Worthy our scorn?

Vir. Madam, you are mistaken;
 We are no slaves to you, but to blind fortune;
 And if she had her eyes, and durst be certain,
 Certain our friend, I would not bow unto her;
 I would not cry, nor ask so base a mercy:
 If you see any thing in our appearance,
 Worthy your sexes softness and your own glory:
 Do it for that, and let that good reward it:
 We cannot beg.

Mart. I'll make you beg, and bow too.
Vir. Madam for what?
Mart. For life; and when you hope it,
 Then will I laugh and triumph on your baseness.
Asc. Madam, 'tis true, there may be such a favour
 And we may ask it too; ask it with honor;
 And thank you for that favour, nobly thank you,
 Though it be death; but when we beg a base life,
 And beg it of your scorn—

Vir. Y'are couzen'd woman,
 Your handfomness may do much, but not this way;
 But for your glorious hate—

Mart. Are ye so stubborn?
 'Death, I will make you bow.

Vir. It must be in your bed then;
 There you may work me to humility.

Mart. Why, I can kill thee.
Vir. If you do it handsomely;

It may be I can thank you, else—

Mart. So glorious?
Asc. Her cruelty now works.

Mart. Yet woot thou?
Vir. No.

Mart. Wilt thou for life sake?
Vir. No, I know your subtilty.

Mart. For honor sake?
Vir. I will not be a Pageant,

My mind was ever firm, and so I'll lose it.

Mart. I'll starve thee to it.
Vir. I'll starve my self, and cross it.

Mart. I'll lay thee on such miseries—

Vir. I'll wear 'em,
 And with that wantonness, you do your Bracelets.

Mart. I'll be a month a killing thee.

Vir. Poor Lady,
 I'll be a month a dying then: what's that?

There's many a Calenture out—does your cruelty.

Mart. How might I do in killing of his body,
 To save his Noble mind? Who waits there?

Enter a Sailor, with a rich Cap and Mantle.

Sayl. Madam.
Mart. Unbolt this man, and leave those things behind you:

And so away, now put 'em on. Exit

Vir. To what end? Sailer

Mart. To my End, to my Will.
Vir. I will.

Mart. I thank you.
Vir. Nay, now you thank me, I'll do more. I'll tell ye,

I am a servant to your courtesie.

And so far will be woo'd: but if this triumph
 Be only aim'd to make your mischief glorious;

Lady, y'ave put a richer shroud upon me,
 Which my strong mind shall suffer in.

Mart. Come hither,
 And all thy bravery put into thy carriage,
 For I will admire thee.

Vir. Whither will this woman?
Asc. Take heed my friend.

Mart. Look as thou scorn'dst my cruelty:
 I know thou dost.

Vir. I never fear'd nor flatter'd.

Mart. No if thou hadst, thou hadst died, and I had gloried.

I suffer now, and thou which art my prisoner,
 Hast nobly won the free power to despise me.

I love thee, and admire thee for thy Nobleness;
 And, for thy manly sufferance, am thy servant.

Vir. Good Lady, mock me not.
Mart. By heaven I love thee;

And by the soul of love, am one piece with thee.

Thy mind, thy mind; thy brave, thy manly mind:
 That like a Rock, stands all the storms of fortune,
 And beats 'em roaring back they cannot reach thee:

That lovely mind I dote on, not the body;
 That mind has rob'd me of my liberty:

That mind has darken'd all my bravery,
 And into poor despis'd things, turn'd my angers.

Receive me to your love Sir, and instruct me;
 Receive me to your bed, and marry me;

I'll wait upon you, bless the hour I knew you.

Vir. Is this a new way?
Mart. If you doubt my faith.

First take your liberty; I'll make it perfect,
 Or any thing within my power.

Vir. I love you;
 But how to recompence your love with marriage?

Alas, I have a wife.

Mart. Dearer than I am?
 That will adventure so much for your safety?

Forget her father's wrongs, quit her own honor,
 Pull on her, for a strangers sake, all curses?

Vir. Shall this Prince have his freedom too?
 Else all I love is gone, all my friends perish.

Mart. He shall.
Vir. What shall I do?

Mart. If thou despise my courtesie,
 When I am dead, for grief I am forsaken,
 And no soft hand left to asswage your sorrows;

Too late, but too true, curse your own cruelties.

Asc. Be wife; if she be true, no thred is left else,
 To guide us from this labyrinth of mischief;

Nor no way for our friends.

Vir. Thus then I take you:
 I bind ye to my life, my love.

Mart. I take you,
And with the like bond tye my heart your servant;
W^e are now almost at Harbor, within this hour,
In the dead watch, I'll have the Long-boat ready;
And when I give the word, be sure you enter,
I'll see ye furnisht both immediately,
And like your self some trusty man shall wait you,
The watch I'll make mine own; only my love
Requires a stronger vow, which I'll administer
Before we go.

Vir. I'll take it to confirm you.

Mart. Goe, in there are the keys, unlock his fetters,
And am ye Nobly both; I'll be with you presently;
And so this loving kiss.

Afcario. Be constant Lady.

Exeunt omnes.

Enter the Duke of Sesse by Torch-light, Master and Surgeon with him.

Surg. You grow so angry Sir, your wound goes backward.

Sef. I am angry at the time, at none of you,
That sends but one poor subject for revenge;
I would have all the Court, and all the villanie,
Was ever practis'd under that foul Ferrant
Tyrant, and all to quench my wrath.

Mast. Be patient,
Your grace may find occasion every hour,
For certain they will seek you to satisfie,
And to the full, your anger.

Sef. 'Death, they dare not:
They know that I command death, feed his hunger,
And when I let him loose—

Surg. You'll never heal Sir,
If these extreams dwell in you, you are old,
And burn your spirits out with this wild anger.

Sef. Thou liest, I am not old, I am as lusty
And full of manly heat as them, or thou art.

Mast. No more of that.

Sef. And dare seek out a danger;
And hold him at the swords point, when thou tremblest
And creepest into thy box of salves to save thee.
Oh Master, I have had a dreadful dream to night!
Me-thought the ship was all on fire, and my lov'd Daughter
To save her life, leapt into the Sea; where suddainly
A stranger snatcht her up, and swam away with her.

Mast. 'Twas but the heat o' th' fight Sir.

Boatswain within, and Sailor.

Boatsf. Look out, what's that?

Sail. The Long-boat as I live.

Boatsf. Ho, there! th' Long-Boat.

Sef. What noise is that?

I hear Sir, —

Boatsf. The devil or his dam; hail her agen boys.

Sail. The Long-boat, ho, the Long-boat.

Sef. Why, the Long-boat.

Where is the Long-boat?

Boatsf. She is stolen off.

Enter Master.

Sef. Who stole her?

Oh my propheticque soul!

Mast. Your Daughters gone Sir?

The prisoners and six Sailors, Rogues.

Sef. Mischief, six thousand plagues sail with 'em;
They'r in her yet, make out.

Mast. We have ne'r a Boat.

Enter Gunner.

Gun. Who knew of this trick?

Sef. Weigh Anchors and away.

Boatsf. We have no wind Sir,
They'll beat us with their Oars.

Sef. Then sink 'em Gunner,
Oh sink 'em, sink 'em, sink 'em, claw 'em Gunner;
As ever thou hast lov'd me.

Gun. I'll do reason,
But I'll be hang'd before I'll hurt the Lady. Exit Gun.
Sef. Who knew of this? Trump. a piece or Mast. We stand all clear. two go off.

Sef. What Devil
Put this base trick into her tail? my Daughter,
And run away with rogues! I hope she's sunk,
Or torn to pieces with the shot, rots find her, } A piece or
The leprosie of whore stick ever to her, } two.
Oh she has ruin'd my revenge.

Enter Gunner.

Gun. She is gone, Sir.
I cannot reach her with my shot.

Sef. Rise winds,
Blow till ye burst the Air, and swell the Seas,
That they may sink the Stars, Oh dance her, dance her;
Shee's impudently wanton, dance her, dance her,
Mount her upon your surges, cool her, cool her;
She runs hot like a whore, cool her, cool her
Oh now a shot to sink her, cut Cables,
I will away, and where she sets her foot
Although it be in Ferrants Court, I'll follow her,
And such a Fathers vengeance shall she suffer—
Dare any man stand by me?

Mast. All, all.

Boatsf. All Sir.

Gun. And the same cup you taste.

Sef. Cut Cables then;
For I shall never sleep nor know what peace is,
Till I have pluckt her heart out;

All within. Oh main there.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Ferrant, Ronvere, Castruccio, Villio, and Guard.

Ron. You are too gentle, Sir.

Flourish Cornets

Fer. You are too careless:

The creatures I have made, no way regard me:
Why should I give you names, titles of honor,
Rob families to fill your private houses.
For your advancement, draw all curses on me,
Wake tedious winter nights, to make them happy
That for me break no slumber?

Ron. What we can,

We dare do.

Fer. Why is your Sovereigns life then
(In which you live, and in whose fall your honors,
Your wealth, your pomp, your pride, and all must suffer)
No better guarded? Oh my cruel Stars,
That mark me out a King, raising me on
This pinnacle of greatness, only to be
The nearer blasting!

Vil. What think you now Castruccio?

Is not this a merry life?
Cast. Still thou art couzen'd;
It is a glorious royal discontentment;
How bravely it becomes him!

Fer. To be made
The common Butt, for every slave to shoot at;
No peace, no rest I take, but their alarms
Beat at my heart: why do I live, or seek then,
To add a day more to these glorious troubles?
Or to what end when all I can arrive at,
Is but the summing up of fears and sorrows.
What power has my command, when from my bosom
Afcario, my most dear, and lov'd Afcario,
Was snatch'd, spite of my Will, spite of my Succor,

And

And by mine own proud slave, retain'd most miserable?
And still that villain lives to nip my pleasures,
It being not within my power to reach him.

Ron. Time may restore all this; and would you hear
Whose counsel never fail'd you.

Fer. Tell me no more,
I faint beneath the burthen of my cares;
And yield my self most wretched.

Ron. On my knees
I beg it, mighty Sir, vouchsafe me hearing.

Fer. Speak, speak, and I thus low, such is my fortune,
Will hear what thou canst say.

Vil. Look but on this,
Has not a man that has but means to keep
A Hawk, a Greyhound, and a Hunting Nag,
More pleasure than this King?

Cast. A dull fool still,
Make me a King, and let me scratch with care,
And see who'll have the better; give me rule
Command, obedience, pleasure of a King,
And let the Devil roar? The greatest corrosive
A King can have, is of more precious tickling,
And handled to the height, more dear delight,
Than other mens whole lives, let 'em be safe too.

Vil. Think of the mutinous people.

Cast. Hang the people,
Give me the pleasure, let me do all, awe all,
Enjoy their Wives and States at my discretion,
And peg 'em when I please, let the slaves mumble.

Vil. But say they should be vex'd, and rise against thee?

Cast. Let 'em rise, let 'em rise: give me the bridle here,
And see if they can crack my girths: ah Villio,
Under the Sun there's nothing so voluptuous
As riding of this Monster, till he founder.

Fer. Who's that so loud?

Cast. I am dumb: is not this rare?
Kings looks make Pythagoreans; is not this
A happiness Villio?

Vil. Yes, to put to silence
A fawning sycophant.

Fer. Thou speak'st truth in all,
And mercy is a vice, when there needs rigor,
Which I, with all severity, will practice;
And since, as subjects they pay not obedience,
They shall be forc'd as slaves: I will remove
Their means to hurt, and with the means, my fears;
Goe you the fatal executioners

Of my commands, and in our name proclaim,
That from this hour I do forbid all meetings,
All private conferences in the City:

To feast a neighbor shall be death: to talk,
As they meet in the streets, to hold discourse,
By writing, nay by signs; see this perform'd,
And I will call your cruelty, to those

That dare repine at this, to me true service.

1 Gard. This makes for us.

2 Gard. I, now we have employments,
If we grow not rich, 'twere fit we should be beggars.

Fer. Ronvere.

Exit Guard.

Ron. My Lord.

Cast. Thou enemy to Majesty?

What think'st thou of a kingdom?

Vil. As of a man

That hath power to do ill.

Cast. Or a thing rather
That does divide an Empire with the gods;
Observe but with how little breath he shakes
A populous City, which would stand unmov'd
Against a whirlwind.

Vil. Then you make him more
Than him that rules the winds.

Cast. For me I do profess it,
Were I offer'd to be any thing on earth
I would be mighty Ferrant.

Fer. who names me?

Deliver thy thoughts slave, thy thoughts, and truly
Or be no more.

Cast. They rather will deserve.
Your favour than your fury; I admire,
(As who does not, that is a loyal subject?)
Your wisdom, power, your perfect happiness,
The most blest of mankind.

Fer. Didst thou but feel.
The weighty sorrows that sit on a Crown,
Though thou shouldst find one in the streets Castruccio.
Thou wouldst not think it worth the taking up;
But since thou art enamour'd of my fortune,
Thou shalt e'r long taste of it.

Cast. But one day,
And then let me expire.

Fer. Goe to my Wardrobe,
And of the richest things I wear, cull out,
What thou thinkst fit: do you attend him firrah;

Vil. I warrant you I shall be at his elbow,
The fool will never leave him. Exit Cast. Villio

Cast. Made for ever.

A shout within.

Fer. What shout is that, draw up our Guards.

Enter Virolet, Ascanio, and a Servant.

Ron. Those rather
Speak joy than danger.
Bring her to my house,
I would not have her seen here.

Fer. My Ascanio!
The most desir'd of all men, let me die
In these embraces; how wert thou redeem'd?
Asc. Sir, this is my preserver.

Fer. At more leisure,
I will enquire the manner, and the means,
I cannot spare so much time now from my
More strickt embraces: Virolet, welcome too,
This service weighs down your intended Treason;
You long have been mine enemy, learn now
To be my friend and loyal, I ask no more,
And live as free as Ferrant; let him have
The forty thousand crowns I gladly promis'd,
For my Ascanio's freedom, and deliver
His Father, and his wife to him in safety,
Something hath pass'd which I am sorry for,
But 'twill not now be help'd; come my Ascanio,
And reap the harvest of my winter travels.

My best Ascanio, my lov'd Ascanio.

Vir. My Lord, all former passages forgot,
I am become a suitor.

Ron. To me Virolet?

Vir. To you yet will not beg the courtesie,
But largely pay you for it.

Ron. To the purpose.

Vir. The forty thousand crowns the King hath given me,
I will bestow on you, if by your means
I may have liberty for a divorce
Between me and my wife.

Ron. Your Juliano?

That for you hath indur'd so much, so nobly?

Vir. The more my sorrow; but it must be so.

Ron. I will not hinder it: without a bribe,
For mine own ends, I would have further'd this.
I will use all my power.

Vir. 'Tis all I aske:

Oh my curs'd fate, that ever man should hate
Himself for being belov'd, or be compell'd
To cast away a Jewel, Kings would buy,
Though with the loss of Crown and Monarchy!

Exeunt.

Enter Sesse, Master, Boatswain, Gunner.

Sesse. How do I look?

Maft

Mat. You are so strangely alter'd.
We scarce can know you, so young again, and utterly
From that you were, figure, or any favour;
Your friends cannot discern you.

Ses. I have none,
None but my fair revenge, and let that know me!
You are finely alter'd too.

Boatf. To please your humour,
But we may pass without disguise, our living
Was never in their element.

Gun. This Jew sure,
That alter'd you, is a mad knave:

Ses. O! a most excellent fellow. (off.)

Gun. How he has mew'd your head, has rub'd the snow
And run your beard into a peak of twenty.

Boatf. Stopt all the crannies in your face,

Mat. Most rarely.

Boatf. And now you look as plump, your eies as sparkling,
As if you were to leap into a Ladies saddle.
Has he not set your nose awry?

Ses. The better.

Boatf. I think it be the better, but 'tis awry sure;
North and by East, I, there's the point it stands in;
Now halfe a point to the Southward.

Ses. I could laugh,
But that my business requires no mirth now;
Thou art a merry fellow,

Boatf. I would the Jew Sir,
Could steer my head right, for I have such a swimming in't,
Ever since I went to Sea first.

Mat. Take Wine and purge it.

Boatf. I have had a thousand pills of Sack, a thousand;
A thousand pottle Pills.

Gun. Take more.

Boatf. Good Doctor,
Your patient is easily perswaded.

Mat. The next fair open weather
Methinks this Jew

If he were truly known to founder'd Courtiers,
And decay'd Ladies that have lost their fleeces
On every busn, he might pick a pretty living.

Boatf. The best of all our gallants, should be glad of him;
For if you mark their marches, they are tender,
Soft, soft, and tender; then but observe their bodies,
And you shall find 'em cemented by a Surgeon,
Or some Physitian for a year or two,
And then to th' tub again, for a new pickle.
This Jew might live a Gentile here.

Ses. What are these? (Ent. 2 Citizens at both doors, saluting afar off.)
Stand close and mark?

Boatf. These are no men, th'are motions.

Ses. What sad and ruthful faces!

Boatf. How they duck!

This senceless, silent courtesie methinks,
Shews like two Turks, saluting one another,
Upon two French Porters backs.

Ses. They are my Country-men,
And this, some forc'd infliction from the tyrant;
What are you, why is this? why move thus silent
As if you were wandring shadows? why so sad?
Your tongues scal'd up; are ye of several Countries?
You understand not one another?

Gun. That's an Englisman,
He looks as though he had lost his dog.

Ses. Your habits
Shew ye all Neopolitanes; and your faces
Deliver you oppressed things; speak boldly:
Do you groan and labor under this stiff yolk?

Mat. They shake their heads and weep.

Ses. Oh misery!
Give plenteous sorrow, and no tongues to shew 'em!
This is a studied cruelty.

1 Cit. Begone Sir,
t seems you are a stranger, and save your self;

2 Cit. You wonder here at us; as much we wonder
To hear you speak so openly, and boldly,
The Kings command being publisht to the contrary;
'Tis death here, above two, to talk together;
And that must be but common salutation neither,
Short, and so part.

Boatf. How should a man buy mustard,
If he be forc'd to stay the making of it?

Within 1. Clear all the streets before the King:

1 Cit. Get off Sir,
And shift as we must do.

Exeunt Citizens.

Ses. I'll see his glory.

Mat. Stand fast now and like men. Flourish Colours.

Enter Castruccio like the King, in the midst of a Guard. Villio.

Cast. Begin the game, Sir,
And pluck me down the Row
Of houses there.

They hide the view o' th' hill; and sink those Merchants,
The r ships are foul and stink.

Mat. This is a sweet youth.

Cast. All that are taken in assemblies,
Their houses and their wives, their wealths are forfeit,
Their lives at your devotion. Villains, Knaves,
I'll make you bow and shake, I'll make you kneel Rogues.
How brave 'tis to b a King?

Gun. Here's fine tumbling,

Cast. No man shall sit i' th' temple near another

Boatf. Nor lie with his own wife.

Cast. All upon pain
Of present death, forget to write.

Boatf. That's excellent,
Carriers and Footposts, will be arrant rebels.

Cast. No character, or stamp; that may deliver
This mans intention, to that man i' th' Countrey.

Gun. Nay, an you cut off, after my hearty commenda-
Your friend and Oliver. No more. (tinous.)

Cast. No man smile,
And wear face of mirth; that fellows cunning,
And hides a double heart, he's your prize, smoke him.

Enter Virolet, Ronvero, Ascanio, and Martia passing over.

Ses. What base abuse is this? Ha? 'tis her face sure,
My prisoners with her too? by heaven wild whore
Now is my time.

Mat. Do what you will.

Ses. Stay hold yet,
My Countrey shall be serv'd first, let her go,
We'll have an hour for her to make her tremble.
Now shew our selves, and bless you with your valours.

Guard. Here's a whole plump of Rogues. } Virolet and they

Ses. Now for your Countrey. } off again.

Cast. Away with 'em and hang 'em; shew no mercy,
I say no mercy.

Ses. Be it so upon 'em.

Guard. Treason, treason, treason.

Boatf. Cut the slaevs to gidgets.

Gun. Down with the Bul-beefs.

Ses. Hold, hold, I command you, — look here.

Cast. A miserable thing, I am no King Sir.

Ses. Sirrah your fools-face has preserv'd your life.
Wear no more Kings coats, you have scap'd a scouring.

Boatf. I'll not the King.

Ses. No, 'tis a prating Rascal,
The puppy makes him mirth.

Cast. Yes Sir I am a puppy.

Boatf. I beseech you let me hang him,
I'll do't in my Belt straight.

Cast. As you are honourable,
It is enough you may hang me.

Gun. I'll hang a squib at's tail
That shall blow both his buttocks; like a petard

Cast.

Cast. Do any thing.
 But do not kill me Gentlemen. Enter Citizen.
Boates. Let's flea him, and have him flye blown.
Cit. Away, and save your lives.
 The King himself is coming on; if you stay,
 You are lost for ever; let not so much nobleness
 Wilfully perish.
Sess. How near?
 2. Cit. He's here behind you. Ex. Sess. Boatsw.
Sess. We thank you. vanish. Saylers, Citizens.

Enter Ferand, Ronvere Florish Cornets.

Fer. Double the Guards and take in men that dare,
 These slaves are frighted; where are the proud Rebels?
 To what protection fled? what villain leads 'em?
 Under our nose distur'd our rest?

Ronver. We shall hear,
 For such a search I have sent, to hunt the Traytors.

Fer. Yet better men I say, we stand too open:
 How now Castruchio? how do you like our glory?

Cast. I must confess, 'twas somewhat more than my
 This open glory agrees not with my body, (match Sir;
 But if it were ith' Castle, or some strength,
 Where I might have my swinge.

Vil. You have been swing'd brother;
 How these delights have tickled you? you itch yet?
 Will you walk out again in pomp?

Cast. Good Fool.

Vil. These rogues must be rebuked, they are too sawcy,
 These peremptory Knaves Will you walk out Sir,
 And take the remnant of your Coronation?
 The people stay to see it.

Fer. Do not vex him,
 H'as grief enough in's bones; you shall to the Citadel,
 And like my self command, there use your pleasure,
 But take heed to your person.

Vil. The more danger,
 Still the more honor Brother.

Cast. If I reign not then,
 And like a King, and thou shalt know it fool,
 And thou shalt feel it fool.

Vil. Fools still are freemen,
 I'll sue for a protection, till thy reign's out.

Fer. The people have abus'd the liberty
 I late allow'd, I now proclaim it straighter,
 No men shall walk together nor salute;
 For they that do shall dye.

Ronver. You hit the right Sir;
 That liberty cut off, you are free from practise.

Fer. Renew my guards.

Ronver. I shall.

Fer. And keep strict watches;
 One hour of joy I ask.

Ron. You shall have many. Exeunt Flor. Cor.

*Pandulfo and Juliana, led by two of the guard,
 as not yet fully recovered.*

1. Guard.

You are now at liberty, in your own house Lady,
 And here our charge takes end.

Pand. 'Tis now a Custom.

We must even wooe those men deserve worst of us,
 And so we thank your labors; there's to drink,
 For that, and mischief are your occupations;
 And to mean well to no man, your chief'st harvests.

2. Gard. You give liberally; we hope Sir, cr't be long,
 To be oftner acquainted with your bounty,
 And so we leave you.

Pand. Do, for I dote not on ye;

Jul. But where's my Husband? what should I do here?
 Or what share have I in this joy, call'd liberty,
 Without his company? Why did you flatter me,
 And tell me he was return'd; his service honor'd?

1. Gard. He is so, and stands high in the Kings favor,

His friends redeemed, and his own liberty,
 From which yours is deriv'd, confirm'd; his service,
 To his own wish, rewarded: so fare-well Lady. Ex. Guard.

Pand. Go persecute the good, and hunt ye hell-hounds,
 Ye Leeches of the time, suck till ye burst slaves;
 How does my girl?

Jul. Weak yet, but full of comfort;

Pand. Sit down, and take some rest.

Jul. My heart's whole Father;
 That joys, and leaps, to hear my Violet,
 My Dear, my life, has conquer'd his afflictions.

Pand. Those rude hands, and that bloody will that did
 That durst upon thy tender body print (this,
 These Characters of cruelty; hear me heaven.

Jul. O Sir be sparing.

Pand. I'll speak it, tho I burst;
 And tho the ayr had ears, and serv'd the Tyrant,
 Out it should go: O here me thou great Justice;
 The miseries that wait upon their mischiefs,
 Let them be numberless, and no eye pittie

Them when their souls are loaden, and in labour, (ror-
 And wounded through, and through, with guilt and hor;
 As mine is now with grief; let men laugh at 'em 'em,
 Then, when their monstrous sins, like earth-quakes, shake
 And those eyes, that forgot heaven would look upward,
 The bloody 'larms, of the conscience beating,
 Let mercy flye, and day strook into darknes,
 Leave their blind souls, to hunt out their own horrors.

Jul. Enough, enough, we must forget dear Father;
 For then we are glorious formes of heaven; and live,
 When we can suffer, and as soon forgive.

But where's my Lord? methinks I have seen this house,
 And have been in't before.

Pand. Thine own house jewel.

Jul. Mine, without him? or his, without my company?
 I think it cannot be; it was not wont Father. (heaven)

Pand. Some business with the King, (let it be good,
Enter Boy.

Jul. It must be good and noble,
 For all men that he treats with tast of virtue;
 His words and actions are his own; and Honour's
 Not brought, nor compell'd from him.

Pand. Here's the Boy.

He can confirm us more, how sad the child looks?
 Come hither Lucio; how, and where's thy Master?

Jul. Speak gentle Boy.

Pand. Is he return'd in safety?

Jul. If not, and that thou knowst is miserable,
 Our hopes and happines declin'd for ever;
 Study a sorrow excellent as thy Master,
 Then if thou canst live leave us.

Lucio. Noble Madam,
 My Lord is safe return'd, safe to his friends, and fortune,
 Safe to his Countrey, entertain'd with honour,
 Is here within the house.

Jul. Do not mock me.

Lucio. But such a melancholly hangs on his mind,
 And in his eyes inhabit such sad shadowes;
 But what the cause is—

Pand. Go tell him we are here Boy,
 There must be no cause now.

Jul. Hast thou forgot me?

Lucio. No noblest Lady.

Jul. Tell him I am here,
 Tell him his wife is here, found my name to him,
 And thou shalt see him start; speak Juliana,
 And like the Sun that labors through a tempest,
 How suddainly he will disperse his sadness?

Pand. Go I command thee instantly,
 And charge him on his duty.

Jul. On his love Boy:

I would fain go to him.

Pand. Away, away, you are foolish.

Jul. Bear all my service sweet Boy.

O

Pand.

Pand. Art thou here still?

Jul. And tell him what thou wilt that shall become Pand. Ith' hquise, and know we are here. Ex. Boy. (thee.

Jul. No, no, he did not;

I warrant you he did not: could you think
His love had less than wings, had he but seen me;
His strong affection any thing but fire
Consuming all weak lets and rubs before it,
Till he had met my flame, and made one body?
If ever heavens high blessings met in one man,
And there erected to their holy uses
A sacred mind fit for their services,
Built all of polish'd honor, 'twas in this man:
Misdoubt him not.

Pand. I know he's truly noble;
But why this sadness, when the general cause
Requires a Jubile of joy?

Jul. I know not.

Enter Virolet and Boy.

Pand. Pray heaven you find it not.

Jul. I hope I shall not:

O here he comes, and with him all my happiness;
He stays and thinks, we may be too unmannerly;
Pray give him leave.

they stand off.

Pand. I do not like this sadness.

Vir. O hard condition of my misery!

Unheard of plagues! when to behold that woman,
That chaste and virtuous woman, that preserv'd me,
That pious wife, wedded to my afflictions,
Must be more terrible than all my dangers.
O fortune, thou hast rob'd me of my making,
The noble building of a man, demolish'd,
And flung me headlong, on a sin so base
Man and mankind contemn; even beasts abhor it,
A sin more dull than drink, a shame beyond it;
So foul, and far from faith; I dare not name it,
But it will cry it self out, loud ingratitude.
Your blessing Sir.

Pand. You have it in abundance;
So is our joy, to see you safe.

Vir. My Dear one;

Jul. Has not forgot me yet: O take me to you Sir.

Vir. Must this be added to increase my misery,
That she must weep for joy, and loose that goodness?
My Juliana, even the best of women,
Of wives the perfectest, let me speak this,
And with a modesty declare thy virtues,
Chaster than Chrystal, on the Scythian Cliffs
The more the proud winds Court, the more the purer.
Sweeter in thy obedience than a Sacrifice;
And in thy mind a Saint, that even yet living,
Producest miracles, and women daily,
With crooked and lame souls creep to thy goodness,
Which having toucht at, they become examples.
The fortitude of all their sex, is Fable
Compar'd to thine; and they that fill'd up glory,
And admiration, in the age behind us,
Out of their celebrated urns, are started,
To stare upon the greatness of thy spirit;
Wondring what new Martyr heaven has begot,
To fill the times with truth, and ease their stories:
Being all these, and excellent in beauty,
(For noble things dwell in the noblest buildings)
Thou hast undone thy husband, made him wretched,
A miserable man, my Juliana,
Thou hast made thy Virolet.

Jul. Now goodness keep me;
Oh! my dear Lord.

Pand. She wrong you? what's the meaning?
Weep not, but speak, I charge you on obedience;
Your Father charges you, she make you miserable?
That you your self confesse.

Vir. I do, that kills me;
And far less I have spoke her than her merit.

Jul. It is some sin of weakness, or of ignorance?

For sure my Will——

Vir. No, 'tis a sin of excellence:

Forgive me heaven, that I prophane thy blessings:
Sit still; I'll shew you all.

Exit Virolet.

Pand. What means this madness?

For sure there is no tast of right man in it;
Grieves he our liberty, our preservation?
Or has the greatness of the deed he has done,
Made him forget, for whom, and how he did it,
And looking down upon us, scorn the benefit?
Well Virolet, if thou beest proud, or treacherous.

Jul. He cannot Sir, he cannot; he will shew us,
And with that reason ground his words.

Enter Virolet, Martia, Ronvere.

Pand. He comes.

What Masque is this? what admirable beauty?
Pray heaven his heart be true.

Jul. A goodly woman.

Vir. Tell me my dear; and tell me without flattery,
As you are nobly honest, speak the truth;
What think you of this Lady?

Jul. She is most excellent.

Vir. Might not this beauty tell me it's a sweet one,
Without more setting off, as now it is,
Thanking no greater Mistress than meer nature,
Stagger a constant heart?

Pand. She is full of wonder I
But yet; yet Virolet.

Vir. Pray by your leave Sir!

Jul. She would amaze:

Vir. O! would she so? I thank you;
Say to this beauty, she have all additions,
Wealth, noble birth.

Pand. O hold there.

Vir. All virtues,
A mind as full of candor as the truth is,
I, and a loving Lady.

Jul. She must needs

(I am bound in conscience to confesse) deserve much.

Vir. Nay, say beyond all these, she be so pious,
That even on slaves condemn'd she showre her benefits,
And melt their stubborn Bolts with her soft pitty,
What think you then?

Pand. For such a noble office,
At these years, I should dote my self; take heed boy,
Jul. If you be he, that have receiv'd these blessings,
And this the Lady: love her, honor her;
You cannot do too much, to shew your gratitude,
Your greatest service will shew off too slender.

Vir. This is the Lady; Lady of that bounty,
That wealth, that noble name, that all I spoke of:
The Prince Ascanio and my self, the slaves
Redeem'd, brought home, still guarded by her goodness,
And of our liberties you tast the sweetness;
Even you she has preserv'd too, lengthen'd your lives.

Jul. And what reward do you purpose? it must be a main
If love will do it we'll all, so love her, serve her. (one,
Vir. It must be my love.

Jul. Ha!

Vir. Mine, my only love,
My everlasting love:

Pand. How?

Vir. Pray have patience.
The recompence she ask'd, and I have render'd,
Was to become her husband: then I vowed it,
And since I have made it good.

Pand. Thou durst not.

Vir. Done Sir,

with me,

Jul. Be what you please, his happiness yet stays
You have been mine; oh my unhappy fortune.

Pand. Nay, break and dye;

Jul. It cannot yet: I must live,

Till

Till I see this man, blest in his new love,
And then :

Pand. What hast thou done? thou base one tell me,
Thou barren thing of honesty, and honor;
What hast thou wrought? Is not this she, look on her,
Look on her, with the eyes of gratitude,
And wipe thy false tears off; Is not this she,
That three times on the Rack, to guard thy safety,
When thou stood'st lost, and naked to the Tyrant;
Thy aged Father here, that shames to know thee,
Inag'd ith' jaws of danger; was not this she,
That then gave up her body to the torture?
That tender body, that the wind sings through;
And three times, when her sinews, crack'd and tortur'd,
The beauties of her body turn'd to ruines;
Even then, within her patient heart, she lock'd thee;
Then hid thee from the Tyrant, then preserv'd thee,
And canst thou be that slave?

Martia. This was but duty,
She did it for her Husband, and she ought it;
She has had the pleasure of him, many an hour,
And if one minutes pain cannot be suffer'd;
Mine was above all these, a nobler venter,
I speak it boldly, for I lost a Father.
He has one still, I left my friends, he has many;
Expos'd my life, and honor to a cruelty,
That if it had seiz'd on me, racks and tortures,
Alas, they are Triumphs to it: and had it hit,
For this mans love, it should have shewed a triumph,
Twice lost, I freed him; Rossana lost before him,
His fortunes with him; and his friends behind him:
Twice was I rack'd my self for his deliverance,
In honor first and name, which was a torture
The hang-man never heard of; next at Sea,
In our escape, where the proud waves took pleasure
To toss my little Boat up like a bubble,
Then like a meteor in the ayr he hung,
Then catch'd and flung him in the depth of darknes;
The Cannon from my incens'd Fathers Ship,
Ringing our Knell, and still as we peep'd upward,
Beating the raging surge, with fire and Bullet,
And I stood fixt for this mans sake, and scorn'd it;
Compare but this:

Vir. 'Tis too true; O my fortune!
That I must equally be bound to either:
Jul. You have the better and the nobler Lady,
And now I am forc'd, a lover of her goodness.
And so far have you wrought for his deliverance,
That is my Lord, so lovingly and nobly,
That now methinks I stagger in my Title.
But how with honesty? for I am a poor Lady,
In all my dutious service but your shadow,
Yet would be just; how with fair fame and credit,
I may go off; I would not be a strumpet:

O my dear Sir, you know:

Vir. O truth, thou knowest too.

Jul. Nor have the world suspect, I fell to mischief.

Law. Take you no care for that, here's that has done it,
A fair divorce, 'tis honest too.

Pand. The devil,
Honest? to put her off?

Law. Most honest Sir,
And in this point most strong.

Pand. The cause, the cause Sir?

Law. A just cause too.

Pand. As any is in hell, Lawyer.

Law. For barrenness, she never brought him children.

Pand. Why art thou not divorc'd? thou canst not get 'em,
Thy neighbors, thy rank neighbors: O base juggling,
Is she not young?

Jul. Women at more years Sir,
Have met that blessing; 'tis in heavens high power.

Law. You never can have any:

Pand. Why quick Lawyer?

My Philosophical Lawyer.

Law. The Rack has spoil'd her
The distentions of those parts, hath stopt all fruitfulness.

Pand. O I could curse.

Jul. And am I grown so miserable,
That mine own pitty must make me wretched?
No cause against me, but my love, and duty?
Farewell Sir, like obedience, thus I leave you,
My long farewell: I do not grudge, I give Sir,
And if that be offensive, I can dye,
And then you are fairly free: good Lady love him;
You have a noble, and an honest Gentleman,
I ever found him so, the world has spoke him,
And let it be your part still to deserve him:
Love him no less than I have done, and serve him,
And heaven shall bless you; you shall bless my ashes
I give you up the house, the name of wife,
Honor, and all respect I borrowed from him,
And to my grave I turn: one farewell more;
Nothing divide your Loves, not want of Children,
Which I shall pray against, and make you fruitful;
Grow like two equal flames, rise high and glorious,
And in your honor'd age burn out together:
To all I know, farewell:

Ronver. Be not so griev'd Lady,
A nobler fortune.

Jul. Away thou parasite.
Disturb not my sad thoughts, I hate thy greatness.

Ron. I hate not you, I am glad she's off these hinges,
Come, let's pursue. Ex. Ronvere and Law.

Pand. If I had breath to curse thee,
Or could my great heart utter, farewell villain,
Thy house, nor face agen, Exit Pand.

Mar. Let 'em all go.

And now let us rejoyce, now freely take me,
And now embrace me Violet, give the rites
Of a brave Husband to his love.

Vir. I'll take my leave too.

Mar. How take your leave too?

Vir. The house is furnish'd for you,
You are Mistress, may command.

Mar. Will you to bed Sir?

Vir. As soon to hell, to any thing I hate most;
You must excuse me, I have kept my word.
You are my Wife, you now enjoy my fortune.
Which I have done to recompence your bounty:
But to yield up those chaste delights and pleasures,
Which are not mine, but my first vowes.

Mar. You jeast.

Vir. You will not find it so, to give you those
I have divorc'd, and lost with Juliana,
And all fires of that nature —

Mar. Are you a Husband?

Vir. To question hers, and satisfie your flames,
That held an equal beauty, equal bounty —
Good heaven forgive; no, no, the strict forbearance,
Of all those joys, like a full sacrifice,
I offer to the sufferings of my first love,
Honor, and wealth, attendance, state, all duty,
Shall wait upon your will, to make you happy,
But my afflicted mind, you must give leave Lady,
My weary Trunk must wander.

Mart. Not enjoy me?

Go from me too?

Vir. For ever thus I leave you;
And how so e're I fare, live you still happy. Exit Virol.

Mar. Since I am scorn'd, I'll hate thee, scorn thy gifts too,
Thou miserable fool, thou fool to pitty,
And such a rude, demolisht thing, I'll leave thee,
In my revenge: for foolish love, farewell now,
And anger, and the spite of woman enter,
That all the world shall say, that read this story,
My hate, and not my love, begot my glory.

Exit Martia.
Alcius

Actus Quartus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Seff. Boatswaine, Master, Gunner.

Seff. He that fears death, or tortures, let him leave me.
The stops that we have met with, Crown our Conquest.
Common attempts are fit for common men;
The rare, the rarest spirits. Can we be daunted?
We that have fini'd at Sea at certain ruines,
Which men on shore but hazarded would shake at:
We that have liv'd free, in despite of fortune,
Laught at the out-stretch'd Arm of Tyranny,
As still too short to reach us, shall we faint now?
No my brave mates, I know your fiery temper,
And that you can, and dare, as much as men:
Calapity, that severs worldly friendships,
Could ne'r divide us, you are still the same;
The constant followers of my banisht fortunes;
The Instruments of my revenge; the hands
By which I work, and fashion all my projects.

Maft. And such we will be ever.

Gun. 'Slight Sir, Cramme me
Into a Cannons mouth, and shoot me at
Proud Ferrand's head; may only he fall with me,
My life I rate at nothing.

Boatfw. Could I but get,
Within my swords length of him; and if then
He scape me, may th'account of all his sins
Be added unto mine.

Maft. 'Tis not to dye Sir,
But to dye unreveng'd, that staggers me:
For were your ends serv'd, and our Countrey free,
We would fall willing sacrifices.

Seff. To rise up.
Most glorious Martyrs.

Boatfw. But the reason why
We wear these shapes?

Seff. Only to get access:
Like honest men, we never shall approach him,
Such are his fears, but thus attir'd like Switzers,
And fashioning our language to our habits;
Bold, bloody, desperate, we may be admitted
Among his guard. But if this fail I'll try
A thousand others, out-do Proteus
In various shapes, but I will reach his heart.
And seal my anger on't.

Enter Ronvere and the Guard.

Maft. The Lord Ronvere.

Boatfw. Shall we begin with him?

Seff. He is not ripe yet,
Nor fit to fall: as you see me begin,
With all care Imitate.

Gun. We are instructed.

Boatfw. Would we were at it once.

Ron. Keep a strict watch,
And let the guards be doubled, this last night
The King had fearful dreams.

Seff. 'Tis a good Omen
To our attempts.

Ron. What men are these? what seek you?

Seff. Employment.

Ron. Of what nature?

Seff. We are Soldiers;
We have seen Towns and Churches set on fire;
The Kennels runing blood, Coy virgins ravish'd;
The Altars ranfack'd, and the holy reliques,

Yea, and the Saints themselves, made lawful spoils,
Unto the Conquerors: but these good days are past,
And we made Beggars, by this idle peace,
For want of action. I am Sir no stranger
To the Government of this state, I know the King
Needs men, that only do what he commands,
And search no farther: 'tis the profession
Of all our Nation, to serve faithfully,
Where th'are best payed: and if you entertain us,
I do not know the thing you can command,
Which we'll not put in act.

Ron. A goodly Personage.

Maft. And if you have an Enemy, or fo
That you would have dispatch'd.

Gun. They are here, can fit you.

Boatfw. Or if there be an Itch, though to a man.

Seff. You shall tye
Our consciences in your purse strings.

Ron. Gentlemen,
I like your freedome: I am now in hast,
But wait for my return. I like the Rascals,
They may be useful.

Seff. We'll attend you Sir:

Ron. Do, and be confident of entertainment;
I hope you will deserve it. Exit Ron. and Guard.

Seff. O, no doubt Sir:
Thus far we are prosperous; we'll be his guard;
Till Tyranny and pride find full reward: Exeunt.

Enter Pandulfo, and Juliana.

Pand. My blessing? no; a Fathers heavy curse,
Pursue, and overtake him,

Jul. Gentle Sir.

Pand. My name, and Family, end in my self
Rather then live in him.

Jul. Dear Sir forbear,
A fathers curses, hit far off, and kill too.
And like a murdering piece ayms not at one,
But all that stand within the dangerous level.
Some bullet may return upon your self too,
Though against nature, if you still go on
In this unnatural course.

Pand. Thou art not made
Of that same stuff as other women are:
Thy injuries would teach patience to blaspheme,
Yet still thou art a Dove.

Jul. I know not malice, but like an innocent, suffer.

Pand. More miraculous!
I'll have a woman Chronicled, and for goodness,
Which is the greatest wonder. Let me see,
I have no Son to inherit after me;
Him I disclaim.

What then? I'll make thy vertues my sole heir;
Thy story I'll have written, and in Gold too;
In prose and verse, and by the ablest doers:
A word or two of a kind step-father
I'll have put in, good Kings and Queens shall buy it.
And if the actions of ill great women,
And of the modern times too, are remembred,
That have undone their husbands and their families,
What will our story do? It shall be so,
And I will streight about it. Exit Pand.

Enter Boy.

Jul. Such as love
Goodness for glory, have it for reward;
I love mine for it self: let innocence
Be written on my Tomb, though ne're so humble;
'Tis all I am ambitious of. But I
Forget my vows.

Boy. Fore me you are not modest,
Nor is this Courtlike. Would you take it well,

If she should rudely press into your Closet,
When from your several Boxes you choose paint,
To make a this days face with?

Jul. What's the matter:

Boy. Pray know her pleasure first.

Jul. To whom speak you Boy?

Boy. Your Ladships pardon. That proud Lady thief,
That stole away my Lord from your embraces,
(Wrinkles at two and twenty on her cheeks for't,
Or Mercury unallayed, make blisters on it)
Would force a visit.

Jul. And dare you deny her,
Or any else that I call mine? No more,
Attend her with all reverence and respect;
The want in you of manners, my Lord may Construe in me for malice. I will teach you
How to esteem and love the beauty he dotes on;
Prepare a Banquet.

Enter Martia and Boy.

Madam, thus my duty
Stoops to the favor you vouchsafe your servant,
In honouring her house.

Mart. Is this in scorn?

Jul. No by the life of Violet: give me leave
To swear by him, as by a Saint I worship,
But am to know no farther, my heart speaks that
My servants have been rude, and this boy (doting
Upon my sorrows) hath forgot his duty:
In which, that you may think I have no share,
Sirra, upon your knees, desire her pardon.

Boy. I dare not disobey you.

Mart. Prethee rise,
My anger never looks so low: I thank you.
And will deserve it, if we may be private,
I came to see and speak with you.

Jul. Be gone.
Good Madam sit.

Exit Boy.

Mart. I rob you of your place then.

Jul. You have deserv'd a better, in my bed;
Make use of this too: Now your pleasure Lady.
If in your breast there be a worthy pitty,
That brings you for my comfort, you do nobly:
But if you come to triumph in your conquest,
Or tread on my calamities, 'twill wrong
Your other excellencies. Let it suffice,
That you alone enjoy the best of men,
And that I am forsaken.

Mart. He the best?
The scum and shame of mankind.

Jul. Violet, Lady?

Mart. Blest in him? I would my youth had chosen
Consuming feavers, bed-rid age
For my companions, rather than a thing
To lay whose baseness open, would even poison
The tongue that speaks it.

Jul. Certainly from you
At no part he deserves this; and I tell you,
Durst I pretend but the least title to him,
I should not hear this.

Mart. He's an impudent villain,
Or a malicious wretch: to you ungrateful;
To me beyond expression barbarous.
I more than hate him; from you he deserves
A death most horrid: from me, to dye for ever,
And know no end of torments. Would you have comfort?
Would you wash off the stain that sticks upon you,
In being refus'd? Would you redeem your fame,
Shipwrack'd in his base wrongs? if you desire this,
It is not to be done with slavish suffering,
But by a Noble anger, making way
To a most brave revenge, we may call justice;
Our injuries are equal; joyn with me then,

And share the honor,

Jul. I scarce understand you,
And know I shall be most unapt to learn
To hate the man I still must love and honor.

Mart. This foolish dotage in soft-hearted women,
Makes proud men insolent: but take your way,
I'll run another course.

Jul. As you are noble,
Deliver his offence.

Mart. He has denied
The rites due to a wife.

Jul. O me most happy,
How largely am I paid for all my sufferings?
Most honest Violet, thou just performer
Of all thy promises: I call to mind now,
When I was happy in those joys you speak of,
In a chaste bed, and warranted by Law too,
He oft would swear, that if he should survive me,
(Which then I knew he wisht not) never woman
Should taste of his embraces; this one act
Makes me again his debtor.

Mart. And was this
The cause my youth and beauty were contemn'd?
If I sit down here! wel —

Jul. I dare thy worst,
Plot what thou canst, my piety shall guard him
Against thy malice. Leave my house and quickly,
Thou wilt infect these innocent walls. By virtue
I will inform him of thy bloody purpose,
And turn it on thine own accursed head;
Believ't I will.

Exit Juliana.

Mart. But 'tis not in thy power
To hinder what I have decreed against him.
I'll set my self to sale, and live a strumpet;
Forget my birth, my father, and his honor,
Rather than want an instrument to help me
In my revenge. The Captain of the guard,
(Blest opportunity) courts me.

Enter Ronvere.

Ron. Sad and troubled?
How brave her anger shews? how it sets off
Her natural beauty? under what happy star
Was Violet born, to be belov'd and sought to,
By two incomparable women? noblest Lady,
I have heard your wrongs and pitty them: and if
The service of my life could give me hope
To gain your favor, I should be most proud
To be commanded.

Mart. 'Tis in you, my Lord,
To make me your glad servant.

Ron. Name the means.

Mart. 'Tis not preferment, Jewels, Gold, or Courtship.
He that desires to reap the harvest of
My youth and beauty, must begin in blood,
And right my wrongs.

Ron. I apprehend you Madam,
And rest assured 'tis done; I am provided
Of instruments to fit you: To the King,
I'll instantly present you; if I fail,
He shall make good your aymes: he's less than man,
That to achieve your favor, would not do
Deeds, fiends would fear to put their agents to. Exeunt.

Enter Violet Reading.

Vir. Quod invitus facis, non est scelus. 'Tis an axiome,
Now whether willingly I have departed
With that I lov'd: with that, above her life
Lov'd me again, crown'd me a happy husband,
Was full of children her afflictions,
That I begot, that when our age must perish,
And all our painted frailties turn'd to ashes,

Then

Then shall they stand and propogate our honors.
 Whether this done, and taking to protection
 A new strange beauty, it was a useful one:
 How to my lust? if it be so, I am sinful;
 And guilty of that crime I would sling from me.
 Was there not in it this fair course of virtue?
 This pious course, to save my friends, my Countrey,
 That even then had put on a mourning garment,
 And wept the desolation of her children?
 Her noblest children? Did not she thrust me on,
 And to my duty clapt the spur of honor?
 Was there a way, without this woman, left me
 To bring 'em off? the marrying of this woman?
 If not, why am I stung thus? why tormented?
 Or had there been a wild desire joyn'd with it,
 How easily, both these, and all their beauties
 Might I have made mine own? why am I toucht thus,
 Having perform'd the great redemption,
 Both of my friends and family? fairly done it?
 Without base and lascivious ends; O Heaven,
 Why am I still at War thus? why this a mischief,
 That honesty and honor had propounded,
 I, and absolv'd my tender will, and chid me,
 Nay then unwillingly flung me on?

Enter Juliana and the Boy.

Boy. He's here Madam;
 This is the melancholly walk he lives in,
 And chooses ever to increase his sadness.

Jul. Stand by.

Vir. 'Tis she: how I shake now and tremble?
 The virtues of that mind are torments to me.

Jul. Sir, if my hated face shall stir your anger,
 Or this forbidden path I tread in vex you;
 My love, and fair obedience left behind me,
 Your pardon asked, I shall return and bless you.

Vir. Pray stay a little, I delight to see you;
 May not we yet, though fortune have divided us,
 And set an envious stop between our pleasures,
 Look thus one at another? sigh and weep thus?
 And read in one anothers eyes, the Legends,
 And wonders of our old loves? be not fearful,
 Though you be now a Saint, I may adore you:
 May I not take this hand, and on it sacrifice
 The sorrows of my heart? white seal of virtue.

Jul. My Lord, you wrong your wedlock.

Vir. Were she here,
 And with her all severe eyes to behold us,
 We might do this; I might name Juliana,
 And to the reverence of that name, bow thus:
 I might sigh Juliana she was mine once;
 But I too weak a guard for that great treasure—
 And whilst she has a name, believe me Lady,
 This broken heart shall never want a sorrow.

Jul. Forget her sir, your honor now commands you
 You are anothers, keep those griefs for her,
 She richly can reward 'em. I would have spoken with you.

Vir. What is your will? for nothing you can ask,
 So full of goodness are your words and meanings,
 Must be denied: speak boldly.

Jul. I thank you sir. I come not
 To beg, or flatter, only to be believ'd,
 That I desire: for I shall tell a story,
 So far from seeming truth, yet a most true one;
 So horrible in nature, and so horrid;
 So beyond wickedness, that when you hear it,
 It must appear the practice of another,
 The cast and malice of some one you have wrong'd much,
 And me, you may imagine me accuse too,
 Unless you call to mind my daily sufferings;
 The infinite obedience I have born you,
 That hates all name and nature of revenge.
 My love, that nothing but my death can sever,

Rather than hers I speak of.

Vir. Juliana,

To make a doubt of what you shall deliver,
 After my full experience of your virtues,
 Were to distrust a providence; to think you can lie,
 Or being wrong'd, seek after soul reparings,
 To forge a Creed against my faith.

Jul. I must do so, for it concerns your life Sir;
 And if that word may stir you, hear and prosper:
 I should be dumb else, were not you at stake here.

Vir. What new friend have I found, that dares deliver
 This loaden trunk from his afflictions?
 What pitying hand, of all that feels my miseries,
 Brings such a benefit?

Jul. Be wise and manly,
 And with your honor fall, when Heaven shall call you,
 Not by a hellish mischief.

Vir. Speak my blest one,
 How weak and poor I am, now she is from me?

Jul. Your wife.

Vir. How's that?

Jul. Your wife.

Vir. Be tender of her, I shall believe else—

Jul. I must be true; your ear, sir;
 For 'tis so horrible, if the ayr catch it,
 Into a thousand plagues, a thousand monsters,
 It will disperse it self, and fright resistance. Whispers.

Vir. She seek my life with you? make you her agent?
 Another love? O speak but truth.

Jul. Be patient,
 Dear as I love you, else I leave you wretched.

Vir. Forward, 'tis well, it shall be welcome to me;
 I have liv'd too long, numbred too many days,
 Yet never found the benefit of living;
 Now when I come to reap it with my service,
 And hunt for that my youth and honor aims at,
 The Sun sets on my fortune red and bloody,
 And everlasting night begins to close me,
 'Tis time to dye.

Enter Martia and Ronvere.

Jul. She comes her self.

Ron. Believe Lady,
 And on this Angel hand, your servant seals it,
 You shall be Mistress of your whole desires,
 And what ye shall command.

Mart. Ha mynion,
 My precious Dame, are you there? nay go forward,
 Make your complaints, and pour out your fain'd pitties, slave, like to him you serve: I am the same still,
 And what I purpose, let the world take witness,
 Shall be so finisht, and to such example,
 Spite of your poor preventions, my dear Gentleman,
 My honorable man, are you there too?
 You and your hot desire? your mercy Sir,
 I had forgot your greatness,

Jul. 'Tis not well Lady.

Mart. Lord, how I hate this fellow now; how despe-
 My stomach stands against him; this base fellow,
 This gelded fool!

Jul. Did you never hear of modesty?

Mart. Yes, when I heard of you and so believ'd it,
 Thou bloodless, brainless fool.

Vir. How?

Mart. Thou despised fool,
 Thou only sign of man, how I contemn thee!
 Thou woven worthy in a piece of Arras,
 Fit only to enjoy a wall; thou beast
 Beaten to use; Have I preserv'd a beauty,
 A youth, a love, to have my wishes blasted?
 My dotings, and the joys I came to offer,
 Must they be lost, and sleighted by a dormouse?

Jul. Use more respect; and woman, 'twill become you;

At

At least, less tongue.

Mart. I'll use all violence,
Let him look for't.

Jul. Dare you stain those beauties,
Those heavenly stamps, that raise men up to wonder,
With harsh and crooked motions? are you she
That overdid all ages, with your honor;
And in a little hour dare loose this triumph?
Is not this man your husband?

Mart. He's my halter;
Which (having sued my pardon) I fling off thus,
And with him all I brought him, but my anger;
Which I will nourish to the desolation,
Not only of his folly, but his friends,
And his whole name.

Vir. 'Tis well, I have deserved it.
And if I were a woman, I would rail too.

Mart. Nature nere promised thee a thing so noble.
Take back your love, your vow, I give it freely;
I poorly scorn it; graze now where you please:
That that the dulness of thy soul neglected,
Kings sue for now. And mark me, Violet,
Thou image of a man, observe my words well.
At such a bloody rate I'll sell this beauty,
This handsomness thou scornst and flingst away,
Thy proud ungrateful life shall shake at: take your house;
The petty things you left me give another;
And last, take home your trinket: fare you well, Sir,

Ron. You have spoke like your self;
Y'are a brave Lady. Exeunt Ronvcre and Martia.

Jul. Why do you smile, Sir?

Vir. O my Juliana,
The happiness this womans scorn has given me,
Makes me a man again; proclaims it self,
In such a general joy, through all my miseries,
That now methinks——

Jul. Look to your self dear Sir,
And trifle not with danger that attends you;
Be joyful when y'are free.

Vir. Did you not hear her?
She gave me back my vow, my love, my freedom;
I am free, free as air; and though to-morrow
Her bloody will meet with my life, and sink it,
And in her execution tear me piecemeal:
Yet have I time once more to meet my wishes,
Once more to embrace my best, my noblest, truest;
And time that's warranted.

Jul. Good Sir, forbear it:
Though I confess, equal with your desires
My wishes rise, as covetous of your love,
And to as warm alarms spur my will to:
Yet pardon me, the Seal oth' Church dividing us,
And hanging like a threatening flame between us,
We must not meet, I dare not.

Vir. That poor disjoynting
That only strong necessity thrust on you,
Not crime, nor studied cause of mine: how sweetly,
And nobly I will bind again and cherish;
How I will recompence one dear embrace now,
One free affection! how I burn to meet it!
Look now upon me.

Jul. I behold you willingly,
And willingly would yield, but for my credit.
The love you first had was preserv'd with honor,
The last shall not cry whore; you shall not purchase
From me a pleasure, that have equally
Lov'd your fair fame as you, at such a rate:
Your honesty and virtue must be bankrupt,
If I had lov'd your lust, and not your lustre;
The glorious lustre of your matchless goodness,
I would compel you now to be! —— forgive me,
Forgive me Sir, how fondly still I love you!
Yet nobly too; make the way straight before me,
And let but holy Hymen once more guide me;

Under the Ax upon the Rack again,
Even in the bed of all afflictions,
Where nothing sings our Nuptials but dire sorrows,
With all my youth and pleasure I'll embrace you,
Make Tyranny and death stand still affrighted,
And at our meeting souls amaze our mischiefs;
Till when, high heaven defend you, and peace guide you.
Be wise and manly, make your fate your own,
By being master of a providence,
That may controle it.

Vir. Stay a little with me,
My thoughts have chid themselves: may I not kiss you?
Upon my truth I am honest.

Jul. I believe ye;
But yet what that may raise in both our fancies,
What issues such warm parents breed.

Vir. I obey you,
And take my leave as from the Saint that keeps me.
I will be right again, and once more happy
In thy unimitable love.

Jul. I'll pray for ye,
And when you fall I have not long to follow. Exeunt.

Enter Sesse, Master, Botefwain, and Gunner, at one door, Martia and Ronvcre, at another.

Ses. Now we have got free credit with the Captain.
Mast. Soft, soft, he's here again: Is not that Lady—
Or have I lost mine eyes? a salt rhume seizes 'em;
But I should know that face.

Botf. Make him not madder,
Let him forget the woman; steer a lar-board.

Mast. He will not kill her.
Botf. Any thing he meets;
He's like a Hornet now, he hums, and buzzes;
Nothing but blood and horror.

Mast. I would save the Lady,
For such another Lady.

Botf. There's the point;
And you know there want women of her mettle.
Mast. 'Tis true, they bring such children now,
Such demilancies,
Their fathers socks will make them Christning clothes.

Gunn. No more, they view us.
Ses. You shall play a while,
And sun your self in this felicity,
You shall you glorious whore, I know you still.
But I shall pick an hour when most securely——
I say no more.

Ron. Do you see those? those are they Shall act your will; come hither my good fellows:
You are now the Kings. Are they not goodly fellows?

Mart. They have bone enough, if they have stout heart
Mast. Still the old wench. (to it.)

Sesf. Pray Captain, let me ask you
What Noble Lady's that? 'tis a rude question,
But I desire to know.

Ron. She is for the King, Sir;
Let that suffice for answer.

Sesf. Is she so Sir?
In good time may she curse it.
Must I breed hackneys for his grace?

Ron. What wouldst thou do
To merit such a Ladies favor?

Sesf. Any thing.
Ron. That can supply thy wants, and raise thy fortunes?
Sesf. Let her command, and see what I dare execute.

I keep my conscience here; if any man
Oppose her will, and she would have him humbled,
Whole families between her and her wishes——
Mast. 'We have seen bleeding throats sir, Citics factt;
And infants stuck upon their pikes.

Botef. Houses a fire, and handsome mothers weeping.
Sesf. Which we have heaped upon the pile like sacrifices.
Churches

Churches and Altars, Priests and all devotions,
Tumbled together into one rude Chaos.

Gun. We know no fear Sir, but want of employment.

Seff. Nor other faith but what our purses preach.
To gain our ends we can do any thing,
And turn our souls into a thousand figures;
But when we come to do—

Mart. I like these fellows.

Ron. Be ready and wait here within this hour
I'll shew you to the King, and he shall like ye:
And if you can devise some entertainment
To fill his mirth, such as your Countrey uses,
Present it, and I'll see it grac'd.
After this Comicke Scene we shall imploy you,
For one must dye.

Seff. What is he sir? speak boldly,
For we dare boldly do.

Ron. This Ladies husband;
His name is Violet.

Seff. We shall dispatch it. Exit Martia, Ronvere.
O damned, damned thing: a base whore first:
And then a murtherer, I'll look to you.

Botf. Can she be grown so strange?

Seff. She has an itch;
I'll scratch you my dear daughter, I'll so claw you;
I'll curry your hot hide; married and honour'd?
And turn those holy blessings into brothels?
Your beauty into blood? I'll hunt your hotness.
I'll hunt you like a train.

Mart. We did all pitty her.

Seff. Hang her, she is not worth mans memory;
She's false and base, and let her fright all stories.
Well, though thou beest mine enemy, I'll right thee,
And right thee Nobly.

Botf. Faith sir, since she must go,
Let's spare as few as may be.

Seff. We'll take all,
And like a torrent sweep the slaves before us.
You dare endure the worst?

Mart. You know our hearts sir,
And they shall bleed the last, ere we start from ye.

Gun. We can but dye, and ere we come to that,
We shall pick out some few examples for us.

Seff. Then wait the first occasion, and like Curtius,
I'll leap the gulph before you, fearless leap it:
Then follow me like men, and if our virtues
May buoy our Countrey up, and set her shining
In her first state; our fair revenges taken,
We have our noble ends or else our ashes. Exeunt.

Actus V.

Scena Prima.

Enter Ascanio, and Martia above.

Mart. As you are noble, keep me from discovery,
And let me only run a strangers fortune;
For when the King shall find I am his daughter
He ever holds most ominous, and hates most:
With what eyes can he look, how entertain me,
But with his fears and cruelties?

Asc. I have found you,
Suspect not, I am bound to what you like best,
What you intend, I dare not be so curious
To question now, and what you are, lies hid here.

Enter Ferrand and Ronvere above.

The King comes, make your fortune, I shall joy in't.

Ron. All things are ready sir to make you merry,
And such a King, you shall behold him now.

Fer. I long for't,
For I have need of mirth.

Ron. The Lady sir.

Fer. Now as I am a King, a sprightly beauty,
A goodly sweet aspect! my thanks Ronvere,
My best thanks; on your lips I seal your wishes,
Be what you can; imagine mine, and happy.
And now sit down and smile; come my Ascanio;
And let this Monarch enter.

Enter Seff. and Mr. Bortfw. Gunner, and Saylor.

Ronv. These are the Switzers:
I told your grace of.

Fer. Goodly promising fellows,
With faces to keep fools in awe, I like 'em;
Go guard the presence well, and do your duties,
To morrow I shall take a farther view:

Seff. You shall Sir,
Or I shall loose my will; how the whore's mounted?
How she sits thron'd? thou blasing muddy meteor,
That frightest the under world with lustful flashes,
How I shall dash thy flames? away, no word more:
Ex. Seff. and his company. Flourish Cor.

Enter Villio, Castruchio, Doctor, and a Guard.

Fer. Now, here he comes in glory; be merry Masters,
A Banquet too? meat conveyed away.

Ron. O, he must sit in State Sir!

Asca. How rarely he is usher'd? can he think now
He is a King indeed?

Ron. Mark but his countenance.

Cast. Let me have pleasures infinite, and to the height,
And women in abundance, many women,

Enter Ladies.

I will disport my grace,
Stand there and long for me.
What have ye brought me here? is this a Feast
Fit for a Prince? a mighty Prince? are these things,
These preparations, ha?

Doct. May it please your grace? Marchpanes,

Cast. It does not please my grace: where are the
The Custards double royal, and the subtilties?
Why, what weak things are you to serve a Prince thus?
Where be the delicates oth' earth and ayr?
The hidden secrets of the Sea? am I a plow-man,
You pop me up with porridge? hang the Cooks.

Fer. O most Kingly:

What a Majestick anger?

Cast. Give me some wine.

Asca. He cools agen now.

Cast. Fool where are my Players?

Let me have all in pomp; let 'em play some love matter,
To make the Ladies itch, I'll be with you anon Ladies;
You black eyes, I'll be with you.
Give me some wine I say,
And let me have a Masque of Cuckolds enter:
Of mine own Cuckolds,
And let them come in, peeping and rejoycing.
Just as I kiss their wives, and somewhat glorying.
Some wine I say, then for an excellent night-piece,
To shew my glory to my loves, and minions,
I will have some great Castle burnt.

Vil. Hark you brother:

If that be to please these Ladies, ten to one
The fire first takes upon your own, look to that;
Then you may shew a night piece.

Cast. Where's this wine?

Why shall I choak? do ye long all to be tortur'd?

Doct. Here Sir.
 Cast. Why, what is this? why Doctor.
 Doct. Wine and water Sir.
 'Tis Sovereign for your heat, you must endure it.
 Vil. Most excellent to cool your night-piece Sir.
 Doct. You are of a high and choleric complexion,
 And you must have allayes.
 Cast. Shall I have no sheere wine then?
 Doct. Not for a world: I tender your dear life Sir;
 And he is no faithful subject—
 Vil. No, by no means:
 Of this you may drink, and never hang, nor quarter,
 Nor never whip the fool, this liquors merciful.
 Cast. I will sit down and eat then: Kings when th'are
 May eat I hope? (hungry,
 Doct. Yes, but they eat discreetly.
 Cast. Come, tast this dish, and cut me liberally;
 I like sauce well.
 Doct. Fie 'tis too hot Sir:
 Too deeply season'd with the spice, away with't,
 You must acquaint your stomach with those dyets
 Are temperately nourishing.
 Cast. But pray fray Doctor,
 And let me have my meat again.
 Doct. By no means:
 I have a charge concerns my life.
 Cast. No meat neither;
 Do Kings never eat Doctor?
 Doct. Very little Sir.
 And that too very choice.
 Vil. Your King never sleeps Brother,
 He must not sleep, his cares still keep him waking.
 Now he that eats and drinks much is a dormouse;
 The third part of a wafer is a weeks diet.
 Cast. Appoint me something then.
 Doct. There.
 Cast. This I feel good,
 But it melts too suddainly; yet, how, that gone too!
 Ye are not mad! I charge you: take away.
 Doct. For your health Sir,
 A little quickens nature, much depresses.
 Cast. Eat nothing for my health? that's a new dyet,
 Let me have something, something has some savor.
 Why thou uncourteous Doctor, shall I hang thee?
 Doct. 'Tis better Sir than I should let you forfeit,
 My death were nothing.
 Vil. To loose a King, were terrible.
 Cast. Nay, then I'll carve my self, I'll stay no ceremonies.
 This is a Patridge Pye, I am sure that's nourishing,
 Or Galen is an Ass: 'tis rarely season'd:
 Ha Doctor have I hit right? a mark a mark there? take away.
 Vil. What ails thy grace?
 Cast. Retriv those Patridges.
 Or as I am a King—
 Doct. Pray Sir be patient,
 They are slown too far.
 Vil. These are breath'd pyes an't please you,
 And your hawkes are such Buzards.
 Cast. A King and have nothing,
 Nor can have nothing!
 Vil. What think you of pudding?
 A pudding Royal?
 Cast. To be royally starv'd,
 Whip me this fool to death; he is a blockhead.
 Vil. Let 'em think they whip me, as we think you a King:
 'Twill be enough.
 Cast. As for your dainty Doctor, the Table taken away,
 All gone, all snatch'd away, and I unsatisfied,
 Without my wits being a King and hungry?
 Suffer but this thy treason? I tell thee Doctor.
 I tell it thee, in earnest, and in anger,
 I am damnably hungry, my very grace is hungry.
 Vil. A hungry grace is fittest to no meal Sir.
 Doct. Some two hours hence, you shall see more: but still Sir

You must retain an excellent and strict dyet. (Sir
 Vil. It sharpens you, and makes your wit so poynant,
 Your very words will kill.
 Doct. A bit of Marmalade
 No bigger than a Pease.
 Vil. And that well butter'd,
 The ayr thrice purified, and three times spirited;
 Becomes a King: your rare conserve of nothing
 Breeds no offence.
 Cast. Am I turn'd King Camelion,
 And keep my Court ith'ayr?
 Fer. They vex him cruelly.
 Asca. In two days more they'll starve him:
 Fer. Now the women, there's no food left but they.
 Asca. They'll prove small nourishment.
 Yet h'as another stomach and a great one,
 I see by his eye.
 Cast. I'll have mine own power here;
 Mine own Authority; I need no tutor.
 Doctor this is no dyet.
 Doct. It may be Sir
 Vil. Birlady, it may turn to a dry dyet;
 And how thy grace, will ward that—
 Cast. Stand off Doctor;
 And talk to those that want faith.
 Fer. Hot and mighty.
 Asca. He will cool apace, no doubt.
 Cast. Fair, plump, and red,
 A forehead high, an eye revives the dead;
 A lip like ripest fruit, inviting still.
 Vil. But O, the rusny well below the hill,
 Take heed of that, for though it never fail
 Take heed I say, for thereby hangs a tail.
 Cast. I'll get ye all with Child.
 Vil. With one Child Brother,
 So many men in a Blew Coat.
 Cast. Had I fed well.
 And drunk good store of wine, ye had been blest all,
 Blest all with double Births; come kiss me greedily,
 And think no more upon your foolish Husbands,
 They are transitory things: a Kings same meets you.
 Doct. Vanish away. Ex. Women.
 Cast. How, they gone too? my guard there:
 Take me this devil Doctor, and that fool there,
 And sow 'em in a sack; bring back the women,
 The lovely women, drown these rogues or hang 'em.
 Asca. He is in earnest Sir.
 I must needs take him off.

Enter Sess. Master, Boatsw. Gunner and Saylor.

Fer. In serious earnest,
 Sess. Now, now be free.
 Now liberty, now Countrey-men shake from ye
 The Tyrants yoke.
 All liberty, liberty, liberty.
 Guard. Treason, treason, treason.
 Fer. We are betray'd, fly to the Town, cry treason,
 And raise our faithful friends; O my Ascanio.
 Asca. Make hast, we have way enough.
 Guard. Treason, treason. Ex. Fer. Asca. and guard.
 Sess. Spare none, put all to th'sword: a vengeance shake
 Art thou turn'd King again? (thee;
 Cast. I am a Rascal:
 Spare me but this time, if ever I see King more,
 Or once believe in King.
 Sess. The ports are ours.
 The treasure and the port, fight bravely Gentlemen;
 Cry to the Town, cry liberty and honor;
crying liberty and freedom within.
 Waken their persecuted souls, cry loudly,
 We'll share the wealth among ye.
 Cast. Do you hear Captain?
 If ever you hear me, name a King.

Self. You shall not

Cast. Or though I live under one, obey him.

Gun. This Rogue again.

Self. Away with him good Gunner.

Cast. Why look ye Sir? I'll put you to no charge; I'll never eat.

Gun. I'll take a course, you shall not, Come, no more words.

Enter Boatswain.

Cast. Say nothing when you kill me.

Self. He's taken to the Towers strength; Now stand sure Gentlemen.

We have him in a pen, he cannot scape us, The rest oth' Castle's ours; liberty, liberty? What is this City up?

Boatsw. They are up and glorious, And rousing like a storm they come; their Tents Ring nothing but liberty and freedom. The women are in Arms too.

Self. Let 'em come all. Honour and liberty.

All. Honor and liberty.

Exeunt.

Enter Juliana.

Jul. This woman threatens, her eyes, even red with fury Which like prodigious meteors, foretold Assur'd destruction, are still before me. Besides I know such natures unacquainted With any mean, or in their love, or hatred, And she that dar'd all dangers to possess him, Will check at nothing, to revenge the loss Of what she held so dear, I first discover'd Her bloody purposes, which she made good, And openly profess'd 'em; that in me Was but a cold affection; charity Commands so much to all; for Violet Methinks I should forget my Sexes weakness, Rise up, and dare beyond a womans strength; Then do not counsel: he is too secure, And in my judgment, 'twere a greater service To free him from a deadly Enemy, Then to get him a friend. I undertook too, To cross her plots, oppos'd my piety, Against her malice; and shall vertue suffer? No Martia, wer't thou here equally armed, I have cause, spite of thy masculine breeding, That would assure the victory: my angel Direct and help me.

Enter Violet, like Ronvere.

Vir. The State in Combustion, Part of the Cittadel forc'd, the treasure seiz'd on; The guards corrupted, arm themselves against Their late protected Master; Ferrant fled too, And with small strength, into the Castle's Tower, The only Aventine, that now is left him? And yet the undertakers, nay, performers, Of such a brave and glorious enterprize, Are yet unknown: they did proceed like men, I like a child; and had I never trusted So deep a practice unto shallow fools, Besides my souls peace, in my Juliana, The honor of this action had been mine, In which, accrues'd, I now can claim no share.

Jul. Ronvere! 'tis he, a thing, next to the devil I most detest and like him terrible; Martia's right hand, the instrument I fear too, That is put to her bloody will, into act. Have I not will enough, and cause too mighty? Weak womens fear, fly from me.

Vir. Sure this habit,

This likeness to Ronvere, which I have studied, Either admits me safe to my design, Which I too cowardly have halted after, And suffer'd to be raviht from my glory; Or sinks me and my miseries together; Either concludes me happy.

Jul. He stands musing, Some mischief is now hatching: In the full meditation, of his wickedness, I'll sink his curst soul: guide my hand heaven, And to my tender arm give strength, and fortune, That I may do a pious deed, all ages Shall bless my name for; all remembrance crown me.

Vir. It shall be so.

Jul. It shall not, take that token, And bear it to the lustful arms of Martia, Tell her, for Violets dear sake, I sent it.

Vir. O I am happy, let me see thee, That I may bless the hand that gave me liberty, O courteous hand, nay thou hast done most nobly, And heaven has guided thee, 'twas their great justice; O blessed wound that I could come to kiss thee! How beautiful, and sweet thou shew'st!

Jul. Oh!

Vir. Sigh not, Nor weep not dear, shed not those sovereign Balfames Into my blood; which must recover me; Then I shall live again, to do a mischief, Against the mightiness of love and virtue, Some base unhallowed hand shall rob thy right of. Help me, I faint: so.

Jul. O unhappy wench!

How has my zeal abus'd me; you that guard virtue, Were ye asleep? or do you laugh at innocence? You suffer'd this mistake? O my dear Violet! An everlasting curse follow that forme I strook thee in, his name be ever blasted: For his accursed shadow has betray'd The sweetness of all youth, the nobleness, The honour, and the valor; wither'd for ever The beauty and the bravery of all mankind: O my dull, devils eyes.

Vir. I do forgive you, By this, and this I do? I know you were cozen'd; The shadow of Ronvere, I know you aym'd at, And not at me; but 'twas most necessary, I should be struck, some hand above directed you: For Juliana could not shew her justice Without depriving high heaven of his glory, Or any subject fit for her, but Violet: Forgive me too, and take my last breath sweet one, This the new marriage of our souls together; Think of me Juliana, but not often, For fear my faults should burthen your affections, Pray for me, for I faint.

Jul. O stay a little, A little little Sir.

Offers to kill her self.

Vir. Fye Juliana.

Jul. Shall I outlive the virtue, I have murder'd?

Vir. Hold, or thou hat'st my peace, give me the dagger, On your obedience, and your love, deliver it. If you do thus; we shall not meet in heaven sweet; No guilty blood comes there; kill your intentions, And then you conquer: there where I am going, Would you not meet me Dear?

Jul. Yes.

Vir. And still love me?

Jul. And still behold you.

Vir. Live then till heaven calls you. Then ripe and full of sweetness you rise fainted. Then I that went before you to prepare, Shall meet and welcome you, and daily court you With Hymnes of holy Love—I go out,

Give me your hand, farewell, in peace farewell,
Remember me, farewell.

dyes.

Jul. Sleep you sweet glasses,
An everlasting slumber crown those Chrystals,
All my delight adue, farewell, Dear Violet,
Dear, Dear, most Dear; O I can weep no more,
My body now is fire, and all consuming,
Here will I sit, forget the world and all things,
And only wait what heaven shall turn me to,
For, now methinks I should not live. She sits down.

Enter Pandulfo.

Pand. O my sweet daughter,
The work is finisht now, I promis'd thee:
Here are thy virtues shewed, here register'd,
And here shall live for ever.

Jul. Blot it, burn it,
I have no virtue, hateful I am as hell is.

Pand. Is not this Violet?

Jul. Ask no more questions,
Mistaking him I kill'd him.

Pand. O my Son,
Nature turns to my heart again, my dear Son,
Son of my age, would'st thou go out so quickly?
So poorly take thy leave, and never see me?
Was this a kind stroak daughter? could you love him?
Honour his Father, and so deadly strike him?
O wither'd timeles youth, are all thy promises,
Thy goodly growth of Honors come to this?
Do I halt still ith' world, and trouble nature,
When her main pieces founder, and fail dayly?

Enter Boy, and three Servants.

Boy. He does weep certain: what bodie's that lies by him?
How do you do Sir?

Pand. O look there Lucio,
Thy Master, thy best Master.

Boy. Woe is me.
They have kill'd him, slain him basely, O my Master!

Pand. Well daughter well, what heart had you to do this?
I know he did you wrong; but 'twas his fortune,
And not his fault, for my sake that have lov'd you,
But I see now you scorn me too.

Boy. O Mistress?
Can you sit there, and his cold body breathles?
Basely upon the earth?

Pand. Let her alone Boy,
She glories in his end.

Boy. You shall not sit here;
And suffer him you loved-ha! good Sir come hither,
Come hither quickly, heave her up; O heaven Sir,
O God, my heart, sh's cold; cold and stiff too:
Stiff as a stake, she's dead.

Pand. She's gone, nere bend her.
I know her heart, she could not want his company:
Blessing go with thy soul, sweet Angels shadow it
O, that I were the third now, what a happiness?
But I must live, to see you layd in earth both,
Then build a Chapel to your memories,
Where all my wealth shall fashion out your stories.
Then dig a little grave besides, and all's done.
How sweet she looks, her eyes are open smiling,
I thought she had been alive, you are my charge Sir,
And amongst you, I'll see his goods distributed.
Take up the bodies, mourn in heart my friends,
You have lost two noble succors; follow me,
And thou sad Countrey, weep this misery. Exeunt.

Enter Sess. Boatswaine, Master, Gunner, Citizens, and Souldiers, as many as may be.

Sess. Keep the Ports strongly mann'd, and let none enter,

But such as are known Patriots.

All. Liberty, liberty,

Sess. 'Tis a substantial thing, and not a word
You men of Naples, which if once taken from us,
All other blessings leave us; 'tis a jewel
Worth purchasing, at the dear rate of life,
And so to be defended. O remember
What you have suffer'd, since you parted with it;
And if again you wish not to be slaves,
And properties to Ferrand's pride and lust;
Take noble courage, and make perfect what
Is happily begun.

1. Cit. Our great preserver,
You have infranchis'd us, from wretched bondage.

2. Cit. And might be known, to whom we owe our freedom,
We to the death would follow him.

3. Cit. Make him King,
The Tyrant once remov'd.

Sess. That's not my end.
'Twas not ambition that brought me hither,
With these my faithful friends, nor hope of spoil;
For when we did possess the Tyrants treasure,
By force extorted from you, and employed,
To load you with most miserable thraldome,
We did not make it ours, but with it purchas'd
The help of these, to get you liberty,
That for the same price kept you in subjection.
Nor are we Switzers, worthy Countrey-men,
But Neapolitans, now eye me well;
And tho the reverend Emblems of mine age,
My silver locks are shorne, my beard cut off,
Partaking yet of an adulterate Colour;
Tho 14 years you have not seen this face,
You may remember it, and call to mind,
There was a Duke of Sess, A much wrong'd Prince,
Wrong'd by this Tyrant Ferrand.

1. Cit. Now I know him.

2. Cit. 'Tis he, long live the Duke of Sess.

Sess. I thank you.

The injuries I receiv'd, I must confess,
Made me forget the love I owed this Country,
For which I hope, I have given satisfaction,
In being the first that stir'd, to give it freedom;
And with your loves and furtherance, will call back,
Long banisht peace, and plenty, to this people:

2. Cit. Lead where you please, we'll follow.

1. Cit. Dare all dangers.

Enter Pandulf, the Bodies of Violet, and Juliana upon a Hearse.

Sess. What solemn funeral's this?

Pand. There rest a while,
And it's not possible there can be added
Wings to your swift desire of just revenge,
Hear, (if my tears will give way to my words)
In brief a most sad story.

Sess. Speak, what are they?

I know thee well Pandulfe.

Pand. My best Lord?
As far as sorrow will give leave, most welcome;
This Violet was, and but a Son of mine,
I might say, the most hopeful of our Gentry;
And though unfortunate, never ignoble:
But I'll speak him no farther. Look on this,
This face, that in a savage would move pity,
The wonder of her Sex, and having said
'Tis Juliana, Eloquence will want words
To set out her deservings; this blest Lady
That did indure the Rack, to save her Husband,
That Husband, who, in being forc'd to leave her,
Indur'd a thousand tortures; by what practise,
I know not, (but 'twas sure a cunning one)
Are made, the last I hope, but sad examples

Of Ferrands tyranny. Convey the bodies hence.

Seff. Express your sorrow
In your revenge, not teares, my worthy Soldiers:
That fertile earth that teem'd so many children,
To feed his cruelty, in her wounded wombe,
Can hardly now receive 'em.

Boats. We are cold,
Cold walls shall not keep him from us. (for a

Gun. Were he cover'd with mountains, and room only
Bullet to be sent level at him, I would speed him.

Mer. Let's scale this petty Tower; at Sea we are Falcons,
And fly unto the main top in a moment.
What then can stop us here?

1 Cit. We'll tear him piece-meal.

2 Cit. Or eat a passage to him.

Seff. Let discretion
Direct your anger; that's a victory,
Which is got with least loss, let us make ours such:
And therefore friends, while we hold parley here,
Raise your scalado on the other side,
But enter'd wreak your sufferings.

Exit Saylor and Soldiers.

1 Cit. In our wrongs.

There was no mean.

2 Cit. Nor in our full revenge
Will we know any.

Seff. Be pleas'd good man,
No sorrow can redeem them from death's Prison;
What his inevitable hand hath seiz'd on,
The world cannot recover. All the comfort
That I can give to you, is to see vengeance
Pour'd dreadfully upon the Authors head,
Of which their ashes may be sensible,
That have salu by him.

Sound a parley.

Enter Ferrand, Martia, Ascanio, and Ronvere, above.

Paad. They appear.

Fer. 'Tis not that we esteem rebellious Traytors
Worthy an answer to their proudest Summons
That we vouchsafe our presence; or to exchange
One syllable with 'em: but to let such know,
Though circled round with treason, all points bent
As to their Center at my heart, 'tis free,
Free from fear; villains, and in this weak Tower
Ferrand commands as absolute, as when
He trod upon your necks, and as much forns you.
And when the Sun of Majesty shall break through
The clouds of your rebellion, every beam
Instead of comfortable heat shall send
Consuming plagues among you; and you call
That government which you term'd tyrannous
Hereafter, gentle.

Seff. Flatter not thy self
With these deluding hopes, thou cruel beast,
Thou art it's toyle, and the glad Huntsman prouder,
By whom thou art taken, of his prey, than if (Like thee) he should command, and spoil his Forrest.

Fer. What art thou?

Seff. To thy horror Duke of Seffe.

Fer. The Diuel.

Seff. Reserv'd for thy damnation.

Fer. Why shakes my love?

Mart. O I am lost for ever;
Mountains divide me from him; some kind hand
Prevent our fearful meeting: Or lead me
To the steep rock, whose rugged brows are bent
Upon the swelling main; there let me hide me:
And as our bodies then shall be divided,
May our souls never meet.

Fer. Whence grows this, Sweetest?

Mart. There are a thousand furies in his looks;
And in his deadly silence more loud horror,

Than when in hell the tortur'd and tormentors
Contend whose shrieks are greater. Wretched me!
It is my father.

Seff. Yes, and I will own her, Sir,
Till my revenge. It is my daughter, Ferrand;
My daughter thou hast whor'd.

Fer. I triumph in it:
To know she's thine, affords me more true pleasure,
Than the act gave me, when even at the height,
I crack'd her Virgin zone. Her shame dwell on thee,
And all thy family; may they never know
A female issue, but a whore; Ascanio.
Ronvere, look cheerfull; be thou a man too,
And learn of me to dye. That we might fall,
And in our ruins swallow up this Kingdom,
Nay the whole world, and make a second Chaos.
And if from thence a new beginning rise,
Be it recorded this did end with us;
And from our dust hath embryon.

Ron. I liv'd with you,
And will dye with you; your example makes me
Equally bold.

Asc. And I resolv'd to bear
What ere my fate appoints me.

Seff. They are ours,
Now to the spoyl.

Boats. Pity the Lady; to all else be deaf. Exeunt.
Within, Kill, kill, kill. Alarm Flo. Trumpets.
Retreat.

Enter Seffe with Ferrands head, the Citizens, Master, Boatswaine, Gunner, Souldiers bringing in Ascanio, and Martia.

Seff. Cruel beginnings meet with cruel ends;
And the best sacrifice to Heaven for peace,
Is tyrants blood: and those that stuck fast to him,
Flesh'd instruments in his commands to mischief,
With him dispatch'd.

Boats. They are cut off.

Seff. 'Tis well.

All. Thanks to the Duke of Seffe.

Seff. Pay that to Heaven,

And for a general joy, give general thanks:
For blessings nere descend from Heaven, but when
A grateful Sacrifice ascends from men.
To your devotion, leave me, there's a Scene,
Which I would act alone; yet you may stay,
For wanting just spectators, 'twill be nothing.
The rest forbear me.

Cit. Liberty, liberty, liberty.

Mar. I would I were as far beneath the Centre,
As now I stand above it; how I tremble!
Thrice happy they that dyed; I dying live
To stand the whirlwind of a fathers fury.
Now it moves toward me.

Seff. Thou, I want a name,
By which to stile thee: All articulate sounds
That do express the mischief of vile woman,
That are, or have been, or shall be, are weak
To speak thee to the height. Witch, Parricide,
For thou, in taking leave of modesty,
Hast kild thy father, and his honor lost;
He's but a walking shadow to torment thee.
To leave, and rob thy father; then set free
His foes, whose slavery he did prefer
Above all treasure, was a strong defeazance
To cut off, even the surest bonds of mercy.
After all this, having given up thy self,
Like to a sensual beast, a slave to lust,
To play the whore, and then (high Heaven it racks me)
To find out none to quench thy appetite,
But the most cruel King, whom next to Hell,
Thy father hated; and whose black imbraces

Thou

Thou shouldst have fled from, as the whips of furies;
What canst thou look for?

Enter Pandulph, and bodies born on the Harse.

Mart. Death; and 'tis not in you
To hurt me farther: my old resolution,
Take now the place of fear; in this I liv'd,
In this I'll dye, your daughter.

Pand. Look but here;
You had I know, a guilty hand in this;
Repent it Lady.

Mart. Juliana dead?
And Violet?

Pand. By her unwilling hand.

Mart. Fates you are equal. What can now fall on me,
That I will shrink at? now unmov'd I dare
Look on your anger, and not bend a knee
To ask your pardon; let your rage run higher
Than billows rais'd up by a violent Tempest,
And be, as that is, deaf to all intreaties:
They are dead, and I prepar'd; for in their fall
All my desires are summ'd up.

Seff. Impudent too?
Die in it wretch.

Boatf. Stay Sir.

Boatf. kills her.

Seff. How dar'st thou villain,
Snatch from my sword the honor of my justice?

Boatf. I never did you better service Sir,
Yet have been ever faithful. I confess
That she deserv'd to dye; but by whose hand?
Not by a fathers. Double all her guilt,
It could not make you innocent, had you done it.
In me 'tis murder, in you 'twere a crime
Heaven could not pardon. Witness that I love you,
And in that love I did it.

Seff. Thou art Noble,
I thank thee for't; the thought of her dye with her.

Asc. My turn is next: since she could find no mercy,
What am I to expect?

Cit. With one voyce, Sir,
The Citizens salute you with the stile
Of King of Naples.

Seff. I must be excus'd,
The burden is too heavy for my shoulder,
Bestow it where 'tis due. Stand forth Ascanio,
It does belong to you; live long and wear it,
And warn'd by the example of your Unkle,
Learn that you are to govern men, not beasts:
And that it is a most improvident head,
That strives to hurt the limbs that do support it.
Give burial to the dead; for me, and mine,
We will again to Sea, and never know
The place, which in my birth first gave me woe. Exeunt

Flor. Trumpets.

Enter Lifauro, Terzo, Ismenia, and Aminta.

Lif. L Et the Coach go round, we'll walk along these Meadows:
— L And meet at Port again: Come my fair Sister, These cool shades will delight ye,
Am. Pray be merry,
The Birds sing as they meant to entertain ye,
Every thing smiles abroad; methinks the River

(As he steals by) curls up his head, to view ye:
Every thing is in love.

Ism. You would have it so.
You that are fair, are easie of belief, Cosen,
The theam slides from your tongue.

Am. I fair? I thank ye:
Mine's but shadow when your Sun shines by me.

Ism. No more of this, you know your worth (Aminta)
Where are we now?

Am. Hard by the Town (Ismena)

Ter. Close by the Gates;
Ism. 'Tis a fine Ayr.
Lif. A delicate;
 The way so sweet and even, that the Coach
 Would be a tumbling trouble to our pleasures:
 Methinks I am very merry:
Ism. I am sad:
Am. You are ever so when we entreat ye (Cofen)
Ism. I have no reason: such a trembling here
 Over my heart methinks:
Am. Sure you are fasting;
 Or not slept well to night; some dream (Isimena?) (cent,
Ism. My dreams are like my thoughts, honest and inno-
 Yours are unhappy? who are these that coast us? Enter
 You told me the walk was private. Antonio and Martin.
Ter. 'Tis most commonly:
Ism. Two proper men: It seems they have some business,
 With me none sure; I do not like their faces;
 They are not of our Company:
Ter. No Cofen:
Lisuro, we are dog'd.
Lif. I find it (Cofen)
Am. What handsome Lady?
Mar. Yes, she's very handsome.
 They are handsome both.
Am. Martin, stay we are cofen'd.
Mar. I will go up; a woman is no wild-fire.
Am. Now by my life she is sweet: Stay good Martin,
 They are of our enemies; the house of Belides.
 Our mortal enemies:
Mar. Let 'em be devils,
 They appear so handsomly, I will go forward;
 If these be enemies, I'll ne'r seek friends more.
Am. Prethee forbear, the Gentlewomen.
Mar. That's it (man)
 That moves me like a Gin.
 'Pray ye stand off Ladies:
Lif. They are both our enemies: both hate us equally;
 By this fair day our mortal foes.
Ter. I know 'em,
 And come here to affront: how they gape at us?
 They shall have gaping work.
Ism. Why your swords, Gentlemen?
Ter. Pray ye stand you off, Cofen,
 And good now leave your whistling: we are abus'd all:
 Back, back I say:
Lif. Go back.
Am. We are no dogs Sir,
 To run back on command.
Ter. We'll make ye run, Sir.
Am. Having a civil charge of handsome Ladies,
 We are your servants: pray ye no quarrel Gentlemen.
 There's way enough for both.
Lif. We'll make it wider.
Am. If you will fight, arm'd from this Saint; have at ye.
Ism. O me unhappy, are ye Gentlemen?
 Discreet, and Civil, and in open view thus?
Am. What will men think of us; nay you may kill us;
 Mercy o'me; through my petticoat; what bloody Gentlemen!
Ism. Make way through me, ye had best, and kill an innocent
 Brother, why Cofen: by this light I'll dye too:
 This Gentleman is temperate: be you merciful:
 Alas, the Swords.
Am. You had best run me through
 'Twill be a valiant thrust.
Ism. I faint amongst ye.
Am. Pray ye be not fearful: I have done (sweet Lady)
 My swords already aw'd, and shall obey ye:
 I come not here to violate sweet beauty,
 I bow to that.
Ism. Brother, you see this Gentleman,
 This noble Gentleman.
Lif. Let him avoid then,
 And leave our Walk.

Am. The Lady may command Sir,
 She bears an eye more dreadful than your weapon.
Ism. What a sweet nature this man has? dear brother,
 Put up your sword.
Ter. Let them put up and walk then: (us:
Am. No more loud words: there's time enough before
 For shame put up, do honor to these beauties:
Mar. Our way is this,
 We will not be denyed it.
Ter. And ours is this, we will not be cross'd in it.
Am. What ere your way is (Lady) 'tis a fair one;
 And may it never meet with rude hands more,
 Nor rough uncivil Tongues. Exeunt.
Ism. I thank ye Sir,
 Indeed I thank ye nobly: a brave Enemy,
 Here's a sweet temper now: This is a man (Brother)
 This Gentleman's anger is so nobly feated,
 That it becomes him: Yours proclaim ye Monsters.
 What if he be our House-Foe? we may brag on't:
 We have ne'er a friend in all our House so honorable:
 I had rather from an Enemy, my Brother,
 Learn worthy distances and modest difference,
 Than from a race of empty friends, loud nothings;
 I am hurt between ye.
Am. So am I, I fear too: Dear Cofen
 Why look ye pale? where are ye hurt?
Ism. I know not,
 But here methinks.
Lif. Unlace her gentle Cofen.
Ism. My heart, my heart, and yet I bless the Hurter.
Am. Is it so dangerous?
Ism. Nay, nay, I faint not.
Am. Here is no blood that I find, sure 'tis inward:
Ism. Yes, yes, 'tis inward: 'twas a subtle weapon,
 The hurt not to be cur'd I fear.
Lif. The Coach there.
Am. May be a fright.
Ism. Aminta, 'twas a sweet one,
 And yet a cruel.
Am. Now I find the wound plain:
 A wondrous handsome Gentleman.
Ism. Oh no deeper:
 Prethee be silent, (wench) it may be thy case.
Am. You must be searched; the wound will rancle, Cofen
 And of so sweet a nature.
Ism. Dear Aminta:
 Make it not sorer.
Am. And on my life admires ye.
Ism. Call the Coach, Cofen.
Am. The Coach, the Coach.
Ter. 'Tis ready bring the Coach there.
Lif. Well my brave Enemies, we shall yet meet ye,
 And our old hate shall testify.
Ter. It shall (Cofen) Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Antonio and Martine.

Am. Their swords, alas, I weigh 'em not (dear Friend)
 The indiscretion of the Owners blunts 'em;
 The fury of the House affrights not me,
 It spends it self in words: (Oh me Martine)
 There was a two edg'd eye, a Lady carried
 A weapon that no valor can avoyd,
 Nor Art (the hand of Spirit) put aside.
 O Friend, it broke out on me like a bullet
 Wrapt in a cloud of fire: that point (Martine)
 Dazled my fence, and was too subtle for me,
 Shot like a Comet in my face, and wounded
 (To my eternal ruine, my hearts valor.
Mar. Methinks she was no such piece.
Am. Blaspheme not Sir,
 She is so far beyond weak commendation,

That

That impudence will blush to think ill of her.

Mar. I see it not, and yet I have both eyes open:
And I could judge, I know there is no beauty
Till our eyes give it 'em, and make 'em handsome,
What's red and white, unless we do allow 'em?
A green face else; and me-thinks such an other.

Ant. Peace thou leud Heretick; Thou judge of beauties?
Thou hast an excellent sense for a sign-post (Friend)
Dost thou not see? P'ill swear thou art soon blind else,
As blind as ignorance; when she appeared first
Aurora breaking in the east, and through her face,
As if the hours and graces had strew'd Roses,
A blush of wonder flying; when she was frighted
At our uncivil swords, didst thou not mark
How far beyond the purity of snow
The soft wind drives whiteness of innocence,
Or any thing that bears Celestial paleness,
She appear'd o'th' sodain? Didst thou not see her tears
When she intreated? O thou Reprobate!
Didst thou not see those orient tears flow'd from her,
The little Worlds of Love? A set (Martine)
Of such sanctified Beads, and a holy heart to love
I could live ever a Religious Hermite.

Mar. I do believe a little, and yet methinks
She was of the lowest stature.

Ant. A rich Diamond
Set neat and deep, Natures chief Art (Martine)
Is to reserve her Models curious,
Not cambersome and great; and such an one
For fear she should exceed, upon her matter
Has she fram'd this; Oh 'tis a spark of beauty,
And where they appear so excellent in little,
They will bat flame in great; Extention spoils 'em:
Martine learn this, the narrower that our eyes
Keep way unto our object, still the sweeter
That comes unto us: Great bodies are like Countries,
Discovering still, toyl and no pleasure finds 'em.

Mar. A rare Cosmographer for a small Island,
Now I believe she is handsome.

Ant. Believe heartily,
Let thy belief, though long a coming, save thee.

Mar. She was (certain) fair.
Ant. But heark ye (friend Martine)
Do not believe your self too far before me,
For then you may wrong me, Sir.

Mar. Who bid ye teach me?
Do you show me meat, and stich my lips (Antonio)?
Is that fair play?

Ant. Now if thou shouldst abuse me,
And yet I know thee for an errant wench,
A most immoderate thing, thou canst not love long.

Mar. A little serves my turn, I fly at all games,
But I believe.

Ant. How if we never see her more?
She is our enemy.

Mar. Why are you jealous then?
As far as I conceive she hates our whole House.

Ant. Yet (good Martine)
Mar. Come, come, I have mercy on ye:
You shall enjoy her in your dream (Antonio)
And I'll not hinder: though now I perswade my self.

Enter Aminta with a Letter.

Ant. Sit with perswasion down, and you deal honestly:
I will look better on her.

Mar. Stay, who's this, Friend?
Ant. Is't not the other Gentlewoman?
Mar. Yes, a Letter.

She brings to challenge sure: if she do (Antonio)
I hope she'll be a Second too; I am for her.

Ant. A good hour Gentlemen.
Ant. You are welcome Lady;
'Tis like our late rude passage has powr'd on us

Some reprehension.

Am. No I bring no anger,
Though some deserv'd it.
Ant. Sure we were all to blame, Lady;
But for my part (in all humility
And with no little shame) I ask your pardons,
Indeed I wear no sword to fright sweet beauties.

Am. You have it, and this Letter; pray ye Sir view it,
And my Commission's done.

Mar. Have ye none for me Lady?
Am. Not at this time.
Mar. I am sorry for't; I can read too.

Am. I am glad: but Sir, to keep you in your exercise,
You may chance meet with one ill written.

Mar. Thank ye,
So it be a womans, I can pick the meaning,
For likely they have but one end.

Am. You say true Sir. Exit.
Ant. Martine, my wishes are come home and loaden,
Loaden with brave return: most happy, happy:
I am a blessed man: where's the Gentlewoman?
Mar. Gone, the spirit's gone, what news?
Ant. 'Tis from the Lady;
From her we saw: from that same miracle,
I know her name now: read but these three lines;
Read with devotion, friend, the lines are holy.

Martine reads.

*I dare not chide ye in my Letter, (Sir)
'Twill be too gentle: If you please to look me
In the West-street, and find a fair Stone window,
Carved with white Cupids; there I'll entertain ye:
Night and discretion guide ye.*

Call me Ismena.

Ant. Give it me again: Come, come, fly, fly, I am all fire.
Mar. There may be danger.
Ant. So there is to drink
When men are thirsty, to eat hastily
When we are hungry: so there is in sleep, Friend,
Obstructions then may rise and smother us,
We may dye laughing, choak'd even at devotions:
An Apoplexie, or a sodain Palsey
May strike us down.

Mar. May be a train to catch ye.
Ant. Then I am caught: and let Love answer for it.
'Tis not my folly, but his infamy,
And if he be ador'd, and dare do vild things.

Mar. Well, I will go.
Ant. She is a Lady, Sir,
A Maid, I think, and where that holy spell
Is slung about me, I ne're fear a villany,
'Tis almost night: away friend.

Mar. I am ready,
I think I know the house too.

Ant. Then are we happy. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Ismena, and Aminta.

Ism. Did you meet him?
Am. Yes.
Ism. And did you give my Letter?
Am. To what end went I?
Ism. Are ye sure it was he?
Was it that Gentleman?
Am. Do you think I was blind?
I went to seek no Carrier, nor no Midwife.
Ism. What kind of man was he? thou mayst be deceiv'd Friend
Am. A man with a nose on's face: I think he had eyes too,
And hands: for sure he took it. (troubled?)
Ism. What an answer?
Am. What questions are these to one that's hot and
Do

Do you think me a Babe? am I not able (Cofin)
At my years and discretion, to deliver
A Letter handſomely! Is that ſuch a hard thing?
Why every Wafer-woman will undertake it:
A Sempſters girl, or a Tailors wife will not miſs it:
A Puritan Holters (Cofin) would ſcorn theſe queſtions.
My legs are weary.

Iſm. I'll make 'em well again.

Am. Are they at ſupper?

Iſm. Yes, and I am not well,

Nor deſire no company: look out, 'tis darkiſh.

Am. I ſee nothing yet: aſſure your ſelf, Iſmena,

If he be a man, he will not miſs.

Iſm. It may be he is modeſt,
And that may pull him back from ſeeing me;
Or has made ſome wild conſtruction of my eaſineſs:
I bluſh to think what I writ.

Am. What ſhould ye bluſh at?

Bluſh when you act your thoughts, not when you write 'em;
Bluſh ſoft between a pair of ſheets, ſweet Cofin,
Though he be a curious carried Gentleman, I cannot think
He's ſo unnatural to leave a woman,
A young, a noble, and a beauteous woman,
Leave her in her deſires: Men of this age
Are rather prone to come before they are ſent for.
Hark, I hear ſomething: up to th' Chamber, Cofin,
You may ſpoil all eſſe.

Enter Antonio and Martine.

Iſm. Let me ſee, they are Gentlemen;
It may be they.

Am. They are they: get ye up,
And like a Land-ſtar draw him.

Iſm. I am ſhame-fac'd

Ant. This is the ſtreet.

Mar. I am looking for the houſe:
Cloſe, cloſe, pray ye cloſe here.

Ant. No, this is a Merchants;
I know the man well:

Mar. And this a Pothecaries: I have lain here many times.
For a looſeneſs in my hilts.

Ant. Have ye not paſt it?

Mar. No ſure:

There is no houſe of mark that we have ſcaped yet.

Ant. What place is this?

Mar. Speak ſofter: 'may be ſpies;
If any, this, a goodly window too,
Carv'd far above, that I perceive: 'tis dark,
But ſhe has ſuch a luſtre.

Enter Iſmena and Aminta above with a Taper.

Ant. Yes Martine,
So radiant ſhe appears.

Mar. Elſe we may miſs, Sir:
The night grows vengeance black, pray heaven ſhe ſhine clear:

Hark, hark, a window, and a candle too.

Ant. Step cloſe, 'tis ſhe: I ſee the cloud diſperſe,
And now the beauteous Planet.

Mar. Ha, 'tis indeed,
Now by the ſoul of love a Divine Creature.

Iſm. Sir, Sir.

Ant. Moſt bleſſed Lady.

Iſm. 'Pray ye ſtand out.

Am. You need not fear, there's no body now ſtirring.

Mar. Beyond his commendation I am taken,
Infinite ſtrangely taken.

Am. I love that Gentleman,
Methinks he has a dainty nimble body:

I love him heartily.

Iſm. 'Tis the right Gentleman:
But what to ſay to him, Sir.

Am. Speak.

Ant. I wait ſtill,

And will do till I grow another Pillar,
To prop this houſe, ſo it pleaſe you.

Iſm. Speak ſoftly,

And 'pray ye ſpeak truly too.

Ant. I never ly'd, Lady.

Iſm. And don't think me impudent to aſk ye,
I know ye are an enemy, ſpeak low,
But I would make ye a friend.

Ant. I am friend to beauty;

There's no handſomneſs, I dare be foe to.

Iſm. Are ye married?

Ant. No.

Iſm. Are ye betrothed?

Ant. No, neither?

Iſm. Indeed (fair Sir.)

Ant. Indeed (fair ſweet) I am not.

Moſt beauteous Virgin, I am free as you are.

Iſm. That may be, Sir, then ye are miſerable,
For I am bound.

Ant. Happy the bonds that hold ye;
Or do you put them on your ſelf for pleaſure?
Sure they be ſweeter far than liberty:

There is no bleſſedneſs but in ſuch bondage:
Give me that freedom (Madam) I beſeech ye,
(Since you have queſtion'd me ſo cunningly)
To aſk you whom you are bound to, he muſt be certain
More than humane, that bounds in ſuch a beauty:
Happy that happy chain, ſuch links are heavenly.

Iſm. Pray ye do not mock me, Sir.

Ant. Pray ye (Lady) tell me.

Iſm. Will ye believe, and will ye keep it to ye?
And not ſcorn what I ſpeak?

Ant. I dare not, Madam,

As Oracle what you ſay, I dare ſwear to.

Iſm. I'll ſet the candle by: for I ſhall bluſh now;
Fie, how it doubles in my mouth? it muſt out,
'Tis you I am bound to.

Ant. Speak that word again.

I underſtand ye not.

Iſm. 'Tis you I am bound to.

Ant. Here is another Gentleman.

Iſm. 'Tis you, Sir.

Am. He may be lov'd too.

Mar. Not by thee, firſt curſe me.

Iſm. And if I knew your name.

Ant. Antonio (Madam)

Iſm. Antonio, take this kiſs, 'tis you I am bound to.

Ant. And when I ſet ye free, may heaven forſake me,
Iſmena.

Iſm. Yes, now I perceive ye love me,
You have learn'd my name.

Ant. Hear but ſome vows I make to ye:
Hear but the proteſtations of a true love.

Iſm. No, no, not now: vows ſhould be cheerful things,
Done in the cleereſt light, and nobleſt testimony:
No vow, dear Sir, tie not my fair belief
To ſuch ſtrict terms: thoſe men have broken credits,
Looſe and diſinembred faiths (my dear Antonio)
That ſplinter 'em with vows: am I not too bold?
Correct me when you pleaſe.

Ant. I had rather hear ye,
For ſo ſweet Muſick never ſtruk mine ears yet:
Will you believe now?

Iſm. Yes.

Ant. I am yours.

Iſm. Speak louder,

If ye answer the Priest ſo low, you will loſe your wedding.

Mar. Would I might ſpeak, I would holloa.

Ant. Take my heart,

And if it be not firm and honeſt to you,
Heaven—

Iſm. Peace, no more: I'll keep your heart, and credit it.

Keep

Keep you your word: when when will you come again
(Friend?)

For this time we have woo'd indifferently.
would fain see ye, when I dare be bolder.

Ant. Why any night: only (dear noble Mistrifs)
Pardon three daies: my Uncle Julio
Has bound me to attend him upon promise,
Upon expectation too: we have rare sports there,
Rare Countrey sports, I would you could but see 'em.
Dare ye so honor me?

Ism. I dare not be there,
You know I dare not, no, I must not (Friend)
Where I may come with honourable freedom:
Alas, I am ill too; we in love.

Ant. You flout me.

Ism. Trust me I do not: I speak truth, I am sickly,
And am in love: but you must be Physician.

Ant. I'll make a plaister of my best affection.

Ism. Be gone, we have supp'd, I hear the people stir,
Take my best wishes: give me no cause (Antonio)
To curse this happy night.

Ant. I'll lose my life first,
A thousand kisses.

Ism. Take ten thousand back again.

Mar. I am dumb with admiration: shall we goe, Sir?

Exeunt.

Ism. Dost thou know his Uncle?

Am. No, but I can ask, Cosin.

Ism. I'll tell thee more of that, come, let's to bed both,
And give me handsome dreams, Love, I beseech thee.

Am. 'Has given ye a handsome subject.

Ism. Pluck to the windows.

Exeunt.

Actus Secundus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Bustofa.

Bust. THe thundring Seas, whose watry fire washes
The whiting mops:

The gentle Whale whose feet so fell
Flies o'r the Mountains tops.

within Franio.

Fra. Boy.

Bust. The thundring.

Fra. Why boy Bustofa.

Bust. Here I am, the gentle Whale.

Enter Franio.

Fra. Oh, are you here, Sir? where's your Sister?

Bust. The gentle Whale flies o'r the Mountain tops.

Fra. Where's your Sister (man)

Bust. Washes the whiting-Mops.

Fra. Thou ly'st, she has none to wash Mops?

The boy is half way out of his wits, sure:
Sirrah, who am I?

Bust. The thundring Seas.

Fra. Mad, stark mad.

Bust. Will you not give a man leave to con?

Fra. Yes, and fesse too, e'r I have done with you Sirrah,
Am I your father?

Bust. The question is too hard for a child, ask me any thing
That I have learn'd, and I'll answer you.

Fra. Is that a hard question? Sirrah, am not I your Father

Bust. If I had my Mother-wit I could tell you.

Fra. Are you a thief?

Bust. So far forth as the Son of a Miller.

Fra. Will you be hang'd?

Bust. Let it go by eldership. The gentle Whale. —

Fra. Sirrah, lay by your foolish study there,
And beat your brains about your own affairs: or —

Bust. I thank you; you'd have me goe under the sails
And beat my brains about your Mill? a natural
Father you are. —

Fra. I charge you goe not to the sports to day:
Last night I gave you leave, now I recant.

Bust. Is the wind turn'd since last night?

Fra. Marry is it, Sir, go no farther than my Mill;
There's my command upon you.

Bust. I may go round about then as your Mill does?
I will see your Mill gelded, and his Stones fry'd in steaks,
E'r I deceive the Countrey so: have I not my part to study?
How shall the sports go forward, if I be not there?

Fra. They'll want their fool indeed, if thou be'st not there.

Bust. Consider that, and go your self.

Fra. I have fears, (Sir,) that I cannot utter,
You goe not, nor your Sister: there's my charge.

Bust. The price of your golden thumb cannot hold me.

Fra. I, this was sport that I have tightly lov'd,
I could have kept company with the Hounds.

Bust. You are fit for no other company yet. (y'faith:

Fra. Run with the Hare; and bin in the whore's tail

Bust. That was before I was born,
I did ever mistrust I was a Bastard,
Because Lapis is in the singular number with me.

Enter Otrante and Gerafto.

Otr. Leave thou that game (Gerafto) and chase here,
Do thou but follow it with my desires,
Thou'lt not return home empty.

Ger. I am prepar'd
(My Lord) with advantages: and see
Yonder's the subject I must work upon:

Otr. Her brother 'tis: methinks it should be easie:
That gross compound cannot but diffuse
The soul in such a latitude of ease,
As to make dull her faculties, and lazie:
What wit above the least can be in him,
That Reason ties together?

Ger. I have prov'd it, Sir,
And know the depth of it: I have the way
To make him follow me a hackney-pace,
With all that flesh about him; yes, and dragg
His Sister after him: This baits the old one,
Rid you him, and leave me to the other.

Exit.

Otr. 'Tis well: Oh Franio, the good day to you;
You were not wont to hear this Musick standing:
The Beagle and the Bugle ye have lov'd,
In the first rank of Huntsmen.

Bust. The dogs cry out of him now.

Fra. Sirrah, leave your barking, I'll bite you else:

Bust. Curr, Curr.

Fra. Slave, do'st call me dog?

Otr. Oh fie Sir, he speaks Latine to you,
He would know why you'll bite him.

Bust. Responde cur; You see his understanding (my Lord.)

Fra. I shall have a time to curry you for this:
But (my Lord) to answer you, the daies have been
I must have footed it before this Horn-pipe,
Though I had hazard'd my Mill a fire,
And let the stones grind empty: but those dancings
Are done with me: I have good will to it still,
And that's the best I can do,

Otr. Come, come, you shall be hors'd:
Your company deserves him, though you kill him,
Run him blind, I care not.

Bust. He'll do't o'th' purpose (my Lord) to bring him up to the Mill.

Fra. Do not tempt me too far (my Lord.)

Otr. There's a footi' th' stirrop: I'll not leave you now:
You shall see the Game fall once again:

Fra. Well (my Lord) I'll make ready my legs for you,
And try 'em once a horseback: sirrah, my charge, keep it.

Exit.

Bust.

Bust. Yes, when you pare down your dish for conscience
When your thumb's coyn'd into bone & legalis, (fake.)
When you are a true Man-Miller.

Otr. What's the matter Bustofa? (the staggers,

Bust. My Lord; if you have e'r a drunken Jade that has
That will fall twice the height of our Mill with him: set him (out o' the

O' th' back on him: a galled Fennet that will winch him

was

A fool going that way, but the Ass had better luck;) Or one of your brave Barbaries, that would pass the Straits, and run (would

Into his own Countrey with him; the first Moor he met,
Cut his throat for Complexions fake: there's as deadly feud between

A Moor and a Miller, as between black and white.

Otr. Fie, fie, this is unnatural Bustofa,
Unless on some strong cause.

Bust. Be Judge. (my Lord)
I am studied in my part: the Julian Feast is to day: the Countrey (sen for

Otr. Yes, and being studied too: and the main Speaker too.

Bust. The main? why all my Speech lies in the main,
And the dry ground together: The thundering seas, whose,

Otr. Nay, then thou must go, thou'lt be much condemn'd
But then o' th' other side, obedience.

Bust. Obedience?

But speak your conscience now (my Lord)
Am not I past asking blessing at these years?
Speak as you're a Lord, if you had a Miller to your father.

Otr. I must yield to you (Bustofa,) your reasons
Are so strong, I cannot contradict: This I think,
If you goe, your Sister ought to go along with you.

Bust. There I stumble now: she is not at age.

Otr. Why, she's fifteen, and upwards.

Bust. Thereabouts.

Otr. That's womans ripe age; as full as thou art
At one and twenty: she's manable, is she not?

Bust. I think not: poor heart, she was never try'd in my conscience.

'Tis a coy thing; she will not kiss you a clown, not if he
Would kiss her.

Otr. What man?

Bust. Not if he would kiss her, I say.

Otr. Oh, 'twas cleanlier than I expected: well Sir,
I'll leave you to your own; but my opinion is,
You may take her along: this is half way:
The rest (Gerasto) and I hunt my prey, — Exit.

Bust. Away with the old Miller (my Lord) and the Mill
Strikes fail presently.

Enter Pedro, with Gerasto blind, singing.

S O N G.

Ger. Come follow me (you Countrey-Lasses)
And you shall see such sport as passes:
You shall Dance, and I will Sing;
Pedro he shall rub the string:
Each shall have a loose bodied Gown
Of green; and laugh till you lie down.
Come follow me, come follow, &c.

Enter Florimel.

Bust. O sweet Diego, the sweetest Diego, stay: Sister
Florimel.

Flo. What's that, Brother?

Bust. Didst not hear Diego? Hear him, and thou'lt be ravish'd.

Flo. I have heard him sing, yet unravish'd, Brother.

Bust. You had the better luck (Sister.) I was ravish'd
By my own consent: Come away: for the Sports.

Flo. I have the fear of a Father on me (Brother.)

Bust. Out: the thief is as safe as in his Mill: he's hunting with our

Great Land-lord, the Don Otrante. Strike up Diego.

Flo. But say he return before us, where's our excuse?

Bust. Strike up Diego. Hast no strings to thy apron?

Flo. Well, the fault lie upon your head (Brother.)

Bust. My faults never mount so high (girl) they rise but to My middle at most. Strike up Diego.

Ger. Follow me by the ear, I'll lead thee on (Bustofa) and Pretty Florimel thy Sister: oh that I could see her.

Bust. Oh Diego, there's two pities upon thee; great pi-tie thou art blind;

And as great a pity, thou canst not see.

S O N G.

Ger. You shall have Crowns of Roses, Dayies,
Buds, where the honey-maker gazes;
You shall taste the golden thighs,
Such as in Wax-Chamber lies.
What fruit please you, taste, freely pull,
Till you have all your bellies full.

Come follow me. &c.

Bust. Oh, Diego, the Don was not so sweet when he perfum'd the Steeple. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Antonio and Martine.

Mar. Why, how now (Friend) thou art not lost agen?

Ant. Not lost? why, all the world's a wilderness;
Some places peopled more by braver beasts
Than others are: But faces, faces (man)
May a man be caught with faces?

Mar. Without wonder,
'Tis odds against him: May not a good face
Lead a man about by th' nose? 'las,
The nose is but a part against the whole.

Ant. But is it possible that two faces
Should be so twin'd in form, complexion,
Figure, aspect? that neither wen, nor mole;
The Table of the brow, the eyes lustre,
The lips cherry; neither the blush nor smile
Should give the one distinction from the other?
Does Nature work in molds?

Mar. Altogether.
We are all one mold, one dust.

Ant. Thy reason's moldie.
I speak from the Form, thou the Matter.
Why? was't not ever one of Natures Glories;
Nay, her great piece of wonder, that amongst
So many millions millions of her works
She left the eye distinction, to cull out
The one from th' other; yet all one name, the face?

Mar. You must compare 'em by some other part
Of the body, if the face cannot do't.

Ant. Didst ask her name?

Mar. Yes, and who gave it her?
And what they promis'd more, besides a spoon,
And what Apostles picture: she is christned too;
In token wherefore she is call'd Isabella,
The daughter of a Countrey plow-swain by:
If this be not true, she lies.

Ant. She cannot;
It would be seen a blister on her lip,
Should falsehood touch it, it is so tender:

Had her name held, 't had been Ismenia,
And not another of her name.

Mar. Shall I speak?

Ant. Yes, if thou'lt speak truth: Is she not wondrous like?

Mar. As two garments of the same fashion,
Cut from the same piece, yet if any excell,
This has the first; and in my judgement 'tis so.

Ant. 'Tis my opinion.

Mar. Were it the face

Where mine eye should dwell, I would please both
With this, as soon as one with the other.

Ant. And yet the other is the case of this.

Had I not look'd upon Ismenia,
I ne'r had staid beyond good-morrrows time
In view of this.

Mar. Would I could leave him here,
'Twere a free passage to Ismenia:
I must now blow, as to put out the fire
Yet kindle't more. You not consider Sir,
The great disparitie is in their bloods,
Estates and fortunes: there's the rich beauty
Which this poor homeliness is not endow'd with;
There's difference enough.

Ant. The least of all.

Equality is no rule in Loves Grammar:
That sole unhappiness is left to Princes
To marry blood: we are free disposers,
And have the power to equalize their bloods
Up to our own; we cannot keep it back,
'Tis a due debt from us.

Mar. I Sir, had you
No Father nor Uncle, nor such hinderers,
You might do with your self at your pleasure;
But as it is.

Ant. As it is; 'tis nothing:
Their powers will come too late, to give me back
The yesterday I lost.

Mar. Indeed, to say sooth,
Your opposition from the other part
Is of more force; there you run the hazard
Of every hour a life, had you supply;
You meet your dearest enemy in love
With all his hate about him: 'Twill be more hard
For your Ismenia to come home to you,
Than you to go to Countrey Isabell.

Enter Julio.

Ant. Tush; 'tis not fear removes me.

Mar. No more: your Uncle.

Jul. Oh, the good hour upon you Gentlemen:
Welcome Nephew; Speak it to your friend Sir,
It may be happier receiv'd from you,
In his acceptance.

Ant. I made bold, Uncle,
To do it before; and I think he believes it.

Mar. 'Twas never doubted, Sir.

Jul. Here are sports (Dons)
That you must look on with a loving eye,
And without Censure, 'less it be giving
My countrey neighbors loves their yearly offerings
That must not be refus'd; though't be more pain
To the Spectator, than the painful Actor,
'Twill abide no more test than the tinsel
We clad our Masks in for an hours wearing,
Or the Livery Lace sometimes on the cloaks
Of a great Don's Followers: I speak no further Than our own Countrey, Sir.

Mar. For my part, Sir,
The more absurd, 't shall be the better welcome.

Jul. You'll find the guest you look for: I heard Confin,
You were at Toledo th' other day.

Ant. Not late, Sir.

Jul. Oh fie! must I be plainer? You chang'd the point

With Tirso and Lisandro, two of the Stock
Of our Antagonists, the Belides.

Ant. A meer proffer, Sir; the prevention
Was quick with us: we had done somewhat else:
This Gentleman was engag'd in't.

Jul. I am

The enemy to his foe for it: that wild-fire
Will crave more than fair water, to quench it
I suspect. Whence it will come I know not.

Enter two or three Gentlemen.

Ant. I was about a gentle reconcilment,
But I do fear I shall goe back agen.

Jul. Come, come; The Sports are coming on us:
Nay, I have more guests to grace it: Welcome
Don Gostanco, Giraldo, Philippo: Seat, seat all.

Musick.

Enter a Cupid.

Cup. Love is little, and therefore I present him;
Love is a fire, therefore you may lament him.

Mar. Alas poor Love, who are they that can quench him?

Jul. He's not without those members, fear him not.

Cup. Love shoots, therefore I bear his bow about.
And Love is blind, therefore my eyes are out. (fore.

Ma. I never heard Love give reason for what he did be-

Enter Bustoza (for Paris.)

Cup. Let such as can see, see such as cannot: behold,
Our goddesses all three strive for the ball of Gold:
And here fair Paris comes, the hopeful youth of Troy,
Queen Hecub's darling-son, King Priams only joy.

Mar. Is this Paris? I should have taken him for Hector rather.

Bust. Paris at this time: Pray you hold your prating.

Ant. Paris can be angry.

Jul. Oh at this time

You must pardon him; he comes as a Judge.

Mar. — Mercy on all that looks upon him, say I.

Bust. The thundring seas whose watry fire washes the Whiting Mops. tops.

The gentle Whale, whose feet so fell, flies o'r the mountain
No roars so fierce, no throats so deep, no howls can bring such fears.

As Paris can, if Garden from he call his Dogs and Bears.

Mar. I, those they were, that I fear'd all this while.

Bust. Yes Jack-an-Apes.

Mar. I thank you good Paris.

Bust. You may hold your peace, and stand further out o'th way then:

The lines will fall where they light, (mirth,
Yes Jack-an-Apes, he hath to sports, and faces make like Whilst bellowing bulls, the horned beasts; do toss from ground to earth:

Blind Bear there is, as Cupid blind.

Ant. That Bear would be whip'd for losing of his eyes.

Bust. Be whipped man may see,

But we present no such content, but Nymphs such as they be.

Ant. These are long lines.

Mar. Can you blame him, leading Bulls and Bears in 'em

Enter Shepherd singing, with Ismena, Aminta, Florimel,
(as Juno, Pallas, Venus,) and three Nymphs attending.

Bust. Go Cupid blind, conduct the dumb, for Ladies must not speak here:
Let shepherds sing with dancing feet, and cords of musick break here.

Song.

fall,

Now Ladies fight, with heels so light, by lot your luck must
Where Paris please, to do you ease, and give the golden Ball.

Dance.

Mar.

Mar. If you plaid Paris now Antonia, where would you

Ant. I prethee, Friend, bestow it?

Take the full freedom of thought, but no words.

Mar. 'Protest there's a third, which by her habit,

Should personate Venus, and by consequence

Of the Story, receive the honors prize:

And were I a Paris, there it should be.

Do you note her?

Ant. No; mine eye is so fix'd,

I cannot move it.

Cap. The dance is ended; Now to judgement Paris.

Bust. Here Juno, here: but stay, I do spy

A pretty gleeke coming from Pallas eye:

Here Pallas, here: yet stay agen: methinks

I see the eye of lovely Venus winks:

Oh close them both: shut in those golden ey'n,

And I will kiss those sweet blind cheeks of thine.

Juno is angry: yes, and Pallas frowns,

Would Paris now were gone from Ida's downs.

They both are fair, but Venus has the Mole,

The fairest hair, and sweetest dimple hole:

To her, or her, or her, or neither;

Can one man please three Ladies altogether?

No, take it Venus, tofs it at thy pleasure,

Thou art the Lovers friend beyond his measure,

Jul. Paris has done what man can do, pleas'd one,

Who can do more?

Mar. Stay, here's another person?

Enter Gerasto, (as Mars.)

Ger. Come lovely Venus, leave this lower Orb,

And mount with Mars, up to his glorious Sphere.

Bust. How now, what's he:

Flor. I'm ignorant what to do, Sir.

Ger. Thy silver-yoke of Doves are in the Team,

And thou shalt fly through Apollo's Beam:

I'll see thee seated in thy golden Throne,

And hold with Mars a sweet conjunction.

Exit.

Bust. Ha? what fellow's this? has carried away my Sister

He never rehears'd his part with me before.

(Venus.)

Jul. What follows now Prince Paris?

Flor. within. — Help, help, help.

Bust. Hue and cry, I think Sir, this is Venus voice,

Mine own Sister Florinels.

Mar. What is there some Tragick-Act behind?

Bust. No, no, altogether Comical; Mars and Venus

Are in the old conjunction it seems.

Mar. 'Tis very improper then, for Venus

Never cries out when she conjoyns with Mars.

Bust. That's true indeed: they are out of their parts sure,

It may be 'Tis the Book-holders fault: I'll go see. — Exit.

Jul. How like you our Countrey Revels, Gentlemen?

All Gent. Oh, they commend themselves, Sir.

Ant. Methinks now

Juno and Minerva should take revenge on Paris.

It cannot end without it.

Mar. I did expect

Instead of Mars, the Storm-Goaler Eolus,

And Juno proff'ring her Deiopeia

As satisfaction to the blustering god,

To send his Tossers forth.

Jul. It may so follow,

Lets not prejudicate the History.

Enter Bustofa.

Bust. Oh, oh, oh, oh.

Jul. So, here's a Passion towards.

Bust. Help, help, if you be Gentlemen; my Sister,

My Venus; she's stolen away.

Jul. The story changes from our expectation, Mars.

Bust. Help my father the Miller will hang me else: god

Is a bawdy Villain: he said she should ride upon Doves:

She's hors'd, she's hors'd, whether she will or no.

Mar. Sure I think he's serious.

(in the breech

Bust. She's hors'd upon a double Gelding, and a Stone-horse

Of her: the poor wench cries help, and I cry help, and none

Of you will help.

Jul. Speak, is it the show, or dost thou bawl?

Bust. A pox on the Ball: my Sister bawls, and I bawl:

Either bridle horse and follow, or give me a halter

To hang my self: I cannot run so fast as a hog.

Jul. Follow me, I'll fill the Countrey with pursuit

But I will find the thief: my house thus abus'd?

Bust. 'Tis my house that's abus'd, the Sister of my flesh and blood: oh, oh,

Exeunt.

1 Wench. 'Tis time we all shift for our selves, if this be

2. However I'll be gone.

(serious.

3. And I.

Exeunt.

Ant. You need not fright your beauties pretty souls,

With the least pale complexion of a fear.

(screet

Mar. Juno has better courage: and Minerva's more di-

Ism. Alas my courage was so counterfeit

It might have been struck from me with a Feather.

Juno ne'r had so weak a presenter.

Am. Sure I was ne'r the wifer for Minerva,

That I find yet about me.

Ism. My dwelling, Sir?

'Tis a poor yeomans roof, scarce a league off,

That never sham'd me yet.

Ant. Your gentle pardon:

I vow my erring eies had almost cast you

For one of the most mortal enemies

That our Family has.

Ism. I'm sorry, Sir,

I am so like your foe: 'Twere fit I hasted

From your offended sight.

Ant. Oh, mistake not,

It was my error, and I do confess it:

You'll not believe you'r welcome; nor can I speak it;

But there's my friend can tell you, pray hear him.

Mar. Shall I tell her Sir? I'm glad of the employment.

Ant. A kinswoman to that beauty:

Am. A kin to her, Sir,

But nothing to her beauty.

Ant. Do not wrong it, 'tis not far behind her.

Am. Her hinder parts are not far off, indeed, Sir.

Mar. Let me but kiss you with his ardor now,

You shall feel how he loves you.

Ism. Oh forbear:

'Tis not the fashion with us, but would you.

Perfwade me that he loves me?

Mar. I'll warrant you

He dies in't: and that were witness enough on't.

Ism. Love me Sir? can you tell me for what reason?

Mar. Fie, will you ask me that which you have about you?

Ism. I know nothing Sir.

Mar. Let him find it then;

He constantly believes you have the thing

That he must love you for: much is apparent,

A sweet and lovely beauty.

Ism. So Sir; Pray you

Show me one thing: Did he ne'r love before?

(I know you are his bosom-Counsellor)

Nay then I see your answer is not ready:

I'll not believe you if you study farther.

Mar. Shall I speak truth to you?

Ism. Or speak no more.

Mar. There was a smile thrown at him, from a Lady

Whose deserts might buy him trebble, and lately

He receiv'd it, and I know where he lost it,

In this face of yours: I know his heart's within you.

Ism. May I know her name?

Mar. In your ear you may

With vow of silence.

Am. He'll not give over Sir:

If he speak for you, he'll sure speed for you.

Ant. But that's not the answer to my question.

Am.

Am. You are the first in my Virgin-conscience
That e'er spoke Love to her : oh, my heart !

Ant. How do you?

Am. Nothing Sir : but would I had a better face.
How well your pulse beats.

Ant. Healthfully, does it not ?

Am. It thumps prettily, methinks.

Ism. Alack, I hear it

With much pity : how great is your fault too,
In wrong to the good Lady ?

Mar. You forget

The difficult passage he has to her,
A hell of fend's between the Families.

Ism. And that has often Love wrought by advantage
To peaceful reconcilment.

Mar. There impossible.

Ism. This way 'tis worser ; 't may feed again in her
Unto another generation :

For where (poor Lady) is her satisfaction ?

Mar. It comes in me ; to be truth, I love her
(I'll go no farther for comparison)

As dear as he loves you.

Ism. How if she love not ?

Mar. Tush : be that my pains : You know not what Art have those ways.

Ism. Bestrow you, you have practis'd upon me,
Well, speed me here, and you with your Ismenia.

Mar. Go, the condition's drawn, ready dated,
There wants but your hand to't.

Am. Truly you have taken great pains, Sir.

Mar. A friendly part, no more (sweet Beauty)

Am. They are happy, Sir, have such friends as you are.

But do you know you have done well in this ?

How will his Allies receive it ? she (though I say't)
Is of no better blood than I am.

Mar. There I leave it, I'm at farthest that way.

Ism. You shall extend your vows no larger now.

My heart calls you mine own : and that's enough.
Reason, I know, would have all yet conceal'd.

I shall not leave you unsaluted long
Either by Pen or Person.

Ant. You may discourse

With me, when you think y'are alone, I shall
Be present with you.

Ism. Come Cousin, will you walk ?

Am. Alas, I was ready long since : in conscience
You would with better will yet stay behind.

Ism. Oh Love, I never thought thou'dst been so blind.

Mar. You'll answer this Sir.

Exeunt.

Ant. If e'er't be spoke on :

I purpose not to propound the question.

Enter Julio.

Jul. 'Tis true, the poor knave said : some Ravisher,
Some of Lusts Blood-hounds have seiz'd upon her :
The Girl is hurried, as the devil were with 'em
And help'd their speed.

Mar. It may be not so ill, Sir.

A well-prepared Lover may do as much
In hot blood as this, and perform't honestly.

Jul. What ? steal away a Virgin 'gainst her will ?

Mar. It may be any mans case ; despise nothing :
And that's a thief of a good quality,
Most commonly he brings his theft home again,
Though with a little shame.

Jul. There's a charge by't

Fall'n upon me : Paris (the Millers son)
Her brother, dares not venture home again
Till better tidings follow of his Sister.

Ant. Y'are the more beholding to the mischance, Sir :
Had I gone a Boot-haling, I should as soon
Have stol'n him as his Sister : Marry then,
To render him back in the same plight he is

May be costly : his flesh is not maintain'd with little.

Jul. I think the poor knave will pine away,
He cries all to be pittied yonder,

Mar. Pray you Sir, let's go see him : I should laugh
To see him cry, sure.

Jul. Well, you are merry, Sir.

Antonio, keep this charge ; I have fears
Move me to lay it on you : Pray forbear
The ways of your enemies, the Bellides.
I have reason for my Injunction, Sir.

Exeunt.

Enter Aminta (as a Page with a Letter.)

Ant. To me, Sir ? from whom ?

Am. A friend, I dare vow, Sir.

Though on the enemies part : the Lady Ismenia.

Mar. Take heed, blush not too deep ; let me advise you
In your answer, 't must be done heedfully.

Ant. I should not see a Masculine in peace
Out of that house.

Am. Alas, I'm a child, Sir,

Your hates cannot last till I wear a sword.

Ant. Await me for your answer.

Mar. He must see her,
To manifest his shame : 'tis my advantage ;
While our blood's under us, we keep above :
But then we fall, when we do fall in love.

Exeunt.

Actus Tertius.

Scena Prima.

Enter Julio and Franio.

Fra. MY Lord, my Lord, your house hath injur'd me,
Rob'd of all the joys I had on earth.

Jul. Where wert thou brought up (fellow ?)

Fra. In a Mill.

You may perceive it by my loud exclams,
Which must rise higher yet.

Jul. Obstreperous Carle,
If thy throats tempest, could oe'rturn my house,
What satisfaction were it for thy child :
Turn thee the right way to thy journeys end,
Wilt have her where she is not ?

Fra. Here was she lost,

And here must I begin my footing after ;
From whence, until I meet a pow'r to punish,
I will not rest : You are not quick to grief.
Your hearing's a dead sense. Were yours the loss,
Had you a Daughter, perhaps be-whor'd,
(For to what other end should come the thief ?
You'd play the Miller then, be loud and high.
But being not a sorrow of your own,
You have no help nor pity for another,

Jul. Oh, thou hast op'd a Sluce was long shut up,
And let a flood of grief in ; a buried grief
Thy voice hath wak'd again : a grief as old
As likely 'tis thy child is ; friend, I tell thee,
I did once lose a Daughter.

Fra. Did you, Sir ?

Befeech you then, how did you bear her loss ?

Jul. With thy grief trebled.

Fra. But was she stolen from you ?

Jul. Yes, by devouring thieves, from whom cannot
Ever return a satisfaction :

The wild beasts had her in her swathing clothes.

Fra. Oh much good do 'em with her.

Jul. Away tough churle.

Fra. Why, she was better eaten than my child,
Better by beasts, than beastly men devoured,

They

They took away a life, no honor from her :
Those beasts might make a Saint of her, but these
Will make my child a devil but was she, Sir,
Your only Daughter ?

Enter Gilian.

Jul. I ne'r had other (Friend.)

Gil. Where are you (man?) your business lies not here,
Your Daughters in the Pound, I have found where ;
'Twill cost you dou dear, her freedom.

Fra. I'll break it down,
And free her without pay :
Horse-locks nor chains shall hold her from me.

Jul. I'll take this relief.

I now have time to speak alone with grief.

Exit.

Fra. How? my Landlord? he's Lord of my Lands

But not my Cattle : I'll have her again (Gil.)

Gil. You are not mad upon the sudden now.

Fra. No Gill. I have been mad these five hours :
I'll sell my Mill, and buy a Roring.

I'll batter down his house, and make a Stewes on't,

Gill. Will you gather up your wits a little
And hear me? the King's near by in progress,
Here I have got our supplication drawn,
And there's the way to help us.

Fra. Give it me (Gill.)

I will not fear to give it to the King :

To his own hands (God blefs him) will I give it,
And he shall set the Law upon their shoulders,
And hang 'em all that had a hand in it.

Gill. Where's your Son?

Fra. He shall be hang'd in fitches :

The Dogs shall eat him in Lent, there's Cats-meat
And Dogs-meat enough about him.

Gil. Sure the poor Girl is the Counts whore by this time.

Fra. If she be the Counts whore, the whores Count
Shall pay for it : He shall pay for a new Maiden-head.

Gil. You are so violous : this I'm resolv'd,
If she be a whore once, I'll renounce her,
You know, if every man had his right,
She's none of our child, but a meer foundling,
(And I can guess the owner for a need too)
We have but foster'd her.

Fra. Gill. no more of that,

I'll cut your tongue out, if you tell those tales.
Hark, hark, these Toaters tell us the King's coming :
Get you gone ; I'll see if I can find him.

Exit.

Enter Lisauro, Tersa, Pedro, and Moncado.

Lif. Does the King remove to day?

Ter. So saies the Harbengers,
And keeps his way on to Valentia,
There ends the progress.

Ped. He hunts this morning Gentlemen,
And dines i' th' fields : the Court is all in readines.

Lif. Pedro, did you send for this Tailor? or you Moncado?

This light French Demi-launce that follows us.

Ped. No, I assure ye on my word, I am guiltless,
I owe him too much to be inward with him.

Mon. I am not quit I am sure : there is a reckoning
Of some four scarlet cloaks, and two lac'd suits
Hangs on the file still, like a fearful Comet
Makes me keep off.

Lif. I am in too Gentlemen,
I thank his faith, for a matter of three hundred.

Ter. And I fortwo, what a devil makes he this way?
I do not love to see my sins before me.

Ped. 'Tis the vacation, and these things break out
To see the Court, and glory in their debtors.

Ter. What do you call him for? I never love
To remember their names that I owe money to,
'Tis not gentle; I shun 'em like the plague ever.

Lif. His name's Vertigo : hold your heads, and wonder,
A French-man, and a founder of new Fashions :
The revolutions of all shapes and habits
Run madding through his brains;

Enter Vertigo.

Monc. He is very brave.

Lif. The shreds of what he steals from us, believe it,
Makes him a mighty man : he comes, have at ye.

Ver. Save ye together, my sweet Gentlemen,
I have been looking——

Ter. Not for Money, Sir?
You know the hard time.

Ver. Pardon me sweet (Signior) (men,
Good faith the least thought in my heart, your love Gentle-
Your love's enough for me : Money, hang money :
Let me preserve your love.

Lif. Yes marry shall ye,
And we our credit, you would see the Court?

Mon. He shall see every place.

Ver. Shall I i' faith Gentlemen?

Ped. The Cellar, and the Buttry, and the Kitchen,
The Pastry, and the Pantry.

Ter. I, and taste too
Of every Office : and be free of all too :
That he may say when he comes home in glory.

Ver. And I will say, i' faith, and say it openly,
And say it home too : Shall I see the King also?

Lif. Shalt see him every day : shalt see the Ladies
In their French clothes : shalt ride a hunting with him,
Shalt have a Mistris too : we must fool handsomely
To keep him in belief, we honor him,
He may call on us else,

Ped. A pox upon him.

Let him call at home in's own house for salt butter.

Ver. And when the King puts on a new suit.

Ter. Thou shalt see it first,
And defect his doublets : that thou maist be perfect.

Ver. The Wardrobe I would fain view, Gentlemen,
Fain come to see the Wardrobe.

Lif. Thou shalt see it,
And see the secret of it, dive into it :
Sleep in the Wardrobe, and have Revelations
Of fashions five years hence.

Ver. Ye honor me.

Ye infinitely honor me.

Ter. Anything i' th' Court, Sir,
Or within the compass of a Courtier.

Ver. My wife shall give ye thanks.

Ter. You shall see any thing.
The privatest place, the stool, and where 'tis emptied.

Ver. Ye make me blush, ye pour your bounties, Gentlemen,
In such abundance.

Lif. I will shew thee presently
The order that the King keeps when he comes
To open view, that thou may'st tell thy neighbors
Over a shoulder of mutton, thou hast seen something,
Nay, thou shalt present the King for this time.

Ver. Nay, I pray Sir.

Lif. That thou maist know what State there does belong
Stand there I say, and put on a sad countenance, (to it;
Mingled with height : be cover'd, and reserved ;
Move like the Sun, by soft degrees, and glorious,
Into your order (Gentlemen) uncover'd,
The King appears ; We'll sport with you a while, Sir,
I am sure you are merry with us all the year long (Tailor)
Move softer still, keep in that fencing leg ; Monsieur,
Turn to no side.

Enter Franio out of breath.

Ter. What's this that appears to him?

Lif. 'Has a petition, and he looks most lamentably,
Mistake him, and we are made.

Fra. This is the King sure,
The glorious King, I know him by his gay clothes.

Lif. Now bear your self that you may say hereafter.

Fra.

Fra. I have recover'd breath, I'll speak unto him present-
May it please your gracious Majesty to consider (ly,
A poor mans case?

Ver. What's your Will, Sir?

Lif. You must accept, and read it.

Ter. The Tailor will run mad upon my life for't.

Ped. How he mumps and bridles: he will ne'r cut clothes

Ter. And what's your grief? (again.)

Mon. He speaks i' th' nose like his goose.

Fra. I pray you read there; Panibus'd and frumpt, Sir,
By a great man that may do ill by authority;
Poor honest men are hang'd for doing less, Sir,
My child is stolen, the Count Otrante stole her;
A pretty child she is, although I say it,
A handsome Mother, he means to make a whore of her,
A silken whore, his knaves have filch'd her from me;
He keeps lewd knaves, that do him beastly offices:
I kneel for Justice. Shall I have it Sir?

Enter King Philippo, and Lords.

Phil. What Pageant's this?

Lif. The King:

Tailor, stand off, here ends your aparition:
Miller, turn round, and there address your paper,
There, there's the King indeed.

Fra. May it please your Majesty.

Phil. Why didst thou kneel to that fellow?

Fra. In good faith, Sir,
I thought he had been a King, he was so gallant:
There's none here wears such gold.

Phil. So foolishly,
You have golden business sure; because I am homely
Clad, in no glitt'ring suit, I am not look'd on:
Ye fools that wear gay cloaths, love to gap'd at,
What are you better when your end calls on you?
Will gold preserve ye from the grave? or jewels?
Get golden Minds, and sling away your Trappings
Unto your bodies, minister warm raiments,
Wholsome and good; glitter within and spare not:
Let my Court have rich souls, their suits I weigh not:
And what are you that took such State upon ye?
Are ye a Prince?

Lif. The Prince of Tailors, Sir,
We owe some money to him, and't like your Majesty.

Phil. If it like him, would ye ow'd more, be modest,
And you less saucy, Sir: and leave this place:
Your Pressing-iron will make no perfect Courtier:
Goe stich at home, and cozen your poor neighbors,
Show such another pride, I'll have ye whipt for't,
And get worse clothes, these but proclaim your felony.
And what's your Paper?

Fra. I beseech you read it.

Phil. What's here? the Count Otrante task'd for a base
For stealing of a maid? villany,

Lord. The Count Otrante?
Is not the fellow mad, Sir?

Fra. No, no, my Lord,
I am in my wits, I am a labouring man,
And we have seldome leisure to run mad,
We have other business to employ our heads in,
We have little Wit to lose too: if we complain,
And if a heave load lie on your shoulders,
Worse than a sack of Meal, and oppress our poverties,
We are mad streight, and whop'd, and ty'd in fetters,
Able to make a horse mad, as you use us,
You are mad for nothing, and no man dare proclaim it,
In you a wildness is a noble trick,
And cherish'd in ye, and all men must love it:
Oppressions of all sorts, sit like new clothes,
Neatly and handsomely upon your Lordships:
And if we pick when your honors spur us,
We are Knaves and Jades, and ready for the Justice.
I am a true Miller.

Phil. Then thou art a wonder.

2 Lor. I know the the man reputed for a good man
An honest and substantial fellow.

Phil. He speaks sence,
And to the point: Greatness begets much rudeness,
How dare you (Sirrah) 'gainst so main a person,
A man of so much Noble note and honor,
Put up this base complaint? Must every Peasant
Upon a saucy Will affront great Lords!
All fellows (Miller?)

Fra. I have my reward, Sir,
I was told one greatness would protect another,
As beams support their fellows; now I find it:
If't please your Grace to have me hang'd, I am ready,
'Tis but a Miller, and a Thief dispatch'd:
Though I steal bread, I steal no flesh to tempt me.
I have a wife, and 't please him to have her too,
With all my heart; 'twill make my charge the less, Sir,
She'll hold him play awhile: I have a boy too,
He's able to instruct his Honors hogs,
Or rub his horse-heels: when it please his Lordship
He may him his slave too, or his bawd:
The boy is well bred, can exhort his Sister:
For me, the Prison, or the Pillory,
To lose my gods, and have mine ears cropt off;
Whipt like a Top, and have a paper stuck before me,
For abominable honesty to his own Daughter,
I can endure, Sir: the Miller has a stout heart,
Though as his Toal-pin.

Phil. I suspect this shrewdly,
Is it his Daughter that the people call
The Millers fair Maid?

2 Lor. It should seem so, Sir.

Phi. Be sure you be i' th' right, Sirrah.

Fra. If I be i' th' wrong, Sir,
Be sure you hang me, I will ask no courtesie:
Your Grace may have a Daughter, think of that, Sir,
She may be fair, and she may be abused too:
A King is not exempted from these cases:
Stolen from your loving care.

Phil. I do much pity him.

Fra. But heaven forbid she should be in that venture
That mine is in at this hour: I'll assure your Grace
The Lord wants a water-Mill, and means to grind with her
Would I had his stones to set, I would fit him for it.

Phil. Follow me, Miller, and let me talk with ye farther,
And keep this private all upon your Loyalties:
To-morrow morning, though I am now beyond him,
And the less look for, I'll break my Fast with the good Count.
No more, away, all to our sports, be silent. Exeunt.

Ver. What Grace shall I have now?

Lif. Choose thine own Grace,
And go to dinner when thou wilt, Vertigo,
We must needs follow the King.

Ter. You heard the sentence.

Mon. If you stay here
I'll send thee a shoulder of Venison:
Go home, go home, or if thou wilt disguise,
I'll help thee to a place to feed the dogs.

Ped. Or thou shalt be special Tailor to the Kings Monkey,
'Tis a fine place, we cannot stay.

Ver. No Money,
Nor no Grace, Gentlemen?

Ter. 'Tis too early Tailor.

The King has not broke his Fast yet.

Ver. I shall look for ye
The next Term, Gentlemen.

Ped. Thou shalt not miss us:
Prethee provide some clothes, and dost thou hear Vertigo
Commend me to thy Wife: I want some shirts too.

Ver. I have Chambers for ye all.

Lif. They are too musty,
When they are clear we'll come.

Ver. I must be patient
And provident, I shall never get home else. Exeunt.
Scena

Scena Secunda.

Enter Otrante and Florimell.

Otr. Prethee be wiser wench, thou canst not scape me, Let me with love and gentleness enjoy that That may be still preserv'd with love, and long'd for: If violence lay rough hold, I shall hate thee, And after I have enjoy'd thy Maiden-head, Thou wilt appear so stale and ugly to me I shall despise thee, cast thee off.

Flor. I pray ye Sir, Begin it now, and open your doors to me, I do confesse I am ugly; let me go, Sir: A Gipsy-girl: Why would your Lordship touch me? Fye, 'tis not noble: I am homely bred, Course, and unfit for you: why do you flatter me? There be young Ladies, many that will love ye, That will dote on ye: you a handsome Gentleman, What will they say when once they know your quality? A Lord, a Miller? take your Toal dish with ye: You that can deal with Gudgins, and course slower, 'Tis pittie you should tast what manchet means: Is this fit Sir, for your repute and honor?

Otr. I'll love thee still.

Flor. You cannot, there's no sympathy Between our birthis, or breeding, arts, conditions, And where these are at difference, ther's no liking: This hour it may be I seem handsome to you, And you are taken with variety More than with beauty: to morrow when you have enjoy'd me,

Your heat and lust asswag'd, and come to examine Out of a cold and penitent condition What you have done, whom you have shar'd your love with, Made partner of your bed, how it will vex ye, How you will curse the devil that betrayd ye, And what shall become of me then?

Otr. Wilt thou hear me?

Flor. As hasty as you were then to enjoy me, As precious as this beauty shew'd unto ye, You'll kick me out of dores, you will whore and ban me: And if I prove with child with your fair issue, Give me a pension of five pound a year To breed your Heir withall, and so good speed me.

Otr. I'll keep thee like a woman.

Flor. I'll keep my self Sir, Keep my self honest Sir; there's the brave keeping: If you will marry me.

Otr. Alas poor Florimell.

Flor. I do confesse I am too course and base Sir To be your wife, and it is fit you scorn me, Yet such as I have crown'd the lives of great ones: To be your whore I am sure I am too worthy, (For by my troth Sir, I am truly honest) And that's an honor equal to your greatness.

Otr. I'll give thee what thou wilt.

Flor. Tempt me no more then: Give me that peace, and then you give abundance, I know ye do but try me, ye are noble, All these are but to try my modesty, If you should find me easie, and once coming, I see your eyes already how they would fright me; I see your honest heart how it would swell And burst it self into a grief against me: Your tongue in noble anger, now, even now Sir, Ready to rip my loose thoughts to the bottom, And lay my shame unto my self, wide open: You are a noble Lord, you pittie poor maids, The people are mistaken in your courses: You, like a father, try 'em to the uttermost. As they do Gold: you purge the dross from them, And make them shine.

Otr. This cunning cannot help ye: I love ye to enjoy: I have stol'n ye To enjoy ye now, not to be fool'd with circumstance, Yield willingly, or else.

Flor. What?

Otr. I will force ye.

I will not be delay'd, a poor base wench That I, in curtesie, make offer to, Argue with me?

Flor. Do not, you will loose your labor, Do not my Lord, it will become ye poorly: Your courtesie may do much on my nature, For I am kind as you are, and as tender: If you compel, I have my strengths to flye to, My honest thoughts, and those are guards about me: I can cry too, and noise enough I dare make, And I have curses, that will call down thunder, For all I am a poor wench, heaven will hear me: My body you may force, but my will never; And be sure I do not live if you do force me, Or have no tongue to tell your beastly Story, For if I have, and if there be a justice.

Otr. Pray ye go in here: I'll calm my self for this time. And be your friend again.

Flor. I am commanded.

Exit.

Otr. You cannot scape me, yet I must enjoy ye, I'll lie with thy wit, though I miss thy honesty: Is this a wench for a Boors hungry bosom? A morsel for a Peasants base embraces? And must I starve, and the meat in my mouth? I'll none of that.

Enter Gerafto.

Ger. How now my Lord, how speed ye? Have ye done the deed?

Otr. No, pox upon't, she is honest.

Ger. Honest, what's that? you take her bare denial, Was there ever wench brought up in a mill, and honest? That were a wonder worth a Chronicle, Is your belief so large? what did she say to ye?

Otr. She said her honesty was all her dowry, And preach'd unto me, how unfit, and homely, Nay how dishonourable it would seem in me To act my will; popt me i'th mouth with modesty.

Ger. What an impudent Quean was that? that's their trick ever.

Otr. And then discours'd to me very learnedly What fame and loud opinion would tell of me: A wife she touch'd at

Ger. Out upon her Varlet.

Was she so bold? these home-spun things are evils, They'll tell ye a thousand lies, if you'll believe 'em; And stand upon their honors like great Ladies, They'll speak unhappily too: good words to cozen ye, And outwardly seem Saints: they'll cry down-right also, But 'tis for anger that you do not crush 'em. Did she not talk of being with child?

Otr. She toucht at it,

Ger. The trick of an arrant whore to milk your Lordship; And then a pension nam'd?

Otr. No, no, she scorn'd it: I offer'd any thing, but she refus'd all, Refus'd it with a confident hate.

Ger. You thought so, You should have taken her then, turn'd her, and tew'd her i'th strength of all her resolution, flatter'd her, And shak't her stubborn will: she would have thank'd ye, She would have lov'd ye infinitely, they must seem modest, It is their parts: if you had plaid your part Sir. And hand'd her as men do unman'd Hawks, Cast her, and malde her up in good clean linnen, And there have coyed her, you had caught her heart-strings These tough Virginities they blow like white thornes

In storms and tempests.

Otr. She is beyond all this,
As cold, and harden'd, as the Virgin Crystal.

Ger. Oh force her, force her, Sir, she longs to be ravish'd
Some have no pleasure but in violence;
To be torn in pieces is their paradise:
'Tis ordinary in our Countrey, Sir, to ravish all
They will not give a penny for their sport.
Unless they be put to it, and terribly,
And then they swear they'll hang the man comes near 'em,
And swear it on his lips too.

Otr. No, no forcing,
I have another course, and I will follow it,
I command you, and do you command your fellows,
That when you see her next, disgrace, and scorn her,
I'll seem to put her out o'th' dores o'th' sodain
And leave her to conjecture, then seize on her
Away, be ready straight.

Ger. We shall not fail, Sir.

Exit.

Otr. Florimell.

Enter Florimell.

Flo. My Lord.

Otr. I am sure you have now consider'd
And like a wise wench weigh'd a friend's displeasure,
Repented your proud thoughts, and cast your scorn off.

Flo. My Lord, I am not proud, I was never beautiful.
Nor scorn I any thing that's just and honest.

Otr. Come, to be short, can ye love yet? you told me
Kindness would far compell ye: I am kind to ye,
And mean to exceed that way.

Flo. I told ye too, Sir,
As far as it agreed with modesty,
With honour, and with honesty I would yield to ye:
Good my Lord: take some other Theam: for Love,
Alas, I never knew yet what it meant,
And on the sudden Sir, to run through Volumes
Of his most mystick art, 'tis most impossible;
Nay, to begin with lust, which is an Heresie,
A foul one too; to learn that in my childhood:
O good my Lord.

Otr. You will not out of this song,
Your modesty, and honesty, is that all?
I will not force ye.

Flo. Ye are too noble, Sir.

Otr. Nor will I woo ye at that infinite price
It may be you expect.

Flo. I expect your pardon,
And a discharge (my Lord) that's all I look for.

Otr. No, nor fall sick for love.

Flo. 'Tis a heathful year Sir.

Otr. Look ye, I'll turn ye out o'dores, and scorn ye.

Flo. Thank ye my Lord.

Otr. A proud slight Peat I found ye,
A fool (it may be too.)

Flo. An honest woman,
Good my Lord think me.

Otr. And a base I leave ye,
So fare-ye-well.

Exit.

Enter Gerasto and Servants.

Ger. What dost thou stay for? dost thou not know the Thou base unprovident whore? (way,

Flo. Good words, pray ye Gentlemen.

1 Ser. Has my Lord smok'd ye over, good-wife Miller?
Is your Mill broken that you stand so useles?

2 Ser. An impudent Quean, upon my life she is unwholsome
Some base discarded thing my Lord has found her,
He would not have turn'd her off o'th' sudden else.

Ger. Now against every sack (my honest sweet heart)
With every Smig and Smug.

Flo. I must be patient.

Ger. And every greasie guest, and sweaty Rascall
For his Royal hire between his fingers, Gentlewoman.

1 Ser. I fear thou hast given my Lord the—thou damn'd thing.

2 Ser. I have seen her in the Stewes.

Ger. The knave her father

Was Bawd to her there, and kept a Tipling house,
You must even to it again: a modest function.

Flo. If ye had honesty, ye would not use me
Thus, basely, wretchedly, though your Lord bid ye,
But he that knows.

Ger. Away thou carted impudence,
You meat for every man: a little meal
Flung in your face, makes ye appear so proud.

Flo. This is inhumane. Let these tears persuade you,
If ye be men, to use a poor girl better;
I wrong not you, I am sure I call you Gentlemen.

Enter Otrante.

Otr. What business is here? away, are not you gone yet?

Flo. My Lord, this is not well: although you hate me,
For what I know not; to let your people wrong me,
Wrong me maliciously, and call me.—

Otr. Peace,

And mark me what we say advisedly;
Mark, as you love that that you call your credit;
Yield now, or you are undone: your good name's perish'd
Not all the world can buy your reputation;

'Tis sunk for ever else, these peoples tongues will poison ye
Though you be white as innocence they'll taint ye,
They will speak terrible and hideous things,
And people in this age are prone to credit,
They'll let fall nothing that may brand a woman,
Consider this, and then be wise and tremble,
Yield yet, and yet I'll save ye.

Flo. How?

Otr. I'll show ye,
Their mouths I'll seal up, they shall speak no more
But what is honorable and honest of ye,
And Saintlike they shall worship ye: they are mine,
And what I charge them Florimell.

Flo. I am ruin'd,
Heaven will regard me yet, they are barbarous wretches:
Let me not fall (my Lord.)

Otr. You shall not Florimell:
Mark how I'll work your peace, and how I honor ye.
Who waits there? come all in.

Enter Gerasto and Servants.

Ger. Your pleasure Sir.

Otr. Who dare say this sweet beauty is not heavenly?
This virgin, the most pure the most untainted,
The holiest thing?

Ger. We know it (my dear Lord)
We are her slaves: and that proud impudence
That dares disparage her, this sword (my Lord.)

1 Ser. They are rascals, base, the sons of common women
That wrong this virtue, or dare own a thought
But fair and honorable of her: when we slight her,
Hang us, or cut's in pieces: let's tug i'th' Gallies.

2 Ser. Brand us for villains.

Flo. Why sure I dream: these are all Saints.

Otr. Go, and live all her slaves.

Ger. We are proud to do it.

Exeunt.

Otr. What think ye now? am not I able Florimell
Yet to preserve ye?

Flo. I am bound to your Lordship,
Ye are all honour, and good my Lord but grant me,
Untill to morrow, leave to weigh my fortunes,
I'll give you a free answer, perhaps a pleasing,
Indeed I'll do the best I can to satisfy ye.

Otr. Take your good time, this kiss, till then farewell,
Sweet.

Exeunt.

Actus

Actus IV.

Scena Prima.

Enter Antonio, Martine, Bustofa.

Mar. By all means discharge your follower.
Ant. If we can get him off: Sirrah Bustofa
 Thou must needs run back.
Bust. But I must not unless you send
 A Bier, or a Lictor at my back, I do not use to run
 From my friends.
Ant. Well, go will serve turn: I have forgot.
Bust. What Sir?
Ant. See if I can think on't now.
Bust. I know what 'tis now.
Ant. A Pistolet of that.
Bust. Done, you have forgot a devise to send me away,
 You are going a smocking perhaps.
Mar. His own, due, due i'faith Antonio,
 The Pistolet's his own.
Ant. I confes it,
 There 'tis: now if you could afford out of it
 A reasonable excuse to mine Uncle.
Bust. Yes, I can:
 But an excuse will not serve your turn: it must be a lye,
 A full lye, 'twill do no good else: if you'll go to
 The price of that?
Ant. Is a lye dearer than an excuse?
Bust. Oh, treble; this is the price of an excuse: but a lye is two more:
 Look how many foyles go to a fair fall, so many excuses to
 A full lye, and less cannot serve your turn, let any Tailor
 I' th' Town make it.
Mar. Why 'tis reasonable, give him his price:
 Let it be large enough now.
Bust. I'll warrant you, cover him all over.
Ant. I would have proof of one now.
Bust. What? scale my invention before hand? you shall pardon
 Me for that; well, I'll commend you to your Uncle, and Tell him you'll be at home at supper with him.
Ant. By no means, I cannot come to night (man)
Bust. I know that too, you do not know a lye when you see it.
Mar. Remember it must stretch for all night.
Bust. I shall want stufte, I doubt 'twill come to the other
Pistolet.
Ant. Well, lay out, you shall be no looser Sir.
Bust. It must be faced, you know, there will be a yard of dissimulation
 At least (City-measure) and cut upon an untroth or two:
 Lyned
 With Fables, that must needs be, cold weather's coming,
 if it had
 A gallon of hypocrisie, 'twould do well: and hooked
 Together with a couple of conceits,
 That's necessity; well, I'll bring in my
 Bill: I'll warrant you as fair a lye by that time I have done
 With it, as any Gentleman i' th' Town can swear to, if he Would betray his Lord and Master. Exit.
Ant. So, so, this necessary trouble's over.
Mar. I would you had bought an excuse of him
 Before he went: you'll want one for Ismenia.
Ant. Tush, there needs none, there's no suspicion yet,
 And I'll be arm'd before the next encounter,
 In a fast tye with my fair Isabel.

Enter Bustofa.

Mar. Yes, you'll find your errand is before you now.
Bust. Oh Gentlemen, look to your selves, ye are Men of another world else; your enemies are upon you;
 The old house of the Bellides will fall upon your heads:
 Signior Lisauro.
Ant. Lisauro?
Bust. And Don what call you him? he's a Gentleman:
 Yet he has but a Yeomans name,
Don Tarso, Tarso, and a dozen at their heels.
Ant. Lisauro, Tarso, nor a dozen more
 Shall fright me from my ground, nor shun my path,
 Let 'em come on in their ablest fury.
Mar. 'Tis worthily resolved: I'll stand by you Sir,
 This way, I am thy true friend.
Bust. I'll be gone Sir, that one may live to tell what's become of you.
 Put up, put up, will you never learn to know a lye
 From an Esop's Fables? there's a taft for you now. Exit.

Enter Ismenia and Aminta.

Mar. Look Sir, what time of day is it? (now,
Ant. I know not, my eyes go false, I dare not trust 'em
 I prethee tell me (Martine) if thou canst,
 Is that Ismenia or Isabella.
Mar. This is the Lady, forget not, Isabella.
Ant. If this face may be borrowed and lent out,
 If it can shift shoulders, and take other tyres,
 So, 'tis mine where ere I find it.
Ism. Be fudden. Exit Aminta.
 I cannot hold out long.
Mar. Believ't she frowns.
Ant. Let it come, she cannot frown me off on't!
 How prettily it woos me to come nearer?
 How do you do (Lady) since yesterdays pains?
 Were you not weary? of my faith.
Ism. I think you were.
Ant. What Lady?
Ism. Weary of your faith; 'tis a burthen
 That men faint under, though they bear little of it.
Mar. So, this is to the purpose.
Ant. You came home
 In a fair hour I hope?

Enter Aminta.

Ism. From whence Sir?
Am. Sir, there's a Gentlewoman without desires to speak with you.
Ant. They were pretty homely toys: but your presence
 Made them illustrious.
Ism. My Cosen speaks to you.
Am. A Gentlewoman Sir, Isabella
 She names her self.
Mar. So, so, it hits finely now.
Ant. Name your self how you please: speak what you
 I'll hear you cheerfully. (please)
Ism. You are not well,
 Request her in, she may have more acquaintance
 With his passions, and better cure for 'em.
Am. She's nice in that (Madam) poor soul it seems
 She's fearful of your displeasure.
Ism. I'll quit her
 From that presently, and bring her in my self. Exit.
Mar. How carelessly do you behave your self,
 When you should call all your best faculties
 To counsel in you? how will you answer
 The breach you made with fair Ismenia?
 Have you forgot the retrograde vow you took
 With her, that now is come in evidence?
 You'll dye upon your shame, you need no more

Enemies of the house, but the Lady now:
You shall have your dispatch.

Enter Ismenia like Juno.

Ant. Give me that face,
And I am satisfied upon whose shoulders
So ere it grows: Juno deliver us
Out of this amazement: Beseech you Goddess
Tell us of our friends, how does Ismenia?
And how does Isabella? both in good health
I hope, as you your self are.

Ism. I am at farthest
In my counterfeit: my Antonio
I have matter against you may need pardon,
As I must crave of you.

Ant. Observe you Sir,
What evidence is come against me? what think you
The Hydra-headed Jury will say to't?

Mar. 'Tis I am fool'd,
My hopes are pour'd into the bottomless tubs,
'Tis labour for the house of Bellides:
I must not seem so yet: but in sooth (Lady)
Did you imagine your changeable face
Hid you from me? By this hand I knew you.

Ant. I went by the face: and by these eyes I
Might have been deceived.

Ism. You might indeed (Antonio)
For this Gentleman did vow to Isabella,
That he it was that lov'd Ismenia,
And not Antonio?

Mar. Good, was not that
A manifest confession that I knew you?
I else had been unjust unto my friend:
'Twas well remembred, there I found you out
And speak your conscience now.

Ant. But did he so protest?

Ism. Yes, I vow to you, had Antonio
Wedded Isabella, Ismenia
Had not been lost, there had been her lover.

Ant. Why much good do you friend, take her to you:
I crave but one, here have I my wish full,
I am glad we shall be so near neighbors.

Mar. Take both Sir, Juno to boot: three parts in one,
S. Hilarie bless you, now opportunity
Beware to meet with falsehood, if thou canst
Shun it, my friends faith's turning from him.

Ism. Might I not justly accuse Antonio.
For a love-wanderer? you know no other
But me, for another, and confess troth now?

Ant. Here was my guide, where ere I find this face,
I am a Lover, marry, I must not miss
This freckle then, I have the number of 'em,
Nor this dimple, nor a silk from this brow,
I carry the full Idea ever with me;
If nature can so punctually parallel,
I may be cozened.

Ism. Well, all this is even:
But now, to perfect all, our love must now
Come to our Enemies hands, where neither part
Will ever give consent to't.

Ant. Most certain:
For which reason it must not be put to'em:
Have we not prevention in our own hands.
Shall I walk by the tree? desire the fruit,
Yet be so nice to pull till I ask leave
Of the churlish Gard'ner, that will deny me?

Ism. O Antonio.

Ant. 'Tis manners to fall to
When grace is said.

Ism. That holy acts to come.

Mar. You may open an oyster or two before grace.

Ant. Are there not double vows, as valuable
And as well spoke as any Frier utters?

Heaven has heard all.

Ism. Yes: but staves the blessing,
Till all dues be done: heaven is not serv'd by halves.
We shall have ne'r a fathers blessing here,
Let us not lose the better, from above.

Ant. You take up weapons of unequal force,
It shows you cowardly: heark in your ear.

Am. Have I lost all employment? Would this proffer
Had been to me, though I had paid it
With a reasonable pennance.

Mar. Have I past
All thy fore-lock (Time?) I'll stretch a long arm
But I'll catch hold again: Do but look back
Over thy shoulder, and have a pull at thee.

Ism. I hear you (Sir) nor can I hear too much
While you speak well: You know th'accustom'd place
Of our night-parley: if you can ascend,
The window shall receive you. You may find there
A corrupted Church-man to bid you welcome.

Ant. I would meet no other man.

Ism. Aminta, you hear this.

Am. With joy (Madam) 'cause it pleases you.
It may be mine own case another time:
Now you go the right way; ask the Banes out,
Put it past father, or friends, to forbid it,
And then you're sure. Sir, your Hymen Taper
I'll light up for you: the window shall show you
The way to Sestos.

Ant. I'll venture drowning.

Mar. The simile holds not; 'tis hanging rather.
You must ascend your Castle by a Ladder;
To the foot I'll bring you.

Ant. Leave me to climb it.

Mar. If I do turn you off?

Ant. Till night fare-well:
Then better.

Ism. Best it should be;
But peevish hatred keeps back that degree. Exeunt.

Mar. I never look'd so smooth as now I purpose:
And then beware: Knave is at worst of knave
When he smiles best, and the most seems to save. Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Julio.

Jul. My mind's unquiet; while Antonio
My Nephew's abroad, my heart is not at home,
Only my fears stay with me; bad company:
But I cannot shift 'em off. This hatred
Betwixt the house of Bellides and us,
Is not fair war: 'tis civil, but uncivil.
We are near neighbors, were of love as near,
Till a cross misconstruction ('twas no more
In conscience) put us so far asunder:
I would 'twere reconcil'd; it has lasted
Too many Sun-sets, if grace might moderate;
Man should not lose so many days of peace
To satisfy the anger of one minute.
I could repent it heartily. I sent
The knave to attend my Antonio too,
Yet he returns no comfort to me neither.

Enter Bustofa.

Bust. No: I must not.

Jul. Hah; hee's come.

Bust. I must not: 'twill break his heart to hear it.

Jul. How? there's bad tidings: I must obscure and hear it;
He will not tell me for breaking of my heart,
'Tis half split already.

Bust. I have spi'd him: Now to knock down a Don with a lye, a silly harmless lye; 'twill be valiantly done, and nobly perhaps.

Jul.

Jul. I cannot hear him now.

Bust. Oh the bloody days that we live in; the envious, malicious, deadly days that we draw breath in!

Jul. Now I hear too loud.

Bust. The Children that ever shall be born may rue it; for men that are slain now might have liv'd to have got children, that might have curs'd their fathers.

Jul. Oh, my posterity is ruin'd.

Bust. Oh sweet Antonio.

Jul. Oh dear Antonio.

Bust. Yet it was nobly done of both parts: When he and Lisauero met.

Jul. Oh, death Has parted 'em.

Bust. Welcome my mortal foe (says one,) Welcome my deadly enemy (says th'other :) off go their doublets, they in their shirts, and their swords stark naked; here lies Antonio, here lies Lisauero: he comes upon him with an Embroiderado, that he puts by with a puncta reversa; Lisauero recoils me two paces and some six inches back, takes his career, and then, on.

Jul. Oh.

Bust. Runs Antonio quite thorow,

Jul. Oh villain.

Bust. Quite thorow between the arm and the body: so yet he had no hurt at that bout.

Jul. Goodness be praised.

Bust. But then, at next encounter, he fetches me up Lisauero; Lisauero makes out a long at him, which he thinking to be a Passado, Antonio's foot slipping: down: oh down.

Jul. O now thou art lost.

Bust. Oh, but the quality of the thing: both Gentlemen, both Spanish Christians, yet one man to shed

Jul. Say his enemies blood.

Bust. His hair, may come by divers casualties, though he never go into the field with his foe: but a man to lose nine ounces and two drams of blood at one wound, thirteen and a scruple at another, and to live till he dye in cold blood: yet the Surgeon (that cur'd him) said if Pia-mater had not been perish'd, he had been a lives man till this day.

Jul. There he concludes he is gone.

Bust. But all this is nothing: now I come to the point.

Jul. I, the point, that's deadly: the antient blow Over the buckler, ne'r went half so deep.

Bust. Yet pitty bids me keep in my charity: for me to pull an old man's ears from his head with telling of a Tale: oh fowle Tale! No, be silent Tale. Farthermore, there is the charge of Buriall; every one will cry Blacks, Blacks, that had but the least finger dipt in his blood, though ten degrees remov'd when 'twas done. Moreover, the Surgeon (that made an end of him) will be paid: Sugar-plums and sweet breads; yet I say, the man may recover again, and dye in his bed.

Jul. What motley stuff is this? Sirrha, speak truth. What hath befallen my dear Antonio?
 Restrain your pitty in concealing it;
 Tell me the danger full; take off your care
 Of my receiving it: kill me that way,
 I'll forgive my death; what thou keepst back from truth
 Thou shalt speak in pain; do not look to find
 A limb in his right place, a bone unbroke,
 Nor so much flesh unbroil'd of all that mountain,
 As a worm might sup on, dispatch, or be dispatch'd.

Bust. Alas Sir, I know nothing, but that Antonio is a man of Gods making to this hour, 'tis not two since I left him so.

Jul. Where didst thou leave him?

Bust. In the same clothes he had on when he went from you.

Jul. Does he live?

Bust. I saw him drink.

Jul. Is he not wounded?

Bust. He may have a cut i'th' leg by this time; for Don Martin and he were at whole slashes.

Jul. Met he not with Lisauero?

Bust. I do not know her.

Jul. Her? Lisauero is a man, as he is.

Bust. I saw ne'er a man like him.

Jul. Didst thou not discourse a fight betwixt Ant. and Lis?

Bust. I to my self; I hope a man may give himself the lye if it please him.

Jul. Didst thou lye then?

Bust. As sure as you live now.

Jul. I live the happier by it: when will he return?

Bust. That he sent me to tell you, within these ten days at farthest.

Jul. Ten days? he's not wont to be absent two.

Bust. Nor I think he will not, he said he would be at home to morrow, but I love to speak within my compass.

Jul. You shall speak within mine Sir, now. Within there.

Enter Servants.

Take this fellow into custody, keep him safe I charge you.

Bust. Safe? do you hear? take notice what plight you find me in, if there want but a collop or a steak o'me, look to't.

Jul. If my Nephew return not in his health to morrow, Thou goest to th'Rack.

Bust. Let me go to th'manger first; I had rather eat oats than hay.

Exeunt.

Enter Bellides with a Letter.

Bel. By your leave, Sir.

Jul. For ought I know yet, you are welcome Sir. (easie,

Bel. Read that, and tell me so: or if thy spectacles be not Keep thy nose unsadl'd, and ope thine ears; I can speak thee the contents, I made 'em; 'Tis a challenge, a fair one, I'll maintain't: I scorn to hire my Second to deliver't, I bring't my self: Dost know me, Julio?

Jul. Bellides?

Bel. Yes: is not thy hair on end now?

Jul. Somewhat amaz'd at thy rash hardiness; How durst thou come so near thine enemy?

Bel. Durst?

I dare come nearer: thou'rt a fool, Julio.

Jul. Take it home to thee with a knave to boot.

Bel. Knave to thy teeth again: and all that's quit: Give me not a fool more than I give thee, Or if thou dost, look to hear on't again.

Jul. What an encounter's this?

Bel. A noble one:

My hand is to my words, thou hast it there, There I do challenge thee, if thou dar'st be Good friends with me; or I'll proclaim thee coward,

Jul. Be friends with thee?

Bel. I'll shew thee reasons for't:
 A pair of old Coxcombs (now we go together)
 Such as should stand examples of discretion,
 The rules of Grammar to unwilling youth
 To take out lessons by; we that should check
 And quench the raging fire in others bloods,
 We strike the battel to destruction?
 Read 'em the black art? and make 'em believe
 It is divinity? Heathens, are we not?
 Speak thy conscience, how hast thou slept this month,
 Since this Fiend haunted us?

Jul. Sure some Good Angel

Was with us both last night: speak thou truth now, Was it not last nights motion?

Bel. Dost not think

I would not lay hold of it at first proffer?
 Should I n'er sleep again?

Jul. Take not all from me;

I'll tell the doctrine of my vision.
 Say that Lisauero (best of thy blood)
 Or any one, the least allyed to thee,

Should

Should be the prey unto Lisandro's sword,
Or any of the house of Bellides?

Bel. Mine was the just inversion: on, on.

Jul. How would thine eyes have emptied thee in sorrow,
And left the Conduit of nature drie?
Thy hands have turn'd rebellious to the balls,
And broke the glasses, with thine own curses
Have torn thy soul, left thee a Statue
To propagate thy next posterity.

Bel. Yes, and thou causer: so it said to me,
They fight but your mischiefs: the young men were friends,
As is the life and blood coagulate
And curded in one body; but this is yours,
An inheritance that you have gather'd for 'em,
A Legacie of blood to kill each other
Throughout your Generations. Was't not so?

Jul. Word for word.

Bel. Nay, I can go farther yet.

Jul. 'Tis far enough; Let us atone it here.
And in a reconciled circle fold
Our friendship new again.

Bel. The sign's in Gemini,
An auspicious house, 't has join'd both ours again.

Jul. You cannot proclaim me coward now, Don Bellides.

Bel. No: thou 'rt a valiant fellow: so am I:
I'll fight with thee at this hug, to the last leg
I have to stand on, or breath or life left.

Jul. This is the salt unto humanity,
And keeps it sweet.

Bel. Love! oh life stinks without it.
I can tell you news.

Jul. Good has long been wanting.

Bel. I do suspect, and I have some proof on't,
(So far as a Love-Epistle comes to)
That Antonio (your Nephew) and my daughter
Ismenia are very good friends before us.

Jul. That were a double wall about our houses,
Which I could wish were built.

Bel. I had it
From Antonio's Intimate, Don Martin:
And yet (me thought) it was no friendly part
To show it me.

Jul. Perhaps 't was his consent:
Lovers have policies as well as Statesmen:
They look not always at the mark they aim at.

Bel. Wee'll take up cudgels, and have one bowt with 'em,
They shall know nothing of this union:
And till they find themselves most desperate,
Succor shall never see 'em.

Jul. I'll take your part Sir.

Bel. It grows late; there's a happy day past us.

Jul. The example I hope to all behind it. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Aminta (above) with a Taper.

Am. Stand fair, light of Love, which epithite and place
Adds to thee honour, to me it would be shame,
We must be weight in love, no grain too light;
Thou art the Land-mark, but if love be blind,
(As many that can see have so reported)
What benefit canst thou be to his darkness?
Love is a jewel (some say) inestimable,
But hung at the ear, deprives our own sight,
And so it shines to others, not our selves.
I speak my skill, I have only heard on't,
But I could wish a nearer document,
Alas, the ignorant desire to know:
Some say Love's but a toy, and with a but.
Now methinks I should love it ne'er the worse,
A toy is harmless sure, and may be plaid with,
It seldome goes without his adjunct, pretty,
A pretty toy we say, 'tis meeter to joy too.

Well, here may be a mad night yet for all this,
Here's a Priest ready, and a Lady ready:
A chamber ready, and a bed ready,
'Tis then but making unready, and that's soon done:
My Lady is my Cosen; I, my self,
Which is nearest then? My desires are mine,
Say they be hers too, is't a hanging matter?
It may be ventur'd in a worser cause,
I must go question with my conscience:
I have the word; Centinel, do thou stand,
Thou shalt not need to call, I'll be at hand. Exit.

Enter Antonio and Martin.

Ant. Are we not dog'd behind us, thinkst thou friend?

Mar. I heard not one bark, Sir.

Ant. There are that bite

And bark not (man:) me-thought I spy'd two fellows
That through two streets together walk'd aloof,
And wore their eyes suspiciously upon us.

Mar. Your Jealousie, nothing else; or such perhaps
As are afraid as much of us, who knows
But about the like business? but for your fears fake
I'll advise and intreat one curtesie.

Ant. What's that friend?

Mar. I will not be denyed, Sir,
Change your upper garments with me.

Ant. It needs not.

Mar. I think so too, but I will have it so,
If you dare trust me with the better Sir.

Ant. Nay then.

Mar. If there should be danger towards,
There will be the main mark I'm sure.

Ant. Here thou tak'st from me.

Mar. Tush, the General
Must be safe, how ere the Battle goes:
See you the Beacon yonder?

Ant. Yes, we are near shore.

Enter 2. Gentlemen with weapons drawn, they set upon Martin: Antonio pursues them out in rescue of Martin.

Mar. Come, Land, land, you must clamber by the cliffe,
Here are no stairs to rise by.

Ant. I are you there? fight and Exeunt.

Enter Aminta above, and Martin return'd again ascends.

Am. Antonio?

Mar. Yes Ismenia.

Am. Thine own.

Mar. Quench the light, thine eyes are guides illustrious.

Am. 'Tis necessary. Exeunt.

Enter Antonio.

Mar. Your legs have sav'd your lives, who ere you are,
Friend. Martin? where art thou? not hurt I hope:
Sure I was farthest in the pursuit of 'em:
My pleasures are forgotten through my fears:
The lights extinct, it was discreetly done:
They could not but have notice of the broil,
And fearing that might call up company,
Have carefully prevented, and closed up:
I do commend the heed; oh, but my friend;
I fear his hurt: friend? friend? it cannot be
So mortal, that I should lose thee quite, friend?
A groan, anything that may discover thee:
Thou art not sunk so far, but I might hear thee:
I'll lay mine ear as low as thou canst fall:
Friend, Don Martin, I must answer for thee,
'Twas in my cause thou feel'st, if thou be'st down,
Such dangers stand betwixt us and our ioyes,
That should we forethink ere we undertake,

Wee'd

Wee'd sit at home, and save. What a night's here?
 Purpos'd for so much joy, and now dispos'd
 To so much wretchedness? I shall not rest in't:
 If I had all my pleasures there within,
 I should not entertain 'em with a smile.
 Good night to you: Mine will be black and sad,
 A friend cannot, a woman may be bad.

Exit.

Actus Quintus.

Scena Prima.

Enter Ismenia and Aminta.

Ism. O thou false,

Am. Do your daringst, he's mine own,
 Soul and body mine, church and chamber mine,
 Totally mine.

Ism. Dar'st thou face thy falshood?

Am. Shall I not give a welcome to my wishes
 Come home so sweetly: farewell your company
 Till you be calmer woman.

Exit.

Ism. Oh what a heap
 Of misery has one night brought with it.

Enter Antonio.

Ant. Where is he? do you turn your shame from me?
 You'r a blind Adulterers, you know you are.

Ism. How's that Antonio?

Ant. Till I have vengeance,
 Your sin's not pardonable: I'll have him,
 If hell hide him not: y'have had your last of him.

Exit.

Ism. What did he speak? I understood him not,
 He call'd me a foul name, it was not mine,
 He took me for another sure.

Enter Bellides.

Bell. Ha? are you there?
 Where's your sweet heart? I have found you Traytor
 To my house: wilt league with mine enemy?
 You'll shed his blood, you'll say: hah? will you so?
 And fight with your heels upwards? No Minion,
 I have a husband for you, since y'are so rank,
 And such a husband as thou shalt like him,
 Whether thou wilt or no: Antonio?

Ism. It thunders with the storm now.

Bel. And to night
 I'll have it dispatch'd: I'll make it sure, I,
 By to morrow this time thy Maiden-head
 Shall not be worth a Chicken, if it were
 Knockt at an out-cry: go, I'll ha'ye before me:
 Shough, shough, up to your coop, Pea-Hen.

Ism. Then I'll try my wings.

Exit.

Bel. I, are you good at that? stop, stop thief, stop there.

Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Otrante and Florimell singing.

1. SONG.

Flo. Now having leisure, and a happy wind,
 Thou mayst at pleasure cause the stones to grind,
 Sayls spread, and grist here ready to be ground,
 Fie, stand not idly, but let the Mill go round.

Otr. Why dost thou sing and dance thus? why so merry?

Why dost thou look so wantonly upon me?
 And kiss my hands?

Flo. If I were high enough,
 I would kiss your lips too.

Otr. Do, this is some kindness,
 This tastes of willingness, nay, you may kiss
 Still, but why o'th' sudden now does the fit take ye,
 Unoffer'd, or uncompell'd? why these sweet curtelies?
 Even now you would have blush'd to death to kiss thus:
 Prethee let me be prepar'd to meet thy kindness,
 I shall be unfurnish'd else to hold thee play, wench:
 Stay now a little, and delay your blessings;
 If this be love, methinks it is too violent:
 If you repent you of your strictness to me,
 It is so sudden, it wants circumstance.

Flo. Fy, how dull?

2. SONG.

How long shall I pine for love?
 how long shall I sue in vain?
 How long like the Turtle-Dove shall I heavenly thus complain?
 Shall the sayls of my love stand still?
 Shall the grists of my hopes be unground?
 Oh fie, oh fie, oh fie,
 Let the Mill, let the Mill go round.

Otr. Prethee be calm a little,
 Thou mak'st me wonder, thou that wert so strange,
 And read such pious rules to my behavior
 But yesternight, thou that wert made of modesty,
 Shouldst in a few short minutes turn thus desperate.

Flo. You are too cold.

Otr. I do confess I freeze now,
 I am another thing all over me:
 It is my part to woe, not to be courted:
 Unfold this Riddle, 'tis to me a wonder,
 That now 'oth' instant ere I can expect,
 Ere I can turn my thoughts, and think upon
 A separation of your honest carriage
 From the desires of youth, thus wantonly,
 Thus beyond expectation:

Flo. I will tell ye,
 And tell ye seriously, why I appear thus,
 To hold ye no more ignorant and blinded,
 I have no modestie, I am truly wanton:
 I am that you look for Sir; now come up roundly:
 If my strict face and counterfeited statelynes
 Could have won on ye, I had caught ye that way, (ye.
 And you should never have come to have known who hurt
 Prethee (sweet Count) be more familiar with me.
 How ever we are open in our natures,
 And apt to more desires than you dare meet with,
 Yet we affect to lay the gloss of good on't:
 I saw you touch not at the bait of chastity,
 And that it grew distasteful to your palate
 To appear so holy, therefore I take my true shape:
 Is your bed ready Sir? you shall quickly find me.

3. SONG

On the bed Ile throw thee, throw thee down;
 Down being laid, shall we be afraid
 To try the rights that belong to love?
 No, no, there I'll woe thee with a Crown,
 Crown our desires, kindle the fires,
 When love requires we should wanton prove,
 We'll kiss, we'll sport, we'll laugh, we'll play,
 If thou com'st short, for thee I'll stay,
 If thou unskilful art on the ground,
 I'll kindly teach, we'll have the Mill go round.

Otr. Are ye no Maid.

Flo.

Flo. Alas (my Lord) no certain:
I am sorry you are so innocent to think so,
Is this an age for silly Maids to thrive in?
It is so long too since I lost it Sir,
That I have no belief I ever was one:
What should you do with Maiden-heads? you hate 'em,
They are peevish, petty things, that hold no game up,
No pleasure neither, they are sport for Surgeons:
I'll warrant you I'll fit you beyond Maiden-head:
A fair and easie way men travel right in,
And with delight, discourse, and twenty pleasures,
They enjoy their journey; mad men creep through hedges.
Otr. I am metamorphos'd: why do you appear,
I conjure ye, beyond belief thus wanton?
Flo. Because I would give ye
Pleasure beyond belief.

4. S O N G.

*Think me still in my Fathers Mill, where I have oft been found-a
Thrown on my back, on a well-fill'd sack,
while the Mill has still gone round-a:
Pretbe firrah try thy skill,
and again let the mill go round-a.*

Otr. Then you have traded?
Flo. Traded? how should I know else how to live Sir,
And how to satisfie such Lords as you are,
Our best guests, and our richest?
Otr. How I shake now?
You take no base men?
Flo. Any that will offer,
All manner of men, and all Religions Sir,
There be toucht in our time: all States and Ages,
We exempt none.

5. S O N G.

*The young one, the old one, the fearful, the bold one,
the lame one, though nere so unsound,
The Jew or the Turk, have leave for to work,
the whilst that the Mill goes round.*

Otr. You are a common thing then.
Flo. No matter since you have your private pleasure,
And have it by an Artist excellent,
Whether I am thus, or thus, your men can tell ye.
Otr. My Men? Defend me, how I freeze together,
And am on Ice? do I bite at such an Orange
After my men? I am preferr'd.
Flo. Why stay ye?
Why do we talk my Lord, and lose our time?
Pleasure was made for lips, and sweet embraces,
Let Lawyers use their tongues: pardon my Modesty,
This desperate way must help; or I am miserable.
Otr. She turns, and wipes her face, she weeps for certain,
Some new way now, she cannot be thus beastly,
She is too excellent: fair to be thus impudent:
She knows the elements of common looseness,
The art of lewdness: that, that, that, how now, Sir?

Enter a servant.

Scr. The King (and't please your Lordship) is alighted
Close at the gate.
Otr. The King?
Scr. And calls for ye Sir.
Means to break-fast here too.
Flo. Then I am happy.
Otr. Stol'n so suddenly? go lock her up.
Lock her up where the Courtiers may not see her,
Lock her up closely, firrah, in my closet.
Scr. I will (my Lord) what does she yield yet? Exit.

Otr. Peace:

She is either a damn'd divel, or an Angel,
No noise (upon your life Dame) but all silence.

Enter King, Lords, Vertigo, Lifauro, Terfo.

Otr. Your Majesty heaps too much honor on me,
With such delight to view each several corner
Of a rude pile: there's no proportion in't, Sir.
Phil. Me-thinks 'tis handsome, and the rooms along
Are neat, and well contriv'd: the Gallery
Stands pleasantly and sweet: what rooms are these?

Otr. They are luttish ones.
Phil. Nay, I must see.
Otr. Pray ye do Sir,
They are lodging-chambers over a homely garden.
Phil. Fit still, and handsome; very well: and those?
Otr. Those lead to the other side o'th' house, and't like ye
Phil. Let me see those.
Otr. Ye may, the doers are open.
What would this view mean? I am half suspicious.
Phil. This little Room?
Otr. 'Tis mean: a place for trash Sir,
For rubbish of the house.
Phil. I would see this too:
I will see all.

Otr. I beseech your Majesty,
The favor of it, and the courie appearance. (with it,
Phil. 'Tis not so bad, you would not offend your house
Come, let me see.

Otr. Faith Sir,
Phil. P'faith I will see.
Otr. My Groom has the key Sir, and'tis ten to one —
Phil. But I will see it: force the lock (my Lords)
There be smiths enough to mend it: I perceive
You keep some rarethings here, you would not show Sir.

Florimel discover'd.

Ter. Here's a fair maid indeed.
Phil. By my faith is she;
A handsome girl: come forward, do not fear wench.
I marry, here's a treasure worth concealing:
Call in the Miller.

Otr. Then I am discover'd.
I confess all before the Miller comes Sir,
'Twas but intention, from all act I am clear yet.

Enter Franio.

Phil. Is this your daughter?
Fra. Yes, and't please your Highness.
This is the shape of her, for her substance Sir,
Whether she be now honorable or dishonorable:
Whether she be a white-rose, or a canker is the question:
I thank my Lord, he made bold with my Philly,
If she be for your pace, you had best preserve her Sir,
She is tender mouth'd, let her be broken handsomly.

Phil. Maid, were you stol'n?
Flo. I went not willingly,
And't please your Grace, I was never bred so boldly.
Phil. How has he us'd ye?
Flo. Yet Sir, very nobly.

Phil. Be sure ye tell truth, and be sure (my Lord)
You have not wrong'd her: if ye have, I tell ye
You have lost me, and your self too: speak again (wench)
Flo. He has not wrong'd me, Sir; I am yet a maid:
By all that's white and innocent, I am Sir,
Only I suffer'd under strong temptations
The heat of youth; but heaven deliver'd me.
My Lord, I am no whore, for all I faign'd it,
And faign'd it cunningly, and made ye loath me:
'Twas time to out-do you: I had been rob'd else,
I had been miserable, but I forgive ye.

Phil.

Phil. What recompence for this?

Ort. A great one Sir,
Forgive me sweet.

Flo. I do my Lord.

Ort. I thank ye;

The next take this, and these: all I have Florimel.

Flo. No good my Lord, these often corrupt Maidens:
I dare not touch at these; they are lime for Virgins;
But if you'll give me.

Ort. Any thing in my power.
Or in my purchase.

Flo. Take heed (noble Sir)
You'll make me a bold asker.

Ort. Ask me freely.

Flo. Ask you? I do ask you, and I deserve ye,
I have kept ye from a crying sin would damn ye
To Men and Time: I have preserv'd your credit,
That would have died to all posterity:
Curfes of maids shall never now afflict ye,
Nor Parents bitter tears make your name barren:
If he deserves well that redeems his Countrey,
And as a Patriot be remembred nobly,
Nay, set the highest: may not I be worthy
To be your friend, that have preserv'd your honor?

Ort. You are, and thus I take ye: thus I seal ye
Mine own, and only mine.

Phil. Count, she deserves ye,
And let it be my happiness to give ye,
I have given a virtuous maid, now I dare say it,
'Tis more then blood; I'll pay her portion Sir,
And't shall be worthy you.

Fra. I'll sell my Mill,

I'll pay some too: I'll pay the Fiddlers.
And we'll have all i'th' Country at this wedding,
Pray let me give her too, here my Lord take her,
Take her with all my heart, and kiss her freely,
Would I could give you all this hand has stol'n too,
In portion with her, 'twould make her a little whiter.
The wind blows fair now, get me a young Miller.

Ver. She must have new clothes.

Tir. Yes.

Vir. Yes marry must she.

If't please ye (Madam) let me see the state of your body.
I'll fit you instantly.

Phil. Art not thou gone yet? (now)

Ver. And't please your Grace, a gown, a handsome gown
An orient gown.

Phil. Nay, take thy pleasure of her.

Ver. Of cloth of Tifflew I can fit ye (Madam)
My Lords, stand out o'th' light, a curious body,
The neatest body in Spain this day: with embroidered flow'rs,
A clinquant Petticoat of some rich stuffe,
To catch the eye: I have a thousand fashions.
O sleeve, O sleeve: I'll study all night (Madam)
To magnifie your sleeve.

Ort. Do, superstitious Tailor,
When ye have more time.

Flo. Make me no more then woman,
And I am thine.

Ort. Sir, haply my Wardrobe with your help
May fit her instantly: will you try her?

Ver. If I fit her not, your Wardrobe cannot.
But if the fashion be not there, you marre her.

Enter Antonio, Constable, Officers.

Ant. Is my offence so great, ere I be convict,
To be torn with Rascals? If it be Law,
Let 'em be wild horses rather than these.

Phil. What's that? (Grace)

Con. This is a man suspected of murder, if it please your

Phil. It pleases me not (friend) But who suspects him?

Const. We that are your Highness's extraordinary officers,
We that have taken our oaths to maintain you in peace.

Phil. 'Twill be a great charge to you.

Const. 'Tis a great charge indeed; but then we call our neighbors to help us. This Gentleman and another were fallen out (yet that's more then I am able to say, for I heard no words between 'em, but what their weapons spoke, Clash, and Clatter) which we seeing, came with our Bills of government, and first knock'd down their weapons, and then the men.

Phil. And this you did to keep the peace?

Const. Yes, and't like your Grace, we knock'd 'em down to keep the peace: this we laid hold on, the other we set in the stocks. That I could do by mine own power, without your Majesty.

Enter Aminta.

Phil. How so, Sir?

Const. I am a Shoo-maker by my Trade.

Am. Oh my Husband!

Why stands my husband as a man endanger'd?
Restore him me, as you are merciful,
I'll answer for him.

Ant. What woman's this? what husband? hold thy bawl-
I know thee for no wife. (ing)

Am. You married me last night.

Ant. Thou lyest: I neither was in Church nor house
Last night, nor saw I thee: a thing that was my friend,
I scorn to name now, was with Isfenia,
Like a thief, and there he violated
A sacred trust. This thou mayst know (Aminta.)

Am. Are not you he?

Ant. No; nor a friend of his:
Would I had kill'd him: I hope I have.

Am. That was my Husband (Royal Sir) that man,
That excellent man.

Enter Bellides.

Ant. That villain, that thief.

Bel. Have I caught you Sir? well overtaken.
This is mine enemy: pardon, (my Sovereign.)

Phil. Good charity, to crave pardon for your enemy.

Bel. Mine own pardon (Sir) for my joyes rudeness:
In what place better could I meet my foe,
And both of us so well provided too?

He with some black blood-thirsty crime upon him,
That (ere the horse-leech burst) will suck him dry:
I with a second accusation,
Enough to break his neck, if need should be,
And then to have even Justice it self to right us:
How should I make my joyes a little civil,
They might not keep this noyse?

Ant. Here is some hope.

Should the ax be dull, the halter's preparing,

Phil. What's your accusation, Sir? We have heard the former.

Enter Julio.

Bel. Mine (my Lord?) a strong one.

Jul. A false one, Sir.

At least malicious: an evidence
Of hatred and despight: He would accuse
My poor kinsman of that he never dream'd of,
Nor waking saw; the stealing of his daughter,
She whom, I know, he would not look upon.
Speak Antonio, Didst thou ever see her?

Ant. Yes Sir, I have seen her.

Bel. Ah ha, friend Julio.

Jul. He might, but how? with an unheedful eye;
An accidental view, as men see multitudes
That the next day dare not precisely say
They saw that face, or that amongst 'em all,
Didst thou so look on her?

S

Bel.

Bel. Guilty, guilty:
His looks hang themselves.

Phil. Your patience (Gentleman.)
I pray you tell me if I be in error,
I may speak often when I should but hear:
This is some show you would present us with,
And I do interrupt it: Pray you speak,
(It seems no more) Is't any thing but a show?

Bel. My Lord, this Gentlewoman can show you all,
So could my daughter too: if she were here;
By this time they are both inmodest enough:
Shee's fled me, and I accuse this thief for't.
Don Martin, his own friend's my testimony:
A practis'd night-work.

Phil. That Martin's the other
In your custodie; he was forgotten:
Fetch him hither.

Const. Wee'll bring the Stocks and all else, and't please your Grace.

Enter Bustofa and Ismenia.

Am. That man's my husband certain, instead of this:
Both would have deceiv'd, and both beguil'd.

Bust. Soh hoh, Miller, Miller, look out Miller: is there n'ere a Miller amongst you here, Gentlemen?

Tir. Yes Sir, here is a Miller amongst Gentlemen,
A Gentleman Miller.

Bust. I should not be far off then; there went but a pair of sheers and a bodkin between us. Will you to work Miller? Here's a maid has a sack full of news for you: shall your stones walk? will you grind Miller?

Phil. This your son, Franio?

Fra. My ungracious, my disobedient,
My unnatural, my rebel son (my Lord.)

Bust. Fie, your hopper runs over, Miller.

Fra. This villain (of my own flesh and blood) was accessary
To the stealing of my daughter.

Bust. Oh Mountain,
Shalt thou call a molehill a scab upon the face
Of the earth? though a man be a thief, shall a Miller call
Him so? Oh egregious!

Jul. Remember Sirra, who you speak before.

Bust. I speak before a Miller,
A thief in grain; for he steals corn: He that steals
A wench, is a true man to him.

Phil. Can you prove that? you may help another cause that was in pleading.

Bust. I'll prove it strongly.
He that steals corn, steals the bread of the Common-wealth;
He that steals a wench, steals but the flesh. (the flesh?)

Phil. And how is the bread stealing more criminal then

Bust. He that steals bread, steals that which is lawful every day:

He that steals flesh, steals nothing from the fasting day:
Ergo to steal the bread is the arranter theft.

Phil. This is to some purpose. (full:

Bust. Again, he that steals flesh steals for his own belly
He that steals bread, robs the guts of others:

Ergo, The arranter thief the bread-stealer.

Again he that steals flesh, steals once, and gives over;
yes, and often pays for it: the other steals every day, without satisfaction. To conclude, Bread-stealing is the more capital crime: for what he steals he puts it in at the head:
he that steals flesh (as the Dutch Author says) puts it in at the foot (the lower member.) Will you go as you are now, Miller?

Phil. How has this satisfied you, Don Bellides?

Bel. Nothing (my Lord) my cause is serious.
I claim a daughter from that loving thiefe there.

Ant. I would I had her for you, Sir.

Bel. Ah ha, Julio. (daughter?)

Jul. How said you, Antonio? With you, you had his

Ant. With my soul I wish her; and my body

Shall perish, but I'll enjoy my souls with.
I would have slain my friend for his deceit,
But I do find his own deceit hath paid him.

Jul. Will you vex my soul forth? no other choice
But where my hate is rooted? Come hither Girl,
Whose pretty maid art thou?

Ism. The child of a poor man, Sir.

Jul. The better for it. With my Sovereigns leave,
I'll wed thee to this man, will he, will he.

Phil. Pardon me, Sir, I'll be no Love enforcer:
I use no power of mine unto those ends.

Jul. Wilt thou have him?

Ism. Not unless he love me.

Ant. I do love thee: Farewell all other Beauties:
I settle here: you are Ismenia.

Ism. The same I was: better nor worse, (Antonio)

Ant. I shall have your consent here, I'm sure, Sir.

Bel. With all my heart, Sir. Nay, if you accept it,
I'll do this kindness to mine enemy,
And give her as a Father.

Ant. Shee'll thank you as a Daughter.

Will you not, Ismenia?

Bel. How? Ismenia?

Ism. Your daughter, Sir.

Bel. Is't possible? Away you feeble witted things,
You thought you had caught the old ones: you wade, you
wade

In shallow fords: we can swim, we: look here,
We made the match: we are all friends good friends;
Thin, thin: why the fool knew all this, this fool.

Bust. Keep that to your self, Sir; What I knew I knew:
This sack is a witness. Miller, this is not for your thumming. Here's gold lace: you may see her in her holliday clothes if you will; I was her ward-robe-man.

Enter Martin, Aminta, Constable, Officers.

Ant. You beguil'd me well, Sir.

Mar. Did you speak to me, Sir?

Ant. It might seem to you, Martin, your conscience
Has quick ears.

Mar. My sight was a little dim i'th' dark indeed,
So was my feeling cozen'd; yet I'm content:
I am the better understander now,
I know my wife wants nothing of a woman;
There y'are my Junior.

Ant. You are not hurt?

Mar. Not shrewdly hurt; I have good flesh to heal, you see,
Good round flesh: these cherries will be worth chopping,
Crack stones and all; I should not give much to boot
To ride in your new, and you in my old ones now.

Ant. You mistake the weapon: are you not hurt?

Mar. A little scratch: but I shall claw it off well enough.

Enter Gillian.

Gill. I can no longer own what is not mine
With a free conscience: My Liege, your pardon.

Phil. For what? who knows this woman?

Fra. I best, my Lord,

I have been acquainted with her these forty Summers,
And as many Winters, were it Spring agen;
She's like the Gout I can get no cure for her.

Phil. Oh, your Wife, Franio?

Fra. 'Tis oh my wife indeed, my Lord,
A painful stich to my side; would it were pick'd out.

Phil. Well Sir, your silence.

Bust. Will you be older and older every day than other?
the longer you live the older still? Must his Majesty command your silence ere you'll hold your tongue?

Phil. Your reprehension runs into the same fault:
'Pray Sir, will you be silent.

Bust. I have told him of this before now, my Liege, but Age will have his course, and his weaknesses.

Phil.

Phil. Good Sir, your forbearance.
Bust. And his frailties, and his follies, as I may say, that cannot hold his tongue ere he be bidden.
Phil. Why Sirha?
Bust. But I believe your Majesty will not be long troubled with him: I hope that woman has something to confess will hang them both.
Phil. Sirha, you'll pull your destiny upon you if you cease not the sooner.
Bust. Nay, I have done, my Liege, yet it grieves me that I should call that man Father, that should be so shameless, that being commanded to hold his tongue.
Phil. To th'Porters Lodge with him.
Bust. I thank your Grace, I have a friend there.
Phil. Speak woman, if any interruption meet thee more, it shall be punish'd sharply.
Gill. Good my Liege, (I dare not) Ask you the question why that old man weeps.
Phil. Who? Count Julio? I observ'd it not. You hear the question Sir, will you give the cause?
Jul. Oh my Lord, it hardly will get passage, It is a sorrow of that greatness grown, 'Less it dissolve in tears, and come by parcels.
Gill. I'll help you Sir, in the delivery, And bring you forth a joy. You lost a daughter.
Jul. 'Twas that recounted thought brought forth these sorrows.
Gill. Shee's found again. Know you this mantle Sir?
Jul. Hah?
Gill. Nay leave your wonder, I'll explain it to you. This did enwrap your child, whom ever since I have call'd mine; when Nurse Amaranta In a remove from Mora to Corduba Was seiz'd on by a fierce and hungry Bear, She was the Ravins prey, as heaven so would, He with his booty fill'd, forsook the babe: All this was in my sight: and so long I saw, Untill the cruel creature left my sight, At which advantage I adventur'd me To rescue the sweet Lamb: I did it Sir, And ever since I have kept back your joy, And made it mine: but age hath wearied me, And bids me back restore unto the owner What I unjustly kept these fourteen years.
Jul. Oh, thou hast ta'n so many years from me, And made me young as was her birth day to me. Oh (good my Liege) give my joys a pardon, I must go power a blessing on my child, Which here would be too rude and troublesome. Exit.
Phil. Franio, you knew this before.
Bust. Oh, oh; Item for you Miller.
Fra. I did (my Liege) I must confess I did, And I confess, I ne'r would have confess'd, Had not that womans tongue begun to me: We poor ones love, and would have comforts, Sir, As well as great: this is no strange fault, Sir, There's many men keep other mens children As though they were their own.
Bust. It may stretch farther yet, I beseech you (my Liege) let this woman be a little farther examin'd; let the words of her conscience be search'd, I would know how she came by me: I am a lost child, if I be theirs: though I have been brought up in a Mill, yet I had ever a mind (methought) to be a greater man.

Phil. She will resolve you sure.
Gill. I, I Boy: thou art mine own flesh and blood, Born of mine own body.
Bust. 'Tis very unlikely that such a body should bear me; There's no trust in these Millers. Woman, tell the truth: my father shall forgive thee, whatsoever he was, were he Knight, Squire, or Captain; less he should not be.
Gill. Thou art mine own child, Boy.
Bust. And was the Miller my Father?
Gill. Wouldst thou make thy Mother a whore, Knave?
Bust. I, if she make me a Bastard. The rack must make her confess (my Lord) I shall never come to know who I am else. I have a worshipful mind in me sure: methinks I do scorn poor folks.

Enter Otrante, Florimel and Julio, &c.

Phil. Here comes the brightest glory of the day: Love yolk'd with love, the best equality, Without the level of estate or person.
Jul. You both shall be rewarded bountifully, Wee'll be-a kin too; Brother and Sister Shall be chang'd with us ever.
Bust. Thank you (Unkle) my sister is my cosen yet at the last cast: Farewell sister foster. If I had known the Civil Law would have allowed it, thou hadst had another manner of Husband then thou hast: but much good do thee; I'll dance at thy wedding, kiss the Bride, and so.
Jul. Why, how now Sirha?
Bust. 'Tis lawful now, she's none of my Sister. It was a Miller and a Lord That had a scabbard and a sword He put it up in the Countrey word The Miller and his daughter. She has a face, and she can sing, She has a Grace, and she can spring, She has a place with another thing Tradoodle.
Fra. A knavish Brother of yours (my Lord.)
Bust. Would I were acquainted with your Taylor (Noble Brother.)
Otr. You may: there he is: mine, newly entertain'd.
Ver. If you have any work for me, I can fit you Sir, I fitted the Lady.
Bust. My Sister (Tailor,) what fits her will hardly fit me.
Ver. Who fits her may fit you Sir, the Tailor can do both.
Bust. You have a true yard (Tailor.)
Ver. Ne'r a whit too long, I warrant you.
Bust. Then (Tailor) march with me away I scorn these robes I must be gay, My noble Brother he shall pay Tom Tailor. Exit.
Phil. Your recovered friendships are sound, Gentlemen?
Bel. At heart, at heart (my Lord) the worm shall not Beyond many ages find a breach to enter at.
Phil. These Lovers unities I will not doubt of: How happy have you made our progress then, To be the witness of such fair Accords? Come, now we'll eat with you (my Lord Otrante,) 'Tis a charge sav'd: you must not grudge your guest, 'Tis both my welcome, and your Wedding-Feast. Exit.

Enter Mountferrat.

Mount. DAres she dispise me thus? me that with spoil
And hazardous exploits, full sixteen years
Have led (as hand-maids) Fortune, Victory
Whom the Maltezi call my servitors?
Tempests I have subdued, and fought them calm,
Out-lighten'd lightning in my Chivalry;
Rid (tame as patience) billows that kick'd heaven,
Whistl'd enraged Boreas till his gusts
Were grown so gentle, that he seem'd to sigh,
Because he could not show the ayr my keel,
And yet I cannot conquer her bright eyes,
Which though they blaze both comfort, and invite
Neither by force, nor fraud pass through her ear
(Whose guard is only blushing Innocence)

To take the least possession of her heart,
Did I attempt her with a thred-bare name-unapt with meritorious actions,
She might with colour dis-allow my suit:
But by the honor of this Christian cross
(In blood of Infidels so often dy'd)
Which mine own Soul and Sword hath fixed here
And neither favor, nor births priviledge
Oriana shall confes, although she be
Valettas Sister our Grand-master here,
The wages of scorn'd Love is baneful hate,
And if I rule not her, Ple rule her fate.
Rocca, my trusty Servant, welcome.

Enter Rocca.

Rocca. Sir.

I wish

I wish my news deserv'd it: hapless I
That being lov'd, and trusted fail to bring
The loving answer that you do expect. (send forth)

Mount. Why speak'st thou from me: thy pleas'd eyes
Beams brighter than the star that ushers day,
Thy smiles, restore sick expectation.

Roc. I bring you Sir, her smiles, not mine.

Mount. Her smiles?

Why they are presents for Kings eldest Sons,
Great Solyman that wearies his hot eyes,
But to peruse his deck'd Seraglio,
When from the number of his Concubines.
He chooseth one for that night in his pride
Of them, wives, wealth, is not so rich as I
In this one smile, from Oriana sent.

Roc. Sir, fare ye well.

Mount. Oh Rocca! thou art wise,
And woul'st not have the torrent of my joy
Ruine me headlong; aptly thou conceiv'st
If one reviving smile can raise me thus,
What trances will the sweet words which thou bring'st
Call me into? I felt (my dearest friend,
No more my Servant) when I employ'd thee.
That knew'st to look, and speak as Lovers should,
